THE LAST CHATTEL.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 1866.

CONGRESS.

It was not to be expected that Congress would make great progress in the matter of the reorganization of the Union before the holidays. But, from its action thus far it is very clear that there is not likely to be any serious division in the Union party upon any vital point of the question.

That Mr. STEVENS is of this opinion is clear from his speech, in which he frankly announced that he spoke for himself alone. Yet, however much any thoughtful man may differ from the theories of the situation which were stated in the speech, he can not refuse his admiration to the tone of Roman heroism which rings all through it. THOMPSON STEVENS has what the French call the courage of his opinions, and every member of the House might in that, at least, wisely follow him. The vice of our statesmanship is timidity and the paralyzing force of a minority. One of our cleverest politicians frankly admits that he is a trimmer. He is thinking of Lord HALIFAX. But HALIFAX explained that if he were sailing at a port he would not try to sail against the wind but he would tack. You must have a port. You must see and confide in a principle, or, like a sailor in shoreward currents who does not keep his eye upon the light, you will inevitably go up to the breakers.

Mr. STEVENS certainly keeps his eye upon the light and he scorns the wind. He sees plainly that the end we must seek is sure rather than swift reconstruction; and he states clearly the steps which he thinks essential to that end, regardless of the undoubted truth that the great mass of citizens will reject both his premises and his conclusions. Yet we are inclined to believe that the difference between the various views of the whole question is one of details and not of essence.

Then Mr. RAYMOND replied at some length to the speech of Mr. STEVENS. He combated his views of the exact present condition of the late rebel States. Mr. STEVENS said that they were out of the Union, and were to be treated as conquered territories. Mr. RAYMOND replied that they did not succeed in getting out, and were therefore States in the Union. He is very positive that the States in question are not out of the Union. Mr. STEVENS is equally sure that they are not in. But even Mr. RAYMOND does not think that they are in the Union as New York and Iowa are. Now, can there be two ways of being in the Union? And if there can, are they not, first, as New York is, and, second, as Montana is—that is to say, as a State with every State power untouched, or as a Territory?

But why split hairs? The question of reconstruction is purely practical. If indeed Mr. RAYMOND had argued that every State not in actual armed rebellion—Mississippi for instance—had precisely the same present rights in the Union and in Congress that New York has, and that no conditions could be imposed upon her elections or her conventions, then the question of the exact condition of the States would be the most practical of all. But since both Mr. STEVENS and Mr. RAYMOND are agreed that the States in question are not to be restored until satisfactory pledges are given to the United States, is not the argument of their abstract condition superfluous? Mr. LEXINGTON called that kind of speculation "a pernicious abstraction." The important point, in his judgment, was how they should assume their practical relations in the Union.

Mr. STEVENS calls the late rebel States conquered provinces, in which there is now no government but the military law of the United States; and he insists that Congress must reorganize them with republican forms. Mr. RAYMOND holds that the citizens of those States are defeated insurgents, who must submit to any conditions of surrender imposed by the victorious commander. The theory of both is adjudication. But would Mr. RAYMOND insist that therefore Congress is powerless, and that the whole matter is to be absolutely and finally settled by the President? The President at least makes no such a claim. Has Mr. RAYMOND forgotten that in the President's proclamation appointing Provisional Governors he expressly recommended the people whom he authorized to vote to present governments to which Congress could properly promise the national recognition?

If, as Mr. RAYMOND argues, we have a right to demand certain concessions of the late rebel States, as parts of their surrender and as conditions of their restoration, and among them may require assent to a proposed Constitutional Amendment affecting the whole industrial structure of their society, is it foolish to suppose that we may also require assent to another such amendment affecting the political structure of their society? It may not be expedient to require it, but that is a totally different point. If we are prevented from requiring it, is it not because of certain supposed indefensible, fandamental rights of States? And if that be so, can any State right be more inviolably sacred than that of giving an uncoerced consent to Constitutional Amendments?

The whole difficulty springs from the wrong starting-point of the debate. The sole practical question for Congress is, in view of the actual situation of the late rebel States, in the light of history, of human nature, and of the principles of our Government, what concessions, in Mr. RAYMOND'S words, ought we to demand. The right to demand any whatever arises from the primal right of every Government in the present position of ours to secure its own existence, and includes the right of limiting the demand solely by its estimate of that necessity. Mr. RAYMOND, probably, is of opinion that the necessity can be satisfied by the conditions he names, acceptance of the emancipation amendment; repudiation of the rebel debt; legal protection of freedmen, and revocation of the ordinances of secession. But if one of his colleagues should consider that the necessity could not be satisfied without agreement to a Constitutional Amendment forbidding political disability by reason of birth-place or complexion, or apportioning representation to voters, he would be fully sustained in his position by Mr. RAYMOND'S logic.

We trust, since the President and the Union party are thoroughly persuaded that some concessions may be rightfully demanded and certain conditions imposed, that Congress, after the recess, will devote itself to the most careful study of the actual situation of the States in question, that it may act wisely as well as promptly upon the report of the Committee upon Reconstruction.

WALL STREET PROSPECTS FOR 1866.

There are reasons for believing that the year which is just beginning will be the most active ever known in the history of Wall Street—or, in other words, that it will witness more frequent and extensive fluctuations in values than have occurred in any previous twelve-months.

One principal reason for this belief is the avowed policy of Government and Congress, which looks to an attempted contraction of the currency as the means of restoring specie payments. Such an operation insures a steady succession of ups and downs. While the contraction is merely threatened, without being attempted, business is checked throughout the country, men of capital refuse to part with their money, business paper sells dear, prudent merchants keep out of debt, and the consequence is an extensive accumulation of idle money at the financial centres, which is sure, sooner or later, to generate speculation and cause an advance in stocks. By-and-by the threatened contraction is actually attempted, and then comes a pinch in the money-market; occurring, in all probability, just as speculation is under full headway, and the "outside public" have loaded up with stocks in order to realize a rapid fortune. Hence comes a panic, and a fall in values more rapid than the previous advance; the "outsiders," and many "inside" speculators too, are "cleaned out;" and then follows a season of calm, dullness, and low prices. But this does not last long. Before many weeks elapse Government stops contracting, either from choice or necessity, and, meanwhile, the fall in prices has increased the purchasing power of the currency, so that money again becomes easy, under the influence of which speculation revives again, and a fresh upward movement is inaugurated—to be followed, in due course, by another collapse. These "ups and downs" will naturally succeed each other at intervals of greater or less duration, so long as paper continues a legal tender, and there is no absolute standard of value to regulate the ordinary transactions of business.

Another element of change may be developed from excessive importations—a point to which reference was made in our last number. If we continue to consume foreign goods as we are doing at present a commercial revolution can not long be deferred, for it is impossible for the country, burdened with a debt of $2,000,000,000, and just recovering from four years of exhausting war, to pay for all these goods. A commercial crisis would of course be severely felt in Wall Street. Merchants are all, more or less, holders of public and corporate securities, which would be sacrificed in the event of a general mercantile shipwreck. A pressure to sell would involve a decline in prices which would go on until points were reached at which capital would desert industry, and would flow in from abroad, to secure bargains at panic prices.

Fluctuations in the market price of the leading railway stocks may be expected to result from the uncertainty which overshadows the proportion to be borne hereafter by net to gross earnings. According to the recent report of the New York Central the expenses of that line have increased during the past year so much faster than gross earnings that, though the traffic on the line has been steadily improving, it has yielded nearly a per cent. less to the stockholders than it did in 1863-4. On the other hand, the Michigan Central and the Port Wayne roads are said to be run for about the same ratio of expense as formerly. We are all familiar with the increased cost of living and the increased cost of labor and all kinds of materials: the president of the leading bank of the city declared on oath in court a few days since that the purchasing power of $4000 a year seven years ago was equal to that of $10,000 a year now. It seems, therefore, reasonable to assume that it must cost the railroads much more than it did to run their trains and keep their road bed and equipment in repair. And as they have not, as a general rule, increased their charges either for passengers or freight, being in many instances strictly prohibited from so doing by their charters, it would seem not unlikely that most if not all of them are actually earning less money on their present enormous gross traffic than they earned a few years ago on smaller gross receipts. These considerations would seem to justify lower prices for railway stocks. But, on the other hand, the indications are unmistakable that each railway stock in its turn will be "cornered" by the great operators of the street. What has been done in the Harlem and Prairie du Chien may be done with all the others. The Bears of Wall Street need no pressing to induce them to sell stocks short in any amounts to suit purchasers, and, though it is an open problem whether money is ever made by cornering a stock, there can be no question but that such manoeuvres inflict heavy losses on the parties cornered. Thus it may turn that just as this or that railway stock is proved to be declining in real value it may advance in market-price in consequence of a cornering operation, and may sell, in 1866, on reduced net receipts, at higher figures than were ever reached in its palmiest days of prosperity. Who ever fancied that Prairie du Chien would sell at 250?

But the most lively fluctuations of the year will probably be in Governments. These securities offer a splendid crop of uncertainties to the gambler. On the one hand, they are mostly held on speculation by parties who have not paid for them, can not pay for them, and must sacrifice them whenever a pinch arrives in the money market. They have never gone through the fiery ordeal through which the public securities of all nations that are or have been at war must necessarily pass before they settle down to a fixed position in the market. Who can say what shall be the natural par of Five-Twenty bonds in the years 1870-75? But, on the other hand, these securities are a first mortgage on every acre of land and every dollar's worth of improvement in the whole country from Maine to the Rio Grande. The Five-Twenty bonds are, all things considered, the best security in the world; that is to say, they are as safe as the safest security known; and they yield a larger income than any other first-class Government bond. Seven-Thirties are worse held than Five-Twentys, and the temptation to sell them short is great. But it must be remembered that within thirty-six months from their date they will be payable in full in currency. As that time approaches they will therefore naturally approximate to par. Most of them have nearly a year's interest already accrued. By the time they are within nine months of their maturity they will sell at or nearly par. Speculators have thus from twelve to eighteen months to work in.

If Wall Street continues lively that is time enough for plenty of fluctuations. The bonds may again touch 114, or 99, or both; the notes may sell at 90 and at 100. If speculation once fastens on them there is no saying how they may fluctuate. If a general impression spreads to the effect that they are going to rise, all the world will buy, and prices will advance far beyond real values; if, on the other hand, the public can be persuaded that they are going to fall, the rush to sell will precipitate them much below the figure at which they ought to rule. There are so many of them, and so many people are interested in them, that there is hardly any limit to the possible fluctuations to be caused by the ebb and flow of public confidence. Railway securities interest a comparatively limited class, and every day the danger of corners and of dishonest management is diminishing that class. Governments interest everybody. Every one who has money either holds, or has held, or expects to hold Government securities. Fluctuations in the price of Government will be felt at every breakfast-table in the country. Let Wall Street once seize upon Government bonds as an instrument to gamble with, and the operations in them, and the fortunes lost and made in them will far outstrip the operations and the fortunes of the most active periods of railway speculation.

A TRUE CHRISTMAS STORY.

In the bright and beautiful summer weather there is often a secret sadness in the thought that it will soon pass away; and so as the happy Christmas rhymes ring in the annual carol of CHARLES DICKENS, there is a painful feeling that the time must at last come when he will tell no more Christmas stories. His budget of this year, "Dr. Marigold's Prescriptions," is issued in a cheap and convenient form by the HAUBENS, and his own contributions to it are most characteristic and delightful.

Doctor Marigold himself is a character finished with great elaboration. He is a creation as positive as Dick Swiveller, although as a "Cheap Jack" he is a type of a more limited character. The incidents of his story have a gipsy homeliness and freshness and that exquisite pathos which, when not exaggerated, and it is not in this instance, invest "Jack" and his surroundings with universal interest. It is a Shakespearean power which plucks one true-hearted vagabond out of the crowd of figures which fill England, and makes him typical and immortal. It is DICKENS'S way of preaching humanity. The tender and vivid portraiture of Doctor Marigold will humanize many a heart toward the fellow-man in the tramp or the wandering tinkler. Whatever the tune DICKENS plays upon the Christmas bells, there is always the old strain heard in it: "Peace on earth: good will to men."

In the collection of little tales that make up the story some are merry and some are sad. And how true they are to life every where was painfully illustrated by an incident of a wreck which was published on the very day the story was issued, and which might have been the most tragical of all in some Christmas budgets.

On Tuesday morning, the 19th of December, the schooner Eveline Ricker "set sail in good cheer" from the Delaware breakwater for Pawtucket, Rhode Island. There were but six souls on board; Captain FISHER, a young man of about 27, and his wife of about 20 years, with a mate, a cook, and two seamen, one of whom, LOUIS TALBOT, tells the story. On Wednesday morning it began to blow freshly. During the day the gale increased. At evening Captain FISHER thought he saw the Highland Lights at Sandy Hook, but TALBOT thinks they were lights in houses on the shore. It was then snowing hard and blowing a hurricane. They sounded and found they were drifting fast on shore, spite of all their efforts to keep off. The sails were useless in the storm which parted the ropes, and the waves dashed over the deck and into the cabin. In the total darkness they heard the roaring of the breakers, and found the vessel to be fast filling. They tried the pumps and let go both anchors. The schooner dragged them instantly, and TALBOT looked about for something to make a raft. "I went down into the cabin, which was more than knee-deep with water at the time, and there I saw poor Mrs. FISHER standing quietly in the water." She turned to him and said, pitifully, "I wonder if my husband knows that I am here?" TALBOT lifted her in his arms and placed her in a bunk high out of the water. Then he went up and lashed himself into the fore rigging, while Captain FISHER, wrapping his wife in a huge coat, lashed her into the main rigging. The schooner struck. Every thing was swept away. The foremast went over with the two seamen. Ten minutes afterward the mainmast went; but TALBOT thinks the captain with his wife jumped into the sea before the mast fell; and he heard the cries of Mrs. FISHER in the water. They had been but a few months married. The captain was cool and much liked, and "she kept her courage up well," says TALBOT. But the next morning the dead body of the bride was thrown ashore upon the beach. On her right hand was a kid glove lined with red wool to protect it against the frost, and her clothes were torn to shreds by the furious waves. The body of her husband had not been recovered.

In the pleasant Christmas season, as we read this sad story, the brave old words of Sir HUMPHRY GILBERT are heard again. It was three hundred years ago, in the evening, that the lights upon his vessel were last seen off Newfoundland. Before midnight they had disappeared. But his words are never forgotten, "Heaven is as near by sea as land."

OUR DUTY TO THE FREEDMEN.

THAT the people of the late rebel States will ultimately see the coincidence of justice and prosperity we have no doubt. But General HOWARD and General GRANT and General SCHURZ are all of opinion that for some time yet the National Government must directly see that the freedmen are protected in every personal right. And this, we presume, will be the suggestion of the Committee on Reconstruction.

To leave the freedmen at once in the absolute control of the late rebel population at the South would be a crime which would forever justly disgrace the United States. Whatever the good intentions of large classes of that population may be, we all know too well that the immediate results of such a policy would be. We see it already in North Carolina. In that State a negro was lately convicted of some trifling offense, and was sentenced to slavery for a term of years. The wording of the Constitutional Amendment permits the enormity. Foolishly following the old phraseology of laws in an entirely different condition of affairs the Amendment forbids slavery except as a punishment for crime. Nothing is easier than to erect vagrancy into a crime; then, by refusing to employ the negroes, to compel their vagrancy; then to sell them into slavery for a longer or shorter term.

This is but an illustration of the foul play to which the freedmen will be exposed in the absence of the national protection. And there is no excuse whatever for leaving them to such a fate. Indeed, when we remember the unwavering possession of their fidelity to us during the doubtful years of the war—how tranquilly they repelled their masters' falsehoods meant to inflame them against us—how steadily these people, regarded as apes and treated like cattle, waited for our coming and believed in our frier ship—how they guided all our escaping soldiers, who counted upon their fidelity as surely as they themselves counted in escaping upon the North Star—how they resisted bribes, the arts, tortures, and death rather than betray us, asking no reward, but trusting in us as surely as we trusted in them—when we remember this unprecedented history, and reflect that many among us are now half reluctant not to deliver them into the pitiless hands from which they rescued us, and are calculating how little we can do for them and how much for those who despise and hate them, we may well fear that the lustre of our victory be irretrievably furnished.

The cause of the United States, said the ex-posing Continental Congress, is the cause of human nature. It is so now more than ever. By the fundamental law of the land every man is now the free equal of every other man, the late slave of Governor OUN of South Carolina as much as the Governor himself; and we trust that the Committee upon Reconstruction, looking at facts rather than at theories, will recommend the continuance of the Freedmen's Bureau until the people of the United States are thoroughly satisfied that the personal freedom which they have conferred upon the majority of the people of South Carolina, for instance, is to be respected by the minority.

MR. BIGELOW UPON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

At a late dinner of American citizens in Paris at which Mr. BIGELOW, the Minister of the United States, and General SCOTT were present, Mr. BIGELOW said: "The policy of the American Government is peace with all mankind, and at the present moment, as far as the eye of any statesman can penetrate into the future, there is no probability of a rupture of the good relations which exist between the United States and every other country."

Mr. BIGELOW certainly ought to know, and his remark only confirms the universal impression that the Mexican complication is to be solved without war, as every sensible man heartily hopes it may be. But it is very desirable that the country should know a few details. While we assume from the Message of the President and from such remarks as those of our French Minister that negotiations are pending, it is very clear that the highest interests of the country would gain by making the assumption knowledge. The House of Representatives, upon Mr. SREYESS's motion, has already requested the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate all the information and correspondence upon the subject, and we hope a response will not be long delayed.

Meanwhile there need be no fear that the public interest in the matter will decline, or public vigilance relax. If there are those who suppose that LOUIS NAPOLEON wishes or expects to remain in Mexico, we think they are profoundly mistaken. He does not court war under the inevitable conditions of such a struggle as this would be. He undoubtedly wishes to get out of the scrape, and our true policy is to help him out, not to threaten to kick him out. A peremptory threat from the United States would make France, which now sneers at the Mexican expedition, enthusiastically united in supporting it at all hazards. Now, of course, if it were necessary, the United States are ready and able to encounter the whole of Europe enthusiastically hostile. But, as a matter of fact, it is not necessary. Patience, common sense, and the President's response to Congress, will carry us through.

TAUGHT BY OUR NEIGHBORS.

SOME curious facts are revealed by the statistics in regard to the young men called out to the conscription in France. In one of the departments it appeared that out of 100 young men, 21 years old, 64 can neither read nor write. In other departments the numbers range from 56 to 62 out of every hundred. In 27 departments the number of illiterate young men is more than a third, or certainly one fourth. In 15 others it varies from a fourth to a tenth. In 10 it is less than a tenth. In the Meurthe and Bas-Rhin there are but four or five out of 100 young conscripts who can not read. In the Haute-Marne but three or four. In the Meuse and the Doubs but two or three. There are 86 departments in all, and Paris is in that of the Seine. Strasbourg is in the Bas-Rhin, and Besançon is the Doubs.

The Minister of Public Instruction has verified the figures, and he has offered a gold medal of the value of 200 francs to be given to the Communal schoolmaster in each department who shall be most successful in reducing the number of illiterate persons in the Commune.

This is an illustration of the way in which things are done in France. Instead of a system which makes it the plain interest of every community to take care that its members are properly instructed, the Government offers a pitiful bribe to the village schoolmaster.

But we have also a recent statement of the Condition-of-England-question, which is even worse than that of France. "Nowhere in Ireland," says a correspondent of the New York Times, who is an Englishman, "have I seen the stupid, ignorant, hopelessly-demoralized people that are to be found here by thousands, and it would scarcely be an exaggeration to say by millions. Now a country with such a population needs a government more intelligent, more active, more powerful, more practical than we have got in England. Twenty millions out of thirty have not the pretense of self-government. They are unrepresented in Parliament; they are confessedly out of the pale of the Constitution."

This is what Mr. OLSTEDT remarked nearly twenty years ago in his most valuable and interesting "Walks and Talks of an American Farmer in England." And it is this ignorance and brutishness which are the real peril of Great Britain, in which 36,000 out of the 30,000,000 own the land, and in which the poor are growing poorer and the rich richer.

All these facts should be carefully pondered by every man in this country who thinks that it is safe to deny men education, or to tamper with perfect freedom of speech and the press. Ignorance any where in this country is a peril every where; and in this view the suggestions of General HOWARD in his admirable Report upon the Freedmen are very significant and important.

OUR MAPS OF THE SOUTHERN STATES.

A VIRGINIA landholder lately said to a friend of ours in Richmond, "I own three thousand acres of land, but I have no money to work it with. I want to sell half of it, and I should like nothing so much as to sell it to a company of Vermont farmers." The desire to sell was natural under the circumstances, and the disposition to welcome Vermonters showed with what common sense the gentleman accepted the situation. For it is by actual immigration and social and industrial intercourse that the hostility springing from separation and ignorance will be removed.

We propose to publish a series of carefully prepared maps of the Southern States, beginning with Massachusetts in this number of the Weekly, accompanied by concise and complete industrial statistics, that the general character and special advantages of the Southern part of the country may be understood by those who are thinking of settling there. There is, for instance, no nobler State in the world probably than Virginia. Her climate, her resources, her variety of surface, are unsurpassed. And now that the system of labor which has blighted her is removed, there is no reason to doubt that she will reach a prosperity proportioned to her advantages. And each State has its special attractions. Knowledge, knowledge, knowledge—that is the key with which the golden treasury of the Future is to be unlocked; and we shall do what we can to put it into the hands of every body in this country who can read.

THE RELIEF OF BROADWAY.

THE pressure of travel upon Broadway in the city of New York is such that some method must certainly be devised for its relief. The question is not purely local. Every part of the country and every citizen has a peculiar interest in the great city and all its conveniences of transport, traffic, and amusement. The street railways have been all successful. But they are not adequate to the increasing demand. The cars are crowded to the utmost discomfort of the passengers. They run as often as safety and convenience will permit. But still the throng increases, and new difficulties require new solutions. What shall they be? How shall Broadway be relieved?

The project which is at this moment most widely discussed is an underground railroad. The enterprise is not original to the Yankee genius. It has been tried, and with striking success, in London, and a Company has been already formed in New York which applied for authority to the last Legislature, which passed a bill. The Governor, for sufficient reasons as it seems to us, vetoed the bill.

But the Governor did not express any hostility to the proposition, nor do we learn that he entertains any. He wishes only to secure all interests, and to avoid, as far as possible, the dangers of monopoly and of loosely-guarded discretionary power. A railroad of the kind contemplated could hardly fail, upon perfectly just conditions, to be very profitable; and we shall gladly record that some Company has performed a plan which, with a due regard to the claims of private property and to the public convenience, shall bring the ends of the great city together and relieve the horrors of Broadway.

CARLYLE'S FREDERICK.

THE fifth volume of CARLYLE'S "Frederick" is just published. It is full of the same extraordinary power as the other volumes, and shows its hero's conduct in misfortune and defeat. The conclusion of this work is amazing. CARLYLE has evidently exhausted all the sources of information, and how dreary and forbidding they must be even a slight student of German military or political movements may easily imagine. Yet the weariness of investigation, the despondency and disgust of picking over a mountain of chaff for a single grain of wheat, are not in the least manifest in the result. The history is elastic, sparkling, and forever fresh, and no other author will ever hereafter feel that the task must be again attempted.

It is obvious from the events narrated in this volume that a great soldier like FREDERICK advocates his adversaries, as NAPOLEON did in the next century. The old methods, slow, cumbersome, traditional, disappear before the onset of the fierce rapidity and appalling daring of a fresh genius. The Austrian and French commanders and Governments learned to anticipate the movements of their adversary, and he sometimes counted too confidently upon their stupidity. The energy with which he threw a few men against an army, the promptness with which he conceived his plans, and the skill and tenacity with which he executed them, rank FREDERICK with the greatest soldiers of history; and his heroism, full of resources in extremity and against enormous odds, kindles the enthusiasm of his biographer.

But the significance of the war in its bearing upon civilization, which is its vital importance, is not revealed in the history. As it appears here it is a tremendous conflict of a Titan with forces individually very inferior but collectively vast and overpowering. As a Protestant hero FREDERICK makes a poor figure, but as a King fighting to extend his dominions and maintain his power he is one of the most striking that can be found. CARLYLE depicts Germany as a huge battle-field upon which France, Prussia, Russia, and Austria sustain the shock, and Great Britain is a sorry and futile listener upon the outskirts. The performances of the British contingent under the Duke of Cumberland, as CARLYLE describes them, must make any well-regulated Briton gnash his teeth. His wit is never so sardonic as when he is laughing at the Britons. But the EARL OF CHATHAM is an exception to CARLYLE'S gibes. He shines with new lustre upon these pages. And it is impossible as we read of him not to regret that, instead of FREDERICK THE GREAT and his era in Germany, CARLYLE had not selected CHATHAM and his era for a history. That subject has never been justly or fully treated, and it would have been an addition to British annals not less striking than the Cromwell.

The personal interest of the reader in FREDERICK is no greater in this volume than in the rest. Apparently he had not a single quality which could excite a genial and hearty affection. As a conspicuous and controlling actor upon the public arena his movements are interesting and his talent unquestionable; but as a man using that talent for mankind he is nothing. A certain insincerity and dramatic shallowness spoil his letters and speeches. There are no winning ways in his private intercourse. His career is a selfish struggle. You scarcely care whether he beats in a battle or is beaten. His German foes are thickly veneered with French artifice; and the glow of a divine passion of patriotism or of conviction is totally wanting. He was the son of his father; only in the son's case the drill-sergeant was a man of genius.

THE HANFERS will immediately issue the sixth and concluding volume of the history; and it is with deep sadness that the reader draws toward the end, for it is the last work of importance for which we can look from his author. He is now seventy years old, and great literary works are not undertaken at that age. But we have no right to complain, for CARLYLE has built his monument, not less in the books he has written than in his enduring influence upon the mind and literature of his time. Vexed as the reader must often be by his whims and dogmatism, he knows that a manly, sincere, and great soul is behind them all, like the sun behind clouds and vapors. His name belongs to the most truly illustrious in English letters, not alone because of his scholarship, and works, and genius, but because he has sought truth under every disguise, and has always honored, so far as he understood, whatever is really noble and helpful to mankind. Our war and this country he has never understood, and we can surely forgive the crude folly of his talk about us. CROMWELL and BENES and the French Revolution he did understand, and he has made the world understand them.

SHINING STARS.

Shine, ye stars of heaven,
On a world of pain!
See old Time destroying
All our hoarded gain;
If our sweetest flowers,
Ever stary serene,
Our hard-earned glory,
Every dream divine!

Shine, ye stars of heaven,
On the rolling years!
See how Time, consoling,
Dries the saddest tears,
T' do the darkest storm-clouds
Pass in gentle rains;
While appearing in glory
Flowers and dreams again!

Shine, ye stars of heaven,
On a world of fear!
See how Time, avenging, Bringseth judgment here;
Wearing ill-won honors
To a fiery crown;
Fading hard hearts perish,
Casting proud hearts down.

Shine, ye stars of heaven,
On the hours' short flight!
See how Time, rewarding,
Gilds good deeds with light;
Fays with kindly measure,
Brings earth's dearest price,
Or, crowned with rays divine,
Bids the end arise!

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

December 29: In the Senate, several bills were introduced and referred. Among the most important were a bill for the admission of the northeastern frontier, and one for the establishment of a branch of the Freedmen's Bureau in each of the formerly slave States. A Message was received from the President giving information in regard to the condition of the States lately in rebellion. The Message in its long and matter pronounced decidedly the local disposition of those States, and was accompanied by a report of Lieutenant-General Grant, characterized by a similar spirit. The reports of Howard and Schurz were also submitted. Senator Sumner called the President's Message "a white washing document, only paralleled by Foster's message on Kansas," and considered the alternative followed.

In the House, resolutions of censure from Louisiana and Virginia were referred to the Select Committee. The bill to regulate railroad transportation between the several States, known as the New York and Washington Air Line bill, was passed after a sharp discussion, 92 to 52. A joint resolution for an amendment of the Constitution as to prohibit the assumption or payment of the public debt by any State was adopted.

December 30: In the Senate, the House bill to pay Mrs. President Lincoln $25,000 was passed. It was agreed to adjourn from the 31st to January 3. In the House, resolutions were referred, congratulating the country on the adoption of the constitutional amendment. A bill was passed giving to the Secretary of the Treasury the appointment of Deputy Assessors of Internal Revenue. A bill establishing several new Post routes was adopted. The recess to January 7 was agreed to. A resolution was adopted giving the President control of several Indian funds. -Enclaves were delivered on Mr. Kellogg, lately a member from New York.

December 31: In the Senate, Messrs. Fremont, Gilman, Harris, Howe, Johnson, and Williams were appointed as the Senate's part of the Select Committee of Seven on Reconstruction. In the House, Mr. Ashley, of Nevada, took his seat. -Messrs. Patterson, Ferry, and Guffey were appointed as Examiners of the Southern Expedition. -Mr. Raymond spoke for an hour, mainly in reply to the speech made by Mr. Stevens on the 19th, and taking the general ground that the Southern States were still and always had been members of the Union; that the effort to secede was frustrated by the victories of the Union armies, and was therefore void; and that the arts, speeches, and deeds of arms of the rebels were of no legal effect in disrupting their connection with the General Government.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The Provisional Government has been withdrawn from Georgia, Alabama, and from North and South Carolina. Governor James L. Orr, of South Carolina, has sent a dispatch to Secretary Seward in response to that of the latter, announcing the President's suspension of the provisional government in that State. Governor Orr states that this announcement will be most gratifying to the South Carolinians, returns thanks in their name, and declares his "unshaken purpose to aid in upholding the supremacy of the laws of the United States."

NEWS ITEMS.

On the 24th of December the Anniversary of the Landing of the Pilgrims was observed at Boston by a grand military demonstration, and the imposing ceremonies connected with transfer of the numerous battle-flags of Massachusetts regiments to the State and their deposition in the Capitol. Mr. John Evans and Mr. Jerome B. Claflin, both Republicans, have been elected United States Senators from Colorado. The first forty miles of the Union Pacific Railroad, from Omaha (Nebraska) westward were completed December 18. The Hon. Lewis D. Campbell, of Ohio, has been appointed, by the President, Minister Extraordinary to the Republic of Mexico, in place of General Logan, who declined the office. The total number of emigrants visited at this port for the year ending November 30, 1865, is one hundred and seventy-eight thousand and three, which number is an increase of fifteen thousand over that of last year.

FOREIGN NEWS.

It is stated that the British Government has dismissed Governor Eyre, of Jamaica, a full explanation of the extraordinary measures resorted to after the riot at Morant Bay. It is conceded, even by those English journals which are noted for their hatred of negroes and abolitionists, that Gordon, who was long for settling the riot, had not been proved to be guilty of any action which they would hesitate for a moment to take the responsibility. We learn that Mr. Laurence, whose only crime seems to have been that he was overseer of Gordon's property, has also been hung.

The Parliament must have become extremely sensitive to every symptom of a hostile intention from America. Lately they were fearfully excited because Admiral Farquhar was taking soundings in French waters. The recent arrival of Major-General Sigfield in Paris has thrown these excitable Frenchmen into another panic. "This occasion does make towards us all."

In Italy it appears that the Delta Marmora Cabinet is destined soon to give place to one formed by Rattazzi. The Nonpartisan brigades have been honored in by the Papal soldiers, and have asked to be allowed to surrender without complying with any rigorous conditions. They have their appeal upon the fact that the Government had, to some extent, concurred with them. It was because of his encouragement of these brigades that the Pope's Secretary of War, M. Neriola, has been dismissed.

The Greek Chamber has abolished the Council of State by a large majority. Count Spontack, the young King's Turkish Counselor, has been driven from the country. Our news from Hayti indicates that General Salnave, after his defeat at Cape Haytien, went to Monte Christo to recruit his army, to which he was receiving large accessions of deserters from Gelfard's forces. Gelfard had offered a reward of $1000 for Salnave's capture.

Spain has refused to submit her difficulties with Chili to foreign arbitration. General Canales, who became Provisional President of Peru, on the expulsion of President Pezet, has been possibly deposed, and Colonel Prado has been made Dictator. The rebellion in the United States of Colombia is deemed at an end, and popular confidence in the Government is re-established.

EXPLOSION AT THE ARSENAL IN WASHINGTON, DECEMBER 18, 1865—REMOVING THE DEAD BODIES.—[SKETCHED BY A. M'CALLUM.]

THE ARSENAL EXPLOSION AT WASHINGTON.

On the afternoon of Monday, December 18, an explosion took place at the Washington Arsenal very similar to one which occurred in the same city a year ago. The explosion took place in a small building at the Arsenal, and in which workmen were employed in sorting ammunition, removing cartridges, etc. The accident was terribly disastrous in its effects, and the force of the explosion was felt at remote distances in the city. Seven persons were instantly killed, and several others fatally injured. They were all employes, and had all been in the army.

We give on this page an illustration of the removal of the bodies after the explosion. The building, completely demolished by the violence of the explosion, soon became a mass of flames. This not only happened before the removal of the killed, but also threatened to involve the adjacent buildings, in which were stored quantities of ammunition, in a like disaster. The bodies of some of those injured by the explosion were torn in a horrible manner.

NOT TO BE TAKEN FOR GRANTED.

To-day I, Eunice Fielding, have been looking over the journal which I kept of the first few weeks of my life in the world, after I left the seclusion of the German Moravian school, where I was educated. I feel a strange pity for myself, the tender ignorant innocent school-girl, freed from the peaceful shelter of the Moravian settlement, and thrust suddenly into the centre of a sorrowful household.

As I turn to this first page, there rises before me, like the memory of a former life, a picture of the noiseless grass-grown streets of the settlement, with the old-fashioned dwellings, and the quiet and serene faces looking out kindly upon the troop of children passing to the church. There is the home of the Single Sisters, with its dimly lighted and spotless easements; and close beside it, is the church where they and we worshipped, with its broad central aisle always separating the women from the men. I can see the girls in their picturesque caps, trimmed with scarlet, and the blue ribbons of the maids, and the pure white head-gear of the widows; the burial-ground, where the separation is still maintained, and where the brethren and the sisters lie in undivided graves; and the kindly simple-hearted pastor, who was always touched with the feeling of our weakness. I see it all, as I turn over the pages of my short journal, with just a faint longing to return to the repose and innocent ignorance which encircled me while I dwelt among them, safely shut in from the sorrows of the world.

Nov. 7. At home once more after an absence of three years; but home is changed. There used to be a feeling of mother's presence every where about the house, even if she were in the remotest room; but now, Susannah and Priscilla are wearing their aprons, and as they go in and out, I catch a glimpse of the soft dove-colored folds of the dresses, I look up with a start, half in hope of seeing my mother's face again. They are much older than I am, for Priscilla was ten years of age when I was born, and Susannah is three years older than Priscilla. They are very grave and serious, and it is well known, even in Germany, how religious they are. I suppose by the time I am as old as they are I shall be the same.

I wonder if my father ever felt like a child; he looks as if he had lived for centuries. Last night I could not venture to look too closely into his face; but to-day I can see a very kind and peaceful expression underlying all the wrinkles and lines of care. In his soul there is a calm serene depth which no tempest can touch. That is plain. He is a good man, I know, though his goodness was not talked about at school, as was Susannah's and Priscilla's. When the coach set me down at the door, and he ran out into the street bareheaded, and took me at once into his arms, carrying me like a little child into our home, all my sorrow upon leaving my school-fellows, and the sisters, and our pastor, vanished away in the joy of being with him. God helping me—and surely he will help me to do this—I will be a comfort to my father.

The house is very different to what it was in my mother's time. The rooms look gloomy, for the walls are damp and mildewed, and the carpets are worn threadbare. It seems as if my father had taken no pride in household matters. To be sure Priscilla is betrothed to one of the brethren, who dwells in Woodbury, about ten miles from here. She told me last night what a beautiful house he had, and how it was furnished with more luxury and cosiness than our people often care for, inasmuch as we do not seek worldly show. She also displayed the fine linen she had been preparing for herself, with scores of dresses, both in silks and stuffs. They looked so grand, spread out upon the poor furniture of our chamber, that I could not help but cast up in my own mind what the coat would be, and I inquired how my father's business prospered; at which Priscilla colored, but Susannah uttered a low deep groan, which was answer enough.

This morning I unpacked my trunk, and gave a letter from the church to each of my sisters. It was to make known to them that Brother Schmidt, a missionary in the West Indies, desires that a fitting wife should be chosen for him by casting of lots, and sent out to him. Several of the single sisters in our settlement have given in their names, and such is the repute of Susannah and Priscilla, that they are notified of the application, that they may do likewise. Of course Priscilla, being already betrothed, has no thought of doing so; but Susannah has been deep in meditation all day, and now she is sitting opposite to me, pale and solemn, her brown hair, in which I can detect a silver thread or two, thinned closely down her thin cheeks; but as she writes, a faint blush steals over her face, as if she were listening to Brother Schmidt, whom she has never seen, and whose voice she never heard. She has written her name—I can read it, "Susannah Fielding"—in her clear round steady hand, and it will be put into the list with many others, from among which one will be drawn out, and the name written thereon will be that of Brother Schmidt's appointed wife.

Nov. 9. Only two days at home; but what a change there is in me. My brain is all confusion, and it might be a hundred years since I left school. This morning two strangers came to the house, demanding to see my father. They were rough hard men, whose voices sounded into my father's office, where he was busy writing, while I sat beside the fire, engaged in household sewing. I looked up at the loud noise of their voices, and saw him turn deadly pale, and bow his white-haired head upon his hands. But he went out in an instant, and returning with the strangers, bade me go to my sisters. I found Susannah in the parlor, looking scared and bewildered, and Priscilla in hysterics. After much ado they grew calmer. When Priscilla was lying quietly on the sofa, and Susannah had sat down in mother's arm-chair to meditate, I crept back to my father's office, and rapping softly at the door, heard him say, "Come in." He was alone, and very sad.

"Father," I asked, "what is the matter?" and seeing his dear kind face, I flew to him.

"Eunice," he whispered very tenderly, "I will tell you all."

So then as I knelt at his knee, with my eyes fastened upon his, he told me a long history of troubles, every word of which removed my school-days farther and farther from me, and made them seem like the close of a finished life. The end of all was that these men were sent by his creditors to take possession of every thing in our old house, where my mother had lived and died.

I caught my breath at first, as if I should go into hysterics like Priscilla, but I thought what good would that do for my father? So after a minute or two I was able to look up again bravely into his eyes. He then said he had his books to examine, so I kissed him, and came away.

In the parlor Priscilla was lying still, with her eyelids closed, and Susannah was quite lost in meditation. Neither of them noticed me entering or departing. I went into the kitchen to consult Jane about my father's dinner. She was rocking herself upon a chair, and rubbing her eyes red with her rough apron; and there in the elbow-chair which once belonged to my grandfather—all the Brethren knew George Fielding—sat one of the strangers, wearing a shaggy brown hat, from under which he was staring fixedly at a bag of dried herbs hanging to a hook in the ceiling. He did not bring his eyes down, even when I entered, and stood thence-struck upon the door-sill; but he rounded up his large mouth, as if he were going to whistle.

"Good-morning, Sir," I said, as soon as I recovered myself; for my father had said we must regard these men only as the human instruments permitted to bring affliction to us; "will you please to tell me your name?"

The stranger fixed his eyes steadily upon me. After which he smiled a little to himself.

"John Robins is my name," he said, "and England is my nation, Woodbury is my dwelling-place, and Christ is my salvation."

He spoke in a sing-song tone, and his eyes went up again to the bag of marjoram, twinkling as if with great satisfaction; and I pondered over his reply, until it became quite a comfort to me.

"I'm very glad to hear it," I said, at last, "because we are religious people, and I was afraid you might be different."

"Oh, I'll be no kind of nuisance, miss," he answered; "you make yourselves comfortable, and only bid Maria, here, to draw me my beer regular, and I'll not hurt your feelings."

"Thank you," I said. "Jane, you hear what Mr. Robins says. Bring some sherry down to air, and make up the bed in the Brethren's chamber. You'll find a bible and hymn-book on the table there, Mr. Robins." I was leaving the kitchen, when this singular man struck his clenched fist upon the dresser, with a noise which startled me greatly.

"Miss," he said, "don't you put yourself about; and if any body else should ever put you out, about any thing, remember John Robins of Woodbury. I'm your man for any thing, whether in my line or out of my line; I am, by—"

He was about to add something more, but he paused suddenly, and his face grew a little more red, as he looked up again to the ceiling. So I left the kitchen.

I have since been helping my father with his books, being very thankful that I was always quick at sums.

P.S. I dreamed that the settlement was invaded by an army of men, led by John Robins, who insisted upon becoming our pastor.

November 10. I have been a journey of fifty miles, one half of it by stage-coach. I learned for the first time that my mother's brother, a worldly rich man, dwells fifteen miles beyond Woodbury. He does not belong to our people, and he was greatly displeased by my mother's marriage. It also appears that Susannah and Priscilla were not my mother's own daughters. My father had a little foreboding hope that our worldly kinsman might be inclined to help us in our great extremity; so I went forth with his blessings and prayers upon my errand. Brother Moe, who came over to see Priscilla yesterday, met me at Woodbury Station, and saw me safely on the coach for my uncle's village. He is much older than I fancied; and his face is large, and coarse, and flabby-looking. I am surprised that Priscilla should betroth herself to him. However, he was very kind to me, and watched the coach out of the inn-yard; but almost before he was out of my sight, he was out of my mind, and I was considering what I should say to my uncle.

My uncle's house stands quite alone in the midst of meadows and groves of trees, all of which are leafless now, and waded to and fro in the damp and heavy air, like funeral plumes. I trembled greatly as I lifted the brass knocker, which had a grinning face upon it; and I let it fall with one loud single rap, which set all the dogs barking, and the rooks cawing in the tops of the trees. The servant conducted me across a low-roofed hall, to a parlor beyond: low-roofed also, but large and handsome, with a warm glow of crimson, which was pleasant to my eyes, after the gray gloom of the November day. It was already afternoon; and a tall fine-looking old man was lying comfortably upon a sofa fast asleep; while upon the other side of the hearth sat a dwarfed old lady, who lifted her forefinger with a gesture of silence, and beckoned me to take a seat near the fire. I obeyed, and presently fell into a meditation.

At length a man's voice broke the silence, asking in a drawy tone,

"What young lass is this?"

"I am Eunice Fielding," I replied, rising with reverence to the aged man, my uncle; and he gazed upon me with his keen gray eyes, until I was abashed, and a tear or two rolled down my cheeks in spite of myself, for my heart was very heavy.

"By Jove!" he exclaimed, "as like Sophy as two peas out of one pod!" and he laughed a short laugh, which, in my ears, lacked merriment. "Come here, Eunice," he added, "and kiss me."

Whereupon I walked gravely across the open space between us, and bent my face to his; but he would have me to sit upon his knee, and I, who had been at no time used to be fondled thus, even by my father, sat there uncomfortably.

"Well, my pretty one," said my uncle, "what is your errand and request to me? Upon my soul, I feel ready to promise thee any thing."

As he spoke, I thought me of King Herod, and the sinful dancing-girl, and my heart sank within me; but at last I took courage, as did Esther the queen, and I made known my urgent business to him, telling him, even with tears, that my father was threatened with a prison, if he could find none to befriend him.

"Eunice," said my uncle, after a very long silence, "I will make a bargain with you and your father. He stole away my favorite sister from me, and I never saw her face again. I've no children, and I'm a rich man. If your father will give you up to me, keeping no claim upon you—even to never seeing your face again, if I so will it—then I will pay all his debts, and adopt you as my own daughter."

Before he could finish all these words, I sprang away from him, feeling more angered than I had ever done in my life.

"It could never be," I cried. "My father could never give me up, and I will never leave him."

"Be in no hurry to decide, Eunice," he said; "your father has two other daughters. I will give you an hour to reflect."

Upon that he and his wife left me alone in the pleasant room. My mind was firmly made up from the beginning. But as I sat before the glowing fire, it seemed as if all the bleak cold days of the coming winter trooped up and gathered round me, chilling the warm atmosphere of the room, and touching me with icy fingers, until I trembled like a coward. So I opened my little lot-book, which our pastor had given unto me, and I looked anxiously at the many slips of paper it contained. Many times I had drawn a lot from it, and found but vague counsel and comfort. But I now drew therefrom again, and the words upon the lot were, "Be of good courage!" Then I was greatly strengthened.

When the hour was ended, my uncle returned, and urged me with many worldly persuasions and allurements, mingled with threatenings, until at length I grew bold to answer him according to his stares.

"It is an evil thing," I said, "to tempt a child to forsake her father. Providence has put it into your power to lessen the sorrows of your fellow-creatures, but you seek to add to them. I would rather dwell with my father in a jail, than with you in a palace."

I turned and left him, finding my way out through the hall into the deepening twilight. It was more than a mile from the village through which the coach passed; and the hedge-banks rose high on each side of the deep lane. Though I walked very swiftly, the night came on before I had proceeded far from my uncle's house, with such thick gloom and fog that I could almost feel the darkness. "Be of good courage, Eunice!" said I; and to drive away the fears which lay in wait for me if I yielded but a little, I lifted up my voice, and began to sing our Evening Hymn.

Suddenly a voice a little way before me, took up the tune, in a clear deep rich tone, like that of the Brother who taught us music in the Settlement. As I stopped instantly, my heart leaping up with fear and a strange gladness, the voice before me ceased singing also.

"Good-night," it said. There was such kindness and frankness and sweetness in the voice, that I trusted it at once.

"Wait for me," I said; "I am lost in the night, and I want to find my way to Longville."

"I am going there too," said the voice, to which I drew nearer each moment; and immediately I saw a tall dark figure in the mist beside me.

"Brother," I said, trembling a little, though wherefore I knew not, "are we far from Longville?"

"Only ten minutes' walk," he answered, in a blithe tone, which cheered me not a little. "Take my arm, and we shall soon be there."

As my hand rested on his arm lightly, I felt a sense of great support and protection. As we came near the lighted window of the village inn, we looked into one another's faces. His was pleasant and wholesome, like some of the best pictures I have ever seen. I do not know why, but I thought of the Angel Gabriel.

"We are at Longville," he said; "tell me where I can take you to."

"Sir," I answered, for I could not say Brother to him in the light; "I wish first to get to Woodbury."

"To Woodbury," he repeated, "at this time of night, and alone! There is a return coach coming up in a few minutes, by which I travel to Woodbury. Will you accept of my escort there?"

"Sir, I thank you," I answered; and I stood silent beside him, until the coach lamps shone close upon us in the fog. The stranger opened the door, but I hung back with a foolish feeling of shame at my poverty, which it was needful to conquer.

"We are poor people," I stammered. "I must travel outside."

"Not such a winter's night as this," he said. "Jump in."

"No, no," I replied, recovering my senses, "I shall go outside." A decent country woman, with a child, were already seated on the top of the coach, and I quickly followed them. My seat was the outer one, and hung over the wheels. The darkness was so dense that the faint glimmer of the coach-lamps upon the leafless hedgerows was the only light to be seen. All else was black, pitchy night. I could think of nothing but my father, and the jail opening to imprison him. Presently I felt a hand laid firmly on my arm, and Gabriel's voice spake to me:

"Your seat is a dangerous one," he said. "A sudden jerk might throw you off."

"I am so miserable," I sobbed, all my courage breaking down; and in the darkness I buried my face in my hands, and wept silently; and even as I wept, the bitterness of my sorrow was assuaged.

"Brother," I said—for in the darkness I could call him so again. "I am only just come home from school, and I have not learned the ways and troubles of the world yet."

"My child," he answered, in a low tone, "I saw you lean your head upon your hands and weep. Can I be of any help to you?"

"No," I replied; "the sorrow belongs to me only, and to my house."

He said no more, but I felt his arm stretched out to form a barrier across the space where I might have fallen; and so through the black night we rode on to Woodbury.

Brother Moe was awaiting me at the coach-office. He hurried me away, scarcely giving me time to glance at Gabriel, who stood looking after me. He was eager to hear of my interview with my uncle; when I told him of my failure, he grew thoughtful, saying little until I was in the railway carriage, when he leaned forward and whispered, "Tell Priscilla I will come over in the morning."

Brother Moe is a rich man; perhaps, for Priscilla's sake, he will free my father.

Nov. 11. I dreamed last night that Gabriel stood beside me, saying, "I come to bring thee glad tidings." But as I listened eagerly, he sighed, and vanished away.

Nov. 15. Brother Moe is here every day, but he says nothing about helping my father. If help does not come soon, he will be cast into prison. Prudence, my uncle will relent, and offer us some easier terms. If it were only to live half my time with him, I would consent to dwell in his house, even as Daniel and the three children dwelt unharmed in the court of Babylon. I will write to him to that effect.

Nov. 19. No answer from my uncle. To-day, going to Woodbury with Priscilla, who wished to converse with the pastor of the church there, I spent the hour she was engaged with him in finding my way to the jail, and walking round the outside of his gloomy and massive walls. I felt very mournful and faint-hearted, thinking of my poor father. At last, being very weary, I sat down on the step at the gateway, and looked into my little lot-book again. Once more I drew the verse, "Be of good courage." Just then, Brother Moe and Priscilla appeared. There was a look upon his face which I disliked, but I remembered that he was to be my sister's husband, and I rose and offered him my hand, which he tucked up under his arm, his fat hand resting upon it. So we three walked to and fro under the prison walls. Suddenly, in a garden sloping away beneath us, I perceived him whom I call Gabriel (not knowing any other name), with a fair sweet-looking young woman at his side. I could not refrain from weeping, for what reason I can not tell, unless it be my father's affairs. Brother Moe returned home with us, and sent John Robins away. John Robins desired me to remember him, which I will as long as I live.

Nov. 20. Most miserable day. My poor father is in jail. At dinner-time to-day two most evil-looking men arrested him. God forgive me for wishing they were dead! Yet my father spake very patiently and gently.

"Send for Brother Moe," he said, after a pause, "and act according to his counsel."

So after a little while they carried him away. What am I to do?

Nov. 20. Late last night we were still discoursing as to our future plans. Priscilla thinks Brother Moe will hasten their marriage, and Susannah has an inward assurance that the lot will fall to her to be Brother Schmidt's wife. She spake wisely of the duties of a missionary's life, and of the grace needed to fulfill them. But I could think of nothing but my father trying to sleep within the walls of a jail.

Brother Moe says he thinks he can see a way to release my father, only we are all to pray that we may have grace to conquer our self-will. I am sure I am willing to do any thing, even to selling myself into slavery, as some of our first missionaries did in the slave-times in the West Indies. But in England one can not sell one's self, though I would be a very faithful servant. I want to get at once a sum large enough to pay our debts. Brother Moe bids me not spoil my eyes with crying.

Dec. 1. The day on which my father was arrested, I made a last appeal to my uncle. This morning I had a brief note from him, saying he had commissioned his lawyer to visit me, and state the terms on which he was willing to aid me. Even as I read it, his lawyer desired to see me alone. I went to the parlor, trembling with anxiety. It was no other than Gabriel who stood before me, and I took heart, remembering my dream that he appeared to me, saying, "I come to bring thee glad tidings."

"Miss Eunice Fielding," he said, in his pleasant voice, and looking down upon me with a smile which seemed to shed sunshine upon my sad and drooping spirit.

"Yes," I answered, my eyes falling foolishly before his; and I beckoned to him to resume his seat, while I stood leaning against my mother's great arm-chair.

"I have a hard message for you," said Gabriel; "your uncle has dictated this paper, which must be signed by you and your father. He will release Mr. Fielding, and settle one hundred pounds a year upon him, on condition that he will retire to some German Moravian settlement, and that you will accept the former terms."

"I can not," I cried bitterly. "Oh! Sir, ought I to leave my father?"

"I am afraid not," he answered, in a low voice.

"Sir," I said, "you must please say 'no' to my uncle."

"I will," he replied, "and make it sound as gently as I can. You have a friend in me, Miss Eunice."

His voice lingered upon Eunice, as if it were no common name to him, but something rare and pleasing. I never heard it spoken so pleasantly before. After a little while he rose to take his leave.

"Brother," I said, giving him my hand, "farewell."

"I shall see you again, Miss Eunice," he answered.

He saw me again sooner than he expected, for I traveled by the next train to Woodbury, and, as I left the dark carriage in which I journeyed, I saw him slight from another part of the train, and at the same instant his eyes fell upon me.

"Where are you going to now, Eunice?" he demanded.

It seemed a pleasanter greeting than if he had called me Miss. I told him I knew my way to the jail, for that I had been not long ago to look at the outside of it. I saw the tears stand in his eyes, but, without speaking, he drew my hand through his arm, and I silently, but with a very lightened heart, walked beside him to the great portal of my father's prison.

We entered a square court, with nothing to be seen save the gray winter sky lying, as it were flat, overhead; and there was my father, pacing to and fro, with his arms crossed upon his breast and his head bowed down, as if it would never be raised again. I cried aloud, and ran and fell on his neck, and knew nothing more until I opened my eyes in a small bare room, and felt my father holding me in his arms, and Gabriel kneeling before me, chafing my hands, and pressing his lips upon them.

Afterward Gabriel and my father conferred together; but before long Brother More arrived, whereupon Gabriel departed. Brother More said, solemnly:

"That man is a wolf in sheep's clothing, and our Eunice is a tender lamb."

I can not believe that Gabriel is a wolf. Dec. 2. I have taken a room in a cottage near the jail, the abode of John Robins and his wife, a decent tidy woman. So I can spend every day with my father.

Dec. 13. My father has been in prison a whole fortnight. Brother More went over to see Priscilla last night, and this morning he is to lay before us his plan for my father's release. I am going to meet him at the jail.

When I entered the room, my father and Brother More looked greatly perturbed, and my poor father leaned back in his chair, as if exhausted after a long conflict.

"Speak to her, brother," he said.

Then Brother More told us of a heavenly vision which had appeared to him, directing him to break off his betrothal to Priscilla, and to take me—me!—for his wife. After which he awoke, and these words abode in his mind, "The dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure."

"Therefore, Eunice," he said, in an awful voice, "do you and Priscilla see to it, lest you should be found fighting against the Lord."

I was struck dumb as with a great shock, but I heard him add these words:

"I was also instructed in the vision, to set your father free, upon the day that you become my wife."

"But," I said at last, my whole heart recoiling from him, "this would be a shameful wrong to Priscilla. It can not be a vision from Heaven, but a delusion and snare. Marry Priscilla, and set my father free? Surely, surely, it was a lying vision."

"No," he said, fastening his gaze upon me; "I chose Priscilla rashly of my own judgment. Therein I erred; but I have promised her half her dowry as a compensation for my error."

"Father," I cried, "surely I ought to have some direction also, as well as he. Why should only he have a vision?" Then I added that I would go home and see Priscilla, and seek a sign for my own guidance.

December 14. Priscilla was ill in bed when I reached home, and refused to see me. I arose at five o'clock this morning, and stole down into the parlor. As I lighted the lamp, the parlor looked forlorn and deserted, and yet there lingered about it a ghostly feeling, as if perhaps my mother, and the dead children whom I never saw, had been sitting on the hearth in the night, as we sat in the daytime. Maybe she knew of my distress, and had left some tokens for my comfort and counsel. My Bible lay upon the table, but it was closed; her angel fingers had not opened it upon any verse that might have guided me. There was no mode of seeking direction, save by casting of lots.

I cut three little slips of paper of one length, and exactly similar—three, though surely I only needed two. Upon the first I wrote, "To be Brother More's wife," and upon the second, "To be a Single Sister." The third lay upon the desk, blank and white, as if waiting for some name to be written upon it, and suddenly all the chilly cold of the winter morning passed into a sultry heat, until I threw open the casement and let the frosty air breathe upon my face. I said in my own heart I would leave myself a chance, though my conscience smote me for that word "chance." So I laid the three slips of paper between the leaves of my Bible, and sat down opposite to them, afraid of drawing the lot which held the secret of my future life.

There was no mark to guide me in the choice of one slip of paper from another; and I dared not stretch out my hand to draw one of them. For I was bound to abide by the solemn decision. It seemed too horrible to become Brother More's wife; and to me the Sisters' Home, where the Single Sisters dwell, having all things in common, seems dreary and monotonous and somewhat desolate. But if I should draw the blank paper! My heart fluttered; again and again I stretched out my hand, and withdrew it; until at last the oil in the lamp being spent, its lights grew dimmer and dimmer, and, fearful of being still longer without guidance, I snatched the middle lot from between the leaves of my Bible. There was only a glimmer of dying light, by which I read the words, "To be Brother More's wife."

That is the last entry in my journal, written three years ago.

When Susannah came down stairs and entered the parlor, she found me sitting before my desk, almost in an idiotic state, with that miserable lot in my hand. There was no need to explain it to her; she looked at the other slip of paper, one blank, and the other inscribed, "To be a Single Sister," and she knew I had been casting lots. I remember her crying over me a little, and kissing me with unaccustomed tenderness; and then she returned to her chamber, and I heard her speaking to Priscilla in grave and sad tones. After that, we were all passive; even Priscilla was stolidly resigned. Brother More came over, and Susannah informed him of the irrevocable lot which I had drawn; but besought him to refrain from seeing me that day; and he left me alone to grow somewhat used to the sense of my wretchedness.

Early the next morning I returned to Woodbury; my only consolation being the thought that my dear father would be set free, and might live with me in wealth and comfort all the rest of his life. During the succeeding days I scarcely left his side, never suffering Brother More to be alone with me; and morning and night John Robins or his wife accompanied me to the gate of the jail, and waited for me to return with them to their cottage.

My father was to be set free, only on my wedding-day, and the marriage was hurried on. Many of Priscilla's store of wedding garments were suitable for me. Every hour brought my doom nearer.

One morning, in the gloom and twilight of a December dawn, I suddenly met Gabriel in my path. He spoke rapidly and earnestly, but I scarcely knew what he said, and I answered, falteringly:

"I am going to be married to Brother Joshua More on New-Year's day, and he will then release my father."

"Eunice," he cried, standing before me in the narrow path, "you can never marry him. I know the fat hypocrite. Good Heaven! I love you a hundred times better than he does. Love! The rascal does not know what it means."

I answered not a word, for I felt afraid both of myself and him, though I did not believe Gabriel to be a wolf in sheep's clothing.

"Do you know who I am?" he asked.

"No," I whispered.

"I am your uncle's nephew by marriage," he said, "and I have been brought up in his house. Break off this wicked betrothal with the fellow More, and I will engage to release your father. I am young, and can work. I will pay your father's debts."

"It is impossible," I replied. "Brother More has had a heavenly vision, and I have drawn the lot. There is no hope. I must marry him upon New-Year's day."

Then Gabriel persuaded me to tell him the whole story of my trouble. He laughed a little, and bade me be of good comfort; and I could not make him understand how impossible it was that I should contend against the dispensation of the lot.

Always when I was with my father I strove to conceal my misery, talking to him of the happy days we should spend together some time. Likewise I sang within the walls of the prison the simple hymns which we had been wont to sing in the peaceful church at school amidst a congregation of serene hearts, and I strengthened my own heart and my father's by the recollection of counsels of my dear lost pastor. Thus my father guessed little of my hidden suffering, and looked forward with hope to the day that would throw open his prison doors.

Once I went to the pastor, dwelling in Woodbury, and poured out my heart to him—save that I made no mention of Gabriel—and he told me it was often thus with young girls before their marriage, but that I had a clear leading; he also told me that Brother More was a devout man, and I should soon love and reverence him as my husband.

At length the last day of the year came; a great day among our people, when we drew our lot for the following year. Every thing seemed at an end. All hope fled from me, if there ever had been any hope in my heart. I left my father early in the evening, for I could no longer conceal my wretchedness; yet when I was outside the prison walls I wandered to and fro, hovering about it, as if these days, miserable as they had been, were happy to those which were drawing near. Brother More had not been near us all day, but doubtless he was busy in his arrangements to release my father. I was still lingering under the great walls, when a carriage drove up noiselessly—for the ground was sprinkled with soft snow—and Gabriel sprang out, and almost clasped me in his arms.

"My dear Eunice," he said, "you must come with me at once. Our uncle will save you from this hateful marriage."

I do not know what I should have done had not John Robins called out from the driver's seat, "All right, Miss Eunice; remember John Robins."

Upon that I left myself in Gabriel's hands, and he lifted me into the carriage, wrapping warm coverings about me. It seemed to me no other than a happy dream, as we drove noiselessly along snowy roads, with the pale wan light of the young moon falling upon the white country, and now and then shining upon the face of Gabriel, as he leaned forward from time to time to draw the wrappers closer round me.

We might have been three hours on the way, when we turned into a by-road, which presently I recognized as the deep lane wherein I had first met Gabriel. We were going then to my uncle's house. So with a lightened heart I stepped out of the carriage, and entered his doors for the second time.

Gabriel conducted me into the parlor which I had seen before, and placed me in a chair upon the hearth, removing my shawl and bonnet with a pleasant and courteous care; and he was standing opposite to me, regarding me with a smile upon his handsome face, when the door opened and my uncle entered.

"Come and kiss me, Eunice," he said; and I obeyed him wonderingly.

"Child," he continued, stroking my hair back from my face, "you would not come to me of your own will, so I commissioned this young fellow to kidnap you. We are not going to have you marry Joshua More. I can not do with him as my nephew. Let him marry Priscilla."

There was such a hearty tone in my uncle's voice, that for a moment I felt comforted, though I knew that he could not set aside my lot. So he seated me beside him, while I still looked with wonderment into his face.

"I am going to draw a lot for you," he said, with an air of merriment; "what would my little rose-bud say to her fat suitor, if she knew that her father was a freed man at this moment?"

I dared not look into his face or into Gabriel's. For I remembered that I myself had sought for a token; and that no earthly power could set aside that, or the heavenly vision also, which Brother More had seen.

"Uncle," I said, shuddering, "I have no voice in this matter. I drew the lot fairly, and I must abide by it. You can not help me."

"We will see," he answered; "it is New-Year's eve, you know, and time to draw again. The lot will neither be to become Brother More's wife, nor a Single Sister, I promise you. We shall draw the blank this time!"

While I yet wondered at these words, I heard a sound of footsteps in the hall, and the door opened, and my beloved father stood upon the threshold, stretching out his arms to me. How he came there I knew not; but I flew to him with a glad cry, and hid my face upon his breast.

"You are welcome, Mr. Fielding," said my uncle; "Phil!"—it did not seem appear that Gabriel's name was Philip—"bring Mr. More this way."

I started with fright and wonder, and my father also looked troubled, and drew me nearer to his side. Brother More entered with a cowardly and downcast mien, which made him appear a hundred-fold more repulsive in my eyes, as he stood near the door, with his craven face turned toward us.

"Mr. More," said my uncle, "I believe you are to marry my niece, Eunice Fielding, to-morrow?"

"I did not know she was your niece," he answered, in an abject tone. "I would not have presumed—"

"But the heavenly vision, Mr. More?" interrupted my uncle.

He looked round for a moment, with a spiritless glance, and his eyes sank.

"It was a delusion," he muttered.

"It was a lie!" said Gabriel.

"Mr. More," continued my uncle, "if the heavenly vision be true, it will cost you the sum of five thousand five hundred pounds, the amount in which you are indebted to me, with sundry sums due to my nephew here. Yet if it be true, you must abide by it, of course."

"It was not true," he answered; "the vision was concerning Priscilla, to whom I was betrothed. I was censured to change the name to that of Eunice."

"Then go and marry Priscilla," said my uncle, good-humoredly. "Philip, take him away."

But Priscilla would have no more to do with Brother More, and shortly afterward she settled among the Single Sisters in the same settlement where I had lived my quiet and peaceful youth. Her store of wedding garments, which had been altered to fit me, came in at last for Susannah, who was chosen to be the wife of Brother Schmidt, according to her inward assurance; and she went out to join him in the West Indies, from whence she writes many happy letters. I was troubled for a time about my lot, but certainly if Brother More's vision was concerning Priscilla, I could not be required to abide by it. Moreover, I never saw him again. My uncle and father, who had never met before, formed a close friendship, and my uncle would bear of nothing but that we should dwell together in his large mansion, where I might be as a daughter unto both of them. People say we have left the Church of the United Brethren; but it is not so. Only, as I had found one evil man within it, so also I have found some good ones without it.

Gabriel is not one of the Brethren.

Not long since, our friend Brown was on a visit to Look-out Mountain, Georgia, and was much struck with the fact that a fine jet of water was thrown up above the top of the eminence on which the hotel stands. Walking round the jet admiringly, he accented a plain countryman's wish:

"My friend, is this water forced up by a pump?" inquiring, of course, the hydraulic contrivance so named. "A pump?" exclaimed the countryman.

"Yes, a pump, I say." "What on earth, Sir? It's a damned big model, and it's tremendous hard work for him. Come here, and I will show him to you."

On these occasions they stripped him as they would a copper, and performed the needful ablutions. He was equally notorious for his hoar of clean lives. One day, on his complaining to Dudley North at his club that he had become a perfect martyr to rheumatism, and had tried every possible remedy without success, the latter wittily replied, "Egad, my lord, did you ever try a clean shirt?"

More curious or more significant Exoduses ever took place than the Exodus of Women to Washington Territory under the leadership of Mr. ASA S. MANCKEN. The scheme proposed by Mr. Mancken is in every way original and praiseworthy. This gentleman, the Moses of this Exodus from New England to the West, is a graduate of Franklin College, Ohio. He went to Washington Territory five years ago for recreation. He found the Territory rich in resources, which it required a vast population fully to develop. The actual population of the Territory was meagre, owing in great part to the small proportion of women. Mr. Mancken saw that there were nine men in the Territory to one woman. His official position as President of the Washington Territory University—an office to which he was chosen soon after his arrival in the Territory—brought him into direct contact with the people. He saw that the emigrants from the Eastern States had been for the most part respectable young men who sought the more promising opportunities for business which a new and fertile country always offers. His survey of the social condition of the Territory led Mr. Mancken to come to New England to find women for teachers. This was two years ago. He succeeded in inducing twelve ladies to emigrate for that purpose. This was an experiment, and it proved a success. He found that the ladies were soon married, and there were none to take their places. Mr. Mancken therefore determined to undertake the transportation of women on a larger scale. He traveled over the North, from Kansas to Maine, in search of intelligent women willing to emigrate, and willing to labor at sewing or teaching. The Government offered him assistance. He chartered a steamer, expecting that the Government would pay the expense. Here he was disappointed, and this caused so great a delay that many of the young ladies (he had induced about 750 to enter upon the expedition) returned to their homes. Some friends advanced the necessary funds, and Mr. Mancken persevered in his undertaking. Although he takes but about four hundred women with him, we wish him success in his undertaking, hoping that this first Exodus may not be the last.

paler, as Saxon, in the intensity of his earnestness, laid his facts and inferences one by one before her.

Then the young man paused, seeing that she was convinced, but grieved also to see at the cost of how rude a shock that conviction was purchased.

"These are cruel truths," he said; "but what can I do? I must undeceive you. I have tracked you from house to house, from city to city, for no other purpose than to save you from the fate to which you are devoting yourself; and now the minutes are going fast, and I am forced to speak plainly, or it will soon be too late to speak at all!"

Miss Rivière wrung her hands despairingly.

"Oh, mother! mother!" she cried, piteously, "why are you not here to tell me what I ought to do?"

"You believe? You are convinced?"

"Yes—alas! I am convinced; but shall I forget that this man was my father's early friend—my mother's benefactor?"

"If William Trefalden told you that he was your father's early friend, Miss Rivière, it was as false as the name under which he made himself known to you!"

"Ah, you do not know all that he did to serve us! You do not know how he sought us out when we were in poverty; how he—"

"Pardon me—I do know it. He sought you out because I gave him your card and requested him to do so. He bought your father's paintings on my account solely; and he never saw Mr. Rivière in his life. I never meant to tell you; but this leaves me no option."

The young girl covered her face with her hands and wept silently. Her tears went straight to Saxon's heart. He felt an irrepresible desire to take her in his arms and tell her that he would give his life to comfort and protect her. But not daring to do this, he only said, in his simple, boyish way:

"Pray don't cry. It makes me feel that I have been so cruel to you!"

But she made no reply.

"I can not tell you," he went on, "what I have suffered in the thought of inflicting this suffering upon you. I would have borne the double share gladly if I could. Do you forgive me?"

Still she wept on. He ventured a little nearer.

"I know how hard it is," he said, tenderly. "I have had to go through it all. He was my friend, and I thought he was the very soul of honor. I would hardly have believed it if an angel from heaven had told me that he would be false to his trust!"

"But he was my only friend," sobbed the young girl—"my only friend in all the world!"

"No, no," cried Saxon, "not your only friend! Don't say that! Don't think it! Look up—look in my face, and see if it is not the face of a truer man and a truer friend than William Trefalden!"

And so, kneeling down before her to bring his face upon a nearer level, the young man touched her hands timidly, as if he would fain draw them away, yet dared not take them in his own.

"Do look at me!" he pleaded. "Only once—only for one moment!"

She lifted her face, all pale with tears, and glancing at him shyly, tremblingly, like a frightened child, saw something in his eyes which brought the color back to her cheek in a flood of sudden scarlet.

"Oh, if I only dared to tell you!" he said, passionately. "May I?—may I?"

He took her hands in his—she did not withdraw them. He kissed them; first one and then the other. He leaned closer—closer.

"I love you, Helen," he whispered. "Can you forget all this misery, and be my little wife? My home is in Switzerland, where I have a dear father who is a pastor. We are a simple people, and we lead a simple life among our flocks and pastures; but we are no traitors. We neither betray our friends nor deceive those we love. Tell me, darling, will you love me a little? Will you come and live with me among my own beautiful Alps, far, far away?"

She smiled. He took that smile for his answer, and kissed the lips that gave it; and then, for a few minutes, they laughed and cried and rejoiced together, like children who have found a treasure.

"You must wear this till I can get you a smaller one," said Saxon, taking a ring from his finger and putting it upon hers.

"It is very beautiful," said Helen. "What is it?—a crystal?"

"No, a diamond."

"A diamond! I did not think there were any real diamonds in the world so large as that!"

"I will give you a necklace of them, every one bigger than this."

"What are you, then?—a prince?"

"A citizen-farmer of the Swiss Republic."

"Then the Swiss are very rich!"

"Not they, indeed; but I am the richest man in the Canton Grisons, and my wife will be a great lady—as great a lady as her grand-aunt, Lady Castletowers."

"Do you know Lady Castletowers?"

"Yes; her son is my most intimate friend. He is the dearest fellow in the world. You will be so fond of him!"

"I do not know any of my relations," said Helen, sadly, "except my Aunt Alcthea—and she does not love me."

"She will find out that she loves you dearly when you wear your diamonds," laughed Saxon, his arm round her waist, and his curls brushing her cheek.

Helen sighed, and laid her head wearily against his shoulder.

"I do not want Lady Castletowers to love me," she said; "and I do not care for diamonds. I wish we were going to be poor, Saxon."

"Why so, Helen?"

"Because—because I fancy poor people are happier, and love each other better than rich people. My father and mother were very, very poor, and—"

"They never loved each other half so much as we shall love each other!" interrupted Saxon, impetuously. "I could not love you one jot more if I were as poor as Adam."

"Are you sure of that?"

"As sure as that I am the happiest fellow in all the world! But tell me, Helen, did you never care for William Trefalden? Never at all?"

Helen shook her head.

"I respected him," she said. "I was grateful to him."

"But did you not love him a little?"

"No."

"Not in the least?"

"Not in the very least."

"And yet you would have married him?"

"Think how lonely I was."

"That is true—poor little Helen!"

"And he loved me. He was the only person in all the world who loved me."

"Except myself."

"Ah, but I could not know that! When did you first begin to love me, Saxon?"

"I hardly know. I think ever since I found you were in danger of marrying William Trefalden. And you!"

"I shall not tell you."

"Nay, that is not fair."

"Indeed I will not."

"Then I shall conclude that you do not love me at all!"

"No, no!"

"Positively, yes."

She turned her face away, half crying, half laughing.

"You have been my hero," she whispered, "ever since the day of our first meeting."

Happy Saxon! Half wild with joy, he took her in his arms, poured forth a thousand follies, and almost devoured her little hands with kisses. In the midst of his raptures the door opened and Mr. Guthrie came in; smiling, but apparently not much surprised by the spectacle before him.

"I beg your pardon," he said. "I knocked twice, but you did not hear me. I fear you do not know how late it is. The good woman down stairs tells me that Mr. Trefalden has appointed to dine here this evening at seven, and it is already half past six, with, I think, a storm coming up."

CHAPTER XCV.
BROUGHT TO DAY.

WITH closed windows, lighted lamp, and curtains jealously drawn, Saxon Trefalden and Mr. Guthrie sat together, ominously silent, in the larger salon of the Château de Peyrolles. On the table were placed pens, paper, and ink. The ante-room was left in darkness, and the folding-doors between stood a little apart. All was very still—in the house no voice, no footfall, no sound of life; out of doors, nothing but the weary moaning of the wind, and the creaking of the weather-cocks upon the turrets overhead.

They were waiting for William Trefalden.

Miss Rivière had withdrawn to her chamber, partly to escape all sight or hearing of the coming interview, and partly to make such slight preparation as might be necessary before leaving the château; the clergyman having promptly volunteered to find her a temporary asylum with the family of an English merchant settled at Bordeaux. It was therefore arranged that the carriage should be in readiness at the back entrance shortly after seven o'clock; and then, as soon as was practicable, they were all three to hasten back to Bordeaux as fast as Saxon's post-horses could carry them. In the mean while the appointed hour came and went; the two men waited, and still no William Trefalden made his appearance.

Presently the pendule on the mantle-shelf chimed the quarter.

Mr. Guthrie looked at his watch. Saxon rose, went over to the nearest window, pushed aside the curtain, and looked out. It was now dusk; but there was still a pale, lurid gleam upon the horizon, by the light of which the young man could see the great clouds rolling together overhead, like the mustering of many armies.

"It will be a wild night," he said, as he resumed his chair.

"Hush!" replied the clergyman. "I hear wheels."

They listened; but the vehicle came along at a foot-pace, and went slowly round by the yard at the back of the château.

"It is only our own post-chaise," said Saxon. And then they were again silent.

Five minutes; ten minutes; a quarter of an hour went by, and the pendule chimed again. It was now half past seven.

All at once Saxon held up his hand, and bent his head attentively.

"I hear nothing," said the clergyman.

"I hear a carriage and pair—coming very quickly—from the direction of Bordeaux?"

Mr. Guthrie smiled doubtfully; but Saxon's trained ear could not be deceived. In another moment the sound became faintly audible, then grew gradually louder, and ceased at last before the gates of the château.

Saxon looked out again.

"I see the carriage outside the gates," he said. "They are opened by a boy carrying a lantern. He alights—he pays the driver—he crosses the court-yard—the carriage drives away. He is here!"

With this he dropped the curtain, and turned down the lamp, so as to leave the room in half-shadow, while Mr. Guthrie, in accordance with their preconcerted plan, went out into the dark ante-room, and took up his station close against the door.

Presently they heard William Trefalden's voice clanking pleasantly with the housekeeper in the hall, and then his footsteps on the stairs. Outside the door he seemed to pause for an instant, then turned the handle and came in. Finding himself in the dark, he deposited something heavy on the floor, and, guided by the narrow line of light between the folding-doors, moved toward the second suite. As he did this Mr. Guthrie softly locked the door and put the key in his pocket. Slightly as the sound was, the lawyer heard it.

"What's that?" he said, quickly, and stopped half-way.

He listened, holding his breath the while; then sprang forward, threw the doors open, and passed into the adjoining room.

As he did so Saxon turned on the full light of the table-lamp, and the two men stood suddenly revealed to each other face to face.

"At last—traitor!"

A frightful pallor—that deadly pallor which is born, not of fear but of hatred—spread itself slowly over William Trefalden's countenance, and there remained. No other sign betrayed the tumult within. Haughty as an Indian at the stake, he folded his arms, and met his cousin's eye unflinchingly.

Thus they stood for a second or two, both silent. Then Mr. Guthrie came in from the ante-room, shut the folding-doors, and took his seat at the table; while Saxon resumed his former place, and, pointing to a chair standing apart from the rest, said:

"Please to sit there, William Trefalden."

The lawyer, with a sharp glance of recognition at the clergyman, flung himself carelessly into the chair.

"May I ask what this means?" he said, contemptuously. "An amateur Star-chamber?"

"It means justice and retribution," replied Saxon, sternly.

Mr. Trefalden smiled, leaned back in his chair, and waited for what should come next. He knew that all was over. He knew that his fairy gold had turned to withered leaves, and that the paradise of his dreams had suddenly vanished away, leaving in its place only the endless desert and the burning sands. He knew that the edifice which he had been rearing month after month, with such consummate skill, was shattered to dust—that the die on which he had staked reputation, country, personal safety, and his whole worldly future, had turned up a blank at the very moment when he believed the prize his own. He knew that Helen Riviere would never, never, now be wife of his; would never grace his home and gladden his heart with her smiles; never learn to give him love for love, in all the weary years that were to come! He knew that from this time forth he was a marked man, a branded felon dependent on the mercy of the kinsman whom he had betrayed; and yet, knowing all this, his self-command never wavered, his eye never quailed, his voice never faltered for an instant. He was desperate, but his pride and his courage were at least equal to his despair.

Saxon, sitting at the head of the table with his head leaning on his hand, looked down for some moments in silence.

"I have not much to say to you, William Trefalden," he began presently; "and what little I have to say must be said briefly. To reproach one who could act as you have acted would be idle. If you had any heart to be touched, any sense of honor to be awakened, neither you nor I would be sitting here tonight."

Still smiling scornfully, the lawyer listened, apparently with the greatest indifference.

"To keep, then, then, to plain facts," continued the young man, "you have defrauded me of two millions of money; you have that money in your possession; you are at this moment my prisoner; and I have but to call in the aid of the village police, and convey you to Bordeaux in the carriage which now waits below for that purpose. Such is your position, and such is mine. But I am unwilling to push matters to extremity. I am unwilling to attach public scandal to the name which you are the first of our family to disgrace. For my uncle's sake and my own, and from respect to the memory of many generations of honest men, I have decided to offer you a fair alternative."

He paused and referred to a slip of paper lying beside him on the table.

"In the first place," he continued, "I require you to restore the money of which you have robbed me. In the second place, you must sign a full confession of your guilt, both as regards the two millions stolen from myself and the twenty-five thousand pounds of which you have defrauded the Earl of Castletowers. In the third place, you must betake yourself to America, and never again be seen on this side the Atlantic. If you agree to these conditions, I consent to screen you from the law, and will give you the sum of one thousand pounds to help you forward honestly in the new life before you."

"And supposing that I decline the conditions," said Mr. Trefalden, calmly. "What then?"

"Then I simply ring this bell, and the boy who just now opened the gates to you will at once summon a couple of sergents de ville from the village."

The lawyer only elevated his eyebrows in the least perceptible degree.

"Your decision, if you please."

"My decision?" replied Mr. Trefalden, with as much apparent indifference as if the subject under consideration were the binding of a book or the framing of a picture. "Well—it appears to me that I am allowed no freedom of choice."

"Am I to understand that you accept my conditions?"

"I suppose so."

"Where, then, is the money?"

"In the adjoining room. You have but to take possession of it."

Mr. Guthrie rose, fetched the carpet-bag, and placed it on the table.

"Your keys, if you please."

William Trefalden produced three small keys on a ring, and handed them to the clergyman.

"You will find the money excellently invested," he said, looking on with unruffled composure while the bag, the deed box, and the cash box were successively opened. The contents of the last were then turned out upon the table, and Mr. Guthrie, with a view to ascertaining whether the whole sum was actually there represented, proceeded to examine each item separately. But he found, after a very few minutes, that the attempt was fruitless. The notes and specie offered no difficulties, but of notes and specie there was, comparatively, but a small proportion, while the bulk of the booty consisted of securities of the value of which he could form no opinion, and precious stones which it would have needed a lapidary's knowledge to appraise.

"I confess," he said, "that I am wholly unequal to the task of verifying this money. It needs a better man of business than myself."

"Then it must go unverified," said Saxon, taking up rouleaux and papers as they came, and thrusting them back again, pell-mell, into the box. "I am no man of business myself, and I can not prolong this painful investigation beyond to-night. We will go on to the declaration."

"If you will tell me what you wish said, I will draw it up for you," said Mr. Guthrie.

Saxon then whispered his instructions, and the clergyman's pen ran swiftly over the paper. When it all was written, he read the declaration aloud:

"I, William Trefalden, of Chancery Lane, London, attorney-at-law, do acknowledge and confess to having obtained the sum of two millions sterling from my cousin, Saxon Trefalden, of Switzerland, with intent to defraud him of the same; and I confess to having deceived him with the belief that I had invested it for his use and advantage in the shares of a certain speculative Company, which Company had no actual existence, but was wholly invented and imagined by myself to serve my own fraudulent ends. I also confess to having invested those two millions in such foreign and other securities as I conceived would turn to my own future profit, and to having fled from England with the whole of the property thus abstracted, intending to escape therewith to the United States of America, and appropriate the same to my own purposes."

"I likewise confess to having, two years since, received the sum of twenty-five thousand pounds from my client, Gervase Leopold Wynnecliffe, Earl of Castletowers, which sum it was my duty to have straightway paid over into the hands of Oliver Behrens, Esq., of Broad Street, London, for the liquidation of a mortgage debt contracted by Lord Castletowers some four years previously; but which sum I did, nevertheless, appropriate to my own uses, continuing to pay only the interest thereof, as heretofore, in the name of my client."

"And I allege that this confession, both as regards the offense committed by me against my cousin, Saxon Trefalden, of Switzerland, and as regards the offense committed by me against my client the Earl of Castletowers, is in all respects substantially and absolutely true, as witness my signature, given in presence of the undermentioned witnesses, this twenty-second day of September, Anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty."

Mr. Guthrie, having read the statement through, passed it across the table. William Trefalden, still leaning back carelessly in his chair, affected to smile at the lawyer-like way in which the clergyman had rounded his sentences, but, as the reading proceeded, frowned, and beat his heel impatiently upon the polished floor.

Saxon pushed the inkstand toward him.

"Your signature," he said.

The lawyer rose—took up a pen—dipped it in the ink—hesitated—and then, with a sudden movement of disdain, flung it back upon the table.

"You have your money," he said, impatiently. "What more can you want?"

"I require the evidence of your guilt."

"I can not—will not sign it. Take your money, in God's name, and let me go!"

Saxon rose, pale and implacable; his hand upon the bell.

"The alternative lies before you," he said. "Sign, or I give the signal."

William Trefalden cast a hasty glance about the room, as if looking for some weapon wherewith to slake the hatred that glittered in his eye; then, muttering a fierce oath between his teeth, snatched up the pen, and, as it were, dug his name into the paper.

"There, curse you!" he said, savagely. "Are you satisfied?"

Mr. Guthrie affixed his own signature as witness to the confession, and Saxon did the same.

"Yes," the young man replied, "I am satisfied. It only remains for me to fulfill my share of the compact."

And he selected Bank of England notes to the value of one thousand pounds.

The lawyer deliberately tore them into as many fragments.

"I would die a dozen deaths," he said, "sooner than owe a crust to your bounty."

"As you please. At all events, you are now free."

Hereupon Mr. Guthrie rose, took the key from his pocket, unlocked the outer door. The lawyer followed him. On the threshold he turned:

"Saxon Trefalden," he said, in a low, deep, concentrated tone, "if ever man hated man, I hate you. I hated you before I ever beheld you, and I have hated you with a tenfold hatred from the hour when we first met face to face. Remember that my deadly curse will be upon you and about you all the days of your life—upon your children, and upon your children's children—upon your marriage-bed, and your death-bed, and your grave. There is no sorrow, no disease, no shame, that I do not pray may embitter your life, and blast your name in this world—no extremity of despair and anguish which I hope may not fall to your portion in the next. Take this for my farewell!"

There was something frightful in the absence of all passion and fury, in the cold, calm, deliberate emphasis with which William Trefalden uttered this parting malediction; but Saxon heard it with a face of solemn pity and wonder, and looked at him steadily from the first word to the last.

"May God forgive me as I do!" he then said, devoutly. "May God in his infinite mercy forgive you and pity you, and soften your heart, and not visit these curses upon your own unhappy head!"

But William Trefalden was already gone, and heard no word of his cousin's pardon.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

What a merry time every body had preparing for Christmas, notwithstanding old Bessie and her stern-looking assistant insisted to prevent! First came the rain, pouring steadily all day, and the ladies sat at the windows shaking their heads at the muddy streets, but cooled by donning water-proof and rubber boots and courageously facing the storm. Then came the snow, softly but thickly, making a disagreeable "slush" on every crusting. But who cared for that when Christmas gills were brightening every shop window? Next Bolas went forth all his embroils, and boldly did they battle. But it was of no use—every body tumbled up their coats and furs a little, doer, and tumbled gaily to the wind. So, finally, the elements yielded, and there came a bright sunny morning, and "all the world and his wife" went out to stink up the shopping. What mattered it to them if the skies were overcast before noon? Even if the sun did not do its duty, wasn't there plenty of daylight in every shop? and such a confounding display of pretty things! And wasn't the vision of staidy pairs of bright, eager, expectant eyes at home a constant pleasure? Every body was gaily; every body was accommodating; every body was ready to give something to the little shivering boy who held out his hand. Nobody was ashamed to carry bundles; nor to say, "I have spent all my money," with a shake of the head at some new attraction.

And so, at length, Christmas Day—with song and praise, with gifts and gladness—came and went.

Now, standing on the threshold of 1866, we bid farewell to the old year—this eventful 1865, in which our country has been rescued, though at such a fearful price—and turn a hopeful gaze to the future, beseeching our warmest wishes to all, that not only the old springs of enjoyment may flow more freely, and pour a purer stream than ever before, but that new sources of happiness may open with the New Year.

We presume that very few ladies will be "not at home" on New-Year's Day. The following paragraph, therefore, taken from a recent Boston paper, probably presents the epitome considered suitable for ordinary occasions—in Boston:

"Not at home" may mean not in the house, or not at home to visitors, the latter words understood, but not expressed. I fear there is no polite alternative; for certainly, when I drove up to the door, if my footman brought me back word, "Mrs. So-and-so is engaged," I should consider it equivalent to a "not direct."

The phrase "Not at home" is deceptively ambiguous, to say the least. In many circles of society it is positively false, because understood literally. If a lady states to give the "not direct" to a caller, and saying she "is engaged" (if she will so accomplish that object, we don't know of any better way to do it. But if not, we think there is a "polite alternative." In the first place, if ladies would always make their morning toilet neat and tasteful enough to be suitable to receive a friend in it, and if they dressed for the day, visitors need not be kept waiting on ordinary occasions, nor dismissed with "engaged" or "not at home." And aside from dressing (which we fancy is often the origin of "not at home"), a lady is seldom so imperatively engaged that she might not step to the parlor, cordially greet her visitors, and, if needed, state frankly at once that her lady is ill—that she has promised to meet a friend at that hour—that her preserves are over the fire, and require more than servant's attention—or whatever the case may be. If the necessity exists, and this is done gracefully and cordially, no one of good sense will be offended, but will honor the more a lady who thus lays aside a very inconvenient kind of false pride. Of course if illness or extraordinary circumstances exist, a message to that effect will, or should, be accepted as all-sufficient.

When "paterfamilias" settles the bill for the Christmas dinner we fancy he would not be sorry if the old time of 1710 could return, when in Scotland "distressed eyes" were sold for "one shilling bottle" (equal to about one penny of our money), "one good hen at two shilling notes, and goose at eight shilling notes; duck and drake, wild and tame, at four shilling." In those days, however, prices were settled by law. Later, in 1745, "strong old claret" was sold at fourteen shillings the dozen, and for "smaller old claret" twelve shillings; "berry one-fourteen shillings a dozen, and heavily water. Eggs sold at a penny a dozen, hens at fourpence each, and ducks at sixpence, twelve chickens for sixteenpence, "a leg of beef" for six shillings, and "a side of mutton" for five. Alas! these days are past!

New York is had enough, but seldom is there any record of any deed in this city so mean as the following:

"A fellow has been arrested in Boston for robbing a cripple of a pair of crutches!"

A Virginia paper gives the following curious account of a family wedding-coat:

"Many years since an old German citizen of Piedmont County, when about to lead his fair 'three' to the matrimonial altar, purchased a broadcloth coat, in which he was married. His wife possessed him with many children, among whose were eight sons, all of whom were married in the same coat in which their father was, and their mother. The youngest of the eight sons had seven sons, all of whom were married in the same wedding-coat; and after the youngest son of the seven, or the youngest grandson of the original owner of the coat, had led his blushing bride to the altar in his venerable grandfather's fashionable wedding-coat he sold it for the sum of $30. What has become of the coat since it was sold we have not been advised, but suppose that some one is keeping it for the purpose of getting married in it."

The Jewish Talmud holds this opinion in regard to women:

"A good wife is Heaven's noblest gift. A housewife never allows herself to be disturbed from her work, even while conversing; she is busy spinning. An old, experienced woman in a household is an ornament to it like a pearl. He who lives in an unmerciful state, knows no joy, none of the blessings of home, and is without support. God has given to woman more ability of judging, correctly than a man."

The English papers are fond of publishing all the "distressing accidents" and "awful deaths" from criminals that they can collect. Evidently they have no liking for that article of ladies' dress. We do not hear of frequent accidents in America from that cause; consequently it must be that English ladies are not so skilful in the management of that part of their attire as American ladies are. One of the foreign papers states that a strange accident recently occurred at a public ball, resulting from some awkwardness on the part of a gentleman. An officer became entangled by the collapse of his partner, and, falling, broke one of his legs; the lady, rolling over him in her turn, fell upon and broke his other leg.

A country couple recently went to be married at Stockport. The man evidently thought some portion of the marriage service superfluous, for when the minister asked him "Will thou have this woman to be thy wedded wife?" he immediately answered, "I be come of purpose."

One of the London magazines, in an article on "My Estate," thus alludes to those in our own vicinity:

"The Irving House, the Astor House, the Metropolitan, and the St. Nicholas hotels at New York, and the Mount Vernon Hotel in New Jersey, have shown, for the last twelve years, what stupendous establishments Butler and Jonathan require—six to eight hundred bedrooms under one roof; three hundred servants; a steam-laundry that will wash four thousand articles in a day (a shirt washed, dried, ironed, and delivered in fifteen minutes); the best of a thousand ornate ovens and served up in a year; bell-telegraphs to every room; five-and-a-half-cent carriages, and other carriages, to convey visitors to and from the hotel; a mile and a half of veranda and balconies in front of the several ranges of rooms; hot and cold water to the every bedroom; a hundred miles of gas and water pipes; a bridal-chamber so gorgeously furnished and served that ten grooms a day is charged for its use—all these things the Americans have long been accustomed to."

Much sensation has been caused in India by an English girl of fourteen years of age having been sold to the Chief of Shikwa, in the Kattywar territory, to be placed in his harem. He is said to be seventy years old, and to have bought her of her parents for 2000 rupees (2000). The parents were poor and dissolute, and the sum of 2000 rupees was the tempting bait which was to make them drive their little girl into the Narrah of Shikwa's net. A clergyman tried to interpose between the unfortunates and the brutal purchaser, but in vain. A deed, however, was drawn up, by which it was stipulated that, in the event of her being at any time banished from that blessed abode of vice, the harem, she is to receive for the term of her natural life the handsome allowance of 150 rupees per annum, or 2000 rupees per annum.

At present most head-dresses are worn in Paris than any other description; by these are meant such things as rows of small curls, which are attached to a comb, and then fastened across the forehead, and sometimes even all round the head; occasionally a scaffolding of these small curls, powdered with gold, is to be seen. Thin bunches of long ringlets are prepared with a comb in the same manner, and fastened at the back of the head; the false curls and twists are extremely thick, and these are placed round the head to form bandeaux. As all fashions are but fleeting, few ladies care to submit to have their front hair cut so as to be able to wear the short fringed curls so much in vogue; consequently, with few exceptions, every one submits to wear those already prepared and fastened on either combs or ribbon bandeaux.

The following description of a few of the new styles may interest our lady readers:

THE DIANA HEAD-DRESS.—The hair is entwined as a French twist, and arranged across the forehead; small smooth bands of hair are combed at intervals over the crown. Small curls are worn round the face, and gold ornaments, enriched with precious stones, are fastened on the crown and between the bands of hair. The back hair is arranged in thick plaits, looped up with a gold comb, and a white feather at the side, arranged to fall low on the shoulder.

THE EMERALD HEAD-DRESS consists of a coronet of short curls across the forehead, the curls being divided in the center by a band of steel, with interceded lines of either silver or gold thread upon it; a branch of hawthorn with silver foliage at the side. Curls pinned across the back of the head, and fastened at the top with a gold and enamel comb.

There is another style, rather more simple, in which the hair is twisted back from the forehead over a small frizzette, and is kept in its place with a thick gold cord, which is carried twice round the head, and then tied at the sides in graceful loops. The hair is arranged at the back with a thick plait.

How do our readers like this style of dress for "a child who is as yet a baby?" A white silk shirt; a low white silk bodice; a muslin gossamer; a snow-flake in white silk, fastened with a bow on the shoulder, covering the chest, and then tied at the side; a white silk pelisse, embroidered by hand in chain-stitch and pearls; a white beaver hat, bound with velvet, and a long white feather at the side. That child is the daughter of a fashionable Parisian, and is cited as one of the most tastefully-dressed children in Paris.

Among the patterns lately taken out in France are the following:

"A hygienic alphabet in gingerbread; a method of making head-dresses, caps, and pocket-handkerchiefs in paper; a mechanical fan, opening and shutting instantaneously; a machine for cutting staps by means of a system of points, reproducing instantly the relief required; an apparatus for making deaf people hear; and ten patents for stopping railway trains."

The intended betrothal of Princess Helina to Prince Christian, of Anhalt-Bernburg, is announced. It is understood that the marriage will be one of a "union, and that, as the Prince has neither country nor subjects to claim the attention, the Royal couple will permanently reside in England.

The French medical schools refuse to admit ladies to study medicine. A lady, Mlle Bangner, a native of Algiers, having passed her examination, and obtained the diploma of Bachelor of Letters, applied to the Doyen of the Faculty of Medicine, of Montpellier, to be allowed to study medicine in that university, but was refused. She then applied to the Minister of Public Instruction, and he proposed the following compromise: That she should be permitted to study medicine on condition that, when qualified to practice, she should confine her labors to the Arab women of Algiers, who have a great objection to male physicians. This was declined by Mlle Bangner.

MISSISSIPPI.

In the present situation of the country the material condition of the Southern States is of primary importance. We give on page 12 a map of the State of Mississippi, surmounted by an emblematic representation of that State. In the centre of the latter is the STATE ARMS, with the eagle and the sun rising over the waters. Above is an armed figure of Minerva, bearing the liberty cap on the spear in her right hand. On the left we behold Dr. Soto, the Governor of Cuba, and probably the first white man who ever saw the River Mississippi, in converse with an Indian chief, while his mailed followers are grouped behind. To the right is a sketch illustrating the great agricultural interest of the State—field laborers bringing in their baskets of cotton to the huge cotton-press which rises in the background.

Mississippi lies between 31° 10' and 35° north latitude and between 88° 9' and 91° 40' west longitude from Greenwich; mean annual temperature varies from 60° to 70° Fahr.; area, 47,146 square miles, of which, in 1860, 5,563,755 acres were in improved farms, and 19,773,927 unimproved farms, valued together at $190,760,367; and the value of farm implements and machinery was $8,826,512. The surface has a general slope in a direction south and south-western. The portion of the State bordering on the Gulf of Mexico, and extending for 100 miles inland, is a sandy country, with but few slight elevations, originally covered with pines. The region south of the Yazoo River, and between it and the Mississippi, is a large tract of alluvial land, of great fertility, subject at times to inundation. The other portion of the State is a slightly elevated table-land, traversed by ridges of moderate elevation, some of which terminate at the Mississippi in what are termed bluffs. The only rivers of note are the Pascagoula and Pearl, flowing into the Mississippi Sound; and the Big Black and Yazoo, running into the Mississippi River, which flows along the entire western border of the State. The surface is well drained by many smaller streams, of which the above-mentioned rivers are the recipient of their waters. It has a coast-line of about 70 miles; a series of low sandy islands, off about ten miles, extend the entire line, the most noted of which are Ship, Horn, and Cat islands, between which and the shore lies the body of water called Mississippi Sound. The population of the State in 1860 was 791,305, of which 353,901 were whites, 773 free colored, and 463,681 were slaves. The following table shows the white, free colored, slave, and aggregate population of each county; and also the number of bales of cotton, of 400 pounds each, produced:

Mississippi produces the largest amount of cotton of any other of the States of the Union; in 1860 it amounted to 1,202,567 bales of ginned cotton, of 400 pounds each. The grain crops of 1860 consisted of—wheat, 587,925 bushels produced; rice, 89,474; Indian corn, 29,057,082; oats, 227,235; barley, 1875; buckwheat, 1699; and rice, 803,082 pounds; and there were produced of peas and beans 1,954,695 bushels; Irish potatoes, 414,520; sweet potatoes, 4,563,873; tobacco, 139,141 pounds; wool, 663,809; and there were made, at the same period, 7282 gallons of wine; butter, 5,096,610 pounds; cheese, 4427; sugar, 506 hogsheads, of 1000 pounds each; 10,036 gallons of molasses, and 1427 of sorghum molasses. Home-made manufactures were valued at $1,082,144. The live-stock in 1860 consisted of 117,571 horses, 110,723 asses and mules, 207,646 milk cows, 105,008 working oxen, and other cattle 415,690; sheep, 832,632; and swine, 1,532,768.—valued, in the aggregate, at $41,391,693. Value of animals slaughtered, $7,800,123.

Manufactures.—There were, in 1860, 276 establishments of industry, with a capital invested in real and personal estate in the business of $4,384,972; the value of raw material consumed was valued at $23,196,636; hands employed, 4572 males, and 203 females, producing articles valued at $6,309,687.

The internal improvements consist of several extensive lines of railroads, which, in 1860, amounted in the aggregate to 872 miles, the cost of construction of which amounted to $24,020,000.

There is no uniform common-school system in this State; each township has a school fund arising from the lease of lands granted for common-school purposes by Congress, every sixteenth section having been so donated. The school sections in some townships are worth many thousand dollars, and in others only a few hundreds. In all the larger towns public schools have been established, and there are many flourishing high-schools.

RESIDENCE OF EX-GOVERNOR WISE, OF VIRGINIA.

We publish on page 4 a view of the residence of HENRY A. WISE, Ex-Governor of Virginia—the same property which has been so long and prominently held before the public, and which is still retained by the Federal Government, in spite of every effort to effect its reinstatement to its former owner, and to obtain a partition for it.

This splendid property is situated about eight miles from Norfolk, on the road to Princess Anne Court House, and contains some 1450 acres, 700 of which were cleared and cultivated, and the remainder in timber, at the outbreak of the war, but a very large quantity of the latter has been cut down during the war, and the wood cut up for the use of the Federal Government, at the saw-mills erected by Governor Wise himself. The property is now in a very poor and dilapidated condition. There are forty or fifty shanties scattered over its large surface, occupied by 230 negroes—men, women, and children—who find what precarious employment they can in the farms surrounding it.

The residence itself—the rambling old building to the right of the sketch—has nothing particular to distinguish it from many others of the kind scattered over the surface of this portion of Virginia. It has evidently been patched and altered at various times, producing in its internal arrangements all those inconvenient ups and downs so common to old-fashioned houses when joined on to modern additions. The oldest and most interesting part is that to the extreme right, represented by its steep mansard-roof and dormer-windows—a feature extremely common among all the old residences of Norfolk and its neighborhood. In this building are still to be seen an old sofa and arm-chair of the Governor—the only portion of his furniture left, excepting an anachronistic bedstead up stairs.

The out-building shown at the extreme left of the picture, and which was formerly the carriage-house, is now used as a free school-house for colored people. It was first devoted to this purpose in 1863, by the American Missionary Association, and at present gives daily and evening instructions to 150 colored people of all ages and sexes, from four years of age up to 65. Of these there are 120 children and 30 adults. The teachers assert that the children learn very rapidly, and that even the adults, with rare exceptions, show aptitude also. The report, so lately current, that one of JOHN BROWN'S daughters is teaching here was a mere fabrication. Mr. B. G. BRYAN has charge of the school, assisted by three ladies—Miss S. E. GILBERT, Miss E. A. LEAVITT, and Miss LIZZIE GILMORE. Mr. D. D. OSGOOD is the general overseer of this property and some eight or nine others in this neighborhood, at present in the hands of the Government, but to be immediately restored to their owners, who have all received their pardons.

CHARLES DECKER—THE SMALLEST MAN LIVING. (Photographed by N. Brown & Son, St. Louis, Mo.)

THE SMALLEST MAN LIVING.

We give above a portrait of Mr. CHARLES DECKER, the smallest man living. CHARLES DECKER, or CHARLEY (as he is more familiarly called), was born in Mississippi. He moved to Memphis at the age of ten years, where he has been employed by Mr. ED. WOODMAN in the profitable and useful occupation of selling Harper's Weekly and other periodicals for eight years. He is now eighteen years old and only thirty-six inches in height, and is well known in Memphis for his smartness and intelligence.

LADIES' EVENING COSTUME FOR EIGHTEEN HUNDRED AND SIXTY-SIX.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP,

COMPOSED OF IODIDE POTASSIUM, WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D., Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the McQueen's Island Hospital, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Voluntary Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases which are considered hereditary become cured by the use of this medicine, and many chronic diseases are cured by its use.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Some say, "Your cure are too quick," while others doubt their permanency, and think that disease can only be cured by the slow and tedious process of nature.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an impure state of the blood, and by its use the system is restored to its normal condition.

PARALYSIS

It is an universally admitted that Consumption leads to Paralysis, and Paralysis leads to Consumption, and the only remedy for both is Constitution Life Syrup.

DYSPEPSIA

Indigestion, weight at stomach, flatulence, liver complaint, want of appetite, bad breath, constipation, biliousness.

SCROFULA

STYMS, KING'S EYEL, GRANULAR Ophthalmia, Keratitis, Gonorrhoea, Syphilis, etc.

RHEUMATISM

(ARTHRITIS), LUMBAGO, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, GOUT, etc.

If there is any disease in which the Constitution Life Syrup is a specific, it is in Rheumatism and Gout, and in all cases of these diseases, it is a most valuable remedy.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of disease, restores the blood, and cures the worst cases of Consumption, and all other diseases of the lungs.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Heals cuts, rots and blanch, all Eruptive Diseases of the skin, etc.

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other eruptions of the skin, which so much disfigure the outward appearance of both men and women, and which make life so disagreeable to themselves and to others.

For all forms of Ulcerative Diseases, of the nose, throat, lungs, etc., and for all other diseases of the head, neck, and face, depending upon a diseased state of the blood, are very successful in their action.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP

Southern States which will give the pacifying influences fair play? So long as a large class of the population is subject to unfair laws there will be no temptation to immigration or trade, and free speech will be constantly threatened. So long, consequently, there will be no harmony or peace.

No man who really understands the character of our Government, and accepts from conviction the principles upon which it is founded, as they are impressively stated by President JOHNSON in his Message, can believe that there will be any actual pacification of the country until this fundamental point of political equality is settled. The question, then, is vital and imminent. Reasoning from evidence and human nature, have we any right to suppose that the present voting population will, without further suggestion from the National Government—in other words, from the people of the United States—take, within this generation, the necessary steps to settle the question of political rights in such a manner as to promise speedy peace and reunion? Or, to put it in the other way, will the true welfare of the country be more endangered by the immediate admission of the unrepresented States, seeing and knowing what we do—or by requiring, as a precedent condition, in addition to the amendment to which their assent has already been required by the President, and for the purpose of securing its rightful intent, a further amendment apportioning representation to the number of voters?

There is no occasion for heat and fury in the discussion of the question. All loyal men have but one great object in view, and that is the earliest real—not nominal or ceremonial—reunion. And it is very foolish for those who differ upon the question of method to denounce each other as reprobates or malcontents.

THE VOTE OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

We have had occasion sometimes to speak of the rats of the City Hall, which gnaw away the legacies of widows and orphans, which prey upon the property of all citizens who think they have any, and which have long since destroyed the honorable name of the city of New York. The taxes of this city are of fabulous enormity; its municipal management is another name for the worst corruption; its foul condition at this moment invites the cholera, which is hastening greedily hither; and were the experiment of popular government to be decided by its working in this city it would be called a failure by every candid mind.

Indeed it is hard to say whether it would not have come to a Vigilance Committee, if it had not been for the sagacious and timely help of the State. The Metropolitan Police and the new Metropolitan Fire Department—of the Commissioners and machines of which we elsewhere in this paper present an illustration, have been of incalculable service to this city and to the country; but they were both stoutly resisted upon their introduction, and that worthy patriot, FERNANDO WOOD, who mourned in the opening war that he could not send arms to the rebels with which to shoot loyal citizens, undertook to resist the law removing his police, but was fortunately not sustained in his rebellion, and yielded.

The politics of the State are a contest between the city and country. The question during the war always was, how large a city majority against the National Government must the country overcome? The vote of the rest of the State, in 1862, elected General WASHINGTON Governor by some thirty thousand, that of the city elected Mr. HORATIO SAYBORN by about forty thousand. The city of New York, in February, 1861, would doubtless have adopted the Montgomery Constitution by a large majority. In November, 1864, it gave more than thirty thousand majority for the Chicago shame and surrender policy. Beyond question it would have supported as warmly a proposition to allow the rebel States to resume their relations to the Union without a single condition; and out of its 123,000 voters some 10,000 only could be persuaded to vote for a candidate for Mayor pledged against the Ring, or conspiracy for municipal swindling.

In view of the proverbial corruption and misgovernment of the city, and of its tenacious adherence at the ballot-box to the party which has so long held the municipal control, and which as a party virtually palliated the rebellion and embarrassed the Government in its effort to suppress it, and considering the undoubted fact that the security of order and property here, such as it is, is due to the care of the State and not to the unrestricted authority of the city, it becomes extremely interesting to analyze the composition of the vote of the city. Why has the American system so conspicuously failed in an American city?

The means of this analysis are furnished in the State census of the year 1865, by which it appears that the naturalized voters of New York city outnumber the NATIVE voters by 26,000. A number which, by a singular coincidence, is almost exactly that of the Democratic majority of this city in our last State election. The whole number of NATIVE voters in the city is

These facts are very striking and significant. Unquestionably the 123,000 votes of the city represent in the mass the least intelligent voters in the country; and it is agreeable to know that the results of the elections in New York city are due to the ignorance of those who have had little chance to know the spirit of our institutions or the true policy of our Government, and not to the intelligent choice of native and educated citizens. These figures explain also the freedom with which money is voted away, and the civic partiality for allowances to the Institutions of the Roman Church over all others. The Census is a happy proof that the utterly misgoverned municipality of New York is not a representative American city.

DECLARATORY RESOLUTIONS.

THERE are certain good gentlemen in Congress who are fond of whipping out declaratory resolutions as a highwayman pops out a pistol, with "your opinion or your life." The performance is usually worse than unedifying; and especially during a discussion which should be so peculiarly calm, earnest, and deliberate as that upon which Congress is about entering declaratory resolutions are impertinent and mischievous. They are an attempt to coerce or forestall conclusions which can only be legitimately expressed after thoughtful consideration. They are devices of impatience and are very deceptive, except when they have the solemnity and force of great Legislative acts, and then they are meant to be maintained by all means and at all hazards.

But when they beg the very point at issue they are merely absurd. A man may hold many abstract opinions which he does not propose at any particular time and under existing circumstances to embody in laws. Yet if he be compelled to express those opinions, he is, on the one hand, exposed to a charge of inconsistency, or worse, if he does not subsequently vote upon a special proposition in accordance with his abstract views; and, on the other hand, by his regard for apparent consistency, he may be coerced into a vote which he does not fully approve.

Congress is a body of practical legislators met for deliberation upon the best methods of achieving certain results. It is not an arena for the assertion of doctrines of political philosophy. Every wise legislator, indeed, will hold certain fixed and absolute general principles, but the best application of them to legislation is the very point of his deliberation. He may honestly believe, for instance, that every body of sound mind and of a certain age should vote; and he may with equal honesty vote against a specific proposition for securing that result. To compel him, without explanation and qualification, to say yes or nay to a declaratory resolution upon the subject, is to embarrass him needlessly, and imperil the very cause which the mover of the resolution may have at heart.

Upon the great question of Reconstruction the country needs no snap judgment, but the most mature and sagacious action.

HISTORY OF THE GOLD PREMIUM.

FOUR years have elapsed since the Banks of the United States suspended specie payments. It is interesting to note the fluctuations which have taken place in gold during that period.

The suspension took place on the last night of the year 1861, eight months after the commencement of the war. For five months the fluctuations in gold were merely nominal, the highest point touched being 105. Wall Street speculators, seduced by the heavy interest account on sales of gold on long sellers' options, were willing to supply merchants with any quantity of specie, deliverable within sixty days, at a fraction below the cash price. People generally were believers in a short war, and, guided by the experience of 1857, were slow to believe in a great depreciation of the currency. Though the first Act of Congress authorizing an issue of irredeemable paper-money became a law on 25th February, 1862, it was not till the June following that the premium on specie marked 100. In the following month, July, the utter defeat of McCLELLAN's expedition against Richmond could no longer be concealed, and in the general discouragement caused by the news gold rose to 120. From this point it reacted in August to 112. In the first week of September came the sad intelligence of the second battle of Bull Run and the rout of POPE, which caused the premium again to advance to 120; subsequently, on news of LEE's invasion of Maryland, it rose to 124; but fell back on his retreat into Virginia, after the battle of Antietam, to 116. Then came news that BRAGG was chasing BURKE through Kentucky to the Ohio River, and gold rose early in October to 137, the highest point yet reached. It reached to 122 on the retreat of the rebels. But the upward tendency had now been fully established, and speculation began to accelerate the movement. In December of 1862 BRAXSIDE fought his un-

Hundreds of persons were now interested in the rise of gold. At Washington leading members of both political parties, department officials, newspaper correspondents, bankers, members of Congress, lobby agents, were all speculating for the rise, and with such daring and capital that nothing short of military successes of a decisive character could have defeated them. The public temper, from having been, in January, 1862, almost unanimous against an advance in gold, was now, in December, 1862, about as unanimous on the other side. The premium had been kept down below 105 by the force of public opinion in the first two months of 1862, in spite of prodigal issues of paper-money; in the first two months of 1863 that same public opinion, without the aid of material disasters, forced up the premium to 173. SHERMAN'S unsuccessful assault upon Vicksburg was the only important defeat of the period, and that was less material than several successes which occurred almost simultaneously. The climax of the speculation was reached in February. In four months gold had risen from 122 per cent. to 173 per cent.—51 points. It may have been too low in October, but such an advance was too rapid to hold. The immediate occasion of the collapse was the passage of the first gold bill through Congress—a ridiculous measure, forbidding loans of over par on gold. Had the market been in a different condition the act would have put up, instead of putting down the price. Inflated as it was, it only required an excuse to give way; this measure sufficed, and before the end of February, 1863, gold sold at 152.

From that point the decline was steady—with occasional reactions—till August, in which month it sold down to 122. This was on the defeat of LEE at Gettysburg, the capture of Vicksburg, and the capture of Fort Wagner at Charleston. When the news of GRANT'S gallant achievement was received in Wall Street it was confidently assumed that Charleston was "as good as taken," and that at last the rebellion had really received its death-blow. During this period of six months, from 15th February to 15th August, the old Bulls in gold had generally been ruined, and the Bears had reaped a splendid harvest.

In August well-informed persons, who knew that the war was not over, that the rebels were still full of fight, and that the Government stood in great need of money, became large buyers of gold and exchange, and the premium again began to advance, until by November, 1864, it stood at 150. The changes were fair that, in the absence of decisive military events, the premium would remain at about that figure, when it unfortunately occurred to Secretary CHASE and to THADDEUS STEVENS that it might be depressed by legislation. On the first suggestion of interference with the trade in bullion the premium advanced to 160, and then, in April, 1864, to 180. Every one became uneasy. If to buy gold would be pronounced a crime the holding of gold would next be declared criminal; the French Government, during the Revolution, had punished with confiscation and imprisonment persons who hoarded specie; if our Government pursued its present policy a similar measure was not improbable. In the dread inspired by these apprehensions large numbers of persons purchased gold and shipped it abroad, creating a scarcity of the precious metal, and causing the price to advance. Undismayed by these indications Congress pursued its policy, and the famous gold bill was passed, the effect of which was to cause specie to advance to 225 in July, 1864.

The military prospect at the time was not unfavorable. GRANT was pushing "on to Richmond;" SHERMAN, with the finest army in the world, was preparing for his march through the cotton States; all the indications were in favor of the success of the Government and the ruin of the rebels. Yet so wide-spread was the alarm created by the interference of Government with the trade in bullion that gold rose 20 per cent. a day for several days in succession, and would have gone on rising indefinitely but for the repeal of the "Gold Act." This evidence of a return to sound principles checked the advance. But it was not so easy to repair the damage done. The lowest price made for gold in August, 1864, was 237—fifty points above the highest price current before Congress began to legislate on the subject. In the first week of September SHERMAN took Atlanta, and, on the news, gold fell to 186. From this point it rose again. In November considerable uneasiness was felt respecting SHERMAN, GRANT'S operations did not yield results which the masses could appreciate, the volume of paper-money was excessive, and there seemed to be no limit to the issues, present and future; and gold once more touched 260.

This was the last great upward surge. From the fall of Savannah at Christmas 1864, which depressed the price to 211, all went well with the Union cause. Congress, taught by experience, killed a few gold bills in a summary manner, and quite positively refused to authorize new issues of paper. Under the influence of this policy gold was only about 200 when Richmond fell. The event caused a decline of 52 points; and when, a few days afterwards, the whole Confederacy collapsed like a balloon, the Generals surrendered, and the Kingmaker was caught, a further decline of 20 points, bringing the price down to 128, was realized.

From that point it has reacted as high as 149. For several months the premium has fluctuated between 147 and 152, seldom rising above the latter or falling below the former figure. Heavy sales of surplus gold by the Sub-Treasurer at New York have put down the premium, and occasional inquiry for gold for duties has put it up. But its range has been a narrow one.

It is not Mr. McCULLOCH'S plan, as we understand it, to attempt any violent interference with the gold market. He will sell all the surplus gold he can spare at the market-price—no more. He will continue to exact gold for duties. He will, of course, oppose legislation on the subject of dealings in gold. And while he will resist all further expansion of the currency, he will from time to time, as the market suits, negotiate new loans with a view to the withdrawal of the currency received in payment. The effect of these measures will be gradually to depress the price of gold as compared with currency. How rapid the depression will be—over how many years the process may extend—how old we shall be when the last legal tender passes out of circulation—these are problems which depend, for their solution, on influences beyond the control even of Secretaries of the Treasury, and respecting which it would be futile even to hazard a conjecture.

THE LABOR QUESTION AT THE SOUTH.

LAST August General SLOCUM, then commanding in Mississippi, countermanded Provisional Governor SHERMAN'S order for the enrollment of the State militia, and gave excellent and conclusive reasons for his conduct. The General's action was not sustained, and the consequences which he predicted are taking place. The following statement, which comes to us in a letter from Rodney, Mississippi, dated on the 2d of December, is confirmed by a distinguished General who was long in service at the Southwest, and has just returned:

"The militia of this county have seized every gun and pistol found in the hands of the so-called freedmen of this section of the county. They claim that the status laws of Mississippi do not recognize the negro as having any right to carry arms. They commenced seizing arms in town, and now the plantations are ransacked in the dead hours of night by Captain WOODS and company. There are no Union troops here, not even a Provost-Marshal nearer than Fayette; and of course the pro-rebel militia are having full sway, although they give Fayette a wide berth in their operations, not wishing to come in contact with the Provost-Marshal. Several of the guns seized belonged to disbanded colored soldiers. Some of them have applied to the Provost-Marshal in Fayette; but, though willing, he is unable to assist them, not having any troops with him. The colored people intend holding a meeting to petition the President's Bureau to re-establish their county in the State of Mississippi, as the civil laws of this State do not, and will not protect, but insist upon enforcing on their liberties."

In Texas, General GRANTON recently arrested an ex-slaveholder for chasing a freedman with dogs. Throughout the disaffected section the hatred of the colored race is intense, and they are persecuted without mercy, especially if they have worn the uniform of the United States. Undoubtedly the whites would like to exasperate the blacks into insurrection, that there might be a good excuse for their extermination. Meanwhile, it is indubitable that the conduct of the freedmen is generally as patient and loyal as it was during the war. They are willing to work, and wish to remain upon their native soil. But the experience of the West India islands shows that the class which, after emancipation, retards and perplexes a proper adjustment of the new relations is always the masters. As a rule, their haughty, senseless, impracticable conduct, their refusal to accept the radical change, and their determination either to retain their old domination under new forms, or by sullen passivity to make freedom seem worse for the laborers than slavery, is the cardinal difficulty of the situation.

That this is to be so in our Southern States is plain, and the duty of the Government, which has freed the slaves, is to consider in what way it can best secure that freedom. The Freeasy Post urges warmly an allotment to the freedmen of portions of the public lands, believing that, when the planting class discovers that labor is disappearing, wages will rise and the treatment of the laborer improve. Others are sanguine that, if a beginning could be made, in Virginia, for instance, of transporting freedmen to Florida, under the auspices of those whom they have learned to trust, even if but a thousand or two should go, the result would be similar; and the landowners, finding that the laborers were not absolutely dependent upon them, would gradually come to reason.

Such suggestions deserve thoughtful attention; and the importance of the question, and the necessity of the most intelligent action, which can be based only upon accurate knowledge, show how indispensable is the continuance of the Bureau which is now so skillfully and ably controlled by General HOWARD. It is also of extreme importance that it should be managed by those who are really and not merely officially interested in the subject.

JURY QUALIFICATIONS.

SENATOR DOOLITTLE, of Wisconsin, has introduced an excellent bill abolishing in the United States courts the disqualification of jurors based upon their knowledge and impression of the circumstances attending the commission of crime. In cases of great and peculiar publicity, when it is especially necessary that the most intelligent jury shall be empaneled, the most intelligent men are obviously more or less familiar with the public accounts of the transaction, but are by no means necessarily prejudiced. The press has taught us all to distrust the press, and no intelligent man now forms an absolute and final opinion merely upon the current reports of news.

The old law, as Mr. DOOLITTLE remarks, called men to a jury because they knew all about the transaction. But lately such men have been entirely excluded. Yet in a case of paramount importance, like that of JEFFERSON DAVIS, when the facts are necessarily familiar to every man, and an opinion has been formed by every man so far as he has considered the facts and what he supposes to be the law, there is no shutting of the mind to any fair statement or strong argument, and the case could be as justly tried by a jurymen who had read and talked upon the subject for the last four years as by a denizen of the planet Mercury newly come down. The question in the case would be not whether DAVIS had waged war against the United States, which he would not deny, but whether he were justified in doing it.

Or to take a somewhat different case—that of QUANTRELL. However strongly a man may feel upon the subject of the Lawrence massacre, he would yet be capable of perceiving a palliation or justification, if such could be produced. And while the exclusion operates against the honest man it is powerless against the dishonest. A person who had vowed revenge against QUANTRELL would often swear that he had no opinion of his guilt, in order to get upon the jury and hang him.

The proposition of Mr. DOOLITTLE applies, of course, to the case of DAVIS. It is very clear that a jury can never be empaneled for his trial if it is to be composed of those who have really formed or expressed no opinion upon the subject. We are indeed inclined to believe that the trial will never take place, but for other reasons. The President says that persons charged with treason should be tried, that the truth "may be clearly established and affirmed that treason is a crime." But how if the jury should not agree or could acquit JEFFERSON DAVIS, for instance?—would the truth not be, in that unlucky case, "clearly established and confirmed" that secession is a right? There seems to us to be more sense in Mr. DOOLITTLE'S bill than, under the circumstances, there would be in the trial it contemplates.

WHAT "JOE FRY" THINKS.

"Joe Fry" takes us pleasantly to task for our "Saturday Sermon" of some few weeks since. He asks:

"Now, old fellow, how are you going to accomplish 'the moral elevation of society'? If the working man, whose whole energies are devoted to hard bodily labor for ten hours per day is to be elevated, please inform me by what process you propose to do it. Does a severe and constant tax upon the muscular system tend to mental elevation? Does it tend to subvert the heart, to crush authority toward all men, to give us broader views of our duties as citizens? Now, Sir, I have worked twelve, eighteen, and sometimes twenty-four hours for a day's work. I confess that I prefer ten hours to either, and would prefer eight hours to ten. Not because I am lazy and don't like to work, but because I believe that there is a living principle within me—the seed which animates and inspires this mass of bone and sinew, flesh and blood that I call my body—that it is my first duty to cultivate and make that keep pure and stimulated. Now I was not born with a silver spoon in my mouth; I expect to work, and work hard, just as long as I am able. But if I can have ten more hours per day to devote to my own 'moral elevation,' would I be any thing short of being an idiot did I sit idly by and do nothing toward the attainment of so desirable an end? Nor do I believe that the capitalists need enlarge if they generously choose to in this eight hours of labor for a day's work. Let some one try the experiment, and at the end of three months report how much he has lost by it, working the same number of men at the same work."

Mr. "Joe Fry" ought to remember that the question is not whether it is desirable that over-worked men should have more time for mental and physical recreation, but how to get it. It is a question of method, and one of the oldest and most perplexing in the world. Joe would certainly be an idiot if he did not take the same wages for eight hours' work that he does for ten if he found any body who wished to give it. But what would he think of giving ten cents for a loaf of bread instead of six? And yet this is what he expects the capitalist to do. If Joe were a dry-goods dealer would he expect a customer to pay him the same price for four as for five yards of the same piece of cotton goods? Now Joe does not sell cloth, but he does sell labor. Does he suppose eight hours of it will bring the price of ten? Of course if the eight is more effective, that is, if it will be worth more, it will bring more. But what would be the result, in Joe's opinion, if the Legislature should fix the price of a six-cent loaf at three cents? If the price of a loaf making eight, or six, or four hours a day's work could secure the same wages to the laborer, the same profit to capital, and the same price to the manufacturer of the loaf, it would be impossible to resist it. And if Joe can prove that the work of eight hours will be as productive as that of ten, he will be a pioneer in the reform which he desires.

He will not misunderstand us. Our object is the same. The point we discuss is one of method only.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The President has reflected much upon the Provisional Government. This Mr. HATTISSEY, Secy. of the Gov. of that State, and Secy. of the Executive office in the Governor's office of New York, evidently the President's chosen for carrying out the Provisional Government in order until after the meeting of Congress, was to make it impossible for members of the body to take part in the organization of Congress. We can see in his own relating these matters of their Provisional Government to attempt to compose or to participate in Congressional legislation. For plainly it was the President's design from the first appointment of Provisional Government that these latter should be displaced by the regularly elected Government, and the functions of the Provisional Government was to provide for the regular election in each State. The President did indeed step in to interfere with the immediate business of the Provisional Government; but his object in doing so was to relieve Congress of a serious embarrassment.

CITY NEWS.

On New Year's Day Major Hoffman was installed in office. The Common Council was reorganized by the election of John Hines President of the Aldermen, and J. W. Green of the Corporation, Board Mayor Hoffman's Message was received by the Common Council. From this Message it appears that our city debt amounts to $41,265,000, of which $2,500,000 is held by the Common Council of the State Bank. The total tax levy for 1865 was over eighteen millions of dollars. The Mayor says that he has been studying his Message.

First—The city should be permitted to choose its own officers, carry on its own government, and manage its own affairs. Its chartered rights should be preserved, its privileges maintained, and never, under any circumstances, should the State Legislature attempt to saddle upon it a constitution to govern and control it.

Second—The Mayor should be clothed with power commensurate with his responsibility. A concentration of power and responsibility should be the end and aim of all legislation relating to its government. It is the division of power and the division of responsibility which cause all or nearly all of our municipal evils, and the sooner this great truth is universally recognized and acted upon the better for the common interests of us all.

The last official act of Governor Hoffman before his expiration of the Mayorship was an ordering of 150000 of Redden's forger to imprisonment for four years and a half. In the course of his address to the prisoner he said: "If, sitting here as a judge, I should indicate your punishment for any of the reasons assigned, or because your eyes are acting and feeling, or because of my own personal sympathies with those who mean for you, I should feel that every sentence I had passed upon a first offender had been a wrong, and that I was indeed a respecter of persons."

NEWS ITEMS.

A large and destructive fire broke out in the railroad depot at Groton, Connecticut, at half past 1 o'clock on the morning of 29th December, which especially damaged the depot, together with a large number of cars and the magnificent Sound steamboat Connecticut, moored in and near this city on the Washington line. The total loss is estimated at a million and a half of dollars, which is partially covered by insurance.

The Hamburg ship Arcturion was wrecked on the night of December 21st on Northwick, and all the crew perished. One man succeeded in reaching the shore, but soon afterwards died from exhaustion and exposure.

FOREIGN NEWS.

President Johnson's Message was received with great favor in England. It appears now to be received by our English leaders that they are not the only slavish and heartless nations on the face of the earth.

At a Thanksgiving banquet given by the Americans in Paris several noble remarks were made, at the close of which we gave the following toast: "The old friendship between France and the United States may it be strengthened and perpetuated." Frenchmen may perhaps wonder at our toast; they can learn from Paris, but they will doubtless understand that certain measures on this point are absolutely essential to the preservation of friendship between the two countries.

Governor Frye had been suspended from his functions in Providence, and Mr. Henry Stokes temporarily appointed in his place.

It does not appear that France has united very cordially with England in the re-assertion against Spain in regard to the Cuba affair.

The Christian naval steamer Albatross, which some time ago escaped to sea from Valparaiso through Admiral Parry's blockade, and was for a while lost sight of, suddenly made her appearance about forty miles to the westward of that port December 26, struck the Spanish war steamer Chalchicomula, and after a brief fight of half an hour, captured it, with all on board, consisting of over one hundred officers and men, four heavy guns, and valuable war munitions and supplies. In the engagement two were killed and fourteen wounded on board the Chalchicomula, and none on the Albatross.

The French Government has been requested to permit arrivals for life.

The news from South America, up to December 8, has been received, but contains nothing of great importance. The 21st of December was the fourth anniversary of the birth of the Emperor Don Pedro. There is no change in the military situation.

MOUNTED MESSENGERS ATTACKED BY INDIANS ON THE PLAINS.—[SKETCHED BY S. B. ESTEROS.]

UNDERGROUND RAILROADS.

An underground railroad has become of such obvious necessity in New York city that the presentation of arguments in its favor is utterly needless. From the Battery to Harlem river is a distance of more than eight miles. While traffic is concentrated in the lower portion of the city near the Battery, the people reside mostly in the upper portion, and the tendency toward Harlem river, and even across that river into Westchester County, is so great that the exclusive dependence now placed upon horse-cars and omnibuses involves a fearful waste of time. A journey which used to be made twice daily, ought to occupy, and would by steam conveyance occupy only forty minutes, now consumes an hour and a half. The railroads now in use do not begin to satisfy the demand. During the last ten years the number of passengers carried by the city railroads has increased from 10,728,000 to 60,325,700. New railroads are built, but still the cars are over-to the bill. In the first place, there was no guarantee that the road would be speedily completed, and, secondly, one of its provisions allowed the Company to use at pleasure, temporarily or permanently, any of the public grounds in the city, thus placing even our parks at the mercy of the Company. The justice of these objections has been acknowledged by the corporation of the Company, who had themselves to abandon the objectionable clauses of the bill. As the Legislature has again reconsidered this subject because of its instant and pressing importance.

It is estimated that the cost of the proposed railway from Bowling Green to Central Park will be over eight millions. The route proposed would follow the line of Broadway to Fourteenth St., thence pass under Union Square and Broadway to Twenty-third Street, thence under Madison Square to Fifth Avenue, and under Fifth Avenue to Fifty-ninth Street. Pipes for ventilating the tunnel might above ground serve as lamp-posts. It crowded; and while there is a hunt to the number of roads that can be built on our principal avenues, there is none to our rapidly-growing population. As a necessity we shall be compelled to build underground railroads. These, besides the economy which they realize as regards space and time, will also be free from dust, and afford fewer opportunities for casualties.

A bill for the construction of the Metropolitan or Underground Railroad passed the State Legislature April 27, 1865. It was sent to Governor FULTON on the evening of the same day, and on the 28th the Legislature adjourned. The Governor did not veto the bill, but returned it to the Secretary of State without his signature. He admitted the necessity of an underground railroad, but found two objections is proposed to erect stations at intervals of half a mile. The tunnel would be wide enough to give room for two lines of road, and would provide for carrying 51,500 passengers per day, or one-half that number each way.

The underground railroad has been tried in London with great promise of success. There, as in New York, it was found that the means of conveyance in the metropolis were slower and more liable to obstruction than in the country. It was a work of greater dimensions to get from the Mansion House to Temple Bar than to get to London from a far distant rural station, just as it takes longer to reach the City Hall from Harlem than to reach the same point from a distance of over thirty miles. A scheme was therefore proposed to encircle London with a tunnel which was to

INDIAN MASSACRES ATTACKED BY INDIANS ON THE PLAINS.—[Illustrated by H. B. HARRISON.]

"Confound that meddling woman!" said David, wrathfully in his heart, but wisely left Mollie to herself, and went below with Jennie to brew the punch, with which to see the Old Year out and the New Year in. Meanwhile Mollie turned down the gas, because of her headache, and, sitting there in the dark, resolved to give David his answer. Even as she resolved the door opened.

"Mr. Trusman," commenced Mollie in a trembling voice. "I have made up my mind about—about what we were speaking of."

"Well," David's voice sounded strangely—choked, and hardly above a whisper.

"And I think I ought to tell you at once," pursued Mollie, hesitatingly, "for fear you might deceive yourself; for, when we stood there by the window, I was not sure of myself, and I think you know it! for I was saying to myself how bleak and bitter it looked outside, and how snug and safe this looked, and that I must choose between them! But I have been thinking since then of Joe"—and here her voice sank and took a new touch of tenderness; "and, Mr. Trusman, no doubt he is dead, but he is not dead to me—not dead to me! and if I sat here as your wife, and there should come a strange step on the stair, and a quick knock at the door, my heart would come up with a jump, and I should say to myself, all in a tremble, perhaps that is Joe; or if we were chatting by the fire, and the storm beat hard against the windows, I might smile at you, but I should be shrinking and praying, as I have done on many a stormy night before, for Joe."

"Oh, God bless you!" and the deep voice that broke in on hers was never David Trusman's. Mollie sprang up and screamed shrilly, "Jennie! Mr. Trusman! Jennie! quick! I'm going out of my head! Jennie!" all the time trying to light the gas, which, flaring up at last, showed David hurrying up, with his sister close behind him, and, oddly enough, Mr. and Mrs. Minnow following her, and Mollie, pale and dumb, with eyes staring wildly at a tall, blue-eyed, well-looking young fellow, who, if he was a ghost, was of the brownest and in the best condition ever seen.

"Joe Dory!" cried out David, loudly, and "Joe Dory!" echoed Jennie, and "Joe Dory, sure enough!" piped Mrs. Minnow, making a rush from behind her husband toward Mollie; "and to think that he—no, that isn't it! stop now—let me begin at the beginning! and, in the first place, Joe isn't dead. It was the wrong man, or the wrong ship, or something, and coming home after a hard voyage think what a start he got when passing here, he saw Mollie at the window as if she were quite at home. Off he flies to Grim-Malkin's to hear the news; and says Grim, says she, 'I have a feeling heart, Mr. Dory, and can't bear to distress you; but if the truth must be told, Mollie's quit this very day, only because I said to her she was going on shameful, and you only dead a year, and nothing certain; and I heard from one that saw her that she goes to David Trusman's, and after that I suppose you know as well as I do what will come next; and this wife Joe, being a man, is stupid of course, and swallows it all, and back he posts to me, and then I come over to see how the land lay," looking wickedly at David; "and thinks to me, 'I'll get her over and bring her out; and I had very nearly brought myself out too! such work as I had to get Joe out of your way, my dear! and I brought you out; and you come out, didn't you?' said Mrs. Minnow, laughing heartily and whirling the bewildered Mollie round and round; "and Joe there all the time on the other side of the door and heard every word you said! and then he insisted on coming over to-night like a ghost, instead of coming to-morrow like a decent Christian caller, and so here he is."

One, two, three, four—the clock striking twelve.

"The punch," cried Jennie.

"The New-Year," said Joe softly, drawing Mollie a little aside, "and a New-Year for us indeed, my love!"

"But since he was to come back, why the deuce couldn't he have come before I made a fool of myself?" growled David Trusman, to the bottom of his glass.

UNCLE JACOB'S WIFE.

We were sitting round the breakfast-table, my father, mother, brother Tom, two sisters, and myself, one winter's morning, when the letters came in, nearly an hour late.

"Postman says, Sir, that the roads are frozen so slippery that he had to leave his horse at a farmhouse and walk over with the bag," said James, apologetically, as he laid the letters by my father's plate.

"There's always something wrong," said my father, with a shrug, "when I am expecting important letters."

"Read that from Jacob," said my mother, pointing to one.

"How do you know it's from Jacob?" asked my father, always a little jealous if he thought his letters were in any way scrutinized, even to the reading of a post-mark.

"I see his writing across the table," said my mother, meekly. Here she touched another weak point of my father's; he was the slightest bit envious of her better sight.

"It will wait," he said, and chipped at his egg. But the touch of spleen was but momentary, and he presently broke Uncle Jacob's red seal.

"He is coming here," he said, without looking up.

"He will be welcome," said my mother, and my father read on. He always read straight through a letter before enlightening us. Suddenly his face changed. He turned pale, absolutely white, he whose complexion was like that of one of his own ruddy apples; his hand shook, too, and he threw down the letter.

"What is it? Is he dead?" asked my mother in her fright, forgetting that she was looking at his writing.

"Worse than dead!" said my father.

"What has he done?" we three girls exclaimed in a breath. "Is it very bad?" for my father's face was a picture.

"Pshaw!" said my father, and his color came back as he spoke; "he's going to be married."

"Married!"

"Married!"

"Married!" We all pronounced the dreadful word, and then there was silence, and we thought much and said little. The matter, in fact, was beyond speech.

"There go your fortunes, girls!" said Tom, breaking silence, with a look that reminded me of his old mischievous school-boy days.

"Hold your tongue, Sir!" thundered my father.

"I must say I think it inconsiderate of Jacob, highly inconsiderate," said my mother, but something in her voice pleaded for Uncle Jacob as she spoke; she was such an unreasoning sort of woman, my mother, in her habit of leaning to mercy's side.

"Inconsiderate? Disgraceful!" said my father.

"Yes, my dear Charles, very disgraceful," said my mother; but I caught the same tone of appeal in her voice.

"Shameful! Ridiculous! Unheard of?" My father was given to the piling of epithets. "Pitiable in a man of his age!"

"He is old to marry," said my mother.

"Old! Only think of it. I am sixty-seven, and he is not two years younger."

"I suppose he was very lonely."

"Why could he not have come here, then?"

"His business, my dear," said my mother. "I suppose he can not leave his office in town for long."

"Why not have asked one of the girls to go and live with him? if he was lonely. Lonely! nonsense! The man has no more feeling of loneliness or any thing else than a dried stick. Lonely!"

"It seems a pity," said the gentle voice of the gentlest of all gentlewomen.

"You don't appreciate the case at all, Mary! The old goose! So, nothing but marrying will serve his turn—and all out of spite too! Well, he is bringing a fine lot of cares on his shoulders, and so he'll find. There's an end to his quiet life now. The trouble of a wife—Here my father checked himself, seeing something perhaps in my mother's face.

"No, Mary; I didn't mean that! You know I did not. You and I have pulled together without a rub for five-and-thirty years. Why, Polly, what are you thinking of?" She did not speak, but I always thought my mother's smile was better than words. I am sure my father thought so too. Her smile was known to us all to be the sunlight under which the sour parts of his nature ripened to sweet.

"I wonder what she is like!" queried Tom, unluckily giving utterance to the thought that was seething in our girlish minds.

"Stuff, Sir! What does it matter!" said my father, effervescing again. "A designing woman, no doubt: designing women are all alike."

Now Uncle Jacob had never spoken a word of love or matrimony, but we built our hopes on the circumstances of the case, and very reasonably so, I think. He had not a single relation in the world outside our house. He had always been kind to us in his way, paying Tom's school-bills, and sending my mother presents of the quaintest ornaments that could well be seen. He was really fond of her, in his unobtrusive way, and had told my father confidentially several times that she was an "excellent woman." On one occasion, too, my father had been lamenting in his presence that we girls could have no fortunes.

"Tom must have the farm, of course, and then if he marries?" my father had said; and Uncle Jacob had said: "Don't fret yourself about their fortunes."

There was no promise in the words certainly—that is, no promise expressed—but did not an implied one lurk there so slightly hidden as to be seen? We thought so, and rejoiced and made merry over it, and made sure of our fortunes from that day forward.

Before a week passed my father had another letter from Uncle Jacob, naming the wedding-day, but not asking any of us to be present.

"Although he invites himself here, in the coolest manner possible, the fortnight after," said my father.

"I would fill the house, Sir, ask the Jenkinsons and young Clive here, and tell him there wasn't room," was Tom's sapient rejoinder.

"And make his wife an enemy for life," said James.

My father shortly enjoined Tom to keep his ideas to himself: so he had evidently decided to receive the visit.

The wedding-day passed, and the fortnight's honey-moon passed, and the bride and groom were to be with us next day (roads permitting). It really was pleasant, their coming so soon, for our curiosity had been raised to the highest pitch, and had as yet had nothing to allay it—not a single particular as to the young lady's age, looks, manners, accomplishments, nay, nor even her name. My mother had thought to write to Uncle Jacob, asking a few questions as to those matters, "to show just a little kindly interest," she said, but had not done it, my father having looked things unutterable at the bare idea.

My mother, in her motherly heart, began to pity the bride, as the hour came for the carriage to be heard crunching the frost up the drive.

"She is sure to be nervous, poor thing. Mind you meet her kindly, girls. It is not her fault about the fortune, poor thing; I dare say she knows nothing about it."

In one of my mother's pauses came the sound of wheels, and we went in a body to the hall—all of us except my father, who kept out of the way, wishing to meet the happy pair privately. Nearer and nearer came the carriage-wheels, and we opened the hall-door, and stood just inside in the biting cold air, as the green carriage, bay horses, and yellow post-boy came to the steps. She was tall—the bride—much taller than Uncle Jacob, tall and slight, and dressed in dark rich colors, but with so thick a veil down that we could not even make a gaze at her face, not even when she kissed us, for she only raised the corner, and let it down again. She was timid, no doubt, as my mother had said.

"Come in, dear aunt, by the fire." "You must both be half-frozen."

"You are an hour later than we hoped you would be."

"Dear Uncle Jacob, let Tom take your coat." Civil things we said of that sort, and finally marshaled our dear relatives to the fire in the morning-room.

"Stir the fire well in Mrs. Jacob's bedroom before she goes up stairs," said my mother to the maid as she left the room, "and take up the spiced negus when I ring. It is a great preservative from cold, negus as we make it," said my mother, turning to our aunt in an explanatory manner.

"Thank you," said the veiled lady. Uncle Jacob in the mean time had taken the poker in hand, and was "mending the fire," as he called it, to such purpose that his yellow-brown face became suffused with ardent crimson, and we kept moving our chairs backward half a foot at a time.

"Yes," he said, replying to my mother; "it was" (poke), "it was cold" (poke). "The roads were" (scrape of the lower bar) "like glass" (crash of the upper crust), "and we creep along slowly."

"Will she never lift her veil?" pondered I, and caught myself wandering off into musings about the mythical "Pig-faced Lady," and her rich veil, never drawn aside for human eyes to gaze behind. What if my uncle had been tempted by visions of enormous wealth to marry—a what? Before I had decided as to the sort of ugliness my aunt raised her veil, and I came back to everyday life.

She raised her veil, and we all looked at her. Nettie made some excuse and fled from the room, but I could hear her laughter at the end of the hall.

I think even my mother was startled by the swarthy, gaunt face revealed. It was a Scotch face evidently, for the salient points of Scotch physiognomy were almost caricatured, they were so strongly pronounced. The high cheek-bones might have belonged to a Tartar.

"Are you warm enough to go up stairs?" my mother asked her, with a tinge of surprise in her gentle tones.

"You must speak out to her," said Uncle Jacob, with a curious quiver in the corner of his mouth. "Out?" my mother asked.

"Yes, loud," and again the quiver. "Janet!" and he moved closer to his wife, "Mary wants to know if you are ready to go up stairs!" He spoke in loudest tones.

"What?" she said, turning an ear as deaf as Dame Eleanor Sparring's. "Up stairs?"

"Yes. Will you go and take your things off?" "Yes, I am ready, quite ready, thank you," said she turned to my mother and rose from her seat.

"Ring for the negus," my mother bade me. "Janet, let me carry your cloak," she said, in a desperate voice, but Aunt Janet was evidently dubious of her meaning, till my mother had taken possession of that article.

"Uncle," said Tom, "I'll show you your dressing-room."

"What on earth can he have done it for?" whispered Tom as he passed me.

Jane and I were left together, and Nettie came back when she heard them pass up stairs.

"Oh, Nettie, why did you laugh in the hall?" I asked.

"She wouldn't hear it," said Nettie; "and you know Uncle Jacob's always a little deaf."

"You will be getting us into a scrape, indeed, if you don't take care."

"Not I. Oh, what a bride!" "She is an odd-looking creature," said Jane.

"Fifty at least."

"We shall be as hoarse as rooks with shouting to her, if they stay for a week," said Jane.

"What a sight the courtship must have been! Poor Uncle Jacob must have made love under difficulties indeed; the whole neighborhood must have been as wise as himself. How ever could he have managed it!" and Nettie burst into a fit of uncontrollable laughter, in which we both joined. In the height of our merriment Aunt Janet entered the room. It was well she was so deaf, or she might have heard what would have vexed her.

My father explained the cause of my uncle's marriage to us in the evening after our guests had retired.

"She was Samuel Marten's only child," he began.

"His partner's?" said my mother.

"Yes. When he told me that much I saw daylight at once. Old Marten died in India over a year ago, and she came home."

"That makes her so brown," said Nettie. "I thought she had an Indian sort of look."

Nettie took the ice first, and made some remarks as to Aunt Janet's personal appearance; but when I started, and looked at the poor lady's face, it was evident that all sounds fell silly alike on those deaf ears of hers. "Do you know I like her," said Nettie, abruptly, one morning, when my mother was urging us to be more attentive. "Of course she's the greatest old fright that ever was seen; but she is kindly and good-hearted, I am sure."

My mother looked pained. "Nettie, don't speak of your aunt so. Never mind her looks; she can not help them."

"I suppose she can not, mamma, and yet a sort of instinct makes me blame people for being ugly."

"It isn't her face I mind," said Jane, who had taken a strong dislike to our aunt; "but her voice is dreadful. Her voice is like the tearing of calico, and sets my very teeth on edge." Our aunt was sitting knitting quietly by the fire all this time.

"She can not help her voice," said my mother. "You should try and look at people's pleasant side, Jane."

"I don't think she has a pleasant side."

My mother made no answer, but turned and abated a little of the morning news from the paper to amuse our aunt. Presently Tom entered.

"Nettie, look here; there is a great hole in my pocket. Will you sew it up for me?"

"Yes, only come closer. Now stand still—do stand still, Tom, dear—I am pricking my finger."

"How long is she going to stay?" asked Tom.

"As long as she pleases," my mother replied.

"How on earth do you manage to amuse such a living statue? I would not be one of you girls, shut up in a room with her morning after morning, for something. She would mesmerize me."

"You pain me, Tom, when you speak so. There is nothing attractive about your aunt; but I am sure she is a very worthy person, and deserving of your respect," said my mother.

"What! for hooking the old gentleman?"

"Tom," said Nettie, "do you think that is Aunt Janet's hair, or a wig (in a confidential tone)?"

"A wig, to be sure," said Tom, determinedly.

"I can not bear it, Tom," said my mother; "you must really go out of the room. Come, Nettie, and show your aunt some of your water-colors. I dare say she likes looking at drawings."

"She looks like a judge," said sarcastic Jane.

Nettie went to the piano after a while and sang a ballad or two of Balfe's and Lindley's, sliding out of them into some Scotch air, which she sang uncommonly well. I was watching Aunt Janet's uninterested face as Nettie sang, and thinking, with some pity, how great a privation hers was, when Nettie struck the first bar of "Ye Banks and Braes," and a change swept across the immobile face for an instant, as if she heard—at least, I mean that for a second I fancied so, for as I looked the face was dull-deaf as ever.

"Poor thing!" said my mother, "how I wish she could hear those sweet Scotch airs!"

"I should not think it would make much difference to her," said Jane. "I don't suppose she is inclined to be romantic."

Two or three days afterward my father came into the morning-room just before lunch, and, seeing Aunt Janet, was about to withdraw. "I wanted to tell you—" he said to my mother.

"Tell me what, dear?"

"Nothing—but that Jacob told me they are going on Thursday. He is getting fidgety at being away from the office so long."

"Janet spoke about going to me this morning."

"Well, I hope you have kept her amused. She must be conciliated at any cost. We must have them again soon, though I hate the sight of her. I really can not enjoy my dinner in the least, shouting out as I must between every mouthful. But it can not be helped."

"I like her," said my mother, "she is quiet and sensible," as my father moved back out of the doorway.

Thursday morning came, and our guests were to leave us. Uncle Jacob was particularly kind in his manner to us all, telling Nettie and me that we must come and pay our aunt a visit in town after they moved into their new house.

"You shall see all that is to be seen, as your aunt means to keep a carriage," he said, kindly, and we thanked him, as in duty bound, but I don't think we either of us felt inclined to venture on our new aunt's hospitality.

We all went up stairs with Aunt Janet to help her to dress herself in her wraps and furs. When she was dressed she sent the maid out of the room, observing to my mother as she did so that she never gave a shiner's money to servants.

"Not to any body she can help," said Jane.

"There you mistake me," said our aunt, turning round sharply on the unlucky Jane in an instant. "I act from principle in not giving to servants, not from greed."

"How ever did she hear me?" gasped Jane, in a lower tone, to me.

"As I hear other people," said my aunt, quietly. "Good-by, dear Mary" (and she turned to kiss my mother). "You have been very kind to me. I never expected you to think me a beauty, you know; you gave me credit for being 'kind-hearted and sensible'—I think that was it—and that is all I want from you. Believe me, I think all the better of you for having lived with you for three weeks in the palace of Truth."

"knew, nor, indeed, guessed—for his face was a sealed book when he so pleased it—but no doubt his heart condemned him sufficiently."

"It was the meanest trick!" said Jane. "Impossible to defend ourselves against such low cunning."

"No, my dear, you might easily have been safe. I don't think it was quite fair of your aunt, though, and I shall write and tell her so."

A few days brought Aunt Janet's letter. "You must forgive me, Mary," she said. "I allow I was wrong—very wrong, if you will; but when you understand all, you will allow that my temptation was strong to see you all as you are. Some day I will tell you the story of my father's second wife, who happily died before him, and you will see that my dread of designing people is a natural one, after what I have suffered. Come up to town and see me, Mary, and let us talk it all over till you forgive me."

"You have saved us, mother, I do believe," said Tom. "She likes you well enough to smile on us all for your sake."

A letter came from Uncle Jacob next. "Being the girls with you when you come, Mary," he said. "Don't let them be vexed with their aunt for her whimsies—she has taken a fancy to your Nettie."

"Nettie's naughtiness serves her as well as most people's goodness," said Tom. "Mother, look at your letter again and see if there isn't an invitation for me."

"What do you think of that?" said he, handing it across.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

New York enjoyed a sprinkling of fine days during the Christmas holidays. But there was an unwelcome episode of "misty, murky weather, drizzling wind and rain together." Broadway became nearly impassable. Between the muddy, slippery pavements and the thronging crowd it was almost as much as one's life was worth to attempt to cross the street. The poor horse had a fearful time in the constant effort to gain a footing on the slimy, glassy surface of our principal thoroughfare, and many nerves were shocked at the sight of a prosaic animal, struggling in his harness, bridled and muzzled. The recent "thaw," though not desirable for healthfulness, has certainly afforded one more favorable opportunity to remove from our streets the accumulated filth, which, again frozen up, will surely remain until next spring the seeds of malaria and death. Then the consequences of uncleaned thoroughfares will be apparent in the most obvious.

Genial reader, did ever you, with curious eye, watch the street-sweepers as they perform their work? Never had a chance? That is not strange, to be sure, chances are rare; but here is one—look! the sweepers with slow and measured steps are marching this way. One, two, three—fourteen in all, and every one armed with broom or hoe. Never mind that couple on the sidewalk, apparently in an angry discussion; nor those others standing with ill-judged weapons, but watch these four who are concentrating their energies upon a spot just in front of us. Two brooms and two hoes. Broom No. 1 makes an undulating sweep among the dirt. Broom No. 2 makes another in the opposite direction, whereby the dirt of No. 1, with all filth, is carried to its original resting-place. Broom No. 1 repeats the former flourish. Broom No. 2 ditto. Hoe No. 1 now comes in between the brooms and draws as much rubbish as it can back over the spot that is being swept. Hoe No. 2 next tosses a quantity of mud from the gutter, at random, toward the brooms. This process goes on. Sometimes the men look at what they are doing, but more often they don't. It makes little difference. At length three shoulder their implements and march on. The fourth succeeds in collecting a little pile of dirt, which a girl of ten years old, with one broom, could have got together in two minutes. As they go, the middle of the street is not touched, only a little strip, a few feet from the gutter, is slightly damaged. This is the way Forty-Seventh Street was swept not long ago. If street-sweepers don't know that a broom is not a sweep there should be a class in object teaching for their special benefit, and they informed that there is a distinction between the movements appropriate to these two implements.

It is a fact of practical utility that impure water is regarded as even more injurious to the health than impure air. If a pitcher of good water be placed in a room in a few hours it will have absorbed nearly all the impure and purrified gases of the room, the air of which will have become pure, but the water utterly filthy. This depends on the fact that water has the faculty of condensing, and thereby absorbing all the gases, which it does without increasing its own bulk. The colder the water is, the greater its capacity to contain these gases. Hence water kept in a room a while is always unfit for use, and should be often renewed whether it becomes warm or hot. That which has stood overnight is not fit for coffee water in the morning.

What next? A bold rogue in Barger, Maine, snatched a pair of gold spectacles from the nose of a citizen, and long since, and made off with them.

An exchange gives the following rules of Church Etiquette, for the special benefit of those who are so fashionable as to make their appearance long after the services have commenced:

Let the lady advance one pace beyond the door of the pew she wishes to enter, halt, and salute. The pew must then be vacated by each gentleman so as to allow for a free movement. The lady should rise simultaneously with the lady preceding her, and see by the right hand, then deploy into the aisle, the head man facing the lady, and the rest walking to his right and rear, the direction of the line being changed by a right counter-march, and forming again into line, up and down the aisle, still faced by the right hand. The lady, when she sees that the count is clear, completes her salute, and advances to her position in the pew. The gentlemen break off by filing from the rear and resume their places. Great care should be taken, of course, by other parties, not to enter the aisle when this evolution is in progress, until it is completed.

The sugar wedding—thirty days after marriage—is the newest thing.

Not long since a telegram was sent by a gentleman in Boston to a resident of this city. On the following morning the gentleman himself arrived here, having taken the night train. About three hours after his arrival the telegram, retid the previous day, was delivered. It proved on inquiry, that, through some mistake at the Boston office, the wrong street had been given in the address, though it was correct in other respects. The messenger—a young boy—ascertained that there was a mistake the evening previous—kept the telegram overnight, returned to the New York office next morning, and, after having it corrected, delivered it.

A gentleman of this city, not receiving a telegram one evening which he had expected, and which related to his case of importance in Albany, left the city next morning on that account. About half an hour after his departure the telegram arrived. On investigation it was ascertained that the boy—a mere child—had come to the basement door of the house the evening before—rang once, but not receiving an answer, concluded it was rather late, and that he would keep the telegram safely until the next morning which he did.

A telegraphic message is ordinarily of so much importance, to say the least, as a letter. Great care is taken that the city postman should be careful, discreet, and capable man. Why, then, should the delivery of telegrams be entrusted to young boys, who have not the good sense or thoughtfulness to consult a Directory, or ring a door-bell a second time?

The London Star gives a pleasant anecdote of the late J. F. Herring, the animal painter:

Some years ago he painted a small picture and received a check in payment. The check was written on a slip of paper, "Pay Mr. J. F. Herring," and duly signed, but without the insertion of the words "bearer" or "order," and the clerk of the Union Bank looked very doubtfully, first at the bill and then at the person presenting it. The artist noticed this, and demanded what was wrong. The clerk explained:

"Don't you see it's payable to J. F. Herring?" "Well, I see that."

"How do I know that?" said the clerk. "Do you know what J. F. Herring is?"

"Herring," said the clerk. "I've got the 'Three Mummies of the Temperance Society' at home."

Herring was delighted. He wrote a post, and on a sheet of blotting-paper lying on the counter dashed off a sketch of some leaves of books.

"What do you think of that?" said he, handing it across.

Fodder seems to be scarce in some parts of the country. A Maine paper states that a cow in that vicinity recently undertook to eat a coat-of-armor skirt. She managed to swallow a piece of the steel spring, but not being able to digest it, it worked through her stomach and penetrated her heart, soon causing death. The ladies should be careful how they shed their skirts about so promiscuously.

In a recent lecture on "Ireland and the Irish" it was said, and with some truth, that the Irishman takes the world more easily than his neighbors; he thinks it is a very good world, for it is the best that ever he lived in! If you talk to him about the dilapidated condition of the house, and the pig in the corner, he says, "Sure I can't bother about it. As for the hole in the roof, when the sun shines it doesn't need to be mended, and when it rains sure I can't do it. And as for the pig, hasn't the house every convenience that a pig could require?"

In that wretched pen at Andersonville the Irish soldier turned the laugh against every recurring misery; and at Peterburg, when the big Russian-bells were howling about the men's heads, it was an Irishman who exclaimed, "And sure there's the fiddlers to collect the wax in a waxen ear!"

The Irish have always been noted for their original and characteristic way of saying things. Theackerly tells of an Irish woman begging alms of him, who when she saw him put his hand in his pocket, exclaimed, "May the blessings of God follow you all your life"—but when he only pulled out his snuff-box, immediately added—"and never overtake ye!"

A nobleman said to an Irish gentleman, "We have had a delightful rain; it will bring every thing out of the earth." "And forbid, your Lordship; I've these wheat under it," was the reply.

An American lady went to London a while ago, and applied to a certain renowned Madame Rachel to obliterate all the marks left on her face by the small-pox. She paid in advance some fifty pounds, and received in return a bottle of "whitewash" and some "Arabian" balms, which produced no effect. Not satisfied with the result she applied to the Palace Court for redress; but at the last accounts her trouble was not ended, since Madame Rachel refused to return the money, and had not succeeded in beautifying the lady.

Every week appears to bring with it a new form of jacket, and so convenient are jackets found to be that many ladies adopt them in preference to bonnets to their dresses. This plan is found to be very successful, as a maid, with one good pattern, can make shirts; consequently, the more costly dress-maker can be dispensed with, and it is as easy to buy two or three ready-made jackets which fit admirably. The plush-cloth, already adopted in the summer, and the patent velvet are used for indoors, while wool-kin and other are fashionable out of doors. Very comfortable pajamas for indoor wear are made of scotch, blue, and violet cashmere, bordered with either blue fox or chinchilla. White jackets are always ornamented with black cord and jet tassels.

The newest Parisian open-cloaks are made either of striped plush, or of what are called the "Eastern silks"—fabrics which are ribbed and woven with the most dazzling of colors. Striped blue and white plush, striped purple and gold plush, green, violet, gold and white Eastern silks, all make up into the most magnificent of open-cloaks. They are cut in the form of talars, and easy have large square sleeves and hoods lined with plain silk of the color which predominates in the open-cloak; hand-kerchiefs and towels being added to the hood, and also to the shoulder-straps.

Brighton Young has had a new "revolution." He says it is "the will of God that the sisters should make their own bonnets and hats for themselves and their families from straw and other materials raised in the Utah Mountains." The next "revolution" will probably dictate the style in which they are to be made and worn. It is said that Brighton Young has a large lot of eye straw "for sale in lots to suit purchasers," which perhaps accounts for the straw-hat revolution.

The London Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, recently presented a watch for maliciously wounding a horse in a most horrible manner. The offender was sentenced to be kept in penal servitude for five years. It would be simply humane to have a society in New York of a similar nature, that the absence of poor dumb brutes might be brought to justice.

The marriage of the Princess Anna Maria is assuming quite the form of a public event. Newspapers and chronicles of every kind have for some time been engaged in recording the wonderful presents bestowed upon the pretty little bride. The numerous contents of the ecclesiastical marriage, offered by the wealthy and endowed, have presented such attractions to burglers that the greatest vigilance and activity on the part of the police have been necessary to protect them. The Empress gives the bride an Alençon lace dress, costing 30,000 francs, and a prayer-book worth 20,000 francs. It is, we believe, not widely known that the Empress gives her relatives a portion of two millions of francs, besides a necklace worth half a million, and a portion of 100,000 francs. Some of the Duke de Mouchy's aristocratic relatives, so far from being gratified at his obtaining a position on the fringe of a throne, complain that he is making a sad blunder.

longing that seized upon him at this thought! If he could but see her once again!—see her; speak to her; touch her hand; tell her how, though false to all the world besides, he had been true at least to her from first to last! He felt that he had never half told her how he loved her. He had never even kissed her—never once; for his respect had been as profound as his love, and he had not dared to claim the smallest privilege of a lover from one so young, so helpless, so be-reaved. He felt now that he would give his soul to clasp her in his arms and press his lips to hers. Good God! how he loved her! How his heart hungered for her!

He shook the gates with all his might—strove to clamber over them—flung himself against them; but in vain. Then he pressed his face against the bars, like a prisoner at the prison-gate, and, sobbing, called upon her name. But his voice was borne away by the wind, and the pitiless rain drove in his face and mingled with his tears.

While he was yet clinging there in the dark-ness with his eyes fixed upon the upper window the light suddenly vanished. He had made so certain that it was her light and her window that the disappearance of that little spark fell upon him like a blow. He felt as if the last link were now broken between them—the last hope gone!

Almost at the same moment he saw a lantern (carried apparently by an invisible hand) moving across the upper end of the court-yard. Again he shook the gates and shouted furiously. The lantern paused—moved on—paused again, and at last came quickly toward him. Then the bearer held it high above his head with one hand, shaded his eyes with the other, and asked roughly—“Qui est là?”

It was Jacques—the same Jacques who had let him out an hour or two before, and who, recog-nizing his voice, again unlocked the gates and admitted him.

“Tiens!” said he. “They are all in bed à Las.”

William Trefalden’s heart leaped with fierce exultation.

“No matter,” he replied. “My visit is to the gentleman. Tell me where he sleeps. That is enough.”

“What gentleman, M’sieur?”

“He who came to-day with the English curé. Quick! Time presses, and my business is urgent.”

“But the strange gentleman is no longer here. He went away about half an hour after Mon-sieur.”

“Yes, M’sieur—in a cabriolet with four horses, taking Monsieur le Curé and the young lady with him.”

“Dug, it is a lie!—a lie, and you are paid to tell it! Give me the truth—the truth this in-stant, or I strangle you!”

And, half beside himself, the lawyer twisted his hands in the lad’s collar as if he meant what he said.

“Ah, Monsieur!—for the love of God, Mon-sieur!—it is indeed the truth—if you kill me for it, it is the truth!”

“Where is Madame Bouisse?”

“Gone to bed, M’sieur!”

“Then wake her—tell her I must see her. If she were dying, I must see her. Do you hear?”

“Yes, M’sieur.”

Trembling from head to foot, Jacques picked up the lantern which he had dropped in his ex-temity of terror, and led the way into the house. They went straight to the housekeeper’s cham-ber, where William Trefalden thundered at the door as if he would bring it down. Madame Bouisse made her appearance, well-nigh startled out of her wits, and wrapped in the counterpane of her bed.

It was quite true—undeniably true. The young Englishman was gone, and had taken man’selle with him. They left about twenty minutes or half an hour after Monsieur took his departure. Madame Bouisse believed they were gone to Bordeaux. Monsieur was free to search the house if he chose; but he would assuredly find that she, Madame Bouisse, was not deceiv-ing him. They were gone.

Gone!

Without waiting to hear or utter another word he snatched the lantern from the boy’s hand and rushed up stairs. From suit to suit, from floor to floor, through empty rooms yet full of the ev-idences of recent occupation, down again, out of the house, and across the court-yard, shivering the lantern to fragments on the wet stones as he reached the gates! Then he paused, turned, lifted up his hands in the darkness, heaped curses on the place, and raged against it impotently, like a madman.

Till now he had been comparatively calm. Basy with his scheme of vengeance, he had put restraint upon his words, and even to a certain degree upon his looks. But now—now he no longer attempted to curb the fire within—now the lava-tide of rage and hate welled up and overflowed, and bore him along, unresisting.

Gone!

Impelled by an instinct that seemed to take the place of sight, he ran down the lane and out upon the high-road. The “Lion d’Or” was now closed for the night; but he battered fiercely at the door till it was opened. The landlord, sleep-ily obsequious, ventured to remark that Monsieur was late, but William Trefalden interrupted him at the first word.

“I must have a cabriolet and post-horses,” he said. “At once—do you hear?”

The landlord shook his head.

“But you have horses?”

“None, Monsieur.”

“Then where can I get them? Quick—quick, for your life!”

“Nowhere in Drouay, Monsieur.”

“But is there no farmer, no shop-keeper, no creature in the place who can be found to drive me to Bordeaux? I will pay any thing. Fool! do you understand?—Any thing!”

But the landlord only shrugged his shoulders and protested that not a soul in Drouay would be induced to undertake the job at such an hour, and in such weather.

The lawyer clenched his teeth, and stamped with rage.

“Then I must walk,” he said. “Give me some brandy before I go.”

The landlord held up his hands in feeble ex-positulation. Walk! Great Heaven! Walk three leagues and a half in this terrible storm! Let Monsieur only listen to the rain—listen to the wind—think how dark it was and how lone-ly! Besides, Monsieur was wet through already.

But Mr. Trefalden broke in with a fierce oath, and bade the man hold his peace and bring the brandy instantly.

Then he poured out half a tumblerful, drank it recklessly, flung a napoleon on the table, and rushed out again into the storm.

He was now utterly beside himself—his brain reeling, his blood on fire, his whole frame throbb-ing with fever and fury. The landlord of the “Lion d’Or,” thankful to be rid of him, shut and barred the door, and went straightway up to bed, resolved not to admit him again under any circumstances. In the mean while he seem-ed to have lost sight of his determination to walk to Bordeaux, and went raving and gesticulating up and down the village, where all, except him-self, were sleeping quietly.

Thus pacing to and fro like a caged beast, he suddenly became aware of the approach of a trav-eling carriage. On it came, thundering through the one straggling street of Drouay, with flaring lamps, steaming horses, splash and clatter of wheels, and the loud cracking of the postillion’s whip. He ran to meet it—he shouted—he im-plored to be taken up—he would pay any price only to stand upon the step, if they would let him! But the postillion took him for a beggar, and shook his whip at him; and the travelers inside, cut off from him by windows opaque with damp, and deafened by the rattle of their own wheels and the pelting of the rain upon the car-riage-roof, neither saw nor heard him. Still he ran beside it, panting and shouting—tried to clutch at the traces, but, receiving a savage lash across the hands, fell back and made a desperate effort to spring up behind. But all in vain. He missed his hold; the carriage swept on, and left him there despairing.

Still, still he ran, fated, irresponsible, head-long—now stumbling among the sharp flints in the road—now getting up with hands all cut and bleeding—now pausing to take breath—now fan-cying he could still hear the retreating wheels; and so, drenched, giddy, breathless, his hat gone, his face and clothes disfigured with mud and rain, rushing blindly on again!

Each moment the storm increased and the wind rose higher, till at last it culminated in a terrific hurricane. Then the thunder came up in heavy peals, and the lightning burst over the plain in rapid flashes, and the wind tore up the vines by the roots, and whirled them wildly away, with all their vintage promise, toward the sea. Yet still, urged forward by that fierce thirst which blood alone could slake, with murder in his heart and madness in his brain, William Tre-falden ran—fell—struggled to his feet—staggered on again—fell again—and so for miles and miles!

Next morning early, when the storm-clouds were drifting off raggedly toward the west with now and then a gleam of uncertain sunshine be-tween, a party of peasant folk coming up from the way of Medoc found the body of a man ly-ing face downward in a pool by the road-side. His clothes, face, and hands were torn and blood-stained. He had a watch upon his person, and in his waistcoat pocket a porte-monnaie full of bank-notes and napoleons. No letters, no cards, no token by which it might be possible to identi-fy him, could be discovered upon the body. His very linen was unmarked.

The honest country-folk laid this nameless corpse across one of their mules, and brought it charitably into the dead-house at Bordeaux. Hav-ing lain there unclaimed for forty-eight hours, it was buried in the new cemetery beyond the walls, with a small black cross at the head of the grave, on which the only inscription was a row of num-erals. His watch, his money, and his clothes were awarded by the préfet to the poor of the parish in which the body was found.

EPILOGUE.

THE world knows the Italian story by heart. How Garibaldi entered Naples: how, at Della Catena, he saluted Victor-Emmanuel as King of Italy; how he sheathed his sword when the great work was so far done, and went back to his soli-tude at Capraia, are facts which need no reca-pitulation. Had one man lived but a few months—say, a few weeks—longer, the tale might per-chance have ended differently. Where we now read Florence we might have read Rome; for “Regno d’Italia” on printed stamp and minted coin, a word of broader significance and more antique gloey. But the ideal Republic died with Giallo Colonna, and was buried in his grave.

In the mean while Olympia’s life became a blank. Her father had been the very light of her inner world. Bred in his political faith, trained in his employ, accustomed to look up to him, to work with him, to share his most secret councils, his wildest hopes, his fears, his errors, and even his personal dangers, she seemed to lose the half of her own soul when he was snatched from her. Then came the sudden change of pro-gramme—a change to her so bewildering, so unworthy, so fatal! Mistrusting Sardinia and scorning the very name of a Constitutional Italy, Olympia conceived that her father's memory was insulted in this compromise; and so, in the bitterness of her resentment and grief, withdrew herself altogether from the work in which her life had been spent. Avoiding all with whom she had labored and acted in time past, and keeping up no more than the merest thread of intercourse with even those whom she was used to call her friends, she then made her home at Chiswick, in the quiet house to which Saxon had conducted her on the evening of their arrival in London. Here she lived solitary and apart, cherishing her sorrow, mourning the great scheme unachieved, and learning that hard lesson of patience which all enthusiasts have to learn in this world sooner or later.

Not thus Lord Castletowers. Too English, too unprejudiced, and it may be added too sensible, to attach paramount importance to the mere epithet of a party, he welcomed the settlement of Italian affairs with a heartiness that he would perhaps scarcely have ventured to express very loudly in the presence of Colonna's daughter. Where she refused to recognize any vital difference between a Constitutional government and a pure Despotism, he was far-sighted enough to look forward to that free and prosperous future which most thinking men now prophesy for the kingdom of Italy, nor was he slow to perceive that there might be hope for himself in the turn that matters had taken. The Italian question thus far solved, Italy would no longer need so much support from her well-wishers. With a liberal monarch at the head of the nation, a parliament to vote supplies, and an army to defend the national territory, the whole system of patriotic blackmail levying, and special pleading of every description, must necessarily collapse. Olympia would therefore no longer feel herself bound to sacrifice her hand to "one who could do more for Italy" than himself. So the Earl loved and hoped on, and wisely bided his time.

Wisely, too, he applied himself in the mean while to the improvement of his own worldly position. Occupying his friend Saxon's vacant chambers in St. James's Street, he devoted himself to his parliamentary duties with a zeal that drew upon him the attention of one or two very noble and influential personages. Having made a couple of really brilliant speeches during the spring session of 1861, and happening to be upon the spot when a man of ability and tact was needed at a moment's notice, he had the good fortune to be intrusted with a somewhat delicate and difficult mission to one of those petty German potentates who make up for very small territories by gigantic pretensions, and balance a vast amount of pride against a scanty revenue.

The Earl, as a matter of course, acquitted himself perfectly, and began thenceforth to be talked of among his elders as a "rising man." It was the Duke of Devonshire smiled graciously upon him, and several of the Cabinet Ministers fell into the way of asking him to their political dinners; and the end of it all was, that just before the setting in of the long vacation, Gertrude Leopold Wynnecliffe, Earl of Castletowers, found himself inducted one fine morning into a very neat little vacancy in the Perquisite Office, where the work was light and the salary heavy, and the chance of promotion considerable. Then, and not till then, he ventured to renew his suit to Olympia Colonna.

The moment was favorable. A year of mourning had passed over her head, and the intense solitude of heart which had been at first her only solace now began to weigh painfully upon her. She had had time to think of many things—time to live down some errors and outlive some hopes—time also to remember how long and well the Earl had loved her; how worthy he was of all the love that she could give him in return; how he had shed his blood for her Italy; and with what devotion he had performed the last sad duties of a son toward her father's ashes. Besides all this, her occupation was gone. She could no longer isolate herself for Italy, for the simple reason that Italy was satisfied to rest a while upon her present gains, and preferred being left to settle her own affairs in a quiet Constitutional way. The disaster at Aspromonte convinced Miss Colonna of this truth, and of the stability of the new régime. And over and above all these considerations Olympia loved the Earl. She had loved him all along—even when she refused him; and now, after a whole year of sorrow, she loved him better than before. So she accepted him—accepted him very frankly and simply, as a true woman should, and promised to be his wife before the ending of the year.

Secure in the consciousness of her splendid birth, Olympia never dreamed for one moment that Lady Castletowers could be other than content and happy in this new alliance of their houses. That the proud Aethra Holme-Pierpoint would in this solitary instance have been prepared to sacrifice blood for gold—nay, would have actually welcomed a Miss Hathorn with her two hundred and fifty thousand pounds more gladly than a portionless Colonna—was a possibility that could by no chance enter within the sphere of her calculations. So when Lady Castletowers came over to see her the next day in her humble suburban home, and kissed her on both cheeks, and said all the pretty and gracious things that the mother of her betrothed husband was bound, under the circumstances, to say, Olympia accepted it all in perfect faith, nor guessed a bitter disappointment lay hidden beneath that varnish of smiles and embraces. The Earl, having himself borne the brunt of her Ladyship's displeasure, was, it need scarcely be said, careful to keep the secret very close indeed.

In the mean while Saxon Trefalden had gone back to Switzerland; and there, despite the urgent remonstrances of those dear friends who missed his little dinners and his inexhaustible check-books, persistently remained. In vain did the Erechtium lift up its voice in despair; in vain did Blackwall lament and Richmond refuse to be comforted, and Italian prima donnas sigh for banquets and brocade gowns by. The boyish, laughing, lavish millonnaire was fairly gone, and declined to come back again. The sirens might sing; but Odysseus only stopped his ears and sailed by unheeding.

The Earl alone knew that he was married; but even the Earl knew no more. He felt it to be somewhat hard that his friend should neither have invited him to his wedding, nor have taken him in any way into his confidence upon so important a matter. He could not but be conscious, too, that there was something strange and secret about the whole proceeding. Who had he married? Was the bride pretty or plain? Rich or poor? Dark or fair? Gentle or stumpy? What was her age? her name? her rank? her nation?

In reply to the first announcement of his friend's marriage, the Earl had ventured delicately to hint at two or three of these inquiries; but as Saxon limited his rejoinder to the fact that his wife was "an angel," Lord Castletowers naturally felt that the statement was hardly so explicit as it might have been.

On all other points Saxon was frank and communicative as ever. He laid his every project before his friend as unreservedly in his letters as if they two had been sitting face to face over the fire in the smoking-room at Castletowers, or leaning side by side in the moonlight over the taffrail of the Albatros. They were delightful letters, filled to overflowing with all kinds of general detail; now telling of the new chateau, which was already in progress; now of the bridge just built at Ostensien, or the road to be made between Taminus and Thuisis; now describing a national fête at Chier, or an entertainment at the Châteaux Plaines; now relating all about the cotton-mills which Saxon was erecting in the valley, or the enormous pasture tracts lately purchased, and the herds of Scotch cattle imported to stock them; now giving a sketch of the design just received from the architect at Geneva for that church at Allfelden on which Pastor Martin's heart had been set for the last thirty years—keeping the Earl constantly as constant, in fact, of every particular of his friend's busy and benevolent life among the simple people of his native canton.

At length it was the Earl's turn to announce the happiness so shortly to be his; and then Saxon wrote to enquire that the newly-married pair would extend their wedding-journey as far as the Valley of Domleschg, and be his guests a while. "My wife," he said, "desires to know you, and my uncle loves you already for my sake. On your wedding-day you will receive a parcel of papers, which you must accept as a souvenir of your friend."

The "parcel of papers" proved to be the title-deeds of the two farms sold to Mr. Sloper, and the title-deeds of Mr. Behrens's "box" and grounds at Castletowers. The farms were worth from ten to twelve thousand pounds apiece, to say nothing of the "fancy price" which Saxon had paid for the wool-stapler's property. It was not a bad present, as presents go, and it made a rich man of the Earl of Castletowers; but he little thought as he wrung Saxon's hand when they next met at Reichenau, that to the man who had presented him with that princely wedding-gift he owed not those farms alone, but Castletowers itself—Castletowers itself, with the ancestral oaks of which he was so proud, and the rare old house in which his forefathers had lived and died for centuries before him. That was the one secret that Saxon never confided to him—not even when, walking together under the apple-trees at the foot of the church-hill, he related the story of his own marriage, of his cousin's perfidy, and of the fate from which he had interposed to save Helen Riviere.

"And that," he said, "was how I came first to know her—how I came to love her—how I won her. I brought her home at once to the little chateau yonder. My uncle adored her from the first moment, and she adored him. I was almost jealous—that is, I should have been jealous, if it hadn't made me so happy. When she had been living here for about a month or five weeks we came up one morning, all three together, to this little chapel upon the hill, and my uncle married us. There was no one present but Kottli and the organ-blower. After my uncle had blessed us and the ceremony was all over, we embraced and bade him adieu, and walked along the Thuisis road till the cabriolet overtook us; and so we were married and went away, and no soul in Reichenau knew it all we were gone. We were so happy!"

"It is a strange story," said the Earl, "and a pretty story; and the best part of it is that you and I are cousins, Saxon, after all!"

"Nay," replied Saxon, grasping his friend's hand in both his own, "it is not much to be only cousins when we have been brothers so long!"

A word remains to be added respecting the other moiety of the great Trefalden Legacy; that moiety which, according to the will of the testator, was to be bestowed in the endowment of a great charity, chiefly for the benefit of "decayed tradesmen, mercantile men, ship-brokers, stock-brokers, poor clergymen, and members of the legal and medical professions, and the widows and orphans of each of those classes respectively." For the accommodation of these widows and orphans, the will went on to direct that a plot of freehold ground should be purchased, and that "a suitable and substantial building" should be erected thereon under the superintendance of "some eminent architect;" and this building was to be called "THE LONDON BENEVOLENT TREFALDEN INSTITUTIONS."

It is delightful to know that all this will certainly be done—some day. The money fell due on the twenty-second of March, 1860, and the sum then transferred to the credit of the trustees amounted to just four million seven hundred and seventy-six thousand two hundred and odd pounds. Since that time the exertions of the Right Honorable the Lord Mayor and Corporation have been beyond all praise. To say that they have either thought much, or done much, up to the present date, would perhaps be premature; but they have eaten an incalculable number of dinners on the subject, which to the civic mind means precisely the same thing. At these dinners they generally entertain a certain "eminent architect," which "eminent architect," being retained at a splendid salary for just so long as the works shall remain in progress, is naturally and laudably anxious to devote his life to the task. He therefore submits a plan now and then, or the modification of a plan, to the intelligent after-dinner criticisms of his honorable employers; and in that position the building-question now stands.

What site that "suitable and substantial building" is destined to occupy, how much it will cost, what it will be like, and at what remote period in the future history of the world it may probably be completed, are questions which the present generation is advised not to consider too curiously. No intelligent and unprejudiced person can doubt, of course, that when the ground is bought, and the building is built, and the bills are all paid, and the dinners are all eaten, and the resident curator, clergyman, physician, secretary, housekeeper, and servants of the establishment are salaried on a scale befitting the splendor of the foundation, there will yet remain something for the "DECAYED TRADESMEN, MERCANTILE MEN, SHIP-BROKERS, STOCK-BROKERS, POOR CLERGYMEN, AND MEMBERS OF THE LEGAL AND MEDICAL PROFESSIONS, AS WELL AS FOR THE WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF EACH OF THOSE CLASSES RESPECTIVELY." In any case, however, the claims of these insignificant persons will not have to be considered in our time; how, then, can we do better than eat, drink, and be merry, after the enlightened fashion of our honorable friends, the Trefalden Trustees, and so leave the future to the care of itself?

THE ENIG.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

NO WOODEN MILK AND VICTUALS ARE SO DEAR.

THE CHILL QUESTION.—"How's your cold?"

A Sister of Charity in Paris has been eating children by taking hold of their noses with hot tongs.

Some Journal of undoubted authority states that several new performers are about to be added to the orchestra. What orchestra is referred to may be somewhat uncertain, but the movement undoubtedly originated in the great "strike" of the musicians. Among these new performers are mentioned:

- The man who fiddles with his watch-chain.
 - The man who hops on one string.
 - The man who blows his own trumpet.
 - The man who is up to the horns of a dilemma.
 - The man who knows the symbols of algebra and the triangles of Euclid.
 - The man who drags the change.
 - The man who rings on the table.
 - The man who is fond of his wife; and
 - Several grotesque (or spectacular) with their musical glasses.
- Some of applicants have been refused, because they all wanted to play the first fiddle; and a chorus could easily have been formed of those who sang their own praises.

N.B.—The lady violinist will appear in mourning.

It is rumored that a gentleman in fair and regular standing in one of our fashionable city churches entered one of our leading music stores some time since, and asked his wishes in this wise:

- "Have you Selznick's song? I want to get a copy."
- "N-no," said the salesman, not being able to recollect at the moment any lithographed sheet with that title—
- "No; I am afraid not."
- "Ah!" said the amateur, drawing on his kid; "perhaps it isn't out yet. Our pastor spoke of it last Sunday as a production of great genius and beauty, and I want my daughter to learn it."
- The shopman, with what gravity he could command, regretted that they had no copies in yet; and the customer left just in season to save the vest-buttons of the book-keeper, at the desk behind the green curtain.

The rain has one disreputable fault; it is an ever-dropper.

The man who "took a walk" the other day brought it back again; but the next day he took a ride and has not since been heard from.

ANTHROPOLOGICAL REMARKS.—While Noah was in the ark, for forty days and nights it was a little dark, and Mrs. Noah and the rest of them not being able to reach their hair, presented an unusual object in the boat-gear line, and she and the rest of the women were continually run by the rest of the crew. Mrs. Noah's smiling reply was, "Wah till the water falls," and as such the style was known. When the ark struck ground, she put her head out of the door and such a head it, and notwithstanding, at the top of her voice, "Is this America?" And the impression was, and is to this day, that it is very much like it.

A young widow, on being asked why she was going to get married so soon after the death of her first husband, replied, "I do it to prevent fasting myself to death on account of dear Tom."

What is the worst that a man can sit on?—Self-evident.

Babies resemble wheat in many respects. Firstly, neither are good for much till they arrive at maturity; secondly, both are bred in the house, and are also the flower of the family; thirdly, both have to be cradled; fourthly, both are generally well. Arrived before they are three years

FETTERED ON A PORTRAIT-PAINSTER.—Taken from life.

Why is an eruptive disease an advantage to a man in jail?—Because when he gets it he breaks out.

A widow, who had just lost her husband, was weeping bitterly for the departed. A friend tried to console her. "No, no," said the fair mourner, "let me have my cry out; after that I shan't think any thing about it."

Who was the first jockey?—Adam, for he was the Father of the Race.

A barometer and a young lady bought some tickets in partnership in a lottery at the recent Sanitary Fair at Milwaukee, agreeing to divide the proceeds equitably. They drew a double dividend, a baby-crib and a lunch-bucket, and the question is, how to divide them, or whether they shall not use them "justly."

There is a good deal of the brain in man. For example, he is generally dog-male, often puppyish, sometimes postulantish, and usually row-el; occasionally cat-gout, and is always ready to be made a "lion" of.

CONSO-LA-TION.—"Which of these roads leads to the village of W.?" Inquired a traveler, as he came to a place where the road he was traveling forked in different directions, of an archer who sat upon a log near by, and whose appearance indicated that he was evidently a sportsman. "Any one on 'em, Sir," answered the boy. "Which is the best, my lad?" inquired the traveler. "Ain't no one on 'em but the best." "Which is the nearest?" "Ain't no one on 'em but the best." "Which do you think I had better take?" "You may take any on 'em; and as for you get half-way that you'll wish you had took 't'other one."

HIS-GRAVE.—Designing mamma.

Some gentlemen were in a tavern, and at the height of their jollity in came a friend of theirs, whose name was Samson. "Ah," said one, "we may see he is severely merry, fearing neither serpent nor scorpion, for, though a thousand such Philistines should come, here is Samson, who is able to bray them all." "Sir," replied Samson, "I may truly venture on so many as you speak of, provided you lend me one of your fair horses."

Sir Walter Scott once had an Irishman working for him who was a great drunkard, and who often neglected his work. Sir Walter sent him to do. One morning, while engaged in his fatherly labor, word was brought him that his man had returned after a two days' absence. Sir Walter dashed his pen down on his desk, and in great anger ordered the son of Erin to be sent to him immediately. Pat entered, like his blindest personification, and Sir Walter poured out the vessel of wrath:

"You unthankful dog!" said he: "here I have been putting up with your misdoings, and forgiving you from time to time; yet no sooner are you in good grace than you take advantage of me. But this is the last time, Sir; we must part."

"Well," said the gentleman from Ireland, "if we must part, I am very sorry, and hope to ill will happen you, but, may I ask, where are you going to?" He got another trial.

A curious law case has been tried in France, to discover who was the rightful owner of a well. Sweating and complication were going on about the matter, to a lengthy extent, when the judge, astonished, exclaimed: "But this is all about a little water. What can it matter so very much, that you should both put yourselves to so much trouble and expense about it?" "Monseigneur," replied one of the advocates, "doubtless." "The value and significance were seen at once, and created a roar of laughter."

Why not, Druggist?—We have already a female doctor, why not have a female druggist? And if so, why not call her Spencer-Druggist?

A gentleman having occasion to call on a solicitor, found him in his office, which was very hot. He remarked the great heat of the apartment, and said "It was hot as an oven." "So it ought to be," replied the lawyer, "for I no here I make my bread."

GENERAL JOSE M. J. CARVAJAL.

GENERAL JOSE M. J. CARVAJAL, the Special Commissioner of the Republic of Mexico to the United States, was born at San Antonio, Texas, in the year 1800. He was educated in Western Virginia, under the tutelage of Bishop ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, President of Bethany College. Since his return from the United States to Mexico, at the age of twenty-two years, he has been actively engaged in the service of his country, holding many important military and civil positions, all of which have been in aid of republican institutions. In 1851, after having for a number of years filled many prominent and responsible offices, which had gained for him the esteem and confidence of his countrymen, he proclaimed himself as wholly in favor of republican institutions, as opposed to the system of military despotism then prevailing in Mexico—which movement in favor of republican institutions was subsequently endorsed by the people, and is now the ruling sentiment of the people in every Mexican State. He has always sacrificed himself, his property, and personal ease to the great idea of his life—the establishment of liberal institutions, civil and religious liberty, and a republican form of government in Mexico. In 1864 he was sent by the Republican (JUANITO) Government of Mexico, in recognition of his ability and long services in behalf of his country, as Special Commissioner to the United States, to seek aid for his oppressed and suffering countrymen. While here he has attached to himself hosts of warm personal friends, and he has succeeded in creating in the American people a great sympathy for his cause. As agent for his Government he has negotiated with an American banking house for the sale of the bonds of the Republic of Mexico, which meet with universal favor. His public and private efforts are such as to win the esteem and confidence of every one with whom he comes in contact; and it is hoped that he will return bearing in his Government the fruits of his long and faithful efforts, in material aid, such as may speedily enable the Republic of Mexico to rid herself of her enemies. Having received his early education in an American college he has become thoroughly conversant with American character; and as he speaks fluently the English language, is particularly qualified to discharge, with credit to himself and his Government, the arduous duties of his responsible position. General CARVAJAL is the Military Governor of the States of Tamaulipas and San Luis Potosi, and commander of the military forces within the limits of those States. It is gratifying to know that his efforts in behalf of his people are meeting with great success, and that a lively interest is being taken by the American people in behalf of his oppressed and struggling countrymen.

ALABAMA.

ALABAMA lies between latitude 31° 15' and 33° north, and 84° 33' and 88° 33' west longitude from Greenwich. Mean annual temperature ranges from 60° to 70° Fahr. Area 50,722 square miles, of which, in 1860, 6,385,724 acres were in improved farms, and 12,718,831 acres unimproved farms, together valued at $175,821,822; value of farming implements, machinery, &c., $7,433,178.

The population in 1860 amounted to 264,201, of which 121,431 were white, 2,200 free colored, and 140,570 slaves. The following table shows the white, free colored, slave (black and mulatto), and aggregate population of each county, and also the number of bales of cotton produced:

Soil.—Bordering the Gulf shore, and for some distance in the interior, is a low sandy region, covered ordinarily with pines. The central portion has an undulating surface, with a deep fertile soil, especially the lands bordering the rivers and streams. The north-east portion of the State is traversed by the Alleghany range, which, in crossing the State, merges into a series of low hills, forming the watershed between the Tennessee River on the north and the Alabama and Tombigbee rivers on the south.

About two-thirds of the surface is drained by the Mobile River, which is formed by the junction of the Alabama and Tombigbee rivers. Both of these streams are navigable for steamboats far inland. The Chattahoochee flows along its eastern head for a distance of 130 miles, and is navigable from the Gulf of Mexico to Columbus, Georgia. The Chotawatchee, Escambia, and Perdido rivers are the only other streams of note flowing south. Tennessee River enters the State at its northeast corner, passes across the State, and returns into Tennessee at the northwest corner. This river is navigable (except a small portion at the Muscle Shoals) far to the northwest in Tennessee. Mobile Bay, 50 miles in extent, is one of the largest of the inlets of the Gulf of Mexico. This State has a coast line of about 60 miles along the Gulf of Mexico.

Alabama is eminently an agricultural State, and produces largely cotton, Indian corn, wheat, &c. The grain crop, according to the census of 1860, was, wheat, 1,218,444 bushels produced; rye, 72,637; Indian corn, 35,226,292; barley, 13,133; buckwheat, 1817; oats, 682,179; rice, 409,465 pounds. Other productions are: peas and beans, 1,482,086 bushels; Irish potatoes, 491,503; sweet potatoes, 5,439,917; tobacco, 232,514 pounds; wool, 770,117; cotton, 889,935 bales of 400 pounds each; and there were made, 18,267 gallons of wine; butter, 6,028,478 pounds; cheese, 15,923; sugar, 173 hogsheads of 1600 pounds each; molasses, 80,113 gallons; sorghum molasses, 55,633; honey, 1,180,073 pounds; hay, 62,211 tons. Value of home-made manufactures, $3,817,623. The live-stock at the same period consisted of: horses, 127,623; asses and mules, 111,087; milch cows, 230,537; working oxen, 68,220; other cat. le. 434,545; sheep, 370,170; swine, 1,749,321. Value of live-stock, $43,411,711. Value of animals slaughtered, $19,237,131.

Manufactures, &c.—There were, in 1860 1430 establishments of industry, with a cap. of $9,908,181 invested in real and personal estate in the business. Value of raw material used, $6,480,933; 6792 males and 1007 females employed, and the value of annual product was $10,668,595. The assessed value of real estate in 1860 was $155,034,683, and of personal property $277,164,678. The total length of railroads in operation in 1860 was 743 miles, the cost of construction of which amounted to $17,591,188.

Common Schools.—A system of public instruction was established in 1834. The number of children, in 1858, between six and twenty-one years of age, was 178,665. The returns show in the summer of 1858 the existence of 2307 schools. This does not include Mobile County, which has a separate and independent school system. The amount paid for free public schools in 1859-'60 was $271,583.

PRESIDENT JUAREZ.

BENITO JUAREZ, the President of Mexico, was born in the year 1809, in Ixtan, an Indian village in the State of Oaxaca. He received his education in the city of Oaxaca, studied law and began his practice with great success. He was a professor in the college of the State, and soon became the President of the Literary Institute, improving the instruction of the students, and establishing new classes of natural sciences.

He began his political career in the Legislature of his native State, and afterward was sent to the House of Representatives and to the Senate of the Republic of Mexico, where he always voted with the parry, or progressive party, being among the antagonists of the privileged classes and religious intolerance.

He was elected Governor of Oaxaca in 1845 and instituted great improvements, establishing schools in every village, opening new roads, and acquiring a great reputation for his administrative capacity. He was among the last who sustained the liberal institutions and who resisted the dictatorship of SANTA ANNA. When this man established his tyrannical government Juarez was exiled and resided in New Orleans and Brownsville with OLMEDA, MATA, ARRAGA, and other Mexican refugees. He returned to Mexico and vigorously aided Generals

COMONFORT and ALVAREZ in the revolution against SANTA ANNA.

When the Liberals vanquished SANTA ANNA, and ALVAREZ was elected President, JUAREZ was appointed Secretary of State for the Department of Justice, Ecclesiastic Affairs, and Public Instruction. He then issued the famous law called the Law of Secularization, which abolished the military and ecclesiastic privileges, and established for the first time in Mexico the perfect equality of citizens before the law. He was afterward elected Governor of the State of Oaxaca, and was the candidate of the progressive party in the Presidential election. COMONFORT was elected, and Juarez was appointed President of the Supreme Court of Justice, an

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP,
COMPOSED OF
IODIDE POTASSIUM,
WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID
EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL
ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY
WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,
Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant
Physician in the Blackwell's Island
Hospital, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D.
Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup
HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that every disease hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigation of the liberal-minded and scientific to carry with them to parallel as the present day.

During the past five years we have contended with obstacles and overcome opposition, as heretofore as were ever encountered by any reformer.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.
Some say, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their permanency, and think that diseases can only be cured by the "slow, retrospective process of Nature."
This is our reply: In health the body, like a well-balanced scale, is in a state of equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effects of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (secondary) DISEASES TRANSMITTED FROM PARENT TO CHILD.

PARALYSIS.
It is so universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the various forms of Paralysis, that we need not reiterate that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.
INDIGESTION, WEIGHT AT STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, MILDEWORMS.

SCROFULA.
SYPHILIS, KING'S EVIL, GONORRHOEA, GONORRHOEA, GONORRHOEA, LEUCORRHOEA, EARLY DEATH.

This taint (hereditary and acquired), filling life with useful misery, is, by all usual medical remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.
(ARTHRITIS), LUMBAGO, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, GOUT, THE RHEUMATISM.

"There is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a sovereign, it is in Rheumatism and its kindred affections. The most intense pains are almost instantly alleviated—morning stiffness is reduced. Cases, chronic or vicarious, of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by us.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of Mercury, removing the lead from the Weak Joints and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce. It hardens Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
Restores, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin, like

ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,
And all other diseases of this kind, which so much disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,
Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Scalp, no remedy has ever proved so equal.

Both Father upon the female face, depending upon a diseased action of the Liver, are very unpleasant in the young wife and mother. A few bottles of CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP will correct the secretion, and remove the deposit, which is directly under the skin.

Diseases of the Liver, giving rise to Langor, Dizziness, Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an ulcerated or cancerous condition of that organ, accompanied with burning or other unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of

Constitution Life Syrup.
As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP
stands unrivalled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR
Are liable to the same diseases. Nature and Science have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD
Produces healthy men and women; and if the constitution is neglected in youth, disease and early death is the result.
Do not delay when the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured.

COSTIVENESS, DIARRHOEA.

They are taken up by the absorbents and carried into the circulation, through which means they are conveyed to every part of the body.

If the pain affects the joints, a single dose produces remarkable benefit. And the same rule applies to constipation, diarrhoea, and dysentery; though with the latter named they may be required night and morning for some days before decided relief is obtained. In affections of the lungs, throat, head, and in Pleurisy, the relief is certain; the excretory organs throw off with ease the phlogis, and the breathing becomes freer. Spasmodic actions is often cured by a single dose.

DR. WM. HALL'S

FOR THE CURE OF Consumption, Decline, Asthma, Bronchitis, Wasting of Flesh, Night Sweats, Spitting of Blood, Whooping Cough, Difficulty of Breathing, Cough, Croup, Indisposition, Phthisis, Pain in the Side, and all Diseases of the Lungs.

$20,000 DOLLAR REWARD is offered for a better recipe.
It contains no opium, calomel, or mineral poisons, and can be safely taken by the most delicate child.

DR. W. HALL'S BALSAM FOR THE LUNGS strikes at the root of the disease at once. The most distressing cough is frequently relieved by a single dose, and broken up in a few hours' time. The afflicted do not have to take bottles after bottles before they find whether this remedy will attend relief or not.

This is NO FANCIFUL PREPARATION, but one which, if used in season, will save the lives of thousands. It has effected cures in numerous cases where the most skilled physicians in this country and in Europe have been employed, and have exercised their skill in vain. Cases which they have pronounced incurable, and where others as well as beyond a doubt, leaving the patients without a single ray to envision their future gloom, have been cured by DR. HALL'S BALSAM FOR THE LUNGS, and the "victims of consumption" are now as vigorous and strong as the most robust among us. And those cases are not isolated ones; they are numerous, and can be pointed out in every country by those who are familiar with its progress and result. Full directions will be found in pamphlet around each bottle.

GENERALS BURGEMINE AND WARD.

Our latest advices from China mention the capture of the Chief of the Tarjans, whose name has been given. BURGEMINE was a New Yorker and went to China several years since. It will be remembered that in 1861 a Bostonian named Ward, whose portrait we also give, organized a force of American and Chinese soldiers, under European and Chinese officers, to repel the invasion of the island of Formosa known as the Yunglo. The force was for the defense of Shanghai, and was commanded by WARD. BURGEMINE was WARD's second in command, and succeeded the latter when WARD was killed in October, 1862.

It was not long before the Chinese Governor of the province, by desiring to pay BURGEMINE's soldiers, excited a revolt among them, the General taking sides with his men. BURGEMINE took various measures to obtain the money to pay his men, and was ordered to resign his command, which he refused to do. The revolt of the soldiers was then directed with a view to his capture and death on the side of the Tarjans. He managed to escape, but quite a number of his men were killed. He found it difficult to get along with the Chinese, the Tarjans being as with the Governor of Shanghai, and he means to spend his increased fortune. One by one he will surrender to each and so many Europeans will be left to follow him, if it is not to be given of security to his life. He is now in the pocket. Accordingly BURGEMINE surrendered the pocket at first to the Chinese, but could not be taken, and BURGEMINE was captured and taken to the Chinese, and he thought no more of them until five $3 50; iron which cost $15 a ton now costs $7 50; wood which cost $2 75 per cord now costs $1 50, etc., etc. It is no wonder that, notwithstanding a steady development of gross traffic, net receipts should fall off; and should the December decline in gross receipts continue in succeeding months, it will not be surprising if some of our railway companies become once more bankrupt.

This condition of affairs is the more interesting as Wall Street for a month or more has been engaged in speculating for the rise in the leading railway securities. Thus Erie and Pittsburg, which sold in April and May last @ 45 per cent., sold within a week at 97 per cent.; Fort Wayne, which sold at 87, touched 107 last week; Rock Island, which was down to 85, is up to 108; Michigan Southern, which was 46, is 74; New York Central, which was 81, is 97; Reading, which was 92, is 107; North Western preferred, which was 45, is 61, etc., etc. A notion prevailed some time ago that the first months of 1868 were destined to witness an active speculation in stocks, based on the ease of money; and the remarkable defeat of the Bears in Prairie du Chien encouraged other combinations to undertake similar "cornering" schemes in other stocks. Thus the veteran director of the Erie is understood to be the leading spirit in a combination which has accumulated all, or nearly all the floating Erie in the street, while other leading operators have bought all, or nearly all the Cleveland and Pittsburg, the Rock Island, the New York Central, etc.

Should the expected speculative fever break out, should the public, notwithstanding the decline in net, and, in some instances, in gross receipts, and in the face of the imminent prospect of currency contraction, undertake to buy stocks for the rise, these various combinations stand ready to supply the demand at a not exorbitant advance upon current prices. On the other hand, should the public continue, as heretofore, for at least sixty days, to stand aloof from stock speculations, and should real holders of railway stocks, alarmed by the increase of expenses and the reduction of dividends, determine to convert them into money, the various cliques which have secured such large quantities of floating stock would be placed in an embarrassing position. Forced realizations would probably involve a decline of 15 or 20 per cent.

There is one chance for the Bulls of Wall Street which is more promising than it may at first appear to outsiders. Such publicity has been given to the unpromising condition of the railway interests that a large number of professional speculators have already begun to sell stocks for the fall. In the event of a decline of 5 @ 10 per cent. this Bear party would receive large accessions of strength. On the scale on which speculation is now conducted in Wall Street, it is not unreasonable to suppose that the sales of the Bears would soon far exceed the capacity of the market, and they would, by the necessities of the case, corner themselves. In two days, on 5th and 6th inst., the whole capital stock of the Cleveland and Pittsburg changed hands in Wall Street. It is clear that when speculators operate on this scale, a shrewd manager only needs to buy a few thousand shares of an active stock, to borrow money on it, and lock it up, and a corner results inevitably. It stands to reason that this will occur in one stock after another, and that, in spite of declining traffic, tight money, and other adverse circumstances, stocks will be seen to advance from time to time, at a rate and in a way that will puzzle those who try to account for current quotations on theories of intrinsic values, and punish, if not ruin, the judicious operators who have sold short that which they have not got and may not be able to get.

In a word, there are times when the public will do well to let Wall Street bury its dead. The leading stocks of the day are selling for more than they are worth, and are more likely to fall than to rise. But speculators who sell them short are more likely to be cornered and to be ruined than to make money. Those who buy and those who sell, on speculation, have the chances equally against them. Bona fide holders will not risk much by selling their property and trusting to the events of the current year for an opportunity of replacing it at lower figures. But if Harlem could be put up to 280, and Prairie du Chien to 250, there will be no difficulty in putting Pittsburg to 500, or Rock Island to 1000, if the silly Bears of Wall Street undertake to sell it short.

GOVERNOR ANDREW'S VALEDICTORY.

GOVERNOR ANDREW, of Massachusetts, upon retiring from five years' service, which will be always memorable in the history of his State and of the country, has expressed his views upon the national situation in a valedictory message to the Legislature. It is a most admirable and sagacious paper. Moderate in tone and temperate in style, it discusses the question of reorganization with remarkable clearness, catholicity, and sagacity; and is plainly the work of a sound political thinker and wise statesman.

The Governor's view of the actual condition of the unorganized States is that of the great intelligent body of American citizens. They are not Territories, in the technical sense, nor have they committed suicide. Their attempt to destroy their relations with the Union has been unsuccessful, and they are now without government other than the military rule of the United States. It is the duty of the United States to supply that government. In the preliminary steps to that end the organic law of the State before rebellion may be wisely observed. The reorganization may be entrusted to the same body that disorganized, but requirements may be rightfully imposed upon it.

What these requirements should be is a consideration of statesmanship, of expediency. In the opinion of Governor ANDREW Congress should offer an amendment to the Constitution granting the right to vote for President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress to colored men in all the States, being citizens and able to read, who would by the laws of the State be competent to vote if they were white, and, without disfranchising existing voters, it should apply the qualification to white men also. The amendment should also leave the election of President and Vice-President directly in the hands of the people. Thus, with the Emancipation Amendment, would discharge the whole duty of the nation to its dependent wards.

The Governor opposes the proposed amendment apportioning representation to voters upon two grounds. First, it is repugnant to the true republican principle to base representation upon any class and not upon the whole body of the people; and, second, it would leave the freedmen entirely in the hands of their late masters, which can not be safely or honorably done.

There is a flaw in this last objection which can not be overlooked. The intention of the amendment is to do by an appeal to the love of political power what could not otherwise, it was thought, be effected except by a direct act of Congress, which it was supposed could not carry the country, and in which the unorganized States would not acquiesce. The assumption of the amendment is, that to retain or increase their political power the whites of the South would enfranchise the blacks. The question is, would they do so? In South Carolina, for instance, as Governor ANDREW asks, would the whites, for the sake of doubling the representation to six members, be willing to concede three to the blacks with the chance of their obtaining the whole six? Would they not rather have the three which they now elect than offset them by another three? This is a fair question. But we are inclined to believe it to be only a temporary question. With the lapse of time and the necessary political development of society in a free government the spirit of caste is weakened, and gradually disappears, while with the unusual basis of political power at hand in half the population, parties would inevitably arise, and the party of equal enfranchisement would finally prevail.

In this country the political disability which springs from the spirit of caste merely, is sure to be sooner or later removed, now that caste has no further legal recognition. But the industrial will precede the political surrender of caste, which is the final triumph of equal rights; and it is a question of paramount importance whether, while we defend every personal and industrial right of the freedmen, we ought not to make it appear to be the interest of the white class to grant them an equality of political rights? If the mere passage of the amendment were to be considered a sufficient security of the just treatment of the freedmen by the whites, and upon their enforced assent to it the keys of the unorganized States were to be delivered into the hands of the whites with the privilege of treating the freedmen as they chose, we should oppose it as warmly as any of its opponents. But our purpose is to avoid all unnecessary friction. As a matter of expediency it is desirable that the whites should assent to just political equality, and we would take every fair and honorable step that would promote that result.

THE LIMITS OF PUBLICITY.

WHAT are the proper limits of publicity in cases of infamous crime, is a question which has been lately discussed with some acerbity. Yet the answer does not seem to be very difficult. Starting from the axiom that every thing which happens is not in all its details a proper subject of public report as news, it is easy to see that all publication should be governed by moral common-sense.

To say, as has been lately gravely asserted, that, because a revolting crime has been committed in a city, all the citizens are therefore "compelled" to listen to the loathsome details, is as ridiculous as to assert that, because the police may have descended upon a nest of ill-houses in Mercer Street, the public are "compelled" to listen to a minute account of all that was discovered in those houses. The public will eagerly read such descriptions, and the more greedily in the degree of their prurient detail, is very possible. But it is not so much the reader as the purveyor of such details who is truly guilty.

Nor is the assertion that crime perishes more surely in the twilight than in the dark a sufficient excuse for publishing all the exciting incidents of crime. Is it necessary for the warning of you that, even if you faithfully show that MacLeish by his lawless courses came to the scaffold, you should describe with the most flagrant particularity every step in those lawless courses? Why is it that the newspapers which defend their recent detailed publication of a lamentable trial do not open their columns to an equal publicity of the details of other trials which they report? The answer to this question is the refutation of their own plea. It is simply that there is no exciting and prurient detail which promises a larger sale of the paper. It is as necessary to purge society of forgery, of larceny, of arson, as it is of adultery. Why do the papers not pour a full stream of withering daylight upon their accounts of those offenses?

This case, we will suppose a paper to say, has attracted great professional and social attention, and the press has been compelled to give it publicity. In other words, the notorious indecency of the circumstances has excited morbid curiosity, and the press has chosen to turn a penny by gratifying it. The duty of the press was to censure and withstand this kind of attention, not to foster it. It was not necessary to omit all mention of the case. But every thing necessary to the public moral improvement of the trial could have been mentioned without the circumstantial reports which were presented.

The immoral influence of the story of great scandals, we will suppose another paper to say, is in the fact that only the pleasant episodes and not the dreary and dreadful end are related. But is, then, an obscene book, the history of an outbreak, told with unshrinking detail, the full daylight turned on in faithful illustrations, if only the shameful and destitute death be likewise portrayed, a high moral influence upon young minds? It is not the thing done, only, it is the way in which the thing is done which determines the moral influence.

NO MORE AMERICAN BOOKS.

UNLESS the Commission which has the revision of the Revenue Law in charge should recommend a modification of the tax on printed books, and Congress should act upon the recommendation, we shall soon cease to print any books at all. A more careful study of the facts leads us to the conclusion that our recent estimate of the relative cost of books printed here and the same books printed in England was too liberal to the foreign printer; we now judge that a book can be printed and published in England for one-third the cost of the same book here. Of course, under such circumstances, the tariff proves no obstacle whatever to imports, and should the present state of things continue, it is clear that, in the course of a few months, the publication of American books will be reduced to those works which can not be produced abroad.

It is understood that the Revenue Commission is favorable to a reduction of the internal duties on books—fifteen in number, as they have been calculated. It should be hoped that they will lose no time in laying their views before Congress. In order to aid them in their deliberations, we present a single item, which is a fair sample of scores:

The Sunday Magazine is a periodical published in London, the price being sixpence a copy, exclusive of postage. Of this Magazine 10,000 copies are imported for sale in this country, the importers affirming that the market value in England is three farthings a copy. Upon this, by the present law, they pay a duty of 25 per cent.—that is, three-fourths of a farthing, making the whole cost here to them, duty included, just 31 farthings, a little less than two cents a copy, or $200 for the whole 10,000. The importers, moreover, demand here twenty-five cents for this Magazine, the market value of which in England, and upon which only they pay duty, they declare to be only three farthings. We shall follow up this case by other instances, of which we have at hand more than a score.

Now let us see what the cost of the bare manufacture of these 10,000 copies would be in this country at present prices. After a careful calculation we find that the paper, composition, stereotyping, press-work, and folding of the Magazine would cost here, for 10,000 copies, 14 cents a copy, instead of three farthings, its alleged market value in England. This includes only the bare cost of manufacture, making no allowance for literary and artistic labor and the cost of the engravings.

Upon these 10,000 copies the importers pay a duty of only three-fourths of a farthing, while the 15 separate taxes imposed by law upon the American manufacturer amount to at least four cents. In other words, we "protect" the British manufacturer of books by imposing upon him by way of duty only one-fifth as much as is paid by the American manufacturer in direct taxes upon raw material and labor.

If this continues, one of two things is inevitable: The manufacture of books here will cease, and the great amount of labor involved in it, directly and indirectly, must find other channels; or the labor must be paid for at English "starvation rates." Practically, both results will ensue. Three-fourths of our printers will be out of employment, and the others will receive pay at British rates; and all for the benefit of our British friends.

THE HEALTH OF THE CITY.

THREE facts compel the attention of every citizen of the city of New York, and interest the whole country. The cholera is at hand, the city is in the condition most favorable to its ravages; and there is no hope of relief from the city itself. These three facts very impressively suggest a fourth—that if the State does not save us the city will not escape the worst form of the pestilence.

Governor FAYSON, in his admirable Message to the Legislature, reminds us that the sanitary care of the city is now confided to two separate Boards, one of which is composed of the Mayor and Common Council; the other of the Mayor and the Commissioners of Health. The powers of the former are almost unlimited; and, when convened, its duration is limited only by the official term of its members. Mayor HOFFMAN, in his Message, says that it has not met for a long time, and he sees no reason why it should be convened. The Board of Commissioners of Health is composed of the Mayor, the City Inspector, the President of each Board of the Common Council, Health Officer of the Port, Resident Physician, and Health Commissioner, and this Board, the Mayor thinks, will be able to accomplish all that may be required of it. His Honor is also of opinion that the sanitary care of the city should not be intrusted to a State Commission.

Governor FAYSON, on the contrary, thinks that the success of the Metropolitan Police Law and of the paid Fire Department "furnish a strong argument in favor of some similar provision for protecting the public health of the same populous territory." In conformity with this suggestion, Senator ANDREWS has introduced a Metropolitan Health Bill. It has been prepared with the utmost care, and includes the methods which the experience of the largest cities in the world has proved to be most effective and advantageous. It is the work of no party of politicians or speculators, but of the best citizens and of men of the highest practical science. Its aim is the security of the health of the city without intrigue or delay.

The circumstances require instant and radical action. There is really no hope whatever from purely municipal agencies, and without denying the abstract truth of Mayor HOFFMAN'S remark, that the city should take care of its own health, it is enough to say that no well-informed man believes that at this juncture it either can or will take the necessary care.

The bill was defeated last year; but the immensity of the cholera will, we believe, secure its present passage without serious delay. Should it fall again, the city of New York will be literally left to its own destruction.

SYCOPHANCY.

THERE are certain papers which have the very bad habit of assuming that those who do not altogether approve their projects of reorganization are ill-conditional malcontents and visionaries who are hostile to a speedy and secure reunion. If a citizen of the United States, who is quite as much interested in the just and permanent settlement of the question as any of the papers to which we refer can be, is persuaded, upon a thoughtful review of all the evidence, that still further consideration and delay are essential before the Government relinquishes its hold upon the lately insurgent States, he is denounced as an enemy of the President's policy, and as insisting upon foolish crochets, theories, and "isms."

Now, it is a very pertinent inquiry why the purely speculative views which the President or any other eminent citizen takes of the situation may not equally be derided as crochets, theories, and "isms." Upon a purely speculative point—such, for instance, as the precise status in the Union of the unorganized States—it is, we presume, permitted to the human mind to speculate. It may also be permitted the same mind to doubt whether the speculations of the President, or of any paper which echoes him upon this point as it would upon every other, are, for that reason, binding upon the American people. There is no folly more absurd than this kind of effort to "whip in" the intelligent mind of the country.

For ourselves, we have full faith in the purposes of the President, whose election we warmly supported. With some of his theories we have differed. His action, upon the whole, has seemed to the whole country sensible and sagacious. In common with the country we sincerely approve the spirit and intention of the conditions of reorganization which he has imposed upon the lately rebel States. But we know of no greater mischief which could be done to American institutions, and of no greater insult to himself, than the obsequious adulation of the President which is lavished upon him by certain papers. It is the duty of the press to reveal to him the tendency and state of public opinion, not to attempt to bully opinion into more acquiescence with his supposed views, and we are very sure that no man can have a profunder contempt for the latter effort than ANDREW JOHNSON.

MEDICAL HISTORY OF THE WAR.

THE skill and diligence of the Surgeon and Medical Department of the army during the war are illustrated in the circulars lately issued by the Surgeon-General. The amount and value of statistics carefully collected are very great, and the mass of facts is reported as much exceeding the results of all previous similar observation.

The medical staff of the war was composed of a surgeon-general, an assistant surgeon-general, and medical inspector-general; 16 medical inspectors; 170 surgeons and assistant-surgeons of the regular army; 362 volunteer staff surgeons and assistant-surgeons; 3000 regimental surgeons and assistant-surgeons of volunteers; 2500 acting assistant-surgeons and physicians under contract, and 6 medical storekeepers. There were 202 general hospitals, with 130,894 beds for patients. More than a million of patients were treated in these hospitals, of whom but one in twelve died; and the general sanitary condition of such hospitals was never so high as in these.

The most fatal disease was camp fever; the most common was diarrhea or dysentery; and after these, inflammation of the respiratory organs. The number constantly sick was about ten per cent. of the strength of the army. The mortality from disease alone was forty-eight and seven-tenths per one thousand of mean strength in the first year of the war, and sixty-five and two-tenths in the second. The registries of the wounded are not completed.

Meanwhile the accumulation of information in regard to the extent and nature of the army sickness is enormous, and the collection of the results of microscopic observation is of the utmost interest and importance. The peculiar enthusiasm of the profession has amassed the most ample material for a medical history of the war; and it is not possible to contemplate without pride and gratitude the conduct of this indefatigable and accomplished branch of the service.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE following hand-fought game was contested between Captain McKENZIE and Mr. C. H. BRANTON, on Monday afternoon, the 18th instant—starting one in a series of matches now in progress at the New York Chess Club. In this case the first winner of three games will be declared the conqueror.

Table with columns: BLACK (Capt. McK.), WHITE (Mr. B.), and a list of moves numbered 1 through 22.

This move is pretty generally condemned by the authorities, "K. K1 to B2" being generally recommended.

This check, we are inclined to think, must have engaged the attention of Captain McKENZIE, as it enables his opponent to sacrifice at once the bishop.

"K1 to Q4" would certainly have enabled him to win the exchange of Rook for Bishop—but Black's counter moves would have become very dangerous.

White's aim here is to compel a drawn game by perpetual check with Queen.

It is obvious that White has now the option of enforcing a drawn game, and we think he would have shown good judgment had he done so.

THE NEW YORK STATE LEGISLATURE.

The eighty-ninth session of the New York Legislature began January 2. In the evening, Mr. Tilden gave an appointed Clerk, and the Governor's Message was read. In the Assembly, Hon. Lyman Thompson was elected speaker. Among the first bills proposed by the Senate was the Metropolitan Health Bill. This bill was introduced by a Metropolitan Board of Health. The board is to have authority to enforce cleanliness and to have the right of appointment of the Police Department. The board is to have a salary of $1000 each, and a secretary with a salary of $1000, and the members of an executive may be employed at an annual cost of not more than $5000.

GOVERNOR ANDREWS ON RECONSTRUCTION.

Governor Andrews, of Massachusetts, is retiring from the gubernatorial chair, gave his views on the subject of reconstruction in an address to the State Legislature. He thinks the admission of the States lately in rebellion should depend upon the following five conditions: Their guaranteeing equal civil rights to the negroes and to the whites; making the elective franchise open to distinctions of race or color; annulling the secession ordinance; repudiating the rebel debt, and restoring the anti-slavery amendment to the Constitution.

Governor Fairchild, of Wisconsin, would probably go further than this. In his late Message he advocates negro suffrage and the hanging of Jeff Davis.

CONGRESS.

In the Senate, Mr. Sumner presented petitions of colored people in Mississippi, Alabama, and Louisiana, asking Congress to secure their liberties, paying for education, etc. A memorial of the Union League of New York was also presented by Mr. Morgan, praying that Mrs. Lincoln may receive her late husband's salary for the full term. A resolution was adopted calling for information respecting the condition of Governors, their pay, appointments, &c.

In the House, a resolution was adopted, that the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the Statute of 1824, providing for registering foreign vessels, and also to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that no American vessel that carried her register and took foreign ports during the late war, shall, under any circumstances, again receive an American register.

In the Senate, a resolution from the House of Washington, transmitted the result of the recent election there, adverse to negro suffrage, was received and laid on the table, as were also the resolutions of Randall Hunt, Senator elect from Louisiana.—The memorial of the New York Chamber of Commerce, asking protection to Northern creditors against the operations of State statutes of limitation in the South, and several others' petitions, requesting equalization of pay and bounty, were presented and referred.—Resolutions were adopted calling on the President for information regarding the order issued by our military authorities in California forbidding the transportation of arms to Mexico, and for the reasons why they have not been so appointed, and authorities of a committee to investigate the claims of legal abolitionists for compensation for colored men giving their services who were enlisted in the military service.

In the House, a bill was introduced granting bounty and additional pay to soldiers and seamen who enlisted in 1864.—A bill was reported from the Ways and Means Committee, and ordered to be printed, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue six per cent. gold certificates to fund all the floating debt of the Government.—A resolution was adopted striking the whole amount of the Government against impost.—A resolution was adopted striking upon the 27th instant for the reason therein stated the alleged kidnapping by William F. Johnson of one of our British consuls.—A bill was introduced, and ordered to be printed, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue six per cent. gold certificates to fund all the floating debt of the Government.—A resolution was adopted striking the whole amount of the Government against impost.—A resolution was adopted striking upon the 27th instant for the reason therein stated the alleged kidnapping by William F. Johnson of one of our British consuls.

NEWS ITEMS.

Governor D. R. Walker, the outgoing chief of Florida, was inaugurated on Tuesday.

On the evening of Saturday, the 18th instant, a most exciting and successful robbery was committed on the express train from New York to Boston. An iron safe of the Adams Express Company was opened by force, probably before the train left New York, and a large amount of money, estimated at half a million of dollars, was stolen from the Company's vault.

Mr. Elijah P. Furdy, for nearly years identified with the political affairs of the metropolis, died in this city at 12 o'clock on the night of January 8.

On Monday, December 11, while a party of numerous boys were skating on the St. Lawrence river, near Ogdensburg, the whole field of ice separated from the shore and began to float down the river. A gentleman in attendance by the side of the boys procured a boat, and by making two or three trips succeeded in rescuing the whole party.

The negroes in the South never had a more successful New Year's festival than that which they have just been enjoying. At Trenton, 30,000 the negroes of Hampton celebrated their anniversary with great enthusiasm.

A St. Louis Dispatch brings bad news from the Plains. The gold is almost as scarce as the Indians. In one locality a hundred soldiers had to be killed to make it necessary to leave them in the hospital. The road below Fort Kearney was blocked with snow.

Major-General Wilson, the master of Jeff Davis, was married at Wilmington, Delaware, January 2.

General William Hickey, Chief Clerk of the Senate, died at his residence, near Washington, January 6, aged sixty-five years. He was one of the oldest and best men of the most distinguished of political affairs, and he has been forty-two years in the service of the Senate.

There have been received by the Adjutant-General, at Washington, about 800 applications for a share in the rewards offered for the capture of the now-fugitive cowboys. The rewards now ready for distribution amount to about $300,000. Arrangements are being made by the Adjutant-General to get possession of the rewards offered in the several States, amounting to over a million of dollars, as soon as it is announced by the Government who are entitled to a share of the money.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The President's Message met in France with the same respect it received in England. Its moderation was estimated, and many journals endeavored to explain away the "New Year's message" as being only temporary, and not intended to help the cause of the American people.

The trial of Evenden in New York was still pending. At Cork, on the 29th of December, James J. O'Connell and Thomas Dunne were found guilty of treason. O'Connell was sentenced to five years' and the latter a ten years' penal servitude.

The cattle disease in England was declining. Returns for the week ending December 16 show more than 14,000 head of cattle in the market of one day, the number of sales being 685, against 200,000 of 1875 in the week ending December 9. There is a decrease of 150 for the week, while in the week previous there was an increase of 600.

Ever mindful of the various poisons in his saddle-bags, Dr. Warner placed them on a small shelf made for the express purpose, in the hall beside the hat-stand, high out of reach of the children. Next he proceeded, with what might be styled a cautious step for a man in his own house, to the door leading into the breakfast-room.

"Ah, Sarah, breakfast over, I see," he said, first glancing in through the partly-opened door, and then venturing more boldly in, when he sees that no one is therein except the negro woman standing over the wrecks of the meal, waiting up the cups and saucers.

"Proy fairly in the trap, the trigger springs: "Over, Dr. Warner? Of course it was, one good hour ago, and you know it when you asked."

It was his wife who said it, following her voice into the breakfast-room as she spoke. She had been saying it over to herself ever since she heard the front gate click, and short and sharp enough were the tones in which she spoke.

"Gracious goodness! can't your patients fix it so we can have some little order about our meals? But it is all your fault, Dr. Warner. Why can't you just give them their physic, whatever it is, be done with it, and come home? Here's Sarah—why can't you get that coffee-pot, Sarah?—here's Sarah—and you haven't washed them plates up yet?—here's Sarah kept from her morning's work, and kept from and kept from it, and she a good six dozen washing to have done and hung out before the cock—come up to-night. If I was you, Dr. Warner, I'd give up my practice; go—dress knows you make be- lie enough at it; you would make plenty if you would only collect. Hat precious little you'd make at any thing else?"

"It doesn't matter, Helen," ventured her spouse, whose somewhat bald head had fallen into an indescribable droop, as of one under a shower-bath, the instant his wife began. So saying, he drew his chair to the table while the servant was placing his breakfast thereon. "I have been up near all night," he continued, as he stirred his coffee; "haven't any warm hominy? Never mind, I have no appetite, any thing will do."

"That Mrs. Bowles, I suppose. Bring me my work here off the sewing-machine, and mind you wipe your wet hands clean before you do it, you Sarah;" and Mrs. Warner takes a seat at the other end of the table. "I would like to know when she settled last—such a lady as you always call her. And why haven't you told me what is the matter with the woman? They might have given you at least a cup of coffee."

"And so they did, Alice saw to that," says Dr. Warner, who never fails to speak the best he can of any and every one.

"Coffee! Yes, Confederate coffee, I'll bet," interposes his wife, threading her needle.

"Yes, but you couldn't have told the difference—at least, hardly;" for the Doctor is very truthful too.

"Stuff! Never tell me," breaks in his wife. "There's old Mrs. Juggins, she uses barley. You know you couldn't stand that, even the smell. Came to find out we had gone and ground it, while she used it so—only toasted. Tried not grinding, but it wouldn't do. There's sweet-potatoes, too, cut thin and browned. Mrs. Bowles's notion; you know what a sickly sort of sweet it was. Coffee! Rye, too, that is Mr. Neeb's plan. Like a Yankee! Then there's Mr. Ferguson, okra seed's his Scotch scheme, as if one could get okra seed enough to last a week. Never tell me! A thing is either coffee or it ain't coffee. You are so polite you pretend you can't tell the difference—don't catch me."

"What, gone up to a dollar? Oh, if I only was a man! If I didn't hang them. First thing you know it was fifty cents. Next time I went in to the stores it was: 'Not one pound on hand, ma'am, sorry to say; hope to get some soon.' Yes, and when they did have some next time it was eighty cents. And all the time they were pretending to be out they had sacks and sacks of it piled away down in the cellar, or hidden under carpets and things wex up in the loft. Oh, if I was only a man! Calicoes up to fifty cents; domestics, six bits; fifty cents for a tin cup; five pounds of sugar for a dollar; molasses, dollar and a quarter; shoes, eight dollars; flour, fifty dollars, or soon will be. I'd like to know what we are coming to. Mr. Barker was right—they are worse than Yankees! Our own goods off to fight the battles of their country, bleeding and dying somewhere, and they at home making money out of the poor wives, and widows, and orphans. Barker was right. Their stores ought to be just taken, the goods sold for them at the old prices. Hang them!" ejaculated Mrs. Warner, her wrath rising, as it ever did, at the sound of her own voice. "Yes, as brother Barker says, 'I could string them up with my own hands!'"

"Rather strong language for a preacher," interposed her husband, who was quietly eating his breakfast.

"As much as to say, if Mr. Barker oughtn't to say it because he is a preacher, I oughtn't to say it because I'm a woman."

Dr. Warner continues to breakfast. A little more, perhaps, of the shower-bath droop about the head. There is a pause of surprise in the eyes of his wife. She sits with suspended needle, looking at her husband. And while she is still an instant let us seize that rare instant to catch her photographs—if we can.

When Dr. Warner first settled in Somerville, years ago this 1862, Mrs. Warner was a tall, spare, shrill spinster. Other than being an exceedingly industrious and neat housekeeper Miss Helen Morris had only fourteen recommendations to a marrying man; and those fourteen had legs and could wield hoes, scrubbing-brushes, and washing-boards. Somehow or other the Doctor married her. Was it that the poor and patientless young Doctor wanted a home? Mrs. Warner very often afterward herself suggested that solution of the case. It was a special weapon in her arsenal in the warriment of her husband, which warriment was a large part of her housekeeping. Nor did she conceal her painful impression to that effect from chance company either; for it was a peculiarity of Mrs. Warner to express herself upon matters, pleasant and unpleasant, relating to herself openly, fully, and upon every occasion. Or it may be—most were of that opinion—that it was not the Doctor who married the lady, but the lady who married him. Good, easy, indolent man, he was no match for Miss Helen Morris—as natural a prey to such a woman as a mouse is to a cat.

Not that the Doctor did not have warning fair and sufficient. When he applied that day in the dirty county court office to Bob Withers, county clerk, for the marriage license, that gentleman did his best. Years after Bob prided himself upon that.

"To Miss Helen Morris—not the widow Morris—to Miss Helen Morris, did you say, Doc?" he asked, with an emphasis not complimentary.

Even when Bob Withers brought himself fairly to the task of filling up the blanks of a license he spoiled one form, and then another, with blunders, his mind evidently being on something else. And when he had dipped his pen in the ink to begin at the third it was only to stick it behind his ear, unlock the drawer in the desk at which he wrote, take out a pistol and lay it thereupon, the handle convenient to his friend. A frank and wholesome face, Bob's.

"Doc," he solemnly said, with hand resting upon the weapon, "I like you as much, by George! as any man I know. I haven't forgot that typhoid-fever time. But look here, Doc. I know that Miss Helen Morris—gracious Heavens!" with considerable irritation, "who in Somerville don't know her?—and I just tell you as a friend, you see—no other possible interest in the thing—but before you marry them black eyes and that awful tongue—you see I boarded with her once—you'd better take this Derringer and kill yourself, by George! and be done with it."

But the Doctor married her.

Early in life Miss Helen may have been a brunette and all the rest. But Mrs. Warner was now sallow—only sallow. The lips were still red, but very thin. And then her eyes? Once on a time the Reverend Edward Arthur had made a pretty long trip on a canal boat, and on his introduction to Mrs. Warner, when he first took charge of the Somerville church, he had been struck with a foolish fancy that her blackly-defined eyebrows resembled the lock-gates on the canal when opening to let down the water. The fact is, the lady's eyes and eyebrows did have an oblique direction upward above the nose, giving her the appearance of being wide awake, becoming more and more oblique as she grew excited. Free as the air in the expression of herself; tough and elastic as guita perch; electric from head to foot, the electricity quivering, as its nature is on every projecting point of the body charged, at the tips of her fingers, the corners of her eyes and mouth, in focus on the end of her tongue.

But let us be charitable. Perhaps if you, or even if I myself, had dipped snuff as long and as incessantly as she had, we too would have been as nervous as she was. But very little Bub, 'Ris, Amos, Sarah, and the rest had to endure it in comparison with the Doctor. Sharp and perpetual as were her eyes and tongue in regard to all within and without her household, the Doctor had by far the larger share thereof.

Because for him it was she cared most. Indolent, sensible, getting-to-be-irascible, slovenly Dr. Warner! He has learned only to droop his head and take it. When it becomes too bad, and if Mrs. Warner pours her vial upon him when company—as she often does—is present, the Doctor, at the earliest possible moment, carries his drooped head out of the parlor and off the place. Yet, let us get at the eternal reason and meaning of things; for there is as solid a reason for the growth of a nestle as there is for the existence of a rose—as substantial a meaning in the existence of a mosquito as in the life of John Howard. As a needed spur—we will not call it thorn—in his side, this wife is a blessing to this husband. He married her, perhaps, with blind persistency—who knows?—

from his physiological studies, because she was so unlike to himself. And she married him?—perhaps from some vague intuitions to the same effect.

If the stream of my story did not hurry me on so urgently I would like to turn out of its current for a moment and say just one word about that admirable provision of Nature, by which she preserves, in our species as in the planets, her own sacred balance. When it is not Parent, nor Pique, nor Mammon, nor any thing other than sweet Nature herself who weds you to your wife, you will find that she mates you two on the plan of a perfect compensation; that is, she makes up for the excess of any defect in one of you by an excess of the opposite virtue in the other. It was something other than Nature that made the match if you, a tall man, are wedded to any other than an undersized woman. Woe to you, Madam, if you, a blonde, are united to a fair-haired man! So of that inner nature of which the outer appearance is but the symbol. Alas for you, Sir, if you, a man of desponding temperament, are wedded to a wife of the same dismal hue of feeling! Though I believe, even in that case, Nature strives to make the best of a union in which she had no hand. I will not say how it will be if you are a man; but if you are a woman I am certain of this: however dependent you may yourself be, the instant you detect the slightest gloom in your husband's brow, or the least growl in his voice, you go instinctively to the other side of the tilting bark, and become as cheerful as possible. And the instant you give way to gloom notice how awkwardly, yet well meaningly, he, your fellow! attempts at least to trim the tilting vessel by putting on at least an aspect of cheerfulness. Woe, then, had it been to Mrs. Warner if she had been united to some black-eyed, black-haired, black-bearded husband! Notice the union of two sable clouds in mid-air, if you would understand the result. So that when Mrs. Warner passed from her sewing and said,

"As much as to say, if brother Barker oughtn't to say it because he is a preacher, I oughtn't to say it because I'm a woman." The Doctor only helped himself in a sidelong and deprecatory manner to the butter.

"I do believe," said Mrs. Warner—"Sarah, step out and tell those children to hush that noise—I do believe," she continued in low, sepulchral tones, "that you, Dr. Warner, are a—Union man!"

Language can not set forth the awfulness of epithet implied in the charge, the casual gates opening wider and wider. "Yes, and I know now why the bells didn't ring last night! I was wondering, I know now!" said Mrs. Warner swiftly, and with a new light breaking all over her face. "Yes, and why you couldn't leave Mrs. Bowles. Worse, is she? Ha! Yes, I see it all." Casual gates open their widest.

Dr. Warner glanced up from his plate at his wife with a flash of admiration. "What an amazingly sharp woman!" he said to himself.

"Bells?" he said, however, at last. "Bells? I should think, Helen, you would have had enough of bells night before last. Every bell in town! There was the big Methodist bell; I lay and counted no less than ten fresh hands in turn at that bell-ropes before day. The first hand began as if he would break the bell to pieces, pulled until it was broken down; then you could notice the rope taken by another till he gave up exhausted; then by another, through the whole ten. I am not nervous, but I couldn't get a wink of sleep."

"Dr. Warner!" said Mrs. W. solemnly, needle, eyes, breath suspended.

"And you know I said at the time—or was it you yourself made the remark—"

"Dr. Warner!—Sarah, dr—come here, stay in the kitchen till I call you."

"Well, it was one of us said it," continued the husband, very calmly sipping his coffee, looking over the top of his cup with unusual hardness at his eager wife.

"You know I never said it!" broke in the wife. You know I never could have been such a traitor as to have said it. And if the paper that came last night says our soldiers have been whipped there in Tennessee, it's a lie! Didn't the papers night before last tell how our men had come out of Fort Donelson and driven the Hessians back through their camps, and killed six thousand, and taken all the rest prisoners, and—and—"

"Very well, my dear, you needn't be excited at me. Have it your own way. Suppose we talk of something else."

"What is the matter with Mrs. Bowles, Dr. Warner?" asked his wife, with sudden suspicion.

"Well," replied her helpmate, slowly, "the faculty have different names for it. There are febrile symptoms, too much excitement in the brain. Nervous, hysteria."

"Stuff; but what has made her worse? I know it can not be she has heard any bad news about that everlasting Rutledge Bowles of hers, for you would have told me so when you first came. What has she heard? Something bad, I know."

"Well, yes. But you know, my dear, Mrs. Bowles permits her mind to run too much, really too much, on the events of the day—"

"Dr. Warner," says his wife, in alarming tones though lower than before, "will you tell me the news that came last night?"

"If you wish it. Remember it may be false, you will be sure it is. In any case I didn't do anything to bring it about."

"What is it?"

"Fort Donelson has fallen, my dear. General Johnson has retreated into Alabama. Nashville has capitulated. A good many more items to the same effect. At least so the paper says. I dare say part of the news may be exaggerated, premature at least."

"It's a lie—it's a base, base, base lie! I'll bet a thousand dollars the man that prints that paper is a Yankee. He ought to be hung!"

Perhaps it was owing to her cheeks having become some shades paler than Mrs. Warner's lips seemed so much redder, her eyes and hair so much blacker than before. "Oh, if I was only a man!" she added.

Mean while her husband only arched his brows deprecatingly, and proceeded to eat his breakfast with a coolness, appetite, even cheerfulness, which contrasted greatly with the vehement, almost hysterical, wife at the other end of the table.

Not, oh the exquisite satisfaction of Dr. Warner in imparting the news, unspeakable satisfaction at the very core of his heart, though all the rest of his anatomy might disavow it!

How you up there at the North rang your bells and blazed in all manner of illumination, and invoked the entire hire to help utter your gratification, Heaven and History well know. Your joy? It was as nothing compared with the electric ecstasy thereof which flashed unexpressed through all loyal hearts at the South. Heaven only knew it then; History shall know it forever.

"And if it is true, though I don't believe a word of it, there's some base treachery in it, or the officers were all drunk, or they were all a pack of cowards! To give up to Yankees! I do wish the Yankees had managed to kill them. I hope Davis will have them tried and hung," says Mrs. Warner.

"Why, my dear, it would take a perfect factory to keep you in rope," dares her husband, playfully but injudiciously.

"And you are not weary a single bit!" responds his wife, turning the lightning of her rage zigzag in every direction that offers. "I do believe you are glad. I tell you, Dr. Warner, if I actually thought so, was satisfied of it, I would not care that, if we have been married so long."

"I'd—ha! no wonder you wouldn't get up that night the bells rung so. I had to lurch and lurch you ever so often before you woke even. And when you did wake, you said it must be fire, not even expecting a victory. Ought not to be too certain, you said, at the very time every bell in town was ringing as hard as could be. Dr. Warner, you are the worry of my life! And there you sit this moment just as cool—"

"But you know, Helen, I heard the news several hours ago. Besides, I've just drunk two cups of your excellent coffee. Then, my mind has been taken up with Mrs. Bowles's case. And, really, my dear," said the Doctor, eager to divert the conversation, "I'm getting uneasy about Mrs. Bowles. Such a sensitive, refined little body she is! perfect lady, too, in every respect; but she has given herself up to so much excitement for so long. Rutledge Bowles, too; the news night before last almost deranged her with joy. Then comes that news last night. The reaction was almost too much for her. I tell you what, my dear," continued the Doctor, with indolent hypocrisy, "I'm glad I have a wife who is stronger than her nerves. Glad, my dear, that you have such strong sense of your own to keep you steady these stormy times."

"No, Dr. Warner, you can't blind me. With all her aristocratic airs I know there are some things, at least, in which I can only pity. One can't help liking Alice. You never hear Rutledge Bowles from her lips—never opens her mouth about him, hardly. But, if you mean to say she loves the South more than I do—"

"But what is the use of worrying yourself? The armies are in the field, doing, I dare say, all they can. And you are doing all you can. You are out every day collecting for the soldiers, and you sing for them at all the concerts, net for them in all the tableaux, sew for them, knit, quilt. What more can you do? If one-half of the ladies of Somerville only did one-half of what you do—"

"Ah, Dr. Warner, I see what you are after!" said his wife, somewhat mollified; "but you are only from Tennessee, Eastern Tennessee at that, and you know where I'm from. What I want is for you to be more interested, excited, more like a warm-hearted Southern man. But there you go day after day with your old saddle-bags over your arms, just as you used to do, feeling people's pulses, dosing children, pulling teeth—you don't talk enough. But this news—oh, it can't, can't—"

"In your acquaintance among the ladies those that talk most, fuss most, do most of the work do they, eh? Why you told me yourself, Helen—"

"Pshaw! Dr. Warner, you know perfectly well what I mean. You are not sore enough the South is going to succeed. And you visit among those Union people just as much—more, I believe—than you do among good Secessionists. Nobody can get any thing out of you. Look at Dr. Gimis."

"Which do you think the best doctor of the two? No, my dear, I'm a physician in large practice, I believe; all my time is taken up with my patients. Dr. Gimis is more politician than medical man—talks about the war at the top of his big voice at the bedside of the sick, and, no matter how sick they are, for the hour at a time. If he likes, and they like, let him. I prefer to do my way, physic them, and come home to my family. You know what a quiet sort of man I am. Besides, you have patriotism enough for us both, Helen. Take your way, my dear—let me take mine."

"Yes, Dr. Warner. Oh yes; I dare say. Very fine. But what worries my life out is nobody can tell. When you are with Secessionists you are as mum as a mouse, or open your lips only to dispute something. When you are with those Union people, oh I know you! Why don't you denounce them, tell me that? Every body in Somerville is talking about you. Mr. Neely told me only last Monday, when he was here to see about Bob drawing those pictures on his back-board, as if you can expect a child to respect a Yankee teacher!—told me, hump, much faith I have in him, hush as he talks—told me Lamont told him that Dr. Peel said he really believed you were nothing more'n less than a Abolitionist, if the truth was known!" But to describe Mrs. Warner's emphasis on the word is beyond the power of type.

"And this great Dr. Peel knows, of course, more about me—he has been here less than a year, I believe—than you do, or than any body who has known me here for ten years," says Dr. Warner, pushing away his plate to be free of him.

"I told Mr. Neely to tell Lamont to tell Dr. Peel from me that it was a lie, and he knew it," said Mrs. Warner, promptly enough. "If he hints such a thing to me, the big, disgraced old puppy, I'll slap those ears of his! But don't you go and say any thing to him," adds Mrs. Warner, who had got her husband into hot water more than once in their married life, as he rises from the table.

"Not the least fear of me. I would be a fool to mind anything that you say of me in these days," replies her helpmate.

"But this dreadful, dreadful news! Are you sure you are not mistaken? It can't, can't be true! I'd put on my sun-bonnet and run over to Mrs. Ret Roberts, she'll know all about it. Though, poor thing! how such a man as Colonel Ret Roberts ever came to marry her, well, say nothing sort of a thing— Oh, one thing, Dr. Warner, engage me ten pounds of coffee at Mr. Ellick's. If any body has any conscience left he'll— But, Dr. Warner—and his wife seizes upon him as he passes her—"do you really think, really now, there's any doubt about the South succeeding?"

Nature gives every living thing some mode of defense, or at least escape. People that have feeble hands generally are compensated with admirable legs. Master Fox does not pretend to the rear nor to the teeth and claws of the lion; but then Sir Reynard is not deficient in cunning. This Dr. Warner can no more stand before the eyes and the tongue of his wife than he can before Atropos. Thin-haired, florid, unamusing, fat, too, he does only what nature has left him to do—droops his head and takes it. It is a great

...them, between us, you know, what of this news?" It is Dr. Peel who asks the question. He has read the bit of brown paper upon which it is printed some six times over, and holds it to read several times over yet before he is done.

"I think, Sir, that one half is false and the other half is exaggeration," replies Mr. Lamum, promptly. He has printed a paper too long not to know all about such things. We call him
Mr. Lamum. The fact is, he is called Colonel Lamum and General Lamum and Major Lamum indifferently. Mr. Lamum by very few.
Indulge me in the weakness of dropping all his titles and calling him simply Lamum. People never called him any thing else except in speaking to him.

An undersized man is Lamum. He may be thirty, and he may be fifty years old—you can form no conclusion on the matter merely by looking at him. Excessively lean; very much stooped in the shoulders; face very pale, and never changing color under any possible circumstance; nose long and sharp; thin black hair; of a swift gait in walking; prompt and sharp speech; very shabby in clothing—that is the man.

Although continually associated with people that do, Lamum never smokes, never drinks, never plays a game—at least of cards. You never catch him in a billiard-room or doggery, unless it is in search of some politician to be found nowhere else. Lamum rarely enters a church—never, in fact, save for some political reason, such as to hear a political prayer or sermon. Yet Lamum swears only when very greatly provoked. No one has ever breathed a syllable against him as a husband. In regard to his various pecuniary transactions his enemies violently assail him; but then his friends as rehemently defend him. As these transactions are entwined in lawsuits without number, it is impossible to decide upon them in advance of the jury.

One word expresses Lamum from his earliest manhood upward, heart and soul, body, mind, and spirit, conversation and conduct—in every respect from head to foot. He is a politician.
Above politics, beneath politics—if it had any beneath—besides politics he has not a thought or emotion. All his reading is political papers; he holds no conversation, when he can help it, except upon political topics. He knows no ties to any living creature except political ties. As to his wife he sees her only across the table at meals, or, perchance, asleep in bed when he comes in late at night. His printer's devils have a joke that all his courting consisted of political conversation with his beloved—though why she married him Venus would have to ask of all the gods of Olympus to ascertain; perhaps Plutus could inform her. Certain it is, all of his street fights have been with political foes.
There is nobody in the world—perhaps his wife excepted; he has no children, he has no proper for such nonsense—loves this pale, cold, eager man.

There are many who fear him throughout his State; but oh, how unanimously throughout the State, which he rules with his pen, is he hated! Robespierre—yes, there must be a resemblance between the very appearance of the two men. Like Robespierre he loves politics not for the office or profit it brings him so much as for the dry sake of politics itself. Something like the intense fondness—not so much of a gambler for his cards as of a chess-player for his mystic game. He has a cold yet infinite zeal in the intrigue, the twisting of facts, the magnifying of useful nothing, the diminishing of disagreeable somethings—the downright lying, the flattering, the bullying, the rewarding, the punishing—the wielding of Power, that is it! Robespierre had his guillotine, had he? Every Nationalist's Star falls like an axe across some man's nape if not his neck! Talk about the unscrupulous devotion of a Jesuit to his order!

Let it suffice to be said, Lamum was, in the most exclusive and intense sense possible to the word, a Politician, not in the sense of a stump-speaker. Lamum had a thin, feeble voice—he could not make speeches, never tried. But his pen! Ah, how powerfully he spoke through that! And how he ruled with it hundreds in every county in the State who did mount the stump.

"Look here, General," says his companion yet again, "you are going to print this ridiculous dispatch, are you? I say, you will fix it up in your paper? You know, between us, it won't do exactly."

"Hold on a moment," says Lamum, who has been writing rapidly ever since he entered the office. Dr. Peel resumes his brown dispatch.
A large, dark man is Dr. Peel. What you might call a bulbous forehead, with very black hair and whiskers, singularly black. Dr. Peel possesses deep black eyes as singularly restless and eager in their motions. The Doctor has been in Somerville but a few months; shortly before the blockade was established over the Southern ports he arrived. Dr. Peel has long given up his practice, he says—has means enough to live.

And the Doctor has means, plenty it would seem—gold. No man can be more prompt in paying his board bill; nor does he make a single debit at a store, though he is continually in them, one and all, and purchases freely. The Doctor is partial to buggy-riding, and makes it a point to take some one of his acquaintances with him whenever he drives out. Though he has been in Somerville for so short a time he knows every body. Especially is he hand and glove with Dr.
Ginnis, Mr. Neely, Colonel Bolkeris, old Mr. Juggins, the Rev. Mr. Barker, Lamum, and the rest of the genuine, from-the-start, out-and-out, non-mistake Secessionists. Of those who are suspected of being Union people he has the most unmitigated horror.

"Thank you, Sir; I wish to have nothing to say to such traitors"—he remarks—"I'd just as lief hang them as eat my dinner." He has frequently observed, "I'd put an ounce of lead through them, or six inches of cold steel into their white livers and black hearts as quick as take a drink, Sir, and a—sight quicker!"

as were his hands would clench, his eyes roll, as he would curse the individuals in question with a species of frenzy that left any other man far behind.

Not a war-meeting of any sort but he was the first to be present and the last to leave, the loudest to applaud and the largest to contribute. On one occasion, at least, he publicly offers from his own pocket twenty dollars in gold, in addition to the fifty-dollar bounty, to every man that will enlist in the new company being raised. From the earliest hour of the day till the latest moment at which he can find any one to converse with him, he has but one topic—Secession and the War. He can not cease from the theme even at table. It is confessed that he is stronger and louder and more violent in the matter than any other man in or around Somerville.
There is a ferocity of manner, a recklessness of assertion, an insanity of feeling about him, which rather cools than otherwise the most violent of his associates.

Considering all the circumstances of his advent in Somerville; that he is so "flush of money—not paper-money, but gold, Sir, round twenty-dollar pieces—I'd be hanged, Sir, if I don't believe—why, the man has no occupation here at all but talk Secession and the War
—I'd be —, Sir, if I don't firmly believe that Dr. Peel is a—" And here the voice of the speaker is sunk into a whisper, and is received with a start and an oath by the hearer; such had often been the remark made in Somerville.

"There is my trunk, gentlemen," Dr. Peel remarked when a committee visited his room at Staples's Hotel to investigate matters. "Don't forget the lid part of it, please. My extra coats, waistcoats, and breeches are hanging on the hooks behind my door. I will take off the clothes I now have on also. Don't forget those extra boots under the bed—might have papers in the linings or between the soles. There you see my revolvers too; pair of bowie-knives also —examine the scabbards, gentlemen. My Enfield rifle stands in the corner. The mattress, too, and the books on the table. Make a thorough search, please."

No man could be more unembarrassed than Dr. Peel by the visit and the suspicion which led to it. One would have supposed that he would have been astonished at it, resented it, killed some one. Not a bit of it. Dr. Peel was not ruffled a feather by any thing of the sort.

There had been some singular discrepancies in the Doctor's statements in regard to the place of his birth, in regard to his having correspondence with his "old and intimate friend Beau-gard," which a "had got confoundedly mis-laid" when desired to produce; but no evidence could be found against the Doctor of a positive nature, and so he resumed his course louder than ever.

It was a little singular, however, the conduct of Dr. Peel, after having politely escorted to the door of his chamber the committee above referred to—Bob Withers, Simmons, and windy Dr. Ginnis the committee were. Seating himself, having called out after them as they departed down the steps the last friendly, even cordial good-morning, with his hands in his lap, forefinger and thumb arched to meet forefinger and thumb, he first thought it over, then began to smile, at last rolled himself upon his bed, fairly convulsed with laughter, genuine, unfeigned laughter, sparkling from every white tooth, streaming in tears from his eyes, possessing him and shaking his brawny frame from head to foot.

"Going to the war? I am going," the Doctor had often remarked, in answer to questions to that effect. "Do you think I'd stay away when there are Yankees to be killed? No, Sir, I am going; and if I was to see my own brother or father among them I'd send a bullet from my rifle here through their hearts first ones. Do you think money could pay me to stay behind?"
And the Doctor would proceed to curse out the rest of the feelings of his soul on the subject in a way which left nothing to be desired.

And yet Dr. Peel's brawny form was still to be seen in every store, at every street corner, before every bar. It was singular. "In constant correspondence with the military authorities, Sir. They are anxious to place me where I can do most for the glorious cause." Yet months rolled by; the Doctor left Somerville often enough, but he always came back again for a fresh start. It was singular.

But Lamum has finished writing. "See if this will do," he says to Dr. Peel; and he proceeds to read:

—THE NEWS OF TUESDAY NIGHT.
"Thank Heaven! we know our readers well enough to know the manner in which they received the news of Tuesday night, of which much, and a vast deal too much, has been said. In the first place, we take for certain that a large part, if not every syllable, of the news is utterly false. Months ago the North was taught, and the entire world was taught, for time and for all eternity, a fact which we of the South have always known as well as we know our alphabet—that Northern soldiers fly like sheep at the very appearance of our brave boys.
"Is it reasonable to suppose that this has been other than the case at Fort Donelson? Did not the last dispatch distinctly declare the utter rout of the Federal forces assaulting that fort? But yesterday we were rejoicing in what we expected as a matter of course—that we pay the least attention to-day to the gipsy-rout lies which have come to our ears? We feel confident our intelligent readers will treat such trash with the contempt it deserves.
"Even supposing the Federals have met with some slight success in Tennessee, it is but for a moment. At the news all the South will gear forth its legions by millions, and in less than one month from this day not only will the Federal armies be driven back, but our invincible hosts will be thundering at the gates of Charleston and Chicago! Looking at the news as we will, in any case we find in it ground only for rejoicing. Doubtless before this our Government has been recognized by every

in country place "courting" was performed in a fashion. The gentleman was paired off with a lady on all festive occasions. They sat and whispered in public. They made no secret of kisses, and the usual manner of sitting, even in broad daylight, was with the legs and arms about the feminine waist. Consequently no mortal guessed the state of my feelings, but my own never suggested the possibility of a match between Lawrence Lorne and Miss Abby Dill "keep-squay."

"I think she know how I loved her. I thought I liked to know it. She had a look she kept a tone in her voice, I believe, I alone heard. all the world as she did, I could not help that she loved me best of all. Yet I was not to find out for myself without asking—all in all I resolved to tell her how I felt. That at school, I wandered away into the woods, there thinking. I knew I was not rich: I was as poor as I: were we really too poor? Should youth wait for gold and lands to look love to its heart? Were gray-beards and the beardless boys who disobeyed them it seemed to me not so. We were young, very, hope, and strength. She had all that and, with the sweetness and beauty that had a love her. Why, if she loved me, should I begin the world together? I was sighing through the branches while 'Why not?' The birds sang it. The sun it in the golden blotches of light dropped the leafy shadow. My heart said, 'Why not?' I rose and went to her across the fragrant clover-field, where the blue bees seemed once more to hum to me, not, if she loves you?" I found her sitting perch, sewing. In the cozy parlor her old sister sat asleep over her Bible. The summer day was nearly over, but it was bright, and the windows of the houses and those little church were turned to molten gold by it. All along the road tinkling bells told of ward-driven cows; swart laborers trudged by fields into the high-road, whistling as they went. Now and then a fitting flock of birds passing shadow to the earth, and far away a red bell was ringing. It was only a fancy; I knew that, yet it minded me of the al of the curfew. And still the sweetness and loveliness of Nature, the look in Abby's eyes, the throbbing of my own heart seemed to me, "Why not, for she loves you?" could not speak then and there. If I had my would never have been told. She must alone with me before the words I must utter. So I asked her to walk with me.

"I must have tea first," said she. "I am real enough to despise that ceremony, and other is ready for hers, no doubt. Come in!" she folded up the needle she was working by and blossoms, and led the way to where she was spread with a snowy cloth, and the home-like tea-time sights and odors asked for old question.

"Number she had just poured out a cup of tea and that in taking it my hand had, by touched hers, thrilling me through with its closeness, when some one came to the door asked. Abby said, 'Come in!' and in a great hulking lad, a scholar of mine, then kept the Post-office.

"Nin, Miss Abby," he said. "I was comin' I father said I'd as well fetch this. It come in afternoon, and looks important."

"I took the letter," said she. "Won't you up of tea?" But Tom, scarlet with con- the request, "hadn't time, couldn't stay," rided out.

"The letter remained upon the table, a large en- with a great red wax seal, four or five post- and as many scrawls, indicating the exist- the Winston. Miss Abby Dill had wait- ally weeks for her letter, whatever it was, ally "looked important."

"It is not," she answered, with a laugh. "ould an important letter come to me?" "y on us! you are going to read it, ain't y?" asked the old lady.

"By-and-by, when I have had my tea and y grandma."

"I have you no curiosity whatever on the sub- nked."

"I doze the old lady called her back. y, you never believed so before; I've cut- that letter, if you are not."

"I pose there should be something terrible in mother," said Abby, with a laugh. "I walk first."

"I really frighten me," said the old lady. "all my nonsense, grandmother; you may r me while I'm gone."

"Right!—with these spectacles that never e?"

"I looked at me. 'Well,' she said, 'must I try,'" said I, and took a penny from my "To s up for it. Heads, Miss Abby Dill letter now—the reverse, she waits a wee," y the coin in the air—Fate brought the worst.

"I sat down at my table by this time, and with a ground, and four new class-rooms. It was vaca- tion-time, and it was quite empty, so I was free to visit the rooms and admire the improvements if I chose. All I did was to sit down at my old desk and fancy Abby Dill among her girls in the light of the long south window.

Opposite the school arose another edifice, beam- new and exceedingly pretentious—the Winston Bank, an institution of which the Winstons were wondrously proud. But it shut out the prospect of distant hills, and the pond with its water-lilies and drooping flags and rushes was quite hidden, and I did not like the alteration.

On the way home I passed Abby's little cottage. Some one lived there now who cared more for beans and cabbages than for flowers, and I gave one look over the pullings and walked away.

Yes, Winston was altered, but I heard pleasant news that day. Miss Abby Dill had returned thither and lived with her old grandmother in a beautiful cottage on what was called The Hill.

She had suitors and offers enough, they said, but she was single still, and "kept company" with no body.

On Sunday I saw her at church. She had not altered. She was even lovelier than ever, and I felt that the path lay clear before me, and that I was free to woo and win her.

But I put a restraint on myself and never went near her. I wanted her to learn that I was there, and that I had become wealthy enough to woo her without being accused of mercenary motives. A monomaniac for the time being, I withdrew all that I possessed from sundry excellent investments and deposited every cent in the Winston Bank, that gossip, nimble-tongued enough in Winston, might carry the news to her. On Wednesday I intended to call upon Abby Dill and begin my wooing. Alas! the most positive intentions fail to be carried out at times. On Tuesday evening, entering my room in the dark, I struck my eyebrow against the door. Next morning I had a terrible black eye. To present myself for the first time in such a plight was simply impossible. I fumed and fretted in vain. I was not presentable for a week despite the apothecary's lotions. Then going to church once more with the intention of offering Abby my escort home I found her seat empty. She had gone away on a visit with her grandmother, and she remained away a fortnight. When they returned there came with them a lady and gentleman, brother and sister. The gentleman, a splendid fellow of twenty-six or thereabouts, who devoted himself to Miss Abby Dill in the most noticeable manner. Walked with her, talked with her, sang to and at her (for how often I listened, miserably enough, under the cottage win- dows in the secrecy of the evening shadows), and was said to be favored by her as no one had been favored before.

I would not see her while this rival must be seen also. Yet I felt conscious that I was leaving the field free to him, and that, by acting as I did, I might cast my last bright hope away.

One day, desperately bitter, I set off for a long tramp through the woods on a damp, foggy sort of day. Lost my way, caught a cold, and an inter- mittent fever, and was on my back a month. When I grew better there was news in store for me. My landlady undertook it. She came and sat beside me as I rested, weak and worn, on a garden bench and began.

"This is a world of trials, Mr. Lorne."

I acquiesced.

"And trouble comes when we least expect it, and heaviest when we are feeling safest," said the dame. "Now are you prepared for bad news, Sir?"

My thoughts flew at once to Abby Dill. The words, "Is she married?" passed my lips unawares, and my landlady cried, "Who? Marcy me! It's nothing about mar- riage. I wish it was. There's a deal of trouble here just now, and you have a big share in it. They said I must tell you. The Winston Bank is broke, Mr. Lorne, and nobody that has had money there will ever get a cent of it as long as they live."

I heard her through without a word, and then arose and walked away. For the next few hours no mortal eye saw me, and I can only desire to for- get them as though they had never been.

In the evening I went out into the village. The stores were full of people talking over the event; some curious spectators of the woes of others; some truly sympathetic; some crushed into a sort of stupor by their losses; and others eager for revenge, uttering threats against the bankers, and cursing them and their own folly. I heard my own name once or twice, but I spoke to no one. At last I went home and locked myself in my room, but not to sleep. Long after every light was out in Win- ston I paced the floor.

Midnight had passed and the moon had set, when against the dark sky I saw, as I gazed from my window, a reddish sort of smoke or mist, which puzzled and attracted me. As I gazed forked tongues of blue flame burst through the lurid mass, and I knew some building was on fire. In a few moments the sky grew crimson, and I could see the flying sparks and cinders plainly. The fire was on The Hill, and Abby Dill's new house stood there, with other of the best houses of the place.

At the thought I started from my post beside the window and dashed down the stairs and out into the street.

A bell was ringing by this time, every door open, and people, half clad, running in the direction of the fire. Two bank directors occupied dwellings there, and some mad wretch, ruined by the failure of the Winston Bank, had become an incendiary, forget- ful in his wrath that between the two stood the shade of one innocent of all wrong-doing—Abby Dill's home, which was in one broad blaze from roof to cellar when I reached the spot.

They had the old grandmother safely out by that time. A servant had lifted her from her bed and carried her to the street through flame and smoke; and now she stood wringing her hands and calling for help for Abby.

They had the old grandmother safely out by that time. A servant had lifted her from her bed and carried her to the street through flame and smoke; and now she stood wringing her hands and calling for help for Abby.

"My child!" she screamed; "my sweet, good girl! Save her! save her!"

But all stood helpless, gazing on the roaring flames helplessly. I pushed my way through the crowd and dashed toward the doorway. Some one cried, "Stop him! It's certain death!" And then I was in the midst of a suffocating smoke, in a furnace of horrible heat.

But the worst was past in a moment, and I was on the stairs calling wildly for Abby to answer me, and a faint voice replied, and, springing forward, I clasped a white figure in my arms and turned—not one moment too soon; but Heaven's mercy brought us safe in life and limb through the greedy flames to the sweet outer air.

I was weakened by illness, though excitement had sustained me to perform my task; but when all was over a death-like swoon crept over me, and I lost consciousness for many moments. I thought myself dying, and was happy; for, as slight and hearing left me, I knew my head reposed on Abby's arm. It lay there still when I awoke to life again. It was gray dawn when I stood with her and looked upon the ruins of her pretty home. A tear was in her eye, and a sad look on her face.

"Poor old house!" she said; "I loved it; but I should not grieve so were it not for grandmother. She will feel the privations of narrow circumstances more than I."

I looked at her curiously. "Surely one house will make but little difference to your circumstances," I said. "Others are to be bought or built."

"With money," she answered. "I have none. A month ago I was a rich woman; but every cent I had was in the Winston Bank, and you have reason enough to know what that implies. I'm as poor now as when I first began to teach in the old school-house yonder."

I acted on the impulse of the moment, and caught both Abby's little hands in mine. Standing thus, I told her all I have told you, and then I said:

"I must begin life over again, Abby, will you begin it with me?"

And she let me draw her to me, and kiss her on brow and cheek and lip, and hold her to my heart—my promised wife, my best beloved, who loved me.

"The path may be stony, but your feet shall not be bruised," I said. "The thorns of life shall never pierce you, my treasure!"

But she answered, "Nay, if there are ills I must share them, and I have little fear; love can compensate for poverty. Then with a change of look and a merry smile in her cheek she cried, 'Do you know if vacation is almost over, and they have asked the teachers in the old school. You have said I must begin the world again together. Shall it be so, Lawrence?'"

"If you like, darling," I said, and kissed her. So one day at morning found me at my desk, with the old array of broad red faces looking at me; but beyond among her girls, my golden-haired wife—nine white hills lasted; and so life could be weary, no toil hard, no lot humble, that was shared with her.

We are richer now; and there is more silver than gold in her bright hair; for we are old people together, and have grandchildren about us; but we are not rich enough, or old enough yet to despise that dear old school or the life we began together there.

THE RUINS OF CAPE HAYTIEN.

By JAMES REDPATH.

The rebellion in Hayti has been unfortunately extinguished. While I regarded it (from my personal knowledge of the character of FRANCOIS-JEAN JOSEPH) as an uprising of the barbarous element, and hoped for the success of the existing government, I deeply regret that the suppression of the revolt is due neither to the amnesty nor to the arms of the President, but wholly to the unwarrantable, bullying, and cowardly intervention of the English navy. This fact will embitter not the unenlightened classes only against GERFARD's triumph, but probably it will unto the entire negro population in opposition to his Government. An attempt, or rather a supposed inclination on the part of his Administration to extend certain privileges to the whites, was the cause of an attempted insurrection at Gonaives a few years ago, the rallying cry of which was—

"Vive le supreme article de la Constitution!"

The seventh article referred to is in these words:

"No white man, whatever be his nationality, shall ever be permitted to land on the Haytian Territory, nor shall he be able, in future, to acquire there either real estate or the rights of a Haytian."

As it would have been unfortunate for us if England or France had aided us in suppressing the slaveholders' insurrection—because such a triumph would have engendered a bitterness in the Southern mind, and a just contempt for our power which no effort on our part would ever have been able wholly to remove—so the fact that the rebellion in Hayti was still as strong as ever, still defiant, still able to repel every attack of GERFARD's troops when the British navy wantonly undertook to interfere and thereby made the President "master of the situation," as the official account phrased it, will, in all probability, cause a sullen submission to his power which is more to be dreaded than open revolt.

The reports of events in Hayti are always so unreliable and contradictory that I have waited until I could learn from trust-worthy sources how the rebellion was suppressed before I completed my record of its civil war.

It appears that an uprising of the blacks, in sympathy with the movement of SALNAVE at the North, was attempted at Jernel or Jernie, but that it was promptly put down by the upholders of the Government. It is charged that GERFARD by his personal conduct has in a measure exceeded obligations to many of the first families of the capital; and that, instead of prosecuting the reforms which he advocated on his advent to power, he has been selfishly seeking to perpetuate his authority at any price. It is further alleged that his unpopularity with the masses is sufficiently indicated by the fact that there have been eighteen attempts at revolution.

Whether these are the capricious complaints of the Outs merely, or just indictments, will presently appear; for if GERFARD increases his efforts to educate all the people, and preserves peace and order combined with freedom of the press and liberty of speech, we will not be unfavorably affected by these the evils of his opponents. I am not at all convinced that the President is unpopular because so many efforts have been made to depose him, nor am I sure that the prompt extinguishment of these attempts was not due as much to his popularity as to his alacrity. I do not speak with confidence on either side, because no person, unless his correspondence with the island is continuous and large, can justly judge of her political combinations. For there are no parties here, but only political campaigns. The Haytian method of deposing a ruler is by inciting a revolt, printing dozens of proclamations, appeals, and strifes; and then with a hip! hip! hurrah! and "Vive la Republique d'Hayti," or "Vive l'Empereur!" as the case may be, entering Port-au-Prince to find the old ruler out of town—generally on board a vessel bound for Kingston, Jamaica. Speeches, new proclamations, eloquent denunciations of the "average despotism" that has been deposed, and an election of a Chief Magistrate for life follow. Thus, whether the ruler of Hayti be called President or Emperor he is in fact the head of a limited military monarchy—limited, if he is a mulatto, by a fear of the blacks; and, if he is a negro, by the apprehensions of another rebellion. In these revolutions no lives are lost and no damage done to property. The troops on both sides understand it perfectly, and are too good-natured to hurt each other. It is only when the parties are of equal strength, or when the rebellion is powerful enough to maintain its foothold, but not able to capture the capital, that bloodshed ever ensues.

The recent rebellion was evidently more formidable than the organs of the Government represent. It held the North with stubborn tenacity. Every assault on the rebel capital was successfully met and promptly repelled. SALNAVE, the leader, was not killed. The port was not blockaded. On the contrary, the Government lost its largest steamer by capture. The best-informed writers state that the rebellion would have been successful if the English war-vessels had not interfered. Whether this predicted success would have led to the establishment of a Northern "Empire," and left the South "out in the cold," a separate and independent republic, as in the days of CHAMBERLAIN and PERRON, it is impossible for us to guess with any accuracy. The probabilities seem to be that it would have led to a compromise, which would have caused GERFARD to resign, and DARIEN, or some other black, equally acceptable to both parties, to succeed him as President of the undivided republic.

The pretext for the intervention of the English was furnished by the refusal of the leader of the rebellion to recognize the right of a British vessel to rank him in his own capital. The "helicopter" undertook to shelter and protect several persons—Haytiens—who had become obnoxious to General SALNAVE. On demand he declined to deliver them up. SALNAVE, thereupon, broke into the Consulate, seized the refugees—and shot them. The Baldwin—Her Britannic Majesty's B. D.—a ship of war, was in the harbor, and at once began to annoy itself by bombarding the rebel fort. The fort fired back; B. D. got aground. The situation became a serious one for the commander of H. B. M.'s B. D.; to save it from the courageous negroes the order was given, and the B. D. was blown up! The commander of Her Britannic Majesty's Baldwin probably felt as the overbold but unacquainted citizen of Charleston did when a negro soldier stepped up and asked him for a light for his cigar. His "feelings were hurt" by his dignity outrageously infringed on; but amusements—complete and stupendous—was the dominant sensation. To think of the audacity of the act—for negroes to dare to interfere with the amusements of H. B. M.'s officers! It was incredible.

But incredible as it was, H. B. M.'s commander of the late B. D., when he saw his vessel blown to fragments, at length believed it, and determined on revenge. He posted off to Jamaica for aid.

On the 7th of November, writes a resident of Cape Hayti, the British steamers Lily and Galafrin arrived from Jamaica, bringing the English Consul-General, Sr. JONES, from Port-au-Prince. The rebel leaders, fearing the probable object of their visit, at once sent commissioners on board to learn what conditions were to be proposed to them. The demand was made for the instant delivery of General SALNAVE and Monsieur DE LORNE, the chiefs of the movement under JOSEPH. Knowing what their fate would be they declined these terms; but at the same time replied that, as they were unable to offer any resistance, they would quietly give up the city. Because the demands of the British Consul was refused, fire was opened from both steamers on the rebel batteries and on all the forts in possession of General SALNAVE, which were rapidly demolished. This occurred on the morning of the 9th. The firing of the steamers was accurate. Fort Madeline (commanding one portion of the harbor) was bombarded three hours, very gallantly—no Britons flinching as he fired, no Haytian trembling as he assailed it. For it had been evacuated on the previous evening. All the guns were spiked. General SALNAVE and his devoted friends had taken refuge on the Yankee steamer, De Soto, which carried them to the adjacent port of Monte Christo, in the Dominican Republic.

It was reported, when the news of the fall of Cape Haytien first arrived, that the British vessels had reduced the town to ruins, and that the troops of GERFARD "occupied the site of what was once the city." The absurdity of this statement caused me to refrain from writing this paper until more trust-worthy information should reach us.

I find this passage in a private letter, which I believe to be a correct account:

"During the bombardment, and before GERFARD's troops entered the city, some desperate characters set fire to the principal quarters, and all the most valuable retail shops and dwelling-places the market and to the Haytiens were not reduced to ashes. They also tried to destroy the foreign warehouse on the seaside, but without success, as there were saved from fire though not from pillage, having been mostly broken open and plundered of every thing they contained, particularly the houses of such persons whose occupants were known to be hostile to the revolution. These were completely gutted; furniture of every description being thrown into the streets and broken up by the mob. By these acts of vandalism many families have been ruined and driven to seek shelter on the plains. Previous to the bombardment, which seems to have been expected, if not known, every one would get away to seek refuge in the mountains. All the white foreigners took refuge on board the French and American steamers, as did Captain Haytien; and Captain Walker, of the De Soto, particularly, has earned the everlasting gratitude of the Cape people for his kindness and consideration toward them during the whole time he has been on the station.

"The fire burned for two days, and this lately-thriving city, which, while in the possession of the French, was their 'Paradise on Earth,' is a second time little more than a heap of ruins, having been totally destroyed by earthquake and fire in 1842, and since rebuilt through the untiring industry of its citizens without one 'shar of any foreign aid."

"The closing scene of the rebellion, after the capture of the city by the President, was the total destruction, by his order, of that part of suburbs known as the Fontaine, inhabited mostly by the poorer classes, who have been the most active and bitter opponents of the Government, and who have now been forced to seek new homes in the plains.

"The losses of the citizens, as well as foreigners, by this rebellion, have been immense, and it will take years to place them where they were before it began; money is very scarce, and people hitherto living comfortably, if not in affluence, have been reduced almost to beggary.

"President GERFARD, prior to entering the city with his troops, published a general amnesty; notwithstanding which it is to be feared that much blood will still be shed of prominent citizens for their complicity in the rebellion against him—whether supposed or real."

Cape Haytien need to be called by the old planters the little Paris of the Antilles, not their "Paradise on Earth," as this writer has it; but it is very questionable whether the luxury and wealth that they boasted of were not vastly exaggerated.

When I visited it, in 1859, Cape Haytien had as many ruins as Venice has canals. This destruction will be severely felt for many years to come. Gonaives and Port-au-Prince have suffered by great fire within a few years; and although the value of property destroyed bears but a small proportion to the natural resources of the Republic, yet the loss of the tropics needs years where we require months only to rebuild the waste places.

There is no hope now for a speedy increase of wealth in Hayti, excepting by universal education, the disbanding of the present army, and the substitution of a few regiments of well-drilled and well-equipped regulars in their place. It is to be hoped that GERFARD will now go vigorously to work and accomplish these reforms, and win for himself a proud place in the history of his country and his race.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

"Worst and worst!" exclaims Mrs. Brown; "this exceeds any thing we have had yet!"

"What now, my dear?" inquires her legs lad, looking up from his newspaper.

"Just look at that gas bill! Perfectly outrageous! Nearly double any previous bill we have ever had, and I know we have not burned gas in proportion to it. The truth is, we pay an abominable price for our light, and something is very wrong about the whole of it."

"Well, well," returns Mr. Brown, soothingly, "that is a fact; but what can we do? We must have light."

"I know it," responds the lady; "but if I were the city of New York, or the Legislature, or somebody—I'm sure it must be somebody's business—she gas companies should not have it all their own way. It is a perfect outrage." And the son what indignation is unconsciously thrust the offending gas bill into the lowest corner of her pocket.

"Why don't you burn candles?" suggests the country cousin, who has been quietly toasting her toes at the grate.

"Burn candles! Nonsense! Do you suppose Mr. Brown would write a check by candle-light? But it wouldn't make the slightest difference. I am convinced, if we did not light our gas at all, that, so long as we have a meter and burners in the house, we should have a gas bill regularly presented, graduated according to the season of the year."

Whereat they all laughed, and concluded they might as well be good-bettered and burn as much gas as they wanted.

We agree with Mrs. Brown, in the main. We can't burn candles; oil is disagreeable; and good daylight is not only a luxury, but almost a necessity nowadays, but in the existing state of things New York is not one whit better off in regard to gas than London is; and we generally fancy ourselves a great deal of that or any other city. The London journals have recently indulged bitterly against certain of their favored corporations, including gas companies, in that, having the monopoly of their business, people are compelled, as it were, to patronize them. So, also, is it in New York. Competition is a useful restraint upon the inordinate selfishness of mankind—poor human nature is so weak. Whenever that is excluded the people are forced to accept the article offered at any exorbitant price demanded, or go without it. "These things ought not so to be."

Meanwhile, until the remedy is applied, we join with some unknown sufferer, in the following appeal to the Gas Companies:

Oh, makers of our gas! reflect
What ruin 'tis to you levy;
It surely can not be correct
Our 'light' should come so 'heavy!'
Blame not my verse if they halt,
Or rhyme not quite complete are;
You ought to know how off a fault
Will happen to 'the note.'
By law just ten per cent. your gain,
You had it better answer
At twice that sum to fill your veins;
You look to the more chosen strain,
By wiffling tricks you dodge the Act,
Which should be our deliverer;
Your gas-tricks anger me—in fact,
I'm in a gas-trick fever!
Give us cheap gas! you'll find it 'ays
As well (I'm certain quite of it);
Gas is no trifle matter,
Although we all walk light of it!

Every body has heard the phrase, "Frightened out of their seven senses," rough and loose though it may be. Perhaps some may have wondered what the origin of it was, and queried whether originally man had seven senses, and some fearful death resulted in a considerable number of them.

that as it may, some enterprising individual seems to have found one of the lost senses, or discovered a new one. This is the proof. Let there be a couple of cubical blocks of wood, of the same size and appearance, one, however, being partially filled with lead. Take them in your hand and you instantly detect the difference in weight. Not by the sense of touch, sight, taste, hearing, nor smelling. What is it then? It is said to be by the sense of weight. Who will discover the seventh sense?

It is often said that a good, hearty laugh is better than a dose of medicine; and certain it is that amusement has a wonderfully happy effect alike upon the sick. A story is told of a young wife, apparently dying from swelling and inflammation of the throat, an insupportable distress; she could swallow nothing; every thing had been tried. Her friends were standing round her bed in misery and helplessness.

"Try her wif a comfitment," said her husband, in a not unkind despair.

She had genuine humor as well as he; and as physicians know, there is a sort of mental tickling which is beyond and above rest of, being under the refuge system, and as instinctive as 'gling. She laughed with her whole body and soul, and in a short space she was well.

Advertisements, in paragraphs of various kinds, often find their way into our papers, in which, by the omission of a comma, or more frequently, in consequence of an awkwardly constructed sentence, the most extraordinary statements are made. For example: A newspaper says:

"A child was run over by a wagon three years old and crossed-eyed with pantalets or which never spoke afterwards."

An exchange, describing a celebration, says:
"The procession was very fine and nearly two miles in length as was the prayer of Dr. Perry the chaplain."

A Western paper announces:
"A cow was struck by lightning and instantly killed, belonging to the village physician, who had a beautiful calf four days old."

In the report of a certain School Committee the following statement occurs:
"We have a school-house large enough to accommodate four hundred pupils four stories high."

It gives one an idea of progress to see such an advertisement as this:
"WANTED—A young man to take charge of a pair of horses of a religious turn of mind."

In this connection it may be mentioned that on the walls of Scituate, near Tyngsboro, England, a board has been fixed, on which is inscribed the following notice:
"Any person passing beyond this point will be drowned by order of the post-boys."

We clip the following flaming advertisement for the benefit of all interested in household economy:
"WASHING EXTRAORDINARY.—A lady having discovered a new and ingenious method of washing a week's wash in three hours, without the aid of a washer-woman, or the use of machine or soap-powder, in defiance of insupportable information to the contrary, (including stamped addressed envelopes, No. F—, etc.)"

This is truly delightful! No more pining things to wash, no more wringing, no more iron with a scolding in it, no more small or worn steam! All is to be done in three hours—and the things wash themselves, for there is no woman and no soap needed. Alas! that the dusting brood should pick us by the sleeve, just as we are about to send off the stamped directed envelope, and suggest that perhaps after all the clothes and the discovery alike "wasn't worth it!"

Appropos of this they have a method of washing in Syria, which has not yet been introduced into our country. Those ladies who have the care of this weekly vexation will be glad to know that wives are duly appreciated in some countries.

"According to the laws of the Greek Church, the clergy may marry once; but if the wife dies, they are not allowed to choose a successor. It is said, and may easily be believed, that this pains for the lady a larger amount of respect and attention than is usually the lot of her sex in the East. A gentleman residing in Syria was surprised, on entering the house of a leading priest, to find him engaged in washing the floor of the household; and on inquiring the reason of such an apparently unorthodox occupation, the reverend gentleman replied: 'I do this to save my wife labor, that she may live the longer; for you know that the law of our Church does not permit us to have another, and I wish to keep life as long as I can!'"

Not long since a lady was passing along the street, in London, her dress caught upon a nail projecting from a parking-box which had been left on the sidewalk, and the result was a hideous rent, whereupon the lady, in righteous indignation, made claim for damages. The owner of the parking-box undertook to have the dress repaired, but it was not done to suit the offended lady, whereupon her husband brought suit against him for wrongfully obstructing the public highway. The obstinate parking-box man undertook to defend himself by proving that the sidewalk was ten feet wide, and that the offending parking-box occupied only three feet on one side of it, leaving the lady an unobstructed passage seven feet wide. He claimed that this was more than enough, and that it was negligence on the lady's part to run against the nail.

The English Court of Law held otherwise, and gave a judgment in the lady's favor for all the injuries which the dress had sustained. We don't believe that parking-boxes have any business to occupy so much space on sidewalks as they do in some parts of New York city. But the ladies of this city will be delighted to know that it will be understood hereafter that a diameter of seven feet is within the proper and legal limits of a lady's skirt.

Here is a new and interesting revelation:
"A French seaman says that Adam was a hundred and twenty-three feet nine inches tall, and Eve was a hundred and eighteen feet nine inches and three-quarters. Such he declares was an equally large young man."

Since cooking always have come into vogue it is believed that it will soon be fashionable for every lady to know how to cook. "Judy Jory," remarks some hungry husband, "what a racket it would be to smother if ladies were so competent in drawing a good dinner as they generally are in dressing themselves out for one! No longer then would husbands be driven to their clubs by the dread of tough, cold roasts, and potatoe underdone. We would not wish our wife to be seen always with her apron on; but even if we were the Emperor of the French, we should wish, in case of need, that she knew how to broil a steak for us."

The other day a New York lady—who justly prides herself upon having every article that comes upon her table nicely cooked—remarked: "I would give a good deal if I knew justly how to make good bread. My bread does not suit me, and, though I understand the theory of bread-making, I do not know enough about it practically to be sure of my case; so I must for my cook take her own method, although there is something wrong about it. It would not be amiss, in such a case, to write all girls, and not mind applying a few lectures for the sake of learning how to make good bread, and the common articles of bread-making."

HON. LAFAYETTE S. FOSTER, VICE-PRESIDENT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY DRAY.]

VICE-PRESIDENT FOSTER.

THE HON. LAFAYETTE S. FOSTER, Vice-President of the United States, was born in Franklin—part of the old town of Norwich—Connecticut, November 22, 1806. He is a direct descendant of Miles Standish. At the age of twenty-two he had completed his collegiate education at Brown University. He then entered upon the legal profession, studying at Norwich with the Hon. CALVIN GODDARD, and was admitted to the bar in November, 1831.

Mr. FOSTER began his official political career as a member of the General Assembly of Connecticut, in 1830. He held this position during that and the subsequent year; was again elected in 1846 and the two years following, and again in 1854. In 1847, 1848, and 1854 he was Speaker of the House. He had in the mean time, in 1850, received from Brown University the degree of LL. D., being at that time Mayor of Norwich.

In May, 1854, Mr. FOSTER was elected United States Senator from Connecticut for a term of six years, and at the expiration of that term, in 1860, was again elected. During his Senatorial career Mr. FOSTER served as a member of the committees on Revolutionary Claims, Private Land Claims, Public Lands, Territories, Indian Affairs, the Judiciary, and Foreign Relations, and was at one time Chairman of the Committee on Pensions. He was elected President pro tem. of the Senate March 6, 1865, and about six weeks afterward, upon the death of President LINCOLN, he became acting Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. FOSTER is a man of quick perception, and is one of the best presiding officers in the country.

THE LATE HON. HENRY WINTER DAVIS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY DRAY.]

HENRY WINTER DAVIS.

THE DEATH of the Hon. HENRY WINTER DAVIS, on the 30th of December, 1865, deprived the country of a very able statesman. Mr. DAVIS was born in Annapolis, Maryland, in 1817. He received his collegiate education at Kenyon College, Ohio, and after his graduation devoted his energies to the study of law. He grew rapidly into a very large and lucrative practice at the Maryland bar.

In politics he was a Whig until the dissolution of that party, when he joined the American party, then very strong in Maryland. In 1856 he gave a warm support to Mr. FILLMORE. He had been the previous year elected to Congress, where he served on the Committee of Ways and Means. He was elected to the next Congress, and was the only Southerner who voted for Mr. PERRINGTON as Speaker.

During the war Mr. DAVIS was a strong and ardent supporter of the Union cause, and if he ever differed from the Administration it was because he thought a more radical policy ought to prevail than was adopted by the great body of the Union party. One instance will in this connection readily recall to mind his part in the celebrated "Wagon DAVIS Incident," which administered somewhat of a rebuke to President LINCOLN, on the ground that the latter, in his policy of reconstruction, disregarded the views of Congress. Though somewhat eccentric in his political views and conduct, Mr. DAVIS was a man of great ability, a fluent speaker, and an accomplished gentleman. His erratic course in politics probably deprived him of a large measure of the influence to which his talents entitled him. His funeral took place at Baltimore, December 31, 1865.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP,
COMPOSED OF
IODIDE POTASSIUM,
WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID
EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL
ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY
WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,
Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant
Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospitals, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Val-
unteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D.
Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup
HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many disease bringers considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or a few weeks; and we cheerfully write the troubling stories of the liberal-minded and reliable to cases which were so painful at the present day.

During the past five years we have contended with obstinate and obstinate opposition, as heretofore as were ever confronted by our reformers.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.
Frequently, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt the veracity, and think that diseases can only be cured by the "slow, recuperative process of Nature."

This is our reply: In healing the body, like a well-balanced scale, is in a state of equilibrium. But when, from any cause, disorder sets in, the scales are thrown out of balance. What is required is to restore the balanced balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all secondary diseases transmitted from PARENT TO CHILD.

PARALYSIS.
It is so universally admitted that Constitution Life Syrup is the only safe means of restoration in the various forms of Paralysis, that we need not hesitate that it is equally the best Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.
INDIGESTION, WEAKNESS, STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER DYSPEPSIA, WASTY OR APETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, BILIOUSNESS.

SCROFULA.
SYPHILIS, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERIPIPELAG, ULCERATION, SALT RHEUM.

This is the HERBERT'S and adjuvant, doing life with its own safety, in all usual suppurated, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.
GOUT, GRAVEL, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, SORE THROAT, &c.

If there is any ailment which the Constitution Life Syrup is a remedy, it is the Rheumatism and its kindred afflictions. The most intense pains are almost instantly relieved, and the most obstinate cases, chronic, or of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by us.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of Bile, restores the Bowels, and cures the Weak Lungs, and obviates those which the use of Calomel is usually produced. It has a Spongy Gotta, and restores the Fluids to their natural state.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
Is a safe and sound remedy for all Diseases of the SKIN, like
ULCERS, PIMPLES, BOILS, &c.
All other diseases of this kind, which so much disfigure the human countenance, and which are so often the result of a disordered system, are cured by us.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases, Ulcers of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Uterus, or any part, are readily cured by its use.

Such Diseases upon the female face, especially upon a diseased action of the Liver, are very unpleasant to the young wife and mother. A few bottles of Constitution Life Syrup will cure the condition, and remove the disfigurement which it directly induces upon the skin.

Disease of the Liver, giving rise to Jaundice, Diarrhea, Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an increased or morbid condition of that organ, accompanied with burning or other unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of

Constitution Life Syrup.
As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR
Are liable to the same diseases. Nature and Science have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD
Prevents both by men and women, and if the constitution is neglected in youth, disease and early death is the result.
Do not delay when the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH
MAN'S BLESSING.

The great feature of our Prize Concert, is the manner in which tickets are sold, differing from anything of the kind ever before offered to the public.

1st. The Prizes are a great deal more valuable.
2d. All of them are genuine Gold and Silver goods, the very best manufactured. The Prizes and Sewing Machines are all new, and the manufacturers' names are sufficient guarantee that they are surpassed by none.
3d. The manner in which it is drawn. Each ticket has its duplicate No. placed in a wheel, and thoroughly mixed, and the ticket-holders present at the Concert, draw these duplicate Nos. from the wheel, the first one drawn out gets the largest Prize, the next one drawn out, the next largest Prize, and in like manner until all are drawn.
To enable us to give away the valuable Prizes, we first sell sufficient number of tickets to insure an equal loss the Prizes are then distributed in order as the duplicates are drawn—until all other Gift Sales, where you buy your ticket, and should you draw a large Prize the Proprietor makes a good loss of the value you draw, consequently you seldom if ever get anything worth what your ticket cost you.

of making their goods as extensively known and appreciated as the United States as they now are, and have been for over 20 years in Europe, they have determined on a plan by which goods of this kind may have the advantage of their splendid styles. As a preliminary, they would remark that they manufacture and sell no inferior Jewelry or Watches.

All are Warranted Gold of the Finest Workmanship.
Our customers will also have the great advantage of a constant succession of new and exclusive styles and patterns with which we stand keep our New York Agency supplied.

We have adopted the plan of sale, now so popular, of charging a uniform price, and this price will invariably be $2 for each article, no matter how costly it may be.
The objects of our Agency are New York Agency are paid by the sale of Certificates, or Coupons, representing the various articles. These Certificates are sold at 50 cents each, or five for $2, and each certificate will entitle the holder the particular article he or she is entitled to on payment of an additional $1. If the article named on the Certificate is not desired, the holder will oblige us, when he returns the Certificate, by stating what other article of the same value he or she may prefer, and it will be sent with pleasure. Our aim is to please, and every means to that end will be exerted. We solicit a trial from every one who reads this notice, as we are confident of giving the utmost satisfaction.

Alcock's Porous Plasters.
A celebrated physician says he was cured as the great number of benefited ladies have produced by one of these Plasters. He affirms that he had also been cured by one word just below the breast-bone; that one plaster over the naval will cure dysentery as well as dysentery, and affections of the bowels.

CURE OF VARICOSE VEINS.
BY
T. ALCOCK & CO. Having your notice in the P. L. G.
Gazette, I got four of your Porous Plasters, and placed them on the parts where the veins were most swollen, and in less than twelve hours could walk as well as ever. I could hardly believe it, I was so well pleased. I wanted to see if the lancet would come back, as we used to, and I did more walking that day than I had done in a week.
The next day I had some pain in my hip; but I got over a plaster there, and in two hours the pain was all gone; and I have felt it since. Certainly they are the best application for the relief of and cure of pain in the joints and limbs, and for various enlarged veins. I have never known and I would not be without them on any occasion.
Yours, truly,
JAMES M. MORGAN.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.
It was early in the spring of 1850 that the Compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a cough, and his cough. I had for some months previous to this time preparation, having for its base the best of the plants, might be so impregnated as to be the cause of the case of the lungs, it was thought. To be the cause of the disease attended to, I suggested a small quantity of the Compound that I had been planning to give, and it was found that the result was very quickly obtained. It was in two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. I was then suffering for some weeks with a bad cough, and I took about ten courses of it, and got well. In November, 1852, I first conceived it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.
As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled. Address: Boston.

This great New England Compound is now offered to the afflicted, having been prepared by the best of chemists in the New England States, where it is the best of all as well known. It cures sore throats, coughs, all kinds of hoarseness, swelling of the throat, and all other affections of the throat. It is a remedy for dysentery, diarrhoea, colic, and bladder, and gravel; and for piles and it will be found valuable. Sold by druggists and collers in medicine generally.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 27, 1866.

A LONG STEP FORWARD.

THE order of General GRANT, defying the ... military authority of the United States in a ... rebellious States, should excite our ... who fear that the Government is too ... to imperil the public peace by delivering ... whole authority of those States uncondi- ... into the hands of a class which can not ... expected to use it in good faith.

The General's reply to the request of Gov- ... PAUSONS, of Alabama, that the national ... should be withdrawn and the local militia ... is also significant and sensible. It is ... follows:

"For the present, and until there is full security for ... maintaining the right and safety of all classes ... in the States lately in rebellion, I would not ... the withdrawal of the United States troops ... them. The number of frontier garrisons might be ... but a movable force sufficient to insure tranqui- ... should be retained. While such a force is retained in ... South, I doubt the propriety of putting arms in the ... of the militia."

The bill of Senator TRUMBULL's continuing ... Freedom's Bureau and extending its op- ... to every part of the country in which ... are to be found in large numbers, is ... of these military orders. It will ... be approved by the President and ... a law. This is another of the plain ... that neither the President nor Congress ... to make haste unwisely, and should ... tend to temper the acrimony of debate ... the subject.

Senator TRUMBULL's bill recognizes two ... and fundamental truths of the situation. ... first, that the National Government means to ... and secure the personal liberty which ... has conferred; and second, that it is essen- ... the freedmen should become landholders. ... that provision every other device will ... futile.

At this moment, it should be remembered, ... free man, excepting those settled upon the ... islands by General SHERMAN, and whose ... Mr. TRUMBULL's bill confirms, are with- ... land and without the means of buying it. ... they are helpless in the midst of a population ... which is generally hostile to them, and they ... have no chance of livelihood except from the ... who may choose to employ them. ... landholder may say to them: "You are ... to go. I do not wish to employ you. Get ... my land." That a man will not and do not ... this, is true. But vast numbers do. And ... laborer has no remedy. He must "move ... and beg, steal, or starve. The tragedy ... his situation can hardly be exaggerated; ... although the feeling against him may mel- ... with the lapse of time, and although the ... of the case will gradually persuade ... landholders not to quarrel with their bread ... yet meanwhile, under these winter ... and among those wintry hearts, the suf- ... of the freedmen is terrible and incalculable, and the duty of the country is plain and ... imperative.

The freedmen are placed by General GRANT's ... under the protection of the mili- ... but that power can not feed them, ... nor house them, nor enable them to work and ... be paid for working. Mr. TRUMBULL's bill ... authorizes the President to reserve for them ... 3,000,000 acres of good, unoccupied land in ... Florida, Arkansas, and Mississippi. Each ... laborer or family is to have forty acres at a rent ... agreed upon by the Commissioner and the ... freedmen. Afterward the tenants may buy the ... land at a price to be named by the Com- ... missioner and approved by the President. Mean- ... while the pauper freedmen are to be provided ... with such lands as the United States may buy ... in any district, and necessary schools and asy- ... lums are to be built upon them; while as the ... paupers become productive laborers the land ... may be sold to them under fair conditions.

The necessity of immediate and decisive ... action upon the subject is urgent. Give the ... freedmen land from which they can not be ex- ... pelled; protect their rights against all ag- ... gressors by the national power; and Time, the ... great mediator and educator, will gradually ... show the present class of landholders in the ... late rebel States that their interests, is one ... with that of their late slaves, now become citi- ... zens; while the occupancy of land, the laws of labor, ... and the education for which the freedmen are ... so anxious and so ripe will develop the self- ... respecting and independent manhood which ... will fit them for the political power which can ... not long be withheld.

OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS.

THE wish expressed by us a week or two ... since that the public might be informed of the ... exact condition of the Mexican question has ... been gratified by the publication of the corre- ... spondence between our Government and that ... of France. The important point of that corre- ... spondence is that on the 18th of October M. ... DREYFUS DE LUCY, the French foreign Minister, ... wrote to the Marquis DE MONTMOLON, the ... French envoy at Washington, that, if the Unit- ... ed States would recognize MAXIMILIAN, France ... would doubtless be able to withdraw its forces ... from Mexico. On the 6th of December Mr. ... SEWARD replies that the condition suggested is ... impracticable; and on the 16th of December ... he writes to Mr. BIGLOW that the United States ... earnestly desire peace with France, but that ... peace would be probably impossible unless ... France should retire from Mexico, and he ex- ... presses his regret that from a conversation ... which M. DREYFUS DE LUCY held with Mr. ... BIGLOW it was clear that the matter could not ... be arranged upon any ground already suggested.

The position of this country upon the ques- ... tion is plainly defined. It will not recognize ... MAXIMILIAN, and it maintains diplomatic rela- ... tions with JUAREZ and the native republic. In ... its eyes, therefore, MAXIMILIAN is an interloper, ... and dangerous to the United States. Their peace ... and safety under present circumstances require ... his departure; and if, after a forcible and ... courteous reiteration of this declaration and the ... exhaustion of every honorable persuasion, France ... still persists in sustaining MAXIMILIAN by arms, ... it will become a practical question for the Unit- ... ed States whether and when and how they will ... sustain JUAREZ. The whole world is aware ... that the circumstances under which France ... went to Mexico are utterly changed. The ... French enterprise depended for success upon ... our national destruction, and France must con- ... form to the unexpected result of our triumph ... or pay the penalty. This conclusion is sug- ... gested by Mr. SEWARD, politely, but plainly and ... emphatically. We believe, as we have always ... believed, that France will not push the matter ... to extremity.

The question of our Alabama claims upon ... Great Britain has also taken a definite form. ... On the 21st of November Mr. ADAMS informed ... Lord CLARENDON that the United States de- ... clined the proposition for a joint commission. ... On the 2d of December Lord CLARENDON re- ... plied, declining to prolong the controversy, ... asserting that "no armed vessel departed during ... the war from a British port to cruise against ... the commerce of the United States," and that ... "the British Government have steadily and ... honestly discharged all the duties incumbent ... upon them as a neutral power." His Lordship ... ought to have added that there was no ship ... known as the Alabama, and then his rejoinder ... would have been consistent and complete.

The history of the Alabama has been writ- ... ten by Mr. GEORGE BROWN, of Boston, in a se- ... ries of exhaustive papers upon the subject. ... He shows from the Parliamentary Blue-books, ... giving dates and documents, that an armed ... vessel did depart from a British port to cruise ... against American commerce. That question ... is not open. And if the British Government ... is contented with the precedent of neutrality ... which it has established, it is satisfied with a ... course that must inevitably destroy its own ... commerce the instant it is engaged in war.

But as we do not expect that France will ... proceed to extremities upon the Mexican ques- ... tion, so we do not believe the United States ... will make war upon Great Britain to enforce the Alabama claims. In both cases the posi- ... tion of the United States is just and dignified; ... and it is certainly a matter of honest pride that ... in the gravest hour of our history our diplo- ... matic ability has been as masterly as our mili- ... tary skill.

THE PRESS AND PUBLIC OPINION.

Nobody believes that there is any party ... among loyal men opposed to the speediest na- ... tional reorganization, although there are many ... who say so in the hope of making political ... capital. The sole practical question is one of ... method, and we are much more likely to err ... by haste than by reflection. We are very sor- ... ry, therefore, to see journals of which a finer ... sense of duty was to be expected abdica- ... ting their function of enlightening public opin- ... ion by argument, and raising the cry that the ... people have made up their minds to a certain ... result, right or wrong, and that any party will ... be ruined which tries to withstand it.

None can be more conscious of the enormity ... of such a cry than some who raise it. The ... business of an honest journalist is not to guess ... at the tendency of the popular current and ... then float with it upon the theory that it can ... not be resisted, but it is to endeavor to turn ... that current in the true direction. RICHARD ... CONDEX did not content himself by saying that ... the British mind was set upon protection, and ... that any party which opposed it would be de- ... feated, but he went to work to show the Brit- ... ish mind that it ought to favor free trade. ... And for what, indeed, are free speech and a ... free press valuable but to mould public opin- ... ion? The press and the tongue may as well ... be muzzled by a tyrant as by the tyrannical ... fear of a majority; and the most contemptible ... newspaper in the United States is such be- ... cause its only aim is to reflect what it believes ... to be the current opinion, however base.

We are not unmindful of the necessity of ... parties to the accomplishment of all political ... reforms, and of the peculiar necessity of union ... among the true friends of the Government at ... this time. We are indeed quite sure that there ... is rather an apparent than an actual difference ... in the Union party. But nothing more surely ... tends to create a schism than hot and reckless ... talk in Congress and in newspapers, and that ... testy dogmatism which is amusing in a katydid ... and ridiculous in an editor or a legislator.

There can be no assumption more utterly ... baseless than that the people of this country, ... who have the decision of the question, are solely ... anxious to have the form of the Union restored ... without consideration of the means by which ... that work shall be accomplished. They are ... not anxious to put fire to gunpowder and ... consider afterward the question of explosion. ... Public opinion, we are glad to believe, over- ... whelmingly favors the just and honorable settle- ... ment of our great questions, and it is the pleasant ... duty of the press to sustain and fortify it.

But fine words butter no parsnips. The peo- ... ple are not deceived as to the real feeling and ... condition of the late rebel section. They know ... perfectly well that the emancipation amend- ... ment was adopted there because the voters ... could not help themselves. The President ... made it an indispensable preliminary step ... toward reorganization. That step has been ... accomplished, and the President waits patiently ... to see what other steps Congress may deem ... desirable and essential. That question will not ... be "rushed," nor does the country, which wishes ... for peace and security, desire that it should be. ... It will be considered thoughtfully and thor- ... oughly, and settled sagaciously and securely.

THE TRAGEDY OF THE NEPTUNE.

Whose duty is it to take care that a poor ... woman arriving in an emigrant ship at this ... port, and being confined after her arrival, shall ... not be left for two freezing nights and days in ... a berth with a little straw to lie on, "very cold ... and damp and wet," and there to remain "ex- ... posed and cold" until she is frozen to death?

This was the fate of MARY ANN GILROY, a ... passenger by the Liverpool ship Neptune, Cap- ... tain ENOCH W. PEABODY, belonging to Messrs. ... C. H. MARSHALL & Co. Captain PEABODY is ... of opinion, according to his testimony, that it ... is the ship's doctor's business to look after the ... sick passengers, and is satisfied that he has con- ... formed to the requirements of the British law ... under which he shipped his passengers. The ... Captain says that it is the business of the Com- ... missioners of Emigration to take charge of sick ... passengers arriving at port; and although he ... did not report to them that there was a woman ... on board prematurely confined, yet Mr. LAW- ... SOV, one of the owners, told him that the Com- ... missioners had been notified.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, inspector of Customs, tes- ... tifies that he boarded the Neptune on Tuesday ... afternoon, and at eight on Wednesday morn- ... ing the passengers were all removed by an agent ... of the Commissioners of Emigration, excepting ... MARY ANN GILROY, who had been confined on ... Tuesday night. All Wednesday the poor wo- ... man lay in the wet and cold straw. The in- ... spector thinks that there was a blanket over ... her, and can not say whether there was a bed under her. At some time he saw the ship's doctor and a woman attending to her. On Thursday afternoon at five o'clock she was moved from the ship by the authority of the Commissioners of Emigration. On Friday morning she died. In her ante-mortem examination MARY ANN GILSON testified that four days before reaching port she told the doctor that her feet were "frosted," and he "wouldn't believe it;" paid no attention to her, and forced her to come upon deck for her medicine. Dr. BRACKS, who accompanied the Coroner, talked with the unhappy woman, found her sensible, and able to converse intelligently, and is of opinion that she died from want of proper care and attention.

A helpless woman has been frozen to death upon a ship in the harbor of New York. Somebody is responsible. Who is guilty of this murder? Is it the Captain, the Doctor, the Commission of Emigration, the owner of the ship? It is pitiful to think of the sorrow and suffering of these emigrant ships, and how easy it is for the guilty to screen themselves. But here is an offense that will not be hidden. Are our laws impotent to protect the defenseless? If not, we hope the press will keep this tragedy fresh in the public mind until the offender is brought to trial and to punishment.

YOUR DOXY AND MY DOXY.

In the time of the Inquisition it was frightful, it is now happily only very comical, to hear a man state his view of a religious question, and then, drawing out the full ars et cetera stop, and pressing with both hands, both feet, and both knees upon all the keys and pedals, exclaim: "To doubt or deny this rule is infidelity begun."

Of course it is. It is arrant infidelity of his assertion. But whether his assertion be the truth is quite another question.

Thus there is a familiar biblical phrase that the husband is the head of the wife. What its exact significance may be is a fair question. Does it merely state a fact, or imply a rule? Does it mean that as the intellect is generally more pronounced in men, and the feelings in women, therefore the guiding force will naturally be in the husband? Does it mean that a drunkard or an imbecile is the rightful arbitrary ruler of his wife, or that where the superiority is all with the woman she is to yield always to the inferiority of her spouse? Does it mean that if the husband be the head he may do what he chooses with his wife? and if not, is she to be the judge when he transcends the rights of headship? It is, in truth, a phrase which will be as variously interpreted as men's minds are different.

But that any man should now, and in this country, denounce a doubt of his interpretation of this or of any scriptural passage as infidelity, or doubt of the essential truths of religion, is so preposterous as to be incredible. Yet it is done; and the well-meaning gentleman who does it would doubtless be amazed if he in turn were convicted of infidelity by the same easy and absurd method. The Romish Church would inform him that his whole interpretation of Christianity is the beginning and end of irreligion and infidelity. To believe in the antipodes was once held to be infidelity of the plain teaching of the Bible. Yet the truth upon that subject has been tolerably demonstrated, and the Bible is not discarded. In the light of to-day it may be shrewdly suspected that to doubt or deny any individual interpretation of a passage in the Bible neither imperils good morals nor religious faith.

THINGS OF COURSE.

The New York World, a few months ago, spoke of ANDREW JOHNSON as an "insolent, drunken brute, in comparison with whom even Caligula's horse was respectable."

The same paper described an acrimonious assault upon Secretary SEWARD, the head of President Johnson's Cabinet, as "the scraping of the old saw SEWARD."

It need surprise no man that the same paper now denounces ABRAHAM LINCOLN as a thief and a swindler.

What could more happily illustrate the national sagacity than that the party of which this paper is the fit organ has been utterly spewed out by the American people?

ROBERT B. MINTURN.

THE true treasures of a nation are its good men, and neither Death nor Time can steal them. The man, indeed, dies, but the memory of his character and his survivors, and is a perpetual inspiration of the noblest action. This is so plain to all of us in the high and clear-sighted moments of life, that every honorable man would wish to build his monument, like that of ROBERT B. MINTURN, in the unobscured respect and tender love of his friends and neighbors.

Gen'l, just, and generous; modest, humane, and unobtrusive. Honored by the most successful and prosperous, beloved by the poorest and most forgotten; his sense of responsibility growing with increasing fortune, until his devoted life was that of an humble skinner of the Divine bounty—this was the New York merchant, the American gentleman, the serene Christian, whose life was a public blessing, and whose death is a universal sorrow.

Wholly withdrawn from what is technically called public life, and declining every position of merely personal advantage, there was no citizen of New York whose name was better known, and known only for an ideal purity in all business relations, and for the most earnest and unweary practical humanity. He was one of the first Commissioners of emigration, because he knew what severe and often repulsive labor the sincere and faithful discharge of that duty demanded; and therefore he was not content to give his name and his money to the relief of the suffering emigrant but he gave his heart and hand also. Could the long train of the poor, who knew him as their friend, and who, when his sudden death was known, came weeping to ask permission to look upon his face once more—have known that, once when a poor emigrant woman lay ill of ship-fever and neither nurse nor doctor would risk their lives in lifting her for necessary removal from her bed to a carriage, he quietly took her in his arms and tenderly carried her, they would have known only one of the endless services of his practical charity, from which no fear of his own safety could deter him.

But his sensitive sympathy did not impair his sagacity. Too finely balanced for extravagance in thought or deed, his mind and heart were in the fullest harmony, and his discharge of every business relation was as wise, unobtrusive, and faithful as his charity. His practical counsel was as valuable as his impulses were generous, so that all who knew him well and those who but seldom met him equally bore from his presence an impression of manly symmetry and completeness.

The death of such a man to those who were nearest him is a personal loss not to be measured. But to the community his influence is so vital and enduring that it should rather be grateful that he lived so long than grieved that he died so soon. When RICHARD CORBEN died his political opponent, DUNKLELL, said of him that there were "some members of Parliament who, though they may not be present, are still members of this House, are independent of dissolutions, of the caprices of constitutions, and even of the course of time." It is true, also, in a corresponding sense, of some men in the larger sphere of society, and of none truer than of ROBERT B. MINTURN.

PORCELAIN PHOTOGRAPHS.

THE beautiful porcelain photographs of Messrs. HERRICK and KERRY, of No. 895 Broadway, fully justify the high praise which they have received. They are printed directly from the negative, so that the outline is exact, and they are then exquisitely colored until they are the most accurate of likenesses, with all the delicacy, softness, and tenderness of the most finished miniatures upon ivory. They are also as durable as the porcelain plate upon which they are painted, and may be wiped and washed and exposed to the sun without losing their brilliancy and completeness. Those that we have seen are colored with great skill; and this application of the art must be regarded as a very important step in the progress of photography.

"INSIDE."

THE second number of this interesting and striking story is published in this paper, with the illustrations of Mr. NASH, who delicately characterizes without caricaturing the figures of the tale. The spirit and dramatic skill of this "Chronicle of Secession" will surely commend it to the faithful attention of those who begin, as every body should, with the beginning.

WHILE THE DAYS ARE GOING BY.

THESE are kindly hearts to cherish
While the days are going by;
There are weary souls who perish
While the days are going by;
If a smile we can renew,
As our journey we pursue,
Oh! the good we all may do,
While the days are going by!

THERE is no time for idle scolding
While the days are going by;
Let our face be like the morning
While the days are going by;
Oh! the world is full of sighs,
Full of sad and weeping eyes:
Help your fallen brother rise
While the days are going by.

ALL the loving links that bind us
While the days are going by,
One by one we leave behind us
While the days are going by;
But the seeds of good we sow,
Both in shade and shine will grow,
And will keep our hearts aglow
While the days are going by.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

January 9: In the Senate, Mr. Sumner presented a memorial asking for the donation of public lands for educational purposes in the States lately in rebellion.—Mr. Foot offered a resolution, which was adopted, appointing Wm. J. McDonald, Ch'k of the Senate, Mr. Hildreth deceased.—A resolution, offered by Mr. Sumner was adopted, providing that any legislation is needed to prevent the kidnapping of fugitives and their transportation as slaves to Brazil or Cuba.

In the House, Mr. Washburn of Illinois introduced a bill published in the Worcester Spy, by Mr. Baldwin, of Massachusetts, declaring that the real purpose of the New York and Washington Air Line Bill was not to operate against the Camden and Amboy company, but to oblige the Central Illinois Railroad Company to carry Illinois State mails and troops free of charge. A discussion of the subject followed, and the bill had been twice passed under a call for the previous question, thus suppressing debate, and that therefore many members who voted for the bill had done so in misunderstanding its real purpose. It was finally agreed that the bill should be returned back to the Senate for discussion.—Mr. Brewster, of Pennsylvania, introduced a resolution, which was referred to the Committee of Fifteen, to the effect that, before Congress conferred the necessary power to punish the rebellious States to form State governments the rights of those among them, always free, in their allegiance should be guaranteed and protected.—Mr. Voorhees, of Indiana, then called up the resolution heretofore submitted by him, concerning the President's Message as an able, judicious, and patriotic state paper; resolving that State cannot under their relations to the Federal Union; and pledging Congress to support the President's policy. He made a long speech against the refusal by Congress to immediately admit the Southern representatives; and was followed by Mr. Stephens, of Ohio, who recalled him of his former attitude against Federal coercion. Mr. Stephens repelled every intimation that the Representatives here have manifested the slightest disposition to interfere with the just prerogatives of the President, or to make up a conflict with him. "If the day ever comes when he will find no supporters except among those who in 1854 were barred so deep that the hand of reconstruction can never draw them, then God help the President and save him from his friends." In conclusion he offered the following as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana: "Resolved—That this House have an adjournment in the President; that in the future as in the past he will keep pace with Congress in restoring to equal position and rights with the other States in the Union all the States lately in insurrection." Under the call for previous question Stephens was supported 137 to 22.

January 10: In the Senate, Mr. Wilson offered a petition of the colored citizens of Savannah, asking for relief from a bill pending in the Committee of Fifteen.—Mr. Forrester reported the House bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint Assistant Assessors of Internal Revenue. Mr. Sumner said he would vote for the bill on the understanding that Mr. McCulloch would not on his own authority, as he had done heretofore, relieve the duties be appointed from taking the oath imposed by Congress. The bill was laid over.—Mr. Wilson introduced a bill to increase and fix the military peace establishment of the United States. It provides that the military peace establishment of the United States shall hereafter consist of seven regiments of a battery, and such other forces as shall be provided for by this act. Section 3 provides that, in addition to the five regiments of artillery now organized, there shall be added one regiment, to be composed of white persons, and one regiment to be composed of colored persons—the officers of which shall be selected from among the volunteer officers of artillery who have served not less than two years during the war, and who have been distinguished for capacity and good conduct in the field. Section 4 provides that in addition to the six regiments of cavalry now in the service, there shall be two regiments to be composed of white persons. Section 5 provides that the Chief of Cavalry, and the Major-General, five Major-Generals, and ten Brigadier-Generals, shall have the same pay and emoluments and be entitled to the same staff officers in number and grade as are now provided by law. Mr. Howe, of Wisconsin, introduced a joint resolution to institute provisional governments for the late rebellious States, and made a long speech in favor of the bill.

In the House, Mr. Hale offered a resolution declaring that the previous question was for the regulation of debate and not for its entire suppression. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.—A resolution was adopted that the Committee on Ways and Means should inquire into the expediency of revising the system of income taxes and if desirable to dispense with the system; if not, that they provide that the tax on incomes shall be for amounts over $200, and that the percentage on all incomes shall be reduced.—On motion of Mr. Cushing, of New York, it was resolved that the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate any report made by the Judge-Advocate-General as to the grounds, facts, and accusations on which J. Jefferson Davis, General C. Clay, Stephen R. Mallory, and David R. Yates, or either of them, are held in confinement.

January 11: In the Senate, Mr. Sumner presented the petition of the Colored People's Convention, asking for colored suffrage.—The bill for the appointment of Assistant Assessors by the Secretary of the Treasury was passed without Mr. Sumner's amendatory amendment.—Mr. Trumbull, from the Judiciary Committee, reported the bill to enlarge the powers of the President's Executive; also the bill to protect the inhabitants of the United States in their civil rights.—The resolution in regard to the Industrial Exhibition at Paris was passed.—The resolution offered by Mr. Howe the day before to institute provisional governments over the rebellious States came up, and Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, opposed it, taking substantially the ground previously taken by Mr. Raymond in the House.

In the House, the credentials of James Farron and John D. Kennedy were referred to the Committee of Fifteen.—On motion of Mr. Ingersoll, of Illinois, the Committee on Territories was instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to repeal the act organizing the Territory of Utah, and to divide said Territory, attaching one portion thereof to Nevada and the other to the Territories contiguous.

January 12: In the Senate, Mr. Trumbull's bill to enlarge the powers of the President's Executive was taken up. It provides that the Executive, approved March 3, 1865, shall continue in force until otherwise provided by law, and shall extend to fugitives and freedmen in all parts of the United States; to organize the Bureau into districts and sub-districts; and authorize the Secretary of War to issue provisions, fuel, clothing, etc., to the freedmen and fugitives, and also authorize the President to set apart for the use of freedmen and legal refugees unoccupied lands in Florida, Mississippi, and Arkansas, not exceeding in all 5,000,000 acres of good land. No action was taken.

In the House, on motion of Mr. Raymond, it was resolved that the President of the United States be requested, if not deemed by him incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House copies of all orders, proclamations, and other documents issued by the Provisional Governors of any States that may have been declared at any time to be in rebellion, of all acts, ordinances, resolutions, and proceedings of conventions or legislatures held in said States under the authority of the call of said Provisional Governors; of all returns of elections for members of such conventions and legislatures, together with the qualifications required for voters in such elections, and for members when elected, together with such other information concerning the public action of such States tending to throw light upon their political condition as may be in his power to do, and to communicate further copies of all proclamations issued by the President or his executive power relating to this subject, whether issued by him directly or through the Secretary of State, and the papers accompanying the same.

January 13: In the Senate, Mr. Wilson's bill on the power military establishments was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.—Mr. Sumner presented the petition of the colored Methodist Episcopal Church of Missouri, praying for colored suffrage.—Mr. Chandler, of Michigan, offered a resolution, which was laid over, that until Great Britain called our claims for damages done to our commerce by her privateers we should withdraw our Minister from the Court of St. James and prohibit national non-intercourse.

In the House, the credentials of Arkansas members were referred to the Committee of Fifteen.—Mr. Stevens offered a resolution, which was adopted, 62 to 27, that attorney-at-law be relieved from taking the oath, as a condition of carrying on his profession.

POLICE COMMISSIONERS' REPORT.

According to the Report of the Metropolitan Police Commissioners for 1865, the number of arrests for offenses of all grades amounted to the enormous number of sixty-eight thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, or about seven thousand more than the previous year. Crimes of violence toward the person have increased in a still greater ratio, the total number being nine hundred and ninety-five, against six hundred and twenty-four in 1864. The report shows that there are twelve hundred "discharges on probation" in the courts alone, and that there are in this city and Brooklyn ten thousand places where intemperate drinks are sold, over eight thousand of which are unlicensed.

FOUNDING OF THE "MARY A. BOARDMAN." It is not pleasant to encounter a disaster at sea under the most favorable conditions. But when the thermometer stands 40° on a degree below zero, such an affair is not only a tragedy, but a tragedy of the first magnitude. It was in precisely this case that the poor vessel the Mary A. Boardman foundered on the night of the 20th instant. Her crew, having grounded on Homer Shoals, off Sandy Hook, were on board twenty-three men and two women, and all of them have perished but for the bravery of two French-Canadian pilots, Henry Seguin and Stephen A. Jones, Jr. The vessel seemed a perilous thing to undertake in its stern cold, in a rough sea, the wind blowing with a terrible force. The brave pilots succeeded, however, after repeated efforts in making the whole crew.

TROOPS FURNISHED BY THE SEVERAL STATES DURING THE WAR.

The Secretary of War, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, has furnished a statement of the number of volunteers called for by the President at various periods, as follows:

NEWS ITEMS.

One hundred and forty-three generals were mustered out of the United States service November 25, 1865. Among them are General Hunter, Rosecrans, Parks, Grierson, Sherman, Johnston, A. J. Smith, Johnston, Cook, Weitzel, Logan, Sherman, G. H. Rains, Canby, Emory, Foster, Wilcox, Torbert, Ewing, etc.

Gen. Leonard Bacon, of New Haven, who has lately returned from a tour through the Southern States, says, in a lecture on their condition, that all Southern States, the women and the clergy are the most intelligent, and that he would have been glad if President Johnson had added to the classes exempted from amnesty the possession of all disqualifications and the office of newspaper. Every one of them should have been obliged to file a statement of his antecedents with his application for pardon.

The total number of national banks now doing business throughout the country is one thousand six hundred and twenty-six. The Controller of the Currency is at present granting authority to say new national banks.

The population of Minnesota is estimated at 275,000. Accurate from localities represent a very magnificent condition of affairs on the frontier. They show a disposition to make contracts, and the planters are generally well-to-do. A number of the planters of the Arkansas Valley have been assigned to Missouri. These reports are quite in contrast with those from Mississippi, where the freedmen are going to work and making satisfactory engagements.

General Tolson, Superintendent of the Freedmen's Bureau in Georgia, has issued a circular, under date of December 22, instructing his agents generally to accept freedmen, who have not properly enough to get along without making contracts, to see that fair contracts which are offered to them. He makes it the duty of his agents to make contracts for those who fall to do so for themselves before the 15th of this month, where good wages and kind treatment are offered to them, and such contracts are to be binding upon the freedmen as if made by their own consent.

On the 13th instant General Terry, the Union President, received a letter from James K. Polk, the Head Clerk of the Southern Irish Republic, cordially following his session during the late troubles, and appointing him Representative and Financial Agent of the Irish Republic in this country.

On the 13th instant Edward P. Brooks, the Richmond correspondent of the New York Times, was attacked in the office of the Postoffice Hotel in that city by the notorious H. H. Hunt, of the Enterprise, who attempted to cow him. Mr. Brooks disarmed his assailant of the revolver and threw it away, and then, with such arms as Nature gave him, defended himself so vigorously that only the interference of the police of the hotel saved him from a vigorous chastisement. The cause of the attack is supposed to be the recent and entirely just denunciation of the disgraceful shooting affair in the Richmond capital.

It appears from an official statement that the total number of men who have received pay for $200, $300, or $100 during the war was 1,723,400, amounting to the aggregate of nearly $200,000,000. The total disbursements during the war were 2,460,000 men, of whom upward of 125,000 received no pay.

On the 16th instant the Hon. Marcellus L. Ward was inaugurated Governor of New Jersey.

When the war on the Government was begun the lands, houses, slaves, merchandise, stocks, and other possessions of the people of Georgia amounted to a value of over 100 million and forty million of dollars, while now the entire property of the State is not worth quite half that amount and is in the hands of the Government. The loss of the war in loss to the Georgia was in the amount of 50 million and four hundred and sixty six thousand dollars, which is about one hundred and sixty-four and a half million of dollars.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The French statement in Great Britain received a very important confirmation, when numerous dispatches were despatched from England to Ireland. In the streets of Dublin the police appeared in double force. Charles Underwood O'Connell has been found guilty of treason and felony. He has been sentenced to ten years' penal servitude.

The official weekly returns in regard to the cattle disease shows that the progress of the disease has been checked, as the increase in the number of animals attacked exhibits a continued diminution.

Special services had been held in Westminster Abbey in celebration of the eight hundredth anniversary of the foundation of the Abbey by Edward the Confessor. The London Times, in an editorial on Mexican affairs, argues that Napoleon will probably withdraw under restraints and upon America, for the interests of the country, to quit any attempt to re-visit, and obtain from its creditors a reprieve on the subject.

The Daily Times points out that the absorption of American stocks throughout Europe has lately been more extensive than ever before known, and says this is one source of the depression of English securities.

Mr. Charles Eastlake, President of the Royal Academy, is dead.

The Paris Patricien says France and England have not offered mediation to Spain in the Cuban question, but their good offices only, which have been accepted by Spain. In South America, the Peruvian army has retreated into Peru and assumed the offensive.

JACK FROST, among the RICH and the POOR

ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATION FROM THE CHAPTER III.

Colonel Juggins emerged from the office of the Somerville Star like an honest blue-bottle fly, only he carried away a good deal of the cobweb about him out of the den of a spider. And very much better the Colonel felt in leaving it than when he entered its door.

When he heard of the investment of Fort Donelson by the Federal forces, never had the Colonel been more certain of the rising of the sun to-morrow than he was of the repulse and destruction of the Yankees. When the news arrived that the fort had actually capitulated, that the Confederate forces had failed to make a stand even at Nashville, it fell upon his ears, and upon those of very many like him, more like the tidings of some great phenomenon, some unprecedented interruption of the laws of nature itself, than merely as the news of battle and defeat.

The instant and most painful impression was—Good Heavens! if we have been defeated—we of the South—defeated once, what may not happen hereafter? The truth is, the events of the war so far had settled the common mind in Somerville, and throughout the South, in the fixed conviction of that which had always been a decided opinion, that Northern troops could not stand before Southern. True, Bowling Green had been evacuated, but that was easily explained; it was a splendid stratagem to draw the Federal troops farther South, and so make a total finish of them!

Future historians will write Manassas as the Waterloo of the Confederacy. The cup of Southern victory there drunk was followed by a degree of intoxication to the South, of a greater than which history has no instance. As has been said before, the universal opinion at the South of Southern invincibility had hardly need of any thing to establish it, and Manassas petrified that opinion into granite certainty.

Nor did the events following Manassas fail to increase this certainty, had such increase been possible. So thoroughly settled was the Southern mind upon the whole subject that the vague fears of Northern preparation going on excited little or no interest. The same sentiment possessed alike the people, the press, and the officials—at least, from no quarter was heard a syllable but to the same note. Any one who had hinted otherwise would have been marked as but a poor creature, unskilled in his wits by an absurd attachment to the Union, which ought to be regarded as treasonous, if it were not so heartily despised as contemptible.

Even the most firm among the Union men were beginning to settle themselves down to what seemed the will of Heaven—craving about to make the best of an inevitable matter. Nor is all this to be wondered at, when it is remembered how successfully all intelligence from the North was excluded from the South. By a most mistaken policy, the Southern press copied from the Northern and European papers, as a general rule, only that which was favorable to the South. It was more than human to withstand an influence so unmingled and uninterred.

True, as to the inherent and unchangeable right and wrong of the matter, the minds of Union men were unshaken; but they had begun to lose to the thing as to a thing very too mysterious to be understood—a thing in which nothing remained but submission to the will of God—fate, destiny, whatever it was to be called. People in the Border States may have been less convinced, but so the people of the States farther South, thence from a cloudless sky is less startling than were the tidings that Federal gun-boats had actually run up the Tennessee to Florence, that Fort Henry was taken, that Fort Donelson had fallen, that Nashville had capitulated! The dominant feeling was—bewilderment.

"My dear Helen," Dr. Warner remarked to his wife, in a calm which had followed one of his domestic tempests, "you may depend on it, and your own clear, strong sense will say yes to me in it, truth is much the best plan. Frankly and truthfully, from the first, with my patients is my plan." They have confidence in me then; they are sure to follow my prescriptions faithfully. There is a mutual understanding between us; no miserable dodging and deceiving on either side; and, whatever the result is, we at least know that all has been done from the start that could be done. The South has been grossly deceived by its doctors, I mean its leaders, from the first.

"Yes, you always hated Secession," broke in the partner of his bosom, the canal-gates opening.

"I was not speaking, just then, of Secession, but of the course pursued since then; but it is all of a piece. Either our political doctors were themselves all deceived, or they deliberately and systematically deluded the unfortunate people who had been cast into their hands," observed the mild physician.

"Went it blind, ma," said Bab, who was making a kite on the floor beside his parents, and who could not possibly have been the child of quick-witted Mrs. Warner and not have been himself smart.

"Hold your tongue, Bub!" broke in his mother. "Nice thing, Dr. Warner," she continued, "you are not satisfied not to be a whole-souled Southern man yourself; you are poisoning even the mind of your own child. I have no patience with you, Dr. Warner—cool, slow, patient submissionist you are! The very idea of giving up to those vile Yankees! Before I'd do it I'd die a thousand times over! You laugh at old Colonel Juggins, I know; but if he is a coarse, ignorant, old man I only wish to goodness you were as hearty in the war as he is! He was always wondering what Johnson was doing, starting there at Bowling Green, when he ought to have been across the river into Ohio. And Davis, and the rest of them, lying there not more than twenty miles from Washington, month after month, instead of marching right on, taking Washington, catching and hanging old Lincoln. Set of cowards! You men are all alike. Oh, if I was only a man!"

"What would you do if you were a man?" asked her impulsive husband.

"Do! I'd raise fifty thousand brave men, lead them right on into the North, burn every house, batter down every town, kill every man I could; I tell you," said then Mrs. Warner, her black eyes sparkling, "I'd kill and burn and cut their throats till they'd be glad enough to make peace with us. That's what Mrs. Bowles and Dr. Gunnis say. Instead of that, they are evacuating Bowling Green—running away, I tell it—and Davis there in twenty miles of Washington and not going right on! Next thing," continued Mrs. Warner, with bitter sarcasm, "we'll read some morning the precious news that they have evacuated Columbus—even Manassas!"

"My dear," said Dr. Warner, helping himself to another slice of ham—for they were at dinner on the same day as that in which we first introduced them to the reader—"my dear, I do firmly believe that if you were a man you would succeed vastly better than nine-tenths of our men. But we have to take them as we find them. However, if you were a man I would have missed the most active and excellent wife in the world, and Somerville the best house-keeper going!"

And it was only the fact; Mrs. Warner was the neatest housekeeper in Somerville; as to the other the Doctor lied, and he knew it.

But it was of Colonel Juggins we intended to speak in entering upon this chapter. Slowly rode the Colonel home meditating upon the news. Lamum and Lamum's pole of newspapers had relieved his mind somewhat, but not entirely. There is a certain mysterious assocation which a foot always carries with it wherever it flies; you may deny it loudly, you may hate it heartily, but when a fact comes to the ear, the mind receives it as such by some mystic affinity as a fact—recognizes it by spontaneous appetite as the palate recognizes its natural food. As well as he knew his name did Lamum know that the disastrous news from Fort Donelson was true. Dr. Peel knew it. Even Colonel Juggins knew it—acknowledge it? no—yet none the less every body knew it to be true. It was as if the sun had varied from his path. Gracious Heavens, what might not be the next news!

Somehow, before he alighted from his horse at home—some five miles from Somerville—all Lamum's consolation had been dissipated from his mind, and the ugly news remained in all its hideous reality. The Colonel belonged to one of the three classes into which all slave-owners at the South may be divided. As a representative man of this class let us say a word or two in regard to the Colonel.

Tom Juggins was the son of a rich Tennessee planter. There had been six or eight children in all, but what with being thrown from unbroken colts, and cholera morbus from eating green water-melons, and chills and fevers, one by one all the children had died except Tom. As to him, he doubtless owed his special strength of constitution to the fact that he had been suckled from his very birth by a negro "mammy." In that mammy's cabin passed the days of his infancy, his mother being a confirmed invalid, and his father having an unfortunate habit of spending in town and in intoxication pretty much all the time he could spare from field and cotton-houses. On the earth floor of his mammy's house Tom learned to walk, and around the chicken-coops in front of it were spent his first hours of play.

As her way never child had a more loving mother than Tom had in his mammy, preferring him, as she decidedly did, to all of her own dark brood. And a very paradise of childhood Tom had of it; permitted to get as dirty as he pleased, very little washing, and no swatching whatever. Nor was his childhood less auspicious as it advanced into older years. With a troop of little blacks at his heels he hunted the calf lot and stable-yard, worrying the calves, riding the horses to water "lure-back," hunting and eating all the eggs. With his allies to lock him did he stone the cats and the birds, clip the tails and ears of the puppies, kill the snakes, paddle in the spring, and climb the trees. Among his subtle associates, too, did he learn and practice many a vice peculiar to their semi-savage nature and easily ingrafted into his.

In due time Tom was sent to school; yet it was very little Tom learned. What with playing truant, and "barring out" the schoolmaster, and holidays occasionally, and idleness all the time, it was very little Tom learned beyond reading, writing, and the beginning of ciphering.

The rest of the story is soon told. After a youth of breaking horses, and assisting and hunting, and accompanying the cotton-wagons occasionally to the nearest city, and frolicking a little at weddings and corn-shuckings, Tom fell in love with and married a neighbor's daughter, and settled down. The death of his parents not very long after devolved the "Place," with all its negroes, on his hands, and Tom went to work ginning cotton and selling it as his fathers did before him. The old hog-houses in which his father lived did well enough for him. True, he did once take a notion to build, had vast quantities of stone and sand and lumber hauled for the purpose; but something or other turned up to postpone the matter, and three the heaps of materials continued to lie, an admirable lurking-place for snakes, laying place for hens, and playing-ground for the swarms of little negroes, till wind and rain and towering weeds had made a medieval ruin of the whole.

Year after year in a row of wretched cabins did Tom, now Colonel Juggins, continue to live, as contented in his home as any hand in his little inferior hut hard by. He had become accustomed to bobbing his head in passing through the low doorways, to walking over the rolling puncheon planks which composed the floors. As to the roof, a clap-board or two could be nailed on in half a minute to keep out the worst of the rain, and a rock or so, with a handful of mud, could close up the worst of the cracks between the logs of the wall. Abundantly able to build a stately mansion, the Colonel saw little in his limited travels to awaken desire for any thing beyond what he already was so accustomed to. Besides, the Colonel was fat.

And so rolled the years by with Colonel Juggins. Hardly would he do as a specimen of the terrible-slaveholder of excited imaginations. Such there are, but not of that class was this Colonel. His dwelling was first cousin to the worst which any slave on the place occupied. His clothing was rather inferior than otherwise to the Sunday suits of his men. As to his daily food, it was about the same in house and in hut. Very often, in fact, was Mrs. Juggins glad enough, when company unexpectedly came, to borrow of some of their "people" the honey, poultry, eggs, or butter with which to clip out the dinner.

True, the Colonel voted and his hands were denied that inestimable happiness; but, then, the Colonel knew very little more at last about the principles voted for or against than they would have done. The Colonel, having all the responsibility and bother of the "Place," was, upon the whole, much the least happy man on it, and, as to his religious principles, if he was a church-member, so was almost every one of his grown hands, and they had the opportunity of receiving just as much and as good religious instruction from Sabbath to Sabbath as he.

There are two other classes of slave-owners, each as distinct from the other as his is from both. The Yankee owner of slaves, Mr. Neely for instance, and the aristocratic slaveholder, Colonel Red Roberts as a specimen. Of them we will speak hereafter. I am altogether unwilling to say that the Colonel's is the largest class, the base of the pyramid, because I am not entirely certain that it is so.

"What I've got to say is this: why can't they just stay at home where they are, mind their own matters, and let us alone." That was Mrs. Juggins's opinion in regard to the war. She always mentioned it at table when company was present and the war the topic. With her it was a plain, common-sense solution of the whole matter, embracing the whole thing entirely and conclusively. "We are not going where they live, and bothering them! Why can't they let us alone!"

But since the Yankees would come South "with their guns and things," Mrs. Juggins yielded to the necessity of sending Tom, their only son, to help drive them back. In her idea it was an operation precisely like having the chickens driven out of the garden—troublesome, but not very dangerous. Often had Mrs. Juggins heard the plan suggested of building a wall around the South, over which no Yankee was ever to intrude. It was intended as metaphor, but Mrs. Juggins misquoted it as highly feasible. The fact is, Mrs. Juggins was the duplicate of the Colonel. Had you been introduced to the Colonel, and an hour after met his wife in a steer, say for the first time, you would have said on the spot: "There is Mrs. Juggins, and I know it!" Both were in weight about the same relation to two hundred pounds, both had the same large, red, good-humored country face. It was little education Mrs. Juggins had when she married, and she certainly had seen time for nothing except the management of the negroes and of her fast coming, fast going too, as for that, children since that event. Except an almanac, a Bible, and a hymn-book or two, there was no reading in their house save the papers. Of those that he took the Colonel decidedly preferred his religious paper, which, while it gave him all the news of his church, gave him also Secession in its moral and religious aspect. But, ye Heavens! why is it that the mere say so of a mortal has so much more weight and force when printed than it has when only spoken? No mistake about that paper!

Never in his life could the Colonel read a paper, or any thing else, except aloud and very slowly. In consequence of this his wife managed to get her news without much trouble on her part. Every syllable was believed by the Colonel as he read it, and by his wife with a double faith, because of the fact that it came to her from the lips and backed by the comments and assurances of her husband. If angels are permitted to hover over mortals, one would think the very tongues of such visitants would have struggled to speak out and apprise this poor Colonel Juggins and his wife of the enormous falsehoods which they feel upon thus from day to day with such a painful, implicit belief. But no; the Colonel and his wife then in their cabins were but representatives of millions at the South—millions willing to know and to do the right, yet so systematically, so unwillfully, so utterly blinded! To keep them apprised of the arts by which they were deluded would have withheld the heavenly guardians from all the enjoyments of bliss in unintermittent activity. Ah, how even angel beams must have heaved to smite with flaming swords the guilty authors of the gigantic delusion! How patient is God! And if the inhabitants of heaven know what goes on upon earth, how must they be partakers of this attribute of the divine nature—else would heaven cease to be heaven, at least so long as earth continues to sin and to suffer beneath it.

It was an immense relief to Colonel Juggins, as he entered the door of his house, to find Brother Barker there. Pete Sheehan had assisted him in regard to Fort Donelson for a time as he rode into town, Lamson had cheered him a little for the moment, but Brother Barker was worth more than all besides. Pete, Lamson, and the rest were all very well, but what Brother Barker said fell on the ears of the Colonel with all the weight of religious truth. From his earliest recollection the Colonel had been accustomed to receive as certainly true what his preacher said whether in the pulpit or out of it. Besides, Brother Barker peered all he advanced from Scripture itself. To doubt Brother Barker's conclusions was irreligious, and the Colonel hadn't been a "member" for thirty years now—class leader, steward, and all—to do that!

"And what do you think of this last Fort Donelson news?" asked the Colonel, immediately after sending his guest, and making himself comfortable by seating himself in a hide-bottomed chair and sitting himself back in it against the wall.

"As I see you do, Brother Juggins—painful, painful intelligence," replied the preacher.

"You believe in it, then?" asked the Colonel, slowly and with a sinking heart.

"Believe in it? Certainly I do. There isn't the least doubt, as I can see, but the Federals are in possession of Donelson and Nashville, Tusculum and Humsville, too, for what we know!"

"Well, you take it easier like than I can," said the planter, with a gloomy brow.

"Why not, Brother Juggins? It is of the Lord, isn't it? Besides, what do I care, and what ought you to care about Donelson, Nashville, and the like, when I know and when you know what the end of it all is certain to be? Why, Brother Juggins, whatever I expected of a worldlying I didn't expect it of you. A man out in the world, now, I wouldn't be surprised at, but you!" And the preacher was as cheerful as his host was gloomy.

"I was hopin' strong it wasn't true," said the planter, after some time. "To me it sounds mighty bad, no use tryin' to hide it."

"And that after all you know on the subject, after all the talk we've had! Well, Brother Juggins, you must pardon me saying it, but I am surprised and grieved," said the preacher.

"Surprised at what?" asked the planter.

"Bad news is bad news, I suppose."

"Strange, human nature; well; oh yes, of course; ought to expect it at least," mused the preacher, with his head down on his bosom as if in seclusion. "So many thousands of years ago it was those Jews talked the same way! At it the instant they heard Pharaoh's chariots rattling behind them. Very first sound of the wheels they forgot Moses, forgot God, forgot every thing except that Pharaoh was after them. Umph! Well, yes."

"I hadn't thought of it exactly that way," said the planter, accepting the reproach humbly, and seeking consolation in it.

"Did I ever say we would escape some fighting, some being defeated before we got through?" asked the preacher—"tell me now, Brother Juggins."

"Yes, I did at the first, as I mind," said the planter with a thoughtful brow. "Christian Israel you know are were. Baldwin, he made that plain in his book. Abraham driv out from his father's house, our forefathers drive of God over the ocean, God's special people in both cases. Thirteen tribes settled in Canaan, thirteen colonies settled in America. Some of our tribes split off from the rest, some of our States split off from the rest, too. And, you mind, when Secession first started, come to think of it, you proved from the Bible there would be no fight, not a bit. God wouldn't let that fool son of Solomon fight the tribes that split off even when he wanted to. There was got to be no fight, no fight at all! God himself would interpose to hinder, you said. And it did look mighty plain."

"But, Brother Juggins—" began the preacher.

"In one moment, Brother Barker, I've been studyin' over it, and I want to speak about that Christian Israel idea while I remember. I've been wantin' to ask you; it don't seem to me like. In the Bible the tribes that split off were all except two; in our case it's the fewer number has split off from the larger number. Then, and this hurts me worst, the tribes that split off were the ones that stood against God in the thing, that became worse and worse, that went to—what did ever become of them?—while the tribes that they split off from remained the favored people of God, had Jerusalem, and the Temple, and all. I tell you, Brother Barker, it was all very pretty when you first look at it, but the more you study into it—there was that about there being no fightin' permitted of God between the tribes when the break-up took place. I declare, for one man, I don't understand it!" concluded the old planter, somewhat testily.

"Brother Juggins," said the preacher, gravely, "do I understand you to say that you have studied Baldwin's book from end to end, deeply, thoroughly?"

"No, Sir," said the planter. "It's near three inches thick, that book. I only skimmed over it—a little here and a little there."

"I really do not think, Brother Juggins," said the preacher, in a tone of expostulation, "that you ought to decide so upon what you say yourself you never studied to the bottom."

"Well, perhaps so," said the planter, as he remembered how ponderous was the volume in question, and how very little he had mastered its contents. "But there was not one syllable about Secession in the whole book, I know that, any how. It was Monarchy and Democracy that was to fight the battle of Armageddon in the Mississippi Valley. Not one hint about Secession!"

And Colonel Juggins was not the only one who had puzzled over the book in question—"ARMAGEDDON, OR THE UNITED STATES IN PROPHET." You saw the thick and well-thumbed volume on every shelf during the two or three years before Secession.

"Brother Baldwin was mistaken about that," consented the preacher. "But he has found out his mistake, and, they say, is lecturing like wild-fire every where setting people right. I believe as certain as I do my own existence those prophecies in the Bible about the South and our Confederacy. I'll talk with you any day about them as long as you like. No man, at least no Christian man, can study those prophecies and say they don't have reference to the Confederacy. But we won't talk about that now. Brother Juggins, will you favor me with a Bible?"

The Bible was found, dusted, and brought. Mrs. Juggins drew still nearer with her knitting.

"Brother Juggins," said the preacher, after he had found the place in the large, well-thumbed Bible, and putting on his pulpit manner as an Episcopal clergyman would put on his gown, "you often say you are a plain man. Well, you can understand a plain passage in the Bible."

"That passage in Timothy?" inquired the Colonel.

"I know we've been over it often before," said the preacher, "but we can hardly have too much of the Bible, I suppose. This book was given to guide us. Brother Juggins? Sister Juggins?" Very solemnly. The persons in question nodded a hearty assent. "Now listen," continued the preacher, and he read, in a slow, solemn manner: "It's First Timothy, sixth chapter. 'Let as many servants as are under the yoke count their own masters worthy of all honor, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed.' Next verse isn't so much to the point. Next is: 'If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness.' That is, any thing against slavery he's just been speaking about. 'He,' that is, every Abolitionist, 'is proud, knowing nothing, but doing about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings, perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, supposing that gain is godliness.'"

"Now let us hold on one moment," said the preacher, closing the book, with his finger in the place. "I just ask you, Brother Juggins, Sister Juggins, isn't all that a description of the Northern people—the Abolitionists?"

"I suppose it is," said the planter for self and wife.

"What I say," added Mrs. Juggins, "is just this. Why can't them people stay at their own home, mind their own business, let us alone? We ain't got up where they live to trouble them."

"Exactly, Sister Juggins. But here's what I want to get at," continued the preacher. "This is the Word of God we're reading. It says 'all that of the Northern people plain and clean. Next it tells us exactly our duty toward them—it's as plain as any part of the Bible.' Listen:—and the preacher opened the Bible again, and, running his finger under the passage, read, very slowly and with prodigious emphasis, the rest of the verse, "'From—such—withdrew—thyself!'"

"Yes, just so; that was your sermon about Secession. I can't see how any thing can be clearer from Scripture than that," said the planter.

"Wait a moment, Brother Juggins; I'm not through yet. I want to ask you one plain question. Do you suppose God ever commands a man or a people to do any thing and then punish them, or permits any body else to punish them, for doing it?"

"No, Sir," said the planter.

"Well, we are beginning to see our way out, then. As you well know, Brother Juggins, the South was only obeying this direct command of God in withdrawing itself from the North and setting up for itself. A man is stone-blind who don't see that our Secession was the command of God. And here you are talking to me about Fort Donelson and Nashville," continued the preacher, becoming greatly excited, "frightened by the pursuing Egyptians, exactly like those Jews were, as if God did not command us to leave, as if God was not going with us in leaving! He lets Fort Donelson and Nashville be taken just to prove us and to try us, as he said to the Jews, and I'd like to know how we are standing the trial. He gave us that great victory at Manassas just to show us, in a way we couldn't help seeing if we was to try to, that God was with us. But what's the result? People forget God, say we did it all ourselves; we're waxing fat and kicking, and now He is letting us be whipped a little just to show who it is that raised up one and casteth down another."

"I liked mightyly what you said in your last sermon, Brother Barker," remarked the planter, after a pause of ramination; "all that about the hearts of the kings bein' in the hand of the Lord to turn about as he pleased. Only I wish England and France would make haste and show some of it. Them Powers have been just goin' to acknowledge the Confederacy every paper I've read since we set it up; somehow they hain't done it yet—"

"Brother Juggins," interrupted the preacher, in a sad tone, "it was hard to wean you from your old notions about that old Union in the first place; it was like drawing your eye-teeth, you know; and now that you are on the right track it is awful work to keep you to it. It's true, we have been acknowledged by England and the rest before now, if we only knew it, or soon will be; but, don't you see, it's wrong in us to look to them so much. Trusting in Assyria and going down into Egypt will be just our sin, as it was the sin of God's other peculiar people. I tell you now, we're going to get it worse and worse from the North till we learn to trust only in the Lord. I believe you know I've had some experiences in religion—real, warm experiences; you want to know what is my strongest experience now—the religious feeling which happens me most?"

"It is that we here at the South are God's chosen people. Promises of Scripture have come out to me plain before now; but I just tell you this, nothing in the lids of this book has ever stood out from the page so plain to me as that. The North has gone off into Free-Loving, Garrisonism, Mormonism, Spiritualism, and that worst and blackest of all kinds of infidelity—Abolitionism. There was some religion there once; but that makes it worse—it's apostasy the North has fallen into, deep-reaching, wide-spreading, universal apostasy—and God has just given them over to it. But he has rescued the South—he has called us out. If there's one single Jew here at the South I never saw it—not even Universalism. Talk to me! Can't you see that you may as well give up all the Bible if you give up what it says on our side? God on our side? The God I worship! He to help those people who have apostatized from him! I'm as certain this day he's on our side as I am there is any God. As a just Lord he can't help those people—can't do it! Look at the Jews! Don't you see how he punished their enemies with sword, fire, pestilence, famine, and the like. If those poor, miserable, blinded Yankees only knew it—the rain that is coming upon them from his hand! I never felt so gray for a revival in my life as I've felt to pray for their defeat and destruction. It's the Lord in me! Ever since they broke up our Church there in New York, in the General Conference of forty-four, the Church South has been praying and penning for this Confederacy. Glory to his name, he has heard our prayer! For one, I'll trust him for the rest!"

But it would be unreasonable to suppose we can record all that Brother Barker said. A small, pale man was Brother Barker, with thin, lank, black hair combed back off of his low and narrow forehead. Were you to see him in a crowd his small and stooped form promised little of the tremendous powers of speech possessed by him. There was a peculiar thickness and heaviness about his eyelids which gave an additional aspect of dullness to the man. Yet, let Brother Barker get fairly into the stand, and fully under way in a sermon, brighter and brighter grew his eyes, faster and faster flew his arms, and words rushed to his lips faster than he could deliver them. Like most of his denomination, the disruption of his Church in 1844 had begun in his bosom an alienation of feeling from the North which had steadily increased ever since disruption had followed in the other denominations; but Brother Barker's Church was decidedly in the lead, as it was the first in the agitation.

Perhaps not a member or minister of the Church itself dreamed how deeply and thoroughly it was leavened in the matter. The act of Secession revealed an earnestness and intensity of alienation in the denomination to the North which surprised the Southern politicians as much as it gratified them. Bishops, presiding elders, preachers, papers, it was a powerful organization ready to the work—in their eyes a religious work. As with every religious body the feeling was deeper and stronger than any merely political body of men ever know. Even the most heated politicians saw themselves utterly disunited by the almost frenzied zeal of such men as Brother Barker. It was not only heart, it was soul these threw into it. And no one can estimate the immense power exerted by such men in all the denominations at the South.

Accustomed to receive as religious truth every thing coming from such a source; impressed, and which is far from being the popular feeling in regard to the politicians, with the disinterested, heart-felt sincerity of their spiritual guides; aware of the moral purity, too, of these, no wonder the masses of the South were so moved by the unceasing efforts of their ministers. No one at all familiar with the South but knows that the Southern clergy accomplished more for Secession than all other instrumentalities combined. By far the ablest arguments and the most eloquent appeals for Secession were from ministers; and what the mass of inferior ministers lacked in ability and eloquence in the pulpit and by the press they more than made up by their universal, incessant, and eager influence during the week, and the power of, at least, their public prayers on the Sabbath.

Assuming as impregnable that theological foundation for slavery which the last thirty or forty years has seen evolved from Scripture, those among the Secessionists who were believers in the Bible planted themselves thereupon as upon rock—making thereupon and therefrom their confident appeal to God for success. And since the universe afforded no other conceivable ground to stand upon in the matter, the pious were not the only ones to avow this as their position. Multitudes who never opened the Bible had awful reverence for this one divine institution if for no other decreed therein. Avowed infidels, too, accepted eagerly so much of Sacred Writ as proved slavery right, even though they scouted all the remainder as fable. And it is a fact worth recording, that, as a universal thing, the right and the wrong of the whole movement settled down, amidst a thousand side considerations, unanimously into this. The abiding of the appeal made to God in battle upon this point, in case it was decided against the institution, was a contingency which never entered the mind—no anticipation of or provision for that. History furnishes no instance of men more absolutely confident of the aid of Heaven. The nearest parallel to their confidence in history is seen in the case of the Zealots in Jerusalem at its bloody fall. Ah, direct of all infatuation to count with such confidence that Almighty God is upon our side when He is—not!

THE BONE MAN OF HONSTONIC.

In a recess beside the great west door of the church of Honstonic, in Bohemia, stood for many generations a gaunt skeleton, its skull drooping on the breast, and the hands folded as though in prayer. Immediately before it was the tomb of a noble family once residing in the neighborhood, but now extinct.

The strange attitude of the skeleton fixed the idea in the popular mind that the Bone Man prayed without ceasing to a dead woman who lay in the vault before him. Several times was the skeleton gazed upon by the people, and under the great and in the church-yard, but on the following morning those who came to early mass saw the grave open and the turf fiddled back, and within the sacred building stood, as before, the white Bone Man with drooping head and folded hands, at the vault door. And well might he be condemned by the judgment of God to stand thus, year by year, before the tomb, for long ago he had been a lawless knight, a strong not God, nor regarding man, and he had come in his wanderings to Honstonic, where he had seen the Lily of Honstonic, the only daughter of the nobleman who then inhabited the castle whose ruins are now the haunt of the owl, and he had leapt the Lily to shame and to an early death. When the old lord in anger slew him his corpse would not rest in its grave, but rose, and stationed itself at the head of the tomb, with the dim eyes fixed on the sepulchral stone which hid the Lily, and there he awaited his release. The corpse became a skeleton, centuries rolled by, and still that release had not been effected. But one morning those who went to church found the niche empty, and the skeleton had crumbled into a little heap of gray dust. How this was effected I will relate, as the Bohemian peasantry tell the tale.

One night there was uproar in the tavern of Honstonic; three leechers, with their pockets full of money, had been drinking and gambling all day, and purposed continuing the same amusements all night. Their drunken shouts and laughter continued till long after every house in the village was closed and every light extinguished.

They were waited upon by a servant girl who had been deserted by her husband, and who had but lately, for the first time, become a mother. By her poverty she had been driven into service. Many a rude and ugly joke at her expense was made by the tipsy men, but she remained silent, modestly and patiently waiting on them without speaking more than was necessary.

As she came out of the cellar with full pitcher, one of the brothers said to her, laughing:

"Well, my girl! I suppose you are busy making clothes for the baby, eh?"

"Ah, Sir!" she replied; "I have not the material of which to make them; would that I had! The poor little lamb will need them, indeed!"

"I'll tell you what," said the second brother, shaking his head drunkenly; "you must earn the money to buy them, and the cradle, too."

"Only too willingly, Sir!"

"Well, I don't mind giving you the money," continued the thoughtless fellow; "if you will do something for it."

"Any thing which is not beyond my strength," said the girl, eagerly, as her cheek flushed with hope; "tell me what I am to do, and I will do it."

"Nothing very difficult, my girl, no-thing ve-ry dif-f-icult," quoth the intoxicated man; and then, with a burst of laughter, he said, looking round to his brothers for applause, "you shall fetch me the skeleton which stands at the church door! Eh, lady, she shall do that, shan't she; and we will pay her?"

The maid recoiled in horror, and her cheek blanched.

"Oh, Sir!" she said, faintly, "do not make a mock of me in my misery, and tempt God with such profanities!"

But the other brothers praised him who had made the offer, and drawing their purses from their pockets they poured out thalers and groschens, and made of them a small pile in the middle of the table.

"There!" shouted they, "fetch us the Bone Man, and you shall have this as a baptismal gift for your fat."

The poor girl trembled in every limb; she looked at the money and then at the red, heated faces of the drunken men, and she knew not what to say. That little pile of silver would, indeed, be a god-send to her—but at what a cost was it to be won? She thought of the gloomy church-yard, and the solemn church, shrouded in darkness, and of the skeleton standing in the wall niche before the tomb.

"Come, you must not be long making up your mind," said the eldest of the brothers; "we do not make such offers more than once."

"Let me have two minutes to decide," she begged, looking once more at the money, and then, flying to her chamber, she bent over her little one and kissed it. "Any thing for thee, my poor one!" she sighed; "and if it be a sin, may God in His mercy pardon me." Then, after having crossed herself, she returned to the parlor and agreed to do what the three men required.

As she left the tavern all was dark, a keen wind blew over the country, beneath a still, star-spangled, cloudless sky; it wafted among the eaves of the houses, and tossed the autumn leaves about in the square of the little town. The church stood on a rise; as the young woman approached it her heart beat faster.

She opened the church-yard gate as the evening bell tinkled; she stood still, and recited her "Ave Maria" with fervor, then stepped out of sight, to allow the sexton to return without observing her. The old man, bent double with age, went coughing from the grave-yard to his bed, and she remained alone among the dead. For some moments a struggle raged within her; she shuddered at the prospect of what she had to do, and felt disposed to return to the inn, but love for her babe prevailed, and she walked up the path leading to the church door.

And now there was a feeble glimmer in the east, and the new moon peeped above the horizon; and she shuddered as she stepped into the shadow of a mulberry-tree which grew in the church-yard.

She turned the handle of the door, and the latch flew up with a noise which was echoed through the vaults and aisles of the church. A feeble, rosy glow from the lamp burning before the Blessed Sacrament gleamed on the altar, but a white moonbeam through a low window fell along the west wall, bringing out the skull and folded hands as frosted silver, in strong relief against the ebon gloom of the recess in which stood the Bone Man of Hostonic. As the frightened girl looked on the skeleton it seemed to her as though the fleshless mouth moved in prayer, and as though a blue flame flickered in the eye-sockets.

The girl summoned up all her courage, grasped the skeleton, flung it upon her back, and ran through the church-yard, passed the gate, flew with her rattling load across the market-place, dashed into the tavern, cast the Bone Man on the table, and, sinking on to a bench, burst into a flood of tears.

A silence fell upon those in the room; all looked with a shudder at the heap of bones, and then with astonishment at the girl. Even the three brothers recoiled from the skeleton as it was flung before them; the courage of the maid amazed them; they had reckoned on her turning back at the church-yard gate, and had calculated on jolting her on the failure of her courage.

But the eldest, staggering to his feet, said: "I tell you all, the lass has well earned her money. She shall have it, and sit down by us and have a drop of something to warm her too."

In the mean while the girl had somewhat recovered herself, and she was called to the table to give an account of her expedition. But she, still pale with fear, only replied to their questions with: "God saved me from any thing very terrible; but, as I carried the skeleton, it seemed to me as though some one were following. Not for any money would I do it again."

"But what is to be done with the Bone Man?" asked one of the brothers; "he can not remain here, and I daren't take him back."

"Nor I," said the second.

"And I am quite sure," hiccupped the third, "that I couldn't walk as far."

"The skeleton must go back, that is positive," said the first; "we shall get into trouble if it is found here."

"Then let her who brought it take it back," thundered out the second with an oath.

The maid, shuddering at the thought of having to make the horrible expedition again, exclaimed, "That was not part of our agreement. I have kept my portion of the contract, and you have said yourself that I have earned the money."

"So you have, my girl, so you have, undoubtedly," said the fellow, "but here—here we don't want to have a skeleton lying about our glasses, and under our very noses, while we are making merry. It takes it itself to its proper place, were my legs steady enough, and my conscience clear. We will give you more money, if you will replace the Bone Man in his old position in Hostonic Church."

"Oh, Sir!" gasped the maid, "I can not, indeed! I swore that I never would tempt God like this again for the love of gold."

"Now shall you," quoth the toper; "not a groshen shall you get from any of us, if you do as we bid you; but this will I promise—I have no children of my own, and I will pay for the education of your little babe when it is old enough to go to school, and I will call these comrades here to witness that the lad shall not be wronged in my will."

The maid looked with trembling at the hideous object which speared across the table. Her breast heaved, she folded her hands in prayer and closed her eyes. The agitation of her feelings, and the battle of conflicting passions, were clearly traceable on her countenance. Suddenly her face became calm.

"As you wish," she said, resolutely, "it is God's will. Yours be the sin, and you will have to answer for it."

As she spoke she lifted the clattering frame of bones, and slung it on her back. Firstly grasping her load, she wrapt forth into the night, and none ventured to follow her.

Would you know the cause of the girl's courage? As she had prayed, an idea shot into her brain as an inspiration from God, that she should dedicate her child to the church; she took the thought as a revelation of Divine will, and vowed there and then to offer her little one to God, if He would protect her on her expedition.

She traversed the market-place with her clattering burden, and began to ascend the hill, scarcely hearing the rattle made by the bones, for she had become used to the sound.

But as she neared the grave-yard the weight of her load became greater and greater, and the burden bowed her down. This she did not observe at first, as her senses were in a whirl of confusion, but, at the lych gate, it became so evident that she was filled with overwhelming horror. In crossing the church-yard she sank repeatedly to her knees, all but prostrated beneath the load which seemed to weigh a hundred-weight. It was with a desperate effort that she ascended into the church, reached the niche, and tried to shake off her awful burden. With unspeakable horror she found that this was now beyond her power, for the fingers had interlaced upon her bosom, and the arms held her as in a vice.

A voice like the moaning of wind through distant trees rushed into her ear, and a chill breath stirred over her cheek.

"I will not let thee go till thou swearest to obtain pardon for me from her below. Descend into the vault and pray for me."

Every hair on the poor girl's head stiffened, and a cold sweat broke out upon her brow. She shivered as a leaf in the wind, and was unable to articulate a word in reply.

"Wilt thou do my will?" asked the voice, and the maid felt the hands tightening their grasp, and heard the creaking of the bone fingers against each other.

"I will!" gasped she in her deadly fear. The fingers fell apart with a click, and the burden slipped from her shoulders. She turned and looked at the skeleton. A dim and phantom life seemed to animate its countenance; there was an expression of wondrous eagerness in the fleshless face, and a shiver of anxiety vibrating through the bony limbs. The jaws stirred, and the same strange voice rushed into the girl's ear.

"Lift the stone from the vault door, and go down the steps. You will find at the bottom a woman in black, sitting in her coffin, by lamplight reading a book. Plead with her for pardon. Till she pardons me I can find no forgiveness with God."

The maid obeyed. She lifted the slab from its place by the iron ring which was riveted into it, it rose at her touch, and disclosed a steep flight of stone steps.

With swimming brain the girl descended into the vault. At the further end burned a dim flame. A soft cool air leaved over her cheek. As she reached the lowest step she looked round. The vault was capacious, with groined roof supported by huge drums of Romanesque pillars. A feeble glimmer irradiated it. On all sides were stone coffins with armorial bearings sculptured upon them. On some lay withered wreaths of flowers, on other corroded swords or helmets. The light by which all this was rendered visible proceeded from the small saffron flame of a lamp suspended in the centre of the vault over an open sarcophagus. There, draped in black, in her stone coffin, with her pale face supported on her hand, her head surrounded with a garland of faded roses, sat a woman reading out of a large book which lay open on her lap. The maid approached her with vacillating steps, and bent the knee before her. Not a motion in the solemn reading figure. The white face was not raised, nor the shadowed eyes lifted from the pages of the book.

With faltering voice the girl besought forgiveness for the Bone Man. No answer. The woman in the coffin seemed to be unconscious of the presence of a living being before her. More earnestly pleaded the maid, her heart beating, and a deep anxiety to obtain the knight's release, filling her compassionate bosom. She called to the woman's remembrance her old love for the knight, the deep sorrow which he had endured for so many ages, and finding deprived of rest b'fore her tomb.

The reading woman shook her head without raising her eyes.

With heavy heart the girl retraced her steps, despairing of obtaining any thing from the lady in the vault. At the top of the stair stood the Bone Man bathed in pure moonlight, an expression of agonized expectation on his face, every bone clattering with emotion.

"Am I forgiven?"

"She has not forgiven you," answered the maid, in a scarcely audible voice.

"Back, back into the vault, and plead till you have obtained my pardon."

I would have spoken, but the skeleton raised its hand and pointed peremptorily toward the vault, and the girl felt constrained to obey. Fear now disappeared, and she felt the warm blood flow into her cheek as evenly as though she were at home rocking her babe.

Again she knelt to the woman in black, and prayed with fervor for the Bone Man. She pleaded by the hopes of salvation, the mercy of God, the Redeemer's wounds; her tears fell on the sepulchral floor; she wrung her hands, and sobbed broke the thread of her prayer. Still the pale woman remained unmoved; still did she read in the great book without raising her eyes to the weeping petitioner before her, and only at intervals shook her head. An hour passed thus; the girl clasped the rim of the sarcophagus, and writhed in the vehemence of her supplication on the pavement. There was no change in the pallid woman, save that the wreath about her temples had shed its withered leaves, and had broken into tiny fresh buds.

Faint and weary, despairing of success, the poor girl again retraced her steps to the upper world. The skeleton was at the top, leaning forward in breathless eagerness, and gray hair spread over its ghastly face.

"Has she forgiven me?"

The maid sadly shook her head.

"Back again," moaned the strange voice; "without you I can not obtain pardon. If you can not procure my release I am accursed forever. Quick! midnight is long past, and all must be decided before cock-crow."

The trembling bony hands were wrung in bitterness of distress.

Once more the maid descended. The same scene was re-enacted. Again she supplicated, and again for all answer she obtained was the shake of the pale woman's head. The girl had pleaded by the name of every thing sacred, and had failed, she seemed to have nothing left by which to plead, but, with her head on the cold floor in the exhaustion of her hope, she asked for pardon for the knight in the name of her own little new-born babe.

At the word the great book was closed, the pale woman looked up, and a flush ran over her face, the wreath of roses around her head burst into a glorious white flower, filling the vault with exquisite fragrance.

"For the sake of thy little babe he is pardoned," said the woman. Then she sank back in her coffin, the great book fell closed on her breast, the lid shut down with a clash, and the lamp went out.

The maid hurried above with joyous heart, guided by the patch of silver which the moon cast on the topmost step.

"She has pardoned you!" she cried, as she saw the white face glancing down to her.

The voice which replied was soft as the murmur of a summer breeze among the ferns.

"You have done well in asking in behalf of an innocent child. In my life spared not innocence, and God sentenced me to find no rest till in the name of an innocent child I could obtain release."

The skeleton knelt toward the Blessed Sacrament, before which burned the sanctuary lamp.

"Glorify be to God!" he said, and extended his fleshless arms, and his jaws moved in prayer and thanksgiving.

The girl looked at him, kneeling in the glory of the moon, and a sweetness and calm settled over the face, directing it of all that was dreadful. Softly and almost imperceptibly he seemed to melt away, with the peaceful and beautiful expression on the uplifted countenance steadily brightening, and when the crowing of the cock rang out sharply through the night air the Bone Man of Hostonic was a little heap of dust.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

DARKNESS VISITING.—You individuals were investigating against the bad lighting of Brooklyn. "It's infamous!" exclaimed one. "Why, look at that gas. I declare it's quite black." "Yes, you may say, lamp-black," rejoined his companion. "And jet-black, too," he quickly added in the next denunciation. And the witty pair disappeared in the gloomy distance laughing. It was evident that with them, at least, the brightness of their humor made some atonement for the darkness of the streets.

JOURNEYING ON THE PLAINS.

There are many things which at this time draw our attention toward the GRAND OVERLAND STAGE ROUTE across the plains of Kansas, Colorado, Utah, and Nevada, to California, making it a subject of intense popular interest. One of these things is the Pacific Railroad project, in which there is now so lively an interest—the route proposed for that road being very nearly identical with the Overland Route. The recent trip of Speaker COLMAN and his party "across the continent" by the Overland Route is also attracting attention to the route itself. And, finally, the raids of the Indians upon parties journeying by this route across the plains have added a tragic interest to the subject. We publish on this page and on page 56 several illustrations relating both to the rail route and to the proposed railway line from Atchison to Pike's Peak. This proposed railway line, together with that from Aspinwall to Panama, which we illustrate on page 61, are characteristic of the energy and enterprise of the American people.

THE EASTERN TRAVELER OF BUTTERFIELD'S

THE OVERLAND COACH OFFICE, DENVER CITY, COLORADO.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

Overland Stage Route (of which BEN HOLLIDAY is sole proprietor) was removed in 1861 from St. Joseph to Atchison. This latter place, the eastern post of our Eastern railway system, is situated in the northern corner of Kansas, along some broken bluffs on the west bank of the Missouri River, 300 miles from St. Louis, and 20 miles below St. Joseph, the metropolis of Northern Missouri. It coincides with St. Joseph and Leavenworth by railway, is the headquarters of the Overland Stage Company, and is also one of the chief points on the border for the transportation, from cars and steamboats to wagons, of all sorts of stores bound to the mines of Colorado, Idaho, Montana, and Utah. Atchison is pre-eminently the border town of the West, and is memorable for its connection with the dark days of Kansas history. It was first settled by a band of ruffians of the worst type with STANFORD at their head. New England proved too much for the ruffians, however, and one morning Atchison awoke a Puritanic town, having gone to bed the night before with strong Southern proclivities. The town has prospered ever since.

The daily line of the Overland Mail Route leaves Atchison at 8 o'clock a.m. This line employs over one hundred coaches, about one thousand horses, five hundred mules, and seven hundred and fifty men. The distance of the entire route, before it meets the projecting arms of the California railways at Placerville, is about two thousand miles. To Denver City the distance is six hundred miles, and is accomplished in fifty-nine stages of about ten miles each. It takes five days to reach Denver, twice that time to make the journey to Salt Lake, and seventeen days to reach Placerville, California.

The Indians have made such havoc on the Plains during the past year that food for man or beast has been very scarce, and the Overland Company has been very much crippled on this account, making the grain with which it feeds its horses some eight dollars per bushel. The Company has also lost about half a million in buildings, grain, and stock by the Indians, and another half a million, probably, from the similar loss in consequence of raids by "the noble red men of the forest." Upon General CROMBIE devolves the important duty of taking care of the Indians on the Plains. Among the limited number of troops of his command are two regiments of infantry, all from the rebel army. They cheerfully re-enlisted into the national army, calling themselves "galvanized Yankees." It was only last spring that General CROMBIE'S protection was extended to the Overland Route.

The Butterfield Overland Dispatch coaches are frequently exposed to an encounter with the Indians. An event of this kind took place in November on the route between Chalky Bluff Station and Denver. Information had just been received of depredations and murders committed on the Smoky Hill route by a band of Indians supposed to be Cheyennes, under the lead of "FAIR BEAN," when, on the 23d of November, the Overland Dispatch coach left Chalky Bluff Station with a small escort of cavalry. Among the passengers were General BENTLEY and our special artist, Mr. THOMPSON R. DAVIS.

The coach reached Monument without any adventure, and left that station on the morning of the 24th, accompanied by an ambulance under the charge of Sergeant N. C. WHIFFLE. So little danger was apprehended that only an escort of eight men was considered necessary, three of whom were in the ambulance with WHIFFLE, while five mounted as a ride in advance of the coach. The coach had nearly reached the next station when the ambulance driver took a short cut, which did not pass the station but which joined the main road a mile further on. The encounter which followed is thus described by the Times correspondent:

"When within fifteen hundred yards of the station, Mr. DAVIS, of Harper's Weekly, discovered that a squad of fifteen Indians were charging down on us. Having seen give the alarm and opened on the red skins with his full rifle, which performance was immediately imitated by General BENTLEY, Mr. HAYSTACK, and Year Gen. Mr. PERKINS doing duty with his revolver from the outside of the coach. As we were all armed with Ballard guns, we have the party of quite as fast as they came, two of them bearing witness of our rapidity in the shape of a bullet-shaped hole in their side. The driver of our coach was not waiting in shock, but quickly drove his team to the station. We left the coach at once, and discovered that another party of Indians had rushed in among the horses and made them start, galloping down the hill. One of the stockmen had started at the first alarm to call the mules that were grazing near the station; one of the Indians discovered him and gave chase just as we got out of the coach. Mr. DAVIS showed his aim and started with his rifle to kill the stockman. The Indian drew an arrow from the bundle, especially relating him, when a bullet from Mr. DAVIS's rifle ended the Indian's performance and the Indian at the same moment. The stockman was shot but the stock safe, and with it five horses belonging to the cavalry stationed at this point. The party consisted of ten men of the Thirtieth Missouri Cavalry. Five of the men were away on a Buffalo hunt, so saved their skins."

In the mean time the ambulance was pursued by some fifteen or twenty Indians, and the four cavalymen were dispatched to its assistance. The party in the ambulance, after a leave-taking, left their wagon and retreated toward the cavalry sent to their aid, and thus escaped with safety. The whole party now brought together numbered twenty-one men, all well armed, but they were surrounded by Indians on all sides. In this critical situation they resorted to a bomb-proof which the garrison at Smoky Hill Station had dug in the hillside, where they determined to await the arrival of the Government train with its strong infantry escort, due the next day. No serious attempt was made by the Indians upon this bomb-proof, and the next day the Government train arrived, and after a slight skirmish with the red men the whole party proceeded on to Denver.

Denver is the leading town of Colorado, and lies under the very shadow of the Rocky Mountains, a few miles north of Pike's Peak. The vast tracts of "prairie schooners," as the tented wagons seen in our sketches are called, give the place an appearance of activity. And indeed, the amount of business transacted in Denver is wonderful, when the small number of inhabitants is considered. The Exposition now on is crowded with miners in all sorts of costumes, bringing their bags of "dust" to exchange for greenbacks, the dust being sold at so much per ounce. It is not an uncommon thing for barrels of gold dust to accumulate in the safes of the principal bankers.

"PEACE ON EARTH."

By THOMAS HOOPER, M.P. FOR LAMBETH.

THE last time that the season of "peace on earth and good will to men" came round, the great struggle between the free and slave powers in America had not yet come to death-grips. Here, at least, many people still believed that the Southern States could not be subdued, and were sure sooner or later to establish their independence, and a new polity which would set for the rest of time as a health corrective to the dangerously popular institutions and ideas of New England. The year has passed, and the great revolutionary epic of our time has closed. Perhaps some of us may still stop short of Mr. Sewall's triumphant summing up: "Death," he says in his yearly address to his fellow-citizens of Auburn, "death has removed his victims. Liberty has crowned her heroes; humanity has crowned her martyrs; the sick and the stricken are cured; the inveterate combatants are fraternizing; and the country—the object of our just pride and lawful affection—once more stands collected and composed, firmer, stronger, and more majestic than ever before, without one cause of dangerous discontent at home, and without an enemy in the world." We may think him somewhat too hopeful in the breadth of his assertions, and may have our fears that it may take a generation yet to weld again into one brotherhood all the States of the Union. But, when he predicts so fearlessly that "under next October's sun he shall be alive, with his fellow-townsmen in Auburn, to rejoice in the restoration of peace, harmony, and union throughout the land," we can not but own that earlier prophecies of his, which seemed at least as rash, have been fulfilled almost to the letter. In any case, we do all willingly now admit, and honor, the marvelous energy and constancy with which the great cause has been played out by the American people. As soon of the many Englishmen whose faith in that people never faltered during the contest, I do most heartily rejoice to see that all classes of my countrymen are at last not only ready to appreciate, but hearty in their appreciation of, what has been done for freedom in America in this revolutionary war. I am sure that we now only want further knowledge of facts to honor our kith and kin across the Atlantic as they deserve to be honored, for the glorious sacrifices which they made of all that was most precious and dearest to them in a struggle upon which not only their own life as a nation, but the future of at least one-third of the world, was at stake.

In this belief, I think that Christmas is the right time for bringing out into somewhat clearer light a side of the drama which has not been as yet fairly presented to us here. I mean, first, the aims on the resources of the Northern States while the war lasted, and, secondly, the bearing of the men of gentle birth and nurture, who, so far from shrinking from the work, and fighting by substitute (as was asserted by some of our leading journals), took at least their fair share of all the dangers and miseries and toils of those dark years.

First, then, as to the people's work: and, highly as we may value the men who have come to the front, and whose names as soldiers and statesmen are now known over the whole world, we must acknowledge that the true hero of the war is, after all, the American people. In proof of this I will take one or two of the Northern States, and look for a moment at what the call was which was made on them, and how they answered to it. Let us look, as a first instance, at the smallest in area of all the States, and the smallest in population of all the free States. Little Rhode Island, at the census of 1860, just before the breaking out of the war, contained a population of 174,026. As usual in the Eastern States, the females considerably exceeded the males, and of the latter there were 82,361 altogether. Up to December 1, 1862, — that is to say, in less than two years from the first call of the President for troops—Rhode Island furnished 11,626 men to the army and 1400 to the navy, or almost 1 in 5 of her total male population, and, of course, far more than that proportion of her men of fighting age, between 18 and 45. In the first enthusiasm, when the call for 500,000 men came in the summer of 1861, the quota of Rhode Island was 4067, and she furnished 5124. I do not give the later returns, because there appears to have been a large number of substitutes among her recruits after 1862, and I have no means of knowing whether these were or were not natives of the State. There is no need to overstate the case, and I should, on every account, shrink from doing so. Rhode Island, though the smallest, is tenth in rank of all the States as a producer, and her people are consequently rich and prosperous. If, in the later years of the war, they found substitutes in large numbers, it must be, at the same time, remembered that they contributed more largely than any other State, in proportion to numbers, to that noblest of all charities—the Sanitary Commission.

But Englishmen will very likely say, "Give us an instance of any but a New England State: they are exceptional." Let us take Indiana, then, one of the mighty young Western States, a community scarcely half a century old. A strong contrast to Rhode Island could scarcely have been found. Indiana, in 1860, possessed 8,161,717 acres of improved farming land; Rhode Island but 829,864. Indiana was fifth of all the States in agricultural production, and thirteenth in manufacturing—Rhode Island standing tenth, or three higher than her gigantic younger sister. Yet we find the same readiness of response to the President's call to arms among Western farmers as among New England mechanics and merchants. The population of Indiana is reckoned in the census of 1860 at 1,826,428, and her males at 880,460. On the 31st of December, 1862, she had furnished 102,686 soldiers, besides a militia home-guard when her frontiers were threatened. When Morgan made his raid into the State 60,000 tendered their services within twenty-four hours, and nearly 20,000 were on his track within three days. I do not happen, in this case, to have the later returns, and so must turn back to New England, to the old Puritan Bay State, to give one perfect example of what the American people did in the great struggle.

Massachusetts, at the outbreak of the war, had a population of 1,200,000 or thereabouts, out of which there were 257,835 males between the ages of 15 and 40. The first blood shed in the war against the slave power, as in the Revolutionary war against England, was Massachusetts blood. The 6th Massachusetts was fired on in the streets of Baltimore on April 19, 1861, and had to fight its way through the town, losing 4 killed and 20 wounded in the operation. Well, the number of men demanded of Massachusetts during the war was 117,624. The number furnished by her (reducing all to the three years' standard) was 125,487, being a surplus over all calls of 7813. Besides these 6750 were mustered in answer to a call for three months' men in 1864, which were never credited to her by the Government. Look at the meaning now of this other fact, that she has actually sent more men to the war than are now to be found in the State liable to do military duty. How does this tell as to war and to the human material in those Southern campaigns? The last assessors' return gave 138,767; while the total number who served (including three and nine months' men, and not adhering to the three years' standard) was 155,486. Out of these how many does the reader (who has probably heard more or less of "stopping the war by prohibiting emigration from Ireland," and of "New England hiring foreign mercenaries to do the fighting") think were foreign recruits? Just 907. This does not include men born out of the States, but resident or naturalized there before the war broke out. These latter, however, I suppose, could not come within the definition of foreign mercenaries; and of foreigners arriving in America during the war, Massachusetts enlisted, as I have said, 907 out of 150,000. While on this point, I may add that the most reliable statistics as to the whole forces of the North show that of native-born Americans there were nearly 80 per cent., of naturalized Americans 15, and of foreigners 5 per cent. only, in the ranks.

I can honestly say that I have chosen these States at hazard, and that a scrutiny of the remaining free States would give a very similar result. And now let us consider what that result is. Rhode Island, Indiana, and Massachusetts may perhaps equal in population this metropolis with its immediate suburbs; while one of them alone actually sent to active service, in the four years of the war, an army equal in numbers to the total volunteer force now under arms in Great Britain. Rhode Island is not so populous as Sheffield, and in eighteen months she armed and sent South 15,000 of her citizens. I know that England in like need would be equal to a like effort. Let us honor, then, all they deserve the people of our own lineage to whom the call has come, and who have met it.

I need scarcely pause to note how the Northern people have paid in purse as well as in person. Let one instance suffice. In 1864 the assessment of Massachusetts for taxes to support the general government amounted to fourteen millions, every fraction of which was collected without impediment or delay. Add to this the State taxation, and the amounts contributed to the Senate and Commission and other organizations for distributing voluntary contributions in support of the war, and we should reach a figure almost exceeding belief. I have no means of stating it accurately, but am quite safe in putting it as high as 25,000,000 dollars, actually raised and paid, by a State with a population less than half of that of our metropolis, in one twelvemonth.

And now for my second point—the example set by the men of birth, wealth, and high position. Here too I feel sure that a few simple facts, taken at hazard from the mass which I have under my hand, will be more than enough to satisfy every just and generous man among my countrymen, and I am proud to believe that, whatever our prejudices may be, there are few indeed among us to whom such an appeal will be made in vain.

I have said above that the mass of materials is large, I might have said unmanageable. It is, indeed, impossible to take more than an example here and there, and to bring these out as clearly as one can in the limits of an article. Let me take as mine a family or two, with some one or more of whose members I have the honor of friendship or acquaintance. And, first, that of J. Russell Lowell, the man to whose works I owe more, personally than to those of any other American. It would be hard to find a nobler record. The young men of this stock seem to have been all of high mark, distinguished specially for intellectual power and attainments. Surely the saddle of war has never been put more unsporingly into any field. First in order comes Wilbur Putnam, age 21, the sole surviving son of Lowell's sister, a boy of the highest culture and promise, mortally wounded at Ball's Bluff in October, 1861, in the first months of the war while in the act of going to the help of a wounded comrade. At the same bitter fight his cousin, James Jackson Lowell, aged 24, was badly hurt, but, after a short absence to recruit, joined his regiment again and fell on June 30, 1862. "Tell my father I was dressing the line of my company when I was hit," was his last message home. He had been first in his year at Harvard, and was taking private pupils in the law school when the war broke out. Warren Russell fell at Ball's Bluff, in August, 1862. Many of us here may remember the account, which was reprinted in the Times and a bar paper, of the presentation of colors to the 2d Massachusetts Infantry, by Mr. May, at Boston, in the summer of 1861. It attracted special notice from the fact that the author of the "History of the Dutch Republic" had been so lately living among us, and was so well known and liked here. The group of officers who received those colors were the very jeunesse d'ore of Massachusetts—Quincy, Dwight, Albee, Robinson, Russel, Shaw, Gordon, Savage, Perkins. Such a roll will speak volumes to all who have any acquaintance with New England history. These colors have come home riddled, tattered, blackened, but five-sixths of the young officers have given their lives for them, and of the 1000 rank and file who then surrounded them scarcely 150 survive. This by-the-way. I refer to the matter, because Robert Shaw was among those officers—a name already honored in these pages, and another nephew of Lowell's. Shaw's sister married Charles Lowell, of whom more presently. We all know how Robert Shaw, after two years' gallant service, accepted the command of the first black regiment raised in Massachusetts (the 54th), how he led them in the operations before Charleston, and was buried with his "niggers" in the pit under Fort Wagner—the grandest sepulture earned by any soldier of this century. By his side fought and died Cabot Russell, the third of Lowell's nephews, then a captain of a black company. Stephen George Perkins, another nephew, was killed at Cedar Creek; and Francis Dutton Russell at one of the innumerable Virginia battles.

I pass to the last on the list, and the most remarkable. Charles Russell Lowell, the only teacher of the James who died "dressing his line," was also the first scholar of his year (1834) at Harvard. He had visited Europe for health, and made long rifting-tours in Spain and Algeria, where he became a consummate horseman. On the day after the 6th Massachusetts were fired on in Baltimore streets, Charles Lowell heard of it, and started by the next train to Washington, passing through Baltimore. All communication between the two cities was suspended, but he arrived on foot at Washington in forty-eight hours. In the first days of confusion he became agent for Massachusetts at Washington, and brought order out of chaos for his own State before joining the army. His powers of command and organization gained him rapid promotion. He served with distinction in the Peninsula campaigns of McClellan, and, after Antietam, was selected to carry the captured standards to Washington. He raised a second cavalry regiment at home in the winter of 1862. He was placed in command of the cavalry force which protected Washington during the dark days of 1863. In Sheridan's brilliant campaign of 1864 he commanded the cavalry brigade of four regular regiments, and the 2d Massachusetts volunteer cavalry. He had thirteen horses shot under him before the battle of Cedar Creek, on October 19; was badly wounded early in that day, and lifted on to his fourteenth horse to lead the final charge, so faint, that he had to give his orders in a whisper. Urged by those round him to leave the field, he pressed on to the critical point of attack; and himself led the last charge which ended one of the most obstinate battles of the war. It is the death of this nephew which wrung from his uncle the lines which occur in one of the last "Biglow Papers," published in one of last winter's numbers of the Athletic Magazine—

"What's needs to them where faith and truth
On War's red sections ring true youth;
Who ventured life and love, and youth
For the great prize of death in battle!
To him who, deadly hurt, again
Flashed on after the charge's thunder,
Tiptoe with fire in his look of man
That rived the rebel line's shoulder!"

"'Tis right to let the young go first,
All the while full of the red and green,
Leaving life's papers dry as dust—
To try and make 'em fill their places;
Noting but tells us what we miss:
There's a good son lives can't never say in,
As that world seems so far from this,
Let for us leaders to grow gray in."

He died next day of his wounds, leaving a widow of twenty, himself not thirty. The Good-Bye, in which his commission as general was published, did not reach the army till after his death. Sheridan, with the generosity which most of the great Northern captains have shown, declared that the country could better have spared himself, and that there was no one quality of a soldier which he could have wished added to Charles Lowell.

My first example, then, gives us one family, in which there was no soldier in 1860, losing eight young men under thirty in little more than three years' fighting.

I have mentioned the name of Motley above. Let us see how it fared with his circle. He has assured me more than once that of his own immediate family there were fewer than the average in the ranks; but he had at least five near relatives serving—three Lothrop, one of whom was killed in Louisiana, Major Motley, badly wounded in Virginia early in 1864; and Major Stackpole, another highly distinguished graduate of Harvard who served through the whole war, and has now resumed his practice as a barrister. Miss Motley married Captain Ives, a gentleman of fortune in Rhode Island, who was traveling in Europe when the war broke out. He volunteered into the navy, commanded the Potomac flotilla, and accompanied Burnside's expedition to North Carolina, where he contracted the illness of which he has since died. His cousin Robert Ives, also a man of large fortune, volunteered into the army, and was killed at Antietam. I believe they were the two last names to bore the name of Ives in their State.

The name of Wadsworth is better known here than most American names in consequence of its English connection. The head of the family was a country gentleman living on his estates at Gorseco, in New York State, up to 1860, with a family of three sons and three daughters. At the news of the attack on the Union troops in Baltimore he instantly chartered a steamer, loaded her with provisions, and sent her up the Potomac—a most timely and brave capital. He acted as aid-de-camp to McDowell, and was his right hand man in the Bull Run campaign, his "youngest as well as his oldest aid" was made a general soon afterwards; and, after several campaigns, was placed in command at Washington. His reputation as an officer had now become such that at the beginning of the last campaign every corps commander of the Army of the KING LEOPOLD AND HIS SUCCESSOR.

No event in European history has been the subject of greater comment, or the occasion of more profound speculation, than the death of King LEOPOLD of Belgium, which occurred December 10, 1865. We give on this page a portrait of King LEOPOLD, and also one of his son and successor.

The death of President LINCOLN, of PALMERSTON, and of King LEOPOLD were the three great obituaries of the year lately ended. LINCOLN died by an act of violence, but both Lord PALMERSTON and King LEOPOLD lived to a ripe old age, and their deaths, though of so great significance, had been long expected. — LEOPOLD was a Prince of Saxe-Coburg, and uncle to Prince ALBERT, consort of the British Queen. He was born December 16, 1796, and had thus nearly completed his seventy-fifth year. He was the husband of Princess CHARLOTTE, and was, moreover, connected by marriage with the principal thrones of Europe. He had latterly been the confidential adviser of the whole family of sovereigns. His second wife was a daughter of LOUIS PHILIPPE, but that circumstance did not prevent him from being a friend and confidant of the Emperor NAPOLEON. He was related to the Russian, Prussian, Austrian, Italian, and Portuguese royal families, and the Empress of Mexico is his daughter. His ancestors were the famous Electors FREDERICK and JOHN, who had protected LUTHER from the wrath of the priesthood in the time of the Reformation. Princess CHARLOTTE, his first wife, was heir-presumptive to the throne of Great Britain, and at one time it seemed not unlikely that LEOPOLD would hold the same position in relation to the English throne which at a later day was so admirably filled by his nephew, Prince ALBERT. The Princess CHARLOTTE died in childbirth in 1817. The event cast a deep gloom over the nation. Queen VICTORIA was born

two years later, and was the daughter of Princess LOUISA VICTORIA, of Saxe-Coburg, sister of LEOPOLD, her father being the Duke of Kent. — On the occasion of LEOPOLD'S marriage with the Princess CHARLOTTE the British Parliament voted a large sum as an outfit for himself and the Princess, and £50,000 for their joint lives, and for the life of the survivor.

The French Revolution of 1830 brought to an end the ill-assorted union between Holland and Belgium. The conflict in Paris by which Louis PHILIPPE succeeded CHARLES X. powerfully affected all the kingdoms of Europe. The Provisional Government of Belgium declared that kingdom independent, and ordered Belgian troops to drive out the Dutch from the country. The great Powers united in disavowing Belgium from Holland, and appointed LEOPOLD king of the Belgians. In the establishment of the independence of Belgium Lord PALMERSTON, then Foreign Minister of England, took a prominent part. The Belgian Congress, out of gratitude to the French nation, as the only power giving material aid in freeing the country from the Dutch, had elected the Duke de Nemours, son of LOUIS PHILIPPE, to the throne. The great Powers generally, and England in particular, objected to this arrangement, and hence the appointment of LEOPOLD. The latter was elected June 4, 1831. A war followed between Holland and Belgium, but France sent 50,000 men to the aid of the latter, and a treaty was signed in October, in which Holland recognized the independence of Belgium. In the following year LEOPOLD married LOUISA, daughter of the French king. When, in 1848, LOUIS PHILIPPE was driven from the French throne, there was great excitement in Belgium, and a cry was raised for a republic. LEOPOLD met this crisis with dignity, disarming his opponents by an appeal to the people. Subsequently his reign was a tranquil one, the chief difficulties of his position arising from the conflict between the Church party and the Liberals. And this leads us directly to the prospect open to his successor, LEOPOLD II. This latter prince is somewhat inexperienced, he having had no participation with public affairs heretofore, on account of his well-known leaning to the side of the Church party. What future complications there may be growing out of the succession of LEOPOLD II. to the throne we know not. We only know that the new king has entered upon his reign in the midst of a popular applause apparently sincere, and with the expression toward him of the good-will of the principal reigning heads of Europe—expressions apparently equally sincere with those made by his own people. But in either case these expressions have been made while yet the late king had not been buried, and are in great measure a tribute to the wise and temperate reign of the latter. Certain it is, however, that the chief difficulties which are likely hereafter to disturb Belgium will arise, if they should exist at all, from internal dissensions rather than from external aggression on the part of other powers. There is now a lull in the affairs of Belgium—but at any instant the storm may open, and the affairs of that country become again the subject of foreign concern—it may be of foreign intervention, and perchance of another European war.

BIRDS IN WINTER.

THE birds have been called God's Messengers ever since that old and holy time when the prophet Elijah, waiting for his evening meal, saw the broad-winged ravens painted black upon the golden sunset, which flooded with glory the brook Cherith, by which he knelt. Our Saxon ancestors called these birds that built about the churches God's Birds, and held them in as great reverence as those which reared their nests against the temples erected by David and Solomon.

We read of winters in England so severe, even within the last century, that nearly all the small birds perished. There were very few robins, wrens, linnets, or larks seen the following spring, and it was the end of summer before any young birds appeared. During those hard winters thousands of birds were picked up frozen to death, for all the rivers were ice-bound, and it was so cold that the oil was frozen in the street-lamps, and they could not be lighted, so that the towns were left in darkness. Freezing showers often fell during these hard old winters, coating every thing they touched with clear bright ice, even the plumage of the birds; while the crimson holly-berries showed as if they were under glass, and the moss and lichen looked like jewels included in crystal cases. How do the small birds live during our severe winters? Where do they find their food?

Even in the severest weather there are millions of leaves in our forests amidst which insects are to be found. Then, too, the birds find berries in considerable quantities. There are also myriads of insect-eggs glued on tree, bush, or hedge, to foliage that never falls, and these the birds find out and devour; and well would it be if our gardeners looked a little more closely to the few leaves which remain on the fruit trees at the end of winter, for they will be found covered with squares of insect eggs, all glued so close together that it is difficult to force the point of a fine needle between the rows. Amidst mosses, among withered grass, in the open hollows of so end of weeds and reeds, in decayed wood, in the thatch of stacks, dwellings, and outhouses, insects are concealed, and seeds are to be found which are only visible to the sharp sight of birds. We see them searching every hole and cranny in old walls, holding on by their claws and the pressure of their tails, and can fancy that the light of their sharp, flashing eyes must be as startling to the poor insects they fasten upon as the bull's-eye of a policeman's lantern is when turned upon a concealed felon. In farm-yards, in places where flocks and herds are foddered, amidst every variety of foliage and herbage, the birds find food that we know nothing of. Watch some bird busy pecking, then kneel down and examine the ground closely, and all you find will be grit, sand, and loam—to your eye nothing else is visible: what else might be revealed can only be discovered through the aid of a microscope. The sight of birds is marvelous. They will drop down like a stone upon an insect from such a height as in our eye would render it as indistinct as a grain of sand on a gravel walk.

The birds pass two-thirds of their time in midwinter in sleep, during which they require no food. The same Providence which causes so many created things to hibernate during the period they would perish for want of food if awake, also provides rest and sleep for the birds, during which they feel no hunger, and renders the few brief hours of winter daylight long enough to gather a sufficiency of food before retiring to roost.

Chief favorites of all our winter birds is the little robin. He never leaves us, but still sings the old year out and the new year in, as his forefathers did, centuries before a Christmas carol was heard. His beautiful red breast and the crimson holly-berries are generally the only bits of warm coloring we see out of doors, where all the landscape is whitened with winter. He hops on the window-sill, leaving the print of his long claws in the snow, while he peeps through the pane with his bold black eyes, asking, in his way, for food, and will enter the room, after a few visits, if he is treated kindly. He has such winning ways that all the children love him, and would not harm him for the world, were he caught and placed in their hands. How delighted the children are to stand at the door and feed the birds in winter, to watch their shy habits, as they draw nearer and nearer until they reach the furthest crumb; then they open their wings and are off in the twinkling of an eye! Throw up a few shovelfuls of earth in the garden, and there the robin is rummaging among it to see what he can find, almost before our back is turned; or else we find him perched, impudently, on the handle of the spade we had left sticking in the mould, and singing away, with all his might, as if trying how much space he could fill with his song, since all the other birds are silent. Neither does he forsake us for long together, either in spring or summer, except at breeding-time, but comes every now and then, as if just to look on and say he has not forgot us. Then he comes again, with his little family about him in their juvenile suits; and you must look very close at them to see a likeness, for they are too young to wear the red waistcoat—the proud crest of the house of the Robins: but they will put it on in autumn, and be able to take a part in the Christmas carols.

In England, where the climate is less severe than in this country, the scene which we illustrate on this page is a very common one in the winter. There the wrens, robins, and finches are frequent visitors at the window. And as for the sparrow, it is never absent. They are the plague of the English farmer. They eat up the early seeds which he sows in February. They are born thieves, and are even said to fight each other in the winter for no other reason than to keep warm.

There are thousands of secluded homesteads scattered over England, where tender-hearted children may be seen administering "out-door relief" to the birds in winter, such as our artist has so beautifully pictured. The speckled fieldfare and the lark-picking bullfinches gaze timidly from the branches of the holly-tree; while the shy, wild blackbirds seem afraid to draw nearer, and the thrush crouches low, as if he feared the noisy sparrows, who make themselves quite at home any where. The third gr. etc.

forth, the graceful chaffinch, and the merry wagtail swam shy, though the chaffinch has approached so near to the noisy sparrows; while bold Robin Red-diamond-shaped lattice.

UNION.

IT is a matter of sincere congratulation that the vote upon the Suffrage in the District of Columbia shows that the great Union party does not mean to serve the purposes of its enemies by fatally breaking its ranks. There is an honest difference of opinion as to the wisdom of unqualified suffrage. The party in Congress seems to have been about equally divided.
When, therefore, Mr. HALE proposed to recommit the bill with instructions to the Committee to report certain qualifications, the Democrats hoped by joining the radicals—to use a convenient distinction—against the motion, to compel the Conservatives to vote against the bill as it stood; in which case the Democrats hoped that their vote united with that of the Conservatives would finally defeat the bill.

These fond hopes of a foolish faction were utterly baffled. The Conservatives voted for the recommitment. The Radicals and Democrats defeated it. The question recurred upon the bill as reported. The Democrats voted solidly against it. But the Conservatives, with insignificant exceptions, voted solidly with the Radicals for it, and carried dismay to the enemies of a sound and peaceful reunion. When the Senate has passed upon the bill and the President has signed it, the union of the Union party will be closer than ever.

This result just at this time is of the highest importance, for there were beginning to be very serious doubts not of the intention but of the sincerity of the Union party. A few days since a gentleman writing in a circle of persons unfriendly to the Government read aloud Mr.
RAYMOND'S naturalization bill. After some sarcastic comments by the company, an ex-rebel officer said: "No matter. Don't trouble yourselves. The dominant party is going to pierce fast enough, and then we and the Democrats will just have things our own way."

It was a very plain statement of a very plain peril. The consequences of a serious division among Union men at this time would be incalculably disastrous, and whoever possession, whoever does not labor strenuously to prevent it, hastens a catastrophe which should ap-pell every honest man in the country. It would be infinitely worse than a mere party defeat; it would involve the honor and peace of the nation. Every object for which the Union party is now contending, with whatever differences of view as to method, would be wholly lost.
The Union policy of reorganization would be scornfully repudiated, and the President, whom the ex-rebels and their abettors now obscuro-usly flatter, refusing, as he would refuse to submit to their dictation, would be contemptuously set aside.

Why should men sincerely devoted to the wise reorganization of the Union and to securing the evident results of the war tolerate the mere possibility of such a peril? Surely we are all agreed upon certain substantial, fundamental points. Upon the abstract definitions of the exact status of the unorganized State we differ. But that is a purely theoretical question. The essential practical point is, that they are not to resume their full powers in the Union except upon certain conditions, and upon that point there is no difference. Thus we all agree that the constitutional right of secession must be plainly disavowed; that the rebel debt must not be recognized; and that the Emancipation amendment must be supported in good faith. But still further we are agreed, and the President and the Lieutenant-General assent, that there must still be military occupation of those States for the security of their own inhabitants as well as for that of the country; and that the Freedmen's Bureau must be maintained to make the radical change of the industrial system as smooth and easy as practicable. And more than this there is no serious disagreement among Union men as to the fact that the Freedmen, becoming by the act of emancipation free men, must sooner or later share every guarantee of individual rights that any free man enjoys, including, of course, the suffrage.

Upon these great vital points there is substantial unanimity of opinion. For these ends we are all laboring. But if we suffer our differences of method to drive us to the fatal extremity of party dissolution, we shall see a path essentially hostile to the Government of Union triumph through our folly. We shall see the military removed, the Freedmen's Bureau abolished, the rebel State debts approved, the national debt repudiated, the faith of the nation to the freedmen broken, and those who for four years by arms or by sympathy sought the overthrow of the Government, controlling it to its destruction, and we shall have our own criminal conduct to thank for it all. The late vote happily reveals the clear conviction among our friends that the defeat of any particular method of action can not be so hazardous to the country as a party schism. And however deeply the superior wisdom of any particular policy may be felt, and however earnestly defended, we are very sure that the good sense which saved the country in the present instance will continue to inspire Congressional action.

THE TAX ON EDUCATION.

THE report of the Commissioners upon the revenue system is awaited with the utmost importance by all who feel that the recommendations of gentlemen so wisely selected, and who have so faithfully devoted themselves to their arduous work, must necessarily have great weight with Congress. We trust that two facts will not have escaped their attention; that English publishing houses are rapidly establishing agencies in this country, and that school committees and teachers in all parts of the land are busily devising means to avoid the expense of schoolbooks, the prices of which are necessarily so high.

Cheap school-books are surely a cardinal necessity of the United States. The one thing that should escape taxation is education. We certainly do not say that any trade should be favored at the expense of any other, but we do ask whether taxes which materially lessen the circulation of school-books do not harm the country more than they help it?

Paper, which is the principal material of books, after the chemicals used in its manufacture have paid a heavy duty, is taxed as a whole under the Internal Revenue act. The printing-ink and all the materials used in bookbinding also pay separate taxes. Finally, the finished book is taxed as a whole. In England, where, as in this country, foreign rags are imported free, books, paper, etc., are especially exempted from taxation, and the English manufacturer is able to pay his duties and land books in New York or Boston at about half the price at which we can make them here.

The inevitable tendency of this state of things is to send our book-publishing to England, to stop our paper-mills, and force our skilled workmen into other channels of labor.
Yet three-quarters of the works now published in this country are books of education. Do we wish that England should write and make them for us? Newspapers are justly exempted from taxation. But are the spelling-book and geography less valuable? No honest trader wishes to shirk his share of the common burden. But ought those who manufacture articles of such prime necessity to bear very much more than their share? If the Commission should recommend that books, as such, be exempted from taxation, they will recommend only that a disproportionate tax be reduced; while the increased circulation caused by the reduction will partly compensate the Government for the apparent loss.

We earnestly trust that the Commission will simplify the whole system of taxation, which is now an exasperating snarl of perplexities; and, while they throw the chief weight upon the great luxuries, will emancipate popular education from the chains which are forging for it; at the very moment in our history when cheap school-books universally diffused are a national necessity.

ABSTRACTIONS.

We have elsewhere repented what we have said more than once, that the question of the present exact status of the unorganized States is practically unimportant, or, as Mr. LINCOLN expressed it, it is "a pernicious abstraction."
But Senator DOOLITTLE in his speech, a few days since, warmly denied that it was unimportant, and declared it to be a vital question.

So it would be if the Senator held strictly to his view of the question and agreed to abide by the inevitable consequences of that view. But he does not. Like every statesman, he is wisely illogical upon occasion. Indeed, the only truly logical advocates of his theory are the ex-rebels and Copperheads. They assert that "once a State always a State," and rebellion having ceased, arms being laid down, Alabama and South Carolina are as much States as Wisconsin or Maine, and are, therefore, entitled to unconditional representation. They hold, and upon their promises justly, that the whole proceeding of the President, in the matter of reorganization, has been absolutely arbitrary and unconstitutional.

We say that the Senator is wisely illogical, for while he roundly asserts that a State can by no possibility lose its status as a State in the Union, he declares in the same breath that some States shall not recover their status as States in the Union unless they will submit to certain conditions imposed by the National Government. Yet does he suppose that the State of South Carolina adopted the Constitutional Amendment as freely as the State of Massachusetts? Of course he does not. But if so, is it not clear that whether a State can go out of the Union or not it can so derange its relations to the Union that they can be restored only as a new State is admitted, namely, by the consent of the Government?

The Senator seems to forget that the war is not over because the rebels have laid down their arms. The war continues until the Government declares it is ended. Every thing that the President has authorized in the lately belligerent States he has authorized as Commander-in-Chief. The existing civil Governments in all the Southern States are, as Senator TRUM-BULL truly says, merely tolerated by the Government of the United States. Governor ORR, of South Carolina, frankly recognizes this fact.
The President continues the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in those States. General GRANT continues active military occupation.
The supreme controlling authority in all those States is that of the nation.

Now nothing can be plainer than the duty of the nation not to relax that authority except upon perfectly satisfactory terms. In the actual situation the plea of State rights is pure folly. State rights are not to be resumed except upon conditions prescribed by the United States, and the United States are the sole judges of those conditions. Suppose the Government knew of a conspiracy extending throughout the late league of rebel States to rise in arms as soon as the national hand was withdrawn. Would it be the duty of the Government to withdraw that hand because there was no present armed rebellion, and because the white inhabitants declared that they acquiesced in the situation? But if the Government has the right to impose any condition whatever to satisfy itself that no rising could be successful even if attempted, it has the right to impose every condition necessary to the same satisfaction.

That is our situation now. Of course the choice of those conditions must be sagacious if it would achieve the end in view. Senator DOOLITTLE asks whether we would seriously undertake to govern the people of the unorganized States without representation. The Senator must first explain on what ground he proposes a system of State government, by which a third of the population are to be ruled entirely without representation. He is willing to admit Senator MARVIN from Florida. But will he explain on what ground he favors the resumption of power in the Union by States which have a proportionally superior representation?

However, the question must be settled according to the Constitution, says some one.
Certainly it must. The war was waged under the Constitution, and it must be ended under it. But the Constitution did not prescribe the methods in which the war should be carried on; and it does not specify the conditions upon which its results are to be secured.

THE FINANCE BILL.

THE financial measure before Congress, which contemplates the reduction of the currency by funding, is of so alarming a nature that it can not be passed over in silence. Not only have the Committee of Ways and Means implicitly obeyed the behests of the Secretary of the Treasury;
they have gone farther, and invested that functionary with powers which he never even thought of soliciting—powers greater than any organized Government in the world ever conferred upon any executive officer.

It was explained a few weeks since in these columns that the aggregate volume of debt to be funded or paid off within the next thirty months does not vary much from $1,800,000,000. Mr.
M'CULLOCH in his report asked for power to fund this debt, and seemed to intimate that from one to two hundred millions a year might be funded. On this the Committee of Ways and Means, through the MORRILL sub-commis-tee, prepared a bill which empowers the Secretary to sell United States bonds, bearing any rate of interest not over 6 per cent., running for any number of years not over forty, at any price whatsoever, at any time or times, and in any amounts he chooses; and further permits him to receive in payment not only the lawful current money of the country, but any of the short bonds or Treasury notes which the Government has been issuing. It is hardly necessary to say that, if such a measure became a law, Mr. M'CULLOCH would be created as omnipotent a dictator of the money market of the country as Congress and the Supreme Court are of our political concerns. By offering bonds for sale in large amounts, he could at any time produce a stringency in the market which would involve a general fall in prices; by accepting all, or nearly all, the bids, he could cause a general panic; while on the other hand, by rejecting bids below a certain figure, or by accepting in payment of his bonds securities not used as currency, he could relieve the money market at once, and cause prices to react as quickly as they had risen. Under this bill he might offer $250,000,000 of bonds for sale for lawful money. Such an offer would cause an active recall of loans, a decline of 5 @ 10 per cent. in all securities, and a general turmoil in commercial circles. When the fall had taken place he might announce that no bid under par would be considered, and that Seven-Thirty notes would be received at par and interest in payment of his bonds. Such an announcement would cause an instantaneous "let up" in money, a rebound of 5 @ 10 per cent. in all securities, and a sudden recovery in merchandise.

All this he might do without violating his duty or exposing himself to the slightest blame or censure. Is it safe to intrust such power to any one man? Is it fair to any man to expose him to such temptation?

How M'CULLOCH enjoys the perfect confidence of the American people. For many months he has had opportunities, by means of the secret sales of gold made by the Department, of realizing fortunes for himself and others. Yet no responsible person, even among his bitterest political enemies, has ever even hinted that either he or any one else has made money by an early knowledge of the intentions of the Department with regard to sales of gold.
The practice of selling gold secretly has been generally condemned on grounds of principle.
But by common consent all admit that HOW M'CULLOCH is an honest man, and that he will not himself speculate, or permit others to speculate, on what he does as Finance Minister of the country.

If it were mathematically certain, therefore, that the extraordinary powers conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury by this bill would never be exercised by any one but Mr. M'CUL-LOCH, the country might view its passage without much alarm. But what if Mr. M'CULLOCH resigned, or were removed, or died? Such things have happened before. And though there is good reason to believe that Mr. JOR-NISON would be careful in selecting his successor, it must not be forgotten that we have had, heretofore, Secretaries of the Treasury and other Cabinet Ministers who were also carefully selected and yet who proved to be not above suspicion. HOWELL COSS was Secretary of the Treasury, and, as we all thought, a most respectable man; yet he did his best to ruin the public credit. THOMAS, of Maryland, a most respectable man, was Secretary of the Treasury, and equally unfaithful to his trust. The post of Secretary of the Treasury has generally been filled by an able and an honest man; but how would the public view the placing of such enormous and irresponsible power in the hands of such persons as the late THOMAS CORWIN or ROBERT J. WALKER—both of them in their time Secretaries of the Treasury? How if such men as JACOB THOMPSON or JOHN B. FLOYD—both of them United States Cabinet Ministers in their day—chanced to be appointed to the Treasury Department?

The war is over, and the necessity for dictatorships may fairly be assumed to have passed away. It is about time not only that all public officials should scrupulously avoid assuming needless responsibility, but that Congress should, as heretofore, hedge its grants of power with proper restrictions and limitations. A curtailment of the currency being deemed requisite, the Secretary of the Treasury may properly be invested with the power of selling bonds to retire short securities or legal tenders. But the amount to be sold, the kind of money to be received in payment, the periods at which such sales may take place, the price at which the bonds may be awarded, and the character and interest payable on the bonds, should all be fixed beforehand and openly by Congress, and not left to be determined privately by an executive officer. The public have a right to know what is going to be done in the vital matter of the currency.

There are two other points—we pass over the objections raised to the issue of Sterling Bonds as trifling and immaterial—upon which exception may fairly be taken to the financial measure now before Congress.

The first of these is the repeal of the section of the old law which establishes a Sinking Fund.
That section had been flagrantly disobeyed by Mr. CHASE, and has been disobeyed by his successor. Finding it a dead letter Congress repeals it. This is repudiation. Men of means abroad and at home subscribed for our bonds on the faith that a sinking fund would be established which would gradually pay them off.
Congress has no more right to abolish the Sinking Fund than it has to alter the rate of interest payable on the bonds, or the date at which they shall become payable. The Sinking Fund was one of the essential conditions of the contract between the United States and their creditors. It may have been an unwise condition. But it was voluntarily and deliberately established by the United States, and to abolish it now is to break faith with the public creditor, and to enter upon the broad highway of repudiation.

The second objection has reference to the payment of the currency interest on Seven-Thirty notes, debt certificates, and the like.
By Mr. MORRILL'S measure it is proposed to absorb a large proportion of the legal-tender notes now afloat. Assuming that the bill will pass and will be a success, in this respect, it is clear that the Treasury Department will not be able to pay its currency interest in legal-tender notes, but will be compelled to pay it in the currency received for taxes—national-bank notes. This also will be repudiation. When the Government put forth the compound-interest notes, the Seven-Thirty notes, and the debt certificates, it covenanted to pay to the holder so much per annum as interest. The covenant necessarily implied, as all covenants do, that such interest should be paid in lawful money. If Jones agrees to pay Browns $5000 on a given day he must pay in legal tenders or gold, or he can not claim a discharge. Now if Government, before the maturity of the Seven-Thirty notes and compound-interest notes, so contrives to reduce the volume of the legal tenders that all its taxes are paid in national-bank notes, it will have no means of paying the currency interest due on its securities in any other medium than in national-bank notes, which may, and probably will, at the time be worth much less than legal tender money. Sound banking authority predicts that, if $200,000,000 of our legal tender currency be withdrawn from circulation, the remainder will be worth from 2 to 5 per cent. more than national-bank notes. In such an event, to pay the interest on the Seven-Thirty notes, compound notes, and debt certificates in a currency worth considerably less than the money in which Government agreed to pay when it borrowed the money of its creditors, will be a very shabby form of repudiation.

It is not very likely that the Committee of Ways and Means or Congress will pay much attention to the warnings of the press. State-party discipline appears to have quenched individual freedom of opinion, and there is so little financial ability in Congress that both the committee and the body of which it forms a part are generally content to obey the orders of the Treasury Department. Were it otherwise, some effort might be made to induce Congress to let the currency alone for the present, and to take advantage of the large revenues of Government to reduce the public debt by selling the surplus gold in the Treasury, and by paying off each short date obligation as it matures. This would be the way to diminish our burdens without producing a commercial crisis, and in the end, it would probably prove as efficacious as Mr. Morrill's method for bringing down the price of gold. But there is no chance that any recommendation of the kind would be heeded.

COMMUTATION ON RAILROADS.

The principle of commutation is simply this, that a low rate of fares to permanent residents along the line of a railroad stimulates settlements and improvements resulting in profit. It supposes that the growth of such a population may be encouraged with advantage, and that there is no maximum attainable too great for the solid advantage of the road. The policy applies whenever a crowded city is located at either terminus capable of throwing out a large suburban population. In England all the numerous railroads leading out of London and other principal cities have practiced it from the outset with entire confidence in its being a remunerative system. The two great lines leading northward from New York (the Hudson River and Harlem roads) pursued the policy until they both passed into the hands of their present owners, who manage them so as to discourage further settlements, greatly to the injury of those doing business in the city who were induced by moderate fares to establish homes in the country. Rates to commuters who use the road daily were increased last season in some instances over three hundred per cent. A step so decisive warrants the conclusion that the policy of commutation is regarded by the proprietors with disfavor, and that further encouragement to settlements will not be afforded except other and different views prevail.

The subject is one of sufficient importance to justify public discussion, and particularly as the true interests of the roads and of the large number of property owners along their lines concur in the establishment of rates such as commuters can afford to pay, and such as will encourage improvements. The population along both lines is yet sparse compared with that along the English roads, but may be increased by a wise and permanent policy to an extent certain to reward the stockholders with ample returns. The policy which exacts the largest possible compensation from each commuter treats the present population as having attained its maximum, and strips them of all means to influence others to build up adjacent homes. These residents, instead of being the earnest and constant friends of the road, as they were at the outset for mutual advantage, are forced to make the complaints which prevent additional settlements. On both lines the great body of commuters, living at points not influenced by active competition, are much dissatisfied, and could not be relied upon for any friendly service to either company. In the matter of taxation, trials before those not influenced by free tickets, coroners' juries, the sufficiency of fences, and applications to the Legislature, these roads will constantly be met by opposition from those commuters who regard the late sudden increase of fares as wholly unjustifiable.

This state of feeling could easily be changed by adopting the policy in use on all the English lines, of discriminating in favor of commuters owning or occupying houses along the line, which can be done with equal advantage to both stockholders and the public.

The London and North Western Railway adopted in 1862, and have since continued the following mileage scale of rates for season tickets for one year for ordinary commuters who use first-class carriages, although authorized by Parliament to charge three pence per mile. Certain resident commuters pay half these rates. From one to five miles, inclusive, £7 10s. per annum, or say $36 gold. For each additional mile up to fifteen £1 per mile, or say $5 for fifteen miles. For each additional mile above fifteen 15s., or say for forty-eight miles $213. This distance, forty-eight miles, is the greatest on the Harlem road for which commutation is allowed. The Harlem road charges for commutation to Croton Falls (forty-eight and a half miles) $112 per annum. The rate between White Plains and Croton Falls is in very nearly the same proportion. Tickets one hundred at a time, are issued, the use of which may be deferred for any period within four months.

The English rates are reduced 50 per cent. in perpetuity in favor of owners of houses erected within certain limits and of a certain value, and are continued to any successor or other occupant. Students or apprentices living with their parents at any of these suburban residences pay also one-half the established rates. The Great Western line has adopted very nearly the rates specified above. Other lines charge much less. For instance, the Chester and Holyhead Railway has established the following rates per annum: for seven miles £7, for fifteen £15, for fifty £28, for sixty £30, for eighty-five £40.

The extravagance of the Harlem rates is the more conspicuous if the amount of accommodation is considered. For instance, above White Plains there is but one morning train to New York, which is the only one a business man going daily to the city can be expected to take; there are but two afternoon trains up, and four in the whole each way per day. It is unnecessary to say that this is very, very far short of the accommodation furnished by the English roads. We understand that their commutation tickets are good for three hundred and sixty-five days, while here they are good for only the week days of the year. A commuter there is not restricted in the number of times he may travel back and forth, but here he must pay for more than one journey each way per day. Abroad, a general ticket is issued which is exhibited only when called for, here a ticket must be surrendered on each excursion and another exhibited for punching.

But the important difference between the two systems is the assurance of a permanent policy in the English roads looking to the substantial interests of those who erect improvements along their lines, tending strongly to mutual benefit and the entire failure of the managers of these two roads to exhibit any such policy. This may be due to the fact that these lines have recently come into the hands of those who, although of great experience in other affairs, are without experience on this subject, and hence they have adopted a rate of commutation which must diminish the population, repress industry, and seriously damage property along these great lines of travel.

THE EIGHT-HOUR SYSTEM.

J. T., who is sanguine of the success of the eight-hour system, is aggrieved by our saying that the British laborer drudges fourteen hours a day for a pittance, and would deny the truth of the statement, but that he understands us to have asserted it merely as an illustration of the law of supply and demand. He thinks we should have said ten hours a day. But if drudging for ten hours a day gives only a pittance to the British laborer, what would drudging eight hours give him? That we did not misrepresent the substantial fact of the condition of the British laborer we are persuaded by what Mr. Bancroft said in his late speech at Birmingham.

"Have you read," says Mr. BRICHT, "a paragraph which lately appeared in the newspapers about J. Cross, a Dorsetshire laborer? He worked six days in the week. He had an excellent character from his employer, for whom he worked 24 years at the rate of 5s. per week. . . . I tell you that many thousands of cases like that of JONES CROSS are to be found throughout the country, and especially in the south, and that their condition is such that hitherto the most anxious investigation has been unable to solve the mystery as to how they keep body and soul together." It is truly, as he calls it, "a desperate condition." Does J. T. think that if the British Parliament were to reduce the daily hours of labor to six that JONES CROSS could keep body and soul together any better?

J. T. is a stone-cutter. He says that as yet there are no mechanical inventions to lighten his labor, and that competition is so intense that when a stone-cutter's day's labor is done he is too utterly exhausted for any mental application, or even enjoyment, whatever. He adds, that the trade in New York, Brooklyn, and the neighborhood, have given only nine hours for a day's work since November 10, 1863, and that no more has been required. This was undoubtedly in pursuance of the law that we mentioned in the "Saturday Sermon" of the natural limitation of effective labor. Nine hours' work at stone-cutting is doubtless, upon the whole, as valuable as twelve, and it is worth, therefore, the wages of twelve. If eight hours' work is equally valuable, it is worth the same. But the question is, whether a law can make eight hours' good labor worth the wages of ten hours' good labor. If it can not, the inevitable effect of the law would be to drive capital where it could get the best return for investment.

J. T. thinks that if the Legislature will pass the eight-hour law "they will check the selfishness of both labor and capital." But how? Can you compel capital in a particular direction? If you try it you will merely paralyze both capital and labor. Suppose the Legislature of New York were to pass a law that nobody should work more than five hours a day, nor be worth more than twenty thousand dollars. Might they not just as wisely and successfully enact that every body should be comfortable and happy? There are some things that laws can not effect, and laws about labor are wise and effective only so far as they curb the natural facts and conditions of labor. Thus it is found that in the work of computation for the census and other statistics six hours a day is quite enough. It would be a very foolish law that would make it sixteen.

It seems to us that the friends of the eight-hour movement are of opinion that it needs only an act of the Legislature to secure eight hours' work, eight hours' sleep, and eight hours' recreation. J. T., however, while apparently urging this kind of legislation, expresses his opinion that "it is too much to expect that our social evils can be removed by legislative acts." What arguments, then, and to what end, shall be addressed to the Legislature?

ONE QUESTION SETTLED.

One of the perplexing questions has been virtually settled. The petition of the earliest veterans of the war who enlisted from the noblest impulses, and who after long service have been discharged, often from illness and wounds, for bounties in proportion to that paid the later enlisted troops, was so plainly natural that it could not be set aside.

But the Paymaster-General reports that it would take $500,000,000 to equalize the bounties. In view of such a sum and the present condition of the finances, do the patriotic positions themselves press their honorable claim? Some kind of provision might be possible, but who would advocate such an addition to the burden of the country?

We must be just before we are generous, and the necessity of absolute economy is imperative. It is not only the duty of the nation but of individuals. It would be a fit crown to the conduct of the people during the war if they universally and individually economized to help pay the debt as they nobly supported its necessary creation.

FIFTH AVENUE SKATING POND.

Now that the skating season has fairly commenced, we take pleasure in reminding our readers of the advantages connected with Major OATMAN'S Skating Pond, on Fifth Avenue. It is the favorite resort of all lovers of the sport, both male and female. This pond is always open to visitors when the skating is good, except on Sundays.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

January 25: In the Senate, Mr. Chandler's resolution to withdraw our Minions from Great Britain, etc., was laid upon the table, 25 to 12.—Speaking on the Negro Suffrage Bill for the District of Columbia, Mr. Davis indulged in the usual abuse of the negro. "Carrion," he said, "had descended from his skin, and his head makes a hole in the ground."

In the House, Mr. Crockett, one of the Committee of Fifteen, offered a resolution, which was objected to, providing for the following conditions for the restoration of the Southern States: First, restoration of civil liberties; second, repudiation of rebel debt; third, the assurance of human rights to all peoples of color; fourth, the impartial distribution of political power among all sections of the country, so that four millions of people shall not be represented in the interests of aggression while at the same time they are excluded from political rights and privileges; and fifth, the election of truly loyal members to Congress.—Mr. Denney, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill revising the grade of General in the army, which was recommended.—The House concurred in the Senate resolution authorizing the Committee of Fifteen to send for papers or papers, 125 to 25.—The bill on Negro Suffrage in the District of Columbia was debated through the remainder of the session. The black population of the District is about 25,000, or about one-fourth the entire population of the District. The provision made by the bill is simply that there shall be no restriction to suffrage based on distinction of color. Mr. Allen claimed that suffrage was the sacred right of the negro. Mr. Rowell, of Kentucky, would give with his State in refusing suffrage. Mr. John T. Thomas, of Maryland, claimed to have a number of the Republican party, but thought that the negro question should come with reconstruction.

January 27: In the Senate, a resolution of Mr. Sumner against amending the militia of Alabama was referred to the Committee of Fifteen.—Mr. Hildes' resolution to provide for national Governors for the rebel States was taken up. Mr. Hildes addressed the Senate at length, claiming that President Johnson had in his policy of restoration largely followed in the footsteps of his predecessor. He supported the President's policy, and claimed that to issue the very Union for which we have been fighting we must have a rapid restoration of all the States to their normal relations in Congress as it is possible.

In the House, Mr. Hildes presented the credentials of John N. Goodwin, delegate from Arizona, who was appointed and took his seat.—The bill to incorporate the National Protective Mountaineering Company, the object of which is to encourage emigration to the North, was taken up. Mr. Baker, of Illinois, objected to the bill as creating what he supposed to be a charitable institution. The bill provided an immense and exclusive privilege on a small number of persons, who might enjoy lands without limitation. The bill was laid on the table, 120 to 27.—The Negro Suffrage Bill for the District of Columbia was taken up and debated. Mr. Denney, of New York, favored qualified suffrage, the qualification to be one of station. He thought it better not to disregard the value of the law. He moved a postponement of the bill to the first Tuesday in April. Mr. Hildes advocated a restriction of suffrage to all who could read the Constitution of the United States. Mr. Thayer, of Pennsylvania, advocated the bill on the ground of equal and impartial justice. Mr. Van Horn, of New York, opposed the measure, claiming that this was exclusively a white man's Government.

January 18: In the Senate, a bill was passed to distribute 500 copies of Mr. Morrill's analysis among the different State Libraries, Departments, etc.—Mr. Wade, from the Committee on Territories, reported a bill for the admission of Utah, which would give the State government proposed by the people.—Mr. Sumner's report upon Mr. Hildes' motion, after they supported the President's policy. He did not think any act of Congress necessary for the admission of the Southern States. This was a white man's Government, etc. Mr. Wade followed in a reply to Mr. Hildes' speech of the day before. He claimed that we were not to support a policy simply because Mr. Lincoln or Mr. Johnson adopted it. Mr. Johnson had gone further than Mr. Lincoln, and had extended the Southern States to adopt the Constitutional amendments and the 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th, as an equal footing. He thought it had been, after scrapping the negro into the military service, to abandon them to their enemies now that the field is over.—A bill was passed giving Mrs. Lincoln the following privilege.

In the House, the bill for negro suffrage in the District of Columbia was taken up. Mr. Johnson, of Pennsylvania, spoke against it. Mr. Rowell, of Massachusetts, was opposed to postponement. He thought the right of suffrage should follow emancipation. He thought the negroes should have a share in the Government as well as in fighting for it. A motion by Mr. Sumner to lay the bill on the table was insisted, 45 yeas against 23 nays.—Mr. Denney's motion to postpone was disagreed to, 24 to 124. A motion to rescind the bill with Mr. Hildes' amendment was lost, 55 to 117. The bill was then passed, 126 to 54. It reads as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from all laws and parts of laws, and providing the qualifications of electors for any office in the District of Columbia, the word 'white' be and the same hereby be stricken out; and that from and after the passage of this Act no person shall be disqualified from voting at any election held in the said District on account of color. And be it further enacted, That all Acts of Congress and all laws of the State of Maryland in force in said District, and all resolutions of Washington and Georgetown inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, are hereby repealed and annulled."

January 12: In the Senate, Mr. Hildes presented the credentials of William Morris, of Florida, which were ordered to be laid on the table.

In the House, $200,000 were appropriated for the purchase of Lewis's Island, Portsmouth Navy-yard.—Mr. Denney spoke on reconstruction, advocating that negroes have every political right necessary to their liberty, and that the public debt should be incurred, and rebel States organized, and there should be a Constitutional Amendment giving Congress power to make all laws necessary and proper to secure to all persons of every State equal protection in life, liberty, and property. We might demand more, but not a job less can we receive.

January 20: In the Senate, the bill for the enlargement of the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau was debated, but no action was taken.

January 21: In the Senate, Mr. Fessenden, from the Committee of Fifteen, reported a joint resolution that representatives and direct taxes should be apportioned among the States according to their respective numbers, excluding from the basis of representation all persons to whom the elective franchise is denied.—The resolution to refer all papers and documents relating to the reconstruction of the rebel States was adopted.—It was voted, 23 to 11, that Fremont's bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau should not be restricted to the rebel States.

In the House, Mr. Stevens offered the same resolution from the Committee of Fifteen which Mr. Fessenden offered in the Senate. This was debated at some length, and was finally made the special order for the next day.

NEWS ITEMS.

Rufus Choate, Jun., the only son of the late celebrated Boston lawyer of that name, died on January 25, at Manchester, Massachusetts, from the effects of wounds received in the late war.

The President has relieved Provisional Governor McLean of Florida, and recognized Mr. Walker as the regular Governor. Texas is now the only State which has a Provisional Governor.

The Message of Governor Worth was received in the North Carolina Legislature January 23. He recommends the reformation of proceedings under provisional rule in the State, the repeal of all laws in conflict with perfect allegiance to the National Government, and the adoption of a judicial system. He thinks that there will be no necessity of organizing the Freedmen's Bureau after the restoration of the State courts, from which he says the negroes can get full justice.

The national debt at the close of December was lost by forty-one million than at the close of last August. Secretary Sherman has declined to make funds. There are the deposit of the month's interest to others all charged for disabilities incurred in the service, or who have died in battle, in hospital, or in rebel prisons.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The Chaff disturbance appears to have been in death of Admiral Pender. It is stated that this officer was killed during the war of his wounds had been captured by the Russians, became ill, and finally died on board his ship, November 19, by shooting himself with a pistol.

It has been announced that the town of Bagdad, in Mesopotamia, was captured from the Imperialists, on January 5, by an American force, consisting of the 10th, 12th and 15th United States Cavalry, under General Davis. The American General Crockett was in command of it, and General Freshfield was on his way thither. The accounts indicate that the French was about starting on another expedition. General Weitzel, at the request of Lebedev, sent two hundred men from Brownsville, Texas, to Bagdad to preserve order.

The French army at Orléans have been concluded. The French army of Orléans, one of the most powerful organs of public opinion in France, has an article showing the course of the intervention, and asking that it be recalled for the Mexican banditti. He only offers it in the way of the withdrawal of the French army from the Gulf of Mexico, which would be an important step, and that for that purpose. It is said that the French Opposition have determined to maintain it in the event of the coming session of the Corps Legislatif, and to bring the intervention in Mexico to an end.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

MRS. SOREL.

CHAPTER IV.

BROTHER BARKER was in the full tide of the most confident and convincing assertions upon the state of the country when he experienced a sudden and singular interruption. This was none other than the entrance of a somewhat tall and slim but very neat lady, who was hailed by Mrs. Juggins with a cordial,

"Why, if here ain't Mrs. Sorel now! Walk in, Mrs. Sorel; glad to see you; don't take that chair, this here is an easier one; take off your bonnet; come to spend the day, I do hope; how are all at home?"

There was nothing specially wonderful in the lady, at least to look at. You could see that she must have been beautiful in her youth; the clear gray eye, regular features, and still graceful form, showed that plainly enough. Yet, being only a lady, clothed in some gray stuff, with a calico sun-bonnet, it was hard to account for the interruption caused by her simple entrance. The preacher stopped in his conversation, singularly abashed and confused. Even the old planter received her more like an overgrown boy caught by the owner thereof in the midst of a water-melon patch than the master of a household. And Mrs. Juggins, too, seemed endeavoring to hide something beneath the bustle of her welcome.

A close observer might have detected a peculiarly arch smile which passed over the face of the visitor at the sudden silence and evident embarrassment which attended her arrival, but it was gone in an instant as she saluted the company with quiet ease and took a seat beside Mrs. Juggins. It was evidently with an effort that conversation was resumed; and the burden thereof was thrown upon the visitor, who had herself to mention the facts in regard to the weather, which, in the section of which we are speaking, and probably all over the world besides, form the invariable introduction to conversation.

It is strange; yet if ever countenances expressed the sense of being caught at something wrong, the countenances of the persons thus interrupted expressed that guilty emotion. Certain it is, there was in the bosoms of the persons interrupted a sharp, sudden sense of guilt which surprised even themselves, but which their outward bearing was too true to their inward self not to manifest. Of all of them the preacher had the deepest, strongest sense of this; and a sense of it which, a moment after, he resented more than the others, being more violent and positive in his after-conversation from this very cause. Meanwhile, if any one could have known it from her composed and natural manner or not, Mrs. Sorel was saying to herself, as she took out her sewing—"Dear me, I wish I had known; but, as it is, I can not help it!"

With the rest, she felt that it was in vain to sit there five minutes and not get into the one, grand, only, all-absorbing, everlasting topic. That it should not, at least, be her fault, Mrs. Sorel immediately engaged Mrs. Juggins, who was her near neighbor, in conversation about the making of butter and the raising of chickens and turkeys. The scarcity of this was evidently leading into the topic of the war, so that it was necessary to avoid that theme also. The gentlemen had from her entrance ceased conversation; the preacher apparently engaged in reading the Advocate—the religious paper of the Church to which Colonel Juggins and himself belonged—and the Colonel engaged in smoking his cob pipe and solemnly thinking over Fort Donelson and Nashville.

Now there was no better soul in the world than Mrs. Juggins, but conversation formed no part of her excellences, so that it devolved upon Mrs. Sorel either to say something or to sit in silence. To avoid this and, at the same time, keep the thread of conversation in her own hands, Mrs. Sorel began in a lowered tone to tell her neighbor of her various devices in the economy of her household; how much a little alum had improved the candles she was making at home; how easy she found it at last to plait straw into hats for her household; how she had succeeded in making starch—a large sample of which she had brought over for Mrs. Juggins—from wheat bran.

"Yes; and just as good as any I ever bought of the store—Yankee made," remarked Mrs. Juggins, as she examined the article carefully. "That is what I say," continued the old lady; "we can do without them, we don't want them here; why can't they just stay at home and—"

"But I must tell you how I managed about making shoes," interrupted her visitor; and she proceeded to tell how many soles of old shoes she had made the children collect from about the place; how she had soaked them well in water, and so made them again into shoes. Mrs. Sorel also informed her neighbor how keenly she had suffered under the dearth of bluing, then desolating all the wash-tubs of the country, and how she had found out that common blue ink, largely diluted, answered just as well.

"Yes, and ink went right up from two bits to fifty cents a bottle, soon's you found it out," moaned Mrs. Juggins.

Much more did Mrs. Sorel have to tell her neighbor, talking rapidly and in her most cheerful manner. Not, if she could help it, should the conversation glide off into the war.

"By-the-by, when did you hear from Frank last?" asked the Colonel, suddenly, in the midst of a description his wife was giving Mrs. Sorel of a loun she was having made.

Colonel Juggins had no such intentions, but his sudden question ruined every thing. He was an ignorant man, somewhat dull too, yet he had his intuitions the moment after that it would have been as well not to have asked the question. But it was too late. Even Mrs. Juggins saw that they were, as she afterward expressed it, "in for it now."

"Not for several weeks, Colonel," replied Mrs. Sorel.

"Your son is in Virginia, I believe, ma'am?" said the preacher, in his usual tone at the beginning of a sermon. Brother Barker always began his sermon in a low and scarcely audible voice; he got loud enough, however, long before he got through.

"With our Tom," said the Colonel, promptly. "And now, Heuther Barker, suppose we take a look at that three-year-old I told you about; you circuit riders know a good animal when you see it if any body does; takes a Methodist preacher to judge horse-flesh!"

"In a moment, Heuther Juggins," said the preacher, who was not to be interrupted in that way either. "I congratulate you, ma'am," continued he, "that you have a son to fight the battles of his country; it must be a great satisfaction to you."

Now, "Brother Barker was built for fight," had been a highly complimentary remark often made in regard to him by his friends. No knight ever went into tourney with greater zest than did this man into any theological controversy, whenever and wherever the lists were opened. But controversy upon the well-worn themes of Church Government, Election, Baptism, and the like, had ceased entirely, had utterly passed from the minds of men. The one great controversy of the day, raging not only upon battle-field but in every village, in every knot of talkers, in every separate heart and mind, this controversy had swallowed up every other. To it men gave all the zeal they had hitherto squandered in dozens of different directions; certainly with Brother Barker this was the case.

"You are perfectly aware, Mr. Barker, that Frank's course does not give me satisfaction," said Mrs. Sorel, calmly.

"Ah, is it so?" said the preacher, raising his brows in wonder. Like every man who stakes every thing on a cause, falsehood favorable to that cause was a totally different thing from the old, abstract, abominable falsehood.

"You must pardon me, Mr. Barker," said Mrs. Sorel; "but I have observed from the outset that equivocation, departure from strict truth, has been a leading feature of Secession. You know perfectly well what my sentiments are to-day and always have been. Frank would not have gone to the war if he could have staid at home. He no more wanted to go himself than I wanted to send him. He was taught to love his country from his cradle, and from his earliest recollection he was trained to regard Secession as the greatest of crimes."

"You must permit me, ma'am," began the preacher.

"Only let me finish, if you please," said Mrs. Sorel, in a manner as cool as it was decided. "At the opening of the war Frank never dreamed of enlisting, at least not under that flag, but his case became more unpleasant every day. Hardly a day but he would say when he came home, 'I hate the thing as much as you do, mother, but what can I do?' Not a day, not an hour of the day, but his old companions were after him to enlist. So many of them were gone that he began to feel as if left alone in the world. The hints, too, about his being tied to his mother's apron strings, about his being afraid to go, and a hundred things of the kind, were upon him till he could stand it no longer. One bitter, bitter day he enlisted! He did as tens of thousands of others have done—swept away against every prompting of reason, religion, and conscience—swept away in the wild tide that sweeps the land—and woe to the wicked men that set that tide going! I tell you, Mr. Barker, if to no others, to thousands of desolated mothers they will have to answer for it at the bar of God!"

If Mrs. Sorel had only spoken this in an excited manner and with raised voice it would have been a much easier thing for Mr. Barker to reply; but there was a calmness, a conviction, a sense of being unquestionably right, in her manner which embarrassed the preacher. Or, rather, there was a sense—struggle against it as he might—of being wrong in the matter in the bosom of this latter individual which he could not overcome. Loudly as he talked, abundant as were his arguments from Scripture, fierce as were his denunciations of the Yankees—all the time there was under it all that sense of being in the wrong which the preacher could not get rid of to save his life. However it may be with other men, the really pious man has a sense of right and wrong in his bosom which nothing can quench—it is the unquenchable spark within him of an eternal life.

"I would think, Mrs. Sorel—you are a professor, I believe?" asked the preacher.

"Mr. Barker," said Mrs. Sorel, with a steady and surprised look at him, "why do you ask such a question? You know that I am."

"Then I would ask, ma'am, why you do not have faith in God to leave your son in his hands? You should not grieve over your son, as I am told you do. Thousands of us—Sister Juggins here, for instance—have sons in the war—"

"And that is just the difference in my case," said Mrs. Sorel, breaking quietly in upon the preacher. "I do not grieve over Frank because he is away from me, or because he may be lying at this moment in some crowded hospital without a mother's hand to tend him. No. Nor if Frank was dying there of some disease or some dreadful wound, would that be what would break my heart. For all that I could and would trust him in the hands of the Lord—it is the case he is engaged in that cuts me to the soul."

"Really, Mrs. Sorel," said the preacher, greatly excited, "your views are very singular, and they may be such as may injure you."

"Such have always been my views, Sir," said the lady, quietly and gravely, "and always will be. If I speak at all on the subject I have none others to express. And what I now think and feel was, a year ago, the sentiment of every individual in our then happy land, with the exception of a few desperate politicians who were even then plotting our ruin. Then they were regarded as bad men; to-day they are the rulers of a deluded people."

If Mrs. Sorel had only got angry as she spoke! But she was so entirely calm, spoke with such force of moral conviction, in such a tone as if of burglars or murderers whose guilt no one could deny, that, in spite of himself, the preacher was confounded. A mere politician would not have been; but Mr. Barker, on the other hand, had a conscience.

"Were you not born at the North?" he asked, at length.

"Mr. Barker," said the lady, after a grave pause, "why do you ask such a question? You know perfectly well that I am a South Carolinian."

an. Mrs. Juggins has told you that repeatedly—so have I."

"You are a strange sort of South Carolinian," said the preacher, with a sarcastic smile.

"Perhaps so," said the lady, quietly. "My father was a plain, sensible planter, living in South Carolina, as his people and his wife's people had lived from the settlement of the country. In the days of Nullification he was a Union man—not without some influence—the unpretending influence of plain, sober, Christian sense—in his neighborhood. He was murdered by a Nullifier, a leading politician then, and I never can forget the lesson I learned then—the calm, solid conviction of the one set of principles, and the heat and violence, the jangling, bullying, cursing, threatening spirit of the other. When I look over the country now I see the same difference between the two parties—only the noblest and best among us here, in many cases, been poisoned and borne away with the wicked spirit which was at one time confined to the bosoms of the desperate few."

"And is it possible, ma'am, that you, a Southern woman, can have any regard for Yankees?" said the preacher, with a strong emphasis, as of naught, upon the first syllable of the word.

"Not for want of learning what a dreadful people they are," said Mrs. Sorel, with a smile. "Only last week Mrs. Juggins was telling me that marriage has been altogether abolished among them."

"Law me, yes!" broke in Mrs. Juggins; "so I'm told. Up there the women all wear pants like men, make speeches, vote, and, I do suppose, carry their revolvers, curse and swear, drink and gamble, just like the men! When any man and woman happen to meet any where and take a likin' to each other they just consider themselves married—free love, they call it!"

"And you remember, Mrs. Juggins," said Mrs. Sorel, "what you told me about Lincoln's having contracted with people to go through the South burning up people's houses by night, so much a house?"

"And Mrs. Juggins could have told you, too," said the preacher, "that the North has apostatized into a universal infidelity."

"Mr. Barker," asked Mrs. Sorel, pausing from her work and looking steadily at the preacher, "do you believe yourself that the Christians of the North have thus apostatized?"

"I asked Lamun the last time I saw him," said the preacher; "he is a Northern man, too; he ought to know, and he said he didn't know that any one doubted it. Though," put in the preacher, with candor, "there may be—I say way he—some Lots in the midst of Sedom; for what I know there may be even seven thousand there that have not bowed the knee to Baal."

"Don't mention that man Lamun, Brother Barker, if you please," broke in Sister Juggins. "Pardner! get! He's head, he said, that's all."

"Yes, what is it, Cousin John? What is the matter?" echoed Clara, turning her face, all alive with compassionate interest, toward the unhappy Mieling, who experienced the agony of all requests when they see detection approaching. Whatever he pleaded he was sure to be tripped on the symptoms, or exposed by the first doctor called in to attend him. He grew pale and red, hot and cold, by turns, as he ransacked his brains for some unheard-of disease, when suddenly he remembered, apropos of the luckless trowers, Charles Read's novelette, "Propria que maribus;" and also that Clara not only knew no Latin but seldom opened a book.

"The disease is constitutional. In fact it may be called hereditary," said the little wretch, his mouth twitching. "I remember that my father often suffered from the same cause. There is nothing for it, as I said before, but time, quiet, and the water-cure. It is called Propria que maribus."

"How strange!" exclaimed Clara, with evident horror. "It must be dreadful. Is it very painful? I never heard of such a thing; did you, Aunt Miriam?" But Mrs. Douglas had walked hastily to the window, and stood there looking out, presenting to the company only a back view of her shoulders, which for some reason twitched unaccountably.

"Aunt Miriam!" exclaimed Clara, in surprise, and vaguely alarmed; "Cousin John! Aunt Mir! what is it? Is it incurable? Is it any thing like the edging around to peep under her aunt's bosom, when she saw, to her inexorable astonishment, that lady crimson, convulsive, and choking with suppressed laughter.

"I think we might go, Clara," said Mrs. Douglas, gurgling. "I do not believe that it is very dangerous. John will be likely to get on better without us," gasping hysterically.

"Aunt! Cousin John! what is it all about," asked the astonished girl, turning toward Mieling. Mieling made no answer. He was trying to die. Just at this juncture a heavy step shook the boards of the little entry, and, without knocking, entered Mrs. O'Flaherty, the "gray mix" dangling from her ears.

"An' here's yer pants, Mither Mieling," laying the articles in question on his bed, "though yez beether not be afther puttin' them on jist yet, I'm thinkin'; maybe they be'n't dirty intirely, I hurried them so." All the time staring hard at the lilac hat and Aunt Miriam; and coming to a dim notion that she might have been indiscreet, Mrs. O'Flaherty drew a long breath, and mended the matter thus.

"An' shure an' I'd have waited if I'd known yez had company, only yez said yez couldn't go out till I bring them, and charged me so petiklar, yez knows."

Mrs. Douglas rushed frantically out of the room, followed by Clara, and Mieling heard them on the landing.

"Aunt, what is it, and what is Propria que maribus?"

"His trowsers, child, his trowsers! It means, that which is proper for men! Did you never see the story? Oh! oh! oh!" Suppressed giggles, ruck and rattle of skirts on the stairs, and then the jar of the front-door below. They were gone. Mieling was a proper and a decorous little man, but he could not help saying, in strict confidence to the luckless "gray mix," still on the foot of his bed, "D—n it!"

Shortly after the President of the Princesse Bank gave Mieling a new suit and a situation at six hundred a year; but we fear Mieling could hardly have been sufficently grateful, for he never gave the President's daughter in return that opportunity of becoming Mrs. John Mieling.

WATCHING FOR THE NEXT THING.

THERE is reason to believe that some people never watch, so that their lives never contain any Next; things happen, and there is an end. It is doubtful if such persons could understand Cato's soliloquy, or Hamlet's. If they have any feeling about death, indeed, it must be that it is next-to nothing; but probably they have none. Such people, however, even if they ever read, can not be readers of any consequence; for the better part of the interest of reading lies in watching for the next idea. Let us, then, leave the consideration of pleasing these good folks till—next time. Their constitutional peculiarity will prevent their feeling the slight. But in the mean while we may, in passing, compassionate them; for theirs is in many ways a melancholy lot. They can never enter with zest into the higher mathematics. They can find no joy in thinking of the infinite divisibility of matter. They can take no proper interest in dissolving views or inexhaustible bottles. They could not possibly become absorbed in Fearnoe on Contingent Remainders, or astrology, or unfulfilled prophecy, or chess, or the kaleidoscope, or any thing that comes Next. They must stick to their Last; and, for my part, I would not stand in their shoes.

It is plain, among other things, that the persons of whom we now speak could never, in childhood, have snatched the fearful joy which you and I have tasted upon being authentically told that we should die after it. This demands an acute apprehension of the Next—and they have none at all. They can appreciate no argument founded upon succession. They never enjoyed the spectacle of a file of soldiers coming round a corner, or a flight of birds coming up from behind a clump of trees; or even a flight of stairs in a proper manner. What could a man of this kind make of Jacob's ladder? or of the paying out of the Atlantic telegraph, for that matter? It must surely have been a witness of this order who gave that ridiculous answer to the barrister's simple question, which way the stairs ran. "One way they ran up, and the other way they ran down." To a properly constituted mind there are few objects of greater interest than a cork-screw, but the class of whom we speak could make nothing of such an instrument.

To some lukewarm person who had never quite apprehended the subject we are, doubtless, inadequately for the popular proverb which informs us that the watched kettle never boils. Then, pray, what does it do? Are we to be told that a kettle is conscious, and has a will, or that the laws of matter are suspended? I will maintain, to my last cup of tea, that the singing of a kettle is unconscious, metaphysical; and that watching one communicates no disinclination to come up to 212° Fah. The proverb is either a parable or a jeu d'esprit—take your choice. If a parable, the Kettle is the Universe; which, to human eyes, is ever on the boil, never boiling; always growing, never full-grown. Or, again—and this will please people who like a good moral—the kettle is the work in watching which the watcher neglects some plain duty; and in that case the meaning is, Leave your Kettle to the fire underneath it, and go and do the next thing that lies handy. But there is a sermon about this view of the subject which throws doubt upon the kind of author to whom the proverb should be attributed. Taken as a metaphysical jeu d'esprit, the meaning is clear—we heard the same sort of thing from the Brazen Head in the Middle Ages, you know. If you scotch, the kettle never boils; it is either going to boil, or it has boiled. This is evidently the product of a mind like that which said the stairs ran up one way and down the other; and, unless it be taken as a pure jest, is a remarkable instance of human depravity. As a practical joke it may pass—it is like taking away a man's chair when he is waiting to sit down; but otherwise it is the emblem of Consciousness. It is rabeling out the processes of mind, and destroying the Eternal Now. And what is the next thing?

The nearest practical approach to this view of the case of the watched kettle is that of sleep that is watched for. Many of us know what it is to lie in bed counting the hours, and watching for unconsciousness. Now, this is manifestly absurd of us. We are as bad as the man who said he would go and see in the glass how he looked with his eyes shut; or as the man who, keeping his pigtail behind, fancied he could see it by turning his head. These errors are founded upon misconceptions of the eternal nature of things, which are so plain to the meaneast capacity as that you can not have your cake and eat it; and the melancholy fate of the two men is well known. The man with the pigtail grew so infatuated with the chase that the speed of agitation became unbearable, and he spun to death; the Irishman tried so persistently to look into his own shut eyes, reflected in a mirror, that he at last fancied he had become a camera obscura, or a catoptric cistula, I forget which, and alienated all his friends by charging to be looked at.

Well, you and I may, and let us hope, shall, escape the fate of these men; but we are quite as ridiculous when we watch for sleep. What we know is that we are not asleep, and that we want to be; but it is impossible to know the fact, when the essence of being asleep is to not know that you are awake. If Dr. Wigan was right—if the two hemispheres of the brain could carry on separate lives, and hold different opinions, and argue with each other, and convey different impulses to the motor nerves—then we might look forward to being asleep, and knowing it. But who would wish for a double-brain, unless, indeed, he contemplated making a fortune by going about in a show, like a spotted baby, and then subsiding, upon his retirement, into becoming uniformity? Doubtful consciousness might be agreeable at times, and under very complicated conditions, but it could never rank higher than throwing up two balls at a time for amusement. I would myself never trust a man who was Protestant with half his head, and Romanist with the other half; nor would the police, to say nothing of the street-boys, permit, in public thoroughfares, a man to stand in one spot all day long, with his right leg propelling him one way, and his left the other. Besides, if such a constitution were to be encouraged, what would become of Social Science? You would have double columns of averages directly; and how could you escape the return upon you, in a fresh form, of the insoluble problem of the three bodies?

It is quite certain that the clown, who said all he wished for in the world was to sit upon a gate and eat fat bacon forever, made a mistake. In time he would have found himself watching for the next thing, and so on, in endless repetition, till he discovered, if any one interpreted him to himself, that he wanted both ends of the rainbow. In the Plaisir de la Ferme de Madame de Genlis there is a fairy, who, in the revenge of her jealousy, sentences her husband's mistresses to all manner of fantastic punishments. One of them, a very virtuous girl, she condemns to an apparently endless stay in a country made on purpose, consisting entirely of level grass, smooth green sea, and cloudless sky bending over. Unless the poor creature had been rescued she would have gone mad, watching for something to be next. There are situations in life when the passion of watching has made the mind like a voice that has reached the sensitive note—it grazes the brink of the next, which seems as if it must come. One's feeling in such a case is almost one of madness if there be much suspense. A rapid, seemingly endless succession of nexts is capable of giving the same feeling, of maddening the mind; but, also, of soothing it. Who does not know what it is to look over the side of a vessel and watch the swift-following waves, or the swift-following bubbles of the foaming track with a feeling that, if the line were broken, if one single next were missed, it would be madness, despair, and infinite darkness, as if the world must at that moment end? I have done it myself till it seemed as if my heart would stop beating, and with it the great pendulum of God, which beats time for heaven and earth, if the pace of the current were broken. So, again, with a field of waving wheat, or blowing grass, or a mass of woodland bent by a great even wind. It has seemed to me as if no note of passion, no shriek of agony, or shout of joy—for either would do—could be strong enough to express sympathy with a meadow of butter-cups tossed and roused by the wind. If that should be the last undulation—if the golden flowers should wave so more! A feeling as of drowning, as of sense half-submerged in a fall fatuous deep through silent water, comes over me—there is, already, a singing in my ears, and a mist before my eyes—the time is, in reality, only a part of a second, but it seems an age till the next wave comes. But it is a come—they move, they laugh, the golden billows—the peninsula of God has not stopped beating—it is not yet the day of nothingness and silence. It is at such a moment as this that the horizon strikes the eye afresh with a sense of infinity. Oh that I had wings like a dove, for then would I see away, and in the pulses of an endless flight there would be something to silence the beatings of my heart!

If there are readers who can remember nothing in their own moods, of which this is a very faint copy, there are, I must think, but few who will not be able to recall something like it in connection with music. Have you never felt as if the close of some exquisite strain of harmony must be followed by something, or that your heart must that moment cease to beat? No man can see God and live, might the rapt soul say; but what remains but that I should see Him and die? And then there is the beating sound in the ear, the half-moment of watching, scarcely conscious, with a feeling as if some monstrous bird, blacker than a thousand midnight, were sweeping up, up, up from the underworld behind to darken all, and end all, if nothing comes. And nothing comes. But these Fallings from us, vanishing,

Dark misgivings of a creature Moving about in worlds not realized.

do not pass without being remembered; sometimes we can recall them at one bound of thought; and then—

Though inland far we be,
Our souls have wings—ah, what a bitter
Which brought us hither,
Can in a moment travel thither,
And see the children spot upon the shore,
And hear the mighty waves rolling o'er us.

We have all heard of the "rustic"—a rustic capitalist—who is represented to be waiting till the river has run past him. But the human mind never did really conceive such a rustic. Wordsworth says, you know ("Essay on Epitaphs"), that "there never was a child who, standing by a stream, did not wonder where it came from, and where it would go to." If such a child there were, he would, of course, be father to the man (if such a man there really is, and I fear I have hinted as much) who never watches for the next thing. But there are, in truth, perhaps few children, perhaps none, who have not felt what we may call the transient madness, the hysterical passion, of watching for the next thing. Some have felt it, as adults weakened by fever have felt it, as adults looking at the dancing splashes of a chandelier; others in looking at a tree, the top of which just peeped over the gable of a house-roof; or at the swift-rising moon. The tree seems as if it must grow higher that instant; and what then? what will not happen? The moon, as if she must climb swiftly up to a given mark, and then up to another, and another—and what will be the consequence? what will be the consequence? A passage in a well-known poem of Wordsworth's, in which the dropping of the moon behind a cottage-roof is followed by a suggestion of the death of his Lucy, may help to reduce this kind of phantasy from contempt in the minds of my readers—if any—who feel that it is too trivial to be worthy of a thought. But, indeed, nearly all men, in highly-wrought moods, have sensations which are analogous. It was not a child, a weakling, or a fantastic person, like whose mouth the same poet put words such as these—in was only a man in love—

The clouds pass on; they fret the heavens depart;
I look—the sky is crazy open;
I know not what I trace;
But when I cease to look, my head is on my heart.

Thus Eglantine, whose arch so proudly towers
Gives like a rainbow spanning, but the vale,
Thou one fair arch, art stand thy bow
And stir not in the gale.

For thus to see thee nodding in the air,
To see thy arch thus stretch and bend,
Thus rise and thus descend—
Doubts in me till the sight is more than I can bear.

"The man," Wordsworth continues, "who makes this feverish complaint, is of giant stature, and could dance in heat itself." But this is what love has brought him to! Love, who "has been a villain since the days of Troy and Helen; who caused the fall of Paris, and a good many more."

There are times when a quick succession of nexts is found merely soothing; but they are times of necessary laze, when there is not left force enough to watch; when what we attend to is the rhythm only. Thus, we find the ticking of a clock soothing—indeed, to mention this is commonplace. But what a dreadful effect may be produced upon the mind by the sudden cessation of the ticking of a clock, when once a certain experience has been gone through! Who that has counted the beatings of a pulse, or listened to the flutterings of a breast, watching for the next, and the next, and the next, and coming at last to the one which has no next, can leave, without agony, to hear a watch or a clock stop ticking, or to hear any rhythmical sound cease suddenly? Reader, one of the most horrible moments of my life was a moment in which the rhythmic note of a common saw, heard over the parapet of a bridge in London, stopped suddenly when I was listening for it. In the distance I heard the saw softened; it had a wisp with it, which reminded me, not too painfully, of the sound of common breath; but when it ceased, I thought I could bear no more in this world, and longed to be that moment taken away. Of course the emotion of that moment was imported from my recollection of a moment of which it was the symbol; but I think the sudden cessation of any thing with a beat in it was always a terror to me.

The fact is, there are some of us who have too much nextness in our composition. "Can you draw an inference?" said Coleridge to the clown. "Yes, Sir," says the clown, "a cart-load of 'em!"

That is the way with you and me; we are too eager to draw our cart-load of inferences, and when we find the inferences will not be drawn we suffer. No man can live into the middle of next week. Respect the almanac. How can you possibly have a whole twelvemonth at once? There is this peculiarity about the Next Thing, remember—that it is sure to come, whether you watch or not. And what a blessing there is in certainty! What relief in the thought that something must happen! We know the difficulty, our own, of holding in check our tyrannical, habitual mood of passivity. Every second of time in our experience throws out a pentameter bridge to the next. We live by a clock that has two sets of hands on the same dial-plate; one is right, and the other is always too fast. Our twelve o'clock is twelve-and-something-short-of-one-o'clock. This depends upon congenital peculiarities, of course—we can not wholly help it, and why should we try to? Still it is painful to have to confess, for example, that the longest musical key-board ever made to a piano appears too short to us. It is so. Looking at a piano the other evening, in a dreamy mood, I was almost struck with a sense of the truncated or arrested appearance of the series of black and white keys—of more they stop than they count. "It is a nice one, isn't it?" said the lovely mistress of the instrument, bending her fair head over the cabinet of sweet sounds. "Imperfect," said I, loudly. "Dear me, where, Mr. Browne?" she inquired. "The key-board," I replied, "is not long enough." "Why," she resumed, "it's full compass—they do not sell them larger—how many octaves would you have?" How many? said I, "millions! When you get to the last, there ought to be one next to it; and one next to that." "Dear me!" said the lady, "it would be like the picture in the 'View of Wakefield'—you could not get it into the room!" "No," said I, "it couldn't be—you might burn it round. Music-stools are always made to turn on an axle; so it would be easy to play upon." "Oh, Mr. Browne!" said this beautiful girl, "you are joking—think how giddy I should be!" "Then," said I, "let it go straight on till it comes to a stop; let it shade off into Space! There is plenty of room in the universe. People talk about wanting room for this, that, and the other, when extension is unbounded! I lay it down as a first principle that nothing ought ever to leave off!" "Oh, Mr. Browne!" said my friend, "what next?"

We do not expect a lady to be logical, so I did not press the point. Nor did I recommend her to read that great Christian Father who believed that at the Resurrection of the dead all bodies would be of a round form, because that was the only perfect figure. His private character may have been, and indeed was, virtuous; but he resided in a vicious circle. If every thing is supposed globular, and the globe is all concentric, the intrinsically placed outside, seen to question of next. But nextness in a circle does not satisfy the mind which has never been fascinated with the charms of infinite nextness. I have often thought I should like to be fixed upon the wings of some huge, lowering bird, in such a height that, looking down, I could see the billows of the sea, dark-green curves fringed with white, chasing one another, on and on, in an everlasting round. But there is always an unsatisfactory feeling—once over you when I picture to myself the last wave reaching up to the same spot again, like the imaginary ship in the crevices of geography. It seems so foolish of it—as had as a comet, which has always appeared to me a singular form of being, for coming here again would not a billow of any spirit which its opportunity and go off into space, gradually changing the parallel direction of the start into a straight line? That is my feeling. Hence, I have better to think of the sea as a great plain, on which the white couriers run an endless race. It is high and their names in the blowing south, and on they go, multitudes in music. Never shall we, who stand on the shore, see one of them again. When this is gone, this in which dip the feet of the children, we shall see the next. And always, and always, the next. How long shall we watch?

OUR IRON-CLAD NAVY.

We give this week on pages 72 and 73 engravings illustrating the iron-clad vessels of every class in the United States Navy. All together the number of these clad vessels constructed since the beginning of the rebellion amounts to 62. A very few of these have been lost; but in compensation for this loss several formidable ones, built by the rebels and captured by our forces, have become, with certain modifications, very efficient vessels in the United States Navy—sketches of three of which, the Mississippi, Albatross, and Texas, are also given. In combination with those constructed by our Navy Department, our iron-clad vessels are of the most various kinds, from the light-draught Monitor to the gigantic sailing ram Texas. All but six or seven of our iron-clads have the Ericsson turret. We have 12 double-turreted vessels. One—the New York—has three turrets.

If we compare our navy with that of Great Britain two advantages, as it seems to us, are very apparent. In the first place, our navy greatly outnumbered the British in iron-clad vessels. According to the published estimate of the British navy in 1863, the whole number of armor-plated vessels of all kinds, even including floating-batteries, was 28. These, again, the very principle upon which our iron-clads are built renders them, no think, vastly superior to even the most formidable armor-plated vessels in the British navy. Instead of a large, movable vessel of the Wasp type, exposing a large surface to the shot and shell of an adversary, we have the compact, light, and easily-handled Monitor. In the latter but a small surface is exposed, and that is rendered almost impregnable. A rain the Texas is to take another specimen of our iron-clad fleet—is the most formidable vessel in the world. For our illustrations of iron-clad vessels we owe much to the admirable lithograph, published by ENGRAVERS & Co., of this city.

THE "DICTATOR"
Iron-clad Gun, 2 guns, 2033 tons, length 224 feet, breadth 33 feet, depth 22 feet. Built in New York by C. H. Delamater, from drawings and plans by John Ericsson. Launched December 26, 1862. Two vessels of this class—the "Dictator" and "Furber"—both sea-going.

THE "MANAYUNK"
Iron-clad, 2 guns, 1654 tons, length 224 feet, breadth 43 feet. Built at Pittsburg by Sawdons & Mason. There are eight vessels of this class, of which the "Cincinnati" is one. Designed for harbors and rivers.

THE "OREGON"
Iron-clad, 2 guns, 375 tons. Built in Portland, Ore., by George C. Bentler, 1862. Three vessels of this class—the "Oregon," "Albatross," and "Albatross"—all 1 gun. Tonnage of the three, 1024.

THE "ONONDAGA"
Iron-clad Battery, 4 guns, 1250 tons, length 225 feet, breadth 50 feet. Built by T. F. Rowland, Greenpoint, L. I. Launched July 17, 1863.

THE "ROANOKE"
Iron-clad, 6 guns. The United States Frigate "Roanoke" cut down to her gun-deck, plated. Received three Ericsson turbines at Stevens Iron Works, New York, 1863. Length 220 feet, breadth 65 1/2 feet. Sea-going.

THE "HAM"
Steam Frigate, a rebel cruiser, surrendered at the close of the war—3 guns, 1300 tons. First built in 1862.

THE "NEW IRONSIDES"
Iron-clad, 20 guns, 3495 tons. Built by Merrick & Sons, at Philadelphia. Launched May 16, 1862. Sea-going.

GRANTED INTO THE ARMY.

In the list of wounded in the memorable battle of Antietam might have been found the name of Patrick Mahoney, private in the 14th Michigan, and a subsequent evaluation of loyalty at the Adjutant-General's Department would have disclosed the fact that the said Patrick Mahoney had been honorably discharged from the service, within a short time after his recovery, on the ground that he no longer represented the legitimate ally of his people. This notice of the Department was due to the Surgeon's report, wherein it was stated, in ambiguous technicalities, that the said private Patrick Mahoney was the author and perpetrator of three bullet wounds, one of which he carried in his right arm, and the other two in his left leg. The report, moreover, stated that the missile in question had been so skillfully lodged in the fleshy intermuscle of the Irish hero, that all attempts to dislodge them through the ordinary processes of digging, boring, cutting, gouging, and other attempts usually resorted upon the living subject under such circumstances, had totally failed.

With his discharge from the service in his pocket, together with a certificate signifying that the Government would at some future date settle his little bill for services rendered, a pig in his mouth, a thick stick (alias shillalah) under his arm, the ex-infantry hero, while walking down the main street of the town of K—, in the State of Michigan, arrested himself with perplexing speculation as to the means of getting back into the service again. That very morning he had called upon a celebrated physician of the place, in hopes of procuring a certificate of physical ability which would enable him to enlist again in his old regiment, but the doctor had assured him that it was quite impossible to pass him. Pat, bitterly disappointed, resorted to himself the injustice with which he had been treated, and mentally and heartily rebuked the old physician, whose conduct appeared to the disappointed candidate to be prompted entirely by a spirit of personal malevolence.

"Shure it's a sin and a shame," soliloquized Pat, "that the old sarkness should say I won't fit for the service. I wonder when was his conscience to cheat a poor boy out of an honest living, and the chance of fighting for the sold flag. I'll go hail, now, he is nothing but a rascal, surgeon, and phisic's bones. Shure I wouldn't trust him to physic a clothes-line. He's swallowed a whole shell of die beauty, and got the words down wrong and forsook. And just because I've got three bullets in my arm and legs. Shure I could carry a cart-load of bullets—I don't feel them. And didn't I hear Captain Matchlock say that once in the olden times a man had back his legs cut off in a scrimmage and fought it out on his stumps, like a red old Irish pesthouse as he was? And his name was O'Wildington, a relation of my own by my mother's side. Hillo! here's a pair of shoulder-scrapes coming down the street. By the powers, it's Captain Matchlock! Ah! isn't he the darling! He ought to have been born an Irishman, he takes so a shilly so nery."

The officer in question—a tall, dark-complexioned, handsome fellow—approached. As he drew near to Pat he was surprised to see the latter throw his cap into the air and dance an impromptu hornpipe.

"Long life to ye, Captain!" shouted the Irishman, "and here's the old Hundred and Forty-seventh, both! and when did you leave the Army of the Potomac? And how's Teddy Murphy, and Jennie Miller, and the old Billy Goat, and all the other boys? And sure ain't I glad to see you standing on your own pins, and not a scratch on your handsome face, my darling, after that little scrimmage of '63? The little scrimmage referred to the battle of the system.

The officer, who seemed to be quite as much pleased as Pat at meeting an old soldier of his regiment, shook hands with the private, and exclaimed:

"Why, Pat! from what part of the world did you spring?"

"O! Ireland!" answered Pat; "first flower of the earth and first gem of the say!"

"But how did you leave your regiment? You haven't deserted, I hope?"

"Deserted!" indignantly exclaimed Pat. "No, they discharged me."

"For what?" asked the Captain.

"For getting two bullets in my leg and one in my arm," said Pat, reverentially.

"They don't seem to trouble you much," said the Captain, laughing.

"Trouble!" returned the dejected Pat; "my heart's just broke with them."

"Why don't you get medical advice?"

"I'm just full of that same. The best surgeon I consulted wouldn't give me a certificate."

"What did he say?" asked the Captain.

"Oh," replied Pat, "he said a power of nonsense, and told me I had deranged duck in my cistern!"

"Nonsense!" said the Captain.

"There for you, Sir," replied the indignant Pat; "that's just what it was—the ignorant hatched list, Captain, I want you to do me a favor."

"What is it?" said the Captain. "If I can help you, you have only to show me the way. I've not forgotten that but for you I should have been left upon the field of Antietam."

"Ah!" said Pat, "that was the pleasantest scrimmage I ever got into; and on my conscience, that best of gentlemen from Arkansas was the dearest child of the whole lot. Do you mind that old piece of a myth he was laying about with? I've kept it ever since, and by the piper that played before Moses, I'm going to have it to be handed down to my ancestors."

"Yes," said the Captain. "I believe I should be able conscientiously negotiated with the Adjutant-General's Department if it had not been for your glibness. But you haven't told me what I can do for you."

"Why then, Captain, do let me," said Pat, "you are going back to the Potomac?"

"Certainly," replied the Captain. "The Government is about to send me to the Potomac."

"Oh, that's all right," said Pat, "I'll be glad to go with you."

"But you must be ready to go at once," said the Captain.

"Oh, that's all right," said Pat, "I'll be ready to go at once."

"Then," said Pat, "I want you to take me along with you."

"Why, Pat, how can I take you?" said the Captain. "You know they won't allow civilians in the camp."

"You and eggs!" cried Pat, with a howl, "I'm not a civilian. There's nothing civil about me! You know they allow you a servant; they'll see the buttons, shillalah no questions."

"I might struggle you in in that way, to be sure," said the Captain.

"Of course you might," returned Pat; "and when it comes to the shilly—"

Pat said no more, but went through an expressive bit of pantomime with the shillalah, commencing with the salute exercise, followed up with taking accurate aim at a visionary general officer in a gray coat, and ending by pulling an imaginary trigger on the leveled shillalah.

"Very well," said the Captain, much amused at Pat's exhibition. "Since you have set your heart upon camp life I'll see what can be done for you."

"Hurray!" exclaimed Pat, jumping up, and then executing a violent and rapid "pas seul" on the shillalah. "Hurray! I'm grafted into the army of the Potomac. Perhaps I'll get to be a general. Won't it read beautiful in the dispatches. On the 14th General Patrick Mahoney made a severe diversion, all alone by himself, into the ranks of the enemy, and returned with the loss of one killed and seventeen wounded. Won't I get into the newspapers! Perhaps I'll be lucky enough to lose a leg, and they'll send me to Congress. Whew! Long life to the Mahoneys!" Here Pat executed another violent flourish of an Irish jig.

"Now, Pat," said the Captain, as soon as the volatile Irishman had become a little subdued, "there is something you can do for me—that is, if I can rely on your discretion."

"Of course you can," eagerly exclaimed Pat. "I don't know what it is, but you can rely on it."

"Very well," said the Captain. "I want you to deliver a note to a young lady."

"I'll give you a stamp," said Pat, "and you can send it through the post-office."

"Why, you stupid fellow," said the Captain, "you won't deliver it secretly?"

"Well," rejoined Pat, "they won't break it open in the post-office without there's money in it; sure it's safe enough."

"No, no," said the Captain, impatiently. "I want it delivered in such a manner that her uncle and aunt won't know anything about it."

"Of course," said Pat, confidently. "I don't know her uncle and aunt, and I'll give it to her safe enough."

"You must be careful," said the Captain, "and be sure you make no blunders."

"Oh, I'll be careful, sure. Where does she live, the darlin'?"

"Turn round," said the Captain. "Now do you see that large white house facing the end of this street on the top of the hill?"

"Numb! Captain; I can't go there," said Pat.

"Why? What's the reason?" asked the Captain, anxiously.

"I've been there before," said Pat.

"Well," said the Captain, impatiently, "that's no reason you shouldn't go there again, is it?"

"Isn't it, though?" replied Pat, shaking his head.

"Perhaps you never had a kettle of boiling water poured over your head, and a part of it into your shoes?"

"No, I certainly never did," said the Captain, laughing.

"Well, I have," growled Pat, "and the sensation is mighty disagreeable. I went there to see a wild Irish girl who is the cook there, and the old woman, old Mrs. Safeguard, that's her name, she baptized me."

"Well," said the Captain, still laughing, "she didn't approve of your fame, perhaps."

"No," rejoined Pat, with a grin, "but she introduced me to something quite as hot; the boiling water. And the old gentleman, he's a nice old curmudgeon; he called me a 'shaving blackguard of a soldier,' and said I ought to be sent to the almshouse."

"That didn't suit your views, I presume," said the Captain.

"Fats! I don't know," replied Pat. "Perhaps I was thinking of the almshouse when I went to see Biddy."

"It's unfortunate," said the Captain, "that you are known there; but you must make an effort. Can't you disguise yourself?"

"I can do that same," said Pat, in the most confident manner. "I'll get some of my old mother's petticoats and transform myself into a July."

"That might do," said the Captain, highly amused at the idea of such a transformation. "If you think you could manage it without fear of discovery."

"Of course I can," said the elated Pat. "Don't you remember when the boys used to dance jigs, on the barn door we borrowed at Culpeper, and I was always the old woman with the petticoat and the hoops I got off of a dear barrel? Just you wait till you see me with a real illegit' barrel, and a little duck in my mouth, and you'll take your davy I'm my own grandchild."

"Very well, Pat," said the Captain, "I must trust to you. Do the best you can. You'll find me at the K— Hotel, after you have got through your mission, which, I hope, you will carry out without going through boiling water a second time."

"Never fear for me, Captain," said Pat, rushing off. As he disappeared down the street the passers-by were electrified with an occasional line from the strikingly descriptive ballad of Bryan O'Lyons.

The Captain looked after him as he disappeared, and then took his way to the hotel. His sole resources were the pay of a Captain in the army, rude health, indomitable will, and a buoyant and elastic disposition. He was, to that singular circumstance of a man of his age, the result of a dreadful fall. He was of unfeignable depth, into the abyss called love. At the foot of the precipice over which he had tumbled he had seen a pair of blue eyes, lovingly gazing upward through a maze of golden hair, and the last object gives to his view when he completely lost his senses was a pair of white arms that beckoned him to approach. Brave as he was he surrendered without a struggle, and having reached the feet of the siren, he found in his dismay that an obstinate slat of dog-wood, in the shape of a miserly uncle, and wearisome, in the guise of a still more covetous aunt, completely barred the entrance to the Temple of Hymen.

Captain Matchlock knew that his brief leave of absence would soon be over. He had tried in vain to obtain an interview with Mary Safeguard, for that was the name of his divinity, but had signally failed. The old couple, who were vigorously opposed to the match, kept the young lady under watch and ward, and exercised such a vigilant guardianship that no opportunity was afforded the lovers for either a chance or a premeditated meeting. Letters had been intercepted, and every device that human ingenuity could invent had been resorted to to create a breach in the faith and constancy so perseveringly shown by the lovers. The Captain was at his wit's end. He had almost made up his mind to call for volunteers, storm and carry the place at the point of the bayonet, when Pat unexpectedly turned up and suggested a transformation unknown to Ovid—Mercury in petticoats!

"I wish," soliloquized the Captain, "I had a better fortune to offer her than a Captain's pay, and a ticket in a lottery of bullets; but her guardianship by so unkindly that I believe no change, even the rude life of the camp, would be welcome to her. I have offered to take her away, by force if necessary. I have told her my mother would receive her, and when this war is over, and that will soon be, we would be married. I hope Pat will not fail. I must see her, or hear from her at once."

Here the Times and Journal, morning edition—great news from the Army of the Potomac! shouted a ragged urchin, with a bundle of papers under his arm, who now came tearing up the street in full cry.

"Here, boy!" exclaimed the Captain.

"Yes, Sir," said the boy, coming to a stop, and standing on one foot. "Here they are, Sir; morning papers—great fight! Capture of Richmond—all the particulars."

"Never mind about the capture of Richmond," said the Captain, "that's been captured by the newspapers so often that the army don't take much interest in it. Let me see," he continued, looking over the telegraphic column, while the little urchin rushed on, startling the whole street with the news that Richmond had fallen once more. "let me see," said the Captain. "Hem!—Frightful murder!—Grand Cavalry Skirmish! Felicitous juxtaposition that; gross mismanagement of the War Department, of course; this correspondent was originally intended for Secretary of War. Here we have it, at last. Highly important from the Army of the Potomac! No probability of an advance! There's something gratifying in the originality of that statement. Ha! what's this? List of drafted men in the city of K—. To be sure; I had forgotten the draft took place yesterday—no community this time, must serve. Some of these rebellious patriots had small appetite for their breakfast this morning, I'm afraid. List of drafted men—Ben Cassidy, Fizz Henry, Thomas Evans, Peter Safeguard! Huzzah! I have him now. I'll buy my wife. Why, this fellow must be in the last stages of fever. He knows it's next to impossible to get a substitute. Mr. Peter Safeguard, in about one hour, I shall do myself the honor of calling upon you." So saying, the Captain entered the hotel, which he had reached at the close of his cursory glance at the paper. Leaving him actively preparing to beat up the enemy's quarters, the reader may take the liberty of inspecting for himself the garrison of the white house on the top of the hill, now commanded by Mrs. Peter Safeguard, vice Peter, retired for gross incapacity.

Peter Safeguard was a small pattern, about five feet four inches in height, quite gray, thoroughly bespeckled and balding, and with one trait of individuality that perhaps saved him from sinking into hopeless imbecility under the sharp discipline of his wife's tongue. This salient point, which reddeus Peter from being considered only generically in this sketch, was his grasping and covetous disposition. It was the only point upon which he contended with his wife. He had a horror of fashion, because it was expensive; and if the climate had permitted, in his cordial dislike of tailors and dress-makers, and their attendant horrors in the shape of bills, would have advocated the original fig-leaf costume as being strikingly appropriate, and, above all, economical. He was, for his sins, just forty-four years and eleven months old at the time when Destiny, as if with instinctive malice, had caused his name to come up in the wheel, and compelled Peter Safeguard to appear in the lists as a most unwilling champion in the cause of freedom.

Mrs. Safeguard was a little, thin, sharp-need woman, considerably older than her husband—a doctrinaire champion of woman's rights, and the proprietress of her husband in every sense of the word. She had wedded Peter with fierceness, and married him in spite of his remonstrances. Her father, an old ex-minister at one of the European courts, at the age of seventy-three, becoming fascinated with the attractions of a little, pale, slender widow, married her by stealth a year after he had lost his first wife, and brought her home to provide over his household, to the great wrath of his daughter. A war immediately broke out, and the result was that the Amazonian daughter met with a most inglorious defeat from the fragile widow, who proved herself a very Boudicca in arms. She not only succeeded in driving her enemy from the garrison, but beat the old diplomatist at his own weapons, by compelling him to settle every dollar of his property on her; and by dint of judicious nursing got rid of her superannuated husband, who died in a year after the marriage.

Mrs. Peter kept up the conflict in society; but the widow, better provided with the sinews of war, retorted the superiority, and spoke of her stepdaughter in so patronizing a manner to their mutual friends that the latter would have cheerfully consented to the introduction of the Oriental custom of burning widows on the tomb of their defunct husbands.

This solemn lady is now seated in the drawing-room of her own house; and seated with her, in a very dependent mood, the fair heroine of the story is compelled to listen to the advice, a thousand times administered, to receive the attentions of an old challepper whose only attractions consisted of bonds, mortgages, and other evidences of the great social evil, money.

"It is no use to you to talk, Mary," said Mrs. Safeguard, "Mr. Walworth is in every respect an eligible party. I am determined you shall marry him, and your uncle is determined you shall marry him; so you might as well make up your mind to submit."

"I think my uncle has very little voice in the matter," said Mary.

"Indeed he has," replied the irascible Mrs. Peter, "and if he presumed not to have a voice in the matter I'd very soon teach him that he had. His voice is mine, and whatever I am determined on is determined on, and very determined too, or I'd know the reason why."

"But, aunt," said Mary, "you know I have given my promise to Captain Matchlock, and if you could only be induced to approve the engagement—"

"Engagement! You talk like a child; there is no engagement, and never shall be. A soldier, indeed! I believe in the old saw, 'Marry a soldier and carry his wallet.' Besides, we have both set our hearts on your marrying Mr. Walworth."

"Why, aunt," said Mary, "he is seventy years old if he is a day!"

"Well," said Mrs. Peter, "that don't hurt him. If he is seventy years old he has twice seventy thousand dollars."

"And that," rejoined Mary, "I suppose you consider equivalent to twice seventy thousand virtues."

"Nonsense, child," said Mrs. Peter, impatiently.

"Since you went to that fashionable boarding-school your head is full of rubbish and nonsense. The Prince of Orange once went down on one knee and died up my abs, when it had become unlaced at the collar-hole. If it had been you, your head would have been completely turned. It didn't spoil me, though. And when the Baron de Vandalieu, a delightful young man, with weak eyes and light hair, with a great golden mustache, offered me his hand and heart I sent him about his business. I found out his income was just six hundred dollars, not enough to pay my shoemaker's bill. I married Peter, a steady man, and a man of property; and look at the consequences: He is a model of a husband, never quarrels, and we have every thing to make us comfortable. Depend upon it, there is nothing like money and the comforts it will bring."

"I would rather live on a crust for the remainder of my days," said Mary, "than marry a man I did not love."

"Stuff and nonsense!" rejoined Mrs. Peter, in the most positive manner. "Love in a cottage? Bah! love is a pigsty; and who is this Captain Matchlock? Nobody knows anything about him."

"He is a brave soldier, aunt," returned Mary, indignantly—"a brave soldier, who has fought for his country—a title that every man who loves his native land should be proud of."

Mrs. Peter was about to reply to this indignant burst on the part of her niece, with some reflections upon the patriotism that was bought with money, when she was interrupted by the opening of the door and the appearance of the immortal Peter who came in with a newspaper in his hand, and who proceeded to walk up and down the drawing-room in a manner so nervous and agitated that it excited the wrath of his amiable wife.

"Mr. Safeguard," said she, "will you have the kindness to explain what you mean by bursting into my presence like a mad bull, and bounding about like a polar bear in a cage?"

"Matter!" exclaimed Peter, who was so completely taken up with his own troubles that he could not see the signs of the coming storm—"matter enough, I should think. Have you read the morning papers, Mrs. S.?"

"Yes," answered Mrs. Safeguard, in her most sarcastic manner, "I have read the morning papers, but I don't think it incumbent upon myself in consequence to behave like a lunatic, though the papers nowadays are aggravating enough to worry a saint."

"That's it," returned Peter, with as sour an approach to a sneer as his inexpressive countenance was capable of; "you have read the papers, and don't know the news."

"I should like to know," said the acidulous Mrs. Peter, "any sensible woman who does know the news after reading the morning paper, especially when she has read the largest portion of it the day previous."

"I have seen more than I want to see, at any rate," growled Peter.

"Mr. Safeguard," said his wife, with her most determined look, "do you intend to explain yourself, or shall I have to use force?"

"The draft," said Peter; "now do you understand?"

"The draft," said Mrs. Peter; "what draft? Do you mean to say you have got the rheumatism again?"

"The rheumatism be—blowed!" said Peter, checking himself on the utterance of an oath and substituting a milder term. "I've caught something worse than that, or, rather, it has caught me."

A sudden light broke in upon the understanding of his wife. She stamped her foot impatiently. "You don't mean to tell me, Peter," she cried, "that you have been fool enough to get drafted?"

"Well, my dear," replied Peter, in a mildly sarcastic manner, "as I had no particular choice in the matter, I don't see how I was going to prevent it."

"Prevent it!" retorted his wife, scornfully. "Why didn't you get appointed on the Committee, and see that your name was left off the list?"

"You had better ask," rejoined the exasperated

Peter, "why I didn't reduce myself to sixteen years of age, or become suddenly deaf and dumb."

"Peter," said Mrs. Safeguard, whose wrath had changed to contempt, "you are a fool!"

"Thank you, my love," said the gratified Peter. "Unfortunately the Government don't reject individuals of the intellectual status that you have established for me."

Mrs. Safeguard, wringing her hands in Julia's excitement, like that unfortunate heroine in the Hunchback, "What's to be done?"

Peter, misinterpreting the allusion for a call upon him for an opinion, proceeded to express it:

"Well," he exclaimed, "there are two horns to the dilemma: one is to shoulder a musket; and the other is to pay a thousand dollars, or more, for a substitute."

"The last is not to be thought of," said Mrs. Safeguard, reflectively.

"And the first won't bear thinking of," added Peter, with a shiver.

"Oh," said Mrs. Peter, impatiently, "you are a coward!"

"The fact of my marrying you proves the contrary, my dear," said Peter, complacently.

"That's right!" retorted Mrs. Peter, "abuse your wife! But I advise you," she said, with sudden ferocity, "to save all your wrath for the enemy. You'll need it before you get through!"

At this moment, and before Peter could find a fitting retort to this last unexpected attack, a knock was heard at the door. "Come in!" said Mrs. Peter, thinking it was one of the servants.

To her order the door quietly opened, and there appeared a stalwart woman, dressed in a calico frock, which was so long that it trailed on the ground. Although the weather was warm she was bundled up in a large woolen shawl, while her head was ornamented with the most outrageous pattern of a straw-bonnet, dating back seemingly to the fabulous ages; a green veil almost concealed her face—what was seen of it indicated a red, coarse, Irish countenance; while her voice, in its unmistakable tone, proclaimed her race. This overgrown oddity stood at the door and courted several times, until Mrs. Safeguard, irritated at the sight, cried out:

"What do you want here, old woman?"

"Sure, ma'am, I'm in a dale of trouble," replied a voice so deep and hoarse that it added to the repugnance already felt by Mrs. Safeguard at her presence.

"What's that to me?" she cried. "Say what you want, and get out over your business!"

"Yes, ma'am," said Pat—for it was he. "As you say, it's hard times for the poor widders; and my boy, the only one living out of seventeen, has been drafted into the army."

"Serve him right!" ejaculated Mrs. Peter, who hated the Irish. "What business had he to come to this country?"

"Sure, ma'am, he didn't come here at all. He was born here, ma'am.—Here Pat, by some ingenious twisting around, contrived to show Mary the corner of a letter, by "poking it at her" slyly, as he termed it, from one's mouth to the other. Mary, whose perceptions had been sharpened under the surveillance to which she had been subjected, saw in it an old woman an ensouler of her lover, and by an almost imperceptible nod gave Pat to understand that she comprehended the plot.

"Sure, ma'am," said Pat, addressing himself to Mrs. Safeguard, "it wasn't the poor boy's fault that he was born here."

"Yes, it was," retorted Mrs. Peter. "He had no business to be born here. He's as big a fool as Peter here, who has gone and got himself drafted. But what do you want here?"

Pat, disregarding the question, gazed admiringly at Peter and exclaimed, "So they've drafted you into the army, Sir?"

"Yes, they have," said Peter, depending as he thought of it. "The army is in luck."

"Of course," said Pat, "you are going to shoulder a musket and have a hand in the scrimmage?"

"Well," replied Peter, reflectively, "I think, considering the imperfect knowledge I have of that weapon, I should rather prefer some other hero shouldering it for me."

"Do you want a substitute?" asked Pat, eagerly.

"Will, yes," replied Peter, "if I could get a second-hand one cheap."

"I know where you can get one, Sir," said Pat.

"Where?" said Peter.

"Here," said Pat, striking himself on the chest.

"I'm your man. I'll go cheap, just for the fun of the th' ag."

"You!" said Peter, looking contemptuously upon the blundering Irishman. "Do you think the Government will accept an old woman in my place?"

"An old woman?" retorted Pat. "Begorra! he must run to himself, 'I quite forgot I was my own grandmother. Faix, Sir," he said, "I don't know why one old woman isn't as good as another old woman."

Here Mrs. Safeguard, who allowed no one to abuse her husband but herself, immediately struck him, most delicately:

"How dare you," she cried, "call my husband an old woman, you impudent old wretch! It's my opinion you are intoxicated!"

"Sure," said Pat, "I'm fasting from all but sin this blessed moment; and you ought to be ashamed of yourself to insult a poor lone widder, without a chick or a child in the wide world—not one out of seventeen, barring my poor boy Jerry, and they've got fed him into the army. Sure they've broke my heart entirely, so they have, oh! oh!" Here Pat began to sob violently. "I've got the draft somewhere. I feel bad. Oh! somebody give me a glass of water. Oh dear! oh dear!"

Peter, who was the soul of liberality when it came to a glass of water, told Mary to bring it, and, with Mrs. Safeguard's assistance, supported Pat into a chair. Mrs. Safeguard, in terror lest the old wretch, as she mentally termed Pat, should have a fit, Mary returned in a moment, bringing a glass of water. As she held it out to Pat that ingenious gentleman contrived, with two simultaneous movements, to tread heavily upon Peter's foot, and to give Mrs. Safeguard an unpleasant dig in the stomach with his elbow. While Mr. and Mrs. Peter were writhing under these indignities Pat contrived to slip the letter into Mary's hand, who, on receiving it, turned her back and walked to the window.

"Oh, I feel so much better now," said Pat; "I feel so much relieved. Every time I hear of any body being drafted it gives me a pain in my waist."

Mrs. Peter, who had been dancing around in the extremity of pain, recovered her breath at last sufficiently to order Peter to turn the old woman out of doors.

"I'd like to see him try it," said Pat; "I'd give him a disability in the army."

"Do you mean to say, you horrid old wretch, that you'll stay here in spite of us?" asked Mrs. Peter.

"As coorse I do," said Pat, composedly. "Isn't my Jerry sleeping out on the cold ground, and you living here in luxury, you ungrateful old woman?"

"Peter," said his wife, "if you don't kick that old woman out of doors you shall go to the army as sure as my name is Safeguard."

Peter, thus peremptorily ordered, rolled up his cuffs and slowly advanced toward the old woman, thinking to intimidate her by a show of resolution, but as he put out his hand to take her by the shoulder he was horrified at seeing a huge cogged rim slowly and mysteriously from the folds of the woolen shawl. It shook ominously in the eyes of the startled Peter. He turned back his coat cuffs and backed away from the threatening weapon.

"No, I thank you, Mrs. S.," he cried. "I'll join the Army of the Potomac: I think it will be safer."

Mrs. Peter did not hear this refusal to obey her commands. She had suddenly become aware that her niece, with her back turned to her, was reading a letter; approaching her cautiously, she caught the paper from her hands, and in a moment made herself acquainted with the contents.

"Very pretty, indeed, you mix," she cried. "A love-letter from that wretch of an officer. But I'll frustrate his plans. As for you, you impudent old woman, I'll teach you what you may expect if you ever put your foot in this house again."

So saying, she caught up a highly polished brass poker which stood as an ornament at the parlor fireplace, and threatening Pat with it, ordered him to leave the house, or she would turn him over to the police with her own hands.

"The police!" exclaimed Pat, "I'd like to catch one of the villains putting their hands on to a lone widder."

"Very well, ma'am, I'll see if this poker or your Irish head is the hardest," said Mrs. Peter. So saying she attacked the unfortunate Pat, and rained such a storm of blows on his back and shoulders that the hero of a hundred battles was compelled to save himself by flight. He ran round the table, and Mrs. Peter passed him with the fury of Achilles chasing Hector round the walls of Troy. In vain the flying foe broke down the bridges behind him in his flight by throwing chains in the path of the relentless Fury. She showed so much agility that Pat, finding himself encumbered by his long skirts, unbuttoned them up, and consequently exposed the light blue of the infantry. Mrs. Peter stood agape at the sight, for one moment, and then rushed from the room and shrieked for the police. Mary followed her, and Peter and Pat remained the survivors of the skirmish. Pat immediately divested himself of his feminine garments, and stood in his skeleton loop like a gigantic blue-bird in a cage. Peter, amazed at the transformation, was unable to speak for a moment. At last, recovering from his stupefied, he exclaimed:

"Who are you, you rascal?"

"Who am I?" returned Pat, "why, don't you see, you unaccountable old haythen? I belong to the One Hundred and Forty-seventh Michigan."

"Do you mean to say," said Peter, "that that (pointing to the hoop-skirt) is the uniform of that regiment?"

Here Pat, looking down, discovered that he was encased in the hoop. He divested himself of that incongruous addition to his wardrobe; and standing erect, shillalah in hand, wicked pleasantly and generally upon his surviving companions.

"Now," said Peter, "I should like to know, just as a matter of curiosity, what the d—l brought you here?"

"It wasn't that gentleman at all," replied Pat, "I just came by myself."

"And," continued Peter, "you had the impudence to bring a letter clandestinely to my niece."

"Seen a bit," returned Pat, "I brought it in my pocket."

"Who was it from?" said Peter.

"From the gentleman who wrote it, sure," answered Pat.

"Now, mark me, my fine fellow," continued Peter, "you have laid yourself liable to severe punishment. You have entered my house surreptitiously."

"No, I never," replied Pat; "I entered through the door."

"And," continued Mr. Safeguard, "you are trying to escape the consequences of your Irish cuds by an affected simplicity; now it's my opinion you are more knave than fool."

"Begorra," retorted Pat, "and that's more than I can say of you."

"Now, Sir," said Peter, "you will give me the name of your employer or take the consequences."

"If it's all the same to you," said the imperturbable Pat, "I'd rather take a glass of whisky and water."

At this moment the door opened and Mrs. Safeguard appeared, followed by Captain Matchlock.

"There, Sir," said the old lady, with a double-distilled acidulous expression, "there! Mr. Safeguard, since you insist upon seeing Mary; but if you have any business with him, you'll find that his business is my business."

"I'm afraid you'll have to make an exception in this case, my dear Madam," said Captain Matchlock, "unless you feel disposed to join the army."

"Sir, if your business is to insult me," retorted Mrs. Peter, "I am inclined to think I shall have to make an exception, although my husband's decision is perfectly indifferent in the matter."

"You are Mr. Safeguard, then?" said the Captain, turning to the stupefied Peter.

"The same, Sir, at your service," replied Peter.

"Peter Safeguard," continued the Captain. "I believe I am indebted to my godfathers for that patronymic, a surname of a long list of Peters; but, I assure you, I had no choice in the matter," returned Mr. Safeguard.

"Then I have the pleasure of informing you that you have been drafted into the One Hundred and Forty-seventh Michigan."

"Sir," rejoined Peter, "the fact of my having been drafted was made disagreeably public in this morning's paper."

"Very well, Sir," added the Captain, "you will report yourself for examination within fourteen days from to-day, and I hope I shall soon have the gratification of showing you the face of the enemy."

"I assure you, Captain, that I should infinitely prefer seeing the back of the enemy in full sight," said Peter.

"That," returned the Captain, "will depend, in a measure, upon your own valor."

"Then," said the despondent Peter, "I think the chances of my witnessing that gratifying spectacle are very remote."

"Mr. Safeguard," broke in his wife, "if I were you I would not exhibit my cowardice to a stranger."

"My love," rejoined Peter, "as I can not afford the price of a substitute, perhaps you wouldn't mind going in my place. The Government would certainly be a gainer, for I don't think there's a rebel regiment would stand before you for a moment."

"By jabsers," interposed Pat, "sh'd be equal to a whole battery of Parrott guns!"

"You can procure a substitute," suggested the Captain, "for a thousand dollars, or about that sum."

"I'm much obliged to you for the information," returned Peter; "but I really don't feel able to present the Government with that trifling amount of money. Now, Captain, you have seen a good deal of the service. Look at me: do you think I could be of any use?"

"Devil's it!" exclaimed Pat. "Enlist the old woman."

"Do you think," persisted Peter, "the Government could get any thing out of me, physically?"

"I am afraid the Government will try the experiment," replied the Captain.

"Come," said Peter, imploringly, "and me a way out of this scrape, and I will be eternally indebted to you."

"That's two days longer than I'd let any man be indebted to me," said Pat, with a knowing shake of his head.

"I see no escape for you," said the Captain. "You must either go or pay the price of a substitute."

"In these circumstances," said Peter, reflectively, "I think I could make great sacrifices for my country; but, unfortunately, those circumstances are not likely to arise."

"Go in, old gentleman," said Pat, with an encouraging smile. "After the first battle you won't mind it."

"I have no doubt," said Peter, "but your prediction would be singularly verified; but, unfortunately, it's the first battle I object to."

"Well, then, fight your second one first," retorted Pat, with the triumphant air of a man who had cleverly surmounted an apparently insurmountable difficulty.

"You object to joining the ranks, then?" asked the Captain.

"Not decidedly," replied Peter.

"And you equally object to paying a thousand dollars?" continued the Captain.

"No," said Peter, reflectively, "I don't so much object to paying as I do to parting with the money."

"Well," said the Captain, "as I don't think you'll reflect much credit on the service, I'll furnish you with a substitute free of expense."

"My dear Sir," said Peter, seizing the Captain by both hands and shaking them in a fervor of gratitude.

"On one condition," added the Captain.

"Oh!" said Peter, with a sudden elongation of his countenance, and dropping the Captain's hands.

"I love your niece, and I have every reason to believe that she loves me," continued the Captain.

"With regard to the latter part of your proposition," exclaimed Mrs. Safeguard, with great severity, "I can inform you, Sir, that you are very much mistaken."

"Indeed he is not, aunt!" exclaimed a voice, gently but decidedly; "and I think my opinion on that subject is worthy of some consideration."

This opinion coinciding so strongly with her aunt's was uttered by Mary, who now advanced and took the hand of the Captain.

"Now," said the Captain, holding Mary by the hand, "give your consent to our marriage and I will furnish the substitute. If you do not, I think we shall have to manage to do without it."

Peter, whose dread of the army, together with his love of money, combined to excite a rebellion against his better self, reflected a moment, and then, turning to the Captain, exclaimed:

"It's a bargain. Get me out of the scrape, and she's yours."

"I say," exclaimed the angry Mrs. Peter, "he shan't have her!"

"Dry up, old woman," interposed Pat, "or we'll have you drafted into the army."

"You have my uncle's consent, Charles," said Mary, "and it is quite needless to say you have mine."

Mrs. Safeguard looked from one to the other with amazement.

"Then I suppose," she said, sarcastically, "you have all made up your mind that I am nobody."

"Not a soul," said the irreproachable Pat. "You're neither use nor ornament. You and the old woman may can go on to the retired list until his term comes round again." And then he added, "For to be a poor ruther either is, nodding to Peter. 'I hope that it won't be him, but Patrick Mahoney—long life to him!—that will be drafted into the army.'"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Origin of Evil.

A gentleman was about completing the sale of a horse which he was very anxious to dispose of, which a little while ago had been very much admired, and which he had been told would sell for a high price. He was standing yesterday to make him drive? The bargain was at an end.

"You like plenty of nice things, don't you, Johnny? How many ribs did you have at the party on the 24th yesterday?" "Yes; but a spiced-rib, then an apple-rib, then a cranberry-rib, then a sweet-rib, and then a potato-rib."

"Well, Mr. Tom, if you're about to leave I shall detain your friend," exclaimed an Irishman kindly to her sister, who was slightly in arrears.

A clerk in a wash-station was lately overpowered by a fugitive young lady who wanted to purchase "Dr. Hoot's"——— "geth'ers-and-unders-grass." The clerk is still alive.

A correspondent tells of a prospector who, on being asked by his mother not to take all the look for in the dish, because it should leave some for mother's, replied, after looking toward the table, "Well, I don't see any M. more here to eat it?"

The best of imagination is described as follows: "It's a year's launch in empty and you pocket ditto-it down and find a money-book."

God's tests for husbands-father wear their dresses better than they need.

A sharp-groove, when a customer who was looking for a pair of trousers ordered that a pair of duds be washed in the washer after it was turned, remarked: "I long to see the machine before I drop your duds."

Mrs. Washington says that her, having become tired of a vision of the sun, has had her in the mental state. She didn't appear the least bit displeased, and the back of her wedding veil was little better with wings.

A widowed old bachelor used the following argument against matrimony: "Coffee is a great promoter of brain power. If you get no milk to combine with it, you get no cream, either with head or heart, they need to be clear of the brainless curiosity. A pair of man's lips, a silk neck, a cooling shirt, a pair of trousers, a pair of boots, all do as much to combine a man as three loaves, the necktie, a large-size fish, eight eggs, a pair of loaf-jaws, several hydrophobics, and the best of 'em."

Different words travel with different degrees of velocity. A ball to dinner will run over a ten-mile lot in a minute and a half, while a message to work will take from five to ten minutes.

"My dear," said Mrs. Deberry to her daughter, "you would not find your dress so very high in crossing the street." "Then, ma'am," replied the girl, "how shall I cross the beauty of my forehead?" "That's a good question," replied the mother, "but I don't think you should look at it." "My dear," replied the girl, "I don't think you should look at it either, and I wouldn't let it be so either."

"My dear," said a girl to a young lady whom she hoped to marry, "do you intend to make a fool of me?" "No," replied the lady, "I never had any such intention."

A young old bachelor says that Adam's wife was called Eve because when she appeared man's day of happiness was drawing to a close.

A country "chap" who recently visited the city for the first time, gives the reason of this fact. "In this way," he says, "I every afternoon two of 'em and when I find myself alone I'll get a woman, I suppose; but how much of the latter is fit to be in with me, and how much is genuine, the pro-temer one no. A better way, a wife, and then when it comes to the point, that he is terrible in his own bad night anatomy. I don't see how he ever gets to be all of the female that comes for a husband and forty weight, but I don't only a month but so her as would give a girl a——— all the spiritual pleasures consisting of cotton and whiskies."

Dr. Parr does not vary his diet in the choice of his expedients, when invited by a prospect of matrimony. He never called a prospect a girl, who, indeed, was little better. The prospect said he would marry if this was all the terms. "No," said the doctor, "and my old 1440p will surprise you."

THE PRINCESS OF WALES AND HER INFANT.

A young mother, holding a baby of two years, is one of the loveliest and holiest objects that can be seen on earth, whether she be a Princess and future Queen or the wife of a poor laboring man.

We are happy to be able to present our readers this week with an illustration representing ALEXANDRA, the Princess of Wales, with her first-born infant, the little Prince VICTOR, whose second birthday occurred January 6 of the present year.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1866.

THE PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

WE have a very high respect for the admirable services of Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS, and for the earnestness with which he holds opinions in which we do not always agree; but Mr. STEVENS lacks some important qualifications as a parliamentary leader.

The amendment reported is substantially that of Mr. BLAINE. It proposes, in substance, to apportion representation to the whole number of the population, excepting those who may be disfranchised by reason of race or color.

Mr. JEWCKES, of Rhode Island, and Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts, have indicated very distinctly and forcibly the objections to the adoption of the amendment. It admits, by implication, that States may disfranchise because of race or color, and that is something of which Congress should not be guilty.

The amendment, as it stands, will probably not pass—at least, we sincerely hope it may not. We do not know, indeed, what further suggestions the Committee may propose which will modify and control this.

amendment defining the qualifications of all adult male citizens of the United States in national elections. Should some educational test be required of future voters, it would still be impossible to trust the education of their colored population to the unorganized States.

The airy gentlemen who think that half a nation can be alienated from the other half for forty years, and after appealing to a tremendous civil war, which rages for four years, tearing up the industrial and political system of half a continent by its roots, and after one party is vanquished in the field and still remains hostile at heart, can conjure a settlement and reunion in a few weeks or months by a free use of the word "conciliation," will have an opportunity of learning wisdom from events.

SENATOR TRUMBULL'S BILL.

THE passage, in the Senate, of Mr. TRUMBULL'S bill for continuing and enlarging the operations of the Freedmen's Bureau will be followed, we trust, by its early passage in the House. The debate was ample, and it is only the truth to say that every argument urged against it was utterly refuted.

Land and education are to be the grounds of security for the liberty of the whole Southern population. If they could only perceive it, every step taken for the elevation of the freedmen is an immense gain for the Southern States and for the country.

Nothing is more probable. If Governor ORN were homeless, houseless, and landless; if he were in the midst of a community which despised and hated him; if he knew that his most sacred rights, his most precious relations, were at the mercy of those who were educated to regard him and treat him as an ox or a dog; if he knew that the power which had given him his freedom, and was strong enough to maintain it, intended to secure him against the consequences of the cruel hostility which surrounded him by giving him land and defending his rights upon it, we are inclined to believe that Governor ORN—unless he were the dull brute which the colored man is represented to be by the political and social friends of Governor ORN, but which his conduct disproves—would do exactly what the freedmen are doing: he would wait the action of his friends before confiding himself to his enemies.

Governor ORN and the opponents of the Freedmen's Bureau do not appear to understand that it is just as impossible for the white population of the South to deal justly by the freedmen as it was for the Catholics of three centuries ago to be just to the Protestants. How absolutely and entirely the white gentlemen at the South misunderstand the colored race and the conditions of progressive civilization let our long war show. Nobody would be so mad as to insist that if the colored race had been always fairly treated in the South there would have been any serious alienation ending so tragically. And in view of their ghastly failure in dealing with the question, modesty might prompt these gentlemen to be slow and distrustful in offering their advice to those who have become the guardians of the freed race.

It is true that it is a question of peculiar moment to the Southern States, because the freedmen are native in that section, and will inevitably remain there. But it is no less true that experience has proved the Southern white policy upon the subject to be intolerable to the peace of the country. That policy was based upon a spirit of caste which is inconsistent with our whole system; and every sign in the Southern legislatures and conventions and papers and speeches and correspondence and conversation, and indeed in every form by which opinion is expressed, shows that the same policy will be continued if the decision were left to the same old authority. There is a universal tendency in the interested section toward black codes, black laws, and an absolute class distinction. But since the method which is utterly abhorrent to the American principle has failed, why not try a policy founded upon that principle? Since injustice has plunged us into war, why not try justice as a means of keeping the peace? Since we have resolved that the late slaves are men, why not treat them as men?

It is the object of the Freedmen's Bureau to secure that treatment. The result can not be reached without vexatious delays and perplexities. There will be complaints, often well founded, of the officers and agents employed. There will be friction and disappointment of many kinds in the working of the system. But they will all be slowly and constantly working out toward justice and the equal rights of men, upon which foundation only can future prosperity and union be erected.

FENIANISM.

WHILE General SWEENEY declares that, if supported, he will conquer a spot of British territory before next May from which to threaten the empire, and Mr. ROBERTS indulges in the dangerous delight of prophesying that within ninety days the green flag will be flying over the largest army of Irishmen ever collected, the British courts are sentencing Fenian prisoners to long years of penal servitude, and the Head Centre, STRANISH, is a fugitive upon the Continent. At the same time, also, Irishmen are every where asking themselves whether the prospects of the Fenian movement to emancipate Ireland and erect the Irish Republic are so promising that they can hopefully run the risk of ruining themselves and their families.

Indeed, the late Fenian performance in the city of New York was so lamentably farcical that the whole movement seems to have died quietly in ridicule here, as it ends more tragically across the sea. It is a symptom both of the discontent of Irishmen and of the utter incapacity of the leaders who have sought to direct that discontent to practical political ends. Yet that discontent, it must be allowed, is greatly traditional and sentimental. Probably few Irishmen who are established in this country would care to return to their native land, and still fewer would wish to give their lives and the comfort of their families to pledge that land under the rule of no higher wisdom than has been displayed in the Fenian movement. The British government of Ireland is not a noble or humane story. No honorable Englishman can contemplate it without sorrow and shame. But had as it may have been, ungenerous as it may be now, it is undoubtedly preferable to the government of such leaders as have appeared in the Fenian ranks.

And even were it not so, every sensible Irishman, and from such only will actual danger menace England, sees that the British Government is now fully aroused, and does not hesitate to take the most decisive measures, and that a revolution in Ireland would be for every British subject a question of the integrity and honor of the British empire. Indeed, this revolution is baffled before it fairly begins. And what kind of a revolution could that be which advertises itself vociferously three thousand miles away in a foreign country, and explodes in a ludicrous wrangle of would-be leaders? Meanwhile, however, we suppose that the collection of Fenian alms continues, and that many a hard working man and woman is giving the money which should buy comfort for their families to a cause which, however inspiring in itself to an Irishman, shows not the least chance of practical success.

There is truly no nobler sacrifice than that of life and of every effort for the salvation of an oppressed country. There is no more splendid spectacle in history than the revolution of our fathers in '76. But grand and ennobling as that struggle was, it would have been a criminal folly if they had obeyed a mere vague sentiment, and had not literally counted the cost and scrupulously weighed the chances of success.

IS THERE TOO MUCH OF ONE SUBJECT?

If any body thinks that both in Congress and in general conversation an undue prominence is given to the subject of the colored population, he ought to remember that precisely that subject was the root of our late war, and it must therefore necessarily be the most prominent topic in all considerations of settlement. But, says some one, why not discuss questions of trade and methods of conciliation, because, after all, it must be by commercial intercourse and social ties that the alienated sections are to be knit together again?

The reason is obvious. Trade and commercial relations depend upon the stability of the industrial system; and the question of the industrial system at the South is that of the colored population. Spite of ourselves, therefore, spite of our weariness of the topic, spite of the monotony of the discussion, it must turn first upon the fundamental point. Until the industry of the Southern section begins again, there can be no resumption of commercial relations; and until there is some final settlement of the industrial system there will be no capital invested and no risks taken, and consequently the land will remain comparatively unproductive.

But still further, as in this country there is no serious impediment any where to the acquisition of political power by every man, an equal share of political power has come to be the security of the fruits of industry. The most ignorant of foreigners, after a short probation, may be naturalized and share political power equally with the most intelligent native. If, therefore, any considerable number of the population should be arbitrarily excluded from political equality, and under circumstances which threatened to make this exclusion permanent, they would be dissatisfied and restless, their claims would be supported by an immense party; a great agitation would ensue, and the industrial relations of the region in which that population lived would be radically disturbed and unsatisfactory.

In our present situation, therefore, the political relations of the freedmen must be clearly defined and established upon the justice which all the rest of us demand, or we shall find ourselves unable to take a single forward step safely and intelligibly. This explains the prominence of the question in Congress and the public mind. The important point is to determine in what way the political equality of the population in question may be most wisely secured. That is the real instigation of the amendments to the Constitution which are debated in Congress. That is the natural and serious interest of the people of the United States. It is with no wish to devote exclusive or disproportioned attention to any question that this is so constantly considered, but only because this is the key of the situation, and when this is justly settled all other questions are less difficult.

THE NEW HAVEN RAILROAD CASE.

LAME AS Justice is said to be, she travels steadily and surely—at all events in some cases. It lacks but a few months of twelve years since the financial community was paralyzed by the news that the President of the New Haven Railroad Company had been flooding Wall Street with spurious certificates of stock, and had run away to hide his guilt and his shame in foreign lands. So vast was the extent of the fraud, and so high had stood the character of the criminal, that people at first refused to believe the news. SCHUYLER was not only a member of the church and a scion of our "hereditary nobility," he was a man personally well known in Wall Street, universally esteemed and respected, a king among railway men, a potentate among financiers. Yet this SCHUYLER, as it was soon proved, had issued fraudulent certificates of stock in the New York and New Haven Railway Company to an amount exceeding two millions of dollars, had foisted them on his friends and acquaintances, the bankers, brokers, and money-lenders of Wall Street, and had run away leaving no trace behind.

After the first shock Wall Street turned its attention to the practical consequences of the development. There was $3,000,000 of genuine stock of the New Haven Road, and $2,000,000 or more of stock fraudulently issued by SCHUYLER. The stock had been active, and on the morning when the fraud came to light, there was hardly a banker or broker in New York who did not hold directly or indirectly some shares. How could the so-called spurious stock be distinguished from the genuine? The brokers studied the subject, and finding that all the certificates were alike, all duly signed and registered, and all to outward appearance equally valid, concluded that no distinction could be made between them, and that the Company—being bound for the acts of its officer—must be equally responsible for all. This was the sense of the New York Stock Exchange, and of the bankers and brokers throughout the country. They therefore summoned the New Haven Railroad Company to recognize all the certificates, whatever their origin, and to transfer them on their books.

The Company refused. Its counsel took the ground that though the Company was responsible for all acts of its officer performed within the scope of his official duties, it was not responsible for acts committed beyond that scope, much less for crimes committed by him. As some of the subordinate clerks of the Company undertook, by a process never clearly explained, to separate the so-called spurious stock from the genuine, and to pronounce two-thirds of the floating certificates of New Haven stock absolute waste paper.

Naturally indignant at this proceeding, the brokers clubbed together and instituted legal proceedings against the Company to compel them to recognize the so-called spurious stock. More than half the leading lawyers of the city were retained on their behalf. The Company accepted the issue, retained able counsel on its side, and prepared for a long fight. The stock was struck from the list of the Stock Exchange, and has never since been bought or sold at the Board.

The suit began in the fall of 1854. It took many shapes, and came up in various ways. There is hardly a leading lawyer at the bar who has not been engaged in it at some time or other, either for or against the Company. As a rule the press and public sentiment were throughout in favor of the brokers. People generally took the common-sense view of the case, and decided that as a loss must fall upon somebody, it was more equitable that it should fall on the Company, which had erred in the choice of an officer, than upon innocent holders of stock who had been guilty of no negligence, and could not, by any possibility, have protected themselves against the event. But the Company stood unmoved. It had a long purse, an obscure Board of Directors, and an ingenious party of lawyers. Year after year dragged on, and but little progress was made. Every technical difficulty was urged by the Company; every side-issue was elaborately discussed; every possible motion was made; every point of law raised; and thus, as we said, year after year passed; the law costs of the injured brokers were steadily on the increase, and they seemed to be no nearer judgment and redress. At last, some six years after the commencement of the suit, a judgment was obtained in one of the cases. It was substantially in favor of the Company.

This was so discouraging to the litigants that many of them, worn out by long waiting, loss of time, and heavy law costs, concluded to accept a compromise which was judiciously offered by the Company. On condition of withdrawing their suits and giving no further trouble, they received one share of real stock for every two shares of so-called spurious stock. Thus at least one half of the claims were adjusted at the cost of all the net earnings of the Company for several years.

But there was one man among the prosecutors of the Company who was not discouraged. This was CORNELIUS VANDERBILT. He had lent money to SCHUYLER on the so-called spurious stock. He had examined the stock before he lent his money, and had proved the certificates correct. He was not now willing to admit that they were otherwise. The adverse judgment did not dismay him. If the Company had patience, so had he. If they had a long purse, so had he. If they could fee able lawyers (one of the Company's counsel is said to have received no less than $100,000 for work in this single case), so could he. He rejected the proffered compromise with decision, and bade his lawyers appeal, and prosecute the appeal with vigor. Encouraged by his example, other victims of the fraud declined to accept the compromise, and appealed their cases likewise.

Then followed more tedious years of postponements, arguments on side issues, motions and counter-motions, and all the legal manœuvres which are so profitable to lawyers and so benumbing to needy seekers after justice. There is no doubt that the Company based its hopes in great part upon the probable death of Commodore VANDERBILT. If he died, there was every reason to believe they might succeed in wearing out the other suitors, and either inducing them to accept the proposed compromise or defeating them altogether. And he was an old man, over seventy, with heart-disease (so 'twas said), with a fondness for fast horses, and a habit of being dashed out of his wagon from time to time. The New Haven Directors each morning carefully examined the deaths under the letter V, and mutely prayed for the release of their relentless prosecutor.

Their prayers were not heard. The Commodore did not die. On the contrary, in spite of heart-disease, fast horses, and upsets, he seemed to grow most pertinacious at the very time other men's patience would weary; and at the very moment the Company expected a season of repose he was upon them more furiously than ever, with new motions and arguments and fresh reinforcements of lawyers. And so, at last, after over eleven years of waiting, he fought the suit to judgment in the Court of Appeals, and won it—obtaining a decision against the Company for the whole amount claimed, with eleven years' interest and costs.

There is something quite refreshing in the statement published by the Board of Directors in which, after reiterating their opinion that the judgment is unjust, they offer for sale $2,000,000 of new stock in order to meet the claims of the Commodore and his faithful adherents. No reliable statement has been published of the amount of money paid—directly or in the shape of stock—to the parties who accepted the compromise three or four years ago. But we judge that the Company would have saved not much less than a million dollars in one way and another had it pursued an honest course at the start, and acknowledged itself responsible for the frauds of its agent.

A healthy public sentiment has thanked Mr. A. T. STEWART for having promptly preferred a complaint against a newspaper which had seemed to charge him with improper conduct in private life. And a like tribute is due to Commodore VANDERBILT for having had the patience and constancy to pursue this railway Company through the mazes of a twelve years' lawsuit. It would be well if we had more such men. As for the Company, we trust we shall never again hear of a wealthy concern, officered by respectable men, trying to shift to innocent shoulders the burden of the crimes of its own officials.

ANOTHER SPANISH REVOLUTION.

WHILE Spain is apparently threatening Chile, she suddenly finds herself forced to look at home. General PRIM, the officer who withdrew from the Mexican invasion during our late war, and who thereby made his name peasant in our ears, after passing privately through Europe for several months, and evidently proposing a movement, returned to Madrid, lived quietly in his own house under the eyes of Marshal O'DONNELL, his rival, and one day, when the Marshal sent some soldiers to arrest him, General PRIM's servants replied that he was not at home; that he had gone out shooting; grinned and bowed; and the next day PRIM appeared in arms at the head of part of the army.

Of course it is impossible to know much of the probable success of a Spanish revolution. Political chaos is permanent in that country, and the rest of the world can only wonderingly await the event of any movement. But the defection of any popular military chief is as alarming as it was in Rome. Every Spaniard is conscious that the throne stands upon volcanic soil. The royal family has not now the popular heart; and it may be said that a skillful leader of an insurrection has a fair chance of success. It may end in a compromise. The Queen may offer him a port-folio if he will sheathe his sword. But that merely makes the ground more volcanic than ever; and when some leader who declines the port-folio appears the Queen may lose her crown.

The official dispatches announced as soon as the rebellion began that it was all over. The royal troops held all the mountain passes. Three columns were bearing down upon the insurgents; and, dismayed and demoralized, PRIM and his adherents were straggling away toward Portugal. Official bulletins, however, express official dogmas rather than facts. Later accounts speak of the universal excitement and of the disturbed condition of Catalonia and Aragon. It is the old story, and certainly nothing can be more deplorable than the chronic political situation of Spain, for which she has to thank the Holy Alliance of forty years ago. But there is hope that every new revolution may develop the men who will truly help their wretched country.

EDUCATION OF THE FREEDMEN.

"THE Freedmen," said our martyr President, "are the Wards of the Nation." "Yes," replied Mr. STANTON, "Wards in Chancery." What is our duty to them as their guardians? Clearly, to clothe them if they are naked; to teach them if they are ignorant; to nurse them if they are sick; and to adopt them if they are homeless and motherless. They have been slaves, war made them freedmen, and peace must make them freemen. They must be shielded from unjust laws and unkindly prejudices; they must be instructed in the true principles of social order and democratic government; they must be prepared to take their place by-and-by in the great army of voters as lately they filled up the ranks in the great army of fighters. The superstitions, the vices, the untruthfulness, the loitering and indolent habits which slavery foisted on the whites and blacks alike, who were cursed by its presence in their midst, must be dispelled and supplanted by all the traits and virtues of a truly Christian civilization.

The North, that liberated the slave, has not been remiss in its duty to the freedman. The common school has kept step to the music of the advancing army. Willson's Readers have followed GRANT'S soldiers every where. Many of the colored troops on the march had primers in their boxes and primers in their pockets. They were namesakes, but not of the same family. Charleston had not been captured more than a week before the schools for freedmen and poor whites were opened there. It is proposed now to educate all the negroes and poor whites in the South—as a political necessity; in order that henceforth there may be no other insurrections, the result of ignorance, either on the part of the late slave or the late slaveholder. Ignorance has cost us too much to be suffered to disturb us again. In free countries it is not the intelligent but the ignorant who rebel. Ambitious men could never induce an enlightened people to overthrow a free Government. It was because there were over 600,000 white adults in the slave States, and 4,000,000 of slaves who could neither read nor write, that DAVIS and TOOMBS and SIMMONS had power to raise armies against the nation. Let us prevent all social upheavals in the future by educating all men now.

The National Freedmen's Relief Association of New York—of which FRANCIS GEORGE SHAW is President and JOSEPH B. COLLINS Treasurer—has been the most active of the agencies in relieving the wants and dispelling the ignorance of the freedman. It has expended during the last four years three quarters of a million of dollars in clothing the naked; in establishing the freedmen on farms; in supplying them with tools; in founding orphan homes; in distributing school-books and establishing schools. They have over two hundred teachers in the South at this time. They support orphan homes in Florida and South Carolina. They teach ten thousand children, and large numbers of adults. They have instituted industrial schools to educate the negro women to be thrifty housewives. They are continually laboring, in brief, to make the negroes self-reliant and self-supporting. They appeal for additional aid. There are but a thousand teachers for freedmen in all the Southern States; whereas twenty thousand could find immediate employment. The National Relief Association could find pupils for 5000. It has but 200. As the work is a good and great one, and as the officers of this Society are eminent citizens of New York, we heartily commend their appeal to the generosity of our readers.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CHESS TOURNAMENT.

In a late number of the Weekly we presented our readers with the first game occurring in a match incidental to the tournament of the New York Chess Club, between the well-known amateurs Mr. C. H. STANLEY and Captain M'KENZIE. This contest has subsequently been brought to a close, having been won by Captain M'KENZIE, in the manner as follows, viz.: M'KENZIE won 3 games, STANLEY 1, drawn games 5. Mr. STANLEY's old friends and admirers, however, are not prepared to accept this result as altogether conclusive of his inferiority—attributing it mainly to his great want of practice; and he is not impossible that when the series of other matches still progressing in this tournament are completed, a reverse result may be arranged. Meanwhile we print below the final game of the late encounter:

A very excellent move, the utility of which will be more apparent as the game advances.

A very ill-considered move, by which the loss of both his Bishop and Knight is probably the correct play, when we should be inclined to give Black's position the preference.

Table with columns: BLACK (St. S.), WHITE (Capt. M'K.), and game moves 15-24.

Black appears to have been demoralized by his first error on the 14th move; and, in consequence, his disasters accumulated.

Table with columns: BLACK (St. S.), WHITE (Capt. M'K.), and game moves 25-29.

And Mr. STANLEY resigns the game and match.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The interest connected with the reorganization of the Southern States is chiefly concentrated on the action of Congress. Mr. Harlan, Secretary of the Interior, recently made a speech at Washington somewhat eulogical in its tenor. The importance which would attach to this speech as coming from a member of the Cabinet is considerably diminished by the fact that the Secretary has determined to leave the Cabinet and enter the Senate. President Johnson, it is announced, has in private interviews expressed his disapprobation of the scheme proposed by Messrs. Stevens, Sumner, and Howe. He holds, it is said, that the Southern States have now more republican governments than they ever had before, and are entitled to representation.

CONGRESS.

January 22: In the Senate, Mr. Sumner proposed an amendment to the bill for the admission of Colorado, providing that the act should not go into operation except on the condition that there shall be no restriction of suffrage on the basis of color.—There was a long debate on Trumbull's bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau. Mr. Scalapery, of Delaware, opposed the bill as a party measure, as an expensive burden to the country and an unnecessary exercise of power, particularly in its application to States which had not been in rebellion. Mr. Fessenden, of Maine, favored the bill, and at the conclusion of his speech declared that there was no collision between the President and the Union party. Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, thought the bill unconstitutional.

In the House, the session was mostly taken up in debate on the Amendment to the Constitution proposed by the Committee of Fifteen. Mr. Stevens was for passing the thing through without debate, but was not sustained by his own adherents. The debate which followed is not noteworthy.

January 21: In the Senate, Mr. Wilson proposed an amendment to the Constitution to prevent any future compensation for emancipated slaves, which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.—The bill to enlarge the Freedmen's Bureau was taken up. An amendment to strike out the section giving the negroes three years' possession of the one-third land was rejected, yeas 16, nays 31.

In the House, the proposed amendment to the Constitution was again debated. The debate covered various points and not the main principle involved in the bill.

January 22: In the Senate, the bill to enlarge the Freedmen's Bureau was passed, 37 to 18. The bill provides, 1st, That the Freedmen's Bureau shall be maintained, giving the President power to divide the section of country included within the provisions of the bill into twelve districts; 2d, That the Commissioner may divide the districts into subdivisions, and provide officers for the same, the salary of each not to exceed $1200; 3d, That the Secretary of War may loan supplies, medical stores, etc., and may provide for the shelter of freedmen and refugees; 4th, That the President may set apart for the freedmen unoccupied public lands in Florida, Mississippi, and Arkansas, not exceeding three millions of acres of good land, the occupants to pay a rental rental with the privilege of purchase; 5th, That the occupants of the land under General Sherman's special order shall be permitted to remain for three years; 6th, That schools and systems shall be built for the freedmen at the expense of Government; 7th, That in any district where any rights allowed to white men are denied to freedmen, the freedmen thus discriminated against shall be protected by the Bureau; and 8th, That any person, where there is such discrimination against the freedmen, who shall under cover of any local law subject a freedman to the deprivation of any civil right or to any punishment other than would be likely to be inflicted on white men, shall be liable to imprisonment for one year or to a fine not exceeding $5000, or both, and that the Bureau shall have power to try and adjudicate cases of this nature.

January 23: In the Senate, the House bill, extending the time for the withdrawal of certain goods from the States, was passed.—Mr. Howe's resolution for the appointment of Provisional Governors in the South was debated. Mr. Howe replied to the speeches made by Messrs. Doolittle and Johnson.

In the House, the debate on the Constitutional Amendment was continued without result.

January 24: The Senate was not in session. In the House, Mr. Smith, Mr. Baker, and Mr. Fremont spoke in Committee of the Whole on the subject of reconstruction. Mr. Smith, of Kentucky, was the main member from the South to take the rest of the day. Mr. Baker wanted President Johnson excluded from any office under the Government. Mr. Fremont insisted upon it that the Southern people had been conquered, and therefore had no rights except what we chose to yield.

January 25: In the Senate, Mr. Trumbull spoke at length on the bill for the protection of civil rights.

In the House, Mr. Raymond spoke for two hours on reconstruction, the question before the House being the adoption of a Constitutional Amendment to regulate the taxation and representation of the Southern States. He did not think it necessary to meddle with the organic law of the country. He thought that it was proper to demand certain guarantees of the South, but the Southern States retained every right which ever belonged to them. We had gained no new rights over them by our victory, but had only freed them from the usurpation of a rebel government. The South had not been conquered. We could not hold them as provisional dependencies. Mr. Raymond was in favor of accepting the status of the Southern States as having resumed the full functions of self-government in the Union; of admitting Southern Representatives, in voting upon equally as a condition to their admission; of excluding from the Federal offices the leading officers in the rebellion; of adopting such amendments in the Constitution as may seem wise to Congress and to the States, acting without coercion; and of taking such precautionary measures as would prevent the overthrow of a republican form of government in any State. Mr. Raymond thus concluded: "I beg you to bear in mind this fact—that we of the North and of the South are at war no longer. The gigantic contest is at an end. The dead of the rebellion have slept at last beneath the soil of one common country under their common flag. Their hostilities are hushed, and they are the dead of the nation for evermore. The victor may well exult in the victory he has achieved. Let it be our task, as it will be our highest glory, to make the vanquished and their posterity to the latest generation rejoice in the end."

NEWS ITEMS.

The Twenty-first Illinois Infantry, the regiment which General Grant commanded at the beginning of the war, has lately returned from New Orleans. This veteran regiment now numbers four hundred and thirty-five men and twenty-one officers, among whom are only fifty men and two officers who started out with General Grant at Vicksburg. One of the originals is the commanding officer of the regiment, Colonel Jackson.

Mrs. Stephen A. Douglas was married on the evening of January 23 to Rev. Dr. Brigadier-General Robert Williams, U.S.A., at his residence, corner of New Jersey Avenue and I Street, Washington. The ceremony was performed by Father Lynch, of the Roman Catholic Church, in the presence of a small and select circle of friends of both parties.

There is much excitement in the Pennsylvania Oil Region caused by the existence of several leases. Lynch has been retained to, to effect a remedy.

January 23, the New Jersey Senate ratified the Constitutional Amendment abolishing slavery. The next day the ratification was signed by Governor Ward.

On the 23d January United States Marshal Murray seized the property of Mr. Paderin, an advocate of the Spanish Legion, having charged that the vessel was to be fitted out as a Chilean cruiser.

Both Governor and Legislature have been convened of the order of 1865, and adjourned to be re-opened at an early day.

THE CHARITY BALL IN NEW YORK.

On the evening of January 29 the crêve de la crême of the New York City aristocracy exhibited in its characteristic manner the Christian's sentiment of charity. The Nursery and Child's Hospital were in need of funds, and the few who were eager for excitement, and to satisfy both these demands at one and the same time, it was determined to give a grand ball, the proceeds of which should be devoted to the above-mentioned institution.

The grand ball came off with great éclat at the Academy of Music, and the result, measured in greenbacks, was a decided success. The occasion will be long remembered in the annals of Terpsichore. Under the skillful arrangements, superintended by Mr. KINGSLAND, the house presented a magnificent appearance. The stage supported a splendid painted canopy. In the centre were two beautiful fountains; at the end were two Cupids holding candelabras. The house was tastefully decorated with drapery and flowers, and the floor handsomely carpeted. There were two bands of music, and the beauty and splendor of the whole scene, including the dancers, baffles description. We can only refer our readers to the illustration given by our artist on page 88.

SIGNOR ETHARDO ON THE SPIRAL PLANK.

One of the most attractive features of the entertainments at the Crystal Palace in London is the performance of Signor Ethardo. This wonderful gymnast, who is a native of Italy, ascends a long spiral platform by peeling up the narrow path a large ball on which he stands, and on which he immediately descends by the same difficult and narrow road—a feat which seems to be by far the more difficult. The spiral platform, in the shape of a cork-screw, is built on the platform in front of the great orchestra, and in full view of the many thousands of spectators. Signor Ethardo has been favored with royal patronage; for, at the Dante Festival at Florence, he appeared in the presence of King Victor Emmanuel, who expressed his high approval, while his Majesty's subjects burst into a frantic fit of enthusiasm, which, it appears, baffled all powers of description. Italian sensitiveness was also carried to such a height that the music was stopped, for fear the vibration should cause the gymnast to make a false step. Certainly the large Christmas assemblages at the Crystal Palace displayed no particular anxiety for the performer's safety, though they were not backward in applauding him as he arrived at various stages of his tortuous and narrow pathway, as he reached the small circular platform at the summit, and as he finally descended in safety. The globe on which this extraordinary performer works his way up and down is 30 inches in diameter and 90 inches in circumference. The width of the winding platform is 12 inches, and flat, with no groove or protection of any sort to assist the ascent or descent; and the height of the spiral column is 50 feet. The incline winding from the base to the capital of the column is upward of 180 feet in length. The globe is constructed of wood and iron, without any India rubber, gutta-percha, or other adhesive material to assist the Signor in his difficult task.

THE WADSWORTH MONUMENT.

The adjoining engraving is a good representation of the monument erected at Genesee, New York, last autumn, to the memory of General JAMES S. WADSWORTH. The monument stands in the burial-ground of the Wadsworth family on Temple Hill. It is built of granite, about eight feet long and five feet wide at the base, and about two feet wide and five feet long at the top. It is about ten feet high, and is surmounted with a flag-draped urn made of bronze. On the four corners are four miniature cannons. On the west side of the monument is the inscription in bronze letters:

BRIGADIER-GENERAL JAMES S. WADSWORTH,
DIED MAY 8, 1864.
FROM A WOUND RECEIVED IN THE BATTLE OF THE WILDERNESS, AGED 56 YEARS.

Above this inscription is an emblematic design in bronze, composed of a sheaf of wheat, a cluster of fruit, scythes, sickle, and a reaper's knife. On the east side is another design, of a sword, epauletta, and laurel wreath. Under this are the names:

MANASSAS, Chambersville, FREDERICKSBURG, Gettysburg,
THE WILDERNESS.

THE NEW STEAMSHIP "RISING STAR."

The new steamship Rising Star, of which we give an illustration on page 93, is one of the longest and most ever built in this country. She is thirty-two hundred tons burden, three hundred and fifteen feet in length, forty-four feet breadth of beam, thirty-one feet six inches depth of hold, and three thousand horse-power. For handsome fitting up, convenience for passengers, and capacity for cargo, according to tonnage, this vessel is the peer of any thing before sailing from this port. She at sea, and his discipline on board ship is perfect and a great source of confidence to his passengers. Generous to a fault, he is a gentleman of culture, of the most refined manners, and we can wish no sea-farer a happier fortune than to travel under his care. The Rising Star, of which Mr. NELSON is Captain, cost nearly $800,000.

INSIDE
A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

AT THE BIRTH, NICHOLS' CELEBRITY.

CHAPTER V.

Over in his life the Rev. Edward Arthur had a misfortune befall him which was really one among the most fortunate circumstances he ever experienced. If it will make this seeming paradox any plainer, let us say instead, the gentleman in question stumbled over an obstacle at the outset of his ministerial path, but so stumbled as from that moment to walk that path, when it had become a thousand times more difficult and dangerous, with a step firm and sure where multitudes fell never again to rise.

This most fortunate misfortune, this most beneficial blunder, happened on this wise:

Some four or five years before Secession was ever regarded as a possibility outside the State lines of South Carolina, a great political movement took place throughout the United States—a movement as sudden, as unexpected, and, it may be added, as much underground, too, as an earthquake. At first there floated a vague rumor, eddying about the street corners of Somerville, of something new and remarkable in the political world. To the people of Somerville it was, however, a something so little understood, and so very far away, that no one felt or expressed much interest in the matter.

The matter, however, which at first was only hinted at in the papers with a scornful tone here and there, began to be more fully and frequently and respectfully alluded to. Each successive paper contained news of sudden and amazing victories obtained by the new party in city elections here and there. The excitement rose rapidly. Overwhelming majorities for the new organization swept away whole States at once. The Whig and Democratic leaders ceased from their mutual strife in amazement; not more astounded were the white-haired old generals of Europe when the youthful Napoleon rushed with victorious hosts over their obsolete tactics and old-fashioned battalions. The one thought with these leaders was how to take possession of the new party, so as therewith to defeat each his ancient enemy. But while Whig and Democrat thus schemed and planned the new movement swept them, for the time, both aside from its onward course.

Somerville was very far from being at the first of things; but even Somerville became finally and deeply interested in this new thing under the sun. In vain, at the outset of the matter, did it look to the Somerville Star for light and guidance. For a time Lamun held both his tongue and his pen. Lamun was taken completely unawares, and was waiting to see. Weeks rolled by; friends and enemies alike waiting for the Delphic syllable from the lips of the renowned editor—friends waiting, afraid to step save after him who had so often led them on to victory, doubly afraid to place themselves in possible antagonism to that trenchant pen; enemies waiting for fear of committing themselves to an organization until Lamun was pledged against it; then, and not till then, could they be certain the organization was a thing right and good.

At last Lamun spoke. A thunder-peal was not more distinct, a lightning flash not more direct and destructive. The new movement was wrong, unprincipled, detestable in every point. Those who had gone into it were deluded fools or designing knaves. From that moment Lamun turned his artillery steadily and terribly upon the new party. It was enough. In a few days his followers had all abandoned and denounced it, his enemies had to a man united themselves to, and henceforth defended, it.

Lamun never hinted an explanation of his course in those days, but it was readily understood afterward. From his earliest political life the dissolution of the Union had been to him what it is said the conquest of Constantinople is to the Russian Government—the grand object and end of existence. If Lamun paused when the new party first rose into notice, it was only to ascertain whether that party could in any way hasten the destruction of the Union; could by any possibility be so wrought by main force as to be a new and effective engine to that glorious end. Had Lamun only been satisfied on this point he would have gone into it with all his might we will not say soul, the word does not apply to the gentleman—let us say intellect.

It was soon sufficiently clear to him that the new party was not available to this end; nay, it might even switch off the public mind upon a new track! Lamun was down upon it. Shrewd politician, men said afterward. Lamun had opposed and denounced Know Nothingism in the very moment it seemed certainly victorious over all opposition. Its sudden and universal unpopularity left Lamun amazingly in the ascendant. His influence was increased beyond comparison. Yet all the shrewdness of the man, all the force, influence, success of Lamun rose solely from his having given himself up wholly to one idea. "The destruction of this accursed Union"—that was the thought, the passion, the end and aim of his life. He had cherished it years before he had dared whisper it even to his most intimate friend. He had attended years ago the Nashville Convention to plan toward this end, when almost universal contempt attended the step. Patiently, hopefully, unwearyingly had he toiled in this one direction. What amazing force it gives a man, the abandoning one's self to one purpose in life!

Had Europe known, had this continent known, how completely the destruction of the Union had been for long years the one fixed purpose in life of a few able men at the South, pledged heart and mind to this thing, Europe and this continent would have been less amazed at the attempt when it was made.

"Be at my office—can you?—this afternoon at four," said Guy Brooks one morning to Mr. Arthur at the rise of the great Know Nothing movement of which we have spoken. As he said this the lawyer—for Guy Brooks was a lawyer—had an aspect of meaning and mystery; and the expression thereof did not suit him either. A face franker and more open you might have searched even his native Kentucky for in vain.

"I can be at your office then," replied his pastor; "but what for?" Not that Mr. Arthur needed to be informed; his friend's mysterious manner had already informed him.

"You come down and see," replied the lawyer. The young minister looked for a moment inquiringly, even doubtfully, at his friend, who had turned away to search for really nothing whatever among the pigeon-holes of his desk. After a minute's silence Mr. Arthur shot and locked the door and laid his hat upon the table.

"I suppose I know what you are speaking of," he said, "and I want a word or two of conversation with you just now and upon that subject."

The lawyer took his seat, though it was evident he had much rather have waived the whole matter.

"Mr. Brooks," said the young minister, "you already know how I am situated—young, inexperienced, aiming to effect good here in Somerville, if it please God. I am resolved to be nothing else in this world and in this town than a preacher of the Gospel. Do you think it will be right in me to go into this new movement? Tell me frankly as a friend, as an officer of our church."

"Yes, I do," replied the lawyer. It was not so much in a positive as in a dogged manner that he said this. What singular creations we all are! Sitting there by that table those two men knew perfectly well, each and both of them, that they ought to have nothing whatever to do with the new party. Guy Brooks, burly, open-hearted, open-handed, frank-spoken man that he was to the centre of his heart, knew with absolute certainty that he ought to go into no organization whatever with whose whole plan and purpose he was not thoroughly acquainted.

His pastor, too, knew, just as well, that, as a minister of the Gospel, he most assuredly had no business in any such affair whatever. If you had asked him, "Would an Apostle have enrolled himself a member of any such party—of any party at all?" the "No, Sir!" would have sprung spontaneously to his lips. "Would Whitfield, Wesley, Heber, Henry Martyn, any true minister of the Gospel, go into such a thing?" "No, Sir! no!" would have been the instant reply. From the first something within him had kept up a perpetual No! at the very possibility of his becoming an initiate in the mysterious Order. And yet both he and his friend persisted, none the less, in doing what all the time they knew well they ought to have carefully avoided. Such is this perverse nature of ours. The voice within, certainly in the case of a Christian, may be as still and small as that which spoke to Elijah at Horeb, but it is perfectly distinct, and is the voice of God. From the greatest to the smallest thing in life, no man errs but does err, not that this voice has not spoken, but that, having spoken within him, he will not heed it.

The mischief is, that the young minister put the keeping of himself in the matter out of his own hands into that of his friend. Almost feminine in his trust where he loved, it was his nature, then, to take a positive pleasure in looking to and relying upon others—at least in the way of advice about things better known to them than to himself. It was an amiable weakness, and a positive weakness if it was amiable. On the whole, after a man has become a man, if he lives in friendship with God, then to that man God within him is guide enough. Infinitely better be advising with Him in his Word, His Providence, and in prayer, than be running hither and thither in search of advice and direction from this one and that, who is himself a safe counselor only as he himself is completely in the matter of God. Better live in one's own fellowship with the Almighty! With Christ on his own bark let every man hold the helm of himself with his own hand! Entirely too much do we depend upon and are we governed by each other.

And so, that afternoon, was our youthful divine introduced, with a sense of shame and wrong-doing, into a miserable back-room of an old office, and there initiated into the mystic land. It so happened that by his side, during the process, stood Brother Barker. Profoundly impressed was pale, lean, lank-haired Brother Barker with the ceremony. His peculiar, heavy-lidded eyes drooped not enough over his pupils, but you could see the awe, the wonder, the intensity of his faith in the whole matter.

"Brother Barker," said the young minister, half aloud to his companion, about the middle of the initiation.

"Well, Brother Arthur," replied he, but giving all his attention to the ceremony.

"One thing I feel satisfied of. This"—and Mr. Arthur finished the sentence aloud—"is no place for either you or me!" And there was not a man there but knew the same, at least of the two ministers. But Brother Barker went into it, nevertheless! From that day none more zealous than he in the cause. No man in all the region organized, and, in every way, advocated the new party so efficiently and unwearingly. "Brother Barker throws his whole heart into whatever he goes into, you'd better believe," had always been the remark among his friends of him.

"We ought—at least, of one thing I am certain, I ought never to have come here," said Mr. Arthur to Guy Brooks, as they walked away.

"Oh, I don't know!" replied his friend. Only he did know.

"You will act as you please," continued Mr. Arthur; "but I am done with the thing from this moment."

And yet not six weeks had passed when Guy Brooks recognized, and with regret, his presence seated among the members of the Order at a special meeting for the purpose of nominating, which was the same as actually electing—the majority of voters in the place being members of the Order—certain county officers. The fact is, the young minister had been informed that Guy Brooks was that night to be put forward for an important office. The vote would be a very close one, it was urged upon him. "Attend for this once, your vote may elect him. Surely you will do that much for your friend!" And so again did he pass out of his own hands into that of others! Yet Brooks was not elected at last. The only vote cast for him was that of the minister, some sudden arrangement having been entered into just as the Order met, by which another man was substituted.

This was the first, and it was the last identification of Mr. Arthur by himself as a politician. In the sudden and overwhelming unpopularity of the Order which speedily followed, it so happened that no one was more thoroughly abused as having been a member of it than was he. Very bitter it was to the sensitive young man, the essence of the bitterness being that his own conscience joined its voice to those of his foes. Many a night did he lie awake utterly miserable. "That I should have erred so, I who so keenly feel the peculiar sanctity of the calling to which I have given myself. The severest of my enemies reproach me not half so bitterly as I do myself. But why should I be so singled out for reproach when every minister of every denomination in this whole region was also a member—all of them—active members! I opposed it in my very initiation, attended but once, and that for the sake of friendship, and yet I am so held up! Why should it be so?"

Why it was all so ordered he understood perfectly well not until years afterward. When Secession became the rage he was the burned child that dreaded the fire. His experience during the furor of Know Nothingism had branded into him several wholesome truths. He learned that a great political movement might swiftly rise and as swiftly cease. He learned that such a movement might, at one hour, number its millions of adherents, and at another after-hour have left scarce one to do it reverence. He learned that vast multitudes might, during a period, be roused to enthusiasm upon a certain point, professing the most thorough conviction, the most ardent affection, the most adamant resolve in regard to that point, and yet, in a very short time afterward, that enthusiasm have utterly cooled out, that conviction utterly gone, that affection changed into as strong aversion, that resolve reversed to work exactly the other way.

His experience from Know Nothingism left him, and thousands like him, thoroughly prepared to resist the far more eventful Secession storm when it, in its terrible turn, raged over the South—to resist it, at least, from sweeping them on its side. To that first experience did this son of Levi, at least, owe it that, from the outset to the end of Secession, he clung but the more devotedly and exclusively to his one business in life as a Gospel minister. And the wondrous dealing of Providence thus with him to this end awoke within him the sincerest faith and love ever thereafter in that Providence.

It was very early one morning, soon after the election of Lincoln was looked upon as a settled thing, that Guy Brooks entered the study of his pastor. That study was a little room in the rear of the church, amazingly convenient to the lawyer on his way between his house and his office down town. The lawyer had a half-concealed expression of anxiety as he entered the room, took his seat, unfolded a huge poster, spread it out upon the table before his friend, and leaned back in his chair with a "There! what do you think of that?"

As the minister read the flaming capitals the lawyer studied his countenance. It was the countenance of a poet as well as a preacher—

There was a marked dissimilarity and as marked a similarity between these two friends. The lawyer was of an unusually large frame—the singular characteristic of Kentucky—stature fit for those who man that outpost and bulwark of freedom, while the minister was but of medium size.

Even had the two men not been thrown together as minister and officer of a young and struggling church, in a new community having but little sympathy with religion, they would have been drawn together by an instinctive affinity. Genuine piety and heart-felt sincerity in both, the dependence of the lawyer upon the minister as his spiritual guide, and of the minister upon the lawyer as his counselor in matters of the world—these ties bound the two closely together.

"Yes, but what do you think of it?" asked the lawyer, as his companion read the poster through, then, without a word, folded it up and returned it to its owner.

"Nothing at all. But where did you get it?" was the reply.

"Tore it down from beside the door of the Post-office," said the Kentuckian, with emphasis. "It was hardly worth your while," said his companion; "you surely attach no importance to any effort of the sort."

"You are mistaken, Sir; terribly mistaken. Listen how it sounds!" continued the lawyer, and he opened the poster as he stood, and read it in a powerful and earnest voice.

"FRIENDS OR SLAVES! The die is cast. The anticipated Abolitionists of the North have accomplished their dishonorable purpose. Beyond a doubt Abraham Lincoln has been elected President. Are you prepared to quit the iron jobs of an Abolitionist? Your President an Abolitionist? Fellow-citizens, we must strike for our liberty now, or be forever slaves! All those in favor of calling an immediate Convention of the people of this great State will meet this afternoon at the Court-house at 3 o'clock. Come one, come all!

"Strike for your altars and your fires, Strike for the green graves of your sires! God and your native land!"

"Well, and what of all that?" asked the minister, perfectly cool beside the excitement of his companion.

"What of all that?" replied his companion. "Is it possible you do not know what is to follow? Do you not know that South Carolina has already seceded? That Mississippi has probably followed? That the storm is just rising which is to sweep over all the Southern States? What of that? It means that our State, too, is to be hurled into the movement."

"By whom?" The minister patient with his mistaken friend.

"By the leaders of this meeting this afternoon."

"And who are they? Look at it, man. Lamson, first and foremost; Colonel Roberts; Judge Jones, who owes his late election to Lamson; Colonel Jaggins will ride in, too, from the country; Dr. Ginnis; Alf Pike; Dick Simmons; Bob Withers; and the like. There may be others, but only as spectators, like yourself, Mr. Ellis, and Ferguson."

"You seem to take it for granted that I am not going into the thing," said the lawyer, composing his face.

"May God forbid!" ejaculated the minister, fervently, and somewhat anxiously. "He has forbidden, he does forbid! But you do not estimate the thing right. Perhaps only a dozen or two of the professional politicians will meet there really determined to act. Lamson will be called to the Chair. Brother Barker, by previous arrangement, will open the meeting with prayer."

"Never!" interrupted the minister, eagerly. "It shows how little you know, shut up here among your books. Brother Barker will open with a long and fervent prayer. His whole denomination at the South will identify itself, has identified itself with the movement. The strongest kind of resolutions have been written out by Lamson weeks ago, and will be introduced and passed. Not a hundredth part of Somerville will sympathize in the thing—the community as a community will heartily disapprove of the thing—yet Lamson will publish a blazing account in his paper, and represent the proceedings as the unanimous and enthusiastic expression of the whole county. Meanwhile, by letters and visits to all parts of the State, made weeks ago, months ago, similar meetings will be got up by similar politicians over the whole State; an enthusiasm will be kindled, will rage with fury over the State. Then a Convention will be held, Secession will be consummated, and then—God only knows what!"

"But the Governor—" began the minister. "By—by nothing at all!" burst out the lawyer, deeply excited. "What a splendid opportunity for immortal fame that man has! Oh, if I could but be in his place to-day!"

"And what would you do? could you do?" "Do? I would run up the flag of my country, rally around it by proclamation every true man in the State, and defy the devil of Disunion and all his infernal works! I tell you, Sir, three-fourths of the voters of the State would stand by me to the death. Lamson and his clique over the entire South—the politicians—are utterly distinct from the people in this whole matter. The politicians have a long-cherished hatred against the North burning in their bosoms; they want plunder and power. The people are busy with their crops and their families; they want only their rights and peace. Yet in one month—in two weeks from this hour, the people will have passed helplessly into the hands of the politicians. And while this golden, glorious moment is passing away never to return, there they sit at the capital of the State, the Governor and the heads of departments, bewailing and deprecating and dreading the awful ruin they have at least sense enough to know is coming upon the State. Unwilling to shed blood! Imbeciles! Infatuated old women! As if the cause of Right and Liberty and Law, and all we hold dear as American freemen, is not the one cause to strike for, if need be to die for. Shed blood! As if that should paralyze us in this last moment. Only run up the flag of our country, rally around it the true men of the State, arrest every traitor; only a firm front and a bold hand for this next golden month, and the State is saved forever, just as old Kentucky will be!" And the lawyer walked the floor in excess of impatience.

"But the Governor?" insisted the minister. "Understands the whole evil as well as any man; would do what is right; but—but—" "Is too old," supplied the minister, in sorrowful tones.

The lawyer's head sunk gloomily upon his breast. "You draw a terrible picture," said the young minister, after a long silence; "yet I do not feel at all dismayed. I have no certain faith in any human arm or brain. But I do feel a full and quiet faith in God. You believe in him as well as I. You know perfectly well that he orders all hearts, all minds, all events in infinite wisdom and love. This is a great Christian nation, has been founded as such. Ever since its peculiar religious foundation was laid in prayers and tears by the boldest men then alive on earth, it has been a nation trained to piety. Think of the numerous and powerful denominations; think of the great benevolent associations for the advancement of Christianity at home and abroad, and of their millions of income. Why, Sir, this is a Christian land! I can not for a moment believe it is to be given up to disruption and ruin. I would as soon expect the sun to—"

"Go out?" asked the lawyer. "Well, and 'the sun shall be turned into sackcloth'—I don't remember the rest of the passage—the moon into blood!"

"Oh, that refers to the latter days," said his companion, with a smile of superior theological information.

"I myself can not think, can not bring myself to believe in the raging of a civil war in this nation—this nation. It seems preposterous," said the lawyer, as if reasoning with himself.

The minister laughed outright. "I did not dream you were ever troubled with such morbid notions, Mr. Brooks. Really Lamson frightens you altogether too much. Do you think that such men as Lamson, and the class whom he represents, are to be compared with the vast body of sober, sensible, Christian men who make up this great country? Or, if that is not strong enough," said the minister, with a pitying smile, "do you imagine that a million of Lamsons are too powerful for the Almighty? For my part, the more I think of it the more composed I feel. War? Nonsense!"

"God often uses bad men to accomplish his greatest purposes," said the lawyer. "As to our Christianity, we may turn out to be not so Christian a people as we have fancied ourselves to be. And who knows," he added, looking at his friend in a way which both puzzled and awoke vague pain in his bosom, "but that the Almighty has a special controversy with us as a people—a special controversy? If He has, you depend on it no amount of Christianity, nor of national fasting and prayer on our part, will arrest His hand until that one matter be settled. We will see very soon. No matter about that just yet. The power of the bad men, the palsy of the good men just now! I declare it does look like the hand of the Almighty, though. However! It is the rain of my native South, and by the rash hands of the South itself, that I fear. However, I am glad to find we think and feel alike in this matter. I was sure we would. Time for me to go to my office. Good-morning." And the visitor was gone only to look back again the next moment.

"I am afraid I know somebody with whom you will not be able to agree in regard to Secession," he said, significantly.

"And who may that be?" asked the minister, feeling his face suddenly burn as he spoke.

"Not the least use to inform you," said the lawyer with a smile, and closing the door after him.

THE WARRANT DEED.

Act—"FRIENDS and His Death."

A LAWYER there was, when I'll call Mr. Clay, He had but few clients, and those didn't pay; At length, of starvation he grew so afraid, That he courted and married a wealthy old maid. Chorus—He to rail it, to rail it, to rail it, day.

At the wedding this lawyer made one great mistake; 'Twas not in omitting the cards or the cake; The ring was well chosen, the parson well fed, But the groom did not ask for an inheritance deed. Chorus, describing this and mistake—He to, etc.

One night, in their chamber, the lady arose, And began to prepare to retire to repose; While her husband sat near her, admiring the charms Which it gave him such pleasure to clasp in his arms. Chorus, appropriate to the feelings of the joyous bridegroom—He to, etc.

She went to the wash-stand to bathe her fair face, The process detained all his beauty and grace; The rose on her cheek, whether rosy or false, When displayed on the towel was nothing but paint! Anxious Chorus, on witnessing the materials of the lady's countenance displayed upon the towel—He to, etc.

She went to the mirror, to take down her hair, But when she had done so, her cranium was bare! Said she, "Don't be frightened to see my poor head, I shall put on my cap when I get into bed." Chorus: to be sung as smooth as the lady's head.—He to, etc.

Her husband next saw, with amazement and grief, A curious performance of hers with her teeth; She took them all out with her fingers and thumbs, Said she, "I'm accustomed to sleep in my gums." Chorus: to be sung by Dr. Colton's laughing-poor patients—He to, etc.

Then she loosened the robes which enveloped her waist, And took something out which within them was placed; Said she, "When I'm dead, let it not be forgotten, You can make a small fortune, my love, on this estate." Chorus: exhibiting the sudden change in the feelings of the widower, produced by receiving the price of the cotton.—He to, etc.

The groom had been sitting in stupid surprise To see such strange doings before his own eyes; But now he leaped up and rushed out at the door, And poor Mrs. Clay never saw him no more! Chorus: showing how the departing husband shut the door after him.—He to, etc.

Young man, when you go to agree for a wife, To the gravest agreement you'll make in your life; Don't trust to good looks—of my counsel take heed; But be sure and insist on a mortgage deed. Grand final Chorus, by twenty-four rascally young men, each determined to exact a mortgage deed.—He to, etc.

PHILIP FALKLAND'S STORY.

When my mother was left a widow, and it had been discovered that the money which was supposed to be lying in the Crampton Bank had been invested in the consolidated Bubble and Snash Company, and in some mysterious manner disappeared with it; when the old family mansion was sold and the furniture with it, and all our earthly possessions were packed away in trunks standing ready cased in the hall for the morrow's fitting; mother looked around her and saw the three of us, all boys, sitting sadly over the fire, and sighed out:

"Well, I'm glad there are no girls among you: men can make their own way in the world, give them half a chance. Maybe it will be the Lord's will that I should go too; and how could I leave young Eneas? There's Eben half a doctor now—and learning every day; and Samuel with good prospects before him—if the ironmongery isn't quite what we'd have chosen; and Phil"—there she stopped and reddened, and said, quickly—"Phil's but young yet, and has elder brothers."

I knew what she meant right well: why her face flushed and her lip quivered. And when Eben had taken his light and gone up stairs to bed, and Samuel, with a kiss a child might have given his mother, had followed him, I took my crutches and came out of the corner where I had been sitting, and sat down by mother's side.

"You've been fretting about me, mother," I said. "She looked at me with another flush, and said, 'I've a great deal to fret about just now, you know, my dear.'"

"I know that, mother," I said. "But I know this also—when you set thinking before the fire just now—often since our troubles came upon us you have said this to yourself:—"

"Eben will be a doctor in good practice some day. Samuel will succeed and make friends and fortune. But what can Phil do but drag his brothers down by living on their bounty?"

My mother put her hand over my mouth. "I never thought the half of that," she said. "Elder brothers should always help the younger."

"And how much younger am I than they?" I asked. "They are twins, and nearly one-and-twenty; I am full nineteen. Mother, you have been anxious on my score. You are still."

"Well, Phil," said mother, "I won't deny it; we have tried—your poor father and I—to make life easy for you, and it seems so terrible for you now. I wish again and again you were a little child, so that I could carry you about and cuddle you up in my arms more than ever. Ever since you were hurt I've felt so, and now, oh, Phil! the others may manage, and I'm an old woman; but what will you do without money?"

"As well as the rest, dear mother," I said. "No, Phil," said mother. "They can walk and run. They hardly used the carriages when we had it, and you always rode, or sat in that or on horseback. They can eat common dishes with appetite, and you need things that cost money to tempt you. And soft cushions and carpets and cozy seats you must have, and I've seen the others choose to spend all day in their work-shop or the barn. I love all my boys; but you're right, I don't fret for the others as I do for you."

"Never fret again, mother," I said; "I've got into lazy habits, and am stronger than you think. And the riding was all pride. You see I look better any where than on my feet. And as for bread-winning, I can do something in that way too. I have hands, if I haven't feet, that are worth much to me."

"The boy never means to turn tailor or shoemaker!" cried mother, with a gasp. "I'll do that before I'll be idle," I said; "but I was thinking of something else. Do you know I believe Nature made me an artist?"

"Goodness!" cried mother. "Why, what makes you think so?" "Because I've always loved to paint and draw," I said. "Because I've done more than you know in that way, and because—to tell the truth to my own mother—I feel certain I don't dash. My pictures are not what they ought to be. I have every thing to learn, but I feel what I can not do, and I'm certain some day to do something."

Mother looked at me as though I were a pet child who had proposed some absurd attempt, and said, in a humming voice, "Yes, dear, of course you can. It will amuse you nicely."

"Wait here," I said. "Only wait here a while." And I went from the room and along a little passage to my pretty bedchamber and brought out my portfolio.

Mother put on her glasses and prepared to look indulgently. But in a little while, as she turned the pieces of millboard over, her eyes began to sparkle. And at last she almost screamed, "They're fit to frame and put in an exhibition. They are, Phil! I always went to one in the spring with poor dear pa, and I ought to know. Oh, to think that I, nobody but I, should have such a genius for a son. A boy who paints pictures fit to frame already! Why didn't you tell us before? Oh, Phil!"

She put both arms about my neck and cried outright as she spoke; and I could have cried for joy to see her so glad. I knew better than she how far my work was from that of an experienced artist. That this was crude, and that cold, and the other a little out of drawing. But it would have been pure vanity to point out these defects to her while she sat glistening over the sketches with her eyes dewy and her lips tremble.

After a while, when she would let me, I slowly gathered them up, and said, "So you like them, mother?" "Like them! Oh, Phil!" sobbed mother. "And to think how good God is all the while. So often I've watched boys at their games and wished my fair-haired Phil could be among them; and, perhaps, if you had not been lame you would never have painted at all. And to be such a genius is better than any thing else in this world. Money? Surely, Phil, I need not fret now. I've heard of great artists being paid small fortunes for one picture. And you'll be a great one, I know. Phil, I could almost kiss that little girl! I have almost (not quite) forgiven her."

"Forgive her entirely," I said, "for she was never to blame."

And as I plodded wearily into my chamber I could not help thinking of the point my life turned upon. I could not help sighing a little heavily to think, after all, how glad I should be to be strong and active like Eben and Sam.

I had not always been lame. It was not until I was fourteen that, as I sat sketching the vessels on the Hudson one afternoon, I spied a little girl, a mere child, on the railroad track between the bank I sat on and the river. She was picking up some flowers she had dropped, and knew nothing of the great iron monster screaming up the track toward her, or of her danger. I called to her, but she did not hear me, and there was so little time to spare that I had barely reached the spot when—No matter—you have guessed the whole already, and I saved the child. She had, they said, no scratch or bruise upon her.

I was so glad of that, when I was able to talk of it, that I longed to see the little creature once again. And then, for the first time, I knew that mother, with her heart full of sorrow for me, had spoken very literally to the mother of the little girl who had come weeping to ask after me and thank me, and had forbidden her to come near the house again. They were strangers, and had left the place since that time, and so we lost all trace of them.

I'm sure mother hated the very memory of the child; but I always felt tender toward her—something as a mother may to the child who owes its life to her agency I often think.

While I tied up my portfolio I gave a few moments to those remembrances, and then called "Good-night!" across the hall. Mother's voice answered almost cheerily, "Good-night, Phil!" And soon I heard her in her own room, and though it was the last night in our dear old home, fell to sleep and dreamed of pleasant things until the day broke.

Then, with the ringing of the breakfast-bell, we were up and doing. There were good-bys to be said to a few neighbors; two faithful servants to part from. Each wanted to visit some favorite spot alone, and each dreading the last moment for the others. But it passed better than we expected for all of us. Mother hid her face in her handkerchief—Eben sighed, and Sam's voice was husky; but that was all. After we were in the cars I felt my hand cold and clammy, and my heart beating fearfully from the excitement I had hardly been aware of; but I had given no sign of what I felt to the others, and was thankful for that, as I watched the roof of our old home fade into the distance, and saw at last even the steeple, in whose shadow my father lay asleep, turn into a cloudy dream and vanish.

Four days later we had found some rooms in one of the plainest streets of New York, and were fairly started upon our new, strange life.

Even I was busy, for the sketches had been shown to my teachers. Eben had said: "I'm no critic, but I think he's got it in his; mother."

And Sam had cried, "You may turn it to profit somehow, Phil."

And the cabinet council decided that the best room was to be my study, and that the front door should be garlanded with a plate bearing the words—PHILIP FALKLAND, ARTIST. So the plate was up; and my sketches were upon the walls, and a new easel and pallet and maulstick ready; and while Eben divided his time between the chemist shop and hard study, and Sam, as clerk in an iron foundry, earned his small salary well, I painted and waited for purchasers and sitters.

They were slow in coming; but daguerreotypes were not in all hands then, and some people were glad to find a young artist who would paint cheaply. My first patron was a coachman, who wanted a likeness to present to his sweet-heart; my second a little dress-maker from over the way, who had evidently been written by teacher Eben, and fancied him the artist; and my third was a gentleman who longed for a portrait of his dead wife, and whose name was Hargrave.

I painted her as she lay, a beautiful piece of marble, on her pillow, and my fancy helped me to the life-like glow on the cheek and the radiance of the smile.

The husband told me his daughter's eyes were like her mother's, and the young lady was to sit to me while I painted them.

One morning I waited in my studio for her coming, and heard a little knock on the door. When I cried, "Come in!" it opened, and a girl of seventeen, dressed in deep mourning, entered. It was no surprise to me when she said, "I am Mr. Hargrave's daughter Jessie, Mr. Falkland," for I expected her; yet something startled me as I placed a chair for her. As I uttered the few common-places which usually come to the lips of strangers who meet for the first time, I was aware of a strange feeling that I had known this girl before, and tried to remember where I could have met her.

Afterward, as I tried to transfer those strange, solemn, long-lashed eyes to canvas, I began to know that I had always secretly expected to look into such eyes. That since I could dream at all I had dreamed of that face. That this girl, yet a stranger, would be more to me than any other living mortal. Somehow she was interwoven with my destiny. Somehow she would work me good or ill.

Thinking thus I painted on, and the daughter's eyes shone from the mother's pictured face. I had never painted so well before. I had never so longed for more time over my work. When the evening shadows began to creep over the sky I laid my brush aside with a sigh, and said:

"If you are as weary as sitters usually are, you will be glad to hear that I have done for to-day, Miss Hargrave."

She answered: "I am not tired in the least," and came around my easel to look at the picture. "It is like mamma," she said. "How could you, who never knew her, paint so good a likeness? The eyes, too, though hers, were handsomer than mine will ever be. How papa will treasure it!"

It came into my mind to tell her that no eyes could be more beautiful than hers; but I held my peace, and only thanked her by a bow for her praise of my work. And then, as she was going, saw her to the door, not knowing that we should ever meet again. In fact, that we should not seemed most likely; for Mr. Hargrave had spoken of returning to England—his native place—and of taking his daughter with him. The picture was already paid for, and was to be sent for on the morrow, and I had no excuse for intruding upon the privacy of either father or daughter.

Yet, again and again the haunting memory of those eyes seemed to warn me that we were not to part thus. And when a month afterward my door opened and Mr. Hargrave entered with his daughter on his arm, I felt no surprise at their appearance.

It was my task, this time, to paint a portrait of Miss Jessie Hargrave—a small one, which her father could take with him on his journey. "For I have changed my plan," he said. "I shall travel until I feel that the old house yonder may be lived in again, and Jessie will keep it home-like for me. She does not wish to leave it."

"I had rather live there than in any other place," said Jessie. "I can remember poor mamma better, I think, with things she has touched about me; but the doctors say papa must go. And he says I should be a trouble to him."

The beautiful eyes filled with tears that I longed to kiss away. And she turned hastily to a portfolio which lay open on the table. While my mother and Mr. Hargrave conversed I made my way across the room and stood beside her. And we looked over the pictures together, and I answered her questions and turned the sketches over for her.

At last we came to a child's drawing-book. A common thing, much dog-eared, and she picked it up.

"I wish you would not look at that," I said. "It is a school-boy's handiwork. Nothing more."

"Yours?" she said.

"Mine, years ago," I answered.

She smiled. "An artist's first attempts," she said; "I should value it, were I you." And she furled the leaves.

There were caricatures of the schoolmaster. A picture of our horse-dog on his mat. No end of wagons, steam-engines, and ships. Two or three copies of lithographs, and, at last, a sketch from nature. The one I had been at work on when I saw the child upon the rails. It was half-finished and a blur was across it, for it had lain face downward on the grass, but Miss Hargrave looked at it eagerly.

"Ah," she cried, "that is a place I know! Is it not at—, on the Hudson?"

"Yes, that is my native place, Miss Hargrave," I said. She gave a little sigh.

"Papa," she said, "look, you remember?" and the father gazed upon the paper earnestly.

"My poor wife loved that place," he said. "Ah, yes, I remember!"

"And why did you not finish the sketch?" asked

Jessie. "You can't value it as I do. May I have it?"

"Take the book," I said, "if you will so far honor it." But I did not tell her why the sketch was not finished.

The little book was in a pretty reticule she carried when she left me. And the next day she came to sit for me. Again I looked at will into the depths of those glorious eyes. Again I marked the delicate outline, the flower-like coloring, the billowy waves of dark-brown hair. She was, to my fancy, the loveliest thing on earth. And soon I knew I loved her. Much as one might love the dweller of some sphere above him—for I had no hope of a thought from her or any other woman. But very earnestly and truly. A glove that she had worn, a flower she had touched, were precious to me as holy relics to a devotee. And often, though I strove to banish them, thoughts of what might have been, had I been handsome as my brother Eben, or stalwart as my brother Samuel, would fill my mind and make me sit idly before my easel in a waking dream.

I said to myself, "When the picture is done I shall see her no more;" but though I knew this would be best for me, my heart gave a great leap of joy when I heard that she had taken a fancy to drawing-lessons, and that I had been chosen for her teacher.

"If you will do me the favor of taking a pupil," said the courtly father, never guessing that the request had given me a little glimpse of paradise.

"Could she learn something in a year? You think so? Then for a year you shall try to make an artist of my little girl, though I doubt her talent."

So matters stood when he went away; and so I gained the estrée of Jessie Hargrave's home. I gave her lessons. Twice a week I had the privilege of sitting beside her for an hour and guiding her pencil. They were the happiest moments that I knew, for I was then alone with her. But we saw each other often at other times. A grim old aunt presided over her home, but Jessie often came to mother for advice or comfort. She grew intimate with all the family, chatted with Eben and laughed with merry Sam, and saw every sketch I made at its beginning.

Whether I quite hid my love, or whether it sometimes was revealed by look or tone, I could not tell; but one thing troubled me. Sometimes, when she thought I did not see her, I caught her looking at me in the strangest way. The look she might have given one she had injured—a remorseful look. That, and nothing else.

By-and-by I began to fancy I had fathomed it. My handsome brother Eben was often at her side. Always ready to walk with her and her little cousin Madge, who had come to live with her. Never tired of hearing them sing duets, and perpetually "rambling over" with a book or a rare flower, or on some excuse or other. So plainly a more subtle disguise that he himself had not when he entered it.

Eben liked Jessie—loved her, and she had found it out—found out also that I adored her, and feared his harshness to pain me.

She pitied me so, you see; I saw that, and it was hard to be pitied only, where I longed for love. She knew I could not awaken that love in any woman's heart; and because of that was kind to me.

Often, when we walked out together, she would leave the rest to keep by my side; and many a time I have seen tokens of her remembrance that I was different from the others in her sisterly watchfulness for my comfort. Yes, she loved Eben, and both were keeping the secret for my sake.

When I once felt sure of this, I said to myself: "Do not be selfish, Philip Falkland; prove to the kind brother and the sweet friend that you can be happy in their happiness; and I set to work to conquer my own heart. Vain attempt! The love I strove to smother was too strong.

But at least I could mask it; and rather than be a blight upon their pleasant interchange of talk and look I played a part; pretended to be early; refused to join their walks; shot myself in my studio when they were all together in our little parlor, and hoped at least to make the handsome pair less tender of me. And I prayed earnestly, Heaven knows, that I might never feel angrily jealous of my brother; kind, quiet Eben, who would have cut his right hand off rather than do me harm.

Yet sadly jealous I must be; and once, when the spring days were growing bright, they had planned a quiet little picnic. Only mother, Madge, and Jessie, and my brothers, and four other young people the girls knew, and were full of merry talk about it, while I, refusing to join them, sat apart.

Jessie had looked troubled ever since I had given a crusty answer to her coaxing invitation. The others had begun to let me have my own way, and before they went she came to me again.

"If you don't like the place," she said, "or if it is too far for you, we will go somewhere else. Do come, Phil!"

And as she spoke her little hand touched my arm, and her dark curls dropped against my cheek. The touch thrilled me through. I trembled and grew pale; but I only answered:

"No; I shall be busy all day. Don't stop to think of me. Good-by!"

And I went to my easel and pretended to be at work. Alas! it was only pretense. For when they had gone out into the sweet spring sunshine I hung brush and pallet aside, and, lying prone upon my little scarlet-covered lounge, hid my face and wept—wept as a girl might, sobbing and moaning—for once, for the first and last time, giving vent to the emotions so long pent up within my breast.

The passionate storm was over at last, and I looked up to see Jessie standing in the door-way of my studio looking at me. Her hands were clasped, her face very pale.

When she saw me she advanced and knelt down beside the lounge. Of their own accord her little pearly hands took mine and held them.

"What is the matter, Philip?" she said. "Have we offended you? We have been so different of late to what we were that I have feared so."

I looked at her ashamed and troubled.

"Since you have seen me blubbering like a baby you might as well know the full extent of my child-likeness," I said. "It never happened before. It never shall again. But, for once, I longed to walk away beside you, as Eben and Sam can. The sweet air did it, or the sunshine. It's over now; and you have always been only too thoughtful of me. Go—they are waiting for you, Jessie."

"I am not going," she said. "And so it is that; and you suffer so in secret. Oh, Philip!"

She seemed to turn faint, and sat down on the chair near my easel, and leaned against it heavily.

"How you must hate the girl!" she said—"the child you saved upon the road. How you must wish she had never been born! Better for her to have died than this! Ah, you did not think I knew of her! Your mother told me."

I arose and crossed the room. Even when I bent over her I could not see her face, but she trembled like an aspen leaf.

"Jessie," I said, "my thoughts of that innocent child are the happiest of my life. Hate her!—my good, kind Jessie! Why should I hate that child? I love her, rather, because I have suffered to do her some little good. I think of her sometimes as the woman she must have grown to be by this time, and think of her young beauty still unmarried—her young life full of joy, as I pray it may be, and say, 'God permitted me to save her.' Often since I knew you I have thought she may be like you—I have wished it could have been you—Jessie!—Jessie!"

For she had started up and stood before me with clasped hands.

"I was afraid of this, Philip," she said. "Ah! you guessed the truth, and speak as you do to spare me. You know I—I, Jessie Hargrave—was the child you saved from death at such a cost. Better that I had lain there dead—better any thing than the purchase of life and strength at such a price. Look at me as you must feel—show me your aversion—shrink from me—bid me begone, for I have marred your life—I—I—I!"

She was sobbing fearfully, and I drew nearer and put my hand upon her shoulder.

"For God's sake, Jessie," I said, "don't speak so, lest you hear the truth! Hate you? Oh, Jessie, I never guessed that you had been the child, but from my heart I say, 'Thank Heaven for it!' At least I have done you some little good, my best, my— Leave me, Jessie—for Eben's sake, leave me!"

"For Eben's sake?" she cried. "Leave you for Eben's sake—what can you mean?"

"Foolish words," I said. "Dear friend—dear sister, forget them."

She turned her wet eyes full upon my face. Her fingers touched my arm and clung to it.

"Say it again, Philip," she said. "Tell me you never hated this wretched child—that you do not hate her now! I have striven so long to keep the secret lest you should. I have said, 'While he does not guess who I am he may like me a little still.' I have wept so much for the harm I have done my 'dear, dear' Jessie, that I really think that you have not hated my memory?"

"It is true that I love you better than my soul!" I cried. "That you are all my world and half my heaven! Go, now; go—best, sweetest, dearest Jessie; and forget that Eben's brother ever spoke these words to you. Whatever happens, the memory of those moments passed beside you will be the sweetest of my life. Some day I can say 'sister' from my heart, for God will help me."

Her clinging fingers never left my arm.

"Eben again!" she said; "surely you do not think we love each other? He is betrothed to Madge. Did you not guess that?"

A great cloud seemed to have passed from the face of my son. The world was bright again. At least no other claimed her. At least I had done no wrong in loving her. I looked into her eyes. I felt the touch of her hand. I breathed her very breath—sweet as new-mown hay!

"Jessie! Jessie!" I cried. "I scarcely dare to ask you for your love, and claim you for my very own. Oh were I strong and able to cherish and protect you! But now, I dare not; I dare not ask what it would be madness to hope for!"

Still, her fingers never stirred. Her eyes never left mine; and from her parted lips fell these sweet words:

"If you dare not ask for my heart, Phil, how dare I, a woman, tell you how long it has been yours without great shame?"

I caught her in my arms, but paused even then.

"Is this pity—the payment of a debt?" I asked.

"Do you sacrifice nothing in giving yourself to a cripple who has only love to give you?"

And she answered: "It is not pity—it is not gratitude. It is pure love, and love is all it asks."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ERRANDY DETERMINATION.—The person who made the walkin ring writes to assure us he made it especially for "the twelfth finger of the left hand but one."

An elderly and good-natured physician, on being called on to her "single Mrs. Brown," declared, "I never yet have lost heart, because I've always kept in constant remembrance the fact that Naevius, the daughter of Horus, was five hundred and eighty years old when she got married."

A NOTE THAT COULD NOT BE HEARD.—Many medical compounds make use of a sharp and A flat; but the author of the "Mansfielder" introduced as a note a sharp which calls our attention to the fact that a philosophical member of the Anthropological Society says all the human races are descended from people who could not speak, or, as he designates them, "mutes." We shall consider the author of the theory in future as "our most-esteemed friend." "But, I say," says Johnny, who always listens to instructive conversation like a good boy, as he is, "if the first people were all mutes, who were the descendants, and who did they bury?"

DADDY DODD.

JOHN BEADLE was an honest man, with a large family and a small shop. It was not a hopeful circumstance in John's position that, while his family kept on enlarging, the shop obstinately maintained its contracted dimensions; that, while there seemed to be no bounds to the race of Beadles, the business which maintained them was strictly limited. John's shop was situated in one of the many by-streets, with no main thoroughfare among them, which constitute Somers Town; and it was devoted to the sale of coals and vegetables. As a householder, John, though in a small way of business, was a person of some importance, inasmuch as he was the sole lessee of an entire tenement. It was something to boast of in that neighborhood, but not much; for the roof which John called his own was a broken-backed roof, and covered only one floor besides the basement, which formed the emporium. The tenement seemed to be fast sinking into the earth. The impression of the beholder was that one story had already sunk, and that the others were rapidly following it; so that it seemed probable in a few years there would be nothing visible but the broken-backed roof lying flat on the spot, a monument of departed commerce in coals.

John's family consisted of his wife Martha, seven children, and Martha's old father. All these, including the old man, who was past work, and utterly without any means of his own, were dependent upon the exertions of John, aided, when urgent family affairs would permit, by his wife. John's exertions were divided between chopping fire-wood, taking out hundreds (more frequently half-hundreds) of coals on a truck, and "moving." The occupation of "moving" may be described as going to houses about quarter-day, wrestling with chests of drawers, sofas, four-post bedsteads, and other heavy articles of furniture, and getting very little money, but a good deal of beer. If John had been a peccator of the wilderness he might have nourished his family upon beer for a week after a moving; but he was only a man, and could do little more than find them a bit of supper with the single shilling which was generally all his reward in available currency.

The door and the window of the shop being always open, the nature and extent of John's stock in trade were patent to the world. It consisted of about a ton of coals—which generally ran small—heaped up in a corner, a little pile of fire-wood, a few strings of onions, a few bunches of greens, a basket or two of potatoes, a box of red herrings, a couple of peppermint-sticks, alluringly displayed with some marrowless nuts and wizened apples on a board outside the window, and a bed-wrench. This last instrument was a wonderful auxiliary to John's other resources. While the two upright beams and the single transverse beam were the support of the emporium architecturally, the bed-wrench was the prop of the emporium commercially. It was a thing not to be bought, but borrowed; and the charge for the loan of this bed-wrench was twopenny. Chaldron Street was given to borrowing, and it seemed to be a street which did not lie easy in its bed, for it was always taking its bed down and putting its bed up again, the result being that John's bed-wrench was in constant and urgent demand. Such has been the eagerness to secure the instrument, that two rival applicants have been known actually to wrench each other in the effort to possess it.

One half of John's shop was occupied by the stock, the other half formed the ordinary sitting-room. This latter room had a fire-place, surmounted by a mantle-shelf, on which stood several works of art in china; and its furniture consisted of two or three Windsor chairs, and a small round table. Little active domesticity was ever witnessed in this department except at the close of the day, when the family, coming from the coals, and the potatoes, and the fire-wood, made a rush at the little round table, and scrambled for herrings and thick bread-and-butter and tea. At such times old Daddy, Martha's superannuated father, was to be seen sitting in an arm-chair by the side of the fire, his bald head encircled by a glory of onions, and the coals rising on his right like a distant mountain range, put in as a back-ground to the picture. Those family banquets were sharp and short. All unnecessary conveniences of luxury, such as knives and forks, stop-basins and the like, were dispensed with. Each one, as he finished his cup of tea, turned round and threw the drags upon the heap of coals, and, when he had finished picking his herring, turned the other way and flung the bones into the fire. After the meal, Mr. Beadle was accustomed to sit down opposite old Daddy, while Martha drew up between them, and devoted herself to the mending of the family linen; but, as the number of chairs was limited, the younger branches of the family usually reclined, in the classic fashion, among the coals, in contact with which they derived a swarthy complexion which caused them to be known in the neighborhood as the "black Beadles." John and Martha loved their offspring dearly, and would not have had any thing happen to one of them for the world; but they began to find that they were increasing both in numbers and in appetite in a ratio altogether disproportionate to the development of the trade in coals and vegetables, notwithstanding that the rolling stock had been increased by a new truck and a second bed-wrench. John's ambition had often taken a run at a horse and cart; but it had never been able to vault so high, and always fell back upon the truck and hurt itself in the region of its dignity. A truck is not a glorious kind of vehicle—especially a coal-truck. It is a vehicle that takes the pavement rather than the middle of the road, for choice, and although the thunder which it makes as it traverses the coal traps on the pavement is considerable, it is not a source of pride to its owner. Besides, it does not warrant the assumption of that sceptre of authority, a whip; and it is usually propelled by one of the human species. Well, it would never do if we all had the same ambition. While some persons aspire to rule their fellow-men, there are others who prefer to exercise authority over the brutes, in driving a horse and cart. This was John's case. A horse and cart, with a corresponding increase of business, and a drive down the road to the Jolly Butchers on Sunday afternoon, with the mist in all her best by his side, and the kids, with their faces washed behind, like a pen of clean little pigs—this had been the dream of John's life; but it was a dream that had not yet come true. Indeed, so far from this, John's prospects were becoming darker than brighter every day.

"What was to be done?" This question, which had long suggested itself to John and Martha, found audible expression one night, after the black Beadles had scampered away to their holes for the night. Old Daddy Dodd was sitting dozing in his chair by the side of the fire, and John and Martha were sitting opposite.

It was John who propounded the question: "What was to be done?"

Martha made no audible reply; but, after a pause, raised her eyes to John's face, and then looked across significantly at Daddy.

John shook his head, and covered his face with his hand.

"I have no right to ask you to do it any longer, John," Martha said. "I had no right ever to expect you to do it."

"But it was my duty and my pleasure to do it, Martha," John replied. "He's your father, and I couldn't see the poor old man starve!"

"But he needn't starve, you know, John," Martha said; and her lips trembled as she said the words.

"I know what you mean," John returned; "but I can't bear the thoughts of it. It's not what ought to be, when he's had a house of his own, and drove his own chaise, and paid rates and taxes, and every comfort."

"Well, it is hard, when you think of it," Martha replied, sadly; "and the drawing-room that we had, too, and the silver spoons, and the real china cups and saucers!" And at the thought of the china cups and saucers Martha dropped a tear.

"Yes, it is hard," John returned; "and that's why I have stood between him and it as long as I could."

"But you can't stand between him and it any longer, John, and I mustn't ask you to; it's not fair to you, John, and you sha'n't be burdened with him any longer."

Poor old Daddy was sitting dozing in his chair, blissfully unconscious of these deliberations, of which he was the subject. In his time Daddy had been in a good, though small way of business, in the carpentering line, combined with a little undertaking (which he undertook in his overtime, to oblige friends), and he had brought up a large family decently; but his sons, who might have been a help to him in his declining years, emigrated, and died in foreign parts; and when the infirmities of age began to creep upon the old man, and he was no longer able to work with his own hands, he disposed of his business at an alarming sacrifice, and retired to live on his means. His means were small, but his remaining years were few; and, proceeding on his philosophical calculation, Daddy lived upon the principal instead of the interest (which he could not have lived upon at all), and lived longer than he calculated. Although Daddy disposed of his business, and let the carpenter's shop, he still continued to occupy the dwelling-house of which it formed a part, and this led many to believe that the old carpenter was pretty well off. His daughter Martha shared in this impression, and was rather disposed to boast of the independent gentleman, her father, and cherish expectations of an inheritance.

One day, about two years after Martha had been married to John Beadle, and shortly after she had prodigally presented John with the second pledge of her affection, old Daddy arrived at the emporium, suffused with smiles. Martha thought he was going to present baby with the silver spoons. When the old man had settled himself in a chair, and recovered his breath, he said, with a pleasant chuckle,

"I've got something to tell you, Martha."

"What is it, father?"

"Well, Martha, I've been looking in the top drawer, and—"

"Yes, father, yes," said Martha, eagerly, making quite sure now that baby was to have the spoons.

"I've been looking in the top drawer," the old man repeated, "and—"

"The spoons," Martha suggested, as dutifully helping her poor old father in a difficulty.

"No, not the spoons, Martha," he said—"the money."

"What about the money, father?"

"It's all gone, Martha!"

"All gone! The money you've got to live upon, father!" cried Martha, hysterically—"all gone?"

"Every farthing," said the old man.

Martha could not believe it. She gave baby to a neighbor to mind, and insisted upon the old man going back with her to his lodging immediately. He gave her the key, and she tore open the top drawer in a frantic way. She seized the canvas bag in which the old man kept his money (for he had an unconquerable distrust of banks), and plunged her hand into it. She could feel nothing like coin. She turned the bag inside out and shook it—nothing fell out of it. She rummaged among the useless odds and ends in the drawer, and not a farthing could she find. Suddenly she paused, and said:

"You've been robbed, father. Somebody's been at the drawer."

"No, no, my dear, you mustn't say that; nobody's been at the drawer but me. I've spent it all. There wasn't much of it—only eighty pounds altogether, and it wouldn't last forever. It's me that's lived too long, Martha;" and the old man sat down in a chair, and began to whimper and weep.

Martha could only sit down and weep too. She was overwhelmed by the thought of her father's destitution, and the prospect which lay before him, in his weak old age. His money was all gone, and his few sticks of furniture, with the silver spoons, which were the only portion of his plate which remained, would scarcely realize enough to bury him.

This was sad news to tell John when he came in (from a moving job) to his dinner. Martha, by way of breaking it gently to him, hysterically shrieked out the tidings at the top of her voice, as John was coming in at the door.

"Oh, John, father's money's all gone!" she cried.

Seeing that Martha was in a dreadful state of excitement about the matter, John, with a proper appreciation of artistic contrast, took the unwelcome announcement coolly.

"Well," he said, "in that case we must keep him. He has nobody else to look to."

And so one day John went over to Daddy's house, sent for a broker, and disposed of all the things except the old man's bed, which he dispatched by the truck to the emporium. That done, he locked the door, sent the key to the landlord, and taking the old man by the hand, led him to the shelter of the broken-backed roof. Putting him into the old arm-chair by the fire, and patting him kindly on his bald head, he said:

"There, Daddy, consider yourself at home—provided for the rest of your life."

So it happened that John and Martha were burdened with old Daddy Dodd, in addition to their own numerous offspring. And Daddy was a burden, though neither John nor Martha ever said so, even to each other. He was an expensive old man, for though he did not eat much, and was well content to share a bedroom with the boys, he had, considering his circumstances, an unreasonable passion for roof; and a glass of "six ale," punctually every morning at eleven o'clock, was absolutely necessary to his existence. The glass of six ale he would have, and he would have it nowhere but in the public house, standing at the pewter bar, according to a custom which he had most religiously observed for more than forty years. One of the inconveniences of this requirement was that the old man had to be provided every morning with three-halfpence, in current coin of the realm; and another, which followed in the course of time, when the old man became decrepit and feeble—was that some one had to take him to the particular public house on which alone he would bestow his patronage (half a mile distant), and bring him back again.

Still no word of complaint escaped either John or Martha, until their family increased to that extent when every half-penny became, as Martha said, an "object." The crisis arrived that night, when John, in general but significant terms, asked his good wife what was to be done.

"It is not fair to you, John," Martha said, "and you sha'n't be burdened with him any longer." And, while the old man sat dozing in his chair, all unconscious, it was resolved between them, after a hard struggle on John's part and many silent tears on Martha's part, that John should next day put old Daddy into the work-house. The resolution was taken, and the old man slept on. Neither John nor Martha had the courage to wake him. They were afraid that he might read their terrible intentions toward him in their guilty faces. "I can not do it, Martha," John said; and he made an excuse to go out of doors to smoke his pipe. Martha could not do it either, and sat waiting for the old man to wake, and presently he woke and called for her. She had withdrawn into the shade, and he could not see her with his dim old eyes.

"Martha," he said, "where are you? Come here and let me tell you what I've been dreaming about. Such a pleasant dream, my dear, about the old days when you was all at home!—I thought I saw you all round the table eating your Christmas dinners; and there was turkey and plum-pudding and all the nice things that we used to have, you know; and then I dreamed that I was taking you to the boarding-school, where you was for a twelve-month, you know; and—and, as we was driving down the Edgeware road in the chaise, John came up and wanted to borrow five pounds, just as he used to do, you know, and—and I lent it him, just as I used to do, and—and—but what's the matter with you, Martha? you're not crying, surely?"

Poor old man, he little knew what thorns he was planting in his daughter's breast. She was crying, but she hid her tears, and said kindly it was time for him to go to bed.

So, taking him by the hand, and leading him to his room, she put him to bed and tucked him up like a child.

When Martha went down stairs again John was quickly peeping in at the door.

"Have you put him to bed, Martha?" he inquired.

"Yes, John."

"Do you think he suspected any thing?"

"Oh no, poor old dear!"

"No, of course not, Martha," John said, "he would never dream that we could be such monsters—but did he say any thing?"

"Yes, he said, 'God bless you, Martha, and God bless John, for all your kindnesses.'"

John, whose heart was much too big for his other faculties, withdrew his head from the door, and vented his smitten feelings in a howl.

John and Martha crawled up to bed that night with the sense of a premeditated crime weighing upon their souls. As they passed the room where the old man lay they turned away their faces. Next morning Martha dressed her old baby in his best clothes, crying over him all the while, and hiding her tears as best she could. Daddy wanted to know if it was Sunday, that they were putting on his best things, and Martha could not answer. Every innocent word he uttered was a reproach to her. She could not look at him at breakfast-time, neither could John.

When breakfast was over, John said to the old man, in as cheerful a tone as he could command,

"Grandfather, I'm going to take you for a walk."

"That's kind of you, John," said the old man, "very kind."

"Well, come along, grandfather; here's your hat and stick."

"I'm ready, John, quite ready. Eh? bless me, what's the matter now, my dear?"

Martha had her arms round his neck, kissing him.

"Good-by, father," she said, through her sobs, "Good-by."

She had resolved not to say it, but she couldn't help it.

"Tut, tut, my dear," said the old man, "we are not going far. Are we, John?"

"No, grandfather, not very far."

"And we'll come back soon, won't we, John?"

"Oh yes, grandfather," John said; and the words almost choked him.

Martha whispered to the children to go and shake hands with their grandfather; and wondering what this unusual ceremony meant, they did as they were told, quietly and silently.

The old man was so much puzzled as the children, and wanted to know if it was a birthday. John could not answer him; his heart was full and his utterance choked. Without another word he took the old man by the hand, and led him from the house; and Martha stood in the doorway, surrounded by the children, looking after them sadly through her tears. It was barely a quarter of a mile to the work-house, but it was a long journey for Daddy, who was getting very frail now. He dropped his stick very often, and John had to stoop and pick it up for him, and there were dangerous crossings to pass, where it was necessary for John to signal to drivers of vehicles to draw up and slacken speed until he carried the old man safely over to the other side of the road. Poor old Daddy, going to the work-house, was highly honored that day. The stream of traffic staid its current and diverted its course to let him pass. It could not have done more for the Lord Mayor. At length John, leading his unconscious charge by the hand, arrived in front of the work-house gates. At the sight of the gloomy portal and the high black wall, which shuts in life and shuts out hope, his resolution began to fall. He stopped and hesitated.

"Grandfather," he said, "it's about time for your glass of ale, ain't it?"

"Well, yes, John, I think it's getting on that way," said the old man, in a cheery tone.

"Will you take it here?" John asked.

"Is this the Nag's Head?" the old man inquired.

The Nag's Head was the house which he had "used" for forty years.

"No, grandfather," John said; "this is not the Nag's Head; but they keep a good glass of ale here."

"Well, just as you like," Daddy assented.

So John took the old man into a public house opposite the work-house gates, and gave him the usual three-halfpence; for it was Daddy's pride always to pay for his liquor with his own hard-earned money. Daddy was sipping his ale John looked at a couple of glasses of spirits; he was trying to sew his falling courage to the point. When the old man had finished his glass John took him once more by the hand, and hurriedly led him across the road. He was at the gate, hesitating, with a full heart, looking through a mist of tears at the handle of the work-house bell, inviting only the clutch of despair, when the old man looked up in his face and said:

"John!"

"Yes, grandfather."

"Ain't this the work-house?"

Daddy's look, his intimation that he knew where he was, the thought that he suspected his design, struck John to the heart; and he hurried the old man away from the gate.

"The work-house, grandfather, no, no!" John said; "what made you think of that? Come, come away, come away; we're going home, grandfather, going home as fast as we can."

John was so anxious to drag Daddy away from the spot that he fairly lifted him off his legs and carried him across the road. In his excitement and haste he quite forgot Daddy's feebleness, and hurried him along at such a rate that the old man lost his breath, and was nearly falling. It was not until a street had been put between them and the work-house that John relaxed his speed and allowed Daddy to recover himself. After that he led him gently back to the emporium, took him in, and replaced him in his old chair by the fireside.

"I couldn't do it, Martha," he said; "my hand was on the bell, when he looked up at me and spoke to me; and his look, and what he said, struck me to the heart. I couldn't do it. I felt as if I was going to murder the poor old man. It's worse than murder, Martha, to put a fellow-creature in yonder; it's burying him alive!"

"But, John—"

"I say it shall never be done by me, Martha," John interposed, sternly. "We must do the best we can for him, and strive to the best to save him and ourselves from that disgrace."

An interchange of looks sealed the compact between them—that Daddy was to have a home with them while they had a roof to call their own, and a loaf of bread to share with him.

Old Daddy had not only been a considerable expense to John and Martha, but during the winter months he had been much in the way. He was always peccating about in the shop, which being also the sitting-room, did not afford much scope for business and domesticity combined. But now the fine days were coming, and Daddy would be able to spend a good deal of his time out of doors. So, when the fine days came, little Beag, John's youngest but two, who was not old enough to be of any assistance in the business, was appointed to the sole and undivided duty of minding grandfather, and taking him for walks, when it was convenient to get him out of the way. Little Beag, a little, large-headed, wise-looking boy of six years, was Daddy's special pet and favorite; or, perhaps, it might have been said, so much more responsible a person was Benjy, that Daddy was his pet and favorite. Be that as it would, they loved each other, and on fine days, when the sun shone, it was their delight to wander hand in hand among the neighboring streets, prattling together like two children, and gazing in, with child-like wonder, at the pretty things in the shop windows. The people round about called them the Babes in the Wood, and old Daddy was certainly as much a babe as Benjy. He took the same interest in the contents of the toy-shops, and sighed as deeply as Benjy sighed to think that his youthful guardian could not become the possessor of a much-coveted toy-gun (with a pink stock), which went off with a spiral spring. In their wanderings, day by day, the Babes saw many strange things, and studied the wonders of Somers Town with the deepest interest. It was their special delight to stand before any open door or window which afforded them a view of a process of manufacture. They stood on gratings and listened to the rattle of saw-machines—"that went by steam," Benjy informed his charge and pupil, who was not very well up in the modern arts and sciences; they gazed at the little men in shirt-sleeves and fat caps, who turned a miniature coffee-mill under a glass case at the grocer's—such industrious little men, who always kept on grinding whether their master was in the shop or not, and never seemed to go home to their beds. They appreciated the lowering of barrels into public house cellars, learning the mysteries of the inclined plane, and speculating as to whether the barrels contained the particular kind of ale which grandfather liked; they watched the making of shoes and the turning of wood, and were sometimes observed to be much absorbed in the daying of sheep, a process which had a deep abstract interest for Benjy, while it set Daddy babbling about the delights—to him now purely visionary—of a boiled leg of mutton and caper sauce.

In these wanderings Benjy was careful not to release his hold of Daddy's hand, for he was particularly envious never to leave him for a moment, and whatever he did not let him tumble down. One muddy day Benjy did let Daddy tumble, and a sad state of mind he was in for fear his mother should find it out. He hid his best with his little cotton pocket-handkerchief to effect all traces of mud from Daddy's trousers; but he was afraid lest the old man might "tell on him." Not that there was any want of loyalty between them, but Daddy was getting so garrulous that he sometimes, quite unintentionally, let out things which got Benjy into trouble; so, when any thing happened, Benjy was obliged to remind grandfather that he was not to tell.

"You won't tell mother that I let you fall in the mud, will you, grandfather?" he would say, as they bent their steps homeward.

"Oh no, Benjy," the old man protested. "I—I shan't say a word about it."

At first, before complete confidence had been established between them, Benjy sought on one occasion to purchase his grandfather's silence with a penny (which he did not at that moment possess, but expected to have some day), but he had cause to know now that the bond of love between them was strong enough to sustain their mutual devotion, except when it was occasionally loosened by an inadvertence, or a lapse of memory, which, in Daddy's case, was beyond the power of either love or money to control. Going home in the summer evenings, after their rambles, Daddy and Benjy had deeply interesting tales to tell the family of the wonders of the great world of Somers Town.

Also, that those relations should so often have fallen upon indifferent ears! But John and Martha were becoming sullen and moody, a prey both of them to the deepest anxiety. The family was still increasing, but the business continued to resist all efforts in the direction of development. John was getting into debt at the coal wharf, and at the potato warehouse. The times were hard, and were coming on harder with the approach of winter. Coals were at eighteen-pence a hundred, potatoes at a penny a pound. The poor people couldn't pay the price. Poor women came for a few pounds of coal and took them away in their aprons. There was scarcely any use for the truck. When coals were so dear and fires so small, Chaldron Street was a good deal given to warm itself in its bed, which thus became a permanent institution. The consequence to John was that his bed-wrench rusted in silliness, and in view of the oxyd which accumulated upon it, it might be said to have been engaged in the disastrous occupation of sailing its head off. The fortunes of the emporium were at a very low ebb; John and Martha could scarcely provide bare food for the family. The black Beadles, clamoring for victuals, and not finding satisfaction at the little round table, passed like a cloud of locusts over the stock in the shop, and making short work of the carrots, attacked even the cabbage-leaves and the turnip-tops. John and Martha were denying themselves day after day, that the old man might have a bit of something nice and nourishing. But things were coming to a crisis now. The coal-merchant, the potato-merchant, and the landlord, all three threatened process, and John was in hourly expectation of an execution. All his striving had been of no avail to save "him and them from that disgrace." It frayed some now. Nothing could avert it.

One afternoon John was sitting on a stool, on the side of the mountain of coal, which had been removed to the last shovelful of dust (and, alas! the capitalist at the wharf had not the faith to replace it), utterly dejected and despondent. It was a terrible trial for a strong man with a stout heart and a vigorous will to be thus beaten down and trampled under the feet of a cruel and relentless Fortune, whom he had wooed with all his art, and wrestled with all his strength. Poor John had received so many heavy falls that the spirit was almost-crushed out of him. When he looked up and saw a strange man darkening his door he felt that the last blow was about to be struck.

"Come in," he said; "don't stand upon any ceremony, I beg; I'm quite prepared for you."

"Are you?" said the man, curiously.

"Yes, I am," John replied. "I know your errand as well as you do yourself."

"Do you?" said the man, in the same tone.

"Do you come here to mock me?" cried John, angrily, rising and facing the intruder; "to mock me as well as to ruin me?"

"Mock you?" said the man.

"Yes, mock me," John repeated, in the same angry tone.

"I did not come here to mock you; far from it," the man returned. "In fact, my business is not with you at all. I came to see Mr. Dodd, who was an old neighbor of mine."

"I beg your pardon, Sir," said John. "You'll excuse me, I hope; but we are in great distress, and I expected nothing but bad news."

"If I am not mistaken," said the stranger, "it is good news I bring you. You are Mr. Dodd's son-in-law, are you not?"

"I am, Sir, and I wish I were a richer son-in-law for his sake," John replied.

"Perhaps there will be no need for that, for his sake," the stranger returned.

"What do you mean?" John asked.

"Well, just this," said the stranger. "A few days ago I noticed an advertisement in the paper addressed to Daniel Dodd, informing him that, if he applied to Mr. Johnson, solicitor, in Bedford Row, he would hear of something to his advantage. Now, thinking that the Daniel Dodd wanted might be my old neighbor, and knowing Mr. Johnson, of Bedford Row, I called upon that gentleman and learned that the person wanted is Daniel Dodd, my old neighbor, and that under the will of his brother George, who died some time ago in India, he is entitled to—"

"Hold hard, Sir," said John, grasping the stranger by the arm, and staring at him with fixed eyes. "You're not having a lark, a cruel lark with us, are you?"

"God forbid," said the stranger, gravely.

"And answer me another thing, Sir," John continued, in the same excited way. "You're not out of your mind, are you?"

"Certainly not," returned the man.

"Very well," said John; "you may go on."

"I was going to say," the stranger continued, "that under the will of his deceased brother George, who died some time ago in India, Daniel Dodd is entitled to five thousand pounds."

"Martha!" cried John to his wife, who was up stairs cleaning the rooms.

"Yes, John. What is it?"

"Father's money's come back again! Father's money's come back again! Father's money's come back again!" And he shouted it over and over again up the stairs, and stamped the balusters every time to give it emphasis.

"Are you gone mad, John?" was Martha's reply, when she was allowed to speak.

"You see, Sir," said John to his visitor; "she thinks I must be mad; no wonder if I thought you were mad. But here's Daddy; he knows you, I dare say, and you can tell him; he often talked about his brother George who went to India; but I thought he had been dead long ago."

At that moment Daddy came in from one of his walks with Benjy, and was told of his fortune.

"Dear me," he said, sinking into his chair. "Father George is dead! Poor boy, poor boy!"

The poor boy had died at the good old age of threescore and ten, but Daddy still thought of him as the lad in the blue jacket from whom he had parted at Wapping when they were boys.

Not without many difficulties, long delay, and considerable cost, Daddy's claim to the five thousand pounds was established. John gave all his time—utterly neglecting the emporium—to the prosecution of the matter, and, oddly enough, in woeing Fortune in this most audacious and presumptuous manner, he proved successful; though, previously, when he had humbled himself in the dirt to implore her for a single smile, she had contemptuously passed onward, bespattering him with mud from her chariot-wheels. And one day John, knowing Daddy's weakness, brought home the five thousand pounds all in notes in the very canvas bag which had been the old man's bank in the days when he was well to do.

"There, father," said Martha, "putting the bag in his hand. And now what will you do with it?"

"What will I do with it?" said the old man. "I'll—I'll keep my promise to Benjy, and buy him that gun!"

"But there's more than will buy the gun, father."

"You don't mean that, Martha?" said the old man.

"Oh yes, father, a heap more."

"Then," said Daddy, "I'll give the rest to John to buy a horse and cart."

"But there's more even than that, father; ever so much more."

"Oh, well, you just keep that for yourself, Martha, for taking care of your old father."

And Daddy, with no elaborate design, but with the simple innocence of a child, which is sometimes wiser than the astute provisions of law, saved the dangerous formalities of will-making and the charges for legacy duty, by handing to his daughter Martha the bag containing all his money.

Besides John even thought of his horse and cart—though that was lurking to a corner of his mind—he regained the tenancy of Daddy's old house, furnished it with as many of the old sticks as he could recover from the breaker's shops, with many splendid new ones besides for the drawing-room, and, when all was done, led Daddy back to his old quarters, and joined him there with Martha and all the family.

But detours had been coming upon poor old Daddy, and he could scarcely be made to understand the change which had taken place in his position. He came at last to fancy that it was a dream, and sitting by the fire-side of an evening, and recognizing his old room peopled with the faces of John and Martha and their children, he would tell his daughter to wake him up by-and-by.

And so he went on dreaming, until one winter's night he woke up in a land where there was no more going to sleep.

And the days of John and Martha are likely to be long and prosperous, for they honored their old father in his age and need, and the bread which they cast upon the waters has come back to them with a blessing.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Give us, reader, if a fit of the "blues" comes over you some day, and you think God and the world have dealt hardly with you, take a trip to the New York Institution for the Deaf and Dumb. It will quieten your sympathies and do you good.

Step into the Eighth Avenue car, and ride up as far as they go—in Manhattanville. Do not be impatient if you have to wait a little here. Take a seat in the shelter car; or, if it is cold, there is a neat room near by where you are welcome to warm your toes while you watch for the omnibus from Harlem. In some cases, a dingy little coach closely packed; but never mind, here is half a seat vacant, and there will not be much room for the cold to gain.

A drive through Germanville would undoubtedly be delightful in summer as the street is lined with many trees, whose bare branches at this season stretch themselves silvery toward the sky. And while you are striving to imagine the change June will bring, the coach stops at the extensive gate of the grounds of the Institution, on Washington Heights, and a short walk brings you to the building itself.

It happened to be on a Monday when we visited the Institution; but every nook and corner was so scrupulously neat as if Monday was not the authorized scrubbing day throughout Christendom. We passed into some of the class-rooms. Intelligent looking lads and girls were asking questions in arithmetic at the blackboard. The teachers, a gentleman and a lady, were both quiet; but it was wonderful to see the ease and grace with which they communicated ideas and the readiness with which their pupils received them.

In another room was a class of older pupils, under the instruction of Mr. Post, the gentlemanly superintendent. Their morning lesson, passages learned from the Bible, had been written by them on the blackboards. One young man had written the texts in French, and was said to be able also to write in Latin.

One exercise was of a very novel and interesting character. We had noticed a drum on the table, and wondered what use it could serve in such an institution. At a sign from their teacher several pupils turned to the blackboard, standing so that they could not see him. He asked us to mention some word; and when he slowly spelled that word by short beats on the drum, using the same symbols for each letter as are used by the operators on the electric telegraph. Though the pupils heard not, some wonderful sensation gave them information, and they wrote each letter as it was indicated by the drum. Similar exercises were repeated several times, and seemed the more strange since the experiment was tried for the first time only five days before.

Our party having been introduced to the class, some of the young ladies wrote a graceful welcome, showing at once ready thought and quick appreciation of ideas.

About four hundred gathered at the dinner-table—French six years old and upward. What a confusion of sounds! Yet no word. A sudden silence; but there is no bowed head, only an earnest turning of every eye to the superintendent, who, in the expressive language of signs, he invoked a blessing. Then a clatter of knives and plates—they unconsciously making more noise than would four hundred talkers. The dinner is plain, yet substantial, and evidently well prepared.

We take our leave marvelling at the intelligence and quickness—the grace of expression and motion—the cheerfulness and happiness which characterize these deaf natives, who, though unfortunate, are yet fortunate in the education they receive in that institution.

The opening of a new hotel in the Central Park will be a matter of much interest to many who seek recreation in that vicinity. It has long been the design of the Commissioners to erect a spacious hotel within the limits of the Park. Instead, however, they have repaired and remodelled a cluster of buildings opposite One Hundredth Street, recently occupied by the Sisters of Charity, and known as "St. Vincent's." The older parts of this series of buildings are full of historic interest. It stood before the Revolution and was known as the McGowan House. It was occupied by the British officers when they held possession of the city; and when the British evacuated New York, General Washington made that house his headquarters. The hotel is tastefully fitted up, and offers entertainment for "men and boys" in the daytime. No lodgings are to be furnished or allowed in the building. Early breakfast, with the fruits of the season, with desserts and hot suppers, and refreshments at all hours are to be provided. An elegant parlor for the reception of ladies is prepared, and the Commissioners have omitted nothing that taste and talent can desire to secure the comfort of visitors. The house is under the charge of Messrs. Estess and Radford, who have kept the Casino since it was opened. Early times and early riders, as well as others, will find a warm welcome and tempting viands at the St. Vincent.

The following hints for the restoration of frozen limbs are given on medical authority:

Do not heat the frost-bitten limb; do not put it into warm water. The water used should be cold, and of about the temperature of thirty-two degrees. Some persons are in the habit of rubbing the frozen or benumbed flesh with snow. The danger is that this will be too cold. If used at all it should be when the air is not excessively cold, or in a room in which the temperature is moderate.

The old proverb, "He who would thrive must rise at five," is constantly scouted in the ears of sleepy morning nappers. There seems, however, to be more rhyme than reason in it; for if

He who would thrive must rise at five,
It must follow, naturally,
He who'd thrive more must rise at four;
and it will insure a consequence that

He who'd still more thriving be Must leave his bed at four of three;
And who his better would outside
Will rouse him at the stroke of two.

And, by way of climax to it all, it should be held good that

He who'd never be outside
Must ever rise as soon as one.
But the best illustration would be—
He who'd flourish best of all Should never go to bed at all.

The following advertisement cut from a popular London gazette, gives the answer to a question often asked weekly, "Where do all the waterfalls come from?"

CHIGNONS! CHIGNONS! CHIGNONS! For Sale, by Order of Government, several cwt. of HAMS cut from the HOUSE OF PRINCE GEORGE in conformity with the Regulations established in Her Majesty's Mills throughout the United Kingdom. In Lots, of every description of color. The attention of PRINCE GEORGE'S, PRINCE OF WALES, and others is invited to this opportunity of securing an adequate supply of material for the manufacture of CHIGNONS of every shade and size. A Liberal Allowance will be made to PRINCE GEORGE'S on taking a QUANTITY. — N.B. The whole of the HAMS, representing the average CONDUIT CASE of the United Kingdom, has been carefully subjected to a DISINFECTING PROCESS and exposed to a temperature of 212° Fahrenheit.

As the validity of this advertisement may be questioned, we mention that the gazette in which it appears is one of the most reliable in London, and is published at "Punch Office, 25 Fleet Street," where further inquiry can be made if desired.

At this season of the year a good many novelties in the way of fashions come from London and Paris. Among the new styles of materials for dresses it is said that black and gold colored silk will be very generally worn during the winter months, for ordinary afternoon wear; the yellow, or rather pale orange stripes, being narrow, consequently the color is not the least conspicuous. The dresses are trimmed with black silk and with narrow silk bands, which maintain the gold stripe, seen on half an inch from the edge of the black silk bands. The revers for the front of the bodice are made with the black silk and narrow band; a band of the same is placed round the neck and out of the coat-sleeved sleeves, and a weltband is likewise formed with the same materials. As a fact worth mentioning, it should be observed that wide waistbands are going out of fashion, and that, besides being made considerably narrower, they are now fastened at the left side of the waist with a row of buttons, but without studs.

As collars are worn large and pointed in front, and according to fashionable dimensions at the back, every young lady is wearing large and long streamers of narrow ribbon at the back of their dresses. These ribbons are attached to the top of the bodice in the center of the back, the loops hang downward, and the streamers, although narrow, are a yard and a quarter in length, consequently fall far below the waist. The ribbons should match either the dress or the trimmings; thus with the black-and-gold striped dresses it would be either black velvet, or silk with gold-colored silk edge.

Shoes with wide ends are very much worn at present with downy outdoor toilets, and likewise with evening toilets. They have usually three toes to them, and the richest are made of velvet. Imagine three square ends, longer at the back than the front, studded with either jet or steel beads, and finished off with two lace streamers; this, made in either black or coral velvet, evidence of mainly an evening dress which has lost somewhat of its freshness. These wide shoes are now always fastened on to a small velvet cord which is studded with beads to match. Beads made of silk are cut with pointed ends, and finished off at the points with gold tassels, beads, or fringe.

Many very handsome and novel dresses for evening wear have lately made their appearance; they are trimmed with loops and ends of ribbon, arranged much in the same style as those worn out of doors, only the ribbons are wider, and consist of white moire encased with gold.

The official reception at the Tuileries on the first days of the new year were conducted with the usual magnificence; the most noteworthy being perhaps the ball given. There were some striking toilettes. A young Belgian lady, who was presented, wore a train of white ermine (she pulled it all over, and in the hollow between every puffing a black velvet chrysothromas). The train was fastened on a single hair-dress, cut in the Prussian form, and trimmed all down the centre of the front with bezels of chrysothromas instead of with large buttons, as is usual with that style of dress. The hair-dress was composed of a tulle of chrysothromas, and of a pearl and amethyst comb. This latter was considered to be in most exquisite taste. A white fawn train, worn by a beautiful German Countess, was studded all over with bees represented in violet velvet and gold, and was fastened at the shoulders with gold cord and violet champlevé tassels. Other trains were ornamented with wide sashes having three or four ends, and these sashes had a very good effect, as they trimmed the centre of the train.

At a Christmas-eve party which was given at the Tuileries, and to which only the most intimate among the Court circle were invited, the Empress wore a most charming toilet. It consisted of white tulle, with sprays of foliage made of different shades of green velvet ornamenting the skirt, and tails of white sarcenet the bodice. The hair-dress was fastened with a coronet of white moire, and round the throat her Majesty wore a magnificent pearl necklace. The Queen of Portugal also wore white; a white satin dress, with a tulle train, and over the tulle a cast-iron haquet, made of white satin trimmed with lace; a jet glass heading the lace. A diamond and emerald comb in the hair, and a diamond necklace round the throat.

A curious custom is kept up among the Russian peasantry in some parts of England. On the evening of their marriage the bride sends her betrothed a shirt of her own making. The whole of the house is cunningly embroidered in the form of the carnation and the rose; six rows of roses are represented; the roses, too, are composed of a delicate sort of lace-work. This garment is kept the whole life long—"It is worn at the first marriage festival, and again put on when death comes to summon the old grey-headed man to be wedded to eternity."

DR. BARTH, THE AFRICAN TRAVELER.

DR. HENRICH BARTH, the great and successful explorer of Northern and Central Africa, is so well known by his travels to the whole civilized world that we can not pass in silence over his premature death, which occurred in Berlin on the 25th of November last. His great work, although so large as not to have been read as extensively as one a third as large would have been, is the best portrait of his character; showing alike his modesty, good sense, courage, confidence, and learning. Germany has sent out some of the best, if not the very best, equipped travelers of modern times. It would be hard to find names which in this respect can stand before NIMROD, FORTYK, SHERREN, BURCKHARDT, ROSENBERG, REYLL, HUMBOLDT, ZOLLER, LEHRMANN, and BARTH. Among these the last-named is admitted as par excellence; and although not child's play without warping at the age of only forty-five years, he has lived long enough to see his name among the foremost of living geographers, as well as to have completed two great enterprises—the scientific examination of the whole North-African Basin, as well as the exploration of Northern and Northern Central Africa, doing in both cases a work which had been accomplished by no predecessor.

His first great work is much less familiarly known among us than the second, and for this reason I may allude more fully to it, as, after all, it was the natural goal of all his earlier years. Bahr's career may be divided into two sections, one of which was completed, the other of which was left incomplete. The goal of his youth was to examine the Mediterranean Basin, the geographical mother, as he thought, of all civilization. The goal of his later years was to prepare a grammar of the North African languages, a work for which his philological attainments eminently fitted him. This work has been left incomplete, and I know not who can walk in his footsteps and bring it to a conclusion.

The son of a prosperous Hamburg merchant, Bahr enjoyed the advantages of pecuniary independence his whole life long. While at school in his native city he was remarkable for the same qualities which characterized him as a man—modesty, reserve, boldness, zeal, industry, and talents. He entered Berlin University in 1839, and studied philology and geography mainly, his instructors being the eminent BODER, CURTIUS, GRUBER, and RYTER. His desire to see something even then of the Mediterranean Basin led him to Italy and Sicily, where he spent four months, and where he conceived the plan, to be executed at the close of his academical career, of following the whole course of Phœnician colonization on the shores of the Mediterranean. This goal he kept steadily in sight. In 1845 he went to England, acquired the Arabic language, took letters to the English consuls of the Levant, and then set out on his first great tour. He passed rapidly through France, over the Pyrenees, and spent four weeks at Madrid. Thence he journeyed on to Cadix and Tarik, where his true tour commenced. Here, at the pillars of Hercules, he was at an outpost of European travel. My brief space will only allow me giving the slightest abstract of his course. He touched the African coast at Tangier, passed on to Tunis and Tripoli, explored the ruins of Carthage and Utica, Cyrene and Bera. Arriving on the Egyptian frontier, he was attacked by Bedouins, wounded, and robbed of every thing valuable, including what he most prized—his note-book filled with observations on the way. The work which he wrote and published after his return shows the excellence of his memory; and happily he had been in constant intercourse with his brother, Captain SCHUCHT of Dresden, and the letters to him proved of unexpected value after the loss of the original notes.

He passed up the Nile to the second Cataract, then through Arabia Petrea, Palestine, and Asia Minor, and so back to Berlin, where he became a lecturer at the University, and prepared his first volume of his travels. The cost of the whole expedition was $11,000 gold. It was worth all it cost to him, however, as a preparation for the next expedition, which was the great work of the next few years.

It is impossible for me, knowing Dr. Bahr as well as I did, to condense the matter which would be interesting to American readers into the brief space at my command. His own volumes contain, however, a full transcript of his later African life. That work was written in English at Halle in German by Bahr, who spoke and wrote our language perfectly. During the last five years he has been Professor in Berlin University. At the time of his death (which was caused by a mistake of his physician, who gave him six grains of tartar emetic to relieve a slight attack of dyspepsia) he was lecturing on the Mediterranean Basin, and preparing his work on the languages of Northern Africa. It aggravates his loss immeasurably to think that he was murdered, but it is too late to save him. I had a long conversation with him less than a week before his death. He was then in perfect health. His bronzed face still bore the impress of African travel, as well as of the journey through Albania, which he made this last summer. He called himself perfectly well; and he who was spared while both his companions, RICHMOND and OSKOVNA, succumbed to the African climate, lived so full by the carelessness, not of an apothecary's clerk, but of an educated physician.

The portrait of Bahr, on page 84, is from a very accurate photograph taken a few years before his death. He was of medium height, thickly and strongly built, with a noble brow, deep though not large eyes, a reticent manner, and great modesty in speaking of his own achievements. He used to be a great admirer of England and the English, but within the last few years his admiration had much subsided; but he continued the friend of America and Americans. He went seldom into society, and it is worthy of record that the last time when he appeared in a social gathering was just one week before his death, at a soirée of Americans at Governor Wallace's. Dr. Bahr was never married; but his life was not without its romantic side, a disappointment in love having been the impelling cause of his joining the African expedition. The same mighty passion which made KÖNNER a soldier made Bahr an explorer.

W. I. GLEN.

TOM, THE BLIND NEGRO PIANIST.

This extraordinary boy, who has for several months astonished and delighted the thousands who have had the good fortune to witness the marvellous demonstrations of his wonderful genius, was born near the city of Columbus, in the State of Georgia, about the 25th of May, 1849. Shut out from all knowledge of the external world but such as could be acquired by hearing and by touch, his whole being seemed to be open to and occupied by touch and sound. No matter what its character; the moan of pain, the cry of anger, the harsh grating of the corn-sheller, the roar of the thunder, and the soft breathings of the flute, all were music to him.

Before he was two years of age Blind Tom sang every thing he heard. When the young ladies of the family, upon their return from school, sat upon the steps and sang, Tom came and sang with them; and such were the facility and correctness with which he took up the air, that they were impressed with the belief that he did not have to learn the tune, but that upon hearing the first note he knew intuitively the balance. Soon without knowing, but from the promptings of nature, that there was any such thing, he began to sing seconds.

At about four years of age he heard the sound of a piano for the first time. Upon the arrival of the instrument he was amusing himself as usual in the yard. The first touch of the keys brought him into the parlor, he was permitted to run his fingers over the keys simply to gratify his curiosity, and to indulge his propensity to make a noise; this luxury he enjoyed occasionally only, as he could chance to find the parlor empty and the piano open. Very soon, however, between midnight and day, he found his way into the parlor, the piano having been left open, and the young ladies were awakened by the sound of the instrument. To their astonishment they heard Tom playing one of their pieces; and the coming of morning found him still at the piano. After this he was allowed to play occasionally, and his powers were so rapidly and so astonishingly developed that in a little time he was permitted to go to the piano at his pleasure. From that day he has played every thing he has heard. He is still developing new and startling powers, the existence of which has been heretofore unknown to the musical world, and the possessor of which seems to have been vouchsafed by the power of God to Tom alone.

Seventeen teachers of music in Philadelphia spontaneously testify over their own signatures as follows:

"The undersigned find it impossible to account for these marvellous results upon any hypothesis growing out of the known laws of art and science. In the numerous tests to which Tom was subjected in our presence, or by us, he invariably gave us satisfaction. Whether in deciding the pitch or comparing parts of chords the most difficult and obscure, whether in repeating with correctness and precision any piece, written or impromptu, played to him for the first and only time, whether in his improvisations or performance of compositions by MOZART, GOSSETT, SCHUBERT, VIVALDI, and others—in fact, under every form of musical examination and the experiments are too numerous to enumerate, he showed a power and capacity ranking him among the most wonderful phenomena recorded in musical history."

Blind Tom plays with wonderful effect some pieces of his own composition. One of these he composed when he was not yet five years old. It was immediately after a storm, and he called it, "What the wind, the thunder, and the rain said to him." Another he composed after hearing the various excited accounts of the first Bull Run battle. The imitation of the setting out and approach of both armies, the skirmishing, the fight, the whistle announcing the approach of KERRY SMITH'S reinforcements, and the terrible retreat, is wonderful, and brings tears to the eyes of his audience. He plays a variety of the most difficult music of the great authors, with a delicacy of touch and a power of expression such as is rarely heard. Blind Tom, we are informed, goes to Europe in Spring.

SKATING IN CHICAGO.

OTHER cities besides New York have their skating ponds, though they do not rival in size our Central Park lakes. We give on page 85 a representation of the interior of the "Great Skating Rink" at Chicago. This is the largest institution of the kind in this country, covering 18,100 square feet of surface. Here are daily and nightly congregated the elite of the City of the Lakes, and the scenes represented by our artist when the waltzers are in motion and the fancy skaters are showing their skill, all under a flood of light from reflectors above, is brilliant in the extreme.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1866.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

THE Amendment to the Constitution, of which we spoke last week, has been passed by a triumphant majority in the House. Of course our view of its adequacy to obtain unaided the special result sought is unchanged, but as one of a series of measures designed to secure certain indispensable ends—which is probably the truer light in which to regard it—it may yet appear to be wise. If, for instance, as Mr. STEVENS urges, this is all that the country will now bear, while the discussions and delays consequent upon its passage will educate the public mind to further essential measures, the objections to it as an independent proposition will disappear.

But lest any one should be inclined to think this sole amendment enough, let us look at its probable operation. Mr. STEVENS says that the ambition of political power is the strongest feeling of the white people in the Southern States, and that this will induce them, under the pressure of the amendment, to enfranchise the colored population. Now it is perfectly clear that this feeling, which undoubtedly exists, is controlled by another just as powerful, and that is the feeling of caste. That the proposed amendment is intended to make it the interest of the white inhabitants of every State to overcome this feeling we do not deny, and that it may ultimately do so is very possible. But we have a very plain duty to the living generation of the colored population, and we have no right to sacrifice them to an ulterior advantage. Let us see, then, what would be the probable operation of this sole amendment.

In the State of South Carolina the population is about equally divided between the white and colored citizens. Let us suppose that it has now three representatives, and would lose one of them if the colored basis were excluded, and would gain three if it were counted. There are no people who know better than the whites of South Carolina that the colored men are not born fools. Their instincts are as good as other men's, and their knowledge, if not of the reading and writing kind, is quite sufficient to inform them who were their friends in the late war. With every advantage apparently upon the master's side, the colored population were against him. Despite the liberal lying, the unblushing and consistent story that the Yankees were coming to sell them to Cuba, or that they would be left to starve and freeze; despite the insane orders of HALLGREN and McCLELLAN, which were the most convincing apparent proof of the truth of such representations, the colored population believed in the Yankees with an unshaken faith; the name of "Lexington" was as sweet to their hearts as that of liberty, and the whites could not coax or drive the blacks to fight for them.

The war ended, and for ten months the same whites have shown the bitterest hostility to the blacks, and both sides know it. On what ground of reason or experience is it supposed that, if the blacks were enfranchised, whether by the State or the Nation, they would vote with the late masters? Nobody knows better than the whites that they would not. Why, then, should the white population wish to neutralize the three representatives whom they now elect and control? Rather than do it they would infinitely prefer to lose one that they might still have two. That is human nature, and especially Southern human nature, as much as the desire of political power. Indeed that is what the whites would do if they wished to retain political power. For they know that the three supposed representatives upon the colored basis would act with the liberal party of the country, while the three of the white basis would ally themselves to the Democratic or Tory party. As sagacious men, therefore, they would prefer to have two voices for their own purposes rather than no voice at all. And how could we excuse ourselves for having delivered the freedmen into the hands of the whites upon the plea that we thought we had devised a method of inducing the latter to be just? Mr. BRUCE deprecates rigor in the treatment of the Southern States; but, unless the report misrepresents him, he said in his Philadelphia speech, at the Freedmen's Anniversary Meeting, that the one point upon which he could not trust the white Southern brethren was their treatment of the colored population.

Other objections to the amendment as an independent proposition might be easily stated. But its intention is right, and it will doubtless be followed by other suggestions from the Committee. The object of the amendment is to punish arbitrary deprivation of political power, based upon race or color, by reduced representation, and no object could be more laudable. Thus the State of New York politically discriminates against a part of her population, not on account of ignorance or incapacity, but of color; a discrimination as outrageously unfair as if it were based upon bodily height or weight. The amendment will exclude that part of the population from being reckoned in the basis of representation. It may, indeed, be so distributed in the various districts as not to affect the whole number of representatives, but any national act imposing a penalty upon the indulgence in so unmanly and demoralizing a prejudice will hasten a reform. Meanwhile the colored voter in the State will not be deprived of his vote, and he will be very sure to cast that vote for the men and measures which will soonest make the organic law of the State conform to common-sense and equal rights.

A PREPOSTEROUS BALANCE.

THE balance in the Sub-Treasury, on the evening of January 31, was about $105,000,000, of which over half was gold and silver coin. This is a larger balance than could be shown by any other civilized government in the world. It is considerably more than our whole annual national expenditure used to be before the war. It is nearly one-third of our whole annual national expenditure now. The question arises, how comes this extraordinary accumulation of money in the Treasury at a time when the taxes are so extremely oppressive? How is it that Government, which finds it necessary to levy fifteen separate taxes on the manufacture of a book, can contrive to accumulate several cords of legal-tender money, and ONE HUNDRED AND FIVE TONS OF GOLD COIN in its vaults?

We have heard of no considerable amount of suspended requisitions. The army, the navy, and the contractors have all been or are being paid off. Nothing is heard now about the delays of Government, which used to be such a standard topic of denunciation a year or so since. Congress is "shutting down" pretty firmly on private claims for damages arising out of the war. Under the circumstances, the revenue being in fact in excess of the expenditure, what does the Treasury do with a balance of $105,000,000?

If we examine in detail the accounts of the Treasury Department we shall find that on the day on which this extraordinary balance was shown the Government held $114,000,000 of money belonging to individuals, and deposited in the Treasury on call after ten days at 4, 5, and 6 per cent. interest. A very insignificant proportion of this money was drawing 4 and 5 per cent.; the great bulk was drawing 6 per cent. interest. Assuming that the whole amount drew 5½ per cent., Government was paying $5,270,000 per annum for its use, or $17,500 a day—and was not using it. On what theory can such extravagance be justified?

If a funding loan is to be placed on the market in this month of February, and the deposit certificates are to be received in payment for the bonds at par and interest, one might perhaps understand the squandering of $100,000 a week for a few weeks in the payment of interest on money that is not wanted, and lies idle in the Treasury. Otherwise there is no excuse for such mismanagement; and before Congress commits to Mr. McCULLOCH the exorbitant powers granted by the Ways and Means bill, it may be well for some member to ascertain why this $100,000 a week has been wasted? The country is not in a condition to waste any money. Though the people, with their old whole-souled obedience to law, are paying taxes steadily just as they are exacted of them, there is none the less a feeling among all classes that Government is drawing at least as much money as it ought from individual pockets, and it is an outrage to throw any of it away through errors of policy.

Another point. Of the Treasury balance shown on 1st February about $52,000,000 were in coin. What did the Government want with all this gold if no immediate attempt was to be made to resume specie payments? For over a week gold has been so scarce in this city that ½ @ ½ of 1 per cent. have been paid for its use for a single day. This scarcity has not been occasioned by any export of coin—for exchange has ruled steadily below the point at which coin can be profitably exported; it has been wholly due to the withdrawal from general circulation of over fifty million dollars by the Treasury Department. It need hardly be explained that coin once received at the United States Sub-Treasuries is practically lost to commerce until it is disbursed. So long as it remains in the banks it can be loaned out or used in any way that is required. Once in the Sub-Treasury it might just as well be at the bottom of the Gulf of Mexico, so far as any benefit to trade is concerned. During the year 1865 Government sold its surplus gold as fast as it accumulated in the Treasury vaults. The sales were injudicious; they were secret; no one could be sure that Government was selling until the deliveries were made; and thus the operations of the Sub-Treasurer were the basis of much speculation. But had as this practice was, it was infinitely better than hoarding the gold idly in the Treasury vaults.

We pretend to no knowledge of the purposes of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is questionable whether he has any set purpose beyond the general one of resuming specie payments as soon as he can. It may be his scheme to accumulate gold enough in the Sub-Treasury to resume specie payments suddenly, in which case the national banks and most of the merchants would inconspicuously break. In his report he avowed his desire for a gradual resumption. In this event, it is difficult to see why he absorbs all the floating gold of the country in the Sub-Treasuries, and thus renders it easy for speculators for the rise to keep up the price.

For many months the course of the Treasury Department has led financiers to suspect that it was "adrift." No great mistakes have been made. But there has been an obvious absence of direct policy in one specific direction. General GRANT and President JOHNSON have kept down the price of gold, and the cotton growers of the South have settled the balance of trade. It is possible that matters have been as well managed thus as they would have been if Secretary McCULLOCH had interfered at every juncture and attempted to control the spheres. But there is surely a limit to "masterly inactivity." It is surely not masterly to pay 6 or 5 per cent. per annum for money that is not wanted, or to create a scarcity of gold by piling up a hundred tons of coin in the Sub-Treasury before resumption is contemplated.

THE COTTON CROP.

WHEN the war ended the cotton dealers and Southern planters assured us that there was no cotton worth mentioning at the South, and that under the free-labor system none would be raised for years. After the lapse of a few weeks, however, a certain number of bales began to come forward, and the authorities in the trade then reluctantly began to admit that there might be 1,250,000 bales on hand. We have already received more than this, and the best-informed circles now estimate that not less than 2,500,000 bales will come forward before 1st September—worth, at present prices, 50 per cent. more than the largest crop ever raised in this country.

Again, until within a few weeks, the partisans of the defunct institution of Slavery were positive that the negro would not work in a state of freedom, and that many many years would elapse before even so small a crop as a million bales was raised at the South. For some weeks this theory has been exploded, and it has begun to be admitted that the crop of 1865 will be 1,500,000 bales. A fortnight since, the best-informed authorities, after a careful examination of the area of land that was likely to be planted, and of the amount of labor that could be relied on, came to the conclusion that, under favorable circumstances, the crop might reach 2,500,000 bales. And now the trade seem agreed that, if no accident happens, we may have a crop exceeding 3,000,000 bales.

Two results will follow. In the first place, the price of cotton must fall, and with it the price of cotton goods which have been selling at exorbitant prices. And, secondly, our friends in Europe will find it much more difficult to pay us for the cotton we shall send them, and with which they can not dispense, than we shall to pay them for the goods we are importing.

THE REVENUE COMMISSION REPORT.

THE Report of the Internal Revenue Commission is received with universal favor. It is both practical and philosophical, and is in itself an admirable illustration of one of its own observations—the advantage, namely, of putting the right men in the right places. If all other commissions for all other purposes in this country were filled with men who were peculiarly fitted for the work; if all the degrees and varieties of office in the Government Departments were occupied by men trained for their duties, the economy and efficiency of the Government would be incalculably increased. Fortunately, the choice for the peculiarly arduous undertaking of investigating the confusion of the present Revenue system, and of recommending one which should be at once comprehensive, simple, and effective, fell upon those who were signally competent.

The Report is written in the plainest and most intelligible style, and without a single weakening touch of rhetoric. It finds fault with the extreme diffuseness of the present system, producing a paralyzing reduplication of taxes, and consequent high prices. As a most striking illustration it presents the very case of the book manufacture, which we have earnestly exposed in these columns, and of umbrellas; and it recommends a repeal of all excise duties upon printed publications.

But this is in accord with the principle which the Report considers should be fundamental in a wise revenue system—an entire exemption of all manufacturing industry from all direct taxation, excepting distilled and fermented liquors, tobacco, and a few other articles, for the reason that such taxes check the industrial development, which is the producer of national wealth. The Report proposes, therefore, to draw the revenue from a few sources; and after an exhaustive and unexaggerated survey of these sources, it estimates an aggregate revenue for the year ending June 30, 1867, of $367,000,000, about two-thirds of which are to be derived from customs, distilled spirits, fermented liquors, tobacco, and its manufactures, cotton, coal oil, and spirits of turpentine and resin. The other third will be derived from licenses, incomes, salaries, banks, stamps, gross receipts, sales, legacies, and successions, with miscellaneous receipts. Adding to this sum the amount derived in 1865 from the taxes on industry, the gross revenue possible under the present rates, with the proposed amendments, would be $435,000,000. Then allowing $16,000,000 increase in the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year ending June 30, 1867, which will make $303,000,000, and setting aside $50,000,000 for the reduction of the principal of the national debt, there will remain a surplus, assuming the estimates to be correct, of $85,000,000 for the reduction of taxation.

The recommendations of the Report for immediate action relate exclusively to the reduction of the present excessive duplication of taxes, which would not seriously impair the revenue. The adoption of further reduction should depend upon the experiment of another year; and indeed the Commission recommends that the change from the old to the new system should be made only so fast as experience shows to be perfectly safe.

The reasoning of the Report is conclusive upon the great principle involved: its recommendations seem to us generally most judicious, and its exposition of the power of the country to sustain its burden are a singular confirmation of the substantial correctness and value of the little pamphlet, "Our Burden and our Strength," which was prepared during the war by Commissioner DAVID A. WELLS, and which gave to our foreign friends, like JOHN STUART MILL, and RICHARD CONDON, and JOHN BRIGHT, a new and surprising ground of faith in our success. The present Report is of so universal and vital an interest, and so simply stated, that every man in the country should ponder it.

PERSONAL GOSSIP.

MR. A. T. STEWART has been doing a very disagreeable but a very necessary public service in summoning the law to notify certain editors and correspondents that they can not publish the defamatory rumors concerning conspicuous men, which are always circulating in a great city, without being held to the strictest responsibility. A libel suit is always so unpleasant that most men are content to "take no notice of what the papers say." But the substance of many of the letters written from New York to newspapers in various parts of the country is personal gossip; and the temptation to seize a shining mark and regale the country with "spicy" scandal is found to be very irresistible. The habit has been growing into an intolerable nuisance which Mr. STEWART'S decided action will tend radically to abate.

But this fondness of gossip about noted persons is not confined to Yankees. Foreign critics are very apt to accuse American travelers of unpardonable personalities in their descriptions, and TRACKERAY sharply satirizes the Yankee tourist for this offense in "Vanity Fair." But our sins of gossip about foreigners are white as snow compared with those of the foreigners, often well recommended and really agreeable and accomplished men, who come to see us and then go home to write about us. Their "trivial fond records" show that there is, especially perhaps in France, another standard of true gentlemanly conduct than in the United States.

The personal memoirs and diaries of sagacious men who are thrown into interesting society are always agreeable and valuable; but the kind of literature known as personal gossip is as respectable as the tittle-tattle of the kitchen or of the bar-room, and can really gratify tastes that look no further for enjoyment. There are certain proprieties which are as sacred in the case of every public man, whatever may be his distinction, as they are in that of the most private individual; and it is just as impertinent a folly to tell us how often General GRANT changes his collar as to make the same interesting revelation about an unimportant private soldier. There is a kind of strictly personal detail which should be reserved for biography.

No arbitrary rules can be laid down to regulate custom; every personal description in literature, but every gentleman instinctively feels when they are violated, and the inevitable effect of their violation is to close the doors of those whose society would naturally be sought with curiosity by foreigners as well as natives. Besides, it concerns the honor of the literary guild that every man who holds a pen shall not by the frequent misuse of the pen come to be considered a bravo who may whip out his weapon at any moment and transfix you before the world.

The public are not entitled to more of the time of any man, however famous, than his duties demand or his inclination allows. Yet how many persons, because they delight in a poet's poetry, for instance, do not hesitate to consume his time in tyrannical vicissitudes of curiosity, from which it is not always easy for him to extricate himself. He is forced to seem cheerful when he is merely asserting that his house is his castle. Of course he will not seem so to those who wish to offer the homage of sympathy and respect, even if he does seclude himself. They will understand that if he would do his week he can not always be the host of strangers, however kindly may be the mutual feeling.

But that American travelers have a peculiar relish for seeing or describing notable persons, or that our descriptions peculiarly transcend the fair bounds of such literature, we can not believe. Cousins Johnny Bull and Crapau are even more addicted to gossip than we. A fine observer who is a gentleman will paint portraits in his travels with the most delicate hand, as Emerson does in describing Lamon and Carlyle. But a traveler with the spirit of an admiring barber will confound fair and unfair details in a huge swath of gossip.

And how they might be paid off in their own coin! An indignant gentleman was speaking of a really cultivated and eminent foreigner who had the most desirable introductions in this country; and when he returned wrote about our most conspicuous men. "He staid with my friend X," said the indignant gentleman, "and in his book he spoke of his personal habits. I should like to speak of his personal habits, and I would inform the world that this prodigious critic allowed himself one shirt a week. On Sunday morning it was clean. Then his waistcoat and coat were thrown fully open. On Monday the waistcoat was closed a little. On Tuesday a little more. On Wednesday the ends of the cravat were suffered to appear over the bosom. On Thursday they quite overspread it. On Friday the waistcoat closed up entirely. On Saturday there was nothing but cravat to be seen. On Sunday there was the full effulgence of the clean shirt again, coat and waistcoat generously thrown open, and an imperceptible cravat."

No man can defend himself against the ingenious ridicule of an author, or from his well-meaning absurdity. But when the criticism or description descends to the most odious and unclean charges, if he refuses to censure it and invokes the law, he puts every lover of public decency under obligation.

MR. STEVENS'S RHETORIC.

In the first reports of Mr. STEVENS'S speech before the vote was taken upon the Amendment there were several allusions to the President which were the grossest insults. The speaker was said by the papers to have called the President "the pundit at the other end of the avenue," and "the man at the other end of the avenue;" and every decent reader was disgusted. But in the later reports it seems that the expression was "high authority at the other end of the avenue introduced through an unusual conduit"—the latter word being evidently mistaken by the reporters.

Yet while this correction is made the foolish sarcasm is still plain enough. "We shall not trouble President Johnson by sending him this Amendment, if it should be passed by Congress, because it is not necessary to submit it to him for his approval." And again: "We do not send it to him and ask his opinion about it, and therefore it was all the more kind in him to send us his opinion without being asked for it." The folly of such talk under the circumstances is incredible. There may be times when sarcasm is wise; but if Mr. Stevens is of opinion that this is the time when sarcasm directed against the President is useful in the speeches of the President's party in Congress, it is but another proof of his singular incapacity as a leader.

Mr. STEVENS would justify his remarks by repeating what he said in his speech, that the reported conversation of the President with a Senator was an attempt to coerce Congress, and that similar conduct in other countries would have cost a king his head. Mr. STEVENS is ardent and rhetorical; but as the members of Congress are constantly going to the White House and talking with the President, who freely states his views, we can not see the enormity of his conduct in expressing his private opinion upon the subjects of which his opinion is asked. If, however, the matter be a grave one, and then under discussion in Congress, we may regret that peculiar publicity should be given to the conversation. But it is surely unnecessary to give the worst interpretation to the incident. The President must be a much duller man than even the Democratic journals and orators declare him to be, if he does not know that the infallible way of insuring the passage of a measure which he disapproves is the mere appearance of an attempt to coerce Congress. That would be the most unpardonable insult which could be offered to the people of the United States; and the assumption of such an attempt, except upon the plainest grounds, would be an equal insult to the President. He may think, as he is reported to have said, that legislation upon suffrage in the District of Columbia is untimely and unwise; but as he knows that Congress is the supreme and only Legislature of the District, it by no means follows that he would think it a timely or wise act to veto an overwhelming expression of its will.

The course of Mr. STEVENS invites a quarrel between those whom time and mature deliberation might readily harmonize, and most therefore be deprecated by all thoughtful men. "Let us be practical," he said to Mr. SCHUYLER, in asking him to yield a favorite plan. Certainly, let us be practical. Let us also be firm and clear-sighted. Let us not betray any interest confided to us, and not be hood-winked or seduced. But let us also understand that honest men may honestly differ, and that the height of folly is to insist upon the alienation of those whose union is essential to success.

MAGNANIMITY AND CONCILIATION.

In his late speech Mr. RAYMOND said that he "would exclude from Federal office the leading actors in the conspiracy which led to the rebellion in every State;" and then added: "The courage and devotion on either side, which made it [the contest] so terrible and so long, no longer owe a divided duty, but have become the common property of the American name, the priceless possession of the American Republic through all time to come. The dead of the contending hosts sleep beneath the soil of a common country, and under the folds of its common flag. Their hostilities are hushed, and they are the dead of the nation for evermore."

But surely if the rebel dead, who died, so to speak, in their sins, are worthy of this tender national regard, it would be very hard in the nation politically to disable forever the rebel living who may truly repent. For instance: WISE of Virginia, KEITT of South Carolina, COME of Georgia, and BARNESDALE of Mississippi, were "leading actors in the conspiracy which led to the rebellion." They all took up arms. KEITT and BARNESDALE were killed. COME and WISE survive. Now if KEITT and BARNESDALE are to be considered "the dead of the nation," why, in the name of fair play, are WISE and COME to be dishonored and disfranchised by the nation? If two men engage in a criminal undertaking, and one is killed in the act and the other escapes, how can a nation be considered sincere in respecting the "courage and devotion" of the fallen if it stigmatizes the survivors? The sincerity and bravery of many of the Colonial Tories who fought against their fellow-countrymen in the Revolution were unquestionable; but we are not aware that they were ever considered the "priceless possessions" of the country. We trust that moral confusion is not essential to magnanimity, nor stultification to conciliation.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE.

The coincidence of the appearance of cholera and of the cattle plague is remarkable, and it is striking that no effectual preventer is yet discovered for either. The loss of stock in Great Britain is already so great that most earnest attention is given to the subject, and while Commissions are investigating and advising, the whole history of the subject is faithfully explored.

It appears that the cattle plague, from Pharaoh's " grievous murrain" down to our time, has been constantly known, and during the sixth century it was especially severe. The armies of Charlemagne with their necessary supplies, strewing whole countries with decaying carcases, are held responsible for the pestilence at that time, as armies are responsible for some other of the fearful scourges of humanity. The Nordt Deutsches Bevier, which contains an interesting paper upon the subject, says that the wars of the eighteenth century, also, generated the cattle plague, and that in the three years, from 1711 to 1714, 1,500,000 cattle died of it in Western Europe. It lasted seven years in Italy, and Holland, in ten years, lost more than 200,000 cattle. In eight years after the death of Charles VI. three millions of cattle died of the plague in Central and Western Europe. Between 1745 and 1758 at least 500,000 were destroyed by the disease in Great Britain; and the Review says that no method of cure tried in 1863 was not tried in 1745 and found wanting. It is computed that during the eighteenth century, from 1711 to 1726, more than 200,000,000 of horned cattle were swept away by the plague in Western Europe.

The result of research and comparison is, that the pest proceeds from the steppes of European Russia. The lower part of the Dnieper is bordered by Russian provinces which breed some 8,000,000 cattle, among which the plague always prevails. The stock sent from these steppes to Polish and Austrian markets introduce the disease, which then penetrates Europe. The neighboring countries struggle to keep out these herds. Prussia destroys even birds and dogs that might convey the plague, but when it is smuggled in it is trampled out wherever it appears. Austria is not so rigorous or so successful. It is supposed that 100,000 infected cattle pass yearly into Hungary and Galicia, and in the former country it is now destroying sheep as well as horned beasts. The Hungarian cattle known as Dutch beasts are often seen in the London markets, and they are supposed to have brought the present plague into England.

The disease is apparently very contagious. Dogs, sheep, pigeons, hens which have pecked among the affected cattle; the attendants on the sick beasts; ponds and streams into which sheds of diseased animals have been drained; high winds and public roads along which the herds have been driven—all retain and convey the deadly virus. The disease appears in five or seven days after the poison is taken into the system; and although upon the steppes inoculation has checked the disease, it fails to arrest it elsewhere until it has coursed through seven or eight beasts; and it is remarked that the pestilence increases in intensity and fatality as it spreads northward.

The British Commission appointed to investigate the subject have decided that the only way to arrest the spread of the disease is to prohibit the movement of cattle, thus confining the ravages to one district. It is in accordance with this conclusion that Mr. WATSWORTH, of Illinois, introduced his bill into Congress forbidding the present importation of cattle. The latest accounts from England make the loss at the present time, in consequence of the plague, about 10,000 a week. An efficient and universal act of prohibition of import during the rage of the pestilence would doubtless save our own stock from its ravages, and it is the interest of the whole country that such an act should be stringently enforced.

THE CITY HEALTH BILL.

SENATOR WHITE, of the Onondaga District in this State, was one of the Committee appointed last year by the Senate to investigate our municipal affairs; and the curious and interesting knowledge he then acquired he has lately made effective in a remarkable speech in the Senate upon the Health Bill. In the course of his remarks he spoke of the enormous number of subordinate officers now employed in that Department under its present partisan auspices. He read the names of some of these officers, and said that it seemed to be a prerequisite to such an appointment that every man should be a liquor dealer by profession and an Irishman by descent. Their ignorance, he said, was appalling. All the officers brought before the Committee—and it will be remembered that these are the persons to whom the care of the public health is now confided—were asked if they understood Hygiene. Some were of opinion that they had it had in some quarters; some thought it did not prevail much; and one officer told the Committee that Hygiene was the bad smell that arose from stagnant water! It is matter of dearest public gratitude that at least one of the guardians of the municipal health knew that stagnant water does not smell sweetly.

Senator WHITE did not claim that his own party would manage the Health Department altogether better than that which is now responsible for it, although he might have safely urged that it could not manage it worse. But he is reported to have said that very much of the shameful swindle of the present Health system was due to its partisan character, and he most forcibly opposed making the one proposed party machine. The opponents of the bill, as reported, claim that it is merely an extension of the power of the Police Commission, and through that of a certain political faction. But it is pretty clear that the objection comes from those who would not oppose the bill if it gave their own friends the ascendancy. And meanwhile we shall be glad if so imperatively necessary a measure as the reported bill should become a law before these words are printed.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

January 20: In the Senate, a joint resolution was adopted, authorizing the payment of $20,000 to defray the expenses of the Committee of Fifteen.—Mr. DOUGLASS offered a resolution which was adopted, calling upon the President for a copy of the report of General Sherman of his observations in the States within his department in his recent tour of inspection.—Mr. TREMBULL, from the Judiciary Committee, reported that John A. Jackson, of New Jersey, had been duly elected Senator, and was admitted to a seat from the 4th of March, 1865.—There was a long debate on the Civil Rights Bill.

In the House, the Constitutional Amendment on representation and taxation was recommended to the Committee of Fifteen without instructions.—A resolution was agreed to instructing the Committee on Claims to reject all claims referred to them for consideration by citizens of any of the States lately in rebellion until otherwise ordered.

January 21: In the Senate, a joint resolution of Thanks to Admiral Farragut and his men was adopted. In the House, a new rule was adopted forbidding the use of the Hall by "senators for any other than legislative purposes."—Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Fifteen, reported back the Constitutional Amendment relating to representation. As thus reported, the amendment has no relation to taxation. It reads as follows: "Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed, provided whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, it persons thereof of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation." The resolution, submitted to the Senate on the 10th inst., was reported by Messrs. Hale, Davis, Raymond, Elliot, McKetta, Davis, and other Union members voted in the negative, and it was opposed to the principle, but because very objectionable in its present shape, and in the power exercised by the Committee in reporting it.

January 2: In the Senate, Mr. TREMBULL'S amendment to the bill of Civil Rights was adopted, 81 to 10. The amendment declares all persons born in the United States not subject to foreign Powers, except Indians not taxed, to be citizens of the United States without distinction on account of color.

In the House, the bill was passed providing that nobody originally registered as an American vessel, and which during the rebellion sailed under a foreign flag, shall be deemed or registered as an American vessel, except by special provision of Congress. According to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, $6,000,000 have been transferred to foreign flag during the war, leaving 1,600,000 tons in the hands of our citizens, who are now in want of vessels to do our carrying trade—single vessels.

January 2: In the Senate, Mr. DOUGLASS offered an amendment to the bill of Civil Rights, making the right to vote a condition. The amendment was reported by a vote of 12 to 49 against it. The bill was then passed, 52 to 12. The bill is very similar in its provisions to one of the sections in the bill for enlarging the President's term.

In the House, nearly the whole session was occupied in debate on the question of reconsidering the vote allowing Mr. HENRY'S evidence in the case of the late Senator-elect between him and Mr. DOUGLASS to go into the Constitution. The matter is reconsidered and withdrawn.

January 2: The Senate was not in session. In the House, a committee of members took place on the bill for the improvement of the Potomac river.

January 2: In the Senate, the Unorthodox Amendment to amend the Constitution came up. Mr. STEVENS proposed to amend the whole article in a new form, substituting for the Amendment, the provision that "no State shall be deprived of its territory, or its rights, or its powers, and that no State shall be deprived of rights, civil or political, on account of race or color; but all persons shall be equal before the law, whether in the court-room or at the bar; and no State shall, in violation of the Constitution, pass any law which shall deny or abridge the rights of any citizen of the United States to equal before the law. It is provided that the Senate shall have as its share for each State an equal number of votes as in the case of the original Constitution." The matter is reconsidered and withdrawn.

In the House, several amendments to the Constitution were offered and referred to the Judiciary Committee. There was some debate on the Freedmen's Bureau bill, but no action was taken.

NEWS ITEMS.

We have received letters from General James M. Smith, the Mexican General, dated at St. Thomas, from which it appears that he was treated in a very arbitrary manner by the English authorities. We have no space, however, to spare for the details. The incident concerning the execution at Jamaica was a surprise.

The steamer Mount, bound from Memphis for Arkansas River, when six miles above the mouth of the Arkansas, January 20, exploded by the explosion of a boiler. One hundred and fifty lives were lost, including the captain of the boat and a party of Company B, Third United States Cavalry.

The steamer Albatross exploded January 20, opposite Robertson's new mill, half a mile above the mouth of Green River. About 100 men were lost.

Lieutenant-General Grant has authorized the raising of $2000 to aid in the erection of the Metropolitan Methodist Episcopal Church, Washington.

The report of Mr. CRAWFORD, Engineer of the Cotton Agents Board, makes strong objections to the proposed legislation proposed on the 10th inst. It has caused much uneasiness among the friends of the proposed measure, although they anticipated some such objection to its despatch. There is no doubt that the report is a serious blow to the well-grounded project, but a means may be found to overcome it.

Harold V. Johnson was, January 16, elected United States Senator from Georgia by the Legislature of that State. Mr. A. H. Stephens was chosen his name to be used.

Countess de Coligny, of the British Embassy, accompanied a delegation from the Cotton Agents Board, through the States, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, and South Carolina, and other States of the South, to the President's residence February 1, whether they went for the purpose of having an interview with him. Their representations were favorable to peace. The delegates were present in two delegations, a local and a foreign. The latter expressed its preference for being able to communicate with the President.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Prussia is not dead yet in Ireland. The city and county of Dublin, the county of Wick, and the county of Waterford have been proclaimed to be under martial law. This proclamation makes it a misdemeanor, punishable by two years' imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for any person to carry arms, except in his dwelling-house, arms or ammunition of any description in any of the proclaimed districts. The London Standard says that London is crowded with British troops. The late general Lord B. Kitchener's death was also mentioned in the work of an incendiary, and various other accounts of the military's position were given up in the word Prussia. A repetition of this statement in the Custom-house and the government office in Downing House is drawn by the authorities, and extra detachments of police are consequently sent to patrol the buildings by night.

The Paris Peace of January 19 continues that Marie Sallard left Paris on the 19th for the purpose of making necessary arrangements with the Emperor Maximilian for the return of the French troops from Mexico at the earliest possible date. The Emperor was to open the Customs on the 15th, and there was much speculation as to the precise position which the Emperor would assume on the Mexican question.

General Pons's Spanish insurrection does not appear to have assumed any very interesting phase as yet. It was still assumed that Pons was attracting no foreign aid. The Russian Government have confiscated the entire property of the Roman Catholic Church in Poland. By virtue of an Imperial ukase, of December 27, 1865, and promulgated on January 10, the heads of monasteries, as well as the heads of convents, and all the other belongings of the Catholic Church in Poland, have been wholly and absolutely appropriated by the State.

The English steamship London, for Melbourne, recently sailed at sea. Two hundred and twenty lives were lost. Sixteen of the crew and three passengers were saved. The ships supposed to have been lost during the late gale on the English coast were the Avon and the London, 200 tons, which became a wreck December 11, midway between New York and London. 1600 passengers were rescued by the English ship Princess.

The American squadron under Admiral Goldsborough has received orders to be ready to move to the Mediterranean Sea. From the dispatches of the 10th inst. it is supposed that the American squadron will be ready to move to the Mediterranean Sea previous to the 15th inst. The dispatches of the 10th inst. also mention that the American squadron will be ready to move to the Mediterranean Sea previous to the 15th inst. The dispatches of the 10th inst. also mention that the American squadron will be ready to move to the Mediterranean Sea previous to the 15th inst.

GEORGE BANCROFT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

GEORGE BANCROFT.

The eminent historian of the United States, whose portrait accompanies the present sketch, is a remarkable instance of the intellectual culture and development which may be attained under the influence of American society and institutions. A cosmopolitan by education, habits, and tastes, in spirit and character he is an American of the Americans. Nurtured in the traditional literary discipline and choicest scholastic learning of New England, at an early age he sought the more liberal and professed methods of European education. Absence from his native country only quickened his attachment to freedom. With the study of ancient philosophy he drank in the love of human progress, and with an instinctive foresight of his future career, conceived the purpose of embodying the spirit of '76 in the democracy of America. Like Dante and the patriots of the Middle Ages, like Milton and the champions of English liberty, his political aspirations were inspired and ennobled by ideal visions of the destiny of humanity. This is the key to his opinions and aims, the secret of his literary and official life. Hence his public course as a statesman, a historian, an essayist, and a popular orator exhibits a pervading unity which is rarely witnessed in the career of our most prominent men.

Mr. BANCROFT was born about the commencement of the present century in Worcester, Massachusetts, where his father was for many years the pastor of the First Congregational Church. By birth and early surroundings he belonged to the order of New England Puritans, whom WASHINGTON HOLMES so quaintly celebrates, as predestined to a life of studious culture and lettered fame. At Harvard College, which he entered when a mere boy, he was considered a prodigy. Cambridge tradition still preserves the memory of his slight figure, his ruffled shirt-collar falling over his forehead, and his voice of childish treble, in marked contrast to the facility and grace of his utterance and the mellow ripeness of his classical and philosophical attainments. His oration on graduating, when only seventeen years old, was on a profound theme, and is said to have been a master-piece of thought and eloquence. The brilliancy of his powers and the vivacity of his manners made him a universal favorite. His precocious genius, tempered with a wisdom beyond his years, was the admiration and pride of friends, and called forth the most sanguine prophecies of his future renown.

Upon leaving Cambridge he sailed for Europe, where he passed five years in travel and in study at the principal German universities. His instructors were among the most celebrated men of the day. His course of study was more extensive and profound than at that time had been pursued by any American. He evinced a rare capacity for labor, and a strenuous diligence that was unimpeded by any vicious indulgences. His course in history, philosophy, and classical learning embraced the whole development of ancient and modern thought. In each department he showed an aptitude, as if that had been his favorite specialty. His youthful zeal awakened a deep interest in the mind of his teachers, whose pride was gratified by his reports of the progress of their fame in the Western World. At the same time he formed the acquaintance of many eminent men in different branches of literature and science, with several of whom his intimacy soon ripened into a warm and permanent friendship.

On returning to this country in 1822 he resided a year at Cambridge as Greek tutor in Harvard College, and introduced several valuable reforms in the course of classical study, although the conservative spirit which was cherished among the ingenious youth of that place was too strong to accept any innovations, however useful, without a struggle. His enthusiasm for learning, stimulated as it had been by his long residence at the highest seats in Germany, and his fresh and ardent faith in intellectual life and progress, came into violent collision with a mass of prejudice, ignorance, and stupidity on the part of youngsters who had scarcely ceased to be school-boys. His dreams of improvement amidst the shady retreats of Harvard were rudely disturbed; and he soon found a more congenial field of effort in the celebrated Round Hill School at Northampton, which, in conjunction with Mr. Coombs, he established in 1823. This institution was a decided novelty among the means of education in the United States. All its appointments were on a scale of prodigal liberality before unheard of. The ablest teachers, native and European, were employed in its service. The routine of study was varied by long and attractive excursions in the pleasant season. A certain splendor was thrown around the administration of learning which was scarcely in accordance with American tastes. Pupils, however, flocked to the place, and a wide and generous impulse was given to the cause of classical education.

At this period Mr. Bancroft commenced his preparations for the "History of the United States," the plan of which he had conceived at an early stage of his historical studies. This magnificent work forms one of the peculiar monuments of American literature. The composition of it has extended over a series of more than thirty years, each successive volume enhancing the value of the work and the reputation of the author. Profound and accurate in research, rich in illustrations from the whole field of contemporary events, ingenuity and brilliant in his general views, every where alive with the spirit of humanity, founded on the soundest philosophical conceptions, and written in a style of marvellous lucidity and picturesque glow, it fills up the deficiencies of a great historical production. Considered not only as a faithful record of a most important period in the development of modern civilization, but as a highly-wrought specimen of literary art, it may be said to take the lead in merit, as well as in date, of the admirable works in its kind which have so signally illustrated our youthful literature.

Mr. Bancroft's career as a statesman, if somewhat eclipsed by the splendor of his literary success, presents a highly honorable record. His discharge of the office of Secretary of the Navy, and of Minister to London, during the administration of Mr. Polk, was marked by sagacity, earnestness, and the love of salutary improvements. As a political leader, in which capacity he has been prominent in his native State as well as at the national capital, he has been distinguished for his reliance on ideas, for his ardent faith in the democratic principle, regarded as the highest expression of the spirit of humanity, and for his uniform advocacy of liberal and progressive measures. Mr. Bancroft is a powerful and effective public speaker. He has the eloquence which proceeds from lucid thought and strong emotion. "Always in earnest, often vehement, he appeals to the imagination by his impassioned rhetoric and graphic illustrations, while he masters the intellect by his power of transparent exposition and cogent argument. Not the least honorable distinction which crowns his name is the decision with which he sided with the friends of the Union during the recent terrible conflict, in opposition to the claims of party associates and political antecedents.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER VI.

It may tend to lower the Rev. Edward Arthur in the eyes of the readers of these pages; but none the less must it be stated that, although a minister, he was none the less also a man. Not an ethereal being, not an ideal of all excellence, but, from head to foot, a human being like the rest of us. Perhaps the interest human part about him was his heart. His capacity for loving, his proclivity for loving, his unweariness in loving from his earliest recollection upward was wonderful.

Of course it is painful to make the statement, yet it must be said that, from the day when just three years old, he was detected in the act of kissing behind a parlor rocking-chair a young lady-visitor of some six months or so less experience of life, onward he had never ceased to love. His own relatives, of course; but, in addition to these, all the little flaxen-haired companions of his childhood—there always being for the day some special queen of his heart in virtue of hair specially flaxen, eyes particularly black or blue, cheeks uncommonly rosy, and fair, and dimpled, dress remarkably beautiful, or, what was even more to the purpose, the being specially associated with him for the time of the little Cleopatras of the hour. Up to the very day of leaving for college he had not learned to master such nonsense.

With the development of lungs and brains and all the rest the heart had perished in growing also. Not that, when he rolled away, just sixteen years old, in the stage from his father's door, he had as yet met exactly with his ideal. None the less did he bear away with him the image in his heart, the lock of her hair being in his Bible in his trunk, of the last. In the quick succession of the queens of his childhood; not so much because he loved her, as from the pleasure it was to him, the absolute necessity it was to him to love somebody.

His four years' course in college was a sudden and total interregnum in all this. Minerva set aside Venus with perfect success during those four college years. Hours had to content itself with merely keeping up the circulation while the brain was being developed. Vastly better would it have been could the two have shared the man more equally between them—not so cold and hard would those four years have been. Languages, philosophy, mathematics; mathematics, philosophy, languages all the session through, the impulse thereof bore him, like a locomotive over a break in the track, over the gap of each vacation with a jar scarce perceptible. That day Edward Arthur graduated he could have laid his hand upon the folds of the silk gown which covered his bosom and have truthfully declared his heart to have been, during the previous four years, wholly free from thought of woman. And as he descended the steps of the platform after Commencement, he could have safely declared that, leaving more sacred things aside dearer to him than the entire sex, from Eve down, was the honor he had obtained from Alma Mater, most revered and beloved of all her sex.

Altogether too short was the period which followed to think upon any thing but the immediate Past and the immediate Future. Bright and early that September morning following his graduation he had determined himself to be matriculated; no man more free from every thing else in the world to devote himself to his studies for the ministry. And into it he plunged; Church History; Theology, polemic, didactic, patristic, exegetic; the preparation and delivery of sermons; Hebrew; Chaldaic; Syriac; German. Gradually was the morning and evening walk granted to the muscles; only because it was a necessary nuisance was the stomach supplied with the regulation food at the regulation hours in the regulation refectory—it was the brain must be exercised, the brain must be fed. No wonder if, like the right arm of the blacksmith, it was developed beyond the rest of the body, out of proportion to the rest of the body. True, the heart was allowed free play in regard to things spiritual and divine, even stimulated and evermore prompted to this.

And, perhaps, it was well that such things should chafe by years preoccupy the heart; obtain from long habit, the deep-seated, uniform custom of the heart, before its doors were opened to all the world. Yet, if its affection for all else could only be kept duly subordinate, the very exercising the heart in the love of all human things would fit it for the more vigorous loving of things superior to these; even as the eye and the hand, quick to see and prompt to gather every little flower flourishing by the way-side, is but trained thereby for the prizing and the gathering the more eagerly of all diamonds and precious stones, too, which may sparkle along the road-side of life. Is it altogether fanciful to remember here that, though the heart beat in the breast with but one throbb, it yet has within itself two separate and distinct sets of organs, an auricle and ventricle on the left side thereof, and an auricle and ventricle on the right side thereof? Thou shalt love God, and thou shalt love men, is the divine command. Only as we love either perfectly do we love both perfectly. Only as we love both as we should, do we, as we should, love either; only when both sides of the heart are whole, and keep the mystic time to each other, does the entire heart throb aright! "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen? And this commandment have we from him, That he who loveth God love his brother also."

One thing is perfectly certain, if ever there was a man prepared to love, prepared to love any thing and every thing which could be loved, that man was the Rev. Edward Arthur when he found himself, college and seminary passed through, pastor of the church in Somerville. Neglected, forgotten, the heart of the man was to assert itself—was to make up for the long-endured tyranny of the brain.

Let me pause a moment here. I have something to say which may greatly weaken the reader's estimation of the Rev. Edward Arthur. Shall I say it exactly as it was? Or shall I not rather carefully conceal the fact, so that the young minister may be that much the greater and stronger individual in the eyes of those who read these pages? Hesitate as I may to say it, ashamed as I may be to announce the fact, deeply conscious, as of course I am, of the damage it will do our hero from this instant to the end of his history, I must none the less say, because I can not possibly avoid it and be at all coherent in my narrative, that the Rev. Edward Arthur during the very first day of his arrival in Somerville fell in love! Pardon him, dear reader, he could not possibly help it; at least he did not help it. Pardon him, indulgent reader, for it was a love which, however hastily kindled, never ceased to burn thereafter with but stronger and brighter and purer flame.

The way of it was this: When Guy Brooks, Esq., years before Secession, had written to the young theologian to come to Somerville and organize a church in that new but promising town, and had received a promise of doing so in reply, he forthwith began, in a terrific hurry, to look around among the families of Somerville for some suitable home for the new minister. It ought to be among the members of the contemplated church, to begin with. Next, in which of those families should it be?

He himself was then a widower and boarded at the time at the hotel, and the hotel was no place for a preacher; half an hour in the bar-room or any where else about the house was sufficient to dishearten one of his calling through all the avenues of smelling, tasting, seeing, and hearing. Mr. Ferguson, the Scotchman, offered to share his bachelor home with the new-comer, especially as he was to be also a member of the church to be organized. Guy Brooks thanked him but declined. A most substantially and inflexibly good man was Ferguson, like all Scotchmen who are not utter reprobates; but like every other Scotchman, agreeable or not, Ferguson was set in his way, not prone to the last degree. And cross, too; no tropical thunder-gust more suddenly, unexpectedly, and violently so. Upon Mr. Ferguson Guy Brooks counted confidently as upon a very oaken beam in the proposed church organization, but, as a host of the pastor thereof? No. The lawyer did not entertain the idea one instant. Suppose the guest should derange, should injure, should lose a Number from Mr. Ferguson's collection? The very possibility of such a catastrophe, with all its disruptive effects upon the proposed church, was sufficient to settle the matter. No one can dislike to pause more than the writer. The collection of Mr. Ferguson has been unintentionally alluded to. But now that it has been mentioned, it must be explained before we can proceed.

In Mr. Ferguson's bosom existed the instinct of collection. It is an instinct. Look at the magpie. We all know what a passion it has for stealing and secreting bits of raw cotton, shreds of rags, fragments of pottery, articles of jewelry, and the like. There is a story about in works on Natural History of another bird—a species of hawk—which has its nest in the centre of a thorny tree, and which impales upon these thorns all manner of grasshoppers, locusts, insects of all sorts, as well as the smaller birds. Toward the decline of its days this winged virtuoso has collected a perfect museum of natural curiosities, and lives and dies in its overshadowed nest, in the centre thereof, in scientific and serene content. However true this may be, we are certain of the instinct in the case of the magpie. And it is the same instinct which is seen in the collector of autographs, porcelaine snuff-boxes, fantastic pipes, singular walking-sticks, rare editions of old books, and the like. Very strong was the instinct in the case of Mr. Ferguson. A Scotchman should have been more sensible; but in an old bachelor the object of his collection was propensities—he had collected into a body every treatise on the subject of Infant Baptism he had ever heard or read of. It may have begun his making the collection, quietly and innocently enough, but it had grown into a passion—a mania.

The walls of a certain room in his house were devoted exclusively to these treatises. Books in folio, quarto, octavo, duodecimo, were there; thick books and thin books, and in every possible style of binding. Pamphlets, too, of all shapes, sizes, and ages upon the subject. Files of all such newspapers also as contained articles upon the subject, and the whole collection patched, yasted, annotated, in every stage of wear and discollocation. Then there were bound volumes of letters he had evoked from reverend and irreverent sources, in all degrees of angry pro and recriminating con. A bulky scrap-book or two contained every flying anecdote, paragraph, item, cut right and left, from every paper which he had ever come upon bearing upon the one theme. One stood amazed to behold how much had been said upon the subject in the world, and turned away aghast at the remembrance that, even yet, the question remained as unsettled as ever. The plain fact is, Mr. Ferguson took hardly the slightest interest in the subject discussed itself—it was in his collection upon the subject that his interest lay.

"No, and it would sicken him, too, for life of the whole subject!" laughed Guy Brooks to himself, as, after declining Mr. Ferguson's offer of a room in his house for the expected minister, he walked back to his office.

"He shall know of my collection none the less. And surely no room in Somerville could be so appropriate for a minister as just that room," said Mr. Ferguson, as he parted from the lawyer. "It is something of a huf, too; only he knew that an amount of huf, on his part could provoke any thing but amusement and good-nature on the part of the frank and open-hearted lawyer.

There was Dr. Warner, also. He, too, was to by a member of the church. There was not a pleasanter house in Somerville than his, nor a better spread table.

"He can have my office in the front-yard," said Dr. Warner, after having previously received his wife's views upon the subject.

A nice office it was, too, as Guy Brooks knew, for it was therein, in retreat from his wife, that the Doctor entertained his gentlemen friends. On the shelves therein were the Doctor's rows of bottles and papers of herbs. Therein also was his homogeneity case of surgical instruments. The wooden apparatus, too, was in the corner, with its complicated straps, in which Bub and his had more than once imprisoned Amos when suffering, in imagination, with the fracture of every bone in his body in consequence of a fall from the top of the stable. In the book-case were the Doctor's medical books, especially his large and intensely-colored Surgical Atlas, of the inside of which he was so careful Bub should know nothing, and yet whose every page had been often and most thoroughly studied by Bub in the absence of his father, assisted by Amos, with his carefully locked out. Therein, also, was the good Doctor's collection, in glass jars and alcohol, of such tumors, bits of lungs and brains, amputated fingers and toes, embryos, and the like delicacies, as had come in his way in the course of his profession. And there, also, was a full-length skeleton in its corner.

"The first thing he will see in the morning, the last his eyes will close upon at night—have an impressive influence upon his meditations," said the Doctor, in commending the room for the expected arrival.

But no. There is a certain smell about that room, considered the lawyer with himself. Besides—and the idea struck the lawyer with considerable force—deprive the Doctor of that retreat from his wife? It would be a base imposition on his easy good-nature. And then, her tongue! Phew!—no!

There was Colonel Roberts also. Fine, commendable house; Mrs. Roberts an excellent woman, and member of the church. And who knows but he might be able to influence even Roberts? But the lawyer, charitable and hopeful as he was, shook his head even as he said it. The squat figure of the Colonel stood before his imagination on the instant—that black hair, those splendid black eyes, that full face, so much like that of a bull-dog, and yet so handsome! "What an unmitigated bully and blackguard that man is!" said the lawyer to himself, as the image rose before his mind—forgetting all about the minister. "Gambler, hard drinker, dandee, obscene to the last degree; unmatched and unmatched in profanity; loose to dishonesty in the payment of his debts and in all his business transactions; awfully a scuffer at the truth of religion and the virtue of woman. With all this, which he cares to be so, what dignity, what grace, what coquetry, what polished wit, what exquisite courtesy! That it would be possible to combine into one such a devil and such an angel!" murmured the lawyer to himself.

Colonel Roberts! Nothing could be more familiar to the public ear and to the public tongue than that. He had been a bold young lawyer; then an indefatigable stump-speaker throughout the State—capacious in anecdote, reckless in statement, reluctant in invective; next an Elector of a successful candidate for the Presidency; then, for six months, Chargé at one of the minor European courts; after that Governor of the State. When Guy Brooks was debating whether or no to make him the host of the expected minister, he was drinking, gambling, playing at once the Edmund Burke and the bully in the United States Senate at Washington. All the State knew pretty well the kind of man Colonel Roberts was; most certainly he disguised nothing of himself from any one. Yet all over the State religious, grave, and sober men applauded the Colonel's speeches; contributed gladly pigs, turkeys, and barrels toward barbecues in his honor; introduced him, with pride at the opportunity of doing so, to their wives and daughters, and voted him into whatever office he demanded rather than asked at their hands.

"As you say, my horse is too far out of Somerville for the purpose; or, there being only Bobby and myself here, I would be pleased to have Mr. Arthur with me," Mrs. Sorel observed, when Guy Brooks, throwing his energies into the matter, had ridden out to consult her upon the subject. There is Mrs. Bowles, thought Mrs. Sorel to herself, and she knitted and thought over the matter, as was her placid wont on every subject, before she spoke out. It was not altogether so clear.

"I have thought of the hotel, of Ferguson, of Dr. Warner, even of Colonel Ret Roberts, besides every other place possible," said Guy Brooks, after a somewhat despondent silence. "It ought to be in the family of a member of the church if possible."

"How did you say he was? or did you say any thing at all on the subject?" asked Mrs. Sorel, at length.

"I do not know, somewhere under thirty, I suppose. You remember I never saw him," said the lawyer. "Ferguson, Warner, Ellis, and myself went to the head of the Theological Seminary to recommend some one to us for the purpose of organizing a church here. In reply Mr. Arthur was warmly urged upon us; we corresponded with him, he says he will come; that is all we know of him."

"Have you thought of Mrs. Bowles?" inquired Mrs. Sorel, at length.

"The very person!" exclaimed the lawyer, rising to his feet. "Strange I never once thought of her. That is, if she will consent. You know well a delicate, retiring lady she is. Besides, it would be an assistance to her, his boarding with her. Yes," added the lawyer, with enthusiasm, "and there is the office Rutledge Bowles occupied before he went to college in the corner of the yard. The very thing! She is a member of the Protestant church, too. I do not think she would consent to the arrangement except on that ground. I will see her right away." And the lawyer took his hat to leave.

"There might be one objection," said Mrs. Sorel, accompanying her visitor to the door.

"What, what can it be?" inquired he, turning suddenly. Mrs. Sorel smiled demurely and continued knitting.

"Oh, nonsense!" said the lawyer, looking at her first, inquiringly, and then with a smile breaking over his wholesome face: "Beg your pardon, I didn't mean to use such language, Mrs. Sorel. But you never fear. We men, especially in such a new place as Somerville, with every thing before us to do, have no time to think about such things. You ladies flatter yourselves; really, I beg pardon again," said the frank lawyer, laughing at himself.

"Do we, Mr. Brooks? Well, perhaps we do," said quiet Mrs. Sorel, not at all cast down—quite confident rather.

"You would not really advise against Mrs. Bowles on that account?" asked the lawyer, seriously, pointing his hat in hand upon the front step.

"By no means, or I should not have mentioned it. Yes, see her, and see what you can do. Don't let me detain you. Good-evening!" But the wise, placid smile was still on her face as she said it.

"Stuff, nonsense! It is to be hoped he will find too much to do to think of such things! Oh these women, they think men never think of any thing else; sensible lady like Mrs. Sorel, too! Get up, Charley!" and with an unnecessary cut of his whip the Kentuckian cantered back into Somerville.

Mrs. Bowles came into the arrangement the moment the lawyer mentioned it, which he did with characteristic promptitude that same evening.

But it was after having most clearly and distinctly ascertained from the lawyer that the expected minister was not from the North, but from Virginia, born, raised, educated there. Good! If any spot on the globe could be said to stand next to South Carolina, in Mrs. Bowles's estimation, it was Virginia. "Though I have a great admiration for Kentucky also," Mrs. Bowles said, with the charming condescension of the daughter of a hundred Earls to a newly-knighted Baronet.

"If he will consent to live plainly there will be no inconvenience to us at all," she said to him immediately thereafter. "I have been so long without seeing even a minister of my own church that it will be a treat to me to have him. There is Rutledge Bowles's office. We can put a bed in there for him, you know. It will do for his study, too. If I see any like the arrangement afterward, you know, we can make a change. But I am sure we will like it—yes, I am quite sure of it!" and excellent Mrs. Bowles was almost enthusiastic upon the subject, greatly to the delight of her visitor.

The truth is, Mrs. Bowles was enthusiastic in every thing. If she liked any thing or person she liked enthusiastically—could not see, would not hear or believe any thing to the contrary. And, it must be added, if she disliked she disliked as sincerely and vehemently as her piety would permit. It so happened that Mrs. Sorel and herself were from the same neighborhood in South Carolina, had been school-girls together. Yet it was singular that the same soil could produce two persons so unlike. Mrs. Sorel tall, dignified, grave, self-possessed; Mrs. Bowles rather petite and spry in face and figure, unacquainted, full of lively fancies, impulsive, quick-spoken. Both were thoroughly ladies in the highest sense of the term—strongly attached to each other from memories of their childhood, still more from contrast of character; for while Mrs. Sorel could not but love the ardent and warm-spoken widow, so sincere and free in every thought and feeling, Mrs. Bowles could not but feel a warm affection for one in whose judgment, strong sense, sober speech she had long learned to have the deepest confidence. She had long been in the habit of consulting Mrs. Sorel in every thing of importance—much more so since the death of her husband, the Major.

I wish our story could pause long enough to permit us to say a little, or rather a good deal about Major J. C. Bowles. You can gather all you may wish to know of his character and history by turning to any book of national portraits. You will find him there among the politicians of South Carolina of some forty years ago. A stately gentleman he appears to have been from the somewhat stiff portrait in question, the half-length painting, from which it was taken, hanging in silent grandeur in the parlor at Somerville. Often did the young minister sit in that parlor of summer afternoons and study, not only the biography of the man himself, but a vast deal of national history, too, in that imposing portrait.

Evidently a commanding man the Major was, with his high rolled collar, huge cravat beneath his chin, and the locks brushed away from the broad forehead, only a blue ribbon across the bosom lacking to make it pass as the likeness of a royal duke. The painting in question represented him thus: the gold-headed case presented him by his constituents after his great speech in Congress resting between his knees, the sword wherewith his father had fought in the Revolution hanging on the wall behind him, St. Michael's Church visible through the window, in so on the portrait was taken in Charleston. But you can see it all for yourself, dear reader, by turning to the volume in question, and his life besides on the next page.

Let us halt here long enough, however, to say at least this: Colonel Ret Roberts and Major J. C. Bowles were as exactly alike, and as utterly, eternally, and irreconcilably unlike, as any two men can possibly be. Both were apparently gentlemen of the highest type of breeding and courtesy, yet Colonel Ret Roberts was only superficially so; it was as natural to him as a suit of the superfine broadcloth is to a prince, and as much a thing apart from and external to his real self as such a suit. Major J. C. Bowles was a genuine gentleman to the centre of his soul. Colonel Ret Roberts was a talented, highly talented man. Major J. C. Bowles was not, even a little dull. With Colonel Ret Roberts, the Major believed to the hour of his death that South Carolina was the first State on the continent—in the world, in fact; unlike the Colonel, however, the Major never in his life cursed and commended to eternal perdition, as the Colonel did every day of his life, whoever and whatsoever was in conflict with him on this point. That Calhoun was the superior of Webster Major Bowles never entertained the slightest doubt; yet Webster was a rational, respectable, perhaps conscientious individual. This the Major sincerely believed, while the Colonel did not—or, at least, swore he did not. That the "peculiar institution" was morally, socially, religiously, politically, eternally right, the essential foundation of all correct government, a thing to exist for ever and ever by ordinance like that which rolls the stars, both heartily believed; yet Major Bowles fed, clothed, cared for his negroes like the Christian gentleman he was; seeing himself to it, with a deep sense of responsibility, that they were not overworked nor their religious instruction neglected. Colonel Ret Roberts, on the other hand, believed and acted in every sense in the belief that his negroes were only speaking animals, to be worked to the utmost by the strictest overseers. However, as Colonel Ret Roberts had but scant reference himself to his own higher nature as an immortal being made in the image of his Maker, you could not reasonably suppose he should imagine any such thing for an instant in reference to his slaves. When in good-humor he would treat them to tobacco, whisky, and all manner of frolic and idleness; but with the same feeling toward them in good-humor as in bed, that they were but animals, worth no more thought than the horses in his stable, petted as such, beaten as such.

Major Bowles had no specially rigid notions on the subject of religion, yet he was not an avowed and insolent scoffer at it like Colonel Ret Roberts; even attended church, at least occasionally, a thing that Lamun never could induce the Colonel to do even when the most important political object was at stake. Nor did Major Bowles admire any Puritanism in regard to morals; yet he never would have soiled his fingers with the greasy cards, the dirty dice-box, the dripping gin-rumblers with which Colonel Ret Roberts was familiar, to say nothing of the profanity, obscenity, and practical debauchery which peopled the Colonel's plantation with his mulatto offspring, as much to the Colonel, and no more, than the puppets littered in his kennels. And the Major had as supreme an adoration for honor as the Colonel; but it was a principle which would have made him blush to leave a debt unpaid, or to do even a deed of doubtful honesty, wherein the Colonel differed from him amazingly in practice. As behoved gentlemen of honor, both had "been out" with an antagonist. The Major had gone out only when grossly insulted, and then had coldly received his enemy's fist with erect bearing, afterward firing into the air. The Colonel, on the other hand, had ever been the one provoking the quarrel, and then eager on the field to kill; in which, to the number of some five or six fives, he had been remarkably successful.

But why speak of Major J. C. Bowles? Did he not waste his estate with too prodigal an hospitality, too utter a devotion to politics, and so subsided, in his later years, first into what remained of his large property, a small home in Charleston, and a practice at the bar, for which he had become too old or too unused by political life to succeed, and then into his grave there in St. Michael's church-yard? Had he but had Colonel Ret Roberts's—what shall we call it?—some highly-polished synonym for raciality, he would not have lost acre or negro. However, so it was.

When somewhat advanced in life the Major married his wife, of a distinguished and of a decayed family as his own. A son and a daughter were the children of his old age—Rutledge and Alice. These were both but children when, after the death of her husband, Mrs. Bowles moved out westward and settled in Somerville. The Major owned lands there; Mrs. Bowles could not endure to take a lower rank in Charleston than her husband had once occupied. Mrs. Sorel had preceded her, and had written, urging to the step. So it was, that, at the date of our story, Mrs. Bowles was living in her neat little cottage-home on the edge of Somerville. She had left South Carolina, it is true, but the soil was all of the State she had left behind her.

The young minister learned all this, bit by bit, after his arrival. Welcomed at the hotel door, as he stepped from the stage, by Guy Brooks, he and the lawyer were at home with each other from that moment; for where people are sincere they understand each other from the first sight of each other's face, from the first grasp of each other's hand. The energetic lawyer had his new possession into his chamber in a moment; and had him brushed, dried, and introduced to Ferguson, Warner, Ellis, and half a dozen more, within the hour of his arrival.

"You must feel yourself at home with us," he said to him, in his frank, hearty way. "We are all fragments of the church that is to be. Dr. Warner here is ready to doctor you the moment you say the word. Mr. Ellis has a store drawn down, a good place to drop into to get acquainted with people. Ferguson here—well, Mr. Ferguson can post you on the subject of Infant Baptism, if you need it at all. I am the only one out of much use. However!"

"Somewhat too young for my fancy; it isn't a fair-checked, brown-haired girl we wanted for such a place as this rough and unchristianized Somerville," growled Mr. Ferguson to himself, as he went back to his room.

The afternoon of his arrival—"Why not?" the lawyer said to himself—Mr. Arthur was carried over to Mrs. Bowles to be introduced, the lawyer explaining matters to him as they walked over.

"What a neat, home-like place!" the newcomer said to himself, as they entered the front gate and advanced along the gravelled walk between the altheas and rose-bushes to the door. Like all houses at the South not built by people direct from the North, a goodly portico was in front of the residence, admitting to a hall into which rooms communicated on either side. It was a May morning when the new-comer stood there, inhaling the fragrance of jasmine and mimosa, glancing around at the many evidences of a refined taste on every side, while they waited for the door to be opened. With Mrs. Bowles, a few moments after, so warm-hearted and cordial in her smiles and gray hair, the young minister felt himself at once at home and at ease—there is so much, so exceedingly much, in refreshment when warmed by a glowing heart!

"I have but a small family, Mr. Arthur," she said, at last. "Rutledge Bowles, my only son, is at college in Columbia." Mrs. Bowles did not say, "Columbia, South Carolina," because to her there was but that one Columbia in the world. "My daughter Alice—" she began; but at that instant the front gate was heard to slam, hasty steps succeeded along the gravel, and a young girl threw open the parlor door, with sun-bonnet in one hand, school-books in the other, her hair about her glowing face.

And the Rev. Edward Arthur was in love!

THE MYSTERY OF TWO VALENTINES.

CLARA and Kate are twin-born maids; But Clara is dark and Kate is fair; Clara's locks lie in ebony tresses, Kate bath a crown of golden hair.

Clara's eyes flash, but Kate's cheek glows; Clara is your love, Kate is mine. Let us for aye to-day compose, Each for the other, a Valentine.

That for an hour's silent flow Broves were knitted and ink was shed, Till—this was just a year ago— These were the Valentines we sped.

I.—TO CLARA.

Him that loves thee, woe betide! Thou wilt chide him with thy pride; Pierce his heart with sharp disdain; Slowly crush him with a reign Of alternate bliss and pain.

I have loved thee well; but now I revoke my love, and vow, By the martyred Valentine, Not for Ophir's richest mine Will I bind my soul to thine!

II.—TO KATE.

I have lain full long in the shadow Of a love that sheds no light Save such as the transient meteor Flings fitfully on the night.

Thine eyes are dipped in the azure Of the stainless heavens above, And the clear rays shining through them Are the constant sun of love.

I have lain full long in the shadow, And I fain would seek the sun; Wilt thou shed one beam upon me From thine eyes, sweet?—only 'twice!

These were the Valentines we sped, In a shrewd disguise, one year ago; But—"Love is blind," it hath long been said, And the blind have a second-sight, you know.

How it befell I can not say; Love is the sport of the trickster, Fate! But Clara is my betrothed to-day, And Herbert sighs at the feet of Kate!

THE WHISPER-ROOM.

It was a paragon lawn, that of Houseley Cottage—emerald in color, closely shaven, and velvet-like in smoothness. It was a fitting inclosure for the red and white roses which, in regular succession, girdled it round. The laburnums, that waved their golden blossoms above it, the great sycamores, whose broad leaves bravely faced the sun's fiercest rays, and the trim flower-beds that ended it, all added their attractions to Houseley Lawn.

Seated in a low chair, under a waving cluster of laburnums, was a girl, apparently eighteen years old. Her hand held listlessly an open book; but her eyes were fixed on the blue expanse of sea that stretched far away, and over which Houseley Lawn commanded a glorious view. She was very fair; the rich masses of light-brown hair glinting gold in the sun, the hazel eyes, which were so radiant in their truth, and the rich complexion, all asserted her claim to beauty.

The French windows of the drawing-room were thrown noiselessly open, and a tall girl, rather older than she whom we have described, came hurriedly down the lawn.

"Oh, Agatha!" she said, "do come in and per-made your mamma to join the Daltons' picnic. It will be capital. Fred Hawkins and Harry Collier are coming."

The other's fair face wore an expression of haste.

"Lucy," she said, "I do wish you wouldn't talk in this off-hand manner. I don't see that any attraction lies in the fact of Mr. Hawkins or Sir Harry Collier coming—certainly not enough to make you call them by their names."

"Oh, bother!" said the father, who was a dashing beauty—blue-eyed, fair-haired, and gifted with superb self-possession. "You're such a prim creature!"

The two girls strolled down the garden together, and while gone we will, in a few words, describe their history.

Agatha Clare was the only child of Mrs. Clare, widow of a physician in large practice, and left by him in affluent circumstances. She was a woman of rare talent, tact, and generosity, and very popular for her kindness and charming manners. Her house of Honesby was a favorite resort of all the younger members of the population, for her dances and croquet parties were perfection.

Lucy Harwich was the daughter of the officer in command of the coast-guard, a retired commander, with more private property than usually falls to his brethren's share. His wife, too, had money. His daughter was what is termed a "fast young lady." She was a beauty, very daring and very willful, very ambitious, and very selfish. Truth must be regarded by a veracious chronicler.

The two girls re-entered the drawing-room, where there was a group of visitors eagerly discussing the picnic. Among them was a man of some note. Harold St. Vraie was a scion of old Norman stock. Unassuming English gentleman as he was, listening calmly to the picnic suggestions, and sitting dressed in gray tweed, with a hunting-whip in his hand, he bore the features and the name of a line of steel-clad warriors, whose swords had been foremost in every field of English battle from that of Hastings. The manors of his house had stretched through half a county, and the holders of them had been repeatedly offered a peerage.

But with him fortune had dealt hardly. But one old manor-house and a hundred acres of land remained to him of all his ancestors' territory. His small income sufficed for his wants, and his interest with the Government would procure him a diplomatic post whenever he married, which event was not unexpected by the young ladies of the locality.

"Let us go to Vrayville Towers," said Lucy, impatiently; "the ruins are splendid, and the legend wonderful."

"Lucy," said Agatha, softly, "remember Mr. St. Vraie's knoll. Look at him."

Lucy did look at him, and saw that his face flushed, and that he looked annoyed.

"Poor fellow!" said her mother to her nearest neighbor, "considering how long the nearest heen in his family, and the ghosts in the place, I don't wonder at his annoyance."

"I'll console him," laughed Lucy, and swept across the room to Harold St. Vraie's side. "I'll show Miss Agatha my winging colors," she said to herself, mentally.

"I pray forgive me, Mr. St. Vraie," she began, in a subdued tone, very unlike the usual rapid and energetic key in which she spoke, and dropping her dark eyelashes over her violet eyes with a timid aspect, "for my stupidity in proposing the visit. I ought to have remembered all that you must remember when Vrayville is mentioned."

"The stupidity's mine, Miss Harwich," interrupted St. Vraie, with a smile. "My morbid recollections are ridiculous. Never mind them. We'll go to Vrayville, and I can lead the explorers over every corner and tell all the legends—if Mr. Thorpe will allow me," he added, with a slight sneer.

He might have been excused for this; for this Mr. Thorpe, who had purchased Vrayville for the sake more of its ruins than of its farms, was a rich man, who bought the place for self-gratification, and was as chary of showing it as he was of his picture-gallery and his gardens. He had refused Harold permission to sketch the old ruins, which had been his forefathers' for seven centuries, and therefore there was mutual dislike between Thorpe and St. Vraie.

"I admire violet-eyed blondes," said Harold to himself, as he strolled down the lawn; but if he did not, I should certainly be enslaved by that hazel-eyed, brown-haired beauty. What a calm self-trust and stately quiet there is about her! But she rather repels."

Agatha's accustomed demeanor deceived many. Accounted cold and slow of feeling, she was a girl capable of strong emotions. For him who was her heart Agatha would be a very heroine of story in her lofty love.

The next day the picnic party started on horse-back. On his black mare, thorough-bred and glossy-coated as satin, Harold looked like the knightly descendant of the Norman, as he galloped along. Arriving at the ruins called the abbey cloisters, and which formed an ancient burial-ground, most of the party clustered carelessly across. St. Vraie, with a bitter smile, turned off by the road, and Miss Harwich, on her bay pony, accompanied him.

"You see," she said, "there is some one else who thinks as you do, and avoids desecration."

"I thank you," he said, warmly. "Of course, none feel as I do."

Miss Harwich replied by a winning smile, and the two rode on. Now, she was, to a certain extent, fond of Harold, and of his long descent; but she was a good deal fonder of herself, and she had heard her mother positively assert that morning the fact of Harold's bequeathment to an "Aunt Clinton's" property of (presumed) five thousand a year. Otherwise, Sir Harry Collier, who was merely a poor baronet, would have stood higher in the young lady's estimate, for she admired his face nearly as much as, and his conversation was far more congenial than, Harold's.

She exerted herself to talk on the subjects he liked. Her blue eyes were very brilliant, her voice very low, her sympathy very marked, Harold's admiration of her beauty great, and his emotions of ancestral pride very potent. In an impulsive moment he proposed and was accepted.

They reached the picnic party, and Miss Harwich ran off to tell her mamma. At this moment Agatha rode in.

"What, Miss Clara," said St. Vraie, "did you not go with the rest?"

"No," she said, quietly.

"Why not?"

"Because I never like to cause pain," she answered, kindly; "and I knew your family tombs were in the cloisters. Will you help me down?"

"You are an angel," thought Harold; and then blushed guiltily, remembering he was an engaged man.

The picnic proceeded. Mrs. Harwich, indeed, embraced Harold when he was apart from the others, and sobbed out her congratulations on his having "her treasure."

"What old tower's that?" said Sir Harry, dinging a Champagne cork toward it.

"Har—Mr. St. Vraie can tell you," said Mrs. Harwich.

"Oh," said the baronet, blundering, as was his wont, "I suppose all the old legends were drilled into you till you believe 'em, St. Vraie."

The other's haughty face flushed red with anger, and his gray-blue eyes flashed fiercely.

"The story about that tower is merely one of family interest," he replied, with forced calmness.

"Let's have it—let's have it!" said Mr. Hawkins, loudly, the sun and Champagne having acted unusually on him.

Harold made no answer, till Lucy Harwich said, "Won't you tell me, Harold?"

His proud face softened, and he answered, quietly:

"It's only the tower where Hugh St. Vraie shut up his guilty wife, Lucy, till she died, three hundred years ago. You see it's not a picnic story."

Miss Harwich looked very grave, and a silence fell on the group, till Harold proposed visiting the "whisper-room."

Up a cork-screw flight of stairs, the ladies blushing and laughingly making the gentlemen go first, the whole party trooped, till they found themselves in a large room, leading out to an ancient terrace of stone, and connected by a passage with a smaller room.

"What is the secret of this place?" said Lucy.

"I shall leave you all to find out," he laughed; "at least, I'll tell you, Lucy, presently. I must go and see if any one's in the smaller room."

The "secret" was that by its acoustic properties the passage reflected back the lowest whisper uttered in the large room into the small one.

Harold St. Vraie passed hastily in with a smile on his lips, for he thought Lucy more charming each moment. He started back, for his eye fell on Agatha Clare, who was gazing out on the rich landscape, and whose fair face was sad. He advanced to speak, when wadded along the passage he heard Mrs. Harwich's voice.

"My dear, I've made a dreadful mistake! It's Sir Harry who's to—"

"Not to succeed to the property you said was Harold St. Vraie's, mamma?" said Lucy's voice, hurriedly.

"Yes; I found it out only just now."

"Oh, mamma, how stupid! What an awful nuisance!" burst out Miss Harwich; "and here, after he's proposed and accepted! And I might have had Collier so easily!" and the young lady stamped with passion.

Agatha Clare turned her face away to avoid seeing St. Vraie's. His features were ghastly pale, and his lips quivering, for the blow struck hard. But his resolution was soon taken, and his face grew stern and composed. Turning to Agatha, whose hazel eyes were full of soft compassion, he said, with difficulty:

"You'll keep the secret, Miss Clara?"

She bowed, and he passed out. As he entered the large room Lucy was saying, passionately, "Tied irrevocably!"

"No, Miss Harwich," said St. Vraie, haughtily, while mother and daughter were overwhelmed with confusion. "The secret of these rooms—the whispering-gallery—has put me in possession of your conversation; I therefore release you freely from your promise; and I trust," he added, sarcastically, "that your future conquest may be more satisfactorily ended."

He bowed low and stood aside for them to pass. Lucy's beautiful face crimsoned and paled alternately, but her accustomed spirit deserted her, and she and her crest-fallen mother descended into the court-yard, whence, under the plea of fatigue, they soon drove off, the baronet being in attendance.

Agatha Clare became conscious that Harold St. Vraie looked on her, to a certain extent, as a sharer in his secret, and she could not help observing his subdued manner and humble deference toward her. He rode home by her side that evening, and seemed unwilling to waste words on any one else. Afterward he was a frequent visitor, and ultimately he asked Mrs. Clare to give him "her greatest treasure," which, with her treasure's sanction, she promised to do.

And as Harold passed the turquoise betrothed ring on Agatha's slender finger, and lovingly pressed her hand, he whispered:

"I don't think any whisper-room will part us, my own?"

Agatha's reply is unrecorded.

CENTRAL CITY, COLORADO.

CENTRAL CITY, Colorado, of which we give an illustration on our first page, is quite a large town, situated among the Rocky Mountains. It is the natural centre of the great mining operations in Colorado. Millions of dollars of Eastern capital are invested in the different mills and claims that circle the town. There has been much mismanagement on the part of Eastern agents, and this has rendered some of the best properties of this region unproductive. The "Lyons' Process," that promises so much, is being tested near Central City. If successful, Colorado will be the greatest State in the Union in its development of mineral wealth. Our artist has faithfully represented the peculiar topographical features of the mining regions among the mountains of Colorado.

We give also on the same page an illustration of a GAMBLING SCENE IN DENVER CITY, COLORADO. The scene represented by our artist is one which may every night be seen by stepping into the tempting saloons of the city. In all of these gambling saloons there is music of a very indifferent quality. They are nightly crowded by men of all classes of society. The games which are played are very various, and some of them are peculiar to this region.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

A certain London gossip, that is almost exclusively devoted to those topics which are supposed to be especially appropriate to ladies—viz., dress, fashion, domestic economy, and family management in general—has recently become involved in quite a discussion regarding the "Discipline of Young Children." An anxious mother, uncertain how to manage her rather willful little girl, asked for advice through the columns of this gazette, and immediately a flood of communications appeared, giving such a mélange of views that the poor "mother" must be puzzled. Each has her own pet theory. One bears her sentence on pure reasoning with children, and styles herself a "Mother of the Rod;" another advises only gentleness and firmness; a third suggests a plan of regular self-education as the best method of training a child to obedience. "A Manager of Unruly Little Girls" insists that there is no "equivalent punishment for grave faults but the rod," and recommends that the whipping system be unflinchingly pursued, especially in the case of little girls, "as they bear pain more than boys!" One individual, claiming the euphonious name of "Cornelia," gives some philosophical views, from which we will quote a passage or two:

"I cordially agree with 'A Manager of Unruly Little Girls' that for young children a whipping is the best course, and well-deserved. I would not whip a child till it is a year and a half old, nor till it is a girl after it is seven years old; but till then, for many faults it is an excellent discipline. Children's nerves often get into an irritable, excitable state, which exhibits itself in crying, and what is termed in the nursery 'naughtiness;' for this state of things it is wonderful what a fine tonic and alternative to the nervous system a whipping proves to be."

At this point we would suggest that "children of larger growth," who are often both nervous and fretful, be made to take this "fine tonic."

"A well-disciplined child, who has been whipped in early days, will generally prove obedient and good-tempered. And pray, what is a 'well-disciplined child' to be whipped for? To give amusement or employment to 'Cornelia' she goes on to say:

"Do your duty to your children in all secular matters—feed them well, clothe them well, teach them well; but don't leave off a pleasant employment because the children wish to see the room you fill in as a castle, and do not give up an interesting book because the children make a noise. Prohibit silence when you wish to read, and cease the music to be abandoned when you wish to paint. Always make your children understand that you are to be considered before them."

"In short"—as Mr. Miswiler would say—teach your children by example to be expressly selfish. Such a doctrine is wholly false. Children have their rights in the home—rights as sacred as those belonging to the parent. The family is the child's world, where he is to learn not merely obedience, but love, generosity, benevolence, justice, and rectitude. And these things are best taught by example. A child's happiness is as much to him as is the mother's happiness to her. And while no child has the right to disturb the peace of the family by selfishness or fretfulness, no more has the mother a right to disturb the family by ill-humor.

But we have unconsciously drifted upon a mooted question, and had better "change the subject."

The following is suggestive to clergymen:

The late Rev. Samuel Fiske ("Donna Brewster") once prayed in the pulpit "that the Lord would bless the congregation assembled, and that portion of it which was on the way to church, and those who were at home getting ready to come, and that, in his infinite patience, he would grant the benediction to those who reached the house of God just in time for that." By this sentence heathed the clergymen succeeded in breaking up a bad habit, which had rendered all legitimate appeals.

Somebody, who evidently has not cultivated his taste for the beautiful, thus remarks upon the appearance of the ladies at a recent ball given at the Academy of Music:

The ladies were superb in material but often tasteless in fashion. As a witness to pay the national debt, one is inclined to criticize these splendid gowns, and procure a Government note of the same. The head! White and vagary can no farther go. They are pyramids of false hair. They are obsolete of obsolete fashions. They are grand staircases of wigs and paths, improperly swept, and with the dust flying. Diamond dust, indeed, and gold dust, but not the less intolerable, and not to be endured. No hair is lovely enough to bear this stately hideous arrangement of the hair.

"Doctor," inquired a lady, last week, of one of the most reliable physicians in New York city, "what about the cholera? Shall we have it here next spring?"

"Well," replied the physician, "you can judge as well as I—there is every reason to expect it."

"If so, what would you advise us to do? Run away from it?"

"Well, yes, I think I should, if in your place. You are somewhere in the vicinity of a horse-baiting factory, are you not? Dreadful concern! Yes, I would certainly get out of the way of such a nuisance if the cholera prevails."

"We are dreadfully annoyed by that nauseating odor," replied the lady, "though not nearly so much as some of our friends who live not a dozen blocks from us. It is positively injurious to the health; and if cholera prevails, such annoyances will greatly increase the risk of remaining in the city. There will be a 'row' about that matter in the spring."

"I hope there will," returned the lady, emphatically; "I should like to help make it!"

The lady has "done what she could," in thus sending us to the opinion of one of the few physicians in the city, on the healthfulness of horse-baiting establishments.

The rich, whose brown-shoes bristle within the wide-spaced, indented region, can leave their houses a prey to burglars next summer, and see for their lives. But there are thousands who have neither money nor brains and they must remain, while some benevolent souls will risk their own lives to care for others.

The following incidents related by a visitor to the ruined town of Plymouth, North Carolina, is indicative of the state of feeling in that section of our country:

Five of us were exploring a fort in the vicinity of Plymouth. We, the ladies, leaving our friends descending some point of military architecture, passed around an embankment which hid them from our sight, and came suddenly upon an old negro who was removing for fire-wood the remains of the stables. He touched his hat in the most approved style and stepped aside for us to pass, but we stood still, and Miss M.—begins a conversation with him.

"Well, uncle, how do you enjoy your freedom?" she asked.

He eyed her suspiciously for a moment; then putting on a look of stupidity and indifference, added:

"Ah, miss, I don't know—don't know as I is free."

"What?" we exclaimed, in astonishment; "don't know that you are free? What do you mean?"

"No, miss," he persisted, "don't know nothin' 'bout it; s'bout 't all."

Just at that moment one of the officials who seemed pained as came up. As the negro caught sight of the Federal officers the look of stupidity vanished as if by magic. Off came the old hat in a twinkling, and with a scowl beaming all over his dark face, he turned to an exclamation:

"Oh! I know you now. You 'snt French, you 'snt friends; so! I know what I is too. Yes, miss, it's a free man, tank God!"

An interesting article recently appeared in one of our daily papers in regard to the city of New York fifty years ago. The writer stated that "the 'Discriminator' of fifty years ago was a colored man ('Billy') who lived in William Street, east of Franklin, where it was the center of prominent merchants, lawyers, and physicians to go, winter evenings, for look-alike talks. This was a general resort." He also remarked that when, "of a Sunday afternoon, we wanted exercise and fresh air, we would walk up to the State Prison, then a prominent feature far away out of the city, but now standing almost unobserved, near Christopher Street. It then looked directly open the river—our several streets intersect the view."

Noradays nobody thinks any air or exercise worth speaking of can be obtained short of the Central Park. And when, as is the case the present season, the skating carnival is unusually extended, those who love the exhilarating sport never grade a long journey to obtain it. Indeed, if ever, have the demands of our city enjoyed this pleasure so long and so thoroughly. It was estimated that not less than one hundred thousand visitors made their appearance in the Central Park every day last week, about eighty thousand of whom were on the ice during the day and evening. New York gathers on the skating ponds "her beauty and her chivalry," and "all goes merry as a marriage bell."

A few days ago a man broke his leg in Chatham Street. A coach was procured, and he was sent, in charge of a police officer, to the City Hospital. He was refused admittance there because his injuries were not considered so severe as to prevent his removal to Bellevue Hospital. But at Bellevue they refused to receive him because he had been in the country only four weeks. Application was then made to the Commissioners of Emigration, but they could do nothing because the man's name was not registered on their books as an emigrant. Learning that the affair was serious, the officer endeavored to obtain permission to have him cared for in the Seaman's Retreat at Staten Island. But the poor fellow having no papers to prove that he was a sailor, this plan failed. By this time the unfortunate man's leg was much inflamed, and he suffered intense pain. Each by the case, the officer assumed the responsibility of conveying him, without a permit, to the Seaman's Retreat, where he was cheerfully received—and having been driven about in search of a place where his broken leg could be dressed, four married hours! Comment is unnecessary.

They raise sweet potatoes on a large scale at the Sandwich Islands. The Honolulu Advertiser tells of one that measured 26 inches in length, 28 inches in circumference, and weighed 22 pounds! Such a potato ought to last a family a month.

Now that the "waterfall" is a little pond it is rumored that it originated, not in Paris, but in India! This is on the authority of Dr. Judson, the celebrated Baptist missionary, who in a letter, written thirty years ago, describing the costume of Karen women, said they wore fantastically-constructed headdresses, the hair, suspended from the back part of the head.

A new style of engagement-ring is mentioned among the novelties in an English paper. It is composed of "three pieces, which can be separated but never dissolved, and which the wearer alone, being in the secret, is able to re-adjust into the true center-point."

In a London literary weekly appears a long list of the "ages of English writers." A few of the more popular known will be of interest:

Walter Collins, 45; John Haskin, 47; Rev. C. Kingsley, 47; Captain Mayne Reid, 48; Anthony Trollope, 51; Charles Reade, 51; K. Browning, 54; Charles Mackay, 54; Dickens, 54; Tennyson, 57; Sir H. Bulwer Lytton, 61; Benjamin Disraeli, 64; Barry Cornwall, 67; T. Carlyle, 76.

An exchange says:

A lady of our acquaintance, young, lovely, and brilliant, called on a celebrated physician to do "something" for a rash of blood to the head.

"I have been doctoring myself," said the lady, "for some time, with a scullie, to the half though kind M.D., while he was feeling her pulse."

"Ah! how?"

"Why, I have taken Breadth's Pills, Parry's Pills, Sherrington's Pills, and Dr. Serravallo's Pills. I have also used Dr. Serravallo's Lotion and Plaster, and—"

"My heavens, madam," interrupted the astonished doctor, "all these do your constitution no good!"

"No! Then what shall I take?" persistently inquired the patient.

"Take!" exclaimed the doctor, eying her from head to foot; "take!" exclaimed he, after a moment's reflection; "why, take off your corsets!"

Those who read the interesting article on "Diamonds and other Precious Stones," which appeared in the last number of Harper's Magazine, may realize how easily the eye can be deceived from the following little anecdote, cut from a recent London journal:

An extravagant baronet, well-known at the Club in St. James's, being on one of very many occasions, hard pressed for money, bribed his wife's waiting woman to procure for him her ladyship's cabinet of diamonds, with which he forthwith proceeded to the family jeweler, expressing a wish that he would substitute the best paste for the real article, when her ladyship would be none the wiser; to which the jeweler unobtrusively replied, "My dear Charles, I did that for my lady more than twelve months since!" thus showing that "my lady" was quite as just as her "lord," and in nothing was he her "master."

The following directions to a portrait-painter are characteristic of some persons:

"Represent me in my portrait," said a gentleman, "with a book in my hand, and reading aloud. 'Aid my servant also, in a corner where he can not be seen, but in such a manner that he may hear me when I talk.'"

ST. VALENTINE'S DAY

AMERICA LETTER.

ABOARD THE "PROMISED LAND."

The "good ship" Promised Land really deserved that name. She was new, had made only one voyage, in a remarkably short space of time, was copper-fastened, two hundred tons burden, was of course registered A 1 at Lloyd's, and was now loading at the St. Winifred's Docks. Many had read the enticing and almost appetizing advertisement, which had been in the Times for many days, under heading of "Steam to the Brazils," of the "spacious poop and after-decks," the "airy and well-ventilated saloons," and the decks "flush from end to end, and offering an agreeable and undisturbed promenade," of the surgeon, who was "experienced," of the "fire-sun-killer," which was infallible, of the "water-condensing apparatus," and, above all, of that "Favorite" Captain, Robert Magregor, who was "so well known on the American station." This collection of nautical blessings irresistibly induced me, when appointed engineer for surveying a new line of railway in the Brazils, to choose the new "bark-rigged liner," the Promised Land, and her Favorite Captain, Robert Magregor.

That was rather a dismal first meeting of all the passengers in the saloon. There was a Spanish-looking actress, a wife or two of a consul, two or three commercial travelers, a couple of officers and their wives, some Frenchmen, some Germans—with, in fact, the almost invariable elements which make up the complement of a packet bound on a long voyage. One gentleman I particularly noticed, who was taking supper, with great relish, by himself. He had come on board early, had established himself early in one of the best cabins, and had put every thing he wanted in its "proper place." When nearly every one was like a moody and troubled spirit, going up on deck and coming down again, and poking into wrong cabins, and hatching over green trunks and packages, he was perfectly and calmly at home. By eleven o'clock he had finished his supper, had read the evening paper through by a wax-candle, as he would have done at his club, and had gone comfortably to bed. This gentleman's name was Colter, a Chancery barrister in fair practice, who had been ordered a long sea-voyage to strengthen his chest, and enable him the better to direct his voice at their "L'chips."

In the morning we were tossing about in the Channel. The sea was dull and angry, and the "bark-rigged-liner" rode heaving and lurching. Already the bulk of the passengers were in their misery, to the music of the "hiss" of the waters, and the straining and creaking of the inside timbers. It was a dark day, too, was raining on deck, and only a bare half-dozen appeared at breakfast. Captain Robert Magregor came down himself, and sat at the head. He was a surprisingly young man for a Favorite Captain, but of a stout build, with sandy hair and large fair face, and a very Scotch accent. "Stiff bit of weather to begin with," he said, cheerfully; "always the better, though, for my passengers; they get into it at once and have it all over. I wish we had a good storm at once, to try this vessel. She'll stand any thing, Sir. Go any where. Built under my own eye."

The Chancery barrister was, of course, there, picking out the best bits of broiled ham and eggs with his fork. I saw him well. Tall, thin, with a yellowish face, and "thin hair, besprinkled spare." "Captain," he said, abruptly, "what was the stoppage last night? It awoke me. Somewhere off Gravesend, eh?"

"Yes," said the captain, "off Gravesend it was—a small boiler came alongside, with two passengers. We nearly ran 'em down; serve 'em right, too. Pretty thing, stopping a vessel in her course! And only the agent would have been making a row, and talking of the company, and perhaps stop the passage-money out of my salary, I'd have let 'em about till they were hoarse."

"And now, captain," said the barrister, buttering toast, with a rasping, crackling sound, "what were they like—men, women, or children?"

"A woman, Sir—a lady, I suppose we must call her," the captain said, with disgust. "Nice thing, isn't it—ladies coming out in bonnets to stop mail-packets on the high seas?"

"And where is she now?" said the barrister, eating a fresh egg. "Breakfast in berth, eh?"

"I suppose so," said Captain Magregor, angrily. "Of course, she's sick. By Jove, the wind's freshening again!" he said, rising; "this is the style of thing. It looks like a good storm before night."

All that day the weather freshened; by dinner-time it was almost a storm, and we had less company at the table than even at breakfast.

This all went on for a couple of days, when things began to mend. The storm abated altogether; and one morning we arose to the smoothest and most lovely weather that could be conceived. The passengers came crawling out of their burrows, with miserable faces, but with some hope. They plucked up wonderfully, as some one remarked. In fact, at the breakfast-table, all but some children were assembled. The captain was at the head, a little down at the loss of his stormy weather, and I and Mr. Colter near him.

"We are all here?" said the barrister; "a difference to the first day, eh? By-the-way, where's the Gravesend lady? She that woke us up out of our sleep—eh, captain?"

The captain answered gruffly that he did not know.

"You should have all your passengers here, captain. No excuse such a morning as this. No breakfasting in bed—in berth, I mean—it's bed for the morals of the ship."

The Scotch captain shook himself at this. "We'll have none of that, aboard. No favor or exceptions. Here, steward! You're not to take in breakfast to any one—d'ye hear?"

"No, Sir. Only that lady in No. 20."

"Has she been ill?"

"No, Sir, the stewardess says. She had dinner yesterday there, and tea and breakfast ever since she came aboard."

The captain almost leaped up with anger.

"This is outrageous. My orders defied by any woman. Lady or woman, it's all one. I'll have the same discipline for all. That's logic, Mr. Colter."

"And good logic, too," said that gentleman.

"Ay, ay. The ship before every thing. And see, steward. Tell that lady—what's her name?"

"Mrs. Arlington, Sir."

Mr. Colter, at hearing this name, started.

"Arlington?" he said. "Are you sure?"

"Why," said the captain, "what's there in it?"

Mr. Colter seemed to be ashamed of having started or shown surprise.

"Nothing," he said. "There's a leading case, you know—Arlington and Hooker—very nearly the same point as the rule in Sbelley's case, but cut down a good deal, you know."

"Well, tell Mrs. Arlington she must be here for dinner or go without any. That's blunt; but it's the fact and truth."

The captain went on deck.

"Now," said Mr. Colter to me, "why should that lady, who has come on board in an exceptional manner, and who has not been in the least ill (as, indeed, I found out in a very odd way, for I saw her reflected in the little sky-light of my berth, and reading and working all through the storm)—why shouldn't she come in and take her meals with us?"

"Well, I never thought of it in that way," I said.

At dinner that day—the fine weather still continuing—all the passengers were assembled, except one. Just as the covers were taken off a little rustle was heard, and a tall, graceful lady stood at the door, looking down the long table as if for a place. She was very neatly cut out of the great human material—slight—was in a purple silk—had a very small face and features—soft hair, with a tiny cap. She seemed almost so shy as a girl, and about two-and-thirty years of age. The lawyer got up, and, with much bustle, caused room to be made for her opposite—near the captain—who shook himself angrily, like a Newfoundland dog.

"Expect every one to be on time on board the Promised Land," he said, roughly. "Can't allow any eating and drinking in the cabins. So I hope, in future, ma'am—"

She was quite composed, and answered him with a soft voice: "I beg pardon, indeed, Captain Magregor. I did not know the rules—indeed, no. But in future you will find me the most obedient of all your passengers."

"Well, I hope so," he said. Get this lady some soup."

The barrister, who had his eye on her all this time, said to her, graciously:

"Hope you have not suffered during the rough weather?"

She answered softly, and with an expression of pain:

"I always suffer. I am almost always a martyr."

"Why," said the Scotch captain, "we know that you weren't ill during the storm, for you had your meals in regularly, and this gentleman here saw you sitting up, reflected in some way on his sky-light, reading away, when it was blowing great guns. Now?"

She raised her eyes from her plate and turned them steadily on the barrister. He helped himself to wine—very coolly.

"You are determined to be hard on poor me, Captain Magregor," she said. "I did not say that I was sick, but that I was almost always sick. I will even appeal to that gentleman who used reflectors to see how I employed my time."

The barrister laughed. "That's putting it very strongly against me. But if I had had such a reflector the other night when our vessel was stopped, and mysterious passengers came on board, that would be worth something. What do you say, captain?"

"I say it was a thing I wouldn't do again, for this lady or for any lady."

Again her eyes were studying the barrister very carefully.

He said, suddenly, as if putting a question:

"You were coming home from foreign service—your own husband?"

She almost started, looked at him, then answered steadily, with her wonderful eyes on him:

"Well, yes, supposing we were?"

"Oh, certainly," said he, with great politeness; "I have no right to put inquisitive questions."

"No more," she said, with a firm smile, "than you have to construct those reflectors of yours. Even my enemy here, Captain Magregor, wouldn't resort to that."

"It must have been very perilous," continued the barrister, addressing her, "that coming on board in an open boat on a rough night. It required great courage," he said, looking round with a smile, "or great pressure and necessity. From Gravesend, I think you said," he repeated.

"Suppose it were Gravesend," she answered, with a smile which was not a smile of pleasure.

"Would you like to hear," she went on, calmly, "my birth-place, names of relations, age next birthday, and other particulars according to a census paper?"

The barrister put up his hands to his face.

"Serve me right," he said; "a capital hit—well sent home too."

"Ah!" said she, laughing; "I wish to hit nobody, provided they do not hit me."

"At any rate," said the barrister, "I have got a lesson."

But I don't think he had. For at tea that night he came up to the table, laughing. "Look here," he said; "I am incorrigible. I belong to the law. So that is my excuse. You know the challenge you gave me about a census paper? Well, I have been working my head ever since, as I should do at a brief for the Vice-Chancellor to-morrow morning. May I tell you what I have found, provided I tell you how?"

The faintest flush of uneasiness passed over that pleasant face, but she hid it by setting back the little cap. "Do as you please," she said, with a smile.

"You know I am helpless. Captain Magregor here, who I thought would be my protector, is turned against me; so every body is privileged."

"First," said Mr. Colter, "you are married, madam, or were married, and your husband's name is Charles H. Arlington—a captain in her Majesty's Ninetieth Regiment of Foot, now stationed at Chatham."

She almost started out of her seat, a strange wildness came into her eyes, with a flash of fury, as she bent over to the barrister.

"What do you mean?" she said, in a thick voice. Every one had been listening, and now turned to each other with surprise and wonder. In a moment her face had changed. She had burst into tears, and, with her handkerchief to her face, she just uttered the words, "He is dead! how unkind!" and floated away out of the saloon.

Many reproachful eyes were turned on the barrister.

"Come, I say, Mr. Colter," said the captain, who had looked after her with much compassion, "this is going a little too far, I think. A helpless woman is no match for a clever lawyer. It ain't equal, you know. Poor soul!"

"You my word," said the eager barrister, "I meant nothing—I really did not. It was a mere chance shot. I knew her name was Arlington. So I looked in an Army List."

The next morning, when the wind had again freshened, I went up very early upon deck. It was a cool, delicious morning, and the vessel was bending through the waves with a sharp, breezy decision that is always very acceptable. It was about seven, and I was sure I should have the deck all to myself; but, to my surprise, there was the captain leaning against the mainmast, with a lady in a little hood talking to him. I knew both hood and lady. Presently they began to walk about, and the captain pointed out this "stay" and that rope. In all these things she seemed to take an eager interest, and I could see was asking all sorts of questions, which he answered very readily, and with great alacrity and pleasure. Then he came toward me and explained the compasses, and then she went to the very end of the vessel, where she stood up on the fore-castle in the breeze, and looked down on the heaving waters with more courage than, perhaps, I could have done, and looked like a statue. I was leaning on the side of the vessel, looking at her in this attitude, when I heard a voice close at my ear: "A fine morning!" It was Mr. Colter, the barrister.

"I thought we should have the deck nearly to ourselves," he said, and walked down toward the pair at the end. When the lady saw him coming she jumped down. She said nothing to him beyond "Good-morning!" but that was said with an air of defiance.

That day the luggage "wanted on the voyage" was to be got up—a grand ceremonial of unpacking for passengers, and a remarkably busy and amusing scene. Every one got up his trunk, and got out things which he could not or would not want. Still it was an amusement, and even playthings are welcome upon a voyage. Every one was unloading and unpacking, even the great Chancery barrister, Mr. Colter, Q.C.

At dinner we were all in great spirits. The captain had given Champagne, which was much enjoyed by the lady who sat near him. Her eyes began to sparkle, and she talked very pleasantly and with great animation. I noticed that Captain Magregor listened with extraordinary attention to every thing she said, spoke very little himself, not even a word about his beloved ship.

"We deserve this," said the barrister, gayly, "after our hard work to-day. Excellent wine it is."

"You should drink, Mr. Colter, to our full and perfect reconciliation; and promise, over Captain Magregor's capital Champagne, so kindly given, never to offend me any more. You must get rid of your animosity to me. Will you promise?"

"Certainly," he answered, merrily, "with all my heart. I am deeply penitent. I feel as if I had committed contempt of court, and had been told to attend at the sitting of his lordship to-morrow. Indeed, how could I feel any thing but cordial good-will to a person about whom I am beginning gradually to know every thing?"

"Know every thing?" she said, a frown coming on her forehead. "You are beginning again. Now, I warn you!"

"Yes," said he, "but we have not drunk our Champagne together yet. It is really the oddest thing. There must be some mysterious relation between us, for these things force themselves on me. Now to-day, at the luggage, I found out your house and street!"

"Champagne, ma'am?" said the waiter.

"No," she said, fiercely, "I'll not drink with you. I'll have no reconciliation."

"Pray hear me first," he said. "Stay a moment, waiter. I saw a portmanteau swung up rather roughly, when the side grazed against the hold, and half tore off a card. I saw it wouldn't stay on a minute, and really with the best intentions, though you won't credit it, took it off. On the face was your name, Mrs. Arlington, written in a very pretty hand. On the back was, 'To be left at Captain Arlington's, Grove Villa, Chatham. Seven and sixpence to pay. 11/6/58.' (You know the odd way they write that.) The very day before our vessel sailed. Obviously the trunk-maker's bill for a lock or repairs."

She almost ground her teeth, and the wine shook in her hand.

"You will not stop till you get a lesson," she said, grimly. "I am not a woman to let myself be persecuted. I can do nothing myself; but if I ask other gentlemen—and she looked at Captain Magregor—"I am sure they will help me. Perhaps the next thing you will tell us at dinner, that you have opened my little trunk and searched it."

"I think," said Captain Magregor, who had been appealed to, "you might let this lady's affairs alone."

If we have barristers aboard, I don't see why we need have barristers' ways. In fact, now, as captain of this craft, I tell you plainly, Mr. Colter, I won't have it. I have authority here, and I must require you to give over prying into this lady's business, or looking into her trunks and that sort of thing."

He looked to her, whose eyes turned to him with speechless gratitude. There was a silence. Half the table heard that speech. Mr. Colter drank a little wine, then called in a clear voice to a gentleman a few places from him:

"Mr. Wilson! you were next me to-day when a portmanteau came out of the hold with a card hanging to it. Would that card have dropped off at a touch?"

"At a touch," said Mr. Wilson.

"Did I save it from dropping back into the hold?"

"You did," said Mr. Wilson.

"Who was it first perceived that there was writing on the back?"

"I did, certainly," said Mr. Wilson. "In fact, I remarked it as the trunk came up."

"There!" said Mr. Colter, calmly. "So much for looking into this lady's trunks. As for my remark yesterday about the husband of this lady, I looked, out of the merest idle curiosity, to see his rank and regiment, in an Army List—"

"An Army List?" she repeated, starting.

"Yes," he went on. "An Army List of the present month, and this is only the seventeenth, and I found him there. But that, of course, must be a printer's error (these things are edited so carelessly), for I think we understood you to say your husband is not alive?"

"Never," she answered, excitedly. "I said I was afraid he might be dead or dying, as I left him very ill."

"Then I mistook," he went on. "Now, that being so, I appeal to the company whether our excellent captain has not traveled a little beyond what is proper in the way he has spoken to me. Really it seems to me a little unwarrantable! and if I was one of your people with a grievance, and were to bring the matter officially before my friend Sir Charles Robinson, chairman of the company, he might look at it rather seriously. Now, I put it to our captain, a brave man, and one of the best seamen going, whether he has not been a little rough with me to-day."

The captain colored.

"Well," said he, "perhaps I spoke too strongly, and perhaps you are right, Mr. Colter. You know I have great responsibility."

The look of anger and contempt the lady gave him was beyond description. She rose at once.

"I see you have deserted me," she said, in a whisper, to the captain. "Well, so be it. I shall go on deck and make the wind and the sea my friends. They, indeed, are faithful."

And she passed out. In about ten minutes the captain followed her.

Very soon the curiosity of the passengers had been excited about this lady and her doings; and I could see that the barrister's little speech had produced a marked impression. Some of the gentlemen took her part; but the ladies were, to a lady, against her.

The barrister was very pleasant on the subject.

"I have got so into the habit of putting this and that together," he said, "that really I can't help speculating, and following out my speculations in this way. Now, this lady, though I really may be putting myself in bodily risk (for who knows how she may turn out? and she gives me such wicked looks), is really quite like a child's puzzle to me; and positively I must put it together successfully before the voyage is out."

There was a rattle behind us, and she was standing at the top of the table. She had heard him. There was the same twitch of vexation in her mouth.

"No warnings," she said, with a smile, "will do you good. Take care; other people may be fond of puzzles too."

"Nothing can be fairer," he said, laughing.

He was walking on deck that evening, when I saw her come up to him with a very sad and bewitching face. I could hear her low voice almost pleading. As I passed close by I heard her say something about—

"Oh, so clever! with such a reputation as you!"

To which he replied:

"Oh, nonsense. You never heard of my name before, unless you had been reading conveyances and deeds all your life. No, no."

The next thing we heard was that the captain had given up his own private cabin to the strange lady. She had come on board late, and had to put up with the worst accommodation. This inflamed all the ladies still more, but more particularly Mr. Colter, who said it was "an instance of singular partiality." That very day we saw an English brig bearing down on us with a signal of distress flying. This was welcome news to the passengers, and brought every one up from below with glasses, to share in the excitement. We slackened speed and let her come near. It turned out, after all, that she was only "short of water," which created quite as ill feeling against the brig, and sent down most of the passengers in disgust. The captain came aboard our vessel in his long boat, and was promptly surrounded by a group asking him all manner of questions, which provided a great subject of discussion at dinner that day. After dinner, Mr. Colter said, in his gay way, "While you were all talking to the captain, I got hold of the steward, and secured a couple of English newspapers. What do you say to that? I suppose no one ever thought of that; though there is not much news, except—except—indeed—and he kept looking up and down the columns, searching for his bit of news, 'one of the usual dreadful murders,'" he said. "Where is it?"

He spoke, I was made to look up by an angry and impatient rustle opposite, and there saw the eyes of the lady fixed on him with such an expression of mixed terror and agony, that I was really startled.

"At Chatham, I think it was," he said: "near to your part of the world. So you had a lucky escape, Mrs. Arlington."

She was growing pale and red by turns, her hands were grasping the table with a clutch, and she half rose to go.

"Ah, here it is!" "What do you mean by this?" she said. He did not affect to see her, but I saw him steal a look at her.

"Why, you are not well," said Captain McGregor. "Take my arm, and come on deck."

"You won't wait to hear the exciting details?" said Mr. Colter. "Why, I declare, it's not at Chatham, after all. It was at Portsmouth. Yes, at Portsmouth. How stupid of me!"

A cautious expression of relief came into her face. "It was only for a moment," she said. "You know my poor husband is lying ill there, and these things happen so often."

"Ah, I see," said the captain. "Was the murderer a sergeant—one Bidley?"

"Yes! Go! Bless me, yes!" said Mr. Colter. "How did you find that out?"

"Why, that all happened before we left England. I read it in the Times a week before. The fellow must be hanged by this time."

"Well, well," said Mr. Colter, laying down his paper, "after that I give it all up. I am getting stupid. I may retire into the profession."

The correcting passenger laughed and received a step in rank on the spot, in respect, from his fellow-passengers.

Meanwhile our captain never ebated in his attentions to the lady, though he grew more gleeful and moody every day. He had lost all his enthusiasm for his ship, and never talked of her in a boastful and affectionate way. On the other hand, carrying out his view of studying every thing that came in his way, Mr. Colter had lately taken great interest in the ship, and all about her, "just to fill in the time," he said. Every day at noon, when the observations were taken, he was careful to assist, and picked up the outlines of navigation in a very short time. Even the mate pronounced that he'd work the reckoning "after to-morrow next day."

This was always his way, Mr. Colter said, "because," he added, "who knows but a navigation case might be trotted to me? Last year I had a drying case, and I made up all the chemicals in a week." By-and-by the mate's prophecy actually came true, and Mr. Colter worked out the ship's reckoning for himself in a very satisfactory way.

The next day a great dark steamer, homeward-bound, came in sight, which the captain, eagerly getting his glass, and making the lady who stood near him look at, pronounced to be one of the Cunard vessels. As it drew near all the passengers got out their letters, which, after a short perusal, were sent on board; and it steamed away out of sight. This was a real incident, and was talked over eagerly and noisily at dinner. Mr. Colter, to whom the captain was very good and just every salient since their little discussion, quite taking the lead. "Such a mail as went on board," he said: "all of us writing home to our fathers and mothers, daughters, wives, and husbands. By-the-way," he went on gayly, and with his eye on the lady, "I didn't see you give a contribution, not a line, to that poor husband in the barracks at home, sitting in his bare room, coming back from their dull mess."

She colored, and again that fierce contortion of impatience came into her face. "How do you know?" she said. "Is the next thing to be that I am to show you all my letters before I post them?"

"God forbid," he answered, laughing, "if I had to read or look at ladies' long letters. No, no, Mrs. Arlington, only, as I always tell you, you are quite a study to me." He laughed again. "But come now," he went on, half addressing those near him, "I did remark that Mrs. Arlington missed the post, or did not know there was a mail going, and thus lost such an opportunity of writing to her husband. It was very unlucky."

Some of the passengers looked one at the other, for by this time—and really in part owing to these hints of the barometer—a sort of mystery of suspicion began to get among them about this lady. There was nothing to do, monotony was beginning to set in, so that even a little suspicion was welcome. This little fact, therefore, started so innocently by Mr. Colter, was taken up readily, and speculated over very often. And the looks of fury and secret hostility that naturally came into her face—as I surprised her often looking at "her persecutor"—were remarkable. Really he was carrying it all too far. But he never seemed to tire of it. A little passage that took place between them a couple of mornings later "intrigued" us all yet more.

"I am hungry this morning," he began, addressing the company as usual, "and do you know who is the reason? No one would guess, I am sure. Mrs. Arlington, you are the reason I am hungry. What is this, fried collops? Yes, Mrs. A. is the reason." Again she was in great confusion. The ladies' eyes were upon her. "Now for the explanation. Mrs. Arlington spilled some of my chocolate this morning. I think you did it on purpose. The steward was carrying it in (I always have it at home, and I must say the lad makes it wondrously as well as my own man), and Mrs. Arlington here ran against him, spilled some of it, and the poor boy brought it in afterward to my cabin, and wanted to know should he make more. Of course I said no. But I didn't even take what was left."

The public were a little disappointed at this story, which they could not follow. The only thing they enjoyed was her really helpless state of confusion and terror. And after that morning the impression still more evidently prevailed that there was something very odd about the strange lady. Later, we all knew the significance of this chocolate story.

The President had now been some seven or eight days out, and with fair weather. We were all getting tolerably well shaken down into the ship, as Mr. Colter said. This eighth day was remarkable for a bright sun out, and the one or two always sick passengers came creeping out of their berths to get a little fresh air and sun. Poor souls! Every one was happy, but the only curious thing was the behavior of the captain, who all the day long had his powerful double-glasses to his eyes searching the horizon far and near. This at first was not attended to; but, as he continued anxiously at this all the day, even sending men to the mast-head, and keeping a little boy there till he nearly fell off, people began to wonder, and then to ask. The first to take notice was Mr. Colter: "Not looking for land, surely?" he said, with a smile. "I made up a reckoning with the mate, and we are in latitude so and so."

The captain answered him roughly: "I can look through my glasses, I suppose, without having to give an account of myself, Mr. Colter? We leave our compass-boxes at home on board this ship." And walked away down to the cabin to the lady; then came up, and spoke to the man at the wheel. It was now about five o'clock, and time for dinner. Mr. Colter, who was very friendly with the mate, and talked with him a good deal about the ship and her handling, now walked over to take a look at the binocular before going down. "Why, look here, Colbrett," he said, "we're taking a bend out of our course. Eh? What d'ye say?"

"Yes, we are, Sir," said the mate. "What's this, Jim?" "Cap'n bid me keep a quarter-point or so to starboard," said the steersman.

"Very odd," said Mr. Colter. "I don't know what's coming over the cap'n," said Colbrett, thoughtfully. "I think," he added, cautiously, "he's now after one of the Havre lines (so he pronounced it) for New York, which we should meet about here. That's what's at the bottom of it, Sir. I suspect he wants news, or something."

"Oh, indeed," said Mr. Colter, and went down to dinner. At this meal the captain and lady were both restless, and spoke little. Mr. Colter was cheerful. When it was nearly done, a steward's boy came in, and whispered to the captain, who got up hastily, and went on deck. This notion excited curiosity. What could it be?

After dessert had been put on, Mr. Colter, wiping his mouth with his napkin, said, gayly, "I really must see what it is all about."

"Ah, you may see and see again," said Mrs. Arlington, with extraordinary ferocity, "but you will not find out much, or be able to surmise much more."

"If" said he, good-humoredly. "Not I, indeed. But a little walk on deck can do no harm." He went up, and presently half followed, for curiosity is stronger than wine.

The evening and the half darkness had come on. The sky-lights over the saloon looked like gorgeous illuminated globes. The sea was fresh, and cool, and blue, and the moon, seeming to be out a little before its time, was shining. Many faces were looking out to the one point where there was a black patch, and a twinkling red and green light growing larger every moment. Many fingers pointed it out to each other. "See the Havre packet!" said Colbrett, pointing up to Mr. Colter; "we're out of our course by three hours. Nigh on forty mile. Only this! Of course it's his affair, and he'll see what the owners will say."

The captain was on his paddle-box, giving orders. "We're going at full speed, you see," said the mate. "She's a faster boat, and won't lie by for us. The French skipper knows his duty to his company."

"Oh, I see," said Mr. Colter. "Where's Mrs. Arlington?" She was in her cabin. By-and-by some boxes were coming up from the hold. Presently the barometer came up, dressed in her shawls and cloaks, and with all her baskets and packages. "I see," said Mr. Colter again.

"Perhaps you do," she said, "but not for much longer. I am going at last to be set free from your insolent and tyrannical persecutions. This kind captain is going to put me on board that vessel which is bound for New York."

By this time a knot of leading passengers had gathered round, listening with wonder. We were gradually drawing nearer to the vessel. The captain was coming down from his paddle-box with triumph.

"We shall overhaul her yet," he said. "They have seen our signals. They are getting out the boat so as to have it ready. They have stopped at last."

He was turning to go, when Mr. Colter, suddenly changing his habitual jocular manner, said: "Just a word with you, captain, before you move in this matter."

He took him by the arm, and led him away down to the end of the vessel, the captain going sulkily. Mrs. Arlington was very restless during the interview, but she looked very often toward the dark French ship.

In a moment they both came back. The captain was very excited. "I'll not listen to you, Sir. You should be ashamed of yourself. I sha'n't move in the business, or listen to such calumnies."

"Brave and gallant protector," she said, taking the captain's hand. "I knew I had a friend in you who would stand by me."

"Then you force me to appeal to the passengers, and to them I shall appeal."

"You would not be so cowardly—so cruel," she said, half imploringly. "I shall tell them what I know and can prove as soon as we touch land. I shall tell them that this woman—"

"Tell what you like," said the captain, doggedly. "Here's the vessel, and go on board she shall."

In fact we were now drifting up beside the great black figure of the French steamer, breathing and blowing off the steam like a tired horse. The men were in the boat, and the trucks were about being swung over the side.

"Well, then," said Mr. Colter, "if you won't listen to reason, I shall go too. New York will be very pleasant, and we have an extradition treaty with that country."

There was a pause. The two stood looking at each other, the lady trembling and breathing hard. The voice of the French captain was heard through a speaking-trumpet.

"Well, then," said she, with a sort of dreadful smile; "since you are so positive in the matter I suppose you must have your way. I am very sorry to have given these foreign gentlemen all this trouble; but it is better to submit than to have a scene. I shall never be able, Mr. Colter, to repay you for all your intrusive kindness."

She hurried down again to her cabin, but her last look at the barometer was one no one could forget. The vessel was put on her old course.

For some days more the voyage continued. Still the lady did not come into the cabin for meals. "I have given her leave," said the captain, ferociously. "I suppose I have that power aboard my own ship, and I'd like to see the man that will dispute it."

"So should I," said Mr. Colter, smiling. "Poor Jack would be laid in irons, and properly so. The law gives you full power, cap'n, to a certain extent. We must all support the law, cap'n. The legal theory is, that the deck of every English vessel is a portion of the British soil."

The captain answered nothing. It was the last day. We were to be off the coast by evening. By evening we were off the coast, near a tongue of land and a light-house. But it was nearly dark. Passengers were all in excitement. A splash of sea was heard alongside, and the Customs officers, some green-looking men in brigand hats, came on board. They went through the usual business. To our surprise we heard Mr. Colter talking, in what was apparently excellent Spanish, with the leader of the party. The leader was very eloquent, and touched his hat often. Mr. Colter gave him a letter as the boat went away—two were left behind in charge of the vessel.

Mr. Colter was literally now regarded as a being of mysterious power. About nine that night (we were all to land in the morning) another boat was heard coming alongside, and a gentleman came up the side, who in English asked the captain to see Mr. Colter. The captain asked his business a little gruffly. "I am the consul here," said the other.

Mr. Colter, who was smoking, came up. The consul took off his hat. "I hope Lord Beaconsfield is well," he said, obsequiously. "His lordship wrote to me by the last mail. We shall do every thing we can for you, Mr. Colter. Would you like to come ashore to-night and sleep on dry land—at a hotel? I can manage that."

"Well, then, do you know, I should," said Mr. Colter, gayly. "I have, however, a few little things to put together first."

"I hope you enjoyed the voyage," said the consul. "Well I did, since you ask me," he answered. "It has really been like Westminster Hall all the way. I suppose you can give me half an hour?"

Half an hour after that he came into the saloon stuffed up to go. I and the captain were the only people there. "Good-by," said Mr. Colter, good-humoredly, "for the present. It seems a little invidious my being the only one allowed to go ashore, but I shall be back in the morning. Good-by."

"And what legacy do you leave behind?" said a woman's voice close by. We looked up and saw flashing eyes, and distorted features, and a quivering lip.

"Good grations!" said Mr. Colter. "What legacy? I say," she repeated; "a noble, manly, and chivalrous one! You a gentleman? No; I will tell you what you are—a miserable spy, a common detective! God forgive you!"

"What strange language!" said Mr. Colter, looking round. "If I was a low creature I would curse you," she went on, in a fury; "I would pray—as I will pray to-night—that the boat which takes you to shore may open and sink to the bottom. You mean, unworthy spy, you! You upward, you! You crawling, creeping, sneaking spy; this is the dirty work you love! Curse you, I say!"

"What message?" said Mr. Colter, not in the least disturbed. "What have I done to you? Why did you fasten on me from the beginning of the voyage—a poor woman that did you no harm—tell me that—oh?"

Mr. Colter suddenly became grave. (It was a curious and most exciting scene; the yellow oil lamps of the saloon playing on her face.) "Since you ask me," he said, "I shall tell you—something, at least. Young William Arlington, your husband—that was—"

"Was?" she repeated, faltering. "—was the son of a very dear friend of mine. I knew something of his history—how the foolish boy had been entrapped into a marriage at Boulogne with a sort of half-French woman that no one knew any thing of, and about whom there were strange rumors. Now, Mrs. Arlington?"

"False, false—every word of it," she said, furiously. "We shall see," he said, gathering up his coat and shawl. "I shall not appear much more in this business. Others will look after it. Sorry no one else is allowed on shore. Good-night all."

She gave a half shriek and shook her head at him. "May that boat of yours sink you, sink you, sink—"

She stopped herself and rushed back into her cabin, for stray passengers were looking out in wonder. I could not for a long while get rid of the dreadful idea of her appearance as I saw her then.

In the morning—a beautiful bright morning—we saw the fine gorgeous coast quite clear. In to my astonishment, there were police in the Spanish dress on the deck talking with the captain, who was very excited. And the English consul was there too.

The passengers were all gathered on the deck, and whispering. At last the captain went down and two of the officers. He came up in a moment with a wild, scared face.

She was in her cabin; but it was fast locked. No one had seen her. No one could see her, or ever did see her again. That deadly look given to Mr. Colter proved to be the last look she gave to mortal man. When the anxious captain had at last her cabin door forced, she was found lying in her berth quite dead and cold, and the ship's doctor pronounced that she had died of poison.

When the English newspapers got out to the British, we all heard of the dreadful Chatham murder of a young officer who had married a half-French milliner against the wishes of his family.

The murderer, the papers said, had got away—it was believed in a Brazilian packet—but he had, according to their favorite phrase, that "the officers of justice would soon be on his track."

Mr. Colter made the return voyage successfully, and much improved in his health, and is now the well-known Sergeant Colter, who stands next for Solicitor-General.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WARRANT A DISCOMFORT.—A constable prying open a grave article on a prisoner with the following words: "We have had a commission stating for several years ago 'Gives Colours.' Well, all we can say is that, considering the material, we wonder they haven't long ago furnished a report."

NAUTICAL WIT.—Brown, being advised for the benefit of his palate to taste an oyster roasted in a little slice of butter, passed a sleepless night in trying to connect a probable joke about the ability of putting the pot upon the spot.

Why is electricity like the police when they are wanted?—Because it is an inevitable force.

Milton was once asked why he did not teach his daughter foreign languages. "I readily can manage enough for a woman!" was his reply.

MYSTIC FORMS OF BUSINESS.—Few of the uninitiated know the significance of wanting long coats of rippled waist the neck, and for their benefit we make the following statement: When they wear the coats hanging in folds, it means "the lady is married;" over the right shoulder, that "she is engaged;" over the left shoulder, that "she has a fellow coming to see her, but I'm not engaged;" and down the back it means "boys, come follow me." If the folds were any at all, it means she "is engaged," and don't wish to have any thing to do with "any other fellow."

Why did Joseph's brethren cast him into the Pit?—Because they didn't want him in the Family Circle.

General Nye says "Congress may be able to reconstruct the Southern States, but neither they nor the devil will ever be able to reconstruct the women; they are perfectly awful."

A gentleman who takes the morning journals, and whose attention is apt to be monopolized by them, recommended one day to his wife for getting down to breakfast in curl-papers, when the lady replied, "If you indulge in your papers, I don't see why I shouldn't enjoy mine."

A man advertising for competent persons to undertake the sale of a new medicine, and adds "that it will be profitable to the advertiser," and so forth.

A traveler, relating his experiences in the East Indies, alluded to the great number of servants employed by gentlemen in that country. "It is to take care of my papers," said he, "I had four servants." "Is that possible?" asked it was the duty of the first to being on the pipe; the second to light it; the third to light it; and what did the fourth do?" "The fourth smoked it—I never could bear tobacco myself."

Our houses should be like our shoes. If too small, they will pinch us; but, if too large, they will cause us to stumble and to trip.

A locomotive on a Western railroad has been adorned with the title, "I will love." This is more than many of the passengers can say at the end of their journey.

It is vain to stick your finger in the water, and, pulling it out, look for a hole; and equally vain to suppose that, however large a space you occupy, the world will miss you when you die.

Why is a horse like the letter G?—Because G makes it go. And what is the difference between this steersman and my aunt who spindles?—One is a every with an answer; the other is an end, Sir, with a queer eye.

A WESTERN FOLK.—"Mary and Mary a year ago—how many different with me—a youthful couple appeared at the gateway of the paragon in a town on a broad side from Harvard. Mounted on a white nag, they also claimed companionship with a big, elderly fellow with, to them, some valuable commodity. The morning, the golden youth left his lady and the boy, and pressed her up the avenue of stars leading to the paragon door, and entered the mansion. Some time passing, he waved his hand to the waiting driver, "Come on, my friend, I'll take the horse!" Guiding the steed to the door, the lady was received by her would-be lord, and soon "the boys were made one flesh," and the minister was left in possession of a goodly supply of beans.

BOOKING-NOTES DEALERS.—"Your wife does not pay any income-tax, I suppose, Mrs. Skinsney?" "Why not, Sir?" "I shouldn't think it was rich enough."

BLANKET-POPULARIZERS.—"All's well that ends well," as the gentleman said when he wrote the postscript to his letter. "Staunch for matrimony," as the chemist said when he took a bad slipper for a black draught.

"As you know it," as the servant said when he drank his master's grog. "A winter's tale," as the characterist said when the pauper asked for more rods.

What is the difference between land and pig-sticking?—One is a word with four letters; the other, kill with intent to kill.

MUSICAL CATHARTISM.—What is a rest?—Going out of the choir for refreshments during sermon time. What is called singing with "an understanding"?—Marking time on the floor with your feet.

What is a staccato movement?—Leaving the shaft in a huff because one is dissatisfied with the leader. What is a waltz?—A professor of music who pretends to know every thing about the waltz, while he can not read his ignorance.

Miss Thompson says that every remnant of body of hers may consider that she has passed the Cape of Good Hope.

"Working for Dave Linn" is defined to be making clothes for a new baby.

PRO PATRIA ET GLORIA

THE REV. DR. NOTT.

THE REV. DR. ELIPHALET NOTT, whose death occurred on the morning of January 23, was the veteran among American divines. He had nearly reached the end of his ninety-third year when he died. His life was more than coeval with that of the republic. Born in the midst of the exciting events which heralded our first Revolution, he lived to see the close of his second—a revolution more momentous than that of '76.

Dr. NOTT was born June 23, 1773. For almost two-thirds of a century he held the position in which he died—the Presidency of Union College. He was born of English ancestry. His father, a merchant, had been unfortunate in business, and was unable to give his son the advantages which at an earlier time he might have been. His mother, a woman of fine culture, exercised a great influence over his first intellectual training, and her discipline created in him an ardent desire to pursue his studies to the utmost practicable extent. While still a boy his brother, the Rev. Simeon Nott, of Franklin, Connecticut, adopted him as a member of his own family, and taught him the elements of Greek and Latin. At the age of sixteen he took charge of a school in Plainfield, where he received much aid and encouragement from one of the most learned divines of that day, the Rev. Dr. John Besant. In his twentieth year he entered Brown University, and, after being connected with that institution for the brief period of six weeks, graduated with the honor of the first degree in the arts.

Returning to Plainfield he commenced to study for the ministry under Dr. Besant, teaching school at the same time. In his twenty-fourth year he was licensed to preach. In 1798, one year later, he accepted a call from the First Presbyterian Church of Albany, where his ministry was very popular, and in every way a most successful success. His celebrated sermon, in 1804, on the death of HAZARD, who was a personal friend of the young evangelist, has long ranked among the best specimens of pulpit eloquence in the country.

The same year in which this sermon was delivered, and while Nott was only thirty-one years of age, he was invited to assume the Presidency of Union College, an institution which had had a separate existence for less than a decade, and was yet struggling to maintain itself. Dr. JONATHAN EDWARDS had been the second President; Dr. NOTT was the fourth. Up to this time the whole number of graduates by this year had been only 63. The College had no library, or philosophical apparatus, and was embarrassed with debt. "Some forty students," Dr. NOTT himself says in an address fifty years afterward, "staggered over the then shores of Schenectady, waiting for almsgiving par-pose in what was then a cabinet-maker's shop, with a single professor, was the whole of Union College." He lent himself to the work of removing all those disabilities and providing for those pressing needs. The State had as yet made no available appropriation, but through his energetic and persistent efforts a law was passed, in 1811, which may safely be said to have laid the foundation of the success of the institution. By this act, granting also liberal assistance to Hamilton and Columbia Colleges, Union College was to receive $200,000, to be appropriated to the payment of its debts, to the purchase of a library and apparatus, and to the erection of college edifices, etc.

From this time the College progressed rapidly. Dr. Nott has himself been the most munificent benefactor to the institution.—Through his direct bounty the College will realize over half a million of dollars. Dr. Nott had acquired a fortune through valuable inventions which he had contributed to society—among which was that of the first anthracite coal stove ever used in this country—and the College reaped a large harvest from his success.

To the last of his long life Dr. Nott retained a very large proportion of the vigor and enthusiasm which had characterized his early career. It was not until September, 1863, that he ceased to appear in the lecture-room. In 1862 he presided at the annual Commencement of the College. Since then his decline has been gradual, and death came to him as winter follows upon autumn, after the rich and abundant harvest of his had been fully reaped.

GEN. SHERMAN'S RECEPTION IN THE HOUSE.

We illustrate on this page the scene in the House of Representatives on the occasion of General SHERMAN'S reception by that body January 20. All business was suspended. The Speaker invited the General to the desk, where he was greeted with an outburst of applause such as has been rarely witnessed on that floor. The Speaker made the following address:

"Gentlemen of the House of Representatives—I have the honor of introducing to you this day, by your unanimous order, Major-General SHERMAN, so well known to you and to the whole civilized world as one of our most gallant and distinguished warriors and our most able and successful statesmen. On the brilliancy of his services for our beloved country I need not dwell, but, thank God, permit me to say to you, as I have said to the world, that he has been in the presence of every battle."

To which the General replied:

"Gentlemen of the House of Representatives—I am very much pleased to find that you have given me the honor of placing my name in such a part of this room, which I never entered before."

GENERAL SHERMAN'S RECEPTION IN THE UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 20, 1866.—[SKETCHED BY A. M'CALLUM.]

were in these galleries. I can simply say I thank you for my heart for the reception you have given me. I hope I may be able to do some good to the world, and I shall endeavor to do all I can to that end."

General SHERMAN, after being introduced by the Speaker to the members thronging around him, retired to a seat in the back part of the House, where he listened with great attention to Mr. RAYMOND'S able speech on reconstruction. He is said afterward to have, in a private conversation, cordially endorsed the sentiments uttered by Mr. RAYMOND.

RECEPTION OF THE SEVENTH REGIMENT.

We illustrate on page 108 the grand reception given on the evening of January 31 by the Seventh Regiment, National Guard, in this city. The Academy of Music and Irving Hall were connected together, thus forming one immense edifice for the occasion. The Academy was profusely decorated with flowers and drapery. Along the balustrades of the first tier, on the red field of drapery, were inscribed the names of those members of the regiment who rose to the higher ranks of the army during their term of service. Among these names were those of General GANNON, JENNINGS, DUNYEA, MCLINCH, GURNEY, SWANER, and McNEILL. The balustrades of the second tier were twined with evergreen and hung with white and gold drapery, relieved with touches of pink. Rastie baskets of flowers were placed here and there, overshadowing the snowy ground-work of the festoons, each panel of which bore the name of a soldier or a hero. On the third tier deep blue and gold and silver drapery, with white lettering, and knapsacks and flags were used with good effect.

Conspicuous on the stage was a scenic painting representing Fort Federal Hill, occupied by the regiment in 1862, with a view of Baltimore in the background. Irving Hall was used as a banquet saloon.

The principal feature of the evening's entertainment was the address delivered by Major-General JOHN A. DEX. He recounted the valuable services rendered by the Seventh Regiment at an early stage of the war, and again in 1862 and 1863, and their conduct in the great riot in New York city. The crowning glory of the regiment, he said, was the large number of officers it had furnished to other organizations. "I hold in my hand," he said, "a roll of five hundred and fifty-seven members of your regiment who received commissions in the army, the navy, or the volunteer service. Nine-tenths of the number were serving with the regiment when the war broke out. Three rose to the rank of Major-General, nineteen to the rank of Brigadier-General, twenty-nine to the rank of Colonel, and forty-six to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel. Of whose names are on this roll of honor are also in soldiers' graves. Others are moving about with mutilated limbs and with frames scarred by honorable wounds, the silent but expressive monuments of faithful and heroic service."

General DEX then reviewed the momentous events connected with the close of the war. As among the lessons of the war, he said, the first "is the great truth that the course of military successes is always from north to south—from frost and snow to flowers and sunshine. Our very instincts teach us that it must be so, and all history confirms it. It is not because the southern nature is less spirited or less capable of high and heroic achievement, but because the northern muscle, elaborated under a colder sky and through more invigorating influences of climate, acquires more compactness, tenacity, and strength, carrying with it (for the mental and physical conditions always assimilate) a greater moral power of endurance. Southern races are, for the most part, precipitate, impassioned, fiery, vehement, sometimes breaking down all opposition by force of their restless impetuosity. Northern races, on the other hand, are calm, deliberate, persistent, determined, and as immovable as a rock against which wind and storm are idly expending their fury." The political tone of the latter portion of his speech was conservative. He advocated forbearance even in the assertion of our undeniable rights.

At the conclusion of this address the floor was cleared for the dance, and hundreds of couples took their positions, and executed quadrilles, polkas, gallops, and valse until midnight. Among the prominent guests present at the reception were General BULLOCK, "Baldy" SMITH, ANDERSON, HAZEN, and FORTY.

We give on this page a representation of the Fifth Corps' badge presented on the evening before the ball to General R. N. BOWENMAN by his old comrades of 7th G Company, Seventh Regiment. It was manufactured by Messrs. L. AUSTIN & SONS, of this city, and is a Maltese cross of solid 18-carat gold, having on its face the coat-of-arms of the State of Maryland, surmounted by the national emblem, suspended to which by a white ribbon is the Seventh Regiment badge, the whole attached to a gold keeper, in the centre of which is a Brigadier-General's star set in brilliant.

General BOWENMAN, a native of Maryland, had been in business in this city for some years previous to the rebellion, at the commencement of which he was a Corporal in the Seventh, and as such served with them in the campaign of '61. On their return from Washington, on the recommendation of his Captain, he was commissioned First Lieutenant in the Eleventh New York Regiment, "Ellsworth's Zouaves." He fought at Bull Run, and was, in 1862, appointed Captain, but thrown out of commission by the displacement of his regiment. He fought with the Seventy-Third New York, without rank or pay, in the hard battles of the Peninsula campaign. In the Wilderness he fought with the rank of Colonel, and when General DEXTER was wounded he took the place of the latter at the head of the Maryland Brigade. This brigade had become attached to the Fifth Corps. August 24, 1864, he received a wound in the attack on the Weldon Railroad. In the battle of "Five Forks" he was again wounded. His brigade in that battle captured 1700 prisoners, of which his own regiment took 400. He retired from the service with the rank of Brigadier-General, and was appointed Deputy-collector of the port of Baltimore.

THE SINGULAR MAN.

THERE was a young man, you may think very strange, But someone or other a little damaged; And if it be true, then as I have been told, He was once a more infant, but age made him old.

His legs were the oddest that ever you knowed, His mouth stood square 'twixt his nose and his chin; And whenever he spoke, it was with his voice, And in talking he always made some sort of noise.

He'd an arm on each side, to use when he'd pleas'd, He never worked hard, when he lived at his ease; Two legs he had got to make him complete, But what was most strange, at each end were his feet.

His legs, as folks say, he could use at his will, And when he was walking, he never stood still; If you had but seen him, you'd laugh till you hurt, For one leg or footer would always go first.

Another strange thing as e'er I did meet, Was when he was hungry he always did eat; He drank when he was dry, and then, if you'd note, Whenever he drank always went down his throat.

If this whimsical fellow had a river to cross, He'd no doubt get over, he staid where he was; And though he ne'er went off the dry ground, So great was his luck that he never was drown'd.

Another strange thing about him I'd tell, For when he was sick he was always well; He gave a deep sigh, then up he would slide, And sneeze or other this odd fellow died.

But the reason he died, and the cause of his death, Was simply, poor soul, for the want of more breath; And now he is left in the cold earth to moulder, If he had lived a day longer, he'd have been a day older.

From the London Examiner.

This is another of those pleasant tales in which Miss Mulock (henceforth to be known as Mrs. Craik) speaks, out of a generous heart, the purest truths of life. In the clothing of the skeleton of the story with warm flesh and blood the author of "John Halifax" uses her own magic arts. The chief of them are her sympathy with all that is right and kind in human intercourse, and her habitual solution of all problems of life by reference only to the highest grounds of action. ... story, which has "Fiat Voluntas Tua" for its motto, her main thought is that the most hopeless lot in life is to be accepted without murmur, but that there is no passive resignation in the right saying, Thy Will be done. For acquiescence in God's will implies the careful use of what powers are left, however feeble they may seem, in life-long endeavor to procure the doing of it. There are more touches of pathos than of humor in the tale, which may ask some tears in the true reading of it.

THE IMMENSE SUCCESS Which has already covered the efforts of the Publishers proclaims this work to be

"THE PEOPLE'S HISTORY," "THE BOOK FOR THE MILLION," "The Cheapest and Best History Published."

Among all the writers of America perhaps no one could be found more capable of writing a history for the people than Mrs. Ann S. Stephens. No person who has read the historical romances which first gave this lady her reputation will doubt her ability to produce a history as once truthful and brilliant. Without deviating from facts she has spread the charm of her great descriptive powers over actual events, throwing them upon the pages of history with a distinctness and fervor that gives them the charm of romance, while every battle she describes is as truthfully delineated as the duldest writer could give them, and each event can be depended upon as authentic in fact and detail.

REASONS WHY THIS HISTORY EXCELS ALL OTHERS.

- 1st. It is a well-written and truthful narrative of events as they occurred, and not a political text-book, nor designed to pander to party feelings or to party interests.
2d. It is not a mere expression of private opinions, or denunciations or commendations of individuals; but a clear and lucid exposition of the facts of war, leaving to the readers' judgment the privilege of deciding upon the merits or demerits of the actors engaged.
3d. It is the only history published containing the portraits of the Confederate officers engaged in the War.
4th. It is the only history containing a complete Chronological Record.
5th. It is the best printed, most handsomely illustrated work of 1150 pages now being published, at the exceedingly low price for which it is sold.

Cost to Subscribers. BOTH VOLUMES, Bound in Cloth, Marbled Edges..... $5 00 Bound in Embossed Leather..... 7 00 Bound in Sheep (Library Style)..... 7 00 Bound either in Embossed Leather or Sheep, Gilt Edges..... 8 00 Specimen Copies mailed on Receipt of price.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP,
COMPOSED OF
IODIDE POTASSIUM,
WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID
EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL
ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY
WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D.,
Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant
Physician in the Blackwell's Island
Hospital, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Val-unteer Depot, under Governor Edwin D.
Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup
HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopeless, inasmuch as frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigations of the liberal-minded and scientific to come which have been parallel at the present day.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.
Some say, "Your cure are too quick," while others doubt their permanency, and think that disease can only be cured by the "slow, recuperative process of Nature."

This is our reply: In health the body, like a well-balanced scale, is in a state of equilibrium. But when, from any cause, down goes one side of the scale, we have the effect of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (hereditary) Diseases transmitted from Parent to Child.

PARALYSIS.
It is as universally admitted that Convulsions, Lameness, Stiffness, and all other forms of paralysis in the various forms of Paralysis, that we need not reiterate that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.
INDIGESTION, WEAKNESS AT STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, MILDAIGNESS.

SCROFULA.
SKIN, KING'S EVIL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERYSIPELAS, ULCERATION, SALT RHEUM.

This is the ESSENTIAL AND ACQUISITORY, filling life with valuable energy, is by all usual medical remedies, incurable.

RHEUMATISM.
LARDERNESS, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, SCIAT-
IC COLIC, &c.

If there is any disease in which the Constitution Life Syrup is a sovereign, it is in Rheumatism and its kindred affections. The most intense pains are almost instantly allayed—excessive swellings are reduced. Cases, three-to six weeks, of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by it.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
Purges the system entirely from all the evil effects of Mercury, restores the lost breath, and cures the Weak Joints and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Calomel is said to produce. It hardens Spongy Gums, and restores the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin, like
ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES,

And all other affections of this kind, which so much disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases,
Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or
Scalp, no remedy has ever proved so equal.

Most Patients upon the female sex, depending upon a diseased action of the Liver, are very unpleasant to the young wife and mother. A few bottles of Constitution Life Syrup will correct the action, and remove the disease, which is directly under the skin.

Constitution Life Syrup.
As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the Life Syrup
stands unrivalled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR
Are liable to the same diseases. Nature and Science have made the Constitution Life Syrup
for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD
Foods feed healthy men and women; and if the constitution is sagacious to youth, disease and early death is the result.
Do not delay when the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP
IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured.

Allcock's Porous Plasters

A celebrated physician says he was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these Plasters. He affirms that headache is cured by one worn just below the breast-bone; that one placed over the navel will cure hysterics as well as dyspepsia, and affections of the bowels.

CURE OF YARBOOSE YIELD.
CITY POINT, Va., January 24, 1865.

T. ALCOCK & Co.—Being your notice in the Police Gazette, I got four of your Porous Plasters, and placed them on the parts where the pain was most severe, and in less than twelve hours could walk as well as ever. I could hardly believe it, I was so well pleased. I wanted to see if the lameness would come back on me or not, so I did none walking that day than I had done in a week.
The next day I had some pain in my hip; but I put on a plaster there, and in two hours the pain was all gone; nor have I felt it since. Certainly they are the best application for the relief and cure of pain in the joints and back, and for vertigo or enlarged veins, I have ever known; and I would not be without them on any account.

Yours, truly,
JOSEPH GATWOOD.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1856 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disagreeable cough. I had for some months previous thought that a proposition, having for its base the inside bark of a white pine, might be so compensated as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in disease attended by a copiousness of mucus, I composed a small quantity of the Medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in seasonable doses. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Lehighville, N. H., who had been suffering for some weeks with a bad cough, accompanied by a white cold, and had failed several times with blood. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She took about ten boxes of it, and got well. In November, 1859, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivalled.—Boston Journal.

This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the test of eleven years in the New England States, where the merits have become so well known. It cures sore throats, coughs, diphtheria, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. It is a remedy for diabetes, bleeding from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel; and for piles and scurvy it will be found valuable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicine generally.

FIRST PREMIUM IMPROVED
$5 SEWING $5 MACHINE.

The Embodiment of Practical Utility and Extreme Simplicity.

Originally patented May 17, 1856; Improvement patented June 8, 1865. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with cast-iron stand, a most wonderful and simple mechanism, so simple in its operation, that the greatest novice, and under favorable circumstances, will be enabled to sew with perfect accuracy and speed. Makes the strongest-stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity, making STAYING STITCHES to each revolution of the Wheel. Will cut, sew, hem, button, make, sew, up, &c. Sewing-machine made and warranted not to get out of order in 5 years. It has taken the precedence at Paris, and received the approval of all the principal journals and of those who have seen it. It is the most perfect sewing-machine that has ever been invented, and is the only one that has received a medal of first class at the Exposition. Also, the only sewing-machine at the same price as any other machine.
For the dressmaker it is invaluable; for the household it supplies a want which is not met by any other machine. With single or double thread, it sews very easily, with a common needle, makes the run and zig-zag stitch exactly like hand-sewing. —See Fig. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION.

IT is now nearly eighty years since the Constitution of the United States was framed. The sagacity which moulded it is attested by the fact that it has adapted itself so long to the necessities of a nation which has increased and extended beyond precedent. No written national constitution has endured so long and prosperously. But wise and skillful as it is, it was the work of men, and, like all human work, it was not perfect. The fathers who made it foresaw that Time would reveal the necessity of change in some of its details, while its great principles of Justice and Liberty would remain forever immutable. They provided, therefore, for its amendment by means which should not in the least degree imperil the stability of the Government established by it, and various amendments have been already adopted.

The experience of eighty years has shown that in two cardinal points the Constitution was defective. These points were not unknown to its framers; but they were those which made the adoption of any constitution doubtful, and they saw that, to form the Union, some concession was essential. The instrument, therefore, did not speak plainly and decisively of either point. It did not in terms destroy all claim of State Sovereignty, and it did not secure the equal rights of all the people of the country; and it is now clear that from that double obscurity the civil war proceeded. The injustice was continued by some of the States, and the doctrine of State Sovereignty was simultaneously incalculated in those States that a convenient constitutional pretext might be found for destroying the nation in order to maintain the injustice. When the crisis came the rebellion justified itself as constitutional, and so thoroughly had the public mind been poisoned that the power of resistance was almost paralyzed. But it rallied, and the struggle was fierce and long, ending in the assertion written in the life-blood of thousands and thousands of American citizens that the doctrine of State Sovereignty is not to be tolerated under any pretense, and that equal rights shall be universal.

It is obvious that after such a struggle the Constitution must be amended; for if we are to have a Constitution it ought certainly to express the most solemn convictions of the people sealed by their blood. And if the Constitution is ever to be enlarged or modified in any manner now is the time. The war is the ghastly proof of the weakness of certain parts of the instrument, and we can never strengthen those parts so securely as now. It is because this is the universal national conviction that the emancipation amendment was so readily accepted.

But the moment that was adopted it changed certain fundamental provisions, and made others necessary. Thus the basis of representation and taxation has hitherto been the whole number of free persons, and, excluding untaxed Indians, three-fifths of all other persons. But the emancipation amendment makes the three-fifths five-fifths who have no political power, and, if they are to be thus counted, a gross inequality of representation is created in favor of those who are most alienated from the Government; and, still further, the consequence will be that, in the very section which is thus unjustly preferred, nearly half the population will be taxed without any representation whatever. An amendment to avoid so absurd a result is therefore imperatively necessary; and, under such circumstances, to complain of "tinkering the Constitution," is to complain of simple justice. The New Hampshire Democratic Convention and the Virginia Legislature are opposed to any constitutional amendment. But such opposition merely proves both its justice and necessity.

In amending the Constitution it will be always remembered by wise men that it is the fundamental law, and should contain only permanent provisions. Temporary objects are better attained by Congressional acts. Yet the fundamental law of the United States will be manifestly imperfect until it guarantees equal rights for every one of the people. We shall gladly hail and support every practicable measure toward this great result; and, meanwhile, let every man who knows that peace and progress are sure only as they are founded upon justice, do what he can to persuade public opinion to believe it.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

THE last solemn rite in commemoration of ABRAHAM LINCOLN has now been performed. As the historians at the Grecian games told the traditions of the country to the assembled Greeks, so the historian of the United States has recited the latest chapter of its story to the Congress and all the chief officers of the nation. The orator was most wisely chosen, and his discourse illustrates the immense advantage to a public speaker of severe literary training. Mr. BACON, of whom we last week published a portrait and sketch, is so accustomed to a comprehensive view of the sequence and relation of events, and to a graphic relation of them, that he treated the story of the war with thoroughness of grasp, compactness and felicity of description, and a severe but true eloquence. His words are exactly chiseled, and the force and precision of his survey of the civil war in its causes and relations will secure a permanent value to this discourse.

The character of LINCOLN himself we could have wished estimated with a subtler sympathy. But it is hard for a man of purely intellectual temperament like the historian heartily to appreciate a simpler and more emotional nature like that of the late President. Posterity will see in him a greater man than his contemporaries can acknowledge. In earlier days the poetic mist of increasing time would have enlarged him in the popular mind to a demi-god. And among all the incidents of his life none will be more fondly prized and remembered than that which THOMAS NORTON has illustrated in this paper.

On Tuesday, April 4, the day after the capture of Richmond by the Union army, President LINCOLN entered the city. He came up as far as Varina in the River Queen, and was thence drawn over in an ambulance to Richmond, where he met Admiral PORTER, who had by that time reached the wharf in the Malvern. About eleven o'clock the President walked up the streets of the late rebel capital, preceded by half a dozen marines, and accompanied by Admiral PORTER, Captain BELT, and some citizens who had been apprised of his arrival. Crowds thronged the streets, and chief and eager among them the emancipated race, which called Heaven's benediction upon their Liberator and Friend as he passed by. Ten days afterward those sad eyes that had seen the end of the great labor closed, and the anxious heart that beat for all his countrymen, was stilled forever. The nation that loved him mourns for him, and will long mourn. It will do more. It will secure to the almost the Liberty which, in the name of the nation, ABRAHAM LINCOLN proclaimed.

TAXATION OF OUR PUBLIC DEBT.

IT was well known at the time, that many of our leading capitalists, among them Mr. ABRAMS, were lately examined by the United States Revenue Commissioners on the question whether or not it is expedient for the General Government to impose a direct tax on each of its public debt as was held by citizens of the United States, the amount received to be applied to a sinking fund intended for the ultimate payment of the principal of the debt. The ostensible reason for the imposition of this tax was the supposed necessity for countervailing legislation to meet the growing disposition in favor of a tax by the several States on the income derived from those securities. A report having been made on this subject to Congress since our last issue was made up, the injunction of secrecy imposed on the press is no longer in force, and we are now at liberty to notice this very important proceeding. The draft bill accompanying the report imposes an annual tax of one per cent. on the face of that portion of the debt which is payable in currency, and seven-tenths of one per cent. on the principal of the gold-bearing bonds. The tax is equivalent to a reduction of the rate of interest on the Seven-Thirties of one per cent. annually, and on the Five-Twenties and Ten-Forties each of seven-tenths of one per cent. annually, thus leaving the rate of interest on the Five-Twenty bonds 5 7/10 per cent. instead of 6, and on the Ten-Forty bonds only 4 7/10 per cent. instead of 5 per cent., an unjust discrimination against the latter. The income derived from this diminished rate of interest is left subject to the income tax of ten per cent. imposed by the United States, and is made subject to such further income or other tax as shall hereafter "be equally imposed and levied upon all incomes, or directly upon all real and personal property within the United States, subject to taxation." The bill by its terms excepts from its operation that portion of the debt which is held abroad, supposed to amount to $300,000,000, but applies to the residue, upward of $2,000,000,000, held at home. It is thus seen that the value of those securities will be greatly impaired if the bill pass, unless it shall be found that the exemption secured by the bill against the schemes of demagogues in the several States amounts to a fair equivalent for this forced reduction in the rate of interest. The arguments presented in the report of Mr. HAYES, one of the Commissioners (for he alone is directly responsible for the measure) in favor of the passage of the bill, are founded in part on the testimony given by those capitalists, a synopsis of which is published with the report; but we see nothing in the evidence thus taken to justify so large a reduction in the rate of interest, and hence we infer that the justification for it is found, if any exist, in the mass of testimony not reported, taken by the Commissioners, to ascertain the effect of present taxation on the industry and future growth of the country. We regret that we are not able to present a view of this testimony, but we can not shut our eyes to the conviction that the fear of State taxation is not the only motive for the bill, but that it is founded also on the apprehension that the burden of the debt will be found too oppressive. The Report states: "Our debt is not excessively large compared with our means of payment. The interest paid is unreasonable and extravagant." "A general system of indirect taxation on a scale as large as ours will either be abandoned for a better, or it will reduce the masses to pauperism and dependence," etc. The payments for local and general taxes are stated at $597,000,000, or within $112,161,781 of the entire net earnings of the people of the United States for 1860, which are quoted with approbation from the Social Science Review at $709,161,781, or 5 per cent. on the whole amount of capital. By adding to the amount of Government tax the per-centages stated as necessarily charged by wholesale and retail dealers before commodities reach consumers, and the payments amount to $112,161,781 over and above those entire net earnings.

An examination of these figures presents the momentous fact that our annual payments for and by reason of all taxes require a constant invasion of the capital of those who pay, and hence the allegation in the report that "the interest paid is unreasonable and extravagant," having reference of course to the amount of the debt. The remedies proposed are:

- 1. Such a tax as will secure a reduction in the rate of interest, the amount to be applied to a sinking fund for the ultimate payment of the principal of the debt.
2. The imposition of a tax on the real and personal property in the United States according to its assessed value, for which purpose an amendment of the Constitution is proposed. This will relieve much of the industry of the United States from the burdens upon it which are now directly imposed.
3. A resort to specie payments, by means of a reduction in the weight of metal equivalent to the present difference between gold and our legal-tender currency.

If measures of this sweeping character are necessary for meeting the payments of the Government they must of course be resorted to; but we have been accustomed to suppose, and we still think—although without the lights which the great body of testimony taken by the Commissioners furnishes—that the resources of the country are ample for this purpose without resorting to this extraordinary measure. It has already been mentioned that Mr. HAYES is solely responsible for the bill and report now undergoing examination in Congress; but all the Commissioners recommended that his report should be laid before that body, on the strength of which Mr. McCULLOUGH sent it in, specially recommending its consideration, but stating that he disagreed with its objects. The report states that "the majority of the commission upon a partial consideration did not accede to the proposition to recommend the passage of the bill;" but this guarded language shows that they neither dissented from it nor were willing to state that they were unfavorable to its passage. They merely did not agree "to recommend its passage." It was the possible fear that the foundations of the Government credit might be seriously shaken which induced the great caution that has been observed in introducing this measure to the deliberations of Congress and the country.

If the alleged discontent with the exemption of the bonds from State taxation is in danger of being aggravated by the action of demagogues into a feeling calculated to impair the value of those securities, and if taxation of the debt by the General Government is necessary to countervail this mischievous tendency, it would seem that a much lower tax might accomplish the purpose. The sinking fund created out of this tax constitutes the sole provision for the ultimate payment of the principal of the debt. While the holders of the bonds must contribute in the shape of taxes to the payment of interest they alone are called upon by this bill to pay the principal to the exemption of foreign owners. It can scarcely be necessary, under any view of the case, to saddle the whole principal of the debt upon the holders of it here, the consideration for it being the certain and secure payment of the lower rate of interest adjusted by the bill. On the contrary, every interest in the country ought to be taxed alike for this object, the accomplishment of which constitutes the highest and most sacred duty of an American citizen.

DEMOCRATIC SPRING FASHIONS.

THE Democratic Conventions of New Hampshire and Connecticut have laid down the Democratic platform for the spring elections. Upon the one important point of reorganization they are logical and consistent. They declare that the Legislatures of the late rebel States having revoked their pretended Acts of Secession, "said States are of right entitled to all the privileges and powers of States belonging to and exercised by them previous to said pretended Acts of Secession." This is the ground which the New York World took early last spring, before the complete surrender of the rebels. "Throw down your arms," cried the World to its political allies in rebellion, "repeal your Acts of Secession, elect Senators and Representatives, hurry to Washington, and demand a voice in the organization of Congress; and let us see who will dare to oppose you." Probably it has seen. Probably it has discovered that the loyal American people, who were strong enough to conquer rebel arms, were also shrewd enough not to be fooled by rebel arts. Probably it will continue to behold the same spectacle for some time yet.

And now let every honest citizen of Connecticut and New Hampshire, as well as of all the other States, understand exactly what this Democratic platform is. It asserts that South Carolina and Mississippi, having laid down their arms and repealed their Acts of Secession, are again in the Union exactly as New York or New Hampshire are. If this be true military commanders have no right to control the civil authorities in those States as they now do. Yet if the United States troops were withdrawn, every loyal Union man in those States would be in danger of his life. That, of course, does not trouble the Democracy, which, as its party sympathies during the war were for the rebels in those States, can not be expected to care for Union men now that the war is over.

Again, if the Democratic position be correct, the Freedmen's Bureau must be abolished, and the laboring population of the late rebel States, which at every hazard was wholly loyal during the war, must be abandoned to the Black Codes and the Vagrant laws, as well as to the unbridled wrath and vengeance of those who bitterly hate them. The consequences may be imagined.

If the Democratic plan be adopted, the men who are still hot with hate of the Government and the Union, who frankly confess it, and who are elected for that very reason, must be admitted unquestioned to Congress to take a supreme share in the control of a Government whose destruction they have long and farrelly attempted, and which they now regard as a conquering and alien power. He who doubts that they would strain every nerve to involve the country in foreign wars, and to ruin its credit by insisting upon compensation for the losses of the war at the South, has little knowledge of human nature or of history.

These Democratic Conventions solemnly declare that they support the President. Let us see if they do. If, as they claim, every late rebel State is of right entitled to exercise every privilege it did before the rebellion, certainly the President has no right to override their civil authority with the national military power. Yet he does so. He retains General TARRANT in Virginia, who supersedes the action of the State Legislature in certain cases. Do the Connecticut Democracy approve? The President sustains General SICKLES in South Carolina, and Governor OAK submits. Do the New Hampshire Democracy approve? The President sustains the Freedmen's Bureau. Do the Connecticut Democracy approve? The President favors impartial suffrage in Tennessee. Do the New Hampshire Democracy approve? The President approves a Constitutional Amendment limiting the basis of representation to actual voters. The New Hampshire Democracy oppose with true Tory instinct "all proposed or contemplated amendments to the Constitution." The President holds the privilege of the writ of HABEAS CORPUS suspended in several States. The New Hampshire Democracy declares that "it is a right which must be preserved." If the States in question are entitled to their position before the rebellion, how do the Connecticut and New Hampshire Democracy support a President who denies them that position, and who insists that only men known to be "loyal" shall be admitted to Congress?

Our pleasant but somewhat "played-out" friends the Democrats, so-called because of their hostility to every distinctive Democratic principle, are at their old tricks. Three years ago they resolved that they were in favor of the war, but were opposed to carrying it on. Now they resolve that they support the President but are opposed to what he does. But, really, as the old judge said to the young lawyer that the court might be supposed to know some law, so the loyal people of this country, who have saved its Government from armed rebellion at the South and Copperhead sympathy at the North, may be supposed by this time to understand the huge political imposture called the Democratic party. From the moment the people of the United States, plainly seeing whether this party was driving the country, put it out of power, its oracles have regularly proclaimed with owlish solemnity that we are all going to the "demonition bow-wow." Journals which unscrupulously supported HORATIO SARGENT, who declared he would give up the Union rather than Slavery, and which strenuously advocated the election of GEORGE H. FENNER, an open disunionist, against ABRAHAM JOHNSON, now inform the people who elected ABRAHAM JOHNSON that they are his true and only supporters and the bosom friends of the Union. We are in great peril, they tell as plaintively, as they have told us for five years past, but all can be avoided upon one little condition. If the people would only comprehend! If they would only see that to put the country out of danger it is only necessary to put the political allies of JEFFERSON DAVIS and the legatees of the Chicago Convention into power! In a word, if they would only believe—and with the experience of the last five years how can they help it?—that the Democratic party are the sole friends of the Union and of the Government and of ANDREW JOHNSON! Yes, if you only believed a green cheese to be the moon! When they do believe that, the people will intrust the Government to the political allies of its enemies, and not until then.

COLORADO.

The Senators from Colorado have been admitted to the floor of the Senate, and their admission is warmly urged in some quarters. But before that is done Congress will doubtless thoroughly investigate the facts of the case.

It will then appear that in March, 1864, an enabling act was passed by Congress, but the people of the Territory, at a legal election in September of that year, decided against the admission under the Constitution proposed. In the summer of 1865 an informal call was issued by the Territorial Committees of both parties for a Constitutional Convention, and an election was held—or, rather, since there was no law, an expression of opinion was taken, for delegates to the Convention, and subsequently for a Constitution and a Legislature. The Constitution was adopted by a majority of the votes cast, and the Legislature was chosen in pursuance of the Constitution. The Legislature elected Messrs. EVANS and CHAFFER Senators, and they went to Washington. Upon their arrival they requested the President to proclaim Colorado a State. But the President very properly replied that his whole authority in the matter was derived from the enabling act, and as the Constitution submitted to the people of the Territory in pursuance of that act had been declined by them, its force had expired, and with it his authority. He therefore referred them to Congress.

The whole proceeding, therefore, from the call of the Committees to the election of the Senators, must be regarded as a petition of certain people of the Territory that it be erected into a State; and the labor of Congress is made all the more difficult because it must explore every detail. An enabling act is a convenient method devised by Congress to ascertain the wishes and conditions of a Territory in regard to a State Constitution. If there shall appear to be a sufficient population; if a majority, upon a fair vote, accept a Constitution framed by delegates elected in pursuance of the enabling act; and if the conditions of the Constitution are in the judgment of Congress republican—then it may, at its pleasure, admit the Territory as a State. But it is absolutely unbound except by its own discretion. It may refuse to admit a State formed in virtue of an enabling act if the Constitution is unsatisfactory, and it may admit a State without an enabling act if it is fully satisfied upon all those points upon which it is the purpose of an enabling act to satisfy it.

Now it is very strongly urged that the whole population of the Territory of Colorado is not more than 25,000—men, women, and children; that of the 5874 votes cast for the Constitution under the call of the committees there was a majority in its favor of only 115, and that at least 2000 men refrained from voting on the ground of the illegality of the election. The Constitution thus adopted excludes colored men from the suffrage, although we have the testimony of a miner to the fact that such men enjoy the benefit of the Homestead Act, preempt lands of the United States, discover and mine the Government mineral lands, have never been deprived of any rights by the district laws of the miners, and are quiet, industrious people, and many of them rich. Moreover, this Constitution disfranchised them at the very moment they were volunteering into the army.

These statements will, of course, be satisfactorily proved or disproved before Congress acts finally upon the question of admission. The action of the voters upon the Constitution was not authorized by Congress, and merely informally expresses the wishes of certain inhabitants of the Territory. This fact being borne in mind, we may all trust Congress to see that no injustice is done any resident of Colorado.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE SUFFRAGE.

No man who knew the White House in the dreary days of PIERCE and BUCHANAN could have believed that in less than six years after they left it, a man who in their time was a slaveholder and a Southern democrat would stand in that House as President and say to a delegation of colored men, headed by a fugitive slave and pleading for absolute equal rights:

"I would it were so that all you advocated could be done in the twinkling of an eye;" and adding, that they were pursuing the same end but by different means. We confess that we are more cheered by this fact and these words than surprised or disheartened that the President does not agree as to methods and times with Mr. DOUGLASS and his friends.

The President's position is plain. Let us see if it is one that should bitterly disappoint or discourage those who believe that an honorable and peaceful Union can be established only upon equal rights. He is not opposed to impartial suffrage, but he thinks it better that those who are now vested with the political power in any State should decide when and how it is expedient to extend it to others. Looking at the actual situation, he is of opinion that the morbid hate of the colored race, upon the part of the whites, in the unorganized States, and the fact that the colored population there is in general landless, homeless, ignorant, and habitually dependent, are sufficient reasons for not enfranchising them by what he regards as an unconstitutional exercise of power. The consequences of such an action, however just in itself, he considers would be a conflict of races, and even were it probable that the blacks could hold their own against the whites in the contest, he supposes, and he is doubtless right in the supposition, that in such an event the hostility of the whole country would be aroused against the unfortunate colored population and postpone indefinitely the establishment of equal rights. It is better therefore, he thinks, as a matter of expediency, to maintain the personal freedom of the colored race, to give them land and protect them in its cultivation, to defend all their civil rights by the arm of the United States, to promote their education, and by all these means to enable them to acquire a habit of self-support and self-respect, to show the whites that they are a permanent and integral part of the population, to allow time to soothe the angry passions that follow so fierce a war, and by making it the overruling interest of the present political community in which they live to enfranchise them, to secure that result by consent and not by arbitrary enactment.

Now if, as many assert, he proposed to leave the freedmen at the South naked to their enemies by withdrawing the troops, by abolishing the Freedmen's Bureau, and by restoring the privileges of the habeas corpus—if, in a word, the President were in favor of the Democratic policy in the matter, he would be scorned and repudiated by every humane and honorable man. But it is not so. He thinks and says a great deal more. He virtually says to the freedmen: "The United States will secure to you all that the ballot would secure until the ballot is given to you by those who, in my judgment and in that of Mr. THOMPSON STEVENS, alone have the right to give it. But I will do all that I can to make them see that it is their interest to give it to you by recommending, as I have frequently done, that representation shall be based upon the number of voters. I do not propose to leave you defenseless to your enemy paraded in political power. I do not mean to arm the strong or cast down the weak. And if I can not do what you wish directly and in your way, I shall yet do it indirectly and in my way."

This is certainly an intelligible and consistent position. Its weak point, however, is evident. It makes the Freedmen's Bureau stand in the place of the ballot to the colored population of the late Slave States. But it admits to Congress those who deprive the freedmen of the ballot, and allows them to vote whether the Bureau shall be continued. If the enemies of the freedman shall at this time have an increased representation based upon his freedom—as they will have unless the unorganized States be required to adopt the amendment—we shall have done what we can to deprive the freedman of the only defense we promise him. And when the States in question are thus disproportionately represented, and succeed by various combinations in overthrowing the Bureau, what can abate this nation from the enormous guilt of conferring freedom upon a race, yet, while it had the power, refusing to secure it? And when the late slaves are once more wholly in the hands of the late masters, the victims of Black Codes and Vagrant Laws, how will the President have led them through the Red Sea of war and bondage to a fairer future of liberty and peace?

But no man, however he may differ with the President as to methods and details, has any right to doubt the sincerity of his purpose; and no intelligent man but must applaud and adopt his words, "that he might differ with some of his friends, and should feel wholly at liberty to differ, and to state the ground of his contrary belief or opinion; but he considered himself identified with the great Union party, and had no desire or intention of being foud outside." For ourselves we believe that ANDREW JOHNSON means what he says: "God knows that any thing I can do in the mighty process by which the great end is to be reached—any thing I can do to elevate the races, to soften and ameliorate their condition, I will do; and to be able to do so is the sincere wish of my heart."

JOHN BRIGHT.

In his late speech at Birmingham Mr. BASCOM expressed the opinion that education is more likely to follow than precede political enfranchisement. He said: "I have just seen a report of a speech delivered last night by Mr. WALKER, who has recently returned from the United States. Speaking of education, he says that, taking the nine Northern States to contain 10,000,000, and half of the people, he found there were 40,000 schools, and an average attendance of 2,133,000 children, the total cost of their education being $9,000,000. In the four Western States, with a population of 6,100,000, there are 37,000 schools, and an average attendance of nearly 1,500,000 scholars, at a cost of $1,250,000. Thus, in a population of 10,000,000, there are 77,000 schools, to which every poor child can go, at a cost of $2,000,000 schooling." Mr. BASCOM thought this rather creditable to our American cousins. "But," he added, "if the franchise in the United Kingdom were as wide as it is in these Northern and Free States, within five years there would be established in this country a system of education as universal as that which produces such admirable results among our cousins across the Atlantic."

In his subsequent speech at Rochdale Mr. BRIGHT entered in detail into the argument for the political enfranchisement of "that great section of five millions of families;" "this wretched people, without whom England would be nothing but a power which a division of the Continental army might subdue and annex." He claims the suffrage for them, however, not as men or British subjects, but as a class; and in that he touches the exact difference between our government and the British. Ours is a government of equal citizens; the British of balancing classes; and the present problem of "Reform" in England is how to adjust the representation of the most numerous class to that of the other classes, so as not to put the control entirely into the hands of one class.

It seems to be probable that the persistent and intelligent agitation of Mr. BASCOM will compel EARL RUSSELL to signalize the close of his public career by a Reform bill which will widely extend the suffrage in England.

LITERARY.

MRS. GASKELL'S "Wives and Daughters" is now being by the HARPER'S. It was somewhat in course of publication before it was suspected or known to be long, and the deep interest it excited, with the curiosity as to the author, was a most gratifying confirmation of her genuine talent. The art of the story is remarkable. It is finished with a facility and dramatic skill and propriety which are very unusual among present novelists. It is not a sketch boldly dashed in, nor a caricature, nor a striking exaggeration, compensating for its intrinsic defects by its picturesqueness and eloquence and humor, but it is a picture of life and character naturally conceived and elaborately and conscientiously made out, with the grace and spirit and facility of a master. Some of its characters are so vividly drawn that they rise almost to the rank of permanent creations, like Mrs. Gilson and Miss Browning; but the great excellence of the tale is the delicacy and sustained skill with which the action of the various characters upon each other is described. It is wonderfully successful in showing the complexity of human character, the play of mixed motives; the inconsistencies and fallacies which constantly check respect, yet are themselves modified in turn, and do not prove those who have them to be wholly monsters or criminals. And the contrast is exquisitely rendered, although never emphasized by the author, between superficial, unsteady, fascinating characters of good impulses and kindly but selfish feelings; and the simple, sweet steadfastness of character rooted in principle. The humor of the Miss Browning household is delightful, and recalls the pleasant passages of "Cranford," while the entire action of the story has perfect freedom and ease of movement. The morality is of the truest kind, whatever the actual end may have been; for the story was not quite finished, although its necessary conclusion is plainly seen. The death of the author with the pen yet in her hand gives a touching and tender interest to the work. But its essential merit will always give it place among the best of contemporary novels.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

February 6. In the Senate, Mr. SUMNER continued his speech on the Constitutional Amendment. In the House, the substitute for the Freedmen's Bureau bill offered by the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs was passed, 196 to 53. The substitute differs from the Senate bill only in minor details, such as the salary of officers, &c.—The bill giving the consent of Congress to the transfer of Berkeley and Jefferson Counties from Virginia to West Virginia was passed. February 7. In the Senate, the House bill to prevent the release of registers to American vessels whose registers were changed during the war was called up. Mr. Sherman opposed the bill as too severe. It would only injure the American Marine. The bill was passed, 31 to 11.—Mr. Wilson's joint resolution to amend the Constitution so as to provide that slaveholders shall never receive compensation for manumitted slaves was referred to the Committee of Fifteen. Mr. Wilson made a lengthy argument in favor of the resolution.—The Constitutional Amendment being in order, Mr. Fessenden replied to some objections which had been urged against it in the Senate and the House. He did not think the amendment subversive of republican principles as Mr. Sumner had argued. He did not think either that the Committee of Fifteen had transcended their proper functions, as had been urged in the House, in reporting the Amendment. The subject had been referred to them, and they could not evade it. He had as much reverence for the Constitution as another man, but he did not deem it more perfect than those deemed it who had made it. Why did they make provision for its amendment? If there ever could arise an occasion for revising the provisions of that instrument, it was now. We had had a great war which had resulted in the emancipation of slaves. The event had been farmed as a slave who had to be adapted to the substance of slavery. This was the case in regard to representation. It might be objected that the Constitution in this instance excluded the colored population from the vote. It was made free to be of the whole number of population to be counted as a basis of representation. The territory had existed, the slaves had been freed contrary to the intention of those among whom they were bred, and the prejudice against the negroes as a class would exclude them from all political rights. Leaving the Constitution as it is there would be representation by all, but there would be an entire class excluded from any vote in the government, and therefore from any real representation. It would be that the power of the disfranchised portion would be increased by just that amount of representation which was denied to the blacks. Why not propose a simple amendment in the terms proposed by the Senate from Missouri, to do away with all distinction on account of color or race in all the States of the Union, so far as regards civil and political rights and franchises? He would prefer something of that kind at once. There were not many Senators within the sound of his voice who would not prefer it, yet the Committee had not recommended such a provision, and he stood there to approve what the Committee had recommended. The position of the Missouri Senator would compel the Southern States either to trust their suffrage or extend it to be for their own safety. The Senator from Massachusetts would hardly contend that at this time the mass of the population of the Western States were fit to exercise the right of suffrage. No man looking at the question would seriously entertain the idea that those to whom the vote was to be given were fit to exercise it. The Senate would be, that the Slave States must either admit all or make an exclusion that would cut off not only the negro population but a large proportion of the whites. This would place the power in the hands of a few. This might not prevent him from getting such a provision in the Constitution, if he could, for he should trust to trust to do away with the immediate remedy now proposed. However this might be, he was not satisfied that suffrage was such a natural right that it need be conferred upon any first-class citizens. The proposition would imply that we were unworried as to freedom. Mr. Fessenden then explained that the Committee had not reported an amendment substituting disfranchisement of color instead of the present territory, because it was believed that it would not get the requisite number of States, and there would be no hope of its adoption. Connecticut and Wisconsin had refused to adopt a similar measure in their own territories. All the Western States seemed to be opposed to it. New York would not consent to it. The pending question was the best that was practicable. "It gives to any fair a right to be represented according to population, with this distinction: that if a State says that it has a class of people not fit to be represented that class shall not be represented."

In the House, the Senate resolution to appropriate $20,000 to pay the expenses of the Reconstruction Committee was passed.

February 8.

In the Senate, Mr. LARSON made a speech on the Amendment. He thought the colored States not yet fit to enter the Union. The representatives from Tennessee he would admit, but not the Arkansas he believed had been elected who ought to be admitted.—The President's Executive list, as amended by the House, was passed.

In the House, the bill for the deposit of public lands for homesteads in the Southern States was passed, 172 to 19.

February 9.

In the Senate, Mr. JOHNSON made a speech on the Amendment. He claimed that the Constitution of the representative to three-fifths of the slaves instead of allowing representation for the whole number, in the original Constitution, was an account of the fact that they were slaves. Now that they were free the spirit of the Constitution demanded that all should be reckoned. He said that only six States allowed suffrage to negroes, while thirty refused it. Enslavement of the colored States there was a majority of those opposing negro suffrage.

In the House there were three military relations, which appeared to very much excite the members. No important business was transacted.

February 10.

The Senate was not in session. In the House, the session was taken up in speeches by Messrs. Wood, Polk, and Williams.

THE PRESIDENT'S FINANCIAL VIEW.

In President JOHNSON'S recent address to the Virginia Legislature he expressed his views of the financial situation of the country in the following terms: "If there is the Southern States be fully restored, the area for the cultivation of the national currency, which is thought by some to be inflated to a very great extent, will be enlarged, the number of persons through whose hands it is to pass will be increased, the quality of exchange in which it is to be employed as a medium of exchange will be enlarged, and then it will begin to appreciate, what we all know, is a specie standard. If all the States were restored, if peace and order returned throughout the land, and the industrial pursuits, all the operations of peace were again resumed, the day would not be far distant when we could put into the treasury of the world $250,000,000 or $300,000,000 worth of cotton and tobacco, and the vast resources of the Southern States which would constitute in part a basis of this currency. Then instead of the issue being inverted we should reverse the process and get the base at the bottom, as it ought to be, and the currency of the country will rest on a sound and enduring basis, and every fact in a result which is calculated to promote the interests not only of one section, but the whole country, from sea to sea to the other."

NEWS ITEMS.

There are reported of forty-two thousand six-hundred persons in Alabama, who will require an expenditure of upward of two millions of dollars per annum to relieve their necessities.

The Paragon (Wisconsin) Register announces the death of Joseph Grele, the aged veteran of one hundred and forty-one years, which occurred on the 27th of January, after a brief illness. Mr. Grele was the oldest man in the world; our readers will remember that we gave his portrait a few weeks since.

From some statistics made up at the War Department of the casualties to our General Sherman during the war it appears that we had 131,819 General's and Brigadier-Generals killed outright in battle, while 203,300 Major-Generals and nine Brigadier-Generals died of wounds received in action, and seventeen Generals of the two ranks died of disease. In the year 1862 our losses of general officers in battle were very heavy, numbering no less than fifteen, while during the present year, or from the end of 1864 to the close of the war, we lost but one General, though the fighting was great and decisive.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The most important item of foreign news is the speech of the Emperor Napoleon to the Corps Legislatif January 22. In this speech the Emperor says that arrangements are being made to withdraw the French troops from Mexico, and it is hoped this will pacify the people of the United States, who were originally anxious to join the allied expedition, but declined, although such expedition was not opposed by their Senators. The Emperor in the paragraph in the Emperor's speech relating to Mexico: "By Mexico, the government I speak of is the will of the people is becoming consolidated; the non-revolutionary, unopposed and dispassionate, have no longer any fears. The national troops have shown their worth, and the country has developed resources of order and security which have developed its resources and raised its commerce with France alone from insignificance to prosperity, and will do. According to the hope which I express of last year, our expedition is approaching its termination. I am relying on an understanding with the Emperor of Maximilian for being the period for reading our troops; and the Emperor may be effected without expending the French treasure, which we have to defend in that distant country."

THE BIRTH-PLACE, HOME, AND TOMB OF WASHINGTON.

SITE OF WASHINGTON'S BIRTH-PLACE.

General Washington's birth-place was destroyed before the Revolution. Upon its site was owned by Washington's father. It was seen after Washington's birth, in 1732, that his parents removed to this estate. The mansion has long since gone to decay.

POHICK CHURCH.

George W. P. Coates, Esq., Washington's Aid-de-camp, placed a slab of free-stone, representing in the above engraving. The house was precisely the same in appearance as the Residence of the Washington Family, shown in the engraving opposite. It was a plain house, instead of one story and attic, situated on the "Wakefield Estate," near the junction of Pope's Creek with the Potomac, in Westmoreland County, Va. The spot which marks the site was deposited in its place in June, 1815. It was enveloped in the Star-Spangled Banner, and laid upon the spot by four Revolutionary patriots and soldiers. The pedestal was constructed of bricks from the old chimney that once formed the hearth about which Washington played in his infancy. This was the first monumental stone ever erected to the memory of Washington.

The residence of the Washington family, in the engraving already alluded to, was situated on the Rappahannock, near Fredericksburg, in Stafford County, and

In the rooms of the National Institute (a portion of the Patent Office Building) at the Capital are to be seen Washington's SWORD AND STAFF. The sword is inclosed in a black leather sheath, with silver mountings. The handle is ivory, colored a pale green, and wound spirally with silver wire. The belt is more ancient, having upon it a silver plate on which is engraved "1757." The staff belonged to Franklin, and was by him bequeathed to Washington. It had been presented to Franklin by a French dowager, Duress, Madame DE TORRACIL.

POHICK CHURCH, where Washington worshiped, is about seven miles from Mount Vernon, upon an elevation on the borders of a forest of oaks, chestnuts, and pines. The MANSION AT MOUNT VERNON was occupied by Washington both before and after the War for Independence had been fought. It overlooks the waters of the Potomac and the shores of Maryland beyond. Washington's mansion is built of wood, cut so as to resemble stone, and is two stories in height. The central part was built by LAWRENCE WASHINGTON,

Upon the walls are pictures of hunting and battle scenes. The ROOM IN WHICH WASHINGTON, DIXON is closed to the public gaze. The architecture of the room remains unchanged. It is entirely empty, as represented in our engraving.

The TOMB OF WASHINGTON is a spacious vault of brick, with an arched roof. Its iron door opens into a vestibule, in which, seen through a picketed iron gate, stand two marble sarcophagi, containing the remains of WASHINGTON and his wife. Over the vault door is this inscription: "I AM THE RESTORER AND THE LIFE; HE THAT BELIEVETH IN ME, THOUGH HE WERE DEAD, YET SHALL HE LIVE." The tomb is situated near the pathway from the river.

THE NAMELESS GRAVE.

DEDICATED TO THE MEMORY OF WILLIAM C. DUNHAM, CAPT. REGIMENT, GEORGIA INFANTRY.

The low wind sighs o'er a Southern plain; That once was strewn with the battle slain; And the moist earth drieks the falling rain, That once was wet with a blood-red stain.

Dark, lowering clouds the heavens o'erspread, Whence the battle smoke has long since fled; And where voiceless lay the fallen dead, A nameless grave is seen instead.

Through the leafless woods the low winds creep, As a sobbing breeze from the loved who weep; And with aching hearts their vigils keep, For one in a nameless grave asleep.

The withered grass breaths the falling rain, O'er the grave lands low like ripened grain; But heavy hearts, though bowed with pain, His nameless grave shall weep in vain.

In forest wild and meadow green, May be many a lowly memento seen; A spirit's heart from the tempest keen, Each nameless grave for aye shall weep.

Search this low mound for one who gave A life to God—the right to save; Too noble that to live a slave— Then fillet now a nameless grave.

Slumber, loved one! sweetly sleep; Thou art at rest—the living weep; Given thy memory here we'll keep, For we on earth thy life-frame keep.

And thou, dear one! not in vain, Mark thy life-time set in pain; For thus thy body here shall gain; The noble dead alone attain.

Oh, wings triumphant from the tomb Rise, patriot spirit! This thy doom: "Ere'st not for aye in veiled bloom, A nation's heart shall be thy tomb."

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER VII.

THEY sit in a room a few minutes longer before we plunge again into the stormy epoch of secession with which these pages begin. We will begin for a moment. Hearken! Sece'sion will come soon enough.

SEEKING DIVER DIVIDENCE.

Blessed forever be the quickening of the sap in the veins, the putting forth of leaves and tender blossoms hued like the rainbow, the eager joy of beginning the earliest rudiments of future fruit—the spring-time of youth! Never physician entered upon the case of his first patient, never lawyer undertook the business of his first client, never painter began his first painting, nor sculptor his first statue, nor poet his first poem, with more eagerness than did the young minister engage in his new charge. Only his was a divinest joy than theirs, as his work was a divinest work. He had dreamed of it all while yet a boy, for, from his earliest remembrance, the ministry had been the purpose of his life. A hundred times had he planned exactly what he would do, and what he would most carefully not do, after having charge, while yet in college. As to his three years in the Theological Seminary, not a day but he had determined upon some new evil to be avoided in his future ministry, upon some new virtue to be practiced. During all the long years going before, he had never known one of his own proposed professions, thrown with him in biography or in person, but he had said to himself, "By the help of God, when I enter the ministry, I will never, never be this and that as I see it in this individual. God helping me, even this heroism, this habit, this success which adorns this man shall be equalled, if it please God, surpassed, when I am fairly upon the stage."

That memorable morning after his arrival in Somerville, when he awoke in Rutledge Bowles's office, there in Mrs. Bowles's front yard, it was a feeling half of pleasure and half of terror which he realized that his life's business, for which he had been so long training, praying, dreaming, was at last fairly entered upon. Ah, how fervently did he pray for aid as he knelt beside his nest bed! What expressions of his own inability to do sought assailed on his lips, and what perfect confidence of being able to accomplish every thing throbbing the same instant in his heart! No patriarch more dignified than he in conducting family worship that morning in Mrs. Bowles's parlor beneath the steady stare of the old Major from his gilded frame, Mrs. Bowles in her low sewing-chair, her daughter Alice upon an ottoman at her feet, and the two family servants seated solemnly near the door. Had he perceived, as he began, in reading the chapter expressly and definitely to Mrs. Bowles and her daughter, his manner would have continued artificial; but, from long habit, after the first six or eight verses, he became deeply and devoutly interested in the words, and read them accordingly. And so of his prayer: nothing could be more natural because nothing could be more sincere. Were it only for the effect of it on one's consequent bearing toward his fellows, it is an admirable thing to possess a deep and habitual reference to, and heart-felt belief in, One supremely above the whole of us.

"The head of the table, did you say?" asked Mr. Arthur a few minutes after, as they were sitting themselves at the breakfast-table.

"If you please, Mr. Arthur, the foot of the table," said Mrs. Bowles, with a slight South Carolinianism of stress upon the word.

It was a dreadful moment for the beautiful theologian, fresh from the barbarisms of three years' dining with stonched and slumped companions in the seminary refectory. His cheeks burned, and Alice's eyes danced with fun. But all the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew in the world can not destroy the true gentleman in a man where it exists by nature.

"You must pardon me, Mrs. Bowles," he said, with a frank smile, after pronouncing the blessing, and with perfect ease of manner: "but I have been living for the last several years like a sort of Robinson Crusoe upon a species of desert island."

"Yes?" asked Mrs. Bowles, to whom the answer was as an Open Sesame, while Alice's mirth became diminished as she found it shared with their guest himself. And so, during the pauses of the breakfast, their new acquaintance gave them in a humorous manner some description of his scholastic life. It was doubly interesting to the mother from the fact that her son was at college in Columbia.

"Really, Mr. Arthur," she said, at last, "it is almost like having Rutledge Bowles on a visit home from Columbia. He always occupied since the death of his father the seat you are now in. You remind me of him, I assure you." Higher compliment than that no new acquaintance could receive from her lips. "You were not educated at Columbia, Mr. Arthur?"

"At Hampden Sydney, Madam," replied her guest.

"In Virginia, I think it is?" asked she. Not quite as low down as Yale or Princeton; however, he was not to blame, she felt sure. Mr. Arthur replies in the affirmative. "You are a native of Virginia, I think?"

"Yes, Madam."

"You did right, quite right to enter an institution in your own State," said Mrs. Bowles, glad to find a defense for him. "I dare say they are not so extravagantly expensive where you were educated. I am almost shocked at Rutledge Bowles's expenditure. I suppose, however, his situation in such a place as Columbia requires greater expense than in other places."

And terribly expensive the fond mother did find her son's education there; but she stated herself proudly for it; she mentioned it with unconscious pride in her tones; it was part and parcel of being at Columbia.

"Though, while we are upon the subject, there is one thing in regard to Columbia I have never yet fully understood," said Mrs. Bowles, after a while. "Rutledge Bowles has explained it to me over and over again in his letters—the perpetual revolutions in the College, I mean.

From what Rutledge Bowles writes it has been impossible for the students to pursue, consistently with their own honor, any other course. It seems strange that the many Faculties of the College can not come to understand, any of them, what the youth of South Carolina are, and what they will not submit to. Strange! It is a great interruption to the studies, I fear. I know very little of the institutions out of the State; but I fear it is something peculiar to Columbia," said Mrs. Bowles, though her face sounded far more like pride.

Yes, in the history, eventful enough, of the College of South Carolina, at Columbia, you have, in epitome, the character and history of the State itself. Self-will, contempt for rightful authority, reckless disregard of every thing except the selfish abstraction of the hour! Gallant, generous, high-toned youth, they yield their own notions to that of their Faculty? No, Sir! Rather than that, let the institution be wrecked to its foundation! Rather than that, let their own education, and consequent success in life, perish! See the same youth when grown a few inches higher in stature and immeasurably more generous, gallant, high-toned, and all the rest; they submit their own ideas to the superior authority of the General Government? They yield a hair's-breadth from their own heated view of their own rights and wrongs—imperishable rights, infinite wrongs? By all that elevates the man above the brute and the negro, never, Mr. Speaker, never! Rather, Sir, let the General Government be wrecked till not a spar floats to tell where once it sailed! Rather perish the hope of the human race! Alas! Alas! Mr. Speaker, we of South Carolina lose every negro from our fields, every cent from our coffers, every city from our soil, every son on the field of battle from our hearth-stones! Perish the universe and we, Sir, we will sit still, rather than it move save as we intend it shall move! From his birth to his death never in the ages such a conspiracy as against your South Carolinian. Nurse, parent, schoolmaster, College Faculty, General Government, opinion of Christendom, course of God's eternal providence—was only begun, universal, incessant combination against him. But not more magnificent the coalition than the defiance thereof to his part!

Poor Mrs. Bowles! From its foundation was practical Secession the incidental but leading part of the Columbia Curriculum, and walk was the lesson learned. The yellow-fever is, they say, a standing affair in Cuba; and there lives scarce a man beside the Pedoes, the Congares, the Elians, and the Cooper and Ashley but involved Secession in his vital atmosphere. It is no strong even for the Gospel. Heaven defend us, even in the conventions of religious bodies. It was: Mr. Channing, Mr. Medcator, it is painful to us, Sir, it is very painful, but on this point we run not fight. No one can regret it more than ourselves, but, if brethren will press, this point, there is, Sir, but one course left us—In secular secession, or, out South Carolina out with her.

Steady, wrong-headed little State! Look at it on the map there, altogether unlike North Carolina even on the east side, and Georgia on the other; tough, three-sided fragment of mediæval granite, refusing to be dissolved or to lose an angle even in the rolling of the great waters of progress; requiring something besides the silent, serene processes of nature by which the craggy mountains are being melted slowly down and the rough globe rounded into shape; requiring the extra force and fury of waters too long and too obstinately dammed back from their natural and inevitable course. Every soul of us, however, admires the South Carolinian at last. Only let him be master, and a truer gentleman never breathed. The Hædtkoppig Peit in him is hidden under the Bayard, the Casse de Leon. He is only a hundred years or so out of place, that is all. There is nothing to laugh at in Don Quixote except his living a century or two too late. Even then it is with pain that we smile at the ancient armor, language defiant of the universe, and, most sorrowful of all, poor old Rosinante which bears him up!

But Mrs. Bowles has made us forget ourselves.

Breakfast over, the Rev. Edward Arthur walked out into Somerville and his new life. Before night he had been introduced to more persons than during his entire academic course. "If I can only remember all their names!" he thought. And, all things, as he went here and there over Somerville, he had it vaguely about in his mind, "Oh, if I can but exert a new influence, an influence for good, a divine influence on these!"

So pleased was his manner, so unassuming, too, that the impression he made upon all was decidedly in his favor. It was not particularly much that the people of Somerville cared for preachers; there was very little of them to be seen every day about the streets, and so he heard every Sunday; yet all had a vague respect for the special denomination to which the new-comer belonged. Besides, education and piety had given a certain elevation to the countenance and bearing of the new preacher. As to that, every thing new has its gloss, we know. Very faithful were the lawyer, Mr. Ellis, Dr. Warner, and his other immediate friends from that time, not only in making him known to the people, but in making them known to him; and all such knowledge kept up a running commentary thereon in the mind of the novice.

"What an agreeable gentleman this Mr.—Mr.—" began he, on parting from the last introduction and day.

"Simmons—not Mr.—Captain Simmons. Don't forget the Captain part of his name when ou speak to him next," said the lawyer, who ad introduced him.

"What an agreeable gentleman the Captain!" continued the young minister. "You heard that he said about having led the choir before moving to Somerville. And his expressions of regard for our new organization."

"And the tears in his eyes as he told you about his good old father, and about his mother's death-bed and dying charge. Ump, yes; I think," replied the lawyer. "Drinks? And the young divine had on the instant planned a series of sermons on intemperance."

"Mr. Peters, this is our new preacher, Mr. Arthur; Mr. Arthur, this is Mr. Peters, a member and pillar of one of the Somerville churches," interrupted the lawyer, introducing him to talk, spare, white-haired old gentleman.

"Don't call me Mr. Peters—Brother Peters; and you must call me as always, Brother Arthur," said the old gentleman, warmly grasping and holding in his own hand extended to him. "I heard you had come; am glad to see you—glad to see you. And you are but a young man at the great work—a young man, a young man, Brother Arthur. You'll find it a hard field, hard field. But you know where your help is. Bless your soul, I was not five when I joined, not five! I've been about a good deal since then; seen wonderful things. We must get better acquainted, Brother Arthur, better acquainted."

"Mr.—Brother Peters seems to be a warm Christian," said Mr. Arthur, after a long and cordial conversation with his new acquaintance, being the latter part of which his companion had endeavored several times, but in vain, to carry him away.

"I declare," said the lawyer in reply, pushing his hat back off his forehead, his fingers ingring indelicately a moment behind his right ear in consideration, "I do not know whether to leave you to find your new acquaintances out for me. Besides, I don't want to eat a damper in you. But the fact is, this Brother Peters—"

"Does not drink, I hope?" asked his companion, hastily.

"Oh no," replied the lawyer, quick to deny such a charge. "Sober as you or I, hard working, honest, kind-hearted, punctual at church as can be; nothing in the world against him but his awful lies. Lying Sam Peters is his name every where. He knows it as well as any one. His friends have talked to him about it, his church has worked with him for years, every new preacher they get makes a special effort with him; it does no good. He has lied so long it has become his nature to lie whenever he may happen to be speaking about, and always. Like an old swearer and his sons, lying Sam Peters tells falsehoods from morning till night without knowing it."

Alas! that sudden sinking of the heart in the bosom of the young minister. It is a painful thing that sinking of the heart in the bosom of the young and sanguine. After a while the heart learns to beat more evenly through every thing. "Ah, yes, Ananias and Sapphira, the sin and the penalty of falsehood; I must preach on that subject," murmured Mr. Arthur to himself, some relief in that.

In the course of the day the two friends came upon Brother Barker, to whom the new-comer was made known. As soon as it could be conveniently done—a little sooner, in fact—Brother Barker felt compelled to tell his new brother in the ministry that there were certain doctrines held by that new brother's denomination which he really could not agree with him in at all; which, in fact, he regarded as against Scripture and common sense, and which really—really he regarded as—but he would not wound the young brother's feelings by saying all he deeply, very deeply felt on the subject!

"A series of discourses establishing our peculiar doctrines, and as soon as possible. Dear me, how much, how very much there is for me to do!" thought Mr. Arthur, as he parted from his new friend.

As to Brother Barker, the arrival of the new minister precipitated him for weeks after with a vehemence now even to him against the obnoxious doctrines in question. The spare frame of the zealous Brother fairly dilated with their enormity, as, in private conversation and from the pulpit, he fought against the detestable doctrines, with long, muscular arms, gleaming eyes, and feet in incessant motion while he talked, like an athlete in the arena.

Before the week was over the young divine had seen the pressing necessity of preparing, and delivering as soon as possible, sermons innumerable. He had incidentally been thrown with Bob Withers, who had told him on the second or third interview that he would have been a Christian long ago, instead of "the regular whisky-drinking, card-playing, cursing and sweating scamp, by George, which I now am, Mr. Arthur!" if it hadn't been for the gross inconsistencies he had observed, by George, in every single professor, by George, it had ever been his misfortune to meet with; not one single exception to the rule, sir, not one! Strange to say, there is something attractive to Mr. Arthur in the round, sensible, good-humored face of Mr. Withers, his frank eyes and sincere manner. Although there is a glow as of ripe grapes in Bob's face, it is a vast deal smaller and more pleasing than, in Mr. Arthur's opinion, Brother Barker's dry and lean, though rigidly correct, face. And that he must preach a sermon warning Christians on this point was only too evident to the restless theologian.

Mr. Ellis, too—the mild, amiable, humble Mr. Ellis—whom Mr. Arthur had best driven to from his first acquaintance with him, unintentionally even he had aided in dampening somewhat the ardor of his new pastor. In answer to inquiries over his counter at the store on the part of that pastor, he gave it as his opinion that the main obstacle in Somerville to the spread of religion consisted in an intense worldliness. He readily agreed with the pastor that here was the grand evil to be aimed at. After Mr. Arthur had added parental neglect, Sabbath desecration, profanity, infidelity, and a score more of evils, to be immediately combated, to his list, he was fain to pause from the enumeration.

However, if he lay down a little wearied at night with accomplishing, in imagination, in Somerville vastly more than has ever yet been accomplished by all his profession put together for men since Christ left the world, nevertheless a sound night's rest sent him forth next morning to his studies and into Somerville as hopeful as ever.

And so the new church was duly organized. It was a small organization, very small indeed; yet, on second thought, even this was a new pleasure to the ardent pastor to know into what a noble size the church was to grow from that little seed. And those who were its members clustered around him so heartily, too. Eucergie Guy Brooks, steady Mr. Ferguson, smiling Dr. Warner, devoted Mr. Ellis. Mrs. Sorel, too, punctual as the clock did she slight every Sabbath morning at eight o'clock with Robby, her bright little boy—Frank is old enough to have a class, and is there before her on his pony—at the door of the little school-house, which was answering as a church for the present, in time for the Sabbath-school just established. Mrs. Colonel Ker Roberts, too, never failed of being there with her children. A thoroughly-informed man of the world could have read the Colonel's domestic character in the pale cheek and bowed head and sorrowful eyes of his wife. To Mr. Arthur she was but an estimable, silent, refined lady, sorrowful by reason of ill-health. Ah, how devoted she was to her children, especially to her boy with his father's superb eyes and bold brow! And devoted a wife but naturally is when her love for her husband is spurred, nothing left for her to love but her children; doubly devoted to them she well may be, when all her care is required to undo all the evil influence upon them of their father.

Mrs. Bowles, too, how enthusiastic she was in regard to the new enterprise! Mr. Arthur never came home at night from his visiting but she had something new and hopeful to tell in connection with the church; some new family who had said they would send their children next Sunday to Sunday-school; some new young man whom she had ascertained to have had parents in connection with their denomination, and who ought to be looked after; some brand-new young lady who had agreed to teach in the school. Almost every night it was late after supper before her guest, so enthusiastic as she, could tear himself away from the sitting-room to go to his little office in the yard. At last Mr. Bowles would run in upon him of mornings there in the midst of his studies, with an apology for interrupting him, only she thought he would like to hear this, that, and the other encouraging something about "our church." How much the novelty of the thing; how much a lively competition with the other denominations in the place, roused by Mr. Arthur's advent into fresh life and zeal, had to do with all this on the part of all of them, no man shall ask and no man shall answer on these premises. "Is in heaven only our motives will be perfectly pure. But unmingled? No, not even there."

And Alice, too. Mr. Arthur saw from the portrait of the old Major where she got her erect bearing and clear, haughty glance. Haughty is by no means the word, but aristocratic would be preposterous in this free land. Modest confidence, self-reliance, independence, queenliness, fearlessness—well, the language lacks the exact word, and we must do without. The reverend guest had taken up an idea that this black-haired, quick-eyed, open-browed school-girl must resemble Joan of Arc, say, before she had come out into the world, yet not unaware of herself even then. There was something of the angularity of the school-girl—likes and dislikes sharply expressed, unadorned amusement at every thing odd in any person whatever, and a certain something in her manner that caused the guest to feel quite sure that she—if she did not dislike him, at least did not give him a thought. All this, and more, in her kept these two quite apart from each other.

The idea never definitely entered the head of their guest; yet, if his heart could have been taken apart and accurately weighed piecemeal, it would have been found that this school-girl all these days was to him decidedly more than all the world besides. You may say it was because he had to love some one of her sex by the necessity of his nature, and she happened to be the nearest and most convenient one to him for the purpose. It may be so. None the less was the unconscious Alice Bowles that person in all the world for whom he most cared. Perhaps if he had had a sister, or a brother, a mother, or even a father, to love, it would have been different; but he was without these, and all these Alice was to him, and he knowing almost nothing of her as yet. Yes, it was foolishness itself.

It took him a long time to keep from looking too much at her as she sat on her low seat at night studying her lessons for the next day, while her mother conversed with their guest. Her face had not settled down as a whole into its final beauty, but her lips had—so full, so red, so eloquent in their very silence. Once, months after his arrival, she had suddenly raised her eyes with an exclamation against her lesson, and had caught his eyes fastened upon her face. But Mr. Arthur was too fast even for her.

"Had I met your daughter, Mrs. Bowles, in London or New York, I could have told where she was born," he said, continuing to indulge the look under cover of the observation.

"Yes?" said her mother, with pleased eyes.

"I never flatter, Mrs. Bowles; but there is a certain something in you South Carolinians which marks you unmistakably," he continued. "But pardon me, I interrupted a remark you were making."

"Not at all," said the mother, abandoning the old theme for the new. "Only what you say we have ever regarded as a matter of course. And it is the same of you Virginians," said Mrs. Bowles, in tone cheerfully conceding the second rank in the world to Virginia.

"Why, as to that, Ma, you can say the same of any one from New England," said the school-girl, putting back her hair from her brow, and letting the book close upon her lap.

"Certainly, my dear," said her mother, with a meaning smile; "and we can always tell where an Irishman is from, or an Esquimaux. But Mr. Arthur left something more favorable to be inferred from his remark, I presume."

"Oh, how I do hate the Yankees!" concurred the daughter. "There is that Miss Moulton at school, her lips pursed up, her elbows drawn down, prim, peevish old maid; forever talking about her duty toward us and to our parents, with her system of education, rewards of merit, marks of approbation—"

"My dear, hush! You should be ashamed of yourself!" said the mother, interrupting her daughter's mimicry of her teacher's words and manner. "You must remember Miss Moulton is employed as your teacher. She is a very respectable person, I know. And you forget that she is not to blame for her place of birth. They may say what they please of the Yankees," continued the mother, turning with charming candor to her guest, "but for my part I think they are extremely useful people in their way. I can not say I have been used to like them very much, but I will say that. We had at one time an extremely deserving young man in our family in South Carolina from the North as tutor for Rutledge Bowles. I am afraid Rutledge Bowles did not make his situation as comfortable as it should be, but I am sure the young man really wished to be of service. He remained but a short time. Rutledge Bowles disliked him; treated him, in fact, so—so scornfully that we were compelled to dismiss him."

Again we touch the chord whereby we at least intended this chapter should be keyed, and repeat, Blessed be the spring-time of youth! How swiftly the days melted into weeks, and the weeks into months, with the young pastor. His sermons were most carefully prepared—too directly aimed at the point in view to be very rhetorical, but pleasing from their evident sincerity and path. To pay more attention to the fullness and flow of words was a lesson he was afterward to learn. It was, you know, as he grew old that Edmund Burke grew so sublimely rhetorical. But no one could be more ignorant of exactly the kind of sermon he was to preach on any occasion than was the preacher himself. At one time he would prepare with great eagerness some special discourse, to find, in actually preaching it, that it was nothing special at all—the reverse rather. Again, he would go into the pulpit with some preparation of which he was heartily ashamed, to find, from his own feeling and the evident interest of the congregation, that it was far better than he had ever done before. One Sabbath when he would count confidently on having quite a crowded congregation, he would be chilled to the soul to find but a small one. Another Sabbath, counting gloomily upon but a sparse attendance, he would be encouraged by a house full. Now he would be led to count assuredly upon certain persons becoming members of the church, to be disappointed instead; and to receive, unexpectedly, persons into membership of whom he had never hoped such a thing. To-day would he be encouraged by the unaccountable presence of certain individuals at church; and on the next occasion annoyed by the unaccountable absence of others.

This week he would attend some funeral, and wonder at the apathy to the important spiritual concerns thus brought to mind on the part of those present; wondering most of all at his own inability, standing beside the open coffin, with the cold face beneath his hand, to set forth, as he would, those spiritual truths. The next week would be illuminated with some unexpected or long-expected wedding, with all the incidents therewith connected.

And there, also, was the pastoral visitation; the conversing with persons from whom all the machinery of Archimedes could not have drawn out more than Yea and No during the interview. However, there was placid, sensible Mrs. Sorel; practical Guy Brooks; delightful Mr. Ellis, with whom he could converse. Crazy as Mr. Ferguson was, too, the young minister soon learned to keep plenty of sea-room in conversation between himself and the Scotchman's hidden reefs; learned even to keep aloof, with a mariner's instinct of a storm, from the Scotchman altogether when that Scotchman was all reef and breakers. And so passed the days along.

Perhaps there was not one thing in his charge in the least degree as he had dreamed it would be—pleasures and pains all different; yet it was a great week and a good work, and a work in which he laid himself out with joy. The very buying the ground for the new church, the planning of the building, the raising the money, was an epic of interest for months. And the actual erection of the edifice, from foundation to weather-vane, it was a daily joy and rejoicing. We say nothing of his intercourse with the workmen during this period; with almost every nail and shingle and plank the young pastor had intimate acquaintance from their arrival on the ground until finally adjusted to their place.

The months of planicking—if we may so speak—in the erection of that unfinished church, with loose scantlings on trossels for seats, and a plausible foot across for pulpit, was accompanied with a purer pleasure than the worship in many a stately edifice all granite and walnut, fresco, and velvet. The obtaining of the church bell, from the instant of the conception of the idea in the head of Mrs. Bowles, until its first peal ring upon the ears so attentive to hear it that Sabbath morning, was one long and pleasurable excitement. And the painting, pewing, furnishing the church throughout, in which the ladies threw themselves with their inseparable and inalienable love for adornment in all its ramifications—was that a matter without deep interest to the pastor, as well as to many others? There was the organizing a choir; the most unexpected discovery of Mr. Ferguson's splendid bass, a mere growl hitherto under his grizzly beard, developing now into music—a hard and stiff old Memnon smitten by the sun; culminating in the suggesting, subscribing for, obtaining, and actually using an instrument. It is impossible to pass lightly over that. And the Ladies' Fairs also, from time to time, for this object and for that; the Sabbath-school celebrations of ribboned and rosy and hungry children; the grand efforts at tract distribution for the entire town; the purchase and arrival of a grand Congregational Library; the building of a study for the pastor; the presenting him of sudden sets of linen and altogether unexpected writing-desks.

Oh, blessed period of life, when a man is fairly at his life's work, with Youth and Health and Hope his close companions! Blessed period when, like a swimmer fresh to his task, there is a joy in every fibre at the very encountering and mounting and leaving behind the opposing billows as they come! Time of exultation, when every defect discovered in one's self is a joy, in the hope of henceforth destroying the same; when every enemy unintentionally made learns the novice how henceforth to act so as to secure instead a thousand friends; when every opposing circumstance is but a something, the path over which leads one that much higher above what he was before! But, O youth thrice blessed, when the Telemachus accompanied by Mentor is realized, more than realized, in him who, engaged in the service of an incarnate God instead, walks ever with that God during all the day, kneeling morn and night in communion, fellowship, friendship closer and sweeter than the world knows beside with that friend and brother! There is too entire an identity between the life of him who is doing the will of God on earth and him who is doing the will of God in heaven, for the happiness and energy of the one in heaven not to be very much the energy and happiness of the other on earth.

In nothing was it more evident how fully engaged the young pastor was with his work, and how entirely he filled and satisfied his heart and his hands, than his entire forgetfulness as to the making of money; that is, as to the accumulating any property at all. It never occurred to him to place at interest what remained over of his salary at the end of the year; it went every cent to gifts for the children of the Sabbath-school, and donations to benevolent objects. When he first arrived in Somerville had he only bought a few town lots at the nominal price then asked, in a few years he would have had even wealth. It never occurred to him for an instant; even the purchasing of a lot for his own home in the future was done only at the suggestion of friends. People who owned a few head of cattle when he arrived in Somerville had whole herds thereof by natural increase in a few years. Why could he not have done the same? There was Mr. Neely, the schoolmaster—with his first earnings from his school he had bought a likely negro woman, and now he had quite a family of young negroes, upon even the youngest of which he could have realized five hundred dollars any day. "And why," Mrs. Warner frequently asked, "could not Mr. Arthur have done the same thing?" Yes, it is with pain that we frankly state this new weakness in one whom we would fain have the reader love. Devotion to his calling? Certainly. But such thoughtlessness, such utter lack of reference to his future wife and children! We would paint him in brighter colors if we dared; better tell the truth of him though. Truth is, "The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light!"

One thing is certain—he grew steadily in the confidence and esteem even of those who acknowledged his deplorable lack of worldly wisdom. Yet "men will praise thee when thou doest well to thyself;" perhaps they would have thought that much the more of him if he had been accumulating property all the while; but let us recount nothing but the truth about him though the heavens fall!

Yes, so far in his ministry the young pastor toiled with enthusiasm and joy. From the first he can be said to have had but one definite trouble; and that trouble had quick, sharp, black eyes, which saw every thing going on in Somerville and a great deal more; and that trouble had a tongue, and such a tongue! Perpetually was Mrs. Warner seeing something dreadful here, and strongly suspecting something worse there, and painfully but positively assured of disaster in the future, and pouring all herself abroad upon such matters every where. Any chemist who had enumerated the ingredients composing the atmosphere of Somerville, and, in mentioning oxygen, nitrogen, vapor, and carbonic acid, had failed to mention Mrs. Warner as a chief constituent element of that atmosphere, would have been woefully mistaken. That one lady managed to keep the place surcharged with anecdotes, rumors, suspicions, surmises, prophecies—all personal, and all of a painful nature to a degree surpassing human power of production. To do Mrs. Warner justice, her own ser-ages, children, husband-household, in fact, was the theme upon which she dilated most freely and fully. Neat and energetic housekeeper as Mrs. Warner was, it was certainly not at home only that she washed her "dirty linen." Some of it showing, in her hands, so very dirty, too.

As the years rolled by the canal gates had been too often opened to close now at all. But her children did not particularly mind, her servants had grown used to it, her husband was too old a sailor upon the tossing deck and amidst the whistling gales of his home not to have come to regard it all as the ordinance of nature. Every day he grew fatter and bolder and more stooped about the head, more slovenly about the person, quite a weather-beaten mariner, but wonderfully forbearing and mild. But then her table, and her exquisitely neat and clock-work household! If one were but stone-blind and perfectly deaf, or a philosopher—Socrates say—be could live even under Mrs. Warner's roof.

And all these months Mr. Arthur continues with Mrs. Bowles. The idea never occurred to her in that form; but her guest was to her all that Rutledge Bowles would have been had he instead tenanted the little office in the front yard all this time—rather more perhaps.

"And Mr. Arthur is such a vast assistance to Alice in her studies," said Mrs. Bowles to Mrs. Sorel one day; "and they have read a great deal of history together, too. Mr. Arthur takes a pleasure natural to a scholar in such things. Really I believe Alice is improved beyond her years—more thoughtful, too. I hope to return to Charleston as soon as Rutledge Bowles is settled in the practice of the law there. It is too soon to speak of such things yet, I am aware; but if Alice is finally married into one of the old families there I will be satisfied."

And placid Mrs. Sorel only smiled in her quiet way, and said nothing upon the subject whatever.

THE "IRREPRESSIBLE CONFLICT."

BY THE AUTHOR OF THE "SILK-DRESS PAPERS."

One of the wisest statesmen of the age has coined an immortal sentence and applied it so pertinently that it has become as "household words" throughout the land. May I be pardoned for borrowing it and applying it to the war that is daily being waged between the wives and mothers of this glorious republic and the so-called servants, domestics, help, or whatever you may please to call them?

Oh that I could dip my pen in fire, and thus light up the trouble I am about to utter; that I might bring before the eyes of the people this great social scourge that is sapping the lives of the noblest race of women the world ever saw! I do not hesitate to say there is not a wife or mother in the land but will overlook the shortcomings of her servants, if they try to do their duty, and their wrong-doings are mistakes only. If there are mistresses who refuse to do this, they are the exceptions that prove the general rule. But it is the indifferent and malicious servants with whom we have to deal; it is those who live in the houses and have mistresses to do their bidding, the stew of the house the more helpless their victims. I would speak of the cook, who, in winter time, boils eggs in the tea-kettle for her own delicate breakfast while the steak is sent to the dining-room not fit to be eaten. The amiable Jones says, "What is the matter with the steak? I bought the best in the market. Arabella, my dear, if you would only look after domestic affairs a little more I think we should be repaid in home comforts." Arabella heaves a great sigh, shuts her mouth close, and wishes that she might be the cook and chamber-maid, and yet have the power of coming to breakfast in a dainty morning-gown with a thousand little pet curls around her face; for Jones insists that she shall wear her hair frizzed. Jones is fastidious about these things; wants his little wife to look a little better than any body's else; this is Jones's pet weakness. Poor Arabella knows where the trouble lies, but where is the remedy? Her head begins to ache, nerves all aflutter for the day, and she begins to fear that Jones doesn't love her as he used to, though the honey-moon is scarcely over. She comes to the conclusion that married life isn't her "forte;" while the amiable Jones goes to his office with a shadowy remembrance of those bachelor breakfasts at Delmonico's, and wondering whether his home will ever resemble his neighbor's across the street, who, by-the-way, has a wife who has sacrificed herself on the funeral pile of her husband. The truth she has not been entirely consumed; there is just enough left for locomotion; but that genial, bright, wide-awake look has vanished from her countenance, showing that she was made of colors that would not wash in the beginning, and yet the washing process has been kept up for an unlimited period. Said wife is cook when cook fails to do her duty; is nurse when the children are ill; in fact, is just as much a martyr as any Brahmin widow, the only difference consisting in the fact that she is a longer time in dying. I am speaking of the martyred sisterhood who have not the strength to endure life's perpetual warfare.

Mrs. Stowe—whom I reverence for her efforts to the full of the amelioration of women's trials—says the houses must be built with the flour-barrel, spices, corn-meal, and mouse-traps all in one corner; and the conservatory is to open off from all this; and the wives and daughters must do all the work. Now, this is all charming and very beautiful, but it happens that her advice comes too late; if what are we to do in such a case? It happens that our house is already built, and no persuasion they part will make my beloved Job pull out the invalid arrangement, and fix it according to Mrs. Stowe's programme. And I have every reason to believe there are thousands of matrons in this country who have husbands as hard to convince as Job Stowe.

Suppose I succeed in having the house arranged accordingly, and suppose Job should accidentally become the father of twins once a year, wouldn't he be excused from doing my own work, and my daughters, the aforesaid twins, be excused on account of size and weakness of muscles? And suppose I was able to have the easy-chair wheeled to the open door of the conservatory, would it be agreeable to have Bridget making basel cakes and vegetable soup under my invalid nose? Wouldn't I be excused from dying, just in self-defense, leaving Job and the twins to the care of a gentle Xanthippe, who would sigh in a very short time, "Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown?"

Again, Mrs. Stowe says we must make every thing so pleasant for the servants that people people in decayed circumstances will be glad to take these places for the sake of a home; and that, in some unaccountable way, we must remove the stigma of servitude, and make it as honorable as a Professorship in a College. I might as well attempt to snatch the brightest part of a rainbow to make a neck-tie for my beloved Job. There is no poetry in scolding knives, unless these same knives are to reflect some loved one's visage; and as Job is the only masculine about the house, I prefer to have the poetry confined to the library. The relation between mistress and servant is as devoid of sentiment as a geometrical figure. We must grapple with facts—not fancy. Suppose I succeed in finding the gentlest person who will come for the sake of a home—sure they not of all others those whom I dread most? Wouldn't I not only have my own trials to bear but theirs also? Are not my hands full to plethora, and my heart to bursting, training up young Ike for the twenty-ninth President, and devising plans to keep Job away from that interesting club? And wouldn't I feel so tender that I should have to get another girl to do their work? And are they not the very ones to forget who is the mistress of the house, not from any bad inclination, but mere force of habit?

This same worthy warden, whose shoe-latchets I feel unworthy to unlace, says we must elevate labor. As we can not bring the servants up to us, we must go down to them, as this is the age for the elevation of the masses. Perfectly as Genesis has sugar-coated the pill, nevertheless it sticks in the throats of a million of matrons. Slight as the task may seem, the cleansing of the Augean stables by Hercules is no comparison to the task.

"We have no way of judging the future but by the past." It never has been done, even when Rome was at its zenith of power and glory; and shall we, the American wives and mothers, throw ourselves under this car of Juggernaut that Erin and Africa may ascend to their proper sphere? Anna E. Dickinson says, it is a glorious thing to die for the black man; but I notice she is as plump as a partridge, apparently a long way from transmigration, and I fear those who preach most are the least apt to practice.

The irrepressible conflict wages. What is to be done? While the American wives and mothers are amply supplied with brains they are perishing for the want of so much bone and muscle. These much needed commodities are found in foreign countries—why not here? It can not be owing to our peculiar institutions. The fact that "help is washed upon our shores by the tide of emigration" does not change the nature of that help? If they are industrious and orderly in their own country why should they not continue to be so after their arrival here? And here is the pivot of the whole difficulty. American house-keepers must have unity of action.

Would General Grant have succeeded in quelling the rebellion, no matter how brave and capable he has proved himself to be, had he gone forth unattended and alone? After a given period it must be assumed that no help will be employed without bringing satisfactory reference from the last place. This must be strictly adhered to. It may even be necessary to form ourselves into a Union League, with ramifications extending to the farthest hamlet in the land, so remote and wide-spread is this moral leprosy. Servants must be given to understand that mistakes will be pardoned, but indifference and malevolence will cause instant dismissal. Every servant must be made to know, if they do not perform their duty, the consequences will instantly be meted out to them, and every mistress must serve herself to endure every trial until the dawn of the new morning.

This is a work of time; but we must set our faces, flint-like, in the right direction, and we are sure to triumph. "The battle is not to the strong alone, but to the vigilant, the active, the brave." No great good is achieved without a struggle. Every earthly birth is ushered in with pain. But I bear witness: "Who will cook the breakfast and do the chamber-work during this transition period?" A couple of sleek, tily cats must be procured to wash the few dishes. The dirt about the house may be allowed to accumulate—it will protect every thing just as snow protects the farmer's crop. Husband must be sent to any respectable restaurant near by—said husband will make no objection if he feels assured that household expenses will be reduced in the mean time. Children must be fed on baker's bread and molasses, and we must make our own tea with our own fair hands. Blinds must be kept closed, and all outward indications of "Not at home" must be kept up to frighten away company. "Last but not least," we must be busy up with the exultant feeling that we have the power in our own hands. Should we become ill in the mean time we will have a pitcher of water and a baker's crust laid on our table. And should we die, better die a natural death than of an overdose of Erin or the Black plague. Let us be resolved that we will not die in this struggle—that we will fight the good fight till the rebellion is ended. We have the national resources of men and money, and we can hold out until the enemy's strength is entirely exhausted. Oh for the glorious time when the intelligence offices are overloading, and the officers of the Freedmen's Bureau groan with the black millstone they have hung about their necks! Will it not be a foreboding of the new millennium?

Having finished the above literary balloon, before cutting the cords loose I laid it before my beloved Job with the apple-pie at lunch-time. "Pretty fair article so far as condiments are concerned, but you don't intend it as any thing practical? I admire that saline arrangement of yours, only I fear a crusade against the cats; but as a cat has nine lives, I'll bet on them every time." Can you imagine how the Princess Radroubolour looked when the Genie told her that a roe's egg must be hung in the middle of her chamber before the palace would be perfected? Two great pearls, surpassing any of Ball, Black, & Co., glistened on my cheeks. Job instantly soared to the proper element, and says: "Little wife, the hardest lesson for us all to learn is submission to the inevitable. Could your two hands lift up the pitcher that holds the Atlantic Ocean and pour it on the Western continent, it would not cover the mountains until every little hill and valley was submerged. And just so long as the demand exceeds the supply, just so long this same state of affairs will continue." I interrupted him, saying, "Job, you see the difficulty through a man's eyes." "They are all I happen to have for the present." "But I feel sure that I am in the right." "Women are generally afflicted that way; but what excellent apple-pie, Storry!" "The cook left a week ago," I sobbed. "Let us be thankful, Storry, that our happiness doesn't depend on servants. I'll take another piece of that apple-pie, and you may expect me home to dinner to-day. There is the place for a man after all." The stroke of the needle ascended, and I am still living to tell the tale.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

"No man ever felt any thing but irritation at seeing a woman's gown doing the business of the evening except, or attached any value to the amount of open-work displayed beneath a looped-up skirt. If young ladies would but believe it—or rather, perhaps, if they did but attach any importance to it when they do believe it—a man will be perfectly satisfied with their appearance, so far as those considerations are concerned, if their persons are spotlessly clean and their stockings glisten of a wrinkle."

So says the London Saturday Review, essentially. We know not how it may be in London, but we unhesitatingly affirm that petticoats and stockings "spotlessly clean" are virtues unattainable in this city by ladies who promenade the streets. Yet of the scores of "fair women" whom one meets in Broadway on a bright afternoon very few seem to realize this fact, though every body knows it. To be sure, the rich drapery is gathered up in costly fashions, and the gay petticoat is a vast improvement on the white one. But with what appropriateness or good taste are such gorgeous fabrics as we constantly see worn in our dirty streets? Costly silks of delicate hues meet one at every step; and yet a passing cartilage, splashing through the mud, leaves a fatal stain upon the fabric, and a drop of melting snow tarnishes the lacem. Such follies are suitable only for the drawing-rooms; and even though one may effort them to destroy her wardrobe, such waste is not only wrong but in bad taste.

For such streets as we have, at this season, plain woollen fabrics are the most suitable wear: the French merinoes and linseys, the English cloths, and even the stout water-proof—all are serviceable and pretty, and are to be obtained in every variety.

So emphatic gives the following, which may suggest to careful wives the reason why their husbands' "dilettante" never "have a glow" or three:

"Biddy," said Mrs. Penrywise, "there is little starch in the dikes this week, and altogether the clothes do not look very nicely."

"And shall you not remember, ma'am, I got but three and sixpence for my labor. If you would have them red and blue you must raise on my wages."

"And what would those shillings do for me, Biddy?" inquired her mistress.

"And faith it would either them more; but it takes the said sixpence to put on the said glove."

"And how would two dollars work, Biddy?"

"Now in me let all you, 'twould make them look so light you never would know the cotton from linen."

"So, Biddy, you are disposed to make a 'milk' if I would have my work done to my liking?"

"Oh! no, ma'am; 't is not that but will ever break the pace by striking; 't is an ill-humored woman that would lift her finger to her mistress, and didn't I tell Parson O'Farley so when he bid me strike on ye. It's not me that would do the dirty thing to all the money in America!"

"Well, Biddy, then after this day we will try the non-starching system."

"And, by the powers, Mr. Penrywise shall be satisfied, but I won't promise to give him!"

The following conversation, which has just come to hand, will explain itself:

"DEAN CORNER.—I saw a very good thing done at a concert the other night. Tickets were one dollar. And there were twelve places on the programme. Eight cents and a third apiece. Rather high. But after the good pieces the audience all clapped their hands, and stamped their feet, and cried 'encore!' until the singer or the player came back again and gave another piece. So we got sixteen pieces instead of twelve. Not price six cents and a quarter each, which, at three per cent, is cheap."

"It strikes me that would be a good remedy for high prices. When the milkman brings a quart of milk and asks ten cents for it let the servant girl clap her hands, and let the milkman immediately pour in a pint more gratis. When a lady goes to Stewart's, and buys a silk dress at three dollars a yard, she should give a few words of applause, and the dressman should immediately cut her off another half dozen yards free of expense. When a gentleman visits the shoemaker's and gets fitted with a pair of boots let him cry 'encore!' and let the shoemaker throw in a pair of slippers. In like manner when a subscriber to Harper's Magazine writes in enthusiastic commendation of the work you should send him the Weekly without charge."

It appears to me that the general adoption of this principle would open the way for arriving at all the evils of high prices. Will you not urge it upon the public?"

"Yours truly, CORNER."

"P.S.—The topic suggests that what has led to the extensive feeling that it can't be applied in church is, that it would lead to the milkman's presiding his sermons over eggs."

A young man in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, on a wager of $500, recently walked a hundred miles in an easy consecutive hoar without sleep. Throughout the time his nervous excitement was kept up by strong tea. His head was bandaged and bathed frequently with rum and salts. He often stumbled from weakness and weariness. The fourth and last day was one of weariness, aching limbs, aching head, and prostration. He required to be supported as he went his hoary rounds. In the fifth hour he was faint and fell. Every hour of the last four he was bathed all over with rum and salts. In the fifth hour he again fell in faintness. The last hour at length arrived, and with his assistants he completed his mile in 33 minutes. A terrible reaction took place afterward, and constant medical attendance and careful nursing alone saved his life. The only sensible thing in connection with this foolish and wicked expenditure of strength is the resolution in which the misguided young man arrived when the affair was over: "That ten times the amount of money he had received would not induce him to make a like effort."

The following singular romance originates in Connecticut.

Newark is exercised about body-snatchers, who, on Monday night last, dug up the body of a young lady who had been buried that afternoon, and succeeded beyond their anticipation. She had been buried while in a cataleptic fit, and, upon being exposed to the night air, animation was restored. The resurrectionist fled, and she walked home. Her parents refused to admit her, believing her to be a ghost. She then went to the house of a young man to whom she was engaged. He took her in, and on Monday morning they were married.

Under the head of "Tale Notes," Martha E. Loomis publishes the following apt paragraph in the San Jose (California) Courier:

"My husband, Robert Loomis, having advertised me in last week's paper as having left his bed and board without just cause, and forbidding the public from trusting me on his account, I wish to state that the bed was mine before I married him; and as for board, he never gave me any since he married me. He has spent a fortune since I married him; and as for credit, I could not get the returns of my children's shoes on his word. I hereby declare the public not to trust him on my account, as I shall pay no debts of his contracting."

It is stated that the United States Telegraph Company have reduced their rates for messages between New York and Eastern cities fifty per cent. The rates are now for ten words to Boston, thirty cents; to New Haven or Hartford, twenty cents. It may be hoped that this telegraphic so as a general fall in prices.

It would that the last male aboriginal inhabitant of Tasmania, or Van Diemen's Land, was present at a coroner's inquest held by three women, the only living representatives of their tribe, who numbered in the first of this century about 3000 to 4000.

Strange as it may seem, the following shrewd epitaph is said to have been actually copied from a tablet in a Massachusetts church-yard:

This is the memory of Ellen Hill, A woman who would always have her will, She worked her husband, though she made good bread, And on the whole he's rather good who's dead. She whipped her children (and she drags her girl) Whipped virtue out, and whipped the devil in. May all such women go to some great fall Where they through all eternity may wail!

In pleasant remembrance of this curious epitaph, found in Cornwall, England, to the memory of Rev. Mr. Colton and wife:

Forty-five years they lived, man and wife, And what's more rare, so many without strife, She first departing, he a few weeks tried, To live without her, could not, and he died.

Coleridge classifies readers as follows:

- 1. Sponges, who absorb all they read, and return it nearly in the same state, only a little dirtied.
2. Sand-glasses, who retain nothing, and are content to get through a book for the sake of getting through the lines.
3. Shovel-bugs, who retain merely the drops of what they read.
4. Wood-choppers, usually rare and profitable, who profit by what they read, and enable others to profit by it also.

In the latest fashion-prints from across the water we find that for some time past blue has decidedly been the favorite color among young ladies who have cultivated an belletristic. White muslin or white silk dresses on the one side have been, trimmed with blue, blue muslin or the white, and blue flowers in the hair, had become a sort of fad among them. Blue appeared to be the color selected as a matter of course. The favorite hue is at last losing its place—probably it has been used too long, or possibly the winter season has had something to do with its being cast aside; but, decidedly, it is now giving place to the warmer and more glowing shades of scarlet and erie.

We have been present at several fashionable weddings of late, and have remarked that not triflingly of woad shade have been invariably selected by the bride-maids as ornaments to their white dresses. The woads retain their whiteness upon white silk dresses more vigorously, and are particularly appropriate to the present dreary season of the year.

As a recent fashionable wedding in London the bride-maids wore rich white gowns trimmed, trimmed round the skirt with two graduated rows of erie ribbon velvet; scarlet flama mantles, trimmed all round the edges and up the centre of the back with an inch or two of white Chapeau guipure; white lace bonnets, with scarlet ribbons. The bride's dress was magnificent in material as well as in proportions. For the skirt instead of ordinary more than one yard and a half along the side as the fair lady walked up to the altar. It consisted of rich white satin, cut out in wide deep scallops round the edge of the skirt, each scallop measuring more than twelve inches in breadth. Dozens of erie ribbons followed the outline of the scallop a short distance up the skirt, and above the bonnetings were rappings of satin and a splendid flower-like bustle.

We may be permitted to question whether a bride's dress cut with a train a yard and a half long is not very inconvenient in the weather. With its Court train, which, as every one knows, is separate from the dress, it is a manageable subject, for in getting in and out of a carriage it can be thrown over the arm and carried gracefully; but when the skin itself is cut with a train twenty yards long, then it appears to involve a necessity of rolling and unrolling previous to entering the church and ascending to the carriage, which must be even more embarrassing to the lady who wears it than to the operators who witness the ceremony.

At a proposed Fancy Ball in Paris, it is announced that two phantoms, one married and the other single, are to appear as birds. The widow is to represent a crow, and the youngest a humming-bird. The first will wear a white satin dress, with swallows round the lower part of the skirt, arranged as a trimming; the front of the bodice will be white satin, and the back black velvet, cut about with erie, so as to represent the long-pointed bill of a swallow; one swallow with out-stretched wings is placed on each shoulder, and a large one will form the head-dress.

The humming-bird will be much more brilliant. The young lady wears a short emerald-green satin dress, ornamented with humming-birds, the throat and sleeves of which are made up with veritable feathers from the most gorgeously-colored singing-birds. The wings and breasts are placed flat upon the material, and at a short distance here all the effect of a flight of birds suddenly stayed in their passage through the air by the green stuff. The bodice looks as though it were fastened with knotting-birds of almost microscopic dimensions, so minute are their proportions. These birds are represented, not in feathers, but in brilliant metallic substances, which seemingly change color with every position they are placed in. The bodice is made of ruby velvet, embroidered with white beetle beet, and the head-dress consists of three small humming-birds lighting amidst the curls.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN ENTERING RICHMOND, APRIL 4, 1865.

KATTIE AND "THE DEIL."

In a certain village of Bohemia lived a peasant woman called Kattie. She possessed a little bit of her own, a garden, and a small incense; but had she rolled in wealth, not a lad would have ventured to say—"Kattie, will you be mine?" for she was snappish as a cat of the woods, and owned a tongue which worked like a fall. She had an old mother, provisionally as deaf as a log, and her she scolded from morning till night, so that her voice was audible half a mile off. If any neighbor entered her cottage, she spat, and set up her back, and hissed so that the intruder was only too glad to escape without a scratched face. When any one passed her door, Kattie fung him a spiteful word; and was only too glad if the passer stopped to retaliate, for if he had an ugly expression to cast at her, she had a dozen to put him with in return.

By the time that she had reached the age of forty, without having found a lover, all the—milk of human kindness she never had, which might adulterate—but all the vinegar of her nature had become Concentrated Sulphuric Acid, ready to blacken and burn any thing with which it came in contact.

It is the custom in Bohemia for young people to resort to the tavern on Sunday afternoon for a dance. As soon as the fiddle or bagpipe is heard, the lads run into the streets, the girls appear at the cottage doors, and the children peep out of the windows. Young men and women then follow the musicians to the inn, and the dance begins.

Kattie was always the first to follow the fiddler, and to appear in the public house. There she saw the lads whirling about with the lasses, but never in all her life had she been invited by any one to dance: Sunday after Sunday she tried her luck, and hoped against hope; no man solicited her hand as a partner. "Well!" said she, impatiently, one Sunday, "here am I getting an old woman, and I have never danced yet! never saw any thing like the lads here! Such a set of clowns! This is provoking. I'd dance with any one—with the old Deil himself, if he were to ask me!" and she snapped her fingers, and stamped on the ground.

She bustled into the inn, sat down, and looked about her at the whirling, merry figures. Suddenly a gentleman in business suit came into the room, seated himself at the table, called for beer, and had a tumbler filled. Ruminating over the assembly, he rested on Kattie. He "rang to his feet, walked across the room, and with the most graceful bow, and with the most courteous air, offered her the glass.

Kattie, delighted at the attention, drank the beer with avidity, and used room for the gentleman to seat himself at her side. After a few words had passed between them, the stranger fung some silver to the fiddler, and asked for a "solo." The dancers deserted the centre of the room, cleared the area, and the gentleman led Kattie forth to dance.

"Bless us all, it will rain to-morrow!" exclaimed the old people, opening their eyes wide with astonishment.

The lads bit their fingers and the girls hid their faces to conceal their laughter. But Kattie saw no one; she was radiant with joy, now that she had a chance of dancing; and danced the would have, in spite of the whole world laughing.

All that afternoon and all that evening the strange gentleman danced with Kattie, and with her alone.

He brought her gingerbread, almond-rock, and lemon-drops, and she ate and sucked to her heart's content.

As soon as the dancing came to an end the stranger got escorted her home.

"Oh dear!" exclaimed Kattie; "would that I might dance with you forever!"

"That is quite within the range of possibility," replied the stranger.

"Where do you live, Sir?"

"Put your arms round my neck and I will whisper to you," Kattie did so, and presto! the stranger had become a devil, and was flying with her to his home—a place which need not be specified. In he came at the door, lashed in a profuse perspiration; for his neck was a heavy one.

"Now then, Kattie, let go," said he.

"Oh, never! never!"

"Come, there's a dear soul, take your arms off."

"Dearest, never!"

"Why, whom have you got here?" asked the Master of the spirit, in a voice of thunder which had in it a faint thrill of dismay.

"K-K-K-atie," panted the unfortunate devil, struggling to shake his fair load off.

"Kattie!" echoed his Majesty, leaping off his throne, casting aside his bifurcated sceptre, and turning—not exactly pale, but Oxford mixture; "Kattie! here's an end to our quiet life, if that woman becomes an inmate of Pandemonium. She'll bring the place down about our ears. Away with you, Moloch, and do not show your face in here till you have shaken off your dreadful encumbrance."

So there was nothing for it but that the quondam Jager should return to earth and free himself from the embrace of Kattie as best he might.

He flew back wearily and dependingly, with a decided creak in his neck. On reaching earth he seated himself on a flowery bank, and putting on a solemn expression, said, in a hollow voice:

"Kattie, if you do not let go I shall plunge you in molten leimstone!"

"Oh," replied she, with exultation, "I feel no pain so long as I am with you!" and she laid her head on his breast.

"Ah!" Moloch looked vacantly at the landscape. "Kattie!" he resumed, as a brilliant idea entered his head, and illumined his countenance with a momentary gleam of ghastly joy; "Kattie, I am so rich; I will give you a mountain of solid gold if you will only let go."

"What! leave you for filthy lucre? Never, never, never!" and she buried her head in his breast.

"Here's a pretty kettle of fish," said the spirit; "what is to be done now?"

He rose and wandered despairingly over a desolate moor which lay stretched before him.

Presently, staggering under his load, he came upon a young shepherd, in a sheep-skin with all its wool upon it. The evil spirit resumed his former human form, and the shepherd was consequently quite ignorant of who he was.

"Why, my good Sir, whom are you carrying?" asked the shepherd, in perplexity.

"Ah, good friend, I scarcely know! why look you: I was walking peacefully along my way, without thinking of any thing in particular, when, with a hop, skip, and jump, this woman fastened herself to my neck, and will on no account let me go. I want to carry her to the next village, and there obtain my liberation: but I am scarcely in a fit condition to do so, my knees are shivering under me."

"Come now," said the compassionate peasant, "I will help you; but I can not carry her for long, as I have my sheep to attend to: half the way—will that suit you?"

"Ah! I shall be thankful!"

"Now then you! hang yourself to me!" cried the shepherd, addressing Kattie.

The woman looked round, observed that the shepherd was infinitely preferable to Moloch; he was good-looking and young. She let go her hold on the Deil, and click—she was fast as a spring-collar round the shepherd's neck.

The man had now quite enough to carry, what with Kattie, and what with his immense sheep-skin dress; and in a very short while he was tired, and strove to disengage himself from his encumbrance. In vain! Kattie would not listen to his remonstrances, and the more he struggled the tighter she clung.

Presently he came near a pool. Oh, if he could but cast her in! But how? Could he manage to slip out of his sheep-skin? No harm trying; but it must be done very cautiously—very gently. Hist! he has slipped one arm out, and Kattie is none the wiser. Hist! he has slipped the other arm out, and Kattie has not observed it. Now then! he slides his hand stealthily up his breast, and unlatches the collar. He has undone one button, two, three—a heave of the head, a splash, and Kattie and the sheep-skin are in the pond. She sinks—she rises; and her exulting eyes rest upon the shepherd and the evil spirit dancing in an ecstasy of delight on the bank.

"My best friends!" exclaimed Moloch, enthusiastically, "you have laid me under a lasting obligation; you have imposed upon me a debt of gratitude which I never can adequately discharge. But for you I might have had Kattie hanging round my neck through eternity; I might never have been able to shake that woman off; and never," continued the spirit, musingly, "never is a very long word! Now, look you here, shepherd—I am—" In fewer words than I could express it the spirit had described his nature to the young man. "Well, and being what I am, it lies in my power to repay you, in my poor way, for what you have done. I will forthwith proceed to the next town, and will enter into and possess the Chancellor. As soon as all doctors and exorcists have failed to free the Chancellor from me, do you go to the town and offer, for the recompense of two bags of dollars, to liberate the Chancellor from the evil spirit which torments him. Then come up to the bedside, say 'Hocus pocus!' and I will fly away out of the window, and enter into and possess the Prime Minister. When all other means of cure have failed, do you volunteer, at the price of two sacks of gold pieces, to free the Prime Minister. Come to him, say as before, 'Hocus pocus!' and I will fly from him through the window, and possess the King. And now, I warn you, beware how you venture to attempt to expell me from the body of the King. Should you, notwithstanding this caution, risk the attempt, I shall infallibly tear you in pieces, limb from limb."

The shepherd expressed his acknowledgment in the best and most appropriate terms of which he was master. "Ta, ta!" said the Deil, as he spread his wings and flew away.

"Ta, ta!" replied the shepherd, gravely, looking after him. Shortly after this a rumor spread through the country that the Chancellor was not quite—to put it mildly—what he should be. It was whispered aside that the Chancellor had been playing pretty pranks, and that it was asserted by professors of medicine and of theology that he was possessed by a bad spirit. All medicines, allopathic and homoeopathic, having failed to cure the Chancellor, the clergy took him in hand and tried the last approved forms of exorcism, but the Chancellor, or rather the Chancellor's tenant, was proof against all ecclesiastical demonstrations.

The young shepherd now came to the town, and loudly proclaimed his power to cure any one of diabolical possession. All other resources having failed, the King determined to give the shepherd a try, and so ordered him to visit, and prescribe for the Chancellor. As soon as the peasant entered the room he saw that the condition of the highest law officer of the Crown was critical. He was kicking his attendants, abusing them in language hardly consistent with the dignity of his position, and foaming at the mouth.

The shepherd demanded as his fee for curing him two sacks of dollars, and they were readily promised. He now approached the unhappy man, whose convulsions became more terrible as he drew near.

"Hocus pocus!" said the shepherd en retentivo and with a solemn face, at the same time making various fanciful signs in the air with his hand. Away flew the spirit, shivering the panes of glass in the window into countless fragments on his way. The shepherd received his fee, and returned to his cottage.

But it was soon noised abroad that something had gone wrong with the Prime Minister, and it was surmised that the demon which had been expelled from the Chancellor, had entered into the keeper of the King's conscience—awkward, decidedly. What was to be done? Regular practitioners were applied to first, as a matter of course, the allopaths tapped the Minister's constitution with violent medicines without expelling the evil spirit. The homoeopaths did nothing at all, and the divines sent the devil to sleep. When all had failed, recourse was had to the quack, and at the price of two sacks of gold pieces the shepherd agreed to perform a cure. The circumstances resembled those in the former case, with one exception: the window was prudentially opened, and a glazier's bill saved. But now the evil spirit struck at higher game, and took full and undisturbed possession of the King.

As might be expected, people—not one allopathic, homoeopathic, and ecclesiastical systems were tasked to recover the King, and proved, as every one knew would be the case, a failure. Then they sent for the shepherd, but he refused to come. They sent again and offered a room full of gold dust, but he persisted in his refusal, remembering the Devil's warning. The Prime Minister now ordered out a regiment of horse, and had the shepherd-exorcist brought with him. In vain did the poor man protest his inability to cure the King; the Prime Minister insisted, and the Chancellor threatened to put the law in force, which required that the bird which could sing and wouldn't sing should be made to sing. Covered by this threat the shepherd determined to do his best.

He entered the royal apartment. The King was howling and frothing at the mouth, and looked desperate. "Halloo!" roared the spirit within; "you here, shepherd? did not I warn you not to attempt to cast me out of his Majesty?"

"Steady," said the shepherd, putting on an expression of awe; and, stealing on tip-toe across the room, with his hand to his mouth, he whispered: "Do you think me such a fool as to attempt any thing of the kind? I'm only come to tell you, dear friend, that—that—KATTIE IS OUT OF THE POND, AND IS ISQUATTING AROUND YOU!"

"Kattie!" gasped the devil. "Then I'm off!" and away he flew.

IN JEOPARDY.

I'm a bricklayer, I am; and, what's more, I live in the country, where people ain't so particular about keeping trades distinct as they are in the great towns. This may be seen any day in a general shop, where, as one might say, you can get any thing, from half a quarter of butter up to a high lantern; and down again to a hundred of short-bills—well, down in the country I've done a bit of a job now and then as a mason; and not so badly, neither, I should suppose, for I got pretty well paid, considering, and didn't hear more than the usual amount of growlin' arter it was done—which is sayin' a deal. Once ain't the most agreeable of lives, and if it warn't for recollectin' a little about the dignity of labor, and such-like, one would often grumble more than one does.

Some time ago—it don't matter to you, nor me, nor yet any body else, just when it was—work was precious slack down our way—all things considered, I ain't a-going to tell you where our way is. A day's work a week had been all I'd been able to get for quite two months; so Mary, that's my wife, used to pinch and screeve, and screeve and pinch, and keep on squeezing stillin' arter shillin' out of the long stocking, till at last it got so tight that one morning she lets it fall upon the table, where, instead of coming down with a good heavy spring, it fell softy and just like a piece of cotton that was empty. And then, poor lass! she hangs on to my neck, and burst out a-cryin' that pitiful that I'm blest if I didn't want my nose blowing about every quarter of a minute. I hadn't minded the screevin' and pinchin', not a bit of it. First week we went without our puddings. Well, that wasn't much. Second week we stopped my half-pints of beer. Third week I got my pipe out. Mary kep' on sayin' that things must look up soon, and then I should have an ounce of the best to make up for it. But things didn't look up, and, in spite of all the screevin', we got down to the bottom of the stocking, as I said just now.

I hadn't much cared for the pinchin', but it was my poor lass as got pinched the most, and she was a-gettin' paler and thinner every day, till I couldn't bear to see it. I ran out of the house, and down to Jenkins's yard, where I'd been at work last. I soon found Jenkins, and I says to him, "Governor," I says, "this won't do, you know; a man can't live upon wind."

"True for you, Bill Stock," he says.

"And a man can't keep his wife upon wind," I says.

"Right you are, Bill," he says; and he went on and spoke as fair as a man could speak, and said he hadn't a job he could put me on, or he would have done it in a minute. "I'm werry sorry, Bill," he says; "but if times don't mend, I tell you what I'm a-going to do."

"What's that?" I says.

"Go up to London," he says; "and if I was a young man like you, I wouldn't stop starrin' down here, when they're giving first-class wages up there, and when there's building going on all round, as thick as thick, and good big jobs, too: hotels, and railways, and bridges, and all sorts."

I fees round sharp, and walks off home; for when a feller's hungry and close up it lays hold on his temper as well as his stomach, more especially when there's somebody belonging to him in the same fix. So I walks off home, where I finds Mary a-lookin' werry red-eyed; and I makes no more talk but I gets my pipe, and empties the bit o' dust there was in the bottom of the jar into it, lights up, and sits down side of Mary, and puts my arm round her, just as I used in old courting times; and then begins smokin' an' thinkin'. Werry slow as to the first, and werry fast as to the second; as smokin' costs money, and the dust was dry; whereas thinkin' came cheap just then—and it's cur-purin' how you can think on an empty inside. I suppose it is because there's plenty o' room for the thoughts to work in.

Well, I hadn't been settin' above a minute like this, when my lass lays her head on my shoulder, and though she wouldn't let me see it, I knowed she was a-givin' way; but I didn't take no notice. Perhaps I had her a little bit tighter; and there I sat thinkin' and watching the thin smoke, till I could see buildings, and scaffolds, and heaps o' bricks, and blocks o' stone, and could almost hear the ring o' the trowels, and the "sur-jar" o' the big stone saws, and there was the man a-runnin' up and down the ladders, and the gaugers a-givin' their orders, and all seemed so plain that I began to grow warm. And I keeps on smokin' till it seemed as though I was one of a great crowd o' men standing round a little square wooden office place, and being called in one at a time; and there I could see them a-takin' their six-and-thirty shillings and two pounds apiece as fast as a clerk could book it. And then all at once it seemed to fade away, like a fog in the sun; and I kept on drawing, but nothing came, and I found as my pipe was out, and there was nothing left to light again. So I knocked the ashes out—what there was on 'em—and then I breaks the pipe up, bit by bit, and puts all the pieces in my pocket—right-hand trousers-pocket.

"What for?" says you.
"Not for a thing, as I know; but that's what I did; and I was a-telling you what happened. Perhaps it was because I felt uncomfortable with nothing to tattle in my pocket. However, my mind was made up; and brightening up, and looking as cheerful as if I'd six-and-thirty shillings to take on Saturday, I says to her as was by my side: "Polly, my lass, I'm a-going up to London!"

"Going where?" she says, lifting up her head.

"London," I says; at (then I began to think about what going to Lon'on meant. For, mind you, it didn't mean a cheap in a rough jacket making up a bundle in a clean blue sashkercher, and then shovin' his stick through the net and sticking it over his shoulder, and then a fling his hands in his pockets, and taking the rest upwards, white as like a blackbird. No; it meant something else. It meant breaking up a tidy little home as two young folks—common people, in course—had been a-savin' up for years, to make so; it meant at half breaking a poor simple lass's heart to part with this little thing and that little thing; leaving up the nest that took so long a-building, and was all as snug arter a cold day's work. I looked at the clean little windows, and then at the bright kettle on the shiny black hob, and then at the werry small fire as there was, and then fast at one thing, and then at another, all so clean and neat and homely, and all showing how proud my lass was of 'em all, and then I thought a little more of what going up to London really did mean, and I suppose it must have been through feeling low and faint and poorly, and I'm almost ashamed to tell it, for I'm such a big strong chap; but that's the truth. Well, somehow a blind seemed to come over my eyes, and my head went down upon my knees, and I cried like a school-boy. But it went off, for my lass was kneeling aside me in a minute, and got my thick old head upon her shoulder, and began a-doin' all she could to make-believe it was all right, and she wouldn't mind a bit, but we'd get on wonderful well up there; and so we talked it over for long enough, while she made-believe to be so cheerful, and knelt at my side, a-sippering away—a-pouting down tonight for herself, and a-carrying I don't know how much for me—till I grieved up, under the discovery that whether work was plenty, or whether work was slack, I, Bill Stock—christened William—was rich in my good wife.

That was something like a thought, that was, and seemed to stiffen me up, and put lone and muscle into a fellow till he felt strong as a lion; so we set to talking over the arrangements; and two days arter, Polly and I was in a halpin' in Lops' den.

Nex' morning I was up at five, and made myself smart; not fine, but clean, and looking as if I warn't afraid of work; and I finds my way to one o' the big work-shops, where the bell was a-ringing for six o'clock, and the men was a-scaffolding in; while a chap with a look was on the look-out to time the late ones, for stepping on pay-day out of their wages—which is but fair, yer know, for if two hundred men lost a quarter of an hour apiece in a week it would come to something stiff in a year. Well, there was a couple more chaps like me standing at the gate, come to see if they could get took on, and one of 'em slips in, and comes out again directly a-swearin' and growling like any thing, and then t'other goes in, and he comes out a-swearin' too, and then I feels my heart go stinking down ever so low. So I says to the first:

"Any chance of a job?" I says.

"Go to—" says he, cutting up rough; so I asks t'other one.

"Any chance of a job?" I says.

"Not a ha'p'orth," he says, turning his back, and going off with the first one; and I must say as they looked a pretty pair of blacks.

So I stood there for quite five minutes wondering what to do; whether I should go in and ask for myself, or go and try somewhere else. I didn't like to try, arter seeing two men refused. All at once a tall sharp-eyed man comes out of a side place and looks at me quite fierce.

"Now, my man," he says, "what's your business? What do you want?"

"Job, Sir," says I.

"Then why didn't you come in and ask?" he says.

"Saw two turned back," I says.

"Oh! we don't want such as them here," he says, "but there's plenty of work for men who mean it," and then he looks through me a'most.

"I suppose you do mean it, eh?"

"Give us hold of a trowel," says I, spitting in both hands.

"Bricklayer?" says he, smiling.

"Right," says I.

"From the country?" says he.

"Yes," says I.

"Work slack there?" says he.

"Awful," says I.

"Ye'll do," says he. "Here, Jones, put this fellow in number four lot."

If you'll believe me, I could have taken hold of him and hugged him; but I didn't, for I kep' it for Polly.

Well—I wonder how many times I've said well since I began!—I was in work now, and I meant to keep it. Didn't I make the bricks and mortar for 'em? My bossman did his day's work that day, if he never did it afore. Then some of the men began to take it up, and got to chaffing; one says there'd soon be no work left; and another says I'd better have a couple o' Paddies to keep me going, one for bricks and another for mortar; while one fellow makes himself precious unpleasant by keeping on going "poff! puff! puff!" like a steam-engine, because I worked so fast. But I let them chaff as long as they liked; and him-by I comes to be working alongside of my steam-engine' friend, and just as he'd been going it a little extra, I says to him quietly:

"Ever been out o' work, mate?"

"Not to signify," he says.

"Cause if ever you are, and come down werry close to ground, you'll be as glad to handle the trowel again as I am." He didn't puff any more that day, not as I heard.

London work was something fresh to me. I need to think that I'd been about some tidy buildings down our way, but what was the tallest on 'em to the London jobs I was put on! Jobs where the scaffolding must have cost hundreds upon hundreds of pounds more than the house, land, and every thing else put together, of the biggest place I had ever worked upon. I used, too, to think I was pretty strong in the head; but I soon began to sing small here—specially when I had been up about a week and was put on at a big hotel. Right up so high that one turned quite creasy, and used to get thinking of what would be the consequences if a sharp puff of wind came and upset one's balance. I could never have believed neither that such a Jacob's Ladder of scaffold-poles could have been built up to stand without crashing and snapping these at the bottom like so many reeds or tobacco-pipes; but I suppose them as builds them knows best what should be done, and what they'll bear. But though I did not like it much, I took good care not to mention it to my lass, for I knew she'd have been on the fidget all day if I had told her.

By degrees I got to stand it all pretty well; and we began to feel a bit settled in our one room. Not that we much liked it, but then it was werry pleasant to go in the evening on pay-day and draw your week's wage, good wage too, just as I had seen it when settin' in my own place at home. We still called it home, for we couldn't get to feel that we were at home in London, and Polly she said she never should, after having a little house of her own; but as there was only our two selves we made things pretty comfortable.

The big hotel was getting on at a tremendous rate, for there was a strong body on us at work, and it used to make me think and think of the loads upon loads of stuff the hotel swallowed up, and how much more it would take before it was finished. One day when I was bricking up at the top—I don't know how many feet from the ground, and I never used to care to look to see for fear of turning giddy—one day it came on to blow a regular gale, and blew at last so hard that the scaffold shook and quivered, while, wherever there was a loose rope, it rattled and beat against the poles, as if it was impatient of being tied there, and wanted to break loose and be off.

It blew at last so werry hard that I should have been precious glad of an excuse to get down, but I couldn't well leave my work, and the old hands didn't seem to mind it much, so I kep' at it. Whenever the wind blows now, and I shut my eyes, I can call it all back again; the creaking and quivering of the poles, the rattling of the boards, the howling and whistling of the gale as it swept savagely by in a rage because it could not sweep us away.

A high wind is pretty hard to deal with sometimes on the ground; and I have seen folks pretty hard driven to turn a corner. So it may be guessed what sort of fun it is right up on a spidery scaffold, where a man is expected to work with both hands and hold on by nothing, and that, too, where a single step backwards would be—there, it's a thing as allus makes me nervous to talk about.

It was getting to be somewhere about half past three, and I was working hard, so as to keep from thinking about the storm, when all at once I happened to turn my head and see that the men was a-scaffolding down the ladders as hard as they could go. And then, before I had time to think, there was a loud crash, and a large piece of the scaffolding gave way and crept with it poles, boards, and bricks right into the open space below.

I leaped up at a pole which projected from the roof above me, just above my head, caught it, and hung suspended, just as the boards upon which I stood but an instant before gave way and fell on to the next stage, some twenty feet below. Tightly clasping the rough fir pole I clung for life.

Think? I did think. I thought hundreds of things in a few seconds as I shot my eyes and began to pray, for I felt as I could not hold on long, and I knew as I should fall first on the stage below, when the boards would either give way or shoot me off again with a spring, and then I knew there would be a crowd round something upon the ground, and the police coming with a stretcher.

"Creep out, mate, and come down the rope," cried a voice from below. I turned my head, so that I could just see that the pole I was hanging to had a block at the end, through which ran a rope for drawing light things up and down to the scaffold. For an instant I dared not move; then, raising myself, I went hand over head toward the polly, and in another instant I should have grasped it, when I heard a rattling sound, and the creaking of a wheel, as the rope went spinning through, and was gone; the weight of the longer side having dragged the other through. As I hung I distinctly heard it fall, perhaps a hundred and fifty feet.

As the rope fell, and I hung there, I could hear a regular shriek from those below; but nobody stirred to my assistance, for I was beyond help then; but I seemed to grow stronger with the danger, though my arms felt as if they were being wrunged out of their sockets, and my nerves as if they were torn with hot irons. Sobbing for breath, I crept in again till I was over the stage first; then close into the face of the building; and there I hung. Once I tried to get some hold with my feet, but the smooth bricks let my toes slip over them directly. Then I tried to get a leg over the pole as to climb up and sit there; but the time was gone by far that. I had hung too long, and was now growing weaker every moment.

I can't describe what I felt. All I know is, that it was terrible, and that long afterward I used to jump up in bed with a scream; for so sure as I was a little out o' sorts came a dream of hanging to that scaffold-pole, expiring every moment to be one's last.

I can't say, either, how long I hung; but feeling at length that I was going, I made one last try for it. I thought of my poor lass, and seemed to see her a-looking at me in a widdler's cap; and then I clenched my teeth hard, and tried to get on to where the end of the pole was fastened. I got one hand over the hard bricks and hooked my fingers and held on; then I got the other hand over, and tried to climb up, as a cheer from below encouraged me; but my feet and knees slipped over the smooth bricks, and in spite of every effort they hung down straight at last, and I felt a sharp quiver run through me as slowly, slowly, my hands opened, my fingers straightened, and, with eyes blinded and bloodshot, I fell.

Fell what seemed to be an enormous distance, though it was only to the next stage, where boards, bricks, and tools, shaken by the concussion, went with a crash below. The deal planks upon which I lay, still kep' in their places, but with their ends jolted so near the edge that it seemed to me that the least motion on my part would make them slip, and send me off again. I was too exhausted and frightened to move, and lay there for some time, not knowing whether I was much hurt or not. The first thing as recalled me to myself was the voice of a man who came up a ladder close at hand; and I could see that he had a rope and pulley with him, which he soon had hooked on to the ladder.

"Hold on, mate," he says. "If I throw you the end of the rope, can you tie it round you?"

"I'll try," I says. So he makes a noose, and pulling enough rope through the block, he slides it to me, but it wasn't far enough. So he tries again and again, and at last I manages to catch hold on it. But now, as soon as I tried to move, it seemed as if something grabbed me in the side, and, what was more, the least thing would, I found, send the boards down, and of course me with them.

"Toll them to hold tight by the rope," says I; and he passed the word, while I got both arms through the noose, and told him to tighten it, which he did by pulling, for I could not have got it over my head without making the boards slip.

"Now, then," he says, "are you ready?"

"All right," I says, faintly, for I felt as if every thing was a-swimming round me; but I heard him give a signal, and felt the snitch of the rope as it cut into my arms above the elbows, and then I swung backward and forward in the air; while, with a crash, away went the boards upon which I had been a-lying.

I couldn't see any more, nor hear any more, for I seemed to be sent to sleep; but I suppose I was lowered down and took to the hospital, where they put my broken ribs to rights in no time, and it wasn't so werry long before I was at work once more; though it took a precious while before I could get on to a high scaffold again without feeling creasy and shivery; but, you know, "use is second nature."

Polly showed me the stocking Cother day, and I must say it has improved wonderful, for wages keep good, and work's plenty; and as for those chaps who organize the strikes, it strikes me they don't know what being out o' work is like. But, along o' that stocking, one feels tempted very much to go down in the country again, but don't like to, for fear o' things not turning out well; and Polly says, "Let well alone, Bill." So I keeps on, werry well satisfied, and werry comfortable.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

The Latest Thing Out—The policeman.

What length ought a lady's criminal to be?—A little above two feet.

Reason!—The nearest reason for getting married that we ever heard was from a man who said he wanted some one to part his back hair for him.

"The rich," said the Jew, "was venison because it is dear; I eat venison because it is cheap."

Why was the giant Goliath very much astonished when David hit him with the stone?—Such a thing had never entered his head before.

Maxim's Law.—The Law of Libel does not apply to a "missing word" case. The parties are not in the same boat.

TRISTE THOUGHTS.

It is quite a mistake, with respect to certain heavenly bodies moving in a brilliant circle, to suppose that is direct proportion to their circumference is their power of attraction.

Matrimony one of the liberal arts? We ask this lawyer in view of two young persons who are all in all to each other, and whose hearts are already united as often as they can be conveniently. This sweet pair propose in a forthcoming announcement to couple with the polite economy of "No cards" the tender detail of "No company."

There is something academic and significant in those feminine titles which have been bestowed on Woman by Man—such gorgeous nomenclature. Matrimony, of course, is her perpetual target, and if a lady does not hit it, she continues till eternity a Miss.

A Testament to the Dams.—The honored chamber is often hung with tapestry. Obedience of dams.

If a man simply asks you to be his enemy, he will probably pay. If he makes you a solemn speech of thanks, saying that he is your debtor forever, he most likely speaks the truth. But if he writes you a touching letter, assuring that he will have his right hand burned off before you shall be hurt, you had better lay aside the money as soon, as you are able to be let it.

A former who had passed unnumberable sleepless nights agonizedly harassed by discovering a method for keeping babies quiet. The mode of operating is as follows: "As soon as the smaller awakes, set it up, propped by a pillow, if it can not sit alone, and smear its fingers with thick molasses; then put half a dozen feathers into its hands, and it will sit and pick the feathers from one hand to the other until it drops asleep. As soon as it wakes a gain, molasses and more feathers, and in place of the seven-monthing yola, there will be silence and enjoyment unexpressible."

PADDY MAKES HIS ECHO.

In the gap of Paddy's
There's an echo or so;
And some of them believe in very surprising
You'll think in this state
That I came to believe—
For a laddie's a thing you expect to find lies in But earth and these
In that hill forest you
There's an echo as sure and as wide as the bank too;
If you civily speak,
"How do ye do, Paddy Bickler?"
The echo politely says, "Very well, thank you."

One day Teddy Keogh
With Kate Connor did go
To hear from the echo this wonderful talk, Sir;
But the echo, they say,
Was contrary that day,
Or perhaps Paddy Bickler had gone out for a walk, Sir.
"Now," says Teddy to Kate,
"The one best to be laid
By this God and dumb bairn of an echo, so say;
But if we both speak
To each other, no doubt
We'll make up an echo between us, my daisy!"

"No, Kitty," says Teddy,
"To answer, be ready."
"Oh, werry well, thank you," cries out Kitty, then, Sir,
"Would you like to be werry, Kitty Bickler?" says Ted.
"Oh, werry well, thank you," says Kitty again, Sir.
"Do you like me?" says Teddy.
And Kitty, quite ready,
Cries, "Very well, thank you," with laughter beginning;
I think you'll confess Teddy could not do less Than pay his respects to the lips that were smiling.

Oh, dear Paddy Bickler,
May you never forsake
Those lips that return as such replies extracting;
And may girls all tremble
Their soft answers like Kate,
No faithless fading, no treacherous feeling,
And, best, be you ready,
Like Paddy Bickler—
Be scarce in being, though given to joking;
And those who're inclined,
May all true lovers find Sweet echoes to answer from hearts they're loving.

One of the editors of a New Orleans paper, when at the beginning to learn the printing business, used to visit a printer's daughter. The next time he attended the meeting he was taken down at hearing the minister utter as his text, "My daughter is grievously tormented with a devil."

Two lawyers, when a kindly citizen died, took heads, and were about to sit in a row.
"Round!" said the leading client, "How come you to be such friends, who were both engaged to my daughter?"
"That fool!" says one: "We lawyers, then, have no like share, or'er our cat o' nine tails—what wife's concern?"

Presch gives some good advice to women in looking for suitable husbands. Among other things he says: "The man who don't take tea, or drinks the tea, takes snuff, and stands with his back to the fire, is a brute whom I would not advise you to marry on any consideration, whether for love or money, but do not let me see you. For the man who, when tea is over, is discovered to have had some, is very sure to make the best husband—fairness like his deserves being rewarded with the best of wives and the best of mother-in-laws. My dears, who a you seek with such a man, do your best to marry him. In the severest winter he would not mind going to bed first."

The best way to expand the chest is to have a large heart within it.

"Dar' er," said a sabbie orator, addressing his brethren, "Two minds are the world. He who has a broad and narrow mind do't leads to perdition, and do oder a narrow and broad mind do't leads to destruction." "If dat can be case," said a sabbie hearer, "dis sabbie individual takes to de woods."

All Out.—A man asked a servant, "Is your master at home?" "No, he's out." "Your mistress?" "No, she's out too." "Well, I'll just step in, and take a name as the fire till they come in." "Faith, Sir, and that's out too!"

"I wish to look at some shoes for my wife," said a very important-looking lady entering a shoe store.
"Yes, ma'am," replied the obliging clerk, instantly displaying a dozen pairs of any make to suit lady shoes. In five the second-best dress.

"I don't want these, Sir. What shoes is my daughter in a greenish army woman, and some faded slippers number 4-4."

"No more can be any thing against his will," said a metaphysician to an Irishman. "By Jove, I had a brother," said Pat, "that with to Henry John, and both I know it was greatly against his own will."

"I will let you a bottle of wine that you shall descend from that chair to see I ask you, Sir." "Then," said the gentleman, who seemed determined not to obey the command so obediently, "I'm down." "I'm in bed," was the reply. "How long till I ask you a second time?" The gentleman, having no desire to repeat his fall, took that perch, came down from the chair, and his next was the wagon.

FOUNDERING OF THE STEAMSHIP "LONDON" IN THE BAY OF BISCAY.—[See Page 190.]

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL PRIM.—[Photographed by FERRISS & Co.]

GENERAL PRIM.

Don Juan Prim, the leader in the late attempt to overturn the Spanish Government, bore the rank of Lieutenant-General in the national army of Spain. He is Viscount del Bruch, Count de Reus, Marquis de Los Castillejos, and Grande of Spain of the first class. He was born at Reus, in Catalonia, December 6, 1814. He fought against the adherents of Don Carlos in the six years of civil war, terminating in 1839. At the close of the war he was elected Deputy to several successive Parliaments. In 1844 he is said to have been seriously implicated in a conspiracy against NARVAEZ, then at the head of the Government, the upshot of which was an attempt to assassinate the Prime Minister as he was driving to the Opera one evening, by firing at his carriage in the Calle de Ballesta. NARVAEZ himself fell the person killed by the shot. NARVAEZ, DON CARLOS, who sat in the front seat with him, escaped with their lives. Not so NARVAEZ's aide-de-camp, BARRERA, who was in the back seat and was shot dead on the spot. PRIM was tried with others, convicted of participation in the murder, and condemned to death; but NARVAEZ, either out of a very extreme magnanimity or possibly from some intimate conviction of PRIM's innocence, induced the Queen to cancel the sentence.

In 1854 General Prim was sent as Spanish Military Commissioner to the camp of the Allies during the Crimean war. On his return from the East he passed through Paris, where, in 1856, he married a Mexican lady, Senora ESCOBAR, who brought him a dowry of $600,000, with expectations of no less a fortune from her mother, and $1,000,000 from each of her two uncles. He was promoted to his present rank in the army in 1856, and in 1858 was raised to the Senate. In 1861 the joint expedition to Mexico of England, France, and Spain was projected, and Prim was sent out in command of the Spanish contingent, being charged at the same time with the duties of a Minister Plenipotentiary. How Prim proceeded to Mexico with the French and English contingents, and came back with the latter, leaving to the former alone the task of a complete subjugation of Mexico and the installment of a Mexican dynasty there, are matters of well-known contemporary history.

Under the Ministry presided over by Sator Mox, Prim was again implicated in some underhand manœuvre which caused him to be banished or "confined" to Oviedo. He was recalled by NARVAEZ, during his last Administration, and is nevertheless said to have joined O'DONNELL in the efforts made by the latter to cast his rival, by fair means or foul. Soon after O'DONNELL's accession to power, however, Prim seemed to recall to memory his former political predilections; he joined himself with ESPARTECO, and threw himself with all his influence into the interests of the Progressistas.

It was on January 3 that General Prim left Madrid on his "shooting excursion," and placed himself at the head of the mottos cavalry regiments at Aranjuez. His insurrection has not been supported with any great force, and he has retired to Portugal.

SAILING ON THE ICE.

An engraving which we publish on this page illustrates one of the most exciting of winter recreations on the Hudson. It represents a boat on skates, as it is spoken, and impelled by the wind in the same manner as an ordinary yacht. With a strong wind and smooth ice these novel craft glide along with almost fearful velocity, attaining a speed said to equal, if not exceed, a mile per minute, or greater than that of the most rapid locomotive.

These ice-yachts on the Hudson are all made on the same general plan. A light frame, 13 feet long, partially floored, is secured to a transverse plank, 13 feet in length, by two bolts and rubber springs. To this movable runners are attached, thereby giving an easy motion to the boat. The stern rests on a third runner, which forms the apex of an equilateral triangle. By this the helmsman guides his boat in perfect safety while flying literally with the speed of the wind.

Poughkeepsie, New York, claims precedence in the proper construction of these glacial yachts. Great rivalry exists among the ice-boatmen, each striving to lead the "fleet" in the constantly-occurring races during the winter season.

THE HARBOR OF CALLAO.

Prim, having entered into an alliance with Chili, has declared war against Spain. The Peruvian and Chilian fleets have effected a junction, and all Spaniards residing in the province of Lima have been forbidden to leave the country. We our readers are aware this war is in consequence of the seizure of the Chincha Islands, with their valuable deposits of guano, by the Spanish fleet, as a material guarantee for the compensation which is claimed on behalf of some Spanish subjects lately resident in Peru. These circumstances give some additional interest to our engraving of the Harbor of Callao, the chief Peruvian seaport. The town of Callao, when not covered with mist and cloud, which is too often the case, presents a pretty and pleasing aspect from the water. The streets, indeed, are dirty in the extreme; but the view of the country around, studded with trees and verdure, and bounded by ranges of deep blue hills in the distance, is agreeable and picturesque. One clear day the towers of Lima, the metropolis of Peru, may be seen at the base of the hills sparkling in the sun, as shown in our engraving. The two forts on the right were built by the Spaniards before the era of Peruvian independence. They form a prominent feature of the town, being constructed of stone and colored a bright yellow. The Peruvian fleet consists of a frigate, an iron-clad ram on the Nesvise principle, and one or two gun-boats and mail-packets converted into war-ships, besides a sailing fleet. The Peruvians have also attempted to build a Monitor, carrying a revolving turret; but though now afloat, and with her turret fixed, she is capable of doing an amount of speed as to be of little or no service should the Spaniards take it into their heads to bombard the port of Callao.

WRECK OF THE STEAMER "LONDON."

For many years no shipwreck has created a more profound sensation than that of the steamship London, bound for Australia, which foundered at sea soon after leaving the British Channel, and on the 11th of January went down with over two hundred souls on board. The late fearful gales off the European coast have left behind them many a signal monument of their power for destruction, but none other so remarkable as the disaster which forms the subject of our illustration on page 128.

The London was one of the finest ships for strength that ever left the Thames. She belonged to Wigham & Son, and was of nearly 3000 tons burden. She had been built about a year, and had made two voyages to Melbourne and back, and her success had raised the great expectations which had been entertained respecting her as a vessel competent to steer around the Southern Cape to Australia. But the gales off the British coast proved fatal to a vessel that had successfully encountered the difficulties of this southern voyage.

The London left the East India Docks December 28, commanded by Captain MARTIN, an Australian navigator of great experience, and, as the event proved, a man of great moral courage. As the night of the 10th was unusually wild, and the wind dead ahead, the vessel brought up at the Nore, and remained there the whole of the next day, which was Sunday. There were two clergermen on board, the Rev. Dr. WOOLLEY, Principal of Sydney University, and the Rev. Mr. DEANES, and both took part in the usual Sunday services. At daybreak on Monday, the 1st of January, the anchor was weighed, and the ship steamed down the Channel still against a head wind, but making fair way. While passing outside the Isle of Wight the wind increased to half a gale, and Captain MARTIN deemed it prudent to put back and lay to for the night in St. Helen's Roads.

On the morning of January 2 the vessel proceeded into the open Channel; and as she ran down, the wind, which was at first light, increased blowing a gale right ahead, with a rolling sea all the way to Plymouth. Here she took on the first and second class passengers who had arranged to join her at Plymouth. Some incidents in connection with this halt—this interlude between the storm which had been already encountered and the storm that was to come—are worthy of record as illustrating the apparently fortuitous disposition of our lives by the hand of Providence. How fortunate for the second-class male passenger who, apprehending the possible fate of the vessel, resigned his passage at Plymouth and returned home! How fortunate, also, for the lady who, after repeated applications to the owners' agents at Plymouth, was finally excluded from among the doomed passengers by the Captain on the ground that his cabin was already full; and for a young man who had taken passage on account of some family quarrel, and who at Plymouth was induced to forgo his voyage! But, on the other hand, what a fate it was that, with the persistence of Nemesis, had followed, and on this occasion succeeded in overtaking, a poor old couple with their three children, who had, on two occasions previously, attempted in vain to go upon the voyage, and each time in a vessel that was wrecked before it reached its destination, but who succeeded the third time in gaining a passage upon the London, and were drowned with their unfortunate companions!

At midnight, on Friday, January 5, the London proceeded on her voyage, and on Sunday the wind again threatened, with a head-sea rising. In the night the wind increased to a gale, and the sea still rose. On the morning of Tuesday, the 8th, while the Captain was endeavoring to keep the ship in her course by means of the screws, the violence of the gale carried away at one sweep the jib-boom, the foretop-mast, the gallant-mast, and the royal-mast. It was impossible to again secure these. At this crisis, the gale all the while continuing to increase, with a sea running mountains high, the Captain seems, for the first time, to have become seriously alarmed, though he had not been in bed the previous night. Still the engines were kept steaming ahead, and there was no anxiety felt as to the ultimate safety of the ship. About the middle of the afternoon a tremendous sea struck the ship, carrying the port life-boat clean away from the davits.

The next morning, the 10th, the Captain turned the ship about for Plymouth. In half an hour after the ship's course had been altered another blow from the sea carried away a second life-boat and stove in the starboard center. At noon a heavy cross-sea was running, with the wind dead astern, which caused the ship to roll heavily and much impeded her progress. But no danger was even now anticipated, and all through the evening of Wednesday and long after midnight the ship continued to steam slowly ahead, the Captain and his officers remaining steadily at their posts and the passengers appearing to have full reliance upon the skill of Captain MARTIN to bring them safely to port. At 10.30 P.M., the ship still rolling deeply in a heavy cross sea, and the wind blowing a whole gale from the southwest, a mountain of water fell heavily over the waist of the ship, and spent its destructive force upon the main hatchway over the engine-room, completely demolishing this massive structure, measuring 12 feet by 8 feet, and flooding with tons of water this portion of the ship. Instant endeavors to repair the hatchway were made, with a promptitude and vigor eddying round with the imminent crisis. Every spare sail that could be got at, and even blankets and mattresses from all parts of the ship, were thrown over the aperture, but each succeeding sea stepped by the vessel drove away the frail resource of the moment, and not more than ten minutes after the hatchway had been destroyed the water had risen above the funnels, and up to the waists of the engineers and firemen employed in this part of the ship. The lower decks were also now flooded with the rush of water the ship was continually taking in. The chief engineer remained at his post until the water had risen above his waist, when he went on deck and reported that his fire was out, and his engines rendered useless. Captain MARTIN, with calm composure, remarked that he was not surprised; on the contrary, he had expected such a result. Finding his middle ship at length little more than a log on the water, Captain MARTIN immediately ordered his main-top-sail to be set, in the hope of keeping her before the wind. The difficult work had scarcely been accomplished when the force of the wind tore the sail into ribbons, with the exception of one corner, under which the ship lay throughout the remainder of the night. The dock-ey-eyes, supplied with steam by a boiler upon deck, and all the deck-pumps, were kept going throughout the night, and the passengers of all classes, now aroused to a sense of their imminent danger, shared with the crew their arduous labors. Notwithstanding every effort the water still gained upon the pumps, and the gale continuing at its height, cross seas with tremendous force were constantly breaking over the vessel, which at length succumbed to the unequal conflict. From this moment the motion of the ship was low and heavy, and she refused to rise to the action of the waves. At a quarter after 4 o'clock on Thursday morning she was struck by a stern sea which carried away four of her stern posts, and admitted a flood of water through the breach. From this time all efforts were useless; and at day-break Captain MARTIN, whose cool intrepidity had never for a moment forsaken him, entered the cabin, where all classes of the passengers had now taken refuge, and, appealing to the universal appeal, calmly announced the cessation of all human hopes. It is a remarkable fact that this solemn admission was as solemnly received, a respectful silence prevailing throughout the assembly, broken only at brief intervals by the well-timed and appropriate exhortations of the Rev. Mr. DEANES, whose spiritual services had been necessary during the previous twenty-four hours.

The next morning the fatal 11th, the Captain informed those in his charge that the ship was sinking and they must prepare for the worst. A life-boat was lowered with five men in her, but was immediately swamped, though the men were got on board again. Was there no hope, then, in that last resort, the life-boats? Then indeed the situation was desperate. All the passengers and crew gathered as by one consent in the main saloon, weeping and with pale, panic-stricken faces, but with no tumult, no frantic exhibition of terror.

About 2 o'clock in the afternoon, the water gaining fast on the ship, and no signs being apparent of the storm subsiding, a small band of men determined to trust themselves to the mercy of the waves in a boat rather than go down without a struggle. Leaving the saloon, therefore, they got out and lowered away the port cutter, into which sixteen of the crew and three of the passengers succeeded in getting, and they launched her clear of the ship. These thirteen men shouted to the Captain to come with them; but with that heroic courage which was his chief characteristic, he declined to go with them, saying, "No, I will go down with the passengers; but I wish you God-speed and safe to land!" The boat then pulled away, tossing about helplessly on the crests of the gigantic waves. Scarcely had they gone 80 yards, or been five minutes off the deck, when the fine steamer went down stern foremost with her crew of human beings, from whom one confused cry of helpless terror arose, and all was silent forever. Those in the boat were saved, being rescued the next day by the Italian bark Adriano. Among those lost, numbering all together 238, was the distinguished actor GREYVES VANDAN BROOK and his sister. The cause of the wreck of the London was probably the large amount of iron on board.

PORTRAITS OF WASHINGTON.

THE PORTRAITS OF WASHINGTON, nine in number, which we give on our first page are now for the first time grouped together in a single series. Two of these portraits have, we think, never been engraved before. One of these, painted by JOHN CATRAN, represents WASHINGTON in the regalia of a Freemason. It was for many years in the BARNARD family mansion, at Frederickburg. The other is a copy of one painted soon after the battle of Princeton (whether by CHARLES WILSON PEALE or V. M. POLK is uncertain), and believed to be the only original picture of WASHINGTON in his full uniform as Commander-in-Chief, except that in possession of the ARDENSON family. The original painting was housed in the house of EMERSON J. LEE in 1864 by HENRY'S firemen. But two years before an excellent copy of it was painted at Washington for Hon. CATRAN LIVES, of Lyonsville. This and the ARDENSON picture were painted at about the same time, while General WASHINGTON was on the AUDUBON farm, after the battle of Princeton. The ARDENSON picture, we understand, is for sale. These two pictures were considered to be the best portraits of WASHINGTON during the active portion of his life.

The portrait which is known to have been painted by C. W. PEALE, in 1772, represents WASHINGTON at forty years of age, in the uniform of a Virginia Colonel of that day. PEALE was a remarkable man. He entered the Revolutionary War at an early period of the contest, and from studies commenced at Valley Forge he painted another full-length portrait of WASHINGTON as Commander-in-Chief at the battle of Princeton. This latter portrait is in the National Institute at Washington.

Dr. MANN'S portrait represents WASHINGTON as a young man of twenty-five. The portrait of WASHINGTON which is most familiar to every body is STRAUB'S, which represents him at a very late period. This is more massive and grand than any of the others. The original head is in the Boston Athenaeum in an unfinished state. The celebrated "Pierler" portraits were copied from STRAUB'S.

The portrait by STRAUB'S, painted in the latter part of the last century, was considered by his family the most faithful likeness of any extent.

A COMFORTABLE DOCTRINE.

When Dr. Livingstone was sleeping one night in the course of his explorations a lion seized and shook him, with a view to further proceedings. It is not many men who can say with Miss Peck-will that they have "lived to be shook" in such a style as this. The doctor records it as his experience that the result of this shaking was to superinduce a sort of comatose state—a feeling half of numbness, half of contented repose—in which he disregarded pain, and had no considerable dread of the tearing of flesh and limbs which was to precede his death. Thereupon he suggests the idea that, perhaps, the practice of shaking their prey which is observed in all feline animals, as well as in dogs and in some of the more violent fishes, is a Providential arrangement to spare the necessary victim pain. If we look into tales of death by violence, we shall see in very many cases some such preparation for a comparatively easy death; easy, that is to say, as compared with the horror which the account excites in those who hear or read of them. This would appear to be notably the case in some kinds of railway accidents. The shock and jar of a collision has something peculiarly numbing about it. Passengers who escape unhurt from such a catastrophe relate that they suddenly became conscious of something happening or being about to happen, and knew nothing more till they found themselves faced round the other way, or heels upmost, or entangled in some of the many strange ways in which the human body is found to be contorted after accidents of this kind. There has been no blow to account for a loss of consciousness; there is no bruise to show, no outward injury done, and yet locomotion of a very complicated and difficult nature has been collected, and a space of time has passed which can not by any means be called instantaneous, for it has sufficed to crush and twist or to roll and to come to an end, and the transported passenger finds himself settled and stationary. A Scotch physician who was in a bad railway accident some years ago discovered himself sitting at the top of the cutting in which the accident occurred, externally unharmed, as if he could not have been thrown there; indeed, from the nature of the case, he could not have been. How he had got there he had no conception; and it seemed quite certain that he had not been carried or in any way helped there. His nervous system was so completely thrown out of gear that he never recovered from the shock. It can scarcely be doubted that had death come upon him in any form whatever during the interval which elapsed between his leaving the carriage and his finding himself quietly seated on the cutting, many yards away from the ruined train, he would have met it without conscious suffering. And, without going through such a hazardous ordeal as this, large numbers of persons have had experience which points in the same direction. A man who is a bad sailor, and has crossed the Channel in really dirty weather, sitting on the deck, knows what it is to be suddenly lifted, as it were, from his seat by some strange power, such as that which carried the prince and princess in the "Arabian Nights" backward and forward through the air, and deposited ever so far off in a heap, among various obvols of umbrellas and chapeaux, and other impediment of a sick passenger on a stormy day. At the moment of his deposit, and for some moments after, no imminence of death in any form could have much effect in rousing him even to a struggle to evade it. And such the same result follows sometimes from what the Irish call a gentle tap on the head; so that in many very horrible accidents resulting in prolonged "agenies of death," which make every nerve of one's body quiver at the bare recital, there are great chances in favor of the victim's having received just some preparatory jerk, or shock, or blow which paralyzes that part of his system to whose sensitiveness pain is due, and so render him unable to feel the lengthened passage. And this may very well hold in the case of those who struggle and cry aloud in their apparent torture, even as the "subject" under the surgeon's knife makes signs of pain when his nerves are under the blessed influence of an anæsthetic. It is a comfort to think of such things in these days, when steam locomotion and steam machinery bring to so many households the horrors of a dreadful death to enhance the usual sorrow for death. And, in face of the terrible catastrophe in the Bay of Biscay, it is a great comfort to think that a similar effect is often produced, though perhaps not to so high a degree, by fatigue, by exposure to wet and cold, by prolonged and anxious doubt. Sea-sickness has especially, and to a very high degree, this effect. A man under its influence will constantly say, "Do with me what you will." If he were to fall overboard he is sure he should make no effort to save himself. If he is told that the ship is sinking, the announcement has but little interest for him. In that storm in which the London went down, long before a tenth part of the passengers could have become accustomed to the motion of the vessel, we may be sure that there were many whose ordinary sufferings rendered it impossible for them to have that keen perception of the horrors of the situation which each fresh detail brings to us on land. And of the rest large numbers must have been tired into resignation, tired by the efforts at self-preservation and the preservation of others they had so spiritedly and so nobly made, tired by exertions the very intention of which precluded the possibility of much agony of anticipation while such exertions lasted. Many again of those whose sex or age or infirmities forced them to be somewhat inactive spectators of all that went on, were doubtless only half alive to their trials. The discomforts of a vessel on which the sea was making clear breaches, the numbness of cold and the results of exposure to wind and spray, the deafening noise of the elements and the confusion of all within the ship—all these and many more influences would be at work to reduce periods of weak constitution to a half-regardless state, some time before death was known to be inevitable.

STARKWEATHER THE MURDERER.

On the last day of January of the current year was concluded at Hartford, Connecticut, the trial of ALBERT L. STARKWEATHER for one of the most horrible murders on record. The prisoner, whose portrait we give on this page, was convicted of murder in the first degree. The sentence was postponed until the meeting of the Supreme Court of Errors on the third Tuesday of February, before which there was to be a new trial; but the evidence of the prisoner's guilt is so overwhelming that to reversal of the verdict could have been expected.

The circumstances of the murder were as follow: Young STARKWEATHER was unmarried, but had been paying attentions to a young lady in Manchester named EMERETT CAMPBELL, who had refused her consent to an engagement, apparently on account of his embarrassed circumstances. According to STARKWEATHER'S OWN CONFESION:

In the early part of the week preceding the homicide his mother, he said, came to Hartford and executed a deed to him of the homestead. Previously (in 1862) she had delivered to him a deed of a lot containing 60 acres, though the deed had never been recorded. In giving him the deed of the homestead she had required him to give in return a mortgage note for $1500 in favor of ELLA, his sister. On the Saturday following, he said, he went to Rockville, and, securing the services of a lawyer there, had the 60 acres of land given to him in 1862 and the homestead which had just passed into his possession deeded by a warranty deed to EMERETT CAMPBELL, thus disposing of her of all the estate to which he held title. On his return home that evening he stopped at Mr. CAMPBELL'S house and gave the deed to EMERETT. When he reached his own home he told his mother what he had done, and she, very naturally, censured him for doing what she pronounced to be a very foolish act, and expressed herself in strong terms. She finally told him, however, that if he was willing to take the deed of the place, as previously agreed upon, and let the note of $1500 in favor of ELLA stand as it was drawn, and would keep the deed in his own name and live on the premises, the arrangement she had made with him with regard to property might remain binding, and if EMERETT would marry him she could come there and live; but if he chose to treat the matter as he had—feeding away all he was worth—he should not have "an inch of the ground."

ALBERT L. STARKWEATHER, THE MATRICIDE.
 (Photographed by E. H. WAITE, HARTFORD, CT.)

The words quoted are precisely those used by her, as stated by FRANK WATSON in this confession. He told her that he would do nothing of the kind—would not take back the deed he had given to EMERETT—and then accused her of interfering with his own and Miss CAMPBELL'S arrangements. Some further conversation of an excited character ensued, which resulted in his mother's going and getting the deed and note (which was in her possession and tearing them up in his presence. High words followed, "and I told her," said he, "that I would be revenged." The destruction of the deed and note rendered the deed he had given to Miss CAMPBELL totally void. "From that time," he added, "until the time of the murder the idea of killing neither did not leave my mind." He said he thought of it constantly—all night Saturday, and Sunday and Monday night, and all the following day, "and the more I thought of it the madder I grew," were the words he used. Monday night he made up his mind to do the deed, as a favorable opportunity was presented by the absence of the hired man and boy. His mother and sister sat up to a very late hour, so they were frequently awakened by him. Toward morning, about 3 o'clock, the house became quiet, and he took the axe from the wood-shed and the knife from a drawer, and proceeded to the bedroom of his mother's sister. On getting there he immediately struck her blows upon the head with the axe, and in so doing started his sister ELLA, who was lying in the back part of the bed, and she sprang up and jumped toward him. He did not expect to kill her, but, snaking as she did, and, as he supposed, striking her, he was led to knock her in the head in order to put her out of the way, that she might not be a witness to his crime against her. To make certain work he used the axe freely, and then stabbed the victim with the knife. Having done this work he says he knocked his head against the wall, and made a bubble on his forehead and ran on the side of his face, and then took his jack-knife from his pocket and cut his shirt and his trousers, so that the entry he had decided to tell, relative to his being attacked by two men, might be believed. After this, in order to cover up the crime, he set fire to the bed, particulars of the burning of which by Mr. WAITE, to whom loans the wardrobe repaired and gave an alarm, appeared in the evidence on the trial.

This is the story as given by the prisoner himself. His counsel put in the usual plea of insanity as the only defense; but the deliberation with which the crime was committed, and with which the attempt at concealment was made after the act, destroy the plausibility of such a supposition, for which the very enormity and unreasonableness of the crime might otherwise have elicited some degree of credence.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 3, 1866.

CUSTOM-HOUSE FRAUDS.

THE Report of the Revenue Commission, which should be carefully pondered by every citizen, and whose admirable philosophy and simple and wise suggestions we have already commended, is fully sanctioned by the Secretary of the Treasury. There are some statements in it which are startling to every taxpayer. Thus the Commission affirms that in its judgment

"the actual losses experienced by the Government through the frauds perpetrated in connection with the New York Custom-house range from twelve to twenty-five millions of dollars."

Now the revenue collected at this post during the last year was about $60,000,000, so that the loss by fraud amounts to from one-fifth to five-twelfths of the whole amount. The largest year exceeds the entire estimate for the Naval Department for the coming year, and is about two-thirds of the sum asked either for the War Department or the Civil Service. The Commission adds:

"A very large part of these frauds arise from the introduction of invoices, excepted with the register and inspectors in the Department of Appraisers."

Here is a very distinct charge. The Appraisers' Department deals mainly with articles upon which an ad valorem duty is imposed. These are probably about one-third of the whole amount of duties; and if we estimate them at $20,000,000, the frauds perpetrated in and through this Department are fully equal to the entire sum collected. The Commissioners cite several instances of the "common, systematic, and shameless manner" in which these frauds are accomplished. Thus they inspected

"two invoices received during the past few months from one of the leading and most respectable houses in one of the chief cities of Europe, one of which contained 25,000 lbs. of the payment of duties was nearly 40 per cent. less in amount than the other which was transmitted for the private account of the importer."

The Champagne makers at Rheims have lately been exposed in this way, and the Commissioners mention half a score of invoices of Rhine wines, in none of which was the amount shown to one-half of the real market value, and in some cases barely one-third.

The case of the Slovak Magazine, to which we have before called attention, is an instance in point. The English publisher of that periodical, we are informed, denies the truth of our statement that the Magazine was entered in our Custom-house at the sum of three farthings. Our English correspondent says: "Mr. STEVENS assures me that this is untrue, and that the work is invoiced unbound at 24 pence," that is, ten farthings. We trust, however, upon the authority of the Commission, that the work was entered at our Custom-house at the sum of three farthings, less than one-third of the sum at which Mr. STEVENS declares that it was invoiced, and, as we are prepared to show, not more than one-sixth of its true market value at the place of production. Certainly if any Custom-house appraiser passed this sum of three farthings he was either grossly dishonest or utterly incompetent; and in this case incompetency is hardly to be supposed, for the price at which the Magazine is sold is plainly printed on the cover. That price is seven-pence, or twenty-eight farthings; and if we deduct one quarter for the difference between the wholesale and retail price, we have twenty-one farthings instead of three as the true market value in London.

Probably the management of the New York Custom-house is no worse than it has been for years, and certainly there are gentlemen of the highest character and capacity in its various departments. But these enormous frauds are the natural result of the system of filling responsible and difficult offices by persons who have no special fitness or training for their work, and no interest in it whatever except to draw their salaries and to make hay while the sun shines. The honest men in the Custom-house with these things reformed as much as any body can wish it. They know how outrageous the swindling is. But it is not enough to know it. It has been long proverbial, and we shall not hesitate to press the matter upon the public attention that something effectual may be done. A new Collector is to be appointed. If he be the right kind of man he will save the Government and the tax-payers millions of dollars. He will do this in three ways:

First—In being by character, experience, and capacity fully competent to manage such an institution.

Second—By displacing first the knaves and then the fools in the different departments.

Third—By sharply watching the invoices of representatives of many "respectable houses" in the chief cities of Europe.

The man who is fit to be Collector of New York will "feel at-risk" with the Revenue Commission, "that the necessity of reform in the management of this institution is more than at present."

THE VETO MESSAGE.

THE Senate did wisely in adjourning after the Veto Message was read. Legislation under such excitement is not likely to be dignified or sagacious. That the Message was a sore disappointment to the true friends of the President can not be denied. Their regret may be measured by the rejoicing of those who would fain use him for their own purposes. Whether those friends are to be found among those who most earnestly advocated his election, or those who most strenuously opposed it, whether those who were in bloody rebellion at the South, and those who heartily supported them at the North, or really the wisest advisers upon the great problem of reorganization, are questions which time will adequately answer.

Of the President's sincerity there is no doubt. That he honestly wishes, as he says, to secure to the Freedmen the full enjoyment of their liberty we fully believe. But he seems to us not entirely master of his own positions. Thus he acknowledges the usefulness of the Freedmen's Bureau as established by the act of last March. But he regards it as a war measure, and war having ceased, he is of opinion that the matter should be left to the States. Yet, if war has ceased, why does he support General Terry's military order reversing the action of the Virginia Legislature? So the President says that in his judgment the late rebel States "have been fully restored, and are to be deemed to be entitled to enjoy their constitutional rights as members of the Union." Yet if this be so, why in his late proclamation restoring the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus did he except the late rebel States? The Constitution defines the conditions under which the right of suspending the privilege may be exercised. It is only when in case of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it. Yet he expressly exhorts us in the Message not to suppose that the United States are in a condition of civil war.

The Freedmen's Bureau is exceptional, but it is so only because the condition of the country is exceptional. All the President's acts in initiating the reorganization of the late rebel States were exceptional. But the question of the hour is very simple in itself, however difficult it may be to answer. How can the United States most surely and judiciously and temperately secure the fruit of the victory they have won? Having given liberty to millions of slaves, how can the authority that conferred it maintain its perpetuity? To suppose that a revised adoption of the Emancipation Amendment, without any specific method of enforcing it, will produce this result is as absurd to imagine that a declaratory resolution would effect it. The Constitution itself contains a guarantee of free speech for every citizen, but it did not secure it in half the country. Why should we expect of an amendment a virtue which does not inhere in the original instrument? The President says that a system for the support of indigent persons was never contemplated by the authors of the Constitution. Certainly not, and this bill is no more such a system than an appropriation for military hospitals would be. It is a simple necessity of the situation. Shall these homeless, landless, forlorn persons be left to the mercies of those who despise and hate them, or shall the United States say, "We cut the bonds that bound you to the ground, and we will protect you while you are struggling to get upon your feet?"

If the President believes that the word of the nation sincerely pledged to the freedmen will be kept by the black codes of South Carolina and Mississippi, his faith would remove mountains. And if he proposes to abandon the freedmen to civil authorities created exclusively by those who think that the colored race should be eternally enslaved, who deny the constitutionality of emancipation, and who have now a peculiarly unconcerned hostility to the whole class, we can only pray God that the result may be what we have no doubt he honestly wishes it to be. We believe that he is faithful to what he conceives to be the best interests of the whole country. And while upon this question we wholly differ from him, we differ with no asperity or suspicion.

WAS Mr. BANCROFT DISCOURTEOUS?

THE charge of discourtesy brought against Mr. BANCROFT for speaking plainly of the position of foreign powers during the war in the presence of their representatives seems to us very superfluous. Congress invited Mr. BANCROFT to deliver a discourse in commemoration of ABRAHAM LINCOLN. To do it properly was to speak of the civil war of which the late President was a central figure; and it was certainly impossible to speak truly of the war without describing the friendly attitude of England and France. Sir FRANKSACK BACON probably remembered that it was his own chief, Lord RUSSELL, who was responsible for the situation in which he found himself. For if the Foreign Minister of England did not hesitate to speak of the United States in its fierce struggle to save its government as fighting for empire, the English Minister in Washington surely has no reason to be offended if in a discourse commemorative of the Chief Magistrate during that struggle the fact was plainly mentioned.

Nor was it surprising that the orator should point the contrast between the American President and the British Prime Minister. They were the heads of the two chief constitutional countries in the world, and they died within a few months of each other. They were most striking and characteristic representatives of their countries and of their differing political and social systems, and the parallel drawn by the orator was entirely natural, appropriate, and instructive. It is simply impossible that the true story of ABRAHAM LINCOLN's life should be agreeable to the spirit that controlled British or French policy during the war, and Congress invited Mr. BANCROFT to tell the truth. He did so with signal and memorable power and effect.

KING COTTON REDIVIVUS.

IN a late Number of this journal it was stated that there was reason to expect that this year's cotton crop would not, under favorable circumstances, fall short of 3,000,000 bales, and might exceed that figure. Further reports from the South, received since that statement was made, go to confirm the views then expressed. Throughout the South, with the exception of a few localities mostly outside of the cotton States proper, land-owners are straining every nerve to plant a great breadth of cotton, the freedmen are hiring readily, and the general report is that every acre cultivated will be planted in cotton to the exclusion of food. It must be expected of course that a certain proportion of the crop will be lost through disputes between planters and freedmen. A certain number of the former will try to cheat their laborers, and a certain number of the latter will desert their employer in the hour of his need. But the best judges do not estimate that the loss from this source will reduce the crop below 3,000,000 bales—if the weather proves favorable.

Assuming that this year's crop marketed between 1st September, 1865, and 1st September, 1867, will amount to 3,000,000 bales, what would be a safe estimate for the crop of 1867? And at what figure would it be safe to estimate the average price of raw cotton, with a three million crop this year, from 1st September, 1866, to 1st September, 1867?

For the ten years ending in 1857, the cotton crop of the United States averaged about 3,000,000 bales, and the price averaged about 10 or 12 cents per pound for middling uplands. In 1849 the crop was less than 2,100,000 bales, and in 1855 it was over 3,500,000. At times the price fell as low as 6 cents per pound, and at other times rose as high as 16 cents for middling uplands. In 1859 cotton culture was stimulated by an increased demand, both abroad and at home, and the crop rose to 3,851,000 bales; in 1859 it further advanced to 4,660,000 bales; and of the crop of 1860, had it not been for the war, it is believed that fully 5,000,000 bales would have been sent to market. The price was then 12 @ 13 cents per pound for middling uplands.

All estimates of the probable crop for 1867 must depend on: 1st. The willingness of the freedmen to labor; 2d. The willingness of the planters to employ them; and, 3d. The price of the staple when grown. No large crop can be made if planters and laborers do not work harmoniously together, and there will be no incentive to grow a large crop if the price of the staple be low. If, on the other hand, the price of cotton be high, planters will be tempted to offer laborers fair wages for fair work, and, according to the ordinary rules of human nature, laborers will be anxious to secure such wages. The "joint" of the question thus appears to be the price of cotton.

Middling uplands is now worth in this city 44 @ 45 cents per pound, nearly four times its value before the war. It seems natural to suppose that no such price can be maintained if we begin to produce crops on the old scale. But, on the other hand, it is equally unlikely that prices can fall to the old figures. Within the past four years the world has made large progress in numbers, civilization, and necessities. The United States alone, which used to require barely 700,000 bales of cotton each year, will now want over a million bales. It is reasonable to suppose that the wants of England, France, Germany, and Russia have increased in a corresponding proportion. This is proved in fact by the firmness of the cotton market in the face of a development of a cotton supply fully twice as large as was expected. Of the countries which, during our war, undertook to supply the world with cotton, Egypt alone succeeded to any extent, and the rapidly increasing consumption of cotton goods in the Levant and Southern Russia fully counterbalances this increased supply. India can never furnish any material amount of cotton to Europe. Nor can the West Indies or Central America until they are better furnished with labor than they now are, or have any present prospect of being. Should the price of middling uplands decline in New York to 25 @ 30 cents in gold, it is hardly likely that the competition of these countries would be felt, and there is reason to believe that spinners at home and abroad would, at such a price, take every bale that could be grown here until the product far exceeded the crop of 1860.

Now, in the old days of slavery, a planter was said to be on the high road to fortune, and was willing to pay $1,000 for adult field hands when he could sell his middling cotton at 12 cents per pound. It is hardly necessary to demonstrate, even to the planters of South Carolina, that free labor is cheaper than slave labor. That is now universally admitted. If then a planter could grow rich by growing cotton at 12 cents per pound with slave labor, what will be the result when he can grow cotton at 25 cents per pound with free labor? Will it not follow, inevitably, that whatever objections the planters may at first entertain to hiring their old slaves, and whatever restiveness the freedmen may evince in renewing their relations with their old masters, both parties will eventually, in view of the obvious profit to be made by harmonious co-operation, agree to work together to grow cotton for the world? To assume that they would not, would be to deny the natural tendencies of human nature.

If the crop of 1866 should amount to 3,000,000 bales, worth on the average 25 cents a pound in gold, it would be safe, in the opinion of sound judges, to look for an increase of 33 per cent. in 1867—say a crop of 4,000,000 bales. There are those who, believing in the broad common-sense of the planters and of the sound instincts of the freedmen, predict that the crop of 1867 will in effect prove the largest ever made—over 5,000,000 bales. But it is best to assume nothing but what can be demonstrated as certain or highly probable. If we raise 3,000,000 bales this year—and the very men who persisted that the negroes would not work in a state of freedom, and that we should not grow a million bales a year for ten years to come, now pin their faith to this estimate—it is reasonable to believe that in 1867 the increase will be as much as is stated. And if in 1859 the world consumed a crop of nearly 5,000,000 bales @ 12 cents per pound, it is also reasonable to believe that in 1867-8, with an advance in all prices throughout the world, and a general increase of population and necessities, a crop of 4,000,000 bales would be consumed without a decline in price below 25 cents a pound.

If these anticipations are realized the United States will be able to export in the fiscal year 1867-8, 3,000,000 bales of cotton worth $100 a bale, say $300,000,000—very nearly enough to pay for all our importations from every part of the world; and the United States Government will realize from the tax of 5 cents a pound, which it is proposed to levy on cotton, not less than $80,000,000 a year—whisk, and tobacco, ought to suffice for its wants.

A MISTAKE.

THE House of Representatives plainly made a mistake in refusing Colonel JOHNSON, of Arkansas, the privilege of the floor, and we speak of the circumstance now because the error may be repeated if it is not exposed. The House has properly, indeed, intrusted to a Committee the investigation of the question upon what terms certain States may resume their relations in the Union, and until that Committee reports the House is honorably bound to take no serious action upon any vital point involved. There is no doubt that the resolution to admit Colonel JOHNSON to the floor was intended to feel the temper of the House, with a view to calling upon it for a snap judgment upon the question already referred to the Committee, and it was unflinchingly a natural indignation with such an effort that induced many members to vote against granting the privilege of the floor.

Yet we are very sure that there was not a single member who so voted who had not as hearty a feeling of admiration and respect for Colonel JOHNSON as any of those who voted the other way; and we should have been glad if Mr. STEVENS or Mr. JULIAN or Mr. KELLEY or Mr. BISHAM or Mr. ELIOT had plainly said so, and, as a mark of honor to a brave and noble citizen, who, under peculiarly trying and adverse circumstances, had been steadily true to the country, had voted to give him the privilege of the floor. That he had credentials as a Representative in his pocket was the proof that other good and true men would have been honored in honoring him. It would by no means have followed that the House was ready to allow Arkansas, without further consideration, to resume her old relations in the Union. The vote would have shown that while his unconditional reception as a Representative was not a point to be decided under the circumstances by his personal merit, yet that the respect of the House for him and his conduct, as well as for that of those who had elected him a Representative, was cordial and profound.

Meanwhile we have no fear that the moral will be drawn by the Union men of Arkansas which has been dolefully set forth. Men tried in the fire for the Union understand perfectly well that the delay in the admission to his seat

INSIDE.
A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

THE SENATE CONSTITUTION.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE current of events presses more and more powerfully upon us as we near the roaring, foaming vortex of Secession. Let us resist it for a moment longer; for even in the waters, comparatively calm and smooth, just outside that vortex, there is a quickening and a current toward that fatal circle, and toward that circle's fatal centre, and all its disastrous result among the black rocks and the surging waters.

Months, and even years, had passed over the young minister at his work there in Somerville. His charge has increased wonderfully from the little seed of its organization. It is no longer an experiment, but a regularly established church and congregation, having a strong family likeness to churches of the same denomination the land over. The old Major gazing down upon his family had heard Know Nothingism wondrously over as the last new thing under the sun. He had heard his daughter Alice say one night to the young minister, lifting her eyes from her slate after having satisfactorily reached the Q.E.D. of her proposition—she was getting fast toward the end of her schooling now—"Mr. Arthur, what is Know Nothingism?"

"I know nothing about it, Miss Alice."

"Oh please!" Miss Alice has said; and is engaged in making a rapid but not fluttering sketch upon her slate of her music-master as he appears at the piano.

"What an expression, Alice!" says Mrs. Bowles, looking up from her sewing. Her eyes are not as strong as they might be, as they were years ago when the Major overhauled first surrendered to them; but Rutledge Bowles must have his share. Rutledge Bowles has left college now—not graduated exactly, but left it. More than now had he consented to waive the post and return to Columbia from Charleston, in the earnest hope that the College Faculty had come to their senses. The last time, however, it was too much, really too much—their course—for him to endure. In company with the other students he again withdrew as to Miss Starr; but this time he could descend no more—could not even entertain such a proposition.

In fact there is, just now, no college at Columbia to descend to. For the time, Student-Secession has killed it. Rutledge Bowles is now in the law office, at Charleston, of one of his father's old friends. That is, he is occasionally in it. What with cigars and wine-parties, games at billiards and the like, he really has but little leisure for the office. Besides, politics must be attended to. Being in Charleston, the Mercury and the Courier must be read, at least glanced over, after breakfast, and an hour or two spent in discussing with the nearest friend the last points of the case. As Rutledge Bowles retires rather late of a night, and rises rather late of a morning, when he has done with the papers and the conversation thereupon after breakfast, it is altogether useless to go to the office that day at least.

Not that he has no purpose in life. Rutledge Bowles has plenty of talent, undisciplined as it is, and superabundance of fire to warm it. He has a purpose before him in life—a purpose to which he would gladly give all his energies. If he could only get to stand upon the floor in Congress, make one good, full speech containing all he would like to say against the North; see the Abolition Members writhe in their seats beneath it, and then have it printed and circulated over South Carolina and the rest of the South, a copy carefully mailed to his mother, he could be content to die, naturally or in any duel which might turn up. Rutledge Bowles has his ideal of human glory, too. Let him have justice done him. Congressman Brooks is the idol of the hour in his latitude—but not with him.

"No, gentlemen," he has said in his knot of friends, "you must permit me to differ from you. I perfectly agree in all you say or can say about that most contemptible fellow, Sumner. But Brooks was wrong to cane him. With all respect for Brooks, the club is not the weapon of a gentleman. Under no circumstances is cudgeling a gentlemanly deed. My idea is simply this: Calhoun would not have done it! If the fellow was a gentleman, call him out. If he is not a gentleman, be unaware of his existence."

But his friends can not agree with him for an instant. He does not know it; but it is the old Major, his grand old father, speaks out in him. And it is amazing in Rutledge Bowles. Not only the young approve the cudgeling; even white-headed men, members of the church, officers of churches, even venerable pastors, think, "under all the circumstances," that Brooks was right. They regret he was compelled to do such a thing in just such a place; but, as it was, he was right, Christ and all his apostles to the contrary notwithstanding. No; Calhoun is Rutledge Bowles's ideal of earthly glory. Not exactly Calhoun the hard student in his youth; nor Calhoun the cold dialectician; nor Calhoun the spotless husband and father; nor Calhoun the irreproachable gentleman only—but Calhoun the scourge of the North. More than once has Rutledge Bowles, strolling along the street there in Charleston, thrown down his freshly-lighted cigar at the door of the public edifice wherein it is enshrined, and gone in yet once more to have another good look at Powers's statue of the old Roman. And Calhoun is an awful presence, standing there in a marble coldness which harmonizes with his character. Only lava cold from Vesuvius could have been better and more significant material. There he stands, his outstretched arm shattered to the shoulder by raging waters and foundering ship. Did Rutledge Bowles read no omen in this of another tempest, another foundering bark, shattering in the future more than that?

"I am astonished at you, Alice," said Mrs. Bowles. "Mr. Arthur tells you he knows nothing of the matter about which you ask him, and you say, Oh please!"

"Yes; but, ma, the girls all say that is just what all their brothers and fathers say when they ask them—and they members of the Order all the time. That is the way it came by its queer name," said Alice, giving unnecessary length on her slate to the fringers of her music-master's widely-extended arms.

"You are right, Miss Alice," the minister replied. "But I am in earnest. And, what is more, I never intend to know any thing more of this new party than I do now."

He was in earnest when he said it; yet we see how he afterward fell from this high estate. And it is almost a positive satisfaction to know that he did not herein. The weaknesses of these ministers are so often internal and undiscovered by the world around, that this error of the Rev. Edward Arthur will help the reader to believe the assurance of the writer of these pages that he was by no means an angel. On the contrary, a man, and a very imperfect one at that.

Yes; Know Nothingism had come and had gone, accomplishing its specific something for God in the land, certainly in this individual. It had been embosomed beneath beds of silk, pamphlets, speeches, as beneath autumnal leaves which had after been so fresh and flourishing. People had submitted somewhat to its merely youthful and unadorned, husbands and mothers, when suddenly they are brought back to their condition of citizens with a shock. In another excitement begins, literally, to riden the horizon!

It had amazed Mr. Neely very much—Mr. Neely was from New Hampshire, and taught school in Somerville—when he first arrived in the South, not to find the negroes working in, from all day and carefully he led up all night. Why they were not in a condition of incessant and universal insurrection had been a puzzle to him, and notwithstanding with him there, before he left the North. Mr. Neely had often read items in the papers before he left the North, and he met with them in the papers of the South after settling in Somerville, to the effect that the blacks in such a county and in such a State had been discovered to be in a conspiracy to rise on a certain fixed day, murder all the whites, plunder and burn all the houses, and—who knows or had any idea of what they would do next? It was a thing in which Mr. Neely took the liveliest, deepest, most nervous interest; yet, for the life of him, he could never get the exact facts of any such case. Every few months he would read of some such conspiracy being discovered, now in this county, now in that, in the State in which he had settled. Officers still he would hear accounts, to the same effect, of which the papers made no mention. It was always the same story—a conspiracy existing, embracing it was not known how many persons; a discovery thereof just before the day it was to break out; certain white men mysteriously involved therein; a dozen or two of the negroes hung in company with one or more white men.

Always exaggerated, the facts were in some cases substantially so. Yet Mr. Neely could not understand the matter for his soul. Who were the white men? What was their motive in exciting the negroes to insurrection? Was it hope of plunder? Was it revenge of private grudges against certain owners? Or was it nothing other than desperate fanaticism? There must be some powerful motive to induce any one to undertake such terrible risk. What was the motive? The detected conspiracy was always followed by confusion on the part of some one or more of the parties involved. What was the confusion? Among so many discovered conspiracies, taking place during so many years, why was no more understanding arrived at of the germ, and process, and end aimed at? The fact and philosophy of the thing—that is what the inquiring mind of Mr. Neely wished to get at. But Mr. Neely never found any body who could cast the least light upon the subject.

Nor would he if he had sought for information throughout the entire South. When such things take place people in the immediate neighborhood thereof are terribly excited; rigid investigations are made; negroes and others are hung; but at last the whole matter remains as much as ever a puzzle and a mystery. A regular organization of white men to excite the negroes to insurrection, with agents abroad? or each case a private, isolated, spontaneous matter? The people of the South know no more on the subject than did Mr. Neely, or than the North from which Mr. Neely came.

So that when, one mid-summer morning, Mrs. Bowles asked her guest, at breakfast, "Mr. Arthur, what do you think of these dreadful burnings we hear so much about?" Mr. Arthur could only reply, "The accounts are greatly exaggerated, madam, I feel confident; beyond that I really do not know what to say or to think."

"We were speaking of the subject last night at Mr. Ellis's house," said Mrs. Bowles. "Mrs. Ellis told me about it before Mr. Ellis came in from his store, and he confirmed all she had said. Stables, mills, private houses have been burned in great numbers; all in different neighborhoods, but all about the same time. In every neighborhood, too, negroes have been arrested and hung. Mr. Ferguson happened to be in to supper. I believe it is the only place in Somerville at which he visits; and he says it is amazing sensible people should be such fools. He does not deny the many simultaneous fires, but accounts for them by the great heat of the summer, which has turned every thing to tinder. Under such circumstances, when the least spark will produce a conflagration, his only wonder is that there are not more fires. We all know Mr. Ferguson, however," Mrs. Bowles adds, with a smile.

"But how does he account for the torpedoes and matches which are said to have been discovered among the negroes—the arms and powder also?"

"Oh! you know Mr. Ferguson. All stuff and nonsense, he says."

"If you will permit me, here is General Lamun's view of the matter," said Mr. Arthur, unfolding a damp paper—the Somerville Star.

"We all know Lamun is a bold, unscrupulous man; but, Yankee as he is, nobody doubts him to be a genuine Southern man, as far, at least, as he can be, poor man!" said Mrs. Bowles. "Please read what he says."

"We have long looked for it," read Mr. Arthur—"have even wondered why the work was not begun before. It is fairly inaugurated, however, at last! True to their infernal principles, faithful, as madmen ever are, to their diabolical threats, the Abolitionists have entered upon their work of fire, and blood, and plunder at last! From innumerable parts of the South and of our own State we hear of awful conflagrations and of detected conspiracies among the blacks. That the whole North is entered upon a crusade against slavery we have no more doubt than we have of the shining of the sun. Advertisements from Texas are to the effect that over the whole of that State conspiracy reigns triumphant. From sources which place the information beyond all doubt we know that there exists a powerful organization, secret, and amply supplied with men and money, sworn to the work. This secret Order has no peddlers, map and look agents, furniture-varnishers, school-teachers, preachers, and the like, traveling over the entire South. Today are these infernal emissaries among us, in intimate intercourse with the negroes, poisoning their minds, supplying them with torpedoes, strychnine, and arsenic, preparing them for what is to come. The signal has already been given. Any night we may wake to fire and carnage unprecedented in the annals of the world. Our houses, our wives—" But here Mr. Arthur stopped. There was much more to the same effect.

"You need not fear my nerves, Mr. Arthur," said Mrs. Bowles, with a smile. "I have heard and read things to the same effect in South Carolina ever since I can remember. I am used to it."

"It reminds me," said Alice, after a pause, "of what you read to us, Mr. Arthur, in Carlyle's 'French Revolution' the other night. You remember the negro alluded to therein standing before the magistrate in St. Domingo, with black seed in his palm covered with a few white seeds. He shook his hand; the white seed had disappeared, only the black seed seemed left! And after that came the awful convulsions there!"

Mr. Arthur ate his breakfast in silence, the negro servant, a smart mulatto boy, waiting assiduously on the table, and hearing all that was said. That was never thought of by any one there. Talk about excluding Abolition emissaries from the South! No public speaker for years past has ever mounted the stump in any part of the South but he has had negroes by scores among his audience: negroes with white children in their arms; negroes attending to the horses; negroes bringing water; negroes loitering around from curiosity. And when, for years past, has any stump speaker filled in his speech to dwell upon Abolition, conveying to his negro hearers, and through them to every black in the South, all the information any human being could convey to them on the subject? It had struck the young minister as a little odd, hearing, on a grand barbeque occasion, Colonel Ret Roberts deprecating from the stump this very thing, when, all the time he was speaking, half a dozen of the brightest mulattoes in the county stood in eager attention within almost arm's-length of him. Save beings to do the work, needing in consequence just so much food, clothing, and the like, the house-flies were little less hooded, save in parentheses of excitement about insurrection.

"For my part," said Alice, motioning Charles, the waiter, to hand her the sirup—she was school-girl enough yet for that—"I wish you had never read me that horrid book, Mr. Arthur. All that description of the peasantry of France in the first part, and how they rose afterward!"

"It was no selection of mine, Miss Alice—" began the guest.

"Oh! I know that, Mr. Arthur; but I do wish, with all my heart, all the negroes were in the Red Sea!" And none but a school-girl could have made such an irrelevant remark, with such singular emphasis too.

"One thing I hardly need say," observed the minister, as they lingered still around the table, "I am not a blood-thirsty character, I believe, and I abhor Lynch-law; but if there be agents among us inciting our servants to insurrection, they are guilty of the most terrible crimes against us, and against the negroes themselves. They can not be watched against too carefully, nor dealt with, when detected, too severely."

"Yes; but what I hate," broke in the impulsive Alice, "is, that we should be in a condition requiring us to be afraid of any body, requiring us to be keeping up a watch all the time. I am a genuine Southern girl," continued she, erect as an Indian, with glowing cheek and sparkling eye, "and I can't bear to think the South should have to be always in a panic about Yankees, and emissaries, and conspiracies. They want us even to be looking around to see if any of the negroes are near before we speak; watching lest they be peeping through keyholes and listening behind doors; whispering and talking low, and using all sorts of devices to hide our meaning. It's a cowardly condition to be in!"

"You foolish girl!" said her mother, smiling at her energy of manner. "Don't parents have things they never speak of freely until their children are sent out of the room? Do we say all we think before our acquaintances even, and friends? What a child you are!"

But, like a willful child, the young beauty only arched her brows and shook her head.

"I only know you always taught me, and you have always taught me, and all I have read has taught me to admire England; and I'm sure there's nothing of the sort—the continual trembling and apprehending I mean—there; is there, Mr. Arthur?"

"There is in Austria and in Italy," replied that gentleman. "I have read about the Charists of England, and the Irish, the French, too, over the Channel; but to what degree they are feared I really can not say. But I must go to my books."

As the weeks rolled by matters became more and more alarming. Every number of the Somerville Star was taken up with accounts of new burnings, new conspiracies, additional hangings. Several fires had taken place in the vicinity of Somerville. One day Somerville was thrown into the intensest excitement—a carpenter's shop was suddenly discovered to be in flames. Not a man of the many speedily on the ground but had his revolver girl beneath his coat. It was discovered, however, to be the work of poor Jack Sampson's children, the unfortunate carpenter himself. Like other unfortunates in this world, Jack had altogether too many children, and every one of all he had was perpetually in mischief and in trouble of some sort or other—a broken leg, or a chopped foot, or a blind eye, or a bad burn, or a "Deary me! something' gone" wrong all the time with them children; it breaks my back to nurse 'em, and breaks my heart to raise 'em!" was poor, slouchy, sailor, worked-to-death Mrs. Sampson's continual expression of the matter.

"Just as I knew!" said Mr. Ferguson. "And if every one of these fires could but be thoroughly investigated it would be found to be the same case in all. Incendiaries? Stuff and nonsense! Look at Sampson's shop; those piles of shavings baking under this hot, dry summer for months; the wonder is they have not caught fire long ago. All those fires in stables, too; any man in his senses must see that the heaps of straw and litter about such places are tinder during such a season as this."

Another fire in Somerville! A dwelling-house this time, and by a negro boy of some ten years old. He was seen to fire the building in broad day! In fact, he never denied the thing. The town authorities had prohibited the usual services for the blacks on Sunday afternoon at the churches; and the boy avowed that he did the deed partly because they had stopped his going to church, but chiefly on account of the overweight of the white babe he was required to nurse.

"I hear tell of de black folks burnin' houses all de time, dar's what made me first tink of it," was his candid explanation to Mayor and Council. "Nobody put me up to it," he persisted. "Mass George he say sha'n't go to church, an' dar baby weigh five hundred pound!"

Now what to do with this negro boy? that was the question. For four weeks Scip lay in the jail; that was all. Longer than that his owner could not do without him. Hired to somebody else, bearing a lighter infant, he sinned no more. But for months he considered himself rather a hero than otherwise. More than once, as he drifted about Somerville on warm Sunday afternoons with his charge, in answer to the question, "Whose baby is that boy?" "Mass Bolling, what lives down by de steam-mill, an' I is de boy what burned down de house by de gully," was his prompt reply.

Another fire! This time it originated in a grocery. By this time Mr. Withers had fallen from being only a drinker of whisky to the lower degradation of being a seller thereof; and "All I know about it is this, gentlemen. Late one night I fell asleep against the counter, by George! There were a good many newspapers, I know, lying on it. Was a candle any where near? Of course there was! Do you think I was sitting, by George! in the dark? I don't pretend to say how my place caught afire," continued Mr. Withers; "but one thing I do know, Jim Budd's gun-shop is next door—was, by George!—to my place, and we can easily guess why any incendiary would want that burned down. The other thing I know is, that I am regularly cleaned out this time—nary red! Not able to get even my daily liquor except on tick!"

Another fire! A cotton-gin this time, a few miles out of Somerville. The excitement was becoming fearful. Could Lamun's explanation be the true one? Was the country really filled with incendiaries? It certainly looked like it. Mr. Arthur found no satisfaction in Mr. Ferguson's theory. Dry and hot as the summer was, there were altogether too many fires. To do Mr. Ferguson justice, with every new conflagration he became more positive upon the subject, frictions even. It had become one of his storm reefs, which his pastor had learned to avoid.

Another increase of excitement! Mr. Isaac Smith, the painter, had been out of his shop all day painting at Colonel Ret Roberts's new office. He did not return to it until bedtime—Mr. Smith was a bachelor, and slept in his shop. After entering it, and while groping about in the dark for his candle and matches, he was astonished to observe flashes of light under his feet. On lighting his candle he found scattered over the floor white grains little larger than the head of a pin, which burst into flame on being trodden upon or rubbed in the hand. Not that Mr. Arthur himself got to see any of these torpedoes, but the story was told him by a dozen lips.

By this time the panic was fairly under way. Even Mrs. Warner disappeared, so to speak, in the universal excitement. Lying Sam Peters, lingering about street-corners, found himself singularly tame and uninteresting where every body was talking. Every fresh number of the Somerville Star was filled with the topic, to the exclusion of every thing else; conspiracies detected, men hung, the whole North engaged systematically in the work of Southern destruction. The paper was frenzied in its descriptions, assertions, incentives; and it was but one of hundreds of sheets employed, few with equal, none with greater ability, to the same end.

"What do you think about it?" asked Mr. Arthur of his friend Gay Brooks. "It is impossible for any human being to live for any length of time amidst universal and intense excitement and not be affected thereby. Physically, mind, as well as mentally, the human magnetism, electricity, sympathy, whatever you may choose to call it, which binds men together, insures that."

"I have my own deliberate opinion on the subject," replied the lawyer. "But we won't bring it up just now. Let us keep cool, and wait a little. The temperament of Somerville just now is too much that of Sam Peters; the whole place talks too much like Mrs. Warner to believe all we hear. No man likes Dr. Warner more than I do," said the lawyer, apologetically; "but Mrs. Warner is really, really—ah, well, we all know Mrs. Warner!"

"But, Mr. Brooks," persisted Mr. Arthur, "I would like to know what you do think upon the subject. It certainly is a mysterious matter, one affecting us very—"

"It certainly is," interrupted his friend, gravely. "But we won't venture an opinion just now. My case is not quite made up, as we knaves at the bar say. Wait. I certainly have my fearful opinion on the subject. But it is really too bad to utter. I may be mistaken. God grant I am! If I'm wrong I'm glad of it. If I'm right time will show." And that was all the generally frank lawyer could be induced to say.

It was the next Sunday night after this conversation that Mrs. Bowles was aroused by a tapping on her chamber window.

"Don't be alarmed, Madam; it is me—Mr. Arthur," said that gentleman, in answer to her hurried exclamation. "Please get up and dress yourself—Miss Alice, too—and don't be alarmed; I trust there is no occasion to be. I will be out upon the front porch."

There Mrs. Bowles and Alice found him when they had hurried on their dresses. But no need to ask him why they had been aroused. Even before they left their bedroom the ruddy glare upon the walls told them of another fire. As they stood upon the front porch the whole conflagration was distinctly visible, tarring night into day, and throwing the shadows of fence and trees darkly upon the ground. Full in view from the eminence on which it stood, the Somerville Factory was one vast blaze from the ground, and with flames which towered high above the lofty roof. A six-story edifice, recently completed, thoroughly furnished, and owned by a Northern Company, the establishment, a good deal sneered at as "that Yankee concern," was none the less the boast and pride of the place.

For a time not a word was spoken as they stood gazing upon the sublime spectacle, listening to the hiss and roar of the steam from the heated boilers. It was remembered by all of them afterward that no shouting was heard, no one was seen hurrying past their house to the scene. In fact, though all in Somerville knew of the fire, few besides those immediately connected with the mill were there.

"You need not remain with us," said Mrs. Bowles, at last. "Perhaps you would like to assist at the fire. The Major always hurried to them when we lived in Charleston; he liked the excitement. If Rutledge Bowles was here he would not even have stooped to awaken us."

"I have no desire to go, I thank you," said Mr. Arthur, quietly; and Alice noticed now that her brother's double-barrel shot-gun, rusty from long disuse, was leaned in a corner of the porch behind him. Beneath his hastily-buttoned coat, too, she saw the butt of a revolver gleaming in the light of the conflagration. And not a man or boy in Somerville that night but remained at home armed to the teeth. It is strange the new and singular emotion which stirred in the bosom of this young and impulsive girl as she stood beside Edward Arthur that night, aware, she hardly knew how, of his pale face and set lips and fixed resolve. Not that he said any thing. Mrs. Bowles engrossed the conversation with reminiscences of South Carolina, and the magnificent scale on which that State indulged itself in its conflagrations.

Like all the other school girls, Alice had made abundant fun of the young preacher among her companions, the truth being that reverence was a trait as yet undeveloped in her character. Her novel emotions are easily accounted for. You have often observed that when you are suddenly awakened at midnight from a sound sleep by music there is a freshness of feeling about you which makes the music far sweeter to you than the very same strains heard on any other occasion; and it was out of a very sound sleep that Alice had just awakened. It might be incidentally remarked that these young people had been closely associated now for some time, not only as dwellers under the same roof. It is amazing how much of history and poetry they had read together; how much, in consequence of that, they had conversed, thought, and felt together—all in a natural, imperceptible way—from week to week. We will say nothing about any impression which may possibly have been made upon her by Mr. Arthur's purity of character and refined breeding, and, above all, his enthusiasm in his profession. You may not have thought of it before, but an honest enthusiasm in any good cause is one of the most beautifying things in this world; it imparts a light to the lip and to the eye, an uplift to the whole person! A quiet, unobtrusive enthusiasm is the light and bliss, the element of heaven.

Not a more unpopular man existed than was Mr. Ferguson the next day, when, true to his native feather, he was as Scotch in his belief of the accidental nature of the fire as ever. There is nothing people in a panic hate more than the man who coldly refuses to go with them therein; there is an affected superiority to every body else, a self-assession in such a course which is positively insolent.

"Every sensible person in Somerville has expected the burning of that factory from the outset of the summer," said Mr. Ferguson. "It was one pile of tinder from top to bottom: cotton, wool lying all about, and a raging furnace in the centre of it. Incendiary? Stuff and nonsense!"

Not an adherent did Mr. Ferguson have to his theory. He only held to it with the zeal of thousands concentrated in himself. Besides, he had entered upon a new collection. It had occurred to him during the last few days to collect and preserve all things in his reach which had so far been published upon the subject of the burnings and conspiracies. "A rare treat it will be to read them after the delusion is over," he said to himself; and he entered with an enthusiasm upon the subject which he had not experienced even in making up his treasure of documents relating to Infant Baptism.

But the excitement in Somerville, as well as throughout the whole region, who can describe! Nothing else was thought or talked of. Arms of all sorts were cleaned, loaded, and laid in readiness. Hardly a lady in Somerville but took lessons, with a hundred "Oh my's!" and "Oh, I am so afraid!" in the art of using the rifle and the revolver. You could not walk past a doorway without hearing the crack! crack! of pistol practice on the part of the inmates of the house.

As to the blacks, the Sunday afternoon service had been long stopped. Now patrols scoured the streets from dark till broad day, firing promptly upon all negroes attempting to run when ordered to stop. By an arrangement of Mayor and Council the rooms and trunk of every negro in Somerville was searched at the same hour by a large committee.

"And nothing found—nec a thing!" said redbreasted Mr. Ferguson, in triumph.

But at least some few arms, boxes of caps, even powder, were found, was the general rumor. In one case, at least, several glass bottles of powder were certainly found in a negro's cabin. Very promptly was he had up before the Mayor, but as he seemed more amazed at the discovery than any one else, he was as promptly released. "I need not say, gentlemen," remarked puffy Dr. Ginnis, the owner of said boy, during his examination, "that if Jim had any hand in putting that powder there, you may string him up, and welcome. But my boy Jim! I'd take my oath he knows no more about it than I do. Why, gentlemen, Jim was raised with me! Nursed by the same mammy; wrestled together a thousand times. He thinks more of me than if I was his own brother." And while Dr. Ginnis waxed short of breath, and ruder in the face, and puffier even than before upon the subject, Jim stood beside him open-mouthed, thoroughly bewildered, undeniably innocent. It was singular the lack of definite, decisive, undoubted proof upon any one point in the whole mysterious matter.

"I am more and more convinced," Gray

THE STORY OF ERNST CHRISTIAN SCHOEFFER.

By AMELIA B. EDWARDS.

I propose relating the story of Ernst Christian Schoeffer. In order to do this circumstantially, I will begin by stating that he was the only child of Dorothea and Wolfgang Schoeffer, of Ulm, and was born in an upper chamber of a house on the Graben, just thirty-two years since.

Wolfgang Schoeffer belonged to a somewhat better class than the majority of his neighbors. He was poor, but not abjectly poor; and he had seen better days. He was a second-hand book-seller by trade, and had begun life with some show of prosperity. He inherited his father's business and stock; and his wife—a pretty Bavarian with whom he had fallen in love while traveling to and fro among the great fairs of Augsburg, Munich, Bamberg, and Nuremberg—was reported to have had not only beauty but money. So when he brought home his bride and opened a shop in the market-place, his fellow-citizens looked upon him as a rising man, and approved of him accordingly. Their approbation, however, was not destined to be of long continuance. Wolfgang Schoeffer had started too ambitiously, and at the end of five years became a bankrupt. He left his shop in the market-place for one of the raiment little tenements on the Graben; and there, when the brief sunshine of his career was all past, and the bitterness of poverty was yet new to them both, Dorothea Schoeffer died in giving birth to the only child of their marriage.

From that day the bookseller was a changed man. He had borne his reverses with tolerable courage, but this last blow told heavily. He seemed to grow old all at once; he avoided his former acquaintances and friends; he ceased to frequent any place of public worship; he became daily more bent, more gray, more gloomy, more selfish in his clothing, and more solitary in his ways.

But not to name the wife of a poor neighbor for the first year or two of his little life, the child was brought home to his father's house almost as soon as he had begun to prattle; and there, under the care of a certain Frau Martha, who was very deaf, very pious, half lodger and half servant, spent all his motherless boyhood.

It would be impossible to conceive a more dismal home for a young child than bookseller Schoeffer's home on the Graben. The floors were never scrubbed, the stairs were never swept, the windows were never cleaned or opened from year's end to year's end, and it was filled with dusty books from top to bottom. The walls were lined, the floors were covered, the air was stale with them. The house contained little else; nothing for comfort, nothing for grace—not even a flower in a pot, or a pair bird in a cage. Books, books, every where books—yellow, dusty, worm-eaten, and unclean, like bones in a charnel house. As for the garden, it was a mere wilderness of nettles and leers.

All this, however, would have mattered little if the boy had known the happiness of being surrounded by kind parents and teachers, and children of his own age; but none of these blessings were his. His mother, really fond of him in her dull way, believed the duties to be all fulfilled so long as she kept him clean and quiet, washed his clothes, cooked his food, taught him the Lord's Prayer, and took care that he did not drown himself in the ditch at the bottom of the Graben. His father cared for him after a nervous, negligent, fitful fashion; but as he was more frequently absent from home than not, and spent his time chiefly in trawling from city to city, he was well satisfied to leave the care of his child's health to Frau Martha and his education to the government.

The painter, like the poet, is born, not made; and Ernst Christian Schoeffer was a born painter. He was endowed from his cradle with the gift of seeing—the precise gift that no mere training can do more than develop, and without which all the academies that ever were incorporated can achieve nothing toward the production of an artist. This privilege is his from very birth. He enjoys it even before he knows that he enjoys it. A brighter heaven than the heaven of other babes lies about him in his infancy; and for him alone of all the sons of Adam the "vision splendid" which even nature's own poet knewed as he traveled on to later life, never "falls into the light of common day."

Thus it was that Ernst was a happy child despite the squalor of his surroundings; thus it was that, even in the midst of these surroundings, he came to an instinctive sense of poetry and beauty. As he grew older he discovered an insatiable treasure in his father's books. A good third of Wolfgang Schoeffer's stock consisted of Bibles—Bibles of all shapes and sizes, in all languages, of all dates; some bound in wood, some in vellum, some in old brown leather; many of them illustrated with quaint wood-cuts, and some with colored maps and half-pieces of strange devices. Bibles, indeed, were the bookseller's specialty; and it was chiefly to buy and sell scarce and curious copies that he traveled so constantly from city to city.

From these—from the "storied windows" and altar-pieces of the churches round about—from the Gothic fountains at the corners of the streets—above all, from the cathedral, with its rich sculptures and traceries, and its wonderful tower like a hillside of old brown stone, the boy learned and studied every day of his life. He proved that cathedral each time that he went to his school, and lingered before it each time that he returned on his homeward journey. He came to know every stone of it by heart—every niche and saint and canopy; every tuft of wind-blown grass that waved aloft on battress and pinnacle. He knew it in the morning light; in the afternoon, when the shadows lay richer and deeper; in the evening, when the eastern front was golden with sunset. The rocks that built and subtended in the tower were his familiar friends. The great entrance peopled with quaint professions, and the bookseller in the spaniards of the huge Gothic arch above the triple doorway, filled him with a perpetual wonder and delight. There is God creating the earth, the air, and the sea; the Almighty artificer being represented each time as an old man dressed in a flowing robe with a globe in his right hand; the only variation in each repetition being that he holds a smooth globe for the earth, a curly globe for the air, and a wavy globe for the sea. Then comes the creation of man; Adam looking at his own shapeless legs with great astonishment, as well indeed he might. Then the creation of Eve, the temptation, and the banishment. Nothing in medieval art more naive and curious than these bas-reliefs above the principal entrance of Ulm cathedral! Few travelers turn aside from the beaten track to see them; few artists study them; but Ernst Christian Schoeffer learned all that they had to teach—all, indeed, that the great master had to teach both within and without. Messages written with the brush and the chisel, upon iron, stone, wood, he hearkened to them all with humility and reverence. The solemn triptych over the high altar, with its Magi garbous in gold and colors, which in very early childhood first fixed his wondering eyes; the slender, elaborate pyx, like a magnified ivory carving; the chair with its quaint, delicate, wonderful oak sculptures, its clustering fruits and flowers, its lace-like canopy, and its triple rank of herons, Pagan, Jewish, and Christian, each feature of whose unauthentic faces he knew by heart; the carved sculptures of dead and gone nobles hung all about the lower end of the nave; the monumental brasses, memorial portraits, and medieval frescoes scattered so lavishly about the private chapels in the side aisles—these things were his first masters in art, and upon them his genius fed and strengthened year by year. It showed itself, as the artist instinct generally does show itself, in all kinds of blundering first attempts. The boy tried his pen-and-ink upon every material that fell in his way. He scratched upon his slate and in his copy-books; he dabbled in clay; he dabbed a little in coarse pigments bagged from a neighboring house-painter; he carved rude statuettes in common fire-wood. These occupations kept him quiet in holiday hours, and his father, when at home, desired no more.

At length the time came when Ernst Christian's seven years of schooling were on the point of expiring. He was now fourteen, and of an age to be apprenticed to a trade. His father intruded him for his own business; but the boy had made up his mind to be a painter, and, foreseeing the struggle to come, had also made up his mind to be first in the field. There was fierce opposition to be encountered and there were insurmountable difficulties to be overcome; therefore, he argued, the sooner the opposition was combated and the difficulties were faced the better. It was characteristic of Ernst Christian Schoeffer's peculiar temperament that he should have so measured himself against these obstacles. It was especially characteristic that he should have the moral gallantry to face Frau Martha at once upon this matter so vital to his own happiness, and yet that his heart should beat and his breath come short as he went up to that father's chamber on the evening of the very day when his school term had expired.

It was about six o'clock on a bleak November night. The stairs creaked under his feet as he went feeling his way in the darkness, and rehearsing the words in which he meant to begin. On the landing he paused, and guided by a thread of light upon the threshold, tapped at his father's door. No reply came. He listened—he heard a sound as of something being closed and locked—he tapped again—he thought he was answered—he went in.

His father, standing by the table with a framed oil-painting lying before him and a key in his hand, turned upon the boy in a sudden paroxysm of anger.

"What do you want?" he said, furiously. "How dare you come in without knocking?"

"I knocked, mein Vater, but—Gott! what a beautiful picture!"

It was a beautiful picture. It represented a fair delicate-featured girl with down-looking eyes and pale golden hair woven into a profusion of soft braids, and a smile as peaceful, as sweet, as soft as that of the Madonna del Velo. The painter of this gracious head had done his work lovingly and happily. Though too cold in color and too hard in effect, the portrait was as highly finished as a miniature, and as perfect in detail as if it had come from the easel of Raphael or Giotto. It measured about twelve inches square, and was enclosed in a cloudy frame of plain black wood, the front of which was glazed, worked upon hinges like a little door, and locked with a small brass key.

The boy forgot his own purpose, his father's anger, and all else at the sight of this treasure. He pressed forward to look upon it, but the bookseller thrust him roughly back.

"The picture is nothing to thee," he said, harshly. "Get thee gone. Get down to Frau Martha. I am busy to-night."

"But, father—"

"Get thee down, I say. Go learn thy tasks for to-morrow."

"I have none. The Herr-president signed my certificate to-day; and he said, if you wished to enter me for another term—"

"Another term, indeed?" interrupted Schoeffer. "Who is to pay for it? Let the Herr-president tell me that. There is not a poorer man as Wurttemberg than myself."

"He said—"

"It is nothing to me what he said. There have been times when I scarce knew where to find food and clothing for thee."

The lad glanced round the squalid room, and sighed.

"I know it, father," he replied.

"It is well you do know it," replied the bookseller, sharply. "You have to earn your bread."

"That is what I came about, father. I wish to be a painter."

The Herr Schoeffer shook his head.

"A painter?" he said. "Eh! it is an unhealthy trade. Besides, I have not a groshen wherewith to apprentice thee. No, boy; thou must follow thy father's calling—a poor one, but, at the worst, better than neighbor Strauss's."

"Neighbor Strauss!" echoed the lad. "Do you think I wish to be a house-painter, like neighbor Strauss? No, no—I mean to be a painter like our ancestor, Martin Schoeffer."

His father looked at him incredulously.

"The boy is mad," he said, with a contemptuous shrug.

"I am not mad. I would live on bread and water to be a painter. I would beg my way to Rome on foot, if you would only let me go."

"Rome! What would you do in Rome, pray, when you had begged your way there?"

"I would go to Overbeck's studio and tell him that I was a poor German boy who loved art, and wished to be a painter."

The bookseller struck the table angrily with his clenched fist.

"Let me hear no more of this," he said. "You talk like a fool."

"But—"

"Silence! Not another word. Get you down stairs and bid Frau Martha make the soup hot for supper."

The boy obeyed reluctantly. As he reached the door his father called him back.

"Hark you, Ernst," he said, more gently. "This portrait is not to be talked about. You must not tell any one that you have seen it. Do you hear?—not even Frau Martha."

"Whose portrait is it, father?"

The bookseller hesitated.

"You must give your word not to speak about it," he said, fixing a searching eye upon his son's face.

"I will never speak of it, father."

"You promise?"

"I promise. But whose portrait is it?"

"Your—your mother's."

"My mother's!"

The lad sprang forward—would have taken the picture in his hand, but that his father again put his back, and would not let him touch it.

"You can see it well enough where it is," he said, with a frown.

"Oh, father! was my mother so beautiful? Were her eyes so very and always?" And the boy's open eyes filled with sudden tears.

"She was very like it," replied the bookseller, solemnly. "There—you have looked long enough."

"May I see it again to-morrow?"

"No, not to-morrow—some day, perhaps. Now go, and remember your promise."

"I will remember it, and keep it," said Ernst, and left the room.

He made his way slowly down the dark stairs, thinking over all that had been said.

"My mother's portrait!" he muttered to himself. "To think that he had my mother's portrait hidden away all these years!"

When he had reached the bottom step he sat down, covered his face with his hands, and fell into a long reverie. His heart was heavy, and the future seemed to lie before him all dark and uncertain, like a scene in a dream.

At length he sprang to his feet, resolved and self-reliant once more.

"I will be a painter!" he exclaimed, half aloud. "I will be a painter; and I will paint as well as that too, some day."

II.

ERNST CHRISTIAN SCHOEFFER carried his point, and became a painter after all. Not, however, without a long and tedious battle—a battle against his father's imperious will; against poverty, prejudice, and obesity—a battle that lasted three whole years, and cost the victor many a fall and many a letter home before Frau was. Still he did win it. He became a painter. He even went to Rome.

A drawing made in secret, and sent up anonymously to the Government School of Art in Ulm—a prize carried off, and a year's gratuitous instruction gained thereby; a second prize achieved, and a second year gained; a third, and its results a gold medal and a purse of two hundred and fifty florins—these were the steps by which the youth struggled on to the fulfillment of his hopes.

His father sternly, ruled, argued, and finally yielded a sullen acquiescence.

That prize came as if dropped direct from heaven. Every thing in it was arranged for him with theologic sense of Rome. These two hundred and fifty florins represented in his eyes the inestimable riches of opportunity. They opened the gates of knowledge to his eager footsteps. They were his passport to the temple of Belshazzar.

Ernst Christian would not have spent a fraction of that prize in Ulm for all the temptations that assailed Saint Anthony. He regarded it as a sacred deposit—it was worth about twenty-two pounds of English money!—and having paid in two hundred of his florins at Herr Schliermacher's bank to be transmitted to Rome, he took fifty for his traveling expenses, and set out for the Eternal City with a light heart and a still lighter knapsack.

He did not liberally make his way from Ulm to Rome on foot. It would have cost him more than his fifty florins for food and lodging by the way if he had done so; but he traveled by the fourth class as far as any German railway would carry him; and he walked through Switzerland and over the Alps; and what with a lift in a peasant's cart now and then, or a cheap fare by rail or diligence, he found himself one evening, just at sunset, before the gates of the Porta del Popolo, with only a few pence left in his pocket, and the likeness of a pair of hoofs on his feet.

How he lived in Rome for the next five years—how, indeed, half the poor students live when one street in every gallery and every church—was, even to himself, a mystery. Thus, from time to time, from year to year, winning now a medal, now a scholarship, now a small sum of money, he made his way on inch at a time, and struggled at last into the foremost rank of student life in Rome. Then, just as his fifth year was drawing to a close and he was looking forward with something more than hope to the chances of achieving an honorary rank to the Accademia, he was summoned home to the bedside of his dying father.

There was not an hour to lose. The elder Schoeffer had been smitten down by paralysis while traveling back from the great book-fair at Leipzig, and had continued slowly sinking ever since. His one prayer was that he might see his son once more before he died.

A poor man can not travel fast. His nearest and dearest may lie dying a thousand miles away; yet the slowest train and the cheapest carriage must bear him to them. Our poor young painter had almost to beg his way to Ulm. How his prayers, his hopes, his fears outstripped his weary feet—how his heart seemed to go on before him all the way—how he sickened at each delay, and counted the miles, the days, the hours, that lay between him and the only parent whom he had ever known, were tortures which only he who had experienced them could adequately describe.

At length, after nearly three weeks of painful journeying, he found himself once again traversing the blank expanse of country by which Ulm is approached from the side of Switzerland. Plodding on foot along a dusty road that seemed as if geometrically produced in one never-ending line, the young man toiled through this dreary landscape all-righ from dawn to sunset before the distant batteries, forts, and earth-works of Ulm became visible to his eager eyes. From that moment his fatigue was forgotten. He pressed forward as if he had but first set out upon the long day's march, and entered the gates of his native city about an hour after dark.

For several days past the conviction that he should be too late had weighed heavily upon him. He had repeatedly told himself that all would be over—that he should never hear his father's voice nor see his father's face again; but even those who are best prepared for the worst are never so fortified against it as not to feel the shock. Death is a surprise—a mournful, terrible surprise—whenever it comes; even though we may be sitting by the bedside waiting for it, watching for it, dreading it as each breath leaves the lips we love. This poor student had, as he thought, prepared himself manfully; and yet when he came to the old house on the Graben, saw no light in any window, heard the echo of his repeated knocking reverberate desolately through the empty floors, and was presently warned off by a voice from an upper chamber of some neighbor's house, with the information that Master Schoeffer was dead, and if any one wanted particulars he must go to the Policei, he felt as if he could hardly believe in the reality of his misfortune.

It was a hard blow. Although the bookseller had been so often absent from his home, although as a father he had been undemonstrative, careless, gloomy, and irritable, still, in his own strange way, he had loved his son, and the young painter felt his loss bitterly. All weary as he was, he sat down on the doorstep, thoughtful of what had once been, and wept in the darkness as if his heart were breaking.

Perhaps he had scarcely known till then that he loved his father so well.

He slept that night at a little Gasthof down by the Danube, and went next morning to the Policei to lay claim to Wolfgang Schoeffer's effects. The news which there awaited him was both startling and painful. His father, always a poor man, had been brought home, after his seizure, by easy stages, and what with the heavy expenses attending his journey, the cost of medical attendance, and the outlay incurred at his funeral, the bookseller had died in debt, and the whole of his possessions had been sold for the benefit of his creditors. Chief among these, it seems, was Herr Schliermacher, the banker and money-lender in the Anlage. Applied to by Frau Martha when her master lay ill, he had advanced a certain loan upon the bookseller's stock, and when all was over had peremptory claims to his money. A valuation having then been taken, the stock and household goods were sold, and the money-lender, doctor, and undertaker took what they could get, which, after all, fell below the amount of their several claims. So poor Ernst Christian Schoeffer found himself homeless and penniless in the streets of his native city.

At length, when the first burst of anguish was past, the young man turned his face toward the Anlage, and presented himself at Herr Schliermacher's office.

The banker, a small, plump, pleasant-looking Jew, with a shining bald head, and a pair of brilliant black eyes, received him civilly enough, and ushered him into his private room. The painter informed him that he had come to inquire into the particulars of the sale.

Herr Schliermacher elevated his eyebrows, shrugged his shoulders, shook his head significantly, and thrust his hands into his pockets.

"The particulars, Herr Schoeffer," he replied, "are told in a dozen words. I advanced certain moneys upon your father's goods, three hundred florins in all; our excellent friend the Herr Doctor Philippart furnished him with medicines and attendance to the amount of fifty florins; his funeral expenses came to one hundred florins. There was also a half-year's rent owing for the house on the Graben, besides a few trifling bills for smaller items, making about thirty florins more. Taken altogether, the liabilities fell little short of five hundred florins, and the effects realized just three hundred and forty-five. Not a kreutzer more or less. Here are the accounts. You can examine them at your convenience."

The young man's hand closed convulsively upon the papers.

"Then my father's creditors are loath to the extent of one hundred and fifty-five florins," he said, in a tremulous voice.

"Just so."

"I please myself to repay them. I will work day and night to it."

The Jew nodded pleasantly.

"We expect no less from you, Herr Schoeffer," he said.

"And I may take these accounts to look through at—"

He was going to say "at home," but remem-being that he had now no home, checked himself, and substituted "at my leisure."

"By all means."

He rose—he hesitated—he had evidently something still to say.

"There is one very precious and sacred relic," he faltered, "which I would give much to possess."

"If it be any thing which I can assist you to recover I shall be happy to do so," replied the banker, politely.

"It is my mother's portrait."

"Will you be good enough to describe it?"

The painter, with visible emotion, described the picture minutely. The banker listened, looked down, coughed dubiously, and rubbed his little fat hands slowly over and over.

"Dear me!" he said, "is that a portrait of your mother? How handsome she must have been!"

"Then you recognize it?"

"Perfectly."

"And can you tell me what has become of it?"

The young man's question came with hot eagerness; the Jew's reply with cool composure.

"Why, yes—no one better. That picture is in my own possession."

"In yours?"

The tone, the look of entreaty, were alike unmistakable; but Herr Schliermacher met both with the coldest imperturbability imaginable.

"Exactly so," he replied. "It is a charming little thing, and I really value it."

"But Herr Schliermacher—my good Herr Schliermacher, you do not value it as I do?"

"I value it too well to part from it," said the banker.

"Herr Schliermacher, I would serve you for seven years to earn back my mother's portrait."

Herr Schliermacher shook his shiny head.

"I regret to refuse you," he said; "but it is quite out of my power to grant your request. I like the picture—my daughter has taken quite a fancy for it—and I have been too busy a loser in this matter already."

"It is worth more than the whole of my poor father's debt put together!" cried the young man, impatiently.

"Not as a work of art. If it were I should not feel justified in keeping it."

"What would you do with it?"

"Sell it, of course, my good Sir; and when I had repaid myself from the proceeds, refund the surplus to yourself."

The painter turned pale.

"For God's sake don't do that!" he said, quickly. "I do not mean to do it. I mean to keep it."

The Herr Schliermacher uttered these last words in a tone that rendered further discussion impossible, and the young man reluctantly took his departure.

He came back, however, the next day at the same hour.

"Herr Schliermacher," he said, "I have come to ask what price you set on my mother's portrait."

"I set no price upon it, Herr Schliermacher. I do not mean to sell it."

"But you would not—you could not—refuse to sell it if I could afford to pay for it?"

"If I understood you rightly when you did me the favor to call upon me yesterday," said the banker, very stiffly, "you are not even in a position to pay off the residue of your father's liabilities."

"That is true; but—"

"Excuse me, Herr Schliermacher. It will be time enough to enter on this topic when you come to me with your one hundred and fifty-five florins in your hand. I wish you a good-morning."

Again the painter turned away dejectedly; but again the next day, at the same hour, he returned to the charge.

"Herr Schliermacher," he began, "will you let me own that portrait? Will you take me into your office? Will you receive me as one of your clerks? I write a good fair hand, and I am a tolerable accountant. If you will agree to this, I will work for you without salary till I have earned the picture back at whatever price you choose to set upon it."

The banker laughed outright.

"My dear Herr Schliermacher," he said, "gentlemen in your profession are the very worst stuff in the world to cut bankers' clerks from! No, I thank you. No aesthetic accountants for me. Besides, if you worked without pay, how would you live?"

"I would rise at dawn in summer, and work by lamplight in winter, and so earn a few florins a week. I can live on dry bread; I have done so before now."

"Yes, you are a most energetic young man," said Herr Schliermacher; "and you deserve to succeed in life. What a pity you were not brought up to business!—you would have made a fortune."

"I do not want a fortune. I only want my mother's portrait."

The Jew shrugged his shoulders.

"Will you try me for a week, Herr Schliermacher?"

"Not for a day. Your proposal, Herr Schliermacher, is wholly impracticable."

For the third time the poor painter went his way sorrowing. He desired the picture passionately, and each fresh refusal only quickened his intense longing for it. He remembered how his father had treasured it, and he also remembered how it was the dear earthly record of a mother whom he had never been so blest as to know.

The next day he was back again at the money-lender's office with a fresh scheme.

"For the fourth time," he said, "I come to appeal to you. If you have the heart of a man you will not refuse what I am now about to ask from you."

The banker tapped impatiently upon his desk.

"Be brief, if you please, Herr Schliermacher," he replied. "My time is valuable, and I warn you that this is the last occasion on which I can listen to you."

"This, then, is what I have to propose. Give me three years in which to earn the one hundred and fifty-five florins, and promise me that you will neither sell the portrait nor give it away during that time!"

The banker leaned back in his chair, and seemed as if he were taking this request into consideration.

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed Ernst, impatiently, "is it possible that you hesitate? Do I ask any thing unfair—any thing unreasonable? Think, Sir—think if it were your own mother's portrait—a mother who had given her own life for yours—"

His voice broke, and he turned aside to conceal his trouble.

Herr Schliermacher looked grave.

"I hesitate," he rejoined, "because it has occurred to me that there may possibly be some other way. Do you paint portraits, Herr Schliermacher?"

"Of course I do! May I paint yours? Oh, my dear, excellent, amiable Herr Schliermacher, let me paint your portrait!"

The Herr Schliermacher smiled, and shook his head.

"Not mine," he said. "I would not give a kreutzer for my own portrait; but my daughter—"

"I will paint her for you in any style you please. Only tell me what you wish done, and I will do it."

The banker was excessively amused.

"I must speak to Salome first," he replied. "Call upon me to-morrow at the same time, and I will tell you more about it."

He returned the following day, as he was bidden, and to his supreme joy the banker informed him that his daughter was willing to sit, and that he might begin on the morrow.

"As for terms," said he, "we will make it picture for picture. You shall paint my daughter's portrait, and when it is done you shall receive your mother's in exchange. Will that content you?"

"Perfectly."

"And you will not object to paint my Salome on a somewhat larger scale?"

"You shall have her at full-length, life-size, after the manner of Van Dyck."

And Herr Schliermacher was well satisfied, knowing that he had the best of the bargain.

III.

Poor Ernst Christian Schoeffer! It was his destiny. He fell desperately in love with Salome Schliermacher. She was very lovely—lovely with the dazzling oriental loveliness of Rebecca of Rachel-of Martina. He had not seen a woman in Italy to compare with her. Her skin was of that soft, rich, tender brown which so enchants us in the Madonna della Saggiola. Her eyes were as brilliant and bewitching as those of the Fomarina in the Palazzo Pitti. Her smile was stolen from Leonardo's portrait of Joanna of Naples. Her hands, long, white, slender, were Van Dyck's. Her gestures, her attitudes, were Titian's. The young painter, to the destruction of his peace, beheld in her the rare and perfect epitome of all that he had admired in art and despaired of in nature. And Salome Schliermacher was so charming as she was beautiful, and so capricious as either. It seemed as if he were to be enchanted, to torment, to bewilder her unfortunate victim. To-day she would be all mirth, to-morrow all gravity; to-day all affability, to-morrow all reserve. Sometimes she would talk of poetry, of music, of art, and talk of them, too, with intelligence and enthusiasm. At other times she would prattle of none but the most childish matters, and peep at a serious woe.

Then she was the most tiresome of sitters. She changed her mind about the dress in which she would be painted, about the attitude, the background, the accessories, fifty times, at least, during the progress of the work. She would be taken in her ordinary dress; she would be taken in her riding-habit; she would be taken as Jessica with the casket; as Bath with the corn-shell on her head—there was no end to her caprices, and there promised to be no end to the picture.

And all this time the interested young painter thought each new dress and attitude more becoming than the last, and, Penelope-like, spent as much time in undoing his work as in doing it.

"When it is once finished," thought he, "all will be over. I shall no longer hear the daily music of her voice; I shall not dare to intrude upon her privacy; I shall be as much parted from her as if we lived in two separate hemispheres. What better, then, can I desire than that the picture may stay in progress forever?"

He was ready, in fact, to spend his life upon it; and I am by no means prepared to say that the beautiful Salome was not quite as well disposed to prolong the task as himself.

Meanwhile Ernst Christian was living within an inch of starvation. Having once been a pupil in the local school of art, he had been able to procure his painting materials upon credit; but he found it far more difficult to get food and lodging on the same terms. There were days when he warmed bread. There were nights when he knew not where to lay his head. His clothes were worn so threadbare that he was ashamed to be seen in them. Let those who have read the lives of Savage, of Chatterton, of Hayne, supply the painful details of starvation.

There must be an end to all things mortal, and despite alterations and delays insupportable, the portrait of Salome Schliermacher at length approached completion. There could be no question of the artist's perfect success. He had been painting with his heart as well as with his hand, and the result was a portrait of such force, such delicacy, such complete and life-like portraiture, as would have made the fame and fortune of a painter in any city less hopelessly stagnant than Utopia. The beautiful Jewess, holding a fan of peacock's feathers in her hand, and dressed in a rich robe of white satin brocade with gold, seemed almost to be stepping from the frame. The smile flickered on her lips; the fixture of her eye had motion in it. It was a portrait that Paolo Veronese might have designed and Rubens painted.

"Herr Schliermacher," said the banker, when he came in one morning to observe the progress of the work, "I am so well content—say, so much more than content—that I will not keep you longer without your mother's picture. You can take it home with you, if you choose, to-day."

Ernst was as grateful as if he had not already craved it ten times over. He grasped the banker's hand; he thanked him with tears in his eyes; and he went home to his parrot that afternoon happier than a king.

The dear, dear portrait! The portrait that he had first seen in his father's chamber that memorable night, now more than eight years ago, when he first announced his desire to become a painter! It was not in the least faded or changed. The eyes had the same sad sweetness as of old. The pale golden tresses shone with an undiminished lustre.

He sat it up before him on the table and set down to eat his evening meal before it. It seemed to light the smouldering embers like a glory. It gave quite a delicious flavor to his soup of stale bread and his slice of mutton. It tarred the water in his pitcher into wine. Thus munching and meditating, with his eyes fixed all the time upon his newly-recovered treasure, he observed that the canvas seemed to have warped away from the stretcher at one corner, and that the picture bulged in the middle, as old pictures are sometimes apt to do. He had long since resolved to carry an exquisite frame for it some day; now it occurred to him that the painting would be improved by what is technically called "backing." That is to say, by being relieved from tension, and pasted down upon a freshly-strained canvas.

"It would preserve as well as improve it," he muttered to himself, as he swept the crumbs from the table. "I will do it to-morrow, and give it a coat of varnish at the same time."

And with this he drew the picture toward him and proceeded to break open the front of the frame with his knife. The little brass key had doubtless been lost long since; at all events Herr Schliermacher had not given it to him. So he forced the case off at the hinges and proceeded to remove the picture. It was held in its place by two little brass buttons greased with vasoline, and came out when those were turned quite easily.

Then he saw what it was that had lodged the surface of the canvas. No wonder, indeed, that it had warped away from the frame! It was crumpled—literally crumpled—between the canvas and the back of the old wooden case with scraps of dusty paper.

Ernst Christian Schoeffer felt quite indignant with the perpetrator of this unnecessary mischief.

"The Goth!" he muttered. "This must have been done in Bavaria. I don't believe there is a frame-maker in Ulm who would have been so ignorant of his business."

He laid the picture tenderly aside, and shook out the contents of the empty frame. As he did so he suddenly changed color, and began trembling from head to foot.

"Gracious Providence!" he exclaimed aloud, "what is this?"

It was a little bit of yellowish paper that had rolled over toward him from the rest of the heap—a dirty, oblong, yellowish scrap, filled with several lines of close printing in the middle, and adorned at each corner with a little engraved initial. He took it up—he laid it down—he snatched it up again. Then he plucked his hands wildly into the folds of the heap, and took up first one little crumpled scrap, then another, then another; then drew the whole heap toward him, and examined it with a strange, frantic, feverish avidity that was almost terrible in its intensity.

Every one of these papers lying piled before him on the table was a bank-note. There were hundreds of them—hundreds and hundreds; many adorned with his father's own writing; some Austrian, some Prussian, some Slavonian, some French, some English. And they were as various in their value as in their nationality. They represented sums ranging from one thaler to five hundred, from a hundred francs to a thousand, from five pounds to fifty.

The half-starved heir to all this wealth felt at first as if he must go mad with joy. He laughed—he cried—he shouted scraps of songs. At length, to sober himself, he plunged his head into a tubful of cold water, and then sat down to add up his money.

It was a complicated task. In order to accomplish it with any degree of accuracy he had to translate the language of each currency into dollars; and this was a feat almost beyond his knowledge. Morning at length surprised him asleep in the night of his riches, his head resting on the table, the pen fallen from his hand, and the sum total still un-written.

Wolfgang Schoeffer, the landman book-keeper, the poverty-stricken inhabitant of the old house on the Graben, had just been a miser after all. Nothing, when we come to think of it, was ever done for him to accumulate wealth while seeming, albeit poor. His special branch of trade, he it remembered, was the sale of old Bibles, and there are certain very rare and curious old Bibles—such, for instance, as the Coverdale Bible of 1535, with wood-cuts by Hans Sebald Beham—which are, when perfect, of almost incredible value. It came out on inquiry that the painter's father was believed to have known more of this branch of bibliography than any German of his time; that for the last fifteen or twenty years he had been known to all the principal collectors and book-sellers of the Continent; that hundreds of precious volumes had passed through his hands; and that, on more than one occasion, he had both received and paid some of the highest prices on record for certain famous early editions. Perhaps one of the oddest parts of the story lay in the fact that, among all the old books which numbered the house on the Graben from basement to attic, there was not found one volume of any importance. It appeared to have been his habit to deal, as it were, in only one valuable book at a time, and always to have the book in his own keeping. As soon as he had succeeded in picking up a scarce volume he knew precisely by whom to take it, and what price to set upon it, and so, by ever turning his money, journeying from place to place, and laying up riches of which no living soul in his own native city so much as suspected the existence.

Allen Hanson, when he woke up that fine morning in Bagdad and found himself Commander of the Faithful, scarcely opened his eyes upon a more astounding change in the aspect of his private affairs than did Ernst Christian Schoeffer when he lifted his head from the table of his wealth and found the morning sunshine tinging all his notes to gold. His brain was clearer now, and his pulse steadier, than either had been the night before; and again, therefore, he set to work, like the mathematical geometer of the nursery-plot, "to counting up his money."

It came, when so counted, to no less a sum than one hundred and twenty thousand dollars; that is to say, to about ten thousand and two hundred pounds of English money.

How the painter deposited his fortune in Herr Schliermacher's bank; how that excellent gentleman marveled at the sum, and took a quiet paternal interest in the young man from that moment; how he invited his dear young friend to dinner that very evening; how Ernst Christian made his appearance in the banker's drawing-room at six o'clock punctually, dressed in a suit of super-fine black, and looking as if he had never known what it was to be hungry or shabby in his life; how the beautiful Salome, grown suddenly quite the modicum, colored her face in the course of the evening to a state of knowledge more perfect than ever; how the story of the picture bulged with bank-notes flew through the country and made its appearance in every newspaper where the German tongue was written and spoken; how, finally, before three months of wealth had passed over his head, the painter became the happy husband of his beautiful sister, and facts which here can receive no more than a passing mention. We have given the outline; those who desire to fill it in with detail must seek in the cradle of his time and the centre of his affections for all that is yet left untold of the story of Ernst Christian Schoeffer.

IRON-CLAD FLEET OF ENGLAND.

Almost a month ago we gave a double-page engraving of the iron-clad fleet of the United States. This week we give a similar illustration on the same scale of the iron-clad fleet of Great Britain. The whole number of vessels, wooden and iron, in the British fleet at the present time is 175, of which 30 are iron-clad. Our illustrations include every one of the latter class.

There can be no doubt that while the whole number of vessels in our navy is less by a few ships than the number of vessels in the British navy, our iron-clad fleet is largely superior to that of England in numbers and far more efficient in character. In this connection we quote from a recent issue of DEWEY'S WEEKLY, the editor of the Boston Commercial Advertiser, speaking of the iron-clad fleet of England and France, by way of comparison.

"With-visioning these, their type of construction, equipment, etc., it felt good that our Navy Department since 1860 have constructed, built, and equipped an iron-clad fleet, both for local defence and sweeping service, more powerful than all the iron-clad navies of the world; and I strongly recommend to the Government, as a profitable and patriotic expenditure, and one which will prove to be the strongest guarantee of peace and just neutrality, a more thorough building and arming of our iron-clad navy; short, then, keeping pace with other nations."

"I can whole-heartedly concur in the recommendation of Bureau chiefs, the first-class, now in process of construction by Mr. William H. Murray, at New York. It is probably the most powerful of the iron-clad fleet of England and France, but I have not seen one of them which, in originality of design, power and equipment of deck, battery, or equipment with her. She combines the impossibility of the turret system with the advantage of the broad-deck and ends. In short, it seems being produced from every point of the compass without changing its position. From the appearance of her model it is evident to me that the most important features of superior speed and, last, withstanding her great iron, were surpassed. It is said she will cost over two millions of dollars. But this is a high when compared with the same vessels of the iron-clad fleet of the world, which are far inferior to her as a vessel of war. Consider her a model for a fleet of such vessels as one of the best produced in France."

Mr. MURRAY especially recommends the suggestions of Secretary WELLES as to the enlargement of our iron-clad, work-shops, dry docks, etc., and a building-plant of proper size for the construction and fitting-out of the largest iron-clad ships, for the machinery and fixtures for lifting and pulling plates, equal in size and thickness to those used by the English navy.

In regard to dry docks Mr. MURRAY says:

"With all that we have done and are doing in the improvement of our navy, I say with our honorable Secretary, we should definitely include in our dry dock. Supposing that we had a few more iron-clad vessels, resulting in the destruction of some of the, we have only dry docks enough to repair a few. It is, and for this reason we would at once become completely work at sea, and this is a matter which should receive our early attention. Both France and England, while adding to the strength and number of their ships, keep pace with the increase of their dry docks and berths. Unless we adopt this system, the additional force we are able to multiply by Congress will be of little use. The French dry docks contain space equal to the fifty of the largest ships of our line, and the last is but approaching this size."

The iron-clads of the British navy more recently constructed are the Albatross, Comet, Parade, Palmer, Zouave, Lord Clyde, Lord Warden, Hell-gramite, Uper, Uran, Parakee, and Reverend. The Albatross was purchased by Admiral Bessy D'ALMEIDA, the Commander-in-Chief of the Channel Squadron, after many sea trials, the best recorded in the navy, as regarded sea-going qualities, manoeuvring, ventilation, etc.

"The Albatross differs from the Albatross," says Mr. MURRAY, "chiefly in the fact that the upper deck was lowered in the former, and the armor continued up to it, instead of the armor of the side being a mere breast-plate. This, we think, makes the former a stronger vessel, notwithstanding its inferiority in armor, but it has made her a comparatively well-ventilated vessel, although many officers of our navy, who have had experience in our Monitor, would perhaps consider her efficient when they learn that her upper deck is four and a half feet above the water at its bow, and that the whole length of the deck is protected by a breast-plate 18 to 24 inches, and that in the widest part of the ship's length she carries a 300-ton battery of iron-clad guns, and a half-deck, at which height it is decked over with her iron covered with bar-iron plating."

The Lord Clyde and Lord Warden are vessels of light draught. The Palmer was constructed as a defense against future Alabama and Florida.

RECEPTION OF THE NINETY-NINTH NEW YORK VETERAN VOLUNTEERS IN BROOKLYN, FEBRUARY 15, 1866.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WARD.—[SEE PAGE 142.]

HON. EZRA CORNELL.

Hon. EZRA CORNELL, the founder of the Cornell University, was born in the town of Westchester, New York, January, 1807. His father and more remote ancestors were Quakers, and young Ezra was brought up under the teachings of this peculiar sect. His father, ELIJAH CORNELL, was a potter by trade, but was a man of considerable culture and strongly-marked character. He attained the age of ninety-one, and reared a family of eleven children, of which EZRA was the oldest son. When the latter was about twelve years old the family went to De Ruyter, New Hampshire. At the age of sixteen EZRA and his younger brother wishing to attend school in the winter, obtained permission to do so if, by the next planting-time, they would have cleared off five acres of timber. They went to school, and the five acres were cleared.

In 1828, at the age of nineteen, Mr. CORNELL commenced life for himself. He left home and worked for two years as a carpenter and joiner in Syracuse and Hersey, in this State. In 1828 he removed to Ithaca, which became his permanent residence. Here he commenced work in the machine-shop of a cotton-factory. In 1831 he married. His wife not being a Quaker he was expelled from that sect. In 1840 he purchased the right of a patent plow for Maine and Georgia, and traveled in those States to sell this improved implement of agriculture. It was about this time that Mr. CORNELL entered into the telegraph enterprise. The first method proposed for the construction of telegraph lines was to lay the wire underground. Congress had appropriated $30,000 to lay such a line between Baltimore and Washington. Mr. CORNELL invented a plow for the special purpose of digging the trench for the wire and laying it at the same time. His project was a success, but he also discovered that the wires were not perfectly insulated. Finally the whole scheme of an underground telegraph was given up, and the plan now at the present time was adopted. Mr. CORNELL, from his contract for the New York and Buffalo line, made $9000, his first success in business. Since then, from various telegraphic contracts and speculations, he has realized several millions of dollars.

Mr. CORNELL first entered into political life in 1861, when he was elected to the Assembly of this State by the Union party. In 1863 he was elected to the Senate. But it is not Mr. CORNELL's political success or his large fortune with which we have to do in this sketch. It is the manner in which he has used his wealth that entitles him to the gratitude and esteem of his countrymen.

In 1830 he appropriated $100,000 to establish a free library in Ithaca. His recent splendid donation of $500,000 to establish a University in Ithaca illustrates his benevolence. He has also given his home farm of 200 acres as grounds upon which to build the University buildings. He has purchased for the institution the Jewett Paleontological Cabinet at Albany. The buildings will be erected at a short distance northwest of Ithaca, on an elevation of 400 feet above Cayuga Lake. The Bible has appropriated for the support of Cornell University the income to be derived from the Land Grant Fund, permanently invested for that purpose. The number of acres appropriated in this State is 380,000. This land scrip is now worth only fifty cents per acre. Mr. CORNELL has begun to buy it and locate the scrip, and hopes by thus increasing its value to secure for the University the princely endowment of $3,000,000.

CASTING AT THE ETNA WORKS.

On Saturday, the 31 of February, a cylinder for one of the largest marine engines in the world was cast at the Etna Works in this city. This enormous cylinder weighs 35 tons, is 35 feet by 10 feet long, 27 inches in diameter, and 2 1/2 inches thick. It is five inches longer in diameter than any cylinder made for a propulsion steam engine having an equal length of stroke. Cylinders have indeed been made larger than this in diameter, as was the case recently for one of the English iron-clads, but they had only one-third the length, the engine having a stroke of only four feet.

The largest cylinders in the world heretofore were those in the steamer Metroplitis, of the Fall River line, which, having a stroke of 17 feet, had a diameter of 100 inches. Cylinders of the same size were afterward used by some of the vessels belonging to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, but they have all been cast into the shade by the enterprise of the Merchants' Steamship Company, who are now constructing two vessels for a new route to Boston via Bristol, R. I., at the yard of WILLIAM B. WYMAN, near the foot of Sixth Street.

For the purpose of casting this cylinder a pit was dug near the centre of that part of the establishment used as a foundry, into which the mould was placed, leaving about one-third of its length above the ground. The main reservoir for the melted iron, which contained nearly eighteen tons of hot metal, stood near, with a duct leading from it to the mould. At equal distances around the circumference of the mould two immense pots, containing five or six tons each of melted iron, were suspended from huge cranes—which served, by-the-way, was held as a kind of reserve, to be used in the event of an insufficiency in the main reservoir, or in case all the iron should not be filled from that source. The act of casting was an occurrence of but a moment or two in duration. The engine when constructed will weigh 1,200,000 pounds. EZRA W. SUTHER, Esq., is the contracting engineer.

The boats for which these enormous engines are intended will be spacious, and when completed will be equal monuments of the enterprise and skill of our master mechanics.

RECEPTION OF THE NINETIETH REGIMENT.

We give on page 140 an illustration of the reception of the Ninetieth New York Veteran Volunteers in Brooklyn, February 15. The Ninetieth Regiment is the last Brooklyn regiment to return, and the Thirtieth Regiment, National Guard, declined to give them a proper reception, in which they were very efficiently aided by the War Fund Committee of Kings County. The regiment, numbering 180 muskets, was conveyed from Battery Barracks to Brooklyn. The Thirtieth Regiment, under the command of Colonel J. B. WOODRUFF, was drawn up to receive them on the south side of the street. A section of artillery from the Seventieth Regiment was detailed for the purpose of firing the salute, which was the signal of the arrival of the regiment. As soon as the regiment landed they formed in column and exchanged with the Thirtieth the usual courtesies.

Both regiments then marched up Myrtle Avenue to the arsenal in Portland Avenue, where the reception ceremonies took place. Along the line of march every body who had a flag displayed it, while the side-walks were lined with the friends of the regiment, all eager to welcome them and do them honor. At the arrival, both regiments paid Major-General H. B. DIXON the compliment of the marching salute. The large drill-room was set apart for the dinner, which was served on four long tables, and was such as to do great credit to all concerned in getting it up. The Mayor and Common Council of Brooklyn, the Police Justice, the veteran officers of other organizations, the Thirtieth and Ninetieth regiments, all occupied seats at the tables. After the regiments had assembled about the tables, Hon. J. S. T. STRANAHAN welcomed the returned regiment, in behalf of the War Fund Committee and the citizens of Brooklyn, in a very appropriate speech, to which Lieutenant-Colonel STRANAHAN, the regimental commander, responded. S. R. CURRIE, of the War Fund Committee, also made a speech of welcome, but it was so long that it was necessary to postpone to make the speech of the occasion. The General was frequently interrupted by the applause of his hearers, whose sympathies he was very successful in touching. The reception was excellently managed, and was worthy of Brooklyn.

The Ninetieth was recruited in Brooklyn in the fall of 1863, and on the 6th of January, 1864, sailed for Key West, Florida. In January, 1865, the regiment went to Beaufort, South Carolina; and subsequently joined the Department of the Gulf, taking part in the siege of Fort Hudson and the Red River campaign. In July, 1864, the Ninetieth joined the Sixth Corps in the Shenandoah Valley. The men fought at Fisher's Hill, at Cedar Creek, and in many other engagements under Sheridan. The regiment re-embarked in February, 1865. It has had about three thousand men in its ranks, including recruits.

RACE BETWEEN THE "ALGONQUIN" AND "WINOOSKI."

Our readers will remember that last summer there was a trial between the Winooski, a Government vessel, and the Algonquin, to test their comparative economy in the consumption of coal. They will also remember that in this trial the latter vessel, though she managed for several hours to maintain a nearly equal competition with the Winooski, finally broke down, being unable to bear the severe strain upon her machinery. It was then arranged that there should be another trial to test the speed of the two vessels. After numerous disappointments, the long-expected race was entered upon on the 13th of February.

The race was not run the entire distance, which should have been 1000 miles; but was, owing to the furthest stern on the night of the 14th, ended in the most summary manner, after running 250 miles. At 11:30 a.m. the two vessels left Wallcut Bay, and steamed up that river and through Hard Lake. The race commenced at Execution Rocks, opposite Rards Point, at seven minutes past 3 p.m. Before passing the light-house the Winooski was more than a ship's length ahead. At 7.40 p.m. the Winooski passed the light-house for the first time; and at 8.38 passed the Algonquin going toward the island as she herself was coming from it, the Algonquin being about fifteen miles behind. About an hour and a half after turning Fisher's Island for the second time the Winooski was thirty miles ahead of the Algonquin. The most rapid increase of the distance between the vessels by ten miles. On the completion of the third round the Winooski was seventy miles ahead. The total number of revolutions made by the wheels of the Winooski since starting was forty-one thousand nine hundred and ninety-two, averaging twenty-one and a half turns per minute. The pressure of steam was uniform throughout the three first rounds, and averaged thirty-five pounds on the engine and forty pounds on the boilers. The consumption of coal averaged about three thousand five hundred and fifty-seven pounds per hour. Going about twenty miles farther on a fourth round, the steam and the darkness rendered further progress dangerous, and the Algonquin came to anchor in Huntington Bay. The Winooski also anchored about a mile from Stamford Point. The race was not continued.

As might be expected, the Algonquin claims to have had a misunderstanding about the start, and when the signal was given her fires were low; by wheelmen were inefficient; her engine broke down, etc.

Fisher's Island, shown in our second sketch, lies fifteen miles east of New Haven, and ten three miles from the main land. It is one mile long and three-quarters of a mile wide, with a light-house on its extreme southern end.

MISSISSIPPI MISSION CONFERENCE OF THE M. E. CHURCH.

The progress of the war early revealed the probability of the emancipation of the whole colored population of the South. A very large portion of this population was in religious communion with the Methodist Episcopal Church South. But as the idea and hopes of liberty took possession of their minds, they naturally inclined to renounce the communion of the pastors and people who had not only justified their bondage, but many of whom had actually held them in slavery and profited by their unregarded toil. The progress of our arms brought many of these colored people within our military lines, and their pastors fled from them. Thus the way was opened for the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church to come to these people and assume the pastoral care of them. In order to do this more effectually, the Rev. J. P. NEWMAN, D.D., of New York, moved by Bishop ADAMS, in 1864, to New Orleans, with instructions to make arrangements for ministering the word and ordinances of the Gospel to both the colored and white congregations, or to mixed congregations. Until the close of the war all received his ministrations gladly. But when peace came, and the ministers of the Church South returned to Louisiana and Mississippi, the white people almost universally withdrew from the services of the Methodist Episcopal Church and returned to the pastoral care of the Church South.

The colored people still cleaved to the Methodist Episcopal Church. This was more or less the case throughout the South, but was especially so in Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas. In order more effectually to serve these people, the Bishops have divided the whole Southern country into four Mission Districts—two of which comprehend Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas. Rev. Bishop TROST has charge of this District, and made a tour through it in December last. He found a goodly number of intelligent colored Local Preachers, and also excellent white Missionaries who had been transferred to the work. On the 25th of December, 1865, in the city of New Orleans, he organized them into a conference, of which our engraving on page 132 gives a view, with the Bishop in the center. It ought to be carefully noted that white persons are admitted to these mission churches on the same terms as are the colored people; so that there is no distinction of caste.

We look upon this organization of colored men into churches, under the care of colored pastors, as a much more important movement than at first may appear. It will bring the colored men into the sphere of self-government, and powerfully tend to elevate the race. The Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church aids them, to a limited extent, in building plain yet comfortable churches, and gives employment to all colored preachers whose piety and intelligence will justify it.

The Conference contains 17 preachers, 12 colored and 5 white; 29 pastoral charges, most of them being large circuits; 1266 church-members; and $47,000 worth of church property. It is the beginning of a self-governing movement that will bear precious fruit in years to come.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

"What are you thinking about, my dear?" inquired Mr. Jones, glancing at the parrot's face of his better half as she sat typing with her toe upon the dittoed duster.

Mrs. Jones looked up with a preoccupied air, but smiled as she met her husband's gaze, and answered, "Considering what we shall have for breakfast."

"For breakfast? Why—how—how—some coffee, to be sure. Wouldn't you wish breakfast?"

Mrs. J. laughed. "You'll think differently tomorrow morning. You like something good to eat as well as any body. As for me, before I half finish my dinner I begin to wonder what to have for breakfast. I declare it puzzles me more to plan varieties for breakfast than to arrange for dinner twice over."

Mr. Jones was an excellent housewife. She did not, like many fine ladies, leave domestic affairs wholly to her servants, however faithful they might be; but gave orders respecting meals personally, and took special care that the dishes should be well prepared and nicely served. Yet she often worried of the perpetual thinking "what to have"—especially for breakfast. Many ladies find themselves in like dilemma. In summer, when nobody but the cooling iced-tea, fresh bread and berries and cold milk make a nice breakfast. In winter when the frost has never more substantial food to fortify the system against the blasts of weather and business.

It is not that the good housewife don't know, but she can not think what to have for breakfast. Every little while she "gives a shiver" as Mrs. Jones used to say, "chops, stews, boiled eggs, omelet, griddle cakes, and toast—I am tired of all. What else can I have?" There are many simple articles which a little ingenuity can easily vary. The simple hot-water bread, and eaten with sugar, is a delicious dish. It is better still with sugar and cream, if you can procure your milkman to serve you with cream. The baked hamlet, cut up cold, and fried, is excellent, either with steak or cream. What our called trapezoid fingers make a nice breakfast dish. Take fresh-cold soda crackers, let them soak five or ten minutes in cold water, then fry in a little lard on a griddle or in a frying-pan. These are also very suitable as an accompaniment to the meat at dinner. Cold chicken, turkey, veal or lamb, and even beef, left over from the previous day, may be minced up fine, warmed in gravy, and served on toast. But in order to avoid this or any other such makeshift article, extra work be given to the griddle and steamer; than scraps will ordinarily give without special instructions.

Breakfast may be wonderfully varied in the article of bread alone. Of course, good homemade bread is generally preferred for ordinary use. But for a change one may put on the table a different kind every day for a fortnight, and not exhaust the resources, if a good bakery is in the vicinity. Boston brown bread is excellent. Not cold—as we have frequently seen it served—but thoroughly heated through. This, with some nicely brewed coffee, makes a very palatable breakfast. But your coffee-balls must be carefully prepared and scented, and stirred up well before frying, or nothing is more tasteless. The Boston brown bread is excellent with cream. It is somewhat difficult to procure this kind of bread, yet away of the larger bakeries supply it. It can be made easily at home, if you want, one of the principal ingredients, can be obtained. But that is difficult. Eye does not get the article needed. Common Graham bread is much more healthful than a constant diet of baked wheat bread. "Bobby Jones" split open, loamed, and buttered, are excellent; so also both wheat and corn waffles. "Johnny Lind Cake"—so called—is very appetizing. This is the recipe:

One quart of flour, four table-spoonsful of sugar, two eggs, a piece of butter the size of an egg, one teaspoonful of soda, and two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar. Mix with milk enough to make a rather stiff batter; put it in cake-pans, and bake twenty minutes in quick oven.

If you choose, bake in small muffin-cups, and call them "Goldsmiths' Ovens." This will give a variety, and they are really never made in that way.

Perhaps Mrs. Jones has decided on her breakfast by this time; but we must recommend one other article, a favorite for breakfast in some parts of New England. Though called these "pancakes," they are very unlike the "pancakes" of New York. They may be made plain or rich, at pleasure, but the following recipe is a good one:

Half a pint of milk. Three eggs. Table-spoonsful of melted butter or lard. One cup of sugar. A little nutmeg. Half a tea-spoonsful of salt. One half tea-spoonsful of soda. One tea-spoonsful of cream of tartar. Of course the cream of tartar should be added in the flour. Make the batter rather stiff. Have ready a little of boiling lard and drop the batter from a table-spoon into it. In order that these don't be successfully made, the batter must be just stiff enough and the lard just hot enough—otherwise they will "soak," as it is termed. A little experimenting will enable one to decide these points. Too many must not be put into the kettle as they rise a great deal. In order that the batter may slip easily, dip the spoon into the hot lard occasionally. When the pancakes look done try them with a knitting-needle; if it comes out smooth they can be taken up. If rightly prepared these are served or neatly so contradicting the phrase, "fat as a pancake," of a beautiful crisp brown outside, and light and also within. With warm bread and coffee—and a bit of cheese is a good addition—they make an excellent breakfast. These may also be used, with lemon and sugar as a condiment, for a dinner dessert.

It is stated that 68,500 valentines were delivered by the New York letter-carriers on the 14th and 15th of February.

A lady coming on from Montreal to Portland had bought a box of silk at the former place, and after entering the cars, a custom-house officer asked her if she had any thing that required examination. Very innocently she produced her valise, the maid strolling in her lap all the while, done up in a coarse brown paper, and asked the officer to hold that parcel while she exhibited the contents of the valise. The innocent victim, not suspecting that custom-house parcel of being an offender, allowed her to go on her way rejoicing.

At a lecture recently delivered at Cooper Institute on "The Philosophy of Smoking," in enumerating the advantages of using tobacco, the lecturer recited an instance in the case of a crew wrecked among the Feejee Islands. All were eaten by the Islanders except one man, and him they declined to touch in consequence of his fresh smelling so strongly of tobacco. Hence the lecturer argued that all travelers should at once commence the use of tobacco, as they never could tell among what company they might fall.

In the Court of Special Sessions, a few days ago, a Cuban, who claimed to be unable to speak English, was tried for stealing, there being also evidence that he was not unacquainted with the ways of burglars. As he signified that he did not understand the evidence against him, a woman who stated that she knew the prisoner, having done washing for him, proffered her services as interpreter. On being questioned, after having given her name and residence, she stated that she was born on the rock of Gibraltar, was a widow, and supported herself and children by taking in washing. She spoke English with great correctness, and said that she could speak fluently and translate correctly French, Spanish, Italian, and Arabic. She had formerly been a governess, but, being without friends in this city, was reduced to the greatest distress. Her child, whom she had not found time to teach the alphabet, could speak three languages. She had taught him while busy at the wash tub. She was undeniably perfect in both the English and Spanish languages. The answers and explanations of the prisoner were given with a quickness and clearness seldom found in interpreters.

The following statement, if true, certainly indicates a wonderful change in the times. We cut it from a Boston paper:

"A Southerner has been boarding in his own house in Beaufort, South Carolina, and paying the negro occupant $1 per day."

In the enlightened State of Delaware there is a law authorizing the sale of negroes convicted of crime into slavery. Four victims recently sold under this statute in Wilmington, brought only from twelve to twenty-five cents each. In view of this deplorable condition we should think the lawless would hardly pay, and that the law might be repealed.

A peculiar pair of 14 and 35 years respectively, residing in Baltimore, took it into their heads to get married, which they did secretly, and started for the congenial society of Washington. The parents followed, and found the youth selling papers and the girl sewing for a darning store, both happy as cooking doves.

The manufacturers are now busy with spring goods. We may state, for the benefit of such of our readers as like to be beforehand in their information on fashions, that stripes prevail on all the silk materials which have as yet been prepared. Not that the spring dresses will be made up from one piece of goods, the design on which represents stripes of equal width, but with three or four different pieces, the ground-work of which is similar, but the stripes are of different widths. The skirts will be composed of three different pieces, but the bodies will be made of self color, matching the ground-work of the skirt, and they will be trimmed with the stripes. Buff or pinkish color, as last spring, will be fashionable for morning wear, and the spring will not be soiled from either broad or narrow, but clusters of fine lines, which are softer in effect than when the lines are solid.

For morning promenade dresses the patent velvet or velveteen has superseded tulle, net, poplin, cashmere, and serge, in popular favor. The velveteen dresses, with pale pink to match, are decidedly the favorite toilets for morning outdoor wear—not that they are by any means common, but, on the contrary, are extremely fashionable, and have, so to speak, been well patronized. The cotton-backed fabric is of English manufacture, and although it pretends to be what it is not, it has many qualities to recommend it. For the effect it produces it is not costly; then it wears well—that is, it does not become either white or shaly quickly; and lastly, in some colors it is very brilliant and rich-looking; such hues as Italian white, dark blue, ochre, or either a shade of golden brown, and maroon; the black inclines to brown, and may be said from the first to look shabby. Then those velveteens require but little or no trimming, which can not be said of either tulle or serge.

Shoes for evening wear are made either of white gros grain or satin, or of silk to match the dress, elaborately embellished with beads. For evening home wear male slippers are generally made either of velvet or of unglazed kid, also embroidered with crystal beads. White shoes are trimmed round with ribbon ruffles of a gay color, generally selected to match the flowers in the head-dress—such male slippers are reached with garters over either corse or blue satin ribbon. For outdoor wear, in dry, fine weather, brown kid boots, with black patent leather tips, are general; they are fastened with black buttons, and ornamented at the top with black tassels. For children this style of boot is particularly fashionable; it is more youthful in character than black kid.

A deliberate act of crime was recently perpetrated near a village on the Jobalpeire line, about twenty-five miles from Alshland, on the border of the Welsh territories. The subject of the sacrifice was the wife of a barber, who, on his death, declared her intention of not surviving; and on her steadily refusing to the expectations of her neighbors, they at last yielded to her impatience, and assisted at the brutal ceremony. The woman did not appear to be under the influence of Aberg, but simply acted on the promptings of what—for want of a better term—we must call religious fervor. She sat upon a pile of wood with her dead husband across her knees, while fagots were piled up to her shoulders, and her hair saturated with grease, continuing to converse with the by-standers while her arms were burning, and only ceasing to do so when flame and smoke choked her utterance.

THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS.

IT is a matter of the gravest regret that the President and Congress should differ so decidedly at this most important moment. It was clear, however, from the day that reorganization became a practical question that great forbearance would be necessary in each branch of the Government, and it is painfully evident that neither has exercised it. But we are inclined to believe that the events of the past fortnight have taught both the President and Congress, as they have taught the country, that a different spirit must prevail upon both sides at Washington, or very serious consequences will follow. Thus, upon the cardinal point of the admission of members from the late rebel States, the President is powerless if Congress persists; and, on the other hand, measures which Congress deems absolutely essential may be nullified by the President's veto.

When the last rebel surrendered, and the States whose secession had been prevented by the national arms were left without other government than the military authority of the United States, it was necessary that steps toward the civil reorganization of those States should be taken by the Commander-in-Chief. The President, therefore, acting under no special verbal warrant of the Constitution, but by its undoubtedly implied authority and from the necessity of the case, appointed Provisional Governors and authorized them to call primary elections of delegates to Conventions, indicating at the same time who should vote. In this last point of his instructions the President was governed by the view which had been kept steadily prominent through the war, that no State could lawfully secede from the Union; and as it was conceded that, under the Constitution, the suffrage should be conferred by the State alone, he refrained from disturbing that understanding, naturally anxious to follow as far as practicable the normal traditions of the Government. He excepted, however, certain classes of those who by the old State laws were entitled to vote, while he refrained from creating new voters.

Undoubtedly this whole proceeding was exceptional. He acted as an absolute military commander, and might, at his discretion, have imposed other conditions and adopted a different system. If he forbade voting to any whom the local law had formerly empowered to vote, the local law was really repudiated. His will was the only law in the case, and he had the same right to authorize WARD HAMPTON'S late slave to vote as he had to prohibit WARD HAMPTON from voting. WARD HAMPTON was no more a traitor, according to the Constitution, although he was a more conspicuous one, than any of his soldiers; and if the Commander-in-Chief could authorize a traitor taken in arms to vote because he had been formerly a voter, he could certainly permit a loyal soldier of the Government to vote who had not hitherto enjoyed that right. But in this matter the President was guided by the plain consideration that it was desirable to make no fundamental changes which he could avoid; and although the true grounds and limits of his authority in the case do not seem to us to have been very clear to the President himself, he proceeded upon his conviction of the indestructibility of a State in the Union, and his action was perfectly intelligible.

The Conventions having met, he stated certain conditions which he, at least, deemed essential precedents to a resumption of the relations of the States to the Union. These were substantially the revocation of the acts of Secession; the repudiation of the rebel debt; the formal adoption of the Emancipation Amendment; the guarantee of all civil rights to the freedmen; and the election of truly loyal representatives to Congress. All of these but the two last were generally accepted by the States in question. But none, we believe, have fully guaranteed an equality of civil right before the law, although in one of the Southwestern States it has been held by a Court that the overthrow of Slavery carries with it all legal distinctions based upon color. One or two loyal representatives were also elected from the late rebel States.

This was the condition of the case when Congress assembled. The point to decide was exactly that stated by the President in his late unfortunate speech: "When those who rebelled comply with the Constitution, when they give sufficient evidence of loyalty, when they show that they can be trusted, when they yield obedience to the law that you and I acknowledge, I say extend to them the right hand of fellowship, and let peace and union be restored." Congress met and found representatives of the rebel States awaiting admission. Congress said at once, "Let us see and see if they can be trusted, and whether they give sufficient evidence of loyalty." "Congress was not bound to take the President's opinion as a precedent. It would doubtless give it great weight; but the power already exercised by the President in the reorganization was so enormous that it was desirable another authority should intervene. The President had certainly no reason to be angry with Congress for exercising the very discretion which he claimed for himself; and it seems to us if the President had been more patient, if he had reflected that it was not for him alone to decide without appeal the conditions of reorganization of the Union, the collision might have been avoided.

It was the evident determination of the President that his view should prevail which excited the jealousy of Congress. How could he expect that General GAUNT's report of a few days' excursion to Charleston would be accepted as a conclusive statement of the actual condition of public sentiment as against the evidence of prolonged and faithful observation presented by CARL SCHURZ? Mutual defiance was exchanged almost at the very opening of the session. The House instantly allowed its most unfit member for the office to be its leader, while the unfortunate expression of Senator SUMNER indicated a hostility and impatience which could only lead to mischief. With an equally unfortunate want of reticence the President talked freely and warmly of the action of the House; and the House had not dignity enough to rebuke THOMAS SWAYNE when, in return, he grossly insulted the President by comparing him, for expressing an opinion, to CHARLES I. subverting the fundamental law. The heat grew. The President, in his Veto Message, most unwisely engaged in an untimely exposition of his views of general policy. The Senate failed to sustain its own bill by the necessary two-thirds. The House, stung with disappointment at the defeat of its favorite measure, and incensed by the untimely remarks of the President, needlessly declared that, whatever his opinion might be, no rebel State should resume its relations in the Union except by permission of Congress. Again THOMAS SWAYNE talked wildly about usurpation at the very moment the President was refusing enormous power, and as if the President's opinion could admit a representative to Congress, and then followed the melancholy scene in the White House grounds.

If this hostility continues, practical reorganization of the Union will be delayed for two years certainly. A political revolution will inevitably arise which will return the late rebel States to Congress without the oath of loyalty, and transfer the Government to the present Opposition. Now Congress, it seems to us, for reasons which must be apparent to every thoughtful man, must take the initiative in returning to co-operation with the President. It must consider what is called his policy totally irrespective of his personality. "The central idea of that policy is, that a change of feeling can not be wrought by law. We must remember that we are to live with the people of the late rebel States as fellow-citizens, not as subjects; and wise men will see many reasons why it is better to leave many things that we might now wish to effect directly to the surer accomplishment of indirect methods." Congress is undoubtedly the judge when the unrepresented States may safely resume their relations in the Union. But the decision should be based upon common-sense and a generous faith in the logic of events, in the progress of human development, and in the wisdom of the American system.

THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

IN our remarks last week upon the Veto Message we assumed from the President's remarks that he proposed to leave the freedmen to the care of the States in which they live. We did so because he spoke of some of those States as in his opinion entitled to resume their normal relations with the Union, and consequently to the right of caring for all their people. He spoke of the present Freedmen's Bureau as still existing; but as that is to expire a year after the end of the war, and as he told us war was now ended, it was fair to assume that the present arrangement would end by the first of May. Moreover, he did not say that he approved such a Bureau, and by insisting that the freedmen were not so forlorn as has been represented, and might emigrate if they were dissatisfied or appeal to the courts, he very plainly intimated, as we inferred, that their rights were not to be defended by the United States. We therefore said nothing of his objections to the particular bill presented to him, but simply expressed our profound sorrow that, in his judgment, the emancipated slaves ought to be abandoned homeless, homeless, landless, and at an inconceivable disadvantage to those who are peculiarly hostile to them.

That our view was not singular was proved by the universal excitement that followed the Message. The party of hostility to human rights, the "Democracy," whose sole article of faith is contempt of negroes, fired their leaden guns at the pleasing prospect that the loyal people of South Carolina who had fought for the Union were now to be turned over to the retreating heads of those who had fought against it. The extreme opponents of this party, true friends of the people and of equal rights, also generally hung their heads in speechless sorrow and amazement. But the Evening Post, which is edited by men as faithful to justice and equal rights as men can be; HENRY WARD BEECHER, whose tongue flames and sparkles against the enemies of man; and many a private citizen not less constant in the good faith, openly asserted that they did not understand the President to be opposed to any bill, but only to the present one, and for reasons which were in some points very weighty. But such was the doubt of the President's position arising from the want of precision of statement, and from the mixed discussions of his Message, that it was immediately announced that the Secretary of State would come to New York and speak upon the subject. Under such circumstances a speech could only be an explanation, and we waited patiently the Secretary's coming.

Mr. SEWARD's reception was deserved. It was a triumph of enthusiasm. Every man in the audience remembered his services and his sufferings, and forgot every thing else. The important part of his speech was this plain declaration:

"Both the President and Congress agree that during the brief transition which the country is making from civil war to internal peace the freedmen and refugees ought not to be abandoned by the nation to persecution or suffering. It was for this transition period that the Bureau of Freedmen was created by Congress, and was kept and is still kept in effective operation. Both the President and Congress, on the other hand, agree that when that transition period shall have been fully passed, and the harmonious relations between the States and the Union fully restored, that Bureau would be not only unnecessary, but unconstitutional, demoralizing, and dangerous, and therefore that it should cease to exist."

He added that the President thought the transition period was nearly passed, and that the original provision is sufficient for the end desired. That provision is for a year after the end of the war; but the war does not end, he said, until a proclamation is issued by the Government; and if, as the year closes, it is found necessary to continue the provision, it is for Congress to continue it. Mr. SEWARD confirmed our view that in the President's judgment the war of the rebellion is "not yet fully closed."

General HOWARD was equally uncertain of the President's meaning, and asked an explanation. The General subsequently issued a letter to the agents of the present Bureau informing them that the President regards the law as continuing "at least a year from this time;" and Senator WILSON, who has wisely maintained pleasant relations with the President, has introduced a bill extending the operations of the present bill for two years.

We are sincerely glad that this is the truth. The national disgrace of an abandonment of the freedmen in their present condition to those who lately held them as slaves would be overwhelming. They are our wards, and we have no moral right to relinquish their hands until we leave them as fully secure in every civil right as every other citizen. Upon this point there is no difference of opinion among Union men. It is the "Democracy" only which would abandon them. The President, in his conversation with Governor COX, of Ohio, speaks of his resolution to see justice done with a distinctness which we should have been glad to find in his Message. The case is unprecedented, and we must treat it accordingly.

MONEY MATTERS.

THE Bull speculators in gold are having a hard time. For three years they have fought the Government with vigor and success. But their glory is departing. They thought 140 quite a moderate price for gold, in view of the $750,000,000 of currency afloat; and when the Government began to sell its surplus gold, some three weeks since, they merely laughed at the Government broker, and took, day after day, all he had to sell. It was not till he returned to the charge day after day, and week after week, each time seemingly with an increased supply of gold for sale, that they lost heart, and, after a few ineffectual struggles, fled in dismay from the field. The premium dropped to 1304, and would have gone still lower, but that at that point the Government broker, not caring to press the market, withdrew for a time.

In days gone by the supply of gold in the Treasury was so small that the price of its actual wants that every one could calculate to a nicety how much the Government could afford to sell. This ascertained, the Bull speculators would make up a "pool," take all the Government gold at a price, and then, when the Government dared sell no more, would run up the premium with perfect impunity, and compel the merchants who required gold for duties to buy it of them at the advance. Now the reserve of gold in the Sub-Treasury is so far in excess of the wants of Government, and the revenue from customs so far beyond general expectation, that there is practically hardly any limit to the quantity of gold which Government can afford to sell. During the month of February it is safe to say that the Government broker must have sold from $28,000,000 to $20,000,000 of gold, and if the speculators had had the courage to keep up the premium above 140 he might have sold much more. By the last official report of the Treasury Department Government held over $50,000,000 on 1st February, and since then the customs have yielded about $15,000,000 more. Fighting a "pile" of this magnitude is a very different matter from fighting poor Mr. CHASE, with his beggarly reserve of five or six millions.

The decline and the increased supply of gold are very distasteful to most of our foreign merchants. When the banks suspended specie payments most of these gentlemen put their capital into gold, and have held it in gold ever since, borrowing currency on the pledge of the gold for the transaction of their business. In ordinary times these gentlemen have done very well. In the first place, their business has been safe from the perturbations and uncertainties which have embarrassed all trades prosecuted on a currency basis. And, next, gold having generally been scarce for delivery owing to the small volume of floating gold, and the large short sales by speculators and merchants, these foreigners have, during a large part of the time they have held their gold, been able to make something by lending it out. It has been quite common for them to get all the currency they wanted on the pledge of their gold free of interest; and it has not been uncommon for speculators to pay them $\frac{1}{2}$ and even $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. a day for the use of their gold. During the first days of February, before Government began to sell, the stock of floating gold had fallen so low that speculators were obliged to pay $\frac{1}{2}$ and even $\frac{3}{4}$ of 1 per cent. a day for the use of gold for delivery. There were halcyon days for the foreign houses which held their capital in specie. Since Government has supplied the market times have changed. Gold is now quite abundant, and holders who want to use their money in business are compelled to pay full 7 per cent. interest for the use of currency.

It need hardly be observed that these merchants had a perfect right to invest their capital in gold. In one point of view the operation was eminently business-like and judicious. But as it somehow generally happened that men who had thus invested their capital in gold became imbued with a deep distrust of the national currency, and as they generally lost no occasion of expressing that distrust, spreading it through society, and impressing it upon all with whom they came into contact, they came, rightly or wrongly, to be regarded as unfriendly to the national cause, and to be classed among the sympathizers with the rebellion. That injustice was herein done to many holders of gold is quite likely. But, in the main, the chances are that the popular theory was just, and that merchants who held their capital in gold were not, as a rule, friends of the national currency or of the country in which it was issued. For this reason there is the less regret felt that this class of persons should now be suffering loss in consequence of the Government sales of gold.

Of the future of the gold market nothing can be said except that gold ought to steadily decline, and probably will. There is no reason why it should be maintained at its present premium. The currency has reached and passed the maximum point of expansion. More compound legal-tenders are now passing out of circulation than Government is issuing of national bank notes. In the course of a few weeks, of the entire issue of $185,000,000 of interest-bearing legal tenders, there will not be $15,000,000 in circulation. At the same time a lively demand for currency at the South is drawing to that section a considerable proportion of the existing national bank notes and plain legal tenders. The currency is still far larger than is required for the business of the country. But it is not as large, in fact, as it was three or six months ago, when the bulk of the interest-bearing legal tenders circulated as money, and few or none of the national bank notes went South.

Serious differences of opinion have been developed in Congress with regard to the Financial Measure, sometimes called the Morrill Bill. It is of very little importance whether Congress passes the bill or not. Under the acts now in force Mr. McCULLOUGH can contract the currency just as fast and as thoroughly as he requires. The new measure would certainly enlarge his powers. But it is open to objections to which existing statutes are not obnoxious; and if the work to be done can be accomplished without creating Mr. McCULLOUGH Director of the money market scandal will be avoided, and the reputation of the Secretary will be spared speculations otherwise inevitable. It seems probable that Congress will pass a law excluding interest-bearing legal tender notes from the reserve which the law compels national banks to keep on hand for the redemption of their notes. Such a measure would restore compound legal tenders to the category of investments, to which they fairly belong—would at a blow curtail the currency by $85,000,000, and would compel some of our national banks, which have been doing business on a grand scale, and declaring enormous dividends, to convert a large proportion of their assets into legal tenders.

The great balance in the Treasury—$110,000,000 at this point, and probably not less than $150,000,000 at all the various Sub-Treasuries and depositories—continues to attract attention. Merchants can not understand why Mr. McCulloch should be willing to pay 5 @ 6 per cent. interest for money which he doesn't want, can't use, and keeps idle. Possibly a solution to the problem may be made public within a few days.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

THAT the President of the United States should have been incited by a shouting crowd of his fellow-citizens to denounce by name a Senator, a Representative, and a private citizen, and to speak of another citizen in the slang of the stump, is something so unprecedented and astounding that, while every generous man will allow for the excitement of passion, there is no self-respecting American citizen who will not feel humiliated that the chief citizen of the Republic, in such a place, on such a day, should have been utterly mastered by it.

Yet the servility which actually defends and approves such an outburst of passion is even more deplorable. The President, excited and exasperated, may be charitably supposed unconscious of the real scope of his words when he accused Mr. SUMNER and Mr. STREISSNER of inciting to his assassination. It is conceivable that he was too angry to weigh his words when, after calling for justice upon traitors—meaning the gallows—he denounced those gentlemen as traitors. But for an editor to sit deliberately down and elaborately justify so tragical an outrage of the plainest official propriety upon the ground that the speaker said that he should "stand by the Constitution," is an offense so contemptible as to be ludicrous. The President has taken a solemn oath to "stand by the Constitution," and nobody supposes that he intends to perjure himself. But the Senator and Representative have taken quite as solemn an oath, and their purpose is no less undoubted. Is it treason and deserving of death to differ from the President's view of constitutional duty? How if, because of a difference of opinion as to constitutional obligation, the Senator and Representative had denounced the President by name as a traitor like JEFFERSON DAVIS? Would they be excused on the ground that they declared they would "stand by the Constitution?"

This is not a question of President against Congress, or the reverse. It has nothing to do with the merits of different views of reorganization. It is an offense unprecedented in our history, which we fervently trust may never be repeated.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN BOOKS.

Messrs. STRAHAN of London, whose exports of books to this country were arrested at the New York Custom-house for apparent undervaluation of invoices, are naturally angry at the interference with their very pleasant and very profitable business, and, being angry, are naturally indignant. The practical discrimination in favor of the foreign producer which at present exists, under the heavy accumulation of excise dues and the light of untaxed duties, encourages them in the belief that the American market is at the mercy of the London publisher. Serenely confident in this advantage given them by the much lower wages of their workmen, they haughtily predict, in a letter published in the London Bookeller, of January 31, "Americans may ignore all the teachings of economic science, and may refuse to believe that Commerce and Industry ever lived; but this must happen nevertheless, that the useless employment of men in the manufacture of books that are already manufactured will cease, and that there will no more be an English and American edition of the same book than there are just now an English and Irish, a French and Belgian, or a Prussian and Austrian."

But besides being very petulant Messrs. STRAHAN & Co. are, as we said above, very indignant. The lesson they have received has led them to examine the United States Custom Laws, and they boast that if one of their games can be stopped they can still play another unchecked. They have found that, under the law, if they export as manufacturers to their New York agent they are bound to invoice their books at the "actual market value thereof at the time and place when and where the same were manufactured," but that if their books undergo an intermediate sale they can be invoiced by the buyer "at the actual cost thereof." This opens a new door to them, and they thus cheerfully point out to their broker publishers the mode by which they propose to make America the literary Ireland of England: "Can we not make the question one of 'actual cost' instead of 'market value'?" The New York house of STRAHAN & Co. (which, by-the-way, has interests separate from ours) can cease dealing with us and order their goods from an expert house in London, to whom we can sell for one-eighth per cent. profit, and who on their part can sell for the same. This is quite according to the statute, and if the New York publishers will insist on our playing at business we may have no objection to do so."

We admit that all this is perfectly feasible, and further, that men who boast that they will commit two fictitious sales to bolster up an invoice of this kind are just as likely to make these sales, nominally, at twenty per cent. loss each as at one-eighth of one per cent. profit, and thus deplete the revenue still more. Messrs. STRAHAN & Co. have our thanks for the openness with which they avow their design of reducing us to literary bondage and the means by which they hope to effect it. We trust the confession will not be without weight with our legislators when they come to revise the tariff.

A PUNGENT QUESTION.

Hon. JOSHUA HILL was a representative in Congress from Georgia when the State seceded. He held fast to the Union, and while withdrawing to his home did not disguise his loyalty during the war. He was a candidate at the late election of a United States Senator by the Georgia Legislature, but the fact of his loyalty was successfully urged against him. In a speech to the Legislature which is remarkable for dignity, force, and fidelity to the country, he told his fellow-citizens many valuable but not agreeable truths, and said to them with a stinging emphasis what is well adapted for other meridians than Georgia:

"You all profess to love the President and to sustain his policy. If I may be allowed to compare large things with small, let me inquire how it is that you can forgive Andrew Johnson for making war upon the Confederacy, and exhorting himself to crush it, and yet reprove me for my peaceful opposition to your revolution? His children fought you while mine fought for you. Are you quite certain that your love for the President is heartfelt and sincere?"

DR. DRAPER'S "CIVIL POLICY OF AMERICA."

THE interest with which books in relation to America are now read all over Europe is strikingly shown by the publication of Dr. DRAPER'S work on "The Future Civil Policy of America" at Leipzig, by Otto WUNDERLICH & Co. This German translation is published in a style calculated for extensive circulation, and is made by Mr. BASTERT, Librarian in Wittenberstel.

Dr. DRAPER'S previous work on "The Intellectual Development of Europe" has had extraordinary success. It has been reprinted in England, and translated into Dutch, Italian, German, the latter edition being published in two volumes by the above-named Leipzig house. The German critics speak of it with unqualified praise. One of the ablest of them in his review describes it as "one of the most masterly and profound presentations of the course of European mental progress that has yet appeared."

Dr. DRAPER'S forthcoming "History of the American Civil War" will be reproduced in England, France, and Germany, simultaneously with its appearance in America. It is expected to be ready the ensuing summer, and doubtless will do much to disseminate in Europe just views of the principles of that great conflict.

LEFT-HANDED WRITING.

The specimens of writing by soldiers and sailors who have lost their right arms during the war are well worthy inspection at the hall corner of Twenty-third Street and Broadway. They are generally "back-handed," but legible and comely, and it is plain that a left-handed clerk or book-keeper can write as fairly as any other. The specimens are another illustration of the character and talent of Yankee volunteers.

IN PEACE.

Oh leave me to my reveries,
My own pure sky, my valleys fair,
My streamlets running where they please,
My flowery hills, my forest trees,
My blue-waved river flowing there.

And let my life that stream beside,
Like it pursue its onward way,
Far from the loud world's pomp and pride,
Not deep, but ever clear its tide,
And careless of the future day.

Thus let it glide on, sweet and slow,
Bordered with flowers, the hills between,
Playing with moss abroad in its flow,
And grasses waving to and fro,
With willow branches dropping in.

My hours rocked by each wind that blows,
Linked hand in hand steal soft away,
In their light track my thoughts unclose,
As fast and fresh as grass that grows
Beside the trodden public way.

They say that life is hard to bear;
My God! it is not so to me,
Two angels—poetry and prayer—
Like sister's love, like mother's care,
Cradle and keep it pure for thee.

Childlike, it still pursues a dream,
A hope, a wish, a memory,
Like butterfly beside a stream;
And in each morning's sunny gleam,
It sees its whole fatality.

Drop upon drop, but heavy-sweet,
Thus to us share the days are given;
There is not one it fears to meet,
Oh God! thus doubtless at Thy feet,
The angels live in heaven.

And when this happy life is run,
Death must draw very gently nigh,
Like flowers half-faded by the sun,
When the long summer day is done,
We only beg our heads and die!

And if not Faith and Hope be there,
Why what is Death? To close our eyes,
To concentrate ourselves in prayer,
To yield our souls to angels' care,
And sleep, to 'waken in the skies.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

February 20: In the Senate, Mr. Wade introduced a joint resolution in amendment of the Constitution so that no President shall be eligible for a second term, and made a speech in denouncing that the President was too ambitious of power. The question then came up whether, notwithstanding the President's objections, the President's Bureau bill should be passed, and was decided against the passage. There was a two-thirds majority. The vote stood yeas 36 to nays 13. Among those voting in the negative were Senators Sargent, Dixon, and Doolittle. Vice-President Foster voted in the affirmative; also Mr. Fessenden and Mr. Wilson.

In the House, the entire session was taken up in noisy discussion on a motion of Mr. Stevens, that "in order to close agitation upon a question which seems likely to disturb the action of the Government, as well as to quiet the uncertainty which is agitating the minds of the people of the several States which have been declared in insurrection, no Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress from any of the said States, until Congress shall have declared such States entitled to such representation." Mr. Stevens moved the previous question. For several hours a persistent attempt was maintained to prevent a vote, but Mr. Stevens triumphed at last, and the resolution was adopted, yeas to 60.

February 21: In the Senate, Mr. Fessenden attempted in vain to introduce the secessionist resolution which Mr. Stevens had moved through the House the day before. The Constitutional Amendment was then debated.

In the House, the great topic of discussion was the Loan Bill, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, when he deems it expedient, to convert obligations not bearing interest, and also to dispose of any of the Government bonds, either in this country or Europe, for the purpose only of retiring other obligations, but not for any increase of the public debt. Mr. Morrill favored the bill. Mr. Stevens proposed to amend the bill by striking out the discretionary power of the Secretary and the foreign loan clause. He contended that the bill placed six hundred and forty-four millions at the absolute control of the Secretary. Mr. Hooper spoke in favor of the bill at great length. He reviewed the financial history of the country for the past five years. He said: "According to the estimates of the Treasury Department, and the actual results of the first half of the present fiscal year, the revenue of the Government from the existing system of taxation, and from other sources, will not be less than $200,000,000; while the annual expenditures for the fiscal year ending on the 30th June the next, including the interest on the public debt, is $254,317,181 58. It is apparent, therefore, that the present rate of taxation will, under any circumstances, yield an amount of revenue much in excess of what is necessary to secure the amount required for the ordinary expenses of the Government, the interest on the public debt, and a reasonable appropriation for its extinguishment within the lifetime of many of those who now bear the burdens of this taxation."—Mr. Hooper thus summed up the terms of our debt: "It may be well to recapitulate the statement of the different forms of obligations which now represent the debt of the country; and also to state the amount of debt existing in each of these forms on the 31st of January, 1866:

Bonds, the principal and interest payable in gold.....	$1,120,786,700 00
Legal tenders of Government notes, including the fractional currency, but excluding the gold coin.....	482,381,810 37
Seven or a three-tenths Treasury note payable in three years, and convertible at maturity into six per cent. bonds.....	880,000,000 00
Legal tender compound interest Treasury notes, bearing interest payable with the principal three years from date.....	193,540,941 00
Certificates of indebtedness, payable one year from date, with interest.....	60,867,500 00
Certificates of deposit of temporary loans, payable with interest on demand, or in ten days from demand, after thirty days.....	97,257,124 50
Amount of the war debt.....	$2,740,491,745 87
Adding other Government debts.....	50,591,473 29
Total amount of debt Jan. 1, 1866.....	$3,200,923,217 66
At the same time there was in the Treasury, in coin.....	$45,738,520 00
Less gold certificates of deposit.....	7,285,160 00
And in currency.....	$38,453,360 00
Total amount to the credit of the United States in the Treasury.....	$84,491,880 00

It was essential, Mr. Hooper said, that our currency should not be subject to fluctuation. This could only be done by a gradual reduction of its amount until the remainder shall constitute the equivalent of coin. The first step in that direction should be to exchange the interest-bearing legal-tender notes for long bonds; and at the same time to reduce the rate of interest on temporary loans to at least four or five per centum. This reduction of the rate of interest on temporary loans would enhance the value of certificates of indebtedness, which bear six per cent. interest; and, being payable at a period fixed by the Treasury Department, they are a more convenient form of loan, while at the same time they provide a mode of anticipating the revenue at times when it may be needed. What the only unfunded obligations of the Government are the legal tender notes and fractional currency, noting nothing for interest, we can more easily determine to what extent, and when, they should be withdrawn from circulation. They now constitute a fund or loan amounting to over $400,000,000 without any cost to the Government for interest. They constitute a loan from the people; and before I consent to their conversion into bonds that will require the addition of $21,000,000 to the annual payment for interest, I wish to know how such benefits are to be derived by assessing so large an increase to the amount of interest we now have to pay; and also, by whose hands it will be done. My chief objection to withdrawing the United States notes from circulation by converting them into bonds are, besides the expense that would be incurred for interest on the bonds, my belief that a larger amount of money than formerly is now required for the business of the country, and my fear that some other paper-money not so good may be allowed to take their place, by which the country would be further than ever from a currency convertible into coin."

February 22: Congressional proceedings were interrupted to give place to the national service in honor of the late Gen. Henry W. Wadsworth. The eulogy was pronounced by Mr. Casswell, Senator from Maryland.

February 23: In the Senate, a new Freedmen's Bureau bill was introduced by Mr. Wilson, and was referred to the Committee of Finance.

In the House, Mr. Washburn was declared entitled to the contested Indiana seat by a vote of 57 to 24.

February 24: In the House, Messrs. Clark, Platts, Beaman, and Brown will make speeches on the subject of reconstruction.

February 26: In the Senate, the collection of the Arkansas Senators were laid upon the table, 20 to 17.—Mr. Sherman spoke against the resolution for the indefinite extension of Senators' representatives. He held that the latest rebel States were State still. He showed that President Johnson's policy only differed from Lincoln's in being more lenient against rebels. He deprecated a resolution to impeach the President. No act of the President's, he said, up to the present hour had been inconsistent with his obligations to the great Union party that elected him.

In the House, Mr. Hingham reported back the Constitutional Amendment that "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to the citizens of each State all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several States, and to all persons in the several States equal protection in the rights of life, liberty, and property." The amendment was laid over.

NEWS ITEMS.

During his last visit to New York General Grant has been presented by several of our leading wealthy citizens with a purse of one hundred thousand dollars.

The winter on the Pacific coast has been even more severe than heretofore reported. Communication with Mexico has been cut off by the great depth of snow, and it is feared there has been great suffering and loss of life. It is said that two hundred Mexicans on the way to San Francisco are known to have perished.

The Georgia Legislature has sent Commissioners to Washington for the purpose of requesting the Government to remove colored soldiers from the State.

The chief medical officer of the Freedmen's Bureau reports that during the month of December the total number of freedmen treated at the various hospitals throughout the Southern States, principally for malarial diseases, was 13,173. The deaths during that period were 680; discharged, 12,493.

Major-General John M. Palmer, commanding in Kentucky, has been urged by the publishers of the Louisville Journal to urge the restoration of the Auburn prison to that State. He answers that he can not do so, and gives reasons therefor, which are as follows:

"More than 20,000 persons, who were for a longer or shorter period of time in prison for the avowed purpose of overthrowing the Government of the State of Kentucky, and forcing its unwilling people into subjection to a local revolutionary government, have returned to the State, welcomed back to their former homes in many cases by communities that regard them as patriots and heroes. In many such communities loyal citizens and soldiers are objects of prejudice, dislike, and often of persecution. Courts organized under the laws of the State for the equal distribution of justice in many instances have perceived themselves to be used as the mere instruments of the vengeance of those who are hostile to the Government, so that loyal men are still, in some parts of the State, compelled to leave their homes, or, if they remain, are constrained to feel that their lives and property and all their dearest interests are insecure. The duty of protecting all the people of the State, and especially those who have perished their lives in its defense, is one that no Government can neglect, and, at the same time, escape the imputation of ingratitude, and subjecting itself to justified contempt. It is also true that upward of 200,000 of our people who were until lately slaves are now free. As slaves they were governed by a system of law adapted to their condition, but the same laws were intended to embrace them as freemen. I assert, with as much earnestness and with as high regard for the honor of the people of my native State as any one possesses, that the general treatment of slaves in Kentucky was humane and kind, and that the people generally recognize the fact that slavery has ceased; but that many outrages have been committed upon persons in every part of the State in violation of the law; and, after the most careful inquiries I have been enabled to make of a single instance in which the civil authorities have punished the aggressors."

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

The Queen of England's address to Parliament was delivered on February 6. We quote those paragraphs which have most interest on this side the water:

"My relations with foreign Powers are friendly and satisfactory, and I see no reason to fear any disturbance of the general peace."

"The meeting of the States of Friesland and England in the parts of the respective countries has tended to increase the unity of the two nations, and to prove to them their friendly concert in the promotion of peace."

"I have observed with satisfaction that the United States, after terminating successfully the severe struggle in which they were so long engaged, are hereby enabled the ravages of civil war. The abolition of slavery is an event calling forth the cordial sympathies and congratulations of this country, which has always been foremost in showing its abhorrence of an institution repugnant to every feeling of justice and humanity."

"I have at the same time the satisfaction to inform you that the enterprise and perseverance of my naval squadrons have reduced the slave-trade on the West Coast of Africa within very narrow limits."

"A correspondence has taken place between my Government and that of the United States with respect to injuries inflicted on American commerce by pirates under the Confederate flag. Copies of this correspondence will be laid before you."

In regard to Friesland she says: "A conspiracy, adverse alike to authority, property, and religion, and disapproved and repudiated alike by all who are interested in their maintenance, without distinction of creed or class, has unhappily appeared in Ireland. The constitutional power of the ordinary tribunals has been carried for its repression, and the authority of the law has been finally and impartially vindicated."

In considering their reply to the Queen's speech some members of the House of Commons thought that Ireland had grievances which ought to be redressed. To these Mr. Gladstone replied, taking exception to the remarks that the evils which afflicted Ireland were the result of legislation, and objected to pledge Parliament to redress evils which were in some degree beyond their power. He also objected to the amendment, on the ground that the Government had in the address desired to denounce Parliament, and said the more clear and unambiguous their language was the better it would be.

ITEMS.

Spain has issued letters of marque against Chile. The Prussian Chamber of Deputies have passed a resolution, by a large majority, protesting against the attempt of the Supreme Court to restrict liberty of speech.

With regard to the Mexican question, the address of the Senate, in reply to the Emperor's speech, says:

"Your Majesty informs us that the memorable expedition to Mexico approaches its termination. This is esteemed to satisfy France that the protection of her commercial interests is assured in a vast and wealthy market now returned to security. As regards the United States, it, from misconception, the presence of the French flag in America appeared to them less oppressive than at a previous and most illustrious period of their history, the firm stance of the commissioners made by your Majesty's Government has demonstrated that bright and menacing language will not decide us to withdraw. France is accustomed to move only at her own time, but she nevertheless wishes to remember the ancient friendship between herself and the United States. What your Majesty asked of the United States is security and observance of international law."

JOHN WILLIAM DRAPER.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

JOHN WILLIAM DRAPER.

DR. DRAPER, whose portrait we give on this page, was born near Liverpool, in 1811. His educational education was much more varied and extensive than is commonly the case. He had every advantage that could be obtained from public and private instruction, and, as was at that time the custom, especially directed his attention to classical and mathematical studies, in both of which he became very proficient.

Selecting the profession of medicine as his vocation, he commenced his studies in the University of London, and subsequently completed them in the University of Pennsylvania, where he graduated in 1836. At that time there were very few persons in the United States who had turned their thoughts to Chemistry, and scarcely any who had had the great advantage he possessed of a thorough drilling in European laboratories. His inaugural Thesis for the degree of Doctor of Medicine, which was altogether experimental, received from the Faculty of the University of Pennsylvania the unusual distinction of being published at their special request.

For some years after graduating Dr. Draper practiced medicine in Virginia. He then became connected with Hampden Sidney College in that State, having received the appointment of Professor of Chemistry and Natural Philosophy. In 1838 he was elected to the Professorship of Chemistry in the University of New York, and has remained connected with that institution ever since.

His original contributions to science are very varied and voluminous. They are mathematical, chemical, physiological, botanical, geological. His medical writings were published for the most part in the "American Journal of Medical Sciences," Hay's Journal, those on non-professional subjects partly in Silliman's Journal, and more extensively in foreign Reviews. If collected together they would make several volumes. They have been translated into French, German, Italian, and extensively republished in England. Indeed so identified is Dr. Draper with the scientific reputation of our city all over Europe, that his experiments and memoirs are constantly referred to as those of "Dr. Draper of New York," as though the name of our city was a part of his name.

Many of these publications contain experimental solutions of difficult problems in Chemistry and Physiology. There is probably no private person in America who has expended more money in a purely scientific direction than Dr. Draper. Whatever discoveries he has made, and they have been very numerous, he has freely given to the world. He has never taken out a patent for any of them, nor sought to make them sources of personal emolument. He took the first photographic portrait of the human face, at a time when the possibility of doing so was universally denied. Had he sought to secure all the advantage from it, he might have made from that alone an enormous fortune. Probably more than ten thousand persons in the United States are obtaining a living from that invention.

Twenty years before general attention was directed to what is termed "Spectrum Analysis" in Europe, he had published some very important monographs in relation to it. They were, however, in advance of the times, and their value is only now beginning to be appreciated. Thus Professor Tyndall, in his "Rede Lecture," last year, before the University of Cambridge, shows that these experiments are at the basis of the modern theory of the Radiation of Heat. Professor Youmans, in a recent review of Dr. DuRoi's "Civil Policy," mentions that one of the most distinguished scientific gentlemen in England said to him, "You Americans have a very remarkable man in Dr. DuRoi; beyond all question your first physicist. He is a most original and consummate experimenter, and I can not but regret that he leaves the field for which he is so eminently fitted." The regret was but natural in a passionate lover as well as an illustrious cultivator of Physical Science.

To the advancement of Physiology Dr. DuRoi has contributed probably as much as any living man. Thoroughly skilled in Anatomy, there is scarcely one of the animal functions which he has not made the subject of experimental investigation. Of his treatise on Physiology, published eight or nine years ago, it may be fairly affirmed that it contained more new discoveries and explanations than any other similar work. It became at once the text-book of many of our medical colleges. It showed that its author belonged to the party of progress in science, as other later works have shown that he does in politics and history.

Dr. DuRoi is a member of the leading scientific and philosophical societies in America and Europe. Honorary degrees of all kinds have been conferred on him by various colleges. For many years he has been President of the Medical Department of the University of New York, and has given much of his time to the administration of the affairs of that institution. His physiological studies and scientific ideas have led him almost necessarily to the cultivation of History. His "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe" and "Thoughts on the Future Civil Policy of America" have had an extraordinary circulation, the former having been translated and reprinted in many different languages. These books have made him more extensively known to the general public than any of his former physical, mathematical, or medical writings.

In these books is recognized at once the same turn of thought that gave such celebrity to his Physiology. He belongs to the party of Progress, the party of the Future. His views are those of the school which insists on the application of exact science to questions of Politics and History. One of the recent English Reviews, comparing his writings with others of that school, says: "In part, perhaps, from his medical education, and in part from the original constitution of his mind, Dr. DuRoi is more predominantly scientific than Mr. Buckle. The latter was essentially a literary man, his scientific knowledge mostly acquired by reading, being simply an accessory. But with Dr. DuRoi it is the basis of his intellectual attainments, the fundamental principle which tends to shape all else into its own likeness." Hence his clear perception of the presence of law, and his unwavering reliance on the regularity and cyclical repetition of historic events—less which generally appear vague and hypothetical, if not absolutely chimerical, to a mind cast in a purely literary mould."

His last work, "Thoughts on the Future Civil Policy of America," has attracted more attention than usually falls to the lot of such books. Originally nothing more than half a dozen fugitive lectures delivered before a miscellaneous audience, and, as its title of "Thoughts" indicates, not intended as a complete or systematic production, the ideas it conveys on matters of public policy have been received as of very serious import. Whatever their intrinsic value may be, it is undeniable that they have made a very profound impression. It is understood that in his "History of the American Civil War," now in preparation, these views will be extended and systematized, and their application in the case of the United States more completely shown.

Dr. DuRoi spends most of his time not devoted to professional pursuits in retirement, at his country seat at Hastings, in Westchester County. He married a Brazilian lady. Of his three sons, one is Professor of Physiology in the Free Academy of this city and in the Medical College; another is Adjunct Professor of Chemistry to his father in the University; he it is who constructed the great reflecting telescope—the largest in America—at the Observatory at Hastings; the third is an engineer of rising eminence.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER IX.

AND so we return at the point from which these pages set forth—the fall of Fort Donelson, and all the boundless astonishment which followed it. We untipped our bark and set sail under the strong wind beginning to blow at that date; and though we have been compelled to reef sail, and lie by for the last few chapters in order to get our ship's company thoroughly acquainted with each other, we will from this moment spread all sail, drive before the ever-increasing blast, and gain such haven in the end as it may please Heaven to grant.

"Exactly as I have all along said it would be, only far worse," Guy Brooks, Esq., is remarking to his pastor in the study of the latter at the very hour Brother Barker is reasoning over the same topic—the fall of Fort Donelson—with placed Mrs. Scree under Colonel Juggins's hospitable though somewhat leaky roof. In fact, every person in the South—outside in the North also—over ten years of age is eagerly engaged at this instant upon this same theme. There in Somerville, the excitement being so intense, it is but natural a warm-hearted, large-souled Kentuckian like Guy Brooks should feel deeply also. And strongly disposed to converse, too. Not in public, however. The time had been when you men spoke his mind more warmly and freely before Bob Withers, Sam Peters, Brother Barker, Colonel Bat Roberts, Colonel Juggins—ay, even before the dread Lamson himself, apt to put it all in savage print ten minutes after; before all Somerville, for that matter, than the lawyer. On the streets, in his own office with his heels upon his table, in good Mrs. Ella's score, and every where else, the Kentuckian was wont to give his opinion upon whatever the topic might be.

Not so in these days. The lawyer has altered into a grave and silent man, with only occasional eruptions, showing that the fires within are only assuaged for being smothered. What he would have said every where before, he now utters only when with such intimate friends as Mr. Ferguson and his pastor.

In every city, village, and neighborhood throughout the South it is touching to see how the Union men cling to each other. The ship having passed completely into the hands of secessionists, these poor disarmed passengers in the cabin below, the hatches battered down upon them, cluster instinctively together for comfort, speculating with each under their breath upon the storm raging around and the breakers ahead. One of the cruellest effects of Secession was the breaking up on every square mile throughout the South of many a friendship between even the oldest and most intimate friends. Worse still, families were broken up, son turned against father, brother against brother, wife against husband. In this latter and worst case, in nine instances out of ten it was the wife who was the Secessionist, while to many a husband nothing was left but either to engage in bitter and unceasing strife at home, or to play as well as he could the patient part of poor Dr. Warner. Yet it would be telling only half the truth here if we did not add that, where friends and relatives did hold to their country alike, the ties between them were immeasurably strengthened thereby; friend loving friend, father loving son, brother esteeming brother, wife valuing husband just so much the more as they thought alike, felt alike here, where thought and feeling had their intertwined roots about the soul's very centre. "Ay, and persons never before acquainted, at enmity even, came now together into capital friendship upon this one and sufficient ground.

"I frankly confess," said Edward Arthur, drawn toward his barly friend as he had never been before, "every thing is altogether unlike what I anticipated."

"Of course," replied the lawyer. "You ministers are only too ignorant of human nature, especially its darker side—which is all over," added the lawyer. "You preach total depravity from the pulpit as an abstract doctrine, yet ignore it in all your dealings with men or expectations from them. Do you remember that day I brought the first phrelog here for you to read? I prophesied then how it would be. As I knew at the time, the whole programme had already been arranged by Lamson and Colonel Bat Roberts, the Colonel at the very time solemnly sworn as a member of the United States Senate to uphold its Constitution—only one instance of a thousand similar perjuries. And yet we were all so horrified at Louis Napoleon! As we all know, there is a Colonel Bat Roberts and a Lamson, in some stage of development, in every town throughout the land. The meeting called and held by them in our Court-house here, not a corporal's guard of the people there; the furious resolutions adopted calling a State Convention; the blazing account thereof in the paper, was but a specimen of like meetings engineered by like men over the State. And this was the spontaneous, indignant, unanimous uprising of the people! You know it all. Before the masses can realize it, no! a Convention is in actual session—a Convention voted for, and delegates thereto elected, by only a miserable minority of the people.

"And who composed that minority?" said the Kentuckian, becoming more and more excited. "First, the politicians themselves—men whose trade and living is politics—men who saw their power and plunder passing forever from their grasp unless they made just that last desperate move. And even they accomplished their end only by superhuman exertion through the press and from the stump. Next come the set in every neighborhood, following their party leaders from the very force of habit. Last, the people, fancying Secession the only remedy against the North. Remedy? Good Heavens!"

"You forget, Mr. Brooks," said Mr. Arthur, "there were really sensible and excellent men—" "Who voted for the Convention, and for delegates to that Convention?" interrupted the lawyer. "Yes; Colonel Juggins, for instance, and all his class; and why? Because Lamson assured them Secession was only a step to Reconstruction—merely a peaceful Secession! He and his no more voted for the dissolution of the Union, and for war if necessary, than did you or I, or Ferguson, Warner, Ellis, and the rest of us who refused to vote about a Convention at all."

"I half thought at the time a terrible mistake was being then made," said his companion. "If Union men throughout the State had all suddenly come into the idea of a Convention when it was first proposed by the Secessionists, had voted for it, had voted true men into it, then—" "We would have seized their one piece of artillery, turned it upon the Disunionists, and with it blown them to the moon!" said the lawyer.

"Ah, it is easy to talk! Or, if the Governor had but placed himself upon the Constitution from the first. But what is the use of talking about that now?" "You know Secession was submitted to the vote of the people afterward," suggested the minister.

"And with great difficulty was that precious Convention induced to do it," said his friend. "And when it was done! By that time hadn't the politicians fanned the fire into a conflagration? You remember how it was commonly declared then that the man who refused to vote Secession was a base submissionist. As to him who voted against it, that man was an Abolitionist, and the sooner hang the better. Freedom! And yet tens of thousands of the best men in the State, scattered apart as they were among the excited, infatuated—"

"Don't let us say fools," interrupted the minister. "We can not keep our tongues too carefully from the violent language of the day." "Did not dare vote," continued Mr. Brooks. "You and I, Ellis, Warner, Ferguson, and the like, did vote against Secession; but I know, and you know, many a man who dared not go to the polls; was sick himself, or had a sick child or wife, or had pressing business somewhere, some cowardly excuse of the sort. Even of those who did go to the polls, how many were prevented by the crowd about the boxes, and couldn't wait, or who disliked going into such excitement, and all that, didn't vote at last. I tell you, Sir," said the excited Kentuckian, "the Signers of the Declaration of Independence left an illustrious name; but I will hand down the fact that I voted against Secession to my posterity as the noblest act of my life; my declaration of independence of falsehood and folly, made when at their highest flow."

"But a majority of the votes cast were for Secession," said the minister, after a pause. "A majority of the votes cast you may well say," replied Guy Brooks. "But you know as well as I whether it was a majority of the voters in the State."

"And then came the marching of troops against the South," said Mr. Arthur, reflectively. "Yes; and no man in the South had, in the flush of the moment, more disposition than I to meet force with force," began the lawyer. "At first it was a feeling sudden and universal. I think you were not altogether un-alarmed in your language, Mr. Arthur, my friend, as you might have been," he continued, with a smile. But there he stopped.

Ah, that terrible test of conviction and principle! Guy Brooks sat in silence, tugging gloomily at the hair behind his right ear with restless fingers, his broad, brown face no longer open, but full of such anxious thought as men know only when bosom and brain are at cross purposes, when feeling and principle are at strife for ascendancy.

He said nothing, but he thought, thought! And multitudes at the South were at the same instant thinking, thinking, thinking—not saying a syllable of their thoughts even to brother or wife.

If his disjointed thoughts could have been written down they would have run somewhat in this manner: "We of the South—Southern! Democratic rights of self-government. But that democratic old Andrew Jackson and his native South Carolina in 1832? Hump! The old General would not have actually fought Carolina? Perhaps. South fighting for its very existence as a nation? Yes; and the United States Government fighting, since need is, for its prior existence. Secession in this case? Then Secession legitimized at the North, East, West, in the South over and over again. Hump! Universal, disintegration, dissolution, death! Wrong to fight against that!"

And on and on—millions at the South on the same track that instant with him—plodded Guy Brooks slowly, painfully through mire and fog. Alas, the systematic effort to drown one's own soul with the clamor of the times! Multitudes of the noblest men of the South were forced to conceal their trains of thought from others, from themselves. Alas, for the laborious process of self-silencing! Miserable dissembling to one's own self as well as to others.

With some it became settled into a hopeless habit, for which "the peculiar times are to blame, Heaven knows, not I; I can not help it!"

With many, very many, the soul came out of the mire at last, to see clearly, to stand firmly, to speak boldly. But that daylight has not arrived as yet to Guy Brooks, sitting there that hour in his pastor's study.

"I am as well satisfied as a man can be on any moral question that Secession is a great wrong, a crime against man, a sin against God." The minister, as he says it, walks to and fro across his study, his hands clasped behind him, his chin drooped upon his bosom. "But then the Battle of Manassas! At the time it seemed to me God's approbation of Secession. Not that I thought for an instant the Almighty approved of Secession," said the minister, hastily correcting himself; "that I never can bring myself to believe. I mean, it began to seem as if the Almighty intended permitting the deed, as he permitted the partition of Poland. So far as we could gather from our papers, the North had pretty much given the South up. But now this sudden, determined, apparently overwhelming advance upon the South—"

The speaker hardly uttered to himself even the rest of his sentence. You who know, could you have found just at that date a Southern-born man at the South who would then have intimated even to himself, much less to his dearest friend, a wish for the success of the Federal arms?

Gay Brooks and Mr. Arthur never were more busy than in keeping themselves from distinct thought upon the matter.

"And do you suppose," said the lawyer, at last, "that the politicians did not know all this time of the immense preparations being made by the Federals on shore and sea at the North? No, Sir. It was no ignorance on their part. From the first they have studiously kept the people at the South in profound ignorance. Look at Bowling Green! Who dreamed the Confederate Army there was so small?"

"It certainly was poor policy," said his companion. "Knaves are always fools in the end," was the lawyer's remark. "It is all of a piece. You remember that summer of the burnings?"

The minister nodded his head to this altogether unnecessary question. If no one else remembered it Edward Arthur certainly did, the memory of his heart assisting therein the memory of his head. That scene, starlight night upon the front porch sparkled in his memory amidst that dark time like a diamond set in jet.

"You may remember," continued his friend, "I had my idea then, as well as Ferguson his, as to those fires, poisonings, conspiracies, book agents, and all. I did not utter my suspicion then to a soul. I could not believe it possible. I do believe it now," he added, with a blow of his huge fist on the pastor's table, sending his heavy Concordance inches in the air.

"Well?" inquired the other. "I confess I am just as much puzzled this hour upon the subject as I ever was." And he paused in the midst of his walk before the lawyer with curiosity in every line of his face.

"Sir, I suspected it then; I know it now," said the lawyer. "The whole excitement in the South then was the result of a regular conspiracy."

"So Lamson said at the time," not so innocent, however, of his friend's meaning as the words would indicate.

"And the unprincipled—yes, it is better to use no epithets; it may become a habit these awful times, and become catharsis—the unprincipled man," continued the lawyer, "was right. Only he was himself one of the conspirators. The whole plot was devised and worked by him and his masters. I tell you, Sir, not more than a dozen or two of the ablest and most desperate of the leaders may have been in the secret; but as I believe in the existence of Satan, so do I believe that the whole excitement that summer was plotted and carried on by them and by their agents to prepare the people at the South for Secession. It was not enough to split the Baltimore Convention, and so bring about the election of Lincoln—that was in the programme. But they knew that even if Lincoln was elected—a Black Republican I mean, whatever his name might be—the South was not ripe for Secession even for that; and that is the way they ripened the South, as by a hot-house process."

"And the John Brown Raid?" asked Mr. Arthur, with a smile. "No, Mr. Brooks, I can not agree with you there. I have long thought that political ability, and political success, too, whether on the part of Louis Napoleon, or of Jeff Davis and his set, consists not so much as people suppose in creating or even in anticipating events. No; it consists rather in instantly and adroitly seizing upon events, even altogether unforeseen events, as they arise, exaggerating them, turning them, working them toward their own end. The destruction of the Union being the end fixed upon, the politicians in Congress, from the stand, by the papers, and in every other way, have strained every nerve to make every event a help toward that."

"And all the time the people, intent only on their daily matter, dreamed of nothing about their country but that it was the greatest and most permanent government on earth!" said Guy Brooks.

And yet a great many people at the South hold with the lawyer upon that incendiary summer up to this hour. Not Mr. Ferguson, of course. As to every thing being worked by the Disunionists to their own deadly end, he believed that as firmly as any man. But for those burnings, the excessive dryness and heat of the season is the full and sufficient explanation.

"Look at the papers if you doubt there being a systematic conspiracy as I say," urged the lawyer. "Do you not see how invariably they are exaggerating into the utmost importance every thing favorable to their Confederacy—invariably, systematically distorting or suppressing every thing in the least degree unfavorable to it? The tremendous clatter they keep up on the bells at every rumor of victory, only a part of the same thing. They desire to establish a manufacturing interest at the South; they have begun it with a vengeance in the manufacturing of lies—out of all material, and out of no material at all."

As we have observed, it was just after the fall of Fort Demolition that the lawyer held this conversation with his pastor. Time was to teach him something of the capacity of human nature to produce, and to believe in, falsehoods beyond what he or any other man could at that day have deemed possible.

"NASHVILLE OCCUPIED BY THE FEDERALS! NOT ONE SOUL THERE SO BASE AS TO WELCOME THEM. INHUMAN ATROCITIES ALREADY COMMITTED THERE! NORTH ALABAMA THREATENED! GRAND ADVANCE UPON VIRGINIA! FLEE! TO DESCEND THE MISSISSIPPI! ATTEMPT SOON TO BE MADE ON NEW ORLEANS! OUR ARMED PEOPLE READY TO MEET THEM BACK. THEIR VERY ADVANCE PERMITTED BY OUR GENERALS AS PART OF A BRILLIANT STRATEGY SOON TO BE SEEN IN ITS FRUITS!" read Mr. Arthur from the headings of the last Somerville Star lying on the table. "It really does seem as if the North was about making a determined effort," he continued, after a pause.

"It does indeed; you may well say so," replied his friend, with tones in singular contrast with the gloomy shake of the head which accompanied them. And it was not only singular, but to the last degree exasperating to Lamson and his set, the way in which the Union people began to swarm out into the streets from their retreats, like bees on the first burst of summer, and the frequency and fullness and unctious with which they spoke of "the late most disastrous news."

Good Secessionists shrank instinctively from all conversation with them; but there was a wonderful degree of sudden visiting among themselves on the part of the Union people. No two of them could meet on the street, or upon the roads around, but they must stop to shake their heads together in sad concert over the "terrible intelligence," and to agree that "matters must be much worse even than our papers represent them, if we only knew." Very sad their brows, very doleful their tones, very depending their hearts, like to the grief of the next heir beside the dying couch of the present owner.

"I lay awake last night thinking, and I am ready to make you a prophecy this morning about this war," said Mr. Arthur, slowly tearing the disastrous news into strips.

"No, Sir, I had rather not," said the lawyer, promptly. "I had enough of prophecy last night to last me a long time. Brother Barker dropped into my room at the hotel last night, and kept me up till midnight. 'I am not speaking with an infidel, but with a believer in the Scripture; and I feel to believe I can convince you from the Bible the Confederacy is of God, and that God is going certainly to establish and bless it,' he said. With that he whips out of his pocket his little black Bible, and goes at me exactly as he used to do about points of doctrine, only with far more zeal."

"I do not remember any Scripture bearing upon Secession," began Mr. Arthur.

"You are behind the times, Sir. You have seen a book, written by a Dr. Baldwin, showing how the United States is clearly alluded to in Scripture. Since Secession Baldwin's idea has been seized upon and arranged to admit Secession and all its glorious results. Oh, I can not remember half the man's nonsense! I listened to it as part of the levity of the times with some curiosity. Alas, and better men than poor Brother Barker originated the idea; he has jumped upon it as his last hobby, and is riding it to death. Even Captain Simmons has caught the infection. Fullest of memories of Sabbath-school and Scripture when drunk, the Captain's religious knowledge until so warmed being as invisible as the writing in lime juice, he now brings, when drunk, an amazing number of scriptures to illustrate the subject in hand."

"Can you not remember at least one of his texts?" said the minister, all the theologian beginning to stir within him. "I am curious to know what even insanity can find to favor the Confederacy in Scripture."

"Well," said the lawyer, his fingers busy behind his right ear, "there is the stone cut out of the mountain without hands which smote the image—in Daniel, I believe. The stone is the United States Government; the stone is the Confederate Government, which is to grow into a great kingdom, and in some way or other fill the whole earth. Ah, yes, the stone being the Scripture emblem of the Confederacy, you have only to turn to the places in which it occurs in Scripture to find plenty of reference to that Government! Whoever fell upon the stone was to be broken; upon whomsoever it was to fall it would grind him to powder—I do not remember where it occurs in the Bible—emblematic of the victorious strength of the Confederate Government. 'The North and Europe sneer at us on account of slavery. Very well,' says Brother Barker, 'the Bible expressly says of the Confederacy, it shall be a stone of stumbling and a rock of offense.' All the rest of the world is infidel, is his notion, because it rejects the Bible doctrine of slavery as a divine right. In other words, the Confederacy is the last, lingering abode on earth of pure religion. 'Perfectly clear that,' says Brother Barker; 'does not Scripture say on this rock or stone I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it? which settles the result of this war upon us by the North,' he said. Yes, he thinks when one you have what he calls a key, like the symbolical meaning of the word stone, you can unlock all prophecy. There is the word seven also; he makes it refer in Scripture to the seven States which first seceded; and he runs that word down through the Bible. Seven women shall lay hold on one man; that means those seven States laid hold upon, to feed and protect them, a Confederate Government over them all, and so on. Then there is a prophecy about the Mount of Olives; mountain in Scripture, he says, means the old United States Government splitting asunder by a line running east and west, referring to Secession. 'Thou breakest the ships of Tarshish with an east wind; Europe lying to the east of us, this is a prophecy of the raising of the blockade by the European states. There was a vast deal more to the same effect, but I have forgotten it. But to do every body justice,' continued the lawyer, 'though people rather like to hear Brother Barker's expositions of prophecy, feel strengthened by them, I have not heard of any one as yet decidedly embracing them. They may be correct; we hope they are correct, is what his hearers say, but that is all.'

'To me such a thing is one of the darkest features of the times,' said the minister, very sadly. 'If ever there was a time when religion and the ministers of religion should hold themselves aloof from the infatuation of the hour it is now; for if there is no restraining influence exerted on the rising tide of worldliness and wickedness by these, what is left under heaven to restrain? I know of no other influence used of God for this purpose.'

'I fear matters are going to be far worse than you or I have ever imagined. And this brings me to the matter I called this morning especially to see you upon,' continued Gay Brooks, rubbing his upper lip with his neural finger.

Ah, that sinking of the heart, which tells more surely in the bosom of impending evil than does the mercury in the barometer of approaching storm! Not yet had Edward Arthur got used to it; though he was to be made a stronger man, and by this very process.

'What do you mean?' he asked.

'I fear we are going to have trouble in our church—great trouble,' said his friend.

'I think not,' said the minister, earnestly, but with more hope in his tones than in his heart. 'You remember I announced from the pulpit, at the outset of Secession, that I intended to confine myself exclusively to the peculiar duties of my calling, and to keep politics utterly out of my sermons and my prayers.'

'It doesn't matter,' replied his friend. 'Do you suppose there is a person in Semerville but knows your views in regard to Secession?'

'I can not help that,' replied the minister.

'I have the deepest and clearest convictions on the subject—how could I but have? I have all my life been accustomed to express myself frankly to my friends in conversation on every topic which came up. Upon this topic, one so continually up, one in which I can not but feel the deepest interest, I have done the same. What else could I do? You would not have me dissemble my honest convictions, I know. I have sometimes wished I had been able from the very first never to have uttered a syllable on the subject one way or another to a human being.'

'You would have possessed supernatural strength to have done so. And even if you had,' continued his friend, 'your very silence would have had the worst possible construction placed upon it. How could you be silent, people would have said, amidst the universal enthusiasm, unless because you could not, would not join in it?'

'But what have I done to imperil the church?' asked the young pastor.

'You do not pray for the Confederacy.'

'Why, Mr. Brooks, you know how often we have discussed that question. "The powers that be are ordained of God," and to the present powers that be I have submitted as to the providence, for the time, of God. The Bible commands us to pray for these powers. So I do every Sabbath from the pulpit in the exact language of the Scripture.'

'You have never prayed for the success of the Confederate Government,' said the lawyer.

'No, Sir,' said Mr. Arthur, 'I never have in private nor in public. What is more, I never will. Mr. Brooks,' continued the minister, deeply agitated, 'I believe in my soul, as before God, that this whole movement is a wrong, a crime, a sin. Men better than I may not believe so, but I do believe so. For my life, after all the thought, reading, and prayer I have given for years to the subject, I can not but believe so, always have believed so, always will. Can I, then, pray for the success of a wrong, a crime, a sin? I believe this whole movement is ruinous in every sense of the word to the whole land. I believe its success would be specially disastrous to my native South. Can I stand up, then, and ask the Almighty to bless, to prosper, to grant success to the movement? No, Sir, I would die first! Scripture distinctly commanded what Timothy and every other minister then was to do, Nero being then on the throne, a usurper, and the vilest of tyrants. The command is left for the guidance of every Christian now. I obey that command literally and fully in my prayer every Sabbath in the pulpit—more than that I can not do.'

'I perfectly agree with you; I heartily and entirely approve your course," said his friend. "The plain truth is, I would not, a good many of us would not, enter the church if you pursued any other course. Yet it will not satisfy the Secessionists in our church. They have been growling at it for some time. As the excitement deepens, and it is deepening every hour, they will not stand it. They—"

"You know I have often offered them my resignation. It is ready at any instant," interrupted the young minister.

"Yes, and your resignation is the closing of the church," said his friend, gloomily.

"I had thought my course met the approval of at least the overwhelming majority of the church," said the minister.

"So it does," said the lawyer; "but times are rapidly coming when even those entirely with you in sentiment will not dare to say so. You see I know men better than you. And I may mistake, but I dread even more than that. You who by habit give yourself to religion, and keep aloof from the excitement of the streets, can not imagine how this excitement is beginning to eat into the very piety even of those who entirely agree with you in political sentiment. Unless I mistake, you will find even they will cease taking any interest in religion; will cease from attending public worship even, such is the paralysis creeping over even the best Christians."

The heart of the pastor had been already too full of forebodings not to acknowledge the truth of all this.

"But what do you advise?" he asked at length, so sick, so deadly sick at heart.

"Simply that you pursue the even tenor of your way," said his friend. "I have told you all this in order to keep you thoroughly aware of the exact state of matters. You should feel no mortification at it as at a matter personal to yourself. You need not I should tell you the sentiment of the church toward you. But we are passing through a terrible revolution—a revolution social and religious as well as civil. Your trial will be that of, I suppose, every pastor in the land. If you were a Secessionist that would not mend matters, for then the Union people would be against you. Let us bear up as we best may; no man in the land but is smitten in some shape by the accused step we have taken off the precipice," said the lawyer, disregarding in his excitement all the rules of rhetoric.

"I am sorry you are so cast down; you are as pale as a sheet."

And long and sad was the conversation which followed between the friends, drawn now nearer together than ever before.

"There is one thing I hardly need say," added the lawyer, as he rose at last to leave. "We are entering on times of great scarcity and pressure. At least do not let your trouble weigh. To my last cent you may depend on me. There is Ferguson, too—but I am ashamed even to suppose you do not know all this without being told. Good-by!"

With the door locked, the curtains down, all the raging madness shut out, Edward Arthur sank upon his knees before One nearer to him and more to him than all the universe beside. Amidst the wreck of all else, this seemed all that was left him. It was not only his church, his old friends, Alice too—Alice? But he never dreamed of regretting his opinions. They had been as much a matter of course to him as his breathing. Long he knelt there in earnest, fervent prayer. He had had troubles before, but here was the wreck to him of all things at once. Alice, he was only entering upon the trial! It was to him but as Gethsemane; the awful remainder of Agony was yet before him.

"I fear you are unwell, Mr. Arthur," said Mrs. Bowles to him that night at supper. "We wondered you did not come to dinner." But Mrs. Bowles was not in her manner and tones the Mrs. Bowles of other days. And Alice, too!

"But I can not help it!" groaned Edward Arthur.

THE DEAR PRESIDENT.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN, the Dear President, Lay in the Round Hall at the Capitol, And there the people came to look their last.

There came the widow weeping for her mate; There came the mother sorrowing for her son; There came the orphan moaning for its sire.

There came the soldier bearing home his wound; There came the slave who felt his broken chain; There came the mourners of a blacken'd land.

Through the dark April day, a ceaseless throng, They pass'd the coffin, saw the sleeping face, And, blessing it, in silence moved away.

And one, a poet, spake within his breast: "It harm'd him not to praise him when alive, And ne'er it can not harm to praise him dead."

"Too oft the muse has blush'd to speak of men— She need not blush to speak her best of him, And still to speak her best of him is dumb."

"O lefty wisdom's low simplicity! O awful tenderness of votal power! No man e'er held so much of power so weak."

"He was the husband of the husbandless; He was the father of the fatherless; Within his heart he weigh'd the common weal."

"His voice was like a father's to his sons; As to a father's voice they, hearing, came— Eager to offer, strive and bear and die."

"The mild bond-breaker, servant of his Lord, He took the sword, but in the name of Peace, And touch'd the fetter and the bond was free."

"He shall not stand among the historic kings, Strong barbarous chiefs and bloody conquerors, But with the pure and great Republicans."

"Those who have been unselfish, wise, and good, Bringers of Light and Pines in the dark, Bearers of crosses, Servants of the World."

"And always in his Land of birth and death Be his fond name—warm'd in the people's hearts— Abraham Lincoln, the Dear President."

BALANCE OF EVILS.—"It is a painful thing," said JESSA, who had been despondent, "to have prospected friends, and to find them out." "Yes," said BROWN, "but that can happen seldom. The plague of life is that you are always liable to find them at home."

A NEW CRY.

In England the question is, "Where are the Poller?" In Ireland it is, "Where's Stephen?"

A physician of Magdeburg, who has just died prematurely at the age of 106, has left in an record in his will that his longevity was due to his having always slept with his head to the north and his feet to the south, so that the magnetic current passed through him and increased his vitality.

Why is a church stinging look like a school-house?—Because it is full of little boys.

A FEW CORRELATIVE THOUGHTS.

The best sort of woman is one who can turn her hand to any thing, trim a boat and a house too. There is a bankruptcy even in the natural world. The day breaks and the light falls.

How odd, yet how appropriate it would be, to go to a tavern to get a glass of beer. Some people like to argue in a witness stand; we prefer to talk in a witness square. If you jump at conclusions, you may take a leap in the dark.

It is quite possible to have a brown study in a green room. What corresponds to an Ambassador?—A cunning priest.

"John, has that party fellow cleared off the snow from the pavement?" "Yes, Sir." "Did he clear it off with slattery, Japs?" "No, Sir, with a shovel."

We have been asked the question, What material makes the best bed-spreader? Being inexperienced in such matters we refer the querist to the Committee of the Hudson County Fair, who put it this way: "Best bed-spreader—Miss Jane Van Hook's."

THE HARVEST IN IRELAND.—Two or three hundred young aristocrats have already been cut in Wicklow, on a plantation of Earl Fitzwilliam's at Stillingsh. Brick bats, it is in consequence to be looked for at the markets, and there will be a fine show of heads at Donnybrook. A riotous display may be expected there, followed in most cases by a fall.

What comes after cheese?—Moose. Stupid people may eat, but shouldn't talk. Their mouths would do well as hooks of Deppit, but not noise of brass.

Why is a swarthy man like a candle?—Because he sometimes goes out at night when he ought not to.

A good story is told of a country gentleman who, for the first time, heard an Episcopal clergyman preach. He had read much of the sermons of the church, and when he returned home he was asked if the people were "gave it up." "Gave it up," replied he; "why, the saintly preacher in his discourses!"

In a town in which they were building a railroad was employed a party of Irishmen, one of whom went to a neighboring town, kept by a Yankee, and asked for a "yard of pork." THE EMPEROR OF BRAZIL VISITING THE UNITED STATES IRON-CLAD "MONADNOCK" IN THE HARBOR OF RIO.

VISIT OF DON PEDRO TO THE "MONADNOCK."

A LETTER from Rio Janeiro of January 9 thus describes a visit made to the United States iron-clad steamer Monadnock by Don Pedro, the Brazilian Emperor:

"On the arrival of the imperial party the vessels of war and the forts heeled forth a salute. It is unnecessary to state that in this the American war-vessels had the lion's share. His Majesty was accompanied by his son-in-law, the Comte d'Eu, and his officers of state and of his household. He was received by Commodore Henshaw and Lieutenant-Commander Bowen, commanding the Monadnock.

"The Emperor passed around the vessel on deck, followed by his suite and courtiers. After this his Majesty inspected the interior of the two turrets, and listened with much attention to the explanation given him in regard to the turret and the system of pointing the guns.

"After exploring the mysteries of the engine-room and lower decks the imperial party partook of refreshments in the cabin of Captain Ripley, when sentiments of respect between the two nations were interchanged. His Majesty and attendants left under a shower of artillery, after a pleasant visit of about two hours. His Majesty expressed himself highly satisfied with his visit."

FIRE IN THE OIL REGIONS.

We give on this page an illustration of the recent conflagration which occurred on Bennedof Run, Venango County, Pennsylvania, February 2.

The fire originated from a spark from the smoke-stack of the Getty Well.

The scene of the conflagration was in the very heart of the oil regions, being a short distance north of the Hyde and Egbert Farm, on which is situated the Maple Shade Wells and the Copette and Jersey Wells, which were at one time in great danger from the burning oil running down Oil Creek.

The progress of the fire was stayed at Well No. 23, partly because this well was not yet in operation, and partly from the persistency with which an Irish laborer, at the risk of his own life, poured water down the sides of the tank. At least half of the wells farther up the creek were saved. It is supposed that the carpenters engaged about the Getty Well had been working, and thus originated the fire. So soon as the tanks burst the liquid flames rolled down the valley of the Run, licking up the water and every thing in its career. In half an hour from the first outbreak a stream of fire nearly half a mile in length extended down the stream, wrapping in flames no less than nine of the best wells on the Run, and several engine-houses and derricks were thus consumed. The bridges both on the railroad track and highway were generally burned. Burning pools of oil, from dory to their tops, mouldering masses of ruined machinery, twisted tank-tops and blackened stumps, offices and hill-sides tell the sad tale. Some of the wells destroyed produced from 200 to 250 barrels per day.

THE GREAT FIRE ON BENNEHOF RUN, VENANGO COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA, JANUARY 31, 1866.—[SKETCHED BY W. W. GOODWIN.]

CHRISSEY HUNTER.

It was a well-known and accredited fact that, in connection with those old English festivities known as "Yeomanry Weeks," more marriages were made up in this brief interval than during any other period of the year. Match-making individuals seriously counted on the Yeomanry Weeks; and probably far-seeing young ladies had fitting matches in their eye, as well as the fire-works and the introductory gawdy, when they came in troops to Priorton to entertain the lucky yeomen.

"My dear," said Mrs. Spottiswoode, the wife of the chief magistrate, who was likewise banker of Priorton, to her spouse, "your cousin Bourhope has asked his sister with us: I must have my sister Corrie in to meet him."

Mrs. Spottiswoode was a shrew, smart, good-humored woman, but not over-scrupulous. She was very ready at adapting herself to circumstances even when the circumstances were against her. For that reason she was considered very clever as well as very affable among the matrons of Priorton. Mr. Spottiswoode was "slow and sure;" and it was because of the happy alliance of these qualities in him that the people of Priorton had elected him chief magistrate.

"My dear," deliberately observed long, lanky Mr. Spottiswoode, "would it not be rather late-faded to have Bourhope and Corrie here together?"

"Oh, I'll take care of that," answered the lady, with a laugh and a toss of her ribbons. "I shall have some other girl of my acquaintance to bear Corrie company—some worthy, out-of-the-way girl, to whom the visit will be like entering another world," continued Mrs. Spottiswoode, with a twinkle of her black eyes. "What do you think of Corrie and my cousin Chrissy Hunter of Blackfauld? The Hunters have had such a deal of distress, and so much fighting with embarrassment—though I believe they are getting clearer now—that the poor lassie has had no amusement but her looks, and has seen absolutely nothing."

Mr. Spottiswoode had no inclination to contradict his wife for contradiction's sake, and as he could rely on her presence as an her other good qualities, he said: "Well, Agnes, I have no objection; Hunter of Blackfauld is an honest man though he is poor, and he is righting himself now."

The invitations were dispatched, and accepted graciously. The guests arrived before Bourhope occupied his quarters; ostensibly they came so soon in order to prepare for him. Corrie had nothing to say about her cousin, her name, Corolla. She was tall, well made, fair-faced, serene beauty, the only remaining maiden daughter of a Scotchman who had returned from the Indies with a fortune, as so many returned then. Chrissy, again, was one of a large, straggling family—a small girl, a very little crooked in figure, and with irregular features and a brown complexion. If she had not possessed a bright, intelligent expression she would certainly have been plain—as indeed she was to those who did not heed expression. It was a delightful chance to her, this brief transplanting into the boom-bing, cheerful town-house, amid the glowing gaiety of the Yeomanry Weeks. Accordingly she was constantly engaged in checking off every little detail on the finger-points of her active mind, in order that she might be able to describe them to her secluded sisters and her sick mother at home. She was determined not to miss one item of interest; never to sleep in so as to lose the moment; never to stray in her walks and fall to be in the house for the return from the afternoon drill. She would pace the meadows among the gay promenaders even when the evening was cloudy, and would not care though she walked alone; she would enjoy the play when Mrs. Spottiswoode chose to take her, and not even object to a squeeze in the box. The squeeze was really part of the fun! But she did not care to have her attention distracted from the stage, even by the proffer of fruit from the yeomen. As to the ball, she did not allow herself to think much of that. Who would ever have dreamed of Chrissy figuring at a fine yeomanry ball? She would not trouble herself because she had only an old wadded white frock of her mother's, when up by ticks to suit her, and yellowed by frequent washing and long keeping; she would not fret because she could not spend money upon a hair-dresser. She must dress her own hair—which was rusty, like every other outward adornment of hers. This was little matter, she reflected, for it would cost dress under the most skillful artist into those gorgeous bows on the crowns of the head which every body then wore; it would only go into comb-lets like little hair-turkeys on each side of her round, full forehead, which was by no means scanty. She had no ornaments in the way of jewelry, save a coral necklace; while Corrie had a set of amethysts—real amethysts—ear-rings, brooch, and necklace, and a gold cross, and a gold watch which she rarely wound up, and which was therefore, as Chrissy said, "a death-like affair." But Corrie was a beauty and an heiress, and ornaments became her person and position; while on Chrissy, as she herself admitted with great good sense, they would only have been thrown away.

Bourhope came with his fellows, and was specially introduced to Corrie and Chrissy. He had had some general acquaintance with both of them before. He gallantly expressed his pleasure at the prospect of having their society during his stay at Priorton. He was a farmer, whose father had made money at war prices. He had bought his own farm, and thus constituted his son a small laird. He had an independent bearing, as well as an independent portion of the world's goods; he was really a manly fellow, in his brown, ruddy, curly, strapping comeliness. But, better still, was an intelligent fellow, who read other things than the newspapers, and relished them. He was a little conceited, no doubt, in consequence of comparing himself with others, but he had a good heart. Corrie and Chrissy both regarded him with scarcely concealed interest and admiration. Chrissy wished that the lairds at home would grow up to be as comely and manly; Corrie made up her mind to have just such a husband as this Spottiswoode of Bourhope.

It was evident the very first night that Bourhope was taken with Corrie. He stared and stared at her, admiring her waven complexion, the bend of her white throat, and the slope of her white shoulders; and even changed his seat at one time, as it seemed, in order to see her better. He quickly claimed her as his partner at loo, and engaged her to walk out with him to hear the band practicing next evening. Chrissy thought it all very natural, and all the more enjoyable. But she caught herself fancying Bourhope and Corrie married, and rebuked herself for carrying her speculations so far. Only she could not help thinking how Bourhope would weary after the marriage—say when there was a snow-storm, or a three-days' fall of rain at the farm-house. But that was Bourhope's affair; if he was pleased, what business was it of hers? Bourhope had this in common with Chrissy—he could entertain himself.

During the first three days of the week Bourhope was zealous in attaching himself to Corrie. But a sharp observer might have remarked that after this he flagged a little, taking more as matter of course and politeness the association he had established between her and him at tea, loo, and the evening promenades. He would even stifle a yawn while in Corrie's company, though he was a meddlesome and not a listless fellow. But that was only like most, to prize less what they had coveted when it was half won.

At this juncture it struck Bourhope, riding home from the morning drill, to ask himself what could possibly take Chrissy Hunter out so early every morning. He had already seen her once or twice looping out of the way of him and his companions, and returning again from the opposite end of Priorton, which was forked by the doctor's house. Corrie, he noticed, was never with her. Indeed, Bourhope had a strong suspicion that Corrie retreated to her pillow again after showing him her lovely face—lovely even in the pink curl-papers. But Chrissy certainly dressed immediately and took a morning walk, by which her complexion, at least, did not profit. Not being a very strong little woman, her brown face was apt to look jaded and streaky when Bourhope, resting from the fatigues of his drill, bugged with the girl in the early forenoon in Mrs. Spottiswoode's drawing-room. So it was worth while, he thought, to spur up to Chrissy and inquire what took her abroad at such an untimely hour.

When Bourhope caught a nearer glimpse of Chrissy he was rather dismayed to see that she had been crying. Bourhope hated to see girls crying, particularly girls like Chrissy, to whom it was not becoming. He had no particular fancy for Cinderellas or other beazar maids. He would have hated to find that his kindfolk and friendly host and hostess, for whom he had a considerable regard, were mean enough and base enough to maltreat a poor little maid of their own location. Notwithstanding these demurs Tom Spottiswoode of Bourhope rode so fast up to Chrissy as to cause her to give a violent start when she turned.

"Hallo! Do you go to market, Miss Chrissy, or what on earth takes you out in the town before the shutters are down?" pointing with his sheathed sword to a closed shop.

Chrissy was taken aback, and there was something slightly hysterical in her laugh, but she answered frankly enough, "I go to Dr. Stark's, Mr. Spottiswoode. Dr. Stark attends my mother, and is at Blackfauld every day. I wait in his laboratory till he comes there before setting out; he goes his rounds early, you know. He lets me know how mother was yesterday, and as he is a kind man he carries our letters—Maggie and Arabella and I are great writers, and postage comes to be expensive—a great deal too expensive for us at Blackfauld; but the doctor is a kind man and he 'forwards' our letters. And Mr. Spottiswoode," she said, warning with her subject, and impelled to a bit of confidence, "do you know, Dr. Stark thinks my mother will be about again in a few months. You're aware her knee-joint has been affected. We were even afraid she would never put down her foot again. It would have been a dreadful trial to all of us." Chrissy spoke simply, in a rather moved voice.

Bourhope was slightly moved, too. He had never heard much about Mrs. Hunter of Blackfauld, except that she was a woman who had been long ailing; and also occasional remarks about the consequences of her being lost or spared to her family.

Chrissy was grateful for his evident sympathy, and gratified by it; but, as if half ashamed of having elicited it, she at once began to pebble to him on other subjects. Bourhope had leaped from his horse, and was doing her the honor of walking at her side, his hand's handle over his arm, and his spurs ringing on the pavement. A sparkling prattle that was of Chrissy's, about the fine morning, the town, and the yeomanry—few topics, but well handled and brilliantly illustrated. Bourhope dared to confess to himself how sorry he was when he reached Mr. Spottiswoode's door.

Next morning Bourhope detached himself from his comrades when he approached the town, and looked narrowly for Chrissy. It would be but civil to inquire for poor Mrs. Hunter. So bent was he on being this civil that though Chrissy was far in advance he knew her by the pink gingham trimming of her morning bonnet, fluttering like rose-leaves in the morning sun. He came up to her, and politely asked after her mother. Chrissy was a little confused, but she answered pleasantly enough. She was not nearly so talkative, however, as on the preceding morning, though Bourhope made witty comments on the letter she held in her hand, and pertinaciously insisted on her telling him whether she mentioned him in her return letters! He reminded her that they were cousins in a way. This was the first time Chrissy had known of any one hunting up a relationship with her, and though pleased in her humility—Chrissy was no fool in that humility of hers—Bourhope she knew was destined for her cousin Corrie. He was out of Corrie's way just now, and was only courteous and cordial to her as living for a time under the same roof. She liked the ruddy, curly, independent, clever fellow of a farmer laird who, out of the riches of his kindness, could be courteous and cordial to a poor, plain girl. But Bourhope could never overtake Chrissy coming from Dr. Stark's again. He spied and peeped and threw out hints, and hurried or loitered on the way to no purpose. Chrissy took care that people should not notice the fact of her being escorted home in the early morning by Bourhope.

A chance conversation between Mrs. Spottiswoode and Corrie was overheard one day by Bourhope, when they imagined him deep in Blackwood. Mr. Hunter of Redraigs, Corrie's father, had not been well, and a message had been sent to that effect to her. But she was philosophic and not unduly alarmed. "Papa makes such a work about himself," she said, candidly, to Mrs. Spottiswoode. "Very likely he has only taken lobster to supper, or his Jamaica rum has not agreed with him, and he is bilious this morning. I think I will send out a box of colocyth, and a bit of nice tender veal, to put him in good-humor again. You know, Agnes, if I were to drive out I could not get back in time for the evening walk in the meadows. Besides, I was to see Miss Aldin about the change in the running on of my frills. It would overturn all my plans to go; and my head gets so hot, and I look so bloomy when my plans are disarranged," Corrie concluded, almost piteously.

"Yes; but, Corrie," hesitated Mrs. Spottiswoode, "you know Dr. Stark is not easy about papa just now. I think I had better go out myself. It is unlucky that Spottiswoode is to have several yeomen, who do business at the bank, at dinner to-day with Bourhope; but I dare say Mary will manage that, as Chrissy will mix the pudding for her. So I will go myself to Redraigs; all things considered, it would be a pity for you not to be in your best looks."

Bourhope, at this point, fell into a fit of coughing, and lost the rest of the dialogue; but perhaps his occasional scowl of disapprobation was called forth as much by this interlude as by the audacious judgments of the Shepherd and Ticker.

The day suddenly turned out very rainy, and the drill was gone through in a dense white mist which caused every horse to loom large as an elephant, and every rider to look a Gig or Magog. The young ladies, so fond of a change of costume at this time in Priorton, could do no shopping; the walk in the meadows at sunset with the laughing yeomen had to be given up. The green meadows were not bright, the grass was dripping, the flowers closed and heavy, and the river red and drizzly. All was disappointing, for the meadows were beautiful at this season with their summer snow of daisies—not dead-white snow either, for it was broken by patches of yellow butter-cups, crocuses, lady's fingers, and vetch, and by the crimson clover flowers, and the rusty red of sorrel, and the black post heads of the nitwort plantain, whose black upon the white of ox-eye daisies has the rich tints of crimine.

Instead of walks there were gatherings round shivering tables; and bottles and glasses clinked cheerily in many a parlor. But Mr. Spottiswoode was sober by inclination. The impressiveness of office, which had quite the contrary effect on many persons of his era, only added to his characteristic caution. The yeomen, too, knew well where hilarity ended and excess began. So there was little fear of excess in Mr. Spottiswoode's house. Mrs. Spottiswoode, a prima in her own line, had a cheerful fire in her drawing-room, and sat by the hearth, with her children tumbling round her; while Corrie, fairer than ever in the blinking fire-light, and Chrissy, brown and merry, sat on either side of her. She invited the farmer laird to enter that charmed ring, which of course he could not help contracting with the loneliness and comfortlessness of Bourhope. But though he sat next Corrie, a certain coldness crept over the well-arranged party. He caught himself glancing curiously at the book Chrissy Hunter had been almost burning her face reading by the fire-light before he came in. Mrs. Spottiswoode did not much care for reading aloud, but she took the hint in good part, and called on Chrissy to tell what her book was about, and so direct Bourhope, without wholly monopolizing his attention.

Chrissy was rather shy at first. She never told stories freely away from home; but she was now pressed to do it. After a little, however, she put her own sympathetic humor and pathos into the wondrous narrative, till she literally held her listeners spell-bound. And no wonder. Those were the days of Scott's early novels, when they were greatly run after, and the price of a night's reading was high. Chrissy's cousin "Rob" was a bookseller's apprentice, and his master, for the purpose of enabling Robbie to share his enthusiasm, would lend the apprentice an uncut copy. Robbie brought it out to Blackfauld, and then all would sit up, sick mother among the rest, to hear it read aloud, till far into the small hours.

Who can tell what that cordial of pure healthful intellectual diversion may have been even to the burdened father and sick mother of Blackfauld, and to Chrissy! The very speaking of it made her deep her hands over her knees, and her gray eyes to shine out like stars—as Bourhope thought to himself.

The assembly paid Chrissy the highest compliment an assembly can pay a speaker. They forgot their schemes, their anxieties, themselves even, to fasten their eyes and hearts on the brown girl—the book dropping from her hand, but the story written so graphically on her memory. Corrie was the first to recover herself. "Oh dear!" she cried, "I forgot I was to take down my hair for Miss Lothian to point it at eight o'clock!"—and hurried out of the room.

Mrs. Spottiswoode roused herself next, and spoke a few words of acknowledgment to Chrissy. "Upon my word, Chrissy, your recital has been quite as good as the play. We are much obliged to you. I am afraid your throat must be sore; but stay, I have some of the theatre oranges here. No, haime, you are not to have any; it is far too late for you to be up. Dear me; I believe you have been listening to Chrissy's story like the rest of us!" But Mrs. Spottiswoode was not under any apprehension about the success of Chrissy's reading. She proved this by immediately leaving Chrissy sitting with Bourhope while she went to put the children to bed, and see if Mr. Spottiswoode, who was doing a quiet turn of business in his office, would have a game of cards before supper. She had really never heard of a girl being married simply for her tongue's sake! Perhaps she knew the line in the song too:

"Very few marry for talking."

and had found its truth in her own experience, for she was a shrewd, observant woman.

Bourhope, it should be understood, was longest subjected to the influence of Chrissy's story-telling power. Indeed, when he did somewhat recover from it, his fancy created fine visions of what it would be to have such a story-teller at the farm-house during the long, dark nights of winter, and the endless days of summer. Bourhope was no ignoramus. He had some acquaintance with "Winter's Tales" and summer pastorals, but his reading was bald and tame to his inspiration. He thought to himself it would really be as good as a company of players purely for his own behoof, without any of the disadvantages. He stammered a little in expressing the debt he owed to Chrissy, and she could only eagerly reply by saying: "Not to me, not to me the praise, Mr. Spottiswoode, but to the Great Unknown. Oh, I would like to know him!"

Bourhope was stimulated to do at once what he was sure to do ultimately—he presented his hospitable entertainers with a box at the play. No doubt this was a great delight to Chrissy, for it was in the days when actors were respectable artists, and play-going was still universal. Chrissy in her freshness enjoyed the provincials as well as if they had been first-rate performers, took the good and left the bad, and sat quite entranced.

Bourhope, although he was decidedly intellectual for his calling, watched Chrissy rather than the stage. He read the feeling of the moment reflected in her sagacious yet sensitive face. Once he turned round and tried the same experiment with Corrie. He might as well have expected to borrow a living soul from well-moulded stucco or marble. He now realized in a more lively manner than ever that grace may look as fair and white, and soft and shapely as swans till they expose their wadding. He tried in church the process he had learned at the play, and it must be confessed, not without effect. Chrissy's expression giving a fair notion of the good Priorton minister's earnestness and eloquence.

But at length Chrissy, aware of the liberty Bourhope took in thus making her his study, yet restless and troubled in her soul and warm heart. She was no fool in her simplicity. She knew that Bourhope did not in any sense belong to Mrs. Spottiswoode and Corrie, and she had shrewdly suspected of late that their anticipated project would not be carried out. She could not help occasionally turning over in her mind the circumstance that Corrie was very plain, but that depressed Matrimor Delville nevertheless bestowed his heart on her, though the girl like her fortune was disagreeable to her for many a long day. Chrissy thought that if Bourhope were independent and original enough to like her—to love her—he was his own master, there was nothing between him and his inclination save her inclination and her father and mother's will. And there was little doubt about their will with respect to a man so worthy, so unexceptionable, and so well endowed as Bourhope.

Nor was there any thing like duty to the Spottiswoodes to stand between Bourhope and Chrissy. But still Chrissy's nice sense of honor was disturbed, for had she not a guess that a very different result had been expected? Nay, she had even a half-criminal notion that she herself had been expressly selected as a companion to Corrie Hunter during the gaieties of the Yeomanry Weeks to prove a sort of harmless foil. A dream of love was a grand shock to Chrissy's quiet life, making wild yet plaintive music, like all nature's true harmonies, within her; and filling her mind with tremulous light which clarified every object, and was fair even to dazzle herself. It was not unnatural that Bourhope should excite such a dream. But Chrissy was not completely dazzled. It was only a dream as yet, and she would be the mistress of her dream; it should not be the mistress of her. So she resolved, showing herself a reasonable, thoughtful, conscientious woman, as well as a loving, fairly-proportioned, and lovely human spirit.

Chrissy retained all her sober senses. She recollected what was due both to the hero and to the others concerned. She was neither a weak victim, nor a headstrong, arrogant, malicious coquette. Like all genuine women, she struggled against yielding herself without her due—without a certainty that there was no irreparable mistake in the matter. She was not a girl to get love-sick at the first bout, nor one to run even at a worthy lover's beckoning, though she would sacrifice much, and do it proudly, joyously, for true affection, when once it had confessed itself. So she shrunk from Bourhope, slipped away from him, and managed to avoid him. He was puzzled and vexed and almost exasperated by doubts as to whether she cared for or wished to accept his notice and regards. Little brown Chrissy taught the bold yeoman a lesson in her own quiet way. She slowly forced upon him the conviction that any gifts or attentions of his—the prosperous, cultivated farmer-laird—were as dross compared with the genius and acquirements of Chrissy Hunter, whom many short-sighted men called insignificant and plain amidst the poverty and cares of Blackfauld. Bourhope was not radically mercenary; he had no certainty that his superiority in worldly estate would secure the strange good upon which he set his heart, and he was at once stimulated and incensed by her indifference to his advances. So he had no communications with Chrissy, apart from a demure interchange of words in general conversation, for three days before the grand review and the FREDRIKA BREMER.

In presenting our readers with the accompanying portrait of FREDRIKA BREMER a few words may not be unacceptable regarding the career of this remarkable woman, whose earthly life closed at Arta, the former residence of her family, on the 23d of December last. To the people of this country the career of Miss Bremer is especially interesting from the fact that she has lived among us, and is so well remembered here by thousands of loving friends.

It is now about a quarter of a century since the spirited publisher Brockhaus, of Leipzig, introduced to his countrymen and women a series of stories so truthful in their descriptions of simple, often homely life—their living portraiture of fathers, mothers, children, and servants, all the individuals of the home circle, in all their varieties—their tenderesses, their quiverings, their joys and their sorrows, their hopes and their fears—as to seize at once on the public heart. Nobody criticized them, nobody questioned whether they were good or bad; all they did was to read them, to laugh or to cry over them, and to feel astonished how pictures so simple could exercise such a fascination over them. These were the famous "Sketches of Everyday Life," by FREDRIKA BREMER, first and foremost of which stands her inimitable "Neighbors," with its charming Francisca, the excellent Bear, and the powerfully-drawn Ma chère Mère. Now that the once so greatly admired authoress has passed from earthly existence, we shall not attempt a criticism of her works, but remember how much we have loved her, how much we owe her, and how much has been accomplished by a woman of slight physical frame and in any thing but robust health through the greater part of her life, and for how much lasting good her name will be honored in her native land for generations yet to come. Twice she received the highest honor which the

THE LATE FREDRIKA BREMER.

Swedish Academy could offer—that of its gold medal. Besides the so well known "Sketches of Everyday Life," Miss Bremer wrote "The Diary," "Brothers and Sisters," and "The Midnight Sun," none of which, however, attained to the celebrity of their predecessors.

No doubt Miss Bremer felt this herself when she changed the pleasant fields of fiction for the more laborious ones of foreign travel. Her travels, to which five years were devoted—two in America and three in Europe and the Holy Land—fill about ten volumes, which contain much close study and deep reflection, and are remarkable for their vivid pictures of life and scenery.

It is not always that the author whose works have delighted and even edified the world lives up to the nobility and truth of his own teaching. This, however, was the case with this excellent woman, whose private life was as remarkable for its deeds of love and mercy as her literary life was for its industry. Those who knew her best loved her most. She enjoyed the society of the young, and surrounded herself by them, generally having one or more young ladies residing with her. One of these assures us that in the twelve months she was in daily intercourse with her she never saw her out of temper, never saw her otherwise than actively kind and assiduous in every way to add to the comfort and pleasure of those who surrounded her. She was received in the highest society of Stockholm, from the Royal circle downward. She was highly accomplished, and spoke several European languages fluently.

Miss Bremer was the means of establishing the Seminarium in Stockholm, an institution kindred to our Ladies' Colleges. She was at the head of every philanthropic work in Stockholm, and many a noble institution both there and in Copenhagen, as, for instance, the Asylum for Destitute Children, owes its existence entirely to her.

TWICE FIVE AND TWICE TEN.

Two children talking together
With the wisdom of twice five years,
And the simple inductive fancy,
That sees beyond what appears.
Said Charlie to little Bessie,
Abruptly ceasing to play,
'I saw Bertie's horse in the stable;
He comes nearly every day.'
'Don't you know he comes to see Annie?
Ah! ah! I was right in my guess,
I always know when he's coming--
Annie has on that pretty pink dress.
'She always makes a difference,
Be it only a ribbon or rose,
Whenever he comes, she wishes
To look her best, I suppose.'
'And do you think she's in earnest?'
'Oh! Charlie, how cruel to doubt--
Why they walk hand in hand together
When the stars are shining out.'
'Well that certainly ought to mean something,
But, somehow or other, I fear
He is not the first or the second;
There may be another next year.
'To-day a new dress or new ribbon,
To-morrow, perhaps, a new rose,
Next year, let us say, a new lover--
Or it may be a dozen, who knows?'
'Now, Charlie, don't be sarcastic;
Would you have her dress always the same?
What has dress to do with affection?
It may be she was not to blame.'
'Ah! Bessie, we birds grow cautious
When we see one or two in the net--
The bait may be very attractive,
And the snare very cunningly set.
'But those two or three victims before us,
They seem to whisper, beware!
The woodland berry is safer,
And, perchance, more wholesome fare.
'Give me the girl that has never Lov'd any one else but me,
That changes not with the season,
Nor runs after novelty!'
'Ah! Charlie, it must be so trag' us
For love once settled to range;
Whatever the season or fashion,
The heart surely never should change.
Take care, Master Charles and Miss Bessie,
There are some things beyond your ken,
The pledges of twice five summers
Are not always redeemed by twice ten.

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY.

No anniversary of Washington's Birthday has had so much significance as the last, which was celebrated in this city with unusual enthusiasm. Among the events of the day worthy of notice were the Military Parade and the presentation by the Union League Club to General Grant of a Portrait of General Scott. In the evening there was a display of fireworks in different parts of the city. Of the display in the Park in front of the City Hall we give an illustration on our first page. It was witnessed by about fifty thousand persons. The pieces, as designated by the pyrotechnists, are as follows: The Indian Palmetto, Golden Circle and Grecian Battery, Persian Rose, Cross of Peru, Yew-tree, Tribute to Ceres, Zania Peruvia, Saturn and his Satellites, Star of America, Star of Independence, Golden Waterfall, Yankee Wind-mill, Passion-Flower, Fairies' Frolic, and, lastly, a Grand Temple of Liberty, covering the entire front of the City Hall, and representing GEORGE WASHINGTON, flanked by Justice and Liberty. Over the heads of the three figures were three golden eagles; and underneath the whole were the words, "WASHINGTON, THE FATHER OF OUR COUNTRY." The pyrotechnic display was concluded without accident at about half past eight in the evening, when the great multitude dispersed.

THE QUEEN OF ENGLAND OPENING HER PARLIAMENT.

For the first time in five years, QUEEN VICTORIA met her Parliament in person on February 6. It was the opening of the Seventh Parliament of her reign. The last occasion of her personal presence in the House of Lords was to inaugurate the Session of a Parliament (the Sixth) which had been thrice honored in a similar manner. On that occasion the Prince Consort stood by her side. The following is an abridged description of the opening of the Seventh Parliament as taken from an English paper:
'Meanwhile an interesting scene had been for some time visible within the House of Lords. At noon a long line of carriages extended from Pall Mall to the port entrance of the Palace of Westminster, most, if not all, of which were occupied by ladies in full evening costume--the wives, daughters, and sisters of peers, and of members of the Government, and some few who were, perhaps, not so nearly connected with the Upper Chamber, but who had influence enough to procure the seats from the coveted distributor of such favors. One of the most notable of the arrivals was a lady who came into the House escorted by the Earl of Lovell, and who was recognized as Lady Anne Beaumont, Nov. Mrs. Nox, the grand-daughter of George Gordon, Lord Byron.
'The Prince and Princess of Wales, the Prince in the full uniform of a general officer, and the Princess tastefully attired in a dress of white tulle, trimmed with black lace, wearing a tiara of diamonds and a long flowing veil of white gauze, covered side by side. The Princess was seated to the place of honor on the west side, immediately in front of the throne. The Prince of Wales took his seat beside the Duke of Cambridge, with whom he was speedily engaged in conversation. At twelve minutes past two the door on the right of the House was thrown open, and we had just a glimpse of the green-carpeted vestibule, with two gigantic Guardsmen standing by. Then the procession slowly entered. Preceded by the Gentleman-at-Arms, the chief officers of the household, and the bearers of the state sword and crown, her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Helena and Louise, Prince Arctur, and Prince Casimir of Schleswig-Holstein, walked round to the front of the throne. Ascending the dais, she was followed by the Princess, who, as soon as her Majesty had seated herself, partially drew round her the robes of state which had been hanging loosely on the throne. Her Majesty wore a velvet dress of so deep a purple that it almost seemed black, bordered with ermine, a mantle of the like material, a white lace veil falling from her widow's cap, and a heavy diamond necklace. The two Princesses, dressed in white, stood with Prince Casimir on the left of the throne, while on her Majesty's right were two ladies in waiting, dressed in black, the Princess of Wales, the Lord Chamberlain, etc.

'During the interval that elapsed between the entrance of the Commons and the reply, the Queen sat silent and motionless, with her eyes fixed upon the ground.
The Speech from the throne was then read by the Lord Chancellor.

"CAUGHT NAPPING."

THE picture engraved on page 152 is by a promising young English artist, Mr. A. H. BIRN. We must leave the reader to speculate how the little arch and deceiver of learning came to commit the outrage on all academic propriety for which he is about to be visited with condign punishment. Perhaps the dominion has been absent a short time and returned unexpectedly; perhaps the little culprit has fancied himself out of observation, beneath the desk of the despot immediately behind him. Possibly the Jews of this petty realm and half-bred wielder of the leatherh Nemeses has himself been nodding; if so, his anger would, of course, be heightened tenfold by the presumption of this little creature in following the example of irresponsible power. As the child is father of the man, so is the school an ante-room to the world. Here we find one bending manfully to his task, there another makes faces at it, either in disgust or for his own and others' amusement; and, yonder, a third neglects it altogether. While what more characteristic of adult nature than that we should make merry over our neighbor's misfortunes? Even some of the softer sex, it seems by this picture, are capable of sharing the tempting pleasure. Here and there, however, it also appears, there are little womanly hearts attuned to thrill with pity and compassion at misfortune and pain; and now and then beauty may be seen irradiated with the heavenly light of unselfish love.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

FIGURES 1 and 2 furnish two distinct representations of a costume known as "the Sappho," which has met with much favor in the grand mode, and promises to become very fashionable generally. It is made of black velvet, trimmed with a possession of black silk and jet ornaments, which terminates in a broad fringe, with a couple of tassels at the extremity. In the parts which are turned over by the collar and the cuffs is a fine and narrow galopure. The waistcoat is terminated with a galopure of similar pattern but of greater depth.
The bonnet adapted to this costume is extremely simple. It is composed of black velvet, with a black ostrich feather, and having a kind of diadem in front ornamented with small black comets.
Figure 2 is a ball-dress of straw-color satin, over which is a japon of white tulle, which covers the entire robe, with the exception of the corsage and the extremity of the train. The corsage and the bottom of the japon are trimmed with puffs of tulle, caught up by yellow roses. The train of the robe is scalloped. The coiffure is composed of a bunch of yellow roses, which descends as low as the waist.
No. 3 is an evening dress of points de soie, striped blue and white, with a large relevé fixed behind by a bow of blue velvet with very long loops. The relevé, which is of blue satin, is bordered--as well as the body and the bottom of the robe--with velvet to match. At the extreme end of the robe is a turgid idea.
The "coiffure Josephine" is composed of a chignon of small curls, covered with a net, and fastened on by a large gold comb. A diadem, also of gold, is worn in front.
On the same page with our Fashion cut we give several engravings illustrating specimens of ladies' wool work, to each of which we shall make separate allusion:
"BANDEAU GREC" OF PEARL MOSAIC.
This bandeau can be very easily manufactured at home out of chased bronze pearls, imitation coral, or any other fancy beads, in the following manner: The two inner threads, marked a in the pattern, are passed alternately, first through one, then through two beads, forming a diamond square. The outer threads, d, are then each passed through a single bead and crossed inside of the two inner beads in the middle of the diamond. A bracelet can be made to match the "bandeau" in the same manner with fine elastic cord.
"FLOCONNE" CROCHET STITCH.
This stitch is admirably adapted to coverings for the feet and traveling wraps, not only on account of its beauty, but its warmth and elasticity, and when worked in two colors--for example, black and white--forms a good imitation of fur for children's muffs and collars. It is set up in tolerably loose meshes and worked backward and forward, thus:
1st Row (A).--In each mesh of the original casting one ordinary close mesh.
2d Row (B).--One close mesh (passing the needle through both loops, which forms an open mesh), one half of mesh, to be repeated from * to the end. To form the left part the wool once around the needle, then make a loop through the next mesh; repeat this process three times, always using the same mesh for the three loops. Unite the loops and extra three threads of the left with one mesh, as is shown in the first row of the pattern, then make an open mesh and crochet it with that which remains upon the needle.

3d Row.--Slide mesh through every single and every half mesh.
4th Row.--Repeat the second, except that the loops for the left are passed through the second open mesh below the left, designated in the pattern by an asterisk (*). The hole for the close mesh in the one succeeding the left, and is marked in the pattern by a cross (+). The contrasting color may be worked in longer tufts or strictly according to the above design.
MUFF WITH POCKET.
This perfect protection against the severity of the winter furnishes a beautiful and suitable gift, and can be made at home. Its excellence consists in being manufactured of materials to match the dress, and being furnished with a pocket, the opening of which is covered with a lappet. The arrangement of this muff may be varied, but the above design is worthy a pre-eminence. The outer covering is made of black velvet laid in folds at the sides underneath the arm-holes, which are trimmed, as well as the lappet, with broad bands of fur. The whole is lined with white sarcenet. The lappet is adorned with a rich application of black satin, embroidered with pearls, in the middle of which is a shield with an initial letter. The lappet is closed with buttons, and the muff is furnished with rich cords and tassels.

A more simple style for children is shown in pattern No. 2. This consists of dark blue velvet, lined with blue silk, and trimmed around the arm-holes and lappet with double frills of blue silk bound with the same. The whole is completed with bands of blue velvet and mother-of-pearl buttons.
KNITTED BORDER FOR PELERINES, BASQUES, ETC.
Material: White angora worsted, pearl-gray worsted, two fine wooden knitting-needles, and a flat mesh, four-fifths of an inch wide, such as is used in netting.
This fringe-like border is peculiarly fitted for pelerines, basques, small rage, etc., and is knitted with white and pearl-gray worsted in interlacing points. The required amount of stitches is cast on with pearl worsted, always taking care that it be capable of being divided by 14, that number being necessary for each point; and it is knitted backward and forward like a garter.
1st Row (loop).--The first stitch is taken off without knitting. The setting wand is then placed at the back of the work, the needle is passed through the next stitch, and the thread thrown over it; this thread is then placed around the wand from above, again thrown over the needle, so that the latter has two threads, the wand only one, and the stitch is taken off. This process is repeated from * to the end.
2d Row is knitted regularly without drawing out the wand, every double stitch being made into one. The wand is then drawn out, and the 1st and 2d rows alternately repeated until the border, which consists of ten rows, is completed. In the 3d row of loops two after every twelve must be made of white worsted, and the same number of white must be added in each successive row, until in the 10th row two meshes of pearl appear between every twelve of white. Two rows of white loops finish the border.

The use for which the article is designed must determine the arrangement of the colors as well as the strength of the material to be employed.

Steinway & Sons' GRAND SQUARE AND UPRIGHT PIANO-FORTES.

Have taken 26 First, Premium, gold and silver medals, at the Principal Fairs held in this country within the last ten years, and in addition thereto were awarded a First Prize Medal at the Great International Exhibition in London, 1862, in competition with 269 Pianos from all parts of the World. That the great superiority of these instruments is now universally conceded is abundantly proved by the fact that Steinway's Pianos, improvements, and general excellence of construction have been copied by the great majority of the manufacturers of both Europe and America as copied as well as every instrument of value over $500, and that their instruments are used by the most eminent pianists of Europe and America, who prefer them for their own public and private use wherever accessible. STEINWAY & SONS direct by special attention to their Patent Agraffe Arrangement, which, having been practically tested in all their Grand and highest-priced Square Pianos, and admitted to be one of the greatest improvements of modern times, will hereafter be introduced in every piano manufactured at NEW YORK, without increase of cost to the purchaser, in order that all their pianos may reap its benefit. THE SITUATION.

DURING the great debate in which the country is now engaged it is well to remember that temperance of tone and a careful regard for truth are always powerful allies. We have lately had signal illustrations of the folly of extravagant statements and personal aspersions; and there can be no more palpable absurdity than that those who stood steadily together against rebellion when rebellion was formidable are now anxious and plotting to surrender the Government to rebels defeated and disgraced. Yet these are charges gravely made against such men as CHARLES SUMNER on the one hand, and ANDREW JOHNSON on the other. Now either or both of these gentlemen may be mistaken in the policy of reorganization which they favor, but there is surely no reasonable ground for believing that they are hostile to the Union or Government. Their views of the true course to pursue may hopelessly differ, but certainly while their intentions are beyond suspicion the difference of their views may be discussed without acrimony. The situation is entirely without precedent, and denunciation, in-in-ation, and fierce partisanship merely confound the confusion and exasperate honest differences.

It is as unjust to assert that Congress is hostile to the loyal men at the South as it is to insist that the President is anxious to have disloyal men sit in Congress. It is as inaccurate to declare that Congress means to sustain a pauper class of freedmen at the expense of the Government as to argue that the President intends to betray the freedmen defenseless into the hands of those who hate them. It is as untrue to say that the course of Congress violates the Constitution as that the policy of the President overthrows it. The truth lies between all these extremes, as may be seen by looking at the last point we have mentioned. If, for instance, it be alleged, in defense of what is called the President's policy, that the war was to prevent secession; that it was successful; that secession was therefore prevented; that the States are now, as before, in the Union; and that, consequently, Congress has no constitutional right to prohibit their representation—it is no less true that if those States are in the Union they were equally so in May last, and that the President has no constitutional right to appoint a Provisional Governor of a State in the Union. The truth is, that the President acted from the necessity of the case; and that must be the principle of action until reorganization is complete. Then, and not before, the authority which is called the war-power ceases, and the normal habit of the Union is resumed. The argument is by no means ended, as Senators DOOLITTLE and JOHNSON seem to suppose, when it is proved that the late rebel States are not out of the Union. They were not out of the Union a year ago. Was any representative which South Carolina might have chosen to send to Congress at that time to be therefore admitted without question? No sensible man will affirm such an absurdity.

Neither the President nor Congress hold that the mere fact of laying down arms raised against the Government proves either the loyalty of those who surrender or the propriety of admitting without question the representatives whom they send. Senator BAYARD JOHNSON himself concurred in the report made to the Senate in February of last year that it was "improper for this body to admit to seats Senators from Louisiana till, by some joint action of both Houses, there shall be some recognition of an existing State Government acting in harmony with the Government of the United States and recognizing its authority." All that Congress asks is that the subject shall be investigated and the facts ascertained, and for that sole purpose was the Reconstruction Committee appointed. The President also reaffirms the same principle when he says, in speaking of the late rebel States: "When they comply with the Constitution, when they have given sufficient evidence of their loyalty and that they can be trusted, when they yield obedience to the law, I say extend to them the right hand of fellowship, and let peace and union be restored." So says the President; so say we all. But here are points to be decided, and by whom? Is it not evident that Congress must decide them for itself before it can admit a single member? The President may for himself be satisfied upon some of these points, and he says in his Veto Message that, in his judgment, "some" of the late rebel States may properly be admitted to representation. But surely neither he nor any other man can expect that his action will blind Congress. There was no subject, indeed, which required more careful consideration. The President is not to be regarded as the arbiter of the national will; the only duty which he owes to the Union is to see that it is not broken up by the hands of an ambitious man.

the danger of any risk of assumption of the rebel debt in any form—all require the most thoughtful care in legislation.

But the most truly patriotic men may honestly differ about methods, and if upon any point Congress and the President disagree, the Constitution indicates the course to pursue. He may interpose his veto. If Congress overcomes it by the Constitutional vote, its will becomes a law of the United States which the President is sworn to execute. If his veto prevails, the will of Congress so far fails to become a law. But the President, if he have any regard for the dignity of his office or for the just distribution of powers in this government, will be very wary of declaring that his view of the case shall prevail against that of Congress. The President is but a co-ordinate branch of the Government. He is not the superior of Congress nor of the Supreme Court. He is the executive officer of the laws. Meanwhile his veto of any measure is a deliberate appeal to the country upon the point of difference, and the country will decide the question at the ballot-box.

But we confidently trust that no such appeal will be necessary. The President and Congress have the same end in view. They both desire the resumption by every State of its relations in the Union at the earliest moment consistent with the general peace and security; and if Congress, accepting the facts of the situation, treats something to time, something to the traditions of the Government, something to the sure laws which, despite passion and prejudice, still control human affairs; and if the President, mindful of the equal dignity and responsibility of Congress, remembers that firmness is not inconsistent with forbearance, nor conviction with conciliation; and if orators and journalists reflect that rhetorical fury is always feeble and futile, the great party of loyal men who saved the Union will secure its peaceful perpetuity by mutual moderation and wise concession.

ENGLAND AND IRELAND.

THE "lead and general cheers" that greeted Sir GEORGE GREY when he announced in the House of Commons on the 16th of February that he should bring in a bill next day for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus in Ireland; the remark of Earl DENBY, the Tory leader in the House of Lords, that he would not interpose a moment's delay; the special session of Parliament on the 17th, when the suspension bill was brought in; the ascent of Mr. DISRAELI, the Opposition leader; Mr. BRIGGS's protest without intention of opposition; and the passage of the bill by a vote of 364 to 0, and the Queen's approval on the same night, show that the British Government is seriously alarmed by the condition of Ireland, and that it means, if possible, to prevent, not to subdue, an insurrection.

The suspension of the great writ is a favorite method of prevention with that Government, and especially in Ireland. This is the seventh time it has been suspended during this century in that country. An act to that effect was in operation in 1800, at the very time of the Union; from 1802 to 1805; from 1807 to 1810; in 1814; from 1822 to 1824; and last in 1848, when the Irish people were arming and organizing and threatening, and were incited to massacre and plunder. In England also the suspension has been frequent. In 1745 the Solicitor-General stated that the act had been suspended nine times since the revolution of 1688. From 1745 until 1794 the law was inviolate, but in that year, amidst the wild turmoil of the French Revolution and the terror of the British Government, Mr. PITT moved its suspension. FOX, GREY, and SHERIDAN eloquently resisted. In one of his speeches FOX said that forcible opposition was merely a question of prudence. He declared that the suspension made the will of Ministers the real Government of England, and that it was Magna Charta itself which was to be suspended. Yet thirty-nine members only supported the opposition, and the writ remained continuously suspended for eight years. In 1817 it was again suspended; but for the fifty years since, as the Constitutional historian of England says, "Ministers, animated by a higher spirit of statesmanship, have known how to maintain the authority of the law in England without the aid of abnormal powers."

But Ireland is always an exception to all English rules. The sense of English feeling toward the unhappy country is generally, not always, harsh and hostile. The popular English conception of the island is that of a wretched people in a chronic state of oppressed or latent rebellion. The traditions of wrong and suffering, which would gradually perish in a thriving and intelligent community, are kept forever fresh in one which is ignorant and wretched whether the wretchedness be the result of human error or of unequal legislation. The problem of Ireland has never been solved; and Carlyle expressed doubtless a vague English sense of despair when he suggested that the only solution was the submersion of the island in the sea for twenty-four hours.

Now if the true view of international relations upon the globe were simply the devil-take-the-hindmost, we might complacently "chaff" England upon her late conduct toward us, and "thank thee, Jew, for teaching" as the word Neutrality. But acutely suffering as we are from the sorrows of civil war, it is impossible not to sympathize with a kindred nation which is menaced by it; and while the British policy in Ireland can not be approved by those who believe that justice is essential to peace, yet if the Fenians or Irish revolutionists propose to invoke the sympathy of the world in an appeal to arms, the world must distinctly know their grievances. A general plea for independence, a general protest against unjust laws, are not sufficient. Discontent with the church establishment and the land-tenure in Ireland are not enough to justify bloodshed, unless it is plain that legal redress has been sought and refused. All the Fenian fury of invective is impotent compared with one plain statement of the leading wrongs which the Government refuses to remedy.

It is true that England did not wait for such a statement from our late rebels before Earl RUSSELL declared that we were fighting for dominion. But if we can find no better example for our conduct than Earl RUSSELL and British neutrality during our war, we shall deserve the scorn which we lavished upon him. Sir GEORGE GREY, in moving for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus, said that the Fenian movement was wholly disapproved by the American Government; and Mr. LAMARCA called attention to "the inadequacy of the laws to enable England to fulfill her international obligations toward foreign countries." There is our revenge, and it is a thousandfold sweeter than pettyfogging a Fenian Abolitionist out of New York Bay.

We need not fear to trust our principles or our traditions. The hostility with which so much of the world viewed our struggle to maintain free Government will change to admiration of the humane and honorable conduct of such a Government in all its domestic and international relations. If England falls into trouble our duty is to do what England ought to have done during our troubles, not what she did.

THE BEGINNING OF CONTRACTION.

WHILE Congress is disputing about the proper method of inaugurating a policy of contraction, this member declaring that the country will be ruined unless his scheme be adopted, and that member announcing that no other plan than his can save the nation, the Secretary of the Treasury, in the absence of appropriate legislation, is quietly in his own way curtailing the currency. On 1st November, a little over four months ago, the aggregate legal-tender currency was $633,709,811. On 1st March the aggregate legal-tender currency was only $605,954,414; a reduction, in four months, of $27,725,197. It is true that during the same period the volume of national currency was increased more than $10,000,000. But over these issues the Secretary had no control; and as the national banks are compelled to hold in their vaults legal tenders to redeem their notes on presentation, any substantial reduction of the former will quickly compel a recall of the latter.

It will be noted that this reduction of $27,725,197 in the legal-tender currency in the course of 120 days was effected without any "funding loans." By offering $50,000,000 of Five-Twenty bonds in exchange for compound legal tenders, in January or February last, the curtailment might easily have been raised to $77,000,000 instead of $27,000,000 without disturbing trade or industry.

"Not to put too fine a point upon it," the Secretary has ample power under existing statutes to curtail the currency—even though Congress should deny him the additional authority he has sought. He can go on quietly exchanging compound legal tenders, Seven-Thirty notes, and other short date obligations for long bonds, at the rate of at least $15,000,000 a month throughout this year, without creating any very serious disturbance in the money market, and he can employ his surplus revenue in paying off debt certificates and call loans. In this way he can curtail the currency perhaps as fast as it would be safe to curtail it, and he can do it in a way which will not involve periodical spasms in the money market.

The two weak points in his position are the deposits on call and the debt certificates. Talk to a Bull in gold about contraction, and he responds triumphantly:

"Contraction, Sir! Impossible! Ridiculous! How can the Secretary contract when he owes $118,000,000 on call after ten days, and $60,000,000 more on debt certificates, maturing on the average within eight months?"

It can not be denied but there is a great deal in this reasoning. So long as Government may be called upon for $118,000,000, on ten days' notice, the Secretary dare not create a tight money market. Such a money market as they have had in London for six weeks would—if established here—have brought the United States Government to the verge of bankruptcy. Every dollar of the temporary deposits would have been called, and it would have taxed the resources of the Government to the utmost to have responded. Surely this is clear enough to dictate the necessity of at once abandoning the seductive but fatal expedient of receiving money on temporary deposit. We have drawn attention more than once of late to the bad policy, in a mere business point of view, of paying interest at the rate of 5 and 6 per cent. per annum on money which lay idle in the Treasury, and was not required by the necessities of Government. But if contraction be fairly adopted as the policy of Government, these temporary deposits will become an element of danger as well as expense. They constitute an impregnable bulwark behind which the banks can defy the Government. So long as they exist Government can no more afford to distress the banks by curtailing the currency than a debtor can distress his creditor by purchasing the latter's paper.

In war time, when the great object of Government was to get money at once in any way, and to postpone the day of payment, debt certificates and temporary deposits were a fair expedient. They answered very well, and more than once helped the Secretary out of grave embarrassments. But now the Government ought not to need to resort to such methods of finance. The revenue is in excess of the expenditure, and Government ought to occupy a position above and beyond the control of local banks or bankers. It is in the power of the Secretary to pay off the bulk of the temporary deposits, and to reduce the debt certificates to a small figure. Until he does so all the legislation in the world will not enable him to curtail the currency, because the parties to be injured by such curtailment will till then hold a call on him for currency to which he can not respond. After he has done so he will be in a position, without further legislation, to curtail the currency about as fast as it ought to be curtailed.

REMEDIES AGAINST FIRE.

THE complete destruction by fire in the daytime of Dr. TRAW'S Church and of the Assembly Rooms in Broadway, notwithstanding the best efforts of the Fire Department, and without any want of water, lead us to consider what it is in the construction of our buildings which exposes them to such certain destruction. The question involves not only the interests of owners and Fire Insurance Companies, but the safety of occupants and the contribution which the generation on the stage makes to the one that is to succeed in the shape of permanent improvements.

Buildings in the Old World are made to stand for ages. Their destruction by fire is as impossible as it is to save houses from being thus destroyed which are built on the American plan. A traveler walking the streets of Florence and Rome is not a little astonished at the preservation of the palace built by the Medici family about the year 1300, and of the Pantheon built for Pagan worship or some other purpose before the Christian era. St. Peter's, which has stood about three hundred years, is safe from destruction by fire, or indeed by any means short of an earthquake.

Although these specimens of architecture have been so long the subject of examination, and although the fire of 1835 swept over above sixty acres of the most valuable part of New York, we still build on the plan of Dr. TRAW'S Church and of the Assembly Rooms, which in a few hours became a mass of ruins. The feature about our houses which most exposes them to rapid and certain destruction by fire is the presence of lath and plaster throughout their interior, constituting with the joists on which lath are nailed a complete wooden structure incased in walls of masonry. The succession of wooden chimneys leading from cellar to roof thus formed, and of well-devised drafts or passages leading to them between the beams on each floor, constitute a perfect contrivance for the steady and rapid progress of fire, secure from streams of water aimed from without. Architects must know this difficulty full well, but yet either from the eagerness of owners to have cheap structures and large rents, or from the wish of architects to be constantly engaged in the work of rebuilding, no proper remedies are provided, and reliance must probably be placed on Legislative means to correct the fatal effects of their joint cupidity.

If those who are engaged in the business of insurance were equal to the necessities of their vocation, the great fire of 1835 would not have been without some value as a warning against a pernicious mode of building. A few buildings, it is true, have since been constructed which are proof against fire. Among these are the Merchants' Exchange, the offices on the southeast corner of Broadway and Liberty Street, the structure for brokers in Broad Street, and more recently the elegant house of Mr. STRAWAR in the Fifth Avenue. But take the mass of houses and churches built since 1835, and they all possess the same vice which exposed the city to a fire extending over sixty acres of valuable property. The loss on that occasion occurred before the introduction of the Croton but it was due to the prevalence of extreme cold and a high wind, which made it difficult to subdue with water a fire which suddenly became extensive among houses favorably constructed for its ravages.

Take any ordinary corner house as an example of this peculiarity of structure. The walls—front, rear, and sides—are of brick, the front faced with stone. This is well enough. Behind the front and rear walls a series of joists about a foot back extend from cellar to garret. On these are nailed laths, and all the wood-work of inside shutters and a deep base. The open space, about a foot deep, forms a perfect draft or chimney of wood completely dried. The exterior side on the street is similarly constructed, except that the strips to which lath are nailed are inferior in depth to the ordinary joist, but there is nevertheless an open space, extending also from cellar to garret between the plaster and the external side wall into which the openings between the beams are conducted, thus extending the draft or chimney under every portion of the floor. In addition to all this staircases are universally built of wood, with the disadvantage, in case of fire, of a well protected open space between the treads and risers and the lath and plaster, which latter constitutes the finish at the back of the stairway. Although many houses have an inside wall along the main hall, yet more generally this and all other or most other partitions are made of joists resting on beams or on each other, covered on each side with lath and plaster, and constituting a further means of conducting the fire rapidly to each floor and to the roof of the building. The wonder is not so much that such structures are completely gutted—such is the well-known phrase—but that they are ever saved from this result if fire ensue.

The interior ornamentation of Dr. Tracy's elegant church consisted mainly of lath and plaster from floor to roof, constructed on an infinity of wood framed to represent solid work, but as ready for the flames as any thing which igneously could derive. This building and the Assembly Rooms, in open day, defied the skill and unremitting exertions of firemen. We can scarcely expect that the care and expense devoted by pagans to the Pantheon for the safety of their house of worship, or by the Catholics in the time of MICHAEL ANGELO in the construction of St. Peter's, will be displayed in our structures, but we can easily show that a very slight attention to details in building will prevent such complete destruction, and that without much expense beyond what is usually made.

In lieu of the system of joists and lath and plaster in the front and rear of ordinary houses it would cost but little more to construct a brick wall separated a few inches from the front and rear wall, to receive the plaster, and to have nailed to it the wood-work of inside shutters. The plaster would of course be perfectly dry. Houses in the interior of blocks would by this simple precaution be much more safe, solid, warm, and durable than are the usual structures, and there would be no loss of room. The outside and inside wall would not need to be tied to each other, but an occasional tie of iron or copper sloping downward from the internal to the external wall would convey any drip from the latter away from the interior, if a tie were supposed necessary, which we are sure it is not. We have closed the open space between these walls at the place where the work for shutters is affixed by a strip of tin, to exclude vermin from this retreat, which, when joists are used, constitutes the place in which they are secure from attack, and where they safely breed—rats, mice, and cockroaches. If, in addition to this, the interior walls were of brick and the main hall were of solid material, with a metal or stone stair-case rising to the second floor, such houses could be inhabited with safety from fire, and with the certainty, at all events, that no extraordinary efforts would be necessary to prevent any but a partial destruction of the building. A cheap class of tenement houses with narrow halls might have flagging in the halls from the partition wall to the external wall on every floor, and an iron staircase to give certain means of exit in case of fire. Such an assurance of safety would enable occupants to take means themselves to put out a fire which could generally be done with ease.

The interior of churches must be constructed on a plan wholly different from that which prevails, or their pastors must share in the anguish of the venerable Dr. Tracy, who, at a period of his life when he most required a secure roof for the worship in which he delights to engage, finds that his efforts to this end have been completely frustrated by the sacrifice made to appearances in the church which his congregation erected. Grand arches made of the flimsy material generally used must be dispensed with if we wish to make certain provision against the carelessness of a workman handling fire. Caen stone, such as we import from France, makes an elegant finish for the interior of churches; but an interior wall of brick, constituting with the exterior a double wall, would be less expensive, the interior wall to be plastered and painted. Where columns are necessary, iron may be used with advantage. It would be well also, in important structures, to have iron rafters and iron lath, but perforated tin or galvanized iron may be used instead of wooden lath. In forming the interior arches galvanized iron may be used with benefit and pressed into whatever shape may be required.

So far as concerns houses built for occupation, the legislation of the State is defective in omitting proper provision for security against fire; and we hope to see such laws passed as may enable the present generation to transmit its industry in the shape of houses to its successors, as a substantial contribution to the wealth of the country. A Commission appointed by the Legislature to examine experts would afford the means for accurate and efficient legislation at the next session.

FOREIGN PROSPECTS.

THE Austrian Archduke MAXIMILIAN still remains in Mexico in his capacity of titular Emperor of that country, and LOUIS NAPOLEON has not yet begun to embark his troops for France. Marshal FOREY declares in the French Chambers that "the great idea" of the Mexican expedition can not be fulfilled without more French soldiers, and a minister of Napoleon's rises hastily and says that the Marshal speaks for himself as the Emperor has already spoken for himself. Meanwhile the Juarez Government of Mexico is both nomadic and shadowy, and—to use a droll expression of the prize-ring or the bar, we forget which—seldom puts in an appearance. This country continues placid, and satisfies itself with keeping an eye upon LOUIS NAPOLEON, and smiling at the Captain Bobodil statesmanship that would peremptorily order France out of Mexico. Mr. CONWAY, a trenchant American writer, now living in London, excites John Bull by arguing that, if we go to war by way of healing our domestic alienations, it will undoubtedly be a war to settle the Alabama claims, et cetera; while Mr. MATTHEW ANOLD, an accomplished and brilliant Englishman, does not reassure his countrymen by declaring that Lord PALMERSTON leaves Great Britain behind France and the United States in the estimation of the world.

It is very clear that none of the Great Powers wish to go to war. If France would fight for Mexico, she sees the United States, the Monroe Doctrine, three thousand miles of ocean, and a native population, all sitting like lions in the path. If England would haughtily decline to look at the little Yankee bill for the Alabama, she sees Ireland seething with discontent, and watchful France ready to turn all chances to account. If the United States would insist upon an Alabama settlement or a departure from Mexico, she sees her own military hand still stretched over a large part of her own domain, and a debt which she can not wisely increase. We believe, therefore, that all these questions will be peaceably adjusted; but we are quite sure they would be adjusted much more rapidly were our own position a little more harmonious. England will disregard the little bill, France will be more reticent than ever, when they hear the President and Congress of the United States mutually announcing and defying each other.

We must not be surprised if the remarkable prestige with which the event of the war invested us is diminished in the eyes of the world by our political discords. If the Union party had moved steadily and unitedly forward to the full reorganization of the Government the amazement and admiration of other nations would have been indescribable, and the triumph of the American system would have been complete. The foreign THOMAS always shook his head dolefully and bade us beware of the perils after the war. But they were not unforeseen by us, and our doubting critic may be very sure that the same intelligent persistence which finished the war will establish peace. He may remember that he was signally wrong in his calculations of the rebellion, and he will be no less so in his theories of the practicability of adjustment. The force of our system is shown quite as much by its capacity to bear undisturbed the strain of extreme opinions and hot differences as by its rapidity of adaptation to new circumstances. The war was truly effective because it did not end at Bull Run. The peace will be permanent and secure because it will spring from wise deliberation.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH.

THE spring is here and the cholera is in the West Indies. Up to the 1st of January there had been eleven hundred deaths from cholera in Guadeloupe. The pestilence had decreased there, but had appeared at Dominica; nor is there any reason to doubt that it will presently appear among us. Meanwhile an efficient Board of Health has been created, and is now organized and at work. We trust that that work may be relentlessly thorough; and that the owners of the tenement houses which are the hot-beds of disease and vice in this city may be rigidly compelled, as the law allows, to cleanse these disgraceful dens.

The usual method of arranging a tenement house in New York is as follows: Upon an ordinary lot of 25 by 100 feet, a front house 25 by 50 is built, and a rear house 25 by 25. There is a court between, 25 by 25 feet, containing hydrant, cess-pool, and privy. The houses are generally five and often six stories in height above the basement. The principal rooms, four upon each floor, occupy the width of the building, with small bedrooms between, one to each main room. Thus in a six-story building there are usually twenty-four families; each averaging five members and often more, as there are generally other lodgers. Each person has thus a little more than ten square feet of ground area, and 480 cubic feet of air space in the whole house. In the main rooms the air space is 317 cubic feet, and in the dormitories 89 feet to each person. This is stated by the careful sanitary report of the Citizens' Association as the average, but often the crowding far exceeds this. Light and air are well excluded. Garbage and slops of every kind are thrown into the street, tainting the atmosphere of the whole region, while the privies are filthy beyond description. The condition of the wretched people who inhabit these places is unspeakable, and it is among them that cholera runs riot. In the last great visitation of 1832 the great bulk of deaths was in quarters like those now filled with tenement houses. But the pestilence was not confined to them. Cholera in Greenwich or West streets is death in the Fifth Avenue, for when once it has taken hold of a city it is no respecter of persons.

The work before the new Health Board is enormous, but there is no reason to doubt that it will be well done. Mr. SCHURER, the President, is a gentleman noted for his energy and administrative skill. His medical associates are gentlemen of the highest professional distinction and personal character; and the Police Commission can at once bring their extensive and detailed knowledge of the city to the most efficient use. The responsibility of the new Board is very great. The City and the State will require rich results from them; but whatever a Health Board can do for a city like New York we are very confident this Board will do.

A COPPERHEAD HISS.

THE Chicago Times, one of the most conspicuous "Democratic" journals in the country, suggests that it is the duty of the President to command the arrest of Messrs. SCAMMEL, STEVENS, and PHILLIPS; and if Congress does not immediately obey the President, it is also his duty to turn the Senate and House out of the capital at the point of the bayonet.

This is a plain proposition that the President of the United States should arrest, during a Congressional discussion, those members who do not agree with his views. It is not a new thing. A little more than two hundred years ago CHARLES I., King of England, did exactly what the Chicago Times urges the President to do. He went to the House of Commons and ordered the arrest of five members. It was in consequence of this violent assault upon the fundamental law of the realm, and not as Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS foolishly said, because of the expression of an opinion, that CHARLES lost his head.

An act which was so intolerable in the English monarchy under the STUART kings more than two centuries ago that it plunged the kingdom into civil war, is now gravely recommended to an American President by a chief "Democratic" newspaper. Of course we do not assume that all "Democrats" are responsible for such folly, although GARRETT DAVIS makes a kindred proposition in the Senate of the United States. But it is instructive to observe the spirit of those who are most clamorous that the late rebels shall be at once restored and without conditions.

The Chicago Times was a steadfast and unscrupulous supporter of the rebellion; and as JERREMOX DAVIS failed to overthrow the Government, it is naturally very willing to see any body else undertake the work. The rebel shot upon the field and the tortures inflicted at Andersonville were constitutional resistance to coercion, thinks the Chicago Times; but the expression of opinion that loyal men should administer the Government it holds to be "Northern rebellion." We greatly misunderstand President JOHNSON if he does not entirely agree with General GRANT's expressed opinion, that such a paper as the Chicago Times is one of the chief hindrances of peaceful reorganization of the Union.

GOOD INVESTMENTS.

AT a time when the price of all kinds of property is declining, and investors are puzzled to know what to do with their money, it may not be out of place to draw attention to two classes of bonds offered for sale, in another column, by the bank of FISK & HATCH. These are, first, the new Thirty Year Six per cent bonds of the United States Government, issued to finance the construction of the Central Pacific Railroad; and, second, the Central Pacific Railroad Company's Sevens, interest guaranteed by the State of California. The former are the longest Six per cent bond yet issued by the General Government; and if, as seems probable, the rate of interest on the public debt be reduced to 4 or 5 per cent, when the Fifty-Twenties mature, three new Sixes, with the Sevens of 1851, will then command as large a premium as the like security did before the war, when Government bought them up @ 115. It may well be questioned whether, in the event of the continued improvement in the public debt, Government can afford to issue many more such bonds.

The Pacific Railroad Sevens are an equally eligible investment. From the last estimates, it seems pretty certain that the Railroad Company will be able to pay the coupons without difficulty. Should its traffic, however, fall as far below present calculations as to leave a deficit, the State of California is bound to supply the money required to meet the interest on these bonds. The interest on them is payable semi-annually in gold; so that, at the present rate of gold, they are almost a ten per cent bond, guaranteed by one of the most solvent and honorable States in the Union.

TAKING CARE OF THE HEALTH.

THERE is an abundance of painstaking on the part of the sick to recover health, but a strange indifference in those who are well to the means of its preservation. We see this contrast strongly marked in relation to consumption, a disease which occasions about one-sixth of all the deaths in the northern portion of this country. In restraining its ravages innumerable means can be done by means of prevention than by those of cure. And yet, not merely in the community taken as a whole, but among the intelligent and those who may be deemed decidedly prudent in most matters, very little heed is given to what is said of the causes of this malady for the purpose of escaping them, and the public attention is largely occupied with the details of consumption-cures. The same contrast may be seen in regard to other diseases, though in most cases it is not so palpable, because the action of the means of prevention is not so obvious.

Now, with all the manifold causes of loss of health from the endlessly varied causes of disease, the expectation would seem a rational one that there would be, at least with all sober and thinking men, earnest and constant inquiry as to the safeguards against this liability. Why is it not so? The chief reason probably is, that with the consciousness of vice and baseness of spirits that attend health there is engendered a feeling of individual security. With this comes in the pressure of present business or gratification. Men are too busy in the pursuit of the objects before them to pause at all for the consideration of the laws of health. They press on, transgressing these laws more or less, till sickness arrests them, and with its present necessities compels them reluctantly to attend to the care of what might have been prevented by reasonable care. There is still another reason. It is the influence of the fact, so commonly observed, that those who write and talk about hygiene are apt to be impracticable ultraists, and their disciples are therefore mostly those who are weak-minded, or are prone to catch up notions and theories, in place of seeking for well-established facts. Such painstaking as is engaged by some writers and lecturers on health is really so irrational as to degrade the subject, and therefore it is apt to be dismissed from the mind. The true rules for the preservation of health not only command themselves to reason and common sense, but do not call for such a heavy resort of appliances as these ultraists recommend, for the human system decidedly resists all procrustean alterations, and will ordinarily keep itself right if it can have fair play. Hygiene is not the cumbersome and repulsive thing that it is so carelessly made to be.

It is not merely those who live for the present alone, and are governed by worldly and selfish motives, that are guilty of sacrificing health by daily inattention to its obvious rules, but very generally those also who live for the good of others and for the eternal future. They are culpably careless in overtaxing their powers, and either end very prematurely a career of usefulness or mar it with unnecessary physical hardships and disappointments. Hugh Miller is a signal instance. He destroyed his life simply by transgressing the plain hygienic principles which should regulate the use of the brain and nervous system. If he had been content to perform less mental labor, with his sturdy frame what a long life of service he might have rendered to his fellow-men! Many a conscientious man falls in a similar way to do his duty—for he is in the light of duty that we would put it. There is a real transgression in this neglect to husband properly the linked mental and physical powers that God has given us. These are talents which we are bound to use in the best manner possible; and if we, by independent exertion, wear them out faster than we ought we are accountable for the loss. We do wrong if we tax them to the utmost to-day without regard to their capability of doing the duties of to-morrow. We ought to have an intelligent plan of action which shall take time into the account; and to do otherwise—to use our powers without due regard to their preservation—is as irrational as it would be for a mechanic to put a machine to such a capacity of movement as would soon derange it, or even break it down. "It is better to wear out than rust out" is the common proverb used in justification of the error that we have indicated. But surely in occupying an extreme it is not wise to run into the opposite one. The intellectual man has no more right to overtax the brain than the glutton has to overtax the stomach.

This subject is most important, and we shall offer some further plain hints upon it.

MR. NEELY.

CHAPTER X.

It is late one afternoon, a few weeks after this, that Edward Arthur, seated in his little room there in Mrs. Bowler's front yard, hears the front gate open and shut, and sees through his window Mr. Neely walking toward the house. In that one glance he sees that Mr. Neely is carefully dressed in his very best; sees all that Mr. Neely has come for; knows almost every syllable of all that Mr. Neely is going to say; sees and knows all this with a sudden glow which tingles him from head to heel—a glow followed by a sudden chill. We must endeavor to excuse the young minister, the fact being that he has lain wide awake all the previous night on account of the bells!

On account of the bells! At nine o'clock exactly the night before, Bill Perkins, the stage-driver, had driven up to the door of the hotel. Long before he could rein in his horses a dozen voices from the crowd, which now awaits his every arrival in the ample porch of the hotel, hail him—"Any news, Bill? What's the news?"

Bill Perkins is aware of his importance, and is silent and even dignified accordingly. No man there so calm as he, though his team is all in a foam, and he an hour earlier than usual on account of the news which burns in his bosom. Their classic reading being extremely limited, the series of stage-drivers of which Bill Perkins is one are not aware of the fact that they strongly resemble the runners in that one of the old Olympic Games in which each one bears at full speed, and transmits in full blaze to the one next beyond him, a lighted torch. During the last hundred hours or so, each driver on the line, catching the news, with the reins and whip, from the one before, has borne it on like a torch indeed, setting aflame with the great and glorious tidings all the country as he drives along. Perhaps it is on account of its being transmitted so far, and from hand to hand so often, that the torch blazes larger and brighter for every mile it is borne over, as with the very rapidity of its transmission.

"The news! What is the news?" says Bill Perkins at last, very slowly, and with considerable irritation in his manner. "Ask me if there's any news! I guess there is news!" And Bill Perkins is thereupon silent, enjoying the dependence of the assembled crowd, and all Somerville behind it, upon his single tongue. Here is the possession of power, and, like all of us, he greatly enjoys it. The moment his news is spoken he vanishes from public attention, and he knows it.

"I tell you what it is, you Jake," he says to the negro hostler, amidst the breathless attention of the crowd, "you'd better have them horses a little cleaner when I come to leave to-morrow than they were last time; better had, or I'll Jake you till your very wool'll come out of curl! No, they ain't any passengers. What are you unbacking them strags for? Think I kerry-strags about behind just for the fun o' the thing? Gentlemen, do shut up till I kin—News? I rather guess there is news! Great battle at Corinth! Glorious victory! Yankees whipped all to smash! Beauregard's taken prisoners all he hasn't killed, an' that's fifty thousand! Battalions, gun-boats, brigades, all captured! Sydney Johnson killed, only that's known to be a lie. But get out o' the way, gentlemen, I must drive to the Post-office. Can't you visit till the mail is open and get your papers?"

And having keenly enjoyed his momentary importance, Bill Perkins subsides, as he drives off, into private life till the next time.

But the news! It is to the crowd like fire to powder. Such a brightening of faces, such a shaking of hands, such a chorus of yells! Prople hurry off to their homes to tell it to their waiting families. Men who live in the country can not wait till the mail is opened, but mount their horses, tied hard by, and gallop off at the risk of their necks through the darkness to tell the news at home, then so gallop back again for their papers. Lamum only stops to say, "The bells, boys, the bells!" Every bell in Somerville! and in the Post-office and his hand in the mail-bag almost before the Postmaster can unlock and draw out the chains through the iron loops thereof.

It is a little strange about Dr. Peel. Up to the arrival of the stage he had been one of the foremost, and certainly the loudest, of the crowd at the hotel awaiting the stage. No man so confident as he that, "Mark my word, gentlemen, there'll be great news to-night;" consigning his soul most emphatically to perdition if his prophecy is not correct. But Dr. Peel has made many a similar prophecy similarly emphasized before; in fact, he never ceases from prophecies to the same effect all day long and all over Somerville, so that people have come to attach not so much meaning to his words as they used to do. It is strange, then, that he is not among the foremost in pressing around Bill Perkins when Bill first drives up. Nobody notices him when Bill has first announced the great news. They would have been surprised at the singular pallor of his face as he stands a little back in the shadow cast by the large lamp hanging in front of the hotel from one of the pillars of the porch.

Nobody notices him in the wild excitement of the hour; but he is silent, has ceased even from cursing, is suddenly shrunken from his burly prominence, agas-struck, dumb. It is not for long, however. Ten minutes later, and Dr. Peel's lumbering form and heavy black brow and exultant profanity is foremost as usual. He can hardly make his voice heard, for three citizens are ringing at the tavern bell, while Joe Staples, the hotel keeper's little boy, is beating the gong, relieved in turns by such of his companions, specially favored thereby, as are not engaged in firing their revolvers and ringing the church bells.

"Gentlemen," he roars, with stentorian oaths, slapping down a twenty-dollar gold piece on the hotel counter as he does so, "there's twenty dollars toward powder to celebrate this glorious news; and there's another ten toward liquor for all who will help me drink success to Beauregard and perdition to the Yankees!"

But there must have been a good deal more than twenty dollars' worth of powder fired off that night from the two cannon, the four anvils, and the innumerable rifles and revolvers in Somerville. As to ten, it was rather many hundreds that went that night across the counters of every grocery in Somerville for liquor; the bells scattering the news meanwhile over all the country for miles around.

All night Lamum is busy in his office reading the papers, writing editorials, answering questions to the crowd pouring through it like a thoroughfare, all flashed and noisy but he. With stooped shoulders, face beaked like a kite, and thin, sharp voice, he is the acknowledged intellect and oracle of the hour, ruling by his very paleness, confidence, and coolness. There is a tone of superiority even in the manner in which he alludes, from time to time, to the excitement of the hour. "Acting as if you did not know who would whip!" he says. No outward sign thereof; but, ah, how keenly he enjoys the hour! Sweeter taste of bliss this man will never know so long as his soul endures.

All night long people came galloping in on horseback from the country. The dispatches are read over and over again at every bar in town; beside the hotel lamp in front of the hotel; by fathers at home in shirt and drawers to the mothers in night-gowns, and the children staring up from cradle and trundle-bed, wondering and crying. All night neighbors are hurrying into each other's houses to talk it all over; and so, from where the news smote, like a stone in the centre of a lake, there at the hotel door, the waves roll and spread until they die off into all the country around miles away. There has been a slight misunderstanding between Captain Simmons and Bob Withers at a grocery, however.

"What I say is, by George, I want to see all this news confirmed first! Suppose it shouldn't be true, by George?" is what Bob Withers has remarked over and over again as he holds on to an awning post in front of a blazing bonfire.

"Look here, Bob Withers; I tell you, Sir, you mean't say that; you oughtn't to say that," Captain Simmons has remarked, as drunk as Withers, but only the suffer in attitude, and the more quarrelsome on that account.

"Confirmed, gentlemen, that's what I say; confirmed is what I want this news to be first. Yes, by George, confirmed," hiccups Bob Withers, regardless of the Captain.

"Any man, such a glorious night as this, who can refuse to believe news, such news, is a traitor!" says Captain Simmons, still more solemnly. Unlike poor Bob Withers, the Captain prizes himself upon being a gentleman in the gentlest sense of the word. Were not his parents highly respectable people, members of the church, especially careful in his training? Hence it is the Captain never dresses except in black, even in summer. As to Bob Withers, the drunker he gets the lower he descends. The drunker Captain Simmons is, only that much higher he ascends. When sober, which is becoming a very rare thing with the Captain, he is but a common sort of person; but as he waxes intoxicated his reminiscences of parents, and church, and Bible-class, and college, and the term he served in the Legislature, and all his past respectability in general, become more and more vivid. It is when at his deepest possible stage of drunkenness that the Captain is in hearing and language the very Chesterfield of Somerville. He now stands regarding Bob Withers with lofty indignation.

"Confirmed, gentlemen!" exclaims Bob, still more loudly, more dogged in his insane notion, blinking gravely with owl's eyes upon the crowd, "that's what I want, by George!"

"This most disreputable individual is a traitor, gentlemen," says Captain Simmons, slowly and solemnly; "a Yankee at heart, an Abolitionist in disguise. By sainted parents I was carefully instructed never to fight, never even to associate with drunken squabblers. This case must be made an exception. He is inebriated, I know, but even his pitiable condition shall be no protection." And the Captain, lifting his cane and advancing upon him, is prevented only by the crowd from inflicting merited chastisement.

But Colonel Ret Roberts is at this juncture dragged out of Lamum's office, after having been called for in vain for the last three hours. Dr. Peel has opened a basket of Champagne, and Colonel Ret Roberts is very drunk by this time, though Dr. Peel and Lamum are not. But zealous friends stand close around the loghead upon which the Senator totters to catch him when he falls.

Oh, divine gift of eloquence!—given not to one man in multitudes, and not by one man in thousands to whom it is given used but for the basest of purposes. People have heard Colonel Ret Roberts before; so wonder, as the news spreads that he is speaking, all groups break up from hotel, grocery, bonfire, street corner, and hurry toward the spot. In a little while hundreds of excited faces show around him through the half light, half shadow of torch and bonfire as he speaks. The frantic applause as he stentorianly begins drowns even the sounds of scattering shots and the pealings of the church bells, intoxicated with their own clamor.

The bells! As the suggestion had broken from Lamum's lips boys and men had raced off toward every church in Somerville. True, the doors of each church were locked. But what difference did that make? The news, the great news, the glorious news! Sashes were smashed in, doors burst open, the very churches made to take—alas! and not in that way alone during these days—the noisiest, rowdiest part in the jubilee. And it is of no use stopping up the access to the bell-ropes afterward. During all these days they hang within open and easy reach to the hand of whosoever chooses to pull.

But the voice of Colonel Ret Roberts rises clear and strong and fascinating above every other sound. Falsehood, fact, fierce invective, anecdote, prophecy, appeal—how smoothly they flow from his lips! No belted earl in Europe has so supreme a contempt for the people as has this South Carolina cavalier; hardly concealed even. He speaks now, as always, not so much to the mob around him, nor for their hearing, as just because he thereby gratifies himself. He speaks as naturally and as necessarily as a river pours its water, or as a mocking-bird sings.

And how they applaud! Men stand there yelling with laughter at his jokes whose daily business is utterly ruined by what Colonel Ret Roberts and his set have brought to pass. Colonel Jaggies has ridden in by this time, summoned through the night and the mud by the bells and the cannon. How cordially he agrees in the speaker's bitter descriptions of the Abolitionists, not even dissenting at the exciting instant to the horrible oaths with which it is peppered! Colonel Jaggies with his plantation swarming with negroes, and so ignorant of the fact that it is just that speaker there before him who, aided by his like, have secured the speedy emancipation of every negro he owns! Abolitionist! For practical abolitionism Wilberforce, Clarkson, Burdett, Beecher, Garrison, Brown, and all the rest, with all their meetings, petitions to Parliament and Congress, speeches, books, papers, pikes, and torches, are, in comparison with Colonel Ret Roberts and his class, but as the jury to the executioner. And not a man is that excited crowd dreams of it!

There is Sampson, the carpenter, listening with both ears, never wincing even when the Colonel estimates his demerit of the Federal army as being composed of "base mechanics!" Staples, the hotel keeper, has left his hotel to take care of itself while he can hear Roberts. How he exults in the demoralization of the North, its speedy bankruptcy and ruin, as prophesied by the speaker; so ignorant that, of his three boys turned by the Colonel and his set from thriving citizens into soldiers, one lies at that moment dead at Shiloh, another is in suffer amputation, and consequent death, to-morrow at Corinth, while George, the last but one, is to be returned at the end of the war a drunken loafer until his death. Yes, there stands Staples, his hat left behind in his hurry, his red and enormous crop of hair on head and face fall one-fourth of the man it seems, for Staples is but a small man, and was once a tailor; disheveled and bristling and electric with the glorious news in every fibre, with eyes sparkling through it like those of a ferret, mouth agape, hands ecstatic, how he listens and laughs and applauds, more of a lunatic than sane to-night!

In the name of God's eternal justice, if Benedict Arnold deserved death for attempting to betray and ruin his country, what do Colonel Ret Roberts and his gang deserve—deserve at the hands of the South, who have so terribly succeeded therein? Let them escape the gallows, waving as traitors, none the less will they swing forever in the chains of history as the greatest criminals that ever blundered through blood and mire since the days of Cain—criminals whose wickedness was exceeded only by their folly!

"Sheep, sheep, sheep," Mr. Ferguson has been murdering to himself all night; "and headed here and headed there, as sheep always are, by smart dogs," adds Mr. Ferguson to himself, from recollections of his native hills and glens. As to believing in the news of the night, not exactly. Mr. Ferguson disbelieved it in advance when he first heard, that night, the rattle of the approaching stage. He disbelieved it still more strongly when he heard the uproar which followed its announcement. Truth is, by this time Mr. Ferguson and Somerville occupy in regard to each other opposite ends of an ever-moving plank, like children playing see-saw. When Somerville goes down in heart up goes the Scotchman, never so cheerful as when his friends and fellow-citizens are gloomiest. To-night Somerville revels in the ascendant over Yankees and universe, but very low in spirits is the Scotchman, indignant all the time at himself for being so, the news being, whatever it is, so absurd! Not that he went down from his room, to ascertain its nature; being all a lie, why should he?

There was one satisfaction in it—he would have another flaming sheet to add to his collection. Beginning with the summer of the burnings, he already had a large one. Not a placard posted on the walls of Somerville from the first in relation to the matter, not a notice of thanksgiving for victory, not a sermon upon the war preached by minister or bishop, not a document of the kind had so far come within his reach but he had seized upon and placed it, in its due order, upon the file.

If any man tried desperately to sleep that night Mr. Ferguson did, but Mr. Ferguson did not succeed, the bells were too strong even for him.

As to the Union people in general, you saw few of them on the streets that night. Doctor Warner went to the office for his paper—but that is no ruse. Mrs. Warner made him go. She read the paper on his return, sitting up in bed in her night-cap, the Doctor holding the candle, and enlightening in his own person, from his wife, the whole Federal defeat of Shiloh over again. There were others of the Union people who glided swiftly and stealthily into the office, obtained their papers, and studied them on their return home—gathering far less cause for the pealing bells and the reports of cannon and guns than others found. It is astonishing, it is perfectly amazing, they should find so much to exult in! they said to themselves—and, in strict confidence, to each other next day of the people of Somerville; yet they themselves were far, very far, from being as cheerful under all the circumstances as, according to their own views of the tidings, they should have been.

In Somerville, as in every town on earth, there existed what may be called the wavering one-third. That is, one-third of the population was sincerely and decidedly in favor of Secession—firm believers in the Millennium it was about producing; another third was still more decidedly of the conviction that the South was wrong, and had nothing but evil to expect in consequence; the remaining third believed in nothing so clearly, inflexibly, and consistently as this—that the winning side was the right side. When with Unionists the wavering was a Unionist too, but, "Bless me, we must be guarded in our language during such times as these, you know!" When with Secessionists the wavering was, "I confess, somewhat doubtful about the step at first, but now that we are in it, of course there is but one course left us; we are all agreed in that, I suppose!" And now that this last news has come, the wavering, when with the Secessionists, shakes hands and smiles amidst the universal smiling and hand-shaking, gladly lost among the crowd. When thrown in private with his Union friend the wavering has nothing special to say—only arches his brows and gives a mournful shrug of his shoulder at the delusion of the rejoicing. The sympathy of the wavering with such a man as Guy Brooks just now—Corinth pealing with all its cannon in his ears—is very much that of the Frenchman who took off his hat to the antique statue of Jupiter. "Who knows," said the Gaul, "but he may get his head above water once more!"

When the first stroke of the first bell smote on the ear of Edward Arthur, studying in his room, it struck like—it may be an awful thing to say of a Southern born, Southern raised man, but none the less most the truth be told—a cruel blow.

"It is the last desperate effort of the Yankees to subjugate the South," Mrs. Bowles had said, before the news came, that night at supper. "They obtained a partial and greatly-exaggerated success at Fort Donelson, on account of their gun-boats. Our Generals were inexperienced, perhaps cowardly, then. The South was slumbering in full belief the war was over; but now the two armies are in front of each other near Corinth you will see a different result. Their gun-boats can not help them then. Our Generals are experienced and brave. The entire South has sworn to their assistance. I believe in our army; I believe in our cause, as that of a people struggling to be free from cruel tyranny; I believe in a just God, above all, and I know already the victory is ours!" said Mrs. Bowles, with glowing cheek. "If it was not that Rutledge Bowles is at the head of his Company in Virginia, soon to be victorious there, I would only regret he is not at Corinth to share that great victory!"

And now hardly has the pastor seated himself after this in his room before the bells, and the shouts, and the roar of cannon announce that Mrs. Bowles is right. As he sits he can hear the instant and joyful bustle in the house. He hears Mrs. Bowles hurry the negro Charles down to the office for the papers. He hears Alice and her mother conversing eagerly together as they await his return. He hears Charles return; can hear Alice reading aloud the dispatches to her mother; hears Mrs. Bowles' loud "Oh, thank God! thank God!" mingled with even weeping. Had it been in regard to any thing else in the world he would have been with them, and one with them.

But as it is? A great gulf yawns between him and the rejoicing town; between him and the very family in which he lives, heretofore one in every thing; between him and Alice! There is a pause; and then the voice of Alice at the piano rings clear to the song of Dixie, and then of the Bonnie Blue Flag. There is another pause; then Alice plays more slowly, sings more sweetly; it is a Psalm this time—the Forty-sixth Psalm. Edward Arthur well knows why; it was the Psalm sung, he has often heard Mrs. Bowles tell, in the Major's father's family by the whole household, white and black, after the news of the surrender of Cornwallis. All this, and he sitting there in his room separated from all the world.

Shall he dash away from him every thing, go in the house, congratulate them on the glorious news, rejoice with her—with Alice—with the whole world rejoicing around? He sinks his head upon his hands resting on the table before him, and tries to go over the whole question of Secession from the first. Was Secession a right thing? During these last two years he has, in reading and in conversation, made himself perfectly familiar with every thing that can be said on both sides of the question. He had brought to the investigation no prejudices or partialities except in favor of the South, in which he has lived all his life, out of which he never expects or desires to be as long as he lives. Discreetful of himself, he has ever sought divine guidance herein. Laying his brow upon his table he sinks upon his knees, and goes again over the whole subject in the language and feeling of prayer. How ardently he desires to believe Secession, under all the circumstances, to have been a right thing before man and before God!

But with all the loud opinion of Somerville ringing at the instant in his ears, for his life he can not effect the slightest, most momentary agreement in himself with that opinion. Secession was—is a wrong thing. But so many at the South disagree with him here? He can not help it; to him Secession was—is a great wrong. But so many pious Christians, learned and pious ministers have believed in it, have written and preached in its favor, have entered into it as the very cause of right and truth and God himself? They are more learned, more holy than he a thousandfold; none the less to him Secession was—is wrong, wrong! He may be deluded, may be insane, but to him that night, reason as he may, Secession is to him as clearly a crime as ever.

Only a little time ago, he remembers, the whole land, North, South, East, West, thought and felt as he thinks and feels to-night. All were unanimous then, at least, on that point—the believers in Secession being regarded, such a little while ago, and by the whole land, with contempt as deluded, with horror as wicked men. He can remember how that sentiment ran through the speeches of all public men, the leading articles of all editors, the sermons of all preachers, the platform addresses on all anniversaries, the very school readers and hymns for Sabbath-school celebrations, the entire country over. And to-night, like a man in full health suddenly dragged into a hideous dream, he finds himself, as it were, alone in this same sentiment, all the world changed as in an instant to believe with all their soul in exactly the reverse. But he has not changed with it; he almost wishes he could have done so; but he has not, and he can not help it. It was—it is a great crime!

Then all that good Mr. Ellis said to him only yesterday comes into his mind. There is no man in Somerville with whom he has held such sweet and intimate communion, for years now, as with Mr. Ellis, the member and pillar of his church. He has a friendship for Guy Brooks, but the lawyer has not the deep and devotional piety of Mr. Ellis. He has often conversed, and very agreeably, with Guy Brooks on church matters; but he has never conversed with him as he has with Mr. Ellis, deep into the night, there by his study fire, or here in his chamber, upon doctrines precious alike to them both, unveiling to him in Christian friendship, the closest and sweetest of all on earth, the deepest experiences of his soul. He has often knelt with Guy Brooks in prayer in private; but it was Mr. Ellis whose devotional spirit rose with his own in agonies of entreaty, in the very wrestlings of living faith for the common cause of their hearts. Was there a proof of affection and esteem for him which Mr. Ellis had not given? Blameless in life, pendent in speech, sincere in soul, liberal of his means to the last cent, above all devotedly pious, Mr. Ellis had been the man of all men he had ever known to whom he had clung closest.

"You know I was a Union man to the very last," his friend had said to him only yesterday. "We agreed perfectly in sentiment on that point. But the case is altogether changed now. We are both Southern men; have and desire to have no country but the South. Well, the South has established itself as a separate nation from the North. We both opposed the step, but it has been taken, and we are not responsible for it. In the providence of God the Confederacy being a nation, and we the citizens thereof, our duty is clear. You know the maxim: 'My Country, may she ever be right; but my Country, right or wrong!'"

And here Mr. Arthur had cried out against this maxim, but all the argument only left them where they were before.

"When the North actually declared war upon us"—Mr. Ellis continued, at last—"war upon us, think of that! Actual war, simply for desiring a peaceful separation from them, from that time my feelings have undergone a complete change. I am glad we did separate from a people capable of taking such a step—such a wicked, diabolical step! Henceforth I have no wish but for the success of our arms, and for the defeat, destruction if need be, of the Northern Government. You have not a warmer friend in the world than I am," adds good Mr. Ellis, taking his pastor by the hand, the tears standing in his eyes as he speaks; "from my soul I admire and love you—am your sincere friend. Don't persist in your course—don't, I entreat you, for the sake of our friendship, for the sake of Christ's cause—"

If Edward Arthur could only have got his friend then and there to have uniled with him in prayer, first for wisdom, and then have discussed together the one thing at the core and centre of it all—Slavery. But he dared not do it. An Abolitionist? Horror. Why Mr. Ellis would have—what would he not have said and done?

As if, deep down under all, Mr. Ellis, and every other Christian at the South was not thinking, in various stages of advance, exactly the same thoughts?

Yet it was strange, too. Long after war had begun Mr. Ellis had little to say upon the subject. Week after week had the pastor, Guy Brooks, Mr. Ferguson, and Mr. Ellis, besides other church-members, met for prayer. On every one of these occasions Mr. Ellis had led in prayer, had prayed for peace, had prayed that God's will might be done, but had never once prayed distinctly for the Confederacy, nor for the success of its arms and the defeat of its foes. As the months rolled on, Mr. Arthur, standing still himself, could perceive a change in his friend. At first he would have scouted, and did so, with horror the idea of his son Henry going to the war. "It was like causing Henry to pass through the fire to Moloch," were his own words often repeated to his pastor. But, at last, Henry did go. Henceforth Mr. Ellis was indeed changed. Now he began to pray earnestly for the Confederacy, to give freely up to and beyond his means to all the demands upon him toward it; to feast upon the papers, believing all they said of success to the Confederate arms; to seek and join eagerly in all meetings and street conversations; in a word, to undo many even of the most violent "from-the-start Secessionists."

As the young minister knelt there in his room, with the bells pealing in his ears, he well knew that no man in Somerville was rejoicing more than Mr. Ellis in the news. "We must cease looking back, cease reasoning upon the matter," Mr. Ellis had told him yesterday, "and must give way now to our feelings, to our natural and hearty feelings, as citizens of a nation invaded by a brutal foe."

"But was not Secession a wrong thing?" Mr. Arthur had asked.

"Well, yes, in a certain sense it was," Mr. Ellis had replied.

"And is not this a war, on the part of the North, but an energetic attempt to put down a wrong thing? Is it not, this war, a desperate attempt on the part of the South to establish this wrong thing? Can you hope for the blessing of God, Mr. Ellis, on any effort to establish any wrong? Dare you deliberately pray to God to give success to the wrong?" said the minister.

"All this is mere morbid fancy, Mr. Arthur. Fight? yes, it is the duty of every man in the South to fight. I have sent Henry! I tell you, Sir," continued Mr. Ellis, a fire gleaming in his eye which no man had ever seen there a few months ago, "if there are any among us who are unwilling to go and fight for the Confederacy I would have them torn by force from their homes and made to go; if they are of no other use on the battle-field they will make breast-works there for those who do love their country."

Mr. Arthur had never been calmer in his life than when he replied, rising as he spoke: "Mr. Ellis, we once thought and felt exactly alike in this matter. You have left me. I stand this hour exactly where I have always stood—must always stand. Wrong is of the Devil. Right is of God. A Wrong is eternally a Wrong, and a Right is eternally a Right. He who fights for the Wrong and against the Right fights for the Devil and against his God. May my right arm wither from its socket before I strike a blow for the one and against the other!"

Only Secession the Wrong? No vague, undefined, instinctive apprehension of a deeper, more desperately wrong thing than that, under that, out of which, as from a giant and deadly root, Secession had naturally sprung?

Yes, Edward Arthur—the bells pealing in his ears—went over the whole subject which he had gone over and over and over again so often during the weary months past. Has not the South passed into the hands of the very worst and most desperate men in it? he asked himself. Many a Mr. Ellis drawn into it now; perhaps many a better man than I am deluded into it from the outset—but that its leaders are men who occupied, two years ago, a position in the esteem of the country the reverse of that to which they have now risen who can deny? And, suppose Secession successful, what is that but the certain crumbling apart, both at the North and at the South, of States held together by so fragile a tie? Will not Secession be ever before the mind as the easy remedy for any discussion among States? And what is my country, my nation, then? What permanency in such a Confederacy toward nations abroad? What permanency in such a loosely-bound nation for the building of railways—the founding of great institutions? What hope for the peaceful spread of civilization and the Gospel in a region perpetually in danger, at least, of crumbling to fragments? Shall I desire and pray that the South may succeed in this effort to make itself another South America of wrangling and warring provinces?

And suppose the Confederacy successful as against the North—does not the one existing cause—Slavery—still exist? With such a line of frontier, with such hostility to Slavery North, with such jealousies and rivalries, could a peace between two such nations last six months? That, Slavery? Old, and stale, and hackneyed reasonings these, now; but to Edward Arthur that night they were living things with which he wrestled as for his life!

It is as one exhausted with long conflict that, on this afternoon after the night of bells, Edward Arthur sees Mr. Neely enter the house of Mrs. Bowles, on a little visit to the mother, and especially to the daughter.

Just a word or two in regard to Mr. Neely while he waits on the front porch for Charles to answer his knock. A tall man is Mr. Neely, with fair hair and florid face. When he first came South Mr. Neely had always replied, "Kentucky," when asked where he was from. Because having made an extensive tour of that State before settling in Somerville, he was from Kentucky. But his fair and rosy face was against him; he had always to acknowledge, at last, that shameful and painful fact of having been originally from New Hampshire; in fact, hard to say, "born there." If Mr. Neely's body was in perpetual motion—hands, eyes, feet, tongue—it was only because it was an instrument thoroughly adapted to his active and restless mind.

One definite purpose Mr. Neely had in life—to succeed. That is, to obtain as much position and property as he could, in which he is very far from being singular. Starting from New England with just one hundred dollars in gold, a good suit of clothes, an old-fashioned watch, once belonging to his father and his father's father, a pleasant person, a ready wit, he had gone into the Book Agency Business because it was the first thing that turned up. But it had occurred to him as a thing still better to study Law, and now he is teaching in Somerville as a means of support—glorious Daniel Webster before him in that—while he masters enough legal knowledge to obtain a license. Mr. Neely is not an unprincipled man; Mr. Neely would not do a dishonest deed for the world—an unobscured, undeniably dishonest deed, you know—but Mr. Neely, all this apart, is resolved to succeed.

Now it is not in New Hampshire that Mr. Neely is expecting to succeed, but in Somerville and the South. Therefore Mr. Neely must adapt himself to Somerville. Point out to him that "Hada't oughter" grates upon the ears of Somerville, and never again does that expression pass his lips. It is part of his creed that though there are such quadrupeds as cows, the universe owns nothing answering to the name of kows. Well does Mr. Neely know that the calling any one to an account for a thing is vastly better expressed by the phrase "calling him to dew fer it," but he would prefer death to such language. Mr. Neely often speaks of "throwing a rock," but of such a thing as a "stone" he has never read, except in the Bible. Cheerfully does Mr. Neely interchange "evening" for "night," and as freely does he give up "chores" for "jobs," and so of all forms of speech unadapted to his new meridian. There now lingers not even the knowledge of one in his mind. It is rather the custom of Somerville to substitute negro labor for one's own labor, and to so man there has it become so indispensable as to Mr. Neely. No man denies the piety of Mr. Neely; but it was after ascertaining which of the churches in Somerville had the largest attendance that he united himself to just that church—and of that church's choir Mr. Neely is a prominent member; but as to introducing, or even alluding to any of the pines so familiar in New Hampshire and in the old church there, and so unknown in Somerville—why, Mr. Neely has long since ceased even to whistle them to himself, on principle. "Identify myself with the South" is Mr. Neely's one, plain path; and the only question on any and every point with him, great and small, is simply, which is the Northern, which the Southern side of this matter? and magnetized by this, Mr. Neely propels the Northern and clings to the Southern Pole of the question by a second nature which has become an instinct.

In a word, Somerville contains many hundred Southern-born individuals, but Mr. Neely is the most intensely Southern person there. That is, in comparison with the born Southerners, we mean. There are a plenty of other men there—Lamus, Barker, and the rest—born at the North, as Southern as he. Let us pause to inscribe this fact on the page of the times-for future analysis and inference by whosoever chooses to undertake the task. Among the people, in the army, in political office, in the pulpit, on the stump, as editors—in all things at the South, Northern-born men are the most intensely Southern Southerners there. Pugnacious and self-conceited old Dr. Johnson once dreamed that he had an argument with some one in which he was defeated. We all remember how he consoled himself on awaking in this defeated condition: "At least, Sir, it was I myself, at last, who furnished my imaginary opponent with all the arguments with which he defeated me!" The North may flatter itself or bewail itself on the fact as it please, but, in a goodly measure, the desperation of Southern resistance was owing to muskets and pens in Northern hands under the flag of the Confederacy, New England wit and New England resolve where raged the battle fiercest in council or in field.

"I was born in Columbia, South Carolina, Sir," Dr. Peel had one day replied to Mr. Neely. Dr. Peel was a dark, super-looking man, almost ducal in dress and bearing, and the words were spoken with his black eye full upon Mr.

Neely, and in tones, to Mr. Neely's ear, so distinct and regal! "I am a prince of the blood, Sir," would scarce have sounded nobler. Ah, how mean New Hampshire, and how plebeian Mr. Neely to himself in comparison!

By no one was Mrs. Bowles congratulated, that day after the bells, in her parlor, more cordially than by Mr. Neely. No one had a brighter smile or a more hearty grasp of the hand on the occasion. If there was any defect in Mr. Neely it was that he was too glad, too fervent. But this one thing, brought with him from his bracing mountains, Mr. Neely could not unlearn; this one Southern thing he had not yet learned—to be still. Not that Southerners are not demonstrative enough, but then they are quiet withal; and this Mr. Neely could not be.

"A most wonderful victory, Madam," said Mr. Neely, rubbing his hands; "the complete rout of the Yankees. You will observe in the dispatch, Beauregard remarked on the spot that it was a more complete thing than Manassas even. I rejoice sincerely in it."

And no doubt Mr. Neely did. He opened his school with prayer every morning, and never had he failed since Secession to insert a petition therein for the victory of the South, and for "the speedy and total defeat of our cruel and implacable foes." Of late he had got into the custom of making little addresses to his school, descriptive of the wickedness of the North and of the glorious and successful revolution in which the South was embarked. As to giving the boys a holiday after the good news of last night, he would certainly have done that if the boys had only come to school that morning; which, however, they did not do, having voted themselves a holiday already, and altogether irrespective of Mr. Neely—the fact being that Mr. Neely was the most thoroughly governed individual in the school. "Old Neely?" any boy would indignantly exclaim on being remonstrated with on some special act of insubordination to his teacher, "why, old Neely is a Yankee!"

Yes, it was hard, very hard! No man could have been an earlier Secessionist or a more consistent Secessionist than the schoolmaster. His whole language had from the outset been of answering and unmitigated hostility to the North. Other men would venture to make exceptions in favor of "some, at least, it is to be hoped—some, however few," at the North; Mr. Neely could not in conscience make any such exceptions. In teaching his boys History he constantly kept up the striking parallel in their minds between the Revolution of '76 and that in which the South was now engaged. He required compositions from every pupil old enough to write them upon the topic of the day, and applauded most highly those in which the Yankees were most terribly demolished. "Nero was the Tyrant of the Roman Empire, and Lincoln is the Tyrant of America," "Only Powder and Steel can cure the North of its Phrenzy," "Jefferson Davis is the Washington of our New Nation," and the like, were the copies set by him for his pupils. More than once highly patriotic songs had appeared in the Somerville Star signed N., which Mr. Neely had never denied as being from his pen. In fine, if Mr. Neely left any thing undone in proof of his sincere devotion to the cause of Secession it is impossible to imagine what that thing was. When he arrived in Somerville he possessed a Daguerrotypes of his father. A large one and a very good one it was, and an honest, fatherly, clear-conscience old patriarch the elder Mr. Neely seemed to be therefrom. Shall it be recorded here that the son deliberately broke to atoms and stamped, in his own words, "to finders" beneath his heel that likeness in the first fervors of the war? Shall it be added that of this he afterward boasted with all phrases suitable in such a deed? Artistically considered this ought not to be mentioned, on account of its improbability, yet was it simple fact.

And yet? True as it is of the teacher it is equally so of all other Northern-born Secessionists—they never were thoroughly trusted and believed in as being really "sound."

"It isn't nature," Mrs. Juggins was continually remarking to husband and visitors, "for any body to turn so agin their own people. You needn't tell me what good Secessionists that Lamam an' Neely an' the rest are, I don't believe a bit in them myself. And there's Brother Barker," said Mrs. Juggins, after a long pause, approaching the subject with reluctance. "Oh, I know how well and how much he talks. But—somehow—yes, Ah, well, don't it 'pear to you Brother Barker is too feverish like, kind o' over-hot?" and Mrs. Juggins looks you anxiously and inquiringly in the eyes at she knits.

And this was the universal feeling whether expressed or not. The more violently Southern Northern men were, only that much the more did people murmur, "Only put on; you'll see one day if it isn't!" It matters not how violent and consistent in his course Lamam, for instance, was; though mortal could say no more against the North and for the South than he; though he harped perpetually on the infancy and the merited halter of "the traitors among us," at least people were only suspicious—"Yankees all of them!"—to the greatest degree. Had any one of them been detected in the worst practices of the incendiary and Abolitionist, one universal chorus would have broken forth, "A Yankee! I always knew it!"

Mrs. Bowles was pleased to see Mr. Neely, however, and conversed eagerly with him on the glorious news—an unconscious condescension running through all her manna, as of a South Carolina lady conversing with a New Englander—a condescension not more assumed, in her part than taken for granted on his. To a female born and living at the North would or could Mr. Neely have been so obsequious, so deferential. It is an unpleasant thing to write, but it is a fact.

But in all Mr. Neely's conversation, though he addressed himself mainly to Mrs. Bowles, it was with chief reference to Miss Alice that he spoke. The truth is, the man really admired and loved the beautiful and queenly girl as he never loved or admired a woman before. There was a majesty in her erect bearing, a dignity inherited from her stately old father the Major, in her reserve, a serene soul in her full and steady eye, which was more to him even than her glowing cheek and coral lip. It is a shame to hint such a thing in America, but it was the old story of plebeian and aristocrat, squire of low degree aspiring to the hand of noble dame. Marrying a South Carolinian! It was next to being born there!

"And it must be a great gratification to you, Miss Alice," he said, at last, "that the flag you presented that day to the regiment was in the fight." And Mr. Neely went back in memory to the day of its presentation, Alice standing on the platform with the colors in her hand, saying her few thrilling words more with eye and cheek and attitude than with tongue, a goddess to him from that moment henceforth and forever. For the moment Alice had endeavored to believe herself then and there a sort of "heroine of '76" over again. But, under all this cry of "Our Country!" "Our Glorious Revolution!" "Our gallant Army!" "Our despicable foes!" there steadily ran this fact, we are fighting for our negroes. Ugly thought, we are fighting for our—slavery! No, not a thought, an unpleasant but undefined consciousness thereof.

"Yes," said Alice; "but I am more anxious to know the fate of the men that received it, just now, than any thing else." Whereupon Mr. Neely skillfully turned the conversation upon their bravery, mingled with reasonings to show why he did not think, at least sincerely hoped, they had not suffered much in the contest. "And you have not heard, you tell me, from your son, Captain Rutledge Bowles?" he said at last, turning to Mrs. Bowles.

"Only that he is at the head of his company in Virginia," said Mrs. Bowles.

"I suppose we shall be compelled to inflict another Manassas upon them there. Perhaps one more defeat of the kind may satisfy them," said Mr. Neely.

"But Judge Bowles was then in Charleston," said Mrs. Bowles. "In obedience to orders. He assures me in his last letter that he will be in the next battle, orders or no orders, wherever he thinks it likely to take place. I regret that he and many of the youth of South Carolina can not feel as satisfied with Mr. Davis and his arrangements as could be wished. It is a little hard that South Carolina should be second to Mississippi, taking the lead in the revolution the way my native State did. It is only for the present, however."

Thereupon Mr. Neely entered upon a glowing eulogy of South Carolina, adroitly wended, too, in the midst of which the bell rang for supper.

"Really, I had completely forgotten myself," he said, as he arose. "Only when one gets to speaking of South Carolina—"

"Stay to supper with us, Mr. Neely," said Mrs. Bowles, with a warmer manner than when he first came, and with perhaps somewhat more of hesitation and of apology for possible intrusion than was necessary. Mr. Neely at last consented.

"You will excuse me, Mr. Arthur," said Mrs. Bowles, when the family were seated at table, "but you are really looking as if you had just risen from a severe illness." It was a fact; the pale, care-worn face of Edward Arthur contrasted strongly at the moment with the rosy and happy countenance of Mr. Neely by his side.

"Yes, Madam, I had no sleep last night," was the reply of that gentleman as he endeavored to assume a more cheerful manner.

"Why, as to that, none of us slept last night," said the schoolmaster. "Glorious news! Was it not, Mr. Arthur?"

Oh, the temptation, the pressing, the almost hourly temptation to lying those days! What is the use of talking about dissembling, evading, getting out of telling the truth, and all that? Satan is Satan, God is God, a lie is a lie! And the lying, downright lying, on the part of the Union people at the South—multitudes of them at least—was one of the most terrible demoralizations of the times. If ever necessity, the fear of consequences, the unparalleled nature of the case, justified people in this, of course they were completely justified. But can any thing make a wrong to be a right? Does God ever so place truth that he isat sin? Alice was eating cake at the moment, but how keenly she was on the alert for Mr. Arthur's reply, though she raised not her eyes.

"Has any confirmation of it as yet arrived, Mr. Neely?" was Mr. Arthur's calm reply.

"Confirmation? It needs no confirmation!" exclaimed astonished Mr. Neely. "The victory is one we already knew would take place whenever the armies joined. The only question was one of place and day."

"You must pardon me if I seem to cast a gloom on the matter, but I frankly confess that my dominant feeling since the news came is one of sorrow," said the minister.

"Sorrow, Mr. Arthur!" exclaimed Mrs. Bowles and Mr. Neely in the same breath.

But not for nothing had Mr. Neely been born in New England. "Why, Mr. Barker is of your profession, and I saw him last night listening to Colonel Ret Roberts, and I really believe he was the happiest man there!"

Mr. Neely was right. Brother Barker was there, and was as happy, to say the least, as any man on the ground. So happy, that in drinking down the Colonel's speech he had no time on the instant even to object mentally to its innumerable oaths, and to its blood-thirsty atrocities. Yes, no man laughed louder, or applauded every sentiment with both of his long hands more eagerly than he. What though Secession had arrested at once the operation and income of every Bible Society, Tract Institution, Missionary Cause—domestic and foreign—as well as every other Benevolent Association in the land; what though it was pouring over the land, through the prostrated embankments of Law, Order, Religion, and Society such a torrent of Profanity, Sabbath Desertion, Intemperance, and all kindred vices as the most gloomy-minded had never dared even to fear: what though ministers were starving at their ministry, or driven from it into other pursuits, churches were being split into fragments and dissolved, all religious worship being comparatively abandoned save to hear political sermons and proclamation prayers; members of churches and even ministers backsliding and apostatizing by multitudes; what though the minds of worldly men were being hardened a thousandfold more in irreligion; even the coming generation blasted in advance by the arrested instruction, and the inevitable corruption, mind and heart, by the times, of the very children. What though the cause dearest, avowedly, to Mr. Barker of all on earth—that of the Gospel—was perishing beneath the deadly influences of war in the land—civil war—yet was Brother Barker the loudest, and happiest, and heartiest among all beneath Colonel Ret Roberts's eloquence that night.

Ah, if Brother Barker had been the only minister of the sort! It was indeed the hour of the Saviour's crucifixion afresh. Never speak of the soldiers gambling at his feet, spotted with his falling blood, nor of the taunting multitude, nor of the darkening sky above and the earth quivering beneath, next to the hiding of the Father's face, the darkest, bitterest thing was that, even of Christ's disciples how nearly may we come to reading: "They all forsook him, and fled." We speak not of you who cling all the closer to your Master, with separatism from the reigning spirit of the world, with strong crying to God during all that hour of darkness. You who, heartily with the North then, or as heartily with the South then, kept most heartily of all to Christ—one with each other at least in that—since that, North and South, your number seemed so small in those days of Satan's hour, and the Power of Darkness!

"For my part I do not wonder Mr. Barker should rejoice," said Mr. Neely, after having waited in vain for the minister's reply. "With him, I believe the entire North to have become thoroughly infidel. This is a religious war—a war for Scripture doctrine in regard to Slavery against Abolitionism and all the other infidelisms of the North. Mr. Barker rejoices in the defeat of the North as in the defeat of irreligion itself—so do I."

"Mr. Neely," said Alice at this juncture, "how then about England and old Scotland—all Protestant Europe?"

"I do not exactly understand your question, Miss Alice," said Mr. Neely, intensely on the alert.

"I mean, only for argument sake, you know," said Alice, "does Protestant Europe stand on this question with the North or with the South?"

"Really, I am not sure," began Mr. Neely. But he saw that Alice knew, and knew that he knew, the facts of the case. "With the North, I believe," he added, under the stress of her clear and steady eye.

"And are they all infidel?" began Alice.

"I tell you what I frankly think; I mean I will frankly say what I really and truly believe, and that is, that almost the whole Christian Church is becoming infidel, Jacobinical. By Jacobinical notions I mean the old French notions of freedom and equality."

"I think I know what Jacobin means," said Alice, her eyes still bent with inquiry upon him.

"In this strife, Miss Alice, between Jacobinism, then, and Conservatism, between infidelity and the Gospel, in fact, I do believe that there is only one spot on the globe in which the pure and genuine Gospel lingers, and that is in the South. I wish to foster no one," added Mr. Neely, "but of all the South I do believe that piety, the purest and most strictly in accordance with the Bible—Old Testament as well as New—is to be found in South Carolina. I myself was born at the North," continued Mr. Neely, with engaging frankness; "but, if one may say such a thing, I would give millions to have been born, of all the world, in South Carolina."

Yes, Mr. Neely actually said just that! Mrs. Bowles cordially approved the sentiment, and assured Mr. Neely how highly she felt flattered. Alice never raised her eyes from her plate.

"Therefore," said Mr. Neely, after some further conversation, "if I, a Northern man, rejoice so in the success of Southern arms, I am sure you must, Mr. Arthur."

is meant when the dispatch says that Beauregard fell back from Shiloh some twenty miles to Corinth. I am confident of the gallantry of our soldiers; but why fall back?"

Thereupon Mr. Neely hastened to explain matters, showing that it was a kind of military strategy almost invariably adopted by victorious armies. Alice listened, but replied not.

"Oh, you mustn't mind Alice, Mr. Neely," said Mrs. Bowles, at length. "She is a willful girl, and she has an independent habit of her own. She is always endeavoring to form her own conclusions on every subject. When she once gets a notion in her head it is impossible to reason with her. She reminds me more and more of her father, Major Bowles. But, Alice, do let us have some music. We are not tired of Dixie yet—what a low name for the South—or the Bonnie Blue Flag—any thing."

"What do you say to Yankee Doodle, or Hail Columbia, or the Star-spangled Banner, Mr. Neely?" said Alice, looking back upon that gentleman, with her hands upon the keys of the instrument.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ON THE FASHIONABLE COURTESY HALL.—"Dear me," said old Mrs. Gals, "why nowadays all the young gals is light headed."

A NEW NAME FOR A BEAUREGARD.—"Miss Gals and Son."

"How that wicked man can go on in their shirt!" exclaimed a good but unscrupulous old lady; "it only takes her seconds to fight a duel!"

Contented people are always happy, they do so enjoy themselves.

A lady, complaining how rapidly time stole away, said, "Alas! I am ever thirty." "Do not fret at it, Madam, for you will get further from that frightful epoch every day."

Why are the English people like the act of reasoning?—Because they are a very busy nation.

When is it useless to try to borrow a book?—When it is lost.

The following story is told of a father of the church. At an academic dinner a debate arose as to the one of the red in bringing up children. The doctor took the affirmative, and the chief opponent was a young minister, whose reputation for veracity was not high. He maintained that parents often do harm to their children by unjust punishment, from not knowing the facts of the case. "Why," said he, "the only time my father whipped me was for telling the truth." "Well," returned the doctor, "it cured you of it, didn't it?"

"God bless will show itself," as the old lady said when she was struck with the colic of her own.

"Mother, where's the pot?" "A pig's head and trotter, son." Little Mary being of an inquisitive turn she got peering in the pot, when she saw one of the trotters in the pig's mouth. "Mother, mother!" she cried, "it has the trotter!" "Oh, mother, if you don't come quick the pig will eat all the trotters!"

Annexed Ward tells a good story concerning the production of the Lady of Lyons at the Salt Lake City theatre: "An aged Norman arose and went out with his twenty-four wives, eagerly stating that he wouldn't sit and see a play where a man made such a mixed line over one woman."

Why is John Digger's boy larger than his father?—Because he is a little digger.

MRS. AND WATER.—A lad, on delivering his wife a few marriage vows in a neighboring city, was asked why the milk was so warm. "I don't know," he replied, with much simplicity, "unless they put warm water into it instead of cold."

John Randolph met an enemy on the street one day, who refused to give him half the sidewalk, saying that he never turned out for a race. "Oh," said Randolph, stopping aside and politely raising his hat; "pass on, Sir."

To what tribe do Scotch Jews belong?—Mac-Absent.

A letter was mailed in one of our post-offices the other day that had no postage-stamp on it, but in place of the stamp had the following written on one corner of the envelope: "Mr. Postmaster, don't charge me postage on this; the stamp wouldn't stick, so I tore the thing up."

Why did Adam when alone find the day very long?—Because it was always passing without him.

"I am glad this coffee don't owe me any thing," said a book-keeper to his wife the other morning at breakfast. "Why so?" was the response. "Because I don't believe it would ever settle."

"Hullo, Bright! what's clock is it, and where's the chicken-pot?" "It's eight, Sir."

An exchange gives reasons for not publishing a poem (which is as follows): "The rhythm sounds like partridges rattling over a barn floor, while some lines appear to have been measured with a yard-stick, and others with a ten-foot pole."

"The next time I catch you alone, Tom Wilkins, I'll give you a good thrashing!" said a ruffianly bully of the play-ground to a well-looking boy. "Well," replied the boy, significantly replying Tom, "I ain't after no right show, as I generally leave my feet and face with me."

Woman's Mission.—"Oh, mission."

A cigarette is said to be a perfect incarnation of Capital, as she keeps her head in a quiver.

THE CURS QUARTER.—"How's your old?"

It has been discovered that (Huckle) hold a leg as well as a military office in Venice. He was a lawyer-general.

What is the worst seat a man can sit on?—Self-esteem.

A warning needed at all fashionable soirées.—"Look out for the joint!"

NEW AXES.—A thorn in the bush is worth two in the hand.

"Tilly," said a mother to her daughter, who had seen but five summers, "what should you do without your mother?" "I should just on every day just such a dress as I wanted," was the prompt reply.

"Can you see any thing in my eye—it feels very sore?" asked a lady, good-for-nothing student of Oliver Wendell Holmes. "I can see a very bad girl," was the reply of the professor, who never likes to be fancy when he has his professional garments on.

VIEWS IN THE HOLY LAND.

THE views of Jerusalem and of other places intimately associated in our minds with the life of our Saviour presented on pages 168 and 169 are new and interesting. We shall briefly notice the several topics of interest connected with our illustrations.

OF JERUSALEM we give two separate views. How different the Jerusalem of to-day from the City of the Great King in the days of HIRSH and PHARAI! Within the walls—if we except perhaps the Temple area, that one grand spot of surpassing interest in Jerusalem—there is not a street which either the Saviour or his apostles ever trod. The present roadways, if even they follow the old lines, are above the rubbish which "many a fathom deep" covers the ancient roadway. There is not one house standing on which we can feel certain that our Lord ever gazed, unless it be the old tower at the Jaffa Gate. Only the heavens above and the hills around remain the same. The site of the old Temple was never open to any but Moslems until after the Crimean War. No remains of the old Temple exist above ground. Every atom of its dust, as far as we can discover, has been swept away. Literally not one stone has been left upon another. Its site, however, can be determined with almost perfect accuracy. The huge old cisterns which supplied the Temple with water still remain. Upon this spot Jesus Christ taught and wrought miracles. This is the Terebinth of the universe. The dust of which rain is made alone remains and covers all. Not an object meets the eye on which kings and prophets with Jesus and his apostles gazed except the Mount of Olives and the blue sky. Yet it may be those holy feet have trod the steps of that old passage; and his lips may have drunk from the waters that "are glad the city of God."

Outside of the walls the Valley of Kidron separates Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives. This is also known as the Valley of Jehoshaphat. Another valley carving in from the west is the Valley of Hinnom, or Tophet. Perhaps there is no place on earth where so many thoughts of human crime and misery suggest themselves as among the rocky slopes of this valley. The horrible Moloch fires which consumed many an accursed child once blazed among these stones. It was on the opposite side, on the Hill of Corruption, that Sennacherib set up his idols in the very sight of the Temple. In this valley is the Accellara, or "Field of Blood," where, into a caverned pit, now built over, bodies were cast, and laid there under a sprinkling of dirt to suffer corruption. It has been closed for a century, but will ever be associated with the traitor. No wonder the valley of Hinnom was made the type of hell!

The village of BETHANY, once the home of MARY and MARTHA, and the place where CHRIST raised LAZARUS from the dead, consists now of brown mud hovels. It is the quiet shade of confusion, dogs, and poverty.

Of all the places associated with Scripture history BETHLEHEM is, on the whole, the most picturesque. The three convents attached to the Church of the Nativity, which crown the summit and the ridge on which the village is built, wear the massive and dignified look of an old medieval fortress. The terraces, which, like gigantic stairs, descend to the lower valleys and the small alluvial plains and corn-fields, have a fair bold sweep, and are rich in olives and fruit trees, the shade and verdure of which relieve the eye from the dazzling glare of the white limestone rocks and soil.

Although Jesus was born in Bethlehem, the Holy Family, immediately after the presentation in the temple, or forty days after the birth of the child, removed to Nazareth. It was here, probably, that the visit of the Magi was made, and not, as is generally supposed, in Bethlehem.

Nazareth of Galilee was the home of CHRIST in his boyhood. Here he labored at his humble trade for many years. Here in this town—among these hills—Jesus was brought up as a child, and was subject to his meek and loving mother, "full of grace," here as a boy "He grew in wisdom and in stature," here for many years he labored as a man for his daily bread; here he lived as an acquaintance, neighbor, and friend. For years he gazed on this landscape, and walked along these mountain paths, and worshipped God among these solitudes.

The Church of the HOLY SEPULCHRE, in which CHRIST is said to have been buried in a large one, including under one roof many chapels, in which different "communities" worship. The Holy Sepulchre is not what many people suppose it to be. It is not a cave, or a hole in a rock; but a small marble chapel, which rises up from the flat stone floor.

GREENWOOD CEMETERY.

IT is now more than twenty years since Greenwood Cemetery was opened for the purposes of interment. It is now the largest and most beautiful burial-place on the continent. A multitude of beautiful inclosures, and several hundred tombs and monuments, involving a vast aggregate expense, may now be seen there—pleasing memorials, in the main, of taste and wealth—certainly of grief and pious love. The tombs, for which the slopes of Greenwood afford frequent opportunity, are of every style of architecture. The monuments are various in design, from the modest tablet to the magnificent pillar or massive sarcophagus. The great number of attractions connected with this Cemetery have made it an object of interest to visitors second to none in Brooklyn.

The grounds of this Cemetery, now comprising four hundred acres, are situated in Brooklyn, on Gowanus Heights, about two and a half miles from the Atlantic Ferry. They are beautifully ventilating and diversified, presenting continual changes of surface and scenery, and are remarkably adapted to the purpose for which they are appropriated. The elevated portions of the Cemetery afford numerous and interesting views, embracing the Bay and Harbor of New York, with its islands and forts, the cities of New York and Brooklyn, the shores of the North and East Rivers, New Jersey, Staten Island, the Quarantine, numerous towns and villages in every direction, together with a view of the Atlantic Ocean, reaching from Sandy Hook to the Pavilion at Rockaway. The various avenues in the grounds (exclusive of paths) extend sixteen miles.

THE ENTRANCE, which we illustrate on page 172, has only been completed a short time. It is on the northern side of the Cemetery. It is situated at a point lying nearest to the vast population of New York and Brooklyn. The gateway is an imposing and elaborate Gothic edifice, solidly constructed of the best New Jersey sandstone. Two passage-ways through the massive structure are appropriated—one to funerals, the other to visitors. A room for the latter to rest in; and free-offices for the Cemetery business, occupy the lower part of the building. Upward it terminates in three lofty pinnacles. There is a bell for the passing procession, and a clock to strike the hours. The deep, triangular recesses of the pediments above the two gateways are filled in, on both sides, with groups of sculpture formed of the Nova Scotia sandstone. These four groups represent the Saviour's Entombment; His Resurrection; the Resurrection of the Widow's Son, and the Raising of Lazarus. Still higher up, on the four shields which surmount the quadrifolds, are figures in relief of Faith, of Hope, of Memory, and of Love.

UPS AND DOWNS.

WHEN I was still a boy of eighteen, going to school punctually every day, as all boys do who intend to some time be great authors like Mr. Tupper, there was a young lady of the same age with myself moving in society, and her name was Christine Bell. Of course there is a vast difference between a school-boy of eighteen and a young lady of the same age in society. Christine was a beauty, and she had several lovers. One of these was a prosperous young grocer by the name of Hiram Jackson, whose first name was familiarly abbreviated to HI, and whose last name to JACK, by the simple-hearted villagers who sat about his grocery in the evenings; so that the boys, when angry and disrespectful, were in the habit of sarcastically calling him High-Low-Jack, whether it was this title which discouraged Christine, or whether she felt too proud to marry a grocer (her father was a dealer in dry goods), or whether she had other and better reasons for her behavior, suffice it that the young lady's name is now Christine Bell Brown. As my name is Brown, and Brown is a very common name indeed, you may naturally conclude that Christine is now my wife. Correct, she is my wife.

It may be unnecessary to explicitly state after this that Hiram Jackson's courting of Christine was unsuccessful. Nevertheless, to avoid any possible misconception, I will so state. It was unsuccessful, and he did not marry Christine. He eventually married another lady, and a very good wife she makes him. He left our village (Milltown, New York State). I am disposed to be thus particular with my reader in all this matter of proper names, because I wish him to understand and believe that I am relating facts, and that I stand ready to shake hands with Mr. Graugrid himself right here on the threshold of my story, and he went out into the world to seek his fortune.

He was an ambitious young man, with a soul above molasses and tea, and he aspired to reach a high place in the world. So he turned his attention to ballooning, and soon had his wish. He became noted throughout the country as a successful aeronaut. He made a great deal of money and a great deal of noise, and all last made a voyage to the Sandwich Islands in a balloon. He came to New York at the end of several years, and built a monstrous hole in the ground, up by Central Park, and put a high board fence around it to keep people from falling into the hole without paying the admission fee. I was at this time residing in New York, and addressing rapidly toward the top of this hill upon whose summit stands the temple in which Mr. Tupper wanders, the envy of his contemporaries. I was a writer for the press, and had recently returned from the sea-side, where I had been representing the literary world as correspondent of the Times newspaper.

Impelled by my affection for Hiram Jackson—now Professor Jackson—and also by some little curiosity respecting the inside of that great hole that he had built and surrounded with a fence, I went to see him one very hot day, when the city was a fearful contrast to the cool delight of the sea-side—and I found him. He was glad to see me, and I happened to apologize for having married Christine.

"Say no more about it, Mr. Brown," said he; "I forgive you. You meant me no harm. Besides that, she filled me before you knew her. How's your babies? mine are well, thank you."

"How many?"

"Four. What's that sticking out of your pocket?"

"My note-book," said I. "I have been scribbling for the Times a little of late, and of course I had to have a note-book."

"You don't say!" cried Jackson, with much cordiality. "A reporter for the Times? Why, how you are getting on, ain't you? The last I heard of you you had got out a volume of poems in a yellow cover. I congratulate you on your improved prospects. I have a great respect for the Times, and I was going to ask Mr. Raymond if he wouldn't like to take a ride in my balloon. But I have neglected it, and—By-the-way, that reminds me: wouldn't you like to go up?"

"Why yes," said I. "I should like to go up if I were sure of coming down in as good condition as I find myself at present."

"All right! You shall go up at the end of the rope. It's a thousand feet long, that rope. It'll pull you down again all safe." There was a sort of windlass run by horse-power that let the balloon up and down. "Pretty sight, ain't it?" the Professor added, with a yawn. He was used to it, you see. "That's the way it is, from morning to night; up and down—up and down!"

"Up and down!" I echoed, absently, as I stood watching the balloon dwindle out of sight, or so nearly out of sight that it appeared no bigger than a pumpkin.

"They're coming down now," said Professor Jackson. "Will you go up this time?"

"I suppose it's perfectly safe?"

"Why, you're not afraid, are you? You sometimes ride in railroad cars, don't you?"

"When I am compelled to I do," said I.

"Well! what proportion of danger do you really suppose there exists, now, between a balloon ride and a railroad ride?"

I thought a minute before I replied:

"I'm not accurate at estimates, but as near as I can put it, in round numbers, I should say the chances were about fourteen million to one in favor of the balloon."

"That's not the precise figure," said Professor Jackson; "but it's very near it—it's very near it."

"Am I to go up alone?"

"No. As you are a little timid, and as I want you to take some notes—not to put in the Times, I wouldn't have you think—I'll send a policeman up with you to protect you."

"How can I thank you enough?" I murmured.

"But I comprehend, it is for Christine's sake."

"Oh, bother Christine!" ejaculated Jackson, moving toward the balloon, which was now fastened to the platform at the bottom of the great hole. "Come!"

The policeman got into the car. It is called a car, but in point of fact it is a basket. Then a young lady got in. This was more than I had bargained for, but it awakened my manly breast to a sense of its duty. What a young lady dare do should I hesitate about?

I at once got into the car. The grapnels were thrown off. We began to go up, and I began to take notes. Here are the notes; when you have read the story through you will not wonder that I failed to put them in the Times.

We are off. See tips (meaning the balloon).

"Oh! oh!" [by the young lady]. The hand down below strikes up. "Who will Care for Mother Now?" Ah! who indeed? Thoughtful hand! Magnificent panorama dawns upon the sight. She tips [the balloon], Skittish feeling. Nam—Kitchick good word. Wind blows us over the Park. That lousy bird, etc. Lakes, etc. Map of the earth. Difficult to realize. Minutes down there. Look like ants. Wave their handkerchiefs tons—Ways a lead-pencil to them. It drops. Watch it dwindle to a speck. The two rivers crossing out of a cloud-bank in north. Water looks like fog-gary. Bay dotted with ships. Narrows in plain view. Young lady says glad she came. So am I. Want to stay here all summer. Delightfully cool. Propensity to policemen—cut the rope and take a nice long ride. "Can't see it" [by policeman]. Took his number. 444. Says his name is Fish, out of his element. Young lady excited and talkative. "Where would we go if you cut the rope?" I propose to cut it and see. Policeman threatens to arrest me. Twitch! Balloon going down. Rather go up. Ah, what a vulgar world we are! Band plays "Hail to the Chief." Can't mean the policeman.

"How are you, Professor?" I cried, as I got out of the car and felt my feet on my native earth once more. I really felt as if I had been an incalculable distance since I saw him last.

"Like it?" he asked.

"Oh, amazingly!"

"But that's nothing compared to a detached ascension, you know," said the Professor, with professional pride. "Nothing at all."

"How I should like to make a detached ascension!" I cried, with the greatest enthusiasm.

Mr. Jackson said nothing.

"Do you make detached ascensions much?" I asked.

"Oh, frequently," said he.

"And when do you make the next?"

"To-morrow, probably."

"How I should like to go!"

The Professor made no reply.

"So you go to-morrow?" I remarked, as we walked up the stairway leading out of the hole.

"If it's pleasant," said he.

"I wish I could go with you!"

"Come and see me again, Mr. Brown," said Jackson, shaking hands. "And remember me to your lady."

I naturally concluded after that that he did not want me to go with him. But I could not help thinking about it all the way home, and resolving that, one way or another, I would have a detached ascension before the summer was out.

After tea that night I talked so long with Christine about my ride in the air that when I thought about preparing my note for the Times it was too late. So I ate a large piece of mince-pie and went to bed.—The reader may think my receding that I ate a piece of mince-pie is a piece of domestic egotism, and has nothing to do with the story. But I think it has a good deal to do with the story.

I was just dozing off when I was awakened by a loud rapping at my chamber-door.

"Who's there?" I cried.

"It's me, Sir—wid a letter," responded the voice of our Bridget. "A man jist bring it to the basement-door, Sir." Bridget continued, as I opened the chamber-door a crack and took the letter in. "He said for me to bring it up at wanst, Sir, bein' it was important."

I shut the door and opened the note. It said:

"Dear Brown,—One of the gentlemen who was going with me to-morrow on the detached voyage is sick, and I am glad to be able to offer you his seat in the car. We start early. Be on hand at 6 A.M. Yours truly, HIRAM JACKSON."

I AM by no means fond of seeing the sun rise, but I was up early for this once, and the appointed hour found me on hand. Professor Jackson was down at the bottom of the hole, superintending the preparations for departure. The great balloon was readying in the light morning breeze, impatient of the grapnels that held it to the earth. Half a dozen bags of sand were being put into the car, and various creature comforts in bottles and baskets. There was also a hand-telescope, and on the floor of the roomy car lay a mysterious something—I knew not what—covered with a long canvas case.

"You're on time, Mr. Brown," said the Professor, shaking hands.

"Always am," said I.

"Well, we'll start right off."

"Where's the other man?" I asked.

"You are the other man," said Jackson.

"But the other?" I persisted.

"Oh, hang it, there is no other! Come, are you ready?"

Was it only my imagination? I could not tell; but it seemed to me as if he asked me this question in a tone such as I should suppose a hangman—rather, say some brutal executioner of the time of Robespierre—would use in addressing his victim. But I made no remark, and got into the car. The grapnels were let loose, and the balloon shot up like a rocket.

"Good God!" cried one of the attendants, looking up after us, "who ever see a balloon tear up like that afore!"

The world was sinking away under us with appalling rapidity. Professor Jackson was already untying the string from the neck of the first sand-bag, to empty its contents and increase our rate of speed. Out tumbled the sand, and almost instantly sank into invisibility. Jackson threw the bag after its contents.

"Why do you waste your bags that way, Jackson?" said I.

"It don't signify," he muttered. "I sha'n't want 'em any more."

I began to watch his movements with a deep and fascinating interest. He was immediately clawing at the neck of another bag, which followed its predecessor. My head swam with dizziness, occasioned by the motion of the balloon.

"How high do we go, Professor Jackson, before we begin to move in a decided current?"

"We sail in no currents this day, my friend," he answered, in a gruff tone, still untying the sand-bag with feverish eagerness. "We are going up."

"Up?" I whispered, a dark fear stealing over me.

"Ay, up!"

"How high up?"

"To the moon—to the blue haze—to any where!" he shouted, as he stood erect in the car, and heeled the last bag out without emptying it of its contents, impatient of his nervous fingers.

"Are you mad?" I cried.

"Mad? No, I'm not a bit mad."

"I have gone high enough. Let us go down."

"Look here, Brown. You've no doubt read a cock-and-bull story about a mad aeronaut, and how he tried to throw his fellow-passenger out of the car. Now, don't turn pale like a great almy! I tell you I'm as sane as you are, or as any body is. I'm not going to throw you out to lighten the car."

"For God's sake let us go down!"

"I'm not even going to throw any of these bottles or baskets out. I tell you I'm perfectly sane; and I'm going to keep these things here to provision us on our long voyage—for though we're now going up at the rate of a mile a minute, it'll be a long voyage."

"In what direction?" I again interjected.

"Up! up! And I'm going to keep you in the car for companionship sake. I had a reason for preferring you to the /vicious man, who was going with me first: you married Christine Bell. I wanted her myself, and I swore, years ago, that whoever got her I would take him away from her somehow. That's all there is about it, old Brown—so make yourself comfortable, since you can't get out. You have seen the last of old mother earth; those clouds below us there have shut it from sight forever. Ha! ha! ha!" he laughed, with intense glee, leaning over the side of the car and rubbing his lean, yellow hands briskly; "this is glorious, isn't it? Let's have a bottle open. Where's that beastly cork-screw? Much good that'll do you, my friend!"

The last remark was elicited by a spring I made for the valve-rope, as he leaned over in search of the cork-screw. I caught the rope and pulled it. It broke and fell down in my hands.

"I cut the strands last night, my boy. I knew what you would be up to," said he.

I began to appreciate the dangers of my position in terrible earnest. Let me be calm and collect my thoughts. So highly rarefied was the thin atmosphere which we were cleaving with steady upward bound that even now I breathed with difficulty. How many minutes more would it probably be ere we reached a height where existence must end? Had I not heard, or read, or dreamed, of one in a like danger with this, who had clambered up the net-work of the balloon and opened the valve with his hands? It was a fearfully dangerous feat, but some effort I must make. I threw off my coat, though I was chilled through with sudden cold.

"What now?" cried Jackson. "You sha'n't do it! I'm as strong as two of you."

He seized me, as I was hastening to clamber up the rope, and pulled me back.

"Let go!" I yelled. "I won't be murdered."

He only laughed sneeringly, but held me fast. I made a fierce struggle, and succeeded in getting high enough to touch the swollen monster overhead. Whipping out my pocket-knife, I opened it with the aid of my teeth, and plunged it into the canvas. To my horror, the seam thus opened ran high up the balloon. The gas escaped with a sound like the rushing of a whirlwind. The great globe collapsed like a pricked bubble; the canvas fell downward with a flapping noise; and the next moment we were falling through space with furious rapidity.

"Dog! Fool! What have you done?" cried Jackson, springing upon me and grasping me about the throat. "I was only trying to frighten you. You have ruined me!"

He glared at me for a few seconds with bloodshot eyes, and then threw me from him. I fell upon the floor of the car.

"I will not go down!" he screamed. "I will not go! Oh, fool that I was! Why did I not go up without you, you beautiful upward? I am ruined—ruined!"

He looked down upon the white cloud-like to which we were now steadily drawing nearer and nearer.

"Up! up! I must go up! I will go up!" And with a sudden spring he bounded upward from the car; then fell down, yelling and cursing.

The clouds were passed and the earth dawned upon my view. A current swept me aside, and I saw the madman no more. It was with great difficulty I clung to the careering car, but the ropes helped me. I shifted onward toward my death. I should be mutilated beyond all recollection by the fall, I thought. Oh, what a ghastly fate!

Suddenly my eye fell upon the long, mysterious, canvas-covered package that I had observed when we left the earth. What it contained was still unknown to me. I hastily tore off the covering, and perceived the article within to be a something made of iron wires and silken silk. Closer inspection showed me that it was a parachute. What a thrill of joy ran through me as I made this discovery!

It was the work of a minute to open it. There was a handle which shut in among the wires through a socket, and at the end of the handle was a strong osken ring, capable of being grasped by the two hands. I grasped it, and leaped from the car, repelling it with my feet as a swimmer repels the boat from which he springs into the flood; at the same instant I spread the broad parachute to the air.

For a moment it was doubtful whether the structure would sustain the pressure of the air underneath, so great was the momentum with which I was descending; and I looked up at its wide canopy over my head with terrible interest as I hung suspended below.

"Thank Heaven!" I cried; "it stands the test! I shall be saved!"

I was now, I judged, only something like a thousand feet above the earth, and descending with comparative slowness. I began to speculate upon the prospect before me. I scarcely hoped to escape uninjured; but a broken leg was a mere hospital to contemplate after the perils with which I had been menaced.

My hands began to feel terribly the strain upon them. God give me strength to hold out to the last! A grating sound overhead startled me and I looked up. To my horror I saw the handle by which I clung slip out of the socket! The parachute passed in the air and I fell down, faster and faster each moment. Unable to endure the agony of sight I closed my eyes and awaited the inevitable death before me.

A frightful jar that seemed to wrench every bone in my body.

I opened my eyes to find that I had evidently fallen down my own chimney, for here I was in my own bedchamber, and my darling Christina yawningly waiting to know, my dear, what was the matter; and had I fallen out of bed, dear; and why didn't I open the door for Bridget, who had been knocking this half hour.

It is due to the reader to state that this last remark was a feminine exaggeration, for Bridget had not been knocking for more than half a minute.

From that day to this I have never felt the faintest desire to make a detached ascension again. I have had quite enough of it. Nor have I since seen Professor Jackson, though I have heard that he was getting on comfortably in his business. He is quite welcome to his business with its precarious ups and downs.

BET'S MATCH-MAKING.

The only time I ever tried match-making in my life was when I was seventeen, and I then so burned my fingers over the business that I took care never to meddle with it again. I was living at the time with my step-mother on her farm near Ballymena. My father was dead, and my step-mother did not like me. She had placed me for a time with a milliner in the town, but finding it expensive supporting me apart from her, had taken me away again. She was thinking of a second marriage, though I did not know it at the time. But this I did know—that she had written to some distant friends of my father in America, who had unwillingly consented to take me off her hands.

I don't think it would have been half as hard for me to have made up my mind to die; for I was a shy little thing, without a bit of courage to deal with strangers, and my heart was fit to burst at the thought of leaving the very few friends when I had to love, and my own little corner of the world, where the trees and the roads knew me. But I felt it would have to be done, and I lay awake all night after the letter arrived, trying to think how I should ever be brave enough to say good-by to my dear friend Gracie Byrne, and to Gracie's lover, Donnell M'Donnell.

Gracie was the cleverest of all Miss Doran's apprentices. She was an orphan without a friend to look after her, and she was the loveliest girl in the country. People said she was proud and vain, but I never could think she was either. She and I loved one another dearly, though I can not think what attracted her to poor little plain me. She had plenty of admirers, and she seemed to freely among them; but the only one to whom I would have given her with all my heart was Donnell M'Donnell. And, oh, dear! he was the very one whom she would not look at.

Donnell and I were great friends, and I had promised to do all I could to help him with Gracie. He was young and strong, and as bony a man as could be seen. He had a fine farm, all his own, some three miles across country from my step-mother's place. If Gracie would but marry him she should live like a lady, and drive into Ballymena on her own jaunting-car. But she was always saying that she would go away to London, and be a great "West-End" milliner. This terrified me badly, seeing that London is such a wicked place.

My step-mother was always crying out that Gracie would come to a sorrowful end, which made me wild; and as I lay awake that wretched night I thought a great deal about what might happen to her if she went away to London by herself, and she so handsome, and not having a friend at all. And I wished with all my strength that she would marry Donnell M'Donnell before I went away to America, which would ease my mind about her, and also about him. For I felt the greatest pity in the world for kind big Donnell's disappointment.

My step-mother was provoked at my sad face next day, and called me ungrateful. But when I cried bitterly she got a little kinder, and in the evening allowed me to go into Ballymena to see my friend Gracie. So toward sundown, when the snow was getting red upon the fences, I wrapped my shawl about me and set off for the town; sobbing loudly to ease my heart, all along the lonely road, where there was no one to hear me but the robins. The brown trees against the dusky red sky, the white swelling lines of the fields, the dark chimneys of the town on before me, were all blent in a dismal mass, when who should leap over a stile and stand beside me but Gracie's great lover, Donnell. I told him my eyes were only watering with the cold, and he turned and walked alongside of me for a good way, while we talked of Gracie of course. He was very angry at her, and said she was playing fast and loose with him, and making him the sport of the town and country. I took Gracie's part, and so we went on till we came to the last white gate on the road, and began to meet the townspeople. Then I told him I was going away, and he looked so vexed that I nearly cried again. I felt so glad to see him sorry.

"Well, little Bet," said he, "we must give you a good dance over in your big farm-house of ours before you go. And, in the mean time—" "I'll see to your business, Donnell," said I, smiling. "Never fear but I'll do your business to the last."

Then he shook my two hands till he nearly squeezed them into jelly, and left me. When I went into Miss Doran's it was past the work hour, and the girls were putting on their bonnets to go away; Gracie only was sitting close to the candle, putting the flowers on a ball-dress for one of the county ladies. She having the nicest taste, had always the honor of giving the finishing touches to the most particular work. She looked very tired, but oh, so handsome, with her pale cheek against the yellow light, and her dark head bending over a mass of white and rose-color tulle.

"A bad here," said she, "and a spray there, and then I have done. You'll come home with me and sleep. That cross step-mother of yours won't see you again to-night."

"Don't talk that way, Gracie," said I; "but I came intending to stay." And the work being finished we went home to her lodgings. A lovely bunch of flowers was lying on her table, and she laughed and blushed, and looked beautiful when she saw it.

"Who is that from, Gracie?" said I. "Donnell!"

"No indeed," said she, treading her head. But I was sure that was a fib, for she looked as happy as possible, lying resting herself in her arm-chair beside the fire while I set out the tea-things. She looked so glad, and the shabby room looking so snug, and our little tea-drinking being so cozy, I could not bear to tell her the bad news now, and began to set about Donnell's business.

"Gracie," said I, "I wish you would marry Donnell soon."

"Soon?" said she, opening her eyes and looking at me angrily. "I'll never marry him!"

"But you know, Gracie," said I, getting hot about it, "that you ought to marry him. He says—that is, I know—you have made him the laughing-stock of the country, and—" "Very fine!" cried she. "And so he has been complaining to you, has he?"

"I did not say that," said I; "but oh, Gracie, I know you like some one. I saw you smiling over a letter the other day, just the way you are smiling now."

"And what if I do?" said she, laughing and tossing her head; "that does not prove that it must be Donnell."

"There is no one else so good," said I, eagerly. "It could not be any one else."

"You my good," said she, staring at me. "I think you had better go and marry him yourself."

"If Oh Gracie!" said I, starting up and sitting down again, and beginning to cry. "I wanted to tell you that I am going to America."

You may be sure we talked no more about Donnell that night.

Donnell did not fail to keep his word about giving me a feast before I left the country. He invited three pipers to play, and half the country-side to dance. Gracie and I met at the cross-roads, and walked over to the farm together, she bringing a troop of beaux with her from the town. The farm is a dear old place, with cedar trees growing up round the house, and it looked so homely that frosty night. Donnell's mother met us at the door, and unpinned our shawls in her own room. Gracie looked beautiful, in a pretty new dress and bright ribbon. Donnell's mother stroked my hair with her hand, and stuck a bit of holly in the front of my black frock. She kept me with her after Gracie had gone down stairs, holding my hand, and asking me about my going to America. And the place felt so safe and warm, and she was so kind and motherly, after what I was accustomed to at home, that my heart got so sore I could scarcely bear it.

We had a great tea-drinking in the parlor, and then we went out to the kitchen, and the pipers fell to work, and Gracie was as amiable as possible to Donnell. But just in the middle of our dancing the latch of the back-door was lifted, and Squire Hannan, walked in in his top-boots.

"I wanted to speak to you on business, M'Donnell," he said, "but I will not disturb you now."

"Will you do us the honor of joining us, Sir?" said Donnell. Squire Hannan needed no second invitation. He was seen making his bow before Gracie, and Donnell saw no more of her smiles that night. She danced with the squire till it was time to go home, and then, after she had set out for the town, escorted by him and her other beaux, Donnell's mother kissed me, and Donnell drew my arm through his, and walked home with me across the snowy fields to my step-mother's house. He was abouting Gracie all the way, and I was, as usual, taking her part.

He came to see me one day soon after, and brought me a basket of lovely winter pears. He leaned against the wall and watched me making the butter. He was disgusted with Gracie, he said; she was a flirt, and he did not care a pin about her, only he would not be made a fool of. She had refused to let him walk with her across the hills next Sunday to the consecration of the new church; and if he did not get some token that she had changed her mind between that and this he would never, he swore, look her way again, but go and marry some one else for spite.

"Oh no, Donnell," said I; "promise me you won't do that." For I was sure that Gracie liked him all the while.

"But I will," said he, smiling; "at least if other people will have me."

"Oh, don't, don't!" said I. But he would not promise.

"It's my mind," said my step-mother, after he had gone, "that you had's more like a lover of years than here. Why don't you catch him, and then you needn't go to America."

"Mother!" I cried, and felt the room spinning round with me till I caught and held on by the door.

"Well, well," she said, "you needn't look so mad. Many a girl 'd be glad of him."

I thought a great deal about how he had sworn that he would marry some one else if he did not hear from Gracie before Sunday. "I'm sure she likes him," I thought; "she can not help it. She must have seen how mean even Squire Hannan looked beside him the other night. And it would be a most dreadful thing if he was married to some one he did not care about, and if she went off to London, with a broken heart, to be a 'West-end' milliner." I thought about it and thought about it. There was no use going to Gracie, for she would only laugh and mock at me. All at once a bright idea came in my head.

I was afraid to think of what I was going to do; but that night, when my step-mother had gone to bed, leaving me to finish spinning some wool, I got out a sheet of paper and a little note of Gracie's which I had in my work-box, and began to imitate Gracie's handwriting. I had not much trouble, for we wrote nearly alike; and afterward I composed a little letter:

"DEAR MR. M'DONNELL—It said—"I have changed my mind, and will be very glad if you will join me on the road to the consecration on Sunday.

"Yours sincerely, Gracie Byrne."

"What harm can it do to send it?" thought I, trembling all the while. I folded it up and put it in an envelope directed to Mr. Donnell M'Donnell, The Bucky Farm. "And it may do such a great deal of good! In the first place, it will prevent his marrying for spite before Sunday, and then she will be so glad to see him coming, in spite of her crossness, that she will be quite kind to him. He is always so stiff and proud when she treats him badly that I am sure it makes her worse. She will never find out that he got any letter—not, at least, till they are quite good friends—married, perhaps—and then they will both thank me."

So the next evening, about dusk, I slipped quietly into the town and posted my letter. I was dreadfully afraid of meeting Donnell or Gracie; but I saw no one I knew. I dropped the note in the letter-box and rushed off toward home again at full speed. I ran nearly all the way; the snowy roads were slippery in the evening frost, and near our house I fell and hurt my foot. A neighbor found me leaning against the stile and brought me home. I was to have sailed for America the very next week, but now I was laid up with a sprained ankle, and my departure was put off.

On Sunday evening a neighbor woman who had been at the consecration came in to tell us the news: This one had been there of course, and that one had been there for a wonder. Gracie Byrne had been there in a fine new bonnet (the girl was going to the mischief with dress), and Squire Hannan had been there, and given her the flower out of his button-hole.

"And Donnell M'Donnell was with her, of course?" said I.

"Ay, 'deed you may swear it," said the woman. "That'll be a match before long. He walked home with her to the town, and her smiles' at him like the first of June!"

"They'll be married before I go away," said I to myself; and I leaned back into my corner, for the pain of my foot sickened me.

Donnell's mother brought me a custard and some apples the next day.

"Donnell's gone to the Glen, my dear," said she, "or he would ha' been ever this merrin' to see you. He went before we heard of your foot, and he won't be home for a week."

"What's he doin' there?" asked my step-mother.

"He has land there, you know," said Donnell's mother, "and he goes whiles to settle his affairs with them that has charge of it. I don't know rightly what he's gone about now. Something has went agin' him lately, for he's not like himself these few days back. He said somethin' about goin' to be married when he came home, but if he is, it's not after his heart; for I never saw a bridegroom so glum on the head of it. Bet, dear, I thought it was you he liked."

"So he does, Mrs. M'Donnell," said I, "but not that way—not for his wife."

"Well, well, my dear!" said Donnell's mother, wiping her eyes.

Every body was coming to see me now on account of my foot. Gracie came the next day or so, and surely I was amazed at the glory of her dress! My step-mother, who did not like her, left us alone together, and Gracie's news came out. She was going to be married on next Tuesday.

"I know that," said I.

"How do you know it?" said she.

"Donnell's mother told me."

"Donnell's mother! Nothing but Donnell and Donnell's mother for you forever! How should she know?"

"Oh, Gracie, his own—"

"Why," she burst in, "you don't imagine that he's the man? Why, it's Squire Hannan! Only think, Bet, of your Gracie being the Squire's lady!"

I was quite confounded. "Oh, oh, Gracie!" I stammered.

"Well," said she, smiling, "are you not glad?"

"Oh yes," I said, "very, on your account; but what will become of Donnell?"

"Donnell again. Now listen to me, Bet. I know when a man likes me, and when he doesn't like me, just as well as any other girl; and I've seen this mousy a day, that Donnell didn't care a pin about me. Not he. He only wanted me to marry him that the people might not say I jilted him. I told him that the other day, when he asked me to have him. 'No matter what I want you for,' said he; 'I want you.' 'Thank you,' said I. And then what had he the impudence to say! If I changed my mind before Sunday I was to send him word that he might come to the consecration with me. Then he would set off for the Glen on Monday, and settle some business there, and be home for our wedding in a week!"

I screamed out, seeing what I had done.

"The poor foot!" cried Gracie, thinking I was in pain. "Is it bad?"

"Never mind it!" said I. "And what did you say?"

"I said," Gracie went on, "that whatever morning he got up and saw black snow on the ground, that day he might look for a message from me. And yet he had the meanness to walk with me on Sunday after all. And the best fun of it is, that they say he's gone to the Glen."

"Oh, oh!" said I, beginning to groan again, and pretending it was all my foot. After that Gracie talked about herself and Squire Hannan until she went away. And somehow I never had felt as little sorry to part with her before. She seemed not to be my own Gracie any longer.

And now I was nearly out of my senses, thinking what mischief might come of my meddling. I was sure that Donnell and Squire Hannan would fight and kill one another, and all through me. I thought I would give all I had in the world to see Donnell before any one else had told him the news, and confess to him what I had done. On Tuesday, about mid-day, a countryman from the Glen came in to light his pipe, and he said he had passed M'Donnell, of Bucky Farm, on the way.

"An' I think things must be goin' badly with him," said he, "for he has a look on his face as black as the potato blight."

"Somebody has told him, maybe!" said I to myself. And I put on my shawl, and borrowing a stick from an old neighbor, I hobbled off secretly up the road toward the Glen. I soon got tired and dreadfully cold, as I could not walk fast, and I sat down on a bit of an old gray bridge to watch for Donnell coming past. At last he came thundering along, and although it was getting dark I could see that he had his head down, and looked dreadfully dark and unhappy.

"Donnell!" said I, calling out to him.

"Who's that?" he said. "Why, it's never little Bet!"

"But indeed it is," said I. "Oh, Donnell, did you hear? I came to tell you. Gracie was married this morning to Squire Hannan."

"Whew!" He gave a long whistle. "The jilt!" said he, and he snapped his fingers. But his whole face brightened up.

"She's not so much a jilt as you think, Donnell," said I, "for—oh, how can I ever tell you!—it was I who wrote you the note you got last week, and she had nothing to do with it. I did it for the best, I did indeed, for I thought that Gracie liked you; I did indeed! And oh, Donnell, sure you won't go and kill Squire Hannan?"

"Won't I," said he, looking awfully savage. "I cut a great blackthorn this morning in the Glen for no other purpose but to beat out his brains."

I gave a great scream, and dropping my stick, fell along with it; but Donnell picked me up, and set me safe on his horse behind him.

"Now," said he, "I'll tell you what it is, little Bet. I'll make a bargain. You'll marry me, and I won't touch Squire Hannan."

"I marry you?" cried I, "after—after Gracie. Indeed I will not, Donnell M'Donnell."

"I've behaved badly," said he, "but I'm very sorry. It's long since I liked you better than Gracie, but the devil of pride was in me, and the people were saying she would jilt me. When I got your bit of a note I felt as if I was goin' to be bang. God bless Squire Hannan! Now will you marry me, little Bet?"

"No," said I. And with that he whipped up his horse, and dashed off with me at the speed of a hunt. He never drew rein till the horse stopped at the dear Bucky Farm house door, when he carried me straight into the bright warm kitchen where his mother had the tea set out, and the cakes smoking ready for his return.

"Talk her into reason," said he, putting me into his mother's arms. "I want her to marry me, and she says she won't."

I did my best to keep sulky for a proper length of time, but it was the hardest thing I ever tried to do, and they both so kind, and the place so bright and cozy, and I being so happy on the sly all the time! So the end of it was that I did not go to America, and that I am Mrs. M'Donnell, of the Bucky Farm. But I never tried match-making again.

FITCH'S HOME FOR SOLDIERS AND ORPHANS AT DARIEN, CONNECTICUT.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

SOLDIERS' AND ORPHANS' HOME AT DARIEN.

We illustrate on this page the Home for Disabled Soldiers and the Orphan Children of such as have died in military service in defense of the country, which, by the munificence of Mr. BENJAMIN FITCH, has been erected at Darien, Connecticut. From the beginning of the war Mr. FITCH has been interested in the cause for which our two millions of patriot soldiers have so bravely fought. At the first outbreak of rebellion, too old and infirm himself to shoulder the musket, and appreciating the tender anxiety of those who by going to the field must leave behind them wives and children, whom they might be leaving forever, Mr.

Fitch promised a large number of men to take under his care all who should be left by them thus without a husband and father's protection. The continuance of the war, and the increasing casualties attending it, soon led Mr. Fitch to see that nothing less than a well-organized Asylum would answer the wants thus created. He therefore, during the spring of 1864, totally unaided by others, purchased and erected suitable buildings, and formally instituted the Asylum since known as "Fitch's Home for Disabled Soldiers and Orphans of Soldiers who have lost their Lives in Defense of the Nation."

Mr. BENJAMIN FITCH, the founder of this Institution, after giving the building and grounds now occupied, worth originally $8000 or $10,000, placed in the hands of the trustees $5000 to be invested as a permanent fund, and $5000 to be expended in making repairs on the building, and in erecting a wing containing a kitchen, dining-room, and a beautiful hall for the use of the institution. He then went to Europe for a season, and on his return presented to the trustees a library consisting of from 5000 to 6000 volumes of choice books which he had collected, and placed at their disposal the sum of $10,000, the estimated cost of the new building.

While in England and on the Continent, with the interest of the soldiers' orphans ever in mind, Mr. Fitch obtained from those with whom he came in contact, and who had the welfare of the country at heart, both American and foreigners, such aid in books, statuary, and paintings as would adorn the home, beautify the life, or instruct the mind of his increasing family of orphans and disabled soldiers at home.

On Mr. Fitch's visit to Italy he called upon Mr. POWERS, the celebrated American sculptor, who generously presented the Institution with a bust of FRANKLIN, executed in Carrara marble, of great beauty and worth. He also received donations of pictures from the celebrated artists Corra and Costa, of Florence, with others of value; and a picture of the Birth of Christ, given by Mrs. ANSTRUP, a widow of an English officer who fell in India. All these works of art were shipped to this country, and unfortunately destroyed in the conflagration of a bonded warehouse in this city in September last, soon after their arrival, proving a great loss to the Institution, no insurance having been effected.

In addition to the foregoing Mr. POWERS introduced Mr. FITCH to Mr. LARREN G. MEADE, Jun., a young American artist of great worth, and engaged with him to furnish a group of statuary, in marble, called the "Returned Soldier," of the heroic, or larger than life-size, of which we give an illustration. A letter from Florence thus describes this work of art:

"The group of statuary represents the Returned Soldier, with an Orphan Child of a fellow-soldier on his knee, to whom he is describing the death of her father on the battle-field, who with his parting breath commissioned him to call upon his family and give them his last dying message. The young orphan, in the interest of the description and with her feelings intensely agitated, presses her face close to that of the narrator, and, with her thoughts completely absorbed, seems to see her dying father expiring on the fughthen field. The emotions of each are expressed with good effect by Mr. MEADE, whose experience in the early part of the war, has not been lost upon him."

It is our duty to Mr. MEADE here to say that, on being informed by Mr. FITCH for what purpose the group was intended, he would only accept 1000 francs, which he says will hardly cover the cost of its production, thereby foregoing any profit to himself.

In concluding this notice of Mr. FITCH's benevolent donation, it will not be out of place to suggest that in every town throughout the country there should be a similar effort made in behalf of disabled soldiers and the children of those who have been killed in battle.

THE METROPOLITAN COLLAR COMPANY.

We give on this page an illustration of the Paper Collar Manufactory of the Metropolitan Company of this city. The machine used in this manufactory, and of which Mr. D. M. SOYER is patentee, is one of the most wonderful and curious inventions of the day. Three peculiarities distinguish this machine above all others in use.

1. Its simplicity.—What by all other processes requires half a dozen distinct and separate operations is here accomplished by one. A single stroke of the die produces a perfect collar, buttonholed, stamped, and finished. All that is done afterwards is merely incidental. The collar is turned by a simple machine, and by another lo, with sine of its companion, folded for the box. This latter process is in every other manufactory performed by hand. The small number of hands through which the collar passes also prevents it from becoming soiled.

2. Its wonderful capacity.—From our own observation we know that this machine produced two collars per second. The eleven machines which the Company have in operation produce 22 collars per second, 1320 per minute, 79,200 per hour, and 1,900,800 every twenty-four hours. Three hundred machines would supply almost every man, woman, and child in the United States with one collar per day.

3. Its economy of labor and material.—The eleven machines in operation save the work of 300 hands. More than 15 per cent. is saved of the paper which in every other process is wasted.

The Metropolitan Collar Company, whose place of business is 165 Washington Street, has a capital of $500,000. It manufactures collars of seven or eight distinct varieties, many of them superior to any in the market, and none of them surpassed, and at a very much reduced cost of production, which enables the Company to defy competition.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The work of reconstruction does not make rapid advance in Congress. The concurrent resolution adopted in the House has also been adopted in the Senate. This amounts merely to an expression of the opinion of Congress as to the rights in regard to the admission of representatives. It can not even be called legislation. Otherwise nothing has been accomplished in Congress.

In the Senate there is some progress. The meeting in Richmond on February 28 strongly supported the President. The principal speech on that occasion was made by Judge M. F. Conway, formerly a representative from Kansas, and also formerly a radical. This speech advocated immediate restoration.

In Texas great progress has been made. The Constitutional Convention met February 8. On the 24th seventy of the ninety delegates were present. J. W. Throckmorton presided. Among the delegates was Mr. Roberts, President of the Southern Convention, who seems to have forgotten that there has been a war. He will, about a dozen others objected strongly to taking the oath to support the Constitution, but were finally compelled to yield to the large Union majority. On the 29th Governor Hancock's message was received. The Governor did not put any glow upon the rebellion. The rebels, he said, had defied the Government, and had been crushed. He advised the Convention to give to negroes civil rights and privileges. This advice was followed. The Constitution of Texas, so far as could be done by the Convention, has been amended so as to allow the freedmen to sue and be sued, to testify in the courts; to make contracts and be contracted with; to acquire, hold, and transmit property in all cases the same as the whites; and to be subject to no penal laws based on inequality of distinction.

Hon. James Johnson, late President of Georgia, who is now in Washington, says the condition of affairs in that State is very far from being as satisfactory as when the civil government was first restored. He speaks of the President's Bureau as an absolute necessity, both for the Union men and the blacks, and that it is very important that more troops be sent into the State at once.

CONGRESS.

February 27.

In the Senate, Mr. Sumner introduced a resolution which was adopted, that whereas the President had not responded to the resolution of inquiry in regard to Provisional Government, adopted January 5, he be requested to furnish the required information if not incompatible with the public interest. The concurrent resolution for the extension of Southern representatives was then taken up. Mr. Dixon spoke against the resolution. He explained the President's position. Mr. Dixon claimed that each House had extensive jurisdiction over its own members. The President's policy, he said, had been misrepresented. He was opposed by many to urge the admission of disloyal men from the rebel States to the two Houses of Congress; he had been charged with a purpose to bring into their former places in this body bloody-handed rebels; he was said to wish to throw wide open the doors of Congress and fill those seats with traitors, fresh from the battle-fields of the rebellion. These objections and statements were in direct contradiction to the President's published statements.

In the House, the Constitutional Amendment giving Congress power to secure the free use of citizens in the States was taken up. Mr. Hillyer opposed the measure, as strengthening the Government. Mr. Randall opposed it, because the Southern States were not represented. Mr. Kelley said the right given in the amendment was involved in the original Constitution, but had been denied practically by our courts for a fifty years. He was in favor of reasserting the right. Mr. Hale said he should vote against the amendment. He submitted that the proposed amendment was in effect a provision under which all State legislation in civil and criminal cases of procedure affecting the individual citizen was to be annulled, repealed, and abolished, and a law of Congress established in its place.

February 28.

In the Senate, Mr. Johnson presented the credentials of William F. Perry, Senator-elect from South Carolina. Senator Nye spoke in favor of the concurrent resolution.

In the House, Mr. Davis spoke against the Constitutional Amendment. Mr. Woodbridge, of Vermont, reported it; as also did Mr. Brigham. The latter alluded to Secretary Seward's New York speech in terms of disparagement. On motion of Mr. Corbin further consideration of the amendment was postponed until the second Tuesday in April.

March 1.

In the Senate, the concurrent resolution was debated. Mr. Johnson, of Maryland, argued that the States were sovereign powers. His speech was moderate, going entirely into the relation between the General Government and the States.

In the House, the Senate bill protecting civil rights, as amended by the Judiciary Committee, was presented, and after considerable debate was passed.

March 2.

In the Senate, after a long and spirited debate, the concurrent resolution was adopted. Mr. Doolittle made a speech against the resolution.

In the House, Mr. Traylor spoke in favor of the Civil Rights bill.

March 3.

There was no session of the Senate, and in the House there was no transaction of business.

March 5.

In the Senate, Mr. Wilson introduced a joint resolution for the representation in Congress of the stolen body in rebellion. It provides that they shall be entitled to representation upon their adoption of laws respecting all distinctions in civil rights on account of color, and upon their confining the right of suffrage upon all colored men who have served in the army, who can read the Constitution, and who pay taxes on real or personal property.

In the House, Mr. Brigham, from the Reconstruction Committee, reported a joint resolution for the admission of Tennessee, which were read twice and recommitted. Mr. Stevens offered a resolution of inquiry relative to persons pardoned by the Executive, and the amount and disposition made of confiscated land.

NEWS ITEMS.

From the West Indies intelligence is received that the cholera was abating at Guadeloupe, and had not broken out in the islands adjacent.

The evidence elicited in the trial of Major Gre, late rebel commander of Saylor's (North Carolina) Prison, shows that of 29,000 prisoners confined in that prison, over 5000 died from ill treatment in five months.

A great Fashion meeting was held on the 4th instant in Jones's Wood. A hundred thousand Irishmen are said to have been present, and so many dollars have been subscribed to aid the cause. The meeting was held in direct opposition to the well-known wishes of Archbishop McCluskey.

It is computed, from official data, that since the last Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made on the 30th of October last, he has reduced the aggregate amount of the public debt $2,000,000, and has paid $25,000,000 of treasury interest on seven-thirty bonds, and $24,000,000 on six interest on gold-bearing bonds, making an aggregate of treasury and coin interest of $49,000,000 paid.

FOREIGN NEWS.

FRENCHMEN.

In the House of Commons on February 27, Sir George Grey, in asking leave to bring in a bill suspending the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland, said that the Fenian conspiracy had only recently assumed its present proportions. It was necessary to strike an effective blow at the Fenian scheme, which were wholly discountenanced by the American Government. The loyalty of the British Army was beyond a doubt. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland recently requested the suspension of the act, saying that he could not hold himself responsible for the safety of the country if power was withheld from him. The bill was passed in both Houses.

On the 17th in Dublin over one hundred arrests of Fenians were made. The Government troops in Ireland were being more and more distributed among the small towns, thus creating a feeling of security.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Three months of that annual epidemic—house-burning—has come. For eight weeks more we must expect it to rage with increasing intensity, until the great crisis comes, the first of May—or rather the thirtieth of April. Even at this stage of the disease anxious-looking individuals are often seen scanning the houses on each side of the street in search of the significant "bill." There are plenty of "bills"—but whichever side of the street the "house-burner" happens to be walking the "bills" seem to happen on the opposite side. He straggles eyes to read without crossing! "A HOUSE!"—in immense capitals—its all he can make out. Of course it is a "house"—he knows that before—but is it "For Sale" or "To Let?" and what is the price, and how can he get it? To find out anything more than that it is a "house" he must cross the street, probably against the steps, and very likely then ascertain that he must go down town for further information as to price. We suggest that it would be an inestimable saving of shoe-leather and temper to have different-colored bills as the houses that are for sale and those that are to let. It is very vexatious, when you are as tired as you can be, to be continually enticed half a block out of your way by the vision of a bill only to find that it is "For Sale" when you had the hope it might be "To Let."

Much of the public about houses seems to be unacquainted; there are many more dwellings to let than is usually supposed. And though the rents are too high—excessively high—we have heard it stated many times within the last fortnight, and by those who have means of judging correctly, that rents will be lower before May. It is certain that there is a great deal of real estate in the market for sale which will undoubtedly be let before long. The tide is moving slowly but surely "up town," where new buildings are beginning to show their fronts more frequently than they have during the years of the war.

Apogee of "house-burning" and "up town," we give for the reader's amusement the following parody on Longfellow's "Kewpie," hoping, however, all will take warning from the fate of the "youth" therein mentioned:

"FURTHER TOWN."

Tired to death, but walking fast,
Along Broadway, one night, there passed
A youth, who wore a pretty nice Cavalier, with this strange device,
"Further-town!"

His anxious eyes and weary feet
Heard the houses in each street;
And like a New-Year's bell, he rang
The accents of that unknown tongue,
"Further-town!"

In hazy homes he saw the lights
Of household fire gleam warm and bright;
Beyond, the spectral street-lamp shone,
And from his lips escaped a groan,
"Further-town!"

"Try not that street," the old man said,
"A transient house is just ahead—
A public school is by its side."
Then loud that electric voice replied,
"Further-town!"

"Oh stay," the broker said, "and rest,
This apartment will suit you best!
A year ahead in his bright line eye,
Sadly he said, "The profit's too light!"
"Further-town!"

"Beware the heavy stable's smell,
Beware the captain's name as well!
This was the agent's last good-night—
A voice replied, far out of sight,
"Further-town!"

At break of day, as heavenward
The Central Park police man started,
Watching the gathering masses there,
A voice rang through the startled air,
"Further-town!"

By following up the unsteady sound,
A dying transfer they found,
Still groping in his bright line eye,
Utterly, with the strange device,
"Further-town!"

There, in the Rowell, they say,
"Drowned," but beautiful, he lay,
While somewhere over Broadway
A voice still like a rickety talk,
"Further-town!"

Some three days before liberty was every where fashionable, a well-known friend of the slave made known the truth in Boston quarters, and was reported mangled and killed. Soon after, while walking in the streets of his own city, glowing with health and vigor, a friend met him with the warm greeting:

"Why, Mr. B., how do you do? So you were not killed after all?"

"Well," returned Mr. B., placing his hands upon his broad chest, and throwing back his head, a little more erect than usual, "does this look like a reconstructed body?"

An English review of "A Noble Life," Miss Mallock's last work, says:

"There is such a high moral tone about the writings of this authoress, the stories are related with such purity and delicacy of feeling, that they are positively refreshing to meet with in these days, when licentious and tender are regarded essential ingredients to the success of a novel. It is a book which even studious mothers who protest against novel reading may see with satisfaction in their daughter's hands, for therein are many noble lessons taught in an attractive manner."

At the marriage of Mr. F. T. Barnum's youngest daughter, which was recently celebrated in Bridgeport, Connecticut, the ceremony was in one particular original. Instead of pronouncing the bridal pair "man and wife," after the usual fashion, the officiating clergyman pronounced them "husband and wife," which, of course, is correct, and a decided improvement upon the form ordinarily adopted upon such occasions. It is also worthy to note that, at the reception which followed the marriage ceremony, no attentions were offered to the guests, and yet the whole affair was a complete success. That fashion might well be followed more extensively.

It is said—we will not vouch for the truth of it—that the ladies have adopted the "Whirlpool" as the name for the substitute to the "Wanderer." The "Whirlpool" is worn by those who have enough of their own grown hair to allow it to trail behind naturally, or hang in tresses. The "Whirlpool" or all the hair on the head is decolored by salvers as the "Whirlpool" at sea, or the "Whirlpool" on land. The variegated colors of hair so frequently worn of late is increasing in popularity. Red, Auburn, and dark brown mingle extensively.

A nice little scrap of romance in Pennsylvania has just been made public. About fifty years ago a young gentleman and lady, supposed by friends to be on the verge of matrimony, separated for reasons best known to themselves. The young man subsequently married and had three wives, the last one within the last eight or nine months. The young lady married and lived with her husband over fifty-three years, and raised a numerous family. During the last year her husband died. The lady, after remaining a widow nearly a year, accepted a proposal from her former suitor—he being about seventy-five years old, and she seventy-one—and they were recently married. The parties are living in Susquehanna County, Pennsylvania.

An exchange gives the following prescription, which any affected with the disease specified may take, if they choose, provided they can mix it:

CRAN RICE LOVE.—Take 12 ounces of dilute, 1 pound of resolution, 1 ounce of the powder of experience, 1 large spoon of time, 12 drams of the pulp of disunion, 1 quart of the cooling water of consideration.

Set them on a gentle fire of love, sweeten it with the sugar of forgiveness, skim it with the spoon of melancholy.

Put it to your heart.
Cook it with the cork of a sound conscience, and there let it remain, and you will instantly find ease, and be restored to your right senses again.

These things are to be found at the apothecary, at the house of Understanding, next door to Reason, in Prudent Street, in the parish of Contentment.

Some of the English journals criticize with severity the "outrageous magnificence of dress" exhibited at the Palace of the Tuileries. The Empress herself appeared at the last ball in a dress which is praised for the extreme simplicity. It was of white tulle poissée, and ornamented with marble and aquatic plants. Her diadem of diamonds was surrounded by an enormous diamond star, while necklaces, ear-rings, waistband, and brooches—knobs were all of diamonds. Various other ornaments were conspicuously displayed. This extremely simple style of dress might not easily be followed by all. And the lady who at the Hotel de Ville ball on the following night exhibited a diamond peacock on her head, with a tail depending to her neck, may be fairly said to have beaten the Empress with her own weapons.

The Italian ladies do not appear to be at all behind their Parisian sisters in the prevailing mania for outrageous dress. At the fancy ball given at Florence recently a lady is described as having achieved "the most absolute triumph of plastic beauty" by appearing in a simple skirt of white satin over a tight-fitting fish-colored slip, such as is worn by ballet-dancers. A Hungarian lady, the youthful Countess Kandy, represented the Mer de Glace. Beneath a double veil of white and of blue tulle, by way of clouds, appeared the terrific undulations of the Mer de Glace, painted and woven on a white satin skirt. Sharp-pointed blocks of ice, bears, chamois, birds of prey, hunters—nothing characteristic was omitted. A very loose tulle, forming a train, draped on the left side a mass of white and blue clouds, and on the right a resplendent sun darting rays of light. At the bottom of the white satin skirt a light silver-stuff simulated bear-foot. The body of the dress was of white satin, cut in small pointed bosoms, trimmed with swan-down and glass. The Countess's fringed hair was prevented from falling quite loose by crystal chains, while her head was framed, as it were, in swan-down. It was fortunately a particularly mild evening, or such a costume would have sent all the other guests home with colds and rheumatism from simple association of ideas.

Somebody says: "There should be no question between man and woman to property—and yet ladies make a dreadful use of the 'my.' 'My house, my servants, my garden, and so forth. Every body knows this kind of lady, and also the kind of unhappy man who is blessed with her." This is very true, and the "my" and "mine" is often carried to an extent which is very offensive to good taste. A lady—unless she happens to live in Cuba—has the right to say "my husband," but she should think twice before she pretends that property to any other word.

GOVERNOR PIERPONT.

FRANCIS HARRISON PIERPONT, Governor of Virginia, was born in the county of Monongalia, Virginia, and is now about fifty years of age. He graduated at Alleghany College in the fall of 1820, and immediately occupied his time in teaching school and reading law. After a while he left his native county and went to Mississippi, where he resumed school-teaching, and the study of law; but he soon returned to his own State, commenced the practice of law in the county of Marion, and rose to a prominent and lucrative position.

On the opening of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, Mr. Pierpont purchased some coal lands, and entered largely into mining operations and the manufacturing of fire-brick. It was in the pursuit of these callings that his mind was first turned toward the wonderful manufacturing and mineral resources of the State of Virginia, which are only now—through the downfall of slavery and its surrounding influences—for the first time actively engaging the attention of the world, and rapidly placing her in the very foremost rank among all the States of the Union.

The long and turbulent period comprised between the Jones Brown affair and the actual passing of the Ordinance of Secession in Virginia are too fresh in the memory of our readers, and can only be briefly alluded to in a sketch of this character. Suffice it to say that, during all that time, when to be considered a Union man was to confront all that can most deeply test the manhood of an individual—the risk of property and life, the overthrow of all that was loved and valued in the past, the scorn and hatred of life-long friends—Governor PIERPONT stood like a beacon of light.

At last the fatal hour came; the Southern heart had been fired, the Cotton States precipitated into revolution, and after a large amount of struggling, Virginia gave way, and the Ordinance of Secession was passed in Richmond by a large majority, the few prominent leaders against the movement being so unpopular that they had to fly from the city in disguise. A public meeting was called at Clarksville on the 23d April, at which a series of resolutions were introduced by the Hon. JOHN S. CARLILE, and approved, calling a Convention to meet on the 11th day of May, at Wheeling. This Convention having assembled, passed a resolution calling a Convention to meet on the 11th day of June at the same place, and in the mean time appointed a Committee of Safety, consisting of five, whose duty it was to see that the State did not suffer in the interim. FRANCIS H. PIERPONT was one of that Committee.

On the 11th of June the Convention assembled at Wheeling, pursuant to call, and immediately organized by electing Hon. ARTHUR J. BORKMAN President, and G. L. CRAMMER Secretary. A declaration of the rights of the loyal people of Virginia was immediately passed, and an ordinance adopted, providing for the appointment of a Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, and Attorney-General, to act as provisional officers for six months, or until their successors should be elected and qualified. FRANCIS HARRISON PIERPONT was elected Governor—a station which he has since filled by re-election, until he came, by Presidential authority, to reside at the State capital.

A great deal of Governor PIERPONT's popularity is due to his personal péripat and manner. He has a frank, genial, honest-hearted way about him, amounting almost to joviality, that inspires sympathy and almost confidence in his good-nature and integrity among all who come in contact with him. He is one of those men of whom one instinctively feels that if he has an enemy it can not be of his choosing.

THE ALBANY RAILROAD BRIDGE.

SIXTY years of vexatious delays, caused by litigation with parties representing interests farther up the river, the work on this bridge was commenced in April, 1864. The first locomotive, the "Augustus Schell," of the Hudson River Railroad, crossed the bridge February 25, 1866, and the first passenger train on February 22.

The bridge proper (consisting the approaches, which in themselves are quite formidable) consists of two abutments and nineteen piers, making a total length of 2025 feet. The extreme length of the bridge is nearly a mile. The main channel of the river is crossed by four spans of 174 feet between the centres of the piers, on the plan known as "Howe's," and two draw spans of 131½ feet each. The remaining 14 spans over the shallow water on the east side, as also over the basin on the Albany side, are short spans ranging from 72 to 78 feet each, built on the same general plan. The truss-work approach to the bridge in the city is about 1500 feet long.

Our view (from a photograph taken by CURTIS, ILL. and DEXTERSON, for W. J. GIBSON) represents the bridge from the Albany Basin to the Eastern Shore, as seen from the large New York Central Railroad Elevator, which stands a few rods south of the bridge.

The drawbridge, including the iron turn-table upon which it rests, is entirely novel, planned especially for the locality, and the circumstances under which it has been built and will be operated. The piers and abutments are all founded on piles. In some cases the bed of the river was excavated to a depth of 10 or 12 feet, and within this space piles were driven to the hard bottom, sometimes as low as 33 feet. A heavy timber crib was then built around these piles of the dimensions of the proposed pier, resting on the bottom of the excavation, and reaching to within three feet below water-mark. This crib was then filled with concrete and faced with heavy timber, upon which the first stones of the masonry were laid. In other cases, after excavating as before, and driving the piles, the latter were sawed off, and a floating caisson, with a heavy timber floor, of the dimensions of the proposed pier, was anchored over the piles, and the masonry commenced in this caisson, which soon settled to its bearing on the heads of the piles, when the sides were removed by unscrewing some bolts, and fast- all away to serve elsewhere.

The piers are of cut limestone masonry, with rough faces, and are 30 feet in height above low-water, and have a width at the bottom of 9 feet, and at the top under the coping (which projects 9 inches on all sides) of 6½ feet. They are all built of heavy cut stone laid in cement.

The face stones are all cramped together by iron cramps, and, in addition, the two faces of the pier are tied together by iron bars at intervals on each course along the front, extending through the pier from side to side; and, still further to insure the strength of the masonry, the head stones are all doweled together with iron dowels—each stone to the stones both above and below.

The bridge has been constructed by "The Albany Bridge Company," constituted mainly of Directors in the different railroads crossing at Albany, and it is understood that it is owned one-half by the New York Central Railroad, and one quarter each by the Hudson River and Albany and Boston Roads. The total cost of the bridge has been over a million of dollars.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1855 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disagreeable cough. I had for some months previous thought that a preparation, having for its basis the taste of white pine, might be so compensated as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it I dissolved a small quantity of the medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Since after this I went some to a party in Lombard-street, N. Y., who had been suffering for some weeks with a bad cough, occasioned by a sudden cold, and had raised masses streaked with blood. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She took about ten courses of it, and got well. In November, 1855, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled.—Boston Journal.

This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the best of elegant doctors in the New England States, where its virtues have become as well known. It cures sore throat, coughs, diarrhoea, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. It is a remedy for diabetes, bleeding from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel; and for piles and every ailment it will be found valuable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicines generally.

GREAT AMERICAN PRIZE CONCERT.

CROSBY'S OPERA-HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILL., MARCH 18, 1866.

25,000 Valuable Gifts, worth $25,000, will be presented to Ticket-Holders.

- 100,000 Tickets will be Sold.
1 Gift, in Greenbacks, $20.00
1 Gift, in T. 30 Bonds, 5.00
1 Gift, in 100 Shares of the Chicago & North-Western R.R., 5.00
4 Squares Grand Piano, $200 each, 4.00
50 Gifts, 50 English Patent Lever Gold Watches, $25 each, 12.50
50 Wheeler & Wilson Sewing-Machines, $100 each, 5.00
50 Gifts, 50 American Lever Silver Watches, $10 each, 5.00
50 Gifts, 50 Silver Lever Watches, $25 each, 1.25
5,000 Gifts, 5,000 Turkey Morocco Gold Clasp Albums, $5 each, 25.00
4,000 Gifts, 4,000 Clasp Albums, $5 each, 20.00
10,000 Gifts, $10,000 each, $1 each, 10.00
50,000 Gifts, Total Value of which, $250,000

The great feature of our Prize Concert is the manner in which it is gotten up, differing from any thing of the kind ever before offered to the public:

1st. The Prizes are a great deal more valuable.
2d. All of them are genuine gold and silver goods, the very best manufactured. The pianos and sewing-machines are all new, and the manufacturers' names are sufficient guarantee that they are expressed by none.

3d. The manner in which it is drawn. Each ticket has its duplicate number; these are placed in a wheel and thoroughly mixed; a distinguished person (selected by the Ticket-Holders present at the concert) draws three duplicate numbers from the wheel; the first one drawn out gets the largest prize, the next one drawn out the next largest prize, and so like manner until all are drawn.

To enable us to give away the valuable prizes we first sell a sufficient number of tickets to insure an equal loss. The prizes are then distributed in order as the duplicates are drawn—unlike all other gift sales, where you buy your ticket, and should you draw a large prize the proprietor makes a great loss of the value you draw, and consequently you seldom if ever get any thing worth what your ticket cost you.

Don't throw your money away on valueless concerts, but send us your orders for tickets soon, if you would secure them, as the larger portion has been already sold. Every ticket is registered before being sent out—the number, name of party purchasing, and address—and all will be notified by mail of the result of drawing.

Tickets $1 each, or eleven for $10, sent by mail on receipt of price and stamp. BRIGGS, LEMON & CO., 144 Dearborn Street, Chicago, Illinois.

P.S.—The above Concert will probably take place on the 25th. Parties at a distance sending us funds for tickets, should they all be sold, will have the money returned to them. BRIGGS, LEMON & CO.

DEALERS IN UNITED STATES AND OTHER DESIRABLE SECURITIES, No. 5 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK.

THE NEW UNITED STATES THIRTY YEAR SIX PER CENT BONDS, Issued to aid the Construction of the Great Central Pacific Railroad.

They have THIRTY YEARS to run, and bear interest at the rate of SIX PER CENT. PER ANNUM, in lawful Money. The interest is payable SEMI-ANNUALLY, in January and July.

EXEMPT FROM STATE AND MUNICIPAL TAXATION. Like all other Government Bonds. They are received by the Bank Department as Security for the Circulation of National Banks, and Circulation is issued upon them at the rate of Eighty per Cent. of their Par Value.

The length of time they have to run renders them very desirable for BANKING PURPOSES or for INVESTMENT, as they can not be called in by the Government, and the Rate of Interest can not be reduced, for THIRTY YEARS.

The only Six per Cent. Bond of the United States in Existence. And they can now be bought at a rate at which they will pay a BETTER RATE OF INTEREST on the amount invested, in the mean time, than any of the Gold-Bearing Bonds, of present prices, unless Gold shall average from 20 to 25 per cent. premium for the next ten or fifteen years.

THE CENTRAL PACIFIC R. R. SEVEN PER CENT. STATE AID BONDS, PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST PAYABLE IN GOLD.

Interest Guaranteed and Paid by the State of California. These Bonds are secured by a Mortgage on 100 Miles of Road, from Sacramento to the California State Line, forming a part of the GREAT PACIFIC RAILROAD ROUTE, adopted and aided by the UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.

These Bonds are secured by a Mortgage on 100 Miles of Road, from Sacramento to the California State Line, forming a part of the GREAT PACIFIC RAILROAD ROUTE, adopted and aided by the UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.

About sixty miles of the road are already completed, on which the EARNINGS ARE VERY LARGE, having been in the month of October, 1865, on fifty-three miles of road then running, upward of $60,000 IN GOLD, the road having as yet penetrated to no very important points.

With thirty miles additional completed, which will probably be ready for working by the middle of June next, the earnings are expected to be not less than $200,000 PER MONTH IN GOLD, by careful estimate based upon the present amount of traffic over the same region without railroad facilities.

These Bonds are a FIRST-CLASS SECURITY in every respect, and a limited amount will be offered upon terms which render them a VERY ATTRACTIVE AND DESIRABLE INVESTMENT.

Inquiries for further particulars will receive prompt attention.

We also keep on hand, and buy and sell at market rates, all classes of UNITED STATES SECURITIES, including Six per Cent. Bonds of 1861, Five-Twenty Bonds (all Issues), Ten-Forty Bonds, Seven-Thirty Treasury Notes (all Issues), One Year Certificates, Compound Interest Notes;

ALSO, NEW YORK SEVEN PER CENT. BOUNTY LOAN, AND OTHER DESIRABLE SECURITIES. Collections made throughout the United States and Canada. Gold and Coupons bought, sold, and collected.

THE REISSUE OF

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

Vol. X.—No. 482.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1866.

[SINGLE COPIES FIVE CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE LATE COLONEL BOWERS.

COLONEL THEODORE S. BOWERS, who, after passing safely through the perils of General Grant's campaigns, was killed by accident on the 7th inst., was a native of Illinois. He was a printer by trade, and at the breaking out of the war edited a Democratic paper in Southern Illinois. He entered the military service as a private in the Forty-eighth Illinois Infantry, declining a commission, and served with this regiment until the return of Gen. Grant's reconnaissance in January, 1862, when he was detailed as clerk at the General's headquarters.

Colonel Bowers was with Grant at Forts Henry and Donelson, and until the 9th of March following, when he accepted the First-Lieutenancy of his Company, declining the Captaincy, which was tendered him. He held this position at the battle of Shiloh, during which he was again called to Grant's headquarters and appointed Aid-de-camp. In November, 1862, he was made Captain and Aid-de-camp, and soon after Major and Judge-Advocate in the Army of the Tennessee. In September, 1863, he was assigned Assistant Adjutant-General, with the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel—succeeding to Colonel Rawlins, promoted. From that time till the surrender of Lee's army he was General Grant's chief Assistant Adjutant-General in the field, and at the close of the war retained the same position. In September, 1864, he was, in consideration of his eminent services, appointed Major and Assistant Adjutant-General in the regular army.

Colonel Bowers was killed instantly by falling between the cars while attempting to get on the train as it was leaving Garrison's Station of the Hudson River Railroad. General Grant with his son, accompanied by the Colonel, arrived at Garrison's Station, opposite West Point, at a late hour on the evening of the 7th, and was compelled to remain overnight. The next day the party went across, and the General, leaving his son at West Point, returned to the east side with Colonel Bowers. When the train arrived by which they were to return to New York some difficulty occurred in relation to a carpet-bag belonging to the party being missed, when Colonel Bowers followed the station agent to the office to see about it, General Grant, in the mean time, being seated in the car next to the rear. When the agent arrived in the ticket-office he picked up a carpet-bag, and presented it to the view of Colonel Bowers, who said, "That is not the one." These were the last words spoken by the deceased. The train at that time was in motion, when Colonel Bowers rushed out to get on board. In attempting to do so he seized hold of the railing on the platform of the car in which General Grant was seated, and jumped upon the step, his body striking with such force against the car as to break his hold on the railing, precipitating him from the step. In the fall he swung around between the cars, his head and that part of his body above the hips falling inside of the track, the car running over him, producing death instantly. His body was dragged about one hundred yards on to a switch and over it, the head being terribly mangled, as was also the upper part of the body. As soon as possible the train was stopped, and the body of the unfortunate man was taken from the track.

General Grant was notified of the accident by Mr. Garrison, the proprietor of the ferry, who said, "General, I think your Adjutant is killed." General Grant replied, "Something told me he was killed," and upon seeing the body he said, "That is he; a very estimable man he was. He has been with me through all my battles." Turning to Major Hunt, of West Point, he ordered the body to be taken to that place and buried, there to remain until further orders.

PAYING PENSIONERS.

We give an illustration on this page of the manner in which United States pensioners are treated at the Pension Office in the basement of the Custom-house of this city. During the week, ending March 9, several hundred of the two or three thousand wounded and disabled veterans received their dues for the six months preceding. The accommodation provided for this purpose are very inadequate. The office is in a basement to which the access is by a precipitous flight of steps.

There are no clerks, and so crowded are the accommodations provided for them, that people waiting the office, some of them married soldiers and some of them aged women, are compelled to stand in a long line for many hours in the wind and cold waiting their turn. The policeman at the entrance does his duty with commendable patience, but finds it hard work to sometimes resist the pressure. In spite of the many proposed remedies to the evil affairs have remained as they were, and the line which extends from the door of the office in Exchange Place around the corner of the Custom-house and thence into Wall Street as far as William in days by-gone still occupies the same position. As only a hundred and fifty persons are paid each day, the sum handed to each varies from twelve to three hundred dollars, the proceeds will require some days for completion.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SAUNDAY, MARCH 24, 1866.

MAKE HASTE SLOWLY.

IT is agreed by all loyal men that the mere fact of laying down arms did not entitle the late seceding States to resume immediately their full relations in the Union. The principle of the President's policy hitherto is that those States must conform to certain conditions prescribed by the Government. That is also the principle asserted by Congress. Those conditions must, of course, be reasonable and generous; but they can be wisely determined only by ample knowledge and deliberation. Some risks must be taken, some perils ventured. But after so terrible a war we can surely afford to be careful in establishing peace. We must build upon things rather than upon words, and the action of the Government must be determined not by theories but by the actual state of affairs.

The important point to ascertain is whether those whose honest hostility to the Government led them to attempt its overthrow are still attached to it; and if so, whether they should at once be intrusted with an equal share in its administration. That the rebellion was the fruit of an original and traditional difference of interpretation of the Constitution is undoubted. That the section in which the war was waged had in very hearty hatred of the other section is known by every man who knows any thing of the subject; and that the citizens of the latter section are unrepentant and not converted is not only a recognized fact, but the supposition of every other thing upon their part is scorned and derided as showing profound ignorance of history and human nature.

This being admitted, is it not fair to assume, and is it not the assumption so far honorable and most commendable to the citizens in question, that being men of strong convictions, of earnest passions, and of skill and patience, they will endeavor to use their new opportunities for the same result to which they turned their arms? That if they are admitted to Congress they will go with those who defeated and expelled their rebellion, will not be denied. That the confederates would attempt to repudiate the national debt, and to allow compensation for emancipated slaves and for property destroyed by war; that it would abolish the national defense of the freedmen and agitate the black code of the late slave States; that it would attack the validity of the Emancipation Amendment as having been adopted by some States under coercion, and by every means would seek to plunge this country into foreign war in order to effect that secession which the civil war failed to achieve, must be believed by those who hold that it is foolish to suppose that the defeated party are converted because they are overpowered.

Certainly no man can wish to take such a view. No man can wish to feel that the dominant feeling of the population in the lately disturbed section is hostile to the Government; but he can not deny that the irresistible weight of evidence shows it. The action of the conventions and of the legislatures; the elections of State officers and of Representatives and Senators; the black code; the vagrant laws; the tone of the press and of private conversation; the testimony before the Committee of Congress; the special correspondence in the newspapers; the tales of commercial and other travelers—all prove that the sentiment of the lately insurgent States is unfriendly to the Government and Union. There is testimony also upon the other side. There are private letters from agents and immigrants of various kinds; but individual evidence is rebutted by other individual evidence, and the prevailing state of feeling must be inferred from the sources we have indicated. Now is there any reason to suppose that in proportion as these States again acquire power of any kind it will not be used inimically to the country?

We shall, of course, be asked whether we would therefore increase their power by a re-annexation; whether they will be more friendly by being left length; whether we expect them to love the name of Yankee, or to confess that they were wrong as well as wicked; and whether we should respect them as much if they were not manly enough to stand by their cause? Such questions are natural, and we have no difficulty in answering them. Nobody from the President down, except the Copperhead party, is in favor of indiscriminate admission or for indiscriminate exclusion. But there is a middle point between frost and fire. Some risks must be taken and will be, but also some securities may be demanded which are more than words.

It is plain that the calm spirit in which the question should have been considered has been lost by the misunderstanding between the President and Congress. But one preliminary measure is clearly essential, and it is one upon which President and Congress can agree.

If the President was not opposed to making precedent to the emancipation amendment a condition precedent to the resumption of the relations of the disturbed States with the Union, he can not fairly object to adding to it an amendment providing for equal representation which emancipation has made necessary. If it were proper to propose and pass one amendment while certain States were not represented, it can not be improper to pass the other. Surely we are bound to take care that the insurgent States have not gained a formidable advantage within the Union by rebelling against it. Let us at least insist upon equality of representation by apportioning it to voters, and do so much toward intrusting the government of this country to all those who honestly love it and have faithfully served it.

THE NEW AMENDMENT.

THE constitutional amendment apportioning representation to population and excluding from the basis those to whom the franchise is denied has been defeated in the Senate. There were objections to the proposition which we stated at the time; but we should, under all the circumstances, have regretted its defeat as a serious blow to the prospects of speedy organization if we were not very sure that the amendment was to obviate a difficulty in the situation which is sure to be remedied. The emancipation amendment, upon the assumption of four million freedmen and a basis of a hundred thousand persons for a representative, adds sixteen members to the representatives of the late slave States. Yet the population which increased the representation, and which upon this basis would give forty members, is excluded from the polls, and is, moreover, the only thoroughly loyal class in the States concerned.

This is an absurdity which must be adjusted; and as the Committee's amendment has failed, Senator DOUGLASS has introduced a substitute, as follows:

“After the census to be taken in the year 1870 and each succeeding census representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the number in each State of male citizens over twenty-one years of age, qualified by the laws thereof to elect members of the most numerous branch of its Legislature; and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to the value of the real and personal taxable property situated in each State, not belonging to the State or the United States.”

This is virtually the amendment which the President has always favored, and which he suggested in the conversation with Senator DIXON. Its spirit is the same as that of the defeated proposition. It aims to enlarge the suffrage, and it offers a strong inducement for its enlargement. It appeals to the love of political power, and expects to effect that enfranchisement of the colored population which is the key of the situation.

Senator WATSON, whose political sagacity and fidelity to freedom are proverbial, is of opinion that the rejected amendment would have produced equal suffrage in the late slave States within five years. Doubtless he and all his friends are, as Senator FESSENDEN said, in favor of abolishing all caste distinctions immediately. But they are very sure that the result can be better accomplished indirectly and by degrees. The feeling of the Senate is shown by the fate of Senator HENDERSON'S proposed amendment, which forbade any State to discriminate against any person on account of color or race. A radical Senate gave ten yeas for the proposition and thirty-seven nays. Senators YATES, SUMNER, and CLARK made the same effort with a still worse result. The Senate has plainly pronounced for leaving the regulation of the suffrage to the States.

It becomes therefore the duty of every man who knows that there can be, and ought to be, no cessation of agitation until the colored citizen has exactly the same defenses of his rights that every other citizen has, to urge the adoption of the new amendment. There are doubtless difficulties and objections. But now that the effort to secure a direct adjustment of the suffrage in the States by the Senate has failed, Mr. SUMNER and his friends, who defeated the Committee's amendment, assume a very grave responsibility if they also defeat Mr. DOUGLASS'S.

STATE POWER OVER THE CITY OF NEW YORK.

THE idea is entertained by many citizens that acts of the Legislature subjecting the city of New York to the control of State officers in whole or in part is an infringement of the corporate rights of the city; but this opinion must immediately be dispelled when it is understood that the city has no public powers except those derived, directly or indirectly, from the Constitution of the State, and that, like all other cities, it is part of its political machinery for carrying into effect the public power of government. It is true that the charter of the city was derived originally from other sources, but on the accomplishment of the Revolution the State of New York succeeded to the rights over the charter which the Parliament of Great Britain might previously have exercised. Those rights were partially modified by the Constitution of the United States, which declared that no State should impair the obligation of contracts. So far, therefore, as the franchises of the city possessed such pecuniary value as to take the shape of property they may be free of State control. The Constitution of the State also declares that nothing contained in it should be deemed to amend any charters to bodies politic or corporate; but neither this saving clause nor the one referred to which prevents any contract from being impaired affects in any manner those public powers which relate to the matter of government. Indeed, the old charters, whether Dutch or English, are seldom looked at, except to ascertain the rights residing in the city to the property and the rights in the nature of property which appertain to the corporation. It would be a strange anomaly if one of the instruments of the State for carrying into effect its powers of government should possess any independent authority in this respect, and hence it has been the custom of the Legislature ever since it had existence to amend and alter the charter in public matters according to its pleasure.

A volume of laws entitled "Acts of the Legislature relating to the City of New York," has been printed, to which appeal is constantly made by those who are interested to find what powers and rights the city may exercise. These acts cover the whole ground of municipal government. Occasionally amendments to the charter have been submitted to the vote of the community of the city, but it is perfectly well known that such vote is wholly unnecessary to determine the legality of the alterations. The power of the Legislature over the subject, so far, we repeat, as the measure is public, is limited only by its discretion. All anxiety in relation to the legality of the Health Bill may be dismissed, and with respect to its expediency, there are strong grounds for believing that the Act will meet with approval, except on the part of those functionaries who were displaced by it, whose alarms are expressed because their vacation as tax-collectors has been suddenly terminated.

The hopes of good government with respect to all matters of health so generally inspired by the passage of the bill in question, and the judicious appointments under it made by the Governor, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, lead us to look in the same direction for relief against the abuses and corruptions from which the community suffers. We weigh well our words when we declare that those who hold power in the city under what exists of the old system are, with few exceptions, the portion of the community most obnoxious to its punishments. Instead of being the protectors of the community they are engaged in the distribution of its property among the great body of tax-consumers. Instead of being interested in maintaining the just authority of government, they strive to break it down and reduce all to their degraded level.

The question arises, to what lengths the Legislature should go in remedying such defects in an important portion of its public machinery. The answer is very clear, that inasmuch as misgovernment widely prevails, to the great damage of the city and State, and to an extent likely to bring the system into contempt, and as the State is responsible for the good working of every part of its machinery, the process of change should go forward until the object of government shall be accomplished—that is to say, the safety, security, and happiness of its citizens. The police system, established by State authority and maintained by a decision of the court of last resort, gives unqualified satisfaction. The fire law, created also by the Legislature, is growing rapidly in public estimation, although experience of it is yet so recent. We trust that other changes may be made with equal prudence and wisdom, in which case all those who do not profit by misgovernment will be gratified.

What is most wanted in our city government is a Board created in the interest of tax-payers, which shall be empowered to approve or disapprove of every measure which involves the expenditure of money so that a concurrence of tax-eaters and of tax-payers shall be expressed as a condition to its passage. If some measure of this character be not adopted, and the city remains in the hands of tax-consumers, all their present power will be lost, and they will find it difficult to get it back again.

A SIGN.

AN instructive illustration of the present feeling at the South is found in the following clauses from the Tax-bill lately passed by the Alabama Legislature:

"12. To sell or expose for sale, for one year, at any one place, any pictorial or illustrated weekly, or any monthly paper, periodical, or magazine, published outside the limits of the State, and not in a foreign country, and to vend the same on the streets, or on boats or railroad cars, fifty dollars."

"13. To keep a news light for one year, in any city, town, or village, for the sale of any newspaper, periodical, or magazine, not including pictorials, provided for in the preceding paragraph, ten dollars."

It is not many months since Provisional Governor FALKNER of Alabama came among us to solicit pecuniary aid, and, according to Mr. BERKELEY, he met no unwilling response. Indeed Northern capital and energy and skill are all ready and waiting to reinforce those of the Southern States the moment there is any indication of a fair security of person and property in the lately disturbed section.

But such laws as those we quote are merely steps backward toward barbarism. Do not the intelligent men of Alabama see that in education alone lies the sole hope of a return of peace and prosperity to the State? No civilized people was ever benefited by ignorance, and there is nothing more perilous to a community than ignorance enforced by law.

The clauses of the bill which we quote are directed, it will be observed, against the illustrated weekly and monthly papers and magazines published in this country. English or French or German literature of the kind, so much of which is inspired, as we have seen during the war, by hatred and contempt of American institutions, may be freely introduced. The clauses we quote are intended to prohibit the sale of the periodical literature published at the North. It is an effort to silence the expression of sentiments which the majority of the Legislature do not like. It is a direct and despotic assault upon free discussion; and like all despotism of the kind is a confession of utter weakness. It is a heavy and crushing tax upon knowledge. It is an attempt to perpetuate that tyranny based upon ignorance which enabled a few men to hood-wink and bamboozle the people of the South until they maddened them into revolution.

Now the sentiments of this paper and of many other papers are no more agreeable to the current opinions of the South than those opinions are to us. But we ask any sensible man in Alabama, however he may differ from our views, whether he is unwilling to trust the fundamental principle of a free government? If he fought during the war for a despotic despotism, of course the nearer he approaches it under the Union the more satisfied he will be. But if he fought for what he believed to be a free popular government, he knows that such a government is impossible under such laws as we are considering. Does not such a man see what every other man in the country sees, that those who exclude any means of education and extinguish free discussion "neither go in themselves nor suffer them that are entering to go in?" Let any Southern man read Mr. BARRINGER'S Letters to Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania, published in the Washington Chronicle at the end of January, and say whether Mr. BARRINGER, who is a North Carolinian, is not a more truly sagacious and conservative leader than the men who pass these foolish laws in the Alabama Legislature. "Northern radicalism even," writes a gentleman who knows what he says, "understands our wants and necessities better than do our leading men here at home in the South."

Every man in Alabama who sincerely loves the State must deplore such insane legislation, as we should deplore a similar misfortune here in New York. It infinitely delays and perplexes the work in which all good citizens of the country are now engaged, for it reveals the present predominance of the old jealousy and hostility which spring from ignorance and resulted in war.

FENIANISM.

THE tone of the English papers in discussing Ireland shows serious alarm. The London Post recommends that any soldier who is found tainted with Fenianism should be tried for high treason and punished accordingly, and the London Times thinks it high time that the British Government asked that of the United States to consider its neutral obligations. The London Times is good enough to say that it has as great faith in the American Government as Mr. GLADSTONE. The Times is so kind as to add that it acknowledges its "friendliness, its promptitude, and its sincerity." And it doubts whether its own Government is quite so vigilant and active as the circumstances demand.

There is also some excitement in Canada, where disturbances are apprehended upon St.

Patrick's day. The Catholic Bishop of Toronto has issued a letter advising all good Catholics to pray that England may do justice to Ireland, and that divine mercy may change the hearts of those who pretend to remedy the evils of Ireland by invading Canada. Certain newspapers in this country magnify every thing said and done upon the subject; but the genius of Harney plays so large a part in the performance that it is not easy to know a single fact of the matter.

It is observable, however, that the Church of Ireland opposes the agitation, and that no conspicuous Irish leader either at home or in this country is identified with it. The speeches, so far as they have been reported, are earnest appeals for contributions on the one hand, and the maddest rhetoric on the other. Meanwhile in Ireland, where the Auburn creper is suspended and the Government is fully aroused and active, no hostile demonstration has been made, and no plan of action is any where apparent. During the week following the news of the suspension the orators in this country adjured their hearers to pour out money to aid those at home who were "in the gap," and who were doubtless even then fighting, but the subsequent steamers brought tidings of nothing but continued excitement and arrests.

The only serious apprehension seems to lie in the fact that leaders who excite the passions of such a people as those who attend the Fenian meetings in this country and give their money will demand their money's worth. If the leaders pass round the hat to pay for a scrimmage, a scrimmage of some kind there must be or their own heads are in danger. The peril has probably passed in Ireland. The Government is in the field first, and every day strengthens it and deprives any insurrection of the advantage of panic, which is incalculable. It is, therefore, quite time for sensible Irishmen in this country to consider what is likely to become of the money which they may have subscribed toward the Republic of Ireland. That Republic can not be established in Canada nor in Jones's Wood. What are the present chances of its establishment upon the green isle? Rash men may cause infinite suffering to innocent persons in that country and elsewhere. But there is no other possible result of Fenianism.

THE TUMBLE IN GOLD.

Gold has fallen again—below 130. The event has sent a thrill through commercial, agricultural, and industrial society. A fall in gold implies a fall in produce, which reduces the profits of farmers, forwarders, and shipping merchants; in dry goods and general merchandise, which sends merchants home with a headache, thinking of stocks on hand; in domestic goods, which sets manufacturers a-thinking whether it were not better at once to shut up mills and discharge hands instead of dying by inches. The world wags, Spain makes war on Chili, the President makes war on the Radicals, the Fenians talk war against England, history is being made daily on every side; but nothing in all this comes so straight home to every man as the fall in gold.

The readers of this journal have been fully forewarned of the decline. Ever since January a fall in gold has been imminent. The unexpectedly large supply of cotton, and the steadily increasing foreign demand for United States bonds, long since insured low rates of exchange, and consequently a reduced inquiry for gold. No man now buys gold for investment; foreign exchange, which is the same as gold, can be bought at 1 per cent. less. Few buy gold for speculation; for the Treasury Department holds a specie reserve which it is prepared to pour on the market at any time in irresistible amounts. The only supporters of the gold market are operators who have sold for the fall, and who are obliged to buy from time to time to fulfill their contracts. It would not indeed be strange, in view of the dullness of exchange, of the reduced demand for imported goods, of the increased foreign inquiry for Five-Twenty bonds, of the prospect of currency contraction, and of the steadily increasing supply of gold from California and from private hoards, if the price fell to 125 or even lower before midsummer.

To producers, manufacturers, and holders of goods this is an unwelcome prospect. It means a steady shrinkage of prices, and a constant drain upon the capital of holders or makers of goods and merchandise. But it is but natural. For nearly three years producers and holders of goods, produce and merchandise, made money so easily that they seemed to possess the royal key to wealth. A merchant only needed to fill his store with goods, and in thirty or sixty days jobbers eagerly depleted it on a substantial advance. A farmer only required to plant double the usual breadth, and his profits were in the square of previous years. Manufacturers only needed to keep every loom at work, and dividends of 50 per cent. per annum came without endeavor. The currency was constantly expanding in volume and declining in value, prices were constantly rising, and the producer and the holder were just as steadily realizing profits. That was flood-tide: we are now on the ebb. The currency has ceased to increase. Without any legislative action the interest-bearing legal tender—of which security $150,000,000 are affiant—have practically passed out of circulation, being clogged by the interest due upon them. Of the remainder of the currency, viz., the plain legal tenders and the National bank notes, the South is beginning to consume a large quantity—more, we judge, than the Controller of the Currency is issuing to new banks. Thus the actual volume of paper-money is diminishing daily without Congressional action. In the course of a few weeks, if not days, some bill or other will pass Congress which will look to a still more direct curtailment of the paper circulating medium. Under these circumstances, it is plain that prices must move in exactly the direction opposite to that which they pursued when the currency was ever on the increase.

To illustrate the point by a familiar example. A horse-owner bought his oats of a dealer in his neighborhood, taking them in small lots of 50 bushels at a time to suit the size of his bin. In 1863, 1864, and 1865, the dealer supplied the oats at the price of the day. He bought probably once a month. A fortnight after his purchase his customer required a supply. They were put in at the price of the day, which usually proved to be from 5 to 10 cents a bushel higher than the dealer had paid for them. When the turn in prices came in 1865, the dealer attempted to charge for his oats the price he had paid for them. "No, no," said his customer, "when prices were rising you charged me the price of the day, whatever it was, without regard to the price you had previously paid for the oats; and now you shall stick to your rule. I will pay the price of the day—no more." So the dealer throughout this winter has been supplying his customer at a loss. He must buy to supply his customers; but every fortnight his stock declines in value. It is the same with coal, dry goods, hardware, and every article which is bought and sold for gold.

It seems to be an open question whether we shall have a panic. Sound reasons can be given pro and con. On the one hand, holders, as a general rule, are showing good sense by marking down prices, so as to anticipate the future; while capitalists are so shy of business paper of the second and third grades that in the event of a heavy decline in prices the wrecks would be fewer than otherwise. On the other hand, it is notorious that large quantities of produce, cotton, coal, dry goods, hardware, and other merchandise are held at the sea-board, at the West, and even abroad on margins. All this would necessarily be sacrificed in the event of a continued decline in gold, and in the absence of a demand for consumption the result of forced sales would be uncertain. Perhaps the police rule may apply. The guardians of the public peace say that a riot which is predicted never breaks out. So, possibly, a panic upon which people speculate in advance is not likely to occur.

It is not a little amusing to note the attitude of Wall Street in view of those ominous prospects. Speculation in that meridian is lively, not to say rampant. A clique, led by the leading director of the Erie Railway, is buying up the stock of that insolvent corporation, and it is 10 per cent. higher than it was when gold was 137. Another clique, led by the leading director of the Rock Island Railroad, is buying up the stock of that concern, and it is 12 per cent. higher than it was when gold was 139. Another clique, led by the leading director of the Michigan Southern, is buying up the stock of that unproductive enterprise, and it is 11 per cent. higher than it was when gold was 138. What the calculation of these various cliques may be, it were vain to conjecture. Published reports inform us that the earnings of these roads have been falling off steadily for three months; and common sense adds that, with a steady decline in produce, and in the Western consumption of merchandise, the decline must continue throughout the year. Still, money being easy, there is nothing to prevent a progressive advance in the price of any stock which a clique undertakes to buy up; the interesting question is, how shall these cliques sell, and to whom, when they propose to reap the harvest they have sown and manured and bargained for?

HUMAN LIABILITY TO DISEASE.

We once heard a lecturer on Health say: "If the laws of health were strictly obeyed all might live to a good old age. I have no sympathy with the religious consolation which is often offered to the bereaved, as, for example, to a mother when her child dies. I do not believe that it is right to say to her that the Lord has taken away her child. She has thrown it away by disregarding in its case the laws of health." This, it is plain, is a strong statement; but does it go so very far beyond the truth as it at first thought seems to do? Let us see.

There is a marked contrast between man and other animals as to the frequency and variety of disease. Let the comparison be made in regard to those which come under the control of man, and are therefore exposed to somewhat similar influences—horses, cattle, etc. They are by no means as subject to disease as men are. The difference is greatest when we look at the period of infancy. The young of these animals seldom sicken and die, while a very large proportion of the human race die in infancy.

Why this contrast? Is it owing to a difference in original constitution—in the organization and its functions? There is no evidence of this, for the functions of digestion, respiration, circulation, nutrition, or growth, etc., are performed in these animals very much in the same way as in the human system, and therefore we naturally suppose that they would be quite as liable to derangement if they were performed under the same circumstances.

The question then arises, is there any difference in the circumstances adequate to account for the difference of results? If there be such a difference it must come obviously from the mind of man, for it is here that the essential difference between him and other animals lies. And yet, so superior is he in this respect to them that one would think him less liable to disease, from the intelligent control that he can exercise over external circumstances. This would be a legitimate inference if he were a pure being, and had the wisdom which would necessarily come from purity. But sin rules in this superior mind of man, and moves to sinful indulgence, which in all its various forms wars the physical organization and renders it liable to disease. A signal example of the effects of such indulgence we have in the use of alcohol. No brute animal drinks this poison, but its use as a beverage is a prolific source of disease in man.

Then, besides the wrong use of external circumstances, we have the effects of sinful passion in all its varied forms. That this exerts a wide influence in the production of disease there is no doubt, though its working is to a great extent secret.

There is still another cause—the wrong use of the mental powers. The use may be either excessive or wrong in character. This may be seen in all the activities of life that tax particularly the intellect, but especially during education, while mind and brain are growing to maturity. The brute animal has no tendency to disease coming from these mental sources, which so commonly in man give rise to congestions and other changes of the brain, to a great variety of nervous maladies, and to diseases of organs in various quarters from their sympathy with the brain. It may be properly remarked here, that it may be that the brute fact that man has a mind so different in some of its qualities from that of the brute increases the liability to physical derangement, aside from the influence of sinful propensities or of the misuse of the mental powers, for the addition of such high mental endowments creates a wider complication than exists in the system of brute animals, and complication always adds to the risk of disorder.

In estimating the influence of which we have spoken we must remember that they do not end with the individual, but descend to the child, and may accumulate through successive generations. Sometimes diseases themselves are transmitted, but more often it is tendencies to disease or hereditary characteristics which become hereditary. It is the accumulation of these tendencies in the course of generations that must account to a large extent for the greater readiness with which sickness is generated in man than in other animals, when both are exposed to similar external influences. What occurs in the individual is not alone adequate to account for it.

Perhaps it will be said that there are maladies peculiar to mankind which may account for the difference in the aggregate of disease. But may there not be a fair offset to this in the maladies which are peculiar to animals? It is true these appear to be less than those which are peculiar to man; but this may not be so, for some of the latter may really come from transgression of hygienic laws instead of fixed extraneous causes.

We will barely suggest here the inquiry whether there is not more of disease in domesticated than in wild animals, and because they are brought under the influence and control of man, instead of being left entirely to their natural inclinations.

If the views which we have presented be erroneous—if the difference between man and brute animals in regard to the prevalence of disease be not attributable to the causes mentioned—we are driven to the conclusion that there is implanted by the Creator in the very constitution of man a tendency to disease—in other words, that he made the organization a morbid, and not a healthy one—a proposition of which there is not the slightest proof, and which the mind instinctively rejects. The alternative is one from which we can not escape.

As the view which we have presented must then be correct, it follows that a true hygiene may accomplish a vastly greater work than is generally supposed. It has the power of preventing a very large proportion of the disease that now afflicts the human family—all or nearly all that there is more than that which exists in the animal creation around us. Of course it would not do this till it had first removed all the morbid tendencies that have accumulated from the past, a work of renovation which it would require some time to perform.

Whatever may be our estimate of the range of hygiene it is very evident that many of the causes of disease are preventable, and the distinction between these and those of an opposite character we will consider at another time.

CHRISTIAN CHARITY.

The funeral of the late Rev. Dr. EDWARD B. HALL, of Providence, Rhode Island, was a singular and beautiful tribute to the Christian charity of that city and to the saintly character of Dr. HALL. He had been for thirty-three years settled over the First Congregational Unitarian Society, and during all that time his zeal in all good and generous works; his fidelity to the suffering and the poor; his constancy and care in the pastoral office; his ability in the pulpit; and the nobility of his spotless life, had made him perhaps the best beloved citizen in Providence. A great concourse of every sect, and from many places, came to witness to his funeral. The Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the State; the Baptist President of Brown University; a fellow-chapman of the Presbyterian church, a Quaker preacher, and a Unitarianist were among the pall-bearers. No sectarian feeling divided them in life, and they bore their testimony by holding his pall to the purity and piety of the good scholar and faithful citizen.

CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD BONDS.

We stated in our last issue that in case of the failure of the Pacific Railroad Company to pay its coupons attached to its Bonds, these would be paid by the State of California. The fact is, that the interest on these Bonds is paid by that State, by a special Act of its Legislature.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CINCINNATI.

March 6:

In the Senate, the bill to ratify the Missouri Free-trade treaty was passed. A very lengthy message from the President, in response to Mr. Sumner's resolution of inquiry, in regard to the organization of governments in the lately rebellious States, was received and ordered to be printed; also the report of operations in the President's library; both of which were referred to the Committee on Education.

In the House, the Military Academy bill was read, and, on motion of Mr. Network, an amendment was passed, so to amend the bill so that no part of the same shall be applied to any case where any person declared to be in rebellion against the Government of the United States, appointed after the 1st day of January, 1863, and such case shall have been returned to its original relations to the Union, under and by virtue of an act or joint resolution of Congress for that case made and passed. The reciprocity treaty bill came up for consideration. Mr. Mayfield addressed the House in support of the bill. It had become necessary, he said, in consequence of the termination of the Reciprocity Treaty on the 17th of the present month. That treaty had been an ill-considered one from the start. It had been first extracted from us by the armed and mailed upon our Bismarck in 1854, by the unaided assistance of the President, led on by the Imperial Government, and then sent from us by the Senators that favored a bold leap forward. We were to abide by the terms detailed, and being able to withstand a blow, ready to yield to a growth. Hereafter we should treat the Europeans as friends, unless they could otherwise be treated as favorites or associates. By the present bill certain privileges were granted, provided ample equal rights were obtained; but in the mean time the object was increased revenue. To show that the Reciprocity Treaty was not advantageous to us, it was testified to by the Senators of Maine, the Legislatures of New York, Pennsylvania, Michigan, and Maine, the Legislatures of Ohio, Illinois, Pennsylvania, New York, and Vermont, the great majority of all the Western States, and the manufacturers whose business with the Canada had materially decreased; but when the President's officers had tacitly assented to the prospect they had enjoyed, by the transfer of terms less onerous to us, if not less favorable to them, than those of the treaty, they felt that they could afford to try to better by regard to the fishing interests involved. It was thought that it might be desirable to demand a conflict with us a perfect right, easily to be obtained through a collision among vessels, and a suspended fishermen catching her alleged beneficial interpretation; but there was no lack of labor, goods, clothing, and whatever the conflict dates, whenever the alleged protection might be, or by whomsoever perpetrated, each knew that the President would be gone forever, look and live, bold and sick. But the Senate in this bill in relation to the fisheries did not make a mistake. On the contrary, it was believed, especially from the frank and friendly exchange of views between the Committee of Ways and Means and the Senators representing the Provinces, that the terms would be readily accepted by work, if not all the Provinces, certainly by those most interested in the trade. The rates of duty proposed in the bill would afford revenue, and would not, in any case, prove prohibitory; in other words, he expected to take so much raw wool, and woolly of those as heretofore; but before the rate could be allowed a surplus of American produce the privilege must be bought with a price equal at least to our taxes, and often much greater. Even with those terms, a restriction would be placed on those who would do other trade—unfavorable. That part of the bill which gave up the fishing business might be looked upon with more distrust than any thing else. The privilege proposed was small, not much more than the duty paid by them on the salt used in curing their fish, and yet the demoralization in some quarters to regard that as a New England question, and not a national one, had continued even New England men to repudiate the measure—showing because it had been well-proved. Hereafter our persons, including them, must be entirely self-sufficient and self-reliant.

March 7:

In the Senate, Mr. Sumner spoke in favor of two laws against the Constitutional Amendment relating representation.

In the House, there was a protracted debate on the Reciprocity Treaty.

March 8:

In the Senate, Mr. Merrill spoke in support of the Constitutional Amendment.

In the House, the consideration of the reciprocity bill by protest all persons in their civil rights was suspended. Mr. Pillsbury spoke in favor of the bill. Mr. Pillsbury moved to postpone, with instructions to amend, so as to allow every thing paid in the bill, and not having right of action in the United States Court, with double costs in case of recovery. Mr. Pillsbury moved to amend the House in favor of the object of the bill, and gave the reasons which had induced him to make such a motion. Mr. Pillsbury moved in approval of the bill, but specified the constitutional right of Congress to pass it. Mr. May approved the new rate on local, constitutional, and political grounds.

March 9:

In the Senate, the Constitutional Amendment received only 35 votes against 21, 25 votes being the necessary two-thirds majority, the amendment was a failure. A motion to reconsider prevailed, and an amendment was offered by Mr. Dudley.

In the House, the Civil Rights bill was read twice, and Mr. Bingham addressed the House in support of it, as being in view of its features amendments. Mr. Pillsbury, after a short speech on the same bill, was followed by Mr. Wilson in a closing speech in support of the measure. The bill was recommitted to the Judiciary Committee.

The Reciprocity Treaty bill was taken up and debated by several members. Amendments changing the rate of 4 per cent. between raw wool and finished were adopted.

March 10:

The Senate met in session. In the House, the day was given up to protracting. Mr. Sumner created considerable amusement by proposing to consider the President's Bill of Pardon, as well as a grand bank, imposed upon the country by the same Vice-presidents.

March 11:

In the Senate, the bill for the division of Colorado was taken up, and Mr. Sumner spoke against it and in favor of an amendment to prohibit ex-slaves from the office of franchisee.

In the House, after an exciting day, the new Reciprocity Treaty bill was adopted by striking out the receding clause by a vote of 45 to 27.

CHARLES SUMNER.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BLACK & CASE, BOSTON, MASS.]

CHARLES SUMNER.

CHARLES SUMNER is a name that will always remain among the most conspicuous of the present epoch of our history. No American statesman ever stood more steadfastly for the plain American principle of equal rights, and none has ever excited more exasperation or been more bitterly denounced. The reason of this is to be found in his temperment and a certain ideal cast of mind, which compels him unconsciously to disregard the conditions of practicality, and to treat public measures purely from the view of abstract justice. A man who does this must expect to encounter the impatience of friends as well as the hostility of foes. Consequently, from Mr. SUMNER'S first notable public appearance, when he delivered his famous Fourth of July oration in Boston upon "The True Grandeur of Nations," in 1845, to his last elaborate speech in the Senate upon "The Equal Rights of All: the Great Guarantee and the Present Necessity," his course has compelled moral approval rather than kindled popular enthusiasm.

Mr. SUMNER was thirty-four years old at the time of the delivery of the oration. Born in Boston in 1811, he graduated at Harvard College in 1836, and after a year of private study he entered the Law School at Cambridge, where he became the fast friend of his great teacher, Judge STORY. In 1837 he began to practice in Boston, and was at once eminent in his profession, publishing, as reporter, three volumes of Judge STORY'S Circuit Decisions, editing the American Jurist, and lecturing at the Law School in Cambridge. In 1836 he declined a chair, both in the Law School and the College, and the next year went to Europe, where he remained for three years.

The best introductions opened to him the finest social opportunities in Europe, which a mind richly stored, a trained and tenacious memory, and the various sympathies of an accomplished scholar enabled him to improve to the utmost advantage. Few Americans have better seen what was best worth seeing in Europe. His habits of ceaseless industry, his remarkable faculties of acquirement, were in constant play, and he made the personal acquaintance, which in many cases ripened into friendly intimacy, of the most distinguished Europeans. In 1840 he returned and resumed the practice of his profession, publishing, in 1844-5, an elaborate edition of "Vesey's Reports." In politics he was a Whig, although he had taken no prominent political part until the creation of which we have spoken, which was a learned and powerful plea for peaceful arbitration in all international differences. In November, 1845, he spoke in Faneuil Hall against the annexation of Texas as a measure intended to subvert the National Government to the control of the slavery interest. The next year, at the Whig State Convention, he defined in a forcible speech the anti-slavery duties of the Whig party, and, with an intrepidity which in a Boston Whig of that time was remarkable, he published a letter to Mr. ROBERT C. WINTHROP, then the Boston Representative in Congress, sharply rebuking him for his vote in favor of the Mexican war. This led to a rupture with Mr. WINTHROP which has never been healed, and that gentleman records his view of the matter in his volume of speeches and addresses.

The dissolution of the Whig party had already begun. The "Conservative Whigs," as they were called in Massachusetts, of whom CHARLES SUMNER, HORACE MANN, JOHN G. PALFREY, SAMUEL G. HOWE, and RICHARD H. DANA, JUN., were conspicuous leaders, withdrew from the political companionship of WINTHROP, EVERETT, CHOATE, and WINTHROP, and supported, in 1848, the Buffalo Free-soil candidates, MARTIN VAN BUREN and CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS. The schism was final, and from that moment the Boston Whig leadership declined. The seceders seemed to take with them the moral force of their party, and when, in 1850, Mr. WINTHROP became Secretary of State under Mr. FILLMORE and resigned his seat in the Senate, to which Mr. WINTHROP by the party traditions had been considered the natural successor, a coalition of Free-soilers and Democrats, after a long and fierce struggle, succeeded in electing CHARLES SUMNER to Mr. WINTHROP'S seat, and he accepted the office, as he had the nomination, without a single pledge to any party or person.

Mr. SUMNER came to the Senate of the United States a young man, perfectly familiar with international law and with the history and literature of all countries; with a thorough knowledge of the details of the anti-slavery movement, and a profound conviction that the insolent and dangerous determination of the Slave Power was the great peril of the nation. His fame had preceded him, and he was not welcome in a body which the spirit of CALICIOUS controlled. Senators like JEFFERSON DAVIS, who prevailed by audacity, or like DOUGLAS, who despised the moral sentiment, affected to sneer at what were called the dainty fopperies and sophomoric rhetoric of the young Senator. But his speech against the constitutionality of the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850, and the opening thunders of his direct assault upon the Slave Power in the debates upon the Missouri Compromise, apprised these men and the country that there was one Senator at least who, standing upon the broad ground of moral right, was equally at home upon every inch of the Constitution and of law with the most learned and the oldest of his associates. Personally of the kindest heart and most polished manners, he disdained social conciliation of his political adversaries; and his opposition was so inflexible and unswerving toward those whom he believed to be conspiring against the country that he was regarded as the personification of the unbending spirit of Liberty, which the Slave leaders knew to be their most dangerous foe. On the 19th and 20th of May, 1853, Mr. SUMNER delivered a speech upon "The Crime against Kansas," which was unanswerable. In the course of it he spoke satirically of Senator BELL, of South Carolina, and on the afternoon of the 22d, while Mr. SUMNER was writing at his desk, he was assailed by PATRICK S. BURNES, a Representative from South Carolina, and beaten upon the head with a heavy gaiter percha cane until he fell senseless.

It was four years before Mr. SUMNER returned to the Senate. During that time he was subject to constant, often to the severest, medical treatment at home and in Europe. While still disabled the Massachusetts Legislature re-elected him to his seat by a unanimous vote in the Senate and by a vote of several hundreds to seven in the House. Massachusetts felt that while her Senator was yet struggling for life his empty chair was a mere eloquent Representative than any other man could be. In the session of 1859-60 Mr. SUMNER resumed his seat, and his first important speech struck the keynote of his Congressional life and exposed "The Barbarism of Slavery." In the canvass for President, in 1860, he was an active worker; and at the beginning of the war he declared its "main-spring" to be slavery, and that there could be no peace until that was broken by emancipation. This policy he steadily kept until it was adopted by the Government. During the war his speeches upon the "Trent" question and our foreign relations were comprehensive and exhaustive, and had great official weight from his position as Chairman of the Senate Committee upon Foreign Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER'S political career has been identified with the debate and the war springing from Slavery. Believing slavery to be the source of all our woes he has steadily advocated Emancipation as the radical means of national regeneration; and as the war has abolished slavery, his efforts are now turned to secure the overthrow of the spirit of caste in the organization of peace. His will is as strong as his convictions; and it is perhaps his misfortune and that of his cause that, in the constructive period which we have now reached, and in which political considerations are so essential and powerful, political differences are apt to appear to him as moral delinquencies. Inimitably fixed in his own clear perception of the necessary development and ultimate achievements of the great American principle of Equal Rights, he seems anxious to secure at once, by acts of Congress, results which can be better attained by other and higher laws. But in his uncompromising desire that the faith of the United States shall be kept with the Freedmen, and that those who are still panting with the effort to destroy the Government shall not be allowed to share in its administration without satisfactory conditions, he has the hearty sympathy of all who love the Union and the national honor.

Among all American statesmen there have been few so variously and profoundly accomplished as Mr. SUMNER. His literary style is stately and scholastic. Each of his speeches is an exhaustive treatise upon its subject. His oratory is declamatory rather than colloquial or rhetorical. A certain dogmatism of style both in writing and speaking may be easily traced to his intense personal consciousness, and to the sober times and events amidst which he has moved. But his chief fame will be that of a man who, during the maturing of a terrible conspiracy against human rights, stood as firm and clear for justice as a light-house in the fury of a storm. Without one faltering tone of compromise or fear or wiles conciliation his lips proclaimed the everlasting truth that justice is right, and is therefore the best policy. The concluding words of his late speech are the true motto of his life. "And now, declaring my belief in Liberty and Equality as the God-given birth-right of all men, let me say in the same spirit, if this be an error, it is an error which I love; if this be a fault, it is a fault which I shall be slow to renounce; if this be an illusion, it is an illusion which I pray may wrap the world in its magic forms."

VICTORY AND TIME.

CHAPTER XI.

As the days and weeks creep by, it is very slowly but very certainly ascertained in Somerville that the great and glorious victory near Corinth was not, at last, quite so complete and final a rout of the Yankees as was at first believed. Somehow they have not fled utterly away—the miserable remnant left of them—but are still lingering, in a singular manner, near or upon the very battle-field. And it is so strange of Beauregard, that he has not long ago descended upon them again from Corinth like a thunder-bolt. Why does he not make a finish of it? What is he staying there at Corinth for? people are beginning impatiently to ask.

Like many another military idol of the time, before him and after him, Beauregard is slowly winning in public estimation. Good Mr. Ellis thanks God for it. "The career of any one General, like Napoleon, in our cause," he avows, "would be fatal to our liberties. We wish victory to be won for us in such a way that to no one man, but to the whole people, and to God above all, the glory may redound." Certain it is, though there were ever so many just on the point of becoming the Marions, the Washingtons, the Napoleons of the war, in some way or other each just missed it as by a hair's-breadth, but missed it altogether.

But the Yankees are even approaching Corinth. Lamum fills the Somerville Star with ample reasons why. Beauregard is hatching some great event within his intrenchments at Corinth, and people say they hope so, and that he will be quick about it; but there are sinking hearts in every bosom in Somerville. However, there is Island No. 10. It has been made a perfect Gibraltar. It is fully demonstrated that the passage of that Island in the Mississippi River by the Federal fleet is an absolute impossibility. Every Number of the Somerville Star exults in "Island Ten," and in the laughable notion of the Yankees that it can be passed. And so for weeks; also as the first approach of an epidemic the rumor gets afloat that Island Ten has been evacuated.

It was not Lamum's fault! To do him strict justice, never from the first had any item, or any particle of an item, appeared in his columns save of good news for the Confederacy. Many a prophecy did he make of great and glorious events; many a statement did he continually repeat, on the best authority, of something or other highly favorable to the Confederacy. Steadily as the days rolled by were his prophecies unfulfilled and his statements disproved, yet you would never gather a syllable to that effect from his paper. And so reader thereof filed away each Number of the Star for future reference as carefully, or with such deep satisfaction, as did Mr. Ferguson.

Lamum had remarked: "If our gallant heroes should evacuate Columbus, it will be only to make a more impregnable stand at Island Ten." Long after Island Ten was evacuated Lamum casually remarks in his columns: "If our able and experienced Generals should evacuate Island Ten it is only to make a stand at Fort Pillow, but a short distance below;" and thereupon follows several columns of such minute description of Fort Pillow—its natural advantages and its armaments—that even a child could understand that of its capture no one need entertain the least fear. "Deluded by their frenzied leaders they dream even"—Lamum was frequently observing in his paper—"of capturing New Orleans!" If Colonel Jaggins read Lamum's full and enthusiastic description of Fort Jackson and Fort St. Philip, and the other Gibralters by which New Orleans was secured from the possibility of being taken, once he read it a dozen times. The boom costing millions of dollars stretching across the river below the forts seems to him a waste of money. And then, the gigantic steamships building at New Orleans to dash to the Federal vessels, to the Colonel they had assumed a grandeur of size and armament under the hand of energetic Lamum from which even a Brunel would have shrunk aghast.

"From what I learn of that splendid ship of war," good Mr. Ellis had said to his pastor, "even if the Federals should pass the forts below, of which I have no fear, that vessel alone, moored as it is in front of the city, could drive them back."

"But the papers speak of it as not yet completed," ventured Mr. Arthur.

"One side is, one side is," urged Mr. Ellis, warmly, "the side toward the river; the guns on that side are enough, amply enough."

And to this his friend had no reply. Stealthily and awfully as the deadly blast of which the Spaniards say, "It kills a man but does not put out a taper," comes the news that New Orleans, too, is captured! A painful thing it is to state, but imperceptibly to themselves men begin to distrust Lamum and all his herd! Undefined, unacknowledged even to themselves, men begin to reason that, if the editors had so often deluded them upon such points as Bowling Green, Columbus, Fort Donelson, Island Ten, Fort Pillow, Rozanne, Pulaski, New Orleans, Corinth, might they not have been unsafe guides on all other points also relating to Secession and its consequences? Slowly, slowly.

"I think I am beginning clearly to see the hand of Providence in lengthening out this matter," Guy Brooks remarked one night to his pastor as they sat together in the study of the latter. "You know my brother, Paul Brooks; he has been down lately from his solitude among the Pines. He was always fond of solitude and reflection—old-fashioned that he is. He has been giving me the benefit of his months of thought up there. We are, he thinks, passing through a revolution indeed, not only a political, but a social, moral, religious revolution. Were it only a political revolution, the establishment of the Confederacy, or the putting down of Secession say, it might have been a thing begun and over in a few months. But it is to be, he thinks, a total revolution in our deepest and dearest convictions on many subjects of vastly greater importance than the mere question of Secession and Union. Such revolutions of thought, belief, opinion, feeling can not be effected all at once. To be sincere and permanent, people must have time to think; yes, time, plenty of it, to think."

"For the divisions of Reshen there were great thoughts of heart," said the minister. "I have been much struck with that passage of Scripture myself of late. Yes, the political leaders have full space, for instance, in which to show themselves—"

"From the tips of their horns to the points of their cloven feet," interrupted the lawyer. "And the people are slowly but steadily finding them out; it is a lesson being very slowly learned, but once learned it will never be forgotten on this continent forever."

"Unless I greatly mistake the South is learning other lessons also," said the minister, after a thoughtful pause. "God is causing us to read over again, beneath the Morning watch of his providence, other matters in which I for one was as thoroughly settled and satisfied as any man could be. We will not speak upon that matter just now—let us wait and see."

"We will see one day," the lawyer remarked, "the wonderful dealing of the Almighty with us in permitting this war to linger so long. Suppose Missouri had resulted the other way, the Confederacy been crushed in the bud, it would have been a mere victory of a day—nothing else. There would have been nothing of a radical cure of the evil, nothing safe and permanent afterward. I tell you, Sir," continued he, rising to his feet, and leaning his body three against the mantle as if the idea was too large and free to be expressed save upon his feet, "especially we here, at the South, are slowly, steadily coming toward convictions, resolutions which shall be those of our own minds and hearts. The bays are holding the question open only till we have had time to think the whole matter to an end. As firmly as I believe in my own existence, I do believe that this whole continent is steadily coming to such a measure of sentiment as will make us such a Union—such a nation as—"

"The old Union was but an emblem of a scaffolding tower," the minister added for him. "I tell you, Mr. Brooks, Southerners as we both are, we can not disguise from ourselves the fact that, on some points, we of the South lag in the march, are a century or so behind the sentiment, the conviction, the Christianity of the times. I have had an uneasy conviction of the kind for years, but quieted myself with the knowledge of its being the providence of God, his peculiar dispensation in our case. And it is only God's providence in present events which I am now waiting to understand. For one I have no notion of fighting against God. Nor have I any intention of being upon the obdurate side, the warring side of a great question. If you glance your eye over the history of the world you will notice that there are certain periods of time when you can run, as it were, a pencil line between where one era ends and a new and better era begins. And there always is a party for the old era fighting blindly and desperately for it! God helping me, I belong not to the old, worn-out era which the world is sloughing off, but to that era which is better, which is sure to succeed, which is that which nearer the Christ that is to come. My happening to be born in the Sandwich Islands would have been poor excuse for was, therefore, to have fought against ritalization and Christianity when they had actually launched from God on its shores!"

And it was well for Edward Arthur, and for the many like him scattered throughout the South, that he and they had a belief in those days clear enough, strong enough, inspiring enough, to bear them up through poverty, and the alienation of their dearest friends, and the hatred and insult of innumerable enemies, and death always threatened, in some cases actually inflicted; a belief, thank God, which grew clearer, stronger, more inspiring, as the darkness and the peril became more dense. Easy enough it was for you, Sir, living outside the South during those days, to possess convictions clear and right upon the great question. You heard nothing else all day among your friends. You read nothing else in your papers, pamphlets, books. You had the one conviction poured upon you from the platform with all force of argument and eloquence. You had it urged upon you in every meeting that met your eye, flashed upon you in every transparency, waved before you in every flag, thundered upon you in cannon exulting over victory, and in the infinite hurrahs of the people! Little merit in your going with the right—how easy it was to you!—when you were in the centre of a great torrent pouring irresistibly onward.

But look at this man, Edward Arthur, one case in multitudes at the South during those long and dark months. From the first hour of that suicidal Secession he received no line of correspondence from any one outside the South, not any during the first two years of the war, not a line from a correspondent within the South, save in endless-istic support of Secession. Such of his correspondents as shared his convictions were positively silent, well aware that the seal of a letter was no bond whatever against the reading of the letter by dozens before it could reach the owner's eye; at the utmost an innumerable, a carefully-veiled servant, a word here and a phrase there, capable of being understood only by the one to whom the letter was addressed. From that hour, during the same length of time, no Northern or European paper, pamphlet, or book met his eye—every printed line which did meet his gaze being in furious advocacy of Secession. Except as their arms proved it, scarce a hint glimmered through the darkness of opinion and sentiment outside the blockade. By himself, even his friends entertaining similar views, confining those views mainly to their own homes, often speaking and acting in direct opposition to their own real opinions; thinking, alone and unaided, by himself and for himself, he arrived at those opinions to which he held so to his life itself, as to more than his life, the grasp upon the opinion being for him to relax his hold even upon life.

And it was better as it was. Only, never wonder at the clearness and energy with which Southern men held to views which they have thus attained. No man values his pains so much as the man who has earned them with sweat and toil; the bells of the full-moon hold not to her pearls with the convulsive grasp of the diver who has brought them up from the depths and darkness of roaring waters.

Lammum says, in his last Star, that I am a traitor to my native soil," the lawyer said, after a long pause. "I really wonder if I am," he continued gravely, weighing the proposition in his mind with his finger behind his ear. "What is my pay for being a traitor? It isn't office. Months ago Colonel Ret Roberts told me that any thing I would have he would see that I did have if I said so. It is a singular fact, but not one, not a single one of the leaders in Secession in or around Somerville but use this hour in receipt of salary in some form. Roberts is a Confederate States Senator; Lammum has the printing of the Confederate laws; Tim Lammum, Lammum's nephew, is a Commissioner; Colonel Jaggins has a contract for corn; Dr. Paul is making thousands by his contract for beef; even Captain Simmons is clerk, when sober, of the Confederate Court; and Bob Withers is a Tax Collector; Joe Staples is Receiver of Confiscated Property—not a man of them but has a fat office, or, if in the army, but is a Colonel or a Quartermaster. Brabe? On account of my opinions my business is ruined and nothing else to look to; my best friends will hardly speak to me. I hold to my original opinions upon Secession against every thing on earth. As to abandoning them—the fact is," added the lawyer, "as Paul, that brother of mine, says, either I am entirely and hopelessly deranged or the Secessionists are."

It is weeks ago now since it had occurred to Mrs. Sorel, knitting, spinning, weaving, making starch, soap, candles, hats, caps, shoes, and every thing else at her place near Somerville, that it would be a great favor to her if Mr. Arthur could occupy the vacant front-room on the left-hand side of the hall in her house. She has nobody, now Frank is gone, but herself and Bobby. It was a delicate matter to bring about under all the circumstances. But women are the best opponents in the world. Talkytrands are they by sex; and Mrs. Sorel had her purpose accomplished and Mr. Arthur safely at home in her front-room almost before he knew it was a thing in view. The truth is, he himself and Mrs. Bowles felt the propriety of the step as well as Mrs. Sorel, and only Mrs. Sorel could have managed it so quietly and pleasantly. Today Sorel is a sober little fellow, fond of his home and his book and his quiet sports, the very image of his mother; it will be a pleasure to Mr. Arthur to direct his studies, another reason for the arrangement.

The propriety of the step! Only you who read these lines, after painful experiences of your own, can understand all the bitterness of meaning herein implied. Not a day but Edward Arthur was made to feel and see it. The strong Secessionists outside of his church had long since removed all doubt from his mind in regard to their opinion of his position. Colonel Ret Roberts had never entered his church in his life. That, however, of course, Gentleness of his stamp never go to church. People not members of the church never had, as a general rule, much desire to attend church—now they have none at all. If some preacher who is also Colonel of a regiment is to preach, or if Brother Barker is to give clear Scripture proof of God's cordial approval of Secession, if there is to be some Sabatival variation of the one strain of glory to the South in the highest, on earth war to the knife, and eternal ill-will to the Yankees, men go to church to be that much more encouraged in a cause in which they are beginning to feel more and more the need of encouragement. But not to hear the old Gospel? To be told over again the old, old story of their being sinners and of Christ being a Saviour? No, Sir! heaven pales its ineffable glories and hell its fires in contrast with the lurid flames of the war.

When professing Christians have become so apathetic in regard to religion Mr. Arthur expects nothing of the rest of Somerville. Yet it touched him keenly that Sabbath morning when Mrs. Roberts made such a point of meeting him, when he visited her class in turn, and shook him with such special cordiality by the hand. He well knew what her eyes worn with weeping meant, and how filling again with tears as she turned from him and stooped as if to tie again the scarf around the throat of her little boy, looking up with bold brow and splendid eyes so like his father's. When immediately after Sabbath-school she left with her children, not waiting until service, her pastor knew as well as if she had told him of the letters from her husband at Richmond requiring her never again to hear her pastor preach; knew as by intuition all the wiles and shams against him with which Colonel Ret Roberts sustained his own spotless reputation of patriotism. He had forbidden her entering even the church. At first she resisted so far as the Sabbath-school was concerned; but it was too painful, better stay at home altogether. How painful to her pastor was that vacant seat henceforth only you who occupied a like situation, and there are many of you, in those days can tell!

And with Mrs. Roberts there fell away many even of his warmest friends in days of old. "Mr. Arthur was a good man; they had known him too many years to doubt that; but now that he was a Union man!" Of what use to call upon them in their homes? Only political discussion, warm, perhaps heated. And so, what was left him but to pursue the even tenor of his way?

"Resign? No, Sir. The great body of the church are content that you should continue preaching to them the Gospel as of old," said Guy Brooks, whenever he consulted him upon the subject. "You run in conscience do only what you are doing. Let us be as quiet as possible; let us wait and hope." And most peacefully and factually did Mr. Brooks, and Mr. Ferguson, and the many like them, attend at service, listening as if with double attention, greeting him on every meeting with triple cordiality.

"You can hardly imagine how painful it is to me," said Mr. Arthur to his friend the lawyer, one gloomy evening as they sat together in the study of the former. "Men whose esteem I hoped I had secured forever pass me without speaking. Even many who do drag to greet me do it coldly and harshly. Even those who I know do fully agree with me in my opinions, and who would not enter the church if I pursued any other course, seem afraid to be seen speaking with me on the street."

"And have not a syllable to say in your defense when you are cursed, as you most continually and fervently are, over Somerville," asked the lawyer, who, in his own dependency, would have been a friend in keeping with those around Job as he sat on his dunghill.

And it was well it was so. Too dependent on others for his happiness, Edward Arthur was fast learning to stand firm in the consciousness of his own integrity—to dispense with all friendship besides its appreciating and enjoying, as he never before conceived of doing, the presence of him who stoeketh closer than a brother. Pale and thin and worn, he was only at a lesson which was to last him his life—the lesson itself was not to last forever, but its results.

"I declare," said the minister, after a pause, "the opinion that I am a traitor to my soil seems to be so universal an opinion, and is so unceasingly expressed, that I have at times almost a sense of shame as for actual guilt. However, that only keeps me at a perpetual reconsideration of my original views. And, alas for me!" he added, with a sigh, "those views are only deepening and strengthening every hour."

"If you were only fixed as a minister my brother Paul lately heard of it would suit exactly. Paul was telling me of it when he was down from the Pines. It is a minister as conscientiously opposed to Secession," continued Guy Brooks, "as I am or as you are—oh, decided, strong, east iron at that point. But he is an Episcopal minister, you see. His bishop has written out the prayers for him, and strong they are for Secession as language can make them, for the blessing of God upon the Confederate arms, for the speedy and total defeat of the Federals, and all that. Twice every Sunday that Union minister stands solemnly up and offers those prayers. Worse than that, the bishop has lately appointed a special prayer-meeting, with prayers to match, to be held two or three times during the week, for the success of the Confederate armies."

"And, true to his canonical obligations, he prays them!" asked Mr. Arthur. "Singular position for a worshiper of God to fill—deliberately, occasionally, kneeling before the Almighty, one set of petitions on his lips, exactly the reverse set of supplication in his— Never mind!" said the minister, interrupting himself, "it is none of my business."

"But it keeps all so straight and pleasant," reasoned the lawyer. "Every now and then the bishop fills his pulpit in his regular visitation; and he always preaches a sermon full and most decided for the Confederacy—Brother Barker over again, only in lawn and with manuscript. But no wonder; the Bishop's negroes have been running away dreadfully of late. His expenses for dogs alone in trailing—"

"My dear Mr. Brooks," interrupted the minister, "do let us speak of something else. A milder, more pious, more sincere man than this bishop before these troubles neither you nor I ever knew. The times have changed him, as they have changed so many of us. There was a time when there lived not a minister at the South who dreamed of alluding in the pulpit to political matters. And now? Would Paul, would Peter, would Heber, Simson of Oxford, Wesley, Whitfield, Nettleton, Daniel Baker do it were they now alive? Would the Saviour do it did he to-day—if such a thing can be imagined—walk the soil of North or South? To me the side the minister happens to be on is a mere nothing in comparison; it is his abandoning the Gospel that is his deadly sin, whether he preach Secession or preach the Federal Union. I feel today as if I had somehow become suddenly obsolete—as if the whole world had passed by and left me in the rear—as if I was far behind the times."

"And you are," said the Kentuckian, "behind the times? Yes, Sir, eighteen hundred years! But Paul says it is the richest thing in the world—that Union minister standing up in the pulpit, as he has to do once every two or three months, reading long pastoral letters from the bishop in his discourse, political indications of the South, you know, the poor fellow reading it with the necessary emphasis and inflection—queer position for a free man to occupy!"

Mrs. Warner did not think so, however, when Mr. Arthur called there next. Of all his pastoral duties none more unpleasant than a visit to Mrs. Warner—until, at least, the minister took a lesson from Dr. Warner, and sat and twined his beard. Of late any one could tell, just by seeing Dr. Warner on the streets, that the gusts at home these days were more violent than ever. The Doctor's necktie was always to one side now, the long ends hanging out, and dreadfully frayed. There was a crushed appearance about his linen; a strip or so of the lining of his coat hanging loose to the breeze from wrists and skirts; more buttons off than of yore from waistcoat and pantaloons; a wild and disordered state of his hair, too, a good deal of it gone altogether, which caused him strongly to resemble a mariner just out of a terrible tempest. And, storm-tossed and weather-beaten as the Doctor was, he was only the fatter for it all. In fact, beaten upon as the Doctor was by the eternal gusts, he had got into the habit of retreating completely within himself these days, and his body had expanded itself to make room for him.

"What I regret, what Dr. Warner regrets, if he would only say so—only he is one of those men who never will speak out as he ought—is, that you do not pray for the Confederacy as you should, Mr. Arthur," said Mrs. Warner to that gentleman, sitting in her parlor this last time. "If you do not feel prepared to preach sermons for the Confederacy and in denouncement of the Yankees, like Brother Barker and ever so many ministers more, well, you needn't do it—that is, if you can feel it in your conscience not to do so; though I am sure our revolutionary forefathers took their swords and muskets even into the pulpits with them. But why don't you pray for the Confederacy—pray for it warm and strong? There's Brother Barker—and he a Northern man too!—he prays every Sunday, I'm told by Mrs. Staples, that the Almighty will defeat, destroy, annihilate the Federals; that He will entrap them in snares, deceive them in policy, decimate them with measles, small-pox, and yellow-fever; not leave enough of them alive next battle for the survivors to bury the rest! Pray? yes, and for their eternal damnation too. They are fiends, they are devils, they are worse than the worst savages; they richly deserve the agonies of the pit! Why, look at it, Dr. Was—I mean Mr. Arthur! They are invading our soil, they are burning our cities and homes, they are slaughtering our men, women, and children; they want to set our negroes free; they are hiring them all the time to rise and cut our throats, and wash their black feet in our blood! Suppose those Yankees succeed; they make us their slaves, to hew wood for them—yes, drawers of wood and hewers of water to them long-legged, tallow-faced, peddling, cheating Yankees! I'd die first—die a thousand and a thousand times over! I've learned how to shoot with a revolver, and I'd kill them as soon as I could a snake. A snake?—yes, a genuine, Southern-born rattlesnake is more respectable than a Yankee! I've had our carving steel sharpened to a point for a dagger; if they come here I'll stab the first Yankee that enters that door! Come here? I tell you, Doctor—Mr. Arthur—I'll burn down my house with my own hands before they should have it. I'd make Doctor Warner shoot down every Hand he's got—and they all came to him through me—before he should let the Yankees get them. That's what Brother Barker says, Dr. Peel too, Lammum, and all. Did you read Colonel Ret Roberts's last speech? Only his wife is such a poor, downcast, silent sort of a woman! But you must pray for the Confederacy stronger, Mr. Arthur. Every body in Somerville is saying you are an Abolitionist. And just suppose they was to hang you some day; you may not know it, but people have threatened long ago to hang you. Ain't you afraid? You know they have hung ever so many." And oh, how much, much more!

And Mr. Arthur sat, holding, instinctively, hard to the arms of the large parlor rocking-chair in which he sat—sat while the upraised gaze of the canal locks poured their tide upon him—sat waiting till the gush would flow itself out.

And so Mrs. Warner went on, taking snuff with her stick energetically all the time.

But the snuff which she so copiously dipped is not Mrs. Warner's only cause. Last night another of those wretched letters, written to some one in Somerville—nobody knows whom—from somebody near Corinth, has announced that Beauregard has actually evacuated Corinth, and is retreating South in confusion! But a day or so before there had been a well-authenticated report in Somerville that Beauregard had ordered his army to prepare for an immediate move upon the enemy. Lammum had filled the last Star with it; the thrilling address of Beauregard to his soldiers before the great victory that was to be; the enthusiasm of his army; the utter demoralization of the Federals; the whole regiment that had already been shot in the Union intrenchments for mutiny; the almost unanimous unwillingness of the troops, Yankees though they were, to fire another shot upon the Confederates.

"Hopeful as we have always been in regard to matters at Corinth," said Lammum, "we are now positively confident of a great and glorious victory, full particulars of which we will give in our next. Slowly but steadily has Beauregard been maturing his brilliant plans. All information from Corinth agrees that the thunder-bolt so long in forging has doubtless been launched long ere this. We congratulate all true Southern men in advance upon the great victory. As to the wretched traitors among us, let them know their day of doom is at hand!"—and vastly more to the same effect.

But one of those miserable letters has arrived, saying that all Beauregard's preparations were not for the rout of the Yankees, and for an immediate march either on St. Louis or Chicago, as Lammum and all others had so confidently predicted, but for a hasty retreat—a retreat under the fire of the Yankees—and leaving behind innumerable deserters. And, somehow, in ten hours after the arrival in Somerville of the letter, every body knows its contents—believes them too, no matter what they may say; past experiences have taught Somerville pretty thoroughly by this time that, amidst the perpetual rumors abroad, the rumors favorable to the Confederacy are almost invariably false, and the rumors of an unfavorable nature are invariably true—or, at least, too near true to be comfortable. Those wretched letters! Nothing could have been done that was not done. A full list had been furnished the postmaster in Somerville of those persons whose letters must be looked into before it could be decided whether their owners are to have them or not. Faithfully did Mr. Smithers, the postmaster, obey these instructions, but with a painful sense all the time of deserting the Penitentiary thereof. Yet almost every week somebody or other in Somerville was receiving and spreading abroad the astounding contents of some letter which should never have been written; or, if written, should never have been read except by an official; or, if read, should never have been whispered to a living soul—never. These foolish letters! Written from the various seats of the war by people who had reference in writing only to the facts, and not at all to the influence of those facts; unknown, unofficial people—in short, unalarmed people, who, in tenderly sustaining the Confederacy against every shock, had no most unusual income to nurse and protract thereby. The contrast, the steadily running contrast, between the pointed information from the seats of the war and the undercurrent of private information from the same sources was amazing. Between the cross-streams of public and of private intelligence the air was always filled with all sorts of rumors as with the flying froth of conflicting waters.

Here is a bright summer morning upon which Dr. Warner casually drops in upon Guy Brooks in his office. "I would not have my name mentioned in it, you understand," Dr. Warner says, in a low, mysterious tone to the lawyer, "but there is a rumor afloat this morning that Richmond has been taken. Of course I do not vouch for the truth of it. Sam Peters was telling me this morning—let it go for what it is worth—that he overheard Lammum and Captain Simmons speaking earnestly together about Central America, tracing the route to it on a map open on Lammum's table. Of course we attach no importance to what Sam Peters says, but it really looks as if the leading Secessionists were contemplating a speedy flight, taken in connection with the other report from another source, you observe!" and the mild Doctor wipes his perspiring forehead, from which the hair is being blown away so in his high winds at home; quite bold the Doctor is becoming.

"I pay no attention to such things," says Guy Brooks, with brightening eyes, "but it may seem somewhat of a coincidence; the Secessionists—the leaders I mean—have had a remarkably depressed look about them of late. Fshaw! it's all nonsense; but I suppose you have heard about some lady or other suddenly coming in upon Mrs. Colonel Ret Roberts and finding her bathed in tears with her children around her. She had just heard the interpretation is, from Roberts at Richmond that the game was over, you see." But the lawyer is ashamed of himself as he says it.

"We are kept so completely in the dark—taking all these things together. Ah, well, we shall know sooner or later," says Dr. Warner, shaking his head as he considers it all over.

"And so Dr. Gianni is running off with some of your patients?" inquires the lawyer at last. "Such a load of patients, you know, I can not help it. It is impossible for a man to think and feel except as he does think and feel; and I make such a poor hypocrite do the best at it I can," says poor Dr. Warner.

"That very day the Scotchman was telling his pastor of this same rumor. "It is all over Somerville; people really believe it," said Mr. Ferguson. "And he was right. Only wish to believe anything, it is the easiest thing to do so. "It may be true, you know," said the Scotchman, before he had done referring to it; always scoffing at all news he did not wish to believe, too.

"Do you see this portfolio?" asked the Scotchman of a ponderous scrap-book lying open upon his table, with covers of blue pasteboard a yard square; half a foot thick the volume is. And he turned lovingly over the irregular leaves—pamphlets, speeches, sermons, placards, hand-bills, written notices of all shapes and sizes, newspapers, too, from a yard across down, and the later dates, to sheets of eight inches, and of all the colors of the rainbow, according as wrapping paper was being resorted to under stress of the blockade. "Now, here is a complete set of the news and the rumors since the beginning of this awful rebellion," continued Mr. Ferguson, turning over his collection with the pride of a virtuoso. "You see, I own lands in the State. My business used to be selling those lands. I have none to sell now, not a rod, for paper-money, you understand. So I have a good deal of leisure to spend on this collection. When a rumor is about captured, I write it out myself and paste it in," and he turned in succession to several pages of his own writing carefully interleaved with the rest of the ponderous volume, his best hand it was in, and with date in full to each rumor, and plenty of capitals and marks of exclamation.

"And each one of those items was in its turn as a dose of ipecac to those who did not want to believe it, and as—"

"A glass of arsenic to those who did," said Mr. Ferguson, contemplating the sentences for his pasture. "Now I have even classified these items for a regular index, here in this book, as the volume," continued the Scotchman, laying his hand upon it. "I have almost nothing else to do; and I have become interested in it as a systematic study of this war, and of human nature during it. Would you like to hear me classify them?"

The Scotchman had a grizzled beard covering all his mouth, and a dry, dialectic way of speaking, with his chin fixed steadily between his upper lip, and in crisp sentences. He walked with a stiff, slow step, never turning his head right or left, favoring his most intimate friends with the slightest possible motion of his hand, striding up and down on his stanchion, never a shade to one side or the other, when he met them. He had often occurred to Mr. Arthur that Mr. Ferguson, if himself classified, would have been labeled of the Linnæus species—a botanist ending for flowers only for analysis, without the slightest reference to their hue or fragrance.

"From the beginning of this rebellion," continued he, with the dry precision of a lecturer, "all of the innumerable rumors I have classified as follows:

"First—The Confederacy is on the verge of recognition by Europe. I have put this first, as being the most frequently repeated and the most steadily believed.

"Second—The North is bankrupt, and can not carry on the war beyond the fifteenth of next month at the furthest. This was a more frequent rumor at first than it has been of late.

"Third—A great revolution favorable to the South is impending at the North.

"Fourth—France, England, and Spain have determined upon an instant armed intervention unless their terms are agreed upon by the end of this month; and the papers all contain these terms, drawn fully out, article by article, in diplomatic style.

"Fifth—An impending mutiny of the entire Federal army against the accused scheme into which they have been hoodwinked.

"Sixth—Great and glorious victories, with the slaughter of half of the Federal army and the capture of the other half, stores, arms, gun-boats beyond calculation. To the same head belongs the repeated capture of Washington city.

"Last—The arrival, 'at last,' of the Confederate fleet, iron-plated, fully armed, from Europe, and the impending destruction of the Federal navy. Such are the classes of rumors, one or more of which are continually afloat. It matters not how often a rumor has been abroad and disproved before; like the balls of the juggler, one or more of them is continually in the air none the less.

"I mention no such small matter as the death—now by pneumonia, now by wounds, now by the hand of some brave Southerner penetrating into his camp for the purpose—of, in turn, every leading officer of the Federal army. Perpetually are they being killed and buried. If they are perpetually rising again from the dead it makes no difference. If they are proved to be alive to-day they are certain to die of disease or to be killed again in the papers to-morrow. There is not a single one of their deaths that I have not down here," said the Scotchman with pride.

"It is amazing how readily the report of yesterday is dropped," said Mr. Arthur. "It was eagerly heard and believed yesterday, yet its disproof to-day hardly excites a remark. It puzzles me."

"Not at all," said the countryman of Hill and Brown, in his sententious manner. "The only reason for every operation of the human mind. Yesterday's news is forgotten because to-day's news is so much more glorious; then, yesterday's rumor was false, it seems, but that of to-day is certainly true. Besides, the hoarsey said it may be true is so unflattering. One thing that interests me in this continual stream of news is my studying therein the working of the leaders of this most disastrous delusion. Like the paid pyrotechnist of a Fourth of July night, they see to it, out of sight themselves, that some rocket is always in the air to keep the paying populace amused. They have such a supply to select from," said Mr. Ferguson, laying his hand and hairy palm on his forehead classification.

"It is but to dash off the lie best suited to the hour in a few rapid lines, send it to the next paper, and in a few days it is read and believed over the whole South. If you had studied this collection as I have, Sir, you would find that just when all the appearances are at their darkest for Secession, then, and exactly then, the largest and most splendid lie is whisking overhead. It comes down a stick, to be sure; but it answers the purpose of the moment, and, on the next occasion, up goes another."

Mr. Arthur did not care to say so to his friend—he was too weary of strife for that; but he knew it was all only a whitewash of fortune Mr. Ferguson. Like multitudes of other men, the Scotchman ascribed to the politicians for more than was at all due them; for far more than they ever even dreamed of doing they had all the course or all the credit, as the case was, thought the minister. They fished the placid ocean into respect, he said to himself, as he rode slowly home to Mrs. Sorrel's. What long-continued and superhuman exertion it required! But now that they have fairly wrought it into commotion, the waters howl and heave and sparkle with all phosphorescent fires by the force of their own fury.

Arrived at home and gone to bed, Mars, not Morpheus, presided over his slumbers. Slumber? During the first hour or so after lying down he tossed as on the wild waves, wrecked, and the bottom of ocean miles beneath his struggling feet. The waters around him are thick with men and women clatching at and burled off from each other, the drowning and the drowned. How red they are, how the waters shiny and clinging, so that he can hardly even struggle in them. How many upturned faces rise and sink there! Can that bold fellow with the hazel eyes be Colonel Ben Bolstead? The thin face of the postage stamps jostled back by Jimmie's Bob Withers's ruby countenance and the pale cheek of Emma? Horror! These flouts by him a fair form, every look of whose streaming hair is dearer to him than his, thus made by the sudden countenance of Colonel Dugans, giving place to that of Mrs. Dugans; and amidst all the quivering, gasping terror the drowsy or heavy as from her lips. "What I say is, why can't they stay where they come from? We want't interrupt them that I know of," and the sleeper is awakened by his own laughter.

"Look here, my friend," he roars to himself, "along this way madness lies." He is right there. Only give up to the thoughts pressing like the Kamoses after you just now, and you are in the highway to whited hair and brow prematurely wrinkled, and insanity and suicide. Millions in the South are on that path now, suffering along all its degrees. Sleeplessness? For the first year of the war men could not sleep of nights for the horror of the thing. However, no nature creates, they say, a sort of integument, a callous membrane about a bullet lodged in the body, so there grows a kind of covering, a callous accustomedness about the horror of the hour in the hearts of men, enabling them to endure it.

With solemn resolve to go to sleep, Mr. Arthur, after pacing the floor an hour or so in fermenting it, lay down again. He is just getting into a comfortable daze when the thought strikes him up and out of bed again; "Suppose at the North Christian men and Christian ministers are as frantic, rabid, raving, unchristian, blood-thirsty for the Right as Brother Barker and his kind are here for the Wrong?" And he travels sides up and down his room upon that track of thought. About his three-hundredth turn at the wardrobe at the end opposite his bed the idea smites him full alsest, and halts him there for long minutes; and isn't this just the process, you poor creature, by which the whole land, North and South, is being prepared, through the deep humiliation of the church, for the greatest religious reaction the land and the world has ever known—to follow, can't you see it, on the heels of the war?

And the Rev. Edward Arthur goes again to bed upon this upstart, and sleeps sweetly until morning.

RATS AND MICE.

Few persons are aware how many kinds of mice are to be found in the world, or the extent of the ravages they will commit. It is a curious and interesting fact that in many cases where mice have increased to a great extent in corn or grass lands, and in extensive plantations, birds and beasts of prey increase in proportion to food on them. Kites, hawks, owls, eagles, jays, and crows, as well as storks, vultures, foxes, etc., may then be found in great abundance, assembled to feed on these destructive little quadrupeds, perhaps in localities where few of them had seldom been met with previously, so accurately does nature provide against what might otherwise be a serious evil. Mice will produce from six to eight young ones at a time, and breed several times in the course of the year, so that their increase must be very great were it not for their numerous enemies.

The mouse is exceedingly attached to her young ones. A lady of our acquaintance on removing a box in a room very seldom used, found a mouse's nest behind it. The female mouse on being discovered sat upright on the nest, and began to scream in a very loud and alarmed manner, evidently apprehensive for the safety of her young ones. My informant was so surprised at this occurrence that she went to call her father to witness it. On her return with him, after a very short absence, it was found that the parent mouse had removed all her young ones away, and they were afterwards discovered under a dust of drawers in the same room, but on the opposite side to that in which the nest was first discovered, so rapid had been her proceedings, and so great her alarm for the safety of her young.

It is very difficult to account either for the disposition of the proceedings of some animals. One would think that a cat would on all occasions in her power kill a mouse, especially when she had her kittens to feed; but this has not always been the case. An eminent surgeon, and an excellent naturalist, whose veracity may be strictly relied on, on visiting a prison in one of the Middle Counties of England, came into a room accompanied by an attendant, in which he saw a cat gnawing upon three mice. "If you will stand quiet for a short time," said the man, "you will see a strange sight." He did accordingly, when, to his great astonishment, he saw a mouse creep out of a hole, go to the cat, and begin sucking her. The attendant assured him that this was a circumstance of constant occurrence, and our informant was so struck with it that he not only witnessed it himself on subsequent occasions, but brought some of his friends to do so.

An old gentleman of my acquaintance who in the habit of sitting before a fire in his library, and doing there for some time, remaining perfectly still. A mouse was in the constant habit of crawling up his leg and sitting on his knee, and rubbing its whiskers. Unfortunately the housemaid had not been told to refrain from hurrying the mouse, which they at length discovered in the room and killed, to the great grief of my old friend.

Those who have been in the habit of taking their walks in the country can not fail to have observed dead sheep near their paths. It has been a common opinion for many years that these mice were killed by cuts or mice, and not often on account of their poisonous nature, or from the stinging scent which they emitted. On mentioning the circumstance to an eminent surgeon, well known for his researches into minute anatomy, he asked me to send him some specimens of these dead mice. On examining them he found that they were all males, and their death was occasioned by their fighting for the females in the spring: the jugular vein was separated in every instance, thus accounting for their being found in the manner above mentioned.

Among other varieties of mice, we have the long-tailed field mouse. It is brown on its back and its belly is white, with long ears and a tail nearly as long as itself. It lays up stores of acorns, nuts, corn, etc., and Pennant tells us that the chief damage done to the fields results from swine grubbing up the ground to get at these stores. We have also the short-tailed mouse.

The last mouse I shall mention is the dormouse. In some of its habits it resembles the squirrel, by collecting nuts, etc., for its winter food, and, like that quadruped, eats its food in a sitting posture, and sleeps like the squirrel during a great part of the winter. The dormouse is not often seen, as it hides itself in woods and thick hedges, and, according to Pennant, makes its nest in the hollow of a tree. It is, however, more common than is generally supposed.

There are two varieties of land rats in England, and one water rat. Of the former, the brown or Norwegian rat has now nearly exterminated the original black rat, the latter being now regarded almost as a curiosity, although it is affirmed that it is still to be met with in some of the great breeding establishments in London. The increase of the brown rat is enormous. They have three kinds in a year, generally from fourteen to eighteen in a litter. Their increase, therefore, would be enormous, did they not, as is well known, devour each other. Sometimes the size of an old male rat is very great. In the Malabar coast, such was the increase of rats, that their burrows extended to a considerable space round the buildings, and in one night they devoured the carcasses of a horse.

It is not always true, as is commonly and foolishly said, that the lower of a ship attacked by another ship in order to search for more abundant food than they could procure in the ship they have just left. This is generally done in the night, but the migration has been witnessed in the day-time. When rats have devoured all the food in a house, they will migrate in considerable numbers to another. A clergyman once witnessed one of these migrations, and saw an old black rat leading a host of his kind in his mouth, and another rat to be the other end; in this way the black rat was gradually and safely along. The consequence of this is, perhaps, that any mouse, only a few feet away. They have been known to meet hundreds of miles of old black, and then back off the following day all the black was captured, or, at least, till that individual reached the old one's house. It has also been asserted that they have no development of eyes, and consequently play as a future stock of food. They were considered a threat to mankind, though it is difficult to guess in what way.

THE WINDOWS.

I stare in the cold and dreary street,
With the thick falling snow,
And gaze with a sad and aching heart,
At the windows all aglow—
At the windows bright with the warmth and light
Which gladden the pale winter;
While the snow covers down on the roofs of our town
And the streets are filled with gloom.

I think of the hearth where the firelight glows,
And the faces that are gathered there,
Of the pleasant faces lit up by the glow,
And the happy voices they hear.
I think of those all, while the snow-stains fall,
As I gaze through a mist of snow,
And out of the past and broken Pan
Comes the ghost of other years.

Once I had wealth and a host of friends,
I had seen a love and a wife,
And a fair-haired child, with a radiant face,
To gladden the hours of life—
But my wealth is but dust; my child is long dead;
And my wife the life has to rest;
And my host of friends there the old tale could
They one and all look dead.

And here is night in the dreary street,
With the thick falling snow,
I stand and gaze, with an aching heart,
At the windows all aglow;
A wretched, lonely life goes by
And servants to wait on my call—
With no friend to greet and no home but the street
Where the bleeding snow-flakes fall.

I watch the shadows that never sit still,
As they quickly pass and go,
And condense a few drear'ly hours in the past,
To look on the street below—
To look on the street where the passing feet
Are scarcely heard to tread;
Where the snow from the skies like a pale shroud lies,
Like a shroud that covers the dead.

It is sometimes the face of a child I see,
And associate a mother's hair,
With jewels of price in each delicate ear,
And a flower entwined with her hair;
It is sometimes a wife in the moon of life,
Or a maiden in her prime;
And sometimes a face whose eye may trace
The furrows which deeps with time.

The children laugh in their innocent glee,
As they watch the falling snow;
The maiden blushes in each step,
A step she has learned to know;
The young wife smiles as one thought beyond,
The loving heart in her breast;
And the old man's eyes glance up on the sky,
Where the good have hope of rest.

But what a word is that to me,
Which is to me, but the memory of a dream—
Where once the days shone back with a glow,
At the bright work the young men,
Oh, when will the light, no more and less,
In the shadows of a dream
The glow of a dream, the glow of a dream,
The shadows that cover the dead.

QUEEN VICTORIA OPENING HER SEVEN PARL

PARLIAMENT, TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1866.

REST.

Tea, out, ye bells! sound midnight through the air;
Till out men's lives, now glowing under care;
Wear out great Time with clock-like every where—
I wait, ye long, for rest.

Feels on step set, ye finger-marks of wear;
Hear ye ye shades! Oh! let the midnight go;
Wing past, ye hours, life is too sad and slow—
I wait, ye long, for rest.

Had faith, ye flowers, let Spring and Summer die;
Bread down, ye shadows, let Autumn too go by;
Oh! blow, ye winds, another Winter's night—
I wait, ye long, for rest.

Rest cometh not, rest is not for the young;
It cometh not, it lies the grass among;
Rest cometh to age, to younger death-bells ring—
I wait, ye long, for rest.

Rest cometh not with worldly joy and mirth;
Rest cometh not until the soul's new-birth;
Rest cometh not until we die to earth—
Then cometh rest indeed.

Death drops our lives, stretch them carefully;
Rest cometh not until we lie peacefully,
Clothe our lips, which utter thankfulness—
"How have we rest indeed."

SETH HATHRON'S FOURTH.

I ALWAYS was a black-browed, broad-shouldered, brute of a fellow, always from a boy. At school (not that I had much of that sort of thing), but at school if old Miss Peggy found out any mischief she laid it to my score because of my looks, when often and often, while I was holding out my hand to be rebuked, the prettiest boy in the school was grinning over his good luck in getting off so safely. She had her preconceived notions of a villain, I presume, and I answered the description.

For the matter of that, of all the books and stories I've read since, especially those written by ladies, I've noticed there isn't one where the language, or fopper, or phrase, or what not, who does all the wickedness of the book, as though he's taken it on contract, wouldn't do for us on a prospect, while their pets, who do the good and noble things, are generally slender, and fair, and pretty. Now the world watch I ever saw—one who was afterward hung, and who deserved hanging right, even on his own showing—had blue eyes, and white lashes, and a pink mouth like a girl's. It's so over and over again; but it's my opinion that if women were put on the poles, before the year was over every hanging, skyward, below fellow whose eyes were met would be backed up in the State Prison on suspicion.

I never was a favorite with any woman but my mother, and she died when I was eight years old. So instead of growing up with the idea that most men have, that every girl they meet is ready to fall in love with them, I never had the slightst hope that any one would ever like me well enough to let me fall in love with her even. And I liked girls so. It was odd for a fellow like me, but how I did like girls!

I never could bear to see the cry, or to hear of their being imposed upon or hurt. I couldn't pass one with a heavy basket or bundle without at least wanting to offer to carry it for her. I could never bring myself to sit in stages or cars when one was standing. I don't think I could if I had been weak or lame instead of the good I was. Yet I've seen get down lounge with their hands in their pockets while poor old ladies, who might have been their grandmothers, stood up before them! And their manners were good and nice those of a bear, and I myself only a working-man, who heard all he ever knew at old Miss Peggy's school.

Something as a man might have felt just in sight of the angels, who were too much above him to be spoken to or touched, I felt about all girls. That is, good, pure girls. When a woman was intoxicated or in my way debased she never seemed a woman to me, but a diabolical sort of creature, all the worse for having something of the pretty womanly look about her.

I was a maker of fire-works, as my father had been before me. I don't know that I liked the business particularly, but there I was, and there I staid. I made good wages, and saved them; for I didn't think enough about my looks to dress much, and I never drank. "Sulky," the other men called me. What of that? It was better to be sulky than raving mad, as some of them were so sundy as Saturday night came round. Men with nice, good-looking wives too, whose children wanted for bread and shoes what they spent in drink. I never expected to have a wife and children, but I knew how they ought to be used better than they did.

I suppose I had come to be twenty-eight or so, and no girl had ever looked at me, except as she might at a famish pecked bear, when, one day, old Mr. Williams, the proprietor of the place, came to me as I was going home to dinner, and said, in his own quick way:

"Hathron, can you drive?"

"Yes, Sir," said I.

"I want you to take the wagon and go over to the railroad depot at Baldwin, and bring down a new hand and her traps," he said. "She'll be there at half past twelve, so you'll have barely time to snatch a bite and go; and you can have the rest of the day to yourself, if you like, as it's Saturday. Her name is Annie May."

Before you can understand what he meant I must tell you that our place (they called it the "No plus ultra Pyrotechnic Establishment," bless you!) employed some five-and-twenty girls, and that they generally came from a distance, and boarded while they staid with an old woman close by, all in one place, to keep them out of harm's way.

Mr. Williams insisted on that, and had a lot of rules about the hours they were to keep and the way they were to behave; good rules, and not so rigid but that there was plenty of innocent courtship and more than one wedding in a season. As for we men, we went where we chose. Some put up at the tavern, some with people who would take a few boarders, and those who lived in the place with their families. There were very few girls who had homes there to go to; for the village was an upish kind of place, full of country seats and villas, and the factory stood all by itself, quite a distance away, and the tavern and the few common houses were grouped close about it, as if the others were too genteel to mix with them. So Mrs. Munson's place was always full. When a new girl came down somebody always had to be sent over to Baldwin to bring her to the factory. I had never been before, and why I was chosen this time it was hard to tell. However, I was willing enough, and so, when I had taken a bite, I put on my best coat and drove over.

It was a day to tempt a man out—a beautiful spring day, with tender green grass on the earth and tender pink buds on the branches, and in the sky there were only two or three fleecy bits of clouds, like carded wool, amidst the blueness. It took only half an hour to get to Baldwin. I'd have been willing it should be ten whole ones.

The train had got in, and there were people waiting in the little house at the depot—a couple of stout old ladies, a gentleman who looked like a minister, and a young woman. I looked at her and made up my mind she couldn't be the new hand, not because she was more dressed than they usually were, but because she wasn't dressed half so much. Generally they had on their brightest gowns, and big beads around their necks, and roses enough in their bonnets to fill a garden. This girl was all in gray, and wore a veil to match. The things were cheap and not new, but they made her look like a lady. I walked up and down and waited. The few women went away in a wagon; the clergyman had a gig sent for him; and there the girl sat beside her trunk, looking now and then out of the window and beginning to seem anxious. At all events it could do no harm to speak; so I took off my hat and stepped up, with a bow.

"I beg your pardon, Miss," said I, "but has there been any body here asking about being taken to Mr. Williams's place?"

"I want to go there myself," she answered; "that is, if you mean the fire-work factory. I'm Annie May."

"I do mean the fire-work factory," I said. "Mr. Williams sent me down to fetch you. I'm Seth Hathron, one of the hands. The wagon is outside; will you get in?—Wait a bit; I'll put the trunk in first."

"Shan't I help you?" she said, and she put her little hand to the handle nearest her. It looked so small I lost out laughing.

"I don't need any help," said I, but I thought I could carry both the trunk and its owner together, if I chose, and she'd let me. She was the smallest creature, to be a full-grown woman, that I ever saw. A piece of the blue sky for her eyes, and a bit of the golden sunshine for her hair, and some of those odd tones that would climb with the barometre over the stone fences seen for her cheeks, and you know how to paint her.

After I had helped her in and had taken the trunk in my hands, I kept staring looks at her and thinking how beautiful she was; and I tried to talk about things that would please her, and pointed out the places on the road, and felt that, bright as the day had been before, it was somehow a great deal brighter now with her beside me.

We stopped at Mrs. Munson's and said good-bye. I carried her trunk into the hall and called the old lady, and drove the horse back to the stable. Then, having a holiday, I got a newspaper and went out into the woods—Baldwin's Woods they called them—and I think I knew every tree by heart.

I'd chosen by chance under a great oak, where Jack Varne, one of the hands, had carved E. V. for his name, and O. G. for Olive Grey's, and had put a ring around them both; and as I looked at the work fell to wondering why Jack Varne should have a sweet-heart and I none, and whether it was only his pretty face or something in our ways that made all girls like him and none me. And somehow I felt handsome and unhappy, and couldn't read my paper, and sat down with my head on my hands, sulking there ever, I suppose, to look on. Maybe it was at ten, maybe two, that I sat there before I hear— a step coming over the grass, and looking up, saw the girl I had driven over from Baldwin—Annie May—coming toward me. She did not see me at first; but when she did she started and stopped, and smiled at me just as I'd seen other girls smile often at other men, but never once at me before that moment. I never thought what I was doing, but held out my great iron jaw and shook hands with her as if we had been friends for years.

"I found there was nothing for me to do in the factory until Monday," she said, "and I came out to see what these woods were like. It's a pretty place."

"Fretful in summer," I said, "and prettiest of all in autumn, when the leaves are burned gold and scarlet."

"I like spring best," she said; "every thing is new and fresh, and just begun. In autumn every thing is nearly over—and that is sad."

"I don't mind it," I said; "I haven't a gay disposition, I suppose," I said. "But look here—if you like fresh young things I'll show you something;" and I took her to where, behind a fallen log, the first spring violets always grew. There were a dozen there now, and she went down on her knees to smell them. She would only pick one, though; it seemed wrong, she said.

That one, after we had walked for an hour or so, somehow dropped out of her hair. She did not know it, but I did; and when she had gone home I went back and found it lying on the path and put it in my bosom. It was so sweet and fresh and beautiful that I could not think it was like her. I liked to think so. Oh, what a day that was for me! What a night when I dreamed it over!

Next day was the Sabbath, and I did what I'd never done before. After I was dressed, angry with myself for not looking handsomer all the while I stood before the glass, I went over to Mrs. Munson's and asked for Miss May.

She came down in a muslin dress and a pretty bonnet with pale blue ribbons; and I remember stammering out something about thinking she might like to go to church and would not know the way. That was all nonsense, of course, for there was the steeple in full sight, but it gave me what I wanted, leave to be with her again.

I'm afraid I couldn't have remembered the text to save my life, and that the sermon was thrown away on me. But I was very happy—happier than I had ever been before; for this sweet young thing seemed to like me, was frank and pleasant with me, and found, I was so glad to think, a sort of protection that she liked in my great arm where her hand rested, going home over the fields, like a fallen snow-flake. It almost seemed to me that I must be crazy to believe that she had taken a notion to me; but it was true. So true that when four of those Sabbath-school boys had passed her walk with me again in Baldwin's Woods, and sat down beside her on the hollow log, behind which a great patch of violets were in bloom by that time, and told her how I loved her, and asked her to be my wife.

Only a month since she came there—only one month since I drove her over in the little wagon; but if the answer had been any thing else than what it was I should have prayed to die. It may not be such a mighty matter to other men to have one woman's love, but I had no one else on earth to care for. So when she said, "Yes," and let me kiss her, it was only shame that kept me from crying outright for joy.

She was mine now, and how proud I was of her! How glad to know that she was so near me when I was at work! How happy to see her so trim and neat among the other girls, who were most of them shabby when they were not fine! and how full of dreams of the future!

She had promised to marry me in the autumn, and after that she should work no more in the factory. I was going to buy a little three-roomed cottage in the village, and to furnish it—humbly, of course, but so that it should be a home for her; and when she was his mistress I should not envy any king his palace. Meanwhile we saw as much of each other as we could, both working so industriously.

One week he had been more than usually busy, for it was near the end of June, and we were making fire-works for the Fourth of July, and the first I had seen of Annie that day I saw in the great saloon where we always gathered to receive our traps. The men on one side, the girls on the other, creeping up to the great desk one by one as old Griffin, the clerk, called out names. I looked across the line of girls' faces, and saw her smiling at me, but I could not get near her. Besides, at that moment, my name was called—"Hathron"—and I slipped up to the desk. Then, for the first time, I noticed that old Griffin was not there. A nephew of Mr. Williams, whose name I knew to be Richard James, was paying the books instead. He was a handsome young fellow, and very gentlemanly— one of the fair kind. I remember thinking as he laid my wages before me that his hair was just the color of Annie's.

He had a sort of amateur way with him, very different from the business-like manner of old Griffin, and when it came to the girls he had something pleasant to say to each one, instead of the old man's snapping—"Say your name and deduct from yours, Jane!" or—"You were late three days last week, Martha!" What he said to Annie I don't know, but she blushed like a wild rose from town to die.

Walking home together, she asked me who he was.

"Mr. James," I answered; "did you never see him before?"

"No," said Annie. "How very handsome he is!—don't you think so?"

I gave a groaning "Yes." I couldn't bear to hear her praise him. She might, for all I knew, be contrasting him with me. That was the first pain I had had since she had promised herself to me; but there was more to come of it.

Besides her daily work Annie had got into the way of doing some fine sewing and embroidery of evenings from Miss Redford, a beautiful young lady, who lived in the parsonage house in the village, and over a week she carried it home. Generally I went with her; but there was overwork for the men to do one night, and I could not get off. I fretted and fumed about it, and when the time came couldn't for the life of me help slipping away to a stable window to try and catch a glimpse of her. Sure enough, I did see her a good way on the road, with her little basket on her arm, but there was some one with her. It was too far to see faces, but I knew the light-gray coat he wore, and it was Mr. Richard James. He was leaning over her as though talking very earnestly; and when some one inside called "Hathron!" and I could stay no longer, they were still going on close together—her face turned up and his bent down, both earnest and eager in whatever they were talking of.

I went back to my work, but I kept that picture before my eyes all the while. I thought of it until it seemed to be burned into my heart in fiery outlines. After all, it was only what might easily have happened if Mr. James had walked the same way by chance; but I could not look at it that way—or perhaps I would not.

It was like my sulky, brooding nature, too, never to say one word about it to Annie, but to keep on thinking and watching in silence. I found out more than I wanted to in that way; for one day when I had made an excuse to enter the women's work-room after Mr. James had gone there, I plainly saw him slip a little note slyly into Annie's pocket. The time had come around for her to go over to Miss Redford's with her work; but that evening, instead of going with her, I watched her—hiding like a thief behind trees and buildings on the road. She went alone and came alone, and I saw nothing for my pains. I did at church next Sabbath, though. When the hymn was given out Mr. James, sitting in the handsome family pew, seeing Annie in doubt as to the number—for the old clergyman didn't always speak distinctly—reached over and took her book to find the place (she sat but a pew behind him). When he gave it back I saw that there was something between the leaves, and come what might would have snatched it, but at that moment Miss Redford, who sat in the side aisle, whispered to Annie to show her the number, and I lost the chance, for in passing the books it was hidden. That it was a note I knew by the white glimmer of the edge as well as if I had seen the whole of it, and surely as I live I saw Annie give Mr. James a meaning smile as he passed us on the church path going home.

Miss Redford looked at Annie as if she knew something of it too, as she stepped after her father and mother into the carriage. They were carriage people—the Redfords—and the old folks looked down on every body else. There was a feud between them and the proprietors of the factory, and they never spoke to either the Williamses or Mr. James; so there was no social chatting on the porch, and the Williams people smiled sarcastically, and the old Redfords scowled and looked haughty, until they were all fairly shut in and driven away. Not Mr. James—he was too gentlemanly; nor Miss Redford—she was too sweet. The feud was among the old folks. The farmers' families made up for their ill-temper through, and half the gentler people from the villas were snirking and bowing to each other.

The factory hands who were at church—a dozen in all, I suppose—hurried home pell-mell by short cuts, not to lose their dinners, and of them all only Annie and I were left. She was waiting for me to join her—a thing I didn't mean to do.

I leaned against the iron railing of the church-yard, wishing I was sound asleep under one of the green mounds, but only looking darker and sulkier, no doubt, than usual, until I saw her turn toward me. Then I leaped the railing and went away, never looking back. I did not go home, but spent the day in Baldwin's Woods alone.

On Monday I was at work as usual. It was the third of July, and the Fourth, of course, was to be a holiday. There were to be grand celebrations at Baldwin, and the show-pieces for the evening were being finished at our place, under the superintendence of Mr. Richard James. It was hard to keep the younger hands at their work. They were half crazy about the Fourth, and I suppose every one of them had a pistol. I never cared for banging at nothing, and should not have had one even if I had felt differently. One young fellow tried hard all day to sell me his: like a goose he had bought two, and was sorry for it.

About dusk I went to get my supper, and was coming back when, among the shadows, I saw two figures standing side-by-side together. I felt it a moment who they must be, and got close enough to hear their voices. It was as I thought. One was Annie May, the other Richard James. They were parting, but I heard enough in the few last words: "Eleven will be the best time; the moon will be up by then. I'll have the carriage waiting under the two elms in Baldwin's Woods. Be certain about the hour, for the down-train starts a quarter to twelve. Good-bye—God bless you!"

Not another word—but I knew the whole. She was going off with Richard James. She whom I loved so. The one of all the world who had seemed to love me. I heard his firm tread go away. I heard her light footstep rattle over the grass, and went back myself to the work-room, for we were to work until a late hour that night. I walked straight up to the young fellow who had been trying all day to sell me his superfluous pistol.

"Smith," said I, "I think I'll trade with you after all."

"Good for you," said he. "The Fourth ain't no Fourth without a pistol, and this is 'gin' cheap. A good load in it too, so be careful."

I counted down the money and took the weapon away with me. Do you want to know what I meant to do with it? Shoot myself through the heart. The idea of murder had not crept into my mind then. I'd swear that with my dying breath.

I only wanted to get rid of my tireless life. There was nothing left to live for—so it seemed to me.

At half past ten I got the chance I wanted, and slipped out. I was going to kill myself in Baldwin's Woods, on the dead log behind which the first spring violets grew, and where we had sat so often since together. The moon was just rising round and yellow behind the black trees, and the factory windows were all ablaze. As I slunk by the office I saw Mr. Richard James there alone. He was standing exactly under a swinging lamp. A trying light for any but a very handsome face, but his was not hurt by it. Great Heavens! how handsome he looked and how happy. My blood boiled with rage, and jealousy, and grief. I was as mad for the moment as any lunatic could be. My hand went into my bosom and caught at the pistol hidden there. The next instant I had fired, taking aim at the handsome head.

But it was not good aim. The ball passed over its mark and struck the swinging lamp. I saw it fall, and a great blaze spring up on the instant, and knew that the fire-work factory was on fire. That factory filled to the roof with explosive substances, and with a hundred and fifty men and boys, and pretty, innocent girls shut up within its walls. I do not know whether Satan ever feels remorse, but if he does it must be such as I felt—hopeless, maddening, scorching.

The next instant there was a horrible report, and I was thrown into the air.

Not hurt, though. I picked myself up from the grass and stood looking at my work. The windows were belching forth flame up in the air, amidst the smoke. Hundreds of rockets, and fire-lights, and Catherine wheels were tossing and flaming—white, and yellow, and purple, and pink, and green, and blue. Hundreds of cannons—some to be ready; and over it all you could hear screams—women's screams—and I went down on my knees and prayed—

"Oh, save her, save her—to be his wife, to hate me—only save her!"

People were flocking in from the village. Workmen, singing and scowling, forcing their way through the flames; and in the midst of the wildest tumults some one caught my arm. I turned—it was Annie, and beside her, white and trembling, stood Miss Redford.

"Oh, Seth—thank God for this!" cried Annie; "you are safe. Oh, dear young lady, try to hope—he may be too."

And then that beautiful Miss Redford sank on her knees before me, and clasped her hands, and prayed me to save her Richard!

"I should have been his wife in an hour," she said. "Oh, save my husband—save my husband—my love, my life, my darling!"

The truth rushed into my mind then. I saw all my blind folly. I remembered the feud between the Redfords and the Williams family, and knew that my Annie had only been helping Miss Redford to meet and correspond with her lover; that it was to be the message I had heard that evening had been sent, and that it would have been better for me to be dead.

"Go out of danger!" I panted. "I'll bring him to you or die with him!" and, with Annie's scream of terror in my ear, dashed away. They were playing on the burning building with the one engine they had at hand by this time, and I could see that many of the workmen were alive.

I clatched one by the arm as I went past.

"Are the women in there yet?" I yelled.

"No, thank Heaven," he answered. "Didn't you know the women were dismissed five minutes before the explosion took place. There wasn't one there. All the men are out too, I guess, but then that were setting the last show-piece in the room next the office—about a dozen. The rest jumped out of windows. There's a broken limb or two, I guess. But that's better than the poor fellows inside roasting alive or down to pieces. Young Mr. James is there, too. His uncle is offering any thing to have him got out. Life's worth more than money, though nobody can do it."

He was right. For hours we worked at the fire before it was out; and then a great heap of lumber was piled over the bodies of the thirteen men who must be inside—dead we supposed—and I heard some one say that Miss Redford was going from one window into another at the Williamses, and that it had come out that she was to have eloped with Mr. James the night before.

It was the Fourth of July; but no guns were fired and no bells rung at Baldwin. All the people of the town were about the factory helping as best they could. We lifted great charred logs and heaps of boards and molten cans, and at last one stopped. "Hush!" he cried; "for God's sake no noise. I hear a voice!" And then amidst a breathless silence we heard a moan under our feet.

We worked with a will now, and at last heard none.

One of the men put his head close down and cried, "Are any of you alive?" And some one groaned, "Yes."

Black with smoke, scorched by the cinders we handled, we went at it again, and at last came to a spot where the beams had made a kind of pent-house. There, jammed together and half suffocated, but alive, were four men. And such a yell went up as mortal ears never heard before. Four saved! four saved! And we drew them out and gave them over to the doctors. Then there was another shout not so loud, for we had come to one insensible, jammed between two logs. He breathed though as soon as we brought him to the air.

It was a time no one ever forgets. Judge what it was to me!

At last all were out but Mr. James, and somebody cried that they could see him under some beams. It was a dangerous place to get at; but I would not stop for that. I forced myself into the narrow aperture, and set to work. I called, but there was no answer. At last I came to him, lying with a great beam across his chest. His beautiful golden hair and beard were singed and scorched, and one of his hands was blistered. I touched him, and screamed in his ears, but they were deaf to me. I got the log off somehow, and dragged him to the light, and then I had help enough. They took him between them and laid him on the grass, and the doctor unfastened his vest.

"Is he dead?" I asked; and I meant as truly as I live, if the answer were "yes," to tell the crowd before me what I had done, knowing well that if I did no law could save me.

There was no answer for a moment, and I spoke again, "Is he dead?" And God bless the dear, white-headed old man who answered so kindly:

"No, my man, he isn't dead. I think he's coming to."

Oh, the mercy of the good Lord—think of it! Of the whole lot one was killed. There were beams, and broken limbs, and black eyes, but there was no death; and soon I saw Richard James—pale and faint but out of danger—standing before me. I can't believe God had been so good to me.

Then that old white-haired doctor mounted on a pile of burned logs and lifted his hat, and there were three such cheers as were never heard before, and a dozen boys sped in to Baldwin to ring the joy-bells; and women came crying to thank me for helping to save their dear ones—so that for shame I went and hid myself in Baldwin's Woods and cried, with my head hidden in my arms, on the old log where the victims were.

Then somebody came softly up the path and sat beside me, and bent over me, and took me, singed and smoke-stained as I was, in two white arms—and only one of all the world could do that—and without looking I knew it was Annie.

"My noble, brave darling," she said; "my own dear that I am so proud of!" and sobbed and kissed me.

"They are so happy, too," she said; "and Mr. James is only scorched and burned a very little, and old Mr. Redford is reconciled to old Mr. Williams, and they will be married after all. They are so fond of each other, Seth—as fond as you and I."

And then I stood up and put her gently from me, and made amends for my sin by an awful sacrifice. I told her the truth—what I was, and what I had done, and why, and waited to hear her renounce me.

She did not do it. She was shocked and grieved, but she pitied me, and I dared to take her in my arms and call her mine again. I believe that all my life there had been an evil spirit in my breast, and that he left me forever at that moment.

It was some time before the factory was rebuilt, and some had been injured, and many were out of work. I knew my duty. To those in need came little gifts of money every week, with no clew to its donor, until my savings were all gone.

So we did not buy the three-roomed cottage, and perhaps never shall; but, penniless as I was, she married me, and we are happy.

Mr. James and Miss Redford are married too; and when we sit in church she smiles across the pews to that little wife of mine, and I think, with a pang of terror even yet, from what God's mercy saved me.

JAVA COFFEE.

Let elderly ladies delight if they can
In black, green, or caramelé tea;
I am firmly persuaded no drink for a man
Can be equal to Java Coffee.

A cup of good coffee will wind a man up,
As a watch is wound up by the key.
Then give me for breakfast, for dinner, and supper,
A drink of good Java Coffee.

Our patriot ancestors did a good thing
In destroying these shiploads of tea;
But they'd gladly have suffered the vessels to bring Whole cargoes of Java Coffee.

We hear of Fongy My-oss; but when we inquire Whose son the young fellow may be,
The Chinese mythology tells us his size
Was Old Government Java Coffee.

For wines and for spirits I've greater contempt
Than for Hyson, Soonging, and Bobon;
With these all put together you'd never attempt To rival good Java Coffee.

When tonics are needed these bark to the dogs,
And let bitters and iron-pills be;
A tonic far better than any such drugs
Is decoction of Java Coffee.

All lawyers want pay for enforcing the laws,
And retainers are welcome to me;
But the fee I like best when I argue a cause,
I assure you, is Java Coffee.

But coffee is commonly coupled with toast,
And our toast for this evening shall be:
To the memory of him who first taught us to toast
The rich berry of Java Coffee!

STUCK FAST.

I once have one night, and Mrs. Bunge—that's our next-door neighbor—shows me something wrapped up in flannel, all pink and creamy, and very stuffy, as though it wanted its nose blowing; which couldn't be expected, for it hadn't got any to signify.

"Ain't it a little beauty?" she says.
Well, I couldn't see as it was; but I didn't like to say so, for I knew my wife Polly had been rather reckoning on what she said we ought to have had more'n a year ago; so I didn't like to disappoint her, for I know she lay 'tween in the next room.

Polly always said there never was such a baby as that one; and somehow it was talking to see how her face used to light up all over smiles when she thought I wasn't looking; and I knew it was all an account of the little one. She never said she felt dull now; and when at home of a night I used to think how my mates would laugh to see me a-handling the little thing that was still being pushed into my face to him; when I'm blest if ever I see such a voracious one in my life; it would hang on to you—nose, lip, any where—in a minute.

One day, when it was about nine months old, it was taken all of a sudden like with a fit. Polly screamed to me to run for the doctor; for it happened that I was on the club that week, and at home with a bad hand. I ran for him and he soon come; and then there was a warm bath and medicine; but afterward, when I saw the little thing lying on Polly's lap so still and quiet, and with a dull film forming over its eyes, I felt that something was coming, though I dared not tell her; and about twelve o'clock the little thing suddenly started, stared wildly an instant, and then it was all over.

My hand wasn't had any more that week; for it took a' my time to try and cheer up my poor heart-broken lass. She did take on dreadful, night and day, night and day, till we buried it; and then she seemed to take quite a change, and begged of me to forgive what she called her selfishness, and wiped her eyes once for all, as she said, and talked about all being for the best. But she didn't know that I lay awake of a night, feeling her cry silently till the pillow was soaked with tears.

We buried the little one on the Sunday, and on the Monday morning I was clapped on to a job that I didn't much relish, for it was the reburial of a sewer that ran down one of the main streets, quite fifty feet underground.

After two years in London I'd seen some change, but this was my first visit to the bowels of the earth. I'd worked on drains down in the country, but not in such a concern as this: why a Lieutenant might have walked down in easy; so that there was plenty of room to work. But then, mind you, it ain't pleasant work; there you go, down ladder after ladder, past gas-pipes and water-pipes, and down and down, till you get to the stage stretched across the part you are at work on, with the daylight so high up, as seen through boards, and scaffolds, and ladders, that it's no use to you who are working by the light of flaring gas. There in front of you is the dark black arch; and there behind you is another; while under your feet the foul rushing water hurries along, sending up a smell as turns your silver watch, and every sixpence and shilling you have in your pocket, black as the water that swirls bubbling along. Every word you speak sounds hollow and echoing, while it goes whispering and rattling along; the dark arch till you think it has gone, when all at once you hear it again quite plain in a way as would make you jump as much as when half a brick or a bit of hard mortar dropped into the water.

But talk about jumping, soaking made me jump more than when a bit of soil, or a stone, was loosened up above and came rattling down. I've seen more than one chap change color; and I know it's been from the thought that, suppose the earth caved in, where should we be? No doubt the first crush in would do it, and there'd be an end of workmen and foreman; but there seemed something werry awful in the idea of being buried alive.

Right as the opening was, when I went to work it made me shudder; there was the earth thrown out; there was the rope at the side; there was the boarding round; there it was for all the world like a big gear, same as I'd stood by on a little scale the day before; and feeling a bit low-spirited, it almost seemed as though I was going down into my own grave to come up any more.

Werry awful and foolish ideas, says you—far-fetched ideas. Werry likely, but then's what I thought; and there are times when even werry strange ideas; and I'll tell you for a fact that something struck me when I went down that hole as I shouldn't come up it again; and I didn't, neither. Why the werry feel of the cold damp place made you think of being buried, and when a few bits of earth come and rattled down upon the stage above my head, as soon as the first start was over it seemed to me so like the rattling of the earth but a few hours before upon a little coffin, that something fell with a pat upon my light trowel, which, if it had been left, would ha' been a spot of rust.

Nothing like work to put a fellow to rights; and I soon found that I was feeling better, and the strokes of my trowel went rippling away down the sewer as I cut the bricks in half; and after a bit I almost felt inclined to whistle, but I didn't, for I kept on thinking of that solitary face at home—the face that always brightened up when I went back, and had made such a man or me as I felt I was, for it was enough to make any man vain to be thought so much of. And then I thought how dull she'd be, and how fond she'd be of looking at the drawer where all the little things were kept; and then I—well, I ain't ashamed of it, if I was a great looking fellow—I took care that nobody saw what I was doing, while I had a look at a little bit of a shoe as I had in my pocket.

I didn't go home to dinner, for it was too far off; so I had my snack, and then went to it again directly along with two more, for we was on the piece. We had some beer sent down to us, and at it we work till it was time to be to go off; and I must say as I was glad of it, and didn't much envy the fresh gang coming on to work all night, though it might just as well have been night with us. I was last down, and had just put my foot on the first round of the ladder, when I heard something falling as it hit and jared the boards up; and then directly after what seemed to be a brick caught me on the head, and before I knew where I was, I was off the little platform, splash down in the cold rushing water that took me off and away yards upon yards before I got my head above it; and then I was so confused and half-drowned that I let it go under again, and had been carried over so before, half-drowned, I gained my legs and heaved, panting and blinded, up against the stony wall.

There I stood for at least ten minutes, I should suppose, shuddering and horrified, with the thick darkness all around, the slimy, muddy brick against my hands, the cold, rushing water beneath me, and my mind in that confused state that for a few minutes longer I didn't know what I was going to do next, and wanted to persuade myself that it was all a dream, and I should wake up directly.

All at once, though, I gave a jump, and, instead of being cold with the water dripping from me, I turned all hot and burning, and then again cold and steady; for I had felt something crawling on my shoulder, and then close against my bare neck, when I gave the jump, and heard close by me a light splash in the water—a splash which echoed through the hollow place, while, half to frighten the beast that I fancied must be in swarms around me, half wrong from me as a cry of fear and agony, I yelled out,

"Rats!"

Rats they were; for above the hollow "wash-wash, hurry-hurry, wash-wash, hurry-hurry" of the water, I could hear little splashes and a scuffling by me along the sides of the track-work.

You may laugh at people's hair standing on end, but I know then that there was a creeping, tingling sensation in the roots of mine, as though sand was trickling among it; a cold seemed to come over my mind, and for a few moments I believe I was mad—mad with fear; and it was only by setting my teeth hard and clenching my fists that I kept from shrieking. However, I was soon better, and ready to laugh at myself as I recollected that I could only be a little way from the spot where the men worked; so I began to wade along with the water here about up to my middle. All at once I stopped, and thought about where I was at work.

"What's my old water row?"

My head turned hot and my temples throbbled with the thought. I went the werry way I should be lost—lost in this horrid darkness—to sink at last into the foul, black stream, to be drowned and devoured by the rats, or else to be choked by the foul gases that must be lurking down here in these dark recesses.

Again the horror of thick darkness came upon me; I shrieked out wildly, and the cry went echoing through the sewer, sounding hollow and wild till it faded away. But once more I got the better of it, and persuaded myself that I had only cried aloud to scare the rats. What would I not have given for a steel stick as a defense against attack as I groped my way on, feeling convinced that I should be right if I crawled down stream, with a little reflection would have told me that up stream must be the right way, for I must have been loosened down by the water. But I could not reflect, for my brain seemed in a state of fever, and now and then my teeth chattered as though I had the ague.

I groped on for quite a quarter of an hour, when the horrid thought came upon me that I was going wrong, and again I tried to lean up against the wall, which seemed to cause my feet to slip from under me. I felt so cold, for the perspiration dropped from me as I frantically turned back and tried to retrace my steps, groping myself by running a hand against the wall, where every now and then it entered the mouth of a small drain, when, so sure as it did, there was a scuffle and crash, and more than once I touched the cold, slippery side of a rat—a touch that made me start back as though shot.

On I went, and on, and still to scaffold, and so gleam of daylight. Thought after thought gave fresh horror to my situation, as now I felt certain that in my frantic haste I had taken some wrong turn, or entered a branch of the main place; and, at last, completely bewildered, I rushed headlong on, stumbling and falling twice over, so that I was half-choked in the black water. But it had its good effect; for it put asoepsie my wild struggles, which must soon have ended in my falling headlong into what was certain death. The water cooled my head, and now, feeling completely hot—knowing that I must have been nearly two hours in the sewer—I made up my mind to follow the stream to its source in the Thomas, where, if the tide was down, I could get from the mud on to the wharf or bank.

So once more I struggled on, following the stream slowly for what seemed to be hours, till at last, raising my hand, I found I could not touch the roof, and by that knew that I was in a larger sewer, and therefore not very far from the mouth. But here there was a new horror creeping up on me, so to speak, for from my waist the water now touched my chest, and soon after my armpits; when I stopped, not daring to trust myself to swim, perhaps a mile, when I felt that weak I could not have gone a hundred yards.

I know in my despairing mind I gave a head like a wild beast, and turned again to have a hard fight to breast the rushing water, which nearly took me off my legs. But the fear of death led me help, and I got on and on again till I felt myself in a tunnel which I soon knew was a smaller sewer, and from thence I reached another, where I had to stoop; but the water was shallower, not above my knees, and at last much less deep than that.

Here I knelt down to rest, and the position brought something else from my heart; and, after a while, still stooping, I went on, till, having passed dozens upon dozens of drains, I determined to creep up one, and I did.

"Pray you won't think it strange as I dream and groan in bed sometimes, when I tell you what followed.

I crawled on, and on, and on, in the hopes that the place I was in would lead under one of the street gratings, and I kept starting ahead in the hopes of catching a gleam of light, till at last the place seemed so light that I dared go so far for fear of being fixed in. So I began to back very slowly, and then, feeling it rather hard work, stopped for a rest.

It was quite dry here, but, scuffling on in front, I kept hearing the rats I had driven before me; and now that I stopped and was quite still, half a dozen of them made a rush to get past me, and the little light which followed even now gives me the horror. I'd hardly room to move; but I killed one by squinting him, when the others backed off, but not till my face was bitten and running with blood.

At last, half dead, I tried to back out, for the place seemed to stifle me; and I pushed myself back a little way, and then I was stopped, for the skirts of my jacket filled up what little space had been left, and I felt that I was wedged in, stuck fast.

Now came the horrors again worse than ever. The hot blood seemed to gush into my eyes; I felt half-suffocated; and to add to my sufferings a rat, that felt itself as it were pinned up, fastened upon my lip. It was its last bite, however, for half dead as I felt then, my teeth had closed in a moment upon the vicious beast, and it was dead.

I made one more struggle, but could not move, I was so knocked up; and then I fainted.

It must have been some time before I came to myself; but when I did, the first sound I heard was a regular tramp tramp, of some one walking over my head, and I gave a long yell for help, when, to my great joy, the step halted, and I shrieked again, and the sweetest sound I have ever heard in my life came back. It was a voice shouting,

"Hallo!"

"Stuck fast in the drain!" I shouted, with all the strength I had left; and then I swooned off once more, to wake up a week afterward, out of a brain-fever sleep, in a hospital.

It seems I had got within a few yards of a grating which was an end of the drain, and the close quarters made the rats so fierce. The policeman heard my shriek, and had listened at the grating, and then got help; but he was only laughed at, for they could get no further answer out of me. It was then about half past three on a summer's morning; and though the grate was got open they were about to give it up, saying the policeman had been humbugged; when a couple of sweeps came up, and the little one offered to go down back-wards, and he did, and came out directly after, saying that he could feel a man's head with his toes.

That policeman has had werry a glass at my expense since, and I hope he'll have a many more; and when he tells me the story, which I like to hear—but always take care shall be when Polly's away—he says he knows I should have liked to see how they saw that drain up in no time. To which there's always such an echo in my heart that it comes quite natural to say, "You're right, my boy!"

UNION SQUARE, NEW YORK, ON A WINDY DAY IN MARCH.

MR. T. HUGHES, M.P.

Our readers will remember that, in our paper for January 27, we published an article by THOMAS HUGHES, the new Member of Parliament for Lambeth, entitled "Peace on Earth." No vindication of the cause for which our armies have fought has been bolder than this generous effort of Mr. HUGHES, and nowhere have the enemies of the United States met a refutation more complete and unanswerable. We give our readers on this page a photograph of this eminent statesman.

The new member for Lambeth is claimed by a large part of the English people as one of their familiar friends. Mr. THOMAS HUGHES—the author of "Tom Brown's School-days," and of one or two more books which have found their way, perhaps, to a less number of readers, but are scarcely less characteristic of the man from whom they came—has made himself pretty well known to a good many of his countrymen, high and low, not only as a novelist and magazine writer, but in various departments of practical work; and, though he is neither a perpetual platform-speaker nor a bustling patron of temporary exhibitions, he has long been reckoned a man of mark in the world of public life.

We need not here pass any criticism on those pleasant, wholesome, and instructive stories, or rather sketches, of English domestic and scholastic manners which commend themselves to the young as well as to the old by their frank cheerfulness of spirit, their hearty appreciation of all harmless pleasures, combined with a shrewd worldly wisdom, and what seems not incompatible with these moral elements—a noble enthusiasm for duty and virtue, with a manly sentiment of true religion. It is possible that these books may have caused him to be regarded as the literary champion of two great principles which have grown more fashionable than ever in the last twelve or fourteen years—the one being called "Muscular Christianity," and the other denominated as an absolute conviction of the superiority of the English race in the fighting and working qualities—in toughness, pluck, and bottom—to every other race of mankind. But the beautiful incandescence which is bred of mere animal ferocity has never been countenanced by him, nor has he ever sanctioned those trades
