of ignorant bigotry against all that is foreign to England in which Englishmen are too apt to indulge. He has shown that the staunchest English patriotism is consistent with an enlightened interest in the prospects of freedom on the Continent of Europe, and with a cordial affection for the citizens of the great American Republic, whose mighty struggle he watched in a sympathizing spirit, and one of whose best representatives—Mr. JAMES ROSS-LOWELL—has been introduced by him to a high literary rank among his countrymen.

The claims, however, of Mr. HUGHES are especially to the confidence and good-will of the working-classes are quite independent of any popularity which he may have gained as an agreeable writer. While he has always disliked and rebuked the ways of the demagogue, and held aloof from the vain turmoil of common political agitation, it has been his steady endeavor to make the most of those agencies of social reform which led him to open a road for the poorest and humblest of his fellow-countrymen to the safe and salutary possession of a share of power in the state. Mr. HUGHES does not endeavor to set class against class, or appeal to the narrow prejudices and interests of one portion of the community to disparage and condemn the others. His chief aim, on the contrary, is to foster those sentiments of mutual respect and kindness among them all, without which the best political institutions are but means of mischief. It was, we believe, through the unwearied zeal and industry of Mr. HUGHES, and of those with whom he worked, that the necessary alterations in the law of partnership were obtained from Parliament in order to legalize the formation of the working-men's stores for the supply of retail wares at wholesale prices, and of the limited-liability companies for manufacturing and trading enterprises, which have been formed on the co-operative principle. Mr. HUGHES has continued to bestow his assistance on all these self-supporting industrial associations of the working men, both in the metropolis and in the north of England; he has been accustomed to act as their legal adviser, and to prepare the title-deeds or conveyances of their property, their agreements of partnership, their statutes or rules, and other instruments required. Work of this description is not the less valuable though done in the privacy of his Lincoln's Inn chambers; and the... for whom it is done have shown that they are... by causing Mr. Hume to be the position... a triumphant candidate on the hustings, at the... election, last July.

LANDING OF AN ENORMOUS ELEPHANT FROM THE "CORNELIUS GRINNELL," AT NEW YORK, MARCH 8, 1866.—[See Page 100.]

Mr. Hume was born at Uffington, Berkshire, in 1825, being the second son of JOHN HUME, Esq., of Downington Priory, Newbury, in that county. He was educated at Rugby School, and at Oriel College, Oxford. He was called to the bar, at the Inner Temple, in 1848, and is a practicing barrister in the equity courts. He has married a daughter of the Rev. James Foss, Prebendary of Exeter, and has several children.

LANDING AN ELEPHANT.

FROM ON BOARD THE SHIP CORALINE GRISTELL, CAPTAIN STRECKER, one of the London packets, was landed, on the 8th of March, a large elephant, said to weigh nearly four tons. "His Immensity" had passed the voyage in the seclusion of the cock-house—amidships—which was considerably heightened for his accommodation. To enable him to reach the wharf a most platform was arranged of oak plank, sloping from the side of the vessel; but it required a great deal of coaxing to induce him to risk his weight upon it, as he seemed to have a preference for the gang-plank, which not only was provided with cleats, but sloped much less. The gangway cracked ominously upon the pressure of one foot, and therefore the elephant took courage and "walked the plank" in perfect safety, followed through the streets by an admiring crowd of men and boys, who sympathized in his evident relief at getting upon terra firma once more.

The name of this elephant is Abnerum. He was brought from London. He stands 9 feet 6 inches high, consumes daily a hundred-weight of hay, and drinks ten gallons of water.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Reason, did you ever sit up to watch for burglars? No? Then you have an experience yet in store for you. "Mercy on us!" exclaimed our good housekeeper the other night as, discharging the servant's care, she went herself to fasten the front-door for the night: "The door-key is gone! They have taken it! These burglars have stolen it!" And the worthy lady examined the key-hole and searched the door in a state of intense excitement. Now the simple loss of the key—though a suspicious circumstance—would not have produced such a commotion in Mrs. W.'s mind had she not been previously disturbed by sundry stories of dark doings in her immediate vicinity. And this strange loss was good fortune—to her mind—that the attempt to enter her house was to be made—perhaps that very night.

Biographical eulogies were offered to Mrs. W., the police were notified—the keyhole door was secured in a manner that would not let locks and keys to shake—and, finally, in a fit of uncharitable benevolence, we volunteered to sit up and watch. "What a grand time to read and write!" we thought, privately; though Mrs. W.—endeavored to impress to with a sense of weighty responsibility.

Every body goes to bed. And with a new novel in one hand and a cup of coffee in the other—with a three-shaded perfume on the table, and—well—an umbrella in the corner, we settle down in the comfortable easy-chair—to rest in the middle of Chapter IV., as the "was small" heroine on the above page looks on. Hark! what's that? and every articulation seems to be lost. Suspense! that is nothing but the distant crackling of the kitchen fire. We had half a dozen flames—then jump up and strain the ear at the post-door: say, yes, we lean over the basement stairs and listen intently. Hark! that peculiar scraping noise grows louder. Plop—a pot goes on board and down we rush into the dining-room, anxious to demolish the intruder. The ear strains in as we open the door and behold, a naked man with a candle in his hand! Hark! nothing of the kind! We see Mrs. W.'s pet Tally, standing in the middle of the room with erect head, bristling tail, and great eyes, staring wildly at the results of her uncharitable scoldings.

Further cross-father we return to the parlor re-visit the cat shall be put out at night, or given away. The pen is better than a book, but only a half page is written when a steady—we fancy—step on the side-stair strikes us. We peer through the blind. What ho!—here these two personifications to be prowling around the base of night! We watch them suspiciously as they creep across the hearth. What do they do? Only two, and we rush to writing again. Hark! a noise in the key-hole, and the sound of beating gross knees. Hark! that's only the cat. Guess the cat is worth keeping on the whole. We resume the novel, pretending to be intensely interested. Hark! post-horn hold the watch to the ear, it makes clear that it has not stopped. A postman, repeat the sound; we listen and investigate. Nothing but the water-dripping from a loose faucet. A heavy regular tread announces the police. They stop to see if all is safe. Yes, but it is three o'clock, and the loose night have been caught long ago, and they never have been the wiser. The alarm ceases. We wonder if there is such uncharitable stiffness and such peculiar reticence every night when we are in attendance? And we fall into a reverie (interrupted by the occasional pricking up of our ears) which has—until morning and Mrs. W.—come simultaneously.

We might well have a larger police force in some quarters of the city, where the "beats" are unreasonably long. Burglars, however, have other enemies as well as the police. New Yorkers are sharper and more cautious than Londoners, we judge, for we do not believe such a story as the following would ever even have been told of them. This is the story, though, of course, we can't prove the truth of it:

A gentleman, residing in London, shut up his house, on 1st week in the country for the summer vacation. After a few weeks' absence he returned, with his key in his pocket, to open his house. Judge his astonishment when he found nothing but the lot of lead upon which his house had stood! On inquiry it was ascertained that a few days after he left the city the neighbors and others noticed that the building was open, and that men were carrying away the furniture in broad daylight. They, however, supposing the owner had given such orders, asked no questions. Pretty soon the men began to take down the lattice, and orderly carried off all the building materials, because nobody had curiosity enough to investigate!

The following paragraph from a recent article in one of our daily papers, on city nuisances, gives indication that our new Health Board mess is open the way for receiving suggestions and information:

"The Complaint Book is not yet ready, but complaints are sensibly coming in to our quarters. Books are being prepared for the purpose of having the complaints entered, one of which will be left at each of the police stations in the districts, and one at police head-quarters.

The Senate has passed the joint resolution to pay Mrs. Clara Barton $15,000 for expenses in securing for and publishing lists of missing soldiers, and for the further prosecution of that work. The vote was unanimous. Mrs. Barton's own claims are uncalculated—we believe she has spent about $5000—and Congress does the nicest justice to repay her and to supply funds for continuing her noble work.

March came in "like a lion," and has been roaring like an infuriated wild beast a good part of the time ever since. Walking is any thing but a pleasurable occupation. The winter's accumulation of filth in the streets, dried by the wind, takes to itself wings and flies into eyes, nose, and mouth, half smothering the unfortunate pedestrian. Ladies endeavor to protect themselves with veils; but nothing short of the thickest double veils—which in reality are blinding—can keep eyes face decently clean. We trust in the old saying that March will go on "like a lamb."

An exchange tells of a war-worn veteran who is now wearing his third nose. He lost the original article in battle, was then presented with an India rubber one, which was also taken away, and is now wearing a wicker one which he made out of an ammunition box! It is to be presumed that the want of gaspowder is still grateful to his nostrils; at all events he uses what it is.

A writer in the London Medical Gazette gives the following lurid explanation of the phenomenon of a lady's black:

"The mind communicates with the central ganglion; the latter, by reflex action through the brain and facial nerve, with the organic nerve in the face, with which its branches innervate."

Queen Victoria is reported as shocked at discovering that the Prince and Princess of Wales smoked cigarettes together in a little blue saloon called their smoking-parlor. This pernicious and reprehensible practice was taught her Royal Highness by her scape-grace husband; and, horrible to say, she likes it.

No so very long ago, in one of the Western States, there was a certain Baptist church, whose members were not exactly a unit on the subject of immorality. At a meeting of church officers, on one occasion, a certain person, not remarkable for purity of life, sent in a request for admission into their fold. One of the excommunicated—a rather rough man—on hearing the name of the individual, exclaimed: "That man? Well, if that man is to be admitted to the church he ought to seek overnight!"

A pair of African twins, christened in Raleigh (North Carolina), resemble a greater natural curiosity than the celebrated Siamese twins. The connection between these girls is closer than in the Siamese twins, beginning below the neck and terminating at the extremity of the spine. To touch one at any point of the body is to touch the other, and a sensation to the brain of each; while a touch of either above the connection is felt by that one only. They can talk to different persons at the same time on entirely different subjects; and one can engage in a game of whist while the other reads or sings.

A singular story is told of a Madonville, living in Hampshire, England, who has performed a feat which would be credited to William Tell. A child, aged seven years, while playing with his bow, and aged twelve months, placed over its head an iron bar similar to that used for the tail of a cart-wheel. The child took the bow to school, and when the parents discovered it they were horrified to find that it was impossible to remove the bar, and speedy amputation was inevitable. Cries, the blacksmith, was called in, and suggested the desperate idea of hammering out the iron with a sledge, and he successfully completed his dangerous task. While one person led the legs and another the head of the little one, others fearfully watched at the ring and severed it. A full blow of iron on each, and instantaneous death must have resulted. It would be impossible to describe the joy of the parents at the moment of the bold blacksmith's.

Fancy dolls have been very brilliant and striking in their little scenes—dolls of course, I at last brought them to a close. Some of the most curious exhibited here have been very unique that we can not follow giving one or two for the same name of our lady readers. It is told that at a recent fancy ball the Marchioness de Galliford visited more than her usual share of admiration and delight as an Artichoke. Her costume was a short petticoat of white corduroy richly embroidered in gold; the bodice appeared to represent gold-painting work-armor. The hair was styled in each side made of white feathers, these were high in the air, and their descent below the knee; her hair was given their descent over her shoulders and down her back in long cascade tangles. A diamond star glinted on her forehead, and even when descending she exhibited a small steel sword in her beautifully-formed ungloved hand.

Another great attraction was the arrival of a very beautiful woman, dressed as a Japanese, who was carried in a palanquin, and escorted by a numerous train of Japanese gaiters, represented by the attendants from the Ministry. A very beautiful young London, Miss C., was admitted as the Queen of the Amateurs, in a similar white petticoat covered with symbolic animals; the bodice was a tiger skin, and the head-dress a small gold helmet. The beautiful Mrs. Miles was Amphitrite, in a sea-green gown dress, apparently powdered all over with seaweed. A silver tank decorated with shells, coral, and feathery seaweeds. A long lot of sea-shells round her neck, and her hair studded with pearls, corals, and crystal drops. These de Toogreffe represented a shower of gold, in a dress of gold brocade, covered with a skin of white tulle (beverage) to the waist, and over that a white tulle tunic made with gold and fringed with emerald gold balls; the bodice was covered with similar gold balls, and the hair was profusely powdered with gold.

But to turn to those fashions which may be of rather more practical interest to the majority of American ladies. It is stated that "crinolines" is at last entirely done, appearing in evening toilets, although it is still worn under promenade and morning dresses. But for evening wear stevedore petticoats are now adopted instead of steel cages. These petticoats are made quite plain round the hips, and have several buttons from the knee downward. About four of these petticoats are worn at one time. The material is muslin, and the stretch is silk. Only very eccentric ladies, and those who desire to be conspicuous, are seen to-day without crinolines out of doors.

Yet the same journal which gives this as the Parisian style, sends to its readers a paper pattern which "will enable them to cut out and make up a very well fitting crinoline at home." And, moreover, states that the real fact is that "crinolines are not so 'going out' as they are only disappearing in view. They are still doing with a persistency which has never, we believe, before been evinced for any article of ladies' costume. They have been written at, Jersey at, talked at, mentioned for ten years or more; French has leveled entire critical shafts against these apparently offending garments; but all to no avail. The one stands there: for outdoor wear small round crinolines are worn, and for evening toilets large train-shaped crinolines are in vogue. This is the rule, although there are certain exceptions to be seen, where crinolines is patronized neither for evening nor evening dress."

American ladies can follow the fashions of Paris or London; or, better still, this is a boasted land of liberty, they may adopt such a style as is healthful, tasteful, convenient, and comfortable.

SIMILES.

To what shall I liken my love for thee?
To the measureless sky, the boundless sea?
Verily no,
It is not so!
The sky is not ever so clear and bright,
But oftentimes clouded and dark and black,
As if the bright sunshine would never come back.
Such is not my love for thee!

My love never changes, 'tis always—
From the cloud of fear or uncertainty.
No storms arise
To dim its skies,
Which are ever bathed in hope's deep blue;
And happiest fancies like sunbeams play
On its shadowless bosom night and day.
And such is my love for thee!

I would not compare my love to the sea,
That emblem of fickle inconsistency.
Now raging here,
Now rippling there;
It can not be trusted for long, I trow,
Besides you can fathom it, know its breadth,
And take the hid treasures out of its depth.
Such is not my love for thee!

But the ocean of love within my breast,
Is a raging storm which is never at rest,
Boundless, endless,
And fathomless.
Nothing can calm it or take it away,
The waves dash high, but the tide of Time
Can never affect this sea of mine.
And such is my love for thee!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

REASONABLE TRANSLATION.

LETTERS TO OURS.—Under a tent umbrella.

ARRANGING FOR YOUR LAMBS ON A WET AFTERNOON.—Knitting their Eyebrows.

TO A CORRESPONDENT.—A gentleman troubled with a short memory having acquired the bad habit of turning down a leaf of a book as he set to remember where he left off, writes to say that he never can remember a street that he's only been in once. How is he to remedy this defect? Very simply: let him do as he does with his books, turn down a corner.

QUESTION TO A WORKING GARDENER.—"Of all your trees which yields most fruit?" Says he, "Sir, the best fruits come from my Judas-tree."

A CORRUPT CONSCIENCE.—When is a greyhound not a greyhound?—When it wears a tail.

SCANDAL.—Miss Martineau is supposed to have committed the fault of profanity in her excellent work, Moral Agency for the Spiritless.

A gentleman had conferred a favor on a friend, an undertaker. Says the latter: "I know, I am under great obligations to you, and allow me to say that your kind favor is kindly appreciated, and I hope I may be able to do you a good turn some day or other. If you ever want a coffin call on me. I should be happy to bury you or any of your family at short notice, at greatly reduced rates." The friend retired, satisfied that the undertaker had an eye to business, and was not lacking in gratitude.

Gentlemen who smoke always that it makes them cold and unpleasant. They tell us that the more they smoke the less they feel.

EXTRA.—The following is the word-revised epitaph of the Lady Elizabeth Greylock: "First cousin to Burke, commonly called the Nativity, she was black, passionate, and deeply religious. Also she painted in water-color, and sent every picture to the Great Exhibition, and of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Slight changes make great differences. "Dinner for nothing" is very good fun, but you can't say so much of "nothing for dinner."

At what hour did the devil make his appearance in the Garden of Eden?—Some time during the night. He certainly came after five.

If you have a cough, don't go to church to disturb the rest of the congregation.

The author who "did not mind his words" introduced some verses thus: "The poem published this week was composed by an esteemed friend who has lain in his grave many years for his own amusement."

REVIEW OF LITERATURE.—Hudson.

A CHURCH CRITICISM.—The following epitaph may now be seen in Deane's church-yard: "Here lies the remains of John Hill, grocer. The world is not worth a fig, and I have good things to say of it."

"Pray, Sir," said a judge severely, to a blind old quaker, from whom no direct answer could be obtained, do you know what we all here for?" "Yes, verily, I do," said the quaker; "I live of you for four dollars each day, and the fat one in the middle for four thousand a year."

The partridge's favorite time of year—the season of Lent.

HERMANN'S NOTE.—(By a Currier.) What to do with Old Milton.—Read it.

A man in Cincinnati adopted an original way of reducing household expenses. One morning, when he knew his wife would see him, he kissed the servant girl. The household expenses were instantly reduced twelve dollars per month.

Mr. Jenkins was dining at a very hospitable table, but a piece of bacon near him was so very small that the lady of the house remarked to him: "Pray, Mr. Jenkins, help yourself to the bacon. Don't be afraid of it!" "No, indeed, madam, I shall not be. I've seen a piece twice as large and it didn't scare me a bit."

"Golly or not golly?" sharply said the City Judge the other day to an inattentive female prisoner in the dock. "Just so your Honor please. It's not for the likes of me to dispute to your Honor's worship," was the reply.

Spain is at red-hot heat with China for having captured one of her vessels. What a faring there will be! Perhaps Spain will find herself to hot water even by dabbling in Chilly affairs.

LEVITANT INTELLIGENCE.—Shortly will appear by the author of Practical Science, Practical Mysticism; to be followed by Practical Mysticism in Chalk with gilt edges.

A certain landlady, it is said, takes her place so early that her lodgers see her to go to bed without a candle after eating a moderate-sized piece.

Somebody describing the absurd appearance of a man dancing the polka, says, "He looks as though he had a hole in his pocket, and was trying to shake a dollar down the leg of his trousers."

Brooks says the prettiest sewing-machine he ever saw was about seventeen years old, with short sleeves, low dress, and garter boots on.

TRUTH vs. FALSEHOOD.

There is a saying, strange to tell,
Though men in books have often said it—
It is, that Truth lies in a well.
If so, then Truth has kicked the bucket.

Why are books the best friends?—Because when they bore you, you can always shut them up without offense.

A noted literary preacher, once sold of a grasping, avaricious farmer, that if he had the whole world inclosed in a single field he would not be content without a peck of ground outside for potatoes.

Why does the eye resemble a schoolmaster in the act of flogging?—It has a pupil under the lash.

An Episcopalian, on admiring a beautiful cemetery, observed that he considered it a healthy place to be buried in.

The only pain that we can make light of—A wind-pain.

The day whose peace of mind was broken instead to have it repaired.

Why is crawling like a ragged coat?—It is a bad habit.

A man may care,
And still be bare,
If his wife be naughty;
A man may spend,
And still may mend,
If his wife be tight.

A clerical gentleman, who appeared before the gipsy sovereign, Queen Esther, with his third wife, was reproached thus by her: "Ah, Mr. Blank, you're an awful waster of women!"

They are fools who persist in being quite miserable because they can not be quite happy.

"Who's there?" screamed old Squire B.—roused from his first nap one bitter cold midnight. "Who's there?"

"Hullo, Squire!" was the reply. "We want to get married."

"You're aw." And now be off with you," said the squire, with emphasis.

Six Kings' Lancers' Motto.—Give a dog a good name and hang him.

Why are ladies like churches?—Because there is no living without them.

"A greater says: "My name is Somerset. I set a miserable bachelor. I can not marry; for how could I hope to prevail on a young lady, possessed of the slightest notion of delicacy, to term a Somerset?"

A Chemical Jester thus alludes: "Some people say sulphuric will not burn the stomach. It's a lie."

A newspaper contains the following: "Truth is covered up out of our address this week."

An honest Irishman, observing the beauty of his wife's curls beginning to fall, reproved them by saying out, "Ay, ay, ye slaves of the world; what for be ye getting a tail of pleasure?"

"My 'pistol is," said a philosophical old lady of much experience and observation, "that any man as disposes within a day does it out of your spite."

"What are you doing with my microscope, George?" "I've been shaving, father, and I want to see if there are any hairs in the latter as yet."

Can a man keep his feet dry when he has a crowd in his boots?

The young gentleman who flew into a passion has had his wings clipped.

A CURRIER'S EPIGRAM ON HIS LEVEL.—"Peace to his knees!"

UNCOMFORTABLE TAX TEAR.—A clergyman, when the contribution-box returned with little silver in it, said he never before understood the text, "Alexander, the top-hermit, did no much evil."

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

Why is a man who signifies like a needle that one can't be threaded?
Because his eye is defective.

Why are backlogs more to be piled than wheat?
Because backlogs are broken, while wheat are only cracked.

Why was the first day of Adam's life the longest ever known?
Because it had no Eve.

Why are women the greatest thieves?
Because they rob their children, lose their sleep, and steal their peaches and buttons.

Why do little birds feed depressed early in a summer morning?
Because their bills are over-run with dirt.

Why is the letter E significant?
Because it is found both in earth and water.

Why do children hate the most?
The mother that bore them.

WE CALLED THIS ONE THE WYLLING AND WREATHEN! ALL WAS A FUNNY YOUNG THING IN '28. WHAT REMAINS OF LOVE'S YOUNG DREAM.

A WARNING TO LANDLORDS.

CHOLERA (to the existing Owners of Tenement Houses). "You'll have to come down with your rents. I intend to occupy these premises myself!"

Robinson & Ogden, BANKERS, AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES, No. 4 Broad St., New York.

Collectors made, with quick returns. Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check. Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Gold will receive our personal attention.

ROBINSON & OGDEN, Bankers.

POLLAK & SON, Mechanic Manufacturers and Hardware, New York, N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced prices. Typewriters held in stock and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Satisfaction for Cash. Prices $2 to $20 each.

TO CURE Diseases of the STOMACH and KIDNEYS, RHEUMATISM, GOUT, GRAVEL, and Disorders arising from excesses, use Smolander's Extract Buckwheat.

Price ONE DOLLAR. Agents for the South and West, D. BARNES & CO., New York, and BARNES, WARD & CO., New Orleans. BULLOUGH & RUGGESS, Boston, Mass. General Agents.

CHINA AND GLASSWARE:

DAVIS COLLAMORE & CO., 429 Broadway New York, Four Doors below Broome Street, are now opening new and beautiful goods.

$200 A MONTH made with SPENCER'S. Don't fail to send for a free catalogue describing full particulars. Address E. M. SPENCER, Stratfield, Va.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER.

This new celebrated Revolver exceeds all others for compactness, of service, durability, power, and safety in carrying. It is light (it weighs only 1 lb.), with larger working water-proof barrels 2 1/2-3 1/2 inch than any Revolver made of same size and weight. Send for circular. GEO. A. BRONCK, 24 CHURCH STREET, New York.

For Sale by Druggists, Fancy Goods Dealers and Perfumers.

Dr. Foote's Advertisements.

OLD EYES MADE NEW, without Spectacles, Drops, or Medicine. Hospital method. Address: E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 113 1/2 Broadway, New York.

COMFORT AND CURE FOR THE URINARY SYSTEM. Sent free. Address: E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 113 1/2 Broadway, New York.

GHOSELY—How it may be made Pleasant; also Care and Cure. Sent free. Address: E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 113 1/2 Broadway, New York.

MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—400 pages—200 Illustrations, 25 Cts. Sent by mail every where, postpaid. Contents Tables sent free. Address the Author, E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 113 1/2 Broadway, New York.

DECEITFUL BANKERS. And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARRISON'S EXPRESS, 45 Broadway.

TO LET. The Four-Story Building, No. 52 Broad Street, 28 feet front. For-rent on 1st of May next. Apply to HANFORD & BROTHERS, Franklin Square.

United States PRIZE CONCERT,

TO BE DRAWN AT CROSBY'S OPERA-HOUSE, CHICAGO, May 28th, 1866.

125,000 Valuable Prizes, valued at $475,515 25, will be presented to Ticket-Holders, including $200,000 in Greenbacks.

NUMBER OF TICKETS ISSUED 500,000, PRICE $1 00 EACH.

This is the greatest entertainment ever offered to the public, and ticket out of every four draws a prize.

The following Prizes are a few among the many to be drawn: (For full list, see circular.)

Table listing prizes such as 1 Gift in Greenbacks, 1 Gift, 1 Gift, etc., with corresponding values.

The drawing will take place after the concert on the night of the 28th inst. where 10,000 persons can witness it. A Committee will be appointed by the audience to superintend the same. All purchases and receipts will be supplied with correct lists of drawings as soon as published. Particularizing tickets will remain in their hands after the drawing, and if their number appears in the list of drawn numbers they will forward their tickets immediately, with full directions as to the shipping of goods or money. Tickets are for sale at the principal banks, book and trade stores in the city, and at our office, 193 Broadway Street; price $1 each sent by mail on receipt of price and stamp for return postage.

Good and reliable agents wanted in every city, town, and village in the United States, to whom great inducements are offered.

Special Terms, or Club Rates.

Any party procuring a club of five or more names for tickets, and forwarding us the money for the same, will be allowed the following commission, viz.:

Table showing commission percentages: 5 tickets to one address for $4 50, 25 " " " " 9 00, etc.

In every case send the name and post-office address of each separate subscriber. Money, by draft, post-office order, express, or in registered letters, may be sent at our risk.

All communications should be addressed to WIGGINS, BRADFORD & CO., 120 Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill. Post-Office Drawer 2015.

Representatives—H. A. WILKINSON, Esq., Senator of Minnesota; Hon. Geo. V. LAMSON, M.C. of Penn.; H. C. ALIX, Esq., M.C. of Wis.; Hon. Wm. Montgomery, Esq., M.C. of Penn.; Hon. Major Dan. Marc. Pa. M.C. of Ind.; Hon. Ira J. LAYCOCK, of Kansas; Hon. Wm. Leffingwell, Lyons, Iowa; Hon. Joseph Knox, of Chicago; H. A. C. GREENE Smith, of Minn.; Jacob Forsyth, Agt. U.S.R.I., Chicago, Ill.; H. KROEBER & Co., Importers of watches, Chicago; Mansell, White & Co., New Orleans, La.

FISK & HATCH, Bankers,

DEALERS IN UNITED STATES AND OTHER DESIRABLE SECURITIES, No. 5 NASSAU STREET, NEW YORK.

THE NEW UNITED STATES THIRTY YEAR SIX PER CENT. BONDS, Issued to aid the Construction of the Great Central Pacific Railroad.

They have THIRTY YEARS to run, and bear interest at the rate of SIX PER CENT. PER ANNUM, in Lawful Money. The interest is payable Semi-Annually, in January and July. They are an Absolute and Uncontingent OBLIGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, and are EXEMPT FROM STATE AND MUNICIPAL TAXATION. Like all other Government Bonds. They are received by the Bank Department as Security for the Circulation of National Banks, and Circulation is issued upon them at the rate of Eighty per Cent. of their Par Value.

The length of time they have to run renders them very desirable for BANKING PURPOSES or for INVESTMENT, as they can not be called in by the Government, and the rate of interest can not be reduced, for THIRTY YEARS. As Gold declines, their relative value to Gold-bearing Bonds, which are liable to be paid off so much earlier, will proportionately increase, and after 1881 they will probably be

The only Six per Cent. Bond of the United States in Existence.

And they can now be bought at a rate at which they will pay A BETTER RATE OF INTEREST on the amount invested, on the same time, than any of the Gold-bearing Bonds, of present prices, unless Gold shall average from 20 to 30 per cent. premium for the next ten or fifteen years. So high an average premium on Gold, for this length of time, is beyond all reasonable expectation, and largely in excess of the most intelligent financial estimates. They are issued only in limited amounts, as the work on the Pacific Railroad progresses. There is but a SHARP ASCENT NOW IN THE MARKET, and the DEMAND IS DAILY INCREASING.

THE CENTRAL PACIFIC R. R. SEVEN PER CENT. STATE AID BONDS, PRINCIPAL AND INTEREST PAYABLE IN GOLD.

Interest Guaranteed and Paid by the State of California.

These Bonds are secured by a Mortgage on 100 Miles of Road, from Sacramento to the California State Line, forming a part of the GREAT PACIFIC RAILROAD ROUTE, adopted and aided by the UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT. They are further secured by a Sinking Fund of $50,000 PER ANNUM IN GOLD, reserved from the earnings of the Road, and Pledged for their Redemption.

About sixty miles of the road are already completed, on which the EARNINGS ARE VERY LARGE, having been in the month of October, 1865, on fifty-three miles of road then running, upward of $65,000 IN GOLD, the road having as yet penetrated to no very important points.

With thirty miles additional completed, which will probably be ready for working by the middle of June next, the earnings are expected to be not less than $200,000 PER MONTH IN GOLD, by careful maintenance kept upon the present amount of traffic over the same routes without railroad facilities. This part of the Great Pacific Route is destined to be one of the MOST PROFITABLE LINES OF RAILROAD IN THE WORLD.

These Bonds are a FIRST-CLASS SECURITY in every respect, and a limited amount will be offered upon terms which render them a VERY ATTRACTIVE AND DESIRABLE INVESTMENT. Inquiries for further particulars will receive prompt attention.

We also keep on hand, and buy and sell at market rates, all classes of UNITED STATES SECURITIES, including Six per Cent. Bonds of 1861, Five-Twenty Bonds (all Issues), Ten-Forty Bonds, Seven-Thirty Treasury Notes (all Issues), One Year Certificates, Compound Interest Notes;

ALSO, NEW YORK SEVEN PER CENT. BOUNTY LOAN, AND OTHER DESIRABLE SECURITIES. Collections made throughout the United States and Canada. Gold and Cheques bought, sold, and collected. Deposits received from Individuals and Firms subject to Check at Sight, as in a Bank.

Certificates of Deposit, available in all parts of the country, issued without charge. Liberal arrangements will be made with Banks and Dealers throughout the country for their New York Accounts. Orders for the purchase and sale of Miscellaneous Stocks and Bonds carefully executed at the Regular Stock Exchange. FISK & HATCH, BANKERS, No. 5 Nassau Street.

UNION ADAMS, HOSIER, GLOVER, and SHIRT MAKER, No. 637 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY.

A Superb and Valuable Book. COPELAND'S COUNTRY LIFE.

A Hand-Book of Agriculture, Horticulture, and Landscape Gardening.

This is the most complete, elegant, and valuable work of the kind yet published. It is adorned with two hundred and fifty fine engravings, plans, and illustrations, and is the book every person who has a farm or garden, and a book every lady should have who wishes to know the best manner of managing a garden and the flower-garden.

1211 edition, revised, 500, 672 pages. Price, Cloth, $5. Sent free to any address on receipt of price. Sold only by subscription. Agents wanted.

DINSMOOR & CO., 25 Cornhill, Boston.

50 PER-CENT SAVED BY USING B. T. RAHBITT'S best Medicinal SALICATE.

B. T. RAHBITT'S best Medicinal SALICATE, "made from Cassava Root." Prepared with the Salicic acid, when taken, nothing but common salt, water, and sugar. Nos. 61, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

WANTED: AGENTS—$120 per Month—to sell the celebrated CROSBY'S new Family Sewing Machine, Price $15. The greatest invention of the age. Send for descriptive circular. SEND TO: E. B. FOOTE, M.D., or Cleveland, O.

CEDAR CAMPHOR

CEDAR CAMPHOR. Use it early. Cheapest and Best for Camphor. Sold by Druggists every where. HARRIS & CHAPMAN, Boston.

MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY,

To be found on each box and each piece of GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLE. All other goods of whatever name, not having this mark, are worthless imitations and infringements on the patents of the Magic Ruffle Company. The GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLES are full six yards in each piece, are well made of the best material, and give perfect satisfaction to consumers. Office of the Company No. 18 Chambers Street, New York.

Marvin's Patent ALGHE AND DRY PLASTER, FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFES

Never lose their fire-proof quality, control the iron, or mould their contents. Stibbed and parlor safes for silverware. MARVIN & CO., 265 Broadway, New York, 713 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

WANTED—AGENTS. For the Historical Chart, BULWARKS OF FREEDOM. Sell like wildfire at immense profit. Address GOLDEN & SAMMONS, No. 1 R. Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois.

SCHILBERG'S GERMAN OINTMENT. Warranted a certain cure, without the slightest danger, for piles, old sores, eczema, salt rheum—all bone and skin diseases, &c. 93 Broadway, New York.

"American Union Company," Manufacturers of the New Ocean-Travel FIASCO, Patent, if not objection to any. Warranted in every particular. Warehouses and "Agency," 467 Broome St.

WANTED—every man in the United States, who has not either an Arm or Leg—to engage in a profitable business. Send Twenty-five Cents for Circular to A. F. BELCHER, Box 45, Philadelphia, Pa.

AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE

To sell LINSINGER'S superbly Illustrated HISTORY OF THE GREAT CIVIL WAR. Over 2000 fine Engravings, costing $20,000. The most complete and reliable history, endorsed by the Government of the State, and the leading Generals and prominent men of the country. Address GILKINGE, W. WILKINSON, PHILADELPHIA, 403 and 609 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

ITCH (WHEATON'S) ITCH Salt Rheum. (WHEATON'S) Salt Rheum.

Will cure the Itch in 48 hours; also cures Salt Rheum, Urticaria, and all eruptions of the Skin. Price 50 cents. By sending 50 cents to WELLES & POTTER, Boston, Mass., it will be forwarded free by mail. For sale by all Druggists.

100 Photographs of Female Beauties sent postpaid for 25c. Address: B. L. FOSTER, 36 Varick St., New York.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,

Manufacturers of Revolvers, Rifles, Muskets, and Carbines,

For the United States Service. Also POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS, REPEATING PISTOLS, Rifle Cases, Revolving Rifles, Edge and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Materials. Sold by Gun Dealers and the Trade generally.

In these days of House-breaking and Robbery, every House, Store, Bank, and Office should have one of our Remington's Revolvers.

Circulars containing cuts and descriptions of our Arms will be furnished upon application. E. REMINGTON & SONS, 110e, N. Y.

Blind

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO
MAR 31 1866

THE REISSUE OF
HARPER'S WEEKLY
A
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

Vol. X.—No. 483.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

MICHAEL PHELAN.—(Photographed by KIMBELL BROTHERS, NORFOLK, VA.)

THE GAME OF BILLIARDS.

By the official record it is found that in Paris, during the year 1865, taxes were paid on 27,478 billiard-tables in public use. The rest of the pastime is not confined to the country of its supposed inception, although almost every nation has its peculiar way of manipulating the game. For example, in France the game is played on a table without pockets, the surface of the bed measuring 5 by 10 feet. Three balls are used, one for each of the players, and a red object ball. A count is only effected by the carom, and each carom scores one only, and as all foul or push shots are prohibited, undoubtedly this game calls forth the highest skill of the player. In England the tables have six pockets, one in each corner, and at the centre of the side rails; the bed surface is 6 by 12 feet. Three balls are also used there, and the counts are made by the winning and losing hazards as well as by caroms; thus, while a carom scores two, should the player or his opponent's ball go into the pocket the score is four, and if both are pocketed the score is six; should all three balls go in, besides the carom, the score is nine. In this country different sizes of tables are used, varying all the way from the French to the English standards. Some are made without pockets, while others have four or six each. The full game includes caroms and the winning hazard, and a stroke can possibly be made to score thirteen.

The game generally played by experts in this country is the four-ball carom game, on a four-pocket table, 6 by 12 feet surface. This, with the score or push shot omitted, is beyond comparison the most brilliant and interesting of all the games; for while it calls for all the scientific ability of the French game, it presents a ten-fold increase of the beauties and intricacies of triangulation, power of force, and startling effects.

During the last twenty years billiards, which had fallen into disrepute, has made rapid advances in this country, and an apartment for its accommodation is now considered a necessity to first-class residences. Next to its generally attractive features and superior sanitary advantages, this increased popularity is mainly due to the increasing exertions of MICHAEL PHELAN, Esq., of this city, who has devoted an active lifetime to the elevation of the pastime and the perfection of its machinery. Mr. PHELAN, who is now in the fiftieth year of his age, is the senior partner of the well-known manufacturing firm of PHELAN & COLLENDER. He has long been celebrated as one of the best players living. Still he never had much inclination for match games, though his great encounter with SEYMOUR, of Detroit, for $7500 a side, which came off in that city in April, 1860, and which was won by PHELAN, has ever been rated as the greatest billiard contest on record. Soon after this occurrence Mr. PHELAN determined to permanently retire from the billiard arena, unless he should at some time have the opportunity of measuring cues with Mr. BEARDSLEY, of Paris, or Mr. ROBERTS, of London, who at that period were the reigning stars of their particular spheres. The last time PHELAN played for a stake was with KAVANAGH, at Irving Hall, in April, 1864. The game was 1000 points up-caroms, push prohibited. The consideration was, the loser to give $100 for the benefit of the Sanitary Commission, while the receipts for admission were donated to the Working Women's Society. PHELAN won.

In June, 1865, through the personal exertions of Mr. PHELAN, and by valuable prizes presented by his firm, almost all the prominent players in the United States assembled in this city, and after forming a Billiard Congress, which still exists, a code of rules was adopted, and a tournament participated in, which established a championship. DUDLEY KAVANAGH, of this city, one of the most successful and effective players in any country, succeeded in securing possession of the Golden Cue, the emblem of the Championship, which he afterwards maintained his right to in five succeeding encounters with the most skillful antagonists that could be brought against him. Finally, in May, 1865, under the plea of illness, KAVANAGH forfeited the Championship Cue to LOUIS FOX, of Rochester; who in turn lost to a contest with JOHN DUNN, of Washington, who now has possession—and is by right Champion of America. The next contestant with DUNN was JOHN M'DONNELL, of this city, and the game was played in the Hall of the Cooper Institute, on the evening of Tuesday, March 13. DUNN retained the cue.

DUDLEY KAVANAGH, who is now exactly twenty-eight years of age, has played more match games than any other man in America, and, of some twenty on record, he was winner in about two-thirds of them. His last encounters were with M. CARME, each player winning a game, and the latter forfeiting a third game, which he refused to practice for, as it allowed the odious "push," which CARME styles "baby billiards." Some of KAVANAGH's over-zealous friends still claim the title of Champion for him, but of course this point can not be maintained. KAVANAGH not only forfeited the cue, but he refuses to respond to the challenges of M'DONNELL, of JOSEPH DUNN, of Montreal, and PIERRE CARME, of New York.

About one year since a real excitement was created in billiard circles by the arrival of a most skillful French Professor of Billiards, M. PIERRE CARME, of Versailles. Placing himself under the direction of Mr. PHELAN, M. CARME gave a series of public exhibitions, and his wonderful prowess in the mouse, force, follow, fly, and other difficult and seemingly impossible shots, have produced profound astonishment and been received with the most rapturous applause. M. CARME has only engaged in two match games (those above-mentioned) during his sojourn in this country, which we understand he has determined to make his permanent residence, and that he will probably shortly open in this city a fine establishment for practice and instruction. He is a native of BORDENX, now in the thirty-first year of his age, and, like KAVANAGH, is a bachelor. M. CARME probably has no superior in his specialties, and is willing to engage any person, for a heavy consideration, at the three-ball French, or the four-ball American games; push barred.—The latest billiard sensation was the arrival, a few weeks since, of Mr. JOHN ROBERTS, the distinguished English billiardist. This gentleman has long maintained his supremacy in the winning and losing hazard game; and as he has beaten DUNN, HIGGINS, CHRISTMAS, BENNETT, and other experts—most of them at an odds of 500 to 1000—he, without doubt, has no equal at the game. He spent the most of the two years just passed in Australia, and on his return to England made an engagement with DUDLEY KAVANAGH to visit this country, under whose management he is now traveling in the West, they lately having taken part in a tournament at Memphis, Tennessee. The friends of Mr. ROBERTS say that on his return to New York he intends to give our best players the opportunity to measure cross with him, and that the contests will probably be at the English, French, and American games. From this it may be inferred that Mr. Bennett intends to accept the challenge of Mr. Joseph Dixon, of Montreal, who some time since defied any man living to play him a game in each of the above specialties, each to be for $2000 in gold a side. Mr. Bennett is now in the forty-first year of his age, and is not a bucketful.

PIERRE CARME.—(Photographed by KIMBELL BROTHERS, NORFOLK, VA.)

DUDLEY KAVANAGH.—(Photographed by G. H. WILLIAMS, BROOKLYN, L. I.)

JOHN ROBERTS.—(Photographed by G. H. WILLIAMS, BROOKLYN, L. I.)

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1866.

SOUTHERN SENTIMENT.

MR. JOHN T. MONROE, of New Orleans, was Mayor of that city when it was occupied by the Union forces, and his conduct was such that he was imprisoned by military authority. At the late election for Mayor he was the successful candidate, and with him three gentlemen who were of the same sympathy were elected for three of the four Recedents of the city. Governor WELLS, of Louisiana, whose Unionism has been lately of a strictly "Southern" character, is yet unwilling to authorize Mr. MONROE to assume office. Mr. KENNEDY, the retiring Mayor, is so skeptical of the loyalty of Mr. MONROE that he also is reluctant to leave the city in his hands, and has telegraphed to the President for instructions. The President is reported to have replied that the facts were unknown to him, and he has declined to interfere. Application was then made to General CANBY, and, as we write, his decision is unknown.

Meanwhile a gentleman perfectly familiar with New Orleans since its capture by the Union army tells us that the life of no Union man would be safe in that city should the United States forces be withdrawn. Another observer reports the same condition of affairs in Savannah; and an old resident of Georgia, faithful through the war, informs us that he should feel it necessary for him to leave the State should the military hold of the Government be relaxed. And these are not exceptional witnesses. Now the men whose conduct is such as to occasion these apprehensions are those who have elected Mr. MONROE Mayor. They are those whose sympathies elsewhere elected Mr. HENNING, an unrepentant rebel general, Governor of Mississippi, and Mr. STANTON, the second chief of the rebellion, Senator from Georgia. They are those who, in Texas, sitting upon Grand Jurors, refuse to act upon the indicted indictments against murderers of Union men during the war, and who, as members of the Convention, are hesitating, at this time of day, as Governor HAMMOND informs the President, to declare the Act of Secession null and void.

Of course so long as this feeling continues dominant in the late insurgent States, so long as fervent fidelity to the rebellion is the sole passport to popular favor, and the universal tone of opinion is bitter hostility to the Government and Union, it is the plainest duty of the Government to maintain a strict military hold of such States. Intelligent men of the South will see that such feeling and conduct are not "acquiescence." Nobody indeed expects defeated men to confess that they were wrong, or to feel a profound affection for a power against which they have ineffectually struggled. But when they declare that they have submitted and acquiesce in the decision of the war, they will not be surprised, and they have no right to be indignant, that the country looks to their acts and not to their words. What kind of acquiescence is it which endangers the personal security of Union men? What kind of submission is it which elects as civil officers and representatives and senators men who are notoriously and honestly incapable of co-operating with the Government? A man who carries up his suit to the highest court, and loses it, does not think he was wrong in bringing the suit, but he pays the damages and yields to the law.

That is all that is asked of the late insurgents. But if they continue to act as if judgment had been pronounced for them, instead of against them, they put themselves still further in the wrong, and indefinitely postpone the day of peace and reunion. If it be natural for them to feel exasperated and bitter, it is no less natural for the country to be wary of admitting them to an uncheckered exercise of power. If they say, as some of them do, "But what further proof can we give? Have we not accepted every thing which has been imposed upon us?" the reply is, that so long as the staunch Union men among them feel insecure, so long as capital and enterprise and labor hesitate to flow toward them, so long as their legislative acts and popular elections reveal a solid hostility to the measures and men which, whether they individually like them or not, are yet inseparably identified with the Government in whose repression they declare their acquiescence, so long the country has a right to say that they have not acquiesced; that they must be distrusted and closely watched; and so long as they will not give up their claims to the right to be treated as rebels, they may require to be neutralized and destroy the very acts to which they point us as proofs of acquiescence.

The people of the Southern States ought to understand that the war was just as earnest to us as it was to them; that there is not the least vindictiveness of feeling upon the part of the loyal people of the country, but, on the contrary, a very hearty desire of sincere union and enduring peace; that there are no foolish expectations of an affected love of the National Government among those who were lately in arms against it; that there is no intention to be unjust or ungenerous toward our Southern fellow-citizens, whatever the papers and politicians who deluded them through the war may say; but that there is a very inflexible determination that the war shall not have been fought in vain; that emancipation shall be made, not called, a fact; and that the permanence and authority of the Government shall not be imperiled by any rash policy springing from ignorance or impotence. There will be no effort to reap more than we have sowed, but the harvest will surely be garnered.

The quality and dominant will of the American people were shown during the war, and they are equally shown to those who can see, in establishing peace. The impolicy of the Copperhead and semi-rebel sentiment should be fully known by this time even to the late insurgents of the South. It could not divide loyalty during the war, and it will not divide the same loyalty now that the war is over. No new party will be formed until the Union party has done its work, and that work is honorable and humane and reasonable reorganization. If any Southerner doubts, if he listens to the sneers who have steadily deceived him for five years past, he will be deceived again and more bitterly. The elections of last autumn, the opening elections of the spring, show that the Union line is not broken; and if the leaders of opinion in the late insurgent States are truly wise, if they wish the country to believe in their acquiescence, they will abandon their dog-in-the-manger policy, and prove that they were honest in the war by honestly accepting the judgment to which they appealed.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL.

The freedom of a large number of the inhabitants of the United States, formerly held as slaves, was recognized and confirmed by the Emancipation Amendment. But more emancipation left the whole class in an anomalous condition, the consequences of which it was plainly the duty of the United States to remove. It became necessary to define at once the relations of the freed people to the rest of the population; and Congress has therefore declared that all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are citizens of the United States; and such citizens, of every race and color, and without regard to any previous condition of slavery, shall have entire equality of civil rights. Any person who shall deprive any inhabitant of any State or Territory of any right thus secured is declared guilty of a misdemeanor, and is punishable by a fine of not more than a thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for not more than one year. The various law officers of the United States, with the officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, and other officers who may be authorized by the President, are charged with the duty of proceeding against all violators of the law.

This Bill of Rights is necessary, simple, and precise. It declares who are citizens, it defines their privileges, and provides for their defense. It pledges the whole power of the country to protect the civil rights of every citizen everywhere. It does not leave them to the whims of local communities nor to the prejudices of caste. It recognizes the right of the supreme sovereignty to declare who are its citizens, and acknowledges the duty of that sovereignty to defend them; nor can any faithful citizen object that his fundamental rights are precisely defined and maintained by the supreme instead of a subordinate authority. The constitutionality of the law can not be questioned except upon the ground of a controlling sovereignty in the States over the nation, and that is a claim which is no longer valid.

This bill—which is truly a Magna Charta—overthrows all hostile legislation of the States against equality of civil rights. The Black Codes, which seek to retain as many of the disabilities of slavery as possible, disappear before this just and beneficent decree. It announces distinctly to those who would still cling to feudalism in America that feudalism is henceforth impossible. It tends to speedy pacification by showing to those who still doubted the national purpose that all the consequences of emancipation have been well weighed and fully accepted by the country. It destroys false hopes. It clears away misunderstandings. It proclaims that when the United States abolished slavery they meant what they said, and know what they did.

The bill passed both Houses of Congress by enormous majorities. In the House of Representatives the vote was 109 to 38, in the Senate 33 to 12; and we see no reason to suppose that the President will dissent. We hope indeed that by the time this paper is issued the bill may have been approved by him and have become a law. We shall hear of that result with sincere satisfaction; for when once the President and Congress agree upon a vital and fundamental measure like this, a better understanding and further agreement will be much more probable and practicable.

Sensible men in the late disaffected States will also be glad that a vexatious question is thus put in the way of settlement. Mr. STEWART, of Georgia, in his late speech before the Legislature of that State, spoke very smoothly of the duty of giving the freedmen fair play. We have the right to expect his earnest support of this bill. Governor ORR, of South Carolina, and Governor WALKER, of Florida, have shown great good sense in their action respecting the education of the freedmen; and they, too, will undoubtedly feel and acknowledge the wisdom of a measure which secures rights that they do not deny. And all citizens of the United States who understand that the country must and ought to be constantly agitated until the equal rights of every American citizen before the law are secured by the highest power in the land, will hail the bill as a measure of the wisest statesmanship, and an earnest of the national resolution that nothing which was really gained by the war shall be lost.

A REPORT UPON THE EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

We have received many letters discussing the eight-hour labor movement, some of them very freely charging us with hostility to the laborer because we have pointed out the impracticability of remedying the evil of over-work by legislation. But the truth is, that the subject is controlled by other laws than that of a Legislature, and must be studied in the light of such laws. A regulation of the State making it penal to work for more than eight hours would be absurd; and a declaration that eight hours should be considered a working-day would be useless. If such a declaration could not be enforced it would leave the matter exactly where it is now.

We observe that Mr. JENKINS, of Indiana, has suggested to Congress that eight hours shall be a working-day in the Government shops and yards; and the New York Legislature has been considering a general proposition in favor of the eight-hour system. In Massachusetts a Commission was appointed last year to investigate the whole subject, and, after careful inquiry and consideration, the Commission have presented a Report which we heartily commend to every working-man and legislator as a most careful, comprehensive, and sagacious treatment of the subject. The Commission was composed of gentlemen peculiarly fitted for the task by sympathy, intelligence, and experience. They have examined the question with the utmost sincerity of purpose to remedy existing evils, and have finally reported against the wisdom, justice, and practicability of an eight-hour law.

The Commission sent into every town of the State to make the necessary inquiries and to solicit co-operation and advice. It also held public hearings in Boston. But neither the response to the inquiries nor the attendance upon the hearings indicated so vital and general an interest as had been supposed. It appears that in the chief branches of industry the "ten-hour system" generally prevails, except in cotton factories, where eleven hours is the general rule. The shortest time established by custom is seven hours and forty minutes for shipwrights upon "old work" or repairs; the longest time is seventeen and a half hours in a few bakeries. The Commission found that the employes were generally in favor of a reduction of time, and the employers opposed to it. Yet those who favor a reduction are not agreed upon the nature of the necessary law. Some wished it to be prohibitory; but a law forbidding a man to use his power of labor at his discretion is a law destroying the capital of the working-man. So, finally, the mass agreed that the law should merely declare eight hours a legal working-day. But such a law is simply worthless.

The Commission are of opinion that the radical objection to making eight hours, or any other number of hours, a legal day's work is, that, by giving one measure of time for all branches of labor, such a law must be unequal in its action. It would not be an impartial law, and that is a fatal difficulty. Moreover, it would be absolutely impossible to apply it to some of the most common and necessary branches of labor. Thus the fundamental industrial interest of farming could not conform to such a law; and the extent of this industry may be inferred from the fact that the present cash value of farms in the United States is about ten billions of dollars. The Commission sum up their objections to the law as follows:

- "Because they deem it essential in principle to apply one measure of time to all kinds of labor.
- "Because, if adopted as a general law in the way proposed, it would be rendered void by special contracts, and so add another to the dead laws that cumber the statutes.
- "Because a very large proportion of the industrial interests of the country could not observe it.

"Because, if restricted, as some propose, to the employe of the State, it would be manifestly partial, and therefore unjust."

The Commission then proceed to a concise, able, and temperate consideration of various points involved in the question: the relation of capital to labor; the province of law; the law of supply; and the employment of capital. They show that capital and labor are not natural enemies, but real friends; and while for the reasons stated they are opposed to an eight-hour law they think that in many departments of labor there is serious injury from over-work, and that in such there is need of reform. This reform, in their judgment, is to be accomplished by intelligent discussion and mutual understanding between employers and employes. They cite instances of such agreement. Thus the workmen representing, at the hearings of the Commission, the factory operatives of Lawrence associated the ten-hour rule for factories, on the ground that the change from eleven hours to eight would be injurious both for the employe and the employer. The introduction of the eight-hour system in Australia was not the result of legislation, but of the tranquil deliberation of all interests. The great co-operative movement in England, illustrated by that at Rochdale—the constituency of the late ROBERT COCHRAN—is voluntary and not legislative. In Germany and France, according to the Commission, the same movement is proceeding without convulsions and with the best results.

We know of no better service which could be done to Congress and to the Legislature of New York, and of every State which is now considering this subject, than to present every member with a copy of this thoughtful, humane, and truly valuable report.

THE DOWNWARD COURSE.

The debates on the Loan Bill in Congress on 16th and 17th inst. fore-shadow the struggle that must be encountered before specie payments can be resumed in this country. All the manufacturers, all the coal-miners, all the producers of grain, all the holders of wheat, corn, pork, and cotton—every one, in a word, who owns property which is liable to devalue while gold is opposed to any and all measures that are calculated to diminish the volume or increase the purchasing power of the currency. It is the old story; the contest of property holders against the public. It is for the interest of all men—including those who now chance to own property and merchandise—that we should as soon as possible get back to a stable standard of values. But it is very hard to drive this truth into the mind of a man who bought pork or cotton or breadstuffs or dry goods at prices 25 per cent. above those now ruling. Such a one is slow to be persuaded that present loss will be future gain.

Portions of continued inflation may for a few weeks or months sway Congress in a wrong direction. They may even prevent the passage of any measure of contraction during the present session. But they will gain little by the contrivance. The duty and policy of the nation in this matter are so clear that no delay will convince the public that they are going to be ultimately neglected. The Loan Bill introduced by Mr. MORRILL is objectionable on many grounds. Its defeat on 16th inst. was not an unmixt misfortune. But those who infer from that defeat that Congress is going to defer to the property holders who—under the lead of JOHN SHEPHERD and THADDEUS STEVENS—desire to perpetuate indefinitely a system of irredeemable and depreciated paper-money, will presently discover that they have mistaken the temper of the nation. Honest men may fairly differ as to methods. One man may favor this sort of contraction, another another sort. One man may look for resumption much earlier than his neighbor. But they who conclude from the opposition already developed in Congress to the MORRILL bill that gold is not going to decline, and that prices are not going to fall with it, will soon find out their error to their cost.

We showed last week that contraction was already in active progress. Over $175,000,000 of compound-interest notes, which six and twelve months ago were in general circulation, have now practically ceased to be currency by reason of the interest which has accumulated upon them. At least $100,000,000 of National Bank currency—say an amount equal to the issues of the National Currency Bureau—have within the past ten months gone South for the transaction of business in that section of the country. And, finally, the Secretary has managed within the past six months to retire about $30,000,000 of the legal-tender notes outstanding. Thus, without any new legislation, contraction is going on at a fair rate.

Even if Congress should, on reconsideration, refuse to accede to the demands of Mr. McCULLOCH, his present powers will enable him to continue to contract the currency at quite an active rate. It is now clear that by mid-summer Five-Twenty bonds will be selling at 75, if not at 80, in London. At these prices the outstanding currency can be exchanged for bonds, and Seven-Thirty notes can be converted into bonds quite as fast as the interests of the com-try require and the safety of commerce will justify.

The Editors of Harper's Weekly are published by LEWIS & CLARK, Inc. No. 130, Broadway, New York, with permission from Harper & Row, N. Y. Editors. Telephone No. 514. For the year 1866, 100 copies mailed to postpaid. Published March 31, 1866. No. 130.

It is not at all desirable that the Secretary should be misled by the present plethoric condition of the Treasury into premature attempts to resume specie payments. Over twelve hundred millions of short-date securities are to be funded or paid off within two years. A policy which should precipitate a commercial crisis would deprive the Government of the means of paying off these securities and of the credit essential for funding them. But no one connected with the Government has thus far developed precipitate views on this subject, and the partisans of continued inflation exhibit a disregard of the facts when they charge the Secretary with desiring to rush forward to specie payments in disregard of the permanent interests of the country. Mr. McCULLOCH's views have thus far been eminently conservative—as the continuance of the temporary loan at 5 and 6 per cent. sufficiently proves.

The great lesson which the public of producers, consumers, manufacturers, middlemen, merchants, farmers, etc., ought to engrave upon their memory at this time is that we are on the high road to contraction, to lower prices, to specie payments. They should beware of being misled by the defeat of this or that bill, by the temporary success of this or that advocate of continued financial disgrace. Let them lay it to their hearts that the American people are bent on rehabilitating their national currency and making it as good as the currency of other nations; and that whatever delays may occur, and however temporarily the paper-money men may seem to triumph, the restoration of a hard-money currency within a given number of years, if not months, is mathematically certain. Let them rely upon it that from this time to the day on which the banks resume specie payments prices will be steadily on the decline, with such reactions as are usual in speculative markets. From quarter-day to quarter-day every thing produced or consumed in this country will show a diminution in market value. Men who hold goods, merchandise, and other property will grow steadily poorer, just as the like class grew steadily richer in the days when the currency was being expanded. Labor will fall steadily in value, until wages decline to a point never before reached in our history. We expect to see common laborers working for half a dollar a day by the time that gold falls to or near par. This will be twice the average paid in Great Britain.

Let the public beware, too, of believing that "the bottom" has been reached before specie payments have been restored. In the downward course there will be many reactions. It will often appear that prices are best upward, and that a general recovery is about to take place. Such symptoms will prove deceptive. There can be no real recovery in prices until the national currency is made worth 100 per cent in gold. When that point is reached, it will be safe to buy any thing, for prices will naturally react sharply from the antecedent depression. But till then, seeming reactions will prove pitfalls of destruction.

Already the signs of the times point to the end. A month ago an active speculation in real estate was in full blast. It seems to have been short-lived. Recent sales at auction show a general decline in prices, and handsome country seats are for sale at rates very much lower than were current in 1856-7. Long-headed men have already read the future. In 1835-6, and again in 1856-7, this class of men refused to buy any thing, and were set down as simpletons by a younger class of operators who claimed to understand the times, and bought right and left whatever was offered at "the going prices." In the course of a few months the young operators were ruined, and their more prudent seniors stepped in and secured their property at almost nominal rates. It will be so again. The men who keep their money, and buy nothing in 1866 and 1867, will probably purchase in 1868 or 1869 all descriptions of property at prices as far below as the rates of 1861-4 were above their real value.

MORE LIGHT!

The most important philanthropic association in the United States is the American Freedmen's and Union Aid Commission, which proposes the education of all the unenlightened population in the late slave States. It is not an impertinent philanthropy, for the welfare of this country depends upon the intelligence of the people, and ignorance any where is danger every where. The ignorance of Maine or of Florida imperils Pennsylvania and Iowa, and he is the true patriot and peacemaker who by every fair and honorable means aims at the education of all the people. The danger to the country is quite as much in the ignorance which puts the mass of the people at the South in the power of certain leaders as it is in the ambition of the leaders. The schoolmaster might have saved us the war. Education will certainly keep the peace.

The policy of Slavery has always been to keep the poor ignorant. Emancipation abolishes the chief reason of so barbarous a policy, but its traditions will long remain. The Charleston Mercury once said that the working-people had no more right to education than the slave; and General HOWARD now says that he believes "the majority of the white people to be utterly opposed to educating the negro. The opposition is so great that the teachers, though they may be the purest of Christian people, are nevertheless visited publicly and privately with undisguised marks of odium." Yet, on the other hand, there are gratifying facts which show the awakening of some of the more intelligent minds in the late insurgent States to the necessities of the case, and which indicate something of that "acquiescence" of which we hear so much and see so little. Thus the Roman Catholic Bishop of Savannah has written to the Freedmen's Aid Union, saying that he learns (what is true) that it has no sectarian character, and asking help in founding schools for the colored part of his flock. The Legislature of Florida has passed laws establishing a common school system for colored children in that State, and the Governor secunds the request of the agent of the Freedmen's Bureau to the Aid Union, that it will assist in erecting a normal school for the education of colored teachers. Governor ORR, also, of South Carolina, and Mr. TRASKWOLD, the Secretary of the Confederate Treasury, having visited the colored schools of Charleston, were so impressed by them that, after consultation with one of the leading colored teachers, they propose a common school system for the colored population of the whole State. These are significant facts, and show that some men at the South understand how the cruel ravages of war are to be effectively repaired.

The Census of 1850, which was prepared under the auspices of Dr. BOW, who stated every thing as softly as possible for the slave States, and which, allowing for the losses of war, may be nearer the truth of to-day than the later Census, gives 568,182 free adults in the slave States who could neither read nor write. The number of free colored adults would very slightly reduce these figures. Assuming that there are 1,000,000 of freedmen, and even 500,000 poor whites to be educated, at least 30,000 teachers would be wanted. The annual expense would be scarcely less than $15,000,000. The daily expense of the war was about $3,000,000. Thus to educate for two years the ignorance of the South from which the war sprung would cost no more than ten days of war. If the States would undertake the whites, the expense would be reduced one-third. Would it be an extravagant expense? Would it be a waste of money? No; for as men are educated their demands increase, and their increasing demands start all the vast machinery of trade. Education in Alabama or Georgia quickens the spindles of Lowell, the looms of Lyons, the fields of the West, the presses of the East. Education is the best police, abolishing armies, destroying penitentiaries, and recognizing the resistless force of the State in a single constable. Every dollar spent for this regenerating influence would be sowing a seed which would be harvested a thousandfold.

The work should be voluntary as that of the Sanitary Commission was; and such the Aid Commission proposes that it should be. Moreover, it should be as heartily welcomed in the destitute States whose population it proposes to reach as it should be sustained by those which are able. Truth is not sectional. Ideas are not local. There is no proprietor's brand upon knowledge. Jealousy of so humane and lofty a work is impossible except among the foolish or the malevolent. It is worthy of the time and of the country. It would be the seal of reconciliation and peace.

COLORADO.

The bill for the admission of Colorado has failed, and we are not sorry. The smallness of the population and the character of the Constitution were the chief objections urged against the bill, and the Enabling act was the main argument for it. But the terms of the original Enabling act were not complied with; and although that of itself is not a fatal objection, yet the facts as reported justify a doubt whether there was a fair expression of the population upon the Constitution. In any case the majority was suspiciously small; and the Constitution disables an intelligent and industrious part of the population because of their color. The general principle was advanced which seems to us very reasonable, that it is not desirable to erect any Territory into a State until it has at least the population necessary to send one representative to Congress. If Colorado wishes to be the equal of New York in the United States Senate, it surely is not unfair to delay her gratification until she is entitled to one member of the House.

A POOR JOKE.

One of the amusing spring jokes is the painful effort of the "Democratic" papers and orators to call the men who sustained the war against the Congress of Richmond and the Chicago Convention disunionists. The gentlemen who with more or less frankness applauded JEFFERSON DAVIS and thwarted the United States Government in the agony of its struggle are very anxious to be considered the especial friends of the Union. As their political allies, the late enemy, could not overthrow the Government they are very clamorous that they should now control it. Next to the dissolution of the Union these worthy citizens would like to see a dissolution of the Union party; and as they have learned that loyal men are able to maintain the Union against combined Copperheads and rebels, they would dearly like to steal that name and brand their conquerors as disunionists. When they can persuade the American people that BUNDECK ARNOLD was a patriot and PATRICK HENRY a Tory, they may convince the same jury that VALLANDIGHAM and the "friends" of HORATIO SETHWORTH are true Union men, and the glorious multitude which saved the Union in war and intend to secure it in peace disunionists.

AVOIDABLE AND UNAVOIDABLE CAUSES OF DISEASE.

PHYSICIANS, in making out certificates of death, sometimes in the case of old persons, when they find no evidences of the presence of some one positive disease, set down old age as the cause of the result. Let us see whether this is strictly correct. What, let us inquire, is necessary to the absolute preservation of health, so that death may come entirely from old age without the agency of any disease? Food must be taken every day of the right quantity and quality, at the right intervals, and adapted to the different periods of life; the influence of all external agencies—as air, heat, light, etc.—must be perfectly regulated, and mind and body must be exercised in the right amount and manner in all the stages of their progress—all this requiring, as you see, vastly more alike of knowledge and judgment and power than are within the compass of man. But this is not all. There is requisite also entire freedom from untoward passions and desires, which are fruitful sources of disease in their irritating and depressing influences upon the nervous system, aside from the results of the wrong practices to which they lead. But even more than this is required. There must be the power to neutralize all those occult causes which operate so widely, producing specific forms of disease, such as scurvy, malarious diseases, cholera, typhus, etc.

You see, then, that death absolutely from old age alone is an impossibility. Even if the occult causes alluded to are escaped, there must necessarily be, even in those that live most rationally, accretions of disease every now and then along the course of life—each one, it may be, slight, but adding to the aggregate which is to produce death at length in those who to all appearance die of old age. Even though there may have been no obvious attacks leaving marks, there always are in such cases slight morbid conditions engendered here and there—weak spots, as we may say—which have much to do with the final result, sometimes obviously and sometimes secretly. It is only when some one of these becomes especially prominent at the last that some malady is set down as the cause of death; and when a concurrence of several or many of them is the cause, though death comes really from a compound disease, it is attributed to old age.

Have you ever read HUNTER's story of the Doctor's "One-hoss Shay"?—how it all gave out at once at every point, making a pile of dust, instead of breaking down—or, in other words, how it perished of sheer old age? An amusing description this of an impossibility akin to that of a strictly general wearing out and death of the human body. As "A chaise breaks down, but doesn't wear out," so we may say of man even when he dies at a good old age, in such a way that the physician can not see that he died of any particular disease. Even in such cases there is undoubtedly often "somewhere a weakest spot," though not discovered; and although there may not be, it is clear that many small weaknesses may produce the result as surely as a single great one.

In what we have said the reader can not fail to observe that the causes of disease may be divided into two classes—the avoidable and the unavoidable; the former, all those common causes which come from such agencies as food, heat, air, light, etc., and the exercise of the powers of our bodies and minds; and the latter, the occult and specific causes of which we have spoken. The classification is not, however, absolutely correct; for the causes of the first class are not available to the full. To make them so would, as we have before said, require more than human knowledge and power. Then again, though we know nothing of the nature of the occult causes, we do know enough of the circumstances that produce some of them to enable us often to escape their operation. For example, though no chemical or other tests have ever discovered the nature of the cause of intermittent fever, the circumstances which favor its production are well ascertained, and we in many cases have some measure of control over them.

Again, the two classes of causes very commonly are mingled in their operation. Take, for instance, cholera. The specific cause of this is unavoidable; that is, no one can escape from its influence who is where it is in operation. But many of the avoidable causes of disease—that is, the common transgressions of the laws of health—are absolutely necessary in a very large proportion of cases, perhaps even the majority, to make the specific cause effectual in the production of the malady. And yet little heed do most people give to these avoidable causes, while they run after vaunted prophylactics, and clamor for ineffectible and ineffectual quarantine regulations. So in the case of typhus there is a specific cause, which sometimes develops the disease in those who observe the laws of health uncommonly well, but it is peculiarly apt to do so in those who live in crowded and continuous transgression of them, as is seen in the crowded and filthy habitations in some quarters of cities in contrast with the model lodging-houses.

The avoidable causes of disease operate with some unavoidable causes much more readily than with others. They, for example, have a great influence, as you have seen, in the diffusion of typhus fever and the cholera, but they seem to have little or none in the diffusion of small-pox, scarlatina, measles, etc. These latter diseases do not, like the former, have their special habitats among the crowded and filthy and vicious.

Take now, in contrast with such diseases as typhus and cholera, consumption, that great and constant scourge (and because constant and not occasional attracting but little attention) that causes in many quarters even one-sixth of all the deaths. The causes of this malady are all available, of course with the limitations before noticed. There is no specific cause—no poison acting in connection with other causes; but the disease is the result of tendencies in the system generated by transgressions of the laws of health, and there is no case in which a true hygiene can win more signal victories. Even those tendencies which are inherited may be very generally removed by proper modes of living.

CONSUL GENERAL MURPHY.

Mr. W. W. MURPHY, Consul General of the United States at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, in Germany, has just arrived from Europe, upon a short leave of absence. Mr. Murphy will be most warmly welcomed by those who know how laudable his services were in maintaining the honor and credit of his country during the war. That the bonds of the United States were in good repute among German capitalists is greatly owing to the intelligence, ability, and courtesy of Consul General Murphy.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

March 31: In the Senate, Mr. Sherman introduced a joint resolution that the aggregate outstanding United States notes, not bearing interest, and including fractional currency, shall not be distributed below four hundred and twenty millions; that all surplus in the Treasury exceeding forty millions in coin and forty millions in currency shall be promptly applied to the payment of accruing liabilities, and to the purchase or payment of the interest-bearing debt of the United States; but the amount of interest-bearing legal-tender notes shall not be distributed by payment or conversion at a rate exceeding five millions per month. This resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance.—The bill to admit Colorado was defeated, 14 to 21.

In the House, Mr. Schenck reported back from the Military Committee a bill to temporarily suspend Military and Naval Appointments, for the filled of loosely detailed officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States. The bill was passed.—Mr. Wilson, of Iowa, reported back, with amendments, the Civil Rights bill. The amendments were agreed to, and the bill was passed by a vote of 109 to 28.

March 30: In the Senate, Mr. Wilson called for the bill to increase and for the military peace establishment, which, after a full debate and the adjournment of several amendments, was passed.—vote 57, yeas 8.

In the House, the joint resolution relative to the Paris Exposition was taken up, and Mr. Washburn, of Illinois, addressed the Committee in opposition. Mr. Chandler, Mr. Grinnell, Mr. Woodbridge, Mr. Raymond, and Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts, followed in favor of the resolution. At the evening session the consideration of the subject was resumed, and receiving several amendments, the resolution was passed.—yeas 60, nays 50.

March 29: In the Senate, the Civil Rights bill was taken up, and the House amendments agreed to. The bill having passed both Houses, goes to the President for his assent.

In the House, the principal topic of discussion was the Loan bill.

March 28: In the Senate, Mr. Stewart, of Nevada, introduced a joint resolution on reconstruction, in favor of universal suffrage, a general amnesty, and admission of the seceded States. In the House, Mr. Hubbard, of Iowa, offered a resolution which was adopted, instructing the Committee on Indian Affairs to inquire into the expediency of concentrating the different tribes of the Dakota or Sioux Indians on one reservation.—The Loan bill was defeated by a close vote.

March 27: In the Senate, the House amendments to the bill establishing a national home for disabled soldiers were carried in, and the measure now only needs the President's signature to render it a law. The bill to provide for an aerial inspection of Indian affairs was called up, and, after some discussion, passed.

In the House, the vote on the Loan bill was reconsidered, and the bill was reconsidered without instructions.

GEORGIA AND TEXAS.

The Texas Convention has recognized the abolition of slavery, and will probably make full provision for the rights of the negro, there being only a very small minority of the delegates opposed to such a course.

The Georgia Legislature has just passed a law that all persons of color shall have the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, and to be sued, to give and receive evidence, to inherit, to purchase, lease, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to have full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and estate, and shall not be subjected to any other or different punishment, pains, or penalty for the commission of any act or offense than such as are prescribed for white persons committing like acts or offenses.

FOREIGN NEWS.

There is considerable opposition in the Corps Legislatif of France to the policy of trying to keep a foothold in Mexico. The fact that a general election will be held in 1869 will have great influence on the Emperor, leading him as far as possible to conciliate the people both on this Mexican question and also on questions of reform. It is significant that M. Jules Favre, a member of the Corps Legislatif, has had the boldness to speak of France as absolutely dependent upon the will of one man, the Emperor.

The London Times speaks of President Johnson's new message in terms of commendation.

Prussia seems determined to annex Schleswig and Holstein in spite of Austria. Count Bismarck has driven the latter country to the alternative of surrendering its own claims or risking war with Prussia. It seems likely that Austria will make the surrender for the sake of peace.

In China the Nippon rebellion, which has arisen from the members of the suppressed Tungting sect, was gaining ground rapidly, and Shanghai was once more threatened with an attack. The foreign residents were preparing to meet their assailants. Despatch agents of creditors insisted on required relief by Chinese officials, under the tacit sanction of the British authorities, are published in the Hong Kong papers. In India disturbances had again broken out on the northwest frontier.

GENERAL PRADO, THE NEW DICTATOR OF PERU.—[SEE PAGE 192.]

MANTILLA STREET, LIMA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. GARDNER, WASHINGTON, D. C.]

INTERIOR GARDEN OF THE ORDER OF BAREFOOTED MONKS, LIMA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. GARDNER, WASHINGTON, D. C.]

SIDE VIEW OF THE BRIDGE OF PIZARRO, LIMA.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. GARDNER, WASHINGTON, D. C.—[SEE PAGE 194.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

INSIDE
A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

IN LOVE.

CHAPTER XII.

"We really can not and will not permit our attention to be drawn off one moment longer from Dr. Peel; he looms altogether too conspicuously upon the Somerville horizon for that. It is impossible longer to ignore the deep and widespread impression he has made upon that intelligent community."

"Describe him to you?" says fair Anne Wright to an old schoolmate, with whom she is conversing, on a visit from an adjoining county. "I can not, Laura; you must see him for yourself, child."

"Oh, well, you can at least give me some hint, can't you, something about him," urges her curious friend—naturally curious from the perpetual reference she hears made to him, beneath that roof. "Is he a big man?"

"At least not a little man," laughs Anne. "Yes, I do really believe he is the largest—I mean the grandest man I ever saw in all my life. Such a noble chest! His forehead, too, high and prominent. And then his eyes—the finest you ever saw—eyebrows, and hair all as black? That isn't the same for it. But his eyes—the most splendid you ever saw—look as if they were actually alive!"

"Why, so they are if the man isn't dead," says her more prosaic friend.

"Oh, nonsense, Laura! I told you I could not begin to describe him," says Anne, who is a fragile and lovely blonde. "There is a sort of soft fire in them, except when he gets roused; then how they glow and flash and scorch. And then he has such a voice, child; I do know it is the sweetest and deepest. And he tells me he makes speeches in Somerville the most powerful—makes the people laugh one moment, and cry like children the next. And when he denounces the Yankees or the Union people! Why he says his voice, when he lifts it, can be heard for miles. Pa says he is equal to Colonel Het Roberts, if not superior. And then he dresses so splendidly! The finest broadcloth, the whitest and finest linen, the richest vests. I do think his neck-ties—figured silk scarfs, you know—are the gayest and the brightest. One notices such things so much more these days when we are all wearing our old things on account of the blockade—this old calico, for instance. And his jewelry, too! Pa objects to that in Dr. Peel. And I didn't like it in gentlemen either till I saw Dr. Peel. He wears several rings on his fingers, large ones, one or two diamonds among them. Then his heavy gold watch—I have noticed it when he takes it out to see if he ought not to be going—it is so massive and rich, with such a heavy gold chain to it all across his bosom. But you ought only to see his breast-pine, Laura! A different one every time, at least, he has called out here—the richest! What is most uncommon about him is the quantity of perfumes he uses. Pa almost swears about it. I don't object to it. Why, Laura, in his appearance, bearing, and all, his olive complexion, too, he looks like a Spaniard—a Spanish prince, so large and stately and magnificent in comparison with us plain people."

"Why, the man must be rich," says Laura. "Every body says so. He always has plenty of money, and he pays it out as freely as a king. The ladies there in Somerville have only to go to him to get any amount they want, provided only it is for the war in any way. Not our miserable, ragged, dirty paper-money; great round twenty-dollar gold pieces; and, you know, they are worth ever so much more than paper. And as to his politics, pa says he never saw—"

"Give for the war? He must be a good Southern man," says Laura, threading her needle afresh. "I was just going to say, pa says he is most determined, active, liberal, confident; 'the most splendid specimen of a Southern gentleman I ever saw," pa said, after Dr. Peel left here last Saturday. And that's just what we like him most for," continues Anne Wright, with enthusiasm. "You know what a hot Southern man pa is; but Dr. Peel is ahead of him, of any body I know. I've always been a good Secessionist, which is more than you can say, Laura. Now don't be offended, dear, but it's actually awful to hear Dr. Peel talk about the Yankees—the most despicable people, he says, in every sense of the word; yes, and proves it in a thousand ways. And then to hear him speak about the South, its extent, resources, glorious victories, future prospects, how essential its success is to the whole world—I can't remember it all, but it is like reading an oration."

"Yes; but why isn't he off for the war?" asks Laura, whose people, by-the-by, have been dreadfully suspected of entertaining Union sentiments. Flague take them! as Mrs. Warner is steadily remarking, you find them here and there and every where.

"You silly child, he is in the war. Not a private soldier to dig in the trenches, or to be shot down like common people. If you were to see him once you would see how absurd that would be. No, Dr. Peel fills some high position or other. He is often away from Somerville attending to military business; in correspondence continually with President Davis, General Beauregard, and the rest. He brought a superb sword all the way out here to show me, one that Davis had presented him with, gold scabbard, silver hilt, with a great red gem of some sort in the end, silver chains to it, and all. Pa pressed him to tell us more particularly about his position—it was only last Saturday. You ought to have seen his manner as he said it—'It would give me much pleasure, Major Wright, to inform you. I flatter myself it would interest and astonish you if I was only at liberty to tell. A gentleman of your intelligence, however, will understand that there are cleaved and difficult duties—duties which require coats of secrecy.' And then he drew himself up with such dignity I couldn't help thinking what a splendid Confederate senator he would make. Don't whisper it, Laura; but he has already told us that he has some promise, when the war is over, of the mission—you know we will have ambassadors like other nations—to Austria or Russia or Spain, he was not assured yet which. But, my dear," ran on Anne, generally the quietest of girls, enraptured with her theme, "you ought only to hear him tell about being taken for a Federal spy there in Somerville, oh, months ago. He told us about a self-appointed Committee visiting his rooms at Staples' Hotel to examine. The idea was so funny, and then the way he took off Bob Withers and that fussy old Dr. Ginnis, pa like to have died laughing. And such splendid teeth, speaking of laughing, you know, he has! He had met with ever so many singular adventures in his life, he told us, but that being taken for a Federal spy he did think was the richest of all. He sat down on the spot, he told us, and wrote to the President a full account of it, just to give Davis, he said, one good laugh if he never has another. How they tumbled over his things, peeped into his boots, and all—spongy Captain Simmons and the rest. But he was glad to see it, he said; it showed the people were active and wide awake for the Confederacy."

"Why, he must have been out here quite often?" said the friend, with a smiling malice in her eye.

"No, not very often; that is, not very, very often," replies Anne, very red and then quite pale. "But we won't talk about him any more; I'm tired of it. How do you fix those garters, Laura? you are such a wise body, and I am such a poor little good-for-nothing."

"Oh, you artful little goose," broke in her friend, "if you ain't in love with the man my name isn't Laura Rice!"

"What nonsense, Laura!" says poor translucent Anne, blushing very red, and then turning so pale it was unpleasant to see. "I never thought of such a thing. Me? I would as soon think of the Emperor of Russia. If you only know him, what a great, magnificent—"

"Nonsense yourself, Anne, don't I know," says her visitor, who, being quite plain, was that much the more strong-minded and sensible. "If you don't know you ought to know that just such fair-haired, blue-eyed, nice little bodies as Anne Wright are the very ones your big Spanish princes are most apt to fall in love with."

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself, Laura," said her friend, flushing with pleasure one moment, almost ready to cry the next. "You ever whisper such a thing, and see if I don't tell every body you are Union. Dr. Peel may have shown me a good deal of attention at balls in Somerville, concerts, tableaux. He may have been out to talk with pa about the war. I never once thought, I never dared to think of such a thing. If I was only a strong, beautiful girl, high-spirited, like Alice Bowles say—but poor little me? Why, he could put me in his vest pocket almost. Me, child! You think yourself mighty wise, but you never were more mistaken in all your life." And Anne vows she will never mention Dr. Peel's name to any body again as long as she lives, rattles off upon other topics for a while, and then becomes so silent as to be but poor company for her friend.

And Dr. Peel is a magnificent-looking man, no denying that fact. As Anne Wright said to her friend, he did look "the very hero of a novel, dear; Byron's Corsair, and all that. And sings? You only ought to hear him sing!"

He looks all this the more strikingly these last few days from contrast with Lieutenant Ravenel. The Lieutenant is a late arrival in Somerville. He and Dr. Peel, to whom he has brought letters of introduction from South Carolina, are inseparable. Any one can see what particular pleasure the Doctor takes in introducing him to all his friends—that is to say, all the gentlemen, not Union men, to be met on the streets. "A genuine bit of Charleston aristocracy, Hagenet blood, distinguished for his gallantry in the war; on important business from the War Department, though what that business is I can not get out of him," says Dr. Peel aside to his friends in billiard saloon and street corner.

If you observe them in Mrs. Bowles' parlor on a visit they make that lady, Dr. Peel looms up peculiarly large in comparison with the small, almost girlish, sun and form of the Lieutenant. The Doctor is quite swarthy, while the Lieutenant is exceedingly fair and rosy, no perceptible beard yet—too young for that. A handsome fellow, too, in his way, in his neatly-fitting gray suit, the sleeves richly embroidered; the military cap sitting jauntily on the side of his head is off now, of course, and you can not fail to admire his light and curly locks. "My dear mother fitted me out before I left Charleston with her own hands," he told Mrs. Bowles in return for some compliment upon his attire. Such frank, open, cordial manners! Fun, too, always lurking in the corners of his dark eye and chiseled mouth, breaking out continually in ready laughter, artless and unrestrained as a child, ever dimpled chin and cheek. Every body likes the Lieutenant on the spot warmly; you can not help it.

"By George! and those slight-built, pretty-faced fellows, girlish as they look, are the very ones to fight, you'll bet; perfect devils incarnate when a battery has got to be stormed. That's what the English people found out about their London dandies there in that war with the Russians," says Bob Withers in reply to Dr. Ginnis's sneers at Lieutenant Ravenel.

For a wonder Dr. Peel sits comparatively silent in Mrs. Bowles' parlor this evening, and lets the Lieutenant do all the talking. And Mrs. Bowles is in a flutter of delight over a visit from one direct from Charleston, and has a thousand questions to ask about Charleston and South Carolina. Lieutenant Ravenel knows almost every body and every thing there. She has vague recollections of having often seen the Lieutenant himself when a little boy playing on the Battery there at Charleston. His family she knows, of course, ever since she knew any thing. And the Lieutenant has a world to say about Rutledge Bowles, with whom he has been intimately associated, and whom he likes almost as much as his mother.

"Only, you know, Madam, there is no merit in that. Every one admires and likes Rutledge Bowles. How much he is growing to resemble his father in the portrait—of the Major, I presume it is, Madam?" says the Lieutenant, with a wave of the hand toward the old hero in his frame overhead.

"I am pleased to know it," says little Mrs. Bowles, all the mother kindling through her refined and thoroughly lady-like manner. "Did Rutledge Bowles send his photograph by you?" she asks, eagerly.

"He would have done so, Madam, for I heard him speak of desiring to send it only the week I left. The fact is, I was not intending then to leave Charleston, much less come so far south as this. Intending? Upon my word, Madam, I had no such intention. Just ten minutes before the Augusta train ran out of Charleston my Colonel caught me on the street with dispatches in his hand and a sealed note of instruction for myself. 'You will hardly have time to throw your linen in a valise and run,' he said. I did run, hard as I could tear, Madam; barely in time to catch the train as it ran out of the depot. You remember it is a good distance from the Post-office, where I was when the Colonel caught me. At the rate they hurry us a pair of fresh feet ought to be served out every few hours as a regular ration, Madam—a relay of wings, or something of the sort." The Lieutenant is so perfectly a gentleman, at the same time so overflowing with life and fun that he keeps Dr. Peel and Mrs. Bowles and Alice laughing, the first named especially, all the evening.

"I could wish Rutledge Bowles was a little more lenient toward the faults of his subordinates," I mean his superior officers, as they are called in military language," says Mrs. Bowles, not without pride. "He seems to be always in some difficulty with them. Yet Rutledge Bowles has, through young, a good deal of his father's, the Major's, accuracy and energy of character too. He lately sent me full drawings of all the defenses of Charleston, with an exact statement of the number and disposition at the time of our troops there."

"Was that not rather—excuse me—against ranks?" began the Lieutenant, politely.

"So he said in his letter. 'But since you have written for them, mother,' he wrote, 'I will risk it.' It was a foolish curiosity I had, not to see the drawings and that, but to see how well he could do it. Friends here also would like to see what Rutledge Bowles could do. Still I did not wish him to come unnecessarily in conflict with his—superiors."

"Oh, we all know Rutledge Bowles," says Lieutenant Ravenel, gravely. "For my part I do assure you, Madam, I have talked with him upon that very point often. You see, Madam, we were students together at—at, pshaw, was it at the Citadel or—"

"Columbia," suggests Mrs. Bowles. "What am I thinking about? Columbia. I prepared for Columbia at the Citadel. Columbia, of course. I could take the liberty with him, you observe; it is not every one who can. If Rutledge Bowles has a fault it is pride. But I could do nothing with him. Ah, before it

separable. Any one can see what particular pleasure the Doctor takes in introducing him to all his friends—that is to say, all the gentlemen, not Union men, to be met on the streets. "A genuine bit of Charleston aristocracy, Hagenet blood, distinguished for his gallantry in the war; on important business from the War Department, though what that business is I can not get out of him," says Dr. Peel aside to his friends in billiard saloon and street corner.

If you observe them in Mrs. Bowles' parlor on a visit they make that lady, Dr. Peel looms up peculiarly large in comparison with the small, almost girlish, sun and form of the Lieutenant. The Doctor is quite swarthy, while the Lieutenant is exceedingly fair and rosy, no perceptible beard yet—too young for that. A handsome fellow, too, in his way, in his neatly-fitting gray suit, the sleeves richly embroidered; the military cap sitting jauntily on the side of his head is off now, of course, and you can not fail to admire his light and curly locks. "My dear mother fitted me out before I left Charleston with her own hands," he told Mrs. Bowles in return for some compliment upon his attire. Such frank, open, cordial manners! Fun, too, always lurking in the corners of his dark eye and chiseled mouth, breaking out continually in ready laughter, artless and unrestrained as a child, ever dimpled chin and cheek. Every body likes the Lieutenant on the spot warmly; you can not help it.

"By George! and those slight-built, pretty-faced fellows, girlish as they look, are the very ones to fight, you'll bet; perfect devils incarnate when a battery has got to be stormed. That's what the English people found out about their London dandies there in that war with the Russians," says Bob Withers in reply to Dr. Ginnis's sneers at Lieutenant Ravenel.

For a wonder Dr. Peel sits comparatively silent in Mrs. Bowles' parlor this evening, and lets the Lieutenant do all the talking. And Mrs. Bowles is in a flutter of delight over a visit from one direct from Charleston, and has a thousand questions to ask about Charleston and South Carolina. Lieutenant Ravenel knows almost every body and every thing there. She has vague recollections of having often seen the Lieutenant himself when a little boy playing on the Battery there at Charleston. His family she knows, of course, ever since she knew any thing. And the Lieutenant has a world to say about Rutledge Bowles, with whom he has been intimately associated, and whom he likes almost as much as his mother.

"Only, you know, Madam, there is no merit in that. Every one admires and likes Rutledge Bowles. How much he is growing to resemble his father in the portrait—of the Major, I presume it is, Madam?" says the Lieutenant, with a wave of the hand toward the old hero in his frame overhead.

"I am pleased to know it," says little Mrs. Bowles, all the mother kindling through her refined and thoroughly lady-like manner. "Did Rutledge Bowles send his photograph by you?" she asks, eagerly.

"He would have done so, Madam, for I heard him speak of desiring to send it only the week I left. The fact is, I was not intending then to leave Charleston, much less come so far south as this. Intending? Upon my word, Madam, I had no such intention. Just ten minutes before the Augusta train ran out of Charleston my Colonel caught me on the street with dispatches in his hand and a sealed note of instruction for myself. 'You will hardly have time to throw your linen in a valise and run,' he said. I did run, hard as I could tear, Madam; barely in time to catch the train as it ran out of the depot. You remember it is a good distance from the Post-office, where I was when the Colonel caught me. At the rate they hurry us a pair of fresh feet ought to be served out every few hours as a regular ration, Madam—a relay of wings, or something of the sort." The Lieutenant is so perfectly a gentleman, at the same time so overflowing with life and fun that he keeps Dr. Peel and Mrs. Bowles and Alice laughing, the first named especially, all the evening.

"I could wish Rutledge Bowles was a little more lenient toward the faults of his subordinates," I mean his superior officers, as they are called in military language," says Mrs. Bowles, not without pride. "He seems to be always in some difficulty with them. Yet Rutledge Bowles has, through young, a good deal of his father's, the Major's, accuracy and energy of character too. He lately sent me full drawings of all the defenses of Charleston, with an exact statement of the number and disposition at the time of our troops there."

"Was that not rather—excuse me—against ranks?" began the Lieutenant, politely.

"So he said in his letter. 'But since you have written for them, mother,' he wrote, 'I will risk it.' It was a foolish curiosity I had, not to see the drawings and that, but to see how well he could do it. Friends here also would like to see what Rutledge Bowles could do. Still I did not wish him to come unnecessarily in conflict with his—superiors."

"Oh, we all know Rutledge Bowles," says Lieutenant Ravenel, gravely. "For my part I do assure you, Madam, I have talked with him upon that very point often. You see, Madam, we were students together at—at, pshaw, was it at the Citadel or—"

"Columbia," suggests Mrs. Bowles. "What am I thinking about? Columbia. I prepared for Columbia at the Citadel. Columbia, of course. I could take the liberty with him, you observe; it is not every one who can. If Rutledge Bowles has a fault it is pride. But I could do nothing with him. Ah, before it

separable. Any one can see what particular pleasure the Doctor takes in introducing him to all his friends—that is to say, all the gentlemen, not Union men, to be met on the streets. "A genuine bit of Charleston aristocracy, Hagenet blood, distinguished for his gallantry in the war; on important business from the War Department, though what that business is I can not get out of him," says Dr. Peel aside to his friends in billiard saloon and street corner.

If you observe them in Mrs. Bowles' parlor on a visit they make that lady, Dr. Peel looms up peculiarly large in comparison with the small, almost girlish, sun and form of the Lieutenant. The Doctor is quite swarthy, while the Lieutenant is exceedingly fair and rosy, no perceptible beard yet—too young for that. A handsome fellow, too, in his way, in his neatly-fitting gray suit, the sleeves richly embroidered; the military cap sitting jauntily on the side of his head is off now, of course, and you can not fail to admire his light and curly locks. "My dear mother fitted me out before I left Charleston with her own hands," he told Mrs. Bowles in return for some compliment upon his attire. Such frank, open, cordial manners! Fun, too, always lurking in the corners of his dark eye and chiseled mouth, breaking out continually in ready laughter, artless and unrestrained as a child, ever dimpled chin and cheek. Every body likes the Lieutenant on the spot warmly; you can not help it.

"By George! and those slight-built, pretty-faced fellows, girlish as they look, are the very ones to fight, you'll bet; perfect devils incarnate when a battery has got to be stormed. That's what the English people found out about their London dandies there in that war with the Russians," says Bob Withers in reply to Dr. Ginnis's sneers at Lieutenant Ravenel.

For a wonder Dr. Peel sits comparatively silent in Mrs. Bowles' parlor this evening, and lets the Lieutenant do all the talking. And Mrs. Bowles is in a flutter of delight over a visit from one direct from Charleston, and has a thousand questions to ask about Charleston and South Carolina. Lieutenant Ravenel knows almost every body and every thing there. She has vague recollections of having often seen the Lieutenant himself when a little boy playing on the Battery there at Charleston. His family she knows, of course, ever since she knew any thing. And the Lieutenant has a world to say about Rutledge Bowles, with whom he has been intimately associated, and whom he likes almost as much as his mother.

"Only, you know, Madam, there is no merit in that. Every one admires and likes Rutledge Bowles. How much he is growing to resemble his father in the portrait—of the Major, I presume it is, Madam?" says the Lieutenant, with a wave of the hand toward the old hero in his frame overhead.

"I am pleased to know it," says little Mrs. Bowles, all the mother kindling through her refined and thoroughly lady-like manner. "Did Rutledge Bowles send his photograph by you?" she asks, eagerly.

"He would have done so, Madam, for I heard him speak of desiring to send it only the week I left. The fact is, I was not intending then to leave Charleston, much less come so far south as this. Intending? Upon my word, Madam, I had no such intention. Just ten minutes before the Augusta train ran out of Charleston my Colonel caught me on the street with dispatches in his hand and a sealed note of instruction for myself. 'You will hardly have time to throw your linen in a valise and run,' he said. I did run, hard as I could tear, Madam; barely in time to catch the train as it ran out of the depot. You remember it is a good distance from the Post-office, where I was when the Colonel caught me. At the rate they hurry us a pair of fresh feet ought to be served out every few hours as a regular ration, Madam—a relay of wings, or something of the sort." The Lieutenant is so perfectly a gentleman, at the same time so overflowing with life and fun that he keeps Dr. Peel and Mrs. Bowles and Alice laughing, the first named especially, all the evening.

"I could wish Rutledge Bowles was a little more lenient toward the faults of his subordinates," I mean his superior officers, as they are called in military language," says Mrs. Bowles, not without pride. "He seems to be always in some difficulty with them. Yet Rutledge Bowles has, through young, a good deal of his father's, the Major's, accuracy and energy of character too. He lately sent me full drawings of all the defenses of Charleston, with an exact statement of the number and disposition at the time of our troops there."

"Was that not rather—excuse me—against ranks?" began the Lieutenant, politely.

"So he said in his letter. 'But since you have written for them, mother,' he wrote, 'I will risk it.' It was a foolish curiosity I had, not to see the drawings and that, but to see how well he could do it. Friends here also would like to see what Rutledge Bowles could do. Still I did not wish him to come unnecessarily in conflict with his—superiors."

"Oh, we all know Rutledge Bowles," says Lieutenant Ravenel, gravely. "For my part I do assure you, Madam, I have talked with him upon that very point often. You see, Madam, we were students together at—at, pshaw, was it at the Citadel or—"

"Columbia," suggests Mrs. Bowles. "What am I thinking about? Columbia. I prepared for Columbia at the Citadel. Columbia, of course. I could take the liberty with him, you observe; it is not every one who can. If Rutledge Bowles has a fault it is pride. But I could do nothing with him. Ah, before it escapes my mind, those drawings you spoke of, would you be so kind? And all the papers, in fact, if it is not too much trouble?"

"HAIL COLUMBIA!"

It is no trouble at all. Mrs. Bowles knows exactly where the package is. Lieutenant Ravenel glances rapidly over them, but is so pleased with them that he begs permission to take them with him, will return them in the morning—they are well worth an hour's study. Mrs. Bowles consents, of course. The dear lady glows up to the smooth parting of her silvered hair with pleasure. A visitor, and a Raveled too, from Charleston—it is an angel stooping from Eden to hush and pine Eve. What with South Carolina, the war, and Rutledge Bowles, the evening passes rapidly by. The gentlemen consent to remain till tea, Alice entertaining them while her mother absent herself, making some special arrangements connected therewith.

Neither of the ladies have any admiration for Dr. Peel, his sumptuous attire, jewelry, and gestures. But on account of the Lieutenant, who remembers Alice, often met her with her nurse in King Street—her mother also, only it is so long ago, at Hillman Hall he thinks it was—they can not refuse to pay the Doctor all due attention. Yet the Lieutenant is the soul of the evening, at tea-table, and after tea till near midnight. The war is, of course, second as a topic only to Rutledge Bowles, and Lieutenant Ravenel regards the attempt of the North to prevent our independence as the choicest of jokes. He describes their cowardice, how they scamper and squall for quarter in every battle till Alice can not help laughing heartily, while Mrs. Bowles's cheeks are wet with tears of mirth. "Not that I do not from my inmost heart pity them," says good Mrs. Bowles. "The madness, the frantic folly of their miserable leaders it is excites my anger. Poor creatures, the Federal privates—mechanics, I presume, most of them, ignorant persons. Yet they, too, have wives and children to sick and weep for them."

The gay Lieutenant is grave in an instant. In his, with tones by recollections and incidents which, he is not ashamed of it, have moved him to tears even in battle. "Poor, poor creatures! I agree in your Christian sentiment, Madam; yes, we can well afford to pity." But the Lieutenant is familiar with the plans of the Confederate generals, narrates skirmishes of which Mrs. Bowles and Alice have not as yet had opportunity to read. Near, owing to their retired situation, have they had such full particulars of the noble fleet being built in Confederate ports and in Europe for the Confederacy. The Lieutenant tells them, too, of certain negotiations then in progress with foreign powers; imparts the fullest information in reference to the great revolution, already arranged and soon to break out at the North for the overthrow "of Lincoln and—pardon me, ladies—his hellish crew." A vast deal more to the same effect, all in a manner so sparkling yet deferential as to bring back to Mrs. Bowles those happy, happy days in dear old Charleston.

"Really you should see the editor of our paper—a Northern man, I regret to say," begins Mrs. Bowles.

"Lieutenant Ravenel has already seen Lamm, Madam," interposes Dr. Peel. "We spent yesterday evening with him. The Star will contain in its next issue more really interesting information than any number since the war began."

And it did contain just that. Somerville read it with keen pleasure or the reverse, according to the political tendencies of the reader. Mr. Ferguson regarded that number of the Star as one of the most valuable in his whole collection. The visit of Lieutenant Ravenel was an event in Somerville. Somerville, in fact, remembers it distinctly to this hour.

But it waxes late. The gentlemen really can not consent to trespass upon the ladies any longer. "Only one piece of music more before we leave," says the lively Lieutenant, who has been beside Alice at the piano turning over the leaves for her, even joining in with a well-trained voice, as she played and sang this and that for the last hour.

"Well, if I can," says Alice, with a smile, her fingers on the keys.

"Hail Columbia. Only for the fun of the thing, you know," says her visitor, laughing.

"You must excuse me." Alice has a taste for fun, but finds no amusement in doing just that, she does not ask herself why.

"Well, then, the Star-Spangled Banner."

"Excuse me, Lieutenant Ravenel," quite decidedly, too.

"Pardon me, only Yankee Doodle, just for the amusement of it," pleads the Confederate officer, with hands clasped in comic supplication.

"You play so well."

"I can be guilty of no such—such mockery," says Alice, surprised at her own depth of feeling and energy of refusal. With heightened roses, too.

"I really am amazed at you, Alice," says her mother, as Alice rises from the instrument. "A willful daughter, much like Rutledge Bowles in character, Lieutenant Ravenel. But since you have given us so pleasant an evening, Sir, of course I respect your aversion to the North, Alice, but then— If you will excuse my poor parentage, Lieutenant Ravenel."

And Mrs. Bowles, who is a fine player, sits down to the piano. She does not exactly see the joke, but it is the request of a guest, a favored guest, Yankee Doodle first. She had almost forgotten it. The servants in the kitchen positively refuse to believe their ears. The Star-Spangled Banner next. Charles and Sally, in the hall by this time, listening, paralyzed with vague ideas that the Yankees have arrived at last. The Lieutenant beside her strikes in with the words after the first line. Mrs. Bowles glances up nervously, to meet the laughing eyes of her guest. What a willful, handsome, foolish fellow!

"Now Hail Columbia, if you will pardon my folly," pleads the volatile officer. It is a severe strain upon her good-breeding, but she has no time to refuse. This time Dr. Peel is on her other side, his deep voice swelling that martial melody. It is better sung than played, but splendidly done as it is, Alice is turning over a book on the other side of the room, the tears, to her own astonishment, trickling fast and free down her cheeks. Her emotions? The variation of magnetism not more beyond her analysis or control.

"It will be such a joke to tell Rutledge when I see him," says the laughing soldier. Mrs. Bowles is three-fourths ruffled with him, but there is a fascination about the young Carolinian which she can not resist. With the last note of the magnificent anthem the gentlemen take their hats to leave, apologizing for their long stay. And Mrs. Bowles has to apologize also for Alice, who has left the room.

"I fear I have offended Miss Alice by my whimsey in regard to that old music," says the handsome Lieutenant, seriously, and with penitence. I am heartily ashamed of myself. I fear levity is my besetting sin. Apologize for me, Madam; she must forgive me on the ground of our being both Carolinians. And may I beg," adds the Lieutenant, coming back into the parlor after taking his leave, "that you will not allude to my visit in writing to Rutledge? There are reasons—in fact, I am here on secret service." His peculiar position prevents the officer from saying more. No one has finer tact than Mrs. Bowles. She anticipates him, understands the whole, and hastens to express again her gratification at having met him. And so they part.

"I do solemnly declare, Fairfax, you are a trump! But look here, man, you carried it too far to-night, entirely too far." It is Dr. Peel who makes this remark over and over when they are safely in the streets, and once again with now emphasis when they are seated in the Doctor's room at Staple's Hotel.

His companion pays no attention to him until he has completed an accurate copy of the papers from Rutledge Bowles loaned him by Mrs. Bowles.

"Beautifully done," says Dr. Peel, after examining the work. "What a doughty man you are, Fairfax! And the list, too; useful documents."

"Worth coming all the way to this little Somerville to get. You see we can buy any number of papers of the sort on the spot. But those are made to sell, perhaps to deceive; this you know to be correct. My conscience hurts me awfully, however," adds the Lieutenant. "What a perfect lady she is; and so unsuspecting! But that music was grand, wasn't it? That is the fool I was raised on; very little else I have heard of and on these last two years; but I never enjoyed it in my life as I did to-night. By Jove! here in the heart of the rebellion, and the sincerest of rebels playing the accompaniment! Did you ever know such a joke?" And the young man stretched out his legs under the table, threw himself back in the chair, and laughed as only the young and happy can laugh.

However, for her life Mrs. Bowles could not see the point of the fun next morning. She felt condemned, guilty. And then passers-by having stopped, horror-stricken, to hear the music, poor Mrs. Bowles had to explain and explain the matter for weeks after. Most annoying. But when Mrs. Warner, on a special visit, with upraised eyebrows, "really could not believe it, Madam. Hail Columbia, Yankee Doodle, Red, White, and Blue, Star-Spangled Banner—all those miserable old songs, and over and over again, I'm told. Why, Mrs. Bowles, you must have heard how Alonzo Wright, only a month ago, when down the country for cotton, shot a man dead, dead on the spot, for only whistling Yankee Doodle thoughtless-like, for the man was a good Secessionist!"

"Mrs. Warner," interrupts Mrs. Bowles, very quietly, but with all South Carolina in her manner, "my daughter Alice and myself and our guests play and sing, and do now, and at all times, exactly as we see fit. You will pardon me, Madam; but how did you say your little Maria is? Well, I trust."

So that nothing is left Mrs. Warner but "Good-morning, Madam!" and to leave.

"But, Fairfax, I'm in earnest about it, in the interest of Government as much as in your own, do you not risk too much?" urges Dr. Peel there in his room upon his young friend.

It is amazing how changed is the Doctor's manner with the Lieutenant from what it is with Somerville; not an oath hardly, gentle as a lamb, not the least bit of a bully or a black-guard. Sumptuous Dr. Peel is a totally different Dr. Peel in every sense from what Somerville has known him. And he wears a business air, too, with the Lieutenant, his natural self evidently.

"Never mind about me, Peel, old fellow!" says his friend, gayly. "The only way to cross rotten ice is to skate your swiftest. You have your way out on this business; I must follow my way. I wonder if I have not had some experience by this time? My way of doing matters has carried me over many and many an ugly place—will carry me over many an uglier yet. The fact is, Peel, I wonder—by-the-by, what your name really is. Never mind about that. The fact is, I'm a man walking the edge of a precipice; over a scantling laid across an abyss; if I stop to look down I'm lost. But I'll be shot if it isn't fun alive, the whole thing. I always had a genius for fun—about the only truth I told Mrs. Bowles to-night. There, at the University of Virginia, we fellows used to think we knew what fun was. I rather datter myself I was a kind of ringleader. Smoking the Fresh; deviling the Neph; putting pigs up the bellry, tied to the rope, so as to ring at it all night, you observe; putting tubs of cold water over the tutors' doors, so as to benefit their debilitated systems with a bath as they came out; dyeing the professors' dogs and horses a lovely crimson—things of that sort. But this is a joke ahead of them, I rather think. As to the danger, that is the spice of the whole thing."

"And you never were in Charleston?"

"Not before the war; often since—on business, you observe, confidential and excessively private. Carolina, with a plague on the heroic little humbug, except that, I was never in it in my life. Thank you for your hints about Rutledge Bowles, only his mother gave me enough during the first five minutes. I was intimate with him, wasn't I? Splendid fellow, I have no doubt."

"His proud beauty of a sister was too much for you," began Dr. Peel.

"Glorious girl, isn't she?" broke in the Lieutenant, with enthusiasm. "And I'll tell you something, Sir, will astonish even you. That girl is Union, Sir—Union true blue—Stars and Stripes to the centre! You needn't whistle. I ought to know the signs by this time. While you were telling the mother that preposterous story about your acquaintance with Calhoun, I gave the fair damsel a full trial, just to be certain of it. I couldn't get her faintest assent to a syllable I said in glorification of the Confederacy, not even the assent of her eyes, steady as they came there the whole time. It was to tease her as much as anything I asked her to play those pieces. A Secessionist might do that, refuse as she did, probably would, but the manner of refusing! And with her brother and mother so dyed in the wool. Glorious girl! I could have hugged her on the spot for her principles. But, as to that, how any woman can stand Jeff Davis, Secession, war for slavery, and all, is more than I can understand—blind feeling."

"Exactly as a woman clings to a red-faced, foul-breathed, roaring, drunken husband, who curses and beats her and the children. It is my husband, you see. My country! The delusion lies just there," says Dr. Peel, with a sneer.

"Oh, as to that, it is amazing how many people I find all over the South who continue to know what their country is, cling to it, too, with all their souls. By Jove, Sir, I honor them," says the young officer—"honor them more than words can utter. They are the very best people, too, of the places where they live. I fall in love with them on sight, especially when they are females. I often meet with wrinkled, toothless old ladies. You see they know people can not well hang them, so they can speak out to their heart's content. And they do. I have heard them abuse Secession even to my satisfaction. I could have taken the dear old things in my arms. Whenever I chanced with Union people off by themselves you can not tell what a severe temptation it is to tell them a little something. I can play upon them as a girl can on a piano; tell them tremendous tales of the success of the Confederacy just to see how melancholy they get, their faces growing as long as your arm in spite of themselves. And to see how they brighten up when I slip in a little good news the other way! They do not believe a word of it, of course; or shake their heads in such a melancholy way, their eyes sparkling. How they will rejoice when the old flag flies over them again, and all the air blows Hail Columbia! True as steel they are; but if one could only tell them how certain the thing is! However, all this isn't business, and I'm off in the morning. People might get too fond of me, you know. Lieutenant Ravenel, Confederate States service—good!"

"Well, I am ready," said Dr. Peel, producing a package of papers from his bosom. "Not much more in addition to what we have attended to already. But, first, there's a receipt for that last thousand you brought; much obliged to Uncle Sam and secret service. Now then. Here—let me see—ah, yes, a statement of the rebel forces and so forth in my district, present and prospective sustenance, and so on. Tell them they may rely on it; I got the statement from headquarters myself. You do things your way, Lieutenant Ravenel of South Carolina, but if you fancy there is a genuine Southerner of higher standing than Dr. Peel in all this district you are mistaken. By-the-by, here's a private letter. Do me the favor to leave it at its address in New York. It is exchange on London for five thousand pounds to my credit, you know; they'll understand it. A good joke, since you like jokes so well, in connection. That represents a cargo of cotton safe over the water in payment by the Confederacy for I have forgotten how many pounds of powder—"

"Permit me, Dr. Peel," interrupts his guest, with a total change of manner. "Do I understand—"

"I am astonished at you, Fairfax. Don't you see that the article was manufactured for this express purpose? We found it would throw up the ball in the metre about, say, three degrees. The standard in our service is rather over that, I think. You ought to have seen the proud satisfaction with which it was received. I volunteered to see to the stowing of it away. Necessary to take special precautions lest it should explode. Explode! And there it is at the Arsenal this instant, all ready in case of need."

"But," began the delighted Lieutenant, "how in the mischief—?"

"Oh, I had specimens plenty for trial, Dupont's best. The Governor shook me by the hand warmly. 'Splendid article,' he said. 'You see I'm an old soldier, and ought to know,' says he. 'We are under obligations to you, Doctor.' I rather think wooden nutmegs will cease to be quoted hereafter. The articles in the way of caps, arms, powder, clothing, every thing that Yankees in Havana, France, England, Belgium, have passed off for genuine cotton upon these poor devils is shameful. Not Yankees only. It does seem that the entire world has conspired with the leaders here South against the South. I am glad of it to my soul," adds Dr. Peel, with a savage oath. "That is what I like most in the thing—the cool, deliberate, thorough suicide in it from the start. Burned towns, railways destroyed, wharves leveled, whole regions stripped bare, to say nothing of the killed and the orphans and widows. Curse on them!" continued Dr. Peel, with a torrent of curses, all his soul in his bad eyes—"no man can hate them worse than I do, and even I am almost satisfied. And then all that is yet to come! I am more than satisfied, almost beginning to pity—perhaps," he adds, with the expression of a devil.

"Hallo, I say, look here, man," says his companion, looking keenly at the speaker. "War is war, I know, and these people would force their heads in the cannon's mouth. But I don't believe in the way you look at it. Take care what you say. If we are whipping them a tough enough job they are giving us of it, all our numbers and navy to boot. Besides, I am a Southern man myself, every drop of my blood." And the gay young officer had changed into a sharp observer upon Dr. Peel. "Besides, you talk too loud. How do you know but there may be some one listening? If there are, up we go, you well know," added he, with a peculiar gesture of his right hand, and resuming his gait.

"Never fear, I know what I am about. I'm too anxious to live if it is only to see the delicious ending. I have taken every precaution. Besides, I don't believe any possible event could make the people here even doubt me. The credulity, the super-astounding gullibility of these people is one long treat to me. I do love to work them up, and have them yell and beg and swear to heaven in glorification of the South. Such double-distilled fools!" says Dr. Peel, leaning into contempt, and so becoming cool again.

"However, business. There, that paper explains itself—the exact date, as near as I can get it, of that raid to be made into Tennessee. I think I have been tolerably accurate heretofore. There is another paper—sealed, you see; private even from you, Fairfax. Ah, that is a little petition of some friends about that Sergeant Boldin. He deserted from Grant—you must have heard of it—after getting himself scarified on the back some way—something like it in one of the old sieges of Babylon, is there not? It was his information gave us that delicious header of the rebels below Corinth. The Sergeant died like a man. You'll find the address of his family there. Seward ought really to do something handsome. Ah, here is that list of the Union men in my district who may be relied upon at Washington. If you are caught destroy that whatever you do; if it gets into rebel hands they'll smell out the cipher, and in that case good-by to the men. That would be a pity. There are two Judges, a Secretary of State, three Superintendents of conscripts, several officers in actual service. It amazes me, Fairfax, and every day—pshaw! no, it does not amaze me. But the rottenness of this whole thing! Talk of Southern chivalry! If you only knew as well as I do the frantic eagerness of these military men—not civilians mind you, but the officers, the very chivalry itself, to make money! All that is a thing, of course, with Yankees, but I did think there would be at least that difference. Why, Sir," adds Dr. Peel, with an oath, "there is not a dodge to which most of them do not resort to make a fortune out of this war."

"Laying up for exile and confiscation, man," says his companion. "And as their paper pay depreciates they will be more desperate in the work than before."

"And to do the South justice," continues Dr. Peel, with something like a sneer, "even you have little idea how very many Union men there are South, and not a man of them even attempting to make a cent out of the war, dumb, dead weights upon the rebellion those of them that escape hanging." The Doctor says this while selecting another paper from his package. "There," he adds, laying it upon the table, "read that, Sir; something actually done for the cause; the amount of stores destroyed is rather under that over the mark."

"Flouring mills, card factory burned; ten powder wagons blown up, two more upset in crossing the river—hum—hum; train of mules ran off from—hum—hum. Why, Doctor, you are the very—steamer Eliza burned; thousand stand of—six pieces small cannon, fifty thousand pounds powder—hum, hum; machinery of percussion cap—"

"That was really a shame," puts in the Doctor, with a display of his remarkably fine teeth. "If you only knew the months of modeling, casting, contriving before they could get the thing to work. Just as they got all ready—I was really sorry for them, such a bitter disappointment. Reminds me of a little thing I didn't think worth putting down. I was on a visit over at the Penitentiary—a distinguished visitor, you observe. The Colonel insisted on showing me over the whole establishment. In one room they had an iron trough filled with the detonating mixture for caps. Very much interested I was, so much so as to visit the room again next day; had a handkerchief full of lime under my cloak, and—if those caps explode I'm mistaken—"

"Destruction of the Arsenal at Jackson" says the young officer, glancing over another paper placed in his hands. "You don't mean—"

"Certainly," says Dr. Peel, with an effort at seriousness. "The women and children I regret as much as any man. But war is war, and they would have it. You observe, there is no neighborhood in all the South in which one can not find plenty of hands. The blacks are too dull often, but the mulattoes are smart enough. Bless your soul, you don't suppose I do my work with my own hands? No, Sir, not if I can help it; besides, what is the use when I have so many ready for any kind from me. You could not do my work; it requires a peculiar gift. In one month I could lay almost every town in my district in ashes if I only gave the word. They are sometimes caught, often hung, yet they never divulge anything—at least, never anything to hurt. Miserable animals they are, of course," adds the speaker in peculiar tones. "Men, monkeys, apes, gorillas, but as mischievous as monkeys. They can not plan, have no idea of combination, yet they can do what is planned for them. They are called 'hands,' you know. And then they have such an innocent, ignorant, stupid look with it all."

"I am sick of the whole thing—sick, sick," says his companion, with ill-concealed loathing for his friend, and raising his face, covered with his hands, upon the edge of the table.

"How you reason!" said Dr. Peel, towering above the Lieutenant, bold and had as Lucifer. "Forty odd blows up at Jackson. Why, Fairfax, those people had already—women and children, mind—had already made cartridges enough to have killed many thousands times that number of our men, and were hard at it still."

"How do we know, at last, but you are humbugging us?" says the Lieutenant, glad of some mode of showing his aversion, raising his head, and looking his companion defiantly in the face. "Who knows but you take the credit of mere accidents?"

"That is for your superiors to decide, Sir," replies Dr. Peel, even laughably. "They have had no occasion to doubt me so far."

"Oh, well, it is none of my business," said his companion, hastily, drawing his cap down over his forehead. "Let us get through."

"Well," he adds, when Dr. Peel has handed in, without further conversation, his last report, "it is a disagreeable business. I'd rather take it out in open field. Yet few men in the field are as useful as I am—and as you are," he adds, with some hesitation. "Certainly none in such danger."

There is a long silence, during which Dr. Peel, business over, is refreshing himself with a cigar as he sits at ease in his superb dressing-gown, rocking himself in the best rocking-chair Joe Staples's Hotel affords. The Lieutenant, meanwhile, is securing the papers about his person.

"Being a Yankee," he begins, as if suddenly impelled into conversation by some new motive.

"I beg your pardon. Figuratively a Yankee, you mean. You are a Virginian, you know," interrupts Dr. Peel, holding his cigar in his jeweled hand, and emitting a long puff of smoke from his lips.

"There is nothing very wonderful in your knowing that," replies the other. "Others besides yourself know me inside our lines. No, what I was about saying is this: being a curious sort of man, I will be glad if you will tell me exactly what prompts you to your well known—I will add wonderful—zeal and energy. I don't think I am an idle man in the cause, but you leave me far in the rear."

"I have no objection to tell you," is the reply, "provided you will tell me why you are so active. I won't stop to be complimentary."

"Soon told," answers the young officer, who has silently resumed his light and dashing manner. "I am a Southern Union man, ten times intenser Union than any of those Yankees North can be if they tried, because it is my native South which I'm helping to rid of the double curse of Secession and—I wouldn't have said it three years ago, I do say it now—slavery. I got my devotion to the Union from father and mother; had it deepened by the stand I took for it at the University; since the war began it has become my very life. The assassination of some of my dearest friends by the rebels, the death of my old father, and the destruction of the old place at the same hands, have helped matters; and I have an old mother—as splendid a specimen of a Virginia lady as ever lived—living at Fredericksburg, who lays her hand on my head and blesses me in my work whenever I see her. Martha Washington, Sir, over again," adds the officer, with enthusiasm. "Precious little I care for old Lincoln. In fact, I've had more cold water thrown on me at Washington than anywhere else. It is the resent of the South from that wretched old Republican and his gang, and their abominable delusions and keeneries, that I fight for. You know all about the Crusaders and the war for the Holy Land."

"But why engage in this particular sort of service?"

"It just happened so: At the opening of the war a particular piece of information had to be obtained from within the rebel lines for a very special reason. No one would go and get it; so I had to do it. It became a habit, you see; the excitement of the thing, the success, a little praise from head-quarters, and all. And I always had a taste for masquerading—for the joke's sake. Why, Sir, I've passed any number of times for Davis's nephew; once or twice as his son—dangerous work that, as I do not know whether the old scoundrel has any son; but every man has nephews, you know. There is hardly a prominent officer in the rebel service whose near relative I have not been somewhere in my travels. I am a native of every State of the South, hailing, at some time or other, from almost every leading town in every State South. I have filled almost every minor office under the Confederate Government; been in every battle, without exception. Masquerading! Why, Sir, I've passed half a dozen times as a lovely girl driven from my home in Maryland, Kentucky, Nashville. I have been the belle of balls in Richmond and Charleston! You would have died of laughing to see me managing my crinoline and tossing my curls! By Jove, I can handle a fan and a parasol as well, at times I almost get to believe I am a woman, and not so ugly a one either! I have had love made to me by any number of military men; have been so enthusiastic for the cause; have had so many charming little ways—'Now, do tell me, General!—' 'Please, Colonel, how many men have we got here?' and so on—that I've got more information than I dared hope for. But I've no time to talk. Isn't that the morning breaking?"

And the young officer rose from his chair, washed his face at Dr. Peel's wash-stand, combed his hair before the glass, and sauntered about the room as fresh as if he had just risen from a full night's sleep.

"Four o'clock," he added, at last, consulting his watch, "and the stage leaves at half past. Have up that breakfast, Doctor, you promised. I have already settled my bill—nothing to do but to eat and leave."

That Dr. Peel was a Power at the hotel was evidenced in the rapid manner in which a hot breakfast was served up in answer to his call to that effect down the stairs. The very countenance of the mulatto who waited on them with it would have indicated to a close observer that Dr. Peel wielded some unusual influence over him at least.

"You said you were in London, I think," said the Lieutenant, who, declining to sit down, stood beside the table eating. "I don't expect any sympathy from you, but did you notice the tomb of André in Westminster Abbey?"

"There were really so many objects of interest—"

"Well, I did. My father took me over when I was a boy; told me the whole story as we stood looking at it. I was fascinated. I suppose there may be some similarity in our dispositions—not our fates, however, I hope. There was a sort of harem-scramble; a dashing mixture of Achilles and—by-the-by, what a fellow Achilles was for a man-of-war! I never thought of it before! Months, you remember, in disguise at the court of King Something-or-other! Isn't that the stage coming up the street? And I had almost forgot. What is your motive?" said the Lieutenant, making a rapid dash of his meal, snapping together the lids of his valise, putting on his cap. "I'm all ready to be off—what is it?"

"None of the motives you speak of," said Dr. Peel, grim and sullen, behind the coffee-pot. "I don't object to the pay; it is to me an easy life; some other reasons, perhaps. But the chief reason," he added, suddenly, "is hate."

"Hate?" Lieutenant Barrell of South Carolina weighs the words as he draws on his beautifully-embroidered gloves, looking keenly in his companion's face. "Hate?"

Few men sharper than Dr. Peel. "I would not have printed all that wild young scamp told you," he had said to Lamson after the issue of the Star containing the Lieutenant's information. "Lamson was wrong to do it," he remarked to Somerville generally. "Chaps like Ravend are fond of exaggerating, making a great blow. Take my word for it, you'll find half he has been telling us is all a lie. With a tremendous oath, "I don't know but what his very letters of introduction to me were all a forgery?" Yes, very smart, indeed, was impetuous and magniloquent Dr. Peel.

Not sharper than young Fairfax. As that gentleman stands drawing on his gloves and looking steadily at his friend seated before him, the stage horn blows a second time, and with it the negro hostler comes into the room for the Lieutenant's valise, and "Mass Bill Perkins say, come or be left."

"You told me to take care I didn't carry it too far. You had better take particular care yourself, Dr. Peel," such singular meaning in the speaker's tones. "Upon my soul, I can hardly blame you; the times which so fast I hardly know how to think or feel; but, fact is, I have found you out, Doctor."

One can make nothing of the Lieutenant's countenance the expression is so strange.

"Why, what do you mean?" asks Dr. Peel, at last, but by no means the Dr. Peel he was up to that instant.

"Oh, pahaw! I know it. You are ——," and he places his lips to the Doctor's ear to say it. Not over half a dozen letters to the world, yet grand Dr. Peel falls back from the whisper as if struck by a bludgeon, and his lively young friend is gone.

THE SURGEON'S STORY.

A TRUE INCIDENT OF THE WAR.

"The only time," said the surgeon, "that I ever saw prisoners roughly handled was at Winchester."

The ladies united in asking him to relate the incident.

"We made regular trips," he continued, "once or twice a week from Harper's Ferry to Winchester. We did not mean to garrote it, but to prevent the rebels from holding it. At the time I was speaking of we had orders to enter Winchester, and push as far as we could safely go beyond it, to find out whether the enemy had any forces in the neighborhood."

"We reached the rebel town in the evening. The General ordered us to rest for the night—until he could get the reports of spies, and of one or two scouting parties that he had sent into the country."

"We dismounted. The officers told us to make ourselves at home. The boys searched all the stables and barns in the town for forage, and others went out in squads to the neighboring farms."

"As soon as they got their horses fed they entered any house they pleased and took up free quarters in it.

"As a squad of three of our men were about to enter a barn in the outskirts of the town, three rebel soldiers suddenly jumped up from among the hay and let blaze at them. One of our men was badly wounded, but not fatally. His two comrades ran back for help. They soon returned, I tell you, with as mad a set of fellows as you could have mustered in Virginia. They burned the barn high and low, every nook and corner, up left and down cellar, but not a trace of the rebels could they find."

"We knew that they hadn't got out of our lines; for our pickets were too strong for that."

"There were some houses near by and we searched them. But we had the same luck—not a trace of the rebels!"

"Well, boys, we must give it up," said Tom Rynder; 'but I'll be hanged if I see how the—— Johnnies got off. They must be here—somewhere right by, too—but they've given us the slip so slick as grease."

"Not much they haven't," shouted Bill Green, a Maryland soldier; "you don't find this child leave this till he collars them dogged rebels. I tell you they're inside ten rods of here, some'ers, and I tell you I'm agwine to get 'em dead or alive. I know their tricks, by jolly, and I tell you they're in that house that some'ers or other. Hillo! Look at that hole! How are you, Johnnie? I'm after you!"

"And with that characteristic speech of he ran to the nearest house, which we had searched already from top to bottom. The houses there have no cellars. They are generally raised about three or four feet from the ground, and sometimes rest on a stone foundation which is built all round; and sometimes again they rest on a little piece of masonry at the corners only, while the spaces between them are backed up with earth. In the banking of this house there was an opening that none of us had noticed. The Marylander made for it and squatted on his knees and peeped in.

"Are they there?" we shouted.

"He looked up and said nothing. He was evidently disappointed."

"No," he said at last, after musing a while, "but they're here some'ers, and I'm agwine to find them. Hillo! bab, come here! Come along with me!"

"A little fellow had just come out from the house. He hung back, but Bill coaxed him into the barn. I went with him. Bill told the other men to keep the women of the house inside, talking to them, so that they might not see him with the boy."

"Now, bab," said Bill to the boy, "do you know that I'm agwine to turn down your house?"

"The boy looked scared."

"Oh, please not, Sir," he cried; "them fellars ain't thar; true's death, Sir, they're not thar."

"And I'm agwine to burg your dad, bab," added Bill, without taking any notice of what the boy had said; "and, likewise, I'll be obliged to give you the pefestest whaling you ever heard tell on in all your born days!"

"Oh, please don't, Sir!" cried the little fellow again—he was thoroughly frightened now—"the soldiers ain't thar."

"How do you know?" asked Bill.

"I know they ain't," replied the boy.

Bill seized him by the collar and, spoke fiercely.

"Now, boy, I'll burg you and your dad, and turn down your house in ten minutes, if you don't tell me what them fellars is hid!"

"Oh, please, Sir, I'm afraid," said the boy.

"Don't be afraid, Bill told him—they sha'n't harm you; nobody sha'n't harm you for us, and, by hooky, I'll pull your gizzard out and hang you double quick if you don't out and tell right off what they're hid!"

"The boy was now completely cowed."

"Well, Sir," he said, "they's hid under our boss. They's dug a hole in the ground right below the middle of the parlor. You can't see it when you look in that hole in the hankin', because they torted all the dirt away, and you see it's too dark to notice the other hole thataway."

"All right, bab," said Bill, "you'll be a man before your mother if you keep your eye peeled! We won't hurt you."

"Oh, please, Sir," cried the boy, "don't burn down our house; we's Union folks!"

"In what direction?" asked Bill, with a grin.

"I don't know nothin' about any direction," said the boy, with a puzzled look.

"Oh, you don't?" continued Bill, "well, ye oughter. You oughter say you're Union—"

"Over the left, you know, over the left,"

he said.

Bill rushed out, and told one of the soldiers to stand with his revolver cocked at the hole in the banking, and to shoot down the first man that tried to escape through it.

"Then he went into the house and asked for an axe."

"What in the world do you want with an axe?" the old woman inquired, with an anxious glance at his face.

"Ax? me no questions and I'll tell ye no lies," said Bill; "but, unless ye want this house burned over yer head, bring me one in less than two-fer."

"The woman saw that Bill was in no mood to be trifled with, and went and got the axe without any more ado."

Bill then turned to the three soldiers who had followed him into the house and told them to draw their revolvers and be ready to shoot. They did so.

"Without a word Bill seized the carpet at the edges and tore it up."

"The women screamed."

"Lard a messy!" shouted the old woman, "what an airth are ye spillin' my carpet for? The ole man and all on us is Union, and bet allers bin!"

"Tos my word and honor," added one of the daughters, "there ain't nary reb hid in our house."

"We don't know nary thing about any reb," said another young woman.

"They all made a fuss and boiled, but Bill took no more notice of them than if they had been a parcel of hogs. He tore every bit of the carpet from the floor."

"As soon as he had done it he took the axe, and with one blow broke through the thin floor."

"Be ready, boys!" he said.

"The women were crying and screaming and talking Union all the time."

"One or two blows made quite a large opening, and with a single jerk Bill tore up the flooring."

"What do you suppose we saw?"

"There lay the three rebels, dressed in dirty horsemans, huddled together at the bottom of a wide hole that they had dug beneath the house."

"Bill was a powerful fellow. He seized one of the rebels by the nape of the neck, and not only pulled him out, but pitched him to the farther corner of the room. One of our boys instantly covered him with his pistol."

"Without waiting to rest, Bill served the two others in the same way."

"You ought to have seen him as he turned to the women!"

"Well, old Sixpence, you're Union, you ar? an' the ole man? and allers hee bin? And you never seed no reb, you never did, Miss Pease? Nor you nather, on your word and honor, Miss Seeseb?"

"They hung down their heads, blushed up to the eyes, and left the room without saying a word."

"We dismissed the rebels and led them to the General. But it was hard work. I never saw our men so exasperated. They wanted to lynch these assassins. If our wounded man had died I don't believe the General could have held them back."

"Next day we had orders to return to Harper's Ferry. The three rebels were larded to the boxes of saddles, and forced to keep up with us all day long on foot. Their shoes were taken from them, and they had 'a hard road to travel, I believe,' that day. That was all the punishment ever inflicted on them for the attempted assassination of our men."

"This," added the Surgeon, "was in the days when we made war on peace principles, and it would not have done them to have lashed these wretches. It might have exasperated the South, you know. So, as I said, all we did to them was to force them for one day to keep step to the music of the Union cavalry's boots."

THE NEW DICTATOR OF PERU.

THE revolution which has recently been contemplated in the republic of Peru, originating, as it seems, in a feeling of dissatisfaction among the soldiers and population of the southern provinces at the behavior of President Pizarro's Government in submitting to the insolent demands of Spain last year, has resulted in the establishment of a dictatorship in the hands of the new President, General Pizarro, who was proclaimed at a meeting in the Plaza of Lima on the 29th of November. The Peruvians seem to feel the necessity of immediate and vigorous measures, as the only means of maintaining the national honor and saving the country from further financial difficulties. The new President promises well. There has been a thorough investigation into the public finances, and a system of taxation is shortly to be established, in order to make up the deficiency and to prevent an entire dependence upon the transient revenues of the guano trade. A general abolition of all privileges and pecuniary grants unlawfully acceded by former governments has been decreed and carried into execution. Several bureaus and all unnecessary offices have been suppressed. A central court of justice has been appointed for the speedy trial and punishment of all persons belonging to the public service who may be guilty of treason, dishonesty in the discharge of their duties, or other crimes. Further, public schools have been decreed for the diffusion of education among the poorer classes. These movements are all in the right direction, and indicate that the Government is in earnest for the welfare of the country.

VIEWS IN LIMA, PERU.

We give our readers on page 196 a portrait of the new Dictator of Peru; and three interesting Views of Lima, the capital of that country.

Lima—in accordance with the old custom which required that great cities should be built at some distance from the sea-port, in order to place them out of the reach of piratical invasion—is situated about two leagues from the Bay of Callao, on the banks of the Rimac. The site of the city was chosen by Pizarro, in 1535. In half a century the city is said to have been peopled by 100,000 souls. But what a decline since then! In 1835 the population was only 54,000. The view of Lima, as one approaches it from the distance, is very magnificent; but the entrance to the city does not justify the anticipations aroused by a more remote observation. Owing to the prevalence of earthquakes the houses are rarely very high, though, so will appear from our illustrations, there are marked exceptions to this custom of building houses only one or two stories in height. On an average there are about forty-five earthquakes per year in Lima. About once in half a century these shocks are extremely violent and ruinous. In this way the whole city has several times been reduced to a heap of rubbish. The most destructive of those occurred in 1746. A little more than an hour before midnight the earth began its tremblings, and in three minutes the city lay in ruins. Of more than 8000 houses only 21 escaped entire. The towers of the cathedral were overthrown. The bridges across the Rimac, of which we give a sketch, was the only public work which escaped. The sea, which had suddenly receded from the shore under the impulse of the shock, with its reflux wave buried Callao and its 5000 inhabitants in an utter and everlasting silence, leaving no vestige of the wreck which it had made!

Our Views of Lima are photographic leaves from the "Bays of Sunlight," photographed by A. GARAYON, and published by PUTZ & SCHENCK, Washington.

MAHONY.

STEPHENS.

THE IRISH BRIGADE AT FONTENOY.

EJECTING THE TENANT.

IRELAND AND THE FENIAN LEADERS

ROBERTS.

SWEENEY.

FACTION FIGHTING.

EMIGRATION

DRAWN BY ARTHUR LUMLEY.—[SEE PAGE 205.]

HELEN GREY.

BECAUSE one loves you, Helen Grey,
Is that a reason you should prout,
And like a March wind veer about,
And frown, and say your shrewish say?
Don't strain the cord until it snaps,
Don't split the sound heart with your wedge,
Don't cut your fingers with the edge
Of your keen wit; you may, perhaps.

Because you're handsome, Helen Grey,
Is that a reason to be proud?
Your eyes are bold, your laugh is loud,
Your steps go mincing on their way;
But so you miss that modest charm
Which is the surest charm of all:
Take heed, you yet may trip and fall,
And no man care to stretch his arm.

Stoop from your cold height, Helen Grey,
Come down, and take a lowlier place;
Come down, to fill it now with grace;
Come down you must perforce some day:
For years can not be kept at bay,
And fading years will make you old;
Then in their turn will men seem cold,
When you yourself are nipped and gray.

LA SONNAMBULA.

THE country between St. Nazaire and Vannes is neither beautiful nor interesting. Scarcely forests of fir, stretching over miles after miles of undulating plain, and seldom varied by the appearance of a peasant's cottage or the mansion of a Breton noble, oppress the eye and fatigue the mind to such a degree that the wearied traveler is fain to turn his attention to the inside of the carriage, should he be unlucky enough to journey by the fog-bait railway that runs through this desert. There is not even excitement at the stations—in fact, excitement of any sort is discouraged by the paternal Government of France. It is unhealthy—it disturbs the mental equilibrium of the people; whereas the strict regularity of thought and action is produced by a discreet system of national education, which is just as visible at railway stations as elsewhere. You are not allowed, for instance, to walk up and down the platform—the impatience and suspense might produce agitation; you are therefore cooped up in an apartment according to the class whereby you travel; the train is placed so that its first-class, second-class, and third-class carriages are directly opposite those respective apartments, and at a given moment the doors are opened and you are propelled into your proper place in the train, under the superintendence of several sergent-majors. So that in traveling through the country there is not even variety met with at the halting-places. You glide into the empty station, suddenly the doors are thrown open, in scramble a few Breton peasants, and away you go again through the interminable forests of fir.

For fellow-travelers I had a lady and gentleman of uncertain age—the latter might be about thirty-five; the former was good-looking, which ought to obviate all speculations as to years. They were not married, for he seemed particularly courteous and attentive to her; they were not brother and sister, for they were utterly unlike each other. I concluded them to be simply friends, or perhaps prospective husband and wife. The gentleman was somewhat reserved; answered her inquiries kindly but curtly; and seemed more amused than interested by her remarks. But how shall I describe the admirable manner—the over-veering beauty, the brilliant, witty, bashful, and simple conversation of his younger friend? The artless grace of her every movement was pretty and perplexing as the motions of a squirrel; she was constantly changing in her look, in her mood, even in the attitudes she formed; while in her casual observations there were such subtle drolleries, such unconscious shrewdness and humor, that the longer you listened the more you were charmed.

She dropped her glove.
I picked it up; and this little circumstance made us friends. From a few words of thanks she proceeded to remark upon the weather, then upon the country, upon the Breton population, upon the French, upon the English, and their barbarous customs. She was indeliberately engaging; she laughed and chattered, grew serious, and abruptly darted again into comedy; teased her companion for his austerity and reticent smile; and gave herself such pretty airs and graces that one could have fancied her a child of thirteen. She asked me if I had seen "Le Duc" when in Paris; if I had read the last new novel translated from the English; then hummed an air from the last page of the Journal de Dinan—a very un-Sunday-like magazine which she held in her hand.

"What I reverence in you English is your power, your grandeur, your great wealth. You are all rich—all very rich, are you not?"
Despite the charming simplicity with which the question was asked, I was obliged, in reply, to suggest that in England I knew of one or two people who might be richer, with no great detriment to themselves.

"Why, you carry fortunes on your fingers, in your watch-pockets, in your purses. Will Monsieur think me rude if I ask to see his ring?"
At once the trinket was in her possession, and with quite an infantine curiosity did she examine it. She then passed it to her companion, whose attention had already been fixed upon it while it was yet on my finger.

"You will think us monsters of rudeness, Monsieur," said he; "but English workmanship is quite a novelty to us. The quaint figuring around the stone, for example, is purely northern. I presume Monsieur has also an English watch?"

"Of the eighteenth century," said I; "an heirloom in our family."

"What a treasure!" he replied, with more vivacity than he had hitherto revealed. "Would Monsieur have the goodness—?"

They were no less delighted with the watch, and insisted on my opening it to show its internal construction and the jewels which it contained. The back of the watch was also admired, with its quaint carving, and likewise its precious stones, which were more readily visible than those inside. The gentleman leaned back in his seat, as though somewhat ashamed of having exhibited this curiosity, while the young lady remained as lively as ever, and continued her conversation during the rest of the journey.

Toward evening we entered the town of Vannes, the capital of the department of Morbihan. I pitched my traveling-case into the first omnibus that presented itself, which happened to be that belonging to the "Hôtel du Dauphin"; and I observed that my lady friend was also about to enter the same vehicle, when her companion made a slight gesture of dissent.

"Which hotel?" he inquired of the conductor.

"Hôtel du Dauphin, Monsieur."

He remained a moment in doubt.

"There is the 'Hôtel de la Croix Verte,'" he remarked to his companion, "and the 'Hôtel de France.'"

"Le voici—par ici, Monsieur!" cried another conductor, with an expressive motion of the hand and courteous inclination of the body.

The lady terminated the little debate by a slight shrug of her shoulders at her companion's hesitation; then, giving the conductor her small quantity of luggage, stepped into the omnibus, and we all three drove off to the Hôtel du Dauphin. Having taken apartments, and ascertained that the table-d'hôte was fixed for half past five, we took advantage of the intervening hour to ramble through the quaint old streets of the town, and admire its extraordinary domestic architecture.

All this time I had been unable to discover the names of my companions; she only called him Louis; he addressed her sometimes as Denise—often as Mademoiselle. As our acquaintance had begun without the usual English preliminaries of formal introduction or card-presenting they were no wiser as regarded myself; nevertheless, we were soon on the most amicable terms, and our walk through the town was rendered doubly agreeable by the casual observations with which we greeted every fresh object of interest.

And of these there were plenty. The narrow, straggling streets were full of an old-fashioned, picturesque beauty. The projecting second-stories of the houses, adorned with grotesque wooden carving and full-length figures of saints, the open easements of green glass encaustic into diamond panes, the ancient walls of the town, the glass-enclosed fane of the Tour de Constance, the venerable and stately proportions of the cathedral, altogether presented an admirable picture of a feudal town of the Middle Ages, and only required the introduction of a few long-haired, yellow-faceted, and scantily-dressed peasants to add to it a thorough Breton character. Mademoiselle Denise was enraptured with these quaint characteristics of a former age. She seemed to have little acquaintance with the manners or appearance of the Bretons; every fresh object was matter for fresh wonder, and our walk was indeliberately delightful.

She was no less agreeable when we returned to dine. She was the only lady present at the table-d'hôte; but she conversed freely, even when the subject of our talk became general. In fact, at one point, she led the conversation to that which had begun our acquaintance—the subject of watches, and, in her laughing way, said that if the gentlemen who were present would produce their watches there would be two of them to be found precisely to agree.

"And a gentleman always prides himself upon the correctness of his watch," she added, with a playful irony.

"Ah, Mademoiselle," said one gentleman, "you compel me to contradict you. My friend's watch is precisely the same as my own."

Her companion laughed; but she insisted that she was right, and refused to believe it, until the gentleman politely handed her both watches.

"There is one second of difference, Monsieur; I wear it!" she cried, with the greatest glee; "and I am right after all!"

"You are rude, Denise," said her friend; "let me return these gentlemen their watches."
"He spoils me, Monsieur," she said to me, "and then reproaches me. Is he not cruel, then—a savage? Behold, therefore, how he glares!"

The glaring savage was at that moment engaged in drying his mustache after having taken a draught of vin rouge, and neither in action nor in manner did he seem very terrible.

After dinner, having some letters to write to England, I bade my new friends good-night and went up to my own room—not, however, until Mademoiselle Denise had been most particular in arranging for the following day an excursion to the Castle of Saccin and to Sarzean, the birth-place of the author of "Gil Blas." Considerably before midnight I was fast asleep beneath the soft, thick coverlet and large cushion which form the upper clothing of a Breton bed.

It could have been but a short time thereafter that I was awakened by a slight noise—so very slight, in fact, that it still remains a mystery to me how I should have heard it. When I opened my eyes I found the room pervaded by bright moonlight, which was streaming in through the casement, and drawing shadows of the bars on the carpet. I was about to close my eyes again, and address myself to sleep, when my attention was arrested by the evident movement of the door, which stood on the right of the bed. It was certainly no miracle that it should open—for I never bolt bedroom doors or shutters even when traveling—but that it should be opened at that time of night was certainly surprising.

Gradually I perceived the distance between the door and the wall increase; and judge of my astonishment when I distinctly observed a white figure appear—the figure of a woman that slowly entered, without seeming even to look at me. I need not pretend to say I was not frightened; the lonely hour, the stillness of the house, the moonlight falling through the window, combined to make this vision a horror which chilled the blood in my veins and made my heart beat audibly. But now, thoroughly awakened by the apparition, I shook aside the vague impressions produced on the mind when in a state of unconscious slumber; and as I sought with a severe scrutiny to fix my eyes upon the face of this woman I recognized, beyond the shadow of a doubt, the features of Mademoiselle Denise.

Judge of my astonishment when I made the discovery! And there could be no mistake about it. As she turned her face to the moonlight the clear definition of her outline was sufficient proof, had proof been required. There were the same finely-cut lips, the straight nose, the high but narrow forehead, even the dark gray eyes, which had grown familiar to me during our acquaintance of the previous dozen hours. She was dressed in white, as I said; but this loose outer garment seemed only to cover clothes of a darker hue—in fact, I should have thought her dressed as usual, with the addition of this loose white robe. Her feet, so was evident when she walked, were bare, and her long fair hair hung down behind until it almost reached her waist. Perhaps it was the striking resemblance she bore to the heroine of "La Sonnambula" that first suggested to me a solution of this seemingly inexplicable mystery; and as I further watched her movements, I was convinced of the correctness of my supposition. She was either a habitual sonnambulist, or had been attacked by a sudden fit of sleep-walking. The more I became assured of this fact the greater became my desire to avert the awkwardness and unpleasantness of her being discovered in such a painful situation; but casting over the chances of the matter in my mind I came to the resolution of allowing her to do as she pleased, judging that she would in a few minutes return to her own room, and the whole affair remain unknown to every one but myself.

So far as I could observe her eyes were open; and on her first entrance into the room she had fixed them upon me with a cold, glassy stare, utterly devoid of recognition or intelligence. In the pale, dim moonlight this mechanical feature of the eyes was exceedingly unpleasant; but I strove to look upon it simply as the result of a physical ailment. Slowly, and unconsciously, she then stepped past the edge of my bed and approached the small dressing-table which stood at the window. Her back was thus turned toward me; and it was only at intervals that I could observe her motions. She seemed to be examining the various articles which were scattered about the table or hanging from the toilet mirror, and presently I heard her repeat, in a low, clear voice, some lines from the Prayer-book, which the good landlord had left in the room. She replaced the book on the table and continued her investigations among the other articles lying about. She took a long blue scarf, which I had hung over the mirror, and bending it round her head in the form of a turban, stood to contemplate in the glass the picture she represented. Any thing more singular than this spectacle could not be conceived. The moonlight lent a pallor to her face, which otherwise her healthy complexion would scarcely have presented; and this ghastly whiteness, coupled with the long white garment she wore, looked almost hideous as contrasted with the bold blue crown which she had assumed. Preparatory, however, to placing the turban on her head, I observed her withdraw from its folds a cameo pin, which I had negligently left therein, and, as I supposed, place it on the table.

Still retaining the novel head-dress she had so ingeniously constructed, she seemed to take an inventory of my jewelry, which was likewise placed in front of the mirror. My watch, which hung from one of the mahogany knobs at the side of the glass, she detached and held to her ear, with the manner of a child.

"Chick! chick!" I heard her murmur; "non Dieu, quelle vitesse!"

I recognized in this exclamation the same artless, new which had characterized her conversation during the day, and was reminded of the school-boy who boasted to his playmate that "he had got such a splendid watch! such a magnificent watch! he would wager it would go faster than any watch, clock, or time-piece in the town!"

Mademoiselle Denise seemed in no hurry to depart, and my suspense was momentarily becoming greater. What the consequence might be of her suddenly awaking from this physical stupor I dared not imagine. I had heard of cases in which the sonnambulist had been recalled to consciousness only to fall dead on the spot. And there were many reasons why this strange affair should not be known; to the lady herself the mortification consequent upon her being told of it, would, I knew, be inexpressible.

In a few minutes, however, I was greatly relieved by observing her unwind from her head my scarf, which she hung over the mirror in the same position she had found it. She seemed to bestow a little attention in arranging the objects on the table—probably prompted by that dim consciousness which haunts us sometimes even in dreams. She appeared to be desirous of leaving every thing in the order—or in the disorder—in which it had been on her entrance; and after having done this satisfactorily, she turned and walked to the door. As she passed I saw that her dull, glassy eyes were again fixed upon my face; yet still with the same vacant, expressionless stare. She opened the door, disappeared with noiseless steps, and I was left to my own reflections.

I can scarcely tell what prompted me to get up; but no sooner had she gone than I stepped out of bed, and went to the table which had so interested Mademoiselle Denise. Here I made a discovery which first startled me, and then amused me. My watch had disappeared, likewise my chain, cameo pin, sleeve-links, and a ring set with pearls and diamonds, the gift of my mother. I was somewhat alarmed, but a moment's reflection showed me how unjust my first thought had been. Moved by some incomprehensible whim, the unconscious sonnambulist had carried with her these trinkets, as a child lifts whatever gay bauble presents itself to its fingers; and I felt assured that when Mademoiselle Denise awoke in the morning and found herself possessed of such strange treasures, her surprise would only be equalled by her desire to restore them to the rightful owner. Probably, I thought, she is an habitual sleep-walker; and knowing her infirmity, will perceive at once how the jewelry came into her possession, upon which she will, of course, make instant inquiry to insure its restoration. Even in this strange circumstance there was revealed one of the principles which are supposed to govern these fits of aberration. Sonnambulists generally are interested in dreamy excursions by those things which interest them in daytime; and reflecting on the peculiar interest which Mademoiselle Denise had taken in my watch when it was first shown to her, I could not wonder that she should make it the subject of her regard when a peculiar fatality had drawn her toward my room. I returned to bed and slept soundly through the night.

Next morning I rose at eight, dressed, went down stairs and had the customary bowl of café au lait served in the breakfast-room; but though I waited and read the newspaper for a considerable time, neither Mademoiselle nor her companion came into the room.

I rang the bell, and inquired of the waiter at what hour they breakfasted.

"The table-d'hôte, Monsieur?"

"Yes."

"At eleven o'clock, Monsieur."

"I shall return then."

"Thanks, Monsieur."

Feeling sure of meeting my two friends at breakfast, I resolved to spend the interesting time in exploring those portions of the town which I had not visited. The morning was very beautiful for the time of year (October), and though the cropped and regular rows of lime-trees in the central square had scarcely a leaf upon them, their more fortunate neighbors on the banks of the canal-like inlet which leads down to the Gulf of Morbihan were green and pleasant in the early sunshine. This was a portion of the place I had not previously seen; and the old gateway of the massive wall, the clustering barges, the groups of women selling vegetables, and sailors lounging about the quays, were eminently picturesque. Over the gateway, in a recess, is placed a large wooden saint, brightly painted, whose glaring white eyeballs and strongly-marked eyelashes produced a strange feeling of mingled amusement and horror. The artist who produced this work was, perhaps, influenced by the thought that those people who were not drawn to the saint by love would be moved by terror; although the rest of the holy man's countenance was exceedingly lascivious and comical.

At the appointed hour I returned to the hotel, and walked into the long apartment where I expected to find the residents in the house sitting down to breakfast. But, in place of the calm propriety and graceful decorum of such a ceremony, I found the wildest confusion and confusion. There were a dozen people in the room, all talking at once; while loud-est of all rose the voice of the landlord, who seemed beside himself with despair. No sooner did he observe my entrance than he sprang rather than came, and in an eager voice, which seemed paralyzed by reason of its very eagerness, he exclaimed,

"Ah, Monsieur!"

"Well, what is the matter?" said I.

"Ah, Monsieur!" he again cried, overcome by his emotion.

"What is it? What has happened?"

"I am ruined, Monsieur; I am lost! I am thrown down, I am trampled upon, I am debased!"

I suggested to M. Deseit that his explanation, so far from being explicit, was the reverse; and that I should have to apply to some of the other gentlemen for an explanation.

"Mais non, Monsieur—clat moi, moi—voilà le malheureux sujet qui parle!"

But during these few seconds I had caught a few of the sentences which were being rapidly interchanged by the others.

"She seemed so innocent, so ingenuous," said one.

"And I—I should never have spoken of it," said another, "but for M. Deseit discovering the loss of his plate."

"How incomparably cunning?"

"How miraculously skillful!"

"And by this time they may be any where—they must have gone by the first train in the morning."

"Of whom do they speak?" said I to the landlord, with a sudden alarm.

"Of the gentleman, Monsieur, who came yesterday evening, and of Mademoiselle his friend. Ah, Monsieur, I am ruined—the honor of the hotel is gone. That any one should be robbed in my house!"

"Robbed—what do you mean?"

"Last night, Monsieur, Mademoiselle went into a gentleman's room—the hair loose, the eyes fixed, the face pale. She appears to sleep, Monsieur, he remains still and will not kill her with fright; she takes his watch, Monsieur—the watch she demanded to see last night at table. He observes not this—he falls asleep—this morning he misses his watch, but speaks not. Ah well, Monsieur, he expects to meet her, but she comes not; we go to awake them; they are gone; their apartments are empty; they have fled, Monsieur!"

"Who is the gentleman who has thus been robbed?"

"I, Monsieur," replied one of their number, stepping forward with a slight smile which was very apparently forced.

"And I also," I said, endeavoring to look quite as unconcerned, "have the honor to be your fellow-sufferer."

"You, Monsieur!" cried they all, having never imagined that besides the unlucky traveler and the landlord there was still another victim.

"Mademoiselle also carries off my watch, chain, ring, and some other little matters! But what would you have? Mademoiselle is pleased, and we are too gallant to refuse her any enjoyment."

"Men! Men, what courage! This Englishman is, without doubt, French, thus to smile in misfortune."

"The wisest thing possible," said another, with a shrug, "for Mademoiselle and her friends seem to have laid excellent plans, and by this time will be beyond all pursuit."

"With my plate," growled the poor landlord, "and with the honor of my hotel! Monsieur, am I not a poor miserable?"

Certainly M. Dubois looked sufficiently unhappy; nevertheless he at once prepared to rush to the Prefet, and this occupation relieved his mind. For myself, I resigned myself to fate and a French breakfast; judging that I should hear but little further from Mademoiselle Denise or her friend Louis. My judgment was correct; in spite of the utmost official vigilance, nothing more was heard of the charming creature who thus suffered from a painful habit which was even more awkward to others than to herself.

THE GHOST ON THE RIVER.

I HAVE just risen from a bed of sickness, and I take up my pen, as soon as I am able to hold it, to commit to writing the events of one afternoon, while they are still vividly impressed on my mind. Not that I think they will ever fade from my memory; but it is a relief to me to tell my story. I will tell it simply as it occurred to me, without comment; that I leave to those who may chance to read what I have written. And even if I tried, what comment could I make? What occurred is still to my mind unexplained—inexplicable of explanation. I have thought over it; I have sought eagerly at what I finally hoped was a clue, but before I could follow it, it has broken and left me as lost as ever. I have tried to doubt the reality of my impressions, to persuade myself that I was the victim of some delusion. But so far as I can trust to my senses, what I saw, felt, and heard was real—real to me, though concealed by a mysterious influence from some of those around me, and to others only partially revealed.

"Chelsea, and all the piers up!" bawled the old man at the Temple Pier, as a steamer came up to the landing stage.

"At last!" exclaimed indignantly a voice near me, "I've been waiting for twenty minutes!"

"You can't expect always to be served first," said the old man, sarcastically; adding, as a vent for his feelings, "Temple Pier, Chelsea, and all the piers! Stage back, ladies, stand back; let the passengers land first, if you please!" he went on, as a lady in black passed him, and tried to get on board.

I was keeping close to this lady; she had walked down Essex Street before me, and had passed the little boat where the man who gives the tickets sits, without stopping.

"Take your ticket here, ma'am. Hi! hi!" called the man, thrusting himself half through the window of his box, and trying to attract the attention of the lady who had passed. But she walked quietly on, and seemed not to hear him.

"Penico," I said, putting two pence on the sill.

"Would you tell that lady in black to come back and take her ticket?"

I promised I would do so, and followed the lady to the landing-stage. I found her seated on the bench at the foot of the steps, her eyes fixed on the river, and her hands clasped. Her dress, a black merino, fitted her slight and singularly graceful figure to perfection. Her veil was up, and her face, which was rather pale, wore an expression of melancholy, which, in my eyes at least, did not detract from its exquisite beauty. I went up to her.

"I was asked to remind you," I said, "that you have neglected to take a ticket."

"You are mistaken," she said, somewhat coldly, "I have one."

"Then I must apologize for troubling you," I replied, bowing; "but it is not my mistake, and, I hope, will absolve me from all intention of rudeness?"

She bowed stiffly and said, "Certainly, we will say no more about it."

Her eyes fell again on the river, as it swirled and foamed past the piles of the new embankment. I followed them. They were fixed on a piece of paper, which danced and tumbled on the maddly water. She stared after it till it was whirled out of sight. I remained still standing by her side; there was a strange fascination in her look and manner.

"Do you know what time it is?" she asked, turning to me. I was surprised at her addressing me of her own accord, after the cold manner in which she had repelled my previous attempts at explanation. I told her it was five-and-twenty minutes past three.

"Then I have five minutes to wait. The Chelsea boat will reach this pier at half past three."

"You seem to be accurately informed," I said.

"Nine years ago," she said, in a weary voice, "the Chelsea boat passed this pier at that time."

"That's a long time to remember," I said, laughing.

She turned and laid her soft white hand upon my arm, as if to impress her words on me. "This very day, nine years ago, I left this pier by the boat which started at half past three."

"Nine years ago," I said, "you must have been a child."

She shook her head. "I was a woman, with a woman's thoughts, and more than a woman's troubles." Her cheeks were flushed, and her hands clasped tightly together. There was something very strange about her.

"Yes," she went on, excitedly, "we were together, I and he. He who was more than a husband to me—and less," she added in a low voice, glancing at her unglazed hand. There was no ring. She spoke more wildly now, and her voice was louder. "He had spoken words to me, such as I had never heard before, such as I could not bear. And I stood here under the bright heaven, with the merry earth all about me, and the golden river glistening in the afternoon sun, and one heart beating near me, which loved me more than all the world besides."

"She caught hold of my arm and clutched it. I had shrunk from her—the woman was mad. "I stood here," she continued, in a calmer tone, "and viewed a wicked vow: that I would shut myself out from the bright heaven and the merry earth, and would break the one heart which loved me more than all the world. I went and leaned on the bulwarks, and looked over into the river; he came and spoke to me, but my heart was hard, and I would not hear him. I shuddered as we passed under Westminster Bridge, for it felt cold and dark there like the grave. And, as we shot out again into the bright sunlight, I jumped on to the bulwarks, and plunged into the river. I heard his cry of agony as I fell, and he jumped in after me. I soon felt his strong arms round me, but I clung about his neck and dragged him down. Twice he struggled to escape, but I pressed him close and closer. I could not die alone. We sank the last time. The tide washed us up and down, but my arms were still about his neck, and my face was close to his. They found us days afterward by the Erith marshes, locked in each other's arms."

I shrank from her. Her fingers relaxed their hold, and she released my arm.

"Days," I murmured, "it could not be, you would have been drowned."

"We were drowned," she said, quietly. The woman was mad or I was dreaming. I looked round at the river, at the boats; I heard the thrud of the hammer as they drove in the piles of the embankment; I bit my lips; I touched her dress to assure myself that I was awake. I looked at her, she was still sitting there; she had relapsed into her old position. The color had faded from her cheeks, her eyes were fixed upon the river, and her hands were clasped.

"Chelsea, and all the piers!" shouted the old man, and I turned to the boat. The lady in black was before me, and as I reached the deck of the steamer, and the clock on the Westminster tower boomed out the half-hour, she turned and looked at me. The boat was painted to-day as it had been nine years before.

I followed her closely on board, impelled by a strange fascination I could not explain, which I struggled against, but was unable to overcome. The sun was shining brightly, and the river danced and sparkled in the afternoon light. There was the busy hum of life all around me. The splash of the paddles, the cries of the lightermen, the whistle of the engine as the train crossed over the new bridge at Hangerford—all the varied sights and noises of the river on a summer's day were present, to impress on me the reality of what was going on around me. But as I stood there on the deck of the steamer I felt as one who has turned back the pages of his life, and sees and hears once more sights and sounds he dimly remembers to have seen and heard long ago. I felt as when, a child, I caught sight suddenly of my own reflection in the glass; and at that sight the memory of what had been in times long past seemed just about to return to me, till the very effort of thinking shattered the image which was being formed, and left me grasping the fragments of a memory.

I looked toward the shore. The old man was standing with his eyes fixed on his companion, and an expression almost of terror on his face.

"She's on board," he whispered, hoarsely, to one of the crew, who was standing by the paddle-box, as he stooped and unlatched the rope from a hook on the landing-stage.

The man did not answer, but looked rapidly round the boat. At last his eye fell on my companion, and remained fixed on her with an earnest gaze, which showed she was the object of his search.

Once more I think over what I then saw, to try if a shade of doubt lurks in my mind as to the reality of what took place. No, I heard the words the old man uttered as distinctly as I now hear the scratching of my pen upon the paper. Nor did I merely passively receive their sense, I acted on them. I stepped toward the paddle-box to question him, but before I had time to reach it the boat forged ahead and we were off. For a few moments, as the fresh breeze dried cooled my temples, I seemed to shake off the spell which bound me to her who had cordoned to me that strange story. I walked forward—I struggled to get as far from her as I could. But then the thought of her delusion, of what she might attempt were there no one there to prevent her, came upon me with redoubled force. It was my duty to protect her, to see, that she did not attempt to act in earnest the story she had told me.

I found her seated on one of the centre benches in her old position, looking dreamily at the river, never moving, never speaking. I stood near her. There were few passengers on board, and of them none seemed to notice the beautiful girl who was quietly sitting apart, apparently absorbed in thought. She walked to the side. I followed; I could not, I must not leave her. She leaned on the bulwarks, and watched the water foaming from the paddle-wheel.

She looked up into my face and spoke quickly, "Would you try to save me if I fell into the river?"

"I can not swim," I said, evading the question. I felt more convinced than ever that her mind was wandering; I must keep close to her. I could, at all events, prevent her jumping overboard; though if she once succeeded in that I could be of no use. As I leaned there by her side looking down upon the water it suddenly occurred to me that some of the crew of the steamer must know her. The words spoken by the old man at the Temple Pier evidently referred to my companion, and the man to whom he had spoken had asked no explanation of them. I had now a chance of leaving her without her incurring much danger, for she was seated again in the old place and the old position absorbed in thought. I walked to the stern and spoke to the man who was steering.

"Do you know that lady in black?" I asked, pointing to the place where she was sitting. He looked at me rather strangely, I thought, but said nothing. I repeated my question.

"That lady in black with the red shawl?" he said; "no, I don't."

"No, no; the lady in black next to her, all in black."

He looked again, and then answered sharply, "There ain't no lady in black there at all. Master's speak to me, Sir, it's against the rules."

I had followed his eyes. He had looked straight to the place where she was sitting, but he had not seen her. Once again the veil seemed lifted from the past, and I saw what had happened long ago. The vision flashed across my brain and was gone; but so quickly that I could not retain it, and even the memory of what it was perished with it.

I was turning to find another of the crew, when I saw that the lady had left the seat where she had been sitting, and was again leaning over the bulwarks. It would not be safe, I felt, to leave her there alone, so I gave up my project for the present and joined her.

We were steaming close by the scaffolding of the new embankment, a strong tide was running out, and the yellow river foamed and splashed round the piles. My companion smiled as she watched it, a happy, childish smile. The boat stopped at Westminster; she never moved, and I dared not leave her; she clung to the bulwarks, and gazed more earnestly than ever at the water. "You had better sit down," I said, wishing to get her away from the side.

"No, the time will soon come now,"

"Do you get out at Lambeth?"

"Before."

"There is no pier between this and Lambeth."

She smiled, a strange sweet smile. Her mind was running on that delusion of hers, that fantastic story of her suicide nine years ago. We were nearing the place where she said it had taken place; I must watch her closely. When we got to Lambeth I would appeal to the crew, to the passengers, would have her removed from the boat, and restored to the keeping from which she must have escaped.

The boat started; slowly it forged ahead under Westminster Bridge, and as the sunlight was shut out, and the dark, cold arch stretched over us, I thought of her smile. It was like the grave, and I shuddered. I saw her shudder too.

I tried to speak to her, but I could not; I went close to her, I almost held her. The boat shot out again into the sunlight; this was the time she had spoken of. I tried to grasp her dress, but my hand refused to move; I could not speak; I could not act. With one bound she was on the bulwarks, and had plunged headlong into the river. I did not pause for one moment; without a thought I yielded to the irresistible impulse which seemed to force me to follow her. I dashed into the water after her—I sank—the water hissed and bubbled in my ears. I stretched out my hands vaguely, for I could not swim; they touched something; it was her dress. I drew her toward me. I felt her arms twice round me, and press me tight and tighter as we sank. Then for the first time the thought occurred to me of risk to myself. I should be drowned. I struggled to escape, but she held me firmly; I tried to push her from me, but she pressed me close and closer. I was being suffocated, her arms strangled me, and her weight dragged me down. We were still sinking; my strength was failing me, and I struggled more feebly. A rush of roaring, hissing water, a sense of utter darkness, and I remember no more.

I was in bed when I awoke again to consciousness; I felt weak and faint; I lay still with hardly the power of thought. Gradually the whole of what had taken place on that afternoon came back to me, clearly and distinctly as I remember it now.

"Is she saved?" I murmured, more as an echo to my own thoughts than as a question; for I did not know that there was any one in the room.

"Hush!" said a kind voice by my bedside, and a grave middle-aged man took my hand. He felt my pulse; "Hush!" he said, "the fever has left you, you must not speak."

"Is she saved?" I asked again. "I must know."

He shook his head, but did not answer; he turned to a woman who was sitting in the window; "The fever is gone," he whispered, "but he is wandering still; you must take great care of him."

"I am not wandering," I said, impatiently; "I only ask if the woman I jumped in after was saved?"

"She was not," said the doctor; "now keep quiet, every thing depends on that." But as he looked to the nurse I saw him shrug his shoulders. I was not satisfied. As I got gradually stronger I tried to question the nurse as to the fate of the unfortunate woman, but I could get no information from her. She seemed almost frightened when I mentioned the subject; so I gave up asking her any questions, being determined that when I could get about I would make inquiries for myself.

Many times, while I lay on my sofa still weak from the effects of my illness, did I recall the incidents of that afternoon. Many times did the face of that poor girl return, haunting me with its exquisite beauty. I have tried to think how it was, that, knowing my own helplessness in the water, without one moment's hesitation I plunged in after her. The impulse on which I acted was sudden and irresistible; an impulse the effect of a cause unknown to me, and which in all probability I shall never know.

I was now nearly well, and was sitting up turning lazily over some old volumes of the Illustrated London News. I was tired of the pictures, and was glancing through some short paragraphs of gossip, when the following lines caught my eye:

"DEATH ON THE RIVER.—A few days ago two bodies, one of a lady and the other of a gentleman, were picked up by some lightermen off the Erith marshes. It appears that the deceased got on board a Chelsea steamer on the 1st of this month. Soon after the boat had passed under Westminster Bridge the lady jumped overboard, and the gentleman immediately followed her. Neither of them ever rose again. Advertisements have been inserted in several papers, as the deceased were evidently in a respectable position of life, but the bodies have not yet been claimed. The lady was dressed altogether in black, and was of singular beauty."

I read it over again. I looked at the date of the paper. It was the very month nine years ago. It was the very day, the 1st of the month. What strange fate was it that had thus thrown in my way a confirmation of that story which I had persuaded myself originated only in the brain of a madwoman? Again I questioned the reality of what had happened; again I tried to think I had been the victim of some delusion. No; to me at least the events of that afternoon were real; my memory reproduced them all with minute particularity. How I had been saved, my kind doctor had told me; of the risk I had incurred there could be no doubt.

The first time I was able to leave my room I hastened to make inquiries. I may say at once I met with no success. I questioned the crew of the steamer, and what passengers I could find, but to no purpose. They shook their heads; no lady had been seen to jump overboard. The old man at the Temple Pier was hardly more communicative; he had observed no lady particularly on that day; he did remember a lady jumping overboard, and a gentleman jumping in after her; he was then one of the crew of the steamer; it was a Chelsea boat. The gentleman and lady were both drowned, and their bodies were washed ashore, he believed, on the Erith marshes; but more than this he could not, or would not say. And with this I am obliged to rest satisfied.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

NOTES OF THE MONTH.

The choicest address to the month that we ever heard was that of a commanding officer, a man of few words, but he only used one, and that was "March!"

At this time a pack of dogs is said to be worth a king's ransom. The monarch referred to was probably David Mc-Halswood.

The friends of Mr. Jeremy Diddler would do well to remember that this, above all others, is the month for raising the wind.

What flower is most like a shepherd's dog?—The willow-flower.

SAWS BY OUR OWN SAWYER.

All have their several tasks in life,
Let each his own perform;
Don't touch the tiller of my boat;
Paddle your own oar.

That bird that flies from nest to nest
Its added eggs must see;
My highest leave for no to guide;
Paddle your own oar.

That husbandman both his barns will see
Who seeks to follow true;
No capitals in two ships can ride;
Paddle your own oar.

For your own postage save your breath;
Who'd send his life for you?
Your spoke but stops my chariot-wheel;
Paddle your own oar.

For-every that traveler must go
Who wears a neighbor's shawl;
Your car can never go with mine;
Paddle your own oar.

Mr. Quibb, reading that "it has been decided in the Court of Queen's Bench, in Dublin, that a vicarage of the Church of England can legally marry heathens," observed that that might be very well as a measure of economy, but that even in the hardest times he should prefer to marry a woman.

A poor Irishman, seeing a crowd of people approaching, asked what was the matter. "A man is coming to be buried," "Oh," he replied, "I'll stop to see that, for we carry them to be buried in our country."

KITTAPHI ON A WATER-DRINKER.

How like Ned Bass, who on a sudden Left off most best for heavy padding;
Forsook old stumps, and sold his soul,
And every drink for Adam's ale;
Till flesh and blood, reduced to water,
Consisting of more dose and water,
Wine, wanting salt to keep out meat,
And had to take it to a cruet,
Mustard and crushed tea &c.

A Western soldier, who had been through all the campaigns and shared in many of the fiercest battles of the war, written from his house, that "he never realized the horrors of war till he got home to Indiana and found his gal married to a stay-at-home dry-goods clerk."

When was breakfast the lightest?—When the crew jumped over the moon.

"Your purse, Tom," said an indulgent father to his spendthrift son, "contains more of a thunder-bolt." "How so, father?" "Because it is always lightning."

Connecticut has long been notorious for the facility with which it permits the marriage tie to be dissolved, and it gave occasion some years ago to a proposal by an Episcopal clergyman of Hartford, which was privately circulated among his friends. He had opened the House of Representatives with a prayer, and found himself the spectator of an extraordinary process, so alien to his own position, and so characteristic of the Legislature of Connecticut, that the result was the following:

IMPROVEMENT.

For cutting all corners—Laws passed,
Connecticut is fairly named;
I twain convene in one, but you Give those whom I convene in two;
Each legislature seems to cry,
What you Connecticut may.

Little Bob begged hard the other day, when some friends were dining with us, to be allowed to come in and sit at the table during dessert, which I told him he might do, provided he neither talked nor annoyed people by asking for fruit. He very readily assented to this condition, which he honestly fulfilled to the letter. At last I heard the poor little fellow crying and sobbing most pitifully. "What is the matter, Bob?" I said. "What are you crying about?" "Why, pa," he replied, "here I am, asking for nothing, and getting it!"

THE TRUSS DISEASE OF CONGRESSMEN TO MINDS.—Miss, minor, minor.

The art of economy is drawing in as much as one can, but unfortunately young ladies will apply this "drawing in" to their own bodies when they wish to avoid any thing like waste.

One of the readiest ways of contracting loose habits is to put a belt around your dressing-gown.

As the quickest way to make a fortune a contemporary suggests marrying a respectable young lady and selling for clothes.

LAUNCH OF THE STEAM-YACHT "BOSS WINANS" AT MILLWALL, ENGLAND.—[See Page 205.]

THE ICE BRIDGE OVER NIAGARA—SWEENY'S SKIRMISHERS (DUCK-HUNTERS) ON THE ICE.—[SKETCHED BY T. B. DAVIS.]

IRELAND AND THE FENIAN LEADERS.

Ireland has gained little by previous revolutions which have been undertaken under far better surprises and certainly have been occasioned by far greater provocation than that which is now threatened. No conspiracy can be conceived offering relatively greater prospects of success than those preceding the insurrections of 1843 and 1848; yet both fastened the yoke of the conqueror upon the conquered more completely than ever. At this time not only is the Church opposed to the revolution, but there are in Ireland alone friends enough of the English interest to more than hold in check the advocates of Irish independence. The best class of Irishmen are not Fenians.

Ireland is sadly misgoverned, but her condition is certainly better than it has been at any previous period. It is true that Irish landlords spend little

THE FENIAN EXCITEMENT—APPEARANCE OF JAMES STREET, HAMILTON, C. W.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY R. MYLNE, HAMILTON, C. W.]

BROWN'S original COCOON is the best hair-dressing in the world.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

IRON CASTINGS AND STEAM BOILERS.

THE HINKLEY & WILLIAMS WORKS, 418 Harrison Avenue, Boston.

ART NOTICE.

WENDROTH, TAYLOR & BROWN'S Fine Miniatures from Life, and copied from other pictures.

GENERAL HISTORY OF FREEMASONRY in Europe, from its foundation, in the year 115 B.C., to the present time.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES For the Army and Navy Hospitals, Barracks, Hospitals, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously.

Agents Wanted.

J. T. HEADLEY'S History of the War, COMPLETE IN TWO VOLUMES.

American Publishing Company, 115 Archway Street, Hartford, Conn.

The Art OF CONFECTIONERY.

"If any lady wishes to be her own confidante... to be initiated into the arts and mysteries of the preparation of whatever goes by the name of confectionery."

THE BEST STRENGTHENING PLASTER

DR. ALLCOCK. They are warranted to keep good twenty years, but may be renewed for fresh plaster without charge.

IMPORTANT QUALITIES. They will cure a Weakness of the Back, Pain in the Side, a Lameness of the Knee or of the Ankle, or Cold Feet, scrofula and with more comfort than any other application.

DR. T. ALLCOCK: Dear Sir,--Seventeen years ago I was severely injured in my back.

I am your obedient servant, JOHN G. CHASEY.

Principal Agency, Broadway House, 204 Canal Street, New York.

DR. BARKWELL, 245 Broadway, has the cheapest, lightest, and best Trusses.

PRINTING PRESS FOR SALE.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, Five Columns, Table Distribution, Bed 25x51. Price $3000.

$1000 REWARD $1000. O'DOR, O'DOR. I warrant my Golden O'Dor to free a beautiful set of whiskers.

DR. C. BRIDGES, P. O. Drawer 6308, Chicago, Ill.

Dr. Livingstone's New Work.

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

A NARRATIVE OF AN EXPEDITION TO THE ZAMBESI AND ITS TRIBUTARIES;

AND OF THE DISCOVERY OF LAKES SHIRWA AND NYASSA.

1858-1864.

By DAVID and CHARLES LIVINGSTONE.

MAP AND ILLUSTRATIONS. 8vo. Cloth, $5 00.

It has been my object in this work to give as clear an account as I was able of the country previously unexplored, with their river systems, general productions, and capabilities.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by Mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $5 00.

J. H. Winslow & Co.

120,000 Watches, Chains, Silver Articles, &c. Worth $500,000!

TO BE SOLD AT ONE DOLLAR EACH, WITHOUT REGARD TO VALUE.

REBUNDANT LIST OF ARTICLES.

- 100 Gold Hunting Case Watches..... $125 00
100 Gold Watches..... 75 00
300 Ladies' Gold Watches..... 40 00
500 Ladies' and Gents' Silver Watches..... 25 00
1000 Travelling Cases..... $15 00 to 25 00
2000 Drinking-Cups..... 2 00 to 10 00
5000 Great and Chased Gold Bracelets..... 5 00 to 10 00
2000 Veil, Neck, and Guard Chains..... 5 00 to 10 00
4000 Ladies' California Diamond Rings..... 1 00 to 5 00
5000 Magic Spring and Snap Lockets..... 4 00 to 10 00
10000 Gold Pins, Silver-Mounted Holders..... 4 00 to 5 00
10000 sets Ladies' Jewelry..... 5 00 to 10 00
5000 Tea, Dessert, & Table Spoons, per doz..... 1 00 to 2 00
1000 Dessert and Table Forks, per doz..... 1 00 to 2 00
4000 Rubber Knives, per pair..... 5 00 to 10 00
2000 Napkin Rings, per pair..... 5 00 to 10 00
2000 Other Articles..... 4 00 to 10 00

Guarantees of all the various articles, stating what each one has, are first put into envelopes, sealed up and mailed; and, when ordered, are taken out without regard to value, and sent by mail, free of all charges.

OCCUPATION

At your own choice. Thousands can make a hundred dollars weekly. No talents required except those found in every household.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1855 that this Compound was originated. A student of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disagreeable cough.

MAP OF THE SOUTHERN PART OF THE UNITED STATES.

FROM THE LATEST SURVEYS BY A. LINDENKOHLE. Folded 8vo. $1 00.

NEW MUSIC.

Arrab-on-Pages, Grand March..... 50c
Silver Truances..... 50c
I have Heard Sweet Music Sounding..... 50c

"He is Breaking Down."

How often one hears the wail of a man who seems wailing away without any specific ailment!

Cough's

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALM is warranted to cure Croup, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.

FIRST PREMIUM IMPROVED $5 SEWING MACHINE $5

The Embodiment of Practical Utility and Extreme Simplicity.

Originally patented May 15, 1851. Improved and patented June 3, 1861. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with complete attachment, a most wonderful and elegant contrivance.

For the dressmaker it is invaluable; for the household it supplies a want.

THE GREAT OPTICAL DELUSION. THE GREATEST WONDER OF THE AGE. A pair sets by mail for 75 cents.

WANTED.

AGENTS, male and female, are seeking as high as $20 per day with "THE GREAT LAROK SAYER," worth $25 to any family.

TIMEKEEPER.

A SCIENTIFIC WONDER and marvel of ingenuity. The Chronometric Pocket Timekeeper.

THE GREAT OPTICAL DELUSION.

THE GREATEST WONDER OF THE AGE. A pair sets by mail for 75 cents.

MAP OF THE SOUTHERN PART OF THE UNITED STATES.

FROM THE LATEST SURVEYS BY A. LINDENKOHLE. Folded 8vo. $1 00.

NEW MUSIC.

Arrab-on-Pages, Grand March..... 50c
Silver Truances..... 50c
I have Heard Sweet Music Sounding..... 50c

"He is Breaking Down."

How often one hears the wail of a man who seems wailing away without any specific ailment!

Cough's

DR. STRICKLAND'S MELLIFLUOUS COUGH BALM is warranted to cure Croup, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs.

JOSEPH H. AND HIS COURT.

By L. MUHLBACH. FROM THE GERMAN.

BY ADELAIDE DE V. CHAUDRON. COMPLETE IN FOUR VOLUMES, FEMPTAT FORM, $1 50.

This great work, which was published by S. H. Gostack, Mobile, Alabama, during the time of the Southern Confederacy, and generally received with so much delight and admiration, is now offered to the people North, East, and West, as well as South.

It can be ordered either direct from the publisher, S. H. Gostack, Mobile, Ala., or from Collins & Brother, No. 24 Leonard St., New York, on receipt of the price $1 50.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.

601 BROADWAY (at North-4th Street) Photographic Materials, Stereoscopic Goods, WAR VIEWS, SCENERY, GROUPS, &c.

LIBRARY DE LOVE, 3 Volumes

GREAT DISCOVERY... DE GRATIS ELECTED GEL. It is warranted to cure rheumatism, diabetes, dropsy, piles, and all sorts of humors.

MOTH AND FRECKLES.

Ladies afflicted with Freckles on the Face, called moth-patches, or freckles, should use FRECKLE LOTION.

"The West Indian Hair Curler."

Warranted to curl the most straight and stiff hair, on the first application, into short curls or waving masses.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

MAXWELL DREWITT. A Novel. By F. G. TARDON. 3vo. Paper, 75 cents.

JAMES LOUIS FREDERU. A Biographical Sketch. By William J. Grayson. With Steel Portrait. 12mo. Cloth, $1 00.

AGNES. A Novel. By Mrs. CHAPMAN. Author of "The Laird of Norham," "The Peripatetic Curate," &c. 3vo. Paper, 75 cents.

A SCOTCH LIFE. By Miss MURPHY. (Mrs. Grant, Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "The British Mission," "A Life for a Life," "The Olden," "The Head of the Family," &c. 12mo. Cloth, $1 50.

GOVERNOR POOTE ON THE WAR AND THE UNION. War of the Rebellion, its Origin and Character. Consisting of Observations upon the Causes, Course, and Consequences of the late Civil War in the United States. By H. S. POOTE. 12mo. Cloth, $1 50.

A TEXT-BOOK ON ANATOMY, PHYSIOLOGY, AND HYGIENE. For the Use of Schools and Families. By James C. DEARNS, M.D., Professor of Natural History and Physiology in the New York Free Academy, and Professor of Analytical Chemistry in the University of New York. With 170 Illustrations. 8vo. Cloth, $2 50.

GUY DEVERELL. By J. S. LA FORT. Author of "Uncle Sam," &c. 3vo. Paper, 50 cents.

WIVES AND DAUGHTERS. By Mrs. GARRETT. Author of "Mary Barton," "Cranford," "Sybil's Lovers," &c. 3vo. Cloth, $2 00; Paper, $1 50.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR APRIL, 1866.

TERMS. One Copy for one Year..... $4 00

An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Five Subscribers, at $4 00 each, or 5 Copies for $20 00.

The Publishers will accept a limited number of Specimen Advertisements for their Magazine, at the following low rates: one quarter of a page, each Number, $75; one half, $1 50; whole page, $3 00.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for inside, and Two Dollars per line for outside Advertisements, each insertion.

THE ISSUE OF

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

LIBRARY
APR 13 1866
CITY OF NEW YORK

Vol. X.—No. 484.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1866.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1854, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

RICHMOND BRIDEWELL, DUBLIN. FROM WHICH HEAD-CENTRE STEPHENS ESCAPED.

THE FENIAN CONSPIRACY IN IRELAND—MARCHING PRISONERS INTO THE COUNTY PRISON AT CORK.—(See Page 112.)

DRESSING FOR CHURCH.

(EASTER SUNDAY.)

Has any body heard the bell?
You have?—dear me, I know full well
I'll never dress in time—
For mercy's sake, come help me, Luce,
I'll make my toilet very spruce—
The silk is quite sublime!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 7, 1866.

PRESIDENTIAL PATRONAGE.

WHATEVER may be thought of the general wisdom or policy of the President's veto of the Freedmen's Bureau Bill, there can be no doubt that one point of it was very suggestive, and that was his opposition to the further increase of Presidential patronage.

alarming sign under a free Constitutional Government.
The excuse offered merely reveals more clearly the danger of the enormous patronage of which we speak. It is urged that, to differ with the President, is to run the risk of encountering the organized opposition of the army of office-holders, who, in other countries, are called the "creatures" of the Government.

In the Senate debates Mr. Fessenden is always conspicuous for an incisive good sense, which is the rarest as it is the most excellent quality of a Senator. In opposition he is always reasonable, speaking to the merits of the special case, and not planting himself upon abstractions.

THE TRIUMPH OF THE PAPER-MONEY MEN.

The paper-money men have won a substantial victory. On 23d March the Morrill bill passed the House of Representatives, with amendments prohibiting the Secretary of the Treasury from curtailing more than $10,000,000 of United States notes in the six months following the passage of the bill, and $4,000,000 in each subsequent month—in other words, restricting contraction to the pitiful amount of about $18,000,000 during the recess, say 24 per cent. of the total volume afloat.

CONGRESSIONAL LEADERSHIP.

Among the living statesmen of this country there is none who commands profounder popular confidence than WILLIAM PATT FESSENDEN, Senator from Maine.

It is one of the marvels of the time that no man known as a radical has vindicated the party and the country against Mr. STEVENS. The opposition of gentlemen like Mr. Raymond and Mr. Davis of this State does not avail.

The Editors of Harper's Weekly are published by LEWIS PERRY, No. 120, Broadway, New York, with permission from Harper & Row, N. Y. Copyright 1866 by L. P. Perry. Price 10 cents. Issue of April 7, 1866, Vol. 8 - No. 14

the restoration of specie payments, and no interest whatever in prolonging the present era of paper-money and fluctuating values. We must not disregard the use that will be made of this fact at the fall elections. By that time politicians will have taken hold of the currency question as a political issue. It will be easy to demonstrate that the great cost of living is mainly due to the depreciated condition of the currency, and opponents of the dominant party will plausibly argue that but for the opposition of such Republicans as STRICKLAND, BOUTWELL, and others—in the interest of vast manufacturing corporations in Pennsylvania and New England—the currency would by that time have been curtailed, gold would have been lower, and the cost of living substantially reduced. It will be further argued by the Opposition press and speakers, that but for the unwillingness of the majority in Congress to admit Southern men to seats, the currency would already have been in process of contraction, and the cost of living on the decline.

As for the Secretary, he will probably do his duty as best he can with such powers as Congress may confer upon him. We regard it as a great mercy to him that the original bill did not pass. Had that measure become a law nothing could have saved him from wholesale charges of corruption and speculation in the stock market. If his power to contract the currency be definitely limited to $18,000,000 between this and December he can, of course, effect little or nothing toward the restoration of specie payments. Gold will fall simply because every one will understand that contraction is only deferred, not abandoned, and because the cotton crop is likely to more than pay our foreign debt. He will doubtless exert himself to convert as large a proportion as possible of his short-date obligations into long bonds, and, by getting rid of his debt on call and of his debt certificates, will emancipate himself from the control of the banks. Another year of high prices and high taxes will satisfy Congressmen that they can not with impunity advocate the interest of manufacturing companies in opposition to the public interest, and the Secretary will then have his revenge.

THE CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION.

A GREAT deal of unreasonable wrath has been lavished upon the Reconstruction Committee. The President denounced it as a Central Directory, which was an unfortunate expression, because it has no resemblance to a Central Directory; and the papers that steadily palliated the rebellion declaim against the Committee as an irresponsible body to which Congress has helplessly committed its functions. This is a natural opposition, because these papers also decry the test oath as unconstitutional, and urge the admission of the late rebel States to all their old rights without conditions. They are, therefore, very impatient with a Committee charged to inquire whether such a policy is wise and safe.

The truth is, that when Congress met it was clear that it must at once adopt the policy of reorganization urged by the opponents of the war, or it must not. To adopt it was to make the war a tragical farce, and to invite rebellion. Of course a loyal and honest and able Congress did not entertain the proposition for a moment. Then it was necessary to determine the exact situation of the country, and to consider the conditions upon which it seemed best that the unorganized States should resume their old relations. This was not a point to be settled by any theory whatever. It involved a knowledge of facts; and the first duty was to collect information, compare opinions, and elaborate methods. Obviously Congress itself could not undertake this work directly; and, unless it were prepared to abdicate its authority, and to allow the President to settle by his sole individual will the gravest question which could ever arise in our history, it was indispensable to appoint a Committee to investigate and compare, to consider, and finally to report, that the whole subject might be treated intelligently by those who were elected by the loyal people of the United States to decide the question.

Nothing could be plainer or more reasonable. Surely if any subject ever demanded the most prudent and thoughtful deliberation it is the reorganization of the Union. It is not a matter to be "hurried up," nor to be determined by an abstract theory. It is the most practical of questions. As Mr. SEWARD said in his letter to Mr. ADAMS describing the interview of President LINCOLN with the peace-ambassador from Richmond in February, 1865: "His power (the President's) is limited by the Constitution. And when peace should be made, Congress must necessarily act in regard to appropriations of money, and to the admission of representatives from the insurrectionary States."

The Reconstruction Committee is thus simply a Commission of Inquiry with no power whatever; and as Congress appointed the Committee because information was necessary to wise action, it very properly resolved not to act until it had the information. At any moment it may alter its instructions to the Committee, or it may discharge it. But it might just as wisely be denounced for referring questions of contested elections to a committee upon that subject, and declining to decide until the committee reported, as for intrusting this most vital inquiry to a carefully selected committee. So, also, to complain that it has not presented a complete scheme of legislation upon the subject, is to complain of the nature of the case. The essential information is, of course, slowly obtained and must be well weighed. Meanwhile, as fast as the Committee sees that a special measure is desirable, it reports it to Congress and asks action upon it. This course is also revised; but if the Committee had been silent to this time would its conduct have been more satisfactory to its opponents?

It is surely a very thoughtless and impatient complaint that the loyal people of the United States, by their representatives in Congress, are considering with the gravest deliberation the most momentous question of reorganization of the Union. The point is not whether loyal representatives are to be admitted, because nobody but a Copperhead claims that any other shall be. The question is, whether South Carolina and Mississippi shall, by the admission of members to Congress, be declared to have resumed all the rights in the Union which New York and Iowa enjoy. It may be that it is most desirable; but is Congress to be blamed for carefully considering the question?

THE LAW OF TESTIMONY.

In the State of New York, since the spring of 1857, the parties to civil suits are equal witnesses with all others. The reform has been an improvement, and the vast majority of lawyers in the State would doubtless smile at the proposition to return to the old system. But the question is asked, and with extraordinary emphasis—if parties to civil suits may witness for themselves, why should not the defendant in a criminal suit testify for himself?

There really is no sufficient answer. If both parties were disqualified there would be at least an air of impartiality. But it is not so. The just theory of the law is that every person is to be presumed innocent until proved guilty; but the practice is to hold him guilty until he can establish his innocence, and he is not suffered to help establish it. If you enter any court where a man is upon trial for an infamous crime of which he may be as innocent as you are, it is impossible not to see that he is already regarded as guilty. We do not deny that this springs from the steps necessary to security which must be taken; but certainly we do not give the accused a fair chance if we silence him. The practice of the law in this respect is amusingly illustrated by a story of a certain New York Judge who was about to sentence a negro for some trivial offense. "Stand up, Zingo!" said his Honor. "What have you to say why the sentence of the law should not be pronounced upon you?" Poor Zingo, frightened out of his small wits, began to stammer, "Why—Mass—Mass—Knick-erbocker—" "Not a word, Zingo," interrupted his Honor, "not a word;" and sentence was pronounced.

A writer in the American Law Register for January, to whom we are indebted for this good story, and who treats the subject with great spirit and force, says that the only theory upon which the testimony of a party to a civil suit was rejected was that if he said anything favorable to himself it must needs be perjury, and that the same reason is urged for a similar exclusion in criminal proceedings. But there is no delay in receiving a plea of guilty. It is only when the story of an accused man helps him that it is discarded. But having rejected the theory in one case, we must reject it in the other. Besides, before the examining and committing magistrate the arrested person may make a statement, and this statement may be used against him, and so may come before the jury without the sanction of an oath. Now if the accused may be heard unsworn before a magistrate, why should he not be heard, sworn, before twelve magistrates or a jury. "If," as the writer of whom we speak says—"if his statements are receivable to influence the magistrate in holding or releasing him, why should they not be received in the form of legal testimony to influence the jury in convicting or acquitting him?"

Again, if the theory be that the accusation renders the accused unworthy of credit, why do we allow one of two accused persons to give States evidence and suffer him to escape by implicating his accomplice? By this offer we beibe both honest men wrongfully accused and rogues anxious to escape to swear falsely. Yet, so determined is the impartial lawyer-convict, that if the State's evidence should tend to exonerate both the accused, it will not be produced.

In the State of Maine, by an act passed in 1863, the respondent to any criminal charge is allowed to testify; and Chief Justice APPLETON of that State says of these changes: "So far as I can judge, they are favorable to the ascertainment of truth—the great end for which judicial proceedings are instituted.....I anticipate from the change proposed a greater certainty of correct decisions in criminal proceedings. The guilty will be less likely to escape. The danger of the unjust conviction of the innocent will be diminished." It appears that in no civilized country save the English-speaking lands is a person accused of crime forbidden to testify for himself. It is a relic of a false and foolish view of human nature. It is a view corrected by our experience and ridiculed by the inconsistency of our practice. If "the profession" will raise the banner of reform upon this subject it will be the banner of triumph.

SLAUGHTER-HOUSES IN NEW YORK CITY.

THE question of the removal of these establishments to the suburbs of the city has lately engaged the attention of the new Board of Health; but in the discussion between the butchers and the Board there was one point of considerable importance entirely overlooked. This was the condition of the cattle as to health, produced by their transfer to the city in cattle-trains, and the superiority of abattoirs in the country. It must be very evident that by taking cattle off their feed and transporting them in cars from the prairies of the West, or from Canada—and the majority of our cattle come from these quarters—they must be bruised and feverish on their arrival at the pens, and in no condition for immediate slaughter. It would be evidently better to kill the animals fresh from pasture and transport the carcass quartered to the city.

The butchers object to this plan on the ground that the meat would, as they say, "be mused" in a jarring train. But this slight disadvantage has to be weighed against the greater disadvantage of unhealthy meat produced by bruises and fever. It would not be difficult, however, to construct cars on the plan of a cooling-house, so that meat might be transported in them without being bruised, heated, or in any way damaged. So far as expense is concerned, if the business were conducted on a large scale, there would doubtless be an advantage in having cattle slaughtered along the great lines, by which they are now conducted into the city—the Harlem and Hudson River roads.

The question, What food we shall eat, and what scrutiny shall be employed in its selection, is one of more importance than is generally supposed. Many diseases are produced by meat injured by an improper mode of feeding animals. This is much more extensive in old countries than in ours, where we yet have vast prairies and abundant crops of corn; but in the Atlantic States, owing to the exhausting plan of cultivation pursued, animals are fed much less luxuriously than throughout the West. Cattle and hogs are there fattened generally in large inclosures, and with abundance of nutritious food, and improper feeding is the exception. But elsewhere such feeding is the general rule. A hog fattened in a close pen can scarcely be fit for food. The air of such a confined place is bad. The refuse of all food is considered good enough for the pig, and it is fed to him from a reservoir in which it is allowed to accumulate until it ferments. The prejudice of the Jew against pork is doubtless due to this mode of feeding, known to produce scrofula not only in the animal, but in those who partake of the flesh. We need not speak of the abuses in fattening cows which have been kept in what are called swill-stables, as the food which comes from these sources is well known to be dangerous to health.

Food that is wholly desirable and proper can best be obtained from animals which are allowed to take exercise during the process of fattening; and if a few butchers would unite in the purchase of extensive grounds in Westchester or Putnam counties and carry out this plan, we feel sure that the enterprise would be rewarded with good customers and large profits. The new Board, instead of directing their attention merely to the question of cleanliness, by influencing removals from the inhabited portions of the city of all slaughter-houses, would promote both the health of the animals and of the consumers.

PREVENTION OF CHOLERA.

In his admirable lectures Dr. SOUTHWOOD SMITH tells us that epidemics all belong to the class of Fevers. The Black Death, the Oriental Plague, the Sweating Sickness, Cholera, Typhus, Small-Pox, and many other diseases of less severity are epidemic and periodical in their character, and are usually preceded by indigestion. The first outbreak of cholera in Great Britain was heralded by it, and the influenza of 1847 announced the cholera of 1848. During the prevalence of cholera all other diseases are apt to partake of its type, owing doubtless in a great measure to the terror which pervades a community at such times, and we find that the reaction of the mental impressions on the body are so powerful as frequently to result in the death of the unfortunate unless his attention can be diverted from himself.

Cholera, like all other epidemics, is fearfully rapid in its action, and if death does not occur in a few hours the patient will usually recover. The great object to be attained in the treatment of the disease when it has announced its presence is to gain time. The sufferer should go to bed at once and send for his physician, for every moment is of value, and proper assistance in the first onslaught of the attack will often decide between life and death in the ultimate result.

Whatever opinions physicians may hold regarding the contagious character of various epidemics, all agree that certain conditions are alike favorable to their development and rapid progress as well as to their fatality. Filthy streets, dirty sewers, exhalations from putrid animal and vegetable substances, are all powerful predisposing causes of the production not only of cholera, but also of typhus and all other diseases of the fever class.

The influence of the foul air voided from the human body is also exceedingly pernicious to the system, especially in overcrowded, ill-ventilated rooms and buildings; but so great is the infatuation of the majority of men regarding the subject of ventilation that, in spite of the evidence of the nostrils, it is often asserted that there is no difference to be found between pure and foul air; whereas the experiments of Dr. ANTON SURRU show that if we condense the air of an overcrowded room and allow it to remain for a week or so it forms a glutinous deposit that possesses a strong animal odor, and if examined from time to time by a microscope the deposit shows the appearance of vegetable growths in which hosts of animalcules are rapidly produced, thus demonstrating in the most satisfactory manner the presence of a large amount of organic matter in the air expired from the lungs.

The poisonous character of the organic matter contained in such expired air, and in that exhaled from the skin, is demonstrated by the same authority in the statement that a few drops of the liquid matter obtained by the condensation of the foul air of an overcrowded room introduced into the veins of a dog produces death, with the usual phenomena of typhus fever.

In the face of such facts it is fully longer to disregard the important subject of ventilation if we desire to escape the epidemic that now threatens us, an attack of which is now regarded as being even disreputable to the patient, since it involves a gross ignorance of the ordinary laws of hygiene, and a disregard of cleanliness in the personal or household arrangements.

It is of course impossible in an article to indicate the means which families and individuals should employ to protect themselves as far as possible from the invasion of this disease, and since the old saying that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure applies with marvellous force to the cholera, it is the duty of all to observe with care the laws of hygiene as laid down in the works on this subject. An excellent summary of them will be found in a book on Anatomy, Physiology, and Hygiene, recently published by Professor DEANER, in which the questions of diet, ventilation, bathing, etc., are fully discussed and brought within the reach of all intelligent minds.

"INSIDE."

THE story of this name, which appears serially in the Weekly, certainly fulfills its promise. It is the most graphic and clearly authentic sketch of the social condition of the late rebel States during the war, and will have a unique value to the historian of the stormy time, and, like all true pictures of a great range of society, is full of value to the statesman and political thinker. The writer of such a tale is not a solitary product of the region in which it is laid; and it is to such clear and intelligent comprehension upon the part of the thoughtful people of the South that we must look for wise action in the future. They are the real friends of the Union and of peace.

SOLDIERS LEFT-HAND WRITING.

IT was in this paper that many of the soldiers who competed for the prizes of left-handed penmanship first saw the invitation to that generous rivalry, and they will now learn with pleasure the result. It is plain from the number of specimens that no Yankee loses his heart with his arm, for there were some two hundred and seventy manuscripts collected from nearly every State in the Union. The loss of two arms, indeed, did not daunt one competitor, who sent a specimen of writing with the mouth, which was remarkable and honorably mentioned. The Exhibition Room was prettily arranged, and, except for an unexpected limitation of time, it would doubtless have been a point of popular interest. Yet it was long enough open for General GRANT to visit it. He was delighted with the display, and wrote a letter playfully confessing that he should be unable to decide upon the merits of the competitors.

This, however, was a responsibility which the Committee could not escape, and after careful inspection and consideration they awarded the prizes, although they would doubtless have confessed that it was often very difficult to discriminate. The original sum offered was five hundred dollars by WILLIAM OLAND BOWEN, who was the projector of the enterprise. To this two hundred and fifty dollars were added by the Sanitary Commission, and as much more by the Committee, making one thousand dollars in all. The first prize of the first class was awarded to FRANCIS H. DUBMAN, private in the Thirty-first Pennsylvania Infantry. There were twenty-eight prizes altogether, and we wish we had room for the names of the recipients, who were from every part of the country, from Maine to Dacotah. General HOWARD, the Head of the Freedmen's Bureau, who is one of the left-armed soldiers of the Union, did not compete for the prizes, but he wrote a pleasant letter to Dr. BELLows, one of the Committee.

It was an enterprise most honorable to Mr. BOWEN and to the brave Yankee soldiers, all of whom showed in the sentiments they wrote that if nobly left-handed they were no less nobly right-hearted.

THADDEUS STEVENS.

The figure which in the present Congress looms up above every other is that of THADDEUS STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Certainly if we were to select the portrait of that Congressman which would be most interesting to our readers it would be the portrait of STEVENS.

The subject of our sketch was born in Caledonia County, Vermont, April 4, 1793. Immediately upon his graduation at Dartmouth College, in 1814, he removed to Pennsylvania. Teaching in an academy in that State, he at the same time prepared for the practice of law. He was admitted to the bar in 1816, in Adams County. In 1833 he was elected to the Pennsylvania Legislature, and also in the years following until 1838, and again in 1841. In 1838 he was appointed Canal Commissioner, and in 1842 he removed to Lancaster.

In 1849 Mr. STEVENS was elected a Representative from Pennsylvania to the Thirty-first Congress. He was a member of the Thirty-second, and also of the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh Congresses. In the latter he held the most important position in the House—that which is usually conceded to the leading member—namely, that of Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. In 1862 he was elected to the Thirty-eighth Congress, and subsequently to the Congress which is now in session.

Not a man of great statesmanship though of sincere patriotism, he is inconsiderate in the policy which he urges upon the country, and in his utterances upon important matters of State. He is bold, and even rash in speech. Chief-Justice TANEY had slept in his grave little more than a twelvemonth when, in an important speech in the House, Mr. STEVENS had the boldness to declare that the opinions of the Chief-Justice on negro citizenship had damned him to everlasting infamy, and, he feared, to everlasting fame. In the same speech Mr. STEVENS expressed his impatience at the magnanimity of the Government in its attitude toward the conquered Southern States, and advocated a revival of the policy which had been visited upon the vanquished in the less civilized epochs of Roman history. Mr. STEVENS is more of an alarmist, we think, than becomes an honest statesman. He exaggerates trivialities. Because President JOHNSON simply expressed an opinion in regard to the proposed amendments to the Constitution, Mr. STEVENS saw in this a dreadful usurpation, not unworthy to be compared with that which cost CHARLES THE FIRST his head. We mention these things as characteristics of Mr. STEVENS's boldness and extravagance. His attempt, afterward, to treat the President's 23d of February speech as a hoax, foisted upon the country by the Copperheads, was equally extravagant as a bit of buffoonery.

HON. THADDEUS STEVENS, M. C.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BEAUF.]

That which gives Mr. STEVENS the great power which he wields in the House—a power which is almost irresistible—is his emphatic and earnest denunciation of treason. The country has suffered so much in the past from vacillation, that it greatly admires any thing which looks thorough and straightforward. Mr. STEVENS's words have a gladiatorial strength which would have done honor to the boldest of Rome's orators. They sway men by their sledge-hammer strokes—they are words of iron. Whatever be the verdict of posterity in regard to the wisdom of Mr. STEVENS's acts and speeches, future generations can not fail to render him the tribute which is always yielded to extraordinary force of character.

THE FENIANS.

We continue this week to give illustrations of matters connected with the Fenian movement in Ireland and Canada. Apparently very little is being done by the Fenians themselves. We hear a great deal of volunteer drilling and parades in Canada directed against Fenians, but we are not aware of the fact that there has been found a Fenian in arms. Ireland has been put under martial law and the Habeas corpus act suspended—and yet there has not been the first shot fired, nor the first act of overt rebellion committed. We smile when we remember the protracted howl of indignation which all England raised when, in the midst of the most serious rebellion which history records, we suspended the act of Habeas corpus. It also excites a and to read the indignant comments of the principal Canadian journals on the neutral attitude assumed by our Government toward the whole affair. The British are protesting most emphatically to-day the profound and instructive maxim which they have always pronounced to all the peoples of the world: "Do as we say, but not as we do."

CANADIAN VOLUNTEERS AFTER DRILL.

It is reported that SEVERUS, the Head Centre of the Fugian Brotherhood, has escaped from Ireland. It is now several weeks since he escaped from Richmond Bridewell prison, of which we give an illustration on our first page. This prison is a Government establishment, and is also a house of correction for male and female convicts. Weaving is the principal employment of the males; those sentenced to hard labor are put to the tread-mill. The prisoners, on being discharged, are paid one-third of the earnings of their labor. This prison, as well as others in Dublin, is full of Fenians.

Arrests continue to be made all over the country. Eleven men charged at Skiloberren, on 28th February, with being concerned in the Fenian conspiracy, were brought to Cork next day, and lodged in the county jail. We give on the same page with Richmond Bridewell prison an illustration of these prisoners entering the jail. Our illustration on page 212, presenting the Canadian Volunteers resting after a day's drill, speaks for itself.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

INSIDE
A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XIII.

Mrs. Dr. Warner had remarked to her husband only yesterday: "Dr. Warner, will you tell me what we are coming to? Flour forty dollars a barrel, sugar four pounds for a dollar, salt twelve cents, coffee one dollar, molasses two dollars and a half, lard forty cents, chickens fifty cents, eggs one dollar, butter a dollar and a quarter—those scoundrel Yankees! And not a calico in town under a dollar a yard, domestics a dollar and a quarter, shoes ten dollars, a paper of pins five dollars! If I only had all the Yankees right in front of a cannon—Lincoln and all—loaded to the muzzle, and could shoot that cannon off, I could die happy. And there's snuff, not a grain of it to be had!"

Mrs. Warner stopped; words failed to express her indignation. In fact the English language had long since been used up by Mrs. Warner.

Its very strongest words had been hurled by her so long and so continually upon the heads of the invaders that they had become insipid and meaningless to her. It is weeks now since she has first remarked that, if she but could do so, she would with her own hands send the North into atoms so small that Omnipotence itself should never find them, nor Omnipotence itself put them together if found.

From Colonel Ret-Roberts's last speech that was; but even that had become language too feeble to express her loathing and abhorrence. Having said fifty times a day that the Yankees were worse than devils, and that even hell was a punishment too light for them—said this in all possible inflections of the idea, what else could be said? Even Mrs. Warner was conscious of a some of exhaustion.

As to the Doctor, what had he to do but to be as little at home as possible, yet in some word of flattery whenever his conscience and a lull in the storm permitted, and so endure? The Doctor agreed in all the lamentations of his wife upon those who had brought about the ruin of the country, with this slight difference only—that the Xanthippe of his bosom located these authors in Washington, and he located them in a somewhat lower latitude. When the infinite diversity of sentiment between the Secessionists and the Union people at the South during the war is considered, the wonder is, not at the alienation that existed there on that account, but rather that no greater explosion followed. But then there was on the part of the Union people an amazing amount of—what is the softest possible word for dissembling?—and a still more astonishing degree of silence. And there was an ominous meaning in that very silence, taken in connection with the class character of the Union people, hitherto and in all other matters, for forecast and prudence, which disqualified their Secessionist acquaintances exceedingly.

There is Mrs. Sorel. The times bring many troubles to her besides the absence of her son at the war. She goes out very little these days. None of the Union people do so any more than they can help. But she meets, as all Union people do, with coldness, sometimes actual denunciation, in company when she does enter it. Often is she under the necessity of entering the small room adjoining her chamber, where is little furniture beyond a chair and a table with a Bible upon it; often than of old, and she remains there longer in these days. Yet she always comes out from it calmer and in happier mood, if possible, than even in her palmiest days of yore. Nothing can be more placid than the conversations she and Edward Arthur, her guest, hold across the next little table at breakfast, dinner, and supper; for Mr. Arthur is rarely away from home in these days any more than Mrs. Sorel. Mrs. Sorel has even to remonstrate with her guest upon his confining himself too closely to his studies.

MRS. SOREL'S COMPOSE.

The truth is, in the absence of the papers, reviews, and new publications of all sorts in which he once delighted, Mr. Arthur has taken to the old English divines in his library, volumes yellow with years and near a yard long, for which he has hitherto found little time. Into these volumes, as into pools pure and deep, he plunges over head and ears, and so forgets the times and himself. Nor are these the only pools into which he plunges. Every morning, to keep as fresh and as strong as possible, he is up and away on his horse to a creek miles off in the dense forest, into which he goes headlong, to return by the time the sun is up, glowing with his bath and the exercise, hopeful of happy days beyond Secession, hungry for his breakfast and for his studies afterward. A little Virgil occasionally; periodic Greek Testament likewise; and Hebrew also, straying away in its elephant tracks far away from Secession, across Canaan, through the rocky gaps of Sinai and Horeb, and on toward Abraham and the Crucifixion.

What with these, the Old Divines, and his exercise, he is preparing sermons having more of the pith and essence of the Gospel in them, leaving away while so engaged from Secession and civil war. It may be only his imagination, but he has an impression that he is just now in special training for a work after Secession is over—some great work in which he is to accomplish more than he has ever dreamed of so far. At any rate he will prepare himself as thoroughly as possible.

Here is a morning, some weeks after his last conversation with Mr. Fergussen, when the gallop and the bath before breakfast do not quite suffice. It is in vain after breakfast that, after getting through his lessons with Robby, he essays the folio of theology. It may be a deep pool at other times, but this morning it seems a frozen one. He can not penetrate beneath, but slips and falls continually on the page as on a surface of ice.

On account of the bells last night? Even from Mrs. Sorel's, three miles away, he could hear the great rejoicing in Somerville—all the bells, all the cannon, all the smaller arms. He woke at midnight with the first stroke of the Methodist bell, by far the largest in Somerville. "If Providence is willing, I am," he said to himself in the act of awaking; but there was no more sleep for him that night.

Somerville has been quite dependent of late, and the reaction of joy over victory is immense. Colonel Jiggins has a negro boy over at Mrs. Sorel's with the paper long before breakfast. Mr. Arthur has read it to Mrs. Sorel of that kind. Cause for rejoicing, indeed! There have been a series of battles near Richmond lasting several days. McClellan has been captured, with his entire army! The gun-boats have managed to escape down James River, but that is all; 60 generals, 140 captains, 30,000 Federals killed, 80,000 captured stores, histories, colors without computation! The war is virtually over! Colonel Jiggins comes along after breakfast.

"Of that vast army, ma'am," he says to Mrs. Sorel, "Bill Perkins was saying last night only 75 privates made their escape, and at last accounts our army was in full pursuit of them!" And Colonel Jiggins, brimmed with enthusiasm, insists on reading over aloud the whole paper from end to end to quiet Mrs. Sorel washing up the breakfast things.

No, Edward Arthur can not get into the merits of the folio this morning. He evades Colonel Jiggins, goes to the stable, saddles and mounts his horse, and rides slowly away he does not care whither. It runs like a ditty in his mind over and over again—"If Providence is willing, I am!" Old passages of Scripture come to the surface, in his memory, of themselves—"His ways are not as our ways, neither are His thoughts as our thoughts. He doeth according to His will in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth. None can stay His hand, or say what doeth thou...." And yet if Secession could but have been put down! One country again; one flag again; universal amnesty; peace and prosperity again, firmer, greater than before!" His mind runs over it all as it is: "The success of the great Wrong! The triumph of wicked men! Anarchy victorious North and South! And is it possible, after all, that such men as Lamson, Roberts, Barker, and the long tail of Captain Simmons, Bob Withers, Tim Lamson, and the like are right? Right? Pleading to God? And all who think unlike them are wrong? their opinions displeasing to Heaven, and now justly rebuked?" It was partly broken rest the night past, but Edward Arthur felt as he rode along as if the very foundations of reason and religion were out of course.

ARTHUR AND ALICE AT THE OLD GIN.

"ONE MORE GLANCE, ABOLITIONIST."

The seven days of Chickahominy were days of disaster to you loyal hearts at the North, were they? Believe it, your deepest feelings in regard thereto were but, in the phrase of old Cervantes, "as cheese-cakes and cream-tarts" to the agony of a deferred, night destroyed, in the bosoms of hundreds of thousands of us at the South, losing our common country as much as you. As much as you? Far more. Though trembling lest you should lose it, you still possessed it. We at the South, actually stripped of all we loved, of flag and country, were yearning for their return. In the great wreck common to both, you were as those of the wrecked still holding on to the floating fragments, though they seemed slipping from your grasp; we were as those drowning without even that, peering and clutching—ah, how desperately!—amidst the roaring foam.

It is raining heavily, and the rider looks around to find that his horse has stopped of its own accord under the roof of an old gin. He has been there before in his excursions. The gin is an abandoned one in the centre of a tract of land, which the furrows, newly leveled by the rains to a plain, and a fragment of an old rail here and there, show to have been once cultivated. There is the screw, too, hard by, its long levers, with their little cap of a roof, idle evidently this many a day. The pit beneath is caved in. There are scraps of rope, shreds of bagging, great piles of cotton seed blue and steaming in the rain around. Yes, many a bale of cotton has been planted and gathered and ginned and pressed and wagoned away from this deserted spot. Edward Arthur is in full sympathy with the scene this morning; how much better to be there just now than in the hotel in Somerville, or even at Mrs. Sorel's. As he alights from and ties his horse to one of the huge posts which support the upper room of the gin-house, the under story being open all around, he is glad he has not to converse with even Guy Brooks this morning. Mr. Ferguson, too—he knows that the Scotchman is that instant in his room there in Somerville contemplating the blazing dispatch which he has just filed in its place in his ponderous scrap-book. There is a gleam of satisfaction in the young minister's mind as he sees, in imagination, the peculiar expression which is that very instant tingling, so to speak, the very tips of the Scotchman's grizzly beard.

But he is to have company at last. There is a galloping of a horse across the old field. It is a lady; she rides her pony in under the projecting roof, and is off and shaking the drops from her riding-skirt before he can get to her assistance. She raises her head as he approaches. Of all persons on earth it is the person whom he would most desire to meet just there and then. Of all persons on earth it is just the person whom he would there and then most ardently desire not to meet.

It may be owing to the fact that we have double lobes to the brain and a double set of organs to the heart; but certain it is a man may have in brain and heart, and at the same moment too, a double set of thoughts and emotions—double and strong, and in exact conflict with each other. And it is with a man in such a case as it is with a steamer, say, when the engine on its one side is propelling, with the engine on its other side backing. Round and round, morally speaking, goes the individual, but not an inch does he advance either down stream or up current. At least Mr. Arthur certainly had, at this moment, just such speed.

But who can venture to assert what her opinion of the chance meeting in that lonely spot was? If you gather any thing from her blush on first perceiving her companion, what are you to gather from the pallor which, the moment after, left her face in such striking contrast with the black velvet cap upon her head, and the black plume which drooped, heavy with rain, down to her cheek? Prompt enough to speak, however:

"All my fault, Mr. Arthur!" she said, gayly. "I have been spending a few days with Anne Wright, an old school-fellow. I determined to ride home this morning, come what might. Anne told me it would rain, but I thought pony would get me home first. Mr. Wright is in Somerville; the hands were off in the fields with the horses, so I had to come alone. I deserve it for starting. But I will have my way, mamma says. How came you here?"

Mr. Arthur has but a disjointed reply to make. Disjointed, because he has no reason for having ridden there at all. And because she is so beautiful—ah! how beautiful! He has not seen her, to converse with her, for many weeks now; and she has changed so! It is all in the sex. Boys do not change so. The youth of eighteen is very much the individual he was at sixteen, only taller—so coming out of any chrysalis with him.

But how is Alice Bowles. When Edward Arthur removed to Mrs. Sorel's Alice was but a girl—a lovely girl, but only a girl, although Mr. Neely used in the habit of visiting her so often. But to-day Alice Bowles alights from her pony in the old gin a woman. Her face is full, and her ruddy lip, and clear eye, and gentle yet firm expression, is that of a woman—no longer a girl. She always bore herself in that erect and imperial manner—a something about the white brow as if made for a crown—a bend about the neck as of Marie Antoinette among the sous-couverts. Before, it was a manner that went and came with her varying moods; but to-day it is herself. It may be the plumed riding-cap she wears; it may be her long riding-dress, which brought up vague memories of grand ladies in their trains at court; it may be it was in the excitement of her rapid ride causing her face to glow so; it may be the contrast between the young beauty and the littered earth on which she stood and the dissipation around her; or maybe it was her sudden advent through the dreary morning, and upon him in a mood as dreary; but, whatever was the reason, she came upon him there very little else to him than an angel from heaven. Had he not loved her at first sight, years ago, when she was only the bud of what had now opened into the perfect rose?

There was one advantage he had over her. He had not come upon her in her retreat there, in the out-of-the-way old gin, but she had come upon him; and, somehow, from the first he had yielded to her the burden of the conversation. His first look as he met her had said so much that he felt, and she felt, he had little more to add. Ah! how she talked, in order to keep from bearing or saying any thing!—cutting with her riding-whip at the shreds of cotton on the ground, shaking the drops of rain from her riding-skirt, smoothing her already smooth hair on each side of her brow.

"And oh, Mr. Arthur, I nearly forgot. What is the news?" she suddenly asked, after all other topics were exhausted. "Anne and I could hear the noise all the way to Mr. Wright's. What great and glorious something has happened this time?" And she entered on the topic with a sense of indefinite pain, and yet of indefinite pleasure too.

Mr. Arthur related the contents of the dispatches. Quite accurately, too, which was a wonder in those days. As a general rule it was a thing impossible, quite impossible, to do then. A man might try to tell his eager neighbor the contents of the last dispatch the moment he laid it down, but he never could repeat it accurately. If he was a Union man his version was far more unfavorable to the Confederacy than at least the printed lines warranted. If he was a Secessionist the news he repeated from the paper was much more encouraging for the Confederacy than even the largest capitals of the sheet just in his hands would justify.

"I need not ask your opinion of the news," said his companion, more thoughtfully. "I presume you will say of it, as you did of the news from Slidell—it is partly true and partly false. And you were right. But it is a pity one can not believe the whole of a matter from the first, and with all the heart. One could enjoy one's self so!"

"You have no apprehension about your brother—?"

"Oh no!" interrupted his companion. "Did not mamma show you—ah! I forgot at the moment that you do not live with us now. No; mamma received a letter from him only ten days ago. He is in Charleston—under arrest, I am sorry to say. There was some Mississippi or Georgian put over him in rank. Very foolishly he neglected to obey some order, something of the kind; I do not exactly understand it. At any rate, Rutledge—Rutledge Bowles, as mamma always persists in calling him—is under arrest in Charleston. Since Rutledge can not bring himself to comply with the wishes of his superior, it is a great pity they can not make it a rule to comply with his. At least mamma almost says so," added Alice, with a good deal of demure frown at the corner of her rosy mouth.

Her eyes being intent on the particular shred of cotton she was switching at with her riding-whip upon the ground, Mr. Arthur had an opportunity of looking at her. Poor young fellow! she was so beautiful; so full of life and grace! And Secession has put them so far apart—not as the East is from the West; that similitude is obsolete in these days—but as far apart from each other as the North is from the South.

"You know I have never seen your brother," said her companion, seeing at the moment with great satisfaction that the rain was beginning to fall heavier than ever. "But is there not—?" and in his half-hesitation Alice hastened to furnish the question for him.

"A strong resemblance between Rutledge and myself? In character, yes, I dare say there is. We are both of us altogether too impatient of control—too much in the habit of having our own way. It is a dreadful defect of character, Mr. Arthur," she said, looking up only for an instant at him, and then resuming her chattering, though it was at least "an inch" of "a king," of the unfortunate piece of cotton; "but I do not see how either Rutledge or myself are to blame for it. We inherited it from our father, who was celebrated for his fixedness—if there is such a word—of opinion; and we have been trained to it from our cradles. If he had only lived it would have been far better for us both; but you know how indulgent mamma is."

"I for one would not live any otherwise than as you are for the world," Mr. Arthur said, emphatically—only it was to himself, not a syllable of it reaching his lips. And yet she knew as well, in the silence which followed her remark, that he was saying just that as if he had said it aloud.

"Only to think," she hastily added, therefore, "of the thousands of brave men that must have been killed; that is, if there really was any fighting at all in Virginia."

"And of the many thousands that are yet to die in hospital and upon battle-field before this war is over," added her companion. "We read of Roncevalles and Fontenoy, and the gallant knights dying at Chevy Chase, and all. Yet the simple truth is, old Froissart, whom you remember we read together last summer, tells of no brave gentlemen nobler or braver in every sense of the word than our Southern soldiers. Chivalry boasts of nothing which the South is not equalling every day, and every hour of the day."

"But we of the South deserve and wear the name of Chivalry, Mr. Arthur, only too well," said Alice, after a pause. "I wish I could not think of it as I do; but, somehow or other, we seem to be as antiquated as Chivalry is, too. As to the nobleness, generosity, courtesy, and valor of our armies, I suppose all the world is agreed; but, with all that, I can not help having a vague but painful sense that we are classed by Europe with Spain, behind the age. If one half of the feeling of the world in regard to us is admiration, the other half of that feeling is pity. I am afraid it is owing to some book or other which I should never have read; or it may be some natural perversity of my character, but it does seem to me as if our armies, gallant as they are, are warring against—what shall I call it?—against Destiny."

It may have been some improper reading, or it may have been the independence of her nature rebelling against whatever happened to be dominant; but it had pained her mother that Alice was not as thoroughly under the rule of the enthusiasm of the day as she desired her to be. Perhaps Mr. Neely had visited her too much—had overdone in his conversation the topic of the hour. Devotedly, too, as she loved her mother, she had known Mrs. Sorel too long not to acknowledge to herself the calm superiority of her sense and judgment to the mere impulse of her mother, beautiful as that impulse was—not that Mrs. Sorel had conversed with her on the great question of the day. At least not for months now had she heard a word from her lips upon the merits of the quarrel. In truth, very rarely indeed in those days were the families thrown together. Mrs. Sorel had always spoken frankly on the subject when she spoke at all, and Mrs. Bowles was as decided in her feelings on the subject as Mrs. Sorel was in her convictions. Feeling vs. Conviction—that was the case at issue.

"If you will permit me, Miss Alice," said her companion, "I may be able to explain you to yourself. If you had read and thought as little upon the whole question now convulsing the country as the mass of those around you—I mean upon both sides of it—I dare say you would think and feel exactly as they do. Or if, notwithstanding all your thought and reading, your character admitted of your forgetting every thing of the kind, and giving yourself up blindly to the popular emotion, whatever it was, then, too, you would feel and think, as, for instance, your friend Miss Anne Wright does. I do not mean to flatter you, Miss Alice, but I can not say what I wish to say without seeming to do so," he added, knotting the lash of his riding-whip industriously as he spoke.

"I only wish I was as happy as Anne in her whole-heartedness upon the subject," said Alice. "How she does abuse the Yankees! I do believe she thinks if the Yankees succeed they will actually make her go to the wash-tub for them, enslave her, make a house-maid or a field hand of her. I'd like to see them come cavorting around me, her father says. Anne says she'll die first. I would certainly hate to eat any dish of her preparing, if I was Mrs. Lincoln, or whoever her future mistress is to be; it would be far from wholesome, I was telling her so last night," said Alice, with a laugh. "But, then, there is my dear, dear mother," she added, with sudden gravity.

"Will you forgive me, Miss Alice?" said her companion. "My admiration and affection for your mother are second only to your own, and I venture to say only this," he continued, gravely, although he saw the color rising in her cheek: "if you had been born at the date of your mother's birth you would have felt and thought just as she does to-day. It may be your misfortune, but you were born some thirty years after your mother. There has been a vast change in the very fashions worn since then. Look at your mother's miniature, taken when she was a bride. There is—whether we like it or not—a still greater change in the opinions of men. A person of active intellect—one who reads, thinks, arrives at independent conclusions—can not be the same in opinion with one born a third of a century before, unless you lived like Robinson Crusoe on a desert island, or unless you lived exclusively in your own section, like the Chinese, or unless you went—"

"Fast asleep, like Rip Van Winkle," interrupted his companion. "Dear me, how it rains! How mamma will scold me for venturing out from Mr. Wright's! You must excuse me, Mr. Arthur; but the plain truth is, I hate to think in these days. I wish I could stop thinking, I'm sure. I would give all I possess for a good drink from the flagon that put Rip Van Winkle asleep!"

"To come out of your cave at last, as he did, and find all the world changed by other hands than your own. Well, perhaps so. And yet if there is indeed a great change for the better to be brought about by human brains and human hands, I confess I would prefer not to live altogether apart from it. I would like—at least in my happiest moments I feel so—to have a hand and a hand in the work. But it is a wearisome thing to think upon so steadily. I never felt it more so than to-day."

Although Alice did not look at her companion she none the less saw the care and pain, even anguish, upon his face. With a woman's quick insight, however, she saw that the anxiety and uncertainty almost which used to—or which she months ago fancied used to—mark the countenance of the young minister, was given place to a twofold expression of confidence and peace; an expression growing from day to day through great suffering into an aspect of certainty and joy. Yet Mr. Neely was true; the handsome man of the two, so fat and rosy, and full of cordial sympathy with the invading South.

"If a person does not agree in sentiment with the people of the South what does he stay here for? Evidently he ought to be with that people in whose opinions he agrees. If I was with the North I would go there, and I would say there." That was Mr. Neely's decided opinion in his last conversation with Alice—or rather in his last conversation with Mrs. Bowles when Alice was present. Mr. Neely did not mention Mr. Arthur's name in that connection; so that he could, of course, have no reference to him; certainly not.

"But suppose, Mr. Neely," Alice had innocently asked, looking up from her sewing—a soldier's shirt it was, one of a dozen made from the cover of her piano, cut up for that purpose as the only material to be had—"suppose you possessed property at the South, valuable property, all the property you owned in the world. I believe it is the certain loss of property in the South for a person to leave as you advise; if you held the sentiments you mention, you would leave, as you say, at the sacrifice of all you possessed?"

"I certainly would, Miss Alice," he replied, enduring her clear look. Perhaps in such a case Mr. Neely would. But perhaps in such a case Mr. Neely would not, also.

"Then if you were now at the North, entertaining the sentiments you do, you would instantly leave the North for the South, giving up all you owned there to do so?" asked Alice. Her beautiful eyes were full upon him. What could he do?

"I would, Miss Alice, I certainly would!" Oh, Mr. Neely! Not to know that you knew, and that she knew, whether you spoke true or not. But, then, the temptation was so great to Mr. Neely the greatest temptation possible in the whole world.

"Suppose, Mr. Neely, though you disapproved of the step taken by the South, and agreed in the course pursued, in consequence of that step, by the North, yet you shrink from engaging in actual war upon your own people, or even from being surrounded by such as were, how then?" Alice had asked.

"These are no days for such nice distinctions, Miss Alice," the school teacher had promptly replied. "As one feels and thinks so should he act. A man must adopt one side or the other, and without a particle of reluctance or shame is doing so. And men will do so whose views are clear. He that is not against us is with us; he that is not with us is against us—plain as the multiplication table, Miss Alice."

Alice really did not know what to reply. But it seemed strange to hear this gentleman from New England speaking so freely of We and Us in connection with Southern affairs. The possessive pronouns in all their inflections were used with painful frequency by the Yankee Secessionists. "Our brave boys!" "The way We are whipping them, too!" "The diabolical designs meditated against Us by the Federals!" and kindred phrases, were more frequent on the lips of men like Mr. Neely from the North than of those who had never been outside the South in their own selves, or in the persons of their ancestors, since Jamestown was settled.

It seemed somewhat of a coincidence, then, with Mr. Neely's previous remarks, that Mr. Arthur should say now, loving Alice as he did, and answering her very thoughts:

"I do not wish to speak of myself. Here in God's providence I am. Not a day, or a moment of the day, that I do not feel how painful a thing it is to differ from public sentiment, especially from the sentiments of those among whom we have lived all our lives, than when there are none in all the world whom we esteem or love more. I have done my very best to become a Secessionist, but I can not. I have done my utmost to believe, at least to hope that, after all, the Confederate Government will be a success and a blessing to the South. For my life I can not think so. I can not get away to Europe, and if I could I would feel very much like Jonah on his way to Tarshish, stern or so stern. No, I am in charge here as a minister of the Gospel. So long as I am permitted to do so, I will continue the duties of my office, obeying faithfully the Scripture directions as to the Government over me. I was, I may almost say, in agonies of mind at first. I am getting used to it. I have within me such a settled sense that I could not have acted otherwise than I have done that I am coming to feel as quiet in mind as a man can be—a kind of solid quiet greater than I ever possessed before. And my experience, though I am not so situated as to have correspondence, or the least intercourse in any way, with one of them, is that of perhaps thousands of my brethren in the ministry at the South, and, in some respects, of hundreds of thousands of the very best men, all Southern men, and destined to do a great work in and for the South yet. But if I knew this hour, Miss Alice, that I was the only Southern man in the whole South entertaining the sentiments I do, I could entertain them not a jot the less for that. It may be my misfortune, it may be my crime, it certainly is my case. As to the future of myself and of my country I am learning to leave the whole in the hands that are managing it, perfectly satisfied in advance as to the result. You must really excuse me, Miss Alice," he added, with a smile. "It is the first time I have spoken to you thus of myself. I assure you it shall be the last time. It has only happened so, you see. You must endure it as one of the accidents of this rainy day."

But Alice did not hear these last words. It was only a few days ago that she had been reading Milton, and why she knew not, but the lines were passing through her mind as she spoke:

"So spoke the simple Abbot, faithful frank Among the fatuous, faithful only he:
Among innumerable false, reserved,
Unspoken, unsaid, uncertainty,
His loyalty he kept, his love, his zeal;
Not number, nor example with him wrought
To swerve from truth, or change his constant mind Through single."

Her head drooped until the plume of her riding-cap almost concealed her face. But, at last, Edward Arthur said nothing to her of himself which she did not know already, and know fully as well as he did himself. She stood still, occupied with the shred of cotton on the ground at her feet. But no longer cutting at it as before, moving it rather hither and thither with the lash of her riding-whip, lovingly, caressingly even, as if it were some living thing which she would not hurt for the world.

"No, but Miss Alice, what I want to know"—Mrs. Warner had said to her in the courtyard where the ladies met to work for the soldiers only the week before, and it was after a long stretch of remark by Mrs. Warner on the one topic—"what I want to know is just this: do you not believe that the Yankees, invading our country, burning our homes, killing our women and children, are worse than the very devils in hell?"

"How should I know, Mrs. Warner?" Alice had replied. "I have never been to the abode of the evil spirits you speak of. I never saw a devil in my life. If I was to come upon a person possessed with one I would keep as far off from—dear me, you must excuse me, I must go and get Mrs. Seel's yonder to give me some more thread."

"I tell you, Dr. Warner," Mrs. Warner remarked to her husband at supper that night, "there is something wrong about that Alice Bowles. Her mother, Mrs. Bowles, such a genuine Southern woman, too. You are their family physician, and sure enough I am your influence on her has not been favorable for the South. You are the plague and misery of my life with your milk-and-water way of thinking and talking, or rather not talking at all upon the subject. How a man of your years, one who reads the papers every day, can be as mild as you are! And, then, knowing my feelings on the subject, hearing every day and hour of your life all I say—I do believe it is just to cross me. Because I am so strong for the South you are exactly the opposite!" Which statement, by-the-by, was not far from the truth. But Dr. Warner only ate his supper with the shower-bath droop about the head, and nothing so endured.

"Alice's father was a staunch Secessionist years ago," mused Mrs. Warner, aloud, striking her tea-spoon against her empty cup. "That is his portrait hanging up in their parlor, grand enough to look at; only it's a pity he couldn't have left a few more negroes to his wife and children. There's Rutledge Bowles, Mrs. Bowles is so over-lasching talking about. A worthless, drinking, gambling fellow, there in Charleston, if half I've heard about him is true. He'd better be here at home making money for his mother. But he's a good Secessionist, was active in the taking of Fort Sumter there at Charleston. Did Alice ever visit the North?" asked Mrs. Warner, suddenly.

"I believe not," replied her husband. "Because it always has the worst effect on Southern people. Spending the summer at the North? I reckon that old cry is over. I never was out of the South! And a far better Southern man you would be, Dr. Warner, if you had never spent that time in Philadelphia, attending medical lectures. If I only had my way," said Mrs. Warner, for the three thousandth time, "no Southern citizen should ever visit the North on any pretext. Nor Europe either, for that matter; they are just as rank Abolitionists there as at the North. Won't recognize us on account of Slavery, Taney said there in his speech in New Orleans! Yea, if I had my way I'd build a wall a hundred feet high all round the South, in real earnest; nobody should go out and nobody should come in. To think how they used to flood the country with their books and papers and peddlers and things! Hang them!"

"I am sure Alice has taken an active part," began the Doctor. "Presenting that flag? Sewing, and singing at concerts for the soldiers, and all that?" interrupted his wife. "There's something wrong for all that. I began to think so that day she opposed having a lottery for the assistance of that regiment. It was against the rules of religion, she said, and there is a law of the State—wonder how she came to know that?—expressly prohibiting it. As if any body would dare enforce such a law these days. And as if Brother Barker himself did not go in for it, and have the meeting to arrange for it in the very church. But, opposed or not, we had it any how. No, I know exactly how it is," said Mrs. Warner, in a lower and more intense tone, peering at her husband under mysterious eyebrows, and shaking the tea-spoon at him like the rhymer of a magician. "It is Mr. Arthur! Haven't I got eyes? Never tell me! And he living there for years, now; helping her in her studies, and all that stuff. He's gone to live at Mrs. Seel's, I know. He doesn't visit at Mrs. Bowles hardly at all. I met their boy Charles on the street and asked him only the other day. I know they ain't engaged, for I asked Mr. Arthur himself when he was here last. But there's something wrong in Alice's mind about Secession, and it came there just in that way, you mark my words. And how people—you among them—will continue to go and hear him preach these days is more than I can understand. For my part I'd just as soon—"

But we have no disposition to share in Dr. Warner's martyrdom.

A very smart woman was Mrs. Warner. Long and unwearying investigations into the affairs of others had given her a remarkable power of insight. Who will deny all of her reasonings in this matter? The being a Union man involved, at that period of the war, in general estimation, the being either a fool or a knave. Now Alice could not believe that Mr. Arthur was either, so that her faith in the desperate depravity of Unionism may have thereby been shaken. And there was Mrs. Seel too, such an old friend, one whom she had so long loved and esteemed, a South Carolinian too; her sentiments were all against Secession. It only happened so, you see. But was ever fly entangled in a web so terrible? It was Spenser's ever old and forever new Song of the Fair Una traveling through the wilderness. Ah, how dark and brambly the way! Consider this Southern girl—for here is but one case of how many thousands of her sex: born on the bosom of the old era, tended by it from birth with its ten thousand tenderest touches; all the deep aversion of early and life-long prejudice repelling her from the bringers-on of the new era; all the warmest sympathies natural to the bosom with soil invaded, kindred slain, valor struggling against overwhelming odds: add to this the ever-present force of an almost universal enthusiasm. And the new era dawning over her, with skies so dim and with hints so vague of its coming clearness. Happy are those whose lot is in the centre, say, of one era—Luther's parents, let us instance. Happier still those who live in the centre of the era which follows—those possessed of a perfected Protestantism, we will say. But the transition period between the two eras—how stormy and full of all perplexity! In every transition period the perplexity lies not without only—it is within one's own bosom that the shadow is darkest, its strife bitterest. Easy enough to do the right when a sincere soul but knows the right—the agony is to know with sufficient clearness what is the right.

If one dare plagiarize from Brother Barker his mode of finding the times in prophecy, we might be tempted as we read to let finger and eye linger upon this prophecy as bearing upon the days of Secession: "It shall come to pass in that day that the light shall not be clear nor dark; but it shall be one day which shall be known to the Lord, not day nor night: but it shall come to pass that at evening time it shall be light." Only look in Brother Barker's little black Bible. You will find the margin of the two verses immediately before this passage is all worn away. Brother Barker, standing in the pulpit a hundred times during Secession, has kept the fore-finger of his left hand pressed just there, holding on like an anchor to the passage, while all the rest of his body swung about wildly in a tempest of declamation, proving that therein Secession and its glories were set forth with a distinctness which left only the inference of judicial blindness upon those who could not see it. Let us do the brother justice; only recognize the fact that the passage in question does refer to Secession, and it is striking, very striking indeed. However, Brother Barker never put our interpretation upon—if you have curiosity to look them up—those sixth and seventh verses of the fourteenth Zechariah—the reverse, in fact.

The rain is falling less and less heavily upon the leaky roof of the old gin-house, if the parties within only knew it. Twenty times has the young minister said to himself, "No, Sir, no; this is neither the time nor the place." But there is something about the drooped head and the hue upon the cheek, even in the motion of the gloved hand holding the riding-whip, as it toys with the shred of cotton on the dust, that emboldens him. He has been speaking out his soul, his heart; and how soft and affecting are the tones of the voice when one does so! "And, next to the approval of my own conscience, do I desire your approval," he is beginning to say, when Alice raises herself and looks across the old field plashy with water. She has heard nothing, but a woman's instinct of approaching danger is strong upon her. And at last she sees only a man on horseback hundreds of yards away riding slowly toward them. It is strange how swift the sex is in its reasonings and conclusions.

In the instant of seeing the approaching horseman she says, and she says it hurriedly:

"May I ask it as a special favor, Mr. Arthur, that you will mount your horse and leave me? You see the rain is over. Excuse me, but please do." How earnest she is!

Mr. Arthur hears, with sense of pleasure at the tones, but with surprise at the request.

"I know you will excuse me and comply with my request if you only know why I ask it," she said, still more hurriedly, her eyes upon the horseman, her gloved hand resting upon his arm.

"Really, Miss Alice," her companion began—"Oblige me this once," she continued, in tones of entreaty and apprehension. "Yonder is Mr. Wright. You know his character and sentiments. I have a fear that he may be intoxicated."

"You must excuse me, Miss Alice," interrupted Edward Arthur, gravely and coldly. "I understand your apprehension, but I can not do as you wish." And a flush almost of anger mounted to his temples.

It was too late. Alice basied herself with her pony, leading him in front of her companion, who assisted her to mount.

"Why, good-morning to you, Mr. Wright," said Alice to the horseman, who had now reached them, in tones of gawpy singularity in contrast with those she had just used. "I will be glad of your secret back to your house. I would start this morning for home in spite of all Anne could do. But I have got wet; do let us make haste; the rain is over." And she lifted her reins, gathered in her hand as if to start, keeping herself, however, still between Mr. Arthur and the person she addressed.

With an "Excuse me, Miss Alice!" Edward Arthur struck her pony a slight blow with his riding-whip, and Mr. Wright, who had reined in his horse with drunken dignity, sat staring at him face to face.

Alonso Wright. As refined and agreeable a gentleman as you could meet with any where when sober. When drunk, a devil incarnate. Long ago had he killed his first man. It was when he was intoxicated, and because he fancied at the time the individual in question, a merry youth of sixteen—Jim Hartley—was looking impudently at him. Very rarely had he got drunk since then. But when he did become intoxicated the passion for killing some one again came upon him as a mania, as part and parcel of his drunkenness. It all took place before Mr. Wright removed to his present home; in fact he had come hither on that account; but, unless rumor lied more even than it usually does, if Jim Hartley was the first he was by no means the last man Mr. Wright had killed. Every body knew Alonso Wright; and when drunk here on his throne had not courtiers more abject. That is, such of them as did not fly the spot. Shunned as his house was by almost every one except an unselect few, it was on that very account that Alice had felt specially drawn to poor Anne Wright, her school-fellow, and hence her visit to her.

As Alice anticipated, Mr. Wright was drunk, very drunk. How could it have been otherwise in Somerville last night after the arrival of such news? There had been a military prohibition on the sale of liquor in the place for several weeks now; but the authorities themselves "raised," as they styled it, "the blockade on whisky" to celebrate the glorious victory over McClellan. Men who never drank before got drunk in Somerville last night. Men whose whisky had been cut off for the months past drank last night in Somerville with the frenzy of long abstinence. Even Lamson was shocked at the state of Somerville last night, Tim Lamson, his nephew, wallowing and vomiting on his office floor in the experience of his first "regular spree." And Mr. Wright, having an entire grocery abandoned to him during all last night, had so far killed no one. He was riding home with an unsatisfied craving in his heart, his loaded revolver ready for any emergency that might arise. Vague wrath slumbered in his bosom against whatever negro might come out to hold his horse as he should dismount at his gate. Not a negro on the place, however, but will find pressing business on the remotest part of the plantation when it is known that "Mass Lenny is comin'."

Such is Alonso Wright, a slight-built, sandy-haired, pale-faced man, who now sits on his horse gazing upon the young minister, of whose presence he was not aware until Alice and her pony had moved from between them.

It all takes place as in a second of time.

"And who are you?" Mr. Wright says, with a sudden half-closing of his eyes and an oath.

Edward Arthur knows perfectly well who and what Alonso Wright is. More than once has he been received with the most gentlemanly courtesy by Mr. Wright in visiting there. But that was months ago. Besides, it was under Mr. Wright's own roof, and drunk as he is, were it under that roof he was now meeting Mr. Arthur, he would have treated him as a gentleman and a guest. But they are not in Mr. Wright's house; Mr. Wright is drunk, and this Mr. Arthur is strongly suspected of being a Union man. Nothing more absorbed by Mr. Wright even when sober than that.

"My name is Edward Arthur," replies that gentleman; but his manner is stern from his knowledge of the questioner and of what may follow.

"A preacher and an Abolitionist," says Mr. Wright, with a volley of oaths.

Mr. Arthur has nothing to reply, but has turned to the post at which his horse is tied, and is slowly unfastening him to return home.

"And now you are going to run, are you? what you Yankees always do. Hold on!" exclaims Mr. Wright, in a tone such as only men like those of his class can use. "Get out of the way!" he adds, with a cut of his whip across the head of Alice's pony, which she is endeavoring to ride between them. He hears not a word Alice says—is not aware of her existence. His eyes, almost shut, are fastened upon his prey.

"Look here," he adds, slowly, drawing his revolver from his girdle as he speaks, "I've got one boy away in the army fighting the Yankees. Ten to one he was killed in that last fight at Richmond. If there is any thing in this world I would like to do this morning is to kill an Abolitionist. Now, you say 'Hurry on, hurry on, David!' or 'Hurry on, hurry on, David!'"

Knowing his man, hearing that indescribable tone of his voice, Edward Arthur had no doubt that he meant what he said.

"Do, Mr. Arthur, for my sake, my sake, my sake," Alice keeps on repeating, still endeavoring to force her pony between them. But pony fears Mr. Wright's whip and Alice's cut.

Unarmed, no chance of springing upon him before he can shoot, there is no alternative.

"Fire when you please, I will die first!" he replies, as pale, as cold, as rigid as a statue.

There is the sharp crack of a revolver, with Alice's shriek on the air. It may have been that Mr. Wright has been drunk too long, or that there was an extra quantity of strychnine in the whisky of last night; for the genuine liquor is running very low in these days of the blockade—but the bullet sings by Mr. Arthur's left ear, and he stands erect and unhurt. And next, what? He thinks of springing upon the desperado, but he knows there are five more charges in his weapon! Mr. Wright curses his nerves and again presents his weapon.

"One more chance, Abolitionist," he says, "Hurray for Jeff Davis and the Confederacy—out with it!"

The young minister has no reply at all to make this time. Pale, cold, rigid he fastens his eye, glittering like ice, upon that of Mr. Wright. No attention at all does that individual pay to Alice, who has leaped from her pony and stands at his side pulling with both hands at his coat, weeping and entreating. He keeps his weapon leveled at the forehead of his intended victim, his finger on the trigger full a minute.

There is neither flinching of muscle nor quailing of eye there. The desperado slowly lowers his weapon. "Well!" he exclaims, with an oath, "you are as brave as a man can be. I'll do you that justice if you are an Abolitionist. I could not kill even old Lincoln himself if he was looking me as straight in the eyes. We'll cry quits if you say so;" and he rose in his stirrup to replace his weapon comfortably in its sheath at his waist.

"No, Sir," said Mr. Arthur, sternly. "I am not a specially brave man that I am aware of. But it happens to me just now that I am not particularly in love with this world, and I am, I trust, prepared for the other. Besides, I am not in your hands or in those of any other man; now, as always, I am in the hands only of God."

"It looked very much as if God had turned you over to me just now; one touch of my finger on that trigger and you would have been in the other world sure enough. However, we won't quarrel about it. Ah, this is you, Miss Alice," he continued, "is it? You must really pardon me any rudeness. But we do not capture a McClellan and his entire army every day"—the ruffian instantly lost now in the polished gentleman. "Shall we ride? Anne will be glad to see you."

"Thank you, Mr. Wright," said Alice, who was by this time seated again on her pony. "I believe I will ride on home; Mr. Arthur will be kind enough to escort me. Good-morning," and the two rode slowly off, leaving Mr. Wright carefully buttoning up his waistcoat to protect his cherished weapon from the damp, hesitating but what he ought to use it yet. And long sits Mr. Wright upon his horse, looking after them as they ride away, doubtful in reference to the course he has pursued in failing to kill some one, especially the chance, in his very hands, too, of having neglected to kill a Union man! Dissatisfied Alonso Wright is with the event and with himself. Stop! Ten to one some of the hands have been up to something on the place since he left yesterday. Wants to be free, do they? Only one good chance at any one of them—and with appetite quickened by new hope of food, Mr. Wright spurs from under the old gin, and rides rapidly home through the drizzle.

Alice rode along the miry way in silence, weeping and mornth struggling with and neutralizing each other in her bosom. It is remarkable how little these two can find to say to each other under the circumstances all the way to Mrs. Bowles's front gate in Somerville. Mr. Arthur is almost haughty in his bearing, certainly very cold and quiet. And so, assisting her from her pony, they part, Mr. Arthur declining to enter the house on the plea of neglected studies.

Yet all the way to Mrs. Bowles, and when he parted with Alice at the gate, our clerical friend fancies that his companion sits on her pony with a form more erect, and the morning as of a new purpose breaking on her face. "Only fancy, I dare say," he said to himself as he rode homeward, "only fancy!"

"Proud? For any one to speak of my being proud!" Alice says to herself, as she stands in her room, her hand wandering mechanically about the fastenings of her hat. Unconscious of herself utterly, because so conscious of another, and that other not Mr. Beakel Neely either, immaculate Secessionist though Mr. Neely is! Four years since the writer has seen a copy of Tennyson—not a copy at present in hundreds of miles, from memory let the lines be ventured:

"Love took up the harp of life, struck on all chords with right, Struck the chord of self, which, trembling, passed in quiet out of sight."

CIRCULAR STREET, PEKIN.

Our engraving on page 216 will give the reader some idea of the extraordinary bizarre aspect of the capital of the Celestial Empire. Can any thing be more strange and fantastic to American eyes than this Circular Street of Peking? We can hardly realize the multifariously quaint and grotesque peculiarities of the scene before us. The streets of Peking to an immense extent are composed of shops where the custom every where is to attract attention from your neighbor by hanging out signs of all forms and descriptions, and in every direction, representing the kind of articles, goods, and merchandise sold within, and bearing names and announcements written in the picturesque Chinese characters, yellow and gold, on silk, or stuff, or calico, till the street is more gay than a fleet dressed with flags for a Royal reception; signs, slung gibbet-wise or like strained pennants into the street; or dangling from a flag-staff like a streamer or the French oriflamme; or perched on the top of a mast; together with a thousand other devices of inexhaustible grotesqueness. Add to all this the ceaseless irregularity of the houses of the tent-like houses with curved eaves like a pagoda; then people your quagmires with the strangest race on earth, and you may form an idea of the Quadrant of Peking.

Peking consists of two cities—a northern and a southern.

CIRCULAR STREET, PEKIN, CHINA.—(See Page 110.)

VIEW OF VOLCANIC ERUPTION AT SANTORIN, WITH THE TOWN OF THERA IN THE BACK-GROUND.

VOLCANIC ERUPTION AT SANTORIN.

OUR American Consul at Athens, Mr. CAMFIELD, sends us two photographic views of the extraordinary convulsion which recently took place at Santorin, in the Grecian Archipelago. We give a few extracts from Mr. CAMFIELD'S letter, followed by a detailed description of the marvelous event, translated from a Greek paper:

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

Athens, February 21, 1866.

I send you herewith two photographs of New Kaimeni, taken by the best photographer here, who accompanied the Commission sent by the Government to see the eruption of the submarine volcano, of which the inside coasts of Thera and Santorin form the internal walls of the crater. I also send you a very perfect map made by an officer of the Topographical Engineers, on which are indicated the part of the island sunk and the new elevation.

The view showing the act of eruption was taken from Old Kaimeni, and where you see a smooth sea, along the edge of which this vapor is rising, there has now grown up a little island. The new promontory is a tongue of land running out between two little islets or bays, in the larger of which the little island, and on the smaller the promontory, George I., has sprung up. Beyond the smoke may be seen the town of Thera, about 2½ miles from the eruption, on the island of Santorin.

The other photograph represents the part of the island which is sinking, and the white houses in the water up to the windows show their peculiar style of building, which the Santorines, with their Bosnian neighbors, have succeeded in inventing. The black mass, forming the principal object in the picture, is the new promontory now at rest. The pools in the sinking portion of Kaimeni and the lake of fresh water mentioned in the following description by DROSDALA.

MAP SHOWING THE SCENE OF THE ERUPTION, BETWEEN 100° AND 103° LONGITUDE, AND 36° AND 37° LATITUDE.

This description is a translation of the first observer, J. DROSDALA, published in Greek in the newspapers of Syra. It is interesting as being the production of the only man on the island of Santorin who can read and write.

An ex-minister of the marine, who came from Syra, told me, as the latest news, that heavy shocks of earthquakes had taken place at Santorin, and the whole gulf seemed one mass of smoke. The Government has sent a Commission to investigate the subject. I saw to-day letters from two members who agree in surmising every thing up to this date as merely probable, and give it as their opinion that a new island will rise, bounding forth with magnitude at eruptions of lava streams.

The rock I have seen from these eruptions seems half-way between basalt and lava, is black, and on the fracture presents minute crystals of feldspar.

In the description which follows the reader should bear in mind that a metre nearly corresponds to the English yard, being 89½ inches.

DROSDALA'S ACCOUNT.

To the Neuroch of the Cyclades:

Syros, January 23, 1866.

A remarkable phenomenon has for several days occupied the attention of the inhabitants of Santorin. On the 15th instant a low rumbling sound was heard from time to time in New Kaimeni, and especially at the place called Vliovos, where are the volcanic waters. At the same time stones detached from different parts of the island were constantly falling about. To a number of the 30th cracks could be seen on the walls of buildings, as also in the ground and the newly erected quay. Toward noon the mudblaze begin to be more frequent, till they sounded like successive discharges of artillery. In the little harbor of Valance the sea was violently agitated, and an immense volume of white foam rose incessantly from the depths. At the same time we could see on its surface and on its borders white vapors giving an odor of sulphur. The afternoon of the same day the boiling of the sea increased, and the ground on the beach commenced gradually to sink down. The morning of the 20th, about five o'clock, a mass, forming a conical pile of 15 to 25 square metres at the base and from 4 to 5 in height, was seen on the sea. After an hour they entirely disappeared. We then went upon the spot with the sub-professors and some others to make a reconnaissance of the phenomenon. We then saw that the whole southwestern part of New Kaimosi was shattered in places. A chasm, commencing at the western shore near the port of St. George and directing itself toward the east, divided in two equal portions the originally formed hill and almost the entire island. Other numberless rents, some running from east to west, others from north to south, separated into a number of parts the ground of the whole southwestern portion of the island. This land, which is formed out of layers of earth but of an accumulation of volcanic stones and sand, or rather of the powder of basaltic rocks, was always very dry and in no way susceptible of vegetation. We saw here four little lakes of pure water, whose size was slowly increasing; for having measured the largest of all, which had hardly an area of 15 square metres, we saw its waters rise five centimetres within four hours. We advanced toward the focus of the volcanic action and perceived a sulphurous odor like that of rotten eggs. White and effervescent vapors arose from the agitated sea, and from time to time we saw spots appear of greenish color, proving that the vapors which arose were of hydro-sulphurous and hydro-phosphoric nature. The ground was constantly shaken, though it subsided very slowly, directing itself toward the interior of the port in question. This depression of the ground was much more perceptible toward the western portion than the eastern; this last showed a depression of hardly three metres, while the western portion had sunk more than six metres. This subsidence, as I have said, took place incessantly and gradually; for having measured the surface of the water at the moment of our arrival and that of our departure, we saw that in the space of four hours the soil of the western portion had sunk sixty centimetres (about three-fifths of a yard).

ERUPTION AT SANTORIN.—VIEW SHOWING THE SUNKEN PORTION OF NEW KAIMENI IN THE FORE-GROUND, AND BEYOND THE NEW PROMONTORY OF GEORGE I.

AN APRIL FOOL.

The sea was agitated and red, like water containing a great quantity of argillaceous mud. Its temperature was that of the soil of the sea, but it tasted bitter, and when taken up in a transparent vessel appeared turbid. The effervescence was very great, and bubbles came from the abundant springs containing sulphuric acid, which expired with force from its depths, accompanied with much noise from the gases escaping with violence. About 5 P.M. of the same day we felt at Sanctora a slight shock. The night of the 20th and that the sea around New Kaimosi was milky white on its surface, and as the interior of the little harbor we could see at intervals flames of red color which continued some distance, while in the harbor of St. George a rapid current was formed which prevented the vessels from entering suit, especially against the wind, which blew directly into the entrance of the port. The four lakes formed in the morning were a little larger, and five others containing very clear and sweet water had appeared, while the subsidence of the ground gradually continued, though less rapidly on the shore east of the chasm, where it was estimated at 10 centimetres per hour. All the remaining buildings of the island are now full of cracks; the old rapures have increased and new ones made their appearance, but always on the southeast side of the island, and nowhere beyond the port of St. George. The low rumbling continues, and slight quakings of the soil near Valance continue to take place at intervals. The boiling sea afterward became lakewarm, and its violence was such that it rendered the approach of boats impossible. The odor of sulphur was carried by the wind as far as Sanctora. The gulls and other sea birds, which on the first day had assembled in numerous flocks to feast upon the dead and dying fish which floated on the surface of the gulf, did not appear at all on the 21st.

In the night of the 21st and 22d we saw from time to time flames in the chasm, and principally on the west coast, where in the morning there was seen as proceed without interruption a cloud of white but black smoke. The subsidence of the ground continued with the same violence to-day. The vents, and particularly those south of the conical hill, enlarged sensibly. The water in all the lakes, with the exception of one alone, became red and bitter, and the sea-water of Valance reddish hot, as also the rocks of the neighboring shores, while the boiling and the best transmit themselves beyond the chasm to the west of its western arm, under which appears to be the focus of the volcanic action. The boiling of the sea has extended to almost the entire Gulf of Sanctora. Last night the odor of smoke became more intense, and at three red flames are seen at the centre of volcanic action, and the smoke became thicker and of deeper color. These flames, which occasionally diminished, continued on here and a half, after which they disappeared, and we see in the same place a shield appear, which gradually increases. I am going on the spot to examine these three curious phenomena.

P.S.—N. C., Jan. 23, 11:30 A.M.—The reef has been changed to an island, to which I was unable to approach very closely on account of the temperature and the boiling of the water. I approached, however, on the land side within a distance of ten paces, and could observe all with perfect accuracy. The night is a magnificent one, and the more agreeable since, without the least danger, we can see the boiling gradually increasing. The smoke, although thick, and rising in showers from all parts of the rising island, has neither a disagreeably strong odor nor a very high temperature, and in no way impedes the respiration. There are no flames to be seen, and even the boards of hats destroyed by the subsidence, or belonging to the little vessels long since sunk in that port, and to-day raised with the bottom of the sea, appear attached to the rocks on the surface of the island, preserving themselves in the midst of the smoke without being at all burned. There are no quakings of the ground to be noticed. There is no noise. The storm sea no longer upturns the sea; but the island develops itself quietly in the form of a bubble, from inside to outside, with such rapidity that I can hardly mark with the eye the great increase, although unable to distinguish in what manner the storm sea which are successively added.

Now, as I am writing, I estimate the height of the inlet at from 15 to 20 metres, and its size 25 to 35 metres in length by 8 to 10 in breadth. The subsidence of the neighboring soil appears to-day to have been arrested. The water of the entire Gulf of Sanctora is, as yesterday, colored red and thick. On the shores of New Kaimosi it is lakewarm, while on the spot where the eruption takes place, and on the west of Valance, along its exterior shores, it is in a state of constant effervescence. It is singular that these volcanic phenomena have as yet exercised no influence on the island of Sanctora, except a slight shock, which made itself felt at five o'clock this morning of the 26th instant. The meteorologic condition has never experienced any influence upon these phenomena; for whether calm, or when violent winds were blowing from different points of the compass, or even amidst the rain, they have continued to operate alike.

P.M.—The island has increased to nearly double its former size. It directs itself apparently away from the place where it made its appearance. I do not believe any volcanic eruption has ever shown itself as mild and benevolent toward its beholders. God grant it may remain so until its close!

Jan. 24.—This night the island has continued to form itself with the same tranquillity. Its shores are business, so as to resemble a great heap of burning coals. The smoke which rises is equally business, so that it might well be compared to a comet's tail. Some of the laborers present a phosphoric glass, and from the great sheets at the summit of the conical hill rise at intervals reddish flames.

6 A.M.—The smoke ceases in proportion to the size of the growing island, which is continually progressing, but not with the same rapidity as yesterday. The sinking of the ground appears to have ceased. The waters of the sea are as yesterday—those of the whole gulf colored and troubled. Fortunately the day is fine, and I am going on the spot to examine again from the nearest spot this beautiful and magnificent sight.

IRA HART had been foolish enough, in the first place, to leave his father's pleasant farm on the edge of the village of Brownville, and come to New York City in search of employment. Setting aside the motives which do mostly influence young men to leave farm-life and seek the life of cities—which motives settle the question of folly for a good many young men—it was foolish in our friend Ira to come to a city where labor-seeking young men are "as thick as flies in a molasses cask," and expect to get a recognition of his merits on the strength of his own honesty of purpose. Boys from the country are constantly doing this foolish thing, and constantly repeating it, as Ira was very much inclined to do after three weeks' vain search for employment. The little money he had brought to the city with him was nearly all gone—nevertheless he had lived very quietly in an attic room of Mrs. M'Packer's boarding-house, instead of running up hotel bills.

It was the first of April, and Ira came out of his boarding-house and walked up the street, debating with himself as to what direction his efforts for the day should take; for he was unrelaxing in his endeavors to obtain employment, day after day.

He had not gone three rods before he was aware of being an object of interest to a cluster of juveniles who danced and grinned delightedly in his vicinity. Remembering that it was the first of April, Ira put his hand behind him and quietly removed a slip of white paper from his coat-tail, to which it had been hooked with a bent pin.

"April fool!" sang out the boys; and the inscription on the paper corroborated their view of the case.

A minute later, he saw a poorly-clad young woman pause and stoop over, about to pick up a small package which lay on the sidewalk in front of an unfinished building.

"April fool!" yelled half-a-dozen boys, popping out from behind a pile of bricks, and pointing jeering fingers at the stooping girl.

She drew back her hand as quickly as if it had been burned, and moved away with a flush of confusion on her red, thin face.

Ira went idly up to the package and picked it up, unassuming of the jeers of the urchins, hilarious at the appearance of a fresh victim so quickly after the last. Supposing it to be a paper of soap, Ira was about to empty it into the road of the gutter, when something in its feeling deterred him. It did not feel like soap.

He opened one end of the package, and found that it contained a little red shoe—a lady's shoe—together with some bits of baby embroidery, and a red rattle. Evidently the boys knew nothing of the contents of the package, which some one had accidentally dropped, and which they were none of them brave enough to open on the first of April.

"Whoever tied up these things so neat," said Ira, "tied 'em up because he valued 'em."

He turned the package over, and found on one side some writing, nearly obliterated by the mud and wet.

"I'll take it to the house and dry it," said he, and then, perhaps, I can read the writing."

So he walked back to Mrs. M'Packer's, and descended straightway to the kitchen, knowing there was no fire in the house that mild day except that which burned in the kitchen-range. The cook was gracious, and did not resent the intrusion; indeed she wiped a chair with her apron, and placed it by the range for our friend. Bridget liked a civil word as well as her betters, and Ira was always courteous to servants—a result of his country breeding, perhaps. I am not sure but Ira was more at home in the kitchen than he was in the parlor up stairs, where the boarders sometimes quizzed his rural airs, especially Mr. Strutt, the dandy bachelor of 35, who furnished the waggery for Mrs. M'Packer's establishment by common consent.

The mud being dried, Ira was able to read the inscription on the paper: "J. G. Bandrol, No. — Broad Street, New York City." The package had evidently come through the mail. There was a post-mark dimly visible, and a space where there had been postage-stamps, now washed off.

Ira resolved to take the package at once to its address. That was a part of the city he wanted to "beat up" to-day. He found the owner of the package in the counting-room of a large grocery wholesale house, at the designated number.

Mr. Bandrol took the package with eager hands.

"Where did you find it?"

Ira told him.

"You saw the notice in the Herald this morning, I suppose?"

"No, Sir; I saw no notice."

"What? You didn't see the reward offered? Then how'd you happen to think it worth your while to bring a little mess of stuff like that all this distance? You couldn't expect a reward?"

"I didn't come for any reward, Sir," said Ira, moving away. "But—" he stopped and turned about, "since I am here, I'll just ask you if you've any work for a young man. That's an honest question that I'm asking at every chance I get."

"No; there's no vacancy with us."

"Then I bid you good-day, Sir."

"Hold on!" said Mr. Bandrol. "You'll be looking up the notice and coming back after the reward. You may as well take it now. Here!"

He handed Ira a ten-dollar bill.

"Reward!" said Ira, turning the clean greenback over and over in his hand. "No, Sir," banding back the bill, "I prefer to earn my money."

Mr. Bandrol looked at him with some surprise. A clerk sitting at a tall desk exchanged a wink with a fellow clerk, which said, as plainly as words, "Here's a green one!"

"There!" said Mr. Bandrol, without taking the money, "you better run along. If you don't want it you can give it to the poor. If it's any consolation to you—you seem to be a superstitious young man—I'll just say to you that I wouldn't take a hundred dollars of any man's money for that little mess of rubbish. My wife has nearly cried her eyes out over it less. Go along; give the money to the beggar-woman on the corner if you like."

"Very well, Sir," and Ira left the office.

"John," said Mr. Bandrol to a porter, "call that young man back."

John obeyed.

"Give me your address," said the merchant to Ira; "if I hear of any place for you I'll send you word. What do you want to do?"

"I can keep a set of books, Sir," said Ira, "or I can roll a hogshead or shoulder a barrel. I'm not afraid of work."

Mr. Bandrol handed him a pen, and motioned him to write his address on a slip of paper, which Ira did in a clear round hand. The merchant looked at it, nodded, and put the slip away.

I know very well what nine out of every ten young men—whether city or country boys—would have done if they had had Ira Hart's little piece of good luck; but Ira was a trifle peculiar, you see—and that is the reason why I happen to have a story to tell. If there were not once in a while a green and peculiar young man to relieve the dead level of commonplace young men, I don't know what would become of the story-tellers, I'm sure.

The absurd and extraordinary idea which found a lodgment in this young man's brain, as he stood at the corner of Wall and Broad streets, thinking over his April Fool adventure, was something like this:

"That pale-faced girl who was about to pick up the little package would have picked it up if these boys had not yelled 'April fool' at her, and frightened her away. She would have returned it, and got this money that's now in my pocket. By good rights then the money is hers; and I'll find her and give it to her. I don't know as I ever saw my duty plainer before me in my life."

A regular-built greenhorn this young chap, wasn't he, Charley Eastboy? And now he'll go poking round the neighborhood looking for that girl, like a needle in one of his father's haystacks. Big thing for the first of April, ain't it?

As it happened, however, Ira knew the house in which this girl lived. He had seen her go in or out of the tall tenement building three or four times; and as her manner was uncommonly modest, and she looked so very sad, his interest had been just sufficiently awakened to enable him to recall the place now to his recollection.

But in that building, with its single entrance-door in front, there were perhaps a score of different households—perhaps more than a score; and if he had entered it he knew not which of all these doors to knock at, in order to find this particular young woman. So when he reached the building, as he did along toward noon, he posted himself on the opposite side of the street, and looked up at the dizzy seven stories of brick and window, in the hope that he might catch a glimpse of the face he wanted. If he failed to see her Ira had a dim notion that he would go through the house and rap at every door in it till he found the right one.

While he stood there he became conscious that he was again an object of interest to that same heavy of urchins who had frightened the girl away from the package in the morning. They were, it was plain from their gestures, relating the sportive incident of the morning to a new-comer, an older boy, clearly a boot-black by profession, and a bully among these youngsters. Presently the boot-black sang out, with the peculiar drawl of his tribe:

"Hehah! Who did? Who hollered April fool at her? I'll whack 'em in de snoot for it! Who hollered at her?"

Ira caught this up quickly. He went over to the boys.

"You know that girl who was going to pick up that package this morning just before I picked it up?"

"Yes," said the boot-black; "you bet I know 'er. Didn't she give me some bully soap when I had the fever? I'll whack any feller who hollered at her."

"That's your sort!" said Ira, diplomatically, patting the boy on the shoulder; "but just show me to her door, will you? I've got something for her."

"Well, I don't," said the boy, looking Ira over with a precociously knowing squint, and seeming to hesitate. "Yer a stranger to me, mister. But," he suddenly added, "I guess yer ain't on it, neither—I don't mind! The young lady ain't to home, though."

"She isn't?"

"No. She goes out caseen'day-times, an' stays home nights. Come round 't'night 'bout seven an' I'll be here waitin' for yer."

This conversation took place in the doorway of the tenement building in question; and Mr. Strutt, our hero's fellow-boarder—be of the terrible wretched the participants therein as he passed the corner of the street on his way to dinner.

"I saw you in the doorway of a mansion in an adjoining street to-day, Mr. Hart," said Strutt, at the dinner-table, winking to his friends as much as to say he had a capital thing on the young man from the country now; "had you been calling on some friends or relatives there?"

"What do you mean?" said Ira, blushing violently, as he was fatally prone to do when directly addressed in the presence of all these elegantly conducted ladies and gentlemen at Mrs. M'Packer's.

"I mean the tenement house in — Street, where I saw you a few minutes ago," said Strutt, smiling blandly. "Relatives there?"

"No," said Ira, eating his dinner industriously.

"Ah, only friends?" persisted the tormentor.

"No, there's nobody there I know in particular," said Ira, still blushing deeply.

"Then, Mrs. M'Packer," said Strutt, laying down his knife and fork with much solemnity, and addressing the majestic lady at the head of the table. "I fear we are about to lose a fellow-boarder. I suspect Mr. Hart is looking for apartments elsewhere."

At this surprising acclimation of wit a titter ran round the table at our hero's expense.

"It's none of your business what I was doing there, Mr. Strutt," said Ira, with a sudden energy that drove the blood all out of the dandy bachelor's face with a rush, "but since you've made me blush before all these people when I've really nothing to blush at, I'll tell the whole story."

Whereupon Ira related his April Fool adventure, and how he was going to see the girl to-night, and give her the money that belonged to her.

Mr. Strutt was in ecstasies over this story; it was the most refreshing thing he ever heard, of its kind, really; cucumbers and lettuce and things wouldn't be a circumstance to it; he cracked several brilliant jokes in rapid succession on the subject.

Somehow Mr. Strutt's jokes did not meet with their usual success on this occasion. The majority of the boarders were positively touched with respect for this young man's remarkable verisimilitude; there was an odor of fresh, natural simplicity about it by no means disagreeable.

After tea that evening Ira went around into — Street, and found the little boot-black practicing a darkey breakdown in front of the tall tenement house.

"I told Miss Harvey yer was comin'," said the boy; "an' she sayed praps yer was her brother. 'S that so?"

"No," said Ira, "I'm not her brother," and he thought again of Mr. Strutt's witicism about "relatives."

Ira Hart had never seen poverty like that which met his gaze on being ushered into the room where Miss Harvey lived; together with her invalid mother, as afterward appeared. There is a much lower depth in New York, but he had never seen it. This was bad enough, in all conscience. No carpet on the floor; no curtains to the windows; no picture or ornament, even the cheapest, to relieve the barren aspect of the walls; and all the furniture in the room was a bed, a chair, a table, and a little stove. There was a cupboard which let into the wall, and as the door stood ajar, Ira saw a meagre collection of dishes—half a dozen, perhaps—and cooking utensils. But cleanliness was every where.

The girl had met our hero with a face full of inquiry, and placed the only chair for him, saying in a whisper:

"Please to sit down, Sir, and please don't wake up mother by speaking very loud."

This referred to the thin, white-faced woman who lay asleep on the bed, evidently far gone with consumption.

Ira looked about him with his deepest blush. He felt as if he had no right to look upon this poor girl's dire poverty. It seemed to him almost like looking on her bare feet—a necessary exposure which he had no business to cast his eyes on.

"I—I—didn't know you were so poor," stammered Ira, standing up and tugging at his pocket-book; "here's some money that belongs to you," and he handed her the ten-dollar bill.

"No," said the girl, looking with strange eagerness at the money; "it is some mistake. It does not belong to me."

"Oh, but you don't understand," said Ira. And then he explained what the reader already knows.

"Oh, how can I thank you?" said the girl, taking Ira's hand and pressing it to her lips. "God must have sent you to us. We are in sore need. I keep your gift for mother's sake."

Tears of gratitude filled the girl's blue eyes, and at sight of them Ira's face grew better than ever, so that he had to get out his red silk handkerchief and wipe it repeatedly.

"Can I—can I do any thing else for you?" said he. "I should be glad if I could serve you any way."

The girl looked him in the eyes, and gave him a smile so sweet that it thrilled him through and through.

"I thought you would ask me that question," said she. "I don't know why; but I thought you would. Yes; it is possible you can do that for us which will be more to us than even this money, which is so welcome—so welcome! I will tell you our story in a few words."

So Ira sat down and listened.

"We lived in a little village in the western part of the State—and she named the village—" and had a tolerably comfortable home. My father was a carpenter and joiner—my mother's second husband. He died suddenly about six months ago, leaving us very poor; and, besides, mother's health had declined so fast that she feared for the future. She has a son somewhere in this city—my half-brother. I have never seen him. He left home when I was still a baby. Mother resolved to come down here and find her son. We are perfectly unused to city ways; mother is so innocent of the world that she never realized what a great city this was, and what a place to search in; and of course I know nothing about it. After we got here the appalling truth became apparent. Mother grew worse and worse. We had rented this room and furnished it quite decently; but lately I have had to pawn one thing after another, till this is all we have left. I have earned what I could with my needle, but that is very little. Mother is rapidly sinking, and the future looks very dark unless my half-brother can be found. But I know no more than a child where to look. You are a man, perhaps you could find him."

"I'll try, at any rate," said Ira. "Please to write his name in this little book."

She took the pencil he offered her and wrote as desired. Ira read it, and jumped up out of his chair.

"Gracious!" he cried, but in a suppressed voice; "who'd ha' thought it?"

"What is it?" asked the girl, with flushing face.

"I'll bring him to you this very night," said Ira, putting on his hat and plunging out of the room.

"Wait till I come back; 'twen't be long."

He ran as fast as his legs would carry him around to Mrs. M'Packer's, and rushed into the parlor where a party of the boarders were enjoying a quiet game of whist.

"Ah, here's our April fool!" muttered the irrepressible Mr. Strutt, winking to his friends. "Well, Mr. Hart, have you surrendered the intruding greenback, and what did the girl say? I'll bet the girl gave, Jenkins, she cracked him on the back and sang out, 'Bully for you, country!' Didn't she, Hart?"

J. DUNNELL.

"Well, not exactly," said Ira, forgetting to blush on this occasion. "But she thanked me very heartily on behalf of her sick mother; and she sent word to you, Mr. Strutt, that she'd like to see you."

"Me?" said Strutt, looking up from his cards in astonishment; "you're getting your green worn off fast, Hart. But you can't April-fool me, you know."

"Your mother," said Ira, very solemnly and deliberately, and looking Strutt full in the face, "lies helpless on a bed in that tenement house. Your half-sister, Miss Harvey, is watching over her. Both are suffering in the direst poverty. Will you walk over and see them? If you won't, I invite these ladies and gentlemen to go with me and see Mr. Strutt's relations in his stead."

"Here's some hanged mystery or other!" exclaimed Strutt, pushing back his chair and flinging down his cards; "I'll go and see what it is."

Ira accompanied Mr. Strutt to the door of the room, told Miss Harvey who he was, and then considerably left the three alone.

The result was that the dandy bachelor, who was not at all a bad-hearted fellow, had his mother and sister placed in a situation of comparative comfort the next day.

How this April-fool adventure of Ira's got to Mr. Baudrol's ears in all its details I could easily explain at length if it were worth while. It did get to his ears, at any rate, and a few days after the young man got a note from the Broad Street grocer. This note was placed in Ira's hands by an old gentleman named Gray, also a booster at Mrs. M'Packer's; and it offered our hero a good situation in the counting-room of Baudrol, Van Wyck, and Baudrol, wholesale dealers in groceries, where he is still at work, to the satisfaction of all concerned.

One of the aforesaid concerned, I promise you, is Miss Agnes Harvey; for Ira has continued the acquaintance with this young woman. What will come of it it is impossible to tell. Agnes is certainly a very nice girl.

MY TEMPTATION.

I WAS brought up a weaver, as my father was before me. I was a good hand at my trade, and I worked steadily at it. When about twenty-four years of age I married a girl who was also a weaver. She was quiet, amiable, and industrious, and made me an excellent wife. We soon had a family, but as we were in constant and good work we not only contrived to keep the wolf from the door, but lived in comfort and respectability as well. We worked for many years for the same firm, one of the largest in England, doing our work well, and never during the whole time wronging our employers to the value of an ounce of silk.

When I was about thirty-five years of age the head partner sent for me, saying he wanted to speak to me on a matter of great importance. I, of course, presented myself at the office, and shortly afterward was ushered into his room.

"Come," he said, "we have always been much satisfied with your behavior, and now we are going to advance you. The under-foreman in our receiving-room is going to leave us, and you may have his appointment, if you like. Your wages will be thirty-five shillings a week, and your wife can work for us as before."

You may easily believe I was overjoyed at the offer, which I immediately accepted; and two days afterward I entered on my duties. They were very light, and consisted principally in receiving the work brought home by the weavers, examining it to see that it was properly done, and giving out the bobbins for fresh work. Times were now very flourishing with us, and we earned sufficient to give our children a good education. My employers were perfectly satisfied with me, and I worked on soberly and honestly.

After I had been seven years under-foreman, the foreman one day died suddenly; and I was most anxious to know who was to succeed him, as he had been a very good friend to me, and we had worked on very amicably together. My doubts at last terminated in a very satisfactory manner. The head partner sent for me one morning, and told me the firm were so pleased with my steady behavior that they had determined to offer me the situation of foreman, with a salary of two hundred a year, to be paid quarterly. I was, naturally, delighted at the intelligence, as I considered my fortune as good as made. I thanked the head of the firm most gratefully for his kindness, and assured him that every effort should be made on my part to give him satisfaction.

"Of that I am assured, Mr. C—," he said (it was the first time he had called me "Mister," and I was not a little flattered by it); "you can now enter on your duties as soon as you please."

When, in the evening, I told my wife of our good fortune, she was completely overwhelmed by it, and for some time could hardly realize it; but when I told her that the head partner had called me "Mr. C—," she was even more pleased at that than I had been myself.

"And why should you not be called Mr. C—?" she said. "I am sure you would make as good a gentleman as the best of them."

"Fair and softly, my dear," said I. "Let us first feel our feet, and then we will talk of that afterward."

My duties now were not more severe than formerly, but far more responsible; for I was intrusted with considerable sums of money to pay the workmen. I had also an under-foreman to assist me, who was a sharp, clever fellow; and we got on very well together. Once a week my books were audited by the firm, and I was frequently complimented not only on my exactitude, but also, as I was a good gentleman, on the neat manner in which they were kept.

Although my income was now two hundred a year, it had not increased much in reality, for it had been suggested to me that, now I was in a situation of trust and responsibility, it was hardly just that I should allow my wife to drudge like a common weaver. I, without hesitation, admitted the justice of the remark, but I hardly thought my wife would agree to it; however, I was determined to try her, so I told her when I went home in the evening that I hardly thought it right she should continue at the loom, considering the position in life we were now in. To my great surprise my wife not only made no objection, but positively told me she had already thought so; and she had wished to speak to me on the subject, but did not like, as she was afraid I should think her lazy.

Although my wife had now given up the loom, she was by no means idle. Unlike most weaver's wives, she was an expert needle-woman, and she occupied herself in making the children's dresses. True, she had always done so before, and had had time for the loom as well; but now we were in a more genteel position, the children had to be better dressed, and, of course, a good deal more needle-work had to be done; but, as my daughters were now old enough to help their mother, it was no great increase of expense after all.

After I had been a few months in my new position my wife one night said to me, "Our landlord called to-day, and I paid him for the quarter. He talks about increasing our rent. He says you have had the house too cheap for some time past, considering the rate of rents in the neighborhood."

"I shall not pay any more than I do now," I replied, "and it is a shameful thing for him to want it, considering how long I have been his tenant. I would rather look for another house than pay a shilling more than I do at present."

"Well, dear," said my wife, "and I think you are right. Besides, there's another thing strikes me. We are living here with common weavers, and mixing with them, which is not quite right considering the difference in our position. And then the girls are growing up, and they ought to do something better than marry weavers."

I was struck with the justice of my wife's remark, and requested her to look out for another lodging or house, which she promised to do.

The next day when I returned home I found my wife had busied herself in finding a new dwelling for us. She had set her mind on one in the Hoxton Road. It was certainly considerably larger than our own, and much more expensive. We were paying twenty-five pounds a year, and this was forty without taxes. It was, however, far more respectable, my wife said, than the one we were then living in in Fleur de Lis Street, and she had hit upon a plan to make it less expensive than it appeared at first sight. It was to let off the first-floor to some single gentleman who was employed in the city in the daytime, so that in point of fact we should have all the credit for the appearance of the house and not be at any higher rent than we then were.

I complimented my wife on her excellent arrangements; the house was taken, and in a few weeks we were in possession.

But although the rent of the house would not be more than our old one when we had let off the first-floor, and the appearance we should create would be far greater, there was the expense of furnishing to be taken into consideration. This somewhat crippled us for the moment, but my wife said in a short time she would make up the amount by the rent of the rooms.

We found without difficulty a tenant for our first-floor, a young man, clerk in an insurance office. He was a quiet, orderly young fellow enough, paying regularly his rent every week. I now proposed that we should begin economizing the money we had paid for the extra furniture, but my wife objected to do so till later, as she had other expenses to meet at the moment. I inquired what they might be.

"Why, my dear," said my wife, "it is utterly impossible that the girls and I can dress now in the manner we did in Fleur de Lis Street, when we were living among weavers. The people about here are very genteel, and I don't like to dress different from our neighbors. We are now in a good position, and we ought to make a better appearance."

I foolishly admitted her arguments, and we set only out of saving the money for the furniture, but we got somewhat into debt for the purchase of new clothes as well. When my wife had obtained the new dresses for herself and children they certainly looked very well in them, and I was, I admit, very proud of my family; but unfortunately, after the purchase had been made, we did not save the money we had expended on the furniture. We continued to live on quietly enough; but we spent, I am sorry to say, somewhat more than our income, though not to such an extent as to cause us any uneasiness. I, however, was obliged to apply to a loan office for assistance, which I had so difficulty in obtaining; and as I contrived to pay up the interest, the affair gave me very little trouble.

I have told you the commencement of our misfortunes, I will now tell you how our gentility ended. My wife's love of dress increased, and with it our expenditures; but our income remained the same. At last my wife ventured to me that the clerk on the first-floor had begun to show great attention to Charlotte, our eldest daughter, and she had every reason to believe it would end in an offer. His family, she said, were very respectable, and it would be an excellent match; and she considered the best thing we could do would be to get acquainted with them. I told her we must be careful what we did. I had no objection to make the acquaintance of the young fellow's family; but at the same time we must be careful not to increase our expenses, as I had already great difficulty in keeping up the payment of the interest of the money I had borrowed from the loan office.

"My dear," said my wife, "what nonsense you talk! How is it possible we can mix with people in a better position of life than ourselves and spend no more than we do now?"

"How much money should you want?" I inquired.

"I do not exactly know. I must get the girls some new dresses, and we must cut a dash a little."

You know, after all," she said, "that if he marries Charlotte, you will not be at the expense of maintaining her; so, in the long-run, it will be no loss to us."

I gave in to her plan, and I applied at the loan office for more money, but to my great annoyance I experienced this time considerable difficulty. However, I got the money at last, and my wife bought Charlotte some new things; and we got intimate with the clerk's family, who appeared very genteel people, and took to us immensely. We visited at each other's houses occasionally, and at last the young fellow proposed for Charlotte.

Every thing, with the exception of my increasing debts, went on flourishingly. On one occasion we went to a dinner-party at the house of the clerk's grandfather, an old solicitor, for the purpose of introducing Charlotte to him. My wife, as we were preparing to leave home, appeared very nervous, and after fidgeting about for some time, said, "The old gentleman is a very sharp fellow, my dear. Take care you do not let any thing fall that will show that we were at one time only weavers, because he imagines we are far higher folk than you suppose."

"I do not wish to speak about family matters at all," I said; "at any rate, you need not be afraid of me. But what makes you think they believe we are better off than we are?"

"Well, my dear," said my wife, coloring slightly, "I don't know how it occurred, but they all believe you are likely to be taken into the house as a partner."

I was exceedingly angry when I heard this, and I inquired of my wife from what source such an infamous falsehood proceeded?

She replied that she did not know; but implied me so strenuously, and at the same time with so guilty a look on her countenance, that in case it were mentioned I would not contradict it, that I fully perceived it was a piece of boasting of her own. I scolded her severely on the matter, and told her that if it were spoken of, I should certainly contradict it. Fortunately nothing on the subject was mentioned during the evening, and although it was a source of quarrel between me and my wife for some days afterward, the affair at last died away.

We had now to invite the old solicitor and the family to dine with us; but before the day arrived I found my wife had got considerably into debt in the neighborhood, and I was again obliged to apply to the loan office for assistance. The secretary told me they would consider my application, and let me know the result; and in a few days their decision came. It was not only that they refused to advance me any more money, but that when my outstanding bills were due they should certainly press for the full amount.

This news came like a clap of thunder on me. What to do I know not, or where to find the money. To add to my sorrow, six months' rent was owing on the house, and the landlord was pressing for it. However, I shut my eyes to the circumstance for the moment, resolving that, as soon as the dinner-party should be over, I would turn over a new leaf and insist on far greater economy being practiced in the house.

The day arrived for the dinner-party, for which my wife had made great preparations. Before leaving the house I took the opportunity of requesting her to be as moderate in all this as she could, and was on the point of leaving her, when a knock was heard at the door, and a broker's man entered with a distress warrant for the six months' rent. I was perfectly agast when he told me his errand; but I was powerless, I had not twenty shillings in the house, and it wanted a month before my next quarter's salary would be due. I had no alternative but to leave him in possession; and with a heavy heart I proceeded to business.

I got on as I best could till the time arrived when I was accustomed to take my dinner. Being to dine at home that day, I went to a neighboring public house to get my lunch. As I was seated at the table, the gloomy aspect of my affairs came before me, and my eyes filled with tears. Ashamed of my low spirits, and seeing the necessity of my resting myself, I called for a glass of spirits-and-water, although ordinarily a most sober man. As I drank it my courage revived, and I began to think in what way I could retrieve myself. But one way presented itself to my mind, and that was a most rigid retrenchment. This I firmly resolved on practicing, even against any opposition on the part of my wife; but still the disagreeable fact presented itself to my mind, that a broker's man was in possession, and that the same day we were going to give an extravagant dinner-party. Something must be done, but what? To brighten up my thoughts, I called for another glass of spirits-and-water. As I drank it the idea came to my mind that a considerable sum of money was at that moment in my possession, but it was my employers'. Why could I not borrow some without their knowing it? If I could pay out the broker's man I should reduce to a certain extent my credit. To-morrow, I argued, I will sell off every thing and replace the amount. The sale of my furniture would be enough for that, and the payment of the money I owed to the loan office as well. The idea then occurred to me that my wife might oppose me, but I silently and solemnly swore that no persuasions of hers should induce me to alter my determination.

I now returned to the house of business. There was a considerable sum in the till, of which I kept the key—more than one hundred and fifty pounds. I took from it, trembling the while like a leaf, the money I required and not a shilling more, and shortly afterward, pleading a violent headache, I returned home and paid out the broker, to the great joy of my wife.

The dinner-party passed off in a most satisfactory manner, although perhaps it appeared more so to me than it really was from the quantity of wine I was obliged to drink to drown the thought of the action I had committed. The next morning I rose with a severe headache; and my wife was so overcome with her exertions the day before that I left her in bed when I went to business. However, I argued, it mattered but little; the next day would be Sunday, and then I should have ample time and opportunity to express my determination to my wife, for I was fully resolved I would sell every stick of furniture I possessed, and enter some cheap ready-furnished lodgings nearer to the house of business. On the Sunday I told my wife the resolution I had come to, and a terrible scene we had of it. She accused me of gross cruelty and meanness. She told me I might at least have waited till the wedding was over, and then she would have offered no objection. Many times I was on the point of telling her of the desperate action I had committed, for I would not acknowledge to myself it was a dishonest one, although I should have considered it infamous in another. Charlotte at last came to my wife's aid, and her tears quite subdued my courage. As the license for her marriage had already been obtained, I at last gave way; and it was understood between us, that as soon as the marriage came off, which was to take place in a fortnight, my plan would be adopted.

One morning in the next week I received a message from the firm to attend at the City house of business about some alterations in my duties. I immediately suspected there was some change to be made in the manner of paying the weavers, which had already been hinted at once or twice, and that my accounts would be audited on the next Saturday, the last in the month. When I arrived, there was no one in the counting-house, and on the desk was a new blank check-book. The devil prompted me, and I peevishly abstracted from it a blank check and put it in my pocket. When I saw the head partner he received me very coolly, and told me that on the next Saturday my books were to be examined, and a new system was to be adopted. I promised every thing should be in readiness, and left him.

I was now desperate, and I resolved on forging my employers' name to a check for one hundred pounds; but when I took the pen in my hand I lost all courage. Still, I argued, it must be done; and I went to the public house, and after drinking two glasses of gin-and-water I had sufficient nerve to commit the forgery.

But now, how was I to get the check cashed? At last I remembered that my daughter's sailor was to call in the evening, and I resolved to make him my tool. When I arrived at home I again applied to the bottle for courage, and as he was leaving the house I told him I should be obliged to him if he would pay a check cashed for me at the London and County Bank the next day, and bring me the money in the evening. He readily promised to do so, and kept his word; but unfortunately he was personally acquainted with the cashier, and they had some little conversation together on indifferent subjects. To shorten a sad story, the fraud was detected, and I was tried and found guilty. My employers recommended me to retrace my account of my previous good character, and I was sentenced to only three years' imprisonment. My daughter's marriage was of course broken off, and my wife has since died of a broken heart. Some weavers kindly assisted my children, but the youngest were sent to the work-house and my family broken up. I have paid dearly enough for a couple of years' gentility. When I leave here, God only knows what I shall do; my character is gone, and nobody will employ me.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE RAILWAY'S DUE.—A New York railroad man. What part of a building would a proud man be likely to avoid?—A basement.

A person was boasting that he was sprung from a Irish family in Ireland. "Yes," said a by-stander, "I have seen some of the same family so high that their feet could not touch the ground."

Do the ladies like short or tall men the best?—Why, by reason of course.

A little boy in an over good family was rebuked for looking into his spelling-book on a Sunday. Says he: "I don't see why I can't look into the spelling book on Sundays so well as I can the Testament week days."

How and you shall reap." That's so. We sowed our seed on the other day and reaped a lot of harm.

"Take off your hat, man," cried a judge to an Amazon in a riding-dress. "Yes," said a lady, "was the reply. "Then," said his lordship, "I'm not a judge."

THE HEAD AND TAIL OF HIS OFFENSIVENESS.—The best Dublin on dirt in that Stephen is described as a lady's maid, and it is in the service of a lady at Kingstown. This is rather a descent—from a head-centre to a hairdresser.

What room in the house reminds you of a troublesome complaint?—The room attic.

Prize gets before a fall." It frequently gets before a waterfall.

A REAL SCOTCH JOKER.—What's the next wise to Golden Sherry?—Silvery. (Silver—oh?)

THE HEART'S MOURNING.—Eating a meat-pie, and wondering, after a pause, what the contents were composed of.

A POOR.—As a schoolmaster was employed the other day, in Scotland, in his delightful task of teaching a sharp scotch in cipher on the slate, the provisorious pupil put the following question to his instructor: "Whaur din a' the figures gang till when they're rabbit out?"

PROVERBIAL EPICURAM.

Cheerily, that nothing costs, Off goes the way to money; Five are attracted less by far With vinegar than honey.

"Opportunity makes the thief." Not in our case. We found a big anchor and chain cable on the sidewalk the other night, and we didn't touch it; there was nobody about neither.

Why is a boarding-house keep'r who fertilize his table with strong butter like a naval officer who has built his table alongside another in action?—Because he is prepared to repel boarders.

An Irish married mother, being asked if he had composed any thing lately, replied, "My last work was a composition with my children."

Fig. 1.—Children's Hat. Fig. 2.—Crocheted Petticoat for a Child. Fig. 3.—Night-cap. Fig. 4.—Baptismal Cap. Fig. 5.—Hat on Pique. Fig. 6.—Sock for Infant.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR APRIL, 1866.—[See Page 211.]

MARY ANERLEY.

Leaves Mary Anerley, sitting on the stile,
Why do you blush so red, and why so strangely smile?
Somebody has been with you—somebody, I know,
Left that smooch on your cheek, left you smiling so!

Quells Mary Anerley, waiting by the wall, Waiting in the chestnut walk, where the snowy blossoms fall,
Somebody is coming there—somebody, I'm sure, Kisses your eyes are full of love, kisses your heart is pure.

Happy Mary Anerley, looking, oh, so fair, There's a ring upon your hand, and there's sprits in your hair!
Somebody is with you now—somebody, I see,
Looks into your trusting face very tenderly!

Quits Mary Anerley, sitting by the shore,
Her face as your knee, roses round the door—
Somebody is coming home! Somebody, I know,
Made you sorry when he said: are you sorry now?

PARIS FASHIONS.

COIFFURE CLOTTÉE.

This head-dress consists of two velvet ribbons, embroidered with clear, white glass beads, and a border of black lace, representing a Grecian pattern, about a quarter of a yard long. The ribbons are supported by a half-circle foundation of wire covered with black silk.

The black lace is slightly gathered, falling over the head, and is ornamented with steel pendants in the star form.

The two pieces of lace are united on each side, and are fastened upon a foundation of about half an inch wide, forming two bands, each half a yard in length. Upon one side is a bow of black velvet ribbon about an inch wide, and a bunch of mixed flowers. The ends of the black velvet ribbon are fastened under the chignon by an elastic cord.

CROCHET PETTICOAT.

(For a child from two to four years old.)

This petticoat is wrought in finesse crochet; the centre of scarlet worsted, and the border of black in design à la grecque. The petticoat is commenced on the border by making a chain of 173 stitches of black worsted. The first three rows are made in the undulating crochet stitch, which is a variety of the finesse, differing only in the manner of taking up the stitch.

From the fourth to the eleventh row the finesse crochet stitch is used with black worsted. The next three rows are done in the undulating crochet.
Then the scarlet worsted is taken for the centre of the petticoat, and eleven rows are made in the ordinary finesse crochet. The narrowing is commenced in the second stitch of the twelfth row by uniting two stitches, and in the following row counting these two as one. The narrowing is repeated seven times in each row at intervals of seven stitches, and is continued in the same manner every third row—that is, in the fifteenth, eighteenth, twenty-first, twenty-fourth, and twenty-sixth. After the twenty-seventh row, which is the termination of the petticoat, a row of plain stitches is made, and the two opposite sides are sewed together, leaving a space of about four inches.
As a finish to the border a row of scallops is made in scarlet worsted, each scallop being composed of two plain stitches separated by two fancy ones.

GEORGE PEABODY.

NIGHT-CAP.

Fig. 5 serves as a pattern for this cap, which is composed of a crown and a fore part. The crown is cut to a point indicated in the model, and is garnered and sewed to the fore part, which is only a straight band about an inch wide and two-thirds of a yard long, sewed together in the middle to form a point. On each side, about four inches from the middle behind, is a large eyelet hole for a string to pass through.

The gathering of the crown comes altogether behind. The cap strings, which are about an-inch wide at first, but increase in width, are trimmed at the ends with a bit of lace. A trimming of fine muslin covers the front, composed of two bands lightly gathered in festoons, and stitched on with a band.

RED "EN TOQUE."

Cut out the bb whole, according to Fig. 5. Trim with loops or edging on the parts indicated in the pattern. Put on a button, and work a button-hole, as in the pattern, and fasten on each point on the shoulder a bow of ribbon about four inches long.

SOCK FOR INFANT OF SIX MONTHS.

This sock is made of white fannel, bound and ornamented with cherry ribbon. It is cut from a seamless piece of fannel, with a lining of muslin.

Bind together with ribbons. Sew the two sides together in the middle behind. Proceed in the same manner with the middle of the upper part from the toe upward. Make a bow of ribbon about an inch wide for the top of the shoe.

PEABODY SQUARE, ISLINGTON.

The magnificent bounty of an American merchant has bestowed a quarter of a million sterling equal to one and a quarter millions of dollars, on the poor of London; and the trustees of this fund, since the first installment of £150,000 was placed in their hands, have thought it best employed in the construction of improved dwellings, as described in their lately published report. The sites for the erection of these buildings are variously situated.
Our engraving on page 221 relates to the plot at Islington. This plot measures 47,668 square feet, and cost over $40,000. There are four blocks of buildings, to comprise in all 155 tenements, with ample accommodation for upward of 650 persons.
The whole cost of these buildings, exclusive of the sum paid for the land, will amount, when the accounts shall have been closed, to $158,450.

The entire community at Islington now consists of 674 individuals, of whom 19 are widows, the rest married persons and children.

The buildings consist of four blocks of houses, five stories in height, which are let out in tenements of one, two, and three rooms. Each block will afford accommodation for sixty families, or 240 in the aggregate. The rooms are each of them about 9 feet wide and 12 feet long, and of a suitable height.
The attic of each block is paved with tiles from the Isle of Wight, and is surmounted by a handsome ornamental turret. There is also accommodation for washing and drying, and at each end of the buildings is a cistern 12 feet long, 6 feet wide, and 4 feet deep, capable of containing 1760 gallons of water. Every thing has been done to render the sanitary arrangements complete in every respect.

The principle and organization in each of these extensive structures is the same. Drainage and ventilation have been insured with the utmost possible care; the instant removal of dust and refuse is effected by means of shafts which descend from every corridor to cellars in the basement, whence it is carted away; the passages are all kept clean and lighted with gas without any cost to the tenants; water from cisterns in the roof is distributed by pipes into every tenement, and there are baths free in all. Laundries, with wringing-machines and drying lofts, are at the service of every inmate.

The weekly rent charged for one room is 2s. 6d., or about 62½ cents; for two rooms 4s.; and for three rooms, 6s. As Mr. PEABODY directed by his letter, the sole qualification required for a tenant is "an ascertained condition of life such as brings the individual within the description of the poor of London, combined with moral character and good conduct as a member of society."

GEORGE PEABODY, whose gift to the London poor is the most magnificent ever made by a private person to a public charity, is the leading American banker in London. He is a native of Danvers, Massachusetts, and about 74 years of age. He became a partner in a trading house in Baltimore, and went to England in 1836.

HOUSES FOR THE LONDON POOR—PEABODY SQUARE, ISLINGTON.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Prognostics are being fulfilled. Victims are about to be...

The first-mentioned fact is evident from a glance at the daily monetary quotations. The second is more apparent from an inspection of the general market reports...

The large number of houses in the market, both "for sale" and "to let," the actual decrease of rents, and the other unflattering admission of real estate owners...

The prospect of breathing in clean streets and pure air looks brighter than ever before. True, only a beginning is as yet made; but that is a thorough beginning...

It is said that "there is neither Cattle Market nor slaughter pen in Paris. The great markets are at Poissy, fifteen miles distant, and at Senones, five miles away...

In those markets the greatest attention is paid to decency, cleanliness, and to the comfort of the animals. They are carefully fed and watered, and no undue driving, hauling, or tormenting is permitted...

What a contrast is this Paris system to the unwholesome and infamous practices which among us have been so successfully pursued! We could almost wish that a revolution Napoleon had, long ago, enacted certain laws for New York city.

A superb sleeping-car has recently been constructed, designed to run weekly between this city and Chicago, on the New Jersey Central Railroad. This car, which is valued at about $25,000, is fitted up in the most splendid manner...

An embargo conspires a long list of "Carolines of Humanity," some of which would be quite worthy a place in Danvers's Museum. Among them are:

The husband that says to his wife on a Monday night when she is in bed, "dinner is behindhand, and 'tuck down.'" "My dear, you look tired—let me walk up and down with the baby while you rest!"

The man who is consistent, and goes out to chop kindlings for exercise after having recommended bed-making to his wife as a beautiful method of expending the chest!

The man who is always delighted with the domestic pudding and pie, and don't expect a daily bill of fare like a Parisian French restaurant!

The man who never saw a collar pattern that fits so much better than his ever did!

Of course, there are females as well as masculines "Carolines" in the list; but we think it more appropriate, considering the "sphere of woman," that they should be only on private exhibition!

Some irreverent investigator inquires if the use of the handkerchief is a part of theological training. As an excuse for making this inquiry, he says:

"I notice some ministers take it out of their pockets as they do their sermons, and lay it on the pulpit. Some spread it out lengthwise through the middle of the Bible; some roll it up and tuck it under the Bible; some shake it over their heads; some stretch it in their hands as if they were going to throw it at the audience; and some keep crowding it into their pockets and pulling it out again, with a nervousness, as if they did not know what use to make of their hands. I want once to hear a popular young preacher, and as much as half of his sermon was made up of pocket-handkerchiefs, and the most of the other half was gold watch and bits of poetry."

Ministers seem to be privileged to be eccentric. There is a story told of a certain preacher who wound up his sermon one Sunday with the following sentence: "On account of the warmth of the weather and the ripeness of the berries, and because I've to go to Ardruant in time, I will say no more at this time." And at another time, when he had read his sermon through, he shut the Bible with a clap, remarking, "And now, brethren, I have done."

We have a distinct remembrance of a venerable and worthy minister of New England, who, in his travels, frequently came impudently to the house of a friend. After being seated at the tea-table, he would often say, in the most unbecoming manner possible, "I would like some cold ham-pudding and milk for my supper;" or ask for some other article, equally unlikely to be prepared.

At a recent Fashionable soiree several American ladies appeared without veils. It was remarked of them that, "whereas they formerly resembled in their shape upon umbrellas, they now have a good deal the appearance of closed oars. What they sacrificed in breadth, however, they make up in length, and the trains which they wear are so long that the inconvenience of getting about is quite as great as it was in the days of crinolines." A vast quantity of underclothing is said to be necessary as a substitute for the discarded hoops, which, indeed, were invented to remedy this very inconvenience. Whatever be the mode which is destined to prevail, let us hope that it may be confined within modest bounds. It is more the exaggeration of a fashion than the fashion itself which has hitherto been the subject of complaint and ridicule.

It may be mentioned in this connection that, at a grand reception recently given at the French Academy, a petition was made that the lady guests would dispense with crinolines altogether for that particular evening, the number having in view the accommodation of a larger number of guests with seats; but, sad to relate, very few complied with the request.

It is currently reported that young ladies are now wearing small bells attached to their gloves for evening! reminding one, as they think through the merry dance, of the nursery ditty of the old woman—

"With rings on her fingers and bells on her toes, she shall have music wherever she goes."

What next will female fashion bring?

Somebody, who seems to understand the subject, thus discourses upon the late:

"It is never too late to do right; as, for instance, a gentleman began to study grammar after he had written for the press six years. It is never too late to get married; Naomi, the daughter of Knock, took her first husband at five hundred and eighty. It is never too late to drop any habit; James, the inventor, wrote sixty-five volumes before he could shake off his 'tobacco' habit."

It is sometimes too late to 'pay the question;' a man once did so to a 'charming widow' just as she reached her house after burying her first husband. 'You are too late,' was the reply, 'the clergyman spoke to me at the grave!'

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

March 22: In the Senate, Mr. Morrill reported a joint resolution from the Committee on the District of Columbia, appropriating $25,000 for the relief of destitute negroes in the District, to be expended under the supervision of the chief of the Freedmen's Bureau, which was passed.

March 21: In the House, a bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial business of the Government was passed.

March 20: In the Senate, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 19: In the House, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 18: In the Senate, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 17: In the House, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 16: In the Senate, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 15: In the House, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 14: In the Senate, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 13: In the House, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 12: In the Senate, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 11: In the House, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 10: In the Senate, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 9: In the House, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 8: In the Senate, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 7: In the House, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 6: In the Senate, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 5: In the House, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 4: In the Senate, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

March 3: In the House, the bill making each of the States of Louisiana and California a single judicial district was passed; also the bill authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

—viz., the Villa de Madrid and Elnon—had been successful in finding—and to their cost too—the object of their search in the harbor near Anson, Island of Cuba. The Spanish ships stood in close shore in order to find the druck of water, when they were opened upon by a very heavy battery on shore, armed principally with guns recovered from the lost frigates Ansonia, and one of the Elnon, received one heavy shot below the water-line, which had to be plugged. The two frigates steamed as close in as they dared and opened fire, although at long range, upon the American and British ships; but after two hours' work and expending about seven hundred shot and shell, they halted off, finding that the shore batteries must be first silenced or destroyed before they would be able to get inside at the ships they anchored. The next day the two Spanish ships returned to Valparaiso.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

IRON CASTINGS AND STEAM BOILERS. THE HINKLEY & WILLIAMS WORKS, 418 HARRISON AVENUE, BOSTON.

Are prepared to manufacture common and gun-metal Castings, of from ten pounds to thirty tons weight, made in green sand, dry sand, or loam, as desired; also Flues and Tubular Boilers, and "HINKLEY'S PATENT BOILER," for Locomotive or Stationary Engines, warranted to save a large percentage of fuel over any boiler now in use.

ART NOTICE.

WENDERSOTT, TAYLOR & BROWN'S Fine Miniatures from Life, and copied from other pictures. Sitings made by E. T. KELLY & CO., 77 Broadway. Please examine specimens.

Stammering

CURED BY BATES' PATENT APPLIANCE. For descriptive pamphlet, etc., address Simpson & Co., 277 W. 23d St., N. Y.

C. M. DUNN & CO.

Manager of the most extensive Gift Sale in the world. Immensely successful in nearly 100 cities throughout the country. Offer Greater Inducements than ever before.

250,000 Pieces, Gold and Silver Watches, Articles of Silverware, etc., worth over $1,000,000. All to be sold for $1 each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get.

Splendid List of Articles.

- 10 Grand Piano-Fortes, $800 to $1200
100 Basewood seven-octave Pianos, 400 to 600
250 Gold Hunting-Cased Watches, 75 to 125
250 Ladies' Gold Watches, 40 to 75
1,000 Ladies' and Gents' Silver Watches, 20 to 50
200 First-Class Sewing Machines, 45 to 75
1,000 Cake-Baskets and Ice-Pichers, 15 to 20
1,000 Fine Cutlery and Silver-Flatware, 10 to 20
2,000 Sets Teas, Dessert, and Table-Spoons, 5 to 10
5,000 Sets Tea, Dessert, and Table-Spoons, 5 to 10
2,000 Napkin Rings, per pair, 5 to 10
4,000 Pocket Knives, per pair, 5 to 10
10,000 Gold Pens and Gold-Pointed Holders, 5 to 10
5,000 California Diamond Rings, 5 to 10
1,000 Fancy Enamelled and Steel Rings, 5 to 10
5,000 Vest, Guard, and Neck Chains, 5 to 10
10,000 Magic Spring and Snap Lockets, 5 to 10
5,000 Drinking Cups and Goblets, 5 to 10
10,000 Beautiful Photograph Albums, 5 to 10
175,000 Other Articles of Jewelry, Silverware, etc., 5 to 15

Sealed certificates of the articles are well valued, and sent, regardless of choice, to each purchaser of a Photograph of any prominent percentage—costing 25 cents. The Photographs are very fine, and worth the money. After opening the certificate, it is at your option to send for the article or not. You can not get less than One Dollar's worth; for the lowest article on our list is a beautiful fifty-picture porcelain-bound ivory-ornamented photograph album, worth $5, which may be ordered on any certificate, while you have the possibility of drawing a watch or piano worth from $50 to $1000.

Five photographs, with certificates, and a silver butter-knife as premium, sent for $1; eleven for $2, with a fine napkin-ring; thirty for $5, with a 20-picture album worth $5; sixty-five for $10, with a silver butter-dish or 100-picture album, worth $10; one hundred for $15, with a solid silver full-jeweled hunting-cased watch, worth $10.

Agents wanted every where, and the most liberal inducements ever yet offered to those who will act as such. Send for circulars. Address

C. M. DUNN & CO., Headquarters 120 Nassau Street, New York.

$1. BOOKS. $1.

Dollar Gift Book Sale.

100,000 VOLUMES. Standard Works, Family Bibles, Photograph Albums, &c., WORTH $250,000.

All to be SOLD for ONE DOLLAR each, and a Splendid Gift.

Worth from 50 cents to $100, to be given with each book. No book to be paid for until you know what gift you are to get. The gifts consist of Gold and Silver Watches, Silverware, Sets of Jewelry, Glass-Bottles, Diamond-Rings, Chains, &c., &c.

Plan of Sale. Certificates are prepared, describing each book and naming the gift that will accompany it, with its value. These certificates are placed in sealed envelopes, and well mixed, and sent, regardless of choice, one to each purchaser of a beautiful Card Photograph of any prominent percentage, in itself worth all we charge—25 cents each; or five for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; one hundred, with premium silver hunting watch, for $15.

On opening the envelope you see what your certificate calls for, and it is at your option to send $1, and take the book and gift (or say other book and gift of the same value), or not. You can not get less than one dollar's worth, for there are no blanks; and you may get a Bible or Album, worth $25 to $50, with a gift worth much more.

Agents wanted every where, to whom great inducements are offered. Don't fail to send for circulars. Address

BOWEN & CO., Publishers, 124 West Fifth Street, Cincinnati, Ohio.

J. H. Winslow & Co.

100,000 Watches, Chains, Silver Articles, &c., Worth $500,000! TO BE SOLD AT ONE DOLLAR EACH, WITHOUT REGARD TO VALUE, AND NOT TO BE PAID FOR UNTIL YOU KNOW WHAT YOU ARE TO GET. SPLENDID LIST OF ARTICLES.

- 100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches, $10 to 20
100 Gold Watches, 5 to 10
200 Ladies' Gold Watches, 4 to 8
500 Ladies' and Gents' Silver Watches, 2 to 5
2000 Revolving Cameras, $15 to 25
2000 Drinking-Cups, 7 to 10
5000 Oval and Chased Gold Bracelets, 5 to 10
2000 Vest, Neck, and Guard Chains, 5 to 10
2000 Ladies' California Diamond Rings, 5 to 10
2000 Magic Spring and Snap Lockets, 5 to 10
10000 Gold Pens, Silver-Mounted Holders, 4 to 10
2000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases, 4 to 10
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry, 5 to 10
5000 Tea, Dessert, & Table-Spoons, per doz., 12 to 14
5000 Dessert and Table Forks, per doz., 14 to 16
4000 Pocket Knives, per pair, 5 to 10
2000 Napkin Rings, per pair, 5 to 10
2000 Other Articles, 4 to 10

Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up and mixed; and, when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents; 5 for $1; eleven for $2; 25 for $5; 65 for $10; and 100 for $15.

Agents wanted every where. Great inducements to ladies and gents to act as such. Fall out to send for circular, which gives special terms, full list, and particulars. Address J. H. WINSLOW & CO., 210 Broadway, N. Y. (CORNER BROADWAY 186.)

THE DAYS OF BRASS JEWELRY Are Over.

THE COSMOPOLITAN JEWELERS' ASSOCIATION, Capital, $2,500,000.

Great One-Price Gold Sale.

Sell no Brass or so-called Plated JEWELRY. WARRANT ALL JEWELRY GOLD, OR NO SALE.

Let it be distinctly understood that this is emphatically a GOLD SALE, by an association of manufacturers, on a one-price average system, and that not a single article of brass or plated jewelry is included in the whole immense stock.

250,000 Pieces, Gold and Silver Watches, Diamond Rings, Sets of rich Silverware, Fine Gold Jewelry, Photograph Albums, &c., Worth $2,500,000.

All to be sold for two dollars each, an average price of one-fifth the usual cost, and not to be paid for until you know what you will receive.

INSURE THE TEN DOLLAR WORTH FOR $2.

25¢ THE PROOF.—We guarantee to send any customer, in exchange for the least article they may get for $2, a splendid richly chased or engraved silver Butter-Dish or Caster, fine plate, valued at $10, or a beautiful 20-picture porcelain Photograph Album, valued at $5; and you have a possibility of getting a Fine Gold Watch or Piano.

Send 25 cents for the Golden Envelope, containing valuable receipts and songs; and one of the sealed Certificates, which are well mixed and taken out regardless of choice, will be sent, which will inform you what you can get for $2, from a Butter-Dish or Caster, worth $10, to a Watch or Grand Piano, worth $1000. Also will be sent our circular, containing list of articles and full particulars; also terms to agents, to whom great inducements are offered.

Two for 50 cents, with a beautiful Photograph; 5 for $1, with a silver Napkin-Ring, worth $1; 11 for $2, with a Silver Napkin Ring, worth $2; 17 for $3, with a Silver Fruit Knife, worth $3; 26 for $5, with a Gold Pen, Extension Case, worth $5; 55 for $10, with a Gold Double Locket, worth $10; 100 for $15, with a fine Silver Watch, worth $15; 200 for $20, with a silver Hunting Watch, worth $20.

In all cases, upon receipt of the money, the premiums as above will be sent with the envelope.

Address CALKINS & CO., Managers, Nos. 120 and 171 Broadway, New York.

TO CONSUMPTIVES.—You will get the Recipe for a sure cure for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, and all lung complaints, by sending to D. A. Lee, No. 231 Pearl Street, New York. He sends it free. Write for it. It has cured thousands.

$200 A MONTH made with STENCIL TOOLS. Don't fail to send for a free catalogue containing full particulars. Address S. M. SPENCER, Braintree, Vt.

"ROGUES and Rascals of N. Y." 124 pp. Only 25c. Postpaid by HUNTER & CO., Hialeah, N. H.

LIBRARY DE LOVE, 3 Volumes For 10 cents. W. G. WENTZEL, 225 Broadway, N. Y.

GREAT DISCOVERY.—DR. GRANT'S ELECTRIC OIL is warranted to cure rheumatism, stiffness, frost-bites, piles, and all sores and pains, in from 1 to 2 days. Sold by all druggists, and by DEWAS BARNES & CO., New York. Depot, Philadelphia.

FOREIGN NEWS.

It is stated that the Austrian Minister of Foreign Affairs has been authorized to make a fresh treaty with the Mexican Government for the completion of the Austrian volunteer corps for Maximilian.

The friendly relations between Prussia and Austria continued unimpaired and unobscured. In France nothing of importance was going on except that the Prince Imperial was going over his rounds.

The latest news from the South Pacific brings the report of a naval action between Spain and the South American Allies. The portion of the Spanish squadrons which had been for some time past at sea looking for the Allied fleet

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP,

COMPOSED OF IODIDE POTASSIUM, WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D., Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospital, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Val-untar Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigations of the liberal-minded and scientific to cure which have so parallel at the present day.

RAPIDITY OF CURE. Sufferer: "Your cure was too quick," while others doubt their permission, and think that disease can only be cured by the slow, recuperative process of Nature.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (hereditary) diseases transmitted from Parent to Child.

PARALYSIS. It is so universally admitted that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the various forms of Paralysis, that we need not anticipate that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA. INDIGESTION, WEARINESS, STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, BAD BREATH, CONSTIPATION, HEADACHE.

SCROFULA. STOMA, KING'S BIL, BLANDER SWELLING, ERUPTIONS, VITRIFICATION, SALT RHEUM.

RHEUMATISM. LAMENESS, LUMBAGO, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, GOUT, THE RHEUMATISM.

If there is any disease in which the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a sovereign, it is in Rheumatism and its kindred affections. The most intense pains are almost instantly alleviated, and the most obstinate swellings are reduced. Gout, chronic or vicarious, of twenty or thirty years' standing, have been cured by it.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP Purges the system entirely from all the acids of Bile, restores the food, breaks, and cures the Weak Stomach and indigestion, and restores the use of Calomel to new products. It hardens Spongy Gums, and secures the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin, like ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES.

And all other affections of this kind, which so much disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases, Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Gums, Forehead, or Scalp, no remedy has ever proved so equal.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands unrivaled in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR Are alike to the same disease. Nature and Science have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD Produces healthy men and women; and if the constitution is neglected in youth, disease and early death is the result. Do not delay when the disease is so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured. WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D., Sole Proprietor, NEW YORK.

SOLD BY EVERY DEALER IN MEDICINE IN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

MORGAN & ALLEN, WHOLESALE DRUGGISTS, AGENTS, No. 46 CHEF Street, New York.

SOLE WHOLESALE BY JOHN W. HOLLOWAY & CO., Philadelphia, Pa. CHAS. C. GOSWELL & CO., Boston, Mass. FULLER, FINCH & FULLER, Chicago, Ill. JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio. COLLINS BROTHERS, St. Louis.

FASHIONS FOR 1866. J. W. BRADLEY'S CELEBRATED DUPLEX ELLIPTIC (OR DOUBLE) SPRING SHIRTS

Are universally acknowledged by Ladies throughout the Length and Breadth of the Land. To be the most perfect and agreeable shirt ever invented, the three buttons made of every fabric made being heavier, and twice as durable.

Opinions of the Press. "Bradley's Duplex Elliptic" said every where, is a great favorite among the fashionable people. - N. Y. Express. They are not equalled in elegance, elasticity, durability, comfort, or economy. - N. Y. Herald.

DR. J. STEPHENS & CO.'S PATENT CORNEA RESTORERS, or RESTORERS OF THE EYESIGHT.

The most eminent Physicians, Oculists, Divines, and the most prominent men of our country, recommend the use of the CORNEA RESTORERS, for Presbyopia, or Far or Long Sightedness, or every person who wears spectacles from old age; Dimness of Vision, or Blurred; Overworked Eyes; Asthenopia, or Weak Eyes; Itching, or Watery Eyes; Pain in the Eye-ball; Amara, or Inflammation of the Eye; Photophobia, or Intolerance of Light; Weakness of the Iris and Optic Nerve; Myopia, or Nearsightedness; or Strabismus, or Staring of the Eye; or other eye diseases, or Strabismus, or Staring of the Eye; or other eye diseases, or Strabismus, or Staring of the Eye.

For Sale in all Stores where First-Class Shirts are sold throughout the United States and Elsewhere. Sole Owners of Patent and Exclusive Manufacturers, WEST, BRADLEY & CARY, Warehouse and Office, 97 Chambers, and 79 and 81 Rensselaer Streets, New York.

Restore Your Sight. USE DR. J. STEPHENS & CO.'S PATENT CORNEA RESTORERS, or RESTORERS OF THE EYESIGHT. They will Restore Impaired Sight, and Preserve it to the Latest Period of Life. SPECTACLES RENDERED USELESS.

A Single Box of Brandreth's Pills. Contains more vegetable extractive matter than twenty boxes of any pills in the world besides. Fifty-five Brandreth's Pills are used in their practice to the exclusion of other purgatives. The first letter of their name is yet scarcely appreciated.

FIRST PREMIUM IMPROVED $5 SEWING MACHINE $5. The embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Originally patented May 1, 1851; Improved and patented June 8, 1863. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with chain-stitch attachment, is superior in operation, uses the straight needle and uses with double or single thread of all kinds.

OCCUPATION. At your own home. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Full particulars sent on receipt of two stamps for return postage. Address HOPKINS & BROWN, 641 Broadway, New York.

MOTH AND FRECKLES. Ladies afflicted with Discoloration on the Face, called Moth and Freckles, should use a PREPARATION called MOOTH and FRECKLE EXTERIOR. It is sold by Dr. R. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond Street, New York. Sold by all Druggists.

PEARSON & CO'S CIRCASSIAN HAIR REJUVENATOR. IT WILL POSITIVELY RESTORE GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR. FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS. DEPOT, 200 JAY STREET, BROOKLYN.

JOSEPH II. AND HIS COURT. By L. MUELBACH. FROM THE GERMAN.

BY ADELAIDE DE V. CHAUDRON. COMPLETE IN FOUR VOLUMES, PAPER, $1 50.

The great work, which was published by H. J. Grotzer, Mobile, Alabama, during the time of the Southern Confederacy, and generally received with so much delight and admiration, is now offered to the people, North, East, and West, as well as South. It is still in circulation in the same great form, with a particularly clear and large type, in which it was produced during the War; and by its clearness within the reach of almost every body, to be put side by side with a "Memento Book" of that great historical epoch.

It can be ordered either direct from the publisher, H. J. Grotzer, Mobile, Ala., or from Collins & Brother, No. 15 Leonard St., New York, on receipt of the price ($1 50). It will be mailed free of postage to all the States of the Union except California. A liberal discount is made on the whole. H. J. GROTZER, Mobile, Ala. COLLINS & BROTHER, 15 Leonard St., N. Y.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES. For the Army and Navy, Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to print cards, notices, and all business. Circulars and forms. The best type, Galleys, 10-15. Address: W. DELINGER & CO., 108 Broadway, New York.

Dyspepsia Laughs at Cathartics.

Defies all the old-styled remedies, but succeeds in INSTANTLY CURE. The disease can only be cured by a powerful effect on the stomach and the alimentary organs, and that effect they must be supplied to them by a powerful use of this invincible vegetable tonic. Nothing else will do it.

Pile Remedy.

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE CURE has cured thousands of the worst cases of Piles and Hemorrhoids. It gives immediate relief and effects a permanent cure. Try it freely. It is warranted to cure. For sale by all Druggists. Fifty cents per bottle.

Coughs.

DR. STRICKLAND'S WHELFLEIGH'S COUGH BALM is warranted to cure Coughs, Colds, Whooping Cough, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs. For sale by all Druggists. Fifty cents per bottle.

Fresh Garden and Flower Seeds.

Prepared by Mill, of the choicest seeds. Also Fresh and Grandest of Trees, 10-15. Address: W. DELINGER & CO., 108 Broadway, New York.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO., 801 BROADWAY (at Nicholas Church). Photographic Materials, Store-keeping Goods, WAR VIEWS, SCENERY, GROUPS, &c.

Photograph Albums, great assortment, Copies of Views of New Persons, &c., &c. French English, and American Novelties.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR APRIL, 1866.

TERMS. One Copy for one Year $4 00. An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Five Copies, $20 00, or 6 Copies for $20 00.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $8 00. Circulation 112,000.

The Publishers will accept a limited number of first-class Advertisements for their Magazine, at the following low rates: One Page $25 00. Half Page 12 00. Quarter Page 6 00.

Or $1 50 per line for a line year. Average eight words to a line. HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation nearly 100,000. HARPER'S WEEKLY. TERMS. One Copy for one Year $4 00. One Copy for Three Months 1 00.

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Five Copies, $20 00, or 6 Copies for $20 00. Payment (cash) in advance. The Extra Copies of Harper's Weekly from the commencement will be sent to any part of the U. S. States, free of postage, upon receipt of the price, &c., &c.

Cloth Binding $2 00 per Volume. Half Morocco 1 00. Each Volume contains the Numbers for One Year.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—Our Rates and Full Copy per line for one year, and Two Dollars per line for six months Advertisements, cash in advance. HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

$1000 REWARD. $1000. O'DOR O'DOR. I warrant my Golden O'Dor to give a beautiful set of whiskers or mustaches to grow on the smooth face in from five to eight weeks; or hair restored in from five to eight weeks. Forward by the testimonials of thousands. Price $1. Sent to any address upon receipt of price. Address: Dr. C. S. BRADLEY, P. O. Drawer 6096, Chicago, Ill.

HONESTY IN TROUBLE

FIRST PROFESSIONAL (reads). "One Hundred Dollars Reward, and no Questions Asked."—Hm! Hadn't we better turn that watch?"

Robinson & Ogden, BANKERS, AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES, No. 4 Broad St., New York.

Robinson & Ogden, Bankers. Collections made, with quick returns. Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.

POLLAK & SON. Manufacturers of... Brass and Iron... Pipes and Fittings...

UNION DIME SAVINGS BANK. CANAL STREET, CORNER OF VAUGHN, DEPOSITS FROM 10 CENTS TO $2000 RECEIVED.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES. A new and original work, with 122 Designs and Plans of Country Houses of moderate cost.

STEINWAY & SONS' GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANO-FORTES

Have taken 22 First Prizes, gold and silver medals, at the Crystal Palace... That the great superiority of these instruments is now universally conceded is abundantly proved by the fact that Messrs. Steinway's pianos, uprights, and grand pianos, of every description, have been copied by the great majority of the manufacturers of both Europe and America.

NATIONAL BANK PENS, MANUFACTURED BY THE EMPIRE PEN CO., 21 and 23 John St., New York. For Sale by all Stationers.

50 PER-CENT SAVED BY USING

B. T. HARRITT'S LAMBS-EAR SOAP. This Soap is made from clean and pure materials, containing no adulteration of any kind, will not injure the most delicate fabric, and is especially adapted for washing hair.

ITCH. (WHEATON'S) ITCH. Salt Rheum. Ointment. Salt Rheum. Will cure the Itch in 48 hours; also cures Salt Rheum, Ulcers, Chafes, and all Irritations of the Skin.

TO LET. The Four-Story Building, No. 51 Broad Street, 28 feet front. For lease or let of any kind. Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square.

"American Union Company," Manufacturers of the New Cannon-Turned PIANO, Patent, if not superior to any. Warranted in every particular. Warehouses and "Agency," 467 Broome St.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER. This new celebrated Revolver exceeds all others for compactness, effectiveness, durability, power, and safety in carrying. It is light, 14 oz., small only 7 in., with larger power and range of action than any revolver made of same size and weight. Send for circular. GEO. A. HICKOX, 54 Gold Street, New York.

Dr. Foote's Advertisements. OLD EYES MADE NEW, without Spectacles, Drops, or Medicines. Pungent medicine free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 112 Broadway, New York.

COMMON AND RARE FOR THE DEPTURED. Sent free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 112 Broadway, New York.

ROGERS' FRAGRANT ODONTOLINE. For Sale by Druggists, Fancy Goods Dealers and Perfumers

THE MEXICAN THIMBLE-RIG.

UNION ADAMS, HOSIER, GLOVER, and SHIRT MAKER, No. 637 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY.

Marvin's Patent ALUM AND DRY PLASTER, FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFES. Never lose their fire-proof qualities, corrode the iron, or melt their contents. Discount and 9 other safes for silverware. MARVIN & CO., 265 Broadway, New York. 123 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY. To be found on each box and each piece of GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLE. All other goods of wholesale name, not having this mark, are worthless imitations and inferior to the genuine.

E. REMINGTON & SONS, MANUFACTURERS OF Revolvers, Rifles, Muskets, and Carbines, For the United States Service. Also POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS, REPEATING PISTOLS, Rifle Guns, Revolving Rifles, Rifle and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Materials. Sold by Gun Dealers and the Trade generally.

Agents Wanted. $2000 A YEAR, AND ALL EXPENSES PAID. For further particulars address W. G. WILSON, Care, East, Ohio.

CEDAR CAMPHOR. Kills all insect that breathe through their skin. For all various eruptions of the skin. Sold by druggists every where. HARRIS & CHAPMAN, Boston.

PESTICINE! It is the Best Restorer for the Hair, also an excellent dressing. Invented by Dr. HOGOT; manufactured by GLEN SKINNER & CO., Springfield, Mass.; and sold by DEMAY BARNES & CO., New York.

WANTED—AGENTS. For the Pictorial Chart, BULWARKS OF FREEDOM. Sets the world on fire at once. Address GOLDEN & SAMPSON, 26 1/2 E. Clark Street, Chicago, Ill.

GAS FIXTURES and LAMPS.

The attention of the trade and of buyers generally is invited to our extensive stock of CHANDELIERS, BRACKETS, &c., of every style and pattern, comprising many beautiful designs entirely new.

MERWIN & BRAY, MANUFACTURERS AND WHOLESALE DEALERS IN ARMS AND AMMUNITION OF ALL KINDS.

Leading Sporting Rifles, of different calibres, and Eagle Arms Co's Bolt and Pocket Cartridge Revolvers. The Bolt Gun carries the Army size Balls, the Pocket Pistol the same size Balls as Colts's 4 in. These arms have an equal now in market. For further particulars, send for Illustrated Circular. MERWIN & BRAY, 940 Broadway, N. Y.

HORRIBLE!!! I HAVE SUFFERED WITH CATARRH thirty years; it had destroyed my voice and my sight—impaired my sight and hearing. In six weeks I have been entirely cured. For humanity's sake I will send the recipe for the simple remedy used, postage free, to all afflicted. Address Rev. T. J. MEAD, Drawer 106, Syracuse, N. Y.

Wanted! Answers!—$100 per Month to sell the celebrated Convention... The greatest invention of the age. Send for descriptive circular. 263, 9 1/2 & CO., Chicago, Ill., or Cleveland, O.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, Have Just Published: I. HISTORY OF Friedrich the Second, CALLED FREDERICK THE GREAT. By THOMAS CARLYLE.

II. A TEXT-BOOK ON PHYSIOLOGY. Being an Abridgment of the Author's Larger Work on Human Physiology. By JOHN W. DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Author of a "Treatise on Human Physiology," a "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe," &c. Illustrated with nearly 150 Wood Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

Probably the History of Frederick will forever remain one of the finest pieces of literary painting, as well as one of the most marvellous attempts at special pleading, extant in our own or any language.—London Spectator. Mr. Carlyle has at last completed his greyn image, and sets it up for the admiration of the world, and, with that amazing fancy for hero-worship in which he excels, would fain see us believe his paragons all that he paints him; and there is evidently power in the picture. The old records have been most thoroughly sifted by Carlyle, who seems to have eliminated every grain of wheat from bushels of chaff.—Examiner and Chronicle.

III. A TEXT-BOOK ON PHYSIOLOGY. Being an Abridgment of the Author's Larger Work on Human Physiology. By JOHN W. DRAPER, M.D., LL.D., Author of a "Treatise on Human Physiology," a "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe," &c. Illustrated with nearly 150 Wood Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

A letter has recently been expressed by professors and teachers who have used my large work on "Human Physiology" that I should publish an abridgement of it, suitable for use as an elementary text-book in a large and schools. I have accordingly in this work endeavored to satisfy them with, and to furnish a book sufficiently simple and comprehensive for such general use, and yet representing the state of the science at the present day.—Extract from the Preface.

Harper & Brothers will send the above Works by Mail, Postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

THE REISSUE OF
HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Vol. X.—No. 485.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1866.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
 $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

"THE CURT REPLY."

There are, we suppose, few of our readers who do not remember from very early days the anecdote of the ambitious BALDWIN scratching on a window-pane, where it would meet the eye of his Royal mistress, the line—

"Fain would I climb, but that I fear to fall!"

and QUEEN ELIZABETH'S dubious, or, as Mr. FOLANSONY'S title suggests, "cart," rejoinder, forming a couplet—

"If thy mind fail thee, do not climb at all."

Yet we must confess that, unless the gentle reader has studied history to better purpose than ourselves, he will find some difficulty in fixing the time, place, and circumstances of the story. It is, of course, beneath the dignity of FROTHING; it has no documentary evidence to recommend it to Miss BRACKENBURY; it is not to be found in Miss AIKEN'S more gossiping "Memoirs of the Court of Elizabeth." We turn with confidence to TYLER'S tolerably elaborate "Life of Raleigh," and, lo! it is not even there. The first reference to it we light on is in one of the early memoirs of Sir WALTER—that by OGDEN. But this only proves a faint scent to guide our chase; the anecdote is given, but with no details whatsoever, and FULLEN'S "Worthies" is quoted as the authority. But, slack-day! our fox only proves a bark here after all. The anecdote is given in the boldest possible manner; only the phraseology is a little more antiquated, reading thus:

Fain would I climb, yet fear I to fall.
 If thy heart fails thee, climb not at all.

The popularity of the anecdote is doubtless due in great measure to Scott's introduction of it into "Kenilworth," where it appears with all the circumstantial embellishments of the novelist's imagination. The handsome young gallant has just been, according to the tradition, taken into the Queen's service in acknowledgment of the chivalrous sacrifice of his richly-embroidered cloak that Gloriana might walk dry-shod. Intoxicated with certain musks of the Queen's favor, received when accompanying her Majesty in her diversion on the river, and after the return to the palace at Greenwich, when, at evening, she was walking in the gardens, "Squire Lackcloak" contrived that a maid of honor should see him enter a summer-house and write on a window-pane with a diamond ring which the Queen had given him as a recompense for the loss of his cloak. The sequel is, of course, perfectly evident.

The attempt to paint an anecdote is generally a misemployment of the resources of art. However, we can hardly find fault with the artist for selecting a subject which enabled him to represent "good Queen Bess" in all her brave attire, and (whether the incident be true or false) so characteristically engaged. We must, however, take exception to the portraiture of her Majesty, as being as outrageously flattering, in its way, as RALPH'S own extravagant adulations of "the goddess," "the Diana," "the Venus"—his excessively vain yet most sagacious Queen. At this time ELIZABETH was approaching sixty, her features were very strongly marked, and she never had the embossment of the picture. The peeping BALDWIN is, on the contrary, not so good-looking as his authentic portraits. Mr. FOLANSONY is an Irish artist, studying at Munich. In No. 480 we gave an excellent picture by him of "John Donnan in Bedford Jail."

THE GREAT FIRE IN CINCINNATI.

We give on page 226 illustrations of the recent conflagration in Cincinnati, sketched on the spot by our artist, Mr. WAIN. The fire broke out in Puck's Opera-house. This building—the most splendid structure of the kind in the West—was completely destroyed. Very fortunately the immense audience, congregated to hear "Milesomere Night's Dream," had dispersed before the accident occurred, otherwise we should have occasion to detail the horrible features of another human holocaust devoted to the Moloch of Flamma.

The first appearance of the fire—due, it is thought, to a gas explosion—was in the scenery back of the stage at 11:30 P.M. The Cincinnati Commercial thus describes the scene which followed:

"In five minutes the flames had wrapped the whole magnificent interior of stage and auditorium, and burst through the rear portion of the roof. On the wings of the thoughtless provided, the flames shot on to a great height and lay out over upon adjoining buildings. Some large masses of black smoke burst from the window of the Fourth Street front windows. At a quarter of twelve the scene was existing in the extreme. The half square bounded by Fourth, Vine, Baker, and Walnut streets had a dome of luridly glowing flames, through which columns of smoke shot up, and from which showers of sparks and branches of flames floated upward, and then descended upon the burning mass below. The dome and ceiling, with their gorgeous and artistic ornamentation, fell with the roof with a terrific crash, and there burst upward a dazzling light, blinding in its intensity. Slowly but surely the fire swept down through the various stories of the office—through of floors and studios—steadily down to the magnificent street, reaching the entire length of the building on the first block of Fourth Street, into the mouth of literature, the store of thousands worth of books of Cassell's store, the valuable stock of Freeman's book-publishing, the fine establishments of W. C. Peters, and Philip Phillips, piano, the immense goods stored in the Adams Express rooms, the collections of DEANE, PRATT, WOOD, & De HAN'S Commercial Institute, the editorial room of the National Union, Harper's job printing establishments, with its valuable machinery, and all the dozen offices besides. From the rear and west side of the Opera-house the flames marched with overwhelming strength to the eastern stable of the Adams Express Company and the building of the Cincinnati Daily Reporter. The fall of a large mass of wall upon the roof of the Reporter building insured its partial destruction, and soon the flames were communicated to the rear of the first and second floors, and rushing upward, swept through the front windows, and told the story of their power to the firemen, who rushed up to grapple with them. But with the same power already so terribly used the descending flames wrapped the structure in their embrace, and the work of destruction was soon far advanced through the job-rooms, where were stored nearly $100,000 worth of cuts, through job-presses, and composing-rooms, and editorial rooms; through the engraving-rooms of Jones & Hart—all totally destroyed."

The total loss is estimated at $1,751,000, over one-half of which was involved in the ruin of Puck's Opera-house.

Our artist has sketched the scene presented by the ruins the day after the fire. An interesting feature of the sketch is the view given of the Chain-gang at work among the ruins.

THE LATE KING OF SIAM.

It is perhaps not generally known that there are usually two Kings of Siam. But the Siamese Royal Brothers, an elder and a younger—not Siamese twins—hold unequal shares in the divided monarchy—two-thirds of the power being vested in the First and one-third in the Second King. The junior of their paternal Majesties has lately been removed by death; we therefore give his portrait on page 226. The senior, whose fame as a learned Buddhist sage, with his other philosophical and literary accom-ishments, has been attested by high authority, pursues a wise and liberal policy, which has resulted in a great increase of the prosperity of his kingdom, since the treaty of 1825 opened the navigation of the Meikam and other Siamese rivers to European shipping and commerce. In the year 1864 the foreign export and import trade of Siam amounted to more than $12,500,000, and employed 55,000 tons of British shipping, besides a great quantity carried on its native vessels, which are built of the teak wood of the country, on the best European models, in the dock-yards of the Meikam. The export of rice, especially to China, is a most important article of Siamese enterprise, amounting to 125,000 tons in the year; and this kingdom is in a fair way of becoming one of the wealthiest and most civilized of Eastern states. The Second King, recently deceased, "would have been," says Sir John Bowring, "a very distinguished man, if he were not eclipsed by the more active nature and more prominent position of his elder brother. He spoke pure English, wrote a hand which might be a pattern for a European schoolmaster; he had work-shops for the manufacture of scientific and mechanical instruments; he had, moreover, a taste for literature, and I found the shelves of his library filled with European, and especially English, books." The palace at Bangkok, in which both Kings resided together, is a large pile, inhabited by about 2000 persons; the First King's wives being more than 300. There was little distinction, as regards the pomp and ceremonies of their Court, between the royal pair.

"THE CURT REPLY."—[By G. F. FOLANSONY.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1866.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

It was unfortunate that the President should have lately said to a delegation from New Jersey that he is too old to change, for the greatest changes of his life have occurred within the last five years, and no reasonable man is ever too old to be convinced. Especially at a time like this, when the wisdom of public policy and the national welfare depend not upon theories but upon the actual condition of affairs, it is surely the part of wisdom to cultivate patience and toleration and an open mind. During the dark days of the war a Union Senator came one day from an interview with President Lincoln and exclaimed, impatiently: "There's no bracing atmosphere at the White House! The President's mind is never made up. No Union man is stronger for seeing him." Then it was a very dull Union man. Mr. Lincoln was strong because he was patient. His patience enabled him to know and to weigh exactly the force of opinions. If he had constantly said upon the vital points of the war, "My mind is made up. I am not to be moved," he would have lacked precisely the distinctive quality of his greatness as a man and of his fitness as President.

President Johnson's temperament differs from President Lincoln's as General Jackson's did from General Washington's. Mr. Johnson likes a fight. All his life he has been a sturdy political champion. He has been trained in the most orthodox discipline of the most despotic of parties, and he gives blows as well as takes them. At the close of a fierce war he stepped into the Presidency over the body of his predecessor murdered by those who would gladly have killed him; and his grim resolution to maintain the Constitution and Union, as he understood them, promised to be inflexible against all whose views differed from his own. But forgetting, as it seems to us, that the most patriotic men may honestly differ in a crisis like the present, he rather imprudently recognizes as the only friends of the Union those who support his policy in every point, without weighing the probable and obvious motives of such support in many quarters. Thus while he declares himself with peculiar emphasis the defender of the Union and Constitution it is remarkable that those who have not shown during the war that they were its enemies doubt the wisdom of some of his measures, while those who have been the open and bloody or secret and treacherous foes of the Union, now vehemently applaud every word he utters and every act he does. Is it that those who with Andrew Johnson have hitherto defended the Union against every assault did not comprehend what they were doing; or is it that those who after long deliberation struggled fiercely to destroy it, are at heart its most intelligent advocates, its truest friends, and the safest counselors in its reorganization?

But this rapturous approval of the President by his political enemies is not a new phenomenon. The party which advised surrender to the rebellion, and exhausted the language in contemptuous vituperation of Mr. Johnson while he stood like a rock against their treasonable fury, has no course left but to excite and exaggerate division between him and his friends. They applaud him not because he demands that treason shall be made odious, not because he maintained military rule and suspended the Actus cypus in the disarmed States, not because he imposed assent to emancipation upon those States and excepted large classes from amnesty, not because he denounced that "a public enemy * * * should be subjected to a severe ordeal before he is restored to citizenship," but because his measures do not command the unqualified support of all Union men, and because they hope to widen a difference into a fatal breach. When Mr. S. S. Cox, who said at Chicago in 1864 that Lincoln and Davis ought to be brought to the same block together now says at New Haven that Mr. Johnson, the faithful friend of Mr. Lincoln and elected with him, is the best of Presidents, it is hard to believe that a politician so experienced as Mr. Johnson does not estimate such support at its true value. He must know that the breach between him and the Copperheads is irreparable. He must know that they would willingly use him as a wedge to split the Union party, as a stalking-horse to their own purposes, as a spring-board to leap into power; that they would use him to the last and then contemptuously discard him. He ought surely to know that the party which must rely for success upon its old alliance with the old spirit of Slavery in the South, and not upon the new spirit of Union and Liberty there, would as soon vote for CHARLES SUMNER as for ANDREW JOHNSON. The Copperhead policy of to-day is a vast reaction against the spirit and results of the war and in favor of the old Southern policy. In such a reaction does the military Governor of Tennessee, the Senator who alone from his section defied to the death the leaders of that old Southern policy, think that he has any place? Had the Presbyterian chiefs honor and confidence in the Court of the Restoration?

The President can not hope to create a new party however doubtful States may waver. The Union party comprising that overwhelming majority of loyal men who sustained the war can not dishonor merely because the war is over. It will of necessity cohere until the fair results of the war are secured. With whom, then, will the President trust himself, with his friends or his foes? However he may differ with those friends, can the difference be really so radical as it is with his opponents? We have no wish to conceal that difference. The various views and measures which compose what is called "the President's policy" are undoubtedly held and proposed by him in perfect good faith. They are inspired by the conviction that the great object now to be attained is security with conciliation, and the preservation of our constitutional system. In this conviction all patriotic men will agree. But upon the question what is security, and what is or is not Constitutional, there are wide differences. When the President assumes that by a formal acceptance of the terms he has imposed the Union is really restored, when he refuses to hear of further delays or conditions; when he opposes any constitutional amendment, or any serious national legislation whatever until the late rebel States are represented in Congress; when he thinks that the present remedies of law are sufficient for whatever friction or wrong there may be in States so long distempered, or, if they are inadequate, that they should not be strengthened until those States have a voice in Congress, he differs from the vast body of the Union party, and apparently begs the very question at issue, which is, upon what conditions those States shall have a voice?

It is not enough that he declares himself the defender of the Constitution against those whom he calls its new assailants. It is not enough that he declares his abhorrence of centralization. It is not enough that he declares that he stands by the Union, and that those who do not agree in every point of his policy are enemies of the Union. That question still remains. The President is unquestionably pure of purpose, and very determined. He may be clear in comprehending and skillful in interpreting the Constitution. He has certainly proved his fidelity to the Union. But the equal integrity, and ability, and devotion, and firmness of Congress can not be questioned. President Johnson must see that the Union party can not accept the indiscriminate support of all his views and measures as the test of constitutional fidelity; and he makes a profound mistake if he regards the situation as a struggle between himself and Mr. THOMAS STEVENS. When he sees those who have as little respect for Mr. STEVENS's wisdom as he has himself gravely questioning his course, it is a fatal delusion if he sees only Mr. STEVENS.

The question is simple. Is it possible for the President to believe that the party whose last general and official manifesto was the Chicago Platform of 1864 is sincerely the Union party of this country? Would he trust to that Convention to settle the questions of to-day more than of two years ago? If the alternative is presented to him of surrendering to that party, or of attempting to form a party composed of the Copperheads, the late rebels, and a few recruits from the Union line, or of continuing to act with those who have fought with him the good fight, but who now, in some important points, differ with his judgment, we shall believe, until belief is impossible, that he still holds to his words of the 8th of February, "that he might differ with some of his friends, and he should feel wholly at liberty so to differ, and to state the grounds of his contrary belief or opinion; but he considered himself identified with the great Union party, and had no desire or intention of being found outside.

He intended to exercise his own judgment, but was ready to yield it when he found it was not sustained by the judgment of the people."

CONNECTICUT.

THE result of the election in Connecticut is peculiarly significant. It shows the great Union line unbroken. It is a plain proclamation that the loyal people of that State, whose sons and brothers went to the war, from which so many never returned, are not yet ready to deliver the State and the country into the hands of those who denounced the war and excused the rebels. ISAAC TOWNY and THOMAS H. SKYMOOR, one of whom, as Secretary of the Navy, did what he could by sending away the national ships to paralyze the Government, and the other of whom, as candidate for Governor, openly expressed his sympathy with treason, are not the accepted political leaders of Connecticut.

The contest indeed was, as usual, severe, but the result was a remarkable triumph for the Union party. In 1864, at the Presidential election, when the honorable existence of the Union itself was at stake, the Union majority for Mr. LINCOLN was only 2406. Now the war is over. There is naturally a certain reaction. The Copperheads masked themselves behind a candidate who voted for the war supplies in Congress, and even for the Constitutional Amendment. The Union party is disturbed by the attitude of the President. His sympathies, under the circumstances, were unquestionably against the successful candidate who had frankly declared his difference with the President upon certain points. The canvass was conducted upon the radical ground in a State which last autumn refused impartial suffrage by 7000 majority; and yet, notwithstanding all these influences which undoubtedly impaired the majority of General HAWLEY, reducing it to half of that of Mr. LINCOLN, the whole Union ticket is elected; there are 14 Union Senators to 7 of the Opposition, and a Union majority of 50 in the House.

The result secures a Union Senator in Congress in place of LAFAYETTE S. FOSTER, and, we hope, indicates that the question of impartial suffrage may be successfully revived at no distant day. It holds Connecticut firmly among the States the people of which, with charity for all and malice toward none, propose to reorganize the vast disturbance of the Union upon the simple constitutional basis of justice.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL.

THE Civil Rights Bill was drawn with simplicity and care for a very necessary purpose. It declares who are citizens of the United States, defines their rights, prescribes penalties for violating them, and provides the means of redress. The power to do this springs from the very nature and function of a supreme government. But the power being conceded, it is fair to demand that any measure of legislation shall be shown to be necessary, politic, and constitutional.

It is certainly essential to an intelligent use of language in the laws and common speech that the true meaning of citizenship should be defined. Nearly a fifth of the population of the country are colored. They are subject to the Government; they support the obligations and do the duty of citizens. Are they citizens or aliens? Can any thing be more unreasonable than to fear or hesitate to define their status? If they are not citizens, are they aliens, are they unnaturalized natives? Domesticated aliens and foreigners have the protection of law, indeed, but these are neither. They are native to the soil. They owe and perform the obligations of other citizens. Why not call them citizens?

That color was not originally a disability for citizenship is undeniable; for the citizens of the several States became, upon the adoption of the Constitution, citizens of the United States, and in some of the States at that time colored persons were not only citizens but voters. Naturalization and other laws in 1802 and 1803, by implication and directly, admit that color is not a disability. In 1848 Mr. HUGH S. LEGARE, Attorney-General of the United States, gave his opinion that a free colored man can be a citizen. But as the Government became thoroughly tainted with the spirit of slavery, the reluctance to acknowledge the fact increased and obscured the whole question. Mr. MARCY, as Secretary of State, held both opinions, that colored men were and were not citizens. Passports have been both issued and refused to them as citizens; and finally the spirit of slavery culminating in the DRED SCOTT decision, declared that a free negro was not a citizen. In 1862, under the Government purged of the influence of slavery, the question again arose, and Attorney-General BARUS in a masterly opinion held that color was not a disqualification. But the baffled party of disunion still asserts the contrary. President Johnson in his veto of the Civil Rights Bill admits a difference of opinion; and the Constitution, while it speaks of citizens, nowhere defines the term. It is therefore both timely and wise, at the close of a civil war which has abolished slavery, that the highest authority should declare distinctly who are citizens of the United States, and what are the rights to which citizens are entitled.

The policy of such a measure is plain from the fact that the civil rights of millions of the native population of the United States are destroyed in certain parts of the country on the ground of color; that this invasion springs from the spirit and habit of slavery, and that, if not corrected by the supreme authority, the inevitable result will be a confirmation of that spirit, and a consequent perpetual menace of the public peace by deepening the conviction of the outraged class of the population that the chance of legal redress is hopeless. The good policy is evident from the further fact that the country earnestly desires repose, but that repose is and ought to be impossible while millions of loyal and tried friends of the Government are exposed, as in the absence of such a bill they are exposed, to the vengeance of those who are still, and naturally, alienated from the Government. Nothing can tend so surely to confirm the peace of the Union as the kindly but firmly expressed intention of the Government to protect and enforce the equal civil rights of every citizen; understanding by civil rights, according to Chancellor KAUF, "the right of personal security, the right of personal liberty, and the right to acquire and enjoy property." This is substantially the explanation given by President JOHNSON of the right conferred by the Emancipation Amendment. "Liberty," he said to the colored soldiers and to Judge WARREN, "means freedom to work and enjoy the products of your own labor." The Civil Rights Bill merely secures that freedom; for no man enjoys the fruit of his labor if he can not own property, and sue and testify and convey.

But if the United States had the constitutional right to confer this freedom, can it be unconstitutional to defend it? If it were constitutional for the Government to insist that the late rebel States should recognize this liberty, can it not insist that they shall assent to its definition and protection? What else was the significance of the second clause of the amendment authorizing the Government to enforce it? Having freed a man from chattel slavery, is the Government bound to look on passively and see him reduced again to virtual slavery, by a State vagrant law, for a trivial offense? The President, indeed, asks in his veto whether the present laws are not sufficient to protect the rights of the freedmen. What rights? If they are neither citizens, nor domiciled aliens, nor foreigners, what rights have they? Clearly their status must be determined before their rights can be defined; and then, if existing remedies are adequate, they are not impaired by the bill. If they are not adequate, the bill is plainly necessary.

The President's objection to the bill as special legislation is a manifest misapprehension. The bill is universal in its application. If the rights of any citizen of whatever birth or color are invaded any where in the country the bill provides the remedy, without any exclusion or exception whatever. But the veto lays great weight upon the fact that "worthy, intelligent, and patriotic foreigners" must reside here five years before they can become citizens, and expresses the opinion that the bill discriminates against them in favor of those to whom the avenues of freedom and intelligence are just opened. But the President hardly puts the case fairly. Let us ask it in another way. If "worthy, intelligent, and patriotic foreigners" are to be made both citizens and voters at the end of a residence of five years, is it unreasonable that worthy, intelligent, and patriotic natives, all whose interests and affections are and always have been bound up with the country, should be made citizens, merely, at the end of twenty-one years? If it be objected that the mass of the natives in question are not intelligent, will it be asserted that the mass of the foreigners are so? If it be right to take a foreigner totally ignorant of our language and government and the whole spirit of our system and give him a vote at the end of five years, can it be wrong to take a man like ROMER SMALL, who instinctively knows and loves and struggles for the Government, and at the end of three years of emancipation give him, not so much as a vote, but the name and rights of a citizen? That is a question which we do not find answered in the Message.

The objection that the bill interferes with rightful State legislation is not sustained by a careful consideration of the bill. If the United States may lawfully define the civil rights of their citizens no State can lawfully impair those rights. The bill leaves the legislative discretion of the States unimpaired by any thing but the fundamental civil rights of all citizens which the nation itself protects; and it gives the United States courts exclusive jurisdiction under an express clause of the Constitution.

But the most extraordinary objection urged by the President is that the Civil Rights Bill undertakes to settle questions of political economy. It is not easy to see precisely what is meant by this statement. The bill provides that all citizens shall have the same right to make contracts, to sue and be sued, to give evidence, to inherit and convey property. Is this settling questions of political economy? We should as soon have suspected that it was an attempt to solve astronomical problems.

The Editors of Harper's Weekly are published by LEWIS PETERSON, No. 125, Broadway, New York, with permission from Harper & Bros., N. Y. Subscriptions are 10¢ for one year 10¢ in advance mailed in advance. Issue of April 14, 1866, Vol. 9 - No. 23

But the serious objection to the veto lies in the fact, which is evident throughout, that the President thinks enough has been done to redeem the sacred honor of the United States, not of the separate States, pledged to the emancipated class. He says indeed that he will co-operate with Congress to protect them; but Congress has maturely considered and presented two methods of protection, and he rejects both. What is the President's plan? Is it to leave them to the Black Codes? Is it to call them free, thereby exasperating the late masters, and then suffer those masters unchecked to forbid them to own property, to bear arms, to testify, and to enjoy any of the rights of freedom? Is it to trust to time, and to hope that when the present generation, to whom we gave our word, is exterminated, some kind of justice may be done their posterity by those who come after us? The present danger to the Union is not in the direction feared by the President. It is not from the United States doing a simple Constitutional act of justice; it is from the States perpetuating the old injustice from which our troubles spring. State rights interpreted by slavery brought us bitter alienation and bloody war. State rights interpreted by liberty can alone give us Constitutional unity and enduring peace.

WHAT IT COSTS TO CORNER WALL STREET.

About three months ago the leading director of the Erie Railway Company fancied he observed that the stock of that concern had been overbid by the reckless Bears of Wall Street, and undertook to "corner the shorts;" that is to say, to buy up the stock, so that the speculators who had sold it for future delivery should not be able to buy when they wanted it. The stock was then in the neighborhood of 80. The director bought and bought, and as he bought the stock rose. Pretty soon it was 85, then 90. Still the director bought on, and by-and-by it was 95, and presently 97. If he had gone on buying it might have been 100, or 110, or even 120, by this time. There are limits, however, to the capacity of even the boldest speculators. By the time the Erie director had bought rather more than all the stock afloat in this country he thought it was time to stop.

He had achieved one half of his enterprise. He had pretty thoroughly cornered the shorts. Foolish operators who had sold Erie short at 80, found themselves compelled to buy it in at 95, and the difference—$1500 on every hundred shares—went into the pocket of the speculative director. There were many who, having sold short at 80, refused to buy in at 95, and remained "short," borrowing the stock from day to day. These the speculative director punished by refusing to lend the stock except for a bonus—say $50 a day for each hundred shares. Day after day passed, and a few resolute patient "Bears" paid their 1/2 per cent. a day, and refused to cover. All the weak and faint-hearted "shorts" had already bought in.

The question now was, what to do with the stock on hand? A few thousand dollars had been taken from "Bear" speculators. But, this apart, the speculating director found himself the owner of all the Erie afloat in this market at an average cost of over 90. There was no demand for the stock. Nobody in Wall Street or out of it wanted 100 shares. At 80 there had been a small consumptive demand. At 95 there was none at all.

The speculative director formed many combinations, by some of which he succeeded in interesting others in his operation. In the course of a day or two these combinations led to disputes among the confederates, and some of the parties in interest began to sell. Others followed, and the cry of coupe qui post being raised, such quantities of stock were thrown upon the market that in a few days the price fell from 97 to 75.

The speculative director had not succeeded in selling all his stock. As his account then stood the speculation had cost him something less than half a million. It was a painful reflection for a man who was accustomed to make, not to lose, money in stocks, and especially in Erie.

A week or so elapsed, and the director resolved to look for his money where he had lost it. He began to buy Erie again. Other operators were as quick as he, and Erie began once more to rise rapidly. From 75 it jumped up to 80, from 80 to 85. At 85 to 85 1/2 the speculative director made his grand demonstration. He bought all the stock that could be had at the price—say 30,000 shares in a single day. On the following day all the Erie loaned out was called in. From 1/2 to 1/4 per cent. a day was again demanded for the use of the stock. Once more the Bears were squeezed within an inch of their lives, and none but the resolute held out. On the next day the grand pinch was ordered. The stock opened at 87, and every one said it was going to go before noon. To the amazement of every one, at 87 there was an ample supply; fully 10,000 shares were sold in the morning, quite sufficient to supply the more pressing wants of the Bears. It subsequently appeared that some weeks previously, when Erie was 75, the speculative director had sold a call for 10,000 shares @ 85, and the holder of this call had defeated the corner by supplying the Bears at the expense of the seller of the call. Thus once more the attempt to corner the shorts had failed.

It took the speculative director but a few days to realize that he had once more missed his mark. Most of the shorts had covered their contracts, and as there was no consumptive demand for the stock at 86, it was clearly futile to put up the price. The director began to sell with vigor and dispatch. How much he sold and at what prices is only known to himself and his brokers. Within a fortnight the price fell 10 per cent., and real stock was still being delivered from the speculative director's board. It is not unreasonable to suppose that at least a quarter of a million must have been lost by him and his friends in their second attempt to corner Erie.

It is now supposed that they have altered their position, and gone short of the stock. In this new adventure they may or may not retrieve the losses they have met with in their previous attempts to corner the street. But Erie will have to fall very low indeed to yield them the $750,000 thrown away in the two abortive enterprises of January and March 1866.

The lesson should not be lost upon Wall Street speculators. If the leading director of the Erie, with unlimited capital, unrivaled skill, and vast power, could not succeed in making money by cornering that stock, it is safe to conclude that no stock can hereafter be profitably "cornered," unless the party which corners it be content to take the stock and keep it for an indefinite period of time thereafter. Such operations, in a word, inflict severe loss upon the Bears, but yield no profit to the Bulls. The feeling of Wall Street is such at the present time that the mere mention of the words "clique" or "corner," in connection with a stock, is sufficient to prevent operators dealing in it. No one will buy or sell a cornered stock. And though people who sell that which they have not got are naturally victimized by such cliques as undertake to buy up stocks reported to be oversold, it does not follow by any means that the cliques themselves will find a market to dispose of the stock they buy. The public argues that a cornered stock must be let alone, and when the Bulls, after ruining the Bears, try to convert their property into cash, they can not, as a rule, do it any cheaper than has been done by the Erie director. Prairie du Chien stock, some account of which was recently given in these columns, could not be sold today in any quantity at 50, though the last reported sale was 96, and the clique—which owns all the stock in existence—bids 92 as a matter of form at each board.

In an article published early in January we alluded to the probable downward course of prices in Wall Street during the present year, and to the prospect of moneyed speculators combining to corner this and that active stock. Both expectations have been realized. Prices have fallen and are falling; and three of the most active stocks—Erie, Michigan Southern, and Rock Island—are or have been cornered. The result is that business is falling off in Wall Street, and that the circle of operators is being steadily diminished. The Bears are being cornered and bled profusely; the Bulls are being loaded up with stocks which they can not sell, and which they will only be able to hold so long as money remains easy. The indications are that business will continue to decline until speculation runs mainly into Governments, which can not be cornered, and in which no thimble-rig can easily be practiced.

THE "METEOR."

THE case of the Meteor is peculiarly interesting as showing the extreme care of the United States Government to maintain the honorable American traditions of neutrality. Nothing can be more desirable, nothing can be more dignified and impressive than to show to the world that, when we denounce British neutrality as a mere name, we know what we said, and were not crying out merely because we were hurt. Yet it is quite possible that, for the very purpose of pointing that shining moral, our Government may be a little hasty to seize an occasion. And that is the exact question of the Meteor. Has she been justly detained? Is a violation of the Neutrality Laws intended?

The Meteor is a noble screw war steamer. She was built in the best manner, is thoroughly equipped, could be readily armed, and was doubtless intended for service during the late war. The war being over she was about sailing from New York for St. Thomas in the West Indies, when the Spanish representatives here complained that she was to be sold to the Chilean Government now at war with Spain, and asked for her detention. The Government immediately issued the necessary order, and the ship was seized. The claimants of the ship moved that the Court appoint appraisers, that the ship might be justly valued and bonds taken, and the vessel released. Upon this motion Judge Burrs decided, on the 23d of March, that the release was not obligatory, but discretionary with the Court. He held that the importance of a strict observance of the Neutrality Laws was so great that the United States should have reasonable time to prove their case; and that when, as in this instance, a forfeiture was claimed under the third section of the Neutrality Laws of 1818 it was clearly the intention of the Government to detain the vessel in order, if necessary, to execute the forfeiture. The application for release was therefore overruled.

It now remains for the Government to justify its action, and to prove that the claimants have fitted out a ship to commit hostilities against any country with which the United States are at peace. But should the charge fail it is a very hard case for the claimants. The libel was filed on the 23d of January. It is now the second week in April. If the charge be baseless, if it were wanton, the owners, so long deprived of the use of their property, and subjected to the expenses and delays of an important suit, have apparently no remedy but lobbying Congress to give them compensation. Judge Burrs himself offers them no other redress. There is no reason or excuse for so shiftless and unjust a state of things. If a citizen brings an ungrounded suit he is made to pay the piper. If the Government does the same thing it should be subject to the same penalty. Great property interests should not be left unremedied to the prepotent action of a Department, to the discretion of a judge, or to the delays of the law. If the owners of the Meteor mean to break the law let them pay the penalty. But if they are innocent let the accuser pay for the losses he has inflicted. And this is a redress which should be established by law.

THIERS AND LOUIS NAPOLEON.

IN his late speech upon the grant for the Great Paris Exposition, Mr. BANNA, the Chairman of the House Committee of Foreign Affairs, said that he had no doubt of the wish of LOUIS NAPOLEON to go to war with this country. It was not surprising, therefore, that the honorable gentleman proposed that we should accept the Emperor's polite invitation to his Fair, and that we should go thither in Monitors and military baggage-wagons, carrying our "20-inch guns and 1000-pound projectiles," with Admiral FARNAULT at the head. If, however, the French Emperor is still desirous of war with us, after the result of our domestic struggle, we hardly think that the mere spectacle of our projectiles can accomplish what the prolonged and vigorous use of these projectiles failed to achieve. We should have been glad to hear the reasons of Mr. Banks's faith, for we doubt if this country or France is of his opinion.

The Emperor of France is a much daller man than he has been hitherto supposed if he is not convinced that his Mexican expedition is a failure. He knows very well that the United States are waiting for him to leave Mexico. He knows that Mr. SEWARD's dispatches, however polite, are perfectly plain in their statement of the feeling of this country; and that if we wait we do not cease to watch, and that any serious movement of increased persistence upon his part would lead to still further remonstrance. He is aware that we have as yet made no false move. His Mexican enterprise is unpopular at home. The pressure against it grows constantly stronger, and he is doubtless persuaded that this Government is much too sagacious to overthrow that opposition by a policy which would unite France to vindicate its honor.

Meanwhile the late speech of M. TUTTAS reveals a new danger to the French Emperor. Hitherto the opposition in France has been revolutionary and not legitimate. It has opposed his dynasty, and has thereby justified him in summary repression. But the astute old political fox, M. TUTTAS, has adroitly changed his base. He declares that there is now no question of the dynasty. That is established. But he asks for the liberty which the founder of the dynasty has promised, and which he has hitherto withheld upon the plausible pretext that it could not strengthen the hands of its enemies. The opposition itself now removes that pretext, and respectfully requires a fulfillment of imperial pledges. This is an immense fortification of its position, for now if there be any danger of revolutionary measures it is not upon its side. It can now reasonably demand, as TUTTAS does demand, freedom of the press, personal security, and retirement from Mexico and other unpromising expeditions.

There was never a time in which watchful quiescence was so clearly our true foreign policy as at this moment. Neither LOUIS NAPOLEON nor the United States deceive themselves as to the traditional enmity of the two countries.

France aided the Colonies not because the Bourbonnais really favored rebellion, but because helping the Colonies was a heavy blow to Great Britain. The debt that we incurred to LOUIS XVI. has been fully canceled by LOUIS NAPOLEON. He has put himself completely in the wrong. He must right himself or account to France. Our position is one of steady observation.

LENGTH OF LIFE.

DIVERSE animals have different limits of life, the varieties being of all degrees, from the insects of an hour up to the animals that live even beyond a hundred years. There is in such case a period of growth in which supply continually exceeds waste, followed by a period in which there is an even state, supply and waste being balanced, and then comes a period of decline. These periods seem to have quite a definite relation to each other, for the longer is the period of growth the longer is the middle period of maturity, and therefore the longer is the whole life. For example, the horse that gets its growth so much sooner than man, does not live half so long; and the elephant, on the other hand, which arrives at maturity about the thirtieth year, lives to a much greater age. Of fishes the salmon, which attains its full size quickly, has a short life; while the perch, the carp, and the pike, which have a slow growth, are long-lived. The same truth holds of the vegetable world.

Length of life depends somewhat upon the degree of intensity of the vital action, and is longest where this is lowest. Tortoises, crocodiles, and fishes furnish us many more instances of great longevity than the warm-blooded animals, which live comparatively a much more active life. And of the warm-blooded tribes the less active are generally the longest lived. Thus the stately peacock, and slow-moving parakeet lives about twenty years, while the restless and quarrelsome cock has a much shorter life. Still shorter is the life of the sparrow and of the smaller birds generally, and their activity is, we know, intense. The rulo does not always, however, hold good; for the bear, though he sleeps much, and is far from lively when he awakes, is rather short-lived, while the active camel sometimes reaches even the age of a hundred years.

We may thus infer that the natural limits of life in different animals are determined generally to the activities natural to each. There is a range of action for every animal which is consistent with its best development, and either going above or below this is detrimental to it. Man is not fitted for such activity as is maintained, for example, by the restless canary-bird, nor for such a low grade of life as that of the tortoise; and if he choose either his organization will suffer, and life will be shortened. You slow living and too fast living are alike injurious.

It can not be said, then, that there is a certain amount of vital power given to every individual, and that the less this is put forth the longer it will last. On the contrary, the putting it forth to the extent of the design of his nature is essential to its maintenance. In other words, some good degree of action is necessary for the development of the vigor of health. Yet it is not probable that the due observance of the laws of health would extend the limits of life very far beyond what they are at present, though it would very largely lessen the mortality at all periods short of old age, and render life more comfortable and useful.

There is one consideration in relation to length of life of too great interest to be omitted. As mental tendencies are transferred from parents to children we should naturally suppose that there would be an accumulation of them from generation to generation, which would continually shorten the period of human life. But this is shown not to be the case by the fact that the statement of the Psalmist applies to the present time. The reason of this obviously is that the tendency in the system is always to health, and as mortal infirmities are always resisted, and their results are often removed—a truth which is exceedingly conspicuous in all hygienic effects, as well as in the struggle against actual disease. A full vitality is often obtained by this vicissitudinal nature over hereditary morbid tendencies of the most decided character.

SOLDIERS' FAMILIES LABOR AND AID SOCIETY.

IT was the reproach of the country after the Revolution that the soldiers were neglected. But the spirit that sustained the economic labor of the Sanitary Commission during the late war does not flag. The thoughtful, womanly care which was felt in every hospital and almost upon the very battlefield is still mindful of its charge, and is zealously devoted to its humane task. Thus as the Great Street Home in this city for divided soldiers is to be closed on the 21st of April, the "Labor and Aid Society of New York for soldiers and soldiers' families" is organized to continue the work and to prevent sending disabled soldiers to the Almshouse. The Institution will have the services as Matron of Mrs. BOWELL, who was the efficient Matron of the New England Home. Already there is a Laundry in operation to which the soldiers' wives or widows come to work daily, and are paid one dollar a day. There will be a hospital in the house for disabled soldiers, and a school in which mothers can leave their children, while they are themselves at work elsewhere in the building. Baking-making and other simple branches of industry will be introduced, and the character and experience of the ladies who direct the society are sufficient proof of the sagacity, thrift, and tenderness with which the Home will be managed.

The Institution needs money now, but it is intended to be self-supporting. The Sanitary Commission promise a thousand dollars some time hence; but our good friends might wisely resolve that he gives twice who gives quickly. Mrs. JAMES GIBBONS and Mrs. B. B. MONTGOMERY will gladly give any information or receive any contribution.

PIKE'S OPERA-HOUSE, CINCINNATI.—FROM A LITHOGRAPH PUBLISHED BY E. MOOREHEAD, CINCINNATI.]

GREAT FIRE IN CINCINNATI—CHAIN-GANG AT WORK ON THE RUINS.—(SKETCHED BY A. R. WADE.)

THE GREAT FIRE IN CINCINNATI, MARCH 24, 1866—BURNING OF PIKE'S OPERA-HOUSE.—SKETCHED BY A. R. WADE.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

INSIDE
A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XIV.

"But I do sincerely hope, my friends, that we are ready by this time to turn away from these second and seventh chapters of Daniel. There are a host of other passages in Scripture I am anxious to show you. Astonishing, is it not, that men should have supposed so long that America was not referred to in the Bible? Why there is not a day passes but I, for one, find some fresh allusion in it, especially to our glorious Confederacy. Yes, let us leave this behind us as settled. By 'the Ancient days' here in Daniel is clearly meant the old United States. By the 'one like unto the Son of man' is as undoubtedly meant the Confederate States. The 'mountain' refers, as we have seen, to the United States also. 'The stone' cut out of the mountain without hands, 'which is to dash all other nations to pieces, and become the great central Christian nation of the millennium, is, as we have clearly shown you, the Confederate States. Any flaw in our reasoning is simply impossible. The man that can not perceive this is hopelessly rotten. Heaven forbid, dear brethren, there should be a Union man among you!"

And here Brother Barker pauses, wipes his streaming face and then his moist hands with his very damp handkerchief, lays it beside his Bible to dry, takes another sip of water, and begins afresh. He is in the pulpit on his regular monthly appointment in the Pines, a country neighborhood some fifty miles from Somerville. A log church it is, densely crowded to-day. On his last regular Sabbath there Brother Barker had preached a thanksgiving discourse upon the defeat and capture of McClellan at Richmond, so powerful as to bring him into a state of homesickness from which he is not recovered even yet. "I'd rather wear out than rust out," he has remarked; and to-day he is delivering one in his series of sermons upon the Confederate States in Scripture.

The fact is, it is long now since Brother Barker has preached anything else except the war. Nothing in the world more insipid, behind the times, obsolete for the present, than the Gospel. But has he not taken up prophecy instead? And is not prophecy as much a part of Scripture as the old gospel? And Brother Barker frankly disclaims all credit as the discoverer of his new interpretations of prophecy; they are discoveries too splendid for that.

"I only use the investigations of other divines at the South," he said. "The documents themselves can not be circulated as widely as they ought owing to the dearth of paper. But so conclusive are these discourses, so exceedingly encouraging to every Christian patriot, that so far as my poor bleeding lungs will allow I am making them known by word of mouth to all under sound of my voice. I learn there are up here in the Pines some who hold to the old Union still; few, very few I do hope. If the brutality of the North, if the justice of the Confederate cause have not convinced such of their error, Scripture surely must. Scripture, brethren, Scripture! And right here let us turn, if you please, to another passage.—But wait a moment. Look at me," says Brother Barker, folding his long arms upon his narrow chest, and standing back a little from the pulpit. "As you all may know, your unworthy speaker was born at the North. I have some half dozen brothers alive there this very Sunday, I suppose. Do you want to know the Scripture that cared me of my last love for the North? Turn then to Genesis forty-first, fifty-first. Wait a moment. What was the first great battle of our revolution? Manassas! Very good. Now read the passage: 'And Joseph called the name of the first-born Manasseh: For God, said he, hath made me forget all my toil, and all my father's house.' See?" And with the finger of his left hand on the passage, Brother Barker spent a vehement five minutes in showing how entirely the South had in and by that battle been made to forget its long slavery to the North, all affection even for that the home of its ancestors.

"Scripture prophesied enough for me here," he said, with both palms on his Bible. "My old father? Manassas! My brothers there? Manassas! The North, and all in it, now, henceforth, and for evermore? At the very least utter forgetfulness and eternal alienation. In other words, Manassas, Manassas! And yet there are people who doubt whether our war is referred to in this Holy Book!" added the preacher, with an air of patient resignation.

Another application of the handkerchief to face and neck and hands; another sip at the glass of water.

"Let us turn now to Isaiah sixty-sixth, seven and eight." And Brother Barker reads—"Before she travailed, she brought forth; before her pain came, she was delivered of a man child. Who hath heard such a thing? who hath seen such things? Shall the earth be made to bring forth in one day? or shall a nation be born at once? for as soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth her children." Now remember," continues Brother Barker, leaning one elbow on the desk, his long forefinger demonstrating the point—"remember what has been proved that, as the ecclesiastical Zion was a type of the New Testament church, so the political Zion was equally an emblem of the central nation in New Testament times—that is, America." And clearly does the preacher apply the prophecy to the instantaneous secession of the South.

"Turn again to Daniel twelfth, seventh." And Brother Barker finds the place and reads—"When he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished." Now, who are the holy people? asks he. "America, of course, the Christian Israel. What was their being scattered? Secession evidently. And what was to be accomplished then and thereby? Look at the seventh chapter going before: the establishment of Christ's last and most glorious nation—these Confederate States! Can any thing be more conclusive?" And Brother Barker goes over the passage and his comment thereupon several times to impress it upon the minds of his hearers. Very fixed is the attention of those hearers.

"Once more, if you please. Isaiah twenty-seven, twelve." And the preacher reads—"Ye shall be gathered one by one, O ye children of Israel." The exact manner of Secession! No co-operation, no movement out of the Union is a body; "one by one" do the States secede!" And on this point also Brother Barker dwells at length.

"Let us turn now to the eleventh of Zechariah." And the preacher reads the chapter. "By the breaking of the staves therein—Beauty and Bands—was prophesied the dissolution of the Union. The three shepherds alluded to in the passage, and all that is said of them there, how manifestly it refers to Missouri, Maryland, Kentucky, and their temporary exclusion from the Confederacy!" And the interest is thrilling as Brother Barker shows from the passage how the North, in its awful destitution and self-division, are to "eat the flesh of one another!"

But the enthusiasm of the preacher overflows all bounds as he turns to the fourth chapter of the Prophet Micah, and paints therefrom the millennial splendor of the Confederacy. Over and over again does Brother Barker read it. "In that day, saith the Lord, will I assemble her that hath been, and I will gather her that is driven out—drives out!" cries the preacher, "and her that I have afflicted; and I will make her that halted a remnant, and her that was cast far off a strong nation." "And the Lord shall reign over them in Mount Zion from henceforth, even forever." And so to the end of the chapter, at which the speaker arrives entirely exhausted.

"Matthew twenty-first, forty-third," resumes he, his handkerchief almost dripping in his hand from its service upon face and neck. "Therefore say I unto you, The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." In the verse before is allusion to a rejected stone," reasons the preacher. "You will remember we saw this stone all through Scripture; cut out of the mountain of the old Union; destined to destroy and supersede all other nations is the Confederate States; 'become the head of the corner' it there says. Why? Because the Union, the old Christian Israel had failed—verse forty-three—to bring forth fruit—fruit which the Confederacy will bring forth!" And closing the Bible, Brother Barker describes at length the awful apostasy of the North, its universal infidelity and abominable wickedness. "Ought I not to know?" he asks, in conclusion. "Am not I a Northern man? born there, raised there? It is sometimes asked by people," continues the preacher, with both hands clenched upon the ledge of his pulpit, and leaning as far forward as possible between them—"sometimes asked why we Northern born men make the strongest of all Secessionists. I will tell you, brethren. It is because we who have lived at the North know the North so much better than men at the South. From long, personal, close observation we know the North!" And what intense loathing did the preacher infuse into the word! Strange that his audience should have such a sense of distance as hearing this from the lips of one born there! True, of course, but they did not like him to assert it. The Brother is conscious of this, and falls back a little disconcerted upon the thirty-fourth chapter of Ezekiel, the eighteenth and nineteenth verses.

"You need not take my word, friends; see what Scripture says of the conduct of the North." And he reads—"Seemeth it a small thing unto you to have eaten up the good pasture, but ye must tread down with your feet the residue of your pastures? and to have drunk of the deep waters, but ye must foul the residue with your feet? And as for my flock, they eat that which ye have trodden with your feet; and they drink that which ye have fouled with your feet." And the minister illustrates this prophecy of the tyranny of the North over the South by its course in regard to the Tariff and the Territories, consoling himself with the speedy righting of the South, prophesied so clearly in the verses which follow.

"Some of you have been rather trying to joke me about my last sermon here," the preacher says, by way of digression. "True, I did believe then that McClellan was defeated and captured. Suppose it was not so complete a defeat as we then supposed; and where is that one of us that had any doubts on the subject then? Look again at my text of that sermon: 'I will remove far off from you the Northern Army, and will drive him into a land barren and desolate, with his face toward the east sea, and his hinder part toward the utmost sea, and his stink shall come up, and his ill savor shall come up because he hath done great things.' Is there a man that does not see that Scripture refers here to Lincoln's army, by its very name, too? I need not enter into this passage again. If it has not been fulfilled entirely yet, it certainly will be, and that soon. But let us turn to Daniel again, seven, eighteen, this time. 'The saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever.' Now what does 'saint' mean when applied, as Scripture means it should be here, to a government? Why, it means a mild, a gentle government. Friends, contrast the Confederacy with the old Federal Government. That bound the States together strong and hard; ruled them with a rod of iron; the most despotic Government, as this was shown, that ever disgraced the earth. But our glorious Confederacy! How perfectly mild and easy it is! The States are free to go and come under it as each one pleases, no restraint, no coercion. The North is invading us—does our Confederacy invade them? No, brethren. It only asked to be allowed to go out of the Union in peace. It did not want a war. It never dreamed of a war. This day it is the gentlest, most peaceable, most lenient; the lightest, easiest government the world ever saw. No wonder Scripture speaks of it under the name of 'saint.' Ah, if the North could but come up to the true idea of all government in this nineteenth century; the millennial, the Christian idea of government—States free as air to vote themselves whichever way they like! Instead of that, what do we see? Why, the old heathen ideas of permanent rule, coercion, war! I tell you, friends, Secession contains in itself the very essence of Christian freedom; it is a Gospel doctrine; it is the very germ and substance of all human organization in millennial times!" And largely did Brother Barker expatiate on this theme.

"Bear with me, brethren," he continues, as he searches the pages of his Bible. "I want to show you another, here it is! Zechariah thirteen, from the seventh verse." And here the pen recoils from recording in such connection the first, at least, of the verses quoted by the preacher. By "the man that is my fellow" Scripture meant, according to him, the "one like unto the Son of man" referred to in Daniel; in other words, the Confederate Government. "And it shall come to pass, that in all the land," continued the preacher from his Bible, "saith the Lord, two parts therein shall be cut off and die; but the third shall be left therein." When we seceded there were thirty-three States, you know," continued the preacher, holding his finger upon the passage for after use. "Three classes there were among these thirty-three States. First, the Border States; second, the Coercion or Northern States; third, the Confederate States, eleven, you observe; just a third of thirty-three. The two parts cut off from God's new and glorious nation, our Confederacy, shall die, you see, be defeated, destroyed, perish—the Border and the Northern States. The third—our Confederacy—shall be left in the land in permanence and prosperity. And look how our trouble from the blockade and the war is farther prophesied—verse nine—"And I will bring the third part through the fire, and will refine them as silver is refined, and will try them as gold is tried: they shall call on my name, and I will hear them: I will say, It is my people: and they shall say, The Lord is my God."

But it is impossible to follow Brother Barker. Only the intense excitement attaching to every syllable said by any one on the one topic enabled the audience to sit so patiently under his eloquence. Less than twenty minutes of a discourse from his lips on any other topic would have worried them out. There was a force, too, in the glowing enthusiasm of the speaker. Whoever else did not believe at least did believe in his interpretations of prophecy. Need we say how he described the impending convulsions at the North from the sixteenth chapter of Revelation, the nineteenth verse? Or the rout at Manassas and in all the other battles of the war, as foretold in the forty-eighth Psalm, fourth, fifth, and sixth verses? Or the future influence of the Confederacy over the world in the nineteenth chapter of Revelation, the fifteenth verse, the "rod of iron" referring to its commercial, and "the sword out of his mouth" referring to its moral influence? That Secession was the act of God himself, He setting up the Confederacy with his own hand, Brother Barker proved from the second chapter of Daniel, the forty-fourth verse. The peculiar estimation set by Heaven upon the same Government, from Isaiah the twenty-eighth chapter and fifth verse. And that the Almighty himself was fighting for them the prophet Zachariah has left beyond question in the fourteenth chapter and third verse of his prophecy. Let those who wish to study the theological aspect of the insanity of the times refer to the chapters and verses specified at their leisure. Let them remember in doing so that there were men who sincerely believed in Brother Barker's application of them, and a new insight will be had into the depth and desperation of that insanity.

BROTHER BARKER.

But the preacher has reserved some of his most telling texts to the last.

"In my previous discourse I showed you," said he, "that in Scripture the number seven refers to the seven States that first seceded. Permit your humble speaker to give you a few more illustrations of this most striking fact." And so he drains the last drop of water from the pitcher, falls when he began, pulls down his waistcoat by the lower edge, moves pitcher and glass out of his way by placing them on the bench behind him, and resumes:

"Micah, brethren, fifth, fifth. 'Then shall we raise against him seven shepherds and eight principal men.'" And clearly it is proved that while the seven principal men means the seven States which first seceded, it is Virginia, seceding when the Federal Government had become "Assyrian" in its attitude toward God's chosen, which makes the eighth.

"Once more, brethren. Isaiah fourth, first. 'And transferring the passage with the forefinger of his left hand, with the other hand he entreats special attention. "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach.'" Dull indeed must his brethren be if they do not see the singular and striking meaning of this at a glance. The seven women are the seven States in a desolate condition when they first seceded. Instantly they all lay hold of one man. "You see it, brethren! They take the Confederate Government to be a husband over them. Each is to remain, you observe, an independent State; insists on feeding and clothing itself; they only want the Confederate Government as a sort of protector. The reference of Scripture to our new nation is as minute as it is abundant. Who can doubt, then, the peculiar regard had for us by the Almighty?"

"Once more, brethren. Isaiah fourth, first. 'And transferring the passage with the forefinger of his left hand, with the other hand he entreats special attention. "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach.'" Dull indeed must his brethren be if they do not see the singular and striking meaning of this at a glance. The seven women are the seven States in a desolate condition when they first seceded. Instantly they all lay hold of one man. "You see it, brethren! They take the Confederate Government to be a husband over them. Each is to remain, you observe, an independent State; insists on feeding and clothing itself; they only want the Confederate Government as a sort of protector. The reference of Scripture to our new nation is as minute as it is abundant. Who can doubt, then, the peculiar regard had for us by the Almighty?"

"Once more, brethren. Isaiah fourth, first. 'And transferring the passage with the forefinger of his left hand, with the other hand he entreats special attention. "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach.'" Dull indeed must his brethren be if they do not see the singular and striking meaning of this at a glance. The seven women are the seven States in a desolate condition when they first seceded. Instantly they all lay hold of one man. "You see it, brethren! They take the Confederate Government to be a husband over them. Each is to remain, you observe, an independent State; insists on feeding and clothing itself; they only want the Confederate Government as a sort of protector. The reference of Scripture to our new nation is as minute as it is abundant. Who can doubt, then, the peculiar regard had for us by the Almighty?"

"Once more, brethren. Isaiah fourth, first. 'And transferring the passage with the forefinger of his left hand, with the other hand he entreats special attention. "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach.'" Dull indeed must his brethren be if they do not see the singular and striking meaning of this at a glance. The seven women are the seven States in a desolate condition when they first seceded. Instantly they all lay hold of one man. "You see it, brethren! They take the Confederate Government to be a husband over them. Each is to remain, you observe, an independent State; insists on feeding and clothing itself; they only want the Confederate Government as a sort of protector. The reference of Scripture to our new nation is as minute as it is abundant. Who can doubt, then, the peculiar regard had for us by the Almighty?"

"Once more, brethren. Isaiah fourth, first. 'And transferring the passage with the forefinger of his left hand, with the other hand he entreats special attention. "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach.'" Dull indeed must his brethren be if they do not see the singular and striking meaning of this at a glance. The seven women are the seven States in a desolate condition when they first seceded. Instantly they all lay hold of one man. "You see it, brethren! They take the Confederate Government to be a husband over them. Each is to remain, you observe, an independent State; insists on feeding and clothing itself; they only want the Confederate Government as a sort of protector. The reference of Scripture to our new nation is as minute as it is abundant. Who can doubt, then, the peculiar regard had for us by the Almighty?"

"Once more, brethren. Isaiah fourth, first. 'And transferring the passage with the forefinger of his left hand, with the other hand he entreats special attention. "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach.'" Dull indeed must his brethren be if they do not see the singular and striking meaning of this at a glance. The seven women are the seven States in a desolate condition when they first seceded. Instantly they all lay hold of one man. "You see it, brethren! They take the Confederate Government to be a husband over them. Each is to remain, you observe, an independent State; insists on feeding and clothing itself; they only want the Confederate Government as a sort of protector. The reference of Scripture to our new nation is as minute as it is abundant. Who can doubt, then, the peculiar regard had for us by the Almighty?"

"Once more, brethren. Isaiah fourth, first. 'And transferring the passage with the forefinger of his left hand, with the other hand he entreats special attention. "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach.'" Dull indeed must his brethren be if they do not see the singular and striking meaning of this at a glance. The seven women are the seven States in a desolate condition when they first seceded. Instantly they all lay hold of one man. "You see it, brethren! They take the Confederate Government to be a husband over them. Each is to remain, you observe, an independent State; insists on feeding and clothing itself; they only want the Confederate Government as a sort of protector. The reference of Scripture to our new nation is as minute as it is abundant. Who can doubt, then, the peculiar regard had for us by the Almighty?"

"Once more, brethren. Isaiah fourth, first. 'And transferring the passage with the forefinger of his left hand, with the other hand he entreats special attention. "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach.'" Dull indeed must his brethren be if they do not see the singular and striking meaning of this at a glance. The seven women are the seven States in a desolate condition when they first seceded. Instantly they all lay hold of one man. "You see it, brethren! They take the Confederate Government to be a husband over them. Each is to remain, you observe, an independent State; insists on feeding and clothing itself; they only want the Confederate Government as a sort of protector. The reference of Scripture to our new nation is as minute as it is abundant. Who can doubt, then, the peculiar regard had for us by the Almighty?"

"Once more, brethren. Isaiah fourth, first. 'And transferring the passage with the forefinger of his left hand, with the other hand he entreats special attention. "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach.'" Dull indeed must his brethren be if they do not see the singular and striking meaning of this at a glance. The seven women are the seven States in a desolate condition when they first seceded. Instantly they all lay hold of one man. "You see it, brethren! They take the Confederate Government to be a husband over them. Each is to remain, you observe, an independent State; insists on feeding and clothing itself; they only want the Confederate Government as a sort of protector. The reference of Scripture to our new nation is as minute as it is abundant. Who can doubt, then, the peculiar regard had for us by the Almighty?"

"Once more, brethren. Isaiah fourth, first. 'And transferring the passage with the forefinger of his left hand, with the other hand he entreats special attention. "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach.'" Dull indeed must his brethren be if they do not see the singular and striking meaning of this at a glance. The seven women are the seven States in a desolate condition when they first seceded. Instantly they all lay hold of one man. "You see it, brethren! They take the Confederate Government to be a husband over them. Each is to remain, you observe, an independent State; insists on feeding and clothing itself; they only want the Confederate Government as a sort of protector. The reference of Scripture to our new nation is as minute as it is abundant. Who can doubt, then, the peculiar regard had for us by the Almighty?"

"Once more, brethren. Isaiah fourth, first. 'And transferring the passage with the forefinger of his left hand, with the other hand he entreats special attention. "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach.'" Dull indeed must his brethren be if they do not see the singular and striking meaning of this at a glance. The seven women are the seven States in a desolate condition when they first seceded. Instantly they all lay hold of one man. "You see it, brethren! They take the Confederate Government to be a husband over them. Each is to remain, you observe, an independent State; insists on feeding and clothing itself; they only want the Confederate Government as a sort of protector. The reference of Scripture to our new nation is as minute as it is abundant. Who can doubt, then, the peculiar regard had for us by the Almighty?"

"Once more, brethren. Isaiah fourth, first. 'And transferring the passage with the forefinger of his left hand, with the other hand he entreats special attention. "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach.'" Dull indeed must his brethren be if they do not see the singular and striking meaning of this at a glance. The seven women are the seven States in a desolate condition when they first seceded. Instantly they all lay hold of one man. "You see it, brethren! They take the Confederate Government to be a husband over them. Each is to remain, you observe, an independent State; insists on feeding and clothing itself; they only want the Confederate Government as a sort of protector. The reference of Scripture to our new nation is as minute as it is abundant. Who can doubt, then, the peculiar regard had for us by the Almighty?"

Nadab and Abihu? Alas, the censor of this minister never glowed except with "strange fire." Most of his ministry had been spent in onslaughts upon other denominations, and it was wonderful the skill with which he planted detached passages from Scripture like so many separate things into scourges for his foes; for all who did not agree with him were foes, actual and active foes to be met and defeated as such. Neutrality? No more than moderation was there an atom of it in his character; therefore he could not conceive of its existence in that of any one else. And when Brother Barker did preach the Gospel, it was in tones so vehement, so unlike the gentle accents of his Master, that the very Gospel heaven, and Gospel hell, and Gospel salvation seemed too strongly of the minister himself to have their due influence. Even the wind which bloweth as it listeth never blew at all in his estimation save as it blew exactly when and where he would have it, and in a hurricane at that.

"Just one thing more, my friends," says Brother Barker, as soon as he has recovered voice enough for the purpose. "When I was explaining just now that prophecy from Daniel about the saint-like character of our Confederacy, its being, in other words, the mildest government the world ever knew, so mild as to be almost no government at all, just these, brethren, I saw a gentleman in this congregation shake his head. I ought to have stopped and spoken of it on the spot. The truth is, I was under such headway I could not stop then. Let us now ask the Brother why he shook his head?"

There is instant and intense excitement in the audience, the deep stir within the heart of war. The minister stands silent for some minutes, but no one stirs or speaks.

"I believe you are the friend that shook his head," the preacher remarks, and his long finger indicates a man among the congregation. An unusually large and tall man it is, a conspicuous object on account of towering above those around as he sits. A large sun-burnt face, plenty of black hair and whiskers, butternut coat and pantaloons, no waistcoat, hickory shirt, copious use of tobacco in the way of chewing—nothing else noticeable.

"Paul Brooks, I think," adds the preacher, all the St. Dominic and the Temperance stirring in his veins.

"Me!" exclaims the gentleman designated, after a torrent of amber. "Did I shake my head?"

"Yes, Sir, you did," says the inquisitor, solemnly, and in the discharge of a painful duty.

"I did, but I didn't know it. But I know I thought No very strong just there. Now I come to think of it, I dare say I did." The speaker says this coolly enough, but he knows the peril he has incurred, feels it creep along his bones, Kentucky as he is, even more than he acknowledges it in his mind. There is breathless, painful silence.

"May I ask why—may this intelligent audience of Southern citizens ask why you shook your head?" The preacher speaks as to a criminal condemned. He will let him say why sentence of death should not be passed upon him, however.

"When I shook my head, though I didn't know till now that I did it," replies Paul Brooks, "it was when you made Scripture say this new movement was the freest and mildest Government on earth. What I meant by shaking my head was—conscription and martial law."

The preacher hears him in silence; then only draws together his lips to restrain unspeakable words, shakes his head in the deepest sorrow, and takes up his hymn-book.

"Forty-sixth Psalm, second part, long measure," he begins.

"Will you excuse me one minute?" says the Kentuckian. "I don't like to mention such things seeing it's Sunday. You won't object, I suppose; and I think a good many of us would be interested."

The preacher pauses, hymn-book in hand, with the air of a martyr at the stake, assailed but patient.

"You say Scripture speaks plainly of this new movement?" asks the Kentuckian.

The preacher assents with a low bow of the head. There is something indescribable in it. It is as of a judge on the bench to some unreasonable prisoner whose fate is already settled.

"And we must take exactly what Scripture says of this movement—that is, what Scripture may seem to say about it?"

Brother Barker smiles a sad but patient assent.

"And we, as good Christians, must obey what it says in reference to this movement to the letter?"

The Kentuckian retains his seat, but spits copiously between each question.

"By movement I suppose you mean our glorious Confederacy," replies the preacher, appealing with both hands to the audience in scornful deprecation.

"Yes, Sir," says the Kentuckian, very mildly, even persuasively.

"You have some intention in your question, I see that. But yes, Sir, yes. What Scripture says of our Confederacy—and it alludes to it continually and pointedly—we must do. Of course." And the preacher loses a little of the martyr as he stands on the defensive.

"There are one or two texts in Scripture," begins the Kentuckian.

But "Brother Barker was sharp as a steel-trap," as was afterward remarked by some then present. "Exactly as I thought," he interrupts, at the same time closing his Bible and pushing it away from him. "No, Mr. Brooks, I will not read those passages. For one, I can not, I dare not make such mockery of the word of God."

"Nothing more to say," remarks the Kentuckian, and so expectorates and subsides into his former indolent position on the rude seat he occupies.

"Forty-sixth Psalm, second part, long measure!" says the preacher, briskly, and with some emphasis, hymn-book in hand.

"Hold on a moment, Brother Barker!" It is an old man seated with a staff between his knees, near the pulpit. "I don't like this way of doing things on a Sunday, and in meeting. But now we are at it friends present would like to hear you read them passages; every thing bearing on the point is interesting."

The preacher acknowledges the movement of assent among the crowded audience. But he can not comply.

"No, Brother Robinson, if I would I could. As a minister of the Gospel, standing here in this sacred place, I can not, I dare not make mockery of God's blessed book."

"The shortest way is, let us read them then. Friends present want to hear. No danger of Scripture hurting any of us whatever part it is. Name the texts, Mr. Brooks." And Brother Robinson, the patriarch of the neighborhood, is standing before the pulpit, the minister's Bible in hand.

"I had no intention of disturbing the meeting," began the Kentuckian.

"Passages, Mr. Brooks; you name them passages," interrupted the patriarch.

The Kentuckian names the eighty-third Psalm, the first five verses. The patriarch is a long time finding the place. Brother Barker leans, with a patient smile, on his elbow, rested upon the pulpit.

"Keep not thou silence, O God; hold not thy peace, and be not still, O God. For, lo, thine enemies make a tumult; and they that hate thee have lifted up the head. They have taken crafty counsel against thy people, and consulted against thy hidden ones. They have said, Come, and let us cut them off from being a nation; that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance. For they have consulted together with one consent: they are confederate against thee." Humph, confederate against thee!" The patriarch has read the passage very slowly.

Brother Barker groans.

"Hold on," he says; "Brother Barker has just told us how one-third of the States—eleven, that is—see the Confederacy Scripture speaks of. I see the ones confederated together in this place are mentioned lower down. Let's count." And the patriarch transfers the Bible to his left hand, while he counts aloud with the fingers of his right upon the stand: "Edom, Ishmaelites, Moab, Hagarenes, Gebel, Ammon, Amalek, Philistines, inhabitants of Tyre, Assur, children of Lot—by jingo, eleven exactly!" Deep sensation among the audience.

"Any more places, Brother Brooks?" he asks, after a long pause, during which he is counting over again to be certain. "Out with it, Brother—yes, eleven exactly?"

"Isaiah seventh, second, third, fourth, and seventh verses," from Paul Brooks. Breathless attention.

"And it was told the house of David, saying, Syria is confederate with Ephraim." Confederate! Yes, well. And his heart was moved, and the heart of his people, as the trees of the wood are moved with the wind. Then said the Lord unto Isaiah, Go forth now to meet Ahaz, and say unto him, Take heed, and be quiet; fear not, neither be fainthearted for the two tails of these smoking firebrands. Thus saith the Lord God, It shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass. Humph, queer!

There is a movement of interest in the congregation as the reader ceases.

"My friends," begins Brother Barker, holding up his right hand.

"In one moment, Brother Barker," the patriarch interrupts him. "Any more passages, Mr. Brooks?"

"I was told Mr. Barker found a good deal about the Confederacy in the Bible. I happened one day in Somersville to come across a Concordance, and hunted out the places where the word occurs. Our preacher says the Jews were emblems of this country, so I thought the word in their history might teach something. However, only two passages more. Let me study a moment. Ah, yes—Obadiah, seventh verse," says Paul Brooks.

"Chapter?" asks Brother Robinson, turning over the leaves.

"Ain't any chapter, seventh verse."

"All the men of thy confederacy have brought thee even to the border: the men that were at peace with thee have deceived thee, and prevailed against thee: they that eat thy bread have laid a wound under thee: there is none understanding in him," reads the patriarch. The very slow manner in which the passage is read is itself almost equal to a running comment upon it. The interest in the congregation deepens.

"Only one more: Isaiah, eighth chapter, ninth verse," says Paul Brooks.

"Associate yourselves, O ye people, and ye shall be broken in pieces; and give ear, all ye of far countries: gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces; gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces. Take counsel together, and it shall come to nought; speak the word, and it shall not stand." But there ain't any thing about the Confederacy in this," says the patriarch, looking up.

"Go on," says the Kentuckian, with a copious expectoration first.

"For the Lord spoke thus to me," the reader continued, "with a strong hand, and instructed me that I should not walk in the way of this people, saying, Say ye not, A confederacy, to all them to whom this people shall say, A confederacy; neither fear ye their fear, nor be afraid."

"That's all," said Paul Brooks. The reader closed the volume, laid it on the pulpit, and took his seat, resting his chin again on the staff between his knees. Dead silence.

"And do you, Sir," said the preacher, aggressively—"do you, Sir, say to this intelligent Christian, intelligent Southern congregation, that those passages have reference to our glorious young nation?"

"I say nothing about it. You all bear me witness you attacked me first. I only say, if all your places in the Bible mean as you say, what do these other places mean?" And in the silence that follows the splash of the Kentuckian's indignant expectoration is distinctly heard.

"I have read, I have heard of awful perversions of this blessed and sacred book, brethren," says Brother Barker, after a pause, and in deep and measured tones; "but such an awful desecration and wretching of Scripture I never heard in my life. On Sunday! In this holy place! During the very hour of divine worship! Only this one thing I've got to say, brethren—and the preacher leaned over his pulpit toward his audience, and spoke in low, significant tones—"I've been told before Paul Brooks is a Union man; now I know it from his own lips!" And the brother drew himself back, as with a calmness awful to behold. "Forty-sixth Psalm, second part, long measure. Brother Stevens will please raise the tone, my bleeding lungs will not permit."

A ROMANCE OF THE HAREM.

AN ORIENTAL ADVENTURE.

THE bold, cunning, cruel, yet beautiful Nuzly Hasein, daughter of Mehmet Ali, has been the heroine of many a romantic story. The following incident, though "strange," is said to be "true."

Count Luigi, a young Italian nobleman of effeminate appearance, became possessed with an intense desire to visit the interior of the Princess's Harem at Cairo. He bribed a lady, with whom Nuzly Hasein was intimate, to assist him in carrying out his mad whim. Accordingly Her Highness was informed that a lady of rank from Europe was anxious to see her Harem, and to pay her respects to a Princess who was so renowned. An audience having been granted, Count Luigi, thoroughly disguised in female attire, proceeded alone to make his romantic visit—his friend utterly refusing to accompany him in so perilous an enterprise.

On reaching the palace he was received in true Oriental style, by haughty concubs, and beautiful slaves; and at length, after numerous ceremonies, was ushered into the presence of the Grand Princess Nuzly.

The Count thus describes his visit and subsequent adventures:

"The Princess Nuzly was of small stature, though beautifully made. She wore, over a pair of wide bright amaranth-colored silk trousers, a large white Cashmere dress, the loose sleeves of which displayed her well-formed arms, and which, being open in front, made her twin a yard and a half in length. A waistband of splendid large pearls, fastened with two large diamond clasps, encircled her waist. Her tiny feet were encased in a pair of satin slippers, embroidered with costly pearls. Her head-dress consisted of a large fillet of golden-colored crepe Cashmere, which was twisted very prettily around her head. Her long black hair, neatly plaited, was rolled up behind and fastened with large diamond pins. Her bracelets consisted of strings of enormous pearls; her necklace was composed of some of the finest pearls imaginable, which fell negligently on her clear alabaster skin. I fell desperately in love with her at first sight. How incomparably beautiful she appeared! How haughty and tapered was her nose; what a sweet, pretty mouth; what pearly white teeth; the whole of her features were perfection itself! But her eyes! Ah, what eyes! They were the most piercing I had ever beheld; at one glance they seemed to scan me from head to foot, to read my thoughts, and cause my heart to palpitate most violently. In short, they shot through the very innermost recesses of my mind. Every time that her penetrating glance was fixed upon me I felt my countenance change, and I could have sunk into the earth. Is it possible, thought I, that those scrutinizing orbs can read the audacious lies that I had framed?"

"Pipes and coffee, according to custom, were served; and then I commenced conversation with my vice-regal hostess. As soon as the usual compliments had been exchanged, I conveyed to Her Highness my friend's deep regret that her sudden indisposition had prevented her from accompanying me. I told her that she was extremely ill, almost in the last agonies of death, and I am really astonished that I did not even go so far as to state that she was dead.

"When once we begin to tell lies we hardly ever know where to stop. The excuses that I made for that lady's absence were graciously accepted by the Grand Princess, and our conversation passed on to other subjects.

"Have you any family?"

"That is always the first question which an Oriental lady asks her visitor. I answered, as a matter of course, in the negative.

"Therefore I suppose you are journeying to Jerusalem to pray to your prophet to give you some?" added the Princess.

"Your Highness, with singular aptitude, has guessed the object of my journey."

"May Allah grant you your desire! for then your husband will love you more affectionately. Does he go with you?"

"No, your Highness, business detains him in Europe."

"I am sorry for that: for it must be very dull to have to travel all that long way alone. For when a woman has to endure loneliness it is almost as wretched as death."

"The subject which she had broached was a very delicate one for me; so I endeavored to turn the conversation upon some other topic.

"It very seldom happens that women in the East meddle with politics, especially Princesses; never-

GRAND MASQUERADE BALL, GIVEN BY Mr. MARETZEK AT THE CAR

Opera, Academy of Music.

The Nast

THE BAL D'OPERA AND CARICATURE DECORATIONS.

Our double page this week represents the grand Bal d'Opera which took place at the Academy of Music on Thursday night, April 5. It was undoubtedly the event of the season, and proved a great success, the committee having spared no expense to make the arrangements on as grand a scale as possible. We hope, from the lot with which this one went off, that Mr. Maxwren may be induced to repeat the experiment annually. The picture is surrounded by representations of a few of the caricatures with which the ball-room was decorated. This new and original style of adornment emanated from the fertile brain of our own artist, THOMAS NAST, and greatly redounds to his credit. There were nearly a hundred paintings, all of them excellent caricatures, easily recognized at the first glance, and they formed the principal topic of conversation. They each of them amazingly portrayed the characteristics by which the various distinguished individuals were known, but none of them could be considered ill-natured; all parties fired alike, from the President down. The caricatures are to be sold by auction at an early day, at the Somerville Art Gallery in Broadway, near Fourteenth Street, when we hope Mr. Nast may amply realize the just reward of his talents and industry.

THE WORKERS.

Clack, clack, sound the hammers now; The sturdy axles ring; The bellows roar, and the hot flames pour Their ruddy light far over the floor; And the trawny smiths, they sing.

Whir, whir, go the busy looms In the factories dark and high, Where the tired workmen softly sigh, Through the crusted pane, on the blackened walls, From the pure and beautiful sky.

Stitch, stitch, go the needles bright And the silver gleaming thread; Women toiling early and late, While the eyelids drop with a heavy weight, To earn their daily bread.

Click, click, go the slender types, As they fall from the printer's hand; Sizzling wide each burning type, As it shaped itself in the mold that wrought, Far over the waiting lead.

Burr, burr, go the busy planes In the honed workshops, where The shrewy planes all day ply Their noisy craft; and the shavings fly, And their fragrance fills the air.

Ring, ring, chime the village bells, As the mighty lever falls On the solid bars of steel and gold By the swarthy colliers fobbed and riled In the great mine's vaulted halls.

Delve, delve—hear the miners at work Far down in the hidden mines, Telling by day and telling by night—'Twas the nervous gloom, where no ray of light—'Twas the worn and aching bones.

On, on speed the sharpened plows As they turn the heavy soil Where the sturdy farmer guides the share Though the last year's furrows, gleaming bare, With the heavy hand of toil.

These are the workers, hour by hour, With hearts that are brave and true, From dawn till dark, through the whole day's length, Each gives with an earnest will his strength To the work he finds to do.

But a greater task for all remains Which will only end with Time; And this grand task is 'mid the restless din Of the constant struggle that keeps us in To make our lives sublime.

DIMPLE.

She had golden hair, black eyes, a brunette skin, and a dimple in her chin. I think I fell in love with the dimple.

I wasn't any body in particular then, only a farmer's lad with a pair of strong arms, and plowing all day in old man Barton's field I used to see her come down into Aunty Maple's meadow joining it, with just a tall fence between, to milk the cows. I didn't know her name, and I felt shy about asking it; for who, at eighteen, likes to be laughed at? And I called her, to myself, "Dimple."

I used to say when the sun began to dip behind the Camel's Hump, which, either purple or white, was always to be seen from the field on clear days, she'll be here in half an hour. And there she always was, with her stool and pail, calling to the cows by name. There were four of them; Saks, and Short-horn, and Dapple, and Crammie. One day Crammie brought us acquainted.

They had taken the beast's calf from her, and she was like a wild thing about it; and just at milking-hour that torment of a boy, Nat Maple, hid himself behind the bushes and made a lowing sound. Crammie thought it was a calf, and when that minute Dimple opened the gate she lowered her horns and made at her.

What with the surprise and the fright together the girl stood quite still, turning white as the lilies in the pond close by; the pails dropped out of her hand and the stool flew any where, and there she was, woman like, giving herself up to her fate without a struggle.

There was a man near though, and he was over the fence with a great oak stick in a minute, and the next Crammie was on side of the gate and Dimple on the other. Brutes with four legs, like brutes with two, are generally afraid of those they know are not afraid of them, and it never entered Crammie's mind to toss me, I fancy.

But there was Dimple in a swoon, and the farmhouse a quarter of a mile away. So I could only fill my hat with water from the pond and sprinkle her face with it, and lift her head upon my arm and hold it there, trembling to think she might have been frightened to death, until the great black eyes opened again, and the lips parted and began to grow red again, and she would stand up all pale and trembling. I steadied her with my arm for a minute or so, and then I took the pails and went into the meadow and did the milking for her, and after that I carried the full pails home for her, for she was trembling still. By that I earned a smile and a nod when we met, and, maybe, a word over the fence at milking times, for in the shadow of Camel's Hump one didn't care much, just then, about formal introductions.

Her name was not really Dimple, of course. It was Hetty Shaw; but I never thought of her by any name but the first, and pretty soon I began to call her so. I think she liked it, for what girl ever had a pretty dimple in cheek or chin without knowing it? None that ever I heard of.

I'm sitting in a velvet chair just now, in a room that cost goodness knows how much to furnish. I've an account at the bank, and shares in the South-east Railway Company; but I'd change in a minute if I could back to raw, awkward John Jasper, perched on a rail fence, with nothing in his pocket but a hole, talking to Dimple, milking her cows in Aunty Maple's meadows; and ransy a richer man than I would give you any thing you could ask to put him back into a poorer place than that, if you'd only give him youth and the girl he first loved into the bargain.

It was the sort of thing to remember in dreams, that homely courtship, under the blue sky of heaven, with earth's clover under our feet. Cut that bit out of my life and it isn't worth much, to my thinking.

"Yes, I was courting her. I hadn't said 'Will you be my wife?' yet, in so many words, but words are not needed when hearts know each other. I had looked and said enough, no doubt, and I went every where with her, and had that air of proprietorship in her which every man, high or low, understands, and took the liberty of finding fault with her gowns, when I didn't like them, and of telling her she looked better in pink than in blue; and she put up with it. Just the surest sign in the world that she liked me.

Nobody found any fault with these things that I knew of but Hal Maple, the widow Maple's son. It seems he had liked Dimple as well as a man could like a woman, and, perhaps, might have told her so, if it hadn't been that he was a drowsy sort of chap, with a fondness for books (he was studying for a doctor), who let time slip through his fingers without marking it, and who never guessed Dimple had a lover until he met us, face to face, her hand in mine, in Green Lane one Sunday evening.

Dimple tried to get her fingers away, but I held them tight, and a blue lightning danced in Hal Maple's eyes, and his cheeks flushed, and I saw through his pale student's face clear down into his heart. He was as jealous as Othello.

Not that I knew much of Othello then, seeing I had never been to a play in my life; but a few months after when I went to Boston and saw it performed, the actor—he must have been a good one—looked over the lamps into the pit at me with just Hal Maple's face, blue lightning in the eyes and all, as I saw it in Green Lane.

After that meeting he tried his best to make up for lost time, but it was too late. I don't blame the fellow for hating me; and he kept the hatred pretty much to himself, and never did an ungenerously thing. He was a gentleman by nature was Hal Maple.

How proud I was, and how glad I was, and what pyramids of little hopes I built! Not one of which could have been built without Dimple. I even forgot the one trial of my life—the thing I had fretted and fumed over more than I can tell you—nothing more nor less than being a farmer's lad when I wanted to be something more, and stopping short with a common school education when it had been in my mind to be a scholar. Nobody had I envied more than Hal Maple, whose mother could send him to college and let him study for a profession; who would some day be called Dr. Maple, and have a gentleman's position in the world. Now the tables were turned. Hal Maple envied me. We're a cruel lot in this world. I rose a good deal in my own estimation by having made myself envied.

This was my plan just then. To live along in the shadow of the Camel's Hump, working and saving until I could get a piece of ground. To build a little house on that, when it was bought, and marry my little Dimple. Then if we had a cow and a churn, a pite table, and four chairs, and a big feather-bed, what more could mortals want to begin with? I never should have thought of any thing more if one bright day—I think Satan showed him the way—my mother's Uncle Darrow had not found me out. He had quarreled with my parents long before, and in his old age had grown remorseful. He told me plainly he was not rich enough to make me rich without injuring his own children, but he was ready to give me a start in life. "A respectable start," he said, looking at the dust upon my boots and the bits of hay on my clothes, "and one year mother would approve of."

Well, I had given up all hope of such a thing, but the wish was not dead yet. It flashed up into flame at his words. I thanked him and pleased him by looking genuinely grateful, and that day got ready to go back to Boston with him. I was so busy that every cow in the meadow had been milked by the time I jumped the fence to have a talk to Dimple.

"Dimple," I said, in a hurry, "I'm going to Boston by the eight o'clock train."

"To Boston!" she cried; "for long, John?"

"For good, Dimple," said I.

If her color had been paint, and she had dipped her cheeks in the pond, all the red could not have left them faster. I saw I had frightened her, and began to reassure her.

"I have excellent prospects there," I said. "I've always hated this life," and then I told her all. She ought to have been pleased, but she cried instead. "How lovelier it will be!" said she.

"I shall miss you, I'm sure," said I; "but I'll write twice a week and come down when I can. It won't seem much. Besides, it's not for long, you know."

At that her cheek changed to scarlet.

She talked a good while in womanish fashion about what I should do in the city, and she sat down by me on an old stump and let her head rest on my shoulder, and by-and-by grew more cheerful. But oh, how hard it was to leave her after all!

I kissed her and went away, and came back again to kiss her once more; and then I stopped to wave my hand to her, and stopped again, just at the foot of the hill, to see the little figure looking after me; and once more at the top, when a flock of pink I knew to be her gown was all I could see against the green grass, and then I found my sunburnt cheeks wet and guessed how they came so. People never die at the minute they afterward think would have been best for them. I think my soul would have gone straight to heaven if my body had dropped, a bit of clay, under the sycamores on the hill-top just then. I had a good mind to go back to old man Barton that minute and ask him to take me back, and refuse to accept any offer that would separate me from Dimple for a day; but in an hour or so I began to think myself an idiot for harboring any such fancy. At eight o'clock I stepped into the train and was off for Boston.

I was three-and-twenty now, and it was hardly the thing to begin to study. My education was sufficient for a mercantile life, and into that I entered. At a low point, of course, but with a chance for rising. My salary was what would have been a small fortune to me a year before, and at first I intended to go back to—and marry Dimple and bring her up to Boston to keep house for me in a week.

I didn't know what city life was then. In a week my cousins had taught me. The clerk's salary was not enough to dress and live alone on as I must. I must wait for Dimple. Meanwhile I wrote to her. She answered with such queer, crooked, ill-spelled notes, my name in the corner written "Master John Jasper," and "with great care" beneath it. I used to kiss them and put them in my bosom at first. After a while I sent her word to have them left at the post-office until called for, because those at the office used to grin so when I got them. At my uncle's it was worse yet. There were three pretty girls there who teased me unmercifully about them, and who screamed with fun at the crooked folding and the unnecessary caution to the postman on the back. It was very cruel of me to be ashamed of darling Dimple's loving letters, but I was. They did her such injustice. That was the way I excused myself. They did her such injustice. She was a lady when you spoke to and looked at her.

So I thought; but three months with those fashionable cousins of mine, and I went down to— I met Dimple at the church door, and walked home with her. She was more beautiful than ever; but so rapid had been my education that I noticed, after the first happiness of the meeting was over, that she had on leather shoes, and that her bonnet was what the Mademoiselle Darrow would have called "a fright." Besides, it certainly was not stylish to hang on my arm with both hands as she did, and to carry her handkerchief folded flat on her hymn-book in the bend of her elbow. But for all that I loved her, and thought of the time when she should be my wife. I knew now it could not be until I could hire a house fit for a gentleman to live in, and buy Dimple dresses such as ladies wore, and have sofas and lounges and stee-a-die to sit on, instead of the four pine chairs which would have contented us once. I think I gave a sigh or two, even then, for the lost simplicity and the ease with which I could have settled down in the poor little cottage three months before; and I remember burying my face in my hands half the way back to Boston, with a sort of miserable desire to shut out thought along with the daylight.

It was six months before I went down again; and then I must have cut a very fine figure, for there was a regular air in the church when I went in, and I heard a whisper of "Boston store clothes."

I had a cigar-case of prime Havanas in my pocket; a watch and seals at my fist; a diamond ring and a pin to match; but I was by no means rich enough to be married. My salary would be doubled next quarter; but then I had my aunt's estimate of "the least a young couple could live on."

Perhaps my manner was colder to Dimple than it had been. She looked sad when we parted; and it was a whole fortnight before she wrote. I did kiss her letter then, for I had been anxious about it.

Oh dear, dear! what little things our tragedies and comedies on the stage of actual life are made of! Write them down, and half the time no one would read them. Little things happened to me, and drove me step by step into a new road, and so it came to thinking that I never should be able to marry; that is, a poor girl, and that there was no reason in the world for writing so many letters, and that, all things considered, I would not. So those queer little notes went unanswered, until, in her fright, Dimple came down to Boston to see me. That ended it, for she was no fool. By the next post, after she went back, came this note to me:

"Mr. JOHN JASPER,—I am not angry—only I have seen that things are not as they seem. You and me have both said a mistake, and it is better to speak plainly about it than to let it go on longer. In this you will find your ring, and, by some odd hand, I will send your letters. Please send me mine, for it is not fit you should keep them now; and believe I shall always wish you well. "HARRY SHAW."

When that note came I raved and stamped and tore my hair at first; then I cooled down. It was better—much better; and then it was her doing, not mine. (How I lied to my-self!) So pretty soon I sent back her letters by a country woman who brought mine, and it was all over between us, and Dimple was not my Dimple any longer.

Sitting in the close city office, in the hot summer days, I used to think sometimes of the breezy green meadows and the waving grain-fields, and wonder whether she came there at sunset, as of yore, to milk the cows. That sort of thing made me wretched though; so I did as little of it as I could, and at last resolved to do what my aunt had been trying to wheedle me into all along; namely, marry Miss Graymarsh for her money. She was very rich, and wonderfully stylish, but not so young as she had been, and never in all her life pretty. I danced with her a few evenings; called on her a few mornings; sent her a bouquet and tickets for the Opera; acted as her escort there; proposed, and was accepted under cover of the music, and was married in two months.

After that I had the finest home I knew of—a wife who "shimmered like the sun," with her fine silks and jewels, like the bride of the ballad—owned the fastest trotter on the road, and was as idle as I pleased. Was I happy? Do you suppose a bird is happy in a gilded cage? Over and over again, waking or sleeping, I heard the thinkle of the cow-bells, and saw Dimple looking over the bars at me—Dimple, with her golden hair and jet-black eyes. I hardly knew what the color of my wife's eyes really was.

I led a life fast and wild as life could be. I was only home once in a while. Then, after the first, it was easier, tamer, and quarrel—quarrel, tamer, and easier. "My" house, and "my" horses, and "my" money from her from morning until night. We never had a child; so there was nothing to bind us together. Still we went through the forms of society, and nobody guessed we were not fond of each other, I suppose. At last we went to Newport, as usual, one summer; and one gleaming morning she would have me go down on the beach. I wanted quiet and my cigar. She turned on me fiercely:

"My money bought you," she said, "and I do not choose to appear, what I am, a neglected wife. Come, I have paid for your attention at least."

I did not go with her. I said words to her which, even with such provocation I never should have said, and she went alone. An hour after I left my room and sauntered down stairs. There was a crowd at the door, another crowd down on the beach, a dreadful something in every face, turned seaward, a whisper of "Keep him back!" "Stop him!" It was of me they spoke; but I forced my way forward and saw men bearing something white and dripping up the path. My wife. By what chance no one ever quite knew she had been drowned. My first thought was that she had drowned herself, and, conscience-smitten, I swooned upon the floor.

When all was over and I was free, with wealth to squander at will, I began to think how I might have made some little happiness for myself by being more tender to her. How even her love would have been better than her contempt. The splendid empty house was a haunted place to me, and I shot it up, and went wandering here and there over the world. I went to Europe. I came back, and found home no happier. I tried California. I lived a month in Canada. At last I thought of the Camel's Hump, and the village in its shadow.

I longed to see the old place once again. Perhaps I wanted to know what had become of Dimple. And there, in a few days, I found myself at the hotel, quite a fashionable place by that time, with Brussels carpets and mattresses in the bedrooms, and a piano in the parlor.

The place had altered. The people were dead or scattered. A young farmer had old man Barton's land, all but a piece cut off by the railway. The Smiths were all in the grave-yard, and the Brown girls had changed their names to a woman. Nobody remembered me, with my great man's mustache and beard, for the smooth-faced young fellow who had lived among them; and the only house unchanged was the widow Maple's. She lived there still, and her son with her. She had hair as white as snow now, and in the middle of his head was a great bald spot, such as students have, nine times in ten, before they are forty.

There was a gilded sign—"Dr. Maple"—on the side of the door, and he had a gig; that was all. I wondered whether I should find Dimple there. After a while I saw her. Down in the meadow, milking the cows, calling them by name, as she did in the long ago. I half expected to hear "Crammie" called, they looked so like the old ones. It was not a girl who milked them now, for I had been away fifteen years, but a woman—a very handsome woman of two-and-thirty. She did her task deftly, aided by a little girl who came with her and went away, not seeing me. But I had seen her glance over the fence where another youth was plowing as I used to plow, and I wondered if she thought—She had the same black eyes and the same golden hair; and I had been right about the face, it was the loveliest in the world.

I could not rest after that. I rode past the house daily; sometimes I saw her, sometimes not. At last a lucky, or unlucky chance befell me. I was thrown from my horse, broke an arm and a rib, and was carried into Dr. Maple's house.

I was in pain, and only half-conscious at first, but as I grew better I began to know that Dimple was my nurse. Her hand smoothed my pillow and gave me my medicine. Often she kept vigil at night, and her face was always gentle and her voice low. What an angel she seemed to me! and even then I could not but notice that her countenance, girlish ways were softened down, and that she was quite a lady.

She knew me, for she called me by name; but what did she think of me? That was a problem I could not solve. As I grew better I knew that I must solve it somehow. I had loved Dimple once, and I loved her yet, with a sort of new love too, born of the present as well as the past. And I wondered whether she had kept single for my sake.

At last I spoke to her.

"Dimple," I said, "will you come here?"

She was sewing in the fading light near the window, but she laid down her work and came to me.

"Do you want any thing, Mr. Jasper?"

"I do, a few words with you."

"And welcome," she said, smiling.

"I'm so much better now," I said, "that I shall

KAMEHAMEHA V., KING OF THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—(See Page 230.)

THE LATE KING OF SIAM.—(See First Page.)

ELEPHANT-HUNTING IN CENTRAL AFRICA.

We give on this page an illustration of a characteristic scene in Central African life as witnessed by the well-known traveler, Mr. S. W. BAKER, in his expedition to the sources of the White Nile and the shores of Lake Albert, Nyassa. The subject of the sketch is elephant-hunting with the sabre, as practiced by the Hamran Arabs on the frontiers of Abyssinia, along the Setite River. Mr. BAKER hunted with these Arabs for some months in 1862.

So dextrous are they as riders that they can pick up a stone from the ground at full gallop, and both dismount and remount at the same pace. They hunt all kinds of animals with no other weapon than the sabre, including the lion, the rhinoceros, and the elephant. The great art is to divert the attention of the elephant when hunted to bay; the enraged animal then follows one man with great fury, and at this opportunity a hunter gallops up behind him and, swiftly dismounting, severs the "tendon of Achilles" with one blow of the sabre, used with two hands. This at once disables the huge beast, and, the blow being repeated on the other leg, he quickly bleeds to death, being thus actually killed with the sabre.

ARABS OF ABYSSINIA HUNTING THE ELEPHANT.

No other tribe but the Haranan Arabs hunt in this way. The danger is exceedingly great, and many hunters lose their lives. Having shared in these hunts, Mr. BAKER has been an eye-witness to what might otherwise have seemed, even to an old elephant-hunter like himself, quite incredible.

ROBERT EDMUND LEE.

ROBERT EDMUND LEE was undoubtedly the most popular of the conspicuous Confederate leaders. The political chiefs had all excited special animosities, but a certain passivity of temperament and mildness of manner conciliated all who came personally in contact with Lee, and his military career had separated him from local intrigues and consequent odium. It pleased the imagination of his section, also, that he was of a noted Virginia family spring of English Cavaliers. His father was "Light Horse" or "Legion Harry" of the Revolution, who had been warmly praised by WASHINGTON and GUNTER, and was known as one of the most dashing officers of that war. Lee himself was the owner of the White House estate and of Arlington House, and, as second in his class at West Point, as a brave soldier in Mexico, where he was brevetted as Colonel, as Superintendent of the Military Academy, and Chief of Staff to Lieutenant-General SCOTT, he added individual distinction to that which he had inherited, and completed the spell which charmed the Southern fancy. It was not difficult for that fancy to see in such a man, when placed at the head of an army, a "great Captain," and to describe a leader whose life was correct as a "Christian soldier and gentleman."

General Lee was born in 1807, and graduated at West Point in 1829. He was First Lieutenant of Engineers in 1834, and Captain in 1838. He was Chief Engineer with General WOOL in Mexico, served gallantly in the chief actions there, was severely wounded, and finally brevetted Colonel. In 1852 he was Superintendent at West Point. In 1855 he was relieved and made Lieutenant-Colonel of the Second Cavalry. On the 16th March, 1861, he was made Colonel of the First Cavalry. From the time that he left Mexico until he drew his sword against the United States he had seen no active service, except that, during the night of the 13th October, 1858, following the failure of old JOHN BROWN'S enterprise at Harper's Ferry, Lieutenant-Colonel Lee arrived with sixty United States marines and two pieces of artillery, and occupied the Armory guard, very near the engine-house.

Colonel Lee remained attached to the military family of General Scott, and in intimate personal and official relations with him, until the 20th of

ROBERT E. LEE, IN CIVIL LIFE. (Photographed by Brady.)

April, 1861, the day after the massacre in Baltimore, and six days after the fall of Fort Sumter. On that day he wrote to General SCOTT from Arlington House, resigning his commission. He had already received overtures from the rebel authorities in Virginia, and no one knew better than Colonel Lee that resignation in the face of the enemy, with the intention of joining him, is treated as desertion by the military custom of all nations. But led in the political school of his section, which made the flag under which he had always served an unmeaning rag, a sincere sophistry doubtless saved Colonel Lee from the sense of dishonor. In his letter of resignation he speaks with unquestionable sincerity of "the struggle it has cost me to separate myself from a service to which I have devoted all the best years of my life and all the ability I possessed.... Save in defense of my native State I never desire again to draw my sword." It was not the letter of a conscious conspirator, but of a man deluded and confused by a conflict which he could not comprehend. On the same day he wrote to his sister: "Though I recognize no necessity for this state of things, and would have forbore and pleaded to the end for redress of grievance real or supposed, yet in my own person I had to meet the question whether I should take part against my native State. With all my devotion to the Union and the feeling of loyalty and duty of an American citizen I have not been able to make up my mind to raise my hand against my relatives, my children, my home." After speaking of his resignation and his hope that his State may never need his services, he concludes: "I know you will blame me, but you must think as kindly of me as you can, and believe that I have endeavored to do what I thought right."

These letters were written on the 20th of April. Three days before, on the 17th, the Virginia Convention had secretly voted to secede. On the 23rd Governor LETCHER proclaimed that the State had joined the Confederacy, although the question had not yet been submitted to the people, and he placed the whole military force of Virginia under the supreme command of JEFFERSON DAVIS of Mississippi. Yet such was the confusion of Colonel Lee's mind as to the actual situation, that on the 6th of May he accepted the chief command of all the secession forces in Virginia, seventeen days before the State voted to secede, which she did, under the advice of JAMES M. MASON that every one who offered to vote against secession should be shot. In his late testimony General Lee says that he unhesitatingly took the oath to the Confederacy if it were required, but he does not recall the fact. He was soon afterwards appointed General, and finally Generalissimo of the Confederate forces, but remained in Virginia throughout the war, personally directing the operations in defense of Richmond.

It is remarkable that the fate of the Confederacy should have been entrusted to one who recognized "no necessity for this state of things," and who acted from what may be called a mechanical sense of duty. General Lee, according to his own testimony, had none of the ardent convictions of his associates, and his career is an interesting illustration of the moral confusion so often produced by a merely military training. For granting Virginia to be the supreme authority to which he owed allegiance, was all that Virginia did to be approved and personally supported by him merely because she did it? Is the moral duty of a man abrogated because his government commits a crime—for surely a resolution involving the misery of war, if it be of "no necessity," is a crime. Taking General Lee's own view, if Virginia fled upon a foreign government without necessity, was the foreign government to submit; or if it resisted did its resistance make the assault necessary? Such questions, of course, were not asked by General Lee. He was a Virginian. Virginia commanded, or he thought she did, and he obeyed, but with more slacity than might have been expected of so reluctant an adherent of State sovereignty. Such conduct may show the discipline of the soldier, but it certainly proves the moral confusion of the man.

THE LATE SOLOMON FOOT, SENATOR FROM VERMONT.—(Photographed by Brady.—See Page 236.)

THE REV. ALEXANDER CRUMMELL.—(See Page 236.)

Mexico had proved the personal gallantry of General Lee, but his genius as the commander of an army was yet to be proved. In the opening of the late war his strategy in West Virginia was much celebrated among the Confederates, but it failed in its results. He was defeated there by General Fremont at Greenbrier, and his military capacity was first fully tested in the Peninsula Campaign. He was already called a great captain; he stood upon his own ground; his army equaled that of his antagonist, and that antagonist was McClellan. Here certainly was an opportunity. A candid writer in HARPER'S admirable "Pictorial History of the Great Rebellion," who has thoroughly studied in the reports of both sides the Peninsula Campaign and the Seven Days' Battles, says that "never in history was better fighting and never worse generalship on both sides;" and he attributes Lee's success in raising the siege to the fact that he committed fewer errors than McClellan.

Lee's two aggressive movements were fatal failures. The first ended at Antietam, which the rebels claimed as a victory—a claim which is ostensibly confirmed by McClellan's permission to Lee to withdraw across the river unopposed. The second ended at Gettysburg, which, with the fall of Vicksburg, was the turning-point of the war. General Lee continued, however, to show a brave front in Virginia, although he doubtless foresaw the final catastrophe of his cause. The country favored him entirely. It was peculiarly difficult for an invading force, and Lee, taught by sharp experience, remained upon the defensive to the end. General Grant's final campaign against him was masterly. His task was simple, but it was tremendous; for it was to hurl the enemy back upon his base, and destroy him on the way, if possible; and failing that, after he was securely entrenched in his citadel. It was done; and General Lee's surrender to General Grant was the virtual end of the war.

The confidence of the Confederates in General Lee was unshaken to the last, and they would doubtless have gladly seen him made Dictator. No word of censure or of harsh criticism was ever spoken against him, and when he surrendered he was more trusted than ever. His portrait hangs in all the homes of the late insurgent section; and it is one of the curious incidents of the whole insurrection that a man doubtless of an amiable character, but of no more remarkable qualities than General Lee has displayed, should be its idol.

The strongest feeling against General Lee among loyal citizens arose, first, from his proceeding directly from the military confidence of General Scott to the direction of the enemy's operations; and then from his total inaction during the sufferings of Union men at Belle Isle, the Libby, Andersonville, and Salisbury. In his late testimony he states distinctly that he knew of no cruelty, and has no reason to believe that it was practiced; that no report of suffering was made to him; that he knew, of course, in a general way, that prisoners on both sides suffered somewhat; but the care of prisoners was entirely in the hands of the War Department, and he had heard vaguely that it had done what it could for relief. But General Lee could not have been ignorant of the horrid reports. He must have known from the papers that Congress had appointed a Commission of Investigation. He must have seen the accounts of the condition of returned prisoners; and Belle Isle was almost in sight of his home in Richmond. If the circumstances had been revealed, if the cry of the whole Confederacy against our treatment of their prisoners had gone up to heaven and through the world, if they had appointed Commissions of Investigation, and we had read detailed reports in their papers of the treatment endured by their captive soldiers—and if a prison under General Grant's very eye were noted as one of the worst, and General Grant had either asked a question or expressed a wonder, nor sought in any manner whatever to test the truth of such harrowing and innocent tales—we are very sure that General Grant's portrait would not now hang in every loyal home as it does, and the loyal heart of the Union would have as severely denounced as now it sincerely applauds his name.

After the surrender in April General Lee withdrew from public observation, and in the following October he was elected President of a college at Lexington, Virginia, where he has since resided. The war has stripped him of his considerable private fortune. He has, unfortunately, like all the chief leaders of the Confederate movement, fully acquiesced in the result of forcible Secession. His testimony reveals his opinion that "generosity and liberality toward the entire South" would be the surest and speediest method of reconciliation, and that he does not know or suspect any intention there of further resistance to the Government. Yet he does not conceal his conviction of a present total alienation of feeling, nor his opinion that it would be better for Virginia to be rid of the colored population. He adds that he has always been of that opinion, and has always favored gradual emancipation.

The family name of Lee has a certain prominence in our history. THOMAS LEE, the grandfather of General Lee, was acting Provisional Governor of the Colony of Virginia more than a century ago. He was the grandson of the first emigrant of his name to this country. His son, RICHARD HENRY LEE, the celebrated orator, moved the resolution of independence in the Continental Congress, on the 7th of June, 1776; and he and his brother FRANCIS LIGHTFOOT signed the great Declaration. History will estimate their powers very differently. It will not call any of them great. It will record in their conspicuous weakness of character; but it will doubtless acquit them all of base intention.

THE LATE SENATOR FOOT.

On Wednesday, March 28, SOLOMON FOOT, United States Senator from Vermont, died in Washington. He was the oldest member of the Senate in continuous service. He was, as Senator DOOLITTLE said in Rutland the other day, "revered as the Father of the Senate."

Senator Foot was born in 1802, at Cornwall, Addison County, Vermont; graduated at Middlebury College in 1826; became Principal of Castleton Seminary in 1826; was a tutor in the University of Vermont in 1827; and from 1828 to 1831 was Professor of Natural Philosophy in the Vermont Academy of Medicine in Castleton. His mental predilections, always toward the legal profession, directed him toward the bar, which he entered in 1831, and, settling at Rutland, which city had ever since been his home, he at once commenced practice, and was at once successful. The appreciation of his fellow-citizens did not long allow him to remain in his chosen sphere of action; for in 1838, 1836, 1837, 1838, and again in 1847, he was sent to the Legislature as Representative from Rutland, and his popularity in that assembly afterward, in 1837, raised him to the Speaker's chair, which he occupied during his last three terms of service. After this a wider sphere of duty demanded his presence, and he entered Congress in 1842, being re-elected in 1844. Returning to Rutland in 1846, after having declined re-election, he resumed his legal practice, but was suffered to retain it for only four years, being elected United States Senator in 1850. He held this position ever after. His present term of office would have expired in 1868. His Congressional life was active and highly serviceable. He was an able and conscientious member of several important committees, and during a part of the Thirty-sixth and the whole of the Thirty-seventh Congress President pro tem. of that body.

Senator Foot was, at the same time, a man of great tact in all the details of business, and a speaker of considerable oratorical power. No one could look upon his face without being convinced of three things: that Mr. Foot was a man of great common sense; that he was a perfect gentleman; and that he was a Christian. "When I leave this chamber," he said, shortly before his death, "I wish no parade, no ostentatious demonstrations to be made; only the ordinary proceedings which custom and propriety impose. I desire to be borne to my friends and home in Rutland, Vermont—a people who have always been faithful to me, more faithful to me than I have been to them, I fear; they have done so much for me. I have no home there, but they will prepare every thing needful; and there by them, among that people, let me be buried." "I was not present," says Senator DOOLITTLE, "when he breathed his last; but from the account which I received immediately after from those who were present, his consciousness remained clear to the last, and his utterance distinct, almost to the very last breath. In his last words, distinctly uttered, he left another message which speaks not only to you and to me, but to all men and for all time. In all history I can not remember to have read of a dying Christian whose last words were more touching and heavenly, and more triumphant over death and the grave. Seeing his time was at hand, the words of the twenty-third Psalm were then repeated to him by his wife. He called her to his side and folded his arms around her for a moment. Then, as his breathing became choked, he said: 'What! can this be death? so easy? Has it come already?' In a few moments after, with a face lighted up as with a soul just entering into Paradise, he joyfully exclaimed, 'I see it! I see it! The gates are wide open. Beautiful! Beautiful! And in a very few moments after uttering these words he expired. As a statesman and a Senator, we honor him as a man of noble character. We cherish his memory as a true and faithful friend. We love him, and as a dying Christian what a glorious example to all mankind!"

KAMEHAMEHA V., KING OF HAWAII.

The portrait which we give on page 236 of the King of Hawaii is pronounced to be a very good likeness.

This King KAMEHAMEHA V., pronounced KAMIA-MAMA, succeeded his brother, the late King and husband of Queen EDMA, on November 30, 1863, being then thirty-one years old. Since his accession he has exhibited considerable ability, judgment, and firmness. One of the first acts of his reign was to refuse to take the oath to the existing Constitution, and by a peaceful coup-d'etat to give his subjects a new Constitution, which Englishmen doubtless think better adapted to their state of civilization and their national ideas than the democratic one established by his uncle, KAMEHAMEHA III., under the influence of the American missionaries, in 1822.

The history of the revolution in the politics of the Sandwich Islands thus brought about under British influence is very interesting. By the articles of the Constitution given to the people in 1822 by KAMEHAMEHA III., it was incumbent on the successor to the vacant throne to take an oath that he would maintain the Constitution of the kingdom whole and inviolate, and would govern in conformity therewith. This no lover of free government would hesitate to pronounce an advance upon the previous political status of the kingdom. Up to the year 1839 the Hawaiian Islands were governed by an absolute monarch, and upon strictly feudal principles. In that year the efforts of the American missionaries who had given much useful assistance in governing the country, worked so far on the patriotic King, KAMEHAMEHA III., as to induce him to sign a Bill of Rights, and, the following year, to grant a Constitution, by which absolute rule was yielded up, and irresponsible power exchanged for government by the three estates of king, nobles, and people. In 1850 the King, influenced by his British friends, recommended a new Constitution, less Democratic in its features. It was perfected in 1852 and signed by the King, who died two years afterward.

At a later period Mr. WYLLIE, a Scotch gentleman connected with the Government, corresponded with Sir JOHN BOWRING concerning further alterations. Sir JOHN, the editor of Jeremy Bentham, had a horror of democracy. The opening sentence of the Declaration of Rights, borrowed from its American prototype, that "all men are born free and equal," appeared to this aristocratic gentleman to be too revolutionary; but in spite of his reasoning the clause was retained. Article 12 of the Declaration pronounced that "No person who imports a slave or slaves into the King's dominions shall ever enjoy any civil or political rights in this realm." Article 19 prescribed, "All elections of the people shall be by ballot;" and Article 78 established manhood-suffrage.

KAMEHAMEHA V., who came to the throne in November, 1863, wished to get rid, by means of a national vote, of universal suffrage, and to replace it by a qualification based on income and property. He refused to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution, and called a convention to alter the provisions of this latter instrument. The conflict in the convention was spirited and sharp. There was much wrangling, and out a little abuse. On the part of the representatives there was determined opposition to the King's design.

On the 13th of August the King's patience had broken down. "This is the fifth day of the discussion of this article," said his Majesty. "I am very sorry that we do not agree on this important point. It is clear to me that if universal suffrage is permitted this Government will soon lose its monarchic character. Thank you, delegates and nobles, for the readiness with which you have come to this convention, in accordance with my proclamation. As we do not agree, it is useless to prolong the session. And as at the time his Majesty KAMEHAMEHA III. gave the Constitution of the year 1852, he reserved to himself the power of taking it away, if it was not for the interest of his Government and people; and as it is clear to me that that King left the revision of the Constitution to my predecessor and myself; therefore, as I sit in his seat, on the part of the sovereignty of the Hawaiian Islands, I make known to-day that the Constitution of 1852 is abrogated. I will give you a Constitution." His Majesty requested ministers to remain at present in their respective positions, in order to avoid confusion and disturbance, and he then dissolved the convention.

On the 20th of August, a week after the breaking up of the Convention, the promised new Constitution appeared. It omits the obnoxious axiom about "free and equal," gives the King a larger place in the state, makes cabinet ministers more responsible, excludes the ballot, prescribes as the minimum qualification of a representative real estate of five hundred dollars' value, and annual income of two hundred and fifty dollars; and of an elector, property of one hundred and fifty dollars, or twenty-five dollars a year rent on leasehold property, and seventy-five dollars yearly income, together with certain intellectual acquirements. It includes a stringent article on royal marriages, and on the accession to the Crown; and, the King being unmarried, it provides for a new step for a royal family, should the present race become extinct.

The little kingdom of Hawaii is, we are glad to see, increasing in commercial prosperity. There is a rapidly-increasing export of sugar, coffee, and other produce, whence the islands are called the West Indies of the Pacific. The foreign population of English, Americans, Germans, and French is yearly increasing. The native population is inadequate for the labor required, and the Government has lately sent out a Commission for importing coolies. A line of steamers is about to be established between San Francisco and China, calling at Honolulu, which will shorten the voyage from England to about six weeks. The country seems to offer many inducements to intending emigrants.

REV. ALEXANDER CRUMMELL, A.B.

ALEXANDER CRUMMELL, though born in America, is probably of purely African descent. His appearance certainly shows not the slightest taint of white blood. His father, BOSTON CRUMMELL, was stolen from the neighborhood of Sierra Leone about the year 1780, when he was 13 years old. His mother was born in Jericho, Long Island, and her ancestors had been free for at least a hundred years. She was brought up in the Hicks family—a family that produced the celebrated Unitarian Quaker ELIAS HICKS. Both parents were brought up in the Episcopal Church. Their son, ALEXANDER, was born in New York in 1819, and attended until 1832 the "African school No. 2," established for colored children by the Matamoras Society. In 1835, with his father's consent, he took all his little scanty earnings, and, thirsting for knowledge, went to Canaan Academy in Connecticut. This school was designed to furnish an advanced and solid education to colored youth; but the spirit of prejudice was so bitter in the neighborhood that, in August of that year, "a mob assembled in Canaan, and, with the aid of ninety-five yoke of oxen and two days' hard labor, finally succeeded in removing the academy from its site—and afterward they destroyed it by fire." The pupils were compelled to leave the town. Young CRUMMELL returned to New York.

About this time a school was established at Whitesborough, New York, known as "Onesida Institute," to which colored pupils were admitted; and to this new hall of learning, then under the presidency of Rev. BENJAMIN GREEN, a most able teacher and thinker, he repaired, and remained three years. While there he supported himself by the labor of his own hands in the field. Again at home, and with a yearning to enter the Christian ministry, at the earnest solicitation of his pastor, Rev. PETER WILLIAMS, he applied for entrance into the General Theological Seminary of the Episcopal Church. But he was refused on account of his complexion.

With undaunted resolution he went to Boston, and through the influence and kindness of Rev. T. M. CLARK, D.D., now Bishop of Rhode Island, Dr. CROSWELL, and Dr. STROUD, of Boston, he was introduced to Bishop GASWOLD, of Massachusetts. The Bishop received him as a candidate with great cordiality, and remarked that "he wished he had a score of colored candidates—he would gladly receive them all." He went to New Haven to complete his theological studies at Yale Theological Seminary; after which he was ordained Deacon by Bishop GASWOLD in St. Paul's Church, Boston, and Priest by Bishop LEE, of Delaware, in St. Paul's Church, Philadelphia.

He officiated in Philadelphia and New York until 1848, when he went to England. While in England several distinguished persons, who knew of the treatment he had received by the church in New York, proffered him a university course at Cambridge. He accepted this, and continued at the University three years and a half—took his degree of A.B., and, leaving England, went as a missionary to Africa. He became a citizen of Liberia, and labored with great acceptance and success, not only among the heathen natives, but in Monrovia and at Cape Palmas, in raising the standard of thought and education among the emigrant population. He became Master of the High School at Cape Palmas, and three years ago was appointed "Professor of Intellectual and Moral Science in Liberia College."

Mr. CRUMMELL is in every sense a finished man. Polished in manners, dignified in deportment, interesting and instructive in conversation, logical in thought and eloquent in delivery, both extemporaneously and in the pulpit, he is an ornament to his holy calling, and vindicates in his own history and person the claims of his race to justice and equal rights.

Among his published writings are, "An Elogy on Clarkson;" a volume of "Addresses, Sermons," etc., published in England; "The Responsibilities of the first Fathers of a Country;" "The Negro Race not under a Curse;" "The Relations and Duties of Free Colored Men in America to Africa;" "The English Language in Liberia;" and "The Future of Africa," published three years ago in New York. This last volume, made up mainly of discourses and addresses delivered in Africa, evinces talent, thought, and cultivation of no common order. The leading idea is, that the colored man, then shut out from a worthy career in Europe and America, has a promising future before him in Africa, where he has been called to meet the demands of civilization, commerce, and nationality.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

March 27: In the Senate, the President's Veto Message, giving 82 objections to the Civil Rights Bill, was received.—The vote on the New Jersey contested election case was reconsidered, and Mr. STOCKTON was declared not entitled to his seat.—32 to 21.

In the House, Mr. CORKING, from the Joint Committee on Reconstruction, reported the testimony taken in reference to the States of Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina.

March 28: In the Senate, the death of Senator FOOT, from Vermont, was announced, and the Senate adjourned.

In the House, on Mr. MORTON'S motion, a bill was passed, enacting that "All proceedings involving the levy and collection of the national tax provided in schedule A of Section 500 of the Act to provide Internal Revenue, etc., approved June 20, 1864, and the act supplementary thereto, approved March 3, 1865, and all proceedings in the levy, return, and collection of the income tax, approved by act set, be postponed for the space of two months. Provided: That all the provisions, remedies, and penalties in said act shall remain in full force and effect in all respects, except so far as the same are changed as to time by the postponement aforesaid."—The Bankrupt Bill came up, and Mr. HOPKINS spoke strongly in its favor. He said some such bill was necessary. He had examined this bill thoroughly, and was free to say that he believed no bankruptcy bill was ever drawn in the country so equal and just in its provisions to all sections of the country as this one, because it extended its benefits to the people of the Southern States as well as to the people of the Northern States. The bill was defeated—yeas 56, nays 78. A motion to reconsider prevailed, and the matter was postponed for one week.

March 29: In the Senate, no business was transacted, and the Senate proceeded at 1 o'clock to engage in the funeral services in honor of Senator FOOT.

In the House, resolutions of respect toward Senator FOOT were adopted, and the House adjourned until Monday.

April 1: In the Senate, Mr. WILSON, from the Military Committee, reported the bill to equalize bounties in a new form, when it was re-committed to the Military Committee. It gives to every soldier in the late war eight and one-third dollars per month, minus the amount already paid.

In the House, Mr. WARD offered a resolution, which was adopted, in favor of prompt action in authorizing an equalization of bounties.

NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.

March 27: In the Senate, the bill incorporating the New York Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and authorizing an appointment of an Assistant Superintendent of Schools in Brooklyn, were passed; also, the bill to change the name of the Free Academy.

In the Assembly, the bill relative to powers and duties of General Park Commissioners, and also to extend their term of office for five years, was passed; also the bill to prohibit the Mayor and Comptroller of New York from disposing of real estate belonging to said Comptroller was lost by a vote of 45 to 33—requiring a two-thirds vote.

March 28: In the Assembly, the bill to incorporate the Underground Railway Company was considered in Committee of the Whole, and discussed at length. No material amendments were made to the bill as printed. It was ordered to a third reading. Afterward the rules were suspended, and the bill put upon its third reading and passed, yeas 94, nays 13.

March 29: In the Senate, bills were passed conferring upon the Metropolitan Board of Health the exclusive power to grant licenses for the sale of liquors within the said district, and prohibiting the Railroad Companies in this State from issuing free passes.

In the Assembly, the bill declaring eight hours' labor a day's work was lost—yeas 64, nays 64.

THE PROCLAMATION OF PEACE.

The President has chosen the anniversary of the capture of Richmond as the fit occasion for an official proclamation of the close of the war, or, to use the words of the Proclamation, "that the insurrection which broke-less articles in the States of Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Florida is at an end, and henceforth to be so reported."

NEWS ITEMS. The shipment of produce (including cotton) from this port, week ending March 31, reached the currency value of $4,187,500, making the total value of the exports of produce and merchandise from the port, since the 1st of January, nearly $27,500,000.

The hospital records, which have just been noted up, show the enormous aggregate of 233,000 Union soldiers to have died on battle-fields and in hospitals during the war to suppress the rebellion. This does not include those who died at their homes of lingering diseases contracted in the service.

The resignation of Major-General John M. Palmer, commanding the Department of Kentucky, tendered seven days ago, has been accepted by President Johnson. General Jefferson C. Davis has been appointed in his place. J. Ross Browne, who accompanied General McDowell in his expedition to Arizona, was taken sick at Soda Lake, and had to be left at Fort Mohave.

FOREIGN NEWS.

From England the principal item of interest is the continued advance of American securities. Five-Twenties having reached 7 1/2. The London Times of the 11th announces that a British war vessel will be sent out, after due notice, to exclude American fishermen from the British Fisheries. St. Patrick's Day passed off quietly in Ireland. No disturbance whatever occurred, and the customary festivities passed off as usual.

In the House of Commons on the 13th, Mr. Gladstone, in a lengthy speech, explained the Reform Bill. The main features are a reduction of the qualification of county voters from fifty pounds to fourteen pounds competency, and for boroughs to seven pounds rental, and to reduce the poll tax from one penny to one-half penny. The measure will add about 400,000 to the number of voters. The bill deals only with the franchise, leaving the redistribution of representation for another session.

The cholera is said to have made its appearance in some of the districts of Germany. In that case the danger to ourselves is somewhat imminent, on account of the continuous stream of emigration to the United States from that country.

ALEXANDRA HOTEL, HYDE PARK CORNER.

This magnificent Hotel, occupying one of the most cheerful, healthy, and pleasant sites in London, overlooking Hyde Park, Golden Square, and the Serpentine, is now open as such a "Grand Tourist" as to render it the cheapest and most desirable Hotel in London.

It comprises numerous suites of Apartments, a spacious and elegant Coffee-Room, a Ladies' Coffee-Room, a Smoking-Room, &c.

There is an Ascending-Room for Visitors to every floor. Arrangements can be made for Board and Lodgings for a fixed charge.

WEDDING BREAKFASTS PROVIDED. APPLICATIONS TO BE MADE TO THE MANAGER.

IRON CASTINGS AND STEAM BOILERS.

THE HINKLEY & WILLIAMS WORKS, 410 Harrison Avenue, Boston.

Are prepared to manufacture common and gun-metal Castings, of from ten pounds to thirty ton weight, made to green sand, dry sand, or loam, as desired; also fine and Tubular Boilers, and "HINKLEY'S PATENT BOILER," for Locomotive or Stationary Engines, warranted to save a large percentage of fuel over any boiler now in use.

ART NOTICE

WENDROTH TAYLOR & BROWN'S Fine Miniatures from Life, and copied from other pictures. Engravings made by E. Y. KELLY & CO., 179 Broadway. Please examine specimens.

Alcock's Porous Plasters

A celebrated physician says he was amazed at the great number of beneficial indications produced by one of these Plasters. He affirms that headache is cured by one worn just below the forehead; that one placed over the nasal will cure hysteria as well as dysmeny, and affections of the bowels.

CURE OF YALCOCK VEINS.

T. ALCOCK & Co.—Seeing your notice in the Police Gazette, I got four of your Porous Plasters, and placed them on the parts where the pains were most acute, and in less than twelve hours could walk as well as ever. I could hardly believe it, I was so well pleased. I wanted to see if the increase would come back on me or not, so I did more walking that day than I had done in a week. The next day I had some pain in my hip; but I put on a plaster there, and in two hours the pain was all gone; nor have I felt it since. Certainly they are the best application for the relief and cure of pains in the joints and back, and for various or enlarged veins, I have ever known; and I would not be without them on any account.

Yours, truly, JOSEPH GARWOOD. Principal office, 294 Canal Street, New York. Sold by all respectable Dealers in Medicines.

A Household Necessity Exists for the Use of DURNO'S CATARRH SNUFF,

Which, in the first stages of a cold, acts like magic. Headache, Hoarseness, Dysphagia, and Bronchitis, Sore Eyes, Dizziness, Bad Taste and Smell—being the result of Catarrh—this snuff removes and prevents all these, and restores a healthy throat. Its effects are pleasant and safe, even for infants who suffer from Croup.

It has the highest professional testimonials. Sold by all Druggists, or sent by Mail to all parts of the United States, for 25 cents for One Box, or $1 for Four Boxes. Address JAS. DURNO, P. O. Box 1765, New York. Wholesale by D. BARNES & CO., 21 Park Row, N. Y.

G. L. & J. B. KELTY,

MANUFACTURERS OF WINDOW SHADES, IMPORTERS OF CURTAINS AND CURTAIN MATERIALS, REMOVED TO 447 BROADWAY, Above Canal Street. NEW STYLES FOR 1866 NOW READY.

J. H. Winslow & Co.

100,000 Watches, Clocks, Silver Articles, &c.

Worth $500,000!

TO BE SOLD AT ONE DOLLAR EACH, WITHOUT REGARD TO VALUE, AND NOT TO BE PAID FOR TILL YOU KNOW WHAT YOU ARE TO GET.

SPLENDID LIST OF ARTICLES.

- 100 Gold Hunting Case Watches..... $110 00
200 Gold Watches..... 70 00
300 Ladies' Gold Watches..... 60 00
600 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches..... 15 00
1000 Revolving Cutlery..... $15 00 to 25 00
2000 Drinking-Cups..... 7 00 to 10 00
5000 Oval and Chased Gold Spoon-knives..... 5 00 to 10 00
3000 Vest, Neck, and Gaiter Chains..... 5 00 to 10 00
3000 Ladies' California Diamond Rings..... 3 00 to 6 00
5000 Magic Spring and Soap Lockets..... 4 00 to 10 00
10000 Gold Pens, Silver-Mounted Holders..... 4 00 to 6 00
10000 Gold Pens, with Silver Extension Cases 4 00 to 6 00
5000 Sets Ladies' Jewelry..... 5 00 to 10 00
5000 Tea, Dessert, & Table Spoons, per dozen 22 00 to 24 00
5000 Dessert and Table Forks, per doz..... 14 00 to 16 00
4000 Dinner Knives, per pair..... 6 00 to 10 00
3000 Napkin Rings, per pair..... 6 00 to 10 00
21000 Other Articles..... 4 00 to 10 00

Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one can have, are sent out in envelopes, sealed up and numbered; and, when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of the Certificate you will see what you can have, and then it is all your option to send one dollar and take the article or not. One of these envelopes will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents; 5 for $1; seven for $2; 10 for $3; 40 for $10; and 200 for $15.

Agents wanted every where. Great inducements to ladies and gentle to act as such. Full list and send for circular, which gives special terms, full list, and particulars. Address J. H. WINSLOW & CO., 208 Broadway, N. Y. (INCORPORATED 1861.)

PRINTING PRESS FOR SALE.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, Five Rollers, Table Distribution, Set 2000. Price $2000. The Press on which Harper's Weekly has been printed. Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 321 Pearl Street, New York.

GEN. LEE'S OWN STORY.

General Robert E. Lee's story of the operations of the Army of Northern Virginia, just published in Part 55 of the Rebellion Record, edited by FRANK MOORE. Illustrated with wood portraits of Maj.-Gen. R. W. HENRY and Maj.-Gen. H. J. HUNT. Price 50 cents. D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, No. 129 Broadway, New York.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

201 BROADWAY (at Nicholas Street). Photographic Materials, Stereoscopic Goods, WAR VIEWS, SCENERY, GROUPS, &c.

Photograph Albums, great assortment, Cartes de Visite of Noted Persons, &c. &c. French English, and American Novelties.

BEAUTY! BEAUTY!

Would you render yourself irresistibly beautiful? Then send at once for "The Parisian Ladies' System of Permanent Beauty." Thousands of testimonials from leading Star Actresses, and ladies of fashion in every part of the United States. Price 25 cents, sent by mail to any address. Address Box 2265, W. B. LEXINGTON & Co., Agents, Chicago, Illinois.

DOLLARS A DAY, To Agents.

A simple Chloroform, Balm, and 100 engravings of Animals, Birds, and Insects. 50 K. Card and the "Ladies' Gossip" all FREE. Send 19 cents postage, to BRUCE, HICKENS & BOYD, Publishers, Station 14, Bellevue House, New York.

THE CHORUS WREATH: A collection of SACRED and SECLAR CHORUSES from Gustavus, Opeter, and Popular Old and New Books; designed as a Standard Book for Church, Musical Societies, Charities, and Schools, and containing all of the most desirable Pieces for Private Practice and Public Performance. Price $1 25—on receipt of which copies will be mailed, postpaid. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

THIS IS A Metal Top Lamp Chimney

That will not break by heat, gives a LARGE FLAME, BURNS UP ALL GAS AND SMOKE; in fact, the MOST PERFECT ARTICLE KNOWN.

New Lamp Chimney Co.,

73 Warren Street, New York.

Fresh Garden and Flower Seeds

Prepared by Mail, of the choicest sorts. Also Fruit and Ornamental Trees, 150,000 Fruit Seeds, Grasses, and Strawberries, &c. of the best kinds. Priced Descriptive Catalogues, gratis, to any address. Wholesale Lists for the Trade. Agents wanted. B. N. WATSON, Old Corner Newsroom and Book Establishment, PLAZA, N. Y.

Pile Remedy

DR. STRICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Hemorrhoids and Bleeding Piles. It gives immediate relief and effects a permanent cure. Try it directly. It is warranted to cure. For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

Coughs

DR. STRICKLAND'S WHOLEFLOUGH SMOOTH BAL-SAM is warranted to cure Coughs, Colds, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs. For sale by Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

Debility and Emaciation

Result from a lack of ability in the stomach to convert the food into nutriment. Strengthen the digestive powers with HOTTETTER'S BOTTLES, and vigor will return to the muscles, flesh, and the entire system. For sale by Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

MOTH AND FRECKLES.

Ladies affected with Dandruff on the Face, called moth-patches, or freckles, should use PERKY'S celebrated MOTH and FRECKLE LOTION. It is infallible. Prepared by Dr. B. C. PERKY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond Street, New York. Sold by all druggists.

FIRST PREMIUM IMPROVED

$5 SEWING MACHINE $5

The embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Originally patented May 12, 1852; Improvement patented June 9, 1862. The celebrated FAMILY GIFT SEWING MACHINE, with numerous attachments, is essential in operation, saves the STRONGEST FORCE, and sews with regularity and accuracy. Makes the machine superior to any other of the kind. It is not out of order in 5 years. It has taken the prizes at 30 Fairs, and received the approval of all the principal journals and of those who have used it. It is the best low-priced sewing machine that has received a premium, or that is PATENTED.

"For the dressmaker it is invaluable; for the household it supplies a vacant place."—Godey's Ladies' Book. "With single or double thread, it stitches in very rapidly make the stitch exactly like hand-sewing."—New York Tribune.

Single machines, all countries, sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instructions, on receipt of the price, $5. $3 dollars guaranteed. Agents wanted every where. Circular, containing liberal inducements, sent free. Address all orders, FAMILY GIFT SEWING MACHINE COMPANY, Office 103 Nassau Street, New York.

OCCUPATION

At your own house, thousands can realize a hundred dollars weekly. No money required except those found in every household. Profits 100 per cent. Demand stable as fear. It is the greatest discovery of the age. Full particulars sent on receipt of 1 cent for return postage. Address HOPKINS & BROWN, 641 Broadway, N. Y.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1856 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a disagreeable cough. I had for some months previous thought that a preparation, having for its basis the inside bark of white pine, might be so compounded as to be very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in disease attended to, I compounded a small quantity of the medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough subsided, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I sent some to a lady in Londonderry, N. H., who had been suffering for some weeks with a bad cough, occasioned by a sudden cold, and had raised more phlegm with blood. She soon found relief, and sent for more. She took about an ounce of it, and got well. In November, 1855, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivalled.—Boston Journal.

This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the test of eleven years in the New England States, where its merits have become so well known. It cures sore throat, cough, croup, diphtheria, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. It is a remedy for diabetes, bleeding from the kidneys and bladder, and gravel; and for piles and hemorrhoids it will be found valuable. Sold by druggists and dealers in medicinal generally.

GEN. W. SWETT, M.D., PROPRIETOR, Danvers, Mass.

BURNHAM & VAN SCHAAL, Chicago, Ill.

JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio.

GENERAL AGENTS FOR THE WEST.

O. M. DUNN & CO.

(ESTABLISHED 1826.)

Manager of the most extensive Gift Sale in the world; successfully successful in nearly 100 cities throughout the country, offer Greater Inducements than ever before.

250,000 Pins, Gold and Silver Watches, Articles of Silverware, &c., worth over $2,000,000.

All to be sold for $1 each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for till you know what you are to get.

Splendid List of Articles.

- 10 Grand Piano-Fortes..... $200 to $1200
200 Revolving Cutlery..... 400 to 600
250 Gold Hunting-case Watches..... 75 to 125
300 Ladies' Gold Watches..... 40 to 75
1,000 Ladies' and Gent's Silver Watches 20 to 50
200 First-class Sewing Machines..... 45 to 75
1,000 Cake-Baskets and Ice Pickers..... 25 to 30
1,000 Fine Cutlery and Butter-Knives..... 15 to 20
3,000 sets Knives and Forks..... 10 to 25
5,000 Sets Tea, Dessert, and Table Spoons 6 to 15
2,000 Napkin Rings, per pair..... 6 to 10
4,000 Dinner Knives, per pair..... 6 to 10
10,000 Gold Pens, silver and gold-nickel Holders, 5 to 8
5,000 California Diamond Rings..... 5 to 10
3,000 Fancy Enamelled and Gold Rings..... 5 to 10
4,000 Vest, Gaiter, and Neck Chains..... 5 to 10
10,000 Magic Spring and Soap Lockets..... 5 to 10
5,000 Drinking-Cups and Goblets..... 5 to 10
10,000 Beautiful Photograph Albums..... 5 to 10
175,000 Other Articles of Jewelry, Silverware, &c..... 5 to 25

Sealed certificates of choice, to each purchaser of a 10-photograph set of premium pictures—valuing 25 cents. The photographs are very fine, and worth the money. After opening the certificate, it is at your option to send for the article or not. You can not get less than One Dollar's worth; for the lowest article on our list is a beautiful fifty-pieces reverse-bound, every-ornamented photograph album, worth $5, which may be ordered on any certificate, while you have the possibility of drawing a watch or piano worth from $100 to $1000.

Five photographs, with certificate, and a silver letter-knife as premium, sent for $1; seven for $2, with a fine napkin-ring; thirty for $5, with a 25-pieces album worth $5; sixty-five for $10, with a silver letter-knife or 50-pieces album, worth $10; one hundred for $15, with a solid silver full-jeweled watch; worth $25.

Agents wanted every where, and the most liberal inducements ever yet offered to those who will act as such. Send for circular. Address

C. M. DUNN & CO., Headquarters 125 Nassau Street, New York.

HERE IT IS! LOOK! LOOK! New Patent "Snap-and-catch" Fish Hooks.

Take every fish that bites. For all kinds of fishing. Sets for boys. Price 50 cents for single hook, or four hooks for $1. Sent postpaid on receipt of price. Address W. E. C. FITZBUSH, Bridgeport, Harrison County, West Virginia.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES

For the Army and Navy Hospitals, Stereoscopic Druggists, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circulars sent free. Sheets of Type, Galleys, 25 cts. ANLAW PRESS COMPANY, 20 Ann St., New York.

TO FARMERS.

POUDRETTE! POUDRETTE!!

The Lodi Manufacturing Company (the oldest manufacturers of Fertilizers in the United States) offer their celebrated Poudrette for sale at lower prices than any other fertilizer in market.

It is made from the night soil and sold of New York City, and has been in use by thousands of farmers for over a quarter of a century: it will manure an Acre of Corn in the fall, and increase the yield one-third.

A Dispatch with the experience in its use on Lawns, Garden Vegetables, Corn, Potatoes, and Tobacco, of hundreds of Farmers, some of whom have used it for over 20 years, containing also price, directions for use, &c., will be sent free to any person applying.

LODI MANUFACTURING CO., 60 Courtlandt Street, New York.

TIME-KEEPER.

A SCIENTIFIC WOODEN and marvel of ingenuity. The European Pocket Time-keeper. The most wonderful invention of modern days. "Chrono-Log" warranted correct. Needs no key or winding up. Price $1 each, in Gold or Silver Gilt Cases. Sent postpaid, on receipt of price. Address J. W. DELAMATER & CO., 208 Broadway, New York. Nov. 25, 14.

CHILDREN'S CARRIAGES, every variety, & P. TIBBALS, 520 Broadway, opposite St. Nicholas.

LIBRARY DE LOVE, 3 Volumes For 75 cents. W. C. WELLS, 275 Broadway, N. Y.

USE BRIGGS' CURATIVE FOR CORNS, BUNIONS, &c.

Sold by Druggists. Dr. Briggs, Chiropractor, 28 Broadway.

SELF-CONTROL, to acquire; to conquer habits; to attain health and mental vigor—a better life. Young men interested can address, with postage, C. C. W. W. No. 2643, General Office, New York.

GREAT DISCOVERY.—DR. GRANT'S ELECTRIC OIL, is warranted to cure rheumatism, deafness, frost-bites, piles, and all aches and pains, in from 1 to 2 days. Sold by all druggists, and by THOMAS BARNES & CO., New York. Depot, Philadelphia.

VIOLENS and BOWS

Sent to any part of the U. S. on receipt of following prices: GENTIAN, Red or Brown, $2 50, $3 25, $4 00, $5 00. FERRUGINO-LAVIN, $2 50, $3 25, $4 00, $5 00, $6 00. PISTON, Black and Lead, $2 50, $3 25, $4 00, $5 00. ITALIAN, $2 50, $3 25, $4 00, $5 00, $6 00, $7 00, $8 00. Our Harrows, very fine, $20, $30, $40, $50, $75, $100. MEDICAL INSTRUMENTS of every description at low New York prices. Send stamp for price-list. Special attention given to this department. FREDERICK BLUMK, 208 Broadway.

MERWIN & BRAY, MANUFACTURERS AND WHOLESALE DEALERS IN ARMS AND AMMUNITION OF ALL KINDS.

Agents for the United States.

Leading Sporting Pistols, of different calibers, and single and double Barrel and Pocket Cartridge Revolvers. The Bolt-Action Cartridge Army size Rifle, the Pocket Pistol, the new-style Rifle and Cartridge &c. These arms have no equal in the market. For further particulars, send for illustrated Circular. MERWIN & BRAY, 208 Broadway, N. Y.

P. S.—We manufacture all our own goods; also are Sole Agents for the celebrated Colt's Model Walking Revolvers.

FAMILIES and GENTLEMEN on a visit to the OLD COUNTRY should not leave without seeing the BIRTH-PLACE OF THE IMMORTAL SHAKESPEARE, STRATFORD-UPON-AVON.

The Hotel bearing his name having undergone recent improvements, will be found replete with every comfort, combined with moderate charges.

Post Rooms and Carriage on hire.

BENJAMIN SCRIVEN, PROPRIETOR.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR APRIL, 1866.

TERMS. One Copy for one Year..... $4 00

As Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Five Subscribers at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $8 00.

Circulation 112,000.

The Publishers will accept a limited number of Single Advertisements for their Magazine, at the following low rates:

One Page..... $25 00

Half Page..... 15 00

Quarter Page..... 10 00

Or $1 50 per line for a less space. Average eight words to a line.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Proprietors.

Circulation nearly 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS. One Copy for One Year..... $4 00

One Copy for Three Months..... 1 00

And on Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Five Subscribers, at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00. Payment invariably in advance.

Two Brown Volumes of HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement will be sent to any part of the United States, free of carriage, upon receipt of the price, viz.:

Club Binding..... $7 50 per Volume.

Half Morocco..... 10 00

Each Volume contains the Numbers for One Year.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for inside, and Two Dollars per line for outside Advertisements, each insertion.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Proprietors.

THE REVUE OF
HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Vol. X.—No. 486.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 21, 1866.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
 $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

SCHOOL FOR FREEDMEN.

The "ABRAHAM LINCOLN SCHOOL" for freedmen, New Orleans, was opened on the third day of October, 1865, in one of the buildings belonging to the University of Louisiana. Rev. THOMAS W. COO-WAY, then Assistant Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, obtained it of Governor WELLS, on condition that another building, known as the "School of Medicine," and held by the Bureau for the use of the freedmen, should be released. Soon after this school was opened it had over eight hundred pupils, and an average attendance of seven hundred and fifty, with fourteen teachers, being the largest freedmen's school in the United States. From seventy to eighty per cent. of the pupils are of mixed blood. Up to the first of February Mr. EDWIN F. WAVES, a native of New York State and graduate of Yale College, was principal. His successor is Mr. M. A. WARREN. Owing to the recent change in the school system which Beuret Major-General BAIRD, Assistant Commissioner, has been compelled to adopt from a free system to one in which the tuition is paid by the pupil, the number of pupils has decreased to about four hundred, with eight teachers. The tuition required is $1.50 per month. The building on the left is a part of the Medical College which has been closed during the war, but is now opened and patronized by a large number of students. In front, between the two pillars, see the teachers, while in front, and on the steps, see the pupils just dismissed from their studies. THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, CHICAGO. The Chamber of Commerce building, of which we give an illustration on page 253, is one of the latest of the many new and handsome public edifices erected of late years in Chicago. It is located at the southeast corner of La Salle and Washington streets, and fronts the Court-house Square. The style of architecture is decidedly composite, the beauty and majesty of art having been made subordinate to the amount of capital stock and the prospect of future dividends. The dimensions of the main building are thirty-three by one hundred and eighty-one feet, and one hundred feet in height. From the main door the entrance leads up a short flight of stairs to a hall which extends the whole length of the building, each side being apportioned into business business rooms, all of which are occupied by merchants, banks, and insurance companies. The sides of the building face respectively on in Salle Street and Exchange Place. From this the ascent to the grand hall is by a double flight of stairs. This hall is the finest, in all its details, erected in the West. Eighteen windows throw their colored rays upon the room. Its loftiness, the harmony of the coloring, and the general character of the design are very imposing. It is elaborately adorned with frescoes, paintings, and appropriate designs. The hall is one hundred and forty-three feet by eighty-nine, and forty-four feet from floor to ceiling.

THE "ABRAHAM LINCOLN SCHOOL" FOR FREEDMEN, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY LILIENTHAL, NEW ORLEANS.]

The building was erected and the site purchased by an incorporated company, known as the "Chamber of Commerce," composed of members of the Board of Trade. It cost about four hundred thousand dollars.

On Wednesday, August 30, 1865, this grand edifice was dedicated, with imposing ceremonies, to Commerce. The dedication of the building was followed by a series of festivities covering three or four days.

The Board of Trade of Chicago, to whose enterprise the city owes the successful completion of this handsome structure, is composed of about fifteen hundred members. It was organized in 1848, and then numbered less than one hundred members.

For the illustration of this building, as also for the description above given, we are indebted to the courtesy of JAMES & ALAN, of Chicago, who have recently commenced the publication of a beautiful work (issued monthly, and to consist of 25 Parts), entitled "Chicago Illustrated." Chicago has made more rapid strides of progress during the last dozen years than is recorded of any city in the world's history; and the enterprise of the city is far beyond that of other cities of equal and even larger population.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 21, 1866.

RADICALISM AND CONSERVATISM.

In every political contest in a Constitutional system the names of Conservatism and Radicalism will be applied to the opposing policies, while the history of such governments shows that the policy which truly conserves the principle and spirit of a free system is that which is called Radicalism. In the conflict of opinion in England before our Revolution GEORGE III. and Dr. JOHNSON were the chief of Tory Conservatives, and saw in the doctrines and policy of EDWARD BURKE nothing but Radicalism and the overthrow of the monarchy. But BURKE was the true Conservative. His policy would have saved the empire upon its own principles.

In this country at this moment both Radicalism and Conservatism, as the names of a policy of national reorganization, are very easily defined and comprehended. Thus Radicalism holds that the late rebel States should not be suffered to take part in the government of the Union which they have so zealously striven to destroy except after searching inquiry into their condition, and upon terms which shall prevent any advantage having been gained by rebellion. By the result of the war the suffrage of a voter in South Carolina weighs as much as the vote of two voters in New York. Is that a desirable state of things? Would any fair-minded voter in South Carolina claim that he ought to have a preference in the Union because, however honestly, he has rebelled against it? Radicalism, therefore, favors an equalization of representation as a condition precedent to the full recognition of the disturbed States, and every citizen of those States who sincerely desires national unity and peace will favor it also.

Radicalism holds that equal civil rights before the law should be guaranteed by the United States to every citizen. It claims that the Government which commands the obedience of every citizen shall afford him protection, and that the freedom which the people of the United States have conferred the people of the United States shall maintain. Is that a perilous claim? Is any other course consistent with national safety or honor?

Once more: Radicalism asserts that, as the national welfare and permanent union can be established only upon justice, there should be no unreasonable political disfranchisement of any part of the people. It denies that complexion, or weight, or height are reasonable political qualifications, and it refers to the history of the country to show that they have not always been so regarded even in some of the late slave States, and remembers that both President JOHNSON and his predecessor were friends of impartial suffrage. Holding this faith, Radicalism urges that while we may honestly differ as to the wisest means of securing political equality, yet that all our efforts should constantly tend, with due respect for the proper and subordinate functions of the States in our constitutional system, to protect those equal rights of man with whose assertion our Government began, and in consequence of whose denial that Government has just escaped the most appalling fate.

This is Radicalism. Is it unfair? Is it unconstitutional? Is it anarchical or revolutionary? It denies no man's rights. It deprives no man of power or privilege. It claims for the National Government nothing which is not inseparable from the idea of such a Government. Does it demand any thing that every prudent and patriotic man ought not to be willing to concede? The views of Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS and of Mr. SUMNER, sincerely entertained and ingeniously defended as they are, are not the Radical policy. Mr. STEVENS holds that the disturbed States are conquered provinces in which the land should be confiscated, as that of Ireland has been three times over without giving Ireland peace. Does any body suppose that even the House, which respects Mr. STEVENS's sturdy fidelity to his own convictions, agrees with him, or that the National Union party holds his view? Mr. SUMNER holds that equal suffrage should be required of the absent States as a condition of representation, and in a Radical Senate which passed the Civil Rights Bill over the veto by a vote of 33 to 15, Mr. SUMNER's proposition obtained 8 votes. Those gentlemen, of course, support the Radical policy, but they do not shape it. The opinions of the Union party are to be found, as President JOHNSON says, in the party platform. The policy of the Radicals is to be seen in the measures they adopt; and of the forty-two bills which at the time of the last veto they had presented to the President, he had signed forty.

In our present political situation Conservatism is the policy which declares that the late rebel States are already in a condition to resume their full functions in the Union, and which denounces Congress for presuming to inquire whether that opinion is well founded. It denies to Congress—that is, to the representatives of the loyal people who have maintained the Government—the authority to look behind the credentials of any man who comes from a State still panting with rebellion, and ascertain the origin and validity of the authority that issued the credentials. It objects to the legislation of Congress while eleven States are unrepresented, without reference to the reason of their absence, thus virtually maintaining the monstrous proposition that a combination of States, by refusing to be represented, may prohibit national legislation. It denies that the United States ought to protect the equal civil rights of citizens before the law, and would admit the absent States to Congress before requiring their assent to an amendment equalizing representation. Conservatism is the policy which, forgetting that the United States are bound by every moral obligation to secure the freedom which they have conferred, apparently believes that that freedom will be best maintained and the national peace most truly established by leaving those of every color who were heroically faithful to the Government during the rebellion to the exclusive mercy of those who sought to destroy it.

These are the distinctive points of the Conservative policy. Are they agreeable to a honorable and intelligent people? And of what is this policy conservative? If of the Constitution and Union, it will of course be earnestly supported by their true and tried friends. Is it so supported? Who are the present Conservatives? Who shout and sing and fire cannon and ring bells in jubilant exultation at every measure in supposed accordance with this policy? The reply is, unfortunately, unavoidable. The Conservative party, or the supporters of the policy we have described, is composed of the late rebels and of those who justified and palliated rebellion, with a few Republicans. And who oppose this policy? Who are the Radicals? The great multitude of those who believed in the war and supported it, whose children and brothers and friends lie buried in the battle-field in every rebel State, whose sentiments are now as they have been for five years expressed by the Union press of the country, and whose voice speaks in the vote of Union Legislatures and in the result of the spring elections.

It is useless for Conservatism to claim that conciliation is essential to reorganization. Nobody denies it. But the cardinal question is, not what will please the late insurgents, but what will secure the Government. If it be said that the Government can not be secured by alienating its late enemies, the reply is, that it certainly can not be secured by alienating its unwavering friends. If conciliation contemplates the filling of national offices in the South by known rebels to the disregard and exclusion of Union men, thereby rewarding rebellion and discrediting loyalty—if it proposes to leave freedom of the United States to the Black Codes of Mississippi and Carolina, and to recognize the fatal spirit of caste which has been our curse—then conciliation is simply a name for ignominy, and Conservatism may see its fate in that of Secession.

Radicalism has not a single vindictive feeling toward the late rebel States, but it does not propose to forget that there has been a rebellion. It has the sincerest wish, as it had the most unshaking expectation, of working with the President to secure for the country what the country has fairly won by the war, and that is, the equal right of every citizen before the law and the full resumption by the late insurgent States of their functions in the Union only upon such honorable and reasonable conditions as Congress might require. All reasonable men who support that policy will not lightly denounce those who differ with them. They will strive long for the harmony of those with whom during the war they have sympathized and acted. They will concede minor points of method, and bear patiently with impatient rhetoric leveled at themselves. But they will also bear steadily in mind the words of ANDREW JOHNSON when he accepted the nomination which has placed him where he is: "While society is in this disordered state and we are seeking security, let us fix the foundations of the Government on principles of eternal justice which will endure for all time." The Radical policy was never more tersely expressed; and it will unquestionably be maintained, for it is founded in the plainest common sense and the profoundest conviction of the loyal American people.

THE REPRESENTATION OF THE LATE REBEL STATES.

THOSE Union men who ask impatiently why Congress does not immediately admit any member from a late insurrectionary State who can take the oath do not seem to reflect that the admission of a member is the recognition that the State from which he comes has fully resumed all its rights in the Union. It is assuming the very point which Congress appointed a special committee to investigate and determine. It is the final act in the process of reorganization. The President so understands it. He said to Governor COX, of Ohio, that when loyal representatives were admitted "the work would be done;" for, in his judgment, the States in question "were restored in all other respects."

If there are Union men who hold that no further measures precedent to complete restoration of all their functions to the late rebel States are necessary, they will naturally complain that their representatives are not admitted. If there are those who think that Congress, as at present composed, is constitutionally incompetent to act upon this or any other subject, they will protest against the absence of such States. If any think that its action, although perfectly lawful, would be hastened or improved by the representation of the absent States, they will properly demand their presence. But if neither the competency nor the capacity of Congress be questioned, and if any thing still remains to be done in the legislative work of reorganization, why take any step that may embarrass it? Those who think continued exclusion impolitic must show why, in such a situation as ours, the utmost prudence and deliberation are inexpedient. Whatever may be the feeling in loyal States, we are very sure that there is no sincere Union man in South Carolina or Alabama who is not more anxious that all possibility of peril from the readmission of Carolina to Congress should be plainly averted than that the State should be admitted.

If the disturbed States have a right to be represented as once, it can only be upon the ground that they have reorganized their local governments in a manner satisfactory to Congress. This was the condition imposed by President JOHNSON in his appointment of Provisional Governors. The Convention of the State was "to present such a republican form of State Government as will entitle the State to the guaranty of the United States therefor." Who was to give this guaranty? Congress, of course. Has Congress given it? Until Congress gives it what claim has the State to representation? The President, indeed, is of opinion that Congress ought to give it. He goes further. He dispenses with the action of Congress as necessary. He said to Governor COX that the States were restored in all respects but representation, and that it was too late to question their right to be represented. This is the President's opinion often and strongly stated. But still the decision of the question does not rest with him. The guaranty of the United States can be given by Congress alone; and when President JOHNSON virtually declares that his opinion settles the matter, that to differ with his view is to endanger the Union, and that he is carrying out the policy of his predecessor, he forgets that President LINCOLN in his last public speech, after alluding to the differences upon the subject of reorganization among Union men, said of the State Government which he had erected in Louisiana, and which had the same authority with those that President JOHNSON has erected elsewhere, "I distinctly stated that this was not the only plan which might possibly be acceptable; and I also distinctly protested that the Executive claimed no right to say what or whether members should be admitted to seats in Congress from such States. The plan was in advance submitted to the then Cabinet, and as distinctly approved by every member of it." Mr. SEWARD, in his letter to Mr. ADAMS relating the history of the conference with the Confederate Peace Commissioners at Fortress Monroe, tells us that President LINCOLN said the same thing to the envoys there.

Since, then, the admission of any member from a disturbed State is the final and solemn recognition by the sole competent authority that the State has fully resumed its relations in the Union, that admission should certainly be delayed until every reasonable pretension has been taken against the inevitable risks of the situation. We can not see upon what grounds those who hold that some precedent measures are still necessary urge the immediate admission of representatives from those States.

THE MICHIGAN SOUTHERN AFFAIR.

It was only last week that we took occasion to relate the misadventures of the leading Wall Street operator who undertook to corner the stock of the Erie Railway. Since then a much more striking corner than any he ever attempted has been successfully accomplished. A party of speculators, comprising by no means the most reputable and solvent operators of the street, have cornered Michigan Southern, and done it so effectually that the losses of the Bears have been almost without precedent. It was the old story. The cornerers bought up the whole stock of the Company. Parties who wanted to buy were offered stock seller three—that is to say, after three days. "Regular" or "cash" stock—that is to say, stock deliverable on the day of the purchase or on the following day—was not to be had. All stock lent out was called in. On 5th inst. 5 per cent. was paid for the use of stock for a single day. On 6th inst. 20 per cent. was paid in many instances. The cornering clique was willing to supply the stock at 84 seller three, while the cash price was 104 @ 107. Not even in the famous Hudson River and Harlem corners was such severe punishment inflicted on the Bears.

It is not certain that the cornerers have made any thing by the operation. It is understood that they have still on hand over $5,000,000 of the stock of the Michigan Southern, and no one is likely to want to buy the property at present prices. A favor of roguery exudes from the stock, and careful houses will not allow it to enter their offices. It may again be tested to 100, or dropped to 50. The only safe policy for outsiders is to let it alone. If this policy be adhered to the clique may yet be compelled to sell the remainder of their stock at prices which may not them a loss on the whole operation. It is, in fact, a Prairie du Chien over again. The old clique which cornered that concern maintain a nominal quotation of 92 @ 94 for it by bidding for it themselves. At the same time they are borrowing 50—the most they can get—on the stock at an average rate of 15 per cent. per annum interest. Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury offers new funding loans, and the money-market becomes tight once more, they will be forced to sell, and may not realize over 30 @ 35. It will be the same with the Michigan Southern. If sales be forced it may fall below 50 per cent. in a couple of days. No one, in or out of Wall Street, believes in its value. In ten years it has paid three dividends. Of these the last was borrowed, and the money has not yet been repaid. A general belief prevails that the directors are speculators, and that they would withhold or declare a dividend to suit their own purposes.

It is likely that the legality of the recent corner will be tested in a court of justice. The leading director of the Erie, who has made or tried to make so much money by cornering Bears in that stock, was outraged at being himself cornered by the speculators in Michigan Southern, and has appealed to the courts for redress. To Wall Street eyes his appeal is ridiculous. A man who sells and undertakes to deliver that which he has not got, necessarily takes the chances of being able to procure the property when he is called upon to deliver it. But the matter may be differently viewed by the courts. In the Napoleon Oil Case, of which some account was given in these columns a few months since, the courts held that, where the price of a stock was advanced above its natural value by fraudulent maneuvers of a managing or cornering clique, parties dealing in the stock in good faith and in ignorance of said maneuvers could recover any losses incurred by reason of the corner. The rule of law is clear: he who buys that which does not exist buys nothing, and can not insist upon a delivery of the thing bought. If Mr. WILLIAM B. ASTOR buys of Commodore VANDERBILT the New York City Hall, which is not for sale, the contract is void, and Mr. ASTOR can recover nothing by way of damages. If JOHN Sells to SARRA the church and church-yard of Trinity there is no sale, and nothing can be recovered by way of damages. If SARRA, who owns all the land on the west side of Avenue B, buys of ROUSSEAU—who is unaware of the state of the case—ten lots on said west side of said Avenue, the courts will hold that the purchase is void, the thing sold not being in the market. In like manner, if BROWN and WILLIAMS club together and buy up all the Michigan Southern in existence; then, having all the stock in their trunk, or due to them from solvent men, bid for a quantity of stock over and above the actual capital, which SARRA and JOHN, speculators in Wall Street, agree, in ignorance of the real state of the case, to supply at a fraction above the market-price, the chances are that the courts would relieve SARRA and JOHN from their contract on the ground that the purchase was void, and that the purchasers were fraudulently minded.

The Editors of Harper's Weekly are published by LEWIS HISTORY Co., No. 125 Broadway, New York, with permission from Harper & Row, N. Y. Subscriptions are $14 for one year, $28 for two years, in advance. Issue of April 21, 1866, Vol. 9, No. 18.

If the commission brokers of Wall Street were wise they would put an end to this cornering business at once. For it is fatal to their business. No man can tell how to advise his customers, or how to save them from loss. To buy railway stocks, in view of the coming depression in business, is wild; to sell them in view of the prospect of corners in each successive stock, is insane. The only safe policy is to let stocks entirely alone, and to leave the brokers to feed upon each other. In other words, the inevitable effect of these corners is to destroy the business of Wall Street. It may be a question whether this is an unmitigated evil. There are many who will regard it as an event not devoid of advantage to the public at large. But the brokers, whose living depends upon the activity of trade in stocks, will not share this opinion, and it is a little curious that both boards should have suffered these corners to be accomplished without even an attempt to protect themselves.

Some ten years ago, before the crisis of 1857, when Europeans were investing freely in United States railway securities, it was proposed to place our leading railway stocks upon the list of the London Stock Exchange. To the astonishment of most people here, the application was denied—on the ground that the capital of most of our companies was so small that in the event of a Bear movement it would be easy for any one of a score of rich operators in London to corner the Bears and force them to settle on their own terms. Experience proves that the Englishmen were right. It would be to the interest of the New York brokers now to strike from their list every stock that is cornered, and to establish for other stocks a clearing day, on which contracts might be settled at the price of the day without regard to the supply of stock on the street.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL.

The Civil Rights bill declares that all persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign power, excluding Indians not taxed, are citizens of the United States, and that such citizens, of every race and color, "shall have the same right in every State and Territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, to be sued, to parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold and convey real and personal property, and to be entitled to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishments, pains and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding."

The bill then defines the method of protecting these rights, the details of which, if imperfect, can readily be corrected. It leaves the adjustment of political privilege to the States. It does not say that a citizen shall be a voter; it says only that he shall have the equal rights of a man.

This law, which was passed by an imposing vote in both Houses, 33 to 15 in the Senate, and 129 to 41 in the House, unquestionably expresses the profound determination of the people of the United States. They conferred freedom, and they have now defined what they mean by freedom. If a man can not own property and exercise every right that springs from its possession he is not free. This truth is fully recognized by ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, at whose instance, and against the wishes of many leaders, the Georgia Legislature has passed a bill legalizing equal civil rights to the freedmen. What Georgia has wisely done for itself the United States have done for the whole country. In doing it Congress has secured one of the most legitimate results of the war, and has laid the cornerstone of enduring peace and Union.

THE CASE OF IRELAND.

ALTHOUGH Foreigners may not be a very imposing phenomenon, yet it is not to be forgotten that the wrongs of Ireland are not a fable, but a very tragical truth. We do not need to explore history to know so much. We have only to consider the general condition of the vast numbers of emigrants from that country to this to be very sure that there must be a radical and vital defect in the system to which they are subject, and which makes them what they are. "The Anglo-Saxon race," titulary says the French Opus National, alluding to the national fast for the cattle pest, "will pay for the salvation of bulls and scourge poor Ireland." The accusation is tremendous, but to every plea of England the actual condition of Ireland must be shown and constantly alleged.

A hundred and fifty years ago MOLYNEUX published his "Case of Ireland Stated," and DEAN SWIFT his "Draper's Letters." Mr. JAMES GORDON, a writer in the London Foreignly Review, reminds us that the House of Commons could not answer MOLYNEUX's book, so they had it burned by the common hangman, while SWIFT's publisher, for refusing to give the author's name, was thrown into prison.

These events are typical of the English system in Ireland, and Mr. GORDON submits the case of Ireland anew.

It must be remembered that the Irish population is not of one race or faith. The pure Celts are few and feeble. The Roman Catholic nobility and gentry, the Episcopalians and Presbyterians, the professional and mercantile classes, with most of the land-owners, belong to the British connection. The "dangerous class" is not the original Celt, it is the Catholic peasantry in the better part of the country who are of mixed race. It is in the most English counties of "the pale" that the chief discontent is found, and if the quarrel were to be settled among the Irish themselves, the Irish of British race, according to our author, would remain masters. It was in these English counties, where Irish had not been spoken for ages, that the rebellion of '98 against the British Government raged most fiercely. The population is energetic, self-reliant, and asks only for just government and fair play for industry.

The Irish priests spring from the people. Their interests are those of their flocks. Educated upon the Continent, which is covered with the monuments of their Church, or at home pondering the ancient power of their faith, the priests point to the people the wrongs of their Church, which is proscribed and persecuted. Before the eyes of those people are the painful contrast of the ruins of the old cathedrals with the modern Episcopal chapel and its well-endowed rector preaching to his congregation of twenty souls, while a thousand of the faithful and traditional Church kneel upon earthen floors in their rude home beyond. These contrasts are deepened in effect by the traditions of alienated estates, of martyred bishops, of the long, desperate struggle for freedom, and the black penal code. The passionate power of priestly appeals upon such points to such people can be imagined.

Most of the land in Ireland has been confiscated three times, and as joint rights of ownership were disregarded the land titles are hopelessly confused. As the tenant farmer by his own outlay increases the yield of the ground the absentee landlord increases his rent and refuses long leases. Small farmers have abandoned the struggle. Large farmers throw land out of cultivation because of the greater profit of grazing. There is, therefore, no steady demand of agricultural labor; in large districts there are no resident gentry or capitalists; and the mass of the agricultural and laboring classes are hostile to the Government, which is represented to them by noble absentee proprietors, who make attorneys their agents, and pay them a percentage upon the rent they can extort.

The hostility of races and of religions has never been fiercer than in Ireland, but it is not greater than that of the native sects or clans before the Reformation. The Pope supported the King of England and the King's Irish against the rest of the Irish population until the King turned Protestant, when the Pope went over to the "Irish clergy." The terrible civil wars continued, and hatred, suspicion, and contempt were embodied in the English laws for Ireland, until the late Lord LYONSBURGH, the Tory Chancellor, described the Irish Catholics as "aliens in blood, language, and religion." He would more truly have expressed the Conservative feeling even of his own time and the last generation had he said enemies instead of aliens.

But during the last half-century England has been trying slowly to atone for the melancholy misgovernment of Ireland. The Tory or Conservative party, which never forgets and never learns, which thinks that the British Constitution is gone if a law is reformed which hangs a starving man for stealing a hen, which has brought England to the verge of civil war more than once in this century, of course resisted and resists. The safety of the British empire, as of every constitutional government, lies in the defeat of the Conservative Tory policy. As an Opposition such a party is useful; as a Government it is perilous. It opposed Catholic Emancipation, the Reform Bill, and the Corn Law repeal. It has opposed every vital reform demanded by the condition of England. The problem in Ireland will be solved by the English liberals. An actual religious and political equality and a change in the land tenure must be achieved before Ireland can rest, or England either. The key-note of English as of American liberalism—the secret of peace and welfare—is Justice.

AMNESTY.

MR. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, who held quite as firmly to the Southern doctrine of State Sovereignty as JEFFERSON DAVIS, was released from Fort Warren during the last autumn, and was lately elected Senator in Congress by the Georgia Legislature. On the 22d of February he made a speech accepting the office and exhorting his neighbors to patient acquiescence in the results of the war. It was unquestionably wise to release him, to suffer him to live at home, and to give good advice to the Georgia Legislature. But surely it is a whimsical injustice to deprive his late associate executive officer of "the Confederacy" of the same opportunities. Why should not JEFFERSON DAVIS be allowed to acquiesce and to urge acquiescence? His offense was no greater, if more conspicuous, than that of STEPHENS; and treason, if they were guilty of it, can not be made "odious" by imprisoning the one and condemning the other.

MR. RAPHAEL SEMMES, also, who commanded the Alabama, and who made war upon the United States after his surrender, has been unconditionally released by the President of the United States. Mr. SEMMES was very successful in his raids by sea upon the ships of loyal merchants. He must have destroyed property to the amount of many millions of dollars. Mr. C. C. CLAY, on the other hand, was very unsuccessful. His raids by land were generally abortive, although planned upon the most comprehensive scale. We do not complain, under the circumstances, so far as they are known, that Mr. SEMMES goes free, but why is Mr. CLAY kept in jail?

We presume that these facts foretell a general amnesty. To hold DAVIS and CLAY while STEPHENS and SEMMES are released is unjustifiable. To undertake to try DAVIS is folly. It would be the trial of the Government. Does any loyal man wish to submit the validity of the war to the verdict of twelve chance men in Richmond? If DAVIS should be convicted of treason, nothing is settled. If he should be acquitted, the Government becomes ridiculous and the war is condemned. No trial can affect the public judgment of his course. Whatever the result, loyal men would retain their opinion and disloyal men theirs. If convicted, he would not be hung, for if there were any danger of the execution of such a sentence the most loyal men in the land would be the most earnest intercessors for his pardon. No constitutional Government was ever strengthened by hanging its enemies after a war in which it was victorious, and no blood shed upon the scaffold for political offenses has ever yet stained the purity of our national garments.

But while the conspicuous individual leaders in the great rebellion, like DAVIS, STEPHENS, LEE, SEMMES, CLAY, and others, instead of being pursued with rigor, are suffered, and wisely suffered, to go with no other penalty than the feeling with which the authors of so much misery will always be regarded by patriotic men, it is all the more important that every reasonable step should be taken to destroy the conditions which so fatally favored their conspiracy. That is the work in which Congress is engaged, and in which it is supported by the sympathy and prayers of those who have served the country.

"CONSERVATIVE" WISDOM.

THE last suggestion of the "Conservatives" is worthy of those who denied the authority of the United States to "coerce" rebels, and who declared the war a failure. It is simply that the President is not bound to execute a law which he considers unconstitutional—in other words, that the President may dispense with the laws.

The simple truth is, that the President takes an oath to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States." The Constitution provides that when the President objects to a law, upon constitutional or other grounds, he is to return it to the House in which it originated, and that House shall proceed to reconsider it. "If," says the Constitution, "after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law."

If the President's conscience forbids him to fulfill his oath and execute the law, he may do what some Commissioners did under the Fugitive Slave Law—he may resign his office.

The "Conservatism" which, by the mouth of Mr. GARRETT DAVIS, suggests to the President to refuse to recognize the Senate of the United States, and by the Chicago Times exhorts him to turn Congress out of the Capitol, naturally proposes, by the New York Herald, that he shall disregard his oath. A "Conservatism" which considers Congress "a Respublic" discovers it to be an impertinence, and the will of the President the sole government of the country, without perceiving that if Congress be a Rump, the President, who was elected by exactly the same votes, is no less a fragment.

And these are the oracles who will up their eyes at "revolutionary" radicals.

MR. JAMES M. SCOWELL.

AS THE name of Mr. JAMES M. SCOWELL will probably never be heard of again, it is instructive to note why it was ever heard of at all. He was a Union Senator in the New Jersey Legislature. The Union Senators were chosen in number, and the Opposition ten. When the seat of Mr. SCOWELL in the United States Senate was vacated, a proposition was made in the New Jersey Senate to go into joint convention for an election. Mr. SCOWELL voted with the friends of Mr. STOCKTON against it, and refused to vote for a Convention, unless the Convention would agree to nominate a person whom he should propose. Why the whole body of Unionists in the Legislature should yield their preference to Mr. JAMES M. SCOWELL that gentleman failed to state. He declared with great solemnity that he was very honest, while nobody doubted that the others were so. The passage of the Civil Rights Bill over the veto apparently depended upon the Senator to be elected in New Jersey, but Mr. SCOWELL declined to yield, and reiterated that his honesty was truly phenomenal. Fortunately the vote of New Jersey was not necessary to pass the bill, but that State has lost one of the finest fruits of her noble victory of the autumn—a Union Senator of the United States—because Mr. JAMES M. SCOWELL, elected as a Unionist, refused to vote for the candidate selected by the whole body of Union men. He was not bound to vote for a man whom he did not approve, but he was bound not to prevent others from voting for their chosen candidate. He had no right to insist that every Union Senator and Representative in New Jersey should submit to his sole dictation; and it is because of his betrayal of an honorable political trust that the name of Mr. JAMES M. SCOWELL was noted for a week, and will not be heard of again.

HOW MUCH SHALL WE EAT?

ONE of the most important items in the relation of food to health is the regulation of its quantity. This seems to be very well done, for the most part, where it is left entirely to the instinct of the animal and the amount of supply furnished by nature; for we have no evidence that wild animals commit errors as to the quantity of their food. It is otherwise with domesticated animals, for their habits are modified more or less by man's control over them, and the supply of their food is not regulated by nature. Errors of diet are often committed by them. You may make your canary-bird or your dog sick with too much of rich food; your horse may be injured by eating from a grain-bin, or your cattle by getting into a corn-field. In the case of man himself the indications of nature are very apt to be overruled by his inclinations and notions—shall we say his judgment? If so, his judgment is often at fault.

What prompts us to eat? It is what we call hunger—a sensation about the cause and seat of which there has been much speculation. Its seat is certainly, for the most part at least, in the stomach; and its cause is the want of some nutrition in the system, this want being expressed by the sensation which it occasions. The greater, therefore, is the want the more intense is the sensation, as we see in the imperative hunger which sometimes appears in convalescents who have been much prostrated by disease. This sensation is often allayed by other things besides food. Nodden had no's way, by its influence on the stomach through the nervous system, destroy it. Filling the stomach with indigestible substances will remove it, or rather overpower it by producing another sensation there, as is done by the diet-casters, and sometimes in experiments on animals.

When food removes hunger it is not by the supply of the want of the system, for the effect comes long before the nutritive part of the food can be conveyed to where it is wanted. It results from the sensation occasioned by the presence of the food and the commencement of the process of digestion. What is this sensation? Is it a sense of fullness? Many eat till there is even an oppressive sensation of this kind. But this comes after one has passed clear beyond the sensation that betokens a sufficiency of food—the sensation of satiety, as we may term it. This is quite as definite as its opposite, hunger, and it is a reliable indication. It is not a mere extinguishment of hunger, but it is a positive sensation of a somewhat complex character. There is a feeling of satisfaction, with some, but slight, sense of fullness. It is sometimes claimed that we should stop short of this, and not absolutely extinguish our hunger; but this would be a disobedience of an obvious indication of nature, and the result would be insufficient nutrition of the system, and consequent feebleness and disease.

This sensation is not an adequate guide in regard to the amount of food, unless the circumstances under which we take it are properly regulated. It may fail us if we eat too rapidly. The feeling of satiety will not come at the proper moment if the food be thrown into the stomach partially masticated and scarcely moistened with the saliva. The true sense of fullness would then be our chief guide, and there is danger of eating too much. It may fail us also if too much be made of the pleasure of the palate by variety of dishes and courses, although we do not deny a due regard to gratification in taking our food.

There should be more attention paid to the cultivation of correct tastes in regard to food. There should not be the alternation which we often see between poor living and such provision as presents extraordinary temptations to gluttony. The fruits of the different seasons should more commonly make a portion of our daily meals. There should be more uniformly good cooking of ordinary articles, and less of the usual making up for deficiency in this by a variety of luxuriously prepared food. Good bread and well-cooked meats are much less common than is supposed, even where there is a profuse display of the sickly wares of cookery, which certainly do deprave the tastes and produce disease. Simplicity—the absence of nature—with plainness and simplicity, should be the main object in the appointments of the table. Excess variety should be avoided, for this leads to going beyond the sensation of satiety, and a more or less oppressive fullness is apt to be the limit of eating.

PROFESSOR LOUIS AGASSIZ.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. SOYER, BOSTON.]

PROFESSOR AGASSIZ.

THE President of the United States referred in his inaugural to the warm reception, by the monarch of Brazil, of the scientific party now exploring that portion of South America. It is believed that this is the first time that a Chief Magistrate of our nation has called attention to any exploration of a nature so purely private in its inception and in its execution. Professor AGASSIZ is the head of that expedition, and such is the remarkable career and character of the man that his new researches have not only merited mention by the President of the United States, the enthusiastic co-operation of the Emperor of Brazil, and the deepest interest of scientific men in Europe and America, but the general public manifested in his movements as great solicitude as if he were engaged in enterprises of great official as well as national importance. His discoveries on the Amazon have called renewed attention to the man who belongs to both continents. Born in Switzerland, he is an adopted son of the United States. Several cantons have claimed him in his native land, and our own LONGFELLOW has added not a little to the confusion in the popular mind when, in his beautiful "Ode to AGASSIZ on his Fiftieth Birthday," written in 1857, he says:

"It was fifty years ago,
In the pleasant month of May,
In the beautiful Pays de Vaud
A child in its cradle lay."

The fact is, that LOUIS JOSEPH BROUEN AGASSIZ was born on the 28th of May, 1807, in a little corner of the Canton Freiburg, Switzerland, not far away from the cantons of Neuchâtel, Bern, and Vaud. His father and five immediate ancestors were clergymen of the Protestant faith. His mother, who still lives, was remarkable for her talent and acquirements. His education was of that complete kind which is open to every one in the excellent schools of Switzerland; but his tastes, influenced by Rev. Mr. FIVAS (now a resident of New York), turned in the direction of natural science. The colleges of Bienne, Lausanne, and Zurich in Switzerland, witnessed his early triumphs in the classics, in general scientific attainments, and in the particular study of medicine—his early chosen profession. He completed his academic course in the Universities of Heidelberg and Munich. Later, in Vienna and Paris, he enjoyed the association and friendship of Humboldt, Cuvier, Hyrtl, and others.

While he was yet in his teens the first Emperor of Brazil took the Austrian Archduchess LEOPOLDINA, the sister of MAXIMILIAN (the first NAPO-LEON's second bride), to share with him the throne at Rio de Janeiro. Then it was that the monarch of Bavaria sent a corps of scientific men to Brazil, chiefly directed by MARTENS and SEIX. AGASSIZ was not yet of age when this expedition returned; but when SEIX, to whom was intrusted the zoological portion, suddenly died, there was no one in Europe whom MARTENS found capable of classifying the fishes of Brazil except the young Swiss, who had devoted more close attention to ichthyology than any other man living. The work was published in Latin, and it instantly placed AGASSIZ in the first rank of authorities. From that time to this the scientific world has been surprised and overjoyed at contributions to science on a variety of the most difficult questions in nature, which required years of the most devoted study merely to arrange preliminaries before publication. The most varied as well as the most accurate knowledge and study are displayed in these works. The late Professor AMPÈRE, of the Sorbonne, Paris, wrote in 1832 that Professor AGASSIZ was the only man living, and one of the few who have ever existed, who had "made himself master of four sciences." Dr. MANUEL PACHICO DA SILVA, President of the Pedro II. College at Rio de Janeiro, recently made, in the Journal de Commercio, a résumé of the works of AGASSIZ, with comments thereon; stating that any one who reads "The Fishes of Brazil" will find that it is a work upon which any one might rest his reputation; that a close examination of the second publication of AGASSIZ—"The Natural History of the Fresh-Water Fishes of Europe"—is a work so complete that any other man would have considered it his exquisitum opus; that his third great treatise—"Fossil Fishes"—for which his preliminary studies were during seven years of most arduous study, and which were ten years in publication, is a monument of research and genius such as the world has rarely seen, leading through the most abstract and intricate regions of zoology, geology, and paleontology, to a new classification, which is recognized by all the leading geologists of the world; that his minor works on the Echini, on living and fossil shells, and several other subjects, were enough to satisfy the ambition of ordinary men; that his "Studies on the Glaciers," and his Expédition Glacière, results of years of arduous investigation and long exposure on the highest Alps, and on the great glaciers of the Oberland and Mont Blanc, did more than any other of his works to revolutionize the former theories concerning the remote period of our globe when the great snow-stern covered tropic as well as arctic zones. "Surely," says Dr. PACHICO DA SILVA, "no one would have looked for other volumes from this great and prolific man; but no sooner does he reach the United States than the New World calls forth new efforts, and we looked upon his contributions to the Natural History of the United States as the final and monumental work of this spacious mind; but now we see him investigating the rich field of Brazil, and we feel that his has not yet been written to the efforts of his genius."

Professor AGASSIZ came to our country in 1846. He was then Professor in the College of Neuchâtel, and visited the United States to study the aspects of nature here. We all remember the enthusiasm created by his lectures. Two years later, duty indicated plainly to the Professor that the New World was to be the field of his labors. The Professorship of Zoology and Geology in the scientific school in Cambridge is filled by AGASSIZ. The magnificent Museum of Comparative Zoology is wholly his creation in its inception, plan, and execution, and has excited the envy of Europe. It has a national importance, and in completeness and extent is the first in the world.

In March, 1865, Professor AGASSIZ left our shores with a corps of scientific men to explore the virgin fields of Brazil. Already this expedition, endowed by the munificence of NATHANIEL TAGGER, Esq., of Boston, has produced abundant fruits. The enthusiastic reception by the Emperor of Brazil, and by the people of that Empire, and the co-operation of the Brazilian Government, are grateful to our nation, which is now more closely united to the most stable Government in South America. The results of Professor AGASSIZ's expedition will, like all his works, redound to the advancement of science and to the promotion of a truthful understanding of the great phenomena of tropical nature.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.)

INSIDE
A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XV.

At the same hour in which Brother Barker is preaching the Gospel—according to Jefferson Davis—at the Pines, Edward Arthur is preaching another Gospel—that according to the Lord Jesus Christ—in his church in Somerville. And he and his comparatively few hearers know that he has got such a grasp upon the very substance and essence of that good news to men as he never had before. Yes, he, and multitudes like him at the South, in ever deepening despair of things human in these days, are looking to the Gospel and to the living God, of whom that sacred paper is but the transparent drapery, with an ever-increasing singleness and intensity to which all previous experience is tame indeed.

"It's the last time, the very last time, you catch me a-bearing him," Mrs. Warner had remarked a few Sabbaths ago as she walked her portly husband home from church. "Yes, I know it, I did say before this I never would go again, and I haven't been, you well know, for ever so long. But I thought that to-day, Thanksgiving Day for our glorious victory over McClellan, he certainly would come out for the Confederacy, and be down at last upon the Yankees. And look at it. All that sermon of his to-day only a-trying to prove what terrible sinners we are instead, telling over all our sins. Not one word about the vile wickedness of the Yankees."

"Why he said, Helen," ventured the Doctor, "that, whatever were the human instruments of chastisement employed, the Almighty would deal in strictest justice with them as with us. You see he wants us to look more at that for which we are being punished than at the punishment itself; he says that if we do not we will be more and more punished by Him until we do.

GOING HOME FROM CHURCH.

For me," added the Doctor, rashly, "I agree with Mr. Arthur entirely!"

But the Doctor never would have said this save from the warmth of just having heard the sermon.

"It's his influence has rained you; he's a traitor, a Yankee, a vile Abolitionist!" says Mrs. Warner, and so decidedly that Alice Bowles, walking home alone from church, can not choose but hear. "Always insisting and insisting upon our sins," says Mrs. Warner, "as if we are not a million times better than the Yankees. Talking, too, about the Almighty, as if He had any hand in this wicked war upon us—it's awful! Look here, Dr. Warner," adds his wife in a sudden change of tone, as a light breaks on her, "I've got it now! The one great sin the South is being punished for is Slavery. That's his idea. Ah, ha, ha. Yes, oh yes, I see! The Almighty is so angry with us because we own slaves he is using the Yankees to chastise us—chastise us, as if they could do it!—for that."

"Has he ever said so?" begins the Doctor.

"Hah, I remember now. That's why he has never preached a sermon—never, on the Bible command to us to hold slaves. Brother Barker—why there's not one preacher I know of but has done an often. Exactly!"

"I am astonished at you, Helen," says Dr. Warner, "new light, of somewhat different hue, breaking on him also. "You well know he has often urged on us—taking the institution for granted—to instruct our negroes—"

"Wants us to see to it that they are actually married and all that—as if a negro ever does more than take up with a husband or wife for a while; and as if virtuous white ladies were going to meddle in such things! Catch me! Something about the duties of negro parents to their children too. Parents! I tell you, Dr. Warner," adds his clear-spoken partner, "all such stuff is inconsistent with the institution. To preach it is to preach Abolitionism, that's all. It may deceive you, but it can't deceive me, so I tell you. And that he, a Southern man, that has lived here so long—"

Dr. Warner walks with drooped head beside his wife while she is exhausting herself upon the subject. Not that he hears a word she says. That Sunday morning when his pastor announced his settled purpose to confine himself exclusively to his spiritual duties comes up before him. People agreed that was a pastor's only true course then—now it is disloyal. Mr. Arthur's is a peculiar position. Once, at least, during the week, the bell of every other church in Somerville summons the congregation to a special prayer-meeting for the success of the Confederacy; alone of the churches Mr. Arthur's remains closed, his bell silent. The only exception to the preachers in and around Somerville, and there are a great many of them, one never sees him on the streets laughing and shaking hands over the last glorious news, or clapping and stamping at the public meetings. Not once has he even been seen at the after-said prayer-meetings, where Sam Peters prays till he can only gasp for the swift and utter destruction of the Yankees. "By the sword, Lord, by the yellow fever, Lord. Like Gideon's foes, by one another, Lord; any way, good Lord, any way, every way, so that thou only out of thy unwaiting fullness speedily destroy them!" Where Brother Barker, too, rises in prayer to such heights of exhortation as well as entreaty as he had never dreamed of even at the climax of the most successful of camp-meetings. All the "putting down, O Lord," Brother Barker clamors for these days is the "putting down of our three fiendish foes!" All the "saying" he supplicates is the "saying our now, our young, our great, our glorious Confederacy, even thine own peculiar people, O our God!"

Yes, it is a trying time for Mr. Arthur, these days.

"He's a lie, it isn't a political matter at all," Sam Peters says in reference to this speckled bird in the flock, "the very existence of Christianity as all on this continent is involved in the success of the Confederacy!" and that is the first article in the Creed—ah, you may deny it now; you know it was then—of every religious Secessionist at the South. But, in the rising tide of the times, friend after friend has been swept away from Mr. Arthur, some dead North, some gone to the war in reality, some gone to the war, from him at least, in heart.

His congregation waxes from Sabbath to Sabbath. In pastoral visits among the few that remain, even among some as heartily opposed as he at the outset to Secession, he hears, "Well, I was opposed to the thing at the beginning as much as a man could be, but now that we are in it—and so on to the "last ditch" with the "black flag" waving over it! Such a forgetfulness of all principle in the matter, such an utter abandoning yourself to the current simply because it is a current. And that current is Lestis itself as to the Past. It matters not a straw how sincerely good Mr. Ellis, and thousands like him, once believed it to be a great sin; "now we are in it; now, you see, we are in it!" is the magical formula, and, presto! off you are gone, soul as well as body, with the movement.

A trying time for the man. There are many as clear and as firm, too, as he, but, unlike them, he can not shut himself up in his office, bury himself in the furrows of his farm, occupy and conceal himself behind his counter. He is before the public every Sunday, peculiarly before them on the often recurring Thanksgiving and Fast days. Somerville has forgotten a good many people, but he is too much before it for that. An annoying Elijah, who will not even let himself away in the seclusion of Cherish and Sarepta, but is perpetually in Abadi's path.

By slow degrees, keenly as it hurt him at first, he is becoming used to people passing him without speaking, to the cold words and colder manner of those who were once his friends. On what pretext resign? Where go if he should? What occupation can he, a man under ban, follow? He has no capital to become a merchant, no farm to be a farmer, as objectionable a teacher as he is a preacher. Let him resign to-day, before to-morrow Brother Barker will himself see to it that he is conscripted. All he can do is to continue in his present line of duty. He wonders, is the delusion in himself or in the mass around me? Ignorant and educated, sanguine and phlegmatic, silent and talkative, violent and mild, the avowed wicked and the devotedly pious—the fermentation is seething all men into madness of opinion, feeling, speech. Alas! for Edward Arthur, he is only petrifying in his isolation.

Look at good Mr. Ellis. There is almost nothing left in his store these days for sale. His last calicoes went off at two dollars a yard. Mrs. Bowles bought his last bolt of domestic at one dollar and seventy-five cents. He did have shoes at ten dollars, none now. His shelves display only empty boxes, bottles of hair oil, stone jugs, patent medicines, and an amazing number of mouse-traps. Any quantity of coffee-mills, but they are only a mockery, coffee selling at two dollars a pound. But not a cent saves Mr. Ellis. His main object in opening his store in the morning is to hear what people—dropping in during the day to ask for articles they won't get—have to say upon the one topic, while, leaning against his empty shelves, he exchanges instead of goods his own freshest hopes in return.

"Goods? No, Sir; and, for one, I intend getting few or none from abroad hereafter. I hope to sell nothing that is not made within the Confederacy. In a short time, Sir, we will have achieved our independence in every sense of the word."

Pity develops in a man the faculty of hope, and the vigor of Mr. Ellis's hope has reference to the Confederacy, and is amazing. His son Henry writes gloomy letters from the army and he rebukes him therefor, ignoring to every one and to himself every thing not encouraging to "the South." The paper he reads several times over on its arrival, with what heated unbelief in its discouraging items, with what magnifying fervor in its encouraging ones. The least intimation of a rumor of the latter kind is a solid satisfaction for, at least, the passing moment. He eagerly repeats it to customers calling in on vain search for axes or nails or pins. An iron-clad navy arrived at Wilmington for the South, a civil war already broken out at the North, European intervention—his sincere belief in the news satisfies all who hear it from him that it must be even so. Whoever else is absent from any war meeting Mr. Ellis is not; his sincere face giving moral sanction to the proceedings otherwise rather vindictive, not to say perfidious. It is singular, though, that he is not a more regular attendant on the prayer meetings; there is a spirit in the remarks and the prayers thereof from which, in spite of himself, he winces and shrieks. The religiousness of Mr. Ellis's belief in the Confederacy disquiets his pastor more than any thing else—all Mr. Ellis's piety running so wildly in that one channel in these days.

But the two rarely meet now. "He knows my sentiments perfectly well; how can he be so cordial with me—not cordial—so full rather of a struggling respect and concern for me still?" the pastor asks himself, wondering whether he will see his former friend at church next Sunday or no. Is it possible deep down in his soul he knows I am right? Mr. Arthur muses upon it, till one Sabbath Mr. Ellis disappears with his family from church.

Perhaps Hobby Sorel may have had an unconscious share in this last step. Not a more modest, quiet, sober little fellow than Hobby; but, to say nothing of his mother, he has by this time become exceedingly attached to Mr. Arthur, who teaches him at home, and makes a companion of him in all his excursions, his heart yearning doubly over Hobby in his state of banishment, and being repulsed from almost every one else. As with the children of all Union people, Hobby has a great deal to bear in the way of abuse. That his mother and Mr. Arthur are Yankees, Abolitionists, and traitors he is told almost every time he is sent into Somerville on an errand. But when Charley Ellis, about his own age, becoming rapidly the very bad boy which the children of pious parents sometimes do become, heaps cursing and abuse upon him, about this time, as a "whitewashed negro," with a great deal more in reference to Mr. Arthur and his mother, Bobby's wrath bursts forth, and, as much to his own surprise as that of Charley Ellis, he gives this letter a sound drubbing. Of course Mr. Ellis hears only his son's, or rather his son's mother's version of the matter; that, with Charley's blackened eyes, settles the matter. Only he will not put it on that ground with Mr. Arthur.

THE PROTEST MARSHAL'S OFFICE.

"The prayers he offers are precisely those he might put up in a Boston pulpit; I can not stand it," says Mr. Ellis. Not that he has any more fancy for Brother Barker and the like for all that. For the present Mr. Ellis and family, his children withdrawn from Sabbath School, are adrift upon the world.

"I wonder whether I would be as dumb upon political matters in the pulpit if I was where I could speak?" said Mr. Arthur to himself, next morning as he rode home from his bath, feeling fresh and strong. "And it is an hypocrisy for me to put my position on the ground that it is the duty of ministers to abstain from politics?"

"You and your fellow-preachers of the same sentiments are in somewhat the same case here at the South that the preachers of the Democratic party are at the North," says Mr. Ferguson, to whom, in Guy Brooks's office the same day, Mr. Arthur propounds his case. "Were you and your like at the North they at the South, to say the least, the temptation upon you as upon them to speak out would be tremendous. Eh? I dare say you would be among the loudest, most violent of them all—a perfect Barker. It is only human nature, man," says the Scot.

"My convictions," means the minister, "are so very clear and strong; so very much to so many is at stake; and, then, the question is so largely a moral, in fact a religious, one! Yet surely a minister should be exclusively—"

"Oh, never mind about that," breaks in the lawyer. "You are occupying the only position you can now," and Guy Brooks continues an interrupted denunciation of the new Stay Law.

"And there is conscription," begins the Scotchman.

"The most awful violation of State Rights—the most unconstitutional thing!" burst out the lawyer.

"You must not say that; you know our Supreme Court is unanimous against you. By-the-by," continues Mr. Ferguson, "I had a visit last night from a man on land business—wanted to buy land—as if I would exchange my solid acres for his worthless paper-money! He was telling me about a District Judge in our sister State—a long story. Being a Yankee and in office he dares instantly, eagerly, that conscription is constitutional. They wanted to argue before him the question of Martial Law, as now existing in every village over the State. 'Not one syllable, gentlemen,' he said; 'my mind is already made up—Martial Law is constitutional also.' And if that gang at Richmond had enacted Polygamy it would have been the same. Poor fellow! I know all about it: at the beginning of Secession, too thoroughly informed in head and heart not to know its diabolical nature and consequences, he wined and strunk. In, however, he went at last, under the terrible pressure, desperately; now he steps at nothing, of course. My land-seeker told me the poor fellow is thinned to a ghost—you can read his misery in his face—he can not sit still a moment—in and out of every group he comes upon, seeking consolation and finding none. Like Milton's Satan he can not fly himself, however. I've put my man's information in my collection, adds he, laying his hand palm on the next volume in question lying on the table beside him: 'and you mark my words, Sir,' continues the plain Scot, 'if I do not have to complete that person's history with an account of his suicide I am more mistaken than I was ever before in my life.'

"I suppose you have that printed list of those who have not paid their War tax," asks the lawyer—"the one pasted up in the Court-house?"

"In my collection? Yes, Sir, my name leading the list. There has not been a matter relating to Secession in my reach that is not there. That collection, Sir, is nothing to laugh at—it is material of profound philosophical study. The regular steps of Secession toward despotism are perfectly beautiful, illustrating the inviolable working of moral law as the rainbow does the natural laws of light. Stay law, exemption of the rich from military service, martial law, conscription, prostituted press, terrorism—we will soon get on to currency utterly depreciated, then imprisonment of property and negroes, terrible military executions to prevent desertion, State militia passed into the hands of the Richmond gang—"

"What raving madness!" breaks in the lawyer, rising from his seat in desperation. "We needed for what?"

"For our share of the Territories, and they are gone; for State Rights, and they are gone." "For Slavery, and it will soon be gone, too. Queen Anne's cake—a hackneyed old proverb, Mr. Arthur. You cut loose from the Union," continues the Scotchman, "and sail off on the one bottom of Slavery! Beautiful experiment, expérimentum crucis, as Bacon calls such; Parady, with a bread, clean counter before him, never tried a heater, completer one in Natural Philosophy. The idea, you see, is to eliminate Slavery from all that has hitherto been mixed with it, to see how the thing itself and by itself stands. Well, not a Power in the world dare recognize your Slave Government; at home corruption and despotism and ruin until you sicken of it—to say nothing of the awful judgments of Heaven upon you by the hands of the Federals! Being from Scotland, I am impartial, of course. And such men as you two, Dr. Warner, Paul Brooks up there at the Pine, and all like you at the South, why, born and living at the South, it is no wonder you are coming so slowly to see. But you are on the road—three years hence the Union men of the South will be the most hearty emancipationists on earth, without a spark of Northern fanaticism!"

It was an awful sentiment; but dry Mr. Ferguson stated it simply as a scientific fact. He was canny Scotch enough, however, to lower his voice as he made the atrocious statement. "And it is the hand of God," he added; "you good people could see no harm in Slavery. Very well, Heaven is putting that very cup to your lip, pressing it there bitter and long, to see how you like the taste. The Jehovah of Moses still rules, an eye for an eye, lex talionis—retributive justice the old Covenanters call it."

Neither of his friends would have endured such language a few months before. Yes, an immense amount of thinking was being done in the South those days, and in the mind of every reasoning mortal there, Union man or Secessionist, it all bore upon that one thing—Slavery.

"And so you had to march up, too, and take your medicine?" the lawyer asks Mr. Arthur, after a long silence. And that gentleman needed no explanation. He had stood before the Provost Marshal, and, under oath, renounced all allegiance to the United States Government, swearing fealty to the "Confederate States of America" instead. Medicine? Yes; and the bitterest to him, and to thousands like him, their manhood had ever taken. Certain zealous females of the Secession persuasion had even offered themselves to the Provost Marshal of Somerville as a committee to administer the same oath to every one of their own sex in the county. Unfortunately the Provost Marshal declined the offer; acknowledged its importance, but plead absence of instructions. Not one of the Secession females but would have died or succeeded. Not even the feeblest of the Union ladies but would have endured first a thousand deaths. Who can conjecture the issue? And, alas for Poesy, Bellona, dread goddess of war, being the most, that such an Iliad should not have been enacted!

"Tim Lamm Provost Marshal? Oh, come now, not Tim Lamm!" had been the universal remark in Somerville when that fact was announced.

Wait one instant. For it takes very little expenditure of colors—water colors—to paint Tim Lamm. A suddenly shot-up youth of nineteen was Tim, oily as to hair, sparse as to mustache, feeble as to stamina, profuse as to speech, loose as to morals, good as to only one thing on earth—and that one thing is poker. All the rest of Tim's fall length is on the canvas when it is added that Tim had "plenty of negroes," and was nephew of the editor. An exceedingly vaporous existence had Tim led up to Secession. With his hat perched, tilted well forward, upon the top of his head, a cigar in the corner of his languid mouth, nothing on the surface of this planet had Tim to do. And he did it; that is, during the day. At night it was poker.

Tim was off to the war from the first, was in one fight in which a bridge was much mixed up, and came back. Forever on the point of leaving to "rejoin his command," somehow he never got off. But as a private? No, Sir. No man readier than he to go as an officer. Not attaining to that, Lamm, editor and uncle, discovers that he can not dispense with Tim from the office of the Star. So Tim is compelled to smoke his listless cigar a fraction of every day in that dreary and very dirty den until his uncle can get him something as Commissary, Quartermaster, Contractor from Richmond.

So, when Martial Law is established in Somerville, Somerville finds it embodied in Tim, cigar in mouth, hat on head, back on the little table before him, ready to perform all the duties of Provost Marshal in the empty store employed for the purpose. And very easy Tim took it. Bob Withers acted for the time as his clerk on the dusty counter near by, entering the names and administering the oath. All that Tim has to do at present is to smooth down his inelegant mustache in the hollowed fore-finger of his left hand whenever he takes his cigar from his mouth with his right. Medicine? Ay, the bitterest on earth.

"An oath under duress has not the least obligation," reasons Guy Brooks and hundreds of thousands at the South. Yet who seriously revere an oath as the most solemn of appeals to God, is or is not the taking of an oath on the heels of such reasoning about as cool, as deliberate a taking the name of God in vain as a man can be guilty of? If the whole moral law, in every possible inflection thereof, were but as explicit and invariable as the Multiplication Table now!

A pitiful sight it was to see old, white-headed men, who had not had time yet to realize the possibility of Secession, the very imagination of which they had abhorred all their lives, suddenly hurried in from their homes, stood like children before this headless puppet of the hour, driven there to do so under peril of property and life, calling on God to witness they renounced the Government they had up till that instant regarded as the noblest and firmest on earth! Solemnly pledging themselves to what? To the suddenest and wildest and windiest—

Strong men came sullenly forward too. "Heaven help us! not a man in Somerville failed to come. Many swearing, as they took the oath—ah, how solemnly!—by the God that made them, to take full vengeance for this their deep humiliation. Yes, it was an oath—not to Secessionists—it left them as it found them; to Union men it was the awful pledge and sacrament of hatred and vengeance. Before that oath their purpose was merely a resolus—beneficial it was a vow.

In the establishment of Martial Law and Conscription Secession rolled up into its senile, subsiding thereafter—but oh, how slowly!—to its nadir.

"I call you to witness, Mr. Lamm, and you, Mr. Withers," Edward Arthur, as he stands before Tim's boots-soles displayed on the little red table, remarks, "that I take this oath only on one ground. Were it not for that I would perish first."

"Ah, and what ground is that?" asks Tim, with languid curiosity, clasping both hands together behind his head and tilting his chair farther back as he speaks. He manages to ask the question, too, with his cigar in his mouth.

"Solely because I am commanded to obey, by Scripture, every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake. I obey as part of my submission to the Powers that be, yielding not to those Powers but to the Providence that permits them present might, and to the express command of God in such a case as this. I submit to this as I would endeavor to do to every affliction He pleases to send, however painful. I have nothing more to say."

"I'm afraid you do not like my Government," says the Provost Marshal, with plying dignity. And if Tim used the expression once during his official career he used it—shall we venture to say?—one thousand times. He had met with it in the corner of some newspaper as the language of some other high and distinguished official in diplomatic correspondence. "I have no choice in the matter," he afterward remarks to those whose houses he has had searched for conscripts, or who are up before him for using disloyal language; "it is my Government which directs me to act as I do. If my Government did not consider it necessary they would not have made it my duty," he replies, when any one attempts to argue the matter of passports from county to county. Yet there is something, as peculiarly pleasing to Mr. Arthur as it is distasteful to Mr. Ellis, in hearing just such an individual as Tim Lamm mention the Confederacy as "my Government."

"I regarded the act of Secession as a wickedness, from voting for which I abstained exactly as I would abstain"—the Minister will add in a steady tone and looking his beardless hero in the eyes—"from the wickedness of swearing, gambling, or lewdness. Every hour I live I more firmly regard it as part of the great crime against God and man for which we are enduring and will continue to endure an awful punishment. I am submitting to it, meanwhile, only as to the afflictive Providence of Heaven, in obedience to its express command to that effect."

The old store is full when he says it. Of course he ought no more to have said it than ought Irate Paul to have made that unpleasant remark about a whitened wall when on his trial. His own ideal Minister would have quietly taken the oath and ridden back again to Mrs. Seer's, thinking and feeling as much as he pleased, but breathing no syllable aloud. He was surprised at himself, for he had no intention of saying a word. But he felt more deeply than he knew, and in the anguish of the moment could not refrain from bearing testimony against the Beal of the hour if he died for it.

At least no other man in Somerville did any thing of the kind. It would have been a too dangerous experiment in the case, say, of Guy Brooks, Ferguson, Dr. Warner, and the like. But Edward Arthur was so well known in Somerville, had married so many of the couples there, hunted so many of the dead there, his purity of life, his acknowledged piety, the evident sincerity of the man, as he stood there before Tim Lamm, erect, earnest, utterly fearless, took the crowd too much by surprise. Besides, just then, it was Tim who presented the majesty of Secession in his person—the contrast between the two was too striking.

"Oh, said he hated and despised the Confederacy with his whole soul! Said he obeyed it only because the Bible made him. Acknowledging, you see, the Bible is on our side. Said the Secessionists were worse than adulterers, liars, and thieves, and murderers! Got so mad he was white with rage. Had his right hand in his bosom all the time, a revolver there I've no doubt. Would you have ever thought such a thing of him, Mrs. Bowles? I used, myself, to think the whole world of Mr. Arthur, have said a thousand times Brother Barker was not to be compared to him. Now just look at those two men! Brother Barker, a true patriot, a strong Secessionist, and Barker a Northern man, you know, while he was here at the South and lived all his life there. I tell you what, Mrs. Bowles—Mrs. Warner it is, she has been in Mrs. Bowles's parlor for the last hour or so, her eyebrows wide apart at the inner ends—"if we only knew we'd find out he's a bad, bad man. There's nothing I can lay my hand on, it's true; but if we only knew! I always was doubtful about him, there's a sort of pride—My little 'Rin is a child, I know; but if she was old enough, and I but imagined Mr. Arthur had any idea of her—"

"I can not imagine what you mean, Madam," says Mrs. Bowles, more in reference to Mrs. Warner's mysterious manner than to her words. "I mean, if my 'Rin was as old as your Alice—I say it as a friend—"

"You will excuse me, Mrs. Warner," Mrs. Bowles interrupts her visitor in her staidest manner—some ten fathoms lower, forty pounds lighter than Mrs. Warner; but it is South Carolina in contrast with Mississippi, and she towers above her as did Marie Antoinette above the oiselle—"we will not allude, if you please, to my daughter, Alice Bowles, in this connection."

How the said Alice managed to bring in Mrs. Warner's name that same evening, as mother and daughter sat sewing together at those perpetual haversacks, is not known, but Alice suspended her needle and looked up surprised at the vehemence of her usually quiet and refined little mother.

"Do not mention her name to me again, Alice. I did suppose our acquaintance with her was ended by my reply to her impertinence in reference to Lieutenant Ravenel's visit. It is not so much her leathsome snuff-dipping, that she should bring her filthy yellow bottle with her into my very parlor, actually converse with me, her filthy soap-stick in the corner of her mouth! It is her quick eyes and her incessant tongue. I do believe the poor creature is a sincere Southern woman; but much as I dislike the Northern people, she has a venom in speaking about them that is exceedingly unadvisable."

"That is one thing I dislike Secession for, mother. Those—Mrs. Seer, and the other Union people—with whom we used to associate most we have been separated from. Mrs. Warner is only one of the new class of people the war has thrown us among. Dr. Peel, for instance, daring to speak to you in Mr. Ellis's store yesterday; that intoxicated old oddity, Captain Richard Simmons, Bob Withers, and Mr. Lamm actually acting with you as a Soldiers' Aid Committee. That odious Yankee schoolmaster, Mr. Neely, too, actually visiting here almost every week. He never dreamed of doing so until he had the war news to talk over with you. For one, if it were not for you and Rudodge, I would almost hate Secession! And to think it is Slavery we are fighting for! It never did before, but it seems odd to me now—Slavery!" adds the young lady, with—like Mr. Arthur before Tim Lamm—a great deal more depth of feeling than she before knew herself to be possessed of.

"Aristocratic little old fool, putting on her Charleston airs with me!" says Mrs. Warner, snuff stick in mouth, that same moment at her fireside. "And that Alice of hers, so polite and reserved, as if she was a queen or an heiress. Plague take them! They say that that Rutledge Bowles the old goose is so everlastingly talking about is going to the dogs there in Charleston. I hope so with all my soul! It's a heap she needs to bring down her abominable pride." And a good deal more to the same effect, Mr. Arthur being intermingled therewith, she said that night in bed to Dr. Warner, like a veteran in the trenches, asleep by her side.

Nothing since his elevation to office pleases Tim Lamm more than Miss Alice Bowles's bearing toward him a few evenings after at a party given by Colonel Ret Roberts. Tim has long since given up Miss Alice as—"beautiful as you please—yes, Sir—but too"—a heated expression here—"proud for me!" It is his new position, of course, which causes Miss Alice to pause near him in an incidental way that night with such a smile as emboldens Tim to inform her that it is a pleasant evening; with great dignity too, the Provost Marshal's hollowed fore-finger smoothing down his mustache.

"You are quite busy these days?" says Alice at last, and with an interest in Mr. Lamm as flattering as it is novel.

"Yes, Miss Alice. Well, only tolerably so. The Secession people among us are so very willing, and those poor Union chaps are so frightened, I don't have as much to do as I supposed I would," says Tim.

"It is such a new thing among us, Mr. Lamm. Do tell me what the duties of a Provost Marshal are?" asks Alice.

"Not a bit proud these days. It is really amazing how the girls are taken by a fellow's being a Government official. Gloriously beautiful!" says Tim afterward to Bob Withers, and a dozen or so more, as opportunity offered, and not without expletives.

"Well, it is a new business to us also," he replies to his fair questioner. "Yes—oh, well, we just do, you know, what turns up to be done. Make every soul take the oath, say. Haul people up if they hesitate about taking Confederate money. A funny thing happened before me about that only to-day, Miss Alice. Joe Staples, the hotel keeper, you know, he has that Scotch Ferguson, grizzly-bearded, positive chap—oh, you know him—up before me, you see. Ferguson had lent Staples some thousand dollars, gold and silver, you know, on interest when Staples was fixing up his hotel, you see. Staples has a trunk full of Confederate money, taken in, you know, from people stopping with him. Staples wants Ferguson to take it in payment. Ferguson refuses. However, he says he may do it under protest, and steps out to consult Guy Brooks as his lawyer. Just as he steps out in comes Colonel Jiggins, cuts with a bundle of Confederate money—he had heard, you see, that Staples was up at my office, and had followed him—cuts, you know, with a bundle of Confederate money as big as a small baby, and wants to pay Staples some—well, I don't know how many hundreds, Tom Jiggins's board bill; you know he used to loaf a good deal about the hotel before he went to the war. What do you think? Staples said he would take it only under protest; steps out to see his lawyer if even that would secure him."

"And what did Mr. Ferguson decide to do?" asks Alice, with interest.

"Came back with Guy Brooks; said he would not take the money in that shape at all. Fact is, people don't like, you know, to take the money. We have the case under advisement. If I could only know," adds Tim, with the dignity of an ambassador, "what my Government would have me do—"

"You have assistance in determining?"

"Assistance? Oh yes; plenty of that. My uncle, Dr. Peel, Captain Simmons when he is sober enough, as for that, and when he is not sober, never is, you know. Fact is, I leave it pretty much to them. I only sit there, you see. We always have a detail of a dozen or so of soldiers to haul up people. The worst here is making out prospects. We let no man go out of the county, and it is so all over the State, but we have him to tell where he is going, what for, how long, and all. However, we have blank forms. Bob Withers fills them up; all I have to do is to sign my name.

But that was just what frightened Mr. Neely. After incredible exertions for office that gentleman had been offered the post of Provost Marshal before Tim. At first he was immensely flattered. But the Yankee, though steadily smothered and trampled down in him with his own hands and feet, was too strong there for that. One night's sleep over it, rather one night's tossing wide awake over it, and Mr. Neely, with a thousand reasons, declined, exactly as he would have done any other speculation in which he might make hundreds, yet possibly, might lose thousands; for the tamer Mr. Neely was not exactly as confident of the certain success as was the outer Mr. Neely. His signature to bills for tuition, in other days, was not so glorious, but safer.

"Mr. Lamun," says Alice, after a while, in lower tones and playing with her fan, "you know how curious we ladies are; there is one thing I would like you to tell me: you have sent some of the worst of the Union men out of the country, have you not?"

Government official as Tim is, he could no more refuse those eyes! Besides, he has an increasing sense of his new importance, and does not care to diminish it.

"I ought not, perhaps, officially, you know, to tell it, Miss Bowles; but you will not mention it, we have. My Government—"

"And in every case they were hung by the road-side?" Alice is paler, but more erect, too, as she asks.

"I'm afraid so," says Tim, not quite so erect, and forgetting his mustache. "My Government is prosecuting a war—"

"It is very close in here," interrupts Alice; "a little nearer the window, if you please. Thank you!" and Tim has a deep consciousness of his importance. It is more painful, however, than pleasing just now.

"You were mentioning Mr. Barker just now, or were you not? He has taken the oath?" she asks at last.

"Parson Barker? I don't remember."

"I must have mistaken. That is—" Alice says, with a stammer and a blush.

"It must have been Mr. Arthur I spoke of," says Tim; and adds: "But it is this conscript business is beginning to make us work. It would look, you know, as if it will take all the volunteers we've got to hunt up the conscripts. In hiding, you see. And when one does catch them, their wives and sisters and old fathers and mothers crying there in my office, you know—"

"However, it relieves you that no one refuses to take the oath—"

"Oath? Oh no! Who cares for an oath, you know? There was Mr. Artbar—but of course you've heard about that?"

"Not clearly. Mr. Arthur? What was it?" It is amazing, considering their long acquaintance, how indifferent Alice is. But Tim tells the whole story very nearly as it occurred—truthful fellow, Tim, except at poker. Besides, he likes to talk, and it is a feather in his new cap to be seen by the company passing and repassing around them talking with her.

"Spunky chap, Miss Alice," he adds at last. "I haven't much use for preachers myself; but one can not help liking that man. He seems really to believe our revolution a wrong thing; shakes his head over us as if we were all out on a spree. Singular! but he really believes so! You won't mention it, Miss Alice, but fact is, of the two men, Mr. Artbar and Brother Barker, as they call him, I can't stand Barker. As to being a good Secessionist, that is all right, you know; at the same time we outsiders don't like to see a preacher mixing himself up in things of the sort too much. It's like a woman outside her sphere. It's that distinguishes us from the Yankees. There's a holy, I mean a pious, or rather a religious—oh! I don't know what you call it," says Tim, making vague gestures with both hands, "a sort of Sabbath-day something one likes to have in a person. The hardest case among us don't like to see a preacher leaving his sermons to mix up— Men are doing, you know, a good deal of cursing and swearing and worse these days; and a parson half-fellow in that sort of crowd, you know— And on Sundays, you know, and in churches, too. For one, I hate—we all do—to have Brother Barker everlastingly in with us, discussing and suggesting—"

"Only trying to moderate you leading officials," explains Alice, in wonderful good-humor. "Not a bit of it, Miss Alice! Moderate? Why, the parson is the most ultra of the whole lot. If we had actually done half the things that parson has urged on us, and from the Bible— You mustn't mention it," continues Tim, who, never less, is thoroughly thawed under the young lady's influence, "but he was for having us send Mr. Arthur out of the country. His Union influence, he said. If we had! But we won't speak of blackjacks along the road any more; excuse me, I see it doesn't agree with you. Parson Barker, his hair combed back, his sallow face, eager eyes, always at a white heat— Fact is, I can't stand Brother Barker!" says Tim, with considerable disgust. "Only you won't mention it, Miss Alice, he always puts me in mind, that man, of the Abolition preachers we read about. Mr. Arthur is mistaken, of course; but no fanaticism about him."

The question, as an official one, weighed, however, on Tim's mind. "I declare something ought to be done with Arthur. I believe my Government would justify me—"

"Oh, play your poker, and let Arthur alone," interrupts Bob Withers, frank and honest Bob, to whom the remark is made that night over the cards. "No, Tim; no, Sir—; you, by George! let the parson alone. I believe I've got hard sense when it isn't my own good is concerned, and I've proved right, by George! more than once in differing from your red-mouthed Secessionists, Simmons, Barker, and such. For my part, I tell you this provost-marshal business won't do; you'll see yet if it will. The whole thing is only a tremendous spree the South is on, a magnificent bender and blow-out, see if it ain't. Smash up, too, some day, by George! But never mind all that; it's poker we are at now."

"I'm an awful wicked scamp—swear, drink, do things worse still—but I can't lie, by George!" says Bob in general, and he says true.

"And, my dear, I was almost shocked," Mrs. Bowles was saying to Alice the same night at home, "at the way you flirted with that Mr. Lamun. You forget that his uncle is a Yankee. Don't do it any more, dear."

LINES TO "THE DERBY."

Or Nature's wondrous stores— Her rocks and woods and shores— Let others sing;

For me, no more of that! I praise the Derby Hat, Bewitching thing!

I look at thee with awe; I think I never saw Such grace as that;

A miracle of art, Without a counterpart, Thou peerless hat!

In cities, or suburban Places, let the "turban" Sometimes be worn;

But the "bonnet" and the "hat" Beside the Derby Hat Look too forlorn.

The satisfaction that I feel at such a hat Will cease—never!

With Keats I now can say, "A thing of beauty's a Joy forever."

Incomparable hat! I am astonished that Thou art so rare;

Thou add'st a new grace, And mak'st each fair face Seem still more fair.

Then I will sing thy praise Until my latest days— Until the grave;

Never let a star be Cast upon the Derby— Long may it wave!

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE LABOR QUESTION.

THE GENTLEMAN WHO TRIES TO CARRY THE EMBROIDERED BAG THROUGH BOTH DOORS—AND PARTS, IF NECESSARY.

A Doctor on Discontent.—If disquiet leads contentment to the view, is it right to expect interest of the spectator, and in the bill at long last?

"I don't miss my church so much as you suppose," said a lady to her minister, who had called upon her during her illness, for I make Sunday at the window as soon as the bells begin to chime, and tell me who are going to church, and whether they have got anything new on."

Hypocrites, like gun-barrels, are not dangerous unless they have something in them. But when the former are charged—powdered, wadded, and water-tight—they should be handled with the greatest caution. In many instances it is dangerous to even look at them.

A TOPHER'S SOLILOQUY.

Leave us their time to fall, And so likewise I: The reason too's the same— Both cases of getting dry. But here's the difference 'twixt you and me— I fall more harder and more frequently.

A madman which can only be made in words certainly "leading to a branch of the peace"—One Irishman discharging his religion to another.

If a police officer is after you, the best thing you can do is to lock the door and then tell yourself.

Mr. Wise, of Virginia, in a late speech, is reported to have said respecting that State: "She has an iron chain of mountains running through her centre, which God has placed there to milk the clouds, and to be the source of her other rivers." The Rochester American remarks: "The figure is borrowed from the New York edition, who milk the clouds as much as they do their cows, and draw from the former the most palatable and healthful portion of the condensed field."

What is new the truth?—What it does not lie.

EPITAPH ON A TOMSTONE IN ENGLAND.

"Our life is but a winter's day, Some only breakfast and away, Others to dinner stay, and are full fed, The oldest man but says, and goes to bed, Large is his debt, who lingers on the day, Who goes the account, has the least to pay."

AN ORATOR QUOTES.—Orestes. "Ma, if white people's made of dust, ain't colored people made of coal-dust?"

"Why, Bill, what's the matter with you? you look 'dewy in the mouth." "Well, Puss, I guess if you'd been through what I have, you'd look bad too." "What's the matter?" "Well, you know Sarah Saltrick, don't you, Pete?" "Yes." "I dined with her last night." "You did! What for?" "Well, I'll tell you. She said she wouldn't marry me, and I'd discard any girl that would treat me in that way."

"Ma, I've struck an oil spring!" exclaimed a young hopeful, the other day, as he dipped a slice of bread into the gravy bowl.

A very worthy minister, settled not a hundred miles from our metropolis, was one Sunday morning descending upon the importance of plain speaking. "Why, my hearers," said he, "St. Paul never used any 'highfalutin' expressions. No; he always spoke plain Anglo-Saxon!"

Mrs. Partington asks, very indignantly, if the bills before Congress are not considered, why there should be so much difficulty in passing them?

A rather profane church-goer of this city, one day asked his clergyman what was the meaning of the passage in the Psalms, "He clothed himself with curving as with a garment." "The meaning," replied the clergyman, "is plain enough; I think that the man, like you, had a habit of curving."

A true picture of despair is a pig reaching through a hole in the fence to get a cabbage that lies a few inches beyond his reach.

An Irishman lost his hat in a well, and was let down in a basket to recover it; the well being deep, and extremely dark within, his courage failed him before he reached the water. In vain did he call to those above to pull him up; they lent a deaf ear to all he said till at last, quite in despair, he belittled out: "O St. Patrick, if you don't draw me up, sure I'll cut the rope."

JAW BREAKERS.

Wish—Hahnyhnyhnygyayyl. French—Larobbeja-quelain. Welsh—ho h.

A boy was caught in the act of stealing dried berries in front of a store the other day, and was looked up in a dark closet by the proprietor. Then the boy commenced begging most piteously for release, and after using all the persuasion that his young imagination could invent, proposed: "Now, if you'll let me out and send for my daddy, he'll pay you for the berries, and lick me besides!" This appeal was too much for the grocery-man to stand out against.

A country editor received a severe "hold" by reading a fragment of newspaper in the city, and recovered a series of letters to his journal, headed "My Trip on the Blues."

A fashionable but ignorant lady, desirous of purchasing a watch, was shown a very beautiful one, the shop-keeper remarking that it went thirty-six hours: "What, in one day?" she asked.

PROVERBIAL EPICURUM.

Prize, like a wild, unbroken oak, His rider overthrows; But he who walks in humble salt security onward goes.

A Western paper suggests as an improvement in Bibles the preparation of a leaf or two in the "family record" for divorcees.

A vagabond-looking fellow was brought before a magistrate at Tourbridge on a charge of stealing turnips. After making some civil remarks, he was asked by the magistrate: "Did you not take the turnips found in your pocket?" "Certainly not," replied the prisoner. "I was to sleep in the field among the turnips and these grew in my pocket—the best of my body causing them to shoot up lower than ordinary. I stole turnips, your worship; I sown the idea!"

The turkey burst its confinement while roasting, and the stuffing escaped to the terror of the liberians (dressed left to walk it, who ran to call her mistress. "Ma'am!" she screamed, "come down and see the turkey; 'tis bewitched' surely, but some of the ornaments is healthy out!"

THEORY AT A WESTERN BARBERSHOP.—The herald reign (brilliant) begins with a bit in the mouth.

An Irishman slipped up and came down "broadside" upon his back, which killed his breathing a minute or two, besides bruising his head considerably. Recovering, he jumped up and threw himself into a fighting attitude, slouch his fist at the inn, as if he was about to take down every rascal upon the slippery substance, and with a violent gesture and threatening voice, exclaiming: "Faith, an' ye'll tak a sweet for this before long, are ye?"

DEFINITIONS.

Book-keeper.—A despatch you to send in a garden of beautiful flowers. The improved crab-tree of humanity. Author.—Conversation with the pen. Artist.—A drawing-room man-trap set by young ladies. Carpenter.—A skillful workman who repairs the damage made by the wear and tear of the machinery of life— An ill that oft must be endured. When life are wanted to be cured.

Woman.—An easy on grass, is one voluble, elegantly bed.

Confidant.—A manual of good manners bound in cloth.

Old Maid.—A quiver full of arrows with no bow (heart) attached.

Wife.—Widow's supererogating.

Heart.—The best card in the chance game of matrimony; sometimes overused by divorcees and knaves; often won by tricks; and occasionally treated in a shuffling manner, and then cut altogether.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

April 3: In the Senate, the bill authorizing the President of the United States to transfer a gun-boat to the Government of Liberia was passed.

In the House, the Senate bill to amend the act of July 4, 1864, for the relief of seamen on board of vessels wrecked or lost in the naval service, was passed.

April 4: In the Senate, the veto Message was taken up, and Mr. Trembly took the floor in defense of the Civil Rights bill.

In the House, the contested election case between Dodge and Brooks was discussed.

April 5: In the Senate, Mr. George F. Edwards, the Senator appointed from Vermont to fill the vacancy occasioned by Mr. Free's death, was sworn in.—The bill to provide an act authorizing in the people of Dakota, for protection against Indian warriors, was passed.—A joint resolution was passed authorizing to colored soldiers their benefits—

At 1 o'clock the Message of President Johnson vetoing the Civil Rights bill was taken up. Mr. Beveridge Johnson took the floor, and spoke at length in opposition to the bill. He was followed by other Senators.

In the House, the bill giving three months' pay preparatory allowed to army officers who should continue in service to the close of the war—to such officers as resigned or were mustered out at their own request after the 15th of April, 1865, was passed.

April 6: In the Senate, Mr. Lane, of Kansas, offered a joint resolution for the admission of the States lately in rebellion to representation in Congress on a condition of their repudiating the rebel debt, indemnifying the Federal debt, assenting to all ordinances of secession, and granting the rights of suffrage to such colored people as can read, or who own and pay taxes on $250 worth of property.—At 1 o'clock the Message of the President vetoing the Civil Rights bill was taken up, and after considerable debate the vote was finally taken, and the bill passed over the President's veto, yeas 33, nays 15.

In the House, the New York contested election case was taken up. After a two hours' speech by Mr. Brooks, and additional debate, the vote was reached. On the question of Mr. Brooks's claim, it stood, yeas 54, yeas 45. (Mr. Mr. Dodge's claim, yeas 51, nays 55.)

April 7: In the Senate, the Loan bill was passed—21 to 7.

In the House, the Civil Rights bill was passed over the President's veto—115 to 41.

NEW YORK STATE LEGISLATURE.

April 3: In the Senate, among the several bills passed were the following: Authorizing the Comptroller of New York City to borrow money for improvement of docks and wharves, relative to power and duties of Comptroller of the Central Park; authorizing the survey of a route for a railroad from Salamanca to some point on the St. Lawrence River, at or near Ogdensburg; and fixing the salary of the City Judge of Brooklyn at $2000 per annum.

April 4: In the Senate, Mr. Low called up his resolution expressing disappointment and regret at the vote by President Johnson of the Civil Rights bill. After some debate this resolution was passed—yeas 21, nays 8.—Mr. Fodge called from the table the joint resolutions heretofore adopted in relation to, and subsequently by the Assembly, on Federal relations, and the first three were adopted by a strict party vote; the fourth, in favor of universal suffrage in the District of Columbia, was adopted by a vote of 12 to 6. An amendment, to limit the privileges to those who can read the Constitution of the United States and have been in the army, was lost—yeas 27, nays 2.

In the Assembly, the Broadway Corrugated Elevated Railway bill passed a third reading—yeas 61, yeas 41. All the other elevated railway bills were lost.

April 5: In the Assembly the following bills were passed: To incorporate the Niagara Ship Canal Company, by a vote of 51 to 31; to reorganize the Senate District of the State; to extend the railroad tracks in Grand and other streets in New York City, by a vote of 71 to 31; to construct an elevated railway in Broadway in New York City, by a vote of 74 to 29; to authorize the taxation of stockholders of banks.

April 7: In the Assembly, the bill to amend the New York Sewerage and Drainage Act passed a third reading.—A resolution approving the course of Senators Morgan and Harris in voting for the Civil Rights bill was passed by a vote of 63 to 33.

NEWS ITEMS.

The steamer England, which arrived at Halifax from Liverpool April 5, had one hundred and sixty cases of cholera on board. There were forty deaths during the passage. The England had 1500 sleeping passengers.

The Senator Reynolds of March 19 announces the release of Hon. D. L. Yulee from Fort Jackson.

The Pennsylvania (Virginia) Express has information direct from Toronto, Canada, that John C. Breckinridge is residing there. "Care is making its mark on his hair, his hair, which four years ago was as black as jet, is now hoary. He is weary of exile, and anxious to return to home and friends." Ex-Governor Price, of New Jersey, is going to Washington to interview for him.

A treaty with the Seminoles has been concluded. The tribe cedes 15,000 acres of their reservation for the use of civilized Indians.

Honoro Maynard has expressed the opinion that public sentiment in Tennessee and North Carolina is more inclined to justice than in Mississippi and Pennsylvania.

The question of negro suffrage in Tennessee. It is said "will be settled by-and-by in favor of the black man, and I should not wonder if Tennessee gave the black man the right to vote before Connecticut. And the black man will probably vote sooner in North Carolina than in Pennsylvania."

The Charleston Courier reports that three thousand two hundred freedmen have emigrated from North Carolina during the last three months to Massachusetts, Connecticut, and the other New England States, on contracts to work at $20 per month, and that more will follow.

The Middle Tribuna, of March 29, says the new form of all parts of Alabama is in the effect that the freedmen are realizing their situation, and are going to work with a will.

The Methodist Episcopal Conference, now in session at New Orleans, has accepted an invitation from the Methodist officials in this city to unite with them and the denomination generally in their public and private devotions.

It is reported that all the muster-out will be completed by the first of May, and there will then be left in service 17,925 white volunteers, and 20,317 colored, making a total of 38,242.

FOREIGN NEWS.

Texas has been so new development of President Lincoln. It is confidently asserted that Lead (Cotton) has been reached Paris, where he was the guest of John Mitchell.

There is great apprehension of a war between Prussia and Austria respecting the Duchies. Great military preparations are being made by Austria. The conciliatory policy of Austria toward Hungary may possibly be put due to a desire on the part of the Vienna Cabinet to relieve the empire from all domestic embarrassments in case of a German war.

The Emperor Napoleon, in his reply to the Address of the Corps Legislatif, says: France, equally with our allies, desires progress, stability, and liberty, but a liberty which shall develop intelligence, strengthen institutions, and the noble exertions of labor—no a liberty bordering upon license, which would create evil passions, destroy all belief, rekindle hatred, and give rise to disorder. We require a liberty which shall enlighten, control, and discuss the actions of the Government, but not become an arm to undermine and overthrow it. Fifteen years ago, when universal chief of the State, without effective power, and without support in the Chamber, but strong in my conscience and the suffrage which had elected me, I ventured to declare that France would not persist in any law. I have kept my word. For fifteen years France has developed and increased, and her high destiny will be accomplished. After an our own will continue our work. My guarantee for this is the assistance of the great bodies of the state, the devotion of the army, the patriotism of all good citizens, and lastly, that Africa possesses that has never failed our country."

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

The looks for subscription to the stock of the Anglo-American Telegraph Company was closed in London on the 15th of March. All the capital required to make and lay a new cable and to get up and complete the one about two-thirds laid last year, has been subscribed. The contractors are making sixteen nautical miles of the new cable per day, and it is a great improvement upon that of last year. The Great Eastern was being put in the most perfect order, and the 20th June it will the try fund for her departure from Sheerness for Valentia, Ireland.

ON THE PLAINS—INDIANS ATTACKING BUTTERFIELD'S OVERLAND DISPATCH COACH.—SCULPTURED BY THOMPSON H. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 245.]

EXTERIOR OF THE ADOBE FORTIFICATION AT SMOKY HILL STATION—FIGHTING THE FIRE.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

ON THE PLAINS.

We give on this page and on page 298 some interesting illustrations of life on the Plains. In No. 474 of the Weekly we alluded to the attack made last winter on BUTTERFIELD'S Overland Dispatch Coach. Our artist, Mr. DAVIS, was one of the party attacked, and has furnished on page 248 a sketch of the occurrence, together with other illustrations, of which he gives the following descriptions:

ATTACK OF INDIANS ON AN OVERLAND COACH.

Leaving Atchison we journeyed out into the vast plains, that never can be other than the vast wilderness that they are. We had, or thought we had, a journey of six or seven days before us. But circumstances alter cases; at least they did ours.

Two hundred and fifty miles from Atchison we became aware that Indians were more plenty than usual along the route. This gave us no uneasiness; but soon after the discovery of the bodies of murdered men—some of whom had been captured alive, and undergone the most awful torture, such as the cutting out of tongues and other parts of their persons, then burning them alive—caused us to be continually on our guard. At this part of the journey Colonel TAMULYS, an able officer and a good Indian fighter, when he has the men, furnished us with a small escort.

Soon after this we discovered the bodies of two more men, from which we drove the wolves, and buried them. These men had fought and been killed; their bodies were covered with arrow-wounds. Brave men as they were, we could only cover them with so thin a blanket of prairie sod that would hide them from sight but not from the wolves.

INTERIOR OF THE ADOBE FORTIFICATION AT SMOKY HILL STATION.—[SKETCHED BY T. R. DAVIS.]

Still further on we buried three more bodies that the Indians had left most barbarously mutilated. These discoveries, following each other so rapidly, caused us to be ever on the alert for an attack, which came about two o'clock one bright day, when one would have thought that the Indians would have been busy hunting the buffalo.

We had nearly reached a station known as Smoky Hill Spring when we discovered a party of fully sixty Indians within short pistol-shot of the coach. Our escort had reached the station and dismounted, leaving our little party to fight the affair out alone, which we did in the most determined style—arrows and pistol-balls penetrating the coach every moment, strange to say, without any thing more serious resulting than a couple of arrow scratches!

The Indians, beaten off, were joined by parties that seemed to come from every leaf. Thinking to drive us from the shelter of the station, which we had by this time reached, they set fire to the tall grass to the westward of us. The strong breeze brought the smoke and flame rapidly down, nearly reaching the adobe before we could check the fire by beating it down and out with our blankets. This we finally succeeded in doing. Then, so far as fire was concerned, we were safe; for prairie grass will not been twice on the same day, and an Indian is too careful of his life to come within rifle range, if he is sure that the party that points said rifle is used to the weapon.

STREET VIEW IN SANTA FE, NEW MEXICO.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

No attack was made until midnight, when an unlimited quantity of arrows were distributed among us. Dawn found us ready, and the Indians perceiving this, no attack was made. About ten o'clock a company of Colonel Tammara's regiment came to our rescue, at the sight of whom the Indians mounted their ponies, and we saw no more of them except at a great distance.

STREET SCENE IN SANTA FE.

The little city of Santa Fe has about it an ancient appearance that is so different from the more American cities of the neighboring Territories, that one scarcely realizes that he is still in the United States. The language spoken is almost exclusively Mexican, and the people so lazy that no excitement can urge them to a faster pace than a slow walk.

Wagons and carts are a too modern innovation for the Mexican, who uses instead the "Burro"—or, in good English, a diminutive specimen of donkey. This "Burro" is raised in the family, among the children, and is the most peaceful and domestic animal that I have yet seen; it has, too, the faculty of being able to exist in pasture that a goat would starve on.

The houses of Santa Fe are built entirely of adobe brick, which is to all appearance the same style of brick that the Israelites were engaged in making for the Egyptians. The roofs of the houses are of mud also, the exceeding infrequency of rain making this roof practicable.

The only thing that the New Mexican does really well in is the manufacture of jewelry; this he makes after the most curious patterns, and very beautifully. Some of the specimens would put to shame some of the best designs of our leading jewelers.

OLD LEVERT'S GRAVE.

"WARR: O my God, how I suffer!" groaned the wounded man, and rolled his bloodshot eyes over the pitiless blue sky and the whispering forest, and then closed them, perhaps as he thought, never to open them again.

Open they did, however, for a heavy footfall came through the wood, heralded by a rough voice slapping.

"—The kingdom coming in the year of jubilee!"

"Just so, year of jubilee sure enough. Lerdly how them graybacks run yesterday—most like as if they'd heard the blood-hounds after 'em! Well, turn and turn about's fair play, and— Hi dere!"

With the exclamation the speaker, a stalwart negro dressed in the uniform of the United States, and carrying a musket over his shoulder, stopped short, and looked down at the wounded and dying man, who, slowly opening his eyes, looked up at him.

"Clare to graceless if it ain't Mas'r Winch—Lieutenant Winch, of the rebel army, I'd ought to say."

"The grave sarcasm of the amendment so tickled the speaker's fancy that he was fain to indulge in a little quibble, even while kneeling down to relieve the dying man.

"I speak, Mas'r, I's got to take you prisoner inter my camp, hasn't I?" asked he, cheerfully.

"I'm dying, Scip. Water, fer God's sake!" cried the wounded man.

"Sho! Dying be you? Oh no, Mas'r, I reckon not. When I got out up so awful last year, 'long of you telling old Mas'r what I said 'bout him to your son, I thought I was dying sure 'nough, but I didn't recollect, too, how bad I wanted a drink, and I kin guess just how you wants one now. Mas'r and you laughed mighty loud when I asked one of you fer de Lord's sake to git me some water. Recollect dat, Mas'r Winch?"

The wounded man raised his dim eyes to the dark face in our pitiless appeal, groaned, and closed them hopelessly. The negro's quick perception translated look and groan, and question.

"Yes, yes, Mas'r Winch, you recollect well 'nough, and you's thinking dat my turn's come now, and I'll put you off for all I got dat time, but you's mistaken. Dat kind o' talk may do for white folks, but I's a nigger, and seems it. Wait a bit now."

Unstopping his canteen as he spoke, the negro filled it at the running brook, raised the head of his enemy tenderly upon his arm, and held to his lips what seemed to them a draught of Paradise.

"Ah!" sighed Lieutenant Winch, "that's life."

"Wait till I get you in de shade, Mas'r. Dis yer July sun's 'bout to melt de mornin' out o' yer bones. Kin yer help y' sure?"

"No! My back's broken I believe—any way both legs are. Oh! No, no, Scip, don't stir me!"

The negro carefully cut away the rebel uniform and examined the wounds it covered. Their ghastly nature told more plainly than words what the end must be, and how soon it must come. The rich brown of Scip's complexion faded to a sickly yellow as he stood upright, and looking down into those dim eyes, said, solemnly.

"Mas'r Winch, if you feels like you want to hear me say it, I fergit you, an' I pray God to fergit you all de wrong you has eber done. For you's got to die, Mas'r, dat's ef'ct."

"I know it, Scip, I know it. Scip—"

"What, Mas'r?"

"I'm glad you said dat, Scip. It was mighty mean of me to put you into that scrape. I'm glad you forgive me."

"Nough said, Mas'r. Now see! you can't be moved, I's going to try to make you more comfortable what you be. Here's a blanket: reckon de feller dat I trowed it away won't want it no more, and here's another, and eber dere's another wid a dead man strapped eber it. Now you see, Mas'r, I jes piece dere tegelder wid a bagynot, and fix 'em ober dis yer limb ob de chestnut-tree, an'—dare you be."

The shadow of the screen thus formed fell gratefully across the figure of the dying man, and he smiled faintly.

"That's it, Scip. Fetch more water, boy!" "Here yer be, Mas'r. Is you head comfortable?" "Yes, thank you, Scip; you sha'n't lose by this." "Don't expect to lose nothin' but little time, Mas'r; and I ain't in a particular hurry. We's out berrin' de dead de mornin', and there's 'nough wids on." "No, but wait, and listen carefully," interrupted the other impatiently. "I'll make you my heir, Scip. I'll make you the richest nigger in de States, ay, richer than half de white men."

Scip opened his great eyes and stared blankly at the speaker, remembering that Lieutenant Winch had not been known in New Orleans as a man of property, or even credit, having, indeed, been rather a loose and disreputable character, his only avowed pursuit being that of marker at a billiard and gambling saloon, while he was shrewdly suspected of other and far less respectable avocations.

"Reckon, Mas'r, you'd better be making up yer 'counts for de next world, and quit follerin' wid such talk," said he, dryly.

"I ain't feeling, Scip, not a bit of it. You've been good to me, and I treated you mean once; and you're a good fellow, and—maybe I'll do better where I'm going, for making it up to you. Some water, Scip."

The negro silently held the canteen to the parched lips, and then squatting grotesquely upon the ground, fixed his eyes upon the face of the rebel, and waited his further revelation.

"We kept a bank, Scip, you know."

"Fero-table dey called it, Mas'r."

"Well, no matter. I'd made up my mind to quit when the drafting began, and I didn't want to go empty-handed. I got another key to de safe, and waited for a pile. One night we had an uncommon run of luck, and raked in gold, jewels, and paper, to de tune of near half a million dollars. That night I made my haul, but I couldn't leave de city, nor I didn't want to. I wanted to save my name, and leave it respectable."

A slight sarcastic twitch of Scip's wide mouth emphasized the period.

"It wasn't so much for myself," pursued the extolled-marker, hastily; "but I've got a little girl—the only creature in de world belonging to me, and I was in hopes we'd go off somewhere, and live handseme and gentel, and I'd see her marry a gentleman, and never know all that's been said."

He paused, and his white mouth quivered with the last pang of defeated hope. The quick sympathies of the negro were touched.

"What's yer little gal now, Mas'r?" asked he.

"At school wid Mrs. Leonard, 16 Grand Street. Her name is Fanny Disbrowe."

"Disbrowe? Ain't it Winch, Mas'r?"

"No. I didn't want her see any one to know she was my child. My name don't smell very sweet in Orleans I'm afraid. I called her Disbrowe when I took her there five years ago, and I haven't seen her to speak to since. She's just turned twelve years old now, and mighty pretty, Scip."

The negro looked with wonder at the face, but now so ghastly and repulsive as it lighted for the last time with the best impulse of the departing soul.

"Din't know as you'd got a child, Mas'r," said he.

"Nobody knew it—not she, nor de school-ma'am, nor any one. Now, listen sharp, Scip. I buried my treasure till I could leave de city without suspicion; and de next day I was drafted, and here I am. I buried it in de church-yard just outside de city, on de north road, in de grave of old Levert, at de northwest corner, you know."

"I know, Mas'r. A big, grand monument, and de grave behind it."

"Yes. And close behind de monument, about two feet below de surface, you'll find a box—the key is here, round my neck, and in dat box is half a million dollars, though some of de paper won't be good for much now, I expect."

"And what's I to do wid all dat money, Mas'r?"

"Go and get my child, Scip, carry her North, and put her at de best school you can hear of. Look out some mistler, or some man dat de poor folks trust and think well of, and put half de money in his hands for de use of de child, and let him make a good woman of her, and marry her to a good man, and have her live respectable, and when she dies do not be ashamed of her name. Scip, will you do all dis?"

"Yes, Mas'r, if I's loved," said the negro, simply.

"And de other half of de money is yours, to use as you've a mind to. But if you don't do well by my child, boy, there sha'n't be a cent of dat money dat don't torment you worse than hell-dere—do you hear me? I'll come from my grave to haunt you, but it shall."

"Dere won't be no 'caison, Mas'r Winch," replied Scip, gravely; "if I gets de little gal and de money, I expects to do my duty by 'em bef."

The dim, dim eyes of de dying man strained themselves in a last long scrutiny of de negro's face, and then he feebly said:

"Somehow I feel to trust you, boy. I've always noticed dat a real honest, sensible nigger was more reliable than any mean white fellow you could pick up. I want her to go North—I was raised in old Massachusetts myself, though I'm Southern principles right straight through—but I'd sooner my girl married a Yankee—Scip—I believe I'm going—head, boy—you'll—be good to—"

"I will dat, Mas'r, I will dat. You kin trust me, Mas'r—I 'clare to goodness, you kin trust me." And Scip repeated de comfortable assurance again and again, until de hand he held grew cold and heavy in his own, and de pallor of de father's face changed to de awful gray of death.

Then Scip decently composed de corpse, covered it wid de blankets, and went away through de wood to summon his fellow-laborers to dig a grave; and when all was over he lingered to swear above dat grave a solemn oath dat de trust committed to him by de dying man should never be forgotten or slighted, but should employ his best energies and skill until his fulfillment.

How to proceed in de first steps of de matter, however, was a question which Scip's mind was unable to solve satisfactorily. New Orleans was still in possession of de rebels, although Farragut's iron hand was already thundering at de gates; and Scip, who had fled from dat city to join de Union army, knew but too well de punishment awaiting his recapture.

Also he knew, or had heard, de penalty of detection from de paternal but severe employer he now served, and he shrewdly guessed dat leave of absence from a corps momentarily expecting to meet de enemy was not to be obtained, even by a more influential applicant than himself.

"No," mused he, marching slowly back to camp in company wid his fellow-laborers, "no, dere's no good axing dat to be fixed. Dere's noffin for it but ter cut an' run same's I did afore, on'y de time I's remain' later slavery an' afore I was runnin' out. Clare ter goodness I wish Mas'r Winch had done died 'fore I come along, or else I wish he'd been ugly an' hateful, so's I could ha' gone an' lef him ter die alone. But he's got me now afore, an' I's a nigger, an' 'er gwine ter break my word like he'd ha' done—I's afore it."

The chuckle closing this train of thought caught de ear of de young Lieutenant commanding de party, and, looking round, his merry blue eyes met de dark and humid ones of de negro.

"What is it, Scip?" asked careless Tom Vane, ignoring at one blow his own shoulder-straps, de private's color, and all sense of military etiquette.

"Neffin but my nonsense, Mas'r Vane," replied Scip; but a sudden inspiration darted into his mind.

"I'll ax his 'pison an' device," thought he; and no sooner was de fatigue party dismissed and de Lieutenant's careless steps turned toward his own tent than Scip was at his elbow.

"Like ter tell you, Mas'r Vane, what 'twas I war luffin 'bout," said he, with a salute.

"Bliss you, Scip, I don't care. I only asked, thinking dere was some fun going. I'm not a father confessor, and you've as good a right to laugh at nothing as I have. Laugh away, my boy, and give a reason to no man. You're free now."

But Scip was not to be diverted from his purpose; and following de Lieutenant into his tent—empty just then—he proceeded to tell him de whole story of his interview wid de rebel officer, his request, and de perplexity in which it had involved him.

The Lieutenant listened with interest, but shook his head at de negro's expressed determination to "cut and run" without de formality of leave-taking.

"Don't do dat, Scip," said he, earnestly; "if you're caught you'll be shot, and if you're not you'll be called a coward and a skulker. Stick to de flag, and we'll all be in New Orleans before many weeks are over."

"Yes, but you see, Mas'r, de lilly money won't be far den. De missus date got de care ob her an' a red-hot rebel, an' an awful hard woman too; an' she'll be off 'fore our folks gets into de city, she will shore, an' de Lord only knows what'll come to de pickaniny. No, Mas'r, I's got to go right d'rectly an' reaky dat er chile an' dat er property 'fore it's too late."

"Then you must get leave or it must be got for you. I'll see de Colonel—he's my uncle, you know—Stop! I've got an idea, Scip! Secret service and spying out de enemy's camp! Hurrah, my boy, I'll go too! See if I don't!"

Snatching his cap Lieutenant Vane dashed out of de tent without further explanation, leaving Scip open-mouthed with astonishment, and utterly bewildered by his companion's daring assurance.

"He go, too," muttered he. "De Lord ha' mercy of I's got to tote he an' de lilly gal 'bout out o' Egypt. Beck'n my han's 'll be ober full."

He was still shaking his head in disapprobation of de idea when de young officer re-entered de tent, his face glowing, and his figure dilated with animation and importance.

"All right, Scip!" exclaimed he, breathlessly. "I've seen de Colonel, and we'll be off to-night. He wants to communicate wid some one inside, and de secret service men are all off. You're to go and speak to him directly."

"To de Kunnel, Mas'r?"

"Yes, come along; I'll go wid you."

It was in de dusk of an autumn evening, some days after de death of Lieutenant Winch, dat a Confederate officer, pale, travel-stained, wearing his arm in a sling and his head in a bandage, slowly mounted de steps of de St. Charles Hotel, in New Orleans, leaning heavily as he did so upon de shoulder of his negro servant. A sharp-eyed and morose-looking individual, who had patiently followed them in deir slow progress through de city, awaited de steps after them, and into de office, where de wounded officer was already inscribing his name.

"A bedroom, if you please, and supper," said he to de clerk as he threw down de pen.

"Yes, Sir. Jim, show de gent to 46. Gong will second in fifteen minutes, Sir."

"Very well. Come, Joe."

The officer left de room, followed by his servant, and de sharp-eyed man who had stood, meantime, staring out at de window and picking his teeth in an abstracted manner, waded up to de desk and laid a detaining hand upon de back de clerk had been about to close.

"William Sewall, Captain C.S.A., and servant," read he. "H'm! That story of escaping from de Yanks and making his way down here from Corinth sounds bogus to me, though it may be. It suited de Colonel, it seems, but I'll be hanged if I would have let him pass so easy. Any way, a little watchin' won't hurt any body, and I'll keep an eye on him and dat sly-looking nigger of his."

Captain William Sewall, C.S.A., with his servant Joe, had meantime installed himself comfortably in No. 46, and closed de door. No sooner was dis done, however, than he opened it again, and thrusting out his head, watched de retreating figure of de white-jacketed waiter until it disappeared down de stairs, then glanced warily through de corridor; and finally reclining and locking de door, mounted a chair to shut de blind above it, open for de sake of de air. This done he stately skipped to de floor, released his arm from de sling, and used it to flourish above his head de U.S.A. cap, somewhat incongruously accompanying de gesture wid de whispered apostrophe—

"Three cheers for de Red, White, and Blue! And three more for Tom Vane and Scip—What's your name, boy?"

"Scip, Mas'r; nuffin more," returned de negro, with a broad grin and a look of acute apprehension cleverly done into one.

"Scip, Scip, then; dat shall be it. Now, Scip, don't be scared, nor roll your big eyes at dat door any more. Every thing is as safe as possible outside, and I've calmed down now. But I'd got to rid myself of de patriotism bottled in all day, somehow or another, or I should have burst. And to think of de cheeky manner we have managed it! Coming straight to de crack hotel and registering myself Captain, C.S.A.! What a story for de fellows when we get back to camp! But, Scip, it was de right way. They didn't half like my story at de outpost back dere, and I shrewdly suspect we have been watched and followed. Did you notice dat fellow who came up de steps just after us?"

"Yes, Mas'r, an' I's eber dat feller afore. Mighty mean trash, I reckon. Nebber seemed much 'bout, dough he's allus hangin' round 'wid gar'lemen tryin' ter look at ef he b'longed wid 'em."

"Just de fellow for a spy, I dare say, and we must look out for him," said Lieutenant Vane, more thoughtfully than he had yet spoken. "Now, Scip, it is my opinion dat de sooner we're out of dis de better; and also dat it will not be well for us to be found at home if any gentleman should take a fancy to call upon us dis evening. So, before we have our supper, I will go out and transact de Colonel's business, while you call at de school, show de written order I have given you from de father of Miss Fanny Disbrowe, take de young lady, and bring her here. Then about midnight we'll visit de church-yard and wake de ghost of old Levert, whoever he may have been; and after breakfast, if all seems tranquil, or sooner if there's any fuss, we'll shake off de dust of dis charming sink of iniquity and go out as we came in."

"Wouldn't it be better, Mas'r, fer ter make shoes ob de money first, and get de pick'ninny arterwards?" queried Scip, cunningly.

"No, my boy; fer we may have to leave without any time for parting calls, and I'd rather risk de child and no money, than get de money and abandon de child."

"Dat so, Mas'r. Dat what I call real honorable sentiment. De credit to a colled peasant, Mas'r, dat idee."

Captain Sewall, C.S.A., strolled leisurely down de stairs, followed by his servant; paused in de office to light a cigar, and to sardoniously inform de clerk dat if any one asked for him he should say he had gone out for some colls, and might not return till late; and then passed down de steps and up de now lighted street.

"He's a coming arter, Mas'r," muttered Scip, closing up to his master's side after a few minutes.

"All right. You strike off down dis lane, and let him follow me. He'll be none de wiser fer seeing where I go," was de equally caustic reply; and a moment after de negro suddenly dived into a black alley, and, hiding himself in a doorway, saw dat de esquire, only passing to cast one long glance after him, hurried on in pursuit of his more important game.

"Go long, you fool! an' I should tink de debil of feel 'shamed to have turned out sich a mean specimen ob a chile!" muttered Scip, wrathfully, as he stole to de head of de alley and watched de retreating figure dogging his master's footsteps. When both were out of sight de negro cautiously emerged, and after following in de same direction for a short distance, struck off into a side street, and presently ran up de steps of a handsome square house whose front door-plate bore de inscription:

MADAME LEMOND'S REMARKS FOR YOUNG LADIES.

To de servant who opened de door Scip announced his errand, and communicated his credentials, in de form of an order from J. Disbrowe to Madame Lemond, to commit to de negro Joe, handing her de paper, de custody of his daughter Fanny, with de property belonging to her.

After ten minutes of de deers-mat, Scip was desired to walk up stairs, and being presently ushered into de drawing-room, found Madame Lemond—a little, nervous-looking Frenchwoman—standing in de centre of de room, de order in her hand.

"Your name, boy?" asked she, rapidly, as Scip passed inside de door, bowing humbly.

"Joe, Mist'."

"And who sent you?"

"Mas'r Sewall, Mist'. Mas'r Disbrowe axed him ter fetch de lilly mist' eber dis place 'fore de Yankee git in, kase dey's gwine ter kill ebbery livin' soul dey find, women an' chilen an' all."

"Mon Dieu! mon Dieu!" exclaimed de Frenchwoman, clasping her hands and turning deadly pale.

"They will do dat, then?"

"Course dey will, Mist', an' dey's like ter hab de chance mighty soon. Mas'r Disbrowe said fer us be shoes an' bring de lilly gal away 'fore to-morrow mornin'."

"I shall go myself. Rosalie must stay and send off de children. I must go—dis very night!" muttered Madame Lemond, rising from de chair where she had sunk, and tottering toward de door.

"Will Missy Fanny be done get ready pretty soon?" interposed Scip, seeing dat both he and his errand were forgotten.

"Oh!"—and Madame Lemond paused to violently ring de bell. A pretty maidservant answered it immediately.

"Put up Miss Disbrowe's clothes, dress her fer walking, and bring her down to dis man, who is to take her home. Then come to my room," ordered de mistress; and, with a slight nod by way of adieu to Scip, glided from the room and ran hastily up stairs. The servant followed, and Scip, finding himself alone, allowed the funeral gravity of his sable visage to relax into a grin, becoming by degrees so broad as to reveal nearly the whole of a magnificent set of teeth.

"Golly! scared she pretty well!" muttered he, and cast an admiring eye about the room, thickly strewn with these articles de luxe so utterly useless, and yet so seductive, in the way of loot, to the rank and file of an invading army.

"Berry pretty pickin' here," continued Scip. "An' seein' our folks 'll be here 'morrow or nex' day, rock'n I'll take my share now."

As he spoke, Scip's black paw descended upon an elegant paper-weight of ebony and silver, with a golden folder and pen-holder lying beside it. These he rapidly transferred to one of his pockets, and rolled his eyes upon a silver card basket and gold-stoppered essence-bottle a little farther on. But even as the great black fingers closed upon the basket Scip paused and drew back.

"Dat no fashion for soldier in de Federal Army be catin' up," muttered he. "De well 'nough for sarrent, or mean white trash; but mahbe some day I'll be an officer an' a gentleman."

More rapidly than they had disappeared, the paper-weight, the folder, and the pen-handle emerged from the pocket of the future "officer;" and although in the half hour ensuing between that moment and Miss Dabrowa's appearance Scip's keen eyes examined and admired every article in the room, not the point of his smallest finger was allowed to touch any one of them; and when Rosalie, the pretty maid, opened the door for the young lady to enter, she found him waiting in the very attitude and very spot where she had left him.

"Here's Miss Dabrowa, Joe, and her trunk's in de hall. Miss's is callin'—good-by, Miss Fanny."

"Good-by, Miss. Joe, are you papa's sarvent?"

"No, Miss, I's Cap'n Sewall's boy. Dat your pappy sent for you by us."

The little girl allowed her dark eyes to rest upon the face of her strange guide for a moment, and then, straightening her graceful figure with an involuntary movement of self-reliance and decision, said:

"Very well, Joe. I am quite ready."

In the hall, as Rosalie had said, stood the young lady's modest trunk, and Scip, shouldering it easily, led the way into the street, closely followed by his little charge.

"Where is papa?" asked she, as they slowly walked up the dimly-lighted street.

"He was 'bout twenty mild from here, missy, las' time I heard from him," said Scip, congratulating himself upon the evasion that was so free.

"And is he pretty well?" asked the child, raising her great eyes curiously to the negro's face.

"Fas'rate, missy. He nobber war so well in his life afore."

Scip spoke confidently and even cheerfully; but glancing down at the delicate little face opposed to his he found there a solemn doubt, a dawning suspicion, impossible to meet or combat.

"Reck'n, missy, we'd bestest hurry up a lilly bit, Mas'r Sewall will be waitin' fer us," said he, hurriedly; and the rest of the walk was performed with silent rapidity.

Arrived at the St. Charles, Scip led his little charge directly to the room retained by his master, and, placing the trunk upon the floor, asked, with even a tender accent in his rough voice:

"Kin I do sumfin for you, lilly missy? or does you want de chamber-maid far to help you dress? Has you had some supper, missy?"

Miss Fanny Dabrowa seated herself upon her trunk, folded her pretty hands in her lap, and fixed again upon the negro those dark and searching eyes beneath whose glance he had already quailed. A pale and delicate child, with slender figure and grave face, colorless save for the curved crimson of the lips, and the dark depths of those great eyes; with a self-contained and resolute expression too wonderful to see upon a face so young and fresh, so childlike in its purity and dreamy innocence. Very self-possessed was this little maid, and she quietly finished her survey of the coarse face and uncouth figure of the negro before she replied:

"No, I thank you, Joe, I don't want any supper nor de chamber-maid, but I want to see Captain Sewall. I like you very well, but I want to see him."

As if in answer to her wish, a rapid step sounded down the corridor, and the next moment the door of the bedroom was thrown open.

"Beck, Scip! Oh!"

And Lieutenant Vane, who had for a moment forgotten the alias of his sable ally, turned and looked anxiously through the hall. All was safe there, but as he entered the room and closed the door he encountered a gaze that showed him the error had been noticed and commented upon by at least one listener.

"Miss Dabrowa, I presume," said the Lieutenant, taking off his cap and advancing smilingly with outstretched hand. But the slender hands folded so tightly upon Miss Dabrowa's lap never stirred, and it was with a yet more earnest look into his face than had searched the negro's that she asked:

"Did my father send you for me, Sir?"

been before, but paused; and by her inquiring look demanded his meaning.

"Sit down, my dear, and don't imagine for a moment that I have any wish to harm or deceive you," said the young man, placing a chair and motioning her toward it with even a beseeching look.

The child seated herself, but with a queenly air that said she did but defer her decision, and the young officer, standing before her, proceeded with his defence, telling as tenderly as he might of her father's death upon the battle-field, of Scip's care and kindness toward him, of the father's dying wishes and bequest, and finally of the negro's consultation with himself, his own connection with the matter, and the consequent deception or rather strategy he had found necessary to practice.

The young girl listened attentively, shedding not a tear at news of her father's death, although the look of bleak desolation upon her face showed how deep the blow had struck to her orphaned heart.

At the close she came and put her hand in that of the speaker.

"You will be the same as my father now, won't you?" asked she, simply.

A half smile struggled with the quiver on the young man's lips. He was twenty-five years old, and Miss Fanny about thirteen.

"I will take the same care of you as if you were my own little sister Alice," said he. "And I will take you to her, and to my mother among the pleasant hills of Vermont, if you will go," added he, kindly.

"And Scip too—I love you for what you did for him," said the child, going to place her slender white hands in the great black ones of the negro, and laying her head for a moment upon his brawny shoulder. Of course Scip began to cry—your genuine African, impraisable as a child, requires but one tone of pathos to bring his tears, one strain of joy to swells his mirth.

"And now, Sir, what shall we do first?"

"Why, I think you had better stay here and try to get a night's rest," replied the Lieutenant, a little startled by the prompt tone of the appeal.

"Scip and I have something to do to-night, and shall not have time to go to bed at all."

"Well, good-night. Good-night, Scip!"

The night was dark and tempestuous, the wind sighing and moaning through the trees of the abandoned cemetery like wails of the naked souls lamenting above their lost bodies.

"Clare to goodness, Mas'r, dis yer's a ugly sort o' job. Reck'n we best' clar out 'fore any ting gits us," whispered Scip, clinging to his master's coat.

"Nonsense, Scip, where's old Lovett's grave?"

"Way ober dere, Mas'r. What dat great white ting an' movin' 'bout. De Lord sals us—what be?"

"It's a poplar-tree, you fool, blowing in de wind. Don't be such a coward, or at least hold your tongue," exclaimed the Lieutenant angrily, as he made his way across the mounded turf and the glimmering head-stones to the far corner of the place.

"De devil—what dat! De Lord forgib me sayin' dat so word!" and Scip's clinging fingers clutched his master's arm like iron clamps.

"What's what, you blockhead?"

"I see somfin—dat know what be?" gasped the negro, his teeth chattering audibly.

"Now, Scip, this won't do. I thought you were more of a man. Recollect we don't have cowards in the Union army, and if you can't walk through a church-yard after dark without all this fuss, how are you going to face a rebel battery?"

The argument was final. Scip would have silently allowed himself to be flayed alive sooner than be pronounced unworthy of his masters, and although his progress was still marked by an obligate accompaniment of chattering teeth, he let go his officer's arm, held his tongue, and steadily led the way toward his ominous El Dorado.

"Dis em, Mas'r. Dis ole Lovett's grave," said he at last, in a subdued voice, as he laid his hand upon a broad granite monument standing by itself in one corner of the grounds.

"Well, you've got de spade. Begia to dig while I light de dark lantern. The sooner we're through de better."

"Dat so, Mas'r," muttered the negro, plunging his spade deep into the turf which had been carefully replaced after the burial of the treasure. The Lieutenant lighting his lantern and shielding it with his coat, took his place upon the other side of the grave, directing the stream of light upon the spot where Scip dug. For some moments the click of the shovel and rattle of the stony earth were the only sounds audible, except the sighing of the wind and the drowsy hum of the sleeping city. The shovel struck with a metallic and hollow sound upon some resisting substance. Scip suddenly raised his head, crying, exultantly:

"Dat's it shore 'nough, Mas'r!" and in the same instant dropped his shovel, uttered a dismal yell, and turning to see caught his foot in the long grass, fell sprawling, and lay upon his face kicking and shrieking, much like a child who has undergone maternal discipline, and between pain, rage, and fright, declines to recover his exposure.

Lieutenant Vane, startled by the yell, hastily raised his own eyes in the direction Scip had looked, saw what he had seen, and not unaptly exclaimed:

"The Devil!"

Perhaps it was. At any rate it might have been, if the devil may be supposed to present himself behind a dark repulsive face, covered with a shock of black beard and hair, and to look greedily down from the top of a monument with glittering eyes, and a ghastly grinning mouth, into the bowels of a wicked man's grave.

Lieutenant Vane did not run, like the peer African, away from the danger, but straight toward it, darting round the monument in fact, just in time to grasp the descending leg of the supposititious demon, finding them crossed, not in flame-colored tights, but gray shoddy trousers of Confederates cut and make. With a hearty kick and heartier curse the apparition would have freed itself, but the stony arms of the young Green Mountain athlete were around him, and his panting voice growling:

"Come now! None of that! I've got you! Here, Scip—quick, youascal!—bring de lantern!"

Encouraged by the mundane air the struggle had assumed, Scip, ceasing his lamentations, rose gingerly to his feet, and craning his neck so as to look behind the granite shaft, beheld his master struggling fiercely with a tall, dark figure, formidable certainly, but yet of the form and proportions of a man.

A sudden grin illuminated Scip's features, and seizing the shovel he had dropped, he crept quietly up, and, with no note of warning, brought down the oaken handle upon the stranger's head.

"Twen't do no harm whatever be he," muttered he; and found himself justified in his conclusion as the dark form fell silent and motionless at his feet.

The Lieutenant, suddenly released from those long, serpent-like arms, staggered back a step, then darted toward the lantern, and turned it upon the face of his fallen foe.

"Ole Jarvis, shere 'nough!" exclaimed Scip, bending over the body with the same air of disgust he might have bestowed upon the crushed carcass of a reptile.

Five minutes more, and the spy, bound hand and foot, with a gag in his mouth, was secretly loosed to the monument, and left to collect his scattered but returning senses at his leisure.

"Now, Scip, you stay here and keep guard and fetch gettin' out de box, while I return for de little girl. Then we will be off before daylight," suggested the Lieutenant, wiping his forehead.

"No, Mas'r. You stop an' let me go. Mahbe dey's got 'spiculous ob us, an' might want fer ter keep you. If dey stop no tain't so much matter, you see."

"I don't see any such thing, Scip. If dere's danger it's fer me to face it sooner than you."

"But, Mas'r, if you leave me 'long o' dis yer white libberd skunk I specs I'll kill him 'fore yer git back. 'Pears like I could' help it nobber."

"Come, come, Scip; dat won't do. To kill a prisoner in cold blood would disgrace us forever. Say you are afraid to stay alone among de graves, and I'll let you go."

"Well, Mas'r, I be, den. I lan' 'fraid ob all de wjers nor all de slabe-drivers in 'Tenn, but I is mees' powerful 'fraid ob de dead men."

"That's honest, Scip, any way. Well, go your way, and manage de best you can; you won't mind a lie or two, I dare say, if it's necessary."

"Dat part ob de strategy ob us, Mas'r," replied Scip, gravely; and the Lieutenant assented with a nod.

"If I doesn' get here by daylight, Mas'r, you jes take de box and put fer camp. I's jine you dere somehow, I reckon."

"If you are not here by daylight I shall come and look for you, Scip," replied Tom Vane, steadily; "and now, my lad, de quicker de better."

The distant clocks struck four, and a soft gray crept through the black mist that had shrouded in the lonely watcher as with a wall. Through it came Scip's, a huge bundle upon his shoulder, a little patient figure by his side.

The Lieutenant reached round the monument and dragged the prisoner's cap low upon his face, and the fast-increasing light might not aid him in tracing their progress—saw that the bonds were strong and unbroken, and then, with the treasure-box in his hand, went to meet his companions.

"Clare to goodness, Mas'r, it's lucky it war me went an' not you. I's lied till I war black in de face, an' you know it ole 'show on me," announced Scip, with an exultant chuckle.

"All right; but let us be moving. You shall tell me as we go. Miss Fanny, can you walk fast?"

"Yes, Sir. Never mind me any more than if I were a soldier too, and you needn't call me 'Mas'." replied the child, whose glowing eyes, steadily bent forward, seemed eager to outstrip her slumbering foe.

Taking her hand in his, the young soldier led her quickly on; and, as dawn brightened into daylight, passed with the stolen countenance safely through the rebel outposts, and a mile further on passed at a deserted plantation to mount the horses carefully selected there upon the preceding afternoon.

"You must ride behind me, Fanny. See—I have strapped your bundle of clothes on fur a pillow, and you will hold tight around my waist. Can you?" asked Lieutenant Tom, merrily.

A bright color flushed across the clear, pale cheek of the little maid, but she answered calmly:

"I think so. I was never on a horse."

"Oh well. Only cling tight to me and you will do," returned the young man, hastily flinging himself into the saddle. "Now, Scip, put her up."

The negro obeyed, and, with the precious chest safe strapped to his own saddle, mounted in turn. The spirited horses, all fed with rebel corn, and wild with the delicious air of early morning, tossed their heads with an exultant neigh, and darted forward. Vane felt the slender arms tighten about his waist, and found time to smile over his shoulder into the pale, determined little face close behind, and to say half kindly, half fondly:

"Never fear, little Fanny, only cling tight to me."

"Golly, Mas'r! dat feller's get loose 'sready! Look a' dah!" shouted Scip, as, pausing on the crest of a long-winding hill, they looked back upon the rebel camp, through whose outpost they had safely passed a couple of hours before. Hastening on from that very outpost, like ants hurrying from an invaded ant-hill, could now be distinguished a number of black spears moving rapidly along the white stripe of road leading toward the position of the fugitives.

"Dey's got de news, an' dey's chasin' us, Mas'r!" exclaimed Scip, his great eyes glaring with anger and excitement.

"They are right. It is a fine morning for a ride, and I trust they will enjoy it. Let us be getting on, Scip," replied the Lieutenant, quietly; and not a word more was exchanged until fifteen good miles lay between the fugitives and the useless pursuit.

That night Lieutenant Vane reported himself to his Colonel, and a few days afterward obtained a short furlough, just long enough to enable him to rush hurriedly home to the old parsonage among the Vermont hills, and to leave there the little, quiet, thoughtful companion of his travels, who shed no tear when he bade her good-by, but stood gazing from the window with such a heart-broken look to her dark eyes and pale lips, that good motherly Mrs. Vane threw her arms about her and wept, as she had not wept in bidding her only boy God-speed!

Leave her there, growing daily in grace and stature—growing too more deeply, day by day, into the hearts of those wise and kindly guardians who care for her, body and mind and soul, while her strange features, fostered in the hands of a wise and honest financier, grows also, and will some day make a splendid dowry for the child of the dead rebel.

Lieutenant Vane—Captain Vane before the war was over—did not come home when peace was declared, but, becoming master of a great plantation, applied the same energy and courage to its restoration and improvement that he had once done to the devastation and impoverishing of a hundred such in rebel hands.

And Scip? Ah! what is to be the fate of Scip, and thousands, millions like him?

Scip waits; and also waits the fortune he has destined to the smothering and opening of his race.

BROADCAST THY SEED.

Broadcast thy seed!
Although some portion may be found
To fall on unreciprocal ground,
Whom sand, or sward, or stone may stay
Its coming into light of day;
Or when it comes, some patient sward
May make it droop and wither there—
Be not discouraged; some will find Congenial soil, and gentle wind,
Refreshing dew, and ripening shower,
To bring it into business flower,
From flower to fruit, to glad thine eyes,
And fill thy soul with sweet surprise.
Do good, and God will bless thy deed—
Broadcast thy seed!

IDOL WORSHIP.

The essential features of human sap reason are very much the same all the world over; only the accidental traits differ. The faith by which the Roman Catholic reposes upon the image of his patron saint or of the Virgin for his protection is, at its root, the same which led the ancients to believe in the power of an image of a patron goddess to protect themselves and their cities; the only difference being that the one is nominally Christian and the other nominally heathen. With only this difference also, the principle which underlies the two remarkable instances of idol worship, which we illustrate on the succeeding page, is one and the same. Under similar religious conditions, human nature exhibits itself in the same way in Cochin China and in Spain.

One of our illustrations represents the procession of the Dragon, which takes place annually in all parts of China. These processions—in which a monstrous image of the Dragon is paraded through the streets—are very remarkable on account of the costumes adopted, and the decorations of every description by which the Chinese strive to give added to their grand religious ceremony. They spare no expense. They deck themselves out in silk and gold; and a single procession costs about ten thousand dollars of our money. To describe the musical exhibition afforded in this display would be quite impossible—the instruments all being of that sort which secure the greatest possible amount of noise. Their cymbals are half a yard in diameter, and are played with astounding vigor. At the head of the procession flaming standards are borne, followed by the mandarins of the first class bearing sacred ornaments, and these by the musicians and palanquins laden with fruits of every sort. Then follows the great dragon armed with every kind of weapon, ancient or modern, of Chinese warfare. Then, after a long troop of gods and goddesses, represented by youths and maidens, follows the image of the great Dragon, which measures from 30 to 40 yards in length. Those who bear the image manage to make the tail represent the undulations and writhings of a real dragon—which Mr. DOUGLASS, in his interesting work on "The Social Life of the Chinese," calls "manoeuvring the Dragon."

The second illustration represents a proceeding no less curious than that which we have just described. Just before the late important event which gave another possible heir to the Spanish throne, a Royal carriage, richly appointed, and attended by priests, soldiers, and outsiders, was seen passing through the street of Atocha. Within this carriage rode an official whose duties are somewhat remarkable—no less a personage, in fact, than the mistress of the robes to the Virgin of Amurza. To this image of the Virgin the Queen applies on every succeeding occasion like that which has just taken place; and for some months previous to the interesting event the highest of the Court officers and dress-makers are considered as to the fashions and richness of the vestive offering which shall be presented to the holy image. It was to the consecration of this magnificent robe, as bejeweled and belaced, that the Royal carriage and its cortege was devoted; and it was believed that the object of the Queen's veneration would, when opportunely served, be efficacious in securing for her Majesty that safety and comfort which in her situation were so desirable. Our illustration represents the solemn ceremony which took place just before the consecration, when the Cardinal Archbishop of Toledo accompanied the image into the presence of Royalty, and the Virgin of Olveids was transported for a month's visit to the palace in all the splendor of the robes and jewels with which it had been decorated. Some days before the time announced for the reception of the little Royal stranger, the Archbishop of Toledo, Cardinal Father TIMILO, set out by special train to fetch the Virgin from the convent of San Pascual, at Aranjuez, and was accompanied by a priest, whose sacred duty it was to carry the image, as though he were bearing a doll. Our illustration is taken from a sketch representing the entrance of the Archbishop to the railway station, where, as usual, a number of the faithful had assembled to witness the deportation of the image whose presence in Madrid was expected to be so serviceable to the Queen in her hour of trouble.

IDOL WORSHIP IN SPAIN—THE CARDINAL ARCHBISHOP OF TOLEDO CONVEYING THE IMAGE OF THE VIRGIN OF OLVIDO TO THE ROYAL PALACE, MADRID.

IDOL WORSHIP IN COCHIN CHINA—ANNUAL PROCESSION OF THE DRAGON AT SAIGON.

GOVERNOR HAWLEY, OF CONNECTICUT.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOSEPH R. HAWLEY, Governor elect of Connecticut, was born in Richmond County, North Carolina, October 31, 1826. His parents removed to Connecticut when he was eleven years of age. After his graduation at Hamilton College, New York, in 1847, he studied law, entering upon the practice of his profession in Hartford, 1850. In politics he acted with the Free Soil Party. After a practice of six years, becoming very deeply interested in the struggle against the extension of slavery, he became editor of the Hartford Evening Press (an organ of the new Republican Party) in 1857, and took a very active part as a speaker in the political campaigns, which were always bitterly contested in Connecticut.

On the breaking out of the rebellion and the publication of Mr. LINCOLN'S call for 75,000 men he drew up an enlistment paper, and headed the list as the first volunteer from Connecticut. Associated with him was A. W. DRAKE, a young Democratic lawyer, who afterward died as Colonel of the Tenth Connecticut. Ignorant of drill, the volunteers selected GEORGE S. BURSHAM, afterward Colonel of the Twenty-second Connecticut, as their Captain, HAWLEY being First Lieutenant and DRAKE Second. BURSHAM was immediately promoted, and HAWLEY became Captain, in which capacity he served honorably three months, and was especially commended by his brigade commander, General KEYS, for good conduct at Bull Run. Upon his discharge he accepted a commission as Lieutenant-Colonel of the Seventh Connecticut, of which Major-General TERRY (the hero of Fort Fisher) was Colonel, and assisted in raising and equipping the regiment. The Seventh went on the original Sherman Port Royal expedition, and was the first ashore at Hilton Head. With his regiment Lieutenant-Colonel HAWLEY was in the siege of Fort Palmetto, and immediately after, upon TERRY'S promotion, HAWLEY became Colonel of the Seventh.

When General SEMMERS prepared for his Florida campaign he selected as his brigade commanders Colonel

MAJOR-GENERAL J. R. HAWLEY, GOVERNOR ELECT OF CONNECTICUT.

HAWLEY, Colonel JACK MONROEMERY, of Kansas fame, and Colonel BARROT, of the Forty-Eighth New York. At the battle of Olustee, Colonel HAWLEY'S brigade commenced the fight, and the Seventh Connecticut, under his guidance, was the last regiment out. He was in the battle for three and a half hours, never once dismounting from his horse, although greatly increasing his danger by being thus conspicuous, while his men were lying down fighting with their breech-loading rifles. Of about 4700 actually engaged in that battle over 1800 were killed or wounded, Colonel HAWLEY'S brigade losing its full share, or over 38 per cent. For his gallantry on the occasion General SEMMERS urgently requested his promotion.

In April, 1864, Colonel HAWLEY came to Virginia with his regiment, and was assigned to the command of a brigade in TERRY'S division of the Tenth Corps, in the Army of the James. In the battle of Drewry's Bluff he lost between 400 and 500 men, and his conspicuous gallantry in the three days of that fight called forth warm praise from his commanders, General STRASSARD, of Vermont—a brave officer, who subsequently lost an arm at Chaffin's Farm—complimenting him on the field for his marked coolness and courage. The campaign before Richmond and Petersburg was an almost unintermittent series of battles and skirmishes from May to November, unexampled before in the world's history, and of all the hard service Colonel HAWLEY had fully his share. At Deep Run, in August, he lost twenty per cent. of his command, and for his conduct there Major-General BOWSER, his corps commander, requested General TERRY to forward a recommendation for his promotion, which being approved by Generals BOWSER and BERLIAN, in addition to others previously forwarded, secured his commission as Brigadier-General in September, 1864.

When General TERRY went to Fort Fisher he left General HAWLEY in command of his division, as the fittest man for that important position. Later, after General HAWLEY joined his brigade at Wilmington, General SCOTT assigned to him the duty of keeping open his lines of communication, as he moved up to join Gen-

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.
[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

Manufacturers' Announcement. Extraordinary Opportunity.

Great One-Price Sale of Solid Gold Jewelry, Rich Silverware, Watches, Diamonds, Rings, Pianos, &c. Including no Brass or so-called Plated Jewelry. EVERY ARTICLE WARRANTED GOLD. $2,500,000 Worth. To be disposed of at the low average price of TWO DOLLARS EACH, WITHOUT REGARD TO VALUE, AND NOT TO BE PAID FOR UNTIL YOU KNOW WHAT YOU WILL RECEIVE.

Splendid List of Articles, All to be sold for Two Dollars Each. Includes items like Superior Grand Piano-Forces, Silverware, Gold Jewelry, and various household goods.

Each envelope contains a valuable collection of useful receipts and popular songs, worth many dollars. Persons ordering envelopes will receive them promptly by mail, postage paid, together with the following premiums, upon sending the cash:

- 1 for 50 cts., with a beautiful Photograph, worth $ 1.00
1 for $1., with a Silver Nail-Pick, worth 1.00
1 for $2., with a Silver Napkin-Ring, worth 2.00
1 for $3., with a Silver Fruit-Ruffin, worth 3.00
1 for $5., with a Gold Fork, worth 5.00
1 for $10., with a Gold Double-Locket, worth 10.00
1 for $20., with a Silver Hunting Watch, worth 20.00

From the Press. THE GREAT GOLD GIFT DISTRIBUTION. We desire to caution our readers against confounding the establishment of the Cosmopolitan Manufacturing Jewelers' Association with the "enterprise" as often advertised in the daily press, and which the purchaser finds upon investigation to be mere catch-penny affairs, gotten up for the purpose of disposing of the rag ends of worthless stocks from the second-hand establishments of the East.

We want again in every town and county, and in every household, and to those selling as such will be allowed ten cents on every envelope ordered by them, provided their receipts amount to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every envelope, and remit 10 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps.

Restore Your Sight. USE

DR. J. STEPHENS & CO.'S PATENT CORNEA RESTORERS, or RESTORERS of the EYESIGHT. They will Restore Impaired Sight, and Preserve it to the Latest Period of Life. SPECTACLES RENDERED USELESS.

The most eminent Physicians, Oculists, Divines, and the most prominent men of our country, recommend the use of the CORNEA RESTORERS, for Presbyopia, or Far or Long Sightness, or every person who wears spectacles from old age; Diseases of Vision, or Strabismus; Overworked Eyes; Asthenopia, or Weak Eyes; Inflammation, or Watery Eyes; Pain in the Eyeball; Amacrobia, or Obscurity of Vision; Phosphoria, or Insensibility of Light; Weakness of the Retina and Optic Nerve; Myopia, or Spoons or Moving Bodies before the Eyes; Ophthalmia, or Inflammation of the Eye and Eyelids; Cataract Eyes; Hemoptoe, or Partial Blindness; Sinking of the Eyeball; Strabismus, or Squinting, &c.

They can be used by any one with a certainty of success, and without the least fear of injury to the Eye. More than 5000 certificates of cures are exhibited at our office. Care given to every case which is applied according to the directions indicated in each box, or the money will be refunded. Write for a Circular—and gratis. Address: DR. J. STEPHENS & CO., Oculists, at HUNTON'S Family Drug Store, No. 16 Astor House, Broadway, New York, P. O. Box 9991.

$1. BOOKS. $1. VIOLINS and BOWS

Dollar Gift Book Sale. 100,000 VOLUMES.

Standard Works, Family Bibles, Photograph Albums, &c., WORTH $250,000. All to be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, and a Splendid Gift.

Worth from 10 cents to $50, to be given with each Book. No Book to be paid for until you know what gift you are to get. The Gifts consist of Gold and Silver Watches, Silverware, Sets of Jewelry, Silver-Buttons, Ribbon Buckles, Chains, &c., &c.

Plan of Sale. Certificates are prepared, describing each book and naming the gift that will accompany it, with its value. These certificates are placed in sealed envelopes, and well mixed, and sent, regardless of value, one to each purchaser of a beautiful Card Photograph of any prominent personage, in itself worth all the charge—20 cents each; or five for $1; seven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; one hundred, with premium silver hunting watch, for $15.

$1 TIME-KEEPER. $1

A SCIENTIFIC WONDER and marvel of ingenuity. The European Pocket Timekeeper. "The most wonderful invention of modern times." "Chronometer" warranted correct. Needs no key or winding up. Price $1 each, in Gold or Silver Gilt Cases. Sent, postpaid, on receipt of price. Address J. W. DELAMETER & CO., 908 Broadway, New York. Has. 15, 14.

Brandreth's Pills

A GENERAL ASSISTANT OF NATURE.

What is health? What is disease? Health is when the supply and expenditure are equal. Disease, when the supply and expenditure are unequal. BRANDRETH'S PILLS impart certain expulsive powers to all matters in the body whose life is below the standard of the surrounding parts, or which have remained longer than the time nature designed. So in fevers, and all that class of cases which seem to you to need purification, BRANDRETH'S PILLS have marvelous curative qualities. Our bodies are continually changing, and it is by this change we live. Should nature remain in organs beyond the time nature designed, pain and inflammation set in, which is nothing more than a preparatory effort for our good. All Brandreth's Pills are supposed, from the results, to do it simply to ASSIST THESE EFFORTS OF NATURE. Principal office, 294 Canal Street, New York. Sold by all respectable Dealers in Medicines.

HOME EMPLOYMENT. A good man wanted in every town and county in the United States, to engage in an honorable business. First-rate pay allowed. The only qualifications required are tact and industry. Address, with stamp, for particulars, Dr. O. Phelps Brown, No. 27 Grand St., Jersey City, N. J.

SELF-CONTROL, to acquire; to conquer habits; to sustain health and strength and mental vigor—a better life. Young men interested can address, with postage, L. G. W., to care No. 6643, General Post, New York.

Pile Remedy. DR. STICKLAND'S PILE REMEDY has cured thousands of the worst cases of Piles and Hemorrhoidal Piles. It gives immediate relief and effects a permanent cure. Try it directly. It is warranted to cure. For sale by all Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

Coughs. DR. STICKLAND'S MELLINCOCK COUGH BALM is warranted to cure Coughs, Croup, Hoarseness, Asthma, Whooping-Cough, Sore Throat, Consumption, and all affections of the Throat and Lungs. For sale by Druggists. Fifty Cents per Bottle.

FAMILIES and GENTLEMEN on a visit to the OLD COUNTRY should not leave without seeing the BIRTH-PLACE of the IMMORTAL SHAKESPEARE, STRATFORD-UPON-AVON.

The Hotel bearing his name having undergone recent improvements, will be found replete with every comfort, combined with moderate charges. Post Boxes and Carriages on hire. BENJAMIN SCRIVEN, PROPRIETOR.

PRINTING PRESS FOR SALE.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, Five-Colors, Table Distribution, No. 20,252. Price $700. The Press on which Harper's Weekly has been printed. Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 231 West Street, New York.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.

92 BROADWAY ST., N. York. Photographic Materials, Stereoscopic Goods, WAR VIEWS, SCENERY, GROUPS, &c. Photograph Albums, great assortment, Carte de Visite of Noted Persons, &c., &c. French, English, and American Novels.

Metal Top Lamp Chimney. That will not break by heat, gives a LARGE FLAME, BURNS UP ALL Kinds of OILS, and is, in fact, the MOST PERFECT ARTICLE KNOWN. New Lamp Chimney Co., 19 Warren Street, New York.

Fresh Garden and Flower Seeds. Prepared by Mail, of the choicest sorts. Also Fruit and Ornamental Trees, 100,000 Fruit Seeds, Garden Seeds, Strawberries, &c., of the best kinds. Free by Mail, Catalogues, gratis, to any address. Write only to us for the Trade. Agents wanted. H. B. WATSON, Fruit and Seed Merchants and Seed Enthusiasts, 147 Nassau Street, N. York.

PEARSON & CO'S CIRCASSIAN HAIR REJUVENATOR. IT WILL POSITIVELY RESTORE GRAY HAIR TO ITS ORIGINAL COLOR. For Sale by all Dealers. DEPOT, 393 JAY STREET, BROOKLYN.

Pulse Irregular, Pain in the Right Side. Some of weariness and exhaustion, no appetite, out of spirits, limbs tremble, troubled sleep. What has all this meant? It means rheumatism. Arrest the mischief by an immediate resort to BISHOP'S PILLS. In three days they will make you, as the saying is, "a new man."

LIBRARY DE LOVE, 3 Volumes. For 25 cents. W. C. WELBY, 225 Broadway, N. Y.

GREAT DISCOVERY.—DR. GRATER'S ELECTRIC OIL is warranted to cure rheumatism, stiffness, frozen limbs, piles, and all colds and pains, in from 1 to 2 days. Sold by all druggists, and by DEWEES BAINES & CO., New York. Depot, Philadelphia.

MOTH and FRECKLES. Ladies afflicted with Eruptions on the Face, called moth patches, or freckles, should use FRENCH'S celebrated MOYH and FRECKLE LOTION. It is efficacious. Prepared by Dr. B. C. FRENCH, Dermatologist, 43 Bond Street, New York. Sold by all druggists.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES. For the Army and Navy Hospitals, for the Engineers, and all who wish to print quickly, in any quantity. Circular sent free. Also Card Paper, City, &c., 10 1/2 St. ADAMS PRESS COMPANY, 20 AND 22, New York.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP, COMPOSED OF IODIDE POTASSIUM,

WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT OF VALERIAN MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS. PREPARED BY WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D., Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospital, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE. What may seem almost incredible is that many chronic ailments considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks, and we cheerfully invite our investigations of the liberal, candid and scientific to those which have so profited at the present day. During the past few years we have succeeded with obstacles, and overcome opposition, as heretofore so well and satisfactorily by our medicine.

RAPIDITY OF CURE. Some say, "Your medicine is too quick,"—a late other think their possession, and think that disease can only be cured by the slow, retrospective process of Nature. This is our reply: To build the body, like a well-built vessel, is to be a state of healthiness. But when, from any cause, down one side of the scale, we have the result of disease. What is required is to restore the equilibrium of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all Chronic Diseases (Indigestion, Dropsy, Catarrh, &c.)

It is an extremely valuable medicine for all diseases of the Blood, and is the only one in the market that will not injure the system. It is especially the Great Life-giving Power.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP. It is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all Chronic Diseases (Indigestion, Dropsy, Catarrh, &c.)

It is an extremely valuable medicine for all diseases of the Blood, and is the only one in the market that will not injure the system. It is especially the Great Life-giving Power.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP. It is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all Chronic Diseases (Indigestion, Dropsy, Catarrh, &c.)

It is an extremely valuable medicine for all diseases of the Blood, and is the only one in the market that will not injure the system. It is especially the Great Life-giving Power.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP. It is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all Chronic Diseases (Indigestion, Dropsy, Catarrh, &c.)

It is an extremely valuable medicine for all diseases of the Blood, and is the only one in the market that will not injure the system. It is especially the Great Life-giving Power.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP. It is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all Chronic Diseases (Indigestion, Dropsy, Catarrh, &c.)

It is an extremely valuable medicine for all diseases of the Blood, and is the only one in the market that will not injure the system. It is especially the Great Life-giving Power.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP. It is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all Chronic Diseases (Indigestion, Dropsy, Catarrh, &c.)

It is an extremely valuable medicine for all diseases of the Blood, and is the only one in the market that will not injure the system. It is especially the Great Life-giving Power.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP. It is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all Chronic Diseases (Indigestion, Dropsy, Catarrh, &c.)

It is an extremely valuable medicine for all diseases of the Blood, and is the only one in the market that will not injure the system. It is especially the Great Life-giving Power.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP. It is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all Chronic Diseases (Indigestion, Dropsy, Catarrh, &c.)

It is an extremely valuable medicine for all diseases of the Blood, and is the only one in the market that will not injure the system. It is especially the Great Life-giving Power.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP. It is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all Chronic Diseases (Indigestion, Dropsy, Catarrh, &c.)

It is an extremely valuable medicine for all diseases of the Blood, and is the only one in the market that will not injure the system. It is especially the Great Life-giving Power.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP. It is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all Chronic Diseases (Indigestion, Dropsy, Catarrh, &c.)

It is an extremely valuable medicine for all diseases of the Blood, and is the only one in the market that will not injure the system. It is especially the Great Life-giving Power.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP. It is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all Chronic Diseases (Indigestion, Dropsy, Catarrh, &c.)

It is an extremely valuable medicine for all diseases of the Blood, and is the only one in the market that will not injure the system. It is especially the Great Life-giving Power.

OUT OF PLACE

Mrs. FLORENCE. "You'll go to Church with us this Morning, Mr. Pippins?"
Mr. PIPPINS. "Haw, weally, Th-a-n-k-a, No! I--I weally shouldn't know a Soul there!"

Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York,
(Two Doors from Wall.)

Collection made, with quick returns.
Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks,
Bonds, and Gold will receive our personal attention.
ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

POLLAK & SON Manufacturers Musical Instruments, 622 Broadway, near 6th St., N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced prices. Pipes and Hiddles sent out to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Catalogue. Pipes $2 to $30 each.

UNION DIME SAVINGS BANK, CANAL STREET, CORNER OF VALUICK, DEPOSITS from 10 cents to $5000 interest at 5% PER ANNUM INTEREST, FREE OF TAX.
Dr. date before April 21st draw interest from April 1st.
ASSETS, $1,800,296 38.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.
A new and original work, with 120 Designs and Plans of Country Houses of moderate cost.
Price $1 50, postpaid.
GEO. E. & F. W. WOOD-
WARD, Publishers, No.
22 Park Row, New York.

Steinway & Sons'
GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT
PIANO-FORTES

Have taken 25 First Premiums, gold and silver medals, at the Principal Fairs held in this country within the last ten years, and in addition thereof they were awarded a First Prize Medal at the Great International Exhibition in London, 1862, in competition with 200 Pianos from all parts of the World.

That the great superiority of these Instruments is now universally conceded is abundantly proved by the fact that Messrs. Steinway's "Acas, improvements, and results of construction" have been copied by the great majority of the manufacturers of both hemispheres (as clearly as could be done without imitations or PAYING RESPECTS, and that their Instruments are used by the most eminent pianists of Europe and America, who prefer them for their own public and private use whenever accessible.

STEINWAY & SONS direct special attention to their Patent Agraffe Arrangement, which having been practically tested in all their Grand and highest-priced Square Pianos, and admitted to be one of the greatest improvements of modern times, will hereafter be introduced in every piano manufactured by them, WITHOUT INCREASE OF COST to the purchaser, in order that all their patrons may reap its benefit.

STEINWAY & SONS' PIANOS are the only American Instruments exported to Europe in large numbers, and used in European concert-rooms.

WAREHOUSES, Nos 71 and 73 East Fourteenth Street, between Union Square and Irving Place, New York.

Satisfaction, or money refunded. $5000 from 15. No Lottery or Gift Enterprise. Any one can do it. Send $5 to A. S. GOULD, Great Falls, N. H.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARRISON'S EXPRESS, 40 Broadway.

NATIONAL BANK PENS,
MANUFACTURED BY THE EMPIRE PEN CO.,
25 and 24 John St., New York.
For Sale by all Stationers.
Every variety of superior Steel Pens manufactured to order, and for sale by the Empire Pen Company.

TO LET.
The Four-Story Building, No. 51 Broad Street, 28 feet front. Possession 1st of May next. Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square.

Large Profits
Can be made by active men in the Street Name Plate Business. Complete outfit of tools and stock furnished by M. J. METCALF & SON, 101 Union Street, Boston.
Mass. Send for Price-List.

MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY,
To be found on each box and each piece of GENUINE
MAGIC RUFFLE. All other goods of whatever name, not having this mark, are worthless imitations and infringe upon the patents of the Magic Ruffle Company.
The GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLES are full six yards in each piece, are well made of the best material, and give perfect satisfaction to consumers. Office of the Company
No. 15 Chambers Street, New York.

LOCKWOOD'S
Cloth Lined Paper Collars were the original from which sprung the entire Paper Collar business, and were the only Paper Collars made from 1854 to 1862.

No Collars genuine without this Trade Mark on the Collars or Box.

Lockwood Mfg. Co., 255 South 3d St., Phila. or 93 Reade St. N. Y.

MAGIC LANTERN
AND STEREOSCOPE.

We are now receiving the most comprehensive and finest importation of glass views ever made in America, representing scenes and objects in nearly all European cities and countries. These views are of the special selection of our Mr. Edward Anthony, now abroad, and are adapted for the uses of either the Stereopticon or the Stereoscope.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
215 Broadway,
3 doors south of the St. Nicholas Hotel.

50 PER-CENT SAVED
By Using

B. T. BASHITT'S best Medical SALICATOR, made from Cassia Bark. Broad made with this Salicetas contains, when taken, nothing but common salt, water, and flour. Nos 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

PESTACHINE
It is the best Liniment for the Hair, also an excellent Dressing. Invented by Dr. BOUT; manufactured by GEO. SKINNER & CO., Springfield, Mass.; and sold by DEMAN BAINES & CO., New York.

CEDAR CAMPHOR
For Mouth, Throat, Ulcers, Inflammation! Sold by druggists every where.
HARRIS & CHAPMAN, Farmers, Boston.

ITCH. (WHEATON'S) ITCH
Salt Rheum. OINTMENT Salt Rheum.
Will cure the Itch in 48 hours; also cures Salt Rheum,
Ulcers, Chilblains, and all Eruptions of the Skin. Price
50 cents. By sending 50 cents to WEEKS & TOTTEN,
Boston, Mass., it will be forwarded free by mail.
For sale by all Druggists.

SELLING AGENTS
STRELLMAN, HEN-RICH & CO.,
Wholesale Agents,
21 Hanover Street,
Baltimore.
J. LOWMAN & BRO.,
Wholesale Agents,
Cor. Pearl & Walnut
Sts., Cincinnati.

GILL & MURPHY, Wholesale Agents,
20 Nassau St., N. Y.
GEO. E. HALL, Retail & Wholesale
Agents, 145 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati.
MAGREY & CARLISLE, Wholesale
Agents, Pittsburgh, Pa.
GARDENING & CO., Wholesale
Agents, Louisville, Ky.

LOCKWOOD, TUTTLE & MILLER,
Retail Agents, 87 1/2 Broadway, N. Y.
CHAS. L. LOCKWOOD & CO., Wholesale & Retail, 224 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington.
CHAS. L. LOCKWOOD & CO.,
Retail Agents, 121 West
Baltimore Street, Baltimore.

THE TRADE SUPPLIED
BY

Lockwood Mfg. Co., 255 South 3d St., Phila. or 93 Reade St. N. Y.

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

REMOVAL.

WM. GALE & SON,
SILVERSMITHS,
487 BROADWAY, cor. Broome Street, New York.
Will remove about the 1st of May, temporarily, to 590 BROADWAY, Metropolitan Hotel,
while the premises

572 and 574 BROADWAY, Metropolitan Hotel,]
(which will be ready in July.)
Are being prepared for permanent occupancy.

Marvin's Patent
ALUM AND DRY PLASTER, FIRE AND BURGLAR
SAFES

Never lose their fire-proof qualities, corrode the iron, or mould their contents.
Sideboard and parlor safes for silverware.
MARVIN & CO.,
255 Broadway, New York.
711 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

SCHILBERG'S GERMAN OINTMENT.
Warranted a certain cure, without the slightest danger, for piles, old wounds, scrofula, salt rheum—all bone and skin diseases, &c. 92 Bowery, New York.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS.
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS AND PERFUMERS.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,

Manufacturers of Revolvers, Rifles,
Muskets, and Carbines,
For the United States Service. Also

POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS,
REPEATING PISTOLS,
Rifle Canes, Revolving Rifles,

Rifle and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Materials. Sold
by Gun Dealers and the Trade generally.

In these days of House-breaking and Robbery, every House, Store, Bank, and Office should have one of Remington's Revolvers.

Circulars containing cuts and description of our Arms
will be furnished upon application.
E. REMINGTON & SONS, Ives, N. Y.

For Sale by Druggists, Fancy Goods
Dealers and Perfumers.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER.

This new celebrated Revolver exceeds all others for compactness, effectiveness, durability, power, and safety in carrying. It is light (14 oz.), small only 1 in., with larger calibre water-proof cartridge ($2.00 ball) than any Revolver made of same size and weight. Send for circular. GEO. A. HICKCOX, 24 Chiff Street, New York.

Dr. Foote's Advertisements.

OLD EYES MADE NEW, without Spectacles, Doctor, or Medicine. Pamphlet mailed free. Address E. B.
FOOTE, M.D., 1139 Broadway, New York.

COMFORT AND CURE FOR THE CAPTURED.
Sent free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D., 1139 Broadway, New York.

GROUP.—How it may be easily Prevented: also Causes and Cure. Sent free. Address E. B. FOOTE, M.D.,
1139 Broadway, New York.

MEDICAL COMMON SENSE.—400 pages—100 Illustrations, $1 50. Sent by mail every where, postpaid.
Contains Tables sent free. Address the Author, E. B.
FOOTE, M.D., 1139 Broadway, New York.

MERWIN & BRAY,
MANUFACTURERS AND WHOLESALE DEALERS IN ARMS AND AMMUNITION OF ALL KINDS.

Sole Agents for the Bel-lard Street Loading Sporting Rifles, of different calibres, and Paule
Arms Co.'s Belt and Pocket Cartridge
Revolvers. The Belt Size carries the Army size Balls, the Pocket Pistol the same size Balls as Colt's 6 in. These arms have no equal now in market. For further particulars, send for Illustrated
Circular. MERWIN & BRAY, 561 Broadway, N. Y.
P.S.—We manufacture all our own goods: also are Sole Agents for the celebrated Colt's Model Whitney Revolvers.

THE REISSUE OF
HARPER'S WEEKLY
 A
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. X.—No. 487.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 28, 1866.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
 $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

OUR "SPECIAL," A. R. W., ON HIS JOURNEYINGS.

STREET SCENE IN CAIRO, ILLINOIS.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT STORES.

Our artist at Cairo thus describes the illustration of the sale of Government stores on the levee at Cairo given on this page:

"Passing along the levee at Cairo, with its dust, filth, and obnoxious drinking-moons, gaping wide open for victims to the trash within, it would appear to a stranger, from the great number of such places, that the people of Cairo had powers not acquired elsewhere to ordinary mortals of resisting the effects of 'tangle-leg,' 'red-eye,' 'twist-knee,' and other brands peculiar to the locality. Outside of each place are gathered a knot of hard-looking fellows. There is a suspicious air of 'lying-in-wait' common to these frequenters of the levee which is not calculated to inspire confidence in a stranger.

"At a Government warehouse an auction is in progress of such stores as appertain to the commissary department. The prominent figures are the actioner and a colored soldier—the former a well-known character, at one time connected with the Herald as an army correspondent. As a getter-up of sells he has few rivals; and many who knew him in the army will recognize him when they hear that he is principally indebted to his powers of ventriloquism for success. Many will remember the anecdote of a Herald correspondent monopolizing the telegraph line at Niagara Falls and telegraphing the first chapters of Genesis to exclude other reporters, who were dying with anxiety to transmit their accounts of the Prince of Wales's progress in Canada. This was that man! As far as your artist knows he is the last instance of this gentleman's proficiency in practical jokes. While the sketch was being drawn the auctioneer, who up to that time had ignored the artist's presence, turned upon the latter with a twinkle of recognition, the response to which was an inadvertent wink. Turning traitor at once, he went on with the sale, accepting the wink as a further bid, and knocking down to the delineator of character an old worn-out copying press at the liberal sum of $1 75."

GOVERNMENT AUCTION ON THE LEVEE AT CAIRO, ILLINOIS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 28, 1866.

THE EXECUTIVE POWER.

IN a free constitutional system of government the executive branch becomes most prominent during a war. The frequent necessity of summary measures, which the common sense of the country concedes, accustoms it to the contemplation of the arbitrary use of extraordinary power. And if, as with us during the late war, the exercise of that power is in the hands of a magistrate entirely beloved and trusted, its essential and normal peril becomes obscured to the public eye.

To our fathers who made the Constitution, however, there was no such obscurity. They had emerged from an exhausting war with a Government in which the executive power had absorbed so much more than its rightful share, even in a monarchical system, that its success in America would have been constitutional ruin in England. When they framed our government, therefore, they defined the power of the Executive as exactly as it could be done. Thus the President was made Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy when in actual service; but Congress alone was to declare war and raise and support armies. He was to veto any law which seemed to him objectionable; but a two-thirds vote of Congress was, upon due consideration, to overpower his veto. He was to make treaties, but only with the consent of two-thirds of the Senators present, and to appoint envoys and judges, but only with the approval of the Senate. In the intention of the fathers, and because of their faith in a popular system, the motive power of the Government was to reside in Congress, which was the immediate representative of the people.

It was in obedience to this system and in full sympathy with the spirit from which it sprang that Mr. LINCOLN, whom circumstances compelled to assert the executive power to its utmost legitimate extent, constantly appealed to Congress to justify his acts. During the war he did not hesitate to state "to whom it might concern" the terms upon which, as Commander-in-Chief, he was ready to cease operations in the field; but he was careful to say that the question of reorganization must be finally determined by Congress. While the war was still raging he said that he was willing to recognize in any rebel State a Government established and maintained by a tenth of the number of voters before the war; but he conceded that the admission to Congress of a State so constituted was a question for Congress alone to decide.

President LINCOLN died just as the work of restoration was beginning. President JOHNSON laid down by proclamation the terms upon which rebel States might proceed to reorganize; but stated explicitly that the work was to be concluded only by the consent of Congress. He did his part as his sense of duty and his view of public necessity demanded. The States, empowered and directed by him, did their part as they saw fit. Congress is now cautiously considering in what way most wisely to do its part, which officially completes the work. And it is just at this point that those who are utterly malignant at the overthrow of the late revolutionary movement which sought the destruction of the Government advise the President to lead a new revolution for the same purpose. Those who, in 1861, called upon "all conservative people" to withstand the "abolition frenzy" of ABRAHAM LINCOLN in undertaking "to coerce Sovereign States," now entreat the same people to call upon the Executive power to seize the Government.

This is a curious illustration of the fact that the devices of slavery, which is a system of brute force and blood and crime, have neither the least conception of a popular government, nor the least faith in any methods but those of the sword. Congress passes a law to protect the equal rights of all citizens of every color in the United States; and GARRETT DAVIS, bred in the politics of slavery, thereupon declares: "that he will try to influence public opinion to procure a repeal of the law—but that he will devote the feeble remnant of his life to overthrowing the Government. SALTHURST of Delaware, another graduate of the same school, more or less soberly announces that his constituents will resist the law to the last. The New York Daily News, which rejoiced at every bloody victory of rebels over loyal citizens, exhorts the President to shed the blood of loyal representatives. The New York World, whose sympathy with the rebellion was masked but not concealed, whose Presidential platform declared the war a failure, and whose fierce vituperation of ABRAHAM LINCOLN and ANDREW JOHNSON in their fidelity to the Union is historical, begs President JOHNSON to disregard his oath; and the Chicago Times, the deadly foe of the Union and of equal rights, urges him to sweep Congress out like chaff.

These men and papers have no more idea of a Constitutional Government than New Zealanders. Like PERCIVAL BROSNA, a politician of their school, if they do not like an argument they are for knocking the advocate upon the head. If they do not like the laws, they are for instant revolution. If the President differs with Congress, he is to turn it out of doors; and if a Congress which they favored should differ with a President whom they did not like, they would urge Congress to hang him without delay. This was precisely the course of the late rebels. They were displeased with the result of an election, and they immediately rose in arms; and it is natural that those who either frankly or sneakily defended them should invite a repetition of rebellion.

But the exquisitely humorous aspect of the matter is, that those who urge revolution as a remedy for legislation which they do not like, solemnly call themselves Conservatives. Large property holders, with people of regular industry and employment, and of small means will, of course, see and appreciate the advantages of such Conservatism. They have been evident in Mexico for the last forty years. They have been revealed in the condition of our own country during the last five years. They would be illustrated in England if, upon the passage of the pending Reform Bill, LORD DERBY and MR. DISRAELI could persuade the Queen to order the army to turn Parliament into the street. Reduced to a plain statement the Conservative policy, as represented by the authorities we have named, is the deliberate destruction of our Government by the absorption of the whole system in the executive branch.

Now if any difference of opinion exists between the executive and legislative authorities the Constitution provides a lawful and peaceful remedy. In case of extremity, as of the veto, the President is to yield, and the will of Congress prevails. The reason of this is plain. The executive power is vested in a single person, whom ambition or fanaticism might tempt to overthrow the liberties of the people. But Congress is the people by their immediate representatives, and it is not supposable that they would conspire against themselves. To say that Congress, without the representation of the late rebel States, is not the people, is simply to say that we have had no lawful government for five years past. The nature of the executive power in our system is indicated by its name. It is the power that executes the will of the people, as expressed under certain conditions, through its representatives. If the elective agent of that power willfully opposes Congress he opposes the majority of the people whose will, lawfully expressed, is the rightful government of the country. The belated devotees of slavery, who call themselves Conservatives, and urge President JOHNSON to subvert the Government, know as little of him and of the American people and of a constitutional system as they did before the war.

THE PROSPECT UNDER THE LOAN BILL.

THE "Loan Bill" has become a law, and by that law the Secretary of the Treasury is expressly prohibited from canceling more than 2½ per cent. of the currency of the country before the next meeting of Congress. It is a substantial victory for the paper-money men, whose leaders are Messrs. JOHN SHREWMAN of Ohio, THADDEUS STEVENS of Pennsylvania, and GEORGE BOUTWELL of Massachusetts—gentlemen whose patriotism can not be doubted, but who have done what they could, it seems to us, to postpone the resumption of specie payments, to perpetuate the degradation of the national currency, and to give a new lease of life to the speculation which is fattening at the cost of the great public of consumers. Whether we are correct or not, the market reports are there to tell.

With few exceptions, prices are as high as they were when gold was 200 and above. Roast beef sells at 25 cents against 15 before the war; real at 27 or 29 as against 14 or 16; mutton at 18 or 20 as against 12 or 14; butter at 60 or 65 as against 22 or 27; coffee at 50 cents as against 25 or 30; cotton goods at 150 @ 200 per cent. advance; wooden goods at 100 @ 150 per cent. advance; boots and other manufactures from hides at 100 % cent. advance; sugar, spices, and groceries generally at 100 or 150 per cent. advance. Very few of these articles are lower than they were when gold was 200. It costs just as much to live now as it did in 1864-5, when the issue of the war was uncertain, and it was a problem whether the national currency was or was not going to follow in the wake of the Confederate shipmasters and Continental money. In some places living seems even higher than it was then. In this city the ship-carpenters, the calkers, and the car-drivers declare that they can not live on the wages which supported them in 1864-5, and have generally struck for an advance.

Now the main cause of the prevailing high prices is the redundancy of the currency, and—to use the jargon of the street—the "ease of money." High taxes, direct and indirect, have their effect, of course. But these exercise less influence upon prices than the condition of the money market. Money is worth less than 5 per cent. per annum in Wall Street. The consequence is that all the National Banks are begging speculators to take their money; and the next consequence is that cliques have been or are being formed in every article of merchandise for the purpose of forestalling the markets with the aid of these National Banks. Cotton, beef, butter, dry goods, leather, hides, groceries are all controlled by cliques, which are buying up or have bought up the entire stocks in market, and are carrying them with the assistance of the National Banks. In this city alone the bank discounts have swelled from an average of $100,000,000 @ $120,000,000 before the war to $250,000,000 now. A similar expansion has taken place in other cities. The advance represents money loaned to speculators to hold produce, merchandise, and stocks. It is this bank accommodation which enables the speculators in beef, butter, dry goods, and leather to extort from the public double the old prices. Were the banks to curtail their discounts these speculators would be forced to disgorge, and prices would fall. So long as the banks can discount freely they will be sure to do so in order to earn large dividends, and the speculators will succeed in keeping up prices.

It was the purpose of the Secretary of the Treasury, by holding a rod over the head of these banks, to compel them to draw in their currency and diminish their discounts. Had he succeeded speculators in the necessities of life would have been compelled to abandon their forestalling scheme, and prices would again have been governed by the old law of supply and demand. He failed; and the consequence is that speculators hold their property as firmly as ever, that prices run as high as they did when GRANT was thundering at the gates of Richmond, and that mechanics are compelled, in this hour of expected contraction, to strike for higher wages.

As for the Secretary of the Treasury, he has a plain duty to perform. He is empowered to exchange long bonds for short date securities in any quantity, and he is not restricted as to the price at which he may sell his bonds. He should act upon this authority without delay. Not an hour should be lost in funding the outstanding debt and deposit certificates, and the interest-bearing legal tender. The absorption of these troublesome liabilities would place the Treasury Department in an independent position, and would inevitably bring the National Banks to such a realizing sense of their danger as would compel at least some of them to initiate the policy of contraction. This measure might properly be followed by an exchange of long bonds for Seven-Thirties. But no time should be lost in inaugurating the policy of contraction. Every hour of delay inflicts loss on the public, and enriches speculators. Every day that is lost swells the ranks of the men who are inclined to hold the dominant party responsible for the great cost of living.

Men of all parties can not too soon or too plainly perceive that hereafter political issues are to be joined on substantial and material questions—and especially on questions of taxation. The people of the United States are paying this year fully $17 per head in taxes—a heavier sum than is borne by any other people. This tax is laid, indeed, to discharge a debt generously incurred for the noblest cause, and no man who understands that every thing valuable to him and his children was secured by it, will grudge its payment. But the redundancy of the currency, the number of National Banks, and their excessive discounts, have swelled the cost of living to twice the average prior to 1860. This is a burden which we all wish to shake off as soon as practicable. The longer it is borne the louder will be the demand for relief. The taxes, indeed, would weigh less heavily if the cost of living were reduced, and speculators were deprived of their present facilities for forestalling the markets. We might perhaps agree to pay 65 cents for butter and $12 for boots if we were relieved from an income tax of 5 @ 10 per cent. But no patriotic party or statesman ought to expect or desire the country to endure for more than the shortest time the great increase in the cost of living caused by the redundancy of the currency, and the necessarily heavy taxes. Even the great Union party which carried the country safely through the late war and restored the flag of the Union "without the loss of a single star," could not hope to retain its present ascendancy except by surely and steadily relieving the public burden.

We think Congress has made a serious mistake; and it remains for the Secretary of the Treasury to do what he can to check the expansion of the National Banks, and to bring down the cost of living. And it behooves him to lose no time in beginning the work.

A GOOD UNION VIEW.

IT was certainly a very questionable compliment that was offered to President JOHNSON in Mobile when, at a late dinner, his health was drunk with that of "President DAVIS." Of course the proposer of the sentiment had been a rebel. But we observe that in Kentucky a Union man, Colonel B. H. BARNOW, who was a LINCOLN and JOHNSON elector, pays no such doubtful honors to the President. He proposes to associate his name with Mr. LINCOLN'S.

At the late Soldiers' Convention Governor BRAMLETTE reported a resolution approving the policy of President JOHNSON, saying that the resolution did not commit the Convention to any man or party, nor was it "an endorsement of any Tylerization," but simply asserted the principles for which the soldiers had fought. He used Mr. JOHNSON'S name, he said, merely to designate a policy. Thereupon Colonel BARNOW said:

"I move to amend by adding at the close, 'understanding it to be the fixed and cherished policy of his lamented predecessor ABRAHAM LINCOLN.' No man in this country had more of my love, respect, and veneration than Mr. LINCOLN. If we must have Mr. JOHNSON'S name in the resolution, let us have Mr. LINCOLN'S too. If, as I understand Mr. JOHNSON, he is carrying out the policy of Mr. LINCOLN, I am for Mr. JOHNSON. With this express understanding I endorse JOHNSON, but I will not endorse him in the language of every rebel meeting in Kentucky, nor in the way of those who, while they endorse him, profess the fundamental and originating principles of the rebellion, the miserable, abominable, and infamous machinations of '93."

It is surely a fair question whether the Mobile toast coupled President JOHNSON'S name with that of JEFFERSON DAVIS because he was supposed to be carrying out the policy of Mr. LINCOLN.

THE AUGEAN STABLE.

THE Board of Health has gone to work in earnest, and has therefore undoubtedly disordered what a task it has undertaken. When we lay in our civic misery and filth, helpless and hopeless, and saw the cholera making ready to fall upon us, the news of the appointment of the Board was like a voice of success. The Commissioners appointed were excellent and satisfactory. They lost no time, and called for nuisances to abate. The nuisances have answered with alacrity. They have appeared in hosts and clouds. They are every where. This was the first step, and it was not difficult. In the city of New York to find a nuisance was about the easiest task to which an inquirer with a nose, a pair of eyes, and a pocket could be called.

But having found the nuisance, how to abate it is a different question; and that is the one which presented itself to the Board directly upon the heels of the first. And it is the consideration of this question which should temper the expectations of the public, and prevent an unreasonable reaction against the Board in consequence of the small apparent results of their efforts—a reaction which is all the more probable from the enthusiastic welcome which hailed the creation of the Board.

Among the chief nuisances and dangers of the city are the markets down town and the tenement-houses. Nothing is easier than for the Board to see this—nothing can be more desirable than a distinct order that these abominations shall be regulated or annihilated. Certainly; let the command be uttered in the most uncompromising voice. And then how is it to be done? Some of the inspectors have reported a certain range of buildings, a horrible slum in which human beings wallow. "Shot it up," says the Board. And the people who are turned out? Are they to encamp in the streets or retreat to other slums? There are hundreds and thousands of people in New York to-day whose habitations endanger the health of the city. They should be unhoused immediately for the general welfare. Where are they to stay meanwhile?

So with the markets. The testimony concerning the Washington Market confirms what every man knows who has seen it. It is in every way a nuisance and a peril. Mr. A. T. STEWART said lately before the Committee at Albany, that, in his judgment, Broadway could be much relieved of its pressure if the markets were moved up town, and the great steamer piers also. There is no doubt of it. But the horrible accumulations of the Washington Market should be removed now, and how long will it take to erect new buildings up town? There is an open lot up town below the neighboring level. The surrounding region has been drained into it until it has become a cesspool offending earth and heaven. The Board order the drainage into it to cease. It is thereupon stopped, but the refuse of the houses which fed it is emptied as slope into the street at each front-door, while the line of the new sewerage which will finally relieve the difficulty lies directly through solid rock, and the work can not be finished tomorrow. In the mean time the neighborhood and the city must suffer, nor can any Board help it.

The Editors of Harper's Weekly is published by LEWIS PICTON, Inc., No. 128, Broadway, New York, with permission from Harper & Row, N. Y. Subscriptions are $14 for one year (12 issues) mailed in advance. Issue of April 28, 1866, Vol. 8, No. 17.

The city must suffer, for the sins of the fathers are visited upon the second and third generations, and in our case those generations make the sins three and four times as bad. The necessity for the vast work of sewerage which is now going on in the city is occasioned by the foolish and ignorant system of laying out the city, and that again is due to intrusting the municipal management to ignorant and rapacious men. Commissioners, for instance, appointed to open streets, receive three dollars for every meeting whether they attend or not. A man may be appointed upon ten or twenty such Commissions and receive payment for all. Is it surprising that there are some streets the laying out of which involves such difficulties that Commissioners have been sitting upon the subject for five years, at the rate of three dollars for every meeting at which they are absent or present, and can not yet determine to open the streets and close their pockets?

A Health Board that undertakes to deal with a city of this kind has begun upon the Augean Stable. The City Government itself is the chief nuisance, and the horrible slums and filth and poor drainage are but secondary evils. It is pleasant to see that the Board goes to its work like a Hercules, for nothing but Hercules' resolution and labor can insure success.

OUR ARTISTS IN THE SOUTH.

THE sketches which we give on our first page are the first of a series of illustrations which we propose to give of the characteristic aspects of life in the Southern States, whether in the city or on the plantation. We have for this purpose a corps of special artists in those States, who have had years of experience in the special class of duties which they have undertaken, and who understand the peculiarities both of the region and of the people. During the war these artists have followed our armies, and have furnished the public through the pages of this paper with illustrations of the great conflict so graphic and faithful that they will be appreciated as long as our history shall be read. The battles are over now; but their results remain—results how different from those contemplated by the late rebel leaders! These leaders, indeed, have failed to revolutionize the United States Government, but they have most certainly succeeded in revolutionizing the southern part of the country.

Yet the desolation which the war has wrought is not irretrievable. A country so purely agricultural in all its interests as the southern section of the republic soon recovers even from the most terrible shocks of war. There is, in such a case, no vast and complex system of commerce to be re-established, for there was no such system to be overturned or interrupted by the war. The cities which suffered were few in number, and as they were simply great agricultural emporiums they will speedily recover their former importance and wealth, while a single crop will almost redeem the plantations from their present state of ruin.

But that which is irretrievable by any possible human means is the social revolution which the war has accomplished. It is a revolution both of society and political economy. With slave labor a chief element of the power of the aristocratic classes of the Southern States has vanished. Not only has the slave been freed, but all labor in those States has risen from a position of degradation to one of honor, and therefore of power. An attempt will doubtless be made and persisted in on the part of those who have formerly monopolized respectability and power to retain so much of their feudal estate as the war seems to have left them; but this is only clinging to shadows. The new impulse given to the laboring interest by its rehabilitation in the South will lead to the development of the many resources of that country, and to the establishment of commerce and manufactures on an extended scale. Gradually, but surely, the unwholesome dwellings of the laborers will cease the noxious of the wealthy planters, and there will rise to the political surface new men with new ideas to represent and give empire to this new interest. It is not in our present Congress that this great contest is to be determined, but in the Southern States themselves, and upon the very fields where the pulsative conflict of arms was fought that has made this second and more significant struggle possible.

With pen and pencil we shall follow this contest through its successive stages. For the present the elements are confused and but dimly shaped. It is like the rising of a new world from chaos. To us the late Slave States seem now almost like a newly-discovered country. For the first time we ask earnestly: What are their resources and opportunities? How has the great earthquake left them—with what marks of ruin upon their cities and fields—with what changes of a social and political character? We shall leave to our artists the task of answering these absorbing questions, so far as it is possible to answer them by means of pictorial representations.

HOW MUCH SHALL WE EAT?

THE fact, so commonly observed, that some eat much less than others, and yet are equally well nourished, although performing an equal amount of both bodily and mental labor, seems to show that eating too much is a common fault. Perhaps we may say that in this country of plenty most of the well-conditioned eat too much, the question very often being, how much can the stomach and the system conveniently bear? But we would not have one go to the other extreme, and seek to know how little food the system can get along with, and be in a comfortable condition. The true question is, how much does the system require to keep it in a vigorous condition? And in deciding this every rational man will be governed mostly by the natural indication spoken of in a previous article. This obedience to instinct implies little thought; and the truth is that the less thought we have about the matter, provided it be properly settled, the better.

What now, let us inquire, are the results of eating too much? These are seen both in the stomach itself and in the system at large. The stomach, however well it may habituate itself to do the extraordinary work put upon it, is gradually impaired in its powers, and therefore becomes liable to various derangements. These may be removed for the time being by dilution of the work of the organ, assisted perhaps by some medicine. But the evil recurring many times, there may be at length positive irremediable disease. If, as is perhaps more often the case, the stomach, though liable to frequent derangements, maintains tolerably well its vigor, results of a more or less marked character will nevertheless appear in the system. The primary result is the supply of more material for growth and repair than is needed; that is, too much blood is made. There is, therefore, a clogged state of the system. Various results come from this, according to concurring circumstances. The effect may be general, giving too much bulk in proportion to vigor. There is a certain tissue called cellular membrane, which acts every where as a sort of packing material, lying therefore under the skin, between muscles, about organs, between streets of other tissues, and even between their fibres; and in those who take too much nutriment there is apt to be too much of this tissue, especially in some portions of the body, and the fat which is deposited in some localities in its cells is increased, sometimes very largely. Circumstances of a local character may also induce enlargement, or hypertrophy, as it is called, of some organ, as the heart or liver. With the surplus of blood, congestion—that is, local increase with partial stasis or stagnation—is apt to occur; and even if this be slight and temporary, a frequent repetition will engender positive disease. With the general disturbance caused by the repetition, there is sometimes produced a degeneration of the structure of some organ, and of course an impairment of its function. There may be from this cause such a change in the heart as to stop at length suddenly its action, and produce death. Very often there is a combination of disease in the stomach itself with other local difficulties, or with the general derangement, all coming from the habitual overaction to which that organ is subjected. It would be an endless task to trace out all the results of overeating, but enough has been said to indicate in the general their nature and extent.

If now, on the other hand, too little food be taken, the stomach does not perform the amount of labor for which it is naturally fitted, and therefore its vigor is impaired, just as in arms of muscles that are not sufficiently exercised. But the results are more seen in the system at large. Not being adequately nourished, there is debility and deficient development. But besides there is depression occasioned by the lack of the genial influence of satiety. From all this there will arise various diseases of either a general or local character, or both combined. Poor feeding is a prolific source of disease in the abodes of poverty.

LITERARY.

DR. LIVINGSTON'S new book, "Narrative of an Expedition to the Zambesi," has just been republished in a handsome volume by the HARPERS. The extraordinary popularity of the author's previous work is sure to secure for this a welcome which its interest will justify. Of all the great African travelers of our time Dr. LIVINGSTON chiefly displays a novel regard for the races and regions which he sees. His story is not a dull diary, or a scientific catalogue, or a colorless narrative. It is not only a delightful tale of adventure and discovery, but it is warm with the most generous humanity, and bright with the haze of a cheerful imagination. And there is peculiar timeliness for us in his observations and judgments upon the people themselves. The African race he considers to be of wonderfully persistent vitality, and in constitution and temperament remarkably fortunate. But centuries of barbarism have degraded them, as PATERICER describes that part of the Irish population to have been degraded which was driven back, generations ago, to the hills of Ulster and Connaught. Nor does he hope for any serious improvement upon the African continent until the slave-trade of the tribes is abolished.

The sixth and last volume of CARLYLE'S "Frederick" is now published by the HARPERS. It is the completion of a work remarkable for research into the most vexations and numerous documents and authorities and for extraordinary power of narration. We have already spoken of the general scope and execution of the work; but while every "reading man" will of course acknowledge its force, its humor, its pathos, and its insight, he will also confess a secret pain that all this power should have been expended upon this subject. He will read it as the work of a master in English literature, but he will discover that even CARLYLE can not make a hero of FREDERICK the Great.

Another famous traveler, Mr. BARBAR TAYLOR, is winning fresh laurels in a new field. His "Story of Kennett," just published by HENRY & HOLT, is the last in a long series of popular works, but none of these all is savor of a wider welcome or longer date. It is an interesting, characteristic, and delightful story. The scene is laid at the close of the last century, in and around Kennett Square, in Pennsylvania, close upon the Delaware line. It is the landscape in which the author was born. The traditions of the story were familiar to his boyhood, and in weaving them together in his book he offers a tender tribute to his home and its associations. The literary art with which the work is constructed is very striking. The characters are all actors in the plot, and all the incidents move symmetrically to the end. The plot is stirring and exciting, but a soft air of rural remoteness and repose envelopes the story like a tranquil atmosphere brooding over the uplands and meadows of Kennett. The characters are strongly drawn, and the Quaker heroine is one of the truest women whom we have lately encountered in fiction. If the reader remembers Hannah Thurston a little doubtfully or unkindly, let him know Martha Deane, and he will learn "How divine a thing A woman may be made."

The work has evidently been a labor of love. The details are wrought with fidelity and skill, and "The Story of Kennett" is undoubtedly Mr. TAYLOR'S best book.

THE HARPERS have issued VICTOR HUGO'S new novel, the "Tollers of the Sea." It has the same peculiarities as "Les Misérables," without the discursive and baffling episodes of that book, and is so full of extravagance and wild, exciting romance, and of that crackling brilliancy of rhetoric for which the author is famous. The tale is of the sea and shore, of love and crime, of the ideally best and worst characters, and it has an absorbing melodramatic interest. Of course it is sensational, for it is VICTOR HUGO'S. The wonderful eye for situations, which was remarkable in "Notre Dame" thirty years ago, is still as remarkable in the "Tollers of the Sea;" and the curious miscellany of knowledge, not always accurate, which was observable in "Les Misérables," is also here. To us there is no indication in it of falling fire in a talent never remarkable for the profoundest sincerity, and if the concluding scene is propositious it is certainly powerful.

THE April Number of the North American Review, published by TUCKERSON & FRATES, is in dimensions a book, and in contents a timely and valuable book. There is not an article in it which is not worthy of careful attention. The one that will be most widely read probably is Mr. PATTON'S paper upon Journalism and the New York Herald. This is most readable, trenchant, and we think, upon the whole, and with considerable modification, true. It is certainly a fine piece of criticism. Its praise and its censure are equally impartial, and it perfectly illustrates the spirit which it urges upon journalists. Mr. PATTON'S paper upon Henry Clay, in the January Number of the Review, was so good that we are surprised it has not been more generally mentioned. The article upon Character is plainly Mr. EMMERSON'S, and is especially interesting as a clear and rigorous reply to the question so often asked, "What is his religious faith?" It has all his antique solidity of thought and exquisite felicity of phrase. CARLYLE'S genius and position are treated with acute insight by Mr. LOWELL, who also comments with very good sense upon the President on the stump. Mr. NORRIS'S review of the latest English translations of Dante is the work of a thoroughly accomplished hand, and delicately discriminates the value of the illustrations he presents. To every student of literature it is a very valuable paper. The contributions upon "Our Diplomacy During the Rebellion," "The Error of De Tocqueville," "Military Law," and "International Arbitration," keep rank with those that we have mentioned; and the reader will find that more timely topics have seldom been more vigorously and satisfactorily discussed than in this Number of the North American.

THE first volume of "Harper's Pictorial History of the Great Rebellion," by ALBERT H. GREENMAN and HENRY M. ALDEN, is now published. It is a large folio of nearly four hundred pages, and contains as much matter as five ordinary octavo volumes. The authors hope within a few months to finish the work in a volume of similar size. This history is the result of the most extensive and painstaking research, and is elaborated with the most patient accuracy. The striking paper in the April Number of Harper's Magazine upon the Seven Days' Battles before Richmond comprised part of one of the chapters of the work, and illustrates its careful fidelity. The close of the war has opened valuable sources of information hitherto unobtainable. These have been carefully explored, and the work is completed to the end of the Potomac Campaign of 1862. Its style is simple; its temper admirable. Firm in their faith both in the power of the Union and in the entire justice of its cause, the authors are candid and reasonable toward its enemies. They treat of men and events neither with partiality nor acrimony, seeking historical truth and not partisan triumph. The profuse illustrations, including maps and plans, with scenes and incidents and portraits, give Harper's History a unique interest and value as the family history of the war.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

APRIL 18: In the Senate, the bill to grant one hundred thousand acres of the public land to aid in constructing a ship canal from Lake Superior to Lac La Poudre, in the State of Michigan, was passed. Also the bill granting land to aid in the construction of the Southern Minnesota Railroad.

In the House, Mr. Raymond, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a resolution, which was adopted, requesting the President to inform the Senate and Congress of the rights and interests of American citizens in the fishing grounds adjacent to the British Provinces, and whether any legislation or other action on the part of Congress is, in his judgment, necessary to secure those rights and interests, in consequence of the abrogation of the Redoubt Treaty of 1804.—The Bankrupt bill came up on the motion to reconsider the vote by which it was rejected a week since. A reconsideration was carried, but on reaching the main question the bill was lost.—page 23, says 22.—A bill authorizing the release of five-year prisoners was passed.

APRIL 17: In the Senate, Mr. Wilson introduced a resolution to prohibit the sale of spirituous liquors in the Capitol building, which was adopted.—page 23, says 22.

In the House, the bill appropriating $7,000,000 to the State of Missouri for money expended for military operations during the late war was passed, after receiving seven amendments, by a vote of 65 to 35.

APRIL 17: In the Senate, the bill to withdraw the State of Missouri from war expenses was called up, and the House amendments concurred in.—The bill authorizing the re-issuance of duties on produce shipped from one port of the United States to another and Canada was passed and goes to the House.—Mr. Stewart introduced a resolution for the following Constitutional Amendment:

AMENDMENT.—Sec. 1. All discriminations among the people because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, either in civil rights or in the rights of suffrage, are prohibited.—but the States may exercise police power subject from contributions on suffrage hereafter imposed.

Sec. 2. Obligations incurred in all of the intervention or of war against the Union, and claims for compensation for services constructed and paid, and shall not be assumed or paid by any State or by the United States.

To this was appended a resolution to send the Southern Representatives after the ratification of this amendment.—The details then proceeded to the usual senatorial issues to the late Senator Ford.

In the House, the bill authorizing the transfer of a grant to the Republic of Liberia was passed. The Senate bill providing for the purchase of the Hawaiian Islands and other islands was next considered and passed.—The concurrent resolution prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors in the Capitol was taken from the Speaker's table, and, after considerable discussion, adopted.—The Senate bill appropriating $25,000 for the relief of destitute persons in the District of Columbia, to be expended under the direction of the Civil War Relief Society, was passed by a vote of 100 yeas.

APRIL 16: In both Houses, the report of the Conference Committee on the Naval Appropriation bill was agreed to.

APRIL 16: In the House, Mr. Corfield made some appropriate and eloquent remarks pertaining to a certain self-interest in respect to the Secretary of the War, communicated April 14, 1865.

NEW YORK STATE LEGISLATURE.

APRIL 16: In the Senate, the Assembly amended to the Brooklyn Metropolitan Railway bill were concurred in. The following bills were passed: Regulating and increasing the salaries of members of the Metropolitan Police Force; for the relief of the Society for the protection of destitute, orphaned Catholic children in New York; incorporating the Mercantile Library Association of New York.

APRIL 15: In the Senate, the following bills were passed: Amending the charter of Brooklyn—it relates to the cleaning and improvement of the streets; authorizing the extension of the City Dock and East Broadway and Battery Railroad; to provide for the appointment of an additional member of the Notarial Public in and for the City of New York; to make more engagements to the act for the benefit of married women in insuring the lives of their husbands; to re-peal the widder's voting law.

APRIL 15: In the Senate, the New York Elevated Railroad bill was tabled.

In the Assembly, Resolutions in respect to the vacancy of the late Daniel H. Dickinson were unanimously adopted. The New York County Tax Levy Bill passed by a third reading. The item of $156,000 for the Harlem Bridge was retained.

APRIL 14: In the Senate, the bill authorizing the taxation of bank stock.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE exciting for this topic is still the German question. The balance of probabilities seems to be in favor of Austria. Every thing, however, seems to depend upon Van Bismarck's power to secure a hearty cooperation of the other German States.—On March 24 Bismarck addressed a circular to all the other German States. This circular states in effect that Austria, without any provocation on the part of Prussia, has ordered armaments of a threatening character, which compel the latter power to arm also on her side. Prussia must now seek guarantees for her security, having vainly endeavored to obtain them in an alliance with Austria. The German people of Prussia and the friends of the King believe her to seek these guarantees first in Germany. The present cooperation of the Federal Constitution does not, however, present of an active part being taken by Germany in any emergency, even with the best intentions on the part of the different governments. Prussia seeks, therefore, to propose a reform of the Federal Constitution adapted to the present state of affairs. This reform is the more incumbent upon Prussia, since even from her geographical position alone her interests are identical with the interests of Germany. The destiny of Prussia is indissolubly connected with that of Germany. Prussia Bismarck asks, in conclusion, how far Prussia can rely upon the support of the different governments in the event of her being attacked by Austria, or being compelled by those States that power to make war. Queen Victoria, on March 23, addressed from Windsor Castle to George IV., the son of the late American States, a very graceful letter in appreciation of his gift to the London Exposition. The London Times says of this: "In such a signal mark of gratitude from the Queen, Mr. Prussia has, we think, received a far higher honor than could have been conveyed by any other title. Mr. Prussia has thus been named in letters among us a kindly feeling for his countrymen that could have been effected by a grant of a dukedom, and for Majesty's letter will, we hope, be received by the Americans as a conspicuous evidence of the friendly regard toward them which such acts have called forth on our part."

The General of Sicily, Austria, Emperor of France, took place on the 14th in the presence of a large number of Frenchmen. By her own express command, she the reporter of the London Times, she wears in death the green dress which having Paris in the midst of February, carefully preserved for the occasion, and the assurance of her wisdom.

Protestants in Italy are, it seems, becoming the victims of atrocious persecutions. In regard to the late massacre in Verona an Italian paper says: "Three houses burned and six persons killed. I visited the ruins this morning, and the families of some of the victims. I will not dwell on the painful impression produced by the blackened walls and broken furniture, the traces of blood still visible on walls and pavement, and the grief of weeping mothers: I will limit myself to facts. It appears that the Lent preachers, instead of exhorting the faithful to repentance, regularly preached hatred to the Protestants, representing their destruction as a necessary work, good and agreeable in the sight of a God of love. No wonder if such had soon produced alienable fruits. But it appears that politics and emotion were combined with religious motives. I am assured that one hundred and fifteen houses were destroyed in such and such a list of them is in the hands of justice. He that will read, on Monday, the 13th inst., a bundle of fanatical tracts, the losses in which the Evangelical societies are held, killed in cold blood two brothers who fell into their hands, reached every thing in the house, and set fire to it. The proprietor and the preacher escaped over the roof, and I am happy to say that the latter found shelter in the house of the Canon Gabeli. The conduct of the Venetian Guard can not be too severely blamed. The meeting place was not more than thirty yards from their post, and the brethren took place literally before their eyes, without their stirring a finger to prevent it. For two hours the mob of fanatics did what it pleased, and during that time it burned these houses and killed five persons. A sixth died yesterday of his wounds. The number of wounded is great, but the list is not yet complete. Besides the priest Saggari Fostiglione, two other priests, a novice, and more than two hundred persons are already made, and more are being constantly made."

THE ISLAND OF SANTORIN, GREEK ARCHIPELAGO, WITH THE SUBMARINE VOLCANO.—(See Page 268)

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

INSIDE A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

TOM IS DEAD!

CHAPTER XVI.

"WHAT? Yes, even unto death, but that is it. Yes, let us ride up to the Pines and spend a week or so with Paul up there. A plain, rough man is Paul, but a sincere and thoroughly sensible one. He lives in rude fashion, but will give us a hearty welcome. We will try to forget for a while there the very existence of Tim Lamum—we shall have to get a pass from him, by-the-by—Dr. Paul, Secession, and the Somerville Star."

It is Guy Brooks who makes the suggestion, to which Mr. Arthur eagerly consents. "I never was in better health in my life," he adds, standing erect as a grenadier, and slapping his hands upon his breast. "When I get fairly into my studies I take to them with keener zest than I ever did before—to get into them from Secession is the thing. If one could only get away for a while, off say among the Esquimaux, I could shout there 'Down with Davis!' till the blue icebergs rang again. Since, like the starting, I can't get out, I could roll myself up like a hedgehog and sleep for six months—such weariness, such intense anxiety, and for so long now."

"Ah, that is a weakness!" remonstrates the lawyer. "We are at our post, and must stand manfully there!" As if he himself did not require to be often rebuked by his friend—the Federals are so long, so very long in coming—for despondency and impatience.

"I know it, since I say it to myself several dozen times a day, but the flesh is weak; Country, Church of God, Civilization even, so suddenly swept from under one. Truth, Justice, Providence itself, gone. Only, all of it my own miserable lack of faith under trial. One will lapse a little when the weather is gloomy, when some special wickedness comes to mind, when Secession gains some great victory, when the North seems to halt, perhaps fall—who knows out here?—in its work, the greatest work. Guy Brooks, Esq.," adds Edward Arthur, boldly, "ever given a nation to do since the world began!"

And this is astounding language for even a Union man at the South to use at this period; think it he may, perhaps, but say such a thing aloud? No. "If one," he continues, "was only where one could do any thing."

"You are doing something," placid Mrs. Sorel had said to him months before, when he had ventured a like remark to her over the supper-table. The truth is, one must have some one to unboom one's self to, especially in periods of great trial, and by this time Mrs. Sorel had become to her guest as a mother.

Robby has left the table before this. They would not mind speaking before him, however, for he rarely goes to Somerville except on Sunday with his mother; and when he is there he has learned, from experience, to evade the attempts to draw information from him in regard to his friends—attempts which not only Mrs. Warner but even Dr. Ginnis and Brother Barker have not dishonored to make. You can teach a child silence on a given topic sooner than you can teach him to read—try it. Besides, Mr. Arthur and Mrs. Sorel had thoroughly instructed Robby in the whole quarrel. No more devoted Union man in the world than Robby.

"If we only knew it," she had then replied, "we would see that the silent influences are ever the most powerful. What so powerful as light and heat, yet what so utterly without sound? You have quietly, but from the outset, occupied a position of solemn protest against the rebellion—sermons, prayers, conversation, very existence in Somerville, all an influence unswervingly against it."

"I have tried to urge in every way I could," Mr. Arthur then said, "the supremacy of Heaven in this matter, as in every thing else; that we are being chastised for some great and good end of God."

"That angry prayers are never heard, that trust in men is vain, that violence of speech and feeling is unchristian. I have never said so before, nor would I now but to encourage you," adds quiet Mrs. Sorel; "but your very contrast to Mr. Barker all the time is an influence in Somerville for good."

"Could Christian men outside the South, at the North, in England say, know my course, I think it would meet their cordial approval; I do think I would have the sympathy of the wisest and best of my generation. In any case," added Mr. Arthur, "I have the hearty approval of my own conscience, though deserved by so many who once esteemed me."

The fact is, he pursued the course he did because any other was simply impossible.

"I do not make my conscience a law to any other man living," he reasoned with Mrs. Sorel; "but neither can I make the conscience of any other a law to me. My own deliberate conviction I must follow, even though it leads me to a traitor's rope," as Mrs. Warner says.

More than he knows it, too, is there growing up in him one great hope. From the hour she had first burst upon him in her mother's parlor a glowing school-girl, swinging her sun-bonnet in her hand by its long strings, his love for Alice, very foolish in him as it was, certainly, had grown up into an absorbing affection. None the less that he rarely met her. He was a Union man; Mrs. Bowles knew it, and was of opinions exceedingly contrary; not for worlds, not for Alice even, would he intrude unwelcome. When he did visit Mrs. Bowles, too genuinely a lady to allude to the war save in general terms, she confined herself to Rutledge Bowles, whose letters few and far apart was the food of her mind and the fountain of her speech. Rutledge Bowles, to Mrs. Bowles South Carolina incarnate, was very often in trouble in these days; his letters were full of it; eternally seceding from Secession right and left, east, west, south—almost, in times of peculiar injustice to him, north even, rather than stand it.

Mr. Arthur often met Alice when at her mother's, never alone, however. Sewing beside her mother, on some one, generally of the war garments so perpetually demanded in the Somerville Store; or playing old music, or reading old books—there were no magazines or new books now. He had a fancy that a blush tinged her smile at their meeting. Did he not see her also as a teacher in the diminished Sabbath-school? Alas, poor human nature! his chief happiness on these Sabbaths is to meet Alice at Sabbath-school, even though mere sight and casual greeting was all.

Her mother never attended church now, for Mr. Arthur would not pray for the Confederacy. But the preacher was aware all the service through of one sweet face down the aisle, down too far away toward the door. The solemn fact, he selected his weekly text, and wrote every line of his sermon almost as much for her as if it had been a letter. Had not Alice become a communicant just before Secession? How much or how little through his means he never dared ask himself.

Long ago, if Secession had not come in, would he have learned his fate at her hands. Yet he believed—that is, he hoped—I mean, he felt assured— However, for the present, wait. Perhaps when the end comes she will see how right I was all along—even her mother may. Not without terrible apprehensions meantime of the young gentlemen in gray clothing and brass buttons who frequented Mrs. Bowles's hospitable parlor, rode with her, took her to parties. But if a man is not to be governed by his own intuition of the wisest, happiest course, what is left him to do? So far, his unwavering intuition is—wait. But it is for something considerably more to him than the re-establishment of the Union that he yearns in looking to the end. Besides, he says, if I was to learn certainly that I have no hope with her, this, with the other trials, will be too great a blow to bear. Let the hope live, if only to sustain me through these dark days.

Perhaps it is as well he does not know of the letter Alice receives these days from her brother. It is soon after his ordeal before Tim Lamum—the first but not the last of that dynasty. Rutledge Bowles writes his sister that he has received a letter to the effect that she is being addressed by a Mr. Arthur, a Union man! Could it have been Mrs. Warner? Surely not Mr. Neely? For these are, both of them, too sharp not to know the kind of epistle Rutledge Bowles will write to his sister, with the effect upon her of that epistle.

He can conjecture the possibility of some such letter to her from her brother weeks after, however. He, too, is favored with one from the young Carolinian. Such a letter that, after reading the first few lines, he refolds it, places it again in its envelope so redirected as to go back to its author, and drops it in the letter-box of the Post-office. This does not diminish the pride of his attitude toward the one he loves most of all the world. Not without a medicinal virtue to him is that letter, a counter-irritant to the other inflammation of Secession.

And thus does, even on this fair young girl, the great question press heavier every day. No neutral ground between the old era and the new. One opinion or the other. And to the opinion you adopt must be given your whole heart also. The past is forever gone; as to the future, choose!

But by a determined effort Edward Arthur throws every painful thought from him down upon the west wind, blowing full upon and past him, as he rides away from Somerville this August morning beside Guy Brooks, on their way to the Pines. Riding bravely away from Secession, conversation, however, on all other topics droops and dies before they have got ten miles out from Somerville.

"One of my old clients that was that stopped me as we were mounting," said the lawyer at last. "He was telling me that he had escaped the ranks by working in a powder-mill. I told him he had better have gone into battle at once. At least a dozen of their trumpety powder-mills have blown up in this section. Villainous—"

"My dear Sir," remonstrates his companion, "do let us forget Secession for a while. We must, or we shall lose our wits. If a cow gives a shake of her bell at night lying by the calf's lot at Mrs. Sorel's, it wakes me instantly out of the deepest sleep to imagine it the Somerville bells over some great victory. I am personally fancying I hear the sound of distant cannon on the west wind. If I hear a shot-gun, I say that man has heard some news. The distant crowing of a rooster has been to me more than once the far-off yelling of somebody for victory. I am positively reluctant to open the Star; it is like opening a letter with a black seal. In fact, I never ask the news of any but a Union man, because I know he will break any disastrous tidings to me in the gentlest possible way." Mr. Arthur laughs as he says it. "I never knew," he adds, "so well before what the command means to pray without ceasing. I never wake at night, never recur to the subject during the day, but it is with a prayer for the Union on my lips. You may laugh at me, but I never catch glimpse of a leading Secessionist, nor the house, child, or dog of one reminding me of him; never see a war-poster on the walls; never see a Government wagon, postage stamp—any thing that reminds me of the great crime, but what theologians call ejaculatory prayer burns on my tongue for its swift and utter destruction."

"Yes, may Heaven speedily crush the rebellion and give us back law, order, civilization, society, country, religion, ourselves. With all my soul, Amen!" adds the lawyer, to such lengths of disloyalty has he arrived. "However, don't tell the Provost Marshal I said so."

And it is noteworthy the manner in which Union men risk their lives in each other's hands in these days. Meet a stranger casually in a store, fall in with a respectable traveler along the road, the one topic is introduced as soon as the salutations are over, and, almost from the first syllable on either side, by tone, manner, bearing—the subtle Freemasonry which causes people who feel alike—lovers included—to be aware of the fact, especially when they feel very deeply, in half an hour the stranger and yourself have mutually placed a life in each other's hands if you both be Union in sentiment. Because there is no longer neutrality. The gulf has so deepened and widened by this time between the two opinions that there can be henceforth no passing and repassing. If you and your chance acquaintance are not Secessionists now, both of you are to the centre of your souls the opposite to that, and opposite to that forever.

"That client of mine," adds the lawyer, "was telling me the various shifts to escape conscription. Some have gone to tanning, and the sort of leather produced is a sight to see. Others have rushed into the making of salt, nitre, sulphur, shoe-pigs—any thing. Others are flying desperately around to get the required twenty scholars, to be exempted as teachers. One man, to my certain knowledge, exposes himself purposely to keep up a sufficient rheumatism. People suffer with rupture, neuralgia, and every other disease under heaven, to a degree unheard of. Many a man has suddenly proved to be many years older than his own wife ever imagined. I have heard of Campbellite congregations of late which have manually ordained to the ministry every male member on their books—how true that is I don't say."

"What a merry the comic will slip into even the most tragic!" grins in Mr. Arthur.

"There is that client of mine," continues Guy Brooks, "a poor, honest, hard-working man, with a wife in wretched health and a swarm of white-headed children. Jewet is his name—Silas Jewet—a fair specimen of really the most virtuous class in the country. All his life he has regarded Disunion with as much horror as a man can regard any thing which he considered impossible; Washington's Farewell Address, framed and glazed, is the only ornament there, hanging up against the wall of his cabin. A Democrat from his pine-wood cradle, idolizing Jackson for whipping the British at New Orleans, the United States Bank, and Nullification. This man wakes suddenly up to find Disunion a fact, and Jackson's alternative with South Carolina actually upon us. And he must leave bedridden wife and helpless children, a few rags of clothing, a little corn in the crib, a few pigs, perhaps an ox or two, their only supply, to be gone—he has no idea where nor for how long, and so fight for—Disunion! No alternative but to take his shotgun, strip himself almost to the skin for the use of his suffering family, and march off in a cause he abhors. Silas Jewet fighting for Colonel Ret Roberts, Tim Lamum, Colonel Jiggins, and the like, that they may retain their negroes, slaves which they have jeopardized by their own mad folly in Secession!"

"And this going before heard after heard to be examined, displaying your hidden sores, concealed diseases, to move their pity and secure an exemption—tasting slavery yourselves to the very drops to see how we like it, as Ferguson says. And all this the insolent trampling over us of men, at least the most active and prominent among them, grog-shop politicians, bullies, and ruffians, the very sediment of society— And the clergyman emphasizes his remark by sweeping his words in full flow lest he should add what he ought not.

THE FATE OF UNION MEN.

"The woods around his house, Silas Jewet says," adds the lawyer, "swarm with runaway negroes. Twice they have broken in, while he was away, upon his helpless family and stripped the cabin of all the little food there was in it. I couldn't advise him to run the country; he will lose every stick of what little he has got if he could move his family even. The woods are full of runaway whites as it is, naked, starving. That we should be brought to this—see, and for what?"

"I tell you, Sir," says Mr. Arthur, more solemnly, "at first I regarded the deadly principle of Secession as the great sin, the cause and source of our suffering. Slavery I was born and raised with, and I never had any very definite idea in reference to it before. I have now. It is the accursed root of this accursed sprig. Could any other than a wrong thing have destroyed our country as it has? Slavery is a sin, Sir; the judgments of Heaven now on us are God's wrath against us, North and South, just for this great sin. And to think that in the Church of God itself this sin has its last and strongest citadel; God's great indignation for passing down sin in the land itself the most active and powerful engine for its establishment! When Heaven's only instrumentality for good to a people is thus not only powerless for good, but is actually the most efficient means in the land for the sin, no wonder He drops it as his instrumentality and draws the weeds instead. And nothing less than God's awful judgments could open our eyes to the truth."

"See those two women in that field on your left?" asks Gay Brooks, interrupting his friend as they ride by a road-side cabin with its improvements. "Don't seem to notice them, but look at that largest one in the big yellow sunbonnet—one with the hoe. Any thing remarkable about her?"

"Not that I can see—why?"

"Well, nothing, only the one in the blue bonnet is Mrs. Peter Hook, and the other is—"

"Her sister, lately from Carolina. Yes; I stopped here to get a drink a few weeks ago. Mrs. Hook told me," says Mr. Arthur.

"You saw the sister—talked with her?" asks the lawyer, with a smile.

"N-o-no; she had just stepped out, Mrs. Hook said."

"Yes, and always has just stepped out, whenever calls. It's her husband, man!"

"Why, I asked after her husband," says astonished Mr. Arthur. "She told me she had a letter from him, in some regiment, somewhere. Was shot in the leg, or something of the sort. I remember I tried to encourage her. She said she hoped so, but feared not. And that other woman—"

"Don't look back. Not five people besides them know of it. Dare say he is used to the women's clothes by this time. Delightful state of things, isn't it?"

And while the friends ride thoughtfully on let us in this connection turn for an instant to Colonel Juggins's household, type and emblem of hundreds of thousands of households throughout the land.

"We ain't goin' on to their lot to interrupt them," had been Mrs. Juggins's reasoning in regard to the Yankees. "Why can't they stay at home? If they don't like ownin' niggers, well jest let them not own them. Our havin' hands is none of their business."

And very cheerfully indeed had Mrs. Juggins equipped Tom, when the war broke out, to go and help drive the Yankees back home. But news comes, months and months afterward, that Tom has been killed there in Virginia. Now Mrs. Juggins is a mother; Tom was her son, her only son. And a very ordinary youth, gawky, freckled, scold, was Tom Juggins; but to his mother he was all the world. When the Colonel, coming back that disastrous afternoon from Somerville, after a dozen efforts to break the news to her, at last takes out the soiled and blood-stained letter from Henry Sorel, who was in the same company with him, and reads it out, breaking down a dozen times in the attempt, Mrs. Juggins's hands fall with the knitting in them into her lap with a first feeling of profound astonishment. Such a thing had never been entertained in her mind for an instant. Then follows the burst of grief, till all the negroes flock into the house from cabin and field to know what is the calamity. It lasts in all its bitterness for weeks; loud weeping when it is the theme of conversation with friends; silent, steady weeping, the tears rolling for hours down her cheek and sparkling upon her half-finished stockings as she knits. Tom as a baby, Tom as a little boy, Tom at school, Tom a grown youth, Tom as she last saw him leaving for the war.

But now a change is coming over Mrs. Juggins which perplexes her husband wonderfully, smothering his cob-pipe on long afternoons with old age suddenly fallen upon him. With every body else, long before Tom's death Mrs. Juggins has come to know that the war is, at first, a struggle for slavery. And since, as her grief loses, so to speak, its first personality, she is thinking the slavery question steadily over as she knits—no Tom to knit for now, but only from habit.

"You may say what you please," she remarks to Brother Barker, whose condolences are, somehow, singularly unacceptable to her, "but my Tom was more to me than all the hands we've got. I'd give up every black one we've got, God he knows, an' glad too, to get our Tom back. Yes, every one of them, from old Cudgo, that waited at my mother's wedding, and can only send the young turkeys, down to that last little thing born in Sakey's house last night. It's them this fight is about. In my opinion one white man like my Tom is worth all the niggers in the world. The Colonel there, he says I mustn't say it; but I've always said, for one, all my life what I think, I don't care who knows it; and if any body else thinks slavery is worth all the men bein' killed and all the other ruin brought upon us for it, I don't. As to what you say about the Bible bein' for it, may be so; there's a sight of things connected with it. Many a time ever since I could remember I've asked myself— However, no matter, that's neither here nor there; but it seems to me a curious sort of thing for God to be for. For our Jesus Christ, say, to be for. Or I wonder if Tom's death is makin' no kind o' unsettled in mind, this slavery 'pears so different. An' you believe it is of God, was an' certain, now?" she asks of Brother Barker with such eyes, as her hands fall with the knitting in them into her lap, that even that Brother, eager to reply, has queer sensations up his spine as he does so.

For his wife's practical sense Colonel Juggins has ever had the highest esteem, and her remarks to him when they are lying side by side under the dingy old tester, or when he is smoking his pipe, have opened a totally new train of thought in his mind. You see at the South we all took the institution as a matter of course from our birth. But many thousands are smoking the same thing in their pipes now. Is slavery worth the ruin it has caused? Could any other than a thing essentially bad have produced such ruin? Up to that date, however, very rarely did the universal thinking utter itself in words. Ah, it is too vast a result to be reached by other than such thinking, even though that thinking be quickened by swift-succeeding and tremendous events.

It was generally, though silently, agreed that it was not a good idea Brother Barker preaching that sermon on the Exodus from Egypt. True, an anonymous admirer requested it by note; he was hardly well through the discourse but Brother Barker suspected a trap, and he rages inwardly over it these days like a caged fox. For Mr. Arthur has been urging of late that the Almighty is pledged against all wrong as it exists in the world, now as ever, and has used, is using, and will use all elements and agencies for its overthrow.

"I confess I am uneasy in regard to Paul," says Brooks, remarking to his companion as they ride along, and after a lengthened silence.

"I fear trouble is brewing up there in the Pines. There are many Union men living there. They have kept very quiet all this time, never expressing their opinions, at least except to each other, violating no law, staying as closely at home as possible about their business. As many as could have fled the State from conscription, and are scattered about wherever they can go, unable to hear from or assist their families. For myself I don't want to go into the Federal lines if I can help it! If I did I might be tempted to take the stamp and tell those people, if you care so much for the slavery of the blacks, at least care something for the worse slavery of the whites—among us, your own flesh and blood, and come and help us. I do think I could stir them up to move a little faster, to tell them of the accursed despotism under which we perish. But then I have to leave, and I hate to go, on every account. Many Union men about the Pines have been shot from behind trees, hung along the roadside, sent out of the county in irons, Heaven knows where. This is the main reason of my going up now," adds the lawyer—"my anxiety in reference to Paul."

"That accounts," said his companion, "for those three columns of abuse of the citizens up there in the last Number of the Star. It is the most ferocious thing I have yet seen in the paper."

And it was. Mrs. Warner, who had fallen into the habit of reserving the strongest "documents" met with during the day to read to her unhappy husband at night, had accomplished two objects on the Doctor by the reading to him of that article, curdled the very blood in his veins, and convinced him that it was the production of a more frantic pen than that of Lamun—even Brother Barker's.

It charged the objects of its rage with being Abolitionists banded into a conspiracy to murder and rob in the pay of the Federals—describing its leader as the avowed infidel who had recently disturbed a peaceful congregation gathered together for the worship of God by intruding his blasphemous atrocities. "More hereafter." The paper added, "That a single one of those miserable traitors has escaped so long does little credit to the unshaken loyalty of the country. These are no times for the regular processes of the law; let the rifle and the rope do its just and speedy work upon them!"

"And Amen, say I," added Mrs. Warner in conclusion; "and I wouldn't wonder, Dr. Warner—oh, you needn't drop that head of yours, if you are one of this band of traitors, President of them, for what I know; you are a Union man, and you know it!" Viler abuse than is heaped by that epithet even Mrs. Warner can not use.

For the last half hour the travelers have ridden along in silence, Gay Brooks with his head declined in thought—thought evidently so deep and painful that his friend hesitates to break in upon it by a syllable.

"Mr. Arthur," says the lawyer at length, looking up at his companion with an expression of deepest anxiety, yet almost childlike supplication, "you are my spiritual guide, now what do you say? You know Lamun has often urged upon the mob to murder me; I am as liable as any man to be shot, as so many have been, from behind a tree; besides, they are sure, sooner or later, to force me into the ranks, even if I escape that. Now what ought a man to do? It ain't that my business is broken up, that so many of my old friends have become personal enemies, that I sacrifice every cent I have on earth by going, that if I am caught on the way my life will be taken. What I hate is to desert the South, wrong as the South is. Then the idea of actually enlisting in the Federal army and systematically killing my own— If they would only let a man alone. I am not disobeying a law they have made, am doing nothing against their Confederacy. But the idea of actually fighting for this thing, and I know they'll force me in at last. I have fifty hands down on my place; but as to fighting for slavery! I don't say slavery is a sin or any thing of that sort, but as to fighting for it I can't, and I won't. God Almighty seems to be against it—any way I'm not going to fight for it or for the ruin of the South, which I know Secession to be. I hate, too, to leave you to struggle on, masters in the church getting worse every day. What do you say?"

The Kentucky lawyer has spoken with energy, turning in his saddle as he rides, and looking his friend full in the face. And it is not the first time the minister has been applied to for advice of the kind. Mothers and wives of members of his church, young men members also, had come to him; "What is my duty, Sir, as a Christian man in reference to escaping or enduring conscription—risk it, or escape, if I can, North, which?" Ah, how fervently had the pastor sought divine instruction in order to instruct others. What can he say? seek the guidance of Heaven in Scripture, prayer, and—Providence.

"It seems to me," he now said to his friend in conclusion, "that you should wait the plain indications of Providence. Don't act an instant before it is essential you should act. The fog opens only as we advance into it. Wait. Let your hand be in that of your Heavenly Father. He will make it so plain you will not even hesitate when the time comes. 'Wait on the Lord: be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thy heart: wait, I say, on the Lord.'"

We all know the Ruler of all uses devils in all their degrees to accomplish His purposes—devils damned already for centuries, and those not as yet in hell, as much as He does the angels in heaven, and those not yet arrived thither from earth. In fact, when you consider it, so far as things now are, it is of all His human instruments—the diabolical ones He most uses, these being so much the most numerous—ay, and energetic.

But the travelers have by this time reached a creek within a mile or two of the home of Paul Brooks. It is a wild and barren spot. The road runs along through deep sand and under pine-trees rearing their heads far above, intermingling their boughs there in unceasing whisperings; only the tapping of the woodpecker upon the dead branches relieving the steady murmur, now rising, now falling, overhead, with a surge as of the sounding sea. Riding slowly along through the solitude, conversing in low tones, they come immediately, and by a sudden turn of the road, upon the creek, which, running for a time parallel to the road, now rushes, swollen by late rains and quite a torrent, across their way, turbid and half covered with the needles and cones of the pines swept away in its course through the forest. For some minutes past there has been the roaring as of falling water, and they now observe that, on the left of the road, and not a dozen yards off, the creek suddenly falls over the edge of a deep and circular chasm.

They see the hazel wand bends in the hand toward water flowing far underground. Certainly the iron filing blindly obeys the attraction of the magnet. And whenever you must have observed it, there be an object near you charged with that which will waken within you to excess joy or sorrow, like or dislike, love or loathing, the very object itself would seem to exert a power upon you direct, and through none of the five channels by means of which objects of lesser interest flow in upon the mind.

Certain it is both travelers at the same instant, and swayed by the same unaccountable influence, turn their horses and ride to the edge of the chasm. Horror! Do their eyes deceive them? The water has washed out a round pool some twenty feet across, falling into it down the bank of the gully with a fall of ten or fifteen feet, and now runs in the hole it has made round and round ere it finds its outlet under a fallen log, and so down the slope. Rans slowly round and round, bearing upon its surface, half-discernible among the floating pine leaves, cones, and trash, the bodies of murdered men. A bearded face runs up full to view—One. Discerned by the naked knees floating only just above the drift—Two. Next it, the bushy top of the head of some one—Three. No doubt about the next; the body is stark naked and floats at full length, swollen, ghastly—Four. Yonder is only a hand, barely distinguishable among the trash—Five. Another in the corner there, the hairy chest broad and full above the water—Six. Yet another, the naked shoulders and back above the water, look—with long and livid streaks laced across from right to left, from left to right—Seven. And that is all.

No. As they gaze in speechless horror another dead body rises suddenly up from under the water, forced up by the current, in an erect posture, the breast toward them; they can only see the bottom of the bearded chin, for the head has fallen back from the hideous gash across the throat—Eight.

Bear witness, O heart-searching God, that herein no syllable is written not in exact accordance with truth; bear witness, for Thou didst see it! Eight men, poor men, honest men, well-meaning, hard-working men, torn at midnight from their shrieking families, borne off into the silent forest, scourged, stabbed, shot, gashed, killed—no man of the murderous gang but had his hand on each victim in some way.

And for what? Simply for doubting whether the destruction of their country was a wise thing, a good thing. Simply for being unable either to change their convictions or to lie and play the hypocrite in regard to those convictions. Only for what they are supposed to think and feel; with having done or intending to do any thing to man charges them. "Union men, damn them!" that was indictment, sentence, death warrant. During less time than we have been narrating this the two friends gaze upon the scene. Then, by the same simultaneous impulse, they turn their horses, standing back sneering with terror and struggling from the spot into the road again, and gallop on as if for their lives. The lawyer guides his animal with his left hand, holding his revolver cocked in his right. Not a syllable between them as they ride. On through the creek regardless of its swollen depth, on along the heavy sand; the road winds here, winds there, up declivity, down into hollow—will they never reach Paul's place?

Here it is, at least the field, every rail including it cut, split, and built into its place by Paul's own hand and honest hands. Another turn of the road. There is the spot. Only a chimney or two, a heap of smoking ashes and charred logs lying between! As the lawyer glances around him, his panting horse reined up in the gap of the torn-down fence, his companion points him to two men standing a hundred yards off. The lawyer is upon them in a few bounds of his horse.

"For God's sake don't shoot, stranger!" one of them yells, falling on his knees on the muddy ground. The other, a negro, has turned to fly, but it is an open field before him, he fears being shot as he runs, and thinks it safest to halt and fall and implore for his life. A trembling, yellow-faced, copperas clothed white man, and a ragged negro, these are all.

"For the Lord's sake don't shoot a fellow till you can hear him. I ain't no Union man. No, Sirs. May God Almighty—" and here the shivering wretch lifts one hand to Heaven and impresses the most awful curses upon himself if he is. A perjury; he is a Union man; whatever of mind and soul he has is invested to its last particle in that direction.

"I no Union man nadder, Lor a massy don't shoot dis yer chile. I Severn man, Severn man, Massa! I mighty willin' you hang Massa Brooks! Suppose he alive I help you hang him of you say so. He Union man, he—" and the negro heaps oaths upon the head of Paul Brooks to a degree which would have satisfied even Dr. Peck, perhaps Brother Barker.

"You hush!" says his companion, angrily, lifting a hoe in his hands. "You held yer ridiculous tongue, or if the stranger don't kill you I will!"

"I'll tell you all about it," continues the man, in hurried tones, and greatly relieved as the lawyer lowers his revolver. "You see, it looks queer to leave the dead body out that way in the open field," he says, rapidly and deferentially. "The smell, you know. Them buzzards, too. Besides the man is dead, bad as he might be. A fellow couldn't know any body would object to bury' him, you see. I live near by, up the creek. No Union man—Hol Robbins, you may have heard the name. Ev'ry body about here knows Hol Robbins. Catfish Robbins they sometimes call me, mouth like a catfish's, you see. Well, I says to Hark here to-day, 'Hark, you take the spade, I'll take your hoe, we'll go over an' bury Brooks.' Not that I approve them sentiments of his, gentlemen, not one bit of it, but he was a sort of neighbor, you know, close neighbor. Fact is, a kind neighbor in sickness, lendin' a fellow a day's work now an' then gettin' in his fodder an' such like. A few dollars p'raps 'casionally. And then them buzzards an' the smell an' all. Besides, my ole woman, she says—"

"Lor, yes, Massa," broke in the negro, "dars do grave yonder to show for it, jest finishin', Massa Catfish an' I, when you come up," and the negro points eagerly to a spot beneath the nearest tree, evidently a grave just filled up. The eye of the lawyer catches at a glance the rope hanging from the lower limb. Instinctively he rides nearer to read what is written on a leaf, evidently torn from an old ledger, fastened with wooden pins to the bough just beside where the rope is tied.

A UNION MAN

he makes it out, rudely scrawled upon the paper with a bit of charcoal.

Silently the two friends sit upon their horses, gazing upon the superscription, understanding the whole story almost as well as if they had witnessed it all with their own eyes. The unpatched cabin door burst suddenly in at night; the sleeping man overpowered in his bed by a dozen men upon him before he is well awake; the desperate struggle amidst excretions and yells; the sturdy form of the Kentuckian dragged at last beneath the tree, bound hand and foot, by men insane from strychnine-whisky, drunk abundantly for that very purpose; the rude cabin plundered and fired behind its owner; the sublime bearing of the man, as of Another Man in like situation before him; the rope hurriedly fixed around the sturdy throat under the bushy beard to stop his words before they can move them from their purpose.

A kind of paralysis is upon the two friends as they sit, and grow years older as they gaze. They are liable to the same death at any instant as he.

Yet, let the plain truth be told, they were less distressed than you would have been if you live any where in the civilized world outside the

THE LOBBY OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES AT WASHINGTON

OPINION DURING THE PASSAGE OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL.

A BLUSH.

Is a blush doth a tell-tale appear
That speaks to the eye, quite as plain
As language to the ear, can convey to the ear,
So a tender confession of pleasure or pain;
What thoughts we should never impart,
What secrets we never should speak,
If the fountain of truth in the heart
Did not rise in a blush to the cheek.
As the blossom of spring on the bough
Is promise of fruits yet unseen,
So the color that mantles thy beauty just now
May be but prophetic of hopes but yet green.
How vain is each delicate art
Of concealment, when nature would speak,
And the fountain of truth in the heart
Will arise in a blush to the cheek!

EM.

Ben had waited there all night. The three roads stretching their three ways before her were powdered with a light, dry snow, which the wind, as it howled along, scooped and tossed in her face. Over her the cold sky of the February night looked near and solemn. The tall pine might be landmark or rendezvous. It was dead to the top, where some scraggy tufts which had sifted the snow cropped out. Heaven knows how she dared stay, little, tired, scared, babyish thing that the daylight showed her. And more than that, Marston Goss was hardly the man whose wife might be keeping appointments with other men at any time, let alone in the dead night, out in the open country in this rain-riddled country, and with one too. But if it had been with the Angel Gabriel it wouldn't have altered the matter in Colonel Goss's eyes, I suspect; and though it could, poor little Em had no thought of justifying herself by explanations; so it's hard to tell where the courage that kept her there came from. She was not glad either to have the dull, lanky dawn break. The darkness had been terrible, but then it concealed her. And the mysterious chipping and cracking, which always begins in the woods with day, were worse than the stillness, every air tightening her nerves to the snapping point. She tried to take her mind from the longed-for meeting, realizing what she was risking. Colonel Goss was likely to return any minute from his morning excursion—to come by one of the very oads before her and find her there; or, which was far better, some of the servants must presently discover her absence from home. She faced these facts in a sort of stupor, making up no excuses nor defending herself with any sense of her innocence, but merely staring dully at probabilities and their results. Uncle Ben, she recollected, was to tote wood that day. He would be along soon, and, like the rest of Colonel Goss's servants, severity had made him too cringing and crafty not to be glad of a spy's earnings. She started a step forward, fancying she had heard the old man's voice shouting to his ox along with the ruck of the crisp morning air. Her head was tired and confused; all the freshness and color gone from her pretty face; her lips dry and grayish, and her violet eyes filled with reckless fright. A lot of paper was crumpled in her feverish little hands: that she had not once let go of since the marble woman—who had come with some fowls and eggs and insisted upon seeing Mrs. Goss the afternoon before—had slipped it, upon some pretense or other, into her work-stand drawer. She smoothed it out now and read it over: "I must see you, Em, a moment. Some time to-night by the old pine-tree at the cross-roads." There was nothing more, and, for that matter, no need of more. She asked no explanations of Stephanie. She was not afraid to do any thing in the world he told her to; and it would be worth a good deal more than she'd give through yet to see him again. The very sight of the words he had scrawled made her feel heavier. She straightened herself with a look of determination—so much like the determination of a boy—stamped her teeny-tweeny feet (teeny-tweeny was what they called her half the time at home), folded her thick shawl tighter, and began searching the lengths of the three roads, taking them in order, beginning at the left: that was the railroad, a single track, level and direct as it cut the red clay bank; next the old pike, wandering away as Virginia pikes do, and off to the right the new military road, flanked by the alashed oaks. Up and down their lengths, in the cold faint light—nothing. But even the looking relieved the dreary thump-thump of the minutes through the dark. Daylight broadened. Now and then her heart quivered and bounded at something she saw. When the something turned out to be a stump, or possibly a dog, her heart had nothing to do but sink again and keep still. It got to be near seven o'clock. She was very tired. Even the strength of excitement was expending itself, and a dreamy kind of delirium began to gain upon her. She was positive that the wheels of Uncle Ben's cart were crossing along over the hard, rough ground, when it was nothing in the world but a woodpecker; she fancied her husband had suddenly come upon her, and at that she screamed out with terror; then she wandered, childishly, what would be done to her if she were found out. She was nothing but a child any way. Not yet twenty, and married to a man who had lived his forty years like a Tartar kral upon his thousand acres, at the head of his hundred slaves; treating submission like an astro-sphere, gorging himself with d spotted rules, and, naturally enough then, suspecting every one around him, even the little wife he had bought two years before for one west of the Kanawha, to be mistress of Marston Manor. She had wanted to love him; but he didn't understand that. Her trifling vexed him, and he showed it, and she was shy and timid, and went away from him to make beautiful pictures out of her simple past, and to live in them instead of in her present. Marston Goss understood this even less than the other. That was why he began to suspect her. Covering there, close to the dead tree, sick with watching and disappointment and fright, she felt his eyes—stern, unmerciful eyes, whose looks alivered her soul. She was dirty and it grew dark. She groped for something to hold by. Her limbs were yielding—sinking. "Em!" Ah! So sudden! It was not true! The blood rushed through her veins. Life came in hysteric gasps. She was sobbing in his arms, dashing the blur of tears away that she could look into his eyes. He was her twin brother, you see, and they had been separated ever since her marriage. "Oh, Stephanie!" "Darling! You have waited here alone?" "It was nothing, Stephanie," in earnest, choking tones, to assure him that there was no harm in what he had asked of her. "You can't tell, Em, what I have suffered"—starting and stopping to look at her wan face. "I got my message to you privately, for I didn't know how Marston might feel about"—touching his uniform—"about having a Federal soldier visiting him"—with infinite tenderness, not to wound her, and a look of inquiry, half expecting she would contradict him for her husband. He hadn't believed in his soul that any man would close his doors upon his wife's own brother. She gave no sign, only a little shiver. "After I sent the note, dearie, we unexpectedly met quite a force of them at the junction." "Yes; he is there," she said. "And there was some fighting about dusk; but no one hurt"—seeing how anxious she looked, and not understanding. "Then I was detailed to carry some orders"—putting his hand with a boy's sense of importance upon his breast pocket, bulky with papers. "And twice after I'd started I was recalled, and the programme changed. Why, I thought I should die with impatience, little one. It's been the hardest night's service I've ever seen." "It was nothing, Stephanie," she said again, very faintly, very contentedly, clinging to him in happy dependence, taking his words in hungrily, caring less, after all, for the words than for the tone. "Little kitten," he said, trying to strip his voice of the shock he felt at seeing her so changed as she was; smoothing her white cheek with one finger of his great gauntleted hand—"to think how we twins hardly breathed apart till you were married, and then never to see one another for two whole years! Why, it wasn't the fair thing at all, baby"—making his voice gay to stop its quivering. "We never should have let you go—should we?" She lay very quiet now in his arms, thriving by breaths on his fondling. She needed so to be loved—so much more than stronger women need it! "You never can know how we've missed you, Em," he said. "And then the war, Stephanie"—in her pitying, complaining, little tones—"I could have gone back, you know, if it hadn't been for the war"—with such quiet submission—a whole volume of disappointment and longing clasped in her half-complaint. "Yes," he said, a little gloomily, diverted from her for the moment by the thoughts her words raised—the weary old war-thoughts—"I think it was harder for me to take up arms against Marston's side—your husband—almost like you, yourself, Em—even than going against old Virginia!"—with contracted lines around his mouth. "Yes, Stephanie." She didn't comprehend much about it in the main. She was too near for its proportions and perspective to be plain. Right there, pressed by the confusion of events; the corn growing green over the acres before her eyes one day—trampled and ruined the next; the dim blue hills bared by cannon smoke, and then left clear; sudden sweeps of greedy guests, going as suddenly, their noiseless line trailing a steel-like glitter, winding through the pass—not much else, but there, that she could understand, except the fury of her husband's hate for the "other side," shown in gusts of rage or savage exaltation—all stirred with a keen, shuddering horror. These were what she meant when she said "the war." Her arms were twisted about one of Stephanie's, so big and clumsy in the blue felt over-coat sleeve, clinging to him as though she could detail the moments and him together; so happy, so very happy, just to see him, trying to begin to think of all the things she meant to say. And then? She cried out, wrenching herself from him wildly; erect, her hood fallen back, letting her long hair loose to the wind; her lips parted, some quick fumes of spirit burning itself out within her; her eyes full of horror. Stephanie's hand was on the pistols in his belt. He sprang about, facing the way her eyes were fixed. And all that way—a good pistol shot—he could feel the mad glitter of Marston Goss's face as he lowered it to his leveled revolver, his black horse curbed, quivering, to his haunches; his hand and will paralyzed by his recognition of his wife, fixed there, in the sharp, gray morning air, like mottled basalt. She raised her hands slowly, mechanically, as a person mesmerized, and put them up protectively before her brother, never turning her eyes one moment from her husband; then slowly, with a mechanical instinct, she laid them upon him, pushing him with the fierce strength of decision, with the impulse of a dumb, dominant will, toward where, near by, his horse was tied. "Go!" she stammered. He understood then, and regained himself. "What—Em—to leave you so?" with cool indignation. "Don't you see? It is he. I am safe," she interrupted, in a still, frozen voice, her eyes ever faltering, her form swaying—keeping unconsciously within the fierce strength of decision, with the impulse of a dumb, dominant will, toward where, near by, his horse was tied. "No matter for that, Colonel, only see you serve us up some live Yankees when the time comes," came ringing back. They were out of hearing. Then out of sight. She battered against the door with her small fists, shook the window, frantic with helplessness and fear. By-and-by a misty insensibility came quietly over her. She felt that the room was quite dark. She tried to pray to God. She thought she would go and kneel down by her bed, as she always did at night. But then the air was swarming with eyes, and as she tried to walk the weaker ones down on the floor groaned and spat at her for treading on them—though she tried to step so lightly. And tugging themselves angrily about her feet they tripped her and she fell down among them. Time went away. Some time it was light, some time dark. All the while they crowded her and jumped about on her so she had no chance to get up, it seemed to her that her skin shriveled and shrank from the bones and her joints crumbled apart. Her soul, too, beat about within her, as if seeking release. But once she came to herself, and found the machine streaming into the chamber, and every thing still. She got up from the floor and cried a great deal with weakness and thankfulness first. She thought a long time must have passed, for the snow was gone, the air mild, and from the window she saw patches of greenish grass. But it was all just as lonely as before. No sign of life—no sound. She knew that the sun was in the west, that the day would go soon. She went steadily to work to get out. The room was in a sort of tower with one narrow, mullioned window. She broke that away desperately. Afterward she knotted the bed-spreads, fastened one end in the room, the other about her waist. It seemed quite simple. She wondered, weakly, that she had not done this at first. Then she poised herself on the window-ledge, shuddered a minute, and, clinging as long as possible with her hands to the sill, dropped. The rope spun about with her weight, and her head struck. One arm grazed the bricks, and hung limp and helpless. In the end she was swinging dizzily a foot or so from the ground, unable to loosen the knot about her waist, with a choking, suffocating sense, watching the whirling world grow black around her, spinning in a vortex of fragments, and sensible of dissociation. "Little Em—" "Are you in Heaven too, Stephanie?"—dreamily—rather gladly. "Open your eyes, darling"—his sobe choking him. The waxy lids lifted heavily. "Why, this is home!"—with babyish wonderment and a quiet sigh—the eyes wandering wearily from the white bed curtains over the blue chairs, the girl's books and toys and the rest. He was trying to brush them out of his eyes—those big, weak tears. The mother was crying softly, uncontrolably, and it was left for him to tell her. "You have been very ill, dearie." She thought for a minute; the tired lids dropping again, but with no agitation as the recollection of it all came back to her. "Did Marston find me?" speaking quite slowly. "I did, darling;" pausing then, hardly knowing how to tell her the rest. "Oh yes! he was away at the bridge"—passively, with little interest. "He was hurt there," Stephanie said, holding his breath. "Is he here now?" startled, opening her eyes a little, quickly. "No, dear; he was hurt, I told you—badly hurt." She thought about it, with no emotion in her face. "Oh yes. He is dead, I suppose." Her spathy face took her heart. "That was why he didn't let me out," she added, with a faint kind of satisfaction in her tone. They looked at one another, and thought she was wandering again. "When I heard about Marston," Stephanie said, "I went to the General, and told him that you must be there alone, and all about it, and he gave me leave to go to you." Her thoughts had gone back. "Yes, it was a long time," she said, placidly. "It was two days since Marston had left you"—breaking down, with great sobe—"my poor darling"—falling on his knees beside the bed, and burying his face. "Little daughter must rest now," came the mother's voice, unsteady and full. She unfolded the two pale hands and held them out, opening the hollow, tender eyes, saying in her little patient, plying way, "I'll go to sleep a little while, mother." They held her hands with pressures of passionate agony, mother and brother; hushing their sobe, holding back their anguish, not to disturb her. It was a little while—only a little while. The sleep was not strong enough to keep her. The sobe were not loud enough to rouse her. She did not wake up to them again. Last summer I crossed the bridge that the rebels held, in spite of all, that night in February, 1862, and went up the road winding over the mountain to Marston Manor. There is neither claret nor hair to the house now. The trumpet flowers flourished in that broken Gothic window; red and white roses grew above the desolation and decay. The servants, whom Colonel Goss sent off to Lynchburg the day he left his wife a prisoner, had come back, neither invited nor hindered, and settled themselves deliberately upon the acres. "And I reckon dey'll let me raise all de meat I wants for my little pone, off de ole place?" Uncle Ben said to us, in interrogative and rather sneaky accents, with his cap in his hand, leaning upon his hoe. "But, Uncle, don't you want something more than corn meal enough to keep you alive?" I asked, experimentally. "You are a free man now, and ought to be thinking of laying by something for old age." "Ole age," with a stampy chuckle, feeling of 't is gray poll. "Yes, I see free men now, breed: I don't an' I've tired scuffin' around like a nigger. Might as well keep on scuffin' for ole massa. Twere'n easy, dat," with another low laugh. "He was a hard master, then?" I asked.

Colonel Goss had given his horse the reins, and was coming toward them. Em was powerless to explain, but she knew how they hunted their prey, how they never spared one! A hard hand seemed to have fastened around her throat. If she could only tell him what she had seen—the tattered rags of those blue felt coats that had swung from the trees; one last winter, this year another—almost in sight of Marston Manor! Spies, they had said. But she knew! If she could only tell him! Colonel Goss did not fire yet. He was waiting to see. Her voice came to her—harsh, dry, as though the very organs were splitting. "He would, Stephanie"—the name ending in a hysterical scream—"and"—pointing to the papers he carried—"your life isn't your own"—wildly, not the woman to be so stirred by any patriotic impulse, but snatching the argument whose thrust would move her brother—"until you've done your errand." Stephanie started. This was true. The very time he had used for his own was a theft. He remembered he was a soldier. These papers—they would be invaluable to Colonel Goss! And she was telling him that his kinship would not protect him! There was no time to think of any thing but his duty, hardly to realize how he had periled that, or to remember that there was no cowardice like failing in it. He reeled into his saddle, buried the spurs in his mare. He had still some yards the start, and, unless Marston fired— Colonel Goss was paralyzed. He looked from the man riding away to the woman who had flung herself under his horse's feet with bewilderment. Then with an oath—a leap in his saddle as if sense came back—he fired, recklessly, another barrel—another. His horse was jaded out. He had ridden him too hard to think of pursuit with him. He dismounted, his face grim and rigid, lifted his wife into the saddle—dinging the weight of his arm over her—and, leading the horse, strode horns across his fenceless fields. He was not prone to either pretense or preliminaries. He was, moreover, as contemptuous, practically, as he was chivalrous theoretically, toward women; and would at any time have given one of his troopers an order in a more conditional tone than he would have made a request of his wife. A great share of the shock he had experienced was from amazement. He had no possible data for inferring the truth—not a man of inference any way. He lifted his wife from the horse, flung her across his shoulder, and carried her to her room. Then, his arms folded, benumbed, virile, six-footed, implacable. "Mrs. Goss," he said, clearly, "I wish the man's name." Half lifeless she had still an instinct left her. She knew that Stephanie was safe only so long as she held her husband from action. Some of his troop must be near. There were fresh horses in the barn; there were short cuts across country as familiar as the chambers in the Manor. And the boy, with the papers he carried, would only count for another Yankee out of the way in the reckoning of Colonel Goss. "I will tell you very soon, Marston," she faltered out. He looked at her with speechless wonder. Mother, nor sister, nor wife had ever said will to Marston Goss before. "You will tell me soon?" he repeated, with slow irony; "why, woman, his rage belching out, the blood curdling with his fierce passion in his veins, "you will tell me now—here—in your next breath—or you will never tell me!" "Ah," she said, pitiously, spreading her little thin palms before her face, "you will not mind at all, Marston, when you know—" He looked at her again with the same surprise. Then, with no more words, went with great strides out of the room, shutting the door loudly, fastening it from without, and wrenching away the key. A few minutes later Em heard the click of Brown Ben's heels as he leaped like a hare over the frozen ground along the road Stephanie had taken. She waited—waited all day. Nothing happened. No one came. At times, with feeble, sickly excitement, she tried to get out of her prison. She shook the door with all her strength, raised her voice in cries which ended in husky gasps. No one came to her. The house was still as the grave; and she got faint with fright and hunger, alone there in the cold, dreary room. Toward dusk, bundled in her great shawl, her little face pressed close to the window, she heard horses coming, and her courage revived. She saw her husband soon, a good many men with him. They were stained and drooping. Their heavy steps and clanking saleres went to and fro, the noise shot with lead words, shivered glasses, and oaths. But no one came to her. She watched desperately. Pretty soon she heard them begin to remount, curbing their restive horses, waiting for the Colonel; talking about a battery that was expected; about a bridge to be held. Then Colonel Goss came out. She saw him tighten the strap of his spur—conscious of a kind of wanderment even at that time for him. When he put his foot in the stirrup and she understood that she was to be left alone again, she sprang up, almost frantic, called and prayed to him with wild shrieks, and pressed her hands to her head, listening for an answer. She heard his voice: "I regret, gentlemen, that we must postpone our supper till morning." They struck a gallop. "No matter for that, Colonel, only see you serve us up some live Yankees when the time comes," came ringing back. They were out of hearing. Then out of sight. She battered against the door with her small fists, shook the window, frantic with helplessness and fear. By-and-by a misty insensibility came quietly over her. She felt that the room was quite dark. She tried to pray to God. She thought she would

He looked at me sharply, a little mistrustfully. Then, evidently relenting, "He was, massa—'clars tru to yer soul," he said, with rather incomprehensible exultation. "But we want to see you freed folks take hold suddenly in your new career," I persisted. Uncle Ben straightened himself with dignity, a little affronted, I think. He looked about him, at his patch of corn, row of collard sprouts, then down to his ragged trousers, and off to his shanty, against which a bacon-to-be was just then scratching his savory sides. And, as though the picture might teach its own lesson, he resumed his boozing in silence, remarking, with after-thought and merely by way of manners, "Yes, massa, so we does!"

KRAUFT'S WORLD BEWITCHED.

MR. KRAUFT, coming home after business hours, was told that a young woman was waiting to see him in the library, and going in with emotions of disgust for a young woman capable of calling on him before dinner, recognized in his visitor Ellen Tree.

Miss Tree was twenty-four or thereabouts, and wore a faded black bonnet. She was not pretty, though she had all the possibilities of beauty, because you can't make rounded outlines, sparkle, ease, roses, and smiles out of constant anxiety and bread and black tea. She was lady-like; that is, would have been, if her gown had not been tattered, dyed, and skimped, and her shawl as shabby as her hat; and she was a tenant of Mr. Krauft's, who instantly concluded that she came to ask some favor about rent or repairs, and as instantly decided to say no—the only way to manage these people in Mr. Krauft's opinion; but as a rule, when you ask favors, you are deprecating; now Miss Tree was not deprecating, though she stammered a little as she commenced:

"Mr. Krauft, you are a man of wealth and influence—"

"Yes, yes," struck in Krauft, bluffly, and facing Miss Tree in a bleak, unappreciative way. "All very fine! but if I have what you say, I get it for myself, mind you! I made my own way up from the bottom round, and never asked help of any one; and folks that mean to get on don't go about whining for help, in my opinion."

"Precisely why I apply to you," said Miss Tree, calmly; "because you have hewn out your way, I was certain that you could not help taking an interest in others who only ask the privilege of following your example."

Mr. Krauft expanded a little.

"Hum! Miss Tree! I—hum—ha! well—certainly: I am sure—if my example—"

"Mr. Krauft, was your early experience painful? Did you ever suffer hardship, or privation?" interrupted Miss Tree, abruptly, thereby preventing Mr. Krauft from giving away his pro-ter example.

"That I did," answered Krauft, promptly, though secretly wondering at what she was driving. "I have lived hard enough, and poor enough in my time. Why, I remember as if it was yesterday, when I came to the city a barefaced boy, and with only a dollar in my pocket; and when any body complains to me, I say to them, my friend, I have been through that mill, and you can't tell me any news. Do as I do; work your way out, you can't commence poorer than I did."

"Exactly," said Miss Tree, her face lighting. "That is all that I want, Mr. Krauft; leave to work my way out. You know, that though unmarried, I have a family depending on me; two little sisters and a paralytic mother. You are an inspector of the school of which I am principal, and my husband. You know what rent I pay, and that I receive a salary of four hundred dollars a year, and can guess, after deducting the rent, how much of it is left for fuel, food, shoes, clothes, and school-books."

"Four hundred dollars is a large salary for a young woman like you," observed Mr. Krauft, stiffly.

"The male principal in the same building, whose classes are ranked by mine, and who has neither more work nor more responsibility, receives exactly double—"

"But then it costs a woman less to live," interrupted Krauft, quickly.

Miss Tree smiled.

"Mr. Krauft, when I buy a ton of coal nobody charges me at a lower rate than you, because you are a wealthy man and I am a poor struggling woman. There is no discount on my mother's tea and sugar, or on my sister's shoes and books. I pay as much for car fare as a man. I pay you as much rent as does the man who occupies the other half of your house; and, setting that aside, if Mr. Edmund's work and responsibility is worth eight hundred dollars a year, is it not common justice to give me for exactly the same work, just as well performed, you yourself being the judge, and the same responsibilities, just as faithfully met, the same wages? What is it worth, in short—not what you think will enable me barely to squeeze through a rainy day; and granting that it does cost me less to live, suffer me to enjoy the privilege granted to every day-laborer, of storing his surplus earnings against a rainy day. If you, Mr. Krauft, and men like you, would exert that influence you have to do away with this crying evil, you would only show me, and thousands like me, simply justice; and yet this is not what drove me here to complain; but the hopelessness," and her voice sank; "the utter hopelessness of it, Mr. Krauft. By pinching and that means, never allowing ourselves food enough thoroughly to satisfy us, and fire enough entirely to warm us, we live; that is, we keep a roof over us, and get out the children's books and shoes, by edging every little while a little closer to starvation than usual; but, Mr. Krauft, when you faced people you were cutting your way through the forest, and every blow was a step nearer light. We cut down the day's difficulties with the certainty that each tomorrow will supply us with a racker and more obstinate growth. We can't get out as mat-terstand. Every year entangles us more thoroughly, and allows us less straw with which to make our brick—"

Up to this point Krauft had listened perforce, but with his indignation increasing at every sentence; and as Mr. Krauft was a large, calm person, whose very rages were cold, his indignation by this time was a sort of moral glacier which, now being in motion, came down on Miss Tree, warm and glowing with enthusiasm, and crushed her.

"Miss Tree, I am really, I may say, pained! shocked!! astonished!!! Why, massa, you are striking at the very roots of our social system. You, an instructress of the young. You are flying directly in the face of Providence; you—you—"

"Poor 'roots' and poor Providence!" slipped in Miss Tree while Mr. Krauft labored for the rest of his sentence. "Goodnight, Sir!" and went out. By that time Mr. Krauft's dinner had been served full five minutes, and Mr. Krauft sat down to it filled with spite.

"Confound the women!" he growled as he helped himself to salience; "and confound all reformers!" he growled again after his final glass of sherry. But what next? Did Mr. Krauft then take his hat and step out in the street? On that point Mr. Krauft himself is unable to depose with certainty. He only knows that he found himself walking in Broadway, and that a very curious change had passed upon him. The Mr. Krauft who drank the sherry was a large, prosperous, full-blown man. Mr. Krauft who crept along Broadway was a dwindled edition of himself, scantly dressed; and whereas he carried about with him habitually a sense of his own importance, like an air cushion, he was conscious of a novel timidity and a sorrowful, foreboding anxiety about something not yet defined. An equally remarkable alteration had taken place in the character of the Broadway crowd. It consisted of men and women, as before, but now it was the women who walked with a brisk air of business, and who stood easily in shop-doors and behind counters; the women who scoured you from hotel-steps, who discussed news and markets in narrow, down-town streets, and eyed favorably handsome, well-dressed young men walking modestly along on shopping expeditions, and only glancing about them from under their eyelashes, or passed worse-dressed and unattractive men like Mr. Krauft with cool indifference; and in some mysterious way Mr. Krauft understood that the roots of society had at last gone by the board; there had been a revolution; men had lost the reins of power; in short, men and women had changed places.

Then Mr. Krauft comprehended the timid anxiety that had taken the place of the old importance. His wife had died leaving her affairs much involved, and two helpless little boys for him to support. Mr. Krauft was in search of work; had been for the past week, and with the most discouraging results. The wages offered men by the various trades were very low.

"The market is already overcrowded," several stout red-faced viragos had told him snappishly. "We prefer female operatives as a rule, and there are hundreds of men eager to work for us at half the price, or at any price at all."

There was a moderate demand for coachmen and masons, but Mr. Krauft knew nothing of either craft. Women monopolized the trades and professions. It was found that they were more apt to learn, and more supple and dextrous; and where strength was wanting machinery did the work. Worse than that, the very fact that he was a man, and obliged to shift for himself, insured Mr. Krauft suspicion and coldness on all sides. It was expected that men would be comfortably maintained and provided for by their wives, and there was a general feeling abroad in society that it was not exactly becoming in a man to possess or use the qualities by which a woman made her way in the world, even when he was obliged to support himself like Mr. Krauft; and whenever any body pointed out the fact that a large number of women were unreasonable enough to die and leave their husbands without income or resources, and a large number of men were unreasonable enough to be so poor that they must work or starve, there arose a general clamor, and it turned out that the roots of society were in as much danger as ever they had been under the old regime. It was plain enough to Mr. Krauft that there was work enough for men and women both; that women monopolized many pursuits for which they were actually not as well adapted as men. Neither could Mr. Krauft see why it was not just as respectable for a man to labor as a woman; neither could Mr. Krauft understand why his two little sons, who would be forced to earn their own living, should be shut out from almost all the roads to competence, and restricted almost entirely to those in which they must delve all their days, with no hope of advance or improvement; neither could Mr. Krauft comprehend why Tom Krauft, his brother, received a salary of four hundred dollars in his capacity of book-keeper, while Miss Ellen Tree, in a similar capacity in the same establishment, received eight hundred dollars for precisely the same work; and yet if any rebellious man or generous woman raised his or her voice in protest, he or she would be not only by decision, thought Mr. Krauft, wearily, to himself, as he plodded up Broadway, looking with timid envy at the comfortable, assured, well-to-do woman forms that continually met and passed him.

Mr. Krauft was really very near despair. He had walked all the morning, and was hungry and weak. That did not matter, but his children were hungry also, and that is very disagreeable. You multiply the trouble in their poor little stomachs by your own paternal anxiety, and the result is too much for your philosophy. I had rather be hungry any time myself. So had Mr. Krauft, and how, he asked himself, could he go home and face the two little things, tucked up in the bed to keep them warm, with not even a loaf of bread? In fact he couldn't, and wouldn't go; and arriving at a desperate resolution and a pair of fine steps together, marched up and rang the bell. The mistress of the fine steps was an old acquaintance of Mr. Krauft's—a sharp little woman, who kept a boarding-house in those days, and was always trying and barely succeeding in making both ends meet; now a woman of great wealth and high standing in business circles.

At Mr. Krauft's ring appeared a lofty and scornful waitress, before whom he instantly became as nothing in his own eyes, and adhered him into the library, where Mrs. Manlius was busy over her papers—sharp as ever, but she had also grown stout upon it, and year sharp, stout people are very discouraging; and she looked at Mr. Krauft in a frosty, far-off way that chilled the eloquent and convincing speech he had prepared into a few incoherent sentences about want of work, destitution, etc.

"I made my way up from the bottom round," retorts Mrs. Manlius, mighty coolly. "So have hundreds of other women."

"Ay, but you don't afford us men an equal chance," said poor Krauft.

"Providence has not made you equal, and intends that you should depend on us," answered Mrs. Manlius, turning over her papers.

"Then why does Providence deprive us of our dependence, and oblige us to use our own faculties?"

"Can't tell, I am sure, my dear Sir"—frostier than ever. "Perhaps for the same reason that, years ago, made it possible for you, Mr. Krauft, then a poor boy, to acquire wealth and ease, and almost impossible for me, on the other hand, being a poor woman, to live at all. I remember that you, like other men, were tolerably well satisfied then with the dispensations of Providence. I see no reason why we should not now be equally well satisfied."

"Oh, Mrs. Manlius!" cried the voice of Ellen Tree, as that young lady emerged from a back and advanced to the light, rosy, sparkling, and beautiful. "You know that it was not a dispensation of Providence in either case, but a good-natured, ignorant selfishness on the part of the men, and now revengeful malice in the case of the women. And you know—you know, Mrs. Manlius—that there were men, plenty of them, who worked for us and with us; and that the majority of men refused help interest only where they did not properly understand our aims; and that the men who would knowingly oppress, cheat, or in any way injure women were few enough to be considered monstrous exceptions. Ignorance was so much the cause of our suffering as it was of those diseases once elevated into dispensations of Providence, and now known to be dispensations of fit; and oh, Mrs. Manlius! if, with increase of light, we deal more hardly with men than they have done with us, which is the most righteous?" cried Miss Tree, her eyes shining with pity for Mr. Krauft.

Teeth were rolling down that poor old creature's leathern cheeks, and there is no telling what she might not have said, in the extravagance of his gratitude, had he not at that recent found himself back at his own dinner-table, full-blown as ever. How Mr. Krauft got back he understands as little as how he came to be out, but he considers his vision as a warning. He has issued orders that Miss Tree is never again, on any pretext, to be admitted to his house, and he closes his eyes against all mention of agitation and reform in the woman-world as persistently as his doors against Miss Tree.

"Give them an inch, and who knows how many ells the creatures will take?" says Mr. Krauft.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

AN APRIL WIFE.

A Lay of the Hempstock.

April weather, foul and fine,
Rain and rainbow, shade and shine,
Fits us like a petticoat with,
Whose hunch temper plagues one's life;
When wild and leading March, in spite of you,
Has stilled into a mood most wild,
With worms she'd give a thrumming Yea,
Before she settles into May.

RAMON FRONCO EXTRAORDINAIRE.—Scottish papers say there is excellent sport on the East and the West. An Irish correspondent wants to know whether the "Tay East" salmon are caught ready boiled.

ENTRANCE ON A PHYSICIAN.—He survived all his patients.

UNLAWFUL MARRIAGE.—"Is there any person you would particularly wish me to marry?" said a widow respondent to her dying spouse, who had been somewhat of a tyrant in his day. "Marry the devil, if you like!" was the craft reply. "Oh no, my dear," rejoined the wife, "you know it is not lawful to marry two brothers."

An old lady once indignantly pointed to the "English in the Rosaire," and asked where one could be found addressed to the Presidents? This was equaled by an old negro Baptist at the South, who said to his master, a Methodist: "You've read the Bible, I s'pose?" "Yes." "Well, you've read it in it of one John the Baptist, hasn't you?" "Yes." "Well, you never saw nothing about no John the Baptist in the Bible, but there ain't no Methodist; and do Bible's on my side."

A very sentimental poet, seeing the garb of an old maid in a field, roared that he should like to send the little thing as a present to his deceased Matilda. "Do," replied one of his companions, "and be a piece of paper and ink, bearing this motto: 'When the you see, remember me.'"

Puzzles.

Great goodness residing in a little breast;
Great grief by low and little sins possessed;
A dwarf who fires and strains to touch the skies;
A giant whose whole work is killing flies;
A mountain flood to drown a starving woman;
An Armstrong gun to annihilate a lion;
An agnesian in answer to a sneeze;
A grave disease arrested by a jest;
A steersman angered by a cartilage;
A return who can not a squib endure;
A manoff driven frantic by a flea;
A poet wounded by a parody;
A woman's sleep disturbed by starfishes breath;
A good man's name by goodie talked to death—
All these are mysteries designed to be Proofs of the goodness of humanity.

GOOD NEWS FOR THE FORTUNALISTS.—In the English Army Estimates for this year a vote was voted for distributed Militia.

You can see it with East (and)—The following ingenious Bible enigmas is inserted under the commandments, in the chance of an old church in England:

Every one letter is wanting to make good English of it.

Thodore Hook was relating to his friend, Charles Matthews, how, on one occasion, when sitting in the company of Bowke, the latter surreptitiously removed from his plate several slices of tongue, and, offering to be very much annoyed by such practical joking, Hook concluded with the following question: "Now, Charles, what would you do to any body who treated you in such a manner?" "Do!" exclaimed Matthews; "why, if any man meddled with my tongue I'd lick him."

"Come, what do you suppose is the reason that the sun goes to the South in the winter?" "Well, I don't know, massa, unless he is started by the clamor of the North, and so an obliged to go to the South, where he experiences warmer longitudes."

A wee bit of a boy having been slightly chastised by his mother on a very quiet day in his chair for some time afterwards, he dozes thinking very profoundly. At last he speaks out thus: "Mamma, I wish you'd get another housekeeper—I've got tired of seeing you read."

Killing comes natural in Ireland, for half the places begin with Kill. There is Killbeg (the all fishers are called begs); and, what is still more singular, there is a Killbetto; Killbama, after the husband; Killbarrack, after the English soldiers; Killbrow, for the way; Killbride for the English proprietors; Killbore, for the delicious number; Killbarn, if that's not enough; and last, though not least, Killpatrick.

Lord Chesterfield once remarked that even Adam, the first man, knew the value of politeness, and allowed Eve to have the first bite of the apple.

Red noses are light-knees to warm woggles on the sea of life off the coast of Malaga, Jamaica, Costa Rica, and Holland.

An Irish girl was ordered to bring the wash clothes on the horse to the kitchen in dry. Her mistress shortly after found a very good steady horse standing in the kitchen completely covered with the articles that had been washed that day. Upon interrogating the girl the reply was, "Oh, to be sure, he told me to hang the clothes upon the horse in the kitchen, and the horse is the kind, not I ever saw, sure."

Why is the human whistler like the Pope's southern?—Because it is a card's card's card's (an ecclesiastic).

"If an earthquake were to engulf England to-morrow," said Jerome, "the English would manage to meet and die somewhere among the rubbish, just to relieve the street."

An honest Philadelphia German got carried over an account of an old woman of a married woman, and exclaimed, "If my wife runs away with another man's wife, I will strike him out of her preacher, if she be none father, minister!"

Just Emma was trying to persuade little Edie to run to school, "You see, my dear, how the Bible shows us to go to school at that time." "Yes, ma'am," replied Edie, "but the old man always goes with them."

Byron had his hands full when he had this adventure: "I stood in Venice on the bridge of Rialto. A police and a prison on each hand."

WRITTEN AFTER GOING TO LAW.

The law, they say, great Nature's chain connects,
That causes ever most profuse effects,
As we behold reversed great Nature's laws—
All my chests lost by a single cause.

A German, being required to give a receipt he felt, after much mental effort protracted the following: "I have not, I wish to mean remark." John Shakespeare.

This world and the next resemble the east and west; you can see how near to one without turning your head on the other.

The greatest head is an ass; the greatest tail is an owl; the greatest fish is an eel; and the greatest man is a fool.

A man went to an insurance office in Paris and insured a quantity of cigars against fire. When they afterwards he made a claim on the company for reimbursement, the cigars having been burned. He admitted that he had smoked them, but claimed that, as they had been destroyed by fire, he was entitled to them for them. The parties went to law, and a verdict was given for the plaintiff, whereupon the defendant immediately threatened to indict the jury for perjury, for having said that he had smoked them. The company was only too glad to let the matter drop.

So DOWNYD BARTON—An injured old bird may learn.

Opportunism, like eggs, must be hatched when they are fresh.

A GRAMMATICIAN'S REMARKS.—"My dear friend, there are three things I very much wonder at. The first is, that children should be so foolish as to draw their teeth, and break up into fruit trees. I know down town; if they would let it alone it would fill itself. The second is, that men should be so foolish as to open a window, as to go to war and kill each other; if it were they would die themselves. And the third and last thing that I wonder at, is that young men should be so foolish as to go off to the young women; if they would stay at home, the young women would come after them."

What does should have been placed at the case of Eden after the expulsion—Adam's (the) Adam's (the) lot.

Dr. Foss was three days a good deal of disease. He was engaged in one evening to give a lady patient when he was more than half-dressed, and one of the things he was to do. On going to her room, and finding himself unable to reach the bed, he murmured:

"Frank, by Jove!"

Next morning, notwithstanding the circumstances, he was greatly vexed, and just as he was thinking what he should do, he should offer to the lady a letter was put in his hand. "The boy will know," said the lady, "and he had discovered the unfortunate condition in which she was when he had visited her, and the concerned him to keep the matter secret, in consideration of the lady's"—a hundred-dollar bill.

A general man is very rarely a poor man, and never a man of doubtful credit. His small accounts are his quality secret, and he never meets with difficulty in raising money to pay large demands. French debts included run credit, and when a man has but that he will find himself at the bottom of a bill he can not meet.

A GIVE MOVES you, an ARRIVAL—Come when you see fit, and bid when you choose.

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

My first is a riddle,
My second a crime,
If you meet with my whole
Look out for a lion.

Or,
Why is a poor cat most likely to guess a riddle?
Because it is a ready guess.

SCENE AT THE PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE ENTRANCE TO THE CAPITOL GROUNDS AT WASHINGTON ON THE DAILY ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.—[SKETCHED BY F. DIELMANN.]

OUTSIDE OF THE GALLERIES OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DURING THE PASSAGE OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR APRIL.

ALTHOUGH the weather is still occasionally bitingly cold, and we are visited at times by frosts of a night, the Parisian modistes are determined to force the spring forward, spite of nature itself. The windows of their establishments, indeed, may be compared to so many parterres of spring flowers. Velvet bonnets are fast disappearing, and in place of them we have chapeaux of white crepe and of rice and other fancy straws. A new shape just introduced, and one likely to become very popular, is a sort of compromise between the bonnet and the hat. It appears to be nothing more or less than a hat with a wide brim, compressed very much at the sides; in fact, a revival of the solidist pastoral bonnet in which both Reynolds and Galveston occasionally decked out their aristocratic beauties, and which we see covering the heads of the shepherdesses of Boucher and Lœngret. This new form of chapeau is made generally in white crepe or the finer sorts of fancy straws. The usual trimming is a wreath of either daisies or jessamine blossoms and leaves, or a wreath formed of Michaelmas daisies, with occasionally a brilliant-coated beetle or two at one side. Those made of fancy straw are bordered with some light-colored velvet—blue seems to be the favorite tint—with strings to match, and trimmed with either a bunch of wheat-ears on one side or a wreath of ivy-leaves, intertwined among which is a choice floraison, all being of the same material as the bonnet itself.

The Pamela bonnet, which the Espresso has now taken up, and which she rechristened the "chapeau Lamballe," is becoming very much worn. The peculiarity of this bonnet is, that it fits close to the lower part of the face—clashes it, as it were—which has a very pretty effect on the countenance of a well-rounded, youthful beauty, to whose perfect oval face it forms a charming frame, but which hardly suits those ladies of maturer years who depend so much upon and who so coyly tax the modiste's art. The chapeau Lantolle, as worn at the present moment, has few ornaments about it, and rarely any feathers, except a little tuft or so. It is now being made in white or pale lilac crapes, in preference to velvet, with, perhaps, a row or two both inside and out.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR APRIL, 1866.

ANTOINE PROBST, MURDERER OF THE DEARING FAMILY.
Photographed by CHARLES CORNELL, BOYD GALLERY, PHILADELPHIA, Pa.

For robes foulards are in great request, more particularly for morning and walking dresses.

The choice Beasmas, which took the Parisian world of fashion, as it were, by storm, still holds its sway, although it is quite certain that it will be impossible to adapt it, on account of its more or less heavy look, to the light and delicate chapeaux which promise to become the mode during the ensuing spring. It will, so doubt, however, retain the hold it has secured as an auxiliary to the coiffure. Formed of pearls, or of smaller, and intertwined round the neck, the hair being fastened behind with a touch of small rose-buds falling over the neck, it has a most graceful appearance.

Coiffures, as at present worn, are generally raised a good deal above the forehead, with a multitude of small curls. The chignon is becoming abandoned among the fair ones, with whom sets are again the mode. The great novelty in the way of nets is the "Coiffure Benoitte," which is covered over with artificial curls made of the glossiest and finest silk of all the various shades of the human hair, and which are occasionally powdered or fluffed over with small gold stars.

Stockings of bright and sombre colors, ornamented with clocks at the sides, or of a white cross-bar pattern, have recently been introduced. For evening dress stockings are of white silk, with clocks in gold or silver embroidery.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

- Fig. 1. Carriage Dress.—Robe of striped blue satin. Collar of blue velvet, with borders of mother-of-pearl, and trimmed with white silk fringe in imitation of feathers. Chapeau Jaune d'Am, in Italian straw, trimmed with black velvet, a white ostrich feather, and a chain Mezzera, formed of large links of straw passementerie.
- Fig. 2. Spring Dress for the Country.—Robe and cascade of light-green tulle, with ornaments in passementerie interlined with black velvet and lace. Chapeau Fantaisie, in light straw, with a garland of leaves, and trimmed with straw-colored ribbon.
- Fig. 3. Robe de Chambre.—Robe and cascade of coarse grey silk, striped black and white; a bouquet, which is fastened to the belt. Forms the coiffure; pockets or Cherise VI. The trimming is of silk fringe, except at the bottom of the dress, where it is composed of a large cord. The chapeau made expressly for her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales is of rice straw, with a tulle in white netting trimmed with ribbon of white satin bordered with blonde. On the left is a white rose covered with scarlet.
- Fig. 4. Evening Dress.—The habit is of brown cloth.

ANTOINE PROBST, THE DEARING MURDERER.

On Saturday, April 7, a murder of the most atrocious character was perpetrated by ANTOINE PROBST, whose portrait we give on this page. The Philadelphia Ledger of April 11 gives the following account:

The victims were CHRISTOPHER DEARING, a driver, his wife, his four children, and his niece, a young woman about twenty-five years old. Mr. Dearing occupied a farm on Jones lane, some distance from the Point-House Road, belonging to Mr. YOUNGSON MITCHELL, of Philadelphia. He had lived there for several years, and had been a resident of the neighborhood for twelve or fifteen years. Besides his own family he had a hired man living with him, a German, whose name is not given; the residents themselves could give; also a black, called CONSELIER, some twenty years old, who was bound to Mr. Dearing, and had been with him seven or eight years.

The last seen of Mr. DEARING alive was on Saturday last, when he came to the city on business, and called upon Mr. MITCHELL, his landlord. After unloading his business he seems to have made a purchase of some meat, which was found in his wagon, and to have driven to his house with his niece, before referred to, who had been conveyed to the Second District Police Station, and from there, by telegraph, to the Central Station. Chief REYNOLDS and FRANCIS at once repaired to the scene of the tragedy, with high-constable CLARK and several other detective officers. GOMER TAYLOR also was soon at the farm, but before he arrived the other bodies had been found in a corner attached to the barn, the mother and four children all lying together, and all, as Mr. DEARING and place were, with their throats cut and their bodies extended under a pile of hay. The mother had, in addition, the top of her head crushed in. Probably a more shocking sight was never seen than the mother and her murdered children after they had been removed from the crib. One of the children was a mere babe, less than two years old, whose innocent face was sufficient, one would have thought, to have moved even the brutal murderer's heart to pity. The victims, with their ages, are as follows: CHRISTOPHER DEARING, 40 years; JULIA, his wife, 35 years; SARAHANN DOLLAN, the niece, 15 years; JOHN DEARING, 5 years; THOMAS DEARING, 4 years; ANNA DEARING, 4 years; EMILY DEARING, 2 years.

The eldest child, WILLIAM DEARING, was residing a few days with his grandfather, WILLIAM DEARING, in West Philadelphia. Had he been home there can not be a doubt but that he would have shared the fate of the other members of the family.

The fact that two members of the household—Probst, a hired man, and the boy CONSELIER—were missing directed suspicion toward them. It was not long, however, before CONSELIER was found to have been murdered also.

On the 12th Probst was captured in West Market Street. The prisoner was searched, and two rings were found on his fingers and a purse in one of his pockets. This was afterward identified as one that had belonged to Mrs. DEARING. Probst had on also some of DEARING's clothes. The confession made by the prisoner was to the following effect:

He said that he had only killed CONSELIER, and that the DEARING family were murdered by a German. His accomplice he called JACOB GAUNTER. The agreement was that all were to be knocked in the head with an axe, and then their throats cut. GAUNTER slept in the barn on Friday night, and on Saturday morning Probst, according to agreement, got the boy near the hay-rick and killed him with the axe. In the mean time GAUNTER was preparing for his bloody work. Probst went to the house and told Mrs. DEARING that a man was at the barn and desired work, and wished her to go to him and show him what to do. She accordingly went, and was there murdered by GAUNTER. The children, except the baby, were then sent one after the other to the barn, and there dispatched by GAUNTER, after which he took the baby from the cradle, and after taking it to the barn killed it.

At one o'clock on the same day Mr. DEARING returned to his home, in company with his niece, and at this time the prisoner and GAUNTER were in the house. Mr. DEARING and his niece were killed on the spot, and their bodies carried to the barn.

The prisoner showed no signs of emotion, spoke freely to such of the officers of the prison as asked him questions, and, when dinner was served to him, he ate somewhat voraciously. He was formerly from Brooklyn. He is five feet eleven inches high, twenty-five or twenty-eight years of age, round shoulders, no side-whiskers, light hair, a short, thin, light moustache, inclined to curl at the ends, has a downcast look, and weighs 175 or 180 pounds. He is loosely made, and has a sturdy gait. He seems to be entirely destitute of feeling; and with the exception of a trifling sum of money, which might have been obtained with far less violence, no motive can be found sufficient to explain this wholesale massacre.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

A recent acceptance of courteous attention in our public-conveyances is the exception not the rule. Many individuals seem to fancy that because they are "ladies" they must receive every thing, and give nothing in way of politeness. The French, characteristically, have a more beautiful way of making themselves attractive. We by no means think that a gentleman is in duty bound always to be jumping up to give his seat to the man to follow him. It may be, as not half so good as he himself is. Nevertheless the courtesy is a very pleasant one; and looking on can't help feeling indignant when a stolid lady coolly takes possession of a seat vacated for her without a word or look of thanks. Yet so common is this done that it is really refreshing occasionally to see another style of conduct.

The other day, as a young lady stepped into a crowded car a gentleman rose and offered his seat. "No, thank you," said the lady, "I am only going a few blocks." But the gentleman's gallantry increased, and at a second invitation she took the proffered seat with a pleasant recognition of the attention. But the original possessor of the seat evidently regarded her as an anomaly, and as he stood near her, apparently very contented so to stand, he looked very much as if he wished it were etiquette to cultivate a further acquaintance.

Not long since a lady entered a car so crowded that no attempt was made to give her a seat until, presently, a gentleman, rising to leave the car, offered her the place he had occupied. Instead, however, of taking it herself, she turned kindly to a weary-looking man who stood near her, holding a heavy bag, saying: "You take this seat, you have a child to hold." She remained standing, while the somewhat surprised girl took the seat. But with so much quiet grace was this little politeness offered that it was a real pleasure to witness it. We should like to have a similar pleasure often.

There is no lack of houses in the market although May is closing on apace. Landlords, who fancied that they held the world—of New York city—between thumb and finger, have relaxed their grasp; and despite all their efforts there is a reasonable probability that the majority of our citizens will still have a roof to shelter them! Housekeepers are already taking time by the forelock and planning about the packing of their Lanes and Penates, while they anxiously wish the dread ordeal of moving were over.

Speaking of moving day reminds us of an item which appears in a recent English journal. It is this:

"We believe it is no longer a secret that the title of the poem on which, as we mentioned some weeks since, the Post Laureate is at work, is 'The Death of Lucretia.'"

Now we are sorry that there should be any misapprehension in regard to what Tennyson is actually writing. And we will relieve any anxiety our readers may feel about the matter by whispering the assurance that, "regardless of expense," we have secured the "author's autograph sheets," and can unhesitatingly affirm that whatever wrong impression exists in regard to the title, is due merely to the circumstance that the poem refers to the Departure of Lucretia—from her home,—a subject alluded to in a ballad sung by Mrs. Lucretia, about six o'clock, on the evening of April 30, 1866. We give it as follows:

TO-MORROW'S THE FIRST OF MAY.
A MOVING BALLAD.
Anon.—London and America.

You must wake and call me early, call me early, husband dear,
To-morrow 'll be the maddest time of all the round New-Year;

Of all the circles of the year the maddest, maddest day,
For to-morrow's the First of May, my love, to-morrow's the First of May.

I sleep so sound all night, my dear, that I shall never wake,
If you do not call me loud, when the day begins to break;

But there are other things will break, I guess, besides the day,
For to-morrow's the First of May, my love, to-morrow's the First of May.

There's many a fine house, they say, but there's none so bright as this;
We've made a nice arrangement here, which we shall surely miss:

These pleasant rooms, the balcony, the trees around the door;
When we moved in there was but one—we planted seven more.

The honey-suckle round the porch has woven its wavy bowers,
And in the garden we have reared a bright army of flowers;

But though we've loved our home so well, we've got to move away,
For to-morrow's the First of May, my love, to-morrow's the First of May.

Our carpets they must all come up, our pictures all come down;
If you'll uncase the looking-glass, I'll wrap it in my gown.

The books I'll leave for you to pack—be careful they're not lost;
The chandelier may go by cart, the globe should go by post.

We sure and take the hammer road—we shall have need of that;
Save all the paper you can find—and don't forget the cat.

Don't mix the pickles and preserves, nor throw the old brooms away,
For to-morrow's the First of May, my love, to-morrow's the First of May.

And oh! tell Bridget, husband, to be careful how she moves
The earthen-ware and crockery, and other things she loves;

And if upon the sidewalk you should hear a dreadful crash,
You'll know our china disaster has gone to eternal crash.

Of course some common things will break, some costly ones perhaps,
But you can't expect to move, you know, without a few mishaps.

And when we've got the moving done you'll have some bills to pay,
For to-morrow's the First of May, my love, to-morrow's the First of May.

The night winds come and go, my dear, along the vacant street,
And the happy stars above them do not seem to mean to cheat;

But to-morrow it will be sure to rain the whole of the moving day,
For to-morrow's the First of May, my love, to-morrow's the First of May.

So you must wake and call me early—call me early, husband dear,
To-morrow 'll be the maddest time of all the round New-Year;

To-morrow 'll be of all the year the maddest, maddest day,
For to-morrow's the First of May, my love, to-morrow's the First of May.

During the recent strike of the car drivers in this city, one of our daily journals in discussing upon the great discomfort and confusion which the whole city suffered in consequence, and the duty of the railroad companies to stand against such strikes, remarked that, "Under no other government on the face of the earth would such conduct be permitted." This was in allusion to the business of the railroad company being conducted without sufficient regard to the convenience of the public. Consequently it was not so surprising that one of these carmen says the Englishman, lately imported, who had been waiting for some time outside the Carriacava for a Fourth Avenue car was puzzled. Not that, after some time, his indignation at the delay burst forth, as he remarked to a gentleman close by, "Well, by Jove, if this bin't a horrid rag. Why, 'ave you no 'emera, her 'acks, her 'aivel-boots? You know bin 'ilforded you can go 'anywhere you like for 'alf a dollar, you know." Here he discovered that those around were laughing at him, and, with a look of scorn, he re-entered the hotel.

The public recognition of the New England Church of this city, which took place, with appropriate services, last week on Thursday evening, was an event of interest to many, as the crowded house testified. As there has hitherto been, in reality, but one Congregational Church in this city—the Broadway Tabernacle—the need of another has long been apparent. On the occasion referred to, the sermon, by Rev. H. W. Beecher, was characteristically full of rich thought and feeling. Rev. J. P. Thompson, of the Broadway Tabernacle, on behalf of the council of ministers, gave the "Right Hand of Fellowship" to the new church, with cordial assurances of sympathy and co-operation. Other clergymen took part in the exercises, and singing, both by the congregation and choir, was interspersed. Eighty-three individuals have become members of this young church. The church edifice, situated in Ferry-street, near the Sixth Avenue, is neat and tasteful, though unpretending in appearance.

The Boston Medical Journal wisely says:

"People who would avoid or prevent cholera should cultivate cleanliness, regularity of life and habits, cleanliness, abstemious exercise, temperance, and the avoidance of all excesses. When they have done their duty in providing for the care of the sick, having public parks, and abating public nuisances, they may safely dismiss their apprehensions."

Certainly no good ever results from excitement and agitation. There is great safety in cool, quiet, self-control, and judicious care. An exchange relates the following incident, from which we may, while we laugh over it, derive a very important moral:

"A friend of ours, who has been unfortunately enough to be taken down with the cholera, left his boarding-house very quietly and suddenly, as soon as the first symptoms of the disease began to manifest themselves, and took his quarters at the hospital. In order to allay the anxiety of his landlord so to his whereabouts, he sent him a note, stating that he 'was unwell and personal hostility toward the house, but that he did not wish to associate with the boarders.'"

"Fashion continues to change with an unobscuring changeability," remarks some cynical observer. "This week the ladies are wearing their dolls' bonnets and other people's hair. Next week it may be their dolls' hair and other ladies' bonnets." It is suggested that it is not at all improbable that it may yet be the fashion to dye the hair to match the color of dress. Thus a lady in the morning may appear with dark brown tresses, and in the evening dye them yellow to match her yellow silk. So when deep mourning was required the hair might be dyed black, and a streak or two of gray might surely be added where half-mourning was thought desirable. So also the fancy colors might be adopted—rose-pink, or sea-green hair would certainly be unique, and who knows but it would be a charming variety?

Not long since a lady was walking through one of the squares in London, with a long skirt trailing in the dust and dirt behind her. She swept magnificently past two stationers, one of whom observed to the other, "I say, that are home 'll require a lot of good-looking to-night." "Yes, and not be clean after all," replied the other. Comment is unnecessary.

The following item occurs in one of the latest London Journals:

THE FANTASTICAL COLOR.—Green dresses are very much the fashion on the Continent. Ladies will learn with much alarm that Professor Muschka and Dr. Lerk, of Prague, have analyzed a green dress worn at a ball in Vienna, and discovered that it contained no less than 2 oz. of arsenic.

There is an old saying that "Beddings brighten as they take their flight." This does not seem to be invariably correct, if the following anecdote be true:

A medical gentleman was addressed by his sick wife: "Oh, John! I shan't leave this bed alive!" "Fears yourself, Betty, and then'll please me," returned John, with great optimism. "I have been a good wife to you, John," pointed the dying woman. "Madam," Betty, smiling," responded the mother-of-John to Madam.

BERNARD'S COCOON.—No other preparation so exactly suits the various conditions of the human hair.
JOSEPH BERNARD & Co., Boston, Proprietors.

We clip the following from the Chicago Sunday Times of April 1:

UNITED STATES PRIZE CONCERT.—GIRTS OF ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS TO GERMANY.—The Society and honor of Messrs. WAGNER, BARNUM & Co. ought to be of themselves sufficient guarantee as to the reliability of the rare instruments which they set forth to subscribers to their great Prize Concert, on May 29, of this year. It is a prevailing characteristic among those who have set high hopes on drawing the big prize to cast suspicion against enterprises of this character, when they have failed to strike the lucky number. But were all that had ever been given creditable, they could not militate one iota against the known responsibility and honor which binds and guides the United States Prize Concert. Besides this, the number of prizes are so great and so valuable that a moderate profit alone would accrue to these gentlemen after the gifts are fairly distributed; for not less than one hundred thousand dollars in greenbacks are to be awarded to the fortunate, including one gift of thirty thousand dollars, one of ten thousand dollars, and a number of others of five thousand dollars, four thousand dollars, three thousand dollars, two thousand dollars, and other high figures—all in good currency. In addition to this twenty-three houses and lots, worth each from six hundred dollars to eleven thousand dollars, will be awarded to the holders of successful numbers. Besides all this there will be one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, ranging from six hundred-dollar prizes to a family costly Bible, making altogether one chance out of every four that a rich prize may be won.

The drawing will be done openly and above-board at Corby's Opera-House, in the presence of thousands, and under the superintendence and scrutiny of a committee whom the audience itself will select. Order and fair dealing, under the circumstances, are unassailable. At least one hundred subscribers will be made independently rich by the gifts they will get, and the rest of those who hold the successful numbers will receive handsome and valuable gifts.

The number and undoubted character of the references of Messrs. WAGNER, BARNUM & Co. give stability and reliability to their enterprise; and this prize concert is commended as a means of safe investment to those who desire an interest in any enterprise involving a small risk for the prospect of great gain. The proprietors promise also to donate to the Lancet and Declarer as much as finds two thousand dollars. Further details of this great enterprise may be found in an advertisement in another column.

EMILY. "What's Capital Punishment, Mamma?"
MASTER HARRY. "Why, being Locked up in the Pantry! I should consider it so!"

Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York,
(Two Doors from Wall.)

Collection made, with quick returns.
Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks,
Bonds, and Gold will receive our personal attention.

ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

MAGIC LANTERN
AND STEREOSCOPE.

We are now receiving the most comprehensive and daintly impregnated of glass views ever made to America, representing scenes and objects in nearly all European cities and countries. These views are specially selected and are adapted for the use of either the Stereoscope or the Stereoscope.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
511 Broadway,
2 doors south of the St. Nicholas Hotel.

POLLAK & SON Manufacture Manufacturers, 692 Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Pipes and Holders set to order and repaired. All goods warranted perfect. Send stamp for Circular. Pipes 44 to 850 each.

100 Photographs of Female Beauties sent postpaid for 25 cents. Address R. L. Fox, 34 Varick St., N. Y.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.

A new and original work,
with 125 Designs and Plans of Country Homes of moderate cost.
Price $1 50, postpaid.
GEN. E. & F. W. WOOD-
WARD, Publishers, No.
37 Park Row, New York.

Marvin's Patent
ALUM AND DRY PLASTER, FIRE AND BURGLAR
SAFES

Never lose their fire-proof qualities, corrode the iron, or mould their contents.
Eidboard and perfect safe for silverware.
MARVIN & CO.,
262 Broadway, New York.
121 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF
Revolvers, Rifles,
Muskets, and Carbines,
For the United States Service. Also
POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS,
REPEATING PISTOLS,
Rifle Cases, Revolving Rifles,
Rifle and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Moulds. Sold
by Gun Dealers and the Trade generally.
In these days of House-breaking and Robbery, every House, Store, Bank, and Office should have one of Remington's Revolvers.

Circulars containing cuts and description of our Arms
will be furnished upon application.

E. REMINGTON & SONS, Illon, N. Y.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS.
And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 68 Broadway.

Ladies & Gentlemen
TAKE YOUR OWN MEASURE AND SEND TO

E. A. BROOKS, JR.,
Importer and Manufacturer of
BOOTS, SHOES, &c.
575 Broadway, New York.

Directions for Measuring the Foot.

First. Place the foot upon a piece of paper and trace the outline of same with a pencil, which will give the length and spread of the foot, as shown in figure A.
Second. Make the following measurements, in inches and fractions, with tape measure, as shown in figure B, viz:

THIS HOUSE IS THE LARGEST IN THE CITY, AND WAS ESTABLISHED IN 1848.

CEDAR CAMPHOR

FOR HOARSE, RELIABLE CURE! FRAGRANT! Sold
by druggists every where.
HARRIS & CHAPMAN, Proprietors, Boston.

UNITED STATES PRIZE CONCERT, to be given at Crosby's Opera-House, Chicago, Illinois, May 25, 1866.
125,000 available Prizes, valued at $25,275 25, will be presented to ticket-holders, including $100,000 in Greenbacks. Number of tickets issued, 100,000; price, $1 each. This is the greatest inducement ever offered to the public, one ticket out of every four drawing a prize. The following Prizes are a few among the many to be drawn. (For full list, see circular.)

1st Grand Prize in Greenbacks	$30,000 00
2d Grand Prize in Greenbacks	20,000 00
3d Grand Prize, Horse and Lot	5,000 00
4th Grand Prize in Greenbacks	2,000 00
5th Grand Prize, Horse and Lot	5,000 00
6th Grand Prize in Greenbacks	2,000 00
7th Grand Prize in Greenbacks	5,000 00
8th to 12th Grand Prizes in Greenbacks, $1000 each	20,000 00
13th to 16th Grand Prizes in Greenbacks, $500 each	10,000 00
17th Grand Prize, Horse and Lot	5,000 00
18th to 21st Grand Prizes, Horses and Lots, $2,000 each	10,000 00
22d to 25th Grand Prizes, City Lots, $500 each	5,000 00
26d to 29th Grand Prizes, Greenbacks, $100 each	5,000 00
30th to 33rd Grand Prizes, Greenbacks, $50 each	1,000 00
34th to 115th Grand Prizes, Greenbacks, $50 each	5,000 00
116th to 119th Grand Prizes, Horses and Lots, $2000 each	5,000 00
120th to 124th Grand Prizes, valued at from $3 to $2000 each	254,275 25
Making a grand total of	$487,515 25

The drawing will take place after the concert, on the stage of the Opera-House, where 20,000 persons can witness it. A Committee will be appointed by the audience to superintend the same. All purchasers and agents will be supplied with current lists of drawings as soon as published. Tickets are for sale at the principal Hotels, Book and Music Stores in the city, and at our Office, 128 Dearborn Street; price $1 each; sent by mail on receipt of price and stamp for return postage.

Good and reliable Agents wanted in every city, town, and village in the United States, to whom great inducements are offered. Information required.
Special Terms and Club Rates.—Any party presenting a club of five or more names for tickets, and forwarding us the money for the same, will be allowed the following commission, viz.: We will send 5 tickets to one address for $4 50;
10 tickets to one address for $9 00; 20 tickets to one address for $17 50; 30 tickets to one address for $25 25; 40 tickets to one address for $33 00; 50 tickets to one address for $41 00; and 100 tickets to one address for $80 00.

In every case send the name and post-office address of each separate subscriber.
Money, by draft, post-office order, express, or in registered letters, may be sent at our risk.
All communications should be addressed to
WIGGINS, BRADFORD & CO.,
(Post-Office Drawer 2013.)
128 Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill.

The proprietors will donate to the Lincoln and Douglas Monument Fund $2000; also there will be $2000 reserved from the person drawing the $30,000 prize, for the same purpose.
Examiners.—Hon. H. S. Wilkinson, Ex-Governor of Minnesota; Hon. Geo. V. Lawrence, M.C., of Penn.; Hon. Alex.
Randall, Ex-Governor of Wis.; Hon. Wm. Montgomery, Ex-M.C., of Penn.; Hon. Major Dan. Mann, Ex-M.C., of Ind.; Hon. Ira J. Lacy, of Kansas; Hon. Wm. Leffingwell, Lyon, Iowa; Hon. Joseph Kees, of Chicago; Hon.
G. Ormsworth Smith, of Miss.; Jacob Farrow, Agt. M. S. R. R., Chicago, Ill.; M. Krueberg & Co., Importers of watches, Chicago; Mansell, White & Co., New Orleans, La.
N. B. Editors of country papers are authorized to act as our agents, and they will be allowed full commission on all tickets ordered whether for themselves or other parties who may order through them.
Proposals for inserting this advertisement are requested.

NATIONAL BANK PENS,
MANUFACTURED BY THE EMPIRE PEN CO.,
32 and 34 John St., New York.
For Sale by all Stationers.

Every variety of superior Steel Pens manufactured to order, and for sale by the Empire Pen Company.

WM. T. FRY & CO.,
Manufacturers of
FRY'S PATENT POCKET FLASKS,
Dressing-Cases,
POCKET-BOOKS, PORTFOLIOS, INKSTANDS, &c., 134 and 136 William St., New York.

Every traveler should carry one of Fry's Flasks. For sale at all the principal Drug, Hardware, Fancy Goods, and Sporting Houses in the United States.

ITCH. (WHEATON'S) ITCH.
Salt Rheum. OINTMENT Salt Rheum.
Will cure the Itch in 48 hours; also cures Salt Rheum,
Ulcers, Chilblains, and all Eruptions of the Skin. Price
50 cents. By sending 50 cents to WEEKS & POTTER,
Boston, Mass., it will be forwarded free by mail.
For sale by all Druggists.

FRENCH ARTIFICIAL EYES.

Largest stock in the United States, of best quality. All orders promptly answered.

GALE & BLOCH, Druggists,
202 Randolph St., Chicago, Ill.

REMOVAL.

WM. GALE, JR.,
LATE

WM. GALE & SON,
SILVERSMITHS,

487 BROADWAY, cor. Broome Street, New York,
Will remove about the 1st of May, temporarily, to 590 BROADWAY, Metropolitan Hotel,
while the premises

572 and 574 BROADWAY, Metropolitan Hotel,
(which will be ready in July.)
Are being prepared for permanent occupancy.

UNION ADAMS, HOSIER, GLOVER,

AND SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

TO LET.

The Four-Story Building, No. 11 Broad Street, 28 feet front. Possession 1st of May next. Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square.

Large Profits

Can be made by active men in the Freed Slave State Business. Complete outfit of tools and stock furnished
by M. J. METCALF & SON, 101 Union Street, Boston, Mass. Send for Price-List.

RAVEN & BACON'S

PIANO-FORTES.
(Established 1829.)

A full assortment of these instruments, which have been well known in the New York market for more than thirty years, constantly on hand. Pictorial circulars sent by mail.

Wareroom, No. 135 Grand Street, near
Broadway, New York.

50 PER-CENT SAVED
By Using

B. T. BARRY'S STAR YEAST POWDER. Light Bread, or any kind of Cake, may be made with this "Yeast Powder" in 15 minutes. No shortening is required when sweet milk is used. No. 64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

FOR PUBLIC EXHIBITIONS.
Stereoscopes, Magic Lanterns, and Dissolving Views, with pictures from all parts, and of every interesting subject, made by JAMES W. QUEEN & CO., 594 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.
Print and illustrated catalogue sent gratis.

WANTED.—EVERY BODY WANTS DR. GIL-BERT'S PILE INSTRUMENT: cures every case.
No pain. Relief in five minutes. Sold by druggists, and sent by mail. Price 25. Circulars free. Address J. T.
GILBERT & CO., 315 Broadway.

Send for Pamphlet.
JAMES W. TUPPES, 27 Charleston St., Boston, Mass.

Portable Steam Engines,
ERICSSON CALORIC ENGINES,
Pumps, Mills, &c., &c.
JAMES A. ROBINSON, 164 Duane St., New York.

200 A Month. Male or Female Agents wanted. Address, with stamp, F. E. Lockwood, Detroit, Mich.

TESTACHINE

It is the best Restorer for the Hair, also an excellent dressing. Invented by Dr. FOOT; manufactured by HEIN SKINNER & CO., Springfield, Mass.; and sold by DEMAZ BARNES & CO., New York.

MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY,
To be found on each box and each piece of GENUINE
MAGIC RUFFLE. All other goods of whatever name, not having this mark, are worthless imitations and infringements on the patents of the Magic Ruffle Company.
The GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLES are full six yards in each piece, are well made of the best material and give perfect satisfaction to consumers. Office of the Company
No. 35 Chambers Street, New York.

LOCKWOOD'S
(Licensed by the Union Paper Collar Company.)
MOULDED COLLARS,
The Trade supplied with all Styles and Sizes at 93 Reade Street, N. Y. & 255 South Third St., Phila.

Book

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. X.—No. 488.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 5, 1866.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

COLORED ORPHAN ASYLUM, MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE—A GROUP OF PORTRAITS SKETCHED FROM LIFE.—[See Page 133.]

50

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 5, 1866.

WHO SHALL DECIDE?

ONE remark in the testimony of Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS expresses exactly the absurdity and peril of the "Conservative" policy of reorganization. In reply to a direct question by Mr. BOUTWELL, Mr. STEPHENS said: "I do not think any of the States attempting to exercise it [the right of secession] thereby lost any of their rights under the Constitution as States when their people abandoned that attempt." In other words, when a State draws the sword against the Union and is vanquished, the moment she surrenders the sword the Union has lost the right to provide for its farther security without consulting the State that is still silent and sore with defeat. This doctrine is the very reverse of that adopted by the President in appointing Governors and prescribing conditions, and is opposed to the virtually unanimous resolution of the loyal citizens of the country. It airily regards the war as a friendly tussle, an exciting little episode; and some of the pleasant party at table having failed in cutting their neighbors' throats, the company will now all be reconciled, and the dinner go delightfully on.

Happily there is a common sense in human affairs which prevents men from following any theory to their own destruction. If this doctrine of Mr. STEPHENS's were to be gravely accepted as the rule of reorganization, he and his friends, who frankly confess that their views as to the right of the rebellion remain unchanged, finding that the present was an unpropitious moment for putting that right into operation, would still have succeeded in obtaining some seventeen additional representatives in Congress. Representation is based upon population. A large part of the population in certain States is reckoned not by its actual number but by three-fifths of it. Mr. STEPHENS and his friends take up arms to secede. During the struggle the United States restores that population to its actual numbers. "Well," cry Mr. STEPHENS and his friends, finding that they are going to the wall, "half a loaf is better than no bread. We aimed at the moon and missed it, but we have shot an owl. We stood at five, and we played for ten. We do not get it this best, but we have scored seven. Let us acquiesce." And he tranquilly proposes that eleven States, having failed to destroy the Union by a bloody war, shall be welcomed back to Congress with a largely-increased representation, and being there, shall help decide whether they will agree to any other measure.

His argument is one that has been frequently urged, and which has an apparent finality very agreeable to a superficial view. "The war," says Mr. STEPHENS, "on the part of the United States was to prevent secession. It succeeded. Consequently secession was prevented. Consequently the States are all in the Union. Consequently they have equal rights, and Georgia has the same claim to representation that New York has. If the population of Georgia has increased during the war, thereby increasing our representation, that is our good luck, but it is none of your business. Show me in the Constitution the power to keep out Georgia."

That is adroit; it shows the practiced politician, but it is not the question. The question is not Georgia, but the Union. The Union has been mortally imperiled by a conspiracy of which Georgia was a part. Georgia and the other Confederates having been vanquished in the field, the question is what further is necessary to secure the Union. And that is a question upon which Georgia can claim no voice whatsoever. The authority which rightfully secured the Union against the arms of Georgia can alone rightfully determine when and how Georgia may return to her rights in the Union. That power is no more verbally specified in the Constitution than the power to coerce States. It is in the nature of things. The Constitution is not at war with common sense, and the Government of the United States having been murderously assaulted will determine, like every other government, what is necessary to its security. Five years ago Mr. STEPHENS and his friends told us that the Constitution did not permit us to do any thing by force to prevent the attempt at secession. We differed, and by force we have prevented secession. Now Mr. STEPHENS and his friends inform us that the Constitution does not permit us to do any thing further. But do he and his friends suppose that they are in a situation to expound the Constitution of the United States to those who have just now successfully maintained it against both the theories and the arms of himself and his friends?

National necessity and the general welfare justified the war. They justified emancipation. They justified the appointment of military and provisional Governors. They justified the arbitrary selection of voters. They justified imposing assent to emancipation and renunciation of the acts of secession upon the provisional conventions. They justify the present maintenance of martial law and the Freedmen's Bureau. They justify any other measure, not inconsistent with the plain and necessary intention of the Constitution, which may be deemed essential to the resumption by any late rebel State of her position in the Union. The necessity must of course be prudently estimated. The conditions must be wisely determined. Neither hostility nor vengeance are to taint them. History and human nature are to be carefully considered. But the right of the authority which prevented the eleven States from destroying the Union to regulate the resumption of their relations in it is as unquestionable as the right of self-defense.

STRIKES.

THE strike of the car-drivers has ended, as strikes usually end, in the triumph of the employers. Yet the conduct of the strikers was, upon the whole, so temperate, and their claim so apparently just, that they were sustained by public sympathy.

The most striking fact in the case was the general willingness of the strikers to respect the equal rights of other workmen. A man has undoubtedly the right to say that he will not work for two dollars a day because those wages will not support his family. But he has no right to say that another man shall not take two dollars if he finds that they will support his family. So any number of men may combine and agree not to work for less than certain wages, but they are the worst of criminals if they forcibly prevent a single man from working who is satisfied with less.

The difficulty with strikes, as with Trades' Unions generally, is, that they presuppose an essential hostility between capital and labor. But that hostility as such does not exist. A man, whether he have a hundred dollars or a million, naturally wishes to buy cheap and sell dear. A rich man buys his labor at the lowest price, as the poor man buys his bread and meat. The poor man is not hostile to the butcher because he prefers to pay the least price possible for good meat, nor is the rich man hostile to the workman because he prefers to pay the lowest sum for which he can hire the labor he wants. Of course this parallel must not be pushed too far. Labor is merchandise, but it is something more. It is merchandise plus a soul. It is useless to try to keep humanity out of political economy. It may be a disturbing and incalculable force, but it is none the less there, and you must allow for it as the sailor allows for drift in his reckoning. We are not saying that some capitalists may not be hard upon some laborers—we are only denying that a man who has a thousand dollars is necessarily the enemy of him who has a hundred.

The important fact for strikers to consider is, that a strike, unless it rises to a revolution—for the French revolution was at bottom really a strike for higher wages or the means of living—is seldom successful. In England, for instance, where they are most frequent, LOUIS BLANC, who has carefully studied the matter and with the heartiest sympathy for workmen, says that for twenty-five years, from 1836 to 1861, scarcely six strikes succeeded.

The great strike of the Preston factory operatives in England in 1854 is the most memorable upon record. They met on the 1st of June in that year and demanded ten per cent. increase of wages. It was refused. The operatives struck, and were supported by the funds of the Trades' Unions, while their conduct was guided by an active committee. The employers announced that if the demand were not withdrawn the factories should be closed upon a certain day. The day expired, and the factories were closed. Seventeen thousand operatives were out of work. Their sufferings were terrible. Those who had been accustomed to earn twenty shillings a week received but four shillings from the general fund, which amounted to £96,000, or $480,000. They endured the strain with gloomy heroism for thirty-six weeks, but were finally forced to yield. The strike had cost the entire population a loss of £250,000, or a million and a quarter of dollars.

Why did the operatives yield? Simply because the employers could wait longer. And there was no remedy for the workmen but a general overturn of society, which is merely burning down your house to warm your feet.

So terrible a spectacle as the Preston strike, and the constant recurrence of the same effort however unsuccessful, as in the case of the stonemasons and bricklayers, who struck for nine hours instead of ten in June, 1861, and of the present tailors' workmen's strike in London, led thoughtful Englishmen to the conclusion that so much smoke means fire somewhere; and intelligent communities in Rochdale and Leeds have established co-operative societies upon the principle of a mutual understanding between production, capital, and labor, which have already had the best results. And if in England, where the condition of the laborer is probably worse than in any other country, the system of strikes has thus far proved of no real benefit, it can hardly be more servicable elsewhere.

In this country the solution of the difficulty is to be found in reason rather than in stopping work. If a body of men who are steady, responsible, efficient, and therefore valuable workmen, find that by the general increase of prices their wages are insufficient, and plainly and temperately state the case to intelligent employers, who are the great majority, we do not believe they would be made to suffer. But if they assume hostility, and act accordingly, nothing is more probable than that they will encounter hostility. For resistance to a request of higher wages usually proceeds from the conviction that to yield is to invite still larger demands. That feeling can be dissipated by frank and honorable conduct, and by the spirit of co-operation, which is the true secret of industrial harmony.

REFORM IN ENGLAND.

LORD GREY and his friends, who agitated England for electoral Reform in 1832, RICHARD CORNWALL and the men who began to agitate for the Corn-Law Repeal in 1837, and JOHN BASSETT with the party who now propose to agitate for further electoral reforms in England, belong to that class of true statesmen who perceive a condition of affairs which will lead to revolution if it is not changed; and who, therefore, before the peril is imminent, arouse the public mind that the catastrophe may be avoided altogether. They are all met by the same objection. They are told that the people do not demand a change, and that they are incendiaries who try to inflame dangerously the public mind. Their answer is always the same. They reply that the conditions of trouble are evident, although latent; and if they are not perceived by the public, that that is the very reason why the public should be made to see. Acting upon this principle they have hitherto taught England the danger and the duty of the hour, and by organizing the popular demand they have compelled petrician power to yield, and have so saved their country from tragical convulsion. Their wisdom lay in putting up lightning-rods in pleasant weather, and in not waiting until the hot air quivered with electricity.

In his late speech upon Mr. GLADSTONE's new Reform bill Mr. BASSETT said that he regarded it as a wedge. It is the beginning of the work, which he very plainly declares is a necessity of the times in England. That work is the constant enlarging of the suffrage. Pass the present bill, says Mr. BASSETT, and Parliament will show that it sympathizes with the multitudes of the English people. The advice of those who urge Parliament to resist it he calls "the most revolutionary advice ever given in this House." And Mr. GLADSTONE, in reply to Mr. LOWE and Lord ROBERT GROSVEOR, who had asserted that the bill proposed to admit drunkards and brawlers and semi-savages to political power, said, with his old brilliant fervor, "I object to the idea of dealing with these statistics as if we were ascertaining the numbers of an invading army. The people who will be admitted to the franchise are our fellow-subjects, our fellow-Christians, our own flesh and blood. Men lauded to the skies for their conduct—men who have borne destitution, starvation almost, with a patience which is a lesson to all."

One of Mr. BASSETT's statements is the key of the position. "You have a population divorced almost entirely from the land and shut out from the possession of the franchise." To see that fact, and to appreciate the vital danger it involves, is the proof of his great political genius. To rely upon his profound conviction that the danger is no less because it is not generally comprehended, and to devote himself to arousing the people to perceive it, makes him a great popular leader. It marks exactly the difference between a follower or a trimmer and a statesman.

Mr. BASSETT knows, as every close observer of human nature and student of history knows, that every country is safe so long as it moves constantly and regularly toward a wider distribution of intelligence, property, and political power. When these tend to concentration—when the land is falling into fewer hands and the political power to a smaller number—the country is fatally endangered. Mr. BASSETT has read Roman history and French history with his mind as well as with his eyes. He has seen that although the early French revolution multiplied the number of land proprietors, and the days of July abolished the old Bourbon monarchy, yet the number of voters was still only about 400,000 out of 30,000,000 of people, so that LOUIS PHILIPPE's parliament was virtually of his own election; and deceiving himself by his own image, which he regarded as the reflection of France, that King found himself suddenly without a kingdom or a crown.

In England the tendency of the land is to fewer proprietors, of which, we believe, there are now about 36,000; and the voters of all kinds are but twelve hundred thousand in a population of 30,000,000; nor to counteract the consequences of this tendency is there any thing broader and more radical than individual or collective charity, except the enlargement of political power. To that Mr. BASSETT looks for more general education, which, in his judgment, is sure to follow. With greater general intelligence, and the self-respect which springs from the consciousness of an actual share in the state, the still further enlargement of political power, even with any necessary modification of the whole system of the country, becomes possible. Without some movement wisely and continuously developed which shall give the great multitude of the people some direct voice in the representation, Mr. BASSETT unquestionably expects grave trouble.

The politics of England are watched with interest by many minds in our lately disturbed States. Their own problems are in many points, and especially in this of suffrage, like those in England. We hope they will weigh the counsels of BASSETT and GLADSTONE.

THE I. R.

Those honest Irishmen who comprehend the real suffering of their country and would seriously help her, must be the most indignant of all the spectators of Fenian antics. It is not to be doubted that large sums have been subscribed for the promised movement toward Irish independence, and the mass of those who give a generous part of their hard earnings to the Fenian treasury are unquestionably very earnest. They heartily hate England, and with the easy enthusiasm of their race they sincerely believe that they have subscribed to some formidable demonstration. If, however, those who have received the money are not quite so earnest, the urgency of the subscribers must be rather annoying. It must be appeased in some way, and nothing would be so valuable to the leaders as a valid excuse for deferring the blow. Has it occurred to those who have given their money that the demonstrations upon the border are intended merely to provoke the United States Government to interfere, so that the leaders can turn to their subscribers and say—"There! you see the Government has interfered! We can do nothing now, of course. But patience, patience, patience. Wait carefully, watch closely, and you shall see what you shall see!"

So far as now appears that is the present scope of the effort to establish the I. R. in the State of Maine.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE SUFFRAGE.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON must not be held responsible for all the follies spoken in his name. The vociferous centurs who defend him, and in the same breath declare that this is a white man's government—meaning that no man of any other complexion should be allowed to vote—reckon without their host. The President is not of their opinion, if we may judge him from his own words on many occasions. Let us refresh their memories.

In his famous speech to the colored people of Nashville, on the 24th of October, 1864, which was certainly not the least illustrious incident of his life, Mr. JOHNSON said, speaking of Tennessee: "Loyal men, whether white or black, shall alone control her destinies; and when this strife in which we are all engaged is past, I trust, I know, we shall have a better state of things, and shall all rejoice that honest labor reaps the fruit of its own industry, and that every man has a fair chance in the race of life."

In April, 1865, Mr. SCHUCKER, Mr. W. D. KELLEY, and Mr. SCURRY, whose views were very radical, were entirely satisfied with the opinions upon the question of suffrage which were expressed to them by President JOHNSON.

In May he told Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, that he should earnestly advocate the extension of suffrage to her colored citizens, if he were in Tennessee, but did not feel that, as President, he had a right to force it upon the late rebel States.

On the 15th of August, 1865, President JOHNSON suggested to Governor SHARKEY, of Mississippi, that he should persuade the Convention to "extend the elective franchise to all persons of color who can read the Constitution of the United States in English and write their names, and to all persons of color who own real estate valued at not less than $250 and who pay taxes thereon.....This you can do with perfect safety."

On the 27th of September, 1865, President JOHNSON told Senator WILSON that the suffrage question was open for discussion within the party, and that he should not discriminate between its members on account of opinions they might express upon points not settled by the Baltimore Convention.

On the 3d of October Major STEARNS made a memorandum of a conversation he had just had with the President, during which Mr. JOHNSON said: "My position here is different from what it would be if I were in Tennessee. There I should try to introduce negro suffrage gradually; first, those who had served in the army, those who could read and write, and perhaps a property qualification for others, say $200 or $250." This memorandum was submitted by Major STEARNS to the President, who returned it with this indorsement: "I have read the within communication and find it substantially correct. I have made some verbal alterations. A. J."

There is no reason whatever to suppose that President Johnson has changed his opinions upon this subject. And no man of common sense supposes that this large part of the population can be long disfranchised with safety.

TAXATION AND REVENUE.

BEFORE these lines are read the House Committee of Ways and Means will probably have reported the amended Tax bill. The papers are full of circumstantial accounts of the changes which are to be made.

These are substantial, suggestive facts. This country, it seems, with a population, including negroes, perhaps 3,000,000 more than that of Great Britain and Ireland, and 9,000,000 less than that of France, yields a revenue to Government fifty per cent. more than the public revenue of Great Britain or of France.

The revenue, as we said, is not to be less in 1866-7 than it was in 1865-6. Yet the expenditure is to be reduced nearly one-half. In 1865-6 the expenditure will be found not to fall far short of $500,000,000.

An important problem is suggested by this probable excess of revenue over expenditure. Is it just or politic for the present generation to undertake the payment of the national debt, and at the rate of nearly 10 per cent. per annum?

But, on the other hand, as future generations will benefit at least as much as the present generation by the war for which the national debt was incurred, it seems but fair to many that they should bear their full share of the burden.

Certain newspapers of unquestioned loyalty dwell upon the advantage of reducing the debt to $2,500,000,000 by the payment in full of some $205,000,000 of short-date obligations.

But is it quite certain that there is no better way of using the surplus of 1866-7 than in paying off $205,000,000 of debt certificates and other short-date obligations?

Look at the situation. Money is a drug in Wall Street. It can not be easily lent even at 5 per cent., and the prospect is that 3 or 4 will soon be the rate. Fully $500,000,000 of currency, independent of interest-bearing legal tenders, are afloat—four times as much as we had before the war.

Now, how will the proposed application of the surplus of 1866-7 to the extinction of 9 or 10 per cent. of the public debt affect this state of things? It will make money even easier than it is, and will render a fresh inflation inevitable.

If, on the other hand, this great surplus—the greatest, we believe, ever accumulated by any nation in a single year—should be used exclusively for the purpose of restoring the national currency to its proper value—the standard of gold—how, then, would the case stand?

The Secretary of the Treasury has communicated his purposes to no one. But if he have not greatly changed his mind since he wrote his report to Congress in December last, he is much more likely to adopt the latter method of disposing of his surplus than the former.

A CONSERVATIVE SIGN.

SENATOR SAYSBURY, of Delaware, one of the most conspicuous Conservatives, recently said, at a meeting of the National Democratic Association in Washington, that he believed "that when JEFFERSON DAVIS left the Senate he was a better Union man than ABRAHAM LINCOLN."

But, despite Senator SAYSBURY, it continues to be six hundred years later. The political theory upon which the rebellion rested has been as effectually settled as any theory can be.

which was, that the States in the Union are absolute sovereign powers, and that the Union was a compact at will. And now Conservatism—the spirit that forever wrestles with the order of nature—true to its instincts, plants itself upon the very proposition that the country has repudiated.

HOW AND WHEN SHALL WE EAT?

DIGESTION is quite a compound process. The food is first cut and ground by the teeth, and at the same time there is poured forth into the mouth from the ducts of several pairs of glands a large quantity of saliva, which thoroughly moistens the food as it is being ground.

There have been many speculations about the nature of the digestive process, and in relation to them the celebrated Hunter remarked playfully: "To account for digestion some have made the stomach a mill; some would have it to be a stewing-pot, and some a brewing trough; yet all the while one would have thought that it must have been very evident that the stomach was neither a mill, nor a stewing-pot, nor a brewing-trough, nor any thing but a stomach."

When the food has been sufficiently acted upon in the stomach it is passed forward into the small intestine, where the nutritious portion of it is absorbed, and then is poured into the circulation to replenish the blood.

The process goes through with in the stomach is a regular one, requiring a certain average period for its completion; and then nature dictates that there should be a period of rest for the organ before the process be entered upon again. It is obvious, then, that no fresh matter should be introduced after the mass of food has become in any good degree digested, for this would interfere with the regularity of the process.

The ease with which food is digested depends much upon the thoroughness of mastication. If unmasticated lumps of food be swallowed the gastric juices are slow in penetrating them, and soon portions of them may pass into the intestines undigested, and prove a source of irritation, and therefore of disease.

It seems to be quite well settled by experience that three meals a day are required for the maintenance of health. If more than these are taken too much is eaten, and the stomach does not have sufficient intervals of rest; and if less the intervals are so long that there is some degree of exhaustion, which, though it may be slight, produces an injurious effect, and if repeated every day, it has in the progress of years a considerable aggregate of influence.

Much has been said about exercising after eating, and the truth has been often overrated. The famous experiment with the two dogs is cited to show that exercise after eating interferes with the process of digestion. Observers just how much was proved by the experiment. Two dogs were fed to the full, and while one was left to lie still, the other was made to run about very briskly.

The same is to some extent true of exercise of mind. It seems to be necessary that there should be some measure of concentration of energy in the stomach for the due performance of digestion, and any very decided exercise, bodily or mental, tends to prevent this.

It is very commonly said that it is wrong to eat just before going to bed. Is this true? Cattle are apt to go to sleep after eating fully. Do sleep and digestion agree well in their case, and not so in the case of man? In some seasons of the year the farmer takes his heaviest meal at the close of the laborers of the day, and soon retires. Is this a bad custom? Our opinion is that food may be taken properly at a late hour, provided, first, that the individual has not already eaten enough for the twenty-four hours, that he has done so being true probably in most cases; and provided, secondly, that he is in such a state of health that digestion will not be act upon his nerves as to disturb his sleep.

CATALOGUE OF THE MERCANTILE LIBRARY.

THE catalogue of the Mercantile Library, just issued by the catalogue committee of that institution, is a model. It is admirably arranged, so that nobody can miss the book he wishes, if he knows either the author's name or the subject of the book, and the classification is complete.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

April 15: In the Senate, Mr. Grimes introduced a bill regarding the appointments of officers in the navy. It provides for 1 Vice-Admiral, 11 Rear-Admirals, 23 Commodores, 54 Captains, 20 Commanders, 126 Lieutenants, 160 Ensigns, and 1000 Midshipmen.

April 16: In the House, the Army bill was taken up, the question being on the motion to strike out that part of the fourth section relating to the Veteran Reserve Corps.

April 17: In the Senate, a resolution was adopted, calling upon the President for whenever additional information he may have received since his last report in relation to the Southern States.

April 18: The act supplementary of an act in relation to the Alaska corps was taken up and passed, 30 to 4. This bill grants indemnity to officers of the army for acts committed in all of the suppression of the rebellion, and exempts them from liability to civil suits for such acts.

April 19: In the House, the bill giving to Edward Day, of Delaware County, Maryland, an annuity of $421.50, as a recompense of his services in depositing the national flag from Gilmore's rebel soldiers, on the 25th of July, 1864, was passed—yeas 100, nays 13.

April 20: In the Senate, Mr. Conness offered a resolution, which was adopted, instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire into the expediency of providing against the importation, transportation, sale, or manufacture of strychnine in the United States.

A NEW LICENSE LAW.

An act has been passed by the New York State Legislature and approved by Governor Foster, to take effect from May 1, 1866, entitled, An Act to Regulate the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors within the Metropolitan Police District of the State of New York.

1. The Commissioners of the Board of Health shall cause to be determined by the Commissioners, and not to be under $20 each or over $1000. These licenses are to be posted in a conspicuous place wherever the liquors are sold.

2. From and after the 1st day of May, 1866, no person or persons shall, within the said Metropolitan Police District, exclusive of the County of Westchester, publicly keep or sell, give away or dispose of any strong or spirituous liquors, wines, ale, or beer, in quantities less than five gallons at a time, unless as here or they may be licensed, pursuant to the provisions of this act, and may be permitted by it.

3. These licenses shall authorize no sale of the liquors specified on Monday.

4. No liquors shall be sold to minors without the consent of their parents, nor to any habitual drunkard, nor to any person while under the influence of liquor, nor to any person against the request of any wife, husband, parent, or child.

5. Every person who shall violate any of the foregoing provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction therefor shall be imprisoned with a fine of not less than $20, nor more than $100, or with imprisonment for not less than ten days nor more than thirty days, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE.

A new batch of correspondence between Secretary Seward and the Marquis de Montebello has been laid before Congress. The question of the whole matter is that France is to withdraw her troops from Mexico within eighteen months. It is understood that the United States will not interfere in Mexican affairs, except as against an attempt made to establish a monarchy against the will of the Mexican people.

The Merrimack expedition has at last been heard from. After a pleasant voyage, diversified only by the usual incidents of sea-sickness, the Commodore reached Rio on the 19th of February. The friends of the young ladies who have ventured in this expedition will be glad to learn that they were all well and in good spirits.

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY & CO., WASHINGTON, D. C.]

ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS.

There are few public men in the country who have spoken so plainly, and whose political career has been so conspicuous, whose real position has yet been more misunderstood than that of Mr. STEPHENS. It was long the habit to regard him as a "national" man, as opposed to the school of State sovereignty; while the plain fact of his whole career is that, while Mr. CALHOUN'S measures were not always approved by him, Mr. CALHOUN'S theory of the Government has never had a more consistent and determined supporter. Viewing the two great historical periods of the country as the Northern and the Southern, the Southern policy has been steadily defended by him, and with a thousand-fold more sagacity than by its noisier and more rhetorical chiefs. If the people of Georgia and of the late slave States had followed ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS rather than ROBERT TOOMBS and BENJAMIN DAVIS, the war would have been deferred, but the character of our Government would have come much nearer destruction. Mr. STEPHENS was born in Taliaferro county, Georgia, on the 11th of February, 1812. He studied law and came to the bar in 1834. In 1836 he was elected to the Lower House of the Georgia Legislature, and in 1842 to the State Senate. In politics he was an ardent Whig, and in 1843 was elected to Congress, where he remained until 1859. In 1844 he supported HENRY CLAY for the Presidency, although he thought him too lukewarm upon the then great Southern measure of the annexation of Texas, and one of the first speeches Mr. STEPHENS made in Congress was in favor of that measure. He was one of the authors of the resolutions for the annexation, which was peculiarly Mr. CALHOUN'S measure, and intended by him to secure his election to the Presidency; and so it was necessary at that time for the Southern policy to acknowledge the right of Congress to legislate upon Slavery in the Territories, the Missouri Compromise was distinctly recognized in Mr. STEPHENS'S resolutions. In 1847 Mr. STEPHENS introduced resolutions upon the Mexican war which became the platform of the Whig party, and by committing it to the Southern policy finally destroyed that party. In 1850 Mr. STEPHENS supported the compromises which included JAMES M. MASSEY'S foolish Fugitive Slave bill. In 1854, when the Southern policy required that Congress should no longer legislate upon Slavery in the Territories, Mr. STEPHENS, as Chairman of the Territorial Committee in the House, was the chief supporter of the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. He took hit or could for "the South" as occasion required. The Whig party disappeared. The Supreme Court declared the Southern policy to be Constitutional; and at the close of the 36th Congress, in 1859, Mr. STEPHENS declined to be longer a candidate. Upon his retirement he spoke, in June, 1859, at Augusta. He reviewed the political movements of the twenty-three years—nearly a quarter of a century—during which he had been in political life, and declared that "we"—meaning "the South"—had gained the victory in every agitation. "There is not now," he said, "a spot of the public territory of the United States over which the national flag floats where slavery is excluded by law of Congress; and the highest tribunal of the land has decided that Congress has no power to pass such a law, nor to grant such power to a Territorial legislature.... Wherever climate and soil suit there slavery can and will go to the extent of population." He cautiously favored the acquisition of Cuba, and plainly but indirectly advised the reopening of the slave-trade. As for the main question of Southern policy, that of slavery itself, he confessed that "the leading public men of the South, in our early history, were all against it." But he said that it was a question "which they did not, and perhaps could not, thoroughly understand." But the increasing lights of religion and science had now shown that not to sustain human slavery upon religious grounds was "to reverse the decree of the Almighty." This great truth having been accepted by the American people, and solemnly proclaimed by the Supreme Court, Mr. Seward considered that he might safely cease from his labors. The country would now advance to a still more shining prosperity. But that no one should misapprehend his orthodoxy upon the one cardinal point of devotion to "the South" he said that, as matters stood, he saw "no cause of danger either to the Union or Southern security in it. The former has always been with me, and ought to be with you, subordinate to the latter."

In the Presidential election of 1860 Mr. Seward supported Mr. DOUGLASS and HARRISON V. JOHNSON, because he was sure that the Southern policy would be safer under them than with the probable extravagance of BRADKENTON and LANE. Upon the election of Mr. LINCOLN he was openly opposed to secession for reasons which he stated in a speech before the Georgia Legislature at Milledgeville on the 14th of November, 1860, in reply to an appeal of Mr. TOOMBS for secession on the previous evening. This speech was much quoted at the time in the Free States as an indication of Union feeling. But it was simply an argument against the policy of secession; the right was never denied by Mr. Seward. The truth is, that the Milledgeville speech states simply the value to "the South" of a Union which it controlled. The election of Mr. LINCOLN, Mr. Seward said, did not remove it from Southern control. The Senate and the House were opposed to him. If the new President and his party should attempt to do any thing which Georgia considered to be unconstitutional, let her secede. He was first for his State, and then for his country; and he merely objected to secession as unnecessary so long as the Union remained as it then was, under Southern domination. This was Mr. Seward's "Union" speech upon the eve of the war.

When, as probably he foresaw, the counsel of the immediate secessionists prevailed, Mr. Seward was at once elected Provisional Vice-President of the "Confederacy" for two reasons: first, to propitiate and secure the Georgia party which agreed with him; and second, because there was no doubt of his entire devotion to "the South" as against the country. This was on the 9th of February, 1862. On the 21st of March he speaks at Savannah. He repeated in almost the same words the philosophy of the speech at Augusta in 1859. He announced that the "old Union" was based upon liberty and equal rights, which was "a sandy foundation." But, he added, "Our new government is the first in the history of the world based upon this great physical, philosophical, and moral truth" that slavery is the "natural and moral condition" of the African race. This is "the corner-stone" of the new system. Mr. Seward neither concealed nor repudiated in this speech any of his well-known views. It was entirely harmonious with his whole career.

During the war he was not conspicuous. He seldom presided in the Richmond Senate, and he twice essayed to end hostilities by some kind of negotiation. He probably did not change his opinion that the attempt at secession was a mistake, and events, of course, must only have confirmed his conviction. From May to October of last year Mr. Seward was a state prisoner at Fort Warren. He was then released upon parole, and, returning to Georgia, secured his election as United States Senator. On the 23d of February, 1866, he made a speech to the Legislature recommending acquiescence in the situation, and such legislation as would secure a chance to the freedmen. But still holding to the right of secession, he also believes that every State which has tried to secede and failed is now entitled without delay or condition to resume the exercise of every other right in the Union—a doctrine which grows naturally out of the old Southern view of the government, and which we have considered in our editorial columns.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

INSIDE
A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XVII.

"O HAPPY day!—O glorious and blessed day!—O day for us to celebrate with joyful hearts as long as we live here and throughout all eternity! No room for hesitation now. Many a time you have laughed at your humble speaker—said, 'Don't be too fast, Brother Barker'—hah! was I not right? From the first whisper of the great news I believed it all, every syllable. Shame upon you who held back, who wanted confirmation, as you call it. There was your sin. Men standing high like among us, too—like the lord on whose hand the king leaned that our text—Second Kings, seventh—speaks about. You wouldn't believe me any more than they would the lepers when they came to tell of the invading army fled. Like them, it is faith you need. You may despise me, but you can't take from me my faith. You hesitated. You said, Louisville taken? May be so. Cincinnati captured?

BROTHER BARKER IS A TALKER.

Perhaps; only there's a good many people living in that town, railways to bring more, and the like. But Washington captured? you asked. Don't know about that. You all believed about the second battle of Manassas which went before all this glorious success; you hummed and hawed about the rest. Only let me have the humble satisfaction of calling you all to witness this day that I believed it all from the first—second victory of Manassas, capture simultaneously thereafter of Louisville, Cincinnati, Washington—yes, and of Philadelphia and New York City, too, which will soon follow. Is it because I believe in our glorious Davis and Lee and Stonewall Jackson and our gallant army? Not one bit of it. What I believe in is God. From the first I have said, Brethren, here's the only ground to stand on. This whole war is a war for slavery. God teaches plainly in His Word slavery is a divine ordinance. In all the world we are His peculiar people, being the only people on earth who believe in the institution as such. An infidel North, an infidel world against us, but God for us! You have trembled and said, 'Oh, the North is so populous, so rich, so united, so determined—the North is so this, and the North is so that.' All I said is this, Very good, if the North is all this and a millionfold more so, what do I care? The God of this Bible is for us. But the whole civilized world is against us. Who cares if all the devils in hell were too? If God be for us, who can be against us? I, all the brethren in our denomination, almost every preacher of every denomination has said the same here at the South—if you would only believe it when you hear it. There is that ninth verse—'We do not well: this day is a day of good tidings; and we hold our peace;' what the lepers said to one another. As I said in taking that text, this being a day of good tidings, I don't intend to hold my peace!"

And Brother Barker did not. It was on Sunday morning in his pulpit in Somerville, to his church crowded to its utmost capacity. For a week the news he specifies has been pouring in, increasing in magnitude and being more fully confirmed every mail. Some rejoicings had taken place from its very first arrival; but last night the news was so entirely confirmed that even the most prudent Secessionist in Somerville abandoned any doubt as to its authenticity. Hurrahing until hopeless hoarseness, bonfires, firearms from cannon down to the feeblest pistol, bells from the big bell of the Brick Church down to the weakest tea-bell in the hands of baby assisted to hold and shake it! Shaking of hands till exhaustion. Somerville has rejoiced before, but Somerville outdoes Somerville this time. Very properly, the news being by far the most glorious ever received.

Around Mr. Ferguson, sitting grimly aloft in his room, Somerville sweeps and roars like a maelstrom, all the county around sucked into the vortex of rejoicing. Like a bantled lion in his brushy hair, the Scotchman broods in defiant scorn behind his grizzly beard. His only care is to secure each and every dispatch or other printed fragment in relation to the news as it appears, and before it can be whelmed in the torrent of later and fresher tidings, give it a permanent place in his Scrap-book according to its exact date and sequence. It is a very Daniel Lambert of volumes. No easy matter to handle it now, as it lies on a table in the Scotchman's room devoted expressly to it; and it is growing rapidly in these days. Mr. Ferguson has no children, not even a cat, and this is his pet. Mr. Ferguson has no visitors beyond Dr. Warner, Guy Brooks before he left, Mr. Arthur, and one or two more; his business is destroyed for the present; the collection is at once his only business and recreation.

Yes, on this Sunday morning, while Mr. Arthur is preaching the old, obsolete, utterly uninteresting Gospel to quite a small congregation, both he and they none the brighter from a night from which sleep had been routed by the bells—at the same hour Brother Barker actually outdoes and altogether eclipses the Brother Barker of any previous occasion. No wonder. Is not the North now finally defeated? The war is over, as Brother Barker very justly reasons in his sermon. Washington being captured, there is no longer any Northern Government existing to fight. With tears in his eyes he confesses in sermons, and in conversation which fills up all the space between sermons, to a feeling even of deepest pity for this misguided and infidel but now utterly wrecked and ruined people. As he refers to it in the pulpit he has broken down, has turned himself to one side to wipe his eyes and blow his nose. Friends must excuse him, he was born among that infatuated people who have so madly rushed upon their ruin; and so, with a hasty swallow or two and a twenty-fifth sip at the tumbler of water beside him, he tucks his wet handkerchief under the edge of his Bible.

"I know your magnanimous souls, dear friends. Even in this hour of your final triumph you pity your fallen foe. In view of their awful overthrow we all feel to sorrow over them. It was an inscrutable Providence that caused me, no will of my own, to be born there. You will excuse—you know how wicked Jerusalem was, yet you know who wept over it!"

Pardon the hand which records this, but shall not that time be set down as it actually was?

"I have heard from my earliest infancy many, very many sermons; in fact, in the earlier portion of my existence I never heard any thing else." Captain Simmons remarks to a group of friends in the grocery next day, "but I never heard a more brilliant discourse—a more affecting one, parts of it, in my life. My nature revolts from a Yankee, even when a Secessionist, yet I must do Parson Barker justice to say that."

"Bear in your minds, friends, this one thing," reiterates Brother Barker, speaking the almost unanimous sentiment of his denomination South at that hour. "The success of our glorious Confederacy, the destruction of the old United States and the infidel North is the doing of the Almighty. And why? Because he could not be a just God and act otherwise."

And it is a little singular that the sovereignty of God is the theme, far from the first or the last time, of Mr. Arthur's sermon at the same hour, the grand doctrine, not the same inference. Though he, too, is dreading this morning in secret lest the will of Heaven may be at last as Brother Barker interprets it—dreading it, rebuking himself for any pain at what Heaven degrades, yet oh that acute, bitter, sickening dread! "Not my will but Thine!" he repeats a thousand times, but oh that it would throbb in his very heart as well as on his tongue!

"You observe my condition, friends," says Brother Barker, half an hour later in his discourse. "My bleeding lungs will not permit—I must close. Only I find on the desk a note making request that I will explain a little Scripture before we part. With pleasure will I do so." And that thin, sallow-faced fellow-creature—his lank hair combed back off his forehead and tucked behind his ears, the centre and soul for near two hours now of that crowded church, enjoys, as he leans forward over his cushion, note in hand, a degree of self-satisfaction intense beyond the ordinary allotment of the rest of us.

"I find here," he says, "some questions to answer. I have had no time to examine them. I trust my general knowledge of this blessed Book is sufficient. 'First, What does prophecy mean by the stars of heaven?' An easy question to answer," with a smile; "as I have often told you, by the stars of heaven is meant in prophecy governments, particularly the States which once composed this Union. 'Second, Has prophecy a meaning when it speaks of a third part of the stars of heaven?' Whoever wrote this note could hardly have attended the preaching of your most humble. I've explained it often in the Sunday-school. The smallest child there could tell you the reference is to our Confederate States; thirty-three States at the time of Secession; eleven seceded States. Yes, if there be, as I've often explained, any thing certain, positively certain, in Scripture," says the preacher, slowly, "it is that by a third part of the stars of heaven is meant these Confederate States of America. Very good. 'Third, When Scripture speaks of the great Red Dragon what is meant?' Really, friends," says Brother Barker, smiling, "these questions are too simple; I'm wasting your time. By the Dragon is meant, of course, the Devil, the Adversary, Satan. He is called great because of his terrible power over men. He is called red—the great red Dragon—to show that he burns like fire with fury, and because he accomplishes his dreadful purposes against men very often by bloodshed and war. 'A last question: Please say, then, what is meant by Revelation, twelfth chapter, third and fourth verses.' Revelation, twelfth, third—twelfth, third." Brother Barker has his long forefinger on the place in an instant, and reads, without a pause: "'And there appeared another wonder in heaven; and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads.' All this emblematic," the preacher pauses here to say, "'of the devil's terrible power over men; but let us go on: 'And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth.'"

Total silence in the vast audience. Then a perfectly distinct "by George!" from the direction in which Bob Withers is seated, with a tittering among the younger portion, first at Brother Barker's aspect of sudden and total discomfiture, swelling as the meaning of this most unexpected Scripture breaks upon them according to the explanation yet ringing in their ears! The whole congregation at last catch the joke, and join in. The thing comes upon it so suddenly. The reaction of feeling also. The sympathy of a crowd of laughters likewise.

Brother Barker has closed the Bible, very sal-

"YOU BLACK-HEARTED ABOLITIONIST!"

low indeed, and leans himself over the desk with deprecating hand for some time before he can make himself heard.

"Brethren," he begins, at last, in his most solemn tones, "an enemy hath done— But the congregation has at this instant a fresh sense of the joke, and go off together in another peal of laughter, as audacious sometimes will, as much at Brother Barker himself, the victim, as at the sudden Scripture.

"An enemy, an enemy hath done this," he says at last. "Once before, in my humble labors in the cause of the South and the God of the South, an enemy attempted to wrest Scripture at church in somewhat the same way. I foresaw then and told friends he wrested Scripture to his own destruction. You have all heard the fate, the just fate, of the traitor who did it—the double vengeance of God on him as a traitor both to his country and to his Bible. Like Uzzah, he laid his hand on the Ark of the Lord, and, like Uzzah, he perished for his sin."

But there is laughter breaking forth yet, here and there, among the most thoughtful. Brother Barker grows more livid, his hair seems blacker, his eyes like those of a serpent, his head projected nearer his audience, his long arm shaking a prophetic finger at them.

"I have spoken of the fate of that miserable man's body," he adds; "but what of his immortal soul gone to the Judgment? I tell you, friends, disloyalty to the Confederacy is a sin against God, a great sin. He will damn a man for that as well as for any other sin. The Powers that be are ordained of God; and it goes right on to add: Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God, and they that resist shall receive to themselves—Damnation!"

But it is impossible to describe the force and zest with which the word passes the speaker's lips.

"As to the person who wrote this"—the preacher holds out the offensive note at arm's length—"let him look out for himself. He may be here this instant. I tell you, Sir, whoever you are, we have your handwritings. You can not escape. Has it come to this!" wails Brother Barker. "Is it possible there can exist among us men so desperate! Men who can yet cling to our vile foe, clinging to it in the very hour that Heaven has finally crushed it beneath its awful wrath! From whom," continues the speaker, after a pause, and with a lower leaning of his body to his audience, as he asks the question, in confidence, of them, "did the writer of this get his Bible passages? The Concordance by which this note was got up belongs," shaking the paper almost to pieces in his extended hand as he speaks, "to a minister of the Gospel now living, this moment preaching, preaching without one prayer for the Confederacy, in Somerville!" And the speaker's silence is more eloquent of meaning than any words could be. Not a grown person but says to himself—Mrs. Warner is not the only lady who whispers it to her neighbor them—"Parson Arthur."

"I will say this much more"—the preacher has worked himself by this time into a frenzy, the projection of his lean body, long arms, small head over the desk, with the lines of his words resembling him, even to Tim Lamm, who sits on one side of the pulpit, crowded there by the stress of the occasion, and has the preacher in profile, to an enraged serpent—"this moment our brave boys, your own husbands, brothers, sons, lovers, friends are far away there, enduring hunger, cold, intense toil for their country, lying in their heart's gore, being this very instant butchered by a fiendish foe; pouring out from every vein their rich, warm, Southern blood! And for what? Doing the Almighty's work on their and His hellish foes. Yes, passing and slaughtering and burning the Louisvilles and Cincinnati and Washingtons of your debased tyrants as those other slaveholders and peculiar people of God did the Canaanites! Our dear boys are this moment slaying such of our cruel foes as come in their reach; and here are we at home, the same foes right among us, people sitting deliberately, insidiously down to write such a paper as this—a deadly snake to it—"while we are exulting in our great victories. Men right at our firesides! Advers dabbling the news on the very hearthstones which warm them. I tell you what, friends and fellow-citizens"—and the preacher, lower down over his desk, two-thirds of his body toward his breathless congregation, suits eyes and lips, long arms and convulsive hands, face livid and teeth set, to the words—"you should this hour seize the wretches and crush them like serpents under your feet!" and the stamp with which he dashes his heel upon their shattered heads thrills every heart.

But not without the conscious uprising in his own bosom, ay, and in the bosom of every Christian man there, of a something adverse to all this, not without that, not without that!

Only human nature, and that nature yours, dear reader, as well as his. Our common nature: in this instance dizzied in and by the raging of such a whirlwind as never befalls twice a century. Let Him decide the degree of guilt who only can.

Reaction, however, being thus established, Brother Barker drives himself back again into the pulpit and takes up his well-worn hymn-book.

"Sixty-eight Psalm, first part, long measure:

"O God arise in all his might
And put the troops of hell to flight."

Brother n, please sing."

Yes, the case of Mr. Arthur grows a more painful one every day. Many of his members, even his warmest friends, cease to attend church; even those who in his kindness most cordially to support, his cause are very rare indeed in their attendance there, exceedingly shy of being seen conversing with him, even for an instant, on the street. So many whom he once knew pass him on the streets, refusing to speak to him, that he now takes the initiative in that matter, and never himself first salutes any one of whose friendly feeling he entertains the least doubt. The very children are, in more instances than one, prompted to call after him as he passes along. The week after Brother Barker's sermon Mrs. Warner's little son salutes him as "A black-hearted Abolitionist." It is on record that the same child receives, for the first time in many months, an exceedingly severe chastisement from Dr. Warner, followed by a much more severe scourging of the Doctor himself by the tongue of his wife; but who dare raise the sacred veil of their family privacy to explain matters?

In fact, Mr. Arthur's apprehension of the exact standing of a leper in Hebrew society is clearer than it ever was before, with all his reading. But let only truth be told; with all his bitter unpopularity in the community he enjoys a sweeter, more solid peace than ever before.

"It reminds me of the story of the prisoner whose dungeon was curiously constructed to contract around him every day," he says to Mr. Ferguson, who has just read aloud from his portly scrap-book a furious onslaught upon "the miscreant ministers yet lingering among us who refuse to pray for the Confederacy," from the last Somerville Star.

"They do their utmost to drive you away. Only go, and they will publish you as having deserted to the Federals, being a hypocrite and a spy all the time you were here," added the Scotchman, upon whom quite a change has passed, by-the-by. Rough, cross, an old booby, and a tough Scot, since Guy Brooks has gone—"fed in a base and cowardly manner to our dastardly foes," as the Star had it—Mr. Ferguson, whose regard for Mr. Arthur has, since Secession, steadily increased, is now, to him at least, more gentle than he was ever known to be to man before. There is the spirit of John Knox in Mr. Arthur which he can not resist.

"Yes, if you were to go you would leave an odor behind you proving you to have been all along the vilest of wolves in sheep's clothing, just as the smell of brimstone proves a departed visitant to have been the devil." So he comforts his friend.

Heretofore he scarcely ever visited any one. The truth is, he was afraid to leave his collection. Now he lugs and crowds that ponderous volume into the iron safe in which he keeps his land-titles and money, and frequently visits Mr. Arthur in the study of the latter. If busy when his friend enters the minister merely returns the dry Good-morning, and waves the Scotchman to a chair till he gets through. Often Mr. Ferguson mounts his horse, a scrubby, obstinate hack, the very counterpart of his own, and visits his friend out at Mrs. Scott's. He has even been known to pat Robby, when out there, on the head—the first time he has touched a child for many, many years. True, the conversation is upon the one topic until Mr. Arthur wearies of it, yet he experiences a pleasure in having his grim and taciturn friend with him. It is somehow like the having a rocky barrier for the time between him and the roar and dash of the ocean—for, very broad, deep, dark, and clamorous is the phase of Secession just now.

"I know dozens of cases in which they have made preachers take the oath even though they furloughed them to preach; resign this morning, and before night Simmons and Tim Lamm will be after you," says Mr. Ferguson, perpetually.

"None of the interest in religious matters among even the best of our people, which I counted on to make up for other things," moans Mr. Arthur. "The Union men flying the country or giving up all heart, despairing of the purpose or the power of the General Government. So many who abhorred Secession have gone into it from a deeper hatred still of Abolition. But oh, this spiritual apathy!"

"Quite a contrast to the fervent praying, preaching, singing, crowding, at that fellow Barker's Sunday services and weekly prayer-meetings!" says his friend. "But the inspiration of all that is purely the Confederacy. It lives with it, will die with it."

"They ignore, for the present, every Gospel doctrine, so far as urging it is concerned, I fear," replies Mr. Arthur. "God is feared principally as the One who may help the Federals; believed in, and invoked, and clung to, mainly as the One who must and shall help the Confederates. It does seem as if their chief affection for the very Saviour now is, because he sanctioned, or, at least, did not expressly condemn, slavery. At heart the truly pious are better than all this, but this is the outer seeming. And I, perhaps, am as fanatical—only the other way."

"The Almighty," puts in the Scotchman, reverently, "is simply withholding his gracious Spirit for the present, leaving men, for the time, to their own ways. There is now a lull in that Divine wind which bloweth as it listeth."

"And the analogy of Nature, will it prove true here?" says the minister, eagerly, "the strong blessing which seamen know always to follow a calm."

"When His other instrumentalities have got slavery out of the way. Even that man Barker has some blind idea toward the truth. Before this last ridiculous news, they tell me, he had a vast deal to say about some Jonah or other being under deck of the Ship of State—some wedge of gold and Babylonish garment being hidden somewhere in camp which prevented success."

"I fear he refers to the Union men still left unhung in the land—not to the institution; but who can tell? How often I wish I could catch a glimpse of some men's hearts! Alas, I do not even know my own!" says Mr. Arthur. "I don't want to speak of myself; but I do feel as if I was actually in jail—my feet in the stocks."

"And midnight upon you; they do as Paul and Silas did, in like case; pray and sing praises to God. The earthquake will come in due time," is the consolation of the Scotchman.

"But so many really good men have gone into this thing—men who hated it at first as much as myself! Some from the influence of others, especially their wives or sons; some because money is to be made in it; some from despair of the success of the Federal Government; some because they are led to regard Heaven as being at last, by its favor, on the side of the South. What pains me most is, that ministers, ministers of our own denomination—men older, wiser, more devoted than I—men superior to me in every sense, should be so thoroughly persuaded and zealous for the Confederacy." And Mr. Arthur's head as he walks his study, wherein this conversation takes place, sinks upon his bosom in deep and painful thought.

The Scotchman sits at the table, apparently turning over the leaves of a Ridgely's "Body of Divinity" in search of something. Really he is far away in Scotland, standing beside a grave wherein he saw laid, years on years ago, a fair young form, whose blue eyes and flaxen locks are parts of his memory forever. The plumed Hander, the white-bearded Lear, the swarthy Othello you see upon the stage are not the only heroes of drama. This grizzly old Scot was not driven apart from men and so deep within himself, more a hermit than if fled to desert and cave, without his tragedy too.

What divine finger touches his heart this morning? Astonished that he had never thought of it before, a new purpose, as his eye rests upon his friend, suddenly blossoms upon him, like the almond bud upon Aaron's dead rod. A new purpose! And like the arrival of the time for the putting forth of buds, it brings a spring and a joy with it even to the wintry old Scot. A purpose, and a substantial one, too, as we shall yet see.

It strikes him—the change in this once enthusiastic young divine, who came to Somerville to accomplish wonders—that is long ago now. The long gallops before breakfast, perhaps. Say it is the plunges the year around into the cold pool. Maybe it is because, in intervals of study, Mr. Arthur toils in Mrs. Scott's garden so with hoe and spade. Because, once too reliant on others, circumstances in these days have thrown him altogether on himself, perhaps. And it may be for the reason that he has been swimming very long now against a current broad and deep. All the providences of Heaven, from without and from within, have wrought together to make him, bodily, mentally, spiritually, a thousand times the man he once was. Men will turn to look upon him as he passes them hereafter, saying to themselves, "There is one who has had a history." Ay, and one, please God, who has a history before him also.

The Scotchman remembers a tumbler of fresh flowers from off an old volume of Shakespeare on the table; and with the sight and smell of the flowers is mingled a fair face he sees at Sunday-school and church. Yes, yes, if God will, there shall be a story, yet un-lived, as pleasant as any Winter's Tale or As you Like It in old Shakespeare or out of it: a story of love through years of trial, and, at last, union just the sweeter and more perfect for all that. Not that Mr. Ferguson is perfectly confident; he knows too much of this sorrowful world for that. If it is in my power, he says.

But Mr. Arthur is thinking as he walks of that last visit good Mr. Ellis made him the Saturday before Mr. Ellis's last appearance at church.

"I do not ask you to take an active part," Mr. Ellis had closed a long entreaty with his pastor by saying. "I confess there is much in Mr. Barker's temper and manner which I can not approve. But people tell me every day that you wish the defeat of the Confederacy, the success of the Federals. Assure me this is not so. This is all I ask."

Mr. Ellis had been urging the waning influence and usefulness of his pastor with tears in his eyes; most sincerely is he attached to his pastor and to his church. If he possibly could he would cling to both.

"Being born at the South, it is impossible for me, as for you, to desire any thing other than what is for the welfare of the South. As to the rest, I can only say, God's will in regard to the South be done. He knows what is best for the South; let us leave it to Him."

And Mr. Ellis can by no means be satisfied with that. If Mr. Arthur could only have told him that he can not regard either Secession or slavery as things for which Heaven is likely to fight.

Dark days these for Mr. Ellis. True, the Confederacy has been most wonderfully victorious of late; its ultimate success is a certainty, of course. But then Henry is off in camp, terribly exposed body and soul. The demoralization even among Christian men is frightful. And Mr. Ellis, his expenses becoming heavier every day, is making nothing there in his empty store. Strange to say, there is a love of property developing in Mr. Ellis's bosom which surprises men—an altogether peculiar love. The new emotion surprised himself at first; but he is past that now. In fact, Mr. Ellis is becoming known as, of all Secessionists in Somerville, that one whose feelings are most involved in it. He is nervous, sensitive, quick to take offense, petulant exceedingly when bad news is coming. Far from as liberal, however, toward the object as he was at first. He has been so drained, you see, and doubly drained by its perpetual appeals.

"Who knows, Mr. Ferguson," says Mr. Arthur at last, "but Providence may permit the Confederacy to be established—a Christian nation of slaveholders, off by itself from all intermeddling—to show what Christianity within it can effect on slaves? The world may thus get a new idea of the power of religion; and the slaves may thus be in an admirable training for freedom, if such they are to have at some future period."

"Visionary!" growls the Scotchman. "God works according to laws inherent in the nature of things. We have no Scripture warrant to calculate upon miracles in our case; and this requires a double miracle. Only by a supernatural restraint would the world be held back from such intermeddling. Only by a miraculous increase of the Christianity at the South will owners do more for and with their slaves than heretofore. Did they not know that marriage is an ordinance of God, the relation of parent and child is an ordinance of God, even if slavery is, as well as slavery? Did they assert those ordinances for the slave? They have had the opportunity; it is gone from them forever. Christianity? It demands the observance of the parental and marital relation in the case of every disciple, white and black, and that is utterly inconsistent with the very existence of slavery. Let a Christian owner try any improvement upon the culture of his slaves; like a dog with a tin kettle tied to his tail he would be run out of the country, with Abolitionist! fastened to him in no time."

"Well, then," says his theorizing friend, "Heaven may permit the Confederacy to gain its independence, to set up for itself, isolated from all the world, as a nation peculiar in this—that it claims to be Christian, yet on the basis of slavery. The Ruler of all may permit this that said nation may work out its own ruin apart from all the world by the law of self-destruction inherent in every wrong thing; or that, as a distinctively slave yet nominally Christian nation, it may be the object of His swift and direct vengeance."

"I prefer," grumbles Mr. Ferguson, "to take a plainer, more common-sense view. By Secession the South is at arm's-length from the National Government, and Heaven is giving that Government both will and power to scourge the South out of Secession and slavery, and back into civilization, Christianity, the Union, and the nineteenth century. That is the way Providence has worked from creation till now—by means."

But Mr. Arthur's attention is rambling. He has lived all his life at the South; and as he walks up and down there come up into his mind the many instances of oppression, cruelty, corruption, awful sin, which have passed under his own eye in connection with, and the direct and, as human nature is constituted, the necessary fruits of just such an institution. How many, many there are! Were he outside the South he would not mention one of them to a soul. He would not narrate a single instance of them all even to Mr. Ferguson. He almost blamed himself for recalling them to memory. He an Abolitionist, even in thought! Perhaps ten years hence people even at the South will hardly appreciate the horror with which such a man as he shrank then from the thought. He ventures now only this far:

"People say I am not sound, Mr. Ferguson. They are right in a sense. I am very much apart from them. If I could only stand up and speak! I am so true Southern man, they say. As if the believing in and urging on the men and the things which have destroyed, are destroying, my own native soil, as I know they are, constitutes that! And here I am gagged, tied hand and foot, not permitted to do or say one thing for my country, dearer to me now than ever. Make a gesture even to save it, and I die. Running daily peril of death for even thinking and feeling—"

"Patience, man!" interrupts his cooler friend. "You can at least preach the Gospel."

"Not all of it. Not the many parts of it bearing directly on the times. No Sunday passes that there are not those at church expressly to see if there is a syllable in sermon or prayer upon which they can lay hold. More than once I have had persons throw themselves, as if cowardly, in my way, who spoke in denunciation of slavery and Secession expressly to trap me. But if it was not for this spiritual apathy into which we have all fallen! I pray, I strive, I can not move it even though as with the finger of an infant. I can not even grapple with it in my own bosom. Powerless, absolutely powerless!" and he falls into a chair and covers his face with his hands.

"Only mortified pride," says the Scotchman, with the promptitude of a surgeon. "Heaven would use you if it needed you. Who knows? You may be in training for future usefulness. And then you may not be: only an atom, any way! When you have learned your own entire foolishness you may lean upon Heaven enough for it to use you in the future."

"I feel at times as if there is no future," rejoins Mr. Arthur, after a silence. "That is, as if I had reached the end of my career. No country left me. The very Church of God powerless, or worked as the most powerful of all engines to delude and destroy the South. I will tell you what is about all my conclusion just now"—drawing a Concordance toward him as he sits at the table.

The Scotchman patiently listening, the young theologian proceeds, with alacrity and increasing cheerfulness as he makes his points more and more past all doubt from Scripture, to prove conclusively that the world will end, in all probability, in a year or so. He rapidly explains from Daniel and Revelation the twelve hundred and sixty years; no doubt on that point. Now for the exact date from which this period is to draw. Scott, Henry, Dr. Cummings, Gibbon—Milton says differently, but isn't to be trusted—dozens of books are torn down from the shelves and consulted. The Emperor Phocas did declare Gregory universal bishop in 606 A.D. "Can you show me on what ground we are to doubt it?" asks Mr. Arthur, eagerly. "Now add 606—please do it yourself on that slip of paper—to the twelve hundred and sixty."

"For the year in which the world is to end? I can calculate without ciphering," says the grizzled Scotchman, with amusement under his beard. "Exactly eighteen hundred and sixty-six."

"But really and in good earnest," pleads his friend, as if for a gift. "You know I never indulge in idle speculations in private or in public; but it really does look as if it may be the year of the end of all. God in mercy grant it!"

"All stuff, man!" says the callous Scotchman, rising from his seat with a yawn. "You would not say so if you had heard to-day of the final success of the Federals, not even if you had heard of any great victory on their part. Nonsense, man! Of that day and that hour—you remember." And Mr. Ferguson, conscious of the flowers on the table, the fair face he sees at Sunday-school, and the youth and energy of his friend, of his own new purpose too, says, emphatically, "For one, I hope not."

"Besides," adds the Scot, in his own room, half an hour later, and with his collection open on a table before him, "it would be the greatest pity," passing his hand lovingly over the past pages, "the greatest pity in the world for such a collection as this to be buried up incomplete, even if it is by a world on fire!" and thereupon Mr. Ferguson falls into meditation as to what kind of binding will be good enough for said collection; and which of the Edinburgh public libraries most worthy of it at his death—all when the Confederacy is exploded. "My only fear is it will not last long enough!" he adds.

TWENTY-FIVE DARK HOURS.

It's what we call a ganger, and have so many men under me when we're making a new line of rail. I passed best part of my time in the country; but I have worked on the lines in France and Spain; but what I'm about to tell you happened in London, where we'd sunk a shaft right down, and then was tunneling forwards and backwards—the shaft being to get rid of your stuff, and sometimes for a steam-engine to be pumping up the water. It's rather dangerous work, and a many men gets hurt; but then a great deal of it's through carelessness, for lots of our fellows seems as though the whole of their brains is in their backs and arms, where they're precious strong, and nowhere else; but I'd got so used to it that in cutting or tunnel it was all the same to me, and now I was busy supering the men digging, and sometimes bricklaying a bit, so that I thought very little about danger when I'd seen as all the shores and props was well in their places.

It was just at the end of the dinner-hour one day, and I was gone down the shaft to have a good look round before work began again, and I'd got my right-hand man, Sam Carberry, with me. It was a new shaft, about thirty feet deep, with ladders to go down, and a windlass and baskets for bringing up stuff and letting down bricks and mortar.

We hadn't tunneled more than p'raps some ten or a dozen foot each way, so as you may suppose it was werry fresh—green, as we calls it; and I wasn't quite satisfied about the shoring up, and so on, for you know fellows do get so precious careless when once they've got used to danger; and as for some of our big navvies, why they're just like a set o' babies, and for every thing else but their regular work they're quite as helpless. Tell 'em to fill a lorry, or skid a wheel, or wheel a barrow, they'll do it like snags; but as to taking care o' themselves—but then, I needn't say no more about that—just look at the great, good-tempered, lolling fellows! A man can't have it all ways; and if he's got it all in bones and muscle, why 'tain't to be expected as he's going to have all the brains too.

"That's giving a bit there, Sam," I says, a-pointing to one part o' the shaft where the earth was a-bulging and looked loose. "That ain't safe. There'll be a barrow full o' stuff a-top o' somebody's head afore the afternoon's over. That's the rain—that is. Take your men and knock out that lower shore, and we'll put it a couple o' foot higher up. Mind how you does it!" Sam nods his head, for he was a chap as never spoke if he could help it, and then he gets up, while I takes a look or two at the brickwork, so as not to be done by the men, nor yet dropped on by the foreman. Then I hears Sam banging away at the bit o' scaffold-pole, and directly after it comes down with a hollow sound; and then there was a rattling o' loose gravelly earth as I peeps out, and then feels as though my heart was in my mouth, for I shouts out: "That's the wrong one!" But in an instant Sam dropped to the bottom, and as he did so it seemed as though some one drew a curtain over the hole, and then I felt a tremor as blow on the chest, and was driven backward and dashed up against the wood scaffolding in the tunnel, and I suppose I was stoned, for I knew nothing more for a bit. Then it seemed as though I was being called, and I sorter waks up; but every thing was dark as pitch and silent as death, and, feeling heavy and misty and stupid, I shut my eyes again, and felt as if going to sleep, for there didn't seem to be any thing the matter to me. It was as though something had shut up thought and sense in the dark, and not a wick of light could get in. But there I was in a sort of dreamy, comfortable state, and lay there perfectly still till a growling noise roused me, when thought came back with a blinding flash, and so sharp was that flash that my brain seemed scorch'd, for I knew that I was buried alive.

For a few minutes I stood where I first rose up in a half-sleeping position, with my head and shoulders touching the poles and boards above me; but a fresh gust made me begin to feel about in the darkness, and try to find out where I was, and how much room I had to move in. But that was soon done, for at the bottom there was about a yard space, and as far up as I could reach it seemed a couple of yards, while the other way there was the width of the tunnel. I dared not move much, though, for the earth and broken brickwork kept rolling and crumbling in, so that every moment the space grew less, and a cold sweat came out all over my face, as I thought that I should soon be crushed and covered completely up. Just then, however, another growl sounded close by me, and for the first time I remembered Sam Carberry, and began feeling about in the direction from whence the sound came.

Bricks, bits o' stone, crumbling gravel, the uprights and cross-pieces and bits of board all in splinters, and stapped in two and three pieces, with their ragged ends sticking out of the gravel. But I could feel nothing of Sam, and I sat down at last, panting as though I had been running, and there was the big drops a-rolling off me, while I drew every breath that heavy that I grew wild with horror and fear; for it seemed as though I shouldn't be able to breathe much longer, and then I must be stifled. It was awful, the thoughts of all that; and had such an effect on me, that I dashed about like a bird in a cage—now here, now there—in mad efforts and struggles to get out. I cried, "Help, help!" and swore and tore about, jumping up and plunging my hands into the earth; till at last, panting, and bleeding, and helpless, I lay upon the gravel crying like a child.

Ah! That did me good, and seemed to clear my thoughts, and make me mad with myself to think I had been wasting my strength so for nothing, when perhaps I might have been doing something toward making my escape; and while I was thinking like this, all at once I started, for there was a growl again close to my head; then, after feeling about a bit, I got my hand upon a bit of broken board, when I felt a green again, and then, after searching about, found that underneath the board was a face which, by scratching away the earth, I could touch, and feel to be warm.

The first thing I did was to start up and strike my head violently against a cross-piece, so that I was half stunned; and then I began to feel about for a shovel till I got hold of a handle, and found that the rest was so tightly bedded in the soil, that I must have been a good hour grubbing it out with my fingers. But I kept leaving off to go and speak to the face, which I knew must be that of Sam Carberry; and though, poor fellow, it did him no good, he being quite insensible, yet it did me good, for there was company—I was not alone—and after leaving off that way now and then, I worked again like a good 'un till the shovel was at liberty; for while I was hard at work I had no time to think about any thing else.

And now, though I could feel that poor Sam was breathing, he didn't groan; and I began with the shovel to try and set his face more at liberty; but at the first trial I threw down the tool with a horrible cry, as the loose gravel came rattling down, and in another minute the poor fellow's face would have been completely covered if I had not thrust myself against the earth and kept it back.

If I could only have kept from thinking I would not have cared; but now that I was forced to keep still and hold up the earth, the thoughts would keep coming thick and fast, and mixed up with them all were coffins—black cloth coffins with white rails; black coffins with black rails; elm coffins; work-house shells; and inside every one of 'em I could see myself lying stiff and cold. There was one light-grained elm, which looked sometimes quite like a little speck right off in the distance, and then came gradually closer, and closer, and closer, till it seemed as though the next moment it would crush me, or drive me into the earth where I was crouching; then it would gradually go back further and further till it was quite a speck again. Then there were processions o' people in black, constantly crowding by.

Now and then there was a noise of a stone falling or a little bit of rolling earth, else all was as still and silent as if there wasn't such a thing as hearing. It was so still that the quietness was horrible, and I began to talk out loud for the sake of having something to hear; and then I listened again, hoping to hear the sounds of pick and spade, for I knew they would be trying to dig us out, alive or dead.

"That'll be it," I says out aloud; "they'll dig, and dig, and dig till they gets to us; but then they've got all the stuff to get up the shaft, and shure up again as they goes, and I shall be gone long before they gets to me!"

Then the horror of death came again, and I leaped up and beat myself about till I was drenched with blood and sweat, and then I lay still again, with my heart throbbing and beating, and try what I would, I couldn't get enough breath. I tried to reach the face of my poor mate, and I found it still warm, and that the earth had not settled over it. It was company to be able to touch it so long as he was alive; but I thought about what must come, and then shivered as I felt that I should scrape the loose gravel over it, and creep to the far end of the narrow hole. And now I began, for the first time, to think about home, and my two girls, and their mother; and there was no comfort there, for I began to wonder what was to become of them when I was gone. Quietly as could be I calculated what my funeral would cost the Odd Fellows, and then about the allowance there'd be for my people out of the Widow and Orphan's Fund, and then I thought how things might have been worse than they was. At last of all, I feels quiet and patient like, and, for the first time since I'd been buried, I was down on my knees with my face in my hands.

I don't know how long I stopped like that, when all at once I fancied I heard a voice speaking, and I started up; but it sounded no more, and as I sat listening I could see again all sorts of things coming and going. Now it was coffins; now strange-looking beasts and things without any particular shape; and as they moved, and coiled, and rolled forward, I kept feeling as though they must touch me; but no, they glided off again, and at last, to keep from thinking, I stripped off coat and waistcoat, and, groping about till I got hold of the shovel, I cried out, "God help me!" and began to try and dig a way out.

"Every man for himself!" I half roared, and the curious, stifled sound of my voice frightened me; but I worked on till I had thrown back a few spadefuls, when I found that I had got it off too long, and that I could do nothing but sink down, panting for air. I couldn't keep off the idea that something was pressing down upon me and trying to force out my breath; at last this idea got to be so strong that I kept thrusting out my hands and trying to push the something away. I don't know how time went, but at last I was lying, worn out and helpless, upon the ground, feebly trying to grub or burrow a way out with my fingers.

All at once I remembered poor Sam, and after a good deal of groping about I found the board again, and laid my hand upon his face, but only to snatch it away with a chill running through me, for it was as cold as ice. Then I tried to touch his breast, but soon gave up; for, with the exception of his face, he was completely bedded in the earth, while the board had only saved him at the first moment from instantaneous death.

I crept as far off as I could; for now it seemed that death was very, very near me, and that my own time must be pretty well run out.

I won't tell you how weak I was again, and how all my past actions came trooping past me. There they all were, from boyhood till the present; and I couldn't help groaning as I saw how precious little good there was in them—just here and there a bright spark among all the blackness. At last I began to think it was all over, for a heavy, stupid faintness came over me, and I battled against it with all my might; but it was like—no, there, in that darkness—like a great bird cooling near, and nearer with heavy shadowy wings; and as I tried to drive it off it went back, but only to come again, till at last the place seemed to fade away; for after groping round and round the place such a many times I seemed to see and know every bit of it as well as if I saw it with my eyes, till it faded away, and all seemed to be gone.

Next thing as I remembers is a dull "thud-thud-thudding" noise, and it woke me up so that I set holding my head, which ached as though it would split, and trying to recollect once more where I was; and I s'pose my poor mind must have been a bit touched, for I could make nothing out until I had crawled and felt about a few times over, when once more it all came back with a flash, and I remember thinking how much better it would have been if I had kept half stunned, for now I knew what the noise was, and I could hardly contain the hope, which seemed to drive me almost mad. Would they get to me before I was dead? Could I help them? Would they give up in despair and leave me?

I lay listening to the "thud-thud-thud" till all at once it stopped, and the stillness that succeeded was so awful that I shrieked out, for I thought they had given up digging. But the dull, distant sound roused me again, and once more I lay listening and counting the spadefuls that I knew were being laboriously and slowly thrown out. Now I was crying weakly, now fuming at the mouth, every now and then the noise could not be heard; at last, when I could just faintly hear the sound of voices, and tried to shout in reply, I found I couldn't do more than whisper.

All at once the earth came caving in again, and I was half buried. Weak as I was, it took me long enough to get free, and to crawl up and sit behind an upright post or two; and it was well I did; for no sooner was I there than the gravel caved in again, and I heard a shout, saw a flash of light, and then was jammed close into the corner, and must have been suffocated but for the wood framing about me, which kept the earth off. But as I sat wedged in I could hear the sound of the shovels and picks, and I knew how men would toil to get out a leather-workman. And now, feeling quite helpless and resigned, I tried my best to pray for my life, or, if not, for merry for what I had done wrong.

"Ain't nobody here?" said a voice, as it seemed to me in the dark, and I could not speak to cry for help.

"Must be," said another voice. "Poor chap's under them planks!" And then came that sound of shovels again, and then a loud hurrying, and I felt hands about me, and that I was being carried, and something trickled into my mouth. Then voices were buzzing about me more and more, and I began to feel able to breathe, and I heard some one say, "He's coming to;" and then one spoke, and then another spoke, and I knew I was being taken up the shaft; but all was as it were in a dream, till I heard a loud scream, and felt two arms round me, and knowing that now I was saved indeed, I tried to say, "Thank God!" but could only think it.

After a bit I managed to speak, but I suppose I said all sorts of foolish, unconnected things, till I asked the time, when the voice that revived me so whispered in my ear that it was nearly three.

"And how long was I there?" I got out at last. "Twenty-five hours!"

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

The greatest but very important one to which the children of New York have condemned the first of May has rolled that festive day of older times of all its charms, Thanksgiving, blooming month, when budding buds and singing birds invite to universal rejoicing under the "brightening fields of ether," is, with us, devoted chiefly to sparkling furniture, and "getting settled." It is really a demonstration of the bright spring-time; and the poet's words are thereby, in part, fulfilled:

"The merry May hath pleasant hours, and drowsily they glide, As if they floated, like the leaves, upon a silver tide; The trees are full of crimson buds, the woods are full of birds, And the waters flow to music, like a tent with pleasant words."

In many country towns there still exists the pretty custom of Maying. The young folks are roused at daybreak by the ringing of the village bell, or, wanting that, by special call of some sleepless youth. They partake the woods, and, overturning the dead, damp leaves, or, perchance, brushing away a lingering layer of snow, discover the hiding-place of the sweet trailing arbutus, that delicate May flower, whose fragrant, pink blossoms are woven into a garland to crown the chosen Queen of May.

The gentlemen of our city who may, for a shilling, say day buy a bunch of spring violets from the little flower-girls on Broadway, do not understand the peculiar pleasure of feeling the soft blossoms in their native woods, unless, by chance, they have the memory of their childhood's home in the country.

The culture of flowers is a delightful occupation. In the city, however, there is little opportunity for it. A plot of ground a few feet square, which most likely the landlord monopolizes every Monday, or a narrow border around the little yard, is the average allowance. Nevertheless, wondrous can be accomplished in a little space by skillful management. And if ladies, who, in general, have the requisite skill and taste, will give a little attention to the matter now they will be repaid beyond by. It need not be an arduous labor. A gentleman will prepare the soil properly in half a day; and, if a lady will sacrifice her usual promenade for a few days, the time thus gained will enable her easily to accomplish the rest, and, we think, she will not lose her very checks in consequence. In selecting seeds and plants the simple, hardy varieties, and those which will blossom through the season, usually give more satisfaction than the more delicate kinds, which require special care. Mignonette, Helianthus, Verbena, Monthly Rose, Phlox, etc., are always to be depended upon. Chrysanthemums, Pinks, Asters, and similar plants will brighten the beds in autumn. So that by making a judicious selection one may have bonquets from her own garden all through the season. Let the children, too, come in for their share of the work and of the flowers. Give Harry and Lucy a tiny bed of their own, and show them how to drop in the seeds. If you will provide a little watering-pot, and let them pull up the weeds, of course they will pull up the plants too, their happiness will be complete.

Women, all the world over, love flowers; and there is no gift to them more delicate and appropriate than a bouquet of fresh blossoms. It is not, however, quite so generally understood that gentlemen often have an equally keen enjoyment of them; nor that it is an equally graceful tribute for a lady to place flowers upon the writing table, or by the breakfast plate of husband or brother, for his especial gratification. We know some gentlemen who particularly enjoy a bouquet for breakfast; and, doubtless, others would find one very appetizing as the warm weather comes on. It might answer instead of a toast or letters.

The Central Park is putting on its fresh spring dress. The "season" will open—weather permitting—on the first Saturday afternoon of May, by a concert. The musical people has been repaired and repainted—a great variety of rustic seats have been added; and, indeed, throughout the Park much has been done during the winter to increase its beauty and render it attractive. The improvements are most apparent in the upper section, which has hitherto been in a comparatively unfinished condition.

When "The American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals" is incorporated and exerts its authority, it may become possible to pass through Broadway and our other thoroughfares without being distressed by seeing overloaded or prostrate, struggling horses. At present it is seldom possible.

The following singular statistics of matrimonial life in Paris are reported:

During the past twelve months 2344 wives have fled the conjugal roof without leaving their future addresses; of husbands who have done likewise there are 4422; of married couples legally separated (not divorced) there are 1115; of dimes who have agreed to live apart, 5348; of husbands and wives living at different houses, 31,319; of happy couples, 43; of unusually indifferent, 61,436.

If this Parisian fashion is liable to prevail in this country more extensively than at present, some remedies should be circulated to check the epidemic. There must be plenty of them. Let us see. Here is a recipe for keeping a husband and making him good-natured:

"Keep his linen in prime condition, with the requisite degree of stiffness; never let him know the want of a button; give him well-baked beef-steak, wholesome bread, and a sparkling cup of coffee for his beverage; keep everything tidily and broken mockery out of his sight; do not annoy him with the blunders and extravagance of a child; greet his evening arrival with a glass, lightness face, well-combed hair, and a welcome kiss; have ready a cheerful supper, a bright fire in the grate, an easy-chair, with comfortable gown and slippers; be merry, and tell him some agreeable news; finally, give him a well-made bed in a cozy chamber."

Very good. New—well—verily, our moral cook-book does not contain a single recipe for making and keeping a good wife. That is strange. The inference is plain. Either wives as a class are not tender enough to be worth preserving any way, or else husbands have not skill enough to follow a recipe if they had one.

It is a matter of surprise—while threading our way through the ranks of children that run wild in the streets without any apparent care—that any of them should live to grow up. We should think they would be killed a dozen times where they are now! But careless as parents are about exposing their children to the dangers of the street, it seems reckless for a mother or nurse to suffer a child to thrust head and arms from an open window as they often do. A sad and not infrequent accident occurred the other day on one of the city cars which should be a warning to all. A passenger sat with his elbow out of the window, when the state of an empty car struck it. The arm was jammed so violently against the window post as to shake the whole car. The poor man said, "My arm is broken," and sank back and fainted.

The death of Dr. H. G. Ottendorf, so well known by his systems for acquiring foreign languages, is reported. He was a German Jew, of insignificant personal appearance, and although he had amassed a considerable fortune, he lived penuriously in the fourth or fifth story of a great chocolate factory in the Rue Richelieu. He had an immense number of pupils, although his rude and uncouth manners drove many away from him. He was about sixty years old, and leaves a wife and children who inherit his estate.

Somebody—we are unable to give the authority—reports the following childish "wonders," each one of which is suggestive enough for a text:

Wonder why mamma keeps Bridget at home from church to work all day, and then says it is wicked for me to build my rabbit-house on Sunday?

Wonder why my minister bought that pretty case with the yellow lion's head on the top, and then asked me for my coat to put in the missionary box? Don't I want a Jew's-sharp just as well as he wanted a case?

Wonder what makes papa tell each five stories to children about his making the master's mist when he went to school, and about his running away from the school-master when she was going to whip him, and then shut me up all day in a dark room because I tried once to be as smart as he was?

Wonder what made papa say that wicked word when Betty upset the ink all over his papers, and then slapped my ears because I said the same thing when my kite-string broke?

Wonder why mamma told Bridget the other day to say that she was out at home when Tommy Day's mother called, and then puts me to bed without my supper every time I tell a lie?

NASHVILLE, FROM EDGEFIELD.

NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, FROM THE OPPOSITE BANK OF THE CUMBERLAND.—[SEE PAGE 284.]

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY—IRON-CLADS PASSING LOUISVILLE FALLS AT HIGH WATER ON THE OHIO.—[See Page 296.]

CITY OF MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE, AFTER THE WAR.—[See Page 294.]

MANUFACTURED BY THE AMERICAN ENGRAVING CO. NEW YORK.

THE PASSION OF MARTIN HOLDFAST.

THERE were ten of us; but four brothers and five sisters had died ere I reached manhood. So, too, had my father and mother. I was left quite alone in the old house—half manor-house, half farm-house—before I was five-and-twenty.

I know not on God's earth a more abandoned and desolate spot than that on which the original Holdfast had chosen to establish his house. Along the northern seaboard of Bestshire runs a long range of sandy hills. They are as deserted as the desert. A few cones barrow in their sides, and when spring returns the shy curlew lays her eggs among the bent. Between the sandy rampart and the sea was a slice of navigable country, perhaps a mile in breadth. This narrow strip runs from the mouth of the Blackwater a dozen miles to the north. The population is thin and scattered. There are some half-dozen farm-houses; the cottages of a few fishermen under the lee of the Giant's Crag (which forms and protects a miniature harbor); Marvell Park, upon a bend of the Blackwater; and in its near neighborhood the Houghs. And the Houghs is the farm manor-house of which I have spoken, where the Holdfasts had lived and died, and where I—Martin Holdfast—was born.

The giant old house had once been gay enough; but its cheerfulness had died out as the unnoted years went by. I had been brought up in a gloomy creed. Hell was to me a tremendous reality before I had cut my first teeth. I was taught in the nursery that God was a terrible tyrant, who delighted in taking vengeance and in shedding blood. As I grew up the scheme was explained to me with amazing distinctness. We had it all laid down for us at school in the form of question and answer; and even to-day I can not look at the old text-book, ever whose awful and wicked riddles teacher and pupil—the pupil being ten years old—pounded themselves daily without feelings of indignation, horror, and astonishment.

Other lads could repeat this lesson without appearing to attach any weight to the words; but I could not. I was tormented by this vision which the gloomy logic of a theologian had conjured up—this vision of a race which a jealous God had created for eternal torment. I reflected, and I rebelled. To hold to such a faith would, I felt, drive me into the direct unbelief. I did not know who God might be; but I was determined, at all hazards, to deny that he looked with cruel complacency upon the agony of his creatures. On this ground I might find rest for the sole of my foot—for a time at least.

But Hackaback and Blastem, our parsons, did not stop here. I knew that Dr. Hackaback was at the dinner-table very much like other men—that he played a respectable rubber, and was particular about his port. Yet when he mounted the pulpit he told us that the world and the things of the world were accursed; that our bodies were the servants of Satan; that we were to see not merely from the wrath to come, but from all that seemed to make life beautiful and desirable—the lusts of the flesh, as he called them. Mr. Blastem was by some ascetical, and I believe that, more or less, he preached what he preached. But my whole mind revolted against the doctrine.

I had been designed for "the ministry," but my teachers found that I was possessed by an evil spirit of unbelief, and they let me go. And then, gun in hand, I wandered across desolate moorlands or by the sleepless sea, day after day, and left the theologians to carry on their windy war. The old place was very lonely by this time; but when a man is hardy in body and soul; loving the open air, his gun, his horses, his dogs; when he is five-and-twenty years old and six feet two in his stockings, he has no right to be permanently unhappy.

Nor was I—only I felt that the color of the life which I had inherited was somewhat gray. It wanted color and brilliancy. I was passively happy in the excitement of the chase; but our rustic merry-makings were not lively. Phyllis had soft persuasive eyes, not averse to love; but then her hands were red and lumpy, and the old farmer's views about the weather were as tedious as a sermon by Dr. Hackaback. The fisher's life did not lack adventures; how could it, when their field of battle and glory was the sea; yet on land, though good fellows in the main, they were sadly prosy; and their serious talk had a flavor of Blastem which was not seductive.

There was one house, indeed, which was not utterly hard and prosaic and unlovely, like the rest. An air of romance—the only romance I thought that lingered anywhere about—blew through Marvell Park. But Marvell Park was empty, and had been empty for many years.

The chief approach to the Park is distant about a mile from the giant old house that I have been describing. The Marvell mansion looks down upon the Blackwater—here half sea, half river. Twice a day

The sea-sea, water passes by, And makes a din in the hills.

Of the present Marvells I knew little or nothing. I knew indeed that the old lord, who had lived, not at Marvell Park, but at some princely palace in a remote Highland county, had recently died. I knew that he had, per force, left the title and the bulk of his estates to a son whom he had driven from the castle, because he (the son) had unflinchingly persisted in attending the parish church of a Sunday when he was needed to make the fourth at a rubber; I knew that he had left Marvell Park to a distant cousin—a plain Henry Marvell, who had long held a high diplomatic post at a Continental Court. More than this I did not know, and my ignorance was shared by all my neighbors.

Opposite the point where at low-water the Blackwater joins the sea, a dyke or embankment has been formed. The land lies low, and, until this dyke was raised, had been frequently flooded. I sat here, gun in hand, one afternoon about the middle of the month of February. The tide was full, and washed the pebbles on the other side of the dyke. It was a true February day—cold, cheerless, inhospitable. The evening shadows were already gathering into the sky while I sat and watched the ducks as they flew up and down the bends of the river, and an old seal which thrust its ballet-head occasionally above water to squint at the salmon-net. Angus, the tackman, had urgently implored me to free him from the deprivations of this wily old rascal. He declared, with tears in his eyes, that it had made his life a burden to him. It had had a bite out of every large salmon he had caught this year, and once or twice, when entangled among the nets, it had viciously smashed them right and left. The old thief was keeping his distance just now, but a bright-eyed vigilant northern diver was sailing within shot. He had come up with the tide, and, having finished his afternoon meal, was looking about him before going off to sea. I had raised my gun, half-minded to give him the benefit of a cartridge, when the sound of skates on the frozen canal at my back—shrill in the frosty stillness—caught my ear, and I turned round.

Artemis and her train! one of her nymphs at least. On she came, with the swift, lithic, indolent ease of an accomplished skater—blissing through the keen February air—her cheeks rosy with the cold and the freshness of her flying feet. She came; who, I knew not; I knew only that a lovely apparition had rushed swiftly out of the February gloom and had steadied herself at my side. Color enough for you, my pre-Raphaelite masters! A dark purple jacket, a skirt of the same color, only a shade lighter, looped up above an orange petticoat; a wide-awake, covered with the skin of some strange animal—a leopard or panther—with a black-cock's feather stuck coquettishly at the side. I could not tell whether her face was pretty or the reverse; but I felt at least that she was supremely graceful, that every movement betrayed an exquisite obscurity, that each supple limb was soft and pliant and obedient to the lightest behest of the soul.

She had stopped at my side, but she did not notice me at first. "How beautiful!" she whispered to herself, as she looked across the embankment. A wintry gleam of sunshine had struck the sand-hills, making them all golden, and lighted up for a passing moment the silver sea. "How beautiful!" she then suddenly, with a little cry of pain, "Ah! my foot!"

She stooped to undo her skates, and then she saw me. She took me, perhaps, for a poacher or vagrant, for she gave a sharp, hurried glance backward along the canal; but her alarm, if she felt any, lasted but a moment. "I am afraid I must trouble you," she said, turning her eyes full upon me. "I must ask you, Mr.—Mr.—"

"Holdfast," I answered, for her voice interrogated.

She smiled; then I saw rightly how beautiful she was. Her smile lighted up her face as the sunrise lights up the sea.

"I am so glad! You are my neighbor, you know—or rather, you don't know me, do you? Do my skates? It hurts my ankles, see, May Marvell."

She held out her foot—a small, clean-cut, shapely foot, cased in a matchless little boot. A few inches of massive stocking, tight and taut, were visible above the boot; for her petticoat, without being exactly scrup, was obviously a very serviceable article, net by any means designed to restrict the free use of the limbs. I loosened her skates, and she thanked me with easy composure.

"I have lost John, our fat coachman, to whose care I was made over. The ice must have given way with him. But, though it gets dark at mid-day here, I can not lose my way, can I?"

I explained to her as well as I could that there was a short-cut across the bents to Marvell, and offering to show her the way to the Park gate, advised her to quit the ice and her skates. She did so at once—with perfect docility, and without a shadow of distrust, accepting the guidance of a stranger. That February walk through the gathering gloom decided the course of my life. Her manner was frank and unreserved. She talked rapidly—at least, words came rapidly to her, and she flung them from her—clear, bright ripples of talk, dashing over into a spray of mockery. Yet her gray eyes dreamt as freely as they mocked; they were soft, and when at rest, rested upon you with voluptuous passiveness. In her eyes, indolent yet restless; in the gliding and swimming grace of her gait; in her talk, passionate yet ironical; in her easy goodness and transient flashes of fierceness, one had glimpses of a nature that might perhaps have scared away a wiser man than I was.

We met Mr. Marvell at the Park gate, anxious about his daughter. She introduced me at once. "This is Mr. Holdfast, papa, our neighbor at the Houghs"—for she had learned all about me already—"he has been so good as to bring me home when I had lost my way." His manner was simple and courteous, and as I left he promised to call for me on an early day, and hoped that we might meet often, now they had come home. "The Holdfasts and the Marvells must have known each other of old."

I did not go home at once. I slowly retraced my steps to the point where we had met—very slowly. Yet I seemed to tread on air. A sudden ray rapture had entered into my life. The old landmarks were transfigured; I hardly recognized them. I had taken a first deep draught of the wine of Love. The moon had already risen, and a sea of silver light quivered and pulsed at my feet. But I saw her face only—the pure ample brow; the full lips, red and curled; the great gray, thoughtful eyes, with their long lashes; heard only the quick, bird-like twitter of her laugh; felt only the pressure of her hand, which had pressed mine at parting.

I struggled from the first in a blind, ineffectual way against the fascination of this girl. But she took me captive as a snake takes captive a bird. Before many days had passed I gave up the contest, and passively submitted to be carried whithersoever my good or evil fate might lead.

"Do you know, papa," she said, one day, while we were seated together in the afternoon twilight, "that I sometimes fancy I have got no soul?"

"You have got a temper, at least, my dear," said her father, blandly.

But she turned away from him with a little impatient shrug, and addressed herself to me.

"That church of yours is quite to my taste; Dr. Hackaback is such a ridiculous old dear! We must have him here, papa. Mr. Holdfast likes him as much as we do. And the sisters Peterson! I could study their bonnets forever. Is Dr. Hackaback a good man, Mr. Holdfast?" she continued, with an air of innocent inquiry.

I supposed that he was very much like his neighbors.

"Then I must get him to be my confessor. I have no end of iniquities to confess. But he must choose between me and the Misses Peterson. I am sure that their opinions are evangelical—such bonnets—and you know I belong to the Broad Church, Mr. Holdfast."

"I fancy Mr. Holdfast is not much interested in your theological experiences, May dear. She is very tenacious, Mr. Holdfast, is May. Ten days ago she wanted to be a nun, and asked me for ever so much to buy a veil."

"Don't tell tales, papa. You know it was a Brussels one I wanted. But I belong permanently to the Broad Church."

"Your friends of the Broad Church," said Mr. Marvell, "make things pleasant, at least." "And why shouldn't things be pleasant?" May retorted. "I am a coward at heart, and the dreadful stories these Evangelical people tell, and the way they swear at you, frightens me out of my wits."

May certainly liked things to be pleasant. I think she was naturally of a brave spirit; but she shrunk from whatever was disagreeable. She wrapped herself in soft furs; she made herself a warm nest; she strove in every way to shut out from her the ugly things of this world—want, pain, disease, sin, death. And thus they became more terrible to her imagination, for they are things that require to be looked in the face, and that grow full of menace to the half-averted eyes. She lived in the senses; and, like all who do so habitually, she had become timid and easily scared in the presence of the supernatural.

In one of our stamperes across the sand-hills I brought her to the old church-yard of the district. On a bright green margin of turf that overhangs the sea, bounded by a low wall through which our mountain ponies easily made their way, half a dozen old head-stones, telling how Alexander Davidson, Elspit Bell, and such like, had died in the odor of sanctity, and "a broken channel with a broken cross," where venerable Caldees had worshiped God after their fashion—such was the place. Railed off from the common earth, but rank with coarse grass and nettles, was the burial-ground of the Marvells—unscathed now for many years, for, as we know, the late head of the house had chosen another resting-place. Peering through the railings, we could read how "May Sybil Marvell" had been laid there a century before.

"She was my great-grandmother," said May, after a long pause.

Then we turned our horses, and rode silently along the bushes down.

She had been in gay spirits during our ride, but now she spoke not a word. Then turning upon me she said, almost fiercely,

"Why did you bring me here? It makes me shudder to think that we must come to that. How I hate death! Were we made only to be put away in such places, to rot beneath those loathsome nettles? Martin, this is cruel of you."

I would have excused myself, but she would not listen.

"Let us gallop along the shore," she said; "the sweet salt air will drive such fancies away. Thank God, there is life in me yet a while!"

She urged her pony with bridle and whip, and we galloped for a while along the firm shore. Soon the moss came back to her cheek; her eyes flashed, as the pace grew faster; the blood danced merrily in her veins.

"I beg your pardon, Martin"—she called me Martin now, as if I was a cousin or a servant—"but the world is so lovely, and life is so sweet, and then it is all so dark and dreary outside. Let us banish these evil fancies, and say good-by to the King of Horrors."

We had come to the fisher's village, and I dismounted for a moment to tighten a girth. As we passed, a sweet voice rose from a group of women who were seated on low three-legged stools in front of the cottages, baiting the lines for to-morrow's fishing. The words of the song, I think, were these:

THE FISHER LAD.

Elie, the lass with the golden curls, Slaps like the thrushes and climbs with the squirrels: All night-long she snoops in her nest, And dreams of the fisher-boy out in the West.

All night-long he rocks in his boat, And hums a song as he lies afloat— A song about Elie, the rosiest lass That blooms on the cliff where the night-wind blows.

The sun deck dives, and the towering lark Flies, with shrill whistles, into the dark; And, hearing the herring-netts over the side, Night-long the fisher-boy drifts with the tide.

Under his feet the herring are steaming; Over his head the stars are dreaming; And he sits in his boat as it rocks in the night, And watches and waits for the morning light.

The wind is soft, and the stars are dim, But never a mermaid whispers to him; And the dews may wrattle her white notes, But she won't beguile him out of his boat.

At break of day from the sandy bay He draws his net, and he calls away— "Over the foam let gipsies roam, But Love is best when it stays at home."

May listened with delight. "It is Maggie Beaton, the cripple," I whispered.

"What a musical voice! I must get the air and the words. Let us speak to them. You know them, I suppose?"

We rode forward, and they greeted us with natural courtesy. May took possession of one of the three-legged stools, and sitting down beside the crippled child, fondled and caressed her. The child gazed admiringly upon the glorious beauty of the face, and was easily induced to repeat the simple air. May had a retentive memory, and in a wonderfully short space had made the air and the words her own. Then with a compassionate career to the child, and a kindly greeting to the older woman, she mounted again, and we rode home.

In the evening we criticised the new books, and tiring of this May went to the piano. "What do you think of this, papa?" she inquired, and then she sang the little air which she had got from the fisher-girl. Her voice was sweet as heaven; I never heard the same bird-like, bell-like notes in any other voice save hers. Then, again, she discoursed soft, sad music, and anon dashed into the riot of a wild Hungarian waltz.

"You recollect how they danced it at Pech, papa? It was the wildest, most picturesque thing imaginable. Do you know the step, Mr. Holdfast?"

"No, I don't dance."

"I can teach you it in a minute; like all these national dances, it looks intricate, but is in reality perfectly simple: see, this is the step."

And then bringing her feet out of her simple skirts—clean-cut, serviceable, matchless little feet—she showed me how it was done.

"You are not so clumsy as I expected. Now, give me your hand, and put the other round my waist. So—so. Oh, you graceful bear, you have torn my dress!" she exclaimed, with a little shriek of affected dismay, as she jumped from my arm. As I walked home that night I understood how men and women had died for love. I had caught glimpses of a passionate rapture which might kill like organic poisons. I had held her in my arms, she had leaned against my heart, her hair had fanned my cheek. I did not sleep all night; I was sick with love; with love from which, as the Athenian poet said, none escape, neither mortal man nor the Undying Ones.

April that year was provokingly fickle. Sunny showers and rain-touched sunbeams chased each other the livelong day. The spring was torn amidst laughter and frequent tears.

On one of these days we were surprised by sudden storm. We were not far from the Houghs at the time when the rain began, and we made at once for the giant old house. Somehow it did not look quite so grand with the rain-clouds driving across the roof—it looked gaunter always in the quietude of summer days. Ere we reached the door we were drenched to the skin, for the water came down in torrents. It was one of those storms when the heaven abandons itself to the fury of tears, and weeps without restraint.

For the first time my mistress stood beneath my roof-tree, her gay plumes sadly draggled. Jen, however, though grim, was fertile in expedients, and she took Miss Marvell under her wing. In a little while May returned, so disgraced that I hardly knew her, to the little parlor where I waited. She had donned an old-fashioned silk dress, that had been intended originally for a much larger woman, and her exquisite rosy smile faded out from below an enormous hood that my grandmother or my great-grandmother had worn.

"I am the ghost of your grandmother come to rebuke you for your sins," said May. "My beloved grandchild," she continued, with charming mock gravity, "I have returned from the next world, where I am comparatively comfortable, solely on your account. Evil communications corrupt good manners, and I do not like the company you keep. These English people at the Park are undermining your principles. Already you have begun the downward career. You walked in the fields last Sabbath; next Sabbath you will steal the spoons; then you will take to drinking and smoking; then you will run away with old Goody; then you will know when Dr. Hackaback is preaching. Ichabod! Ichabod! the glory is departed," and the anxious representative of the Holdfasts drew the cloak round her face, and gazed out the backslidings of the house.

Her mimetic power was perfect. She would have made a great actress.

"That queer old duck, Goody," she continued, in her own voice, "is a perfect treasure. She allowed me to ransack your grandmother's wardrobe. I hope you like the result;" and she made me a stately courtesy, such as old Mrs. Julian Holdfast may have made about the beginning of the last century.

I admitted that it did credit to her taste.

"I've a great mind to keep it for our theatricals in summer—it does become me, I think. Martin, what a lovely face!"

As she spoke she pointed to a picture on the wall—a bright, true face, on which all the charities that make life sweet were written.

"My mother's portrait."

"Your mother?" she said, in an altered tone. "It is a face one might trust forever. Martin, you are happier than I. You had a mother; I never knew mine. Perhaps—" Here she paused.

A softer mood than I had ever known in her succeeded. I looked away, for there was a trouble in her voice. I looked away; but I did not do so I must have fallen at her feet and kissed the hem of her robe. I never loved her so wildly, so passionately, either before or after, as I did at that moment. Her eyes, traveling round slowly and dreamily, rested on me; she recovered herself directly; her exquisite sensitiveness warned her what was coming—told her of the words that quivered upon my lips.

A keen, defiant light came into her face. It said as plainly as words: "No, I shall not and can not bear you. I do not love you. Speak a word and I leave you forever." But about she only said, coldly, "I think the carriage must have come."

I resolved that I should go no more to the Park. It was clear, here me on as the night at times, that she did not love me. And I—this poisonous joy which had crept into my blood was eating up my life. But I would cast it out; and so for a week, gun in hand, I tramped over the sand-hills, returning at night weary and fagged and wretched.

At the end of the week came a note from May: "Dear Mr. HOFFEST,--I have been in bed a week, but am better. Kate Saville comes next month, and we must begin our rehearsals. But I can not make up my mind what play to choose. Will you come and help me to-day? They do. You know we close at seven."
"M. R. M."

Of course I did not go; of course you would not have gone? Perhaps not; if you and I were wiser than Solomon and older than Methuselah. Otherwise I think I know what road we would take and where it would lead us.

I had resolved to keep myself well in hand, but my passion was visible in my face. I think that even Mr. Marvell must have noticed it; for after dinner, as we sat for a moment over the wine, he led the conversation to his daughter. He probably knew more of her experiences than I did, and good-naturally desired to warn me.

"She is a clever little witch, is May, but as untamable as a fly. It is a pity she is such a tremendous coquette--only all women are coquettes. Fill your glass, Mr. Hoffest; I got that wine from Rotterdam."

He held up his own against the light as he continued:

"I think a taste for sound old claret is about the soundest taste we can cultivate. And it is a duty to single out sound enjoyments; for the costs of life are easily exhausted. The horizon grows gray; enjoyment flags; the senses fall us. We close up all the avenues to pleasure before we know that they are so few. And when they come, the supreme rewards of sorrow are poor and valueless. Your mistress's kiss does not burn as it used to burn; the truth is, she loves you. You don't relish the wit and the courtesies as of yore; your stomach is not what it was, and you weary of D--'s old jokes. My good Sir, a woman is only a woman; and when you once get behind the scenes you learn how you have been imposed upon, and swear never again to find a world of romance in a sheet of pasteboard and a pot of paint."

He filled his glass and paused meditatively. "You know Clavering by name--an obstinate old man; he made a terrible mess in China. Well, Clavering once said a good thing--by mistake. At a dinner of the men of our time at Cambridge he got pathetic over those who had left us, and made a delightful malapropism: 'Some of them are happily dead; others, alas! are married.' Our shout of laughter decomposed him terribly; and when he found that he had transposed the words he insisted on putting them right, amidst still noisier shouts. But I think the first edition was, after all, the true one, and had I been Clavering I would have stuck to it."

This was the philosophy that reared me into the drawing-room, where the witch sat dreaming in the fire-light.

A witch indeed, as you would have confessed had you heard her sing that night in an arch, airy, half-passionate, half-mocking, that suited the words well, Lodge's delightful song:

Love in my bosom, like a bee,
Doth suck his sweet;
Now with his wings he plays with me,
Now with his feet;
Within mine eyes he makes his nest,
No lock, no key, can open this;
My kisses are his daily feast,
And yet he robs me of my rest:
Ah! woman, will you?
And if I sleep, O he
With pretty slight,
And makes his pillow of my knee
The divining right;
Strike I the lute, he tunes the string;
He makes plays, if I but sing;
He leads me easy lovely things,
Yet e'er he my heart doth sting:
Ah! woman, will you?

Realized can mock a little at love even while she complains, but I had taken the disease in its worst shape, and was past jesting. A physician--could we physic Love!--would have said from the beginning that my malady was mortal.

Our theatrical projects, however, kept us in the mean time constantly employed. But although we unpacked the library we could not agree upon a piece. This play was too warm, that was too cold; we would not muster performers for one, nor properties for another.

"I wish we had a poet among us," said May; "only poets are such dull people to have in a country-house. I knew a poet once. I was left to amuse him, and he nearly bored me to death. He told me that he had lost his heart to a particular friend of mine, but I didn't believe him; he had written so many rubbishy poems about the affection, that he had no heart left to love. Do you recollect the song he wrote for me, papa, and which you said he had stolen from Master Lovelace? It went somehow thus, I think:

With frowns and tears and smiles,
And sighs and wiles,
The May her gown beguiles;
But my May keeps the grace
Of true love in her face.
Sweet is May's hawthorn hedge,
And by the water edge,
The meadow of the edge;
But my May's answerer far
Than hawthorn hedge are.
The thrush repeats her tale,
And the sad nightingale
With passion floods the vale;
But my May's stranger thrills
My soul among the hills.
The kisses of the May
Are scattered every day
On all who come this way;
But my May's lips are kept Like choicest violet.

And so the foolish fellow ran on, with much more on the same key. But he might help us now, could we lay hands on him. Do you recollect what he was called, papa?"

But Mr. Marvell had entirely forgotten. "We couldn't well advertise for him, I suppose, so we must do without him, and take one of these two. Which is it to be?"

The first was a little gay French vaudeville--artless as the best art is, but exquisitely graceful and petulant. There was absolutely nothing in the story, but the people in it talked about nothing in the most charming way. The hero and his mistress made desperate love; but they clearly didn't care a copper far each other, and their passion ran off in epigrams. "My beautiful lady," said the lover on his knees at last (he went down quite leisurely), "My beautiful lady, have pity on me." And the lady answered, "No, I have no pity. Je suis la belle dame sans merci." And so the play ended.

No, that would not do. May felt perhaps that it was overlike the play she had on hand; so we chose the other. It was Goethe's Egmont.

Kate Saville had not yet appeared, and Miss Marvell and I read the great play together. There was something in it--in Clara's unreflective rapture, in Egmont's heroic recklessness--that fascinated her imagination.

I was but a sorry Egmont, I fear--so poor a performer that Miss Marvell sometimes snatched the part out of my hand, and swore (as ladies swear) that she would be the Count herself. And then, mulling herself in some covert or shadow that lay at hand, she would show me with admirable patience how it was done; how Egmont, bending over his mistress, had clasped his cloak, and disclosed the jeweled collar of the Golden Fleece. "But this is not my Egmont."

I wonder sometimes that I lived through it all. I was like a man in strong fever, now on fire, anon my teeth chattering with cold. I was in rapture and in agony. This witch had poisoned my blood. As she bent over me that night, as I felt her breath touch my cheek, I was as jealously mad, as ferociously miserable, as Othello. I knew that my senses were deserting me; this potent enchantress had changed me into some wild animal that I did not recognize; and I fled affrighted from her spells. What if I should smother her in my blind rage, as the Moor smothered his bride? As I looked out on the black pools of water on which the moonlight lay, I swore that, come what might, I should not go to her again.

I kept my word. I did not approach the Park. But Fate was stronger than my will. I was to see her once more beside the sea.

She had been walking, and she came up to me with a beautiful flush on her face.

"Kate Saville has come," she said, "and we are ready for a rehearsal. Where have you been for ever so long?" Then, without waiting for my answer, "I hope you are perfect in your Egmont?"

"I do not mean to be Egmont," I answered, gloomily.

"You are not going to desert us, surely?"

"I shall not act."

"Mr. Hoffest, this is too bad. Kate will be inconsolable."

But I would not. She never asked my reason; she knew by instinct what I meant. She should have gone then; but she still waited.

"Will nothing tempt you? Come up to-night. Kate shall give you a song, her voice is superb; and I--I will give you a smile," the coquette said, while a lovely one crossed her eyes and lighted up her mouth.

"Temptress!" I muttered, eying her almost savagely.

"My dear Martin," she said all at once, quite seriously, "what all you? One would fancy that you took me for a witch. I suppose the best that you expect is to see me ride away on a broomstick;" and she affected to point like a spell-bound child that has been crossed.

But I looked her full in the face (for I had ceased to fear her--I was reckless and desperate), and I saw that her eyes did not defy me.

Then came the end.

I took hold of her hand as we stood together and clasped it in mine. She was not offended; she did not resist; I fancied there was an answering pressure. Her touch kindled all the blood in my body into a blaze. I turned and looked her full in the face. The smile had faded off the upturned mouth and cheeks, which were pale with fear or passion or love, but it still lingered in her eyes, and I felt that her eyes consented. I stooped down and kissed her on the lips. I was mad with love, and her lips did not resist. For a moment they clung to mine, or seemed to cling. Had Heaven been in the other scale I could not have foregone that kiss. Then the softness died out of her eyes; her face grew set and hard and cruel; she curled herself out of my arms, and retreating swiftly and stealthily, gained a little knoll, from which she turned and faced me. Her eyes were full of scorn; she crouched a little, as if with angry shame; at the very moment I thought of a panther-cat in act to spring.

"Sir!" she said, flashing out magnificently, "have you forgotten that you are a boor?"

The voice rang with mockery and bitter pride; yet, turning suddenly, she bowed her face into her hands and sobbed convulsively. Her being shook beneath the storm. It was not a summer shower; it was a convulsion of nature. I was by her side in a moment; my arm was round her waist; she was tagging at the strings of her hat. "Loose them!" she said; "they are choking me." She sat down on the bank, but for many minutes could not control her hysterical sobs. Her whole nature was moved--perhaps it needed such a convulsion to teach her that she had a heart.

"May," I asked, penitently, "what have I done?"

"Martin, you have humbled me bitterly. It is my fault; I know that I led you on. I have been false, light, unsteady."

"You are the delight of my eyes," I murmured, passionately.

"No, no!" she replied, piteously; "do not speak so. You can not be so sorely hurt; it would make me miserable to think that you were hurt."

"Hurt!" I exclaimed; "it is a hurt I shall carry with me to the grave--gladly." Then such a look of pained entreaty crossed her face that I stopped abruptly. For a moment there was silence; but she did not speak.

"May," I whispered, "you know how I love you; can not you love me a little?"

"No," she said, steadily, through her sobs; "I have no love in my heart. I am too hard to love. I do not love you." I turned very pale; and her eyes sought mine pitifully. "Martin, how have I deceived you? You must have known how cold my heart was. Why have you been so blind?"

"May--May!--might you not learn to love me?"

"It is impossible," she said. Her tears were dried, and she had gathered herself up to go. Her face was hardening again. Her mood had changed--as I pressed her. I felt the chill coming. "It is impossible. It can not be."

Yet I persevered; what will not a man do for dear life when he is drowning? "Do not shut hope out from me," I said.

"It is best to speak plainly at once," she replied--and her voice had recovered its clear, musical, mocking ring; "I can not give you my love, for--among other reasons--it is pledged to another. Good night!"

"Audley?" I echoed, mechanically.

"Yes, Audley--the House of Commons man. Audley is my betrothed," and then added, God knows with what bitterness, "My love, my love, my love, my Egmont!"

"Are you a woman?" I said, moodily, yet with unnatural calmness--for I was dazed by her cruel beauty--"Are you a woman, or a tiger's cub?"

Then I turned upon my heel and left her where she stood. She did not call me back; yet I fancy sometimes in my dreams (it is fancy only) that I heard her say "Martin" softly amidst a low burst of weeping. I never saw her again.

I never saw her again. My heart was still hard against her when I heard one say, "She is dead." Even in death I did not forgive her. Had she not burned up my heart? Had she not lured me to the very gates of hell? Had she not left me with a slight, dainty, scornful, mocking smile? But one day (when my fever was over--for I had been stricken by the plague of which she died) I wandered listlessly, mechanically, along the shore till I reached the church-yard among the sand-hills. A low name, I noticed, was carved upon the wall. Another "May Sybil Marvell" had been laid out of the sunshine under where the rank nettles grow. Then--remembering who had last stood by my side on this turf, remembering that April evening--my heart forgave her, and all my fierce love turned into tender pity. She might have been fickle and treacherous; but at least she had had my whole heart, and she had been to me what no other woman could be again.

And it may be (I say sometimes to myself, as the old bitterness returns for a moment) that I am her debtor. She taught me in a few days the lesson which old men, even to their fourscore years, have sometimes failed to learn. It takes long to squeeze the fever of hope out of the heart; many a bitter dismissal, many a sharp disillusion to make a man utterly happy and apathetic. But I took my dose at a draught, and since that hour am cured.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

ILLUMINATE DULL. Three young men were discovered in a respectable office in Dublin drilling a cat. They were removed to the police-station.

YOUR CHOICE PAY. Why can't the Irish perform the play of Hemlock?--Because they always make Aphasia of the tonic.

"I say, boy, how far do those rocks run into the sea?" asked a gentleman of a half-dressed, hair-shirted fisherman's son on the east coast of Scotland. "They duns rin aw, sir, they just lie still there."

Old Tom Cat, when at defiance, cathepally scolded the dogs. They cat-head in broken. No cross will you cat-moment the shells and cat-houses. They cat-head will no more be head. The catastrophe was in the category of thy life. No catastrophe will bear thee to the catastrophe. Cat-heads will sing and to move far thee. Her cat-head. They will rejoice in thy cat-head. The catastrophe that bound thee to thine life is broken. No catastrophe will be shed on thy demise. They had been the "Cathode" of thy species. Thy head will not be so downy catastrophe. No catastrophe will be taken of thee. Thy cat-hatting was allowed. No cat-head will be wrapped in thy gossamer. Thy catastrophe is hatched forever. They had gone over the catastrophe of gossamer. They had sipped thy hot cat-tee. They set awed from the catastrophe of cat-tee. Thy catastrophe is shock. Cat-heads will cry on thy grave, and cat-head and catastrophe. And cat-heads may sigh over thy resting-place for aught we care. Adieu, old Tom!--a hot cat-head!

A Connecticut doctor was attending a very poor and feeble pair of cows in a very large load of wood. A neighbor asked him how he expected to get so large a load to market with so poor a team. The doctor replied that he expected to have some assistance from Divine Providence. His neighbor asked him whether it would not be as well to dispose entirely with the cows and let Providence draw the whole load.

A pair of lovers, fleeing from stern and cruel parents, were married in the ran case St. Luke, the other day. Papa telegraphed to the contractor to send his daughter back; but he telegraphed back: "Never return a far on this road."

SELF SACRIFICE!

THEY (to his little Cousin Benjamin, who only once did him greatly as to care of). "HELLO, BENNY! WHAT A' YOU GOT THERE? AN CHANGE? WHY THE MOST BEASTLY UNWORTHY THING YOU CAN BUY!"

"Y ANY LATE, GIVE 'S BOLD AND LET 'S SQUEEZE THE NASTY JUICE OUT FOR YOU!"

THE BARBER OF BAILLEN.

The barber of Baillen was four feet high. His wife measured five feet ten; His waist a Venus in figure or flow, And he was the meekest of men.

The fair lady's temper had evil reports. Her short husband was pitted by all; Her tongue, like a pendulum, constantly swung, And her language was seasoned with gall.

A young friar came off the dance to confess. But whether she told him the truth, The author could not relate in song; While the friar kept his counsel, wise youth.

One morning at breakfast the chocolate was hot, And the fair lady's temper not cool; The barber complained of catarrh, but she Tied her hand with a three-legged stool.

"Pray mate it, my love, and see what I say Is strict truth, on your Pope's sanctity; I know 'tis as cool as the air on the bridge;" So she tasted to show her civility.

Chocolate cups heated remain very hot For a very long period of time; So the fair lady blushed her petulant temper, While it served but her temper to press.

The lady her stalwart arm raised on high To beat at her little lord's head The fluid that peppered her petulant tongue-- When an accident happened instead.

That instant the friar appears at the door, Intending their breakfast to share; When splash goes the chocolate all over his hair, And spreads in the roots of his hair.

London Note.--When a gentleman has taken so much that he has not the ability to stand, he may possibly be self limited to the ability, and can apply to Chancery to wind up his watch for him.

What prevents the running river running away?--Why, 'tis his cup.

What's the difference between a butcher and a cord-stainer?--One cuts the cords, and the other cuts the tails.

What's the difference between an inventory and an auction?--One "looks" the fire, and the other fires the looks.

Misery loves company, and so does a marvellous young boy.

A gentleman at the opera, the better night, is wanting the praises of a new opera-glass which he had just purchased, said, "Why, how poor soul, it helps the ladies on the opposite side of the house so much that I can stand the music on their pocket-handkerchiefs, and hear the beating of their dear little hearts."

The youth who got upon his bellows to see where the wind came from is now trying his hand at blowing geyser-boulders.

ECLOGUES.

What must be done to conduct a newspaper fight?--Write.

What is necessary to a farmer to visit his f--System. What would give a blind man the greatest delight?--Light.

What is the best piece of counsel given by a Justice of the Peace?--Peace.

Who commits the greatest abominations?--Statists. What is the greatest terror?--Fire.

What's the difference between a book-black and a slave-owner?--One blacks the boots, and the other boots the blacks.

"I have lost my appetite," said a gigantic fellow, who was an eminent performer on the trapeze, to a friend. "I hope," said the friend, "no poor man has found it, for it would ruin him as a work."

A French valet, in describing the trading powers of the great Yankee said: "If he was out away on a far-off island, he'd get up the next morning and go around selling soap to the inhabitants."

An old sportsman, who, at the age of eighty-three, was met by a friend riding very fast, was asked what he was in pursuit of? "Why, sir," replied the other, "I am riding after my eighty-fourth year."

A Western "local" acknowledges the gift of "two bouquets, smiling in their paper fronts as do girls' faces within their looped night-caps." That man is too imaginative to be kept on parole.--Items.

SELF SACRIFICE!
THEY (to his little Cousin Benjamin, who only once did him greatly as to care of). "HELLO, BENNY! WHAT A' YOU GOT THERE? AN CHANGE? WHY THE MOST BEASTLY UNWORTHY THING YOU CAN BUY!"
"Y ANY LATE, GIVE 'S BOLD AND LET 'S SQUEEZE THE NASTY JUICE OUT FOR YOU!"

TIMBER-BOOMS ON THE ST. JOHN RIVER, NEW BRUNSWICK.—[See Page 284.]

REBUILDING THE BURNT DISTRICT IN RICHMOND, VA.—DESCRIBED BY T. H. DAVIS.—(SEE PAGE 286.)

JAMES STEPHENS.

JAMES STEPHENS, founder and chief of the Irish Fenian Brotherhood, was born in the county of Kilkenny, in Ireland, in 1823.

He was a civil engineer, and was little known at the time O'Connell, John Mitchel, and a few other tried patriots formed the party of Young Ireland, and, after the famine of 1847-8, made an appeal to insurrection. A large number of enthusiastic young men responded to this appeal. At their head STEPHENS placed himself, determined to share the perils braved by O'Connell.

The arrest of O'Connell put an end to the movement, and STEPHENS found refuge in France, where he joined O'Mahony, who had also fled thither, and who is now at the head of the American order of Fenians.

After a stay of some years in Paris STEPHENS returned to Ireland, and organized a secret society of vast proportions, which is to-day known as the Fenian Brotherhood. It is perhaps not generally known that STEPHENS is the sole author of Fenianism; that he alone understands all the secrets of the Brotherhood; and that three times already he has crossed the Atlantic for the purpose of organizing and developing, with the aid of his friend JOHN O'MAHONY, the Fenian Brotherhood in this country.

STEPHENS, as is well known, was arrested, and a short time afterward escaped from Richmond Bridewell, where he was imprisoned, in Dublin. The story of his escape would no doubt be interesting, but all we know of the matter is, that very little which has been told is exactly true.

The celebrated Fenian chief has been for some time in Paris. He has determined to leave France for this country; but not to stay here, it being his intention soon to return to Europe.

EXPLOSION AT ASPINWALL.

The last Pacific steamer from Panama, the Arctona, brings the news of a terrible catastrophe at Aspinwall caused by the explosion of seventy cases of nitro-glycerine, which formed part of the freight of the British steamer European, at that port. The upper works of this steamer were all blown into fragments, and the lives of about fifty persons were destroyed by the first explosion. Two subsequent explosions took place, adding still further to the loss of life, the last one resulting in the total destruction and sinking of the European, which had been

JAMES STEPHENS, THE FENIAN CHIEF. (PHOTOGRAPHED BY COMAY, PARIS.)

EXPLOSION AT ASPINWALL.—RUINS OF THE PANAMA RAILROAD COMPANY'S FREIGHT-HOUSE. (PHOTOGRAPHED BY J. MARTINEZ, ASPINWALL.)

nowed out into the harbor. This event took place on the morning of April 3, just as nearly all the local freight had been delivered. The Panama Star and Herald give the following account:

"The wharf at which the vessel was unloading, and which was some 400 feet long, was literally torn to pieces, the superstructure was completely demolished to within a hundred feet of the freight-house, and hardly a plank remained in the entire length of the structure that was not wrenched from its fastenings. Immediately in front of where the vessel lay a gap was cut through the wharf—plank, planking, etc., all disappearing. The ship and wharf both caught fire, and the latter was saved from entire destruction only by the exertions of several citizens, who got the fire-engines to work, and after a few hours extinguished the flames, regardless of the risk they incurred from another explosion of the burning ship. The Panama Railroad Company's splendid freight-house is left a pile of ruins. The frame of the air-mass by the occasion seems to have raised the roof—which was constructed of iron and steel—upward, a few feet, its own weight bringing it down with immense force into the building, and carrying with it both the end walls, leaving the house, excepting the side walls, which appear but thin, if at all injured, a mass of ruins. It would be difficult to imagine a more complete wreck than that presented by the freight-house and wharf.

"Scarcely a building in the place escaped without more or less damage, those of a substantial nature suffering most; nearly all the brick and stone buildings were badly injured, but the freight-house is the only one we have heard of which has been rendered unpalatable. Hoody a whole window of glass remains in the city, and the destruction of glassware, crockery, and such like is really wonderful.

EXPLOSION AT ASPINWALL.—THE WHARF AND THE "EUROPEAN" ON FIRE.—(PHOTOGRAPHED IMMEDIATELY AFTER THE EXPLOSION BY J. MARTINEZ, ASPINWALL.)

"The most awful part of the catastrophe was the dreadful loss of life and suffering attending it. Of the number of killed and missing it is impossible to give a correct estimate, but from present data the number may safely be put down at fifty, and is, we fear, more likely to prove over this number than under it. Of the 41 men comprising the crew of the Johnson 9 have been killed and 11 are missing. Two clerks engaged on the wharf—Mr. Swanson, of the W. I. and P. Steamship Company, and Mr. Carter, of the Panama Railroad Company—were both instantly killed, and of 12 natives, or Polynesian, employed on the wharf and in the freight-house some are supposed to have been saved; besides, it is believed a strong gang of native laborers, who had guns on board the unfortunate steamer, have met the fate of the others. It will be several days before a correct estimate can be made of the loss. Many bodies were no doubt thrown into the water and picked up by sharks, while others are still buried beneath the ruins of the freight-house and wharf, or were down with the ill-fated ship. The scene in Aspinwall, after the first explosion, can not be described—it was horrible in the extreme. While the ruins gave an air of desolation to the place, the mangled and bereaved bodies or places of bodies to be met with in every direction for a great distance around the ruins of the disaster were heart-rending, and the suffering of the poor mortals crushed and crushed, in whose life was not calmed, was really dreadful.

"The nitro-glycerine, which caused the explosion, is a compound used for blasting purposes, and was shipped from Liverpool for California. It is, we understand, of a similar composition. If not the same, as a barrel or box of oil which exploded in Greenwich Street, New York, a short time ago. It will be remembered the package was accidentally dropped on the street, and immediately exploded, tearing down two or three large buildings and damaging many others.

"The amount of damage caused by the explosion is roughly estimated at $3,000,000, which is about the loss figure at which it can be placed."

THE ST. JOHN RIVER.

In connection with the Fensian excitement now prevailing in New Brunswick the sketch of the St. John River, given on page 284, will be unusually interesting to our readers.

The City of St. John, the chief maritime port of New Brunswick, is built on a peninsula at the mouth of the River St. John. Its fine harbor in front, and Courtenay Bay in the rear, almost surrounding it with water, give it the appearance of an island. By its peculiar situation it is eminently adapted for commercial purposes. Its chief trade is lumber and ship-building. The population is now about 40,000. The growth of St. John has been rapid; many of its inhabitants now living can remember when its site was a dense forest. The city can not be said to possess many public buildings with pretensions to architectural beauty, but many of its shops are on a scale that will compare favorably with those of older towns. There are about thirty churches and chapels belonging to different denominations. The public institutions reflect great credit on the inhabitants, especially the Penitentiary, Almshouse, Marine Hospital, General Hospital, and Lunatic Asylum.

The lover of picturesque scenery finds a most impressive sight in the rapids of the River St. John at low tide, as the rushing and foaming waters sweep with irresistible force between the perpendicular rocks, which rise on each side to the height of 80 or 100 feet. Sometimes accidents have occurred, but they are rare, and only in the case of boats approaching too near the rapids and being swept into the whirlpool. As the tide rises in the Bay of Fundy the waters gradually become calmer. Just before low-tide, while yet its waters are in commotion, may be viewed an exciting scene. Rafts of timber, wood-lands, acres loaded with deals, and steamers towing logs come into view from behind the small island at the head of the falls, and, being caught by the current, are borne on with great rapidity, and follow each other in quick succession, while the hardy raftsmen ply their oars with the utmost courage and skill. It is in order to keep the tide which will now carry them down to the harbor that they incur the risk of passing the falls at such a time. At half-tide these falls are perfectly smooth, and no trace is visible of their late commotion. They remain so for a short time. As the tide rises in the harbor and gains a level above the waters of the river, the falls again become a scene of wild commotion; but this time the waters flow the reverse way, owing to the narrowness of the gorge and sudden rise of tide, which rises to the height of 30 or 40 feet. These falls form no impediment to the building of large ships on the river, as they can safely pass through at half-tide.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH.

A LARGE portion of our illustrated matter this week relates to Southern cities.

As will be seen by our artist T. R. Davis's sketch on page 285, the burned district of Richmond, Virginia, is being "reconstructed." The rebuilding of the houses destroyed by the order of JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE furnishes employment to a large number of freedmen. Where a few months since only blackened ruins were visible may now be seen buildings of far more pretentious appearance than those destroyed. The negroes, says our artist, work with an alacrity for which they were not before noted, which is certainly a strong vote for the free labor system of which so many people in the South have doubted the feasibility. The money used in the erection of the costly and substantial stores in this district is mostly raised in the North by bond and mortgage on the property.

Our picture on the first page of this sheet, representing a group in the Colored Orphan Asylum at Memphis, is very characteristic. The portraits are all from life. The tallest figure of the group, holding a little child, is "Aunt MARY," who is of a yellow color with gray wavy hair. Clinging to her arm is "SUSANNA," a quadruplet of six or seven years, with curly hair. The figure at the extreme left—"LESLIE"—is black, as are also the two little ones in front, while the girl "MARTHA" on his side is very light. The three figures at the right—"CHARLES" (reading a book), and "EMERSON," holding a little sick brother "RUFUS"—are quite black. "Aun-EMERY," the centre of the group, is brown. The little baby in her front is light, with straight hair. Still more in the foreground is the sick child "CATHERINE," opposite whom is "LOUISIANA ARMSTRONG," who is shaking peacock feathers before his face for his amusement.

Our other pictures on pages 280 and 281 are alluded to in the following notes which our "Special" on his trip from Cairo southward has jotted down for the benefit of our readers:

LOUISVILLE.

"A stranger from the East naturally wonders at the extensive interest which whisky holds in countries bordering on the Ohio. Here the people that distill the liquor are not at all ashamed of their business. The distillers of the more Eastern States have a sneaking consciousness that the distilling business is not compatible with respectability, and evince a cowardly spirit in fabricating excuses for their indulgence in the fiery juice. Now in the West a man takes his whisky 'like a man' without reference to his doctor, a stomach-ache, or a cold. As churches are the prominent institutions in an Eastern town, so here the still-house overshadows all its neighbors and proudly takes the first rank. It may be this disregard for outward appearances will account for the Western indifference to paint and other external adornments, though it seems almost useless to attempt any thing in opposition to the sooty influence of soft coal.

"Thus Louisville—of which I had formed a charming ideal as a place where pretty houses nestled among the trees out of the reach of the scorching rays of the sun, and where the fiery nature of the Southern slumbers in a luxurious sensuousness—turns out to be in fact only a rival of Pittsburg. Masses of smoke, belched from numberless chimneys, keep the place in a perpetual fog, and, descending in showers of soot, produce a monotone of color not cheering to the sight. Broadway—the Fifth Avenue of the city—which may some day be a cheerful street, is at present a conglomeration of fine mansions and of mean little houses built of freestone, or painted a cold, staring gray to resemble that material.

"Louisville is very thriving, and its population is rapidly increasing. Property is held high, and house rents are more exorbitant than in New York. The negroes are at work on the same principle as other laborers. If they fulfill their agreements they are sure of employment, but your lazy negro is quickly set aside as soon as a better one offers. And in other respects they have nothing to complain of. The stories of brutal outrages inflicted on them are emphatically denied by the whites.

"When I was in Louisville the Falls were covered with ten feet of water, so that the iron-clad Typhoon and Oswego passed safely over them.

"To artists visiting Louisville it may be interesting to know that there is a genuine VAN DYKE in the Roman Catholic cathedral—a fine picture and said to be well authenticated. At the Willard House, where I stopped, there were some fine specimens of Kosterkiens—tall, broad-shouldered fellows, apparently men who had been in the army, and who, to judge by their remarks, could not back any other occupation. They were 'reconstructed' but out of their element.

"Louisville is striving hard to compete with New York, St. Louis, and Cincinnati, as a cotton market; but I think she will not cause the premature decay of New York for a year or two. Leaving this place, I took the night train for NASHVILLE.

"I paid exactly twice as much for a sleeping berth as is charged on Northern lines. I had some notion of stopping at the Mammoth Cave, but regarding the time spent in holes of the earth as so much dead loss, I passed it by. Nashville was soaking in a heavy rain as the train entered.

"The people of Nashville are working with a vigor which they have never hitherto exhibited, building up commerce and devoting themselves to business. The streets are being paved thoroughly with the Macadam and Nicholson pavements. White men and black work together in the streets, pushing forward these improvements. The majority of the citizens are wisely seeking in the blessings of peace to make up as soon as possible for what has been lost by the war, and they show all the outward bearings of good citizens. Like Louisville, Nashville is troubled with heavy rents and a scarcity of houses. The city is finely located on a rock, which, rising from the banks of the Cumberland in picturesque strata, is surmounted by the freestone Capitol of the State, like a pale sentinel keeping watch over the city. Along the banks of the river this rock crops out in flat horizontal strata.

"It must be a wonderful relief to a city like Nashville, after being for so long time a garrisoned town, to be freed from the presence of soldiers. But few of the latter have been left, and these are merely orderlies of General THOMAS, or attachés of the quarter-master or ordnance depot. The people of Nashville, I believe, are better disposed toward the Government than the Tennessee farther South. The city received an impetus from the war which has, in a great measure, compensated it for any losses which it may have sustained during the struggle. The distinction between Federal and Confederate still remains. There is socially no affiliation between the two classes.

"Quitting Nashville by the Johnsonville Railroad, we came upon the line of fortifications. The ground had been plowed over, and fences ran over the forts, through outcrops and all. The country for some distance lay smiling with the first blush of spring, to which the blooming peach-trees added no slight charm. In places the flat strata of the freestone cropped out, and was being quarried with very little trouble. The mistletoe abounding upon the trees would make an Englishman feel 'quite at home.' After a while the road leads into a less promising region, more hilly, and showing the remains of defensive works that mark the spots commanding river crossings. These consisted of burned block-houses, with little rifle-gaps, rapidly disappearing before the effects of the weather. Here and there farmers were at work glowing up the land. At one place I noticed white men, little boys, and negroes all alike busy driving plows through the soft earth. It was dark before the train reached Johnsonville, where the road at present terminates, and passengers take steamboats for the rest of the route.

MEMPHIS.

"Memphis has now the unenviable reputation of being the worst behaved city in the Union. There is a floating population here, made up of the dregs of both armies, which would be a curse to any city. Order is, however, prevailing, and the outrages that were common last winter are becoming less frequent. Business is remarkably dull, and all the stores look overstocked. The hotels, lobbies, and halls, are crowded with loungers, people doing business in the city, commercial travelers and 'reconstructed' citizens, who would do well to imitate the examples set them by Southern generals, and go to work. The newspapers, both Union and Secession, do their best to keep open the wounds made by the war. The latter class are particularly severe, and give constant proof of the determination of the Southern press to keep up the vindictive sectionalism which caused the late war. Another war between the late antagonists is impossible; but the irrepressible conflict is still going on, and the great trouble seems to be a want of Christian forbearance. Nowhere is this state of affairs worse than at Nashville. The sketch of the city was taken from a portion of the fortifications known as Fort Pickens, to make way for which a number of nice houses had been torn down. Now the fort is turned into a brick-yard, and sable brickmakers, under the supervision of white men, follow that ancient art where ere while the rebel cannon frowned ominously over the cliff."

FILTER THE WATER.

THE Asiatic Cholera (see Tribune of July 7, 1865)

"Has made its appearance in London. Its first victim attributed his fatal malady to the poisonous impurities of the Thames, on which river he was employed as a lighterman."

"The Disphragis Filter, manufactured by ALEXANDER McKENZIE & Co., No. 35 West Fourth Street, near Broadway, is the kind of porous filter to which I alluded in my recent report to the Union Board. I consider the artificial sandstone which constitutes the filtering medium to be an excellent article for the purpose. The instrument is quite durable, and only requires to be reversed occasionally to insure its action. JAMES R. COLLIER, M.D., New York, April 28, 1862. Chemist.

Call or send for circular.

BERNERT'S preparations go among the best class of people, and are pronounced incomparable. JOSEPH BERNERT & Co., Boston, Proprietors.

A REMARKABLE FACT.

THE COLONIAL DENTAL ASSOCIATION, 19 Cooper Institute, have extracted teeth for 11,485 patients with laughing gas, all of whom by their signatures certify that it was done without pain, and that the gas was pleasant. Not an accident has happened with it. Dr. CARROGAN and all our leading surgeons endorse the gas as the best and only really safe anesthetic now in use.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ALEXANDER HOTEL.

This magnificent Hotel, occupying one of the most cheerful, healthy, and pleasant sites in London, overlooking Hyde Park, Boston Row, and the Serpentine, is now open at such a reduced Tariff as to render it the cheapest first-class Hotel in London. It comprises numerous suites of Apartments, a spacious and elegant Coffee-Room, a Ladies' Coffee-Room, a Smoking-Room, &c. There is an Ascending-Room for Visitors to every floor. Arrangements can be made for Board and Residence for a fixed charge. WEDDING BREAKFASTS PROVIDED. APPLICATIONS TO BE ADDRESS TO THE MANAGER.

New Skirt for 1866.

FOR DOUBLE SPRING SKIRTS.

They will not bend or break, like the single springs, but will ALWAYS preserve their strength and beautiful shape, in all crowded assemblies, churches, theaters, railroad-cars, and for PROMOTION OF BOYS' WEARS—each being composed of two finely tempered steel Springs, braided tightly and firmly together, edge to edge, forming one hoop, and making the strongest and most pleasing as well as the most durable and stylish SKIRT EVER MADE. In fact, they are superior to all others, combining comfort, economy, lightness, elegance, and durability. Inquire for BRADLEY'S DUPLEX ELLIPTIC for DOUBLE SPRING SKIRT. For sale every where. Manufactured exclusively by sole owners of patent, WEBSTER, BRADLEY & CARY, 97 CHAMBERS and 79 and 81 BRADY STREETS, New York.

Stammering

Cured by Deane's Patent Appliances. For descriptive particulars, &c., address Simpson & Co., 277 W. 39th St., N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

- Here Just Published:
MRS. MARIJORDANES. A Novel. By Mrs. G. MARIJORDANES. Author of "Chronicles of Carlingford," "The Perpetual Curate," "Agnes," "Life of Edward Irving," "The Days of my Life," "The Laird of Nartaw," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
THE TOLLERS OF THE SEA. A Novel. By Victoria STROO, Author of "Les Miserables." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
LIVINGSTONE'S ZAMBESI. Narrative of an Expedition to the Zambesi and its Tributaries; and of the Discovery of the Lakes Shirwa and Nyassa. 1858-1864. By DAVID and CHARLES LIVINGSTONE. With Map and Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00. On Terms with Livingston's "South Africa."
MAXWELL BREWITT. A Novel. By F. G. THOMPSON, Author of "George Gold," "The Plebeian Kicker," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
WALTER GOHING. A Story. By ANNE THOMAS, Author of "Doris Deane," "On Guard," "The Leigh," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
A TEXT-BOOK ON ANATOMY, PHYSIOLOGY, AND HYGIENE. For the Use of Schools and Families. By JOHN C. DAVEN, M.D., Professor of Natural History and Physiology in the New York Free Academy, and Professor of Analytical Chemistry in the University of New York. With 170 Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $3 75.
DRAWING PHYSIOLOGY. A Text-Book on Physiology. For the Use of Schools and Colleges. Being an Abridgement of the Author's larger Work on Human Physiology. By JOHN WILLIAM DAVEN, M.D., LL.D., Author of a "Treatise on Human Physiology," and of a "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe," &c. Illustrated with nearly 100 Wood Engravings. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.
WIVES AND DAUGHTERS. By Mrs. GARRICK, Author of "Mary Barton," "Cranford," "Helen's Lover," &c. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00; Paper, $1 00.
A NOBLE LIFE. By Miss MURDOCK (Mrs. CRAIG), Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "Christina's Mistake," "A Life for a Life," "Oliver," "The Orphan," "The Head of the Family," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.
JAMES LOUIS FETTER. A Biographical Sketch. By WILLIAM J. GRANTON. With Steel Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.
AGNES. A Novel. By Mrs. GLENNIE, Author of "The Laird of Nartaw," "Chronicles of Carlingford," "The Perpetual Curate," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.
GOVERNOR FOOTE ON THE WAR AND THE UNION. War of the Rebellion; or, Sympathy and Charity. Consisting of Observations upon the Causes, Course, and Consequences of the late Civil War in the United States. By H. S. FOOTE. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.
THE BELTON ESTATE. By ANNE THOMAS, Author of "Can You Forget Her?" "Doris Deane," "Franklin Partridge," "The Small House at Allington," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
CARLYLE'S FREDERICK THE GREAT. History of Frederick II., called Frederick the Great. By THOMAS CARLYLE, Author of a "History of the French Revolution," "Oliver Cromwell," &c. With Portraits and Maps. Complete in 6 Vols. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per Vol.
GUY DEVERELL. By J. S. LE FANT, Author of "Cecil Stiles," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by Mail, Postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.
$200 PER MONTH. Wanted—Gentlemen Agents to sell articles of unusual use. Descriptive catalogue sent upon receipt of three red stamps. JAS. HATHWAY, 25 Maiden Lane.
THE CHOLERA. A Familiar Treatise on its History, Causes, Symptoms, and Treatment, with THE MOST EFFECTIVE REMEDIES, and proper mode of administration, without the aid of a Physician: the whole in language free from medical terms, especially adapted to the use of the public generally; also containing a History of the Epidemics of the Middle Ages. By G. T. COLLIER, M.D. Sent postpaid on receipt of 50 cents. Agents wanted. First National Manufacturing and Publishing Co., 265 William St., N. Y.
Convention Chorus-Book. A collection of ANTHEMS, CHORUSES, GLEES, and CONCERTED PIECES, for the use of Musical Conventions, Choral Societies, &c.; without exception the cheapest book of the kind ever published. Price $3 cts. Bound free on receipt of price. DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.
GREAT PRIZE DISTRIBUTION by the NEW YORK GIFT ASSOCIATION, 113 Broadway, New York.
15 Rosewood Flasks, worth from $25 00 to $50 00
15 Melodions, Rosewood Cases 15 00 to 25 00
150 Music Boxes 15 00 to 40 00
100 Silver Revolving Patent Castors 15 00 to 40 00
100 Silver Fruit and Cake Baskets 15 00 to 40 00
500 Silver Tea and Table Spoons 15 00 to 30 00
100 Gold Hunting-Case Watches 15 00 to 100 00
250 Diamond Rings, Cluster, &c. 50 00 to 100 00
500 Ladies' Gold Watches 50 00 to 100 00
200 Silver Watches 25 00 to 50 00
MANNER OF DISTRIBUTION. Certificates, bearing each article and its value, are placed in sealed envelopes, which are well mixed. Out of these envelopes, containing the certificate or order for some article (worth not less than one dollar at retail), will be delivered at our office, or sent by mail to any address, without regard to choice, on receipt of 25 cents. The purchaser will see what article it draws, and its value, which may be from One to Five Hundred Dollars, and on that sum one Dollar, and receive the article claimed, or may exchange it for any other article on our list of same value. No blanks—every purchaser gets value.
A CHANCE TO OBTAIN ANY OF THE ABOVE ARTICLES FOR ONE DOLLAR BY PURCHASING A SEALED ENVELOPE FOR 25 CENTS. Parties desiring with as may depend on having prompt returns; and the article drawn will be immediately sent to them by express or return mail. Entire satisfaction guaranteed in all cases.
$5 Six Certificates for One Dollar, 15 for Two Dollars, 25 for Five Dollars. Great Inducement to Agents.
$5 All letters should be addressed, T. BENTON & CO., Box 2567, Post Office, New York.

NO MISTAKE ABOUT IT!

Miss Spraggles (affectionately) "I want a nice Steak, Butcher, but I must depend on you, for I don't understand any thing about Meat." Factious Butcher. "Don't ye now, Miss! Well, you'll know more about it as you grow a little Older." [Miss S. is immensely flattered.]

Robinson & Ogden, BANKERS, AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES, No. 4 Broad St., New York, (Two Doors from Wall.)

Collections made, with quick returns. Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check. Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Gold will receive our PERSONAL attention. ROBINSON & OGDEN, Bankers.

MAGIC LANTERN AND STEREOSCOPE

We are now receiving the most comprehensive and finest assortment of glass views ever made in America, representing scenes and objects in nearly all European cities and countries. These views are specially selected and arranged by our Mr. Edward Anthony, and are adapted for the use of either the Stereoscope or the Magic Lantern.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO., 511 Broadway, 2 doors south of the St. Nicholas Hotel.

POLLAK & SON Manufacturers of Sewing Machines, 59 Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Worn and broken Sewing Machines repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular. Prices $6 to $25 each.

Marvin's Patent ALUM AND DRY PLASTER, FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFES

Never lose their fire-proof qualities, corrode the iron, or swell their contents. Slatboard and parlor safes for silverware.

MARVIN & CO., 265 Broadway, New York, 271 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.

A new and original work, with 120 Designs and Plans of Country Homes of moderate cost.

Price $1 50, postpaid. GEO. E. & F. W. WOODWARD, Publishers, No. 31 Park Row, New York.

WANTED—EVERY BODY WANTS DR. GILBERT'S PILE INSTRUMENT: cures every case. No pain. Relief in five minutes. Sold by druggists, and sent by mail. Price $1. Circulars free. Address J. P. GILBERT & CO., 315 Broadway.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF Revolvers, Rifles, Muskets, and Carbines,

For the United States Service. Also POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS, BREAKING PISTOLS, Rifle Guns, Revolving Rifles, Rifle and Shot-Gun Borels and Gun Materials. Sold by Gun Dealers and the Trade generally.

In three days of House-breaking and Robbery, every House, Store, Bank, and Office should have one of Remington's Revolvers.

Circulars containing cuts and descriptions of our Arms will be furnished upon application.

E. REMINGTON & SONS, Illus. N. Y.

MERCHANT'S BANKERS. And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARRIS & CHAPMAN, 65 Broadway.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN. A daily authenticated Autograph Letter of his will be sold to the person making the most liberal offer. Address A. H. L., Washington, D. C.

WM. T. FRY & CO., Manufacturers of FRY'S PATENT POCKET FLASKS, Dressing-Cases, POCKET-BOOKS, PORTFOLIOS, INKSTANDS, &c., 184 and 186 William St., New York.

Every traveler should carry one of FRY'S Flasks. For sale in all the principal Drug, Hardware, Fancy Goods, and Sporting Houses in the United States.

50 PER-CENT SAVED BY USING

B. T. BARRETT'S best Medicated BALNATON, made from German Salt. Broad made with this Saltpetre contains, when boiled, nothing but common salt, water, and flour. Nos. 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 10, 73, and 74 Washington Street, New York.

FOR PUBLIC EXHIBITIONS. Stereoscopic, Magic Lanterns, and Dissolving Views, with pictures from all parts, and of every interesting subject, made by JAMES W. QUINN & CO., 324 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia. Price and illustrated catalogue sent gratis.

UNITED STATES PRIZE CONCERT, TO BE GIVEN AT CROSBY'S OPERA-HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, MAY 28, 1866.

125,000 Valuable Prizes, valued at $492,575 25, will be presented to Ticket-Holders, including $100,000 in Greenbacks.

NUMBER OF TICKETS ISSUED, 500,000. PRICE $1 00 EACH.

This is the greatest inducement ever offered to the public, one ticket out of every four drawing a prize.

Table listing prize amounts and ticket counts. Includes items like 1st Grand Prize in Greenbacks ($30,000), 2d Grand Prize in Greenbacks ($20,000), etc.

The drawing will take place after the concert on the stage of the Opera-House, where 10,000 persons can witness it. A Committee will be appointed by the audience to superintend the same.

Good and reliable Agents wanted in every city, town, and village in the United States, to whom great inducements are offered. References required. Agents Terms and Club Rules.—Any party procuring a club of five or more names for tickets, and forwarding to the society for the same, will be allowed the following commission, viz.: We will send 5 tickets to one address for $4 50; 10 tickets to one address for $9 00; 20 tickets to one address for $17 50; 30 tickets to one address for $26 25; 40 tickets to one address for $35 00; 50 tickets to one address for $43 75; 100 tickets to one address for $87 50. In every case send the name and post-office address of each separate subscriber. Money, by draft, post-office order, express, or in registered letters, may be sent at our risk.

All communications should be addressed to WIGGINS, BRADFORD & CO., 123 Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill.

The proprietors will donate to the Lincoln and Douglas Monument Fund $2000; also there will be $2000 reserved from the person drawing the $20,000 prize, for the same purpose. References.—Hon. N. S. Wilkinson, Ex-Senator of Minnesota; Hon. Geo. V. Lawrence, M.C., of Penn.; Hon. Alex. Randall, Ex-Governor of Wis.; Hon. Wm. Montgomery, Ex-M.C., of Penn.; Hon. Major Dan. Mass, Ex-M.C., of Ind.; Hon. Ira J. Laysok, of Kansas; Hon. Wm. Leffingwell, Lyons, Iowa; Hon. Joseph Kase, of Chicago; Hon. C. Graves Smith, of Minn.; Jacob Peckwith, Agt. M. & E. R., Chicago, Ill.; M. Krosberg & Co., Importers of watches, Chicago; Maxwell, White & Co., New Orleans, La. N. B. Editors of country papers are authorized to act as our agents, and they will be allowed full commission on all tickets ordered whether for themselves or other parties who may order through them. Proposals for inserting this advertisement are requested.

GAS FIXTURES and LAMPS. The attention of the trade and of buyers generally is invited to our extensive stock of CHANDELIER, BRACKET, &c., of every style and pattern, comprising many beautiful designs entirely new.

ARCHER & PANCOAST, Manufacturing and Warehouses, Nos. 9, 11, and 13 Mercer Street, New York.

Tool and Horticultural Chests FOR SPRING TRADE.

A full assortment of Tool-Chests, all sizes, from $5 up to $110, manufactured and for sale by GEO. FAIR, Buffalo, N. Y. Send for circular.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER.

This new celebrated Revolver exceeds all others for compactness, effectiveness, durability, power, and safety in carrying. It is light (3 1/2 lbs.), with larger muzzle than any other of same size and weight. Send for circular. GEO. A. BUCKING, 54 Cliff Street, New York.

UNION ADAMS, HOSIER, GLOVER, AND SHIRT MAKER, No. 637 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY.

REMOVAL. WM. GALE, JR., LATE WM. GALE & SON, SILVERSMITHS, 487 BROADWAY, cor. Broome Street, New York. Will remove about the 1st of May, temporarily, to 590 BROADWAY, Metropolitan Hotel, while the premises 572 and 574 BROADWAY, Metropolitan Hotel, (which will be ready in July.) Are being prepared for permanent occupancy.

Portable Steam Engines, ERICSSON CALORIC ENGINES, Patented, Mills, &c., &c. JAMES A. HODGSON, 184 Duane St., New York.

200 A Month. Male or Female Agents wanted. All towns, with salary, E. L. Lockwood, Detroit, Mich.

PESTACHINE. It is the Green Soap for the Hair, also an excellent dressing. Invented by Dr. ROOT, manufactured by O. R. HIN SHINER & CO., Springfield, Mass.; and sold by DEMAS BARNES & CO., New York.

ITCH (WHEATON'S) ITCH Salt Rheum. OINTMENT Salt Rheum. Will cure the Itch in 48 hours; also cures Salt Rheum, Ulcers, Chilblains, and all eruptions of the skin. Price 50 cents. By sending 50 cents to WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Mass., it will be forwarded free by mail. For sale by all Druggists.

SCHILBERG'S GERMAN OINTMENT. Warranted a certain cure, without the slightest danger, for piles, old wounds, scrofula, salt rheum—all bona and skin diseases, &c. 33 Dowry, New York.

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS. SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS AND PERFUMERS. CEDAR CAMPHOR. Best against MOths. CHEAP! FRAGRANT! RELIABLE! Sold by druggists every where. HARRIS & CHAPMAN, Boston.

WARD'S Paper Collars AND CUFFS FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN, Wholesale & Retail, 387 BROADWAY, N. Y.

NOTICE TO THE TRADE. A wholesale price-list sent by mail.

THE REISSUE OF

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Vol. X.—No. 489.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 12, 1866.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1864, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH.

THE illustrations on this page and on page 292 are thus described in the following notes by our "Special," A. B. W.:

WILD-CATS AT NASHVILLE.

"At a restaurant known as SREIGMAN'S there was, among other animals, a magnificent pair of wild-cats, just caught in the neighborhood of Nashville, and awfully savage, the male showing his temper, if teased, by immediately attacking the female, who would then, standing up on her hind feet, deliver battle with heavy blows from her taloned paws.

LEVEES AT CINCINNATI.

"When I reached the 'Queen City' it was in a great ferment. FIRE'S Opera-house and other buildings had burned down the night before, and the magnificent city engines were playing upon the ruins.

"The good people of Cincinnati look upon their city as 'some pumpkins' in a business point of view, and point to their levees as an illustration. I should imagine that the levees do nearly as much business as six New York piers. At about 'starting time' there is a great confusion of bells, whistles, and Calliopes.

THE CALLOPE.

"Attracted by one of the latter, I went aboard to see how the thing was done. The reader will see how from the sketch I have made. Certainly it was the best iron-clad music I had heard; and, strange to say, the whistles were in tolerable tune.

"At 12 the next noon I went aboard the General Anderson, a Louisville boat, and bade adieu to the Queen City, which presented more of a picture than when I entered it. The tall tower of the Catholic church loomed up against the smoky atmosphere and indistinct outline of hills beyond the city, while springing out over the river the new suspension-bridge to Covington hung pendant from its massive towers. Swiftly slipping down the river, swollen and muddy, past the weather-beaten shanties, gas-houses, and shapeless coal-barges, and then on past the piers on which Cincinnati stands, the bluffs rapidly close in upon the river, on the right hand presenting slopes devoted to the culture of orchards and the vine. This bank for some distance presents the appearance of suburbs, with buildings picturesque but, as usual, unpainted, and with roads leading up over the tree-crowned heights.

WILD-CATS IN NASHVILLE.

"Having heard much about the superior beauty of Western ladies, I had gone about Cincinnati with an artist's eye for the study of that interesting subject. I recollect how some Western people jeered at a picture in Harper's Weekly entitled "Types of Female Beauty." It was an amusing commentary on their remarks to find that a certain vendor of a quack nostrum advertised as a beautifier of the fair sex had transferred one of the heads from that engraving to his show-bill, as a specimen of the glorious results to be attained from the use of his manufacture.

"RELIGIOUS SERVICE ON THE 'SOUTH.'

"The Suth, one of the finest river boats, went down the Mississippi from Cairo with your artist, a full complement of passengers, and, it was said, 2000 tons of freight. As among this transient population there were twelve ministers on their way to the General Conference of the Southern Methodist Episcopal Church in New Orleans we had service on the Suth in the gorgeous cabin of the steamer. The President was prayed for, but Congress was ignored. The guests to the name of Journeys were many and ardent. The congregation was attentive, among the most devout being some gamblers. At the close of the service a subscription was proposed for the benefit of the Methodist Church in Fredericksburg, Virginia, destroyed by the war. To this I noticed that two Jews contributed, anxious, I suppose, to stand well with their Southern brethren of the Gentile persuasion. As for the ministers they exhibited feelings of bitterness toward the North quite unworthy of their profession. One of these, shortly after the service, I heard relating an interview with the Hannay in New York, in which he had openly avowed to one of that firm his regret that they should be obliged to purchase their publications. Mr. Hannay, he said, asked him if he was not one of those who objected to the education of the negro. His answer was that, on the contrary, they of the South wished to instruct that race to save them from being robbed by the North, as the white people of the South had been. This was received as happily by the others as though a fine point had been made.

"I could not but be aware of the curious social atmosphere which pervaded this company of travelers, composed of Southern and Northern people with a sprinkling of Jews and foreigners. Outward politeness was every where visible, but there was not one atom of cordiality between the different sections. The Southern people mixed with the others, but they showed more of curiosity and ardent desire to hear their sentiments than of friendly feeling toward their countrymen. They are very inconsistent. Professing the greatest desire to let by-gones be by-gones, they will yet tell you in the next breath, and without any apparent idea of the contradiction, that the hatred which the North has earned of the South can not be wiped away, and that the two sections are wider apart than ever.

"As the boat left Cairo the colored crew took their places on a pile of corn sacks at the bow, and, raising a flag, sang, as is usual with them on leaving port. They were a fine body of stalwart Kentuckians and Virginians, and had been hard at work the day and night previous getting in the cargo. The tone was monotonous, and the doggerel rhythmless, and devoted to suggestions to the Captain to come down with a treat of "beandy-wine." A jug of whiskey fixed them, however, and they were soon spread about on the piles of cargo.

THE LEVEE AT CINCINNATI, OHIO.

In addition to the illustrations of the South already alluded to, we give on page 296 a view of Shockoe Creek Valley, Richmond, Virginia, of which a description is given on page 292; also on page 297 a graphic sketch by Mr. FENNERS of a cotton team in North Carolina. Not the least interesting of our Southern pictures is that on page 298, of the Negro Celebration in Washington, of which a description is there given.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 12, 1866.

THE CONGRESSIONAL PLAN OF REORGANIZATION.

THE propositions of the Reconstruction Committee will strike every thoughtful citizen as perfectly reasonable. They seem to us to justify the hope of the most truly intelligent and patriotic persons that Congress would propose no policy upon which the whole Union party of the country, including the President, might not agree. Some concessions of opinion were inevitable upon all sides. Those who held with Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS that there should be general confiscation, or with Mr. SCHMIDT that impartial suffrage should be immediately established throughout the country, or with the President that no further conditions whatever were necessary, must have seen that the opinion of the country did not support them, and that all must meet upon some firm and moderate middle ground such as the Committee now offer.

The objection to what is called the President's policy is plain and conclusive. It is that, by allowing the late rebel States to resume their full relations in the Union immediately, and without further provision, those States would have actually gained political power by the rebellion. This gain arises from the fact that every colored man, as a slave, counted as three-fifths of a man in the basis of representation; but as a freeman he counts as five-fifths. In a State like South Carolina, therefore, where the colored population is half or even more than half of the whole, and where that half is disfranchised, every voter has practically twice the power of a voter in a State like Connecticut. This is an absurdity and injustice so recognized as to demand instant adjustment.

On the other hand, the objection to the imposition of equal suffrage by the National Government as a precedent condition of resumption of full rights in the Union is practical and unavailing. In the first place, it is hardly to be presumed that the States which prohibit equal suffrage, or deny it to a colored skin altogether, would insist upon its adoption by the suspended States; and, in the second place, such a proposition would have been very widely regarded as a radical blow at the most sacred of State rights, and a consummation of centralization. Moreover, there are many of the most faithful and liberty-loving Union men, who are the steady advocates of equal suffrage, and who, under the circumstances, do not doubt the entire competency of Congress to require this or any other condition which might seem to it necessary, but who doubt the wisdom of this method, and question the expediency of such a requirement, and who could not therefore heartily sustain it.

But we see no good reason for supposing that all reasonable and patriotic men should not sincerely unite upon the propositions presented. They have reference exclusively to national relations. They do not interfere in the State economy, except in defense of national rights. They declare simply, in the first place, that no State shall abridge the privileges of citizens of the United States. Such a proposition is its own irresistible argument. A citizen of this country should be equally a citizen every where in it; this is plain, and therefore all his civil rights as a citizen of the United States should be sacred wherever the national flag floats. Can the President, with all his warm convictions of the sanctity of States, object to an obviously just provision?

In the second place, whenever the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of the male citizens of a State who are of age, except for crime or participation in the rebellion, the basis of representation shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age. In other words, if South Carolina shall choose to disfranchise 100,000 of her citizens because of their color, or New York shall choose to do the same thing because of want of property, then each of those States shall suffer in the national representation just in that proportion. Such a provision stimulates every State to enlarge the suffrage, and to extend education in order to make the suffrage safe. It is strictly harmonious with the President's expressed wish to base representation upon the number of voters.

In the third place, the Committee recommend that until the 4th of July, 1870, four years hence, all persons who voluntarily adhered to the rebellion shall be excluded from voting at national elections. This article we presume is introduced to embody the President's desire that "treason shall be made odious," and that in the great work of reorganization the late rebel leaders shall "take back seats." In his frequent and vehement expression of that desire the President unquestionably spoke for the loyal country, and his sentiments are still further incorporated in the proposed bill to render certain of those leaders ineligible to office under the government of the United States. This third proposition is the one which seems to us likely to occasion most difference of opinion. That it is in strict accordance with President JOHNSON'S frequent suggestions is true, but it is a point of doubtful policy, not essential to the general plan, and, it seems to us, might be safely omitted.

The fourth proposition is a matter of course, that neither the United States nor any State shall assume to pay any debt incurred in aid of the rebellion, or for any claim for compensation of loss of slaves, and Congress is authorized to enforce the provisions of this article.

These are the propositions of the Committee, which we trust will be unanimously adopted by the Union vote in Congress, because they are perfectly just and moderate, and because they do not claim to reap more than has been sown. They simply define and secure the legitimate result of the war as recognized by the general conviction of the loyal country, and as it has been often strongly stated by President JOHNSON. They contain nothing vindictive, and if the Government of the United States has any right whatever to do any thing whatever to prevent the late rebel States from gaining political power by their rebellion, it may challenge the whole world and its late domestic enemies to show any thing unprecedented, unjust, or ungenerous in the settlement it proposes. We believe that the vast body of the Union party of the country which carried the war successfully to the end, and which triumphantly elected LINCOLN and JOHNSON, will most cordially sustain this policy of reorganization and gladly appeal to the country to ratify it. And however anxious the President may be to see loyal men from the late rebel States admitted to Congress, we shall be very slow to believe that he will refuse his sincere co-operation to a plan which does not conflict with any of his known opinions, and which secures the admission of loyal members to Congress with the heart-felt welcome and congratulation of the whole loyal country.

That the proposed settlement of the Committee should be greeted with sneers and anger by those who have persistently declared that Congress is a bloody, factious, revolutionary body is natural. These objectors have counted upon overthrowing the President and destroying the Union party by fomenting every real or asserted difference between them. But here is the utter refutation of their calumnies. Here is the plain proof that Congress seeks only the speediest reorganization of the Union upon the most temperate and reasonable conditions. For we assume that there will be little delay in ratifying the report; and then, so great and unprecedented is the occasion, we trust that the Legislatures of the States will be immediately summoned in special session to act upon the proposed amendment, that Congress and the country and the world may know the will of the loyal people of the United States upon this most vital point of national policy.

THE CHOLERA AND THE QUARANTINE.

FOR more than a year the arrival of the cholera at the port of New York has been expected. The memory of its former horrors was very vivid. The certainty of its terrible ravages when it should appear was indisputable. So great was the apprehension and the desire that the city should be protected by every means that a Board of Health with extraordinary powers, not, however, including those of a Quarantine, had been created. There was a health officer specially charged with the sanitary defense of the port from foreign danger. There had been a body of Quarantine Commissioners for two years, whose duty was to find a suitable site for the Quarantine buildings. Every precaution had apparently been taken, when, on the 9th of April, the emigrant ship England, with 1200 passengers, arrived at Halifax. The cholera was raging on board, and there had been fifty deaths upon the passage. The pestilence was plainly at hand, and the efficiency of our New York preparations would doubtless be soon proved. And so it chanced; for on the afternoon of the 18th the emigrant ship Virginia, with 1043 passengers, arrived in the Narrows, off Staten Island, and reported thirty-eight deaths by cholera upon the passage, and the disease still raging.

It then appeared that the sole preparation in this port consisted of the hospital ship Falco, which was not ready for service! As soon as possible, by putting on board a crowd of laborers, she was made ready, and on the 21st the sick were removed from the Virginia. As soon as possible, also, another ship, the Illinois, was prepared, and the well passengers were received upon her. If the fact were not tragical it would be unspeakably ludicrous. The chief port of the Western continent, after a year's warning, was totally unprepared to deal directly and adequately with the approach of a fearful pestilence. The probabilities were that it would come, as it did come, in an emigrant ship. It was known that such ships are crowded, often with more than a thousand passengers. The most extensive hospital accommodations were the most obvious necessity, and they were not ready. The difficulties may have been many, but there are cases in which difficulties must not be pleaded, and this was one of them. Somewhere, somehow the State of New York should have been ready for the event, and it was not ready.

We say the State, because the Health officer, in his explanatory letter, says that the Legislature up to the time of its adjournment had left the Quarantine Commissioners without any money. The law forbade them to erect hospitals on Staten Island, or Long Island, or Coney Island—the only New York shores of the bay; and New Jersey had refused them a foothold upon its territory. On the day that the England arrived at Halifax the Commissioners had telegraphed to the Secretary of the Navy asking for vessels. Two days afterward two were offered, but they proved unsuitable; and then vigorous measures were adopted to fit the Falco for immediate service. But this explanation is not satisfactory. The Atlanta was here last November. The cholera was very sure to come early in the spring. There were no hospital accommodations but the ship Falco. It was settled that there could be none upon the shores of the bay. Whose fault was it that the Falco was not ready even on the 18th of April? Whose fault was it that no other ships were asked for until the 9th of April? If the Legislature pertinaciously postponed the necessary appropriations, why was no statement made to the public that the imminent danger of the situation might have been known and proper pressure brought to bear upon the offenders? The Virginia and England are now both in port. After the former arrived the Quarantine Commissioners asked the authorities at Washington for the temporary use of Sandy Hook as a retreat for well passengers from infected ships. But the Government replied that New Jersey granted the use of Sandy Hook only upon condition that it should be devoted to military and similar public purposes. The Commissioners appeal, therefore, to the Board of Health to allow them some point of land at the disposal of the Board for the accommodation of quarantined passengers, declaring that the floating accommodations are insufficient.

The state of the case, then, is this: There are some 2000 persons detained in Quarantine. The sole hospital is the old ship Falco, which accommodates not more than a hundred patients, to which, as we write, the Scraper and Perseus are added. The shelter of well passengers is the steamship Illinois. There is a law against erecting hospitals on the adjacent land, and the Commissioners say that the floating accommodations are insufficient. Other infected ships are daily expected, and we have no other preparation. Meanwhile the Board of Health have asked for the use of the military hospitals at Fort Schuyler upon Throg's Neck, at the entrance of Long Island Sound. It is idle to assert that this dilemma arises from the destruction of the hospitals upon Staten Island; for that part of the island upon which they were situated was virtually a thickly-settled portion of the city of New York, and no effectual quarantine was possible there as the ravages of the yellow-fever in the neighborhood proved. It is not to the acts of a population which had no other remedy against a mortal disease planted among them, but to the avarice and corrupt intrigue of politicians and merchants that the absence of a suitable quarantine is to be ascribed.

The history of the New York Quarantine is briefly this: In 1758 the first hospital and offices were placed by the Colonial Legislature upon Bedloe's Island. In 1796 they were removed to Governor's Island, where they remained until the yellow-fever in 1799. The next year the Quarantine was established upon Staten Island, against the remonstrances of the inhabitants, twenty-four of whom were destroyed by the yellow-fever from the hospitals in the very first year of their erection. From that time onward the population constantly protested, until, in 1848—when there were a hundred and eighty persons attacked by infectious diseases from the Quarantine—the outrage became so undeniable that, upon careful inquiry, a Committee of the Legislature recommended its immediate removal. In 1849 an act was passed and officers appointed for the establishment of hospitals at Sandy Hook. Certain shipping interests in New York thwarted the operation of the act, and nothing further was done until 1856. In that year the Staten Island and Long Island shores were declared by the yellow-fever, and the Legislature, in March, 1857, again ordered the removal of the Quarantine station. The Commissioners under the act applied to the Legislature of New Jersey to obtain Sandy Hook, and were again defeated by the same shipping interest, by the remonstrances of the Health Officer, the Board of Underwriters of New York, and the Commissioners of Emigration. Meanwhile it was impossible to prevent constant communication between the hospital-grounds and the other side of the wall, the seat of a dense population, mainly of a class which could not remove. The helplessness, suffering, and mortality of the inhabitants were such that the Board of Health of the town declared the establishment an insupportable nuisance, and called upon the citizens of the county to abate it without delay; and on the evenings of the 1st and 2d of September, 1858, without the least injury to the patients, who were carefully removed and protected, the buildings were burned to the ground by the people of the neighborhood. One man was accidentally shot by an employe of the institution, but the destruction was so little indicative of a riotous spirit that the property-holders in the vicinity considered that their property was enhanced in value fifty per cent. by the removal.

It is nearly eight years since the buildings were destroyed, and it is only during the session of the Legislature just ended that an act was passed to erect new hospitals upon the west bank of the Lower Bay. If the operation of this act is not thwarted as all the others have been, New York may possibly be ready for the next pestilence. But for the present she is shamefully unprepared; and although the sudden cold and the strict isolation of the ships have checked the progress of the disease for a time, the suffering of the passengers who may be subject to quarantine is already assured. The Health Officer says, "The roughness of the bay, from the high winds, makes it very unpleasant for all, and causes much sea-sickness." The present Quarantine arrangements are a disgrace to New York.

Upon page 292 the reader will find a descriptive Map of the Bay and the position of the ships.

MR. SEWARD'S DIPLOMACY.

MR. SEWARD'S letter of February 12, to the French Minister, the MARQUIS DE MONTMORON, is an elaborate and very able paper, stating with courtesy but with firmness the exact position of the United States in the Mexican complication. It has settled the question. France will leave Mexico without the appearance of compulsion, while the honor and peace of the United States are maintained. This is another of the signal services of Mr. SEWARD to the country, which will be gratefully remembered in extenuation of many harsh words privately spoken, and of much apparent alienation of sympathy from the cause to which his life has been devoted. The policy he has pursued in the French difficulty is surely preferable to the Captain Bobadil method, which was strenuously urged upon him in some quarters—a method of managing such questions which does not tend to keep the peace of the world.

The United States, according to Mr. SEWARD, do not question the right of France to settle her accounts with other nations in any manner which pleases her. If Mexico refuses to pay debts justly owing to French subjects, or if those subjects are maltreated in Mexico, it is certainly competent for an independent Power like France to demand and secure satisfaction. Nor, on the other hand, does the United States Government deny that any form of government voluntarily adopted by the citizens of Mexico must be respected. But the war in Mexico has become one of political intervention, which, in the judgment of this Government, menaces the interests of the United States; and there is no satisfactory evidence that the people of Mexico have established an empire, nor is such evidence possible while the French army remains.

As for the internal anarchy in Mexico which the French foreign Minister and others so loudly deplore, Mr. SEWARD bravely says that it is not to be denied but that this anarchy is necessarily and even wisely endured in the attempt to lay sure foundations of broad Republican liberty; and no foreign State can rightfully interfere in such trials, and, on the ground of a desire to correct them, deprive the people of their natural right of domestic and Republican freedom. The United States, therefore, must continue to recognize the Republic of Mexico, with which they have always maintained relations, and can not know the Austrian Archduke MAXIMILIAN as a Mexican Emperor.

The alternative is not stated, but it is plain. If the republic, our ally, should ask for aid in expelling an invader, it would be for us to consult our interests, which, as the wise and prudent ruler of France must see, would lead us to —! The French Minister of Foreign Affairs thereupon replies that the withdrawal of the French troops will begin in November.

At the same time, hearing that Austrian re-

The Editors of Harper's Weekly is published by LEWIS PUBLISHING CO., No. 152, Street, New York, with permission from Harper & Bros., N. Y. Subscriptions are $10 for one year (12 issues) mailed in advance. Terms of May 12, 1866. Vol. 4 - No. 19

troits, under the countenance of the Austrian Government, were to replace the Frenchmen, Mr. Seward writes a brief dispatch to Mr. Motley, our Minister at Vienna, asking him to request a friendly and just statement of the position Austria intends to assume in Mexico, and to announce, in an equally friendly and just spirit, that hostilities in Mexico carried on by Austrian subjects with the consent of their Government will be considered war waged by Austria against the Mexican republic, of which the United States could not engage to remain silent or neutral spectators. Such friendly and just conduct on all sides will doubtless induce Austria, deserted by France and threatened by Prussia, not to sanction such hostilities. The Emperor Maximilian will then be about ready to take passage for home, and Mexico will resume, unmolested, her staggering journey toward national existence.

Less sagacity than Mr. Seward's and a different temperament would have managed these matters differently. But his ability and address in the West affair, and his tranquil tenacity in this French complication, rank him with the most accomplished diplomatists. It was a fashion some years ago to deride him as a doctrinaire, but it would not be easy to find greater common-sense in the management of difficult affairs than Mr. Seward has shown in these transactions, and we regret all the more that he seems inclined to treat our domestic questions in a tone of petulant persiflage.

ON TAX-GATHERING.

The public revenue from taxes, direct and indirect, during each of the fiscal years 1865-6 and 1866-7, is officially estimated at $525,000,000—say $16.50 per head of the total population of the United States—being 33 per cent. more than is paid by the population of Great Britain and Ireland, and about 100 per cent. more than is paid by the people of France. It is clear that when JAYMESSON BRICK, in his next Fourth of July oration, refers to the "worn-out despotisms" of the Old World, it will be but prudent to omit the usual sarcastic allusion to "tax-ridden people."

Heavy as the taxes are, however, they are and will continue to be cheerfully paid, so generally is it understood that the national debt was incurred for a proper purpose, and that the national credit must be preserved at whatever cost.

But there can be no question as to the impolicy of rendering the present onerous tax system needlessly odious by unjust, inquisitorial, and insulting formalities in the collection of taxes. Common sense indicates that the tax-gatherer, while doing his best to protect the Government from fraud, should not go out of his way either to outrage the feelings or to injure the interests of the people from whom he collects taxes. It is not quite certain that our present tax-gatherers altogether realize this principle.

There can be no question, for instance, but the publication of the income-tax returns last year was a gross outrage. It was a shameful invasion of the privacies of business. It may have served to bring to shame some rogues who had concealed their income for the purpose of cheating the Government. But for the sake of this barren revenge how many honest men were humiliated by the public parade of their misfortunes! A merchant's credit rests upon the proportion borne by his gains to his losses. To compel him to publish the results of his business each year is a stretch of despotism unparalleled in Russia, Turkey, or Morocco. Yet this is what our tax-gatherers did last year, apparently with the sanction of the authorities at Washington. The outrage was regarded with amazement in England, where, with becoming delicacy, the collector keeps his returns an inviolable secret. "The Americans not pay taxes!" said a good English friend, on reading the income-tax returns as published in our papers; "the Americans will endure without a murmur invasions of private rights which would plunge England into revolution."

Nor was the form and principle of the income-tax returns last year less objectionable. On the back of the return were a number of questions which will be readily remembered. The gist of these questions was: "Are you not a confirmed rogue, and have you not perjured yourself in the within return?" Now is there any common sense in thus gratuitously insulting tax-payers? If the original return be false the signer will not stickle at repeating on the outside the falsehood he has already stated in the inside. If the original return be true, the signer will justly feel indignant at being inferentially charged with regnery. In general these income-tax returns must be matters of honor. No investigation, however inquisitorial, will enable the officers of Government to detect the false statements rendered by a rogue. Why suggest the idea of fraud? In actual business every one has learned by experience that the surest way to get cheated is to assume that you are going to be cheated, and to take all manner of offensive precautions. Revenue officers should remember the fact; and bearing also in mind that their calls on the public are of their nature unwelcome, should not render them doubly so by useless and irritating hints at knavery.

Last year, when the income-tax returns were made, a ruling of the Revenue Commissioner required a man to pay income-tax on all profits he had made, and did not allow him to deduct his losses from his gains. Thus, if a man had made $10,000 in teas and sugars, and had afterward bought ships and lost $20,000, the income-tax gatherers insisted on the tax on the $10,000 without regard to the loss of $20,000. No man, it seems, cared to resist so iniquitous and absurd a decision, and many men who had really no income at all in 1864 paid tax nevertheless. A recent ruling of the Commissioner partially corrects this injustice. This year taxpayers will be allowed to deduct their business losses from their business gains. But they will not be allowed to deduct losses from fixed investments in stocks and bonds or real estate. Thus, if a man, in 1865, owned real estate which yielded him $10,000 a year, and at the same time lost by dealings in real estate or merchandise $25,000—so that, in reality, he had in that year no income whatever—he will still be required to pay income-tax on $10,000. Whether such a decision as this can be maintained in the courts may be a question. There can be no question whatever but that the practical effects of such decisions is to arouse animosity against a revenue system so harshly administered.

Judge SMALLER has lately rendered a decision which is of much importance. Heretofore assessors, after accepting returns and transmitting them to collectors who collected the money specified therein, have been in the habit of sending detectives to examine the books of the parties who had made the returns with a view of detecting frauds. Judge SMALLER has decided that, when an assessor has accepted a return, he can not afterward repudiate it. This seems to be common sense. If an assessor has reason to suspect the truth of a return made to him let him reject it or hold it in abeyance, and before transmitting it to the collector, make his inquiries and examinations. But after he has accepted it, he has no right to question it unless he is prepared to bring a specific charge of perjury against its author. It is impossible to exaggerate the practical evils of the present system of detectives. JONES, let us say, is a distiller, and has been making returns to the department regularly ever since returns were required. They have always been received, transmitted to the collector, and by him presented for payment and paid. Now appears on the scene ROUSSON, who says he is a Government detective, and desires to examine JONES's books for the last two years to see whether he has not understated his operations. Every one who is engaged in business will understand that SMITH and BROWN, who are competitors of JONES in the same trade, could afford to give $10,000 to know exactly how JONES's business stands, how much whisky he has made, to whom he has sold it, and at what prices. All this information the detective ROUSSON naturally acquires by virtue of his office. In the Revenue Department supplied with detectives of such tried virtue that it can be sure ROUSSON will not sell his information to SMITH and BROWN, or, more likely still, accept a bribe from JONES for keeping his eyes shut during the examination of the books? It is very important indeed that Government should not be cheated in the collection of the revenue. But—strange as it may seem to the Revenue officers—there are things more important still; and one of these is, that citizens of the United States shall not be subjected to a government of spies and informers. The privacy of the bedchamber is not more essential to the individual than the privacy of his ledger to a merchant. Government must not venture to violate the one or the other. If it does so, it does it at its peril. The Government of the Emperor NAROLAN—whom we denounce as despotic—no more dare send detectives to inspect the books of a Paris merchant, under the pretense of seeing if he had not cheated the revenue, than it dare bombard New York without a declaration of war; and we are not, after all, very much more long-suffering than the French.

Revenue officials, and Congress—which will have this matter of the taxes before it at the time these lines are read—must steadfastly remember that the country is now cooling down from the enthusiasm which existed during the war. While the war lasted, every objection urged against the acts of Government was tantamount to aid and comfort to the enemy, and loyal men bore and forbore, rather than aggravate the necessary embarrassments of the Administration. That season has passed away. Neither the existence of the nation nor the success of our arms are now in question. People have leisure to think of their private concerns. They can afford to demur to any official proceeding which they deem unjust, without compromising their character as loyal men. Congress must therefore beware of assuming that, because the acts of the Revenue officials met with acquiescence during the war, they will not be questioned now, if they be questionable. Government and the revenue are very important things. But, as Mr. LAWCOLL well said, "The ship is made for the carrying and preservation of the cargo." The people have some rights as well as the Government. And while Congress will but do its duty in securing a proper revenue for Government, it should not forget that it had better leave Government without any revenue whatever than secure that revenue at the cost of the private rights and liberties of the people of the United States.

"ALL RIGHT, AGAIN.—DE SAUTY."

DE SAUTY is still "all right." He is the most miscellaneous "toiler of the sea." DE SAUTY will never say die. He is already preparing for his next attempt. May his lines lie in pleasanter places!

The stowing of the new cable in the tanks of the Great Eastern began three weeks ago. At the end of June the steamer will sail and the experiment begin again. Meanwhile the engineers of the Company and other scientific men agree in the conviction that it will be very easy to recover the cable which is now lying at the bottom of the sea, and complete it into an electrically perfect telegraphic line between Valentia and Newfoundland. These gentlemen are further of opinion that the Great Eastern can lay a cable in any weather; that her paying-out machinery worked perfectly, and can be trusted to lay cables across the Atlantic; and that with a steam-engine attached to the paying-out machinery the cable could be recovered before it reached the bottom and be repaired at once. They affirm that the cable of 1865, although capable of bearing a strain of seven tons, did not sustain one of more than fourteen hundred weight in the laying in the deepest water; and that four nautical miles of that cable were recovered from a depth of more than two miles, and the insulation of the gutta-percha covered wire was not in the least affected by the depth of water or the strain of recovery. On the contrary, it is proved that the insulation of a cable improves by its submersion in the cold, deep water; while the wire of 1865 was a hundred times better insulated than cables made in 1858, which were then considered perfect and are still working. It is supposed that the length of the line between Valentia and Heart's Content will be about 1900 miles, and that eight words a minute can be transmitted. The intention of the Company, as we understand, is to lay one new cable, and to recover and complete that of last year. For this purpose 2730 miles of cable will be shipped, which, in all but a slight difference of weight in air and water, will be exactly like the last.

Last year 1200 miles of cable were laid from Valentia westward, and this, according to the authorities, is now lying in perfect electric condition in the very safest place in which a submarine cable can be kept, and ready to do its work as soon as it is finished to Newfoundland, which is 600 miles distant from the west end of the wire. A system of recovery of the cable has been carefully matured, and every body concerned is clearly of DE SAUTY's cheerful opinion, "all right." Certainly it deserves to be; and the undaunted energy of the managers is the best reason for supposing that a work which is sure to be sooner or later successful may succeed at this third trial.

WHAT SHALL WE EAT?

The question is often asked of physicians, Is such or such an article healthy? The idea being that some articles are always readily digested, while some others are, as a matter of course, somewhat of difficult digestion, and therefore occasion to all more or less of trouble. The questioner usually, however, has no fixed purpose of discarding whatever kinds of food may be deemed injurious, as should be done if conscience is to dictate here as well as in other matters. The intention generally is to use occasionally the unhealthy articles, giving a large preponderance to those which are healthy. But the idea of such a general division of food into two classes is wholly unfounded. The question as to a suitable diet is an individual one. What may be readily digested by one is not by another, and profuse, therefore, Gasquet in the stomach. The latter can ordinarily digest easily a larger range of diet than the sedentary man, because with his greater general vigor there is commonly greater vigor of stomach. Milk, which is apt to agree well, as it is expressed, with most persons, in some occasions turned in the process of digestion, and to them it is, therefore, an unhealthy food. Cucumbers are often condemned unsparingly, but by many they are easily digested; and if so, the refreshment they afford is certainly beneficial. We have known some invalids to be really very much benefited by them from this cause. The effect was so marked in the case of one of them that she said that she was always better in the season of cucumbers than at any other period. We sometimes meet with some singular idiosyncrasies in regard to food. We know a lady who could eat rich cakes with impunity, and yet plain bread would make her sick.

Though milk is a full combination of all the elements of necessary food, it should be depended upon as the only food in no other period than infancy. We should follow here, as every where, the indications of nature. Teeth are made for use, and are supplied at the right time. Therefore, as soon as the child has a sufficient number to serve well in cutting and grinding there is a call for solid food. The change should be made gradually, and not be inaugurated in full till the milk in the mouth is completed. The most common error is to make the change too early; for it is obvious that when there are only a few small teeth there is not an apparatus adequate to the proper mastication of the solid food that is often at this period made a part of the diet.

Sugar is an important article of diet, as indicated by its liberal supply in nature. The wisdom, therefore, of some restrictions that are sometimes put upon its use in the diet of children is doubtful, though there is no question that the free use of it at irregular times between meals is very injurious. But while we use it liberally, we should avoid using it in such a manner as to beget a dislike for articles of food in which it is not present.

Fruits are not made so prominent as they should be as a portion of our daily food, especially in the summer season. Observe that we say as daily food, for the occasional free use of them, with long intervals of abstinence from their use, is apt to produce derangement of the digestive organs.

Some are very restrictive in their diet, especially in relation to fruits, when such diseases as dysentery and cholera are prevalent. This is an error; for the best diet as a prophylactic is that which nature dictates as the most suitable to the digestive organs under ordinary circumstances. And experience has shown, what nature indicates, that the regular use of ripe, well-conditioned fruit is really a good preservative against irritation of those organs as well when such diseases are present as when they are not.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

- April 28: In the Senate, the bill for the admission of Colorado passed, 39 to 13.
- In the House, Mr. MORRILL reported a bill, which was passed, levying 20 per cent. ad valorem on all imported live stock.
- April 29: In the House, the bill for the relief of paymasters was passed.
- April 27: In the Senate, the bill for the relief of certain naval contractors was passed.
- In the House, the Northern Pacific Railroad bill was defeated, a motion to lay on the table being carried, 75 to 66.
- April 30: In the House, the River and Harbor Improvement bill was passed.

REPORT OF THE RECONSTRUCTION COMMITTEE.

- This Report recommends three measures:
 1. A resolution to amend the Constitution, so that
 1. No State shall abridge the privileges and immunities of United States citizens.
 2. Representation shall be based on the population, excluding Indians not taxed, but whenever in any State the elective franchise shall be denied to any portion of its male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age, or in any way abridged, except for participation in the rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation in such State shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens not less than twenty-one years of age.
 3. Until the 4th day of July, 1870, all persons who had voluntarily adhered to the late insurrection, giving aid and comfort, shall be excluded from the right to vote for Members of Congress, and for Electors for President and Vice-President of the United States.
 4. Neither the United States nor any State shall assume to pay any debt of obligation already incurred, or which may hereafter be incurred, in all of the insurrection or war against the United States, or any claims for compensation for loss of involuntary service or labor.
 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.
 6. A bill to provide for the restoration of the late rebel States to their full political rights, providing
 1. That whenever the above-revised amendment shall have become part of the Constitution, and any State shall by its legislature shall have ratified the same, and shall have ratified its Constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oaths of office, be admitted into Congress.
 2. That when any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the proposed amendment to the Constitution, any part of the direct tax, under the act of Aug. 5, 1861, which may remain due and unpaid in such State, may be assessed and paid by such State, and the payment thereof upon proper assurance from such State, to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, may be postponed for a period not exceeding two years from and after the passage of this act.
 7. A bill declaring to be illegitimate to office under the United States Government the following persons:
 1. The President and Vice-President of the Confederate States of America, so called, and the Heads of Departments thereof.
 2. Those who in other countries acted as agents of the Confederate States of America, so called.
 3. Heads of Departments of the United States, officers of the Army and Navy of the United States, and all persons attached to the Military or Naval Academy of the United States, Judges of the Courts of the United States, and members of either House of the Thirty-sixth Congress of the United States, who gave aid or comfort to the late rebellion.
 4. Those who acted as officers of the Confederate States of America, so called, above the grade of Colonel in the army, or Major in the navy, or any one who, as Governor of either of the so-called Confederate States, gave aid or comfort to the late rebellion.
 5. Those who have treated officers or soldiers or sailors of the army or navy of the United States, captured during the late war, otherwise than lawfully as prisoners of war.

NEWS ITEMS.

The Metropolitan Board of Excise created April 28. The Board voted to establish two grades of licenses: one, at $25 a year, to authorize the sale of ale, beer, and lightness liquors; and the other, at $100 annually, granting license to sell ale and beer only.

July: Master of the Memphis Circuit Court, has decided that the law of Tennessee, discriminating against colored persons in the hearing of affidavits, is in conflict with the Civil Rights Act, recently passed by Congress, and therefore void. The negroes of Memphis may now open as many billiard saloons as they want.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The preparations on board the Great Eastern for reeling the new Atlantic Cable have been completed, and the stowing away of the cable in the tanks commenced on April 7. At the end of June or the beginning of July the Great Eastern will commence laying the cable.

An attempt was made to assassinate the Emperor of Russia on Sunday, April 15. The assassin fired a pistol at the Emperor. The ball, presumably, missed its aim. It appears now as if there would be no German war. Denmark will surely succeed in securing the alliance of the minor States, several of which have already declared for Austria.

THE "CALISOPH."—[See First Page.]

SHOCKOE CREEK VALLEY.

It is not overrating the city of Richmond to say that, in point of diversity of scenery, in and around her, and for picturesque beauty, she stands unrivaled by any city of her size in the United States, and but few in the world. Situated, like Rome, upon her seven hills (Shockoe, French Garden, Union, Garfield, Oregon, Church, and Navy) whenever the traveler moves he is met by some fresh coup d'œil totally dissimilar to any thing he had seen before, and altogether destructive of that unpleasant monotony which is experienced in all large, flat cities, laid out in regular squares with mathematical precision.

One of the most interesting of the many views is the one which we present elsewhere, from a sketch by Mr. J. R. HANCOCK. It is taken from the eminence on which the Medical College stands, and immediately adjoining the famed residence of JEFFERSON DAVIS, the garden-front of which is seen on the bold promontory to the left of the picture. The hill on the opposite side of the valley is called Union Hill, and was, during the war, one vast encampment, when its side dotted with tents must have presented a most animated appearance. On the crest of the hill, at the extreme right, is seen Howard's Grave—a cluster of beautiful pine-trees—which was used as a camp and a hospital during the war, and is now occupied by the freedmen.

1. Newark.—2. Jersey City and Hoboken.—3. New York City.—4. Brooklyn.—5. N. Y. Bay.—6. Quantico Station.—7. The Narrows.—8. Fort Harrison.—9. Coney Island.—10. Staten Island.—11. Quarantine, Lower Bay.—12. Rip-jett, New Jersey.—13. The Highlands.—14. Sandy Hook.

MAP OF NEW YORK BAY.—[See Page 293.]

In the centre of the valley runs the great Central Railroad, leading to Gordonsville, and thence by the Orange Railroad to Alexandria and Washington. The varied fortunes of this great artery during the war are too well-known for recapitulation. In the distance is seen the great work-shops and engine-stores belonging to the Company. Shockoe Creek, which gives its name to the valley as well as the hill upon which the residence of the late Confederate President is situated, is a self-willed and pugnacious little stream that is either in good or bad humor as it chooses. During the summer months it meanders through the valley, a peaceful, inoffensive little stream, barely sufficient to turn the old-fashioned mill which is shown toward the right of the picture, and little children gambol about its cool waters; but when winter sets in, and the floods come on, Shockoe Creek has often been the source not only of consternation but much damage to various parts of the town. On its way to join the James River it passes under Franklin, Main, and Cary streets, and in flood-time creates havoc in the lower portions of these streets. Last winter it became so furious as to demolish several houses in the valley, inundated the cellars of Franklin and Main streets, and visited the old market, sweeping off butter, eggs, vegetables, and even the contents of the butchers' stalls that were not suspended high enough above its deprivations.

ON THE MISSISSIPPI—RELIGIOUS SERVICES ON BOARD THE "RUTH."—[See First Page.]

Along the crest of Union Hill runs the Mechanicsville Road, parallel with it. It was along this road that, in 1862, Lee marched his army to encounter McClellan upon the occasion of the ever-memorable seven days' fight. Upon that occasion the whole population of Richmond, men, women, and children, turned out upon the eminence from which our sketch is taken to mark the movements of the troops; and the sight of burning shells in that famous encounter was distinctly visible to the spectators.

Shockoe Valley is also the locality for public executions, a portion of it—that seen at the extreme left of the picture—being called "Execution Valley." It is rarely that public executions occur in Richmond during peace.

(Engraved according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.)

INSIDE
A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

BY GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XVIII.

OF late Mr. Neely—a beef-contractor now, and getting rich much more rapidly than when he taught school; no man striving more desperately than he to keep himself in the very van of Southern sentiment—finds himself suddenly mystified and left behind. For several weeks now he has observed posted up from time to time on every door wall about Somerville a mysterious placard of red paper, sword-shaped, bearing mystical letters:

Turning whithersoever he goes to keep Mr. Neely out of some unknown Paradise, blazes this awful portent, until the contractor for beef can stand it no longer. He has questioned others in vain. Why had he not thought of it before? Tim Lammum!

Even after he found Tim, in the bar-room of Staples's Hotel, industriously engaged—Tim is a commissary agent these days, by deputy, his sole business by day being to smoke, with poker added at night—it is some time before Mr. Neely can get through with Burnside's repulse on the Rappahannock. This is the last news; and so Mr. Neely fighting it over again with terrific slaughter Tim only puffs a languid assent. In fact, the war has become a bore to the ex-provost marshal; for that bubble of blood has burst before this, at least until another and more regular one can be blown. The Yankees being so invariably and utterly routed in every fight, the independence of the Confederacy being beyond all question, very tired indeed is Tim of the whole subject.

And now, when Mr. Neely at last arrives at his point, and desires admission to whatever secret society lies behind the mystic sword, this Dragon of the Hesperides has that one fatal question to ask:

"Where were you born, Mr. Neely?" though he already knows perfectly well; and on Mr. Neely's reply assures the applicant that his admission is therefore an impossibility, and walks off.

That matter of birth—it clings to Mr. Neely as to Cedipus cling his curse. No child born out of wedlock, no offspring of one who dies by the hand of the hangman, so unfortunate. Yes; if his mother had been a harlot kenselled in a brothel, if his father had been a criminal whom last dying speech and confession had been published in all the papers, Mr. Neely could have concealed the blot and shame upon his name in some distant region, and lived and died respected and in peace. But his New England birth! The "damned spot" will not "out," nor can it be concealed. New England training will not permit him to tell a point-blank lie in the matter, even if he did not know from bitter experience that a certain Yankeeism clings to him in shape of unceasing and long-continued exertion, an emblem of his right hand, which howev'ry itself do what he can. Cruel misfortune! and he so little to blame for it, too! Was it he or his parents who sinned, that he should have been born—in Connecticut? He would not have insisted on South Carolina, if that were too great a boon; if he could only have been born on the northernmost edge of Maryland, or the southernmost possible coast of Florida! Better have first seen the light even in the most desperate county in Arkansas.

THE MYSTICUS PLACARD.

In the name of Reason and St. Logic what is it constitutes one a Southern man? What the very essence and marrow of the thing so much more desirable to Mr. Neely than was the being a Roman citizen of old? Surely, Mr. Neely reasoned, it must be in the actually owning a negro. Yet, while many a man who enjoyed the enviable blessing of being Southern born, either could not or would not own a slave, Mr. Neely both could and would and did. The first moment it was in his power, with money industriously made and hoarded for that one end, Mr. Neely bought a negro. Not a negro man; Mr. Neely was not sufficiently acquainted with owning of the article to venture that at first. He bought a negro woman, of the jettest black he could get for the money.

Language fails to describe Mr. Neely's feelings on that eventful night when his woman Coely, paid for and delivered, made herself at home in the kitchen of his residence, while he sat in his room and thought it all over. He went back to the happy hour he came into possession of his deceased father's huge silver watch, had it actually ticking in his distended fob, his own watch. He recalled the day he put the first horse he ever bought in the stable, and stood without in the snow listening to it munching its hay; his own animal, hoof and hide, from the tips of its ears to the end of its tail; his own quadruped, to ride, harness, plow, swop, sell, exactly as he pleased. But here was something far superior to all that. A woman, a living, breathing, speaking, working woman. There was the "help" at his old house, Keziah, but she could drop her work, place her arms akimbo, and give Mr. Neely's mother just as good as she got—could, and on the occasion of a final spaz did, hurry her things in her trunk, slam to the lid, snap her fingers in the face of the Neely household, and depart, leaving them cookless and in the middle of a heavy washing. But here was a Keziah, only of another shade of complexion, who could cook, wash, iron, sew, plow and hoe, and his own, own property. His own woman to keep or to hire, to sell or to swap—from the crown of her head to the sole of her foot as much his own article as was his watch or his horse. And then, all her children as they might come into the world his also!

That eight hundred dollars had bought him more gratification than he had ever dreamed it lay in the power of money to purchase; it gave a value to money which it had never had even in Mr. Neely's eyes. Mr. Neely sat up late thinking it over, not unconscious of how much elevated he was thereby above any of his old acquaintances still resident in his old village. He would like to be there—they knowing of his purchase—if it was only for a few days to enjoy it. He woke a dozen times that night with the thought. He even went out once or twice during the night to the door of the kitchen to make sure she was there, heard her deep breathing within and returned satisfied. You who own merely houses, lands, bank stock, railway scrip, and the like, wait till you own a human being before you can claim to understand the pleasure of property. Only we at the South got so used to it!

With Mr. Neely there was at first the flushed eagerness of a school-boy with a stolen watermelon; the sense, too, of having achieved a kind of moral impossibility, which added to the excitement of the purchase.

But these weeks, up to and after the date of the sword on the walls, roll by very slowly; wearily, too, with the burden of heavy hearts. A vast and increasing difference between Union men and all others. Business, ruined with the Union people, was never more thriving with good Secessionists. Hardly one of these last in Somerville but has an office, a contract, an agency—something or other which pays. If Tim Lammum has bought one fine horse in the last year he has bought twenty, the best to be had in all the land. Captain Simmons also. Herbert it was with utmost difficulty he was able to pay his board bill at Staples's; in fact, Joe Staples, his hair standing a thousand ways with indignation, exulting as he is, has been led in comment upon the Captain's delinquency, fearless of consequences. During the last few months, however, the Captain has "settled up like a gentleman," as Staples himself proclaims; has bought several new negroes, drives a splendid pair of blacks—not, of course, of the last-mentioned race—and is now habitually drunk, and therefore habitually the most Chesterfieldian in his intercourse with others of any man in Somerville. Bob Withers expresses only the experience of many thousands like him the South over.

"As for me, gentlemen, what's the use denying the thing among friends? Secession has put me on, by George! my legs for one!" Only a tax-collector is Bob; yet in some mystic manner he has got capital from some source, with which, ceasing from drinking even for the time, in the eagerness of a new excitement, he has speculated in flour, salt, and whisky, until, if we may credit his statement, he is "Rich, by George! You can always count on returns trading in the retail necessities of life, gentlemen. Yes, rich; you'd better believe so. Don't pretend to say how long it will be before Tim Lammum there wins it all from me at poker; but until that or some other providence happens to relieve me of it, for the first time in my life, by George! rich, yes, Sir, rich!"

There is Smithers, the postmaster, as testifery a little sandy-haired man as you have in all your circle of acquaintance. A strange article where-with to fill a post-office is sugar; yet Smithers has several rows of hogheads thereof and therein. Seven cents a pound Smithers sells it at? No, paid for it. It is forty-five cents a pound wholesale, fifty cents a pound retail, he sells it as. Smithers's intentions are—negroes. In fact, he is always in the market for a woman to do the housework. An unfortunate man he invariably is in his perpetual purchases of the same. As fast almost as he can buy them do they run away—owing to Mrs. Smithers, whom even Mrs. Warner has described as being "out of those women who will not have a moment's rest herself, nor let a soul on the place have it either, day or night. Deliver us from such creatures!" unconscious that that respected lady is as much like herself in that as it is a pin to a needle, a thorn to a splinter.

If Smithers has one woman "lying out" he has half a dozen. And where is the use of having the dogs to trail them? You have to pay more than the woman is worth to catch her. And when she is caught and whipped, Smithers doing it with his strap, Mrs. Smithers with her tongue, the first thing Mrs. Smithers finds when she wakes of a morning is the kitchen hearthstone cold, and Polly, Molly, Cynthia, Aggy, whatever it is, gone again. And thus does Smithers's sugar dissolve away.

Look at Joe Staples. Happy day for Staples when he laid aside shears and goose, leaped from his counter, rallied to himself the other eight parts of manhood, and went to keeping tavern! With money—gold it was—lent him by Mr. Ferguson, he provisioned his house so thoroughly when prices were low, and charges so enormously now when prices are high, that he too is getting rich. Since he has straightened his crossed legs he has actually grown inches in height, feet in circumference, beyond all admittance in the estimation of his household and himself. His very hair is more electric than ever with increased life at its roots.

As to little Joe Staples—the forward, disappointed, little offspring—under the new hotel regime, "he has money in great rolls, you'll bet," is the touching plight of other boys to their parents; "lays game-chickens, emsly, cigars, and a new pony whenever he wants to!" He is not quite nine yet, but already disdains the hotel going on the arrival of glorious news. Generally he is the first, after Bill Perkins has announced it, at the Brick Church, hobnobbing with the grip of a cray-fish to the knot on the end of the rope, rising high from the floor into the air at each semicircular sweep of the great bell.

And there is good Mr. Ellis. Four daughters has Mr. Ellis, and two sons. Henry, his eldest, is back home now, a hero from the republic on the Rappahannock, but a cripple for life with a shot through the hip, and dreadfully emaciated by months in the hospital. Charley Ellis, his brother of twelve, no longer an attendant at Sunday-school or at church—it being impossible to go to Mr. Arthur's church any longer, since he will not pray for the Confederacy—shows terrible evidence thereof in morals; is, in fact, a distress to his father. A care-worn, haggard, stooping man now, from when collectors of the perpetual subscription-lists for war purposes shrink most when they are abroad—as, for one such object or other they always are; because they know how Mr. Ellis shrinks from them. He really can not, will not! The money is misappropriated, or the object does not exactly fit his way of thinking. More intensely, bitterly, even fanatically Secession than ever before; yet Mr. Ellis is getting the reputation, justly or not, of being the most pious man in Somerville. In far shabbier attire than he ever wore in other days Mr. Ellis, from talking at street corners all the rest of the time, is frantic to disprove all unfavorable, and to magnify all favorable news. On Sundays also, discussing Burnside and Lee with lying Sam Praters, Tim Lammum, Dr. Peel, Captain Simmons, and the rest, while the bells are ringing, and afterward too. As so that, the MAKING CAPS.

Union people in Somerville are also thrown together these many months now in new combinations. Society, thoroughly broken up from its foundations, is crystallizing into totally new forms.

Mr. Neely is flourishing as a beef-contractor in war times should. Possessing Confederate money in great sheets, he has bought quite a snug tract of wooded land near Somerville, and sells wood off it by the hundred cords. True, it is land belonging to Gay Brooks, Esq., but he being, as is well known now, a Colonel in the Federal service, his property has been confiscated and sold.

It is not in horses, lands, sugar, or even— which he declares in the Star to be the best of all investments—negroes, that Lamm, the editor, has placed his money. Cotton is his weakness. Report whispers into your ear that he has hundreds of bales safely to his account in some place over the water—but report says the same thing of most of the Secession leaders; it may all be false. With Government teams an immense deal of cotton is certainly going to the nearest ports, the Government stores coming back on blockade-runners being singularly disproportionate. In fact, a cry of swindling and corruption and favoritism is already begun, which swells every day; only among the people, however, and the power has long ago passed out of their hands.

Dr. Ginnis, big, pompous, spending his money—on all sorts of Medical Boards these days—in improving his place in Somerville, asserts that Dr. Peel, who has half a dozen contracts, has made half a million—but who can say?

"Even an infidel," reasons Mrs. Warner to her husband, "can see the Almighty is on our side by the way He is blessing us. Every mail brings news of glorious victories, and scarce a Secessionist at home—I mean those who took a leading hand—but is raising money. As to those miserable, God-forsaken Union people—look at them! I say, only look at them!"

Well, yes. As a general rule these last have sacrificed to their pigheadedness, to their perverse principles, every thing in the shape not only of popularity, common respect even, but of business also. But their infatuation, their obstinate convictions, like cancers in the bosom, seem destroying their victims; and, like cancers, are incurable—only the more deep-seated as the days roll by and Secession develops itself. Their love for what they still persist in calling their country grows still unquenched, unquenchable.

You who lived outside the South during the war, reading all varieties of papers, speaking exactly what you happened to think and feel, imagine, if you can, yourself to have been placed as these were. You were no more accustomed to your life hitherto to freedom than were those. Your convictions upon the whole matter were no clearer than were those of those men; only, living within the disease itself they knew more of its misery than you could. To them the rebellion is devastating their own soil. Think of yourself as, under like circumstances, not daring to speak your deepest and dearest sentiments at your own table and fire-side lest your very children should, by their unguarded words, betray you to death. Imagine yourself doomed every day of your life to hear read aloud from the papers and spoken by every tongue that which you knew to be lies; forced to see the commonest of common sense hourly trodden under foot; compelled continually to hear approved things subversive of all morality, powerless to help yourself; obliged to hear positions assumed by Christian men and women, by Christian ministers and in churches on the Sabbath—positions assumed, sentiments advanced, plans proposed, which, in common with every believer in Christianity outside the malaria of Secession, you knew to be exactly that which Christianity was given to overthrow—principles which you knew, as well as you could know any thing, to be of the devil, fathered upon a holy God! All this, and you required to sit under it all like a statue!

The next time, dear reader, you hear news, glad news, which causes all your heart to leap for joy, oblige me by trying yourself the experiment of wearing therupon and therefore the saddest of countenances, as if for tidings the most disastrous. On the next occasion you hear news which rings a death-knell to your fondest hopes, be so kind as to assume the appearance of one who has just heard what he most desired. This was only the lot of Union people at the South all the war through. Your son, your husband, off from you in the Confederate ranks, enduring all the privations of a soldier's life, fighting, in spite of yourself and himself, in a cause you abhor; fighting against all of superior that is coming doubtfully toward you! But you can not imagine it as we felt it.

"Never was my poor faith in God so strong as it is now," pleads Mrs. Sorel says to Mr. Arthur in these days of the reprisals of Barnsides. "Because I feel that nothing but his special grace could sustain me as I am sustained. That my boy—my Frank—had the other day standing beside me, with his dead father's eyes and hair and very voice, his father's strong sense beginning to beam upon his forehead—my pride, beside Robby—my sole hope on earth—that he should be undergoing all those horrors in Virginia, and for what? And the tear which trickles down her cheek as she bends lower down over her sewing is, alas! but one of the drops abundant as rain which, from the same cause, fall over the whole South.

Because Frank Sorel has been trained to be true to his name in all his dealings with his mother, as with every one else, and writes, accordingly, as truthfully as he would have spoken had he been at home. Letters filled, as all truthful letters from Confederate armies these days are, with tales of nakedness, hunger, barbarism food, exhausting marches, cold, and wet; letters telling of filth, vermin, disease, death by hundreds, like that among infected sheep; letters after battles in which valor the most desperate avails as nothing against artillery, and persistence even after frequent defeat, and telling of all the after-horrors of wounded, dying, dead; letters at least hinting at the gambling, hideous profanity, and licentiousness, before which even white-headed Christians give way, even Chaplains not rarely go down; letters written on a blanket spread on the ground, on saddle flaps, all blotted and blurred. If Mr. Ferguson, now, could only have made up a library of volumes of the war letters!

"And we have Davis's assertion that the war may last for years," says Mr. Arthur. "Even after it is over, the Confederacy a success, our young men have still to be soldiers, partly to watch the North, partly to stand perpetual guard over the negroes, then a hundred-fold more in need of being guarded than ever. May Heaven deliver Frank and Robby here from such a country! The ruin of our glorious land, and all this for—slavery." How evident that Mr. Arthur is becoming a fanatic!

"Pardon me, Mr. Arthur," says Mrs. Sorel, gravely, "but we will not speak on that subject. You know all my life-long prejudices on the matter. If our peculiar institutions are displeasing to Heaven, it will do away with them in its own time and way. I would not raise a finger in the matter. Meanwhile, to talk upon the subject—pardon me—is disagreeable to me. You know I am a South Carolinian, and we have been so basely abused by the Abolitionists! I am too old to change my views, too old even to think patiently upon the subject."

Not the only Union heart in the South which at that day shrunk from all investigation on that point. We all shudder and turn away when the bandages come to be unwrapped from an ulcer or a wound long neglected. We are so constituted, some of us, we grow pale, sicken, faint—we can not do it. We prefer to let the bandages stay, and hope for the best. Put on the broadcloth over it all, and, for Heaven's sake, let us say no more about it.

Mrs. Bowles is whitening in her hair these days as well as Mrs. Sorel. Not trouble only—bewilderment. Things were so perfectly settled in her younger days there in South Carolina. If Mr. Neely was not born there Mrs. Bowles was; it was a satisfaction to her every waking hour of her life; she escapes as much as she can out of the present which so stuns her into that blessed past.

"Dear Mrs. Sorel, please advise with me, talk with me as you used to do. There is such a difference between the two opinions; they are in such conflict one of them must be victorious over the other before very long. Which is the right one? Won't you tell me something?" It is Alice who says it, seated on a stool at Mrs. Sorel's feet, in Mrs. Sorel's own room. Her friend sews and mends with bowed head, moves almost unconsciously that Alice beside her is other than the little girl she was it seems but yesterday.

"You know you have always been another mother to me. You used to advise me in all my little troubles, and always advised me right," pleads Alice. "What do you think—what ought I to think upon these terrible things?"

"Do not think upon them at all, Alice," says Mrs. Sorel. "We are women. Let the men think and vote and fight."

"In so awful a state of things even we ought to know at least which is right and which is wrong," begins Alice.

"It is a theological affair in part; why not consult Mr. Arthur?" asks Mrs. Sorel, with something of the smile of other days as she looks her fair visitor in the eyes upturned to hers. Alice colors beneath the smile, drops the long lashes over her eyes, but answers none the less promptly:

"A minister has already advised me on the subject—that Mr. Barker. You know mamma has not attended Mr. Arthur's church for some time. Mr. Barker has had the good taste to make her a pastoral visit in consequence. But you know mamma, Good Secessionist as she is, she has a horror none the less for such men as Dr. Peel, Dr. Ginnis—especially for Mr. Barker, almost as much aversion as for the Abolitionist preachers. She sent down a request to be excused. He did not understand it in the least, and left behind, with his compliments for mamma, his last printed sermon."

"Well?"

"Oh, I actually read it through!" says Alice. He preached it on one of his visits to the capital of the State, and it was published, as the Post says, at the earnest request of the Governor and all the other officials there."

"And what is it all about? Colonel Juggins always sends me over Mr. Barker's sermons so fast as they are published, as well as every thing of the kind, but I'm ashamed to say," adds Mrs. Sorel, "that I have never read one of them yet."

"All about the Institution. It is like what I have read about the clergy of Europe preaching that kings rule the people by Divine right. They proved from Scripture that despotism is not of man at all, but exists by Divine ordinance. All who believe in and fight for despotism are God's peculiar people. All who oppose kings are infidels. This combining of the preachers for slavery so earnestly reminds me of the Holy Alliance of Europe. Am I wrong, Auntie?"

"I have been trained from my birth, my dear," says Mrs. Sorel, gravely, "to believe that the Bible does expressly sanction slavery. It is true I have never read but on one side. I may add, that I have at times had some painful doubts on account of some of the things which seem inseparable from slavery, yet you know there is no institution but is liable to be abused. Two things troubled my mind; the Abolitionists are a bad, violent, blaspheming people—avowed infidels many of them, running into a thousand isms and errors. With such a people God can not be. And, then, what to do with the blacks if they were freed? But we won't talk about it, dear; there is nothing I dislike more. God will do what is right."

"Only this, Auntie—it does look so much as if men who themselves cared nothing for the Bible were using the preachers as a convenient set of tools to establish their own purposes. And I could not but think," adds Alice, after a long pause, "if the Church in the South—God's own Church—should turn out to be the chiefest instrument in defending a great wrong—"

"My darling Alice," interrupts Mrs. Sorel, nervously, and placing her hand upon the lips of her visitor, "you must permit me; please, don't. How earnest you are! Let us talk about something else. I am an old woman now. You young people belong, for what I know, to a new order of things; but you must let us old people alone in our notions. Did I tell you about Robby's fight with Charley Ellis? I would like you to see how he has grown; but he has gone fishing with Mr. Arthur—no one in the world like Mr. Arthur. And you actually did this transferring yourself—take off your collar, dear, that I may see it better. And what does your mother think of the terrible prices? Mr. Arthur insists on not having any sugar in his coffee. He thinks I must have white sugar for my tea—actually bought up the last fifty pounds in Somerville for me. But just to think: wood ten dollars a cord; meal five dollars a bushel. Not a bit of flour. Molasses four dollars, beef fifty cents, fifteen dollars for the coarsest shoes."

"I make my own, Auntie; you know how independent I am; pretty good for a first attempt, are they not?" and Alice, holding aside her skirts, puts forth the neatest of little feet.

"And Alice, dear, your mother did have to sell Charles?" Mrs. Sorel asks in the lowest of tones, gently as to a sick child.

Ah, how the bright young face at her knee clouds!

"I will tell you, Aunt Sorel. Ma says it is because Charles has been so insolent of late, and she has no one to control him; but we were compelled to, every thing is so very dear. I plead with her to let me sell my piano instead; she would not let me even speak of it. And such trouble we have had with Charles's wife ever since! but what could we do? And, then, she may revenge herself on us."

"Revenge herself, child?"

"You are the only person in the world I would tell," says Alice, her eyes so troubled as makes Mrs. Sorel's heart sick to see. "But I do believe Sally has given that Mrs. Warner a hint already of the—plain way in which we have to live. What I most dread is, that Sally may tell of my making things."

"Making things, dear?"

"Making caps—those ridiculous military caps that are so much worn now. You know I can make them before ma is up in the morning, and when she supposed I was reading or writing to Rutledge in the front-yard office. They sell them at the stores for five dollars each, and pay me three. I was obliged to take Sally into my confidence to sell them; and you can't imagine what managing it has taken to keep ma and the storekeepers from knowing about my making them. If she knew of it I do believe it would make her seriously ill."

"And you have sold your pony, Alice?"

"Of course, Aunt Sorel; with corn so high what could I do?" But Alice's assumed gaiety is not altogether a success, for Lightning Bug was a great favorite.

"No letter from Rutledge yet?" Mrs. Sorel asks after a long silence, during which she is smoothing down the long hair of Alice, seated at her knee thoughtfully.

"Not a line for months now. Oh, Aunt Sorel, we have so much trouble!" And leaning her head upon knees which have often supported her in infancy, Alice wept silently. "I do believe if it was not that I have to be cheerful and managing in order to keep ma's spirits up, I would—I do not know what would become of me!" Alice adds at last without raising her head.

It was one result of Alice's visit to Mrs. Sorel that, closed that very night with Sally in the kitchen, she told her all. Ever since Charles had been sold Sally had been sullen, on the usual road to insolence, insubordination, the marshal called in to whip her as a last resort; only the worse for that; next the calaboose; after that disgrace a servant lost to all love or fear; always insolent, always being whipped, always running away, in some instances slipping James-town coffee or some other poison into the family coffee-pot.

"Why, good law, Miss Alice, why didn't you tell me all this before?" is all Sally can say for some time, her tears flowing plentifully in unison with those of her young mistress. "If I had only known it! An' I had suspected something of de kind, you carryin' on so with them caps an' things. On'y you telled me so many little bits, Miss Alice. Bless your soul, you know you did, an' I don't blame you a bit. I don't mind one straw 'bout Charles now. You see he don't hab to hob Somerville. Fact I'd rather your ma did sell him; he was about the best all de time before; now he comes home on'y at night, sets more by me, an' I sets more by him for havin' him off some. Sollyam fact is, I serve cowardin' for not seein' it all before; an' you an' your ma, all of us, from South Carolina on!" All other now," she adds, soothing Alice like a child. "You get up in de mornin' de same Miss Alice, pros-like an' strong; need nether say nother word to me."

"I am glad to see that Sally has come back to her senses again," says Mrs. Bowles, profoundly ignorant of the facts of the case, as she and her daughter sit sewing together the next morning; "but it is all in the State they are from. They may talk about their old Virginia servants; at last there is all the difference in the world between even them and our South Carolina black people. As your dear father used to say, it is only in South Carolina that slavery as an institution exists in perfection."

At the moment her mother was speaking, Alice, by some singular association, was thinking of a picnic long ago in the woods, when Mr. Arthur, rolling over an old log to serve her as a seat, had pointed out to her the ants thus unperceived to the light scampering off in every direction for their lives. It happened she had just been reading aloud to her mother from the papers an account of the manner in which the planters of Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama, almost all of the Slave States, were hurrying about with their negroes from the Federal breaking in. "What the Yankees call the breaking in of the nineteenth century upon them, I suppose," said Alice to herself, singularly mingling the incident of the log and the events of the day with feelings of pleasure and pain wonderfully blended together. That Satan should put such thoughts in a heart so pure, so secluded, too, from his usual outward appliances!

"I have been thinking more than ever before in my life as I lay awake a little last night of one thing Mrs. Sorel told me," says Alice to her mother after an account, not a complete one, of her yesterday's visit.

"It is amazing about Mrs. Sorel, perfectly past my comprehension," says Mrs. Bowles, sadly. "She a South Carolinian herself, and after South Carolina had itself seceded and caused the other States to do the same! But what was it, Alice? I know Mrs. Sorel too well to suppose she would attempt to pervert your judgment—"

"She did not allude to it once, mamma. No, she was speaking of the little things that occur to one. She insists that each even of the smallest events happens to each of us by the special ordering of Heaven. That each event is of just such a kind as is best fitted to destroy what is weak or wrong in us, to qualify us to be happier, more useful to God and men here and hereafter. She says that generally even the most painful events have most influence on one in this way for good." But the last words of this Alice murmurs almost below her breath and to herself, with her eyes fastened upon the fire. "God help us to understand and feel and believe this all the time!" is the silent prayer of her soul.

Mrs. Sorel is a truly pious woman, although strangely permitted to err in regard to her native country, asserts Mrs. Bowles. "By-the-by, Dr. Ginnis is a member of Mr. Barker's church, I believe. I trust he will have pity's feel, under his less last night, the truth of what Mrs. Sorel told you, but which, my dear, I have myself instructed you in long ago in reference to a Providence over us. It is my only hope it reference to Rutledge Bowles, I am sure."

"Sally came back from market by way of the place, and says his whole property there is gone, only the chimneys left," rejoins the daughter.

And this brings us back to the night before.

At the very hour in which Alice was admitting Sally into her secret, the C. C. were engaged in admitting Henry Ellis into theirs. Henry is a wounded hero, and he is battered—no neophyte fitter for these Hellenistic mysteries than he—into that dread organization, holding midnight convales in the upper room over Mr. Ellis's store. Though violently opposed to masonry and all secret societies heretofore, the rash of Secession swept him into the new society as into many another position from which he would before have shrunk. Is the heavy expense attendant upon his membership therein the only reason why he rather regrets the step after the first few weeks? Nor has he seemed specially pleased that Henry should be initiated into this modern Felix Gericht.

Consumed with intense curiosity, we follow Henry Ellis as he enters the front-door below stairs, conducted by Tim Lamm, who bears, instead of a lighted torch in his hand, a cigar in his mouth as they grope along the darkness within. There is a tremendous oath in renunciation and denunciation of the old Union, and of intensest devotion to the Confederacy, and especially to Slavery, administered to them when inside the front-door, when at the bottom of the steps, when arrived at the top thereof; nor are they admitted into the door of the innermost arena without a repetition of the same. And very imposing it all is therein; the members seated along the sides of the room, an elevated seat at the far end, draped with a black flag, while before it burn a certain number of candles, to signify the Confederate States; other unlighted candles among them, to indicate the deplorable condition for the present of Missouri, Kentucky, and Maryland. Dr. Peel, in very remarkable attire, occupies the seat as the Glorious Calloun, presiding. And very imposing the ceremony is when Henry Ellis has it explained to him, by the Glorious Calloun before whom he stands, that a certain altar thereby—on which lies a Confederate flag, upon which is placed a Bible—represents that, of all nations on earth, it is the Confederacy which is truly Scriptural. In vivid proof of which the whole Scripture record of Noah's curse upon Cain is immediately recited before him: Drunkenness of Noah—insurrection—Shem, Ham, Japheth, and all. The effect is somewhat impaired, however, by Noah, a venerable patriarch with a white beard to his waist, to whom Ham, very black indeed, holds a candle while being duly cursed by Noah from a book.

"Cursed be Canaan," reads a well-known frank, and honest voice. "A servant of servants shall be— By George! Simmons, hold the candle nearer, can't you? Blessed be— One half inch more, Simmons, and you would have set the beard on fire. If I was too drunk to stand, by George!" adds Noah, with asperity, "I'd lie down." And Ham reels away at last, the curse being endless and overwhelming, in deplorable plight.

Next Abraham, with a voice and gestures singularly like those of Brother Barker, in spite of beard and mask, reads the neophyte brought before him in another part of the room a lengthy lecture, embracing the rest of the Biblical argument for Slavery, closing with a strong intimation that as the South, in obeying the Divine command in this matter, are therefore God's peculiar people, those nations who do not do the same are under the wrath of Heaven. Shall we relate how George Washington, risen from his grave in the person of Dr. Ginnia, rehearses—in bag-wig, knee-buckles, and pretentious voice—the innumerable wrongs of the North and the rights of the South? Nor shall we wholly abstain from referring to a sarcastic Eulogy upon the Union delivered by the Evil One himself, to persons whom the only alterations Tim Lamm thinks it necessary to make in himself are a tail and a pair of horns. After which the notice is inscribed in all the countersigns and grips, and learns also that the mystic C. C. stand for Children of Calhoun, and also for Curse of Canaan, and the red sword to be passed so as always to point North—but that needs no explanation.

Next follows the arrangement of certain mangled matters relating to the widows and orphans of soldiers, in which the sums specified bear ludicrous proportion to the grandeur of their distribution.

"Children of Calhoun. Business," says Dr. Peel at last.

Whereupon, to the astonishment of Henry Ellis, 'he lights are put out and the conclave left in perfect darkness, during which the entire membership are evidently employed in changing their seats.

"Business!" says the Glorious Calhoun, at last.

"Glorious Calhoun!" A voice from the darkness.

"At my post!" replies that individual.

"Silas Jewet, comscript, sought for. Fled!" says the voice.

"Isaac Smith, ever cotascript age, but disloyal. Warned to leave. Fled!" says another voice from the other side, which Henry Ellis has heard before from the lips of Joe Staples.

"Glorious Calhoun!" from the far end of the room.

"At my post!"

"Hol Robbins, known as Catfish Robbins, exempt on account of sickness. Very seditious in language, disapproved!" The voice is evidently dignified. "His boy, Hark, actually fought for his master—soon settled him," the speaker adds, in a lower tone for the information of his near neighbors. But, after this, name after name is called out, now from one side and now from the other side of the darkness, with comment like the above. Then there is called one name more which makes most sensation of all.

"Parson Arthur!"

"Make charge!" from the presiding officer.

"Opposed to Secession from the first, and persists in his crime. Silent but influential for the Union."

"Business proposed!" from the Glorious Calhoun.

"I move he be regularly warned to leave," the speaker carefully dignifies his voice, but is loud and dogged. Whereupon rises a hubbub over the whole hall, some urging with violence, some opposing the suggestion. One voice has at last obtained the mastery; it would seem in the darkness as if its owner had mounted upon his seat.

"I tell you, fellows, you'd better not; by George, no! No man ever regret the parson's course more'n I do; but that man has buried too many of our dead, nursed too many of our sick, married too many of our couples for that! I ain't a Christian, but I know one when I see one, and precious few they are. Parson Arthur is not favorable to the Confederacy, I know, but you all know he is a Christian, a Christian gentleman. We can't afford it, fellows; and, by George, we won't!"

"One word more, gentlemen"—another voice from the darkness—"I'm Henry Ellis, you may know that by my crutches, there!" and a double knock is heard upon the floor. "You all know I have been fighting for the South in Virginia. Well, for one, the man that detests Mr. Arthur, unless he breaks some law, has me to disturb too. I say no more!"

A vote is taken. According to the Ritual of the C. C. on any thing moved for the benefit of the Confederacy the vote is South instead of ay, and North instead of nay. On this occasion a voice in the darkness, evidently the original proposer of the motion to rid Somerville of Mr. Arthur—a thing often before done by the C. C. in the case of other obnoxious individuals, and which has landed said individuals in a clime exceedingly unlike Somerville and very far above it, or in still another place not so greatly unlike Somerville though below it—on this occasion, we say, the original voice votes South, with an emphasis which makes up for its being the only vote to that effect. Most of the C. C. do not vote at all; but enough vote North, and with emphasis of their own, too, to decide the question for Mr. Arthur's further stay in Somerville. Let it be distinctly recorded here that we do not assert the first-named vote to have been given by the Patriarch Abraham; for the sake of sweet St. Charity let the matter at least remain in doubt.

This matter being disposed of:

"Glorious Calhoun!" from the darkness, which, like that of Egypt, is both intense and swarming with angry spirits.

"At my post!"

"Mr. Ferguson." We all know Joe Staples's voice.

"Make charge."

"Against the revolution from the first. Bitterly against it still. Won't touch Confederate money. Won't give the least belief to any good news. Always says it's a lie."

Joe Staples, who is deeply in debt to Mr. Ferguson, has never probably read Sallust, and imitates unconsciously those of whom that historian records that they joined the conspiracy of Catiline to get rid of their indebtedness. Not Staples only, no more eager Secessionists in all the South and from the outset, and a little before, than those owing heavily, especially to Northern creditors. But—

"He ridicules all the good news," adds another voice.

"And pastes it all in a big book," contributes a third from the darkness.

"And won't give one single cent toward the war," adds a fourth.

"A cross-grained old Abolitionist, heart and soul against us!" cries still another.

"Business proposed!" from the chair as soon as the Glorious Calhoun can make himself heard.

"Frighten out of his boots!"

"And to-night, right away!"

"Those in favor will say South!" Overwhelming voice.

"Those opposed will say North!"

"North"—only one voice, Henry Ellis. "One word, men," he adds. "You all know I have fought, will fight as long as I can pull a trigger for the South; but only on the open field, and where I can see. I resign." And the speaker is hobbling on his crutches toward the door as well as he can guess at it.

"Children of Calhoun," says Dr. Peel, promptly.

"At our post!" from the members, evidently part of the Ritual.

"Because, not fighting for the South in the field, we must work for it at home!" In full chorus, after Dr. Peel.

"Well, it's a sort of work I won't do for one. And I tell you, gentlemen, just this. I find here among all you stay-at-homes a sort of ferocity, a kind of devilish bitterness there isn't the least spark of in the army, and you know whether it fights or not. You must excuse me, your secrets are safe with me, but I am gone;" and a stumble and slam announces that the speaker has managed to find the door and leave—those nearest the door not unconscious that several seem to be leaving with him.

It is a singular fact, but from that night the C. C., notwithstanding the immense amount of work yet to be done, and the appalling oaths binding upon the organization to do it, steadily wanes to extinction. In vain Brother Barker especially exerts himself; for by his powerful appeals, not without tears, he has brought about, from outside, such an attention as admits him and Mr. Neely and others of Northern birth. It may be the very violence of these hastens its end. Even the dullest Secessionist knows that Union men have been initiated, at least men who were once Union, and that these have been foremost in ultra propositions therein. The sincere Secessionist sees afterward how these Union men thus kept the proceedings of the C. C. fully known to all their own kind outside, and, also, by putting on too much steam from within hastened the explosion. But the genuine, sincere, Southern-born Secessionists did the Northern-born members of the C. C. great injustice when they afterward charged the same treachery upon these.

"For one, gentlemen, I am firmly persuaded," said Captain Simmons, afterward, "that there was not a Yankee Secessionist in all the South, whoever he was, and whatever he said or did as editor, private, general, quarter-master, mere citizen, or what not, but went into Secession, and acted as he did during it with the full though secret determination thereby to defeat Secession and overthrow Slavery. In fact, gentlemen," continued Captain Simmons, with a firm grasp upon the pillar of the porch in front of Staples's Hotel, peculiarly dignified because particularly drunk: "I have become fully satisfied that Secession was got up and carried through by Yankees, South and North, expressly to procure the destruction of Slavery and the triumph of the North over the South. Hypocrites, gentlemen, every soul of them. Their bended eyes salute the skies, their lifted knees the ground, as the hymn has it; abhorrence of such was among the deepest sentiments instilled into me by parents now saints in heaven, where one day I hope to rejoin them. This whole thing has convinced my mind, gentlemen," adds the Captain, with a wave of his left hand, "being a Southern-born man myself I am none the less free to say it, that the Yankees are what they claim to be—the smartest people on this planet. None the less does my soul loathe them; so the last degree are they offensive to me."

Whether any of said Yankees who afterward claimed any thing of all this for themselves individually speaks truth or not who can say? Oh if we could but read the heart! Alas! he who pens these lines can not read his own. Enough for us that he who has the final settlement of all things say.

"Secret and Special Committee of Three will meet here to-morrow night at twelve. Be vigilant, Children of Calhoun, much and great work remains to be done." This from the chair, after the candles had been again lighted.

"France, what from you?" The editor, Lamm, who is thus addressed, sitting in his place under that flag, is silent.

"England, what from you?" Jem Budd, gunsmith, seated opposite France, under the Cross of St. George, is compelled, by the painful facts of the case, to remain silent.

"Ourselves," says Dr. Peel, with enthusiasm, rising from his seat broad and jeweled as midnight, "what from us?"

"Rappahannock!" prompt and loud from the whole C. C.

A fervent prayer from Brother Barker in closing, as there had been one from the same source in opening, and, with certain mystical signs gone through, the C. C. adjourn. A Federal Flag being first spread before the door, each of the C. C. in passing out trembles it under foot, stamping and grinding their heels and spitting upon it in a manner in strict conformity with the Ritual and the feelings—some of them. Only let it here be written that the faculty of disembelling in some men, and during some epochs, is vigorous beyond all estimation.

"Oh yes, do what you please to old Ferguson!" is heard in the noise of departure. "We are at war, by George! We're got into this mess, and all we've got to do is to fight out of it if we can. But not Parson Arthur, by George! not the parson!"

SIR RALPH'S HERIOT.

A LANCASHIRE TRADITION.

In the "good old times"—that far-off past of which so many people talk and read about with pleasure, but to which so few, if any, would like to return—Ashton was the seat of the Ashton, or Asbhton, family. A Sir John Asbhton, in the fifth year of the Sixth Henry, became possessed of the Manor of Asbhton on payment of one penny annually. This worthy knight is said to have built the old church, and to have been the first to introduce seats for the common people. With a gallantry which adds fresh lustre to his name, the number of these seats being limited, they were given to the women—the tenants' wives and daughters.

Sir John was succeeded by his son Sir Ralph, who earned for himself the honorable title of the Black Knight. It is supposed that the annual ceremony observed at Ashton on Easter Monday, of "kissing the Black Lad," simply commemorates the popular custom in which Sir Ralph was held; this custom bearing a close resemblance to the "Guy Fawkes" proceeding of November the 5th.

Sir Ralph was feared and hated by his tenants. He was permitted, by royal letters patent, to execute supreme jurisdiction, and he misused his trust.

One of the most oppressive forms of taxation, originating in the feudal age, but perpetuated long afterward, was the custom of heriotage. This was neither more nor less than a fine for dying. A certain claim could be, and was, made by the lord of the manor on the property of the deceased tenant, and it fell with great severity on widows in humble circumstances. Death laid low the bread-winner, and the landlord stepped in to take away best part of the scanty store the dead man had scraped together.

There was, so says tradition, a poor widow near Ashton. Her husband had held his little farm under Sir Ralph Ashton, one of the most rapacious and cruel of men. The character borne by Sir Ralph was worthy of the old doggerel which set forth public opinion with regard to him—

"Oh, Joss! for thy money's sake,
And for thy bitter power,
Have on from the ace of the Tower,
And from Sir Ralph of Ashton!"

He spared neither age nor sex; he had to pity for the sick or the dying; he showed no mercy to the widow and the orphan; wherever his shadow fell trouble came; wherever his voice was heard, weeping and wailing were not far off. When Sir Ralph heard that his tenant was dead, he sent an imperative order, commanding that the heriot should be paid without delay. Now the widow had nothing with which she could satisfy his claim except one cow, and the cow was the chief sustenance of her family. The widow had four children to feed—two of them an infant not many weeks old, the eldest an idiot boy, harmless, but useless, strong and active, and about fourteen years old. This poor lad, tenderly beloved of his mother, was to her more trouble than all the rest.

It was a sad scene which the widow's home presented on the Christmas morning of 1484. Sharp, cold weather—weather unusually severe for the country for miles around covered with snow; the rivers and streams bound in icy fetters; the bleak wind sweeping and moaning through the forest and over the waste, as if it were chanting a Lenten dirge rather than singing a Yule carol. Cold outside the miserable home of the poor widow, and colder within, she and her children had taken a little milk and eaten a little porridge, and they sat huddled together over a few red embers on the hearth. The idiot boy was singing softly to himself, and winking his bony eyes at the fire; the other children were all unwittingly making their sorrowful mother still sadder.

"Was it not Christmas? then why not have a holly like they did last year—eh, mother? Why not have a Christmas fire—we should like Christmas fire, mother? And how long will it be before father comes home, and shall we have Christmas fire to-day, and see the holly, and sing as we sang last Yule-tide?" The cow looked from her crib, separated only from the family by a slight partition, and the sound the poor least made only served to deepen the misery of its poor mistress. The Black Knight of Ashton claimed the cow for his heriot, and, if he took her there was to be death for them.

Suddenly the door, which had been closed, was flung open, and Sir Ralph Ashton looked in—a tall, squarely built man, with snowy locks, and a great quantity of dark hair on head, and lips, and cheeks, and chin. His eyes glowed like fire, and there was a scowl on his face that betokened a storm.

Harsh, hard, fierce, and cruel were his words. He had himself come to claim his cow, and he would have it; the heriot was his, the cow was his, none should deprive him of his rights. Mercy! it was not in his hand. Leniency, delay! nothing was said of either in his feudal charter. Chances, for the sake of him whose feast they kept that day!

Sir Ralph laughed his own harsh laugh, and said he had no time for feasting. So a couple of fellows who had accompanied Sir Ralph, drove out the peasant from the shed, and the knight, with a show of expelling the family from their miserable abode, turned to depart. It was the idiot who stopped him—

"Best thou our legs lord?"

"Ay, fool; what hast thou pert tongue to say to that?"

"The legs lord will die, mother—will he die?"

"Hush, boy, hush!" said the widow.

"Nay, let the brat speak out. What of it, boy—what if I should die?"

"Then thy legs lord will claim heriot."

"And who may he be?"

"Old Heriot—Heriot!"

"And what heriot should I pay to him?" roared the knight, half angry, half amused.

"Thy soul."

"And thy body shall smart for it, imbecile!"

"Oh, he's p'ity, he's p'ity—the lad's daft!" and the widow threw herself before the knight, who roughly spurred her with his feet.

"Enough of this. All of you shall suffer for this. There, no whipping!" He strode away across the snow, and never once looked back.

There were strange things that night at Ashton Hall. It was rough weather—snowing hard and freezing hard; but the company was still numerous, for when the lord of Ashton dispensed his good cheer was to those tenants who alighted his hospitality! A huge fire was kindled on the broad hearth, but it gave forth no bright and cheerful light; it sputtered, and could not be made to blaze. The air was damp and chilly; the woodwork seemed to have lost its fire, and the Christmas plants looked shriveled on the walls. The guests spoke in low whispers, and affected the fire rather than engage in any merry-making sports; the minstrels, in their little oaken gallery, rubbed their numb hands, and felt oppressed. There was good cheer; there were merriments in quaint devices of all sorts, hobby-horses, and what not; but there was no mirth.

About six in the afternoon Sir Ralph came into the hall and glanced angrily round upon his guests, and his indignation broke out in a storm of reproach. Was his bounty to be churlishly received by his own kind? Had John the Slater, and Ruess the Miller, and Jack the Woodman, and Halbert the Leech, come there to a feast or a funeral? Were there man's buff, hot necks, and bob-upple, no peer sport for these gentry? Was not the Christmas-plate large enough or good enough for their tastes? By his halberd it should go hard but he would teach them better manners!

While the angry knight was thus addressing his guests—guests who stood appalled to fore him—out of the merriments, a little fellow, clad in black, with a monk's luring horns, and a shawl, a long tail with a drape to it, cautiously crept out of the group, and stealing unperceived behind the angry host, seized him by his cloak, and tripped him on the floor. Sir Ralph had never in his whole life been so humiliated. Every face about him turned white as the specter's. He regained his feet in an instant, and catching up a stout oaken cudgel, dealt about him with no weak hand. The guests flew before him in dismay, and were closed round and round the hall in the utmost confusion. Some fell, some scurried into the open air; but the black man never fell nor fled. He was, or rather seemed to be, every where at once. He was safely in a corner one moment, and Sir Ralph was making sure of him, when out and away was he, dextrously diving and somersaulting between the knight's legs, perhaps spearing him, perhaps, for an instant, leaping on his back—here, there, every where, making the hall ring with his shrill laughter.

At last no more than a dozen of the guests remained, with the exception of those who were helpfully hurt and lay gasping on the floor. Sir Ralph paused to take breath and look about him. There, in the music-gallery, with his legs hanging over the fret, sat the black man, leaning his body to and fro, and laughing as if he was a witness of the drollest affair he had ever seen in his life.

"Fall down the rope!" called out Sir Ralph.

"Guard the stair. Some of you seize him. By the Hood, he shall pay for his sport!" The figure leaped from the gallery, and stood face to face with the knight. Sir Ralph raised his cudgel and aimed a stout blow, but the knave avoided it. Again Sir Ralph strove to strike, with the same result. There, in a shrill voice, heard distinctly over the hall, the black figure cried:

"The heriot! the heriot! Sir Ralph, I came to tell thee thy legs lord would take his heriot at Easter." And with these words and a diabolical laugh the figure vanished.

Sir Ralph hastily quitted the hall. He was troubled. Hastily he sent for his priest. What passed between them is unknown. Next morning the widow's cow was returned to her; in the course of the day assistance was sent to her from Sir Ralph's alms-house. He became charitable. He was attentive to his religious duties. He forbade any allusion to what had occurred on Christmas night; but as the year advanced he was noticed to change in other respects; he became weak, the rigorous fast of Lent told on him, and at Easter he died.

Such is the popular tradition of the Black Knight of Ashton. It is related by various authorities with different embellishments, and its explanation is sometimes supernatural, and occasionally the reverse. Who was the strange visitor—the black man, with his quaint antics and dreadful message? The Evil One, say some; a "Buggart" full of mischief, say others; only a few believe in the opinion which to us appears the most probable—namely, that the customer was no other than the idiot boy—witness the cough, but not so "daft" as to be incapable of the conception and execution of an ingenious trick—mad enough, doubtless, but with "method in his madness."

VIEW OF SHOCKOE CREEK VALLEY, RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.—SCULPTURE BY J. R. HAMPTON.—[See Page 297.]

COTTON TEAM IN NORTH CAROLINA.—[DRAWN BY EDWIN FORBES.]

A STRAY LETTER.

SWEET COZ, I really meant to write,
In answer to your last,
A week ago this very night;
Dear me, how time has passed!

and leaves bloom; "It wouldn't rain in the country on May-day, I'm sure. And Clara Clark writes in her letter such a glowing account of the festivity that are to be held to-day in the grove near their house.

of these May-day merry-makers had a lurking suspicion that there was a good deal more in the affair than those billets promised. And indeed there was; but how little they dreamed of!

given to our friends, to take home with them. If my part, I have resolved to add to the gift fish-baskets, and all. But I presume some of you—

OUR MAY-DAY FESTIVAL.

DREAMING, I had the blues,
If I knew a nice word I would use it; but there is no other word that will express the exact state of the case.

EVERYBODY knows Beaujour's Assembly Rooms
—where that graceful Monsieur teaches the young ladies how to behave. The dancing-master was not in attendance on the occasion I am telling about,

A brick pattering of applauding palms from the table-waiters greeted this little speech; and then the Colonel, addressing the guests, added,

MR. B. FRANKLIN BERJARRIS is a young man and a job printer—somewhere in Pearl Street, if I am not misinformed. He recently married a wife,

TOO LATE.

AT, I saw her, we have met—
Married eyes how sweet they be!
Are you happier, Margaret,
Than you might have been with me?

A DAY'S SHOOTING IN MAY.

MR. B. FRANKLIN BERJARRIS is a young man and a job printer—somewhere in Pearl Street, if I am not misinformed. He recently married a wife,

HENRY A. SMYTHE, ESQ.

HENRY A. SMYTHE, Esq., who has recently been appointed by the President as Collector of the port of New York, was born in Hobart, Delaware County, in this State, in 1817, and is now in the fifth year of his age. His father, one of the earliest settlers in that section of the country, was a popular and able lawyer, and his maternal grandfather was the Hon. ANDREW MARVINE, also a distinguished lawyer, and who for some time represented the Delaware district in Congress.

At an early age Mr. SMYTHE, after receiving a good academic education, came to this city, commencing his business life as clerk in one of our large jobbing and importing houses. This house having been burned out in 1830, Mr. SMYTHE became connected with a large importing house, in which he subsequently became a partner. After remaining here about six years he joined the domestic commission house of F. SWINNEY & Co., of Boston, to whom, soon after, he suggested the propriety of opening a branch house in this city. The success of this enterprise was so striking that many of the merchants of Boston formed similar connections with New York. He remained in this firm until 1857, when he established the large and extensive house of SMYTHE, SPRAGUE, & COOPER. Mr. SMYTHE, in this new position, as heretofore, was the managing man of the firm, the business of which was most profitably and successfully carried on, even through all the great commercial excitement and revolutions of the period from 1857 to 1864. During the latter year he retired from the partnership, and was immediately elected President of the Central National Bank—an institution which was brought into existence mainly through his efforts, and he still remains at its head. The ability with which he engineered the affairs of the bank is the strongest evidence that could be given of Mr. SMYTHE's business tact and energy of character, as well as his executive ability, which constitute the very qualifications requisite for the Collector of the port of New York.

Honorable in his own actions and dealings, it is expected that Mr. SMYTHE will exact the same standard from his subordinates in the Custom-house. Socially, he is of a genial and benevolent disposition. Fortunately he is not known as a politician. His political bearings are rather conservative, and he is understood to be a supporter of President JOHNSON. This, however, has not prevented his receiving the support of all parties in his claim to the position to which the President has appointed him. It is but rarely that our Collectors have ever been chosen from among merchants, but those few who have been thus chosen were, without doubt, the most popular and efficient ones we have had. Certainly there is room for reformation in the New York Custom-house; and the man best calculated to bring this about is not a politician, but one such as we believe Mr. SMYTHE to be—a man eminent for business tact and rigid integrity.

HENRY A. SMYTHE, Esq.

THE NEGRO CELEBRATION IN WASHINGTON.

THE occasion of the celebration, which took place April 19, was the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. Two regiments of colored troops and various colored civic associations, with many other colored citizens, assembled in front of the Executive Mansion, making a dense mass of colored faces, relieved here and there by a few white ones. After the firing of cannon and the playing of several martial airs three cheers were given for the President of the United States, who, having been escorted to a prominent position, addressed the assemblage. The President, after thanking his colored friends for the compliment they were paying him in presenting themselves before him on the day of their celebration, reminded them that their truest friends were not those who had selected them "as a hobby and a pretense by which they could be successful in obtaining and maintaining power." He claimed to have himself contributed more than any other man in procuring the Constitutional ratification of their emancipation. He had done this not to gain power, but to establish freedom—a cause for which he had periled his all. He concluded as follows:

"Then let me mingle with you in celebration of the day which commenced your freedom. I do it in sincerity and truth, and trust in God the blessings which have been conferred may be enjoyed and appreciated by you, and that you may give them a proper direction. There is something for all to do. You have high and solemn duties to perform, and you ought to remember that freedom is not a new idea. It must be reduced to practical reality. Men in being free must deny themselves many things which seem to be embraced in the idea of universal freedom. It is with you to give evidence to the world and the people of the United States whether you are going to appreciate this great boon as it should be, and that you are worthy of being free. Then let me thank you with sincerity for the compliment you have paid me by passing through here to-day, and paying your respects to me. I repeat again, the time will come when you will know who have been your best friends, and who have been your friends from mercenary considerations. Accept my thanks."

Very many of the audience approached and shook hands with the President.

The procession then re-formed and took up the line of march along Pennsylvania Avenue. In passing the Capitol cheer after cheer rent the air in compliment to their legislative friends. There were probably 4000 or 5000 colored men in the procession, while 10,000 of the same race were interested spectators, manifesting their joy and gladness by waving their hats and handkerchiefs and cheering lustily the passing procession. The celebration was closed with religious services and the delivery of addresses in Franklin Square in the presence of a vast multitude. The stand on the south side of the Square was calculated to seat a large number of persons, and was handsomely decorated, a large national flag being displayed on either side, and one hanging in festoons at the front corners, with one in front on which was a message of President LINCOLN as follows:

"Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives: The act entitled 'An act for the release of certain persons held to service in the District of Columbia' has this day been approved and signed. A. LINCOLN. April 10, 1865."

Over the top of this stand was the inscription:

"LINCOLN, the Liberator of millions; his great work is done, and he sleeps in peace in the great prairie of the West. We are loyal to God and to our country. This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes."

Also: "We have received our civil rights. Give us the right of suffrage, and the work is done."

The audience were then addressed by the Rev. HIGHLAND GARNETT (colored), SENATOR TAYLOR, and the Hon. HENRY WILSON.

CELEBRATION OF THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BY THE COLORED PEOPLE, IN WASHINGTON, APRIL 19, 1865.—[SKETCHED BY F. DIEZEL.]

VALUABLE SCHOOL BOOKS

Harper & Brothers, New York: HARPER & BROTHERS, New York:

KNAPP'S FRENCH READING-BOOK. Chestonathle...

KNAPP'S FRENCH GRAMMAR. A Practical Grammar...

DRAPER'S (HENRY) TEXT-BOOK ON CHEMISTRY. A Text-Book on Chemistry...

DRAPER'S PHYSIOLOGY. A Text-Book on Physiology...

SMITH'S PRINCIPIA LATINA, PART I. Principia Latina...

A TEXT-BOOK ON ANATOMY, PHYSIOLOGY, AND HYGIENE...

Harper & Brothers will send the above works...

Remarkable Cure of Stiff Knee by Allcock's Porous Plasters.

How many persons, from stepping on a piece of orange-peel...

Principal Agency, Broadway House, New York.

C. M. DUNN & CO.

MOST EXTENSIVE GIFT SALE IN THE WORLD. All Articles $1.00 each.

A LADY, who has been cured of great nervous debility...

Amidon's Improved Clothes-Wringer.

Best in any part of the country on receipt of price.

Trade supplied at Manufacturer's price.

GREAT DISCOVERY. DR. GRANT'S ELECTRIC...

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES

For the Army and Navy Hospitals, Mountains, Druggists...

J. H. Winslow & Co.

100,000 Watches, Chains, Silver Articles, &c. Worth $500,000!

TO BE SOLD AT ONE DOLLAR EACH, WITHOUT REGARD TO VALUE.

- 100 Gold Hunting Cased Watches... 100 Gold Watches... 500 Ladies' Gold Watches...

Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one has been...

MERWIN & BRAY, MANUFACTURERS AND WHOLESALE DEALERS IN ARMS AND AMMUNITION OF ALL KINDS.

Leading Sporting Rifles, of different calibres, and single and double Barrel Cartridge Revolvers...

FISHING TACKLE.

In all its varieties, for sale by A. DRAPER, No. 53 Nassau Street...

The Miseries of Despondency. Growing out of a disordered condition of the liver...

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent post-paid for $5 each...

THE WHITE FINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1850 that this Compound was originated...

This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted...

TO FARMERS.

POUDRETTE! POUDRETTE!! THE Lodi Manufacturing Company...

It is made from the night soil and soil of New York City...

A Pamphlet with the experience in its use on Lawns, Gardens...

LODI MANUFACTURING CO., 67 Courtlandt Street, New York.

FIRST PREMIUM IMPROVED $5 SEWING MACHINE $5

The embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity...

Single machines, all complete, sent to any part of the country...

Now Ready, By Subscription, a Superb Book, COPELAND'S COUNTRY LIFE.

For every month in the year. No other book published contains so general a variety...

Now Ready, By Subscription, a Superb Book, COPELAND'S COUNTRY LIFE.

For every month in the year. No other book published contains so general a variety...

Now Ready, By Subscription, a Superb Book, COPELAND'S COUNTRY LIFE.

For every month in the year. No other book published contains so general a variety...

Now Ready, By Subscription, a Superb Book, COPELAND'S COUNTRY LIFE.

For every month in the year. No other book published contains so general a variety...

Now Ready, By Subscription, a Superb Book, COPELAND'S COUNTRY LIFE.

For every month in the year. No other book published contains so general a variety...

Now Ready, By Subscription, a Superb Book, COPELAND'S COUNTRY LIFE.

For every month in the year. No other book published contains so general a variety...

Now Ready, By Subscription, a Superb Book, COPELAND'S COUNTRY LIFE.

For every month in the year. No other book published contains so general a variety...

Now Ready, By Subscription, a Superb Book, COPELAND'S COUNTRY LIFE.

For every month in the year. No other book published contains so general a variety...

Now Ready, By Subscription, a Superb Book, COPELAND'S COUNTRY LIFE.

For every month in the year. No other book published contains so general a variety...

Now Ready, By Subscription, a Superb Book, COPELAND'S COUNTRY LIFE.

For every month in the year. No other book published contains so general a variety...

Now Ready, By Subscription, a Superb Book, COPELAND'S COUNTRY LIFE.

For every month in the year. No other book published contains so general a variety...

Now Ready, By Subscription, a Superb Book, COPELAND'S COUNTRY LIFE.

For every month in the year. No other book published contains so general a variety...

THE NEW BOOKS OF THE SEASON

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

SANS MERE; on Kestrels and Falcons. A Novel. By the Author of "Guy Livingston."

THE TRUE HISTORY OF A LITTLE HAZARD. By the Author of "The Adventures of Captain Jack."

THE TOLLERS OF THE SEA. A Novel. By Victoria Hulse.

THE ADVENTURES OF GEORGE DAVINGER. See 400th Year and Four Months Captive among the Tribes of the North.

THE LOST TALES OF MELICIA. By Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton.

MAXWELL DRUMM. A Novel. By F. G. Thompson.

LIVINGSTON'S ZAMBESI. Narrative of an Expedition to the Zambezi and its Tributaries.

WIVES AND DAUGHTERS. By Mrs. Gaskell.

A NOBLE LIFE. By Miss Melick.

JAMES LOUIS FETTER. A Biographical Sketch. By William J. Grayson.

AGNES. A Novel. By Mrs. Oliphant.

WALTER GORING. A Story. By Annie Taylor.

GUY DRIVER. By J. S. Le Fanu.

GOVERNOR FOOTE ON THE WAR AND THE UNION. War of the Rebellion, on Military and Political Principles.

Harper & Brothers will send the above works by Mail, postage prepaid...

CHOLERA TROCHES.

Need of Compound Camphor Troches, a positive preventive for all choleraic symptoms...

THE CHEAPEST HISTORY OF THE WAR. Complete. Price 50 Cents.

HITCHCOCK'S CHRONOLOGICAL RECORD OF THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, 25 00.

Circulation 112,000.

The Publishers will accept a limited number of free-class ads...

Circulation nearly 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS. One Copy for One Year $4 00.

TERMS. One Copy for One Year $4 00.

TERMS. One Copy for One Year $4 00.

VISITOR FROM TOWN. "And what's in this field?" FARMER. "This?—why, this is what we call a fine field of Rye. Don't you know Rye yet?" VISITOR. "Oh yes, I know Rye well enough; but I never saw it in that shape before."

Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York,
(Two doors from Wall.)

Collectors made, with quick returns.
Interest allowed on deposits subject to check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks,
Bonds, and Gold will receive our personal attention.
ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

POLLAK & SON Manufacturers of Sewing Machines, 99 Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Repairs and Holders sent to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular. Prices $5 to $25 each.

Marvin's Patent
ALUM AND DRY PLASTER, FIRE AND BURGLAR
SAFES
Never lose their fire-proof qualities, corrode the iron, or mould their contents.
Safes made and put up for alterations.
MARVIN & CO.,
225 Broadway, New York.
711 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

WOODWARD'S COUNTRY HOMES.
A new and original work,
with 122 Designs and Plans of Country Houses of modern construction.
Price $1.00, postpaid.
GEO. E. & F. W. WOOD-
WARD, Publishers, No.
23 Nassau St., New York.

ORIENTAL CHOLERA BITTERS.
Used with the greatest success as a preventive, and adopted by the faculty of Constantinople.
Sold at 302 Pearl Street, New York.

RAVEN & BACON'S
PIANO-FORTES.
(Established 1820.)
A full assortment of these instruments, which have been well known in the New York market for more than thirty years, constantly on hand. Special attention sent by mail.
Warehouse, No. 135 Grand Street, near
Broadway, New York.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF
Revolvers, Rifles,
Muskets, and Carbines,
For the United States Service. Also
POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS,
REPEATING PISTOLS,
Rifle Cases, Revolving Rifles,
Sole and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Materials. Sent by Gun Dealers and the Trade generally.
In these days of House-breaking and Robbery, every House, Store, Bank, and Office should have one of Remington's Revolvers.
Circulars containing cuts and description of our Arms
will be furnished upon application.
E. REMINGTON & SONS, Illion, N. Y.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARDEE'S EXPRESS, 62 Broadway.

THE PATENT BOOK-MARK.
The attention of Editors, Editors, Clerks, Clerks, and the Reading Public generally is directed to a most and simple contrivance, known as the PATENT BOOK-MARK.
This little instrument is now in general use among authors and professional men. To use it, the reader has only to put it on the margin of the book, being careful to make it rest on the surface of the page which it is desired to mark. It is neat, clean, convenient, and so portable that it may be used in a modern-sized volume without inconvenience. Send 25 cents for a sample of one dozen, and you will find it to be a saving of books, time, and temper.
Price $2.00 per Gross. Trade supplied on liberal terms.

HULIN & CORNWELL,
STATIONERS,
Printers, Lithographers, and Book-Bind Manufacturers,
234 Pearl Street, New York.

Dr. Foote's Advertisements.
OLD EYES MADE NEW, without Operation, Doctor or Medicine. Paralytic mald-free. Address E. R. FOOTE, M.D., 1126 Broadway, New York.
COMFORT AND CURE FOR THE RUPTURED.—
See free. Address E. R. FOOTE, M.D., 1126 Broadway,
New York.
MEDICAL COMMON SENSE.—400 pages—100 Illustrations. $1.50. Sent by mail every where postpaid.
Contents: Tubercle, Truss, Address the Author, E. R.
FOOTE, M.D., 1126 Broadway, New York.

50 PER-CENT SAVED
BY USING
B. V. BARRIET'S STAR YEAST POWDER. Light Bread, or any kind of cake, may be made with this "Yeast Powder" in 15 minutes. No kneading is required when sweet milk is used. No. 64 to 74 Washington Street, New York.

ITCH (WHEATON'S) ITCH.
Salt Rheum. OINTMENT Salt Rheum.
Will cure the Itch in 48 hours; also cures Salt Rheum, Clubs, Chills, and all eruptions of the skin. Price
50 cents. By sending 50 cents to WICKS & POTTER,
Boston, Mass., it will be forwarded free by mail.
For sale by all Druggists.

A WONDERFUL INVENTION.
FRENCH POCKET TIME-KEEPER,
ONE DOLLAR EACH.
A scientific novelty, lately invented in Paris, more correct than the most costly gold watch. It never runs down or gets out of order. Every lady and gentleman should have one. Price, with ornamental dial, in gold or silver gilt, One Dollar.
Sent by mail postpaid on receipt of price. Address FOREIGN NOVELTY AGENCY, Jersey City, New Jersey.

Meeks' Cabinet Furniture Warehouse
Removal to the new White Marble Building, No. 436 Broadway, between Fourth and Great Jones Streets, NEW STORE, NEW STYLE'S, POPULAR PRICES.
These extensive warehouses afford ample facilities for the display of our immense stock, consisting of an elegant variety of fashionable Rich, Medium, and Plain Furniture, which will be sold at Popular Prices. For Purchasers are invited to inspect the largest and best business stock in this country. No. 436 BROADWAY, New York City.

Special Announcement.

THE UNITED STATES PRIZE CONCERT

WILL POSITIVELY BE GIVEN AT CROSBY'S OPERA-HOUSE, ON MAY 28, 1866.
ONLY FOUR WEEKS TO TIME OF DRAWING.

No Postponement.

125,000 Valuable Prizes, worth $492,575 25, will be presented to Ticket-Holders, including $100,000 in Greenbacks.

Over 250,000

TICKETS ARE ALREADY SOLD, AND WITH THE HELP OF OUR

Five Thousand Agents

(Located in nearly every Town and City of Importance throughout the Country) we have

No Doubt Every Ticket will be Sold before the Day Designated.

Local and General Agents will please make a note of the above facts, and "govern themselves accordingly." They can easily see the necessity of making returns promptly each week.

Parties ordering their Tickets by mail should send along their orders immediately. If the Tickets are all sold the money will be returned.

The drawing will take place after the concert, on the stage of the Opera-House, where 10,000 persons can witness it. A Committee will be appointed by the audience to superintend the same. All purchasers and agents will be supplied with correct lists of drawings as soon as published. Parties holding tickets will retain them until after the drawing, and if their number appears in the list of drawn numbers, they will forward their ticket immediately, with full directions as to the stippling of goods or money. Tickets are for sale at the principal Hotels, Book and Music Stores in the city, and at our Office, 133 Dearborn Street; price $1 each; sent by mail on receipt of price and stamp for return postage.

Good and reliable Agents wanted in every city, town, and village in the United States, to whom great inducements are offered. References required.

Special Terms, or Club Rates.

Any party procuring a club of five or more names for tickets, and forwarding us the money for the same, will be allowed the following commission, viz.:

WE WILL SEND

5 Tickets to one address for.....	$4 50
10 Tickets to one address for.....	9 00
25 Tickets to one address for.....	21 50
50 Tickets to one address for.....	43 00
100 Tickets to one address for.....	85 00
250 Tickets to one address for.....	212 50
500 Tickets to one address for.....	425 00
1000 Tickets to one address for.....	850 00

In every case send the name and post-office address of each separate subscriber.
Money, by draft, post-office order, express, or in registered letters, may be sent at our risk.

All communications should be addressed to
WIGGINS, BRADFORD & CO.,
133 Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill.

The proprietors will donate to the Lincoln and Douglas Monument Fund ($2000) also there will be $2000 reserved from the person drawing the $20,000 prize, for the same purpose.

Invitations.—Hon. M. S. Wilkinson, Ex-Senator of Minnesota; Hon. Geo. V. Lawrence, M.C. of Penn.; Hon. Alex.
Randall, Ex-Governor of Wis.; Hon. Wm. Montgomery, Ex-M.C. of Penn.; Hon. Major Dan Mason, Ex-M.C. of Ind.; Hon. Ira J. Larrabee, of Kansas; Hon. Wm. Leffingwell, Lyons, Iowa; Hon. Joseph Runtz, of Chicago; Hon.
C. Greene Smith, of Miss.; Jacob Forsyth, Agt. M. R. R. I., Chicago, Ill.; M. Krasberg & Co., Importers of watches, Chicago; Maxwell, White & Co., New Orleans, La.

N. B. Editors of country papers are authorized to act as our agents, and they will be allowed full commission on all tickets ordered whether for themselves or other parties who may order through them.

Proposals for inserting this advertisement are requested.

THE BONA FIDE GIFT CONCERT:

Comprising the entire Valuable Stock of
CLARK & TAYLOR, JEWELERS,
148 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.,
TO BE GIVEN AT SMITH & NIXON'S HALL,
May 23d, 1866.
$10,000 IN GREENBACKS.

First Gift, $5000 in Greenbacks.
Second Gift, House and Lot in Chicago, $4000.

5000 One-Dollar Greenback Gifts, Gifts of Gold and Silver Watches, Diamond Rings and Pins, Gold Chains, Ladies' Amethysts, Turquoise Pearl, and 15-carat Gold Jeweled Sets; Ladies' and Gents' Rings, Ear-Rings, Silver-Hutton, Solid Silverware, French and American Clocks; a large stock of Books, South Sea's Silver-Plated Goods; and thousands of other articles too numerous to mention.

8575 Gifts, 43,000 Tickets.
One Gift in five.
REMEMBER:
$1.00 Only for a Ticket; 11 Tickets for $10;
100 Tickets for $25.
REMEMBER:
$3000 for One Dollar.

This Concert will not be postponed, as we shall open with a new stock June 1st. Send all orders at once, or you will be disappointed.
Money can be sent at our risk by drafts, express, postoffice orders, or registered letters, or by mail in Greenbacks. Address all orders to

CLARK & TAYLOR, Jewelers,
(P. O. Drawer 628.) 148 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.
(Specimens of this scheme sent by return mail. Include stamp for return postage. All goods warranted.)

200 A Month. Male or Female Agents wanted. Address, with stamp, E. K. Lockwood, Detroit, Mich.
Portable Steam Engines,
ERICSSON CALORIC ENGINES,
Perry, Hills, & Co.,
JAMES A. ROBINSON, 124 Duane St., New York.

ART NOTICE

FINE MINIATURES.
WENDERBOTH, TAYLOR & BROWN,
PHILADELPHIA.
Encouraged by the favor extended to their paintings in New York, have established a branch for making stamps for their Fine Miniatures at the Gallery of BOGARDUS, 368 Broadway.

PESTACHINE
It is the Best Restorer for the Hair, also an excellent dressing for the Face. Manufactured by ERIN SKINNER & CO., Springfield, Mass.; and sold by DEMAS BARNES & CO., New York.

NAVAL OFFICERS—INDEMNITY.
Officers of the Navy, who lost Clothing by the destruction of any vessel during the war, can receive benefits which will enable them to procure compensation for the same, by addressing
S. B. A., Box 901, Boston, Mass.

Economy is Wealth.

If you want the best-fitting, strongest, and most serviceable Paper Collar ever offered to the Public, don't fail to purchase the

PATENT REVERSIBLE PAPER COLLAR

MARCH BROS., PIERCE & CO., AGENTS,
WINTHROP SQUARE, BOSTON.

FOR PUBLIC EXHIBITIONS.
Stereoscopes, Magic Lanterns, and Dissolving Views, with pictures from all parts, and of every interesting subject, made by JAMES W. QUINN & CO., 704 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.
Printed and illustrated outlines sent gratis.

TARRANT'S Seltzer Aperient.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY,
To be found on each box and each piece of GENUINE
MAGIC RUFFLE. All other goods of whatever name, not having this mark, are worthless imitations and do not compare with the GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY.
The GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLES are full six yards in each piece, are well made of the best material, and give perfect satisfaction to customers. Office of the Company
No. 15 Chestnut Street, New York.

THE REISSUE OF

HARPER'S WEEKLY

LIBRARIES
MAY 19 1866

Vol. X.—No. 490.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 19, 1866.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

MAJOR-GENERAL JUDSON KILPATRICK, U. S. MINISTER TO CHILE.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY GEORGE A. BARNARD, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.—(SEE PAGE 289.)

COMMODORE JOHN RODGERS, U. S. N.
PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRANT, NEW YORK.—(SEE PAGE 289.)

K. E. Duple. Buotacion. U. S. S. Vanderbilt. Steer Helix. Flag-ship Manatita. Venezuela. El Horno. Corro-horno. Villa de Mañila. U. S. S. Monitor. Bombed Warehouse. Fort and Flag-staff.

BOMBARDMENT OF VALPARAISO BY THE SPANISH FLEET, MARCH 31, 1866.—SKETCHED BY AN OFFICER OF THE U. S. NAVAL SQUADRON OFF VALPARAISO.
[SEE PAGE 289.]

"The Three Little Spades."

When the above title will be commenced in the next issue of the Weekly a new serial story by Miss WALKER, author of "The Wise, Wise World."

MAY'S ADDRESS TO THE GOTHAMITES.

Come away to the country!—away! away! My carpet is spread on the sea; The trees are in bloom and the air is perfume, tional ground, says: "The adoption of some such measure as the Civil Rights Bill was unquestionably desired by the great body of the Union party throughout the country."

Mr. RAYMOND is regarded as one of the chiefs among "the President's friends." He says in the letter to his constituents, from which we have quoted, that he knows the President regards himself as a member of the Union party, and that he has a right to act on his own judgment in all matters of public policy.

The question of the situation is, what do the loyal people of the country wish? not, what do the President or Congress wish? President JOHNSON has frankly said, and we are very glad to believe, that his object, like that of his predecessor, is not to impose his own view but to ascertain the national desire.

of Congress upon constitutional grounds for requiring the assent of those States to an amendment equalizing representation is equally a denunciation of the President for demanding their assent to the amendment abolishing slavery, or to the repudiation of the rebel debt, or to the revocation of the acts of secession.

The question of further conditions is wholly one of expediency, and not of constitutional right or authority. And can there be any thing inexpedient in requiring that a voter who was lately a rebel shall not have twice as much power in the Government as a voter who has been always loyal?

NEUTRALITY.

If the United States intend to regulate the wars of nations according to American ideas of justice and propriety, or by the judgments of American commanders, that policy should be announced and understood.

In the war between Spain and Chili the United States have taken a position of neutrality. It may be a wicked war, causeless, unjust, horrible; but we have resolved to be neutral. Commodore RODGERS says that he was sent out under the strictest injunctions of neutrality.

Of course, a sudden and unadvised bombardment, imperiling women, children, neutrals, and non-combatants, is ferocious and inexcusable. But Spain being at war with Chili, the war being of necessity naval, and Valparaiso being the most vulnerable point of Chili, was it against the laws of war to strike at that city in the only practicable manner, after four days' warning for the removal of non-combatants, neutrals, and neutral property?

EARL RUSSELL AND MR. BANCROFT.

Lord RUSSELL has made a sad mistake. His speeches and letters during our late war were perfectly familiar upon both sides of the Atlantic; his phrase that the United States Government was fighting for empire has become historic; that he habitually spoke of us as "the late Union" and "the late United States" was undeniable, and yet when Mr. BANCROFT spoke of him as making haste to send word of our agony to the other courts of Europe, Lord RUSSELL asks Mr. ADAMS to convey to Mr. BANCROFT a plain denial of the truth of his assertions, and to refer him to facts of a totally different character.

Lord RUSSELL should have remembered that Mr. BANCROFT is trained to consult authorities, and to make no statement without the verification. Upon the occasion in question he was a historian reciting history, and in the preparation of his discourse he followed his constant method of study and composition—saying nothing for which he could not produce the proof. He therefore responds to Lord RUSSELL's letter in a brief, nervous, and trenchant letter which utterly refutes it.

We have heard of other conspicuous Englishmen making the same mistake, although in a less public manner. Mr. GLANVILLE, for instance, was very doubtful of our success in the late war. He reasoned as a scholar and an observer. No nation hitherto, in his judgment, could have subdued so formidable a rebellion, and he doubted even if Great Britain under the same circumstances could succeed.

Yet, to one passage in Earl RUSSELL's unfortunate letter every honorable American will heartily assent. It is his expression of a wish that in time of peace the people of Great Britain and of the United States should not keep up "sentiments of irritation and hostility founded on a mistaken apprehension of facts, and tending to lay the foundation of permanent alienation, suspicion, and ill-will."

We are glad that Lord RUSSELL has furnished Mr. BANCROFT this opportunity of explaining a matter which has been curiously misunderstood and vehemently misrepresented.

THE ROSS ROBBERY.

HAYDEN the final adjustment of the losses growing out of the KERCURUM frauds, Wall Street has again been startled by a development of rascality even more ingenious than that of EDWARD B. KERCURUM, though fortunately involving a smaller amount of money.

But little is known of the man's antecedents. He seems to have had few friends or intimate acquaintances. He had been an operator in Wall Street for some years, and, until their failure, was a customer of KERCURUM, SOX, & Co. Whether he learned his trade at the feet of EDWARD B. KERCURUM is matter of conjecture.

His chief speculations, however, were made without the intervention of a broker. Wall Street is so confiding a locality, and brokers are so simple a race of men, that any one who hires an office and hangs out a sign can immediately set his checks afloat for thousands of dollars, and people deal with him as unreservedly as if the mere possession of an office and a sign were certain guarantees of probity and capital.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 19, 1866.

REMOVALS FROM OFFICE.

WE should be very sorry to believe that the President intended to remove honest and capable men from office because they did not agree in all points with his view of the true policy of reorganization. It would be so flagrant an illustration of the perils of Executive patronage to which we recently alluded, that it would be the plainest duty of the Senate to interpose every Constitutional impediment.

A STALE SOPHISM.

It is amusing to observe the triumphant air with which certain papers ask the question whether, if the United States fought to prevent some of the States from seceding, and were successful, those States are not still in the Union; and, if so, whether they have not the same rights in the Union that all other States have?

The Editors of Harper's Weekly are published by LEWIS'S WEEKLY, Inc., No. 120, Broadway, New York, with permission from Harper & Bros., N. Y. Subscriptions are $10 for one year (12 issues) mailed in advance. Issue of May 19, 1866, Vol. 6 - No. 20.

his explosion he gave genuine checks, genuine-ly certified, for both.

Money, however, came too slowly to this ardent chevalier of fortune. A short cut to wealth was what he coveted. And on a little reflection he discovered not one, but two. A slight examination of various railroad bonds enabled him to discover a bond which was not disfigured by tawdry pictorial embellishments, but which, being plain and unadorned, was susceptible of exact imitation by any printer. Such a security he found in the 8 per cent. bonds of the Michigan Central Railroad. To his friends, DAVID GROSSBACK & Co., he gave orders for the purchase for his account of $20,000 of these bonds. They bought them and duly delivered them to Ross. Thus supplied with genuine originals, Ross proceeded, probably with the aid of accomplices as yet undiscovered, to manufacture spurious bonds. Disposing of his genuine bonds through another broker, he took $20,000 of the forged bonds to GROSSBACK & Co., and borrowed $15,000 thereon, the house naturally supposing that these were the very bonds they had bought for him. Another and a larger parcel Ross took to the Union Bank and borrowed money on. It is likely that he disposed of more forged bonds elsewhere, but if so the victims have as yet made no sign. The Michigan Central bonds are so plain that any printer can imitate them to a nicety, and it is remarkable that they have not been counterfeited before.

One royal road to fortune being thus discovered and exploited, the other was next explored. A bank check is said to be "certified" when the paying-teller writes his name across it. This constitutes an acceptance on the part of the bank, and renders the check as good as the bank-note of the accepting bank. It occurred to JOHN ROSS that it was no very difficult matter to counterfeit the acceptance of the paying-teller of his bank. He tried it, and after some practice succeeded perfectly. By counterfeit certifications of his own checks on the Union and Continental banks, he succeeded in obtaining from CHAS. & Co., BLACK & SPALDING, and others, at least $150,000 in gold, with which he took his leave for parts unknown.

It may be remarked that of all the banks in the city there are none whose certification is more difficult to counterfeit than that of the Union and Continental banks. The Union Bank uses a stamp of peculiar shape, and the signature of Mr. GIBSON, the paying-teller, is a miracle of calligraphy. Not less remarkable and difficult of imitation is the autograph of the paying-teller of the Continental Bank, which is in a peculiar blue ink, and utterly inscrutable to persons who have not seen it before. The signatures of the paying-tellers of other great banks—the Bank of Commerce, the Bank of the State of New York, and the Bank of the Commonwealth, for instance—are so plain that any school-boy could imitate them perfectly after a few hours' practice. In practicing his rogueries on the Union and Continental banks, JOHN ROSS evidently "jouait à difficulté," as French billiard players say. He could have accomplished his purpose much more easily had he forged certifications on the Bank of the State or the Bank of Commerce.

The KITCHEN affair taught bankers that they must not lend money to any one—however high in station or credit—without a careful inspection of his collateral. The Ross affair should awaken Wall Street, and especially the banks, to the frightful looseness of their manner of doing business. A new rule should be adopted with regard to the certification of checks. No more signatures—easily counterfeited—should alone constitute certification. A private stamp, constantly changed, and of which the secret were only known to the banks, should be added. If this precaution be not adopted JOHN ROSS will have many imitators, and their funds will far excel his in magnitude. With his boldness and skill it is amazing that he contented himself with $300,000, and did not take a million.

As to forgeries of bonds and stocks, there is nothing to be said except that dealers in such securities should not receive them from parties whom they do not personally know. There is no security in our market that can not be successfully counterfeited. The Michigan Central bonds were certainly very easy to copy. But there is skill enough among the rogues who now abound in this country to forge bonds of a much more elaborate appearance. We know that the larger descriptions of the national currency have already been counterfeited with such exactness that even the Department has been praxed to detect the counterfeit from the genuine bill. Yet these notes are said to be in the highest style of the art—covered with intricate scroll-work, and indorsed with an elaborate picture by the hand of the first engravers in the country. What if the knaves who counterfeited these notes turned their attention to Five-Twenty bonds or Seven-Thirty notes? The only possible security for a banker or broker is to refuse absolutely to receive bonds or stocks from parties whom he does not know. Even this security would fail in some cases, as a rogue might, by following the example of Ross and hiring an office in Wall Street, establish in the course of a year character enough to enable him to circulate counterfeit bonds. But it would be an improvement on the present loose practice.

We are a little curious to see how the chase of Ross will end. The LOCO robbery and the Madison Avenue robbery have bred queer notions in many people's heads as to the proper functions and the actual policy of our detective police. In the former case the thief, or one of the thieves, is understood to have proposed a negotiation with the police, by which, on condition of his absolute release, his share of the booty was to be divided between himself and the detectives. We have not heard of any prosecution arising out of the affair, though the law against the compounding of felonies is clear enough. If Ross should turn up, and if he should propose to pay the detectives the reward offered for his apprehension—$5000, and to restore half his booty on condition of retaining the other half—would the offer be accepted? And if it were, what would be the effect on the minds of the thieving community?

REFORM IN ENGLAND.

THE Government Reform Bill of Mr. GLADSTONE has passed the British House of Commons by a meagre majority of five votes. Its fate in the House of Lords seems, therefore, almost inevitable; and in that event the Ministry will probably resign or appeal to the country.

In the former case it would be impossible to expect public contentment with a Tory administration; while a Liberal ministry would undoubtedly bring in a still more stringent bill. In the latter case the extraordinary spectacle would be presented of a small minority of the able adult population of the country deciding whether any addition to their number should be made from the vast majority. The peaceful solution of such a question would be a most striking and instructive event, for it would show how deeply seated is the reverence for order and law in the general British mind. It would also show an astonishing progress in that direction since the Reform Bill agitation of 1832.

The Reform question in England is not one of an enlarged voting list only, it involves the very character of the Government. As it now exists the British government is one of classes. The practical point of moderate Reformers is to secure the balance between the aristocracy, the wealth, and the working-class of the country. The fear of the Tories is that the whole political power will fall into the hands of the working-class, which includes the great bulk of the population. They denounce JOHN BRIDGER, therefore, as really aiming at the structure of the Government itself.

But the inevitable tendency of all constitutional governments should teach wise men in England that, as political power will be more and more extended, the true national policy is not closer restriction, but provision to make the extension safe. Education and intelligence are the final security of national welfare; for they see not only the righteousness but the policy and interest of justice, which is the sole enduring corner-stone of peace. Meanwhile there was never a better time for electoral agitation in England. GLADSTONE, JOHN BRIDGER, JOHN STUART MILL, THOMAS HOUGHES, WILLIAM E. FORSTER, and Mr. GOSCHEN are sincere and able leaders. They all sit in Parliament, and they thoroughly understand the necessity of the reform.

A "WELL-CONSIDERED OPINION."

THE popular political comedian, MR. JOHN VAN BUREN, is reported to have said, the other evening, in one of his most successful acts of drollery, at the Brooklyn Academy, "that the Republican Party was committed by the Administration of President LINCOLN to the policy of the present Administration; and gave it as his well-considered opinion that Congress had no more to do with the restoration of the States to the Union than they had to do with the construction of the new court-house in the city of New York."

This was not original with MR. VAN BUREN, but it is sufficiently answered by the truth, which is simply as follows. On the evening of the 11th of April, 1865, MR. LINCOLN made his last public speech from a window of the White House. In the course of it he said:

"In the annual Message of December, 1863, and the accompanying Proclamation I presented a plan of reconstruction, as the phrase goes, which I proposed, if adopted by any State, should be acceptable to and sustained by the Executive Government of the nation. I distinctly stated that this was not the only plan which might possibly be acceptable; and I also distinctly presented that the Executive claimed no right to say when or whether members should be admitted to seats in Congress from such States."

He proceeded to say that he had submitted the plan "to the then Cabinet," and that it was distinctly approved by every member, although one suggested "that I should omit the pretext against my own power in regard to the admission of members of Congress."

The exact point upon which President JOHN-

SON differs with Congress is the one which President LINCOLN expressly declared was the exclusive concern of Congress. Yet the excellent jester, MR. VAN BUREN, assures us that the friends of MR. LINCOLN are committed to the support of MR. JOHNSON in his difference! Of course MR. JOHN VAN BUREN is peculiarly qualified to speak for the friends of MR. LINCOLN; and of course, as he gave us, at Poughkeepsie, in October, 1864, his "well-considered opinion" that MR. JOHNSON was a violator of the Constitution, he must be believed when he now imparts his "well-considered opinion" at Brooklyn that MR. JOHNSON is the Saviour of the Constitution.

Jordan is a very hard road to travel, MR. VAN BUREN!

THE UNITED STATES AND RUSSIA.

MR. SEYMOUR's resolution of congratulation of the Emperor of Russia upon his escape from attempted assassination will probably excite more attention in Europe than it does here. For it is another illustration of the friendly alliance between the two vast Western and Eastern powers which was so conspicuous during the late war, and which is naturally a spectacle of profound interest to other nations.

The attempt to assassinate the Emperor was made by a man who considered himself injured by the emancipation of the serfs. But when he was confronted with his intended victim, who mildly asked him, "How have I ever injured you?" he had nothing to reply. It would have been among the most remarkable coincidences of history if the chiefs of the two great nations which have recently abolished slavery and emancipated serfs should each have fallen by a hand inspired by the brutal spirit of the foe they had overthrown. And certainly, as one has escaped, it is peculiarly becoming in the countrymen of the other to offer their hearty congratulations.

THE VASSAR COLLEGE.

THE Vassar Female College at Poughkeepsie, New York, is now fully organized, and established in its noble building. The number of students is already three hundred and fifty, and President HAYMOND'S firm and beauteous rule is pleasantly apparent. There is naturally the warmest feeling toward MR. VASSAR, the founder of the College, and on his late birthday, when he drove out to visit the institution, he was surprised by a most festive and friendly reception from the whole fair body of scholars. They were ranged along the grounds at the entrance, and greeted him with sweet strains and smiles as he passed under bowery arches to the door, where a chosen choir burst into a song of welcome. Afterward there were congratulatory speeches and songs in the chapel, from which the company repaired to the dining-hall, where a tasteful and modest collation was prepared. This was all the work of the young ladies of the College; and it was a very graceful and appropriate tribute to a man who, like MR. COOPER and MR. FRANCOUR, has chosen to devote a large private fortune to a noble public service.

HEAT-FOOD AND BUILDING-FOOD.

THE different varieties of food are divided by LUTJES, a celebrated German chemist, into two classes—substances which are used for maintaining the heat of the body, and those which supply the material for building and repairing. The former—such as starch, sugar, and oily substances—are found on analysis to be composed of carbon, oxygen, and hydrogen; while the latter—the gluten of grain, the fibrin of meat, the casein of milk, etc.—are composed of these with the addition of nitrogen. These latter are therefore called nitrogenous food, and the former carbonaceous, from the quantity of carbon which they contain. The heat of the body is supposed to be produced by an actual, though unseen, combustion going on every where; that is, by a union of oxygen with carbon, forming carbonic acid, and with hydrogen, forming water—just as in what we ordinarily call combustion. The carbon and hydrogen are furnished in part from the wear and tear, or waste, of the system, and in part from the food. As the oxygen, which, as in ordinary fires and lights, keeps up the combustion, is introduced into the blood in respiration, the heat-making food is called by LUTJES respiratory food.

The views of LUTJES are disputed by some chemists and physiologists; but without entering into any discussion of them, we would simply say that there is good ground for believing that what is called carbonaceous food is used to some extent, though not entirely, for producing heat. The evidence of this is much more decided in regard to fatty substances than those which are starchy and sugary.

We have some practical illustrations of the distinction between the two kinds of food, which are of an interesting and instructive character.

The Greenlander and the Esquimaux eat oily food, in the form of fat and train-oil, in large quantities, simply because the abstraction of heat from the system demands a large production of animal heat, and therefore an abundance of heat-food, or fuel for the fire. Accordingly ample provision is made by the Creator for their wants in this respect, for the animals from which they get their chief nutriment—as bears, seals, and whales—are full of fat or oil, while there is but little of this substance in the animals that furnish meat to the dwellers in Southern climes.

When there is a deficiency or a suspension of the supply of respiratory food, the fat which has been deposited in the system is burned up, as we may say, to furnish the requisite heat. This is seen in the case of some hibernating animals, as the wood-chuck and the bear. When they come out of their torpid state in the spring they are lean, though they were very fat when they went into it. So also in sickness, the fat previously accumulated in the body furnishes fuel for the maintenance of its heat, in place of the respiratory food, the supply of which is now more or less cut off.

The common popular idea is, that the use of food is simply to furnish material for growth and repair; while really a large proportion of it is only fuel to keep the body warm. And there are many facts which show the importance of supplying this fuel-food in due quantity. Such facts as the beneficial influence of cod-liver oil in consumption and other diseases have led to the more careful consideration of the relation of oily food to health. Without adopting the extreme views which have been advanced by some on this subject, we think it to be well settled that the abstemiousness from fatty substances, so common with many, predisposes them to those diseases which originate ordinarily in a low state of the system, as scrofula and consumption. The habit of eating only the lean part of meat is positively injurious, unless a sufficiency of oily food be taken in some other form—as butter or milk, which contains this substance in combination with others. Persons who commit this error of diet are apt to have a flabby and blanched skin, and coldness of the hands and feet, with an irregular and fastidious appetite.

Infants are sometimes made the victims of this error by a confinement to a farinaceous diet. Barley-water, rice-water, arrow-root, etc., can never take the place of milk; for, to say nothing of other important elements, there is in them none of the butter which is so essential a part of the milk, that beautiful natural emulsion, which contains all the requisites of nutrition, even to the iron for the blood and the salts of lime for the bones.

Labouring men require more nitrogenous food than those who lead an inactive life, for there is in them more repair necessary, and therefore more need of material for it. For this reason men, that live almost wholly on such articles as potatoes or rice or plantains, which have comparatively little of the nitrogenous element in them, can not do or endure as much as those who have a proper mixture of meat and vegetables in their diet. So, also, a horse that is not worked will be in good condition living on hay and potatoes, but if he is worked he will lose flesh unless grain be made a part of his food.

There is in most articles of diet a mixture of the two kinds of food. This is true of milk and of the grains that are used in making bread. Even in the lean part of meat there is some fat mingled with the muscular fibres. And men instinctively follow out the indications of nature in this respect. Thus the Irishman eats with his potatoes butter-milk for the casing that is in it, or cabbage, which is one of the vegetables that is rich in nitrogen. The Irish dish called kol-cannon is composed of potatoes, cabbage, and pork, seasoned with salt and pepper. SEYMOUR says of this: "Take a pot-bellied potato-eater and feed him on this dish, and he will become not only stronger and more active, but he will cease to carry before him an advertisement of the kind of food he lives upon." So the Italian eats cheese with his macaroni; and the Spaniard onion, a highly nitrogenous vegetable, with his bread. So pork is commonly eaten with cabbage or beans, butter with bread, and oil with salad.

LITERARY.

THE interior spirit of the rebellion was never so appallingly revealed as in the tale of "Inside," now publishing in this paper. In reading the smooth testimony of witnesses before the Reconstruction Committee like GENERAL LEE and ALEXANDER H. STUART, who state their belief in State sovereignty as perfectly sincere, we are apt to forget what every honest man in the North and South and East and West should remember—that the plea of State sovereignty was urged to protect and defend the untold and indescribable wrongs of slavery. That is the eternal disgrace of the rebellion. Had State sovereignty been invoked as a remedy against oppression, as an assertion of the rights of man, as a defense of civilization and humanity, however mistaken as a policy the late rebellion might have appeared it would have commanded the respect which attends all earnest efforts for the improvement of men. But the infamy of the object tainted the whole act. And the passions which slavery had fostered wreaked themselves remorselessly, not upon the slaves, but upon the Union men in the Slave States, who were born and bred in presence of the system, and who were not troubled by it, but who were simply faithful to their country. The fate of such men was tragical. They were hung, drowned, burned, tortured, exiled, and the heroes delineated in the chapters of "Inside" published recently are confirmed by every witness of the interior of the rebellion whom we have ever met, and were personally known to the author of this story. It is not desirable, in the interests of peace and Union and reconciliation, that these things should be forgotten. They were the natural and inevitable fruit of the huge wrong which was more the enemy of the region in which it existed than of the rest of the country. If that region says that it was itself the best judge of the matter, the unanswerable reply is, that so vast a wrong is not to be judged by opinions of its rightfulness, but by its results; and they are curiously blind who do not see that there can be no enemy so fatal to the happiness and prosperity of any community as a system which generated the ferocious crises of which Union men in the rebel States during the war were the victims.

"Miss Marjoribanks," a delightful novel by Mrs. ORCHAMPT, is just issued by the HARVARD. Those who have followed it in its serial publication are unanimous in their praise of the interest of the story and the skill of its development; and surely no one who has read "Katie Stewart" will doubt the fascinating power of the author.

"MUSTERED OUT" COLORED VOLUNTEERS AT LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS.—[SEE PAGE 218.]

BOMBARDMENT OF VALPARAISO.

The long-threatened bombardment of Valparaiso by the Spanish fleet took place on the 21st of March. After the suicide of Admiral PAREJA Captain MANSUEZ had become Acting Admiral, commanding the Spanish fleet. On the 27th of March MANSUEZ gave four days' notice of the bombardment. Every diplomatic representative of foreign powers at Valparaiso entered a strong protest against the contemplated outrage, in which the rights of neutrals were so directly involved. MANSUEZ in his notification of the bombardment based his action upon the refusal of Chili to grant redress for the grievances suffered by Spain, and upon the fact that he had been unable to come to blows with the allied fleet. General KILPATRICK, our Minister to Chili, and Commodore JOHN RODGERS, commanding the United States Pacific Squadron, united in efforts to bring about an amicable negotiation between the contending powers. This might have been effected but for the fact that MANSUEZ insisted upon Chili's first saluting the Spanish flag, which Chili persistently refused.

At the instance of General KILPATRICK Commodore RODGERS entered into an arrangement with the British Admiral DRESMAN to prevent the bombardment by force. The French Government had but a single war-vessel, the Egeria, off Valparaiso, and could not, therefore, offer any very material assistance in a conflict with the Spanish fleet. The attitude taken by Commodore RODGERS and Admiral DRESMAN led the citizens of Valparaiso to expect that there would be no bombardment. Accordingly very little heed was given by them to the four days' warning given by MANSUEZ. But in this they were disappointed. For at the last moment Admiral DRESMAN received instructions from the British Government to maintain an attitude of strict neutrality. Commodore RODGERS, although with the iron-clad Monitor Mohawk, as he had assured DRESMAN, he would, "in not less than thirty seconds and not more than thirty minutes," leave only the main-masts of the Spanish iron-clad Nesoesca above the water, hesitated to enter upon the conflict unsupported.

Commodore RODGERS gives the following official account of the bombardment:

"This morning at nine o'clock the Spanish Admiral opened upon the town with shot and shell, directing his fire principally against public buildings and store-houses. After a continuous bombardment of two hours and fifty minutes the firing ceased, and the Spanish Admiral withdrew his vessels.

"Fear of the stone buildings connected with the Custom-house were actually destroyed, with their contents. Other adjoining buildings used for the same purpose were very much injured. The value of merchandise destroyed in those was vaguely estimated at some twenty-five millions of dollars. The Intendencia, or Government house, the Boice, or Exchange, and the railroad buildings were damaged to a considerable extent. Naturally and inevitably parts of the city which the Spanish Admiral declared he did not intend to injure received many of his missiles. Several blocks of private buildings were destroyed by fire, and churches and convents and hospitals were not exempt from injury. Few lives were lost—not more than eight or ten."

The Spanish fleet consisted in all of six vessels—the Nesoesca (iron-clad), the Resolucion, the Villa de Madrid, Blanca, Vencedora, Pagante de Manila, and the Berenguela. Only four of these participated in the bombardment.

Our correspondent, writing from Valparaiso, gives the following account of the assault:

"The squadron having taken a position near the city, at 2:30 they opened an effective fire on the bonded warehouses, Custom-house, Intendencia, Post-office, Naval Academy, railroad buildings, barracks, and all other public property. The bombardment continued until midnight without cessation. At 11 the bonded warehouses and the southern portion of the city was enveloped in flames, the dense smoke from which arose and settled over the beleaguered city like a pall. Although the fire was directed toward public property alone, the shot and shell in many cases injured private buildings to a very great extent. The fire in the southern portion of the city consumed many large wholesale warehouses and private residences. The flames spread rapidly, and for a time defied all the efforts of the Fire Department to check them, assisted by a large number of sailors from both the American and English men-of-war in the harbor. The conflagration continued until late Sunday afternoon. The total amount of losses is estimated at not less than $20,000,000. The fire was not returned from the shore, but the Chilean flag floated defiantly on the brow of the hill overlooking the warehouses, and for a long time attracted the fire of the Villa de Madrid, a first-class 40-gun frigate; shot and shell hurled rained about the flag-staff, but still the iron-clad and 'hope star' could be seen amidst the smoke and dust caused by the explosion of the shell. At about 11:30 a portion of a shell wounded the staff, causing it to lean over a little, but the ballards and stays supported it through the fire. The flag-ship Nesoesca (iron-clad frigate, 24 5-inch guns) did not participate in the bombardment, but kept under way in front of the city, directing by signals the movements of the different vessels. The fire from the frigate Blanca and the corvette Frodoval was observed to have been particularly effective, doing great damage to the Custom-house and the Intendencia, which buildings, together with those in the immediate vicinity, were riddled with shot and shell. It is estimated that at least 2000 projectiles were thrown into the doomed city.

"Such was the bombardment of Valparaiso, which was witnessed with absorbing interest by the American and English squadrons in the harbor, and by the wretched inhabitants of the city from the hills overlooking the town."

The report of the Committee appointed at a meeting of British subjects, held at Valparaiso March 28, includes among others the three following significant resolutions:

"That Rear-Admiral DRESMAN'S plea of want of sufficient force to oppose the Spaniards is humiliating to his countrymen and inadmissible, considering that the co-operation of a powerful United States squadron was pressed upon him by its commanders, and that this meeting can not express in sufficiently strong terms its indignation that such an atrocity as the bombardment of a defenceless town with a population of 80,000 inhabitants should be perpetrated in the presence of a British squadron.

"That it is a matter of regret that between the British Chang d'Affaires and the community there has long existed an antagonism which has rendered him unfit to represent its interests, and that in the present emergency the disadvantages resulting therefrom have been more sensibly felt by his passive submission to the wishes of the Spanish squadron, while other vessels have been placed in much more favorable positions through the services of their representatives.

"That a deputation be appointed to wait upon the United States Minister, General KILPATRICK, and upon Commodore RODGERS, and express to them, on behalf of the meeting, its high appreciation of their earnest endeavors to prevent, by co-operation with the British force, the bombardment of this city, deeply regretting that those endeavors had not been more successful."

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.)

INSIDE A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

MR. FERGUSON APPEARS AT HIS WINDOW.

CHAPTER XIX.

It is not long after the adjournment of the C. C. that Mr. Ferguson, seated in his room reading the well-worn little Bible which, while yet a youth, he brought over, a genuine fragment of Scotland, with him, preparatory to going to bed, hears a noise as of the gathering of a crowd beneath his windows.

It is the upper room of a large stone building which he had built, by far the most substantial edifice in Somerville, to rent as a store. And it had brought Mr. Ferguson in a good rent until Secession closed it up, as it had closed up almost the whole legitimate business of the South. "The temporary inconvenience," Colonel Ret Roberts remarks in his public and private speeches, "which precedes independence and unparalleled prosperity; and he who bewails it is, adds the Colonel, coming down upon the stand with clenched fist, "either a fool or a Union man and a traitor!"

Very true, of course; yet it will sadden one. To say nothing of the vast tracts devastated by actual war, the appearance of the country far from such scenes is mournful. Fields, as you ride along, with broken-down fences, and acres wholly given up to sunflowers and cockleburrs, or making but faint fight against them. Noe did you ever before see white girls so young carrying water, or boys so very small driving oxen, or females, not African, cutting wood and hewing. The desolation looks worst in the little towns through which you pass. The homes are there still, but in painful need of glass and pallings and paint. The shops are all still there, but almost all shut up—no sound from within of hammer, plane, or saw. Nor have the offices emigrated; they are all there still, with their rusty signs of lawyer or doctor; but the lawyer, generally speaking, is colored now, speculator, or quartermaster; while the doctor is killing more rapidly than before in the ranks, or practicing wholesale surgery in the distant hospitals. And the stores remain, but mostly shut up, their enterprising proprietors gone into battle, or, most likely, into cotton. The shut-up doors and windows of the towns may, like the closed mouths and eyes of those in a swoon, be only temporary; but it looks, all the circulation stopped, very much like death. Not that there is not in every village at least one shop, store, grocery, gathering-point of some sort left, whereat clusters together the whole male population on the arrival of the stage, to get the papers and to hear the much more diversified and thrilling news brought by the passengers. An hour is spent by the neighbors so assembled in anticipating what the stage will, and should, and "has to" bring before it drives up; then two hours, after it has gone, in discussing what it actually does supply them. Blessings on these, the mass, the more virtuous and industrious portion of the people, the country, in fact, yes, Heaven abundantly bless these, even though it be in ways they dream not of! But upon the leaders—editors, military magnates, political preachers most of all—upon these rest the justice of Almighty God!

But Mr. Ferguson. He listens a while to the noise growing louder beneath his windows, then kneels for his evening devotion, remaining perhaps longer upon his knees than usual. Rising at last, he listens and considers. All the doors and windows of the building, for fire-proof purposes, are coated with sheet-iron and securely fastened. The truth is, Mr. Ferguson has long calculated the possibility of an attack, and is not unprepared. He glances at his iron safe—yes, his scrap-book, to say nothing of other valuables, is secured therein, and the Scotchman deliberately hides the key in a crevice to which he has called the attention of Mr. Arthur long before. As the noise below increases into groans and yells he coolly produces from their hiding-places and lays upon the table, cleared of every thing for the purpose, two of Sharp's rifles, a pair of revolvers, a claymore brought from Scotland; the two Derringers he secures about his person, with the handles ready to his hand.

"Twelve and twelve," he says aloud of the provision on the table for his coming guests, "are twenty-four; two in my sockets, twenty-six; claymore at least one to last—say thirty in all." And so he snuffs the candle, takes his seat, and listens. Yes, it is the night of the C. C.—he remembers that. But then it may prove a false alarm.

He listens. Yells, oaths, blows upon the door, cries for ladders and axes. Not the C. C. only; there is a Camp of Instruction some dozen miles from town, and stray soldiers therefrom drop in to take a hand—good practice for actual war.

"Oh, nobody's going to kill the man; only going to give him a good scare," is the remark made to Dr. Warner, who, plucking himself out of the coils of his wife wound about him in night-gown and hysterics, has come down to see what is afoot, and that physician is tossed off from the crowd like a straw; and while he catches desperately at the attention of this and that individual, meditating a stump speech in defense of his friend, the tumult increases until he is fairly drowned and washed away.

"Now, then, what do you want?" hails the Scotchman, who has raised a sash, opened the leaf of a shutter, and looked out.

The pressing necessities of the mob thus appealed to are various.

"A hundred dollars for the soldiers!"

"In gold, old boss, mind!"

"And holler hurrah for Jeff Davis!"

"And down with old Lincoln!"

"Promise you will leave in twelve hours."

"And never come back." It is Joe Staples, this last; it will be several thousand clear gain to him if the Scotchman complies or is killed.

And thereupon follows a perfect storm of suggestions from the many-headed. The Scotchman waits patiently till he can be heard.

"Men!" he begins, at last.

"Stand firm, man!" shouts a powerful voice from over the way; and it is followed almost instantly after by the awful blasphemies of Dr. Peel, in the centre of the crowd, upon the man who said it.

"Men!" continues the besieged, "you are half of you deranged, the other half drunk. On that account I don't want to kill you. Do what you please. Only put my life in danger, however, and I will kill some of you. Howl away!"

And the Scotchman draws in his head, closes and fastens the shutter, lowers the sash. Not an instant too soon, for the missiles rattle upon it like hail.

Considering within himself, the Scotchman drags a large desk so as to fortify himself in a corner commanding windows and door, upon which he disposes in easy reach his weapons, having first carefully examined the caps of his fire-arms and unsheathed his claymore.

"Yes, I maun not forget it," he says, relaxing for a moment into a dialect the very burr of which has almost worn from his tongue; and taking the key from its crevice over the mantle, he unlocks the safe, takes out a written paper, dates and signs it, with a line under in explanation.

"It's not as regular as a man can wish, but it's the best a man can do. Ah, yes!" And he lugs out his ponderous collection, writes a rapid bulletin of matters up to date of sieges, pastes it from his mutilage apparatus and with the dexterity of long practice in its place in the volume, and replaces it and the paper in the safe, relocks it, puts the key in its place, and is comfortable once more.

"What fakes men are about their Wills," he says as he takes his place behind his abatias, "and I as great as any," he growls.

Meanwhile the uproar without is enough to appeal the stoutest heart. If yells and curses could have beaten down walls it would have been "all over" with Mr. Ferguson. What next?

Towering on the horse-block in front of the store, Dr. Peel, with terrific profanity, announces to the C. C. present that, having splendidly accomplished their project of frightening the old scamp, the next thing is to adjourn in quest of drinks.

But Alonzo Wright, being already supplied on that point, most strenuously objects, his thirst is now for blood. "Our own boys far away to-night," he shouts from the horse-block, "fighting for us, pouring out their blood in rivers. And here in this house is an insolent old scoundrel worse than the worst of Yankees. It is time to make example of these Union men, sneaking scoundrels, traitors, abolitionists," and a deal more to the same effect. Furious curses, ardent appeals, passionate entreaties—there is splendid eloquence in the raving of the man, and the audience are in the mood to appreciate it. In fact Joe Staples is making a free thing of it at the bar of his hotel near by, is even pressing his liquor upon all who come in perpetual relays from the crowd and back again. The ex-tailor sees a chance of his making the happiest hit of his life; he even dispatches a negro with a demijohn down to the crowd.

"Axes, men, axes, and our cry to-night is Rappahannock!" And the speaker springs from his rostrum among an excited crowd of kindred spirits. Some little time is spent in obtaining axes, those near by having unaccountably been misled. Next, it is slow work trying to peel the iron sheathing of the stout doors, especially in the rush of the crowd, each thinking he can do it better than the other, Dr. Peel as active among them as Alonzo Wright.

DR. PEEL AND JEM.

Meanwhile Mr. Ferguson within ponders his course: "Had I not better fire on them from above? If they get those doors down they'll be upon me in such numbers—wait on the Lord till the last moment before you take to your platoon. God forgive me, I have been too cross with these poor demented bodies all along! Too close in business matters, too. Not meet to be partaker of the inheritance of the saints in— It is good," he continues to murmur to himself, "both to hope and"—arranging the weapons to his hand—"quietly to wait for the salvation of the Lord. Forgive my contempt for these fools, Lord, but those sects they are such fools."

The blows rain fast and heavy on the doors. Step! They must have given up the axes, and are now using a ram of timber. The Scotchman has known of too many similar atrocities, has dozens of them in printed form and written in his Scrap-book, not to know, specially since he has heard Alonzo Wright among the crowd, that his own death is about as much a speedy certainty as any thing human can be. The faxen hair, the blue eyes, the bonny smile—it seems nearer, clearer to Mr. Ferguson than for many a long year now. Heaven! But unfortunately he can not think of heaven without a grim remembrance of the Secession of angels therefrom, and the fate of said angelic Secessionists, too. Fly the one great gulf should swallow us all up so completely these days.

But the bells? What can they be ringing the bells for? That begins to be an inquiry among the excited mob, pausing a little to listen and ask.

Fire! An illumination upon the sky, dark shadows beginning to fall from the houses that way across the street. Fire! fire! And falling upon the excitement before Mr. Ferguson's doors, as when the sun shines on the hearth-stone, the greater glow extinguishes the less. Fire! fire! fire! And even Alonzo Wright, disabled some time ago by an accidental blow upon the shoulder from the axe of Dr. Peel in the intense enmity of the Doctor, after cursing for a time the rapidly-diminishing crowd, is compelled to limp after it. In little more time than it has taken to recede it the assault on Mr. Ferguson has begun and ended.

"Dr. Ginnis! Dr. Ginnis!" is the cry into which that of fire has now subsided.

"Dr. Ginnis?" Then, as we too hurry on to the spot, one word about him; it can soon be said, before we've gone more than a square. Low of stature, stout of frame, red of face, puffy of breath, load of tongue, excitable of temperament, "Secession from the start," of course. From the outset it is with pain that Dr. Ginnis tears himself from the knot at the street-corner to visit a patient. He is hardly in the sick chamber before the topic is introduced. As soon as possible the complaints and the prescription for the patient are got through with as an altogether secondary matter, that the Doctor may get to European dependence on the South, the sovereignty of cotton, the Scripturalty of slavery, the religious apostasy and hastening downfall of the North, the untold blessings Secession is to pour from its cornucopia upon our glorious Confederacy, and all the last great Confederate victory, too, roars over again with all its cannon in the ears of the stammering patient. The Doctor is enthusiastic, as even his political friends allow. Secession has taken possession of every globe of his blood, fold of his brain, holds as a rider does the reins every fiber and tendon of the Doctor's gibbous person. A big bubble, Dr. Ginnis, oscillating wonderfully when the wind blows as it often does, glittering in the sunshine of good news. It does Mr. Ellis good to see and hear him.

"Glory be to God!" he shouts, clapping his hands together, snatching his hat from his heated forehead, and waving it with enthusiasm. Then off like a shot, a large one, from the Post-office to spread the tidings whenever wonderful news arrives, as it does almost every mail.

"Have you heard the news?" he cries to people on foot across the street, on horseback, in carriage, whom he sees as he goes, never waiting till he can get near enough to see whether they be acquaintances or not. "Glorious news! Yankees cut to pieces again! fifty thousand killed! Not apt to be up early as a general thing himself, so man before Dr. Ginnis when the stage is to get in before day. "Wake up, all of you!" he shouts at the doors of the houses as he returns home with the great intelligence. "Wake up!" hanging tremendously on the gates and doors. "Great news! Louisville captured! Cincinnati burned! Washington City in our hands! hurrah! Wake up! Glory be to God!" And the Doctor hurries on to stir up the rest, making great bulwarks in his wake, literally so.

"Twenty-seven regiments bayoneted where they stood; cut down and cut to pieces; the carnage tremendous!" And Dr. Ginnis has a peculiar way of drawing his coat-sleeves up his arms, turning down the cuffs of his exposed shirt-sleeves, as he says it, and moving his mouth and eyes as if he was about taking part therein himself, anxious to behold. Being a member of Brother Barker's church, no man, not even Sam Peters nor Brother Barker himself, more fervent in prayer than Dr. Ginnis—only he begins too violently, runs in fifteen minutes into hoarseness, and ends in wheeze. There is this slight inconsistency in Dr. Ginnis. At the very outset of Secession, in indignant denial of the possibility of war resulting from the same, he had loudly and frequently promised contemptuously to drink every drop of blood that might be shed.

"If you will turn to Psalm fifty-fifth, fifteen, you will see that David said exactly the same thing, 'Let death seize upon them, and let them go down quick into hell,'" remarks Brother Barker when informed that Dr. Ginnis had been distinctly heard to say "Damn him!" in reference to Butler in New Orleans. "You will hardly deny that David was a holy man. And these are most extraordinary times. We can not judge men by the rules of ordinary times; it would be foolish as well as useless to do so," reasons the divine. Nor was he the only professed Christian who used the same reasoning in reference to the intoxication of leading members of the church, even chaplains in the army, on rejoicings over victories. In fact, it was said of Brother Barker, and of many others like him, that, not content with supplicating yellow-fever and death in every form, as well as that in battle, upon the infidel foe, he and others had prayed for something that sounded marvelously like an eternal damnation of the same foe. Let any one who retains to-day clear recollections of what passed during the great delirium say, was this actually so or was it not?

Turning a corner on our hurried way from Mr. Ferguson's we find it is Dr. Ginnis's house that is on fire. Upon the whole, the handsomest two-story residence in Somerville, handsomely furnished, the Doctor has not occupied it more than a year. And the Doctor is moved as never the most glorious news had ever moved him before. Consequently the wretches is upon him almost from the first. He stands now near the fast-consuming remnant of his home, stammered, silent, in utter collapse. For there is this peculiarity about Dr. Ginnis, that he is as much affected by bad news as by good, the elation produced by the last being fully equalled by the degree of depression produced by the first—according to the inexorable law of mechanics whereby action and reaction are equal. Hence it is that while we good Secessionists rather like falling in with Dr. Ginnis when good news is afloat—we couldn't avoid doing that, as the Doctor then pervades every nook and corner of Somerville—we would rather not fall in with him when the news is bad. In this last case, to do the Doctor justice, we are not apt to, however, as he stays pretty closely at home then, if possible.

But Dr. Ginnis is not needed at the fire at all. Dr. Peel has arrived on the spot among the first, and has been hard at work from the moment he arrived. Truth is, Dr. Peel, by sheer force of the man, has come to be the life and soul of Somerville long before this; no public dinner, no war-meeting to receive from or dismiss to the war any distinguished personage or personage going to become distinguished, no ball or cakelaud, no public enterprise, of which Dr. Peel is not the grand carrier-on as well as the originator. We have come even to accept the essences, jewelry, broadcloth, and boasting of the man in consideration of his undoubted patriotism and genuine liberality of feeling and of funds. It has got to be generally believed that Dr. Peel and Anne Wright are engaged to be married, and Alonzo Wright has risen a hundredfold in public consideration, to say nothing of Anne, frail in form, fair, gentle, and doubly lovable in appearance from her contrast to magnificent and scantly Dr. Peel as she hangs upon his arm or stands by him in the dance in public assemblies.

And Dr. Peel sustains his well-earned reputation for public spirit and energy now at the fire. He has rushed a dozen times into the house, and returned bearing wardrobes, bureaus, and the like, beyond the strength of other men. Tearing off weather-boarding to get at the flames; on the top of the stable endeavoring to save it; here, there, every where; men running hither and thither like children at his command; his hat gone in the confusion; moving in the heat as in his native element, no man there refuses to feel him to be the hero of the hour, Agamemnon, king of men. But even Dr. Peel can not work miracles. When morning breaks it is upon the chimneys only and a few charred timbers, upon a bed of ashes, the bones, as it were, of the once living home, from which life and flesh are gone. All that is left is for Dr. Peel to start a subscription list, before he has washed his hands for breakfast, in Dr. Ginnis's behalf, heading it with a handsome amount, and canvassing the entire community with it before night.

In his heavy loss Dr. Ginnis accepts the assistance with gratitude, but adds to Dr. Peel: "A thousand thanks, Dr. Peel, for all your noble aid; but if you could only help me to prove it was the work of an incendiary, even if we did not know whom, and couldn't catch him—just to know that certainly would be a great satisfaction to me!"

He does not say it, but to have it known that his house had been selected out of all others in Somerville as that of the most prominent patriot there for destruction, would have gone far to console the Doctor.

"That was my full belief at first," says Dr. Peel, with oath, "until I happened upon that pipe I showed you lying near the stable among the straw. Some careless old negro woman. If I was you I would examine into it; and if I was to know that any negro of mine had lost so splendid a property—" And the friend describes, with awful profanity, the vengeance he would inflict.

And Mr. Ferguson? It is full compensation to him for the insults of the night that it has, at least, yielded him one of the most interesting pages for his collection. With more than the neatness, precision, blue ink, red ink, and black, with which he keeps his own hand and other accounts does he prepare the bulletin for posterity, date, events, results in full.

The second day after the fire Dr. Peel rides out to see Alonzo Wright. No man could make a handsomer apology for having accidentally lamed his friend's shoulder, which is badly hurt. "I was opposed to going on at first, you will remember, General Wright. I only wanted to frighten the old scamp. But I got excited by your eloquence; it would sweep away a stone. When I got hold of that axe I was in such a desperate hurry, too, to get at the fellow—"

"Let us say no more about it," interrupts Mr. Wright. "I am sorry for that man Ginnis, of course, but I am very glad the fire happened just as it did. When I am drunk I am a perfect fool, rather a devil incarnate. If any thing had happened to that brave old man I could never have forgiven myself. What an old Trojan he is! I will make a point to speak to him the next time I see him on the streets. It was the same way with Mr. Arthur. I made myself a perfect blockhead with him once—you may have heard of it—as the old gin. He will bear me witness I went in next day and apologized. I've told Anne here nobody ties the knot if she ever marries but that man, if only he was not an Abolitionist, or Union man, which is the same thing. True as steel he is, for all he is so quiet. But let us talk about Burnside, any thing. I made a fool of myself that night in Somerville, am ashamed of it, and have made Anne a half promise never to go to the place any more." This, with a good many strong expressions between, from Mr. Wright sober, a person bearing no resemblance to Mr. Wright drunk.

So Dr. Peel, taking another cup of the coffee—"the genuine article, Doctor; no rye, barley, okra, sweet-potatoes, or other trash in it"—of Miss Anne's making and another slice of Miss Anne's sponge-cake—only blondes like Anne can ever make real sponge-cakes; brunettes succeed in pound, preserves, and the like, not in sponge—Dr. Peel, we say, changes the topic to our bright prospect now of speedy success. At which point, Colonel Juggins having ridden over to trade certain oxen with Mr. Wright, Dr. Peel is left to be entertained by Miss Anne.

Petite Anne! A canary-bird is small, we know, never so small as when in contrast with an eagle. Very quiet is Anne; low-spoken, too. Blushes also coming and going on countless errands to and from heart and cheek. No one plays better on the piano—not concert music, you know, but exactly the kind for a parlor. Anne sings, too, as a canary-bird ever should, and very sweetly; not the operatic style either, yell, squall, inarticulate; you are not deafened by Anne, and can make out as distinctly every syllable she sings as if she spoke it. Dr. Peel standing behind her, turning over the leaves of her music as she plays, joining in with his splendid voice, stooping to say this and the other nothing in his lowest modulations.

"I had no idea it was so late!" she says, with an instant thrill at the impropriety of saying so with such simplicity, when, at last, Dr. Peel sees by his mazy gold watch that it is time for him to go. Mr. Wright, done with Colonel Juggins by this time, urges his guest to stay to tea. Dr. Peel would do so with great pleasure, he could ride in to town by moonlight, only he has "an appointment to keep."

"With some fair lady, I'll bet," says Mr. Wright, good-naturedly, as he shakes the Doctor's hand on parting.

"Wrong this time, General—not with a lady," replies Dr. Peel, Anne's little hand in his as he bids good-by.

No, not with a lady. As the Doctor nears the corner of a fence, about a mile from Somerville, he draws rein to speak with a particularly ill-visaged negro man, evidently waiting for him there. Protruding chin, with beard in little knots upon it here and there; retreating forehead; coarse wool tied up in pig-tails, sticking up in every direction from his head; squalid clothing; long, ape-like arms; big, flat feet—a savage. In all New Zealand none more so. Not a more thorough savage that hour in the Africa from which the man's great-grandfather came, save that here Jem is enveloped in an atmosphere of civilization, the chief ingredient gas of which for his breathing is—force. And Jem has lost his ancestral Fetich, the Christianity he has in exchange being too undefined for him at least to put in words if questioned. Not that there are not thoroughly pious negroes at the South; there are many thousands of them—a larger proportion of them pious, perhaps, than of the whites, only Jem was not one of them. Yet, sad to say, when Jem has any special villainy to engage in the negro in Somerville of all others whom he is sure to call upon to assist him therein is Orange, a preacher, a very Brother Barker for singing and praying among the blacks. Beyond this there is not, of course, the least parallel between the two preachers. Only, the remark may, with great deference to every body, be made, that, if Brother Barker's Scripture views of Slavery prompted him to his most violent courses, by a singular coincidence, it was the Rev. Orange's views, too, of Slavery from the Bible—read, doubtless, upside down—which prompted him to his most objectionable courses; his evil courses being, however, all underground. So very sly is Orange that it is hard to speak certainly; yet, if the fact was known, it is rather Orange who employs Jem in deeds of darkness than Jem who employs Orange. Just now both are in the hands of a greater than either.

"Splendidly done, Jem; you couldn't have done it better," says Dr. Peel to Jem standing before him. Great contrast between the broad-clothed, bejeweled, perfumed, highly-educated, perfectly-accomplished, and powerfully-influential Dr. Peel and the savage beside him! Civilization and Barbarism embodied and in strongest contrast? Apparently. Only there is not another white man in Somerville to whom Jem does not take off his hat when he speaks to him, but the relic of a head-covering remains untouched on Jem's head now, though no man can express in word and manner greater respect, even affection, for a companion.

"O'y Orange an' me," he says. "I told you boys before I don't think it is safe the money should be in your hands; you are sure to let it out," begins Dr. Peel, taking a canvas bag, apparently quite heavy, from his bosom.

"Me an' Orange think so too, on'y we is out of tobacco. A few dollars for our women-folks, too," pleads the savage as humbly as a child.

"Very well, certainly," says Dr. Peel, replacing the bag in his bosom, and giving the man a few coins of gold from his purse. "You may have that over and above, and welcome. The rest any day it is safe for you. You and Orange can't be too careful, remember, Jem. You know how to get it to me if you hear any thing. When I need you boys I'll let you know."

But what would have struck an over-dropper in all this interview most was the singular bearing of these two very different villains to each other. It can not be expressed in words, but it was very singular—very singular indeed.

A STRANGE STORY.

When the criminal, Pierre Granger, escorted by four gend'armes, was placed in the dock of the court of assize, there was a general stir among the crowd which had assembled from every quarter to be present at his trial.

Pierre Granger was not an ordinary culprit—not one of those poor wretches whom the court, as a matter of form, furnishes with an advocate, judges in the presence of a heedless auditory, and sends to oblivion in the convict prisons of the State. He had figured at Auzil in the columns of the newspapers; and while M. Laperrier had undertaken his defense, M. Louragat, the attorney-general, was to conduct the prosecution. Now, at the time of which I write, these two men stood at the head of their profession. Whenever it was known that they were to be pitted against each other in any cause, crowds immediately flocked to enjoy their eloquent sentences, sonorous periods, and phrases as round and as polished as so many billiard-balls. It was a perfect riot of tropes and figures, a delicious confusion of periphrases and metaphors. All the figures of rhetoric defied before the charmed auditory, and spouted, jested, and struggled with each other, like Virgil's playful shepherds. There was a luxury of epithets, passing even that of the Abbé Delille. Every individual substantive was as regularly followed by its attendant adjective, as the great lady of the last century by her train-bearing page. In this pompous diction a man became a metal, a horse a courser, the moon was styled pale Diana. My father and my mother were never called so, but invariably "the authors of my being;" a dream was a vision, a glass a crystal vase, a knife a sword, a car a chariot, and a beam became a whirlwind: all of which, no doubt, tended to produce a style of exceeding sublimity and beauty.

Pierre Granger was a clumsily-built fellow, five feet ten in height, thirty-eight years old, with fox hair, a high color, and small, cunning gray eyes. He was accused of having strangled his wife, cut up the body into pieces, and then, in order to conceal his crime, set fire to the house, wherein his three children perished. Such an accumulation of horrors had shed quite a romantic luster upon the perpetrator. Ladies of rank and fashion flocked to the jail to look at him; and his autograph was in wonderful request, as soon as it became known that Madame Célestine Langelot, the licentiate of the district, possessed some words of his writing in her album, placed between a ballad by a professor of rhetoric and a problem by the engineer-in-chief of the department; neither gentleman, to say the truth, being much flattered by such close juxtaposition with the interesting post-prisoner. When Pierre Granger, with his lowering brow and air of staid cunning, was placed in the dock, the names of twelve jurors were drawn by lot, and the president demanded of the counsel on either side whether they wished to exercise their right of challenge. Both declined offering any objection to twelve such honorable names; but the attorney-general added, that he would require the drawing of a supplementary juror. It was done, and on the paper appeared the name of Major Vermer. At the sound a slight murmur was heard among the spectators, while MM. Louragat and Laperrier exchanged a rapid glance, which seemed to say: "Will not you challenge him?" But neither of them did so; an offer conducted Major Vermer into his appointed place, and amidst profound silence the indictment was read. Major Vermer had lived in the town during the last two years. Every one gave him the military title, yet none could tell when, or where, or when he had served. He seemed to have neither family nor friends; and when any of his acquaintances ventured to sound him on the subject, he always replied in a manner by no means calculated to encourage curiosity. "Do I trouble my head about your affairs?" he would say. "Your staidly old town suits me well enough as a residence, but if you don't think I have a right to live in it, I shall be most happy to convince you of the fact at day-break to-morrow with gun, sword, or pistol." Major Vermer was precisely the very man to keep his word; the few persons who had entered his lodgings reported that his bedroom resembled an armory, so fully was it furnished with all sorts of murderous weapons. Notwithstanding this he seemed a very respectable sort of man, regular in his habits, punctual in his payments, and fond of smoking excellent cigars, sent him, he used to say, by a friend in Havana. He was tall, very thin, bald, and always dressed in black; his mustaches curled to a point; and he invariably wore his hat cocked over his right ear. In the evenings he used to frequent the public reading-rooms of the town, but he never played at any game, or conversed with the company, remaining absorbed in his newspaper until the clock struck ten, when he lit his cigar, twisted his mustaches, and with a stiff, silent bow took his departure. It sometimes happened that one of the company, bolder than the others, said, "Good-night, major!" Then the major would stop, fix his gray eye on the speaker, and reply, "Good-night, monsieur!" but in so rude and angry a tone that the words sounded more like a malediction than a polite salutation. It was remarked that whoever thus ventured to address the major, was, during the remainder of the evening, the victim of some strange ill-luck. He regularly lost at play, was sure to knock his elbow through a handsome lamp or vase, or in some way to get entangled in a misadventure. So firmly were the good townsfolk persuaded that the major possessed an evil eye that their common expression, when any one met with a misfortune, was: "He must have said 'good-night' to the major."

This mysterious character died every day at the ordinary of the Crown Hotel, and although habitually silent, seemed usually contented with the fare. One day, however, after having eaten some bread soup, he cast his eye along the table, frowned, and calling the host, said: "How comes it that the dinner to-day is entirely meagre?"

"Monsieur no doubt forgets that this is Good Friday."

"Send me up two mutton-chops."

"Impossible, major—there is not an ounce of meat to be had at any butcher's in the town."

"Let me have some fowl."

"That is not to be had either."

"What a set of fools!" exclaimed the major, striking his clenched hand on the table with such force that the bottles rumbled and rocked just as if all the wine in their bottles had got into their heads. Then he called the waiter, and said, "Baptiste, go to my lodging, and bring me the inland carabine which hangs over my pillow."

The poor host trembled, and grew very pale when Baptiste returned with a double-barreled gun, beautifully inlaid with silver. The major coolly examined the locks, put on fresh caps, cocked both barrels, and walked out, followed at a respectful distance by the guests and inmates of the hotel. Not far off stood an old ivy-mantled church, whose angular projections were haunted by many ravens. Two large ones flew out of a turret just as the major came up and took aim for a double shot. Down tumbled both the unclean birds at his feet.

"Sacré bleu!" said he, picking them up. "I'm regularly sold—they're quite lean."

He returned to the hotel, and, according to his express orders, one moiety of his ill-omened booty was dressed in a savory stew, and the other simply roasted. Of both dishes he partook so heartily that not a vestige of either remained, and he declared that he had never eaten more relishing food. From that day the major became an object of unobtrusive respect, of terror to others, of curiosity to all. Whenever he appeared on the public promenade every one avoided him; at the theatre his box was generally occupied by himself alone; and each old woman that met him in the street invariably stopped to cross herself. Major Vernor was never known to enter a church, or accept an invitation; at first he used to receive a good many of these, and the perfumed billies served him to light his cigars.

Such, then, was the thirteenth juror drawn in the case of Pierre Granger, and it may easily be understood why the audience were moved at hearing the name of Major Vernor. The paper of accusation, notwithstanding drawn up by the attorney-general with a force and particularity of description which terrified the ladies present, was read amidst profound silence broken only by the snoring of the prisoner, who had coolly settled himself to sleep. The gens d'armes tried to rouse him from his slumber, but they merely succeeded in making him now and then half open his dull, leaden eyes. When the clerk had ceased to read, Pierre Granger was with difficulty thoroughly awakened, and the president proceeded to question him. The interrogatory fully revealed, in all its horror, the thoroughly stupid foolishness of the wretch. He had killed his wife, he said, because they couldn't agree; he had set his house on fire because it was a cold night, and he wanted to make a good blaze to warm himself; as to his children, they were dirty, squalling little things—no loss to him or to any one else. It would be tedious to pursue all the details of this disgusting trial. M. Lorrain and M. Lévesque both made marvelously eloquent speeches, but the latter deserved peculiar credit, having so very bad a cause to sustain. Although he well knew that his client was as thorough a scoundrel as ever breathed, and that his condemnation would be a blessing to society, yet he pleaded his cause with all a lawyer's conscientiousness. When he got to the peroration he managed to squeeze from his eyes a few rare tears, the last and most precious, I imagine, which he carefully reserved for an especially solemn occasion—just as some families preserve a few bottles of fine old wine to be drunk at the marriage of a daughter or the coming of age of a son. At length the case closed, and the president was going to sum up; but as the heat in court was excessive, and every one present stood in need of refreshment, leave was given for the jury to retire for half an hour, and the hall was cleared for the same space of time, in order that it might undergo a thorough ventilation. During this interval, while twelve of the jurors were cooling themselves with ices and sherbet, the thirteenth lighted a cigar, and, reclining in an arm-chair, smoked away with the gravity of a Turk.

"What a capital cigar!" sighed one of the jurors, as he watched, with an envious eye, the odoriferous little clouds escaping from the smoker's lips.

"Would you like to try one?" asked the major, politely offering his cigar-case.

"If it would not trespass too much on your kindness."

"By no means. You are heartily welcome."

The juror took a cigar, and lighted it at that of his obliging neighbor. "Well, how do you like it?" asked the major.

"Delicious! It has an uncommonly pleasant aroma. From whence are you supplied?"

"From the Havana." Several jurors now approached, casting longing eyes at Major Vernor's cigar-case.

"Give women," said he, "I am really grieved that I have not a single cigar left to offer you, having just given the last to our worthy friend. To-morrow, however, I hope to have a fresh supply, and shall then ask you to do me the honor of accepting some."

At that moment an official came in to announce that the court had resumed its sitting; the jury hastened to their box, and the president began his charge. Scarcely had he commenced, however, when the juror who had smoked the cigar rose, and in a trembling voice begged permission to retire, as he felt very ill. Indeed, while in the act of speaking, he fell backward, and lay senseless on the floor. The president, of course, directed that he should be carefully conveyed to his home, and desired Major Vernor to take his place. Six strokes sounded from the old clock of the town-hall as the jury retired to deliberate on their verdict in the case of Pierre Granger. Eleven gentlemen exclaimed with one voice that the wretched assassin's guilt was perfectly clear, and that they could not hesitate for a moment as to their decision. Major Vernor, however, stood up, placed his back against the door, and regarding his colleagues with a peculiarly sinister expression, said, slowly—

"I shall acquit Pierre Granger, and you shall all do the same!"

"Sir," replied the foreman, in a severe tone, "you are answerable to your conscience for your own actions, but I do not see what right you have to offer us a gratuitous insult."

"Am I then so unfortunate as to offend you?" asked the major, meekly.

"Certainly, in supposing us capable of breaking the solemn oath which we have taken to do impartial justice. I am a man of honor."

"Bah!" interrupted the major; "are you quite sure of that?"

A general murmur of indignation arose.

"Do you know, Sir, that such a question is a fresh insult?"

"You are quite mistaken," said Major Vernor. "What I said was drawn forth by a feeling of the solemn responsibility which rests with us. Before I can resolve to make a dead body of a living, moribund being, I must feel satisfied that both you and I are less guilty than Pierre Granger, which, after all, is not so certain."

An ominous silence ensued. The major's words seemed to strike home to every breast, and at length one of the jurors said, "You seem, Sir, to regard the question from a philosophical point of view."

"Just so, Monsieur Cernosa."

"You know me, then?" said the juror, in a trembling voice.

"Not very intimately, my dear Sir, but just sufficiently to appreciate your fondness for discounting bills at what your enemies might call usurious interest. I think it was about four years ago that an honest poor man, the father of a large family, blew out his brains, in despair, at being refused by you a short renewal, which he had implored on his knees."

Without replying M. Cernosa retired to the furthest corner of the room and wiped off the large drops of sweat which started from his brow.

"What does this mean?" inquired another juror, impatiently. "Have we come hither to act a scene from the 'Memoirs of the Devil'?"

"I don't know that work," replied the major; "but may I advise you, Monsieur de Bardine, to calm your nerves?"

"Sir, you are impertinent, and I shall certainly do myself the pleasure to chastise you."

"As how?"

"With my sword. I shall do you the honor to meet you to-morrow."

"An honor which, being a man of sense, I must beg to decline. You don't kill your adversaries, Monsieur de Bardine; you murder them. Have you forgotten your duel with Monsieur de Lillar, which took place, I am told, without witnesses? While he was off his guard you treacherously struck him through the heart. The prospect of a similar catastrophe is certainly by no means enticing."

With an indistinct movement M. de Bardine's neighbors drew off.

"I admire such virtuous indignation," sneered the major. "It especially becomes you, Monsieur Dario."

"What infamy are you going to cast in my teeth?" exclaimed the gentleman addressed.

"Oh, very little—a mere trifle—simply, that while Monsieur de Bardine kills his friends you only dishonor yours. Monsieur Simon, whose house, table, and purse are yours, has a pretty wife."

"Major," cried another juror, "you're a villain!"

"Pardon me, my dear Monsieur Calfan, let us call things by their proper names. The only villain among us, I believe, is the man who himself set fire to his house six months after having insured it at treble its value in four offices, whose directors were foolish enough to pay the money without making sufficient inquiry."

A stifled groan escaped from M. Calfan's lips as he covered his face with his hands.

"Who are you that you thus dare to constitute yourself our judge?" asked another, looking fiercely at Vernor.

"Who am I, Monsieur Peron? Simply one who can appreciate your very rare dexterity in holding court-cards in your hand, and making the dice turn up as you please."

M. Peron gave an involuntary start, and thenceforward held his peace. The scene, aided by the darkness of approaching night, had now assumed a terrible aspect. The voice of the major rang in the ears of eleven pale, trembling men, with a cold metallic distinctness, as if each word inflicted a blow.

At length Vernor burst into a strange, sharp, hissing laugh. "Well, my honorable colleagues," he exclaimed, "does this poor Pierre Granger still appear to you unworthy of the slightest pity? I grant you he has committed a fault, and a fault which you would not have committed in his place. He has not had your cleverness in masking his turpitude with a show of virtue—that was his real crime. Now if, after having killed his wife, he had paid handsomely for masses to be said for her repose—if he had purchased a burial-ground, and caused to be raised to her memory a beautiful square white marble monument, with a flowery epitaph on it in gold letters—why, then we should all have shed tears of sympathy, and eulogized Pierre Granger as the model of a tender husband. Don't you agree with me, Monsieur Norbec?"

M. Norbec started as if he had received an electric shock. "It is false!" he murmured. "I did not poison Eliza; she died of pulmonary consumption."

"True," said the major; "you remind me of a circumstance which I had nearly forgotten. Madame Norbec, who possessed a large fortune in her own right, died without issue five months after she had made you her sole legatee."

Then the major was silent. They were now in total darkness. Suddenly came the sharp click of a pistol, and the obscurity was for a moment brightened by a flash, but there was no report—the weapon had missed fire. The major burst into a long and loud fit of laughter. "Charming! delightful! Ah, my dear Sir," he exclaimed, addressing the foreman, "you were the only honest man of the party; and see how, to oblige me, you have made an attempt on my person which places you on an honorable level with Pierre Granger!" Then, having rung the bell, he called for candles, and when they were brought, he said, "Come, gentlemen, I suppose you don't want to sleep here; let us make haste and finish our business."

Ten minutes afterward the foreman handed in the issue paper—a verdict of Not Guilty—and Pierre Granger was discharged amidst the hisses and execrations of the crowd, who indeed were prevented only by a strong military force from assaulting both judge and jury. Major Vernor coolly walked up to the dock, and passing his arm under that of Pierre Granger, went out with him through a side-door.

From that hour neither the one nor the other was ever seen again in the country. That night there was a terrific thunder-storm; the ripe harvest was beaten down by hailstones as large as pigeon's eggs, and a flash of lightning striking the steeple of the old ivy-covered church tore down its gilded cross.

This strange story was related to me one day last year by a convict in the infirmary of the prison at Toulon. I have given it verbatim from his lips; and as I was leaving the building the sergeant who accompanied me said, "So, Sir, you have been listening to the wonderful rhodomontades of Number 15,788?"

"What do you mean? This history—"

"Is false from beginning to end. Number 15,788 is an atrocious criminal, who was sent to the galleys for life, and who during the last few months has given evident proofs of mental aberration. His monomania consists chiefly in telling stories to prove that all judges and jurors are rogues and villains. He was himself found guilty, by a most respectable and upright jury, of having robbed and tried to murder Major Vernor. He is now about to be placed in a lunatic asylum, so that you will probably be the last visitor who will hear his curious inventions."

"And who is Major Vernor?"

"A brave old half-pay officer, who has lived at Toulon beloved and respected during the last twelve years. You will probably see him to-day, smoking his Havana cigar, after the table-d'hôte dinner at the Crown Hotel."

"HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP."

"Pshaw!" exclaimed Mr. Brown, contemptuously, as he snarled over the leaves of a fashionable magazine. "I can't find a decent story here. Now, what are all these?" Mrs. Brown came and sat down on the arm of the easy-chair in which her legs had been reclining. "Those? Why, those are croquet patterns."

"And that," indicating with his finger a singular-shaped figure, "is that a croquet pattern?"

"No, my dear innocent man," returned Mrs. Brown, "that is a pin-cushion—and there," turning over a leaf, "is another pattern, such a beauty; so be made in dark blue velvet and pearls! I am going to get materials to-morrow and commence one for the little table in our spare-room."

"Ah!" responded the gentleman, reflectively. "Do you happen to remember, my dear, how many pin-cushions you have made for the spare-room since we were married?"

"Well, you know that pretty white satin one baby spotted, playing with it—"

"Curious plaything," murmured Mr. B.

"—And somebody spilled some hair oil on the pink silk one; and I began a cushion out of black velvet, but I never finished it; and then that beautiful crimson—"

"Where are you going, Mr. Brown?"

"Only to my writing-desk," replied that gentleman, who was already half across the room.

"Dear me, how absurd!" ejaculated the lady, taking up for continued examination the magazine which her husband had tossed upon the table. Pretty soon, however, tired of the alliance, she stole softly along to the writing-desk, and peeping over Mr. Brown's shoulder, said, "May I see what you are writing?"

"Oh yes, my dear! It is especially for you. Or stay, I will read it to you." And placing her on a very comfortable seat, he commenced as follows:

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF THE PIN-CUSHION.

Although for centuries the pin-cushion has been a common article of human habitation, and has thriven and been most prolific in the very centres of civilization, its physiology and habits have been but little noticed by naturalists. Even the place to be assigned to it in the order of animated nature has been disputed.

Linnæus classed it with the hedge-hog, porcupine, and kindred animals; with which it has no noticable affinity—that of shooting loose spines on the approach of men; but in other respects it is very dissimilar. Buffon, observing that it frequented human habitations, and these chambers and dwellings for its abode, was led to consider it an insect, and to class it with the spider and centipede.

Cuvier, however, who was the first to dissect the structure, and observe accurately its anatomical structure and relations, corrected these errors and rightly assigned to the pin-cushion a place in the order Invertebrata, in company with the aracha, the sponge, and the (baby's) coral.

The pin-cushion is a creature of which it may be said with justice, that you do not see all its good points at the first glance. Individuals of the species differ widely in size, and even somewhat in form. All, however, so far as observed, have a soft, homogeneous body, destitute of skeleton, and covered with a firm, tough skin, in which are set, more or less thickly, a great number of spines, which serve, probably, as its principal means of locomotion with the world, as it has no limbs nor organs of locomotion. It has eyes however. If a few needles are thrust into its back the eyes may be seen distinctly.

The pin-cushion is very domestic, seeking the society of man, though it decidedly prefers that of women. It loves to lie on mantle-pieces, on dressing-tables, or wash-stands, or to make its nest in bureau-drawers. The smaller varieties will burrow cunningly in a gentleman's pocket. It is less timid than the rat or mouse, seldom sneering from a stranger even, unless actually touched. It thrives best in the temperate regions, and prefers climates and large towns. It has been found in the tropics, but neither Perry nor Kane make any mention of having found it in the frozen North. It is most prolific, and attains the greatest size in hotels, barbers' shops, fancy shops, and similar places. Though seldom toward sea, it is not gregarious. It is rare to find two or three little creatures together.

The pin-cushion frequently enjoys long life. The simplicity of its internal structure preserves it from many of the ailments to which the softer animals are subject. It is most liable to perish through severe abrasions or divisions of the external skin, to which it is exceedingly exposed. When these occur immediate aid should be afforded, as nature appears to possess no restorative power. If means of proper appliances the wounded pin-cushion may be recovered; and care being taken, it will usually pass a long, contented life, peering at last through simple old age alone.

"Dear me! Mr. Brown," exclaimed the lady as that gentleman came to a pause, "what an amount of nonsense you can write about nothing!"

"Nothing! Why, I am sure I thought I had been writing about the pin-cushion. But if you looked upon calling it nothing I have no objection. Only I am hungry—I am sure that was the tea-bell that rung before I had read my second period in the pin-cushion."

And they went down to tea.

If Mr. Brown's brain had been less prolific we should have had room to give our little readers some descriptions of "new styles" for "pin-cushions." As it is we can only say that they are scarcely fit of fending a porcupine head, and "New styles for a pin-cushion" if they open any popular periodical for notice.

It is certainly to be hoped that the following statement, made by an exchange, is a mistake:

"Within a month after the opening of the New York Institute Asylum over fifteen hundred applications were made by wealthy parents for the admission of their daughters, who had contracted habits of intemperance from the use of wine and liquors at fashionable parties."

May-day in New York develops character. 5th Avenue and Madison are brought to light as well as generally and softness. Some people have a way of taking a petty revenge on the house they are leaving; or else it is merely a chronic mania, by carrying away with them pieces of it.

On the second day of May a gentleman of this city went to call on a friend who had been boarding in Twenty-third Street. On reaching the house he was puzzled by not being able to find the bell-handle. Considering he was mistaken in the house, he looked for the door-plate—it was gone. That was not strange; but on searching for the number of the house that also had been removed. A further investigation for some signs of progress showed that the door-plate was missing. A slight peep opened the door, revealing that the lock, and all pertaining to it, was wanting. Convinced by the surroundings of the identity of the house the gentleman stepped into the vestibule; and seeing through the curtainless glass of the inner door a small boy, he resorted to the successful expedient of tapping on the glass. It was a somewhat doubtful relief to learn that his friend was not an occupant of this location, but his house, since the probability seemed strong that the notorious, outgoing tenant had carried off his boarder's jaw.

How many full-grown Americans know how to eat properly? The lawyer who stuck up on his office-door, "Gone to dinner; back in ten minutes," might as well have added, "I am killing myself by holding my food, and then trying to digest it over my papers; at five-fifty I shall probably be either a broken-down invalid or a hearse, but, in the mean time, I am very much at your service." There is also a ghostly humor about the other story of the host in a New England city who asked his guest, at a Sunday dinner, if he would mind eating his pie in the street as they walked along.

The ever-strict rigorists of etiquette often suffer severely in consequence of bad days. But even the most particular of our times would scarcely make such a sacrifice of good taste as that recorded in the incident we give below:

In England, during the French Revolution, the Duke of Bedford invited the emigrant Duc de Grammont to a splendid dinner, one of those magnificent entertainments in which English noblemen prize themselves on giving to crowded heads, and their good feeling prompts them to do it to excess. During dessert a bottle of Champagne was produced, which for age and flavor was supposed to be unexcelled. It was liquid gold in a crystal flagon, a ray of the sun descending into a goblet; it was nectar which was worthy of Jove, and in which Bacchus would have revolved. The noble head of the house of Russell himself helped his guest to a glass of this choice wine, and the Grammonts in lauding it declared it to be excellent. The Duke of Bedford, anxious to judge of its quality, poured out a glass, which so soon approached his lips that with a heroic conviction he exclaimed: "Why, what on earth is this?" The better approached, took the bottle and applied it to his nostrils, and to the dismay of his master pronounced it to be counterfeit! The Duc de Grammont had swallowed this horrid draught without noticing.

As to fastidious Bonnets, it is said, are not worn at all! A handful of lilies or violets, fastened with a ribbon, and placed conspicuously on the top of the head, being mostly concealed by the hair, is used as a substitute. No bonnets amount to nothing!

Some other things are worn, however—dresses, for example—and very handsome ones too.

The popular material for the present season is called crepe, and is one of the prettiest fabrics ever manufactured. It is a sort of strong Ulster crepe, with all its lustre and brilliancy of silk upon it; and, added to this, it has an admirable quality—it is soft to the touch. Each-gay crepe dresses, trimmed with pale-blue silk, are very popular. The silk is cut on the cross and made into beads, and these beads are worked over with crystal beads. This trimming is varied either with gimpure, lined with colored ribbon or with narrow fringe, arranged in rows to simulate pearls. Pink and blue crepe dresses are particularly pretty for evening wear.

White and scarlet will be the Fashionable summer colors, and therefore likely to be also adopted here. Many white fustian bodices are trimmed with these colors. A very pretty one has, first, scarlet ribbon full and black lace round the throat, and another covered down as a collar round the neck. Scarlet buttons bordered with they lace are arranged down the front, and the cuffs match the neck.

Garibaldi in white muslin are trimmed with a new material in cotton that washes with them, and looks at night like black ribbon and Gray lace. Some of these bodices in fine muslin, lawn, and embroidery, are cut open across at the throat. Others cross like a jacket, and are composed of narrow bands and lace.

Colored hand embroidery on shawls is a new feature in the fashion introduced for the coming spring and summer. The materials upon which the work is executed are China crepe, French crepe, fine cashmere, etc., and upon black or white grounds. Flowers and leaves are introduced in the natural colors, sometimes in garlands centered round the shawl as a border, and sometimes in strips. Lace patterns in black and white, and executed with a Russian stitch, are also used, sometimes alone, and at others mixed with the colored flowers. Rich soft silk shawls, known as, are generally added to these shawls, but sometimes the border is of lace, black or white, or a mixture of both.

Black and white granadine shawls, embroidered in scarlet, deserve notice as novel. Plain shawls also, in these thin materials and fringed, and also plain neck shawls in lace, in all colors, delicate light-blue and rich rose shades, will be worn.

U. S. S. Vanderbilt,
U. S. S. Monadnock.

Spanish Flagship Nassau.

Resolution,
Villa De Madrid

Vencador.

Blanca.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF VALPARAISO, CHILI, BY THE SPANISH FLEET UNDER ADMIRAL PAZ.

NUNEZ, MARCH 31, 1866.—SKETCHED BY AN ATTACHE OF THE CHILEAN EMBASSY.—[SEE PAGE 309.]

IT COULD

me—Yes or No. Let it be, if you like, that I want you to take care of me. I am much older than you are, you know."

"I don't know what possessed me. I said 'No.' Oh! how I would have liked to recall the word, but it was spoken, and he rose with a clouded and disappointed face. He lingered a little, and asked to know why it was No and not Yes? I said we could not be happy together. He bowed gravely and left me. I suppose he was hurt, for he did not add a word. No assurance of friendship, of good-will, no hope that I would relent or change my mind, passed his lips. The door closed upon him. I heard the garden gate fall to, and I felt in a sort of stupor. It was over. What madness had made me taunt him? Every step took him away farther from me—never—never again should we meet. Perhaps he would not have left me then, if I could have spoken the truth. Ah! if I could have said to him, 'I can not be happy with you because I love, and you do not; because my love and my pride would suffer all day long if I were your wife; because it is easier to do without you than to have you on these terms.' If I could have said all this, would our meeting have ended thus? It was too late to think of that now, but it was not too late to suffer. I buried my face in the pillow of the couch on which I was sitting, and cried and sobbed as if my heart would break.

Poor Carlo's cold nose thrust in the hand which hung down by my side in the folds of my dress roused me. I looked up and saw Mr. Thompson. He was very red, and seemed furious.

"I have forgotten my umbrella," he said, a little nervously.

Yes; there it was, in the corner, that horrible umbrella of his! But instead of going to look for it he suddenly came and sat down on the couch by me. I do not know how I looked, but I felt ready to die with shame. He took my hand and kissed it.

"My dear Miss Raymond," he said, persuasively, "why should we not be happy together? I can not bear to give you up, indeed I can not."

I looked at him in doubt.

"Then do you really like me?" I asked.

"Do I really like you? Why, what else have I been saying all along?"

"You said you wanted to take care of me."

"Oh, if we are to go back to that—" he began, resignedly. But we did not go back to that; we went back to nothing, for a miserable girl suddenly became the happiest of women. Still I was not quite satisfied.

"You would not have come back if it had not been for that horrible umbrella of yours," I said, with a little jealousy.

"Very true," he replied, with his peculiar smile; "but I did come back, and I glanced in through the window first, and saw you hiding your face on that cushion, and Carlo looking at you as if he thought it strange you should be so furious; and so I came in for my umbrella; and, to tell you the truth, I had forgotten it on purpose."

Perhaps he only said it to please me; but as I looked in his face I did not think so then; and, though years have passed over us both, I do not think so now.

SEED-SOWING.

Mr. LITTLEBERRY perceived in Amelia—a dawning lady of sixteen—a growing interest when questions of love and matrimony were under discussion. Mr. Littleberry had loved and lost. Not loved and lost in the beautiful way that leaves a sweet and tender pain behind, but loved and lost in a bitterly practical and unlovely way. I should put it plain if I said that, life being viewed as a vast gambling-table and matrimony a lottery, he had staked his love—and lost, not won. He had suffered, in a word, profoundly; and his experience he knew to be worth more than untold gold, if its lessons would but be received by the young and forward-looking. Little Amelia was one such. Mr. Littleberry was thrown frequently into her society, and, wishing to sow good seed in her heart, he had striven to win her esteem by listening with every indication of interest to her callow prattle about beaux and that sort of thing. So he found his opportunity to speak words of warning and wisdom to Amelia.

One day, discovering that she listened to him with high apparent interest, he suffered himself to talk at such length as this:

"You think you love, do you, Amelia? Perhaps you do. I can't tell. But let me whisper this secret to you: girls of your age do not often love profoundly, nor judge wisely concerning their own hearts. How should a little lass whose mind is immature—wholly in the formation state still—be able to tell the difference between a girlish fancy, which time will wear away, and that true love which sinks deep into the soul, and knows no change nor death till the grave covers the heart in which it dwells? It would not be fair to expect that of her. Love is a thing that can not die. It is nonsense for any one to say that a person, having once loved, ceases to love, that love changes, that it cools or deadens, that the lover becomes tired of his sweet-heart. Impossible! To love once is to love forever."

"This kind of love, Amelia, does not often take up its dwelling-place in the heart of a girl of sixteen or a boy of eighteen. Not but that it may, and can, but that it hardly ever does. When it does there is something rarely exceptional about it. If I were to say what I thought was the truest age at which the impulses of the heart may be relied on as a safe index, I should place it somewhere beyond the age of twenty-five, for either sex. For men, perhaps later. Men's minds usually do not mature in the direction of the emotions so early as women's do. When a man or woman seriously 'falls in love' (as folks say) at the age of twenty-six or seven, or upward, it is pretty sure to be a true passion, which can not be destroyed. If it is a false one it will pass away speedily. But to really love at that age, and to marry, is to be happy."

Feeling himself getting into deep waters, Mr. Littleberry paused.

"Are people always happy who marry when they are twenty-six or seven?" asked Amelia, with charming simplicity.

"There!" said Mr. Littleberry, "I wanted just such a question, Amelia, to help me out. No; don't let any such absurdity as that get before your eyes, and blind them to the truth. We are talking—"

Mr. Littleberry perhaps forgot that he was himself doing all the talking.

"We are talking, you must bear in mind, about love. Now the world is full of people who don't marry for love, and don't pretend to. They marry for wealth, or for convenience, or for pride; some marry for hate. That these marriages are unhappy is to be expected, and is no more than fair. But when people marry, as they suppose, for love, they certainly ought to be happy. Now here's the thing in a nutshell. If it is true love they will be happy—they must be (and I positively assert that a true and noble love can never die). At eighteen they are incapable of judging in this matter; at any twenty-six or seven they are capable, if they ever are. So if a girl of sixteen thinks she loves, there is no certainty that she does love—she is terribly liable to be mistaken about it. But if a woman of twenty-five thinks she loves, it is pretty certain to be so. I have known fifty cases of marriages for love (so supposed) at eighteen, and they all proved ill-assorted and miserable unions. Now the sum and result of this sermon, Amelia," Mr. Littleberry smiled, "is this—that marriages contracted between children are woefully in danger of proving unhappy. You are young; the opposite sex is peculiarly attractive to you; your heart feels the longing to love, and reaching out its tendrils, as the poets say, for an object to cling to, is quite as likely to cling to the wrong object as to the right one. When you stop to think that among every hundred young men you see it is hardly possible the one exists in whom your heart will find that perfect, restful love that will bear you through life, isn't there a grave danger that you, in your determination to love somebody, will love—or seem to love—the wrong one? Now fancy for an instant that you are married to one of these youths at the age of seventeen; a few years—may, a few months—may show you that your love does not satisfy; in time it dies; you may find some 'excesses of sorrow' in the new and different love you give to your children; but you feel that this is not true love which you bear your husband. This is mournful, but, alas, how many go through life so! Pray God they may know nothing worse than the mere 'dreadfulness of emptiness' herein! But suppose the worst happens—suppose, when ten years are gone by, and you are twenty-seven, you chance to meet the man you should have married—what then? Ah, that is the terrible thing! But what help is there for you now? It is too late!—too late! You are bound about by other ties, which must not and can not be broken! You look back on your past life, and see wherein you erred, and that you must bear the consequences of your error through life. You can do nothing—nothing except to pray Heaven to help you carry your weary load."

Mr. Littleberry bowed his head on his hand, thinking I know not what thoughts. Amelia, supposing from his silence that he was done, stole out of the room. He heard the door close behind her, and raised his head but not in time to add the further word he would have said: bidding the young girl beware of becoming bewitched by the mere senses, and of taking the step which she might some day find was beyond all setting right.

However, he believed he had sown good seed; and he lighted a cigar and went to his office.

II.

I MARK A LOVE-SCENE to describe. Gather round me, young ladies. It is bona fide.

Scene, a pretty parlor. Time, evening. Window-curtains down. Lamps lit.

A young man of perhaps twenty-one was kneeling at the feet of a beautiful girl with warm brown eyes and flowing curls.

That a young man of respectable parentage should kneel on the floor at the feet of a young lady of equally respectable parentage, in the heart of a civilized community, in the State of New York and in the year 1862, is an absurdity, I freely admit. But in that absurd position did Charley Christie find himself on the evening in question, and Kate M'Call looked down upon him not unkindly while he so continued.

"Kate," said the young man, "won't you say yes? You must say yes! I will not get off my knees till those lips have pronounced the simple word that bids me hope."

"Oh, Charley, how can I?" said little Kate, seventeen to a day, and very impressive. "What would father and mother say?"

"They would relent, Kate. I'm sure they would. Your father likes me. Do say yes!"

Poor Kate was in a quandary. It was a trying position for a girl of her generous nature, to sit there and witness such a handsome fellow as Charley Christie, with such sweet whiskers, kneeling at her feet with his earnest, up-looking eyes, and begging her to "say yes."

All that "yes" meant, being said, was that she would marry Charley the next day, privately.

"Oh dear, I am afraid, Charley!"

"You love me, Kate?"

"Yes; that is, I think I do. But I should be so afraid, when I go home to Penville again, and had to tell father and mother what I had been doing. I—I think I had better not."

"You refuse me, Kate?" said the young man, in deep distress.

"No—not exactly. But you—you must let me have time to think of it a little."

"You're not going to tell any one?"

"Oh no. I wouldn't dare."

"Then when will you give me an answer?"

"Why, you are so sudden, Charley. Give me till day after to-morrow."

"So long as that, Kate!"

"That is not so very long. I will give you an answer day after to-morrow."

Having said so much, Kate felt a great relief, and this helped her in sticking to her point.

So Charley got off his knees without having heard her "say yes," thus violating his own terms.

Kate was at this time visiting her grandparents in this city. Young Christie, as an old acquaintance in Penville, had been permitted to escort her about to places of amusement, and a week of uninterrupted evenings in her company had brought the youth to his present pass.

The next day Kate went to a tea-party given at Amelia Mansfield's, and there she met that queer old fellow, Mr. Littleberry—a man past thirty-five, but such pleasant company!

Mr. Littleberry was pleased with Kate's ingenuous face and soft eyes, and talked with her a good deal. What seed he undertook to sow in that quarter, if any, I never asked him; nor whether he had any opportunities that he ought not to have neglected. I trust he had.

While he sat talking with Kate in the parlor after tea he was suddenly hailed across the room by Mrs. Gosney, a pretty widow of twenty-five, with the exclamation:

"Mr. Littleberry, what is this hurry? Amelia says you told her the other day that no one could really love till they were twenty-six or seven years old."

"Me?" said Mr. Littleberry, blushing deeply at finding his private seed-sowing thus being converted into a spectacle for a roomful of ladies. "Why, no; I did not say so—that would be an absurdity."

"Why yes you did, Mr. Littleberry!" cried Amelia, turning on him with a look of much astonishment. But Mr. Littleberry shook his head. Alas, he would have been glad to hold his tongue, but they would not let him.

"Then what did you say?" asked Amelia, a little piqued.

"Yes, what did you say, Mr. Littleberry?" put in Mrs. Gosney.

"I said—I—I—that is—"

Guiltily man! Why did he stammer so?—and think so? He asked himself why, and got no answer from himself.

I can tell him why: It is one thing to sit in a rocking-chair twiddling your watch-key, and calmly and deliberately sowing sentiments which you design for the private and especial behoof of a single young lady auditor in whom you feel a kindly interest; and it is another thing to have a chorus of female voices plump at you a witness-box sort of a cross-question of, What did you say? Say it again, Sir. Repeat your words, Sir. Let us know what all this means.

"Amelia," said Mr. Littleberry, gravely, endeavoring to recover his calmness, "do you soberly say that I said to you that no one could love till they were twenty-six or seven years old? Is that what I said?"

"Yes," said Amelia, who innocently believed herself to be stating the gist of Mr. Littleberry's whole argument; "I know you said so, Mr. Littleberry, for I heard you, and I don't forget so easily."

"It is impossible I should have uttered such an absurdity, child," said Mr. Littleberry, a little warmly—stumbling since that he was; "why not say twenty-five and three months? A statement of that kind is absurd."

Amelia was confounded, but obstinate. Mr. Littleberry grew more cool.

"I will try and tell you what I did say, ladies," said he, finally. "I advanced, in general terms, the principle that love, as between the sexes, was a sentiment that could not well exist in an immature breast. A girl of eighteen or a young man of twenty is not likely to be capable of judging wisely concerning a passion that has an apparently strong hold upon his or her heart; and although it may be a true love, the probabilities are a hundred to one that it is set the love which will endure forever, and bless the life of the pair. I said, that at twenty-five or upward, one is not likely to be mistaken in the matter, while at the younger age one is very likely to be so. Marriages contracted at so early an age prove almost always unhappy. Such marriages are often performed in a gust of passion—are often born of the moment—and two foolish children may bind themselves in a weak, blind hour, and incur that hour all the rest of their lives. I deem it the most dreadful danger to which our young people are exposed, the facility with which private marriages are performed in this State. The clergyman who will thus marry two big babies ought to be thrashed; but there are in this city plenty of clergymen who will do it."

Mr. Littleberry, having thus strayed a little aside from his proper theme, suddenly makes a faint effort to return to it, and failed wretchedly.

"As a general principle, the child that walks into a pond will be drowned; and as a general principle, the children under twenty who venture the untied waters of matrimony will be sorry they had not washed till old enough to swim."

Here Mr. Littleberry stopped in a miserable state of dissatisfaction with himself.

And as he went to his room that night he muttered to himself,

"I am almost resolved to register an oath, like the man in the fable, that I will never undertake to do a fellow-creature a service again. The idea of that hasty little Amelia getting so much good out of my sermon the other day! I am tempted to declare this seed-sowing a humbug."

Don't, Littleberry, my friend. That would be rash and false.

Let me whisper to you that brown-eyed Kate M'Call took into her heart the seeds you dropped while in the parlor, as a flower drinks the dew it needed that very hour. She left the house that night wiser and stronger than when she entered it—all through you.

Charley Christie, if he had waited on his knees for Kate's "Yes," would have stood in that position till this day. For Kate said "No."

Inside of six months Charley Christie found another flame, and Kate M'Call was as nothing to him. She is still at home in Penville—still under twenty-five—still beautiful, and growing more lovable every year. Who marries her for love his heart will be made glad.

"And some fell upon a rock; and as soon as it was sprung up it withered away, because it lacked moisture."

"And some fell among thorns; and the thorns sprung up with it and choked it."

"And other fell on good ground."

There is always good ground somewhere. Let us not weary, Littleberry.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A GRATEFUL ACCORER or IT.—A man asked the cause of his father's death, answered that "while he was addressing a large outdoor assembly of people, who were listening to his remarks with the deepest interest, a position of the platform on which he was standing gave way beneath him, whereby he was precipitated several feet with such violence as to break his neck." His father was awed.

Who were the original hog-towners?—The President.

CURE FOR A COLD (A. N. 1420).

Put your face in hot water, As high as your thighs; Wrappe your head up in flannel, As low as your eyes; Take a quart of warm'd gruel, When in bed, as a dress; With a number four dippe Will follow your nose.

A man, seeing an undertaker carrying a very small coffin, exclaimed, in the utmost surprise, "Is it possible that this coffin can be intended for any living creature?"

A LAY FOR MAY.

"May I come?" said the month. "Oh, say!" "May you come?" we replied. "You say, For you come postively, Deftly, and sprightly;

Not roughly, Or gruffly; Not asserting your right, Nor using your might; Not with raging and riot, But with mildness and quiet;

Not with a snarl, and a snarl, and a will, But pleasantly, orderly, manly, and still, Having permission with 'May' So, May, you may come and stay."

Why is England the richest country in the world?—Because it has a Dead pore on its coast (then say other coast?)

A reporter, in describing a meeting of a local abstinence society, said that "they had a most harmonious and profitable session, and retired from the hall full of the best of spirits."

Why is the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland beneficial to the Fuzians?—Because it quickens their apprehension.

What kind of money is every where legally tender?—Hard-money.

"If a family quite fill their carriage why are they not to be dressed? Do you give up, Sarah?" "Well, mamma, I 'peck it is better dry's got to be full (dressed). Yab! yab!"

It is only a curious grammarian who would inquire too strictly concerning your relatives and ancestors.

What man is keener than a razor?—A sharper.

WARNING TO NARCISSES.—Meddling with other women brings us into scrapes, and thereby one of the elders of a certain church made "bad, worse." A young fellow entered the church and took his seat, keeping his hat on. The elder, seeing it, requested him to take it off. His request not being complied with, he spoke to the young man a second time, and seeing he still hesitated, the elder gently lifted the hat off, when, to his chagrin, he called a quart of hickory nuts, making more noise than was consistent with decorum. "Meh," quietly said the youth, "see what you have done!"

CHANGE OF NAME.—In consequence of the successful counting displayed by the Head Centre in stating the police, we believe that the title of a well-known spot in Dublin is to be changed; instead of "Stephen's Green," it is henceforth to be known as "Stephen's any thing but green."

DEEP AND BROTHERS.—Those who live on sponge cake must often eat luncheon pie.

Why are the arrows of Cupid like a man in an agon?—Because they are all in a gutter.

A peddler reading in a paper that a distinguished opera singer had "a voice of two registers," expressed his opinion that she ought to sing with great warms.

Most everybody can write your name, says Josh Billings, but there ain't but few that can write good names— and it 's more takes an educated man now appreciate it after it is writ.

"New children," asked a school inspector, "who loves all men?" A little girl, not four years old, and evidently not well up in the Catechism, answered quickly: "All women!"

A German surgeon in Paris was recently bereaved of his wife by death. His friends assembled to console with him, and found him engaged in dissecting her body!

The ancient Scandinavians called their poets Scalds; the modern Scotch poet is known as poetic fire in all ages.

A CAUTION TO TAIL-GATHERERS AND OUTRIGGERS.—If a man is to do as he is done by, he may well be excused for scolding when he is tailed.

Ladies look most "killing" when they are ready for fighting.

A WORTHLESS BOON.—A neighbor.

APPROPRIATE THANK.—Every thing is about as dear as it can be.

Why, if you paint a man's portrait, may you be described as stepping into his shoes?—Because you make his feet yours (paternal).

"It is not meet only that it be extremely dear," said a careful housewife; "but I can not obtain four for nothing for less than double the usual price, and they do not make eggs half so large as they used to be!"

Do you want to know the man nearest whom you have the most reason to guard yourself? Your looking-glass will give you a very fair likeness of his face.

"Raising Cain"—The plasters down South.

WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE, M.P.

GLADSTONE.

UPON the death of Lord PALMERSTON it became evident that the duties of leader in the English House of Commons must devolve upon Mr. GLADSTONE, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Many misgivings were felt as to his fitness for so responsible a position. There was no question, of course, there could be none, as to his ability; but it was doubted whether he possessed the necessary discretion, tact, and command of temper—qualities which had been so characteristic of his predecessor. Mr. GLADSTONE has thus far been fully equal to the occasion, and for judgment and prudence, as well as for pre-eminent ability, he stands to-day the first of English statesmen.

The Right Honorable WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE, the fourth son of the late Sir JOHN GLAD-

STONE, Bart., was born at Liverpool, December 29, 1809. He graduated at Oxford in 1831. Shortly after his election as member of Parliament for Newark, in 1832, Sir ROBERT PEEL appointed him to a junior Lordship of the Treasury, and two months later to the post of Under-Secretary for Colonial Affairs. Together with his ministerial leader GLADSTONE soon retired from office and remained in the Opposition until PEEL's return to power in 1841. He was then sworn a member of the Privy Council, having accepted the Vice-Presidency of the Board of Trade. In this position it became his duty to explain and defend in the Lower House the commercial policy of the Government. The revision of the British tariff in 1842 was almost entirely the result of his energy and industry. In 1847 he was chosen the colleague of Sir ROBERT HARRY ISOLIS as member for the University of Oxford. He could not unite thoroughly with the High Church and Tory party, and he refused to accept office under the short-lived ministry of the Earl of DERBY in 1852. He was, however, returned that year by the University of Oxford, though not without a sharp contest. His influence more than that of any other man contributed to the early dissolution of the DERBY administration and the succession of the Earl of ARDEN. Under the latter he was appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer. Lord PALMERSTON took the Government in 1855, and in a few weeks Mr. GLADSTONE resigned on account of a difference with the ministry in regard to the conduct of the Crimean war. He still continued to give the PALMERSTON ministry his support, and in June, 1858, he resumed the Chancellery of the Exchequer, which office he has since retained. In the late elections he failed to be returned to Parli-ment by the University of Oxford, and now sits as a member for Lancashire.

As an author Mr. GLADSTONE is chiefly known by two works—that on Church and State and his work on the Homeric Poems. The former was the subject of one of Lord MACAULAY's critical essays in the Edinburgh Review.

As a statesman Mr. GLADSTONE strictly belongs to no party. He is as conservative as he is liberal. Without the popularity of JOHN BAIKIN among the British masses, he yet inspires general confidence in all classes of society. In his late acute work upon England LOUIS BLANC says, that the peculiarity of GLADSTONE'S mind, which gives him often a hesitating tone in speech and a half reluctance in action, is his exquisite sense of justice, which shows him how much it is to be said upon both sides of a question.

A FEARFUL CRASH.

In Hartford, Connecticut, there occurred on the morning of May 2 a singular accident, which we illustrate in the accompanying engraving. The Hartford Courier of May 3 thus describes the affair:

About 2 o'clock Wednesday evening the north wall of the building known as the City Bindery, near the corner of Tremont and Pearl streets, fell with a loud crash which started many of the inhabitants of that vicinity from their beds. Although it had been an earthquake. The walls had been removed to such an extent to make room for the new building about to be erected by Case, Lockwood, & Co., that the heavy rains of Tuesday probably started the foundation—hence the accident. The upper story was occupied by Case, Lockwood, & Co. for bindery purposes, the stories below by O. D. Case & Co., and others. Owing to the lateness of the hour we were unable to ascertain the extent of the damage done, but the loss will amount to thousands of dollars. It is fearful to think what might have been, had the accident occurred a few hours later, as there are upward of two hundred rooms and tenises employed in the building. It seems a providential escape for them.

We mentioned briefly Wednesday morning the fall of the north wall of the City Bindery building on Tremont Street. In digging a cellar for a new building to be erected by Case, Lockwood, & Co., on the site of the old jail, workmen went as close to the bindery wall as they could, and the violent rain of Tuesday night washed away the remaining foundation, and the wall tumbled with a tremendous crash. A party walling out and went through the building and the south wall fell from destruction.

The north wall of the structure is standing, and it is said that some of the employes of the establishment who came across the Park yesterday morning entered the building before discovering that any thing had happened. The total loss can not, of course, be exactly ascertained, but it will amount probably to over fifty thousand dollars.

O. D. Case & Co., publishers, conducted their business in the third floor. They had 3000 volumes of Garrison's "American Clashes," Vol. 1, all ready for delivery; 1000 volumes of James H. Hunt's "Four Years in Mexico"; a quantity of Mitchell's Outline Maps. Their loss can not at present be known.

Case, Lockwood, & Co., in the two upper stories and attic, had 5000 volumes of "Annals of the Revolution," a part ready for delivery in the Hartford Publishing Company, besides a quantity in various stages of forwardness; selling price $4 a volume. There were also 15,000 volumes of Garrison's "Clashes" in the bindery works for O. D. Case & Co., selling price $4 to $7 a volume. They were also getting out a quantity of Cottage Bibles, and forty different school-books, on a contract for 30,000, is part already delivered; price ranging from 75 cents to $1 a volume.

FALL OF THE CITY BINDERY OF O. D. CASE & CO., HARTFORD, CT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY PRESCOTT, HARTFORD, CT.]

BURNING OF CHURCHES IN PETERSBURG.

In Petersburg, Virginia, where there is said to be, generally, on the part of the citizens, a good feeling toward the freedmen, there is yet enough left of the old barbarism of slavery to inspire the wanton destruction of churches for no other reason than that they are frequented by colored people.

At about 2 a.m. on the morning of May 1 fires were discovered issuing from the Sunday school of the Union Street (colored) Methodist Church. This room was a separate building, standing a few feet distant from the main body of the Church. Upon the alarm being given the Stroom quickly repaired to the spot and succeeded in saving the church, but the school-room was entirely destroyed.

About two hours after this conflagration the alarm was again sounded, and the new African Baptist Church on Harrison Street was found to be on fire, which, notwithstanding the earnest endeavors of the fire department, burned to the ground, the flames having gained a great headway before being discovered.

During the progress of these fires attempts were made to burn two other African churches, the old African on Harrison Street, now used as a school-room, and the Gillfield, quite a handsome edifice on Gill Street. The destruction of these buildings has inflicted a wanton and undeserved injury upon the colored people.

The Petersburg Daily Leader, commenting on these fires, says:

If the guilty parties imagined that they would find the sternest reprobation of approval of their villainy in the sympathy of this community, they have been woefully deceived. In no part of Virginia, or of the South, does a better feeling exist between the whites and blacks. With rare exceptions the feeling for mention, the oppressor of the colored people in Petersburg has been all that could be desired, and the compensation of their general conduct has been unassumed. But if they had been as virtuous as they have been un-

FIRES AT PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA—RUINS OF THE COLORED BAPTIST CHURCH ON HARRISON STREET.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY LAZELLE & M-MOLLEN, PETERSBURG, VA.]

MUSTERED OUT COLORED VOLUNTEERS. "Blasphemy before the office of Colonel Fager..."

THE BILLS. Hear the Trademen with their bills— What a world of misery their very look instills!

Read the contents of the bills— What a world of bankrupt thoughts in every cry!

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE. CONGRESS. May 1: In the House, Mr. Eliot offered a resolution, which was adopted, directing the Select Committee on Freedmen...

May 4: In the House, the bill to revive the grade of General in the United States Army was taken up...

RECONSTRUCTION. It is reported in good authority that President Johnson met his Cabinet on the 30th of April...

THE CAPTURE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS. It appears from the records in the War Department that, with the exception of the President's Proclamation...

OUR FINANCIAL CONDITION. The 1st of May public debt statement from the Treasury Department shows a reduction in the grand total...

GENERAL SHERIDAN BEFORE THE RECONSTRUCTION COMMITTEE. We make the following extracts from the evidence submitted by General Sheridan to the Reconstruction Committee...

FOREIGN NEWS. The Reform Bill has passed the British House of Commons by a majority of five votes.

the committee on the subject of the bill to revive the grade of General in the United States Army...

NEWS ITEMS. Antislavery Protest has made a full confession in his praise of all the wonders of the hearing...

The New Scotia Legislature has voted $5000 to the widow of Dr. Harker, who died by cholera while employed in attending on the ship's passengers.

The Methodist Episcopal Church (South), now in Convention at New Orleans, has changed its name to Episcopalian Methodist. This has been done to make a Union with the Northern Episcopal churches impossible.

The ladies of Columbus, Mississippi, recently decorated the graves of the Confederate dead in the cemetery of that city. They also paid the same mark of respect to the memory of some forty Federal soldiers buried near by.

The Texas Constitution, drawn up by the late Convention, will be submitted to the people on the fourth Monday in June. It formally abolishes slavery, and places freedom on an equality with white before the law.

BRADLEY'S CELEBRATED PATENT DUPLEX ELIPTIC. They will not bend or break, like the single spring, but will always preserve their perfect and elastic shape...

Advertisement for I. E. WALRAVEN Lace Curtains and Window Shades. Includes text: "Lace Curtains and Window Shades", "House-Furnishing Linens", "BETSEY JANE WARD", "GILBERT RUGGE", "New Skirt for 1866", "Spring Skirts".

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP,

COMPOSED OF IODIDE POTASSIUM, WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D., Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospital, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Volunteer Depots, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks, and we classify under the investigations of the liberal-minded and scientific in cases which have no parallel at the present day.

RAPIDITY OF CURE. "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their permanency, and think that diseases can only be cured by the slow, recuperative process of Nature.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (constitutional) diseases transmitted from Father to Child.

PARALYSIS. It is so universally admitted that Constitution Life Syrup is the only effective means of restoration in the various forms of Paralysis, that we need not reiterate that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DIARRHEA. INDIGESTION, WEIGHT AT STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, AND BRUISES, CONSTIPATION, BILIOUSNESS.

SCROFULA. STYRIA, KING'S EYEL, GLANDULAR SWELLINGS, ERYTELEMA, ULCERATIONS, SALT RHEUM.

REUMATISM. (ARTHRITIS), LUMBAGO, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, GOUT, AND RHEUMATISM.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP Purge the system entirely from all the evil effects of Malaria, removing the bad breath, and curing the Weak Joints and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Calomel is sure to produce.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP Emetics, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin, like ULCERS, PIMPLES, BLOTCHES, And all other difficulties of this kind, which so much disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases, Eminent of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Femur, or Scapula, no remedy has ever proved so equal.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured. WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D., Sole Proprietor, NEW YORK.

J. H. Winslow & Co.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELRY AT LOW PRICES. 100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, PENS, BRACELETS, CIGARETTES, GLOBETS, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000! To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO., 208 Broadway, New York.

MERWIN & BRAY,

MANUFACTURERS AND WHOLESALE DEALERS IN ARMS AND AMMUNITION OF ALL KINDS.

Leading Sporting Rifles, of different calibers, and Eagle Arms Co.'s Belt and Pocket Cartridge Revolvers.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO., 501 BROADWAY (at Nicholas Hotel).

WAR VIEWS. PHOTOGRAPHIC ALBUMS, GREAT ASSORTMENT, CARTES DE VISITE OF FAMED PERSONS, &c., &c.

MOTH AND FRECKLES. Ladies afflicted with Discolorations on the Face, called moths, patches, or freckles, should use FERRY'S celebrated MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION.

PRINTING PRESS FOR SALE. One Taylor Double Cylinder, Five Rollers, Table Dispensing, and No. 1. Price $2500.

FISHING TACKLE. In all its varieties, for sale by A. DRAPER, No. 68 Nassau Street.

NEW MUSIC. Twilight Dances Waltz. Duet. For violin 15c.

CHOLERA TROCHES. Needles' Compound Camphor Troches, a positive preventive for all choleraic symptoms.

DRUNKARD STOP! De BEER, 41 Chatham St., New York.

LOOK! LOOK! Full instructions by which any person can master the great art of Ventriloquism.

A Stout Back-Bone is an Essential To physical health as to political consistency.

FIRST PREMIUM IMPROVED

$5 SEWING MACHINE $5

The embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Originally patented May 13, 1850; improved and patented June 5, 1862.

Single machines, all complete, sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instructions.

$2 ASTOUNDING! $2 Timekeeper $2 And Vest Chains, $2 00.

A genuine English Sewing Machine Timekeeper, with accurate miniature compass in the dial.

THE CHEAPEST HISTORY OF THE WAR. Complete, Price 50 Cents.

HITCHCOCK'S CHRONOLOGICAL RECORD OF THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR.

$150 A MONTH! NEW BUSINESS FOR AGENTS. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Maine.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES. For the Army and Navy Hospitals, Mercantile, Druggists, and all who wish to print cheaply, elegantly, and expeditiously.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER. CHEAPEST AND BEST. Price of Presses, $15, $18, $22, and $30.

DR. CLOVER'S NEW CHAMPION LEVER TRUSS. In perfection. Trusses, bandages, &c., &c., of every kind.

OLD PRICES FOR LACE AND MURLIN CURTAINS.

Nottingham Lace Curtains AT REDUCED PRICES.

Gilt Cornices No. 447 AT REDUCED PRICES. Broadway.

Window Shades, ALL KINDS, STYLES, AND FIGURES.

Agents Wanted.—$20 a Day. We want agents, male and female, in every county in the United States.

RIMMEL'S Aromatic Vinegar. One of the most necessary adjuncts of the Toilet and the Bath.

RIMMEL'S PATENT PELLUCID GLYCERINE SOAP. The most useful and agreeable Soap for the Toilet.

THE NEW BOOKS OF THE SEASON

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

RANS MERCI; or, Kezrole and Paloma. A Novel. By the Author of "Gay Livingtons."

THE TRUE HISTORY OF A LITTLE RAGAMUFFIN. By the Author of "The Advantage of Beards."

MISS MARIJORIBANNS. A Novel. By Mrs. G. O'FRYANT.

THE TOILETS OF THE SEA. A Novel. By VICTOR HUGO.

THE ADVENTURES OF HUBERT DAVIDGER; Seventeen Years and Four Months Captive among the Dyaks of Borneo.

THE LOST TALES OF MILSTON. By Sir EDWARD BULLOCK LYTTON.

A TEXT-BOOK ON ANATOMY, PHYSIOLOGY, AND HYGIENE.

LIVINGSTONE'S JOURNALS. Narrative of an Expedition to the Zambesi and its Tributaries.

WIVES AND DAUGHTERS. By Mrs. GARRICK.

A NOBLE LIFE. By Miss MURDOCK.

DEAFEN'S (HENRY) TEXT-BOOK ON CHEMISTRY.

JAMES LOUIS FETTERLU. A Biographical Sketch.

AGNES. A Novel. By Mrs. O'FRYANT.

WALTER GOING. A Story. By ANNE THOMAS.

GUY DEVERELL. By J. S. LE FANT.

GOVERNOR FOOTER ON THE WAR AND THE UNION.

Stammering. Cured by Baker's Patent Appliances.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR MAY, 1866.

TERMS. One Copy for one Year $4 00.

Circulation 112,000. The Publishers will accept a limited number of free-class advertisements.

Agents Wanted.—$20 a Day. We want agents, male and female, in every county in the United States.

RIMMEL'S Aromatic Vinegar. One of the most necessary adjuncts of the Toilet and the Bath.

RIMMEL'S PATENT PELLUCID GLYCERINE SOAP. The most useful and agreeable Soap for the Toilet.

HARPER'S WEEKLY. TERMS. One Copy for One Year $4 00.

Circulation nearly 100,000. The Books Vendors or HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement will be sent to any part of the United States.

Three to Advertisements.—One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for inside, and Two Dollars per line for outside advertisements, each insertion.

TRUE COURAGE.

'THAT DREAFFUL BOY.' 'Oh, ain't Margaret brave, that's all! Last Night, when she was in the Garden, I saw a Man jump over the Hedge, and Kiss her. She was not a bit Afraid, and said nothing about it when she came in!'

Robinson & Ogden, BANKERS, AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES, No. 4 Broad St., New York, (Two Doors from Wall.)

Collections made, with quick returns. Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check. Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Gold will receive our PERSONAL attention.

ROBINSON & OGDEN, Bankers.

POLLAE & SON Manufacturers of Sewing Machines, 62 Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Pipes and Hoses cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted. Send stamp for Circular. Pipes 25 to $20 each.

Marvin's Patent ALUM AND DRY PLASTER, FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFES

Never less their fire-proof qualities, outside the lock, or inside their contents. Safes made and packed safe for shipment. MARVIN & CO., 385 Broadway, New York, 723 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

50 MAKE YOUR OWN SOAP PER-CENT SAVED BY USING R. T. BARRITT'S PURE CONCENTRATED POTASH, or READY SOAP MAKER. Warranted double the strength of common Potash, and superior to any other soap or lye in the market. Put up in cans of 1 pound, 2 pounds, 3 pounds, 4 pounds, and 15 pounds, with full directions in English and German, for making Hard and Soft Soap. One pound will make 15 gallons of Soft Soap. No lye is required. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market. R. T. BARRITT, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, and 74 Washington St., N. Y.

RAVEN & BACON'S PIANO-FORTES. (Established 1828.)

A full assortment of these instruments, which have been well known in the New York market for more than thirty years, constantly on hand. Special circulars sent by mail.

Warehouse, No. 135 Grand Street, near Broadway, New York.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,

MANUFACTURERS OF Revolvers, Rifles, Muskets, and Carbines, For the United States Service. Also POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS, REPEATING REVOLVERS, Rifle Guns, Revolving Rifles, Rifle and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Materials. Sold by Gun Dealers and the Trade generally. In these days of House-breaking and Robbery, every House, Store, Bank, and Office should have one of Remington's Revolvers.

Circulars containing cuts and description of our Arms will be furnished upon application.

E. REMINGTON & SONS, Des. N. Y.

ORIENTAL CHOLERA BITTERS, Used with the greatest success as a preventive, and adopted by the faculty of a metropolitan.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS, And others should send to all parts of the United States by HAKENDEN'S EXPRESS, 45 Broadway.

MAGIC LANTERN AND STEREOSCOPE.

We are now receiving the most comprehensive and finest importation of glass views ever made in America, representing scenes and objects in nearly all European cities and countries. These views are specially selected and are adapted for the use of either the Stereoscope, or the Magic Lantern.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO., 341 Broadway, 3 doors south of the St. Nicholas Hotel.

100 Photographs of Female Beauties sent postpaid for 50 cents. Address R. L. Fox, 34 Varck St., N. Y.

THE BONA FIDE GIFT CONCERT: Comprising the entire Valuable Stock of CLARK & SAYLOR, JEWELERS, 146 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill., TO BE GIVEN AT SMITH & NIXON'S HALL, May 23d, 1886.

$10,000 IN GREENBACKS.

First Gift, $5000 in Greenbacks. Second Gift, House and Lot in Chicago, $4000.

1000 One-Dollar Greenback Gifts, Gifts of Gold and Silver Watches, Diamond Rings and Pins, Gold Chains, Ladies' Amethysts, Topaz, Pearl, and Emerald Gold Encrusted Sets; Ladies' and Gent's Rings, Ear-Rings, Necklaces, Solid Silverware, French and American Clocks; a large stock of Rogers, Smith & Co.'s Silver-Plated Goods; and thousands of other articles too numerous to mention.

8575 Gifts. 43,000 Tickets. One Gift in five.

REMEMBER: $1 00 Only for a Ticket; 11 Tickets for $10; 50 Tickets for $50.

REMEMBER: $5000 for One Dollar.

This Concert will not be postponed, as we shall open with a new stock June 1st. Read all orders at once, or you will be disappointed.

Money can be sent at our risk by drafts, express, post-office orders, or registered letters, or by mail in Greenbacks. Address all orders to CLARK & SAYLOR, Jewelers, (P. O. Drawer 628.) 146 Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill.

Circulars of this scheme sent by return mail. Include stamp for return postage. All goods warranted.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER.

This new celebrated Revolver exceeds all others for compactness, convenience, durability, power, and safety in carrying. Is light (14 oz.), small only 1 in., with larger metallic wire-gauge cartridge .38-100 ball than any Revolver made of same size and weight. Read for circular. GEO. A. HICKCOX, 73 Peacock Street, New York.

ITCH (WHEATON'S) ITCH. Salt Rheum. OINTMENT Salt Rheum.

Will cure the Itch in 48 hours; also cures Salt Rheum, Ulcers, Chills, and all Eruptions of the Skin. Price 50 cents. By sending 50 cents to WEEKS & POTTER, Boston, Mass., it will be forwarded free by mail. For sale by all Druggists.

Advertisement for 'FRAGRANT SODIUM FOR THE TEETH' with a circular logo and text: 'BEWARE OF IMITATIONS. SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS AND PERFUMERS.'

Special Announcement.

THE UNITED STATES PRIZE CONCERT

WILL POSITIVELY BE GIVEN AT CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE, ON MAY 28, 1886. ONLY FOUR WEEKS TO TIME OF DRAWING.

No Postponement.

125,000 Valuable Prizes, worth $492,575 25, will be presented to Ticket-Holders, including $100,000 in Greenbacks.

Over 250,000

TICKETS ARE ALREADY SOLD, AND WITH THE HELP OF OUR

Five Thousand Agents

(Located in nearly every Town and City of Importance throughout the Country) we have

No Doubt Every Ticket will be Sold before the Day Designated.

Local and General Agents will please make a note of the above facts, and "govern themselves accordingly." They can easily see the necessity of making returns promptly each week.

Parties ordering their Tickets by mail should send along their orders immediately. If the Tickets are all sold the money will be returned.

The drawing will take place after the concert, on the stage of the Opera-House, where 10,000 persons can witness it. A Committee will be appointed by the audience to superintend the same. All purchasers and agents will be supplied with correct lists of drawing as soon as published. Parties holding tickets will retain them until after the drawing, and if their number appears in the list of drawn numbers, they will forward their ticket immediately, with full directions as to the shipping of goods or money. Tickets are for sale at the principal Hotels, Book and Station stores in the city, and at our Office, 123 Dearborn Street; price $1 each; sent by mail on receipt of price and stamp for return postage.

Good and reliable Agents wanted in every city, town, and village in the United States, to whom great inducements are offered. References required.

Special Terms, or Club Rates.

Any party procuring a club of five or more names for tickets, and forwarding us the money for the same, will be allowed the following commission, viz: WE WILL SEND

Table with 2 columns: Quantity of tickets and Price. 5 Tickets to one address for $4 50, 10 Tickets to one address for $8 00, 20 Tickets to one address for $17 50, 30 Tickets to one address for $25 50, 40 Tickets to one address for $30 00, 50 Tickets to one address for $35 00, And 100 Tickets to one address for $50 00.

In every case send the name and post-office address of each separate subscriber. Money, by draft, post-office order, express, or in registered letters, may be sent at our risk.

All communications should be addressed to WIGGINS, BRADFORD & CO., 123 Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill. (Post-Office Drawer 5213.)

The proprietors will donate to the Lincoln and Douglas Monument Fund $2000; also there will be $2000 covered from the person drawing the $20,000 prize, for the same purpose.

Referees.—Hon. M. S. Wilkinson, Ex-Governor of Minnesota; Hon. Geo. V. Lawrence, M. C., of Penn.; Hon. Alex. Rankin, Ex-Governor of Wis.; Hon. Wm. Montgomery, Ex-M. C., of Penn.; Hon. Major Dan. Mann, Ex-M. C., of Ind.; Hon. Ira J. Laysok, of Kansas; Hon. Wm. Luffingwell, Lyons, Iowa; Hon. Joseph Koon, of Chicago; Hon. C. Graves Smith, of Minn.; Jacob Forsyth, Agt. M. S. R. R., Chicago, Ill.; M. Kroebing & Co., Importers of Watches, Chicago; Massey, White & Co., New Orleans, La.

N. B. Editors of country papers are authorized to act as our agents, and they will be allowed full commission on all tickets ordered whether for themselves or other parties who may order through them. Proposals for inserting this advertisement are requested.

ART NOTICE. FINE MINIATURES.

WENDEROTH, TAYLOR & BROWN, PHILADELPHIA.

Encouraged by the favor extended to their paintings in New York, have established a branch for making sittings for their Fine Miniatures at the gallery of BOGARDUS, 363 Broadway.

PESTACHINE

It is the most effective and the most pleasant of all vegetable purgatives. Invented by Dr. HOFF, manufactured by URSIN SHANNON & CO., Springfield, Mass.; and sold by DECATI BARNES & CO., New York.

DEAFNESS,

DISCHARGES FROM THE EAR, AND NOISES IN THE HEAD, RADICALLY CURED. By the use of the recently-discovered Vegetable Extract

OTTINE.

Price $2 00 a bottle. For sale by all Druggists. GEO. C. GOODWIN, 36 Hancock Street, Boston, Wholesale Agent.

Portable Steam Engines, ERICSSON CALORIC ENGINES,

Pumps, Mills, &c., &c. JAMES A. ROBINSON, 104 Duane St., New York.

Advertisement for 'WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS' with a circular logo and text: 'Self-Measurement for Shirts. Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts and Collars, sent free every where. THE CASH can be PAID BY EXPRESS COMPANY, WHOLESALE AND RETAIL. R. W. H. WARD, No. 237 Broadway, New York.'

MUSICAL BOXES.

Playing from one to thirty-six different tunes, and costing from $5 00 to $50 00. The most complete stock ever offered for sale in New York. Fine ornaments for the parlor, and cheapest compensation for the invalid. R. J. FAHLLAND & CO., Importers, 31 Malder Lane (up stairs), New York. Musical Boxes repaired.

READ THIS! IMPORTANT!! READ THIS!!!

STURCKEL'S PATENT GRADUATED BOTTLES.

Graduated from 1 to 500. Patented Feb. 4, 1866. Needs of Families, Physicians, and Druggists will find in these bottles most valuable adjuncts. They are a cheap, useful, practical bottle, graduated the same as the graduated measures; raised marks on the bottle. No family should be without at least one at home. Ask your Druggist for them. You may often have occasion to use them. Sold by all wholesale and retail Druggists, and by GEO. W. STURCKEL, Patentee, Box 499, Pittsburg, Pennsylvania.

NATIONAL GIFT CONCERT

WILL BE GIVEN AT CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE, CHICAGO, MAY 31, 1886.

25,000 VALUABLE PRIZES VALUED AT $100,000.

Will be presented to the ticket-holders totaling $25,000 dollars in money. Only 100,000 tickets will be sold, thus giving a prize for every four tickets. A ticket costs but five Dollars, and it may draw $10,000. The $25 prize in Greenbacks is

TEN THOUSAND DOLLARS.

I have just published a book which contains a complete descriptive list of all the prizes, and much other valuable matter of general interest. In this I have explained how the drawing will be conducted, and I have answered every other question that can possibly be asked in connection with the concert. One copy of this book will be sent free of charge to any one sending for one or more tickets, and including five cents for postage. Forward every prize named in this book will be drawn at the appointed time, WHETHER THE TICKETS ARE SOLD OR NOT.

THE PRIZES ARE READY, and will be distributed immediately after the drawing is completed, and correct lists of the winning numbers will be sent to agents and ticket-holders. Parties whose numbers appear on the list will forward their tickets at once, with directions as to shipping goods and money.

INDUCEMENTS FOR FORMING CLUBS.

Upon the receipt of $4 00 I will send you 5 Tickets. Upon the receipt of $7 00 I will send you 8 Tickets. Upon the receipt of $10 00 I will send you 12 Tickets. Upon the receipt of $15 00 I will send you 20 Tickets. Upon the receipt of $25 00 I will send you 30 Tickets. Money may be sent at my risk by draft, P. O. order, or registered letter. My references are any citizen of Chicago. Address MARTIN O'BRIEN, 123 Dearborn Street, Chicago, Illinois.

GILMORE & CO.'S

CELEBRATED BAND INSTRUMENTS.

EXTENSIVELY USED IN THE ARMY AND NAVY.

PRICES REDUCED, May 1, 1886. CIRCULARS SENT FREE BY MAIL. The general adoption of our instruments by all first-class bands and orchestras throughout the country, is the best evidence of their superiority over all others now offered to the public.

GILMORE & CO., Musical Instrument Manufacturers, 15 & 19 Harvard Place, Boston, Massachusetts.

CEDAR CAMPHOR

Defends Pure and Weakens from Worms and Blisters. Made by HARRIS & CHAPMAN, Boston. Sold by drug-gists every where.

SCHLEIBER'S GERMAN OINTMENT.

Warranted a certain cure, without the slightest danger, for piles, old wounds, scrofula, salt rheum—all bone and skin diseases, &c. 55 Bowry, New York.

MOTT'S CHEMICAL POMADE

Is the best hair-dressing and restorer known.

THE REISSUE OF

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. X.—No. 491.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1866.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE MEMPHIS RIOTS.

There was in Memphis, on the first two days of May, an excitement unequalled since the close of the war. The origin of the disturbance between the whites and negroes of that city was highly creditable to the colored soldiers, and the riotous proceedings which followed were a disgrace to civilization. For the riot the lower class of white citizens were as responsible as were the soldiers of the Third United States Colored Infantry for the original difficulty. This regiment, whose reputation has been a bad one, had been mastered out, since which they had frequented whisky-shops in the southern part of the city, and had been guilty of excesses and disorderly conduct. On the evening of May 1 some drunken members of the regiment were on South Street, talking noisily, when in an insolent manner they were ordered by two policemen to cease their noise and disperse. Words ensued, followed by blows, throwing of missiles, and firing of revolvers.

To understand what followed it must be remembered that the police force of Memphis is composed mostly of Irishmen, whose violent prejudice against negroes was so shamefully displayed in the New York riots of 1863. The Tribune correspondent thus described the riot:

Word was sent to police head-quarters, and the whole force at once proceeded to the scene of the fray, being joined on the way by a crowd of excited citizens. Meanwhile the firing had brought other negroes to the spot, who arrived with clubs and some with revolvers, so that by the time the police force came up the two parties were about equal in number. The negroes held the original position, and, upon the approach of the police, showing no disposition to disperse, they were fired upon by the police and citizens who accompanied them. This fire was returned, and for a while both parties seemed themselves in discharging their weapons as rapidly as possible. Meanwhile word was sent to General Slocum, who promptly dispatched to the scene of action a company of regulars (white), whom the negroes were quickly dispersed and driven in every direction.

SCENES IN MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE, DURING THE RIOT—BURNING A FREEDMEN'S SCHOOL-HOUSE.

[SKETCHED BY A. R. W.]

During the evening the wildest and most exaggerated reports were spread throughout the city. Every rumor, rumor of the indulgence of the fight told a different story, and the highest excitement prevailed. Each rumor placed a new aspect upon the affair than the preceding one, and only served to deepen the pre-arranged prejudice against the negro. Soon after dark this excitement and prejudice found vent. Large numbers of armed citizens repaired to the scene of the fight and commenced firing upon every negro who made himself visible. One negro upon South Street, a quiet, industrious laborer, was shot down almost in front of his own cabin, and after life was extinct his body was fired upon, cut and beat in a most horrible manner. In all parts of the city, wherever they could be seen, negroes were fired upon by policemen as well as citizens. They were shot while driving carts, and quietly walking in the streets about their business. The police seemed to make it their special business to shoot every negro they could see, no matter where he was or what he was doing. The result was that by 9 o'clock the colored population were numbers dwindling with wild alarm. How many negroes were killed during the night it is impossible to ascertain, as fire was incessantly heard during the night from houses in all parts of the city. It is estimated that from 15 to 20 were killed. So far as I have been able to learn, not a white man was fired upon by a negro during the whole night.

After the light of Tuesday evening the negro soldiers and most of the colored population residing in the vicinity of the fight fled to the fort for security. They were perfectly quiet—in fact, were terribly frightened for their own safety. At an early hour yesterday morning every thing in the neighborhood of the late fight was quiet and peaceful. One, indeed, were the negroes to be seen in the streets. The bodies of most of those killed the evening before lay scattered where they fell, in some places horribly mutilated and disfigured. Before the door of a dilapidated house with a revolver, shot-gun, and musket, with a squad of policemen, repaired to the locality. As soon as they reached the place they commenced firing upon every negro in sight. It was said that the negroes had shot two white men who were quietly passing along in that vicinity in the morning; but this was, doubtless, one of those wild and unfounded rumors called out by the unnecessary excitement of the previous evening, and the unjust prejudice of the ignorant whites against the freedmen, who were killed were found, nor could the reason be traced to any reliable source. Immediately upon the commencement of firing by the militia, the report spread rapidly through the city that the fight had been renewed, and a large posse of citizens were called out by the Sheriff, armed with large gun-stones, and ordered to the field of battle. By 11 o'clock a large force had collected in the vicinity, who dealt out destruction to every colored man within reach. Several negro women and children were shot, in several instances from a light to a bullet striking them. So far as I could see, there were no armed negroes in the neighborhood, and I have the testimony of many respectable and reliable gentlemen to the same effect. The negro soldiers, and many old soldiers, stood trembling in the fort, filled with the most apprehensions, and beyond even imagination of those who were engaged in shooting down innocent and helpless men, women, and children. The arrival of a company of regulars upon the ground restored order, and the militia and police gradually retired. How many negroes were killed in this vicinity during the morning is not known. The number, however, was considerable. During the entire day they were shot down in various parts of the city. But one white man was killed in the street, and he was shot by a southern white man for the simple reason that he stood talking with an old negro acquaintance. Such familiarity could not be tolerated. And I have, after careful inquiry, failed to find a single instance where a white man was shot at during the day by a negro.

SCENES IN MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE, DURING THE RIOT—SHOOTING DOWN NEGROES ON THE MORNING OF MAY 2, 1866.—[SKETCHED BY A. R. W.]

Two or three days after the red glare of fire shot up in the northern part of the city, then the flames burst out in the eastern part, and then they rolled up in the northern portion of the city. Some thirty houses, occupied by negroes, every one of them for colored children, and every place of assembly for the freedmen were given to the devouring element. Lincoln Chapel, costing $12,000, only served to what the appetite of the greedy destroyer, for soon the old place of worship in the city—a large brick church on the corner of Main and Overton streets, lately occupied by the freedmen, rolled away into a heap of blasted and charred ruins. And while the fire rolled onward and upward the masses weiled and wept. At this writing we possess no estimate of the damage caused by the fire on the main, so great is the confusion and excitement.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 26, 1866.

THE TRIAL OF THE GOVERNMENT.

IT seems to us they greatly mistake the temper of the loyal majority of the American people who suppose that because there are differences among them upon certain points of policy, they will, therefore, from sheer impatience, grow careless of securing the victory they have won. If the correspondent of the London Times reports truly, even the President himself makes the mistake of considering the loyal majority as aiming merely at a party advantage and not at the public welfare. He forgets that he could be as easily accused of holding his course merely with a design to secure his own re-election. Indeed the freedom with which the President assents the motives of those who decline to receive his views as the perfection of statesmanship is one of the unpleasantest episodes of this interesting time.

The truth is, that, with the utmost magnanimity and a cordial desire of restoring the Union to its normal condition, there is no considerable number of faithful Union men in the country who believe that the late rebel States should be restored to their national relations without further conditions. Those who hold that they should be, are the late rebels, their Copperhead allies, and a very few who have hitherto acted with the Union party, and of whom Senator CONAN, of Pennsylvania, is a representative. Those all believe with ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, that as Congress did not consent to Secession the seceding States had a continuous right to resume all their relations with the Union at their pleasure. There is no middle ground between this peevish opinion and the position of the faithful citizens who sustained the war and elected Mr. LINCOLN and Mr. JOHNSON. As Mr. JOHN L. THOMAS, JR., of Maryland, said, in his manly and admirable speech of the 21st of April, the late rebels "are either to be consulted as to what conditions will best please them, or we are to make known to them upon what terms we please to receive them. . . . We are either to exact no guarantees for future security, or we are to impose such guarantees as Congress in its wisdom may deem best for the public good."

In determining these guarantees there is no limit to the authority of the Government but its own discretion. The rebel forces have surrendered, but the Government has not laid down its arms, and General SHERMAN assures us that it will be long before they can be safely relinquished. The right to defend its own existence against armed assailants, which is inherent in the Constitution and in the nature of Government itself, authorized the Government to wage war against the rebels, and the authority to maintain its security by exacting guarantees of defeated rebels is a necessary part of the same inherent right. There was no express verbal provision of the Constitution for emancipation or for any other measure of war, nor for the appointment of Provisional Governors by the President. But the power of the Government is not limited by its excuses. Its rightful action is not subject to their discretion. Because they lay down their arms, they can not compel the Government to connive at its own subversion. The Union is restored, and the rights of the States are resumed, not when ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS and the Copperheads say so, but when the loyal people of the United States in Congress assembled are content to declare it.

That declaration should be made only after the most careful investigation and reflection. It is not surprising that the late insurgent States should still seethe with angry passions. It was to be expected that Union men would still be hated and maltreated. It is natural that men like HENRY A. WISE should continue to raven and swear at the Union, against which they have so long plotted and declaimed. It is not strange that conspicuous rebels should be enthusiastically elected to the highest local offices, and that men whose hands are still trembling with the effort to overthrow the Government should insolently denounce those who have maintained it at the most costly sacrifice as enemies of the Constitution. It was above all to be expected that the freedmen, whose fidelity to the Union has been proved, should be the victims of those whose war for slavery has ended in emancipation.

All these things are natural phenomena of the situation. There was no thoughtful man who did not anticipate them, and only the foolish are disappointed now that they are every where apparent. But these phenomena are contemplated without anger as without surprise. They serve to admonish us all that the conditions upon which States full of such a spirit may resume their national relations must be determined with great sagacity and prudence. Great risks are of course to be taken. That is the inevitable law of the situation. "Bring us back!" uttered LOUIS WINDFALL in the dark days of 1860, when the Senate chamber, to which his comrades now again seek admission, rang with the contemptuous fury of secession: "When you undertake that, and have accomplished it, you may be like the man who purchased the elephant—you will find it rather difficult to decide what you will do with the animal." None of us supposed that the end of the war would solve all problems. The question to be decided would plainly then be the one which we are now reaching, whether, the attempt of forcible secession having failed, and the rebel States having resumed their relations upon prescribed conditions, the controlling majority of the American people would still maintain the Government and the Union under the constitutional forms, or permit it to be subverted.

We have now, therefore, to decide under what conditions that final and crucial experiment shall be tried. Sooner or later the normal condition of the country must be restored, and there is no conceivable method by which the strain and friction of the trial that will follow can be avoided. Certain conditions we may see at once would be useless. General disfranchisement, for instance, simply postpones the experiment. Holding the suspended States as conquered provinces, also, protracts and complicates, but does not obviate the peril. The only rational solution of the problem is to confide the experiment of a popular government to its principle in such a way that it shall have the fairest trial. Then, if it fails, it is not we but human nature which is responsible. If the lawfully expressed will of the people of the United States is that this Union shall end and the Government dissolve, there is no further alternative or appeal. But to ascertain this will, to satisfy the conditions of the trial, the whole people must be consulted. It will not do to follow JAMES M. MASSON'S advice to Virginia, and hang or shoot every man who votes in a certain way, or CLINTON'S promise that in North Carolina Union men should be hushed by "the swift attention of Vigilance Committees."

The risk that we undertook when we fought to defend the Government and save the Union was not, if we succeeded, to govern half of the country as a subjugated province or colony without national rights or representation, but it was to trust the Union to the people of the Union, some of whom hated it and had fought against it, and would doubtless vote against it. The less delay in the trial the better; for delay endangers a just decision by breeding impatience among loyal citizens anxious to renew their old activity and repair their fortunes. The important element of the experiment was thus evident. It was the late slave population. The war had made them freemen and citizens. If the old order of the national system were restored, and they were not consulted, and the Government were embarrassed or ruined by an alliance of the late rebels with the Copperheads, the experiment of a popular government would be as far from satisfactory solution as ever. It can be satisfactorily tried only by an equality of electoral right among the whole population. The experiment is not satisfactorily tried evidently if 681,000 citizens, as in North Carolina, are invested with political power to the exclusion of 331,000 who have the same qualifications except color; or if, as in Virginia, 719,000 may exclude 533,000; or, as in Alabama, 595,000 may exclude 437,000; or, in Georgia, 591,000 may exclude 465,000; or, in Louisiana, 357,000 may exclude 350,000; or, in Mississippi, 353,000 may exclude 436,000; or, in South Carolina, 291,000 may exclude 411,000.

Under the circumstances of the case, as we have defined them, this electoral equality may be secured either directly or indirectly. Congress may, as a measure of national security, determine who shall vote, either by express specification or by sanctioning the provisions of a State Constitution, and guarding against its unfair operation. This is obviously a purely exceptional measure. In the normal operation of our system the regulation of suffrage is left to the States, and it would be touched by the National Government in this instance for the same reason that property in slaves was touched—for the public safety. The right of a State to regulate suffrage is no more sacred than that of a property holder to his property. The Constitution protects neither when in extreme national peril its sacrifice becomes necessary. Congress has chosen, and we think wisely, to leave the regulation of the suffrage to the States, but proposes to reduce the basis of representation in proportion to the number of male adults disfranchised except for rebellion. The reason for proposing this rather than directly establishing impartial suffrage is purely one of expediency. It saves friction.

This is the substance of the amendment suggested by the Committee of Reconstruction. This enables us to meet the inevitable risk in the safest way. This, also, undoubtedly commends itself to every loyal man in the country. This is the logical completion of the measures already taken. And when this has become a part of the fundamental law, then, with an executive which will honestly defend the equal civil rights of all citizens, and confide the national offices to hands which have always faithfully upheld the nation, we shall be ready to encounter the sharpest peril to which a popular system of government has ever been exposed.

THE APPOINTING POWER.

THE question of Executive patronage, of which we have several times spoken, is beginning to excite deeply the public interest and attention. It is to be considered without the slightest reference to the present President. Mr. JOHNSON can not be accused of grasping at an increase of that patronage, for he vetoed both the bills which would have greatly enlarged it, although he has been charged with using that which exists for his own political support and not for the public service. If that should be true in his case, the exercise of the power should be restricted by every lawful means; and that it may not hereafter be true in any case, under any Administration, the Executive patronage should be very seriously abridged.

The Constitution empowers the President to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint all officers of the United States whose appointment is not otherwise provided for by the Constitution. But "Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments." Here is one plain remedy for the peril of the enormous executive patronage now held by the President. Assassins, collectors, postmasters, and a large class of officers, as Senator SHERMAN recently remarked in opposing Senator TRUMBULL'S amendment, may be removed from the Executive control. Is there any good reason why they should not be?

As for the apparent discourtesy toward the President of such an act, it should be remembered that it would always seem discourteous to limit a prerogative which had been long exercised. But fortunately the present President has himself very forcibly and truthfully stated the danger of committing so vast a power to the hands of one man. And while it is indeed unfortunate that the antagonism which has become apparent between him and the present Congress would give to such a proposition an air of personal suspicion and censure, yet we can trust his good sense to accept a reform, whose unquestionable advantage to the parity of the Government he has most ably advocated, even when it seems to be generated by distrust of himself.

It is not easy to see, upon a careful study of the Constitution, how the power of arbitrary removal by the Executive can be derived from it; but there is undoubtedly a question of the scope of that power. The popular theory indeed is, that all national offices are the prerequisites of the Presidency; and that when we elect a President we do virtually elect every village postmaster and custom-house boatman in the country. The theory is, that we are torn up by the roots every four years. The result is, that a vote for a successful candidate is held to be a valid claim to office; and the candid applicant recommends his merit and his modesty by declaring that he never asked for an office before. This terrible demoralization of our politics is the logical result of the principle that to the victors belong the spoils; and the consequence is, that the public service is intrusted to the most incompetent hands and the taxes are enormously increased.

This practice has now become so lawless in our whole system that reform, or even relief, seems hopeless and helpless to many honest minds. But there is a way to begin even to clean out the " Augean stable." There may be, as we said, a perplexing constitutional question of the limits of the Presidential power of removal from office. There is a long tradition of thirty years' unquestioned use of this power. But there can be no obscuring an express provision of the Constitution authorizing Congress to place the appointment of thousands and thousands of officers beyond Executive control. Here is a plain way to begin this radical and regenerating reform. If it does not prevent the myriad little offices from becoming the spoils of a party, it at least distributes their division, and in the case of appointments vested in the courts of law, it secures comparative permanence. When we have gained one step the next can be more easily taken. When it begins to appear that the perils of a Presidential election are due to the fact that so large an army as the officeholders are voting for their bread and butter, and not to the fact that we are changing the chief Executive of the Government, sensible people—and, spite of Chancellor OXFORDIAN, they are the final Government—will very sensibly ask why we should be shaken to the centre every four years. Can't we roast our pig without burning the house down?

A wise man maintains the value and beauty and usefulness of his home by constantly tending it with brush or plane or trowel, wherever and whenever it shows the need of repair. In this way his home is always comfortable, his domestic tranquillity undisturbed, and his home a model to every neighbor. A wise nation is wonderfully like a wise man. It does not wait until the roof begins to tumble about its ears before it inquires whether it leaks.

UNITED STATES CONSOLS.

IT is not so clear as it seemed a few days ago that Senator SHERMAN'S bill for the consolidation of the United States debt into a 5 per cent. 30-year consol will become a law without opposition. Some pains have been taken to collate opinions in Wall Street, and the result of the inquiry is, that a 5 per cent. 30-year bond would not under present circumstances command public favor. Some journals announce that applications for the new consols have already been forwarded to the Department. But it would probably appear, as investigation, that such applications, if not wholly mythical, have proceeded from houses which have bought Ten-Forties on speculation, and are naturally solicitous for their advance.

We may be said, as a nation, to have now reached years of discretion, and it is time that an end were set to youthful follies. Time was, not long since, when we had such faith in our national strength and vigor, that we believed the rebellion could be put down by 75,000 volunteers, and that $500,000,000 of greenbacks could be issued without justifying a premium on gold. We have learned wisdom since then. All men now admit that the United States, vastly favored as they are by Providence, are not exempt from the laws of political economy, and that United States citizens, loyal as they may be, will not lend their money to the nation at any cheaper rate than they can lend it to individuals. This much must be said by way of answer to that class of reasoners, who are forever discussing economical questions from a sentimental point of view, and denouncing a man as disloyal because he insists that two and two only make four, desirable as it would be for the country that they should make five.

Now, with regard to this 5 per cent. consol, it is clear, in the first place, that if the bonds can be negotiated, it would be advantageous to negotiate them; in other words, it would be a gain to reduce the rate of interest on our outstanding liabilities from 6 and 7/8 to 5 per cent.

But to do this, without repudiation, the consent of our creditors is essential. And no man, who is not crazy, will expect bondholders who are entitled to receive 6 per cent. per annum from Government to gratuitously forego their claims and accept 5. No adult of sound intelligence can be expected to make the commensurate a present of one-sixth of his income from national investments.

It is thus clear that of the $2,200,000,000 of national debt not represented by greenbacks, $814,000,000, which is in the shape of Seven-Thirty notes, $171,000,000, which is in the shape of Five-Twenties of 1864 and 1865, about $302,000,000, which is in the shape of long Sixes; in all, about $1,258,000,000, or nearly two-thirds of the whole, are out of the reach of the Government, and would not be converted into the proposed consol, unless Government offered its creditors, by way of compensation for the sacrifice it asked them to suffer, an equivalent which it is not in its power to bestow. The holders of these various securities are entitled to 6 per cent. for various periods ranging from 4 to 15 years; they can not be expected to surrender their rights without compensation.

The Editors of Harper's Weekly is published by LEWIS PERRYMAN, Inc., No. 120 Broadway, New York, with permission from Harper & Row, N. Y. Subscriptions are $14 for one year (25 cents) in advance.
Issue of May 26, 1866. Vol. 8 - No. 22

Of the remainder of the debt—say $1,100,000,000 (exclusive of greenbacks)—about half, $500,000,000, is in the shape of Five-Twenty Bonds, which are redeemable next year. It is not settled whether they are redeemable in gold or greenbacks. Mr. CHASE unofficially assured holders that they were payable in gold. It is not likely, however, that the Government will do more than it is obliged to do, and as the law is not explicit, it is as well to assume that they will be paid in paper. A further sum of $62,000,000 in debt certificates is also redeemable within the year; $130,000,000 of deposit certificates; and about one-third of the outstanding compound-interest notes—say $60,000,000. Thus, in all, assuming that the new consols prove a success, and be negotiable at par, within twelve months, it is in the power of the Secretary to fund therein $772,000,000 of the public debt. Should Mr. McCULLOCH share Mr. CHASE'S views, and consider the Five-Twenties payable in gold, the aggregate would be reduced to $572,000,000. In 1867-8 and 1868-9 the balance of the compound-interest notes—$120,000,000—might be funded. In 1869 and 1870 the new Five-Twenties—$171,000,000—would mature, and might be disposed of. In 1871 and '73 the Five-Twenties created by the conversion of Seven-Thirties would mature, and might be paid off or converted. And, lastly, in 1874 the Ten-Forties might be exchanged.

Clearly, then, the consolidation of the public debt into a 5 per cent. consols is going to be a slow business under the most favorable circumstances.

But what if a 5 per cent. loan could not be negotiated at par? What if the design of the bill was to prevent any successful negotiation by the Secretary? These are questions of moment. It was Senator SHERMAN who defeated the Secretary's plan for the construction of the currency and the gradual absorption of the greenbacks with a view to resumption. It is the same Senator SHERMAN who now restricts the funding powers of the Department to a 5 per cent. bond at par, well knowing that the only 5 per cent. in existence are selling at 95, after having been for a year between 90 and 92. Of course, if a 5 per cent. loan could not be negotiated at par, the debt certificates and deposits on call would have to be renewed, the compound-interest notes would not be disturbed, no effort would be made to pay off the old Five-Twenties next year, and a plethora of money would prevail at the monetary centre, which would make the fortunes of the speculators who are said to have influential friends in the House and the Senate at Washington.

Senator SHERMAN'S bill seeks to enlist public favor for the new 5 per cent. by exempting them from taxation. Has any one reflected upon the practical effects of such an exemption? Supposing the bill passed and the bonds were negotiated, what would be the result? Why, simply that the capitalists and rich men of the country would be exempt from taxes, while poor men paid them. How long would such an inequality be endured? Among the causes of the French Revolution De TORQUILLAN enumerates, first, the exemption of the nobles from taxation, and adds that subsequent French governments, taught by experience, have carefully avoided this error. And this is the policy which Senator SHERMAN now recommends us to adopt!

A SUPERFLUOUS JURY.

It is very authoritatively announced that the Government of the United States is about submitting the decision of the justice of the late war to twelve chance men in Richmond, Virginia. For what purpose this is to be done is not clear. If the twelve men decide that the Government had no right to wage war, what then? Will anybody's opinion be changed? In the former case, will those of us who supported the war regret our conduct, or feel that we committed at the murder of the brave men whom all true hearts forever honor? In the latter case, will those who opposed the war acknowledge their prolonged and miserable mistake? The sole question which can engage the consideration of the twelve men is, whether Secession is a right reserved to the States by the Constitution? But can that question be more absolutely and finally decided than it has already been by the war?

The plea of JEFFERSON DAVIS precedes the question of treason. He would willingly agree that treason should be punished. But he would contend that he has not committed treason. Treason against the United States, says the Constitution, "shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." But this is true only of a citizen of the United States. DAVIS argues that he was not a citizen. He contends that his sovereign State had withdrawn and had thereby relieved him from allegiance to the United States. Therefore, while he would not deny that he levied war, he would insist that he did so not as a citizen of the United States but of a political community with which the United States were at war. Consequently he is an alien enemy, not a traitor.

Suppose, however, that the twelve men decide that this plea is of no avail; that a State is not sovereign, and can not withdraw from the Union, and that the allegiance of every citizen is due to the national authority; yet, we ask again, what have they decided which the whole country has not already decided by the most tremendous ordeal? This decision certainly gains nothing in weight or solemnity by the approval of the twelve men. Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS and his friends do not change their opinion. Certainly loyal men do not change theirs. In the estimation of the first, JEFFERSON DAVIS does not become a criminal, even though hung upon a gallows; in the judgment of the last, he is not a hero or a patriot though he go untouched. Upon what point, then, and to what purpose, are the twelve men summoned to decide?

Is it to determine whether there is such a crime as treason? But the Constitution defines it, and there is no question. Is it to decide whether DAVIS is guilty of treason? But that question is already settled by the refusal of the country to admit the plea under which he levied war. Is it to make treason and traitors odious? But how can that be done by convicting and hanging JEFFERSON DAVIS when General HUMPHREYS, of Mississippi, who is guilty of exactly the same offense, is elected Governor of Mississippi by his fellow-traitors—all of whom are equally guilty with DAVIS—and who is pardoned by the President that he may exercise his office? The odium of treason in the person of DAVIS hanging upon the gibbet is entirely destroyed in the person of HUMPHREYS sitting in the Governor's chair.

But suppose the twelve men differ, or agree that DAVIS is not guilty of treason. Is it worth while for the Government of the United States to have placed itself in such a ludicrously humiliating position? If the jury be packed, the trial is a farce. If it be free, there is the chance and the probability of this humiliation. Now, is there any conceivable advantage to be gained by the trial which can authorize the Government to take such a chance as this? If the accused be convicted he is not disgraced. His offense is political, and no reasoning can persuade men to regard political offenses as crimes. Does any man suppose that if convicted DAVIS would be hung? To hang him would be an error as huge as to try him. To-day he is a baffled conspirator, and practically the deadest of dead men. Hang him and he becomes a living power to sedition, and an eternal remorse to the country. Every reader of history condemns CHARLES I. until he mounts the scaffold; then he pities him. Did his father's scaffold frighten or deter JAMES II.? We have subdued this vast rebellion by force of arms. The blood it shed has been avenged upon the same field by blood. Its argument, its objects, and the characters of those who caused and controlled it, are committed to the terrible justice of history and the conscience of mankind. Our present duty is not to hang those whom we did not shoot, but to secure ourselves by political measures against political perils.

Of course we speak of DAVIS merely as a political offender. If he be guilty of complicity with the horrible massacres at Andersonville and Salisbury and Belle Isle, or with the crowning crime of the assassination, humanity itself calls for his punishment. The evidence of this latter charge is in the hands of the Judiciary Committee of the House. Before the Richmond trial we hope that Committee will give the country a plain statement of the grounds upon which the President offered a reward for DAVIS'S arrest as a conspirator in the assassination plot.

HOW TO ESCAPE THE CHOLERA.

The cholera first appeared in this country over thirty years ago, and such a vast mass of facts has been gathered that some think it unreasonable that the doctors have not fully settled upon the means of preventing its incursion and diffusion. But it is forgotten that in this world it takes a long time to settle even the most simple points in any new subject that comes up. And besides, there is, after all, more ascertained by medical men in regard to the cholera than is commonly supposed; but this is very much kept out of view by the excitement that prevails in relation to the few points that are in dispute.

The world, both professional and non-professional, is in truth too much occupied with the question, whether the cholera is contagious? and every doctor is piled with it by patient and friend and stranger. And you must either be a contagionist or a non-contagionist, or you will give no satisfaction to the questioner or disputant that introduces the subject. This comes from a narrow view of the facts. One who has a certain set of facts come under his observation, decides that the disease spreads by contagion; while another, from another set of facts, comes to an opposite decision. This is all wrong. Where there are numerous facts, and many of them apparently inconsistent, they must be extensively compared and sifted in order to reach correct conclusions. Taking this broad view of the facts revealed by the whole history of the disease, it is clear that its ordinary propagation is by some cause, as yet wholly unknown, which does not emanate from the sick, and that it is only now and then contagious. For, not to go into any discussion of this point, while there are occasional facts that show that cholera is communicated from one person to another, it very commonly overleaps the strictest quarantine and sanitary cordons, and often fails to follow the freest lines of communication.

Far be it from us to say that all quarantine regulations are to be discarded. Some are necessary. And yet some which are resorted to are useless; others still are absolutely injurious, multiplying the victims of the disease; and none are to be relied upon as certain preventives of its introduction. The idea, indulged by some, of sealing up this whole country against the cholera by a universal quarantine is preposterous.

So much for quarantine measures. But there are other measures about which there is no dispute, and they are of immense importance in limiting the ravages of cholera if not in preventing its introduction. And yet their value seems to be far from being properly appreciated by the community at large.

Promoting cleanliness is one, and we use this expression in its broadest sense. You must have a clean skin, clean clothes, clean air, clean houses, yards and streets. No filth must be covered up with an outside show of cleanliness. Dirt in cellars, in corners, may do the mischief. A nasty carpet, changed with the accumulating filth of months of slothfulness, may procure the cholera for a family. After all, this interior uncleanness has more to do with the origin of the disease than what is outside. Bad as are the emanations from decaying vegetable and animal substances, they are nothing like as inviting to cholera and other diseases as those from personal filth, within and without, but especially within, where, pent up from the free air, they act with all their force.

Much is said about disinfectants; but, useful as they are, they never can take the place of cleanliness. We say, then, both to communities and to individuals, Clean up, clean up; and when you have done so, keep clean—for the cholera is likely to come again; and, if not, there are other diseases, as typhus fever and cholera infantum, constantly, and therefore less observably, destructive of life, of which filth is a chief cause.

New York and Philadelphia once presented a decided contrast in regard to the influence of cleansing measures. Philadelphia adopted them thoroughly, and had but 700 deaths from cholera; while New York, neglecting them, had 5000 deaths.

There is no fact more prominently brought out by the whole history of cholera than that intemperance in drinking is one of the principal causes of its diffusion. It acts in two ways: directly, by predisposing the individual to an attack, a large proportion of the victims being from the intemperate; and, indirectly, by promoting the uncleanness, poor and irregular living, and crowding together of families. If, then, we could shut up the drinking places we should effectually cut off one of the chief sources—nay, the chief source—of the influences that so largely generate cholera and various other fatal diseases.

Intemperance in eating predisposes to the disease. But so also does a diet too restricted in quantity or variety. A poor diet will weaken the system, and thus make it liable to an attack. A diet restricted in variety does not meet the wants of the system, and so fails to fortify it properly against disease. The true course is to have just such a diet as a rational moderate liver would adopt in ordinary times. Good fresh vegetables and ripe fruits should be eaten as usual, as a part of the daily diet, and not irregularly.

No reliance should be placed upon vainly prophylactics—that is, remedies supposed to ward off the disease. Intoxicating drinks are often taken for this purpose, and they are really among the most likely means of bringing on an attack. Good habits of living, the cheerful performance of duty, and a calm trust in Providence, are the best prophylactics. These are the grand preservatives of the physicians who fearlessly stand at their post in the midst of the pestilence, and very seldom does one of their number fall a victim to it.

LEFT-HAND WRITING.

THE specimens of left-hand writing by disabled soldiers, of which we have formerly spoken, were lately exhibited in Washington, and excited very general interest and attention. Speaker COLMAN, General BANKS, General HOWARD, the representative left-handed soldier, with other noted men, made interesting and eloquent speeches, and it was resolved that the collection should be sent out for exhibition at the Great Fair in Paris. Meanwhile these left-handed heroes who have not contributed are invited to send specimens of their writing for reference and preservation to WILLIAM OLAND BURNES, Esq., of the Soldiers' Friend, who has devoted himself with untiring energy to this patriotic and illustrative work.

LITERARY.

Under page 330 of this Number we begin the publication of a charming little story called "The Three Little Spades," by Miss WARNER, author of "The Wide, Wide World."

With the Number for June, 1866, Harper's Magazine begins its thirty-third volume. It is the one hundred and ninety-third number of the whole issue of this popular periodical, whose hold upon the public does not appear to relax. The circulation is very large, and has increased by twenty thousand copies since the first of the year. The June Number opens with a paper by General SYMONDS upon his "Personal Recollections of the War." The author is a Virginian, and was a steady Unionist throughout the struggle. His peculiar position, his shrewd humor and observation, and his artistic skill both with pen and pencil make this article, which is one of a series, very entertaining and valuable.

A brief paper upon "Gladstone as Leader of the Commons" is a vivid and picturesque sketch, and is the best portrait of the English statesman who now excites such interest and admiration. "The Fall of Richmond" describes that event from the inside. It is written by a resident of that city whose heart sank with Lee's retreating army. The other articles make an excellent variety, and we see no signs of ennui in Harper's Magazine.

An "Index to the daily Times for 1865" is a very useful work, and is the model of an index. We believe it is the first instance of the kind, with a single exception. The book contains twenty thousand references to the events mentioned during that period, each specifying the date, page, and column of the paper in which it is to be found. It is handsomely printed, and bound in dove form, and contains 182 double-column pages. The index applies to other papers as well as the Times, the daily news for all the papers being essentially the same.

A modest, anonymous novel, "Emma: a Tale of Slave Life in Haiti," is published by JOHN BAUMANN. Although its date is so remote its interest is vivid, while the novelty of its scenery and incidents, and the skill with which the tale is unfolded, give it a peculiar charm. The evident familiarity of the author with the details of Roman life under the empire does not make his penance, but imparts a fine local coloring to the events of his story. The plot reveals the essential inhumanity of slavery, whatever the time or the race analyzed—a truth which it is most useful to study in the passionate perspective of centuries. The merit of this modest book is likely to be overlooked, but we heartily commend it to our readers.

"Across the Continent" is the title of the book of Mr. SAMUEL BOWLES, editor of the Springfield Republican, recording his observations during his late journey with Speaker COLMAN. It is by far the most graphic and shrewd report upon the journey over the plains, the Mormon Question, the Pacific Railroad, and Territorial Mining, that we have, while the quick and humorous eye, the true and tender heart, and the picturesque and subtle hand of the author, give it a various interest which can not fail to send the book every where over the country. Mr. BOWLES is an American and a Yankee in every heart-beat, and the sound good sense which is manifest through the whole work gives the greatest value to all his opinions upon the important and interesting questions he touches.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

May 8: In the House, debate was opened on the joint resolution reported by the Reconstruction Committee proposing a Constitutional Amendment. In the evening the vote was taken up, and the first section, imposing a tax of five cents per pound on cotton, was adopted.

May 9: In the Senate, the House resolution appointing a Commission to select a site for the New York Post-office was passed. A bill to incorporate the National Theological Institute of the District of Columbia was passed. The object of the Institute is the education of colored men for the Christian ministry.

May 10: In the Senate, the Post-office Appropriation Bill was taken up, the pending question being on Mr. THURMAN'S amendment, providing that no compensation be paid to any Assistant Postmaster until his appointment is confirmed by the Senate, unless recommended to fill a vacancy created by death, resignation, or expiration of office during the recess of the Senate. The Senate was addressed by Mr. HOWARD and Mr. GORHAM. The vote being reached the amendment was disagreed to—yeas 35, nays 53. The bill was then passed.

In the House, the joint resolution to amend the Constitution was passed, including the disfranchisement clause, 195 to 37.

NEWS ITEMS.

The body of Brother KING, late Collector of the Port, who, it will be remembered, was killed while endeavoring to jump off a Hoboken ferry boat into the river, was discovered at 5 A.M. May 14, drifting in through the gap of the Atlantic dock, Brooklyn, by Officer KENNY.

On the 10th of May Jefferson Davis was indicted for treason by the Grand Jury of the United States District Court now in session at Norfolk, and the trial of the prisoner, it is supposed, will take place in June.

James Stephens, the Fenian Chief, arrived in New York last week. His arrival was soon followed by the resignation of O'Malley.

The appointment of Collector Ruyter for the Port of New York was confirmed by the Senate May 11.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The Russell administration has concluded not to resign, but deemed it prudent to make some concession to the Whig section of the Opposition, the member of the proposed Reconstruction of Senate. The latter measure will be shown to the House before the Franchise Bill is passed in Committee.

The Washington correspondent of the London Times gives that paper an interesting account of an interview which he had recently with President Johnson.

The German question was still unsettled, and its fate more threatening than at any previous time. Neither Prussia nor Austria would yield any of their demands, nor would either lower its terms to the other. The war spirit still smoldered in Italy; but it was reported that France had given a gentle hint that the time to strike for Venetia had not yet come. A meeting of the European Congress was talked of, for the settlement of the question now so angrily debated.

Since the advent of warm weather the cholera has broken out at the most towns of Holland and in the interior of Brittany, between the French ports of Brest and St. Nazaire. All winter and spring the disease has been making a few victims in the Dutch Province of Luxembourg and in the French Province of Brittany, and the great question has been what direction the epidemic would be likely to take when hot weather returned. We now see that from Luxembourg the disease has crossed the Rhine into Holland, and that in Brittany it is going back from rather than to the coast.

Cholera has appeared among the German emigrants awaiting embarkation for America in Liverpool. The Germans went on board the Steamship Victoria some time ago as the England and Portugal for New York, but the disease manifested itself on board about immediately after her departure from Liverpool, and two deaths occurred before she crossed to Queenstown. She had to put back to Liverpool. The National Steam Navigation Company has decided to stop German emigrants by their vessels, and the British Government ordered a strict examination of all German emigrants before their admission to England.

EDWIN M. STANTON.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY & CO., WASHINGTON, D. C.]

EDWIN M. STANTON.

It has been usual with some of the admirers of the Secretary of War to compare him with CAESAR, the war minister of the French revolution. The analogy may hold good in respect of the enthusiasm, energy, soul, and inflexible honesty evinced by each in the performance of public duty, but the burdens which our war imposed upon Mr. STANTON far exceeded in their magnitude and complication the utmost of those that were borne by the celebrated Frenchman.

Mr. STANTON came into office on the 26th of January, 1862, a month before the decisive and cheering victory of Fort Donelson. Though never identified with the party by which Mr. LINCOLN was elected, his appointment was urgently recommended by both Mr. SEWARD and Mr. CHASE, as well as by Mr. CARRISON, whose retirement caused the vacancy which he was to fill. He had always been a thorough-going Democrat of the JACKSON school; but these Republican leaders will know the earnestness of devotion to the Union, and the extraordinary power he had manifested during the disastrous closing days of Mr. HOCHSTETTER'S administration. In these days of gloom and anxiety he was Attorney-General, while Mr. HOLY was Secretary of War, and Mr. DIX Secretary of the Treasury; and it was chiefly to him, and to these patriotic associates of his, that we owe the preservation of the Government from total shipwreck before the 4th of March, 1861, so that the helm of power could be put into the hands of Mr. LINCOLN. The services which Mr. STANTON then rendered were known especially to Mr. SEWARD, with whom, as the designated Secretary of State of the new Executive, he was in constant communication. It was also felt to be desirable to give a prominent part in the work of the Administration to some representative man of the War Democrats who were then nobly sustaining Mr. LINCOLN in his efforts to vindicate the national integrity; and accordingly, when Mr. CARRISON left the War Department, Mr. STANTON took charge of it.

At the time when Mr. LINCOLN appointed him to this office there two remarkable men, who were destined to an intimacy which history will never cease to remember, had not seen each other. The first meeting between them was when Mr. STANTON went to the White House to receive his commission. We believe, also, that the first notice which the new Secretary received of his intended appointment was but the day before the nomination was sent to the Senate, when he was informed of it just as he was about to rise for the argument of a case in the Supreme Court. The relations thus commenced between the President and the Secretary of War always remained exceedingly cordial; or, rather, they constantly became warmer and more confidential, down to the last fatal day which ended Mr. LINCOLN'S earthly career. While he was rarely seen at the offices of the other executive departments, at the War Office he was not merely a frequent, but a constant visitor. His tall form, wrapped in his familiar gray shawl, was usually to be seen making its way along the back alley that leads there from the White House, at from 9 to 10 o'clock in the morning, or about 6 in the afternoon; and persons who were admitted to see the Secretary on important business in his private room at those hours would sometimes find the President stretched upon the sofa there, if the discussion between him and the Secretary had not yet been concluded. Indeed, the tie between them seemed to be quite as much that of private affection as of official duty; and when the catastrophe occurred which roused the nation in mourning, all will remember how admirably the confidence of the deceased statesman in his friend and adviser was justified by the latter. For a brief time, in that awful crisis, the whole Government seemed to rest upon the shoulders of the Secretary of War; and the country will not soon forget the manner in which the momentous trust was discharged.

Mr. STANTON is a native of Ohio, whence his parents emigrated from Culpepper County, Virginia. He was born at Steubenville in 1815; studied at Kenyon College in 1833, remaining there barely a year; served as a bookkeeper's clerk at Columbus at the same time that he was studying his future profession; was admitted to the bar in 1836, and began the practice of the law in Harrison County. He soon gained an extensive reputation for ability in the argument of abstract questions of law, as well as for success with juries. The memory of some of his more remarkable efforts, especially in the latter department of his profession, is still fresh in all that part of Ohio and the neighboring region of Western Virginia. He also became known as an active politician of the Democratic party, of which Senators ALLEN and TAPPAN were then leaders in Ohio; and into the political contests which then prevailed he cast himself with all the fire and passion of his powerful nature. In 1848 he removed to Pittsburg, whence, in 1857, he transferred his residence to Washington, where his professional occupations, especially in patent cases, soon became as constant as we presume they were profitable. Of his history in connection with the War Department it is not necessary that we should speak in these columns. The people know it already.

Mr. SWANSON is about five feet eight inches in height, and is a person of broad shoulders and heavy frame. His features are rather round and full, his hair very dark, though thin, and his complexion sallow. These peculiarities, combined with his intense and penetrating dark brown eyes, and his heavy beard, sprinkled freely with gray, give somewhat of an Oriental air to his general appearance. Though his ordinary expression is thoughtful, absorbed, and stern, his smile is gentle and winning as a woman's.

One of the most striking facts about Mr. SWANSON is his indifference to the usual means of popularity. Though during the past four years no man has been criticised so vehemently as he, he has not once undertaken to defend himself, either by his own hand or that of any friend. The facts alleged against him might be either wholly fictitious or wholly misrepresented; he has treated them with the same patient neglect, as if confident that the future would do him justice, or careless of all wrong provided he himself felt that he was right. This habit seems to have been adopted by him before his advent to public office. His arguments in important legal controversies he has taken no pains to preserve. In one of these, which related to the right of the Suspension Bridge Company at Wheeling to construct their bridge across the Ohio River, his plea is spoken of by those who had the luck to hear it as a most impressive performance, but we have not succeeded in procuring a printed copy of it.

Mr. SWANSON has been twice married. His present wife was Miss ELLEN DICKINSON, of Potosi. He has four children: a son of some twenty-five years by his first marriage; and one son and two daughters, all yet little children, by the second.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

INSIDE
A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XX.

THERE is a certain manner—the nautical name for which the writer has clean forgotten, though he assures the reader he once knew it—by which a vessel is advanced upon its way when steam or tide or wind fall in. Its anchor, with a stout cable attached, is carried forward in one of the ship's boats and hooked on to some rock or iceberg ahead, the other end of the hawser being fastened to the capstan on board. With many a heave-to the crew then ply their strength, as in a slow whirlwind, around the capstan until they and their vessel are drawn to the anchor. The anchor is then again borne forward, and so the operation continued as long as may be necessary.

And in the same way we will bear the anchor of this our bark ahead, and grapple it with this first day of March, 1865, and endeavor to—yes, warp, that is the word—warp ourselves up to that point; for, though all the world else moves, Somerville has seemed sorely to lack, so far as advance is concerned, of steam and tide—not of wind, only it has been perpetually shifting.

Great events have befallen since Dr. Gimna's house was burned—many of them.

Vicksburg. The Somerville Star had acknowledged, after the fall of New Orleans, that the Mississippi River, Fort Pillow and Memphis having fallen, was open along its whole length to Federal navigation. Only a few days after its article in proof that this, so far from being an advantage, would be, like the capture of New Orleans, a positive disadvantage to the Federals, Vicksburg and Port Hudson are known to have suddenly arrested the navigation of the river, at which, with singular inconsistency, the Star greatly rejoices. Then follows the long story—oh, how long and weary in the slow telling!—of the assault upon Vicksburg and the repulse. The episodic capture of Arkansas Post, though Somerville has accounts for weeks after that event of the escape on their way up the river, and their march across Tennessee to join Bragg, of the prisoners there taken. Next comes the wearisome digging of the famous canal, and its failure, proving that hydraulics and hydrography are greatly neglected parts of civil engineering as taught at West Point. Great rejoicing in Somerville over that. Then comes Grant's desperate march around and regular investment of Vicksburg, at which also Somerville greatly rejoices.

"With Johnston in front of him, and Pemberton in his rear cutting off his escape to the river, we regard the annihilation or capture of Grant's entire army as a positive certainty," says the Somerville Star for weeks. "As to starving out Vicksburg, we happen to know it to be victualled for a two years' siege."

A SMALL SCENE.

Then follow tidings of the fall of Vicksburg. This is scouted with scorn. For weeks after, it is amazing how many gentlemen arrive, not in Somerville, but in its immediate neighborhood, who "are known to have left Vicksburg on the tenth or fifteenth of July, the place not having fallen then, nor having the least intention so to do."

Even when Vicksburg and Port Hudson are known to be captured—"We see only cause of congratulation in it," says the Somerville Star. "First, because of the tremendous loss—one hundred and fifty thousand is the lowest estimate—of the Federals in capturing those points; second, because it will occupy a large part of their army to garrison those places; third, in that guerrilla bands will as effectually prevent the navigation of the river as before!"

Yes, there is the singular fact. We Secessionists may attach infinite importance to an Object, may wait in most intense anxiety to know the result in regard to it, deny the capture of it indignantly for weeks after it has fallen, yet the instant it is known to be undoubtedly gone we care no more for it, wonder we should ever have interested ourselves so much in New Orleans, Vicksburg and Port Hudson, Chattanooga, Atlanta, Savannah, Mobile, whatever the object is in its turn; can even see now, are astonished we did not see it before, that the loss of each such place is on every account rather an advantage than a disadvantage to us. Not merely in words only or in editorials—to some degree actually in heart it is so! No doubt there is, with the occurrence of each disaster to the Confederate arms, a secret undermining going on in the understanding and heart of each even of the most rabid Secessionists, but it is unacknowledged at this period even to themselves. In exactly the same way, Dr. Gimna, swelling and bursting to-day with some wonderful news of Foreign Intervention, Confederate Victory, and the like, abandons it to-morrow when it is known to be false, not only without much regret, but scarcely remembering even that he ever heard, much less believed, in any thing of the kind.

"But who," says Mr. Ferguson, "can reason in regard to insanity, or analyze infatuation? There is something even awful in it," he adds; "a supernatural folly at which I shudder, as at the direct doing of Jehovah."

At which point Mr. Arthur corrects his friend by drawing distinction between the positive and the permissive providence of Heaven—a distinction lost upon the Scotchman, who quotes the case of Pharaoh and the children of Israel to a frightful degree in these days.

But even while we are scolding the lying rumors of the fall of Vicksburg all Somerville is electrified by tidings of the glorious victories of General Lee in Pennsylvania. The bells can not ring enough after the dispersion of the Pennsylvania militia and the capture of forty thousand prisoners at Gettysburg. Brother Barker has been entrapped by false news so often by this time that he is far from being as credulous as of yore, yet, "Do you imagine General Lee would have crossed the Potomac if he did not know what he was about? Believe it; yes, brethren, with all my soul!" For who can resist, if it is only the big bell of his own church, to which little Joe Staples clings, with brief relays for refreshment, for hours at a time? And so, when he can have the bell so long enough for him to be heard in special prayer, as on Sabbath, Brother Barker leaves all doubt in regard to his patriotism far behind.

It was a singular coincidence that Orange, plowing in his master's field, and Jim at work with his axe in the woods near Somerville, both paused from their labors at the first sound of the bells with about the same exclamation upon their lips.

"Dar's had news for us!" They, and, of their colored friends, not they alone, had made about the same remark once or twice before at the sound of distant explosions, taking them to be cannon for victory. These reports, however, had turned out to be only the blowing up—quite a common incident—accidentally, of powder-mills and all therein—no mistake about the bells, however.

Not that, returning to Mr. Barker, his has been an altogether untroubled course. Like other eminent confessors in all ages he has had his troubles also. Many, among the best of his church, have long ceased to attend thereat. There is Mrs. Juggins.

"No, Brother Barker, I can't do it. It was bad enough to see you, a preacher of the Gospel of peace, marchin' along, as I see you that day in Somerville, with a gun on your shoulder, member of a company, practicing, too, with them at a mark, I'm told! But for a disciple of the blessed Jesus to preach and pray as you do is more'n I can stand. Not only it is nothin' but politics, politics all the time with you in the pulpit and out of it—no Gospel; but, then, you've been there than Staples or Larsen, actually blood-thirsty an' bitter. God, He knows I love my country. I gave Tom for it, didn't I? Please God, I hope the Yankees may be whipped back where they come from. If they ain't, it won't be for want of prayin' for it here South!"

"All the Union people have ceased to come to church long ago, and to support the ministry," begins her spiritual leader.

"Can't help it, Brother," says Mrs. Juggins, firmly; "the Colonel and I is getting old; since Tom was killed, too, I've seen things different. The Confederacy gainin' its independence is a great thing, I dare say; but religion here, the makin' a better world after this, is a better thing still. Dare say you have no idea how you've stopped preachin' and prayin' any thing but the Confederacy. And look at it. The Sabbath-school there in Somerville is broken up, they tell me. Except on some grand political occasion, they say you've only a handful to hear you. Then you know better'n I how many of the very pillars of our church, ministers even, some of them, has taken to drinkin', cursin', and swearin', swindlin', and all manner of wickedness. As to sinners, they are farther off than ever; and who's to blame?"

Yes, Brother Barker has a hard time of it as well as Mr. Arthur. Somehow his salary is very slow in being paid, what little is promised, the reliance he placed upon his Secessionist admirers in this matter being exceedingly mistaken; ready enough they are to crowd his church on every political occasion to hear, and to inflame and inflame by their presence the violence of sermons and prayers for the South.

"If the Almighty does not give victory to General Lee in this his march upon our wicked foe, the very angels of heaven will be ready to revolt," he had remarked one Sabbath morning in a sermon. Who could say more than that? Yet the subscription paper circulated the very day after on his behalf was far from as successful as it should have been. "We all greatly admire, esteem, approve Brother Barker's course—no man in all Somerville more patriotic and useful than he—yet the war has cut our means down so, and we have really so very many calls every week connected with the war, that we can not say at this moment what we can give, Brother; we will think upon it, however, and let you know."

"No, Sir, you must excuse me," Captain Simmons remarked when applied to. "True, I was early instructed to worship in the sanctuary, and I could at this moment repent to you, sing to you to its own tune, the hymn 'Away, away; away, away to Sabbath-school.' True, I do drop in to hear the person when he gives us a red-hot sermon, prayers, and all the trimmings, on the times. But I can not disguise the fact that he is a—Yankee. My soul revolts at a Yankee and—you must excuse me."

There was the shameful way, also, in which Brother Barker was treated on his last visit to the Pines. The preacher is exceedingly averse to speaking of it, but it seems a camp of soldiers stationed there have varied their monotonous routine of slaughtering such fat heaves, and stealing such poultry and honey as they can lay hands upon, by insulting, hustling, throwing clubs at Brother Barker on his last appointment. Not on Union principles at all—from sheer contempt of a religion which has ceased to owe them in reference to things spiritual in its superhuman exertions to instruct and excite them in reference to the Confederacy.

Very slowly, indeed, the truth comes out in regard to the Gettysburg affair. Somerville has placed all its hopes on a long succession of heroes, dropping them in turn as easily as it has done great cities; for the time, even General Lee has slattered on the earth from his pedestal. The tide and flow of feeling during those days among Secessionists and Union people—the one class being in the trough exactly at the instant the other is on the crest of the sea—who can describe!

Neither can be described the intense eagerness of Mr. Arthur, Dr. Warner, Mr. Ferguson, and all other Union people—it is amazing how many of them are left in Somerville still—for Federal papers. Colonel Gay Brooks, not a written line from him since he left, contrives to get papers to friends in Somerville. Isaac Smith, painter, too, little he cared for literature of any sort, still less his big and better-making wife; now the zeal with which Isaac Smith, from within the Federal lines, pours in letters and papers upon his wife is wonderful. Mrs. Smith's little parlor sees, and sees very often too, visitors it never dreamed of before. Let fat Mrs. Smith get a package as large as your hand at night—and her mails almost invariably arrived at that period—how soon to-morrow she had a dozen applications from friends to know the news. And a great deal of news Isaac Smith managed to smuggle in; only, alas! Isaac, from long use perhaps of his brush, gave too much—a little proving to be true. For, let the truthful record be made, we Union people in Somerville are almost as credulous in regard to the news we wish to be true as are the Secessionists—not quite, but almost.

"DIDN'T I TELL YOU SO?"

But, ah, the eagerness with which we clutch a paper from the North! We get it as a great favor, to be read as rapidly as possible, to be returned exactly at such an hour to such a place. We button it up in our breast-pocket, and hurry home, for we dare not be seen with it on the streets. Arrived at home, we arrest all the household work, turn the children ignominiously out of the room with terrible threats in case they come in again, which, by-the-by, they are sure to do a dozen times during the reading on pressing emergencies which can not be postponed a moment; and so we carefully unfold and read the precious paper aloud to wife or sister, to say nothing of all the Union people in the neighborhood cautiously summoned in to hear. The editorials, dispatches, items, advertisements of hair oil, and the like—with greedy hunger we let no morsel or crumb of the paper escape us. In spite of all the effort we make, a dozen readers or two have had the document before us, as dozens will, eagerly wondering why we can not remember that others want the paper as well as ourselves and get through with it after us. In consequence of this, the paper is painfully illegible at the folds; we have, in the course of the most interesting articles, to stop and puzzle around the chinks, often to take a flying leap over them and proceed. The little scraps of patriotic poetry, here and there, we often memorize even. And so the paper circulates till it is read, literally read, to shreds.

There was Everett's speech at the Dedication at Gettysburg. Could the orator have imagined the zest with which his words there spoken would have been read from soiled and worn-out sheets by thousands at the South his soul would have burned with sublimer enthusiasm than any awakened in him by the audience then visible to his eye. Who of us forgets the keen enjoyment with which we read our first fairy tales in childhood's sweet hour—not so keen, so delicious that gratification as the reading, during the war, of all thoroughly American matter oozing in to us, parched with thirst, from abroad. The circulation through Somerville of one good paper of the kind did all the Union people—for if one individual thereof read it, every soul did or had it repeated to him—evident good for weeks to come. Perhaps the shortness of the allowance—as with food doled out to the wrecked at sea—increased its value, months often elapsing between the ration. Let us keep secret the absolute faith even Mr. Ferguson placed in the least assertions of a Northern paper, his belief herein as absolute and sweeping as was his unbelief in reference to the Somerville Star and all its kind. And, as men build a moral tablet into the wall of an edifice with due inscription, permit the inscription here of this profound truth, that in very much every sense of the word human nature at the North and the South is exactly the same; with superficial differences we are at last One people.

The fall of Vicksburg and Port Hudson and the victory at Gettysburg send the Union people of Somerville quite up upon the crest of the ever-rolling sea, and—Mr. Ellis, Dr. Ginnis, lowest of all—the Secessionists down into the trough thereof for months to come.

"I tell you, Lamum," Dr. Peel says to the editor of the Somerville Star, telling away cold, pale, steady as ever in his business of lying by power-press, ever consistent in falsehood whatever news Bill Perkins brings in his budget—"I tell you, man, one screw loose in the machinery of the Confederate Government is the way the Post-office is managed. What awaits all you say in your paper so long as there is a perpetual stream of private letters coming in to the contrary? Federal papers, too, these Union people are constantly getting them; letters, also, from friends in the Federal lists—such things provision them, so to speak, to hold out. If a few more of them could be barged—!"

But this last remedy has been so thoroughly tried—not actually in Somerville, as yet, but all around it. There was Mrs. Isaac Smith's teacher, John Jennings. Who did not know him? Gray-headed with fifty years of farming—farming with his own hard hands alone these days, his boys being in the Confederate service, and he owing no negroes.

"You see, Mr. Arthur," Mrs. Isaac Smith says to that individual, who harrises to see her—is she not a member of his church?—on hearing of the catastrophe, "they knew John was a Union man. He tried to help its being known, but he couldn't. Not that he said anything. He made a point to stay close at home—never opened his lips. But he was my brother, you know, and my husband being gone that was enough. Every once in a while he'd come down from his place—fifteen miles, you know, it is from here—to bring me a little butter, or cheese, or wheat, whatever happened he could spare. Ever since Jim Bolden waylaid and shot down his own brother-in-law, Mr. Tanner—they do say Mrs. Tanner, his sister, who is a bitter Secessionist, actually got her brother Jim up to it—ever since Tanner was found lying dead in the road with a ball through his head for being a Union man, John has been careful as a man could be. Letters from Isaac! How could John get letters from Isaac? As God hears me, Sir, John never saw one that I didn't show him. But you've heard the story; I have no heart to tell it, hardened as I'm getting to almost any thing. A party of a dozen of them broke into his house at midnight: said to his daughters, poor things! screaming around, they only wanted to take him to Somerville to be conscripted. Sarah, the eldest, knew better; she clung to him till they tore her off, some of them holding her to the wall while they tied John's hands. As they were dragging him out, Sarah she begged and screamed only to be let give him—her gray-headed old father—one last kiss; they wouldn't let her do even that, the man holding her saying things—Can you make yourself believe, Sir, that such a thing can be true in this Christian land?" says Mrs. Smith, speaking more slowly, exhausted with weeping till not a tear is left, emotion itself worn out from exercise so intense and so long. "Sarah here in the next room could tell you herself. They dragged that offending old man—lived fifteen years in the neighborhood—out of his house, mounted their horses, and rode off at full speed, holding the end of the rope. Of course when he couldn't run he was dragged. Sarah tracked him next day by the bits of his clothes on the brush till she lost the trail over the rocks. No one but her, and she not twelve years old, near night she finds her father at last. They had hung him by the neck from a blackjack. God knows whether it was because they intended it, or because they did not know how to tie the rope so as to strangle, but he was warm yet when she came upon him. He had been hanging there in struggle and agony full fifteen hours. Sarah she had never thought to bring a knife—just think if you can of that poor young thing working there—"

But here there is loud crying from the next room of the little house—Sarah has been wakened from her slumber of exhaustion by her aunt, who has forgotten in her excitement that her niece is asleep there.

"We must get used to it, man; like things, in all varieties of British wickedness, are taking place every hour," says Mr. Ferguson, to whom Mr. Arthur has been telling the story. "The National Government will not or can not help us. For His own wise purpose the Almighty is leaving us to ourselves."

"But to me the strangest part of the infatuation of these men around us," says Mr. Arthur, walking the floor of Mr. Ferguson's room like a caged leopard, "is that they do not seem to understand exactly where Dr. Warner and you and I and all other Union men of Somerville—and I know of more and more of them every day—actually stand. Do you suppose Mr. Ellis, Captain Simmons, Bob Withers, Ginnis, the Lamums, and the rest know that there is not an individual at the North, in the Federal army, in the Cabinet at Washington—not Lincoln himself more thoroughly, intently, absolutely—"

"Sh-sh-sh, man, not so loud!" says cautious Mr. Ferguson.

"And expect me actually to pray for the success—"

"We must beware of becoming too excited. It is our duty to exercise the patience and meekness of the Gospel," remonstrates the Scotchman at some length, whose feelings never assume the form of wrath, only of intense bitterness and contempt. "Beware of becoming a Brother Barker, or only on the opposite side," adds this grizzled mentor.

And it strikes this Telemachus that night, ruminating, Testament in hand, in his room at Mrs. Sorel's, that he is sliding down into a condition to be alarmed at. He blames Mr. Barker, Mr. Ellis, and the rest—for what? For leaving the Gospel and the moderation of the Gospel behind them; for ceasing to have main reference to things spiritual, and becoming far too intensely interested in things of this world. Wonder if I am not doing the very same thing? he thinks. If they are too excited for what they call their country, am not I for what I regard as mine? True, there is a wicked rebellion; my interest is in my country, in which is involved civilization, freedom, the Gospel itself—And all he can conclude is to set more rigorous watch upon his heart, out of which are all interperate deeds, words, thoughts, feelings—the issues of life. For grace to do which he prays there and then. Only there is the same sense of exhaustion in prayer that there is in reading the Scripture and in preaching. Leading the life of a parish with most in Somerville every day, so little encouragement, every emotion in such perpetual and intense play—thought, fervor on the strain—insufficiency of actual labor to give relief—exhaustion.

And Alice? If she was a thousand miles away now! God forbid—she is all of hope he has. Yet, like the Princess of Fairy Tale, alive to her lover in all her charms, yet inclined beyond any thing but mere sight in adamantine crystal.

Oh yes, yes, of course, the writer knows all that fully as well as the reader; but Mr. Arthur, though he ought to have done so, doubtless did not. It is the easiest thing in the world for you to say how you would have gone boldly to her like a man; how you would, and long ago, have had a perfectly frank and full conversation with herself, and, if necessary, with her mother. You have a consent for this Mr. Arthur for waiting, hoping, fearing so long. Very well; letter despise him for cowardice in the matter than that the one who pens these lines should despise himself for telling a falsehood in the matter. "If I was Alexander I would do so and so," said Hephæstion. "And so would I were I Hephæstion," replied Alexander. You have, dear reader, first to be Mr. Arthur, defers and all, and then to be exactly in Mr. Arthur's rather peculiar position, before you can decide how he should have acted.

"We so-called Union people here in Somerville are like—Bye we I do not mean to include you, Miss Alice," says Mr. Arthur to her one day. "I have made his semi-six-months' call at Mrs. Bowles's, and find that lady away from home assisting down-town in the preparations for a supper in behalf of the sick soldiers—the proceeds somehow never reaching them in its transit through so very many hands—very little at least—and that paper-money into which the specie paid in has become singularly transmuted. We dare not stop to ask whether, before calling at Mrs. Bowles's, Mr. Arthur knew or not of that lady's absence. How could he, in that case, have conscientiously asked Miss Alice if her mother was at home?"

"The Union people in and around Somerville," he repeats, having corrected himself from daring to class his fair friend among them, "are like the early Christians."

"In purity of purpose or in degree of persecution?" asks Alice, looking up—what beautiful eyes! thinks her visitor—from her sewing. Was ever woman lovelier? demands Mr. Arthur of himself, warming himself in her presence after long dwelling among winds and frosts and icebergs without.

"It was of their kindly feeling toward each other that I spoke," says he. "Not a day I do not hear of some charitable and generous deed. You have long heard of old Mr. Adams—"

"Is it not strange that so large a slaveholder should be a Union man? You know he openly avows it," says Alice.

"He is far from being the only slaveholder—" begins Mr. Arthur, but prudently halts. "He has had the reputation heretofore of being rather—rather—"

"A penurious old gentleman," supplies Alice, demurely. "Proverbially so, I fear."

"Well, his corn-cribs, fodder-stacks, smoke-houses, grain-bins, poultry-yard seem to have ceased to be his own this last year. He gives away as freely as water. People send out their wagons, and help themselves as a matter of course. Provided, you know—"

"The applicant be thoroughly disloyal—to the Confederacy I mean," says Alice with, did ever woman have so sweet a smile since Eve was created? says Mr. Arthur, to himself. "Oh, yes," she continues, "Mr. Neely was telling me of it when he was here last night; no, it was when he was here last week. He tells me the Union people are more like one family dwelling over town in different houses—what belongs to one belongs to all. I happened to pass Mrs. Isaac Smith's this morning, and I noticed no less than three wagons unloading sacks of something—pigs, turkeys, chickens, corn—almost every thing, and next two immense ox teams going in that direction with wood as I came away."

Like one family? More loving with each other than the members of families generally are. Those of the Union people in Somerville who did not even know of each other's names or existence had long now become well acquainted. Long before this had old quarrels between such of these as had been at variance ceased. No distinction of occupation, denomination, property between these any longer. Treated with contempt, at least coldness, by all Secessionists, Union people can not even pass each other on the street without stopping to shake hands. On the most frivolous pretenses, and on none at all, they are visiting each other, especially when "disastrous news" is afloat, all the day. The very children of Union parents confidently expect now, when they pass him on the street, as much of a smile as Mr. Ferguson ever manages to radiate through his beard. As to that, more than once or twice has sober little Robby Sorel come home laden with gifts from men he has met in town of whom he only knows that they asked his name.

And how Mr. Arthur cherishes, hidden among his sermons, letters of encouragement, anonymous, homely signed, drop-letters from persons in Somerville, long letters from strangers living far away. Letters in which the writers venture decided opinions in reference to current events in guarded language, but with such an air of being arrived at on the part of the writers after much thought, and as original and remarkable discoveries as makes Mr. Arthur smile. The plain country people that take Mr. Arthur cautiously to one side when they meet him, and look to him, in exceedingly prolix and round-about way, their views, or ride out, introduce themselves, and spend the night at Mrs. Sorel's to do the same, each displaying his devotion to the Union and his execration for the Confederacy from within a hundred wrappings, like a precious jewel peculiar to the speaker's self. And the delight, too, mingled with fears that he may not be prudent as he should be, of the new friend when he finds Mr. Arthur, with exactly the same opinions, so very decided and clear.

Not plain people, obscure and quiet only.

"Parson Arthur, hold up a minute, I want to say a word to you," says Bob Withers, whom Mr. Arthur meets face to face on horseback in a sequestered spot near Somerville. And Mr. Arthur complies, but with very cold manner, for, like almost every man of his class in Somerville, Mr. Withers is very shy of Mr. Arthur in public; Mr. Arthur, therefore, is doubly shy of him. But Bob's open, cordial face is irresistible.

"I've wanted to speak to you for a long time. But in strict confidence, by George! mind—in strict confidence, Parson. You look pale and worn, and go about Somerville looking as if you didn't have a friend there. I wanted to tell you it's a mistake—you've plenty, only we don't like just now, by George! to show it. You just hold out, Parson, that's what you've got to do, hold out! I ain't a professor myself, as you well know, though if I don't get to heaven at last it's a poor chance for most Christians, by George! I know. When this thing come about, do you suppose I didn't know as well as you and Brooks and the rest it was a piece of the most infernal folly? What could a fellow do, by George? We were in it, you see. But it's worse than I ever thought it could be. Worse? The lying, swindling, shuffling, stealing, murdering, no-iver-sat scandalism! Oh, never mind, by George! You only hold out—that's what I say, hold out! And if you think I don't know as well as you that this whole thing is harrying, like every other spree, damn bang to eternal smash, you are just, by George! mistaken. Yes, Sir—"

And Mr. Arthur does not see his way clear to refuse the double eagle Bob Withers insists upon leaving with him as a token of regard when they part at last. As to that, no one can write a letter or speak a word, "in confidence between us, Sir," without doing something of the same kind. Though Brother Barker even would have been almost satisfied with the coldness with which Bob Withers and Mr. Arthur pass each other on the street the very next day.

In fact Bob Withers is very far from being the only prominent Secessionist of whom Mr. Arthur could have told some singular things if he had wished. But who dare say what is done toward this by Vicksburg, Port Hudson, and Gettysburg?

Even the grand old Major seems to look down more benignantly than of old from his frame, this spring morning of eighteen hundred and sixty-four, upon Mr. Arthur chewing himself in the society of the Major's daughter. Very dignified and reserved indeed the visitor intended to be when he found, so very unexpectedly, that he must be entertained by the daughter instead of the mother. It was, after all formal inquiries in reference to Rutledge Bowles, at whose name both color simultaneously; after being fully informed in reference to Mrs. Bowles's health, whom he already knows to have become greener, thinner, more nervous than ever from what he has casually heard and seen of her; after Alice has volunteered to speak of the school she is intending to keep, after all this and a little old music too, that Mr. Arthur, slipping from sheer force of habit, permits himself to speak of politics by the reference to the kindness among Union people.

He ventures, Mrs. Sorel and Robby being mentioned, to tell how the latter is advancing in his studies. Nor can he resist the inclination by this time to relate how Robby was assailed for about the hundredth time on his last errand into Somerville by Joe Staples. But Mr. Arthur refrains from mentioning the artillery of Yankee, free negro, Abolitionist, traitor, and a good deal worse with which Robby was assailed. That he and every child of every Union parent had long ago become accustomed to, though it took a long time before Robby could endure being named as an Abolitionist, that being something ingrained into him as far worse than any other epithet in the world—the quintessence of all abuse. But when Joe Staples actually seized upon the bride of Robby's pony, and would not let the child pass till he had been sufficiently cursed, nothing being left for it, Robby slipped off his pony, left him to his fate, and pitched in, dense little fellow as he was, with his neat jeans suit and his hair fresh from his mother's brush, and with the sudden ferocity unknown to his mother and himself under surface of his sober sense, gave Joe Staples such a drubbing as increases tenfold Staples Senior's hatred for the Union people, and causes Mr. Ellis to caution his Charley that night at table against ever associating with a boy so desperately depraved as Robby Sorel.

"And she to set herself off from every body, and pretend to be so very strict with her children!" says Mrs. Ellis from her bed in the next room. "You hear what I say, children! If ever I know of your associating yourselves with them—"

And so on, and so on.

"Do you know," says Alice, at last, "that Mrs. Warner and Mr. Ellis, and the others who have withdrawn from the church, are greatly offended that you never have called even to see them since they withdrew?"

"And when they have urged me so often to do so, too," adds her visitor, reflecting her smile. "Would you have me do so, Alice—Miss Alice?"

What a nameless charm in the very parting of her hair, in the plain collar around her neck, in the flow of her calico dress—see she has had now four years if he only knew it—a divine grace, a heavenly sweetness! After so long, long a period, too, of anxiety, disappointment, alienation from a hundred friends! Of course he exaggerated her, idealized, apotheosized—just as we must not trust what is said of holy travelers fresh from long and bitter travel is crossing the Alps. So rapidly and thoroughly has this lover thawed, beyond all his recollection when he first bowed to her, on principle not even shaking hands with her on his first coming! Five minutes more, and, having but all resolve to the contrary as if it had never been, Mr. Arthur will have learned his fate. A discourse infinitely more impassioned and eloquent than he had ever favored her with from the pulpit already burns on his lips, when—the big bell of Brother Barker's church first, then, clanging in as for their places in a procession, one by one, every bell in Somerville! Really and truly it was the great, hidden, unacknowledged movement, from the recent Federal successes, which had thrown these two thus so close together. At the first blow made by Joe Staples—yet still from his drubbing but a martyr to the cause—upon the big bell, these two are far apart. His fault, his, not hers!

And here are Mrs. Bowles and Mr. Neely. Great news, glorious news! From the South west of the Mississippi this time. Banks is captured at Mansfield, eight hundred wagons, fifty cannon, innumerable prisoners, all the gun-boats and transports; not the least doubt but the next mail will bring accounts of the capture or destruction of the last vestige of the Federal force. Slight, pallid, enthusiastic Mrs. Bowles! She strives, even in the excess of her joy, to be quiet from habitual refinement, but fairly rolines with exultation. And Mr. Neely! Getting quite fat, physically as well as pecuniarily, upon his counterfeiting, he is rosy as morning, rubbing his hands, pulling down his waistcoat, jubilant in every curl of his hair, in every motion of his body, for he can not sit still! If any thing was needed to bring his cup it was meeting Mr. Arthur in just that parlor on just that occasion. Even the old Major overhead beams upon them in grander proportions, struggling in his frame to speak.

And just at this juncture it is that Brother Barker makes that fatal mistake of his. The Somerville Star is full of the news. Tim Lamm and Bob Withers shake hands over it—alienated during three months before from something rising out of poker. Dr. Pool has read the dispatches aloud in a dozen crowds, with running oaths of confirmation. Even Bill Perkins, fallen back into a mere stage-driver on account of Confederate disservice he has been bringing so long, with vague sense on the part of the people that he is somehow to blame for them, is treated till he can not stand. Dr. Ginnis, inflated, from the shabbiest collapse, in five minutes, by the news, to his fullest former proportion, is up and down every street, in and out of every store in the place, slapping his hands together, drawing back his sleeves, whooping but irrespirable, gesticulating though he can not speak.

There is Mrs. Warner; from some sudden whirl, given by the Confederate disasters, she has been prophesying defeat and ruin to the South for weeks on weeks now. Not a bit less vituperative. She plies her staff-stick as energetically as ever, denouncing the swindling, stealing, lying officials of the Confederacy, their cowardice and inaction! She does not stop with, "We are whipped—whipped, I tell you!" but even adds, "And I'm glad of it, because I hope the Federals will catch and hang these miserable fellows loading about with their stripes and ambulances and things, when they ought to be off at the front, as they call it, fighting!" All of which falls incessant upon Dr. Warner, who droops his head and takes it, conscious of being in some general way guilty of it all himself. Even if he is halder these days, what he loses in hair he makes up in flesh—a storm-bent man, but used to the squall and gust. The instant Dr. Warner could tell his wife this last news, before he had got it half out of his lips, his wife had snatched her footstool and thump, and thrust the former within half an inch of his nose.

"Didn't I tell you so, Dr. Warner? I want you to tell me that this instant! Didn't I tell you so? Didn't I tell you, over and over and over again, we would whip them yet? Always croaking!—selling me about your Gostybergs and Vicksbergs till I was sick of the sound! And you a pious man—at least, pretend to be, and doubt that God is a just Being! Wanted me to laugh at Brother Barker."

Which brings us back to the fatal mistake made by that clergyman when the news comes of Banks's repulse.

"I hope so, I hope so!" he says, having hold of Mr. Ellis's hand, with peculiarly mournful intonation of the word "hope"; "but I fear not. We have been so often deceived—I myself, on one occasion—by mere idle rumors. You, as a Christian, will understand me when I say I see the hand of Satan, the Father of Lies, often put forth these days. For some inscrutable purpose, always against the best and holiest of causes; but," adds Brother Barker, with a sorrowful shake of his head, "we are not ignorant of his devices. I hope so, Brother Ellis, but I fear not, fear not."

Even Mr. Ferguson, peering the dispatches as they come into his Scrap-book—with grim unbelief upon the surface of his beard, though sincerest apprehension is tugging at its roots—even Mr. Ferguson might have admired the sorrowful, not to say morose, disbelief in the glorious tidings by Brother Barker, as he shakes himself away, with boiling head and sorrowful hand, through the crowds upon the streets.

Long ago, like all his class, his chiefest associations have been, especially on the street, with striped officials and brass-buttoned heroes. He may be talking with Sam Peters about his bad fall from his horse, awfully exaggerated by Sam; or with Smithers, also a member of his church, about Mrs. Smithers's last worthless runaway of a cook; even with Mrs. Warner, who regularly attends his church now, and always bewails Mr. Arthur's course in conversation with her now pastor—whatever it is with whom he is speaking, but Brother Barker but catch sight of a military man passing, or over the street, and, with a hurried excuse, he is off to speak to the son of Mars, or to get an introduction—offer to introduce himself, if unacquainted.

But when this news of our glorious victory over Banks in Louisiana arrives, Brother Barker fails to render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's.

"I hope so, Captain Simmons—hope so," he says, steadily resisting the universal Faith and Joy, gently deprecating it, with open hand, as a father among his thoughtless children—"but I fear not, f-a-r not!"

And this illustrates just what Mr. Neely so bitterly bewails—the deep-seated, utterly incurable want of faith in even the most thorough-going of Northern-born Secessionists on the part of Southern-born men.

"Gentlemen, you see that person who has just left us," says Captain Simmons, full of solemn joy, and something else, over the news, his left arm around a friendly post; "Rev. [sic] Mr. [sic] Barker, resi-resident clergy-clergyman of this common-munity. Did you ob- [sic]—observe the statement he imparted to me [sic]? We having full-foldest dispatches of a glor-glorious achiev-y-achievement, he, that [sic] individual, doubts it, gently-gentleman, doubts 'it'!" (Intense scorn.) "But do you con-jecture-conjecture the reason? A Yankee! I admit he tells hard [sic] to hide it—very hard.

It will come out. Not a Yankee in [sic] the whole Confed-y-Confederacy this day [sic] but is a double traitor—traitor to his own sick-sack-section, and a traitor to [sic] us. My earliest infidelity was, I may say, sat-sat-saturated with reverence for the clock. But that Yankee, Bob-Barker, I revolt from. To those of his birth I apply the language of the—the hymn: 'Touch not, taste not, handle not!'

Is it reasonable, therefore, to wonder at the frantic effort made by Brother Barker to right himself, when it is established beyond all doubt that Banks has really been repulsed? Eager as Mr. Ferguson and the rest of the Union people are to stave off that conviction, strange to say, the fact of the affair breaks at last upon them not more against their wishes than it does upon the preacher against his! Frantic effort! Brother Barker finds Prophecy which bears direct upon it. In the course of a sermon on the golden image which Nebuchadnezzar set up, after proving that the erection of the Washington Monument at Washington City, being as palpable an idolatry as in the case of the Babylonish king, was doubtless the grand sin for which the South was chastised, Brother Barker gave in his painful experience as an unbeliever in reference to the late news. With tears he made a clean breast of it:

"As lack of faith, brethren, in Kirby Smith, it was no sin; as lack of faith in Heaven, pledged by all its attributes to the cause of the South, it was a great sin. Pardon your most unworthy speaker"—bowed head, wet eyes, handkerchief. "And as this very moment, while I stand here before you"—handkerchief dropped on the desk, arms extended at their full length upward, eyes upon the ceiling above the pulpit, look hair falling back from the head bowed backward—"the angels in heaven, seraphic Stonewall Jackson towering among them, all who have gonethither by mill—thousands from our glorious battle-fields, all heaven!"—extended arms farther extended to take it all in—"from innumerable harp rings Jubilee over our victory at Mansfield!" Speaker stationary for a moment in thrilling tableau; then slowly-falling eyes, then hands, then head.

"But"—handkerchief, sip of water, tone fallen from ecstasy to commonplace—"let us note, in the fourth place, who are destroyed by the Furnace Flames." Which proves in some way to have been the Federal Government.

If we think we can depart when the sermon is over we are mistaken. Brother Barker—very hoarse—has been, as we brethren may be aware, in attendance last week at the regular semi-annual meeting of our Church in the State. A full attendance, as we are happy to know. Subject of the support of the ministers; fully dwelt upon this by the preacher. One or two other matters before we come to the main business done by said meeting, brethren.

And here Brother Barker proceeds to read in his best manner a Whereas, with ten resolutions thereupon, passed unanimously at said meeting, in enthusiastic eulogy, exaltation, prophecy, in reference to the Confederate Government in general, and one or two Major-Generals in particular—the well-known morals, or rather immorals, of said individuals causing their names to have an odd sound, as of Saul among the Prophets, in that connection.

One thing more—the collection for Brother Barker's support.

"Not that you do not mean well by putting in Confederate money, dear brethren," the preacher mildly expostulates as the hats go around; "not that I will not gladly do all in my power to sustain the currency. But you know as well as I that it rates only at twenty for one. Even at that, people, I grieve to say, will not touch it when they can possibly avoid it. Of their gold and silver Scriptures invariably represents the generous as contributing; it is surely of our dear that we should give to the House of the Lord. Understand me, brethren, not that I—"

SOUTHERN PICTURES.

Our artist gives the following description of the sketches which we publish on pages 328 and 329:

ROCK AND LITTLE ROCK.

"Little Rock, the capital of Arkansas, seems to thrive pretty well, notwithstanding that business is dull and likely to remain so till the prospects of this year's crop are decided. There is stationed at this place the Nineteenth Regular Infantry and the Third Cavalry, as well as some colored troops on the other side of the river. The Quarter-masters and Commissaries are reducing their departments, and the extensive army hospital around the Masonic College is almost deserted. Labor is in demand, and all the industries colored population are doing well. There is less of squall among the race here than elsewhere. Military occupation is a fact which every where starts one in the face; and the defensive lines that surround the city are still comparatively perfect.

Big Rock is two or three miles above Little Rock on the opposite side of the river, although after crossing the ferry at the latter place it takes a round of ten miles to reach the former. The Arkansas River makes here a pretty reach, the bluff called Big Rock being a good feature in the picture. The river is not usually so high as represented in the two cuts on page 328.

CHEYANNE AT WATCH HOOKS.

"This terrible break in the levee, over a mile in length, has flooded a hundred miles of the country, and is pushing out to the ocean by way of Berwick Bay. Planters all along the route taken by the waters have no hopes of a crop this year. Fields of cane, cotton, and corn, flourishing well before, are now under the flood—which, without hindrance, is pouring over the low lands to the beyond beyond. So sudden was the break that, besides overflowing the farms, in some instances drove away the families, who escaped by shifts from the houses, leaving hens, turkeys, and all live-stock to their fate. No attempt has been made to stop the crevasse; and indeed it would be impossible to effect any thing until the river has fallen again, of which there is no immediate prospect. The river is on the right of the sketch on page 329, the break extending from the figures on the levee to flats in the distance."

A Louisiana paper, speaking of this subject, says: "From every part of the State come up, in response to our daily records and warnings, the most touching lamentations because of the overflowing floods. The great crevasses in West Baton Rouge have been abandoned, and the people of that parish, and of Iberville and Point Coupee, driven in great numbers from their homes, many of them to perish miserably. The accumulating waters from these crevasses have also filled up the neighboring bays and basins so that a large portion of the Atchafalaya country is already flooded, and the people have fled to the highlands. And now, in the midst of all this actual devastation, come sweeping down upon us floods from the Missouri, the Arkansas, Red, and all the other tributaries of the mighty Father of Rivers, threatening to wash away whatever little of dry land is left to us."

WASHINGTON MARKET.

It is a city which boasts the best markets of the world as regards the excellence of the commodities offered for sale in them it is shameful that these markets should be, of all others, the most filthy in their surroundings and the meanest in their structure.

For the present necessities of the city their situation is unfavorable. They are not sufficiently central; they were built over a century ago, when they were probably very conveniently located, but now they are in the most commercial quarters of the city, where they are least needed. They are difficult of access, also, on account of the crowded streets. Why can we not have in the more central portion of the island large, clean, and tastefully-constructed markets, such as shall be an ornament to the city instead of being, as now they are, reckoned as nuisances?

Of our large markets Washington Market, of which we give an illustration on page 322, is the oldest. Its first charter dates from 1586—a century before the establishment of our republic, and long before the birth of the illustrious patriot from whom it was afterward named.

SPRING.

Sweet Spring has come, and once again,
O'er hill and plain,
She weaves her carpet soft and green,
In brightest shades of emerald sheen.
With pinks and convexes between;
And lays it down
Where late the white and chilly snow,
So late to go,
Leak'd off and left the earth so brown.

Sweet Spring has come, she wakes again;
For hark! a strain
Of woodland welcome soothly rings;
The air is stir'd with glancing wings,
With crystal pipes and twitterings,
From conscious birds:
While larkskins sporting on the mead,
With velvet tread,
Skip in and out among the herds.

Sweet Spring has come; we through the shade
Of lower and glade
Can trace her pathway in the dark,
By silver glints from larchen bark,
And purpling bud-lights on the stark
And leafless boughs;
Or by the gleams from sunlit streams,
Whose dancing beams
The gentle ferns mistake for vows.

Sweet Spring has come, and in my heart
Its passions start.
Joy's babbling brooklets gaily sing,
Like silver chimes that sweetly ring,
And new-plumed hopes take lighter wing,
And mount above;
Even star-bright eyes and rose lips fair
Spring blooming there,
And promise autumn wealth of love.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

The pedestrians of New York city make no special claim to any "right of way" in the streets. To be sure it is necessary to cross these streets frequently; but care, care, and carriage never seem to regard those who humbly go as foot. No do the "hoovers" expect any such attention. If, by means of dodging behind one vehicle, and before another, and running alongside of a third a while, they succeed in crossing without being crushed, they are simply thankful, and never for an instant cherish the idea that they had the slightest right to be in the street at all.

Moreover, our citizens have unconsciously and grossly surrendered a large portion of the sidewalks, which are generally supposed to be for the special use of pedestrians. Apple-stands, newspaper stalls, and innumerable miniature bazars for various commodities, have long been patiently tolerated. Each by each has the encouragement continued until the majority of second-class shops—to say nothing of many that would refuse to be so called—are literally turned inside out. Pendent rows of slaughtered animals, artlessly arranged over terraces of potatoes and turnips, signal a market within. The corner grocery sign extends far and wide in the shape of boxes of hard soap, coils of dried apples, and baskets of lemons and pears; while one's head is not infrequently entangled in the melange of hoop skirts and brilliant-colored bangles and belts which waltzing announces that dry-goods "are sold here" for "less than ever." But New Yorkers bow their heads submissively, best a return if necessary, or pass on.

There is, however, a limit beyond which forbearance ceases to be a virtue. Some of our sidewalks appear to be exclusively used for lumber-rooms and packing places; and immersion through these is next to an impossibility. Pass down Bedman Street, for example, or you can find an equally good (?) specimen in many other directions if you prefer. Boxes, barrels, casks, and bales of goods literally crowd the sidewalks. Bundles of rags, and newspapers, and packages of every conceivable kind of merchandise are stowed, apparently, on the flagstones. A man weighing a hundred and twenty, or a woman with the smallest possible circumspection, would be repulsed by the attempt to squeeze through, to say nothing of garments soiled and rent. But perhaps this is some extraordinary emergency, a mere temporary state of things. Return a couple of hours later, the blockade continues. Come back again to-morrow, or next week, and the sidewalks are as usual in the same condition.

Really it does not seem that it would be unreasonable to mildly suggest that a small passage way be reserved on the sidewalk for those who do not desecrately ride in cars or carriages.

The May Anniversaries appear to have been carried on with unusual spirit and interest this year. This was doubtless due to some measure to the series of bright, sunny days which adorned last week; and which enticed many to venture out who are ordinarily "keepers at home." Among the many meetings of interest, the Anniversary of the Institution of the Deaf and Dumb, that of the Institution for the Blind, and the "Howard Music and Home for Little Wanderers" were especially interesting. Ten thousand dollars were contributed to the latter Society, several gentlemen giving one thousand each. At the reunion of the American Congressional Union, six thousand five hundred dollars were donated, at the instance of General Howard, for the purpose of establishing a church in Washington, where the "truth" should be "outspoken" and "proclaimed aloud."

Of course, during this coming season, all cases of cold, cholera morbus, cholera infantum, dysentery, and of every kindred disease, will be regarded by the establishing masses as instances of genuine Asiatic cholera. Let those who can think be sensible, and avoid while the two extremes—caricatures and fear.

Something like the following is said to be an everyday scene:

"Omnibus crowded. Enter two young ladies of the female profession. Gentleman rising to one of Y. L. V., 'Take this seat, Miss.' No. 2 to lady No. 3. 'You take it, Katy.' No. 2. 'No, you take it, Mary dear.' No. 1. 'Oh no, Katy, I'd rather stand; you sit down.' No. 2. 'No, no; I can just as well stand.' No. 1. 'You had better sit down, Katy.' Swift scolding, men standing crowded, door half-way open, and wind blowing in the street. No. 2. 'Won't you take it?' Well, then, to No. 1. 'You are very kind, Mary dear.' Swift scolding, omnibus drives, girls roll into eye of old gentleman on one side, and jump elbow into hat of young gentleman on the other, and scold. Gentleman who surrendered seat having been utterly ignored in this conversation, vows as he hangs on the conductor's strap, he will never rise again, not for a prince."

The Parisian correspondent of one of our daily journals states that a French workman has just completed for the Duke of Wellington a work of novel and peculiar construction, the idea of which was conceived by the Duke himself, who is well known to be of an impatient temper, and can not pass half an hour in any one's society without feeling an irresistible inclination to look at his watch. This being very impolite the Duke devised an ingenious plan to ascertain the hour without any one present being the wiser for it. The watch manufactured for him is a silent repeater. It is provided with a spring, upon twisting which a small hammer issues from the case and strikes the hour in the palm of the person's hand who holds it. The Duke will merely need to slip his hand casually into his pocket, touch the spring, and he is immediately informed of the time of day. The only difficulty will be that all the papers will publish a description of the trick, and the Duke find it somewhat embarrassing to put his hand in his pocket without having his secret discovered.

The death of Mrs. Carlyle took place under very peculiar circumstances. She was taking her usual afternoon drive in Hyde Park, when her horse favorite dog, which was running by the side of the hearse, was run over by a carriage. She was greatly alarmed, though the dog was not seriously hurt. She lifted the dog into the carriage and the man drove on. Not receiving any call or direction from his mistress, as was usual, he stopped the carriage and dismounted her, so he thought, in a fit or fit, and drove to St. George's Hospital, which was near at hand. When there it was discovered that she must have been dead some time. Mrs. Carlyle's health had been for several months feeble, but not in a state to excite anxiety or alarm. The deceased lady was the daughter of the once well-known Dr. Welch, of Haddington, and, with gifts and grace of her own, she inherited much of the force and penetration of her father's intellect. She was worthy to be the life companion of Thomas Carlyle.

The Cleveland Herald gives an account of a singular case of suspended animation—a trainee of twenty-four hours in duration. A young German, recently married, was taken suddenly ill at his place of business, and in two days was, in all appearance, dead. Arrangements were about to be made for the interment, when the young wife insisted that the funeral be postponed; and she remained in the room with the supposed corpse, clinging to the idea that he could not be dead. She became convinced that she perceived the body move. Her friends became anxious about her reason and tried to divert her mind from the sorrowful scene. Two long hours were spent in conversation, the friends urging that she was deceived, possibly by the flickering light. Then, suddenly, another slight movement was perceived by all, and the scene which followed may be imagined. The husband and wife are now living, well and happy.

By a series of interesting experiments, lately made, a woman's tongue has been found capable of moving one thousand times hundred and twenty times in a minute. Think of that, all ye who argue that woman is inferior to man! Produce a specimen of the masculine gender who can accomplish such a feat, or yield the point!

The following characteristic excerpt of Dr. Franklin is not so new as it is good!

During the long residence of Dr. Franklin in Paris he was once invited to a party of the nobility, by whom the Bible was ridiculed and severely criticised. It was remarked that the Bible was devoid of all literary merit; and Franklin being absent, they applied to him for his opinion. He replied that he was deeply prepared to give them an answer, as his mind had been turning on the merits of a new book of non-existence which he had just happened to fall in with at one of the book stores; and as they had pleased to make allusion to the literary character of the Bible, perhaps it might interest them to compare with that old volume the merits of his new prize. If so, he would read them a short section.

All were eager to hear the Doctor read them a portion of his new book. In a very grave and serious manner he took an old book from his coat pocket, and with a propriety of utterance read to them a poem.

"That is pretty," said one.

"That is sublime," said another.

"It has not its superior in the world," was the unanimous opinion. They all wished to know the name of the work, and whether that was a specimen of its contents.

"Certainly, gentlemen," said the Doctor, smiling at his triumph, "my book is full of such passages. It is no other than your good-for-nothing Bible, and I have read you the prophet Isaiah's."

Big Beck on the Arkansas.

A.P.M.

LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS.—[See Page 277.]

CHANGE ON CHINE PLANTATION, WEST BATON ROUGE, LOUISIANA.—[See Page 327.]

Published by Harper & Brothers, New York.

HARPER

CLARA'S TEMPER.

I WANTED new carpets in the parlors, and my Uncle Andrew declared they were unnecessary. Now that was not so; for only I knew how they had been turned and coaxed and even needed. And why, seeing that every one knew my uncle was rich, should the best rooms of the house look shabby? It was bad enough to live down-town where no one else did; to have the busy law-offices on the first-floor; and to pass long days seeing no one but old Barbara and the cat, as I had done often and often since I kept house for Uncle Andrew, with-out being ashamed to ask any one in besides.

"He's a gentleman been knocking for half an hour. I do suppose, and couldn't make himself heard for the jawin'."

And in the midst of the sudden silence a tall figure passed her and came into the room, hat in hand, with that peculiar bow, equally removed from the servile bend of an inferior and the flourish of the drawing-master, which so plainly marks the gentleman. I felt my hot face flush anew with shame at the very thought of being seen so red with anger. And what had I been saying? I could not remember. All sorts of passionate things for this cool, calm, quiet man to hear. I bent over the tea-cups, wishing I could quietly sink through the floor, as I often did when my angry feelings came to an end, and I saw what a fury they had made of me.

Meanwhile the gentleman was talking to uncle.

"Mr. Andrew, I believe?" he said.

My uncle bowed. The gentleman handed him a card.

"Ah!" cried my uncle, growing genial at once. "Mr. Rushton—glad to see you, Sir. I have been expecting you. Take a seat, Sir, take a seat. We have not yet finished breakfast. Pray join us."

"Thank you, I have breakfasted," replied the stranger.

"No matter," said my uncle; "an extra cup of tea or coffee hurts no man. Barbara, a cup and plate. We can be more sociable. I don't know whether you are a sociable man, Sir, but I am. Now, Clara, My niece, Sir."

I saw in the glass between the windows a very meek and very pink face lifted for a moment, and I heard a voice to match—not in the least the voice of half an hour before—inspire whether Mr. Rushton would take cream and sugar.

I was naturally far from bashful, but that day I could neither speak to nor look at our guest, and I listened to the conversation without joining in it by a word. Indeed, there was not much opportunity for me to speak. The talk was all of law matters. Of the case of X versus X, in which my uncle was engaged for the plaintiff. Of the singular letters on which he most depended for evidence, written in such a peculiar, idiosyncratic style as almost to defy translation, yet every word of great importance. Of the assistance Mr. Rushton's perfect knowledge of French would be. I gathered the fact that this young gentleman was about to be employed by my uncle in some capacity—whether as clerk or secretary I hardly knew—and that, it being necessary that he should be always in communication with my uncle, he was to remain, for a while at least, under our roof.

"You'll have the blue room put in order, Clara," said my uncle, curtly; "and now, Sir, shall we adjourn to the office?"

Then they arose, and, looking on the floor, I saw the shadow there make a bow; bowed in return, and was alone. Never, never, never, so long as I lived, should any one find me in a temper again. That I vowed. Yet it was not an hour before I was angry as ever with that provoking Barbara, who insisted that the blue room needed no sweeping, and that, if it did, she couldn't do it baking day.

"I didn't mean to," I said to myself, as I bathed my eyes with rose-water; "but an angel could not live with testy Uncle and sulky Barbara without quarrelling. It was not my fault, but theirs."

Then I went up to darn the worn place in the carpet. It was a good while before I could look the stranger in the face, but then I saw that he had a cool olive skin, calm dark eyes, a mouth as sweet as it was firm, and the broad forehead of a thinker. Perhaps his face was not regularly beautiful—I hardly know; but it had the effect of beauty, and he had youth and health and strength, and was wonderfully graceful. Soon I'd have given half the world to know what he thought of me. He was polite, attentive, as a gentleman would naturally be to the only lady inmate of the house; but, perhaps, after all, he remembered the little vixen he had first seen. I tried to be calm and quiet; to answer uncle when he scolded me with decorous respect—but that thought haunted me. I had never thought so much of any man's opinion in my life.

On Sundays we went to church together. I learned by that that he had an exquisite voice, for I used to hold my breath to listen to his singing. At last I ventured to ask him to sing for me at home. I never shall forget the song he sang, but there are many ways of singing. I have heard it from another, and scarcely listened. That same night I sang for him. He said not one word of praise—only bowed a thank you; but, as he turned my music, I saw his heart beat under the soft gray vest he wore. Mine was beating, too, like a mad thing.

Well, after that I was not so much afraid of him, and it came to long talks in the parlor and long walks by moonlight. We never said one tender word. We never took my hand. We never looked at me more earnestly than one friend might look at another; but I felt, in spite of that, that he cared something for me, and I—/ loved him. I used to think sometimes with shame that I had given my heart unsought; that it was unadvisedly to care so very much for one who had not asked me yet to care for him at all; but how could I help it? All my feelings were strong. I could not walk by the delectable rule and line so many women liked; and in the sight of Heaven I could not be wrong in admiring what was admirable, in loving purity and truth and noble manhood! So I kept my secret, but did not strive to alter it. And at last! At dusk one autumn day we walked in the shady Square, under some old trees.

The nurse-maids had gone home with their little charges, and the file of workmen with tin-cans had tramped through it into the street. The fountain tinkled and splashed into the wide basin. The flowers gave forth their sickly evening perfume. A bit of crescent moon came faintly into the sky; and in all the Square, besides ourselves, was only a sleeping beggar stretched upon a bench. No one to watch—no one to listen; and then I heard all I longed to hear! I had never thought that quiet man could love so—that that silence could cover up such a sweet wealth of tenderness.

We went home arm in arm, and under the blue heavens the moon saw no woman happier than I.

Ah me! If you had told me then what I should do I would not have believed you. As well believe a man would willingly cut the rope that held him from dropping into some awful chasm as that I should part myself from him.

For weeks and months I kept my temper. For half a year I was too happy to be angry. We were to be married in a little while, and there would be little change save a trip to some country place, for we were still to live with my uncle in the old house. Edwin—I called him by his first name now—was not demonstrative; but I knew he loved me, and that was enough.

Enough until one day I heard Ruth Baker say to my cousin Grace:

"Heaven send me a different husband from the one Clara is to have! Who would think he was fond of her?"

"It's only his way," said Ruth.

"I'd teach him another," said Ruth.

That set me thinking. It was not pleasant to be spoken of in this wise. No good ever comes of listening. I began by trying to lure Edwin into making pretty speeches and doing silly things. At last I strove to pierce him into more demonstration of the love I knew (poor fool, that it should not content me!) that he really felt, and flirted, before his very face, with a young coxcomb of a midshipman, just my age, for whom I absolutely felt a detestation.

The little puppy had taken it into his small brain to admire me. He was pleased and flattered. Edwin looked on gravely without a word. At last, angry that he should take it all so coolly, I let the little middy steal a kiss from my lips where he could see me.

That evening, when the rest were gone, I felt a hand touch my arm.

It was Edwin Rushton's. I looked up.

"I want to speak to you, Clara," he said; and before I could answer had quietly taken me to task, as one might a willful child, on my impropriety.

"It is not right," he said; "and people will make even worse of it. I can not permit it, Clara."

Not a jealous word. My uncle might have spoken much the same. "He can not love me," I thought, and my cheeks burned hotly.

"Who made you my judge and master?" I asked.

"Yourself," said he, "when you accepted me."

"Mere silly I!" I cried. "Why do you care to hinder others from having what you don't want yourself?"

"What do you mean?" asked he.

"Frank would give his right hand for a kiss from me," said I; "and you hardly know whether I am living or dead, I believe. It's like being in fetters to be tied to such an icicle."

"You are letting your temper carry you away," said he.

"My temper, Sir?"

"Yes," said he; "it is your one great fault. I saw that when I first saw you. There, there."

He tried to soothe me, as though I had been delirious. I believe I seemed so to him.

I forgot every thing in my anger.

"I wish you had never seen me," said I.

"You will be sorry to have said that."

"I say it from my heart."

His face grew white.

"There is more in this than I thought," said he. "Perhaps you love Frank Hearne better than you love me?"

I saw the chance of making him jealous. I saw nothing else in my rage.

"Perhaps I do," I said. "We can't help our fancies."

He drew a great breath, and arose, standing before me like a statue.

"I will not let your pledge to me stand between you and your young lover," he said. "God forgive you, and make you happy! Good-by! You are as free as you ever were."

And I was alone. Alone, stretching out my hands toward the closed door, and calling on my darling to return. He did not hear me. He never came.

"Temper! temper! temper!" shouted my uncle when I met him at the breakfast-table next morning. "Ah, you will suffer for your folly this time. He was the noblest fellow God ever made, and you've lost him. I told him you'd repent. 'No,' said he, 'it is not temper. She loves Frank Hearne; she told me so.' By Jove, if that puppy enters my door I'll kick him!"

"Is he gone?" I asked, with my head in my hands.

away. My life was over; my joy past. I wanted to die; but I was young, and still lived. I shut myself up from every one, and knew they said of me that I had been jilted. What did I care now? At first I used to hope he would return. I knew soon that such a hope was folly. No angry mood had made him leave me. He believed me false. Oh, the pain in his face, the anguish in his voice at that last moment! I never should forget it. As time went on I scolded myself for their sins, so I punished myself by recalling that look, that tone daily and hourly.

The spring which was to have seen us wed was gone. Autumn came, and winter. At Christmas tide I sat in my own room reading. It was long past twelve. Barbara slept in her attic, my uncle in his chamber below, but I could not sleep. The evergreen Barbara had twisted about the gas fixtures and placed over the mirror seemed to mock me with its holiday look. What was he doing tonight, my Edwin—my own dear love? I lifted the curtain and looked out. All the street was white with snow, frozen snow, that crisped and sparkled in the starlight. Opposite a dark figure paced slowly—a watchman, I supposed; but my fancy, aided possibly by a vague rumor of Edwin's presence in the place, made the outline seem his. Oh, if he should be there! If—ah, it was all folly! I dropped the curtain, and sat down before the fire a while. Then I took my white dress from its rack—the dress in which I should have been married—and folded it and unfolded it, and creased it, saying such words to it that you would have thought me mad. Yet while it was on my knee I fell into a kind of dream. It hardly seemed as much like sleep as stupor.

I was startled from it by a blaze of light. The dress had fallen from my lap into the grate. It was all aflame, flaring up toward the bed-clothes. In an instant they were caught, and the blaze went whirling up the paper on the wall, and the window curtains, long and light and floating. I rushed to the door. Alas! my evil genius had impelled me to lock it and withdraw the key. I could not find it. I searched in vain. I screamed, I prayed. Neither man nor Heaven seemed to hear me. I stood in a very furnace of flame. Walls and door and ceiling were all blazing.

They were crying fire in the street now. I heard the policemen's clubs, the tolling of the fire-bell. Why did no one come to save me? Help, help! The flames were licking up the floor, climbing, twining, swirling through the ceiling. Barbara would be burned in her bed, my dear uncle would perish, and I—I had done it, I!

The flames had driven me into a little corner. They were driving me closer at every instant. I could not see the door—it was a wall of flame. The window was a seething furnace.

"God receive my soul!" I prayed. And then I heard a crash. Something came dashing through the door into the flames. A voice cried:

"Clara! where are you?"

And I felt Edwin's arms about me once more, and was borne through the red whirlpool out into the open air. He had saved me, but he left me then. After I knew my uncle had caught me to his breast I saw him no more. One moment of hope had I had; it was gone as though it had never been.

Ah, that was a woeful night! The dear old house was gone, with all its belongings, and the alarm and exposure hastened my uncle's end. He took to his bed in the new lodgings we found, and never arose from it. In two months we buried him, and I was alone in the world.

A great heiress; for it proved that Uncle Andrew had been far richer than I guessed. But oh, so miserable and lonely that the poorest wretch might pity me! I had not heard one word of Edwin Rushton since the night of the fire.

But six months after, as I sat at work in my black dress, Barbara came in weeping.

"What is the matter?" I asked, for she plainly wanted me to question her.

"I've seen poor Mr. Rushton," said she. "It makes my heart bleed. He that was so strong and bold, feeling his way along like that! You'd cry too, Miss."

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"Didn't you know?" she said. "Why, Miss, you, of all people! I heard it from his landlady. The night he saved you he went home feeling his way up the stairs. She was frightened, and asked him what had happened. 'I've been through a fire,' said he, 'and I suppose it will pass off soon; but I can see only a red blaze.' It didn't pass off, Miss—her's blind!"

"Oh no, no!" I sobbed. "Oh no!"

"It's true; more the pity," she said, and was going from the room. I stopped her.

"Where did you meet him?" I asked.

"In the Square," said she. "He goes there every night. A boy leads him, and he sits alone near the fountain—Ah, you'd pity him, poor dear!—waiting until he comes again to fetch him."

Every evening! I had no rest until the next. Then I put on shawl and bonnet and went over to the Square. All quiet in the dusk, as it had been on that long-gone night when he asked me to be his; the nurse-maids and the children gone home; the troop of toll-free laborers passed by. I stood by the fountain and looked at him.

He stood beside it, his soft hat drawn low over those darkened eyes; his hands playing with the loose chain that kept intruders from the fountain's brink. I remembered standing in that very spot. I knew it by the weeping willow drooping over it, and the cleft head of the post hard by—only a little cloth, you might not have noticed it, but I remembered feeling it with my finger as he spoke to me.

I looked at him, my love, my life. He who had sacrificed so much for me, and was held enough for any thing.

I went closer. I touched him. He started. "It is only Clara," I said; and he trembled all over for an instant.

Then he said: "I can not see you, but I know your hand. I should have known it if you had not spoken."

And I knew he loved me still. "Edwin," I said, "it was the hand of your promised wife once. It is long since you have held it; will you take it now?"

"Give it to me," he said; and our palms touched once more.

Then we stood silent, close together.

"I have been the cause of great ill to you," I said. "Do you hate me for it?"

"You forget," he said; "it was not I who caused to love."

I clung to him. "Did you believe me?" I asked.

"Oh, Edwin, I never cared a straw for Frank Hearne. I flirted with him because I thought you indifferent. My evil temper conquered me, and I sinned foolishly. I loved only you. I never shall love any other."

"On your soul?" said he.

"On my soul!"

"I shall be happier for knowing it," he said. "It was hard to think you false. Oh would I were not blind!"

"If you were not," I said, my heart choking me, "I could not speak as I do now. If you love me still, and, oh, I think you do!—if you forgive me, and you seem to, take me to your heart again, your promised wife. If not, let me go to hide my shame, for I have been over-bold, and die of my remorse."

He caught me in his arms. I felt his great heart beat.

"It is worth eight—it is worth life!" he said, and kissed me. "Then I led him home, through the still streets."

We were married in a quiet little church. Only Barbara was with me, and I wore my black dress. I shed some tears, but I was very happy, so was he. So in the years to come in which we dwelt together.

And still the future held a great joy for me. Years after, when there were young children at our fireside and gray hairs in his curls, my darling's sight returned to him. When the surgeon told me he could see, my first thought was great thankfulness. My next: "But I have altered so. Will he know the girl he won in the faded woman?" But when I stood before him, trembling and fearful, this was what he said, though the roses of my cheeks and the gold of my hair were quite gone, I knew:

"My love, how sweet a woman you have grown! There is no angry temper in your face now any more than in your voice." And he kissed me like a bridegroom, and I thanked Heaven.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.)

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS WARNER, Author of "The Wide, Wide World."

CHAPTER I.

"PAPA, please," said little Primrose, "what smells so sweet?"

Her father sat by the table, untying a large brown package; and from it came a strange, fresh, wild sort of perfume; but sweet, as Primrose said, and very pleasant.

"What smells so sweet?" Mr. May answered, cutting the last stubborn knot with his pen-knife.

"Why, my dear, I fancy it is some of my new seeds." And selecting a small paper-bag from the heap which now lay spread out before him, Mr. May held it down to the little girl's nose as she stood at his side. Primrose took a long sniff with great delight.

"Oh, papa, how good!"

"Good, is it?" said Mr. May, laughing. "Prin, you ought to be a seedsmen!"

"No, papa. But I wish I had a garden."

"So as to plant such sweet things as celery seed?" said her father. "Prin, this is not a flower."

"But, papa," cried the impatient Lillian, flinging down her book on the widow-seat, and coming to the table with a bound, "there are flowers, you know, and we might plant 'em! Oh, papa, wouldn't you give us a garden?"

"If you please, papa?" said another little voice, now drawing near; "there is nothing we should like so much! Only I should prefer to have our gardens separate, because I should wish to keep mine in order."

"There spoke my methodical Clover!" said Mr. May, with another laugh, as his orderly, rosete, chubby little daughter came gently and stood behind Primrose, who had not spoken again, but whose dark eyes watched her father with intense interest.

"One would like a garden to keep in order, and the other to run wild in; and the third—What does my little Prin want of a garden?" he said, bending down to kiss her.

"I should like it so much, papa!"

"Prin would nestle there just like a little bird," said her tall brother Sam.

"Papa," cried Lillian, "will you give us three gardens?—I should like that best too."

"Yes, Lily should be allowed to grow weeds entirely on her own account," said Jack.

"When I grow any you'll know it," said Lily, with great good-humor. "Will you, papa?"

"I find one garden pretty expensive now," said Mr. May; "what should I do with three more?"

"Oh, they wouldn't cost any thing—our gardens," said Lily.

"A very excellent sort of gardens yours will be then," said her father. "Where do you propose to get your seeds and plants?"

"Well—just a little," amended Lily.

"Perhaps we could get wild flowers, papa," said Clover, thoughtfully. "And I've got one package of seeds already, that Maria Jarvis gave me. It's niggonette."

"And then just the ground is so pretty, papa!" urged little Primrose.

"Think so?" said Mr. May. "I must confess I like to see the ground well covered. But what'll dig it up, to begin with?"

"Why, Belds," said Lily.

"Robin has a great deal to do," said Primrose, "I guess Sam would, you know, papa, to do any thing." It was very ridiculous, of course, but—tall fellow as he was—Sam's eyes actually dimmed with pleasure at this compliment from his little sister.

"And will Sam take care of the garden all summer after they are dug up and planted?" said Mr. May, lifting Primrose upon his knee.

"Oh no, papa! that's what we want to do."

"Well," said her father, "upon three conditions I will give you each a garden: First of all, mamma must approve. Next, each one is to choose her own seeds and plants; to suit her own taste. And, lastly, each must keep her own garden in order, after the first heavy digging is done. She must sow the seeds, and plant the plants, and dispute possession with the weeds—all herself. Now, what does mamma say?"

"I say yes, with all my heart!" answered Mrs. May. "But I too shall make conditions—or, at least, one: In each garden, no matter how full it may be, there must be one corner set apart for patience, perseverance, brotherly-kindness, and such sweet herbs; and each shall be well hedged in with the Golden Rule."

"Well, children, now you know the conditions, what do you say?" said their father.

"I like the conditions very much, papa," said Clover.

"They are easy enough," said Lily.

"Mamma," said Primrose, quitting her father and going to lean her elbows on her mother's lap, "what is the hedge for?"

"To fence out such little mischief-makers as pride and selfishness and envy; for if they get in they will root up every sweet flower there. And no other hedge grows low enough and close enough to keep them out."

"But, mamma," said Primrose, her little mouth dimpling into a smile of full intelligence, "who'll want the herbs?"

"We shall see," said her mother, answering the smile. "I should not wonder if I came down to the garden myself for a sprig now and then."

"Well, papa," said Lillian, "we agree. But where are the seeds and plants which we must choose to come from?"

"I suppose from my pocket," said Mr. May. "Most things seem to come from there nowadays. See! here are three greenbacks—a dollar apiece for each of you—how far will that go? Far enough, I think, for little wipers."

"Oh, papa!" said Clover, "a dollar apiece is a great deal. Are flower seeds so expensive?"

"All depends upon the sort," said Mr. May, with a shrug of his shoulders. "They cost from five cents a paper to fifty cents a seed, according to circumstance."

"Fifty cents a seed!" said Lily. "I guess I shouldn't buy that sort. Spend all my money for two seeds, truly!"

"Papa, did you mean me to spend a whole dollar too?" said little Primrose, eyeing the greenback in her hand as a joy quite beyond belief.

"You are to spend the whole of it. And you will find it as easy to do as possible."

"A dollar will buy twenty papers of the first kind—only think!" said Lily. "Papa, will Robin lend us tools?"

"No, no; you are to have nothing to do with Robin. I will furnish the tools. Now, what next?"

"How are we to choose our seeds, papa?" said Clover.

"Oh, to be sure! Here is Mr. Vick's Catalogue," said her father, taking it out from his pocket, "full of names and descriptions and prices. You can study this at your leisure, and when the lists are made out I'll send an order for the seeds."

Prim's eyes glistened as her father flattered over the leaves of the Catalogue. What pictures of flowers were there!

"How splendid!" said Lily, taking it from his hand, and passing over a bunch of petunias.

"Papa," said Clover, "I feel too rich!"

"Rich?" said Mr. May, laughing—"you will feel as poor as possible when you have studied that Catalogue for half an hour. I foresee an endless call for donations. In fact, you will be such poverty-stricken donors, with your one dollar apiece, that I think we had better take up a collection at once, before matters go any farther. Mamma, what will you give?"

"Some strong calico frocks, and thick shoes and gloves," replied Mrs. May, promptly.

"A most needed contribution! But tending rather to the comfort of the gardeners than the beauty of the garden."

"Oh, I will give the gardeners each a rose-bush," said Mrs. May.

"Ah, that is good! Sam, what say you?"

"A cutting of geranium, Sir, for each; with twice for tying up the flowers, and strong sticks and labels. Also, the help of a knife and hammer and nails when wanted."

"All very excellent and necessary," said his father.

"I will furnish advice," said Jack, "in any quantity, and upon the most liberal terms. Also, as Sam says, a well-grown plant of Canada thistle for each garden—just to promote the growth of mamma's sweet herbs."

"It wouldn't promote the growth of mamma's hedge," said Lily. "If you'll furnish shears, Jack, we'll take it, and thank you too."

"For me," said Mr. May, "I will provide the roots. And I think, under the circumstances, that is all I will engage to do."

"Do you mean that you will give us tools, papa?" said Lily, with flashing eyes.

"A little spade and watering-pot, papa?" said Primrose.

"You will see," said her father. "If I tell you I'll help you, the package will not be so interesting as it is."

"We can work!" said Lily, gaily. "We've nothing to think of for one day. Come, Clover, let's go make our list."

"But I think I can not make mine to-night,

Lily," said Clover, as she came to the window. "I don't know yet where my garden is to be."

"That makes no difference," said Lily. "Just look at these pink! Did you ever see any thing so grand?"

"Why, it makes a great deal of difference," said Clover, eyeing the pink with loving looks. "I can't tell what I shall want. I may have to 'plant out' something; you know; and that would require tall things. Or there may be rocks. Oh, Lily, I'm so happy!—it's so delightful!"

"These gardens will be a study," said Mr. May to his wife. "Clover, what do you know about 'planting out'?"

Clover turned back, blushing a little.

"Not much, papa. But I heard you and Mr. Jarvis talking one day, and I saw something in a book."

"That's right," said her father; "listen, and then apply your knowledge. But go and make your list, my child; and then it can be modified here and there if need be. You will find it a larger business than you think. And I'll see where the gardens shall be to-morrow."

So the three children curled themselves up on the broad, low window seat, and the work began. Mr. May and the boys went off, and their mother sat silent by the table, her gentle face bent over her work.

CHAPTER II.

THE children of whom I told you in my first chapter had been (so far) brought up in the city. Brick walls, and noisy streets, and town sights and sounds, were what they knew best; and it was no wonder that Primrose pronounced the colony seed "sweet," if only by way of comparison, and quite apart from its intrinsic claims. Of course their knowledge of flowers was all in one line. A greenhouse full of geraniums, carnations, violets imprisoned in pots, and each stretching their spiny arms wildly about, far away from their native plains; an orderly hyacinth in a tall-glass in a furnace-heated room, or a small bed of the same planted where now and then a stray beam of sunshine slept between indolent walls; a tall magnolia, growing ferociously between a brick wall on the one hand and the dusty pavement on the other; a wisteria, rambling cheerily over a brown stone front in the vain search after something pleasant—all these they had seen again and again. But these are exiles, singing but half their sweet song in a strange land; and every child knows the difference between their captive beauty and the free, sunny grass of a transient dandelion, that every now and then runs away to see the world, and displays the oldest fashions in Fifth Avenue. Highly respectable little dandelion!—nobody ever dared laugh at it yet.

A year before this time of which I write Mr. May had bought a country place, and with the beginning of winter the family had all removed thither, to make it their home. It was set at all a remarkable place, unless for being at once large, old-fashioned, and comfortable—three things not always found together in those days. The house stood back from the road, with a short, smooth slope of grass between, and a simple white fence for boundary line. The fence turned up the slope quite near the house on one side; but on the other, where was the door of entrance, the green turf had even a wider sweep than in front, and the fence stood off at a respectful distance. Behind the house was a large garden and orchard combined, where already Robin was busy with his pruning-knife and hot beds, and preparations of all kinds. For it was now just at the end of winter, and there were days when the very breath of spring was abroad; and the light on the bare trees looked soft and gentle, and adventurous blades of grass peeped out in sheltered places.

The front-door of the house being, after all, a side door, the real front was unbroken except by a large low-window belonging to the family sitting-room; and as the first floor of the house was but a single step above the ground, this low-window was something like a glazed porch, having its own low step without, and within a broad, divan-sort of seat on all sides. And now, in winter, shut tight with double sashes, it became the favorite resort of the children. Here they sat with their Catalogue on this very afternoon of which I speak, hardly knowing whether they were most delighted or at their wit's end; for of all distracting things command me to a well-down-up, illustrated Catalogue of flowers! Such a bewildering confusion of red and blue and purple and yellow; such descriptions of "snowy white" blossoms dazzling your very eyes; such "blazes of brilliance" that you seem to see; such "very sweet" perfumes that you almost perceive! The colored leaves, the stately growers, the trailing creepers, the vines that mount up like Jack's bean to an enchanted world above your head. People go into raptures over lace and jewels and old china. Well, well, those have their place; but it is not the place of a violet, after all. And they are not heart's-eases—they can never be balm.

"Now, first," said Lily—"oh me, whatever shall we do with these hard names!"

"They are not so hard when you have looked at them a little," said Clover. "Maria Jarvis knows ever so many. See—that first one is easy enough—'Aronia.'"

"How shall we begin?" said Lily; "will you take the first part of the Catalogue, and I the second, and Primrose the third? or shall we divide by flowers? Aronia for you, and adonis for me, and ager-ageratum for Prim? Such names!"

"But that wouldn't be choosing," said Clover.

"No, it wouldn't," said Lily, "and we've got to choose. Well, shall we agree that we won't ever take the same?"

"But that would not be choosing, either," said Clover.

"Then we'll just have to begin, and be mere about it," said Lily. "I don't want any of all these first four—do you?"

"I want adonia," said Primrose. "It's sweet."

"Write it down then," said Lily, "but if you take all the sweet flowers, I guess you'll have enough. And that's so little—only six inches high. But I'll tell you what I want, and that's snap-dragon—never mind the other name. Look, Clover, here's a picture of it; and you see they say it's 'exceedingly brilliant.' Oh, I should think so, indeed!—scarlet and yellow with white throat, and 'crimson with white throat,' and 'magnificently striped,' and all sorts. Which would you take?—here's a blood-red one."

"I should take this—see, down at the bottom," said Clover, "best and brightest varieties mixed."

"Why how splendid!" said Lily; "and only ten cents for them all."

While Lily was writing down snap-dragon, Clover peeped over the leaf and quietly headed her own list with sweet adonia.

"What's that?" said Lily. "Oh, I don't believe you'll like that. It's just some common little white thing."

"But see these!" said Clover; "amaranthus, with red and yellow and green foliage. I must have that—they say it's useful for back-grounds."

"What are back-grounds?" said Lily. "Love lies bleeding—what a funny name! Prim, don't you want any thing on this page?"

"I'll see what there is first," said Primrose, knitting her little brows; on all the other pages, I mean. Because I got so confused. I think I want every thing; and you know I can't have that."

"Oh, but a dollar will get a great deal," said Lily; "just look at those asters! I must have them."

"So must I, some of them," said Clover. "And there are ever so many kinds. Which one will you take?"

"This first one—'perfection,'" said Lily. "There can't be any thing much better than that."

"I'll take the 'chrysanthemum—flowered,'" said Clover. "I like chrysanthemums."

"Well, I guess I'll have this little one—'pyramidal bouquet,'" said Primrose. "Because I like bouquets."

"Prim's garden will be all six inches high," said Lily, laughing.

"They say balsams are beautiful," said Clover, writing the name down on her list. "And they must have good culture; you see they must be sown and then transplanted, and pinched off. That's just what I shall like. I think I can take pains enough."

"Then you'd better take some cockscombs," said Lily—"recommended to all who will give their plants good care." Why, I mean to do that, too, of course; but then I don't want fussy things."

"Oh! oh!" cried Primrose—"just look at these dianthus flowers over the leaf!"

"Dianthus!" said Lily—"what's dianthus? Why, they are perfectly splendid!"

"They are pink," said Clover; "it says so down here. I never saw any thing so beautiful in all my life!"

"No, I believe you never did," said Lily; "and there are ever so many kinds. Let's go all through and look at the pictures the first thing. There's something—I don't know what; and petunias—and petunias. Mamma, this Catalogue is perfectly fascinating!"

Mamma laughed a little at that. "How do the dollars hold out, Lily?" she asked.

"Oh! I don't know," said Lily—"well, I guess. You see, mamma, we are going through just to put down a few of the most striking ones first, and then we can add to the lists afterward."

"How many 'most striking ones' does each list contain at present?" said Mrs. May, looking very much amused.

"We haven't counted yet, mamma. Now, there's something I should like—a 'double green-centred sunflower,' from five to eight feet high."

"That sounds imposing, at least," said Mrs. May.

"Don't you like sunflowers, mamma?—the name's pretty. What do they look like?"

"Mamma," said Primrose, going to her side, "what flower do you love best?"

"I am quite fond of primroses!" said Mrs. May, taking the little face between her hands and giving it a kiss.

"And you'd like some more?" said Primrose, laughing.

"Well, there's plenty of 'em in Mr. Vick's Catalogue," said Prim, gaily, going back to her seat. "And I'll write 'em right down."

"But, Lily," said Clover, presently, looking up from her list, "mamma has reason—how far will a dollar go? It will never buy all these in the world!" said Clover, showing a slip of paper well penciled on both sides.

"Oh! I guess it will," said Lily; "a dollar's a great deal. Let's count up and see. But I haven't written down the prices—never mind; we can turn over the leaves again. There's snap-dragon one—I mean ten; and aster fifteen; how comes that, I wonder?—fifteen is twenty-five; and pink, ten more, makes thirty-five; and my sunflower is forty-five; and pansy, sixty-five; and my double petunias—Dear me, what will ever do!—double petunias, fifty! Why, I must have five dollars' worth on my list, at that rate."

"I've got three dollars' worth on mine," said Clover, laying it down with a blank face. The children looked at each other, then broke into a laugh.

"Prim was wise," said Lily; "she waited. Well, we've just got to begin over again, that's all."

"Yes," said Clover, "we began all wrong. I ought to have had more sense. The way is to put down only what you must have, at first; and then write down the price after each one. Let's take new slips of paper, and make a nice list this time."

"Well," said Lily, and she wrote at the top of her paper—"Flower seeds that I must have."

"New don't let us talk," said Clover, "but just go over the Catalogue quietly and think." And again the enticing pages were turned over, leaf by leaf.

"Well, this passes all my philosophy," said Lily, when she had again added up her list. "It seems that I must have at least two dollars' worth!"

"That's just what I've got, too," said Clover. "Papa might well say it would be a long piece of work."

"Mamma," said Primrose, once more quitting the low-window for her mother's side, "isn't it funny?"

"And are you in difficulties, too?" said her mother.

"I've not made my list yet, mamma. I get so confused between what they want and what I want. I think I'll wait till they have all done with the Catalogue, and then I can take it."

"That's not likely to be very soon," said Lily.

"What can I strike out! Mamma, did you ever see this bartsia—very showy, with yellow flowers and gray branches?"

"Yes, I have seen it."

"Is it pretty?"

"It is very showy."

"Which is the prettiest, that or pansies?"

"Oh, pansies, if I am to be judge! They are showy and lovely too."

"How nice!" said Lily; "that's just what I'd like to be. I'll mark pansies with my red pencil, as a settled thing. But they're terribly expensive."

"It often costs a good deal to be showy and lovely," said Mrs. May, with a smile.

"I must have my hyacinth-bloss," said Clover, "but that don't cost a great deal; and I must have some stocks, though they do. Mamma, are zinnias handsome?"

"Very handsome."

"I may want those, they look useful," said Clover, with her feet full of plans and bark-grounds.

"And I must have petunias," said Lily. "Mamma, my head's in a perfect whirl."

"Then if I were you," said her mother, "I would put my body in a whirl, and then give it a good run out of doors. You will not know red from blue if you sit puzzling there any longer."

"I guess that's true," said Lily, with a laugh. "I'm as tired—!"

And the children went for their books and cloaks and then off into the snow; little Primrose giving a lingering look at the Catalogue where it lay on the window-seat. Her list was but just begun.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE LANGUAGE OF FLOWERS.—"Well, I'm blowed!"

JOURNALISM.—A new Boston Catholic satirical paper will, it is rumored, shortly appear in England. It is to be called Guy Fawkes, and will blow up the Houses of Parliament once a week.

AN IRISH PRISONER being asked why he permitted his pig to take up his quarters with his family, made an answer amounting to a matrimonial rail-road:—"Why not? Down the piece after every conversation that a pig can require!"

THE ENTIRE ASSETS of a recent bankrupt were also children. The creditors asked magnanimously, and let him keep them.

WHAT BUSINESS ought Tom Thresh to go into? (Grove Grove etc.)

THE CHINESE WAY WITH THE LAWYERS.—Mary was her own counsel.

WHY IS QUEEN VICTORIA, just about now, like a deaf lady?—Because her King (having) it in a bad condition.

A DEBILITATED our acquaintance says that it is much easier to take the Factor of a woman's oath than off her cap.

HOW MANY PARS are there in a plot?—One p.

LETTERS FROM AROUND.—What foreign town has the dirtiest street?—Moscow.

ACCIDENT WITH MACHINERY.—"I've got a new machine," said a Yankee peddler, "for picking bones out of shaves. Now, I tell you, it's a little bit the darndest thing you ever did see. All you have to do is to set it on a table, and turn a crank, and the fat flies out under the wheel, and the bones the other side. Well, there was a country 'greenhorn' got hold of it the other day, and he turned the crank the wrong way, and, I tell you, the way the bones flew down his throat was awful. Why, it stuck that fellow so full of bones that he couldn't get his shirt off for a whole week."

THE FOLLOWING IS an Irishman's description of Baking a canon:—"Take a long hole, and pour brass or iron all round it."

ONE OF GOUGH'S stories was a man hit at those ditatory people who are always behind lines. Some one said to a person of this class, "I see that you belong to the three-headed people." "Three-headed! that's rather uncommon." "Oh no, common enough—two hands like other people—and a little behind-head."

A MIMICRY paper announced a short time since that the "wife-step in Greenwich County yielded fifteen thousand gals." The next week the editor came out with an "erratum—for wife read wine."

A SCOTCHMAN asked an Irishman, "Why were half-fortings coined in England?" The answer was, "The gals Scotchmen an opportunity of subscribing to charitable institutions."

WHY IS A MAD BULL an animal of a convulsed disposition?—Because he offers a horn to every one he meets.

AN INVISIBLE gentleman lately fought a duel with his invisible friend because he joyously asserted that he was born without a shirt to his back!

THE FOLLOWING purports to be a model medical puff:—"DEAR DOCTOR.—I shall be one hundred and seventy-five years old next October. For over eighty-four years I have been an invalid, unable to step except with a crutch and with a lever. But a year ago I heard of the Great Relief Balm. I bought a bottle, used the ointment, and found myself a man. I can now run twelve miles and a ball on horse, and throw thirteen consecrals without stopping."

THERE ARE GREAT fears entertained in England that if the cattle disease continues Heriot's declaration that the "gimes are out of joint" will be realized.

THE FELLOW who sat down on a pig got up on the spot of the moment.

A DECEASED chief justice once addressed a jury in the following metaphor:—"Gentlemen of the Jury, in this case the witness on both sides are verily afflicted; the witness incredible; and the plaintiff and defendant are both such bad characters that to see it is indifferent which way you give your verdict."

"BATER" call a great many people to church.

WASHINGTON MARKET, NEW YORK CITY.—SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.—[SEE PAGE 327.]

"SPRING-TIME."

THE BLACKSMITH'S WIFE.

BY AUGUSTUS COMSTOCK.

She has a figure trim and neat,
 And full of health and life,
 With nimble hands and nimble feet,
 The blacksmith's little wife.

Her hair is dark, her eyes are blue,
 And though her cheek is browned,
 An anchorite would smile to view
 A face so smooth and round.

All day she labors like the bee,
 The blacksmith's little wife,
 While round her play her children three,
 Bright-haired and full of life.

And all-day long, her cheery song
 Comes through the cottage door,
 With tap, tap, tap, her patters rap
 The neatly sanded floor.

Her swartly husband, from the town,
 Comes home when day is dim;
 For kisses he must stoop 'way down,
 Or she climb up to him.

He's just the man that women crave
 To shield them from "the wrong,"
 For he's as kind as he is brave,
 As brave as he is strong.

"You're tired out with work," she sighs;
 "You lead a weary life."
 "No, no," quoth he, "tis Paradise,
 With such a little wife."

The gleeful fire with ardent rays
 Keeps shy from the hearth,
 The tea-pot blazes in the blaze,
 The kettle stokes with rattle.

The sleek "grimalkin" purrs and mews,
 The dog whines at the door,
 The pattering of little shoes
 Is heard along the floor.

About the smith his children play
 When evening's meal is through,
 They love to see his pipe of clay
 Send forth its clouds of blue.

They clamber on his shoulders broad,
 They clamber on his knee,
 While wife looks on with smile and nod,
 And all are full of glee.

I'd sooner be this blacksmith bold,
 With such a little wife,
 Than have the wealth of yellow gold
 That gilds an aimless life.

THE ISLAND GIRL.

A TRUE INCIDENT.

After leaving the port of Valparaiso we cruised for several months in different parts of the Pacific, capturing three large sperm whales and a "California gray." The latter was a curious-looking fish, about twenty feet in length, with a long, funnel-shaped head, crooked flukes, and a thin, tapering body, spotted like that of a leopard. We lost a whole tub of line, and one of our best boats was stove, before we succeeded in killing "Monsieur Gray," but he rewarded us for our trouble in the end—yielding us forty barrels of good clear oil. By this time the few casks of fresh water procured at Valparaiso were nearly empty; so, as soon as we had stowed our all we shaped our course for the Navigator Islands to obtain a fresh supply. Our vessel was the bark St. Mary, of New Bedford, commanded by Captain Barlow—a tall, raw-boned native of Sag Harbor, who could fling a lance to the distance of twenty fathoms without missing his aim. He was a thorough whaler and sailor, equally cool and collected whether tussling with the mighty Leviathan of the deep or the shrieking typhoon; a large-hearted, genial man, too, well calculated to win the love and esteem of his officers and crew.

"THE BLACKSMITH'S WIFE."

"THE ISLAND GIRL."

All hands were delighted with the prospect of a run ashore. The vast watery wilderness of ocean, unrelieved by a rock or even a floating blade of grass, most exotically fatigues the eyes of poor Jack, how deep soever may be his attachment to Old Neptune; and though his fancy may occasionally weave pictures of rocks, valleys, and even trees among the clouds in the horizon, yet these are not substantial enough to satisfy his longings for a sight of terra firma.

As our little bark stood bravely upon our shoreward course we spent our leisure hours in washing and "patching up" our well-worn garments, so as to look respectable when we should reach our island port—for a sailor likes to appear well, even in the eyes of a savage. A couple of clothes-lines forward, extending across and above the deck from the lee to the weather shrouds, now presented a spectacle which was both amusing and picturesque. Old blue jackets with great patches upon the elbows, trousers of various sizes and colors, Guernsey frocks, woolen stockings, and clean but melancholy-looking shirts were there—all tussling about in the wind, with arms and legs kicking and striking at each other, as if they were quarrelling because one garment stood a chance of getting dry before the other.

One morning, however, the cry of "Land O!" wafted simultaneously from our three mast-heads, put an end to our "washing and drying." We donned such of our garments as were fit to be worn, and hung up those that were wet in the fore-hold. Then leaning over the bulwarks, we gratefully inhaled the sweet fragrance of flowers and spices wafted from the groves of beautiful Samoa, the island we were approaching. As our little bark beached herself through the curling waves our watchful gaze was soon rewarded with tall, sloping hills, covered with cloud-like masses of green verdure, slender cocoa-nut-trees lining a white, curving beach, and the hats of the natives, with the smoke ascending from them, seen through openings in the shrubbery of bread-fruit-trees and clambering vines.

We let go our anchor a quarter of a mile from the beach and shook hands with a number of natives who had come alongside; a canoe loaded with yams, cocoa-nuts, bananas, and bread-fruit, which they were anxious to exchange for tobacco, articles of clothing, etc. After our sails were fuiled we were at leisure to trade with the islanders. From one of them—a giant fellow whose only garment was a piece of tappa (cloth) confined about the waist, and whose Herculean chest was scarred with many wounds received in battle—I obtained a hundred ripe yellow bananas for a small whistle, which I had carved from a whale's tooth. There was something touching in the simple, child-like pleasure evinced by the stalwart savage for such a mere trifle. His eyes sparkled, his whole countenance glowed with delight as he turned the little piece of ivory round and round between his thumb and forefinger. He examined it on all sides, then chuckled and commenced to dance about the deck, clapping his hands. Afterward I saw him striding to and fro along the beach, blowing the whistle with all his might, and returning the careless gaze of his dusky brethren with glances of puffed exultation. From this man my attention was at length drawn to a pretty, interesting little girl of seven or eight years, who was seated upon the knight-heads crying and sobbing as if her heart would break. She wore a long thin robe of faded tappa, confined just beneath the armpits, and around her forehead a pretty wreath of flowers, from beneath which her long black hair streamed in wavy masses. On her lap were several downy mountain or mouse apples, strung together by means of a piece of twine formed of cocoa-nut husks.

"What ails you, my child?" I inquired, advancing and touching her on the shoulder; "why do you cry?"

She wiped her eyes as if comforted by my sympathy, and in broken English informed me that she had not yet succeeded in selling one of her apples. The crew, attracted by mere palatable fruits, had paid no attention to her simple merchandise. She feared she would have to go back to her old mother, who had sent her to the ship in one of the canoes, without any cloth or tobacco; and this old mother, who, according to the child's description, was a perfect fury—would then beat her with sticks, and afterwards shut her up in a dark hole in the mountain.

I immediately purchased the apples, giving her in exchange half a dozen heads of tobacco and a small silk scarf. The latter I fastened about her shoulders, telling her that it made her look very pretty, and expressed the hope that her mother would not take it away from her. She clasped her hands and laughed with childish glee; then threw her arms about my neck, calling me her dear "friend" (friend), and declaring in her half wild, half gentle manner, that she would never go back to her wicked mother, but would stay with me and let me be her father.

Before I could reply an angry screech, something like that of an owl, pierced my ear, and turning, I beheld an old, fierce-looking hag, whose paint figure was enveloped in a ragged piece of cotton cloth. She held in one hand a knotted, ferocious-looking stick, and in the other a long wooden pipe. Her skin was of the hue of parchment, her forehead seemed to bear a hundred wrinkles, and the small black eyes beneath gleamed like those of a wasp from a shrivelled apple.

"Hi! hi! hi! run from mother, ah?" she screamed, seizing my little companion by the shoulder. "Glad we cease aboard—give much beat; beat so we walk for long time!"

And lifting the stick she would have carried out her threat, had I not prevented her. The tobacco which her little daughter now slipped into her hand elicited a screech of satisfaction, and grinning with delight, she thrust the stick into an old belt around her waist, and proceeded to fill her pipe. She had lighted it and begun to smoke when the mate came forward, ordering all the natives to leave the ship. My little girl was obliged to go with her mother. Her eyes filled with tears when she entered the canoe, and as it glided away from the vessel she looked back now and then, waving "farewells" to me with the pretty scarf. I stood watching her until the canoe with its occupants disappeared around a head-land; and even then her large, melancholy eyes haunted my mind.

When our watch was sent ashore the next day with a raft of coals, I looked in vain for the child among the groups of natives about the banks of the lake from which we were to procure our water.

Children of both sexes were there, running hither and thither, or rolling over the green turf like tumble-bugs. Many were provided with long wooden spears, which they darted at the little fish gliding beneath the ripples near the beach. The girls were very pretty, but I was not impressed by either of them as I had been by the child with the mountain apples.

After we had obtained our water and stowed it I visited the island on several different occasions, but was still unable to find my little friend; and I felt a presentiment that I should never see her again.

One foggy morning about a week after my last ramble over the island we got up our anchors and stood out to sea. I had just taken my station at the helm when the cry of "Hard up—up with that wheel!" was shrieked by the mate, who stood upon the knight-heads, forward.

I raised the wheel quickly, but even as I did so I heard a snapping, crackling sound, followed by a plaintive wail that pierced my ears like a knife. The next moment the main yard was hauled aback and a boat was lowered—for the bark, I soon learned, had run over a canoe, containing a little girl. A melancholy suspicion flashed through my mind, and with breathless anxiety I awaited the return of the boat. It was not long absent. The crew had not found the occupant of the canoe, but had picked up fragments of the frail vessel, to one of which, caught by a projecting sail, hung the silk scarf which I had given to the island girl.

The poor child, leaving her wicked mother, had put off in the canoe before the vessel sailed, that the night might intercept it and be taken aboard to join "her friend;" but the thick fog had prevented her from seeing the bark in time to escape her melancholy fate.

SECOND THOUGHTS.

"NICK, old fellow, tell me what's the row? There have I been thinking you sulky and all sorts of things; tell me—" and I got up and put my hand on his shoulder. "Poor old boy! what is it?"

"Oh! leave me alone. There's nothing the matter; only I'm a fool. Well, if you must know, read that! I shall be all right soon; only I got that this morning—read it! It's my own fault; I know I'm an ass!"

I took the letter he held out, and he twisted up his mouth and tried to whistle "I'm adieu;" but it was a failure, and he added, in a lower tone:

"One can't pull up a ten years' fancy of that sort, Jack, without shaking the soil a bit. Thank you for making me let the cat out; I'm all the better for it. Good-night!"

I was sorry—more sorry than I could say—for him. He was the oldest friend I had got. We had slept in the same chamber at Winchester, and had rowed in the same boats at Oxford, and I could not bear to see him so cut up. I could have done almost any other thing for him, any thing—but—wish him any other answer than the one I read by the fire-light now. It was this:

"MR. DEAR BARNARD,—You must not think more of the subject mentioned in your letter. I do not speak of honor or unadvisably; but I do speak decidedly, wishing to aid you in determining to take your mind from a subject which you must believe me can only bring you pain. That you may be more satisfied of this, I enclose a letter from my daughter Minnie, who is much distressed at being obliged to give you pain.
Believe me, yours sincerely,
T. DARLEY."

I could not bring myself to read Minnie's letter, so I folded Mr. Darley's up again, and gave them both back.

"Poor old Nick! I'm very sorry for you. I hadn't a notion you really cared for her. Good-night, old boy!" and I squeezed his hand, feeling half a hypocrite all the time, and lay down to think till I fell asleep.

I think that any one who is rash enough to attempt to describe even an ordinarily pretty girl is sure to make a failure; so all I shall venture to say of Minnie Darley is, that she was slight and very pretty indeed. Possibly some critics might object that her lips were rather too thin. Perhaps, too, that her delicately-chiselled features were, at times, almost so colorless as to be almost more suggestive of marble than soft flesh and blood; but in a moment a blush or a smile could warm the beautiful statue into a charming English girl; and any one must have been something altogether less than honest who could watch her, flushed and animated, in the momentary pause in a value or gallop, without acknowledging that—artistically speaking at least—she was lovely.

I really was very sorry for my friend Nick, for I know how I should have felt that letter. I had only known her six months; he, poor fellow! had loved her for ten years. It had been, according to his own account, his one idea since he was a boy at school, and he was inconceivably now, and seemed quite unable to rouse himself up to any thing. I had the greatest difficulty in stirring him up enough to start for Switzerland; and if it had not been for my mother and sister, whom I had promised to escort as far as Geneva, I am not at all sure that either of us would have left England at all. When we did start he was not a lively companion, and for the first whole day traveled with his hat resting on his nose, without speaking a word.

Fortunately our passage over the Channel was a very rough one, and Nick, who was never an over-good sailor, was compelled, against his will, for a time to turn his thoughts away to other more immediate troubles.

There is nothing, as every one knows, like time and change of scene to take the edge off any sorrow; and nothing, perhaps, helps their effects more than another sorrow intervening. His shocking seasickness was, as it were, an awful black chaos yawning between him and his rejection; and when we landed at Boulogne his spirit had risen in a way that surprised us all. We had lovely weather, luxuriant fruit, and amusing company. My mother and sister, who both liked him, and had heard his story, did all that kindness could suggest to cheer him up, and by the time we reached Geneva, after a laborious journey, he was quite himself again, merry and uproarious, the life of the party; and his confidence in me had been dropped for at least a week.

We had arranged—at his suggestion, I believe—to go with the ladies of our party as far as Chavronix, a solitary chalet, standing in its own pine-wood and vineyard, on an isolated marble rock, a little way up the mountains between Bex and Aigle to the west of the Rhone above the Lake. A steamer was starting very soon after our train arrived, so we made up our minds to go on by it the same night as far as Lausanne without making any stop at Geneva. There was not any time to spare, and Nick ran to inquire for letters, while I hurried the luggage on board as best I could. My mother and Nick settled down quietly on one of the benches on deck to digest their letters as the boat steamed out. Neither Fanny nor I had any to read; so we leaned together over the bows, and devoted our whole attention to the enjoyment of some grapes and a light fresh breeze which blew in our faces, and was exquisitely refreshing after the dust and heat of the train. A heavy shower had just blown over, leaving the sky behind it as blue and sparkling as the lake below, and the distant mountains and trees on either shore and the sunny leeward sails of the fishing-boats glistened in the "clear shining after the rain." We had not been very long in that delightful state of dreamy abstraction which the full appreciation of beautiful scenery at once requires and produces by an adapting power of its own, when Nick joined us and broke the silence with, "Jack, when you have quite done building castles up in the Alps over there, I have got something to talk to you about, if Miss Holmes will spare you for a few minutes."

"Very well, Mr. Barnard, you may have him for a little while, as you ask so prettily, but you must give him me back soon. He's very useful to tell me the names of the places. You must get me Murray first though; it's in mamma's bag there."

"I have got such a queer letter from my mother I can't think what she's driving at" (he had carried me off to the other end of the boat before he began to speak). "Just tell me what you make out of it." It was a short note, without any date, and written evidently in a great hurry. I read it through two or three times, and Nick lit a cigar and puffed away in silence:

"DEAREST NICK,—We are all in a great state of excitement, and can't think where to write to you; but I think it just possible that a line posted to-day may catch you at Geneva. So I write for the chance to say that you will find letters from Mr. Darley waiting for you at Chavronix, where you said in your last you expected to be soon. Jack has the gray mare added to take this into Hellion, so I have not a minute time to write. Well, dearest boy, you were in low spirits when you left England. Take care you do not allow yourself to be too much excited now. I suppose this news will cheer you very trip.
I love you, my
Your loving mother, E. B."

"Can Minnie have changed her mind?" he said, in a low tone—"no, surely not. It can't be."

"Can Minnie have changed her mind?" I had not thought of that. Yes, that's it; what else could it be? that must be it; and I tried to swallow the big lump in my throat, and said, "That's it—of course it is. Nick, you are a lucky fellow, and I congratulate you—though it costs me something to do it. Of course that's it."

I don't think he noticed the last part of my speech; but he snatched up the letter and read it through again. "No, surely, she never would. It's impossible."

I had worked myself up till I hardly knew whether to laugh or cry. Nick pitched his cigar over the side and watched it hiss into the water; then put his hand on my arm and said, with a coolness that seemed rather odd for a lover, and aggravated me intensely, "It's a rum go, and I don't know what to make of it. I want to ask you one thing; don't say a word about this to your mother or sister."

I left Nick and my sister chatting together, and went and sat down by myself in any thing but pleasant thought. Till that night at the pilot-house I had not been sure that I was really in love with Minnie Darley at all. It was only now, as I stared down into the foam of the paddle-wheel, now that all chance was past, that I was finding out how much I really cared for her. We were nearly at Ouchy. I opened my pocket-book and took out an envelope with a faded violet in it, and threw it overboard. "That's done. She is a flirt, like the rest of them," and I went to see the luggage taken out.

We slept that night at the Hotel Gibben, and, after an early walk through the wood to the Signal Hill, which commands one of the most extensive views of the Lemans, started off again by boat, past Vevey, and Old Chillon, and the little island, to Ville Neuve, at the head of the lake, whence we took the train to Aigle.

We left our luggage at the station, and made a small boy in a blouse happy with the promise of fifty centimes to show us the way to the house, which had been hired for some years as a summer residence by a widowed cousin with two little girls. A pleasant walk of half a mile up a narrow road, fenced in by a crumbling stone-wall, half hidden in ferns, and overhung by walnut-trees, brought us to a grove of magnificent chestnuts, and through their huge twisted stems we seen caught sight of our friends coming to meet us.

On a table of soft moss close by some rough wooden seats we found some wine and fruit awaiting us, and sat there chatting and telling our adventures till it was time to go in. "There are some letters for some of you, Fanny dear, on the drawing-room chimney-piece," said Mrs. Grey, when we had all met for tea; "I forgot them when we came in." Fanny was up in a moment, and danced back into the room with a disappointed "Not one for me; what a shame!" Mrs. Holmes, two for you, mamma, and 'N. Barnard, Esq.,' such a fat one for you, Mr. Barnard; I'm sure it won't have got another one in it." Nick took it, blotted crimson, and put it in his pocket. It was from Mr. Darley.

Supper, as every thing else must, came to an end at last; but after supper there was a turn on the terrace, and, after that, something else, which kept us with the rest of the party, and it was not till we were alone in the little bedroom we were to share for the night that Nick could venture to open his letter.

I don't know which was most eager. I looked over with him and read:

"MR. DEAR NICK,—If you believed how much I was to me to be obliged to send you the telegram to my last letter, you will not, I am sure, think that I give me the greatest pleasure to forward that which accompanies this. Second thoughts, they say, are best. I fancy you will not quarrel with the truth of the saying in your case. I think you had better come here at once on your return. There will be several business matters to arrange, and I may possibly, by then, be able to say what allowance I shall be able to let you have. You must be moderate in your expectations at first.
I hope Mrs. Darley may be able to persuade your mother to meet you here. Writing you all happiness,
I remain,
Your very truly,
T. DARLEY."

Nick stared at me. "Well, old boy, I congratulate you," I said, with a sickly smile, and the knob in my throat bigger than before; "I wish to goodness I could not; but I must—so I do."

Slowly once more he read through the letter, getting redder and redder every moment, till all of a sudden he threw it down into the middle of the room and burst out in a towering passion. "Second thoughts, indeed! and wasn't I have second thoughts too, I should like to know? A flimsy thing that I'm going to be kicked and then whistled for again, like a dog."

"Second thoughts, too—!" He stopped short and was quiet for a moment, and went on in a lower tone. "Jack, I've been an ass! The fact of the matter is, I don't care a snap for Minnie Darley; but I love your little sister Fanny a thousand times more than I can say. No, stop; don't say any thing yet, and don't go starting as if you had never read Romeo and Juliet, nor heard of such a person as Headline; but just listen quietly to me. I shall go right home to my chambers, and stick to the law night and day till I've doubled my dirty three hundred a year, and then I shall try my luck with Fanny. I've had two or three letters this year, and I know I've got wits enough if I can only stick to it, and I will. I was thinking the whole matter over last night. I guessed you were right yesterday, so I sat up and wrote a letter to old Darley to tell him I was very sorry for his daughter and all that; but that I've blowed if I'll have her. I didn't put it exactly like that, of course, but I was firm and civil, and I'll send the letter first thing to-morrow morning. I wonder when the post goes? Have you got any stamps, by-the-by?"

I never was so taken aback in my life, and had literally a difficulty in catching my breath. There was a vague feeling of relief with it all. Minnie's account got over it, and who could tell what might not happen then? but the complications before us were appalling.

"Let me see your letter." It was at my feet. I picked it up, tore it open, and looked for her signature, and read—

"Dear Sir,
Your obedient servant,
"MRS. AND FANNY."

I suppose I opened my eyes wider, if possible, than they were before, for, in a second, Nick had snatched the paper out of my hands. It was Minnie's letter, announcing the sudden death of old General Barnard, soon after he had executed a will which revoked a former one, bequeathing his money to build and endow two monasteries and a convent, and left all his property to Nick on his attaining the age of twenty-five.

Mr. Darley was named executor and trustee, with full powers to do as he thought best with the estate till Nick should come into possession. A dozen times, at least, we must have read it through. Nick at last broke the silence. "Jack, on second thoughts, I ain't sent this letter to old Darley."

I seized hold of his hand and shook it so that his arm was stiff for three days after, and it was a mercy that he was not disgraced by having it posthumously lengthened.

I have not much more to tell, and what there is is best told in few words.

Nick left us the next day but one, but before he went he caught Fanny (by accident, he says) alone on the garden.

What happened there I am sure I don't know; but I do know that when I met them coming back through the chestnuts, Fanny ran and threw her arms round my neck and kissed me, and Nick paid me double at least for his stiff arm.

Both of them, no doubt, thought it very cruel of my mother to refuse point-blank to allow the wedding till Fanny was eighteen; but, perhaps, in the whole, it was as well, for Nick in the mean time turned twenty-five, and was able to accept an invitation to stand as Conservative candidate for Helidon. When the appointed day—Fanny's birthday—came, I was in full orders, and had rung myself in as rector of Barnard.

I am not a good hand at describing a wedding, and am grossly ignorant of the difference between taciturns and tulle; but Emma and Edith Grey were two of our bridesmaids, and as Nick and Fanny were going to the East, and did not want Chavronix for the honeymoon, Mrs. Grey lost it not.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TO FURNITURE DEALERS AND HOTEL KEEPERS.

TUCKER'S PATENT SPRING BEDS.

There are some truths besides those mentioned in the Declaration of Independence that are self-evident, and though they may pertain to the less vital interests of the human race, they are by no means unimportant. Among these are these: A bed, to fulfil the purpose for which it is desired, must be comfortable; it must be so constructed as to insure convenience; it should, for easy transportation, be made portable; and, lastly, the common sense demands that it should be both elegant and economical. All of these essential requirements concur in the spring beds invented by Hiram Tucker, and it is confidently affirmed that nothing has yet been devised for man's comfort which is at all comparable to it. A single night's repose on one of these will cure the most inveterate sufferer of his sleeplessness. For sale wholesale by the TUCKER MANUFACTURING COMPANY, 110, 111, and 112 West Street, Boston, and 59 John Street, New York.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,

501 BROADWAY (at Nicholas Street). Photographic Materials, Stereoscopic Goods, WAR VIEWS, SCENERY, GROUPS, &c. Photographic Albums, great assortment, Cartes de Visite of Noted Persons, &c., &c. French, English, and American Novels.

PRINTING PRESS FOR SALE.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, Five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 24x31. Price $2500. The Press on which Harper's Weekly has been printed. Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 221 Pearl Street, New York.

FISHING TACKLE.

In all its varieties, for sale by A. DRAPER, No. 52 Nassau Street, one door from Maiden Lane, New York.

Patent Hook and Chain Fish-Hook. A perfect trap; springs open in the fish's mouth; sportmen and boys all want them. New agents wanted. Send 20 cents and stamp for two sample books, terms, and trade-price, to JOSEPH HILGGE, 120 Broadway, New York. Room 20.

Piano Study and Practice is Made Attractive.

By the System adopted in "RICHARDSON'S NEW METHOD." No long dry lessons, nor wearisome exercises, but SPLENDIDLY STUDIED throughout, and CHARMING MELODIES for practice, at every step. No one who has used this book will ever use or recommend any other. It is all that can be desired. Price $2.50. Sent postpaid. OLIVER DUTTON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for 25 cts.; 50 Photographs of Rebel Officers for 20 cts.; 100 Photographs of Female Soldiers for 25 cts.; 100 Actors for 25 cts. Address C. SEYMOUR, Holland, N.Y.

Brandreth's Pills,

WHICH TIMELY USE, UNDER PROVIDENCE, HAS OFTEN SAVED LIFE.

These celebrated Vegetable PILLS are so new, untried remedy; they have been used and tested in the United States for thirty years, and are relied upon by hundreds of thousands of families as almost their sole medicine when sick. No cure or expense is spared in their preparation, and it is certainly true when I assert that no king can have a medicine safer or surer than Brandreth's PILLS.

They produce a good effect upon disease almost immediately they are taken. By some wonderful power, perhaps electric or nervous influence, the progress of disease is arrested; where weakness and pain have been present, the system becomes clearer, and the patient soon obtains refreshing sleep.

The genuine BRANDRETH'S PILL BOX has upon it a UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT STAMP with B. BRANDRETH in White Letters in the seal.

Principal Office 254 Canal Street, New York. For sale by all respectable dealers in medicine.

MOTH AND FRECKLES.

Ladies afflicted with Dimorphosis on the Face, called moth-patches, or freckles, should use FERRY'S celebrated MOOTH and FRECKLE LOTION. It is infallible. Prepared by Dr. H. C. FERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond Street, New York. Sold by all druggists.

$200 PER MONTH.

Wanted—Gentlemen Agents to sell articles of universal use. Descriptive catalogues sent upon receipt of three 25¢ stamps. JAS. HATHWAY, 25 Maiden Lane.

$150 A MONTH! NEW BUSINESS FOR AGENTS.

H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Maine.

$1500 PER YEAR paid by SHAW & CLARK.

Hillsdale, Maine, or Chicago, Illinois.

CATAARRH—Norton's New Remedy for CATARRH.

removes at once mucus in the head, pain in the temples, offensive discharges, and extinguishes the disease at its fountain head forever. Price $1.00 a bottle. Send a stamp for a pamphlet to GERRIT NORTON, 11 Ann St.

A LADY, who has been cured of great nervous debility, after many years of misery, desires to make known to all fellow-sufferers the sure means of relief. Address, looking a stamp, MRS. M. KERRITT, P. O. Box 2, Boston, Mass., and the prescription will be sent free by return mail.

LOOK! LOOK!

Full instructions by which any person can master the great art of Ventriplomancy in a few hours sent by mail for 25 cents. Address M. A. Jagger, Collins, Illinois.

J. H. Winslow & Co.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELRY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000

WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASSETOES, GOSSETS, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every town and county.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO., 206 Broadway, New York.

MERWIN & BRAY,

MANUFACTURERS AND WHOLESALE DEALERS IN ARMS AND AMMUNITION OF ALL KINDS.

Leading Sporting Arms, of different calibers, Patent Revolvers, Arms Co.'s Bolt and Pocket Cartridges, &c., &c. The Bolt Size carries the Army and Navy Cartridges, the Patent Pistol the same size (Balls as Colt's &c.). These arms have no equal now in market. For further particulars, send for Illustrated Circular, MERWIN & BRAY, 202 Broadway, N. Y. P. S.—We manufacture all our own goods; also are Sole Agents for the celebrated Colt's Model Whitney Revolvers.

NEW MUSIC.

Twilight Dreams Waltz. D'Almeida. For violin 1c. Three O'Clock Galop. For violin, 15c. Piano. 25c. Maba Waltz. By D. Godfrey. For violin, 1c. Piano, 25c. Misa. Pina Quatre. (The set is formed the same as a plain cotillon, with an extra part, the "Misa-Fin," in the center.) Complete figure and set 1c. I can not sing the Old Song. Violin, 25c. Variations by S. Richardson. 4c. Piano, 25c. I have Heard Sweet Music Sounded. Violin, 25c. Mailed postpaid. FREDRICK BLUME, 106 Bowery.

FIRST PREMIUM IMPROVED

$5 SEWING MACHINE $5

The embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Originally patented May 11, 1846; Improvement patented June 9, 1862. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with complete attachment, is superior in operation, neat the ordinary sewing, and easy with needle or special variety of all kinds. Makes the most perfect and regular stitches by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity, making sixteen strokes to each revolution of the Wheel. Will sew on silk, cotton, linen, wool, &c., &c. Sewing machine manufactured. Warranted not to get out of order in 5 years. It has taken the premium at State Fairs, and received the approval of all the principal journals and of those who have used it. It is the only improved sewing machine that has received a premium, or that is PATENTED.

"For the dressmaker it is invaluable; for the household it supplies a vacant place."—Godey's Ladies' Book.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly makes the stitch strictly like hand-sewing."—New York Tribune.

Single machines, all complete, sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instructions, on receipt of the price, $5. Ship delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted every where. Circular, containing liberal inducements, sent free. Address all orders, FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE COMPANY, Office 125 Nassau Street, New York.

$2 ASTOUNDING! $2 Timekeeper $2

And Vest Chains, $2 00.

A genuine English Solid Silver Case Timekeeper, with accurate mechanical movement in the dial, in gold or silver case. Beautiful and elaborate in design, of exquisite workmanship, and remarkable for its compactness and absolute certainty as a timekeeper. Fully warranted for 5 years; will not get out of order, and will last a lifetime and is a most valuable and perfectly reliable Pocket Companion and an accurate timekeeper for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use. Price each, small size, with a rich gold plated Case, $2.00. Mailed free. Agents wanted every where. Price list free. Address M. A. SELL & CO., Importers of Watches, &c., 5, 5, corner Broadway and Fulton St., N. Y. Established 1847.

TO FARMERS.

POUDRETTE! POUDRETTE!!

The Lodi Manufacturing Company (the oldest manufacturers of Fertilizers in the United States) offer their celebrated Poudrette for sale at lower prices than any other fertilizer in market.

It is made from the night soil and offal of New York City, and has been in use by thousands of farmers for over a quarter of a century: $4 will manure an Acre of Corn in the hill, and increase the yield one third.

A Pamphlet with the experience in its use on Lawns, Garden Vegetables, Corn, Potatoes, and Tobacco, of hundreds of Farmers, some of whom have used it for over 20 years, containing also price, directions for use, &c., will be sent free to any person applying.

LODI MANUFACTURING CO.,

65 Courtlandt Street, New York.

Agents Wanted.—$20 a Day.

We want agents, male and female, in every county in the United States to sell Wilson's New 300 Levered Farmer Sewing Machine and the New England or Common Sense Machine. We will pay $20 per month, or give a large commission, at which the above wages can be made. For particulars address with stamp, to Wilson's Sewing Machine Manufacturing Co., ULYSSEUS, Ohio.

CHOLERA!—Preventive and Cure.

Hopman & Co.'s preparation, which was used with the best success in the Cholera of 1832, '49 and '54; and recommended by eminent physicians. They are not secret preparations, as the ingredients are stated on the label. Hopman & Co., Chemist and Druggists, Nos. 209, 201, and 176 Broadway, and Fourth Avenue, cor. Seventh Street, New York.

DR. GLOVER'S NEW CHAMPION LEVER TRUSS

It perfects. Trusses, bandages, &c., &c., of every kind constantly on hand. Send for circular. No. 11 Ann St.

CLOSING OUT SALE

OF THE NEUFCHATEL WATCH CO.

Coming to the failure and sudden closing of the works and business of the NEUFCHATEL WATCH CO.

A large number of fine Watches, manufactured especially for the United States, being heavy, first-class timekeepers, intended to stand hard usage and sudden changes of temperature, are left in our hands for immediate sale. As agents of the Company, we are obliged to dispose of this stock for cash in the shortest possible time. We have, therefore, decided on the plan announced in the one that will be producing the best result. This plan gives every one an opportunity of obtaining first-class timekeepers at a price that all can command. As every Certifiante represents a Watch, there are no blanks, and every one who invests in this sale acquires a Watch at half the retail price at least; and, if at all fortunate, one to wear with pride through life.

Remittances may be made at our risk in registered letters or by express, or post-office orders and drafts payable to our order, and we guarantee a safe return. This IN-BUSINESS sale delivery and safe return in every respect. We warrant every Watch as represented, and satisfaction is guaranteed in every instance. Knowing the worth of the stock, we can give a warranty to every purchaser. The price has been fixed at the very low figure in order to insure immediate sale; and all who desire to improve the opportunity should make early application.

HAZARD, MOORE & CO., 120 Broadway, New York, (late 202 Broadway)

AGENTS FOR THE NEUFCHATEL WATCH CO.

THE FOLLOWING SPECTACULAR LIST OF Fine Watches and Chains, Worth $350,000!

100 GOLD WATCHES

121 Gold hunting-cased Chronometers, from $175 to $250

122 Gold hunting-cased English Pat. Levers... 50 to 75

123 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 75 to 100

124 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 100 to 125

125 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 125 to 150

126 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 150 to 175

127 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 175 to 200

128 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 200 to 225

129 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 225 to 250

130 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 250 to 275

131 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 275 to 300

132 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 300 to 325

133 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 325 to 350

134 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 350 to 375

135 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 375 to 400

136 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 400 to 425

137 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 425 to 450

138 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 450 to 475

139 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 475 to 500

140 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 500 to 525

141 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 525 to 550

142 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 550 to 575

143 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 575 to 600

144 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 600 to 625

145 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 625 to 650

146 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 650 to 675

147 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 675 to 700

148 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 700 to 725

149 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 725 to 750

150 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 750 to 775

151 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 775 to 800

152 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 800 to 825

153 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 825 to 850

154 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 850 to 875

155 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 875 to 900

156 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 900 to 925

157 Gold hunting-cased Patent Levers... 925 to 950

THE NEW BOOKS OF THE SEASON

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

LIVINGSTONE'S ZAMBESI. Narrative of an Expedition to the Zambesi and its Tributaries; and of the Discovery of the Lakes Shirwa and Nyassa. 1855-1859. By David Livingstone. With Maps and Illustrations. Two Vols., $2.00. Uniform with Livingstone's "South Africa."

THE ADVENTURES OF HEUBEN DAVIDOFF: Seven Years and Four Months Captive in the Desks of Siberia. By James Greenwood, author of "Wild Sports of the West," "Gleanings of Europe," &c. Illustrated with numerous Engravings. Two Vols., $1.75.

THE LOST TALES OF MOUNTAIN. By Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton. Three Vols., $1.00.

Harper & Brothers will send the above Works by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the Price.

Of Every Million of Americans

800,000 are more or less Dyspeptic. But 100,000 of them are cured: for in their health, their strength, and business, they are suffering. Dr. J. C. WOOD'S "MILK OF BITTERS" there is a balm for every ailment of the "National Disease." Statistics prove that the cure of dyspepsia is a matter of life with the consumption of this medicine.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICE

For the Army and Navy Hospitals, Barracks, Camps, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Government style. Price of Type, Galleys, &c. 25 cts. Adams Express Company, 37 Ann St., New York.

5000 Agents Wanted, 25 per cent. commission. Inquire of the circular to H. & C., P. O. Box 11, New York.

Beck, Rose, and Wray's Improved Paper, and the most beautiful and durable. Address "B. & C.," Hillsdale, N. Y.

SHURE YOURSELF AND FAMILY AGAINST THE CHOLERA

By sending 50 cents for Dr. G. T. COLEMAN'S work on the Symptoms and Treatment, with the most effective Remedies. For sale by all New Agents and Dealers. Agents wanted. First National Bk'g and Pub. Co., 105 William Street, New York.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR JUNE, 1866.

CONTENTS: PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WAR—(First Part.)

ILLUSTRATIONS.—The Two-Wheel Wield—Pack Train—A Happy Family—Luna—Hospitality—The March upon Harper's Ferry—Bathing the Arsenal, Harper's Ferry—The Battery, Harper's Ferry—West News of the War—Watering House, Allen's Tavern—The Guard-House—Fencing.

THE THREE RIVER COUNTRY. Illustrations.—Denouncing the Value of Liberty—City of Austin—Oregon Lodge—The Universal Sin—The Great Magistral Lodge—Massachusetts Lodge—Peak Lodge—Oregon Mill, Upper Austin—Aboriginal Customs—City of the Candidates for Mayor—R. C. Field—The Grizzly Bear of West Virginia—Mr. Jackson's House, Austin—New York Speculations—Miss New—The Midas Mill—The Keystone Mill—The Coalfield Mill—The Patent Mill—Cotton City; Miss's Mill—The Mill of Dan's Mill—History and Antiquarianism of Boston—Seating Chamber of Misses Mill.

CHATTANOOGA. Are There Other Inhabited Worlds? Illustrations.—The Moon at Sunrise—The Moon during the Eclipse—The Planet Mars.

THE SPLENDID. LASTER LILIES. GLADSTONE AS LEADER OF THE COMMONS. THE LOVE AMERICAN. HENRY HATH, THE AFRICAN TRAVELER. With a Portrait.

ANNALS. By WILSON COLLIER. How the Firm. Charles III. Continued. The Diary Edited. Book of the East. CHAPTER I. At the Station. Illustration.—The Ship to Carthage.

THE FALL OF BULI-MOON. MISS LATTIA. AMERICAN STUDIOS IN HOME AND FLORENCE. A PSYCHOLOGICAL EXPERIMENT. A HIXIAN GEOGRAPHY. THE OUTSIDE WORLD. WORKING THE BEARD. EDITOR'S HASTY CHAIR. MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS. EDITOR'S DRAWER.

TERMS. One Copy for one Year $4 00

An Extra Copy gratis, for every Club of Five Subscribers, at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $8 00.

Circulation 112,000.

The Publishers will accept a limited number of first-class Advertisements for their Magazine, at the following low rates:

One Page $25 00

Half Page 12 50

Quarter Page 6 25

Or $1 50 per line for a 100 lines. Average eight words to a line.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation nearly 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS. One Copy for One Year $4 00

One Copy for Three Months 1 00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Five Subscribers, at $4 00 each, or 6 Copies for $20 00. Payment invariably in advance.

The Bound Volumes of HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement will be sent to any part of the United States, free of postage, upon receipt of the price, viz.:

Cloth Binding $1 00 per Volume.

Half Morocco 1 00

Each Volume contains the Numbers for One Year.

TERMS TO ADVERTISERS.—One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for inside, and Two Dollars per line for outside Advertisements, each insertion.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

LOST PROPERTY.

ANXIOUS MOTHER (to Grandfather). "Papa, Where's the Baby? Nurse says she left it with you."

NEW NOVELS

- Published by Harper & Brothers, New York. Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price. Armada. By William Conway...

Robinson & Ogden, BANKERS, AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES, No. 4 Broad St., New York.

Robinson & Ogden, Bankers. Collections made, with quick returns. Interest allowed on Deposits...

POLLAK & SON Manufacturers of Brass and Copper Goods. No. 410 N. Y. St., New York.

Marvin's Patent ALUM AND DRY PLASTER, FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFES. Newer low their fire-proof qualities...

E. REMINGTON & SONS, MANUFACTURERS OF Revolvers, Rifles, Muskets, and Carbines. For the United States Service...

Economy is Wealth. If you want the best-fitting, strongest, and most comfortable Paper Collar ever offered...

PESTACHINE. It is the Best Hair Dresser for the Hair, also an excellent dressing. Invented by Dr. BOGOT...

MAGIC LANTERN AND STEREOSCOPE. We are now receiving the best...

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO., 24 Broadway, 2 doors south of the St. Nicholas Hotel.

100 TERRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT! SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

ART NOTICE. FINE MINIATURES. WENDEROTH, TAYLOR & BROWN, PHILADELPHIA.

MUSICAL BOXES. Playing from one to thirty-six different tunes...

GILMORE & CO.'S CELEBRATED BAND INSTRUMENTS. EXTENSIVELY USED IN THE ARMY AND NAVY.

MOTT'S CHEMICAL POMADE. Is the best hair-dressing and restorer known.

ITCH. (WHEATON'S) ITCH. Salt Rheum. OINTMENT Salt Rheum. Will cure the Itch in 48 hours...

CHILBLAINS CURB and PREVENTIVE. A remedy that, in a very few days, will cure...

Special Announcement. THE UNITED STATES PRIZE CONCERT. WILL POSITIVELY BE GIVEN AT CROSBY'S OPERA-HOUSE, ON MAY 28, 1866.

Local and General Agents will please make a note of the above facts, and "govern themselves accordingly." They can easily see the necessity of making returns promptly each week.

GEDAR CAMPHOR. Cheapest and best defense against Cholera-Morbus. Prepared by HARRIS & GRAPMAN, Boston.

50 PER-CENT SAVED BY USING B. V. HARRIS'S LARVA-SAVING SOAP.

TAXIDERMISTS' MANUAL. GIVING full instruction in Skinning, Mounting and Preserving Birds, Animals, Reptiles, Fishes, Insects, Eggs, Skeletons, &c.

MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY. To be found on each box and each piece of GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLE.

Dr. Foote's Advertisements. OLD EYES MADE NEW, without Spectacles, Doctor, or Medicine. Trapped and mailed free.

Steinway & Sons' GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANO-FORTES

Have taken 59 First Prizes, gold and silver medals at the Principal Fairs held in this country...

Tool and Horticultural Chests FOR SPRING TRADE. A full assortment of Tool Chests, all sizes, from $2 up to $125...

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE. Magnifying small objects 500 times. Magnifies every article for 50 times...

FOR PUBLIC EXHIBITIONS. Stereoscopes, Magic Lanterns, and Dissolving Views, with pictures from all parts...

WANTED. EVERY BODY WANTS DR. GILBERT'S PILE REMEDY. cures every case No pain. Relief in five minutes.

CROQUET AND CRICKET. J. PARKER, Commission, France, manufactures the game of Croquet, and Imports Cricket Goods.

LOCKWOOD'S MOULDED COLLARS. The Trade supplied with all Styles and Sizes at 93 Rensselaer Street, N. Y. & 255 South Third St., Phila.

THE UNIVERSITY OF IOWA

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. X.—No. 492.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 2, 1866.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS WARNER,
Author of "The Wide, Wide World."

CHAPTER III.

"Well, young ones," said Mr. May, next morning at breakfast, "what of the lists? Are they made up?"

"Not finished, papa," said Clover.

"Papa," said Lily, "it's terribly hard work!"

Mr. May laughed.

"I thought so," he said. "And so you have all been busied with a dozen things? Well, I have chosen three places for the gardens. My part of the work was easy."

"Oh! papa," said Lily, "whereabouts is mine?"

"Why, that is as you all agree," said Mr. May. "I promised to provide the places, but you must do the dividing yourselves. The first is down by the fence, just in front of the bow-window. The second lies close at the foot of the window itself."

"Papa," said Clover, "may the one who has the place by the fence let her flowers run on it?"

"The one by the fence may do what she likes with the fence, except pull it down. In like manner the one by the window may do any thing with that except break it. The third place lies down at the foot of the slope to the west; toward the side fence but not by it. This is rather the largest of the three."

"Oh, I should like to have the largest!" said Lily.

"Till the weeds come," said her father. "My dear, have you thought about the weeds?"

"Oh! I don't think to let 'em come—so I needn't think about 'em," said Lily. "But Clover's the oldest, she ought to choose first."

"I don't care about choosing," said Clover. "I dare say I can make something of either place."

"Well, then, I shall take the large place down at the foot of the slope," said Lily. "I can't bear to be crowded."

"Now, Prim," said Clover, "you must choose next."

"By what rule of preference?" said Mr. May, who was watching the progress of affairs with a good deal of interest.

"She is the smallest, papa—it might make more difference to her."

"May I really choose?" said Primrose. "I don't think it's fair."

"Why you it is, if I wish it," said Clover.

"Well, then," said Prim, with grateful pleasure in her very tone, "I choose the place under the window. Because mamma can look at me when I'm at work; and I might be lonely down there by the fence."

"I am sure mamma will approve that arrangement," said Mr. May, as they left the table. "Clover," he said, softly, bending down with his arm round her, "are you quite content?"

"I? Oh yes, papa! I shouldn't enjoy any thing, you know, if Lily and Prim were not pleased. And besides, don't you think, papa," said Clover, drawing him off to the window, "that my fence will be an advantage, and give me nice facilities?"

Mr. May laughed; but there was great tenderness in his eyes as he stooped and kissed the honest, sensible little face, and went away.

"Yes," he said, "you'll find 'facilities' enough, and turn them all into felicities!"

Clover stood still, looking out at her fence.

"Oh, Sam!" said Lily, "will you dig our gardens this morning?"

"Certainly not," said Sam, without hesitation.

"Oh, why not? I thought you would do any thing!"

"I will not, chiefly because it is impossible," said Sam. "The ground is frozen as hard as a rock."

"Why, is it?" said Lily—"frozen? That's very strange."

"On the contrary, it is just what happens every year about this time."

"But when will it melt?" said Lily.

"Melt?" cried Jack; "the ground melt! Ha, ha! that's a good one!"

"Well, I don't see what you're laughing at," said Lily. "Other frozen things melt."

"Yes," said Sam, "other frozen things melt, but the ground does not."

"And as soon as the ground thaws will you dig up our gardens, Sam?" said little Prim.

"If I live and am well, you may depend upon it. As soon as the ground will work, I will."

"What do you mean by the ground's working?" said Clover, tussling round from the window.

"Why, just now it is frozen hard, you know; and when it first begins to thaw it is very wet—more like mud than earth; and it is impossible to dig it well and break up the lumps, and make it fine and smooth. Indeed you can hardly dig it at all. But when the water drains off a little, and the warm sun has shone upon it for a while, the earth gets dry and crumbly, and then it will work. So shall I. You'll find those three gardens dug when you first get up some morning, I've no doubt."

"How interesting it is!" said Clover.

"But, Sam," said little Primrose, "please don't dig my garden when we're asleep, because I want to see you do it."

"Why, it's not much to see, is it?" said Lily.

"Just dig it up, that's all, isn't it?"

"Just dig it up, just right," said Sam; "and put on just what is wanted, and make it just smooth afterward."

"What do you put on, Sam?" said Clover.

"Measure of some kind. I must ask papa what kind this soil needs."

"Is it hard to dig it just right?" said Primrose.

"I hope it won't be, after the frost is out," said her brother. "I'll do my best to get it in nice order for your plants and seeds."

"We haven't got any plants," said Lily, "we shall have only seeds. Except mamma's rose-bush."

"Oh!" said Sam, who was turning over the Catalogue, "you've taken care of that, have you?"

"Taken care of it?" said Lily; "why we haven't got money to buy plants."

"Plants come from seeds."

"But, Sam," said Lily, "how can we sow our seeds till we get the ground to sow 'em in?"

"It does sound difficult," said Sam. "Are those lists made out?"

"Mine is," said Lily.

"Mine isn't," said Primrose.

"I can finish mine very soon," said Clover, "now I know where my garden's to be."

"Let's look over yours first, then, Lily, if that is ready," said Sam.

"Oh, I'd like to have you, very much," said Lily. "I guess you'll think it's beautiful. You know papa told us to choose; but then each of us had such different reasons for choosing that I don't believe we've got one thing alike. You see I took (generally, I mean) the flowers with easy names—I got so bothered with names half a yard long. And Prim wanted all the sweet things; and Clover," said Lily, with a laugh, "wanted all the awful things. Cef-fal flowers; it's such a funny idea!"

Sam looked comically down at his Catalogue.

"The three lists, then," he said, "may be divided into Sweet, Useful, and Easy-Useless."

"Well you may laugh," said Lily, "but you'll see what a grand list I've got, if it is easy-useless. I didn't want flowers that were too much trouble, Sam; and I'd rather have something that I can call snap-dragon at once, and not be always saying 'the tall, blue thing,' or 'the little pink thing,' because I can't remember its name."

"Very judicious and proper," said Sam, opening the Catalogue. "I conclude, then, that snap-dragon heads the Easy-Useless list."

"Yes, it does," said Lily; "this one down here; 'best and brightest varieties mixed.' That was the one Clover advised me to take."

"Useful advice at any rate," said Sam. "What comes next? Anemone warwickii?"

"No indeed," said Lily.

"This one, perhaps, then—amblyopis setigera."

"I should think people would be ashamed to give flowers such names," said Lily. "Little innocent things that can't help themselves. No, this is the next—aster: the penny-flo-ered perfection, mixed colors. Then comes calendula—that's a sort of marigold you see—and then comes. That looks so beautiful that I had to take it. And the 'mixed varieties' are only five cents."

"That sounds useful," said Sam. "How about this great cockscomb?"

"I don't like the looks of it much," said Lily. "I sha'n't take it. But here's a pretty thing, Sam—this little dwarf convolvulus—convolvulus minor. You see convolvulus major is morning-glory, but I've taken the minor. Ten cents—and all sorts of colors. And one must have some little things, I suppose. Then now come the pinks—just look at them! I've taken one, and Primrose another, and Clover another."

"You could not have made a better choice," said Sam.

"Then I've got this hollyhock," said Lily—"showy and double." "I hope you like that? And oh! Sam, what do you think about sun-dew-ers?—just see, 'perfectly double,' and 'from five to eight feet high.'"

"I never saw one so tall," said Sam, waiving the more difficult question of his thoughts.

"Well, I'll see," said Lily; "I couldn't quite make up my mind. But flax—I must have that—'brilliant crimson,' and flowers all summer. I didn't know flax was so beautiful."

"This is not the common kind," said Sam.

"I wanted some pansies, but I couldn't have every thing," said Lily, turning over the leaves rather fast, as if to hide from her sight all the unobtainable beauties; "and of course I couldn't give up those petunias. There—just look! But they are terribly expensive—twenty cents; and that just takes all the rest of my money! Now, Sam, what do you think? Isn't it a good list?"

"Very good," said Sam, "and not difficult."

"There's all sorts of peas and beats over here," said Lily; "but I thought they would be common. And there's something else, beginning with a Z, that looks handsome; but the name's ugly. And one can't have every thing."

"THE LITTLE QUEEN OF THE WOODS."—(FROM A PAINTING BY J. G. BROWN.)

 "Sam, where did you learn so much about flowers?" said Mrs. May from her table.
 "At Tharabaska, mamma, while I was at school. Mr. Austin's place was close by, and I did a great deal of work and play too in his gardens."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 2, 1866.

MAKING TREASON ODIOS.

THE President has directed that RAPHAEL SEMMES, the late commander of the late Arlowss, shall not, while he remains unpardoned, hold or exercise the function of Probate Judge, to which office he had just been elected in Mobile. This is an indication of caution and prudence which will be commended by every good citizen.

When Mr. JOHNSON became President he made many speeches to many deputations, and the refrain of every speech was that treason must be made odious. No sentiment he ever uttered was more approved. It was not because he was understood to mean that there must be universal vengeance. No sensible man wished that there should be a general hanging and confiscation and outlawry. No one who knew history and human nature imagined that the peace which had been won could be secured by a vindictive policy. Treason was to be made odious by honoring patriotism. The Government was to favor those who had been faithful to it during the long, dark day of rebellion. Such a policy was founded in common sense. It was intelligible to the dullest mind. Why, then, has it been so often disregarded?

We are not of those who say or believe that the President wishes to put the Government into the hands of its enemies. It is sheer folly to insist that he is anxious to welcome red-handed rebels into Congress. A man is not proved a villain because his views appear to be short-sighted and perilous. Some of the honestest men in the world have done the most mischief, but for all that they were not bad men. That the President should wish to see the Union restored to its normal condition during his Administration is most natural and laudable; nor is it necessary to suspect the motives of such a desire. We disagree, indeed, with many of his views, and the temper in which he often discusses public affairs in his popular speeches is most lamentable. His disposition to make assent to his theories the test of patriotic fidelity is, of course, simply preposterous, and any systematic attempt upon his part, which we do not anticipate, but which is clamorously urged upon him, to proffrate the vast patronage of office for the promotion of his own purposes, however honestly those purposes may be sustained, we trust will be Constitutionally opposed to the utmost. But we believe he heartily deprecates the unpromising state of feeling in large portions of the late rebel section, and while he is inclined to attribute it to the delay of Congress to admit loyal representatives from that section, he probably entirely forgets how much of the unsatisfactory condition of the late insurgent States is due to departures from the policy of making treason odious.

When the Union men of those States who have suffered every kind of outrage, who have been fined, mobbed, imprisoned, and have seen their Union neighbors hunted and tortured and hung for their fidelity to the Government, see a man like General HUNTER, of Mississippi, a conspicuous, leading traitor hastily pardoned by the President that he may become Governor; when they see Mr. MONROE, of New Orleans, another chief traitor, pardoned that he may become Mayor; when they see members of the Cabinet deliberately annulling the law of the land in order to appoint late rebels to national offices, while the most noted and tried Union men in the insurgent States ask in vain for such recognition of their fidelity, how can such men help bitterly feeling the contemptuous scorn with which the triumphant rebels regard them? How can they help asking why they might not as well have been rebels? How can they help in conviction that the policy of the Executive's quodulation of rebels and not recognition of Union men, or avoid asking with intense indignation whether this is the way in which treason is to be made odious?

On the other hand, what is more natural than that the late rebels who, as the President solemnly declared last year, were to be made odious, seeing exactly what the Union men see, should denounce Congress precisely as they used to denounce "the North," should heap every insulting superlative upon the most loyal men in the country, should vociferously declare their "rights," and begin vehemently to expound the Constitution which for four years they have trampled under foot? What is more natural than that these men whose treason, the President taught us, was to make them odious, should persecute with savage ferocity the most unfortunate and defenseless of all Union men in the South, the freedmen, attack their teachers and assassinate the officers of the Bureau, when they see that the Executive is plainly hostile to the Freedmen's Bureau, is reluctant to secure their civil rights, and sternly denounces as traitors their especial friends? What is more natural than that these men who were to be made odious should make it odious to have been a Union man, and as Mr. BORRIS says in Virginia, should "assume a superiority over the loyal men of this State, impudent, defiant, and determined to ostracize, decapitate, and put the brand of infamy upon loyal men, and by legislation to render treason commendable and loyalty a crime." What wonder that the late rebel Mayor of Mobile, at a banquet of rebels, tossed together ANDREW JOHNSON and JEFFERSON DAVIS, while JOHN MEXON BORRIS, whose fidelity to the Union will not be questioned, declares that he has abandoned President JOHNSON'S plan?

What is the explanation of this extraordinary state of affairs? A year ago, amidst the total ruin of the rebellion and exhaustion of the rebel section, and with the hearty sympathy and support of every loyal man in the land, Mr. JOHNSON became President, declaring, while all the people said Amen, that treason must be made odious. Now, when a year has passed, it is loyalty that is odious and dangerous in the disaffected section, and the vast body of loyal citizens gaze at the President in wonder. Is this situation to be explained by the delay of Congress to admit loyal representatives from unorganized States, or by the fact that the Executive has not succeeded in making treason odious in those States?

If from the moment he became President Mr. JOHNSON, while he reasonably pardoned and amnestied the late rebels, had strenuously supported in every way the constant Union men of the rebel States, if he had shown the most unflinching determination that every right of the freedmen should be respected, and had every where manifested the success of the Government by its official preference of those who had defended it and believed in it under terrible trials, then, whatever his differences with Congress upon questions of method might have been, his policy would have been as approved and resistless as that of Mr. LINCOLN. As it is, the Union men of the Southern States are either silenced as before and during the war, or else with Mr. BORRIS they mean to try for their rights independently of the President.

The sad and stringent testimony of Mr. BORRIS and of Ex-Governor HOLDEN of North Carolina, neither of them "Radicals," supported by the constant evidence of private letters and of the frankest statements of Southern Union men, that should the military force be withdrawn they could not continue to live at home—the incessant assaults upon the freedmen's schools and teachers—the testimony of General GRANT and of General SHERMAN that a military force must be retained for a long time yet in the late disaffected States—the ferocity of the late rebel press, and the undoubted fact, as Governor HOLDEN says, that "the true Unionists are dejected, cowed, proscribed, under the ban socially, pecuniarily, and politically," should certainly induce the President to consider whether there may not be some better explanation of the situation than the radicalism of Congress. A little radicalism is perhaps natural and even pardonable under the circumstances. And we have no doubt that if the Executive should unwaveringly insist upon making treason odious, not by hanging or imprisoning or confiscating, nor by treating every man who was in arms as if he were a murderer, but by that firm preference of tried fidelity which is perfectly intelligible and practicable, the morbid truculence of tone in the late rebel section would abate, the painful and prolonged rupture in the great Union party would begin to heal, and the prospect of a truly "restored Union" would become much more promising.

EQUALIZING REPRESENTATION.

At a late political meeting in Philadelphia Senator COWAN, of Pennsylvania, is reported to have declared that he was opposed to any amendment of the Constitution at this time. The importance of any opinion of Mr. COWAN'S is due entirely to the public impression that he speaks for the President. But that he does so upon this subject we can not believe. For can it be seriously supposed, even by Senator COWAN, that the loyal people of this country intend that the late rebel States shall have gained political power by their rebellion? Are the States which conspired against the Union not only to have ceased the countless sacrifices of life, the enormous debt of the country, and the universal derangement of all commercial and social relations, but also to have increased their weight in the National Government? Yet such will be the result if no amendment is made to the Constitution equalizing representation.

Mr. OWEN, in his admirable letter, shows that in the eleven States lately in insurrection the population is in the proportion of three-fifths white to two-fifths colored. If the three-fifths, to which belongs the dangerous element in those States, exclude the two-fifths from voting, and the Constitution remains unchanged, every three white voters in those States will have as much political power in Congress and in all Presidential elections as every five white voters in the other States. Is it for this result that Shiloh was fought and the fiery battles of the Wilderness? Is it for this that SUMNER marched to the sea, that our brothers were tortured to idleness and death at Andersonville and Belle Isle, and that untold thousands of them are buried in unknown graves? Mr. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS tells us that the opinions of those who led the rebellion are unchanged. Do we, then, propose to give them an unjust advantage in the political arena to which the debate is now adjourned? Senator COWAN says yes. We trust he may live long enough to hear the loyal country, the citizens who have been the soldiers and sailors, and their brethren and friends, answer the question.

The eleven late insurrectionary States are entitled under the present apportionment, reckoning the whole population white and colored as the basis, to fifty-eight representatives; under a purely white basis they would be entitled to forty-two. Even then they would have an unchanged representation in the Senate, and consequently in a Presidential election the white voters of those States would have an advantage over the white voters of the other States. This should be remedied by the election of President directly by the people.

The question is simple. Shall we, by leaving the Constitution unamended upon this point, say to the chief insurrectionary States that so long as their white population which supported the rebellion chooses to disfranchise the colored population which was loyal, every white voter shall have twice or twice and a third as much political power in the Government as the white voter of the States that did not rebel? This is the question which should be put to the country unembarrassed by any other proposition. This is the amendment suggested by the Committee of Congress, which we hope will be freed from the four years' disfranchisement of those who adhered to the rebellion and then offered to the Legislatures of the States. The result, we imagine, will teach Senator COWAN that a victorious people can be magnanimous without folly, and conciliatory without forgetting common sense and justice.

THE ENGLISH REFORM BILL.

THE next step in Mr. GLADSTONE'S Reform bill, it appears, is the redistribution of seats—or, as we call it, the reapportionment of representation. The disproportion between the representation and the population in different parts of the British islands has always been extraordinary. It has arisen from the ancient borough and county rights and privileges which it was the object of the "Municipal Reform" bill of the year 1835 to regulate. Parliament is composed of members elected by counties, by boroughs, by a certain number of cities, and by the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin. Upon certain towns and boroughs the right of voting was anciently conferred by the gracious will of the King; but in a town where there was a corporation it was that, and not the people, which was represented.

In 1790 the city of London had 500,000 inhabitants and four representatives; while the county of Cornwall, with a population of 175,000, had 44 representatives. In the same year 575 voters, scattered among 80 boroughs, sent 60 members to Parliament. The member for Taverton was chosen by 14 voters; the member for Tavistock by 10. The borough of Old Sarum is historical. Old Sarum is the synonym of a rotten borough. This was a deserted spot of half a dozen old houses and a dozen inhabitants, and was entitled to two representatives, who were generally nominated either by the steward or butler of the proprietor of the sea-shore stepped into a boat with three others, and the election took place at sea. But in the debates of 1831 the Lord Advocate mentioned a case where the constituency was composed, in addition to the sheriff and the registering officer, of one person—who met, called himself to order, took the chair, nominated himself, seconded the nomination, voted for himself, and declared himself unanimously elected.

In Middlesex, in 1844, it appeared that the voters were 1 in 115, in Lancashire 1 in 80, and in West Surrey 1 in 26. Tavistock, which in 1790 sent one member for 10 voters, now elects two members by 433 voters. Honiton has 283 electors and two members; Totnes 250 and two members; Thetford 217 and two members. Mr. ROBERT LOWE is one of the most active and forcible opponents of the GLADSTONE Reform bill. He represents Caithness, and is elected by 175 voters, a majority of whom, or 88 voters, would counterbalance the votes of 11,396 electors in the northern division of the West Riding of Yorkshire. Mr. LAWSON, Attorney-General for Ireland, represents a constituency of 86 electors. His seat would be secured by 44 votes, and his vote is of course equal in the House to that of either of the members for Cork, whose constituency numbers 15,572.

These extraordinary inequalities are natural in a system of government of classes and not of the people; and they explain much of the condition of England. The perception of the inadequacy and injustice of the representation brought the country into plain view of civil war in 1831 and '2; but such is the political progress even in England, that the year 1867 will probably see a man who believes in universal intelligent suffrage Prime Minister.

NATIONAL BANK SCANDALS.

THE pending investigation of the affairs of the Merchants' National Bank at Washington reveals facts which, though scandalous enough to shock any outside observer, were not unexpected by those who have made themselves familiar with the working of the National Bank system. It not only appears that the heaviest deposits of public money in the Washington bank were made after its insolvency was established, but it further appears that a considerable portion of that very money was used in stock operations in Wall Street. In other words, stock speculators got control of the bank, used its money in Wall Street and lost it, and, to make good their losses, contrived to induce Government agents (it is needless to mention names) to give them more money to speculate still further. It is the old story of JACKSON or KATZBACH.

The scandal might pass over and be forgotten in the usual nine days were the Merchants' National Bank a solitary specimen of its kind. But it is only one of two or three score institutions which have been fattening on the public money. Over twenty-four millions of public money were, at the date of the last Treasury return, deposited for safe-keeping in National Banks. The amount must now be reduced to less than twenty-three millions and a half by the failure of the Merchants' Bank. All this money is left with the National Banks free of interest; though, simultaneously, the Treasury Department is paying 4 and 5 per cent. interest on $130,000,000 of temporary deposits which it does not need. A smart financier can thus make money very easily. All that is requisite is to get his bank appointed a Government depository, which is readily done. A little further exertion secures him a deposit of half a million. If he does not choose to take trouble or to run risks, he takes the money to the Sub-Treasury in New York or Philadelphia, and lends it to Government at 4 per cent. Thus our obliging Secretary actually pays 4 per cent. interest for the use of his own money, and our smart National Bank makes $20,000 a year without risk or labor. This may be very grand in theory, but in practice it strikes us as that financing of the order is not the way to restore a sound currency or to promote economy.

There are points of view in which the National Bank system commands approval. It is an improvement on the old State system, which involved such wide variations in the values of the currencies of different States, and opened the door for so many frauds. No one would now desire to abolish it, and go back to the old plan. In the main it is a success. But it can not be denied that the system, as at present administered, is susceptible of improvement. The public will not much longer pay taxes at the rate of $16 50 per head for the purpose of enabling National Banks to realize 12 per cent. on their capital—as they do by drawing 6 per cent. on the bonds deposited with the Controller of the currency, and 5 more by using the currency issued to them on the deposit of said bonds. Sooner or later, Congress will tax the bonds deposited at a rate which will absorb the bulk of the interest they bear; and no sound objection will be urged against the measure. Nor is there any justification for the deposit of public moneys in National Banks when the Government has Sub-Treasuries and national depositories in which its moneys can be safely kept. Apart from the risk which such money runs—quite needlessly, there is something demoralizing in placing at the gratuitous disposal of speculative bankers large sums of money which may not be called for in months, and by the use of which, with good luck, fortunes may be realized.

It is notorious in Wall Street that the bulk of the "fancy stocks," which have been lately inflated in that meridian, are "carried" with money loaned by National Banks—in good part, doubtless, money really owned by the Government. The money of the Merchants' National Bank at Washington was lost, it is said, in Chicago and North Western, and one or two fancy coal stocks. It had previously been used to corner Michigan Southern—so 'tis said. Who can say how the other $25,500,000 of Government money in the National Banks is being employed? Is this the money which is inflating Canton, and Quicksilver, and Mariposa, and Pittsburg, and Fort Wayne, and the other lively "fancies" of the street? Or is it em-played in carrying gold—with a view to put up the premium and depreciate the national currency? If Mr. McCULLOCH is willing to lend his own money to National Banks without interest, while at the same time he borrows money of the same banks at four per cent., there would be no inconsistency in his selling gold to keep down the premium, and at the same time furnishing buyers of gold with currency (free of interest) to carry the precious metal and so defeat his object.

The Editors of Harper's Weekly are published by LEWIS PERRY, Inc., No. 120, Broadway, New York, with permission from Harper & Row, N. Y. Subscriptions are $14 for one year $27 for two years in advance.

History incessantly repeats itself. Thirty-two or three years ago Government deposited its money with State banks, which used it to foster speculation, and the result was the crash of 1837 and heavy losses of Government money. We seem to be treading in the old path. If Government continues to employ the National Banks as depositories of the public money, in disregard of the established Sub-Treasuries, the amount in the keeping of these institutions will soon swell from $3,500,000 to double that amount. The Sub-Treasurers have no interest in increasing their deposits; the National Banks have every reason to desire their increase. And at Washington the latter appear to have more friends than the former. Mr. McCULLOCH is understood to have interfered with the War Department last week to prevent the summary withdrawal of paymasters' funds from the National Banks; and the Controller of the Currency has written a letter to say that in his opinion National Bank notes are quite as good as greenbacks. If Congress does not interfere, this sort of thing points very clearly to increased deposits in the National Banks, a vast speculation based on such deposits, and another 1837 within a year or two. It is for Congress and the tax-payers to say whether this risk shall be incurred.

THE LATE RIOT AT MEMPHIS.

A PRIVATE letter to us from Memphis, written just before the late riot by a careful and impartial observer who is the reverse of a "Radical," is an interesting revelation of the state of society in that city, and explains the late shameful scenes there. Our correspondent is speaking of the Freedmen's Bureau, and says:

"The Provost Marshal of the Bureau attends every morning at the station-houses to which cases in which the colored men are concerned. This is quite necessary, the civil authorities of the city being mostly Irish, and terribly vindictive to the negro. Two or three cases of their gross intolerance come under my notice. The Mayor is a full-blooded Irishman, and the only justice I saw are of the same nationality. Brutal insults and all kinds of mistreatments are common. In Memphis one of the ordinances is, that a stranger not a slaveholder can only sell through the agency of commissionaires appointed for that purpose. The police are constantly on the watch for infractions of this ordinance. Now upon the steamer Louisville, a boat I traveled on, there was a large number of boxes full of poultry going to New Orleans. A well-dressed man coming on board and addressing a colored porter, asked if they were for sale; he was told that the man who owned them was in at dinner. Without further words he carried off the porter to prison. When the man was released, and the captain inquired what had become of him, he sent another colored man to the station with a message that it was altogether a mistake. This man was likewise detained in Danversville. The clerk on the boat went next, but without satisfaction. So the captain went up, and was told that his man was to be held for trial for breaking a city ordinance. He asked that the court sit and decide the matter. This was at once refused. He next demanded to see the law. The Irish judge pulled out a dog's-eared old order-book, and pointing to a page, remarked, 'There, damn it, is a copy of the law.' The captain would not leave his room, and even offered his boat as security for his appearance, without avail. He then brought him of the Bureau, through which the man was released, the captain leaving fifty dollars with the officer as a bond to produce the man if wanted at a future time. The court was now in session; now was the informer rebuked for riding and saying 'he would be damned if he was going to lose his three dollars.' Under such laws about a hundred negroes are at present held."

It is not surprising that in such a city upon the slightest pretense the police force and the rabble should engage in a bloody hunt of this unhappy class of the population. We gave last week the details of the sad scenes of the first days of May. The animus of this terrible riot is evident. It was that hatred of the colored race which is made more malignant in the late Slave States by the fact of its unswerving loyalty during the war. That the drunken colored soldiers were quarrelsome and noisy and ruder as drunken white soldiers are under similar circumstances is undoubtedly true. But no conduct of white soldiers would have occasioned so prolonged and murderous a persecution. The Memphis Dispatch, which was a furious advocate of the rebellion, and is now of course an equally furious opponent of "the Radicals," gravely states that in this wanton massacre of negroes and burning of their houses "Radical ferocity was indulging a partial satisfaction." In precisely the same spirit when the foreign rabble of New York hung and shot and burned the inoffensive negroes in the summer of 1863, the New York World, and other papers in sympathy with the rebellion, spoke of the loathsome crimes of a mad mob as a movement of "the people."

Both these shameful riots spring from the inhuman prejudice against the colored population which is carefully fostered and inflamed by the Democratic party. We appeal to any intelligent man whether it is a fact that that population is generally or notoriously lawless or criminal or malignant. We appeal to our history to declare whether for the last eighty years they have been more sinned or sinned against in this country. And we appeal to Yankee common-sense to decide whether a party whose sole policy is contemptuous injustice toward a seventh part of the population is not a party radically dangerous to the peace and welfare of the country.

General STONEMAN's letters upon the riots to the people of Memphis are manly and decided. They show that the peace will now be maintained if he has force sufficient. General FISK, of the Freedmen's Bureau, and a Committee of Congress are engaged in investigating the circumstances of the disturbance. Those who ask why this is done by Congress forget that Memphis is still under the National care.

A SIGN IN VIRGINIA.

THE Virginia Union Convention is one of the most cheerful signs of the times. It is an indication of the self-respect and confidence of the large number at the South, who although compelled to silence during the war still nourished the true faith. For a year they have been as silent as before, apparently waiting to see the salvation of the victory which their cause had won. But at last they begin to see that they must save themselves, and Mr. CHAMBERS, of Portsmouth, touched the mainspring of their final success when he said that "the true policy of the Union men in the South should be to 'avail themselves of the negro element.'" This is indeed obvious, when we consider that the colored population compose a solid body of the staunch Unionists. We confess, however, that we had not expected this inevitable and decisive position to be so soon taken, and the fact that it has been in proof of the earnestness of those who plant themselves upon it. We call it inevitable, because with the vast moral support given to impartial suffrage by the most intelligent class of citizens in the country, and its sure final triumph, it was impossible that, as political differences began to express themselves again in the rebel States, this immense resource of strength should be disregarded.

It is a significant fact that no political Convention has declared itself for impartial suffrage more plainly and forcibly than the late assemblage at Alexandria. It was in that city that the first advance of the United States was made against the external lines of the late rebellion, and it is there that the first blow of a Southern State is given to the vital spirit of the rebellion. When the platform of this Convention becomes the policy of the late rebel States the cornerstone of an enduring peace will be laid.

The Convention organized the Union Republican party of Virginia, and took measures for the appointment of State and county committees. The platform declares for impartial qualified suffrage as a requisite of a republican form of government, and as a means of harmonizing the policy of the President and of Congress. It holds that any considerable portion of the people which is denied a voice in the elections will be denied just protection for person and property; that no reconstruction is sure which does not provide against the assertion of the doctrine of secession; that treason should be made odious; that it is the evident intention of the late rebels to try to secure by votes what they could not obtain by bayonets; that intelligence is essential to a truly safe popular government, and that universal education should therefore be secured by a system of free schools; and, finally, the Convention appointed a committee to wait upon the President and Congress and solicit their sympathy and their approval of its action.

Here, then, is a movement to which the most cautious can not object. The most fanatical doctrine of State rights can not carp at the peaceful and lawful action of a body of unquestionably loyal citizens; and the most ardent believer in the right of the nation to secure the Union by any just political condition may well prefer to see that result attained by spontaneous local action. This Convention is but another illustration of the vital character of the question of equal suffrage. It will be agitated every where in the country until it triumphs, and until it does triumph we shall be subject to the gravest political excitements.

RELATION OF EXERCISE TO HEALTH.

THE necessity of exercise for the maintenance of health is a very hackneyed theme, and yet few really understand how it promotes health, and some even of those who have written about it would be puzzled in trying to furnish an explanation. With this want of clear ideas of the real nature of the subject, there are consequently many errors about which are practically injurious. Hence the necessity for looking at the matter more carefully than is commonly done.

What effects do exercise actually produce in the system? Its most palpable effect is increased activity in the circulation—the heart beats faster and stronger, pumping the blood more rapidly into the arteries; and the capillaries, the minute extreme vessels, are every where fuller of blood than usual, which is shown externally to the eye in the reddening of the skin. The lungs are crowded with blood, and hence the breathing is rapid to provide sufficient air to aerate the surplus blood passing through. With the reddened face there is a reddened brain, for the strongly-pumping heart forces more blood than usual upward into this organ. And so of other organs.

What comes of all this? What should come from increasing the supply of building-material and from stimulated action? Good development, building after a full pattern, and strong building. It is not, observe, mere bulk that you get—that may come from mere relaxation, with a plentiful supply of material. The structure is firm as well as large.

You see this result in the muscles themselves. Look at the bulging muscles of iron strength in the arm of the blacksmith, in contrast with the muscles in the arm of a sedentary man. So also the sailor has the muscles of the arms more developed than those of the lower extremities, because he uses them so much more; while, on the contrary, the muscles of the lower limbs of the dancer and the athletic runner are extraordinarily developed.

But while the enlarging and strengthening effect of exercise is manifested most decidedly in the muscles, it is, as you have seen from what we have already said, by no means confined to them. There is not an organ of the body that is not affected. This is recognized generally in relation to the stomach, for it is commonly said that exercise increases the power of digestion. But it is equally true of the lungs. Let them be untrammelled by pressure, and the exercise that makes the blood come through their minute vessels, distending them fully, will enlarge and strengthen these organs. So, too, the brain can do its work better if the blood be every now and then vigorously pumped into it; so that the thinker in taking exercise is not merely resting his brain, and strengthening his system at large, but he is directly storing up power in the brain itself.

We have thus far spoken of growth or building; but after the full development is reached exercise is needed to keep up the good condition. If it be omitted there will be either shrinkage or bulk without vigor. We are accustomed to think of adults as being fully developed; but there are glaring facts which prove that many of them are far from it—either they have never been well developed, or if they have, there has been a decided loss from long inactivity of the requisite exercise. We refer to the measurements that show such large increase of bulk, especially in the capacity of the chest, after a course of gymnastic exercises.

But there is something beyond mere development in the results of exercise. The nervous power, or vital force, or whatever it may be called, has for one of its natural stimuli or excitants arterial blood, and therefore the better this and the more briskly it circulates the greater will be the general activity of the various organs.

Another thing still to be taken into the account. It is the effect on the skin. We do not refer here to the firmness that exercise gives to this organ in common with the other organs of the body, as seen in the contrast between the thick and elastic skin of the active and the thin and flabby skin of the sedentary. We especially refer to the important functions which this very extensive organ performs. One of these is excretion. In the insensible perspiration—the breathing of the skin, as we may call it—though so slightly done, there pass off constantly much of the refuse of the system. For the purpose of effecting this there is a vast system of tubes in the skin. Mr. E. Wilson, with the aid of a microscope, counted 8338 tubes in a square inch on the palm of the hand. By his estimate there are in the whole skin about 7,000,000 of these tubes, and the total amount of tubing is 48,500 yards, or 28 miles. Now, these tubes, like all other tubes, need an occasional washing out to remove obstructions, and this can only be done by the free, sensible perspiration produced by brisk exercise. Outside bathing will not alone accomplish this—it may remove obstructions from the outlets of the tubes, but can not clear the tubes themselves. This must be done by water forced through them from the inside—that is, by the flow of the perspiration. It need hardly be said that if these tubes are not kept clear, the refuse which should pass through them, retained in the system, will surely impair the health and produce positive disease.

You see from what we have said that gentle exercise alone can not answer the purposes alluded to. There must be mingled with it strong exertion—such as will make the heart pump the blood forcibly into all the organs, and will cause a good flow of the perspiration. The very graceful and proper walk of the formal processions so commonly seen issuing from boarding-schools does but little good. Scanty development and feebleness are the certain results of such shortcomings in the obedience of nature's laws.

The limits of exercise, and the relative values of its various forms and modes, will be considered hereafter.

"THE LITTLE QUEEN OF THE WOODS."

THE charming picture on our first page is reproduced from a painting by J. G. Brown, of this city. The painting is one of those pleasant works of art which have given Mr. Brown a well-deserved popularity. We have placed this engraving in immediate juxtaposition with Miss Wagoner's beautiful story of "The Three Little Spades," because there seemed to be a peculiar fitness in setting "The Little Queen of the Woods" in the midst of a chapter about flowers.

LITERARY.

THE first volume of LOEWEN's "Pictorial History of the Civil War," published by GEORGE W. CARLSON, is now ready. It is a large and handsome volume of 600 pages, copiously illustrated, and it tells with unflagging interest and fidelity the story of the rebellion from the meeting of the Charleston Convention in 1860 to the disastrous battle of Bull Run. It is written in a lucid and animated style, warmed with the most earnest, patriotic feeling. In the author's judgment the rebellion was a crime against the country, against liberty and civilization; but his fervid condemnation of the leaders in the dark conspiracy does not confuse his faculty as a faithful chronicler. Mr. LOEWEN's familiarity with the country and with our history acquired in the preparation of his "Pictorial History of the Revolution," and of the War of 1812, and his practiced skill as a writer and designer, have been of great value to him in compiling this history. He is now visiting every point of interest during the war; and when his journey is completed he will have traveled about twenty thousand miles for the purpose of his work, which will be completed in three volumes. The author's candor and sincerity, his careful and extensive research, and his untiring industry and patience give a peculiar charm to his Chronicle of the War.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

May 15: In the Senate, Mr. Sherman reported a bill to reduce the rate of interest on the national debt, and for funding the same. The joint resolution to prevent the introduction of slaves into the United States was then taken up, and, after receiving some amendments, was passed. A message was received from the President, respecting, without his signature, the bill for the admission of Colorado.

In the House, the Senate amendments to the Post-office Appropriation bill were concurred in.—The bill on the organization of the Territories was passed by a vote of 19 to 41. The sixth section prohibits the denial of suffrage to citizens because of race or color.

May 17: In the Senate, the Diplomatic Appropriation bill was passed.—The West Point Academy bill was then considered, and an amendment adopted prohibiting the appointment either to West Point or the Naval Academy of any persons who have served in the rebel army or navy. The bill was passed.

May 18: In the House, a resolution was adopted, without debate, declaring Mr. DeLoach entitled to his seat as Representative from the Thirtieth District of Ohio.

BURNING OF THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

On the night of May 11 a fire broke out in a restaurant connected with the Academy of Music, and that office was soon laid in ruins. The New York University Medical College was destroyed. The fire extended into Fifth Avenue street and across Third Avenue. The loss is estimated by millions of dollars.

NEWS ITEMS.

Ex-Governor John Lothrop, of Virginia, in a recent letter, states that he has taken no part in politics, and has not cast a political vote since 1861. He says that he is peacefully retired, and is contented to possess his own property. He says in conclusion: "The only service I can render is to give the country the benefit of my example, in showing a proper respect for the laws of the land, and a practical obedience thereto."

Captain Ap Cadeby Jones, who left the United States Navy for that of the rebels and commanded the Ironclad Virginia, has been appointed Chief of Ordnance of the Peruvian Navy.

The farmers in Upper Georgia and North Alabama are plowing up their cotton crops and planting corn instead. Not more than one-fourth of the crop can be counted on in those regions.

Mr. Ferry has been nominated United States Senator from Connecticut to take the place of Vice-President Foster.

The testimony taken by the Reconstruction Committee is in print. It makes a volume of 763 pages of document size.

On the 15th of July, 1865, the date on which the last expedition of colored troops was organized in there were in the service of the United States 120 regiments of infantry, 23 of heavy artillery, 10 companies of light artillery, and 7 regiments of cavalry—in all as follows:

Infantry.....	12,000
Heavy Artillery.....	15,000
Light Artillery.....	2,500
Cavalry.....	7,500
Total.....	37,000

FOREIGN NEWS.

The financial panic in England was increasing. Failures have occurred involving millions of pounds sterling. Among the houses closed is that of Sir George Fife. The Bank of England Charter Act has been passed, and interest has advanced to the rate of 12 per cent.

The news from Germany exhibits no improvement. Count Bismarck threatens Saxony with shorter measures unless she at once disarms. Saxony, on the other hand, insists her military preparations on the ground that she may be called upon by the Federal Diet to provide a contingent. It is stated that Prussia has lost no time in answering the Austrian note of the 26th ult., and that she insists upon regarding the movement of Austria in the direction of Italy as a menace. Just as an arrangement appeared to have been come to for the simultaneous demobilization of the armaments of Austria and Prussia the latter power objects to the Austrian preparations in Venetia and on the frontier against an attack from Italy.

The Italian Government also objects to the Austrian armaments, and doubts that Italy had incurred her armaments. Austria maintains that Italy is arming; but she promises not to take the offensive against Italy, and she will immediately restore her army in Venetia to a peace footing. The Italian Government has obtained the unanimous assent of the Chamber of Deputies for placing the army on a war footing, and for providing by royal decree aid by extraordinary measures the financial means necessary for the defense of the country.

Austria has an army of 485,700 men, Prussia 316,000 men. At the latest advice Prussia had ordered her entire army on the frontier, America had called out "every soldier." Italy was most energetic in her war preparations, Saxony had mobilized her army, Turkey was about to take the same step, and Russia was reported as moving a portion of her forces. An attempt had been made to assassinate Count Bismarck in Berlin.

On the 26 of May the Spanish fleet under Admiral Nunez, on its way to bombard the city of Callao, Peru, was badly beaten by the shore batteries in the harbor, the vessels shattered, and Nunez himself wounded. The Vista de Madrid and Barcelona were so badly damaged early in the fight that they were obliged to withdraw to San Lorenzo, and they were afterward followed by the Amazons and the rest of the fleet, more or less damaged. The fight lasted five hours. Fifty Peruvians are reported killed and one hundred and twenty wounded. Honor Galvez, the Secretary of War, was killed. The loss of the Spanish fleet is not known; but it is supposed to have been heavy.

The Fortunate passenger, now a tuble, who saved the life of the Clear in her ill-fated voyage, has most important possessions in Florida. His life will not be a profitable one, for in St. Petersburg also the public subscription in his behalf already exceeds $275,000, and, further to fit him for his new post, the Emperor has appointed General Tschibum to express his education,

THE FIRE IN SALEM

We give on this page an illustration of the recent fire in Salem, in which Lynde block and building in its rear were destroyed. The fire broke out on the night of May 14, in a shed in the rear of the East India Marine Hall building. The locality was one extremely difficult to operate in, and the flames were much advanced when the steamers and engines were brought to bear upon them.

In a short time the stable and Gymnasium building were enveloped in flames, the fire creeping through the roof immediately, and defying the thorough drenching of water which fell upon the outside, but which was unable to penetrate to where it was most needed. The roof finally fell in with a crash.

The East India Marine Hall building was at one time in great danger, the eastern covering being on fire its entire length, and the flames penetrating the roof. A pipe was finally put into the building, which was thus saved from destruction. As it was, the building was considerably damaged by water, though the celebrated collection of curiosities was saved without much injury, though with considerable displacement.

The whole of Lynde block was soon in flames, commencing at the southern end. The total loss of property was not be less than from $75,000 to $100,000.—The wooden buildings were not of great value. The Lynde block and the brick block on Liberty Street were the most valuable of the buildings destroyed.

THE FIRE AT SALEM, MASSACHUSETTS—DESTRUCTION OF LYNDE BLOCK.—[SKETCHED BY J. W. TAYLOR.]

RECEPTION OF THE FENIAN CHIEF.

On the 15th of May Mr. JAMES STURTEVANT, the Fenian Chief, was honored by his brave brethren with a grand reception at Jones' Wood. There was a crushing turn-out, and notwithstanding that admission-tickets cost fifty cents ahead, there was an immense audience gathered together to hear what the old veteran from across the sea had to say for himself and—for them. About fifteen thousand Fenians are supposed to have been present:

"At half past one," says the Herald, "the carriage which had been sent down to the Metropolitan for the General Inspector appeared before the main gate to the wood, bearing its illustrious freight. The several bands which had been engaged there during the morning by the appearance of evil, moving hither and thither up 'Hall to the Chief' with commendable vigor. Mr. STURTEVANT was driven rapidly down the Hill to headquarters between long lines of shouting and cheering Fenians, male and female, young and old. With his hat often from his head and waving his pair of legs in the delightful attitude."

We have not space to give Mr. STURTEVANT'S ad-

OFFICE OF THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU, MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE,

[SEE PAGE 316.]

dress in full. He began with the history of his own connection with the Fenian cause:

"Toward the close of December, 1857," he said, "a young Irishman called at my residence in Dublin, bringing me letters from Colonel O'Mahony and from the late Colonel KILGALLAN, DOMERTY. He had also an oral communication to make himself; but all was to the effect that an organization had been established in America, of which Colonel DOMERTY was appointed the chief, and I was requested to commence an organization and to direct it in Ireland. . . . On my return to Ireland, after seven years' exile, the first thing I did was to travel through the country in every direction to derive a thorough knowledge of the people, and to see what could be done. I devoted a whole year to that, during which time I traveled three thousand miles on foot." He acknowledged that the Fenian movement was a conspiracy. He recessed the discouragements he had met in this country and at home, and alluded especially to the opposition of the clergy. "We have," he said, "invariably instilled upon our friends the duty of giving assistance and submitting in all devotion to their clergy in their spiritual character, but that in their temporal character they were deeply to look upon them as enemies. Without this training you never could have a force in Ireland upon whom you could rely." He earnestly urged upon his brethren the necessity of union in their efforts. He said the organization in Ireland toward the close of last year numbered two hundred thousand men, and of that force fifty thousand were thoroughly drilled, with a large proportion of men who had seen war and such powder on the battle-field—a large proportion of veterans, in short; fifty thousand were partly drilled men, and the other hundred thousand quite untrained. All that the Fenians wanted was war material and money.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.)

INSIDE

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XXI.

It came upon Somerville at last. Came the very week of the Sabbath upon which Brother Barker had exulted, with the angels in heaven, over the repulse of Banks on Red River. Came at the very time the Secession element of Somerville was glittering upon the very crest, the Union element glooming in the lowest trough of the ever-rolling sea. Came to Somerville as comes upon the pit of his stomach to a pugilist an unexpected blow when he has just warded off another from his eye. So occupied were we all in Somerville with the defeat of Banks that we had completely forgotten about ourselves. It was like that ball in Brussels of which Lord Byron has issued such extensive tickets; no marriage bell went merrier than did Somerville, when, like the roar of the coming Waterloo, dimming the sparkling eyes, paling the glowing cheeks at said ball, comes the rumor of an advance of the Federals upon the town.

How the rumor first reached the place who can tell? Rumor at times seems to be, indeed, the living goddess the Romans made it, and to move with lightning rapidity in and by itself without the intervention of any means whatever. It was exactly at nine o'clock Friday night that Dr. Warner threw Mrs. Warner into strong hysterics by the announcement that the Federals were coming. When that lady ventured to steal forth after a night spent in hiding her silver and the children of her negro woman, lest the mother should run away, her jewelry and other valuables, refreshing herself occasionally by abuse of alternately the Confederates and the Federals, her husband being most to blame of all, the first object she beheld was the Federal flag flying from the roof of the Court-house, near which Dr. Warner had his home.

We have the authority of Sir Walter Scott that the bugle blast of Roderick Dhu possessed the double power both of causing the instantaneous appearance and the as instantaneous disappearance of bodies of men. Whatever wizard blew the blast in this case, the appearing of the Federal force was not more sudden than was the disappearance of the main Secessionists of Somerville. For reasons which will appear in the sequel, we abstain from saying any thing more in reference to this raid than the actual fact of its having taken place just at that time in Somerville compels us to record. Closed stores, upon the walls of which the enemy have posted bills informing the citizens that, so long as they are themselves quiet, the invaders will scrupulously avoid molesting any other than Confederate property; deserted streets, every individual peeping from behind doors and through the slats of shutters with curiosity swallowing up all other feeling; the marching hither and thither of blood-coated cavalry; the sound of martial music—a dream come and gone before we know it.

That Friday night Mr. Arthur was in the very act of kneeling with Mrs. Sorel's household at family worship when an halloo makes it necessary for Bobby to go down to the front gate to quiet the dogs and find out what is wanted. He is gone so long that Mr. Arthur himself goes out. He meets Bobby returning, and only hears some one shout, "Tell them exactly what I told you!" as the one shouting gallops off in the darkness. Repeating his message on the way back, Bobby repeats it yet again when he gets into the house. A most remarkable message it is.

"Colonel Brooks says, 'Be prudent, don't commit yourselves!'"

"Colonel Brooks?" asks Mrs. Sorel—"Colonel Brooks, Brooks?"

"Nothing else?" asks Mr. Arthur, bewildered giving place to the sudden joy.

"As soon as I could get old Coff to stop barking I asked, 'Who's there?' says Bobby, soberly, but not without some vague sense of new importance. "One of the men—"

"There were two, then?" asks his mother.

"Yes, ma, on horseback, two—Dr. Peal and Mr. Brooks. Colonel Brooks says, 'Be prudent, don't commit yourselves!'"

THE FENIANS HAVE GONE.

dent, don't commit yourselves! That is exactly what Mr. Brooks said. 'Is that you, Bobby?' he asked, when I first got to the gate—'Is that you, Bobby?' so eagerly. Humph," adds Bobby, "I think I ought to know Mr. Brooks's voice. Didn't I used to see him every day? Wasn't he my Sunday-school teacher? Colonel Brooks says, 'Be prudent, don't commit yourselves!' And then they galloped off."

"But how do you know the other was Dr. Peal?" asked Mr. Arthur, while Mrs. Sorel sank again in her arm-chair, as if unable to stand.

"Oh, I knew that before I got to the gate. He was cursing old Coff, you know," adds Bobby. "Oh, I know Dr. Peal. I've heard him cursing and swearing ten thousand times. Colonel Brooks says, 'Be prudent, don't commit yourselves!'" Bobby repeats the words as he had before done quite other words, verses and the like, from Mr. Brooks's lips in the Sabbath-school.

"I really and sincerely think you had better go," says Mrs. Sorel, suddenly, to Mr. Arthur, after half an hour of wondering and questioning.

Mr. Arthur lifts his eyes in mute inquiry, though he sees at a glance that placid Mrs. Sorel has been reading his thoughts all the time.

"By the Federals you know I shall be respected," she says, rapidly but quietly; "if any of the Secessionists should endeavor to molest me, it would be none the better, all the worse, if you were here. Go, Mr. Arthur, go!"

"I can not think of leaving you. None but you and Bobby," begins that individual. "The negroes—"

"They would not harm their old mistress. No—Mrs. Sorel is safer without you," she adds, with a smile.

"I can not think of going. I will not leave you exposed," says Mr. Arthur, throwing on the table his hat, which he has, most unconsciously, got from the hall, and has had in his hand all this time. And he takes his seat, and draws Bobby to his accustomed place between his knees.

"Mr. Arthur," says Mrs. Sorel, very erect in her chair—as thoroughly from South Carolina at the moment as Mrs. Bowles ever was—"I am mistress in my own house—No, I don't mean that. I am old enough to be your mother. I will do to you as I would to Frank if he were here. I command you to go!"

Even as he gallops along through the darkness toward Somerville his conscience smites him; but he gallops on, leaving the casuality of the case to be settled when he has more time.

A busy time he finds it when he reaches town. He had met more than one vehicle on the road thither; he now hears the roll of wheels, the galloping of horses in every direction; slamming doors, running feet, sawing, hammering, glancing lights in the windows, lanterns in almost every stable. Few voices heard, but an exceedingly busy time.

Not until he has alighted at Mrs. Bowles's gate does he ask himself how he is to arrange matters with that lady—what he is to say. The front-door is open, a light streams from it, and, as he opens the gate to go in, the beams fall full upon the face of Brother Barker, of all men in the world. And very much excited indeed is Brother Barker.

"Ah! Brother Arthur," he says, in an agitated manner, seizing upon, and—from sheer force of general habit—shaking the hand of the other in the long, and altogether indescribable manner peculiar to Brother Barker after a warm meeting in church or arbor. It is the first time he has ever spoken to Brother Arthur for years now. Generally he has avoided him on the street, or, when compelled to pass him, it has been with a nod greatly colder than no recognition; the repulsion—moral, religious, intellectual, every way—the repulsion between these two men being really greater than that between any other two men in Somerville.

"Your horse, I believe, Brother Arthur?" pointing to the animal from which Mr. Arthur had just alighted with his left hand, while he retains his friend's hand, still shaking it, in his right.

It is Mr. Arthur's horse.

"Would you be so kind? Some unprincipled person has stolen my animal from the stable within the last hour. The fact is—I presume you may know—it is believed the Federals—I would not wound your feelings for the world, Brother Arthur"—another shake of the hand—"but I have reason to think that I may be singled out"—greatly agitated.

"What can I do for you, Sir?" asks Mr. Arthur, to close the interview, endeavoring in vain to extricate his hand.

With many hurried words Brother Barker at last asks and obtains Mr. Arthur's horse, and rides off, and faster than its owner had come. The fact is, just before, Brother Barker and Bob Withers had been thrown together at Staples's hotel, in the universal jumble of the confusion and hurry.

"Oh, is this you, Mr. Barker? You here yet?" Mr. Withers has found time, in the rush, to stop and ask of that gentleman, with astonishment, even terror, depicted on his face. "Why, my dear Sir—by George! You here still? Don't you know they have sworn to hang you? You must have heard of it; it is you they are coming to Somerville after! Colonel Brooks commands the force. It was you, you know—don't you, by George!—who had his brother Paul hung. From your own steeps they'll hang you, man!" But here the two are separated in the confusion, and for several days after Brother Barker has disappeared, with multitudes of others, from the streets of Somerville.

Mr. Arthur finds himself in Mrs. Bowles's parlor, and in company with that lady and her daughter, before he has as all arranged what to say. He had not supposed Mrs. Bowles could be as cold and stately as she now bears herself, frail as a shadow, the silvered hair so smoothly arranged under the neat cap, the refined face as sorrowful yet as stern as Antigone. Mr. Arthur has a general idea, in the hurry of the moment, that so far from being in undress Mrs. Bowles has on her very best attire, dressed even with unusual care. With coldest politeness she barely endures Mr. Arthur. Alice sits with drooping eyes after the first salutations. No wonder he can not read her thoughts, she is far from knowing them herself.

"Will you pardon my intrusion?" he asks, without taking a seat. "I happen to be in Somerville to-night, and come to beg, if altogether convenient, that I may be permitted to sleep in the front office to-night."

"If you desire to sleep there, not being able to go out to Mrs. Sorel's," begins Mrs. Bowles, with coldest dignity, and as ungraciously as she can force herself to be.

"A gentleman has just borrowed and ridden off my horse," Mr. Arthur remarks, Hannibal like, his ships burned behind him, that having been not the least motive with him in permitting Brother Barker to take his horse—not without a mounting color in his face, and conscious of the appealing eyes of Alice upon him.

"We do not need your protection, Mr. Arthur, nor do we desire it—Alice, my servants, and myself," Mrs. Bowles proceeds to observe in her coldest and most measured manner. "Were there no one else, Rutledge Bowles being absent, Mr. Neely has kindly sent word that, as soon as he has secured his negroes and other property, he will endeavor to call. I think that the substance of his note, Alice, my dear?"

"Mrs. Sorel and myself thought—"

"I am aware that the enemy which has desolated other parts of our country is expected," continues Mrs. Bowles, still more measuredly. "Excuse my interrupting you, Sir. I am perfectly informed also of the outrages and atrocities to which we may and probably will be subjected by them. It is not impossible but they have heard of my son, Rutledge Bowles, and may seek to visit vengeance on Alice and myself on that account. Nor will the place of my known birth be a protection to me, nor my known horror of the flag they bear, nor my unpeppable aversion to their country—"

"Dear mother," begins Alice.

"Permit me, Alice. I admired your spirit in sending word, as you did, to Mr. Neely that we would not need his presence. Alice will tell you also that we do not need yours, Mr. Arthur. You will pardon me. Alice and myself are prepared to suffer whatever the fiercest foe may see fit to inflict—to lay down our poor lives, if need be, on the altar of our country. We are quite poor now. They will find but little to rob us of. My husband—Major Bowles's portrait I have already caused to be removed." Sure enough, their visitor, who had missed something, he could not tell what, from the room from the time he entered, glanced over the mantle, and saw only a blank space where lately the grand old Major used to sit enthroned.

"You must permit me to add, Sir," continues Mrs. Bowles, dignified as ever, but excited by her own words, "that of all the gentlemen in this community you are the last I would look to for protection. Passive as you have been, to use no harsher phrase, in this struggle for the lead of your own birth, withholding even your prayers for its success, associating exclusively with, and encouraging to your utmost, those in our midst who are traitors to their country, ripens upon its hearth—hush, Alice, you will permit me to speak in my own house—you, Sir, are the last man in the world to whom I would wish, above all, whom I would have Alice my daughter to look to for protection. Though he has been at one time even insolent, I would prefer my—the boy Charles, who was once my servant, as a protector. That you see here now, instead of at Mrs. Sorel's, is the result, I presume, of secret communication with the enemy. Besides"—all in a quiver from head to foot, her hand wandering about her brow.

"You must permit me, Madam," interrupts

THE HANDKERCHIEF AND THE FIST.

Mr. Arthur, quite conscious of Alice's eyes in mute entreaty, not without color in his cheeks, but never speaking in sick chamber or to dying friend in gentler tones, "to withdraw my request. I should not have intruded. I will do so no more. I trust you will one day do me more justice."

With a bow to the ladies in leaving, carefully avoiding Alice's face with his eyes, yet reading more meaning in them none the less than ever before in his life, the visitor is gone. And Alice, though she never looks out at the window during the rest of the night, is perfectly aware, amidst all the noise of wheels and hoofs and feet, that Mr. Arthur is keeping watch and ward about them.

"I have ever esteemed Mr. Arthur a gentleman; I have often wished Rowledge Bowles could have known him; but that he should have pursued the course he has pursued me. Mrs. Sorel, too, positively bewilders me. And I am told that Mr. Brooks is actually a Colonel in the Federal forces. It can be nothing," said Mrs. Bowles, with her hand to her head, "but insanity, raving insanity. Either they are deranged"—her hand wandering about her brow—"or I am," added she, with the use of the strongest metaphor in her knowledge. "As I have told you a thousand times, Alice, my dear, I wish you to have no further acquaintance with this Mr. Arthur. You have known him for years, but I wish you always to class him in your mind with Benedict Arnold—remember, dear."

But Alice is thinking, by some strange coincidence, of the night of the insurrection—how they three sat up together on the front porch all night waiting for what did not, like millions of other things expected in Somerville, take place at last.

And so the night wears away, neither mother nor daughter caring to lie down. Mrs. Bowles, poor lady! at one and the same instant blaming herself severely for having spoken so to Mr. Arthur, and regretting that she has not been even more bitter to him; wondering that persons like Mrs. Sorel and her late visitor—so good and calm and firm heretofore—so calm and firm and gentle now—wondering, wondering! And Alice, too, so silent and quiet.

And so she comes back with a start to the fact that the Federals are coming, and that she must meet them with the dignity and quiet scorn which behoves South Carolina when Yankees are in question.

And Alice? Conscious all along of Mr. Arthur keeping watch around the place; now glowing with her mother in heroic resolve; now mourning that it is such things as Secession and Slavery that we must be heroic about; imagining to herself one Great Republic rending these twin curses out of its bosom, and lifting itself free, strong, and People henceforth! But it is we, the South, who are being whipped, subjected. And so she wanders about in the same hazy, morbid, darksome theme, treading in thought now to the right, now to the left, as upon tufts of turf in a morass, upon the innumerable yess and noys of the master, but with firmer foot, in straighter course than before, not unconscious of broadening light ahead.

Had it actually been Colonel Brooks himself Mrs. Sorel would have been less surprised than she was when Brother Barker, not two hours after Mr. Arthur's leaving, presents himself before her, after most violent protestations on the part of old Cuff at the front gate and along the walk—even Cuff seeming trouble abroad tonight, and vigilant accordingly.

"Ah, Sister Sorel!"—and he has her hand in his before she can believe her eyes—"hope you are well? And the family too? And this is your little boy, Robby, I believe?" Retaining Mrs. Sorel's hand with his right, he takes Robby's with his left, and so establishes double rapport with the household.

"What a fine little fellow—sober as a judge! The truth is"—another shake of both the hands in his own—"I met Brother Arthur in town, and have returned his horse for him. Please have him put up; and it would be well to tell your servant—how are you, girl?—not to let the boy give him too much corn. Mr. Arthur rode him rather violently." Another shake of the hand for both, and releasing them. Then the visitor, placing his hat upon the table, takes a seat, and says: "From long experience, Sister Sorel, I have learned never to feed a horse when too warm. All are well, you say? Pleased to hear it. Excuse me a moment?—certainly."

For it is Mrs. Sorel's first thought to have Robby out of the room, and impress upon his youthful mind these two things: First, not to mention the strange message given him; nor to allude to it in any way.

"Why, mother, do you think I don't know?" says Robby, with as much indignation as is consistent with respect.

"Yes, mother," to the next injunction—to be polite to their new visitor, and to keep silence generally. "But the best way is for me to go to bed." Which, with a kiss to his mother, he forthwith does.

Immediately on her re-entering the room, her emotions, singularly like those of Mrs. Bowles with her visitor, Brother Barker informs her where he met and left Mr. Arthur—for whom, it seems, from words and tones of voice, the newcomer has an affection rather more than merely fraternal. And so, with briefest possible allusion to the expected raid, Mr. Barker requests and obtains a bed—Mr. Arthur's—for the night.

"In case any armed men should visit the house during the night"—he lingers behind with his candle to say to his hostess, who has hardly opened her lips—"I know you will not mention the fact of my being concealed here. As a minister of the Gospel, Sister Sorel, an humble preacher of peace, I desire to hold myself strictly aloof from all scenes of violence and strife.

My life is in your hands, my sister; but I am not a Sinner, I am pleased to say, nor are you a murderous Jaek."

Nor does the sudden guest, over "the dish of butter and milk," furnished him by his harmless Jaek next morning—the night having passed without event, save the uninterrupted barking of Cuff, assisted by all the other dogs on the place, at the perpetual passing of travelers—have any thing to say except to dwell upon the horrors of war in general, the absolute inconsistency of the same with Christianity. The eyes of Brother Barker, smitten as by long illness, to say nothing of salowness of visage, show how little sleep he has found that night in Mr. Arthur's bed. However, we were all of us wide awake that night in Somerville.

Bobby, with lips visibly sealed, places the Bible upon the table after breakfast is over, from force of invariable habit; the decent servants gather in as usual; Mrs. Sorel, with fewest words, requests their guest to take Mr. Arthur's place, and lead in worship.

"We will omit singing, if you please," says Brother Barker, after reading the first Scripture which comes up; "my voice might attract—ahem. Let us pray." And having prayed for every possible blessing upon that particular household, with general applications for delivery from war, Mr. Barker hastens through that exercise.

"If it is not too great a favor, Sister Sorel: if you will give your servants some charge to keep silence; if you will allow me to occupy Brother Arthur's room for the present—I observe it to be his by the books there—I will be obliged." And the guest disappears within that room, the curtains of which he has carefully put down, but appears again at the sound of a galloping along the road.

"Sister Sorel," he says, bending, with ashy face, over that silent lady as she sits at the table washing up the cups and saucers, "I have reason to know that my life is in great danger; even now the foe may be on my track. I am—an"—the galloping outside louder and louder—"not a soldier, I am"—white lips and trembling voice and sallowest of faces—"a poor, humble preacher of the blessed Gospel of peace. My life is in your hands, my blood will be upon your skirts."

"Mr. Barker, go to Mr. Arthur's room and remain there. Any thing an old woman may be able to do for you I will do. You have no cause of apprehension."

And in his room Brother Barker remains, trying to read, trying to pray, tacking the curtains so as to conceal himself from any one passing, listening, trembling, enduring such agonies of fear as waste him like a spell of sickness.

Mrs. Warner, peeping forth that morning, finds the Federals in quiet possession of Somerville. We can not be mathematically accurate, but Mrs. Warner has said, a very great number of times, that she only wished the entire Yankee nation had one neck that she might break it; one throat that she might cut it; one heart that she might drive this, holding up the knife wherewith she is carving at table as she speaks, into their heart to the hilt. Touchstone's complete destruction, in words of his foe, Dr. Slop's exhaustive curses upon the knots in the spring of his bag; Blomish anathema in full, so far as her knowledge of the language furnishes her with the words, her intellect with the thoughts, her imagination with the possibilities, her heart with the zeal, has Mrs. Warner long ago equaled in imprecation upon the Federals. No Mrs. Partington has ever swept away the Atlantic more vigorously, in anticipation, than has Mrs. Warner; yet now that it is actually over her threshold the mop falls her wearied hand. She has so exhausted herself before their arrival that she can scarce even feel any thing, except curiosity, now they have actually come. Probably this is the reason why she does not burn her house now, as she has so often said she would do. She has ample opportunity of shooting at them from her windows, she has almost sworn she would, yet she merely peeps at them instead.

Friday night they take possession. All Saturday and Sunday they are in possession. Not one male Secessionist visible. Union men quiet as mice. Guy Brooks need have sent no message to that effect.

The stores are all closed. Somerville has long ago learned to do that when even Confederate soldiers are in the neighborhood. Over and over again have squads, half-naked, two-thirds starved, four-fourths desperate, helped themselves from the stores in Somerville to exactly what they wanted, a good deal more than they could consume. It shocked us terribly at first, but Mr. Ellis and the rest of us have become used to it. Only three days before the raid of the Federals, Mr. Ellis was speaking of it to Colonel Ret Roberts in his store, on a visit to his family from his duties in Richmond.

"Three times, Sir," said Mr. Ellis to that distinguished Senator, "has my store been sacked by ruffian soldiers."

"And very probably will be a dozen times again," said the Colonel, very coolly indeed. If Colonel Ret Roberts was a splendid black-guard, a brilliant bully, an eloquent, unprincipled, thoroughly plain-spoken scoundrel before the schooling of the last few years, tell us, oh whichever of ye daughters of Jupiter and Minerva is the Muse of History, what Colonel Ret Roberts is now!

"And my taxes?" says Mr. Ellis; "look at it, Sir. I pay two and a half per cent. on my sales every three months; one per cent. more for soldiers' tax; five per cent. on all real estate; eight per cent. on all the wool, tobacco, cotton I had on hand in '63; ten per cent. on profits on sales. Let me see! Yes, I am taxed as a retail merchant, taxed over again as a wholesale merchant. And all this while my Corporation, County, State taxes are at least one hundred per cent. heavier than they were before the war."

"Certainly. But you may rest sure the taxes now are nothing to what they will be next year," says Colonel Ret Roberts, as coolly as if stating a desirable fact, with a sort of pleasure even.

"But have you nothing encouraging to tell us?" asks Mr. Ellis, nervously. "Your opportunities at Richmond—"

"I know nothing but what you read in the papers," remarks the Senator, elaborately paring his finger-nails. "You have heard me from the stump, Sir. If you people at home will sustain the currency, the South will succeed. If you do not, it won't. You know as well as I whether they will sustain it. We are in this thing; all we can do is to—do what we can. Hold on, Lamson!" so that editor, who is passing, and the distinguished Senator is gone.

An exceeding, scarcely disguised, contempt Colonel Ret Roberts had for the people before Secession; his contempt now is so great that it is not at all disguised. He is elected for years to the Confederate Senate, entirely beyond the favor of the people. They stand so astounded by his cool insolence in public and private that he has left again for Richmond before they have time to recover themselves.

And Sabbath dawns upon Somerville still in Federal occupation, the quietness of death upon the population peeping from behind doors and shutters upon the Federal cavalry passing and re-passing. After full conference with friends, a Federal chaplain desecrating Brother Barker's pulpit, the only church beside his own in Somerville open that day, Mr. Arthur fills his own pulpit, his sermons being exactly the same they would have been had there been no raid. Quite a large congregation too, to Mr. Arthur's surprise; almost all ladies. Mr. Ferguson sings base, as grave and cold in manner as if war were confined to the Crimea and like distant regions. And the Federal officers and men, whom the ladies came to see, are there, quiet, orderly.

"Nothing remarkable at last, every thing exactly as usual," Mrs. Warner, at church for the first time in many months, remarks, as she and the Doctor walk home. And, beside a little abuse of the men who have tamely permitted the Yankees to come here, Mrs. Warner is strikingly silent to-day.

"If I knew Colonel Brooks was not coming to church I wouldn't have gone, I can tell you. Have you seen him yet, Dr. Warner? Mighty shy you Union people are of your Federal friends, and they of you! As if I don't know the reason why. You all had better be, I tell you; if all our men are gone—miserable cowards that they are—there's plenty of women left in Somerville to watch you. Did you notice that fat Mrs. Isaac Smith at church, she whose husband has gone over to the Yankees? I watched at her sitting there on a side-seat near the pulpit expressly to look at those Federal wretches, looking wisely at them—expected to see her husband among them, I suppose. As I live, there she is this moment going into that Jen Budd—even 'Ria could tell what she is for!"

It was true. Mrs. Isaac Smith had never made a visit since her husband fled. She has only a general irritation made her years before by poor, pale little Mrs. Budd, the gun-maker's wife; yet there she is this moment, in Sunday finery long laid aside, entering the door in question. Sharp Mrs. Warner sees it all at a glance. Jen Budd's little one-story house is right on the most public street in Somerville; its front porch is as good a place as any in the town to see all that can be seen of the Federal troops.

Besides, Jen Budd and Jen Budd's harmless little wife belong not only to the one side of the great question which rends Somerville asunder but also to the other. Secessionists say of Jen: "Oh! Jen Budd is a quiet sort of fellow, but he is all right at heart. He doesn't talk much, but he has said this, that, and the other exceedingly severe things about the Yankees, and especially about the Union people. And then Alfred Morgan, Mrs. Budd's brother, who left for the war years ago, we all know that he is a good Secessionist, in dangerous and efficient service for the Confederacy in the North. Jen doesn't say much about it, but he has shown letters from Alf to that effect. Oh, Jen is all right!"

"You can't change a man's nature," Union people say to each other of Jen Budd. "Of course it's his interest to keep well with the faithful; it's the only way to hold his detail to fix guns and stay out of the army. As to Alf Morgan, Jen can't help that. But we all know Jen. He's told me in confidence a thousand times a vast deal about the madness of Secession." There were disadvantages in Jen's course. Neither party were thoroughly cordial with him. Besides, for Jen is making money those weapon-using days, he can not refuse to give when called on to assist Union families suffering for the necessities of life in the absence of their husbands. Far more impossible to refuse his aid when called on, as he is about every other week, to contribute to some war purpose or other. He has to pay for his position, but he holds it and his tongue quietly, firmly.

"I took a lunch just before coming to church, ma'am; please excuse me. But you know my horse is out of the way, and I am dying to see the Federals. If you have no objection," Mrs. Isaac Smith says to little pale Mrs. Budd, who lives in her own house as closely as an snail, and keeps no servant, and who, a good deal astonished at the apparition of stout Mrs. Smith, whom she has not seen for so long, invites her from the parlor in to dinner.

It is all very well when, dinner over, Jen Budd smoking his pipe in one corner of the fireplace for the convenience of spicing, Mrs. Budd opposite him in her easy-chair, Mrs. Isaac Smith filling with her portly person the chaise between, the three fall into a quiet, confidential chat. At least Mrs. Isaac Smith, greatly freshened up by the blue shirt she has seen at church, talks, and the others listen.

First, she tells all she has seen and heard at church, for Mr. and Mrs. Budd haven't entered any church for years now; Jen Budd, a member of Brother Barker's church, too. Next, Mrs. Isaac Smith, by natural transition, speaks of Mr. Arthur; to all of which, Jen Budd, on one side, saying "Exactly" when Mrs. S. speaks to him; pale little Mrs. Budd, on the other side, says, when she is appealed to, "Just so, ma'am." By natural transition, too, Brother Barker is next on the carpet. Mrs. Isaac Smith warms warmer as she recounts some of that divine's violent remarks in and out of the pulpit. To this, also, Mr. Budd, when directly appealed to for his sentiments, says "Precisely," and Mrs. Budd, "Just as you say, ma'am." Next, Mrs. Isaac Smith asks in general terms after Mrs. Budd's absent brother. She has heard what a bitter Secessionist Alf Morgan is; how actively and tenaciously at work for the Confederacy he is at the North. So she asks after him as under a sort of protest. At the North somewhere, and well, when last heard from, is all Jen and his wife can inform her on that point.

Her entire being, day and night, flowing in one channel, her husband who is away, Mrs. S. tells for the ten thousandth time that Isaac would never have left if it wasn't they were forcing him into the army. Isaac has his faults—who of us has not? Isaac is a peaceful man—didn't want to fight on either side if he could help it. But Isaac could not fight for what he believed to be a wicked—rebellion. Mrs. S. rather hesitates before bringing out this last word, but Mrs. Budd only replies, "As you say, ma'am," while her husband merely puts another cloud of smoke, and adds, to the tearful eye of Mrs. Isaac directed to him, "Exactly so."

Like other large bodies broad Mrs. Smith does not easily get started; but once started, momentum being in proportion to weight, it is very hard for her to stop.

"Of course you have heard of how they murdered my brother John Jennings?" she asks of Mrs. Budd.

"Goodness gracious, what's that?" she adds in the same breath.

"That? What?" asks Jen, nervously, while poor Mrs. Budd is several degrees paler than before.

"Hah! must have been mistaken, of course; thought I heard somebody under the floor. But I am so nervous!" says Mrs. Smith.

"Thought you heard somebody under the floor!" and Mr. Budd exclaims this in staggeringly loud tones, as if addressed to some one at a distance, and resumes his pipe.

"Your brother, ma'am? there are so many murdered, you know, one can not remember exactly," says pale, little Mrs. Budd, eagerly, quickened a good deal by the overflowing warmth of her visitor by this time. Mr. Budd smokes with inquiring puffs. And so Mrs. Smith enters on the murder, describes it minutely, with the desiccated condition of the family left—all with such a natural eloquence that even solid Jen Budd is affected. So much so that when Mrs. Smith says at last, suddenly, "You know John Jennings well, Mr. Budd; you know I've only told you the truth; now what do you think of a cause which permits, even justifies such a thing as that?" Mr. Budd removes the pipe from his mouth and begins:

"So sure as there is a God in heaven, ma'am—" "Jen! My dear?" interrupts his wife from the other side with a cry, and holding up a warning hand.

And well it is for Mr. Budd. Though his wife does not know it, there is a tap upon the door, and in walks—of all persons in the world—Mrs. Smithers!

Mrs. Smithers! We write the word reluctantly, knowing how hopeless it is to portray her upon the page. Let us see what our recording that she was a very tall, a very long and red in the face, a very violent female in temper and language will do. Mrs. Smithers's brother we know, all six of them, as desperadoes who have long ago killed their men. Mrs. Smithers is said to be a good shot with rifle, double-barrel shot-gun, revolver. The way Mrs. Smithers is known, with her own boy hands, to cobble her siring negro women, has awakened even Mr. Warner's reprobation. Her nearest neighbor are exceeding respectful to, and shy of, Mrs. Smithers, not knowing what instant a clothes from their yard into her garden, or a quarrel between her children and theirs, may bring her down upon them with some deadly weapon, or more deadly tongue. As to her having barked, in a paroxysm of rage, that negro babe which would keep crawling in upon her recently-swept floor, down the hill back of the house, we respect all that story of course, knowing, as we all do, that negro testimony is so evidence.

But we knew we could convey so adequate idea of Mrs. Smithers, the postmaster's wife, when we began. Mr. Jen Budd had such an idea, however, and the instant she entered the room he uttered a "Whew!" none the less intense from being altogether internal. Publicly, meeting them on the street, had Mrs. Smithers refused and resented the salutation of more than one Union man of her previous acquaintance. The Union ladies, met by her casually in store and at funerals, she had not centered herself with refusing to speak to, but had looked at them in a way which had sent more than one of them from shopping and visiting home and to bed. Being of a fighting stock, Mrs. Smithers was true to the breed—even her brother, with many an oath, admitted that.

As Mrs. Smithers entered, offensively ignored the existence of Mrs. Isaac Smith, and took the hand and the seat which poor, pale little Mrs.

Budd offered her, Mr. Budd saluted her and withdrew, remembered in the hall the feeble state of his wife's health and returned; really could not risk it, when back in the parlor, and retired; feared, when half-way out of his front gate, that his wife might faint, perhaps die, and so returned again. He has an inspiration, he will effect a diversion.

"Bad news I hear this morning," he begins, after the usual salutations are over—Mrs. Isaac Smith will not, Mrs. Budd can not speak, nothing left for him. As the husband of his wife, the head of the household, the only chance is to keep the conversation in his own hand till one of the visitors shall depart—any subject on earth rather than of the Federals just arrived.

"What news is that, Mr. Budd?" asks Mrs. Smithers, reserving, "It's a lie," in the corner of her eyes and upon the tip of her tongue.

And having mentioned it simply that, being uppermost in his mind, it came first in the hurry of being compelled to say something instantly, Mr. Budd narrates the fact of the suicide of the District Judge of a Southern State. Nor had Mr. Ferguson been so interested in the occupation of Somerville as not, that very day, to have entered the same in his Scrap-book. Had he not foretold it?

"Drunk or crazy," is the verdict of Mrs. Smithers, relieved to know it is only that.

Jem Budd, tolling more rigorously for another topic than he ever does upon gun-lock or barrel, stumbles upon the case of the refugees. Tells how they are pouring into the region about Somerville; how poor they are, how sorry they all seem to be that they ever abandoned their old homes; thinks it a great shame people should receive them so coldly.

"Serve them right. Why didn't they stay where they were and fight the Yankees?" is Mrs. Smithers's opinion, who gives only half attention to her host, casting about in her mind how best and soonest to assault Mrs. Isaac Smith.

"Have you noticed, Mr. Budd," asks Mrs. Isaac Smith, advancing her skirmishers, "how all the papers agree about the swindling going on by Government officials? Every single paper! Charges made by judges, findings by grand juries and by little juries, every body knows it, universal corruption and swindling. From the highest to the lowest, all the officials at it, the papers say." Because the lady speaking has heard very often of the remarks made in reference to herself by the gigolos at her side—infinitely more than that, the very often expressed wish of Mrs. Smithers has come to her ears, to hang that red-headed painter, Smith, abolitionist and traitor, with her own hands. Nor does the least doubt linger in the mind of any of Mrs. Smithers's circle of friends but she would do just that thing if she had but the chance.

"I have noticed it, ma'am," says sorely-perplexed Mr. Budd, "but have thought"—with special reference to Mrs. Smithers—"our papers ought not to publish such things at this time."

"I suppose you notice, Mrs. Budd, how sick even the Yankees are, from their own papers, with that vile Lincoln? All we have to do is to keep whipping them till his term is out; they'll be only too glad to make peace with us then, if they don't have a revolution among themselves before that," says Mrs. Smithers.

Mr. and Mrs. Budd retaining their seats on opposite corners of the fire-place, the two visitors between them, Mrs. Isaac Smith being next to Mrs. Budd, Mrs. Smithers to Mr. Budd; Mrs. Smith having addressed her remarks in reference to the refugees across Mrs. Smithers to Mr. Budd, in contempt of that lady, Mrs. Smithers addresses, of course, her conversation across portly Mrs. Smith, and in utter ignorance of her existence, to Mrs. Budd. Conversation will become platted together in this way, even in ordinary times and under friendly auspices all around. Even then it is hard at times for the couples thus engaged to keep their throats of talk untangled. It is peculiarly difficult to-day in Jem Budd's parlor.

"As you say, ma'am," pale little Mrs. Budd replies, across Mrs. Smith to Mrs. Smithers.

"But isn't it strange, Mr. Budd, people won't take Confederate money? It's the most miserable trash, no better than brown paper!" says Mrs. Smith, across Mrs. Smithers.

"—and they actually force the miserable people to take their greenbacks at the point of the bayonet!" continues Mrs. Smithers to Mrs. Budd, heaving with indignation at Mr. Budd's bare "Precisely, ma'am," in reply to her interlocutor, disregarding the "So I've heard, ma'am," which she gets from here.

"—could hardly believe what I hear every day of how poor people are getting among us. A good many can't send their children to Sabbath-school, nor day-school either, for want of clothes. Can't even put their feet out of their own yard themselves. What a terrible condition we are—"

"—universal infidelity there now, ma'am," from Mrs. Smithers, draws Mr. Budd's "Tis, indeed!"

"—that, of course, is worse. Backsliding? Worse than that, Mr. Budd! Open gambling, drinking, swearing, stealing, and worse. The preachers themselves—"

"—can you wonder at it? Only wonder, ma'am, is they haven't left, all of them long ago, wretched traitors to their country! Anxious to leave! I'd help them in a shorter way than they ever—"

"—even to the last drop of our blood, ma'am, and if the war should last ten thousand—"

"—said it was kept up only by the women, and especially the Secession preachers at home. The army is sick enough of it, you may be sure. Why, Mr. Budd, I got a letter, I mean a person told me—"

"—for of all things in this world, ma'am, a traitor to one's own soil they were born on, and a she-traitor is a thing I do—"

"—always so, Mr. Budd. Yankee Secessionists are the craziest, just as Yankee masters and mistresses are the hardest upon their poor negroes."

The conversation becomes more tangled as it becomes more personal.

Mr. Budd has firm hold of the pipe between his teeth, long since gone out, and only repeats his "Precisely so, Exactly, ma'am," from mechanical habit. Poor, pale, little rabbit of a Mrs. Budd, with firm hold upon the arms of her easy-chair, fascinated by Mrs. Smithers's terrible eye, no more hears what that fiery visaged lady says than if she was deaf, only is conscious of a steady rattle of words, and gasps her affirmatives at regular intervals.

But the conversation becomes more closely welded together as it heats.

"Quarrel!"

"Beast Butler!"

"Wretched Hypocrite!"

"Despicable Gouge!"

"Who wouldn't get fat as a beef, ma'am, when one is rid of a drunken husband?"

"Six, Mr. Budd, six brothers, murderers!"

"Used to be dead drunk, ma'am."

"Has swindled with sugar speculations until—"

"Abolitionist, who ought to be."

"Actually whipped her, Mr. Budd, until the bones—"

Mr. Budd closes his teeth harder on his pipe-stem, Mrs. Budd clutches firmer hold of the arms of her chair, the catastrophe must be near—

A long clear bangle blast out of doors! Mr. Jem Budd sees his only hope.

"The Federal cavalry, ladies!" and hurries out of his front-door, in a manner washing with extended arms his angry visitors before him upon the front porch, leaving Mrs. Budd utterly exhausted in her easy-chair behind. And if the company had not made so much noise and been in so great haste in leaving the room they would have heard a distinct sound from beneath the floor upon which they were. It may have been a mouse or a bat. It did not sound like dog or dog. Perhaps a parrot had made his hole there, for it sounded exactly like the words "Good! Thank God!" What makes it stranger of all is, that Mrs. Budd, the instant she is alone, is on her knees on the floor, and, with white cheeks, says in low, sharp tones, "For God's sake, All, be quiet," her lips almost touching the carpet.

The Federal cavalry coming up the street at a slow walk, and so very many, apparently, rough, bearded, powerful-looking men, too; moving in much more of a military manner than such Confederate soldiers as we have seen. Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Smithers stand, side by side, upon the elevated porch, both thrilling with deepest feeling, but of quite a different nature. Guy Brooks—arrest, and—risaged, more powerful in appearance than ever—rides slowly and at the head of the column. As he approaches, his eye catches that of Mrs. Isaac Smith. So far he has carefully avoided speaking to any of the Union people, for the best of reasons. There is something in her broad, earnest face, something so wistful in her eyes, that she forgets herself, and salutes her. Just a scarce-perceptible lifting of the forefinger of the gauntleted hand to the cap.

It is the drop too much. Bless you! Mrs. Isaac Smith has not been in the School of Prudence all these years since Isaac left, for nothing. She had resolved to be prudent before she left home; she had told Sarah Jennings over and over again, "Oh, I'll be careful, Sarah, you never fear." She had even made a special prayer, kneeling by her bed that morning, after she had put on her best bonnet and all, that she might be prudent. But perhaps her late engagement with Mrs. Smithers has "overbrought" her, as she afterward explains the matter. As Colonel Brooks touches his hat she rushes back into the parlor, matches from prostrate Mrs. Budd her handkerchief—she had left her own, to avoid the temptation, at home—and, standing beside Mrs. Smithers, waves it to the Federals, continuing waving it vehemently—the tears running copiously down her unconscious cheeks.

But if she waves her handkerchief at the Federals, Mrs. Smithers, advancing to the extreme edge of the porch, shakes her fist at them; a long arm has tall, red, hard-featured Mrs. Smithers, and a fat that has knocked many a negro child over, as well as her own, for that matter. Handkerchief and fist so egregiously flourished, side by side, send a peal of laughter down the columns—even Guy Brooks laughs outright.

But Mrs. Smith has bid farewell to her wits. "They've murdered Hol Robbins, Mr. Brooks! they've hung John Jennings! you know him, Mr. Brooks—old John Jennings, my own brother! For God's sake don't march away and leave us!" she cries, with the cry of anguish peculiar to a woman beside, say, a drowning child. Handkerchief hard at work.

"Tut-traitor! Tut-traitor! Tut-traitor!" screams Mrs. Smithers, with the yell of fury peculiar to a furious female in her fiercest fury, fist shaken almost to dislocation.

"May God bless you!" cries Mrs. Isaac Smith, her entire soul as well as body in each separate word.

"May the devil—!" But the rest of Mrs. Smithers's wish, though in the highest and shrillest of screams, is drowned in the cheer for Mrs.

Smith, which rings once again, again, down the columns, every man of whom by this time enters into the spirit of the thing.

It is full half an hour after both their lady visitors are gone that Jem and his wife can realize it all.

"That it should have taken place of all the houses in Somerville at my home!" said Jem Budd to himself over and over and over again; "and when I've worked so hard ever since the thing began to keep well with both sides. It is too bad!"

Mrs. Budd has long since gone to bed seriously ill.

"But I don't blame her a bit, not one bit either," adds Jem just as often, strictly to himself however, glancing around even then to be sure no one is by, though it is midnight, and Jem is in his own chamber. His reference is to Mrs. Isaac Smith.

He then falls upon his knees, although not, it would seem, for devotional purposes. With his lips to the floor he says,

"Had plenty of supper, Alf!"

"Plenty, Jem," from below. It must be a parrot.

"Good-night, old fellow! Fun, wasn't it?"

"Guess it was. Good-night!" from below again.

Remind me, Mr. Smithers, to take my Derringer with me whenever I go out," says Mrs. Smithers to her husband that night in conclusion. "If ever I meet that woman I'll spit in her round old moon of a face, as sure as my name is Araminty. If she says a word to that, I'll put a bullet just as deep into her old carcass as the Derringer can carry!"

"Needn't talk to me, Sarah Jennings, child. I didn't intend it when I went to church this morning. I couldn't help it. And, what is more, I don't care one single cent. Let them hang me if they want to, like they hung your pa. It's in a good cause, God knows. I'm tired of my life any way, Isaac gone so long. Humph, but only let her try it! But oh, won't we smile with these people when the old flag is here again for good! Not that I want their life; may the Lord forgive me, so!"

As to Mr. Ferguson, when, on Monday morning, he lays out the Scrap-book from his Sabbath rest in the iron safe, to the bulletin of the arrival of the Federals on the previous Friday night he has to add their leaving during Sunday night. It is a week or two before he can make an accurate statement of the number of negroes and Confederate stores they have taken away with them. One thing he knows, grim and silent during the whole raid as the Sphinx at midnight—no one can touch him for it; not a word, gesture, wink to found any thing upon.

But it seemed strange to Robby, riding a week after upon his pony past Staples's Hotel, to hear the way in which Dr. Pool, absent on pressing business from Somerville a fortnight now, curses the Federals, and Guy Brooks especially. Yet Robby only seals his sober face into still more sober silence, and rides about his errand, earnestly hoping he may not have to engage in another fight this time.

And so Somerville gets past their point in its history.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Among the many captives of the Belle goddess of Fashion it would be strange if she did not sometimes, by chance, light upon some quality, by which she commends herself to the hearts (either pocket) of husbands and fathers, even more than to her special votaries—the ladies. For the "looks of creature" has learned by dear experience that "The fashion doth wear out more apparel than the sun," Shakespeare has it; but they regard the latter word as a mere telegraph for "women." It will therefore undoubtedly be a prospective comfort to those much-abused pockets before mentioned, to know that it appears to be the sudden desire of the leaders of Fashion in Paris to adopt the greatest simplicity in all things appertaining to their toilet. Many numbers of aristocratic circles regret that they have spent such fabulous sums of money on the latest ornaments and dresses which were popular during the past winter, and with repugnance even the wise resolve to cast aside such costly trappings, and to dress elegantly without any large outlay. How long-tired this resolution may be, is uncertain; but it is said that a very striking change appears in the toilets of those ladies whose dress is certain to be a subject of comment whenever they appear in public. A certain princess, who, in Paris, goes by the name of the Charming Queen of Fashion, is now to be seen in the simplest toilet, such as a very plain untrimmed bodice or poplin jacket and skirt, the latter looped up over either a blue or marine silk petticoat. Whether those below the rank of princesses are permitted to adopt a like simple style is not stated. We may infer that it will be allowed from the fact that at the present season preference is given to white, either for house or ball dresses; and that those white dresses are to be trimmed with "elegant simplicity." Beyond this—we sympathize with the upward-looking, while truth compels us to be frank—there has come from across the waters no positive proof that the "simple style" has reached its height. On the contrary, we find it stated that walking-dresses are made of grey-colored silks, and are embellished with steel. These embellishments represent dogs and horses' heads, and upon certain silk (a favorite color just now) they are brilliant enough. Another toilet consists of a silver-grey gown royal dress, the side ornaments on the skirt being silver buttons of open silver work, and round the bottom a handsome silk fringe, with silver hanging buttons at the top of it, and a silver band at every joint of the petticoat. A very elegant robe is of white holed, dotted over with blue or pink flowers, trimmed all up the skirt with rows of shiny gimpes over colored ribbon put on in broad bands, and graduated in the length of the pieces. The corsets initiated with a band and ornaments of gimpes, forming festoons. A white tulle dress bonnet, made of straw-colored silk—the coat was varnished, and the vandykes slashed together again with straw with piping; a deep flounce of point d'Algerette was sewn all round the coat; a narrow bonnet of white tulle replaced the huckle round the shoulders. The head-dress was composed of flat gold braids, which curled on it.

It is also announced that the latest new Parisian bonnet is "to shape not unlike the barber's basin used in some of the remote parts; in other words, Ben Quinon's helmet, stuck squarely on the top of the wearer's head, like the cover of a flower-pot. It is fastened to the place by means of ribbons about as wide as your two hands, and that under the chin, forming a gigantic bow, rather larger than the leaf of a moderate-sized dining-table." There is also, by way of variety, the inverted-breakfast-table style, trimmed with every thing and any thing, and two strings to hold it on; the round-vegetable-table-cover style, either with or without the little round bottom at the top; the Sassy-work-basket style; the table-mat style—oval, and oblong, all trimmed and bedecked with glass, or straw, or jets, or birds, or feathers, or flowers; or all these put together.

Finally, it is reported that the fashionable women in Paris, not contented with wearing crowns of the springs of which are made of pure gold and silver, have now taken a fancy to boots with heels plated with the same precious metals.

New York ladies may be able to discover the "great simplicity" which throats Paris in some of the above fashions.

The managers of the "New York Young Men's Christian Association"—earnest and accomplished young men, whose time and money have been freely given for the benefit of those less fortunate—are now endeavoring to increase their means for the purpose of erecting a building which will enable them to offer special attention to the young men of this city. Their design includes a Lecture Room, Reading Room, Circulating and Reference Library, Conversation Room, a Gymnasium, and other means of recreation and advancement. Such a house could not fail to become a general place of resort. For its erection and endowment they ask the sum of $250,000. There are thousands of young men in our midst, friends, and in the true sense of the word, honest, who are thrown upon their own resources for recreation and the employment of their leisure time. Money could not be better employed than in providing attractive rooms, where healthful recreation, books, newspapers, magazines, etc., might be freely enjoyed by that large class, who only need a little sympathy and friendly guidance to make such a resort more truly congenial to them than are the haunts of vice and dissipation.

The Woodland Cemetery referred to in the item we gave our readers a few weeks ago concerning Philip Fahy is in Cambridge, Washington County, New York. The removal of Fahy's remains to that cemetery was made by order of the Troy Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which recently held its session at Cambridge.

The third Choral Festival, which took place at Irving Hall on last Saturday afternoon, attracted a large and appreciative audience. A choir of one hundred male voices, among whom are sixty of the finest boy-sopranos in America, produced a charming effect. The programme, young voices seem to have something unusual in them. Handel's choros, "Thus roared about the stony throne," was enthusiastically received. "The Angel Trio," sung by three sopranos without accompaniment, as well as the aria, a solo, by Master Toole—both selections from Mrs. Deland's "Elijah"—were peculiarly beautiful. No solo was the solo by Master Grenville, from Handel's "Messiah." Many other selections were effectively rendered; and the descriptive lecture on Cathedral architecture added to the interest of the whole performance.

If such choral festivals could be frequently repeated, so that not only more musical amateurs could attend them, but the experienced and teachers of Sabbath and Ward Schools, and also the children who are under their training, it would give a desirable impulse to the musical taste of our city. Many valuable lessons thereby be gained which might be applied with great advantage in the cultivation of children's voices.

May is the farmer's hope-time—now he casts the seed into the fertilizing earth, with bright anticipation of the autumn harvest. He may sing with a glad heart the following lines, which, by-the-way, are not of very recent origin. For a Maine journal gives a description of a venerable relic of antiquity in the shape of an earthen pitcher or twenty-five years old. And amidst the various emblematic representations of farming implements which adorned it is this stanza:

"Let the wealthy and great Roll in splendor and state;
I envy them not, I declare it,
I eat my own loaf,
My own chickens and hen;
I shear my own sheep and I wear it,
I have horses, I have beavers,
I have fruits, I have flowers,
The lark is my morning alarm,
So jolly boys, now,
Ham's God speed the plow,
Long life and success to the farmer!"

Mr. George Peabody's gifts to Danvers, Massachusetts, his native town, and to the city of Baltimore, amount to the sum of $200,000, while his donations for the benefit of the poor of London swell up to the magnificent sum of £400,000 sterling. It is so small satisfaction that it is an American that England is indebted for the greatest boon ever given to the poor of London.

A new style of announcing marriages seems to be fashionable at the North, as may be inferred from the following quotation from a North Carolina paper:

"By Dr. J. A. Sherrill, at twilight on Wednesday evening, February 28, 1864, in Catawba County, North Carolina, at the house of the bride's widowed mother, Mrs. A. A. Glanville to Miss Lizette Milligan, after a short but most delicious courtship."

Somebody says, sentimentally perhaps—we leave the reader to judge—thus:

"The world buds every year,
But the heart's just one;
The blossom falls off once,
No new blossom comes again."

If the term "heart" be used proverbially in this case, this statement is not susceptible of proof. If used literally it may be true, since a poet of undoubted authority says of women:

"No second passion e'er can charm;
She loves, and loves forever."

But certain it is that either the first statement is not universally true, or else the "heart" of a Michigan farmer, who recently lost his wife, had never budded. It seems that the wife died early in the morning. The farmer did not fancy being left alone in the world, and immediately decided to marry again. Hitching up his team, he took to his arrear-act and goes to a neighboring village to buy garments for the dead. While there he married the girl, and returned to his home the same night with his second wife, so that, by actual count, he was not a widower twelve hours. The new wife appeared at the funeral the next day in deep black, and was one of the principal mourners over the body of the first wife.

The pastor of a fashionable church pathetically exclaims: "Two-thirds of the members of my church are honorary members. They don't come to prayer-meetings; they don't attend Sunday-school; they don't add to the life of the church; they are the passengers on the gospel ship; they hear no burdens; add no strength; their names are on the books; they are honorary members."

It was rather a curious compliment which Voltaire paid to Madame de Livry, when he said of her to a friend: "She was so beautiful that I rubbed my legs, this body and stood before her like a point of admiration."

BLISSVILLE, LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS.—[SEE PAGE 346.]

"DROWNED OUT"—A SKETCH ON THE ARKANSAS.—[SEE PAGE 346.]

CHURCH AT GRAND LAKE, ON THE MISSISSIPPI.—[SEE PAGE 346.]

ARSENAL GROUNDS AT LITTLE ROCK—BAND OF THE NINETEENTH INFANTRY.—[SEE PAGE 346.]

MONTICELLO, THE HOME OF JEFFERSON, NEAR CHARLOTTESVILLE, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

OUR ARTIST IN VIRGINIA.

MR. THEO. R. DAVIS, who accompanies General Speedman in his Southern tour, sends us three sketches, from which we have engraved the illustrations on this page.

Lynchburg is situated on the south bank of James River, 191 miles west of Richmond. It is built on the hill-side, and the view from the river is quite picturesque, and would be more so but for the crowding together of the houses. In 1733 this place was a little settlement containing only five houses. It is now the great tobacco city of the Union. It was incorporated in 1805. The city suffered comparatively little from the war. Labor is in great demand; the freedmen are industrious, and the feeling of the whites toward them is in general kindly and sensible. The city of Lynchburg was not occupied until after the capture of Richmond.

Monticello, the home of JEFFERSON, near Charlottesville, is located on the crest of a mountain, the view from which is so quietly beautiful that Jefferson called it the "Heavenly Mount." He made this retreat his resting-place after the fatigues of public life. The mansion is fast going to decay; portions of it are in an extremely dilapidated condition. The present occupant charges visitors twenty cents for admission to the premises. The people of Charlottesville certainly can not be held responsible for the ruinous aspect of the home of the "Father of Democracy;" "for," says our artist, "we have not during our journeyings seen a more respectable and industrious community."

JEFFERSON'S TOMB, NEAR CHARLOTTESVILLE, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY THEO. R. DAVIS.]

The slab of Jefferson's tomb is of granite, and is the second one which has been erected, relic-hunters having carried away the first monument chip by chip. They have made some progress in the destruction of the present one. The inclosure is as little cared for as the mansion. Judging from appearances, a few years more will make the ruin of both complete.

SOUTHERN PICTURES.

"There is a large class of white men in the South," says our artist, Mr. A. R. W., "who do not work if they can avoid it, and Memphis is well represented in this respect; it is this class that the colored men seem to imitate rather than the industrious. How they live is a mystery. Not a little stealing is done, I suppose, for I have seen white men lurking among the negro huts and purchasing cotton stolen in small quantities from the levee. In some way they manage to pay the rent of their lots, which is often exorbitant. For a piece of land not fifteen feet square as much as ten dollars a month is asked and paid, not in situations, be it remembered, where land is valuable for any present purpose. All do not pay in this proportion, however, and there are not wanting generous people who have procured land and cut it up in small parcels at a reasonable rent.

"The colored people do not care to go out on the plantations, since by draying and working on the levee for 40 cents an hour they can make out a living; and so long as they support themselves it is supposed to be no one's business how much or how little they earn.

GENERAL SPEEDMAN'S TOUR—THE CITY OF LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

FREEDMEN'S SURRENDER, MEMPHIS.

"In this room, containing an army desk and some rickety chairs, and principally decorated with handbills conveying the information 'that intelligence, or later broken—1874 or 1876—entering the building, will be accommodated with 60 days' imprisonment,' contracts are signed between the colored men and planters hiring them, and the thousand and one appeals, differences, and complaints incident to the present relations of labor, heard and arbitrated, as far as my limited observation went, with strict justice and with no indication of that partial leaning toward the negro which I have heard the Bureau accused of. General BUNKER, who superintends the department, shows a spirit of fairness in his decisions, which unprejudiced people must admire, singularly in contrast to the injustice meted out sometimes by the civil courts of Memphis. The scene sketched represents a group of negroes and the contractor who had hired them discussing a breach of contract on the part of the latter, who had sold the plantation they were hired to till after they had done considerable work upon it, and had then proposed to turn them over to another plantation. The negroes demanded their pay, and the annulling of the contract, on the reasonable grounds that such an arrangement was not included in it, nor contemplated by them when it was signed. This being clear, the planter—I believe—at the recommendation of the Marshal, agreed to cancel the document. The cases which come before the Bureau are of very various kinds, and are often exceedingly trivial. Some of the negroes have applied to General BUNKER for permission to carry pistols for personal protection, but he could only tell them that it was unlawful and a privilege out of his power to give, but that while the practice of carrying weapons is universal among the whites they were as much entitled as any to their possession. While I was at the office a negro boy came in who had been hired through its agency by a man some twelve miles from the river, in Arkansas. This boy had made his escape, and was applying for protection. According to his statement he had used an oath—not in anger—to another laborer. For this the master had beaten him with a pistol and a heavy stick about the head, inflicting a severe wound, then tying him up had set the dogs upon him, his arm still showing abundant evidence of the sharpness of their teeth. To be sure there was no counter-statement, but the boy gave his testimony clearly and apparently with truthfulness. A planter was there to complain of one of his hands, whom he wanted punished for answering him back by 'What? instead of 'Sir?' At one office I saw a negro whose complaint was against another who was 'cutting him out' in a love-affair.

A characteristic case was being fought through by General BUNKER. JOHN HENSON is a mean specimen, who, among other slaves, owned before the war one FRANK HENSON, some nine miles from Memphis. JOHN HENSON'S estate was within the Union lines. JOHN H. personally found it healthy to rebel outside that limit, and made a compact with FRANK to work the plantation on shares. FRANK ran the farm and fed his master's family through the blockade for two or three years; and when JOHN HENSON got into quiet possession again of his place he repudiated FRANK'S claims, on the ground that a slave could be no party to a contract under the State laws of Tennessee. It was decided by the Freedmen's Bureau that FRANK'S claim was just. JOHN appealed to General FAX, who indorsed the decision, and again to General HOWARD, who ordered the decision to be enforced. To prevent this JOHN H. filed an injunction in the Supreme Court, which, I believe, decided against the Freedmen's Bureau. This is a test case of the powers of the Bureau, and it is not likely to give it up yet. The courts of Tennessee are sure to back up the white man against the slave in any case, but there are higher tribunals. The most enlightened men of the South are the officers of the army. As a rule, they are more liberal in their behavior to strangers, and certainly accept the situation with a better grace and more manly bearing than the vindictive non-combatants.

The negroes know this well, and the consequence is, that men like General FORTNER can get labor to work his lands while the citizen class of lazy, unimproved planters have to go without. I met a gentleman on the Arkansas who had owned 250 slaves, had served in the war, and now accepted the situation. Instead of sitting gloomily down with the idea that negroes were of no use as freemen, and the country necessarily gone to ruin, he determined to decide the question for himself. He told me that he was doing well; he had already on his place 75 men at work, and when I met him he had engaged 40 more, of a regiment mustered out at Durrall's Bluff; not, it must be added, without opposition from the officers of the regiment, some of whom tried to dissuade the man from contracting with him. This plantation was as comfortable a place as a negro intending to work could probably find. When their tasks were done the men could do as they pleased. There was a teacher for them, a good fiddler or two, and every prospect for a jolly Fourth of July, and I have no doubt that this gentleman will make money. Who knows but the negroes, although they may not be induced to work the long hours that were required before freedom, may, on the other hand, quicken their slow pace and do as much in shorter time? The old system was to blow the horn so early on the plantation that, in the cotton picking season, the hands would be all out, after cooking and eating breakfast, by the first appearance of light, ready in the rows to commence the work of picking while the dew was so heavy as to drench them from the laden branches almost at noon. The first picking would be so wet as to require exposure on the stagers till noon, about which time the sun's heat would dry the clothing of the pickers. This was not a healthy practice for the fall of the year. Dinner, ready cooked, would be brought out to the fields and hurried over. Work was continued as late as 8 o'clock, when the hands would be dismissed for supper. This was a killing system, and required all the overseer's watchfulness; but the result was an immense profit to the planter.

Even with the present prospect of remuneration the inducements to plant cotton are great. Eighty hands, it is stated, can easily grow and pick 1000 bales of cotton. These are paid on an average 16 dollars a month and rations, which, at the present prices of cotton, would realize a handsome fortune in one year. Good cotton land will raise 1 bale to the acre, in some places 1½ bales. The introduction of improved agricultural machinery will, in great measure, make up for the loss of labor in the South, for the implements of farming in this section appear to have been modeled upon the primitive efforts of our forefather Adam.

DOWN THE MISSISSIPPI.

"After the delay usual with steamboat men, in the category of whose virtues that of punctuality is unwritten, our boat at last got away from the levee at Memphis, and once more among wasted and deserted plantations we continued down the Mississippi. Hardly a plantation could be seen where there were any signs of life, and so on to the White River, which is a deep and narrow channel well adapted for steamboat purposes, as it scarcely varies in hundreds of miles and always has plenty of water. There was so much at this time that all the country adjacent was overflowed. No land being visible among the trees except at places, few and far between, where the everlasting forest of cypress, gum, and cotton-wood, with its undergrowth of cane, gave way to a bluff.

On the Mississippi are very few plantations in working order this year; the water in many places has overflowed, and the banks of the river are generally very desolate, and back from the river it is even worse; there are not so many deserted plantations and burned houses, but the back-water of the Mississippi has done much damage, and is very slow to quit the fields. On the Mississippi it is not expected that the crop will amount to much; in the interior of the State of Mississippi about one acre out of four is the amount in cultivation.

In Arkansas, judging from what I could see, something like half the lands are in cultivation. The negroes there appear to be getting along amicably with the planters. The Little Rock Dispatch says they are generally contented and industrious, while at the same time the employers show a disposition to pay good prices, and also to feed and treat them well. This is the sunny side of the picture, but away from the highways of travel in Arkansas it is not all roses and dew. Here is a story of another kind. Some short distance from Pine Bluff, on the Arkansas River, lived a planter whose negroes did not know that they were free, but, on the contrary, had been told and believed that the North was whipped, and slavery tighter than ever. A rumor, however, reached them, and they determined to run for it, not daring to tell their master that they were free. They were all domiciled in a new house the master had built, with no other entrance than through his own dwelling. This he locked securely at night, so that they were as good as prisoners. One night, however, they managed to get out, and to the number of 14, leaving some helpless ones behind, the late slaves started for the river, having previously dug up their master's money—the secret of whose hiding-place one of them knew—and appropriated $150, putting the rest back. A boat came along and took them all on board for Memphis, charging them $5 each for passage, but finding them verdant and in possession of more cash, made another charge of five dollars a head before they let them ashore. The woman who gave this narrative had $100 of money, her father's saving, in Confederate currency, and she never believed the Yankees were victorious till the Memphis shopkeepers laughed at her money. The rest of the 14 that got away had hired out to a planter for $7 a month and rations.

One curious thing about freedom is the manner in which it mixes up the matrimonial relations of these people. Some of them, owing to the little sales effected by their masters, find themselves with two or three wives and families, and several husbands sometimes claim one wife. Indeed, they are only just beginning to understand the real obligation of matrimony.

North Alabama appears to keep up its reputation as a degraded section. The people are poor and do not work, and the land is as poor as the people, being mostly worked-out soil. The intellectual condition of the whites and blacks in this country is about on a par; and very little improvement is likely to take place in the negro till the white race are educated to a higher development.

CHURCH AT GRAND LAKE.

"On a Sabbath morning our boat touched at the landing-place of Grand Lake, on the Mississippi. Here was the only church we had seen thus far. It was located away from any considerable town, and how the inhabitants can reach it at this stage of the water without boats is a problem. Near the church were many burnt chimneys, the remains of buildings destroyed in the war. Ruins of this sort were quite frequent all along the river.

MEMPHIS, ARKANSAS.

"On one side of the dilapidated capital in Little Rock is a collection of log-huts and shanties known by the euphonious name of Ellersville. As it is chiefly devoted to the colored population the name is significant. To this picturesque retreat in the very centre of the city numbers of the mustered-out colored soldiers betook themselves, their wives, families, or sweet-hearts having already secured habitations there, where they could cook out of doors and live inside in the highest style with the liberal allowance of room usually afforded by coffee.

ARMENIAN GROUNDS AT LITTLE ROCK.

"These grounds are described as having been very beautiful before the war. At present they show evidences of abuse, having been used as a camping-ground by the Confederate soldiers during their occupation of Little Rock. The band of the Nineteenth Regulars playing here of an evening renders the grounds an attractive resort, and as the trees and flowers put on their summer dress they will become quite pretty once more. The arsenal itself is the prominent building, while beyond it, behind the summer house, is the house of the commandant."

On page 345 a description is given of Mr. TUNBROOK R. DAVIS'S sketches of Lynchburg, Manilla, and the tomb of JEFFERSON.

A HOPELESS CASE.

DOCTOR THATCHER paced the room anxiously. He was perturbed. He longed for the return of his adopted son; he scarcely knew why, but he also dreaded it. He took up a book; he could not read. Gradually, as he sat before the fire, he fell into a restless doze. The sound of a door opening and the door-chain rattling awoke him. He rose and took the lamp into the hall. There was his nephew; John Harkness, fevered, and evidently with drinking. His face was flushed, his hat was crushed, his coat torn.

"Why, Jack," said the Doctor, reproachfully, "you've tired yourself in your rounds, and then taken too much wine. You shouldn't let those farmers tempt you. I used to find it hard."

"There, that'll do," said Harkness, sullenly. "I've been with no farmer. I drink because I've lost at cards I tell you, and your cursed stinginess never leaves me a shilling to try my luck with. I'll be kept under no longer. I'm over head and ears in debt, and money I'll have. If Aunt Fanny won't stump up, you must. I'll get money somewhere, and I'll pay you out for keeping me without a penny. No, I won't go to bed—go to bed yourself. I want brandy. Give me brandy!"

Then, with a volley of oaths, Harkness threw himself on a sofa, and fell, in a few seconds, into a drunken sleep.

The old Doctor stood over him, half paralyzed with sorrow and surprise. Could the rumors then be true?

"No," he thought to himself; "no, I will not believe it. This is a mere youthful folly. The poor boy has been led away by some of those farmers, who think they show no hospitality unless they make their guest drunk. Poor boy, how sorry he will be to-morrow morning! I shall lock him in now, that the servant may not see him, and I will come myself and let him out, and then lecture him well. Poor boy!"

In the morning, when Dr. Thatcher unlocked the door of the room where Harkness had slept, he found the window open and the room empty. His old servant James informed him that Mr. John had come and ordered the gig at six o'clock, and started upon his rounds.

"Poor boy!" said the Doctor, "he was too ashamed to meet me. Haven't face me after the misconduct of last night. Gone out to work again, too, without his breakfast, dear boy! Won't dare to see his Aunt Fanny to-day, I'll be bound. Of course he meant nothing last night; perhaps I've been too close. I must call at the bank and draw a check for him. Ha! I was had enough at his age."

An hour or two later found the rough but worthy Doctor driving at a sober pace toward the bank.

"There goes Old Murder!" cried the pert chemist's assistant to an associate, who was talking to him at the door of the shop in the High Street.

"Yes. There goes old four miles an hour! Did you hear of young Harkness, and how he carried on last night at the billiard-room? Swore he'd been cheated, got noisy drunk, and fought three of the men there with the bat-end of a billiard cue. Oh, he's going the whole hog, he is! How he flashes his money, to be sure."

"Well, Thatcher," said the manager of the bank, as the Doctor alighted from his chaise, "what can we do for you?"

"I want this check, Miller, for one hundred and fifty pounds, cashed, and I want to look at my book."

"Certainly. Edward, get Dr. Thatcher's book from the parlor."

"I am going to the post-office, and will call in a minute or two. Pahaw! how cold it is. Seen my son to-day?"

"Drove by, Doctor, about half an hour ago, down Church Street."

"Always at work. That's the way. Early bird picks up the worm."

"Thought he looked ill, Sir. Works too hard."

"Yes, it is a dog of a life, ours. One gets old before one has leisure to enjoy what one has earned."

The manager smiled deprecatingly, as much as to say, "Rich people will have their joke."

The Doctor came to the post-office.

"Any letters, Mrs. Johnson?"

"Yes, Doctor. There's one for you."

"Hand it out."

The Doctor sat in the chaise and read it. It was from a hospital in London, a consumption hospital, to which he annually subscribed twenty pounds. The secretary wrote to tell him that two years' subscriptions were due.

"Staff about due!" growled the Doctor. "Sent Jack to pay it into their bank a month ago. He never forgets any thing."

"Here is your book," said the manager, handing the small parchment-covered book to the Doctor as he entered the bank, where a farmer was scooping up a salmon-colored bag of sovereigns.

"No, it is not entered," said the Doctor, in a startled way. "Did not my boy Jack pay in twenty pounds the end of last month for Drummson's? Surely? The last check he paid in. I've not sent since to you for any thing."

"Let me see the checks, Mr. Miller." The Doctor spoke quite calmly, but his voice trembled. "Will you allow me to sit down for a moment in your back parlor till this gentleman has gone? There has been some mistake about a subscription; a quiet minute or so will set it right."

"Certainly, Sir. Edward, show Dr. Thatcher in and give him a chair. There, Sir, are the checks. Edward, put on a bit of coal, the fire's low."

The Doctor, as the door closed behind the manager, looked closely at the checks, turned the signatures up and down; then he rested his head on his hands and burst into tears. The signatures were forgeries.

"I see it all," he murmured. "Oh, that unhappy boy! and this, I fear, is not the worst. O Abraham, my son, my son!"

"There's something up," said the clerk to the manager, as he took a hasty peep over the green curtain of the glass door. "Why, good gracious, Mr. Miller, the Doctor's faint!"

"Good-morning, Mr. Miller," said the Doctor, when he had recovered, and shaken his seat once more in the chaise; "there is no blunder, after all, I see where the mistake lay. I have taken all the checks up to yesterday. Continue the draft. Young man, be kind enough to turn the chaise. Thank you."

The Spartan boy kept the wolf hid till it gnawed into his heart. Dr. Thatcher had a secret whose teeth were sharper than even the wolf. In that half hour he had suffered the pangs of death itself.

He drove straight to his sister's, Mrs. Thatcher's, whose neat little cottage was about a quarter of a mile from the town, and near the old parish church. As the Doctor's chaise drove up, Miss Page ran out, looking very pale and anxious.

"Well, Letty, how's Aunt Fanny?"

"Very, very ill, dear uncle. No appetite, very weak, no sleep."

"That won't do; and has Jack been?"

"Yes, and orders the same medicine, only larger doses; but I'm sure—I'm sure it does not agree with her. Do give your advice, uncle."

"I promised Jack, only two days ago, never to interfere with his patients; but this once I will. Send some one, Letty, to take the mare round the stables."

Mrs. Thatcher, the Doctor's sister, was sitting up in bed, propped with pillows. Her handsome features were sharpened by illness, her cheeks were sunken, her eyes pale and anxious.

"Well, Fanny, and how is it with you?"

"Bad, bad, John; perpetual pain, nausea, no sleep, no appetite."

The Doctor's face changed, a ghastly pallor came upon his lips.

"Let me see the medicine, Letty."

Miss Page brought it. The Doctor looked at it eagerly, then tasted it. The next moment he had flung the bottle on the fire. A dew of nervous excitement broke out upon his forehead.

"Uncle?"

"Brother?"

"The medicine is much too powerful for you in this weak state. Jack is a clever fellow, but he does not know your constitution as I do. You must not, however, pain him by telling him you have not taken his stuff, so I will send you some tonic that resembles it in color, but less violent. This was too much for you. Jack was right—he was right, but he has not taken into account your age, Fanny."

"I could not take it yesterday, and Jack was very angry."

"You take the medicine I shall send you when I return directly it comes; take it every two hours till the sickness abates. Now, come, lie back, Fanny; you are very weak."

The pale worn face turned toward him and smiled on him, then the head sank back on the pillow, and the weary eyelids closed.

"I can not shake off this stupor, John. Good-by, and bless you, dear John!"

The Doctor signed to Letty to leave the room. When she had done so, and the door closed, he sat down by his sister's bedside, sorrow-stricken and thoughtful; in that silence, broken only by the tick of the watch at the bed head, and the deep breathing of the sleeper, he fell on his knees, and prayed for help and guidance from the Giver of all Good. Then he took out his repeater and waited till the minute-hand reached the half hour. It was three o'clock that had struck when Letty closed the door. Then he took his sister's hand and woke her.

"What, John, are you here still?" How good of you! I thought I was alone. I feel better now. It was that dreadful medicine that hurt me."

"Fanny," said the Doctor, with all a woman's tenderness, "when you made your will in the summer, you told me you left all your money to Jack on his marriage with Letty. Now, I want you to do me a kindness."

"I left it all to dear Jack; I told him so. What kindness can I show you, brother, a poor, dying old woman like myself?"

"Alter the will this evening, and leave me the money during my lifetime. It will be a check on Jack, if he grows extravagant or wild."

"Oh, he won't, dear boy! Yes, as you will, John. You have always some kind and good object in what you do."

"I will bring a lawyer and witness in half an hour. It might ruin even a well-intentioned lad, and make him idle. Later in life it will perhaps come better."

In the room below the Doctor found Letty, anxious and apprehensive of some evil, but she scarcely knew what.

"Oh, uncle, uncle!" she said, in tears, "nothing is not in danger, is she? Oh, do say she is not in danger!"

"By God's help, Letty, she will be out of danger in a few hours. It is well I came. Letty, you love me, and you love my son Jack?"

"I do! I do! you know how I do, dear uncle."

"If you love us both you will then do as I tell you, and not deviate a single iota, for much depends on what I am now going to say. But first let your man George ride quick into town and get this prescription made up."

What the Doctor's instructions were meant not at present to be revealed.

THREE hours later the Doctor was in his surgery, examining a drawer of dangerous drugs that was generally kept locked. He had just closed it, and was musing with one elbow on his desk and his head on his hand, when there came a step behind him. He looked round; it was John.

"John," he said, and he said no more. But there was an infinite depth of reproachful sadness in that one word.

"Dear father," said his adopted son, "I deeply regret the events of last night. I was tempted to stay at a farmer's harvest-home, and I talked nonsense (did I not?) about debt and wanting money. It was all wandering. Forget it all—it meant nothing. It was foolish, wrong of me. I'm sorry for it."

"Let it be the last time, Jack," said the Doctor; "it is harder to come up hill one step than to go down twenty. Do not break my heart by becoming a bad man. By-the-by, have you sent Aunt Fanny the medicine, and how is she?"

"Oh, pulling through all right. She's as tough as nails."

"What prescription are you using?"

"This," said John Harkness holding up a bottle of simple tonic drops. "The old lady wants strength. Oh, she'll do if she can only get stronger."

The Doctor nodded, and said, "The tonic is right. At that moment the surgery door opened, and an old farmer presented himself.

"Why, Farmer Whitehead, how are you?"

"Alling, Doctor, thank ye, with the flinny. Uncommon bad, to be sure; and so is my missus."

"Ah, I thought Jack here had been attending you for months; you are down in our books. How is this, Jack?"

The young man's color rose. "It is a mistake of mine. I'm a regular duffer for memory; it was Robinson at Wood-est I meant. I'll put it all right."

"Just see to Farmer Whitehead then, now. Give him a diaphoretic and ipecacuanha to keep the pores open. I'll go and dress for dinner."

"Stepped in here," the Doctor muttered, as he shut the surgery door behind him. "I fed this serpent, and now he stings me; but still no use shall know his shame, for I may still, by God's help, save him from crime, and leave him time and opportunity for repentance. Heaven have mercy upon him! Yes, still—still I may save the boy I once loved so much."

Dinner was over. The Doctor had been cheerful, as usual, and had made no further reference to the unhappy events of the night before. John Harkness had grown listless and soiled as ever, seeing the Doctor garbled with so brief an apology.

"Jack," said the Doctor, warning to the conversation, "go and get a bottle of that thirty-two part; I feel to-day as if I wanted a specially good bottle."

John Harkness went, and returned in a few minutes with the bottle, carrying it carefully, with the chalk mark unspurred.

"That's right, Jack. Don't do like the country lads, who, when his master said, 'John, have you shaken that wine?' replied, 'No, sir; but I will, and then about it up like a draught. Ha, ha! I'll doant it; I like doing it.'

The Doctor rose to decant the wine, standing at the buffet to do it facing a mirror, and with his back to the table, where the young man had again silently seated himself. In the round shining surface of the mirror the room was repeated in sharp clear miniature. The bottle was still gurgling out its crimson stores into the broad silver wine-strainer, when the Doctor, casting his eyes upon the mirror, observed John draw swiftly from his breast-pocket a little fat black vial and pour a dozen drops of some thick fluid into the half-full glass which stood beside his uncle's plate.

He took no notice of what he had seen, nor did he look round, but merely said:

"John, I'm sorry to trouble you, but we shall want some brown sherry; there is hardly enough for to-day. Get it before we sit down to the real business of the evening."

The moment John Harkness left the room the Doctor, with the quickness of youth, slipped the wine, recognized the taste of tannin, threw open the door leading into the surgery, dashed the wine down a sink, then shut the door, and refilled the glass to exactly the same height.

"Here is the sherry, governor. Come, take your wine."

The Doctor tossed it off.

"I feel sleepy," he said—"strangely sleepy."

"Oh, it is the weather. Go into that green chair and have a ten minutes' nap."

The Doctor did so. In a moment or two he fell back, assuming with consummate skill all the external symptoms of deep sleep. A deep apoplectic snoring breathing convinced the Doctor's adopted that the landman had taken effect.

A moment that hardened man stood watching the sleeper's face; then, falling on his knees, he slipped from the old Doctor's finger his massive seal-key.

The instant he turned to run to a cabinet where the Doctor's case-book was kept, the old man's stern eyes opened upon him with the swiftest curiosity; but the old man did not move a limb nor a muscle, remaining fixed like a figure of stone.

"He's safe," said the coarse, rattling voice; "and now for the case-book, to fix it against him if any thing goes wrong."

As he said this the last man opened the case-book and made an entry. He then locked the book, replaced it in the cabinet, and slipped the key-ring once more on the Doctor's finger. Then he rose and rang the bell softly. The old servant came to the door.

"The governor's taken rather too much wine," he said, blowing out the candle; "awake him about twelve and tell him I'm gone to bed. You say I'm out, if you dare; and mind and have the trap ready to-morrow at half-past nine. I'm to be at Mrs. Thatcher's."

When the door closed upon the hopeless profligate, the Doctor rose and wrung his hands. "Lost, lost!" he said; "but I will still hide his shame. He shall have time still to repent. I can not—can not forget how I once loved him."

Sternly the Doctor set himself to that task of self-devotion—stem as a soldier chosen for a forlorn hope. "To-morrow," he said, "I will confront him, and try if I can touch that hard heart."

When the servant came at twelve the Doctor pretended to awake. "Joe," he said, "get my chains ready to-morrow at a quarter to ten; mind, to the moment. Where's Mr. John?"

"Gone to bed, Sir. Good-night."

"He makes them all here like himself," said the old man, as he slammed his bedroom door.

"How is your missus?" said the young doctor, as, driving fast through Crossford the next morning, he suddenly espied Mrs. Thatcher's servant standing at the post-office window.

The old coachman shook his head.

"Very bad, Sir; sinking fast."

John Harkness made no reply, but lashed his horse and drove fiercely off in the direction of the sick woman's house.

"It all goes well," he said, half aloud. "I had half a mind to stop the thing yesterday when I saw her; but these fellows press so with their bills, and the governor's so crossed stringy. I really must press it on. It's no crime. What is it? Only sending an old woman two or three days sooner to the heaven she is always whining for. Yet she was fond of me, and it's rather a shame; but what can a fellow do that's so hedged?"

So reasoned this fallen man, steeped in the sophistries which sin uses as narcotics to stupefy its victims.

Arrived at the door he threw down the reins, tossed back the apron, and leaped out. He was excited and desperate with the frenzy he had already found time to take. All at once, as he passed his fingers in a vain way through his whiskers and shook his white great-coat into its natural folds, he glanced upward at the windows. To his surprise, but by no means violent regret, he saw that the blinds were all down.

"By the Lord Harry!" he muttered, "if the old cat hasn't already kicked the bucket! Vengeance, that'll do. Now then for regret, lamentation, and a white cambric handkerchief."

He pulled at the bell softly. In a moment or two the door was opened by a servant, whose eyes were red with crying. At the same instant Miss Paget stepped from a room opening into the hall. She had a handkerchief to her face.

"Oh, John, John," she sobbed; "my dear, dear aunt."

"Then she's really gone," said Harkness, with well-feigned regret. "Here, Letty, come into the back parlor and tell me about it. Why, I didn't think the old lady was going so soon."

"Not there, John, not there," said Letty, as she stood before the door.

"I'll go up and see her at once."

"No, no, John, you must not. Not yet."

"Why, what's all this fuss about, Letty?" said Harkness, angrily. "One would think no one had ever died before. Of course it's a bad job, and we're all very sorry; but what must be, must be. It is as bad as crying over spilt milk."

"Oh, John, you never spoke like this before! You never looked like this before. John, you do not really love me!" And she burst into a passionate and almost hysterical weeping.

"Nonsense, nonsense, Letty; you know I do. We can marry now, now she's left me her money. I've got rather into a mess lately about tin. It's that old woman who lies up stairs, and my stingy hard old governor, who kept us so long from marrying and being happy. We will marry in a month or two now, let who will say any. By George! if there isn't the bureau where she used to keep her papers. The will must be there. There is no harm in having a look at it. Where are the keys, Letty? Go and get them from her room. She's no use, I suppose, for them now? She kept them tight enough while she was alive. Come, hurry off, Letty; this is a turning-point with me."

Letty threw herself before the old bureau, the tears rolling from her eyes. "Oh, John, John," she said, "do not be so cruel and hard-hearted! What evil spirit of greed possesses you? You were not so once. I can not get the keys. Wait. Have you no love for the dead?"

"Stuff and nonsense. I want no whining sentiments. I thought you were a girl of more pluck and sense. Get away from that bureau. I'll soon prise it open. It's all mine now. Mind, I'm queer this morning. Things haven't gone smooth with me lately at all. Get away."

He pushed the weeping girl from the desk, and, thrusting in the blade of a large knife, wrenched open the front of the bureau. A will fell out. As he stooped to snatch it up the door opened, and the old Doctor stood before him. There were tears in his eyes as he noticed Letty from the room. She gave one long look back, and the door was locked behind her. There was a terrible stern gravity in the old man's pale face, and his mouth was clenched as if fixed with the pang of some mortal agony.

John Harkness stepped back and clutched hold of the shattered bureau, or he would have fallen.

"John," said the old man, "you have deceived me. I loved you, loved you Heaven only knows how tenderly. There was a time when I would have bled to death to save you an hour's pain. There was a time when I thought more of your smallest disappointment than I should have done for the loss of one of my own limbs. I fostered you; I took you from a bad father, and brought you up as my own son. I have been foolishly indulgent, and now, like Abraham, you have taught me bitterly my folly. You have forged—you have lied. Yes, don't dare to speak, Sir. You have blacked and blacked your heart become as you gave yourself to self-indulgence and sin. Further and further you erred from the narrow path; faster and faster you drove down hill, till at last, forsaken by the good angels, and urged forward by the devil, the great temptation came, and you fell into cancer. Not a word, Sir; you see I know all. Old as I am, 'twas love for you made me subtle. I found out your forgery. I discovered your false entries of patients' names. I traced you out in all your follies and vices, and finally I saw you, when you thought me asleep, take the key-ring from my finger, and make those entries in a forged hand in my case-book, that night, but for God's infinite mercy, have led to my being now in prison as a murderer. You may start; but even a horrible cold-blooded crime did not appal you. It is fear, and not repentance, that even now makes you turn pale. The sin of Cain is upon you. Even now, sugar faces are looking up from the lowest shames of hell, waiting for your coming; while, from the nearest heaven, the pale and face of one who loved you as a mother, regards you with sorrow and with pity."

"Father, father!" cried the unhappy and conscience-stricken wretch, and held out his hands like one waiting for the death-blow from the executioner.

"Have mercy! Spare me! I did not kill her. She would have died, any how. I am young; give me time to repent!"

"John, I will not deceive you as you have deceived me. My sister still lives. I discovered your intended crime, and gave her antidotes. She may yet recover, if it seems good to the all-merciful Father; still you had murdered her but for me. Tell me not of repentance. Time will show that. I shall never hear in this world whether or not your repentance is true or false. Here is one hundred pounds. That will start you in another hemisphere for good or for evil. I wish, for the honor of our family, to conceal your shame, and the last spark of love that is left argues me to conceal your intended crime. Letty you will see no more. I, too, am dead to you forever. It is now one hour to the next train. Speed that time in preparing for your journey. At the nearest sea-port write to me, and I will forward all that belongs to you. Your debts shall be paid. I shall tell people that a sudden spirit of adventure made you leave me and start for Australia."

"But Letty—one word," groaned the discovered criminal. "I love her—one word. I forget her for a time in my cruel selfishness; but I love her now—marry—"

"Not one word. She is ignorant of your crime, but she knows that you are unworthy of her love. Mind, one struggle, one word of opposition, and I throw you into prison as a forger, and a man who had planned a murder. Go; when that door closes on you it is as if the earth of the grave had closed over my eyes. We shall meet no more. Go. Speak to no one; and remember, that the will you hold in your hand leaves not a single farthing to yourself. Go. We part forever. If you write, I burn the letters unopened. Go."

The young man stood for a moment as soldiers are sometimes said to do when a bullet has pierced their hearts. His face was the face of a corpse, but no tears came. The blood was frozen at its source. Then he stepped forward, kissed the old man on the forehead, and rushed from the house.

In five minutes afterward the door softly opened, and Letty entered. The Doctor took her hand. They knelt.

"Let us pray for him," he said, solemnly. "Letty, his fault you shall never know, but you must henceforward consider him as dead. Those who love me will never mention his name. Let us pray for him, my child, and may God's Spirit soften that hard and rebellious heart, for nothing else will. My hope and joy is gone. There is nothing left me now but to prepare myself humbly for death. Come, Letty, let us pray, for prayer avails much."

ONE July afternoon, thirteen years later, a handsome, curly, black-bearded man, in a fur cap and rough Australian coat, drove up to the door of the King's Arms, seated beside the older man even better and more bearded than himself. He alighted and ordered lunch; as he lunched he talked to the waiter about Crossford and old times. He had once known Crossford, he said.

"Has Travers not got this house now?"

"No, Sir; he died three years ago, and his widow became bankrupt."

"Where's Jones, the veterinary surgeon?"

"Dead, Sir—died in a fit four years ago."

"Is he Harris, the fat saddle, to the fore?"

"No, Sir—died last year of dropsy, and his son's dead too."

The stranger sighed and drank down a glass of ale at a gulp.

"Waiter, get me some brandy, hot." He hesitated for a moment, then he said, fiercely, "Is old Mrs. Thatcher still alive?"

"What! old Mrs. Thatcher at the lawn? Oh, she died seven years ago, and left all her money to her brother, the Doctor. There was an adopted son who would have had it, but he turned out a scamp."

"Oh, indeed! This is shocking bad brandy. And the old Doctor—is he still alive?"

"Oh, Lord, no, Sir. Dead six years since. Why, Sir, you seem to remember the people well?"

The stranger rested his head on his hand and thought for a moment; then he said:

"And Miss Paget, Mrs. Thatcher's niece—is she living—married, I suppose?"

"Living—yes, Sir. Look, Sir; why, there is her carriage standing at the bank-door opposite; wait, and you'll see her come out. She married a Lieutenant Price, of the Bombay army."

At that moment, as the stranger looked out of the window, a lady stepped into the carriage; three pretty children—two boys and a girl—leaped in, laughing, after her. It was Letty, still beautiful even as a matron, her face wearing the old sweet amiable expression. The skittish ponies rebelled, but darted off audaciously at a touch of their mistress's whip.

"What, in the dumps, old friend?" said the second stranger, going up to his friend, who still stood with his face fixed to the window. "Come, more liquor—I'll cheer this time; it's our last day in old England."

"Come old England and all that are in it!" said the other man, turning round fiercely. "Come, let's catch the 11.30 and get back to Liverpool. If I once get to the old tracks in Australia—once on the back of a buck-jumper and after the kangaroo, I'll never set foot again in the old country. Here's your money, waiter. Come, Murray, let's be off!"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

An Irish emigrant leaving the coast-guard at Fortmouth, asked a sailor, "What's that?" "Why, there's sunset," was the reply. "Sunset?" exclaimed the emigrant, "and does the sun go down in this country with such a bang as that?"

A LAUREATE DIVORCE.—A blind man's dog. Which of the inmates of the ark paid most attention to their toilet?—The fox and cock, for they took their breakfast and soup.

A CONTROVERSY.—(To be given at the close of a morning meal.) Why would a lady who stays at home all the year round be likely to prove herself a false relation to her nephews?—Because she is not a true-and. Good-morning.

CREATORS' BILLS.—A carpenter was employed by a farmer, and rendered the following invoice bill: "To hanging two barn-doors and nailing seven hours, three shillings and sixpence."

If a man seems kindly one he is said to be second asleep? Why should Lord Byron be presumed to have been a good-tempered young man?—Because he always kept his choker pulled down.

MARRIAGE FACTS.—At a naval court-martial, lately held, the following dialogue is said to have taken place between one of the witnesses and the court: "Are you a Protestant?" "No, Sir." "What are you, then?" "Captain of the firetop."

What is the best way to keep a gentleman's affection?—Not to return them.

Two captains agreed to share their prizes, and met weekly to give an account of their seven days' work and signalize their rank. On one occasion Captain A.—signaled Captain B.—"I have taken something." Quoth B. wrote up the booty. "What have you taken?" and all hearts stood on tip-toe of expectation. "Physic," was the pithy reply of Captain A.—

A CAPTAIN'S LUNA.—The writer of an autobiography is clearly justified in seeking the widest possible departure from the truth, for it is notoriously incorrect to write about one's self to make use of a little little bit.

Why are birds likely to feel depressed early on summer mornings?—Because their little bills are all over dirt.

A French Bishop in a sermon recently administered a philippic to circulating libraries: "Let us beware," said he, "while putting on their profane and expensive attire, how narrow are the gates of Paradise."

An old lady living in the country lately refused to let her niece dress with a young graduate of Oxford, because she heard that he was a "barometer of arts," whereby she understood him to be an artificial teacher.

Why are poultry the most profitable stock to keep?—Because for every grain they give a peck.

A fine coat may cover a fool, but never conceal one.

A doctor lately informed his friends, in a large company, that he had been eight days in the country. "Yes," said one of the party; "it has been convenient to the Times." "Ah!" said the doctor, crumpling his neck importantly; "pray, is what term?" "Well, as well as I can remember, in the following: 'There was last week seventy-seven deaths less than the week before!'"

BRUCE WANTS.—April showers. The question, how getting drunk over advances one's happiness? would seem to be put to rest by the Irishman who was courting when drunk, and was asked what pleasure he found in whiskey. "Oh, Biddy, it's a waste of time to see two of your wale party faces instead of one!"

Why is the tread-mill like a true convert?—Because its treading is the result of conviction.

Laureate travels so slowly that poverty soon overtakes her.

SAWS BY OUR OWN SAWYER.

Nothing perfect. Some creek is found in every staff; And every grain must have its chaff; Without their weeds no garden plot; The sea itself has ugly spots.

Every beam must have its black; Every good doth smother a lack; Every skin some fiddle shows; Some feisty petal, every rose.

No horse that never stumbled (true); No fire so bright that no smoke grew; No berry without its fiddle notes; No beam of light without its notes.

The world itself is not quite round; A glass in every home is found; No tree without its withered notes; No joy without its shade of grief.

No clock that never erred a minute; No book without some error in it. Great Henry's self did sometimes nod; All bear the six-string.—"It's no use."

PRESENCE PLAIN.—"Sir," said an old Scotch woman to her minister, "I shan't be a part of your return yesterday." "Indeed! what was it?" "You said a pious and the figure of ornamentation, and I shan't know what it means." "Is that all? It's very plain. The figure of ornamentation is merely a picturesque mode of saying, 'Oh! ah! is that all?' and the good woman: 'What a pity! but I was not to understand that!'"

PRESENCE PLAIN.—"My dear Mrs. B., have you a lady prevent the odious habit of cooking in one's house?" asked Mrs. A. "The only way that I know," replied Mrs. B., "is to have nothing for breakfast, and wait it over for dinner and supper."

"Pa, can a person catch any thing if he don't run after it?" "Certainly not." "Well, then, how did you catch the cold you've got?"

Criticism shoppers, who never buy, are known in the trade as counter-traders.

A legal eagle calls his writings "criticism, strings to my," "a with if another hat."

GRAND RECEPTION OF JAMES STEPHENS, THE ENGLAN CHIEF, AT JONESH WOOD, APRIL 14, 1866.—[From PAGE 340.]

PARIS FASHIONS FOR MAY.

THE Parisian modistes have certainly produced a fair stock of novelties in the way of chapeaux for the present season, the most remarkable of which are the chapeaux Lamballe, Watteau, Bergère, Benetton, and Printanier. The favorite materials of which these are made are tulle and fancy straw; but sometimes they are formed entirely of clusters of flowers, such as clematis and lilies of the valley, or vine leaves of different shades of color, with here and there a few small green or purple grapes arranged closely together. In the front there is occasionally a band of colored ribbon on a rack of beads, the strings of the chapeau being, of course, of the same color. When the chapeau is of tulle this is frequently gathered, and the crown is encircled with a wreath of flowers, hyscilla, moss-roses, passion-flowers, heart's-eases, forget-me-nots, or lilies of the valley, the ends of which hang down on either side, or, joined together, fall over the breast. The strings are for the most part of white ribbon, with frequently a second pair of strings of tulle; but strings of mauve, pale blue, or green, or other light color ribbon harmonizing with the tints of the wreaths are also worn. The chapeaux of fancy straw are trimmed with similar wreaths to those just described, and occasionally have the ribbon of the strings passed over the crown. A favorite trimming for these chapeaux is a cluster of ears of wheat or barley on either side, with a chain Benetton of straw passementerie falling down in front. The strings in this case would be of straw-color ribbon with, perhaps, a second pair of strings of mauve, crape, or tulle of the same color. Most of the chapeaux have glass drops suspended round the brim; the more elegant tulle bonnets being ornamented in a similar manner with pearl beads.

For robes several novelties in the way of foulards have made their appearance; for instance, the foulard Patti, with a border formed of musical notes; the foulard plantain, ornamented with ears of wheat knotted together; the foulard pastel, with small bouquets of flowers on a pearl or rose, gray or white

THE MONEY-MAKER

THE MONEY-SPENDERS

PARIS FASHIONS FOR MAY, 1866.—CHAPEAUX AND COIFFURES.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR MAY, 1866.

QUITE REASSURING.

"The Rooms are Charming, and would Suit us exactly. But how about the Neighborhood? Are you sure that it is a Healthy one?" "Healthy, Madam! I should think it was! Why, look at us! We've been here more than a Twelvemonth, and I should think we ought to Know!"

Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York,
(Two Doors from Wall.)

Collections made, with quick returns.
Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks,
Bonds, and Gold will receive our personal attention.
ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

POLLAK & SON Moeschowitz Manufacturers, 501 Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular. Pipes $4 to $50 each.

Marvin's Patent
ALUM AND DRY PLASTER, FIRE AND BURGLAR
SAFES
Never lose their fire-proof qualities, corrode the iron, or wield their contents.
Sideboard and parlor safes for silverware.
MARVIN & CO.,
365 Broadway, New York.
721 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
Revolvers, Rifles,
Muskets, and Carbines,
For the United States Service. Also
POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS,
REPEATING PISTOLS,
Rifle Cases, Revolving Rifles,
Rifle and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Materials. Sold by Gun Dealers in the Trade generally.
In these days of House-breaking and Robbery, every House, Store, Bank, and Office should have one of Remington's Revolvers.
Circulars containing cuts and description of our Arms
will be furnished upon application.
E. REMINGTON & SONS, Inc., N. Y.

SCHILBERG'S GERMAN OINTMENT.
Warranted a certain cure, without the slightest danger, for piles, old wounds, scalds, salt rheum—all kinds and skin diseases, &c. 23 Bowery, New York.

WARD'S,
PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS.

Self-Measurement for Shirts.
Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts and Collars, sent free every where.
THE CASH CAN BE PAID TO EXPRESS COMPANY,
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL.
E. W. H. WARD, No. 251 Broadway, New York.

FOR PUBLIC EXHIBITIONS.
Dispersions, Magic Lanterns, and Dissolving Views, Job pictures from all parts, and of every interesting subject, made by JAMES W. QUEN & CO., 254 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.
Printed and illustrated catalogues sent gratis.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARNDEN'S EXPRESS, 45 Broadway.

MAGIC LANTERN
AND STEREOSCOPE.

We are now receiving the most comprehensive and finest importation of glass views ever made in America, representing scenes and objects in nearly all European cities and countries. These views are especially selected abroad by our Mr. Edward Anthony, and are adapted for the uses of either the Stereoscopic or the Magic Lantern.
E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
501 Broadway,
3 doors south of the St. Nicholas Hotel.

FRAGRANT SOZODONT FOR THE TEETH
BEWARE OF IMITATIONS
SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS AND PERFUMERS.

MUSICAL BOXES.
Playing from one to thirty-six different tunes, and costing from $5 50 to $200 00. The most complete stock ever offered for sale in New York.
Five ornaments for the parlor, and pleasant compositions for the organ.
M. J. PAILLARD & CO., Importers,
21 Maiden Lane (2nd story), New York. Musical Boxes repaired.

CEDAR CAMPHOR

Put your clothes away with Cedar Camphor, and you insure against the ravages of Clothes-Moths most cheaply. C. C. is sold by druggists every where. HARRIS &
CHAPMAN, Boston.

ART NOTICE
FINE MINIATURES.

WENDEBOTH, TAYLOR & BROWN,
PHILADELPHIA.
Encouraged by the favor extended to their paintings in New York, have established a branch for making sittings for their Fine Miniatures at the Gallery of BOGARDUS, 363 Broadway.
100 Photographs of Female Beauties sent postpaid for 25 cents. Address R. L. Fox, 34 Varick St., N. Y.
GILMORE & CO'S

CELEBRATED BAND INSTRUMENTS.
EXTENSIVELY USED IN THE ARMY AND NAVY.
PRICES REDUCED,
May 1, 1866. CIRCUL-
LARS SENT FREE BY MAIL.
The general adoption of our instruments by all first-class bands and their popularity over all others now offered to the public, GILMORE & CO., Musical Instrument Manufacturers, 15 & 17 Harvard Place, Boston, Massachusetts.

MOTT'S CHEMICAL
POMADE

Is the finest hair-dressing and restorer known.

WATCHES, California Diamond Jewelry, and Chains at wholesale, suitable for Dealers and Speculators. Price-List sent by mail on application to LIONEL JACOBS, 172 Broadway, New York.
THE MAGIC PHOTOGRAPH—New, startling, original, and delighting old and young. Price 50 cents by mail. J. C. HANEY & CO.,
No. 129 Nassau Street, New York.

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

PESTACHINE

It is the Best Restorer for the Hair, also an excellent dressing. Invented by Dr. BOOT; manufactured by DR.
HEN SKINNER & CO., Springfield, Mass.; and sold by DEKAS BARNESS & CO., New York.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER.

This new celebrated Revolver exceeds all others for compactness, effectiveness, durability, power, and ad-aptly to carrying. It is light (4 lbs.), small (only 7 in.), with larger metallic water-proof (22,000 ball) than any Revolver made of same size and weight. Send for circular. GEO. A. BIRDSON, 23 Hickman Street, New York.

MERWIN & BRAY,
MANUFACTURERS AND WHOLESALE DEALERS IN ARMS AND AMMUNITION OF ALL KINDS.

Sole Agents for the Ballard Revolver Loading Sporting Rifles of different calibers, and Eagle
Arms Co's Belt and Pocket Cartridge
Revolvers. The Belt Revolver carries the Army
size Balls, the Pocket Pistol the same size Balls
as Colt's 6 in. These arms have no equal now in market. For further particulars, send for Illustrated
Circular. MERWIN & BRAY, 363 Broadway, N. Y.,
U. S. — We manufacture all our own goods; also are Sole Agents for the celebrated Colt's Model Whitney Revolver.

PRINTING PRESS FOR SALE.

Our Taylor Double Cylinder, Five Rollers, Table Distribution, bed 20x31. Price $2000. The Press on which Harper's Weekly has been printed. Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS,
331 Pearl Street, New York.

WARD'S
Paper Collars
AND CUFFS FOR LADIES
AND GENTLEMEN,
Wholesale & Retail,
387 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Ladies' Victoria Turn- Ladies' Empire Turnover Paper Collar. over Paper Collar.
Ladies' English Stand- Ladies' American
-ing Paper Collar. Standing Paper Collar.
Ladies' French Paper Ladies' English Paper
Cuffs. Cuffs.
Gent's Piccadilly Paper Gent's Shakespeare Collar. Paper Collar.
Gentlemen's Standing Gentlemen's Turnover
Paper Collar. Paper Collar.
Gents. Reversible Gents. English Paper
Paper Cuffs. Cuffs.

NOTICE TO THE TRADE.
A wholesale price-list sent by mail.

RAYMOND'S
CENTRAL CLOTHING WAREHOUSE,
Nos. 121, 123, and 125 Fulton St., Corner of Nassau St., New York.
(OPPOSITE THE HERALD OFFICE)

At the above Establishment you always find one of the largest and best assorted stocks of Men's and Boy's Clothing in the City, and at the lowest Market Prices.

LOCKWOOD'S
(Licensed by the Union Paper Collar Company.)
MOULDED COLLARS,
The Trade supplied with all Styles and Sizes at 93 Beade Street, N. Y. & 255 South Third St., Phila.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

Vol. X.—No. 493.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 9, 1866.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS WARNER,
Author of "The Wide, Wide World."

CHAPTER IV.

"I'm afraid I may have to alter my list, Sam," said Clover; "I'm afraid miss is difficult. I wrote down just what I wanted at first without noticing how the seeds were to be planted; and now I see some of them must be 'under glass.'"

"Never mind," said her brother, "let's take the list first and the difficulties afterwards. It is a great point to know what you want."

"I know that pretty well," said Clover; "only it was hard to want little enough. Well then, Sam, first of all, you know, I must cover my fence; and papa said I might have just as much fence as I liked."

"Fence of libium," said Sam; "yes, that's right."

"So first of all I chose some vines," said Clover. "This beautiful byacinth bean, with dark purple flowers and varnished pods—it must be splendid, I think."

"Varnished pods?" said Lily—"where did you find that? I thought it was just a bean—and beans are so common."

"Well, maybe it is common," said Clover, "but I guess not; for Mr. Vick says it ought to be grown more than it is. And it will cover my fence grandly, for the shoots are sometimes twenty feet long. But then, Sam, I thought it would not do to have the fence all dark—so I chose next this pretty carsey-bird vine, with fringed yellow flowers."

"Very well chosen," said Sam. "Don't you want a blue vine too? here are blue Ipomoeas."

"I thought of that," said Clover, hesitating a little bit. And then softly tending down Sam's head to where little Primrose sat on the floor at his side, Clover silently pointed out to him in large, childish writing at the very head of Prim's list—"Ipomoea grandiflora asperba."

"So I thought I wouldn't," she said, with a smile; "a second one might hurt the superb effect, you know, Sam. And don't you think yellow and purple go well together?"

"Nothing could be better," said Sam, twining his arm round the girl's waist and drawing her close to his side. "And I see you have got the start of me, Clover, and have planted your hedge before I have even the ground dug up."

"Planted my hedge?" Clover repeated. Then, with a smile and a fash, "I think mamma was the planter, Sam."

"And may God give the increase!" said her brother, tenderly. "Now what comes next? The fence being covered, what shall we do with the ground?"

"I thought," said Clover, a little shyly, "that my vines would show better at intervals, you know—not to see quite the whole of them at once. So I chose these tall alphas and mar-tynias for flowers, and then to mix with them this pretty amaranthos—Joseph's Coat—with its three-colored leaves. I think they'll do for a back-ground," said Clover, with the same shy look at her brother's face, which somehow or other confused her and brought a blush into her own. But he only said as before:

"Well chosen. What next?"

"Next, in front," said Clover, "I want a whole mass of flowers, the gayest I can get. There's stocks, and salpiglossis, and gaultheria, and celosia, and balsam, and anemone, and helichrysum. The helichrysum flowers are good all winter."

"A first-rate list," said Sam. "Don't you want some very low-growing flowers just in front, to slope it quite down to the grass?"

"Yes, I wanted some very much," said Clover, "but my money gave out. And then I thought the taller flowers would show best from the house, and so that I had better keep them. But I can change my list."

"No, no," said Sam; "you are to choose, you know. And the list is capital. Now, little one," he said, lifting up Primrose and placing her on his knee, "what sort of a collection of sweets have you got together?"

"Oh, it's so difficult!" said Prim, knitting her small brows and tugging the Catalogue leaves back and forth with perplexed fingers. "I wanted to get all the sweet things, but they are so many. And then Lily says some of 'em are so common. I'm afraid my garden won't look pretty unless I get some other things too; and I don't know what to leave out and what to put in."

"Your garden will look pretty, I'll answer for it," said Sam. "I never saw a collection of sweet things in my life that was not beautiful. What does Lily say is common?"

"Why, my sweet peas, for instance," said Primrose, studying her list.

"I'm glad if they are," said Sam, "but I never found it out. I think for every sweet pea you may find fifty fuchsias. Have them by all means."

"Oh, I'm so glad!" said Prim, her face brightening; "for he says they're so very sweet. And see, Sam, all colors. Then oh, Sam, I want this blue ipomoea!"

"Then have it," said Sam, smiling.

"But it costs twenty-five cents!"

"Well, you've got twenty-five cents to give for it."

"But I mean," said Primrose, "it leaves me so little money for any thing else."

"Yes," said Sam, "you must choose between one great beauty and four or five smaller ones."

"Is it a great beauty? Then I'll have it," said Primrose. "It don't signify if I haven't a great variety in my garden, I guess. But here's a beauty—a white primrose! That's what mamma likes."

Sam thought, as he looked down at the fair little face captured joyfully by his that mamma had excellent taste. Few prettier things to be found, to his fancy, than such a white primrose. But he only said, laughing,

"This one, Prim?"

Why, it has a name as long as you are—another acanthis alba."

"I know," said Primrose; "but it don't matter. I needn't say 'em all at once. Then here are my pansies, Sam; they're not sweet, but they're lovely."

"You extravagant little puss!" said Sam; "pansies cost fifteen cents!"

"Yes," said Primrose, sedately; "but I had to have 'em, you know. Then here is phytolacca—I don't know what it is, but it smells pretty, and it's sweet too. And here's datura. Oh, Sam, just look at this, with flowers seven to nine inches long, and sweet!"

"Must be a real horn of perfume instead of plenty," said Sam.

"Oh, but it's plenty too!" said Prim, "for it says 'very sweet.' Then here's alrochia and callitriche—that's not sweet, I suppose, but it sounds beautiful."

"That's a fine list," said Sam. "I'm not sure but it's the most troublesome one of the three; but as you are a patient, painstaking little body, you won't mind that."

"I like it," said Prim.

"But what's the particular trouble of Prim's list more than ours?" said Lily.

"There are more things that require transplanting, and ones that must be started in heat."

"What's 'starting in heat?'" said Lily.

"Being very warm, and therefore beginning to grow."

"Now, Sam, don't be a tease! What is it really?"

"That is true which I said," answered Sam; "only it is the seed's side of the question. Your part of the work is to furnish the warm circumstances that bring about such a good result."

"Putting them in the sun, do you mean?" said Lily, "in a warm part of the ground?"

"The sun has very little heat to spare just now, and the ground is as cold as ice—being, in fact, frozen."

"Well, we can wait till it melts—I mean thaws—and gets warm, then," said Lily.

"And then some of your flowers, which need a long time to grow, would begin to bloom by about the end of summer. You must give them artificial heat, and make them a climate."

"Well, this is the funniest work!" said Lily. "Why, Sam, there isn't any artificial heat but the fire or the even, and I shouldn't think taking would be useful."

"WHEN GREEK MEETS GREEK."—FROM A PAINTING BY J. G. BROWN.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY GELLATLY & LACKY.]

"Sam," said little Primrose, looking very puzzled, while Clover silently knit her brows over the difficulty, "why don't you tell us what you mean at once?"

"Because I want you all to think and find out," said Sam. "You must not be ignorant little gardeners; I want you to learn."

"And so do I want to learn," said Clover, "but how can we?"

"Now, here"—said Sam, taking up the three lists in one hand and the Catalogue in the other—"here I find, first, the Useful list—containing, we will say, two hardy annuals, eight half hardy, and two which are sometimes at least called tender. The Easy list contains six hardy annuals, two half hardy, one tender; while the Sweet list has four hardy and four half hardy."

"But what does half hardy mean?" said Lily; "and how can seeds be tender?"

"That is just what I want you to find out. Study your lists, and study Mr. Vick's Catalogue, and make up your own minds how the different seeds should be treated. Then you can tell me what sort of artificial heat you want, and I'll try if I can provide it."

"What delightful work!" said Clover. "Sam, you're very good!"

"Well, wouldn't it be wiser to choose seeds that don't cost so much trouble?" said Lily.

"Every one must judge for himself," said Sam, with a smile at his mother as he rose to go. "I shouldn't write the order for the seeds till to-night, so you can all make what changes you please. Study Mr. Vick."

And away went Sam, leaving the three children in a pleasant state of uncertainty, excitement, and business. Lily took up the Catalogue and lounged down on the window-seat, turning the ending leaves back and forth; Clover gave one loving look at her list, and then, folding it neatly together, laid it in her work basket, and took out her day's task of sewing; and little Primrose, bringing up a good fact-cushion to her mother's feet, sat down and rested her face on her small hand, and fell at once into a deep brown study.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, JUNE 9, 1866.

THE SITUATION.

IT is strange that those who defend against all corners and at every hazard what is called the President's policy do not see that they weaken their case instead of strengthening it by claiming that it is expressly constitutional. To the contrary, the difference between its advocates and those who are unwilling to accept it is purely one of expediency. For what is the President's theory? It is simply that the condition of the country at the close of active hostilities compelled him to adopt certain measures for the resumption by the States of their local governments and of their relations in the Union, which they have accepted and are required. But there is not a word of express warrant for these measures in the Constitution. They were what in his judgment the public safety required. They were limited, indeed, by a certain theory of the perpetuity of a State in the Union, but that theory made the measures themselves mere usurpation. If the States were never out of the Union—to use an expression which has become a cant—what right had the President of the United States to appoint a provisional Governor? The reply can be only that the public safety required it. But if he had the right to take so radical a step as that, he had the same right to do whatever else he considered the public safety to require. His action upon the subject has exactly the same authority that his predecessor's emancipation proclamation had, and that authority is ample, and founded in the first necessity of society and government.

If now the advocates of the general policy which he favors, and which is in many respects admirable, rested their argument upon its expediency merely as opposed to the expediency of some other policy which is founded upon a different estimate of the requirements of the public safety, there would be much less acrimony in the discussion. This is what we mean by saying that the difference in the Union party is one of method rather than of principle. The President says that the late rebel States, having consented to the conditions which he thought the public safety demanded, are entitled to resume their national relations. Those of the Union party who differ from him insist that some other conditions are essential. It is simply ridiculous to retort that his conditions are the only ones which the Constitution authorizes, for the letter of the Constitution authorizes none at all. It is a question of expediency. The President thinks that he has gone far enough. There are those who think that we ought to go farther.

Mr. SWANWICK is certainly right in saying that prolonged reflection brings us all nearer to a common conclusion. Active hostilities ended so suddenly that opinions upon the questions which immediately became imperative were vague and uncertain. Doubtless golden opportunities were lost, but once gone they could not be recovered, and regret was folly. The ship of state must be trimmed to the breeze of to-day, not of yesterday nor of to-morrow. Politics is the art of expediency. Statesmanship must strive for all of the best that is possible under a fair estimate of the circumstances. Don't jump until you come to the river, said Mr. LINCOLN, and don't try to swap horses in the stream. The first duty of every man is certainly, as Dr. CHANNING says, to ask not what is expedient but what is right. But his second duty is not less clear and imperative. It is to ask in what way in the present situation he may best secure the right. Mr. BACOUR, in England, believes in "manhood suffrage," but he supports with all his power the new Reform bill which only enfranchises some 400,000 more of the population. Can Mr. BACOUR be fairly accused of betraying the rest of the people?

Those of us who believe as we do that the national faith is pledged to the maintenance of the equal civil rights of the freedmen, who hold that justice is the best policy, and that the interest of the Union and the prosperity of every part of it require the earliest practicable establishment of impartial suffrage as the surest security of equal rights, may honestly differ as to the wisest method of reaching that result. To charge any man with infidelity to the end because he prefers other means than ours is the very stupidity of folly. Mr. JOHNSON is not proved false because Mr. VALLANDIGHAM praises him, as Mr. LINCOLN was still true although Mr. PIERCE denounced him.

The prospects of a reasonable understanding among Union men seem to us fairer now than they have been for a long time. If, as now seems probable, Congress shall ask only for a constitutional amendment equalizing representation, basing it upon voters, the President can hardly oppose it, for it is his own frequent proposition. We have no doubt that Congress, as the immediate representatives of all faithful citizens who fought and won in the war, would gladly abolish all political distinction founded upon complexion. But it is plain that this result will be sought not directly but indirectly by proportionately reducing the political power of the States that maintain such distinctions. Here, again, the President has often plainly declared his sympathy with the enfranchisement of colored citizens by the States. Unless he mistakes his own opinions there is really no substantial difference upon this point between the policy he favors and that which Congress is likely to adopt.

We have all so much the habit of fighting that it is hard to unlearn it, and we draw our weapons upon each other. The President reaches his conclusions by other processes than many of us pursue. Congress, elected in the midst of a civil war, represents the exalted sentiment of a nation struggling for life. But it has won. Its life is secure and its whole system purified. The very ferocity and tenacity of the struggle are the measures of the prostration of the vanquished. They do not love us, and will not. They do not profess reverence; it is idle to ask it. All we can do is to secure the future not by conscriptions, confiscations, disfranchisements, executions, the utter futility of which history witnesses and human nature explains—not by any methods or vengeance, but by those equitable, political guarantees which the truly conservative common-sense of the country and of mankind will approve.

THE PROBABLE WAR IN EUROPE.

It is more than half a century since there was a general war in Europe. The last one ended in the overthrow of the great NAPOLEON and the treaty of Vienna in 1815. That treaty was Tory and reactionary. England, which was the sole truly constitutional government in Europe, was chiefly represented at the Congress by Lord CASTLERAGH, a Tory of the old school, and the distribution of Europe was made in the interest of the Kings, and not of the people. "That the people are the property of certain royal families," said FRANCIS HORSER, "was to be established as a maxim in the system of Europe."

Time brings its revenges. One of the cardinal points of the settlement of 1815 was that the BONAPARTES should be forever ineligible to the French throne. In 1831 the great NAPOLEON died at St. Helena. In 1832 his son, the Duke de Reichstadt, died at Vienna. In 1866 his nephew, LOUIS NAPOLEON, is Emperor of France, with the consent of the European sovereigns, who, by acknowledging his title as NAPOLEON III., do really recognize the Duke of Reichstadt as NAPOLEON II., and, by implication, his father as NAPOLEON I.; and LOUIS NAPOLEON holds in his hand the redistribution of power in Europe.

Prussia, under the government of a despotic King and a daring Minister, has been for some time plainly intending war with Austria, upon pretense of some Schleswig-Holstein difficulty, but really with the hope of becoming the dominant power of Central Europe. Austria, composed of several nationalities, and for that reason essentially the weakest of the great powers, alarmed and trembling, looks for the support of the smaller German states, which are important only as members of a confederation which the triumph of Prussia would destroy. But Italy, biasing with patriotic enthusiasm and sustained by a vast army, sees that the hour has come for reclaiming Venice, and is all in motion. The British Government, hitherto denouncing the impending war as causeless, proclaims its neutrality. But as half the supplies of food for England come from the Continent, which would force her to look to America for them, with which she has some unsettled accounts, it is not plain that she could avoid a part in the struggle.

As for France, if LOUIS NAPOLEON could fulfill his traditional policy and push her border to the Rhine, he would incalculably aggrandize his dynasty and identify it with the glory of France. That result is impossible so long as the settlement of 1815 continues. But the war inevitably demolishes that settlement, and makes the bank of the Rhine attainable by France. Abstractly, therefore, he must favor the war; but it was unnecessary for him to speak except upon extraordinary occasion, and that was furnished in a late debate of the French Chambers.

On the 3d of May one of the French Ministers, M. ROUBINE, said that the Government preferred not to discuss the question of the war. But some days afterward M. THIRIAS, the poet of the old Napoleonic epopees, the pet of the bourgeoisie, or the Parisian shop-keepers, and the Conservative leader of the Opposition, replied in a speech which caused such sensation that the sitting of the Chamber was suspended for an hour. In this speech THIRIAS asserted that the balance of power in Europe required that Germany and Italy should be composed of separate and feeble states. He said that this intention was proclaimed at the peace of Westphalia in 1648, and that it was confirmed in the next century by FRANCISCK TER GERAT, and again in this century by the Congress of Vienna. But the policy of Prussia was inimical to this intention. It would found a great empire in Central Europe which would threaten France. France must therefore courageously protest against the action of Prussia, and must say plainly to Italy that, if she attacked the state quo by seizing Venice and were defeated, France would not lift a finger to save her from Austrian vengeance. This speech M. THIRIAS called a last effort in favor of peace, of the good of his country, and the honor of his Government.

LOUIS NAPOLEON is not a fool. He heard the leader of the Conservative opposition to his Government declare that the true policy of France is the maintenance of the settlement of 1815, which excludes him from the throne upon which he sits. His Majesty, therefore, rolled smoothly with the Empress to the quiet old city of Auxerre upon the Yonne, ninety miles southwest of Paris; and when the Mayor laid the keys at his feet and told the Empress (Mademoiselle MONTIJO) that her son's ancient and loyal Auxerre would be forever at his service, LOUIS NAPOLEON said, "Thank you, your worship. You country people are the true France, and you hate as I do the treaty of Vienna." Paris swore terribly the next day; but Europe had heard from the lips of NAPOLEON's nephew that a war directed against the settlement which dethroned and humiliated his uncle, and which he, the nephew, could guide to success, was a war with a treaty that he detested.

In any view the European settlement of 1815 is doomed. Peace seems possible only upon condition of negotiations which would annul it, and war can not leave the situation as it finds it. Peace, however, is almost impossible when vast armies in neighboring territories have been accumulated, when a war loan has been made, and when conviction, passion, and apparent interest urge the combatants forward. The European war, which seems inevitable, is the hand of NAPOLEON BONAPARTE proudly tearing the treaty of Vienna and flinging it away.

OPINION NOT TREASON.

SENATOR DOOLITTLE is reported to have said in a late public speech, that "the union of the States under the Constitution is the cornerstone of the American Government, and he who denies it, let him come from the South, East, West, or North, is a traitor." Now that the Constitution is the bond of union is an undeniable proposition. It is as unquestionable as that respiration is the condition of human life. It was scarcely worth while for Senator DOOLITTLE to make a journey to Philadelphia for the sole purpose of saying that twice two are four. But when he proceeds to declare that any other opinion is treason, he commits a foolish error, or the Constitution to which he exhorts obedience expressly defines treason to consist in levying war against the United States.

An opinion can not be treason. It may be false. It may be dangerous. It may lead to treason as the doctrine of State sovereignty did. In a time of actual war its expression may be an efficient aid to the enemy, and therefore the expression may be properly repressed. But to denounce any abstract political opinion as treason is to commit the unpardonable sin of Rome against the human mind, and strike at the liberty of thought. The Southern school of politics in this country has always held and proclaimed the theory of State sovereignty, and it has always been plain that if reduced to practice that theory would lead to civil war. But that opinion was not treason until it fired at the Star of the West. If it were, Senator HAVES was as guilty as QUANTRELL. It seems to us that a Senator of the United States should be able to make so cardinal a distinction. We pay Mr. DOOLITTLE the compliment of believing that he does not consider Mr. FORTSON equally guilty with LOUIS WINDFALL and JAMES M. MASON.

It is very necessary that this distinction should be observed during the great debate in which we are now engaged. The question of reorganization is to be settled by argument, not by rhetorical vituperation. When Mr. STEVENS says that the late rebels deserve hell, or when Mr. COWAN informs us that they behave like saints, nothing is gained except a conviction that neither of those gentlemen are likely to give any valuable counsel in the emergency. So when Mr. DOOLITTLE declares by plain implication that those who do not agree with him are traitors, he also certifies his inability to treat the question as it should be treated. An argument which is adequately answered by saying "You're another," is not a very powerful argument.

THE LAST LESSON OF THE ACADEMY.

DURING the last sixty-eight years there have been forty-four theatres destroyed by fire in the United States. This is at the rate of one for about every eighteen months; but it is an agreeable fact that the loss of life has been very small. The most melancholy incident was the burning of the theatre in Richmond, Virginia, on the night of the 25th of December, 1811. It was crowded, and more than seventy persons perished, among them the Governor of the State. What horrors we were spared by the breaking out of the late fire at the Academy of Music at 12 o'clock at night instead of 10 we shall happily never know. But it was impossible to stand by the ruins on the morning after the fire and not shudder at the appalling peril to which the audiences in that building have been exposed.

It is shameful and incredible that any building liable to be crowded with human beings should be such a trap as the Academy evidently was, and as most theatres and public halls in this country are. There are many places in all our cities and towns who never enter any place of public assembly because of their knowledge of the foolish risk. There are large halls in upper stories used for concerts, for lectures, and lectures, which will contain from a thousand to two thousand people, which are constantly packed with crowds, and from which, in case of alarm, the only egress is two or three doors and a staircase or two. The lives of those persons are at the mercy not only of a real peril but of a mere panic. When that peril is plainly revealed the easy public confidence is disturbed and often destroyed. Thus in Providence there was a large and handsome hall in a third story directly over a business warehouse, full of varnish and the most inflammable material. One night after the hall had been crowded at a lecture the building took fire and was consumed like tinder. There was good Yankee sense enough in the city not to run that dismal risk forever, and a spacious hall was built upon the ground-floor open upon three sides to the street, and so arranged with windows and doors as to be emptied in five minutes. That hall, of course, is very popular.

But the structure of buildings should be regulated by law. The law does not permit a flimsy, palpably insecure wall to be erected, and it should require just as imperatively that every building designed for the assembly of crowds should be practically fire-proof. As the spectator looked in at the ruins of the Academy there was nothing to be seen but the four brick walls, and a heap of bricks, mortar, and rubbish upon the ground, with a few charred timbers. We do not forget that a theatre is mainly vacant space; that it is only a floor and a series of galleries; but for that very reason the audience is more exposed. The smoke and flame are every where at once. It is because the scenery and the stage appointments must be of such timber that the more care should be used in the other parts of the building.

It would be ridiculous if it were not mournful to see the ease and colority with which fire consumes "fire-proof" stores: and other buildings in the city of New York. A brick wall and an iron shutter apparently satisfy as a security against fire, when every floor and beam is of wood, and a passage for the free course of the flames is left all through the building. Some weeks since an article appeared in these columns suggesting a little more sense in building; but the matter should be regulated by law before some ghastly accident convicts us of criminal folly.

Means here, if the Academy is to be rebuilt as is announced, we trust that the reporter will not merely expatiate upon the multifarious and taste of the enterprising committee of superintendence, but will closely observe the structure and carefully inform the public whether the floors are all wood laid upon wood, and whether elaborate masses of wooden filigree are every where accumulated; whether the exit from the upper and most dangerous gallery is by a narrow door or two; and whether, in a word, the theatre is a tinder-box, which, in case of fire when full of people, would be sure to repeat, upon a fearful scale, the Richmond tragedy of 1811.

The Editors of Harper's Weekly are published by LEWIS PERRY, No. 126, Broadway, New York, with permission from Harper & Bros., N. Y. Subscriptions are $10 for one year (12 issues) mailed in advance. Issue of June 9, 1866. Vol. 1, No. 23.

THE UNIVERSITY MEDICAL COLLEGE.

We speak elsewhere of the lesson of the late disastrous fire. But it laid its wasting hand not only upon our opportunities of amusement but of instruction, and it is in this way that its consequences are most serious and deplorable.

In the University Medical College, which was next to the Academy of Music, were stored the complete chemical apparatus of Dr. J. W. DRAFER, and the many exquisite and costly instruments with which for many years he has conducted his experiments. It was impossible to save them, and such a loss is incalculable to any one but a patient and exact scholar.

Dr. MOTT'S MUSEUM also, a collection of illustrations of his surgical operations for more than half a century; the Museum of the old Lyceum of Natural History; the medical and surgical collections of Drs. BARFORD, POSEY, VAN BURKE, and FAIRB, all are gone. The duty, as we believe it will be the pride of New York, is to replace these collections. The country as well as the city is impoverished by the late fire; but it is not according to the Yankee genius to suffer it to remain so.

FINANCIERING EXTRAORDINARY.

About three weeks ago gold, which had been for some weeks steady at 125 @ 127, jumped up to 130. The Secretary of the Treasury held at the time over $75,000,000 of gold—much more than he needed for the payment of interest of the public debt. He determined to sell a portion of this surplus; and accordingly, for some days, fed the market with two to three millions daily, at the rate of 130 1/2 per cent. Speculators and foreign bankers, studying the state of affairs in Europe, were confident that gold would rise, and bought all the Secretary was willing to sell.

A sharply-defined contest thus arose. On the one hand, the Secretary, with $50,000,000 of gold on hand (allowing for $15,000,000 sold), was determined that gold should not rise above 130. On the other hand, the public, persuaded that gold could not be kept down by any Secretary in the world, in the face of the war prospect in Europe and the high prices of all commodities here, were as resolute buyers as he was a resolute seller. Newspaper organs of the Secretary denounced the "Gold-room speculators," and declared that the Government would sell every dollar it held rather than let gold go up. Other organs of public opinion were less clear as to the result, and trusted that Mr. McCulloch would have better luck than befell his predecessor, Mr. Chase, in his contest with the Gold-room.

Matters were in this position, when, on Monday, May 21, at 4.15 P.M., the news of the panic in London was flashed over the wires from Halifax. Any child could tell what such news portended. Every broker, and every speculator, and almost every merchant in the city rushed to the Gold-room. The Government broker—Mr. PERRY M. MYERS—was there, peddling out the Government gold at 130 1/2. Neither the unusual throng nor the astounding character of the news disturbed his calm complacency. He had his orders, and he would obey them. It had been pretty generally expected that on the receipt of the news the Government would either withdraw from the market for a time, or at least advance its rate. Nothing of the kind was done. In reply to inquiries, Mr. Myers said he would sell at the old price, and to any amounts desired. A tumult broke out even more tempestuous than the wild scenes which were so often witnessed in the Gold-room during the war. Mr. Myers was besieged, hustled, crushed, almost throttled by eager buyers of gold. So fierce and furious was the demand that in twenty minutes he sold, at 130 1/2 and 1/4, some fifteen millions of gold—representing a sum of nearly $20,000,000 of currency. As he left the room a few minutes after five the excited buyers bid up the price to 131 1/2.

The question now was—which had won the fight, the Secretary or the speculators? It was clear that, after selling to all nearly $30,000,000 of gold, the Treasury had lost the control of the market. Its reserve was now reduced so low that it could not afford to sell any further amount large enough to frighten dealers. In a word, it had done what its friends had threatened it would do—poured out upon the heads of the speculators its gold by the ten and fifteen millions in a day, and the market had taken it, and the premium had advanced. Thus far, then, clearly Mr. McCulloch, like Mr. Chase, had been beaten.

But the question remained—how were the $15,000,000 in gold sold by Mr. Myers on Monday afternoon to be paid for? Mr. Myers had the right to deliver every dollar of this gold on Tuesday, and to demand greenbacks in payment. This was what Mr. McCulloch's friends said he would do. Had this been done, so severe a money pressure would have ensued that gold would inevitably have fallen back below 130, probably to 125, and the Treasury might at that figure have taken back some of the coin so recklessly sold on Monday afternoon at 130 1/2 @ 1/4. The banks were in the wildest trepidation. A renewal of the panic of April 1864 was expected. Gold speculators themselves trembled at the position in which they had got, and began to regret that they had undertaken to fight the Treasury. They entered the Gold-room on Tuesday morning feeling any thing but exultant.

But there seems to be a fatality in the operations of our Treasury Department. On Tuesday morning, before the appearance of the Government broker, gold sold at 131 1/2. When he showed himself the premium fell to 131 1/4. At that price he offered fifty thousand. It was taken, and in a few minutes he had sold a million. Then his courage or the courage of his principals failed, and he fled discomfited from the room. The premium instantly leaped to 134 1/2; and the parties who had to pay for gold, reassured by this indication of infirmity of purpose on the part of the Government, began to hope that the Treasury would not exert its right of insisting on payment that day.

The event justified their hopes. Not much over one-third of the gold sold on Monday was delivered on Tuesday; another portion of the amount was delivered on Wednesday, and the balance not till Thursday. The reason generally assigned was that the Sub-Treasurer had not certificates enough to deliver all at once. For the sake of out-of-town readers we may explain that gold is invariably delivered in the shape of gold certificates of deposit signed by the Sub-Treasurer, and of the denomination of $5000 or less. Gold, in bags or bulk, was long ago declared to be not a good delivery in consequence of the frequent disputes arising about "short counts," and the dangers involved in the transmission of bags from office to office. To deliver $15,000,000 of gold 3000 certificates would be required; and it was said that the Sub-Treasurer had not so many on hand, and had not time to sign new ones in season for Tuesday's deliveries. This was lucky for the Bulls in gold, and unlucky for the Secretary. By distributing the deliveries over three days the money pressure proved much less severe than it would have been had the deliveries been all made on Tuesday, and the Secretary's victorious antagonists were enabled to hold the gold they had bought of him @ 130 1/2.

But this matter of delay was not the only favor granted by the Secretary to the parties who had defeated him in the Gold-room. Let them should experience undue difficulty in paying for their gold, the Sub-Treasurer was authorized to receive as money debt-certificates not yet due, compound interest notes at their face value with interest, and deposit certificates without notice. Of the two latter classes he did receive about $7,300,000; of debt certificates, perhaps $4,000,000. In other words, the Secretary not only sold to speculators fifteen millions of gold at 5 or 10 per cent. below the price which they would have had to pay for it had he not been bent on keeping down the premium to 130, but he actually furnished them with the means of paying for half their purchases by discounting his own paper before maturity. They naturally took advantage of such extreme complaisance, and on Thursday the premium rose to 141 1/4, at which price not a few of the lucky buyers realized their profits—having netted some $3,000,000 at the cost of the Government in an operation of a fortnight.

It used to be a maxim among the gamblers who thronged Wall Street and Exchange Place in Mr. Chase's time to "copper" him, whatever he did or said. When he tried to contract the currency the gamblers knew it was going to be expanded—when he tried to put gold down, they bought; when he predicted an advance in public stocks, they sold them. And, as a general rule, they were right. He meant well and honestly, but he could no more control events or contravene the laws of trade than King Canute's courtiers could check the flow of the tide. Every time he interfered with the natural working of economical laws the effort recoiled against himself. When Mr. McCulloch became Secretary better things were expected of his practical experience as a banker. But, thus far, he seems to be following pretty closely in the wake of his predecessor. He told us, at Fort Wayne and in his Treasury Report, that the currency was going to be contracted, instead of which it has been growing steadily more abundant, so that money has been cheaper this year in Wall Street than ever before, and prices are so high that we have nothing whatever to export to Europe. He undertook, with a surplus at his command much larger than the average reserve in the Bank of England, to keep gold below 130; it is nearer 140. His friends assured us that the speculators who had beaten him in the Gold-room would never be able to pay for their gold; he furnished them the money. Here is financiering with a vengeance!

THE COPPERHEAD AS A SIREN.

If snakes could sing a Copperhead might be a very Loredal. But Fate has forbidden them the faculty of music. They can not escape themselves, nor conceal their true character from human eyes.

Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, who denoted the policy of the Democratic party at the last Presidential election, by preparing the famous disgrace and surrender platform of the Chicago Convention, has just opened his arms broadly to embrace the President at the Convention of his party in the State which spewed out Mr. VALLANDIGHAM by a hundred thousand majority three or four years ago. During the war Mr. V. was a bland apostle of peace, but now that peace has descended he sounds the alarm; he talks valiantly of "thrusting them [Congress] from the Capitol," and of using "the power of the purse and sword." To use those powers to save the country from armed rebels seeking to perpetrate human slavery shocked the gospel-ekness of Saint VALLANDIGHAM; but to apply them to thrusting out the representatives of the people legislating for the security of equal rights—that joyfully commends itself to his Democracy and Christian forbearance.

The President of course understands the offered embrace of Mr. V. A kiss was long ago the sign of betrayal. When ANDREW JOHNSON falls into the open arms of CLAYTON VALLANDIGHAM, faithful citizens of the United States may well shudder. But while he retains as his advisers those whom Mr. LINCOLN called to befriend him and the country the Copperhead charms in vain.

At the same Convention Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON also made a speech "praising the courage and statesmanship of Mr. JOHNSON." But Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON, who extolled and justified the rebels during the war, and who was nominated at Chicago as the distinctive candidate of the surrender party, has also no mercy for Congress. He denounced the "malignant counsils of the radical Central Directory, whose feet were upon the throat of the Constitution even now, and who intended to throttle it." He is of opinion that the "radical majority of Congress hate the Government and desire its overthrow." The same majority he also defines as "blind and bigoted Jacobins."

Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON was not always of this zealous turn. When it was not a question of loyal representatives legislating, but of armed rebels striking at the heart of the nation, Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON had no hard words for them. They were not malignant. They had no feet upon the throat of the Constitution. They were lambs who had no intention of throttling. They did not hate the Government, nor desire its overthrow. They were not blind and bigoted Jacobins! Oh no! When in January, 1864, a resolution was introduced in Congress branding the rebellion which had already flooded the land with blood to destroy the Government as "desperate, wicked, and bloody," Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON voted against it. Three years before when the conspirators were whetting their swords, butler would not have rested in the blood-mouth of Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON when he spoke of them. He acknowledged the right of Secession. He begged Congress, if the rebelling States could not be conciliated, to let them depart in peace. He had no rhetoric about "malignant counsils," and throttling the Constitution, and hating and overthrowing the Government. He did not roar and scold, and stand with his fist clenched and foot raised to help them go. No, no! far from it! He sighed, the tender PENDLETON! he sobbed, he wept. It was the very ecstasy of manly grief. "If they must leave the family mansion," he wheeled and stammered, "I would bid them farewell so tenderly that they would forever be touched by the recollection of it."

Is it strange that General JOHN A. LOGAN said: "I would as soon vote for JEFF DAVIS as PENDLETON?"

Does Mr. PENDLETON suppose that the loyal people of this country have forgotten these things? Does he suppose that they have forgotten how he deserted the country in its hour of extremest peril? Does he suppose that they do not know that he was as radical a disunionist as JEFFERSON DAVIS? Does he not know that his opinion and advice upon the Constitution and the reorganization of the Union have exactly the weight that Mr. ROBERT TOOMBS or Mr. LOUIS WISFALL's would have? And if his party could not carry Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON while the event of the war was still uncertain, do they suppose they can win a race with him on one shoulder and VALLANDIGHAM on the other, now that the Union they despised is safe and the Government they spat upon is triumphant?

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

May 21: In the House, the Bankrupt Bill was passed, 65 to 30.

May 22: In the Senate, the Report of the Committee of Fifteen was brought up, Mr. Howard opening the debate. In the House, an amendment to the Income-tax law, extending the amount exempted from $2000 to $2500.

May 24: In the House, the Senate's amendments to the Home-Jail resolution to prevent the introduction of chains into the parts of the United States were discussed in, and the joint resolution is passed by both Houses.

May 25: In the House, Mr. Schuch reported back a substitute for the Bounty Bill, and immediately moved the previous question. The bill was passed by a vote of 123 to 5. It fixes the payment of bounty where the soldier is dead, and there is no widow or minor child, and also where the soldier is alive. It gives to each soldier, widow, and orphan eight and one-third dollars for each month of service, or $100 a year, (including bounties already received for service.

VIEW OF THE SCHEDULE.

On the evening of May 25, Secretary Stewart, of Auburn, made a speech in which he discussed his views of our present political situation. The Secretary first alluded to the sudden conversion of Democratic leaders upon the accession of President Johnson.

This was unusual, he said, by the loyal expression of the Southern people, who accepted "the conditions of partial amnesty and limitations in re-entrance privileges which were proclaimed by the Administration, all at once renounced the principles, promises, and policy of secession and disunion, in order to re-entrance the Union, and with their votes, and brought forward with alacrity the resolution of their long-cherished institution of slavery, and cheerfully threw them, to be burned upon the Altar of Union which they had so nearly destroyed. The unexpected change in the attitude of political adherents was an obstacle entirely unlooked for, and it was not until after a long and arduous struggle, and after negotiations among loyal and tried Union men.

"There was doubt," said Mr. Stewart, "on the part of many in the Union party whether this conversion was real, how could Unionists and rebels be converted to the support of a Government of Union administration? This was the question every where put by the zealous leaders of the Union party. 'Was it at that moment that I conceived that question by asking where, who? How could Democrats and rebels be converted? Is it not their conversion that you contended for, and that you now desire? I expressed the opinion that the condition of peace with the new responsibility must be understood in good faith accepted. I advised prompt and complete reconciliation, with the reservation of one of the constitutional symmetries of the Union. Regarding the sanguinary question that the rebels and their Democrats' adherents were only changing their political strategy with tortuous purposes, I argued that, with few and unimportant exceptions, they were now to be received and accepted as fellow-citizens and freemen. I urged that this would be fully done if only the rebel friends of the Administration, remaining united and harmonious, and their remaining their justly-acquired prestige, should themselves promptly and magnanimously secure to the nation the enjoyment of a justly-desired peace and independence, equal and properly."

The Secretary then spoke of the rapid progress of peace and reconciliation. He said that "between the Federal Government and those restored and reorganized State Governments there exists now a more complete and practical harmony than has ever before prevailed between the Union and so many of its members since it was first established."

Mr. Stewart then alluded to the conflict between the President and Congress. He said that there was no serious difference between them. "What the nation needs," he reconciliator, and just now it needs nothing more. It needs, moreover, a very little of this. It needs a reconciliation between the Senators of the United States who are now sitting and those Senators who, being loyal and qualified for membership of the Senate, have been elected, or may hereafter be elected by the people of the several States which were lately involved in the rebellion. It needs a reconciliation of the same kind between the members of the House of Representatives who are now sitting and loyal members already elected or to be elected by the people in the same before-mentioned States. It needs just this Congressional reconciliation, and nothing more."

"A failure of our reconciliation for an indefinite period would not be anything less than a political disintegration of the nation in the rebellion. It would be disunion and revolution; it would be Mexican or French anarchy."

In regard to the Civil Rights Bill, Mr. Stewart said: "There is no weakness at all in our political system if the personal or civil rights of each member of the State, white or black, free-born or emancipated, native-born or naturalized, are not more secure under the administration of State government than they could be under the administration of the nation government. Harmony is essential to union; but harmony is impossible in the civil sense if every State is not left free from constitutional interruptions in its civil rights by the Federal Government. The Civil Rights Bill inflicts on the late seceding States, now after slavery has ceased to exist, the very aggression which, through the Fugitive Slave Law, the slave States committed upon the free States."

The day after this speech was made by Secretary Stewart there was in Washington a movement of the President and his cabinet, and in nearly every case their political views were entirely fresh.

Secretary Waller was brief: "You are one and all," he said, "for the Union, I suppose, and for the re-establishment of the rights of the States. These are my views."

Secretary Stanton spoke at length. He had at first been in favor, he said, that negro suffrage ought to be demanded of the South, but he had concluded that it was impracticable. He had advised the President to approve the President's Reconstruction Bill. He expressed no disapprobation of the Civil Rights Bill, neither did he consider it; but he seemed to think there was much to recommend the military rule in the South might result in legislation unfavorable to Northern sentiment to the South. He was opposed to the disfranchisement clause of the amendment proposed by the Reconstruction Committee.

Secretary McCulloch's speech was a complete and hearty endorsement of President Johnson's policy in every particular. He concluded that: "I have desired and hoped for the continuation of this great Union party, with which I have ever been identified (where); but if its leaders are no longer so united as they were, the preservation of the Union, I am greatly apprehensive that it can only be secured, I trust, follow citizens, that this will not be the case; that it will descend to hostility, and its attempt to continue alienation between the two sections of the country, and that it will embrace these principles, which look to harmony, to restoration, and to peace. If it should do this, it will still continue to be the great and most honorable glory of the country, and never break with loyalty, its glory. If it does not, in days to come, it will be the epitaph that will be written it will be: 'It knew how to prosecute the war with vigor, but it lacked the wisdom to avail itself of the benefits of victory.'"

Secretary Denison framed that if the differences between the President and Congress were not adjusted, the Union party would suffer dissolution. The election was better than at the beginning of the session. There was no longer any talk of holding the Southern States as conquered provinces. "The work of re-entrance," he said, "will be every one's authorized by the Constitution. I will not doubt that this conversion will be made, and the results of the war by which it is now being prosecuted will be secured and perpetuated. The best of peace and concord between the people of all sections of our country."

OSSEIP IVANOFF KOMMISSAROFF KOSTROMSKOI, THE ENNOBLED PEASANT WHO SAVED THE CAESAR'S LIFE.

OSSEIP IVANOFF
KOMMISSAROFF KOSTROMSKOI.

As the enthusiasm about the newly-made nobleman who was the means of saving the Czar's life continues in St. Petersburg, we give his portrait, and a few particulars of the man who is for the time being the idol and subject of conversation of all Russia.

OSSEIP (JOSEPH) IVANOFF KOMMISSAROFF, a young man of twenty-five, was born in the village of Molevino, province of Kostroma. The village belongs to Baron Kotzeb, to whom Kommissaroff stands in the relation of a liberated serf. Having been lately allowed to go to St. Petersburg and work in a hatter's shop, he soon rose in his calling, became freeman, and married a peasant girl. The 16th April being his birthday, he went to say his prayers in the chapel near the house of Peter von Guzar. Going to the river-side, close to the Marble Palace, he perceived that the bridge was removed and the passage temporarily interrupted. Retracing his steps, he then made his way to the Summer Garden, at the gate of which a crowd was assembling round an Imperial equipage. Knowing the carriage to be the Emperor's and longing for the happiness of beholding his Majesty, he joined the crowd waiting for the monarch's arrival. Presently there was a stir in the crowd, and he saw the Czar in an overcoat. His Majesty approached the carriage, and was putting on his cloak, when a young man, who had been standing behind Kommissaroff, tried to push him aside. This individual had repeatedly attempted to penetrate through the surrounding crowd and get nearer the carriage; but Kommissaroff, wishing to see the Emperor, would not suffer him to squeeze through and plant himself before him. At the moment when the Emperor was putting on his cloak the individual, pushing Kommissaroff forcibly aside, made his way to the front ranks of the multitude. Kommissaroff followed him closely. Hardly had the assassin got near the Emperor when, drawing a pistol from underneath his overcoat, he leveled it at the Emperor. Kommissaroff, who had noticed the movement, instantly caught him by the arm, and, diverting the pistol from its aim, caused it to discharge in the air.

The family name of the Czar's deliverer has been changed into that of Kommissaroff Kostromskoi, in memory of the province which has twice furnished saviors to the Imperial house in moments of danger. He finds himself suddenly enriched and enabled by the favor of the grateful Czar, and he is the object of a romantic and passionate enthusiasm on the part of the loyal population of the Russian capital. Whenever he shows his face in the streets he is pounced upon and kissed by mosjiks; his deer in the Kirpitsnoi Pereulok, where temporary apartments have been taken for him by the Crown until his new house shall be ready, and where he is waited on by servants in the Imperial livery, is besieged day and night by an eager crowd, all anxious to catch a glimpse of the savior of the Czar's life; he has been enrolled honorary member of all the clubs at St. Petersburg and Moscow, his health is drunk at all entertainments, many of which are held solely for the purpose of doing him honor; his photograph and that of his wife meet the eye in every window and are hawked about at every inn step. Besides the original grants of money and estates from the Imperial purse and the public subscriptions opened for him in all the great towns, golden swords, estates in land, given by private individuals, precious images, and every imaginable kind of present continue to pour in upon the illustrious latter's apartments. His patent of hereditary nobility has been made out, and the share from the Emperor ALEXANDER on the subject has already appeared in the public journals. The most astounding feature in the whole business is the fact that General TOMASSOFF, the talented defender of Sebastopol, has been selected, as a kind of tutor, to look after, advise, and generally educate the bewildered young man.

COUNT BISMARCK, PRIME MINISTER OF PRUSSIA.
(See Page 265.)

AUXERRE, ON THE BANKS OF THE YONNE, FRANCE—WHERE LOUIS NAPOLEON MADE HIS FAMOUS SPEECH OF THE 6th OF MAY.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

INSIDE A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XXII.

It really must not be indulged in, this tendency to loiter along the way—a tendency caused by birth and long residence under Southern skies. We must quicken our pace over these pages to keep up with events falling in rapid succession.

There is the march of the Federals upon Atlanta. The Somerville Star has kept all of us in Somerville fully aware of every thing relating to that. It is a thrilling narrative as told us from Star to Star. Let us think. We give up Chattanooga, a place of no use to the Federals, and the abandonment of which is a positive advantage to the Confederate cause in every way—there is a motive in it. That motive we all understand and exult in when we have the Star and all the bells in town triumphant over the total defeat of Rosecrans soon after, and the re-occupation of Chattanooga, capturing therein stores and munitions of war enough to supply the whole South for two years.

Captain Simmons, standing in Jem Bodd's shop, is full, as Jem, in paper cap, dirty face, leathern apron, files and tinkers away at his gun-making and mending, of it. During two hours he discusses with Jem the splendid strategy of General Bragg, and its complete success; to all of which Jem says, at intervals, "As you say, Captain." "Exactly so, Sir." "Just what I say." "Precisely." "Yes, Sir; of that we may be sure."

Yet when, not a week after, Dr. Warner, in attendance upon poor, pale little Mrs. Bodd, upon whom he is always in attendance for that matter, says to Jem, sitting in the room, by the fire-side for the convenience of spitting as he smokes: "And so it turns out that the Federals were not driven out of Chattanooga, Mr. Bodd. Having read the accounts of the way in which they had fortified themselves there, I really did not for a moment suppose that other report was true, did you?" Jem spits and replies, "Certainly not," and waves in his habitual affirmatives to all that Dr. Warner has to say.

"Eighteen months!" the Doctor ejaculates a moment after. "People at the North wouldn't believe it. And the way you have managed to keep it close, too! I have feared a hundred times—"

"See, Doctor," breaks in Jem, taking his pipe

THE DOCTOR HAS GOOD NEWS.

from his mouth in order to lower his tone, "All couldn't get shot of conscription any other way. You know how we hammered at it for ever so long before we could fix it up. The cellar was Mrs. Bodd's notion; we laughed at it, Alf and I, at first. Then we all thought, when Alf first hid there, the war would 'a been over long ago. He's there, and there's nothing else to do but stay there that I can see;" and Jem resumes his pipe.

"Why, he's making a fortune in shoes, man, if your wife does get the credit of it. But what preposterous letters he writes! Dr. Glanis was giving me all the contents of that last one from New York," says Dr. Warner, with glee. "I could hardly keep it in."

"Oh, that's Alf's fun; only recreation he has, Doctor," pleads Mrs. Bodd, whose whole existence is invested in Alf and Jem. "But you can't tell how comfortable he is down there. Often comes up after night. Alf's got as fair as a girl there out of the sun. But oh! if the war would only end! I am so tired, tired! And Mrs. Isaac Smith came so near finding Alf out that day. It would kill me if they was to get Alf," adds poor little Mrs. Bodd. "And he won't go with the Federals now he has a chance. Says he wants to see it out here in Somerville; as if he sees any thing?"

"You see, Mr. Bodd," says Dr. Warner at last, perfectly grave as he rises to leave, "we Secessionists are pursuing a masterly policy. You will not forget to give Mrs. Bodd the powders; those last bells were a little too much for her."

MISREGINATION ARGUMENT.

"And you really, really do think—" says pale little Mrs. Bodd, smiling through the borders of her preposterously beruffled night-cap. With clergymen, sea-captains, and physicians women are always confidential.

"I really, really do, ma'am," replies Dr. Warner, with unctuous energy. "Just wait a little. Yes, a masterly policy. We are retreating toward Atlanta only to draw the Federals deeper into the country, away from their base, their gun-boats, and all that. Oh, don't let any fear of that keep you sick; we are bound to whip them. Your husband will tell you the same." And Jem Bodd, with a responsive grin upon his usually sedate countenance, says, "Exactly what I say, Lucy. Oh, we'll whip 'em, we'll whip 'em!"

Only there is more smiling all around than the conversation, apart from its peculiar tone, would warrant—a degree of cordiality, too, among the parties.

"And Alice Bowles is actually teaching school?" asks Mrs. Bodd as Dr. Warner is drawing on his gloves.

"Hard at it, ma'am. You mustn't think badly of her when I tell you, with her absurd raising, it was death almost to her to do it. She always was a noble girl. They are very much pleased, you know we all are now, but very much pained indeed. The discipline she is enduring is the very thing for her, be the making of her," says the physician.

"I always thought so much of Alice," says weak little Mrs. Bodd, "because she is so pretty and strong. She often comes to see me. She knows all about Alf. How she laughed when I told her! Ah me! Doctor, I never was very strong; but once, years ago, Jem there, at least he said so—"

"Thought you were very pretty, ma'am," interrupts the Doctor, "and was perfectly right, ma'am. Only wait until you get your health again, Mrs. Bodd—until our glorious independence is secured, you know!"

"Just what I tell Lucy," adds her husband, with a smile. Mrs. Bodd is not the only pretty girl whose beauty gives place to ill health within a very few years after marriage in southern climes—fair, frail creatures, whose day is like that of the butterfly in more respects than one.

"I tease Alice about Tim Lamm and Mr. Noely and all her other beaux," says Mrs. Bodd, whom Dr. Warner's visit has greatly enraptured, "but I never dare mention Mr. Arthur to her."

"Such a traitor, you know," adds Dr. Warner. "Pity, pity!"

"Exactly so!" says Jem Bodd, reflecting the Doctor's smile.

"Not much worse than Jem here, I'm afraid," puts in Mrs. Bodd, with the same light upon her face. "He never says a word to me, Jem don't—not to a soul since this thing began; but I'm afraid Jem's a bad, bad man!"

"Exactly as I say!" adds Jem, following the Doctor to the door with a candle and a grin.

And there is many another among the men still left in Somerville, though none so sedate and non-committal as he. Very often have Dr. Warner, old Mr. Adams, and the like been favored with a wink and an aside smile which said as plain as words, "A good joke, ain't it?" by individuals in the very heat of jubilation amidst a crowd over foreign intervention, glorious victory, iron-plated Confederate fleet, Northern sickness of the war, and all the rest. The number of these equivocal individuals in Somerville is great, is increasing, their feigningness becoming more undignified every day.

And so the times roll on. We are not without news in these days in Somerville. Sure enough, the Federals are being drawn slowly but steadily away from Chattanooga. With unprecedented folly they persist in walking blindly, ready into the fatal trap. We whip them at Dalton, we rout them with terrible slaughter at Marietta, yet they still have enough left to follow our army, fallen back to entice them still further in. Such a series of Confederate victories we have never yet enjoyed. Full details by the column; little items, like grains of pepper, in all the corners of every paper. "The destruction of Sherman's army is more complete than had been supposed." "We have totally destroyed Sherman's line of communication with Chattanooga." "It is now well known that at Kennesaw Mountain Johnston will spring his trap, the enemy being drawn sufficiently into it."

Then follows the brilliant victory achieved by Hood, now in command, over Sherman at Atlanta; of this we have the official accounts and the—bells.

It is just following this that Mr. Arthur, riding in to the Post-office very early one morning, goes direct from the office to Mr. Ferguson's room. So early, in fact, that he finds that gentleman still in bed. As to Mr. Arthur, he is wide awake, very ruddy and fresh.

"If you please, let me have the key of your safe," he says, in high spirits, to his friend.

"Key of my safe?" And the Scotchman, drawing on his trousers, hands that implement to his friend, taking it from under his pillow, watching grimly the futile efforts of Mr. Arthur to unlock the safe, or even to find the keyhole when he has the key.

"I wanted to make an entry in your Scrap-book," he explains at last, with boyish eagerness.

"An entry?" And Mr. Ferguson, holding up his trousers with his left hand, has opened the safe in a moment.

"Atlanta has fallen!" His visitor can keep

THE TEST OF CONFEDERATE MONEY.

it back no longer; beginning with enthusiasm, his voice faltering as he says it, though. "Oh, Mr. Ferguson, Atlanta has fallen at last!"

Not a syllable from Mr. Ferguson, not a smile. If possible, more grim than ever. Yet, by a singular coincidence, he remembers, doubtless merely from the fact being open before him, that he is indebted, which he is not, to Mr. Arthur, and pays him two dollars on account upon the spot. And Mr. Ferguson spends the whole of that day upon the streets—no particular business at all. For there is this peculiarity of the Union men—that while you never see them abroad, so far as they can help it, when the news is good, as it generally is in Somerville hitherto, for the Confederacy; so sure as it is bad, which will happen in spite of the Star occasionally, out they all swarm from their retreats, meeting with each other, clasping warm hands and shaking doleful heads, with smiling faces, over the tidings at every turn and corner. Secessionists not unaware of it either.

The very next time Mr. Arthur rides in to the Post-office he is hailed before he can get there from the yard of Dr. Warner's house. Whenever he conveniently comes Mr. Arthur rather avoided that residence. He imagined black eyes watching him through the windows, and, from mere sight of him, a terrible tongue set agog. More than once have "Ris and Bab, long since withdrawn from the Sunday-school, hailed him in opprobrious terms in passing, saluting him on one or two instances with their political sentiments in the shape of pebbles. Until he is safely past the house he is not sure but Mrs. W. may herself rush out and scourge him with her tongue. For he often hears of the frequent and various ways in which she has expressed her ardent desire that he should be disposed of. Truth is, he has a mortal terror of the lady in question.

So that when he is hailed this morning, as he rides by on his way to the Post-office, he nervously starts until he sees it is Dr. Warner. The Doctor, while shaving at the glass in his room, has spied his friend passing, and now comes out in his shirt-sleeves and the soap upon his forehead, good-humored face to say, "Don't be in such a hurry—hold on." And, leaning over the fence, Dr. Warner does not wait for an answer as to the health of Mrs. Sorel before he says, glancing behind him at the house and in a lowered tone of voice,

"Have you heard the news?"

"No. Some glorious Confederate victory? Where was it?" deeming it best to show the Doctor and himself thereby that he expects and is prepared for the strongest news of that nature.

"Mobile has fallen!" pressing still closer to the fence, and speaking in a still lower tone.

"Are you certain?" Ah, what relief and satisfaction! You at the North supposed you derived pleasure from news of Federal success—you know nothing about it!

"Oh yes; that is, Farragut has captured the forts which defended it. Of course the city lies at his mercy. We will hear by the next mail of his occupying the place." Which they didn't, nor for long days after.

"All well?" asks his friend, for they both feel that they are standing in point-blank range of a battery, and do not care to protract the conversation.

"Yes; and, by-the-by, I will send out a barrel of sugar to Mrs. Sorel's this morning. I have been owing you"—which here, too, is not the case—"a long time. Well, good-by. Haven't got time to come in, I suppose? I'll see you on the streets in the course of the day." And, sure enough, all the Union people are abroad to-day again, swearing forth in this last burst of sunshine like bees, with scarcely subdued buzz, too, the weather is getting so pleasant!

"Thought I didn't see you!" is Mrs. Warner's sarcastic remark as the Doctor resumes his shaving, which the Doctor did not think, however. "I'll bet a thousand dollars, when I come to hear it, there's had news for the South. Running out this cold morning like a great big boy in your shirt-sleeves and half shaved to talk to a man that never enters your house. There's some bad news—you needn't tell me! I saw you laughing when you told him; and I as good as heard him say, 'Thank God, I'm glad of it!' Humph, I know you by this time!"

Which was the solemn fact; but the Doctor, with his head fallen into its old droop, shaves on, making the soap upon his mouth the base excuse for not saying any thing in reply. But, at last, Mrs. W. has not half so much to say as of old, nor half the bitterness in saying that which she used to exhibit.

There is, in fact, this peculiarity about all Secessionists in Somerville—it is only as they are excited that they are confident; the instant they cool they become doubtful. As a large audience gathered to hear Colonel Bet Roberts or Captain Simmons, for the Captain, with a firm hold upon the dock in Brother Barker's church—"Admission, one silver dollar for the benefit of the soldiers"—makes orations, Brother Barker opening with prayer, these days, we are enthusiastic, and positively certain of the success of the Confederacy. It is when we break up, go home, and are off to ourselves individually, that we, in the ideas if not dialect of Bob Withers, "Are not so certain of it at last. At least, for one, by George! I ain't!"

Of one thing we are, thank Heaven! perfectly certain as the days glide by. We do not pretend to understand what Sherman and Hood are about marching thither and thither. Davis has told us at Macon that Sherman's capture of Atlanta is to be to him a Moscow defeat at last. Leaving out of consideration the conflagration of Moscow and the Russian winter, trifling discrepancies in the historic parallel, we only wait to hear of the total destruction of Sherman in fulfillment of this official prophecy. After the first sickening sensation upon hearing of the fall of Atlanta we recuperate, confidently counting upon Sherman's great disaster as only a question of time, for Davis has said it.

Of another thing we are even more certain—the defeat of Lincoln at the approaching election. For months the Somerville Star has been filled with articles from Northern papers, themselves so replete with denunciation of Lincoln, so confident of his speedy fall, that we only wonder the North, in its intense and evidently unanimous hatred of Lincoln, is willing to wait until election day to hurl him headlong from his place. We know the despot will endeavor to bring the bayonet to bear upon the polls; there may be a few votes cast for him by office-holders; but there will be one universal fight at every election precinct in the North. We would prefer McClellan should be elected on some accounts, yet count a good deal upon neither candidate being elected, but the whole mockery of a government there being utterly broken up, exploded, totally wrecked by the convulsions sure to shake the land upon election day.

Lamun has articles, a series of them, to prove it. Captain Simmons made a description of these approaching convulsions a thrilling point in his orations, the earthquake in Lisbon being the tremendous illustration thereof, himself tottering in the stand as he speaks, in a manner exceedingly emblematic. Yet as the day approaches there is a slackening of public certainty somehow.

"I have hoped McClellan might be elected," Dr. Warner has said to Mr. Arthur in the security of Mr. Ferguson's room.

"You have!" exclaims that gentleman, with as much surprise as pain.

"Why, yes," says Dr. Warner, rubbing the phrenological organ, whatever it is, immediately behind the ear with his forefinger. "I see no end to the war otherwise. The Democratic party might conciliate in some way, compromise, arrange the thing," continues the fat, slovenly, thoroughly excellent physician, in a vague, general, undecided manner. "Don't you?" he asks, doubtfully.

"I!" asks Mr. Arthur, with indignation. "No, Sir! May Heaven forbid! There is only one plain road: to carry the war steadily, unflinchingly on till the purpose for which it began is accomplished. The election of McClellan I would look upon as the election of vacillation, weakness, the success of the Confederacy, anarchy, ruin! I am really amazed that you, Doctor, could look at it in any other way. Don't you regard it in that light, Mr. Ferguson?"

"Of course!" growls the Scotchman, in accents scarcely polite to Dr. Warner, considered as being at the moment his guest. "Not a sensible Union man North or South thinks otherwise."

And yet when we hear in Somerville that Lincoln is actually elected, no man sees more clearly by that time than Dr. Warner that the Union men have greater cause to rejoice in this than in any other victory achieved by the nation. Yes, that victory was the Waterloo of the whole war.

"If you can use it, or if you know any person—any person not a Secessionist, you know—who can use it, send out a wagon, send half a dozen wagons," old Mr. Adams says the very day we hear in town of the re-election of Lincoln, to Mr. Arthur, whom he meets, as he might and did meet every other Union man of Somerville, upon the streets. "I've plenty of rye and oats left; you or any body, any body you can recommend, is more than welcome!"

Very remarkable. Thin, and sharp, and cold as a razor is old Mr. Adams. A tough time of it Sam Peters, even Brother Barker himself had of it before the war is getting a cent for any object out of old Mr. Adams, strenuous commiserator of that church as he was. All Brother Barker's commiseration well knew and bewailed Brother Adams's stinginess. It was as well, as proverbially, known to be Brother Adams's sin which did most easily beset him, as was lying known to be Brother Peters's weakness. Only the latter, in times of religious revival, openly confessed, and, in terms so highly colored as to show the old vice ran in the very blood, bewailed his sin, whereas Brother Adams did nothing of the kind. We all knew Brother Barker meant him in all his many bits at the penurious and close-fisted in and out of pulpit—all of us except the individual aimed at himself. Or if he knew it he only gripped his bivalves more closely together, and took it upon his crustaceous sides, like so much mere water.

But all that was before Secession. If any Secessionist obtained, otherwise than by physical force, a horse, or a bundle of fodder, or a sack of oats, or a grain of corn, or an ounce of pork from old Brother Adams, that fact is not upon record. To Union people, on the other hand, he no more thought of withholding any thing he possessed than he thought of going to hear Brother Barker or any other Secessionist preach. Long and thin, sharp, cold, and hard as he was, sour and close, old Mr. Adams had hidden among his bones, like gold among the streets, a pure, strong love of country: the vein once struck was inexhaustible. How can we tell how much it cost his friends to elect Mr. Lincoln there at the North? Millions in the way of bribes, the Star said. It certainly cost old Mr. Adams, when over, in pork and corn and potatoes, hundreds, to say the least.

But we have no time in Somerville to reason about the results of Lincoln's re-election, the Star exulting in it as the certain means—as hundreds of events have been before—of at last making the South a unit, and thoroughly arousing the people. Ah, how many, many theories were manufactured at the South during the war, each perfectly symmetrical and beautiful! Babbles? Yes, but then we could blow them as fast as they burst, you know. Yet we have no time to discuss that question in our intense curiosity in reference to Sherman just now.

"Yes, he has cut loose from Atlanta," Captain Simmons demonstrates the matter, newspaper in hand, to Dr. Ginnis and Mr. Ellis collected in Jem Budd's shop out of the rain—"cut loose from Atlanta in sheer despair of getting out of Georgia by the way he came; Hood, you see, having got behind him. He is making—you see what the paper says—frantic efforts to escape by way of the Atlantic coast, his only hope left, sheer desperation."

"Oh, Lee from Richmond!" begins Dr. Ginnis, eagerly.

"And the militia of South Carolina!" adds Mr. Ellis, still more eagerly.

"Of course will close in upon him. I have no more doubt of the capture of his entire command than I have of my existence. Davis's idea of his retreat to Tennessee being cut off was good, as every thing from his consummate statesmanship is; but," continues Captain Simmons, "Sherman's case was worse than Davis supposed. Why, gentlemen, look at it, not one man, not a single gun he has but we are bound to get. It is a certainty."

"A special Providence," says good Mr. Ellis. "I love to trace the hand of Heaven in our cause."

"That's just what I say," puts in Jem Budd, as he hammers away at a gun-barrel clutched in his vice upon his work-table. "Exactly what I say." Consequently while we are rejoiced thereby still it is only what we expected when we soon read in all the papers of the capture of Sherman. And, to make this good news complete, the same dates give tidings of Hood's capture of Nashville.

"What I always said," Jem Budd remarks to Tim Lamun, dropped into the shop to see, in a languid way, if his revolver has all the silver mountings he has ordered for it; and who, cigar in mouth, legs hanging listlessly down as he sits on Jem's work-bench, gives him all the details of these two glorious events as they have been coming in for two weeks now.

"Seems to me," Jem Budd ventures at last, punching and hammering away, none the less, at his work, "that Brother Barker isn't as chirky as he used to be." He only says this to say something.

"—old woman!" vituperates Tim, with prompt profanity. For Brother Barker does not occupy the position in Somerville he used to; he has in some imperceptible, incomprehensible manner dwindled and shriveled. Very few, indeed, at church these Sabbaths. Sabbath-school long since suspended.

Even grim Mr. Ferguson almost pities them, his respected fellow-citizens of the Secession persuasion, when the truth comes upon them at last! Comes upon them so suddenly, and with double blow! And herewith a fact, not altogether new but interesting in human nature, is evolved. As thus:

"Any thing new in the paper this morning?" Dr. Warner asks, the very day after Tim Lamun's conversation with Mr. Budd, of Dr. Ginnis, with whom he has professional relations.

"Why, n-n-no. Some rumors, I believe; I have not had time to look carefully over the paper yet. By-the-by, Doctor, what do you think now of that negro's wound? Not lockjaw supervening, do you think?"

"Have you the paper there, Captain Simmons? Any thing in it?" Dr. Warner—easy, good-natured Dr. Warner—frayed as to the edges of shirt bosom and collar, gone as to half-a-dozen buttons or so on vest, neckerchief and hair disheveled and scattered abroad as by gusty winds; yet we all like him in Somerville, as unanimous in opinion about him as we are in sentiment in reference to his wife; being on good terms with—except his wife—every person in town, the Doctor asks the question in an indifferent way of the Captain.

"Nothing of special interest, Doctor; nothing at all," replies the Captain, folding up the paper as he speaks and putting it in his pocket, oblivious, in a dignified manner, of the Doctor's hand extended for it. "The solemn truth is," continues the Captain, seriously, steadying himself, so to speak, by fastening his oracular and admonitory eyes upon those of his questioner, "there is no truth in the world just now. Falsehood? From my infancy have I loathed it. Lying? Next to a Yankee, my soul abhors it. Sainted parents instilled the story of Ananias and Sapphira into my earliest being. Sir," continues the Captain, "it is painful to say it, but men of my standing," holding on to the Doctor under pretense of laying a Mentor's hand upon his shoulder, "should not hesitate to utter at this awful crisis their religious convictions. You may repeat it, Sir, as from Captain Simmons, Lamun is a Yankee, and Lamun is a liar. Never had I the least faith in him or his paper. No, Sir, I was not falling. When I require your assistance to enable me to maintain an upright position I will say so. Nothing new, Sir, in the paper, save foolish rumors—nothing at all."

"Nothing new, I'm told," Dr. Warner remarks to Mr. Ferguson, into whose room he next enters. "I was up all night with one of Colonel Wright's hands who has given himself an ugly cut, or got one some way."

"Nothing at all," replies, concisely, the Scotchman, who is busy with scissors and paste at his collection, "except that Sherman is in possession of Savannah with trifling loss, and Hood's army has been utterly routed below Nashville!"

"Bless my soul! and it must be true!" exclaims the electrified Doctor, his face ablaze with satisfaction.

"I beg you will let me pay you that little amount, Doctor," Mr. Ferguson says in conclusion of their conversation, a very animated conversation.

"Not one cent, Sir; not one cent. I will be positively offended if you ever mention it again."

and both offer and refusal are in strict coherence with the news; and the Doctor leaves him a tapper and a wiser man.

"I tell you just what it is, gentlemen! Why not say it if a fellow thinks it, by George! You all know I'm not a bad Southern man, but we are whipped, gentlemen, whipped, by George! and well whipped." It is Bob Withers makes the remark that same day in the presence of Captain Simmons and Mr. Ellis, in the store of the latter.

"Only a few days ago, in Jem Budd's shop, I think it was, I said I was afraid about Sherman. You see I didn't see where the troops were to come from to stop him. Besides," adds Captain Simmons, "Georgia is rotten—you would my words, rotten, gentlemen. That about Hood I don't see into. I can't believe it, and I won't. Sometimes we say of news 'It's too good to be true,' and this"—with heavy swearing—"is too bad to be true!"

"For me," says Mr. Ellis, too nervous about the news to notice with reproach, as he ordinarily would, the profanity, "I endeavor to trace the hand of a just God in all events. It can't be we are to be subjugated, can not be; it would be unjust, unjust, grossest injustice in—I mean the Almighty will not permit it, should not, will not!" very much excited indeed.

"But look at it, gentlemen," reasons Bob Withers; "we've got our last men in the field, ain't we? You both know as well as I, not a soul goes to the front if he can help it; neither of you gentlemen has the least idea of going, and you don't catch me going, by George! Details for this, details for that, nothing but details. Then, it wouldn't do to talk this way about things before Union people, but we know how the soldiers are deserting, shoot them as fast as you please; but they will desert, sick of the war, want to get back to their sweet-hearts and wives. Lincoln elected for another four years, being whipped in all the fights, what's the use? they say. And it's more than carding officers dare to do, arresting them around here. Six enrolling officers shot down lately in my own knowledge by returned soldiers."

"Mr. Withers," begins Mr. Ellis, excitedly.

"People won't touch the paper-money except enough to pay taxes. Improvement is scaring people, by George! A little too fast; they shoot them down, by George! I know one man won't take office as impressing officer!" Bob Withers continues.

"Mr. Withers, you really ought not," good little Mr. Ellis begins again, emphatically. Only more emphatically than he Mr. Withers proceeds:

"You hear it on every side, openly, 'I do this to keep out of the army,' 'do that to keep out of the army.' You may now them down by whole ranks at a time for desertion, it does so good, not a bit. Then, look at the country people—returned soldiers, I suppose—breaking open people's houses by night, demanding of old men, even of women and children, their money, or blow their brains out, let alone taking every thing they can lay their hands on in open day. Then—"

"But what is the alternative, man?" Captain Simmons breaks in upon Mr. Withers, with energy enough to drown and overwhelm him. "Submission. Submission to wretched Abolitionists. Abolitionists! gentlemen, people who make the negro our equal, actually associate with them. There is, gentlemen," adds Captain Simmons, with an air, "a new sin at the North, miscegenation," tucking a thumb in the arm-hole of his vest on each side as he speaks, "they call it, the abominable intermarriage."

"How any man can suppose a holy God will—" vainly attempts Mr. Ellis to put in.

"Oh, shut up, Simmons!" interrupts Bob Withers, with violence in honest face and voice, triumphant over both. "Who do I see riding to water late of an evening, with a little milk-and-molasses chap on the pommel of his saddle before him? Oh, by George! Simmons, be consistent, man. Tuesday? No, it was Wednesday last—never mind what day it was. Simmons here will tell you who it was I saw drinking out a-fishing in his boggy with a yellow woman—and she ain't even pretty, Simmons—dressed up as nice as you please, and that same little half-white chap—fine child, Simmons, as I ever saw—in her lap. And it's been so for years—we all know that here in Somerville—does you actual credit in some respects, you. And you know whether or no you did send that oldest yellow boy of years to Oberlin before the war began. But you ain't the only one, Simmons—only you are more steady to one, Simmons—steady, by George! to one."

"I consider your licentious remarks, Sir, as personal," says Captain Simmons, reddening and swelling like a turkey-cock.

"Don't intend any offense," Bob Withers replies on; "but I appeal to Dr. Peal, dropped in just in time. No, I won't; Dr. Peal is one of the sinners, like Simmons and myself. But here's Mr. Ellis—regular church-member and all that, now, Mr. Ellis. Look here! if a man will live, it's all a matter of taste; my taste ain't that way myself; but if a man will live for you—that way ain't the only one, Simmons—with a negro woman, raise up a family—no ladies present, I believe—this is the point, Mr. Ellis—is it worse to do that illicitly, illegally, or legally? As to this whole Secession, it's always been only the grandest sort of a spree—a tremendous spree, by George! Smash up in the end, see if there ain't."

"I consider, Sir, your whole strain of conversation as unworthy a Southern man," exclaims Mr. Ellis gets room to say at last. "Your sentiments are dangerous, Sir, dangerous for not to utter in this community, Sir. They will not be tolerated, Sir, not for an instant. Sir—"

BURNING OF THE NEW YORK ACADEMY OF MUSIC ON THE NIGHT OF MAY 8, 1866.—Engraved by Bookwood & Co., New York.—[See Page 360.]

TRENT RIVER SETTLEMENT, OPPOSITE NEWBERN, NORTH CAROLINA.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE H. DAVIS.]

SCHOOL-HOUSE AND CHAPEL AT TRENT RIVER SETTLEMENT.—[SKETCHED BY THEO. H. DAVIS.]

NEGRO HUTS AT TRENT RIVER SETTLEMENT.

GENERALS STEEDMAN AND FULLERTON CONFERRING WITH THE FREEDMEN IN THEIR CHURCH AT TRENT RIVER SETTLEMENT.—SKETCHED BY T. H. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 360.]

THE OLD CRADLE.

And this was your Cradle? why, surely, my Jenny,
Such slender dimensions go somewhat to show
You were a delightfully small Pica-e-crazy
Some thirteen or twenty short summers ago.
Your baby-days faded in a much-troubled channel;
I see you as then in your infant strife,
A tight little bundle of wailing and fussing,
Perplexed with that newly-found friend called LIFE.
To him as an infantine frailty is scandal;
Let by-gones be by-gones—and somebody knows
It was like such a baby in dance and in frolic,
Your cheeks were so rosy—so rosy your toes.
Ay, here is your Cradle, and Hope, a bright spirit,
With Lure now in watching beside it, I know,
They guard the small nest you yourself did inhabit
Some thirteen or twenty short summers ago.
It is Hope glides the future—Love welcomes it smiling;
That wags this old world, therefore stay not to ask—
"My future life, is my future beguiling?"
If smothered, still it pleases—then raise not the mask.
Is life a poor roll some would gladly be doing?
He is riding post-haste who their wrongs will adjust;
For at most 'tis a footstep from cradle to coffin—
From a spoonful of pap to a mouthful of dust.
Thus smile as your future is smiling, my Jenny!
Though blossoms of promise are lost in the rose,
I still see the face of my small Pica-e-crazy Unchanged, for these cheeks see as blooming as those.
Ay, here is your Cradle! smother, smother to my liking,
Though thirteen or twenty long winters have sped;
But, hark! as I'm talking there's a "click" striking,
It is time Jenny's baby should be in its bed.

BETSEY'S BONNET.

"WELL, Uncle Abel, now you are off for home,
I suppose trading all done, crops all bargained for, eh?" and John Dare lifted his hat and pushed back his thick hair as he stood on the hotel steps talking to a plain country farmer in a suit of homespun gray.
"Wa'al, no, not quite yet, John. I want to get Betsey a bonnet; a real nice one; just as good a one as a Yorker might want. 'Cause Betsey's worked awful hard this spring. Times are good too. So I guess we'll see if my Betsey ain't look as good as any body. S'pose you don't want to go along with me, do you?"
"Let me see—four o'clock—yes, I'll go, Uncle Abel. I'll look at the pretty girls, though; you won't mind that. Come on."
So they walked off up the street, the fashionable attire of the young lawyer contrasting strongly with the antiquated cut of the farmer's garments, which at home were wont to lie in solemn state in the spare room all the week, only to be worn on Sunday with becoming carelessness. There was little fairness in the face—a trifle too fair for manly beauty, with its bloods mottled and setting of those brown curls—to the bronzed and beardless one, with the few locks, sparse and gray, beneath the well-brushed hat; but the clear blue eye was the same in both, and like those that were closed fresher under the sod by the apple-orchard on Uncle Abel's farm, where his dead sister was laid when John was a tiny child. It troubled John not a whit to be seen with the plain countryman. In spite of his perfumed hair and well-gloved hand his heart was true and lead to the good friend of his boyhood, and the inquiring glances of his companions gave him no annoyance whatever.
They reached Madame Brunette's at last, and John leaped in the doorway and straightway engaged in the laudable employment of finding out the prettiest face among the girls in attendance.
Josie Mollett, radiant with an... and I think a little artificial bloom, came forward... my most bewitching glances to wait upon the old farmer. She brought so attractive a person with him; and, fancying that she would show her superior ability by so doing, made up her mind to quiz Uncle Abel unmercifully. Poor old man! He never was so miserable in his life. In Hoptown he would have had no trouble whatever. Miss Crabtree, in her plain dress and cap with lavender ribbons, would have told him at once what to get, and her little gray eyes would not have confused him in the least.
But here was a fine lady with a great circumfer-ence of black silk trailing out along the carpet, a waist no bigger than a wasp, a head on which the hair seemed struggling in crimps and curls to get away from stifling bands strapped tightly around it, and a pair of great black eyes looking straight at him. While the damsel held up one style after another, or tied them on competently, Uncle Abel looked at John imploringly, but derived no help from him.
"Now, young woman, show me some of your best bonnets—real good ones. None of your old-fashioned poor things for my wife."
Having said this Uncle Abel felt that he had stated the case clearly and should have no farther trouble.
Miss Josie called ahead and returned with a white chip gipsey, trimmed with blue, a stirred green satin with a red rose on it, and a gray straw trimmed with scarlet poppies.
"Now this will be just what you want, sure; only twenty-five dollars too—so cheap and so becoming."
Uncle Abel confessed afterward that he felt quite confounded at the great price, but did not mean to let that Franchised girl know it, so he only said,
"O, that's the style, eh? It ain't a bit like Betsey's old one though."
"O, no, Sir, the fashion has changed entirely.
Now this gipsey is just the newest thing out, and your wife would set the fashion in the town, I don't doubt."
She looked up at John Dare meekly, but could not interpret the look in his eyes; so, taking it for granted that it was an expression of admiration, she purred the same strain:
"Just fresh from Paris; I am sure your wife would like that. Shall I try it on for you?"
"Wa'al yes, I can tell better how it looks then.
How it looks just like a dish."

"There—it goes on in this way!" and Josie pitched the little thing over her rosy face, tied the strings in a big bow knot, and swept down the length of the room. "Don't you like it?"
"Wa'al, it's kind o' purty; but it's awful queer, ain't it, John?"
John thus appealed to could only answer that he "knew nothing in the world about women's bon-nets;" and took up his reverie, whatever it was, just where it was broken off. But looking slyly in the long mirror opposite he saw Josie making signs to another girl, and he soon found that they were amusing themselves vastly at the perplexity of their customer. He saw, too, that a pale, quiet girl, with smooth brown hair looked up from her work indignantly, and he rather saw than heard her say, "For shame!" and grow crimson as she spoke.
His own face flushed a little as he became aware that Uncle Abel was being made the butt of their jokes—good Uncle Abel, who was looking so ad-miringly at the fabrics incomprehensible to him, his old heart only full of the thought how he should make his present worthy of the patient soul for whom it was intended.
Then John was greatly perplexed; for as he said truly, he knew nothing about all that mysterious and bewildering arrangement of dress that he saw every day.
Still he knew that Aunt Betsey's spare locks, thickly sprinkled with gray, were not dressed in modern style, and he could not for the life of him see whereabouts on that dear old head any of those gipsies or fancions would rest. He remembered that long ago Aunt Betsey was wont to twist her hair with the same energy that distinguished all her movements, and that this operation resulted in a hard knob at the back of her head, like a door-handle, which certainly would not harmonize with these capless head-dresses.
Just as his brow was overcast with this thought the pale girl came toward Uncle Abel, her cheek flushing as she did so in defiance of the other girls, holding in her hand a plain Loughborough bonnet, trimmed quietly with violet ribbon.
She wore a mourning dress, and the plain bonnet at her throat he'd a look of gray hair.
"I think that this might suit you, Sir," she said.
"If your wife don't dress her hair in these fashions these bonnets would not do at all. This is rich and plain, and covers the back of the head and neck."
"Wa'al now, tell me, for I have got so bothered with these things that I don't know one from 't'other.
I want to get a nice bonnet for Betsey, and I mean to. Now just tell me if you would like your mother to wear one like this?"
"O, I beg your pardon, ma'am. I didn't see; and he touched the sleeve of her black dress. "I—I—am so sorry!"
The young girl brushed off a tear quickly as she said: "I have no mother now; but if you'll trust me, Sir, I think this will suit."
She had stood hitherto just out of the range of John Dare's vision, and had not seen him at all.
Something in the sound of her voice attracted him, perhaps, and when Uncle Abel called:
"Here, John Dare!" he stepped hastily enough toward them. The girl thrust the bonnet in Uncle Abel's hand, and would have been out of sight if her dress had not caught on one of the branching stands and held her fast.
"Any!" and John Dare, with a hot flush on his face, caught her hand and so detained her. "Amy Egbert, have I found you at last?"
The girl's face grew white and red by turns, and the words she spoke came so low and broken that only John could catch their meaning.
Uncle Abel pushed his spectacles up on his forehead, and, still holding the hat in his hand, looked open-mouthed from one to the other.
"I guess you must have known this young woman afore, didn't you?" he said; but John was too busy with eager questions, and Amy was trembling and flushing as she tried to speak calmly, and so his question was unanswered. Pretty Josie was dividing her attention between a new customer and the strange scene beside her, and between anger and mortification she looked in no need of help from rouge as she tossed her head and muttered various uncourteous remarks in regard to "that Amy Egbert and her bean."
Uncle Abel held the hat a while longer quite patiently, but at last despairing of the interview being ended, so he coughed and then he said:
"I'll take this bonnet. Twenty dollars is a good deal, but Betsey's worth it, ain't she, John?"
John need not have started so, or said "Very," which wasn't a sensible answer at all; but Uncle
Abel laughed a little at himself, and said, softly:
"O, boys will be boys!" He was obliged to tell Miss Egbert the direction over twice too, and felt quite uneasy lest it should not arrive at his hotel in time.
Outside the door John turned to leave his uncle, and looked as shy as a girl as he said, "It's all right, Uncle Abel. You've found a new bonnet, and I've found a—a—an old friend!"
Uncle Abel held his hand fast, and looked a moment, without speaking, in John's face, in a wistful way; then said, looking in the young man's eyes,
"See's a motherless girl, John!"
"Uncle Abel!" and John turned angrily away, or would have done so if the detaining hand had not held him with a grasp which sixty years had not weakened. "Look here, my boy, I meant no offense. None of my blood turn villains," he said, proudly; "but you see she's young and pert and fervent, and, maybe, if you see too much of her she might get to thirvin' more of you than would be good for her, and if you ain't in earnest I guess 'twould br... her heart. Shake hands with your old uncle, my boy. I meant no harm; but I promised Liza when she was on her dyin' bed that I would alias try to give you good advice, and the last words 'most that she spoke, says she, 'Abel, watch over my boy.'"
" My dear, kind uncle, I thank you—indeed I do —for all your kindness; but I could not bear to think that you should misjudge me. I know Amy long ago, when her parents were both living, and she had all that wealth could give her. I loved her then in a quiet way, but I was too poor to tell her so. Then came reverses and death, and in her poverty and pride the girl hid herself from me resolutely until now. She tried to earn her bread by her accomplishments but failed, and gladly took this means to do so. Now, if I can win her for my wife, I shall bring Mrs. John Dare to see you some fine day this summer—may I, Uncle Abel?"

So they parted, and the passers-by little dreamed of all that hand-grasp spoke.
"Wa'al, wa'al, if things don't turn out queer!"
soliloquized Uncle Abel, homeward-bound, with a hardbox safely placed on the seat before him. "To think how near I come to gettin' one of them gipsies for Betsey. Why, she would have laughed a week about it. And then to think that painted picture of a girl was making game of me all the while.
And then the other one, with her gentle way, taking the trouble to tell a stupid old fellow like me what was the right thing to buy. I guess she would make our John a nice wife; and after Betsey and me has passed away there'll be a nice bit of property comin' to John, and that'll help him on."
How pleased Aunt Betsey was to be sure, when the old man gave her the new bonnet! How "fair and young" she looked in the fresh ribbons and soft blond around her face! And how she laughed at the idea of wearing "one of them dish-covers on her head!"
Just when the country was in its June glory
John Dare brought his bride to the farm-house where he had spent so many childish hours, and he led her to all the old familiar spots, from the well in the brook to the grave by the orchard. But as long as straw and ribbon may endure to keep them both in mind how John Dare found his wife, they tell the story of the time when Uncle Abel bought Betsey's bonnet.
A DASH INTO YORKSHIRE.
If any body with ordinary powers of observation and description will go any where and relate what he sees and hears faithfully, he can scarcely fail to interest those who listen to him. It is when people write all out of their own heads that they are dull and incomprehensible. Human nature is always interesting to human nature. I feel confident, therefore, that I shall not bore the intelligent reader by relating faithfully what I saw, heard, and observed in my scamper through the county of York. If you put yourself in my place, which, being an imaginative reader, you will have no difficulty in doing, you will feel quite a new sensation to be walking into a strange town with a little carpet-bag in your hand, but with no purpose in your mind, seeking adventures, and trusting to the chance of accidents.
I can not tell how I came to entertain the notion that Leeds was rather an elegant sort of a town for a seat of commerce, but I approached Leeds with that impression. Perhaps it was owing to something that I had read in a geography-book at school, aided by a general idea that a seat of the woolen trade would naturally be so. But the first glimpse I had of a forest of tall chimneys lifting their heads above a canopy of black smoke, was so strangely out of harmony with my ideal that I began to think I had got into the wrong carriage and been carried to Manchester. But no, it was Leeds. They didn't expect me, evidently; for there was no fly waiting to convey me in triumph through the town. Three frys were in attendance truly, but they were engaged beforehand; but there were none for chance travelers. I felt it to be entirely my own fault. I ought to have given the good people notice. I can not remember ever before this occasion emerging from a railway station with a carpet-bag in my hand without being surrounded by a mob of boys competing for the honor and profit of carrying my luggage. But here not a boy appeared. Not a single soul was on the look-out for any chance whatever. Good sign, I thought. All employed in the wool-trade. Plenty of work, good wages, no idle people. So I trudged along with my carpet-bag until it began to rain water, soot, powdered bricks, and grit, when I turned into the first hotel I came to. I went straight to the smoking-room to calm my feelings with a cigar. The room was full of smokers. They were mostly enormously big men, with large, long heads and high cheek-bones, and they all wore brown leggings and had whips. They were smoking long pipes—of a length to match themselves—in silence when I went in; but presently they began to talk. What is the matter with me? Have I relapsed? Has my comprehension left me? I do not understand a single word they say. Ah, I see now; it is the dialect. Having had long experience of it on the stage I couldn't have believed that real Yorkshiremen would speak it so ill. I listened very attentively, but I could make nothing of the conversation. If they had only mentioned the word "yell," or said "dem it,"
I might have felt that I was in Yorkshire; but they never said any thing so intelligible, and I didn't feel that I was in Yorkshire. I spoke to my next neighbor in real Yorkshire, which I learned from a celebrated comedian, and the ignorant yokel did not understand a word I said. I observed too, with disappointment, that their hair was not flaxen, and didn't curl; and that not a man in the room slapped his walrus. One man had so far outraged his country and the well-known habits of his people as to come out without a waistcoat. And without a flaxen wig that curls all over his head, and a waistcoat to slap when he says "dem it," how can a man be a Yorkshireman?
I went in search of new adventures, and wandering about for some time among high, gaunt red-brick woolen warehouses—unrelieved by a single bright shop or cheerful dwelling—I met with an adventure. I was getting very depressed, and thinking of going back to London by the very next train, when I heard somebody cry "Hoy!" I turned round and saw a stout, sturdy, ruddy-faced gentleman standing at a green gate about twenty yards off. We cried "Hoy!" again, and so... that the signal was recorded for me I went toward him.

He seized me by the hand, shook it heartily, and said he was glad to see me.
" How was I?"
I said I was quite well. How was he?
" First-rate."
" And how were all friends in London?"
I ventured to say that all friends in London were in a satisfactory condition.
" And now come in," he said; "dinner will be ready in a few minutes."
Now, the reader can believe me or not, just as he likes; but I can honestly assure him that I had never seen this gentleman before in my life; but in looking at him, and listening to his voice during the above brief colloquy I came to have a notion that I had known him for a long time, that he had been expecting me, and that I should find every thing prepared for my reception. Nothing occurred to dispel that notion, but every thing to confirm it.
My host introduced me to his wife. She shook hands with me, and said she was glad to see me.
Would I take a glass of wine after my long journey?
If I wished to change my clothes, I would find my room—right-hand door on the first landing. The cloth was already laid, and it was laid for three.
" We expected you at two," the lady said; "but as you did not come, I put the dinner back."
" It was very kind of you, I'm sure," I said.
" Oh, not at all," she protested. " Would I take my pudding before my meat or after? Yorkshire fashion was to take it before the meat."
I said I would take it Yorkshire fashion, for I loved the Yorkshire fashions.
" Had I seen Polson lately?" my host asked.
" Yes, I had seen him last week."
" Still at the old shop, I suppose?"
" Yes," I said, " he was still at the old shop."
" And what was he doing. Still at the old game?"
" Yes," I said, " still at the old game."
And so the dinner passed pleasantly away. When we were sitting over our wine, my host said: "I have invited a few friends to meet you this evening. All people that you know. Marsh and his wife, Deacon and his wife, Partridge and his wife. Old Cockle is coming, too—you remember old Cockle, of course?"
I said that it was very kind of him, that I should be very glad to meet so many persons that I knew, and that I particularly remembered old Cockle. I firmly believed at the moment that I did know all these people, and when they came I recognized them all on the instant. Looking round the table, at the " tea fight" (which was a pleasant Yorkshire meal of tea, coffee, fish, roast fowl, and buttered steak), every face that I saw was familiar to me, so was every voice I heard. Stuttering my eyes I knew them all by their speech. I heard old Cockle incidentally mention that he had never been in Leeds.
Until this day I had never been in Leeds. Yet I knew old Cockle, and old Cockle knew me. This is not a story that begins with an indelible and ends with that most unsatisfactory definite vice, "a wild and troubled dream." It is a simple fact that I am relating. For two days I found myself in a strange town, which I had never visited before, in the midst of familiar faces and old friends, who entertained me hospitably, and paid me every attention. First, one old friend and then another old friend conducted me over the town to view the lions of Leeds. They are not good, and they are not imposing. They are a good deal like sacking-dresses. It is a dingy soot-brown town, swept by the work-house order of architects and light-colored bricks. It struck me all strange that a town which produces such fine soft glossy cloth should be itself so rusty and threadbare. The town-hall is a magnificent building, perhaps the handsomest town-hall in the kingdom; but it is too far for the town.
It stands like an exquisite marble statue in the midst of a builder's lumber-yard. Briggate, the principal commercial street, is a sort of two-story Tottenham-court-road. The woolen mills give you the wild idea of houses suffering from jaundice. All the goods sold in the shops seem to be soft goods.
I wanted a penknife, and searched three streets in vain for a cutler's. I entered at last a shop that had a slight look of hardware, and when I asked for a penknife they tried to put me off with a woolen comforter. In the end the shop-boy was sent out to procure the article I wanted, and he was so long absent that I think he must have gone to Sheffield for it.
I was much struck with the paucity of public houses—good phrases that "paucity of public houses"—in Leeds. I congratulated my guide on the pleasant fact as being a testimony to the temperate habits of the people. I regret to say that he could not accept my congratulations. He let me into a secret. The public houses in Leeds are necessarily situated up courts. There is no sign of them in the main streets; but if you go up the courts there you find them. And every street was pierced with these sly little courts, like rabbit-holes in a sandbank.
The young ladies in Leeds are all in the fashion;
but they overdo the thing a little. Their dresses are nearly as big as their heads, so that they appear when in the streets to have two heads, one with a hat and one without.
I found at a public office an old friend—when I had never seen before in my life—who had made arrangements to conduct me over a woolen mill. One proprietor refused to admit me, having a strong suspicion that it was my design to take the pattern of his new machinery. Another made me welcome and showed me every thing. The history of a yard of doeklin would fill a volume, so I can not even attempt to summarize it. From the sheep's back to the final rolling of it up in a bale it goes through a score of elaborate processes, and changes its appearance every time. It is always going into a machine, or a tub, or a boiler, and coming out—like a comic entertainer—in a new form. It is torn to pieces by the "devil," and spun and twisted, and treated, and boiled, and dyed, and pummeled, and shaved, and hot pressed, and I don't know what all. The adventures of a pair of distress-shilling trousers would beat the exploits of the seven-league boots all to nothing.

A word as to shoddy. I thought it was a term of reproach, a thing to be ashamed of, a sly dodge of the dealer. But Leeds is not ashamed of shoddy, it talks about it openly, uses it openly. What is shoddy?

I was not quite clear on this point before I went to Leeds, but I know all about it now, and will give others the benefit of my newly-acquired useful knowledge. Shoddy is old wool made as good as new. Every manufacturer keeps a devil, a ravenous beast with a fearful set of iron teeth, and an insatiable appetite for old coats and old trousers, old any thing that is made of wool. Toss him an old garment and he will tear it to pieces in no time. The spun and woven threads are converted into wool again, and are worked up into new threads to be woven once more into a piece of cloth. Cloth so made—with a mixture of new wool—looks very well and wears very well. I defy you to tell which is shoddy cloth and which is not. We all wear shoddy without knowing it. For light wear shoddy cloth will serve every purpose; but it will not stand strain and exertion. You must not venture to practice gymnastics in a pair of shoddy trousers. Here is the weakness of shoddy—the shortness of the staple. You know now—if you did not know before—why the old clothman is so eager and anxious to buy any garment, however ragged, which is composed entirely of wool. The old suit goes to the mill and comes back to you in a new shape. Your trousers to-day may be your waistcoat to-morrow. Such is the economy of modern trade.

The cloth-hall at Leeds is a huge shed, a quarter of a mile long; the area of which is divided into streets of stalls, at which, on market-days, the manufacturers exhibit specimens of their goods. It is a curious place, well worth seeing. Let me impart to the reader a secret I picked up here. How to tell if there is cotton in a piece of cloth. Take a small piece and tear it both ways, against the warp and against the weft. The wool in tearing makes a dull soft sound; the cotton tends with a crackling noise. Do this when your tailor swears "it is all wool," and see how foolish he will look when he hears the rattle of the cotton threads. The price of broadcloth ranges from a shilling a yard to twenty shillings! At wholesale prices you can get cloth enough to make a suit for five shillings.

Having seen Leeds at work, I was curious to see it at play. With this purpose I made the round of its night amusements. I went to a theatre. It was poorly attended, as it deserved to be; for though the house was large and capable of being made bright and attractive, it was in an inconceivably dirty state, and the performance on the stage was dreary in the last degree. When will provincial managers be brought to understand that people do not go to the theatre as a duty, but to be made cheerful and to be amused? Why should any one come away from any where to sit in this dingy den, and be witness to a performance which, in point of art and skill, is below the mark of the basket who executes a clog dance on the calladap in the street?

I visited a music-hall. It had evidently been a flour-dish factory, or something of that kind; but, with bright lights and a lively band of musicians, it was infinitely more cheerful than the theatre. This Leeds music-hall has its peculiarities. The people are admitted to the body of the building gratis, paying for their entertainment in the price of the beer they drink. The charge for admission to the galleries is sixpence, and there is a sort of pew at the end of the hall set apart for mothers with children in arms. The entertainment was of the usual character. Awkward young ladies in dicky evening costumes, showing a lanky length of red arm, came on with pieces of music—of which they could not read a note—and sang sentimental ballads in shrill notes, which set your teeth on edge. Then the all-pervading irrepressible comic man, with the bristles hat and the long-tailed coat, treated us to Slap-bang and Kafkasian and Undoodle-day, and always when he failed to make an effect, knocked his hat over his eyes, and by that triumphant stroke of humor invariably brought down the house. It was not exactly an elevating entertainment; but it admitted of great variety, and the audience seemed amused. It was at least a lively place, and well ordered of its kind, which the theatre was not.

In the course of three hours I pretty well exhausted the night's entertainments of Leeds. They included an organ performance at the town-hall, a concert, and a reading at the Mechanics' Institution.

They are a musical people in Leeds. From almost every court leading to the public houses tuneful voices reached the street, and in some of the houses fiddles were going. In the bar of a little beer-shop, which I was curious enough to visit, I found a handsome piano jammed up against the beer engine, and a man playing it for the delectation of half a dozen yokels, who were drinking their beer at the counter. It was a mean, shabby little beer shop; but the piano was in a fine rosewood case, and the performer played remarkably well. There was nothing to pay for the music. I had half a pint and a grand fantasia for twopenny. Nay, more; a gentleman at the bar did a little double-stuff for the entertainment of the customers generally. It seemed to me that the piano was a pleasant mitigation of the mere drinking and getting drunk purposes of the ordinary public-house bar; and I have observed that where music, singing, dancing, and other amusements are dispensed with liquor, they have the effect of keeping people sober.

My kind host offered, if I would stay over to Wakefield with him, to show me a curiosity; the said curiosity being the whole of the original manuscript of the Pickwick Papers, which, I was assured, is in the possession of a printer there. I was informed, too, that a Yorkshire schoolmaster advertised himself as the proprietor of the real original Dutchess' Hall, which is now conducted on principles of the most boundless liberality. My new old friend in Leeds—whose hearty hospitality and kindness I shall never forget—promised me to stay a day or two longer; but as I was cured of my vanity, I was anxious—selfish person that I am—to get back to town. I took Hall in my way, though it was a good deal out of my way, and took a glance at the lions there. I had shared in the impression, which, I believe, is the popular one, that Hull was in the last degree a dull, smoky, dreary town. I had heard it associated with another place whose name begins with H and ends with two Y's. But I found that Hull had been much belied and shamefully traduced. The Humber, if it were not normally of the color of pea-soup, is as fine a river as any in the kingdom. As to the town, I prefer it to Leeds. The bricks are of a better color, the streets are busy and bustling, and the surrounding country is really charming. Hull has a statue, a marvelous statue. It is situated in the market-street, in the midst of cyster-stalls and fish-barrow, and it represents William III. on horseback; William and the horse being both gilt all over. The golden man and horse have a curious effect of gracing among the trucks and booths. And here, for the first time in Yorkshire, I was gratified by hearing somebody say "don't." I asked a native why Hull had erected a statue to William III.; and he said he was "don't if he knew." I believe William did Hull the honor of landing on his shores, when he was obliging enough to come over from Holland to govern England. It was there that first he showed his blackplack face.

Hull is maritime, and has docks, and ships, and sailors, and is all the more lively in consequence. It has two theatres, a circus, and several music-halls. One of the theatres (the Royal) is an example of what may be done, even in the provinces, by enterprise and liberal management. It is a handsome, rosy building, elegantly decorated and luxuriously furnished, and the places are dressed and mounted in first-rate style. The result is, that the better classes go to the stalls and boxes, and that the local shareholders find their account in a well-filled treasury. Hull, too, has a pretty park, with pleasant walks, and flower-beds, and ornamental waters; and the roads leading to the country are studded with bright little villas, where you may hold house comfortably and elegantly for thirty pounds a year. So never believe any one who says that there is only the difference of a letter between Hull and the infernal regions.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Amuse this season of the year, when "lovely June" is entering summer in a great "hoo and cry" is raised about "going into the country." What does it matter though June is often one of the most charming months of all the twelve in the city? Or what does it avail though one has a comfortable, dry house here, and country boarding-places are crowded and ridiculously expensive? It is fashionable to go into the country; and people must bestir themselves and secure some spot where the sun-fairly may enjoy the delirium of being "out of town" during the "season." This is frequently all they do enjoy. Long Branch, Newport, Saratoga, and the superlatively resorts are, in the "season," overcrowded, even if it were possible for every particular whose household long for country air to trust himself within the distance of a hundred miles from the city. So some more quiet retreat is often sought in the suburbs of New York, on the banks of the Hudson, or even away in Vermont or New Hampshire. But, alas! not infrequently they soon believe that the merchant was about right, who said to his young wife when she begged him to take her into the country for the season:

"My dear, it is quite impossible at present; but I'll tell you what we will do, and we shall never know the difference."

"What is that?" asked the wife, eagerly.

"We will turn off the gas and the Croton and move our bed up into the attic!"

Though it is worse than folly to abandon comfortable houses for more fashionable ones, nevertheless the real, genuine country is a grand thing for every body to enjoy whenever they can moderately. Especially for the children; it would be better for them, physically, to be in the country all the time. The freedom of outdoor life is blood, bone, and muscle to them. If half of our pale city boys should take their school-books to a dark den, and spend an entire year in "roughing it" on a good farm, the world would be the gainer, yea, keener, in young men of mental strength and vigor.

For every one change, to a certain extent, is beneficial, and the feelings of the city naturally seek it in the country. And that is just as it should be. The thing that is bad is the peals which annually sweep people on the approach of the summer season to the city—any where, say where—provided it bear the magic name of country, though wanting the reality. Our magnificent Central Park opens to those who reside in town numerous sources of enjoyment, with plenty of fresh air and delightful scenery, which one may tolerate in without any fear of a bill being presented to him on leaving—unless, by chance, he passes by the Astor!

The recent discussion between the Allopathic and Homoeopathic physicians in regard to the treatment of the cholera brought to mind a recipe we saw long ago, which may be useful to our readers. We give it from memory:

Homoeopathic Recipe.—Take a spring chicken, and let it be rather skinned. Dress it nicely, and keep it in the sun. Let the chicken fall on a bottle of water, and hold four hours. When it is done, take one table-spoonful and mix in a quart of pure spring water. (Filtered Croton will answer very well.) Ten drops of this mixture, taken in half a wine-glass of warm water, at intervals of three hours, will be found very nourishing. If the patient is particularly thirsty, the services of a nurse can soon be dispensed with.

By way of contrast, we are reminded of a good lady of the Allopathic persuasion, whose minister came to console with her after the death of her child.

"My friend," he began, "I am sorry to hear that you have lost your baby."

"Yes, sir," replied the mother, "we did every thing to save it, but in vain. We had five doctors, and they gave it castor oil, and rhubarb, and opium; and when that didn't do any good, they gave it ipecacuanha and calomel; and then they put a mustard paste on the stomach and chest, and a blister on the neck and side, and applied leeches to the head. But it was of no use; the poor little thing died after all!"

Suffering when leads to crime—far more frequently even to our very noble than those whose imagines who never know what it is to want for bread. Not long since a very respectably-dressed young man was brought before the Court of Special Sessions on the accusation of stealing a book from the Astor Library. The prisoner pleaded guilty; and stated—and there was every reason to believe what he said to be true—that he had received a liberal education, and had come to the city to look for a situation; he had spent all his money; had been two days without food, and had walked the streets for two nights. In the morning he thought he would steal a book, eat it, and get something to eat, but he mistook the temptation. He looked over the morning papers, went out again in quest of a situation, and found one as clerk in a grocery store, but he was not to commence work until the next day. This, he said, was a long time for a man to wait who had walked the streets two days and two nights; and as he concluded his story he burst into tears, and said, "The gnawing of my heart made me steal." Ministers were taken by the judge to ascertain if these statements were true. And it is to be hoped that before this time the young man has been put in the way of earning an honest living.

An Eastern paper gives the following suggestions to regard to the cholera:

"Don't get it on the brain, and, in this end, avoid reading the daily papers. Endeavor, if possible, to keep a clean conscience and two or three clean shirts. Rise with the lark, but avoid larks in the evening. Be above-ground in all your dealings, and above-board in all your feelings. Love your neighbors as yourself, but don't have too many of them in the same house with you."

Country newspapers, by-the-way, seem to be under the impression that the Atlantic cholera has broken out in spots all over New York city, and that the entire population is in imminent danger. Some of these above-mentioned journals printed one of the little boys who came rattling into the house just at dusk, one evening, exclaiming, "Oh, mamma, there are a hundred cholera out in our yard!" "A cholera case! Oh, no, my dear," returned mamma. "Well, I am sure there are as many as fifty." "Oh no, you are very much mistaken." "Well, my way," persisted the boy, impatiently, "there is our cat and another out!"

The health of New York city is reported to be unusually good—the month of May was unusually cool—and the city is unusually clean.

The New York Observer says:

"When you write for a newspaper write all your words in full as you wish them printed. This has been said a thousand times, but not one man in ten observes the rule. All our best writers do observe it. In this paper we print an article in which the writer abbreviated the word 'government' into 'govt,' and the printers made it 'govt,' as they are the power of the government was changed into 'the power of the gov't.' But the letter 't' and cross the letter 't' and try to spell correctly. If you can not comply with these rules after you have written your article put it in the fire."

We would add in these directions; write legibly, and on one side only of the paper. If you do not write a plain hand employ an amanuensis. Nothing is more vexatious to an editor than to strain his eyes and puncture his brain in deciphering hieroglyphics. No manuscripts which in written illegibly stands much chance of being regarded favorably. An editor feels obliged to reject it before he has read the first half page.

Colored starch, says a London paper, is the latest and greatest novelty of the season. It is made in pink, buff, the new mauve, and a delicate green, and blue will soon be produced. Any article starched with the new preparation is completely white, but as it washes out, the garment that was pink to-day may be green to-morrow, and buff afterwards. It is intended especially for those bright but brazenly-colored articles that are costly, wash out, and perplex their owners. If the pattern has been marked, they only need the mauve starch; if green, green starch; and they can be restored one even and pretty shade, thus becoming not only wearable again, but very stylish. White starch-makers or hat-makers may also be colored in the same way, and infinite variety afforded.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

HAIR ON TAYLOR.—One day during the late Anniversary Week a witty friend of ours, passing beneath the shadow of the well-known ecclesiastical structure that grows the neighborhood of Broadway and Tenth Street, was accosted by a grim-looking country peddler, evidently of the order of those who frequent the distance to Wall Street. "Wall Street?" inquired our friend, looking the questioner in the face, and immediately comprehending the allusion; "just as far, Sir, as Trinity Church, is from Grace." The effect on the stranger, who appeared to take the answer in a spiritual sense, can better be imagined than described.

The individual who tried to clear his conscience with an egg in New York, and to make his spirit with peace. If he fails in this it is his duty to abstain to blow out his candle with a believe, and slink calmly into the arms of a young lady.

A FINE TRANSLATION.—Victor Hugo, in his new book, "Les Travailleurs de la Mer," mentions a Scotch instrument of torture called "le bappin." What a dreadful name to give it, to be sure! Imagine a Scotch gentleman sitting in his library and playing on his bagpipes. Perhaps some foreign writer can't say much in think of fear by a mention of "le bappy dandy."

A DARK CONJUNCTION.—"See, why am I here in the most insignificant little bit of the world?" "Because they don't obey thy."

Question.—Can you tell me why a hypocrite sits in his best dress, than you or I, on how many has a party, and goes?

Answer.—The eye of death can best counterfeits (point her feet), and so I suppose can best count her toes.

"The post-office is our village," writes a Vermont body, "was kept in the bar-room of the tavern, a great resort for loungers. An old chap, more remarkable for his coarseness and indelicacy than his good nature, was sitting there one day with a lot of boom-companions, when the Methodist preacher, a new-comer, entered, and asked for his letter. Ned belpen asked, bluntly: 'Are you the Methodist parson? just come here to preach?' 'I am,' pleasantly replied the minister. 'Well,' said belpen, 'will you tell me how old the devil is?' 'Ezra,' replied the preacher, 'rejoiced his preacher, and left the room amidst the roars of the company.'"

A CONJUGAL CONUNDRUM.

Which is of greater value, my wife says. The bride or bride-groom? Must the truth be said: Ah! it is most. The bride is given away; The bridegroom's often regularly sold.

Two men died at an angle at the same time, and killed Mrs. An Irishman observed: "They might have saved their powder and shot, for the fall would have killed him."

Mr. Belpen.—A lady writes to ask whether her husband, who is by profession a coffee, is justified in sitting up all night in the exercise of his vocation. He can, at all events, get in a proverbially philosophical plan—that it is never too late to mend.

Send an old paper to his country the other day: "If one swallow makes a summer, what a tropical region would your stomach be, old fellow?"

AN EXTRAORDINARY CASE.—Jollyboy, who has been rather knocked out of time by the usual gaiety and conviviality, has been entirely cured by a course of step-lane-propaganda.

"To be, what did the Democrats do when they crossed the Red Sea?" "I don't know, but I guess they dried themselves."

"ANOTHER WAY."

When lovely women, Lump of Folly, Would show the world her wretched looks: Would treat herself as child her folly, And waste each man of sense away. The crowd would laugh at her, and say: To prevent a wick from every eye, Degraded a spouse, disgust a lover, And spoil a respectable to-day.

"Will you have some company?" asked a gentleman of Aunt Prudence, a dinner-table. "Dear me, no!" she replied, with a shudder; "I'm fond of you in their place, but I should as soon think of eating dog soup!" The gentleman did not urge her.

DOMESTIC FLORA.—A FRAGMENT.

"I am a married lady of thirty—oh! Every evening I see in their beds A 'broken down' of early hours. Every morning my slippers greet The pained paces of twenty-year feet. Thirteen little hours are always in a fever, Thirteen little hours are filled with bread and butter, Thirteen little hours are busy all day long, Thirteen little hours, with doing something wrong. Till I fall on my face, With an empty, ah! And when my poor husband comes home from his work, Tired and hungry, and down as a Turk. What do you think is the picture he sees? A legion of babies, all in a row— Johnny is crying, And Lucy is fighting, And wretched mamma, with her hair all a flying; Henry and angry William bounding hills high; Charles in the parlor reading current Jeff; Edward strutting round in paper Sunday suit; Harry at the glass, with a wave at his breast; Robert gets his finger—'no! when your finger strikes the door, Misses their asking with a fury-grown roar; Baby at the coal-bod hovers in beard, Throwing in his spite to the infernal fire. Alas! my head and master, being rather weak of nerve, he begins to see his position in the evening paper—'Oh, and then the frightened little ones all fly to me for comfort, And so the dreary hours 'old a grand' I believe—oh! I'll give you my news, but you feel me a myth; Yours, very respectfully, Mrs. John Smith.

"Now, papa, tell me what is happening?" "It is," replied papa, "when mamma pretends to be very kind of me, and puts no buttons on my shirt till I'm out of a dozen times."

There is a man in Pennsylvania who is so fearful of matrimony that he will do anything to keep a wife's death to the end of her race in order that he may divorce her from other ladies. Even then, he occasionally makes a mistake.

A recent criminal trial at New Orleans had a rather novel catastrophe; the prisoner was acquitted, and his own and the counsel for the prosecution conspired to jail for contempt of court.

The Way we see HARRY.—The best way to be happy is not to want any thing until you have got it, and then be sorry of it. Fiddling and wish, are good things to have, as one has not too much of them.

The Irish people ride so much in case that Ireland might be called the carriage.

VERY LIKELY. "YES, JERKINS, I HAD BETTER WEAR MY VEIL. GIBSON IS NOT THE PLACE TO DISTRACT THE ATTENTION OF YOURS MARY!"

THE UNITED STATES STEAM SLOOP OF WAR "WAMPANOAG."—[See Page 363.]

GOVERNOR THOMAS SWANN, OF MARYLAND.

GOVERNOR SWANN OF MARYLAND.

THOMAS SWANN, the present Governor of the State of Maryland, was born in the city of Alexandria in the State of Virginia. His father, THOMAS SWANN, was a lawyer of ability and distinction, and during the Presidency of JOHN QUINCY ADAMS held the office of United States Attorney for the District of Columbia. His son, Governor THOMAS SWANN, the subject of this sketch, was educated at the University of Virginia, and commenced the study of the law in the office of his father in Washington. He, however, never pursued the practice of his profession, and having married a lady from Maryland, came to the city of Baltimore, where he has since resided. A gentleman of fortune and liberal education, firm and decided in his convictions, and of great promptness and energy of character, he became interested in all works of public improvement then being projected, which might in any way tend to promote the prosperity of his adopted city and State. A man of boldness and determination was required to undertake the completion of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and Mr. SWANN'S election as President, in 1848, was hailed with satisfaction by the public authorities, as well as by those of his fellow-citizens who were familiar with his character and the previous services he had rendered to the Company. At once turning all his energies to the accomplishment of the work he had undertaken, and boldly contending with these difficulties that had at one time appeared as formidable, he had the satisfaction of seeing fulfilled the prediction he had made as early as 1851, of the completion of the entire road on the 1st of January, 1863. On the final completion of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, Mr. SWANN resigned his position as President and became the President of the North Western Virginia Railroad, whose work diverging from the Baltimore and Ohio Road in the mountains, extended itself to the Ohio River at the mouth of the Little Kanawha, some ninety miles west of the city of Wheeling. This road also was opened for travel under his auspices, and he only retired from its management in 1867 to become Mayor of the city of Baltimore, to which office he had been elected by a large majority of his fellow-citizens.

In this position, to which he was twice chosen, Mr. SWANN did much for the advancement and prosperity of Baltimore. He proposed, and was able to carry by his paramount influence with the Councils of that city, a change from a volunteer Fire Department with all its irregularities to a paid Fire Department with all its promptness, order, and efficiency. He introduced into the city the new system of police and fire-alarm telegraph, which adds so much to the safety of persons and property, and which has since been generally adopted in all cities throughout the Union. When Mr. SWANN came into office the jail, which had been of sufficient size when the population did not exceed some fifty thousand inhabitants, had long been found totally inadequate to the requirements of a city of nearly two hundred thousand people. When he left office a noble edifice of great size and striking architecture had taken its place. The water-works by which Baltimore is supplied, at an elevation of 217 feet above tide, with pure water by natural flow, was another of the works for which that city is indebted to his administration.

COLONEL WILLIAM B. THOMAS, COLLECTOR OF THE PORT OF PHILADELPHIA.

COLONEL W. B. THOMAS,

COLLECTOR OF THE PORT OF PHILADELPHIA.

The last public official act of Mr. SWANN'S Mayoralty was the inauguration of the Park on the 15th October, 1860. Soon afterward the Southern States seceded and the war for the preservation of the Union began. Mr. SWANN took a firm stand on the side of the Federal Government, and advocated at all times and under all circumstances the strict maintenance of the authority of the United States. When the plan of the National Banks was developed Mr. SWANN was made President of the first bank established in the city of Baltimore. And when the Constitution abolishing slavery forever in Maryland was established in 1864, he was chosen by the people to fill the highest office in their gift, that of Governor of the State.

Notwithstanding that Mr. SWANN is still in the prime of manhood, with enlarged and liberal views, few men will be found who have identified their names with undertakings of more practical and lasting benefit to his State and people.

— COLONEL WILLIAM B. THOMAS was born in Upper Merion township, Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, May 25, 1811. In 1842 he became a citizen of Philadelphia, where he was among the first to apply steam-power to the manufacture of flour. His business largely increased, till he now owns one of the largest manufactories in the world, using upward of 1,500,000 bushels of grain annually. Mr. THOMAS soon took an active part in all great business movements. He was one of the founders of the Corn Exchange Association, and was its first President. He is also a leading member of the Board of Trade. In early life he was a Democrat, but left that party many years ago because of his anti-slavery principles. In 1852 he voted for JOHN P. HALL, and in 1860 for the nomination of LINCOLN at Chicago. His career since the rebellion began entitles him to a place in that noble column of men whose names are written on the glorious pages of the war.

— Mr. THOMAS was in Washington when the Capital was cut off from the North by the rebellion in Baltimore. He volunteered for the defense of the city, and, masked on shoulder, paced the streets during the memorable April of 1861. Those were the days when loyal men scarcely knew when to trust. At midnight the President sent for Mr.

REMAINS ON A BATTLE-FIELD.

THOMAS and offered him the Collectorship of the Port of Philadelphia. He accepted, but that he was never an office-seeker his main course afterward has proved.

In 1822, after McClellan and Pope were defeated, Mr. Thomas grew weary of merely civil duties, and in August he formed the employe of the Custom-house into two military companies, and equipped them from his private means. In September he answered the call of Governor CENTER for troops by marching his companies to Harrisburg. Here he was given the command of a regiment, and sent at once into Maryland, where he remained till the danger was over.

In June, 1863, when Lee invaded Maryland, Colonel Thomas at once marched his regiment, then twelve hundred strong, to Harrisburg, and was ordered to guard the Northern Central Railroad, of vital importance to the movements of the Army of the Potomac. His regiment was afterward engaged with the enemy at Wrightsville and at York, and Colonel THOMAS, in command of all the forces at the latter place, prevented the rebels from crossing the river. He then joined MINOR, to aid in the pursuit of LEE. In July, 1864, Colonel THOMAS organized a new regiment, the Hundred and ninety-second Pennsylvania Volunteers, one of the largest ever mustered in Philadelphia. He placed himself and his command at the disposal of the Government, and was ordered to garrison Fort M'Henry, at Baltimore, then to Johnson's Island, and next to guard the large military stores at Gallipolis, Ohio, then threatened by the rebels. He remained at this important post till November. Thus Colonel THOMAS, from 1822 to 1864, was engaged in four campaigns, in each of which he displayed many of the highest qualities of a soldier.

This military record would be honorable to any soldier; it is doubly so as that of a man holding a responsible civil position under the National Government. His duties as Collector of the Port would have excused Colonel THOMAS from any active part in the war, but he refused to throw off any responsibility by pleading another. His administration of the Custom-house at Philadelphia has given entire satisfaction to business men as well as to the Government, and there is no citizen of Philadelphia in whom a deeper trust is more worthily reposed by the community.

BURNING OF THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

On the night of May 21 a disastrous conflagration occurred in this city, resulting in the destruction of the greater portion of the block between Fourteenth and Fifteenth streets, and between Irving Place and Third Avenue. The Academy of Music was held in ruins; the New York University Medical College, including the valuable museum collected by the late Dr. V. LEITCH MOTT, shared the same fate, and the fire extending across the avenue burned down the St. James Lutheran Church.

The scene presented at the height of the conflagration was grand and imposing. The huge pile of buildings comprising the Academy were thrown into strong relief by the seething body of flames rising within, and the reflection of the fire was thrown over the entire city, gilding every prominent spire in sight, and throwing every street into the glare of noonday. Two firemen who had at an early period of the fire entered the Academy failed to make their escape in time, and perished in the flames. The loss from this fire is estimated at over a million of dollars. We hope that our principal and most valuable edifices hereafter constructed will be fire-proof buildings.

THE NEW NAVAL SLOOP "WAMPANOAG."

On the 25th of September, 1864, the first frigate of this beautiful vessel was raised at the Brooklyn Navy-yard, and on the 15th of December of that year she was launched. Her dimensions are: length over all, 354 feet; extreme breadth, 48 feet; depth of hold, 23 feet 6 inches; tonnage (old), 3300 tons.

Being built for high speed she is very sharp at the ends, carrying a graceful curve from stem to stern, and having the appearance of a yacht more than that of a vessel of war. In strength she can not be surpassed. She is diagonally strapped, fore and aft, with iron straps 4 1/2 inches wide by 1/2 of an inch thick, upon the outside of the timbers, in two sets, one set crossing the other at an angle of 45°, and both riveted to a head-strap 5 inches wide by 1/2 of an inch thick. They are also riveted together where they cross each other, in an opening between the timbers. The vessel has also composition straps at the ends to take any strain she may be subject to there.

On each side of the four boiler-batches there are two "A" truss-frames of yellow pine, built to relieve the ship as much as possible of the great weight below, and also to help support the decks at those points.

The ship's frame is of seasoned live-oak; the keel is of white oak in one depth; and the main keelson is composed of live-oak plank in five courses, each caulked to the other. On each side of the main keelson run the sister keelsons, also of live-oak. Outside of these keelsons are six more for the boilers and engines to rest on, three on each side, running as far forward and aft as the shape of the vessel will allow.

The space occupied by the boilers and engines is 164 feet in length. They were designed by Mr. LEITCH MOTT, Chief Engineer of the Bureau of Steam Engineering. The boilers, of which there are eight large, besides four superheaters, are MARINE. The fire-rooms are 26,000 square feet, and the grate-surface is 1175 square feet. There are four smoke-stacks—two 7 feet 8 inches in diameter, one 6 feet 6 inches, and one 6 feet 3 inches; all 16 feet high.

The engines consist of two horizontal direct action, with cylinders 100 inches in diameter and 48 inches stroke. The number of revolutions is 45 per minute. The diameter of the cylinders is 48 inches, and the diameter of the piston is 48 inches. The engines and boilers were built at the Novelty Iron Works, New York. The coal-bunkers contain 350 tons of coal below the berth-deck, and 150 tons on the berth-deck, making 500 tons in all.

The armament of this vessel can be, if desired, twenty 9-inch guns.

The rig will be bark, and she can spread 25,000 square feet of canvas. The ward-room and stowage are on the berth-deck aft, and occupy a length of about 80 feet, and in workmanship and design the accommodations are equal to any thing of the kind ever before put into a man-of-war. On the upper or gun-deck, under the poop-deck aft, are two cabins, one for the captain of the ship and the other for the admiral. This poop-deck extends to the main-mast, and is 6 feet in the clear under the beams. The fore-cabin extends to the foremast, and will accommodate near 100 men; the rest of the crew, about 300, will be accommodated on the berth-deck.

In building this vessel no pains were spared to make her all that could be desired; and all concerned in her construction deserve all the credit due for the workmanlike manner in which each department has carried out the plans of her constructor.

GENERAL STEEDMAN'S TOUR.

OUR artist, Mr. DAVIS, gives the following description of illustrations on page 261:

TRENT RIVER SETTLEMENT.

"The Inspection Tour of General STEEDMAN and FULLERTON has certainly had one good result, the removal from authority of a person named FRENCH, who first came among the freedmen as a chaplain to a colored regiment, and won, by different acts of kindness, the confidence of single-minded people, that are ever ready to believe that a man from the North is sure to be their friend.

"While at Newbern General STEEDMAN and FULLERTON were called upon by a delegation of 'old slaves,' and from these men we heard the story of their troubles, feeling convinced that they spoke only the truth. The day following the Generals visited the Trent River Settlement, and met the freedmen in their simple log-chapel. Here, from different colored men, we learned the story of their difficulties.

"With regard to the Freedmen's Bureau in North Carolina, there is no doubt but that the Bureau has accomplished a vast amount of good, and is in some districts of advantage; but, in others, the management of affairs has been so bad as to occasion trouble, not only with the citizens but with the freedmen. At Salisbury all classes join in testifying to the capable and satisfactory manner in which Colonel C. A. COLLEY has conducted affairs.

At Raleigh, Goldsborough, and Newbern the case is different. The freedmen see that the Bureau agents are looking out for their welfare only so far as their pockets are benefited by so doing. If the citizens can be believed—and they seem honestly disposed—they would willingly take the charge of the freedmen, and give him his rights in the courts (so laws of the State give him those as yet). The freedmen express a strong desire to have the Bureau left for their protection. 'It has been their place of refuge in the past—why not in the future?' They are afraid that the 'white people will not be kind to them if the Bureau is taken away.'

"That the freedmen can be left at present without some protection of the kind I do not believe; but that a change might be made for the better, both for the freedmen, people, and Government, is certain. At present large numbers of able-bodied men do no other labor than draw their rations from the Government, and will continue the same heavy labor until some way is devised for their removal to some position where their labor can be made available."

COUNT BISMARCK.

COUNT BISMARCK SCHONHAUSEN first became prominent in German politics when, after passing through the usual gradations of the diplomatic service, he was in 1851 dispatched as Prussian representative to the Diet at Frankfurt. He had then for four years served as representative of Brandenburg in the Lower House of the Prussian Parliament, in which position he had exercised a considerable influence, and attracted to himself the attention of FREDERICK WILLIAM IV.

In 1859 BISMARCK was appointed ambassador to St. Petersburg, where he remained until 1862, and won for himself the esteem and confidence of the Czar, who conferred upon him the order of Saint-Alexander-Newski. In May, 1862, he was sent as Prussian minister to Paris, and on the 1st of June was received in public audience at the Tuilleries. In consequence of the conflicts occasioned in the Prussian Parliament by the budget of the army, he was made in September, 1862, Prime Minister, with the portfolio of Foreign Affairs. The situation in which he was placed was one of weighty responsibility. He was unable to triumph over the resistance opposed by the Chamber of Deputies to the military organization, because the latter tended to weaken the militia for the profit of the army. In this spirit the Deputies adopted by a very strong majority propositions which the Government had declared impracticable. The House of Lords sided with BISMARCK. The Deputies declared the vote of the Upper House illegal, and the session was closed by the King. The latter had given BISMARCK as assuming the leading position in Government the grand cross of the Legion of Honor.

BISMARCK brought on the Danish war, and won Austria to his support. He now boldly claims for Prussia the most material advantages derived from that war in Schleswig-Holstein. It is impossible now for Austria to avoid war with Prussia, except by a withdrawal from the Danubius.

OF LOTS NAPOLEON'S speech at ANKARA we speak upon the editorial page.

ARMADALE. A NOVEL. By Wilkie Collins. Author of "No Name," "Woman in White," "Queen of Hearts," "Antonina," &c.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, Have Just Published: ARMADALE. A NOVEL. By Wilkie Collins.

Author of "No Name," "Woman in White," "Queen of Hearts," "Antonina," &c. With Numerous Illustrations. 8vo. Cloth, $3 00; Paper, $1 00.

ESTD HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

TO FURNITURE DEALERS AND HOTEL KEEPERS.

TUCKER'S PATENT SPRING BEDS.

There are some truths hidden from the eyes of the ignorant, and though they may pertain to the low vital interests of the human race, they are by no means unimportant. Among these are those of a bed, to fulfill the purpose for which it is desired, (used by consumers); it should, for easy transportation, be made compact; and, lastly, the common sense demands that it should be both DURABLE and ECONOMICAL. All of these essential requirements centre in the spring beds invented by Hiram Tucker, and it is confidently affirmed that nothing has yet been devised for man's comfort which is at all comparable to it. A single night's repose on one of these will cure the most inveterate doctor of his sleepless. For sale wholesale by TUCKER MANUFACTURING COMPANY, 145, 127, and 129 Court Street, Boston, and 29 John Street, New York.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO., 921 BROADWAY (at Nicholas Street). Photographic Materials, Stereoscopic Goods, WAR PAPERS, SCENERY, GROUPS, &c. Photograph Albums, great assortment, Cartes de Visite of noted Persons, &c. &c. French English, and American Novelties.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES.

For Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circulars and five Sheets of Type, Case, &c., 10 cts. ANNES COMPANY, 36 Ann Street, New York, and 25 Lincoln Street, Boston.

5000 Agents Wanted. $5 per day and expenses. Issued stamp for circular to E. H. & Co., Springfield, Mass.

New and Choice Piano Music.

AFLOAT ON THE TIDE. M. Keller. 20 cts. BE KIND TO DARLING RUBY. Nell, D. F. Donke. 20 cts. KISS ME WHILE I'M DREAMING. W. W. Woodruff. 20 cts. I LOVE THE LITTLE RIBBLING STREAM. G. G. G. 20 cts. DEAR FATHER, DRINK NO MORE. A. Sherman. 20 cts. One or more of these beautiful songs will be sent postpaid on receipt of price. OLIVER DITSON & CO., Publishers, Boston.

$150 A MONTH! New Business for Agents. H. B. SHAW, Alfred, Maine.

$1500 PER YEAR paid by SHAW & CLARK. Hallowell, Maine, or Chicago, Illinois.

CATARH. - Newton's New Remedy FOR CATARH removes at once noise in the head, pain in the temples, offensive discharges, and extinguishes the disease as in its final head forward. Price $1 00 a bottle. Send a stamp for a pamphlet to GERRIT NORTON, 11 Ann St.

The American Patent WATCH SAFE.

THE AMERICAN WATCH SAFE COMPANY is now prepared to furnish the new, useful, and elegant PATENT WATCH SAFE to the public.

This WATCH SAFE will be found to afford the most perfect security from pickpockets.

It can be adjusted to any garment. Having been modeled on the lines adopted by the celebrated AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY, selections can be made to fit any watch.

For sale at wholesale by all the leading Fancy Goods Houses, and at retail by all Jewelers, Tailors, Fancy Stores, &c. &c.

C. V. DEVEREUX & CO., General Agents, 428 Broadway, New York.

THE KEY TO COMFORTABLE, CLEAN, AND QUIET SLEEP.

BROWN'S METALLIC WEATHER BANDS outside DUST, NOISE, and ODOR. STOP THE BATTING OF BARBERS, and all warms good for FIVE YEARS. Price $1 00 a pair. 104 Broadway, New York, over the Manhattan Savings-Bank.

Local Agents wanted every where. Send for circular.

100 Photographs of Union Generals sent postpaid for 25 cts.; 50 Photographs of Rebel Officers for 25 cts.; 100 Photographs of Famous Battles for 25 cts.; 100 Acorns for 25 cts. Address C. RYMOUTH, Hallowell, N. Y.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP.

COMPOSED OF IODIDE POTASSIUM, WITH THE COMPOUND CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT OF VALUABLE MEDICINAL ROOTS AND HERBS.

PREPARED BY WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D., Graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York, formerly Assistant Physician in the Blackwell's Island Hospital, late Medical Inspector of the New York State Voluntary Depot, under Governor Edwin D. Morgan.

Constitution Life Syrup HAS PRODUCED A REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

What may seem almost incredible is that many diseases hitherto considered hopelessly incurable are frequently cured in a few days or weeks; and we cheerfully invite the investigations of the liberal-minded and scientific to those which have no parallel at the present day. During the past five years we have conducted with obstinacy, and overcome by position, as heretofore as was ever encountered by any reformer.

RAPIDITY OF CURE.

Please say, "Your cures are too quick," while others doubt their permanency, and think that disease can only be cured by the "slow, resuscitative process of Nature."

This is our reply: In health the body, like a well-oiled wheel, is in a state of equilibrium. But when, from any cause, there is one side of the scale, we have the disease of disease. What is requisite is to restore the normal balance of the scale.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP.

Is a positive and specific remedy for all diseases originating from an IMPURE STATE OF THE BLOOD, and for all (secondary) Diseases transmitted from Father to Child.

PARALYSIS.

It is an universally admitted fact that CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP is the only effective means of restoration in the various forms of Paralysis, that we need not reiterate that it is emphatically the Great Life-giving Power.

DYSPEPSIA.

INDIGESTION, WEAKNESS OF STOMACH, FLATULENCE, LIVER COMPLAINT, WANT OF APPETITE, AND HEADACHE, CONSTIPATION, BELCHING.

DIARRHOEA.

DIARRHOEA, RHEUMATISM, GOUT, GRAVEL, CALCULI, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, MIGRAINE, RHEUMATISM, GOUT, GRAVEL, CALCULI, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, MIGRAINE, RHEUMATISM, GOUT, GRAVEL, CALCULI, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, MIGRAINE.

RHEUMATISM.

DIARRHOEA, RHEUMATISM, GOUT, GRAVEL, CALCULI, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, MIGRAINE, RHEUMATISM, GOUT, GRAVEL, CALCULI, NEURALGIA, SCIATICA, MIGRAINE.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP.

Purges the system radically from all the evil effects of Malaria, removing the lead from the blood, and curing the Weak Points and Rheumatic Pains which the use of Quinine is sure to produce. It banishes Spasmodic Cough, and secures the Teeth as firmly as ever.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP.

Eradicates, root and branch, all Eruptive Diseases of the Skin, &c.

ULCERS, PIMPLES, SLEETINGS.

And all other difficulties of this kind, which so much disfigure the outward appearance of both males and females, often making them a disgusting object to themselves and their friends.

For all Forms of Ulcerative Diseases.

Either of the Nose, Throat, Tongue, Spine, Forehead, or Face, no remedy has ever proved so rapid.

Both Parties upon the female form depending upon a diseased action of the Liver, are very unpleasant to the young wife and mother. A few bottles of CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP will correct the action, and remove the deposit, which is directly under the skin.

Diseases of the Liver, girl's rise to Langour, Distress, Indigestion, Weak Stomach, or an advanced or chronic condition of that organ, accompanied with burning or other unpleasant symptoms, will be relieved by the use of Constitution Life Syrup.

As a General Blood-Purifying Agent, the LIFE SYRUP stands unrivaled by any preparation in the world.

THE RICH AND POOR.

Are liable to the same disease. Nature and Science have made the CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP for the benefit of all.

PURE BLOOD.

Produces healthy men and women; and if the constitution is neglected in youth, disease and early death is the result. Do not delay when the means are so near at hand, and within the reach of all.

CONSTITUTION LIFE SYRUP IS THE POOR MAN'S FRIEND, AND THE RICH MAN'S BLESSING.

Buy it, Take it, and be Cured. WILLIAM H. GREGG, M.D., Sole Proprietor, NEW YORK.

SOLD BY EVERY DEALER IN MEDICINE IN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

MORGAN & ALLEN, WHOLESALE DRUGGISTS, AGENTS, No. 46 CHEST STREET, NEW YORK.

SOLD WHOLESALE BY JOHNSON, HOLLOWAY & COWDEN, Philadelphia, Pa. GEORGE C. GOODWIN & CO., Boston, Mass. FULLER, FINCH & FULLER, Chicago, Ill. JOHN D. PARK, Cincinnati, Ohio. COLLINS BROTHERS, St. Louis.

EFFECT OF THE EXCISE LAW IN NEW YORK CITY.

"Guess'm all right—hic—for Sunday—hic. No need o' my—hic—goin' to New Jersey—hic. 'Ave a nice time t' ham w' th' old—hic—coman 'nd the babbies."

Robinson & Ogden, BANKERS, AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES, No. 4 Broad St., New York, (Two Doors from Wall)

POLLAK & SON Wholesale Manufacturers, 69 Broadway, New York, N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced rates.

Marvin's Patent ALUM AND DRY PLASTER, FIRE AND BURGLAR SAFES

E. REMINGTON & SONS, MANUFACTURERS OF Revolvers, Rifles, Muskets, and Carbines, Pocket and Belt Revolvers, Repeating Pistols, Rifle Cases, Revolving Rifles, Rifle and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Materials.

WARD'S PERFECT FITTING SHIRTS. Self-Measurement for Shirts. Printed directions for self-measurement, list of prices, and drawings of different styles of Shirts and Collars, sent free every where.

MUSICAL BOXES. Prices from one to thirty dollars. Sent by mail on receipt of the price, and charges for the freight.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS. And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARRISON'S EXPRESS, 60 Broadway.

I. E. WALRAVEN, IMPORTER AND DEALER IN CURTAINS, WINDOW-SHADERS, AND LINENS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

MAGIC LANTERN AND STEREOSCOPE. We are now receiving the most comprehensive and finest collection of glass views ever made in America.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO., 5-7 Broadway, 3 doors south of the St. Nicholas Hotel.

Dr. Foote's Advertisements. OLD EYES MADE NEW, without Spectacles, Doctor, 1120 Broadway, New York.

GILMORE & CO.'S CELEBRATED BAND INSTRUMENTS. EXTENSIVELY USED BY THE ARMY AND NAVY.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT. FOR PUBLIC EXHIBITIONS. Before-springs, Magic Lanterns, and Dissolving Views, with pictures from all parts, and of every interesting subject.

Meeks' Cabinet Furniture Warehouse. Removed to the new White Marble Building, No. 450 Broadway, between Fourth and Great Jones Streets.

POSTPONEMENT. THE UNITED STATES PRIZE CONCERT, To have been given at CROSBY'S OPERA-HOUSE on MONDAY, MAY 28th, 1866, will be postponed until MONDAY, JULY 9th, 1866, on which occasion HALF A MILLION DOLLARS IN PRIZES will be presented to Ticket-Holders, including ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS IN GREENBACKS.

THE POSTPONEMENT is an unavoidable necessity, not so much in consequence of the number of tickets yet sold as the positive necessity there is for a proper registration of those already disposed of, which has been delayed in consequence of the negligence and carelessness of a portion of our Agents in making their proper returns.

Table with 2 columns: Ticket quantity and price. Includes rows for 5, 10, 20, 50, and 100 tickets to one address.

In every case send the name and post-office address of each separate subscriber. Money, by draft, post-office order, express, or in registered letters, may be sent at our risk.

WIGGINS, BRADFORD & CO., 123 Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill.

The proprietors will donate to the Lincoln and Douglas Movement Fund $5000; also there will be $2000 reserved from the person drawing the $25,000 prize, for the same purpose.

Referees.—Hon. Major Dan. Mason, Ex-M.C., of Ind.; Hon. Ira J. Laysack, of Kansas; Hon. William Leffingwell, Lyons, Iowa; Hon. Joseph Koss, of Chicago; Hon. G. Graves Smith, of Miss.; Jacob Forsyth, Agt. M. & T. T., Chicago, Ill.; M. Krosberg & Co., Importers of watches, Chicago.

Proposals for inserting this advertisement are requested.

WATCHES, California Diamond Jewelry, and Chains at wholesale, suitable for Dealers and Speculators. Price-List sent by mail on application to LIONEL JACOBS, 177 Broadway, New York.

CEDAR GAMPHOR. In the best and cheapest MORTAR-GRINDERS. All druggists sell it nowadays. HARRIS & CHAPMAN, FARMERS, Boston.

Steinway & Sons' GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANO-FORTES

Have taken 25 First Prizes, gold and silver medals, at the Principal Fairs held in this country within the last ten years, and in addition thereto they were awarded a First Prize Medal at the Great International Exhibition in London, 1852.

That the great superiority of these instruments is now generally conceded is abundantly proved by the fact that Messrs. Steinway's "Acoustic, Impassioned, and perfect of construction" have been copied by the great majority of the manufacturers of both horizontal and upright pianos.

STEINWAY & SONS' PIANOS are the only American instruments exported to Europe in large numbers, and used in European concert-halls.

WAREHOUSES, Nos. 71 and 73 East Fourteenth Street, between Union Square and Irving Place, New York.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT. SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

FOR PUBLIC EXHIBITIONS. Before-springs, Magic Lanterns, and Dissolving Views, with pictures from all parts, and of every interesting subject.

SOMETHING NEW.

A SET OF ROCK-CRYSTAL JEWELRY, comprising BRACELET, PIN AND EAR-RINGS, $1 00. A FULL SET DITTO, comprising BRACELET, PIN, EAR-RINGS, NECKLACE, AND BRACELETS $5.

THE BOWEN MICROSCOPE. Magnifying small objects 500 times. Magnifies even anywhere for 50 CENTS, on Terms see $1 00.

UNION ADAMS, HOSIER, GLOVER, AND SHIRT MAKER, No. 637 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY.

PESTACHINE. It is the best comb for the hair, also an excellent dressing. Invented by Dr. BOOT, manufactured by JOHN SKINNER & CO., Springfield, Mass.; and sold by DENNIS BARNES & CO., New York.

MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY. To be found on each box and each piece of GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLE. All other goods of whatever name not having this mark, are worthless imitations.

PRINTING PRESS FOR SALE. One Taylor Double Cylinder, Five Columns, Table Distribution, Had 25x52. Price $2500.

MERWIN & BRAY, MANUFACTURERS AND WHOLESALE DEALERS OF ARMS AND AMMUNITION OF ALL KINDS. Sole Agents for the Ballard Revolver.

Economy is Wealth.

If you want the best-fitting, strongest, and most agreeable Paper Collar ever offered to the Public, don't fail to purchase the

PATENT REVERSIBLE PAPER COLLAR

MARCH BROS., PIERCE & CO., AGENTS, WINTHROP SQUARE, BOSTON.

THE UNIVERSITY OF IOWA
JUN 13 1866

THE REISSUE OF
HARPER'S WEEKLY
A
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Vol. X.—No. 494.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 16, 1866. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

His long life-march is ended,
His battles fought and won;
With solemn voices blended,
Of drum and bell and gun,
Lay him down
Whose renown
Is an unsetting sun.

The measured tramp of battle
Beats in his pulse no more;
He hears no more the rattle,
No heeds no more the roar,
Fixed within
By the din
On bloody fields of yore.

In him through years unslumbering
The early conflicts lay,
His great, still spirit keeping
The fight of Chippeway;
Lundy's Lane
Through his grain
Struck deeper than the bay.

And D'Ulton's towers within him,
And Cerro Gordo's height,
Like giants watched to win him
From life's small, creeping blight;
High and calm
In their psalm
He kept the way of right.

And Aztec halls repeating
His firm victorious tread,
Found in his spirit meeting
Fit for their mighty dead,
Weaker men
Ne'er again
Their influence round him shed.

In time when others faltered
Before the storm that blow,
His mighty soul unaltered
By error's specious view,
Stooped in vain,
With no strain
Stood up unmoved and true.

And he, in mercy loving,
Through weariness of years
Was kept unto the proving
Of hopes that knew not fears;
Gently then—
First of men—
He passed, and left us tears.

His long life-march is ended,
His battles fought and won;
With solemn voices blended,
Of drum and bell and gun,
Lay him down
Whose renown
Is an unsetting sun.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 16, 1866.

THE DUTY OF UNION.

DURING the last few months there have been enthusiastic meetings and passionate speeches in support of condemnation of Congress or the President. It has been confidently asserted that the difference would be referred to the people at the autumn elections, and they would authoritatively decide between the contestants. All this has seemed to us premature, for the reason that the points of dissent were not finally established. All that is clear is, that the President holds certain theories of the situation and Congress apparently others. But what Congress intended to propose under its theories was undecided, while nothing was more evident than that the President's logic was amazingly defective—and, to use a plain phrase, that his bark was worse than his bite.

A political canvass before an election must be conducted upon certain proposed measures, and not upon theories. A bank or no bank; a tariff or no tariff; the toleration or prohibition of slavery in a Territory; it is upon such intelligible measures that every body can comprehend that the great popular debates upon the stump are held and the popular decisions are made at the polls. Now the important question is, what are the differences in proposed measures between the President and Congress upon which the country is to be asked to decide?

That both honestly wish the restoration of the Union can not be doubted. That both have a theory as to the principle which should regulate that restoration is obvious. But until we know precisely what Congress proposes how can an issue be made for an election? The decision of the Senate caucus and the debate in the Senate foreshadow, indeed, the ground which Congress probably means to occupy. But is it so clear that the President will refuse to stand with them? Suppose that Congress proposes to disqualify certain rebel leaders for certain offices until two-thirds of each House remove the disqualification, and substantially to equalize representation by basing it upon voters, is it probable that the President, who has so constantly insisted upon making treason odious, and has suggested the very same amendment, will take the unnecessary responsibility of opposing so mild and generous a settlement? In making these propositions Congress will have yielded much to the desire of harmony with the Executive. Is the Executive to yield nothing?

It is true that the President may refuse all accommodation. He may insist that he has required all that is needed, all that is constitutional. He may declare that he will stand or fall without moving an inch from his present position. He has indeed virtually said as much. But he said it under other circumstances. He said it when it seemed as if Congress intended to occupy a position of uncompromising hostility. He said it before the mature decision of Congress had been declared. If after that declaration—after the wise, just, and moderate proposition which it would seem that Congress is prepared to make—the President should insist that the representatives of the loyal people are to have no voice in the settlement of the victory which those people have won, then the issue will indeed be made, and the final appeal taken to the country.

But surely all those who believe as we do, that the division of the Union party, and the consequent surrender of the Government of this country to a party controlled by the counsels of such leaders as ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, GEORGE H. PENDLETON, VALLANDIGHAM, and HORATIO SKYMOOR, would be incalculably disastrous to the cause of true liberty and civilization, will not passionately insist that such division, with all its consequences, is inevitable. Mr. WENDELL PHILLIPS, we observe, fortreadily desires that result. He prays that the Union party may be defeated. But its defeat is the resumption of power by ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS and his friends. Why does not Mr. PHILLIPS put it in the other way, and say that he fervently hopes for the success of those gentlemen? Mr. PHILLIPS did what he could to defeat Mr. LINCOLN in 1864 by chilling the public confidence in him. He declared LINCOLN recreant to liberty. He hopes now to chill confidence in the party that elected Mr. LINCOLN by a similar declaration. It must be remembered, however, that Mr. PHILLIPS's position is not partisan. He is a critic of all parties, and asks nothing of any. But all men who, like JOHN BRAYNE in England, believe that great political and social results are to be attained through party organizations, will, like him, while they declare equal rights to be the ultimate aim of their efforts, yet cordially work with any great party which shows the practical power to advance nearer to that bourse.

It is to secure the gains already made; to forestall the completion of the work of restoration to the bonds which defeated rebellion, that it is the imperative duty of the President, of Congress, and of all loyal men, to maintain the ascendancy of the Union party until its work is accomplished. Congress has evidently yielded much to this great result; and it remains for the President to decide whether the restoration of the Union which should be accomplished by an alliance of the late rebel leaders, of the Copperhead leaders, and of such individual recruits as Senator COWAN, would not be a reactionary reconstruction, sure to plunge us into further trouble. It would not be President JOHNSON and Senator COWAN who would control that alliance, but Mr. STEPHENS, Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, and Mr. PENDLETON. Whoever takes the responsibility of putting this Government into such hands will have a serious account to settle with the loyal American people.

THE MARTYR OF FORT MONROE.

THE strenuous effort of those who had no word of horror for the capture and massacre of Union soldiers at Andersonville and Belle-Isle to represent JEFFERSON DAVIS as the victim of cruelty at Fort Monroe have occasioned the publication of his bill of fare for a week, which has been widely published. There are thousands of honest people all over the land, who work hard for their living, who would be very glad of half as good fare as the Martyr of Fort Monroe daily enjoys. For those of our readers who may not have seen the list we quote a specimen:

WEDNESDAY.—Breakfast.—Rice and eggs, wheat and corn-bread, butter, sugar, coffee, milk. Dinner.—Mutton-chops, stewed oysters, potatoes, onions, apples, bread, butter, coffee.

THURSDAY.—Breakfast.—Beef-steak, two boiled eggs, wheat or corn-bread, butter, sugar, milk, coffee. Dinner.—Veal-cornets, poached oysters, potatoes, onions, bread, coffee, butter.

FRIDAY.—Breakfast.—Stewed oysters, mackerel, or fresh fish, wheat and corn-bread, coffee, sugar, milk, and butter. Dinner.—Pork-steak, poached eggs, potatoes, onions, bread, butter, coffee.

SATURDAY.—Breakfast.—Kittion-chops, two boiled eggs, bread, butter, milk, sugar, coffee. Dinner.—Stewed oysters, potatoes, onions, bread, butter, coffee.

This probably compares favorably with the daily bill of fare at Andersonville; but since there will undoubtedly be a persistent attempt to excite sympathy and even admiration for JEFFERSON DAVIS as a political prisoner suffering for an honest difference of opinion, it is as well to understand clearly precisely what his position is.

The odium that hangs around his name, and which will forever deepen, does not arise from the fact that he held abstractly the theory of State sovereignty and the constitutionally reserved right of secession; but that he and his fellow-conspirators chose to assert that doctrine at the cost of countless innocent lives and of the welfare of the country, not to remedy injustice or oppression for which there was no legal redress, but to perpetuate the foulest system of tyranny under the sun. Had DAVIS and his confederates appealed to God and mankind for the rectitude of their intention as revealed in the purpose of the war which they invoked—had they armed against the National Government in the name of vital State rights which that Government had denied—had they risen against an arbitrary power which was grinding them and their families, and trampling upon sacred, natural, and constitutional rights for which it refused a remedy—then, indeed, the last terrible appeal to blood, which only hopeless oppression authorizes, would have been justified, and their cause, however unfortunate, would have commanded the admiration and sympathy of the world.

It is idle to say that, holding secession to be a constitutional right, they might assert it at any time, and for any purpose which pleased them. When war is the cost of the practical assertion of any right it can be justified only by the fact of vital grievance for which there is no other redress, or by the purpose for which it is intended to exercise that right. That was the justification of our great revolution of 1776. But what is JEFFERSON DAVIS as the official representative of the rebellion of 1861? He is a man who deliberately plunged his country into the most fearful war, and flooded it with blood that he might whip women and sell children at his pleasure. His pretense was State sovereignty, his purpose was human slavery. That was the object for which he and the other leaders "fired the Southern heart." For this they directed the war. For this they starved brave men at Andersonville and Belle-Isle, tortured them into idiocy, and shot them like dogs. For this were Southern Union men seized at night, and before the eyes of their despairing wives and agonised children hung and shot and drowned. For this they drove thousands and thousands of conscripts to die upon the field of battle. For this JEFFERSON DAVIS's garments reek with innocent blood, and his name is a stench.

Here is a pretty martyr, with his ham and eggs and poached oysters! Here is a Christian hero; and General MILLS must be removed if he does not bow low enough! Here is a model American, who must be magnified into a Spielberg victim and sufferer of the Bastille if his muffins are not toasted, and his beef-steak is overdone! Our readers will bear us witness that we have not advocated vengeance, that we think the trial of DAVIS for treason a mistake, and that we are ready to take, with fair precautions, all the necessary and inevitable risks of the situation. But the mandarin sentimentality that would drape with the dignity of a martyr for political opinion a man who for such a purpose waged such a war we believe will disastrously recoil upon those who foster it. We have no wish to revive dead feuds or to use harsh words, but we can conceive no greater misfortune to the manhood of American youth than that they should be taught to regard JEFFERSON DAVIS as a guiltless and unfortunate patriot.

THE PAUSE IN EUROPE.

IT is natural that the great powers of Europe should pause upon the very edge of war and reflect if there be no alternative. It is so long since there was a general war upon the Continent, and every war has such inevitable horrors and so doubtful a conclusion, that it is not strange there is reluctance to strike the first blow. Once struck, there would be no recoil. Once begun, war could end only in a reconstruction of the map, and an enormous debt, weighing upon every belligerent with crushing force.

Yet we do not see that war can be easily avoided. If the considerations were merely dynastical, they could be settled in a Congress. But they are national, and involve the most absorbing passions. Italy will go into no Congress which does not accept the cession of Venice to the Italians as a preliminary. Yet Austria can not consent to relinquish Venice without fatally impairing her prestige as a great power. Prussia can not consent without some equivalent that France shall stretch her line to the Rhine; yet where is the equivalent that can be offered? The call of a Congress is wise, if only to show that no accommodation is practicable. Italy is inflamed already; GARIBOLDI has been summoned to the head of the volunteers. A large loan has been taken. The people believe their cause to be sacred. It has the sympathy of the world. The eager Italians believe the long looked-for hour is already striking. How can they pause? If the ministry order GARIBOLDI back to Capraia they must be ready to face an insurrection. Austria must therefore, as it seems to us, surrender the Italian portion of her empire or there must be war.

And if it comes and desolates Europe, let us learn its lesson. It is simply this, that any settlement of great political convulsions which is reactionary will very soon revenge itself upon those who make it by plunging them into deeper trouble. The English revolution of 1649 ended in the death of CROMWELL by the return of CHARLES II. and the old STUART régime. It was a reactionary settlement, and it ended eighteen years later by the menace of a vast war, which was avoided by the peaceful and "glorious" revolution of 1688 and a settlement which was not reactionary. The revolution of 1787 in France was finally composed by the settlement of 1815 which was reactionary. It was made in the interest of certain families, and not of the nations nor of the people of Europe. Consequently there have been discontents and dangers and overthrows until now, after fifty years, the settlement is to be changed either by a Congress, which is improbable, or by the sword.

In this country we are doing for the Union what the settlement of 1815 did for Europe. Let us take care that it be not reactionary like that, but in the direction of the war itself, like the glorious settlement of England in 1688.

WALL STREET SQUABBLES.

A FALL in Erie stock from 95 in January last to 57 last week has led to much angry comment in newspapers which sympathize with holders of stock. Some journals have fiercely denounced Mr. DANIEL DREW, the leading director of the concern, and have tried to make him responsible for the decline.

Now we have no desire to figure as Mr. DREW's apologist. He is old enough and able enough to take care of himself. But in a matter of this kind a little common sense is not out of the way.

It is on record that the earnings of the Erie Railway have fallen off half a million in the first four months of 1866; that the concern owes, exclusive of bonded debt, nearly four millions of dollars which it can not pay; and that no dividends can be paid for some years to come. Under these circumstances, for which no director of the concern is responsible, a decline in the stock would seem fully warranted. If any body is to be taken so task on the subject, why not assail Mr. BONNET H. BERDELL, the President, instead of this or that director?

But it is said that Mr. DREW is a speculator in the stock, and has made money on the decline. This may or may not be the case. We pretend to no information on the subject. Mr. DREW is well known as a large, bold, and generally successful operator in Wall Street. We presume he declines this to no one. As such he operates in all stocks, including the stock of the Erie Railway, of which he is a director. When he thinks it is going up he buys for the rise; when he thinks it is going down he sells for the fall. Whether he sold for the fall when the stock was 80 @ 90 no one but he and his broker know. If he did not do so, he neglected his business as a speculator. For it was clear to every one, three or four months ago, that a heavy fall in Erie was sooner or later inevitable. But to hold him responsible for that fall, simply because it is supposed that he foresaw it and acted upon his prescience, is on a par with holding an astronomer responsible for the occurrence of an eclipse.

The abuse of Mr. DREW emanates from cliques which have bought large quantities of stock for the rise, and are disgusted that the public do not step in to take them off their hands. The famous clique which bought up all the Prairie du Chien, and own it still, have lately bought all the floating New York Central at 93 @ 95, and are waiting for somebody to buy it of them at an advance. They are said to have lodged $2,500,000 with some bankers as margin on the operation, and so long as money remains easy they can go on buying stock and holding it indefinitely. Another clique has bought up all the Cleveland and Pittsburg, and are holding that, waiting, like MACAWHURK, for something to turn up which shall relieve them of their burden. Another clique have bought up all the Canton; another all the Boston Water-power; another all the Fort Wayne. All these cliques argue that the prevailing ease of money, which Mr. McCULLOCH has created, must sooner or later generate speculation in stocks, and lead the public to take their property off their hands at an advance. Thus far they have met with but poor success. With a brief exceptional period, money has ruled at 4 @ 5 per cent. for 40 days, but no general speculation has been developed in Wall Street. Commission brokers are doing little or nothing. The fall in Erie naturally confirmed the unwillingness of the outside public to buy stocks, and hence the abuse of Mr. DREW in newspapers which are devoted to the interests of the overloaded cliques.

Speculation may yet break out. The brokers all desire it from natural motives, and the public may yet possibly be lured into the arena. But the signs of the times are not favorable. Mr. McCULLOCH may play fast and loose, as he has done hitherto. But the people at large want a return to specie payments, and they will have it sooner or later. So long as that is impending speculations for the rise will be dangerous. The Opposition party will presently put a hard-money plank in their platform, and unless the Administration meet the move with a corresponding pledge, and evince some willingness to carry it out, it will be defeated at the elections. Smart as Wall Street is, and keenly as the old heads of that moribund scan the signs of the times, it is plain to the sun at noonday that until the paper dollar be worth a dollar in gold the tendency of prices, with periodical and spasmodic exceptions, must be downward, and speculators who operate for the rise must sooner or later be overwhelmed in ruin.

A CORRESPONDENT ANSWERED.

A WALL Street correspondent, referring to an article of last week entitled "Financing Extraordinary," asks several questions.

1. Is it a fact, as stated in that article, that somebody made three millions out of the Government on the sales of gold?

Answer.—Mr. PETER M. MYERS, Government broker, sold $32,000,000, or thereabouts, of Government gold at 130½ @ 130¼. All last week the price ranged at 126¼ @ 124½. Therefore the buyers of Government gold realized the difference between 130½ and say 124½, which on $32,000,000, is about $1,500,000 in currency.

2. Who bought the Government gold and realized this profit?

Answer.—Nobody can answer this question. The gold was bought chiefly in large lots, many of them a million each, by leading gold-dealers, who may have acted for customers, or may have bought for themselves. Nothing but an inspection of the books of the parties to whom the Government gold was delivered could determine the names of the real buyers.

3. Was it possible for any Government agent, knowing the purpose of the Department, and rightly construing the import of the news from Europe, to buy gold from Mr. MYERS so as to be sure of a profit?

Answer.—Mr. MYERS had his orders to sell at 130 clear of commission. He, and any persons to whom he may have imparted the secret of his orders, must have known perfectly well that as soon as he stopped selling the news of the London panic would drive gold up 5 @ 10 per cent. Buying gold from MYERS was therefore a sure operation, especially if he had sold ten or twelve millions. There is no evidence to show that any Government agent did take advantage of MYERS's orders, and speculate in gold. But there must have been

The Editors of Harper's Weekly is published by LEWIS PERRY, No. 120, Broadway, New York, with permission from Harper & Bros., N. Y. Telephone No. 114 for New York 122 licensed mailer in private. Issue of June 16, 1866. Vol. 6. No. 24

eral Government agents besides Myers who had an opportunity on that Monday afternoon of making a fortune at the expense of the Government.

4. Is Myers still the Government broker? and how came he to be selected for the post? Answer.—Mr. MYERS is still, so far as we know, the Government broker. His selection for the post is understood to have arisen from his being the brother-in-law of Secretary McCULLOCH.

THE PAID FIRE DEPARTMENT.

The question of a paid Fire Department in a large city no more admits of serious discussion than that of a paid police. There is no more efficient body of firemen in the world than the Fagin peopled, and although great fires are infrequent there, because the houses are not built as with us so as to insure destruction if they take fire, yet the management is admirably prompt, skillful, and decisive. The treatment of fires in our inflammable cities is serious work. To be properly done there must be a body of men ready to move and act at any moment. These men must be of independent circumstances or they must be well paid. To leave the labor to chance volunteers is to create a dangerous class in the community, as was fully established by the investigation which preceded the passage of the Paid Department Bill. There may be among them daring and skillful men, as the experience of fires in New York proves; but it is idle to suppose that they would be less daring or less skillful if their services were properly appreciated and rewarded. The laborer is worthy of his hire.

For our distant friends we may state that the opposition to the paid system proceeds from that interest in the city of New York to which we owe our enormous taxation and utter misgovernment. It is that interest of wholly venal and corrupt politicians which has made the name of the city a by-word still reproach, and which keeps it politically in alliance with all that is mean and un-American. It is a conclusive argument for the paid system that this interest bitterly denounced it, as it denounced the Police Commission and the Board of Health. If a man is known by his friends, great public measures are tested by their enemies. When FERNANDO WOOD was ready to oppose by force the introduction of the Police Board there was not an intelligent citizen who did not know that the Board was absolutely essential to the protection of the city. And when the "shysters" and "bunkers" of every degree are in full cry against the Paid Fire Department, its necessity and value are fully established.

THE FENIAN RAID.

THAT Ireland has real wrongs, and that the rule of that island by England has been generally fierce and stupid, can not be denied. But there is of late years a manifest disposition to reason and reform, and in so complicated a difficulty there can be no hope except in the greatest good sense upon both sides. The total forgetfulness of this fact has occasioned the recent wild and criminal efforts at Irish rebellion, so that it is the folly of the revolutionary leaders which is responsible for the constant delays and despairs of the English friends of Ireland.

While the Fenian movement was confined to Jones's Wood and the "Moffat Mansion" it was merely amusing, except for its mad waste of the hard-earned money of simple men and women. But when a rabble cross the border, and without artillery or supplies or trains begin to make war by murdering honest people who turn out to defend their homes, the affair ceases to be contemptible and becomes criminal, and the worst fate that should befall such offenders would excite little pity. Mr. O'MAHONEY is very probably a sincere enthusiast, as fit to lead a revolution as a blind man to command a seventy-four. Mr. STRANAHAN, there is no reason to doubt, is much of the same character; but many of the other managers are designing men who have fortunately disgusted many of their followers.

It is a poetic justice that Canada, which was a nest of the most malignant rebels during the late war in this country, and which smiled placidly at their forays and plots against the lives and properties of loyal American citizens, has been invaded by one of the very rebels whose confederates she so gladly harbored. The O'NEILL who figures in the late affray at the mouth of the Niagara River was a companion and friend of WIRE at Andersonville. He raised a body of Irishmen among the prisoners he was starving, to fight against this country. Canada cheered him on; Canada was polite to O'NEILL's comrades, CLEMENT CLAY and JACOB THOMPSON; O'NEILL was bravely fighting for "his country." Points of view differ, and Canada can now comprehend exactly how her conduct seemed to loyal American citizens.

The conduct of our Government in the whole affair has been prompt and honorable. There has been no simulated neutrality. General GRANT, passing by chance through Buffalo, is-seed the necessary orders. The directions from Washington were decisive, and were not delayed because of any untimely colic of the legal advisers of the Government, as in the case of the British counselor, whose stomach-ache allowed the Alabama to escape.

We hope that those honest people who are anxious to redress the wrongs of Ireland will now see that the road to that redress does not lie through the blood of innocent men in Canada. They have given their money, and have received in return a foolish blunder and a monstrous crime. Men of the O'NEILL kind are leaders who would infallibly bring the noblest cause to shame and ruin.

HEAT-FOOD AND BUILDING-FOOD.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly: "In your issue of May 19 I find an article on 'Heat-Food and Building-Food,' to which I wish to take exception.

"The author asserts it as a fact that fat and oily food is necessary to a proper nourishment of the body, and that those who abstain from it are apt to have a flabby and bloated skin. FRANKLIN, an eminent authority, says: 'Flesh off or fat is more difficult of digestion, and more obnoxious to the stomach, than any other alimentary principle.' Is it possible for it to be 'very difficult of digestion' and so 'obnoxious,' and at the same time necessary to health? Rather does not the experience of medical men (as well as our own business) teach us that that only is really difficult which we resist? Comparatively few are fond of fat meat. We are speaking now of persons in good health, not of those who, in these days of greasy and unwholesome food, are debilitated and debased.

Dr. BACON, in his celebrated experiments on St. Marks, found the gastric juice very slow in its operation on fat, and that it felt generally retarded the process of digestion. It is well known to be the cause of boils, pimples, and blotches on the skin.

"It is also stated that 'laboring men require more nitrogenous food than those who lead an inactive life, for there is in them more rapid necessary, and therefore more need of material for it. For this reason men that live almost wholly on such articles as potatoes or rice or plantains, which have comparatively little of the nitrogenous element in them, can not do or endure as much as those who have a proper mixture of meat and vegetables in their diet. So, also, a horse that is not worked will be in good condition living on hay and potatoes, but if he is worked he will soon feel unless grain be made a part of his food.' I am unable to perceive what the last sentence has to do with eating meat. I rather think it is an argument against it. A member of Congress can be cited to prove that hard-working men can subsist on vegetable alone with advantage. The concentration of the Tyrol may be named; and if the writer of 'Heat-Food,' etc., wishes to consult statistics, he will find not only that vegetables are noted for longevity, but that they are able to endure much greater hardships and fatigue than flesh-meat.

Laboring men, who suffer more of the wear and tear of life than those of sedentary occupations, require more 'protein' or 'building,' and therefore more nutriment. Wheat and rice are among the most nutritious substances known, yet wheat contains but a little over two per cent. of nitrogen, and rice less than one. The poor Irish, who relied almost entirely on milk, potatoes, and perhaps a few other vegetables, are a hardy and long-lived race.

The animal we eat are, as a general thing, herbivorous. Those which live exclusively on vegetables, and whose flesh is formed of the proteaceous elements of those vegetables, are most relished and sought for among civilized nations. It follows, therefore, that we actually eat indirectly on plants. Why, then, do we eat those plants in a pure and primitive state, and do no anything of the degrading influence of roasting the poor beast by whose help we obtain much of our food, and thus serve us as an immense amount of hard labor, besides adding to our comfort and wealth in furnishing skins for clothing and covering? Is it because of the disease and troubles arising from eating of flesh meat, the purity of which is always more or less impure by the state of the animal? Respectfully, VEGETARIAN."

The points brought out by "Vegetarian" are easily disposed of.

As to the digestion of fatty or oily substances, it has been discovered that this is not really done in the stomach. They are merely intimately mingled there with the other contents by the churning movements of the organ, and pass on into the small intestine. Here by the action of the pancreatic juice, the change is produced in them which fits them to be absorbed by the lacteals, and to be poured into the blood; in other words, here they are digested. Speaking of digestion, then, as a process which is not limited to the stomach, we are, in opposition to what is quoted from FRANKLIN and BACON, that fat is not difficult of digestion. The stomach, indeed, can not digest it; and the gastric juice, instead of being "very slow in its operation on fat," as BACON says, does not operate upon it at all, but the pancreatic juice does the work, and does it easily.

"Vegetarian" objects to enjoining the use of fat meat upon those who dislike it; that what is not relished is not easily digestible. It is indeed true that the relishing of food promotes its digestion; and yet one can generally learn to eat fat meat, even though the aversion to it be very decided. But if not, a due amount of butter may be eaten to make up for the deficiency. That a considerable proportion of oily food is necessary in some form is a settled fact. A wide observation teaches it. The instincts of men as to food show it. Nature demonstrates it in the matter that it furnishes in milk, that beautiful combination containing all the requisite elements of food. It is an error to say that fat "is well known to be the cause of boils, pimples, and blotches on the skin." An undue use of them may, it is true, sometimes produce these effects, but they come quite as often from other causes.

"Vegetarian," in thinking that what was said of the horse is an argument against eating meat, fails to perceive the point of the statement. The truth to be illustrated was that work, making war and labor, called for a larger amount of building or nitrogenous food than was needed in the idle. And so we give to the working horse grain, which, being more nitrogenous than hay and potatoes, is to him what the nitrogenous meat is to man.

As to the statistics referred to as favoring vegetarianism, we do not believe that if fairly examined they will justify the conclusions claimed for them.

We think that when good results have been ascertained to come from what is reputed to be a vegetable diet, it will be found that it was not strictly vegetable. One of the statements of "Vegetarian" shows a looseness on this very point. "The poor Irish," he says, "who subsist almost entirely on milk, potatoes, and perhaps a few other vegetables, are a hardy and long-lived race." Is milk a vegetable article of diet? A similar mistake was once committed by a student, who, on going into the country, gave up meat, and on his return was quite loath in praise of vegetarianism, because he had gained so much flesh and strength. On inquiry it was found that milk had been the animal basis of his vegetable diet. The Irishman living almost exclusively on potatoes, or the Chinaman on rice, inevitably becomes pot-bellied and slender-limbed; but let him have in addition milk or any other articles furnishing a due proportion of both nitrogenous and oily food, and his abdomen will lessen and his limbs enlarge to their normal volume.

"Vegetarian" thinks that as the flesh we eat comes mostly from herbivorous animals, we had better eat the vegetables from which their flesh is formed rather than eat the flesh itself. The same reasoning would properly lead us to stop further, and prompt us to go to the source of the nutrition of the vegetables; or, in other words, to what they eat by their roots to make them grow, so that we should be dirt eaters instead of vegetable eaters. "Vegetarian" does not seem to recognize the order of nature in regard to nutrition. All nutriment comes at first from the mineral world, and plants are the means of transfer from minerals to animals. They gather up material from mineral substances, and put it into such forms as make it fit nutriment for animals. There are some animals that live on this vegetable food alone, and are called herbivorous; while others live on the vegetable-eating animals, and thus get their nutrition one remove farther from mother earth, and are called carnivorous. Others still eat both animal and vegetable food, and are termed omnivorous. All animals but man are governed wholly by instinct in this matter. He is left to reason it out as well as he can, looking to the promptings of instinct, the adaptations of the digestive organs as compared with those of other animals, and the results of observation and experience. These all point to a mixed animal and vegetable diet, and not to that of the vegetarian.

HOME FOR SOLDIERS' ORPHANS AND WIDOWS.

Governor FLETCHER, of Missouri, and Dr. RICHARDSON, the State Surgeon-General, most warmly commenced the project of the Home for Soldiers' Widows and Orphans, at St. Joseph, in that State. Missouri suffered severely and peculiarly during the war, and the natural sympathy of other Union States has been expressed in many valuable and useful contributions. There is still room for more, and we are very confident that such a charity commends itself without special eulogy. Mr. GILES, one of the trustees, is now in the city, at the Lafayette House, and will receive any contributions or give any information.

LITERARY.

"Armedale" is the title of WELKIN COLLINS'S new novel, just published by the HARRIS. The characteristics of the author are as pronounced and familiar as those of any living writer. He gives us always an elaborate and original plot, worked out by persons whose characters are analyzed with a delicacy of detail entirely unsurpassed. They reveal themselves wholly to the reader, who watches every motive and act as the student of physiology follows with intense interest the play of every part of the wonderful human frame. Or he puts a microscope under our eyes through which we watch with eager curiosity the exact structure of animalcules which are interesting solely from the distinctness with which they are revealed. This patient and persistent detail makes every one of COLLINS'S novels seem like a course of lectures. His books have the reality of exciting criminal trials, and there is perhaps no novelist who so plays with and prolongs the curiosity he excites. The despatch he delineates, as in the character of Miss Gwilt in "Armedale," is startling, but he vindicates its probability, and the reader emerges from the long and dark suspense of the story upon the cheerful conclusion as the traveler, after a stormy and exciting voyage at sea, sees the placid green shores of the sunny harbor awaiting him.

"The New York Social Science Review" is a quarterly journal of Sociology, Political Economy, and Statistics, edited by SCARUS BRUCE and J. K. H. WILCOX. It is a work of faith and enthusiasm, proposing, "without personal or partisan feelings, to examine by the light of science the political and social evolutions of the day." It will also reprint all important State documents of the current quarter. The last number contains a valuable International Almanac, and the "Review" will doubtless be a convenient and serviceable reference, as well as a stout advocate of scientific social progress.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

May 10: In the Senate, the reconstruction resolutions were then taken up. The third clause, disfranchising the rebels till the year 1875, was withdrawn and by a unanimous vote.—The Railroad Bill was passed, 39 to 23. This Bill provides that any railroad may carry all passengers, troops, mail, Government supplies, etc., from one State to another, providing that this act shall not affect any stipulation made between the Government and any railroad company now existing.

In the House, the new Freedmen's Bureau Bill was passed, 66 to 23.

passed, and that a joint committee of seven Senators and nine Representatives be appointed to represent Congress at the funeral of the late Lieutenant-General. The resolution was adopted.—The Reconstruction resolutions were taken up, the pending question being a substitute for Section 3, already stricken out. It does not restrict outrages, but shuts off all those from holding a civil or military office, either under the United States or any State, who have borne their arms in rebellion, or who aided the rebels, in being guilty of insurrection or in aiding the rebellion. Mr. DODDIE opposed the section. It was adopted by a vote of 39 to 18.

In the House, the Senate's amendments to the House Bill to facilitate commercial, postal, and military communication among the several States were taken from the member's table and considered. The bill has, therefore, passed both Houses.—The House resumed the consideration of the bill to promote the construction of a line of railroad from Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, to Cleveland, Ohio. The bill was passed by a vote of 77 to 41.—The concurrent resolution providing for an adjournment until Monday, and for a adjournment of Congress to attend the obsequies of General Grant, was agreed to unanimously.—The bill authorizing the construction of a railway between Washington and the North-west was passed—yeas 29, nays 27.

CHOLERA IN QUARANTINE.

On the 26th of May the British steamer Onion, from Liverpool, G. H. Palmer commanding, arrived at this port. She had on board the passenger ship, Onion, from Liverpool. She had on board several ill persons, some of them very low. The number of passengers was 214. The next day the Onion, from Liverpool, arrived with 100 passengers, of whom 25 had died of cholera on the passage, 25 were on board sick.

The Board of Health, unable to obtain a lodgment for a hospital on Long Island or Staten Island, are anxious to make use of the west shore of Jersey Island for this purpose.

Under date of June 5, Dr. Bland, Deputy Health Officer, reported that 26 new cases of cholera had been received from the steamer Onion on board the hospital ship in the Lower Bay, and 13 deaths had occurred.

The Deputy Health Officer reports that "something must be done soon, or the mortality among the passengers of the Onion will amount to that of any vessel ever in this port." "The hospital," he adds, "is now much overcrowded. Every available space on the ship is occupied with dead and dying." The Quarantine officer on the Onion writes: "The old Onion is as full as she can be of the worst cases of cholera I ever saw in my life."

There are now seven hundred persons crowded together on these ships in our harbor, and the Health Officer states that some of them have very naturally complained by force to break out from their boarding lodges, and that a mutiny is likely to occur at any time. Dr. Bland has publicly stated to the Board of Health that if another ship with diseased passengers arrives he has not a place in which to put a patient!

THE FENIANS INVADE CANADA.

On the 1st of June a few hundred Fenians, of the Fenian persuasion, crossed the border into Canada and captured Fort Erie—which is about as much of a fort as Fort Lee—a small village, located on the Niagara River, opposite Black Rock, three miles distant from Buffalo. A battle was fought at Ridgeway on the 2d. The Fenians found it impossible to hold their ground in Canada, and retreated to the United States border, where a large portion of them were captured by the United States troops guarding the river. Among those captured, it is said, are Colonel O'NEILL—the leader of the invading force—with his staff.

NEWS ITEMS.

Colonel Jacques, of Illinois, having been tried on the indictment found against him in Kentucky for rape, has been triumphantly acquitted. None of the witnesses mentioned on his behalf were examined, but the case was decided on the testimony of the prosecution without a word of argument from the counsel for the defendant. The Indianapolis Journal says:

"The wretches who undertook to swear Colonel Jacques into the penitentiary succeeded in convincing the jury that they were a grand pack of liars, and so completely demolished themselves that no testimony was needed on behalf of the accused. He was prepared to prove, by some of the best men in Illinois, that he was in that State at times when some of the witnesses testified to his presence in Kentucky, and his participation in the alleged crime; and by others that he was in this city on a certain day in which it was sworn by a prosecuting witness he was in Kentucky; but the proof was unnecessary.

The weekly report of Dr. Eliza Harris, Registrar of Vital Statistics, shows a total of 593 deaths in the city during the week ending on Saturday, the 26th inst. This number is less than on any previous week.

General Steadman and Fairbanks, who have been investigating the management of the Freedmen's Bureau in Georgia, will report favorably on Tillson's administration of affairs.

The returns of the West Virginia elections indicate a majority ranging from eight to twelve thousand for the amendment to the State Constitution. The last of the amendment is as follows: "No person who, since the 1st day of June, 1861, has given or shall give voluntary aid or assistance to the rebellion against the United States, shall be a citizen of this State, or be allowed to vote at any election held therein, unless he has volunteered into the military or naval service of the United States, and has been or shall be honorably discharged therefrom."

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE WAR ON THE PLATE.

In March, after a delay of nearly ten months, active operations were again commenced. The allied fleet, composed of about thirty vessels, including four iron-clads, left its moorings at Corrientes, and proceeding up the river, anchored in two divisions opposite the Territory of the Republique Paraguaray. The allied army, consisting of about 30,000 men of all arms, also advanced toward the western bank of the River Parana.

In an engagement with the fort at Itapira, a Brazilian iron-clad, about the last of March, received a serious injury, and 24 men were put hors de combat a serious injury.

On the 19th of April the first battle was fought between Brazilian and Paraguayan soldiers. The Imperial force alone having taken possession of a small island in front of Itapira, and about half way across the river, the Paraguayans attempted to dislodge them, and being rebuffed a force of about 300 men in 20 canoes, paddled steadily across the channel and landed a little before dawn close to a battery of nine rifled guns recently erected by the Brazilians; the pickets, however, saw them in time, and having given the alarm, the garrison, consisting of nearly the same number of men as the enemy, were quickly formed in line of battle, and as the Paraguayans drew into the Brazilians poured a murderous volley into their ranks and following it up by a battery charge, drove them to the beach, killing over 200 of them, taking 64 prisoners, 20 canoes, and 120 muskets. The Brazilian loss is reported as 43 killed and 128 wounded.

On April 27 another battle took place. The allied army, 18,000 strong, had invaded Paraguay. The Paraguayans attacked them with considerable bravery and great intensity, as usual, but only brought 5000 men to the field, who were completely routed, losing two pieces of artillery, one flag, a great number of muskets, and about 400 men killed and wounded. The Brazilian loss was 40 killed and 200 wounded. Itapira was then abandoned by the Paraguayans.

THE GERMAN QUARREL.

At the latest advice the German question was still unsettled, nor was any thing definite known concerning the proposed Congress. Meanwhile, peace demonstrations on a large scale were taking place in Prussia, and serious disturbances were reported, occasioned by calling out the reserves. In Italy the war spirit was enthusiastic and general. Volunteers were flocking by thousands to take their part in the war for the liberation of Venice.

Notwithstanding rumors current, the Springer Post says the marriage of Princess Helena, with Prince Christian will take place on the 25th of July.

WINFIELD SCOTT.

SCOTT'S DEAD-BED.—[DRAWN BY THOMAS HART.]

ODE BY A BROOKLYNITE.

She came like a beautiful vision
To brighten the night of my care,
Her dress was arranged with precision,
In ringlets descended her hair.
In a stage on its way to the ferry
We met, as is usual, by chance;
'Neath the spell of her glances my very Soul sank into amorous trance.
Alas! how by rude fate are banished
Illusions we'd willingly nurse!
I started—my vision had vanished,
And so had my watch and my purse.

IN DISGUISE.

"What's the matter with your head, Cato?"
"Berry obligin' for massa to ask. Burnt um, sah, totin a kettle o' cruller fat for Dinah, but Miss Mira put some salve on it, done it a heap o' good. Eber's so berry kind to ebery body, is Miss Mira."
"Yes, kind to ebery one but me. I thought that as I rode through the gate Cato held wide open, and, dismounting, bang him the reins; kind to the servants in the kitchen; the dog who came limping to the door; to buggar and wandering tramp; to guest, and kin, and stranger; to ebery body and ebery thing but me—to where she should have been kindest of all; for I loved her, loved her as men love who only love once in their lives. Even then my heart was beating furiously to feel myself so near her. My step quickened, I bang the door wide open and strode in. I heard my aunt cry, 'It's Paul!' I heard my uncle utter the same words pleasantly, and a furious, tumultuous larking and leaping told me that Nep had awakened from his nap upon the rug to greet his master. In a moment more the red light of the open fire had flashed upon me, and I grasped two plump old hands.
"Really we were anxious about you!" cried my aunt. "We expected you yesterday. How is your mother, and why didn't Nina come with you?"
"Then, before I could answer, my uncle said, 'Just in time for dinner, my boy. Let's talk it over at the table. Why, Mira, any one would fancy you did not see your cousin.'
"I'm sure he's large enough," said Mira, counting her stitches as she sat at crocheting work. "How are you, Paul? I told them you'd come back again, like a bad penny."

I nodded carelessly, and stooped to pat the fawning dog, begging mutely for a caress. Poor comfort it was, yet, after all, some little, to know that Mira never guessed how much I cared for her. I was as careless in my manner to her as she was to me. I imitated her as thoroughly as good-breeding would allow in one of my sex, and said again and again, "At least, I can take the secret to my grave with me. The girl shall not triumph, as she would, in my pain."
I had whistled Nep out of the room, and followed my old uncle to the dining-parlor. I suppose no one could have guessed that I was any thing but happy as I chatted of my journey and gave Nina's excuses for absence. "She is to be bridesmaid for a friend," said I; "and there are dresses to be made, and I know not what to do, before the day arrives."
"Who is the bride?" asked my aunt.
"Lilla Newcome."
"And you the bridesmaid, eh?" chirruped Mira.
"I?"
"Why, we heard you adored Lilla."
"I've always admired her."
"And she has jilted you?"
"Not so bad as that."
"Let me sympathize with you."
"Not at all; there are other pretty Misses in the world."
I said that because Mira was as dark as any Cato.

"A blonde? Hear him, aunt. Had I yellow hair and blue eyes I'd have the grace to admire brunettes."
"We can't help our fancies," said I, who absolutely disliked light coloring.
"Of course not; now, if you were not fair."
"Well?"
"I'll tell you how I admire dark men."
"Don't stop for that. I shouldn't care."
Her black eyes danced. "You'll see my idea of perfection to-night," said she. "Captain Earnly."
"I have seen the gentleman."
"By-the-way, I promised to play something for him to-night," said Mira, "and if I don't practice I shan't be able to remember it. Excuse me, will you, good folks?" and away she tripped, leaving us in the midst of dessert.
Captain Earnly did call that evening, and she played for him, and sang with him. He told her stories of his prowess as a soldier, and she was wondrously interested. He mentioned his wounds, and she pitied him with voice and eyes. I thought him an affected coxcomb. She evidently considered him a hero of the first water.
I sat on the porch without the window, smoking and chatting with my uncle. Once or twice I thought of the Spartan boy's fox gnawing and tearing at his bottom. So my love tore me, and so I hid it—better to die of it than have it seen.
She was not my cousin by blood, that dark-eyed Mira—only my uncle's adopted child. No tie of relationship stood between us, for though cousins we had I scarcely think they ever loved very truly. She was the very realization of my dream of girlish beauty. She was ebery thing I had ever hoped to see; and when coming back from that long journey, in which I had well-nigh "put a girl's record about the world," I found her altered from a romping child to what she was. I knew my fate was sealed; and for a little while she had been so kind to me that I had been made a fool of.
It was very different now. She had banded up Cato's black hand. She sighed over the black-haired Captain's striped scratches. Yet six months before I had been wounded nearly unto death by an accident, and her first greeting on my convalescence was, "You careless wretch, the only wonder is you didn't manage to cut your arm quite off, and make a fright of yourself for life! I've no patience with people who can't look where they are going. You'll break your back yet, and end your days in a wheel chair."

"Let me keep the use of my feet at least, so long as I am to dwell within reach of your voice," said I; and we passed for a couple of unobtrusive jesters.
Sometimes, in my character of cousin, I used to act as Mira's escort. Odd enough it was to see how tired she grew of me. How any stranger seemed better company than I. And some day, when she had been wooed and won, perhaps by the Captain biding over her at the piano, I should shake hands and utter some careless congratulation, and she would nod adieu to me, and we should part forever. Strange enough, all of it, when I remembered how I actually felt toward her.

The Captain was going. He had looked at his duty watch. "Shocking to think how late it was—How lightly falls the foot of Time that only treads on flowers!" and, with a quotation and a bow and a glance at Mira, the room was empty of him. It was a relief to me.

Mira had resumed herself at the piano. I snatched in and sat near her. "Will you sing something for me?" I asked. "This sweet old thing for instance?" and I tossed "Love No" upon the piano.
"Sweet old things are tiresome, and I am tired," said Mira; and if she could have read my soul she could not have blushed more deeply. Perhaps she was thinking of the Captain.

"If you could only hear Nina's friend, Miss Deane, sing that," said I, affecting to yawn.
"Another blonde?"
"A lovely one."

"Ah!" and laughing she arose, and going out upon the porch gathered two or three rose-buds. Not because she wanted them, I think, but merely in a idle mood. As she passed me afterward one dropped from her bosom at my feet. I left it lying there, but came back with slippered feet an hour after to find it, and kiss it, and sleep with it against my heart. A silly, romantic thing for a man of thirty to do. Yet I did it nevertheless.

So ended my first evening at Oakdell. I had hoped for nothing else, yet always I felt a new pang. I wondered why I came there so often, as I looked at the summer sun rising over the distant hills next morning, and vowed, as I had vowed before, never to come again.

My uncle was busy with rod and line as I entered, and we were to pass a long, bright day beside the trout streams. At four Cato was to drive the ladies down, and we were to go home together in the carriage. Despite my resolution I found myself anxious for their coming as the day wore on, and when, with the sound of wheels, my uncle cried, "That's Mira's laugh!" my heart beat at the sound of the musical ripple, and I forgot the rod I held entirely. I can see it yet, the mountain stream spanned by a rustic bridge beyond the tiny waterfall, amber and green where it caught the sunlight. About us mighty trees, making a nook dark and solemn as a Druid temple, and on the other side of the bridge a white road, winding ribbon-like away, up which the carriage came, whirled toward us by two ebony horses.

They had brought some one with them. A young farmer, beardless and gruff of voice. Certainly not my superior in any way. Yet how attentive Mira was to him! How pleasantly she listened to his account of his last fishing-excursion! When he called across to me:
"Had 'y luck?"
She answered for me.
"Of course not, cousin Paul never catches any thing or shoots any thing. Basket and game-bag are both inevitably empty."
"How, how! Now that ain't true, is it?" roared the farmer.
"I shan't contradict a lady," said I.
"We'd I would if she said that to me," said the gentleman. "She couldn't though; I always see lack. Haw, haw!"

I flushed scarlet. Certainly it is no crime to fall in catching a fish or shooting a bird; but no man likes to have his failings in these particulars remarked upon by a girl, who evidently despises him for them, in the hearing of a roaring lust who prides himself upon his skill, and that day my basket was empty indeed.
I hung my rod away in a few moments and wandered into the woods. Mira's laugh followed me for a long while. Now and then the coarse howl, haw! of her companion. Even to such a brute she was complaisant. I ground my teeth and kicked innocent pebbles mercilessly, and was muttering savagely to myself when a jovial "Hallo, Paul!" fell upon my ear, and before me stood Ben Hillgrove. Black-eyed, merry, water-loving Ben, who seemed to be always in a boat, just going to step into a boat, or just stepped out of a boat, when he was not on board his yacht.

"I've been looking for you, Paul!" he cried. "Some of my college friends, the best fellows you ever met, are going out in the Natty Hillgrove to-morrow; you must come with us. You shan't say no, as you always do. I'll not listen to it."
"I intend to say yes, and thank you," said I, quickly; and Ben tossed up his cap. I could have tossed mine also in my joy at being so readily provided with an excuse to run away from Mira, laughing at me with her beehive secret.

"We go on board to-night at nine, and have supper in the cabin," said Ben. "You'll be there?"
"Yes," I said.
"Good-by until that time, then," said Ben. "You know where she lies? I thought so. Don't fail," and he was off like a shot.

They were waiting for me when I returned to the river-side. Miss Mira and her escort chose to taze me about my long delay. It was all of a piece with the rest. I stung her back a retort that sounded merry enough, and climbed to a seat beside Cato. It was a pleasure to take the reins from his hands and drive the horses home at their full speed. The heading race did me good. Once there I hastily repeated Ben's invitation. "But you are not going?" said my aunt. "You've but just come to us."

"I can not refuse Ben this time," I said; "indeed I can not, aunt."

"Why should you, my boy?" asked my uncle.
"Why indeed, mamma?" said Mira. "Imagine the luxury of living a week in an atmosphere of smoke and whisky, afar from civilized society!"
"Pretty high parties some o' them yachting crew," said the farmer. "Every one to his taste, though."

"No," say I. "I leave you to keep each other company," I answered, and left Mira and her Orson together.
At nine I was as merry as the rest in Ben Hillgrove's pretty cabin over a supper that would not have disgraced Delmonico's.

At dawn the yacht was on her way, as graceful and fair a thing as sailed the waters.
Had we too much smoke and whisky aboard? Were Ben and his crew not after all the sailors they thought themselves? I can hardly answer. I was conscious with suppressed emotion, ready for any wild excitement. The rest were reckless, merry, high-living young fellows all of them. I only remember this positively. We had three days of calm, bright weather, then a storm began to gather; we went on deck to watch it, we admired the sky and sea, and rejoiced in the excitement of the tempest. We were at supper when it was at its worst that night. Later, every man save Ben and the sailors was in his berth.

I slept soundly. I was awakened by some one shaking me by the shoulder.
"Who's that?" I cried.
"I, Ben. The Jeany is sinking, Paul! Can you swim?"

"Yes."
"So can every one on board. There's a chance for us. God grant no harm may come to you! It would seem my fault. I induced you to come."

The merry fellow was serious as a deacon now. I grasped his hand and went on deck; strange, startled faces that I hardly recognized looked pale in the flickering lantern light. One, a young fellow of twenty, stood close to me.

"I don't fear death, I hope," he said, turning to me. "I'm no more a coward than most men; but there's a girl at New Haven who'll take it hard, I'm afraid, if this is the last of me—and no boat can live in such a sea. I'd like to see her once again;" and his voice choked into a husky whisper and he turned away.

It gave me no comfort to know that Mira would not grieve for me.
We took to the boat in a blinding, howling tempest. Half an hour after the yacht went down. I remember nothing else.

"He's a comin' to."
"Lord be praised. I thought he was gone!"
"Be ye better, Mister?"

I opened my eyes. I was lying upon the sea-board in the light of dawning day. Some roughly-clad, weather-beaten people were beside me. One held a flask of liquor to my mouth. I remembered all in an instant, and feebly gasped, "Where are the rest?"

"Your mates?" asked a man.
"Yes—my friends."
"Don't tell him," whispered a woman, and I knew the worst. An hour later I saw the three who had been tossed on shore with me lying decently cared for in a fisherman's shanty. Ben, with his black eyes closed forever. The youth who had spoken of his sweet-heart, and a young Virginian who had seemed the merriest of all. I am not ashamed to say I wept as I bent over them. Those about me, used as they were to the perils of the sea, seemed to feel grieved and heart-stricken.

"They're all so young, you see," sobbed an old woman—"mother's boys, no doubt, every one of them!"

And now, as I grew stronger, I felt it my duty to hasten back to Oakdell, bearing the sad news. A train passed through the village at noon, and I availed myself of it. The moon was rising when it stopped at the familiar station, and I started on foot for my uncle's home, wondering, if some survivors had not already brought the news, how I could break it to Ben's old mother.

The house was unusually dark as I approached; no light in the parlor, none in the library. The gloom which wrapped it told me that the news had come. As I opened the gate softly I heard Cato's voice.
"Yes, Dinah, it's true 'nuff. De gentleman knows de odor heat went down. We shan't neither see Massa Paul until we goes to Glory."
Then black Dinah sobbed.
"Missus takes it berry hard, don't she?" asked Cato.

"Gone to bed—won't eat nor nuffin'," said Dinah. "She loved Massa Paul like her own son. Oh, dis is a dreadful world, Cato!"

"Can't hab no kids, Dinah," said Cato, piously. "Oh get out wid growin'!" said Dinah. "Tears you can't hab nuffin'. I wonders folks was born jes for trouble."

I stole past the kitchen window and into the house. All dark and silent on the lower floor. Only at the end of the hall, in a little room called mine, I saw the glimmer of a lamp. I went toward it. I pushed the door further ajar and looked in.

In the middle of the room, upon the floor, sat Mira. Nep stood beside her, and her face was hidden in his shaggy coat. Both arms were about his neck, and she was talking to him. I listened.

"Oh, Nep!" she sobbed. "It can't be true, can it? The blue eyes shot, and the fair hair all wet and dank at the bottom of the sea? The voice dumb, and that great heart still? It's a dream, Nep! He'll come back yet! It is a wicked lie, Nep!"

The dog gave a sort of low moan. I retreated still. "Oh no!" I heard her say. "It's folly to hope. You are happier than I, Nep. He loved you and he cared nothing for me. He patted you on the head when you parted. He left you with a sneer. He didn't know I loved him as well as you, Nep, though not so humbly. Oh, Paul! Paul! can you be dead? You, my life, my love, my darling!"

She sprang to her feet, wringing her hands. I pushed the door wider. The creaking of the hinges startled her; she turned and screamed,
"Oh, Paul! Paul!"

Then the red blood rushed to her face, and her voice rang out,
"You? I thought it a ghost. So you are not drowned! Reserved for another fate which shall be nameless. I hope you are content, now you've nearly frightened mamma to death. Go and repeat yourself at once, Sir?"

Go? Nay, no place for me but at her feet. I knelt there humbly. I caught her hand, I kissed it. Her dark face grew proud and cold.
"You shall not pretend to hate me any longer," I said. "It is useless, Mira; I've been beside the door too long."

"And heard a little play acted for your benefit," she answered. "I heard you coming, and— Yes, Sir, I did—don't insult me by doubting that—"

She broke down and burst into tears. She struggled passionately, but I held her tight. Humbled by her humiliation, I told her all. My love, my longing, my pain at her coldness. The anguish the belief that she cared nothing for me had given me so long. And at last the struggle ceased, the head dropped low upon my shoulder, and I held Mira to my heart, and kissed her fondly, for she was mine, and I here until death parted us.

Then she left me to break the news of my safe return to the old people.

Those who had been saved had told of the fate of the other boat, and there was no need of my telling the truth to Ben's mother. I had only to tell her where his body lay. Three were sad days for me despite my own happiness. But they passed, and were half-forgotten, as other woes may be so quickly, before, her bridesmaid duties being over, Nina came to us from the city. She saw Mira and myself walking hand in hand and smiled. An hour after, when the girls had been shut up together in their room, she came to me.

"I'm so glad, Paul!" she said.
"Thank you, darling."
"It is meet for Mira's sake. I know she loved you, Paul."

"Did she tell you so?"
"No; she told I saw it."
"And never spoke to me?"

"Paul, one woman's secret should be holy to another, and I never guessed you loved her."
And so that girl of sixteen had read the heart of the other girl a fortnight while it was a blank to me; and the two had kept the secret that was my very life from me, not guessing mine.

And seeing each other daily we had yet only looked upon masked faces, and, taking lives for life and pride for scorn, had worked ourselves mad with grief, and we might have joyed for these days, and months, and years.

I thought of that when I next took Mira's hand in mine. I thought of it when I stood with her at the altar. I think of it often now, though I have called her wife so many years that, looking out upon the lawn, I see a younger Mira walking with her lover in the twilight—a Mira who calls my Mrs "mother."

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS ANNA WARNER,
Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER V.

As yet so bright morning hour crept on, and for a while nobody spoke. Mrs. May sat still and silently, a glance only at the children now and then telling where her thoughts were at work; and Clever, too, broke off her thread and passed it through the eye of her needle, and wrought a bar overhand seam with noiseless, patient industry. As for Lily she had quitted the subject of seeds and gardens, with the difficult questions of hard, half-hard, and tender; and now gave all her attention to a fringe of long icicles that hung glittering in the sun from the top of the low window. The new world was very bright that morning—clear, cold, and yet with a certain mingling of the softness of spring with the splendor of winter that was very charming. Chick-a-dees whistled about among the leafless branches in utter glee and good-humor; hopeful song-sparrows turned up their long snooded voices; and the gray cat on the fence watched them both, her teeth chattering with eager desire instead of the cold. Mat, the rough Skye terrier, was out for an airing, and sat in very contemplative mood on the gravel-walk—perhaps musing what had become of the snow.

All this while little Princess sat still, with her head against her mother's knee, and her eyes fixed on one particular half page of the Catalogue. At last, with a long breath, she looked up.
"Mamma, if you'd just tell me about the seeds things, and the half-hardy things, and all that, I could understand it in a minute. But it puzzles me so!"

"You're to study the Catalogue, Priss," said Lily. "Mamma, only do just look at these things!"

"I've been studying the Catalogue," said Princess; "and it says, 'Hardy annuals are those that may be sown very early in the spring in the open ground.' I think I understand that. And another flower the first season, and these other things—annuals—don't; I understand that too. But why won't the half-hardy ones endure frost?"

"Pussy goes and sleeps all night in the barn," said Mrs. May; "could you keep warm there?"
"No indeed, mamma."
"And suppose your aunt Kate should put her cuntry out to roost with the chickens?"

"Why, I think it would freeze to death before morning," said Primrose.

"Yes, for it is tender; but the chickens are hardy. And Puss is hardy, and so is Mat. Look at him—a few minutes ago he lay here by the fire, and now he sits out there in the cold wind without even a sign of great-coat or mittens."

"Mat in mittens!" said Prim, with a laugh.

"But I think he has a great-coat—dear old Mat!" said Lily; "only it's more shaggy than any man's coat."

"It is just the same that he wore here by the fire," said Mrs. May. "But he is hardy—he can bear the cold."

"And you're half-hardy, and must be wrapped up," said Lily.

"Yes, and just so it is with plants. Some are perfectly hardy, and the frost can do them no harm."

"Those are the great strong plants, I suppose," said Lily—"the trees and bushes."

"Not always," said her mother. "Some trees will die in our Northern winter, while the little daffodil pushes its soft leaves right up through the frozen ground, in the midst of snow and ice and bitter winds. It is something in the nature of each plant, something derived from its native soil and air that makes it hardy, or half-hardy, or tender."

"What do you mean by its native soil, mamma?" said Clover, laying down her work.

"Are plants of different nations too, like people?"

"Certainly," said Mrs. May; "and with strong national differences. Geraniums, for instance—the green-house pelargoniums, which we call geraniums—with their glowing colors and rich leaves, are native Africans; they grow in tropical heat, where long creeping vines make ladders up and down the cliffs for the wild monkeys."

"Geraniums and monkeys?" said Lily; "oh, splendid!"

"Mamma," cried little Primrose, "how lovely it must be!"

"Not very—the monkey part of it," said her mother, smiling. "For indeed they are many of them not true monkeys but large baboons—very ugly and very mischievous."

"How large, mamma?" said Lily, who had a great weakness for every thing like a monkey.

"Some as large as a mastiff, and much stronger—of a dark brown color, with black heads and feet, a violet-bird face, and gray whiskers."

"What objects!" said Lily, laughing.

"And the geraniums, mamma?" said Clover.

"They just help to set off the strangeness and ugliness of the monkeys. In the mountains about the Cape of Good Hope, among the heights and passes, the cliffs are covered with wild creepers; the long trailing stems and runners making a complete net-work. Not a net-work of bare stems, but all hung with rich foliage and brilliant flowers; and scattered here and there among them is a wilderness of geraniums and other superb tropical plants."

"What a nice time the baboons must have!" said little Primrose, giving a sigh to the geraniums.

"A very nice time! You can see them in troops of four or five hundred, sitting on the rocks, or climbing up and down the perpendicular cliffs by means of these 'monkey ladders' like so many boys in a wild school of gymnastics."

"And they're all 'tender,' I suppose," said Clover—"the geraniums and the monkeys and their leaders and all."

"All tender—not one could bear our winter climate; while, on the other hand, we and our violets and snow-drops could as little endure the fierce heat of South Africa."

"Then plants and animals are tender or hardy just according to the heat of the land they belong to," said Clover.

"Very much so. The coconut-tree and the palm will not grow here in the open air, nor our apple and cherries in South Africa or New Zealand. The parrots never come to our northern States, even in summer, while the little snow-bird wings its way to the very shores of the Arctic Sea and there builds its nest."

"How beautiful it is, mamma!" said Clover.

"Hardy, half-hardy, and tender—the words have such a new meaning to me now. The birds that stay here all winter are hardy, and so are the squirrels, and the oaks, though they lose their leaves; and the roots of the grass, deep down in the ground. But my hyacinth blossoms will not bear a bit of cold, nor most of my other plants."

"Clover talks as if they were all growing already," said Lily, with a laugh. "But, after all, it's very interesting, of course, but I don't see what it has to do with our gardens, nor why Sam made such a fuss about our learning it."

"Oh, don't you?" said Clover, her eyes sparkling with pleasure and interest. "Why, Lily, we've got to make a climate for these tender things; it won't do to plant 'em right out in the cold ground."

"Make a climate!" said Lily, rather scornfully. "I should like to know how!"

"So should I, very much," said Clover; "but I suppose Sam can tell us."

"Well, I don't see the use of much fuss with our gardens, after all," said Lily. "I want just pleasure out of mine; and if I've got to learn first what the climate is, and then make it, for every thing, I might as well be at a geography lesson."

"Oh!" Clover exclaimed, but suddenly checked herself and went on with her sewing.

"I don't want to begin with it, say way," said Lily. "I'd rather take the fun first and the study afterward."

And silence came again, while the two needles made quick passes to and fro, and Lily watched her lace-fringe, now melting drop by drop.

"Mamma," said little Primrose, "how would you begin?"

"Begin what?"

"Our gardens, mamma."

"I suppose I should begin—as I do every thing—with asking God's help," said Mrs. May.

"Mamma, would you?" said Lily, from the window, while Clover again dropped her work. "About such little things?"

"Are they too small to need His help? I know no such things."

"But would he like to have children ask him about their gardens?" said Primrose, wistfully.

"About any thing, dear, in which they wish for His blessing. Who can make the seeds grow? who can bring forth the flowers in their beauty?"

"And you were thinking of us, too, mamma, were you not?" said Clover, softly. "About our seedling help?"

"Yes," said her mother, "for with every pleasure or sorrow, every success and every disappointment, some little opportunity for good, little temptations to evil; we may please God, or we may disappoint him. And even alone in our own little gardens of sweet flowers we have need to pray: 'Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not.'"

Mrs. May rose up and left the room, leaving the children to their thoughts.

"Temptations!" Lily repeated. "Well, I suppose I shall know 'em when they come, though I don't see where they're to come from. But I must look over my list again, to see if I want to make any changes. Let's have the Catalogue, Prim."

And the lists were made out that very evening, with some alterations, and sealed up ready for the post.

"You see I had to change some things, Sam," Lily explained; "for every time Jack sees me he calls out 'Snap-dragon! best and brightest varieties, mixed!' just as if he was a waiter on a steamboat. And I'm sick of the very name."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Tax lawyers of to-day seem not unlike those who scribbled in the time of "rare Ben Jonson." For in one of his dramas he alludes to the "men of that large profession," as those "Who could speak

To every cause, and change some contracts,
Till they were hoarse again, yet all be less."

Reasoning from analogy, we have no doubt that if a case were brought into court depending upon the important question "Is black white?" it would be clearly proved so to be by some skillful advocate, if not in Whately's most approved style of

"Black is a color;
White is a color; therefore,
Black is white?"

the point would be established in some other equally laud manner.

The other day the captain of a certain vessel was arrested on the charge of having violated the new law for the prevention of cruelty to animals. The complainant stated that the captain had brought a cargo of turtles from Florida, and that the turtles were confined in a very cruel manner, "having holes bored through their feet and made run through to secure them." It was, however, earnestly reported "that the prisoner's counsel would move for a discharge of his client on the ground that turtles are not animals." Quite a brilliant idea is that! It would not be difficult to prove that statement from Worcester, who says that an animal is a "living, sensitive creature," etc. Now who is the man who, in a pre-emptory state, has been a turtle, and can upon oath affirm that a turtle is "sensitive?" It is perfectly plain that the thing can't be proved! Oh, perhaps, a more consistent argument might be, & in Whately:

Some animals are vegetables;
Turtles are not vegetables; therefore,
Turtles are not animals.

Recently, the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals will soon have their hands full of business. People are beginning to realize that many things have hitherto been allowed altogether contrary to the law of humanity. Commemorative coins in from various quarters, indicating that the public mind is waking up upon this subject. One unfilial the horrible tortures that animals—helpless victims to the cruel science—receive at the hands of surgeons. Another protests against the cruelty of some individuals who "made a horse trot twenty miles in 30 minutes and 30 seconds." Another still, pleads for the dogs who are ill-treated while being trained to perform tricks; and states a case of retrospective justice, which, however, occurred not in America but in Switzerland. It appears that a man brutally beat a little dog which would not obey his order, and while doing so, one of his large dogs sprang forward, seized him by the throat, and bit him so severely that he died on the following day.

In due time we shall reap the benefit of all the efforts now being made, and soon and sure to be paid less frequently than they have been hitherto.

Many who had looked forward to a summer at Saratoga will deeply regret the loss of Congress Hall. There are indications that the fire was the work of an incendiary. Can not some of these wretched criminals, who are spreading destruction abroad, be brought to justice? There is little doubt but that the destruction of the Academy of Music has made somebody guilty of arson in the first degree.

A friend sends us the following "bit."

"Not long since, while in the country, I met a lady who had recently visited New York, and was especially interested in the Central Park. After dining for some time upon the various subjects of interest within the Park, she inquired:

"Do you know what Miller is buried there?"

"Unwilling to hurt the good woman's feelings, and yet puzzled how to reply, I hesitated; but was relieved by her saying:

"The name was S. C. Miller, and I thought perhaps he might be a relative of the Millers in this vicinity."

"The best of Miller had attracted her attention, but she read the name after a fashion of her own."

A somewhat similar mistake was made by a lady, who after examining the statue of the "White Captive," and scrutinizing the article's name—"Palmer, S. C."—which was engraved in one corner, remarked:

"So Palmer is a Southerner?"

"Oh no," said a friend, "he is from Albany."

"But don't you see his name, Palmer, S. C., South Carolina?"

The following occurs a moral with it:

"A married officer, on arriving at the Carrage, whether he had been ordered to join his regiment, wrote to his wife that he had 'formed a connection with a very agreeable man, and intended to spend the summer very pleasantly.' Unfortunately, and greatly to the surprise and mortification of his good lady, he inadvertently dotted the letter e in the word man."

The moral is, send your dots in writing. Some other things should be watched at the same time also, as is indicated by this "bit"—which we slip from a city newspaper:

"If the gentleman who keeps a shop in Cedar Street with a red head, will return the umbrella he borrowed from a lady with an ivory handle, he will hear of something to his advantage."

Lastly, it is not unwise to cross one's "F's" in writing, one mistake may occur, as in the case of the merchant who wrote to his agent, who was cruising around the coast of Africa, to send him two monkeys. Now the merchant was somewhat deficient in orthography, so he spelled two, "two" and so he omitted to cross his "f's," the agent, with some surprise, read the order, "two monkeys." At length one of the merchant's vessels came into port—the deck, masts, and rigging all alive with grinning faces. The puzzled merchant read the agent's letter with a still more puzzled brain:

"Dear Sir,—I have of March 29 received. I send fifty monkeys. Have found it very difficult to procure so large a number. Will endeavor to fill out the balance of your order, and forward by next ship."

Yours truly,
JOHN BARRA."

Celebrated people, especially poets, often suffer strange passions as the price of their popularity. In the "Life Letters" of Mrs. Edgeworth the epistle of the immortal "request" that came to her, and gives some quotations from a record that she attempted to keep for a while. The following are a sample:

"A famous lyric for a scholar when he should die, he being now well and pushing on well."

"The owner of a canary-bird, which had accidentally been starved to death, whose some elegant verses."

"To purchase a manuscript volume of three hundred pages, the author having always had a distaste to the business of publication, finding that it brings on a 'pain in the back of the neck.'"

"To prepare the manuscript of a colored preacher, of whose character and abilities I was ignorant."

"Desired to assist a servant-man, not very well able to read, in getting his Sunday-school lessons, and to 'write out all the answers for him, clear through the book, to save his time.'"

"A motto for the loss of a second wife, fortified by the argument that I had composed one at the death of the first."

A Portland (Maine) paper says that a patent has been secured by a gentleman in that vicinity which will make a complete revolution in applying buttons to garments. By this invention buttons can be attached to any part of wearing apparel without the use of thread. The invention consists solely in making the button with a spiral wire to be inserted into the cloth like a cork-screw, and they pressed down flat so as to form a ring to hold the button in place.

A sad story was whispered in Paris not long ago. M. Miller, a Danish poet, who had lived for the last fifteen years in Paris, died suddenly at Rome. He was poor; he had raised his eye reading by the gas-lights of the cafe, and writing in his chamber by candle-light, and was ordered to Normandy in Rome as a lunatic, and sent to a mad-house, where he died in two or three days. It is believed here, as much from loss of liberty as from any thing else.

In regard to summer fashions there is no lack of styles novel and tasteful. For the benefit of those who are preparing for the country, we would say that toilets intended for country and sea-side wear, in fact all those which are made short, are covered with embroidery, or else they are ornamented with handsome braid. Very few dress-makers now make a separate petticoat with these costumes; they rather add round the lower half of the skirt a band, which sometimes a petticoat. The skirt is cut out round the edge either in wavy lines, scallops, or tucks, and these are ornamented with Mexican embroidery, crossed in either gold-colored or scotch silk. On the band of what forms the petticoat, and above the hem, there are two rows of black ribbon-velvet, and between these there is a single row of Mexican embroidery, to correspond with the skirt.

The narrow waistlines beside are found to be so effective that they are used in great profusion as trimmings. They harmonize particularly well with white, black, and blue. They are much admired for ornamenting black silk dresses which are worn over long silk petticoats. The braid is arranged in graceful designs on the bodice, sleeves, and decorative jacket, which accompany the black silk skirt. These braid are also seen in straight lines down every part of the Garibaldi bodice or business blouse. Another popular and rather original manner of using them is to trim the costume's straps which are now used for looping up silk skirts. These are, of course, neither so elegant nor so tasteful as the bands of Algerian and Oriental embroidery, any which are used for the same purpose; but then, on the other hand, they are not nearly so costly.

PEUBRIA AND AUSTRIA.

Peubria was a rebel,
Austria was a thief;
Peubria and Austria
Made a Danish deal.

Peubria said to Austria,
"Leave the swag alone."
Austria said to Peubria,
"When you drop your bones."

Peubria said to Austria,
"You don't mean to go?"
Austria said to Peubria,
"Out of Hottentot! No."

Peubria said to Austria,
"Wherefore do you arm?"
Austria said to Peubria,
"Of you in alarm."

Peubria said to Austria,
"I don't mean to fight."
Austria said to Peubria,
"My intention quite."

Peubria said to Austria,
"Drop your warlike game."
Austria said to Peubria,
"When you do the same."

Peubria said to Austria,
"What's the end to be?"
Austria said to Peubria,
"Kill me, and you'll see."

Peubria said to Austria,
"Come, this long war's do."
Austria said to Peubria,
"Sir, the same to you."

Peubria said to Austria,
"I'll the deed try."
Austria said to Peubria,
"Thank you, so will I."

A JOKE THAT ISN'T SO GOOD.—What is the difference between the Hebrew idea of a slave and the modern notion of a wash-hand stand?—The former is stated to be "a bawler of wood and drawer of water," while the latter is "a drawer of wood and cover of water."

CULINARY MAXIMS.

To secure light bread—put your flour into the hands of a grocer, and it will be sure to rise.
Ice-cream should be baked in a quick oven.
Domestic "broils" should be avoided.
Don't eat soup with a fork.
Peewees should come to the table with their jackets off—being an exception to the general rule of etiquette.

A ducky who was sent to jail for marrying two wives successively by saying that when he had one she fought him, but when he had two they fought each other.

A fellow out West being asked whether the fellow he was drinking was a good article, replied: "Well, I don't know; I guess so. There is only one queer thing about it: whenever I wipe my mouth I burn a hole in my shirt."

Marked should learn temperance from the moon—the fuller she gets the shorter her horse becomes.

A wag having married a girl named Church, says he has experienced more happiness since he joined the Church than he ever did before.

"You are a colossus; I'll commit you," said an official judge to a noisy person in court. "You have no right to commit a nuisance," said the offender.

Time is said to be money. Certainly; set a few us in paying their debts!

A storkman lately addressed his female auditors as follows: "Be not proud that the blessed Lord paid you sex the distinguished compliment of appearing first to a female after the resurrection, for it was only done that the good things might spread all the sooner."

A pin has as much head as a good many authors, and a great deal more point.

Many a weak-faceted youth has been disgraced and made hollow by the fiery tongue within it.

A wicked editor says that at a church some people clasp their hands so slowly in prayer that they are unable to get them open when the contribution box comes around.

BURIAL OF SCOTT.

BREVET LIEUTENANT-GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT was on the 1st instant interred in the West Point Cemetery, on the banks of the Hudson. It had been the General's intention to spend the summer at Cozzetta's Hotel, according to his custom. The very day he died preparations were being made for his removal to this house, which had been his home for many years. He died, however, at Rock's Hotel, and here his body lay in state until the funeral, which took place in the Post Chapel.

In the morning the body was taken to the chapel, across the West Point parade, without any other retinue than the guard of honor and a dozen soldiers. The chapel within and without was deeply draped in black. The coffin, which was elevated upon a platform, was of mahogany. It had on either side three silver handles, a rim of silver borders on the covers, and was lined with satin; a silver plate over the breast was circled with a laurel wreath, while the stars of his country's flag were wrapped about the body of the chieftain. The people were then admitted to see the body. Among those who entered for this purpose were several old soldiers who had fought under Scott's years and years ago, and who were moved to tears. This was the single touching picture connected with a funeral otherwise cold and formal.

The funeral services in the chapel, which were those usual in Episcopal burial, were held at noon. There were present at the ceremony our most prominent military characters, Lieutenant-General GRANT, General MEADE, HOWARD, SCOTT, THOMAS, Vice-Admiral FARRAGUT, Captain WOODRUF, and others. A Congressional delegation was present, among whom were Vice-President FORTY, and Speaker COLFAX, FARRAGUT, PALMER, and REBOODEN, of the Navy, and Generals COLLIER, TOWNSEND, SAMPSON, VAN VLIET, DELA-FIELD, and MASON, of the army, officiated as pall-bearers. On the completion of the exercises in the chapel the procession moved to the cemetery under the direction of General MEADE. Commencing at sunrise, minute-guns were fired from Battery Knox until after the interment had taken place. On other pages of our paper will be found an extended sketch of Lieutenant-General Scott's career, with illustrations of his campaigns and of his funeral.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

An excited father called in great haste on Dr. Abernethy and exclaimed, in an excited manner: "Doctor! Doctor! my boy has swallowed a mouse!" "Then go home," quietly replied the Doctor, "and tell him to swallow a cat!"

MATHEMATICAL QUESTIONS.

What sort of a figure does Mary cut when she has left the room?—A poly-gone.

How can you describe the coverage of a road which has ten curves and breaks up!—By a wrack-ledge.

Why should a four-decker, plied for only a couple of weeks on each side, be built with six angles?—Because it's a deck-a-gid.

What is higher and broader when the head is off?—A pillow.

A PARADOX.

As William drew his Susan best
He whispered to his bride:
"Though queer it sounds, I love, my dear,
To live by Suez's side."

It seems to me I have seen your physiognomy somewhere before, but I can not imagine where. "Very likely; I have been the keeper of a prison for the last twenty years."

BURIAL OF SCOTT—SERVICES

E, IN WEST POINT CEMETERY.

"SHALL WE MEET THEM ALL THERE?"

As we raise up our eyes to you azure expanse,
Where the great ocean of light sheds its beams and its heat,
Or, dimmed by the fast-fleeting clouds which subside
The returning of what we so cheerfully greet;
A "myriad" of "seas" to lead us aloft,
And our spirit, withdrawn, flies upward to where
With deep, smiling thoughts, hearts mournful and soft,
We anxiously ask, "Shall we meet them all there?"

To my Father reveal for the care which he gave
To my earlier days when my thoughts were so wild;
When I took little note of the future to care
The fast-gliming hours which were spent as a child.
With a deep, anxious look from his oft-shining eye,
He would tell me, "Dear boy, you will soon be a man.
I shall soon leave you here—I also must die,
Pray think of my words, and so learn while you can."

To my Mother beloved—can I add to that name?
Beloved—its scars tell all I feel in my heart!
Could I see her once more—she still be the same
As in childhood I knew her—then with her depart!
Ah! that dear mother's face is still fresh in my sight,
Though her spirit is veiled from my weak, mortal eye;
And I feel that the beams of your heavenly light
Are a pathway which leads me to her in the skies.

To my Sister, long since laid in peace by her side;
And oh as my thoughts wander back to that hour,
I remember her then—both the joy and the pride
Of our home, of our parents—a fresh-budding flower.
Still a child, without knowing the wiles of this life,
She was taken away to the far Spirit-land,
Where innocents reign, free from sinning or strife,
To be one of the pure in that heavenly band.

To my Brother, the eldest—the hopes of our home,
Given up to his plow, with a proud, noble heart;
We bade him farewell when his comrades all came,
And the sound of the drum bade our sorrows depart.
But he has far away on the side of the hill,
Where they heavily hid his remains from their feet;
Though so dear to me now is the grave which they fill,
Still I wish they were here, where our own they grew.

To a beautiful world—withstanding the grief
Which commingles so much in the joys of this life;
And it tells us that these are but passing and brief,
While the pleasures to come know no sorrow nor strife.
There's another, beyond us, around us, above,
Where Death never enters—there's nothing to fear;
Where that "mystical" will o'er blind us in love,
And we anxiously ask—"Shall we meet them all there?"
CANTONMENT, February 17, 1866. J. P. R.

HOME FROM THE SEA.

In the second quarter of the eighteenth century Jotham Beverly resided on Nantucket Island, within a stone's-throw of the present village of Siasconset, and barely a mile from the ruined light-house on Beverly beach. At that time the inhabitants of the island were very few—numbering only a few hundred, and they were even more rude and hardy than they are at the present time. At the date of the commencement of my story the Indians, it is true, had deserted their ancient fishing-wation; but the markets for their white successors were far away, the sperm-trade was yet in its infancy—or, at least, in its early youth—the sterile soil gave response to the impertinence of the hubandman only after long and patient toil; and, in fact, the inhabitants of Nantucket—all pursuing the fisheries for a livelihood—were the roughest and most primitive of Puritans.

But comparative good fortune always seemed to attend Jotham Beverly. He was a tall, raw-boned, sandy-haired, grasping Scotchman, good-hearted withal, and apparently with as much early Yankee go-aheadness in his little finger as was contained in all of the heads of the little colony put together.
Jotham's family consisted of three—his wife Margaret, his daughter Jean, and himself.

When Jotham was about forty years of age, and had lived on the island for a number of years, he conceived the project, the completion of which was the great ambition of his after-life. This project was the building of a light-house. The whale-fisheries of Nantucket already had become somewhat important. Upward of fifty whale-ships were owned by the islanders, and the principal port had become a rendezvous for vessels in the same trade from many sea-ports of the coast. Of course, the perilous nature of Nantucket shoals—to this day so carefully avoided and so frequently the cause of wreck—were even more to be dreaded in that early day, when the science of navigation was comparatively crude.

Jotham had always been a man of action. When his project was thoroughly conceived he was restless until he started the work. Obtaining some legislative recognition and a little—very little—pecuniary assistance from the colonial government, he slowly procured the necessary tools and appliances, employed a band of laborers—many of the latter being negro slaves and Indian squaws from the main land, and, with little delay, instituted his favorite scheme.

Jotham's daughter Jean was acknowledged by all to be the sweetest and the fairest girl in all Nantucket. Certainly not one of the young fishermen ever saw little Jean trip up the hills to look out for her father's incoming sails, or scatter through the cabin garden-patch, while her mother sat spinning in the sunlight by the door, with a certain longing, and a certain furtive visioning of a happy home, with a bright wife to make it cheerful within.

Jean had many lovers too. Strange to say, the most favored appeared to be a great, hulking, awkward young fellow whose name was Andrew Graef, whose mother loved the unenviable suspicion of being a witch, and whose fishing-craft usually met with the very worst of bad luck. Jean was an unconscionable little flirt. Like most pretty girls, she was fully conscious of her beauty, and, like very many of them, the admiration of her charms made her insensibly vain.

But awkward, hulking Andy Graef seemed to have found the secret to her esteem, while his handsome compeer were compelled to be satisfied with her scorn. True, she even abused Andrew's folly. Her lover at one time risked his neck to pluck for her a well-deserved from the face of a precipitous crag, and then had the little willing torn to pieces and thrown into his face for his pains. At another time, Miss Jean lost her amber necklace in the Devil's Griddle—a dangerous eddy that whirled between two of the inner reefs—and Andy, recurring the keel-pike, and narrowly escaping drowning at the same time, was rewarded by a heartless laugh and a stinging box on the ear, because one of the miserable beads had become disengaged and irretrievably lost.

But in spite of these and a hundred similar instances of ingratitude, hulking Andy followed his sweet-heart like a great bearly animal, happy enough if a little smile would reward him for days of indifference. It was, perhaps, this blind and utter devotion upon his part that mostly won upon the girl.
There was more besides, however. For she was not so vain as not to know and admire the honesty and goodness of her unsmooth lover's nature; and his utter contempt for death, when his services were enlisted in her behalf, was also a qualification which she must needs respect.

And so the monotony of that humble island life
abbed on in peaceful contentment, while Jotham Beverly, with his workmen and workwomen, and his derricks and mortars, went on with the rearing of his light-house. It arose but slowly. When the ice and frosts of the severer autumns put an end to the work for that season only about twenty feet of the rude but staunch tower were complete. Nevertheless old Jotham was pretty well satisfied. From the small front lattice of his cabin he could see the round, dark structure stand high up on the bar, with the wintry sea frothing and leaping madly, but vainly, at its rocky feet. All through the long winter he would sit at that lattice, looking over the inner light, smoking his pipe thoughtfully, and examining the tower with a critical and loving eye.

When spring returned old Beverly had his labors at work again as early as the weather would permit, and slowly, little by little, foot by foot the round, rough tower began to grow into the air.

About this time there came to Nantucket from Boston a young sea-farer who was known by the name of Seagrave. He commanded a strange craft, Seldom before had such a vessel floated in the rocky harbor of Nantucket. Unlike the clumsy whalers which frequented those waters, the Raven, as this vessel was called, was a model of symmetry and beauty. She was a three-masted schooner, rakishly built, and very low in the water, with her hull painted black, and a huge object, concealed by tarpaulins, on the after-deck, which might have been a gun, or something else. The crew of the stranger were also very different from the greasy whalers and coarse fishermen who hailed from the island.
They were better-dressed, sprightlier sailors, and were also nearly all distinguished by wearing weapons in their belts. Seagrave himself was a great improvement on the average of the Nantucket skipper. He showed considerable refinement; his voice was sweet and gentle, and his language well chosen. He was also young, brave, and handsome; there was something almost princely about him in the eyes of those simple fishermen; and in the eyes of giddy Jean Beverly he was every thing that her fancy had conceived of all that was noble and romantic.

The strangers were evidently starting upon a long voyage, and their ostensible object in stopping at Nantucket was to make some additions to their stock of water. But they lingered much longer than was necessary for this simple purpose; the gentlemanly skipper was frequently on shore, and there were sly hints that he found a much pleasur-er attraction there than the clear fountains of the island.

But old Beverly could not bring himself to like Seagrave. He could not be blind to the fact that his daughter Jean was apparently fascinated, though the stranger skipper seemed to always treat her with merely commonplace politeness. Poor Andy Graef now saw himself completely deserted by Jean, and he also, and very naturally, eyed the stranger with black mistrust. Then, as it soon transpired that the Raven was nothing less than a slaver, this fact increased the old man's distrust, and indeed brought the rakish schooner's crew into general disrepute among the islanders, with a majority of whom the slave-trade, though then so commonly pursued, was held in great abhorrence.

There was, however, that about Seagrave which could scarcely be related by a simple man like old Jotham. His manner and address were of that world-wide, cosmopolitan order which simple and lowly people can only combat with the utmost difficulty. And even before Beverly was, precisely aware of any intimacy existing between the stranger and his own household, Seagrave had become a frequent visitor at the Beverly cabin, and a frequent partaker of its fragrant hospitalities. There was something about this man that was strangely engaging to every one. Though still young his features bore the impress of a long, wild life by sea and shore, and the expression of his dark eyes was frequently of a hard, pitiless cast, which was something remarkable in one so young. Yet his voice was soft and musical as that of a woman. His deportment was modesty that which is the result of instinctive refinement, and his language very seldom merged into the careless idiom of the sea-farer.

But upon no one did the spell of the stranger fall so strongly as upon pretty Jean Beverly. She beheld and listened to him with silent admiration.
Here at last was the hero of her dreams before her—not in the coarse garb and with the ungainly gait of her father's lovers, but in all the romance of adventure and ocean chivalry, and draped in the additional attraction of a mysterious past, which must have been spent among scenes even wilder and more romantic than his stories hinted of.

Poor Andy would still at times steal in upon the Beverlys in the evenings, and be permitted to watch the effect of Seagrave on Miss Jean, as the con-spicuouser would recount the adventures of the past, the great deeds yet to be done, the gold and glory to be won on remote seas, and the fascinations of a lover's life. It called him to the quick to perceive the extent of the influence exercised by Seagrave over Jean; for he perhaps saw more of it than her own parents.

One tempestuous night they were all sitting cozily about the fire-side of Beverly's cottage. The hoarse cries of the breakers on the near beach were plainly heard in the cabin, though the fire blazed cheerfully —for the spring was still chilly with bleak winds—and all parties (except Andy) were in a pleasant mood of mind, just after finishing one of Dame Margaret's hearty suppers.

Jotham had been on the reef all day, and was now smoking his pipe in a contented frame; Seagrave had just finished a humorous sketch of tropical naval, and was merrily engaged in cutting from an old newspaper grotesque figures, with a pair of shears, for Jean's special entertainment; Margaret was spinning; and Andy was glumly toasting his knees at the fire, without vouchsafing a word, but keeping his ears inordinately distended.

The self-satisfaction of old Beverly at last broke the brief silence which had fallen upon the party, though he rather addressed the raging elements without than any one in the company.

"Yes, ye may howl and beat and slash yourselves against the rocks of said Nantucket, but ye'll ne'er disturb the basements of said Beverly's tower.
Wait till she's full-grown, my roarin' hearties—wait till her bonny lamp makes daylight through the tempest and the night, and the merry sailors will laugh at your terrors!"

Having delivered himself of this exalting apotrophe, Jotham settled himself down again, with two or three self-satisfied whiffs at his pipe, and a slow, benignant glance upon the company, as though to convey in its full force the prospective benevolence which the Beverly light-house was to convey upon the world.

"You will indeed send gladness to many a gallant heart, Squire Beverly, when you have perfected your noble project," said Seagrave, who always called the old man "Squire," and made a rule of continually cherishing his vanity.

"Father," said Jean, very thoughtfully, "suppose I should be spirited away over the sea, would you still work at your light-house?"

She said this so earnestly that every one was surprised.

"'Sdeath, bairn! who in the dell's name would spirit you away over the brine?"

"I didn't say any one would, you silly, darling old man," she replied, merrily; "but suppose they would. Suppose the Good People would, for instance?"

"Or the Bad People," grumbled Andy Graef, in a scarcely audible tone.

"Well, child," responded the old fisherman, gayly falling in with the merry mood of his daughter,
"rest assured that, whatever happens, the work o' the light-house will go on, whatever betides. And even if you should be carried over the sea this very night, I pray that the first gleam o' the new signal will light ye home once more!"

"Amen!" said Andy Graef, in a sepulchral tone;
while the rest, including Seagrave, laughed quite heartily at the old man's apt reply.

But before that reply was quite concluded the door was suddenly opened, and in walked Andy's mother, the Widow Graef, who, in spite of her poverty and her reputation as a witch, was always sure of a welcome at the broad hearth of the light-house builder. She was an old, withered, and exceedingly miserable-looking woman, and her tattered plaid cloak was now dripping from the tempest. Andy cast a deprecating, apologetic glance around, as he almost always did when his mother appeared, for her temper was a bad one, and she seldom spoke well of any one.

But Widow Graef was not to be appeased. She had caught the last portion of Jotham's speech, and now answered it, standing, as she spoke, in the centre of the room, and assuming a prophetic attitude.

"There may be more meaning in your words than you ken at the present time, Jotham Beverly," said she, with a shrewd and knowing look from her twinkling gray eyes. "I was bred in the same parish as yourself, Jotham, an' mind my words, when your silly child is spirited away, her return will be signaled by the first glint of your light-house—and return she will not till then. They tell ye I'm a witch," she continued, with an evil and lowering look at Seagrave, and indicating him by a motion of her skinny finger; "well, take a witch's advice, an' beware o' that man! He has the dell in his eye, an' there's little guid to the house that fosters him!"
Seagrave only laughed.

"Tush, tush, granny!" said Jotham; "ye're never quiet with speaking ill o' your neighbors!"

"Beware o' him, I say! an' keep your eye on your chickens, or the hawk will swoop and grip his prey!" cried Granny Graef, with passionate emphasis. "An' mark my words, when your uncanny bairn is spirited away, the first glint o' your light-house, an' that alone, will signal her home from the Sea!"

"Come home, Andy!" she cried, fiercely, at the same time seizing her son by the arm. "Wad ye wait here to see your white dove kissing the talons that's thirrens' for its blood? Come home, darling, and let the foolish bird go flying to her fate!"

With this she pulled hulking Andy, always submissive in her grasp, out of the room, and together they vanished in the storm. The only one of the remaining company who was in nowise disturbed by the language of the old woman was Seagrave. She reminded him of a number of humorous anecdotes, the recital of which, in his inimitable way, soon restored every one to their accustomed good-humor, and the old lady and her prophecies were soon forgotten.

As the night was drawing on late, Seagrave, enveloped in his rough great-coat, took his departure for his vessel—making light of the five miles over the soft, sandy road, and steadfastly refusing to stay all night.

On the next morning (still stormy, for it was the equinox) the good fishermen of the port of Nantucket missed the rakish form of the slaver-crew from their harbor, and at the same time Jotham

Beverly missed the form of his giddy daughter Jean.
Jean Beverly had indeed been spirited away over the sea by Seagrave the evening.

Nearly two years had passed away, and the coveted scheme of Jotham Beverly was almost completed. It was early spring, and Jotham, sitting at the seaward-looking lattice of his cabin, glumly smoking his pipe, could see his round, rough tower rising symmetrically and to the height of over one hundred feet above the reef, the summit almost ready for the reception of the monstrous lantern, which, through the aid of the colonial government, he had been already able to secure from the old country.

At last the huge lantern was securely mounted, and, at the close of a bright but blistering May day, old Jotham, accompanied by Andy Graef, mounted the winding stairway of the tower to attend to the arranging of the great wicks in the crystal dome.
Line lights and calcium signals were then unknown.
Huge flares, drawing their inspiration from white blubber, alone served to light the tempest-tossed over treacherous rock and deathful sand.

The first illumination of Beverly Light-house was an event among the good people of Nantucket as important as the first illumination of a great city by gas. The fishermen assembled on the beach from all portions of the island, accompanied by their wives and children—many of the families bringing their evening meals with them, so as not to starve, on any account, the unprecedented spectacle.

The sun was setting in a heap of thunder-clouds as Jotham and Andy moved fitfully among the rows of wicks, trimming them carefully, and old Beverly especially eying every thing with almost fatiguing love and tenderness.

He passed at one of the sides of the glass cupola and looked down upon the rude spectators, huddling together far below on the sands.

"Yes, yes," he soliloquized, with moody satisfaction in his tones, "ye can come now and view my triumph, when ye snatched lang sn' at my work. But it's a' the way o' greatness."

"Maister Jotham! Maister Jotham!" cried hulking Andy, excitedly, interrupting the man of the light-house; "there's a white scud in the sea! an' there's another, and another! Ye mean carry up your flares if ye wad piece a tempest, for there's a big an' brewing."

Jotham turned his eyes to the direction indicated, and his experienced eye soon apprised him that the warning had not been given too soon. The south and east were heaped with wind and thunder; far away the sea could be seen leaping and flaking like a boiling caldron, and the rain was descending in sheer torrents. It was one of those swift spring squalls so prevalent on the coast, and especially perilous to vessels so unfortunate as to be caught in them.

"It is comin' fast, Maister!" cried Andy.

"Yes," replied Jotham, "an' there's a ship in the throat o' the wharfwind, or I'm a lubber! It's black as night already. Give me the torch, Andy.
Quick! We're just in time to save her from the rocks."

An inky darkness had pervaded the atmosphere within a few moments' space. But at the application of the torch the wicks burned beautifully, shooting up thick, clear, yellow flames, and flinging a flood of radiance far over the tempest-fretted rocks, and far over the deep sea beyond. A flash of pardonable pride reddened the face of Jotham Beverly as he heard the hoarse cheers of the fishermen rising from the strand beneath. They had also been apprised of the approach of the ill-fated vessel on the dangerous shoals, and the sudden gleam of brilliancy from the cupola of the tower was an omen the beauty of which, under the circumstances, even their rude natures could comprehend and appreciate. Every thing appeared to fever the light-house builder on that eventful night.
The approaching ship, the sudden blackening of the skies, the very elements themselves appeared to lend strong dramatic effects to this hour of his triumph, and the entire effect was strong and impressive in the extreme to all the islanders. The heat of the blazing jets soon rendered the interior of the lantern intolerably hot to the occupants, so that they were both glad to beat a retreat to the chamber immediately below. Here they stood looking out to sea through the open loop-holes, while the reflection of the strong light from the glistening waves rendered their countenances conspicuous to all up-gazers from the beach beneath.

But all eyes were now turned toward the approaching vessel, which was frequently revealed by flashes of lightning, and which was also, by the time, within the outer edge of the lantern's scope.
The rain descended in perfect sheets, the reverberation of the thunder was almost a continuous peal, the sky was black as ink, save when scented by the lightning gleams; and the sea, as far as could be seen, was a wilderness of gigantic waves, while the long and clamorous roar of the breakers on the easter reefs was plainly audible through the hills of the thunder.

As the unfortunate vessel drove into the full stream of the signal all eyes watched her with breathless intension. Her top-masts had been completely wrenched away by the violence of the whirling storm, and her sails were in tatters. It appeared that she was irretrievably doomed. But she was bravely manned, and her crew were not going to despair without a fight for life. Her rigging was black with men endeavoring to restore the shattered sails, and there were still evidences of order and discipline on her littered decks. But pretty soon a monster billow was seen to sweep her from stem to stern, and when she emerged she was evidently unmanageable, while comparatively few of the men were visible where before they had been actively at work.

"It's all up with her; but she is a brave craft!"
said Jotham Beverly, between his clenched teeth.
"Maister Jotham!" cried hulking Andy Graef, with even more excitement than he had yet shown,
"what cut o' a craft is that?"

"Three-masted schooner, low in the hull, sharp-prowed, and like one of a Government cutter," replied the other, eyeing the doomed craft with the practiced eye of an old skipper. "Yes, and there goes her death-shriek!" he added, hoarsely, as a flash leaped from the stern of the wreck, immediately followed by the boom of a signal-gun.

"Do you know the name of that ship, mate?" continued Andy, in husky tones.

"Nonsense! you're daff, Andy! How should I know it?"

"Do you know her skipper's name?" repeated Andy, with even greater excitement than before.

"Haud your tongue, ye crazy loon!" returned the other, peevishly.

"But I know 'em both, Malster Jotham!" cried bawling Andy, shaking his head aloft with nervous passion. "The craft's the Seagrave, and her skipper is the pirate Seagrave! Ha! ha! my old witch-mither wasn't a fool! The first glist o' your tower lights your own hairs hame frae the sea!"

Before the thunder-stricken auditor could turn upon him Andy had vanished from the chamber, and Jotham heard him crashing down the winding staircase with break-neck leaps. Jotham leaped for out of the window, and saw the fishermen and wreckers making ready with their life-boats. He saw Andy emerge from the tower's foot and burst among them, inspiring them with frantic gestures. He felt a strange, hot feeling come over his old breast—a wild desire to go down and also help—but he could not move. He could only look and think. The surf was tremendous at the very foot of the tower, but one life-boat was already afloat, with Andy at the stroke-oar, before the old man dared to turn his eyes seaward again. When he did so, his glance was riveted to the spot, for the white garments of a woman flittered and gleamed at the schooner's taffall; and now but a few rods intervened between the vessel and her fate.

The crew had apparently given themselves up for lost, for they seemed to stand motionless upon the decks, as though stupefied with fear, and their boats were evidently lost, as there nowhere appeared to be any attempt to launch one. But one brave, like form, which Jotham thought he recognized as Seagrave's, moved ceaselessly among the nervous men, as though to encourage them, with now and then a cheering gesture toward the white-robed form at the taffall.

Andy's life-boat, urged by ten stout seamen, had almost crossed the foaming height toward the outer reef, when, just as a terrific peal of thunder shook the earth, followed by increased deluges of rain, the schooner made one bound, and was seen to strike a rock with fearful force. The waves, receding for a moment left her almost literally pinned in situ, impaled upon the sharp horns of the reef.

Even then that one brave form, fearless in the very jaws of death, was seen, axe in hand, having away at the remaining mast, and evidently inspiring his crew with cheery shouts. A wild hurra of admiration rose from the throats of fishermen on the beach, and even Jotham set his teeth still harder as he gazed. But the sea was stronger than a mortal arm, however brave. Billow after billow lashed the schooner down from the rocks and trampled her into fragments. Just as Andy's life-boat gained the reef, the last vestige of the schooner disappeared among the rocks and blinding spray of the further side. It was then, and not till then, that the heart-broken Beverly quitted his look-out to seek poor Margaret in the cabin near by.

The tempest continued for a few hours, and Andy's life-boat returned to the beach with the rest at the stroke-oar empty. The survivors could not explain their comrades' absence, but one of them said that he had seen the luckless fisherman spring upon a rock and make his way toward the wreck.

The next morning the beach was littered with fragments of the schooner. There were many corpses washed ashore. Some were from among the vessel's crew, but many were the nude bodies of black men with iron fetters still clamping their limbs. Two of the bodies were fished in each other's arms, and clasping each other by the throat as though they had gone down in a death-struggle. These were Andy Graef and Seagrave, the slave captain.

But the last corpse that was found was that of giddy Jean Beverly, with her yellow hair all tangled with sea-weed, and her cheek much paler and thinner than when she left Nantucket. And this did the first gleam of that old raised light-house there welcome the erring one home from the sea.

THE LATE LIEUT.-GENERAL WINFIELD SCOTT.

WINFIELD SCOTT was born near Petersburg, Virginia, on 13th June, 1786. His father, a farmer, died when he was five years old; when he was seventeen he lost his mother also. Though but little is known of his childhood, it may be inferred, from his attendance at the High School at Richmond, and subsequently at the College of William and Mary, that the death of his father had not deprived the family of a maintenance. Unlike many of our great men, there is no reason to suppose that Scott was compelled in early youth to work for a living. At the age of twenty, after the usual studies, he was admitted to the Virginia bar, and spent nearly two years in unsuccessful efforts to obtain practice, first in his native State, and subsequently in South Carolina. Had clients been forthcoming, the country might have lost a great soldier and gained a respectable lawyer. As it was, a natural taste for arms had time to develop in the idleness of the circuit, and was stimulated by the prospect of a new outbreak of hostilities with Great Britain. In 1806 Congress increased the army, and on Scott's earnest solicitation he was appointed, in May of that year, when he was barely twenty-two, a Captain of Light Artillery.

For the next three years his life was not of public interest. He was sent to Louisiana, and there, with an indiscretion not unusual in a fiery youth, he used expressions respecting his superior officer which led to a court-martial and to his suspension from the service for a year. At the present day no officer in Washington's position would prosecute a young captain for talking foolishly about him at a dinner-table. But sixty years ago public men were more sensitive, and even Senators appealed to the Senate to be protected against newspaper criticism. The suspension was a lucky accident for Scott. He devoted the idle year to close study of his profession at the house of his friend, R. WATKINS LAMON, and thus fitted himself for the work he had to do.

It came soon enough. After a forbearance unparalleled in history, on 18th June, 1812, Congress declared war upon Great Britain. On 12th October following Scott, now Lieutenant-Colonel of Artillery, made a forced march through a heavy storm to Schlosser, and offered his services to General VAN RENSSELAER, who was about to attack the British works on Queens-town Heights. Whether the adventure was a wise one has been a matter of debate. Judged by the result, it was not. It may well be said that, before embarking on the enterprise, the General in command ought to have made sure both of adequate transportation and of the fidelity of his troops. But the people's heart was smouldering under the disgrace of Hull's surrender, and—as before Bull Run—every one said that something must be done to sustain the morale of the army. So CURTIS and VAN RENSSELAER advanced in boats, in small detached parties, and effected a landing; fought gallantly enough, against desperate odds, until one officer after another was disabled or killed, and intelligence was received that the New York militia refused to cross the river. Scott was on the Canadian side, and practically in command, when the fatal news came. Mousing a log in front of his troops, he briefly described the situation:

"Hull's surrender must be redeemed. Let us die with arms in our hands. There is no retreat!"

And the little band, consisting of less than 800 men, resisted the whole British army for more than two hours. At last, pressed by sheer force down the hill-side, they were driven to the water's edge, and further resistance being impossible, they surrendered. Scott thus began the practical study of his profession in defeat and imprisonment.

Every school-boy is familiar with the story of his interview in his prison with the two Indian warriors. The giant JACONA, a Hercules of the forest, had so often fired at him in the course of the battle that he could not understand how the tall American still survived, and with a rude hand tried to feel for the wounds he felt sure he must have inflicted. All the gentleman's blood in Scott was roused.

"Oft, villain!" said he, throwing the savage back: "you fired like a squaw!"

"We kill you now," was the response of the grinning savage.

And but for a swift leap to the rear, where he grasped a sword, and the timely appearance of a British officer of the guard, his career might have been ended by the tomahawks of his victors.

Not less familiar to all readers is his dispute with his captors about their Irish prisoners. On the deck of a transport in the port of Quebec the British officers had mustered their Queens-town prisoners, and were separating the Irishmen from the Americans. They required each prisoner to answer a question, picked out the Irishmen by their brogue, and set them in irons as traitors. As soon as he discovered what was going on, Scott ordered his men to keep silence, and they obeyed in spite of threats and caresses. Out of this transaction grew the famous debate on the right of a British subject to expatriate himself. The British Government at first threatened to execute as traitors 28 Irishmen, taken prisoners at Queens-town. Our Government, through Scott, who was soon exchanged, set apart 23 Englishmen, prisoners of war, as hostages for the 23 Irishmen. Wild with rage, EARL BATHURST then put in close confinement 46 American officers and non-commissioned officers to answer for the 23 Englishmen. And Mr. MANROSE retaliated by setting apart 46 British officers to answer for the 46 American officers and non-commissioned officers. This settled the question. The 23 Irishmen were never brought to trial, and at the close of the war were released. And though the British Parliament has never formally admitted the right of a British subject to expatriate himself—indeed, only three or four years ago that right was expressly denied by one of the highest courts of the realm—it is not likely that Great Britain will ever again attempt to enforce her peculiar views against naturalized citizens of the United States.

But little glory was won on the northern frontier in 1813; what little there was belongs to Scott. The only successful operation of the year was the capture of Fort George, out of which work the garrison ran almost as soon as they were attacked. It was Colonel Scott, who with his own hands pulled down the British flag—his "long legs" having enabled him to distance Postres in the race, to the latter's great disgust. He subsequently commanded the advance of General WILKINSON's miserable expedition against Montreal, but had no opportunity of distinguishing himself, and was not sorry when relieved from duty under that incapable officer.

This and other failures satisfied Colonel Scott that, to win victories over trained British troops, our officers and soldiers must know more than they did. Accordingly, in the winter of 1813-14, he established a camp of instruction at Buffalo, became himself drill-sergeant for the officers of a brigade, and as soon as his pupils were sufficiently instructed, saw that they imparted what they had learned to the men. By dint of hard work he had succeeded by spring-time in creating a full brigade of well-disciplined troops—perhaps the best brigade in the service. On 9th March he was appointed to their command with the rank of Brigadier. He told the Government that his brigade would give a good account of themselves, and he kept his word.

On 26th July the battle of Chippewa was fought. The commander of the American army, General BROWN, was far in the rear when it began. All the instructions Scott received were in these words, about a couple of hours before the first fire:

"The enemy are advancing; you will have a fight."

BROWN himself freely admitted that the glory of the day was Scott's. The battle was won by superior generalship; Scott succeeded in striking the British line obliquely and doubling it up. The force on both sides was about equal—say 3000 on a side; the killed, wounded, and missing about 16 per cent. on our side, and 25 per cent. on the side of the enemy. Quite a sharp affair, small as the numbers appear by the side of the heavy figures of more recent contests.

The battle of Niagara, LANDY'S LAKE, or BRIDGEWATER, as it has sometimes been called, was a still more bloody affair. It was a surprise to our side. False information had led General BROWN to believe that the enemy were moving on Schlosser, whereas the only change in their position was the arrival of some fresh troops. General Scott, at the head of his brigade, came unexpectedly upon the whole British army drawn up in order of battle, in a good position, at about 7 P.M. on 25th July. The odds were one of those which try a General. Had Scott attempted to retreat the enemy, three or four to one, would have overwhelmed him. He could not stand still under fire. He decided instantly to attack, and at the same time sent swift aids to the rear for the remainder of the army. The race succeeded. The English did not suspect that there was no one in their front but General Scott's brigade. They moved cautiously, and stood upon the defensive. By the time they discovered their mistake BROWN had come up with the remainder of his army, and the contest was nearly equal. It ended in our driving the enemy from the ground he occupied. Beyond this there was no result. The loss on both sides was about equal—say 20 per cent. of the force engaged.

These two battles demonstrated that the youth of 26, whose tall form was so conspicuous where the fight was hottest, and who seemed utterly reckless of his personal safety, was likewise a ripe and sagacious General. Connoisseurs like WELLSINGTON and KOSCIOUSKO pronounced his strategy in this campaign to be of the highest order. His men were enthusiastic over his personal bravery. Warned to dispense with some of the gaudy trappings of his uniform, which, added to his great height, made him a conspicuous mark for sharpshooters, he said, "No; if I die I will die in my robes." At Fort George he was the first in the work, though he knew that matches had been applied to the magazine. At Niagara two horses were killed under him, and he was twice wounded, once in the side, and again, at the close of the fight, very severely in the shoulder.

To a man like Scott, keenly sensitive to public opinion, and greedy of fame, his reward for the services he had rendered his country must have been peculiarly gratifying. "Vexatious by his wound, he was carried to Batavia, and thence, as he slowly recovered, on the shoulders of friends, to Geneva. Thence he was able to ride in a carriage, and he proceeded by easy stages to Philadelphia. His journey was one continued ovation. People turned out to meet the conqueror as they had turned out to meet WASHINGTON. Mothers brought their children to look at him. At Princeton, New Jersey, he was received at Nassau Hall, glorified in an eloquent speech, and honored with a degree. At Philadelphia the Governor met him with a division of militia. At Washington the President offered him the Secretaryship of War. This he declined, but accepted the rank of Major-General—the highest in the army at that time. Congress struck a gold medal in his honor. The Legislatures of Virginia and New York voted him swords and thanks. Like NAPOLEON, he had reached the pinnacle of fame and popularity at an age when most men are only just commencing life.

The next eighteen years were usefully spent in the public service. He enriched our military literature with several works of merit, which are still used as hand-books. He devoted attention to improving the condition of the army, and spent much time at West Point. He traveled in Europe, studied foreign military systems, and borrowed what his judgment approved. His old chivalrous nature loomed up when the cholera broke out among some troops in the West. With his own hands the fearless soldier nursed the sick and soothed the dying. From his position as Commander-in-Chief, he was in constant consultation with the Presidents of the day, and with increasing years his judgment ripened, and his opinions on topics not military were frequently sought by the best minds of the country.

It is perhaps too much to say that but for him the war of rebellion would have broken out thirty years before. Certain it is, however, that a majority of the people of South Carolina were as bent on rebellion in 1832 as afterward in 1860: equally certain that his wise precautions, the careful garrisoning of the forts, the quiet gathering of strength sufficient to defeat attack, the preparations to collect duties off Fort Moultrie, and the constantly implied assertion that the Government would not hesitate to defend itself by force if assailed, had much to do with the collapse of nullification; and quite possible that similar precautions, taken in time by BUCHANAN, might have averted the civil war in 1861. He had shown so much tact and judgment in this delicate matter that the popular voice selected him to be "moderator" when the patriot war in Canada threatened to involve the country in needless hostilities. Once more he revisited the scenes of his early glories—this time to keep the peace and prevent war. He was as brave as ever. When an angry meeting of "sympathizers," furious at some violation of our territory by Canadians, threatened to invade the Province forthwith, he lectured them, and wound up with—

"You know me, and I tell you that, except over my body, you shall not cross the line."

By dint of hard work and telling speeches he succeeded in checking the sympathizers and preventing a war. A like service he rendered at a later date, when the northeastern boundary dispute threatened to involve Maine and New Brunswick in war. A still more difficult and delicate feat was performed by him in 1838, when he succeeded in removing the Cherokees from their homes in Georgia to their new reserve west of the Mississippi. To induce 15,000 people, old and young, to remove against their will from the homes of their fathers, to a new country a thousand miles away, without force, harshness, or cruelty, seems a problem pretty nearly insoluble; but Scott solved it, and actually won the esteem and affection of the Indians.

WINFIELD SCOTT was 60 years of age when the Mexican war broke out. With the exception of SUWAROFF, who was 65 when he defeated KOSCIOUSKO at Warsaw, and MARLBOROUGH, who was nearly 60 when he won Malplaquet, but few Generals have won victories at so advanced an age. Very few indeed of the great soldiers of history accomplished any thing after they had passed fifty. Scott was an exception to the rule. He had placed himself among the great soldiers of the world at an age when most men are mere boys, and now he was going to prove himself a still greater soldier at an age when most men are retiring from life.

The Mexican war was begun by the Mexicans, who invaded Texas. Expelled from that State, they were pursued by TAYLOR, and driven from Monterrey; but not even the victory of Buena Vista brought us nearer to a peace. General SCOTT told the Administration that peace could only be won by blows at the vital parts of Mexico: which he explained by suggesting an expedition against the city of Mexico from the base of Vera Cruz. There was at first considerable hesitation at Washington. Sound military men questioned the safety of an expedition whose objective point was some two hundred miles from its base, and there can be no question but Mr. POLK was extremely loth to add to the laurels of General SCOTT—a political opponent. But the credit of the Administration required success, and after much delay General Scott was dressed in November, 1847, to carry out his plans. To the Mexicans, the intelligence was not unwelcome. The castle of San Juan D'Ulloa they considered impregnable, and SANTA ANNA proclaimed that between Vera Cruz and Puebla they would find "many a Thermopylae."

Yet they neglected obvious precautions. On 9th March, 1848, Scott landed his army without opposition three miles from Vera Cruz, and at once besieged the place. A fortnight afterward the bombardment commenced, and at the end of seven days the town and castle surrendered. Both foreign and domestic critics had predicted that General Scott would spend a year in vain attempts to reduce San Juan D'Ulloa.

A few days were spent in loading material of war, and preparing for the long march into the interior. In the second week of April the army moved, and on 15th the advance met the Mexicans under SANTA ANNA, at the defile of Cerro Gordo—a post naturally strong, and to fortify which the Mexicans had expended their best efforts. General Scott's course showed that age had not diminished his early vigor.

"The enemy's whole line of intrenchments," he ordered, "will be attacked in front, and at the same time turned early in the day to-morrow, probably before 10 A.M."

It was so done. Some of the Mexican works were stormed, others were turned; three thousand Mexicans surrendered with all their artillery, and SANTA ANNA, whose first experience of a Mexican Thermopylae must have been disheartening, mounted a mule out from his carriage, and rode rapidly toward Perote. The pursuit was vigorous. Through Jalapa and Perote, without halting or meeting an enemy, Scott's army pushed forward to Puebla, 115 miles from Vera Cruz, on 15th May, six weeks from the successful establishment of their base on the coast.

It was then that the real difficulties of the campaign began. To keep open a line of communications 115 miles long through a hostile country, full of defiles and mountain passes, with an army in all ten thousand strong, was a feat that has not been surpassed even in the late war. The difficulties of the situation were aggravated by lukewarm support of the General at Washington, and by querulous letters written by officers of his command to newspapers at home. Scott's manly soul chafed fiercely at criticisms which a man of less sensitive organization would have despised. But neither the capacious sarcasms of the War Department nor the ignorant cavils of newspapers diverted him from his purpose. By strenuous exertions he kept the road open to Vera Cruz, and at length, in August, he received the supplies and reinforcements he needed. As soon as he could count upon 10,000 available men, besides the garrisons required for his base line, he moved on Mexico.

SCOTT'S FUNERAL—IN THE CHAPEL.

It is not necessary here to recapitulate the familiar story of Contreras, Charubasco, Chapultepec, and the Belen Gate. It must suffice to say that by strategy and the valor of his troops Scott, with ten thousand men, in the open plain, beat SANTA ANNA, with twenty thousand behind strong works, and on September 14 entered the Gran Plaza of Mexico a conqueror. The exploits deserved and elicited the warmest applause from military critics in Europe. It reminded one of Napoleon's early feats in the war in Italy. Stunned by the unexpected result, the Mexicans made haste to negotiate for peace; and when it was found that the victor demanded no exorbitant terms, did not seek to alter the form of their government, would accept no reward for himself, and merely proposed a plan of accommodation which, while guarding against a recurrence of hostilities, was equally honorable to Mexico and to the United States, they actually received him with enthusiasm.

His return to the United States, which should have been triumphal, was embittered by squabbles with his officers and bickerings with the Government. As was the case in McCLELLAN'S Army of the Potomac, many generals of the Army of Mexico thought more of their own fame than of the success of the national arms; and the Administration, blinded by partisan prejudice, could only see in the conqueror of Mexico a formidable Whig competitor for the Presidential succession. By order of the Government General Scott had handed over the command of his army to General BURTAN, and returned home in October, 1848, to stand his trial before a court-martial on charges preferred against him by creatures like PILLOW, and to prosecute charges against other officers. A knowledge of the weak points of Scott's character—of his readiness to accept an affront from the most insignificant person, and of his sensitiveness to indignities which a more callous nature would never have noticed—enabled unworthy men in the army and in the Government to wound him beyond bearing, and to goad him, in the extremity of his suffering, to retorts which did not become his greatness.

In June, 1853, nearly four years after his return from Mexico, the Whigs nominated him for the Presidency. He was beaten by Mr. FRISCO, his record on the slavery question being less clear than that of his Democratic antagonist. His letter to T. P. ARKISSON, written in 1848, on the subject of slavery, showed clearly that he didn't like the institution, and this was enough for ripening secessionists. Mr. PIERCE, on the contrary, was understood to regard slavery as the direct work of Providence. Such a defeat, on such grounds, involved a compliment.

BATTLE OF LUDY'S LANE.

JUNE 16, 1866.]

LANDING AT VERA CRUZ.

In October, 1860, Lieutenant-General SCOTT (Congress had given him that brevet rank) was seventy-four years of age. His body was feeble; he was lame; he suffered from a painful disease; he slept badly. But his mind was clear enough to discern the signs of the times. Ten days before the Presidential election he called Mr. BUCHANAN's attention to the defenseless state of the Southern forts, and to the danger of their being seized by Southern rebels. With the guileless simplicity of his character, he never suspected the President of complicity with the traitors. Again and again, after the election of Mr. LINCOLN, he pressed his views on the Government; they were uniformly disregarded. His old comrade in arms, General CASS, was the only member of the Government who would listen to him, and he was too old to struggle against his colleagues. The others affected to disbelieve his warnings, or checked over what they called his "senile terrores."

As inauguration day drew near, and the seizure of Southern forts by rebels and the passage of pretended ordinances of secession vindicated the soundness of General SCOTT's judgment, the traitors at Washington threw off the mask, and confessed that they regarded the Government as defunct. BUCHANAN actually countermanded the parade of the troops on WASHINGTON'S birthday—"for fear of irritating the South." General SCOTT—noble old Roman—grew stronger and sterner as other men in authority grew weaker and more disposed to temporize. He was not afraid of offending any body. His knowledge of the Southern character led him to apprehend an attempt to assassinate LINCOLN. By the aid of his detectives, he discovered the Baltimore plot about as soon as it was found out by the detectives employed by Mr. SEWARD and THURLOW WHEAT. This nefarious scheme baffled, his next care was to see that Mr. LINCOLN was not murdered on inauguration day.

Persons who witnessed that inauguration will remember that a large number of roofs on Pennsylvania Avenue were covered with men. Careless observers took them for spectators. They were, in reality, troops, armed with rifles. In the crowd were armed detectives, acting under SCOTT's orders; and in buildings adjacent to the Capitol were three or four batteries of horse artillery, fully manned and equipped; the most efficient of them commanded by a gawky young lieutenant—GODFRAY WERTZEL. Washington was, in fact, that day in a state of siege; though nobody, except, perhaps, the conspirators, knew it. If all passed off tranquilly, the event may, perhaps, be due to General SCOTT's thorough precautions.

Of the remaining years of General SCOTT's life there is little to be said. He soon became aware that at his age, and with his infirmities, he was not competent to conduct the War for the Union. Bull Run almost broke his heart; and though he lived to regret his designation of McCLELLAN as the fittest officer to succeed him in the supreme command, it was with sincere delight that he relinquished a responsibility which he was no longer able to endure. In quiet retirement, beguiling his leisure by the composition of an autobiography, he took the interest of a true patriot in the success of our arms; followed

GRANT and SHERMAN on the map with the eye of a connoisseur, and was never tired of extolling their merits to visitors. He had been sadly chastened of late. Many of his best friends had turned their backs on him. ROBERT E. LEE, his right hand, led the rebel army; another and a dearer one yet was suspected of even fouler treason; his wife's family were open rebels; his native State denounced him. With more humility and resignation than were his wont in younger days, he bowed his head to these afflictions, and drove the closer to his country as his friends departed from it.

Though he had no warning of his approaching death he was not unprepared. For some time he had expected his end; and had more than once sought religious counsel, and devoted his thoughts to a future world. He died, where he wished to die, at West Point—the place above all others which he loved, and where he will be best remembered. There are no "last words" of his to be recorded by the historian. His last act was to press, in token of approbation, the hand of the clergyman who proposed to read to him, as he lay dying, the noble service for the dead from the ritual of the Episcopal Church.

STORMING OF MOLINO DEL REY.

SCOTT'S ENTRY INTO MEXICO.

PLEASANT.—That much-dreaded operation of tooth-drawing has been changed from pain to pleasure by Dr. Collier at the Cooper Institute, if the report of friends can be relied on. The inhalation of the nitrous oxide gas, being free from the danger of chloroform and ether, has become quite an institution in our city.

THE UNIVERSAL CLOTHES-WRINGER, WITH COIL WHEELS.—Over 300,000 sold and now in use. Warranted the best and most durable wringer in use. R. C. BROWNING, General Agent, 82 Courtland Street, New York.

NOSE AND FACIAL.—Ladies afflicted with distortions on the face, called scabs or freckles, should use Parker's Mole and Facial Lotion. It is infallible. Prepared by Dr. R. C. FERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond St., New York. Sold by all druggists.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TOILET GLASS,
Showing both back and face at once. Adjustable in front of any mirror, and indispensable to any lady's toilet. Send for circular to CHAPPELL & GODDEN, Publishers, N. Y.

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
801 BROADWAY (at Nicholas Block).
Photographic Materials, Stereoscopic Goods, WAR VIEWS,
SCENERY, GROUPS, &c.
Photograph Albums, great assortment, Cartes de Visite of Noted Persons, &c., &c.
French English, and American Novelties.

NEW PHYSIOGNOMY, or "SIGNS OF CHARACTER," as manifested through Temperament and External Form, and especially in the "business face divine." One vol., 168 pages, and more than 1000 illustrations, with index complete. By R. R. WELLS, Editor of the PHYSIOLOGICAL JOURNAL. Price, post-paid, $5. Address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 89 Broadway, New York.

MERWIN & BRAY,
MANUFACTURERS AND WHOLESALE DEALERS IN ARMS AND AMMUNITION OF ALL KINDS.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have Just Published:

- ARMADALE. A Novel. By WILKIE COLLINGS, Author of "No Name," "The Weenan in White," &c. With Numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.
- HAND AND GLOVE. A Novel. By ANNEA R. FOWLER, Author of "Half a Million of Money," "The Ladder of Life," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
- WALTER GORDING. A Story. By ANNE THOMAS, Author of "Dinah Donne," "On Guard," "The Ledge," &c. 8vo, Paper, 15 cents.
- MAXWELL BREWITT. A Novel. By F. O. TRAMER, Author of "George Gault," "Phemie Keller," &c. 8vo, Paper, 15 cents.
- MISS MARJORIBANKS. A Novel. By Mrs. GILBERT, Author of "Chronicle of Carlingford," "The Perpetual Curlew," "Agnes," "Life of Edward Irving," "The Days of my Life," "The Laird of Norlaw," &c. 8vo, Paper, 15 cents.
- GILBERT FUGGIE. A Novel. By the Author of "A First Friendship." 8vo, Paper, $1 00.
- THE TRUE HISTORY OF A LITTLE RAGAMUFFIN. By the Author of "The Adventures of Redden Davidge." 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
- THE FOOLERS OF THE SEA. A Novel. By FLORENCE HENCO, Author of "The Miserable," &c. 8vo, Paper, 15 cents. (Fifteenth Thousand.)
- RASH MURCH. or, Kestrel and Falcon. A Novel. By the Author of "Guy Livingston," "Brood and Gave," "Marion Dering," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.
- LIVINGSTON'S KAMBU. Narrative of an Expedition to the Zambesi and its Tributaries; and of the Discovery of the Lakes Shirwa and Nyassa. 1853-1864. By DAVID and GEORGE LIVINGSTON. With Map and Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00. Uniform with Livingstons' "Swahili Africa."
- THE ADVENTURES OF REUBEN DAVIDSON; Sergeant York and Four Months Captive among the Indians of Boston. By JAMES GREENWOOD, Author of "Wild Sports of the World," "Carnivals of Savage Life," &c. Illustrated with numerous Engravings. 8vo, Cloth, $1 50.
- THE LOST TALES OF MILETUS. By Sir EDWARD BELWYN LYTTON. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Harper & Brothers will send the above Works by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the Price.

BANKING HOUSE
JAY COOKE & CO.

Corner Wall and Nassau Sts., New York.
We buy and sell at the most liberal current prices, and keep on hand, a full supply of Government Bonds of all Issues, SEVEN-TENTHS,
Certificates of Indebtedness,
AND
COMPOUND INTEREST NOTES.
And execute orders for the purchase and sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Gold.

PIANO-FORTE.
New scale reserved, 7 oct., iron frame, overstrung. $300
Full sized, with carved moldings. $400 to $450
Elegantly carved, finished back and front. $500 to $600
Second-hand, at great bargains. $300 to $375

VIOLINSONS.
Portable case, with divided scroll, &c. $20 to $150
Piano case, single and double rods. $150 to $300
PATENT APPROVED CHAIRS $110 to $200

NEW MUSIC.
Organ Grinders' Polka, introducing the new song of the Organ Grinders. 25c.
Nip Nip Quoddy, with complete sets and figures. 25c.
Three O'clock Galop, for violin, 15c.; piano. 25c.
Gypsy Waltz, by D. Godfrey, for violin, 15c.; piano. 25c.
Mable Waltz, by D. Godfrey, for violin, 15c.; piano. 25c.
Twilight Dances Waltz, D'Arct. viola, 15c.; piano. 25c.
Hanging Thoughts—"I love but Thee" 40c.
The Light in the Window, by Virginia Gilbert. 10c.
Nellie's Good-bye, beautiful song and chorale. 25c.
Ka-Fo-Lo-Lo (great comic song). 25c.
Cuckoo Notes, "with comic end." 25c.
I have heard Sweet Marie's singing, violin, 15c.; piano. 25c.

VIOLINS AND BOWS, severely selected, and sent by express to any part of the U. S. on receipt of the following prices:
GERMAN or FRENCH. $2 50, $3 50, $4 50, $5 50, $6 50, $10, $15.
FRANCIS or ITALIAN. $1 50, $2 50, $3 50, $4 50, $5 50, $8 50.
Old MANNING (very fine tone). $5, $7 50, $10, $15, $20, $30.

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS
Of every description at lowest New York prices. Send stamp for price-list. Special attention given to orders from abroad. FREDERICK BLUM, 908 Broadway.

Stammering

Corrected by Bates' Patent Appliances. For descriptive pamphlet, &c., address Stimpson & Co., 271 W. 32d St., N. Y. They received medals at New York, London, and Paris.

DO YOU WANT LUXURIOUS WHISKERS OR MUSTACHES? We will send free by mail a recipe which will force them to grow on the smoothest face, or hair on bald heads, in six weeks. Address REEVES & CO., 78 Nassau Street, N. Y.

MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY,
To be found on each box and each piece of GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLE. All other goods of whatever name, not having this mark, are worthless imitations and trifling gains on the patients of the Magic Ruffle Company. The GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLES are full six yards in each piece, are well made of the best material, and give perfect satisfaction to consumers. Office of the Company No. 56 Chambers Street, New York.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.
CHEAPEST AND BEST. Price of Press, $15, $16, $20, and $25. Price of an office, with Press, $15, $20, $25, $30, and $35. Send for a circular to the LOWE PRESS COMPANY, 25 Water Street, Boston.

COMMON American Single Pistols, per pair, $1 50; Double Guns, $2 50 to $3 00; real Twist and Patent French Guns from $10 00 up. Guns, Rifle Pistols, Percussion caps, Gun Materials, &c., including all qualities of every article in the line, carefully selected, at lowest prices. CHARLES POLSON, 23 Maiden Lane, New York.

Restore Your Sight.

DR. J. STEPHENS & CO.'S PATENT CORNEA RESTORERS, or RESTORERS of the EYESIGHT.
They will Restore Impaired Sight, and Preserve it to the Latest Period of Life.
SPECTACLES RENDERED USELESS.

The most eminent Physicians, Oculists, Divines, and the most prominent men of our country, recommend the use of the CORNEA RESTORERS for Presbyopia, or Far or Long Sightness, or every person who wears spectacles from old age; Emphasis of Vision, or Hazing; Overworked Eyes; Amblyopia, or Weak Eyes; Epithemia, or Watery Eyes; Pains in the Eye-ball; Anisometropia, or Unequality of Vision; Phosphoria, or Intolerances of Light; Weakness of the Iris and Optic Nerve; Myopia, or Spectacles or Moving Bodies before the Eye; Ophthalmia, or Inflammation of the Eye and Eyelids; Cataract Eyes; Hemorrhage, or Partial Blindness; Staking of the Eyeball, &c.
They can be used by any one with a certainty of success, and without the least fear of injury to the Eye. More than 5000 certificates of cures are exhibited at our office. Care guaranteed in every case when applied according to the directions enclosed in each box, or the money will be refunded. Write for a Circular—sent gratis. Address Dr. J. STEPHENS & CO., Oculists, at HURSTON'S Family Drug Store, No. 19 Astor House, Broadway, New York, (P. O. Box 596). Dr. J. STEPHENS & CO. have invented and patented a MYOPIA, or CORNEA FLATTENER, for the cure of NEAR-SIGHTEDNESS, which has proved a great success. Write for a Circular.

$5 SEWING MACHINE $5

FINEST PATENT and Improved, the embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Originally patented May 13, 1846; Improved and patented June 3, 1866. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with numerous attachments, is in constant operation, sews with ease and regularity, and is in constant operation, sews with ease and regularity, making SIXTEEN STITCHES to each revolution of the Wheel. WIG-BACON, SING, SEWING, SEWING, SEWING, SEWING, SEWING, &c., &c. Strongest machine manufactured. Warranted not to get out of order in 5 years. It has received the approval of all the principal journals, and of those who have used it.
"With single or double thread, it stitches yet very rapidly does the stitching exactly like hand-sewing."—New York Tribune.
Single machines, all countries, sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instructions, on receipt of the price, $5. Ship-delivery guaranteed. Agents wanted every where. Address all orders, FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE COMPANY, Office 128 Nassau Street, New York.

Steinway & Sons' GRAND, SQUARE, AND UPRIGHT PIANO-FORTES

Have taken 25 First Premiums, gold and silver medals, at the Principal Fairs held in this country within the last ten years, and in addition thereto they were awarded a First Prize Medal at the Great International Exhibition in London, 1862, in competition with 260 Pianos from all parts of the World.
That the great superiority of these instruments is now universally conceded is abundantly proved by the fact that Messrs. Steinway's "action, improvements, and peculiarities of construction" have been copied by the great majority of the manufacturers of both hemispheres (as shown by the fact that their instruments are used by the most eminent pianists of Europe and America, who prefer them for their own public and private use whenever accessible).
STEINWAY & SONS direct special attention to their Patent Agraffe Arrangement, which, having been practically tested in all their Grand and highest-priced Square Pianos, and admitted to be one of the greatest improvements of modern times, will hereafter be introduced in every piano manufactured at their works, wherever (mechanical or other) improvements are introduced in order that all their pianos may reap its benefit.
STEINWAY & SONS' PIANOS are the only American instruments exported to Europe in large numbers, and used in European concert-halls.
WAREHOUSE, Nos. 71 and 73 East Fourteenth Street, between Union Square and Irving Place, New York.

TO FURNITURE DEALERS AND HOTEL KEEPERS.

TUCKER'S PATENT SPRING BEDS.
There are some truths besides those so generally admitted in the Declaration of Independence that are self-evident, and though they may pertain to the less vital interests of the human race, they are by no means unimportant. Among these are these: A bed, to fulfil the purpose for which it is designed, must be comfortable; it must be so constructed as to insure durability; it should, for any use, be made portable; and, lastly, the common sense demands that it should be both durable and economical. All of these essential requirements centre in the spring beds invented by Hiram Tucker, and it is confidently affirmed that nothing has yet been devised for the comfort which is at all comparable to it. A single night's repose on one of these will cure the most inveterate doctor of his skepticism. For sale wholesale by the TUCKER MANUFACTURING COMPANY, 115, 117, and 119 Court Street, Boston, and 58 John Street, New York.

GOLD PENS.

If you want a GOLD PEN, send to E. S. JOHNSON & CO., 44 Nassau St., N. Y., and by return mail receive circular showing styles and prices. Shipping done at 50c. ea.

CATARHIT.—Newell's New Remedy FOR CATARRHIT removes at once mucus in the head, pain in the temples, offensive discharges, and extinguishes the disease at its fountain head forever. Price $1 00 a bottle. Send a stamp for a pamphlet to GERRIT NORTON, 11 Ann St.

J. H. Winslow & Co.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELRY AT LOW PRICES.
100,000
WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, PENS, BRACELETS, CASTORS, GOSSETS, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, &c., &c.
Worth $500,000!
To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 50 cents for a Certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every town and country.
J. H. WINSLOW & CO.,
509 Broadway, New York.

TWICE A MONTH THE GALAXY,

THE NEW ILLUSTRATED PORTFOLIO.
PRICE 25 CENTS.
Among the contributors thus far are Bayard Taylor, Richard Grant White, Edward G. Stebbins, Frances Power Cobbe, John Eaton Cochrane, Fred. Hoar, Chas. Godfrey Leland, Dr. Henry Draper, Phineas Gory, Ross Terry, The Author of "Katie's Choice," and others.
Send 25 cents for a specimen copy to
W. C. & F. F. CHURCH,
No. 28 Park Row, New York.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES

For Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circular sent free. Sheets of Type, Cast, &c., 10 cts. Adams Press Co., 22 Ann Street, New York, and 50 Lincoln Street, Boston.

$2 MAGIC Timekeeper $2
And Vest Chain, $2 00.

A genuine English GOLD GOLD of SEVEN COURTESY Timekeeper, with accurate miniature Course in the dial, in handsome case. Beautiful and elaborate in design, of exquisite workmanship, and remarkable for its compactness and absolute certainty as a timekeeper. Fully warranted for 5 years; will last a lifetime and is a most accurate and reliable timekeeper. Possesses complete and satisfactory machinery for Ladies' or Gentlemen's use. Price each, small size, with a rich gold plated Great Vest Chain, only $2. Mailed free. Address WALTER every where. Price list free. Address M. A. NEBLE & CO., Importers of Watches, &c., 8 E. 4th Street and Fulton St., N. Y. Established 1847.

Brilliant and Powerful Day and Night DOUBLE PERSPECTIVE GLASSES.

For Tourists, Sportsmen, and Theatre-goers.
Brazilian Pebble Spectacles and Eye-Preservers, to improve the sight of old and young without the annoying effect of frequent changes. Catalogue sent free by enclosing stamp. SIMMONS, OPTICIAN, 260 Broadway (under Ludlow House), N. Y.
THE KEY TO COMFORTABLE, CLEAN, AND QUIET HOUSES.
BROWN'S METALLIC WEATHER BANDS exclude DUST, MOISTURE, AND ODOR, STOP THE RATTLING OF SHUTTERS, and are warranted good for FIVE YEARS. Principal Depot No. 644 Broadway, New York, over the Manhattan Savings Bank.
Local Agents wanted every where. Send for circular.
THE WEST INDIAN HAIR CURLER.—Warranted to curl the most straight and stiff hair, on the first application, into short ringlets or waving masses curls. Send to any address on receipt of $1. Address THE HENDERTON HAIR-CURLING CO., Box 2821, New York Post-Office.

Great Freckle, Tan, & Pimple Balm.

Now ready and for sale. It beats the world. Try it. Warranted. Sent to any address on receipt of $1. Address THE HENDERTON HAIR-CURLING COMPANY, Box 2821, New York Post-Office.

$150 A MONTH! New Success for Acute M. B. SHAW, Alfred, Maine.

$1500 PER YEAR paid by SHAW & CLARK, Hallowell, Maine, or Chicago, Illinois.

MALARIA EVERY WHERE.

Scarcely has there been a season so fruitful as this of malarious diseases. Not only on the prairie and in the valleys of the West; but mostly in all the old haunts of Fever and Ague and Bilious Remittent Fever have these pestiferous diseases been unusually violent; but they have extended to towns and cities never before infested with them, and have even assailed the mountains and situated thousands of people supposed to have been placed by the laws of nature above their reach. Hence we are compelled to admit that a fatal element pervades the atmosphere all over the country, and should at once resort to the only approved preventive of its consequences.
Hostetter's Stomach Bitters.
A tonic as potent, an antiseptic as perfect, an alternative as irrefragable, and an stimulant so pure, that it soothes the human system to rest and builds all the profligate cause of disease. With the confidence that one placed in incompressible garments right over among blinding billows, the man who arms himself against malarial with this powerful digestive medicine may walk a fever-scorched district fearless of its insidious atmosphere. The inveterate and resistible in present or general in all parts of the country may be but the severest of a deathly scourge now on its way westward from the East. Prepare the system with Hostetter's Bitters for a successful battle with the malignant cause of all epidemics. Be wise in time. Sold every where.—New York World, November 5, 1865.

PRINTING PRESS FOR SALE.

One Taylor Double Cylinder, Five Rollers, Table Distribution, Bed 24x31. Price $5000. The Press on which Harper's Weekly has been printed. Apply to HARPER & BROTHERS, 221 Pearl Street, New York.

JUNE 16, 1866.]

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

Have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at Cargo Prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show. All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

PRICE LIST.

- COLONG, 70c, 80c, 90c; best, $1 20.
MIXED, 70c, 80c, 90c; best, $1 10.
ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 80c, 90c, $1, $1 10; best, $1 20.
GREEN TEAS, 80c, 90c, $1, $1 10; best, $1 20.
YOUNG HYSON, 80c, 90c, $1, $1 10; best, $1 20.
JAPAN, $1, $1 10; best, $1 20.
IMPERIAL and HYSON, best, $1 20.

These Teas are chosen for their intrinsic worth, keeping in mind health, economy, and a high degree of pleasure in drinking them.

Coffees Roasted and Ground Daily.

GROUND COFFEE, 20c, 25c, 30c, 35c; best, 40c.
W. H. Nevada, Valencia, Bourbon, Housekeepers, and Family who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in their articles by using our FRENCH BREAKFAST and DINNER COFFEE, which we will sell at the low price of 20c, 25c, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c to $1 20 by purchasing their Teas of the Great American Tea Company.

No. 21 and 23 Vesey Street, corner of Church Street, Post-Office Box 5245, New York City;
No. 442 Broadway, corner of Bowler Street;
No. 208 Eighth Avenue, near Thirty-seventh Street;
No. 200 Fulton St., Brooklyn, corner Coenties St.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Head and Wagon Peddlers, and small Stores of which there are many thousands, all of which are doing well, can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled; and in case of clubs we have each party's name marked on their packages as directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 21 and 23 Vesey St.

Our friends are getting up Clubs in most towns throughout the country, and for which we feel very grateful. Some of our Clubs send orders weekly, some not so often, while others keep a standing order to be supplied with a given quantity each week, or at stated periods. And in all cases (where a sufficient time has elapsed) Clubs have repeated their orders.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send Post-Office Drafts or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collection by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to collect on delivery.

We return thanks to parties who have taken an interest in getting up Clubs. And when any of them come to New York we shall be pleased to have them call upon us and make themselves known.

Henceforth we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

The following letter tells its own story:

BROOKLYN, GREEN CO., Wis.,
May 8, 1866.

To The Great American Tea Company,
31 and 23 Vesey St., New York City;

The package of Tea I ordered of you came safely to hand. All are highly pleased with their Teas. Your best is superior to what our merchants call their best, and sell for $1 to $1 20. The Colong is far better than what they sell at $1 20. I have never seen another order, amounting to $120. I would send you a much larger one, but many of our farmers are so afraid of being humbugged. They say that if you give a good satisfaction this time as you did before, they will then "go on." Send the goods by United States Express, with bill for collection, as before. All bill by mail to myself. You will hear in a larger way from this section next time. Mark the box to my address. Respectfully yours,
W. H. MACK.

ORDER No. 2.

Table with 2 columns: Item Name and Price. Includes items like 5 lbs. Best Colong, 5 lbs. L. Adams, 5 lbs. Mrs. Howard, etc.

P. S.—Send 4 lbs. of your best Green Java Coffee, with price, to
W. H. Mack.

Our second order from Mr. R. H. Harrison, of Pittsburg, Fort Wayne, and Chicago Railway Shops, Fort Wayne, Ind., embraces a club-order comprising over 500 names of gentlemen engaged in the above manufacturing works.

All Manufacturing Establishments can save two thirds of the cost of their Tea by sending their orders to THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY, Nos. 21 and 23 Vesey Street, New York City. (Post-Office Box 5245.)

Meeks' Cabinet Furniture Warehouse

Removed to the new White Marble Building, No. 622 Broadway, between Fourth and Great Jones Streets. NEW STORE, NEW STYLES, POPULAR PRICES.

These extensive warehouses afford ample facilities for the display of our immense stock, consisting of an elegant variety of Fashionable Bed, Medium, and Plain Furniture, which will be sold at Popular Prices. EP' Purchasers are invited to inspect the largest and best assortment in this country. No. 622 BROADWAY, New York City.

"There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune."

MAMMOTH OIL ENTERPRISE AND GRAND GIFT DISTRIBUTION.
40,000 Shares of Stock to be Sold for Five Dollars each,

AND
40,000 Valuable Presents—One to each Shareholder.

$20,000 IN GREENBACKS, BONDERS, AND OTHER VALUABLE PROPERTY, TO BE DISTRIBUTED AMONG SHAREHOLDERS WHO INVEST $5 IN THE STOCK OF THE VANOVERBROOK OIL COMPANY, WHICH WILL PAY 500 PER CENT. PROFIT ANNUALLY ON THE AMOUNT OF THE INVESTMENT.

Distribution to take place Tuesday Evening, July 24, 1866, at IRVING HALL, NEW YORK.

The merit of this plan is twofold. First, each subscriber to a $5 share becomes a Stockholder in the Company, and entitled to the benefits of its success. Second, every person who purchases stock has a chance to receive a valuable present—a small fortune.

SPLENDID LIST OF PRESENTS.

Table listing various presents and their values, such as Brown Stone House, Frame House, Presents, Lots in the City of New York, etc.

HOW TO OBTAIN SHARES.

Forty thousand printed receipts will be issued, each entitling the holder to one share of stock in the Vanoverbrook Petroleum and Mining Company, and each accompanied by a card of admission (properly numbered), to the Grand Distribution, and entitling the holder to the present that may be drawn to his number on that occasion. The receipts and cards of admission can be had at book stores, and of agents throughout the country, at $5 per share, or by enclosing the amount in a registered letter to

W. H. MITCHELL, No. 14 Chambers Street, New York.

Wines and Cordials.

I will send to any address, on receipt of One Dollar, directions for making the following Wines and Cordials, so extensively used in Great Britain, viz.: Scotch, Spanish, Raspberry, Marston, Claret, Champagne, Gooseberry, Currant, Ginger, Honey, Peach, Strawberry, and Elderberry, equal to imported Champagne. The cost is but trifling. Contains no alcohol. Pleasant to the taste, and exceedingly healthy. Address Thomas H. Golding, Lancaster, Ohio.

FIVE DOLLAR GOLD MEDAL SEWING MACHINE.

An entirely new and formidable Sewing Machine, Class I, especially adapted to FAMILY USE, with Pulver improvement. Warranted extra strong, elegant, and RAPID.

WILL REWIND UP FOR YOU. MAKE THE SEWING THE SAME AS YOURS. WILL NOT STOP A SEWING. IS A SELF-FEEDING.

STRENGTH, ELASTICITY, SPEED, SILENTLY, CERTAINLY, and CHEAPLY in use. Gives perfect satisfaction whenever introduced. One machine, Class I, for justly use forwarded by Express to any part on receipt of price, $5. Address Gold Medal Sewing Machine Co., 2 E. corner of Ann and Nassau Streets, New York.

FISHING TACKLE.

In all its varieties, for sale by A. DRAPER, No. 23 Nassau Street, one door from Nassau Lane, New York.

Patent Sheep- and Cat-fish-Pan-Hook, a perfect trap; springs open in the fish's mouth; expeditious and lays all want them. Send 25 cents and stamp for two sample books, or $1 25 for one dozen, and trade-price, to JOSEPH BRIGGS, 120 Broadway, New York. Room 25.

STANDARD AMERICAN

BILLIARD TABLES.

Approved and adopted by the Billiard Congress of 1863. The best and only reliable Billiard Tables manufactured in this country, and every article relating to Billiards, for sale by PHILAN & COLLENDER, Nos. 62, 64, 66, and 68 Crosby Street, New York City.

I. H. WALRAVEN, IMPORTER AND DEALER IN CURTAINS, WINDOW-SHADES, AND LINENS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

No. 686 Broadway, New York, 719 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

CLOSING OUT SALE

NEUFCHATEL WATCH CO.

Owing to the failure and sudden closing of the works and business of the

NEUFCHATEL WATCH CO.

A large number of fine Watches, manufactured especially for the United States, being heavy, fine-time time-keepers, intended to stand hard usage and sudden changes of temperature, are left in our hands for immediate sale. As agents of the Company, we are obliged to dispose of this stock for cash in the shortest possible time. We have, therefore, decided on the plan announced as the one that will be profitable to the desired result. This plan gives every one an opportunity of obtaining fine-time time-keepers at a price that all can command. An every certificate represents a Watch, there are no blanks, and every one who invests in this sale acquires a Watch at half the retail price at least; and, if all fortunate, one to wear with pride through life.

Remittances may be made at our risk in registered letters or by express, or post-office orders and drafts payable to our order, and we guarantee a safe return. This INSURE each delivery and sure return to every party. We warrant every Watch as represented, and satisfaction is guaranteed in every instance. Knowing the worth of the stock, we can give a guarantee to every purchaser. The price has been placed at the very low figure in order to insure immediate sale; and all who desire to improve the opportunity should make early application.

HAZARD, MOORE & CO.,

120 Broadway, New York, (late 202 Broadway.)

AGENTS FOR THE NEUFCHATEL WATCH CO.

THE FOLLOWING SPLENDID LIST OF Fine Watches and Chains,

Worth $350,000!

TO BE SOLD FOR

TEN DOLLARS EACH.

Table listing various watches and chains with their prices, such as 127 Gold hunting-cased Chronometers, 143 Gold hunting-cased English Pat. Levers, etc.

EP' All the above list of Watches will be sold for Ten Dollars each.

Certificate representing each and every Watch in the above list are placed in similar envelopes and sealed. Any person obtaining a Certificate, to be had at our office, or sent by mail to any address, can have the article called for on the return of the certificate, with Ten Dollars.

We charge for forwarding certificates, 50 cents each. Five will be sent for $2, and three for $5. The certificates must in all cases be returned with and accompany the money when goods are ordered.

All orders promptly filled and forwarded by return mail or express. Address

HAZARD, MOORE & CO.,

120 Broadway, New York.

5000 Agents Wanted. $5 per day and expenses. Send stamp for circular to Bell & Co., Springfield, Mass.

HARPER'S

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

FOR JUNE, 1866.

TERMS.

One Copy for one Year $4 00
An Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Five Stars.
Subscribers, at $4 00 each, or 5 Copies for $20 00.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE and HARPER'S WEEKLY, together, one year, $8 00.

Circulation 112,000.

The Publishers will accept a limited number of first-class Advertisements for their Magazines, at the following low rates:

Table showing advertising rates: One Page, $20 00; Half Page, 15 00; Quarter Page, 7 50.

Or $1 50 per line for a less space. Average eight words to a line. HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

Circulation nearly 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $4 00
One Copy for Three Months 1 00
And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Five Subscribers, at $4 00 each, or 5 Copies for $20 00. Payment invariably in advance.

The Bound Volumes of HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement will be sent to any part of the United States, free of carriage, upon receipt of the price, viz.:

Table showing shipping rates: Cloth Binding, $1 25 per Volume; Half Bound, 75 00.

Each Volume contains the Numbers for One Year.

Terms to Advertisers.—One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for inside, and Two Dollars per line for outside Advertisements, each insertion.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

RATHER 'CUTE.

SMALL BUT SHARP-PASSIONER. "Look here! You didn't give me the Right Change just now!"

CLERK. "Too Late, Sir! You should have Spoken when you took your Ticket!"

PASSIONER. "Should I? Well, it's of no Consequence to me; but you gave me Five Dollars Too Much! Ta-ta!"

Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York,
(Two Doors from Wall.)

Collection made, with quick returns.
Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks,
Bonds, and Gold will receive our personal attention.

ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

POLLAK & SON Mearschers Manufacturing, 221 Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Pipes and Blows cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular. Pipes $5 to $50 each.

Marvin's Patent
ALUM AND DRY PLASTER, FIRE AND BURGLAR
SAFE'S
Never lose their fire-proof qualities, corrode the iron, or shrink their contents.
Safes and other safe for silverware.
MARVIN & CO.,
265 Broadway, New York.
113 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
Revolvers, Rifles,
Muskets, and Carbines,
For the United States Service. Also
POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS,
REPEATING PISTOLS,
Rifle Cases, Revolving Rifles,
Rifle and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Materials. Sold
by Gun Dealers and the Trade generally.
In these days of House-breaking and Robbery, every House, Store, Bank, and Office should have one of Remington's Revolvers.
Circulars containing cuts and description of our Arms
will be furnished upon application.
E. REMINGTON & SONS, Illus, N. Y.

MUSICAL BOXES,
Playing from one to thirty-six different tunes, and costing from $5 00
to $60 00. The most complete stock ever offered for sale in New York.
Fine ornaments for the parlor, and pleasant companions for the STRAID.
M. J. FAILLARD & CO., Importers,
21 Maiden Lane (op stairs), New York. Musical Boxes repaired.

FOR PUBLIC EXHIBITIONS.
Stereoscopes, Magic Lanterns, and Dissolving Views, with pictures from all parts, and of every interesting subject, made by JAMES W. QUINN & CO., 224 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.
Printed and illustrated catalogue sent gratis.

MADAME JUMEL'S "MANMARIAL BALM" for establishing and beautifying the form. Mechanical appliances used when necessary. Madame Jumel's WREN-KLE OILY EXTRACT. Depot, 343 CANAL STREET.
Orders mailed to Agent for Madame Jumel promptly attended to. Send for Circular.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
And others should send to all parts of the United States by HARDEN'S EXPRESS, 45 Broadway.

Ladies & Gentlemen
OUT OF THE CITY,
TAKE YOUR OWN MEASURE AND SEND TO
E. A. BROOKS, AGT.
Importer and Manufacturer of
BOOTS, SHOES, &c.
575 Broadway, New York.

Directions for Measuring the Feet.
First. Place the foot upon a piece of paper and trace the outline of same with a pencil, which will give the length and spread of the foot, as shown in figure A.
Second. Make the following measurements, in inches and fractions, with tape measure, as shown in figure B, viz:
1st.—The ball of the foot.
2d.—The last toe.
3d.—The length of the 4th.—The Heel.
5th.—The Arch.
6th.—The Gait.

THIS HOUSE IS THE LARGEST IN THE CITY, AND WAS ESTABLISHED IN 1848.

Best Shirt Collars, "diamond, Snow-White," $1. Send "red" and "grey." Hildes & Puggen, 75 Nassau St., N. Y.

O'BRIEN'S NATIONAL PRIZE CONCERT WILL BE HELD AT The Rink,
Thursday, July 5th, 1866.

THIS HALL, BEING THE LARGEST IN THE CITY, WILL ACCOMMODATE ALL WHO WISH TO ATTEND. IMMEDIATELY AFTER THE CONCERT THE DRAWING WILL TAKE PLACE.

One Hundred Thousand Dollars
IN VALUABLE PRIZES INCLUDING
Twenty-three Thousand Dollars in Money,
WILL BE GIVEN TO THE TICKET-HOLDERS.
ONLY 100,000 TICKETS AND 25,000 PRIZES,
Being One Chance in Four.

The First Prize is Ten Thousand Dollars in Cash.

The Drawing will positively take place at the time mentioned. The prizes are all purchased, and will be delivered immediately after the Concert; and a full statement of the drawing and list of the winning numbers will be sent to every ticket-holder. Parties whose numbers appear on the list will forward their tickets at once, with full directions for shipping goods or money. I have published a NEW BOOK, containing a full list of prizes, describing how the prizes will be drawn, and how parties not in the city are to send for them, and, indeed, answering every question about the Concert, besides containing much other valuable information, which I will send free of charge to every one buying a ticket and inclosing five cents to pay postage.

Inducements to Clubs:
I WILL SEND
For $ 4 00..... 5 Tickets..... 30 Tickets.
For 7 00..... 8 Tickets..... 40 Tickets.
For 10 00..... 12 Tickets..... 50 Tickets.
For 17 50..... 20 Tickets..... 100 Tickets.
For 21 00..... 30 Tickets.....

Money can be sent at my risk by Draft, Post-Office Order, or Registered Letter. Always send your full Name, State, County, and Post-Office.
ORDER TICKETS EARLY. At this time, June 1st, not over 10,000 Tickets remain unsold, and this number will soon be exhausted. Money received after the Tickets are all sold will be promptly returned.
M. O'BRIEN, 122 Dearborn Street, CHICAGO.

Representatives: William Schanz, N. Y. City; L. Prang & Co., Boston, Mass.; U. Taber & Co., New Bedford, Mass.;
Frazier & Tappin, Rochester, N. Y.; J. M. Bradstreet & Son, Chicago and New York; Goodell & Co., New York City;
L. A. Hill & Co., Boston, Mass.; Butler, Perigo, & Way, Baltimore, Md.; Wm. M. Kuhl, Cincinnati, Ohio; Rice
& Allen, Chicago and Kalamazoo; Wm. B. Egan & Co., Chicago, and every other, banker, and merchant in Chicago.

LOCKWOOD'S
(Licensed by the Union Paper Collar Company.)
MOULDED COLLARS,
The Trade supplied with all Styles and Sizes at 93 Reade Street, N. Y. & 255 South Third St., Phila.

THE UNITED STATES PRIZE CONCERT,

To have been given at CROSBY'S OPERA-HOUSE on MONDAY, MAY 29th, 1866, will be postponed until MONDAY, JULY 2d, 1866, on which occasion HALF A MILLION DOLLARS
IN PRIZES will be presented to Ticket-Holders, including

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS IN GREENBACKS.

THIS POSTPONEMENT is an unavoidable necessity, not so much in consequence of the number of tickets yet reserved as the positive necessity there is for a proper registration of those already disposed of, which has been delayed in consequence of the negligence and carelessness of a portion of our Agents in making their proper returns. We advise all parties waiting tickets to send for them without delay, as we have but a limited number yet on hand. We wish most particularly to impress upon the minds of our Agents the importance of their making their returns at once, and of receiving whatever errors may have crept into their reports immediately. We will pay to those sending for tickets that if they should all be sold at the time their order is received the money will be returned. No applications for new Agents for the sale of tickets will be considered, as we have no more than sufficient tickets for those Agents we have already appointed. Tickets are for sale at the principal Hotels, Book and Music Stores in the city, and at our Office, 122 Dearborn Street; price $1 each; sent by mail on receipt of price and stamp for return postage. We invite the particular attention of persons wishing to order tickets by mail to the following

Special Terms, or Club Rates.
Any party procuring a club of five or more names for tickets, and forwarding us the money for the same, will be allowed the following concessions, viz:

WE WILL SEND

5 Tickets to one address for..... $4 50	30 Tickets to one address for..... $25 00
10 Tickets to one address for..... 9 00	40 Tickets to one address for..... 35 00
15 Tickets to one address for..... 17 50	50 Tickets to one address for..... 45 00
And 100 Tickets to one address for..... $50 00

In every case send the name and post-office address of each separate subscriber. Money, by draft, post-office order, express, or in registered letters, may be sent at our risk. All communications should be addressed to

WIGGINS, BRADFORD & CO.,
122 Dearborn Street, Chicago, Ill.

The proprietors will devote to the Lincoln and Douglas Monument Fund $1000; also there will be $2000 reserved from the proceeds of the drawing, for the same purpose.

Representatives—Hon. Major Dan. Mason, Ex-M.C., of Ind.; Hon. Ira J. Laycock, of Kansas; Hon. William LaFayette well, Lyons, Iowa; Hon. Joseph Knapp, of Chicago; Hon. C. Graves Smith, of Minn.; Jacob Foreyth, Agt. M. & E. L., Chicago, Ill.; M. Krumpholtz & Co., Importers of watches, Chicago.

Proposals for inserting this advertisement are requested.

SOMETHING NEW.

A SET OF ROCK-CRYSTAL JEWELRY, comprising
BREAKFAST-PIN AND EAR-RINGS, $7 50.
A FULL SET DITTO, comprising BREAKFAST-PIN, EAR-RINGS, NICKEL-PLATE, AND BRACELETS, $9.
Forwarded to any address free of receipt of the price.
F. P. PERKINS & BROTHER,
Importers of East India and Fancy Goods,
122 Broadway, New York.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER.

This new celebrated Revolver exceeds all others for compactness, effectiveness, durability, power, and safety in carrying. It is light (14 oz.), small only 1 1/2 in., with larger metallic water-proof cylinder 20-100 ball than any Revolver made of same size and weight. Send for Circular. GEO. A. BURROCK, 33 Rockman Street, New York.

PESTACHINE

It is the best Restorer for the Hair, and an excellent dressing. Invented by Dr. RUOFF; manufactured by ORIN SKINNELL & CO., Springfield, Mass.; and sold by DEMAS BARNES & CO., New York.

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

100 SPLENDID PHOTOGRAPHS of Female Deuties for 25 cents. Address
D. L. FOX, 24 Varick Street, New York City.

EMPLOYMENT
$2,000 A YEAR PAID AGENTS.
MALE & FEMALE FOR PARTICULARS
ADDRESS W. G. WILSON CLEVELAND, O.

WARD'S
Paper Collars
AND CUFFS FOR LADIES
AND GENTLEMEN,
Wholesale & Retail,
387 BROADWAY, N. Y.

NOTICE TO THE TRADE.
A wholesale price-list sent by mail.

THE REISSUE OF

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

JUN 24 1866
LIBRARY

Vol. X.—No. 495.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 23, 1866.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

WALL STREET, NEW YORK.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY WILLIAM B. AUSTIN, NEW YORK.]

Vertical text on the left margin, including names like 'J. D. S. Jolley' and 'W. S. T. Lewis & Co. Wall St. N.Y.' along with small illustrations of eyeglasses.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 23, 1866.

THE REPORT OF THE CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE.

THE Report of the Congressional Committee upon Reconstruction is so able and conclusive that we wish it might be universally read. It is the Constitution and common sense applied to the situation; and after the passionate and pettifogging spirit in which Reconstruction, the most important of all our present questions, has been so often discussed its tone is manly and dignified. There is nothing exactly new in the arguments of the Committee, but the Report is an unanswerable statement of the conclusions to which the commonsense of the loyal part of the country had arrived, and upon which, as we believe, it now reposes.

Those conclusions are in brief that the rebellious States were left, at the close of the war, without other valid government than the military authority of the United States, directed by the President as Commander-in-chief; that the civil government of those States could become valid only upon recognition by Congress, and that the resumption by those States of their relations in the Union can occur only upon such conditions as Congress may prescribe. The folly of the assumption of ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS and the late allies of the rebellion, that the moment a rebel State was forced by arms to surrender it regained untouched and without condition every right and privilege it had enjoyed as a part of the Union is conclusively exposed by the Committee. "To admit such a principle for one moment would be to declare that treason is always master and loyalty a blunder. Such a principle is void by its very nature and essence, because inconsistent with the theory of government and fatal to its very existence."

To know the condition of the late rebel States it was necessary either to take the opinion of the President solely, or to sift the evidence upon which that opinion was founded and enlarge the range of testimony. This latter course was adopted, and the impression left upon the Committee is again that of the great mass of Union men in the country. The condition of the States in question is precisely what was to be expected. It is a feeling of intense regret that the struggle could not be prolonged, and of bitter hostility toward the Government. But while this is natural to any party defeated in so fierce a contest, the Committee find that it is peculiarly strong in the States in question. "The conciliatory measures of the Government do not seem to have been met even half-way. The bitterness and defiance exhibited toward the United States under such circumstances is without a parallel in the history of the world." It is remarkable that Mr. SEWARD in his Auburn speech states the situation exactly the other way. "The work of reconciliation," he says, "has outstripped expectation. Indeed, it has never had a parallel in human affairs." We presume that the private conviction of most of us, based upon all the various public and private evidence of the year, will confirm the Committee's judgment rather than Mr. SEWARD'S.

After the most careful consideration upon adequate evidence the Committee believe that adequate security should be required for future peace and safety, and they suggest, as the result of natural concession, the amendment determining civil rights, equalizing representation, disqualifying certain persons for office under certain conditions, and disowning the rebel debt. This amendment has been already adopted by the Senate in a moderate and generous sense, and will undoubtedly be approved by the House. As there is nothing in it which is not strictly in consonance with the views which the President has often expressed, we hope that for the sake of harmony he will not oppose it. If, however, a bill should be offered for his signature, postponing the admission of any late rebel State to Congress until the amendment had become a part of the Constitution and had been ratified by the State, he would undoubtedly veto it. It seems to us, for many good reasons, advisable that each suspended State should be restored upon its individual acceptance of the condition, and we hope that such may be the final judgment of Congress.

Thus this most important Committee concludes its labors, and concludes them worthily. It has been severely derided and insulted by the most malignant enemies of the Union and Government at the North and South; and even the President's impatience has betrayed him into disparagement of it. But we challenge any cavalier to produce from history an instance of a settlement by a victorious government so honorable, so reasonable, so free from vengeance, so tenacious of the spirit of a truly free government. There is no lately rebellious citizen of the United States who "acquiesces" honestly in the situation who can declare it ungenerous or unjust, while every faithful citizen will heartily commend it as the true popular platform. The substance of this Report is sure to be filtered through editorials and speeches, so that it will become familiar to the country. But Union clubs and committees could do no better service to the good cause than to multiply legible copies of it.

OUR NEUTRALITY.

THE President's late decisive proclamation of neutrality in the Fenian raid upon Canada was derided by those who snarl at all his acts, but was of necessity cordially approved by all thoughtful citizens in whose minds passion and prejudice had not obscured the sense of national honor. We are at peace with Great Britain—a peace which the interests of liberty and civilization require to be maintained—and to insist that we shall wink at the desolation of a neighboring colony of that power by such a body as the "Fenian army," because Great Britain played fast and loose in her neutrality during our late war, is simply childish and preposterous. To plead the dishonor of England as an excuse for our own, is to dispute the palm of shame.

We vigorously denounced the insincerity of British neutrality. We derided it as dishonorable to the last degree. We swelled with indignant scorn at the miserable subterfuges of the British Government in the matter of the Alabama. Were we right or wrong? Was her conduct honorable or ignoble? Of course we have not changed our opinion—and why, then, should we sneer at our Government for refusing to do precisely what we think is dastardly in the British Government to have done? The strictest freedom of speech in debating the wrongs of Ireland or of any other country we properly tolerate. The organization of an Irish Republic in Union Square is an innocent diversion of the subscribers to Fenian bonds. The call to send arms to Ireland or the exhortation to strike at Canada, are all permissible, for they are thus far words merely, mere wind. But if the attempt is made to send arms, they are justly seized. If men attempt to put their vows into execution from our territory, they are justly opposed. And if the movement be apparently concerted and imposing from its numbers, the proclamation of neutrality is a simple Executive duty. Our only regret is, that the Government should have apparently countenanced the movement by releasing JOHN MERRICK at the request of a Fenian deputation. To release him was not unwise; but to do so upon such a request was to commit a double blunder, for it was both a recognition of Fenians and a discrimination among American citizens founded upon birth. As Irishmen, American citizens have nothing to ask of the Government—and as Fenian Irishmen (to use an Irish figure of speech) still less.

There is nothing more commendable in our history than our consistent and conscientious observance of neutral duties, which was honorably acknowledged by "Hibernicus" during the Alabama debates. It began with the existence of the Government itself. President WASHINGTON declared the strictest rule, and enforced it. In 1793 there was war between England and France. The friendship for our late ally and antipathy to our recent foe were yet warm, and JEFFERSON, the especial friend of France, was Secretary of State. But WASHINGTON and JEFFERSON both acted promptly and efficiently. They did not wait for proofs of intended expeditions to be furnished by the representatives of either belligerent. "As soon as it was perceived that such enterprises would be attempted orders to prevent them were dispatched to all the States and ports of the Union." In 1805, when Mr. JEFFERSON was President, he equipped a fleet to enforce neutrality, and "to bring in the offenders as pirates." In 1818 President MONROE compliments "the whole community" for its honorable fidelity to neutral obligations. In the border troubles of 1838-40 Mr. WEBSTER, as Secretary of State, declares the intention of the President to bring "to exemplary punishment" all the violators of law and disturbers of the peace upon the Canadian border. In 1848, when the Germans were trying to unite in one great empire, their Government sent commissioners to this country to buy a steam war vessel. But learning that the buyers were interested in the little Schleswig-Holstein war, our Government forbade the sailing of the steamer, nor was she permitted to depart until, after long negotiations, the buyers gave bonds in $900,000 that she should never be used against any nation with which we were at peace. In 1855, during the Russian war, the Government seized Mr. LOW'S bark Moway, although it considered the complaint of the British consul improbable, and it proved to be totally unfounded.

In the recent instance not only our uniform precedent and the general reason of such cases, but the intrinsic inhumanity and folly of the belligerent acts demanded the strict enforcement of neutrality. The attempt was to sunder the British empire by seizing Canada by that part of the Irish population of the United States with whom their most conspicuous religious and political leaders will have nothing to do, and who were earnestly dissatisfied from the enterprise by the recognized head of the revolutionary movement. There could be no conceivable result of such a mad foray but bloodshed and sorrow. It is true that Canada looked on coolly when rebel raids against us were plotted under her eyes. But is that Canadian conduct to be the model of ours? Did the offense of Canada, great as it was, deserve that her soil and cities should be exposed by us to such a horde and such a spirit as ravaged New York in the July riots of 1863? Even the correspondent of the New York Herald, which has incessantly magnified Fenianism, admits, in speaking of the invading "army," that "the most of them were nothing more or less than an armed mob, roving about wherever they pleased, robbing the homes, and insulting and abusing women and children." If our laws and precedents had not forbidden our connivance with so horrible a tragedy as this raid would have been, if unchecked, certainly our common humanity and common sense should have forced us to interfere; and the President is to be heartily thanked for his fidelity to the national honor.

THE PROBABLE WAR IN EUROPE.

TEXAS will apparently be a Conference of the European powers, but it is generally conceded that war is unavoidable. This will not seem strange to any one who reflects that there is a universal wish in Europe to reconstruct the map, as it is called. That can be done only by peaceful negotiation or by war. But what chance is there among the conflicting claims, and hot passions and ambitions of the various powers, that a harmonious redistribution could be made? The wisest heads are clearly of opinion that it is hopeless, and that it may not be possible even to hold the dogs of war in leash until the Congress dissolves.

Meanwhile the number of troops upon a war footing is already enormous. The northern army of Austria alone, under General BISMARCK, upon the frontiers of Prussia and Saxony, is composed of 380,000 men and 500 guns. The Austrian force in Venetia is 190,000 men, while the Austrian reserves comprise 800,000. Vienna is being rapidly fortified. The Italian army will contain more than 500,000 men, of whom 250,000 are already in the first line, and are inspired with the utmost enthusiasm. The Prussian force is immense, and Europe is already a camp once more.

There are two elements which have not been much considered, but which may prove to be of great importance. These are Russia and the Republicans. The people of Europe at this time would hardly allow the struggle to be merely a dynastic combat. They would seize the moment of universal tumult to claim further rights; and when once a war begins of the necessary proportions of this, it is impossible to foretell the end or the results. A great deal more than was meant will be both won and lost.

A. J. HAMILTON AND A. H. STEPHENS.

ANDREW J. HAMILTON OF TEXAS, and ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS OF GEORGIA, are representatives of the two spirits between which, from this time forward, there will be "an irrepressible conflict" in the late rebel States. They are both natives of slave States. They have both been slaveholders and Democrats. They have both been recognized political leaders. They are both men of intellectual ability, tenacity, and force. But the heart and hand of one are set toward the future, those of the other to the past.

When the other Southern leaders of the Democratic party took up arms against the Government STEPHENS warned them to pause. He pleaded that he was as true as they to State sovereignty and slavery. He declared that with him the Union was subordinate to "the South." He tried to show them that "the South"—meaning the ambition of those leaders and the interests of slavery—could still control the Government, and that open rebellion would be ruin. But the conspirators were bolder than he, although less astute. Possibly they felt that the conscience of the American people, which was now clearly awakened, could not be put to sleep again, because it had caught a glimpse of the eternal truth that the national interest was coincident with justice, and that therefore every year's delay was fatal both to their ambition and its unholy object. But whatever their motive, they shouted with RONNET TOOMAN that if the sword were not put into their hands they would seize it—and they did so. STEPHENS became silent, and floated with the current, and was made the Lieutenant of the conspiracy. Then he opened his mouth to say what even WIGFALL and the most foolish and fierce of the conspirators hardly dared to breathe—that the express intention of the new empire was to surpass Dahomey, and its Government was to be founded upon the crime against human nature itself which civilized mankind had elsewhere scornfully spurned.

But when the conspirators declared themselves in TEXAS HAMILTON defied them. In fiery appeals to the people he exposed the nature of the conspiracy and the purpose of its chiefs. He showed the benignity and blamelessness of the Government, declared its intrinsic power, and foretold its overwhelming triumph. His voice was an inspiring bugle blast of patriotism, and no man's attitude in any formidable crisis was ever more heroic than his. Hated and denounced by the rebel chiefs, he stood fast and cried aloud until to stay longer was useless; and then, hunted by men fiercer than blood-hounds, he made his way within the Union lines. There he continued his work. His voice was heard every where encouraging the loyal heart of the country, until, with the victory which he had prophesied, he returned to Texas as Provisional Governor. Of all those who have filled that office HAMILTON alone clearly comprehended the situation. He understood the struggle. He knew and trusted the principle which had prevailed, and he was resolved that that principle should inspire the policy of reconstruction in his State, because that only promised peace and permanent union.

HAMILTON and STEPHENS are both again conspicuous, both are again leaders of public opinion at the South. STEPHENS declares that his principles and convictions are unchanged. He still holds to the right of secession. He "acquiesces" in the result because all force of further resistance is exhausted. An ardent rebel, he proudly reaffirms his faith in the principle of the rebellion, and denying the right of the Government which he has vainly sought to overthrow to exact any security for its safety, he haughtily claims "share in its control." Encouraged by his position the old spirit of "the South" revives, that spirit which has been so terribly proved fatal to the Union and the Government. HAMILTON, on the other hand, says plainly to STEPHENS and his friends: "You have made it necessary for them (the loyal people of the United States) to make certain requirements of you, and they will do it in such a manner as that they will never be disturbed again by a rebellion. I would do the same, and so would you if placed in a similar position. You would not permit any State to go back until you had assurance of the hearty submission of the people in a manner not yet given by the people of Texas." Then, with a directness and force which must rather amaze STEPHENS and his friends, HAMILTON, after declaring the freedom to be the equal of any of them before the law, exclaims: "As a friend of the Government of the United States, as a friend of humanity, and as a man of truth and honor, he is immeasurably the superior of any pardoned but unrepentant rebel."

When one man says so, many men think so. General HAMILTON announces that there shall now be the utmost freedom of speech, and that the truth shall be told fearlessly. He will be supported by those who believe that the United States will see fair play, and the debate between the old silence and despotism of slavery and State sovereignty, and the new speech and inspiration of Liberty and the Union will be opened. It will be hot and sharp, but the issue is clear. With the formation of a true Union party, the real character of "acquiescent" like STEPHENS, who hold to the things that are passing away, will be revealed, and a healthy political condition will ensue. As a conciliator, as a peace-maker, as a patriot, as a true American, ANDREW J. HAMILTON is as superior to ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS now, as he was superior to him in wisdom and patriotism during the war; and it is by such men as HAMILTON, and by such principles as his, and not by leaders like STEPHENS that the true reconstruction of the late rebel States will be effected.

THE FEAST OF FOLLY.

IN the time of Queen ELIZABETH of England the fashions imported from the Continent were so extravagant and ruinous to private fortunes that the Queen, who had three thousand dresses in her wardrobe, issued a proclamation against extravagance in dress. We have no Queen, but we certainly have need of the proclamation. The wild waste of money in the most vulgar ways is a matter of profound public concern. It tends directly to make marriage difficult, and whatever limits honorable marriage threatens public morality.

Our feast of folly is the more contemptible that it is imported. Our vanity is second-hand. New York is apparently content to be a cast-off Paris. Like a pert maid it smirks and ogles in the discarded dresses of its mistresses. It waits for Paris to be hooped before it enlarges its skirts, and mockingly reduces them when Paris dwindles. The follies of Long-champs are daring, original, and preposterous. But they are the follies of one of the richest and most corrupt of European courts. The same follies, carefully imitated in New York or at Saratoga or Newport, are only feeble and farcical.

Does an honest young man, earning his living in New York, and hoping to marry his sweet-heart on some happy future day, wish to see her spring the Princess MARIANNE or the superb Mrs. B——, a noted divorcee in Paris, at whom even newspaper correspondents laugh

THE SOUTHERN METHODIST BISHOPS.—PHOTOGRAPHED BY LEWIS, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA.—[SEE PAGE 386.]

Daily.

Merrill.

Palmer.

Duggell.

Anderson.

McTear.

Plummer.

Wright.

McLain.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.)

INSIDE
A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.
IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

MR. WRIGHT AT HOME.

CHAPTER XXIII.

If ever a man was justifiable in flying to the flowing bowl to-night surely that man is Alonzo Wright. True, he has made solemn oath not to take another drop, Christmas having witnessed his last awful frolic, with the death of a favorite negro man somehow mixed up in its frantic festivities, until next Fourth of July, unless, Mr. Wright most carefully stipulates in his vow, we gain our independence before then; in which latter case he, Tim Lamum, Dr. Peel, Bob Withers, and a few other like spirits, are solemnly pledged to each other to have about the greatest time of it yet known on earth; Captain Richard Simmons moving and assisting unanimously to carry said proviso.

A dozen times has Mr. Wright ~~assisted~~ Anne, hanging with silent importunity upon his arm on this as well as every other occasion of his leaving home for Somerville, that he will not taste, touch, smell a drop, not even go on the side of the street where the grocery is. For Mr. Wright is far from being an austere father. Anne has grown up in his eyes the fairest and loveliest and most thoroughly accomplished of women. There is a droop in her large blue eyes, a wave and fall in her fair hair, a mould of her form, an altogether indescribable sweetness in manner and tone which would attach any father in the world. In addition to her being his only child and chiefest companion, she is her dead mother over again. Very often, indeed, of evenings, when Anne sits at the piano, her fingers straying over the keys from one piece to another, singing half a song here, another half there, breaking out in some brilliant bravura, or idling through the tangles of a schottische, does her father sit, cigar in mouth, looking at and loving her with all the admiration and love of his soul. A rather small, light-complexioned man is Mr. Wright, but your big burly people never feel most. It is in the slight-built organizations you find fire and force; leanness and ferocity are coupled in the wild-owl, vivacity and venom in viper and rattlesnake.

In fact, ~~the~~ Anne at least is "all the world to" her father. At the head of his table; her graceful form about the house all day in diligent housekeeping; persuading and remonstrating with the servants, who serve the family wondrous well under the double impulse of mortal terror of "Maa 'Loon," on the one side, and devoted attachment to "Missanny," as they call her, on the other; even when Dr. Peel or other company are being entertained in the parlor, Mr. Wright, proudly conscious of Anne from the moment he awakes in the morning till he kicks off his boots at night, can join in whatever denunciation of the Yankees is going on between him and the gentleman with whom he is conversing, and be keenly alive all the time to the ever-varying loveliness of Anne on the other side of the room.

Why conceal these bitterest pangs of remorse which give such intensity to Mr. Wright's paternal affection? Yes, Anne is like her mother, most like that mother when at her loveliest; and there were hushed whispers in the community in which Mr. Wright lived at the time of his wife's death, vague rumors from family servants, and from friends who prepared the body for burial, of bruises and marks. Let us say so more about it where nothing certain is known. No man knows better than Mr. Wright that he is a devil incarnate in his cups, and the demonic love of liquor which possesses the man is restrained only by his love for his daughter, and mortal dread of what he may do to her in some moment of intoxication.

And yet, reasoning with thousands of other Secessionists at the same instant, if ever a man was justifiable, every thing to the contrary notwithstanding, in drowning his sorrows in the bowl to-night that man is Alonzo Wright. As an almost universal rule, even those of the Secession leaders, in the army and out of it, who never drank before, are taking to drinking now. As to those who have drunk hard all along, these do nothing else now at all.

"Why, look at it, gentlemen," says Captain Richard Simmons, who sits to-night on the counter of the grocery, his left arm around a pillar, from which hang the fly-specked muscans of red, white, yellow, and blue paper cut into meshes adorning the ceiling, expressing, for Tim Lamum, who sits dead drunk in an adjoining arm-chair, and for Bob Withers, who smokes in silence, and for Dr. Peel, whose speech is exclusively oaths, and for Alonzo Wright, who is brooding over the times, seated on the card-table, his slouched head down over his eyes, the painful feelings of all.

"Only permit your eyes to range over the situation, as Lamum says in the Star. A Yankee, gentlemen, Lamum is," adds Captain Simmons, impressively. "It may be a weakness inherent in my nature; I've tried to master it again and yet again. I will be frank with you; I can not. My soul abhors a Yankee. Never mind about his professed devotion to the Confederacy. A lifetime spent in fiercest ardor for it would not satisfy me. My nature revolts from a Yankee. There's old Nobby—a Yankee school-master! Who so loud and strong for the South? Insisting on shaking my hand every time we met over our glorious victories. I pledge you my word of honor, gentlemen, I always went straight to my room at Staples's and washed my hands with soap every time. Natural antipathies? For one, gentlemen, I loathe, abominate, detest, execrate—"

"Oh, hold your horses, Simmons, by George! who knows? You may be one yourself. Feddled the ware for years for what we know. Very likely all your talk only a Yankee trick to throw us off."

"If it is by such buffoonery, Bob Withers, you seek to divert our minds in this dark hour of our country's distress your remarks are beneath, because doubly beneath, my notice. Charleston fallen, gentlemen!" continues Captain Simmons, dismissing Mr. Withers from existence by a slow wave of his hand. "I can not realize it. The fact is, it is a thing which can not be realized. I can imagine Wilmington fallen. I do not deny that Petersburg and Richmond are polluted by feet I never dreamed would tread them. That General Lee has surrendered, though it was infinitely worse than death to me, I can because I must believe. Nor do I refuse to acknowledge that Mobile is occupied; that Johnston, whom I revered next to Lee and Davis, has also surrendered. Dick Taylor's surrender smites us to-day like the hand of fate. But Charleston! From every other consideration my soul revolts to Charleston. I can not realize it, gentlemen. I may succeed in some degree by the time I have retired at night, but the first thing I know I find myself sitting bolt upright in bed, during the silent watches of the midnight hour, in a cold sweat, and exclaiming, 'By Him who made me, it is not, must not, shall not, can not be so! Charleston? C-h-a-r-l-e-s-ton! Impossible!'"

"Why not get up a theory, Simmons?" says Dr. Peel, scrupulously neat in attire, while the rest are disordered in apparel to the last degree; in the highest spirits, whether from liquor or not, though he does not show any signs of intoxication other than that, while his comrades, Bob Withers excepted, can not drink enough to float them even to ordinary water-mark. "You proved to us, Simmons, in this very room that Charleston, Wilmington, Petersburg, and Richmond, if evacuated, would only be so in pursuance of Lee's new plan of abandoning the seacoast and concentrating in the interior—a new plan, splendid plan. When Lee surrendered you were ready for that. Lee always had a reason for what he did. Lee had sent all his veterans to Johnston, and surrendered as a consummate rascal! Come, Captain, you have never wanted for a theory before; make haste. Where is your inventive faculty? Some brilliant scheme, if we only knew what it was, behind all this news you are wailing over." And Dr. Peel flashes his white teeth upon him, in singular spirits considering the times.

"Sir," replies Captain Simmons, with oracular dignity, "I wait to hear from President Davis. I can see deep meaning in the consummate silence of that Washington of our glorious revolution."

"You can? By George, I can't! What is the use of being a drove of geese still, gentlemen?"

It is Bob Withers who proposes the question, rising from his seat to do it. Very much inflamed is Bob's face these trying times, from excessive weeping, perhaps. But it is an honest, sensible, good-humored, Bacchus-like face, too.

"I always looked on the thing as a big spree, and you know I always said so. I knew it was all wrong from the start, ruinous and wrong as any thing gets to be in this world, a tremendous frolic. We all went into it. Of course I wasn't the man to stay behind. It was the wildest, most expensive, biggest spree you ever saw, and I pitched in. Yes, and would do it again tomorrow if it was to do over again; never backed out when half a dozen fellows invited me to go in. When the whole South got drunk, think I'm going to keep sober? But the smash up has come at last—it will come. Broken windows and crockery and tables to pay for, headache, empty purse, black eyes, men killed. But wasn't it the grandest blow out! But I knew all along it was a spree, always said so; they could never humbug me, by George! with their lies. No, Sir-ree, bob!"

"There is this one consolation, gentlemen," remarks Captain Simmons, more Chesterfieldian the drunker he gets, with a solemn air, and waving gracefully aside the volatility of their Mercutio—"one consolation which fills my nature in this hour of darkness with profound satisfaction—the killing of Abraham Lincoln. Had I an offspring I would have him baptized Booth Simmons. Even in my pangs of bitterest mortification at the failure, if failure it is, of our beloved Confederacy, I say to myself, 'Captain Simmons, Captain Simmons, you forget that Lincoln the tyrant is at this moment in eternal perdition. Like the balm of some place of which I was instructed by pious parents—Gilead I think is the name—the reflection soothes, at least for the moment, the anguish of my spirit.'"

"The last place I would think you would wish Lincoln to go to, Simmons," remarks Dr. Peel, with great surprise.

"Exactly what I was going to say, Doctor, by George!" puts in Bob Withers.

"May I request an explanation, gentlemen?" asks Captain Simmons, with his staidest air.

"I would think you would much rather he had gone to heaven. You have hated him so much here one would suppose you would regret being associated eternally with him hereafter," replies Dr. Peel, with Mr. Withers's cordial assent.

"If there be a thing which disgusts me more than all besides with inobriety," says Captain Simmons, with slow and unspokeable scorn, "it is the reckless impiety and irreligion too often connected with it. No merit in myself, seeing my early advantages, my inculcated habit of worshipping from earliest infancy in the sanctuary. Be drunkards, gentlemen, if you must," adds Captain Simmons, with impressive solemnity, "but not scoffers—no, not scoffers. 'Tis the voice of the scoffer, I hear him complain.' Not exactly that, but something to that effect was intimated—"

"We respect your piety, Simmons," interrupts Dr. Peel. "It is fully equal to that of Parnon Barker, at least; he told me to-day that it was not so much the hand of Booth as the hand of God. His only regret, he says, is that Booth did not kill him on the day of his inauguration. Dozens of church-members—lying Sam Peters, Dr. Ginnis, and the like—say they are glad of the assassination, regret that it failed in the case of Seward, hope the good work will go on. Even that little saint, Ellis, the sincerest and best of them all, got almost drunk with joy over it." From this statement, however, the writer of these lines distinctly withholds his belief.

Let us step out of this choice set of companions, only for a moment, to say a word as to the way in which the killing of Mr. Lincoln was received in Somerville.

There is Jen Badd. When Staples, every hair on ~~his~~, rushes into Jen's shop and announces the glorious news, that dirty-faced artisan pauses long enough, with suspended file, to say, "Ah!" with genuine surprise; to add immediately after, as he continues his filing at the gun-barrel clenched in the vice before him, "Just what I always said." It is but history to record, however, that when Dr. Warner drops in a moment after to ask after Mrs. Badd's very precious health, and to tell Jen—of course that was altogether a secondary motive—the news of the surrender of General Lee, which comes by the same mail, but which Staples has neglected to mention, the gun-smith stops altogether from his work, and, adding largely to the darkness of his nose by a long reflective rub thereof with his forefinger, has genuine joy in his eyes while he says, "Precisely so, Doctor; what I always thought."

The fact is, no sentiment, whatever it was, whether Union or Secession, has ever been advanced in Jen's hearing since the war began which has not met in Jen a ready assent. Like hundreds of thousands of others at the South during this period, Jen has but put in practice Talleyrand's famous maxim—that words were given to us to enable us to conceal our thoughts.

There is Mr. Ferguson, too. Very eagerly he pines in the dispatch announcing the assassination, with every thing relating to it, but as the grandest of all lies, the very blossoming and perfection of the lies of the period. Only his sincere affection for Mr. Arthur will afford him patience with the unshakable belief that gentleman gives to the news from the outset. He even condescends, the Scotchman, to argue with his friend. Mr. Lincoln would have been assassinated in Richmond if at all. How could he have been killed in a crowded theatre, and the murderer escape? Besides, it is known that Mr. Lincoln is a member of the Presbyterian Church, and consequently no attendant at theatres. Can not Mr. Arthur see that the news is manufactured to accompany and neutralize the tidings of Lee's surrender? The trick is too transparent.

A tremendous amount of evidence it took to convince us Secessionists that Vicksburg had fallen, and all the rest; we do not want to believe it, you observe, therefore we won't. Alas, we should all be descended from the same Adam! But the amount of evidence it required to satisfy us Union people that Burnside was repulsed on the Rappahannock and the like is incredible. If the heart would not get so dreadfully in the way of the head!

As wide apart as Heaven and Hades are the brutal rejoicings of red-faced Mrs. Smithers and the sincere regrets of Mrs. Bowles over the same event. Not even Mrs. Smithers's deliberate and permanent sentiments, let us hope.

"I regret it; Alice deno, even more than I would deplore the fact of General Lee's surrender, if such preposterous news should prove true, and total change in Dr. Peel's manner as he stands before him. "That is all. You are safe up to a certain point. Take care."

THE QUIL.

And the preacher has left the room as suddenly, yet as coolly too, as he entered it, leaving Dr. Peel, who has not even attempted to speak, wilted down behind him. Yes, wilted down is the word, whatever rallying of passions there may be afterward; as if some gorgeous palm-tree were to have the life suddenly withdrawn from its towering height and tropical foliage.

Whether this were the cause or not, there is no telling how long Dr. Peel may have continued, on the occasion of Bob Withers's mention of Mr. Arthur, to have cursed him; nor how zealously Bob, risen somewhat unsteadily to his feet to do so, might have wielded his cudgels in favor of Mr. Arthur, whom never since the war began has he failed to defend on every instance of attack, and the instances are very many of Mr. Arthur's being denounced in his presence; no telling, we say, how long the altercation may have proceeded, when a singular diversion therefrom occurs.

"Dr. Peel," says Alonso Wright, whom all had supposed asleep, suddenly rising from his seat, pushing back his slouched hat, which has all along covered his slant broodings not slumbering, drawing his revolver, cocking it, pressing it against Dr. Peel's broad chest, with his finger on the trigger—"Dr. Peel, look here! I want to know, now and here, what do you mean?"

"Mean?" Dr. Peel is of a ghastly pallor as he asks the question, not daring to stir a hair's breadth; even Captain Simmons stops his maulin chant, and, with Bob Withers, is silent with amazement, as much at the sudden and peculiar tone of Mr. Wright as at his action.

"Mean? In reference to what?" Dr. Peel rather gasps than articulately asks the question, quailing under the deadly light in Mr. Wright's small, half-closed eyes, as well as at that cold peculiar voice.

"In reference to her," replies that individual. "Oh!" It is but an exclamation from Dr. Peel's parched lips; but it indicates at least partial relief. "You forget that others are present, Mr. Wright. I will speak with you alone on that point with the greatest pleasure," he adds immediately.

"Humph! That is a fact. I had forgotten they were here with us. I was thinking. Come now," and, slipping his revolver, after uncocking it, into its leather case at his side, Mr. Wright rises.

"With pleasure. In one moment, Sir. But one word, gentlemen," says Dr. Peel, pausing as the door. "You will oblige me, oblige both Mr. Wright and myself, by making no allusion whatever to this little matter. I beg your promise on your honor you will not mention it to any one, gentlemen," adds the speaker, still more anxiously, as some new thought seems to pass over his mind at the instant. "Do I have it?" he asks, with eager look at each.

"Certainly," says Bob Withers, with a good-humored nod. "Most assuredly you may rely upon my honor," adds Captain Simmons in his gentlest tones, with a reassuring wave of his left hand, and knowing nothing at all of what is going on. "Permit me to entreat you, however, not to abandon the flowing bowl, which inebriates, though, alas! under our depressing circumstances, it fails to cheer."

But the two are gone. Not is there any record of their conversation thereafter. Only this—an old family servant testifies to having overheard Dr. Peel remark the next afternoon to Mr. Wright in the parlor at the latter gentleman's house, a few moments before Anne comes in to give them, at her father's request, a little music. The two gentlemen had arrived from town very late the night before. Pretty much all day they had spent in riding out over the plantation in company. At dinner the servants, as well as Anne, had remarked that Mr. Wright, though pale and exhausted as he always was after an excess, was in the highest, wildest spirits, peculiarly affectionate toward his daughter. Dr. Peel, on the other hand, attracted the attention even of the dullest of the servants waiting upon the table. At times he would join in the conversation, lead it in his liveliest manner, full of anecdote and laughter. Again his countenance would fall, he would cease to converse, seem to be buried in deepest thought, sallow, drooping, drinking eagerly and frequently of the wine upon the table, and, after dinner, upon the side-board, as if to obtain a supply of stimulation which had been suddenly cut off from within.

The very servants waiting upon the table and about the house that and the evening days compared notes in the kitchen even then, as well as months afterward, upon the singularity of Dr. Peel's manner toward their young mistress. Now addressing himself to her in his easy, bold, sparkling way as of old, although by an evident effort, as if he forced himself to do so against his natural choice. Then glancing at her again furtively, fearfully, with an indescribable mixture of admiration and apprehension, not without quick side looks as of deadliest terror at Mr. Wright himself, playing the host with all the ease of the master of a household toward a favored and welcome guest.

But it was this which the old house-servant Alfred spoke of often after as having overheard Dr. Peel say to Mr. Wright, in evident pursuance of a previous conversation:

"You may rest confident, Sir, that it will not be by my fault. But I have little hope. I fear, greatly fear you are mistaken."

"Stuff, nonsense, Doctor. I will take the chances on you any day." Alfred testifies to his master's having made reply just as Anne entered the room. "Faint heart, man, never won fair lady." And surely father had never cause to be prouder of or more affectionate toward a daughter than did Mr. Wright this afternoon. No wonder he so openly manifests that pride and affection.

You may have observed, Miss, or Madam—you, Sir, certainly have—how the ladies, especially the younger ones, suddenly and surprisingly bloom out upon our planet in the early spring. It may be some cunning alteration in their dress, doing with subtle skill for themselves, in the way of adornment, what the Creator does then for bird and bristly and flower. Or it may be that nature, in clothing at that season the plains with verdure, the lower animals with freshness of skin and plumage, forgets not to give them a softer light to the eye, a sweeter dew to the lip, a deeper bloom to the cheek, a gentler ripeness to the form in the case of woman, who is undoubtedly the dearest to her heart of all Dame Nature's numerous family. And, it may be, the eye and the imagination are themselves quickened by the stirrings of spring in us men also to view things in a brighter light. Whatever be the reason therefor the fact is so.

And never woman that May morning exemplified it more than did Anne Wright. Clothed in a modest dress of some crazy hue, her fair hair in abundant curls about face and neck, her complexion of a softer glow, and her eyes of a deeper blue, she beams upon her father and upon his guest with a beauty surpassing any thing they had either of them ever before imagined in her. Her every motion and tone even are modulated to a livelier, at the same time gentler, melody. Who knows what presentiments connected with their visitor were not moving in her blood?

When left alone together in the parlor by Mr. Wright, who has to see for a moment to the fire plowing of his corn, Dr. Peel and Anne know before a word is spoken that the eventual hour of their lives has arrived. It is the man not the woman who is embarrassed. Quiet and modest and pure as she is, the whole thing is with her so much a matter known and settled as to being no new, or intensely agitating, thought with it. During the years now of Dr. Peel's visiting at her father's house, though he has made no formal proposals, she has learned perfectly well that he loves her, and that—she loves him.

But it is strange so bold a man as Dr. Peel, one so supremely self-satisfied and independent in bearing heretofore, should seem as if smitten by an ague. His face has grown of an ashen yellow, contrasting badly with hair and eyes so dark. And there is a fastidiousness about these latter, a trembling about the large and bejeweled hands, an irresolution and timidity, upon which Anne grounds her own guesses and composure. In fact, the two seem to have completely changed places, only there is something altogether indescribable in the bearing of Dr. Peel, to which even the words mean and cowardly may be given. To any other than poor little Anne he would have the aspect rather of a condemned criminal covering under sentence than of a confident lover. The simple fact is, strange as it may seem, Dr. Peel seeks to know his fate at Anne's hands to-day, only because the alternative is to receive it in more serious shape still at the hands of her father.

"But I am anxious you should know—should not be deceived. In fact, if you know all I know you would—I am convinced it would be useless in me to expect your fear."

It is Dr. Peel who says it, more nervous and vulnerable even than when, half an hour before, his conversation with Anne began. But Anne only laughs, as composed as he is the reverse, laughs a joyous and confident laugh.

"I am a poor man," continues the lover, and repeats it eagerly, as if it was a sudden and welcome thought—"a poor man, a very poor man, indeed. You may have imagined me to be rich. I confess I have given you false impressions on that point. I am extremely poor, Miss Anne; not at all able to support you as you should wish and naturally expect." And he looks at her with eager eyes.

Anne laughs more than ever. "You have told me that you love me," she says, as if she loved to repeat the assertion. "What do you think I care about whether you are rich or poor?"

Dr. Peel walks the room like a baffled man. Another thought strikes him. He eagerly seizes upon a gilded Bible lying upon the table, advances upon Anne as if to say something, then returns it in haste to the same spot as eagerly, and continues to walk the room in evident distress of mind.

"Dr. Peel," says Anne, at last, a blush burning over neck and face, "I do not understand all this. If you do not really love me, do not really wish—"

But Dr. Peel is at her feet before the words are out of her lips, in passionate accents assuring her of his affection, only there is the covering, fearful manner over it all, hardly venturing to look her in the eyes even in his warmest protestations. "No, no, no, not that, not that, Miss Anne. I only was anxious to save you from—not to deceive you," he says, hurriedly.

"You will see what proof I give of affection." And he goes to the table, gets the Bible, and seats himself beside her as with a desperate calmness. "That you may not blame me I am about to put my life in your hands. Will you swear not to reveal to any one what I tell you?"

Anne laughs, wonders a little, gazes upon the anxious face of her lover, lays her little hand upon the book, curiosity creeping uppermost. "Why, what in the world," she begins.

"What I tell you will shock you terribly. If it were known to your father he would kill me instantly, here in this room."

Anne gazes upon the agitated man with blue eyes widening with wonder, curiosity, and deeper affection for this splendid suppliant. "It will not bind me a bit more than I would have been," she says, at last. "Yes, to please you, I'll swear; and I do wish you and pa would let me do all the swearing." And she lifts the book to her lips.

"Not even to your father?" says Dr. Peel. "Not to a living soul. Why, what on earth?" "Miss Anne," says Dr. Peel, in most impressive manner and with lower tones, "you and your father have been greatly mistaken in me. I am—an no Secessionist at all; I am a—Union man."

Anne sits looking at him with wonder, taking full note of his, to her, handsome face and form; it is as if an emperor knelt at her feet. "A Union man! Why, Dr. Peel, who would have thought of it?" troubled, wondering, bewildered for whole minutes.

"I knew you would reject me when you know it. And I swear to you it is so," continues Dr. Peel, watching her face with painful inquiry.

"A Union man? Why, who in the world! Oh yes," Anne adds, rapidly, half in earnest. "It's a great pity, a very great pity. Pa and I thought you the very best Southern man we ever knew. But then I'll give you pa's newspapers to read. Besides, I could convert you myself. I will tell you all how they treated us, about—wasn't it about Kansas or Nebraska? one or the other; and how they wanted to free our negroes, and what women's rights people they are, and all their terrible atrocities, and the way they have marched their soldiers over our country burning and plundering. Oh, ever so much! I am certain I could convert you"—glowing with beautiful confidence—"positively certain!"

"Never, Miss Anne. Not even you. I always have been a Union man. Will be one for ever and ever," says Dr. Peel, very slowly, and Anne sits wondering and troubled, while her lover watches her with anxiety.

"Ha! I never thought of it. Dr. Warner there in Somerville, Mr. Ferguson, Mr. Brooks; there is Mr. Arthur, too—over so many in Somerville are Union people, they say," breaks in Anne, at last, "and they are not such desperately bad people either. Besides," and the artless girl puts her fair curls from her glowing cheeks, and laughs with delight, "there is Mrs. Sorel, and the girl I love most in the world, Alice Bowles. I know she is Union; she told me so herself; or, at least, she wouldn't say she wasn't, couldn't make her do it when she was here last week. Yes," added Anne, eagerly, and with a blush, "and Alice's own mother, too, is a good Secessionist; and I needn't be Union, must I? Please not. I never thought of that. Yes," she added, with the glad haste of a child, "and then the war is over. Pa himself says we are whipped. Very soon there won't be such names as Union man and Secessionist as all, will there?" And the difficulty has passed as entirely away beneath her ardent affection as a cloud before a summer's wind. "If you only say you really and truly love me," she adds, with archness and joy.

"Love you? I love you as the flowers do the light. I adore you as you adore God," breaks out Dr. Peel, with feverish energy, but with the cowering eyes, the shrinking and apprehension of manner as before. And again the baffled lover walks the room, Bible in hand, in deepest, most painful thought, while Anne wonders and—laughs.

"Miss Anne," says Dr. Peel, "I have not told you all yet. Remember your oath," and he holds up the Bible in his hand. "My life is in your hands. There is another thing I must tell you. If your father had guessed it, had the faintest suspicion of it, he would shoot me down here as sure as you are sitting there. Had I better not tell you? You will reject me with horror."

Anne looks at him with blue eyes opening again with wonder. But love is fast rallying all other sentiments in her heart, for it is master of all else in a woman, to its support. Here is this man, whom yesterday she loved yet so feared, the grandest and most powerful of all men she ever knew, he is at her feet, has put his utmost confidence in her, will hide nothing from her, places even his life in her hands.

"I have sworn; you need not fear me." She wonders and laughs—"Why, what on earth?" "Miss Anne," says Dr. Peel, coming near her and speaking in lowest tones, "I am an altogether different man from what your father and yourself have supposed me to be—totally different in every sense. I am not an officer in the service of the Confederacy. I am, really and truly, an agent, have been from the opening of the war an agent, an active secret agent of the Federal Government. I am one this moment. I intend to be one so long as the Government wants me. There! All I ask is that you only reject me, not tell your father or any one else till I can get away." And Dr. Peel, with sallow face and cowering eyes as before, watches her lips as if for his destiny.

Poor Anne! The matter is altogether too much for such lovely curls, and blue eyes, and rosy cheeks, complexion, and lithe, childish form. She is bewildered, stunned; passes her hand wearily over her brow, tries to think. Love bestirs itself in her bosom, summons all the sentiments of the soul to its aid. Romance! Anne has long dreamed of a hero of romance as her true knight; if ever woman had such a lover she now has. There is a glory and a grandeur, too, these latter days, in the very name of the Federal Government; it is something very much to be deputed, but very powerful and magnificent; and all this vague grandeur now falls like a mantle around her lover. Pity, too. Yes, if my father knew it he would lay him dead on that floor. One little whisper to her father, and—she knows him well—there are the rapid cracks of a revolver, and this stately Prince of hers lies his length on that parlor floor a dead man in his blood. Her lover is in her power, and he deliberately placed himself there—such his confidence in her. Besides, it strikes her with wonderful force; what a brave man! To think of his spending years in Somerville, being here now with a sword suspended over his head—why, it is the very chivalry of romance! Love him? She never so dreamed of loving him. She loves him the more she thinks. Reject him? Reject him now she knows all this? It would be like rejecting the whole universe!

"Dr. Peel," she says at last, lifting up her eyes like those of a little child to his face, "did you say that you loved me, loved me really and truly?"

With singular contrariety between cowering eyes and impassioned words, Dr. Peel renews his protestations vehemently.

"I will marry you," she says, quietly and simply; placing, as she says it, her little hand in his.

The strong man is convulsed with emotions beyond his control. He grasps the little, soft hand, and lets it go. He groans and curses half aloud. He actually weeps. Anne notices the beads of perspiration start upon his brow. He lifts her hand to his lips, and lowers it again before touching it with there. And all through his agony it is with cowering eyes. Anne is astonished. There rises against her love a great amazement, which, like a billow, threatens to overtop and bear it down.

She follows him with alarmed as well as wondering eyes while he, again risen from her side, paces the floor in agonies of perplexity. The tears actually trickle annotated by him down his cheeks; he grinds his teeth, and curses under his breath.

"Miss Anne," says he, at last, "I have not told you all even yet. The worst is to come, infinitely the worst. Do you think you could love me, be my wife, cleave to me whoever and whatever I am?—but the emphasis he puts into the words can not be written. Don't answer yet. Think. Imagine of me the worst possible thing that your imagination can frame—the very worst—the very, very, very worst. Stop! Do not be in a hurry. Think!" And the man ventures to look straight at her, with the look, ghastly and dreadful, of a criminal convicted of the foulest of crimes.

"Dr. Peel, I am an innocent country girl," says Anne, at last, even placidly. "I have had no mother to guide me since I was a little child. All you have told me this morning has astonished and shocked me. I am so bewildered I can hardly think at all. But one thing I know. You have told me a thousand times this afternoon that you love me with all your heart. I can not understand what you mean by what you now say. But I know that I love you and will marry you. Is that not enough?" asks Anne, like a little child. "Though what in the world you mean—"

"Hallo, man! did over a fellow need more than that?" It is Mr. Wright, who breaks in upon them, having opened the door unperceived by either in their excitement. "Why, Peel, you look more as if you had seen a ghost. You little rascal, Anne, I didn't know you could cove and terrify a man so, you little tartar! Yes, I heard her, Doctor. All right! Kiss me before you go, Anne. The fact is, Dr. Peel, I have taken a fancy to you! I knew it was all stuff what you insisted about Anne's not having you. It was because you had not asked her—and no one would ever have suspected you of holding back!" And Mr. Wright rattles on in the highest spirits.

Before sight Dr. Peel, after an interview with Anne, has arranged with Mr. Wright that the marriage is to take place almost immediately—for pressing reasons. "Meanwhile we will keep it all, of course, a profound secret. And I must leave the day of the wedding with Miss—Miss Anne; most pressing and important business," the lover says.

Dr. Peel may be a happy man, but he seems to be singularly cold and hard—with always the cowering eyes.

AT SEA.

Far away, the flowers are growing,
And the sweet June breezes blowing,
Rich warm light on hay-fields glowing,
Stoopy cattle, homeward going,
By the leafy hedgerows lying,
Lights and shadows waver o'er,
Lovingly, the lovely shore,
Far, far away.

Here the winds are round us sighing,
And the desert waves replying,
And the sea-net skimming, flying,
Round our ship, her rough track plying,
Day and night still changing, dying,
Round our course—for evermore
Passing from the lovely shore,
Far, far away.

Far away dear hearts are sending Thoughts of love, all space transcending;
Dear and honored knees are bowing,
Voices sweet for us ascending,
Many a note of blessing blending—
Mighty blessings, following o'er,
Guard us to that other shore,
Far, far away.

Moonlight on the waters sleeping!
Sea, in golden glory sleeping!
Stars, your watch above us keeping!
Waves about us rolling, leaping!
Winds these liquid mountains leaping,
Light us, tell us, bear us o'er
To that other unknown shore,
Far, far away.

NOON AT THE PRIMARY SCHOOL FOR FREEDMEN, VICKSBURG, MISSISSIPPI.—[SEE PAGE 398.]

PRIMARY SCHOOL FOR FREEDMEN, IN CHARGE OF Mrs. GREEN, AT VICKSBURG, MISSISSIPPI.—[SEE PAGE 398.]

MARDI-DAY FESTIVAL AT NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA.—[See Page 392.]

BARS IN THE LANE.

By GEORGE COOPER.

After the milking was over
Annie would follow the cows
Half a mile, down to the clover,
And turn them in to browse.
Neat little figure is Annie,
Handling the bars in the lane,
Letting down ever so many
Just in the sunlight's wane.
Wild-roses blooming beside her
Much not her cheeks' lovely red;
And her leaves, trying to hide her,
Dance at her musical tread.
Witching curls peep from her bonnet—
Peep like bright birds from their nest;
And her hair—oh to have won it!—
Beats with a gentle unrest.
Lips may be humming a ditty,
And faces may show unconcern;
But secrets there are—what a pity
That some are so easy to learn!
Now while the robins are nesting
Why does she wait in the lane?
Though, if white arms need a resting,
No one, of course, could complain.
Light in the farm-house are gleaming,
And bars must be laid in their place;
But little Annie stands dreaming,
A blush on her beautiful face.
Is it late? Not that she cares now;
Ah! merry eyes, mild and brown,
Could you not tell why she wears now
Just the least mite of a frown?
Over the path by the mill-side
Some one would wander by night;
Some one who came from the mill-side,
Lured by two eyes that are bright.
Meadow and valley grow stiller
Under the earlier stars;
Would it be strange if the miller
Help Annie to put up the bars?

FLINT AND STEEL.

LOOKING at me now you can hardly realize what a gay, willful, careless girl I was in my teens, when I was Stella Martin, instead of "Grandma Flint."
I was an only child, and my parents made an idol of me. Their love showed itself (like more's the pity) in letting me have my own way in every thing. Short of my running into fire or water, I do not think they ever restrained me, and unless it might have been the noon or stars, there was nothing I cried for that I did not have. When I went to school I met with resistance and discipline for the first time, but my gay temper, pretty looks, and coaxing ways made me a favorite with teachers and scholars, and I soon had my own way almost as much as ever.
When I was fourteen I declared myself tired of our quiet village life, and persuaded my parents to let the farm and remove to a large town, where I went to a fashionable school and made new and gay friends. I enjoyed myself thoroughly for nearly four years; then I met a power that no prayers or persuasions, no tears or passion of mine could move.
The power of Death. It had never come near me before, but now it snatched away my dear, gentle, indulgent mother. My grief was so unreasonable and violent that my health became affected. I hated the town and its gayeties, and father gladly took us home to our quiet red farm-house on the hill, surrounded by its well-known corn-fields and pastures, and overlooking the winding river and straggling village.
There had been many changes in our absence, but the one that concerned me most was, that the Geertz had moved away from the farm next ours, and it was now occupied by a family of orphan girls all younger than I, and under the care of a brother much older. Prissy Flint, the eldest girl, soon came to see me and we became fast friends, for she was a tender, kind, loving little thing, always glad to be guided, and we were both mourning our mothers.
We were constantly together, for our homes were only a quarter of a mile apart, and the path through father's corn-fields and along the best-tree lane to the Flint orchard was a very pleasant walk.
The elder brother was away teaching, but Prissy had a great deal to say about him, and I soon learned that "brother Edmund" was the light and the low of her life. Every plan, every opinion, every wish had been formed by or must be referred to him.
She quoted him, praised him, and referred to him till I was weary of his name and perfections. She was so unable to do any thing without his knowledge and approval that, with my hatred of control and dictation, I soon took a violent prejudice against him. It was strengthened by hearing his peevish sneer and his opinions deferred to by every one I met. At sewing-circles the girls would ask me:
"Have'n't you seen Edmund Flint yet?" "What a pity!" "You'll be sure to admire him." "But you needn't expect he'll admire you; he's as cold as ice." "Even you can't break his heart, Stella."
"He hasn't any to break," said another. "Oh yes he has, but Stella isn't the kind for him. She isn't good nor steady enough."
"She won't dare to carry on in the singing seats when he gets home," said Sally Bowers.
"And why not, pray?" I retorted, losing patience at last.
"Wall, you try and you'll find out—that's all,"
was the reply.
"O, don't," implored little Polly Colby—"Edmond Flint's as good as the minister. He makes us all behave."

"I shall not be afraid of him. I shall do just as I please."
"O, won't you go with Prissy then."
"O, you would think he was a king, by the way you all talk," I returned, scornfully. "I shall not bow down to him, you will see. And now do let's talk of something else."
As usual, my will prevailed. I had always been the queen and leader before I went away, and now, with my town dresses and manners, I had easily resumed my sceptre. Spring and summer passed away; I had recovered my old health and spirits; Prissy and I were more intimate than ever, and her brother was still absent. One Sunday morning I waited for her to call for me as usual on her way to church; waited till it was late, then hurried on alone, and, arriving heated and annoyed, found her in her place in the choir, and the "long prayer" began. I was very irreverent then, and began to question her at once, but she only colored, and put her finger imploringly on her lips. Not a word would she speak till the prayer was over, and then only a hurried whisper.
"Den't, Stella, please; brother's here, and he never likes me to talk in church time."
I threw back my head scornfully, and caught a glimpse of a tall figure and a grave, brown face in the tenor row. I was careful not to look that way again. He should see that I, at least, took no interest in him, the conceited tyrant; but I couldn't help listening for his voice with great curiosity when the singing began. With all my wish to find fault I could only admire its perfect sweetness and wonderful flexibility and compass. This only irritated me the more, and I determined to plague him.
If I couldn't make Prissy talk I would make her laugh, and as soon as the sermon was fairly under way I began to draw caricatures in my hymn-book and show them to her. I was very clever with my pencil, and soon had the poor girl in an agony of suppressed laughter, and could hear her brother snoring uneasily.
I rejoiced, but not long, for a hand was placed on her shoulder, and a stern, handsome face bent down between us, whispered a few words that changed her laughter into remorseful tears. Not another look would she give at my sketches. I was not to be so easily put down, and soon had a new one passing around among the more reckless members of the choir. Presently Dick Price, the minister's son, a wild scamp of a boy, leaned over and said,
"Let's see the fun, Stella," and some one handed the book toward him. Hardly had he grasped it, when I heard that new voice, quick, low, and decided.
"Give it to me, Dick; are you not ashamed of yourself? If you have no reverence for God's house, you might, at least, have some regard for your father."
I felt that the book was surrendered, and as utter silence fell upon the gallery; and I knew that for that day, at least, my power had gone to my rival.
Mortified and angry, I sat through the remainder of the services, and almost hated my own voice when I found how beautifully it blended with his in the last hymn. Part of the music was arranged for two voices, and, either in mischief or in compliment to our superiority, it was left to the new-comer and me. Excitement, emulation, and defiance made my tones ring out like a bell. I knew I was doing wonderfully; but through the plaintive, minor strain, and along the old swinging fugue, and out into the burst of glad triumph at the close, went ever with mine, in perfect harmony, that clear, strong, vibrating tenor, soaring and falling and floating, strengthening, surrounding, and perfecting mine.
After it was over I remembered my anger and its cause, and, not wishing to encounter the remarks of the girls, I would not stay for Sabbath-school, but went home without even speaking to Prissy. In the afternoon I did not feel in spirits for any active mischief, but took satisfaction in pretending to sleep all through the sermon, and in avoiding Prissy's gentle attempts at consolation.
In the evening I wandered restlessly out to walk, but had hardly left the gate when I saw Prissy and her brother coming. They were talking earnestly, and I had time to spring back and crouch behind some lilac bushes before they passed. Then I heard her soft voice pleading:
"But she is so bright and gay, so witty and pretty, and fond of me!—oh, brother!"
How my face burned as he replied:
"Beauty without gentleness, wit without reverence, intelligence without discretion. Such a character I can never admire, and I can not think her a desirable mate for my dear little sister."
I started up in angry tears and watched them as they walked away. I knew that timid little Prissy would give me up, but it was not she I watched so keenly, but her tall, manly brother, with his firm step, dark curly hair—cold, brown eyes, and resolute expression. There was nothing I could despise or ridicule. I had to acknowledge to myself that he was more attractive than any young man in town—one any girl might be proud of—and he had decided that I, the Queen of the Village, was unfit to be his sister's friend—I, who had been petted and courted all my life, in the place where he was a comparative stranger! From that moment a wild contradiction of feeling with regard to him possessed me—a determination to hate and defy, and a wild longing to gain his good opinion. "Such a character I can never admire" often rang in my ears, and stimulated new one and now the other of these feelings. "Beauty without gentleness, wit without reverence, intelligence without discretion!"
Often and often, in self-humiliation, I would own it was true; and again I would passionately assure myself that he was hard and unjust.
We were constantly meeting in the choir, at singing-school, sewing circles, sleigh-rides, and all the village gatherings; but I had carefully avoided being introduced. Occasionally circumstances had compelled him to pick up my book or hand me a chair, but the civility was always coldly offered and haughtily accepted. Prissy had gone away to school.

Many weeks passed by, and my power and popularity waned, and Edmund's as steadily increased.
One afternoon in November I went to help decorate the school-house for some exhibition or concert we were to have, to raise money for the church. He was not there, so I had a merry time, and, being interested, stood until all were gone except Ben and Sally Bowers. It was getting dark, and Sally ran home for another candle, our only one being low.
All was done but the motto over the door, and that nearly finished, when the evergreen gave out. Ben hurried into the woods for more, leaving me alone for a few moments. I thought I would hang up the letter O we had just made; so, slinging it over my arm, and taking the candle in my hand, I climbed the ladder, and had just adjusted all to my satisfaction, when my feet somehow slipped, jerking me downward so suddenly that the sleeve of the arm I was holding above my head caught on a big nail and was held fast, while my left hand, which held the candle, was thrown against the crisp wreath, and they blazed up in an instant all around my face and fingers.
I could not free my right arm; every time I tried seemed to fix the stout sleeve more firmly, and only made the ladder tremble dangerously under me.
"Ben! Ben!" I shrieked, "Come quick! quick!
I'm in trouble!" And then I heard a man's step and voice close by.
"Take the candle!" I cried, "and then get up here, somehow, and lift me down. My sleeve is caught, and I can't move, and the ladder is slipping!"
The candle was snatched in a moment, and then I heard one of the desks wrenched up, dragged below me, and some one tall springing upon it clasped my wrist with strong, steady hands, lifted me, freed my sleeve, and as the ladder fell from under my feet, held me close in his arms and jumped lightly to the floor.
For one dizzy moment my head leaned against him, while the blazing wall, the dim rows of desks, and the wintry twilight landscape beyond the open door, blurred together and then were gone.
But the cold air revived me soon, and opening my eyes I looked up and found, with a start, Edmund Flint's dark face, softened and anxious, bending over me.
"Is it you?" I exclaimed, with ungrateful emphasis.
"Yes, it is I," he said, and his face became as cold as usual, as I straightened myself and stood alone and away from him.
For a moment we looked full and haughtily into each other's eyes, then mine fell, mastered, and I trembled as I said:
"Thank you for helping me so quickly and kindly.
I don't know what I should have done. I am very much indebted to you."
He only bowed and went back to tear down and trample out the burning wreaths, while I went out and sat on the door-step waiting for Ben and Sally, for I felt too weak to go home, and my burned hand pained me cruelly. Presently he joined me.
"You mustn't sit here; you will get cold. Take my arm, and I will go home with you."
"I prefer to wait here for Sally and Ben."
"Then I shall stay with you." He sat beside me.
"Why didn't you drop that candle?"
"Because it would have set fire to those pine boughs and then to the ladder."
"That was very brave and thoughtful of you.
Did your hand get burned much? Let me see it."
His quiet, authoritative air annoyed me. I said nothing but concealed my hand under my shawl.
"Do you hate me so much that you had rather suffer than let me help you? I wonder you let me lift you down."
"I thought it was Ben."
"And were angry when you saw who it was?"
"Yes."
"You are very honest at all events. I suppose you will not deny that you dislike me?"
"No."
"Perhaps you will also tell me why?"
"If you choose to hear."
"I do."
"Because, then, you took away from me the love of the only girl I cared for. I was motherless and lonely, but you thought me unfit for her. You shared me before all the choir, and you told Prissy
I had 'beauty without gentleness, wit without reverence, intelligence without discretion.'"
He turned red and pale as I vehemently spoke.
"Did my sister tell you that?"
"No, I heard you as you passed my gate, and I have disliked you ever since."
"You had reason to," he said, gravely, "and I thank you for giving me an opportunity of saying that I am very sorry I judged you so harshly from one interview. It was wrong of me, and I beg your pardon. I have now seen you truly brave, and thoughtful, and honest. I never saw a girl before that was all of these; and you must allow me to say, now that we are speaking so frankly, that I admire you as much now as I disliked you that Sunday. I did take Prissy away because I saw she would do wrong rather than offend you, and I was afraid to have it so. I know you have thought me hard and tyrannical?" I nodded.
"We can call ourselves equal then as to first impressions; but I hope that is past now. Please let me look at your hand."
His frankness and simplicity, his apology and praise had altogether disarmed me. I was in much pain, too, and held out my hand at once. He was shocked at its appearance, and going quickly to the spring behind the school-house brought back a quantity of soft, wet moss, in which he gently wrapped it. Ben now appeared; he had lost the path, and wandered away, and was astonished and concerned at my adventure; but I saw his requish eyes shine when I had to let Edmund pin my shawl, tie on my hood, and go home with me, while he remained to repair damages and explain to Sally.
From that night Edmund perseveringly sought me, in spite of the coldness and rudeness my pettish often led me to assume, for fear he should suspect the power he was fast gaining over me. People began to gossip about us; the village was divided.

Some said it would be a match, others declared that as "Stella had never minded any body and Edmund had always been obeyed, it was impossible."
But love made it possible. Long afterward he told me that at the moment he took me in his arms,
"so small and delicate" (as used to say), "but so fearless and spirited; when I felt your proud little head sink on my shoulder, I felt it shoot through my heart that you were for me, and faith and all I loved you as my own from that time."
With me it was different. I felt his power from the first, but I was too haughty and willful, impatient of control and reproof, to yield easily even to love. He was naturally imperious and stern, and had no understanding of caprice or impulse. His life was ruled by principle and religion, and I often shocked him, and he often hurt me. Many a weary discussion we had, and many a stormy interview—for we were as different as possible, and yet we loved each other dearly all the time. The boys and girls loved to get us together. "Here come Flint and Steel," they would say; "now we shall have knocks and sparks."
At last one June evening Edmund called at the door and asked me to come out to the gate a moment. I went, and there by the lilac bush where I had crouched nine months before stood Prissy, whom I had not spoken to since. She sprung into my arms and cried for joy. I gave one proud glance at her brother, which he met so implacably that I returned her kisses and cried too. Then we had a long talk, all three, and agreed to forgive and forget and be the best of friends for ever and ever. By and-by I walked home with Prissy, and then Edmund returned with me. The locust-trees along the lane were in bloom, and the night air was heavy with their sweetness. You know now, Annie, why I have always loved it, for it brings back to me that quiet summer evening when my true, brave, level, the noblest man I ever knew in God's earth, offered me the treasure of his love; me, the vain, uneducated child, so little worthy to have won it. And I did not appreciate it even then; happy as I made me, proud as I was of it, I often tried it to the ground, and gave him and myself many bitter hours before I learned the lesson that the girl who does not love well enough to obey does not love well enough to marry.
Of course I do not mean when points of conscience are concerned; that is another thing; but outside of that, in every engagement and every marriage questions of expediency, preference, and judgment will arise, and blessed and happy then is the who loves well enough to find submission easy. But, as I said before, I had to learn this lesson by suffering. We were engaged two years, and besides many minor quarrels, we twice came very near parting forever because of my wicked, haughty determination to do my own way and accept neither advice nor reproof.
Once when we were on the river with a party of others I persisted in going where the ice was thin because Edmund had said, in his quiet, absolute way, "You mustn't go beyond the bend, Stella."
I made no answer. When he was gone I had the girls laughing and saying I had found my master at last; and one jeeringly said I didn't dare go, and was quite as much as Prissy now. Stung by her foolish words, I flung myself away from Prissy and hid boldly out upon the forbidden place. One moment of exultation and then the ice cracked, quivered, and, as a wild scream came from the girls,
I went down into the death-cold river. Some of the boys ran after Edmund, and Ben Bowers flung himself flat near the opening and caught my cloak as I came up, and then, with faces pale as lead across, they managed to help me out; and the first thing I saw was poor Prissy flat on the ground in a faint, and Edmund running toward us white as she was.
You can imagine how ashamed I was. But he never reproached me by a word, and after a week of sickness and gentleness I was as gay and mighty as ever.
At another time I was invited to go on a sleighing party with Frank Prescott, a handsome, reckless fellow, an old admirer of mine. Edmund had never approved of him, and he said at once he could not allow me to go. I declared I should not consult him; he was jealous and tyrannical; and I intended to go. At last he said if I did we must part, and I said, "Very well."
I went. Frank was sober when we started; but when we stopped at the Half-way House, and had a dance and refreshments, I saw what I had to expect, but was too proud to say a word over to Prissy, who had come with her brother. When we started to return my partner was so intoxicated he could not drive. I took the reins and drove carelessly fast, for I was now really frightened. Happily had we left the other sleighs behind when Frank threw his arm around me and kissed me again and again with his hot, hateful lips. I screamed as loudly as I could, but all control of the horse, who plunged up a bank and threw us both out into the deep snow. I scrambled up without just as Edmund and Prissy overtook us, and with tears of anger and shame told my story. It was some consolation to have Edmund drag my tormented by the collar to my feet, and make him repeat the banished epilo-gy before he was flung back, sobered, into the sleet.
But all the way home, while I lay crying in Pris-sy's arms, I had no word or look from my love.
Stern and silent he sat. It was a terrible ride, and ended in a cold "Good-night" at my door.
I was heart-broken all the next day, and finally consulted my girls and sent a line, asking him to come to me. We had a long, sober talk. I went out to be forgiven and petted at once, but he said No. How noble and unselfish he was! I cut my member his quiet, firm, and cold as he told me that though he loved me better than his life, though I filled his heart, though with all my faults he loved my every look and tone and could not be happy without me, yet he feared that he was unsteady to me—that I did not love him well enough to bear with his stern temper, and so we had best part. I saw that he was in earnest; that he sincerely preferred my happiness to his own, and was resolute; though his face was pale with pain as he refused my caresses and coaxing. Oh, how little and poor and mean and unworthy I felt—how senseless my past willfulness!

In that moment a new and great love filled my heart; I felt a thrill of assurance that to be guided by him would make me happier than to rule a world. That under the sway of his love, controlled as it always was by high principle and wise judgment, I should be more content than if left to my own caprice.

At last I made him understand this, and then we were blessed indeed; and through the forty years of our married life there was never again more than a momentary cloud between us. Had he been of a mean or tyrannical nature we should have quarreled more and more; but he proved so noble, patient, and just that it became my pride and joy to acknowledge his authority.

When God called him from me twenty years ago, when the brave, clear voice was only a faint whisper, and his once strong arm could not lift the weary hand that lay so light in mine, he told me:

"Stella, you have been the great joy of my life; if I could live it over I would alter nothing in you; I would only try to serve God better and love you more." And then God's gates were opened for him and I was left desolate, only praying that I might follow soon; but the Lord willed that I should live on, long past my beloved, past all my early friends—past strength and usefulness and sight, but not past memory. That gives me still my youth, my husband, and all these happy years.

(Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1866, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.)

THE THREE LITTLE SPADES.

By MISS ANNA WARNER, Author of "Dollars and Cents," etc.

CHAPTER VI.

The lists went by the next day's mail. It was such a fair, soft spring afternoon, in spite of the March wind that went roaring about, peering after squirrel-cups, and alder flowers, and I know not what, that every body had gone out. Mr. May drove off soon after dinner to Hickory Corner, the nearest village, saying nothing, like a wise man, of what he might find at the freight-station. Mrs. May was away on some good errand among her poor neighbors; and the children were clustered in the work-shop, watching Sam.

I'm afraid that people who are fond of yellow satin and such light trifles would not have admired this old work-shop; but the children thought it perfectly charming. It was but a room in the carriage-house, with two extremely cheerful and dusty windows, where whole generations of spiders had spun their threads and woven their tapestry unobserved, dealing out summary justice, with but short imprisonment nor even the form of a trial, to all such wasps, gnats, and blue-bottle flies as came in their way.

In the middle of the room stood a long work-bench; and the sides of the room, and every corner and window ledge, were full of tools. Tool-chests stood on the floor, boxes of nails and screws, old pieces of iron, odd hinges, lay in the window. Here hung up a saw and there a long plane, with twenty other things of which the children knew not even the name. At present their whole attention was fixed upon Sam—watching every mark of his gimlet, winking their eyes at every blow of his great hammer—so they stood in a trance of pleasure.

Sam was working away at a small box with a sloping roof, or rather with ends prepared for a sloping roof; and two other such boxes stood on the work-bench, each being roofed in with neat, classifying pieces of glass.

"I don't see what the glass is for, after all," said Lily.

"Don't you?" said Sam. "Suppose we should break out all the glass in our windows some cold night, what then?"

"Oh, to be sure! the glass keeps the heat in. But then how does it get in, Sam? you can't make a fire in this little place."

"This little place would burn up pretty quick if I did," said Sam. "The heat gets in through the glass, Lily, from the sun. And it gets in better and quicker when the glass is sloped in this way toward the sun than if it were set up straight as it is in our windows."

"I wish I understood why," said Clover.

"Papa'll tell you some day, or I will," said Sam, hammering away. "I haven't time just now."

"Here's papa this minute," said little Primrose.

"Why, so he is!" said Lily, going to one of the dusty windows. "He's left the wagon, and is coming over here with a big, big package in his hands."

Sam looked up for a moment and said, "Ah!" with an expression which proved that he understood the package thoroughly; and then began to whistle "Yankee Doodle," and to use his hammer with great energy all at once.

"Sam likes something," said Primrose, with a laugh. "He always does when he whistles that." "Sam likes several things—Primrose among the rest," said her brother, stooping down to kiss her. "But here's papa."

And Mr. May entered, bearing the great package. Such a package! with long, white handles sticking out steep, and sharp, black points and corners piercing the brown wrapping paper below. The whole tied up and bound together with "furry strings," Lily said, as if on purpose to keep curiosity at a respectful distance. The children clustered round, asking at least a question for every string; Sam stopped his whistling, indeed, out of respect to his father's presence, but there was the faintest smile of pleasure on his face as he laid down his hammer and stood still to watch the proceedings; and as for Mr. May himself, he was clearly as eager as the children, but he would not answer a single question. There he stood, untying some strings, cutting others with his knife, laughing at the children, giving them a pat or a kiss, as the case might be, but still at work on the package.

Such a package! I must say again. It was utterly bewildering and mysterious. And, like an Arabian Nights' difficulty, vanishing into another just as great, the large package presently revealed itself (when the fourth string was cut) into three packages—each one wrapped up in stiff brown paper, tied round with numberless strings, out of which peeped white handles and black corners, just as before.

"There," said Mr. May, with great satisfaction, taking the three packages in hand, and measuring the respective length of the white handles, "this tallest one is for Clover, and the next for Lily; and this smallest of all must be for Primrose! In fact, it looks just like her!"

"Papa?" said Clover, doubtfully, as she took the package.

"I know! I know!" exclaimed Lily, tearing at the brown paper which shrouded her. "It's our tool! our garden tool! Oh, papa, how good you are! Oh, whatever shall I do with these strings! What is the use of tying things up so! Oh, Sam, I see the end of something sticking out of mine!"

And Lily tugged at the strings, and pulled, and tore the paper off, leaving the strings yet on; and finally caught up Sam's chisel, and began to work at the fastenings with that in an alarming way.

"Here, here!" said her brother. "If that is to be the style of operations, you may as well have help and a better tool." And Sam took out his knife, and quickly cut the cords, one after the other.

Clover, meanwhile, was patiently untying her knots, one by one. She had hardly spoken, had not exclaimed at all; but two pink spots in her cheeks grew very deep as she wrought with the hand, unyielding bits of twine, her fingers trembling with eagerness, though they labored on so steadily.

Little Primrose, on her part, was another picture. After one prolonged look at her package, as if to find out wherein it resembled her crimson merino and golden hair and little white ruffs, she stood at a sort of "parade rest;" the package "grounded," her small fingers clasped tight about it, and her whole attention given to Clover's knots and Lily's fingers; her eyes dancing as each fastening gave way. Then, when brown papers fell to the ground, and the bright little steel tools, with their neat white handles, came full into view, Primrose gave one long "Oh!" of wondering delight; and then, as the only other thing she could say, turned round to her father and held her little mouth for a kiss.

"Why, Prim, do you like them?" said Mr. May, laughing and holding her fast, package and all.

"Well, young ones, be as happy as you can, I must go." And with a silent embrace from Clover, and a rather vociferous one from Lily, Mr. May departed.

"Now, Sam," said Lily, "put your work right up and tell us all about these things. Oh dear! I never was so happy in all my life!"

Sam laughed, and sitting down on the work-bench drew Primrose into his arms.

"Does not this little one want to see her tools?" he said.

"Oh yes!" said Primrose. "But my fingers aren't strong enough."

"Mine are," said Sam. "There, you sit up here by me on the bench, and we'll untie all these knots, and talk to Clover and Lily at the same time. What do you want to know about first, Lily?"

"This, I suppose," said Lily, displaying one of her tools, "is a spade."

"That is a spade. See what a beauty of a little one papa has got for Primrose! with a wee, wee handle just big enough for her little fingers. It's perfect."

There could be no doubt about that, from the way the little fingers took hold of it.

"But I thought you were going to dig the ground for us, Sam?" said Lily.

"So I hope to do the first time. But then there may be light digging to do afterward, and transplanting, and all that."

"And we want to learn how, any way," said Clover.

"Well, what's this?" said Lily. "Oh dear! these come Jack. Now we'll have a bother."

"This?" said Jack, unconsciously catching it from Lily's hand, "ha! a fine tool, I declare! This, young ladies, is called a rake; and it is chiefly useful for tearing your flower leaves into long strips, to make them look fringy. It adds very much to the striking effect of a flower-garden."

"You hush, Jack," said Clover, giving his shoulder a gentle tap. "I know a little about rakes, Sam, what's this?"

"A trowel." "And trowels are used for digging up stones, and conveying them to the gravel-walk or the grass," said Jack.

"They're for transplanting," said Sam, smiling, "for digging up little obstinate weeds, for filling flower-pots, and for smoothing the ground where you want to sow seeds."

"And this," said Jack, taking up another tool, "is commonly called Neptune's trident, which you perceive it resembles. In the sea, as used by its original owner, it was excellent for spearing fish; but by the strange mutation of mortal things it is now used in gardens, to spear caterpillars, gnats, and earth-worms. This one of Prim's, you see."

"Indeed mine won't be used for any such thing," said Prim, indignantly. "Spear caterpillars, truly! I don't mean to have one in all my garden."

"How nice!" said Lily. "Only I don't mean to have any weeds. Oh, I'm so happy! Come, let's go and show 'em all to mamma."

"But just wait till I gather up my strings," said Clover.

"Leave 'em here," said Lily, "you don't want 'em."

"They may be useful," said Clover, solemnly.

"Ha! ha! ha!" said Jack, turning a scornful smile in one corner of the work-shop. "Such model gentlemen! One will have no caterpillars, and 't'other will have no weeds; and the other—I don't know, I'll keep watch about Clover's. She's an old-fashioned as a gray rock, and about as steady."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Scarcely ten years ago, at the Government expense of a New England Secretary, a faithful there was read, entitled "A Visit to the Moon." In this there was a description of a dinner party given to the Lunarians; and we remember being struck by one fact that was stated, namely: that the Lunarians of our acquaintance—having reached a point of perfection that even Delicissimo might envy—dispensed entirely with eatables. In place of them were causing little steam-engines, conveniently fitted up, running around the dining-table on circular tracks, and distributing every imaginable delicacy to the guests. We believe, also, that there was some contrivance for conveying the viands to the mouth of each individual. We give publicity to these statements, in the hope that some enterprising person may hasten to make his fortune by appropriate inventions. We will lay no claim to the patent right. And in these days of "dying ships" nothing should be considered impossible.

There are machines for every thing nowadays. Sewing, writing, printing, washing, laughing machines (say not go so be called), and so on ad infinitum. It may be mentioned, however, that as yet no successful thinking machine has been invented; and here is a chance for somebody! The day may not be far distant when authors and editors, sitting only at their desks, may turn a crank, and the machinery spring, leap back, close their eyes for a comfortable nap, and ready to feed a thrilling novel or a learned editorial all ready for the press!

Speaking of usefulness reminds us of a little note recently found among a package of law papers in the pocket of a New York lawyer. It is without date or signature:

"Dear Sir, I'm curious to learn how you make the new washing machine go. You said you were told it would save you the price in six weeks or so. Can you wash whatever you want to? From a shirt to a pair of lace curtains? and has the water pipe where the water runs a guarantee to wash all the buttons? I imagine you probably wouldn't, but, however, it possibly may—don't you think, slowly turning the crank, you could certainly wash baby? I suppose after breakfast on Monday, as you go out to blank your bottom, you stop on the way to the kitchen and do the work's washing with ease. And after a little more practice, I imagine, my precious leather, you'll do all the washing with one hand, while you polish your boots with the other."

"Since you were the person to buy it, do you use it yourself all alone? Or sometimes let kindly try it, while you stand and laugh at the fun? Does the handle flutter your hands? Do the rollers get rusty and squeak? Is the thing what it's cracked up to be? And if it's cracked up, does it hold in the water at all? Why should a poor washing be so much more to be feared than a 'dignit'! Besides, can you more if you will, I ask for the pleasure of knowing: Do you (perhaps) wash-machine still, or do you keep it going?"

A little attention to the condition of some of the city railroad cars would not be out of the province of the Board of Health. Many of them are kept in a state of filthiness almost intolerable. The old, rusty cushions, which have served the public for years and years, should be removed, and clean cane-bottomed seats substituted.

A large silk establishment in Boston was recently examined by the authorities of that city. Four large mules, weighing probably two thousand four hundred pounds, were discovered, and they investigated the contents of one of them. It was filled with refined writing, and on taking a sample for experiment, they found that mixing it with water gave a very good imitation of milk.

A new method of managing boarding-school young ladies has been recently adopted at a seminary in Indianapolis. The other day the principal learned that some of his pupils had packages of letters from young gentlemen in the city—rather explicit. Exasperated beyond endurance he caused the young ladies to stand up before the entire school and read the letters in full, with the names of the writers. There was a fluttering in the school.

Professor Agassiz has been presented with a large and beautiful collection of fishes by the Emperor of Brazil. A pleasant autograph note accompanied the gift.

Small as ladies' bonnets are nowadays the newspapers can't let them alone. One says:

"A lady in the country wrote to a friend in the city to purchase for her a new spring bonnet. She desired the crown to measure seven inches—just enough to cover her waterfall—and a red ribbon."

Another anecdote:

"A new bonnet is out—a common white handkerchief is placed over the top of the head and tied under the throat, with a wreath of roses in the shape of a horseshoe on top."

Still another:

"A new style of bonnet has turned up at Richmond, Indiana. It is described as 'consisting of two straw, tied together with a blue ribbon on the top of the head, and red bands suspended at each of the four ends of the straw. Price, nineteen dollars.'"

A Dutchman now being called upon to testify in court as a witness, exhibited a singular confusion as to his own identity. The usual question being asked, "What is your name?" he replied, "Yes, I recall myself Fred, but maybe you don't know—it is Yewwep. You see, change, mine mother she have two little boys; one of them was an old one was my brother, or one was my brother and 't'other was me—I don't know which; and I was almost so old as my brother was young, or my brother was almost so old as me—I don't know which, and mine mother she don't; and one of us was named Fred and 't'other Yewwep, or one named Yewwep and 't'other Fred—I don't know which; and one of us got died, but mine mother she never could tell whether it was me or mine brother what got died; so, change, I don't know whether I am Fred or Yewwep, and mine mother she don't know."

Those who have hitherto failed in making for themselves a place in the "Pat's Corner" may find consolation in a bit which we cut from an exchange:

"A gentleman in Scotland has preserved an old number of the Greenock Advertiser, containing the following announcement:

"John is Correspondent.—T. G.—The line was meeting 'On Linden, when the sun was low,' are set up to our standard. Poetry is evidently not T. G.'s forte."

These two little gems of thought are full of truth and beauty.

"The last, best truth which comes to late perfection, even in the kindest soul, is tenderness toward the hard."

Schlesinger toward the unobscuring warmth of heart toward the cold, philosophy toward the idealism.

"Christian grace is like perfume—the more they are pressed the sweeter they smell; the more they shine brightest in the dark; the more they are shaken the deeper and they take, and the more fresh they bear."

It is stated in the Paris Journals that on the recent journey of the royal family to Aversa the Empress was attended in the "most simple style." Her dress is described as of rich black green silk, with an immensely long train, which was covered with small jet stars; a tiny anti-slip, likewise studded with jet and trimmed with galunet; and a white steamer bonnet of the Luncheon form, studded with jet and set with Northern blue ribbon strings—such was Her Majesty's traveling costume. An anecdote is told relating to this Aversa journey which shows how observant the Empress is, and how graciously her remarks are responded to. Among the attendants who came to welcome Her Imperial Majesty, M. Canella Doucet was conspicuous in his dress as comrade-general, having been grandly seen during the winter in his academic robe. The Empress soon singled him out, exclaiming, "You are every where, and always in a different form?" to which M. Doucet replied, "Yes, Madame, I do change my costume very frequently, but my sentiments never."

Among the new materials for summer dresses are the pique, which are worn this season so as to look as though they were merely ribbed, and they are generally covered with a pattern. The patterns include brocade arabesque patterns; there are also flowers and hares, and several other designs, generally on white grounds. Pique is very popular for dress-making, and the newest pattern in this material is stripes of a dark color with large dashes or ovals, or stars in the stripes; the ground of the dress is either white or color color.

As a change, there is a new material called the pique. It is made of very fine wool, with satin stripes, and is something like the rosette (cherry) mode. It is very pretty in light color, such as the low blue, pink, maroon, and sea-green. It is not expensive, and many pretty promenade toilets are made of it, trimmed with ribbon of the same color and with thick fringe.

It is not such a difficult matter to be well dressed in summer without spending a great deal of money, as most generally be the case in winter. Freshness is the great merit of a summer toilet.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

Why was Noah's ark like a smoke-house?—Because it had a lion in it.

Vienna Success.—"Taking a Sight."

DEAR SIR, I have just been informed, by one competent to know, that one of the most lucrative positions in that of a postmaster. We can easily believe it to be much more so than that of Postmaster, but that it is worth fifty thousand pounds a year is a downright fact, and so we will. I suggest the remark that such a view must come out of the numbers so well known as a Philistia.

"A lot of copper are in play!" said Mrs. Partington, as her eye caught an account of some mining operations. "I don't wonder they have the profits and every thing else with it. I don't wonder they had in looking for copper diggers, for copper is very plentiful."

BOARDING-SCHOOL, GREEN'S LAMENT.

Perchance I shan't see you in court, With anger, when you bid I quit, To tell me that the milk is sour, And give me food my head is pale! My weakness was 'twas vain to tell When even salt becomes a self!

A rabbit's head is but a skin, My being is dissolved in vain! For water I need swallow not; The laws I find about it in sight! I grumble at the loss I take, Like old John Rogers at his stake.

A word to you, my tender friends, I'm bound to tell it unto you, No language but the French can lead An old enthusiast in the crowd; The brass work of all their talk Is, silly people are the world.

"What is the future state?" said a clergyman to a sprightly little girl. "Heaven, Sir." "No, no," said the clergyman. "I mean what is the real degree of opinion of men and women?" "Why," replied she, after a little hesitation, "I suppose they are to be married."

A Times or Lam.—A forged bank-note.

Why is an over-worked horse like an umbrella?—Because it is used up.

Why is a beef-steak like a locomotive?—It's got so much steam without it's taste.

A Providence can not preserve a ship. The word is "sheep" in his mouth. Being an iron-clad, he said to a boy, "I shan't die a war ship?" "No," answered the boy, "it's a rat."

A Box Striver.—A turpentine.

At a fancy-dress ball in Paris recently, a lady was seen in a very low-bodied dress, white flannel and wearing an abundance of green grass. She was politely asked by a gentleman what she presented. "The 'w. Moss' or." "At low life, then, Madame?" The lady blushed and the gentleman smiled.

The Hawk's Progress.—Over the flower-beds.

JUSTICE BELMONT.—On Good Friday, in a town in North Wales, an elderly minister, with a full pate, judiciously selected for his text, "My sins are greater in number than the hairs on my head."

A GOOD PLACE FOR PATENT HAIR DRESS.—Canada; for there the hair is always gray.

In an old family Bible in Connecticut the record of a birth is entered in this wise: "Elizabeth Jones, born on the 19th November, 1788, according to the best of her recollection!"

A baker has invented a new kind of yeast. It makes bread so light that a pound of it weighs only twelve ounces.

If a young man spends two hours with a young lady every night, and her old folks don't make any fuss about it, and his old folks don't make any fuss about it, the two young folks may be said to be engaged.

A Yankee made a bet with a Dutchman that he could swallow him. The Dutchman lay down upon the table, and the Yankee, taking his big toe in his mouth, slipped it secretly. "Oh, you are lying me," said the Dutchman. "Why, you old fool," replied the Yankee, "did you think I was going to swallow you whole?" "Well," said a hen-pecked husband, "go to bed." "I won't," said the wife, "I will be married!" "Why is an alarm of fire in the night like a chicken-broth?—Because it spoils the nap."

American Custom-house, British Flag, &c. &c. &c.
FENIAN RAID INTO CANADA—VIEW OF WATERLOO, NEAR FORT ERIE, WITH BRITISH CAMPS, ETC.—[SKETCHED BY J. P. HOFFMAN.]

THE UNITED STATES STEAMER "MICHIGAN" WITH CAPTURED FENIANS ON A SCOW-BOAT.—[REPRODUCED BY J. P. HOFFMAN.]

THE FENIAN RAID.
 We give on this page and on page 397 illustrations of the Fenian invasion of Canada. Waterloo is just a little way from Fort Erie. The following extract from the Army and Navy Journal gives a very good account of the raid:
 On Thursday, May 11, a considerable number of Fenians had quietly gathered into Buffalo, calling themselves laborers, bound for California. At about half past two next morning they had collected at Black Rock, some three miles north of Buffalo, and here they at once crossed the Niagara River by the aid of two logs and four canal-boats. They landed safely, under the green flag, and at once took possession of the ruins of old Fort Erie, just at the place where the lake narrows to the river. Their number was somewhere from 1000 to 1500. Their military organization consisted of four regiments, the Thirtieth, or Tennessee, the Seventeenth, or Kentucky, the Eighteenth, or Ohio, and the Seventh, or Buffalo, besides an Indian detachment. All these had Colonel O'Neil, formerly known as having enlisted a regiment for the rebels of such of our soldiers in the horrible sea at Andersonville as preferred the honor to death.
 This crossing had been successfully concealed from the United States authorities. At embarking in the Fenian feet the men received arms and ammunitions, but no commissariat seems to have been organized. They at once cut the telegraph wires leading into Canada, tore up the track of the railroad near them, and advanced westward along the lake shore toward Fort Colborne, at the mouth of the Welland Canal.
 The first Canadian force to come into actual conflict with the Fort Erie Fenians was a body of about 1000 Voltigeurs, under Colonel Ross or Bonanza, which had been ordered to Fort Colborne, while another force, under Colonel Pascoe, was advancing upon the Fenian rear, up the Niagara River, via Chippewa. Ross's troops met O'Neil and his Fenians about 8 A.M. on the morning of Saturday, June 3. O'Neil was advancing westward, and now took post at Limestone Bluff, somewhat less than half way from Fort Erie to Fort Colborne. There was a sort of battle, in which—though there are various reports—the Canadians seem to have displayed their superiority, and to have advanced in pursuit of them as if already victorious, when the Fenian line was merely falling back to rectify an error. Many of the Fenians are veterans of the Rebellion, and not to be discouraged by a charge; so they charged by means in their turn upon the confident Canadians, and very easily disposed them. But the losses are reported as only 4 killed and 15 wounded on the Fenian side, and 23 killed and wounded on the Canadian side.
 After pursuing the beaten Canadians for some distance the Fenians fell back toward Fort Erie. They had imposed some provisions at that place, but their supplies quickly fell short, notwithstanding what they could find in the vicinity. More Canadian troops were coming up to Fort Colborne; Pascoe's force was approaching from Chippewa; the Michigan and one or two logs had effectively closed the Niagara River to reinforcements. As the Fenians approached Fort Erie again they had a brush with a small Canadian force, but easily dispersed it; and at night, worn out with fatigue and hunger, the Fenians attempted to creep back into the United States. Their main body was promptly captured, with the logs conveying them, by the Michigan; the stragglers and pickets were left on the Canadian side, and were taken by Colonel Pascoe's force, which went into camp at Fort Erie; and the left-hand movement of the Fenian invasion was over, and a failure, and its troops were prisoners to United States District-Attorney Davis, though in the immediate charge of Captain Barnes, of the Michigan.
 The sketches on page 397 show the ruins of Fort Erie and the flag captured from the British at Ridgeway by the Fenians.
 Since this failure other attempts have been made, but have not succeeded.—The Fenians made a great mistake when they began the work of emancipating Ireland with the infraction of the laws of the country of which they were the adopted citizens. The President's proclamation, and the vigilance of our military force on the frontier, will prevent an early repetition of the collision at Fort Erie and Ridgeway.

FENIAN RAID INTO CANADA—SKETCHING ON THIS IS OF JUNE BETWEEN THE BRITISH AND THE FENIANS.—[REPRODUCED BY J. P. HOFFMAN.]

FENIAN RAID INTO CANADA—RUINS OF FORT ERIE.—[SKETCHED BY J. P. HOFFMAN.]

CONGRESS HALL, SARATOGA, NEW YORK.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. S. AVERY.]

THE FENIAN RAID—BRITISH FLAG CAPTURED BY THE FENIANS.—[SKETCHED BY J. P. HOFFMAN.]

THE FIRE IN SARATOGA—BROADWAY THE MORNING AFTER THE FIRE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. S. AVERY.]

THE FIRE IN SARATOGA.

CONGRESS HALL HOTEL in Saratoga was destroyed by fire on the morning of May 23. At twenty minutes past twelve the flames were discovered in the north wing of the building, and issuing from the apartment known as the ironing and linen room, wherein the women ironers had been at work until an unusually late hour on the night before to be in readiness for the annual opening of the house, which was to take place on the very day of the fire. The frailty of the immense structure was soon apparent in the instantaneous spread of the flames, and but little more than an hour elapsed before it was a complete and impressive heap of ruins. The glare of the fire was plainly visible in Troy, Albany, Schenectady, and throughout all the adjacent country.

The loss involved in this fire was nearly $200,000. Congress Hall was built in the year 1812 by Mr. GAZDUS PERMAN, and it was while superintending the work upon the building that he fell and injured himself, and afterward died of his wounds. The hotel was kept in the family for a number of years, when a Mr. VAN SCHENCKHOFF bought it. He left it in his will to Mr. KRESLER, his son-in-law; and in 1850 the only surviving heir, Mr. E. V. KASSER, came into possession, all his relatives being burned or drowned, or both, on the ill-fated steamer Henry Clay. Mr. H. H. HARMON, the last proprietor, bought the house on the 9th of September, 1854, and had retained his right in it ever since. He has had partners with him, but he himself had been the man of the establishment. The large number of improvements which had been made in and around the hotel are too numerous to mention, but they were such as made it equal, if not superior, to any in the place. A new office had been made in the front of the building, which included the rooms formerly occupied as a bar-room, and extended back as far as the piazza. The bar-room had been sent down stairs, as also several other branches of hotel appointments. Mr. HARMON had announced his intention of opening the hotel on Monday, May 23.

THE FIRE IN SARATOGA—RUINS OF CONGRESS HALL.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY A. S. AVERY.]

WHY SHAKE HANDS WITH NEIGHBOR JONES?

My neighbor Jones is of portly mien, His face both smooth and bland, And he has a terrible way—to me— Of heartily shaking my hand. Now there is nothing of which to complain In a good and hearty shake, But upon my word with my neighbor Jones I feel as if handling a snake. He meets me at church in the midst of a crowd, Or sometimes he meets me alone, And his eyes they glare with a grayish stare, And the look of a rounded stone. I am getting afraid of my neighbor Jones, Of the touch of his clammy palm, And I am afraid that his stony eyes Have always a meaning of harm. I know that, one day, when my pig broke through Into Jones's pasture field, He kindly opened my garden gate, When they rained my early yield. I know that when Sam, my brindled cow, Was choking in yonder lot, That Jones sat still on his fence and watched, But Jones to me came not. I know that Jones, in digging a well, Cut off the stream of mine, And I know that Jones both chuckled and laughed, As though the joke were fine. And I know that Jones has threatened the law For things not worthy a song; But I always give in to my neighbor Jones, Though the principle is wrong. I know that Jones once pulled at the ear Of Billy, my eldest born, And that I incurred, by my peevish way, My Billy's utter scorn. That Billy declares when he shall grow big That there's death to Jones's ears, But still I have hope he will change his mind, Like myself—when Jones appears. But why do I shake old Jones's hand? It is not for love, I am sure. Or rather, why let him shake hands with me, When his shaking I can not endure? I wish that the fashion of shaking hands Would go out with the spring or fall, And I ask, when I think of my neighbor Jones, Why do they shake hands at all?

THE HONEST THIEF.

There once lived in St. Petersburg an aged man, who, though poor, had always been noted for strict honor and integrity, and whose whole course of life was regular as clock-work. Each morning he left his modest dwelling at precisely the same hour, passed through the old-clothes market to his Bureau, and after his six hours' labor was accomplished returned home by the self-same route. His garments were shabby from long service, and the covering of his cap was worn to shreds. The urgent solicitations of his daughters finally induced him to replace the latter article; and seeing some of a green color one day in a shop window, he went in and inquired the price. The shopman, however, refused to sell them, on the plea that they were already bespoken, and offered to show him others of a different hue; but the old man had set his heart on green. "Well, then," said the man, "if you must absolutely have it, take it, and if needs must I can fish another by to-morrow to take its place." The bargain was accordingly concluded, and the next day no small excitement was created by the appearance of the cap, which elicited from his colleagues smiling congratulations upon his successful purchase. Two days afterward, the heat being intense in the Bureau, he felt in his pocket for his handkerchief, in order to wipe the perspiration from his face, and drew forth, to his great astonishment, one of fine India feather silk. He showed it to his colleagues, and inquired if he had not by mistake appropriated another person's property; but one and all disclaimed all knowledge of it, and agreed unanimously that it must be a surprise from one of his daughters. "Children," said he, upon his return to his house, "who has done this? Do you wish to make me vain in my old age?" His daughters also declared their ignorance of the matter, and, after many needless guesses, finally made up their minds that it must have been put in his pocket by their cousin, who spent the last Sunday with them; and the handkerchief was carefully put aside by their father. On the following day, as he was carefully spreading his coat-tails in order to seat himself at his desk, he felt something hard in both his pockets, and putting in his hand brought out from one a gold watch and from the other a well-finished purse. This time his reason was overwhelmed; but after long reflection he formed a sudden resolution. He had been more punctual than the other officials, and was alone in the room; he therefore determined to say nothing to them of his discovery, and as soon as the office hours were over he went directly to the Chief of the Police and solicited a private audience. He then produced the watch and purse, and related the history of the handkerchief. After the Chief had fully possessed himself of all the particulars he said: "It is very singular! Has nothing of the kind ever happened to you before?" "Never before last week." "Have you made any change in your... with in that time?" "No."

"Recollect!" "Oh yes, certainly! I bought a new cap!" "Tell me how and where you bought it." The old man told him every thing connected with his purchase, upon which the chief laughed heartily, and exclaimed: "Poor, honest man that you are, you have become a member of a band of thieves! Do you not perceive? The twenty caps of the same shape and color were to serve them as a mark of recognition; and as every pickpocket seeks to divest himself as quickly as possible of his stolen goods, they have taken you for an accomplice, and transferred these articles to your pockets. We are greatly indebted to accident and to you. Take this money and buy another cap from one of the principal magazines; then bring this one back immediately; for as I hope to have the whole gang in my power to-morrow you must not run the risk of being arrested also." The old man went into a shop and purchased another covering for his head; but as he was about to tie up the cap in his handkerchief, in order to take it back to the police-office, he found in the crown, to his no small surprise, a costly piece of lace. He hastened to deliver this fresh booty into the hands of the Chief, who again burst into a peal of laughter when he beheld the despairing countenance of the honest thief. The necessary measures were immediately taken. Two dozen detectives were made acquainted with the form of the cap; and simultaneously, at precisely the same hour, every possessor of the sign was placed in duress vile.

THE SOUTHERN METHODIST BISHOPS.

The Episcopal College of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, consists of ten Bishops, three of whom are not assigned to regular duty because of their advanced age, and four were elected and ordained at the late session of the General Conference, held in the city of New Orleans. We present this week a representation of the whole body, with the exception of the venerable Senior Bishop, SOOLA, whose feeble health detained him from the Conference at which the photograph was made from which an engraving is rendered. The subjoined sketches give an outline of the main facts in the history of each, with his distinguishing characteristics: 1. JOSHUA SOULA is a native of the State of Maine, and is now in his eighty-sixth year. He entered upon the work of the holy ministry in the last year of the last century; was ordained Deacon in 1807, Elder in 1808, and Bishop in 1824. He is a man of large build, powerful physique, and majestic appearance; has endured immense hardships in the pioneer work of the itinerant ministry, and exerted a very great influence upon the growth of Methodism on this continent. For several years he has been relieved from regular Episcopal duty, and in a serene old age is waiting his change at his simple residence, near the city of Nashville, Tennessee. 2. JAMES OSBORN ANDRANIK was born in Georgia, in 1794; entered the ministry in 1812; was ordained Deacon in 1814, Elder in 1815, and Bishop in 1832. Without learning, he made his way by the natural powerful eloquence of his preaching and the pious industry of his pastoral labors. He is genial, warm-hearted, and simple. He has retired from the active Episcopacy; but in memory of his former labors, and in respect for the great purity of his character, he is warmly cherished by his Church. 3. ROBERT PATRICK is a native of North Carolina; born in 1799; a Licentiate in 1818, a Deacon in 1822, his ordination having been delayed by the absence of Bishops; an Elder in 1824, and a Bishop in 1846. He is a man of high intellect, strong passions, magnanimous spirit, and considerable culture. He is represented as the philosopher of the Episcopal bench. He seems sluggish in his movements, but is powerful when aroused. Often impatient, he is always generous. His knowledge of law makes him an excellent presiding officer. As a preacher he is exceedingly unequal. When he succeeds his pulpit efforts are very impressive; his failures are total. He was, we believe, President of La Grange College, in Alabama, when elected Bishop. His uttered opinions have great weight in the Annual and General Conferences. 4. GEORGE FORREST PATRICK was born in Georgia, in 1811; began to preach in 1830; ordained Deacon in 1832, Elder in 1834, and Bishop in 1854. He is affable, careless in his manners, very handsome in face and person, with a dark eye and a remarkably charming smile. In the pulpit he has had the reputation of great brilliancy. He is still a powerful preacher. His voice is like a bugle; it strikes you from afar. Not remarkable for discrimination, he carries his messages by the force of the enthusiasm his magnetic style seems to kindle. He is a liberal thinker and a genial companion. In Georgia his influence is unrivaled. 5. JOHN EARLY was born in Virginia. He is believed to be in his eighty-second year. He was admitted to the Virginia Conference in 1807; was ordained Deacon in 1809, Elder in 1811, and Bishop in 1854. He is a man of remarkably commanding presence. In all crowds where he is a stranger his appearance attracts immediate attention. It is a combination of the Apostle and the General. He was born to command, and he does command. He has been a great worker. His energy is tireless. At his advanced age he can travel as much as any of his colleagues; and although, by reason of his multitude of years, he has been relieved from the burden of Episcopal labor, and takes his place with Bishops Andrew and Soala, his presidency at the late General Conference is said to have shown his clear head and strong hand, grasping and managing the reins to the last. 6. HERRARD HENRI KAYANAGOR, a native of Kentucky, was born in 1805; entered the ministry in 1823; was ordained Deacon in 1825, Elder in 1827, and Bishop in 1854. He is a hearty Christian—very simple, very discreet, slow in the chair on a point of order, very reliable upon points of law if time be given, happy, pure, peaceful, much loved and much respected. As a preacher he requires a long time to fire up, but when heated he is a pulpit engine of several-prosper-power. 7. WILLIAM MAY WIGHTMAN, a native of South Carolina, was born in 1806; entered the Conference in 1828; was ordained Deacon in 1830, Elder in 1832, and Bishop in 1865. He is below the medium height, with a head and face not very indicative of high intellect, yet he is in reality a man of very considerable ability and elegant culture, has been editor and professor, and was President of the Southern University when he was elected to the Episcopacy. Those who are intimate with him manifest a warm affection for his person and character. 8. Enoch MATHEW MARVIN was born in Missouri, in 1825; was a Licentiate in 1841; ordained Deacon in 1843, Elder in 1845, and Bishop in 1866. He is a tall, thin, cadaverous man in his appearance, wears his hair long and careless, is wholly unshaven; has a clear, blue, deep eye, a high intellectual brow, and a nose which makes his whole face look like the portrait of CALVIN. His mental endowments are lofty, his temper gentle, his spirit Christian, his preaching very superior, and his laboriousness—notwithstanding his apparent feebleness—really exemplary. 9. DAVID SEYM DOGORY was born in Virginia, in 1810; entered the Conference in 1829; was ordained Deacon in 1832, Elder in 1833, and Bishop in 1866. He is slender, graceful, pleasant, cultivated, and eloquent. He is a good man, a scholar of considerable acquirements, and a delightful and edifying preacher. He has been editor of several periodicals and a professor. 10. HOLLAND RICHMOND M'TYRE was born in South Carolina, in 1824; entered the ministry in 1840; was ordained Deacon in 1843, Elder in 1849, and Bishop in 1866. He has been editor of several Church periodicals. As a preacher his matter is solid, but his delivery is slow—very slow; as a writer he is most lucid and pungent. Nothing comes from his pen which does not arrest attention. He is very vigilant and very sagacious. He never barks at what he thinks wrong; he bites, always putting his teeth into the point of the error. He is upright in person and character, has a steel-gray incisive eye, and a hard face, which is wonderfully relieved by a remarkably illuminating smile. He is a man of rare executive power, and upon this characteristic his friends base their hopes of a most useful Episcopal career for this youngest of the four Bishops called to that office by the Church at its late General Conference.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH.

Mr. A. E. W.'s sketches on pages 397 and 398, illustrating the May-day Festival at New Orleans, Louisiana, and the Freedmen's School at Vicksburg, Mississippi, are thus described by the artist: "FREEDMEN'S SCHOOL AT VICKSBURG. "One of the most noticeable features of these schools for freedmen is the cleanliness and good clothing of a majority of the scholars. Of course there are ragged and rough specimens, but these are not the rule. It is one of the many evidences I have found in Mississippi of the general well-being of the negroes, and their capacity to take care of themselves. These scholars, embracing all ages from the grand old down to the infant, are attentive, and master their tasks without any appearance indicating that the labor is irksome. The lady teachers, with a little tact, do almost any thing with them; and, although all teaching is a wearisome business, I should judge that these people showed the average intelligence displayed in the New York public schools. The Superintendent of the schools, CHAPMAN WARREN, considers that in all that pertains to language they are, perhaps, ahead of white children in quickness of apprehension. How far their capacity for education would carry them is doubtful. That these schools will vastly improve the colored people there is no room for doubt; the evidence is conclusive on that point. The school-house is a dilapidated affair, and the owner is anxious to get it into his possession again. The location of the school will have to be changed. The prejudice of the Southern people against the education of the negroes is almost universal. "MAY FESTIVAL IN NEW ORLEANS. "New Orleans has been the scene of a number of festivals during the present month, in honor of May and the flowers. "The Germans have, according to time-honored custom, swilled and guzzled lager, with additions in the shape of loud-smelling rye-bread, louder saucings, and absolutely noisy garlic and cheese; after which they danced in the hot sun, in a mob, upon a platform, perching happily, and causing the air to reek with recollections of the above-mentioned commodities. The Fenians have had their little picnic (in peace), and other May picnics are in contemplation; but the prettiest festival was that of a dancing-school—patronized, I was informed, by none but the children of the 'élite' of New Orleans. "This entertainment came off at the French Opera-house, where the little pupils resolved themselves into an amateur ballet-corps, and gave tableaux and fancy-dances, succeeded by a ball, in which the spectators were allowed to join after eleven, the hour when most of the little ones went home. "The tableau selected for the sketch is the crowning of the May Queen of the Fairies by Morning, Night standing near by, and a little boy, personating Bacchus, ready to present a bouquet—although what in the name of goodness Bacchus has to do with the fairies dependent is unable to tell! Prettiest 'three-year-olds,' who might be the originators of all the jokes attributed to that age in the 'Editor's Drawer,' occupied pedestals in the character of Cupids. Gas, candles, flowers, scenery, and, above all, blue-dye, made quite a pretty spectacle; and the children acquitted themselves with a self-confidence and ease quite remarkable. The New Orleans children are much older, so to speak, than the children of the North. Those who have reached the mature age of twelve have left childhood entirely behind them, and are prepared to—and do—act the part of men and women. "Going to school at a very early age, the climate, like a hot-house, forces them quickly to maturity; but whether the average of life is so long as in less forward countries is very doubtful."

CROONS FOR THE CRADLE.

FULL well I recollect the rhymes, The ballads of my cradle times, © Nursery! For often Emma Jane would bring Her darning to my crib, and sing Of—well, of almost any thing! © Nursery! She rocked my cradle to and fro The while she chanted soft and low, © Nursery! And I remember how I hung On all she said, on all she sung; For I was musical, though young, © Nursery! She said, "There was a little man!" Ay, marry, thus the tale began, © Nursery! "He had a little gun," she said, "With bullets that were made of lead" (They generally are, I've read), © Nursery! Anon she sang about the fall Of Humpty Dumpty from a wall, © Nursery! And then her voice would sink again To something of a softer strain— Some exhortation to the rain, © Nursery! She said that if it went away It might return another day, © Nursery! She sang to me of Jack and Jill, Who came to grief upon a hill, Through taking up a pail to fill, © Nursery! I would I were a child again, To hear the songs of Emma Jane, © Nursery! Oh! cradle-days forever flow! Young hopes forever overthrow! I walk the world alone—alone! © Nursery!

NOTE AND PRECAUTION.—Ladies afflicted with disorders of the face, called moth-patches or freckles, should use FRANK'S MOLE AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is infallible. Prepared by Dr. R. C. FRANK, Dermatologist, 69 Bond St., New York. Sold by all druggists.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

INVISIBLE PHOTOGRAPHS. THE GREAT WONDER OF THE AGE. Beautiful and perfect photographs instantly made in the parlor by man, woman, or child. Price 25 cents per package, with full directions. MEEKER'S PHOTOGRAPH, 594 Nassau St., New York. Liberal discounts. The Trade.

Fever and Ague Extinguished. Martyr to Intermittent Fever, a word with you. The responsibility for your suffering rests upon yourself. Just as surely as you shake to-day, or will shake to-morrow, HUSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS will extinguish the disease under which you labor. Had you taken this genial tonic as a preventive, you would have no need of it as a cure, for it renders the system impervious to all malarious ferments. But since you neglected the prevention, rid yourself without delay of the complaint by resorting to the only reliable remedy. Break the chills with HUSTETTER'S BITTERS, and they will return no more. This is the experience of thousands, and it will be yours. Quinine is a slow means of relief; it is useless to the last degree; it is more dangerous than the malarial itself; it may even be utterly fatal. How different is the effect of the Bitters. Their curative action is rapid; they are agreeable to the palate; they are not only entirely harmless, but tend heartily to strengthen the constitution and prolong life; they never have failed, and it is confidently asserted that they can cure full in any case of Fever and Ague, however long-acute in its character. To be without HUSTETTER'S BITTERS in any region infested with Intermittent or Remittent Fever is simply to reject safety and court disease.

FISHING TACKLE. In all its varieties, for sale by A. BRADY, No. 31 Nassau Street, one door from Maiden Lane, New York. Price 127. Pencil Sharp and Gash the Fish-Hook. A perfect trap! springs open in the fish's mouth; apparatus and hook all wash them. Sent 50 cents and many for very simple hooks, or $1 higher one dozen, and trade-price, to JOHN BRIGGS, 120 Broadway, New York. Sent 50.

J. H. Winslow & Co. THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY EVER OFFERED TO SECURE GOOD JEWELRY AT LOW PRICES.

100,000 WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, PENS, BRACELETS, GASTORS, GONLETS, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000! To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get.

J. H. WINSLOW & CO., 204 Broadway, New York.

Unparalleled Success. Immense Popularity. Triumph of Enterprise over Difficulties. The Work taken in Hand by The People.

$50,000 as Working Capital MAMMOTH OIL ENTERPRISE Being rapidly paid into the Treasury.

Great Success Of the Plan for the GRAND GIFT DISTRIBUTION.

All Agents must report weekly. The public can find full particulars in this paper under the title "Grand Gift Distribution." Address HENRY W. WATKINSON, 14 Chambers St., New York.

Brandreth's Pills. COSTIVENESS, DIARRHŒA.

They are taken up by the absorbents, and carried into the circulation, through which medium they are conveyed to every part of the body. If the pain affects the joints, a single dose produces remarkable benefit.

Principal office, 294 Canal Street, New York. For sale by all respectable Dealers in Medicines.

BUY IT FOR YOUR FAMILY. The Gold Medal Sewing Machine. Price only $5 00.

ENTIRELY NEW, SWEET, STRONG, COMPACT, ELEGANT, DURABLE IN FORM, AND CONVEY. FEEDS LIGHTLY AND PATENTED, WITH LATEST IMPROVEMENTS. RELIABLE IN ITS WORK; DOES NOT STOP STOPPING. SEWS FINE, AND WITH GREAT SWIFTHNESS. WILL NOT RATTLE OFF. HAVE THE SEWING THIS SAME OR BOTH SIZES. WILL NOT SEAR THREADS. DOES WHAT NO OTHER MACHINE WILL DO, NO MATTER WHAT PRICED. Sewed 4000 and made 200 or 300 per day, 1000 per week, 2000 per month, 20000 per year. More than ready to receive proposals to establish permanent agencies throughout the country.

BUY IT FOR YOUR WIFE. HISTORY OF WEST POINT AND ITS MILITARY IMPORTANCE DURING THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

And the Origin and Progress of the UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY. BY OLIVER EDWARDS G. BRYANT, A. M., Adjutant of the Military Academy. ILLUSTRATED WITH NUMEROUS MAPS AND ENGRAVINGS. 1 vol., 8vo., Blue Cloth, 66. Half Bound, 67. 50. Full Morocco, 80. D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher, No. 195 Broadway.

Now I Lay Me Down to Sleep.

A most touching Ballad, with Chorus. Words by Miss Elsie Fox; music by A. D. Wallbridge. All of the original critics and the leading vocalists of New York pronounced this the very best song of the season. Price 25 cents. Sent by mail, postage paid. W. A. FOND & CO., No. 547 Broadway, New York.

NEW PHYSIOGNOMY, or "SIGNS OF CHARACTER," as manifested through Temperament and External Form, and especially in the "human face divine." One vol., 328 pages, and more than 1000 illustrations, with index complete. By S. R. WELLS, Editor of the PERSONALITY JOURNAL. Price, post-paid, 65. Address FOWLER & WELLS, No. 390 Broadway, New York.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES

For Merchants, Druggists, and all who wish to print neatly, cheaply, and expeditiously. Circular sent free. Sheets of Type, Case, &c., 50 cts. AMERS TRUSS COMPANY, 76 Ash Street, New York, and 30 Lincoln Street, Boston.

$2 MAGIC Timekeeper $2 And Vest Chain, 50 cts.

A genuine English Soap Gold or Silver Compensate Timekeeper, with accurate indicator compass in the dial, in handsome case. Beautiful and elaborate in design, of crystal workmanship, and remarkable for its compactness and absolute certainty as a regulator. Fully warranted for 3 years; will last a lifetime, and is a most elegant and necessary addition to every gentleman's wardrobe. Price each, small size, with a rich gold plated Grand Vest Chain, only 50 cts. Mailed free. AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE. Price list free. Address M. A. NEELE & CO., Importers of Watches, &c., 8 E. corner Broadway and Fulton St., N. Y. Established 1841.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

Have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at Cargo Prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show. All goods sent are warranted to give satisfaction.

PRICE LIST. YOUNG HYSON, 50c, 50c, $1, $1 1/2; best, $1 25 1/2 lb. GREEN TEA, 50c, 50c, $1, $1 1/2; best, $1 75 1/2 lb. MIXED, 75c, 50c, 50c; best, $1 1/2 lb. JAPAN, $1, $1 1/2; best, $1 25 1/2 lb. OOLONG, 70c, 50c, 50c; best, $1 1/2 lb. IMPERIAL and GUNPOWDER, best, $1 25 1/2 lb. ENGLISH BREAKFAST, 50c, 50c, $1, $1 1/2; best, $1 25 1/2 lb.

Our Black and Green Mixed Teas will give universal satisfaction, and suit all tastes, being composed of the best First-Class Black and Mysore Greens. English Breakfast is not recommended, excepting to those who have acquired a taste for that kind of Tea, although it is the best prepared.

Coffee Roasted and Ground Daily. GROUND COFFEE, 20c, 20c, 20c, 20c; best, 40c, 40c, 40c, 40c. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our FRENCH BREAKFAST and DINNER COFFEES, which we will sell at the low price of 30c, 30c, 30c, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Great American Tea Company, No. 11 and 23 Vesey Street, corner of Church Street, Post-Office Box 6643, New York City; No. 640 Broadway, corner of Beeker Street; No. 502 Eighth Avenue, near Thirty-second Street; No. 299 Spring Street; No. 325 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, corner Canal Street.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Board and Wagon Peddlers, and small Stores, which class we are supplying every thousands, all of which are doing well, can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled; and in case of clubs can have each party's name marked on their packages as directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 11 and 23 Vesey St. Our friends are getting up Clubs in most towns throughout the country, and for which we feel very grateful.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send Post-Office Drafts or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders will be forwarded by express, to collect on delivery.

We return thanks to parties who have taken an interest in getting up Clubs. And when any of them come to New York we shall be pleased to have them call upon us and make themselves known.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up a Club of over $20. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

The following letter tells its own story: Great American Tea Company: Gents.—The tea I ordered from you arrived here one week ago to-day, and they give entire satisfaction in all that have tried them.

Very truly yours, T. Pool. Brought up.....$120 25

Table listing various tea and coffee products and their prices. Includes items like Young Hyson, Green Tea, Mixed, Japan, Oolong, Imperial, Gunpowder, English Breakfast, and Coffee. Prices range from 20c to $1.25 per pound.

P.S.—All towns, villages, or manufacturers where a large number of men are engaged, by ordering together, can reduce the price of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY, (Post-Office Box 6643.) 11 and 23 Vesey Street, corner of Church, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK, Have just Published:

THIRTY YEARS OF ARMY LIFE ON THE BORDER. Comprising Descriptions of the Indian Nomads of the Plains; Explorations of New Territory; A Trip across the Rocky Mountains in the Winter; Descriptions of the Habits of Different Animals found in the West, and the Methods of Hunting them; with Incidents in the Life of Different Frontier Men, &c., &c. By Colonel R. B. MARCY, U.S.A., Author of "The Prairie Traveler." With Numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $3 00.

ARMADALE. A Novel. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "No Name," "The Woman in White," "The Queen of Hearts," "Antonina," &c. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00; Paper, $1 00.

THE TOILERS OF THE SEA. A Novel. By VICTOR HUGO, Author of "Les Miserables." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents. (Fifteenth Thousand.)

HAND AND GLOVE. A Novel. By AMELIA B. EDWARDS, Author of "Half a Million of Money," "Barbara's History," "The Ladder of Life," "My Brother's Wife," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper 50 cents.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by Mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the Price.

$5 SEWING $5 MACHINE.

FINE PATENT and Improved, the embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Original patented May 13, 1842; Improvement patented June 5, 1852. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with its unique attachment, is now in operation, and with more than a million years of all-around operation, and rapidity, making extreme attention to each evolution of the Wheel. With various, neat, simple, extra, new, and improved, &c., &c. Strongest machine manufactured. Warranted not to get out of order in 5 years. It has received the approval of all the principal journals, and of those who have used it.

Single machines, all overparts, sent to any part of the country per express, packed in box, with printed instructions, on receipt of the price, $5. Sixty days' guarantee. Agents wanted every where. Address all orders, FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE COMPANY, Office 798 Nassau Street, New York.

GOLD PENS.

If you want a GOLD PEN, send to E. S. JOHNSON & CO., 44 Nassau St., N. Y., and by return mail we will send you the best showing style and price. Despatch done at 50c. ea.

A LADY, who has been cured of great nervous debility, after many years of misery, desires to make known to all who suffer from the same disease, the cure she has undergone, including a strong MED. M. MERRITT, P. O. Box 305, Boston, Mass., and the prescription will be sent free by return mail.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

It was early in the spring of 1853 that this Compound was originated. A member of my family was afflicted with an irritation of the throat, attended with a distressing cough. I had for some months previously thought of a preparation, having for its basis the white bark of white pine, which I considered as so very useful in the case of the throat and lungs. To test the value of it in diseases of the throat, I compounded a small quantity of the medicine that I had been planning, and gave it in teaspoonful doses. The result was exceedingly gratifying. Within two days the irritation of the throat was removed, the cough abated, and a speedy cure was effected. Soon after this I met some one who had been cured of a cough, which had been suffering for some weeks, with a bad cough, occasioned by a sudden cold, and had failed several times with blood. The soon found relief, and was cured. She took about ten courses of it, and got well. In November, 1855, I first advertised it under the name of WHITE PINE COMPOUND.

As a remedy for kidney complaints the White Pine Compound stands unrivaled.—Boston Journal. This great New England Remedy is now offered to the afflicted, having been proved by the test of eleven years in the New England States, where its merits have become so well known. It cures whooping cough, influenza, bronchitis, spitting of blood, and pulmonary affections generally. It is a remedy for diabetes, resulting from the kidneys and bladder, and gives; and for phlegmatic dyspepsia it will be found valuable. Sold by druggists and chemists in medicine generally.

Geo. W. Swett, M.D., Proprietor, Boston, Mass. BURNHANS & VAN SCHALK, Chicago, Ill. JOHN B. PARSE, Bradford, Ohio. General Agents with the West.

WANTED! $200 PER MONTH paid to Agents to introduce Mosquito Nets. Address, with stamp, MOSQUITO NETS, Sewing Machine Co., Westchester, Mass.

Prince's Improved Patent Fountain Pen

Does filling writes 15 hours. Agents wanted. Call or send along for Circular to JOHN S. TUDBY, 228 Broadway, corner of Fulton Street.

Send Photographs, by which any lady or gentleman can produce a photograph in half a minute with a few drops of water. Package of simple photographs for mail for 50c. Address P. O. Adams, 602 Broadway, N. Y.

50,000 Agents Wanted. Send for sample. See page 389. Murphy & Co., Jersey City, N. J.

THE KEY TO COMFORTABLE, CLEAN, AND QUIET WEATHER.

BRUNNEN'S METEORIC WEATHERER IS THE BEST. It is the only one that will keep you comfortable in all weather. It is the only one that will keep you clean and quiet. It is the only one that will keep you healthy. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will keep you happy. It is the only one that will keep you safe. It is the only one that will keep you strong. It is the only one that will keep you beautiful. It is the only one that will keep you successful. It is the only one that will keep you content. It is the only one that will keep you satisfied. It is the only one that will

THE REISSUE OF

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

THE UNIVERSITY OF
JUN 30 1866
CARIEE

Vol. X.—No. 496.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JUNE 30, 1866.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

"THE HALT."

This picture, from a painting by THOMAS NAST, has lately been on exhibition in Chicago, and the Chicago Tribune thus speaks of it:

"A pleasant farm-house, shaded with vines; a tired soldier, leaning upon his gun, taking a cup of water from the farmer's wife—the children looking on in youthful wonder; you can not see their faces, but you know how they look. A little farther on a soldier sitting down tantalizing a dog; a splendid distance and background, with a baggage-wagon and soldiers, beautifully-drawn foliage, and delicious bits of sky. Such is THOMAS NAST'S 'Soldier's Halt'—hard, perhaps, in coloring, and filled with idiosyncrasies, and yet bearing the impress of great talent. Better or more conscientiously elaborated foliage you will rarely see, and the same as to sky and atmosphere. NAST is well known to all art lovers. He is known to every body as the delineator of the splendid cartoons in Harper's Weekly."

LEWIS CASS.

THE Hon. Lewis Cass died at Detroit, Michigan, on the morning of June 17.

Before the late war Cass was held by our people to occupy a very large place in our history—he was looked upon, in some sort, as a monumental figure. Just that place he can never hold again in the popular estimate, simply because the war of the rebellion has, like a vast cataclysm, swept away many former political and military idols from their lofty pedestals.

The New York Tribune thus laudably epitomizes the life of General Cass:

Lewis Cass was born in Exeter, New Hampshire, the 9th day of October, 1781. His father was a commander in the Revolutionary army, and took part in the battle of Benning's Hill, Ticonderoga, Princeton, Germantown, etc. The young Lewis was educated at Exeter, and studied law at Marietta. He was admitted to the bar in 1800, and practiced with success during several years. In 1804 he was elected to the Ohio Legislature. Being placed on the committee instituted to inquire into the movements of Colonel Hays, his hand drafted the law which enabled the local authorities to arrest the same and locate engaged in that enterprise as their presence from the Ohio. He also drew up the address to Mr. Jefferson, embodying the views of the Ohio Legislature on the subject. In 1807 Mr. Cass was appointed Marshal of the State, a post which he filled until 1810. In the year of 1817 he volunteered to join the forces at Detroit under General Hays, and was named Colonel of the Third Ohio Volunteers. Colonel Cass commanded the advanced guard when the army moved from Detroit into Canada, and drew up the proclamation addressed by the General to the inhabitants of that country on their arrival in it, and commanded also the detachment which destroyed the British forces posted at the bridge over the Chippewa.

THE LATE LEWIS CASS.

Shortly afterward Colonel Cass was included in the expedition which moved on the signal of the American army, and, after making his report at Washington, was appointed to the Twenty-seventh Regiment of Infantry, and, after a short interval, promoted to the rank of Lieutenant-General.

He took part in the pursuit of General Pakenham, and in the triumph at the Mexican town. At the close of his campaign he was left in command of Michigan, with his headquarters at Detroit, a position he discharged for the post of Civil Governor over the same State in October, 1812.

In 1814 he was associated with General Harrison in a commission to treat with the Indians, who had been hostile to the United States during the war. In 1820 he succeeded himself permanently with his family in Michigan. From the year 1817 to 1825 General Cass was the most instrumental in the various treaties concluded during the peace between the United States and the different Indian tribes located along its entire frontier. In 1826 he was made President of an historical society established in Michigan, and in the following year delivered an important address embodying the early history of the State, and bringing it down to the period when it became a part of the Union.

In 1826 he received the degree of LL.D. from Hamilton College, New York. In 1827 he was made Secretary of War by the then President, General Jackson. It was during his tenure of this office that the war of the Severn Indians broke out, a military task by some has been attributed to his want of judgment. In 1830 the same President appointed him Minister of the United States to France, where he published a book entitled "France, the King, Cass, and Government," in which Louis Philippe and his supporters are somewhat lavishly praised.

In 1842 President Taylor having been proved in power by the death of General Harrison, General Cass was, at his own request, recalled. From his return to America many acts of his life were felt to be peculiar, and of very interesting character. He now declared himself in favor of a high protective tariff, a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, and of the reconstruction of a bank of the United States.

These views brought him in close alliance with General Taylor, of Pennsylvania, and that portion of the Whig party who had a strong of whom FRANK speaks would in this country as zealously discontinue a cruel fashion as he declares they could successfully oppose a cruel war, they would not be the less public benefactors. For any fashion is cruel which compels vast expense. Any fashion is cruel which encourages extravagance. Any fashion is cruel which debases society, and every thing which gives money the reward of merit is degrading.

"THE HALT"—A SCENE IN THE GEORGIA CAMPAIGN.—[FROM A PAINTING BY THOMAS NAST.]

The wife of Prince METTERNICH, the Austrian ambassador in Paris, now dictates the fashion. The Empress is obsolete. If FAMOUS beauties should wear cowhide boots, cowhide boots would be de rigueur in the choicest circles. If she should drape her pretty person in cloth of gold and throw hoops out of the window, the streets of all the great cities in the world would become impassable, and the drawing-rooms every where would glitter with splendor. What a power this lady has! For if she wore a plain straw hat and a plain dress, simplicity and economy would be the fashion. But, after all, what is her right divine? If she chooses to wear a hat of old Venetian sequins on her head, why should the sycophants of Saratoga take to chasing themselves with gold dollars? If she chooses to draggle a satin train along a gravel walk, why should the dames of Newport wipe the sea beach with silk? Why does not each dainty American dame show her equality with F. AUSTRIAN by following her own sweet will and regulating it by the eternal fitness of things? To be fashionable is not necessarily to be womanly and ladylike. What if those who can effect it should resolve that only what is womanly and ladylike shall be fashionable?

FORT MONROE AND ANDERSONVILLE.

JEFFERSON DAVIS is charged by the Government of the United States with complicity in the assassination of President LINCOLN, and the Government can not decently parole him until it has withdrawn that charge. Should it be withdrawn he would remain a prisoner under indictment for treason, which is also a capital crime. So long, however, as he is imprisoned upon whatever charge humanity requires that he be well treated, and that there shall be no delay in his trial. There has, however, been a foolish attempt to excite sympathy for him and odium against the Government by depicting him as a martyr, a Bastille sufferer, a dignified and pathetic victim of a haughty and cruel Despotism. Yet there is no other prisoner in this or in any country charged with a capital crime who is so comfortably lodged and honorably treated as JEFFERSON DAVIS. He has a casemate properly furnished. He has a daily bill of fare such as no other prisoner in the world enjoys, and which would amply satisfy any honest man. He has the range of the ramparts upon which to breathe the ocean air, and he has books, newspapers, wife, and friends around him. He has, or had, a physician also, who apparently sat at his feet to catch the drops of wisdom that fell from his mouth; a physician who has prepared a book about the prisoner whom he calls "ex-President" and "distinguished captive."

Let us not forget that this man, for whose comfort sentries must tread softly, for whose delicate stomach the bill of fare must be daily changed, for whose gratification the recreations we have named are provided, is the same man who could see from his house in Richmond the island upon which Union prisoners were slowly starved and frozen, and who knew that thousands of his fellow-men imprisoned at Andersonville were pitilessly tortured into idiocy and death. Not the least pang of their horrible bodily suffering would we have retorted upon JEFFERSON DAVIS; not one touch of retaliation should the American people allow to be visited upon him. But when they are asked to believe that he is tortured by the authority of their Government, it is wise for them to perceive the difference between the treatment he receives from the Government which he sought to destroy and that which he contemned in the case of those who strove to defend it. Nor will those people forget that the same papers which furiously denounce the pretended cruelty of the Government toward him were silent over the awful tragedies of Andersonville and Belle Isle, or faintly denied them.

MOSES F. ODELL.

THE name of MOSES F. ODELL, who died a few days since at his home in Brooklyn, after a long and painful illness, has been of late very conspicuous as that of a most faithful and efficient public officer, and as a leader among those Democrats who on the most stringent partisan sympathy could not seduce from the plain path of patriotism. Although he had always been a Democrat and an active party man, President of the Empire Club, Assistant-Collector of Customs under Democratic ascendancy, and Democratic Representative in Congress, he devoted himself ardently at the outbreak of the rebellion to the support of the Government; served with the utmost diligence upon the Congressional Committee on the Conduct of the War; effectively aided the raising of troops, and was a constant, helpful, and sympathetic visitor in the camp and hospital.

Strongly attached to his party name and traditions, he did not hesitate to follow his convictions, and sign the report that virtually censured McClellan; and he voted for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and for the Emancipation Amendment. Had he been still in Congress we believe that he would have declined to yield to the ignominious policy of opposing every humane and just measure intended to secure equal rights, and would have voted for the Constitutional Amendment recently adopted.

His official career, like his private life, was spotless. Energetic and sagacious, he clearly comprehended his duty and promptly did it. It is stated, we believe without contradiction, that President LINCOLN, who saw and justly valued his worth and efficiency, offered to Mr. ODELL the office of Collector of New York. But Mr. ODELL suggested that FRANCIS KING would be a more suitable officer; and Mr. KING was subsequently appointed, while Mr. ODELL was made Naval Officer. For many weeks he had been necessarily absent from his post, suffering acutely from a disease which he knew to be mortal. But in illness as in health his warm religious feeling kept his soul serene. For many years he had been a devoted member of the Methodist Church, and especially interested in the Sunday-school. At the annual summer festival he was always present, directing and cheering; and thoughtful of the children to the last, he asked to be carried to the window when they marched by at their late celebration, that he might see the blithe parade and show his young friends that his heart was with them in death as in life; while but an hour or two before he died he sent for some of his old Sunday-school scholars to sing to him the hymn he loved, and so peacefully sank to rest.

Mr. ODELL will be long and kindly remembered even by many who did not personally know him, but who had learned to honor his patriotic fidelity.

EXERCISE VERSUS DEFORMITY.

A CROOKED back is a very common thing in ladies, as every dress-maker knows; but a taller sedition finds this deformity in gentlemen. On this point Dr. WARREN of Boston says: "Of the well-educated females within the sphere of my experience about one-half are affected with some degree of distortion of the spine." A very judicious French writer goes even farther than this, and says: "It is so common that out of twenty girls who have attained the age of fifteen years there are not two who do not present very manifest traces of it."

Whatever discrepancies there may be between the estimates of different observers, all agree that the deformity is very common, especially in females that are delicately brought up. Why is it so? Is it a necessity under the circumstances, or can it be avoided? In accounting for it much has often been said about posture in study, and pictures are introduced into some books on physiology for schools to show what are bad postures and what are good ones. It is commonly enjoined upon girls that they should sit bolt upright in order to keep the spine in a straight position, and thus prevent its becoming crooked. Though posture has much to do with producing deformity, as you will soon see, this teaching is radically wrong. This sitting steadily in one position, however straight, is directly calculated to make the spine crooked; while variety in posture, allowing the spine to be sometimes straight and at others bent this way and that, tends decidedly to prevent deformity. If it were not so we should more often find a crooked-backed boy than we now do, for boys are generally allowed this variety of posture, while girls are expected to sit up in what is deemed a very proper attitude, which is certainly a very stiff and uncomfortable one, especially if the back be permitted to have no support.

Let us look at the rationale of the matter. What is it that keeps the spine straight? Or, rather, what is it that enables it to assume a straight position at any time in the midst of all its bendings in one direction and another? Observe how it is built. Here is a column of twenty-four bones, with elastic cartilages between them. It is the compressibility of these cartilages that allows the spine to be bent and twisted this way and that, and it is their elasticity that enables it to assume the straight position. We have then in this column of chain of bones twenty-four joints, in each of which nature intends there shall be some motion; and nothing can be farther from her intention than to keep this column as straight and unbending as a stick. For the very purpose of bending and twisting it in its joints there is a very complicated arrangement of muscles the whole length of the back. And whenever the spine is straight it is made so by an exact balancing of action between the two halves of the body, and they do so uniformly, except when called upon to do otherwise in the various motions to which we subject it.

This disposition of these muscles is always carried out when they have their natural strength and fair play. But very commonly in the schoolgirl which is necessary to give vigor to the muscular system, and weakened muscles never act regularly, and so can not maintain that balance of action needed to prevent deformity in what they hold or move. In the enfeebled girl, therefore, the muscles of the back fail to hold the spinal column firmly. At the same time the other parts of the apparatus, the cartilages and ligaments, partaking of the general feebleness, lose their usual degree of elasticity, and so fail in helping to straighten the column after its bendings. The stretched ligaments do not contract as well as usual, and the compressed cartilages remain somewhat compressed. What is the result? The column becomes deformed, and of course in directions governed by the predominant positions assumed.

But this result does not come alone from the general debility occasioned by a deficiency of exercise in the body at large. There is a local deficiency over and above this general one. The muscles of the back are less exercised than the other muscles of the body. There is a special restraint put upon them in two ways. First, custom does it. It is not considered proper for the girl to bend and twist the spine with the freedom that nature designs, and which is allowed to the boy. When she sits she must always have the erect posture, and when she moves it must be in such a way that no one could suspect that there are any joints in the spine, and it might be reasonably concluded that she has a single long back-bone, in place of the twenty-four bones with which the boys are endowed. The mode of dress also helps to secure this inaction of the muscles of the back, and the consequent stiffness of motion. As well might we put splints and ligatures on the limbs as on the trunk of the body; the result would be the same—restraint on natural motion, and consequent disease.

One thing more. The exercise which the muscles of the girl get is not only insufficient, but it is wrong in character. It is too much one thing. They are obliged to hold the spine in one position, and therefore get wearied out, just as in the old-fashioned punishment of holding a book out at arm's-length the muscles of the arm are wearied out. And many a back-ache has come from this cause, nerves being permanently injured as well as the other parts of the apparatus by this unnatural management.

We say, then, to mothers and teachers, let that beautiful and complicated apparatus for motion, the spinal column, have all the motion that the maker of it designed in girls as well as in boys. Free it from all shackles, and let it have fair play. Let it bend itself and twist itself, and it will have a straightness that no splints or supports can give it. It was made to keep itself straight, and it will do so if you will let it.

LITERARY.

"Thirty Years of Army Life on the Border," by Colonel R. B. MARCY, first published by the HARVARD, is a truly valuable contribution to our knowledge of the remote West and of the Indians of the plains. Indeed, we know of no other work which so fully satisfies curiosity in regard to a race which is fast perishing; and the simple style of Colonel MARCY is admirably suited to record the results of his extensive observation. The story of his winter expedition over the Rocky Mountains is one of the most exciting chapters of Western adventure; and he does not forget the natural interest of the reader in the quaint characters and picturesque or illustrative incidents of the region. Colonel MARCY's book will be of permanent value, and the publisher will be grateful to those who have persuaded him that he should not allow the rich results of his long and laborious and habitable experience to remain unsold.

"Lectures on the Study of History," by GOLDSWIN SURRIS. This is another most timely and remarkable work, also from the HARVARD. GOLDSWIN SURRIS is known as one of the ablest thinkers, admirable scholars, and very, snowy writers in England. This volume contains the lectures delivered by him upon opening his course as Regius Professor of History at Oxford, and his pleasant and instructive paper upon the University itself is added. This is not the place to enter upon any discussion of the principles which are asserted and illustrated by Professor SURRIS. They will be variously estimated by scholars and cultivated readers, but none will deny the power and brilliancy with which the Professor's opinions are presented. They are the results of profound familiarity with history, and of shrewd insight and reflection; and the work is that of a master, not of a tyro. Professor SURRIS disputes the philosophy of history as maintained by COBBIN and BOCKLE, and we do not recall a more cogent and vigorous analysis of their theory than these lectures contain. The work, which is very brief, is indispensable to every one who would understand this most interesting discussion; while the manly, sincere, and delightful style, with the essential attraction of the subject, will not fail to charm the general reader. The lectures upon the American colonies is especially interesting to us, not only from its topic, but from its revelation of the lofty cosmopolitan sympathy which makes GOLDSWIN SURRIS much more than an Englishman, and which invites every generous mind to strive with him for the "fraternalization of the world."

THE COMING IN OF THE "MERMAIDEN."

The moon is bleached as white as wool,
And just dropping under;
Every star is gone but three,
And they hang wide asunder—
There's a sea-ghost all in gray,
A tall shape of wonder!
I am not satisfied with sleep,
The night is not ended;
But look how the sea-ghost comes
With wan skirts extended,
Stealing up in this weird hour
When dusk and dawn are blended!
A vessel! To the old pier-end
Her happy course she's keeping;
I heard them name her yesterday—
Some were pale with weeping,
Some with their heart-bunger sighed:
She's in, and they are sleeping.
Oh now with fancied greetings meet,
They comfort their long aching;
The sea of sleep hath borne to them
What would not come with waking,
But the dreams shall meet be true
In their blissful breaking

The stars are gone, the rose Moon comes,
No blush of maid is sweeter;
The red sun half-way out of bed
Shall be the first to greet her;
None tell the news, yet sleepers wake,
And rise, and run to meet her.
Their lot they have, they hold; from pain
A keener bliss they borrow,
How natural is joy, my heart!
How easy after sorrow!
For once, the best is come, that hope
Promised them "to-morrow."
JEAN INGELW.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

June 22: In the Senate, the amendment placing $100,000 at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury to improve the fisheries, under certain restrictions, the salaries of the clerks in his Department, was agreed to by a vote of 23 to 11.

June 23: In the House, the Senate amendments to the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States were adopted by a vote of 179 to 72. Mr. Stevens closed the debate. He concluded that the amendment would not be adopted as an improvement on the present one. In his judgment, it contained the serious defect of the existing, both State and National, and would give the next Congress and President in the near-future a veto. With their enlarged base of representation, and the exclusion of loyal men of color from the ballot-box, he saw no hope of safety unless in the prevention of improper meddling acts which should do justice to the freedmen and reject disfranchisement as a condition precedent. While he saw much good in the proposition he did not prefer to be satisfied with it. This will be no reason for its speedy adoption, he believed. Let us talk what we can get now, and hope for better things in further legislation, in making acts or other provisions.

June 24: In the Senate, the bill to define the number and regulate the appointment of the officers in the Navy was passed, 23 to 11. It provides that the officers of the Navy shall consist of one Admiral, one Vice-Admiral, ten Rear-Admirals, twenty-five Commodores, fifty Captains, sixty Commanders, one hundred and thirty Lieutenant-Commanders, one hundred and thirty Masters and thirty Ensigns, and in other grades the number to be fixed by law. The pay of the Admiral shall be $10,000 per annum.

June 25: In the Senate, a veto message was received from the President, containing his objections to the bill enabling the New York and Montana Mining Company to purchase certain public lands.

In the House, a resolution was adopted appointing a Commission to investigate the late case of assault committed on Mr. Gilmore, of Iowa, by Mr. Lawrence, of Kentucky. The Senate bill to regulate the appointment of lieutenants in the Navy was passed. The joint resolution to provide for expenses of the Paris expedition, was passed, 51 to 25.

The number of deaths in this city last week was 365, being a decrease of 58 from the number of the previous week. It is the lowest in the corresponding week of 1865. Prof. Snow is delivering a course of lectures before the Imperial Society and the Hygienic Association, respectively, on "Discoveries in his recent tour up the valley of the Amazon. He was very high recommended from his rapid and successful explorations, May 2.

Nebraska City papers of the 15th inst. state that the State organization has been secured, and the Union State set on a working China majority in both branches of the Legislature elected. This result was mainly expected, as an early well-organized vote was given in favor of the Union. It was found the Territory was fully ready in their hands. Nebraska has a population of 45,000—an increase of 7,000 since 1860.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE IMPENDING WAR.

The Conference at Paris has been adjourned. Austria would only be one of the countries to be included that some of the Powers represented would be obliged to accept of territory.

The Conference of European states on June 5 the following statement in the House of Commons in answer to General Peel's question as to whether the Conference had been given up: "I am sorry to state that I cannot give an answer substantially in the affirmative to the question of the right honorable and gallant gentleman. The first communication made to the British Government was a telegraphic message received last night from France, stating that, in the opinion of the French Government, the Conference was at an end, in consequence of the answer from Austria imposing conditions that were entirely impracticable. We are now in possession of the Austrian despatch upon the subject, and the substance of it is: 'We required a definite assurance that all the Powers which were to take part in the projected Conference should be ready to renounce the pursuit of any special or particular interest to the detriment of the general tranquillity; and the Austrian Government went on further to explain that settlement by saying that the work of peace which the Emperor had in view could be a condition to be accomplished, it appeared to them indispensable that it should be agreed to beforehand from the deliberations of the Conference any thing that would tend to give to any of the States who were then invited to the meeting any territorial augmentation or increase of power. The requirement of such an agreement beforehand was regarded by the French, next of France as equivalent to the refusal of a conference, and as rendering it impossible; and the Government of England are agreed in their view of the case with the Government of France. All prospect of the meeting of a Conference must therefore, I fear, be regarded as at an end.'

War it seems most likely. Austria has three-fourths of a million of men in the field. She is, or thinks herself, a full match for all her present adversaries. Her population nearly equals theirs, and she has the Middle States of Germany, with an army of 250,000 men, formidable in her, and likely to meet in her favor if the war lasts. In Italy the Austrian army, stretched in one of the strongest positions in Europe, may offer the enemy to exhaust its strength against the Quadrilateral. In the north Field-Marshal Benedek, the ablest soldier of the empire, is at the head of an army which may strike a sudden and crushing blow. From the frontier of Bohemia he looks northward and eastward over the plains of the Prussian Kingdom, and sees no insurmountable obstacle to the progress of Berlin or the conquest of Silesia. Whatever may be in store for the Austrians they are at this moment convinced that the outbreak of war will give them energy and revenge, and deliver the empire forever from the designs of its enemies.

The convention of the Bohemian States by General Galles is looked upon by France as an act of direct provocation. The Nord Deutsche Zeitung says that the Austrian declaration to the Diet is little calculated to strengthen the peaceful hopes which the plan of a Conference had raised. The convention of the States, a political measure, can not be regarded otherwise than as a glaring violation of treaties, and an attack upon the sovereign rights of Prussia.

In the mean time Prussian troops have entered Hildesheim, and the Austrians have concentrated at Altona. Austria has instructed Galles to send an armed expedition to Bohemia.

BUNKER HILL.

BUNKER HILL is a round, smooth elevation in Charlestown, Massachusetts, 110 feet high, commanding the peninsula of Boston. It was connected by a ridge on its southern slope with a smaller elevation known as Breed's Hill, 75 feet high, the crests of the two hills being about 700 yards apart. These heights are famous for the battle fought on them between the Americans and the British, June 17, 1775. The city of Boston was at the time occupied by the British General, GAGE, who had just received large reinforcements, under Generals BURGESS, HOWE, and CLINTON. The American forces, with their headquarters at Cambridge, knowing little of military discipline, and made up of independent companies of militia and volunteers, were under command of General ARTHUR WELLES, who had under him FRESCOTT, PUTNAM, GAMBLEY, STARR, and PERRY—men who had learned the art of war in the battles with the French. This was the situation when Colonel Prescott, with 1000 men, was sent to seize the hills commanding Boston. Bunker Hill was occupied first, but the position was abandoned for Breed's Hill, nearer Boston. During the 17th Prescott was reinforced by PUTNAM and WARREN. Intrenchments had been thrown up, and the Americans awaited the attack, which came shortly after noon. The British numbered about 2000 men. The attack was made in front, the British moving up to the breast-works. — But they were repulsed again and again in several charges, until at length the ammunition of the Americans gave out, and the latter were compelled to retreat. The loss of the British was over 1000 men, that of the Americans 400. — Among the killed was General WARREN.

The Monument commemorating the battle stands in the centre of the grounds included within the redoubt on Breed's Hill. It is a square shaft of Quincy granite, 221 feet in height, 31 feet square at the base, and 15 at the top. Inside the shaft is a winding staircase of 294 stone steps, which leads to a chamber just under the apex. This chamber has four windows, which command a magnificent view of the surrounding country. The corner-stone of the Monument was laid on the fiftieth anniversary of the battle, June 17, 1825, by General LAFAYETTE, then the nation's guest, when DANIEL WEBSTER pronounced an oration to an immense audience. About forty survivors of the battle were

Emperor have tended to the preponderance of Austria in Germany, and, internally, to the centralization of power. On the 26th of April, 1854, he married the Princess ELIZABETH-ANNELE-ERGENIE, daughter of MAXIMILIAN JOSEPH, Duke of Saxepresent on that occasion. The Monument was completed in 1842, at an expense of $150,000. It was dedicated June 17, 1848, the oration being delivered by Mr. WEBSTER, and the President of the United States, with his entire Cabinet, forming a part of the vast audience.

FRANCIS JOSEPH I., EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA.

FRANCIS JOSEPH I., Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary and Bohemia, was born on the 18th of August, 1830. He is nephew of his predecessor, FERDINAND I., and eldest son of Archduke FRANCIS CHARLES and of the Princess SOPHIA, daughter of MAXIMILIAN, King of Bavaria.

The Emperor FERDINAND, tired of the cares of royalty, and the victim of disease, abdicated at Olmutz on the 2d of December, 1848. The same day his only brother, the Archduke FRANCIS CHARLES, waived his claims to the throne in favor of his son, who was declared of majority at the age of sixteen years.

The first years of his reign were disturbed by civil war. Hungary was in revolt, Sardinia had invaded the Milanese, and the Austrian empire seemed to have reached the brink of dissolution. The young Emperor had come to the throne with the promise of giving to the whole country a free, constitutional Government—a promise which he could not then, and which afterward he was not disposed to keep. The intervention of the Czar in Hungary and the victory of Novara combined to save him his throne. The reaction was terrible, and a large number of the revolutionary leaders were condemned to death.

All the efforts of the Emperor have tended to the preponderance of Austria in Germany, and, internally, to the centralization of power. On the 26th of April, 1854, he married the Princess ELIZABETH-ANNELE-ERGENIE, daughter of MAXIMILIAN JOSEPH, Duke of Saxe-

BUNKER HILL MONUMENT.—(Photographed by W. S. ADAMS.)

FRANCIS JOSEPH I., EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA.

LUDWIG B. VON BENEDEK, THE AUSTRIAN GENERAL.—(See page 406.)

ria, who has given him two daughters. During the Crimean war the Emperor of Austria openly manifested sympathy with the Allies, but gave no material support to their armies.

In 1859 the war in Italy came on. What followed—the victories of the French and Italians, the loss of Lombardy to Austria, and the compromise of Villafranca at a time when Prussia seemed on the point of forming an alliance with Austria—is well known to our readers. There was a new Hungarian agitation in 1859, and a war seemed imminent, but the imperial proclamation of October 25, and the suitable concessions made by the Emperor, prevented its occurrence.

The Emperor FRANCIS JOSEPH has created an order which bears his own name. He has devoted himself to the military administration of affairs, and is virtually his own Minister of War. In 1859 an attempt was made against his life, and he received a trifling wound.

LUDWIG RITTER VON BENEDEK, THE AUSTRIAN GENERAL.

THE AUSTRIAN Emperor, FRANCIS JOSEPH, has intrusted to Field-Marshal LUDWIG RITTER VON BENEDEK the command of the Austrian Army of the North, which lies on the borders of Saxony and Prussia.

BENEDEK is a Hungarian and a Protestant. He was born in 1804, at Oldenburg, and after the usual course of training at Neustadt, he entered the Austrian army as a cadet in 1822. He obtained the rank of Colonel in 1843. He took a prominent part in quelling the Galician insurrection in 1845; and in the memorable Italian campaign of 1848, under RANZOVIC, he distinguished himself at the retreat from Milan, at Oseno, and especially at the battle of Curtatone, for which he received the order of Maria Theresa. In 1849 he contributed to the reduction of Mortara and to the victory of Novara. Ten years later, in the war of Italian independence, BENEDEK was one of the few Austrian Generals who exhibited very great military capacity. He commanded the Eighth Army Corps, and especially distinguished himself at Solferino, his division being the last to leave the field.

Both among the nobility and the lower classes BENEDEK is enthusiastically admired. When, on May 12, he made his headquarters in Vienna, he was greeted with applause by the people and the army. To the latter he said:

"Soldiers! I bring you my whole, warm, soldier's heart, my iron will, my highest confidence in you, my unwavering trust in Almighty God, and, with all these, the faith which I derive from my former success as a soldier!"

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1865, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.]

INSIDE.

A CHRONICLE OF SECESSION.

By GEORGE F. HARRINGTON.

IN TWENTY-FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER XXIV.

"Yes, Sir, the grandest sort of a spree; and, as you well know, Simmons, I always said so from the start, by George! This is the smash up, Sir, and a smash up it is, ain't it?"

"Mr. Withers, I have refrained so far with the very desperation of hope. I can refrain no longer. It is as you say; I confess it, it is," says Captain Simmons, indignantly dignified. "Yes," continues he, with the solemnity of a prophet and exceedingly disappointed Dr. Nansen, "I can tell you that fellow Neely, in regard to a question of mine, he informed me last he had ceased to think at all, that there was only variance where once he had possessed."

"There is a Yankee, but now for honest, honest men ever before, and, being a Yankee, he is the worst element in connection with me. I have seen him many a time, and I have heard him many a time, but I never saw him."

"I have seen him many a time, and I have heard him many a time, but I never saw him."

"I have seen him many a time, and I have heard him many a time, but I never saw him."

"I have seen him many a time, and I have heard him many a time, but I never saw him."

"I have seen him many a time, and I have heard him many a time, but I never saw him."

"I have seen him many a time, and I have heard him many a time, but I never saw him."

"I have seen him many a time, and I have heard him many a time, but I never saw him."

RECONSTRUCTION.

in the fact that the United States are disbanding their armies; that Europe must certainly intervene also; that a just God—Mr. Ellis writes a series of articles to that effect—can not, will not, ought not, must not, shall not, abandon a cause so manifestly His own; that if we will only hold out a little longer, a foreign war or something else may turn up for our deliverance.

People hardly even read a line of all this. For four long years they have believed with a belief passing all calculation, but even the faculty of belief is wearing out. Nobody has any regard even for Brother Barker these days; people withdraw their children from his Sabbath-school, or suffer them to stay away unapproved, and never go to church themselves; the very best members sink, for the time, into a coldness, not to say apathy, which language fails to express. Haggard, restless, sallow, lean Brother Barker, from the crown of his lank hair to the soles of his sorrowful feet, in countenance, apparel, and bearing breathes only desolation and despair. At times even he flares up, however.

"Never," he says to Bob Withers, taking up again the refrain of the general creak—a refrain, however, which, vigorous and unanimous at first, is fast dwindling down to the rare and solitary cry of an individual here and there—"I, for one, will never live under Federal despotism; never, Sir, never, never! I will go to Mexico, to the Sandwich Islands first. Rather," says Brother Barker, with a savage gleam in his eyes, "I will stay here and agitate."

"Do what?" asks Mr. Withers, who has taken Brother Barker in his hand and excited him up thus, exactly as a child rubs a match to see it flax and burn blue, only for the melancholy fan of it. "Do what?"

"Agitate, Sir, agitate, agitate! A-d in getting up another revolution, if it is eight years hence."

The fact is, we good Secessionists in Somerville, having duly sown the seed, are now harvesting in our whirlwind, and the crop is terrible.

Mr. Arthur endeavors to promote a certain piety for them in his bosom by summing it up in conversation with grim Mr. Ferguson:

"You can hardly imagine a rain more complete," he says. "Take Colonel Ret Roberts as an instance. He has proved demonstrably mistaken in all upon which he staked his sagacity and judgment. He endures the rigors of defeat, after and repeated defeat, military and political. He has lost all his property, especially his means. He may not own a dozen North America's; but he has lost his property in the Confederacy, and now has no way to get it back. He may not have much money, but he has lost his property in the Confederacy, and now has no way to get it back."

"The fact is, we good Secessionists in Somerville, having duly sown the seed, are now harvesting in our whirlwind, and the crop is terrible."

"The fact is, we good Secessionists in Somerville, having duly sown the seed, are now harvesting in our whirlwind, and the crop is terrible."

"The fact is, we good Secessionists in Somerville, having duly sown the seed, are now harvesting in our whirlwind, and the crop is terrible."

"The fact is, we good Secessionists in Somerville, having duly sown the seed, are now harvesting in our whirlwind, and the crop is terrible."

"The fact is, we good Secessionists in Somerville, having duly sown the seed, are now harvesting in our whirlwind, and the crop is terrible."

"The fact is, we good Secessionists in Somerville, having duly sown the seed, are now harvesting in our whirlwind, and the crop is terrible."

ble of—instruments made meet by these very times, you see, for the Master's use."

And very clearly, indeed, does this minister see it to be his duty, in and out of the pulpit, to preach conciliation, moderation, and all the kindred Christian virtues; mingling much more with men than for years past, suppressing all partisan exultation, glowing with quiet enthusiasm instead in this direction. But joy in the result? Gratitude to God for it? The feeling is a much more quiet one than he had imagined it would be in anticipating it in dark days, which seem a hundred years ago now; but ah, it is an unspeakable one!

Yet, as these eventful days of May, 1865, sweep along, a new hue of feeling suddenly colors the wide and roaring current. Union men in Somerville had dreaded the rise of a bitter feeling against them which might result in the destruction of their lives and property. They are lost sight of, or thought of only with respect, in the new feeling which suddenly and angrily flushes the surface, especially among the soldiers returning by thousands to their homes. It is a feeling of bitter wrath against their own officers, partly because of individual grievances at their hands, chiefly on account of the belief, deep-seated and universal among the army, that the officers, with scarce an exception, have been engaged all along in such systematic swindling in cotton and commissary stores as no country has ever before known. The feeling has been long growing—growing for years. Military subordination suddenly thrown off, it bursts forth with terrible vehemence. Speculators, too, outside of the army, share the deep hatred of the soldiers. The universal cry is, "While we have been enduring privations for years, suffering and without pay, these have been at home making money. At least they shall share with us!"

Suddenly officers and speculators find themselves in the very camp of enemies more to be dreaded than the Federals, and they, after a moment of bewilderment, are flying in all directions. All Government property in reach is in some instances broken into and plundered. The stores of speculators share the same fate. Demoralized by plunder, the soldiery fall next upon any supplies in reach under the same plea. No house in Somerville and throughout the State safe from their search on the least suspicion, or none at all, of secreted Government supplies. Until, at last, every man in Somerville, the officials most of all, first secretly prays for, then openly desires, ardently desires the arrival of the National forces as his only hope.

"I wish to Heaven they would come!" Dr. Ginnis does not hesitate openly to say the day the soldiers disinter twenty sacks of coffee from beneath the corn in his crib. And yet, only a week before, the pious Doctor, in acknowledging in husky voice that we are whipped, that the war is over, had darkly adieu, "For the pec-ent, Sir, only for the present!" with terrible intimations of gloom and gesture of a guerrilla war to be waged for, at the least calculation, forty years to come.

Even after the surrender of Lee Mrs. Smithers has denounced the panic of the hour as a mere panic. Smithers has speculated, in some complicated manner, in paper-money. The postmaster Smithers is, but of course it was not Government money he used, turning the paper into specie, and that less sugar, and that into negroes. Yes, negroes. That is Smithers's weakness, negroes.

"Just as soon as this little panic is over," Smithers demonstrates to his wife, "those negroes will bring twice what I gave. Soon as the war is over, Aramistey, one negro will bring more'n I paid for 'em."

Yet the panic increases rather. Smithers has as much as he can do to secrete about his place what valuable property he has. Colonel Ret Roberts's house is searched by the soldiers on one side of him, and Mr. Neely's on the other, and the soldiers say they are successful, too, for Government stores. Even long, red Mrs. Smithers is terrified. With a tub and cloth ready on the front porch, and a child on the look-out, whenever a squad of soldiers happen to pass, Mrs. Smithers, dropping every thing to do so, is on her knees upon the porch scrubbing the floor for dear life—the idea being to impress on the minds of the soldiers the fact that the house is inhabited only by the poorest of people. Until, at last, even Mrs. Smithers is as wrathful against the Federals for not coming as she ever was against them for coming at all.

"I must do you the justice to say so, Dr. Warner. I have never yet had an illusion, even in this dark hour, of any desire on your part for the Federals to come."

It is good Mr. Ellis who says it, seated in the Doctor's parlor at this critical period. Mr. Ellis has dropped in for medicine for his ailing wife, and in fact has never entirely dropped Dr. Warner on political grounds; the Doctor is so fat and easy and good-natured it is almost impossible to do so on any grounds. Very cold has been Mr. Ellis's manner to the Doctor; very crisp his "Good-mornings, Sir!" in passing; very reticent each to the other during the Doctor's professional visits upon Mrs. Ellis; but both are men too thoroughly good at heart to lose all "electric affinity" for each other.

"Of course," continues Mr. Ellis, in his nervous manner, "I regret you have not been more decidedly Southern, Dr. Warner. I disapproved of Secession as much as yourself, Sir; it was wrong. But when we of the South were actually attacked then I buried all that. Even if your brother or father is in the wrong, would you not defend them if attacked? My country right or wrong, Sir! Your upholding Mr. Arthur in his course has pained me. In fact, I do most heartily disapprove"—Mr. Ellis always kindles as he goes—"of your lukewarm support of the Confederacy. I think it wrong, very wrong."

"OH, MOTHER, MR. ARTHUR IS KILLED!"

Mr. Ellis need not have reproached himself at all for saying that. He was not a bit to blame. Mrs. Warner only used it as a pretext; she had almost fretted herself and Sally, her two hundred pounds' weight of black cook, to death for an opportunity ever since the surrender of Dick Taylor, the last of her hopes, to say it.

"And you think Dr. Warner wrong, do you, Mr. Ellis?" she breaks in, whirling like a gust round from her sewing-machine to say it. "Wrong? Wrong? Ha! And you to sit there and say it, after God himself—and you a pious church-member too—has Himself shown what He thinks of Secession. Mr. Ellis, I've known you for years, respected you too, and you are under my roof. But this much I must say to you—you are crazy, as crazy as any lunatic that ever was put in a strait-jacket. And for you to believe in that lying, thieving, murdering—hold your tongue, Dr. Warner!—retreating, looting, cheating, repudiating Confederacy, the greatest swindling concern this earth ever saw! And after it is actually gone to pieces too! I wouldn't say a word, Dr. Warner, but it is more than I can stand. You are wrong—wrong—wrong! A quiet, sensible man when it began. A quiet, sensible man, holding your tongue in all the raging folly when you saw you could do no good, all through these—these four long, long, bad, bitter years. Standing by your minister when he only wanted to be nothing but a minister and let politics alone. Yes, I know what you would say, Mr. Ellis. I am not ashamed to confess it, now I see my error, more shame to you sticking out in what you see now is all wrong. Yes, I'm glad of the opportunity to acknowledge how wrong I've been, specially to my own husband. Not that I expect to turn angel. He married Helen Morris, and Helen Morris I'm certain I'll be till I die. But I am sick in my very stomach of Secession—sick to death. Here you've been telling Dr. Warner it wasn't the Federals whipped us, but the speculating and stealing, from the highest officers downward. Confessing with your own mouth that the whole thing was rotten, needed only a touch to make it crumble of itself like a rotten, rotten old pumpkin. And Dr. Warner is wrong—wrong—wrong!" intensely sarcastic, in shrillest F sharp.

"I tell you what, Dr. Warner," rising suddenly from her seat, upsetting her sewing-machine in doing so, and crossing the room rapidly to her husband. "I've been burning to say it. I'm glad Mr. Ellis has stirred me up to say it—yes, and to hear me say it sits right there. I'm proud of you, Dr. Warner. You do not talk out as much as I could wish; but all these four years you've had ten thousand times my sense. There, never throw it up to me I've said it, and I'll be sorry in ten minutes I told you; but it is only the solemn fact, you provoking old thing!" And Mrs. Warner throbs her arms about that weather-beaten farmer's neck, as he sits with the old droop of his head lower than ever, awaiting the blowing out of this most unexpected gale, stoops down, kisses him upon his bald forehead, rises again, and exclaims astonished Mr. Ellis; the casual-guests open their widest, hysterical but defiant.

And good Mr. Ellis finally leaves the house, having obtained a good deal more medicine than he came for.

Mr. Ellis, wild, shrilled, bewildered, thrice in age what the past four years should have left him, looks up, as he walks home, to encounter the cheerful fire and the hearty good-day of Mr. Arthur riding by. It is as the new era in contrast with the old. Only the minister chides himself for not having worn a soberer manner—nothing he abhors more than any even accidental triumph over his old friend—chides himself for his aspect, under the circumstances, of cheerfulness even. But how can I help it without playing the hypocrite? he asks himself.

But he rides fast, for he has a letter from Mr. Sorel's returned son for Mrs. Sorel. He thinks it must be from Frank, her long absent boy, only he does not know the writing upon the envelope, very much worn and dirtied by being brought so far in the soldier's knapsack. There is a singular fear thrilling to his heart as from the touch of the letter, taking it out of his breast-pocket when he gets out of town to look at it again—a creeping influence, a crawling cold. As he rides it gathers over him, a fever, a vague apprehension, so that he almost starts to bend himself called by some one from among the corn in a field to his left.

Drawing in his horse he sees it is a rough black-hand, who is looting near the fence—a savage of a negro, with his hair done up in little tails around his brow, the woolly beard in want patches over his face. Mr. Arthur, as the negro takes off his fragment of a hat, recognizes him as Colonel Juggins's Jen.

"Good-mornin', Mass Arthur. Jest one minute. Hope all well, Nor. I want to see you. Any way, I seed you ridin' along, an' it comes upon me to tell you—" the boy says, scratching his head, shifting his hat from hand to hand, looking eagerly at Mr. Arthur, agitated and confused. "Orange he say, you hold your tongue, you fool, none of your business. Orange is a jus-out like you, but somehow— Look hyar, Mass Arthur, ebry body say you mighty good man—"

"I am in a hurry, Jen."

"One minute, Sar. Case is dis. Suppose a man owe you money, keep promisin', promisin'—"

"Well, Jen, any other time. I have a letter for Mrs. Sorel from Frank," begins Mr. Arthur, touching his spur to his horse; for a leading feature in this gentleman's character is hurry and impatience.

"You better hear me?" It is all the boy says, but there is emphasis so peculiar in the tones, as they fall upon the rider's ears rods off, that he halts his restive horse and rides back.

"You know that man—Peel is his name—Dr. Peel? Ha! needs'tell me, Sar; I kin see you know him. I nuffin to say of him, Massa, not one word to say," adds the negro, with earnest depreciation. "He rich, big, splen-did man. Nobber saw him myself in my life. Nobber heard him say one word. Nobber spoke one word to him in my life; may Great Massa up above strike me dead in dis fence corner if I ebber did!"

"What about him?" asks the rider, with breathless eagerness.

"I hear tell he goin' to marry Miss Anne Wright, marry her dis berry mornin'—"

One instant, only one instant, the minister sits on his horse still and cold and pale as marble; the next he has got a at his horse's best speed toward Mrs. Sorel's house, but toward her house only because it is on the road to Mr. Alonzo Wright's.

Arrived there, he throws the halter of his horse over the post, and hurries in; it will take him but a moment. It is the force of habit which causes him thus to stop, and hurry to his bedroom to be one moment there, only one moment, upon his knees—if ever in his life rarely to-day. Meeting Mrs. Sorel in the passage, he places her letter in her hand and hurries by. Before he has well closed his room door he hears her cry. That cry, peculiar to her sex, never uttered by them save when wrung from the deepest distress, he understands. Frank is dead, killed probably, dead certainly. Yet he stands trembling with impatience none the less when the white-haired mother, in the agony of her grief, casts herself upon his bosom, crying:

"Oh, Frank, Frank! I knew it was coming, but I can not, can not bear it. Help me, oh my Heavenly Father, help, help!"

How strange it seems, how cruel! Mr. Arthur has no word hardly of consolation for her, does not draw her down beside him upon her knees in even the briefest prayer in that terrible hour. With but an impassioned word, a mere syllable, in fact, of consolation, he uncouples her aged arms from about him, puts her by gently but firmly, and hastens past with cold, set face.

Fresh impetiment. As he walks rapidly down the front walk, he meets a lady coming up it with hurried step. She is veiled, but he would recognize the form if it were only by the quickened beatings of his own heart. Even then it forgets for one instant all the world beside, and bounds toward her with the truest and strongest instinct it is capable of. And she recognizes him in the same moment, lifts her head bowed down upon her bosom, throws back her veil, reveals her face all discolored with weeping. She starts impetively toward him as she does so, yet draws back even in the act itself with freshened color in her face.

"Oh, Mr. Arthur, such terrible news!" she says. "Rutledge, brother Rutledge, my only brother! And I fear it will kill mamma. I was in school. They gave her the letter first. A soldier brought it. It will kill mamma. I didn't know what to do. I rode out to see if Mrs. Sorel, to see if you—"

"In there, in there—see Mrs. Sorel! Not now, Miss Alice, dear Alice! Mrs. Sorel, Mrs. Sorel!" he interrupts her, in hurried tones; and Alice, amazed even in her anguish, sees her lover unfasten his horse, hurry past her with cold, set face, mount and ride rapidly off in the direction from Somerville. The next moment she and Mrs. Sorel are weeping aloud, clasped in each other's arms.

Not two hours after Mr. Arthur rides from Mrs. Sorel's gate, Mr. Wright, Dr. Peel, and Brother Barker alight at the gate of the first-named gentleman. Mr. Wright is evidently incensed, Dr. Peel is dressed with unusual splendor, even Brother Barker is as bright and fresh as his best black suit can make him. But all seem hurried and heated. Brother Barker is pallid beyond all precedent, which is saying a good deal, for very sallow and yellow, indeed, has been his complexion for the last two months.

"I told you so when you wanted me to have that man come out here to-day. Devotedly as I was attached to your daughter, Sir, I tell you plainly I would rather forego her hand than have such a fellow officiate."

It is Dr. Peel who says it as they ride up to the gate.

"A Union man, Sir, a bitter Union man. As I said at the time, a regular Federal spy in our midst. A—hypocrite!" Almost the entire stock of Dr. Peel's profanity interposed between the two words. "You did right to kill him, Sir, perfectly right. Even this clergyman could not object under the circumstances. We will ride in to-morrow and surrender ourselves. Acquit you! You will receive the thanks, Sir, of every Southern man in Somerville. Besides, as a spy, even the Federals could not touch you for shooting him."

"Look here, Peel," says Mr. Wright, seizing upon that gentleman's arm as he is about to open the gate, steadying himself with difficulty as he does so. "I told you I ought not to have drunk a drop there in town. Under the circumstances, you see. Out of respect to Anne, Dr. Peel, look here. I love my daughter, you, parson—what is it? Parker? Barker? I love that daughter of mine there in this house. I love her because I killed her mother, you see; not shot her, you know—it was with a big music-book, I believe. Besides, Anne's a good daughter; best girl, prettiest girl on earth. No, you don't," with a firmer hold upon Dr. Peel's arm, who is endeavoring to open the gate. "Wait. Champagne? How much was it? It's my impression you put something in it. I ought not to be drunk before Anne to-day, told you so five hundred times there in Somerville. Hmph, if I only had half a thought you did, I'd—Parson Arthur? Why didn't you hit him yourself? However, I fired at him once myself in the old gin, and missed. Did you ever hear me tell about it, Mr. Parker, Marker—what is your name?" with great indignation at the clergyman present, and copious oaths.

"Not now, Mr. Wright," entreated Dr. Peel, in his most persuasive manner. "We've got the license, Miss Anne is waiting—"

"Think I care one cent?" interposed Mr. Wright. "Yes, I did kill that Parson Arthur, plucky fellow, though, he was. Ought to have seen him that day down there at the old gin. Kill? Why," and Mr. Wright took his revolver from its leather case at his waist, "see this? See how smooth it revolves? All you've got to do is to cock it—see?—point it at your man, one little, little touch on this trigger, and—down he goes. Arthur ain't the first man I've killed, by a long sight; nor won't be the last. Why, gentlemen," continued Mr. Wright, with an air of perfect sincerity, his eyes half closing as he looks at each in turn, and his voice in that peculiar low key which can not be described—"if either of you were to give me cause, half a cause, a shadow of a reason for it, I'd kill you here and now—kill both of you with the greatest satisfaction, rather do it than not. You see I like such things. Ever since that day I up with the big music-book—you see I had been drinking—"

"Mr. Wright," interposes Dr. Peel. "We have the license, here is the clergyman, Miss Anne sees us. I ask you as a father if you think it respectful to Miss Anne Wright—"

"Put it on that ground, do you? Well, let us go in. Only, wa'n't it over in a flash?" and he confronts his companions as they proceed up the walk toward the front door. "Here we were riding along talking about—what were we talking about?—never mind. All on a sudden down upon us comes that fellow Arthur—rides well, rode well, I mean, didn't he? What was he saying? Oh, yes, Colonel Wright, Colonel Wright, one word with you, Colonel Wright, wasn't that it? You says, Peel, what was it? Oh, yes, Mr. Wright, you say, yonder comes a man I know to be a Yankee, a Federal spy, and my mortal foe, about him down! What did you turn so yellow for, Peel? your lips were white, screamed like a wild cat you did, didn't he, Mr. Larker, Parker; what—a very large oath—"is the reason I can't keep your name in my mind? Never mind. What was it? I said. Let's hear what the man has to say, Peel. Then you whips out your six-shooter and fired. Missed, of course. Fellow kept right on steady as steel, didn't wince or draw rein. What did he say? For God's sake, Colonel Wright, one word with you! Then over in a flash, wa'n't it? I had out my revolver and fired. I assure you, gentlemen," and Mr. Wright brings the assurance with oaths. "It was like that day with my wife. I didn't even know I laid hold, or intended to touch that music-book—you see she was playing on the piano at the time; it was over before I knew it. Something in here," says Mr. Wright, gravely, and laying his hand on his bosom, "not myself. It wasn't there the moment before. It is gone the instant the thing is done. What you would call the devil, parson; wouldn't you? Ning out."

"Really, my dear Sir, it is very difficult—" Brother Barker begins, snatching feebly, rubbing his hands together, glancing for aid to Dr. Peel. "Think I may kill you? you are a coward, Arthur wasn't. Riding steadily up. One word, Colonel Wright, for God's sake, one word! his right hand up that way. Then I fired for his left breast button, last of the row, and—down he went. Never," added Mr. Wright, impressively, "whatever you do, gentlemen, never fire merely at a man. Always aim—I always do—for some distinct something—a button, a brass-pin, something of the sort on him."

And so they turn to go, Dr. Peel foaming with impatience, but afraid to cross the man, Brother Barker wishing that he had been on some distant appointment instead of in Somerville when they came for him that morning. Nor does his dismay decrease when Mr. Wright suddenly turns upon him when they are on the steps of the parson.

"What was that you said at the time, parson? For Heaven's sake let me get down and see if he is killed, wasn't it? I says, I've brought you out to marry Anne and I'll kill you too if you—yes that was it—kill you too, if you try it. You pucker up your face and say, rolling up your eyes, as if it was a grace at table, it is the awful judgment on him of God. It's very curious," adds Mr. Wright, as they enter the door—"in these difficulties I am like a spectator looking on; know all that is done, remember every thing that is said perfectly well, a kind of two of us in the thing at the same moment, a cool one and a hot one, and which is me and which is the devil I never can tell."

Only all this is pale and colorless delineation of Mr. Wright's words, the criticism and fervor of his profanity being omitted. As to the facts, they were as he stated.

And the minister lies bleeding, apparently dead, in the road where he fell. His horse, startled by the shots and his rider's fall, had fled from the spot for a few hundred yards, had then stopped to graze, and so had by nightfall found his way to his stable-door, carrying fresh alarm for his owner to a household already scientifically distressed.

Mrs. Sorel had gone to town with Alice hours before and has not returned. The servants, greatly afflicted by the loss of their "Mass Frank," doubly afflicted by this new calamity—for they are all greatly attached to Mr. Arthur—hasten to inform Robby in the house of the arrival of the riderless steed. A few hours before that sedate little boy was only "Robby," now he is "Mass Robby" with the servants. His mother, too, has clasped him to her bosom, wept over him, and kissed him as her only child. In spite of his anguish Robby is not without a new sense of importance. Scarcely afflicted in regard to Mr. Arthur, to whom he is ardently attached, with tears streaming afresh down his cheeks, but with the gravity of the oldest of men, he gives charge to the household to be careful, generally, during his absence, and rides in through the darkening twilight to Somerville, meditating soberly and with a sense of having attained, during the last few hours, years of growth.

Entering at last the house of Mrs. Bowles, so well known yet so long unvisited, he steals quietly, as is his wont every where, into her chamber. But even Robby's sobriety of soul is startled at the deadly hue upon the face of that lady, lying, a mere shadow of her former self, partly in the arms of his mother, who sits upon the bed—all the alienation of the last few years utterly gone, and the two friends more to each other now by far than ever before; while Alice comes and goes silently and gently, not without a pleasure in the reconciliation of the hour, even in her deepest sorrow for her dead brother, and for her mother fast following him. Common affliction has robbed every coldness between these two, made keenly alive, by and during their years of separation, to all they really see to each other. It touches Alice to observe how, in a mutual manner and tone, these two sorrow-stricken and white-haired friends are more to each other, like the schoolmates of years ago, than grown persons.

"Read it yet once more, Eliza dear; just once more, please. Not from the beginning—that passage about his being a high-toned gentleman," Mrs. Bowles is saying as Robby steals quietly in.

"No officer in the army could have been more ardently beloved—" No, that is the wrong paragraph," Mrs. Sorel says, searching for the passage in the soiled and crumpled paper in her hand, wet with tears, and already known by heart, every line of it, to these three. "Yes, here it is," continues Mrs. Sorel, at last, reading from the letter: "It has been my lot to be thrown with many officers from the State of our common birth, very many of all grades during the war; but among them all, I am free to say that Captain Rutledge Bowles stood pre-eminent as a high-toned gentleman and most gallant soldier. It was only after Colonel Carrington had frequently expressed his hearty approval of the killing of Lincoln that Captain Bowles spoke at all upon the subject; nor then, until Colonel Carrington had pressed Captain Bowles for an utterance of his opinion. The very strong, language used by your lamented son in denunciation of the crime in question was but characteristic of the man, as I have already remarked in full. Nor has Colonel Carrington even the excuse of intoxication, which the delirium of his language and conduct on the occasion would seem to indicate. Some excuse may be found for him who slew your son in the intensity of chagrin and bitterness attending the fall of Charleston. But, in the interest of truth it should be stated, so far as any exasperation on this ground should have affected any one, that individual might have better plead it in the case of Captain Bowles, he being a South Carolinian by birth, than Colonel C., who is well known to be a native of Connecticut. And this is the general rule—"

"That will do, Eliza," and the pale sufferer places her thin hand upon the paper. "I thank God for it, Lizzie dear. I did hope, even pray, that Rutledge Bowles might fight, even if he must fall there, upon some great field of victory within South Carolina. My heavenly Father has granted my prayer, though not as I thought. He has fallen on that soil—fallen in even a nobler cause—fallen in detestation and denunciation of a dastardly crime; the nobler in him to denounce it, to die for denouncing it, so it was a crime against the man in all the world whom we both—Rutledge Bowles and myself I mean—hold in greatest dislike. An inscrutable Providence, Lizzie"—and here the wasted hand waddens feebly about the sunken temples—"has been against the South. We won't discuss it, dear. I have tried to understand it; tried, and tried. If you only know, Eliza," said the grief-stricken woman, with earnest eyes upon the friend on whose bosom she leaned, "how hard I've tried! I've laid awake long nights through, when Alice here slept sweetly by my side, trying to make it out—trying so very, very hard. I have gone over the whole Bible in search for light, Lizzie. I have wept and prayed so! Don't be offended with me; we won't say any thing more about it; but I can not see how South Carolina was wrong. I know God rules, dear; does nothing but what is right; but we ought to have succeeded, Lizzie. I always feel that—"

"Mamma, please, you know what Dr. Warner—" begins Alice, who sits beside her mother, with the humble pleading of a little child, and moistening the thin hand clasped in her own with tears.

"I was only going to speak about the terrible fall of Charleston, and about those awful scenes in Columbia—but you are right. Only I try and try"—the hand taken from her daughter's grasp, and touching the forehead here and there with fragile fingers. "I do not, I can not understand—"

"But you were speaking of Rutledge, Alice," says Mrs. Sorel, mindful of the daughter's own appealing to her through tears, and in gentlest tones.

"Yes, Lizzie, I know, and you know too, how foolish I have always been about Rutledge Bowles—except Alice here, all I had on earth; but I think even this moment more about South Carolina and its defeat and all than I do about him. You know how we have both been trained so that, Lizzie; it is part of my—my very heart;

I can not help it. That Abolitionists should actually conquer us!" and again the frail hand goes to the brow, unspeakable bewilderment in her eyes.

"But I too have lost my son, Alice—my Frank. Let me read you the letter again." And in quiet tones, but with the tears trickling down her cheeks and glittering upon the white sheet as she reads, Mrs. Sorel again goes over the few words of her letter, brought in the same package with her friend's, telling of the death of her boy, after long sickness, in the hospital at Richmond. The letter is roughly written by a couraier, many words misspelled, but all to the effect that it was the death of a Christian youth fully prepared to die, his last breath filled with messages of love to his mother and Robby, and confident expectations of reunion with them in a world where war is forever unknown. Very peaceful and quiet his death, breathing quiet and peace even through the first anguish of the bereaved mother.

"And there is this too, Eliza, about Rutledge Bowles," says the pallid sufferer, returning immediately, though after deepest sympathy with her friend, to her own sorrow. "Alice will tell you I told her, when I recovered from my fainting fit it was my first thought, as it is now my consolation. It is better he should have died, Lizzy, now that South Carolina is defeated. Rutledge Bowles could not have endured to see it, dear. To live under the rule of Abolitionists would have been to him a living agony and humiliation worse than death. It is better as it is. Though why our heavenly Father should have permitted—" And as the wasted fingers seek the forehead, Robby can no longer keep silence. He has stolen silently by his mother's side, she aware of his presence there, but too absorbed in the sorrow of her friend and herself for her to notice him.

"Oh, mother, mother!" says Robby, the tears beginning to flow afresh at the sound of his own voice, "Mr. Arthur, Mr. Arthur!" and breaks down.

Alice is seated by the bed, gently drawing out through her hands the long white tresses of her mother, too full of sorrow to speak, but at the name she turns so sharply around even her mother can not but remark it, her lips parted, every vestige of color gone from her cheeks.

"Oh, mother, Mr. Arthur is killed! His horse—" But Robby can get no farther, for Alice has fallen forward upon the bosom of Mrs. Sorel in a faint, and all is confusion.

[To be Continued.]

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

It is somewhat curious—even if one visits a first-class restaurant on a Sunday—to notice the compulsory change of "progress" which some unthinking epicures are forced to make upon the passage of the new tables. An attentive waiter at Deimos's arrangements with care and dexterity a tray for a gentleman who is evidently dining "à la carte" shows. The order for dinner is given, reading with: "And bring me a bottle of Royal Rose." "No wine at all served today, Sir." The thoughtful gentleman looks up in surprise—evidently he has not been to church, and apparently has not even thought of his being Sunday. "No wine?" "No, Sir, not today." "Ah!" responds the disappointed applicant, glancing reflectively at the occupied tables in his immediate vicinity; "well"—another investigating glance—"bring me a bottle of Champagne cider." And this order being complied with, and the opening "pop" sending his imagination, the recipient tries to fancy himself enjoying real Champagne.

The workings of the Excise Law are awakening fine discussion on the question of temperance; and in an enlightened republic free discussion eventually results in enlarged views, and a final triumph of right principles.

A Portland paper remarks—and the suggestion is worth the attention of other cities—"The authorities ought to establish water fountains at various points about the city to meet the wants of the thirsty. People must have something to drink. It is never wise to cut off a popular and vicious indulgence without giving an innocent and healthful pleasure in its stead."

In a little town away "down East," efforts were once made to have a couple of beer pumps for the convenience of the people. The matter was brought up at a town-meeting, but was voted down because the necessary was rather low. Whereupon an orator made the following effective speech: "There's Mr. Jones, he's gin up selling milk; you've just voted that we can't have any water, and the Legislature says we ain't to have any liquor! We've got about two inches of snow on the ground, but when that's gone we shall be in a fix! Then what are we going to drink?"

Perhaps people might take to nature's pure beverage if they had a good chance to get it. It has been stated that during the summer a "jar of cool water near the door of every liquor shop will do more to diminish the rum-seller's business than a policeman on guard." Numerous water fountains have recently been established in London, and have had a marked effect upon the beer shops. One dealer threatened legal proceedings against the authorities for allowing a drinking fountain to be opened near his house, alleging that it had diminished his returns more than twenty-five per cent.

The Portland journals announce that an awful discovery has just been made with regard to the wholesale destruction of the Southern tribe in France. It seems that the "picnic pyramids" of little birds which are so noticeable in French markets are killed by poison! It is asserted that treason-like quantities of such venoms are sold for the purpose. The drug is bottled with grease and spread over the fields at every period of the year. This information has created not a little alarm among epicures.

deprived of hair and strength. People who prepare and deal in articles of food should have sufficient knowledge to prevent such reprehensible practices as endanger the lives of eaters.

Structures have been very abundant notwithstanding the unusually cool season; and "Les Chans and Strawberry Festivals" have been very fashionable, as they generally are in June. These festivals are in many cases given for the pleasure or benefit of Sabbath-schools; and the little folks enjoy them vastly, to say nothing of the "children of larger growth," who are so busy with the good things for the purpose, purchase, or exhibiting in the Sunday-school Library. And speaking of selling good things reminds us of an anecdote, which contains a suggestion that any charitable lady is at liberty to follow—if she pleases!

"A nobleman recently went to the sale of fancy articles lately held at the Ministry of War, Paris, for the benefit of the poor. He first asked the lady at the stall what was the price of a beautiful silver case. 'Two hundred francs,' was the reply. 'No, no, I'll take it,' said the lord. 'And this jewel-case?' 'Eight hundred francs.' 'No, no, I'll take it,' said the lord, holding a note of five francs. 'The price for any thing else?' said the lady. 'An' I replied by, 'what I wish to be sold to be compared with any of these articles, but for a price.' 'What do you wish?' 'To kiss your fair hand.' The lady blushed, recoiled, and replied, 'Three thousand francs.' The lord grandly kissed the proffered hand, given with some hesitation—but what will not charitable ladies do for the poor? 'I want something else,' said the lord; 'a lock of your hair.' 'That will be six thousand francs.' 'That is nothing,' said the lord, on receiving the lock of hair which the lady cut off for him. 'Six and three are nine,' said the noble lord, and, handing 1800 francs to the lady, he nobly departed pleased with his bargain."

There is a good deal to be deduced from a short poem which we find in an exchange. It is from the pen of William L. Burroughs:

THE TWO DESTROYERS.

Once on a time a pious Moslem, saying His morning worship in their style of praying, Just as the early sun had lit the skies— Beheld a phantom through the mist arise— A phantom hideous as the dream of death. "What art thou?" said the saint, with timid breath. "I am the Plague!"

"And whither tends thy race?" "To slay ten thousand men in yonder place." "Do not, I pray thee, if such prayer may be." "It rains I see enough." "The destiny?" "Oh, then, if Allah willeth my path of doom; Let the ten thousand know their woe's doom; But in the prophet's name I do explore, When thou hast slain ten thousand, slay no more!" "To hear is to obey!"

The vision passed, And o'er a multitude its shadow cast, After the plague was over, at the place, And hear in which it first revealed its face, Again the horrid phantom hovered—and new Out spoke the body woe: "Whence comest thou?" "From yonder place."

"How many hast thou slain?" "Twenty thousand strew the plain!" "Then, best! there are twenty thousand dead!" "The truth, with frenzied lips the phantom said, 'Fall twenty thousand more death's power confer. I smote ten thousand, four struck down the rest."

A singular account is given in a recent Mobile paper of a youthful prisoner, about 16 years of age, confined in the city jail, but who could not be kept there. Six different times his limbs were placed in iron, the strongest and most intricate, but all to no purpose. Then the officer manacled him by drawing his wrists together behind his back, after which he put on a tight-fitting pair of patent handcuffs. He then drew his arms close behind him and put on a pair of cuffs stretched by a short chain, above his elbows. A chain was then attached to the cuffs at the wrist, which extended down to the shackles which were closely fitted and locked on his ankles. The officer then jokingly remarked to him: "Now, Boston, if you wiggle yourself out of that dress I will guarantee that the sheriff here will give you the freedom of your cell, and so long as you behave yourself you will never again be locked in this jail." The young man declared he was a burglar, and in less than three minutes after he was left alone he stood without an iron upon him—the deed evidently being accomplished by slight of hand. It is said that he is a native of New York city, and has graduated from the Tuolome.

The London Quakers speak with a mixture of earnestness and sarcasm against the practice of bleaching the hair, which so many brunettes, paying reckless homage to fashion, are miserably practicing. It says: "The practice is simply ruinous; one that, if followed again and again, will change one's thick tresses of brown or black into something, for color, like a signed cat's back; for texture not unlike a convict's tusk of picked and unraveled oakum. At any rate, brunettes should be contented. Having bleached their tresses, they should go into a chlorine bath and bleach their skin to match. The operation would be painful, but fashion does not heed pain. The result even is doubtful; but the experiment might be worth trying. We have seen a portion of a dead negro's skin bleached white; whereas there would seem to be hope of success in a live brunette." The speculator announces that there is now sold in Paris a dye which instantly changes white or flaxen hair into the most glorious gold, which is nearly instantaneous, and never falls, or can fall. It is called orpiment, is the golden sulphuret of arsenic, and has only one trifling drawback, which those who want it probably will not mind. It kills, but as inevitably and as swiftly as does arsenic wood.

A very comical-looking vehicle is now the fashion in the Bois de Boulogne. It is hung on the finest springs, and is like the car of a water-sprayer—a theoretical one. There is but room for the fair driver and her petticoat, and she sits in as completely as an oyster does its shell. There are no hinges on, either their behind or her or the side; and on account of its peculiarities it is called the Kaulative by the ladies, and the Apocryph by the gentlemen.

They rather vaude us in England in regard to matrimonial advertisements, judging from the following, which present the matter with unalloyed frankness to all desiring wives:

Ade Emily Jenny, just sixteen, fair, blue eyes, and handsome, would like to be married as early as possible. Received, who is seventeen and pretty, having rich golden hair, wishes to marry a tall young man, about twenty-four years of age. Violet wants to be married to a tall man. She is tall, and very good-looking. Lilla Hook would dearly like to be married. She comes in first-class society, and has £2000 a year. She is eighteen, tall, and strikingly handsome.

Some of the applicants put the matter rather upon the ground of duty and decency: Mary G., who has good looks, but does not wish to speak of them, wants to be married. She has read her Bible, and knows that marriage is the destiny and honor of woman. She is twenty-three. Catherine E. B., who has dark brown hair, and soft brown eyes, with pretty features and nice figure, wishes to fulfill her woman's mission, and marry. She will have money.

Victor Hugo's home is situated in the most lovely spot that ever landscape painter dreamed of. Placed upon a height, it overlooks the city, the fort, and that immense horizon of the sea where sailing vessels to traverse the flight of even gulls itself. The house is colonaded in Gormery, where it settles lively curiosity. Wonders are related of it, enhanced by the mystery overhanging a threshold till now never crossed by the Gormery world; it is said to contain furniture worthy of an emperor's palace. The apartments and galleries have been entirely constructed from designs by Victor Hugo; he passed three years in drawing them. The rarest curiosities adorn the interior; for Victor Hugo, who loves to live in the past, has a taste for antique furniture.

Individuals in general, and ladies in particular, will be delighted at the good news which comes from a country situated between Honduras and Nicaragua. It is stated that there is a territory inhabited by the Mosquitoes—not the fish, but human beings—who have just been discovered. The ladies and gentlemen of the tribe are very small, but their hair would rejoice the heart of a Truffaut, being curiously long and extremely beautiful, parting in the middle in the style called Tom Joady, and descending on each side for two yards or more according to imagination. The color is even varied, and in some of it a light yellow, showing how nature adapts itself to fashion at the right moment. The officers of the frigate Thetis, cruising in that coast, who have had the honor of discovering these sons and heirs of the Mosquito land, have not had a large supply as locks of hair to their lady-loves—and to the merchants; and a just-ruled company (black and white, perhaps, by immediately formed, for the serving of the heads and collection of this useful and necessary article of commerce. The company will be called the "Whigton."

The last new thing in vegetable is really quite a startling wonder. The plant comes from Java, but we are told that it has been fairly tried in the open market in London and succeeds perfectly well. Think of a radish, says the Pall Mall Gazette, with seed-pods about three feet long, and sometimes growing five or six inches in diameter and weight! We can think of nothing like it except Jack's immortal bean-stalk, which authoritatively described plant is nevertheless not spoken of as good to eat, whereas this radish is said to be as palatable as it is monstrous. The pods are the edible portion, and when half grown you may pull them or eat them as a suspended part in a salad. When they are full grown you may boil them, and they taste like a combination of asparagus and green peas.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WANTED: for—burgh, in the Term, Plain Cook; to wash, dress, and milk a cow. Good character indispensable.—Apply at 66 — Street.

The paper from which we extract is Scotch, and not Irish, or we should have attributed to a bull the cow that wanted washing and dressing as well as milking.

LATHER REMEDY FOR BRUITS.—Use freely externally on the hair, grove, and take it internally to clear the system.

THE GIFT.

TO A FRIEND AT A FENCIBLE. Ah! good was your gift, false friend, It hid mine eyes with tears, With quags did his poor brow red, And made me sin for more. Gave of my sufferings and my woe, Begone!—I've had enough; You laughed to see how I wept; 'Twas you who gave the snuff!

HAIR LIVES OF INDIVIDUALS.—The compulsory purchase of land by a railway company is levied added to it. The buyers take a site in the seller's face.

What is the difference between a turned and a speaking trumpet?—One is hollowed out and the other is hollowed in.

THE NEEDLE-WOMAN'S EXPLANATION.—Ahem! Why should the British Government strive to abolish the use of the shuttle in Ireland?—Because it facilitates against the security of the crown.

WRITTEN AFTER GOING TO LAW. The law, they say, great Nature's chain connects, That ceases not most prodigious effects; In us behold reversed great Nature's laws— All my effects lost by a single snuff.

A Chaucerian Society awarded their annual gold medal to the author of the following specimen of burlesque in reality: Why is a man cutting grass like Otello?—Because he is a scow (Hart).

In a Black report we read, a few rights since, "The Government are a fraction better." Which governments?

In temperance in diet. Our first parents ate themselves out of house and home.

Of unity, paying with attachment upon an elephant in a moment, what the lawyer? "What kind of a boat is that ain't" lay with his tail?"

What commodity is always afforded at cost?—The Law.

Shakespeare says that "use strengthens habit." Somebody states that he tried the experiment on a coat, but it did not answer at all.

What things increase the more you contract them?—Debts.

A company is on-ly retained. Four heavily loaded a day for a couple of months will put you in the way of one that will astonish all your friends.

If you can't cross a fish to him, try your persuasive power upon a cross dog, and you will be sure to succeed.

TO REMOVE STAINS FROM THE CHAIRS.—Get rich. An old farmer was selling a library at auction. He was not very well read in books, but he seemed the thing, credited to book, and went ahead. "Have you here," he said, "Harrison's Progress of the Progress; how much is it for?" "How much do I care for the Progress?" "Two shillings," said the old man. "I'll take it for the Progress," said the old man. "I'll take it for the Progress," said the old man. "I'll take it for the Progress," said the old man.

REFRESHMENTS. The best drink for a principled man is a "stern march," although the notion is, would probably being him to "the world's" ocean. Speaking of principled men, would it be inappropriate to divulge a law from an illustrious pugilist? "A new pugilist?"

The following list of refreshments includes many (in different drinks not found on the wine list of the popular hotels): For baskets—covered wine. For workmen—stagnant wine. For alchemists—the old port. For rising operations—colored water. For vegetarians—colored wine. For mountaineers—mule wine.

THE ISLAND OF GEORGE.—It is stated that the new island which has appeared off the coast of Greece has been named George, after the young king. And even? We trust that the island, which was struck up unexpectedly by a regular, regular, regular in the same way that the Ministry was placed on the throne of Greece, will not see him the example of disappearing again, as these volcanic islands continue to, the subject arising from a drop of the crater. And though we a good many orders given in Greece going ripe for a distribution.

A grim, hard-headed old judge, after hearing a business dispute from a contentious young barrister, advised him to pick out some of the feathers from the wings of his imagination and put them like the tail of his judgment.

If you would enjoy your meals be contented, a every man can not tell whether he is eating bread or sugar or stewed umbrellas.

THE MOSQUITO.

A Plate from an Illustrated Work suppressed by the Camden and Amboy Railroad Company, entitled "The Insects of New Jersey."

"SPRING."—[From a Drawing by A. Herr.]

THE CONTRAST OF SUFFERING. ANDERSONVILLE & FORTRESS MONROE.

Sh. May

TREASON MUST

BE MADE ODDIOUS.

DREAM-HAUNTED.

I HAD taken a lease of Gledhills of my friend Mr. Leonard. The latter, before he would consider the business settled, insisted upon my sleeping one night at Gledhills. "Dobson and his wife, who have charge of the house, will find you a tolerable dinner, and make you up a comfortable bed. I will walk over in the morning at ten and see you; and then, if you are still in the same mind that you are in now, I will have the agreement drawn up at once, and you can enter upon your occupancy the following day."

The autumn day was drawing to a close when I found myself walking up the avenue toward the old mansion at Gledhills. An old man answered my summons at the door. He bowed respectfully at sight of me, and informed me that Mr. Leonard had sent word that I was about to dine and sleep at Gledhills, and that every thing was prepared for my reception. As I crossed the threshold the great door closed behind me with a dull, heavy crash, that vibrated through every corner of the house, and awoke a foreboding echo in my heart. Preceded by my earliest guide, when age and rheumatism had bent almost double, I crossed the disclate-looking entrance-hall, passed up the grand staircase, and so through a pair of folding-doors into the drawing-room, beyond which was a suit of smaller rooms, of which two had now been set apart for my service. How child and cheerless every thing looked in the cold light of the dying day! Now that the glimmer of sunshine rested no longer on the place, my fancy refused to invest any of those bare, desolate rooms with the pleasant attributes of home; and already, in my secret mind, I half repented my facile eagerness in being so willing to accept, without further experience, this worm-eaten old mansion, tenanted, doubtless, by the ghosts of a hundred dead-and-gone folks, as a shelter for my household gods, a home for all that I held dear on earth.

The two rooms set aside for me I found to be comfortably furnished, in a neat but inexpensive style; but when I understood from the old man that ever since the death of the last tenant, three years before, they had been furnished and set aside, ready for the reception of any chance visitors, like myself, who, either by their own wish or that of Mr. Leonard, might decide to pass a night at Gledhills, and that three or four would-be occupants before me had so slept there a night each, and had gone on their several ways next-morning, never to be seen under that roof again, I began to think that there might perhaps be something more in Mr. Leonard's stipulation than was visible on the surface.

Having dined, and done ample justice to Mr. Leonard's cloret, and being possessed in some measure by the fumes of interest, I took my cigar and strolled along the corridor, and so came presently into the great empty drawing-room, in which the members were now playing a ghostly game of high-and-low. It was unoccupied and destitute of furniture, and its creaked floor creaked and groined beneath my tread, as though it were burdened with some dreadful secret which it would fain reveal, but could not. Outside each of the three long, narrow windows with which the room was lighted was a small balcony, below which stretched a velvet expanse of lawn, set here and there with a gay basket of flowers, the whole being shut in by a clump of aspen trees. I have said that the room was destitute of furniture, but I found after a time that it still contained one relic of its more prosperous days, in the shape of a family portrait, which still hung over the mantel-piece, as it had hung for half a century, or more. When I became aware of this fact I fetched one of the candles out of my sitting-room, in order that I might examine the picture more closely. It was a full-length portrait of a man in the military costume that was in vogue toward the end of last century. The face was very handsome, with a proud, resolute beauty of its own, that would have been very attractive but for a vague, repellent something—a hint of something tiger-like and cruel lurking under the surface of that artificial smile, which the artist had caught with rare fidelity, and had fixed on the canvas forever. It must have been something in the better traits of the countenance that taught me to see a likeness to Mr. Leonard; and I could only conclude that the portrait before me was that of some notable ancestor of the present master of Gledhills.

The fatigues of the day and the solitude to which I was condemned drove me to bed at an early hour; but there was something about the novelty of my position that precluded sleep for a long time after I had put out my light, and I remember hearing some clock strike twelve while I was still desperately wide awake, but that is the last thing I do remember, and I suppose that I must have slid off to sleep a few minutes later, while still in the act of assuaging to myself that in sleep there was for me an impossibility. Whether I had slept for hours or for minutes only, when I woke up in the weird land of dreams, is a point on which I can offer no opinion. I awoke to that consciousness which is possessed by dreamers, and which, in many cases, is quite as vivid as the consciousness of real life; but throughout the strange, wild drama that followed I was without any individuality of my own; I had all the consciousness of a spectator without the responsibility of one. I was nothing; I had no existence in my own dream; I was merely the witness of certain imaginary occurrences, which took place without any reference to me, and which I was powerless to prevent or influence in the slightest degree.

Before me was the drawing-room at Gledhills—I recognized it at once by the portrait of the soldier over the fire-place. The walls, painted of a delicate sea-green, were hung with numerous pictures and engravings in rich frames. A thick Aubusson carpet covered the floor, and in the huge fire-place a wood fire, that had nearly burned itself down to ashes, was slowly expiring. The furniture was chintz-covered, and curtains of chintz draped the three high narrow windows. Standing in one corner, between the quaintly-carved legs of a mahogany chiffonier, was a tall Marlboro jar, with an open-work lid, from which was exhaled a faint indescribable perfume, as of the broiled sweetness of a hundred flowers; in the opposite corner stood a harp; books richly bound were scattered about the room, which was lighted by a number of wax-candles fixed in lustres over the mantel-piece.

Seated at a little fancy-table was a girl, eighteen or twenty years old, making-believe to be busy with her embroidery, but with a mind evidently preoccupied by some more important subject. She had on a short-waisted white dress, after the fashion of those days, from which her long narrow skirts fell away in delicate folds, utterly guiltless of all modern modes of extension of circumference. Her face was beautiful, and she had the air of a person quite conscious of that fact; but underlying this charm of regular features there was something resolute and proud, that carried the mind back, as by an instinct, to the portrait over the fire-place. She had loosened the thick masses of her chestnut hair, and they now fell low down over her shoulders, confined only by a narrow band of blue velvet. Round her neck was a thin chain of gold, from which hung a locket, which she drew every now and then from the bosom of her dress, and pressed with feverish eagerness to her lips. The same impatience was visible in the way in which she would put a few quick stitches into her embroidery, and then pause, with the needle in her fingers, to listen intently, and so lapse into a dreamy, absent mood, out of which she would wake up in a minute or two with a start, and begin to ply her needle again as restlessly as before.

That something for which she was so impatiently waiting came at last—a low, clear, peculiar whistle, heard by me so distinctly through the mist of my dream, and remembered so well when I awoke that I could afterward reproduce it exactly. The young lady started to her feet the moment the signal fell on her ear. Her eyes flashed with a newer radiance: her soft lips parted into a smile; while from her bosom upward a lovely flush spread swiftly, as though Eden had touched her that instant with his torch, and already the celestial flame were coursing through her veins. A brief minute she stood thus, like a lovely statue of Expectancy; then she hurried to one of the windows, and drawing aside the long chintz curtain, she placed a lighted candle close to the window as an answering signal. Then, having withdrawn the candle and replaced the curtain, so that the window from the outside would seem quite dark again, she left the room, to return presently with a ladder of this rope, to which were affixed two hooks of steel. Her next proceeding was to lock the three doors which opened into the drawing-room, and having thus secured herself from intrusion, she passed out of sight behind one of the curtains; and then I heard the faint sound of a window being cautiously lifted, and I knew, as well as though the whole scene was visible to me, that she was fixing the rope-ladder to the balcony by means of its hooks, and that presently her lover would be with her.

And so it fell out. A little while, and the curtain was lifted; the lady came back into the room; and following close upon her steps came a tall stranger, dark and handsome, like a true hero of romance.

"My darling Lenore!" "My dearest Varrel!"

He took her in his arms, and stooped, and kissed her fondly; and then he drew her to the light, and gazed down into her eyes, in which nothing but love for him was then visible, and then he stooped again and kissed her not less tenderly than before. His roquelaure and hat had fallen to the ground, and he now stood revealed a man of fashion of the period. As before stated, he was eminently good-looking, with languishing black eyes, and a positive smile such as one usually endows Romeo with in imagination. He wore his hair without parting of any kind, in a profusion of short, black, glossy curls, in which there was no trace of the elaboration of art, and he was clean-shaven, except for a short whisker that terminated halfway down his cheek. He wore a blue coat with gilt buttons, swallow-tailed, short in the waist, and high-collared. His waistcoat was bright-yellow as to color, crossed with a small black stripe; a huge eal depended from the top of his black small-clothes; and the Hessian boots in which his lower extremities were encased were polished to a marvelous degree of brilliancy. His cravat, white and unstarched, and tied with a large bow, was made of fine, soft muslin; and the frilled bosom of his shirt had been carefully crimped by conscientious feminine fingers. In this frill he wore a small cluster of brilliants; while a large signet-ring, a genuine antique, decorated the first finger of his right hand.

Such was the appearance of Sir Derwent Varrel; and absurd as a costume like his would now seem on the classic flags of Bond Street or St. James's, it yet became the baronet admirably, while he in return lent it a grace and distinction which made it seem the only attire proper for a gentleman.

"Why did you not come last night?" said Lenore. "How after hour I waited for you in vain." "Twas not my fault, dearest, that I did not; of that rest well assured," answered Varrel. "Business that brooked not delay kept me from your side. I was hugely chagrined."

"That weary, weary business!" sighed Lenore. "Tis ever men's excuse. But now that you are here, I will not be melancholy. Ah, that I could be forever by your side!"

She nestled her head shyly on his bosom. He stroked her chestnut hair softly with his white hand, and looked down on her with a crafty and sinister smile—such a smile as might light up the face of a Fowler when he sees the fluttering innocent which he has been doing his best to entice begin to turn longingly toward the snare.

"Little simperton!" he replied, pulling her ear. "You speak as if what you long for were impossible of attainment; whereas one word from you would make it a blissful certainty, and render two loving hearts happy forever."

"I can not, Varrel—I can not say that word. Ah, why does my father dislike you so much?" "A'y faith! how should I know? But dislike it not the word, little one. You should ask, why does he hate me so intensely? There are those who gladly calumniate me, and for such he has over a ready ear; for I am unfortunate enough to have many enemies, and doubtless twice as many faults."

"No, no, I will not hear such language," exclaimed Lenore. "In time my father will relent, and then—"

"Never, girl!" said Varrel, fiercely. "Colonel Leonard is not made of melting stuff. His hatred of me he will carry with him to the grave. Never look for change in him. Sweet one," he added, changing his tone in a moment to one of low-breathing, imploring tenderness—"sweet one, as I have told thee before, both thy fate and mine are dependent on a single word from those rosy lips. Be mine, in spite of every one! I am rich and can supply thy every want. We will go abroad; and in some lovely Italian valley, or fair life of the eastern sea, we will forget our by-gone troubles, and watch the happy days glide softly past, while rounding our lives to that perfect love which alone can bring back Eden to this weary earth. Oh, Lenore, dearest and best-loved, flee with me at once and forever!"

She was standing by the little table, smiling, trembling, and yet with tears half starting from her lids, while he, kneeling on one knee, was covering her hand with passionate kisses.

"Oh, Varrel, you try me almost beyond my strength!" she murmured. "But I can not, I dare not do as you wish. You know not my father as well as I do. He would seek me out and kill me—and you too, and you too, Derwent! wherever we might be. His vengeance would be terrible and pitiless."

"Tisid little pass!" he said, half scornfully, as he rose and encircled her waist with his arms. "Am I not competent to protect thee against the world? Fear nothing. For this house of bondage, for this stagnation of heart and soul, I will give thee life and light and love. Thou shalt exchange this—"

"Hush!" exclaimed Lenore, suddenly, with a smothered shriek. "I hear my father's footfall on the stairs. To the window, Varrel, or you are lost!"

One hasty kiss, and then Varrel dashed aside the chintz curtain, and sprang to the window, only to fall back next moment into the room like a man stricken in the dark. "A thousand devils! I have been betrayed!" he exclaimed. "The rope-ladder is gone, and I see the figures of men moving about the lawn. Lenore, you must hide me!"

"Too late—too late!" she sobbed. They both stood for a moment as though changed to stone, while the footsteps came with a heavy tramp along the echoing corridor, and halted outside the door. The eyes of Lenore and Varrel turned instinctively to the door-handle, and they saw it move as it was tried from the other side, but the door was still locked.

"Opea, Lenore—it is I!" said a stern voice from without; and the summons was emphasized by a heavy blow on the panel of the door.

"Oh, Varrel, I dare not disobey!" said Lenore, in an agonized whisper. "Hide yourself behind the curtains; perhaps he may not know of your presence here; and when he shall have gone to his own room we must plan your escape. Hush! not a word. Hide! hide!"

"Why this foolery of locked doors?" said he who now came in. "Am I to be barred out of my own rooms by a child like you?"

"The night was so dark, and—and I felt so lonely, and—and—"

"And—and you did not expect your father back so soon?" he said, mimicking her tone with a sneer. "Is it not so, you white-faced jade?"

"Indeed, papa, I—"

"Don't prevaricate, girl!" he said, with a savage stamp of the foot. "Come, now, you will tell me next that you have had no visitors—eh?"

"Indeed, no, papa," said Lenore, with painful eagerness.

"Been quite alone ever since I left home this afternoon?"

"Quite alone, papa."

A faint dash of color was coming back into her cheeks by this time; she began, perhaps, to hope that after all this questioning his suspicions would be allayed, and he would go to his own room. If such were the case his next words must have undeceived her terribly.

"You lie, girl—you lie!" he said, in a voice whose sternness was not without a tremble in it; and as he spoke he touched Varrel's hat contemptuously with his foot, which up to that moment had lain unheeded on the floor. "Oh, that child of mine should ever live to deceive me thus!" His clasped hands and upturned face seemed to appeal to Heaven against the falsehood that had just been told him; but next instant the look of anguish died from off his face, and his features settled back into more than their former hardness as he strode across the floor and flung back the curtain, behind whose folds Varrel was concealed. "Behold the proof!" he cried.

"Behold the damning proof! Oh, Lenore!"

For a moment the two men stood eyeing each other in silence. Lenore, with a pitiful cry, fell at her father's feet, but he headed her no more than if she had been a stone. In the father of Lenore I beheld the original of the picture over the drawing-room mantel-piece; only he seemed older and more grizzled, and his features more deeply marked with the carving of Time's chisel than in his portrait. He had on a sort of military undress suit, with a pair of heavy riding-boots and spurs, and a short heavy whip in his hand.

"This, Sir Derwent Varrel, is an unexpected honor," said Colonel Leonard, in a tone of unaccounted irony, as he made the baronet a sweeping and ceremonious bow. "Pray—pray let me beg of you to emerge from an obscurity so uncongenial to one of your enterprising disposition. That is better, Lenore, child; let us have a little more light on the scene—it is a pleasure to look on the face of an honest man—and we may, perchance, need it all before we have done. More light, girl, do you hear? And now, perhaps, Sir Derwent Varrel will favor us with some explanation—any, the most simple, will, of course, do for us—of how he came to be hidden, like a common thief, behind the curtains of my drawing-room."

Varrel's pale olive cheek flushed deeply at this little speech, and a dangerous light began to glitter in his eyes as he stepped out of his hiding-place, and advanced into the room.

"Colonel Leonard shall have an explanation as simple as he desires," he said. Then he stopped to refresh his nerves with a pinch of snuff.

"You are aware, Sir," he resumed, "that I love your daughter; that several months ago I would fain have made her my wife; and that your consent alone was wanting to such a union."

"Precisely so," said Colonel Leonard in the tones of tones, as he balanced the handle of his riding-whip between his thumb and finger.

"You might prevent our marriage, Sir, but you could not keep us from loving one another," said Sir Derwent, proudly.

"In other words, my daughter had will sufficient respect left for me to refuse to wed you without my consent; but you had not sufficient respect for her to refrain from using your influence over her weak girl's will to induce her to desert her father, and to consent to nocturnal assignations with a libertine like yourself. Love! The word is soiled is coming from such lips as yours. You and I, Sir Derwent Varrel, had high words together six months ago, and I told you then that I would rather see my daughter lying in her coffin than wedded to such a one as you; and those words I repeat again to-night. Come hither, girl," he added, seizing Lenore roughly by the wrist, "come hither, and choose at once and forever between me and this man, who has taught thee to lie to thy father. What do I say? Nay, there can be no choice between such as this man and me. I tell thee, girl, that thy ignorance can not fathom the depths of such iniquity as his. A gambler so deeply tainted that in no society of gentlemen is he allowed to play; a libertine so vile, that to couple a woman's name with his is a passport to dishonor; a sharper and blacker, who has been twice hooted off the Newmarket course; a bankrupt so desperately involved that only by a wealthy marriage—with such a one, for example, as the heiress of Gledhills—can he hope even partially to retrieve his fortunes. Bah! what thy country-bred ignorance knew of these things?"

"Hard words, Colonel Leonard, very hard words," said Sir Derwent, disdainfully; "but, I am happy to think, utterly incapable of proof."

"Hard words! ay, hard enough to have moved an innocent man to righteous anger, but not, as it seems, to flutter thy slow-beating pulses ever so faintly; and that because thou knowest them to be true. Proof! Here's one out of a dozen. Who lured sweet Mary Doris from her home in yonder valley, and hid her away in London past the finding of her friends? Who held the simple village beauty lightly for a month or two, and then discarded her to starve or die as she might think best? Who bet you, Sir Derwent Varrel, unless this letter also lies—a letter signed with your name, and found in the poor child's pocket when she lay with white staring face and dripping hair in the dead-house by the river. And now it is my daughter then seekst to entrap!"

As Colonel Leonard drew from his pocket the letter of which he had been speaking, Lenore, with a low cry of anguish, sank fainting to the floor; and the horror-stricken Varrel reeled backward like one suddenly stabbed.

"Reptile! it is time the score between us were settled," said Colonel Leonard, with a venomous ferocity of tone. "Only one of us two must leave this room alive." "I can not—I dare not fight with you," murmured Varrel. "Oh! do not try that to escape me thus. You refuse to fight. Then take the punishment of cowardice." And with that the heavy thong of Colonel Leonard's riding-whip whistled through the air, and came down on Varrel's neck and shoulders twice, twisting round his face on the second occasion, and leaving a thin livid wheal across his cheek when it had cut into the flesh. Varrel's first impulse was to shrink backward with a mingled cry of rage and pain; but the next instant he closed with the Colonel, and wrestling the whip from his hands, flung it to the other end of the room.

"Give me a sword—a pistol—a weapon of any kind!" he cried, hoarsely. "This vile treatment absolves me from all consequences. Colonel Leonard, your blood be upon your own head!"

The Colonel smiled sweetly on him. "Well spoken," he said, "only that you express yourself somewhat after the Puritan fashion. Your cry to arms is worthy of all praise, and I hasten to comply with it. In this cabinet, Sir, are a couple of as pretty playthings as ever gladdened the eyes of a gentleman. Volla! they are both alike in every particular. The choice is yours."

Varrel's fingers closed over the hilt of one of the rapiers thus presented to him; and while he tried its edge and temper, by running his finger and thumb appreciatively along its length, and by bending its point back nearly to the hilt, Colonel Leonard dismounted himself of the careless over-coat in which he was enveloped; and next minute the two men fronted each other.

"Gardez-vous, Monsieur!" cried Colonel Leonard as he made the first pass.

It was thoroughly understood by both of them that they were fighting for dear life—that neither of them must look for mercy from the other. Both of them were excellent swordsmen, but Sir Derwent had the advantages of youth and agility on his side, and he pressed the Colonel hardily, who, while keeping up his defense warily, yet felt himself compelled to retreat step by step before the desperate lunges of his antagonist.

The clash of the swords seemed to rouse Lenore from the stupor into which she had fallen. With her hands pressed to her temples, and with glaring eyeballs, that followed every movement of the con-batanta, she staggered to her feet. Her lips moved, but no sound came from them. Perhaps she was asking herself whether it were not all a hideous nightmare, which the first breath of reality would dissipate forever. With the same mingled look of horror and unbelief on her face she watched the two men coming slowly down the room again, for Colonel Lenore was still slightly overcome by his more youthful antagonist. The rapier clashed together; bright sparks flew from their polished blue-black surface, as they struck each other, and heat and quivered like things of life in the grasp of the sinewy hands that held them.

The combatants were just opposite the spot where the half-demented Lenore was standing like one incapable of motion, when suddenly, at a movement in theirs, the point of Colonel Lenore's rapier snapped off; an advantage which Varrel instantly followed up with a dextrous stroke, which sent the Colonel's broken weapon flying across the room. Lenore, with the quick instinct of love, divined her father's danger; and the same moment that the rapier was twisted out of his hand she sprang forward with a wild, frantic cry to shield him with her body from what she knew must follow, and the sword of Varrel, aimed at her father's heart with all the strength which hate and the desire of vengeance could lend to such a thrust, passed instead through the body of the hapless girl. Her father's arms caught her as she was falling. "Papa—kiss—forgive," she murmured in his ear; then a stream of blood burst from her lips, she shuddered slightly, and was dead.

Colonel Lenore passed his quivering lips tenderly on her forehead; then lifting her in his arms, he carried her to a couch. "Lie there for a little while, sweet, foolish darling," he said. "Perhaps I may join thee on thy journey before long."

Varrel, who was like a man half-mad, would have rung for help, but Colonel Lenore, by a gesture, forbade him to do so. "You and I, Sir," said the Colonel, "have still our little business to arrange."

"Great Heaven! what would you more?" exclaimed Sir Derwent.

"Revenge my daughter's death!" said Lenore.

"Her death was a pure accident."

"Granted. She died to save my life, and that life I now devote to avenging her memory. What I said before I say again—only one of us two shall quit this room alive. Here are two pistols; one of them is loaded, the other is unloaded. Choose one of them. In three minutes that clock on the chimney-piece will strike the hour. At the first stroke we will fire across this table; and may Heaven have mercy on the soul of one of us!"

"It would be murder!" said Varrel, in a low voice, while a cold sweat broke out on his athen face.

"Call it by what name you will," said Lenore; "but as I have said, so it shall be. Dare to refuse, and by the great Flood of Darkness, whose true son you are, I will thrash you with yonder whip within an inch of your life, and send you forth into the world branded forever as a coward and a rascal!"

Sir Derwent wiped the perspiration off his forehead with his lace-bordered handkerchief, and his dry lips moved in faint protest. His courage was beginning to waver. The slow, patient ferocity of his enemy was not without its effect upon him.

"Choose!" said Colonel Lenore, as he laid a brace of pistols on the table. Varrel hesitated for an instant which to pick, and Lenore smiled, grimly. No fresh arrangement of position was necessary, they being already on opposite sides of the table, on which poor Lenore's embroidery was still lying, as she had cast it aside in the first flutter of hearing her lover's signal.

"Colonel Lenore, I must make a last protest against this bloody business," said Varrel.

Again the Colonel smiled. "In ten seconds," he said, "the clock will strike. Be ready."

There was a great contrast between the two men as they stood thus, fronting what for one of them must be inevitable death. Colonel Lenore's bronzed cheek looked even darker than usual, and his eyes seemed to burn with intense hate as he stood gazing at his antagonist from under his lowering brows; but his extended arm was firm as a bar of steel. Varrel was evidently nervous. His lips had faded to a dull bluish white; he pressed one hand to his chest occasionally, as if to still the throbbing heart beneath; while the other, which held the pistol, trembled slightly in spite of him.

Four seconds—three seconds—two seconds. The deathly brooding stillness that pervaded the room was something awful. One second. The silver bell of the little French clock had not completed its first stroke before the two triggers were pulled. A flash, a report, and a gust of smoke from one of the weapons, and Sir Derwent Varrel, shot through the heart, fell back dead.

"So perishes a thorough scoundrel!" said Colonel Lenore as he gazed into the face of his dead enemy.

Suddenly a door opened, and showed a very old lady, with white hair, and clad in a white dressing-robe, standing in the entrance. From the movements of her hands you understood at once that she was blind, or nearly so.

"Henry! Henry! where are you?" she cried. "Some one find a pistol just now. Oh, call me that you are not hurt!" and she advanced a step or two into the room.

A spasm of anguish passed over the face of Colonel Lenore. "I am here and well, mother," he said. "Pray, return to your own room. I am sorry to have disturbed you."

"And Lenore," said the old lady, plaintively, "why has not Lenore been to kiss me, and say good-night? Has the child gone to bed?"

"Lenore is asleep, mother," said the Colonel, in a whisper. "We must not disturb her. She shall come to you in the morning."

"Straps—straps," murmured the old lady; "she never forget me before;" and with that she turned and went slowly away, groping with her hands before her; and the Colonel, falling on his knees, buried his face in the white dress of his dead daughter. At which point the whole machinery of my dream dissolved away, and I awoke.

There was no more sleep for me that night. So lifelike and vivid was my extraordinary dream, so much did it seem like a part of my own personal experience, that the effect left by it on my mind was not lightly to be shaken off. Lenore's wild cry as she flung herself into her father's arms, the voices of Varrel and Lenore in angry dispute, seemed still to echo in my brain; and I felt that every minute incident of that terrible tragedy must henceforth be, as it were, a part of my own life. Impelled by some vague feeling which I could not resist, I quitted my bedroom, and waded, half-dressed, into the great desolate drawing-room, the scene of all the strange incidents of my dream. The ghastly splendor of the moonlight filled it no longer; it was as cold, dark, and silent, as some vast tomb. As I stood in the doorway, longing, and yet afraid to enter, a gust of slight wind sweeping up the valley rattled the windows of the old mansion; and what seemed like a low, responsive sigh, came to me out of the gloom, a sigh so unutterably sad, that, with a shudder, I stepped backward and shut the door.

I was very glad when ten o'clock came, and brought Mr. Lenore, punctual to the minute. "It is only what I expected," he said, when I had given him an outline of my singular dream; "and I may now tell you, Sir, that precisely the same dream which impressed you so strongly last night is dreamed by every one, no matter who they may be, the first time they sleep at Gladhills, and never afterward; and this sleep—for I may truly call it by that name—has hung over the house from the night on which the tragedy, which you witnessed only in imagination, was worked out in all its dreadful reality within these walls. You will now understand why I requested you to sleep one night at Gladhills before finally deciding that you would take the house; and it remains for you to consider whether your wish, whose health you say is delicate, could undergo such an ordeal as she would assuredly have to pass through the first night of her sojourn under this roof."

I decided that she could not endure the trial, and gave up Gladhills.

A STORY FOR GROWN PEOPLE.

BY A VERY LITTLE BOY.

"AND how would you like it yourself?" said Willie's fairy godmother, knitting away very fast on her spider's silk stockings.

Willie's mamma opened her eyes wide, under the magic border of her nightcap. This was before the dressing bell, you understand; and the fairy godmother having slipped down the chimney, had perched herself on the bedpost, where she sat in spectacles and high-crowned cap, with her legs twisted around the post, looking more like a night-mare than a respectable fairy godmother.

And, said mamma, yawning:

"But see must have discipline, you know." "I agree with you," said the fairy, sharply. "So to commence with, get up; you should be ashamed to hesitate and dawdle there. You ought to have the habit of springing up promptly at the first tinkle of the bell."

Now if mamma was any thing at this particular moment she was sleepy, and she put her nose down among the pillows, and gave herself a little twist, and would have liked very well not to hear the fairy godmother.

"What a perverse, unmanageable person you are!" said the fairy, disapprovingly. "If you could see now the expression of your face, and all because I request of you something that is for your good! How slow you are with your lacing! and so, mamma, not the brown dress, but the gray one, if you please!"

"But why not?"

"Do you answer me back?" cried the fairy; "the gray dress I say, and no arguments."

"But it is no—" commenced mamma, when,

"Silence!" commanded Willie's fairy godmother, with such a look in her little black eyes that mamma thought it prudent to comply, and get into the gray dress as fast as possible, though she disliked it, and only wore it on dismal occasions like washing days. It fitted ill, and she felt ill-dressed, and she was very watchful at being twitched out of her sleep; and though she did not dare to explode, she did splash the water and twirl about the ewer; and—

"Such evidences of temper must be punished," declared the fairy, solemnly. "You will remain at home to-day in place of calling on Mrs. Greenleaf."

"But Mrs. Greenleaf sails for Europe this afternoon," cried mamma, aghast.

"Sorry to deprive you of your farewell; but as you remarked to Willie, when you kept him at home from the picnic that he had anticipated for six weeks, I do it for your good, my dear."

"She is my dearest friend, and I must see her," said mamma, resolutely. "She would never forgive my absence. Really, dame, this passes a joke."

"So Willie thought. You may remember he threw himself on the ground in a sort of despair, and that he would not be comforted; but as you very properly remarked, ill-temper must be curbed."

"But," interrupted mamma, almost beside herself, "you surely don't comprehend—"

"Did I ever say Yes when I had once said No?" asked the fairy godmother, astutely. "I am sorry for your disappointment, but—why tance? We must have discipline, you know."

Here the breakfast-bell rang, and as by this time mamma's temper was turned entirely wrong side out, she went down to the breakfast-room and seated herself with a sullen face, while the fairy godmother took her place at the head of the table with a smiling air of having been very patient in doing her duty.

"And what silk mamma this morning?" asked papa, looking at her in surprise.

"We have had a very naughty mamma here," said the fairy godmother, smiling more than ever.

"A very rebellious, cross little woman she has been this morning!"

All the people at the table concentrate themselves in a stare at mamma, who feels gullier and worse than ever.

"You don't tell what made me ill-tempered," thinks mamma.

"Very sorry to hear this!" said papa, disapprovingly.

Out flies the cork of mamma's bottled wrath.

"You would be cross, too, if—"

"Mamma! mamma!" Papa and fairy godmother in full chorus, "How dare you, Madam! Go and stand in the corner!"

Mamma stood in the corner, and would have liked to have butted her head through the corner, only that was manifestly impossible. There was not a ray of light in mamma's sky. Every body disappeared of her; nobody would give her a chance to explain; and there was the intolerable disappointment about Mrs. Greenleaf! and if at any time she found herself gradually settling down to something like serenity, why there was the fairy godmother to stir her up again. She would omit no order.

"And I am afraid this is to be one of our unlucky days," says the fairy godmother, with a smile that made mamma angry in a moment. She had trouble with cook.

"You see you commenced badly," remarks the fairy, soothingly.

She was nervous with the children.

"Oh! it is of so much importance to begin the day properly," observes Willie's fairy godmother.

Do what she will, mamma can not get away from the irritating remembrance of this unlucky commencement, which is perpetually set in her way for her to stumble over; and then, this was really a day of misfortunes. There was a fine staircase of Night—mamma's perpetual delight! Papa had imported it for her. It was the one extravagance of their plain little drawing-room; and on this morning Martha, while dusting, described her doer a little too vigorously; and there was the statuette in pieces on the ground. Mamma sat down beside it with a face that looked like crying.

"Tut! tut!" said Willie's fairy godmother. "It is a pity, to be sure; but then, just think how many mamma have no bread and butter and shoes for their little children."

Which was true; but that did not mend the statuette, and mamma looked still more like crying.

"You are as childish as Willie," said his godmother, watching mamma from under her spectacles. "He cried for his lost box of paints, and would not be comforted by the little heathen children; and you will not be consoled by the mamma who not only has no statuette but no shoes."

Then mamma was busy with a pudding. She baked it with her own hands; for she had made it after a recipe of the fairy godmother, and, if a success, it was to surprise papa. At the critical moment, as she was placing it in the oven, she was seized with a doubt. Something about sugar and spice was to be done to the pudding at the last moment. Query: Which last moment? Just before going into the oven, or just before coming out? She ran up stairs to ask the fairy godmother.

"Hush!" said the dame, who was counting her stitches.

"I just wish to ask—"

"I desire you to be quiet," said the fairy, severely.

"Sit down in that chair, and neither presume to speak nor stir till I give you leave."

Mamma sat down. She was a grown-up mamma; to be sure, but then Willie's godmother was a fairy, and could make her over into a spizak, if she chose, with one twist of her knitting-needle.

Tick! tick! Five minutes by the clock; ten! Mamma's pudding standing in the oven, mamma fuming on the chair, and the fairy counting her stitches. Five minutes more, and there was a patter and rattling in the chimney—fairy visitors for godmother. They pulled up chairs, and pulled out their knitting, and talked interminably. Mamma edged up, and the clock ticked off the minutes with uncomfortable rapidity.

Commenced mamma at last: "Do tell me about my pudding. It will be—"

"Hush! hush!" cried the fairy godmother, shocked.

"Little mamma should be seen and not heard. Really I am quite ashamed of you;" and went on talking. And of course you know what had happened to the pudding by the time that the old ladies had tripped up chimney again. It was turned to a cincher.

Mamma was miserably vexed.

"You have a little patience as your son," calmly observed the fairy godmother. "When Hal Green offered to lend his pony he rushed home to ask your permission for the ride; but, you remember, you were engaged with Miss Tattle, who was on one of her endless histories, and you would not permit him to speak; and so he sat counting the minutes; and when she finally took her departure it was too late for the ride. I remember you reproved him for his want of resignation."

There was no time for further pudding attempts, and finding a book mamma sat down to forget her annoyances in reading. Just as she reached the interesting chapter she heard the fairy godmother:

"Mamma! mamma!"

Away ran mamma, with "What is wanted?" and—

"I wish you would go up in the attic and hunt me some spider's web," said Willie's godmother.

"I am almost at the end of my ball of silk."

"How disagreeable!" muttered mamma, and was instantly relaxed with,

"How selfish you are! I am sorry to find you so disinclined."

Mamma found the spider's web, tore back to her book, reached the middle of the interesting chapter, and heard the fairy godmother again.

"Mamma! mamma! I wish you would cease and hold this spider's web," said Willie's godmother.

"Tiresome old thing!" said mamma, and, giving up her book in despair, sat down at her sewing when the spider's silk was wound.

"You hold your work very awkwardly," said the fairy godmother; and presently,

"Why do you not manage better with your children? Do you hear them now?"

And ten minutes after,

"What a sulky expression you wear! It is really very unbecoming! Why are you not more pleasant and cheerful?"

And when she had nearly completed the garment,

"Mamma, put up your work," said the fairy, suddenly.

"I have only ten stitches more," urged mamma.

"But put it away at once," commanded the dame;

"I require instant and perfect obedience."

Mamma folded away the frock, sticking the needle in it crossways, as if it had been the fairy.

"And how has our mamma been?" said papa, coming in just then.

The fairy shook her head.

"We have a bad report to-day, I am afraid. Mamma has been sulky, disinclined, impatient, and rebellious. I am really pained by her perversity."

"Are you?" cried mamma. "Why then did you take such pains to bring about all these fine results? You commenced the day by a disagreeable and perfectly unnecessary restriction about my dress, because I did not endure it with a smiling face; you proceeded to inflict on me a grievous and irreparable disappointment; and not satisfied with that, you called the family attention to my ill-humor, omitting all mention of the cause, and forbidding me to explain. You have worried me through the day with ceaseless reproaches and commands, and then rebuked me because I did not look cheerful under the discipline. You spoiled an entire afternoon by refusing me a moment's attention. You broke in on my occupations on the most absurd pretense, and then exclaim that I am irritated. You yourself have been the cause of what you so much dislike. You worry and cross and fret with a continual and venacious supervision, that would strain to their utmost the principles and patience of a saint."

"You acknowledge, then," said the fairy, "that you, a grown woman, would be fretted out of amiability and self-control by my system; but pray, Madam, is it not your own fault? When did you ever find fault with it before? When you inflicted on your son a disappointment as unbearable as the one you yourself have suffered, you never asked what caused the ill-temper, for which you punished him, or if the punishment was not too great for the offense. When you follow him about all day, with continual fault-finding about very small matters, you expect that he will bear with a smiling face and mood his ways at once; but when you are pursued in the same way you find that it only makes you cross, and stir up the worst part of your nature; and yet he is a little boy, and you are a grown mamma. When Willie's game or project is spoiled, because little boys must not interrupt, and you will not hear him till it is too late, you are shocked that he is sulky and aggrieved; and yet how intolerable it was to sit, while your pudding was spoiling, for want of an answer to a simple question! and you are, a grown mamma and he is only a little boy. You insist that he, a little boy, must leave his most delightful occupation, at the height of its interest, without even a look of dissatisfaction; and yet how hard you, a grown mamma, found it to practice what you preach! You say I am the cause of your shortcomings to-day. If that is so, then, in a limited degree, you are the cause of much of your son's naughtiness; for I thought I could not do better than imitate the system of such an experienced and sensible mamma as yourself, and I have simply copied you to the letter; and if the system works so ill when tried on yourself, is it not just possible that, though rules and a steady and firm system of discipline are absolutely required in a family, that a system of discipline, enforced with an utter disregard of the tastes and feelings of its object, is a tyranny, even when enforced by a mamma—And a few guiding rules are an indispensable as a boundary fence; but that restrictions and regulations, thick-set all through the day, are so many traps and snare-words for unwary little Willies; and that a mamma ought not to require more patience, self-control, and forbearance of a little child than she could see herself in precisely similar circumstances?"

Papa smiled, mamma pouted; and I, Willie, having heard it all, have written it all down for the benefit of those poor grown people, who have been so busy all their lives in teaching us that they have never had any time to teach themselves.

"Hush!" said the dame, who was counting her stitches.

"I just wish to ask—"

"I desire you to be quiet," said the fairy, severely.

"Sit down in that chair, and neither presume to speak nor stir till I give you leave."

Mamma sat down. She was a grown-up mamma; to be sure, but then Willie's godmother was a fairy, and could make her over into a spizak, if she chose, with one twist of her knitting-needle.

Tick! tick! Five minutes by the clock; ten! Mamma's pudding standing in the oven, mamma fuming on the chair, and the fairy counting her stitches. Five minutes more, and there was a patter and rattling in the chimney—fairy visitors for godmother. They pulled up chairs, and pulled out their knitting, and talked interminably. Mamma edged up, and the clock ticked off the minutes with uncomfortable rapidity.

Commenced mamma at last: "Do tell me about my pudding. It will be—"

"Hush! hush!" cried the fairy godmother, shocked.

"Little mamma should be seen and not heard. Really I am quite ashamed of you;" and went on talking. And of course you know what had happened to the pudding by the time that the old ladies had tripped up chimney again. It was turned to a cincher.

Mamma was miserably vexed.

"You have a little patience as your son," calmly observed the fairy godmother. "When Hal Green offered to lend his pony he rushed home to ask your permission for the ride; but, you remember, you were engaged with Miss Tattle, who was on one of her endless histories, and you would not permit him to speak; and so he sat counting the minutes; and when she finally took her departure it was too late for the ride. I remember you reproved him for his want of resignation."

There was no time for further pudding attempts, and finding a book mamma sat down to forget her annoyances in reading. Just as she reached the interesting chapter she heard the fairy godmother:

"Mamma! mamma!"

Away ran mamma, with "What is wanted?" and—

"I wish you would go up in the attic and hunt me some spider's web," said Willie's godmother.

"I am almost at the end of my ball of silk."

"How disagreeable!" muttered mamma, and was instantly relaxed with,

"How selfish you are! I am sorry to find you so disinclined."

Mamma found the spider's web, tore back to her book, reached the middle of the interesting chapter, and heard the fairy godmother again.

"Mamma! mamma! I wish you would cease and hold this spider's web," said Willie's godmother.

"Tiresome old thing!" said mamma, and, giving up her book in despair, sat down at her sewing when the spider's silk was wound.

PICTURES OF THE SOUTH.

MARRIAGE OF A COLORED SOLDIER.

This wedding seemed to me somewhat remarkable, inasmuch as the bride was only thirteen, and the groom only about seventeen years old. A lady, looking at the sketch, thought the decent appearance of the party and the taste shown in the bride's apparel exaggerated for the sake of appearance. This, however, was not the case; the scene is given just as it appeared. The bridegroom was a musician, a straight, well-built young fellow in his best uniform. The bride was a light-colored woman in a dress low enough to meet the requirements of the fashionable society of New York. They listened thoughtfully to the worthy chaplain's remarks; and the whole affair was creditable to the colored folks assembled on the occasion. As we left they were all sitting down to a very fancy bridal supper; and the band—of which the new-made husband was a member—was playing outside. It was not an aristocratic marriage, but there was a fiddler ready, and it is safe to surmise that the company enjoyed themselves.

SCENE IN FRONT OF WASHINGTON HOTEL, AT WASHINGTON.

The scene in front of the Washington Hotel is characteristic. As you go South you notice the gradual disappearance of reading and writing rooms, and of decent sitting-rooms for the guests. Thus the sidewalk becomes the only available place for MARRIAGE OF A COLORED SOLDIER AT VICKSBURG BY CHAPLAIN WARREN OF THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

loungers. Being more limited than in larger cities, when, in Vicksburg, the pavement is covered with chairs, there is not much space for passengers, especially ladies, to get by. They do not seem to mind it though, but thread their way through the gentlemen and the tobacco-juices with comfortable fertility. It is not agreeable to ladies in New York to have to pass the groups of loungers at the hotels. What would they do if the aforesaid loungers brought chairs out and spread themselves all over the sidewalk, smoking, spitting, wrangling, and so forth? A. R. W.

SCENE IN FRONT OF WASHINGTON HOTEL, VICKSBURG, MISSISSIPPI.

PARISIAN TOILETS.—[See Page 414.]

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JUNE, 1866.—[See Page 414.]

PARIS FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

The rain and the east wind having at last given place to bright sunshine and moderately warm weather, ladies' toilets, which during the past month were only in course of development, now exhibit a very decided change. The most striking invention of the moment is certainly the robe en fourreau—jacket, skirt, and jupon being all of the same material, and all trimmed to correspond. The jacket is usually very short, and generally made so as not to fit close to the figure, in which case it is merely fastened at the neck. The skirt, which commonly has a slight trimming half-way up its seams, is looped up in folds, to the ends of which silk tassels are sometimes suspended; while beneath it is displaced the jupon, trimmed in a most elaborate style with scrolls, vandykes, rosettes, crosses, crests, diamonds, or other geometric patterns. Occasionally the jupon, instead of being of the same material as the robe itself, and trimmed to correspond with it, is of plain silk of the exact color of the trimming of the robe, with perhaps a single or double row of ribbons running round the bottom. These dresses are made in almost every variety of material.

The robes displayed by the "grand monde" recently at Longchamp, when the great race for the Grand Prix de Paris came off, were of the most magnificent description, and comprised the very latest varieties of the mode and all the colors of the rainbow—bright blue, green, puce, and rich gold-color silks—the brilliancy of the last was subdued, however, by its being covered entirely over with open black lace; striped foulards and gaze de Chambéry in rose-color, porcelain blue, violet, green, and orange, or silver gray or white grounds. Some were made en fourreau, and the wearers of these, with their chapeaux Lamblin, merely wanted crooks in their hands to look very like those exceedingly elegant and most artificial-looking shepherdesses which one meets with in the pictures of BOUCHER and WATTEAU. The majority of robes were, however, with trains of considerable length, and almost the whole of them were made with jackets of the same material, and commonly cut into the most fantastic forms. Thus, some had long lappets hanging down in front and still longer lappets hanging behind, looking not unlike a bird's tail; others were elaborately notched and scalloped round the edges, and many had long open sleeves that hung down almost as low as the knees. The majority were fastened with elegant bands round the waist, but, when the jacket was exceedingly short, it hung quite loose, except at the neck. These robes, when of some positive color, were trimmed with white or black lace, and, occasionally, with straw passementerie, the effect of which was extremely beautiful; while the lighter shades and the striped patterns were trimmed, for the most part, with satin ribbons. The predominating colors of the flowers in the bonnets, and also the bonnet-strings, were, almost invariably, of the precise tint of the trimming of the robe; or, when the robe was of a decided color and trimmed with lace, of the same shade as the robe itself.

If the spectacle which Longchamp presented may be regarded as any indication of the coming mode, the days of crinolines are certainly numbered. The majority of the more elegantly-dressed women seem to have entirely abandoned it. These magnificent robes, with long trains, worn with a plain white jupon, with a broad ruche at the bottom of it, certainly looked most graceful without its adventitious aid, though it must be confessed that the robe en fourreau, spite of the fullness of its looped-up skirt, looks somewhat scanty when worn without crinolines.

Malins are just now coming into vogue, and many of the new patterns are not only exceedingly brilliant in color, but tasteful in design. Floral patterns, consisting of large wreaths and bouquets, and long, trailing clusters of flowers, certainly predominate, though robes, with borders of delicate floral patterns, seem likely to become most fashionable.

For evening dress something like a contest may be said to be going on between foulards and other materials of quiet tints and small patterns and striped and other foulards of the most brilliant hues. Of novelties among the former may be mentioned the foulard alone, the pattern of which is composed of flying birds in gold-color silk; secondly, a foulard, with rose-leaves, sprigs, and buds scattered indiscriminately over the ground; and, thirdly, a foulard, with feathers of different hues symmetrically arranged. Among the richer kinds of foulards may be classed those with carnine and black, or violet, or turquoise-blue stripes, interspersed with clusters of flowers or simple white daisies on silver-gray grounds; and one with a pattern formed of peacocks' feathers of the most brilliant and most variegated tints elegantly disposed on a ground of pearly white. Other evening dresses are of gaze de Chambéry, striped with the gayest colors. When the corsage differs from the robe itself, it is not unfrequently composed of an entre-deux of fine lace and puff of tulle.

Ball dresses are of white tulle, sometimes with delicate artificial flowers tastefully arranged about the skirt, in other cases with rouleaux of white or some light color satin at the bottom of the skirt, the corsage being trimmed to correspond, and occasionally of white tulle embroidered over with silver thread.

There is no particular change to be noted with regard to chapeaux, except that the tulle, or mullin, or net strings, which are now worn extremely wide, have generally a blonde edging to them; the wreath, too, when joined together at the ends, falls now so frequently over the chignon as upon the least. Below is a description of a few chapeaux observed at Longchamp.

First, a chapeau of cerise color net partially covered with white lace, and with long glass beads hanging round the rim. In the front of the bonnet, which is depressed at the top, in the style of the Tudor cap, is a full-blown rose; a bunch of rose-buds hangs at the left side. The strings are of cerise color ribbon. Next, a chapeau of rice straw, almost entirely covered on one side by a large heart's-ease; surrounded by a few leaves, and having some small heart's-eases on a puffing of net to form the front. A bunch of heart's-eases fastens the head net strings (edged with blonde) immediately under the chin. Another bonnet was of some delicate Italian straw, having a band of scarlet velvet running round the rim about an inch from the edge, and a similar band across the crown. On these bands were arranged clusters of large purple grapes, with rich brown and green leaves festooned over with silver. Other chapeaux were wreathed with bunches of grapes formed of imitation pearls; and one had a wreath of ivy and fig leaves, with small figs hanging in clusters over the front, the whole being on white aluminum beanie.

At Longchamp most of the parasols were of white or some delicate color silk, a few of them being covered with white lace. Attempts are, however, being made to introduce parasols wreathed round the edges with artificial flowers or embroidered over with daisies and crests, or with race-horses or bunches of flowers, all in their proper colors, on light-tinted and black grounds.

Ladies' boots are still worn very high and with tassels, as formerly. The fashionable bottines have merely the toes of leather, the remainder of the boot being of some thin, textile fabric of exceedingly minute pattern, and for which gray, with occasionally a narrow scarlet binding, appears to be the color most in favor. The heels of the boots, which are as tall as ever, are covered with the same material.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

Fig. 1. Evening Dress.—Robe of black tulle fringed, covered with a pattern formed of small daisies, and ornamented at the lower part of the skirt with large crystalline tassels, and bordered with lace. Corsage with bands and belt of satin, edged with narrow lace to match the trimming on the skirt. Chapeau of white tulle, with an entre-deux of open lace.

Fig. 2. Evening Dress.—Robe and corsage of white Swiss muslin, or other similar material, embroidered with guipure, with belt to match. A row of ribbon round the bottom of the skirt. Chapeau of heavy straw, encircled with wreath of flowers. The strings, which are of green ribbon, are fixed to the top of the crown.

Fig. 3. Walking Dress.—Robe of striped tulle, caught up in folds so as to show a jupon of the same material. The trimming is of satin ribbon, with a narrow edging of lace and with small silver or glass buttons strung down the center. The chapeau is of gassed tulle, trimmed at the edge with a garland of white lace and with pearl drops suspended from the rim, which fall upon the forehead and on the cheeks. The strings are of tulle, bordered with white blonde, and are fastened together with a sprig of flowers.

Fig. 4. Walking Dress.—Robe and corsage of gray shawl material, trimmed with narrow or rose-color ribbon, ornamented with a delicate passementerie. The chapeau is of yellow straw, trimmed round the edge with a ruche of tulle, of the same color as the trimming of the robe, on which rests some large white daisies. At the top are bouquets of tulle, fringed by similar daisies. The double set of strings, neither of which are intended to be tied, fall loosely upon the breast.

PARISIAN TOILETS.

Fig. 1. Fashionable robe, white ground, with small, red disks. Over the lower margin of the skirt is a very narrow fringe of white tulle, gathered and bound on each side by a narrow ribbon of red silk. Corsage very low, with epaulettes formed by the continuation of a ruche similar to the fringe and placed on the upper margin of the corsage; a line ruche serves as a belt. Inner corsage of white muslin, high in the neck and with long sleeves. Straw hat, "Lamballe," with capotons, wheat ears, black lace, and wide "border" of black tulle.

Fig. 2. Blue silk robe, with "dentelle" edging, trimmed with silk ribbon of a little darker shade; above, and as a continuation of this trimming, is a ribbon which terminates in the middle of the back in two long loops and still longer ends. White straw hat, trimmed with crests of blue silk, blue ribbons, and puff of white tulle; narrow blue "border," very wide edging of white tulle sewing on outer "border." Blue parasol lined with white silk.

FANS.

When and where was the fan invented? The beauties of old Rome were as familiar with its charms as the proud-stepping dames of modern Spain; and ladies of every clime and complexion have adopted the mischief-working weapon of coquetry, and become skilled in the mystery of fanning a fan. Copper-colored dandies, born to use the tomahawk and scalping-knife, have rejoiced in the possession of turkey-plume fans; and the clever Japanese have turned the instrument to uses undreamed of by less ingenious nations. In the alien-hating dominions of the Tycoon, the schoolmaster brings usually archaic to book by rapping their knuckles with a fan; the fop uses it as a switch; the beggar makes it a receptacle for alms; the traveler seeks the useful information in its folds; the warrior brain a foe with its iron case; and it comes as a death-warrant to the high-born evil-doer.

The deacons of the Greek Church receive a fan upon being ordained, to remind them that they are expected to keep intrusive insects from annoying the superior priests in the performance of their public duties; and a large fan of white peacock feathers has figured in many a grand religious solemnity as part of the papal insignia.

In Shakespeare's day no lady thought of stirring abroad without her fan, the case of the toy devolving upon her gentleman-usher: even Juliet's nurse must have Peter to carry her fan; and many a poor lover, who had revisited a feather from his lady's fan, and worn it as a favor, hesitated at carrying his love to its legitimate conclusion, for fear of his ability to Keep a lady waiting-room, And buy a hood and silver-handled fan With forty pound.

The most fashionable fans were made of ostrich, peacock, or other flexible feathers, fastened into a metal or ivory handle. Among the unconsidered trinkets snatched up by Falstaff's hungry jockeys, Pistol and Nym, was the handle of a certain Mistress Bridget's fan, for which a fence of the period paid the conveyers three shillings and ninepence. When Elizabeth housed her lord-keeper by dining with him at his house at Kew, a diamond-decked fan was one among the gifts with which he acknowledged her condescension. Fans, indeed, seem to have been always acceptable to her majesty; and many such costly toys figure in the list of New-Year's gifts tendered by courtiers to their royal mistress. That terrible sea-bird, Sir Francis Drake, presented Elizabeth with a fan of white and red feathers, its gold handle enameled with one half moon of mother-of-pearl, including another of diamonds and pearls, forming a jeweled frame for a miniature portrait of herself. The Countess of Bath furnished another of swan-down, "with a mass of green velvet, embroidered with seed-pearls, and a very small chain of silver gilt, and in the midst a border on both sides of seed-pearls, sparks of rubies and emeralds; and thence a monster of gold, the head and breast of mother-of-pearl." A modest gentleman, who preferred to show his loyalty anonymously, sent the queen a fan of sundry colored feathers set in a silver-mounted agate handle. Leicester paid his court with a fan of white feathers, the gold handle ornamented with pearls, emeralds, rubies, and diamonds, and bearing "a lion rampant with a white bear mauling at his foot"—a device that may have been merely significant of his loyalty to the queen, but capable of being interpreted in a tenderer fashion by the woman. When Elizabeth died, the royal wardrobe contained no less than twenty-seven fans.

Tom Coryat was charmed with the elegance of the Italian fans. He says: "These fans both men and women of the country do carry to cool themselves withal in the time of heat, by the often fanning of their faces. Most of them are very elegant and pretty things. For whereas the fan consisteth of a painted piece of paper and a little wooden handle; the paper which is fastened into the top is on both sides most curiously adorned with excellent pictures; either of amorous things tending to dalliance, having some witty Italian verses or fine emblems written under them; or of some notable Italian city, with a brief description added therunto. These fans are of a mean price, for a man may buy one of the finest of them for so much money as countervailth our English great." The Italian gentlemen did not stand alone in their effeminacy. The butterflies of the Scotch Sobol's court carried fans to shield their tender faces from the rude wind as they rode to basquet or ball. "We strive to be accounted womanish," murmurs Greene, "by keeping of beauty, by curling of hair, by wearing plumes of feathers in our heads, which in wars our ancestors wore on their heads." This ridiculous custom seems to have had a long life, for Aubrey bears witness that in 1678 gentlemen were in the habit of carrying huge fans with handles half a yard long; serving not only for their protection and decoration, but coming into domestic use as instruments for correcting their grown-up daughters when troublesome or rebellious. The judges of the land were not exempt from the fan fever, and no less a man than Lord Chief-Justice Coke carried an enormous fan when going the circuit—a curious method of adding dignity to the majesty of the law!

Catharine of Braganza introduced the green shading fan into England, and it held its pride of place until the Revolution, when the folding fan came into vogue, and the old-fashioned feather fan (rechristened the matron's fan) was relegated to elderly ladies, as "more comely and civil for old persons than the former, which is shifted with nothing but vanity;" the vanity lying in the landscape, romantic scenes, and fanciful designs with which the folding fans were decorated. In Anne's reign the toy had lost none of its charms, nor had fashionable ladies acquired more decency, for we are assured that they only endured the intolerable fatigue of sitting out the morning-service at church by making it an occasion for displaying their fine fans, white hands, and brilliant jewelry. The fan must have made deep inroads on a fine lady's pin-money, since Sir Roger de Coverley thought the profits of a windmill should be set apart to find fans for his perverse widow, if she became Lady de Coverley.

To flirt a fan properly was an art only to be acquired with labor. Mrs. Abington, the actress, was a proficient in it:

"O' my, ladies, cry Abington;
Observe the fanning in her air;
There's nothing of the actress there:
Assess her fashion if you can,
And catch the grace of her fan."

Addison gives some amusing instructions in the use of the fan. Holding the fan was performed with the instrument closed, the excoctant first shaking it at one gentleman, then tapping her neighbor on the shoulder, next pressing her lips to the end of the fan, and finally letting her arm fall easily and gracefully by her side. This was to be learned in about a week. Unfolding the fan required at least a month's incessant practice; the manoeuvre comprising little flirts and vibrations, gradual and deliberate openings, and voluntary fallings asunder of the fan. To discharge fan was to make a pop as loud as the report of a pocket-pistol. To ground fan was to top it gracefully upon the table with a certain air, in order to take up a pack of cards, replace a falling pin, adjust a stray curl, or perform some equally important act. All these difficulties of fan-dill surmounted, the greatest remained to be conquered; but even fanning the fan might, with great perseverance, be mastered by an apt pupil in three months' time. "There is an infinite variety of motions to be made use of in the flirting of a fan. There is the angry flutter, the modest flutter, the timorous flutter, the confused flutter, the merry flutter, and the amorous flutter. Not to be tedious, there is scarcely any emotion in the mind which does not produce a suitable agitation in the fan; inasmuch that, if I only see the fan of a disciplined lady, I know very well whether she laughs, frowns, or blushes. I have seen a fan so very angry that it would have been dangerous for the absent lover who provoked it to have come within the wind of it; and at other times so very languishing that I have been glad, for the lady's sake, the lover was at a sufficient distance from it. I need not add that a fan is a pride or a coquette according to the nature of the person who bears it."

When ivory, leather, wood, and paper superseded feathers in the manufacture of fans, artists were called in to add beauty to the delicate weapon that gave Confines to the watchful dame,

To every other breast a fane.

Watteau fairly fanned his way to fame; Cipriani, West, and Reynolds did not disdain to use their pencils in the service of fashion, and we can readily accept Miss Barney's assurance that the result was more delightful than can well be imagined. But the painters were not allowed to have it all their own way; the engravers entered the list with vigor and success, and catered to the love of novelty with great profit to themselves. When Bachewell was the pet of the ladies nothing would serve for fan-mounts but representations of the church martyr at the bar. When Gallier's Fanels took the town by storm, every lady carried Liliput about with her; and when the Beggar's Opera made Gay rich, and Rich gay, fans were covered with copies of the songs and engravings of the scenes. A correspondent of Sylvanus Urban, writing in 1758, gives a curious list of a dozen designs he saw displayed by a row of ladies kneeling at the communion in a fashionable London church. Such subjects as the "Meeting of Isaac and Rebecca," and "Joseph and Potiphar's Wife," being Scriptural, might pass muster with a tender critic; but "Darby and Joan," "The Taking of Porto Bello," "The Humors of Change Alley," "Silence," "Vauxhall Gardens," "The Judgment of Paris," "Harlequin, Pierrot, and Columbine," and "The Prodigal Son," from the "Kate's Progress," were hardly in keeping with the occasion. The popularity of the printed fan-mounts seems, however, to have run counter to the interests of the English fan-makers, for they thought necessary to petition against the importation of them from abroad; and one of their advocates proposed the levying of a tax of sixpence and a shilling upon every paper and leather fan-mount, calculating to raise thereby a revenue of between twenty and thirty thousand pounds, to the detriment only of some half-a-dozen paltry plate-engravers, who were enriching themselves and starving hundreds.

"WHAT CAN I DO BEST?"—It is always difficult for a young man to decide what calling is best adapted to his capacity. By calling on FOWLER & WELLS, Photographers, 89 Broadway, and obtaining a full description of character, he will be enabled to decide understandingly.

"A WOMAN'S GLORY."—The magnificent hair of multitudes of American ladies is ascribed to the use of BURNETT'S COCOAINE. No other preparation so exactly suits the various conditions of the human hair.

WEEK AND PROCEEDS.—Ladies afflicted with dislocations on the face, called moth-patches or freckles, should use PERRY'S MOON AND PEARLS LOTION. It is sold by Dr. R. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 47 Bond St., New York. Sold by all druggists.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

INVISIBLE PHOTOGRAPHS.

THE GREAT WONDER OF THE AGE. Beautiful and perfect Photographs instantly made in the parlor by men, women, or child. Price 25 cents per picture, with full directions. MESSENGER & McDONNELL, 106 Nassau St., New York. Liberal discount to the Trade.

Filter the Croton. The Diaphragm Filter.

ALEXANDER McKENZIE & CO., Plumbers and Gas Fitters, No. 25 West Fourth St., N. Y.

$2 MAGIC $2 Timekeeper $2 And Vest Chain, $2 00.

A genuine English FINE GOLD GEAR or SILVER CASEWORK Timekeeper, with accurate and reliable movement in the dial, in handsome cases. Beautiful and elaborate designs, of complete workmanship, and remarkable for its compactness and absolute certainty as a watch-work, fully warranted for 3 years; will last a lifetime, and is a most accurate and permanent timepiece. Pocket Case and Warranted movement for Ladies or Gentlemen's use. Price cost, small size, with a rich gold plated Steel Vest Chain, only $2. Retail Price. Agents Wanted every where. Price Not Free. Address M. A. NELLE & CO., Importers of Watches, etc., 5 E. corner Broadway and Fulton St., N. Y. Established 1842.

PORTABLE PRINTING OFFICES

For Manuscripts, Broadsides, and all work which is printed neatly, promptly, and expeditiously. Circular and Book Sheets of Type, Galleys, etc., 10 cts. ANASIS PRESS COMPANY, 28 Ann Street, New York, and 25 Lincoln Street, Boston.

FISHING TACKLE.

In all its varieties, for sale by A. DRAPEL, No. 25 Nassau Street, one door from Maiden Lane, New York.

spring open to the fish's mouth; sports-boys and boys' use was 10 cts. Send 20 cents and receive $1.00 worth of books, or $1.50 for one dozen, and trade-price, in 10-25-PH BRIGGS, 135 Broadway, New York. Room 25.

The Way of Wisdom.

Important to all young persons who aspire to lead a true and practical life. THE WAY OF WISDOM, No. 1, for the youth of both sexes, 25 cents; Do., No. 2, for girls and young women (which is accompanied by No. 1), price, in cloth, 50 cents. Mailed, sealed, prepaid, on receipt of price. Address CLARK ORVIS, 110 Nassau Street, New York.

$5 SEWING MACHINE $5

First Prize and Improved, the embodiment of practical utility and extreme simplicity. Originally patented May 15, 1852; Improvement patented June 8, 1862. This celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, with complete attachment, is constant in operation, sews with accuracy and speed...

E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO., 201 BROADWAY (St. Nicholas Block). Photographic Materials, Stereoscopic Goods, WAR VIEWS, SCENERY, GROUPS, &c.

Allcock's Porous Plasters

CURE LUMBAGO, PAINS OF THE SIDE, VARICOSE VEINS, SORE CHEST, &c.

An Electrician, who has great experience of their effects in local rheumatism, in the deltoid, and deep-seated nervous and other pains, and in affections of the kidneys, etc., etc., attributes all their sedative, stimulative, and pain-relieving effects to their electric qualities.

Lame Back. Blandford House, New York, Nov. 25, 1865. T. Allcock & Co.—Gentlemen: I lately suffered severely from a weakness in my back. Having heard your Plaster much recommended in cases of this kind, I procured one, and the result was all that I could desire.

Large Dividend. MANHATTAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY, Nos. 155 and 158 Broadway, NEW YORK.

Organized in 1850. H. STOKES, President. C. Y. WEMPLE, Secretary. J. L. HAINES, Assistant Secretary.

ADVANTAGES OVER ALL OTHER COMPANIES. Dividends annually; $1,000,000, now payable, forty per cent. Annual receipts nearly $2,000,000. No claims unpaid. All terms of Life Policies based. Non-forfeiting Life and Endowment Policies, payable in five and ten annual payments. Notes taken for part of the premium. Expenses less than any other Company. Policies issued in all the principal cities.

SELF FASTENING BUTTONS

PUT ON AND TAKEN OFF IN A MOMENT by any one without sewing, stitching, knotting, or use of the needle. They are changed from one position to another in an instant, will never pull off nor tear the cloth. This invention resolved the long question (Globe Maker) as to the value of the American fastener in comparison with the foreign one. It is the best of all, and is now being used by every tailor, dressmaker, and by every one who uses buttons.

BUTTONS FOR MEN AND BOYS. COAT BUTTONS, per dozen, plain black, 50c; plain white, 50c; plain blue, 50c; plain red, 50c; plain green, 50c; plain yellow, 50c; plain purple, 50c; plain brown, 50c; plain grey, 50c; plain orange, 50c; plain pink, 50c; plain lavender, 50c; plain magenta, 50c; plain cyan, 50c; plain magenta, 50c; plain cyan, 50c; plain magenta, 50c; plain cyan, 50c.

NEW MUSIC.

"I Loved Him at First Sight," composed and sung by Miss John Wood, in the successful play of the "Three Guardsmen." Price 25 cents. "Three Goodness Wags," by Thomas Baker, price 25 cents. "Waiting of the Green Gables," composed by Thomas Baker, and played nightly with great applause at the Olympic Theatre; price 25 cents.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY

Have selected the following kinds from their stock, which they recommend to meet the wants of Clubs. They are sold at Cargo Prices, the same as the Company sell them in New York, as the list of prices will show. All goods sold are warranted to give satisfaction.

PRICE LIST. YOUNG HYSON, No. 1, $1.00; No. 2, $1.00; No. 3, $1.00. GREEN TEAS, No. 1, $1.00; No. 2, $1.00; No. 3, $1.00. MIXED, No. 1, $1.00; No. 2, $1.00; No. 3, $1.00. JAPAN, No. 1, $1.00; No. 2, $1.00; No. 3, $1.00. OOLONG, No. 1, $1.00; No. 2, $1.00; No. 3, $1.00. IMPERIAL and GUNPOWDER, No. 1, $1.00; No. 2, $1.00; No. 3, $1.00. ENGLISH BREAKFAST, No. 1, $1.00; No. 2, $1.00; No. 3, $1.00.

All towns, villages, or manufacturing places where a large number of men are engaged, by circulating together, can reduce the price of their Tea and Coffee about one third by sending directly to the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY, (Post-Office Box 5643.) 31 and 33 Vesey Street, corner of Church, New York.

For further particulars, getting up Clubs, &c., see Harper's Weekly, June 25, 1866.

100,000 WATCHES, CHAINS, SETS OF JEWELRY, PENS, BRACELETS, CUFFS, GLOBULETS, SPOONS, FORKS, NAPKIN RINGS, &c., &c.

Worth $500,000!

To be sold for ONE DOLLAR each, without regard to value, and not to be paid for until you know what you are to get. Send 25 cents for a certificate, which will inform you what you can have for $1, and at the same time get our Circular containing full list and particulars, also terms to Agents, which we want in every town and country. J. H. WENLOW & CO., 201 Broadway, N. Y.

PEACE hath its VICTORIES.

To prevent or conquer disease is a grand achievement; and as surely as bullets and bayonets will destroy, so surely will HORTON'S BITTERS preserve and prolong life.

This is the most trying period of the year. The statistics of the strongest yields more or less in the consuming temperature of reformation. Vigor comes from every pore. The strength of man passes away in invisible vapor, and weaker women become emaciated and nervous. It was to meet such difficulties that Horton's Bitters were given to society. It is to prevent the evil consequences to which an exhausted, depleted, debilitated organization is liable, that they are recommended as a TONIC for both sexes.

Wine tastes of the community, rich as well as poor, work continually. If their hands are unemployed, their brains are busy, and head-work is as depressing to the vital energies as muscular toil. But once the system with Horton's Bitters, and the wear and tear of business life will be comparatively unobtrusive, even in the most oppressive weather. No longer will be experienced; for, as fast as the vital forces are expended, they will be recruited and renewed by this beautiful restorative. As a summer beverage it is indispensable to young and old. Sold every where.

CHIT-CHAT, an illustrated semi-monthly paper. Only 25 cents for 3 months. Specimens 10 cts. Address: Box 247, Post-Office, New York.

SAINT CECILIA'S DAY: A CANZONA. Translated from the Dutch. The Music by J. B. Van Loon. Cloth, $1.00; Paper, $1.00. Sent postpaid. GILVER MITCHELL & CO., Publishers, 377 Washington St., Boston.

The Best and Most Popular Books RECENTLY PUBLISHED.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the following Works by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States on receipt of the Price.

THIRTY YEARS OF ARMY LIFE ON THE BORDER. Comprising Descriptions of the Indian Nomads of the Plains; Explorations of New Territory; a Trip across the Rocky Mountains in the Winter; Descriptions of the Habits of Different Animals found in the West, and the Methods of Hunting them; with Incidents in the Life of Different Frontier Men, &c. By Colonel R. B. MARCY, U.S.A., Author of "The Prairie Traveller." With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $3.00.

GOLDWIN SMITH'S LECTURES. Lectures on the Study of History, delivered in Oxford, 1859-61. By GOLDWIN SMITH, M.A., Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford. To which is added a Lecture delivered before the New York Historical Society in December, 1864, on the UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD. 12mo, Cloth, $1.75.

ARMADALE. A Novel. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "No Name," "The Woman in White," "The Queen of Hearts," "Antonina," &c. Numerous Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, $1.60; Cloth, $2.00.

BULWER'S LOST TALES OF MILETUS. The Lost Tales of Miletus. By the Right Hon. Sir EDWARD BULWER LYTTON, Bart., M.P. 12mo, Cloth, $1.00.

SANS MERCI; or, Kestrel and Falcon. A Novel. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone," "Sword and Gown," "Maurice Dering," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE TOILERS OF THE SEA. A Novel. By VICTOR HUGO, Author of "Les Misérables." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

HAND AND GLOVE. A Novel. By AMELIA B. EDWARDS, Author of "Barbara's History," "Half a Million of Money," "My Brother's Wife," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents. CARLYLE'S FREDERICK THE GREAT. History of Frederick II., called Frederick the Great. By THOMAS CARLYLE, Author of a "History of the French Revolution," "Oliver Cromwell," &c. With Portraits and Maps. Complete in Six Volumes. 12mo, Cloth, $2.00 per Volume.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

FOR PERSONS SEEKING BUSINESS. A book giving capital required in over 2000 kinds of business in New York, number of firms engaged in same, failures in each the past year, salaries and wages paid clerks, bookbinders, &c., cost of living, and other matters of interest—obtained by circulating the city, and verified by affidavits of commerce. Sent postage paid for $1. G. H. SNYDER & Co., 105 Broadway, New York.

SMOKERS, REJOICE. A pleasing discovery. Smoking made innocuous to the most fastidious. Smoke and save money, health, and pure breath by our method. Information sent to any address on the receipt of Two Dollars and 2 red stamps for return postage. Address J. Deen & Co., Grocers, 74.

WANTED! $200 PER MONTH paid to Agents to introduce our new $15, $25, and $50 Sewing Machines, Ketchikan's Patent. Address, with stamp, MOSAIDOCK SEWING MACHINE CO., Waltham, Mass.

"The Mammoth Inferno" gives away to every body, good stamps for a. Goodly made cost, 15 cents. Serial editions, 15 cents. Law of love, 10 cents. W. C. WELBY & Co., 215 Broadway, New York.

GOLD PENS.

If you want a GOLD PEN, send to E. B. JOHNSON & CO., 41 Nassau St., N. Y., and by return mail receive circular showing styles and prices. Expecting done at 50c. DR. CLOVER'S NEW CHAMPION LEVER TRUSS. Elastic Stockings, Shoulder-Braces, Belts, Bandages, &c., in great variety. Dr. Glover, 21 Ann St., New York.

GREAT BANKRUPT SALE OF WATCHES.

To be disposed of for 50 cents. Warranted pure Solid Silver Cases. In good running order. Address: SMITH & CO., No. 1 Harvard Street, Boston.

Agents wanted to sell the only good $75 Sewing Machine in the country. Every machine warranted as represented. Machines furnished with tables. We have also a patent iron for that can be attached to any ordinary table for operating any cheap machine in use. Send for circular to Shibley & Stone, No. 412 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR JULY, 1866.

CONTENTS: PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WAR.—(Continued.) ILLUSTRATIONS.—Balls of 1861 Church near Charleston.—A Picture of Malibu.—A Candidate for the Program.—The Harlequin.—Houses of Distress During Harper's Ferry.—Tides of the Violent, Massachusetts.—A Captive Volunteer.—The Granite Lion.—The Little Cottage.—Not at Home.

MIDDLETOWN. SOME CURIOUS HOMES. ILLUSTRATIONS.—Moose-Net in a Bottle.—Harvard Museum.—Innocence and Sin.—Aunt of Appleton.—Out of Order.—Hive of the Bee.—Vest of the Slave.—Nest of the Red Wasp.—Nest of the Patchwork Wasp.—Nest of Politics.

A LOOK AT LISBON. ILLUSTRATIONS.—Tower of Babel.—Castle of Pavia.—Church of Loreto.—Don Anselmo.—Fresco of the Last Judgment.—The Palace of Ajaccio.—The Great Arch of the Apennines.

HIGH DASSIN A VIRGINIAN VILLAGE. ARMADALE. BY WILKIE COLLINS. (Continued.) BOOK THE LAST. CHAPTER II. In the House. CHAPTER III. The Purple Peak. CHAPTER IV. News from Norfolk. CHAPTER V. Middleton.

GETTING INTO JULY, 1866. FRANCES ASHCY. With a Portrait.

THE SWORD OF DAMOCLES. THE POOL CATCHER. SANCTUARY PRIVILEGES IN BOMBAY. UNDER THE ARCHES. MR. MIDDLETOWN'S MISTAKE. A STUDY OF LESS. THE FLOOD OF BIRDS. REPRODUCTION OF THE COLORED POPULATION OF LOUISIANA.

AN HOUR AT SEA. FORTY-TWO. EDITOR'S EARLY CHAIR. MONTHLY INDEX OF CURRENT EVENTS. EDITOR'S DRAWER.

TERMS. One Copy for one Year $4.00 An Extra Copy, sent by mail, for one Year, $1.00. An Extra Copy, sent by mail, for one Year, $1.00. Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $5.00.

Circulation 112,000.

The Publishers will accept a limited number of Exchange Agreements for their Magazine at the following low rates: One Year $1.00 Half Year $1.00 Quarter Year $1.00 Or $1.50 per line for a line space. Average eight words to a line.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers. Circulation nearly 100,000.

HARPER'S WEEKLY. TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $4.00 One Copy for Three Months 1.00

And an Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Five Subscribers, at $4.00 each, or 6 Copies for $20.00. Payment invariably in advance.

THE BOSTON VOUCHER OF HARPER'S WEEKLY from the commencement will be sent to any part of the United States, free of carriage, upon receipt of the price, viz.: Club Binding $7.50 per Volume. Half Bound 10.00

Each Volume contains the Numbers for the Year. TERMS OF ADVERTISING.—One Dollar and Fifty Cents per line for inside, and Two Dollars per line for outside advertisements, each insertion. HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

THE LOW TIDE OF FASHION.

ANXIOUS SISTER. "My dear HORACE, if you will wear such Waistcoats, I'm sure you'll get something the matter with your Lungs!" HORACE. "Ah!—then, judging from Feminine Fashions, Women are not afflicted with such inconveniences as Lungs nowadays!"

Robinson & Ogden,
BANKERS,
AND DEALERS IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES,
No. 4 Broad St., New York,
(Two Doors from Wall.)

Collectors made, with quick returns.
Interest allowed on Deposits subject to Check.
Orders received for the Purchase or Sale of Stocks,
Bonds, and Gold will receive our PERSONAL attention.
ROBINSON & OGDEN,
Bankers.

FOLLAK & SON Manufacturers, 222 Broadway, near 4th St., N. Y., wholesale and retail at reduced rates. Pipes and Holders cut to order and repaired. All goods warranted genuine. Send stamp for Circular. Pipes 50 to 150 each.

E. REMINGTON & SONS,
MANUFACTURERS OF
Revolvers, Rifles,
Muskets, and Carbines,
For the United States Service. Also
POCKET AND BELT REVOLVERS,
REPEATING PISTOLS,
Rifle Cases, Revolving Rifles,
Rifle and Shot-Gun Barrels and Gun Materials. Sold
by Gun Dealers and the Trade generally.
In these days of House-breaking and Robbery, every House, Store, Bank, and Office should have one of Remington's Revolvers.
Circulars containing lists and descriptions of our Arms
will be furnished upon application.
E. REMINGTON & SONS, Illus., N. Y.

MUSICAL BOXES.
Playing from one to thirty-six different tunes, and costing from $5 50
to $40 00. The most complete stock ever offered for sale in New York.
Fine ornaments for the parlor, and pleasant companions for the invalid.
M. J. PAULIARD & CO., Importers,
21 Maiden Lane opp stairs, New York. Retail Dealers everywhere.

FOR PUBLIC EXHIBITIONS.
Stereoscopes, Magic Lanterns, and Sliding Views, with pictures from all parts, and of every interesting subject, made by JAMES W. QUINN & CO., 924 Chatham Street, Philadelphia.
Printed and illustrated catalogue sent gratis.

MADAME JUREL'S "MARSHAL PALM" for enlarging and beautifying the face. Mechanical appliances used when necessary. Madame Jurel's WHIN-KIE OBLITERATOR. Depot, 263 CANAL STREET.
Orders mailed to Agent for Madame Jurel promptly attended to. Send for Circular.

MERWIN & BRAY,
MANUFACTURERS AND WHOLESALE DEALERS IN ARMS AND AMMUNITION OF ALL KINDS.
Sole Agents for the Ballow Spring Rifle, of different calibers, and Eagle
Brand's Belt and Pocket Cartridge
Revolvers. The Belt Size carries the Army size Ball, the Pocket Pistols the same size Ball as Colts's. These arms have no equal now in market. For further particulars, send for Illustrated
Circular. MERWIN & BRAY, 262 Broadway, N. Y.
P.S.—We manufacture all our own goods. Also are Sole Agents for the celebrated Colts's Model Walking Revolvers.

MERCHANTS, BANKERS,
And others should send in all Orders by HARPER'S EXPRESS, 25 Broadway.

THE Union War Chart.
Lieut. Gen. GRANT says, "It will be found valuable in every library." Gen. HOWARD says, "I trust it will meet with the reception it merits from the army and the people. Every soldier and every citizen ought to have one. Agents wanted. Price $2 00. Address LORENZO DUW & CO., Publishers, 7 Broad Street, New York.

Orders must be received early to be satisfactorily filled with our best quality brilliant colored Fireworks. FUN-STON & SUNFIELD, 5 Day Street, near Broadway.
Colors Prepared and Charged, also dynamite, discharges, and fireworks of bowels. $1 box, $5 doz. Gun Vanocot, Haverhill, Md.

DEAFNESS,
DISCHARGES FROM THE EAR, AND NOISES IN THE HEAD, RADICALLY CURED
By the use of the recently discovered Vegetable Extract
OTTINE.
Price $2 00 a bottle. For sale by all Druggists.
GEO. C. GOODWIN, 56 Beaver Street, Boston,
Wholesale Agent.

MAGIC RUFFLE COMPANY,
To be found on each box and each piece of GENUINE
MAGIC RUFFLE. All other goods of whatever name, not having this mark, are worthless imitations and infringements on the patents of the Magic Ruffle Company.
The GENUINE MAGIC RUFFLES are full six yards in each piece, are well made of the best material, and give perfect satisfaction to consumers. Office of the Company
No. 35 Chambers Street, New York.

GRAND NATIONAL CONCERT for the benefit of the SOLDIERS' and SAILORS' NA-TIONAL ORPHANS' HOME FUND, under auspices of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Union, Washington, D. C., at GRUYER'S THEATRE, on Thursday Evening, August 2, 1866.
200,000 Tickets will be sold at $1 each—75,000 Presents awarded, valued at $250,000! $25,000 of the Proceeds to be given to the Soldiers' and Sailors' National Orphan Home Fund, $25,000 to the Washington Male and Female Orphan Asylum, and the Balance, after deducting expenses, to be paid to the Treasurer of the Soldiers' and Sailors'
Union of Washington, D. C.

ONE PRESENT TO EVERY FOUR TICKETS.
LIST OF PRESENTS TO BE AWARDED.

1 Three-Story Brick Residence, 11 Street, between Sixth and Seventh.....	$24,000
1 Three-Story " " Second Street, near E.....	20,000
1 Three-Story " " Tenth Street, between M and N.....	8,000
1 Two-Story " " Tenth Street, between M and N.....	5,000
1 Two-Story " " Tenth Street, between M and N.....	5,000
5 Five City Lots, on Seventh Street, North.....	4,000
1 Splendid Carriage, Horses and Harness complete.....	4,000
1 Splendid Diamond Ring.....	2,000
1 Set of Diamonds, complete (Ears, Rings, and Rings).....	1,000
1 Grand Piano (Steinway's).....	1,500
1 Solid Silver Tea-Set.....	1,000
10 Grand Pianos, $50 each.....	5,000
100 Gent's Gold Watches, $20 each.....	2,000
50 Ladies' Gold Watches, $15 each.....	750
5 Grand Melodions, $20 each.....	1,000
25 American Case Silver Watches, $15 each.....	3,750
25 Hunting Case Silver Watches, $20 each.....	5,000
25 Diamond Rings, $100 to $200 each.....	2,500
25 Diamond Pins, $100 each.....	2,500
40 Sewing Machines, $100 each.....	4,000
20 Sewing Machines, $15 each.....	3,000
20 Silver-Plated Tea-Set, $75 each.....	1,500
50 Silver Custers, $25 each.....	1,250
5,000 Clocks, Albums, Jewelry, &c., $5 to $10 each.....	25,000
10,000 Tea and Table Spoons, &c., $2 to $5 each.....	25,000
10,000 Card Sets, sleeve buttons, &c., $1 to $2 each.....	14,000
40,000 Books, Gallery, Engravings, &c., $1 to $10 each.....	20,000
Total.....	$250,000

The awards will be made after the Concert, on the stage of the theatre, where three thousand persons can witness it. A committee will be appointed by the audience to superintend the same.
Printed lists of awards will be published and supplied to Agents and Ticket-holders. Parties having tickets will retain them until after the awards are made, and if their number appears in the list, they will forward their tickets immediately, with full directions as to the shipping of goods or deeds for the property. Tickets for sale at all the principal Hotels, Book and Music Stores in the City, and at the Headquarters, in the Mammoth Fair Building for the benefit of the Soldiers' and Sailors' National Orphan Home Fund, corner of Seventh Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C. The Directors appeal to the liberality of the people to give this enterprise their kind support, and thereby assist in relieving the wants of the Orphans of our fallen comrades.
MANAGING DIRECTOR: Major H. A. HARR. President Soldiers' and Sailors' Union; Colonel CHAS. F. CARP.
All persons desirous of acting as Agents are requested to act as Agents, but no commissions will be allowed.
Money should in all cases be sent by Post-Office Order, Draft, Express, or Registered Letter.
In every case send the name and Post-Office address, County and State of each separate subscriber, and inclose stamp. All orders for tickets must be addressed to WILLIAM S. MURDO,
Secretary Soldiers' and Sailors' National Concert, Washington, D. C.
Tickets sold at 154 Broadway, New York.

REFER, BY PERMISSION, TO:
Major-Gen. Winfield S. Hancock, U.S.A.; Gen. Robert C. Schenck, M.C., Ohio; Gen. Halbert E. Paine, M.C., Wis.; Gen. John H. Schoon, M.C., N. Y.; Gen. James G. Sherman, Kansas; Gen. J. N. Hedrick, Iowa; Gen. D.
C. McClellan, D. C.; Gen. O. V. Doyne, N. Y.; Hon. Thos. W. Ferry, M.C., Mich.; Hon. George Lunt, M.C.,
Penn.; D. C. Foster, M.C., Pa.; Major J. E. Deagley, N. Y.; Hon. Richard Wallace, Mayor, Washington, D. C.;
Hon. Wm. D. Keller, M.C., Penn.; Hon. R. F. Wade, Ohio; Hon. B. Eggleston, Ohio; Hon. Kelson V. Whaley,
M.C., West Va.; Hon. Eben C. Ingraham, M.C., Ill.; Hon. Henry C. Deming, M.C., Conn.; Hon. A. H. Latham, M.C., N. Y.; Hon. Leonard Stern, M.C., Penn.; Hon. William A. Newell, M.C., N. J.; Hon. George W. Fuller, M.C., Ind.; Hon. Stephen Wilson, M.C., Penn.; Hon. J. B. Granger, M.C., Iowa; Major O. H. Van Buren, N. Y. Gen.
R. M. Hayes, M.C., Ohio; Hon. R. T. Johnson, M.C., N. Y.; Hon. W. E. Latham, M.C., West Va.

FOR THE LARGEST ASSORTMENT OF FRENCH JEWELRY AND GENERAL FANCY GOODS, TRY
F. P. PERKINS & BROTHER,
737 BROADWAY, Corner of WAYLES PLACE
MAGIC LANTERN
AND STEREOSCOPE.
We are now receiving the most comprehensive and finest assortment of glass views ever made in America, representing scenes and objects in nearly all European cities and countries. These views are specially selected and arranged by our Mr. Edward A. Levy, and are adapted for the uses of either the Stereoscope or the Magic Lantern.
E. & H. T. ANTHONY & CO.,
5-11 Broadway,
2 doors south of the St. Nicholas Hotel.

MOTT'S CHEMICAL POMADE
The best hair restorer and dressing. Sold by Druggists.

EMPLOYMENT
$2,000 A YEAR PAID AGENTS.
Males & Females. For particulars
Address W. G. WILSON, CLEVELAND, O.

"Steel-White," "Steel Shirt Collars." Send $1, with "size." Mailed free. Billon & Foggan, Nassau St., N. Y.

THE NATIONAL REVOLVER.

This now celebrated Revolver exceeds all others for compactness, effectiveness, durability, power, and adaptability in carrying. Is light (14 oz.), small enough to carry, with larger calibre water-proof cartridge (20-100 ball) than any Revolver made of same size and weight. Send for circular. GEO. A. BUCKDUX, 73
Beekman Street, New York.

UNION ADAMS,
HOSIER, GLOVER,
AND SHIRT MAKER,
No. 637 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK CITY.

WARD'S
Paper Collars
AND CUFFS FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,
Wholesale & Retail,
387 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Ladies' Victoria Turnover Paper Collar. Ladies' Empress Turnover Paper Collar.
Ladies' English Standing Paper Collar. Ladies' American Standing Paper Collar.
Ladies' French Paper
Cuffs. Ladies' English Paper
Cuffs.
Gent's Piondilly Paper
Collar. Gent's Shakespeare
Paper Collar.
Gentlemen's Standing
Paper Collar. Gentlemen's Turnover
Paper Collar.
Gent's Reversible
Paper Cuffs. Gent's English Paper
Cuffs.

BEST ASSORTMENT OF JEWELRY AND FANCY GOODS, BY NEB & BROTHER
100 N. WATKINS BLVD.

LANTERN
AND MICROSCOPE

The most complete set of views ever made to appear, objects in view by all known methods and especially some newly discovered objects of the microscope.
THOMY & CO.
211 Broadway,
New York City.

CHEMICAL ANALYZER

MADE BY W. M. MENT PAID AGENTS FOR PATENT RIGHTS IN CLEVELAND, O.

100 N. WATKINS BLVD.
NEW YORK CITY.

REVOLVER

Patented Revolver made by
J. A. BURTON, N.Y.

DAMS
OVER

MAKER
DWAY

D'S Millars
'S FOR ES IMEN, et al.
N. Y.

Express
Paper Collar

Express
Paper Collar

Express
Paper Collar

Express
Paper Collar

Express
Paper Collar

Express
Paper Collar

Express
Paper Collar

1877

10

11 12

13

14

15

The following pages contain the following pages