DEBATES

CONVENTION OF LOUISIANA.

In conformity with their adjournment at the town of Jackson, the Convention, in pursuance of an act entitled "An act to provide for the calling of a Convention, for the purpose of re-adopting, amending or changing the present constitution," met this day in the room prepared for their reception in the city of New Orleans.

At 12 o'clock, m., the Hon. Joseph Walker, senatorial delegate from the county of Rapides, and president of the Convention, took the chair, and the secretary proceeded to call the names of the several delegates.

Forty-nine delegates responded to their names.

The President rose and stated, that it was only necessary for him to say that, in pursuance of adjournment, the Convention had re-assembled on this occasion for the purpose of proceeding with its labors. The Convention were now organized, and he presumed ready to proceed to business.

He further stated that in the spirit of the resolution adopted at Jackson, inviting clergymen of the different denominations to open the procedings of the Convention with prayer, he was solicitious to have extended the invitation to the clergy of this city; but that upon an examination he found the resolution so worded as to confine the invitation to the clergymen in the immediate vicinity of Jackson. Not wishing to transcend the authority in any manner, of the Convention, he deemed it proper to bring this matter to their consideration.

Mr. Lewis, the senatorial delegate from the county of Opelousas, moved to amend the resolution inviting clergymen to open the proceedings with prayer, by substituting in the resolution, New Orleans, in place of Jackson; which amendment was carried.

Mr. Marigny, representative delegate from the parish of Orleans, made the following report:

Mr. President—The committee appointed by the Convention, sitting at Jackson, for the purpose of making the necessary arrangements for the reception and meeting of the Convention in the city of New Orleans, on the 14th of the present month, have the honor to submit for your consideration the following report:

Your committee first addressed themselves to the honorable the house of representatives for the purpose of procuring their room for the sessions of the Convention. The house having refused to grant it, your committee were under the necessity of procuring some other suitable apartment, and to procure the necessary furniture to enable the Convention to resume their labors. The account for the furniture will be presented to you in a few days, and will amount to about one thousand dollars.

Your committee applied to Mrs. Hawley, the lessee of the St. Louis ball room, with whom they made the following arrangements, subject to your approval:

Mrs. Hawley furnishes the ball room, and five rooms destined for the use of the clerks of the Convention; the principal room to be at the service of the Convention during its sessions, unless the legislature adjourning, the Convention should prefer the hall of the house of representatives.

Your committee have agreed to allow Mrs. Hawley fifteen dollars per day for the use of said locale.

Your committee are under the impression that this room, in every respect, is suited for the meetings of the Convention.

They would observe that Mrs. Hawley reserves to herself the privilege of retaining the room on the 17th, 24th and 31st of January, and the 4th of February, for the purpose of giving society balls, and will require it on these days at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

Your committee deem it likewise proper to state, for your information, that the city council of the first municipality, design to place chains across the corners of Royal, Chartres and St. Louis streets, during the sittings of the Convention, so that their deliberations may not be disturbed by the passage of carriages and other vehicles.

(Signed,) B. MARIGNY, Chairman.
C. ROSELIUS,
G. LEONARD.

Mr. Claiborne asked for the adoption of the report.

Mr. Guion said that in that part of the room where he was seated, not one word of the documents read at the secretary's desk had been heard. If it was the report of the committee appointed to make arrangements for the meeting of the Convention in New Orleans, announcing their selection of this room, he should oppose its adoption. It was impossible to hear anything coming from the president's seat or from the secretary. He had not heard what the president had said upon taking the chair. A dozen members around him had been equally unfortunate in catching a syllable of what transpired.

Mr. Marigny replied that the difficulty complained of could easily be remedied; the seats of members could be brought much nearer to the president's desk, and to each other, so that every thing said during the proceedings would be audible.

Mr. Winchester submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the report of the committee of arrangements, be referred to a special committee of five members, with instructions to take this report into consideration, and to report thereon, and with further authority to inquire whether another and more appropriate room for the sittings of the Convention cannot be obtained in the city.

Mr. Marigny was opposed to this resolution, inasmuch as it submitted a duty already discharged by one committee, to the supervision of another. He thought that courtesy to the committee already appointed, would not permit that their work should be submitted to a second committee with the view of its being undone. The committee of arrangements were perfectly conversant with all the public buildings in the city suitable for the meeting of the Convention, and had selected the present locale because they thought it the best adapted to the purpose. The room was spacious and airy, and combined every requisite. The terms agreed upon were reasonable—fifteen dollars per day. What was the use of beginning de novo with another committee. If it was for the purpose of trying to save one or two dollars a day, by getting some other place, that object was, to his mind, very insignificant in comparison with the importance of proceeding with the labors of the Convention. Surely the Convention could not expect, reasonably, to get a room for nothing. The committee had made all researches; this room was in a convenient position for publicity, and was accessible to a great proportion of the population, resident and transient. It appeared to him to be a rebuke of what the committee had done, to refer their report to another committee; it was casting undeserved blame upon them, as they had done all in their power to accommodate the Convention, and to make the best possible arrangement.

Mr. Winchester said he would regret much if the passage of the resolution could be construed into any censure upon the committee of arrangements for what they had done. Surely nothing was farther from his mind. What he designed was, that the committee to be raised, should inquire whether the contract proposed to be made by the first committee was proper. If the committee reported that it was, then all difficulty would be obviated. Little experience of the suitableness of this room has yet been had, and that has not been of a satisfactory character. It appears to be difficult to hear what is said on one side of the house on the other side. He had been removed but two seats from the one he now occupied, and he could there neither hear the voice of the president nor of the secretary. This was a serious objection. And, if the voices of those officers cannot be heard in the immediate vicinity, how are we to hear gentlemen whose seats are at the other extremity. He did not say that any better place could be obtained—but it would be proper and expedient to ascertain the impossibility from further investigation. Many of the members have but just arrived, and have had as yet no opportunity of satisfying themselves on that point. This resolution would enable them to do so. It was said that the Washington Armory, which was wider and otherwise more convenient, could be had. The committee could inquire and report whether it was not preferable for the meetings of the Convention, and make such arrangements as were most agreeable. He was opposed to springing this matter suddenly upon the Convention. Let us have at least the opportunity of inquiring whether a more suitable place—one better adapted, may not be procured. That was his object, and certainly no want of courtesy towards the committee of arrangements, who have provided this room.

Mr. Dunn said he had been for some days in the city, and his attention as a member of the Convention, had been called to the subject of where the Convention should meet. He had heard that the lessee of this edifice had asked twenty-five dollars per day for the use of this room; that price he considered to be rather dear; he had since learned that she consented to place it at the disposition of the Convention for fifteen dollars. This appeared reasonable, when the accommodations afforded by the room were taken into view. He had canvassed the matter, whether any better place could be selected, and from all the information he could obtain, he was convinced that none better could be had, or on more reasonable terms. The Washington Armory, which had been spoken of, he doubted much whether it could be obtained during the present week, on account of the engagements of the lessees. The committee of arrangements had discharged their duty as well as it could be performed, and he was clearly of opinion that their report ought to be adopted. The room is large and spacious, and the seats of members may very well be brought much nearer.

Mr. Kenner would suggest a middle course. The members of the Convention had, as yet, no opportunity of fully testing the advantages or disadvantages of the present location. He would, therefore, propose to suspend the further consideration of the subject until Friday next.

Mr. Downs said he was opposed to any thing which would have the effect of delaying the labors of the Convention. He did not wish the time of the Convention to be consumed with this matter. The committee of arrangements have procured this room, and it appears well adapted for the purpose. As to the difficulty of hearing, that may be remedied by bringing the seats of members nearer to each other and to the president's desk. He was for disposing of this question at once; and was, therefore indisposed to re-commit the subject, or to postpone it to another day. In hearing the report read, he was at first opposed to the condition, that the room should be at the disposition of the lessee for three or four evenings, but he had since heard that the furniture could be easily removed and returned, for the limited period she required the use of the room.

Mr. Ratliff would suggest that the report be first adopted, and that the delegate from St. James (Mr. Winchester) present his resolution in the form of a distinct proposition. The committee, under that resolution, might institute the inquiry whether any better place could be had.

Mr. Grymes said that there was no necessity for that. Let the question be taken on the proposition of the delegate from St. James, to refer the report.

The PRESIDENT put the question on Mr. Kenner's motion to postpone the further consideration of the subject to Friday next. Lost.

The question then recurred on Mr. Winchester's proposition to refer. Lost.

Mr. GRYMES moved the adoption of the report, which motion prevailed.

Mr. GARCIA asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Soulé, who had been called rom the city on account of bad health.

Mr. LEONARD presented a resolution that seats be prepared for the reception of the members of the Legislature, within the bar of the Convention.

Mr. EUSTIS said he did not oppose the adoption of this resolution through a want of courtesy towards the members of the legislature, but simply because the room was too small to admit of the presence of a greater number of persons within the bar than the members of the Convention. It was desirable that the labors of the Convention should proceed with all convenient speed, and that its proceedings should not be interrupted by the attendance of a greater number of persons within the bar, than its members and officers, for whose accommodation the room was scarcely more than sufficient.

Mr. LEONARD said that the seats of members could be drawn nearer, and that if this were done for their accommodation, sufficient room would be left for the reception of such members of the legislature as chose to attend.

Mr. GRYMES objected to the resolution, because it would interfere with the business of the Convention. The legislature have their business to perform, and we had ours. Let us do our duty, and leave them alone to do theirs.

On motion of Mr. WADSWORTH, the credentials of Messrs. Conrad and Benjamin, members elect, were referred to the committee on elections.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD presented a resolution for the printing of the reports of the several committees, with proper blanks and with the lines numbered.

It was adopted, with an amendment by Mr. Downs, that said work be executed by to-morrow, and that if the printer to the Convention be unable to execute it, the secretary be authorized to have it done elsewhere.

Mr. GRYMES moved that the Convention take up the report upon the first article of the constitution of the State, relative to the distribution of powers.

Which motion prevailed, whereupon the Convention went into committee of the whole, (Mr. Leonard in the chair.)

1st. That the powers of the government of the State of Louisiana shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them to be confined to a separate body of magistracy, to wit: those which are legislative to one, those which are executive to another, and those which are judiciary to another.

Mr. GRYMES called for the adoption of the foregoing section.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD suggested that the word "that" at the commencement, was superfluous, and ought to be stricken out. As the articles of the new constitution, he presumed, would not be submitted to a committee upon style, it would be necessary to make all necessary corrections before they were adopted. He instanced another mistake which was probably a typographical error. The word "confined" was employed for "confided."

Mr. DOWNS remarked, that as there appeared to be several typographical errors, and inasmuch as members who may have taken notes had not come prepared with them, not expecting at this preliminary sitting that the reports would come up, he would move that the committee rise for the purpose of making a motion for adjournment.

The committee rose, whereupon the chairman (Mr. Leonard) reported that the committee had had under consideration the first article of the report upon the distribution of powers, and that they had made some progress, and asked for leave to sit again.

Whereupon, the Convention adjourned until to-morrow, at 11 o'clock, a. m.

WEDNESDAY, January 15, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. SCOTT.

Mr. RATLIFF offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on contingent expenses be instructed to enquire into and to ascertain the amount of mileage due to each member of this body, for his travelling expenses to and from his residence to the Convention in New Orleans, and to direct the payment of the same.

Mr. BEATTY moved to amend the foregoing by adding "and that the committee report to the Convention.

Mr. GUION moved to lay the whole subject on the table, and called for the yeas and nays. The following was the result:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Brent, Burton, Brumfield, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Kenner, King, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Penn, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill and Winder—43 yeas; and

Messrs. Chinn, Dunn, Leonard, McCallop, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Stephens and Wederstrandt—11 nays.

Mr. WINDER moved that leave of absence be granted to Mr. Miles Taylor of Lafourche, who was prevented from attending the Convention, by a serious illness in his family.

Mr. EUSTIS regretted to be under the painful necessity of opposing the motion. Those who knew him would not believe that he was actuated by any want of courtesy towards the gentleman in whose behalf the request was presented, but would attribute his opposition to the true motive —a conscientious sense of duty. He readily conceded that this was an extreme case and assuredly, if under any circumstances the Convention would be justified in granting leave of absence, the nature of the present application would entitle it to indulgence. But it was not in reference to this case that his objections were urged. He was fearful that these requests would be multiplied, and would become but too common, if not checked at the very outset. At Jackson he had observed that they had gained ground to such an extent that it became a matter of course to grant them whenever they were mentioned.

Mr. E. referred to the application made yesterday, by the senatorial delegate from the German coast, for leave of absence to another member of this body. That gentleman was beyond seas for the recovery of his health, and certainly his claims to indulgence were entitled to great consideration. Yet, he (Mr. E.) would not have given his sanction to that proceeding any more than to the present application, had he anticipated then other requests of a similar kind. The necessity in the one case was equally as astringent as in the other, and he regretted that he did not object yesterday to that application. He submitted to the Convention, first, the question, what power had they to grant leave of absence? To his understanding, any member had a right to absent himself when he saw proper, and only be made amenable to his constituents for such absence. He (Mr. E.) denied the right of the Convention to interfere. If urgent circumstances prevented a member from attending, let his constituents judge of the urgency of those circumstances; that is a matter for their consideration, and he was opposed to the Convention taking upon itself to pronounce an opinion, and to absolve the absent member. If the indulgence be granted upon one pretext, it will be claimed upon others; the only way is either to shut the door or to open it widely. He repeated his regret to be under the necessity of opposing the present application; it was certainly sanctioned by considerations personal to the gentleman in whose favor it was asked, which had great weight with him, but he was so well convinced that if it were granted, and the principle were recognized, that other applications would follow, and the consequence would be a very serious interruption to the labors of the Convention, that he felt constrained, much to his regret, to oppose it, and to insist on its rejection; to put an end at once to all applications of a similar character.

Mr. GRYMES sustained a similar view of the subject. If the indulgence in any case could be granted, then certainly the gentleman whose application was pending, was entitled to it. He (Mr. G.) acknowledged the great worth of that gentleman, and regretted his absence, as well as the circumstances that led to it. In reference to the application made yesterday to permit the absence of another member of the Convention, he (Mr. G.) would certainly have opposed it had it not been for the great desire he felt that the Convention should take up the reports and proceed at once with its labors. He apprehended debate, and that was his only reason for not opposing the application yesterday. The Convention, to his judgment, had nothing to do with permitting absence on the part of its members. Their absence was a matter between them and their constituents, for which they were only amenable to their constituents.

Mr. DUNN differed in opinion from the two gentlemen who had just addressed the Convention. He considered that no member could properly absent himself without out leave, and leave was only to be accorded upon the most urgent circumstances, exhibited to the satisfaction of the Convention. Among the rules adopted at Jackson, was one to that effect. It was the 39th rule. The object was to keep the members together, and to ensure their punctual attendance for the performance of the duties devolving upon the Convention. The present application was fully sustained by imperious necessity, and while he (Mr. Dunn) regretted the occurrence that caused the absence of that gentleman, who was a most valuable member of this body, he could not but yield his acquiescence to the request. He trusted the motion would prevail.

The question was taken, and it was carried in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT informed the Convention, that he labored under an error in stating yesterday that the 50th rule, that the Convention may go into committee of the whole, had been adopted. It appeared that up to the 42d rule had been adopted, and the remainder, which were few in number, had not been adopted.

Mr. DOWNS moved that the rules be referred to a special committee of five, and asked the president not to place him on the committee, on account of his time being engrossed by other duties.

This motion prevailed, and the PRESIDENT appointed Messrs. Roman, Eustis, Mayo, Kenner and Read, said committee.

The PRESIDENT informed the Convention of the resignation of Mr. Louis Exnicios, door keeper.

Mr. GRYMES moved that it be entered on the minutes, that the president be authorized to appoint a door-keeper.

The PRESIDENT said he would prefer the Convention to make the selection.

The question was taken on Mr. Grymes' motion, and it was lost.

Mr. DOWNS moved to reconsider the adoption of the report of the committee of arrangements, to provide suitable apartments for the Convention. He had stated yesterday that the adoption of the report did not bind the Convention to retain their present apartments. He had since learnt that the adoption of the report was considered final in the matter. He would, therefore, move its reconsideration, and if that motion prevailed, he would next move that it be laid on the table, subject to call.

The motion to reconsider was carried, and the report was then laid on the table.

Mr. LEWIS moved that the Convention proceed to the election of door keeper.

Mr. RATLIFF nominated E. Remondet.

Mr. CULBERTSON nominated G. W. Reinecke.

Mr. PENN nominated J. K. Miles.

Mr. BOUDOUSQUIE nominated — Faures.

Mr. GARCIA nominated Joseph Chevalier.

The PRESIDENT appointed Messrs. Dunn and Culbertson, tellers.

The result was as follows:

Mr. Remondet,	34	votes.
" Faure,	8	"
" Chevalier,	8	"
" Miles,	4	"
" Reinecke,	6	"
" Blank,	2	"
" Hickey,	1	"

The PRESIDENT announced that out of sixty-three votes cast, Mr. Remondet had received thirty-four; consequently Mr. Remondet was duly elected.

Mr. MAYO moved that seats be allowed to the reporters of the several papers. Adopted.

On motion, the Convention took up the

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Mr. Lewis called for the reading of the report upon the first article of the constitution of the State, and moved some verbal corrections.

Mr. Preston moved to adopt in lieu of the first article reported by the committee, the original article of the constitution. There were only a few verbal changes in the report; the meaning was identical between the article as reported, and the corresponding article in the old constitution. Mr. Preston eulogized the old constitution; it was venerable for its age, and we had lived under it for thirty years; there were only three or four points upon which the people desired change. Let the constitution be preserved, wherever no change is required, and only let it be amended in the particulars where amendments are required. As for verbal changes to better the language, these were unnecessary, and he considered it would be better to leave the language as it was, and not consume the time of the Convention by a dispute upon words and syllables.

Mr. Conrad of Orleans, was happy to hear the eulogium pronounced by the delegate from Jefferson upon the old constitution, and he hoped to hear him often reiterate his admiration of that instrument during the progress of the labors of the Convention. As to what that delegate had said about disputing on words and syllables, he would remark that words and syllables were ideas, and were therefore very important. The time of the Convention might be much less profitably spent. He was pleased at what had fallen from the gentleman (Mr. Preston) in relation to the old constitution, which, coming from the quarter it did, was most satisfactory to him (Mr. Conrad) inasmuch as he understood it to imply that a sparing hand would be applied to that instrument by those who had hitherto professed the design of making sweeping alterations, and of changing materially its features.

Mr. Conrad said that the old constitution had been made at a most auspicious period; that its framers met with the harmony of a band of brothers, and were not actuated by the violence and bitterness of party strife; but were influenced by the same spirit of concession—the same lofty patriotism that animated the framers of the federal constitution. He was glad to hear the delegate (Mr. Preston) say that we had lived for thirty years under that instrument, it had promoted the happiness and prosperity of the State. Whatever misfortunes and reverses we have recently undergone, were not attributable to it.

While he expressed his concurrence in the admiration of the gentleman (Mr. Preston) for the old constitution, he could not concede that it was unnecessary to make corrections in the language, and to rectify grammatical improprieties. He thought some definite plan ought to be adopted in amending the constitution.

Mr. Wadsworth considered it trifling with great principles to discuss about mere words. He explained why the committee, of which he had the honor of being chairman, had incorporated an amendment in the second section of the first article. It was to preclude the monopoly of offices, by prescribing that no person or persons holding office under one of the departments of government, should exercise office under another. The present debate appeared to be about the superfluity of the word "and." If it is superfluous can it not be cut out? It was puerile to debate about so trifling a matter.

Mr. Downs said that to avoid any misconception that might arise from what fell from the member from New Orleans, (Mr. Conrad) he would make a few remarks. He agreed with the delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston) that the old constitution should be touched as little as possible, except in material points. The language of that instrument should be preserved. It was consecrated to us by the associations of thirty years. We should not change a word or letter where there is not some urgent reason for doing so; and where we are in doubt as to the necessity of making verbal corrections, he would give to the original language of that instrument the benefit of his doubts. But in saying this much, and in concurring so far with the delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston) he would not have the member from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) infer, as he had seemed inclined to do in reference to the delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston) that he (Mr. Downs) had changed any of his opinions as to the vital importance of those salutary amendments to the constitution, which he (Mr. Downs) had always advocated. He had not changed his views; he had thought, and still thinks that these amendments should be made. Time, in his opinion, would be saved by passing over mere verbal corrections, after the adoption of the articles; they would, he presumed, be submitted to a committee of revision, who would suggest all such corrections as were essential, and the new constitution would be out as an entire work, not disjointed in any of its parts.

After some debate upon questions of order and of precedence, the question was taken on Mr. Preston's motion to adopt the first section of the first article of the old constitution; which motion was carried.

Mr. Preston moved to adopt the second section of the first article of the old constitution.

Mr. Lewis moved as a substitute, section second of the report of the committee.

Mr. Guion moved to amend said second section of the report, by striking out "collection of" and inserting after the word "persons," the words "being one of these departments or," and inserting in the place of "none of those departments" the words "one of them;" the section would then read as follows:

Sec. 2. No person or persons being one of those departments, or holding office under one of them shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others, except in instances hereafter expressly directed or permitted.

Mr. Guion said that the object of this amendment was to incorporate the principle of the report to exclude a plurality of offices in the same person, and to engraft that principle upon the article of the old constitution, which was to remain otherwise unchanged.

Mr. Downs called for the yeas and nays on Mr. Guion's motion. The result was as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquié, Bourg, Brumfield, Burton, Chinn, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Dunn, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Porche, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Feliciana, Stephens, Trist, Voorhies, Winchester and Winder—34 yeas.

Mrssrs. Brazeale, Brent, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Claiborne, Covillion, Downs, Eustis, Humble, Ledoux, Leonard, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Penn, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Sellers, Waddill and Wederstrandt—25 nays.

So Mr. Guion's amendment prevailed.

On motion, the section was further amended; and on the further motion of Mr. Preston, the section as amended was adopted.

Mr. Preston movod that the committee on rules be instructed to make their report by to-moorow at 11 oclock.

On motion, the Convention adjourned till to-morrow, at 11 o'clock, a. m.

Thursday, January 16, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. Clapp.

Mr. Roman, chairman of the committee appointed to examine the rules temporarily adpted at Jackson, reported that the committee recommended the rules from No. 1 to No. 42. They also reported the balance of the rules, with some modifications, for the consideration of the Convention.

On motion of Mr. Downs, the rules were taken up, and read separately.

After some modifications, by Messrs. Ratliff, Downs and Lewis, they were finally adopted.

Mr. Downs moved the incorporation of the fifty-fifth rule into those adopted upon the subject of printing.

Mr. Kenner objected to its aboption, on the score that it would ental very heavy expense.

It was finally laid on the table subject to call, on the motion of Mr. Lewis.

Mr. Sellers submitted some statistical information from the State treasurer, transmitted by that officer in obedience to a call from the Convention. It exhibited the population of the State, amount of taxation, and the objects upon which taxes were imposed, and was made up for the year 1843. Mr. Sellers moved that it be printed.

Mr. WADSWORTH moved that a committee be appointee to wait on the treasurer, and to obtain similar information for the year 1844, and that the printing be suspended until all the information be obtained, when all the documents be printed.

Mr. Wadsworth's motion was lost; and the motion being taken on Mr. Sellers' proposition; it was carried.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, the Convention took up the 2d article of the old constitution, together with the amendments of the committee.

Mr. RATLIFF moved to adopt the 1st section of the 2nd article of the old constitution.

His motion prevailed.

On motion, the 2nd section of the same article, as reported by the majority of the committee, was taken under consideration.

Mr. DOWNS explained that this article was reported precisely as it was in the old constitution, with the exception that the word "closing" had been substituted for "commencement."

This section was adopted.

On motion, the 3d section, as reported by the majority of the committee, was taken up.

This section fixes the general elections throughout the State, for one day, and for the first Monday in September.

Mr. WINDER moved to substitute "June" in place of "September."

But at the request of Mr. SELLERS, he withdrew the motion; and Mr. Sellers then moved to strike out September, and leave the period in blank, to be filled up hereafter by the Convention.

Mr. MARIGNY said he would oppose the motion to strike out September; and would briefly explain the motives that induced a majority of the committee on the legislative department to report in favor of fixing the period of election in September. There was no doubt but that the principle of free suffrage would be adopted by the Convention, and the only guarantee that would be provided for the restraint of the abuses of that pivilege, would be a certain probationary residence. If the elections were fixed for June or July, they would be exposed to the control of the floating population, who had no identity of feeling or interest with the true and permanent interests of the State. He disclaimed being actuated by local feelings, in advocating the retention of the month of September, in perference to any other time. He had arrived at that age, and had acquired that experience, which would preclude him from being governed by partial views or considerations. And the best evidence he could give of his frankness and sincerity, was his support of a proposition that would deprive the city, which he had the honor, in part, of representing, of the control which she would acquire over the balance of the State, by the principle of free suffrage, unrestricted, by placing the elections in a month which would insure the expression of voice, only of the real population who had actual interest at stake, or who were identified with the prosperity of the State. This course he took in the presence of his constituents; for those that thronged the galleries and lobbies were his constituents.

If you fix the elections in June or July, you place the result of the popular choice at the control of what is well styled the floating population—those birds of passage, who come to New Orleans for a limited season, and for some temporary purpose, and who are ready to quit at any moment, particularly at the period when yellow fever makes its appearance. By the month of September, these birds of passage have taken their flight, and the population of the city is reduced to the actual citizens—to those who have a real and permanent interest in wholesome and judicious legislation; in the maintenance of order and the preservation of our local interests. He considered that no good citizen was afraid of yellow fever; it was the baptism of citizenship, and he that went through it offered some guarantee of devotion to the country.

Mr. MARIGNY repeated, that he was too old to become the champion of any local interest. He was actuated by a sincere desire for the interests of the whole State—for every part and portion of it, and he was convinced that it was for the welfare of the whole State, that the elections should be held at a season of the year, when the actual population would alone have an opportunity of expressing their will. The population of the city of New Orleans was swelled to 100,000 souls by the presence of transient persons, at this time, and hereafter that excess of population would be considerably augmented. Should the elections be held in June, the transient population would stifle the voice of the resident population at the ballot box, and not only will the city be subject to this control, but the country—the whole State will be swayed by it. This result could be avoided—and the dangers attending universal suffrage, be obviated by fixing the election at a later period—in the month of September, as proposed by the majority of the committee. Otherwise the vital interests of Louisiana will be at the mercy of these birds of passage; who are bound to the soil by no feelings of attachment; no community of interests, who have no property; no guarantee for their fidelity. He hoped therefore, that the time specified by the committee would be maintained. The principal of universal suffrage would no doubt be conceded, and some effectual checks ought to be provided against the abuses of that privilege. This was one which he considered to be most efficacious, and it ought to be preserved.

Mr. Roselius said, he regretted to differ with the gentleman who had just addressed the house, and to be under the necessity of taking a very different view of the subject. Sir, said Mr. Roselius, I regret that any sectional considerations should have been invoked. It is truly lamentable. The question before us is one of vital importance; it is whether the sacred principle of suffrage is to be subverted. If, as the member from New Orleans (Mr. Marigny) apprehends, it be the intention of the Convention to extend the right of suffrage to all, it will only be because in its wisdom it judges it to be right and proper to do so. If the right be conceded, it would be strange if this body were to determine that the high privilege should be extended to all, and yet in the same breath, prescribe that it should only be exercised when the city is deserted. When an epidemic is casting its fearful ravages and seeking with insatiate fury, fresh victims. At a time when one-third of the population, as is usually the case, have sought safety abroad. Is it right and proper a such a time as this to open the ballot-box es and call upon the citizens to vote? T announce the great priciple of the electiv franchise to all, and yet fix its exercis when nobody can enjoy it; when the po pulation is reduced and the number of vo ters must necessarily be small, I cannot said Mr. Roselius, perceive any reason fo this proceeding. To disfranchise a larg proportion of the population, who, fron necessity—from the urgency of danger happen to be absent during a particula month, or a particular season of the year

It is well known, that to avoid the pe riodical visitations of the epidemic, some of our most respectable citizens are in the habit of absenting themselves, and have never become acclimated from the fear they entertained that the attempt might be followed by fatal consequences. And, because they have never exposed themselves to the fiery ordeal—have never, in the language of the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Marigny) been subject to the baptism of the yellow fever, they are not to be considered qualified citizens, and are to be debarred the sacred privilege of suffrage. The political principle of suffrage, said Mr. Roselius, is inherent in every freeman, and I cannot see how it can be restricted and denied; because a citizen does not choose to incur the risk of contracting yellow fever or any other epidemic that may prevail at a particular season of the year.

Mr. Roselius said he did not comprehend what the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Marigny) meant by "birds of passage," which was applied by him to distinguish a certain portion of the population. If that class were meant who acquired no residence among us, and were not entitled to the privilege of citizenship, surely no one in the Convention or out of it, would pretend to maintain that the privilege of suffrage should be extended to them.

For himself, he (Mr. Roselius) was in favor of the extension of the important right of suffrage. He had always been in favor of its extension. He was never opposed to it, and had never expressed an opinion against it. It was true, he had been misrepresented, because when a member of the legislature he opposed an attempt to violate the constitution; and opinions were imagined for him by those who did not know, which he never entertained. He never was, and never should be, in favor of restricting the inestimable privileges of suffrage, provided the right was protected and guarded by proper enactments. Provided a proper registry law were passed, to put a stop to frauds and corruptions; to prevent outrages, and to put proper guards for the assurance of the sacred privilege against the frauds, forgeries and corruptions which had become of late but too frequent, and were perpetrated with the utmost recklessness of purpose.

He was decidedly in favor of extending suffrage to all that were entitled to it by citizenship. Those that were not citizens and had no intention of becoming citizens, who could properly be classed as "birds of passage," as "the floating population," they might well fall under the ban of the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Marigny,) but not citizens who were as deeply interested and had as much involved in the prosperity and good government of the State, as any portion of the community.

He assented so far as the arguments of the gentleman (Mr. Marigny) were predicated in relation to those that were not citizens: who were here transiently, for a few days or a few months, and who would probably never return. They acquired no rights of citizenship and were not entitled to the privileges of suffrage. He held it as a fundamental principle that the right of suffrage resided in the people. What people? Those comprising the community in which the privilege is to be exercised. To fix the period for its exercise, when one-half of the legal voters were absent at the north, or in the west—in the south or in the east—upon business or upon pleasure, flying away from the pestilence, was to make a mockery of the elective franchise, and to restrict it to a few persons. He would vote for the proposition to strike out the month of September.

Mr. Preston said he did not anticipate that the subject under consideration would have come up at so early a stage of the proceedings, and he must, therefore, confess that he was unprepared to discuss it; it had come up so unexpectedly.

The delegate from New Orleans, who had just set down, had spoken so forcibly and powerfully, as to leave him (Mr. Preston) but little to add. He was unwilling, however, to give his vote without saying a word or two.

One position, said Mr. Preston, we must assume: who shall be citizens of Louisiana? Upon this point there are a variety of opinions. For one he was in favor of conceding every facility to become citizens; not only because it was liberal and just in itself, but because it would contribute and ensure the prosperity and advancement of this great and growing State. In the progress of the deliberations of this body, he should advocate that policy as far as his vote and his little say went.

A rule would have to be fixed by the Convention, establishing what residence is requisite for persons coming among us to be citizens of the State, and to be entitled to all the privileges consequent thereon. In establishing that rule, we should not be influenced by narrow and selfish motives, but should receive with open hearts, with liberality and with generosity, all that desired to cast their lot among us. By the constitution of the United States, citizens of one State were entitled to all the privileges of citizenship in another; the period when the right of suffrage should be conferred was left to the discretion of each State, and in his conception, the slightest impediment that could be imposed, would be the best and wisest policy. He was invincibly opposed to that error of government, which enabled one class to have advantage over another. Which prescribed that one class of free white citizens, should be debarred a privilege granted to another class. He considered it anti-republican—illiberal and unjust. In saying this he did not wish to reflect in the slightest manner upon the motives of that venerable and respectable citizen, with whose views on this occasion, he so materially differed.

But what will be the inevitable consequence of this inequality among our citizens? It will be a source of perpetual struggle and unceasing discontent. The gentleman that last addressed the Convention, (Mr. Roselius) alluded to the supposed frauds committed upon the ballot box. What are they? Frauds on behalf of human nature. The attempt to participate in a right which is unjustly withheld, and which belongs to them as creatures of the creator—of the Great God who endowed them with the same inalienable rights.

He would inquire what else could be anticipated, than the struggle for equality on the part of those that were deprived of a right common to all, and yet by an unjust and unworthy prejudice, limited to a few? It would be, he repeated, an undying struggle, and would only cease with the unfortunate cirumstances that gave it birth. It was a manifestation of a want of love. It was acting on a narrow principle, instead of a broad, noble and generous principle. We should teach ourselves and our children, not to rely on fortuitous distinctions—not on mere accidental circumstances; but to rely upon the advantages of superior energy, superior talents and indomitable perseverance. We should act on this ennobling principle, and teach it to our children. We should teach them what is to be attained by rising early and sitting up late; by indomitable perseverance and industry. That is the lesson we should inculcate—not that by the mere accidental circumstance of being here, they are to be endowed with exclusive privileges and are dispensed from making any exertion. We should invite our children to embark in the career of usefulness and laudable ambition, with all that have merit —let them come from where they may, and teach them that intrinsic merit can be the only test, and only distinction. Let the field be disputed by superior energy, greater industry, greater talent. not by mere priority of residence. Let the spirit of emulation be stimulated by a wide competition, in which all our citizens may engage, without reference to artificial distinctions, based upon the sordid calculation of a few years residence.

These, said Mr. Preston, are the general views of the question. Now as to the particular considerations. The month of September is a season of general relaxation. Our merchants, who have toiled and labored through the winter—and who, for enterprise, industry and public spirit, will vie with the merchants of any other city of the Union; after contributing during the winter to the wealth of the city; either for business or for pleasure, repair to the north or to the west. The mechanic, who has seduously toiled, does the same thing, and even the common laborer, if we descend to him, if decent it can be called, relaxes his ponderous arm, and for a season tastes the enjoyment of repose. The toil of the winter is past—the hum of activity is hushed—the shaking of the earth by man's labor is suspended—the hurly burly for a brief period ceases; the drayman turns his mules into pasture, and avails himself of the suspension of his daily pursuits, to retire in the country—to go up the river or across the lake. So, too, is it with the planter: his labors for a season are over; his crops laid by, and he goes either north or west for his pleasure, or with an eye to his business. Surely, he is entitled to this relaxation! His health may be impaired, and it may be necessary for him to recover it, to go to the hot springs of Arkansas, or to the mountains of Virginia; he may visit some near and dear relative,from whom he has been separated for a series of years. Whatever may be the motives, he is surely entitled to absent himself, whether it be for a few days, for a few weeks, or for a longer period. Must he on that account be deprived of any of his political privileges—must he pay a penalty for his temporary absence? Why so? Is he not as much interested in the welfare of the country, as if he were actually within its limits; is not his property, or his affections, his business or some other preponderating consideration, or all of these, as much involved, as dear to him, as if his foot were actually upon the soil, and would he not fly as quickly to the rescue, if the State were exposed to danger, as any citizen? But he may be afraid of the yellow fever, and he may be flying, as he considers it, for his life, to a more salubrious clime. Well, what of that. The only way to cure him of his fears is to eradicate that fell destroyer, and the only means of accomplishing that desirable result, is to invite and promote emigration. Pursue a liberal course to those inclined to come among us, and you will attain this end. Invite emigration by the liberality of your laws, and your swamps, the prolific sources of disease, will be drained. They will be cleared, and you will have accomplished as glorious a work, as that of Cesar, when he drained the marshes near Rome, which conferred more true glory on him, than all his brilliant victories. Induce, then, by all possible means, emigration; it has made the United States; it has built up the city of New Orleans; it has peopled the great West, and is destined to accomplish the most important results. Like the great Nile in its overflow, it will fructify and enrich the State.

Do not do any thing to keep away population: we want it all. Ninety-nine out of one hundred of those that come among us make useful citizens. They are found to be among the most enterprising—the most energetic of our citizens. Who have opened the best plantations? Who have distinguished themselves most at the bar, in the pulpit, in the mercantile pursuits? Is it not those citizens who have come among us; who have removed from their former homes for a more extended sphere of action—a wider field for their talents and industry. Some of them have come with but a single trunk, which contained all their worldly wealth. Some with but the garment they had on, and yet they have made their way; they have established by their energy, their fortitude and their genius, a proud name among their fellow men. They have built magnificent edifices, they have adorned your city—they are foremost in promoting every public improvement; and in building up their own fortunes, they have built up your city, and are destined, they, and those that follow them, to make the State rich and prosperous. They will contribute towards paying the debts of the State. The actual liabilities of the State amount to four millions of dollars, and the eventual liabilities to some twelve or fifteen millions. It is by the industry of "those birds of passage" that we must look for means to cancel that indebtedness. It is from them that we are to expect the clearing of our swamps and the tilling of all our soil. Come, then, let us encourage them to settle among us; let them come with their little means and their public enterprise, and if they have nothing but their two hands, let us receive them with welcome, they possess true fortune—honest hearts and strong hands; they will build and improve, and our liabilities will become as a mere drop in the bucket. Do not let us listen to petty jealousies, to foolish distinctions. Do not let any baneful jealousies prevail between town and city. The policy that is beneficial for the one, is beneficial for the other. Let not the city be pulled to pieces under the pretence of building up the country. Let there be reciprocal feelings of good will between them, and an identity of feeling. Young men in the city, it is true, have not always the activity and energy of young men in the country; it was amid the pleasures of a city life that they became frequently enervated; in this very room, in the blandishments of the seductive dance. To the country they retire to regain their health, and to reinvigorate their bodies. There was a mutual dependence between town and country. This was the view he (Mr. Preston) took. He trusted that a liberal policy would prevail, and that the Convention would discard all prejudices, all narrow minded distinctions—that they would give every facility of acquiring all the rights of citizenship, and that they would impose no restrictions upon those rights, when they were once granted.

We should then become a happy, united and contented people, and all would redound to the glory of our common State.

Mr. Marigny said that, as he observed no other member of the majority of the committee had seen fit to address the convention in favor of the period fixed for the elections throughout the State by the report, he felt himself called upon to speak again, for the purpose of responding to the arguments on the other side. He understood full well the difficulty of his position, having to contend against two men of brilliant and powerful talents; yet, notwithstanding he hoped to triumph over them by the intrinsic strength of his position.

The gentlemen had misapprehended his argument, when they understood his object to be to deprive some two or three hundred merchants of the privilege of suffrage by bringing on the elections in their absence. That was not his object. He apprehended no danger from that class, nor did he desire to affect their right of suffrage. The danger he feared was from another quarter, and well known to those who were at all conversant with the city. By placing the elections in the month of September, the evil was avoided. There was no doubt but the principle of universal suffrage would be conceded by the Convention. It was the democratic principle, and the people required it. The population of New Orleans was at present one hundred thousand souls; a little reflection would exhibit the great preponderance of population in favor of the city over the country, and it could very easily be inferred, if the principle of universal suffrage prevailed, and that it would prevail he had no doubt; and the elections were brought on at that season of the year when the population of the city was at its maximum, what would be the consequence? The democratic principle was that men and not property should be the basis of representation. New Orleans was destined to become the greatest city in the world. Even as far back as 1772, a man of great judgment and research, when the city of New Orleans contained but three or four thousand persons, while writing on the Indias, predicted that New Orleans would become the greatest city in the world. A glance at the map of the United States will at once satisfy the most incredulous.

It requires but little segacity to perceive that with universal suffrage, the city of New Orleans, unless some expedient be adopted, is destined to engulph the political influence of the balance of the State and to control its destinies. Since the danger is imminent, common prudence dictates that it should be avoided, and the most certain way of avoiding it, with the principle of free suffrage, is to bring on the elections when none but the resident population are in the city. There can be no doubt that if the elections be held in May, under the system of free suffrage, New Orleans would elect the governor and a majority of the legislature. The true policy would be, then, to diminish the influence of the city. He wished the city to retain that proper weight to which she was entitled, but he would neither have her permanent interests nor those of the country sacrificed, by taking the power entirely out of the hands of those that were identified with the State and its real interests, and transfer them to a mass of persons who had nothing at stake, and who were reckless of all consequences.

Look at the city of New York. Is it her merchants that control her elections? or is it the population to which he had alluded? We should look into the future. We should diminish or preclude the influence of a class not identified with our local interests and peculiar institutions. If the power be suffered to pass into their hands, the resident population throughout the State will be suppliants; they will be at the feet of their masters. All history teaches us an example. The house of representatives in the United States; the house of commons in England; the chamber of deputies, are the governing and directing powers. The reason is simple, they have the power of raising money, and appropriating it. Hence we see that, in England, Queen Victoria courts the commons; Isabella the Cortes; and Louis Phillippe trembles before the chamber of deputies. These bodies have the appropriation of the funds, and money governs the world.

He was no lawyer, and had not the eloquence of the gentleman who had answered his arguments. He felt under obligations to the gentleman who had last spoke (Mr. Preston) for his compliments, and returned him his acknowledgements.

Mr. Conrad of Orleans, expressed a desire to address the house, but as the hour was advanced, he moved for an adjournment until to-morrow at 10 o'clock, which motion prevaled.

Friday, January 17, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceeding were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. Nicholson, of the Methodist Church.

The President submitted a letter from Bishop Blanc, in reference to an invitation to the Catholic Clergy under his charge, to open in turn, the proceedings of the Convention with prayer.

Mr. Ratliff, on behalf of the committee on contingent expenses, brought to the consideration of the Convention a claim from Mr. Kelly for one hundred and fifty dollars for printing. He desired to ascertain the wishes of the Convention in relation to said claim, and at the same time suggested that it would be proper to confer authority upon the committee to pay similar claims for services rendered to the Convention, without the necessity of troubling the Convention with them.

The President remarked that the proper course was to report the claim to the Convention, and to take the sense of that body thereon.

On motion, the committee were authorized to pay Mr. Kelly the amount due him.

Mr. Downs presented a resolution authorizing the sergeant-at-arms, under the direction of the president, to provide suitable places for the reporters of newspapers within the bar, and seats without, for the accommodation of the public.

Mr. Ratliff said, before adopting this resolution he would like to inquire what would be the expense? He was not disposed to have seats placed without the bar for the public, which would be monopolized by the first comers, and which would exclude the greater portion of the public; for these seats would necessarily occupy considerable space, and those that were not fortunate enough to get in in time to occupy them, would be compelled to retire altogether. He thought it better not to provide seats; the whole space in the lobbies being left open for the accommodation of the public, those that become fatigued or uninterested with the proceeding or debates, would retire, and give place to others. It would happen that our lobbies would be sometimes crowded and sometimes not crowded. When they were crowded we could not provide seats for all, and it was better to leave every one in the same condition. Do not provide seats for some few, which few would exclude the many. On the principle of economy, too, said Mr. Ratliff, we should spend no more money than is indispensably necessary to complete the great work for which we are chosen. The members of the Convention, with commendable liberality, have refused to receive mileage for repairing to the city of New Orleans to attend their duties. Let us carry out the principle—that is the true doctrine. If we provide chairs they will be broken; and if it be benches, the whole space will be occupied and rendered inaccessable to the great mass. The Convention by a vote, which he regretted, had refused to invite and provide seats for the members of the legislature; and now, we are asked by this resolution, to provide seats for the people! Let us, at least, be consistent in what we have done. If the powers of eloquence of this honorable body cannot charm the public to come and hear us—if we cannot interest them by the importance and interest of the topics we shall discuss, he, for one, was indisposed to go to the expense of placing cushions for the convenience of some, while many others would be unable to penetrate into our lobbies, by the very room which those seats would occupy. The gentleman (Mr. Downs) who proposed this very resolution, was a distinguished member of one of the bodies of the legislature, the members of which were excluded by the rejection of the resolution which invited them to seats in their own bar; he certainly regretted the result. But inasmuch as we have taken that course, let us not make any invidious distinctions. He (Mr. Ratliff) had never heard that seats were provided by other legislative bodies for the accommodation of spectators; it was not done in congress, to his knowledge, and why should we incur this additional expense. We have adopted the principle of economy, and let us not incur one dollar's expense which is not indispensably necessary.

Mr. Downs said the gentleman (Mr. Ratliff) made "much ado about nothing;" "a tempest in a tea pot." It was but a small matter. The house of representatives of the State, of which body the gentleman had been a member, had seats provided for the public; so had the senate, as the gentleman (Mr. Ratliff), if he did not know, could easily see by a visit to the lobbies of that body. If congress had not seats provided for the auditory, it was the first time he had heard it. He regretted to see the gentleman (Mr. Ratliff) making so great a display about nothing. If the State be so poor, so impoverished, that she cannot provide seats, be it so; that was the only argument that could be adduced; but he could not concur in it. The gentleman had spoken of the fate of a resolution inviting the members of the legislature to seats within the bar of the Convention. It was true that resolution was lost, but he apprehended it was through inadvertency; it was, however, totally unnecessary, as by one of the rules adopted yesterday, all officers of the State and of the United States, were privileged to seats. Did he understand the gentleman (Mr. Ratliff) to say, he was sure the gentleman did not mean it, that we should exclude the public, by refusing the conveniences which are necessary upon their attendance, and that we should shut ourselves up like another star chamber, and exclude the public scrutiny? He begged the Convention to excuse him for troubling them with so small a matter.

Mr. MARIGNY remarked that seats had been provided at Jackson, for the accommodation of the public. He could see no reason why the same courtesy should not be extended to the public of New Orleans. The committee of arrangements in Jackson, of which, he believed, the gentleman (Mr. Ratliff) was chairman, had expended three thousand dollars to fit up the hall for the accommodation of the legislature. The committee of arrangements, in New Orleans, have expended but one thousand dollars.

Mr. DOWNS' resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Convention resumed the consideration of Mr. Sellers' motion to strike out September, as the period for holding the general elections, which was under discussion when the Convention adjourned yesterday.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD said, before the question was put to vote, he had a few, and a very few remarks to make, and he made them rather with a view of explaining his own position than with the expectation of influencing the opinions of others whose minds were, without doubt, finally made up.

When the report was made last summer by the majority of the committee on the legislative department, fixing September as the period for holding the general elections —a period which was to extend through all time—as long as the Constitution we were now forming would endure,—he was at a loss to determine what were the motives that influenced the committee in this selection. He had heard various months suggested by various members, but until the report was made, he had never heard the month of September recited among them. He had held his judgment in suspense, to hear something to justify that selection, and had listened with the expectation that the chairman of the committee would enlighten the Convention upon the subject, but had listened in vain; that gentleman had not vouchsafed to enter into any explanations, and it would seem, that the duty had devolved upon his colleague from New Orleans (Mr. Marigny) to explain the motives that governed the committee. He certainly had no objections to this course, it was very well, but it authorised him to take it for granted, that the member (Mr. Marigny) had uttered and explained not only his own motives but those of the committee that made the report.

The PRESIDENT said it was not in order to attack the motives of members; much less to infer their motives from what may have fallen from one of their colleagues in debate.

Mr. CONRAD said, the president certainly labored under a misapprehension. He attacked no man's motives. Those of the gentleman (Mr. Marigny) were, without doubt, laudable and patriotic, as were the motives of the other members of the committee that concurred in recommending the month of September, as the proper time for holding the elections. He merely understood the gentleman (Mr. Marigny) as, not only giving his own views for the preference, but those of his colleagues on the committee that participated in that opinion. He understood the gentleman to be the organ of the committee, and to have given verbally the reasons that actuated the committe in reporting the month of September. Surely, he was not out of order in examining the force and cogency of those reasons.

The PRESIDENT said he had no design of restricting the gentleman. He had merely cautioned him of the rule.

Mr. MARIGNY hoped the gentleman would be allowed the utmost latitude. He would, however, inform that gentleman that the opinions he had expressed upon the subject were his own, and that he had not taken upon himself to interpret or to express the views of any of his colleagues upon the committee. He was perfectly willing that the gentleman should analyze his motives.

Mr. CONRAD said, it would seem that the misapprehension of the President had extended to his respectable colleague. He repeated, again, that he contemplated no assault upon motives. He had presumed that the member was the organ of the committee and had expressed their views, but if this were not so, unquestionably the gentleman was the organ of himself, and his arguments were proper matters for examination.

He had listened with profound attention, with pleasure, to what had fallen from that gentleman, and concurred—cordially, heartily concurred in most of his sentiments. It was truly remarkable, that while he concurred in those sentiments—while he admitted the force and cogency of the gentleman's arguments, he differed totally from him in his conclusions, that to place the elections in the month of September, would be a sovereign remedy for the evils so gloomily but faithfully depicted by him, as the result of universal suffrage unrestricted, unguarded by any of those checks and balances which the peculiar position of this State appeared to render so indispensably necessary. He had said it was remarkable that he participated in the apprehensions of the gentleman, as to the calamities that would attend such a system, and yet could not vote for the proposition presented by him as so efficacious a remedy; while on the other hand, he differed from almost, if not every position of the delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston) with whom, however, he concurred in the vote that delegate would give upon the question. He would take the vote of the delegate from the parish of Jefferson, and the argument of his colleague from New Orleans. The gentleman from New Orleans had taken as the substratum of his argument, the ground work to establish his positions, that the Convention were about to adopt the principle of universal suffrage, without any of those salutary checks, any of those wholesome restrictions that prudent sagacity would dictate—without any checks or balances whatever. The gentleman, he repeated; had drawn a gloomy but faithful picture of the disorders—the calamities of such a system, and had presented an admirable argument against it. The gentleman had exhibited in vivid colors what would be its inevitable tendency—that it would stifle the voice of the real and permanent population of the State, and place her true interests at the mercy of those having no identity of feeling or of interest in common with her—commit her destinies to strangers, and the substance of her children to be devoured by those "birds of passage" that flock among us for a brief season, and then fly away to other regions.

The gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Marigny) had drawn attention to the peculiar condition of things in this State. To the large proportion of slave population in the country, and to the peculiarity of a large commercial city, entirely disproportioned, in population and in wealth, to the balance of the State. He had argued from the ratio of increase of population in this great city, that her population must increase more rapidly than that of the balance of the State, and that unless some means be devised to prevent such consequence, transient persons—persons who have no attachment to the soil, and no permanent interests at stake—"birds of passage," as he has aptly termed them, will obtain possession of the government and dethrone the owners of the soil—those identified with it by interest and affection, and supersede them in their rightful authority. He predicted this result, unless some means should be adopted to preclude it. The remedy that he suggests, as all powerful, is to fix your elections in September.

Now, Mr. President, (continued Mr. Conrad) I am far from believing that this Convention is prepared to adopt any system, from which such consequences can flow. I am far from believing that it is the wish of the citizens of the State—the owners of the soil; those whose families, whose interests, whose affections are bound up inseparably with Louisiana—that such an unfortunate and mischievous system should prevail. I do not believe they would ever permit the management of their affairs to be confided to persons not identified with them in feeling and in interest. It would be a gross violation of the will of your constituents—a shameful betrayal of your trust, to displace, by any act of yours, the rightful, the legitimate owners of the soil from their just ascendency, to thrust them out to give place to strangers—to "birds of passage;" and not only "birds of passage," Mr. President, but birds of prey that would perch upon the vitals of the State and devastate her institutions.

The people of Louisiana, Mr. President, said Mr. Conrad, assuredly were far from anticipating such a result to the labors of this body; when consulted, it was true, they decided in favor of amending the constitution, but they never had the remotest idea that any thing so dangerous would be entertained, much less consummated. It was true, that the popular feeling was in favor of an extension of the right of suffrage—that it should be enlarged, and that the defects, which experience had pointed out in the existing constitution, should be removed. They were anxious that the restricted system of suffrage which now prevailed, should be so enlarged as to extend that privilege to a more numerous class of citizens; they were disgusted with the evasions and perversions to which, perhaps, the system itself gave birth; but in extending the right, they wished that extension to be accompanied by some guarantee—some assurance against the recurrence, not only of the abuses they had witnessed with pain and mortification, but against other and graver abuses that would result from that extension, if adequate checks and proper remedies were not provided. Far from him was the design to impute the irregularities and violations that have been perpetrated of late upon the ballot box, to this or that party in particular, to this or that class of citizens. He disclaimed all such intentions, and was actuated here by no party feeling. All men and all parties may have been more or less to blame, but he had yet to learn that any portion of the State desired to see those evils realised which have been so gloomily, yet so faithfully and eloquently depicted by his colleague (Mr. Marigny.) If that gentleman could only have convinced him that such a design was entertained in this Convention, and that holding the elections in the month of September would be an effectual check; while he would have resisted with all his powers, the mischievous principle itself—unlimited for evil, without guards and without checks—he should have united heartily upon that or any other expedient which would preclude or even lessen the calamity. He was yet to learn that the design was seriously entertained by any one here, to break down the walls which have been raised for the protection of the true interests of the State, for their preservation—to destroy the bulwarks erected by our forefathers for the salvation of our institutions and our liberties—to widen the breach so far that all may enter, be they whom they may, come from where they may—wafted to us by every breeze and by every billow, and floated down to us like so much driftwood upon the broad bosom of the Mississippi. That all these, just by the mere accident of touching our soil, should be converted into citizens, and marched to the poll to stifle our voices! He could not credit such a design as being actually entertained in this body by any one, and he would not believe it until it was manifested to him by the yeas and nays upon the journal.

But suppose, said Mr. Conrad, that my colleague (Mr. Marigny) is right in his alarming conjecture, and that I am wrong in doubting it. Do I misapprehend the efficacy of his remedy? The question is will it prevent the evils he apprehends? I think not. If the system he anticipates be actually entailed upon the State it is quite immaterial to me. I do not care when the elections take place, in what month, from January to December. The consequences will inevitably ensue let them take place when they may. It must be borne in mind that many of the natives, many of the resident population of New Orleans, those having a visible interest, absent themselves during the summer months. Some of the 'floating' population whose influence in our elections the gentleman (Mr. Marigny) so much fears, do the same thing; but the great mass remain; they have not the means of quitting the city, nor is it always quite convenient for them to do so. The city may hold out to them some inducements to brave even the redoubtable yellow fever, and as far as some of them may be concerned, there is not much choice between the yellow fever on the one hand and starvation on the other. This numerous class, at least nine-tenths of that population, actually remain, and would be as ready to vote in September as in January.

The only effect then, of the gentleman's proposition would be to exclude such of our citizens as might be absent on business, for pleasure, or for health, while the privilege of suffrage would be open to unrestricted exercise on the part of those he so much dreads, it would be denied to those who, even under our present restricted system are entitled to a vote, merely because they happened to be absent at a particular season of the year, when sickness and inactivity reigned. It would result then, that a respectable class of our community would be disfranchised, few in numbers in comparison to the population that have excited so far his apprehensions, while the right of suffrage would be accorded to a mass, for whose fidelity we possessed not the slightest guarantee, for where one American citizen leaves the State for a few months, a thousand transient persons either arrive or remain. That would be one consequence of the gentleman's proposition to disfranchise some of our best citizens. He predicted to us the mischief that will follow a system of universal suffrage, unrestricted, unlimited, without any checks whatever, and then he tells us with the most positive confidence: select the month of September for your elections and you do away with the evil: you preclude the calamities that will inevitably result from that baneful system of unlimited universal suffrage; that is, you may adopt a vicious and imprudent system, if at the same time you provide a remedy. You may administer the poison if you will, but take my antidote! We must make ourselves sick to enjoy the satisfaction of testing the gentleman's sovereign panacea! As well might we attempt to cure a vital disease by a plaster upon the finger, as to attempt to arrest the host of evils which he has so truly and faithfully depicted, by placing the elections in September! As well might we attempt to stop a creavasse caused by the mighty Mississippi by a wisp of straw, or a shovel full of earth! The evils and calamities must ensue, if you adopt the system; they are inseparable from it if you do not provide some limits, some checks, some means of prudent restraint. Let us take a retrospective glance at the population, to whom the gentleman has referred. They are a moving, "a floating population," some of them may remain for one, two, or three years, may have passed though the fiery ordeal of the yellow fever one summer, and then may leave the city as unexpectedly as they came into it, with as little feeling of identity, as little interest in its prosperity, as they had the very first day they landed upon its shores. This is the class of persons whose influence would be deleterious to our elections. I fully concur, said Mr. Conrad, in that opinion with my colleague from New Orleans, (Mr. Marigny) but I altogether deny and controvert his position, that by placing the elections in September, you may extend to them with impunity the right of suffrage, as they will not be present to avail themselves of the privilege. This is a falacious and visionary notion, and God forbid that we should trust our safety to it, exposing ourselves heedlessly and recklessly to the danger, which in the gentleman's opinion, would make the expedient.

I would, said Mr. Conrad, not create the mischief, and then the expedient of the gentleman, admitting it to possess the efficacy that he claims for it, will be unnecessary. I am glad, however, that the gentleman expressed himself so decidedly, because it is in earnest that he appreciates the evils of unrestricted universal suffrage, and knowing them and deprecating them with the force he has, it is not reasonable to infer that he will contribute his vote to impose so serious a calamity upon his country. The right of suffrage, I readily admit, Mr. President, ought to be defined with liberality; but to make it of any value —to prevent the greater possible evils—it should be guarded, it should be fenced in by proper checks and balances. The main thing is to exclude those migratory residence among us—that have with us no identity of interest or of feeling, but are merely with us to subserve some purely personal purpose, and are ready in a moment to be wafted back from whence they came, or any where else, and turn their backs upon us; they should be excluded from the extraordinary privilege of controling our elections; but at the same time in doing this, we should exclude no citizen, no man that offers positive guarantees of his attachment to the country, be those guarantees either in his possessions, or affections from the privilege of suffrage. We may inquire and determine upon what conditions the privilege may be accorded; this is essential to the well being and safety of the body politic, but when once the privilege is granted, we should, by every means in our power, facilitate its exercise. We should not give the boon with one hand and withdraw it with the other. Once conceded, the concessions, as the conditions, should be final. The wheat should be first separated from the chaff, and that done, the utmost equality should prevail.

No citizen should be despoiled of his right to vote, nor should he be called upon at an inconvenient orinopportune moment to exercise the privilege.

The gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) in the philanthropic dreams that have been excited by his vivid imagination, had depicted in glowing colors the advantages that would accrue by making the State the great recepticle for people from all the world; and in his profound sagacity has discovered a new and novel system of political economy, and that is this, that we may by recruiting our population, it matters not of what materials, extinguish all our public liabilities—not by dollars, but by extending to the new comers all the privileges of citizenship at once, upon their arrival, and increasing thereby, indefinitely the number of voters at the ballot box! If this new system of the gentleman could only be realized, it would confer upon him immortality, and would entitle him to the eternal gratitude of mankind. But it somehow unfortunately happens for the gentleman's theory, that the State of Mississippi, which has embraced universal suffrage, has formally repudiated her indebtedness. If the principle of the gentleman has no other merit, it has at least that of perfect originality.

The only question involved in fixing the time for our elections, is one of convenience. We are not now prescribing the qualifications of electors; that point, one of transcendant importance, is not before us in the decision of the present matter. We are only determining at this time the period when the electors shall cast their suffrages, and that question is one of pure convenience. That is all. The only criterion is the convenience then of the voters. Who shall be entitled to the privilege of suffrage, is another and distinct proposition.

I have heard, said Mr. Conrad, a great deal of declamation; I will not say on this floor, about the inestimable privilege of suffrage. Without doubt, it is a great blessing, a great boon; but, sir, it is not the only great blessing. Life, health and liberty are certainly not inferior to it in importance. Without doubt it ought to be justly prized; and if it be justly prized, it will not be extended to those that are unworthy to exercise it—whose very touch would pollute it. It ought not to be extended but upon proper considerations of sound policy; but when once it is extended, it becomes the absolute property of him who has acquired it; and its possession should be implicitly respected; it should no more be interfered with; we have no more control over it than over any other individual possession, over life, liberty or property. It should no more be sacrificed than any of these; on the contrary, every thing should be done to make it valuable, and to facilitate its exercise upon every proper occasion.

The question, then, continued Mr. Conrad, resolves itself into this: which is the most convenient season for the voters generally? which is the most convenient month? Surely there is no one member of this body that will lay his hand upon his heart, and say with sincerity, that it is September.

If I were called upon, said Mr. Conrad, to select one particular month, the most inconveneient in all the calendar of months, I would select September. That it is so excessively inconvenient appears to have been its only recommendation to the committee; and this very inconvenience is assumed as one of the very strongest arguments for its selection, by the gentleman who has defended that selection. It will exclude some of the voters; and, as I have demonstrated, Mr. President, among that class of voters which, under the strictest and most confined system of suffrage, would be entitled to the privilege. The very circumstance of their being absent during that month from the State, is siezed upon to disfranchise them, and that, while the notion is entertained that suffrage ought to be given to every body else. The utmost latitude, and the extremest opinions are to prevail in reference to suffrage, with one only restriction, and that is to effect exclusively a particular class of our citizens; they are to be cheated out of it; it is to be filched from them, if they dare to go beyond the limits of the State, and remain beyond this fatal month of September; they are to be forbid its exercise. Why should they pay so heavy a penalty? The month of September is known as one of the most disagreable, if not the most disagreeable in the whole year. It is excessively warm and unhealthy, and both mind and body suffer from its relaxing influence; it is at this period that one feels least disposed to exertion, It is then that the fevers to which our climate is so unfortunately exposed, appear in their worst and most aggravated form.

The Convention met in this month at Jackson, and what was the consequence? Although that place is one of the healthiest localities in the State, they felt it indispensably necessary to adjourn; they were afraid for their own safety, as well as for the safety of their families, during their absence from their homes at this most inauspicious and critical period of the year. Some of them that voted against the adjournment returned to their homes to find some of the members of their families sick, and in some instances a more serious calamity.

The inconveniences of the month of September were by no means, then, peculiar to the city. It was a period of sickness and death too, in the country; and, as regarded the inconveniences of voters, these inconveniences were greater in the country than in the city. In the city it was nothing to attend a precinct of election, they were so numerous, and so near to every citizen that they might almost be considered at his door. But in the country it was quite different; the nearest precinct of election was frequently at the distance of some miles from the residence of the voter; and to get at the polls, he had to brave the noxious influence of a September sun. It was at this time that his presence, too, was most indispensable upon his plantation. Either some one of his family or some of his slaves were laboring under some sudden attack of fever, or were liable every moment to fall sick with some of the prevalent diseases. It was a notorious fact that our climate, neither in the city nor in the country, was favorable to good health in the fall months. Now and then it became necessary even for an habitual resident to go abroad to recruit his health. But admitting that it was a trip of mere pleasure; why compel any one to forego the pleasure or the wish? Why do this?

Another reason which he (Mr. Conrad) could not find it in himself to condemn, because it was attended with beneficial results, was the practice for candidates for the popular suffrage, to go round and communicate, interchange and express their opinions and sentiments to those whose votes they solicited. If the elections be fixed in September, those visits woul have to be made in the months of July and August, if made at all, and they would impose a dangerous risk. A gentleman who stood deservedly high with one party, and was admired and respected for his talents by the other party, fell a victim to the fatigues of an electioneering campaign, undertaken at about the same season of the year—Mr. Richard Winn, of Rapides, a candidate fer congress. His early and premature death was an irreparable loss to his party and to his friends. Another gentleman who stood deservedly high, and who had once been a candidate for governor, while on an electioneering tour or visit to the Lafourche parish, at the same season of the year, was sun struck and almost lost the use of his eyes. Why should our elections be placed at a season when candidates are precluded from visiting the people, or exposed to a fatal danger if they do?

It is not alone in reference to the city that the inconvenience would be felt. Besides, the residents of every city in the world, are in the habit of frequently quitting them in the summer season. Cities are no where favorable to health. The residents of London, among that class who are affluent, are in the habit of quitting it in the summer, and spending three or four months beyond its dingy atmosphere. So too, with the gay and fashionable Parisans, and even so far north as St. Petersburg, many of the inhabitants retire in the summer beyond its precincts. So, too, in the United States, in the principal cities in the north and south; in New York, as well as in Boston and Charleston; in Mobile, as well as in New Orleans. they retire to some of those verdant shades—some of those flowery prairies, so poetically described by the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Preston). That gentleman knows, and I know, said Mr. Conrad, that fixing your elections in September would not materially effect the transient population of the city. It would effect that numerous class of our citizens who seek for relaxation and repose; upon the whole coast, from the gulf to the bay of Pensacola, in the summer months—from the mouth of the Mississippi to Baton Rouge, and from Baton Rouge to the prairies of Attakapas. Why should the elections be held in their absence?—where is the necessity first? Is it to preclude that class of persons to whom the member from New Orleans has so frequently alluded "as birds of passage?" He (Mr. that effect; those "birds of passage," that flit across our horizon for a season and then are seen no more, even Conrad,) denied that it would have at present, with the numerous evasions of our laws of election, and with the breaches that have been made upon the constitutional restrictions, do not exercise any striking influence at the ballot box, as is perceptible from the mayors' elections, which are held in April. It would not be these that would be excluded by fixing your elections in September. But it would be those worthy citizens who have established themselves among us; who are deeply involved and interested in our destinies; who have built their nests among us, and have made this city their roosting place. Some of their sons and daughters are to be seen in this very room at night, moving through the mazy dance.

These are the citizens whom you disqualify by fixing your elections in September, and that because they do not choose to expose themselves, or some female member of their family to the cruel ordeal of the yellow fever—that political baptism which is the severe test to be ordained as the only proof of their patriotism and their devotion to the State. The gentleman (Mr. Marigny) is a native of Louisiana, and has been exempted by his birth from that baptism; he is therefore, ignorant of its tortures and its suspenses; did he but know them, Mr. President, I am convinced from his well know humanity and benevolence, that he would be the last one to require so awful a proof of good citizenship. It bears a striking resemblance to that religious baptism which prepares one for another and a better world—its fountains are diseased; its ministering priest is the physician; and death but too often the sponsor!

When we are young, and have no families dependent upon us for their daily bread, we can recklessly encounter dangers, even for what is less valuable than the right of suffrage. But when we are invested with the responsibilities of providing for the wants of those to whom we are bound by the most solemn and sacred ties, our lives become precious indeed; it is then we desire life and are least disposed unnecessarily to peril it.

His colleague, (Mr. Marigny) in examining the evils that would result from a general system of universal suffrage—unlimited and unrestrained—had directed his exclusive attention to a few citizens, whose influence in our elections, in no event, would be pernicious, and entirely overlooked a numerous class of persons, who offered no guarantees whatever, for a proper and becoming exercise of the elective franchise. As a matter of right, of justice, I insist (said Mr. Conrad) that nothing shall be done to exclude, or to render inconvenient, the exercises of the right of suffrage to those that are entitled, and who have for a series of years exercised that privilege. But while I say this much, and am willing to extend within proper limits the elective franchise, I can by no means participate in the opinion of the delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston) that we would be justified, or that it would be good policy to grant it to every body—Tom, Dick and Harry, that may have set their feet upon our shores within the last twenty-four hours: to the offscourings of the earth. I make a distinction between that class of persons and those that would alone be excluded were the proposition of my colleague (Mr. Marigny) to prevail. If that proposition prevails, and we send out the new constitution with it, we shall inflict a mortal stab upon our offspring. We shall send it out with the seeds of internal disease, and it must come to a premature end. If the American people have one sentiment that is peculiar to them, it is their abhorence of injustice. I care not from what quarter it may come. If in an instrument professedly designed to extend the right of suffrage, there should be so gross an attempt to restrict it and to preclude it, you may depend upon it, Mr. President, the people will not submit to it. Their voice may be feeble at first, but it will not be long before there will be one general burst of indignation. It will not be long before they will be heard knocking at the doors of your legislative halls and demanding another Convention. The new constitution cannot stand with any such principle in it.

I have done! If I have not convinced others, I have at least made known to my constituents my opinion, and I am ready to abide their judgments.

Mr. Downs said that if he had not designed to address the Convention, and to unfold his particular views upon the proposition before the Convention, the attempt made by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Conrad) to make him, with the other members of the Convention, not only responsible for the particular period recommended in the report, but for the arguments assumed by the member (Mr. Marigny) to sustain the proposition in its favor, would constrain him to offer a few words of explanation.

[Mr. Conrad said that he had had only inferred that the report embraced the current opinion of the majority of the committee.]

Mr. Downs: the gentleman even in that is mistaken. I, for one, differed with the majority of the committee, upon that particular point. It was agreed to make the report to the Convention, with the understanding that those who differed in opinion on any matter therein, should, if they chose, sustain their objections before the Convention. I regret, said Mr. Downs, that the gentleman should have fallen into this mistake, inasmuch as a similar charge was made at a period very interesting to that gentleman and his political associates, and it was as flatly denied by me in the Jeffersonian.

[Mr. Conrad: that is the very first time I have heard any thing of the matter. I do not receive the Jeffersonian.]

Mr. Downs: after the elaborate and very able arguments that have been made against the proposition, I find myself dispensed from saying much. What little I have to say shall be stated briefly.

I concur with many of the propositions of the gentleman that last addressed the Convention, as to the injustice of excluding any class of citizens who are entitled to the privilege of suffrage; but at the same time, candor compels me to say, that what fell from the gentleman in regard to the extension of suffrage, was not to my mind satisfactory. I am apprehensive of his checks and his balances. I am fearful that they mean more than might at first strike the eye. They may be convenient phrases to cover a very restricted system. I was much better pleased with what fell fron another gentleman (Mr. Roselius) on the same subject, and was glad to hear him assert that he was in favor of suffrage in its most liberal and extended form.

The gentleman (Mr. Conrad) in taking up a system for examination, would do better to consult the principles of that reform as sustained by those that advocated it than to imagine them for himself. This was a very unfair way of meeting and resisting it. As for the extension of suffrage, nothing unreasonable or dangerous was desired—at least, as one favorable to that policy, I desire nothing of the kind.

It is with regret, said Mr. Downs, that I find myself under the necessity of differing with some of my valued political friends, upon the point under discussion; I have listened with profound attention to all that has been said. The subject is, however, not new to me. I have reflected deeply—I have pondered upon it calmly and dispassionately, and the convictions upon my mind are irresistable. It is painful for me to differ with those with whom it has heretofore been my pride and pleasure to act. I deeply deplore it. But I would say to all those whose minds are not irrevocably made up, to pause and reflect. At the first blush, it may appear judicious to place the elections at a season of the year when it is presumable that most of the transient population are abroad. This ground, however, cannot be sustained—it is untenable, as mature reflection will show.

The delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Conrad) takes it for granted that if suffrage be extended, it will be conceded to foreigners and strangers. This may be the idea of that gentleman in relation to the extension of suffrage; but it is not mine, nor is it the opinion of those that act with me. When this question shall properly arise, I am, said Mr. Downs, prepared to meet and to sustain all that I may have ever advanced in relation to it.

Mr. President, said Mr. Downs, this is no new question to me.

[The President said it was not in order to extend the discussion by entering into an argument upon the extension of suffrage.]

Mr. Downs said it was very natural for one to be discussive in treating upon any one of the articles of the constitution, for there was a certain connection between some of these articles and others. It was true, the extension of the right of suffrage was not involved in the fate of the present proposition, but it had nevertheless been incidentally introduced and discanted upon very largely, during the progress of the debate.

The question when shall our elections be held, was connected with considerations of political power. His attention had been long and earnestly excited to the subject, and with this very question of the dreaded ascendancy of the city over the country, by an extension of suffrage, had he entered into public life. He was indifferent to any sectional feelings on the subject. The first question with him, was as to the principles that being good, he was not to be led astray by extraneous considerations.

In 1838, the first time he (Mr. Downs) was a candidate before the people, the contest happened to be conducted in reference to this very question of the aggrandizement of the political power of New Orleans, by the extension of suffrage. That contest was a most exciting struggle, the most exciting that he has since then passed through. A bill had been introduced into the legislature, to extend the right of suffrage by imposing a poll tax. His opponent resisted the passage in the legislature, and voted against it on the ground that it would increase the influence of the city, and thereby prove dangerous to the country. He (Mr. Downs) replied to that argument, and announced distinctly that if the principle was right in itself, it could not be affected by any such local considerations. The question was thoroughly examined, and the tickets of each candidate were headed by the principles they proclaimed. The question was then presented to him, and he decided it. He has since reflected upon that decision, and has seen no good grounds to doubt its accuracy.

He disclaimed being actuated by any local feeling of partiality towards New Orleans. That great city stood in too imposing an attitude to be placed in an inimical position, to the balance of the State, because she might possess the preponderating influence. He considered New Orleans the city of the State, and as much his city, (although he did not reside within her borders, and probably never would,) as if he were an actual resident. She was not only the city of Louisiana—but the city of the great west—the city of half an empire, destined to hold more than half the population of the United States.

He assuredly did not think it good policy to engender feelings of dislike and jealousy between New Orleans and the country. They were both essential to each other, and the laws made for both should be uniform, as far as possible. It happened, however, that large commercial cities sometimes required a different kind of legislation; it was only when this was indispensable, that he could sanction any distinction between the city and the country.

He earnestly entreated his friends before committing themselves to a final vote, to examine and to ponder well all the arguments upon the question. The right of suffrage was a most important privilege, and nothing should be done to impair it. According to the maxim "the truth was powerful and would prevail," he wished to see the principle of suffrage carried out in its purity, free from all cliques and all undue influence. Any other free suffrage was not his free suffrage. He wished every free white male citizen of the United States to have a voice at the ballot box. He could not vote, therefore, for any restrictions—direct or indirect—which would deprive the qualified voter of his right. He was for that reason opposed to fixing the election in September, inasmuch as it would operate against many citizens that choose to be absent. He characterized September as the most dangerous month in the whole year, and it was sufficient for him to be aware of the fact, to select some more appropriate period. He was not for the "yellow fever qualification," as one of the city papers had aptly termed the effort to place our elections in that season of pestilence!

The object of an election (said Mr. Downs) is to bring out the popular will, and the nearer we can approach to a full expression of that will, the more perfect the system.

As has been justly observed during the discussion, the month of September was as objectionable to the country for holding the election, as it was to the city. It was essential to the comfort of the citizens that there should be some period of rest—some period of general repose. Even the steam engine that is in full operation to go to St. Louis, must pause and have a rest. It would be a strange anomaly if man alone was to be denied the sweets of repose from his exciting pursuits. The summer was our period of rest. It was the siesta—the Sabbath of the State.

These were some of the considerations, hastily urged, that would induce him to vote in favor of the motion to strike out the month of September. We should impose no hardships upon our citizens; we should not deny them the privilege of going abroad whenever they were disposed, and least of all, we should not make the important and inestimable privilege of suffrage, the penalty. He would never consent to debar them that privilege, and he could not, therefore, vote for the proposition.

Mr. Peets desired saying a few words before giving his vote. He should vote against the proposition to strike out "September," but his reasons for doing so were somewhat different from those that had been urged. He was not governed as a member of that committee by any party feelings. He totally repudiated and disclaimed all such motives. His solicitude was to ascertain what would be for the benefit of the whole State, and when he was satisfied upon that point, he would vote accordingly.

The true principle, in his mind, was that the time for holing the general elections, should be at the most convenient period for the mass of the voters; their convenience ought to be consulted and respected.

He did not entertain any very great apprehensions of the influence of the city. She gave at present six thousand votes, and the balance of the State could poll about twenty-one thousand. Admitting that by the extension of suffrage, her vote would be increased one-third more, that did not present any very alarming disproportion.

The great proportion of the population of Louisiana was agricultural, and their interests and convenience, forming as they did the mass, ought surely to be taken into account. It might happen that by bringing the elections on in September, some of the citizens of New Orleans might suffer some inconvenience, but they were only a fraction of the population. It was certain, that if you brought on the elections early in the fall, it would be inconvenient for the planters to attend, if it were possible for them to do so, by reason of the inundation of most of the streams. Mr. Peets instanced, that with last election, the voters in the section of country he had the honor to represent, were compelled to float on logs to get to the polls. That period of the year was quite unsuited, particularly as regarded the country on the Red river and the Ouachita, it being for the most part inundated.

Mr. Miles Taylor said he was a member of the committee that made the report, recommending the month of September. He did not believe that in the committee, he had concurred in the report by voting for it; in fact, he had been unable to participate much in its labors, on account of his bad health. If he were, however, mistaken in his recollection, and if he had voted for the report, he did not feel bound to vote for it here, if the arguments he had heard had changed his opinion. From all that had been urged, it seemed to him important to ascertain first, what were the qualifications of the persons to be admitted as voters. He wished that point to be defined, and when it should be settled, we would encounter no difficulties in fixing the period for the exercise of the elective franchise.

In conformity with these views, Mr. Taylor moved to lay the motion of the delegate from Concordia (Mr. Sellers) on the table, as well as the article of the constitution, until the article defining the qualifications of voters was adopted.

Mr. Sellers thought the present question had no bearing with the question of suffrage. They were distinct; the only matter under consideration has been discussed, and let it be decided by a vote.

Mr. Miles Taylor thought it the best course to lay the motion and the article on the table until the question of suffrage was decided.

The question was taken on Mr. Taylor's motion, and it was lost.

The question then recurred on Mr. Sellers' motion, to strike out September and leave the month in blank, and was decided by yeas and nays as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Brent, Briant, Burton, Cenas, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia,

Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Mayo, Mazureau, Penn, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder—48 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brumfield, Cade, Carriere, Covillion, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Peets, Porche, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Voorhies, Waddill and Wederstrandt—20 nays.

Mr. WINDER moved to fill the blank by inserting "June."

Mr. GUION advocated the adoption of June, as being the most convenient. The principle had frequently been acknowledged during the discussion of what was the proper time for holding the elections, that the convenience of the voters should be consulted. It would suit both the sugar planting interest and the cotton planting interest, to place the elections in June. He was in favor of fixing them for the first Monday of June.

Mr. SELLERS said the object of the delegate from Lafourche (Mr. Guion) and his own were identical, they differed only as to the means. He considered November infinitely preferable to June for the accommodation of the people and the reception of votes. June was a healthy month and so was November, but he thought November preferable.

The yeas and nays were called for on Mr. Winder's motion to fill the blank with June; the following was the result:

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Boudousquié, Briant, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand Saunders, Voorhies, Winchester and Winder—29 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cenas, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Humble, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Penn, Porche, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Jefferson, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill, Wadsworth and Wederstrandt—40 nays.

Mr. MCRAE proposed to fill the blank with October.

Mr. ROSELIUS said that the same motives that induced the Convention to reject September would induce them to reject October. All the reasons that applied to the one, applied with equal force to the other.

The yeas and nays were called on Mr. McRae's motion.

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Humble, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Penn, Porche, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Voorhies and Wederstrandt—26 yeas.

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquié, Bourg, Briant, Burton, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Preston, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, Ratliff, Saunders, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder—41 nays; the motion was consequently lost.

Mr. BURTON thereupon moved to insert the month of November, and called for the ayes and naps:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Penn, Porche, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Waddill Wederstrandt and Winder—33 yeas.

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Lewis, Mazureau, Ratliff, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Splane, Trist Wadsworth and Winchester—34 nays; so the motion was lost.

Mr. BURTON proposed the second Monday in November.

Mr. EUSTIS said it was always with diffidence he addressed the Convention, and offered his views upon subjects with which he presumed others were much more familiar. It was with great deference he differed in opinion from those gentlemen that addressed the Convention in support of the several periods deemed by them most suitable for holding the general elections throughout the State.

It had been remarked by a member, and the remark appeared to meet with general concurrence, that it was exceedingly unwise to make any change in the old constitution, unless the changes could be for the better. He had listened with earnest attention and great pleasure to what fell from the gentlemen in discussing the proper period for holding the elections, but he had heard nothing that satisfied him that the period fixed by the old constitution ought to be changed. That period has been established for thirty years, and the very diversity that exists in relation to any other, would seem unerringly to indicate to us the propriety and expediency of maintaining it.

The gentleman from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) it is true, has told us of the high waters that prevail at that particular season of the year in the district represented by him, and has complained of the great difficulty experienced by the people there to get to the polls. This is the only reason given why the period fixed in the old constitution should be changed. Admitting it to exist, the question occurs is it sufficient to induce us to appoint another time? In July, it happens that the waters are occasionally high: they are sometimes high, but generally they are low. Taking it for granted, however, that in the district of Ouachita they are always high in July, and that it is some inconvenience to the voters to get to the polls if the elections take place then, would we be justified in order to accommodate the people of one district —of one portion of the State—to change the time to another period that would be inconvenient to the balance of the State?

We have heard (said Mr. Eustis) many eulogiums pronounced upon the old constitution. He did not agree in the extravagant praises that have been lavished upon it. He did not believe that it deserved them, and if he were to say he did believe it he would not speak the truth. It had been said that it was a good constitution. He never believed it was a good constitution.

The proper guards for the amendments or alterations we should make to the constitution, are the defects or imperfections that experience have pointed out. Do the interests or convenience of those that sent us here require a particular change? Apply this test to determine whether it be expedient.

The appointment of the particular time to hold the elections is a high political question. It is a most important question of political power. Some gentlemen contended that the elections ought to be fixed in the month of September. This proposition had but few advocates, and could not be sustained upon reasons of sound public policy. He (Mr. Eustis) disdained all other considerations. To fix it at that time, would be to deny to a class of our citizens the privilege of suffrage, and it would be debarring them the exercise of political power. It would be despoiling them of a right, which was as much their property, and should be held as inviolable as their possessions. To refuse it to them, and yet extend the right of suffrage, would be a gross and palpable inconsistency.

The arguments which should preclude the Selection of September, apply with equal force to October, and have so fully been explained in the debate, that it is unnecessary to repeat them.

The time when the elections should be held, is nothing more nor less than a question of political power. Before that issue all other considerations sink into insignificance.

In 1812, when the constitution was formed, the same question of political power existed as in 1845. The period chosen has been consecrated by the experience of thirty-two years, and has been unattended with inconvenience. We have seen what has been the fate of the propositions appointing other periods; and he, Mr. Eustis, would submit it to the judgment of the Convention, to those members particularly who have expressed so much veneration and attachment for the old constitution—a sentiment in which, by the way, he did not participate, inasmuch as he believed society would have made more rapid advances, and the general prosperity of the State would have been greatly accelerated without it, to exhibit a little of that feeling of attachment never exhibited on this occasion; and since they could not better, to respect a provision that had stood the test of thirty-two years.

Mr. Ratliff said he sincerely concurred in what fell from the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Eurtis). We have heard no complaints against the period fixed by the constitution for holding the elections. It was better, then, to leave it untouched. He entertained a high veneration for the constitution; some portions he considered very defective, and those he should like to see changed; but in other respects he was for leaving the constitution as it was. If, however, a change was to be made, and some other period was to be substituted for July, he was decidedly of opinion that April ought to be selected. It was a healthy season of the year, and the water was low. Within his recollection the Mississippi had only once broken over its banks in April. His only object was to obtain the largest possible vote; he thought April favorable to that purpose, particularly with the establishment of convenient precincts of election. If the period were to be changed, he considered the first Monday in April as the most desirable time for all sections of the State; but he was very willing to leave the constitution untouched in that particular respect.

Mr. Guion concurred with the delegate from Felician (Mr. Ratliff) as to the month of April being a convenient period for holding the elections. He was opposed to the proposition of the gentleman, (Mr. Burton) because it would bring our State elections on at the same time every fourth year with the presidential election. This was with him a very serious objection. The qualifications of candidates for State offices would be forgotten and swallowed up by the all-exciting consideration of who should be President. This would be a great calamity, and would deprive the State of the services of the best and most useful citizens, who otherwise would be elected without an unfortunate reference to party politics and party excitements.

Mr. Beatty said he concurred with the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Eustis) in considering the present question as a question of political power. It is a question as to who shall enjoy the sovereignty of the State of Louisiana. Shall it be confined to those who only are interested in the welfare of the State, or be left open to those who have no real interests, and who, if they have an interest, have another and a predominating interest elsewhere? To persons who have no identity with the State, and in fact, form no real portion of the community. He referred to the disparity in the number of votes given at the last election between the second municipality and the first and third municipalities, taken in aggregate. The second municipality had given more votes than the other two put together. That was a result quite unanticipated, and was a source of great astonishment. Were we to believe that illegal votes were cast? It was certainly the general impression that there were more voters in the first and third municipalities than in the second. How were we to account for this remarkable result? Were we to suppose that all the voter in the first and third municipalities did not vote? The occasion was one to secure a full vote. Either we were compelled to adopt the hypothesis, that all the voters did not vote, or believe that the second municipality gave a greater number of votes than the other two, a conclusion that was not established by the census, and which we were not prepared for. If neither of these conclusions were true, then it was to be inferred that illegal votes had been cast.

Mr. Beatty expressed himself in favor of retaining the section in the constitution as it was. He considered that under the section it was designed that the elections should be closed in one day. They had been extended to three days. He considered that extension unconstitutional. But so as to make the provision more positive, inasmuch as it had been interpreted differently, he was willing to insert an express clause to that effect.

The month of July was usually healthy, and fixing the elections then, could not preclude any one from the privilege of suffrage. Few persons were in the habit of absenting themselves so early, and if they were disposed to do so, as the elections came on but once in two years, if they valued the privilege as they should, they would willingly forego their design for a few days, until the elections were held. If they were not disposed to do this, they were unworthy of the privilege, and the exercise of it could not be to them a matter of any serious consideration.

Mr. Beatty concluded by moving the first Monday of July.

A motion was made for adjournment, and the yeas and nays were called upon said motion. It was negatived—ayes 25, nays 43.

Mr. Claiborne rose to a point of order, that no motion could be entertained for fixing a particular day in a particular month. The motion should be restricted to the month, inasmuch as the month alone had been stricken out of the report of the committee—the particular time was still in the provision—September alone was stricken out.

The Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. Garrett moved that the blank be filled with the fourth Monday in November.

The Chair decided that this motion was not in order.

Mr. Garrett expressed an intention to appeal from the decision of the chair.

When, on motion, the Convention adjourned until to-morrow, at 11 o'clock, a. m.

Saturday, January 18, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and the proceedings were opened with prayer.

Mr. Garrett stated, that he would not appeal from the decision of the chair, upon his motion which was decided to be out of order, to fill the blank with "the fourth Monday of November."

Mr. Boudousquie hoped the question would be taken on Mr. Eustis' motion to fill the blank with July. He considered that motion to be first in order.

Mr. Splane moved to reconsider the proposition of the member from St. Helena, Mr. Burton.

Mr. Grymes said, in accordance with the rule that required a certain notice to be given, he would notify the house of his intention to introduce a proposition in relation to this vexed question.

He did not consider it a part of his mandate, to struggle for this particular day, month, or year. Nor did he think it material, that one particular period should carry over another, inasmuch as that, as well as the whole article, could at any time be brought to the consideration of the Convention. To vote upon the proposition now was merely pro forma, as every article and section were subject to revision until the constitution was signed. All these squabblings about one particular period in preference to another was, to his conception, but small game. His purpose was not to propose any particular day. He was as willing that the Convention should determine upon November, as any other time. He did not consider it as irrevocable. But in order to put an end to this contest, he would inform the Convention, that he designed presenting a proposition—let whatever time be fixed upon—to strike it out and leave it to the legislature to select such time as they may think most fitting. If the Convention were so disposed, they could at once proceed to the consideration of his proposition, and if it was carried, the matter would be put to rest. In his judgment, it would be more appropriate to leave the decision of this question to the legislature.

Mr. Boudousquie moved that the Convention proceed to the order of the day, being the unfinished business under consideration when the Convention adjourned yesterday.

The President decided that the motion to reconsider was first in order.

The question was taken on Mr. Splane's motion to reconsider the vote on the proposition for November, and the motion to reconsider was carried in the affirmative.

The President announced, that he had appointed on the committee of revision, Messrs. Eustis, Roman, Miles Taylor, Brent and Mazureau.

Mr. Penn moved that the Convention proceed to consider the vote taken upon November.

The President decided that the unfinished business had the precedence, which was the motion of Mr. Eustis to fill the blank with July.

Mr. Penn appealed from the decision of the chair.

The question was taken and the decision of the chair was maintained.

Mr. Ratliff said he had a few remarks to make, and his object in making them was less to occupy the time of the Convention than to define his own position. He had the misfortune to differ with some of his friends, and he wished to set himself right as to the grounds he assumed, and the points of difference between them and him.

To his conception the members of this body were delegated to make a constitution, to define who were citizens, and what privilege they would enjoy. When these privileges were defined, they were entitled to all the benefits of them. This was the position he occupied, and this was his guide of action.

In carrying out this fundamental and essential point, we must resolve the question which is the time most convenient and most advantageous to all. Which is the period that will enable the greatest number of votes to be cast; that will bring to the ballot box the greater number of citizens.

We should first establish in the constitution what is essential to entitle one to become a citizen. To acquire the immunities and rights of citizenship—to become one of us. And then determine upon the essential principle, that all shall enjoy equal privileges and equal rights in the exercise of the inestimable privilege of suffrage, as well as in the enjoyment of all other rights appertaining to citizenship. No one should be put to inconvenience further than the nature and circumstances of things should require, and the same uniform and general rule should apply as well to the inhabitants upon the inundated lands of Red River, as to those in the swamps of Catahoula. The citizens of New Orleans, of Rapides, of Baton Rouge, should be placed upon a proper equality as regarded the facilities for exercising their rights of suffrage.

Let us suppose that all the citizens of the State were congregated here in person for the purpose of choosing that period which was most eligible to them for the exercise of suffrage. What time would they select? Would they choose an inconvenient period, when the voices of the mass would not be heard—when it might be stifled and unworthy and unfaithful agents might be foisted upon them by bribery and corruption? Or would they select an eligible time, when the voice of every citizen, high or low, rich or poor, might be heard. Let their will dictate to us our duty. We are sent here to express and to carry into force that will, and if we fail to do so, we are recreant to our sacred trust—we are recreant to all our pledges.

This, Mr. President, continued Mr. Ratliff, is the pure democratic doctrine. It is true democracy. I do not allude to party democracy, but to the sacred principles of democracy, independent of party; and when a whig comes up to that standard, which they do sometimes, I am ready to go heart and hand with him. What democrat will gainsay this doctrine? What democrat will say that the public servant should not be brought to the scale and his principles weighed? If I cannot get that principle not only recognized, but adopted, which secures the expression of the whole voice of the people, then, Mr. President, I shall remain in a minority. No local feelings shall ever actuate me. I do not say they have any place on this floor. I trust, and hope in God they have none! When the people thought fit to choose me to the proud station of representing them on this floor, I was no candidate, Mr. President; I did not go about electioneering. I was represented as a red hot locofoco, but my constituents knew that I could raise my voice above all party considerations whenever principles were endangered—that I preferred, whenever there was a conflict, principle to party. That all personal, all political considerations should, to my humble judgment, give way to the necessity of framing a good constitution—a constitution of which we never should be ashamed—one that would stand the test of time—that it would reflect the will and wishes of the people, and would carry out those essential and fundamental principles indispensable to their safety, happiness and prosperity. I determined, Mr. President, if I could do no good, to do no harm, and never give occasion to myself for bitter self-reproach. In saying that much, I considered I said a great deal.

These, then, are the broad principles I would lay down, and by them I would determine the most eligible period. First, as to September; that month has been urged upon us, but it has been conclusively shown that there are inseparable objections to it. It is a period of sickness and death; of absence from the State of many valuable citizens. For these, and other powerful reasons that have been advanced, it would be an unfortunate and partial selection. To October the same arguments apply as to September; it, too, is a period of sickness and of absence. If we select November, there are likewise to it many valid objections, the principal one of which is all powerful—that in every fourth year our State elections would occur about the same period with the presidential election, and that our local affairs and interests would be swallowed up by the all absorbing consideration of who should be president; and party politics would be stimulated constantly among us by the results of the elections in some of the great States of the north and west, whose elections would precede our own. These, Mr. President, are weighty apprehensions to my mind. Then as to July. It is objected to this month that the weather is extremely hot, and that one gentleman lost his life in undertaking an electioneering campaign during that season of the year, and another was seriously endangered, and that these dangers would preclude candidates from interchanging sentiments with the people, unless in their anxiety to be elected, they choose to eucounter the imminent peril of their lives. We are told too, again, that the people on Red River and Ouachita, owing to the high stage of the waters, were under the necessity of remaining at home at the last election, or of going to the polls upon logs. This surely is a serious inconvenience, and is extremely hard, that a voter cannot exercise the privilege of suffrage without embarking on a log, or upon a raft, or paddling his own canoe.

The facilities of voting certainly ought to be as great as can be devised; precincts of elections ought to be multiplied, and the people should in every way be encouraged to express their views upon men and measures. Men and principles should constantly be kept to the test of public opinion. In this way, Mr. President, you make the people independent of demagogues; you secure an enlightened, a pure system,—a republican system—be it whig or democrat.

I listened said Mr. Ratliff, with profound attention to the eloquent remarks of the gentleman from Jefferson; to the able arguments of the gentleman from New Orleans and of the gentleman from Ouachita. It is with great diffidence I enter the lists with such giants, that I attempt to re-echo the reverberation of their cannon. Delicacy and a conscientiousness of the feebleness of my powers, would deter me from saying any thing after the able discussions we have heard. I was under the conviction that I had a duty to perform ; that I am bound to express with the limited powers I possess, the wishes of my constituents, and to express their sentiments. I will not be recreant to that responsibility; I shall never shrink from a faithful and bold discharge of the duties I have assumed. I will not be a silent and inactive member; and if I could not stand up in defence of the rights of the people, I would resign, and go home to those that sent me here.

If I were called upon to select a proper time for holding your elections, Mr. President, with my hand on my heart, and in all sincerity of conscious rectitude, I would pronounce in favor of the month of April; and I do think, sir, if the present constitutional period should be changed, no period so eligible could be found in the whole calendar of months. One objection against maintaining that time has been referred to in the eloquent remarks of the gentleman from Caddo, that the voters in that portion of the State were obliged to go on rafts and canoes, or forego the most noble privilege of freemen.

Mr. Ratliff said he had reached the grand climacteric in years, when it was not very convenient to tell one's age. He was born in Louisiana, and he had some experience of the high waters which prevailed. In all his experience he knew of but one overflow in the month of April. In that month the weather is fine, and the roads are good. But, it is said, that this season is too busy a period for the planter to absent himself. He denied the assertion. and he had some knowledge that the contrary was the fact. If he ever acquired a reputation for any thing, it was for being a tolerable good overseer. No good farmer or planter would be in a position not to repair to the polls, to exercise the privilege of a freeman, from the second to the third Monday in April, or even earlier. But he considered that the most convenient time. April was one of the healthiest months in the year, and with the democratic principle of the extension of suffrage, facilitated by the establishment of convenient precincts of election, would be the most desirable for the people at large. And if the period for electing members to Congress be placed in April, another advantage would result. The representatives would be elected and delegated fresh from the people, and not, as it is now unfortunately the case, be elected one year in advance.

Mr. Ratliff contended that it was not in reference to the affluent that the period of elections should be fixed. To the rich man, to the man who owned one hundred, fifty, or even five negroes, there was no difficulty for him to get to the polls. He could leave when he pleased, and even charter a steamboat to transport him. Not so with the poor man; with the industrious hard-working farmer, the honest mechanic who was assiduously shoving his jack-plane. They could not leave at all times, and all periods were not convenient with them. And yet the poor man had equally his interests to protect in legislation, and his privilege of suffrage was just as valuable, and his interests ought to be equally consulted. In the spring he could vote without any great inconvenience—he could go to the polls without alarming apprehensions for his family; but in the fall it was quite otherwise. It was the convenience of the yeomanry, the honest yeomanry of the country, we should consult. It would be inconvenient for the poor man to go to the polls in the fall; he might have a sick family; would be stopped. The partner of his bosom or one of his children might be taken sick, and as he was just going to start for the purpose of fulfilling the inestimable right of suffrage, he would be arrested by the intelligence that little Ben was sick of the chills and fever.

I am, said Mr. Ratliff, a practical man. I take a common sense view of things, with the intellect God has given me, and he has given me his share—I mean, Mr. President, my share.

Mr. Ratliff concluded by stating that he was opposed to the fall months. They were sickly as well in the city as in the country. It was at that season of the year of that dreadful pestilence which was more fatal than the yellow fever—he alluded to the congestive fever—prevailed. He was decidedly in favor of choosing April for our elections, otherwise, if that period did not carry, he was for continuing July, which was consecrated to us by the old constitution.

Mr. Sellers craved the indulgence of the Convention for trespassing upon their patience, or rather he might say, their impatience. The district which he had the honor to represent, in part, on this floor, was deeply interested in the determination of the present question. It was true, we were not defining in so many words, directly, who should exercise the right of suffrage, but we were doing so in point of fact. In his district there were a number of citizens—of persons entitled to and exercising the right of suffrage, who absented themselves in the month of July, and who, if the elections were fixed for that period, would be debarred the privilege of suffrage. It was not material to enter into an examination of their motives for quitting the State at that particular season of the year; whether it was for pleasure, business, or apprehension of the epidemics that prevailed in the fall months, not to attempt to determine how far it was prejudicial to the interests of the State. True it was, they come under the denomination of "birds of passage." At least that expression was applied to them; but, whether deserved or not, one thing was certain, they had paramount interests in the State—having all their property involved, they were deeply interested in it by being the possessors of property which was useless except attached to the soil.

He could not believe it was sincerely contemplated to exclude them, and yet to fix the elections in July would not only have that effect, but likewise it would throw many obstacles in the way of that population, in his district, that never left the State. The stage of water that usually prevails at that time of the year, was so high, as to inundate the country, and preclude the possibility, without great difficulty, of getting to the polls. The result of the inconvenience of holding the elections in July were exhibited in the fact, that in his district nine hundred votes had been cast in the elections of that month, when in the succeeding month of November, fourteen to fifteen hundred votes were cast. The consequence, it was plain to see, was this; that if the month of July be mentioned, many of the legal voters actually resident, all the time, would continue to be excluded, not to mention the numerous class of voters that leave the State and return from the beginning to the end of November.

These, and a good many other reasons that he might adduce, but which he abstained from stating at this time—deeming what he had said to be sufficient, would induce him to vote against the month of July. The policy, it seems, had been recognized, that the time to be fixed should be the most convenient to all the citizens, and this being settled, as well as the design to extend the right of suffrage, he could not conceive that it was the intention of any one to throw shackles around the exercise of that privilege, and to prevent its exercise. Believing that the selection of July, as proved by experience, could exercise that tendency, he should vote against that month.

Mr. Guion said he would prefer a month in the spring. But failing in that, his second choice was to adhere to July.

He proposed the first Monday in May.

Mr. Chinn said that to him personally, it was a matter of no consequence what particular time was selected. But after listening to the various suggestions, he was inclined to think that the latter part of April or the beginning of May, was the most opportune period. If it be designed by the Convention to secure the fullest expression of the public will, then it must be conceded that this result will be more likely to be attained by fixing the elections in the spring, than at any other period of the year.

Mr. Mayo sustained the first Monday of November. It was the most eligible period in the year, and most convenient to all. In the spring months the planters were busy. The roads were good in the month of November, and, in almost all respects, that period was the most convenient. He should reserve his vote until the question was put on the first Monday in November.

Mr. Splane declared his preference for November.

Mr. Culbertson would inquire of the mover in favor of November, if he would consent, if November were carried, to place the day in that month towards the middle or towards the close, and would not insist on the first Monday? If that was the intention of the gentleman (Mr. Splane) he would vote in favor of filling up the blank with November.

Mr. Splane: any day in November, I am willing to accede to.

The question was taken on filling the blank with November, and the yeas and nays were called for.

Mr. Claiborne said he would vote affirmatively, but he was in favor of a later period than November.

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cenas, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Leonard, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Read, Roselius, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill, Voorhies, Wederstrandt and Winder—48 yeas; and

Messrs. Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Mazureau, Ratliff, Roman, Ledoux and Trist—17 nays.

Mr. Benjamin did not rise to debate the question. He was aware that the house were already exhausted. He had some facts in hand which would go to show, that if the period were fixed in November, it ought not to be before the latter part of the month; otherwise a large number of voters would be excluded from the polls, which, from the vote that took place on another occasion, he judged was not the intention of the Convention.

Mr. Benjamin then read a list exhibiting for the last ten years, the duration of the yellow fever at its periodical visitations. It seldom happened that the disease was entirely extinct before the close of the month of November, or the beginning of December.

Mr. Kenner moved the fourth Monday of November, and called for the yeas and nays. Yeas 32, nays 35.

Mr. Claiborne moved for the third Monday in November.

Mr. Waddill asked for a division of the question.

Mr. Claiborne contended that the question was not susceptible of division.

Here a discussion arose upon the question of order, in which Messrs. Claiborne, Ratliff and C. M. Conrad participated.

The PRESIDENT decided that the question could be advocated.

The yeas and nays were called for upon the motion to strike out the "first Monday."

Mr. WEDERSTRANDT sustained the first Monday in November, as the most eligible period for holding the elections.

The result was 28 yeas, 39 nays.

So the house refused to strike out the first Monday.

Mr. PENN moved for the adoption of the section as amended.

Mr. CULBERTSON gave notice, that having voted with the majority for November, he would move for a reconsideration on Monday.

Mr. MAYO moved to fill up the second blank by inserting "1845."

Mr. BEATTY moved that said paragraph be laid on the table subject to the call of the Convention.

Mr. DUNN gave notice that he would move for a reconsideration of his vote on November and July, on Monday next.

Whereupon, the Convention adjourned to Monday next, at 11 o'clock, a. m.

MONDAY, January 20, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. PRESTON.

Mr. VOORHIES presented a memorial from a respectable citizen of Attakapas, suggesting amendments to the constitution.

Mr. MARIGNY moved that said memorial be laid on the table.

Mr. VOORHIES hoped that the memorial would be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read said memorial, and had read some portion of it, when

Mr. SAUNDERS moved to lay it on the table, subject to the inspection of the members.

Mr. VOORHIES said he hoped the motion of the member (Mr. Saunders) would not prevail, and that the reading would go on.

Mr. KENNER said that if this document were allowed to consume the time of the Convention by being read, it would establish a bad precedent. The Convention would be obliged to ilsten to similar communications, of immeasurable length, whenever they were presented. It had assembled for the purpose of amending the constitution, and it was the privilege of its members to suggest such amendments as they deemed necessary. It was encroaching upon this privilege to anticipate the suggestion of the members, and to ask the action of the Convention upon peculiar views of particular individuals.

He would therefore move to refer the communication to the parochial and district delegation that represented the section of the State in which the memorialist resided.

The PRESIDENT said that the reading of the paper had been called for, and that call had been seconded. It was for the Convention to decide whether the reading should go on.

Mr. CULBERTSON would inquire if the majority could control the reading of the paper? Was there any rule to that affect? He had heard nothing uncourteous or improper in the paper.

The PRESIDENT said that there was an implied right that all such papers should be read. But if the Convention did not think they were relavant, the reading could be dispensed, and they could be disposed of as the Convention might think fit.

Mr. TALOR of Assumption, said that the decision of the President was sustained by the thirty-first rule; it was founded upon reason. If the the reading of the document were called for, and after the reading had commenced, it was found that the time of the Convention were uselessly consumed it could be arrested, and a disposition might be made of the paper. He was as unwilling to prevent the reading of any suitable paper as any one. But he could not believe in the propriety of taking up the time of the Convention with long disquisitions upon government. We had met to consult and advise upon what amendments were necessary to the organic law. If persons out of the Convention wished to enlighten us upon the reforms we ought to make, they have ample opportunity of communicating to us their views in private intercourse. And besides this, the press is open to them for a full exposition of their thoughts.

The PRESIDENT would interrupt the gentleman. The chair had decided the question, and it was not in order to discuss it.

Mr. MILES TAYLOR said, it was not his intention to discuss the matter. He would move to lay the memorial indefinitely on the table.

Mr. VOORHIES called for the yeas and nays to lay the memorial indefinitely on the table, and the result was as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porche, Prudhomme, Pugh, Read, Roman, Roselius, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor, Trist and Winder voted in the affirmative—40 yeas; and

Messrs. Brent, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, King, Leonard, O'Bryan, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Scott of Feliciana, Voorhies, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the negative—21 nays.

Mr. SOULE asked to be excused from voting. He was not present when the discussion began.

On motion, Mr. Soulé was excused.

The PRESIDENT submitted a letter from J. A. Kelly, printer to the Convention, asking three hundred dollars, on account of printing done by him.

Mr. GARRETT moved that the president be authorized to draw a warrant in favor of said Kelly for the amount claimed; but subsequently modified his motion to refer Mr. Kelly's letter to the committee on contingent expenses.

Mr. RATLIFF objected. He said that the duties of the committee on contingent expenses was to examine claims that were actually due. It seemed that Mr. Kelly asked an advance. If it was a claim due the printer, then it would be a legitimate subject of examination for the committee. He was a working man and would never object to any labor that might be imposed upon the committee, provided it fell within the appropriate functions of the committee. But he would not consent that the house should give this matter the go-by, and divest themselves of the responsibility, by throwing it upon the committee. If in their judgment the claim ought to be admitted, why then, pay it; if not, reject; they knew Mr. Kelly's situation. He was in want of money to enable him to prosecute the printing for the Convention.

When a small claim was presented by Mr. Kelly for work actually done, he (Mr. Ratliff) asked the sense of the Convention whether it should be paid, and they decided that it should. But the present matter is essentially different. It is for them to say whether the money asked for by Mr. Kelly, shall be advanced or not.

The PRESIDENT said the member from Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) misapprehended Mr. Kelly's letter. His demand was for work done.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD thought that some rule ought to be adopted for all similar claims, which would relieve the Convention. If some fifteen or twenty minutes are to be consumed by an examination of the accounts of printers, the labors of the Convention would be materially retarded.

The motion to refer prevailed.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the section fixing the period for the general elections.

Mr. MAYO said, that there was a misapprehension in taking the vote upon the motion he made yesterday. It was understood by himself and some other members, that the question was put upon another proposition. Besides, he had voted with the majority, and he was entitled to move for a re-consideration. His motion was to fill up the last blank with "1845."

Mr. BEATTY said that his motion was to lay the gentleman's (Mr. Mayo) proposition, to fill the blank with 1845, upon the table, subject to call, and that that motion was carried.

Mr. VOORHIES said that he labored under a similar impression as the gentleman from Catahoula, (Mr. Mayo.)

Mr. CENAS made a similar statement.

The PRESIDENT said the question would be upon the motion of the member from Catahoula, (Mr. Mayo) to reconsider the vote, laying his proposition to fill the blank in the third section of the second article with 1845, upon the table.

The question was taken and decided in the affirmative—Yeas 31, nays 30.

The PRESIDENT said the motion of the member from Catahoula (Mr. Mayo) to fill the blank with 1845, was before the Convention.

Mr. MAYO said that the question of constitutional reform, had been a subject of great interest with the people for the last six or seven years. They were anxious to know what the Convention would resolve upon. The people expected a liberal policy in regard to suffrage, and a more just and equal system of representation. They wanted to know when they were to enjoy the privileges of extended suffrage. The public officers, too, wished to know when their term of service would expire.

Mr. READ was in favor of an early period, and of fixing the time as proposed. It was his opinion, however, that it would come in more appropriately in the schedule.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD participated in a similar opinion. The schedule provided for the governor and other officers, and he saw no reason why the legislative department should not be included in it. It was evidently unnecessary to act upon this subject at present.

Mr. BEATTY moved to lay the motion on the table subject to call; the yeas and nays were asked, and they were as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brent, Briant, Carriere, Cenas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Eustis, Garcia, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Peets, Penn, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Read, Roman, Roselius, Saunders, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Voorhies, Wadsworth and Winder—47 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Covillion, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Mayo, Porter, Porche, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Ratliff, Soulé, Waddill and Wedsretrandt—17 nays. So the motion was laid on the table, subject to call.

Mr. CULBERTSON said that he had given notice on Saturday last, that he would move to reconsider the vote fixing the elections on the first Monday in November. Upon reflection, he doubted whether the motion would meet with any satisfactory result. Every available month had in turn been proposed, and in turn voted down, with the exception of November, and the majority did not appear disposed to go beyond the first Monday of that month. He would have preferred June, May, or the second Monday in April. He apprehended a motion for any of these periods would not succeed, and hence, he would withdraw his motion for reconsideration, and give way to the gentleman from Feliciana (Mr. Dunn) who had made a similar motion for reconsideration.

Mr. DUNN moved to reconsider the vote for the first Monday in November.

He said, he hoped the Convention would be actuated by a spirit of compromise in fixing the time for holding the elections. That spirit had influenced him. We had been told, and the fact was notorious, that the yellow fever prevailed in New Orleans until a late period in th month of November. This induced many citizens, who absented themselves to avoid the epidemic, to keep away until the danger was passed, and if the elections were brought on at such a time, they would be excluded from the privilege of suffrage.

He trusted that this consideration would not fail to have its due weight with the majority. For himself, he preferred the month of July, but was disposed to relinquish it, inasmuch as he had been told that by reason of high water in some sections of the State, it would be excessively inconvenient for voters resident in those sections to attend the polls.

It was incontrovertible that the majority ought to govern, and to enable the majority to declare their sentiments, the elections should be held at that season of the year when the full expression of the public voice could be heard.

He trusted that the sober second thoughts of the majority would convince them of the injustice of placing the elections at any period of the year, when a large portion of the legal voters would be absented. It was a question of fact whether the city of New Orleans was not exposed to the fatal effects of the epidemic at the beginning of November. If that question were decided in the affirmative, and it could be resolved in no other way, why then, was it not evident that a gross wrong would be done to the citizens of New Orleans by requiring them to cast their votes at so unpropitious a period? Why not extend the time for twenty days longer; that would evince a spirit of compromise, and a disposition to carry out the principle of convenience, which should be extended to all parts of the State.

Another reason, that ought to have great weight, was that the presidential elections every fourth year, came on at this identical period. It would be a great misfortune to connect general with local politics.

If the first Monday of November be maintained may it not be inferred that there is something more than the convenience of some particular locality involved? If that period be insisted upon, he (Mr. Dunn) would not say an intentional wrong was contemplated, but unquestionably there was the semblance of wrong?

We should be ready to render full justice to all; to place political power in the hands of those to which it legitimately belonged, and to do this we should consult the interests and the convenience of all. He was influenced upon this floor by no party considerations, it was not a question of whether whig or democrat should profit, but a question of what was right, just and proper. If there be any thing improper or unjust in the constitution we were about forming, it will incur the risk of being rejected, for the people will not ratify injustice—they will not sanction oppression.

Mr. Dunn concluded by an appeal in favor of compromise—of concession; if no period (said he) can be selected, generally acceptable, or more acceptable than the period fixed in the constitution, why then, the best policy would be to maintain that period, consecrated as it is, by thirty-two years' experience.

Mr. WADDILL, with a view, as he stated, of giving the present matter the go-by, for the present, offered a resolution appointing a committee of five to inquire and report upon the number of votes given at the municipal elections, and those given at the presidential elections.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, in order to give further time for reflection, and in order to obtain the information contemplated by the gentleman from Baton Rouge (Mr. Waddill) moved that the matter lay on the table until to-morrow. The information obtained might induce the majority to accept of July as a compromise.

The motion to postpone was lost.

The PRESIDENT stated that the question before the Convention, was the reconsideration of the vote taken upon the first Monday in November.

The question was taken, and it was negatived.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to reconsider the vote given upon the month of July. He had voted against that month with the majority.

Mr. RATLIFF considered this motion to be out of order: If this course were sanctioned, it would lead to interminable proceedings. Twenty votes might be taken on the negative and affirmative of questions that might arise in one day, and the next day we would have forty motions for reconsideration. He did not conceive how the gentleman could go back and raise the question of July. The motion to reconsider November, being lost, it appeared to him that all other motions to reconsider other periods, were out of order.

The PRESIDENT said that according to the rule, the question of July could be reconsidered. If the house determined to reconsider that vote, it did not displace November, it only placed the whole subject again within the control of the house. This was his understanding of the matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH said, in conformity to the rules, he would give notice of his intention to move a re-consideration of the vote upon November. By giving two day's notice, he thought himself within the rule, and any time thereafter he could call for question upon the reconsideration.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD said that the gentleman (Mr. Wadsworth) would have to specify in his motion when he intended to take up the question of reconsideration.

Mr. CLAIBORNE participated in the opinion of his colleague from New Orleans, and made some remarks to sustain that contradiction of the rule.

Mr. WADSWORTH then gave notice that on Thursday next, he would move for the reconsideration.

Mr. BENJAMIN gave notice that he would move, on the same day, for a reconsideration of his vote upon the month of July.

Mr. KENNER inquired of the chair whether there was any rule requiring motions to be submitted in writing.

The PRESIDENT replied that motions had to be reduced to writing when any member required it.

Mr. KEAD moved the adoption of paragraph 3d of the section.

Mr. DOWNS moved to amend the 4th line by inserting after the words "the general assembly shall meet on the third Monday of January," the following: "immediately after the election." Adopted.

Mr. CULBERTSON moved to strike out that part of the section that authorised the legislature to fix another period for their meetings, than that appointed by the constitution.

The question was taken, and it was negatived—33 in favor, and 35 against.

A motion was made to adopt the paragraph, which lead to a slight discussion whether that motion was in order, in which Messrs. Conrad, Roselius and Taylor of Assumption, participated.

Mr. BOUDOUSQUIE would ask a simple question of the chair: whether questions that had been negatived could be reconsidered? If they could, it seemed to him the Convention could make but little progress. Every question that had been debated, discussed, and voted down, could be brought up de nevo before the Convention. Were there any limits to these reconsiderations of articles of the Convention?

The PRESIDENT replied that this was the dilema to which the Convention were reduced.

Mr. KENNER: So far from being a dilema, it was the intention of the Convention.

Mr. PRESTON moved to amend the 3d section so as to make the sessions annual, instead of biennial.

Mr. CLAIBORNE hoped this amendment would not be carried. Experience had shown that the frequent sessions of the legislature tended rather to prevent bad, than secure good legislation. The principle of biennial legislatures was found to work well, wherever it had been tried; and in addition to that consideration, and many others that might be adduced; it was a great economy.

Mr. PRESTON said that his views upon this subject were not hastily formed, with but little reflection. It was not necessary for him to say a great deal in support of the principle. The reasons that decided his judgment, would occur and carry conviction to every man that would take the trouble of investigating the matter.

In the first place, experience indicates to us the expediency of adhering to the system. It has been in operation among us for thirty years, and each succeeding legislature has had ample business to engage its attention. To this experience of our own, we unite the experience of twenty-four of our sister States, who have adopted and continued the same system.

The only exception to this almost general rule, are the States, he believed, of Mississippi and Tennessee; and if the former State has only biennial sessions, there are so many called sessions, that it is equivalent to holding annual sessions.

Then, continued Mr. Preston, in addition to the thirty years' experience that we have, we find that in every constitution, including the constitution of the United States, and bating the two instances to which he had referred; in all the constitutions adopted before and after the constitution of the United States, and comprising a period of nearly sixty years, that this principle has universally been adopted; that it was adopted when the colonies became independent States; and that it were excited when they were colonies. It was based on experience; and was a matter of such self-evident necessity, as to be consecrated not only by our own example for thirty years, but by the example of our sister States of the confederacy.

The business of man, Mr. President, is annual. The planter makes his annual crop and balances his yearly expenses. The merchant, too, posts up his books with the end of the year, and prepares for business for another. The lawyer settles up his old business, as far as he can, and prepares himself for new, and to extend the circle of his clients. The physician does the same thing. Our judges endeavor to clear their dockets at the end of the year; and our most important officers are bound annually to make their reports of the conditions of the departments confided to them.

It is, therefore, manifest that there is nothing so extraordinary that our legislation, which should vary with the wants and wishes of the people, should be renewed or subject to examination annually. In a new country there are so many important interests to be promoted—so many new wants arising, that the business of legislation is one of the very highest importance to the community. Take one branch of the public service for an example; our revenue laws, notwithstanding the experience we have had, they remain still very defective, and do not produce all the results that can be desired. New sources of revenue, too, are springing up, which should be made available to the exigencies and wants of the State. Surely our debt is very heavy, and we require every cent of revenue we can raise—not by inferring, however, burthens upon those citizens who already contribute—but extending the circle of taxation; discovering new objects upon which it may be laid, and other classes of our citizens who should contribute their proportion to relieve the State from her embarrassments. It is necessary and proper too, that all receiving officers should be held to a strict accountability, and be compelled to answer for their stewardship at the end of every year. And who, Mr. President, can hold them so well to that accountability as the legislature.

They should obtain their quietus—I use it because it is an old term, but I much prefer the expression, a full discharge—before they should be permitted to retain their employment for a succeeding year. The treasurer of the State, too, has his annual accounts to present to the legislature. I like that portion of our constitution, Mr. President. Then again offices are to be filled—it is true, that most of the appointments are biennial, bnt in the event of death, resignation, or other contingency to the incumbent, is it not well that the branch of the government that ratifies those appointments should be in session annually, to perform that very important function. In the senate, too, is lodged the pardoning power; for, by the constitution, the governor may grant pardons, reprieves, remit forfeitures, subject to the examination and ratification of the senate. The power of trying impeachments, too, are confided to the senate. The house of representatives is the grand inquest of the whole State, as the grand jury of a parish is the inquest of that particular parish. It is their duties to inquire, and with the participation of the senate, to perfect our social system—to look into the revenues. There are now forty odd parishes in the State, and a great number of local officers, into whose conduct and fidelity the legislature is bound to inquire into annually. Why should we not adhere to that which is sanctioned to us by time immemorial, by the experience and the test of time? Why should we abandon a good system—a system that had been adhered to with but two solitary exceptions. A system that is immemorial.

But, says the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Claiborne) it is necessary to have biennial sessions in order to prevent bad legislation. This argument defeats itself, for if bad legislation be the consequence of annual sessions of the legislature, what guarantee have we that there will be only good legislation if we have only biennial sessions. And suppose but one solitary aet of bad legislation is consummated during one biennial session, how are we to get rid of it before the return of the next session, at the expiration of the two years?

I will, said Mr. Preston, mention a case in point, which will strikingly illustrate that part of the argument. During the session of 1844, a decided disposition existed in the legislature to get the State clear from all connection with banking corporations—to divorce her from those institutions. For that purpose an act was passed for the relinquishment of the interest of the State and the disposal of her stock. The conditions upon which this arrangement with the banks was to be made, was subject to the consent of those institutions, and in consideration of certain advantages allowed them, a favorable stipulation was made for private individuals, who were their debtors allowing these individuals the privilege of renuing upon the payment, say of ten per cent. inclusive of interest. The legislature, without doubt, intended ten per cent. exclusive of interest, instead of inclusive; for otherwise the debt would never be paid. The payment of ten per cent. inclusive of interest would not pay the debt in one hundred years, whereas the payment of ten per cent., exclusive of interest, would pay it in ten years. The consequence was that the banks refused to accept the law, and by that, and that alone, the State lost one hundred thousand dollars. She lost them as effectually as if so many dollars were taken out of the treasury and thrown into the sweeping stream of the Mississippi. It is a matter of wonder that the legislature have not yet corrected the error, perhaps its consequences are irretrievable, and that the banks would not now be disposed to embrace the stipulations of the law; so the State will continue to lose one hundred thousand dollars per annum, which would have been saved but for the unfortunate substitution of the letters i n for e x; for at this time when the law passed cotton was at a high price, and there were the strongest inducements to the banks to accede.

But, if we must admit the force of the gentleman's argument that bad laws are passed, why then, in the name of God, do not deprive us for two years of the faculty of repealing them. Those who may have participated in their passage will be forced by public opinion to repeal them so soon as the legislature is convened. That argument seemed to him (Mr. Preston) paramount in establishing the expediency of annual legislation. But without asserting, as the gentleman does, that there is bad legislation, the very possibility that it may occur, could be most conclusive.

Mr. Claiborne: Mr. Preston has mistaken me. I did not say we had bad legislation, but simply that the legislature occupied itself more with preventing the passing of bad laws than in the passing of good ones.

Mr. Preston: Very well. That does not prevent me from concluding that the arguments I have used are as powerful as they are just. We have as much occasion annually to prevent bad laws, as to enact good ones. Experience has proved that it is necessary to be continually scrutinizing the laws; and in supposing that the legislature errs oftener than is generally admitted, I still believe that it effects more good than evil, and that its probity will always be more useful than its blunders will be dangerous.

As to the expenses, I confess that the legislature is too long in session. Thirty consecutive days would be amply sufficient, as in South Carolina, without restricting however the executive from exercising its right of convoking extra sessions. Acting thus, the expense would be inconsiderable; twenty thousand dollars would cover all costs; twelve thousand for the sixty representatives, the seventeen senators, and twenty officers, at four dollars a day, with eight thousand dollars mileage—reducing it to that figure in consequence of the facilities for transit which we now enjoy. Assuredly, Louisiana, whose population and industry are every day on the advance, could afford this annual tax.

It is in vain you will say; there are never too many amendments in the business of legislation. A multitude of local matters must inevitably come before the legislature though even you were to leave to the police juries of the parishes of the State, the business connected with the care of the rivers, lakes and bayous, slaves and other subjects of minor importance. Observe what is passing this year! It was thought that in the presence of the Convention, the legislature would suspend its sittings. On the contrary, this multitude of small local affairs give it a glut of occupation and prevent it from adjourning. It is even possible that a great quantity of arrears will be left! It is a misfortune you will say perhaps. I agree with you; but that is another reason why I shall insist on the necessity of the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. Marigny: It is my duty, as a member of the legislative committee, and as I have sanctioned the clause which is attacked, to demonstrate its utility. If the Convention adopt the amendment offered by Mr. Preston, it will fail in its duty to itself. In fact, why did the people ask for the Convention? What else but to provide means for introducing a system of wise economy, to restrain the legislature and to prevent the State from compromising its faith, and from contracting endless debts? Every political meeting at which I have been present, has professed this doctrine; every speaker whom I have heard discuss the subject has warmly and eloquently sustained these principles and their consequences. And now the delegate from Jefferson, who has no doubt used the same language, comes forward to try to prove to us that it is absolutely necessary that the legislature should assemble every year. This is what I cannot understand. Reperuse the report of your committee, and you will find that there are now not sixty but seventy representatives, and according to every probability, there will shortly be a hundred. How is it possible that the assembly of this immense number of legislators can be brought about without an enormous expense to the State? And then, if they immediately proceed to the great object of their mission; which is not always uppermost in their thoughts?

For twenty years, during which I occupied a seat either in the senate or the house, I remarked that the session always lasted from two to three months, and out of sixty members of the latter, there were usually fifteen or twenty on leave; and proportionably it was the same case with the senate; which abundantly proves that neither one body nor the other occupied itself seriously with the public interest, and whatever might have been urged upon them to stimulate them to expedition, they never adjourned until the 15th of March, a period when it was absolutely necessary for them to look after their sugar or cotton. Thus, as men rarely change in this mode of thinking and acting, what has been will again occur, and notwithstanding all the fine oratory which may be employed on the subject, there will always be, year after year, an expense incurred of one hundred thousand dollars for the twenty-five senators and seventy-five representatives.

But the delegate from Jefferson lays great stress on certain facts, and if I rightly comprehend him, says that on correcting a single word, they had or might have saved one hundred thousand dollars. This is probable, but there is another fact which is still more important. Let us suppose that the constitution, which we are now making lasts thirty years, that our legislature costs one hundred thousand dollars each time it meets, if instead of assembling once a year, it only sits once every two years, is it not plain that at the end of thirty years you will have saved one million five hundred thousand dollars of the money of the State, without reckoning interest? That, at all events, is worth your one hundred thousand dollars.

It is true that henceforward, the State will not be permitted to pledge its faith to issue bonds, to make appropriations for the bayous Pigeon, Laviolette, &c. and that the legislature will meddle less with the public affairs, but this will be no evil, and on the other side the State will gain by it; which is all that we have a right to desire.

Very well, says Mr. Preston; but local affairs! local affairs! It is necessary that your legislature be charged with the administration of the bayous and ferries, Have you not your police juries who would readily undertake the care of these affairs? Arrange in such a manner that the legislature shall only occupy themselves with the passing of general laws, and then a session of forty or fifty days every two years, will amply suffice for the due discharge of their duty. We are not here in Louisiana as in other States, involved without hope in the intricacies of the common law, in which the lawyers alone are at home. We have one code, one written law, which every one can read and understand.

I have then the right to express my astonishment when I hear the great economist, and the declared champion of the democracy, engage you in the consideration of a project which would multiply your difficulties and your expenses, if you once seriously entertained it. There ought to be here neither whigs nor democrats; we ought all, as good Louisianians, to unite with one accord, to lay down the true principles of order and economy. It is for these reasons I shall vote against Mr. Preston's amendment.

Mr. Read remarked, that Mr. Preston had committed an error in his political statement. With the constitutions of these States in his hand, he could prove that there are seven, viz: Missouri, Arkansas, Illinois, Mississippi, Tennessee, Delaware and Ohio, whose legislatures sit only once in two years.

The President then put the question on Mr. Preston's amendment, and it was rejected, by a vote of 59 to 7.

Mr. Downs: I move that after the words January the words "which shall follow immediately after the election," be inserted.

The Convention adopted the amendment.

Mr. Culbertson: I move that the following words be omitted: "unless another day be fixed by law."

This amendment was also adopted.

Mr. Claborne: I move that the words

"during the day only," be substituted for "one day only."

This proposition became the subject of a slight discussion.

Mr. Claiborne withdrew it.

The question was then to adopt the third section of the second article, except the first paragraph, which remained for the consideration of the Convention.

Mr. Conrad of Orleans opposed it.

Mr. Downs sustained it.

Mr. Lewis sided with the former.

Mr. M. Taylor with the latter.

Mr. Boudousquie then observed to the President, that if they could thus adopt under a reservation to examine, there would be no end to their labor.

The President stated that such are the rules, and that the Convention had decided it so.

The question was then to adopt the first paragraph of the third section as amended, which was carried by a vote of 59 to 8.

Mr. Sellers: I move to expunge all the fourth section of the second article relative to the qualifications required from candidates for representatives; and the reason I assign for the motion is, that the people, even to the women, are the best judges of the qualifications necessary for a representative.

Mr. Read: I move to substitute for this same fourth section, the following words: "Every elector possessing the qualifications required by the present constitution, is eligible for election to the house of representatives.

Mr. Grymes declared that these words signify the same as those which are comprised in the section; but he made a mistake regarding the section, and was corrected by Mr. Mayo.

Mr. Benjamin: I oppose the amendment. We have not yet decided on any thing regarding elections. Why then vote in the dark? We can well understand the qualifications necessary to be required from candidates to the house, and know nothing about those which shall distinguish electors. It is better to wait a little, and not in this manner mix up section after section.

Mr. Boudousque wished to know if the section would remain subject to call, should Read's amendment pass.

The President answered it would.

Mr. Downs remarked, that in expunging the last clause of this fourth section, it would be similar to the corresponding section in the old constitution, and he therefore moved that the latter be chosen.

The President then put Mr. Read's amendment to the vote, when it was rejected.

Mr. Sellers moved that his motion be disposed of.

Mr. Guion moved that it be laid on the table, and the Convention adopted his motion.

The President: The question now is on the fourth section of the second article.

The secretary read it as follows:

Sec. 4. No one shall be elected a representative that has not attained the age of twenty-one years at the time of his election, if he is not a free white citizen of the United States, if he has not resided in the State for the two years immediately preceding the election, and the last year in the parish of which he is elected representative.

Mr. Kenner: I move to substitute the words "twenty-five" for "twenty-one," and "five" for "two."

Mr. Lewis: Divide the question.

The President: The question now is to expunge the word "two."

The yeas and nays having been called for,

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Loselius, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative —35 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Culbertson, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Leonard, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the negative—33 nays; consequently the word "two" was ordered to be expunged, and

The Convention adjourned till to-morrow at 10 o'clock, a. m.

Tuesday, January 21, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and the proceedings were opened by prayer.

Mr. Read moved for the adoption of the first paragraph, third section as amended.

Mr. Splane moved to fill the blank requiring the qualification of residence, for a member of the general assembly to one year's residence preceding the election.

Mr. Dunn prefered five years, and moved that the blank be filled with that period.

Mr. Splane said he would not make any lengthy argument in favor of his proposition. He thought the qualification of one years residence was sufficient, for he felt assured that unless the candidate gave unerring indications of his attachment to the interests of the State, the privilege of suffrage would not be bestowed upon him, whether the residence was one or two years, and that a man really designing to identify himself with the State, would be as effectually identified in one year as in five, or a longer period. After all, it was the province of the people to determine who should represent them, and they were the best judges both of the ability and fidelity of candidates. Their judgments would not lead them astray.

Mr. Miles Taylor said he was in favor of the proposition offered yesterday by the delegate from Concordia, (Mr. Sellers) to strike out all the qualifications and leave the voters unrestricted in their choice. That could very well be done, if, in defining the qualifications of voters, we took care that none but the real residents of the State, those identified with her in one way or another, should be invested with the highly important and vital prerogative of suffrage.

The most essential question was to determine who should exercise the political power of the State, and if that were properly and discreetly determined, the utmost latitude could be given to the voters to select who should represent them. It was true, it was within the range of possibilty that they would make occasionally an improper choice, but it was barely within the range of possibility. It was not likely they would abuse that freedom. It was not likely they would elect a colored person or a woman to represent them. But if it be deemed necessary to erect barriers against possible abuses, let them be effectual ones. For this reason, if qualifications were to be required, he, Mr. Taylor, would sustain those that appeared best calculated to effect the purpose for which they were intended. Consequently, he would prefer five years to one, for the residence, that being the longest period, and offered the surest guarantee.

Mr. Lewis said he would not trouble the Convention with many remarks. He had never wearied the patience of the Convention by any thing extensive, and he certainly would not do so now. If we consider the present question in its effects and influences, it was one of the greatest possible importance. The idea had been inculcated that the greatest freedom should be accorded to the masses, of which, Mr. President, you and I are units. This doctrine was beautiful in theory; but what was its practical effects? What would be the practical results of carrying out the principle of unrestricted liberty? Why, it would be an abrogation of all government! What is Government? The very term government necessarily implies restraint. It implies that some govern and others obey. Throughout, government is a restraint, and when it ceases to restrain, it ceases to be government; none govern and none obey—it is anarchy, and society is resolved into a state of nature.

It is said that sovereignty resides in the people. This is true in itself; but attempt to carry out the principle literally, and you have the republics of Athens and Sparta, which proved in the end to be impracticable. A pure, unmixed democracy is an absurdity. It is opposed to the very nature of man. Some restraints are indispensable to the protection of the minority, and if you yield that up, then your pretended government becomes a mere farce. It cannot be government unless it protects the minority, and restrains by its authority, violence and disorder. It cannot be government unless it have the force to restrain any sudden ebullition of popular excitement within bounds.

Where is the use, it may be asked, of requiring a certain well defined residence before one be allowed to enter the halls of your legislature? It is because it would be unreasonable and unsafe, to abandon that guarantee of attachment and fidelity to the State. We, the people, are liable to err, and to be led astray. We are liable individually and collectively to be swayed by our passions, and our interests; and it is wise and prudent that we should be under some of those wholesome restraints which are dictated to us in our cooler moments, as necessary and indispensable to keep us within the bounds of discretion. It is utterly absurd to believe that our government, that any government, can exist without restraint, reposing solely and entirely upon the momentary will of the people; the majority of whom are omnipotent for evil, as well as for good. The minoity must be protected from the majority, and the majority protected against themselves. This position is irrefragible. We must take the position, that there is, and necessarily must be, some restraint. We must look at the qualifications of the representative, and have these qualifications positively prescribed. It is true, we often hear that the representative is the servant of the people, but this is only true in one sense. In another, the representative is the ruler of the people. The truth may be unpalatable to the ultra democracy, the ultra democrat, and the jacobins. They may not relish the idea of submission in the sovereign people, but relish it or not, to get rid of it, they must destroy the very essence of government. He hoped there were none here who indulged in the visionary idea, that restraints were idle. To such utopian dreamers the naked fact must appear distasteful, but there it was, inseparable from any possible system of human government. In all countries, and among all people so soon as restrictions ceased, government ceased. Anarchy invariably followed the extinction of that vital principle of government.

To establish a state of society, it was requisite for each individual to give up so much of his personal liberty as was essential to the government and well-being of the whole, and which would secure to him adequate protection for the liberty he retained. To suppose, then, that he was under no more restraint than in his native state of liberty; that there was no limit to his conduct, but his feelings and his impulses involved a paradox. It was an absurdity.

Communities had the inherent right to determine upon what conditions, persons coming among them should participate with them in the administration of the government, and exclude them altogether if reasons of policy dictated it. Surely, it was within their province to determine at what time they would consider a person coming from abroad sufficiently identified with their peculiar system of policy. To say that any man, even from our sister States, who had just put his foot upon our shores, was qualified to enter our legislature, and to make laws for our government and the regulation of our property, was asserting that which common prudence and sagacity repudiated. It was an error and a folly to suppose that such persons could be eligible without any danger of their being chosen, and if chosen, without danger to the permanent interests of the State. That vox populi is always vox dei, said Mr. Lewis, I utterly deny. It is a favorite but a fallacious doctrine of demagogues. From the Peloponnesiacum bellum to the present time, it has universally been the practice of demagogues to delude the dear people by flattering them, and those who have tickled the fancies of men the most, have invariably been the most successful—I cannot say, they have proved in most cases, to have been the best qualified to fill the stations to which they were elected.

Whence proceeds, asked Mr. Lewis, so much improper legislation? It is because men are actuated too often by their sudden impulses, and go to extremities without weighing the consequences! Hence, the necessity for hedging our liberties with proper guards and restrictions: to limit the power and the possibility of doing evil, as far as human sagacity can prevail.

Can it be said that we would be acting discreetly, to throw open our institutions to the immediate control of persons who have just come among us—who do not comprehend and frequently are prejudiced against those institutions; to persons more especially who come from Europe—whose systems of government are so entirely dissimilar to that peculiar system adopted in the United States? Should no probation be required of such, to learn our system: to get rid of their prejudices? Even between Louisiana and her sister States.

there is a material difference in their respective systems of jurisprudence. Louisiana is the only State in the Union where the civil law prevails. It is the only State whose jurisprudence is derived from that pure source. And, whatever errors and fallacies may have existed in the despotic government of Rome, it is the most perfect and equal system of law, that the sagacity of man has ever discovered. With my little experience in it, I would not, (continued Mr. Lewis) exchange it for any other system under the canopy of Heaven. And, are we to entrust the government of our State to persons who are profoundly ignorant of this peculiar system of law? The gentleman from St. Mary's, (Mr. Splane,) thinks that one year's residence is a sufficient qualification for a member of the Legislature. I would ask that gentleman, from his own experience of the civil law, whether a common law lawyer, from one of the other States, could have a sufficient knowledge of the civil law, to take part, understandingly, in the proceedings of the legislature, having relation to our jurisprudence, after a residence of but one year. He would have first to unlearn all that he had learned: to get rid of his prejudices in favor of the one system and his aversion to the other: that would be a first rate step, and it would take more than a year to qualify him for the local duties, even of a police jury. I do not mean to acquire that perfect knowledge of the profession necessary to the barrister at law—that intimate acquaintance with its practice—but a general idea of what our system of laws are, what laws are actually in force, their general tenor and character; the same range of information that is possessed by our farmers and planters who aspire to be members of the legislature. And is it to be seriously argued in this body, that we would be justified in permitting strangers that have but just arrived, who do not understand our laws nor our peculiar interests, to step into our legislature, and without any preparation, at once take part in modifying our system, in directing and in controlling it? —that in our boundless liberality and generosity we should divest ourselves of political power, and confide it to perfect strangers? that we should place ourselves entirely at their mercy and under their control? For one, I am unwilling to do any thing of the kind. I believe in morals as in politics, the nature of man is frail. I cannot give my sanction to a proposition, to open the door and let persons, having no identity with the State, nor no feelings in common with the permanent population, rule us. I cannot consent that every thing should be decided at the ballot box, and that there should be no anchor of safety. I am for imposing reasonable restraints for the protection of ourselves and our children, and hedging our liberties with adequate barriers. With every breeze, the popular will may have changed, and the majority become the minority. There would be no security nor no permanence for our institutions. We would be tossed to and fro upon a tempest of popular excitement.

Let some reasonable period be then adopted that will afford us some guarantee; that will justify the presumption that those who have come among us have become acquainted with our institutions and are identified with us. Five years may possibly be too much. I am not a stickler for that particular period, although I doubt much whether the majority of those that come among us will be able to appreciate our institutions in less time. I am, however, disposed to meet discordant views upon the principle of compromise. Some period is unquestionably necessary, and upon my conscience I do not think five years too much.

Mr. Brent said, at the risk of being considered a jacobin, a demagogue, and a radical, he rose to sustain the motion of the delegate from St. Mary, (Mr. Splane,) and oppose the motion of the delegate from East Feliciana, (Mr. Dunn,) requiring five years' residence as a qualification to sit in the general assembly of the State. When the proposition was made yesterday to strike out two years, he voted against it, because he apprehended that this very movement would be made to increase that term of residence. But, inasmuch as the blank had been created, he participated in opinion with the delegate from St. Mary, that one year was amply sufficient. He concurred fully in the proposition presented by the delegate from Baton Rouge, (Mr. Read,) in the form of a substitute for the section, which provided that the qualifications of the member returned to the general assembly should be identical with those of the voter. This was no new principle. It had been consecrated in the constitutions of several of our sister States. It was the true principle of representative government, and any other was at war with democratic institutions. I contend we are not called upon—it is not our duty to impose barriers and obstacles in the enjoyment of the political rights appertaining to the people. We have no right to impose shackles which are not even to be found in the old Constitution. Our mission is to give the people greater liberties; not to restrain the liberties which they already enjoy. Is it to throw impediments in the way of popular rights, that we have met to amend the old Constitution?

But, Mr. President, to show that I am not mistaken in asserting that the principle making the qualifications of a member of the general assembly and a voter identical, is not a new one, but has been consecrated in the Constitution of several of our sister States of the Union,—I will quote from their Constitutions:

Mr. Brent read the 1st section of the 6th article of the Constitution of Connecticut; also the 4th article of the same section, and the 3d article of the 7th section of the Constitution of Virginia.

I will not occupy the attention of the Convention by reading further extracts from the Constitution of other States, showing that they have embodied a similar principle. What I have read shows that the principle is not a new one, nor is it original to this body.

It is a correct principle. It does not establish a privileged class. It does not divide our population into two classes, one to be favored, and the other not.

The President said that the debate appeared to embrace a very wide range. It would be well if gentlemen were to confine themselves strictly to the subject under discussion. It would save a great deal of time, and facilitate the despatch of business.

Mr. Brent: The point I have spoken of has a direct application in sustaining the principle of one year's residence as a sufficient qualification, as far as residence is concerned, for a member of the House of Representatives. That period has been deemed sufficient for an elector, and it is but right, just and proper, that an elector should be eligible to the House of Representatives, or any office in the gift of the people. In relation to the term of residence, is it intended that the Convention should retrogade—go backwards. Can it be possible, that we are to throw barriers not provided by the old Constitution. If we adopt the old Constitution as our guide, it requires a residence of two years. From whence comes this proposition, which requires a residence of five years. Is it to be supposed that it was the intention of the act calling this Convention, to throw obstacles and barriers in the exercise of the political rights belonging to the people. Is that the reform which they had a right to expect? I do not understand such to have been the intention of the people! But what is the practice in reference to this subject elsewhere. We find that in the constitution of fourteen of the States, but one year's residence is required as a qualification for the House of Representatives. These States embrace the oldest, the youngest, and the largest in the confederacy, to wit: Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Virginia—Ohio is silent as to residence—Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Arkansas, &c., &c. More than one-half of the members of the United States confederacy require but one year's residence, and are we to be asked at this day to impose a greater restriction? Is there any good reason why Louisiana should adopt a different principle of government from her sister States? We find some States that require a residence of two years to be eligible to the House of Representatives, to wit: Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky, Vermont and New Hampshire, making twenty-one States that do not require a greater residence than two years. The remaining States require three years, and are we to establish an odious distinction, not to be found in the Constitution of any other State in the Union!

The delegate from Opelousas (Mr. Lewis) seems to think that there is a disposition on the part of those that wish to liberalize the Constitution to abolish all law, and establish some system without control, without check.

When we come, (said Mr. Brent) to that provision to curb the legislative department, it will be seen who goes farthest to restrain, within well defined limits, the power of the legislature. I am not, it is true, in favor of proscribing or restricting the rights of a portion of the community; but, at the same time, I am as reluctant to break down society, as the gentleman from St. Landry. I wish to see established equal political rights, in which every man may participate, be he rich or poor. That the exercise of the right of suffrage shall be opened to every citizen, and that every voter shall be eligible to any office. These are my principles, and I wish to see them carried out in their integrity.

Mr. Dunn would briefly explain the reasons why he proposed a residence of five years. His principal reason is based on the position of Louisiana, which made him reluctant to entrust the administration of her affairs to the hands of strangers, of persons who knew nothing of our institutions, and whose peculiar feelings, manners and education, were so essentially different. It would take at least five years for a person of ordinary intellect, coming from a distant corner of our Union, to become familiar with our institutions, habits, history, locality, and above all, our peculiar system of laws, which, as has been stated by the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis,) differs so materially from the laws of the other States of the Union. Would it be the part of wisdom to intrust our institutions to strangers, utterly ignorant, careless, and indifferent, to our interests? But it may be urged by our honorable friend and colleague from Feliciana, (Mr. Ratliff) who will no doubt address the Convention in opposition to my views, that the people of the parish will take care not to confide their interests to incompetent hands; and it is not to be presumed that they will send a stranger to represent them. That is the very reason why I insist upon the requisite of five years' residence. If the people will not do it, it is an indication that they do not wish it; and how, I may well ask, can it be considered and stigmatized as an odious principle to engraft upon the Constitution the feelings of the people themselves? The fact that the people will not do it, should be conclusive of their wishes. I will concede readily that it is not likely that strangers will be elected to the legislature. I agree with the delegate (Mr. Ratliff) in that opinion; but where is the wrong in saying so, and placing that restriction in the Constitution? What is to be gained by leaving the matter open.

But, the gentleman (Mr. Ratliff) may tell us, that if one particular parish should think fit to send a person to the legislature not conversant with our interests, a stranger, it would occasion no injury to the other portions of the State. I beg his pardon. I hope he will not insist upon such an argument. Not only would the incompetency, the unfitness of the representatives of any particular parish effect his own immediate constituents, but it would prove detrimental to the people of the whole State. The power to do evil is not limited to the parish that sent him, alone, but is commensurate with the State.

I will put it to the Convention, why if one year's residence be insufficient to qualify a transient person to fill the important station of representative—and to this no one can dissent—what harm can there be in incorporating the principle excluding such person. If there were any invidious distinctions in relation to that particular class of persons, then I admit that there would be something odious in the distinction; there would be something personal. But, inasmuch as the restriction is general in its nature, it should give offence to none. Besides, the exclusion is only for a definite period—a period surely not disproportioned to the end to be attained.

Is there any thing unreasonable in anticipating that all our public offices may be filled with benefit to the State, by her native sons; by those identified with her, either by birth or by a residence of several years; by the strongest local attachments? Is it unreasonable to anticipate that our colleges and public schools will send out young men, capable of aspiring to the highest offices in the State? If there be any advantage in our legislation, surely the natives of the soil are entitled to it. The immigration to Louisiana is immense, and hourly on the increase. In that respect, the situation of this State is dissimilar to that of Virginia, and the Bay State. Their population is not on the increase, whereas there is not a day that thousands are not arriving in this city. I am, said Mr. Dunn, glad to see them, and cordially extend to them the right hand of fellowship, and when they have remained long enough to become identified and can appreciate our institutions, I am willing they should participate freely with us in all the rights we enjoy.

Mr. C. M. Conrad had a few observations to make in reply to what fell from the delegate from Rapides, (Mr. Brent.) That gentleman affirmed, what in his opinion, is the true republican doctrine—and that doctrine is that no restraint should be imposed in selecting agents to whom are to be confided political trusts. That doctrine may be true. It may be . . . . . .

(Mr. Brent explained what he did say.)

Mr. C. M. Conrad: The true republican doctrine as expounded by the delegate, (Mr. Brent) that the qualifications of members of the legislature and of other public officers, should be identical with the qualifications of voters, is somewhat new and novel to me. I have never before heard it broached in Louisiana. One or two States may possibly have adopted it, but the great majority of the States have adopted a different principle.

I will begin with the Constitution of the United States. In reference to the qualification of members to the House of Representatives, it prescribes that they shall have attained the age of 25 years. So that if the popular mandate were to indicate a man of the most distinguished talent—a political miracle like Pitt, who at the age of 25 years was premier; one as distinguished as Jefferson or Henry Clay, he could not be eligible unless he was 25 years of age; nor could he be a representative unless he had been a citizen of the United States for seven years. The same qualification that would entitle him to a vote, would not be sufficient to entitle him to a seat in Congress. For the latter, it is indispensable that he should be a citizen for seven years, and an inhabitant of the State from which he was chosen. This restriction is in a Constitution framed by Madison and Franklin, presided by Washington. The republican principle for voters and for members of Congress are in that instrument essentially different. If the true republican doctrine be as stated by the gentleman from Rapides, (Mr. Brent) the fathers of the Constitution were in the utmost darkness and ignorance.

But let us look into the State Constitutions. In Maine, a residence of five years is required. In New Hampshire, a good democratic State, seven years' residence is required. In Massachusetts, a free-hold and five years' residence is required.

(Mr. Brent thought the delegate from New Orleans was mistaken in relation to Maine.)

Mr. C. M. Conrad: Five years' residence and citizenship are essential, in Maine, to be a member of the Senate, and two years' residence to be a member of the House of Representatives. In Connecticut, one must be a citizen and pay taxes. In Vermont, two years' residence is required. In Ohio, no residence is required, but there is a property qualification. I would beg the gentleman from Rapides (Mr. Brent) to consider one point. Louisiana is peculiarly situated. In Virginia, North Carolina, the Eastern and Northern States, a short residence may be allowed to acquire a citizenship. Why? Because immigration is small, and those that come are lost in the mass like drops of water in the ocean. They are not sufficient in numbers seriously to affect the character of the representative body. The greater proportion of the population in Louisiana is new: the tide of immigration is flowing into New Orleans, and the increase is greater here in one year than it is in Virginia in five—New Hampshire in ten—Rhode Island in twenty. Who goes to Maine? Immigrants would rather go to Texas. Who goes from Louisiana to New Hampshire? Immigration flows south, not north.

All the doctrines and examples of the delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent) have no application. The resources of Louisiana, her wealth, public lands, the inducements held out to enterprise in a large city, invite, encourage immigration among us. I would throw no obstacles to obstruct that immigration; but I would not entrust the government of the State to persons who had not yet had time to become identified in interest and feeling with us. There are two modes of securing the identity of persons coming among us with our institutions. One is by interest and the other by ties of attachment and sympathy. The committee on the legislative department struck out the property qualification; they declared it unnecessary that there should be any pecuniary interest to secure fidelity in the exercise of suffrage. All idea of claiming fidelity by identity of pecuniary interests, they considered obsolete. If that be the true republican doctrine, be it so. What remains? We have no guarantee as to pecuniary interest, as not one dollar may be involved in the right of individual suffrage. Persons who never expect to acquire among us property, and who came from States hostile to our own, may participate with us in the government of the State. What other guarantee have we? Attachment and sympathy! How are these to be created—in a day, month or year? If persons who feel attachment to their native soil, their birth place, where they have passed their youth, come here from Massachusetts, Virginia, Rhode Island, can they divest themselves in one year, six months, from the influence of the particular institutions with which they are familiar; from the influence of education, prejudices?

Can an inhabitant of Massachusetts, who removes among us, regard slavery in its true light? will he submit to the perfect tolerance of religions, so remarkable in our community—not the result of law—but the result of public opinion? It must be presumed that the attachments he has formed in his former home will preclude him from imbibing, at once, a relish for our institutions. If he resides for years, he may acquire that attachment, and lose his original prejudices. But I would not trust any one who would say after only one year's residence in a country that he loved, that country better than the one from whence he came. If he loved not the country that gave him birth, and could so soon forget it, he was not to be trusted—I do not trust such an attachment. "No man can say that his second love is stronger than his first." If we cannot better the systems of other States, why attempt it? Why introduce crude and novel principles?

The gentlemen from Rapides (Mr. Brent) had said that if we place the residence at five years, it was a retrogade movement. Does he call it a retrogade movement to throw guards around our institutions and protect our liberties? But he sustains the motion to insert one in the blank requiring residence. The old Constitution fixes it at two years. To make it one year, surely is a retrogade movement

I would have no objection, if I knew what were the qualifications for electors, and provided they were adequate to make them correspond with the qualifications for members of the legislature. But if the qualifications for electors be loose, then it becomes more essential to be strict in reference to the qualifications of those who administer our laws.

I shall certainly vote for a longer period than two years: five years is the extreme that I would go, and I am not prepared to say that I will go that far.

Mr. Ratliff considered it necessary to a proper discharge of the duty he owed to this body, and to his constituents, to state his views upon the subject under consideration. He had voted against striking out the provision requiring two years' residence. It had worked well in the old Constitution, and had satisfied every one. He had been active and prominent in getting up this Convention, but he had never heard any complaint of that particular provision. He was very willing to have left it untouched, but if he were to vote for a change he would sustain the motion of the gentleman from St. Mary's, (Mr Splane) to make the residence one year. The property qualification was odious with the people, and had been disregarded. In support of this opinion, he (Mr. R.) referred to a case in the House of Representatives when he was a member of that body, and a member of the committee on elections, with a distinguished gentleman now in this Convention. The seat of one of the members was contested for the want of property qualification. The committee would not inquire or notice this allegation, nor would the House.

To show the futility of insisting upon the requisition of age among other considerations, Mr. Ratliff alluded to the fact that both Mr. Clay and Mr. Randolph were elected and took their seats before they were twenty-five, in the congress of the United States; and when some inquiries were made of Mr. Randolph as to whether he had attained the requisite age, he replied, "go and ask my constituents."

Let us inquire, said Mr. Ratliff, under what particular circumstances the Constitution of 1812 was adopted, which consecrated the provision of two years residence. Louisiana had not long emerged from the Spanish and French dominions—about nine years only—and Florida, which was subsequently attached to Louisiana, was still under the control of Spain. It was supposed that some unkind feelings existed. The cantonments in Florida were still kept up, and it was as easy to descend and go to Louisiana, as it is now to go to Texas. The day has gone by when there is any danger growing out of a difference in population, to guard against. We have become a united people.

He did not consider that there was any danger of electing any one who was not entirely identified with the interests of the State by some years' residence; but suppose, said Mr. Ratliff, that some man of very distinguished abilities were chosen to the legislature, would it not be an evidence of his popularity, and of the confidence of the people in him. There was no likelihood that any abolitionist would be chosen. No abolitionist would sneak into the affections of the people, for his abolition would stick out at least a foot. If the period were less than one year, there would be no danger. Suppose that any one of those distinguished men, Calhoun, Tyler, or Silas Wright, were to remove to Louisiana, would any one object to see them elevated to the legislature of this State? Would not the friends of Henry Clay be proud to see him there? And the friends of Tyler, would they not be proud of his talents; would not those of Calhoun shout to see him enrolled a citizen of Louisiana, and his transcendent talents at the service of the State?

The people, said Mr. Ratliff, are honest, and are not to be deceived by renegades. The delegate from Opelousas, (Mr. Lewis) appeared disinclined to confide in the people. I think his views are wrong.

Mr. Ratliff concluded, by an earnest appeal against five years. He regarded it as aristocratic to fix upon so long a period, It was knocking down the pillars of the social fabrick.

Mr. Mayo opposed the proposition for five years, and referred to the several constitutions of the other States of the Union, to show that nothing so restrictive and partial was any where to be found.

Mr. Claiborne was not very solicitous that the period should be fixed at five years, What he considered of vastly greater importance was, that the qualifications of the electors should be properly defined by sufficient residence. If this were done, the utmost latitude might be given to the electors to choose without restriction or qualification. The voice of those having a real interest in the State being alone heard at the ballot box, it would result that they would not send improper persons to represent them.

The question upon Mr. Dunn's motion for five years was put, and the following was the result:

Yeas.—Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of N. O., Conrad of Jeff., Couvillon, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Winchester, and Winder—32.

Nays.—Messrs. Benjamin, Brazeale, Brent, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Gulbertson, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, O'Brian, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prescott, of St. Landry, Prescott of Avoyelles, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott, of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Splane, Trist, Waddle, and Wederstrandt,—32.

The President gave the casting vote, and decided the question in the negative.

Mr. Lewis then moved to fill the blank with four years, and called for the ayes and nays.

Yeas.—Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of Jefferson, Conrad of Orleans, Couvillon, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Lewis, Labauve, Legendre, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Sellers, Stevens, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Winchester, and Winder—34.

Nays—Brazeale, Brent, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Culbertson, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McRea, Marigny, Mayo, O'Brian, Peets, Pouche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Soule, Splane, Trist, Waddil, and Wederstrandt —31.

So Mr. Lewis' motion prevailed.

Mr. Voorhies moved a further amendment by inserting in the seventh line, after the word election, "and in case he be a naturalized citizen, the time of his residence shall be computed from the date of his certificate of naturalization."

Mr. Voorhies said that, in submitting this amendment, it was not necessary for him to say more than that this object was to place the naturalized citizen and the natural born citizen on a perfect equality.

Mr. C. M. Conrad suggested that the amendment would come in better as a provision after the eighth line.

Mr. Lewis asked for its adoption.

Mr. Downs said he had a few remarks to make in relation to this amendment, and had he supposed that the previous restriction would have been carried, he would have taken occasion to have urged the objections that weighed upon his mind against it. Half an hour ago, (said Mr. Downs) the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) denied that any intention was entertained by him or those in whose views he participated, to retrograde. If it was a problem, then, I think, said Mr. Downs, it is fully solved now. It would seem that a large number in this Convention, of which that gentleman is one, are disposed to retrograde instead of progressing. When I say they are disposed to retrograde, it is not without reason, since the opinions of some of them, at least, are less liberal now than they have heretofore been. For example, the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) and a distinguished member from St. James (Mr. Winchester) were, in 1841, both members of the House of Representatives, when the bill contemplating a Convention from the Senate was cut up in the House; and, yet, this old provision of the Constitution, requiring two years residence, was left untouched. In the Convention at Jackson, the chief feature of this identical section, making two years' residence essential to eligibility, appeared to meet with no opposition from that quarter, nor was it objected to in the counter report. It would, therefore, seem that since last August a less liberal spirit prevails in relation to this matter, and that I consider a retrograde movement!

Is this the advancement that the people of Louisiana are to expect? They anticipated more liberty, not additional burthens! They desired less restriction, that the bonds, the fetters, that have been thrown around them should be taken off.

I do not concur in the Utopian proposition that there should be no restriction as to sex and color, but I do think that great discretion ought to be left to the voters—and that there should be no clogs or bars to the right of the people to choose whoever they please to represent them.

The delegate from Catahoula (Mr. Mayo) had shown conclusively that none of the States of the Union required so great a restriction.

It was unfortunate to keep up prejudices between Louisiana and her sister States. The existence of certain prejudices had done much to retard the increase of population in this State, and, consequently, had materially affected her prosperity. The simple fact, that Louisiana had adopted the parish judge system, had kept away thousands of persons—emigrants crowded in upon the line dividing Arkansas from Louisiana as thick as bees: they even cultivated land in Louisiana, but they kept themselves out of her jurisdiction. Another prejudice that was unfounded, and which had also a beneficial tendency, was that against the civil law. Our civil laws have been modified and the result is, a better system than prevails in the other States. But the prejudice is already excited, and we should do nothing to increase it. If our institutions be only liberalized, many persons of wealth will remove to the State. What will be the disappointment of all such, if instead of pursuing a liberal policy, we should adopt one more restricted than that of the old Constitution? That in place of requiring two years residence, we require five. And it is not in relation alone to naturalized citizens, however imprudent and indiscreet a policy of exclusion towards them would be, that the effects of this course will be felt. It will apply to native citizens of the other States—to those who have every identity of feeling and sentiment with us for our common country. They too will be debarred by this narrow proscription and prejudice.

What, asked Mr. Downs, would have been the result if Congress in 1803 had passed a law inhibiting emigration from the other States into Louisiana; or to have shackled it with such restrictions as to have made it impossible for emigrants to have settled among us? Suppose that such a principle had been incorporated in the Constitution of 1812? What would have been the result? Where would have been the wealth of New Orleans? Instead of counting one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, it would not have numbered over forty or fifty thousand. Instead of a city above Canal street five times as large as the original limits of New Orleans, nothing would have been done, and we would not now see those magnificent edifices where once stood stagnant pools of water. Where would have been the activity and energy for which this city is so conspicuous? Houses have multiplied, and capital has found a thousand sources of profitable investment.

Mr. Downs further argued that the provision in the Constitution requiring two years residence, had been in existence thirty-two years, and had not produced the slightest detriment to the State. In all that time no one had been elected to office who did not possess every reasonable guarantee.—Where was the use of establishing an exclusive principle? Surely the veteran sons of Louisiana did not seek it. They were not afraid of coming in competition with the talents, energy and industry of their fellow-citizens from the other States. Why impose a condition not required by the other States?

The amendment offered in relation to naturalized citizens presented the same narrow and contracted spirit. It was unworthy the genius and liberality of Louisiana.

Mr. Downs concluded by hoping that if no improvement in accordance with the spirit of the age, tending to liberalize this part of the constitution was intended, that it would be at least left untouched; and that if we could not advance, we would not go back and travel down hill.

Mr. Marigny said he rose to oppose the amendment presented by the delegate from Attakapas, (Mr. Voorhies) and he hoped it would at once be rejected. He could not comprehend under what aim that amendment could have been presented. He could make no distinctions, and would never distinguish insidiously between naturalized and native born citizens. By this amendment, the naturalized citizen was singled out, and made to undergo a probation of nine years, that is to say, a naturalized citizen would be excluded for nine years. For to the five years prescribed by him to become a citizen, four years were added after his naturalization. It was most oppressive, without example, and without antecedent!

An honorable member (Mr. Ratliff) had referred to several of the great men of this country, who were natives of other States that would be excluded by this provision for four years, from aspiring to office were they to come to this State. Such men as Calhoun, Clay and Wright. He (Mr. Marigny) would ask members to look back on the past history of this State, and see who were among the most eminent in the Senate, on the bench, and in other high and important functions? To whom was Louisiana deeply indebted? Was it not to Porter, to Mazureau, to Petot, to Durbigny and others, all of whom were born in foreign countries? Who was it that compiled our code, and who has been one of the best expounders of the civil law? In this Convention he (Mr. Marigny) disclaimed being whig or democrat. He considered that the restriction of nine years amounted to total exclusion. It was a man's life.

He would ask what was the difference between a man coming from the other side of the ocean and one coming to us from the North, tinctured with the doctrine of abolitionism? The latter returns back in the summer to his home, whereas the former, who has quit his native country because he dislikes the institution of monarchy, remains among us—becomes identified, and voluntarily submits to the perils of the yellow fever baptism.

He was indeed astonished, amazed, that so distinguished an advocate of democratic principles as the gentleman from Attakapas—one so liberal in his views, should have offered such a proposition. It was toryism, all pure! For himself, he (Mr. Marigny) could not forget the services that have been rendered to the State by naturalized citizens, and could not consent to exclude others of that class who were no doubt as patriotic and intelligent. He trusted that the gentleman (Mr. Voorhies) that offered the proposition was laboring under some misapprehension upon the subject, and that it would be withdrawn. If it were not withdrawn, he confidently hoped and expected that it would be unanimously rejected.

Mr. Lewis said that inasmuch as his friend from Attakapas who presented this proposition, had not risen to reply to the arguments urged against it, and no one was more competent of doing so than that gentleman, he would briefly explain what were his views in relation to it.

He had heard nothing to justify the hopes of the gentleman that last addressed the Convention, (Mr. Marigny) that the mover would withdraw the proposition. He had heard nothing to sustain the strenuous opposition that has been made to it.

The gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) had argued against the proposition, that it had established an odious distinction. It was called an odious distinction, because, as had been charged—if he had not heard it so qualified in this body, he had heard it elsewhere. Native born citizens were entitled to no more consideration than foreigners, for the matter of birth was purely accidental and conferred no claim; that one legislation should be different for one and the other.

He would make a few remarks in relation to this proposition—the principle was the same as would come up upon another question, upon which, if his health were spared, he designed presenting his views more at large.

It will be attempted to be shown that foreigners just landing upon our shores, and coming from the very hot-beds of European despotism, should be allowed equal facilities of voting at the ballot-box with the native born citizens, or those identified with the State by a long residence, and by a community of attachments and interests. The question naturally arises, whether this ought to be tolerated, or whether it ought not to be tolerated.

There was a marked difference between this and the old world. He would not now enter into a discussion of the subject.—We should seek to elevate the character and promote the permanent welfare of the State, and it is necessary and proper that the native born citizen should at least, be on an equality with the foreigner from other lands. If a citizen of Mississippi, under this provision, were to come into the State of Louisiana, he would be under the necessity of remaining five years before he would be eligible to a seat in the legislature. And yet that citizen belongs to a State that is an integral portion of our Union. The foreigner is under the protection of the consul and flag of his country; he is not amenable to, and may claim exceptions from our laws.

I know, said Mr. Lewis, a respectable gentleman who has been twenty-five years in this country, and has never sought to be naturalized. He is a subject of Louis Phillippe—and he has a right to sue in the federal court, and that right he exercised by having a suit that was instituted against him transferred to that tribunal. Suppose a declaration for citizenship had been made twenty years ago? The proof, attestation and inscription are all that would be necessary to convert the applicant into an American citizen at once.

Mr. Lewis declared himself opposed to the present naturalization laws; but he was for respecting them as long as they existed. There should, however, be an equality under those laws between naturalized citizens and native born citizens. If native born citizens from the other States of the Union are required, from reasons of sound policy, to remain among us five years before they are eligible to public offices, at least equal restrictions ought to be prescribed in regard to foreigners who may become naturalized. A native citizen is always subjected to the laws of the country, and is obliged to bear his share of the public burthens. Not so with the foreigner. He may exempt himself from our laws and remain under the laws of his own country. In the mean time, he may make his declaration to become a citizen, and when it suits his convenience, or his interests, he may go through all the forms in a few moments, and at once become eligible to office, while a citizen of Mississippi, coming into this State, is compelled to work on the public roads and perform militia duty, during the time he is acquiring a residence amongst us, and from which the foreigner is exempt. Now, the object of the proposition under discussion, is to prevent this inequality, and to place the native born citizen on an equality with those who are naturalized; but not to allow the latter any advantage over the former.

If he arrive in one of our sister States, and is naturalized there, then from the date of his naturalization, he is placed on an equality with the native born citizen of that State.

A great deal has been said to disparage those feelings of patriotism which are national and incident to our birth place: whatever may be urged to the contrary, I have great confidence in those feelings, and I would not trust a man who was callous or indifferent to them.

I cannot consent that there should be any distinction bearing exclusively upon the native born citizen, and that the foreigner, as soon as he perceives a vacancy in our legislative halls, and, before the ink be dry upon his naturalization papers, may thrust himself into the vacancy, while a native born citizen would have to remain five years, and be subjected to all the duties and all the liabilities of citizenship. This is exacting too much, and not affording a sufficient guarantee for our native citizens.

Mr. Preston said: Notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary, I think this Convention was called to abolish many existing restrictions upon the political rights of our fellow citizens, and not to impose new restrictions upon us. All those who struggled and clamored for a Convention, did so for a Constitution more liberal to all men—those who opposed it, were content with existing restrictions.

I do not believe the majority of the people of this State, in calling the Convention, wished to extend the enjoyment of the utmost rights and privileges of man to every white man in the State, that could be enjoyed without danger to the State. The property qualification of the voter, by universal consent, is denounced and abandoned. The disgraceful spectacle, of the basest prostitute, enabling the bully of her brothel, (I see no ladies in the room) to exercise the right of suffrage, while the poor supporter, by his labor, of his lawful wife and children, is constitutionally deprived of the inestimable right of participating in the government of the country he is obliged to defend with his life, will never be witnessed in Louisiana again.

But now our fellow-citizens of other States must be disfranchised two years because they chose to cast their lot, as most of us have done, within the limits of our State. Emigration has made our lands valuable—our State rich and powerful—and, in every respect, improved the whole condition, physical and mental, of our population, and will continue to do it, in a geometrical progression. The property qualification greatly retarded it, and Alabama, Mississippi, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and States admitted long after us, have far outstripped us in the race of prosperity and population, although our soil and climate, and commercial emporium, presented advantages far superior to any they possessed—,will not say the restrictions of our Constitution and laws have entirely produced the result; but they have had great effect in retarding our progress, as is conclusively proved by the facts stated by the delegate from Ouachita, that the country is filled by settlers, and blessed by all the comforts of family, north of the geometrical line which separates us from Arkansas, while population is sparse on its south side. The reason is, that men will not stop where an invidious distinction is established by law between them and their fellow men. They would sooner go on to Texas. "Let them go," I hear spoken near me. I say, No. Let them stop on our prairies—reclaim our swamps—bring into productive operation, of some kind, our pine woods—enrich and strengthen our State, and enable her with as great an area as any other State in the Union, to keep pace with her sister States in wealth and population, and strength and education, morality, and every thing that makes a State.

We have lived under the Ægis of the old Constitution for thirty years, which admitted our fellow-citizens of sister States to all the rights of freemen, after a residence of twelve months. Can any man say experience has proved this liberal principle deleterious to the State, or that our safety requires its repeal? If, on the contrary, it be a feature in our constitution, venerable by its antiquity, endeared to us by its benificence, for I, and every emigrant citizen, have enjoyed the hospitable reception it extended to us, let us cling to it as a benefactor and not repudiate it as an enemy.

The Constitution of the United States in prescribing that the citizens of each State shall have all the rights, privileges and advantages of citizens of the other States, indicates the principle, that if possible consistently with our safety, we should extend to our fellow citizens of our sister States all the privileges we enjoy ourselves.

Our government is the government of one country, and therefore every citizen of a sister State should feel the State as much his home as his native State. We do feel at home in other States, when we go there As our sister States require but a single years residence of us to entitle us to the right of suffrage, we should be equal at least to our sister States, in liberality and reciprocity.

The principle of requiring long residence is erroneous. It is based on excluding many, depriving them of rights, treating them inhospitably, in order to guard against a very few, supposed to be vicious and dangerous to our State. We should, on the contrary, encourage all, and at least grant them their rights, and guard ourselves by legislative means against the injuries the few might inflict, punishing those who offend for their misconduct, and not all, whether they offend or not, lest some might do so to our prejudice.

Believing that the provision of the Constitution can be retained without danger to our State, I will endeavor to show that not more than one years residence in our State should be required, in order to enable a citizen of any other State to acquire a residence in this State, and exercise all the rights of a citizen thereof. And first, it is sufficient to establish residence. A year is the period fixed by Heaven in which man experiences all the vicissitudes of heat and cold, the life of spring and the death of autumn, in which he plants and gathers and enjoys the fruits of the earth. The period for which contracts are generally made, and in which they are to be fulfilled. A years permanency in one place is evidence of a man's intention there to fix his residence, because he has finished there a period in time. It is ordinarily considered among men, that having resided a year in a place a man is a resident, and that he has lost his residence elsewhere. It is prima facia evidence of this fact, and should be considered proof of the fact by reasonable men, until the contrary appears.

When therefore a man proves himself by such evidence a citizen of our State, what reason can there be for depriving him of the rights of citizenship?

We should accord the rights of citizenship to such a citizen, because every other State in the Union accords those rights to the citizens of Louisiana after a similar or shorter residence, except the State of South Carolina; and some of the States after three months residence within their limits. The burthens a man has to bear, commences with the very first year of his residence in our State. A man who has resided here a year we tax, if he has taxable property, or pursues taxable occupations. He works on the roads, and is required to perform militia duty, and serve on patrols. He is liable to defend the State by personal peril and services. By personal labor during a year he contributes his mite to the prosperity of the State. Man is naturally gregarious, and cannot live a year without affections, pleasures and social connexions, and in less than that time becomes attached to the country, and persons and things in it. He would be entitled to vote on the presidential election in the State whence he came, and would be entitled here, but that he is restricted by the constitutional provision proposed. Thus we positively deprive him of a political right, merely because he moves to our State. Yet he is a citizen of our sister State, the descendant perhaps of one who had done much for our country in the field, or the senate. He is habituated from infancy to love this whole country and institutions, and now interested to devote that affection to our State, because he located among us. Attachment to country being equal, is he less capable of performing the duties of a citizen than one of us. This depends upon his education and the society in which he has been reared. Now in other States of the Union they have means of education, and improve them equally with ourselves; and whoever lives there imbibes principles and attains information equal to that which we possess.

Our extremely fertile lands and genial climate attracts to our State a rich planter from Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, or the Carolinas, with his family and slaves. There are a great many such in the northwestern parishes of the State. Far more would come and embrace all the advantages that are held out to us, if our Constitution and laws invited them. Is there any reason why such men should pass through a probation of more than one year before they are enabled to enjoy the political privileges which we possess?

But I will suppose what is most generally the case, that citizens of other States come without means, but with honest hearts and strong arms, or with education and talents to invest, and exert this capital in our State. For the hands that nature has given us, and the talents with which she has endowed us, is capital, and most productive, and constitutes a most valuable accession to the State. For there are vast fields still vacant for all hands that choose to be employed within our State. Our agriculture is in its infancy. The sugar and cotton lands are far from being all occupied. As to provisions our production is limited, compared with the vast resources of the State. The ground is unoccupied and unimproved. There are other and valuable productions for which our soil and climate are undoubtedly suited, which have not yet occupied our attention: I mean silk, and wine, and oil. Our climate is suited to many rich fruits, if properly cultivated. In the manufacture of the thousand articles for domestic and other uses, we have not yet made a commencement. Our commerce, which will soon be first in the Union, is carried on almost exclusively by the citizens of other States. We are young in the vast ramifications in which industry might be most usefully and productively employed. We should court and attract population, instead of repelling it by restrictions, which exist nowhere else.

Now, if the rich emigrate with their slaves to settle and improve our rich soil and render it productive, principle requires they should have a voice in selecting the officers of government, whose action is to regulate their property, and no apprehension of danger requires a duration from principle. He who has but his industry to invest in the productive labor, and in the rich rewards of enterprise which our State presents, has his person, his liberty, his character, and his prospects to be protected and advanced by government. These are as invaluable to him, and even to the State, as property to the rich: and therefore he should have a voice in enacting and executing the laws on which all that is dear and invaluable to him depends. If we cannot accord this right to him without danger to ourselves and State, then refuse it. But who can lay his hand on his heart and say he apprehends danger to our State or to himself by allowing our fellow-citizens of our sister States equal rights with ourselves, after residing a year in our State as a citizen thereof? The liberal and generous mind sees in their incorporation with us, with all our rights, all the certain advantages to our State to which we have alluded. While the supposed dangers are but the airy dreams of imagination, which no one really feels, or believes will ever be tangibly felt.

This city, which is the great point of connexion between the produce of the western world, and the eastern continents, and southern island. Its commerce is destined to be boundless in amount and extent. True statesmanship indicates to us, to further by all means in our power, that destiny in our day and generation, not to retard it. It can be greatly advanced by encouraging our fellow-citizens of every State to embark with us in its vast commerce, with equal rights, priviledges and advantages. And by encouraging the good feeling which would result from such a course, we would eventually command unbounded influence over western America, in policy, morals, education, manner, and every branch of civilization. The seaboard in all countries and ages has governed the interior by example and influence, if wise and worthy of imitation. We would also, by intercourse with every part of the world gather that which was valuable in every branch of civilization, even at our antipodes.

We may greatly retard these brilliant results by throwing impediments in the road of those adventurous spirits who come to this emporium, to embark on the sea of enterprise which it presents, and creating invidious constitutional distinctions between the new and old inhabitants of our State, prejudicial to the former. I fear that such invidious and odious distinctions and legislation of a similar character growing out of it, by impeding the emigration of the friends and connexions of those who have settled and accumulated fortunes in our State, has and will continue to induce many of the latter to retire to other climes and countries, with their wealth, to enjoy with it, in the evening of life, the kindness and affection which grows out of the ties of nature.

It was suggested that we should have the guarantee of two years residence, against the spirit of abolitionism with which new comers might be imbued. A year is enough to enable his neighbors to turn any man's views on this subject, and guard against them, if dangerous to the State. It is sufficient too, to enable the new comer to see that the well regulated state of slavery in our State was indispensable to the happiness of the slave, the prosperity of the State, and safety of the white population. Every man capable of taking a correct view of our civil society, would wish to see a million instead of three hundred thousand black slaves in our State. Deprive any considerable portion of our population of political rights, and in this respect degrade them to the condition of the slave, and you will make the evil of slavery dangerous by exciting the sympathy of a portion of the whites. But elevate every freeman in the State to an equal participation in its government, and make that broad political distinction between him and the slave, and you will raise a wall of fire kindled from the united souls of freemen, around our State and her institutions, against the diabolical machinations of abolitionism.

And while on this subject of security, I will observe that there is employed in carrying on our commerce and intercourse with the western States, the best organised and physically powerful army that ever appeared on the face of this globe.

Under the benificent provision of our existing constitution, striking out the odious property qualification, a sufficient number of these defenders of our country would declare their residence on the shores of our rivers, in the suburbs of our city, in our fertile soil and genial climate, and there plant their wives and chrildren, all their affections and hopes, and future prospects; a sufficient number I say, to ensure a fellow feeling in the whole army, and ensure the united arms and souls of all, in our protection and defence against external invasion and internal insurrection, and render our frontier State and out-post city as secure as the apex of the Alleghany.

When our city and State in their infancy were really endangered by invasion and exposed to domestic insurrection—when a powerful foreign army were on our soil, at our very firesides, their cupidity and brutality stimulated by our beauty and booty; when every thing that clings around the core of a man's heart was staked upon the point of his sword, did you then enquire of your brethren of other States, the brave Tennessean, Kentuckian and Mississippian, if he had resided two years on your soil, to insure his fidelity in danger, or did the glorious title of American citizen impel them and you to mingle your blood in a common stream and struggle for the foremost rank in our glorious deliverance from danger, when American soil was invaded.

Let us affect no fears of our fellow-citizens of the Union, for political purposes in the calm tranquility of peace, which we did not feel in the hour of peril, and with open hearts receive our fellow-citizens of our sister States, and admit them to all the rights and advantages we enjoy. And when the storm of invasion and danger shall again beat at our doors, they and their friends and connexions will again cheerfully rush to our rescue, and our future and common triumphs will be as glorious as that which is already inscribed on the the brightest page of our history.

Mr. Voorhies said, the range which the debate had taken upon the simple, and as he conceived, just proposition which he had offered, necessitated a few remarks from him. They were due, as well to explain the motives that actuated him here, as to define his position to his constituents. He was a Louisianian, and could safely assert that he was attached to the interests of the State, as well as to her enduring prosperity. Nor could it be said that he was favorable to any restriction which the sternest necessity did not imperiously require. He was for the most indiscriminate freedom, consistent with the true interests of the State and her peculiar position. Those who knew him were well aware that he entertained no prejudices against foreigners, and that he was liberal in all his political feelings.

The design of the proposition he had offered, was only to apply to the future. He was for leaving all upon an equality, and to deal with all upon a strict principle of justice. He thought the destinies of the State were safe in the hands of her children, of those that were intimately identified in feeling, and by attachment with her. He thought that our community were sufficiently intelligent; that they possessed sufficient talents, sufficient virtue and patriotism, to administer the government of the State.—But he was not for that against foreigners, nor did he desire to interfere with all the privileges which our institutions guaranteed to them. He merely wished that our institutions should not be recklessly committed to strangers—persons who had but just arrived among us, who were unacquainted with our habits, with our pursuits—from assuming the prerogation of government. His proposition was to extend to none who were American citizens, be they native born or naturalized, but to place them on a perfect footing of equality; and only to require that they should reside some little time among us—that they should have an opportunity of comprehending the spirit and genius of our institutions, before they should be placed in our legislative halls, and invested with the extraordinary privilege of making our laws, and giving destination to our property.

He disclaimed being actuated by any spirit of illiberality—he was influenced by no narrow-minded or contracted prejudices. The provision was general. It applied to all American citizens who may hereafter be disposed to cast their lot among us, and it required them to reside four years among us before they would be eligible to offices of high trust and great responsibility. The perpetuity of our institutions demanded that we should have some guarantees, and he did not conceive there was anything extraordinary and unfair in entertaining some control over the administration of public affairs.

It was a source of deep regret and painful mortification that our naturalization laws were perverted to gross impositions and abominable frauds.

A correction should be applied somewhere; and inasmuch as there was nothing efficient to preclude those abuses, which every one admitted, it behooved us to take such action as the necessity of the case suggested, so as to prevent, or, at least, to lessen the evils to which we were exposed.

It was consonant with sound reason and good policy, that we should seek to protect the permanent interests of the State and of her permanent population.

What had fallen from the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Marigny) that to do this was illiberal, and suggested by principles of toryism, was idle. The principle he (Mr. Voorhies) had introduced was common to all. A foreigner among us was under the protection of his flag, and was exempted from all the burthens imposed upon our citizens; if it was his intention to become a citizen, and he complied with the laws of naturalization, all that was asked of him was to undergo the same residence required of natural citizens from our sister States. There was surely no cause for him to complain. There was nothing odious or illiberal in the requisition. It was not intended that we should be under the control of a mob of foreigners who do not understand our institutions, and were, perhaps, inimical to those institutions. The proposition was founded on reason and justice, and it was to be hoped that it would prevail.

Mr. C. M. Conrad rose to correct a mistake. The member from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) had said, that, although unfortunate yesterday, in some of his statements, he ventured to say, and he asserted it as a positive fact, that there was not a State in the Union that made such a distinction as that embodied in the proposition of the gentleman from Attakapas. Now, if that delegate will refer to the constitution of Maine he will find that in the State of Maine citizenship for five years is required. In Georgia, a naturalized citizen must have been admitted nine years before he is eligible to the senate of that State and seven years before he can be eligible to the house of representatives.

Mr. Grymes said, that this debate had begun before his avocations had permitted him to be present. He presumed that the minds of most members were made up how they should vote. He rose on this occasion to express his opinions. But he did not apprehend that they would have the slightest weight. For his own part, his course was decided, and he would briefly state the reasons that influenced him upon this question.

He considered that matters of public policy of vast interest and importance were involved in it, and it did appear to him that the grounds upon which it was placed, particularly the delegate from Jefferson (Mr.

Preston) were not such is he could approve or coneur. They may, possibly, have their weight; but he could not comprehend how the Convention could be placed in an antagonistical position with the people. That stringent measures should be adopted by the Convention, in direct conflict with the mandate of the people. He would ask the delegate from Jefferson where was the sovereign power, if it be not in this house? Is it any where else? The people, in their primary and original capacity had delegated all power to their representatives in Convention, and when the sovereign speaks, it is by our mouths.

He did not believe the members of this body would be influenced by the argument that the sovereign people and the Convention were in a conflicting attitude—one seeking to restrain, and the other shrinking from that restraint.

We are, said Mr. Grymes, the sovereign people themselves. The question before us is one of political expediency. The gentleman from Jefferson argues from the exception to the general rule.

Why fly off to particular instances, to which we may accord one individual assent. If we adopt the exception, does it prove the general rule? Does it prove that it may be applied to all nations? In one breath we are told of discord, and in another of dissolution.

The delegate from Jefferson tells us that we are so poor in the arts and sciences, that we must get down upon our knees and entreat Europe to pour her stream of science upon us. He conceives that we are so perfect that we can take the exception and leave the general rule to our poorer sister States. This argument can have no weight. The harmony and peace of the community rest upon sound general principles, and not upon exceptions. This aberration is not to be deprecated. There is not a principle extended, by the gentleman, to local or general cases. He takes the line of his departure by throwing away the anchor of our safety, and then relies upon miserable exceptions.

What are the positions of the delegate? I will take them seriatem. If foreigners are not made eligible to the legislature, this exclusion, if maintained, will deter them from coming among us.

Surely there is no falling off in the tide of emigration, and it bids fair to continue to sweep over our land. It pours upon us in unprecedented numbers, and we are forced to the conclusion, that it is not the immediate privileges which are accorded —the advantages of participating in our institutions, that is the predominant motive that brings them to our shores. I repudiate the true advantage of participating in our institutions, for I hold it no advantage to be exposed to the turmoil of our elective system. But, says the gentleman, we want these people to teach our children, to disseminate among us the arts and sciences. Will the gentleman mention the case of a single individual that has been abstained from quitting the European side of the Atlantic because there was a restriction or a prejudice against elevating him on his arrival, to the legislature? Is there any school master who has been deterred from quitting the western side of the Atlantic, because, forsooth, he could not be a legislator on his arrival? The tide of emigration shows that no such inducement is necessary? Nor have I ever heard that any such school master, or any profound scholar, has ever retired to Europe because he could not assert his right to be eligible to the legislature.

I have not the statistics to show that the United States, as the recepticle of the great European hive, bids fair to monopolize the greater proportion of that redundant population. I would not restrain them from coming to us; but it is evident and palpable that the tide is so tremendous, that every acre of land will be brought into cultivation. And when undiscovered lands shall have been found, new hordes will emigrate to them. We may have an irruption of the inhabitants of Central Asia, of Affghanistan, and of the Hindoos; and if they cut down and fell our forests, without attempting to regulate our institutions, we will be fortunate indeed!

It was a fallacy to imagine, that a participation in our institutions was a source of any great anxiety among those that come among us. It was by no means the inducement that led them here.

But let that be as it may, it is clear to my mind that the United States have a right to consult public policy, either in allowing unlimited, or in restricting the conditions. I will state without circumlocution what I think of that point.

The United States is the property of her citizens, who have a perfect right to enjoy exclusively the liberties and privileges belonging to her institutions — the heritage bought by the blood of their ancestors.— They have fostered and perfected those institutions, which are our own. If we chose to call others to participate, well and good.

I would go as far as the most ardent philanthropist. I would say, it is true we have planted this tree of liberty; we have fostered and reared it, until its branches are sufficient to shelter both you and us. But for God sake don't hack and destroy the tree; don't interfere with it, but let it remain as it is! Let it be under our charge, until you shall have acquired sufficient experience to tend it.

The knowledge of our institutions and their peculiar operation, can only be acquired from some years experience. It is only after a sufficient lapse of time that the new comer can be presumed to have formed any permanent attachments, or to be sufficiently imbued with our political rights and liabilities. As to the notion that all this is intuitive, and that the human mind is unerring in its comprehension of the principles of popular government, that is a wild vision of the brain. It cannot give a conception of the apparatus of our government, which must be learnt by foreigners from actual experience, but which we imbibe with our mother's milk. I never will believe any such a thing, if I were to live to the days of Methusalah.

We have a good Constitution, a good government, exclusively fostered by the sweat of our brow and the blood of our veins. We have a right to admit partners or refuse to admit them. And are we employing too much severity towards strangers to insist that they wait a little while, and watch the operation of our system—that they study the character of our people. When the schoolmaster or other learned person, that the gentleman from Jefferson would have to come among us from Europe, to enlighten our ignorance, arrives, and we place ourselves or our children under his charge, what would be his astonishment if, after he had learnt us our A. B. C.'s, we should turn round and say to him we know more than you do, and can teach you? Would it not be as arrogant for a foreigner, a stranger to our institutions, that had just arrived among us, to tell us that he comprehended them better than we did, and that he was going to remodel them for us. His science might be vastly superior to our own, inasmuch as he came from Europe, but we might prefer another kind of knowledge, and not be willing to be so preceded in our just authority and control. We belong to a race with whom liberty is indispensable. Our institutions are free, and we are as free as air.

I am decidedly in favor of a certain period of probation for those who come among us from foreign countries. They should serve some little apprenticeship to understand our institutions, to get rid of their prejudices, and to form some permanent attachments. There is a great deal of nicety in our government—the boundaries are imperceptible, and a foreigner might be treading on the toes of the Constitution without knowing it was there. It would be a mystery to him. As to a stranger understanding our institutions intuitively, it was no such thing.

The question was taken on Mr. Voorhies' motion, and the ayes and nays were called for:

Yeas—Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Barton, Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Couvillon, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, Saunders, Sellers, Stevens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder, —39.

Nays—Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Downs, Eustis, Garcia, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Leonard, McRea, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Scott of Feliciana, Soulé, Splane, Waddill, Wederstrandt,—32.

Whereupon, on motion, the Convention adjourned.

Wednesday, January 22, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and the proceedings were opened with prayer by the Reverend Mr. Nicholson.

Mr. Ratliff, in behalf of the committee on contingent expenses, reported a resolution allowing $350 to J. A. Kelly, printer to the Convention, for work done and to be done.

Mr. Carriere introduced a resolution authorising the committee on contingent expenses to allow mileage to the clerks of the Convention from the town of Jackson to the city of New Orleans.

Mr. Lewis objected to the adoption of this resolution. The clerks were already sufficiently well paid, and allowing them mileage would entail heavy expense. If they were not content with what they received for their services, let them resign; others would be very glad to take their places. The motion to refer the resolution to the committee on contingent expenses was lost.

Mr. Lewis moved for the rejection of the resolution, and called for the ayes and nayes.

Ayes—Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Burton, Chambliss, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porche, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Stevens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, and Waddil—32.

Nays.—Messrs. Cade, Carriere, Cenas, Couvillon, Dunn, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, McRea, Marigny, O'Brian, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Assumption, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, and Wederstrandt—25.

Order of the day.—The Convention resumed the consideration of the fourth section of the second article of the constitution, as reported by the majority, and as amended by the proposition of Mr. Voorhies.

Mr Lewis called for the adoption of the section.

Mr. Downs said: in the discharge of what he deemed to be a duty, he begged to trespass on the attention of the Convention, and to make some remarks before the question was taken, on the motion to adopt the section. Perhaps he was liable to the charge of remisness in suffering to progress so far without developing more fully than he had done the serious objections which operated against it in his mind.—But he had not anticipated that it would have been pushed so successfully, otherwise he would have insisted upon his objections.

In the remarks he intended to offer, he might speak with great earnestness—he trusted that his earnestness of manner would not be misconceived or misunderstood. He usually spoke with earnestness whenever the question under consideration involved principles of individual liberty and popular rights.

It was certainly less from an apprehension that the proposition of the delegate from Attakapas (Mr. Voorhies) which had been incorported in the section, would have much effect, than because the principle was wrong, invidious and odious, that he raised his voice against it. He felt deep regret and mortification that such restrictions as were embodied in the section should find advocates on this floor, and lest his silence might be misconstrued, he felt it to be his duty to protest against the course of policy which it was contemplated to pursue.

Strong and able arguments have been adduced to sustain the prescriptive views which are carried out so fully by the proposition of a delegate from St. Landry, requiring a residence of four years to be eligible to a seat in the house of representatives, and the proposition of the member from Attakapas that applies the restriction with greater security to naturalized citizens.—He had reference particularly to the gentleman who last addressed the Convention (Mr. Grymes.)

I regret, said Mr. Downs, to encounter such fearful odds. It seems like temerity to enter the list with so renowned a champion, and it would have been more appropriate had the task fallen to older and more experienced hands; but it was not to gratify my convenience, but to serve my country, that I am here, and feel how inadequate are my powers to resist the biting sarcasm of that gentleman. I have no other course. There is one position which that gentleman assumed, with which I cannot concur. I took no notes and do not profess to give his precise words. He said that the doctrine of a member from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) appeared designed to array the Convention against the people. I disclaim any such design. I cannot however admit that the sovereignty of the State is exclusively vested in the Convention, and that the people have no control over the actions of that body. I protest against such a doctrine.

But what does the gentleman mean? Does he mean that the Convention possesses the physical power to make a constitution? If he means that, having got into the Convention, by hook or by crook, we may forget the opinions of the people—disregard their remonstrances, and usurp their sovereignties, then I would say, that our powers are not unlimited. We should not forget that our constituents are intelligent and observant, and that if the objects for which this Convention are called are frustrated, they will hold us to a strict accountability. If we set ourselves in defiance with their opinions, we will incur a heavy penalty. He hoped no such design was entertained. For myself, said Mr. Downs, I acknowledge my accountability to those who sent me here, and if I were to violate their wishes, I would never return to them, but would go to Texas. There are some who have got into this Convention upon the strength of their pledges. Some there are who appear to exult at the prospect of defeating the will of the people, who are evidently pleased with the sarcasms that have been uttered; but they should remember that they will have to give an account of their stewardship. That if they violate their pledges and forget their sacred obligations, they will not escape with impunity. They may be flattered here, they may feel themselves omnipotent, but the day must come when they will be shorn of their powers and their honors. By what rule do they set themselves up as the sovereign people? I do not desire, Mr. President, to make any personal allusions. But I know an honorable member whose opinions on this question are certainly not those of his constituents, nor are they consistent with his former declarations.

[The PRESIDENT: Sarcasms and personal reflections ought not to be indulged in.]

Mr. KENNER: There is nothing which the gentleman has said, to which exceptions might be taken. I hope he may go on.

Mr. DOWNS: I confess that my friends and myself were almost in despair at the debate and occurrences of yesterday. The position of affairs wore a somewhat sombre hue, but upon reflection some consolation suggested itself to my mind. That although the eloquence of the gentleman from New Orleans was so overpowering as to sweep all before it, and to invest him with the honors of the day, still that eloquence would not bear the test of scrutiny: that it was brilliant but delusive, and would vanish before the broad glare of reason. I recollect that in former times and in other countries, it was sa id of one about whom the world was divided, (Charles II) that he never said a foolish thing nor did a wise one. Not that I intend to apply this remark in its full extent to that gentleman. The best things will not escape the fallacies of mankind.

I remember an incident in the early history of the country that has some application to the member from New Orleans, and which convinced me that we were not entirely overpowered. During the incipient stages of our revolutionary war, a delegation from the colonies met at Annapolis. All the great men that the country then boasted were in attendance. The rules had not yet been provided, and there was a solemn pause. Patrick Henry arose and electrified his hearers by a magnificent burst of eloquence; such as never before had under similar circumstances been heard. Richard Henry Lee, another Virginian, followed the father of American oratory. The assembly were spell-bound and entranced. The sages of the revolution were at once convinced that there were no greater men among them than Patrick Henry and Richard Henry Lee. So overpowering and astounding were their oratory, that Mr. Chase, a man of profound knowledge, and who subsequently became a Judge of the Supreme Court, stepped over to Mr. Wythe and observed, "we may as well go home, we are unable to cope with these Virginians." And so much impression did this incident make that they were both placed at the head of the most important committees. An address was to be prepared to the crown, and Patrick Henry was placed at the head of the committee. So little qualification did he possess for that duty, that he was compelled to relinquish it. The paper was drawn up by Mr. Livingston, and it was one of the finest productions that appeared among the admirable State papers of that day. These two men with such transcendant talents for oratory, were not endowed with a turn for business. The failure became known, and Mr. Chase then observed, that if those two individuals were inimitably superior as orators to their colleagues, yet they fell far short in an aptitude for business and the faculty of putting their thoughts on paper. The practical results and tests of government have been carried out by men of little brilliancy, while those that have dazzled and shone most conspicuously as orators, have left little to impress the age with their genius or to remind posterity of the benefits they have confered. Look at two of the most splendid orators that our country has yet produced. Patrick Henry and Randolph. What great traces have they left? The few speeches that have come to us are the only monuments of their wisdom. But where are their acts? On what pages of history are they recorded? Whereas Franklin, a man of no brilliancy whatever as an orator, has impressed the age in which he lived, and in every page of history is recorded the services he rendered to his country.

I would remark Mr. President, said Mr. Downs, that if you take the proposition of the gentleman from Attakapas, in its literal sense, it impresses no restriction; it takes off the restriction of five years residence for the benefit of naturalized citizens. If they be naturalized, the very next day afterwards they would be eligible under the proposition to a seat in your legislature. That, however, is not the meaning intended.

As I understand it, Mr. President, the State has no right to make exceptions, and to impose invidious distinctions between the citizens of our common country. A citizen of our State is entitled to all the privileges of citizenship, and the rule is identical whether he be a naturalized citizen or a natural born citizen. The Constitution of the United States makes no distinctions. And the State has no more control over citizenship than she has over the national prerogative to coin money. I state authoratively that she has no right to impose disabilities upon citizens by naturalization. I rely upon the Constitution to sustain that point.

If a citizen of Mississippi is eligible to all the privileges of a citizen in Louisiana according to the Federal Constitution, how can the Convention impose excluding disabilities? It is against reason as well as authority. A talented and distinguished gentleman, who was an inhabitant of the Mississippi territory, when it became a State of the Union, but who had never gone through the usual process of naturalization, was elected to the legislature of Louisiana from a particular district to which he had removed. The question arose whether he was a citizen of the United States and eligible. The Senate decided that he was. Judicial decisions sustaining the same principle, that all the inhabitants of the Mississippi at her admission into the Union became ipso facto citizens of the United States, have been frequently pronounced.—That particular individual has held many high offices in the State.

Mr. Downs contended that the proposition and the proviso were unconstitutional; that is, they conflicted with the Constitution of the United States, inasmuch as they were intended to establish a greater restriction than existed in that instrument. In support of this opinion, Mr. D. quoted the case of Collett against Collett, before the Circuit Court of the United States; 8 Dallas, vol. 2, page 294: also another case from the same book, which, said Mr. D., is still more explicit. These decisions Mr. Downs considered as deciding that the States cannot impose greater restrictions, in admitting foreigners to naturalization, than are imposed under the act of Congress. The States may require less, but they cannot require more. In some of the new States they have availed themselves of that construction to admit foreigners to citizenship upon easier terms.

He called upon gentlemen who appeared to have such great dread of admitting citizenship, to point out a solitary instance where any injury had resulted from the appointment of naturalized citizens under the State or general governments. They had never abused their trusts, whether employed in a civil or military capacity, and had invariably been remarkable for their attachment and devotion to the land of their adoption.

Mr. Downs said, on grounds of expediency he was strongly opposed to the amendments offered. He would not retort upon the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr.

Grymes) the harsh expression which that gentleman applied to the argument of the member from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston.) He would not say it was "unfair," but he would say that the gentleman's argument, as it was an argument upon the exception, and not the general rule, was illogical. The gentleman from New Orleans had fallen into the very error which he charged upon the delegate from Jefferson. That gentleman had attempted to rest his argument upon an exception—an exception liable to all the objections of an exception—and has adopted the contracted dogma of native Americanism. Let us look into its origin. When we desire to form correct opinions we naturally inquire into the opinions of others, and, so far as they are solid and consistent, do we attach confidence in those who may utter them. If the opinions expressed be good, we rely with greater authority on him that advances them, in other respects. This doctrine of native Americanism is not new. It comes from a very objectionable source; a source which is associated in our minds with every thing that is vile and degrading in politics. It first made its appearance in the days of federalism, and produced the famous alien and sedition law. Whenever the federal party could get on and hold its own, and occasionally succeed, the contest was waged upon broad national principles; but, when a series of disasters attended all its efforts it has invariably found fault with the institutions of the country, and has sought to contract them in their application.

So it was in 1798. That party discovered it must go down unless some expedient could save it, and it judged truly, for in 1800 it was hurled from its elevated position. With a view of bolstering it up by engendering prejudices and creating animosities in the community, the alien and sedition law was passed. It became a leading question, and a distinguished champion of democratic principles, one of whom Louisiana will ever be justly proud, was conspicuous in the struggle. Perhaps of all his productions, his arguments against that law was the best. Livingston was at that time a member of Congress from the State of New York. I remember reading it in my boyhood, and it made so great an impression upon me that I recollect it distinctly. It is one of the most admirable and conclusive arguments, and the State should get a copy and have it elegantly bound and deposited in the archives, as well in honor of its great author as because it was one of the best expositions extant upon the subject to which it refers. I have it in an abbreviated form, as well as the remarks of another distinguished democrat on the same subject, (Mr. Tazewell.) I will not detain the House by reading over any portion of these documents, but if members have any wish to see what were the opinions entertained at that time upon the alien and sedition law, the volume is at their service. The opposition to this act of oppression, was the rallying point of the democratic party. In the legislature of Kentucky prompt and decided action was taken, and in the legislature of Virginia introduced his famous resolutions. So soon as the democratic party got into power it was repealed, and the prisoners confined under its authority were set at liberty. The same principle which was then repudiated, hurled under foot, is now revived with all its narrow and contracting prejudices. From boyhood I have reprobated it as a principle of oppression and exclusion. Surely no man, certainly no democrat, can give to it his countenance.

The next occasion when the principles of the alien and sedition law were proclaimed was during Mr. Madison's administration, when the country was in a state of difficulty and embarrassment, when the President was menaced by enemies from abroad and enemies from within. It was at that critical period that a Convention was held in a little village in New England, which will give immortality to the place. We never would, otherwise, have heard of the village of Hartford. At this meeting of traitors, this very question of native Americanism was revived and brought out, conspicuously, with another question of vital and abiding interest to the South—the proposition to exclude a representation of our slaves. Such is the doctrine of Massachusetts at the present day.

In connection with this part of the subject, Mr. Downs would read an extract from the Southern Quarterly Review for 1844. The author's name was not given. But from the great ability with which the article was written, he presumed it was from the pen of a very distinguished gentleman—Professor Everett. It discussed the question of the annexation of Texas, which we are told will produce disunion, as we were told by the Hartford Convention that the representation of slaves would produce disunion. Here is the extract:

"Some year or two after, the Hartford Convention proposed amendments to the Constitution. Among which, we find a restriction upon Congress from admitting new States, without the consent of two-thirds; the withdrawal of the representation allowed to the slave-holding States, based upon the slave population; the exclusion of aliens from office and from the privileges of citizenship, except after a residence of twenty-one years; the limitation of the eligibility of the President to one term, and that he should not come twice from the same State. These amendments were proposed by the legislature of Connecticut to the other States of the Union. We have the reports of the legislatures of New Jersey and Pennsylvania upon them. In both they were peremptorily rejected, and we infer they met with favor nowhere."

Mr. President, said Mr. Downs, we find in this little extract, the spirit of the alien and sedition law revivified and blended, and in sweet communion with a new element of political strife endangering the peace and safety of the American Union. It met with no favor then. I trust it will meet with no favor now. We see in these precious doctrines the design to revolutionize the whole country and light the torch of civil war. It is the Hartford Convention sanctioning the federal doctrines of 1797, and again proclaiming the same principles, which when originally broached, had proved so disastrous to the party that espoused them. And are not these principles the same that have given rise to the native American party—the old federal party under a new phase? In 1800, the federal party were signally defeated, and meeting with a succession of reverses, they revived the exploded doctrines of 1797, and made war upon our institutions. Our institutions were not perfect enough for them, and they desired to make sweeping changes, so as to accomplish better their designs. The Hartford Convention of 1814 could not shine, its principles were bad ones; they were repudiated by the people, as in 1798, and as they will be repudiated again in 1844. Why are that party not more generous, why do they take their defeat so hard, why do they not adopt better principles, and refrain from invading the sacred privileges of the Constitution?

Mr. Downs then proceeded to show that the doctrines of the present native American party were not original. That the same hostility existed even before the passage of the alien and sedition law, and before the adoption of the federal Constitution. He read from the Madison papers to show that the same policy now advocated, to exclude persons of foreign birth from participating in the goverment of the country, were broached and insisted upon even at that time, with great pertinacity. He commented upon the views expressed by Mr. Butler, a member of the federal Convention, which embodied the very spirit of these invidious doctrines, and which have been spun out in the milk and water productions of the day as sustaining the policy of exclusion. He said the liberal opinions of Washington, Madison, Franklin, Wilson and other distinguished patriots were the reverse. They were not for exclusions, restrictions and restraints, and for denying the boon of citizenship to their fellow man. He considered the opinions of Franklin the more practical, because that distinguished man had spent a considerable time in Europe, and had the best opportunity of forming a correct judgment. What were the opinions of Franklin? They bore testimony to the good feelings of foreigners even in their own country, for our institutions, and his penetrating mind could discover none of those evils which have become of late a theme of so much pretended disquietude and reproach.

It may be said, that during a period of over sixty years, although several States have formed and modified their system of government, not one have incorporated the principle of placing the naturalized citizen in an inferior position to the native born citizen. If we except the States of Georgia and Maine, there is not a State in the Union that has adopted this illiberal distinction. The Constitution of Georgia was formed in 1790 and had reference to the peculiar geographical position of that State in the vicinity to the then dominions of Spain. As for the State of Maine, there was no discussion on the proposition in her convention. It appeared to have passed without ordinary consideration. So that, to use the common phrase, from Maine to Georgia, no such unworthy restriction existed in any of the constitutions of our sister States.

The weight and balance of authority was then against incorporating it in the Constitution. The opinions of the most eminent of the fathers of the American Constitution and of American liberty, were decidedly averse to any unusual length of probation for foreigners, who sought among us an asylum from oppression. The intendment and designs of the federal Constitution were, that the States should impose no greater restriction than were imposed by the laws of Congress; and if they did, these restrictions would be inoperative.

The opinions of all the eminent men, whose views he had quoted in direct conflict with the spirit of the amendment, exhibited that we ought not to adopt it.—Among these illustrious men was Mr. Wilson, to whom, after Mr. Madison, great credit was due. He conceded that the services of Mr. Madison were most eminent, but next to him no one had impressed a stronger mark of his mind upon the Constitution than did Mr. Wilson. That individual was a foreigner by birth, and however disposed some may be to carp at his opinions on that account, his name is an illustrious refutation of the fallacy of those new fangled doctrines of the day which would represent one class of citizens as less attached to their country than another.

These, said Mr. Downs, are my general views. They are not hastily nor inconsiderately formed. Nor are they alone my particular views, nor those of my particular party. They are the views of men who are not blinded to the true interest of the country, and who are not carried away by the impulses of prejudice.

To show that some members of the whig party fully conceive the folly of the crusades urged against naturalized citizens, I will (said Mr. Downs,) read an extract from the Louisville Weekly Journal, the editor of which paper is a distinguished writer and a personal and political friend of the late whig candidate for the presidency. I differ with him on all political subjects. It will be seen that, although he displays a strong bias, yet he pronounces himself decidedly against the recent movement of his party to organize themselves under a new name, and upon the principle of hostility to foreigners. This article was penned immediately after the defeat of Mr. Clay, and may be considered a sort of funeral oration, or an explanation of the causes that prevented the whigs from making a better fight.

(Mr. Downs here read the extract referred to, and in connection an extract from the New York Tribune, another whig paper, reprobating the policy of fighting for new issues.)

So, Mr. President, you will see that the views I have expressed are not exclusively my own, nor that of the party to which I belong. As for the success of the present movement against naturalized citizens, it is my deliberate opinion that the wise policy inculcated by Madison, Franklin, and Wilson, will not be abandoned for half a century, if even then; and that our country, with her native and adopted citizens, notwithstanding the efforts to divide the community and to engender local prejudices and animosities, will move on to the accomplishment of her high and exalted destinies.

The gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Grymes,) who displayed a certain kind of liberality, had said that the American tree of liberty had been planted amid perils and strife, and that all might freely come and repose themselves under its shade. It is true, Mr. President, that the tree is now strong, and that it has taken root upon our soil. It has been exposed to shocks and tempests, but it has weathered the storm. It should, however, be remembered that it was not always strong and vigorous, nor was it permanently established. Some sixty or seventy years ago it was a feeble, percarious plant, and was exposed to eminent peril. It then required the protection of stout hearts and willing hands, and adopted, as well as native citizens, crowded around it to keep it from danger. There was then no petty jealousies—no local animosities, and the blood of foreigners freely commingled with the blood of native citizens, to nourish the tree. It may not be forgotten that, on a dark and stormy night, an officer approached the Canadian shore, and that he sealed the cause of liberty with his life. It was Montgomery, and his Irish blood was freely shed to secure and preserve vitality to that tender plant. De Kalb, and a host of other patriots, contended with the nerve of freemen that it should not be uprooted and destroyed; and if we are now basking under its foliage, we should not forget that our fellow men from all parts of the world, assisted us in rearing and preserving it. We should not forget that one of the most important battles, in fact the one that put a termination to the war, and secured our independence,—I allude to the battle of York Town—another San Jacinto was gained, by the joint co-operation of the American forces, under Gen. Washington, and the French forces, under Lafayette—two columns advanced to the charge, one American and the other French. We should not, in a moment of exultation, flushed by prosperity, forget the friends that stood by us in the hour of our darkest peril. We should not forget the incalculable services rendered to us by Lafayette, who left a proud and lofty position in his own country, to sustain and defend our liberties; who perilled his life, and freely offered his fortune. These things should be in the recollection of the gentleman, (Mr. Grymes,) and in the recollection of the other gentlemen, who appeared so little disposed to extend the inestimable privilege of American citizens beyond the immediate boundaries of our soil. Nor was Lafayette alone in that generous devotion to our cause. A few years ago I visited Saratoga's plains, where a foreigner, an Englishman achieved the next greatest victory, certainly in its results, to York Town.—That victory deranged the whole plan of the enemy, and paved the way for our final success. The officer to whom I allude was General Gates.

I repeat what I asserted yesterday, that no example can be pointed out, of any detriment having ever been done to the United States by a naturalized citizen, either in a military or civil capacity.

There was no end to the restrictions upon the people, when they were once begun. If you say that no citizen shall be allowed the privilege of voting except he has been five years in the State, you may go another step and say that he shall not vote without property, you may then say he shall not vote without landed property, and so on until you have brought the restriction within its narrowest limits.

I have developed the reasons, which, in my opinion, should induce us to reject the section, with its odious amendments. In the name of the people of Louisiana, of our common constituents, I call for the rejection of the section, and I hope my motion will prevail.

Mr. Sellers said, I will not, Mr. President, attempt to enter into the wide range that this discussion has taken; and would not now trespass upon the attention of the Convention, were it not to repel a personal allusion. The gentleman who has just sit down, has alluded to my relations with my constituents. I think that the time of the gentleman would be better occupied in discharging his own duties, than by alluding to mine. I presented a proposition to strike out the whole section, because I thought the people should be left unrestricted in their choice. That proposition failed, and it is the sense of the Convention that there should be some qualifications enumerated in the Constitution, for those who may present themselves for the suffrages of the people. Upon that proposition I consider myself authorized to vote for the period which appears to me best calculated to attain the end proposed, by its adoption.

Mr. Grymes said: Mr. President, I rise with some considerable embarrassment to make some remarks in reply to the speech of the gentleman from Ouachita. It has been said by that gentleman, that the few observations I made yesterday were marked with sarcasms and a harshness of expression. I was not conscious of being sarcastic, either in word or in manner. Surely nothing was further from me than to say any thing which could be construed into sarcasm. I am amazed that it can be conceived I intended sarcasm, or that my words could be stamped as such. In the few observations I made I am not sensible even of the slightest harshness. I feel, under such a reproach, somewhat embarrassed, and I must say this, that either the gentleman from Ouachita misapprehended my remarks, or I have not understood his. To suppose any severity on my part, surely grows out of misapprehension and misconstruction. I answered simply the speech of the honorable member from Jefferson, and combatted his propositions. That was all!

But the gentleman from Ouachita complains that I applied the term "unfair" to the arguments of the member from Jefferson. The gentleman from Jefferson and myself have pursued the profession of the law more years than it is pleasant to look back upon. I would ask him if there be any severity, any peculiar harshness in qualifying an argument that is ingenious, plausible, as "unfair." An ingenious man will draw false deductions, and if you admit his premises, he will argue you out of house and home. I could not say the arguments of that gentleman were fair, when I conceived them to be specious only, and I am at a loss to perceive how I transgressed.

I dislike all such explanations, and deprecate an over sensitiveness which discovers offence when none is intended. I trust that such a spirit will not interfere with the freedom of debate. I wou'd not willingly offend, nor would I treat the arguments of a member otherwise than with deference. I would consider it to be a heinous offence to wound the feelings of any one. Having set myself right upon this matter of "sarcasm," I will proceed to notice the arguments of the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs.)

That gentleman found fault with what I said in relation to the powers of the Convention, and the duties of its members. The gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston) in treating upon this subject, endeavored to draw a distinction between the Convention and the people. As if the Convention had the powers independent of the people, of expressing its own will; in a word he endeavored to place the Convention and the people in antagonistical positions; whereas, I contended that the Convention were the people, assembled for the purpose of considering their organic law. According to that gentleman, we were endeavoring by stringent restrictions to confine the people. I utterly repudiate such a notion, and deny that this Convention design to interfere with the franchises of the people, of whom they are the immediate and specific mandataries. I cannot conceive what restrictions the Convention would impose, that would be contrary to the will of the people. The people have all power. It is their province to determine, and they will determine through their Convention, how far and upon what basis suffrage shall be extended; who shall be eligible to serve them. They will determine how citizenship may be acquired by those who choose to come among them. It cannot be shown that in this the Constitution of the United States is violated; for that instrument does not pretend to regulate suffrage in the States. The people of the State clearly have the right to say who shall exercise the political power of the State. It may be a question of expediency how far suffrage shall be extended, and what facilities shall be accorded, to acquire citizenship. Whether we shall require any residence, or no residence. Whether a man shall have the right of voting when he touches our shores, or whether he shall be admitted to a probation, to prepare him for the duties and responsibilities of citizenship. That is the only real question. Upon that footing, and that footing alone, should it be placed. Can it be shown that by admitting every body to the enjoyment of suffrage, that it will promote the permanent interests of the State—that it will promote the happiness of her real population? I have heard no argument upon that point. The States of Georgia and Maine have deemed some restriction, similar to the proposition before us, but only greater in extent, as necessary and proper. But, in place of arguments upon the question, we are met by a disquisition upon the alien and sedition law and the Hartford Convention, and an attempt, a labored attempt to show, that there is something in common between them and the present proposition. The gentleman from Ouachita need not have sought in such doubtful and objectionable sources for the principle embodied in the section, as it has been amended. There was no point of contact. The Hartford Convention had no more to do with this principle than the Convention has to do with an imperial Ukasse. He could have found that identical principle enumerated elsewhere—consecrated in an instrument which combined the wisdom and the intelligence of the fathers of our institutions. He cou'd have found it in the Constitution of the United States, where it stands until this day undisputed and unquestioned.

But the gentleman (Mr. Downs) contends that the principle requiring residence from naturalized citizens, and identical with that for native born citizens of the other States, is unconstitutional; and in order to establish his position he has read to us a decision of the United States Court. The gentleman will pardon me for answering him as to the pertinence of this authority upon the question under debate. If we were in another arena it would require no answer from me. What is the amount of this authority? It is the case of Collett against Collett; and if I answer the gentleman, it is because the house may expect an answer. I will read the decision. The simple question in that case was this, whether an individual was a subject of his Britannic Majesty or a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania. I will not read the arguments of counsel, for they are neither here nor there, but the decision of the Court upon the point involved. It is quite short.

What does it amount to? To this simply, that the indiviual having been naturalized by the local authorities of the State of Pennsylvania, having taken the oath of allegiance, and gone through all the formalities of law, was a citizen of the United States, and therefore no longer a subject of Great Britain, and could not sue in that court as he desired to do.

What is the next citation of the gentleman? It is equally strange and unfortunate. I will not detain the House by reading the arguments of counsel; they are ingenuous; but what say the court? There is no relation between what they say and the matter before us. The judges pronounce that a certain individual a Spaniard by birth, is not a citizen of the United States and therefore cannot commit treason, and they accordingly discharge him. There is certainly no point of contact between this and the provision requiring a residence of five years to become a citizen of Louisiana.—The question in the first case, reported in Dallas, was whether an individual who had taken the oath of allegiance, and complied with the formalities of law, before the Mayor of Philadelphia, was a citizen of the United States. The court reply affirmatively! The next question was whether a Spaniard, charged with treason, was a citizen of the United States.—The court reply in the negative, and he is discharged. What analogy do these decisions have? How do they bear, in the remotest manner, an affinity with the question before us?

The gentleman from Ouachita speaks of pledges given. I do not know whether he intends to include me in the number of those he alluded to. I can tell that gentleman, if he does, that I stand on this floor without reference to any pledges. I was sent to express my opinions, after a full declaration on my part, of what those opinions were.—A large portion of those who cast their suffrages for me, differ with me upon many political points. By electing me they adopted my opinions. I came here against my repeated declarations and wishes. I had no political objects to subserve, and it was with great reluctance I assumed the grave responsibility of representing them on this occasion. I have but a short time to remain in this world, and I did not certainly intend to meddle with politics. There were so many more that were willing to take the onerous burthen. I have come to express my opinions, and these I shall ever express with frankness and candor—not with harshness—not with sarcasm—but with amity—with the respect I owe to myself and others.

In regard to the principle involved in the provision under debate, the gentleman from Ouachita has sought to show that it is unconstitutional. This is something very indefinite. It is a non seguitur. In reference to what is it unconstitutional? The old constitution? If it be unconstitutional in that respect, then, it seems to me, that any change from the disportions of the old constitution will be unconstitutional, and our special mission here is useless. I would ask the gentleman from Ouachita in what respect the provision is unconstitutional?

[Mr. Downs: the Constitution of the United States.]

Mr. Grymes: with what particular provision? There is only one section in that instrument that has the most remote allusion to the subject. And that is the second section of the 4th article. (Mr. Grymes read the section referred to.)

Well (continued Mr. G.) how does it operate in derogation to the provision before us? The first inquiry is, what does it mean, that a citizen of our State shall be entitled to all the privileges of citizenship in another? I would ask the gentleman from Lafayette, (Mr. Preston.) if there is any thing repugnant in this provision. If the provision declare that a citizen of Louisiana shall not be elegible to a vote unless he shall have resided ten years in the parish where he offers his vote, will it be said that a gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to a vote ten days after his arrival. Gentlemen will not contend that the Constitution of the United States sanctions such an inequality.

If I were disposed to be invidious, I would ask the gentleman from Jefferson, who has said so much in praise (I say nought against them) of foreigners; and I would not stop them from bettering their condition by coming among us, although the stream grows larger and larger every day, on a scale certainly commensurate with all our wants: I would ask, I say, if it were not perhaps invidous, the Attorney General, if there were none that were bad and vicious; if he never met any such at the bar; and if it were alone American citizens, by birth, that were to be found there. I presume he would find, notwithstanding his eulogiums, the mass of statistics the other way.

Mr. Grymes was not disposed to be illiberal or narrow minded. Our laws secured to foreigners the most essential privileges—greater than were accorded to foreign subjects by any other nation—they were protected in their person and property as much as American citizens: they possessed the faculty of holding property and of transmitting it to their heirs; in a word, they possessed every thing. But in respect to suffrage, it was deemed necessary that there should be something to indicate—to sustain the presumption of attachment and loyalty to their new country. They were to be subjected to an apprenticeship of four years, after which they could be members of the legislature, and were equal to participate with us in the government of the country.

Can they acquire the necessary knowledge to make them good and useful citizens in one single day? Can they approach the ballot box and discreetly use the privilege so prematurely bestowed upon them? Can they have sufficient knowledge of men and parties to vote understandingly? Why are talents searched for? If persons who have no knowledge of our institutions—no knowledge of our public men, save that intuitive knowledge—that emanation of god-like intelligence and patriotism which the member from Jefferson, in his admiration for mankind, has implanted in the human breast but which unfortunately for his theory is contradicted by actual experience, are allowed to determine and control the destinies of the country at the ballot box.

There are three distinct classes of foreigners that come among us. One class disgusted with the restraints of monarchical governments are disposed to give to our liberal institutions the form of license.—Another class are influenced by all the prejudices and hostilities against our institutions which they have imbided in their native land and in their early youth; and the third class are thrown upon our shores by the strong arm of necessity—they have not the means of sustaining life at home. The latter are by far the most numerous class.

If we accord to them the privilege of controlling and giving destination to our property, we have only to go one step further, and, in order to place them upon a perfect equality, by some kind of agrarian law, to divide our possessions with them.

The gentleman from Ouachita has read to us numerous passages from the delegates in the federal Convention upon the question of admitting foreigners to naturalization. The views of individual members of that body, among whom there appeared to be some diversity of opinion, may be well enough sought to satisfy our curiosity, but certainly can have no effect in influencing our judgments, inasmuch as the Constitution is the concentrated wisdom of the whole body, and in that instrument we find the identical principle recognized of a distinction between native citizens and foreigners, is vested with the power of prescribing and regulating their admission to citizenship. Notwithstanding the peculiar opinions of Mr. Wilson, who was himself a foreigner by birth, and no doubt a very worthy man, and some other distinguished men—the Convention that formed the Constitution were not prepared to receive foreigners and admit them to citizenship without any formality, and to make no difference between them and citizens by birth. Hence, we find that in another section the qualifications for members of Congress for one branch, for citizens by naturalization are seven years residence, and for the other nine years. If the opinions of Mr. Wilson did not prevail at that time, how can it reasonably be expected that they ought to prevail now. And, if there be any thing really odious as has been assumed, the charge is applicable to the framers of the federal Constitution, for there the principle stands recorded.

I have been accused of treating with a certain levity foreigners. I deny that I have done so. I am not inimical to them. In what I have said, I answered only what fell from the gentleman from Jefferson, who, in his admiration for foreigners, and in his anxiety to recruit our population with fresh hordes, has assumed that we should open the flood-gates and let the stream pour in upon us, in order that we should have the lights of science and intelligence diffused among us. I certainly do not object to Europeans—I do not object even to Asiatics, provided they do not insist upon our adopting their code of morals! We receive all with hospitality; they are left free to pursue whatever trade of industry they choose—they are placed under the protection of our laws. We receive them in our home, we give them the best that we are possessed of, we kill the fatted calf; but if we deny them the government of our homes, it is said we are harsh and illiberal. They must not only regulate our homes, but they must even have the choice of the cook and the ordering of the servants!

The gentleman from Ouachita has alluded to the services we have received from foreigners during our revolutionary war. I would not disparage any of those services. I am willing to admit them to their fullest extent. The gentleman has spoken too of the sacrifices made by Lafayette; that he relinquished the honors and distinction of nobility to give us a helping hand. I am surprised that the relinquishment of nobility should appear to be an object of such vast magnitude to a simple republican. Lafayette served us faithfully, but he could not accuse us with ingratitude. He was received as the nation's guest, from one extremity of the Union to the other, and our statute books contain the evidence that we did not stint ourselves to mere outward expression. We were liberal and generous, as far as liberality and generosity could go. Exclusive donations of land were made to Lafayette, and even so far were his services acknowledged, that the office of Governor of Louisiana upon its acquisition was tendered to him, but like a good man he refused it.

The proposition is clear that each State is sovereign, and may use all those which are not delegated to the general government by the federal compact, but which are reserved to the States and the people. It is clearly then, within the province of each State to regulate and declare upon what terms local citizenship may be obtained, and this is a question exclusively of expediency. If the gentlemen who are opposed to any guarantee, and who are in favor of admitting strangers to suffrage, can show that it will be expedient to do so, then the argument has ended, and I shall cheerfully vote to strike out all and any restriction upon the acquisition of suffrage. But they have not done so, nor will they argue the question upon legisla ive grounds, but they take exceptions, and assume premises having no connection with the subject matter under debate.

The gentleman from Ouachita has told us an anecdote to show that although Patrick Henry was a great orator, he was not a man of business, and has insinuated an analogy between that distinguished individual and myself. I have not the pretentions to think the compliment is at all deserved, nor do I value myself upon any faculty I may possess of speaking. The art of speaking is, perhaps the least valuable. It is evanescent, and when one's thoughts are expressed by speech, they are retained only through an imperfect recollection. It is true the words may be taken down, but the manner and expression that gave them force are not there, and they are lifeless and insipid; whereas, the faculty of expressing our thoughts in writing, is enduring through all time, and by the possession of the press, may be diffused to countless thousands.—This gratification, I trust, the gentleman from Ouachita fully enjoys. I do not pretend to possess any great aptitude for business, and in that respect I may be more like Patrick Henry than the gentleman who institutes the comparison.

Mr. Grymes concluded by an earnest appeal in favor of the section as it had been amended.

Mr. Marigny said, that notwithstanding the impatience displayed by several members of the Convention, he would avail himself of his right to develope his views in order that they might have the utmost extension. New Orleans embraces within her limits a large number of naturalized citizens, whose cause he could not and would not abandon; but even if there were only one among his constituents whose rights were attempted to be invaded, he would, as he did now, enter the lists in their defence.

I shall, said Mr. MARIGNY, respond briefly to the distinguished and influential gentleman that has just addressed you.

A very simple question has been converted into one of colossal dimensions, and has been argued so as to create unnecessary fears. The gigantic conceptions and prodigious subtlety of the arguments that have been employed call for the experience, the eloquence and the learning of one of my colleagues, (Mr. Sou'é) but indisposition prevents him from addressing the House, and I feel myself called upon to attempt the task at a moment, when to my great surprise and that of many others, the senatorial delegate from my district has placed himself at the head of the opposition. I do not enjoy the advantages of being like him an orator, a lawyer and a dialectician, but nevertheless, I feel that Providence will neither deny the force nor the logic of which I stand in need to refute his arguments!

Let us turn our eyes around this room for as a general examines the force of the enemy and their position, so the orator should understand the assembly whom he addresses, and discover the habitual designs of parties. We are here seventy-seven delegates. Some are here to prevent all amelioration. Others to secure to the people greater privileges than those accorded by the Constitution of 1812. That is to say, the majority after repeated protestations and renewed exertions, have succeeded in calling a Convention—the minority have sent their representatives here with the well understood design of arresting and preventing all amelioration. Here is our position, and here is the cause of the divergence of opinion that has manifested itself among us, and the excitement of passions that have agitated our proceedings. But let us look at the question.

Under the old Constitution the people may select their representation from either the naturalized or the native born citizens, so much so as regards the former, that five years after their arrival, upon their being naturalized, they may aspire to that proud distinction. Well, the minority who have heretofore found that principle a good one, profit by the dissensions in our ranks, to extend this time of probation, and design, hereafter, that no naturalized citizen shall enjoy the same privilege, unless he reside nine years in the country—five in the republic, and four in the State.

I confess that never did any thing surprise me more than this proviso, and I am induced to believe that its mover did not fully comprehend its extent. In vain did the delegate from Jefferson ask what was to be obtained by this proviso. Why was it desired to destroy rights consecrated for thirty years, and which had been unattended with the slightest detriment to the State. What harm had ever been done by naturalized citizens, that they should be treated with so much rigor? Whether it were reasonable, just or wise, to repulse men whose ancestors participated so honorably in the good administration of the country, as well as in the elaboration of our laws, as in pursuit of honorable and profitable avocations.

No reply was made to that delegate, except by amusing phrases, by a silence, the motives of which it was easy to comprehend, and by citing laws that had no bearing upon the question; for these laws existed elsewhere, and there were no grounds to give them weight in a Convention, the special mission of which was to diminish the public burthens, and to increase the public privileges. Already, by the defection of which I have spoken, has it occasioned the loss of two important rights belonging to the people.

Let the minority continue but to succeed in this way, and the people will soon find that in place of an executive, a dictator will be imposed upon them. How is it that men, capable of reasoning, should, like the member from Attakapas, (Mr. Voorhies) imagine that a stranger cannot understand our institutions in less than nine years. I know full well that it requires seven years to learn the Greek and Latin, but I did not know that it required nine years to understand a constitution of four or five pages! It is of no use to argue with those who are forced to take refuge in so restricted a position.

Let us see how the elevation of sentiment compensates for the feebleness of argument. The delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs,) has eloquently described the heroic march of a French column at the memorable battle of York town; and my colleague, (Mr. Grymes.) with impassable coolness, replies, "well be it so, but we have largely paid for these services." But when, Mr. President, has French blood been paid for with gold? The French people, in whose veins it ran pure and generous, compelled their King to pronounce against England, and to send aid, in men and money, to our republic—at that time scarcely born—and when the most experienced, doubted the possibility of assuring its independence; and after these important services, in the moment of prosperity, we reply to the fraternity and sublime devotion of our faithful ally and friend, and say proudly, "be silent, we have paid you!" A man who poetized the republic, as Homer poetized Mythology, traversed the continent to announce that at length the standard of liberty floated in the West, and that it was the interest of nations to assure its triumph.

We reply, "Lafayette, we have fully paid in money for all your services!" I knew that we wished to convert the intellectual world into materiable matter, but I did not know that we made of merit and of services an affair of bankers and money brokers!

Let there be no mistake, as to the designs entertained: they are neither those of reason, nor conviction. Eloquence and address are relied upon more than truth and justice. But where shall we be led by this policy? To labor without an object, and to incur useless expenses.

The people, without exception of origin, crushed in their dearest sentiments, will reject the constitution that has been adopted by management. The minority, it is true, will have accomplished their object, which has always been to preserve the old constitution; but the Treasury will be diminished by eighty thousand dollars, and the people will be again thrown upon the tempest of excitement.

Inimical as I have always been to radicalism, I was far from thinking that those on the opposite side, would have pushed their views so far, and nothing remains for me but to deplore their course. They are about inflicting evils upon us greater than those of which we should be cured. The people, fatigued sooner or later, will do that which their agents have refused to do.—See what they have done, and then comprehend how they can conquer and reign. Charles the First, of England resisted the demands of the people, and his head fell under the axe directed by Cromwell, the prophet of the people. Louis XVI hesitated between the court and the people, and his head rolled upon the block of the convention and of the people. Charles Xth receded before the popular movement, and was conducted to the tomb through the route of exile! The nobility and clergy were disposed to remain stationary in Spain, and the people became excited, had recourse to fire—to blood—assassination—and to poison; for it was necessary that they should triumph and that necessity made them blind and cruel.

Let the minority reflect! Their triumph will be but momentary; the people in their anger will have no more respect for persons than property and when another Convention shall be called, to correct the error of ours, nothing will prehaps remain but the mallet of the President.

Mr. Culbertson said that he had voted in favor of the proposition of the delegate from Attakapas, but upon maturer reflection, and having heard the question fully debated, he would vote against the section as it had been amended.

On motion of Mr. Ledoux, who expressed the desire of making some remarks upon the subject under consideration, the Convention then adjourned.

Thursday, January 23, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened by prayer from the reverend Mr. Hinton.

Mr. Wadsworth informed the Convention that this was the day on which he was agreeably to previous notice, to ask for the re-consideration of the section fixing the general elections for November.

The question was taken, on the motion, to re-consider, and the ayes and nays were called for.

Yeas—Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant Chinn, Derbes, Dunn, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau Marigny, Roman, St. Amant, Saunders, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Wadsworth, Courad of Orleans, Eustis, Claiborne, and Roselius—27.

Nays—Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Convillon, Downs, Garrett Humble, Hynson, M'Callop, M'Rea Mayo, O Brian, Peets Penn, Porche, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Stevens, Taylor of Assumption, Ledoux, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Leonard, and Winder,—37.

So the motion to re-consider was lost.

Mr. Wadsworth presented a resolution for the appointment of an additional reporter in English.

Mr. Voorhies supported the resolution.

Mr. Lewis expressed himself opposed to electing another reporter; he apprehended that the present reporter was sufficient. If Mr. Kelly was unable to fulfill his contract, we should be under the unpleasant necessity of displacing him.

Mr. Wadsworth would modify the resolution by proposing to appoint a committee to examine and report what was the cause of delay in the publication of the reports.

Mr. Chinn saw no necessity for referring the matter to a committee; the secretary might communicate all desired information.

The motion to refer to a committee of five members prevailed, and the president appointed Messrs. Wadsworth, Lewis, Claiborne, O'Brian and Waddill members of the committee.

Order of the Day.—The Convention took up the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution, which was under discussion, when the convention adjourned yesterday.

Mr. Ledoux rose and said: Mr. President, although I have the honor to hold a seat in this body, it may appear presumptuous for me to rise from it, to enlighten those who have so much more judgment and experience. When I look around me, I see men whose age, talents and experience make them my superiors in every thing, except, perhaps, in good intentions. It would seem that I would be justified in listening to what fell from them, and regulating my opinion upon the weight of theirs. But the subject before us is one of too much importance, and a sense of duty will not permit me to remain silent. I cannot concur in the position assumed by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Grymes,) that we are the people. I apprehend that this assertion embodies a dangerous doctrine. The argument, that because this body is a creation of the people, that, therefore, whatever it does is done by the people, is tantamount to this: God made man, man robs his neighbor, and therefore God is the author of the theft! We are but agents of the people. An experience of 30 years convinces them that there were dispositions in their organic law, not consonant with true liberty and true republicanism. They have determined to assume the powers which they confided to the framers of the old constitution, and if we are convened here, it is only for the purpose of remedying the evils and inconveniences of which they so loudly complain. This is our mission, and nothing more!

I consider the proviso proposed by the delegate from Attakapas, (Mr. Voorhies,) as embracing odious restrictions upon the sacred rights of the people. It is an unwarrantable attempt to control their liberties.

Suppose, for example, that a planter needs an overseer, and it suits him to employ one from the North or from Europe. Can he, without a violation of principle, be compelled to choose one at home or in an adjoining parish? When the founders of our government determined that our institutions should be based on the popular will, it was because they confided in the sagacity and judgment of the people, and that the people, the source of all power, would not be led astray.

Why should we distrust the people? Why should we pursue the course of severity towards them, and repulse those who have sought an asylum upon our shores. Our naturalized citizens have been as devoted, as attached to the country as our native citizens. They have always been faithful to us in the hour of danger, and are we to repulse them in the day of prosperity? I hope that this will not be done. Not only do those from foreign countries appreciate our liberties and our institutions, but they dislike any other appellation than that of an American citizen.

I shall never forget the appropriate and beautiful response of a distinguished gentleman who was formerly one of our citizens, but now a resident of New York. When on a visit to Virginia he was taunted with being a foreigner. You ask me, said he, to the person who addressed him at a public meeting, whether I am a citizen of the United States? Sir, I have been naturalized four times; the first time I was naturalized in virtue of the treaty of cession of Louisiana to the United States; the second time I was naturalized in virtue of the establishment of a territorial form of government in Louisiana; the third time by the admission of Louisiana into the Union; and the fourth time, you are no doubt anxious to know how I again became entitled to the privileges of American citizenship, and who were my sponsors—it was on the battle field, fire and water were the symbols, victory, patriotism and glory, were my godmother, and General Jackson my godfather!

I shall not make any comments upon this happy retort. Foreigners who have been baptised under the auspices of Washington, Adams, Jefferson and Jackson, will never prove recreant to the sacred principles of the Constitution, nor insensible to the impulses of patriotism. They have never been recreant in the moment of danger—they will not be recreant in the days of prosperity and sun-shine!

I entertain no fears of their fidelity and attachment. I have unbounded confidence in them, as I have in those who first drew their breath in this land of liberty: I make no insiduous distinctions between native and adopted citizens; and I would leave the people free to choose whether they would entrust their interest to one of their native fellow-citizens, or one of their adopted fellow-citizens, believing that upon the patriotism, integrity and virtue, of both classes depend the durability of our institutions, and the happiness of our people.

Mr. President, I think I comprehend our mission. The people are competent to take care of themselves. Let us commit the ship of State in all confidence to their hands; let them appoint, without let or hindrance, the captain, engineer, and the whole crew to man her, and we need entertain no fears but that she will proudly sail upon a sea of glory, and be wafted by the propitious gales of prosperity to the port of happiness.

I shall not detain the Convention further than to say, that I shall vote against the section as it has been amended.

Mr. Ratliff rose under a sense of duty to enter his solemn protest again against the principle embodied in the section. It was, he repeated, unjust, partial and oppressive. He would not apologize to the Convention for trespassing upon their attention after the brilliant and masterly arguments they had heard from the most distinguished members of this body. He had not the vanity nor presumption to suppose that any thing he could say would over-balance what had fallen from them, or add to its force. He did not pretend to vie with them in oratory—they were literary men—men of great weight of character. But my constitutients, said Mr. Ratliff, have sent me here to perform a most important duty, and, however feeble may be my powers and inadequate my conceptions, I feel bound to exert myself to the utmost of my poor abilities.

I trembled (continued Mr. Ratliff,) when I heard the motion to strike out the qualifications in the section, for radical and destructive as I have been called, I am not for mutilating the old Constitution in those parts that have been sanctioned and still are sanctioned by the unanimous approval of those that sent us here, and whose wishes we ought to follow, and not our own sudden caprices. I predicted to my constituents what has actually occurred—that radical and destructive as I am called, they would see me defending the Constitution from the attacks of those that are denominated conservatives, and upholding those liberal provisions in it which the people have so much revered, and which induced them to submit so long to the blemishes and defects which it contained.

The distinguished gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Grymes,) in order to give point and force to his arguments, has imagined the tree of liberty extending its branches over the whole of this Union—open to all for shelter, exposed to be hacked and cut down by foreigners; and to prevent this direful result, he tells us that we must pass the proposition of the gentleman from Attakapas, (Mr. Voorhies.) I can see, Mr. President, no danger of such a calamity.—Our naturalized citizens are as much interested in the preservation of that tree, in keeping it in its green and flourishing state as we are ourselves! What do the lessons of experience teach us? Has there ever been a naturalized citizen, who was found recreant or inimical to our institutions? whose patriotism has not responded to the exigencies of the public service? I know not, Sir, of a single instance; and why should they all of a sudden abandon their attachment and fidelity to the country and conspire against its liberties? Why should they do so? But if their patriotism be really extinct—if those that arrive upon our shores be recreant to patriotic impulses, is there not a strong evidence, a selfish one it is true, but an all-powerful one still existing to restrain them from their fell purpose. What are they to gain by destroying our liberties? Do they not destroy at the same time the asylum which has given them protection—which has placed them upon an equality of rights, and where are they to flee? Why prolong the term of probation? Why make it longer than the acts of Congress have established? If five years be too short, let the concentrated wisdom of the nation apply the remedy. But do not let Louisiana say to a bona fide American citizen, "Sir, you must wait four years longer before we can recognize you as a citizen, although every where else you are, to all intents and purposes, an American citizen? There is something exceedingly harsh and contracted in this, and it leads much further than some gentlemen imagine. It may embrace some of the constituents of the very gentleman that presented it—some of them who may have voted for him—and yet he turns round and by a general principle excludes some of the very individuals that sent him here; for it may very well happen that among the voters there had been some but recently naturalized; and they would, if this principle is adopted, be obliged to relinquish their privileges of citizenship, until the expiration of the four years that are prescribed.

[Mr. Voorhies: the gentleman is entirely mistaken. My proposition cannot have a retroactive effect, and it certainly never was my design that it should. I consider personal rights that have been acquired under the sanction of our laws as vested rights, and not to be interfered with. I will repeat, so as to avoid any misconstruction of my motives, that I have no hostility nor dislike for naturalized citizens. I make no distinctions between them and other citizens; and my proposition goes no further than for the future, to place naturalized citizens removing from other States on a precise equality with other citizens, removing to Louisiana; and requiring four years residence from both to qualify them for assuming the management of our public affairs.]

Mr. Ratliff: I do not understand your provision thus. It embraces the past as well as the future, at least the language would authorize that interpretation. But to continue.

The honorable delegate from N. Orleans, (Mr. Grymes,) thinks it very hard that any one should complain of severity being employed towards foreigners, when he says they are received with open arms; that the fatted calf is killed for them, and that they are made welcome. But that, not satisfied with this noble treatment, they turn around and wish to command the good man's house, to order about his servants, and complain of his cook. Very well; but if the stranger should marry one of the daughters and become a member of the family, it seems to me that in that case his tastes ought to be consulted, and some regard ought to be paid to his wishes.

I do not in the least object to the arguments of the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr Grymes,) he struck some powerful blows, and managed with infinite tact and address what will never fail to exercise some influence in debate—ridicule and sarcasm. But after all, the result of his masterly effort was not as astounding as might have been anticipated. Some of the minority may have been amused at his manner of disposing of the arguments of his adversaries, but he did not change a single opinion, a proof that, although his argument was able, it was not convincing; on the contrary, one gentleman who had voted with the majority, with the independence and judgment that characterized him, declared his intention to change his position, because he considered his first conclusions were wrong, and that almost immediately after the brilliant display of the member from New Orleans. It is very easy to perceive that reflection will not sustain the principle under discussion. It is odious, because it is exclusive, and, as for any pretended danger that the people will elect persons to represent them who are not identified with the State, the idea is preposterous. They will do no such thing. There are too many old stagers to take the stump, in whom the people have already implicit confidence, for confidence is a plant of slow growth, and does not attain its maturity in a day, or in a year.

Another consideration, if we impose restrictions, we will make our work odious, and the people will not accept it. They will repudiate it. It will be a Constitution of mere waste paper; for such is the form of our Government, that, however certain individuals may be inclined to doubt the sagacity of the popular will, there is no proceeding without it. It is indispensable to measures and to men.

Our mission is confined simply to amending such parts of the old Constitution as the public voice has reprobated. We have no business to attempt to anticipate the wishes of the people beyond this; but we should respect, and leave inviolate every disposition in the constitution, where no amendments have been demanded by the people. The conservatives, as they are called in contradistinction to the radicals, faithfully promised to stand by the old Constitution, and permit as few changes in that instrument as possible. On that ground those that are here were elected, and on no other; and I, a radical, now call upon them to respect their engagement with the people.

Why should we indulge in petty jealousies and idle apprehensions? Is it probable that the legislature will ever be composed of strangers to our institutions, of persons having no vote or interest in our community? We have only to look at the principal and most of the subordinate offices of our State, to be convinced that there is a natural feeling of preference in favor of the native population. There is no need of fostering it by unworthy appeals. The highest offices of the State are in the hands of the creoles of the State. The speaker of House, the president of the Senate, the governor of the State, the treasurer of the State are all creoles. The two gentlemen whose names have been mentioned, as probable candidates for governor, are both creoles. Has any one complained? No, the American population from the other States, and the naturalized population, are well satisfied that it should be so. How many men of sterling merit never have distinguished themselves, for want of a proper occasion? Thousands of Washingtons and Bonapartes have died in obscurity, behind the plough. They wanted the occasion to devolope their genius. The greatest men our country has ever produced, have risen by the force of their own genius. Witness Henry Clay, who was once a mill boy. Do not let us destroy competition; on the contrary, let us stimulate it, and let the honors be to that man who renders the greatest services to mankind, be he born on the soil or elsewhere. There is no fear of our being outdone by persons from other countries; we have natural advantages over them, that give us already a decided advantage in the race. Each parish, and each section of the State has its men of recognized standing, and they are not to be thrown aside to give place to perfect strangers, that have arrived yesterday, or the day before, as some gentlemen apprehend. Why, humble as I am, and feeble as are my powers, I am afraid of being beaten by no man in my district, as long as I shall do my duty, and when I cease to do it I ought to be beat. There is not a foreigner, however brilliant may be his tallents, that could beat old Cy Ratliff, in West Feliciana, if such an one was made elegible to office to-morrow, and was to run with him in competition for the suffrages of the people. It is idle to pretend that we shall be domineered over—driven from our homes, or reduced to vassalage, if we do not adopt stringent restrictions towards naturalized citizens. I hold, (said Mr. Ratliff,) all restrictions upon the people to be useless. If the people are disposed to observe these restrictions, why, then, they are useless; if they are not disposed to observe them, they are still useless, and there is no power to enforce them against the will of the people. We have the example: Mr. Mouton, the present governor of our State, was elected and inaugurated, but who inquired, either before or after the election, whether he had the property qualification or not; who cared whether he owned five thousand dollars, or not one cent? They voted for him, not for his propperty; and who doubts that if he had been excluded, on account of a want of property qualifications, and another election had been ordered, that he would have been elected over again—not as he was the first time, by democratic votes alone, but by both democratic and whig votes. The people would have revolted in carrying out one of these very restrictions, and would have nullified it by their unanimous voice. And again, who asked the respectable and worthy gentleman that preceded him, who was twice elected governor, and who now holds a seat in this body, if he had the property qualification to be governor. I never voted for that gentleman, and yet I am bound to say, and I say it with pleasure, that his administration was wise and sagacious, and that he endeavored, and to a certain extent, succeeded, in averting the evils attendant upon an abuse of the resources of the State, at a time when another honorable gentleman, also in this body, and myself, stood up in support of the Governor, although we were both politically opposed to his administration.

Mr. Benjamin did not design to address the Convention, but the propositions and the doctrines that have been advanced by some of the members were so startling, so novel, and presented such extraordinary issues, that he felt called upon to make a few observations. Any stranger that would have entered this room during any stage of our discussion, would have supposed that we were debating a Constitution for Europeans, or the people of the other States, and not for Louisiana. For the whole burthen of what has been said, has been rather what privileges should be granted to strangers coming among us, than what rights and what guarantees we should secure to ourselves. The debate has been so very discursive, that it has embraced the widest range, and has touched almost every topic.

At first, said Mr. Benjamin, I thought the President wished to restrain the discussion within too narrow a range, but I never dreamed it could be carried so far.

The question before us, divested of all the extraneous matters with which it had been clogged, was a simple one. It was a question of security. This State is peculiarly situated, and her position exacted some measures of prudent forethought, in order to shield her from assaults upon a vulnerable point. Her peculiar institutions were liable to attack, and it was to preclude the danger which menaced her that some measure, similar to the one under discussion, was deemed of vital importance.

A great deal has been said about the voice of the people, and one gentleman has taken upon himself, ex cathedra, to declare what that voice is. I know not how the gentleman came by his mantle of inspiration, but I deny that he has any business to interpret the will of any other constituency than his own. No member has the right to set himself up as the exclusive judge of the voice of the people, and to insinuate that there is any contradistinction between what he supposes to be the voice of the people, and the particular course that any delegate on this floor may see proper to pursue. He may, if he chooses, construe the voice of those that elected him to represent them, but he has no right to place himself as the exponent of the will of the people of the whole State. I deny his competency to do so, and I deny his right. Having disposed in a few words of the remarkable position taken by the delegate from Ouachita, on that matter, I return to the consideration of the subject under discussion.

What is really the matter in dispute? It is this, that no one shall be eligible to the general assembly who has not resided four years in the State, if he be a citizen of the United States by birth or by adoption. What objection can there possibly exist to this provision? It is assumed that it is an unequal, unjust, and anti-republican restriction. Let us examine it in these various points. And first—How is it unjust? Every citizen is placed on a precise equality in the requisition of residence, be he a native or an adopted citizen. The principle is explicit. It applies to all—to the citizen of New York as well as to the citizen of Mississippi; to the native born citizens of other States, as well as to the citizen by naturalization; four years are prescribed for all.

Where is the impropriety of protecting, by requiring residence, the institutions which we have met to remodel and to perfect? Have we not the right to do this? Is there any thing wonderful or extraordinary in its exercise—something that has never been thought of by any other government; in a word, "is it an odious distinction?" I apprehend not. The very same principle was mooted in the federal Convention, and was finally embodied in the Constitution of the United States. But are there no other restrictions? What is that restriction which requires that the voter should be free? That he should be white. Is this anti-democratic too? Next that he be a male. Are these all odious distinctions? Where do the odious "distinctions" begin, the "aristocratical" exclusions? All are willing that two years' residence should be required. That is conceded to be correct. But four years is "aristocratical,"—an attempt to create a "privileged class,"—a "nobility." Is it possible that men, presumed to represent the elite of the State, can present such conclusions; can be driven into such petty evasions, and maintain the absurd theories that we have heard seriously contended for on this floor.

The member from Point Coupée, (Mr. Ledoux) had stigmatized the proposition as anti-republican. Yet the delegate from the first district, (Mr. Grymes) had invoked attention to that article of the Constitution of the United States, which upon the very same subject of qualification of persons elected to the house of representatives, prescribes that they shall have acquired citizenship for seven years, which with the five years for naturalization, would make twelve years' residence for adopted citizens before they would be allowed a seat in Congress. If the principle be anti-republican, then Madison, Franklin, and Washington, were anti-republican, since they sanctioned it. Let the gentlemen who employ that argument, make the most of it.

But, says the delegate from the parish of Point Coupée, if a sugar planter wants an overseer, shall he be restricted to taking one in his own parish when he would prefer one from abroad. There is no visible analogy between this suppositious case and the principle involved in the proposition. If it pleased a sugar planter to send to the North for an overseer that was profoundly ignorant of the cultivation of the cane, as he would be, the only sufferer from the mismanagement of his own crop, if he were so foolish as to act so inconsiderately, no one would have a right to complain; he would punish his own folly. But suppose there was an association of planters, is it to be presumed that they would appoint an overseer to superintend their joint interests who was manifestly incapable and an improper person? The representative of a particular parish, is not the mere echo of that parish. His vision should not be bounded by the petty locality from which he comes. He is here to guard the interests of his constituents; it is true he has another obligation, and that is to promote the interests of the whole State. It may well be conceived how very important it is to have men in our legislature that are imbued with our feelings and sentiments, and are identified with our interests and institutions.

There is one subject, said Mr. Benjamin, that I approach with great reluctance. It is a subject of vital importance to the southern States, and should produce at least unanimity in our councils, to avert a common danger. It is not the part of wisdom, however we may differ, to wrangle where the safety of all may be compromitted. I would scorn to appeal to party considerations. A question may arise in a few months that will obliterate all party distinctions; when there will be neither whigs nor democrats. When the whole South will coalesce and form a single party, and that party will be for the protection of our hearths, of our families, and our homes. That man must be indeed blind not to perceive from whence the danger comes. The signs are pregnant with evil. The speck upon the horizon that at first was no bigger than a man's hand, overshadows us, and there is not a breeze that blows that does not sound the tocsin of alarm. The light is shut out, and we should prepare ourselves to meet the emergency, whenever it may come. Our organic law would be deficient if it did not provide a bulwark. If it did not guard us from the machinations of an insiduous foe. The course of events within the last few months prove that we must rely upon ourselves and our southern confederates, to maintain our rights and cause them to be respected, and not upon the stipulations in the federal compact. We must insist for ample security for these rights.

Mr. Brent said he could not permit the section, as it had been amended, to pass to a final vote without expressing his views upon it. He regarded the proviso of the delegate from Attakapas, (Mr. Voorhies,) as admirably adapted to the proposition, requiring four years' residence in Louisiana, to be entitled to the privilege of a seat in her legislature. They fitted well together, and only one thing more was necessary to complete the beauty and harmony of the whole. That was a provision that none but native born citizens of the State should be eligible to office. The proviso of the gentleman from Attakapas makes a distinction between native and adopted citizens, or it does not. If it does not make any distinction, it is idle and unnecessary, and it is occupying our time which could be more profitably employed. If its effect be to create a distinction, I enter my most earnest and decided protest against it. I impugn no man's motives. I have no doubt they are pure and patriotic, and that the advocates for this restriction really believe it would have a beneficial effect. But motives cannot vary results. I consider this provision an entering wedge for the native American question in its whole length and breadth, and I see nothing in that narrow and contracted doctrine to entitle it to favor. What have we seen in our sister States? That its progress has been marked by violence and blood. Nay, sir, that it illuminates the torch of the incendiary and wrapped a peaceful city in flames, desecrating the sanctuary of the living God! I regret, sir, from the bottom of my heart, that this element of discord and of strife has entered into the debates of this august body.

It may be said that these remarks are not pertinent to the matter at present before this body. I think it has a direct bearing, and that the spirit of exclusion engendered by the native American question ought not to find its way into our constitution, or into our legislation.

The question arises whether we should amend the old constitution in this particular section? Were the popular will pronounced in favor of any change in it, it might be proper to modify it. But such is not the case. There is no complaint in reference to it. It has been in existence for thirty-two years, and it has worked well. How many persons of foreign birth have found their way to the legislature under it? Remarkably few. Some fifteen or twenty perhaps, and in every instance men of eminent talents, as illustrious for their virtues as for their patriotism. Men, that have conferred high distinction upon the State, and illustrated and adorned the pages of our history.

There is another point, said Mr. Brent, upon which I would offer my views. I object to the people being restricted in the choice of their agents more than I do to the injustice of excluding a portion of them from participating, if they choose, in the administration of the affairs of State. I complain of the proviso. But gentlemen tell us that it is impossible to acquire a knowledge of our institutions under five years. Our institutions are not so complex: the principles of our government are few and simple. If five years be not sufficient, why not prescribe forty? Would not forty years be better than five? Liberty springs spontaneous in the human breast. It withers under the sirocco breath of despotism, but is soon restored to life and vigor by the moisture of liberty.

It is an entire folly to suppose that because persons are eligible to office they will necessarily be elected. There are millions of citizens eligible to the office of President, but there are but few elected. To make foreigners eligible would not necessarily result in their election. It is idle to suppose that the ignorant would control our legislation. It is paying the people a poor compliment to contend that they would elect some ignorant foreigners over an intelligent native citizen. I have great confidence in man's capacity for self-government. I believe in the discernment of the people, and I cannot think the people of Louisiana are so besotted as to choose persons, no matter how incompetent they may be, that have but just touched our shores.

I cannot, (said Mr. Brent,) concur in the proposition advanced two or three times in the course of this debate, that this Convention constitutes the sovereignty of the State. I cannot for one admit that the sovereignty of the State resides in us. The sovereignty of the State is in the people themselves. We are but their agents —their representatives. It may happen that we may violate their will and instead of a better constitution make a worse one. If we do that, we shall soon find where the sovereignty resides.

The delegate that last addressed the Convention alluded to a subject of vital importance, which in his opinion, rendered the proposition before us essential. He said that the signs of the times boded the amalgamation of the whig and democratic parties, for the purpose of protecting their hearths, their families, and their homes.

So far as I am concerned, said Mr. Brent, I do not entertain any fear from the source to which he has alluded. And however apprehensive I might be of those evils, I see nothing in the proviso that would afford any efficacious protection. I fear our own citizens—the abolitionists of the North—more than I do the emigrants from Europe. What protection does the proviso afford us from the assaults of those fanatics? The proviso does not say that none shall vote nor hold office, but those that own slaves. It does not preclude non-slaveholders from office. How is it possible, that this proviso can have any effect? It simply declares that no adopted citizen shall be allowed to represent us, unless after four years' residence within the limits of the State after his naturalization papers have issued.

I enter my most solemn protest against any distinction between native and adopted citizens. Let them both stand on the same footing; and in God's name, let the people elect whom they please, native or adopted.

I am a native of Louisiana, but I would be the last one to secure a monopoly for creoles, if they were without talent and energy; and may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if I ever sustain a principle of favoritism for them.

I have stated before my objection to the first part of the section. I entertain the same objections, and believe it is not wise to exact so long a residence from a citizen who has emigrated to the State, to be entitled to the right of suffrage, or to be a candidate for office. I am decidedly adverse to excluding any in the distribution of offices, and converting Louisiana into a new celestial empire. I cannot look upon emigrants from our sister States as enemies. We have been all educated in the same school, rocked in the same cradle, and can point to the same great men as the fathers of our country, Washington, Franklin and Jefferson. I trust the odious clause will be stricken out, and that our fellow-citizens from other States, whether native or adopted, will be placed, after one year's residence, on an equality with ourselves.

Mr. Chinn said he was about to make an odious motion, the motion for the previous question. This subject had been under discussion for two weeks, and it was perceiveable that all the arguments had been exhausted. He would withdraw the motion, if the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Eustis,) wished to speak.

Mr. Eustis said he certainly had no desire to be heard, or he would have risen on some previous occasion. In no event, however, would he consent to receive from courtesy, that which belonged to him as a matter of right. He was willing to respond to the wishes of the House, by arresting the debate where it was.

[The Convention having signified their wish that Mr. Eustis should express his views, and Mr. Chinn having withdrawn his motion,]

Mr. Eustis rose and said: Mr. President, it strikes me with some surprise that a desire should be imputed to me to be heard, when the subject under debate is deemed to be thoroughly exhausted. This arises, possibly, from the fact, that I happened to be among those that were solicitous to speak. But since the Convention is disposed to hear what I may offer for their consideration, I shall in the first place remark, that I am opposed to the restrictions proposed, which would affect a large number of citizens that I have the honor to represent on this floor.

My design, Mr. President, is not to discuss the question before the Convention; that I conceive has already been fully done. But to suggest to the Convention a decision that will be just, that it will sustain the character of the State, and will stand the test of truth and of time. In the first place, I consider the amendment an useless innovation upon the original section in the Constitution. That section has been in operation for thirty-two years, and no injury, no detriment has resulted to the State. The arguments that have been employed to show that there is a necessity for a more stringent rule, have, to my humble conception, entirely failed, and the only consequence that would flow from the adoption of the proposition, would be unfortunate dissentions in our community, and dangerous excitements. Why change that which experience has sanctioned? I can see no necessity for doing so, while I see much evil that would inevitably ensue from the innovation. How would you place those citizens that have been naturalized within the last year or two? Would they be excluded? Would your provision apply to those that are daily making declaration of intention to become citizens? It makes no reservation in favor of such. In every view of the case, then, I deem it inexpedient, unjust, and oppressive.

I will not enter into personal considerations, for these I hold beneath the dignity of this body. The question before us is a political question. Let us look at the past to judge of the future. Where is the urgency, where is the necessity of adopting this principle? Has our legislature ever been beset by strangers, that have conspired against the prosperity of the country; against her permanent interests? Have the people ever selected unfaithful servants from the class you would prescribe? Never! But, it is not alone striking a blow at a portion of the people, you strike a blow at the whole people, if you embody this rule in your Constitution. You say to them that their choice shall be restricted. There is surely here improper restraint, and view the question as you may, you are invading the prerogatives, not only of the persons to be excluded, but of the masses—the great body of the people—who are to choose those, who in their opinion, are best fitted to represent them.

But it is urged that these restrictions are necessary. Only demonstrate to my satisfaction, (said Mr. Eustis,) that they are necessary and I will yield my objections. But I deny they are necessary. The Constitution of the United States has been referred to as a precedent. It is true that the Constitution of the United States exacts a citizenship of seven years to be eligible to the House of Representatives, and nine years to be a senator. But do, gentlemen, take into consideration the circumstances that induced that restriction? Let us examine this point.

The federal Constitution was adopted in 1787, about the period when we emerged from a long and sanguinary war. Our independence had been secured, but intestine disorders and contentions yet prevailed. We were exposed to foreign influence. The influence of England on one side, and the influence of France on the other. It was apprehended that we might be compromitted by one or the other. We had treaties to make: our foreign relations were yet to be established upon a permanent and a proper basis; and our national position was to be maintained. The Convention that met to form a more perfect and substantial union between the States, felt the importance of all these considerations, and the restriction towards adopted citizens was the result of the necessity of the times. It was concurred in with great reluctance, and we have the explicit opinions of both Madison and Franklin in favor of a course of liberality towards those that sought an asylum upon our shores, and for that rational liberty denied them in the land of their birth.

The weight of this precedent being then settled, let us next inquire into the other precedents. There are only two others. The Constitutions of Georgia and Maine contain a similar principle. In the latter the principle was adopted without debate, an evidence that little consideration was given to it. As for Georgia, the principle was adopted under peculiar circumstances. The Constitution of that State was formed in 1798. The Floridas were still under the dominions of his Catholic Majesty. The troubles in France were progressing, and threw upon our shores the tide of her emigration; and Spain was endeavoring to foment difficulties in the Western States, in order to bring about a separation of the Union: the State of Georgia touched the Spanish line, and influenced by the apprehensions that the treaty concluded about that time with Spain would not be carried into effect, a great deal of distrust prevailed, and the people of Georgia felt reluctant to accord the privileges of citizenship without exacting a residence of seven years as a security.

Does not an inquiry into the facts satisfy us that the restriction in both instances was the result of an immediate necessity, or rather a presumed necessity? but that necessity no longer existing, and the distrust at first entertained against that class of persons having been removed by a better knowledge of them, and by the practical experience that they have proved to be among the best and most useful of our citizens; why should they be proscribed and excluded? Besides, among the twenty-six States, there are but two that have sanctioned this exclusive legislation, and one of those, as I have shown, under very peculiar circumstances. All the other States are uniform in making no distinctions between one class of citizens and another class of citizens.

I am of opinion that the Baconian system of politics is, after all, the true one. If politics be a science, it is the science of results. We should never reason upon exceptions, but we should base our opinions upon actual results; and in my opinion, it is better to profit by the experience of the past, than to seek to change and alter those principles of government that have never been attended with injurious results; but which on the contrary have worked to the satisfaction of all.

Moreover, what are the consequences of exclusions and restrictions? Are they not calculated to engender distrust—to create dissensions and bitterness, and to excite the ill-will of that portion of the community that are less favored? And why should we distrust any portion of our citizens? We know from experience how easy it is to excite suspicions. One of the purest and best of our public men, Mr. Madison, was accused of being in the pay of Napoleon—one of his creatures. This fabrication was believed by many. For myself, Mr. President, I have no fear of foreign influence. I do not believe in its existence. It is true there are in this city a St. Patrick society, a St. Andrews society, and the Society des Bienfaisance. But all these are charitable associations, and are commendable. As for political associations among our naturalized citizens, I know of none. They range themselves as other citizens under our party lines—some are whigs and others are democrats: there is as much diversion of opinion among them in relation to political measures as there are among our native citizens. I attack and defend no class. They have like all other men their faults, and their virtues, and their prejudices, and their weaknesses; but who are exempt from the general lot of humanity? There is, however, no reason for the suspicion that they are not equally attached to the institutions of the country. That suspicion is unfounded.

Take another view of the subject. This restriction would apply to a man who had lived thirty years in the country. If he were to feel disposed to be naturalized to-morrow, his residence of thirty years would count him nothing in accomplishing the four years. It has been said that the principle is uniform, and that it operates with no greater severity upon the naturalized than upon the native citizen. I deny the assertion. The naturalized citizen is already obliged to undergo a probation of five years, and after that period is fulfilled, he is met with another imperative requisition, for five years more. Where is the necessity for this rigidity? It is pretended that it is to ensure an acquaintance with our institutions. Well, may not a foreigner in the five years preceding his naturalization, make himself perfectly conversant with our system of government? Where is the use of submitting him to another ordeal? Is it not enough guarantee that a man should make of this country his home, have his children and his affections here, possess property, more or less, pay his taxes regularly and contribute to the public burthens, for him to consider himself identified with us, and expect that others should so consider him.

I am aware that the excitement raised against foreigners has been the result of our party contests; but of that I will not speak. We are not here to descend into party strifes, and into party feelings, but to elevate ourselves to the standard of truth and immutable justice. The soreness of defeat, will, by degrees wear away, and then a juster perception of things will be apparent. I know that there are some prejudices existing, and some hostility towards naturalized citizens, on the part of a portion of our population, who are intelligent and, in other respects, liberal. I regret it sincerely, but we should do nothing to aggravate that spirit. I am not the apologist nor defender of democratic principles, but this much I may say, that those principles are at the foundation of our institutions, and we are, therefore, bound to maintain them inviolably. I shall never, by any act of mine, promote invidious distinctions in the political rights to be accorded to our citizens, but shall consider all classes equally entitled to all the privileges of freemen.

In early life, (said Mr. Eustis,) I visited Europe, and I can never forget how well I was received. I was treated with attention and kindness wherever I went. I never can be insensible to the obligations imposed upon me during my sojourn, which embraced a period of nearly three years; and as long as I can raise my voice in favor of the oppressed stranger who seeks a refuge in Louisiana, I shall never consent that hospitality and friendship shall be denied him; I shall never consent that our doors shall be closed against the natives of the climes that seek the protection of our better and more liberal system of government. If I do may my right arm fall from its socket. My social relations I do not permit to influence my political principles. The first regulates my private intercourse, the second determines my duties as a citizen, and as a citizen, I consider the principle under discussion unjust and impolitic. It is equivalent to telling the people they must choose from a privileged class. This is not consistent with republican instututions, and, moreover, the people will not yield obedience to this dictation. They are fully competent to decide upon the pretentions of those that seek their suffrages.

It is true that in the mass of population that come among us, there are some who may be unworthy; but their number is small. They are soon found out and are not trusted with the public confidence. When such men as the Peires, the D'Aquins and the St. Gemes, and many others who defended us from foreign aggression and invasion, seek our shores, we should indulge no species of exclusion, for fear that we may be perpretrating an act of injustice towards men as patriotic, as liberal, and as enlightened as any country could ever boast. I shall never feel any apprehension in receiving such men, let them come from where they may.

The abuse of the naturalization laws has no doubt contributed towards the distrust that has manifested itself among some against naturalized citizens. I admit, with pain and sorrow, that these laws, of late, have been violated in some instances. But to whom is blame attributable? Is blame alone to be attributed to the individuals that have been hunted up by political partizans, and by appeals of one kind and another, seduced and led estray. Are those that promoted these frauds, that knowingly caused them to be perpetrated, to escape all censure? It is unfortunate and discreditable that such things have occurred, but if the truth must be told, they have had their origin in violent party excitements. They have been stimulated by an unfortunate system of betting upon elections; here is the true secret. If all the members of our judiciary had but done their duty, these scandals never would have occurred. But because evils have resulted from our own fault, is it just and proper to punish a respectable portion of our citizens, and to exclude them from a just weight in the political power of the State?

Mr. Stephens explained the vote he was about to give, but these explanations were not audible at the Reporter's desk.

Mr. Miles Taylor moved that the motion for the adoption be laid upon the table, subject to call. Lost.

The question was taken upon the adoption and the following was the result:

Ayes—Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne, C. M. Conrad J. B. Conrad, Couvillon, Derbes, Dunn, Grymes, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazareau, Prudhomme, Roman, Roselius, St. Amant, Sellers, Taylor, of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Winder and Winchester.—37.

Nays.—Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Culbertson, Downs, Eustis, Garcia, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Leonard, McCallop, McRea, Marigny, Mayo, O'Brian, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott-of Madison, Soule, Splane, Stevens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill and Wederstrandt—36.

The President voting in the negative, it was lost.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

Friday, January 24, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and the proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. Warren.

Mr. Dunn presented a claim of Robert Perry, for the transportation of furniture for the use of the Convention, from Jackson to the Mississippi, and for an awning made for the Convention while it was at Jackson; and on his motion it was referred to the committee upon contingent expenses.

Mr. Splane complained that the reports of the debates of the Convention were not published. Great interest was felt to know the proceedings of this body, and it was desirable that publicity should be given to them. With that view, he would propose to make arrangements with two of the city papers.

He accordingly presented a resolution for the appointment of a committee of three members to make a contract with two city papers, for the daily publication of a synopsis of the proceedings.

Mr. Guion thought that the better course was to lay the resolution on the table, until the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the delay of the publication of the debates made their reports.

Mr. Downs referred both to the delay and the imperfect manner in the publication of the debates. He was therefore in favor of acting at once upon the subject. It was desirable that the proceedings of the Convention should appear frequently and with regularity.

Mr. Lewis was opposed to appointing a second committee, until the first one had been discharged. If the first committee be discharged, then he had no objection to the appointment of a second committee.

The motion to lay on the table prevailed.

The Order of the Day.—The Convention took into consideration section five of article second, as reported by the majority of the committee on the legislative department, providing for the places of holding the general election throughout the State.

Said motion was adopted.

On motion of Mr. Brent, sections six and seven were laid on the table, and section eight, as reported by the majority of the committee, was taken up.

Section 8. In all elections by the people, every white male citizen of the United States, who at the time being has attained the age of twenty-one years, and resided in the State two years next preceding the election, and the last year thereof in the parish or election district in which he offers to vote, shall enjoy the right of an elector; shall in all cases, except treason, felony, breach, or surety of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance on, going to, or returning from elections.

Mr. Mayo offered the following substitute:

Every free white male citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, who has resided in this State one year next preceding an election, and the last six months thereof in the parish or district in which he offers to vote, shall be deemed a qualified elector, and be entitled to vote in the parish or district where he actually resides, for each and every officer made elective by the people under this State or the United States. Provided, that no person in the military, naval or marine service of the United States shall be considered a resident in this State, by being stationed in any garrison, barrack, or military or naval place or station within the State; and no person under interdiction, or person convicted of any crime punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, unless pardoned, or restored by law to the right of suffrage, shall enjoy the right of an elector. Electors shall, in all cases, except treason, felony, breach or surety of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at and returning from the polls.

Said substitute being before the Convention, Mr. Mayo rose and addressed the Convention as follows:

Mr. Mayo said, that as he had felt it to be his duty to make some remarks in support of the substitute he had the honor to present, particularly to enable his constituents to judge of his position relative to it. He could not expect to say much upon a subject which the members of the Conventon must already have become familiar, that would enlighten men of the intelligence possessed by the members of this body.

If the importance of any subject can make discussions necessary, it is this. Though as the question is now presented, without knowing with certainty what provisions may be offered to restrict the right of suffrage, it is impossible to determine with precision what points are to be attacked, or to what restrictions an argument is to be directed. I have heard one honorable member say in his remarks on another subject that he hoped strong guards would be thrown around the elective franchise. There are two minority reports of the committee that had this subject under consideration, by both of which a residence of three years in the State is required unless the person offering to vote has a high property qualification. This he thought he had a right to consider as the opinion of a portion of the Convention, and should endeavor to combat the doctrine contained in the provisions of those minority reports.

It can hardly be necessary to state to this body that this is one of the most important subjects that can come before this Convention. It is a peculiarity of our republican institutions that all power is inherent in the people, and can only be properly exercised, when delegated by them to their representatives.

Suffrage is the paramount right upon which rests the rights of life, liberty, and property. It is necessary to a proper understanding of this subject to enquire, first, who are the people, that according to correct republican principles should have a voice and express their wishes, in the selection of representatives. The people, strictly speaking, are all the white men, women and children, who are to be affected by the laws. It appears to be understood by all that a portion of these, from a want of the necessary age to fit them for the exercise of a discreet choice, and also women whose condition does not fit them for any participation in the affairs of government; all those who have not become naturalized citizens according to the acts of congress, and those not free, and white, shall be excluded from the elective franchise. These embrace a majority of the whole—of that whole which is embraced under the denomination of the people. How many more does sound policy require should be excluded? I can speak with certainty of the wishes of those of the particular district which I have the honor to represent; and can hazard but little in stating that their opinion is concurred in by a large majority of all the voters in the northern part of the State. The question was distinctly made, during the canvass for members to this body, and decided by the people in favor of allowing to every free white male citizen above twenty-one years of age who may have resided twelve months in the State and six months in the parish in which he offers to vote, the right of voting for all offices to be made elective by the Constitution. This is a question of liberality or illiberality to the governed, in the policy of the State. I hold that onerous restrictions upon the right of suffrage are the results either of undue power in the hands of a few, from which the many have not been able to wrest it by peaceful means, or of prejudice. The government of England is that which bears the greatest similarity to ours, of any that does now, or ever did exist, though it is a monarchy. Many learned political writers among them, Montesquieu, Burke, and John Locke, have treated it as the best practical model of government, and as approaching to perfection. That government is similar to ours in this. In both there is an executive magistrate entrusted with the execution of the laws. In both there are two bodies entrusted with legislation. In England the house of commons is elected by the people; here, both branches are elected by the people.

The two governments are dissimilar in this. That in England the sovereign power is held to be inherent in, and when exercised to emanate from the king—from a single individual; with us, it is laid down by the declaration of independence, which an eminent law writer, (Judge Story, in his comments upon the subject,) states, "is an act of paramount and sovereign authority." "That all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to secure their safety and happiness." According to this declaration, and as universally understood and acknowledged with us, government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. In this the two governments are essentially different and irreconcilable. In the one all the power is supposed to reside in the king, and in the other, it is declared by an act having the force of the paramount law, to reside in the people.

In England, the office of the members of the highest branch of parliament is hereditary, and men become entitled to hold seats in the house of lords by hereditary right, whether they be fit for the office or not. With us, the highest branch of the legislature as well as the lowest is elective, and the free choice of those entitled to suffrage, is exercised in elevating them to their offices.

Our executive is also elective. Their king hereditary, and in legal contemplation can never die.

Our forms of government for the Federal, as well as State Governments are improvements upon that of England. We have shaken off most of the impediments to the free exercise of our inherent rights and liberties, that exist in the constitution of that government: but have, from abundant caution, and I hold from some degree of prejudice, retained unnecessarily some of the onerous restrictions, which exist in the constitution of England. At the time of the formation of the constitution of the United States in 1787, no person was eligible to the house of commons in England as the representative of a county, unless he possessed a freehold estate of the annual value of 600 pounds sterling,—about $3000, consequently there were but very few in many of the counties, who were rich enough to qualify them to be chosen: in other words the right of the voter was restricted to a select few in many of the counties. This was the first important restriction upon the choice of the people. Next, no person was entitled to give his vote for a commoner, unless he owned a freehold estate of the annual value of 20 pounds, about $100. This again restricted the right of the citizen, so that not one-fiftieth part of those upon whom the burdens of government really rest, could exercise any right to choose even a member of the lowest branch of parliament. At the time of the institution of the house of commons, the people supposed, and correctly, that they had obtained an extraordinary and liberal grant of power from the monarch. It was thought liberal, because by it, a small portion of the citizens could exercise a choice in the selection of rulers, but so few can exercise it and the powers of government are so securely lodged in the hands of the wealthy, that though the oppressions were probably ameliorated, still they have not ceased; and tithes, taxes, and rents have been and still continue to be imposed upon them, that prevent them from the enjoyment of prosperity, or that degree of happiness, which man has a right to expect under a well regulated government. This system of a property qualification to render a man eligible to parliament, and to entitle a man to exercise the right of suffrage, was transferred by the sovereigns of England to America, and was provided for in the charters granted by them to the colonies in America. In the charter granted by William and Mary, in 1691, to Massachusetts, it was provided that the governor and council and representatives being freeholders, should be annually elected by the freeholders of each town, who possessed a freehold of forty shillings annual value, or other estate of forty pounds. Similar provisions are to be found in the other charters granted to the colonies. From this, it is evident that we have taken this restrictive system from England. First by a direct exercise of it by the English sovereigns themselves, and afterwards, by copying from the charters granted by those sovereigns. To show how tenacious the people of this country were of retaining the spirit of the constitution of England; the constitution prepared by John Locke for North and South Carolina and adopted by those colonies, then forming but one, will furnish ample evidence. By that, two orders of hereditary nobility were instituted. The legislature was dignified with the name of parliament.

These facts show a desire, at least, on the part of the early colonists to conform to the English system. This desire, I apprehend, has grown into a prejudice, and as the people have become enlightened upon the subject, and formed new constitutions in the several States, they have gradually thrown off the restraint, until at this time there are but ten out of the 26 States where any property qualification whatever is required to entitle a citizen to vote, and but one, South Carolina, that requires a longer residence than one year.—I have heard no serious complaints from this degree of liberality, which permits the citizen to exercise his natural right to choose those who are to make laws to govern him. What harm has been produced by it? What legislatures have been selected that have been unfit to be entrusted with the business of legislation? Or if any such have been chosen, is it fair and reasonable to suppose that if a property qualification had been required of the voter better and wiser legislatures would have been selected? Legislatures that would have imposed less burdens upon the people, or established laws that would have tended more to their prosperity, security and happiness? I do not think that the affirmative of the proposition can be maintained.

If not, then, why not extend to all who have furnished evidence of an interest in, and an attachment to our institutions the rights of citizens? I heard it said, a day or two ago, by an honorable member in discussing another subject that, if a man were to come here from the country of his birth and say that he had a greater attachment to our institutions than he had to his own, that he would not believe him. I, on the contrary, should be inclined to believe him from the evidence furnished by the fact of his making this State his home. I should, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, be induced to believe that some considerable and important considerations were necessary to induce him to leave the country of his birth and early affections to take up his abode with strangers in a foreign land, and, should at once conclude that the attachment he had to our people and our institutions, induced him to make the change, and that attachment, and the hope of the enjoyment of prosperity here, would be to me sufficient evidence of his interest, and judging from the fact of his continuous residence here for one year only, I should believe that he liked this country better than that of his birth.

If the elective franchise be extended to all those who are embraced in the substitute, and who appear to me to have a kind of natural right to enjoy it, those disturbances and tumults, which have sometimes been witnessed at elections, will cease. The unnatural restraints which are sought to be broken, will be removed, and the rights heretofore forbidden, but to a great extent exercised in fraud of the law, will be removed.

Our present constitution requires a residence of twelve months in the county; who has demanded a change in this particular? I never heard of such a demand until I came into this body. Those who voted for a convention, I understood, to vote for it, for the purpose of having restrictions upon their rights removed—not additional ones imposed. Could I think that the safety, prosperity or happiness of the people of this State required any further restriction upon the elective franchise than the substitute now under consideration will afford them, I would cheerfully withdraw it. But with the example of sixteen out of twenty-three of our sister States, who are with no greater restrictions, and many of them with less than those proposed by the substitute, enjoying, with the utmost degree of security, quiet and prosperity, all the blessings of liberty. With the example also of the election to this convention of the intelligent body now assembled here by those who have been constituted electors, after a residence of but one year in the State, the property qualification having been evaded by the citizens. I hope that if the present proposition be not supported, I shall, at least, enjoy the pleasure of hearing the reasons for its rejection. The emigrants from foreign countries, after becoming naturalized citizens, and those who come to reside with us from other States of the Union, know when they come that they are liable to be called upon by the authorities of the State to protect and defend us, in our lives and property, and if their services should be needed, they would, I am satisfied, be found true to their duty to defend us. It is our duty therefore to court their emigration to the State. To do so we should indicate to them, that they, on coming here, and furnishing evidence of a desire to remain, will be permitted to enjoy those rights which ought to be common to all freemen, and which would be extended to ourselves and our children, were me to go to those other States where liberal systems prevail.

Mr. Grymes moved for the rejection of the proviso—lost.

Mr. Voorhies said he was in favor of the section as reported by the majority of the committee; he would therefore vote against the substitute.

Mr. Boudousquie moved that the substitute lay indefinitely on the table; and called the ayes and nays:

Yeas—Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Couvillon, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Guion, Grymes, Garrett, Hudspeth, King, Labauve, Lewis, Legendre, Marigny, Mazareau, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amant, Saunders, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Stevens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wederstrandt, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder—40.

Nays—Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Downs, Eustis, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Leonard, Mayo, McRea, McCallop, O'Brian, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Splane and Waddill,—27.

The question reverted upon the adoption of the section as reported.

Mr. Voorhies moved to amend by inserting the word "consecutive" before the words two years, so as to make the residence two consecutive years.

Said amendment prevailed.

Mr. Garrett moved to strike out from the fifth line to the eight. He wished to fill up the blank so as to make the section correspond with a similar section in the old Constitution. He saw no necessity for making any further change than suppressing the property qualifications.

Mr. Lewis said: Mr. President, it is admitted on all sides that we should pursue that course which is best calculated to promote the interests of the State. I will not trespass upon the time of the Convention, and will simply say a few words. However important the debate on this matter may be, I think it can be compressed into a nut-shell. We never can expect any results without compromise. The property qualification is to be relinquished, and I think properly. But there should be some condition which will afford a guarantee. Let us have some assurance that the destines of the State will not be committed to improper hands. The report of the majority of committee seems, upon this point, to approach a compromise. I should prefer three years to two, but I am willing to yield to two years in the spirit of compromise. Some gentlemen would prefer one year, others favor three years; and between one year and three years, we may well unite in a spirit of mutual concession upon two years. The Constitution of the United States was the work of compromise; without compromise no Constitution can be formed.

My friend from Attakapas, (Mr. Voorhies,) from whose excellent judgment I differ with great deference, has suggested to amend the section by placing the word "consecutive" before the words two years. I do not think that amendment would make the measure any clearer, and it is, therefore, unnecessary. I trust the section will be adopted, and that ultraism will not prevail on either side. We may meet half way, and the vital principle, of which many think in danger by substituting too short a period of residence, will be secured.

Mr. Ratliff said: I have listened, Mr President, with a great deal of pleasure to what has fallen from the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis.) I, for one, am always ready to respond to the spirit of concession. I am of opinion that two years is not an unreasonable period. It has been suggested that if we fix upon one year, we may, in times of high political excitement, be exposed to pipe laying from the adjoining States. Loafers and vagrants may be sent among us to turn the scale at the ballot box. I see no great hardship in requiring two years residence, and I am willing to meet the gentleman upon that period.

Mr. Preston: I oppose this part of the report, fixing the residence at two years, instead of one as heretofore. I see no good reason for changing the disposition of the old Constitution upon that point. It is true that the property qualification is to be abandoned. But why is it to abandoned? Because such is the declared wish of the people; and to obtain the abandonment of that odious principle was one of the three cardinal points for which the people desired a Convention. Moreover, what is the property qualification at present? Is it not a mere nullity? But is said that if the period of citizenship be fixed at one year, many vicious persons will vote. It will be the same if the period be fixed at two years. It is impossible to attain perfection, and to preclude abuses. Vicious persons will vote, fix the period when you may, and the qulifications as you please. Give to every man in the community the greatest amount of liberty consonant with the safety of society. Place all your citizens upon a footing of perfect equality as to their political rights, and you will promote the well-being and happiness of all.

I consider, said Mr. Preston, one year amply sufficient to give us every reasonable guarantee. We have had the experience of thirty-two years, and that experience has satisfied me that there is no necessity for increasing the period. We have, too, the experience of our sister States. In Massachusetts an inhabitant is allowed to vote without limitation of residence. In Connecticut, six months residence is only required to be a voter; and in all the new States the residence is quite trifling. Yet no harm has resulted. We find those States progressing in wealth and population. I oppose all useless and unnecessary restrictions. There is no fear that the people will not discover the real dispositions of those that come among us. Although the people of the New England States have the reputation of being peculiarly inquisitive, we are not without curiosity ourselves, and soon discover every thing in relation to new-comers. We ascertain who they are—what is their business, and what they intend to do. Men are gregarious and seek for the sympathy of each other.

Our State stands in need of population. We have immense resources, and these resources can only be fully developed by a dense population. We should invite and encourage immigration. If we discourage it, instead of flowing in upon us, it will go elsewhere. It will go to the new States of the West—to Arkansas, and even to Texas.

Pursue then a liberal policy. There is a wide field for industry in our State. Our swamp lands may be reclaimed, and even our pine barrans may, by the ingenuity and industry of man, be adapted to some culture, which will make them valuable.

Let us not be actuated by narrow-minded prejudices. Let us encourage, by the liberality of our laws, talents and industry to come among us. Let us profit by the enterprise and public spirit of all. The result of such a policy will be that our State will fill up with an industrious and energetic population, and her wealth and importance will become every day greater and greater. Her intercourse will be extended from the Allegheny mountains to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Gulf of Mexico to the farthermost parts of Europe and Asia, even to our antipodes. Let us invite strangers with a spirit of liberality to come among us, and when we have proved them by a reasonable residence, let us freely accord to them all the privileges and all the immunities of citizenship. Our State will then become rich and prosperous. In the moment of peril, when an invader threatened to drive us from our homes, we were not so particular about residence, we were glad to receive the aid and assistance of citizens from the other States. The Kentuckians and the Tennesseeans that flew to our rescue, and risked their lives in our defence. We need not be afraid of such citizens. They have proved their attachment to us upon the field of battle, and they will always be ready to fight and die in defence of our liberties whenever they may be assailed.

Mr. Wadsworth said, I do not rise to speak for Bunkum. I do not speak for the lobbies. The gentleman from Jefferson says we must be liberal. What is his idea of liberality? How does he define liberality? If his liberality be limited by some little regard for ourselves, by some prudent restriction. I have no objection to being liberal, as is his pleasure to call it. But if this liberality be at the expense of our safety, if it endangers our well being, and places us under the control of ignorance ane folly, then I conceive such liberality to be insanity, it is madness. If an individual were to throw away his property, give it to the first person that he met, it might be considered liberal, but at the same time it would induce rational persons to believe he was a fool. The gentleman from Jefferson, in his unbounded liberality, grasps at the antipodes, and in his benign philosophy, would bore a hole to place a steam engine, so as to get at them. I would place no obstacles in the way of the gentleman, I wish him every facility in getting at his antipodes.

The gentleman from Jefferson is mistaken in the intentions that he attributes to the legislature, in passing the act providing for the calling of a Convention. I was a member of the legislature at the time the bill passed, and I did not so understand it nor vote for it. I never contemplated we should establish any such liberal system as the gentleman imagines; that we should permit strangers to intrude into our houses, take our bed, and eat up our dinner!

In voting for a Convention my design was to remedy existing abuses, particularly in reference to the ballot box, and not to ensure greater abuses by placing our institutions under the control of persons who have no identity of feeling with us, and are without intelligence and integrity.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said if every restriction appeared to the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston,) to be an abridgement of liberty, then government itself should be abolished, inasmuch as it was restriction.

Mr. BOUDOUSQUIE found the propositions advanced by the gentleman from Jefferson so extraordinary that he could not refrain from making a few remarks. He considered that we should continue to exercise some control over the management of our public affairs, and not abandon them to the guidance of mere strangers. He was not for exacting the baptism of the yellow fever for the security of the State, as that was too frequentlya baptism that was followed by death, but he thought some reasonable residence ought to be required before we place implicit confidence in strangers. He could not consent that we should open our arms to receive persons that would undoubtedly come among us for sinister purposes. Why, eight days has not elapsed since there was an abolitionist, deputed by the governor of Massachusetts, in this very building. He never would consent to such a policy. It was, in his opinion, dangerous in the highest degree.

Mr. DUNN considered the subject of such vital importance that, for the purpose of affording time for reflection, he would move an adjournment.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, 25th January, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer.

The PRESIDENT submitted an invitation to attend the exhibition of the second Municipality Public Schools.

Mr. WADSWORTH on behalf of the special committee to whom was referred the duty of inquiring into the cause of delay in the publication of the reports of debates, made a report recommending that a contract be made with one of the city papers, for the publication of said report, and that an additional reporter be appointed.

Mr. SPLANE proposed to amend the report of the committee by providing for the publications in two papers, in place of one.

Mr. WADSWORTH made some verbal explanations in relation to said report.

Mr. DOWNS complained of the irregularity of the publications, but could not yield his assent to the employment of two city papers and the retaining of the present printer. He read the conditions under which the printing of the debates had been ordered. It was evident that these conditions had not been observed.

Mr. BRENT presented a resolution vacating the office of printer of the Convention, and instructing the committee on contingent expenses, to settle with Mr. Kelly for any amount that might be due him to date.

Mr. WADSWORTH said there was a provision in the report for the appointment of an additional reporter.

Mr. BRENT: I have no objections to that.

Mr. BEATTY considered it useless to appoint an additional reporter. The gentleman who is reporter, ought to be able to discharge the duties, and would no doubt be able to do so, if his entire time were given to the Convention. But, he had understood that the same individual was also reporter to the senate. Let him resign one or the other.

In reference to the substitute offered by the delegate from Rapides, (Mr. Brent) to dismiss the present printer, Mr. BEATTY stated he was in favor of it, with a proviso, that the committee should not pay said Kelly any amount until he shall deliver up the reports to date.

Mr. BRENT had no objection to offer his substitute as a distinct proposition.

Mr. MILES TAYLOR moved to recommit the subject to the same committee, for the purpose of inquiring into the contract made with the printer, and the manner in which the work had been done.

Mr. BRENT opposed the recommitment, on the ground that it was unnecessary. The Convention were in possession of sufficient information to justify the dismissal of the printer.

Mr. VOORHIES participated in the views of Mr. Brent.

Mr. WADSWORTH was in favor of recommitting the report, in order to give the printer an opportunity to be heard. The first committee had not made an inquiry tending to the removal of Mr. Kelly, nor had they recommended that step. The proposition to remove him being brought directly before the Convention, it was not fair to act upon it, without giving Mr. Kelly an opportunity to justify himself.

Mr. RATLIFF was in favor of the recommittal, as an act of justice.

The question was taken on the motion to recommit, and it was carried in the affirmative—yeas 40; nays 17.

Mr. Peets moved that the committee be instructed to report by Monday next.

Whereupon, on motion, the Convention adjourned to Monday next, at 11 o'clock, A. M.

Monday, 27th January, 1845.

The Convention met and its proceedings were opened by prayer from the Rev. Mr. Twitchell.

Mr. Wadsworth, on behalf of the special committee to whom had been referred the subject of the printing of the debates, offered a report, accompanied with a resolution, dismissing J. A. Kelly from the office of printer to the convention, and providing for the election of another printer.

Mr. Chinn was fearful that the present resolution was premature. He did not understand from the report that Mr. Kelly was actually delinquent in the discharge of his duty. Would it not be better, at any rate, to give that officer a little further trial? The scolding that had been inflicted upon him would be sufficient to ensure punctuality for the future. The reporter, perhaps, had not been prompt in furnishing the debates to the printer, and therefore the latter might not be at fault.

Mr. Garrett moved for the postponement of the question, until Thursday.

The motion was negatived—yeas 26; nays 37.

The question was taken on the adoption of the report, and it was decided affirmatively—yeas 43; nays 18.

Mr. Downs moved the 2d portion of the resolution by saying two printers—one for the French and one for the English.

Mr. Lewis was opposed to this amendment. There were two establishments in the city, the Bee and the Courier, that were both competent to do this work in both languages. He saw no necessity for separating the proceeding in French from those in English. It was better to publish them together. This was suggested, too, by motives of economy. It was not good policy to divide responsibility.

Mr. Kenner inquired whether it was intended to give each of the printers the compensation accorded to Mr. Kelly, $1500?

Mr. Downs: I intend to divide that amount between the two.

Mr. D. then went into arguments showing the advantages of this mode of publication.

Mr. Ratliff moved to lay the resolution on the table, subject to call. Lost, 19 ayes, 47 nays.

The question being on the first part of the resolution,

Mr. Ratliff opposed it. He stated that he had not voted for Mr. Kelly, but that inasmuch as he had been elected he was not for unceremoniously turning him out. He could never sanction an act which had the semblance of injustice. The report was not explicit as to whether Mr. Kelly was at fault. Mr. Kelly was the father of a family, who were dependent upon him. Mr. R. concluded by an earnest appeal in favor of Mr. Kelly.

Mr. Dunn spoke in favor of giving to the printer some further time, to see whether he could progress to the satisfaction of the Convention.

Mr. Miles Taylor supported the report of the Committee.

The question was taken and decided in affirmative—ayes 25, nays 23.

Mr. Marigny spoke in favor of the amendment proposed by Mr. Downs, and referred to the unsatisfactory manner in which the reports had been printed in French.

The question was taken on Mr. Downs' amendment, and carried in the affirmative.

Mr. Sellers moved that the same rule apply that the reports be published at least three times a week or oftener, which motion prevailed.

Mr. Beatty moved to amend the resolution, so that $500 be allowed to each printer per ten numbers of the paper containing the debates, which motion prevailed.

Mr. Downs called for the adoption of the first resolution.

Mr. Ratliff spoke against destituting the present printer.

The first resolution was adopted.

The second resolution was taken up.

Mr. Ratliff offered a substitute appointing a committee to enquire into and report upon what terms the printing could be done.

Mr. Bevtty called for the previous question, and it was ordered,—49 ayes; 19 nays.

The question was taken on the second resolution, and it was passed.

The third clause providing for the payment of the amount Mr. Kelly was concurred in.

Mr. Brent moved that the Convention proceed to the election of the printer.

Mr. Voorhies moved that the Convention proceed, at the same time, to the election of both.

Mr. Downs called for a division of the question.

Some objections being made, the president, (Mr. Claiborne,) decided that the question was susceptible of division.

Mr. Pugh moved to save time that the president appoint the printers. Lost.

Mr. Cenas nominated Mr. Jerome Bain on, of the Courier, for the printing French.

Mr. Chinn nominated Magne and Weisse of the Bee.

Messrs. Culbertson and Downs tellers.

The following was the result:

J. Bayon : : : 40 votes.
Magne and Weisse : 29 "

Mr. J. Bayon was proclaimed duly elected.

On motion, the Convention proceeded to the election of the printer for the English.

Mr. Guion nominated W. H. M'Cardle of the Tropic.

Mr. Read nominated Besançon, Ferguson & Co. of the Jeffersonian Republican.

For W. H. M'Cardle : : 31 votes.
" Besançon, Ferguson & Co. 36 "
Blank : : : : 3 "

Accordingly Messrs. Besançon, Ferguson & Co. were duly elected.

Mr. Downs moved that the Convention proceed to the election of an additional reporter.

Messrs. Ratliff and Conrad opposed the motion.

The ayes and nays were called for, and the result was 46 nays—18 ayes.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

Tuesday, January 28th, 1845.

The Convention met and its proceedings were opened by prayer from the Rev. Mr. Beadle.

Mr. Ratliff on behalf of the committee on contingent expenses, presented a resolution authorizing the payment of $72 33 to Mr. Robert Perry, for expenses incurred by him in removing the furniture belonging to the Convention, from Jackson to the Mississippi river, and

On motion, the said resolution was adopted.

Order of the Day.—Section 8.—Report of the majority on the legislative department, which was under discussion when the Convention adjourned yesterday.

Mr. Grymes wished to explain his views in relation to the subject under consideration, and he would avail himself of this occasion to do so. The question involved was one of the highest moment; it was no less than the conservation of our institutions. Gentlemen have said that the principle in the report of the majority of the committee finds no place in the Constitutions of any of the States of the Union. One gentleman said that he would not assert the fact on his own knowledge, because he had found himself mistaken on other occasions, but that he considered that the gentleman from Catahoula had established it to a demonstration. No doubt if the argument were true, it would have great weight with the Convention.

Mr. Grymes begged the indulgence of the Convention, if in the important examination he was about to institute, he should be under the necessity of entering into dry details. So far from the principle not being found in the Constitutions of the several states, there is not a State in the Union in which this particular principle, or an equivalent conservative principle, does not exist, and where its features are not strongly marked.

In the old and respectable State of Massachusetts this conservative principle, it was seen, was embodied in the right of suffrage. Massachusetts was one of the happiest States of the Union. She owed no debt, and her people were contented and prosperous. Connecticut was another example of a State well governed, that had adopted a similar principle. By her Constitution, it was necessary that the elector should possess some qualifications, that he should have served one year in the militia, and that he should be sworn to the proper exercise of the elective franchchise.

In the empire State, New York, so highly distinguished for her democratic principles, three years' residence is required, and other qualifications. At the time our Convention commenced its labors at Jackson, the Convention in New Jersey had just completed the Constitution of that State; between Louisiana and New Jersey there was as much difference as between the twinkling star and the sun in his meridian splendor. The natural resources of New Jersey are insignificant. Her sandy plains can bear no comparison with the rich lands of Louisiana. Well, how stands the conservative principle in that State? To be a member of the senate, four year's residence is required. To this it may be answered, that the only restriction affects the Senate.

The conservative principle is some where in the Constitution. And so it will be found that where the utmost extension is given to the right of suffrage the conservative principle is placed in some one of the departments as a check. Sometimes it is confided to the executive department, sometimes to the legislative, and sometimes it is placed to control the political powers of the State.

The State of Pennsylvania, which is a democratic State, par excellence, and which has been termed the arch of the Union, requires three years' residence for the candidate for the house of representatives; four years to be a member of the senate, and seven years to be governor.

Even the insignificant State of Delaware, which might be governed by the corporation of a city, has placed a restriction upon the qualifications of the members of the legislature; it is there that the conservative principle of the government is placed. To be a member of the senate it is requisite to hold property, and for the governor twelve years' residence is exacted.

Mr. Grymes argued that property should have its just weight in the government. It ought not to be excluded altogether, for whatever might be said to the contrary, it afforded a conclusive test of attachment to good order and good government. It contributed to the elements of virtue and independence, and promoted industry and public spirit. He should have been pleased to have seen the conservative principle maintained in property; he was willing, however, to give that up, but what he did insist upon, was that the conservative principle should be consecrated some where in the new Constitution. He was perfectly willing to adopt the new theories of democratic government, although he doubted in most cases, whether experience was not the surest guide; he was ready to follow the age, but certainly he did not wish to out-run it, and to impose upon the community hazardous and doubtful experiments.

He referred to that unfortunate course of legislation which had involved the State to an almost unlimited extent, which had impaired her resources and imposed heavy burthens on the people, and attributed to vicious and imprudent legislation. Without that fruitful source of mischief, Louisiana would now occupy a very different position. It was the part of wisdom to guard against a recurrence of those evils. Let us have some guarantee that the political power of the State will not be abused; that it may be exercised with sound discretion and directed so as to secure the permanent interests of the State.

He could not assent to the proposition of an honorable member, (Mr. Preston,) that there was an intuitive, spontaneous faculty in the human breast, to understand the principles of free government, without reflection or information, and that a man who had just put his foot upon our shores, even if he could not read nor write, was, by this intuitive knowledge, indoctrinated into our peculiar system of government. He could not discuss such a proposition, because it carried upon its face its own refutation. Some time, and even some degree of intelligence were necessary to appreciate and comprehend the character and bearing of our institutions. It required four years to learn a trade; and in the professions of law and medicine it takes fifteen years, and great study and practice before one can be well versed in the details and principles of those professions. To decide upon the right of property, and construe the laws of the country, demands age and years of experience. And will it be seriously urged that a stranger can go to the ballot box, and make a proper use of the privilege of suffrage? It was preposterous to think so. We might as well abandon all idea of government at once.

To show of what materials the population—the masses of those that were thrown upon our shores were composed, called attention to the report of the Administrators of the Charity Hospital for the last year. From this report it appeared that 4530 foreign paupers had been admitted into that institution. These would be the persons that would throng your polls, and whose necessities and whose ignorance would afford the opportunity to political parties to turn the scales of power in times of high political excitement.

Some gentlemen have gone very far, in assuming and contending for the principle that we should open our institutions to all kinds of persons, who may come among us, without restriction, and without guarantee. One gentleman places this policy upon the feeling of gratitude, with which he is inspired, because he was hospitably received while on a visit to Europe. That may be very well; and as far as hospitality is concerned, no reasonable objection can be made to its being fully reciprocated. But was there any thing more than hospitality shown to the gentleman? was he allowed a vote, and the right to participate in the political affairs of the country? Is it to be presumed that had he interfered in those matters, he would have been incarcerated in some dungeon, and very summarily disposed of. And yet it is thought extraordinary that any system of restriction should prevail in relation to persons coming from those very countries—even the slightest—where an American citizen is totally excluded from all political privileges, and would be laughed at, and perhaps imprisoned, if he were to question the policy of that exclusion.

The fact is, said Mr. Grymes, our system of government differs so materially from theirs, that there is a perfect contrast. In this country we have practical as well as theoretical liberty. A man can go where he pleases and when he pleases. But in Europe he must have his passport, and he cannot go a mile scarcely without being over-hauled and his passport viseéd. In every thing he is subjected to the vigilance of the law. He cannot even die in peace. He must be registered and recorded. There are a thousand petty vexations, a thousand acts of tyrannical inquisition never dreamed of by an American, until he finds himself beyond his own country.

It must not be conceived, said Mr. Grymes, that I am the enemy, or would, if I could, prevent our shores from being the asylum of all those that choose to seek them. There is plenty of room for all, thank God; but what I would insist upon is this, that we should not expose our institutions to the control of persons who are in the main profoundly ignorant of them; and that we should at least require that residence which would afford a reasonable presumption of their capacity and their virtue to participate with us in the duties and responsibilities of American citizens. In that, as in other things, I recognize the necessity of a conservative principle. Without that principle, our government must tend to anarchy, and our institution be perverted to the basest and worst of purposes.

Mr. Marigny said, I have listened with profound attention to the remarks that have fallen from my colleague, who has just addressed the House. I will therefore make no comments upon the Constitutions of the several States in regard to the particular principle upon which that gentleman dwells, and still less will I make a political voyage to Germany or to France. Other times—other measures! What suits one country does not suit another; that is generally conceded. I am in favor—decidedly in favor of the section under discussion, and I consider it my duty as a member of the committee that reported it to defend it. The old Constitution required but one year's residence, but at the same time it required the payment of a tax to exercise the right of suffrage, which last condition had become a subject of great discontent among the people. It was necessary upon that point to concede the principle; for if kings are obliged to make concessions, the representatives of a free people are bound in the strongest manner to respond to the popular wishes.

It was for this reason that the committee did not hesitate for one moment to admit free suffrage as one of the necessities of the times; and this decision was the more just, for it cannot be denied that popular elections had become a sort of monopoly, each party purchased property of little value, which they divided out among a numerous batch of voters, whose suffrages in that way they secured. This was carried so far that the true intention of the Constitution becomes a dead letter.

In sanctioning the principle of universal suffrage, the committee were convinced of the necessity of prolonging the residence, for the purpose of testing the attachment, or rather developing the attachment of strangers and citizens from the Northern States, whose laws and habits differ so materially from our own. This change of a test, considered by many as humiliating for one that is reasonable and just, has, nevertheless, not satisfied certain members of this Convention. Among others, the delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston,) has taken advantage of the occassion to entertain us with a long jeremiade upon what he chooses to distinguish as the unprecedented, unjust and malicious period of two years. Where is this great injustice after all? Strangers do not come among us solely to exercise suffrage, but to engage in commerce and agriculture. If they betake themselves to commerce, we see them endeavoring to make a fortune as quick as possible; and we hear them say, so soon as that object be accomplished—"well, my object is attained. I have acquired wealth, and I will now return to the country of my birth to enjoy it." Where is the necessity of taking so much interest for persons whose designs are so selfish, and who take no heed of us or our institutions further than their personal interests may be advanced. This would no longer be liberalism but demagogueism. We would never know who were the real population and who were not. It would be necessary to be at the doors and at the windows to know what these new constituents would desire; and I have no doubt that the delagate, if he could induce you to reduce the period of residence to one year, would not be satisfied with that, but would ask you to reduce it to six months—to three months! I can never favor so unrestricted a spirit as that, because I think it contrary to the interests of the country and my constituents. Let us grant universal suffrage, inasmuch as that is the result of social progress, but do not embrace others than those that have resided two years in the State. I say this results neither from ambition nor from interest. It is suggested to me by long experience and an intimate acquaintance with men and things. Pass any amendment reducing the period, and sooner or later, you expose the community to great and inevitable dangers.

Mr. Read said he would trespass upon the attention of the Convention only for a few moments—not for the purpose of discussing this matter, which had been extensively debated, but to place the House in possession of the views of his constituents, and to explain the vote he was about to give. When the question of the expediency of calling a Convention to remodel the Constitution was first submitted to the people of Baton Rogue, out of 700 votes only 80 were cast against calling the Convention; and at the second trial, there were only 40. One of the most prominent questions that contributed to this result was the question of suffrage. His colleague and himself had explicitly declared their opinions in reference to this subject, as well as to other matters of paramount importance. In order to place the fact before the Convention, that the people sustained this reform among others, he would beg leave to read an extract from a circular issued two weeks before the election, and addressed to the constituency, whom he had the honor, in part, of representing on this floor.

"The right of suffrage should be extended to all free white male citizens, of the necessary age and residence, regardless of any property qualification.

"This doctrine has been warmly opposed, not only in Louisiana, but in other States and countries, by those upon whom fortune has smiled propitiously, and before whose portals the horn of plenty has poured its abundance; but the shocking inaptitude of measuring mind by dollars and cents, is so apparent, that most are obliged to yield. Some there are who may yet stiffen their necks against enfranchising the hardy sons of toil and misfortune, but their efforts will be more fruitless than the task of Sisyphus, who 'was condemned in hell, to roll to the top of a hill a large stone, which had no sooner reached the summit, than it fell back into the plain with impetuosity, and rendered his punishment eternal.' This class of men deserve a severe rebuke, for the unrighteous attempt to make property a qualification over mind. The instability of such a qualification is so great, the limits so uncertain, and the injustice so flagrant, that public sentiment has declared against it. Vice and dissipation, though sparkling with silver and gold, should stand abashed in the presence of virtuous poverty, instead of being permitted by the sanction of laws or constitutions to crush it in the mire. The ownership of twenty-five head of cattle, under our present Constitution, entitles a man to vote, but the poor day laborer who has but one cow, is spurned from the ballot box as a mass of putridity. Even ignorance, if gilt with the precious metals, can exercise the right of suffrage, while intelligence clothed in rags must shiver in the bleak winds of disfranchisement. A thousand instances might be cited, to show the flagitious tendency of such a doctrine, but it is unnecessary. If man can think without property, he can vote without property. Such a constitutional provision is immoral: it invites to evasion and fraud, and depresses the tone of society. Give us then universal suffrage, properly guarded."

Mr. C. M. Conrad addressed the Convention in favor of the section. He was actuated by a spirit of compromise, in yielding his assent to "two years" residence. This guarantee was not as satisfactory as he could have wished, but with a Registry law, and some other checks, it would go to some extent in protecting the ballot box from violation, and preventing our institutions from improper control.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

Wednesday, January 29th, 1845.

The Convention met, pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the 8th section of the second article of the Constitution as reported by a majority of the committee.

Mr. Dunn said it was with great diffidence he arose to address the Convention on the important subject under consideration, after having listened to the very argumentative and eloquent speeches of distinguished gentlemen with whom he was associated; he was impelled to do so from a sense of duty, being fully aware of the high responsibilities under which he acted; he knew he was accountable to his constituents—his country—and his God, for every vote he should cast in the formation of the Constitution. He had been delegated by his friends to assist in this important business, and would be careful not to abuse the trust reposed in him. They had required of him no pledges—his opinions on all the leading and general principles involved were well known to them—high-minded and generous as they are, it was certain they never intended to constitute him a mere automaton in this honorable body; and he was equally certain he never would have accepted the mission on any such terms—his opinions had been formed on mature reflection, and as yet had undergone no change, but his mind was open to conviction, and he was anxious to hear the reasoning of gentlemen on all the important subjects that would come up.

He supposed every member of the Convention was desirous of ascertaining the best and wisest policy for the promotion of the general good; and that they would be guided by their consciences and judgments, and pursue the broad line of duty.

He had made up his mind to vote against "striking out," and was willing to fix two years as the residence of electors, upon condition that other guards and checks were established, for the purpose of protecting the purity of the ballot box. That as the Convention was in committee of the whole, and, freedom of debate allowable, he would give his views as to what further provisions he conceived to be necessary.

He said the first question in order was, whether the article in the old Constitution required amendment—he thought it did, and was sorry to differ with the Honorable gentleman (Mr. Preston) from Jefferson. He, (Mr. Dunn,) maintained that, to his mind, there was no article in the Constitution that calls more loudly for amendment. He said, as a conservative, he was now, as heretofore, in favor of preserving the frame work of the old Constitution, (though he had no eulogy to pronounce upon it,) and that he was only anxious to remove such parts as were defective. That experience, had proven the article under consideration to be not only defective, but humiliatingly so. It contemplated a property qualification—this he was opposed to—first, because he believed that in the improvement in government, it was an ascertained fact, that property would take care of itself—the great object of government was to protect the citizen in the enjoyment of life, liberty and property—the poor man had an interest for the protection of his life and liberty, which are more valuable than property. He strenuously opposed the idea that a man should be disfranchised on the ground of poverty; said it was safe to trust to that patriotism which he was willing to believe glowed in the bosom of every American.

He contended that in practice, all manner of artifices had been resorted to, that man's ingenuity could invent, to avert and avoid the provisions of the article under consideration. That it has been the cause of the perpetration of the grossest frauds, and the commission of the blackest crimes; that it was a well known fact, that during the canvass in the late Presidential election, 1500 tax receipts, for some inconsiderable sums, were issued to enable the contending political parties to get around the law. However right the officer may have acted in issuing these receipts, not being disposed to impute any blame to them, as it was their business to collect the revenue and taxes on the lands, &c., yet no one can doubt the fact that these tax-payers were evading the Constitution, and jurists must agree it was a fraud upon that instrument.

A variety of other instances and means of making voters might be mentioned. That these practices, which are attributable to the demon of party, are ruinous in their consequences, and degrading and demoralizing in their effects upon the community, no one will dispute. Desiring then that the tone of public virtue should be elevated to the highest possible standard, can it be supposed that the people would object to providing such guards and checks as would be proper and necessary to preserve purity in our institutions, that would remove all temptations so demoralizing to man. But we have been admonished by the gentleman from Jefferson, to "let alone the rights of man." Sir, we are sent here to protect the rights of man, and not "let them alone." If the necessary checks are not established, controlling man in the path of rectitude and duty, liberty will exist only in name.

Mr. D. said it was a universally acknowledged principle, that for the purpose of protecting the rights of the majority, it became the duty of the law-maker to restrict those who could not be safely trusted with the privilege of voting. Hence our sons are denied the privilege until they arrive at twenty-one years of age, as their judgments are presumed not to be sufficiently matured to enable them to judge correctly. And females, whose education, habits and pursuits in life, separate them widely from political strife, moving in a holier and purer atmosphere, and elevated above the conflict of party politics, are of course included, notwithstanding they have great interests to be represented.

It is (he said) a question of fact, whether there is a floating population among us, who, if allowed to vote unrestricted, would prove dangerous to the best interests of the State, striking at the very foundation of her civil and religious liberty?

He believed there was such a population, and on the increase to an alarming extent. That such a population would be always found in populous cities, and insisted that it was particularly important to protect the agricultural interest against this evil; an interest that had been protected in all ages; an interest which enriches the world and rewards the industrious laborer. He said he would agree with the gentleman from Baton Rouge, (Mr. Read) that the poor man, owning but one cow, should vote; the rearing of cattle was an important business, and many of our best citizens in the country are exclusively engaged in it. He had no doubt the legislature that put a tax on twenty-five head of cattle, done so, not for the purpose of revenue, but to enable those citizens whose property consisted alone in stock, to exercise the privilege of voting. They did not intend to oppress, but to protect and elevate them. He regretted the gentleman from Baton Rouge would not go with him, and give a better and surer protection to this class of their fellow citizens, and not leave them at the mercy of a heterogeneous mass of mankind, who has no sympathy or interest in common with them. He did not wish to degrade New Orleans, he knew there was as much kindness, generosity and intelligence there as would be found in any city, and like all other cities, its population is mixed. There would always be danger of a confliction between the commercial and agricultural interest. It should be remembered that Louisiana was unlike many agricultural States; owing to its locality, the commercial interest was very great and rapidly increasing. That "luxury, avarice, injustice, violence and ambition take up their ordinary residence in populous cities, while the hard and laborious life of the planter will not admit of these vices. The honest farmer lives in a wise and happy state, which inclines him to justice, temperance, sobriety, sincerity, and every virtue that can dignify human nature." Consequently to protect the planting interest and insure equal justice in legislation there should be restrictions thrown around the ballot box, and said if no one else did, he would propose a registry law, and a provision that no foreigner coming into the State should be allowed to vote for two years after the date of his naturalization—and that every elector should vote only at the place where he resided at the time of the election. He considered these provisions just and necessary. A register would be necessary to prevent excitements, mobs, frauds and perjuries—and would give assurance to all that there was purity in the elections.

He was far from wishing to make any odious or invidious distinctions, he was acting only in view of the necessity of the case—we had all witnessed a great political excitement—he knew that frauds had been perpetrated upon the naturalization laws. To prevent an occurrence of these things, (which under existing laws will in times of high party excitement take place again,) was his only object, and he knew of no better, fairer, or more liberal mode. If any better, could be suggested, he would adopt it. He was aware that the law of Congress conferred certain privileges to this class of the community, and he was unwilling to deprive them of their vote or of holding any office in the gift of the people after the lapse of a sufficient time to enable them to become familiar with our institutions, and identified with the country—he wished all his acts in the Convention to be impressed with impartial justice. He said the restrictions he had mentioned seemed to his mind very necessary; it was important to maintain the purity of the ballot box. It was the palladium of republican liberty. When we look back and call to mind what has occurred in our State the last year we must agree that we are not that happy, prosperous and harmonious people as formerly. The fact he said he should not be disguised that these are threathening clouds—casting their dark shadows over the brightness of our republican institutions. But he had an abiding hope, that there was virtue, wisdom and patriotism enough in the land to dispel them, and to guide the ship of State safely through the shoals and quicksands that threaten its destruction. That the star of liberty would soon emerge from behind the cloud that now dims its brightness, and shine forth again with all its native glory, lighting us to honor, prosperity and happiness.

Mr. Brent said, that he should vote to re-adopt the article of the old Constitution, striking out the property qualification required for voters. Upon this subject, there was no difference of sentiment among his constituents, and he felt that in giving the vote which he designed to do, he would represent not merely the majority which elected him, but the united and undivided sentiments of the entire population of the parish. The opinions of the people of Rapides have long been fixed and settled in favor of the extension of the right of suffrage. No diversity of sentiment exists among them, and it will be seen by a reference to the journals of the senate and house of representatives of this State, that whenever a proposition has been made to extend that right by all lawful and constitutional means, that Rapides has invariably recorded her votes in favor of it, whether she were represented by whigs or democrats.

It was true, that the announcement of this fact would not be considered material by those who imagined that they were the representatives, not of the particular constituency who elected them, but the representatives of the people of the whole State at large, and were therefore under no particular obligation to conform to the views of a particular section. But he for one could not admit that doctrine—he could not believe he was absolved from an immediate and direct responsibility to his constituents, or that he had been sent here for the purpose of representing the views and sentiments of any other people, than those who had elected him. It was his intention to represent truly and faithfully his constituency, and if gentlemen upon this floor acted differently, it was evident that the sentiments of the people of Louisiana would not be correctly ascertained. A Constitution might thus be made, directly adverse to the wishes and intentions of the people. He could not consider that he occupied the important position of a representative of the entire State of Louisiana, and he would satisfy himself with endeavoring to impress upon the organic law the particular principles advocated by his constituents. He would leave to other gentlemen the task of representing sections of the country, whose voters had not contributed to place them in this hall. At all events, he considered himself bound to respect and observe the views of the particular parish which he had the honor in part to represent, and to vote upon this question in strict conformity with the known and unanimous wishes of the people of that parish.

There was one position advanced by the honorable delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Grymes) to which he could not subscribe. He could not admit that personal and individual rights were inferior in importance to the rights of property. He thought that it was the chief excellency and boast of our institutions, that they regarded the personal rights and freedom of the citizen, as paramount in importance to all considerations connected with property. There were other governments, and those the most despotic in the world, where the rights of property were more securely guarded and protected by sanguinary and penal enactments than they are in this country, but it is the glory of our government that it recognizes nothing as equal in importance to the freedom and liberty of the citizen. The bold assumption that property is paramount to personal rights, to say the least, is novel, if not startling, to those who have been educated in the school of our republicanism. He entered to this doctrine his most unqualified dissent. The protection of personal liberty was paramount to all other considerations, and property sank into insignificance, when compared with this great object of government.

The gentleman from New Orleans, after passing his eulogium upon property, and urging upon us the propriety of watching its interests with solicitude, then adverted to the present lamentable and deplorable condition of our State affairs. He told us of the causes which had operated to produce this result, and he attributed it to the wild and reckless spirit of extravagance which had been fostered by evil legislation. He spoke of the creation of a vast banking capital—of an inflated currency, and of the thousand mad and ruinous schemes which had been projected by our State legislature, and which were the copious fountains from whence have flowed the evils that now impend above us. He told us that in the past there was nothing but a gloomy retrospection—in the present, nothing but grinding taxation—and in the future, nothing but a dreary and sterile waste, unrelieved by the faintest glimmerings of hope. But did not the honorable gentleman recollect, or has he forgotten, that all these evils have arisen under a property government, where the spirit of conservatism and restriction has stamped itself upon every page and section of the organic law? In the old Constitution restrictions are to be found every where. With one exception, the people are withheld from the exercise of all the political powers which justly belong to them. And even the ballot box is hedged round with odious and aristocratic restrictions. Now, how happens it that all these evils which have been depicted by the glowing pencil of the distinguished delegate, have occurred to us under the operation of a restrictive or conservative Constitution? Sir, the picture which has been delineated by the graphic hand of that delegate is but too true; and what more potent and convincing argument could he urged against a conservative Constitution than the very picture which he has drawn with such fidelity to nature. Restriction is the rank soil from which have sprung these noxious and deadly weeds. Such evils could not have occurred to such an extent under the operation of a more liberal and democratic Constitution. For as water tends to its level, as the mountain stream rushes to the river, and the river pours its tribute to the sea, even so does democracy tend to an economical administration of the government, and a rigid responsibility on the part of the public officers of the country.

But, sir, a great deal has been said about conservatism, and the importance of having conservative features engrafted in our Constitution. It is well for us, as we progress, to understand the definition of terms. What is meant by conservatism, and what are we to understand by conservative features in the Constitution? If conservatism means, as we have been heretofore told, to protect and defend the old Constitution from the changes and amendments proposed by its enemies, then, sir, so far as this section was concerned, he was a conservative. He was for re-adopting that provision of the old Constitution which fixed the residence required for a voter at the term of one year. And although he professed no particular fondness for the old Constitution, yet it was perhaps remarkable, that he had never yet lifted his voice in this Convention, except in favor of retaining the provisions of that instrument. It was equally astonishing that the so called conservatives had been the very first to lay violent hands on the Constitution, and to alter and mutilate that instrument, to which so much regard and esteem had been heretofore manifested. When we come to discuss other proposed changes in that Constitution, it will not do for these gentlemen to talk about its antiquity, and the veneration with which they regard it. They have been the very first to destroy its character of sanctity, by being the very first to enforce important and radical changes in its provisions. But, sir, conservatism may also have another meaning. From what has been said by the delegate from New Orleans, it seems that conservatism means, any thing which goes to restrict the exercise of popular rights. If, sir, conservatism means any thing, which has the effect of taking power from the many to give it to the few, or any thing which squints towards a monarchy or an aristocracy, he wished it to be distinctly understood, that he was not a conservative. He had no lot nor parcel in it, and he washed his hands clean of any thing pertaining to conservatism.

The honorable gentleman from New Orleans, had likewise told us that the conservative or restrictive principle, runs throughout all the constitutions of the confederacy; and he has made copious quotations from those constitutions, to show that if conservatism does not exist in any one given part, it will be found in some other part of those instruments. He therefore urges the propriety of imposing a restriction in that particular article now under discussion. Sir, the reasoning of the gentleman is neither logical nor sound. The true question to be ascertained, is whether it is in this identical part of the constitution, that the other States have thought proper to locate the restriction. That they have inserted restrictive clauses in some other portion of the constitution, is certainly no argument why a restrictive clause should be inserted in the section now under debate. When we come to discuss the sections where restrictions have been placed in the other constitutions, it will perhaps be a fair argument to insist upon the propriety of similar provisions. But unless the delegate has succeeded in showing that the other States have placed the restriction upon the right of suffrage, he has entirely failed to sustain his position by the numerous quotations which he has made.

Mr. Brent said that he held in his hand the volume of constitutions from which that gentleman had quoted, but instead of reading from the constitutions of the old States, at the beginning of the work, he would read from the constitutions of the new States, to be found near its conclusion. If the gentleman really desired to march with the age, as he stated, he would not have searched so diligently the provisions of those constitutions, which were framed towards the close of the last century. He would have endeavored to ascertain what were the principles incorporated in constitutions framed more recently, as furnishing the best guide to the opinions and sentiments of the age.

Mr. Brent here quoted from the constitutions of Iowa, Alabama, Michigan, Illinois and Arkansas, and contended that a spirit of liberality characterised those constitutions, as regarded the elective franchise, which was utterly at war with the restrictive principle, sought to be engrafted on the constitution of this State.

He then proceeded to say that he did not attach much weight to the authority of the old constitutions of the confederacy. They were framed at a period, when man's capability for self government was an unsolved problem, and when the purest patriots and ablest statesmen, were doubtful of the result of our great experiment. Among these, there was, however, one illustrious exception—a man whose intellect towered above the age in which he lived, and mingled itself with the events of the coming generation—he alluded to Thomas Jefferson, the apostle of democracy; whose devotion to popular government stood, unshaken, the test of time and trial. This statesman saw earlier than others the successful issue of our republican institutions, and in his philosophical writings upon government, he has left a priceless heritage to the young statesmen of America.

Sir, said Mr. BRENT, the doctrines which have been contended for by the gentleman from New Orleans, are the exploded heresies and fallacies of an age numbered with those beyond the flood. Even the very constitutions which he has quoted, do not sustain him in his advocacy of the restrictive feature sought to be incorporated in the present section. He advocates two years' residence as a qualification for a voter. Now, sir, what are the practice and experience of the States upon this subject? Eight States require less than one year's residence—seventeen States require one year's residence, and only one State in the Union requires two years' residence, to wit: South Carolina, whose constitution was framed in 1790, more than a half a century since. The gentleman talks of marching with the age in which he lives. Does he keep pace with this enlightened period, or rather does he not retrogade, and go back to the darkness and bigotry of 1790? Is this marching with the age, to abandon all the principles which have been consecrated in this century, for a principle which has never had a foothold among the constitutions of modern times? He left it for the gentleman to decide in what category he was placed.

It has been further contended in argument, Mr. President, that because a property qualification was to be stricken out by general consent, some other restriction would be necessary, to supply its place. It is truly consoling to reflect that gentlemen with such exalted notions of property, should be willing to abandon a property qualification. But what are the motives which have induced gentlemen to pursue this course? Is it in consequence of the convictions of their own judgment, that such a qualification was odious and aristocratic, or is it because the people have spoken trumpet-tongued to their representatives, demanding its total and unconditional abandonment? He could not undertake to speak of the motives of delegates upon this floor, but he believed he could speak confidently of the reasons which had induced the people to desire its abrogation. It was because the people believed in the logic and philosophy of Benjamin Franklin, that if you make property the basis of suffrage, it is the property and not the man, which votes; it is the inert mass of unthinking matter which exercises political influence, instead of the intelligent and responsible being, who was fashioned by the great Creator, in the likeness of his own image.

But, sir, by what kind of reasoning have gentlemen arrived at the conclusion, that because property qualification is to be abandoned, some other restriction must be substituted in its place? Of what avail will it be to remove one restriction, if it is to be superseded by another? If we advance one step forwards, and take another backwards, our position will be stationary. The people have said, that property qualification must be relinquished, but have they declared that the gap is to be closed, by another restriction, of a form and character scarcely less obnoxious? Sir, gentlemen have entirely misapprehended public sentiment on this subject. The people have desired property qualification to be stricken out, but they have not suggested the propriety of filling the hiatus with another restriction. That idea is purely original and native in this body.

The delegate from West Feliciana, (Mr. Ratliff,) had declared his intention to vote for two years' residence as a security against pipe-laying. The remedy does not suit the disease. To suppose that the purity of the ballot-box would be better guarded by two years' residence than one, is to suppose an absurdity. What we understand by pipe-laying is the voting in this State of persons who do not reside amongst us, but who have come here for the mere purpose of controlling our elections. These individuals stand the test of our law, and when challenged at the polls, they will take all the oaths necessary to entitle them to suffrage. It is as easy for them to swear to two years' residence as it is to one year's residence, and no guard against this specie of frauds, is provided by an extension of the term of residence. It is idle to suppose that our elections are so important that any man would come here and remain twelve months merely for the purpose of voting.

The alarm has been sounded about the danger to be apprehended to our institutions from the removal of those restrictions that now encompass the exercise of the elective franchise. Away with such chimerical and shadowy fears! I acknowledge, Mr. President, (said Mr. Brent,) that I am in favor of throwing open wide the portals of this Constitution for the admission of voters to that palladium of American liberty, the American ballot-box. Gentlemen tell us of the peculiar situation of Louisiana—of its exposed frontier, and of the fact, that in case of invasion, it will be the first point of hostile attack. There was a time, sir, when the thunder of invasion rang along these streets, and when a fair opportunity was given to test the truth of the political doctrines now advocated in the opposite quarter of the house. If, sir, we had then distrusted every one, but the natives of the soil, what would have been our situation, in that hour of thick—coming peril, when the very boldest held his breath? At that period, although there were restrictions upon voting, there was no restriction upon the right of fighting, either as regarded residence or the payment of a tax; and I have been told by an actor in the memorable scenes of the 8th of January, 1815, that nearly nine-tenths of the Orleans battalion were not voters, under the restrictive Constitution of 1812. You had soldiers, but not voters in that gallant band, who drove back the heavy columns of British mercenaries led on by Packenham, and who, fighting undismayed amidst death and carnage, upheld the striped banner of our country, above the cloud and smoke of battle, and secured this city from the torch of conflagration, from pillage, and from all the horrors of a city sacked by a brutal and licentious soldiery. What a commentary was this upon that contracted spirit, which treated every one but the natives of the soil, and the property holder, as a foe to our country and to our institutions! And what a commentary is it upon that exclusive and restrictive spirit, which is now seeking a lodgement in the organic law of this State!

But, Mr. President, we have been told, that unless the door is closed against the horde of foreigners, who are annually disgorged upon our shores, that we will have Asiatic notions of government engrafted on our legislation. Sir, there is no necessity for Asiatics to come here to import Asiatic notions for the government of our people. Asiatic principles have already been adopted and acted upon in this hall. The exclusive spirit of Native Americanism is essentially Asiatic in its origin, and it is worthy of the parentage from which it sprung. Go to China, and you will find that the Chinese entertain the same opinion of their own superiority over the rest of the world, that seems to be entertained by a certain class of politicians in this State. The Chinese are too wise—too valiant and too virtuous to permit ignorant foreigners from Europe or America to interfere in the political concerns of the celestial empire. This doctrine of Native Americanism smacks strongly of the flavor of Pekin and Hong-Kong. It is much better adapted to the meridian of that empire, which is governed by the "cousin to the sun and the brother to the moon," than it is to the meridian of the free and enlightened States of the American confederacy. It suits much better the pagan and idolatrous people of Asia, than it does the christian posterity of the wise forefathers of the American Revolution. I reject it altogether as unworthy of our race, and unworthy of the age in which we live.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I have only to say that I consider the extension of the term of residence required for a voter to two years, as unnecessary and injudicious. One year is amply sufficient to test the intention of an immigrant to become a citizen of our State, and as I am fortified in this opinion by the support of the able statesmen who have framed the other Constitutions of this Union, I shall give my vote without entertaining the slightest doubt in regard to its propriety.

Mr. Downs said, that although the whole subject of suffrage was not immediately involved in the particular matter under consideration, yet as the debate had been gone into so fully, he was induced to follow the course taken by the gentleman that preceded him in the discussion. It was moreover not material when the subject was debated, or whether the discussion became general on an isolated point, inasmuch as the question was one of leading and vast importance, and would elicit a full and free investigation at some stage of the proceedings. Both of the gentlemen that addressed the House in favor of restriction—certainly one of them—had said that the question was nothing more nor less than who should govern the country. This being its inevitable result, we should not precipitate our action, but should give to the question our serious and matured reflection. For good or for evil would be our decision. For himself, he had reflected seriously upon the question in all its bearings, and the result of those reflections had not been changed by the eloquent remarks of the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Grymes.)

That gentleman had assumed that the conservative principle ought to be somewhere in the Constitution. The term conservative principle was to his (Mr. Downs') mind vague and indefinite. It designates no quality and can be considered in no other light than as a relative phrase. We must know to what particular institutions it is to be applied, and as applied to one government it means one thing, as applied to another, another thing. In other countries, perhaps, it has an existence as well as here. In Russia, the conservative principle may be despotism. In Turkey, the free use of the bow-string—the cutting off the hands of rebellious subjects. But, in this free and enlightened Republic, where the science of free government has made so much progress, I must confess, said Mr. Downs, I do not know what it means. It may perhaps mean that we should be slow in abandoning antique systems and notions of government. If it means that experience has demonstrated that men are more disposed to put up with existing abuses than to seek for reforms, and that they always progress gradually and slowly, there is more danger of their submitting to old practices and to old things, too long, than their making rapid and radical changes. It will be remembered that the first steps taken by the colonies in resisting the aggressions of the parent State were of the mildest character. The natural feelings of association and attachment made them very reluctant to commit themselves to an open rupture. The colony of Virginia simply remonstrated, and it was only after Hancock, Madison and Jefferson, had declared that a bold policy was the safest course, that Dickerson, Wythe and others, who were fearful of extreme measures and held back, were induced to take a decisive stand. The danger then is, that men will hold on to old abuses with which they have become familiarized, and that they will cling to them with great tenacity through vague apprehensions and misgivings of the dangers of innovation.

We might, with as much reason insist that science should make no progress, as to attempt to arrest the progress of political government. By a parity of argument, it would be as logical to assume that the old machinery originally employed to propel steamboats was better adapted to that purpose than the new machinery, which has been perfected by experience, and that the first steamboats on the Mississippi, the Etna and the Vesuvius, were superior to the floating palaces that now adorn our port.

The gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Grymes,) having settled to the satisfaction of his own mind the necessity for the conservative principle, as he calls it, places that principle in a residence of two years. I object, said Mr. Downs, to this restriction upon the right of suffrage. I cannot conceive that it is at all necessary, that it is just, or that it is expedient. The old Constitution considered one year sufficient, and experience has tested that no inconvenience—that no injury has resulted, nor is it likely that any such would result, or that any one would approach the polls who was not an American citizen, and consequently clearly entitled to the franchise. I repudiate any principle that would stifle the popular voice at the ballot box. If conservatism mean any thing—if it be indeed designed for the preservation of our institutions, I know of nothing that would more effectually tend to that object than the full, fair and unrestricted will of the people through the ballot box. If there be any peculiar preservative power in our government it is the people; and to check them in the exercise of their undoubted right, is to destroy the only effectual conservative power of which I can have any idea.

The gentleman from Rapides, (Mr. Brent,) in his reply to the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Grymes,) had shown that restrictions upon the right of suffrage were by no means common among the States. The delegate from New Orleans had assumed that wherever restrictions existed, the States were free from debt, and possessed the best and most successful govments. The gentleman's argument had signally failed. The truth is, that upon the peril of indebtness it could not be said that the argument applied either way, for it so happened that States that had restrictions, and those that had none were equally involved. That argument was therefore without force. Here was the State of Louisiana, it certainly could not be pretended that her Constitution had not been sufficiently restricted, involved in debt, and contradicting the gentleman's position. There was one thing, however, which was the result of unrestricted suffrage, and it exhibited itself in a remarkable manner. It was this, that people where suffrage was unrestricted, contributed less money for the support of their government than where suffrage was restricted. In Louisiana, more money was contributed by her citizens than was paid by the individual citizens of the other States. This fact was exhibited in a valuable publication—the American Almanack, from which he would read a comparative statement of the individual contributions in the several States.

[Mr. Downs here read the statement referred to.]

Thus, it would be seen that the citizen of Louisiana pays $1 99, four times as much in proportion as is paid by the citizen of any of the other States. It was perfectly natural that this should be the result. Where the taxes were divided among a great many, the individual contribution became less, and that was not the only effect, the emoluments of office were less. Whereas, under a restricted system of government, as in Louisiana, which was confined to a few, the emoluments of office were greater. In proof of this, look at the State of Michigan, the territory of Iowa, and the State of Arkansas. The governors of these States receive from $800 to 1,000 per annum. The salaries of the judges were in proportion, but in Louisiana, where there is a property qualification and the right of suffrage is restricted, salaries are increased, and it is difficult to reduce them. In the Democratic Address of 1842, it is shown what are the heavy burthens imposed upon the people of this State in taxes; they are four times as large as the taxation of any State in the Union, in proportion to the population. Is there a single man that will not respond to the sincere hope that something effectual may be done to relieve us from these burthens.

Now, Mr. President, is it not clear that these enormous expenses are the result of a radical defect in our system? Has not experience demonstrated this to be the case? The reason is simple; the more you restrict the government the more you confine political power to a few hands, the greater will be the expense and the greater the salaries. Confine this power to only half of the population, and the expenses will be much larger; but go still further, and confine it to one-fifteenth, one-tenth of the population, and finally place it in the hands of ten men. You will find that there will be enormous salaries, and the patronage will be so appropriated as to perpetuate power. Look for example at other countries—at England and France. In England, where the right of primogeniture is still maintained, and there is a house of lords, a monarch to be kept on the throne—look at the salaries and the expenses of the government; the salaries for the judges, the money spent to keep up the state of the bishops, who do nothing—and to support a bloated nobility, who by hook or by crook, must have the means of gratifying their extravagant habits—look at the national debt, to pay the very interest on which, it is beyond all anticipation to pay the capital,—the people have to be subjected from time to time to additional burthens, and are ground down by the weight of these exactions.

Nevertheless, this is a government of property holders, where property is the chief object of protection. The political power is in the hands of a few individuals, and although the country is thoroughly cultivated and is a garden spot, all its means are monopolized by the favored few, while the many go without the very necessaries of life. And yet an under secretary, or an attaché, gets as much salary as most of the important officers in the United States.

I cannot concur, said Mr. Downs, that property should be the sole object of protection in a government? That property should be the only consideration. I do not recollect the phraseology of the gentleman, (Mr. Grymes,) but this I gathered to be his meaning. I do not say that it should not have its proper weight; it will always have that, but it should not be considered paramount and supersede the protection due to personal rights. If protection to property be considered the evidence of good government, then despotic governments frequently are good governments. I doubt much whether property is more secure in this country than it is in England, Austria, Prussia and France; for mere protection to property, these governments answer as well and perhaps better, than that of the United States. In Prussia a considerable amount of the revenues derived from taxation, goes to support an admirable system of public schools, perhaps the most perfect in existence. But there is something more important than mere property, which should be the serious object of governmental solicitude. There are personal rights to be guarded. There have been revolutions to protect personal rights, but none to protect property. In the early history of England, we find the habeas corpus extorted from a reluctant monarch, and what was that for? To protect the liberty of the subject. It was to place the subject under the protection of the law, and to rescue him from tyranny and oppression. That power should not invade personal rights, and drive the innocent victims to the gallows. Suppose there be but two classes, those who have property and those who have none. The property holders will never be imposed upon, but those who have no property will be subjected to contributing money, and will likewise be called upon to contribute personal services. In the event of a war, property holders will not risk their lives; they will not be enrolled in the militia, but will so frame the laws as to shuffle off that dangerous duty upon the laboring classes; they will send them, the poor devils who have nothing to lose, and who have no body to care for them. It is the laboring classes that now form the bulk of the militia; that perform fire duty, and if they are denied all voice at the ballot box, and are to be destituted of all political rights, why then they will soon be under the despotism of the property holders. On the other hand, there is no danger from the poorer classes; they have always been the defenders and protectors of the property of the rich, and will ever be so. All they ask is for a fair participation in the civil rights of citizenship. Property and money are power, and will always exercise a sufficient control over the poor, without denying to them a voice in the administration under the plea that they are the rabble—poor devils, and should have no lot or part in the laws made to govern them, except implicit and blind obedience to the behests of the rich and powerful. There is no necessity, no true wisdom, in degrading the poorer classes and placing them on an equality with slaves, by denying them the most important privilege of freemen.

These doctrines are not new to me. I have advanced them long ago, and to dispose of this part of the subject, in a word, I will read an extract from a report made by me as chairman of the committee of the senate.

Now, Mr. President, from these hasty views, where is the danger of extending to all classes of American citizens the privilege of suffrage?

A friend has just placed before me a list of all the States, with those that have become involved by heavy loans.

[Mr. Downs here read the extract referred to.]

From this statement it will be seen that there are fewer States that have anticipated their resources, and fettered themselves with debts, with the privilege of unrestricted suffrage. The ratio is about as five to one. In some of the States, where suffrage is free, have property holders suffered; nor have the poorer classes, invaded as we are left to infer from the argument of the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Grymes,) the inviolability of property; property has been as secure in those States, as in the other States of the Union. I do not myself attach great weight to this argument, but inasmuch as that gentleman has attempted to argue the question upon precedent, I have met him on that ground. I confess that he has poured forth such a torrent of eloquence that I knew of no better way of dispelling the effect he may have produced than by turning against him the very facts that he has advanced.

Great allowance must be made in the consideration of his views, for the fact that he comes from a State which though democratic as regards the policy of the general government, has always been restricted in her local policy. It is impossible for us to eradicate entirely our early impressions, and the prejudices we may imbibe for particular localities. Virginia although she has occupied a conspicuous place in national politics, and that too in favor invariably of democratic principles, has made less progress in those principles as regards her State government than any State of the Union. She has clung with singular per-tinacity to the peculiar aristocratic notions which were engrafted upon her political condition during the early period of her settlement and while she remained a colony. Hence she has not kept pace locally with democratic progress, and has shown a singular aversion to carry out those principles. In 1839, her Convention assembled to remodel the Constitution, and it is not saying too much to assert, that there were more talented men in that convention than any other that has assembled since the formation of the federal Constitution. Yet it is equally certain that they were afraid of making popular reform; they were so wedded to the particular state of things, although, in some respects, avowedly anti-democratic and repugnant to the progress of democratic principles, that they made as few and as slight modifications as possible. To illustrate in a strong point of view this antipathy to innovation and to show what was the Virginia conservatism in the earlier part of her colonial history—in 1671—I will mention a fact related of Gov. Berkley. In speaking of the New England States, that had at that early period evinced their desire for public education, he thanked God there were neither free schools nor printing presses within his colony—for learning created disputation and disobedience, and the printing press promulgated them. Governor Berkley was not the last of the conservatives—there are many more whose views are almost as limited in 1845!

The gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Conrad) had referred to the authority of Mr. Madison in favor of restriction. No man entertains a higher opinion of that eminent statesman than I do, and is disposed to give more weight to his authority. Since the member from New Orleans, (Mr Conrad,) quoted Mr. Madison, I have examined his recorded opinions to see how far they could be construed as favoring a restriction upon popular suffrage. With the permission of the convention, I will read a few extracts from his notes.

Extract from the Madison Papers.

"These observations" (see Debates of August 7th 1787—the same referred to by Mr. Conrad) do not contain the speaker's more full and natural view of the subject which is subjoined. "He felt too much the example of Virginia.

The right of suffrage is a fundamental article in republican institutions. The regulation of it is at the same time, a task of peculiar delicacy. Allow the right exclusively to property and the rights of persons may be oppressed.

In civilized communities property as well as personal rights is an essential object of the laws, which encourage industry by securing the enjoyments of its fruits—that industry from which property results, and that enjoyment which consists not merely in its immediate use, but in its posthumous destination to objects of choice and of kindred and of affection.

In a just and free government therefore the rights both of persons and of property ought to be effectually guarded. Will the former be so in case of a universal and equal suffrage. Will the latter be so in case of suffrage confined to the holders of property? * * * * It is nevertheless that there are various ways in which the rich may oppress the poor, in which property may oppress liberty, the world is filled with examples. It is necessary that the poor should have a defence against the danger.

Mr. Madison, it would be seen in a vote without date in the appendix, reconsidered what he had advanced and promptly admitted he had gone too far. In one place he uses this remarkable language, "there are many ways in which the rich affect the poor." That, Mr. President, is our very doctrine.

I could, said Mr. Downs, read other extracts from these very interesting papers were I not apprehensive of fatiguing the Convention.

In the 3d vol., on the same subject, during the Virginia Convention, in 1829-30, Mr. Madison holds the following language:

"Were the Constitution on hand to be adapted to the present circumstances of our country, without taking into view the changes which time is rapidly producing, an unlimited extension of the right would probably vary little the character of our public councils or measures. But as we are to prepare a system of government for a period which it is hoped will be a long one, we must look to the prospective changes in the condition and composition of the society in which it is to act. * * * * *

* * * * It must not he supposed that a crowded state of population, of which we have no example, and which we know only by the image reflected from examples elsewhere, is too remote to claim attention. * * * * * * * Supposing the estimate of the growing population of the United States to be nearly correct, and the extent of their territory to be eight or nine hundred millions of acres, and one-fourth of it to consist of inarable surface, there will, in a century or little more, be nearly as crowded a population in the United States as in Great Britain or France, and if the present Constitution of Virginia, with all its flaws, has lasted more than half a century, it is not an unreasonable hope that an amended one will last more than a century."

Thus it will be seen that Mr. Madison's original opinions upon the subject of popular suffrage were reversed upon mature reflection; that in the first instance he frankly acknowledged he felt too much the example of Virginia, and asserted "that if the rights of suffrage were restricted to property, the rights of persons might be oppressed." At a still later period of his life, in 1829, when he had attained an extreme old age and had retired from the service of his country, from which retirement he emerged only for a temporary purpose, he reiterated substantially the same opinions, but from the apprehension of the great increase of population and the changes that time are rapidly producing in the condition and composition of society, he fears the result. He still, however, repudiates the idea that property is every thing, and persons nothing. He re-affirms the same views that he had expressed in relation to a speech made by him in the federal convention, as being his more full and matured thoughts. In a note to that speech he says, "persons and property being both essential objects of government the most that either can claim is such a structure of it, as will have a reasonable security for the other." In 1829-'30, he says, "it cannot be expedient to rest a republican government in a portion of society, having a numerical and physical force, excluded from and liable to be turned against it, and which would lead to a standing military force, dangerous to all parties and to liberty itself."

If we are, indeed, to be subjected to "this conservatism principle," let it be declared not only to this house, but to our constituents. If we are to be under a despotism—if we are to be hung up at the yard arm, and be reduced to a state of society which will require a military force to coerce obedience, the sooner that intention be proclaimed the better. If property be every thing, it must be protected under a despotism, at the point of the bayonet.

Surely such were not the anticipations of the fathers of the revolution. Surely such is not in accordance with the genius of our institution; they never designed to protect property at the expense of personal liberty. Property is sufficient to protect itself; it is an element of power, and will and can defend itself. If left to itself, no apprehension need be entertained that it will be assailed. Property will not only be safe, by leaving suffrage unrestricted, but it will become safer. And not only will that be the inevitable result, but taxation will be reduced by extending the sphere of the elective franchise.

I most firmly believe that the extension of suffrage will be followed by a reduction of public salaries. As to what the legislature may have accomplished in reducing salaries, it amounts to little or nothing. I do not think that their intervention can be counted upon for any thing effectual. The system of high salaries is beyond their control under existing circumstances. It is true there have been some slight reduction: that the salary of the governor and some of the judges have been cut down, but it is equally certain that the great body of municipal and parochial changes were in great disproportion with the resources of the people. If a bill be introduced in the legislature for the purpose of making reductions, the officers that it may effect, bring all their power to bear in order to defeat it. I do not wish to be understood as intending application of these remarks to particular persons, I merely narrate the facts as they are. If the bill pass in one branch of the legislature it invariably fails in the other, and so are retrenchments staved off from year to year.

To exhibit the exorbant charges of public officers, he (Mr. Downs) would state a case in point. A respectable citizen of New Orleans had instituted a suit against a delinquent tenant, and siezed the furniture subject to his claim. The various processes of the law having been complied with, the officer presented him an account of $40 over and above the amount sued for.—The whole charges of the city were excessive. Some steamboats paid as much as six thousand dollars, and from that amount down in proportion. Of course, the people of the country, contributed to this heavy tax. For all these abuses there was but one remedy—the power of the people—extend the right of suffrage, so that every man may declare through the ballot box, whether it be his will to submit to such onerous exactions. That is the only certain way of affecting retrenchment and economy. The expenses of government are four times as large in Louisiana as they are in her sister States. The judges of our supreme court were paid $500 more than the judges of the supreme court of the United States, and many other salaries were upon the same inflated basis. As for the argument, that without holding property one could not feel an interest in the community, it had no validity, There were considerations—there were ties more powerful than mere pecuniary interest.—There were few men however that had not some pecuniary interest involved, and to his conception, a man would be as devoted to the country with $1 as $10,000.

If you admit the property qualification, then you must admit the graduation of that qualification. If a man possessed of $10,000 is more interested in the destinies of the country than one who has not a dollar, then he that owns $50,000 must be still more interested than the first, and so on according to property. If a man with fifty negroes has one vote, he that has one hundred ought to have two. Money then should become the measure of talent, and your Jeffersons, Jacksons and Clays should have given place to some foreign Rothchild, who would have made upon that principle, a public officer, one hundred times better, because he happeneed to be one hundred times better off. Talent should be proscribed and money-bags take its place. Such an argument carries upon its face its absurdity. The people in electing the highest officers of the government should not take into consideration the services and qualifications of the man, but should examine his strong box to see whether he was the richest citizen and possessed of the maximum qualification.

The people were the best judges of the capacity and fitness of their public officers. They should be left unrestricted, and no American citizen having resided in the State a reasonable period, should be denied the privilege of suffrage. The old Constitution had fixed the residence at one year, and it ought to be maintained. The only thing that was really objectionable was the property qualification, and that odious distinction being swept away, its place should not be supplied by another as unnecessary and as invidious. No separate class should be built up in our community with a patent nobility, with peculiar privileges that were denied to other citizens through narrow-minded prejudices and artificial distinctions.

Mr. Downs concluded by hoping that each section of the Constitution be taken up separately, and decided upon its own merits.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

Thursday, 30th January, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened by prayer, from the Rev. Mr. Nicholson.

Mr. Scott of Baton Rouge, asked for leave of absence, for Mr. McCallop of the parish of West Baton Rouge.

Mr. Voorhies objected.

The question was taken, and leave was granted.

The President submitted an invitation to the Convention, from the officers of the People's Lyceum, to attend a discourse to be pronounced by Professor McCauley.

Mr. Roselius called the attention of the Convention to an invitation to attend the examination of the public schools of the second Municipality, to-day at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Dunn hoped that the business of the Convention would be suspended at 12 o'clock, to enable them to assist at that interesting exhibition. The subject of education would no doubt claim the serious consideration of this body, and no opportunity of becoming acquainted with the details of the present system of public schools in the city, should be suffered to pass unimproved. He therefore moved that the members of the Convention proceed in a body.

Mr. Lewis objected. He said no man certainly had a higher regard for public education than he, or would go further in promoting it. But he could not consent that the important objects for which the Convention were assembled should be arrested, and that several hours should be lost. If individual members wished to attend, it was within their discretion to do so, but for one he was opposed to a cessation of the business of the Convention.

Mr. Culbertson said that, inasmuch as the invitation had been accepted, and arrangements had been made for the reception of the Convention, it would appear not altogether consistent or courteous to abstain from attending. If we had declined the invitation on account of our public duties, our motives would have been understood and appreciated, but it appeared rather late to urge that as an objection now.

Mr. Lewis inquired of the Secretary whether the invitation had been accepted. The Secretary replied that no motion had been made for its acceptance.

Mr. Culbertson: Then I labored under a misapprehension.

Mr. Roselius: I move that it be accepted, and that we proceed in a body at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Voorhies said he would call for the yeas and nays. He admitted that education was an object of great public utility, but at the same time the Convention were not assembled to go about visiting public institutions, however meritorious they might be. It should not be forgotten that the expenses of this body were $600 a day, and we should, therefore, economize our time, and get through our duties as quick as possible.

Mr. Splane said that he felt under the necessity of voting for the resolution, as it had been the general impression, both in and out of the Convention, that the invitation was accepted: that it was not expressly accepted, and our acceptance recorded upon our journals, was a matter of pure accident. Preparations have been made, and the Convention is expected to attend. He must, therefore, vote for the resolution.

Mr. Dunn: This is no common, insignificant matter; no holiday show; but an object of vast and incalculable utility. The Convention could not better employ its time than to give its public countenance to a plan of education that embraces the whole of our population. If our institutions are to be preserved, it must be through the intelligence of the people, and the general diffusion of knowledge. Without that, our institutions are not worth one straw.

Mr. Lewis admitted the importance of public education, but thought the members of the Convention, whether in their official or individual capacity, could give it their countenance as well without as by attending this exhibition. If the peculiar duties of the Convention permitted it, he would cheerfully attend as a private citizen.

He would move for the division of the question, and would vote affirmatively upon the question of acceptance, as that he considered pro forma. Upon the question to attend in a body he should vote negatively.

The question of acceptance was agreed to without a division. Upon the motion to attend in a body, Mr. Voorhies called for the yeas and nays—yeas 27—nays 34.

Order of the Day.—The Convention resumed the consideration of the 8th section of the 2d article of the Constitution, relative to the qualification of voters, which was under discussion when the Convention adjourned yesterday.

Mr. Lewis said: When the Convention adjourned yesterday, I designed making a few observations in reply to the doctrines advanced by the member from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) and the member from Rapides, (Mr. Brent). The particular question now to be voted on, must necessarily enter but little into the discussion in which we find ourselves. It would, more properly, be upon the principal question than upon the isolated point, whether the residence should be one year, two years, or more. The range of debate has been so extensive, and I differ so far from those that oppose the section, and in some respects from those that advocate it, that, once for all, I shall state my views upon the subject. In sustaining a proposition which is designed to establish the corner stone of our republican institutions, I hope I may be indulged if I travel, in legal parlance, occasionally out of the record, and follow the example of the gentlemen that have preceded me, with whose opinions I find myself unable to agree.

In the outset I will premise that there is one proposition of the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs), with which I agree. I think, with him, that the property qualification should be swept away from the right of suffrage. I have reflected upon the subject for many years, and the conclusion to which I have arrived is, that this restriction is not in unison with the progress of the age and the present condition of representative governments. Why concede the right of self-government, and deny its exercise to every individual member of the community? Many arguments might be adduced in favor of the right to suffrage, without reference to property, but I conceive it to be unnecessary. While I agree upon that point, I cannot consider how a government can exist without restrictions upon the will of a bare majority. It is for the protection of the majority, as well as of the minority, that there should be some positive restraints. No government can exist and be effectual without those restraints. It would have no more strength than a rope of sand. It must must have some fundamental principles—some conservative power to maintain its existence. I contend that this conservative or preservative power is essentially necessary to its well being, and that no government can succeed without it, however it may be ridiculed. I shall not descend to notice that species of argument. The idea that such a notion should be entertained has been treated with a great deal of levity; and such definitions have been given to the word conservative, as suited the purposes of those who made them. I repudiate the definitions that have been assigned.

There is another preliminary point to which I would refer. One gentleman assumes that the individual members of this body are the representatives of the whole State. Another gentleman contends that each representative is the representative only of his particular parish. In this case, as in most others, I think the truth is to be found between the two extremes. We are here first, to represent the interests of the sections of the State from which we come, and next, to consult upon and represent the general interests of the whole State; and reconcile sectional interests with general interests. We are to preserve the rights of our immediate constituents, and do justice to the rest of the State.

We must not, said Mr. Lewis, suppose that we are wiser than any other body that has ever assembled for the purpose of fixing the constituent basis of government. If we expect to arrive at any definite result, we must yield up our peculiar views, if it be necessary—in plain words, we must compromise our differences.

The assertion in the Declaration of Independence, that all men are born free and equal, cannot be understood as implying a perfect equality of rights in society; for, if this were so, women and minors would not be excluded from participating in governments. The enjoyment of individual liberty under governments can neither be unlimited nor uncontrolled. The extent of liberty, and the duration of society, is dependent upon the wise restrictions that are imposed; or, in other words, upon the conservative principle, upon which must rest the foundation of the social compact. I cannot, therefore, subscribe to the opinion of the member from Ouachita, that we should take the Constitution, section by section, and decide upon each according to its merits. On the contrary, in my opinion, we should make it have a general correspondence in all its features: there should be no contradictions, but all its dispositions should be in perfect unison.

The examples, argued Mr. Lewis, that have been drawn from history, to sustain the assertion, that revolutions in the political world have invariably been occasioned by restrictions upon personal liberty, are not altogether exact. The revolution which precipitated Charles the 1st from the throne, was not occasioned by restrictions upon personal rights, if we except some abuses of the star chamber, but rather by the extravagant contributions levied upon the people—the heavy taxes that were imposed. As to the abuses of the star chamber, they were a matter of but secondary consideration. But the principal and main cause, was the excessive taxation, attempted to be levied without the assent, and with the reprobation of the house of commons. As for personal liberty, it is notorious that the English people enjoyed more personal liberty at that time than the other nations of Europe. It was the want of the conservative principle, when the King attempted to levy taxes without the consent of parliament, that led to the change of government, and finally enabled Oliver Cromwell to establish a despotism, the natural consequence of anarchy. The government was only brought to its equipoise, and the popular liberty established, under Charles the II, when the conservative principle was restored.

sanguinary revolution in France. There we find a faithful picture of an unrestricted, unlimited popular government. The government of the mere majority—of brute force. The monarchy and aristocracy were struck down with one blow. It was said by the demagogues of that day, that pushed the people to excesses, that the age of gold was at hand. The worst passions of human nature were excited, and every thing done to uproot the foundations of society, and to replace them by the mad dreams of political zealots. Human life was sacrificed with the utmost apathy, and the earth was deluged with blood. From the omnipotent voice of the populace rose the fatal cry, to the guilotine! to the lanterns! Death was the portion of all that did not bow the head to demagogueism; and that era of liberty, which was described as the realization of the perfectability of human government, was followed by the reign of terror!

These examples, it may be said, apply only to monarchies; but I contend that men are but men, whatever their institutions may be, and are more or less under the influence of passion, and the sudden outbursts of excitement. The same causes produce the same, or similar effects, and when is it borne in mind, that these and similar horrors which history presents, of the fallibility of our species, are the result of license and of distempered notions of liberty and equality; we should reflect seriously upon the possibility of similar occurrences, and not permit ourselves to be carried away by mere theories and abstractions. In republican governments, which in one sense are essentially the governments of the people, we should establish certain definite principles, which while they secure the expression of the popular voice, and give to us all the benefits of republican institutions, will restrain any outbursts of sudden passion, or any abuses which the majority, under temporary excitement, may be disposed to commit; and which will maintain the vested rights of the minority. There should be some bulwark to resist the waves of popular tumult, beyond which there would be safety and ropose ; some conservative power which would ordain "thus far thou shalt go, but no farther."

Mr. Lewis said he would make a few remarks that properly did not belong to this subject. The principles of native Americanism had been expressly assailed by an honorable member, (Mr. Brent,) who had attempted to cast ridicule upon those principles, by representing them as being of Asiatic origin, and as being worthy of the children of the sun and brother to the moon. That gentleman had gone still farther, and asserted that the native American party of Philadelphia were the authors of what he termed a most disgraceful outrage upon the rights of naturalized citizens; and not only that, but that they had desecrated the temple of the living God. These were, said Mr. Lewis, the substance of his charges; and as a native American—one proud of that title, I take this occasion to defend the principles which he thinks so odious, and which in his opinion have suggested so unparalelled an outrage. I deny that there is any thing in the event to which he refers, that can attach the slightest odium to the native American party. What are the facts in relation to those riots? Who were the first aggressors? There is nothing in that occurrence for which the native American party cannot justify themselves before God and man! A body of native Americans had assembled in their own country, to discuss a question of public concernment to themselves, as native Americans; and were attacked and threatened by a band of foreigners. The room where they met was invaded, and they were threatened with being driven out. They did meet, and this foreign rabble attempted to eject them. Was not that sufficient to arouse them, and to provoke their retaliation? Were the rights of American citizens to be trampled on with impunity? If there were bloodshed and arson, be the fault on those that were the cause. I am sorry that these charges are made in this house, by a native American. But, as a native American, I repel and throw them back!

To return to the question; I do not say that property should alone be protected. Personal rights are more sacred, but both should be an object of solicitude. Individual interest demonstrates that if an association of men were to select a person to conduct their private affairs, they would prefer one having a common interest with them, to an utter stranger, who had nothing at stake. It is those that are interested, those who are liable to contribute to the support of the government, that should be entrusted with the important duty of making our laws, and of regulating our taxes, one of the most important functions of government; and it would be folly to commit to those having no taxes to pay, nor any identity of interest, the power to impose public burthens. The power of taxation is one that never can be properly exercised without the consent of the taxed. In our conflict and separation from Great Britain, the imposition of taxes without representation, was one of the principal causes of complaint. The colonies were taxed without being represented.

In deciding the question of who are to be the depositories of poltical power, it behooves us to have a care not to entrust the administration of the government to irresponsible persons, who have nothing to lose, and who being at the bottom of the wheel, cannot be worse off—who have every thing to gain and nothing to lose.

I shall not attempt to answer the comparison instituted by the gentleman from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs,) between the superiority of a steamboat now, and one in the infancy of steamboat building; by which he attempts to make an analogy in the science of government. I find no analogy in the comparison, and I shall not waste time to consider it. Past experience have convinced me that man is incapable of governing himself, without restriction; in fact the very term government, necessarily implies restraint. The founders of our institution saw the necessity of restrictions—of checks and ballances; and it becomes us to profit by the experience of the past, as well as by their experience.

As regards the right of suffrage, it ought to be extended to all those who offer by residence and by association the presumptive proof that they are identified with us and attached to our institutions. But to grant suffrage indiscriminately, to persons who are foreign to us in sentiment and feeling, as well as by birth and education, would be an act of consummate folly, for which we would pay very dearly. The Roman republic, whilst it confirmed the perogation of citizenship to its own citizens and preserved the conservative principle, maintained its exalted position, but when in the progress of time, it extended that privilege to foreigners and strangers, it weakened its power; and from that period began its decayance in public spirit and virtue. At one time the title of a Roman citizen was the proudest that man ever boasted. In the remotest quarter of the world it paralyzed the arm of oppression. At first the distinction of Roman citizenship was conferred upon a few strangers, but as no immediate evil resulted, the privilege was extended far and wide, until the Roman citizens proper disappeared among the hordes that pressed upon them. It is to to be hoped that such a destiny is not reserved for this republic!

One word as regards citizens of other States. We are forming a constitution of Louisiana—not a constitution for the several States, and one half of Europe. It is proper for us to say, upon what conditions we shall allow persons among us to participate in political power: as for all other privileges they are amply accorded; but when it comes to making our laws and carrying them into effect, we should surely have some guarantee of fidelity; and no right judging man, that desires the perpetuation of our institutions, will think it unreasonable to remain two years to qualify himself before he goes to the ballot box to deposite his vote and to take a share in the destinies of the State. I certainly entertain no prejudices against our fellow citizens of the other States. I consider them like ourselves Americans, and attached as we ought all to be to our common country and to our glorious Union. But there are in some of their local institutions and ours an essential difference—there is a dissimilarity between our systems of law and theirs, especially as regards minors and married women, and before they can understand these differences and appreciate them, they ought to reside among us for some time. Is two years an unreasonable period? I think not, and no man of experience will think that it is, who reflects that constitutions are not formed for exceptional cases, but for universal application; and however eligible some might be to citizenship by their preconceived notions, it would be an unsafe rule to take these as our basis for action.

As regards foreigners, I must say that I view their eligibility to citizenship under the laws of the United States as exceedingly unfortunate. Those laws I would have repealed in toto. But, inasmuch as they exist, I am for respecting them. It is my deliberate conviction that out of twenty foreigners who immigrate to our shores nineteen would not make good citizens. The twentieth may be every way deserving. There are some that come amongst us that are deserving. But the great mass are the rabble, the dissolute and the vicious: the pauper and the ignorant. A few of them make good citizens, but precious few. I think it better to give up the twentieth man, that possesses qualities that would make him a good American citizen, than to take the nineteen that are without a solitary requisite. The love of country is emplanted in the human breast. It is an impulse bound up with the strongest ties. It is posssible that a man born in another country and raised in another clime may love the country of his adoption as well as the country of his birth. But it is barely possible.

Mr. Miles Taylor said, he rose to submit his views with great deference. The question before the Convention was of itself very narrow, but as auxiliary points had been brought into the discussion, and opinions had been expressed from which he differed, he begged to state the grounds of difference.

Before entering into an examination here we should regulate political power, and to whose hands we should commit it. I feel myself called upon, (said Mr. Taylor) to refute the deductions drawn from certain premises, or rather I may say the premises themselves, which have been invoked, to show that it would be dangerous to establish a government dependent upon the will of the majority, unchecked by restrictive powers. The revolution in England by which Charles the 1st was dethroned, was not occasioned, as supposed by the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) through the obstinacy of that monarch to govern without the intervention of parliament; no more was this so, than the afflictions of the republic were the natural consequences of the government of the people. A bold and daring aristocracy, anxious to maintain their privileges which constitute a fraction of the country; for the popular representation at that day was no more than it is at present, a fictitious representation, overthrew the king and suffered him to be conducted ignominiously to the scaffold. It is true that this revulsion was followed by the establishment of a republic under the lead of a man as able as he was hypocritical, and that so far from producing the beneficial results which were anticipated, it stimulated greater abuses and occasioned greater suffering. But the people in whose name and for whose benefit the revolution was professedly begun, were not at fault; they contended with all their might against the oppression, but it was in vain, as they were divested of their power. It is a mistake to cite the protectorate of Cromwell as a consequence of the disorders which were the result of popular government. The same remark applies to the more recent revolution in France. The first constituent assembly in France exhibited great judgment, and made their reforms with proper deliberation. But, when the king and the nobility undertook to defeat these reforms and to betray the cause of the people, by deserting to the enemies of the country, as were shown by the flight of the king and the coalition of the European powers in concert, the people justly indignant, retaliated, and from one extremity to another they proceeded until they reached the reign of terror. We have been told that the mob at Philadelphia was excusable, because they defended the privilege of American citizens. For a much stronger reason should we exempt from censure a people who were exasperated by the connivance of their sovereign in a sudden invasion. I am not an apologist for the disgraceful riots at Philadelphia, nor do I wish to be understood as justifying the horrors of the French revolution. All that I contend for is this, that the French people were provoked, irritated into the acts of violence which they committed, and which degraded their cause. But so soon as their enemies attempted to coerce them their dissensions ceased, and they became united as a band of brothers, to meet the common danger. They repulsed their enemies and preserved their independence. How does that example sustain the deductions of the member from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) that popular governments are incompatible with public virtue, and cannot exist.

The principal error in the arguments of those that attempt to prove from history the impossibility of popular governments, is, that they do not sufficiently distinguish the principle from the action of those governments. It is incontestible that the authority of government takes its source from the will of those upon whom it is to operate, whether we consider the action of the legislative, the executive, or the judiciary; and that beyond the source of power itself, are the means of exercising it; but the means are not at present under discussion. The question is, who shall determine the action and sphere of political power? I do not hesitate to say that it should be the majority. I may be told that this would be placing personal rights above the rights of property. I admit it. I do not think that property can be alone the connecting link of society. Important as it is, it is nothing more than an accessary; and it will not be difficult for me to show that the arguments that have been adduced in its favor are as erroneous as those based upon the popular revolutions in England and in France. It is true that the enlightened Madison hesitated in making persons the basis of government instead of property, but it is equally true that he was influenced by the fear that from the great increase of population the popular action, if not checked, would be dangerous to our institutions. Experience has shown us that these apprehensions were illusory, and the examples which the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) draws from history, do not sustain the reverse of the proposition.

The history of Rome presents no example of a popular outbreak against property. There never was a contest between the rich and the poor, unless we designate as such the commotions raised by the plebians for bread. If we examine attentively the history of that republic, we find that there was but one species of contest; the contest between the oppressed and the oppressors. This was the natural consequence of the peculiar and unjust system which prevailed in the polity of the Roman people. Their community was divided into two classes, with unequal power—the plebians, that were ten times more considerable than the patricians, had but one-sixth of the political power; and in addition to this, the expression of the public will was limited to the seven hills of the city, which dictated laws to the provinces. Can any reasonable parallel be drawn between the system of government at Rome—a splendid aristocracy—and the democratic institutions of the United States? It is not to the principle of property that we are to attribute the force and strength of our government, but it is to the principle of association, and the love of personal liberty that binds us together.

It seems to me, that instead of consulting the several constitutions of our sister States to show that property would be unsafe, if it were not made an element of the government, and that those who possessed no property would be dangerous legislators, it would have been more appropriate to have referred to our own experience to sustain the contrary doctrine. Property has governed in Louisiana exclusively, and what has been the result? What disposition has been made of the public property? and what forbearance has been shown in the collection of revenue? We find that the State has been involved to an immense amount, and impoverished in her resources, and by what legislation was this done? Was it by the poor or by the rich: by a representation based upon property, or a representation based upon persons. Who created those wild and visionary speculations that have emptied the public treasury and violated the public faith? Was it to succor the poor that the Union Bank and the Citizens' Bank were created, or was it to accommodate the rich, the property holders, whose interests were especially represented in your legislature. For whose benefit were large appropriations made to the Nashville railroad company, to foster the spirit of speculation? By whom were your legislatures besieged for charters of banking corporations and visionary schemes of internal improvement? Certainly not by the poor. Your representation has been based upon property, and what has been the result? Has property protected itself, or has it protected the interests of the laboring classes? A retrospection of the past will show that it has not. The argument that property would be endangered if representation be based upon persons, is without force. We have had experience of what a property basis is. We have seen the extravagances and follies that have attended it. Extravagances and follies which would have been still more serious in their consequences, had it not been for the firmness and judgment of a citizen, whose official station enabled him to arrest their onward march, and to save some millions of dollars from the yawning abyss of bankruptcy. Why then prefer property to persons? Property will always have its full share of weight; I would not exclude its proper influence, but I would not sacrifice the interests of persons to property; that is to say, I would not render persons inferior to property, by giving to the latter a preponderance.

In vain will it be assumed that taxation is the first object of government; that to those only that pay taxes belongs the government. Either this argument has weight, or it has no weight. In the first hypothesis the argument is closed. In reference to second, I will remark that it is not only those that own the property that pay the taxes, but, also, the consumer of the product of the property—the laboring man who purchases. The man who serves six days in the militia during the year, contributes his time, not only for the protection of the State, but for the protection of this very property; and he, also, is entitled to a voice in the administration of public affairs.

An allusion has been made to the assumed injustice of requiring two years' residence in the State. It has been qualified as aristocratical, and as establishing an unjust preference. I cannot take that view of the subject. If our elections are to be held biennially as has been proposed, what great hardship can result? To secure the attachment and fidelity of new comers, some period should be fixed upon as a test. Is two years too long for that purpose? It has been said and truly said that the State is peculiarly situated. Her institutions require a guarantee from those that are to participate in wielding her destinies. Some time must elapse before strangers can become assimilated in sentiment and feeling with the old population. I do not think it would be wise to dispense with so necessary a requisite as that of residence, and I cannot think the period is disproportionate to the necessity. Persons are arriving among us in great numbers from Europe and from the Northern States—those from Europe, it is to be presumed, are more or less imbued with the prejudices and feelings of a political order of things entirely different from our system of government; and among those from the Northern States are some that are tinctured with doctrines not in unison with our domestic tranquility. To allow all these, at once, to approach the ballot box would surely be impolitic. It would be endangering our institutions, and unwisely exposing ourselves to foreign influence and domestic corruption.

Mr. Splane said that it was due to him self and to the parish he had the honor of representing, (the parish of St. Mary,) to explain the position in which his constituents and himself stood upon this subject. Before his election, he had distinctly stated his views upon the several questions which would in all probability come before the Convention, and upon this point explicitly, to remove restrictions upon suffrage, and to impose none. He would read from his printed address to the people of the parish of St. Mary.

Mr. Splane said that consequently he should vote for the motion of the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs,) to strike out, with the view of filling the blank with one year. This was in accordance with the wishes of his constituents. He did not pretend to know what were the wishes of other constituents. He spoke only of his own.

Mr. Burton offered a substitute for the section, requiring that the voter should be twenty-one years of age, a free white male, and that he shall have resided one year in the State.

Mr. Preston: that is in precise accordance with the old Constitution, striking out the property qualification.

Mr. Benjamin raised the question of order upon the receipt of the substitute.

Mr. Downs considered the substitute to be in order.

Mr. Claiborne participated in the opinion of his colleague, (Mr. Benjamin,) that it was out of order.

Mr. Grymes: questions of order should be decided without debate.

The President decided that the substitute was in order.

Mr. Guion would inquire of the chair if the substitute were adopted, whether it would be subject to amendment.

The President: No sir.

Mr. Benjamin, thought that this decision was erroneous and would lead to confusion.

Mr. KENNER inquired of the chair, whether the motion for the previous question, if it prevailed, would cut off the substitute.

The PRESIDENT: The motion for the previous question if it prevailed would bring up the question to strike out.

Mr. O'BRYAN thought the previous question would be on the adoption of the section.

Mr. CHINN: the decision of the chair would throw the house upon the original report.

Mr. KENNER's motion for the previous question was put and carried---ayes 42 nays 24.

The question was then taken to strike out the following words : "and has resided two years in the State and one year in the parish in which he offers to vote."

The ayes and nays were called for and were ordered, and the result was as follows:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Leonard McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Preston, Read, Sellers, Splane, Waddill and Wederstrandt—23 ayes.

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquié, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Carriere, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Marginy, Mazureau, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder—44 nays.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the section.

Mr. KENNER proposed the following proviso :

"Provided that no person of unsound mind, or one who has been convicted of felony, or any crime, shall enjoy the privilege of suffrage, and provided further that no elector shall vote out of the parish in which he resides, or if it be in the city of New Orleans out of the ward in which he may reside."

This proviso gave rise to a desultory discussion.

And on motion, the Convention adjourned without coming to a decision.

FRIDAY, January 31, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and the proceedings were opened with prayer from the Rev. Mr. Reilly.

The CHAIR announced that the call for the previous question yesterday, on the 8th section, cut off all amendments. The previous question was properly on the original report, but we had through inadvertance taken the question upon the motion to strike out.

Mr. LEWIS: the question has been taken and decided, and it is too late now to interfere with that decision.

Mr. DOWNS: the decision of the chair, this morning, corresponds with what was stated by the member from West Baton Rouge, (Mr. Chinn,) that the previous question was properly upon the original report.

Mr. SELLERS had voted in the affirmative upon the motion to strike out, under the belief that the section was open to amendment. He had been so informed by the president. He would now ask to change his vote.

Leave was granted, and Mr. Sellers' name was recorded in the negative.

ORDER OF THE DAY.—Section eight, article second.

Mr. KENNER offered his proviso excluding from suffrage persons of unsound mind, and persons guilty of criminal offences; and requiring further, that each voter should vote in the parish in which he resided; and in cities, in the ward in which the voter resided.

The President decided the foregoing to be out of order.

Mr. ROMAN offered the following additional section:

SEC. 10th. "It shall be the duty of the general assembly to provide by law for the registration, at least three months before every general election, of all the qualified voters of the State, in the several parishes in which they actually reside. No person shall be entitled to vote except in the parish of his residence, and if the parish is divided into election precincts or wards, in the election precinct or ward where he resides, and except his name shall have been recorded in the last registry made previous to the election."

Mr. ROMAN said that the Convention had sanctioned the principle of universal suffrage. Each one would have to accommodate himself to that principle; but it was all important not to lose sight of the difficulties that would beset the judges of election, in distinguishing as to those who really possessed the qualifications still required. Fraud was more facile of practice in Louisiana, than in any other State of the Union, on account of the crowds of persons that came from the other States, and more particularly from Europe. To convince one of the motley character of that population, it was only necessary to go in the morning to the market; there was a confusion of tongues there, equal to that of the Tower of Babel. It is necessary to make some law to prevent frauds, which, all agree, exist to an alarming extent, and I believe the foregoing proposition is of a character to effect that purpose.

Mr. Dunn said that this proposition was one that ought to be considered with some reflection. He therefore moved that it be printed.

Which motion prevailed, and the section was made the order of the day for Wednesday next.

Mr. Claiborne presented the following section:

Sec. 9th. "In all cases when persons offering to vote shall be naturalized citizens, the residence of two years in the State, required by the preceding section, shall commence from or after the date of their naturalization."

On motion of Mr. Guion, the foregoing section was ordered to be printed, and made the order of the day for Wednesday next.

Mr. Miles Taylor presented the following additional section which was also ordered to be printed:

Sec. "Absence from the State shall interrupt the residence required in the preceding section, unless the person absenting himself shall be a housekeeper, and his dwelling house shall be actually and exclusively occupied during his absence, by his family, or some portion thereof."

Mr. Benjamin stated the fourth section of the second article, had not been adopted, nor rejected—the motion to adopt that section, as amended, having failed by the casting vote of the president, it was not adopted.

On motion of Mr. Scott, of Baton Rouge, said section was laid on the table, subject to call.

And Mr. Claiborne moved to amend the foregoing by the following order, "and that it remains on the table until the question of suffrage be decided," which motion prevailed.

Mr. Scott, of Feliciana, moved that the seventh section of the second article, which is as follows, be taken up:

"The house of representatives shall elect its speaker and other officers."

Said section was adopted.

Mr. Lewis moved that the Convention take up the sixth section, which motion prevailed.

Sec. 6. "Representation shall be equal and uniform in this State; each parish shall have at least one representative, and beyond that, if entitled to any more, in proportion to the population of each, ascertained and calculated according to the principle of representation, adopted in the constitution of the United States. "	Bossier,	1
Total,		72

As soon as may be after the United States census of 1850 shall have been taken and promulgated, and every ten years thereafter the number of representatives shall be fixed and apportioned, according to the principles of this section, so as not to be less than seventy nor more than one hundred, and whenever a new parish shall be created, a separate representative shall at the same time be provided for it, which shall continue until the next decimal apportionment."

Mr. MARIGNY said that this section was the most important section that had as yet been under consideration. As a member of the committee-I disaprove of the report just read, of the majority of the committee, and also disagree with the counter report. I ask that the section be rejected, and shall proceed to state on what grounds I base this demand.

This section is neither in harmony with the federal constitution, nor with our local institutions. Still less is it in accordance with the popular will, whether we take for its exponents the whig party or the democratic party. It would be better that each member should abandon this body than to pass such a section. "Representation," says the section, "shall be equal and uniform." In this case representation should undoubtedly be in the ratio of population, and according to the federal basis, which does not admit the right of property in its apportionment; a representation is allowed to each fraction of fifty thousand citizens, and accordingly it would have to be conceded here that the number of electors should determine the number of representatives; and I would be curious to hear what certain orators would say that wish to throw aside property and take persons exclusively.

But it would appear that this is not the reasoning which the authors of the section attach to the words, equality and uniformity; for they say immediately afterwards "each parish shall have the right to one representative at least." How one member to each parish? Why the fourth district, where as many new parishes have been created as possible, has already twenty eight representatives in the lower house, and if you add to these twenty eight representatives, those of four or five adjoining parishes that have a similarity of interest, the amount will be augmented to thirty two or thirty three representatives, which will constitute within three, one half of the whole house. Is not this a most singular mode of securing equality and uniformity. Parishes that contain scarcely two hundred electors, are each to have one representative, and if they unite by a common interest, they will embrace in all time the majority of the house. How can you explain this inconsistency, unless you admit that you attach greater value to property than to persons?

To argue upon this question cannot avail you, for I have before me the calculations that you have made, and the figures that you have placed opposite to the same, of each parish. You say that Caddo shall have one representative, Bossier one representative, and so on with several others, that it is needless to enumerate, but to whom you give equal weight with the parish of Plaquemines. And yet, what a striking difference between her geographical limits and the parishes of the West, which you favor so liberally. She has ninety miles in length, and in breadth she has, first, a peninsula of 60 miles square, between Lake Borgne, the Gulf, and the River; and, secondly, immense prairies which have been supposed inhabitable, but which, from the employment of steam to machinery for the purpose of draining, promise to be progressively brought into cultivation; thirdly, numerous bayous, and, finally, growing villages, such as Pointe à la Hache and the Balize. And to this parish you accord but a single representative, and you pretend that such a concession is in conformity with equality and uniformity? In my opinion I pronounce it to be a mockery; a violation of all justice.

Again; if the evil were confined to the present, it would not be so oppressive.—But the injustice does not stop here, for the section goes on to say, "that whenever a new parish shall be created she shall be entitled to one representative."

This clause, it cannot be denied, is altogether in favor of the Fourth District. Elsewhere in the State there is a decided repugnance to dividing old parishes to create new ones, but in the Fourth District there is but one dominant and predominating idea, and that is, to divide and subdivide. In addition to all this, calculations are made already upon the land not yet sold, on the Atchafalaya, out of which will be carved some fifty or sixty parishes! When that takes place, the Fourth District will have a majority in the Legislature; will vote at will all the appropriations; distribute as she pleases, the seven or ten millions of revenue, which the immense riches of the State will pour into the treasury. In the time of peace, as in the horrors of war, this favored district will regulate the destinies of the State—having the possession of the public purse—and the balance of the State will be mere servants, or adversaries, to be laughed at! This cannot be. Never will such a montrosity be consummated! The majority of our citizens would be like the executive power in France, in Spain, and in England, subjected to the caprices of a legislative majority, that the body of the State had not contributed. I repudiate with indignation such a design. If the Convention untowardly gave it their countenance, I would refuse to sign the constitution containing it, out of respect for the people who disapprove it. But the Convention will, I hope, do its duty; and the only response it will give to the long and excited debates, which will be indulged in, to prove that what is most unjust is founded in justice, will be a profound silence, and the rejection, prompt and absolute, of the section, the three first lines only excepted. This is the motion, Mr. President, which I submit; and which I hope will at once prevail, so heartily anxious am I that the last traces of such a piece of machination shall disappear.

Mr. Benjamin suggested that, in fact, the section was conceived in such a manner as not to be in a proper form for the action of the Convention. He, therefore, moved that it be referred to a special committee of twelve; three to be chosen from each of the congressional districts.

Mr. C. M. Conrad trusted that the Convention, before taking farther action upon the subject, would reject at once the principle, according one representative to each parish. It might answer very well the views of certain persons, to create new parishes, for the purpose of getting the parochial offices, consequent upon those creations, but he doubted much whether the Convention would establish, by their action, the carving out of new parishes, tending to destroy the principle of uniformity and equality, and to establish among us the rotton borough system of England. If this objectionable principle were rejected, which was, in fact, in contradiction with the three first lines of the section, "that representation should be equal and uniform," the committee, to whom his colleague (Mr. Benjamin) proposed to refer the subject, would be enabled to determine upon the proper basis, and that once determined, it would be a matter of mere arithmetic to make the apportionment.

Mr. Boudousque moved that the section be at once rejected, for the minority of the committee were restricted to protesting against the course of proceeding of the majority, and the only hope they had was to appeal to the justice of the Convention, when the section should come up.

Mr. Downs: I was so far from anticipating the attacks, which the report of the committee has encountered, upon the subject of apportionment, that I am unprepared to repel them. One honorable member (Mr. Marigny) rises from his seat and threatens the Convention that he will not sign the new Constitution if the Convention dare adopt this section. This section, cries another member, (Mr. Benjamin) in a tone no less indicative of excitement, is repugnant to justice, and in direct conflict with the principles of equality and justice. The whole section, exclaims a third member, (Mr. C. M. Conrad) is in direct conflict with the three first lines, which declare, as a basis, "that representation shall be equal and uniform"; and all three unite in vociferating, reject this section at once and send the subject to another committee, which will be more equitably composed than the first. If this be the way in which the business of the Convention is to be conducted; if it be imagined that by violence and force of recrimination, certain designs are to be attained; then, I will say, that those that employ this method will find themselves wofully mistaken. Differences of opinion should be left open to accommodation, and not to wilful and unfounded accusations. On whose motion was this very committee, which is now found to be so very objectionable, formed? It was formed on the motion of one of the very gentlemen (Mr. Benjamin) that denounces it at present with so much acrimony. It was framed, too, at a time when excitement and violence were unknown. But, because the committee, composed of delegates from each senatorial district, have not reported in accordance with the peculiar views of certain gentlemen, it is said that the report is glaringly unjust; that it is culpably wrong; and that the first committee must be dismissed with anathemas, and a second one, more equitably composed, chosen to investigate the same matter de novo. Unless it be designed beforehand to dictate to the new committee the very report which they shall make, what report can they make to satisfy those that object so strenuously to the action of the first committee? It may very well happen that the first report is not perfect, but I protest against the imputation that the majority of the committee were actuated by the design of advancing sectional interests, and giving a preponderance to any section to which it was not clearly and indubitably entitled—if such preponderence really exists, which is asserted with so much vehemence of declamation. There is nothing in the principle which is so novel or startling. The basis that has been adopted was the favorite basis of the Southern States, and was the one incorporated, at their express desire, into the federal constitution. The principle that each parish should have one representative is neither new nor extraordinary. The Constitution of the United States gives to the smaller States an equal voice with the larger, in the Senate of the United States. And, as to the particular objections urged against the basis of representation, I repeat again, it is the very basis that the slave-holding States have considered vital to their very existence. If you denounce that basis, you may maintain the doctrines of Massachusetts and those States that are inimical to Southern institutions. For the sake of consistency, how can you argue that the basis of representation in the federal constitution is proper and just, while you denounce the very same principle as tyrannical and oppressive in our own constitution?

When the question was recently under discussion, said Mr. Downs, upon the right of suffrage, and the superiority was assumed for property, while I resisted that doctrine, I admitted that property ought to have the weight that legitimately belonged to it. Slaves are the greatest sources of revenue in the State. They are identified with a very important local interest that should have its weight in the administration of our political affairs.

The gentleman from St. John the Baptist (Mr. Boudousquie) complains vehemently that each parish should have a representative, because some of the parishes of the State are small and insignificant. Now, it so happens that the very parish that delegates that gentleman, and the adjoining parish of St. Charles, are among the very smallest parishes of the State. If the gentleman's rule were to prevail, to cut off the smaller parishes from representation, both these parishes would be denied a separate voice in the Legislature. An examination of the question, free from bitterness and excitement, will demonstrate that there is nothing so unjust, so odious, in allowing each parish to have a representative. If, as in some of the republics of antiquity, the people assembled immediately and disposed of all great questions, there would be no necessity for assigning to each distinct local political community a representation. But, inasmuch as the republican principle of representation, which was unknown to the republics of ancient times, and which is certainly a very great improvement, exists; and which enables a very large extent of country to live under one general government for general purposes, and a local government for local purposes; the necessity of bringing together the whole people to consult, is dispensed with; and they have the facility to entrust their interests to a few persons to be adequately represented. To carry out the principle in its purity, however, it is necessary that every portion of the community should have a representative to represent their general, as well as their local wishes. Each fractional portion having a separate territorial interest, should be represented in the general assembly of the whole community. Because the population be relatively small is no reason why it should be deprived of a voice whenever its independent territorial existence has been established and is continued. Its population may increase, but if its population did not increase and if it were to remain stationary, how are its vested rights to be protected and its wants and wishes be made known? By allowing it to participate with another parish in electing a representative? To this I would observe that the interests of even contiguous parishes are not invariably identical. The parish that had the greater population would govern the one that had the smaller population. The person elected would have his local attachments and personal interests with the mass of the population, by whom he would be chosen. Besides, the coalesced parish might be at some distance, and the representative might not visit it, either on account of its remoteness, or because it was difficult of access, on account of the bayous and marshes that separated its territory.

I have had, (continued Mr. Downs,) during my own personal experience, some acquaintance with the spirit that has actuated our legislation. Those only have had the real preponderance in the legislature among whom there was a perfect unity of sentiment, and as this unity of sentiment was on many occasions extremely difficult among the representatives of the country parishes, even when party spirit was temporarily lulled, it has so happened that the ten or eleven representatives from the city have paralyzed the action of all others, save themselves, and have invariably carried the object at which they aimed. This result is not difficult of solution. Wherever there are large aggregates of persons interested in any design, their objects are likely to succeed, even to the detriment of other interests, unless some efficatious means be devised to preclude the weight of their concentrated, and because concentrated, more powerful action. I contend that nothing so effectual, to preserve the due weight of the country, can be adopted, as so to distribute the representation, that each separate parish shall have a separate representative.

As I have said before, the plan suggested by the majority of the Convention, is not deemed perfect. It may have, and doubtless has, its defects. But, let those who so vehemently opposed it, suggest a better one. If it be intended to take all for granted which is to be urged against this report, and by endeavoring to raise an excitement against a particular section of the State, to divide the country for the benefit of the city, I tell gentlemen to beware lest they overreach their mark. Their burning eloquence and loud denunciations may lead to a result which they will sincerely regret. The city of New Orleans may suffer the rebound, and it will then be seen who will gain the most—those that have sought to rend all in pieces, or those that desired to pursue a course of exact justice to every portion of the State.

We are here, said Mr. Downs, to deliberate with calmness; to asperse the motives of no one, and to avoid stirring up angry dissensions and contentious feelings. To consult and to deliberate, and where we can, to compromise. The report of the committee is before the Convention. Let them amend it, if it be faulty. But, as I do not think that any committee can be appointed to make a report that will be satisfactory to all parties upon this subject, I oppose the recommittal. I consider, moreover, that the motion to refer, and in some measure the remarks that have been made, upon the report, is an attempt to cast censure upon the committee—censure which is altogether undeserved and without the slightest foundation.

Mr. Benjamin said, that the present was not altogether a fitting occasion to enter into the merits of the report of the majority of the committee. I will take another opportunity to reply to the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) and will prove that the grounds he has assumed in defence of the section are unfounded. Some observations, however, have fallen from that gentleman that necessitate a reply. In the first place, he is under a misapprehension, if he thinks that in denouncing this report I had the slightest intention of impugning his motives, or those of the other members of the committee that concurred in it. I impugn no man's motives. I only complained that the operation of the section if it were adopted, would be unjust and unequal, and this I am ready to show. One of two things, either the report is conformable to justice, or it is not, If it be just in its disposition of the representation of the State, then it ought at once to be sanctioned. If it be unjust and partial, as I hold it to be, then it ought to be fully discussed, and its defects laid open to inspection. Discussion ought not surely to be considered as a criticism, or a censure of the motives of its authors. I disclaim any such design. I have not the slightest doubt that it appeared exceedingly just to the delegate (Mr. Downs) that the fourth district, in which he resides, should have one half of the representation to the legislature, for its proper share. I, however, entertain quite a different opinion.

Mr. Downs: I did not say that the fourth district should have one half of the representation, nor does the section provide such a representation.

Mr. Benjamin: The difference is but a small matter; it may vary my statement two or three votes, but to be precise, I will say one half of the representation within two or three votes!

I have been accused by the honorable delegate, (Mr. Downs) of being the mover of this committee, and therefore, he thinks, I should be precluded from objecting to the report upon any point. It is true that I moved for the formation of the committee, but I did not certainly constitute it. For it happens that as three-fifths of the committee are radicals, that part of the State which is deemed most radical, has received the lion's share. Perhaps, this remark may be construed into something personal! I am convinced that nothing can be done until some definite and equitable basis be adopted, and for that purpose I have proposed that the report be re-committed to another committee, which will better represent the various sections of the State, and which will propose a less exceptionable apportionment than the present one in its details.

We have been exhorted, said Mr. Benjamin, to give to this question our serious consideration. We are too much interested in it not to do so, without the necessity of an exhortation. A disposition has been exhibited to revive the old story about the influence of the city, and to get up a petty jealousy between the country and the city. The tocsin of alarm has been rung, and the order has gone forth that the voice of the city must be stifled. There are elements of discord enough without attempting to arouse local jealousies and sectional feelings. Certainly no desire is felt by the delegation from the city, to deprive any portion of the country of its just weight. The best policy for all to pursue is a just and equitable course, for no temporary advantage can be a permanent gain. As for political considerations, they may well be regarded as out of the question, for no man can tell what will be the political situation of parties two years hence; nay, not six months hence.

Some mysterious threats have been made by the gentleman from Ouachita. I am no delphic oracle to interpret the gentleman's meaning. Some allusions to blows to be struck. . . . . .

Mr. Downs: I do not mean a conflict of arms.

Mr. Benjamin: I understood the gentleman; he made mysterious threats of what might occur, if the report were referred to another committee. If the gentleman would explain the danger, I might, perhaps, to avoid some terrible and impending evil, consent to vote according to his wishes. But, we are not children to be frightened by any bugbear that his excited fancy may set before us. I know of no worse evil than the adoption of this report, and I shall vote to refer it.

Mr. Dunn hoped that this motion would not prevail. He trusted that the report would be taken up and concurred in. If there were errors in it, they were subject to correction. He thought that the basis was a just one, and peculiarly adapted to the local position of the State. With due deference, he trusted, that the house would take up the report and act upon it, section by section.

Mr. C. M. Conrad moved to strike out all of the section with the exception of the two first lines, announcing the principle that representation should be equal and uniform. He considered the balance of the section as in positive contradiction with the foregoing declaration.

Mr. Roselius said he would support the motion to refer the report to another committee. His colleague, (Mr. Benjamin,) who had made that motion, had supported it so forcibly as to make it necessary for him to say, on the present occasion, but little. The question would come up hereafter more properly for discussion. The present committee have fixed no basis—they have established no principle for the "equality and uniformity of representation;" and unless a basis be proposed, how can we proceed properly to the adoption of the section. The present question, we are told is an important question. It is not only important in reference to the subject to which it relates, but it is important in relation to the divergent opinions to which it has given rise. And hence it is desirable that something precise and definite should be presented for our action. Does the report of the committee place us in possession of any thing precise and definie? It is true that the principle of uniformity and equality are enunciated. But are these fundamental principles carried out? I say they are not carried out, but are violated in the details of the section. The apportionment made is arbitrarily without any basis, either of federal numbers of the electors or of the population, and to each and every parish is assigned one representative. Upon what principle of apportionment is this representation assigned? If a parish have but twenty voters it is still to have one representative, and an equal voice with one having five hundred or one thousand voters! Is this the principle of equality and uniformity?

There are, said Mr. Roselius, three modes of fixing the representation of the State. The first is the basis adopted in the existing Constitution—that of the qualified electors; the second is the basis of population, and the third is a mixed basis of property and population. The principal of either basis are fixed and immutable. Not subject to legislative control, nor to the passions and excitements of the moment. Choose which you please, establish a fixed and immutable principle, but do not involve yourselves by an arbitrary rule into a labarinth, from which there is no escape. Do not establish a rule that will fluctuate with the will of the legislature, and which will be subject to the interested action of political parties—to be modified and to be changed as may best suit the views of that party, which may happen temporarily to be in the ascendant, and which they may employ to perpetuate that ascendency.

But I may be told that the report establishes a basis in accordance with the constitution of the United States. Not to be mistaken, I will refer again to the report. It says:—"Representation shall be equal and uniform." That is very well, but it proceeds in direct contradiction, "each parish shall have at least one representative, and beyond that, if entitled to any more, in proportion to the population of each, ascertained and calculated according to the principle of representation fixed in the constitution of the United States. The first representation under this constitution shall continue [arbitrarily!] until after the next United States census, in 1850, and shall be as follows." Here follows the enumeration. Is it not clear that the federal principle of representation is only called into operation after the year 1850, and only when a parish shall be entitled by its population to more than one representative. But the principle of federal representation, partical and sectional, as it is in its operation towards a particular portion of the State, is silent in reference to the allotment of our representation. The small parishes in the northwest, that have been carved out with a rapidity and earnestness which surprised me, at the time, but which is now perfectly comprehensible, are to have one representative in any event, even although under this very federal basis, they would have no right to claim a representation distinct and separate. The federal principle is to operate only to their advantage. When they invoke it, it will be because they are entitled to more than one representative, but in the meanwhile they are to have the preponderance and are to wield and control the legislation of the State. I would ask, Mr. President, if such an arbitrary allotment of the political power of the State, is not a flagrant injustice, a wilful and positive wrong? Can it be said to be made upon any fixed basis? I repudiate the idea that there is any thing like a basis, or that is founded upon the principles of equality, "Representation shall be equal and uniform." Indeed! Is this equality and uniformity? That the political power should be wielded by a minority. For taking the federal basis which admits the enumeration of three-fifths of the slave population, a greater number of representatives are allowed to the minority than they are entitled to. I shall, on another occasion, refer to the injustice of taking the federal basis in this State, for the apportionment of representation.

In reference to certain expressions, that have fallen during this debate, I shall not say any thing. They were no doubt suggested during the heat of debate, and signify nothing. I impugn the motives of no member on this floor. I believe all are actua. ted by good motives, whatever diversity of opinion may exist. I do not consider a reference to motives a proper theme for animadversion. We have nothing to do with motives. The acts of the majority of the committee are before us in this report. Shall we sanction that report? I think it ought not to be sanctioned, because it makes an unequal and partial disposition of the subject. Hence it is I think it should be referred, and inasmuch as the able delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs,) and his intelligent colleagues upon the committee, have not been able to determine upon a just basis of equal apportionment, the necessity of re-committing the question, appears to me to be the more apparent.

Mr. Chinn said he would, if the motion to refer prevailed, move that the committee be instructed to report a basis in accordance with the federal basis.

Mr. Grymes said it was immaterial to him how the question at issue was reached. But if it is to be referred, it seemed to him but fair that the committee to be raised should be placed in possession of some instructions indicating the sense of the house. With that design, without trespassing too far upon the indulgence of the house, he would give his views upon the report as it stood.

And, in the first place, the majority of the committee, it appeared, had decided in favor of federal numbers, as the basis of representation. God forbid, said Mr, G., that, in the remarks which I shall make, I should wound the sensibilities of persons too ready to take offence, or give umbrage to those whose zeal prompts them overmuch to desire success to their own particular system.

Property, in my opinion, should be the basis of representation; but next to property I would take the qualified voters. If neither of these are to be the basis, then I am in favor of a basis founded on an enumeration of the free white population of the State. As to the federal basis adopted by the committee, I consider it arbitrary in its character, and calculated, if established, to keep up dissensions and excitement in our community. It is well known that the federal basis was a departure from principle, insisted on by the southern States as a guarantee, and consented to by the northern States, only as a compromise, without which the union of the States was impossible. Its design was to preserve the balance of power and protect the southern States from encroachments on the part of the northern States, to which the augmentation of population from local causes, would otherwise have given an ascendancy. That was the motive for establishing the federal basis.

But, can it be pretended that our local situation as the inhabitants of the State in relation to each other, makes it necessary that we should take such a basis? How can there be any difference requiring it, when all our population indifferently are the proprietors of slaves? The delegate from Ouachita may reply to this, that if we refuse this basis, then we repudiate one of our own vital and essential institutions. This response is not well founded; it is not analogous to the precise situation of things. In a State where all are submitted to the same laws, enjoy the same franchises, hold the same description of property, it is idle to adopt an arbitrary system of apportionment that is not only repugnant to our social position, but manifestly unjust. The federal basis, it must be conceded, is proper in reference to the Union, but what propriety, what necessity exists for the adoption of that basis in the State of Louisiana? I go further and assert, that so far from their being any propriety or necessity for its adoption, that its inscrutable tendency would be to expose that particular institution to the very risk—to guard against which it was insisted upon as essential in our federal compact, and so it was essential in our federal relations. But, that necessity certainly has no existence in our local relations; not the most remote.

What will be the operation of this basis? Assuming that the number of representatives be fixed at 72, and the number of senators at 32, the 4th district will be entitled to 29 members in the first body and 14 in the second—making a total of 43, which will be only nine less than a majority of the whole assembly. And yet, to this strange and monstrous proposition is given the attribute of "equality and uniformity." I, in vain, seek for the balance of political power in the State. It has no visible existence. In what particular can it then be said that this apportionment is conformable to the immutable principles of justice. No one, assuredly, will assume so difficult a a task as to reconcile it with justice; and yet the glaring inequalities will continue to increase and become more appalling with the progress of time.

The western portion of the State is the richest in agricultural resources; it is fast increasing in slave population; and, as a natural consequence, the great preponderance of that discription of persons will render its white population quite small. There is not a planter that removes there that does not carry with him from fifteen to twenty slaves—that may be taken as the relative proportion; and it may be assumed that the comparative increase of white and slave population is as 1 to 7. Whereas, in lower Louisiana, our slave population is decreasing visibly, especially in the city of New Orleans, where, in a population of one hundred and ten thousand whites, there are but eighteen thousand slaves, making its relative proportion, on the contrary, in the city, in the ratio of 6 whites to 1 slave. From the city of New Orleans to the town of Baton Rouge, the increase of the laboring white population is very great, and this accounts for the decrease in the number of slaves, which are removed to the western portion of the State, and elsewhere, where their labor is more productive. If, for example, you take one of the new parishes of the west, with an area of thirty to fifty miles square; and, to its white population add three-fifths of the slaves, it is certain that one of the river parishes, in lower Louisiana, with a population in the ratio of 2 slaves for 1 white, will have less show in political power than the parish in the west, that has a slave population in the ratio of 15 slaves to 1 white. Can a more arbitrary and unjust system be divised, and how can it be expected that the Convention can sanction such a plan to transfer the political power of the State into hands of a few persons, resident in a particular geographical portion of the State.

In furtherance of the design now openly manifested, a regular and systematic plan of operations has been carried on in this very region, which it is proposed to favor so especially. It is very certain, that if the power to create new parishes is still continued in the legislature, the carving out of territory for that purpose will be stimulated by the principle that each parish shall have one representative, and in this the west will continue to enjoy an exclusive monopoly. The reason is very simple. In the older portions of the State, the lands are not as productive, and the inhabitants of large parishes there, are not disposed to incur heavy expenses by dividing their territory. But, in the west, the lands being rich, the population can be split up into fractional communities, and can bear the burthens of the parochial systems when carried out, ad infinitum. Consequently, the superiority of population in the east will be overbalanced by the number of parishes in the west; and political power will reside in a corner of the State which has been split up in a hundred little parishes expressly to attain that preponderance.

The more I examine the subject, (continued Mr. Grymes,) the more am I convinced that the scheme is repugnant, not only to the interests of the city, but to all the other districts, and I may add, to the true interests of the whole State. In the third district, I find that only fifteen representatives and seven senators are allowed by this one-sided apportionment,—a disproportion of within one of one half between the third and fourth Congressional districts, the latter being allowed forty-three members to the legislature. So much for the disproportion between the third and fourth districts, without taking into consideration the difference between the fourth district and the remaining districts.

Independent of these considerations, (said Mr. Grymes,) how are we to ascertain, without statistical information, the population of the several districts, white and slave,—the amount of taxes paid,—the area of each parish, and the amount of its productive labor. The delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs,) although on another occasion he sustained a contrary doctrine, is in favor that property should be represented and taken into account upon the apportionment. But what kind of property would the gentleman have represented? Slaves, only! And why not other property? If slaves, as property, are to be represented, why not represent houses and lots, and all other property in the city and country? If the proprietor of a slave is to be invested with greater political power by reason of that possession, why should not the proprietor of a house, or the capitalist, partake in the extension of power through representation? Surely, all property should be treated alike, and no invidious distinctions made between one kind of property and another kind of property.

These views (said Mr. Grymes) influence me to indulge the hope, that if the report be recommitted, as suggested by the gentleman, (Mr. Benjamin) it will be with a view of reporting to the consideration of this House, some equitable plan of allotting the representation of the State by fixing some definite and immutable principle as the basis; and likewise, that the committee should place the House in possession of exact and precise data, without which, it is impossible for the House to arrive at any correct and equitable conclusion.

Whereupon, the Convention adjourned.

Saturday, February 1, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. Nicholson opened the proceedings by prayer.

Mr. Downs informed the Convention of the sudden indisposition of the President, by which he was unable to attend the deliberations of this body,

On motion of Mr. Scott of Baton Rouge, Mr. T. W. Chinn took the chair.

Order of the Day.—The Convention resumed the consideration of section sixth, article two, of the report of the majority of the committee on the legislative department, fixing the apportionment of representation.

Mr. Mayo said: the discussion yesterday, Mr. President, forcibly reminded me of a remark made pending the discussion of the adjournment at Jackson last August, during which an honorable member from Feliciana, (Judge Saunders,) stated that he would almost as soon commit his body to the coils of the anaconda as to submit the action of this Convention, to the influences to which its members would be exposed in New Orleans.

I now, sir, feel keenly the force of that remark. On yesterday when this question was presented, four distinguished members from New Orleans, addressed the Convention in support of a commitment of the section, relative to the apportionment of representation, now under consideration, to a committee of three members from each congressional district of the State, and the three last of those members asserted with all the force of their united eloquence, that near half the representation of the State, viz: twenty-nine members to the house of representatives and fourteen senators were, by the report, apportioned to the fourth congressional district; and these statements I find repeated in the Tropic, a city paper this morning, in which the statements appear to be re-asserted, on the very high authority from which they emanated in this hall yesterday, and will thus be promulgated to the country as facts, before the replies can be published in the official papers of the Convention, and are not likely to be fully explained to all the readers of the Tropic, as that paper may or may not publish the remarks that may be made in answer to those statements.

It is not my purpose, sir, to attack any member on this floor, nor to defend any one, but simply to state facts and leave their effect, for the determination of the Convention and of the country.

It was strongly intimated by the speeches yesterday to which I am now replying, that this very partial plan of apportionment,—this flagrant injustice as it was expressly denominated, arose as a consequence of the fact, that the member from Ouachita, which is within that district, was the chairman of that committee, and that from his great zeal for his constituents, a less proportion of representation had been provided for other parts of the State than for that district.

I, sir, was a member of that committee, and represented a portion of the third congressional district.

I confess, sir, that I was shocked and astounded when I heard the assertions of such gross injustice as would have been perpetrated by the committee, at least by that portion of it that concurred in the apportionment of senators and representatives, as reported, if the statements made yesterday were correct.

I, at first, sir, almost distrusted the correctness of the numerous data of apportionment, that I calculated and reviewed before that committee reported,—and sir, as a source of relief to myself having upon my desk the data upon which the apportionment reported was made, I immediately set myself to work, to determine the facts from the statistics in my possession, which I was ready to have presented yesterday, but was unable to get the floor previous to the adjournment. If injustice were done by any report of the committee in which I concurred, I, as a member of the committee, am amenable, together with any other member who concurred in the report, to that charge of injustice, which certainly would result from the statements which were made yesterday as facts. A charge of injustice, sir,—of the most flagrant injustice committed by the largest committee of this Convention, and composed of one member from each senatorial district! and that charge made and reiterated by four members from this city simultaneously, and accompanied at their close by loud and repeated calls of question, question, question, resounding through the hall, before members opposed to the commitment could have an opportunity of ascertaining the facts; I must be permitted to say carried with it, at least the appearance of concert and design. I do not say that such was the fact, or that any design existed to carry the measure by storm or by surprise, but that to me it was strongly indicated by the circumstances. I beg of members not to understand me as casting any reflection upon the motives of any one, for such is not my intention.

I heartily accord to every member upon this floor the utmost purity both of motives and intentions. I am dealing with facts only. The honorable member, (Mr. Boudousquié,) from St. Charles, I understood, to state, as a reason for the commitment of the section under discussion, that he should be glad to have this section reported on by a fair committee. I do not see that member in his seat to correct me, if I am in an error, which I regret. I can but think, sir, that this is strong language, especially when taken in connexion with that used by the members from New Orleans.

Now, sir, let us see how this question of fairness of the committee stands. By an examination of the statistics which I have in my possession, and which I have no doubt are correct, this fourth congressional district by favoring which such great injustice is said to have been done, was represented in that committee by but four members, which was less than one-fourth of the members of the committee. There are embraced in the district of seventeen parishes, which is more than one-third of the whole number of parishes in the State, and which together at the last presidential election gave eight thousand, six hundred and one votes, being more than one-third of the whole number of votes given at the last election for president, or ever given at any election in the State. I have not had time since yesterday to add together the whole number of white population of the State from the imperfect census of 1840, so as to determine whether it bears the same proportion to the representation, reported for the fourth district, that the proportion of voters bears to it, but from a hasty glance at the census, I am inclined to think that if the white population were made the basis, the result would not be varied materially. From a table which I have prepared since yesterday with considerable care, and which is as correct as any data I have been enabled to obtain has enabled me to make it, it appears that the first and second congressional districts embracing New Orleans and ten other parishes, gave at the last presidential election ten thousand, nine hundred and twenty-one votes. The vote of New Orleans having been greatly increased as appears to be acknowledged on all hands by fraudulent votes; and that twenty-eight representatives are, by the report, given to those two districts.

The first district gave as nearly as I can determine four thousand, two hundred and forty-one votes, and has ten representatives, provided by the report; and the second district gave six thousand, six hundred and eighty votes and has eighteen representatives. The third congressional district has seventeen parishes, gave seven thousand, three hundred and forty-three votes, and has twenty-one representatives. The fourth district, as already stated, has seventeen parishes, gave eight thousand, six hundred and one votes, and has 23 representatives, instead of twenty-nine, and ten senators only, instead of fourteen, as was asserted yesterday. I will now read the statement of facts which I have prepared, and from which I have drawn my conclusions, and if they are incorrect, I desire to be corrected, but I think I am sustained by all the statistics that exist upon the subject.

In connexion with this, as unfairness and injustice are also charged, or at least implied, from the statements made yesterday, in relation to that part of the report that relates to the senatorial districts, I will, for the information of the Convention in addition to the fact that no more than ten instead of fourteen senators are given to the fourth district, compare the number of votes given by each senatorial district provided for by the report at the last presidential election, and if the great inequality does exist, it will be apparent from the facts. If not, the reverse will appear from facts. It will be borne in mind that the vote in the city of New Orleans, as appears generally to be conceded, was greatly increased at the last election by fraudulent votes, and that at the presidential election in 1840 there were but a little upwards of three thousand votes in the city, at which time the vote of the city was greatly increased by fraudulent votes. Each senatorial district as reported by the committee, is to send four senators. The first senatorial district is composed of that portion of the parish of Orleans, which lies on the East side of the Mississippi river, and at the last election for president gave five thousand, six hundred and forty-eight votes, or very nearly that number.

The second senatorial district is composed of the parishes of Plaquemines, St. Bernard, the remainder of the parish of Orleans, parish of Jefferson, St. Charles and St. John the Baptist, which gave two thousand. five hundred and forty-six votes or nearly.

The third senatorial district is composed of the parishes of St. James, Ascension, Assumption, Lafourche Interior and Terrebonne and gave two thousand, six hundred and thirty-six votes.

The fourth senatorial district is composed of the parishes of Iberville, West Baton Rouge, East Baton Rouge, Point Coupeé and Avoyelles, and gave two thousand, four hundred and seventeen votes.

The fifth senatorial district is composed of the parishes of West Feliciana, East Feliciana, Washington, St. Tammany, St. Helena and Livingston, and gave two thousand, seven hundred and twenty-four votes.

The sixth senatorial district is composed of Concordia, Carroll, Madison, Ouachita, Union, Franklin, Tensas, Morehouse, Catahoula and Caldwell, and gave three thousand, three hundred and twenty-eight votes.

The seventh senatorial district is composed of the parishes of Rapides, Natchitoches, Caddo, Calcassieu, Claiborne, Sabine, Bossier and Desoto, and gave four thousand, one hundred and ninety-one votes.

The eighth senatorial district is composed of the parishes of St. Mary, St. Martin, St. Landry, Lafayette and Vermillion, and gave two thousand, eight hundred and sixty-eight votes. Now, sir, by comparing these districts with the votes at the election which has taken place since the report was made, and taking into consideration the fact that large fractions as well as small ones must always exist in apportioning representation, and that the population in the different portions of the State is constantly changing, increasing in some portions of the State, while it decreases in others, it appears to me that the committee have not only not done injustice, by the proposed apportionment of senators, but that on the contrary it is remarkable, that any combination of parishes has been found in solid form, that results in an apportionment as equal. The vote at the election for governor in 1842 was, I believe, that upon which this apportionment was based, and from which a greater equality will appear on comparing the votes, with the districts, than by taking the vote of 1844 as a basis.

While acting as a member of the committee that reported the section now under consideration, sir, I felt the responsibility that rested upon me as one of its members. I was, sir, then as now fully aware of the importance of the task that we had to perform any, labored incessantly, and with the utmost care, to obtain all the information within my reach, with a view to apportioning the representation upon a fair and just basis, fully appreciating the danger that would arise of a rejection of the Constitution, if the apportionment were unjust or unfair, and believe that the same feelings actuated, most if not all the members of that committee. If any provision will be more likely than another to endanger the approval by the people of the Constitution, if submitted to them for their approval or disapproval, I apprehend that it will be that relative to the apportionment. I am, I acknowledge, at this time favorably disposed to submitting the result of our deliberations to the people for their rejection or approval, though not pledged to do so, if I should on reflection, think such course improper. If any member will at any time point out a fairer and better mode of apportionment than that reported, I will cheerfully yield any preference I may have for any part of it. I did not, sir, in fact fully concur in either portion of the report. There was a great variety of opinions entertained by different members of the committee in relation to it, as appears from the fact, that four minority reports were presented by different members, in one of which I concurred, not because I supposed it perfect, but because I thought it the best that could be agreed upon by any considerable number of the members.

I disapproved of the section reported by the majority, particularly on the ground of forming senatorial districts to elect four senators in each by general ticket. I greatly prefer single districts. By two of the minority reports, it is provided that the apportionment shall be made by the legislature, that shall first convene under the new Constitution,

The section proposed by the honorable member from Assumption, (Mr. Taylor,) apportioning representatives, I thought at the time it was presented, was more perfect than any of the others. It is contained in a minority report presented by that member. If there really is injustice done by the report to any portion of the State, it can as well be pointed out and adjusted by the Convention as by another committee. I can see no good reason for such a reference now. I cannot think that a committee composed of three members from each congressional district will be likely to produce that result, unless it be produced by appoointing six members from the city of New Orleans, which the president might do, as New Orleans forms part of two congressional districts. Here Mr. Benjamin interrupted the speaker by stating that no delegates had been chosen to the Convention who resided in that portion of New Orleans, embraced in one of the congressional districts. Mr. Mayo proceeeced: I was not previously aware of the fact stated by the honorable member, and am glad to be corrected by him. It does not appear to me, sir, that the representation either to the house of representatives, or to the senate is likely to be apportioned by any committee that can be appointed, that will be more equal, uniform and just than has been provided by the reports already before the Convention; much less is such an object likely to be effected by a committee to be composed of three members from each of the four congressional districts. It may be best, and justice may require that the distribution and ratio be changed from the plan reported, in some particulars, by taking from some parishes and giving to others. Rapides and Natchitoches would appear to be entitled from the number of votes given at the last election, to another representative each; but this can certainly be as easily done without a reference to another committee as by such reference. As to giving a member to each of the new parishes, it appears to me that sound policy and justice demand it.

The fact that each parish is a distinct, political corporation, having separate and distinct interests, arising from the fact of its political existence, will create a necessity for separate representation from each, and though some two or three of the new parishes may not at this time be entitled by its numbers to a separate representation, yet their population is rapidly increasing.

and will soon entitle each to a separate representative.

I will conclude, sir, by expressing a hope that the Convention will proceed to the consideration of the report without distracting its proceedings by referring the section to any other committee.

Mr. Downs said he felt it to be his duty to make some remarks in reply to what had fallen from the gentleman who had so strenously opposed the report of the majority of the committee upon the subject of apportionment. He had been drawn suddenly into the discussion yesterday, by the peculiar mode of attack, with which the report had been assailed. He could not but express his astonishment at the extraordinary procedure of yesterday. It would appear that there was something more at work than the desire to guard mere peculiar local interests. As soon as the subject of apportionment was accidentally and unexpectedly called up yesterday, five of the ablest members of this body, one after the other, got up and poured a broadside into the report. One gentleman—there were so many that he did not recollect the particular one; and he would have to distinguish them by numbers, from no. 1 to no. 5—he believed this was no. 2, proposed that the report should at once indignantly be rejected—kicked out of the Convention, while another gentleman, no. 1, was for unceremoniously dismissing the original committee, by the appointment of another that will be in his conception more just and less partial in the discharge of the duty to be assigned it. It was very evident that if those gentlemen had their way, the report would have been sent to the bottom of the Mississippi. They would find, distinguished as they were, however, that it would be rather difficult to get rid of the report by the violence of their denunciations. It was very evident that their intentions were to attach a bad name to the report, and get rid of it in that way. They thought by raising the cry of mad dog, they would have a reasonable pretence for keeping up an incessant fire. Their strategy was ingenious, but not novel in legislation. They wished to divert attention from the city of New Orleans, and by enlisting a feeling of jealousy against the unfortunate fourth district, to divide the country, for the benefit of the city.

How, enquired one of the gentlemen, can justice be expected from a committee composed of a majority of radicals. I do not know what the gentleman meant by the term radical. There are a large majority of democrats on the committee, and this is one of the very few committees in the Convention, upon which there is not a majority of whigs. From the very necessity of the case it had to be so composed, being constituted in the main, of a delegate from each senatorial district, and it was impossible to appoint a majority of whigs, when the large proponderance of senatorial delegates were democrats—but as many whigs as could be appointed were placed upon the committee, and the worthy president of the Convention had in this, as in every other proceeding, exhibited the utmost impartiality. As for the charge of radicalism in the committee, so far from there being a majority of radicals, there are but few radicals upon that committee, and the chairman of the committee, myself, it is well known, is opposed to one of the chief features of radicalism, and in that I differ from many of my political friends—the election of judges by the people. To the majority of the members of the committee, this serious charge of radicalism will be something very novel. As an insinuation has been made about the particular complexion of the committee, I will here state, that out of nine standing committees of the Convention, there are only three upon which there is a majority of democrats, four of the committees contain a majority of whigs, and two upon which there is an equality of whigs and democrats. In looking over the names of the gentlemen that compose them, I find the name of but one member who is at the same time upon two of the most important committees of the Convention—the committee upon the executive department and the committee upon general provisions—Mr. Benjamin.

The intention of the opponents of the report is quite evident. They propose to refer it to another committee, one more impartial. How is that committee to be composed? Of delegates from the four congressional districts. Now, it so happens that the city of New Orleans forms a part, and a controlling part of two districts. The committee is to be constituted of three members from each district, making twelve members, and out of these twelve members the city may have six, or one half. It is not expected that any report will be made by the new committee which will be satisfactory. That is not the design. The object is to get rid of the first report. I strenuously object to this proceeding. If the section reported be imperfect, why not let it take the same course as the balance of the report of the committee. Propose a substitute for it, and take the sense of the house upon the substitute, or amend it so as to make it meet the sense of the house. Assuredly the committee never imagined that their report was perfect. They presented it as the most perfect they could suggest for the action of the house. Two points in it have been the particular objects of attack. The first, that the basis should be in accordance with federal numbers, and the second, that each parish should be entitled to at least one representative. I see nothing in these principles so obnoxious to good policy or sound reason. The report of the majority of the committee adopts the first as the basis of representation, and as for the second, we have a precedent in several States of the union, and in the senate of the United States, where the little State of Delaware has as much might as the great State of New York. Both the report of the minority and the majority agree upon the federal basis of representation. The principal difference in the reports is in this, that the minority recommend that the legislature be entrusted, as heretofore, with the duty of making the appointments. Experience has demonstrated that it would be unwise to leave it to the discretion of the legislature, and hence the majority of the committee recommend the opposite course.

It has been urged, that out of the $500,000, paid into the public treasury for taxes, the city of New Orleans contributes $200,000, and that consequently she is entitled to more weight. This statement is not altogether exact, as will be seen on reference to the treasurer's report. The city contributed, in the year 1842, but $76,780, and the difference between that period and 1844, in the collection of revenue, cannot be essential. In this amount I exclude the tax upon auctioneers and boarding houses, and upon hawkers and pedlers, which I consider in the gross, to be paid by the country. So much for that argument.

To hear the extravagant declamations of some gentlemen, it would be supposed that the fourth district was overflowing with slave population, and that every acre of land within it was susceptible of cultivation. It is true that there is an average proportion of good land, but there is a great deal that will never bear cultivation. There are pine barrens and swamps. And as to there being an excedant of slave population; the contrary is the fact. The third congressional district would enjoy the greatest advantage from the federal basis, if reference be had to the number of slaves.

The great sensitiveness of the delegation from New Orleans, is explained by the fact, that if they succeed in getting the Convention to adopt the white basis, the city will have the entire and full control of the legislation of the State. If the number of representatives be fixed at 79, the city of New Orleans alone will have the relative proportion of 32, besides the delegation from the adjoining parishes, which may be disposed from identity of interest and from association, to unite with her. Hence the bursts of eloquence that we have heard, and the withering denunciations of the report. It is very natural that the delegation from the city should seek to establish her supremacy; I do not complain of it. But certainly they ought not to expect the country to relinquish and abandon every thing. No member from the country has the slightest wish to interfere with the city, and to take from her any of the just weight, to which she is fairly entitled. In saying thus much, I express my own sentiments, and those of every member from the country, I feel well assured.

But why make the attempt to defeat a proposition which has been maturely considered, and which is presented, not as perfect, but as perfect as the labors of the majority of the committee could make it, by a violent and preconcerted mode of attack, and by getting up the cry of mad dog against it, so that it might be destroyed. I repeat, if there be defects, and that there are defects I will not permit myself to doubt, in the report, why not remove them. As for the principle of representation to each parish, I think it a just and equitable one, but in order to limit the principle, I would have no objection that the legislature be inhibited from creating any new parishes, unless they contained a certain number of inhabitants. The power of abolishing parishes, is clearly within the competency of the legislature, and they availed themselves of that power, by abolishing the parish of Warren; it might, therefore, very well be left to the discretion of the legislature, to abolish any parish where its population did not entitle it to representation.

If the white basis be adopted, it is very clear that a number of parishes, not in the fourth district of the State, will be deprived of representation. Some of these parishes are represented by gentlemen who oppose this report.

[Mr. Downs here read from the census the white and slave population of the parishes of St. Charles, St. John the Baptist, Rapides, the Parish of Orleans, &c., &c.]

The ascendency of the city of New Orleans would be tremendous. It would sweep all before it.

The question of apportionment was naturally an exciting one. It had occasioned a great deal of excitement in the former Convention that formed the present constitution; but the difficulty had arisen there, upon the complexion of the senate. It was declared that accommodation was impossible, and yet the matter was compromised. That is the only way in which it can be settled. Let us then approach with calmness, and use no other weapons but of persuasion and of sound argument.

Mr. Conrad, of New Orleans, said it was not his intention to participate in this debate, but inasmuch as the two gentlemen that last addressed the house, had replied to those of his colleagues, who were not now in their seats, called away by their engagements, or by indisposition, he would beg leave to make a few remarks on their behalf, and at the same time, would state his own particular views upon the subject.

The gentleman that just addressed the house, rose yesterday under some apparent excitement, and in his reply to one of my colleagues, he indulged in some personal asperity. He seemed to think that the fault found with the report, attached to the individual members that made it. This sensitiveness of the chairman of the committee, appeared unnecessary. Certainly not the remotest intention could have been entertained, to reflect, in the slightest manner, upon the motives of any member of that committee.

But the gentleman from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs,) seems to think that there was a preconcerted movement against his report, on the part of the city delegation. For myself, Mr. President, I can assert that I never heard the subject of apportionment mentioned, from the time I left Jackson, until yesterday, when the point was brought under consideration. The gentleman complains that the hue and cry has been raised of mad dog, against the report. That may very well be, as the report assuredly exhibits certain signs of hydrophobia.

The delegate from Catahoula (Mr. Mayo) whose calculations may be very exact, it seems to me has taken a singular mode of illustrating the equity of the apportionment in the report of the committee. He has based his calculation upon electors, whereas the report adopts white population, including three-fifths of slaves. If the basis were electors, then this calculation might apply, but how can it apply to a mixed basis of white population and slaves. If the gentlemen have adopted the federal basis, as their report would indicate, let them stick to it, and argue upon it, but not adopt the principle of federal numbers, and then attempt to sustain it by adducing the number of qualified electors in each district, and parish, to show that there is not a striking disparity in the apportionment they have made.

There are in my opinion two radical defects in the report. The first is, that although the true principle is announced, "that representation shall be free and equal," it contradicts and nullifies that principle by declaring that each parish, no matter what may be its population, shall have one representative. The next objectionable feature is the representation accorded to slaves as a particular kind of property. How should the legislature be constituted? By the representatives of the people—not the representatives of slave property. This is so clear as scarcely to need one word of elucidation. The reason why slaves are admitted into the federal basis are peculiar, and have reference to a state of things that are not analogous to the local position of the State. But why, if you admit slave property to representation, do you refuse to admit other preperty? Slaves in Louisiana are no more than property. And yet a distinction is established between slaves and other property, and slaves are admitted to a representation by the report? The argument based upon the necessity, under which the federal Constitution was framed, has as I have before said, no weight in the present case. The federal Constitution was a part of independent sovereignties, without which no union could have been formed, and which could not have been established at all without that compromise. But, as my colleague, (Mr. Grymes) has justly observed, it was a departure from principle, redered indispenble by the existing institutions of one half of the confederated States, and therefore perfectly justifiable and perfectly expedient.

I certainly do not object to any basis of representation that will operate equally. But the proposition in the report is unequal and partial. It is not equal and uniform, and hence I object to it. If property be adopted as the basis, let all kinds of property enter into that basis; and not a certain kind of property which predominates in a certain portion of the State. But in the fact that there are more slaves in one quarter of the State than there are in the others, do we discover the real reason why slave property is so singularly favored. Its chief recommendation lies in that; and hence it has been selected; for, by no conceivable basis could the fourth district aspire to the ascendancy in political power.

How would it be found if any member were to get up and propose that the sugar planter should have two votes, while the cotton planter be restricted to one, or the reverse? Its injustice would be apparent; and yet a cotton planter in Ouachita or Natchitoches is not only to be represented himself, but three-fifths of his slaves are to be taken into the basis of representation, and he is to have as many additional votes in that ratio, as he has slaves. It is true, that he has but a single vote, but that one vote may be equivalent to the votes of ten, twenty or thirty white men. And why, since you adopt the principle, do you estimate but three-fifths of the slaves property; why do you not say two-fifths or one-half, or the whole number. If the principle be consonant with equality and uniformity, why not carry it out? It is simply because it is an arbitrary principle, and is revolting to a sense of justice.

If the apportionment, giving to each parish, however small, one representative, was temporary, we might submit to it. But such is not the case. The apportionment, in that respect is irrevocable. It must have, at least, one representative, and as many (heaven save the mark!) as it may, hereafter, be entitled to. It is to keep one until it gets more, which is giving it one in perpetuity.

The evil, however, great as it is, does not stop here. The apportionment applies to every new parish that may be created: by the fact of its creation it is to have one representative; thus affording to political parties the means of perpetuating their power, and of carrying into effect any favorite measure they may desire. It has become the practice of the monarchical governments of England and France to recruit their strength in their higher legislative assemblies by the appointment of a batch of new peers. The result of this one representative parish system will be attended by something like the same consequences. Whenever a party needs assistance in the popular branch, they will have nothing to do but to create a batch of new parishes.

The right of representation is a sacred right. It is not to be denied where it is due, nor accorded where it is not due. It is the property of the citizen, and it is in vain to extend suffrage with one hand, if you destroy the value of the gift with the other. My opinions in relation to this particular point are well known. I have fully and freely expressed them; and had my views prevailed, I would have required some guarantee of fidelity and attachment in every case for the exercise of the privilege of suffrage. But this has not been done; and it comes with a peculiar bad grace—with a great deal of inconsistency from those who have declaimed so much in favor of the inestimable right of suffrage, and that it should be extended to every free white male, without any restriction whatever—to propose a basis that admits three-fifths of the slave population to be proportionately equivalent to the white population; and by so much reduces the political power of the individual electors between themselves.

If reference be had to the law under which we have assembled, it will be seen that one of the objects designed was the establishment of a more equal and just system of representation—for certainly the disparity in representation was most striking. This feature of inequality is most visible in the Senate—the parish and city of New Orleans having but one Senator, while the parish of Pointe Coupée has one. It would seem by the report this inequality, with ten-fold force, is to be transferred to the popular branch, and the majority are to be transferred, bound hand and foot, and delivered over to the tender mercies of the minority—the great proprietors of slaves in the north-west corner of the State—who may continue at will the multiplication of new parishes as exigencies may require. They will enjoy, as heretofore, a monopoly of this business, inasmuch as the southern and older portions of the State have divided their territory as far as has been deemed expedient or useful.

It is useless, if not worse, to attempt to arraign sectional or local feelings against the city of New Orleans. The city of New Orleans is not the only portion of the State that will be affected, although, it is true, she will be affected, in the extent of her population and of her electors, to a greater degree. But, it is said that the growth of the city, and the increase of her population, are dangerous to the country; that she will monopolize the political power of the State. That consideration might properly have been urged, and was urged by me, against an improper, and, as I conceived, without restrictions, a dangerous extension of suffrage. Suffrage has been extended, and if the apprehensions of the gentlemen, now, for the first time, avowed, are to be realized, we must seek to avert it without sacrifice of principle. I do not desire to see the city of New Orleans possess an undue influence, and if suffrage were confined to those only who really were interested in her prosperity, and in the stability of the institutions of the State, there would exist no reasonable cause of alarm that she would acquire that preponderance; and, even if she acquired it, in the course of usual events, there would be a positive guarantee that she would not abuse it. But, as I said before, and which I again repeat, cities are not the safest depositories of political power. I would not place the country at the footstool of the city, nor would it be good policy to deprive the city of all influence, and place her in the attitude of an humble and servile dependant of the country. The balance of power should be carefully adjusted and the rights of both town and country amply protected.

If gentlemen really feel the apprehensions they now express, of danger from the great number of voters in the city, let them retrace their steps, and fix the basis of suffrage so as to decrease the number of electors, without affecting the rights of any who are justly entitled to a vote, and who may be allowed the exercise of that privilege, consistent with the safety of the State. This will be an effectual check against the anticipated danger, and then there will exist no pretext to infringe that golden rule of republican governments—that "representation shall be equal and uniform." No principle will be violated; for the State has an undoubted right to fence in and protect her institutions, and to perpetuate her liberties by a wise and salutary policy in reference to suffrage.

Mr. Dunn said that he had considered with a great deal of attention this question of representation. It was a subject of vital importance. His opinion of the report of the majority of the committee had not been shaken by any thing that had fallen from the several gentlemen that had assailed that report with so much power and vehemence. The design of choosing the white population as the basis of representation for the State of Louisiana was fraught with mischievous consequences; nay, it involved the existence of the agricultural interests of the State. That basis was no doubt a proper one in a community whose institutions were dissimilar in most respects from those of Louisiana; but here imperious necessity demanded that the species of property from which the greatest amount of revenue was derived, and which was the source of our agricultural wealth, should enter and be considered a part of the basis of representation. By reason of the existence of that very species of property, and of the chief products of the State, the white population of the country was comparatively smaller than the same population in the city; but the population of the country was a permanent population, and essentially attached to the soil, and to the institutions of the State. By far the greatest interest in the State—the interest upon which the safety and perpetuity of these institutions mainly depended—was the agricultural interest; and the question presented itself, shall that interest be sacrificed; shall the country be sacrificed, in order that the city may control and direct the destinies of the State? Such an event as that would be most lamentable; and, if it be politic to avoid it, we must choose that basis which will give to the country her just and necessary preponderance.

As for any system of perfect equality in representation, adapted to our peculiar condition, it is out of the question. We have a great and growing city, entirely disproportionate to the balance of the State; a city which is not only the recipient of the products of the State, but which is the recipient of the products of an empire of States. A city which is filling up with all kinds of population, and which is exposed to the outbreaks and commotions of the varied elements of which it is composed. Will any one say that the country would be justified in relinquishing the power which she has wielded, but never abused, for the purpose of transferring it to the city? Without disparagement to the patiotism and virtue that exist in New Orleans—which is without doubt as great as any other city—would it be safely placed? I think not, and the honorable gentleman himself (Mr. Conrad) has on more than one occasion, testified to the danger of making New Orleans the arbitress of the State.

The country is free from those passions, those sudden excitements which pervert and carry men's minds to fearful extremeties, and therefore is a shield to our institutions to guard them from sudden assaults, and preserve them from the insidious machinations of enemies from within or without. It is, therefore, the part of wisdom not to diminish her just weight, but on the contrary to place it on a solid and permanent basis.

Every consideration of sound policy dictates that the country should maintain her ascendency. She has the power and will retain it.

On motion, the Convention adjourned.

Monday, February 3, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

And on motion of Mr. Scott of Baton

Rouge, Mr. T. W. Chinn was continued as president during the indisposition of Mr. Walker.

Mr. Brent offered a resolution that the Convention meet every evening at 7 o'clock, p. m., and called for the yeas and nays. Yeas 32, nays 27; so the resolution was adopted.

Mr. Read offered a resolution that an additional reporter in English, be appointed.

Mr. Beatty objected to the resolution. The gentleman that had been elected reporter ought to be able to discharge the duties of that office, and would be able if he were not at the same time the reporter of the senate. He was opposed to all sinecures.

Mr. Downs was convinced of the necessity of an additional reporter. It was impossible for any one man to get through, unaided, and make the report from day to day. As for the present reporter being the reporter of the senate, he would state that his occupations in that body did not interfere at all, he conceived, with his duties to this. Either, said Mr. Downs, we should have published regularly the debates, or abandon their publication altogether.

Mr. C. M. Conrad thought it better to renounce the publication of the reports, than to incur any additional expense. He saw no necessity for their publication in such hot haste. The paper upon which they were published were destined to be destroyed by worms and mice. He did not expect, nor did he wish to inflict any thing he might say in this Convention, upon posterity.

Mr. Saunders thought that inasmuch as the publication of the debates had been determined upon, they should be made properly, and that no more duty should be expected from an officer of this body, than that officer was capable of performing.

Mr. Beatty would move an amendment to the resolution, that a reporter be appointed for the French. He was opposed to the resolution, but if it were to pass, let there be no distinction.

Mr. Downs thought it unnecessary to have an additional reporter in French; for the reporters in English could assist the reporter in French.

Mr. Claiborne saw no necessity for accelerating the publication of the full reports. An abstract was given in the papers every morning, and the official reports appeared some days after. He would move to lay the resolution and the amendment on the table.

The question was put on Mr. Claiborne's motion, and it was lost—30 yeas, 32 nays.

Mr. Kenner said he believed that the publication of these reports were the cause of the long speeches that were made. Ever since the meeting of the Convention, we have had the game of nine-pins, that is, one gentleman gets up and imagines points of disagreement, and then knocks them down to show his skill. Another gentleman follows, and so the game is kept up from day to day.

He would therefore move to abolish the office of reporters to the Convention.

Mr. Kenner withdrew his motion, in order to take the question upon the appointment of additional reporters. After that he would renew his motion.

The question was taken on Mr. Beatty's amendment, and it was lost—yeas 25, nays 41.

The question then recurred on the appointment of an additional English reporter —yeas 31, nays 36.

Mr. Kenner then renewed his motion to abolish the office of reporters.

Mr. Covillion moved that said motion be laid indefinitely on the table—yeas 40, nays 22.

Order of the day.—Section 6, article second; Apportionment.

Mr. Beatty said that the question of apportionment had always been, and always would be, a question of great gravity in a representative government. It is one of those questions that must be met boldly, and when settled, it must be settled immutably, beyond the control of legislative power. The experience of the past had demonstrated the impolicy of assigning to the legislature the duty of making the apportionment, even if the basis were fixed. The same causes that made the requisition to that effect in the old constitution inoperative, would make a similar requisition inoperative in the new constitution. It is notorious that for a series of years, there has been a constant murmur against the present defective and unequal apportionment of representation, and that it has been continued despite of public opinion.

The plan of representation that he was about to submit, was based upon federal numbers. He considered that the safest basis of apportionment for the State. It was true that the city of New Orleans would possess less influence under it than she would by an apportionment according to either numbers or voters, but this he acknowledged was to him a recommendation. In all ages and in all countries the influence of large cities, whenever exercised, has been detrimental to the States in which they were situated. Paris has controlled, and still controls the destinies of France. It was there that the memorable revolution that drenched her streets in blood began, and it was amid her motley and excitable population that the horrors of that revolution were perpetrated. It was there, that one of the best and noblest causes in which mankind were ever engaged, was sullied by crime. It was there that revolution was succeeded by revolution, party by party, until Napoleon placed the imperial crown upon his head. So too, do we find that Rome controlled the vast extent of territory which she aspired to govern. The passions of that haughty city ruled the balance of the republic. The slightest convulsion within her walls was felt in the remotest provinces, until by her overgrown and pampered weight, she fell to the lowest scale of degradation and impotence. Had the power of the republic been diffused in place of being concentrated in the city of Rome, the republic would have possessed some recuperative energy to have withstood the shock of the barbarous hordes, and would not have been a constant prey to intestinal commotion.

Let us profit by the experience of the past. Let us place the country beyond the corroding influence of the city. The republics of ancient Greece were controlled by their cities, and they fell a prey to luxury and licentiousness. Let us pursue any system that will diffuse power over the territorial limits of the State, and that will not concentrate it in any one part, especially in a large city. Let us avoid placing power in the hands of a few. It is dangerous to republican liberty.

Taking the free white population as a basis, said Mr. Beatty, New Orleans would have at present, more than one-third of the representation of the State, and should the increase of that class of population in the city, for the future, be in the same ratio as the past, in a few years the city would have one half. The federal, he conceived to be the correct basis under these circumstances. Slaves were not merely property; they were a portion of the population, of the labor of the State; and labor, he deemed, the exclusive source of wealth. If, said he, we adopt the free white male population as a basis, taking into consideration the fact that the slave population of New Orleans is fast diminishing, it is not beyond the range of possibility that New Orleans may in a few years, without detriment to her own interest, propose and carry the abolition of slavery. In his proposition he had taken the whole population of the State. The whites he had estimated by the census of 1840; the blacks by the assessment roll of 1843; he then took the smallest parish in the State, (in point of population) as a basis for the distribution of representatives, and dividing the whole population by double the number in that parish would give eighty-six representatives, instead of the present number seventy-two; and he would if his proposition were favorably received, hereafter suggest a provision that the legislature should have no power to create a parish unless its population equalled the number he had used as a division. His proposition would give to New Orleans about one-third of the representation. There were a few parishes that he was not positive had the required population, to which he had apportioned a member each; but he had been told that the increase of population in those parishes since the census of 1840 was sufficient to justify him in so doing.

The more I reflect upon the subject, said Mr. Beatty, the more am I convinced that the federal basis is the true one for the general interests of the whole State. The following are the details, according to that basis of my proposition, which I shall propose, as a substitute for the report of the majority of the committee.

"Representation shall be equal and uniform in this State, each parish shall be entitled to representation in proportion to her population ascertained and calculated according to the principle of representation adopted in the constitution of the United States.

At the first regular session of the legislature after the reception of the United States census for 1850, and every ten years thereafter, the legislature shall choose some number as a representative number.

The number so chosen shall be taken as a divisor, and each parish shall be entitled to one representative for every time this divisor shall be found in the dividend formed of its representative population, and to one additional member for every fraction exceeding the one-half of the divisor.

The house of representatives shall never be composed of less than seventy nor more than one hundred members.

The first representation under this constitution, (ascertained as near as may be in accordance with the above principle) shall continue until after the next United States census, and shall be as follows:

Plaquemine 1, St. Bernard 1, Orleans first municipality 9, second 7, third 6, right bank 1, Jefferson 2, St. Charles 1, St. John Baptist 1, St. James 2, Ascension 2, Assumption 2, Lafourche Interior 2, Terrebonne 1, Iberville 2, West Baton Rouge 1, East Baton Rouge 2, West Feliciana 2, East Feliciana 2, St. Helena 1, Livingston 1, Washington 1, St. Tammany 1, Pointe Coupée 1, Concordia 1, Tensas 1, Madison 1, Carroll 1, Franklin 1, St. Mary 2, St. Martin 2, Vermillion 1, Lafayette 2, St. Landry 3, Calcassieu 1, Avoyelles 2, Rapides 3, Natchitoches 3, Sabine 1, Caddo 1, De Soto 1, Ouachita 1, Morehouse 1, Union 1, Caldwell 1, Catahoula 1, Claiborne and Bossier 1.

On the motion to refer the report of the legislative committee,

Mr. PRESTON said, that he regarded the question as the most important that could come before the Convention, and at the risk of being charged by the honorable delegate from Ascension, with playing at ten pins, by assuming objections and making long arguments to combat them for the reports of our debates, he would occupy some of the time of the Convention on this subject. The reports of speeches would show he had not played a great deal at the game, or been very successful. He made a speech at Jackson, of some length, against the adjournment, which by the way was not reported at all. If his friends and himself had knocked down the pins on that occasion, the State would have been greatly the winner.

I shall oppose the reference of the report; because on this subject as on every other, it would be better to take the old Constitution, establish such changes of principle as are demanded by experience and the will of the people, and leave all the details of carrying them into execution to the legislature, which details if properly and permanently established now, might be most inexpedient or unjust hereafter.

From close observation, I think three principal objects lead to the call of this Convention.

1. The extension of the right of suffrage to all free males of the age of majority.

2. The equalization of representation in the senate, according to the principle of the Constitution, as to the house of representatives.

And 3d. To reform our utterly inefficient and overwhelmingly expensive judiciary.

The question of suffrage has been fully discussed and substantially decided, and although not as liberally as I could have wished, yet it has been placed upon a more liberal footing than existed before.

The equalization of representation is now under consideration, and when disposed of, I shall consider two-thirds of the labor of the Convention terminated, for when the principles of these great subjects are settled, I hope we shall enter into no details, and if we do, I care but little who commits them to writing.

The existing Constitution announces the rule that representation shall be equal and uniform throughout the State, and shall be forever regulated by the number of qualified electors, and to carry the principle into effect, provided that a quadrennial census should be made, and the representation apportioned by the rule. To carry it into effect the old Constitution relied upon the guarantee of the oaths of the members of the general assembly to support the Constitution. Yet the provision of the Constitution was not always carried into effect. Therefore, if the principle contained in it, is the only true republican rule that can be adopted, it ought to be maintained and a new and stronger guarantee established to ensure its execution. That guarantee is easily devised by providing that the first quadrennial act of the general assembly shall be to make the apportionment, and that no act shall have the force of law until it is made. It will be asked, would you stop the operations of the government? There is no danger. No member of the general assembly would dare to stop the operations of the government by the violation of his oath, to support the Constitution. He would know and feel that such a course would cut short his political existence; and the love of life would ensure his fidelity to his sworn duty.

Should we then re-adopt the principle of the existing Constitution, enforce it in the house, and extend it to the senate? I shall maintain the affirmative, for I consider it the very essence of popular and representative government. It is as essential to popular government, as the golden rule of morality—"Do unto others as you would have others do unto you," is essential to christianity.

There are some members of this Convention who have been denominated, not by themselves, but by others, radicals. I know not what meaning those who thus christen us, attach to the term radicalism. But if it be applied to my principles in relation to the government of this State, then imitating the distinguished delegate from Opelousas, who the other day defined his principles as a conservative, with so much precision and accuracy, I will now define my radicalism. I hold that all power resides in the people, and prefer to all others a popular government. That necessarily implies that the people have the right to govern, and are capable of self-government: and for one I place entire and the most implicit confidence in the honesty, and also the wisdom of their government.

By the people, I mean the free white males above the age of majority. This excludes slaves, because from necessity as well as choice, we all regard slaves as property alone, and have never enumerated them as political persons. Policy also compels us to exclude free colored persons from the exercise of political rights, and indeed may compel us to exclude them from the limits of the State. It is only cavilling to embarrass the subject with minors who are under the control of their parents or guardians, and represented by them; who are incapacitated by nature to govern themselves, and whom, we have already determined in fixing the right of suffrage, are incapable of governing the State. So also women have not and ought not to have any direct power in any other government than a gynarchy. In a popular government they are properly represented by their natural or selected protectors. Their appropriate sphere is the government of the fireside. The family circle is the kingdom in which they should preside, that there frugality should prevail, and no defalcations occur; that their daughters should be the most economically, neat, plain, modest and interesting; their sons intelligent, industrious, generous and noble; there to rear virtuous citizens for the future government and defence of the country, and pure and spotless wives for their aid and comfort in domestic life; that there should be no absconding of husbands, because his house was rendered his heaven by his presiding angel and the cherubs that dwell therein.

Having thus ascertained who are the citizens of the State entitled to govern it, capable of self-government, and in whom we must and do confide the government, it necessarily results that if they could assemble together to exercise the powers of government, each citizen would have one voice on all subjects and questions and the majority would govern in every thing. But it is impossible for the whole to assemble and act in convention, and therefore they must from necessity act by agents. In the Constitution of our government, the legislature represents the will of the people, the executive their power, and the judiciary their reason or justice. The executive officers, the members of the legislature and judges of our courts, are therefore the mere agents and servants of the people. And it is the right, the duty, and for the interest of the people to appoint these agents personally, if possible, and if that cannot be done by the means that may be most convenient to the whole people.

The executive represents the whole State, and each citizen has one vote in his election. But as the general assembly consists of many members, each citizen must have a vote, and the same number of citizens must appoint the same number of representatives. If a smaller number of electors may appoint a greater number of representatives the necessary consequence is that the minority may govern the majority, which is impossible in a popular government, because repugnant to its vital principle.

Representation, therefore, both in the senate and house of representatives, must be equal and uniform, and be forever regulated by the number of qualified electors in a district or parish to be represented. Any departure from this rule is a violation of the vital principle of popular government which may be attended with no great injury in the particular case, but leads to a disregard of principle in every other case, and a struggle for power to gain advantages by legislative means, and not by greater exertion, under an equal constitution and just legislation.

It has been urged that taxation should have weight in regulating representation. If the parish which pays the greatest tax should have the most representatives then the individual who pays the highest tax should have the most votes; and he who pays none, or the parish which contributed nothing to the State revenue, the one should have no vote and the other no representative. Taxation is laid to a great extent on property and profitable professions; at the same time the revenue is principally expended in legislation in the support of public officers and tribunals for the protection of property and profits, and it is but reasonable that enjoying all the advantages of taxation, these should bear its burdens. It would farther be impossible to ascertain who actually paid the taxes. It is certainly not those who pay the money into the hands of the collector, or treasurer, and take his receipt, who support all the burdens of government. The merchant collects and pays for the lumber makers, the ship carpenter, blacksmiths and other mechanics and laborers in ship building, for the master, officers and crew, and deducts it out of their wages and profits. So the planter pays for all the mechanics and producers of necessaries for his plantation; the landlord pays the tax collector, but adds the tax to the rent of the tenants. Capital affords the means and facilities of paying taxes; but labor is the real tax payer, and by this system would not be represented at all.

I contend further, that property affords no criterion of representation. One object of government is to protect property, and it contributes to the support of government; but society is no doubt proportionably burdened for its protection. Beside life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, are blessings more invaluable than property, and equally require the protection of laws and representation in the legislature. To prove it, I have no doubt that Crœsus stretched on the bed of sickness, with the certainty of dissolution, would exhaust all his wealth for the protraction of his life. And although property contributes to the support of government, the citizen contributes more in proportion by personal services, although but little of the expenses of government are incurred for his personal security. He is ever ready to defend the State from invasion or insurrection with his life. He serves in the militia six days in the year, works on the roads, and forms the patrols. In conflagrations, to whom do you look for the preservation of your property. I have seen this splendid hotel on fire, and the more splendid St. Charles, and men, without a dollar, in the midst of the fire and smoke, and ashes and wrecks, struggling at the risk of their lives to save them, while the owner stood aloof from the danger.

We have heard much in the progress of this discussion, of the tendency of an unrestrained popular government to anarchy. And there can be no doubt that this, like every form of government has its evils. This is but saying that every thing human is imperfect. But I contend, that the more popular the government is, the more secure and perfect it is.

The revolutions, that the horrors of which, have been depicted, to shew the inclination of the people and the tendency of their government to anarchy and bloodshed, in my opinion, have rather proved: "that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms of Government to which they are accustomed." The happiness of man consists principally in the enjoyment of power, wealth and knowledge. Popular governments diffuse these among the many; other governments concentrate their enjoyment in the few. If I understand the French Revolution, by an artificial system, slowly, gradually and firmly built up—all the power, wealth and knowledge of the kingdom had been accumulated in the king, nobles, military and priesthood; most of the property of the kingdom was in their hands, and exempted from taxation—that the Government presented one vast spectacle of extravagance, profligacy, pollution and corruption, the burdens of which, were imposed upon labor alone. The oppression and sufferings of the peasantry became absolutely insupportable, when they rose in the might of man and washed the kingdom, in blood, to be sure, because surrounding tyrants, and sympathizing despots forced them to do it. But, they regenerated France, because it was necessary she should be born again. And what is France now? At her head, the only patriot King in Europe—wisdom in council, and energy in war, and economy in government. Wisdom and knowledge diffused, and power not felt, and millions of families as happy and secure as humanity will permit.

The decapitation of Charles the First, was the death of the most corrupt and tyrannical government in Europe, and which had become absolutely insupportable to the people—and the restoration of Charles the Second, was the restoration of civil liberty; and in some degree of popular government. His Charter to Rhode Island, Republicans of the present day have clung to with tenacity, and condemned to perpetual imprisonment a martyr of liberty, substantially for resisting it. An eminent cotemporary historian, has declared, that under its regime, "no where in the world has life, liberty and property, been safer than in Rhode Island."

And what is the situation of England at present? By an artificial system of government and legislation well digested and long and gradually imposed on the people by laws of primogeniture, pensions and sinecures, stars and garters, innumerable civil officers, vast armies and navies, a government is firmly fixed on that devoted people, which condemns nineteen million out of twenty millions to toil from day light until dark, for a bare subsistence of their miserable families amidst squallid wretchedness. The whole landed property of the kingdom, by giving the government to the landed interest alone, is in the hands of the million; and the whole production of the tenantry, except barely enough for their subsistence, is extracted, to support the profligacy of this aristocracy. But this was insufficient, and they have, by legislation, created a debt of the Government of four thousand millions of dollars, from the the Government to the same aristocracy the interest of which, is to be paid by the labor of the poor, and toil of the peasantry, to the same bloated aristocracy, to support their extravagance and debauchery. But for the vast armies and navies, which the same toil and labor is made by government to support, the people of England would rise from their degradation and sweep their oppressors into non-existence, and men would rule instead of property, and its pampered possessors obtained apparently by law, but in reality, by legal robbery.

Let us then conclude that riches are power, have intrinsic value, and afford in themselves advantages, and happiness enough, without giving them constitutional and political power, and that they will always be sufficiently sought and acquired without fictitious aid from legislation.

It is more seriously pressed that the federal basis of representation shall be adopted, that is, that three-fifths of the slaves should be enumerated in calculating the representation.

The first objection is, that it is an arbitrary rule; there is no more reason for enumerating three-fifths than one-fifth of the slaves, or the whole. It is an arbitrary departure from principle, justifies other departures and leads to the overthrow of representative government.

It is a basis which was adopted by independent States, of heterogeneous populations, interests and institutions, about to form a more perfect union principally for external defence and intercourse, objects that would affect each State very much, in proportion to their population and production, and, therefore, the territory and labor of each might well enter into the calculation of the representation of the whole.

It was, besides, a mere compromise without which, the union of these independent States for the greater good and security of the whole, it is admitted, could not have been effected. It was necessary to quiet the whole, and in fact operates as equally on the whole as any rule that could have been adopted. To regulate the representation in Congress by the number of electors in each State, could not have been adopted with any thing like equality, because the qualification of electors depended on the will and legislation of each State, some requiring high qualifications and others admitting universal suffrage.

But this federal basis can have no application here, where no union is to be formed nor compromise to be made. It has no necessary connexion with the representation in the legislature of one independent State, having a homogeneous population throughout its limits, common interests and the same institutions. As applied to this single State, it is an unequal basis, because it could and would necessarily lead to this anti-republican consequence, that the minority of electors would govern the majority. Indeed, that is the avowed object of its supporters. The gentleman from East Feliciana said, we have the power in the country and we will retain it. That puts an end to all argument on the subject and reduces the question to submission or revolution.

It is unreasonable to give one portion of the citizens a greater weight in the Legislative branch of the Government than another portion, although equal in numbers.—For example, to give a parish having three hundred electors a representative in the Legislature, and another parish having only three hundred electors two representatives, because they own five hundred slaves. Or to simplify the matter more, to give you double the weight in the Legislature which I possess, because you own, we will say for round numbers, two slaves, especially if they be so old or so young as to be valueless; although I may own houses and lots, lands and stores, and ships, and boats, and mills and manufactories. It is unreasonable, because the two men are equal and the two portions of men are equal. And the man aside, I can never agree that two slaves shall have more weight in the political government of the State, than I possess.

To admit the federal basis would as necessarily make the free parishes and free men without slaves, abolitionists, as it tends to make the Northern States abolitionists with far less reason. And you could not keep even the slaves from a knowledge growing at every election that two of them had more weight in the government than a free man, which would soon destroy the institution of slavery to the infinite injury of the agriculture, the wealth, and I will say, happiness too of our State. But let every slave know that he is what he is, and must necessarily be in this state, property, and let every free man know, that he has a voice and weight in the government, and that the slave has none, and you will raise a Chinese wall between abolitionism and slavery, that will secure forever this invaluable institution of our State.

These evil consequences of the federal basis would be greatly promoted by admitting the free colored population to participate in influence in the government instead of entirely excluding them as the existing Constitution does.

A leading object of the proposal is to give the agricultural portion of the State an influence in the government to which their numbers do not entitle them. This would be unjust, if it could be accomplished, and would produce no good but much evil, if accomplished. The harmonious and equal union of the agricultural, commercial and manufacturing interests of the State, and of every other species of industry, useful to morals or physical happiness, promotes the prosperity of all; whilst if antagonistical feeling and struggles could be got up, each would strive to destroy the success of the other, to the great detriment of all.

The great and avowed object of changing our ancient Constitution as to the basis of representation, and of departing from all principle, is arbitrarily to deprive the cities of New Orleans and Lafayette of the weight and representation in the General Assembly, to which the number of their electors justly entitle them.

If we depart from the Democratic rule of the old Constitution to take taxation as the basis of representation, these cities pay half the taxes of the State. The Treasurer's report shew that by adding to the taxes on houses, lots and slaves in these cities, the taxes upon professions, taxes upon the fees of public officers, on auctions, on banks and insurance offices, on pedlars and hawkers, succession devolving to non-residents, &c. &c., these cities pay more than half the taxes of the State. And the observations of the gentleman from Ouachita, that the country indirectly pay a great portion of these taxes, is not well founded. Though some of our produce is sold at auction, and most of it pays commission to merchants; although some of our planters board at hotels and contribute to the support of professions which pay taxes, yet nineteen-twentieths of the tax-paying power and resources of this city is derived from the commerce which grows out of the exchange of the vast production of the mighty Western world with the Atlantic cities, the Continents of Europe and the Islands of the South.

If we depart from the true principle of Democratic government to base representation on wealth, the estimation of the landed property of the cities of New Orleans and Lafayette is one half the estimation of the landed property of the whole State. But, the country has now 160,000 slaves, for the sake of round numbers, say slaves of the value of fifty millions of dollars. When you take into consideration the capital invested by our merchants and others in ships and steamboats, and all their paraphernalia, the vast magazines of dry goods, hardware and groceries, extending from the parish of St. Bernard to Carrolton, the incalculable amount of rich and costly furniture which has accumulated in the private and public houses during a century, the stocks of all kinds, and real money hoarded away, $8,000,000 now lying in the banks. When you consider the manufactories, machinery, tools and materials of these great cities, you can scarcely calculate how much the aggregate value of all these would exceed the value of all the slaves of the country.

So that there can be no reason for departing from the essential principle of a representative government, except arbitrarily to arrest the growing influence in the government of these growing cities. And this is based partly upon prejudice against them and partly upon a supposed diversity of interests between town and country. It is said cities are sores upon the body politic, and of course, New Orleans will be a mighty sore; that the planters are virtuous and patriotic and incorruptible. To the last proposition, I subscribe most cheerfully; in the first position I am an unbeliever. I believe great commercial cities have exercised a most beneficient influence on the States to which they belong. Commerce unites the citizens of the same State as it does nations by the strong ties of reciprocal usefulness, and mutual benefits. It harmonizes, civilizes, enlightens all, and equalizes their comforts and pleasures. It unites us to our Antipodes, it converts mankind into one family, it is the system of peace, it will extirpate war and annihilate barbarity.

And while I subscribe most cheerfully to the virtue and patriotism of the agricultural portion of the State, I must claim equal virtue, patriotism and intelligence for the bone and muscle of these cities. There is froth above and dregs below; but the soul and body is sound and pure. And when we look at the vast schools of learning and morality which the concentration of population and wealth enables us to establish and support, no one can doubt that as our advantages are greater, we must attain the greatest perfection in all that is useful to man, and exercise the most beneficent influence on all who enjoy our intercourse.

I have next racked my imagination to discover in what the interest of town and country can conflict, but the more I study, the more I find their interest one and indivisible. The merchant and every profession rejoices in the prosperity of the agriculture in the country, because it contributes to their own prosperity. They look with an anxiety to the abundance of the crops, and a fear to every thing that may deteriorate them only inferior to that of the proprietor himself. They are proud of the virtue, intelligence and patriotism of our planters and farmers. The gentlemen of the country have the same deep and abiding interest in the prosperity and welfare of the city. It is the pride of the West and of the whole country and peculiarly of the people of Louisiana.

There is a peculiar mutuality of interest to which I will allude, and I have done:—

The gentlemen of the country have a great interest in the city. A single one of their children may well take charge of and manage their whole plantation. The commerce, the enterprizes, the vast industry connected with our great city will always afford business and a living for the rest of their offspring.

The business of the city to be done by the youth requires but little physical exertion. Being much divided into many hands it is not calculated to enlarge and develope the mental faculties. A great many therefore grow up in softer habits, with feebler frames and intellects, less invigorated than those who are reared in the country. They are habituated also to indulge much in light but expensive amusements; the theatres, balls, social parties, expensive dress and indulgencies of every kind. Their income does not meet their expenses, and they are led to seek employment in the villages and towns of the country, and other business which it affords, where their faculties, mental and physical develope more, and where the details of commerce and the light ornamental and useful occupations in which they have been engaged, are more available. The amusements in which they have indulged do not exist, they have no motives to their former habits of expense, they engage in business, their income exceeds their outlay, and they are successful in business. The young men of the country of more energy, more physical ability come to the city, engage in commerce and professions, have no expensive habits, are indifferent to amusements, care not about wasting too much time in social intercourse or money in dress, attend only to business, keep all their gain, and are soon entirely successful.

Thus the eminent professional men and large merchants, of great cities, to a great extent, come from the country, and the teachers, merchants, professional men of the country go from the cities. The breed is crossed probably to the very great advantage of both————As by cropping off their excressences and transplanting certain trees in other soils, they produce a more abundant and luxuriant fruit, so with the youth of our city and country, by moderating the exuberances which a growth in either produces, and adding the advantages which are peculiar to the city or country life, the abler, better and more useful citizen is produced in each.

Let us then abandon all prejudices, repudiate arbitrary power, and cling to principle and the old Constitution, where it is based upon a principle so essential to the rights of man. Otherwise the nature of man will struggle for his equal rights until they are attained. In this age we cannot go backwards in intelligence and freedom, we cannot become ignorant and slavish, but must advance in a geometrical progression until the goal of perfection is approached. Commit the government of the State to men, and not to things, and to free and equal men, and our harmony will be eternal, and our strength invincible. In this city is a necleus of freemen, around which, the army on our great river, and brave men from every part of the country will unite, and in any possible contingency render our destiny as great as the early events of our history is glorious.

I will conclude in the words of a great philosopher, statesman, jurist and poet of former times, which contains the whole pith of the argument:

"What constitutes a State?
Not high-raised battlement or laboured mound,
Thick wall or moated gate?
Not cities proud with spires and turrets crown'd;
Not bays and broad arm'd ports,
Where laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
Not starr'd and spangled Courts,
Where low-brow'd baseness wafts perfume to pride,
No—men—high-minded men,
With powers as far above dull brutes endued,
In forest, brake or den,
As beasts excel cold rocks and brambles rude;
Men, who their duties know,
But know their rights, and knowing, dare maintain,
Prevent the long aimed blow,
And crush the Tyrant while they rend the chain,
These constitute a State."

On motion of Mr. Downs, the substitute of Mr. Beatty was ordered to be printed.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned until this evening at 7 o'clock.

Tuesday, February 4, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer from the Rev. Mr. Clark.

Order of the Day.—The 6th section of the 2d article---Apportionment.

Mr. Benjamin said he desired to make some remarks in support of his motion to refer the report of the majority of the committee to a special committee. He would extend that motion to embrace in the reference the substitute offered by the delegate from Lafourche. (Mr. Beatty.) It was palpable that without something definite for the consideration of the house, it was impossible to proceed with order and regularity, and to avoid entering upon a thousand divergent propositions that would be suggested during this desultory debate. The report before the house was unsatisfactory; the apportionment it suggested was arbitrary. and did not even conform to the very basis which it assumed. The principle of allowing one representative to each parish, whatever might be its population, was independent even of the principle of federal numbers, for the representation of one member was to be allowed without reference, and without regard to the federal numbers in the parish. There was then, no basis for the Convention to act upon in the proposition of the majority of the committee, and hence it became necessary to recommit their report to another committee in order that some definite plan, founded upon a general principle of equality and uniformity, let that principle be what it may, should be submitted to the action of the Convention; otherwise you involve this body in an inextricable labrynth, for if we take up the details before we agree upon the basis, it will be impossible to arrive at any result. Discussion will succeed discussion; proposition will succeed proposition; and we shall be no nearer coming to a conclusion ten days hence than we are now. It is indispensable that a committee should take the initiatory action, and by an examination of the subject; report to us some satisfactory basis, and at the same time place the house in possession of data which will enable them to apply that basis to the details of any proposition they may submit. It would be appropriate, too, in furtherance of that design, to instruct the committee, to be raised, upon the views and feelings of the majority of the house, in order that their report might conform to the will of that majority. From the tone and feeling that has been manifested since the discussion began, it is evident that there is a great diversity of opinion upon the basis of representation, as well as upon the details of apportionment, upon any basis that might be adopted. The principal points is to resolve the basis upon which representation shall be allowed; that being settled, there will be nothing more than an arithmetical calculation, which will not occupy the committee more than an hour. When the sense of the majority shall be ascertained, as to the basis to be adopted, nothing will be easier than to instruct the committee accordingly; and for the committee to report, in conformity with the instructions, the result of their labors. It may happen that the committee may err in their calculations, butit will be easy for the house to detect the errors and correct them, as it may happen that the committee, feeling themselves restricted by the instructions they may receive, may make such a distribution of the representation as will provoke the animadversions of the minority. But, in any event, their report will supply the house with a rule, a basis, a principle upon which each member may act, and upon which the popular voice may determine.

The details of the report of the majority of the committee, gives the lie to the enunciation with which it begins, "that representation shall be equal and uniform." I object, said Mr. Benjamin, to any deception; I wish the people of the State to be fully informed of the designs entertained upon this vital question. Let the facts be disclosed, in order that they may determine whether the principle proposed, be in accordance with the true republican doctrine. Whether there shall be submission or revolution. If that be the issue let us know it. If such be the irrevocable will of the majority of the Convention, let it be stated in plain and undisguised terms.

Mr. Benjamin next proceeded to review the arguments of the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs.) He insisted that the principle allowing one representative to the parishes not entitled to such representation by their population, was a violation of that "equality and uniformity" which was the foundation of representation in all republican governments. That the federal basis was not proper nor just in Louisiana, because it was not equal nor uniform in its operation; and that the reasons and motives that rendered that basis necessary in the constitution of this State—that our local institutions were identical throughout the State; and that the compromise that produced the federal basis had no relation to the social condition of the body politic in Louisiana.

Slaves were by our laws, nothing but property. But, says the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Beatty) we should allow them to form a part of the basis of representation because they are productive labor, and labor should be represented. If this argument hold good, then it might with equal propriety be urged that we should allow representation to oxen, horses, &c., which are attached to the glebe, and which are equally productive labor. This is the first time that I have ever heard the notion that labor should form a part of the basis of representation broached, and especially that particular kind of labor.

Mr. Downs replied to the arguments of the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) and insisted that there was nothing in the report of the committee to call for the violent assault made upon it. He regretted the line of argument assumed by the gentleman, (Mr. Benjamin) as he had no doubt it would figure in the abolition journals of the north, while he admitted the ability and eloquence with which that gentleman had handled the subject.

Mr. Benjamin said he did not know how to understand the member (Mr. Downs.) That member complimented him for the ability with which he had treated the subject under consideration, and then taunted him (Mr. B.) with the notoriety he would acquire at the north, because he opposed this slave basis. He thought the gentleman (Mr. Downs) was not consequent with himself, and was much more likely to obtain notoriety among that faction by reason of his advocacy and peculiar mode of sustaining that basis, than he (Mr. Benjamin) who so strenuously objected to it.

Mr. C. M. Conrad next spoke in favor of a recommittal, and Mr. Downs replied to him, objecting to the recommittal.

The question was then put and the yeas and nays called for, with the following result:

Ayes—Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Briant, Brumfield, Cènas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Garcia, Grymes, Hudspeth, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Taylor of St. Landry, and Winchester—25.

Nays—Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Leonard, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prescott, Pugh, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder—39 nays; so the motion to recommit was lost.

Mr. Preston then presented a substitute for the section, in conformity with his promise on Monday. This substitute provides: that representation shall be equal and uniform throughout the State; that the basis shall be the electors of the State, a census of which to be taken in 1846, and every fourth year thereafter; and no legislative act to have the force of law unless such census be taken and the apportionment made in conformity; that the number of representatives shall not be less than sixty nor more than ninety.

The substitute of Mr. Beatty was next in order.

Mr. Sellers moved that the substitute be laid upon the table, in order that the section reported by the committee may be taken up and discussed, This motion prevailed.

The substitute offered by Mr. Preston for the first period of the section, was, on motion of Mr. Downs, laid on the table. This substitute would adopt an electoral basis, and do away with the provision entitling each parish to one representative.

Mr. Benjamin then moved to strike out of the section, "each parish shall be entitled to one representative."

Mr. Downs rose in opposition to the motion. He argued that the principle was not a novel one. It had, he said, a precedent in the constitution of the United States, and in those of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New York. This was as far, he said, as he had examined.

Mr. Benjamin said in substance, that his convictions were that such a provision would be a continual source of strife in the legislature, and perverted to party uses and exigencies.

Mr. Ratliff coincided with Mr. B., and was in favor of striking out; he was also in favor of the electoral basis.

Mr. Charles M. Conrad likewise supported the motion to strike out, and expressed himself in the strongest terms hostile to the provision giving one member to a parish, irrespective of its population.

Mr. Porter rose and said, one gentleman (Mr. Preston) had declared in this debate, that the only true principle of representation is numbers—that one man in one place should have as much influence as one man in another—and that to establish any other principle was to overthrow and to annihilate popular government. To this I would reply, said Mr. Porter, that the gentleman was mistaken as to the other principles of representation being subversive of republican governments, inasmuch as numbers was not generally adopted as the sole basis of represention in our sister States.

I will not imitate the example of gentlemen who have gone to ancient Greece and Rome to find examples, but I will refer to the constitutions of the several States in this country, where the science of free government, in my opinion, is much better understood. The book of constitutions from which I shall sustain my positions, is a book of results. I have never seen the debates of any other than the Virginia Convention; and have no knowledge of the proceedings of any other, with the exception of the Convention of the State of Tennessee, where the principle of giving to each county that had two-thirds of the ratio of representation a representative, was adopted, which effectually gave to each county a representative. In the Virginia convention, where the subject of apportionment was more ably debated, with due deference to this house, than any where else, they settled down upon any thing else than numbers. Representation was based on the divisions of the State, east and west of the mountains, upon taxation and numbers, all having their due weight.

Mr. Porter contended that the principle of restraining the influence of large cities was well known and appreciated in all the States of the Union. Equally well understood was the principle of conceding to each distinct and separate political community comprised within the local subdivisions of a State, a voice in the general administration of public affairs. The question upon this floor was not understood. It was not population alone, but locality and incorporated interests that entered, for the most part, in the representation of the major portion of our sister confederacies. The principle was recognized in several of the States that, with the increase of numbers to be represented, decreased the representation. In Maine every county and fractional subdivision is represented. As for the particular objection applied to new parishes in Louisiana, that was easily obviated. Let the legislature be inhibited by this constitution from creating any new parishes which shall not embrace an area of 20 to 25 miles square, and which shall not contain a certain definite population. He was not in favor of cutting up parishes to increase sectional influences, nor did he believe that such had been done. The creation of new parishes had been for the convenience of the people residing therein. In Massachusetts a representative was allowed to each of the fractional subdivisions into which the territory of that State had been divided. In New Hampshire the same principle prevailed, with a clause according one representative for each one hundred and fifty persons, and two representatives for four hundred and fifty, and thus increasing the scale. In Vermont the representation was by towns—the fractional subdivisions into which that State was districted. In Rhode Island so great was the apprehension of concentrated power, that it was expressly provided that no town should have more than one sixth of the representation; it is provided that each town and city shall always have one representative: of course the towns cannot be all of one size. In Connecticut each town shall have one representative. In New York, a large agricultural State, and densely populated, provision is made that each county shall have at least one representative. In New Jersey a representative is accorded to each county, however small may be its population. The State of Pennsylvania has also guarded against the influence of Philadelphia, by restricting the representation of that city. In Delaware no basis is laid down; each county, without respect to numbers, has three senators and seven representatives. In Maryland likewise a similar restriction prevails. Baltimore is not allowed to vote with the county, and in the town of Annapolis a freehold of fifty acres is required to vote with the county. In the actual constitution of Maryland—the constitution adopted in 1838,—it is expressly provided that should any of the counties fall short of the number fixed upon as the basis, they shall nevertheless retain their then representative. That State had carefully guarded against the influence of her metropolis. The old constitution declares that each county shall elect four delegates—the new constitution provides that any county or city, having less than fifteen thousand souls federal numbers, shall be entitled to elect three representatives, (no odds how much less,) every county having a population of fifteen thousand souls, and less than twenty-five thousand souls, federal numbers, shall be entitled to four delegates—and that every county having twenty-four thousand souls and less than thirty-five, shall have five delegates; and that every county having a population of more than thirty-five thousand souls, federal numbers, shall elect six members, (and no more,) and that the city of Baltimore shall not have more than six members; and it further provided that in the apportionment hereafter, the counties having two, three and four representatives, their representation shall not be reduced. Thus, Baltimore, having more than one third the whole population, can never have but six votes, less than one twelfth of the whole representation.

In South Carolina, the apportionment is arbitrary; there are one hundred and sixty-one members in the house. The cities of Charleston, St. Phillip and St. Michaels, have fifteen representatives and two senators, making seventeen in both houses, out of one hundred and sixty-one members, say one ninth, and can have no more. Thus the influence of Charleston is guarded against, which possesses about one third of the population of the whole State. In the revised constitution an apportionment is made, and it prescribes that if any election district shall appear, from its population or taxes, not to be entitled to representation, it shall, nevertheless, send one representative.

In North Carolina each county is entitled to send, without respect to population, two representatives and one senator. The amended constitution provides that the senate shall be formed on taxation, the lower house of federal numbers: and each county to have one member, whether it have the ratio or not. Here, again, federal numbers, taxation and county representation is maintained.

In Georgia the constitution provides that one senator shall be elected from each county, without respect to population. The basis is federal numbers; the ratio is fixed at fifteen hundred persons, and so on in progression. Twelve thousand persons shall be entitled to a representation of four members; but no county shall have more than four, nor less than one. So far, said Mr. Porter, we have found no representation based solely on numbers, from Maine to Georgia.

Mr. Porter here gave way to a motion to adjourn, and has possession of the floor to-morrow.

Wednesday, February 5, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and its proceedings were opened with prayer.

Order of the Day.—Sec. 6, Art. II. Apportionment.

Mr. Porter resumed his remarks:

In the Constitution of Kentucky, the basis of representation is the qualified voters; and here, for the first time, the gentleman has found the principle he contends for. The same principle is to be found in the constitutions of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and it is also in Tennessee, but with a proviso, that each county having two-thirds the ratio, shall have one member, which really gives one member to each county. Now, sir, except in the four States above named, and in the old constitution of Louisiana, (which it is well known is but a transcript of the Kentucky constitution,) the principle the gentleman contends for is not to be found in the Book of Constitutions.

Before I proceed to examine the balance of the constitutions, I would, briefly here state, that all of those States, (the four above) are inland States, having no seaboard or sea-port towns, which can ever grow up to have any overshadowing influence, or antagonist interests from the country—when I have examined the balance of the constitution, I shall return to this part of the subject and discuss it more at large.

The next constitution then is that of the State of Mississippi, and here again the same principle of county representation is again taken up—white population with the proviso that each county shall always have one representative.

Alabama, again, white population, provided however, that each county shall have at least one representative.

Missouri, white population, provided each county shall have at least one representative—again this principle is carried out.

Michigan, white population, provided each county shall be entitled to one representative.

Arkansas, white population, provided each county, although its population may not give the existing ratio, nevertheless it shall always have one representative.

Sir, we see after examining the constitutions of all the twenty-six States, that the principle of county representation is most scrupulously maintained, in over twenty of those constitutions; that it is an almost all pervading principle,—but we will now return to those exceptions to the general rule, the four States above named. Now, Sir, I frankly state, that if I was a citizen of either of those States, I should have but little objection to abandoning county representation; and why? because it is utterly impossible that any antagonist, or separate interests, can grow up between the towns and country. As before said, they are all inland States, and have no sea-port towns. For example, Sir, could the city of Nashville exist without the State of Tennessee? Could it live a year, or even a month, without the support it receives from the country? Could Louisville exist without the support it receives from Kentucky? Could Cincinnati move on in her rapid progress in improvements, but for the immense produce of the State that is continually crowding the city. And Sir, could any of the towns of Illinois or Indiana exist, without the States in which they are situated. Sir, it is evident that they are mutually dependant on each other, and the one cannot exist without the other.

Now, sir, I would ask gentlemen, in all candor, if the State of Louisiana stands on the same footing towards its metropolis? Sir, suppose the sponge was this day applied to all the beautiful and highly cultivated fields in Louisiana—suppose that this State was this moment laid waste, what would be the effect on this city? Sir, it would be but a drop in the bucket; it would feel the shock, (so to speak,) but for a moment. No, sir, the growth of this city depends not on the State; it will grow with the growth, and prosper with the prosperity of every city, town, hamlet and plantation in the vast valley of the Mississippi. Then, sir, is it not right to guard against this mighty, this growing and over-shadowing influence? Sir, have we not abundant examples for so doing? South Carolina, having a house of one hundred and sixty-one members, has restricted Charleston, and two counties, St. Phillip and St. Michael, to fifteen votes in the lower house and two in the senate, making seventeen votes, out of one hundred and sixty-one, say one ninth; the city having near one third the population of the State. The State of Maryland has limited Baltimore, which has one third the population of the State, to six votes. New-York city has but one eighth the population of the State, yet she is restricted by county representation, and restricted in the senate. Rhode Island guards against this concentration of power, by saying expressly that no town or city shall ever have more than one sixth the whole numbers to which the house is hereby limited. If these restrictions are necessary in those States, are they not doubly so here? for no bounds can be set to the growth of this city. Then, sir, it is evident that it has been the continual policy of more than twenty States to guard against the concentration of power, and to give to each corporation or county a representation. Now, sir, I would ask where is the safest repository of power, in the city or in the country? I hope the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Conrad) who is now advocating the opposite side from me, will pardon me for quoting his remarks whilst he was debating another question on this floor; I only regret that I cannot give them with the same force and eloquence that the gentleman did; he said that "the safest repository of power was in the country;" I concur with him heartily; but the gentleman went farther and said that "cities were but sores on the body politic;" I concur again with the gentleman, and ask where is the safest repository? But I hope I will be permitted to quote again from the gentleman, whilst discussing this question, and arguing that there could be no antagonist interest; he most beautifully represented the State of Louisiana as the kind mother giving nourishment and support to her beautiful offspring (New Orleans) a beautiful figure, and I wish to keep it up. Where ought the government of the family to be, with the mother or the child? But, sir, this spoiled child (before it is half grown) is demanding the keys of the household, and would manage in despite of maternal authority the concerns of the whole family. Shall the government be given to it, or shall it remain where it is, and where it has never been abused. He asks gentlemen, if they are prepared to destroy this maternal government under which they have grown up and prospered, and place it in the hands of a city, subject to all the evil passions, sudden excitements, violent evulsions, and all the distracting elements which abound in every city. Sir, it is to be hoped that the sober good sense of this house will refuse to do so; but sir, is there not another point of view in which we may argue the propriety of county representation? permit me to ask is there not a strong analogy between the principle of representation as carried out by the United States among the different States, and as carried out by the States of this Union among their respective counties; sir, when a State is admitted into the Union, it always has at least one representative; but farther sir, it has two senators; the smallest State in the compact, as soon as it is organized, has in the senate equal representation with the largest; then sir, numbers are not strictly maintained in either the United States or in the Constitutions of the different States. Sir, this is a subject in which my constituents are directly and vitally concerned—the question is, are they to have a representation in each parish or not? If you strike out the provision now under consideration, they are deprived of representation from each parish; those parishes, Caddo and De Soto, have a much larger territory and more population than many of the old parishes, which have long had one representative each, whilst those two parishes are represented on this floor by only one. Sir, (Mr. PORTER said) in conclusion, permit him to say, had he done less than submit his humble views on this subject, he should feel that he was unworthy of the high honor conferred on him by a kind and confiding constituancy. Sir, said he, taking the results of the sober deliberations of more than twenty Conventions in the United States, it was his settled judgment that each organized parish ought always to have one representative, and he would vote for that principle; and furthermore, that the city of New Orleans shall not (let her population be what it may) have more than a certain proportion of the representation of the State, (say one-sixth.)

Mr. ROSELIUS said, there was nothing more to be deplored than the efforts made to excite the country against the city. It is not our mission, Mr. President, to face these prejudices, nor should they be suffered to influence our action. Our mission, in my humble conception, is to perfect the social compact which should unite all the citizens of the State, and every portion of it in a common community of interest. Can a nobler or more important object be conceived? And yet, when the question is presented to us, to establish the basis, the very foundation of our representative system, upon a just and proper footing; to lay the corner stone of our social fabric, it would seem that passion is to supercede reason, and an arbitrary rule is to prevail over equality of political rights. An odious and tyrannical rule is proposed, in place of a just, equal and uniform principle. And, when we object to this, as unjust and partial, we are referred for a precedent to the federal constitution. The federal basis was adopted under circumstances essentially different from those which attend the proceedings of this body. No parellel can be established between the necessity in the one case and the necessity in the other. In our State there is no necessity, no occasion for the federal basis, and its operation here would be unjust and partial. It would deprive a large portion of the people of their just representation, and would transfer political power to the hands of a few persons, whose political weight would increase with the number of slaves they possessed.

There can be no compromise, said Mr. ROSELIUS, when principle is involved. I shall never consent to any compromise involving principle. Where the matter is one of convenience, a compromise may well enough be made. But, upon vital questions—questions affecting our very institutions, upon these, I hold it, would be culpable to compromise.

The gentleman from East Feliciana, (Mr. DUNN,) with the candor and sincerity that distinguished him, placed the attempt to apportion the State, so as to destroy all the power of the city upon its true ground. That gentleman said, "we have the power and we shall keep it. This is the sum and substance of all the arguments in favor of the report of the majority of the committee; for whatever other grounds be assumed, and whatever efforts be made to sustain the proposition, the whole matter resolves itself in point of fact to this, "we have the power and shall keep it." It is not right, but might, that is to prevail.

I have listened, said Mr. ROSELIUS, with a great deal of attention to the remarks of the delegate from Caddo, (Mr. Porter.) That gentleman has read to us extracts from various constitutions to show that numbers are not generally regarded. The principle invoked, wherever it may be found, is superannuated. It was originally derived from the state of representation in England. It is a part and parcel of the rotten borough system of that country, which has not even yet been entirely destroyed, notwithstanding the passage of the Reform Bill. In northern States it has continued to prevail by the force of habit. Among the States enumerated by the delegate from Caddo, figures Rhode Island, whose charter was obtained from that vicious and unprincipled monarch, Charles the Second. The people, it is true, have submitted to the partial and unjust principle where it has prevailed, but is that an argument to authorize us to impose that principle upon our constituents? In Massachusetts, it is pushed so far, that in an isolated spot, situated on the sea coast, where people repair to get oysters and fish, and which contains a few huts for some 6 or 8 fishermen, yclept a town, a representative is allowed. I have this from a respectable gentleman formerly from that State. There are doubtless other towns of no greater magnitude similarly distinguished, but this one he mentioned to me from his own personal knowledge.

Mr. Roselius concluded by an earnest appeal, against the adoption of the section, and in favor of its recommittal.

Mr. Dunn said, that as an allusion had been made to a remark of his in the few observations he had submitted upon the subject under debate, he felt called upon to explain the scope of that remark. It certainly did not intend that it would be proper to do injustice towards the city. He contemplated nothing of the kind. So far from it, he had come here with no other design than to do full and ample justice to every part and portion of the State. In reference to a proper apportionment of representation, which is the foundation of republican government, he (Mr. Dunn) had said that the country had been invested with her fair proportion of representation, and she would not concede it to her prejudice. I deny, (said Mr. Dunn,) that there is any injustice in the principle recommended by the majority of the committee that federal numbers should be the basis, or that there is any thing arbitrary in that basis. On the contrary, I contend that it is peculiarly adapted to the State, and is the only principle that can be established for the permanent welfare of both city and country. Take either population or electors as the basis, and you make New Orleans the arbitress, the mistress of the whole State. New Orleans will control Louisiana. It is to preclude this result that I insist so strenuously in favor of federal numbers as the basis, because that basis is uniform in the balance of the State, and will place the agricultural portion of the community beyond the power of the city. I repeat, I think the city a dangerous depository of political power, and I wish the country to maintain its ascendancy.

As for the principle according representation to each parish, it may or may not be defective. That principle may admit of some modification. But, so far as it has the effect of dividing and diffusing political power, it appears to be reasonable and just. As I am now convinced that the best mode of arriving at a satisfactory solution of the question invoked, will be by referring the whole subject to a committee. I will move for the reconsideration of the vote, by which the question of reference was lost.

Mr. Saunders presented a substitute to the propositions under consideration, and asked that a committee of twelve be appointed, three from each congressional district, to take into consideration the various propositions that were offered, and to report the result of their labors to the Convention.

Mr. Grymes contended that it was always in order to recommit. In this particular case, this is the only reasonable course he could adopt. A majority have decided in this body, beyond the power of reason, that there is necessarily a contrariety of interests between the city and the country, and the former must be shorn of her strength. Every thing that has transpired, the various suggestions and propositions that come from the majority, clearly demonstrates that no quarter is to be shown to the city. It is useless then, to argue a question so far prejudged. I consider the city a victim to the vague and idle apprehensions of the country. All that remains for us is to make the best of a bad bargain, and be duly grateful for the best terms that may be offered. We have been told that the great God of nature has implanted in the human breast a love of justice and a perception of right, but unfortunately this beautiful sentiment has no practical force upon the calculations of interest and the effect of power. We have before us the example how weak is this assumed love of justice and perception of right in restraining the force of numbers!

I cannot (said Mr. Grymes) perceive any conflict between the interests of the city and the interests of the country. There is no misfortune that effects the country that is not felt, as there is no revulsion in the city that is not felt in the country. But it is useless to say any thing upon that point. The majority have willed that there should be a contrariety of interests, in order that the city may be curbed. Well, be it so. You have the power to do it, and will no doubt do it effectually. All that the city may ask, is that you shall do it reasonably and consistently.

I repeat that all the propositions that have been made are designed for the sole purpose of keeping the city in vassalage to the country. We must submit. But in the name of God, let the principle upon which you act, have the semblance of equality and uniformity. The proposition of the gentleman from East Feliciana, (Mr. Saunders) appears to have that in view, and hence, appreciating his motives, I unite with him in the motion he has made.

Mr. Peets said, that notwithstanding the eloquent remarks of the city delegation, they had not shown how it was possible to make an apportionment upon strict principles of equality. It was out of the question to do so. There is only one way of equality, and that is by general ticket. But as that system suits no one, it is necessary that we should adopt an arbitrary rule, whether it be the number of electors—federal numbers, or territorial representation: in each there will be a disparity and consequently a want of perfect equality. It seemed to him (Mr. Peets) that if the number of representatives could arbitrarily be fixed at from seventy-five to one hundred, instead of from one hundred to one hundred and fifty, it might with equal propriety be conceded that it was as fair to apportion that number throughout the State. I never would consent that the city should be oppressed—but I do contend that small parishes have an unquestionable right to be represented. This is proper and just in itself. But it is politic, in order to prevent the concentration of power—particularly in a large city. For these reasons, said Mr. Peet, I shall vote against striking out.

The question was taken upon striking out the following words from the report of the majority of the committee, "each parish shall be entitled to one representative."

The yeas and nays were called for—40 yeas—32 nays.

Mr. Saunders then moved that the report of the majority of the committee and the other propositions be referred; which motion prevailed with an amendment, that the propositions of the delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston) and the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Guion) be also referred—38 yeas to 34 nays.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned until this evening at 7 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

On motion of Mr. Preston the Convention took up section 14 of the report of the majority of the committee, and adopted said section as follows:

Sec. 14. Not less than a majority of the members of each house of the general assembly shall form a quorum to do business: but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and shall be authorized by law to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as may be prescribed thereby.

The 15th section was then adopted.

Sec. 15. Each house of the general assembly shall judge of the qualifications, elections and returns of its members; but a contested election shall be determined in such manner as shall be directed by law.

The Convention then took up the 16th and 17th sections, and adopted them as follows:

Sec. 16. Each house of the general assembly may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish a member for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member, but not the second time for the same offence.

Sec. 17. Each house of the general assembly shall keep and publish weekly a journal of its proceedings, and the yeas and nays of the members on any question shall at the desire of any two of them, be entered on the journal.

The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the 18th section.

Sec. 18. Each house may punish by imprisonment, during the session, any person not a member, for disrespectful and disorderly behavior in its presence, or for obstructing any of its proceedings: provided, such imprisonment shall not at any one time exceed ten days.

This section underwent some verbal amendments. Mr. Ratliff opposed the section as unnecessary. The legislature did not need any such rule, and it might be abused and lead to oppression. If the legislature were annoyed by any disturbance, they could appeal to the criminal laws of the country.

Mr. Wadsworth replied that a resort to the courts would not be efficacious to assure the deliberations of the legislature from any obstructions, as persons who might be evilly disposed could obstruct the proceedings of the legislature, and then, when brought before the courts, would have the faculty of giving security.

Mr. Downs said he considered this provision necessary not only to protect the legislature, but also to enforce obedience to its mandates. He corroborated this view of the subject, by an actual occurrence in which some bank or other corporation, had refused to allow the legislature to make an examination.

Mr. Kenner stated he was opposed to the section.

The yeas and nays were called for—yeas 54, nays 7.

The Convention then took up section 19, and adopted it as follows:

Sec. 19. Neither house during the session of the general assembly shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which they may be sitting.

The Convention then took up section 20, as follows:

Sec. 20. The members of the general assembly shall severally receive from the public treasury a compensation for their services, which shall be four dollars per day during their attendance on, going to, and returning from the sessions of their respective houses, provided that the same may be increased or diminished by law; but no alteration shall take effect during the period of service of the members of the house of representatives by whom such alteration shall have been made: And provided, also, that this compensation shall exist for the period of sixty days only, but if the general assembly shall at any time extend the session beyond sixty days, they shall not receive any compensation for any period beyond the said sixty days.

Mr. Eustis proposed to add to the foregoing section the following, "and provided further, that no adjournment shall exceed ten days."

Mr. Benjamin opposed the proposition. He said that it was not desirable to prevent the legislature from re-assembling during the same year, if deemed essential. The object to be attained was an abreviation o the legislative sessions, and it was accomplished by allowing the members a per diem for sixty days only. If they saw fit to remain but fifteen days in session, and meet again during the year, he could see no valid objection against it. The sessions of the legislature, but in particular cases it might be necessary and appropriate for the legislature to have two sessions in one year.

Mr. Eustis replied that in point of fact there was no difficulty—the difficulty suggested by his colleague (Mr. Benjamin) was merely verbal. The object of his (Mr. E.'s) proviso, was to preclude the legislature from extending their sessions to another portion of the year. And as to any necessity for their meeting a second time, that was provided for by the section empowering the governor in cases of emergency to convene them.

Mr. Claiborne conceived that he understood the object of the gentleman (Mr. Eustis.) He thought that if the words "during the same session" were inserted, it would meet the views of the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin.)

Mr. Eustis accepted the amendment.

Mr. McRea moved for the rejection of the clause limiting the session to sixty days.

Mr. Dunn sustained the motion to reject. The public business might require a longer session than sixty days. That period would not be probably long enough for the legislature convened under the new constitution, immediately after its adoption.

Mr. WADSWORTH was opposed to the clause, because it would only affect the members who were poor. It would drive them from the legislature—they would be starved out by the wealthier members. It was paying the legislature, moreover, a very bad compliment to assume that the only way of getting them to attend to their duties, was to deprive them of their salaries after a certain time.

Mr. RATLIFF made an earnest appeal in favor of striking out the clause.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved that the legislative session be extended to seventy-five days.

Mr. DUNN proposed ninety days.

Mr. BENJAMIN thought sixty days more than sufficient—especially when the legislature would be relieved, as was designed, of the petty local business, which would be confided to the police juries of the several parishes. The legislature of South Carolina was never in session more than twenty days, and three times that period should certainly be amply sufficient in Louisiana. Full one half of the time of the legislature was consumed in bills of a purely local character—such as the establishment of a ferry, and this cost the State more than the privilege to the individual was worth.

Mr. SCOTT of Baton Rouge, confirmed the observations of the delegate (Mr. Benjamin) by his legislative experience.

Mr. WADSWORTH replied that it some times happened that a bill represented as local, involved the interests of a great portion of the whole State. He instanced the Raccourcie Cut-off.

Mr. READ proposed to allow the members of the legislature one half of their pay after the expiration of the sixty days.

Whereupon, on motion, the Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 6, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer, by the Rev. Mr. GOODRICH.

The Hon. T. W. CHINN, delegate from the county of Iberville, in the Chair.

The CHAIR announced the following members to compose the committee upon the 6th section, article 2d—Apportionment; to whom was referred the report of the majority of the committee on the legislative department upon apportionment, and the various other propositions.

First Congressional District.—Messrs. Wadsworth, Benjamin and Grymes.

Second Congressional District.—Messrs. Preston, Roman, and Beatty.

Third Congressional District.—Messrs. Saunders, Scott, and Ratliff.

Fourth Congressional District.—Messrs. Downs, Porter, and Lewis.

Chairman of the Committee.—Mr. Lafayette Saunders.

ORDER OF THE DAY.—Section 9, presented by Mr. CLAIBORNE, requiring that the residence of two years in the case of naturalized citizens, should commence on or after the date of their certificate of naturalization.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said, that his only object in presenting this section, was to preclude the frauds and corruptions which might result on the eve of an election, by a wholesale process of naturalization. By this section, the steam process of manufacturing American citizens, would be arrested. Naturalization would take its proper course, and the two years intervening would afford naturalized citizens a proper opportunity of becoming acquainted with our political parties, and with public men. He hoped that the section would be favorably received by all who desired to preserve the purity of the ballot box.

Mr. GUION favored the object designed by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Claiborne) but would propose a substitute to this effect.

"No person shall be entitled to exercise the right of suffrage in this State, who has not been for the last two years a citizen of the United States."

Mr. CLAIBORNE: I accept the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. EUSTIS said, that he would not have troubled the House with any views of his if any other member had manifested a disposition to oppose the adoption of this section; but as no one had done so, he was unwilling that the question should go by default. What he would offer was not by way of mere argument, but by way of counsel. He considered this question as too important to be a subject of disputation.

I think, said Mr. Eustis, that I see the Convention about to commit a capital error. That through an excitement which I believe to be but transitory, we are about to yield to the sudden impulses of passion. From the passions of the day, I would appeal to the fathers of the day. I would appeal to you as supreme magistrates of the State, whether it be politic—whether it be expedient, to engraft upon the constitution this principle of exclusion. Would it be wise to pronounce it the judgment—the law of the State? I shall not repeat what I said when a similar subject was under consideration. But I will leave that and pass to the subject before us. And first, permit me to submit to the judgment of the Convention, that the proposition of my colleague (Mr. Claiborne) is an innovation; that nothing of the kind is to be found in the old constitution, nor has it been demonstrated to be necessary in the thirty-two years of experience that we have had under that constitution.

In none of the recent constitutions of our sister States, although this never-ending subject of foreign influence has been agitated among them, with equal, if not greater violence, than with us, has such a principle of exclusion been adopted. Complaints of foreign influence then, as here, have been heard; these complaints have been reiterated in the political contests and defeats of the day, until the ear has tired of them, and yet in none of the constitutions, remodelled or amended amid all this excitement, has any such principle been engrafted upon them—a principle odious by its exceptional and personal character. In appealing to the judgment of the Convention, I would ask them, not to neglect the injunctions of expediency. Not to forget the political history of the country. The operations of the constitution and laws of the several States that have been in existence for more than half a century, and which to my mind have established, and I say it with great deference to the opinions of others, the fundamental doctrine of political equality. We should bear in mind that we are now about to establish the corner stone, upon which will rest the quiet and repose of this whole community, the sovereignty of the whole State. With due humility I would suggest, whether it would be well to abandon the lessons of experience to follow new and untried elements, and which the necessities of the times neither call for nor justify. These are the results of my reflections, and I would entreat the Convention to pause and ponder the consequences before they commit themselves to a policy which will give great dissatisfaction, and which will operate exclusively and with peculiar harshness upon a valued portion of our community. With due deference to the opinions of others, I cannot consider this exclusion as just. The State of Louisiana, in common with her sister confederates, has relinquished the power of making citizens, and has invested it in the general government of the whole Union. Congress have established five years as a proper period to admit foreigners to naturalization, and even if we have the constitutional power, which may admit of argument, it would not be politic, wise or expedient to add any thing to that restriction. When a foreigner resides permanently among us for five years, with the intention of becoming a citizen, and of making this favored land his home—when he marries among us, and has all his affections concentrated in our midst—when every feeling and sentiment dear to the human heart unites him to the soil—is it reasonable, is it proper to treat him with distrust; to deny him the confidence reposed in other citizens, and to require him to wait two years longer before he be placed upon a perfect equality. This distinction will rankle at the heart of the naturalized citizen, and he will feel with pain and mortification that the fundamental laws of the country place him in an inferior position, and in a position in which he is held up as a constant mark for suspicion, and perchance for reproach. Instead of being a united family, we distract and divide our community; we destroy harmony and reciprocity of feeling, and create dissatisfaction and discontent. And why this? Where is the necessity? The object of government is to represent the interests, the feelings and the wishes of all; to harmonize society and to bind it together indissolubly, for the attainment of liberty and of happiness. My colleague (Mr. Claiborne) says it is to prevent frauds! He thinks that a temptation will exist on the eve of an election to make, as he expresses it, "citizens by steam," and that this section will preclude that result. Admitting, for the sake of the argument, that we have been admonished by past experience, that frauds do particularly occur on the eve of elections, no other mode of preventing them can be employed than a legal mode. We find that our sister States suffer from the same assumed inconvenience that we do, and yet no local legislation has ever been made to meet the case. Certainly it would not be proper with a view of preventing the naturalization of improper persons to preclude the natualization of persons legally qualified. It might happen, that the term of five years might expire on the eve of an election, and that a resident foreigner might wish to complete his naturalization with the view to the exercise of the privileges of suffrage. What is there wrong in that. There is no more harm in his being naturalized at one time rather than another, if the laws of Congress be fulfilled, and if he have resided the necessary period and can make the necessary proof. There are natives who are as jealous of the liberties of the country in the other States, as there are in Louisiana; frauds are as rife elsewhere as here, and yet none of the constitutions of our sister States, formed amid all the excitement which has prevailed among them, have adopted such a principle of exclusion. I have said, that as the foreigner when he comes here, is required by the laws of Congress to reside five years before he can be admitted to citizenship, it would be unjust to require two years more residence on the part of the State. Are the five years, in which he may obtain a thorough practical acquaintance with our institutions, to count for nothing in the supposed necessity that an unusual residence is essential to indoctrinate him in sound American principles. I will proceed to show what is the law of Louisiana in relation to the acquisition of residence by aliens. I refer to Moreau's Digest of the laws, page 309. It is as follows:

"That any alien coming into this State from a foreign country, or from any State of the United States, or any citizen of the United States coming into this State as aforesaid, shall after having resided one year without any interruption in one of the parishes of this State, having in the meantime purchased or rented a house or room, or parcel of land, or pursued some profession or employment for a support, be considered as having acquired a residence in the parish where such individual has so resided and complied with the above requisitions, by making proof of the same before any judge or justice of the peace within this State, who is hereby authorized and required to receive such evidence and make it a part of the records of his court, and to grant to the individual an attested certificate to that effect, and the oath of the individual applying, supported by the evidence of another, shall be deemed sufficient."

The old constitution imposed upon the Legislature the duty of pointing out the manner in which a man coming into the State should declare his residence. In pursuance of that requisition the first law, which was amended by the act of 1818, which I have read, required that the person coming into the State desirous of acquiring residence should give notice in writing to the judge of the parish, where he proposed to reside of such intention, and at the expiration of twelve months from such notification he should be considered a resident. The act of 1818 is the law of the State, and methinks it would be a wrong violation of the spirit of justice to embody a principle in your constitution at variance with our past practice, and not called for by any sound reasons of good policy. The existing statute has regulated the conduct of citizens and sojourners. Justice is the foundation of law. Can the assumed emergency, and I do not deny that frauds have been committed, be met by this section? I think not. But how can the evil be remedied? I answer by having judges who obey the laws. If you cannot trust your judges, we have assembled to little purpose; our labors to form a new constitution will be productive of no good. If you can't trust your judges then, there is an end to the liberties of your country. For important as the right of suffrage may be considered, and important as it is in fact, it is nothing in comparison with an efficient and irreproachable judiciary. You may extend the right of suffrage, but unless you embody in your constitution such wise and wholesome regulations as will ensure to your judiciary the confidence and respect of reasonable and well-thinking men, the extension of suffrage, as far as the expectation of the public and the permanent good of the State be concerned, will be a mere humbug; for suffrage will not and cannot affect those salutary reforms which are essential in that most important branch of the public service. It cannot reach your judiciary, and purge it from the dross with which it may be encumbered. The idea that good government can exist merely by the will of the people, independent of good institutions, is a paradox—it is a mistake. The people govern through their institutions, and if you cannot trust your institutions it is better for us to go home. It must be admitted that many of the judicial functions are treated with levity, and in some instances with shameful profligacy. Our naturalization laws for example, are good. There is not a lawyer that will contravert this opinion. Take the old act, passed under Mr. Jefferson's administration; it is almost excellent law. It was passed at a period and in a body conspicuous for intelligence and purity of heart. In the ancient days of the glories of the republic, and it bears the stamp of integrity and of genius. What do the naturalization laws require? Every one knows the history of those laws. The periods for residence have successively been changed.

Under the administration of Washington, in 1790, the term of residence required for naturalization was at first only two years, and the power was delegated to all the State courts to admit persons to citizenship after the completion of that residence. In 1795, five years after, the period was increased to five years. In 1798, under the administration of John Adams, it was placed at fourteen years. The judgment of the people of the United States was pronounced against this extension of residence, and in 1802, under Mr. Jefferson, the identical term of residence, five years, was restored as under George Washington. The adjudication of citizenship is by a most solemn judicial proceeding. The proof has to be furnished of all the qualifications essential to citizenship, to the satisfaction of the judge, and an oath is administered before God and man—a proceeding infinitely more solemn than attends the rendition of an ordinary judicial decision. The judge who can so far forget his duty as to desecrate the sacred requirements of that law—to prostitute his official station, by a total disregard and violation of its provisions; who can forget the obligations it imposes upon him, which are between him and his God, is guilty of an offence that words are inadequate to express. Setting upon the life of a fellow being, and pronouncing his sentence without adequate proof, is nothing in comparison with the responsibility incurred by that judge who admits a man to citizenship who is not entitled to it. It strikes at the very foundation of the political edifice—there is no name for such an act.

The sentence of reprobation prononnced by the senate of Louisiana upon a profligate judge, who had thus far dishonored himself and exposed the institutions of his country, will act as a warning to all who would imitate his example. It will show them that they are neither above nor beyond punishment, if their moral perceptions are so blunted as to impel them to such outrages.

It is not by imposing restrictions then, on the rights of citizenship, when these rights are once acquired by foreigners; it is not by exclusive legislation that you can hope to effect the object of precluding frauds upon the naturalization laws. You must strike at the root of the evil. You must exact that your judges do their duty, and hold them to do that duty. There is no defect in the laws themselves of naturalization which facilitates the perpetration these frauds. The defect and the cause of the evils that may exist, lie in the manner in which those laws are executed. Here is the true cause.

I am ready and willing to go as far as any one, to put a stop to these evils. I am ready to apply proper remedies, but I cannot sanction a principle which is subversive of the rights of persons claiming to be citizens, and who are citizens, in conformity with the supreme laws of the land, and in virtue of solemn decisions of courts of justice.

There is no complaint of the manner in which foreigners are admitted to citizenship in our federal courts. The proceedings of law are enforced there. They are strictly observed by Judge McCaleb, as they have been by all his predecessors, and not a case has ever occurred in those courts to which the least exception could be had.

It is properly within the competency of the legislature to provide laws to meet the emergencies of the present case. This section, in our fundamental law, at any rate is superfluous. The legislature might direct that the courts should not naturalize within three months preceding an election. What is to prevent them from doing that? I do not suggest this myself, as a remedy; but it can be done by the legislature, without embodying in your fundamental law an untried novelty—an exclusive and mischevious principle. There is another remedy, and a more effectual one. If you can't trust your judges in the matter, forbid them from naturalizing foreigners at all. Take away from them the power, and I will go with you. That can be done by a single line. The exercise of the power of naturalization by State courts has been conceded by congress through comity, and it is within the competency of the State to decline the authority. This is perfectly plain to members of the legal profession. The judicial power of the United States is vested in a supreme court and such inferior courts as congress may from time to time ordain and establish. This is the extent of the judicial power of the United States; it goes no further. I repeat, if you can't trust your judges in the matter of naturalization, take away from them the power to naturalize. I do not say they are unworthy of confidence; nor would I act upon that principle. In some cases congress has given State tribunals jurisdiction in revenue matters; in other cases in criminal causes; this jurisdiction has sometimes been declined, therefore, no difficulty can exist if the State should think proper to relinguish, or the parts of her courts of justice, jurisdiction in naturalization cases.

Mr. Eustis alluded in the course of his remarks, to the importance of placing the judiciary system upon a proper basis; of sustaining its character for impartiality, for intelligence; for honor and for integrity. A well organized judiciary was, in his conception, the most essential safeguard to the rights of the citizens, and the greatest preservative of our public institutions.

In conclusion, he thanked the Convention for their patient attention. He appealed to them to reflect well upon the consequences of attempting to apply a remedy for temporary abuses, which were perfectly within the competency of the State authorities to remedy; and for which we might invoke a principle in the constitution in vain. We should profit by the experience of the past; by the experience of wise statesmen, and not wander in the dark without chart or compass to direct them. In the fundamental basis of our government nothing should appear but what experience has sanctioned, and the maturest judgment has confirmed.

Mr. Claiborne said it was not his intention to enter into a discussion of the question involved. He was convinced, without prejudice to any class of our fellow citizens, that some rule in the constitution was essential. The section before the Convention applied to the future: it was not to preclude the effects of naturalization, but simply to prevent the abuses of naturalization on the eve of an important political combat. Objection was taken to this, and it was pronounced by the gentleman (Mr. Eustis) a harsh and rigorous restriction. With equal propriety it might be said to be harsh and rigorous to require residence at all, and that the opposite extreme, making residence unnecessary in the acquisition of citizenship, would be the just and proper policy. If every reasonable restraint in government is to be considered a harsh restriction, we had better abolish the government at once, and resolve society into its original state of individual independence and anarchy.

I repeat, Mr. President, that it is not my intention to argue this question; I will leave that task to more competent hands. The gentleman (Mr. Eustis) complains that this subject has been suggested under excitement. If the delegate means to say that I have supported it under any excitement, or under the influence of prejudice, I deny emphatically the charge. If any one has been excited, it has been the member himself. I deny that I wish to make exceptional restraints, bearing exclusively on naturalized citizens, or that I designed exciting feelings of ill will between naturalized citizens and native citizens. Here again it is the gentleman who is at fault and not I. I have made no appeals to local feelings. We have required two years' residence to acquire citizenship from our fellow citizens of the other States, and they are in the mean time, during these two years, subjected to all the duties and obligations of citizens; whereas a person from another country, before he is naturalized, is exempt from all these duties, and has certain advantages in being allowed the privilege of suing in a particular court, and of having transferred any civil proceedings instituted against him to that court. I wish to put the native citizen on an equality with the naturalized citizen, in relation to residence. That is all, and I am indeed astonished it should have provoked so much feeling. I disclaim all prejudice against naturalized citizens, who have conformed to the spirit and intention of our laws. I am acquainted with many most excellent naturalized citizens, and the proof that there is nothing improper in the principle proposed, is, that they heartily concur in the necessity of some rule by which our naturalization laws may be preserved from the prostitution of party purposes, and from abominable frauds and corrupt evasions. This platform is large enough for native citizens and naturalized citizens—for all reasonable and judicious of whatever country or party they may be. I repeat again, far be it from me to excite passions or create excitement. I sincerely deprecate any thing of the kind on any occasion, and more especially on an occasion when there should be so much moderation and so much patient and dispassionate investigation.

Mr. Marigny said that it would seem from the presentation of this proposition, that the lessons of experience were not always salutary. After the debate, no less full than it was animated, upon the subject of the qualifications to be required for membership to the house of representatives, during which debate a principle was embodied in the original proposition that four years residence, to count from the date of the certificate of naturalization, should be essential to the qualifications of naturalized citizens, making in all nine years' residence, was rejected by the casting vote of the president. It was to be supposed that a similar exclusion would not be pressed upon our attention. That the principle having once been rejected, it would have been considered settled, and would not have made its appearance again to disturb our deliberations.

But, this reasonable presumption is disappointed, and it is attempted to exclude for two years the citizen, who has been naturalized in virtue of your laws, and who has resided the full period they prescribe. After receiving his brevet of citizenship from your highest tribunals, and with all the solemnities of an oath, he is told that this is not yet sufficient: that he must wait, although he is a citizen, two years longer before he can exercise the most important privilege of citizenship—the right of suffrage! It must be acknowledged, that this is a most anomalous and curious proceeding! And the attempt to engraft it upon the constitution again, after it has signally failed upon another point, is a most extraordinary mode of reviving an extinct question, and of giving it vigor.

I am diametrically and invincibly opposed to this section, because it is unjust, and partial, and not only is it unjust and partial, but it is likewise opposed to the true interests of the city and State; and is aimed more particularly at the city—although it comes from a delegate of the city, contrary to my expectations, and I may add, to my great surprise. That delegate, one would have presumed, from what he has seen passing in the house, would at least perceived that his proposition was unfortunate and not opportune, to say the least. In fact if the country delegation should sanction this principle, it will not be because they consider it just or reasonable, but because they will comprehend how prejudicial it will be to the city, against which they appear determined to do every thing to paralyze any little influence she may still retain in the operations of the government.

I feel well assured that if a foreigner was to land in the parish of St. James, and was to go through all the formula necessary to citizenship, and at the expiration of five years, was to propose to vote, no one would stop him and require two years' more residence, if this section were actually in force; and certainly it would be but reasonable that they should not; for if in a probation of five years, he was not identified in feeling with our community, it would be evident that he would never be identified—no more in two years longer than ten years longer, or fifty years longer! Why should it be different as relates to a person from Europe landing in New Orleans?

Why? The answer is obvious. It is because the electoral influence of the city is dreaded. The increase of the population of the city is becoming greater and greater every day; and it is apprehended under the influence of universal suffrage, the city will acquire sufficient force to wrest power from those that are dilapidating the public treasures. It ought to be sufficiently well known that if the denunciations hurled against naturalized citizens were well founded, and which it would be reasonable to presume I would comprehend at my advanced age and with a political experience of thirty years, I would be the last one to sustain them, in what I consider to be their just privileges, and which privileges could only be forfeited by an hostility to our institutions and a disregard of their duties as citizens. If they were pernicious to our institutions in a time of peace, or in a time of war, I certainly would not hesitate to sustain the interests of the land of my birth. It is not at my age that reason and judgment are seduced by the sudden inspirations of an extravagant and dangerous philanthrophy. To my experience, adopted citizens have uniformly conducted themselves in a manner which evidences that the interests of the country, that its prosperity and the perpetuation of its institutions are dear and sacred to them. The principal design in this determined hostility to adopted citizens, appears to have its chief weight in the prejudices of the country against the influence of the city by cutting off a large class of persons from the privilege of suffrage. And, I again repeat, that it is with astonishment and regret, I find my celleague from New Orleans promoting that object, without reflecting upon the secret designs of the country, at a moment when it is a question to make the number of electors the basis of representation. His attempt to sustain the section upon the ground, that the proposition is based upon a perfect equality between the citizen of New York or of Massachusetts arriving among us, and a person arriving from Europe has signally failed. It is evident that the latter has to undergo a probation of five years before he can be politically on the same footing with a native citizen, and if you require two years longer at the expiration of the five years, it is evident that the latter requisition operates with greater severity in one case than the other.

The framers of the present constitution, among whom I had the honor of being one in 1812, apprehended much less than you appear to do this foreign influence. They required as well from naturalized citizens as from native citizens a residence of but one year in the State and six months in the parish. Why were they so liberal? Because they knew from experience; an experience which was fully confirmed by the glorious events of the 8th January, 1815, that it did not require an indefinite period for strangers to become attached to our institutions and to peril all in their defence. It may be alleged that foreigners never make good citizens; that they are never attached to our institutions. This has been said and will be said again. But what do facts prove? What does history say? It denies emphatically all such allegations. Never has the tocsin of danger been sounded; never has the drum called patriots to arms, without foreigners hastening to your camps and enroling themselves in your companies before even they have their certificates of naturalization. They repair to the thickest of the fray; to the most exposed and dangerous positions and dispute in valor and in patriotism with the natives of the soil, the meed of the public praise. It would seem that love of liberty is inherent among the thousand and tens of thousands who seek an asylum from the despotisms of Europe. There are some nations, France for example, where the prosperity and advancement of the United States is a part and portion of the public impulse and the public feeling, and it would be almost ungrateful to attempt to repress that sentiment. Louis Phillipe, the citizen king and the profound and sagacious statesman, may have paid a visit to the young Queen of England to express to her his desire to preserve the peace of the world, but in great emergencies be fully persuaded that France and the United States are inseparable allies. There is no Frenchman who does not appreciate the secret hatred borne by England towards our republic, and does not participate with hearty good will in our dislike of England and her intermeddling policy. Authentic facts and glorious results are the evidence of reciprocal partiality for each other, between the United States and France. Neither the gold nor the machinations of England can arrest this mutual enthusiasm, not only between the good and virtuous of both countries, but even between the vicious and the depraved, even pirates; for we have the proof, that not all the gold of England could purchase the men under Lafitte, at Barrataria, but that even at the very risk of their lives as outlawed criminals, as soon as the fleets of England appeared off our shores they repaired at once to the American camp and offered their services in defence of the American cause. They abandoned their crimes for the purpose of contending against the natural enemy of the United States; and while they took the most dangerous positions on one side, the naturalized citizens on the other, marched in close and serried columns, to meet the common enemy and to drive him back. Wherever heroic deeds were to be done, pressed forward a naturalized citizen; your cannons were manned by them. In one place stood a St. Gème, the Achilles of the American army, defying danger and striking a blow for liberty; in another a Dominique Gou, a Garrigue Fleaujac, and a host of others, of whom Louisiana will ever be proud to rank among her citizens. Even the people of color who had sought refuge among us from St. Domingo, felt the general enthusiasm, and full of heroic courage they marched under the command of the brave Savorry, who stimulated them by the cry "March on, my friends, march on against the enemies of the country." And as in that solemn hour of death and of victory, there neither was on the field of honor distinctions of classes nor distinctions of languages; the hero of the day, the immortal Jackson pressed to his bosom that brave man, whose disinterested devotion had rendered him so formidable.

Can we cast a retrospective glance at the past—can we reflect and do justice to the services of foreigners—first in assisting us to achieve our independence and secondly in preserving it, and say that we really apprehend danger from their becoming citizens? No; it cannot be. Your hearts cannot dictate so odious an exclusion! It must proceed then, from the fear you entertain that the city will absorb the political power of the State, if you do not restrict her citizens, and deprive a large portion of them of the right of suffrage. But your fears of the city are illusory, and if they were not illusory, you should take no other than constitutional, legal and proper measures to avert the object of your terrors. Do not vaunt so much the talents and eloquence of the city, and be frank enough to admit, that your only design is to keep possession of the public treasury? It is that which induced you, on the one hand, to resist an uniform basis of representation—a basis founded on the electors; and on the other hand, it increases to decrease by every means the circle of suffrage in the city, although you do not choose to make war directly against the principle of universal suffrage. I consider the proposition before us as supported in a principle of Machiavelism, and it certainly can never receive my sanction.

Mr. Downs said, that he was totally opposed to the adoption of this section. His reasons were similar to those he had given when a similar principle of exclusion was under debate. The section was not clear, as it was, and he presumed went beyond the designs of its authors. At least an interpretation might be given to it still more exclusive and unjust. It might be understood as applying even to citizens who have been previously naturalized, and whose term of naturalization at the period of the final adoption of the new constitution had not reached the term of two years. In order to prevent that construction, he would propose an amendment that this section should be operative only in future cases of naturalization. He should, however, vote against the section, even if his amendment prevailed.

Mr. Soule said that before the Convention decided upon a matter which had given rise to so much discussion, he desired to submit a few observations and to show what were the grounds that would determine the vote he was about to give. I am opposed, said Mr. Soulé, to the original proposition of the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Claiborne) to the substitute offered by the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Guion) and also to the amendment of the member from Ouachita (Mr. Downs;) although if I thought it possible that either of the principal propositions would prevail, I would vote in favor of the amendment. Let it not be presumed that my opposition to those propositions is based upon the inconvenience that would result in attempting to carry them into practice. As a naturalized citizen, upon that point I shall be silent. I oppose them because they are repugnant to our institutions; and in saying this, I dare to hope that I am conforming to the legitimate desires of our common constituents, who appointed us their mandatories, that we might consult upon the great and fundamental principles of republican government, and not upon mere questions of temporary expediency, which germinate passion, and give rise to local animosities and bitter feelings of resentment.

Yes, Mr. President, I can solemnly aver that I was far from expecting that this Convention would disappoint the wishes of the people and controvert the very objects for which they called it into existence. No one questioned at the moment it convened that it would be a faithful exponent of the public wishes, and its panegyrists have told on several occasions since its convocation, that if there was an incontestible fact it was this: that the Convention could not express any thing else than the sentiments of the people—in a word, so great were the identity between the creature and the creator, that they were one and the same thing. Nothing, however, is more unfounded! But it would appear that in calculating the consequences of such an avowal, some have taken care to shield themselves under the pretext that it is impossible to take the will of the people as a guide for the proceedings of this body. Surprised, as I might well be, at such an avowal, I have listened with deep attention to the arguments of those that favor it; and I must say, in all sincerity, that I have heard nothing to sustain their position.

I am convinced more than ever, that the principles of the government under which we live consecrates the most perfect equality, and that this principle has its source in the common will of the masses, and therefore cannot be dependent upon the will of the few. I am, however, necessitated to declare that all the various efforts made here to induce,no matter what majority, to sanction a clause despoiling an entire class of our fellow citizens of their most precious and inestimable rights, by depriving them for two years of the rights of citizenship under the United States, convince me that if reason and justice be upon the side of those whose cause I maintain, the force of numbers in this Convention lies somewhere else, and it would seem that a disposition prevails to give a very different construction to the principles that constitute republican or popular governments.

Can any one believe, Mr. President, that such a proposition as the one embraced in the section before us would have been suggested had the late presidential struggle terminated differently? We are too prompt to cede to the weakness of humanity; too easy to fall under the dominion of our passions, and when they reign supreme, we are not reluctant to disregard the dictates of reason and of justice! And why? We are told of conformities! We are asked to sanction doctrines that have no other motive than temporary conformities. But I would ask, are we assembled here to yield our judgment to a temporary outcry against a portion of our citizens, which has been excited by the political defeat of one of the contending parties, and to legislate agreeably to the passions and feelings of the moment. Or are we here to treat of principles, and to settle the fundamental basis in accordance with republican principles? If the first be in fact, our object, we had better declare the Convention a permanent legislative body, for mere legislation is but the result of the occurrences of the day and of the common routine of human life, and to each event or modification of the political or social phases, we should provide an enactment. But if we are sincere in the desire to accomplish the only mission for which we are assembled, should we not first ascertain whether the measure proposed is consistent with fundamental principles.

It must be obvious, from the range and character of the functions pertaining to this body, that our mandate is a restricted one, and that it is clearly defined. The law under which we have assembled, declares formally that we are to consult upon but three measures of general utility to the State. As regards these measures, at least, we cannot exonerate ourselves from the responsibility imposed as well by the law itself, as by the will of the people. The abstract individual right of resisting the realization of these three great measures I concede; for the minority have their representatives here for the purpose of defeating them, inasmuch as the minority could not defeat the popular will in calling the Convention. I find nothing extraordinary in that desire on the part of the minority but what I find most extraordinary, and I may add most deplorable, is this, that the minority have by some means or other succeeded in converting themselves into the majority of this body, and have placed themselves in a position to defy the popular will and to defeat all expectations that this assembly will carry into effect the objects for which they were convened.

Inasmuch as the mandate calling this Convention is a restricted mandate, let us see what are the restrictions which are attached to it. It is first declared that the Convention shall extend the right of suffrage, that is, they shall give greater liberty to suffrage than was permitted in the old constitution. In vain have I sought in that instrument for any distinction in the privileges and in surities accorded to citizens, between native citizens and naturalized citizens. There is no such distinction, and I can very well conceive the reason. When that constitution was formed no one thought of the distinctions which certain persons are so desirous of creating at the present time, or if these distinctions were thought of, no one dared to mention them, as at that time the preponderence of the population were naturalized citizens, and such an attempt would have stifled in the bud. Such a line of demarcation in 1812 would have been considered an outrage—an odious attempt at proscription, and would not have been entertained for a single moment by any constituent body emanating from the people. It would have been striking a blow at the fathers of the very men who sat in that Convention—they would have been the first victims to the measure which is now before us for approval.

What, asked Mr. Soule, is the essential character of the government under which we live? Is it an aristocracy or a democracy that controls our destinies? Some might hesitate to reply pertinently to this question. I shall be candid enough not to hide any of my impressions. The democratic principle of which we boast, is not so absolute nor so general as to preclude all vestiges of aristocracy, and I must confess that in certain departments of our government, the senate for example,—when perhaps it may be prudent as one of the conservative principles upon which so much has been said in this body,—its traces are very visible. It pervades other portions of our system, unfortunately; but it must at least be conceded that above all our system of government, is a representative system of government, and that the first corollory is, who shall be represented? Is it not all the consistent portions of the people, or in other words, those that formed a portion of the political society at the formation of the government? That must necessarily be conceded, unless one portion of the people relinquish their political rights, and I even doubt whether they have that power; you cannot sacrifice them and prescribe them from equal political privileges with their peers, without overthrowing the very prinple upon which reposes the edifice of government.

Temporary expediencies have been invoked. But what is the nature of these temporary expediencies. To my mind, these expediencies smack of despotism—of the subserviency of the many to the few! I am yet to hear any valid reasons for these assumed expediencies. For 32 years, has the old constitution guaranteed the same privileges to native and adopted citizens, without distinction, and no one until now has ever complained of the inexpediency of placing the one and the other upon an equal footing. Assuredly, there must be some other motives—some other designs than those that are professed, and which it is endeavored to sustain by a reference to the abuses said to have existed at our last elections. Will any one tell me what connexion is there between those abuses and the question before us? These abuses are the results of some defects in the mode of carrying out the naturalization laws of the United States, a subject which is under the exclusive control of Congress—all power upon the subject of citizenship having been transferred by the States to the federal government. But what is the question before us? Is it to preclude improper naturalizations? Congress alone have control upon the subject. It is not this! What is it then? It is to deny the legal effects of naturalization in pursuance of the laws of the United States and of the decree of a competent court, and to suspend the operation for two years in the State of Louisiana. To state the proposition fairly is enough to show its partial and exclusive bearing!

My personal position as one of those belonging to the class of citizens whom it is proposed to proscribe and to mark with the seal of exclusion, forbids me from entering into the details of the question. But I may be permitted to ask, taking a general view of the measure as a high political question, whether it is conformable to the principles of justice, and whether it can be carried into effect without a violation of the supreme and superior law of the land—the laws of the federal government. They prescribe how citizenship shall be acquired, and these requisitions are exclusive of State control. A man once recognized as a citizen in pursuance of those laws cannot be compelled to forego the privileges that citizenship confers, no more for two years than for twenty years, or a total exclusion. His rights of citizenship once acquired are complete, and can neither be revoked nor suspended. If these privileges were not available as soon as acquired, the proud distinction conferred by the federal government would be a mockery and the person acquiring citizenship would be liable to be ousted from the privileges, or to have them interrupted or curtailed at the whim of our accidental majority.

But if this Convention, representing the sovereignty of the people of Louisiana, had this power, I doubt very much if the people would sanction its exercise. The people of Louisiana would not approve so great an outrage. They would repudiate it, and repulse it with scorn and indignation. The attempt to introduce it into the constitution shows how pernicious are political excitements and passions. They would transgress the fundamental principles of the government, and trample upon the equal rights of those who were so unfortunate as to fall under the ban of partizan displeasure.

There is no justice, said Mr. Soule, where there is not equality. Equality is the foundation of justice. What is the object of requiring residence to acquire citizenship? Is it not for the purpose of identifying the new-comer with the institutions of the country, and of familiarizing his mind with their operations? Well, if that be the intention, and assuredly there can be no other, why do you think that two years is sufficient for a native citizen from one of the other States, when you exact seven years for an European? Is not the five years amply sufficient, without exacting at the end of that period two years more for him to acquire all the information and all the attachment to the land he has chosen by preference, or by necessity, if you will, for his home and for his affections? There is not so great a disparity between the aptitude of one class of persons to understand republican institutions, and another class. The native has his patriotic impulses and his appreciation of the institutions of his country. But is that any reason why an adopted citizen should not be actuated by similar impulses, and governed by similar sentiments of love for a free government? Is the adopted citizen so devoid of intelligence and patroitism as to be insensible and indifferent to the interests of the government of his choice? He has left his native country to avoid persecution, or to better his condition; he comes to Louisiana, and after having resided honorably five years in the State, he asks and obtains his naturalization papers, presuming that they confer the privileges of citizenship; he approaches the ballot box to participate in the selection of those that administer the government, which imposes taxes and obligations upon him, and he is repulsed. He is told that he is not yet an American citizen, but that he must wait two years more, before he can exercise the privileges of citizenship.

But we have been told that a certain degree of intelligence is necessary to understand our institutions, and in this intelligence foreigners are wofully deficient. I deny there is more ignorance among the foreign emigrants, considered as a whole, than among the masses of our other population; or that there is less general aptitude in understanding our institutions. The truth is, that a perfect knowledge of government is confined to the smaller portions of society. Government is a science of reflection and observation, and has to be studied attentively. The theory of government is an abtruse matter, but the operation of government is felt by every one. Every man knows whether he enjoys more or less liberty, or is exposed to few or greater burthens. It is unnecessary to be profoundly versed in government to appreciate all this; one man feels results as well as another, although he may not clearly understand how these results are effected. As for guarantees of fidelity and attachment to the State, there is nothing to make an European less susceptible of these attachments than a New Yorker or a Bostonian. I claim no superiority in point of intelligence between the natives of our country and the natives of another. One community may possess more general knowledge, and may have made greater progress in the arts and sciences than another; but in all civilized countries the general aptitude for acquiring information is about equal; and a man from a foreign country is as capable of understanding the system of our government as the native of the soil—that is in the aggregate.

It is unfortunately but too true that frauds have taken place, and that our courts of justice have relaxed and enfeebled our laws; but can it be said with truth that our adopted citizens have sullied our institutions to a greater extent than native citizens? or that they have promoted, as a class, the evils which we all deplore? Facts will not bear out that assertion. I have in my possession a title, by which a miserable property in the third Municipality has been transferred to no less than eight hundred and seventy-five individuals, of whom two thirds at least are native Americans. But you may say that strangers also participated! I admit that they have. The great plotters, however, the manipulators of the electoral frauds, were not strangers! In virtue of what principle of justice will you wreak your vengeance—upon the instruments, while you suffer the authors to go unpunished.

I complain as much, and with as much justification, of the frauds that have been perpetrated as any one. I ask, with as much sincerity as any one, that measures be taken to arrest them; but I cannot consent that one constitution should be marked and blurred over with inequalities and exclusions, which would not in fact prevent frauds, but which would result in positive injustice and great individual wrong. Let us not then be impelled by sudden passion to do an act, which in momemts of calm reflection our judgements would condemn; and which in after time, when the present excitement shall have passed away, we should blush to find embodied in our organic law.

Mr. Downs observed that this section was entirely useless in any event; and in support of the opinion that if evils resulted from the naturalization laws, congress was both competent and appeared willing to apply the proper remedies. He read the report of the committee upon the judiciary of the senate of the United States, presented by Judge Berrien. The gentleman who made this report, belonged to the political party from whom the assaults upon adopted citizens came; but that gentleman had discarded all those wild and visionary notions of danger from naturalization, that have become of late so constant a theme of declamation.

Mr. Claiborne expressed astonishment that the member from New Orleans, (Mr. Marigny,) could imagine that he, Mr. Claiborne, would promote any scheme to cut off the just influence of the city. The absurdity of such a charge appeared upon its face. He certainly wished the city to possess her just weight. He again repeated he was not partial to any class in the community; they were all entitled to protection; but what he had insisted upon was, that the section was proper, inasmuch as it was calculated to arrest frauds and evasions on the eve of our political contests.

The question was taken on the amendment proposed by Mr. Downs, and it prevailed without a division.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the section, and the yeas and nays were called for.

Yeas—Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Cénas, Claiborne, C. M. Conrad, F. B. Conrad, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Grymes, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, W. B. Prescott, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, M. Taylor, R. Taylor, Trist, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder—42.

Nays—Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Downs, Eustis, Garcia, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Leonard, McCallop, McRea, Mariginy, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porche, Porter, W. M. Prescott, Preston, Ratliff, Read, W. B. Scott, T. W. Scott, Soulè, Splane, Stephens, Waddill and Wederstrandt—32.

Mr. Stephens moved to rescind the rule for evening sessions, and the yeas and nays were called for.

Yeas—Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Grymes, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Hynson, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Leonard, McCallop, Mazureau, Porche, Preston, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Kenner, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Soulè, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder—42.

Nays—Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent,

Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Eustis, Humble, Lewis, McRea, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Pugh, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Trist, Waddill, Wadsworth and Wikoff–30.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned until to-morrow at 11 o'clock, A. M.

FRIDAY, February 7, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and its proceedings were opened with prayer from the Rev. Mr. Warren.

On motion of Mr. SAUNDERS, the Committee on Apportionment were authorized to order such printing to be done as they deem essential.

Mr. PENN, who was absent yesterday at the moment of taking the vote upon the clause requiring that the residence of naturalized citizens should be counted from the date of their certificate of naturalization, asked leave to record his vote in the negative, which was granted.

On motion of Mr. RATLIFF, the committee on contingent expenses were authorized to pay each of the Convention printers $500, for subscriptions to their paper.

ORDER OF THE DAY.—Mr. ROMAN's proposition requiring a registration of the votes.

Mr. DOWNS moved that the following words be struck out, "the general Assembly shall provide by law, that the electors having the requisite qualifications, shall have their names enregistered in the parishes in which they respectively reside."

Mr. ROMAN said, that when he submitted to the consideration of the house the section now under advisement, he was, he would acknowledge, under the full belief that if there was a right which it behoved every member of this body to guard, and in the defence of which, all would unite, it was the right of suffrage—or in other words, the ballot box from the pretensions of those who could not approach it without violating its purity. Notwithstanding this, the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. DOWNS) asked that the words expressing the most efficacious mode, and, in fact the only means left us to secure so desirable a result should be stricken out. And, what are the reasons that he vouchsafes to sustain this demand? None, that he has as yet chose to declare! I hope, (continued Mr. ROMAN) that the Convention will not sanction that motion, but that they will adopt the section as it is.

Should we decide differently, the people will think that we have made no fitting return for their confidence, and will only find in the decision we have taken upon sufferage a momentary and imperfect proceeding, in place of protecting suffrage we have abandoned it to caprices and passions of parties. Each time that a man votes who is not possessed of the qualifications required, it is evident that he destroys the effect of a legal vote, and that the legal vote by this is deprived of the right of suffrage. And, as whatever is true in regard to a single individual, is true in regard to a number of individuals, it results that an entire election may be vitiated by the violations that paralyzed the weight of the legal voters.

Who among us, (continued Mr. Roman) would authorize, I do not say by doctrines, but by his silence, so great an abuse upon the elective franchise? There is on the contrary none that would not put a stop to them. There is, I repeat, but one way of avoiding the recurrence of these disgraceful transactions in our elections, and that is by a registration, in pursuance of the constitution, where the names of electors would figure a sufficient length of time before the election—giving every proper facility to inquire whether each individual aspiring to the privilege of suffrage, has the qualifications required by law, and that on reference to the roll, the commissioner of election would have an unerring guide of the votes they ought to receive.

Let us examine, said Mr. ROMAN, whether the opposition of the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. DOWNS) is founded upon any serious and valid reasons, and as that gentleman has not seen fit to inform me what are his reasons, I am forced necessarily to infer them. Is it because he thinks we should not embody in our constitution that which is not to be found in the constitutions of any of the States in the Union. I would reply to this, that it is not fair to refute by analogy a measure purely local. There is not a State in the Union whose population is as mixed as ours; there is not a State where there are as many strangers constantly arriving from every clime—there is not a State where the election laws have been violated to so great an extent; and it therefore becomes necessary to distinguish the electors from those who are not. But, if it be said, that this provision is consecrated in no constitution, it may be replied, that admitting this be so, it is sanctioned by the laws of several of the States; for example, by Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, where it has been in vigor for nearly fifty years, and where it has been found fully to answer the designs of a wise policy. Never are frauds and violations upon the ballot box spoken of, comparable to the frauds and violations in this State. Why not adopt the same means to arrive at the result?

Will it be contended that the measure proposed is applicable only to large cities, and therefore it ought not to find its place in a general constitution? When a measure has been found, not only useful but absolutely necessary, we should not fear to embody it in the fundamental law; we should rather fear to submit it to the legislature which often may be vacillating and undecided. Our legislature has been thirty-two years in existence and has taken no steps—not even the most remote, upon the subject, although it certainly was of sufficient importance to attract attention; and judging of the future by the past, it is indubitable the legislature will do nothing to guard the ballot box, unless constrained by the constitution.

But is it true that this measure is alone necessary in large cities? To respond to this question affirmatively, it would be necessary to deny that there are any frauds committed in the country. It is notorious that ficticious property has been assigned to individuals in order to enable them to vote under the restriction of the old constitution, requiring property qualification, and this property qualification being dispensed with in the new constitution, frauds may be committed in reference to citizenship and to residence. It may be that the frauds to which I have alluded are neither as extensive nor as great as has been represented. I have no intention in alluding to them other than to show by notorious facts that the proposed measure is no less necessary to the country than the city.

It has been assumed that nothing is easier in the country than for the spectators at an election to know who are legal voters, and who are not, and that, therefore, an enrolment of the names of the voters would be troublesome and expensive—and besides unnecessary. I admit, that in some of the parishes this reciprocal knowledge exists, but it might happen that the votes objected to by the minority of the parish might be received by the majority for the purpose of increasing their vote—and that the inspectors might not refuse these votes. As for the expense, that would be a mere trifle—certainly not to be taken in consideration with the importance of preserving the purity of the ballot box! The duty of making this registration might be confided to any suitable public officer—to the assessors for example who in their rounds might take down the names of the legal voters. This task would be easier as the assessors would be well acquainted, from the nature of his duties, with the resident population. A justice of the peace or other magistrate might be invested with the power of examining the list; seeing that it was posted up at the most public places in the parish, and in a word, to carry out all the details required by law. Admitting that for the purpose of having this duty properly performed, it were necessary to expend a certain amount of the public money, which could not but be trifling in amount, would not the public good amply justify it?

I do not think, said Mr. Roman, that it is a fair objection to urge the omissions and errors that sometimes may occur in the assessment roll of taxes. The assessment roll, in the country parishes, is affixed only at the court-house door, but the list of voters might be placed at every public place, and so promulgated as to meet the eye of every citizen; and if, in the case of taxes, it is a matter of little moment whether an individual contributes a little more or a little less to the taxes, it is a matter of greater interest that each qualified voter should secure his right of suffrage, and no voter who valued that privilege would be found delinquent or indifferent. In the first instance the loss is not a matter of much consideration; but the second is of essential consequence, and may affect the political portion of the State, in reference to divergent opinions and conflicting ascendencies. Moreover, the zeal which would animate every citizen to vote himself, not only in favor of his own political predilections, but also to secure the votes of those entertaining similar opinions, would secure the enregistration, not only of the legal voters, but many that were not.

I would further remark that in the law, in virtue of which we are assembled, it is provided that the eighth section of the second article be so amended as to fix and determine, in a more specific manner, the qualifications of all persons exercising the right of suffrage. What has been done up to this day, in relation to the first duty assigned us in this section? We have abolished the property qualifications on the one hand, and extended the time of residence on the other. Is this sufficient? I answer emphatically no! It is indispensable to give to the inspectors the means of distinguishing who are the legal voters from those who are not. It is apparent that the only efficacious means is enregistration, yet nevertheless it is opposed. Will the gentleman propose something better? It is evident that the purity of the ballot box should be maintained; I trust there is no difference of opinion, at least, upon this point; and if it is to be maintained what other plan can be so effectual, especially in a densely populated city, thronged with transient persons. How can we pretend that we have discharged our duty, if incurring the former difficulties and aggravating the abuses that heretofore have existed, in extending the circle of suffrage, we do not provide some effectual checks to restrain suffrage to those to whom it has been judged fit to extend it. Can we base our omissions of this duty upon the plea that we have an apprehension of imposing restrictions, and that we should not put the people to the slightest inconvenience? But what is a little inconvenience? or what are a few indispensable restrictions, in comparison with the public safety, and with the respectability and purity of our elective system? We cannot hide from ourselves the fact, that the frauds committed in this State upon that system, have become a bye word of reproach, and that it would indeed be discreditable to our reputation as a member of the federal union, and as a proud and chivalric State; if this Convention be suffered to complete its labors without imposing an effectual barrier against similar recurrences; I hope then the Convention will not hesitate to pass the section I have proposed. I have but one object in view, and that is to protect the rights of every citizen of the State.

Mr. Downs said it was not without powerful, and to his mind conclusive reasons, that he had moved to strike out the principal portion of the section under consideration; and inasmuch as he had been asked to give his reasons, he would briefly submit them.

In the first place, it was a safe rule to establish nothing in this constitution which did not involve an indispensable principle, and he (Mr. Downs) doubted much whether there was any uniformity of opinion as to what a law of registration was. Each one would interpret the meaning according to his own judgment. Each one would give to it the application which he judged to be the most fitting; and we would, in effect, be establishing an indefinite and doubtful registration. But to this, it may be answered, that the legislature will define the power. If the legislature will do this, where is the necessity for incorporating it in the constitution? The legislature will be fully competent, in the exercise of their judgment, not only to decree the principle as effectually as it could be done in the constitution, but also to carry out the details. A change of circumstances may occasion a change of ideas; and it is for the legislature to be governed by the necessities that may exist. Our mission here is to establish the fundamental principles of government; not to decree upon matters of temporary expediency. Moreover, this section, if adopted, would be nothing more than an injunction; and suppose the legislature should not think proper to conform to it, what will enforce obedience to this injunction?

Far be it from me to justify any of the frauds which it has been alleged has been committed, and which, no doubt, have been committed. I abhor them with all my soul; and I should indeed be gratified if a termination could be put to them. I would have them feretted out and exposed to public indignation; and I very much regret that one branch of the legislature that has taken up the subject, should have confined the examination to one particular parish, instead of making it general to every parish where the commission of frauds have been charged. I would not have this investigation confined at all—I would not restrict it to any particular party, or any particular individuals, but I would make it general and would submit all to the same rigid examination. There are several parishes where these frauds have been committed, and they have been committed to a greater extent in New Orleans.

Mr. Roman: I did not say that frauds had been committed in a particular parish. I said they had been suspected in that parish, and measures had been taken to expose them. This was a matter of public notoriety, and as such I stated it.

Mr. Downs: Be that as it may; I alluded in general terms to the frauds that have been signalized by popular rumor. I consider, I repeat, all such desecrations of the ballot box as a sacrilege committed upon our political institutions; for the corruption of the ballot box necessarily involves the corruption of our institutions, and will taint them until they become one mass of putridity. Those who commit them should be proceeded against with all the rigors of offended and outraged justice. But while I reprehend all frauds, and am solicitous to preclude them, I cannot give my sanction to any measure that will deprive or put to trouble and inconvenience, a large number of legal voters; and the result of which will be, by subtleties and distractions, to give rise to greater frauds than those it was intended to avert. How are our elections, in fact, now managed? Each party have at the polls their challenging committees. In doubtful cases oaths are administered and questions are asked. What can be suggested of greater force than this scrutiny of parties, and the zeal manifested to reject or admit a vote as it may be favorable to the one or the other political party? Should it be abandoned and a preparatory list be relied upon as decisive of the qualifications of the persons seeking to vote? would it be the elector who would have to hunt up the person authorised to enregister the name, or would it be the duty of the latter to draw up the voters in order that their names might be recorded? This cause would have a direct tendency to facilitate frauds, and to establish them on a greater and more extended scale. The officers to be appointed to this particular duty, of taking down the names, no matter what particular officer, would necessarily belong to one or the other of the great contending parties, and would not in every instance be proof against the temptation of placing names not entitled to suffrage, upon the list, and excluding those that were entitled to suffrage, who were known to be opposed to his political party; and as this proceeding would be secret, as far as possible, and the public would not be able to comprehend its extent, the ballot box, instead of being protected by the vigilance of the two parties, and by the spectators present at an election, would be subject to the entire control of one or two officers. Would that be wise or politic?

Mr. C. M. Conrad hoped that the Convention would not adopt the proposition of the delegate from Ouchita, (Mr. Downs.) It was a matter beyond dispute that frauds have been committed upon our elections to a great extent, and the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) mis-aprehended the delegate from St, James, (Mr. Roman,) when he supposed these frauds were confined to a solitary parish. Frauds have been committed to a greater or less extent all over the State. Their extent and their degrees of enormity have varied with the local position of the different parishes, and with circumstances. They have scarcely been observable in places where the population was small, and they have been multiplied and carried out in all their ramifications where the population was numerous. Accordingly, they have been most rife in the city, where the opportunities and the material was found to exist in a greater degree. I do not wish to reflect upon the city, which I have the honor, in part, of representing; but it is to show that I am impartial in reference to all evasions of our electoral laws; and because it is necessary to admit the evil, in order to insist upon the remedy.

In the first ward of the first Municipality, at the last election, a much greater number of votes were received than were dreamed of; some two hundred or three hundred more. My colleague, (Mr. Benjamin,) also a resident of the same ward, thinks that the number of illegal votes was not as great as I have stated, but I do not think I have over estimated them. By whom were these votes created? It is fair to infer, by one or both of the political parties. I do not except either; and far be it from me to attach greater blame to the democratic party than to the whig party. I believe both are culpable; and it is useless and worse than useless to criminate and re-criminate. Every well thinking man should be impressed with the necessity of arresting these evils—as none can deny their existence. Many of those that cast their suffrages at the last election could not now be found by all the vigilance of the police. They have dissappeared from the city; some are in Europe; some in the western States, and some in the eastern States: in Canada, in Texas, and every where else. They never were residents of our city; merely temporary sojourners. It was very difficult to prevent illegal votes from being cast, under our laws. Some would escape the vigilance of challenging committees, and would be received. The individuals themselves, in some instances, were not aware of their total want of capacity to vote, and would approach the ballot box under the full conviction that they were entitled to suffrage, when in point of fact they were not. Mr. Conrad instanced some examples within his knowledge. The abuse of suffrage was certainly one of the greatest evils that threatened the durability of a representative system of government. The political power of the State should be confined to those to whom that power was assigned, for good and valid reasons. It ought to be restricted to those having a permanent interest in our institutions, be it a pecuniary interest, the love of country, or attachments to the peculiar institutions of the State. A man who steals a loaf of bread to gratify the cravings of hunger, or a coat to cover himself, is punished with the greatest rigor of the law; but a man who steals the important right of suffrage—for it is a theft for a man to vote, knowing that he has no right to vote—escapes without punishment, for the fine is seldom, if ever, inflicted; and yet I hold, said Mr. Conrad, the purloining of the privilege of suffrage to be one of the greatest offences that can be perpetrated upon our institutions. It directly affects their stability, and brings our system of government into reproach. Every invasion of the right of suffrage, is a crime that every well thinking man should stigmatise and desire to see punished effectually. I should rather see a purloiner of the right of suffrage sent to the penitentiary, than a poor miserable devil who had committed a common petty larceny.

But if punishments are not to be inflicted or enforced for violations of the elective franchise, let us at least attempt to preclude the recurrence of these outrages. The necessity for some efficacious remedy is apparent. What remedy shall we apply? I know of none that would be as effectual as the propositition of the delegate from St. James (Mr. Roman) and I therefore give it my hearty concurrence.

The gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) has complained that some investigation into the frauds that have been committed is not sufficiently general; that it is restricted to one particular parish. For the sake of consistency these examinations should not be partial; but after all, I very much doubt their efficacy. These are something like an expost mortem examination. They may call our attention to the particular malady that afflicts the body politic, but for any other purpose they are perfectly useless. And even in this they fail to leave any practical effect. They arouse and embitter political animosities, and keep up political excitement. I repeat, they are worse than useless. It is evident from the experience of the past that some safe-guard is needed for the protection of suffrage. Let us not debate, or waste our time in alledged frauds; we know the allegations to be true, that frauds are committed, and we should devise some effectual check in our organic laws. It seems to me that this subject is worthy of all our attention, and all our solicitude; there is no mode so effectual of publicity as the registration of the votes, and it will supply to the inspectors of election a similar guide as the assessment roll—they will be deprived of that guide, and we should substitute something in its place.

But says the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) the section does not define in terms sufficiently explicit the mode of enrollment. This is not the object of the section. It is not designed to confuse and embarrass the details. These will properly be an object of legislative consideration. There is no penalty prescribed for omitting to act upon the registration, and the legislature, says that gentleman, may do as they please. So may they do in reference to several other principles adopted in this constitution. In the first place, it is not presumable that they will neglect to carry out the principles of the constitution—principles which they are sworn to observe and to execute. But, whether they violate their duty and their oath or not, it cannot be urged as an objection to our perfecting the work assigned us. I repeat, it is not likely they will refuse to carry out the provisions of the constitution, but if they do, that will be a matter between them and their constituents. We shall have discharged our duty upon a very essential and vital subject. As for the penalty consequent upon refusing or neglecting to be placed upon the enrollment, it is embodied in the section itself, which prescribes that no one shall be considered a duly qualified voter unless his name appear upon the register. This will be the most effectual way to carry out the law that the legislature may make into complete execution. The omission of this penalty has been severely felt in other States of the Union, that have adopted a similar plan, and experience has suggested to the delegate from St. James to supply the omission.

As for what the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) has told us, that this enrollment of the qualified voters will be but a secret system, subject to great abuses, it is evident that the member has consulted rather his imagination than his judgment. How can he suppose that the law will not be so framed as to guard against all partialities. Moreover, it will not be contemplated to give to the officer any control. Any person may have his name placed upon the list, but the list will be subjected to the inspection of all the citizens, and if any name be found thereon subject to doubt as to the qualification, some judicial officer will be charged to investigate the grounds of opposition and to pronounce upon it after hearing the party and his testimony. The ridicule consequent upon the publicity of the proceedings will deter those having no right to vote, from causing their names to be placed upon the register; and thus the register will be found to contain few, if any names, to which objection may reasonably be made.

The delegate from Ouachita has referred to another objection. He apprehends that the electoral franchise will be compromitted by other proceedings; I consider the right of suffrage to be much more endangered by the existing system. How many persons have voted in our elections that had no right to vote, while in the tumult and confusion that have reigned about the polls, a multitude of legal electors have been excluded from their right of suffrage.

The necessity for enrollment has been compared, with a view of making it odious, to a passport. I do not consider that there is any thing degrading in being registered as an American citizen, fully entitled to participate in all rights appertaining thereto. A list of the electors is a list of the citizens of the State, in which any one might be proud to find his name. If it be objected that the enrollment in the country is unnecessary, and that can be sustained, I have no objection to restrict the operations of the measure to incorporated towns. The indolent, the vicious, the floating population, do not repair to the country. There is no way for them to get along there. But they congregate in our large towns, principally in the limits of New Orleans, where they lead a precarious existence and are willing to sell themselves to the highest bidder. To relieve the city of New Orleans from the influence of such persons, if it be deemed not essential to provide a registration law in the country, I do think that the section under consideration is most material, and I am solicitous to secure its advantages for the city.

Mr. Ratliff considered that the proposition as it related to the country, was entirely unnecessary. The inhabitants in each electoral precinct knew each other, and would not suffer strangers to vote among them. He was not prepared to say that it was not necessary for the city of New Orleans. But to cover the whole subject, he would propose a substitute to the following effect, "that laws be passed to define explicitly the rights of citizens entitled to suffrage under the present constitution."

Mr. Brent said, he could vote neither for the proposition of the gentleman from St. James, (Mr. Roman) nor for the substitute of the gentleman from Feliciana, (Mr. Ratliff.) I cannot consent that the legislature shall have the power of controlling the elective franchise, which being the constituent principle of the popular sovereignty, should not depend upon the legislation of a body that is subjected to the influence of the ephemeral successes of party. It is the constitution itself that should define all that appertains to the exercise of suffrage, and who should enjoy that right; and when once it is defined, it should not be in the power of the legislature to contract it, or to throw obstacles in the way of its free and uninterrupted exercise. There is no necessity for conferring authority upon the legislature to adopt this inconvenient system of enrollment, and the only motive which I can conceive for pressing it so earnestly upon the Convention, is that it may be the pretext for restricting the right of suffrage and defeating one of the most important measures that we were called upon to consummate.

The decision upon another odious restriction, yesterday, affecting this very same right of suffrage, convinces me that any proposition to contract suffrage, and to fetter its free exercise, will meet with a favorable reception in this body. I say this with pain and mortification, and I may add, that great as the triumph of the people in the final achievement of the measure of calling a Convention was, their disappointment will be as great to find that their earnest expectations of adequate reforms will not be realized through this body. Those who have been chosen to carry out the popular will in some instances appear to have forgotten their mission, and to have united with the smaller number of restrictionists in controlling the action of this body; it is in this way, that the objects for which the Convention were called are to be defeated, or if partially accomplished, to be saddled with so many exclusions and conditions as to make the result of little or no benefit to the people. We have so far made but little progress in the great work assigned to us, and yet we find fetters and restrictions in all that we have done. To such an extent has this unfortunate spirit been carried, that it has become almost a matter of indifference with those that have opposed it from the beginning, whether it be continued on to the end—that restriction be piled upon restriction until there be but one general system of restriction, which when submitted will be indignantly repudiated by the people, and be consigned to everlasting reproach.

Upon every occasion when the popular prerogatives have been involved, we have been told of the abuses of suffrage and the frauds that have been committed upon the ballot box, as if we were not fully instructed as to the existence of these frauds and the causes of these frauds. No one can abhor violations of the right of suffrage more than I. But it may well be questioned how far the existing restrictions have not contributed towards these frauds, and the irregularities that have occurred; and if they have had that effect, what are we to expect from more tyrannical restrictions of the elective franchise? Assuredly, this measure of emolument will not preclude frauds. On the contrary, it will hazard the right of the legal voter to suffrage, and will promote fraud rather than prevent it. Wherever a similar plan has been tried it has been found necessary to repeal it; it has germinated the most stupendous frauds. It is very easy to perceive the license it gives to illegal voting; the list of names is omnipotent; the inspectors of elections are but mere automatons, as far as they possess the right of interrogating and discovering whether the person offering to vote is a legal voter; they are pointed to the list—if the name be there he votes, if it be not there he cannot vote, although he can prove on the spot that he is a legal voter. Whether the name be there or not depends upon one, two or three individuals; they may refuse to put down the name of a legal voter, and put down the names of a hundred illegal voters—to subserve some party object. These few individuals are constituted into a star chamber, an inquisition, whose powers are unbounded over the right of suffrage.

I do not know what particular mode will be devised to call up the voters to get their names placed upon this oracular list. In the city of New Orleans it may be by the beat of the drum; but in the country, in those parishes where the population is sparse, and plantations are distant from each other from five to ten miles, and from the court house fifty or sixty miles, it will be difficult, if not impossible, for the inhabitants generally, to conform to this arbitrary rule; and yet if their names are not on the list, they are to be deprived of their right of suffrage, the fundamental right of every American citizen, and one which it never should be in the power of any one to control or preclude.

Mr. Claiborne said, he certainly would never sanction any principle that would deprive a legal voter of his right of suffrage. If the proposition would have that effect in his conception, he never would sustain it. He was not prepared to say that it would not be attended with some inconvenience in the country. Of this, gentlemen from the country were the most competent judges, and he was ready to accede to their wishes in that respect. But for the city, he considered this measure indispensable, and that it could not be attended with any inconvenience worth mentioning. Unless it were adopted, each municipality electing separately its representation to the legislature and its local officers, it would be very easy for persons to pass over from one municipality to the other, and vote in the municipalities in which they did not reside. A regular system of what was called "colonization," could be carried on by political parties. The only way to prevent this was by a list of all the legal voters—excluding no one that was a legal voter, but enabling the inspectors to decide who were actual residents and legal voters. His object went no further than to prevent evasions and frauds, and to secure suffrage to those really entitled to it.

As for the objection, that it is degrading for an American citizen to have his name enrolled upon this list, I think it, (said Mr. Claiborne,) frivolous. We have our names called over by the secretary every morning as members of this Convention, and no one thinks that degrading. So far from there being any degradation in being enrolled as an American citizen, I think it an honor, of which any man might well be proud.

Mr. Mayo said, Mr. President—I am willing to go as far as any member of the Convention to sustain any measure to prevent frauds at elections. But I do not think that the provision of the section which it is now proposed to strike out, will have a tendency to effect that object; on the contrary, I think its tendency will be to multiply them.

Those parts of the constitution that relate to the elective franchise will have to be construed by commissioners of elections who are seldom lawyers, but who, on the contrary, are men not in the habit of construing constitutional law. Hence it is necessary to make all laws upon that subject as plain and intelligible as possible. The more we multiply constitutional and other provisions upon the subject, the more doubts and uncertainties will arise in their interpretation; and the provision now under consideration is peculiarly calculated to produce that result. Let us examine its provisions. It provides that a "registration shall be made at least three months before every general election of all the qualified voters of the State in the several parishes in which they actually reside."

By the 8th section, which we have adopted, it is provided that a residence of two years in the State and one year in the parish, shall entitle a person to vote. I supposed, sir, that that section settled the time that was to be required of a voter; but this, (probably without intending it) will require an additional residence of three months in the parish and State, in all cases where its apparent intention cannot be evaded. The registry must be made three months before every general election, and by the last clause of the section presented, it is provided that "no person shall be entitled to vote" "except his name shall have been recorded in the last registry." Now, sir, it is apparent that as the voter's name cannot be registered until he has resided two years in the State and twelve months in the parish in which he offers to vote, and the registry must be made three months before every general election, that three month's residence will be required by virtue of the registration law, in addition to the two years in the State and one year in the parish, which is required before the registry is made. There is in this a plain and palpable conflict between the two sections. Commissioners of elections cannot be expected to make uniform decisions upon these conflicting provisions. One set of commissioners will decide, that section 8th as adopted, being unequivocal and plain, will entitle a person to vote, who at the time of offering his vote, has resided two years in the State, and one year in the parish. Another set of commissioners will decide that the name of the person offering to vote must appear on the registry, and that the residence required must have expired at least three months before the election, as required by the registry clause. There can be no doubt in my mind but that the section now offered will require a residence of twenty-seven months in the State and fifteen months in the parish, instead of the time required by the 8th section; or it will extend a right to vote to all persons, whose names may be registered, though they may have removed from the State since the registry of their names. But will the registry clause have a tendency to prevent frauds? It appears to me that it will not; but that, on the contrary, it will open a door to very numerous frauds. All persons whose names will be found on the last registry will claim a right to vote, notwithstanding they may have removed out of the State permanently before the election; and this right unintentionally, I suppose, appears to be granted by the registry clause. This certainly opens a door to fraud; so far as it would be construed to permit a person to vote after removing from the State. Another objection, sir, to this provision has struck me as being peculiarly entitled to consideration. It is that it is calculated to confer power upon the political party that may have the ascendancy in the legislature when the registry law may be made. It cannot be denied, that the legislature is always composed of different political parties; such has always been the case, and probably always will be; and each of those parties is always striving to perpetuate its power. The registry law if made will be made by the party in the legislature that may at the time of making it, be in the ascendancy. The appointment of registers will be made from the party who at the time may be in power. The registers will be party men. The duration of their offices will depend upon the will of a party---and they will probably be appointed to hold their offices, as coroners now do, during the pleasure of the appointing power, whether it be the legislature or the governor. They will be located in districts to suit the convenience of the friends of the party appointing them. All the means to effect the registry will be party means; it will all be moved by party machinery, and the ends to be obtained wil lbe party ends. And, sir, I think we may safely predict a wo to the party that may be in the minority in the legislature at the time of making the registry law. In addition to this, sir, it will be extremely inconvenient to voters in the country to get their names registered. The office of the register will necessarily be remote from many of the citizens, and they must all, previous to every general election, leave their work and business and travel some 10, 20 or 40 miles to the register's office to have their names registered. They get there and find that the register is absent. They must return home without accomplishing their object. To return a second time for the purpose will be more than they desire to do, and more than they probably will do, and their right to vote will be lost. Men will have a repugnance at having to acquire a right to vote at such a price, and the business part of them, at least, instead of spending the time and going to the trouble that will be necessary to entitle them to exercise the right, will stay at home and attend to their business. It was suggested by the honorable member from St. James, (Mr. Roman,) who has no doubt passed in review a favorite mode of registry: that the register could sit in his office and in a few hours make up a registry of the voters in his district. This, he no doubt could do, but it must be remembered, that this register is likely to be a party man; if so, he will be more likely to think of the names of those in his district who he thinks will vote with his party, than of those who will vote against it. This is natural, and arises from the frailty of the nature of man. In politics men desire to think their party right. This induces a belief and they believe accordingly. If any were left off from the list that ought to be upon it, it would be likely to be those who would vote against the party to which the register belonged. If any were put on the list that ought not to be on it, it is reasonable to suppose that the greatest number of such would be the friends of the political party of the register. It was further suggested, that after the register had completed his list, he could have it examined by a justice of the peace, or other officer, which would be a sufficient guaranty of its accuracy. I do not think this would be very effectual. Officers are not fond of criticising the acts of each other, and the registry would be more likely to be approved, as a matter of course, than to be critically examined and corrected.

In conclusion, sir, I will remark, that we have already removed the cause of a large portion of the frauds at elections, by removing the property qualifications, and I do not think the present provision calculated to remove the cause of others, but to increase them.

Mr. C. M. Conrad thought the apprehensions of the member from Catahoula, (Mr. Mayo) chimerical. Every person asking to be enregistered would be enregistered; he might even send his name. The enregistration would be pro forma. But whether the name enregistered should remain, would depend upon the fact whether it was that of a qualified voter. The list of all the names would be exposed to public inspection, and if there were any about whom there was any doubt a proper legal investigation would be had before some magistrate appointed for that particular purpose, and the evidence would be heard for and against, and upon that evidence would the decision be made. The enregistration could not not be prostituted to any party purpose. Its only object would be to protect the ballot box; to secure suffrage to those entitled to it, and to preclude persons not entitled to it, from voting.

Whether this particular proposition to register the names of the qualified voters was feasible in some of the parishes without great inconvenience, he (Mr. Conrad) did not pretend to determine. It might very well be obnoxious to the objections that have been urged by some of the delegates. But he was convinced of its expediency and its usefulness in the city of New Orleans, and that it could be carried into execution with but little trouble and without detriment to the right of suffrage.

The gentleman from Catahoula had alluded to some conflict between this section and the 8th section of the 2d article, which had been adopted. If this conflict actually existed after adopting the present section, it would be in the power of the Convention to reconsider the 8th section, and make both conform.

Mr. Ratliff announced that he would withdraw his proposition for the present, and took occasion to repeat his objections to the section offered by the delegate from St. James, (Mr. Roman.)

Mr. Miles Taylor argued that this proposition to register the names of the voters would have no beneficial effect, while it might be a source of some trouble and inconvenience. He thought it unnecessary, because the frauds which it was assumed it would prevent, were already precluded. In fact what gave rise to these frauds? It was first the requisition in the old constitution that property was essential to suffrage. We have done away with this property qualification, and in lieu of it we require a longer residence; and by the adoption of the proposition yesterday, we prevent the effects of any frauds upon the naturalization laws by requiring two years' citizenship. We have thus struck at the root of the evil. The frauds employed to evade the constitutional provision of taxable property to secure suffrage will no longer be made, because suffrage does not depend upon property—therefore we effectually put a stop to them. We have provided for residence, and finally arrested the next most prolific source of fraud, naturalizations made with a view to operate upon the result of immediate elections; for such naturalizations will no longer be of any service to political parties. The only remaining matter which may be an object of evasion is residence; we have required two year's residence for suffrage, but this may be avoided, and persons may vote before they have acquired that residence. I think that if we strike out from the section the requisition upon the legislature for a registry law, and retain that part which requires that persons shall offer their votes in the parishes in which they reside, and no where else; and in cities in the particular wards of their residence; by multiplying electoral precincts, we shall have done all that it is possible for us to do to accomplish the design of guarding the ballot box. The people themselves at the several election precincts, will be able to prevent non-residents from voting, and this will be found much more effectual in fulfilling the essential of residence than a registry of the votes proposed by three or four persons, who may abuse their power, and debase it to party purposes.

Mr. Downs said, that the only effect of a registry law in Louisiana would be a repetition at our elections of the same frauds which occurred in New York and Philadelphia under the regime of a similar law. The clubs and political associations of both parties in the three months preceeding our elections would be sedulously engaged in getting names of persons upon the list upon whose votes they could rely; and when the list was finally made out, a regular system of intrigue and corruption might be employed to influence and control the votes of a majority upon the list.

Secret agents might be sent out to tamper with the voters, to coerce some and to seduce others. Our elections would become objects of corruption, and in place of fraud being repressed, it would be strengthened and placed in a commanding position, with absolute sway over the decrees of the ballot box.

Mr. Claiborne suggested that it might be better to lay the section on the table, in order to reflect further upon the subject, and so to amend it, to make it unexceptionable in its operation if it were really defective.

Mr. Grymes said he was opposed to postponing action upon the section, because in this way we would be accumulating our duties instead of getting through with them. This question was not over difficult of solution, and surely the long debate to which it had given rise was not at all necessary to elucidate its merits or point out its defects.

I consider, said Mr. Grymes, that a registry law should not be embodied in the constitution, and this not because I conceive it to be a restriction upon the popular will, which certain persons would so enlarge as to make any practicable system of government utterly impossible; but because it is unnecessary, it is unsuited to the country and useless in the city, and is, moreover, nothing more than a simple matter of legislation, as much within the competency of the legislature without a constitutional provision, as if there were a thousand constitutional provisions.

It is a maxim of jurisprudence, that the innocent should not suffer because it is necessary to punish the guilty. This maxim is equally applicable to legislation. Under the pretext of punishing the fraudulent—those not entitled to suffrage, a thousand freemen and laboring men would be precluded their right of suffrage. So whose benefit would this provision enure? Who would be the first to enregister their names? Partizans, indolent persons—persons who expected to sell their votes, and all others of a similar class; while the farmer, and the hard-working artizan would either forget or neglect through the press of his occupation to present himself in time, and would suffer the penalty of exclusion. This ought not to be. It cannot be done without great injustice. And, moreover, what is the essential difference between three inspectors of election to decide upon the qualifications of persons offering to vote, and three persons authorized to receive and register the names of the voters? Does it not amount, practically, to the same thing, as far as the prevention of frauds is concerned? Is it to be supposed that the latter would be a greater check than the former? I do not believe it. There will always be persons ready to corrupt at elections, and frauds will more or less be employed to effect the result. The only thing that can be done is to determine with precision the qualifications necessary to suffrage, and to make these qualifications conform to the exigencies of our position.

I certainly cannot vote for a principle that would operate with great severity upon a numerous class of legal voters, because I may be told it will prevent illegal voting, which I do not think it will affect.

Mr. C. M. Conrad proposed to strike out the words "in the several parishes in which they may reside," and to substitute the following, "residing in cities and villages that are incorporated or may be incorporated."

Mr. Benjamin expressed himself in favor of the section as it was presented. Experience has demonstrated the necessity for a registry law, and another striking consideration why such a measure is indispensable, and which has not been urged in this debate, is that the Convention has sanctioned the principle that elections in this State shall be concluded in one day. How will it be possible in this city, divided even as it is into wards, to receive all the votes, if contests arise and have to be decided in the uusual way before the inspectors? It will be out of the question; and it will be in the power of a minority, at will, to prevent the result of an election, or to prejudice it. Many citizens will be precluded from voting; every voter who is a member of the party that may be supposed to be in the ascendancy may be challenged as to his right of voting by members of the opposite party, and every device may be employed to procrastinate and defeat the reception of particular kinds of votes. It is because I fear this result, said Mr. Benjamin, and because I think with the senatorial delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Grymes) that the right of an American citizen to suffrage ought not to be compromitted, that I am in favor of the section. Without intending to accuse one political party or justify the other, I would invoke the voice of public notoriety, whether it is not a matter of constant occurrence at our elections, that there are continual contests as to the right of suffrage. Why, in the very contested elections that occupied the attention of this Convention at Jackson, between my colleague (Mr. Conrad) and myself on the one part, and Messrs. La Sere and Plauché on the other; the principal grounds of complaint of both parties were the frauds that were committed. Our combatants declared that legal voters had been refused their right of suffrage at the polls. We declared that our political friends, in many instances had been denied the privilege of suffrage, although entitled to it, because certain illegal ballots were refused. The inspectors of both political parties reciprocally accused each other of being the cause of these difficulties, and of the election not having been legally held. Similar difficulties will occur again and to a greater extent with enlarged suffrage. It may happen that one political party may keep from voting a large portion of the other political party. This will give rise to tumult and disorder; perhaps even blood shed. Such results certainly ought to be avoided, and how can they be better avoided than by a list that will be conclusive of the right of each voter. It will facilitate voting and take from the inspectors the unfortunate duty, in a moment of the greatest political excitement, of deciding upon the reception of a ballot, that may decide the contest in favor of the one or the other political party. Constitutional points, and cases where the construction of the law itself is doubtful, may arise unexpectedly before the inspectors, and they be called upon suddenly for a decision. These inspectors are seldom chosen from the legal profession and are not conversant with the interpretations of laws. What is the consequence? Each inspector belongs to a political party, and is frequently selected because he is prominent in that party. Each inspector is stimulated by the excitement that prevails, and which has prevailed for several weeks before the election. The point of difficulty is raised, and there is a party lawyer on each side counselling each an inspector. Books are brought in; arguments are made, and the election is suspended in the mean time. The result is that the inspectors disagree as widely as their counsel, and their respective determinations take a party hue.

I remember at the last election a difficulty that was sprung, all at once, upon a number of voters. They were denied the right of suffrage because it was pretended they had lost their legal residence by a visit to the north or across the lake. At first the point was disputed—the law was referred to, and contrary constructions were given to it. The inspectors were bewildered, and as a last resort application was made to the parish judge, whose duty, it was said, was to decide the point. An express was sent to that officer, and he returned an enigmatical response. The voters, exasperated by the attempt to exclude them, deposited their ballots by force. God forbid that I should justify any violence—I do not pretend to say that it was proper—but I mention the occurrance to show the necessity of adopting some suitable measure to establish the right of the voters, independent of the inspectors, and before the very moment when they are about to offer their ballots. I knew of no plan as effectual as a registry. It is exposed for some months before the election to the public inspection, and all that may be urged against the right of any person to vote, can be preferred and determined upon. It is finally homologated or confirmed by a competent authority, and and as soon as a person presents himself, claiming the right to vote, reference can be had to the list, arranged alphibetically. If his name is there—he votes—it is a proof that he is a legal voter, and is conclusive. If his name is not there it is equally conclusive that he is not a legal voter—for if he was a legal voter either he or his friends would have his name placed on the list. As for the trouble, if that be an argument, the same argument would apply to the trouble of voting. To vote may be considered troublesome, but it is a duty; so would it be a duty to have one's name registered and if a man placed any value upon the right of suffrage, he would not consider the one a more unnecessary duty or a greater trouble than the other.

There is certainly nothing degrading in the idea of being registered as an American citizen. If a Roman citizen was proud of his title of citizenship, I can see no reason why an American citizen should be ashamed of being recorded and recognized in the capacity of a citizen.

Mr. Downs would ask the member, (Mr. Benjamin,) if it were proper that the constitution should be made to suit future legislation, or whether future legislation should be required to conform to the constitution? for all the argument of the member, (Mr. Benjamin,) resolved itself into this: shall we insert a special act of mere legislation in our constitution, because the particular mode of conducting the elections in New Orleans are attendant with difficulties, and do not conform to the wishes of either, or both of the political parties. If the election laws in the city be defective, whose fault is it that they are not amended, changed or modified? The legislature have full power over the subject; and if I am not much mistaken, when a proposition was made, during the last session of the legislature, to correct the defects of those laws, and to appoint three inspectors in place two, which was the only radical source of difficulty, the gentleman, (Mr. Benjamin,) opposed it. How can we be asked to embody in the constitution a matter that does not properly belong to it—which is impotent for good, and powerful for evil? If the election laws of the city must needs be amended—if this be conceded at last, why not apply to the legislature? As for the particular system of registration, we have had an example of that already; in a list of 1300 names, to whom the right of voting was attempted to be given by ficticious property, to vote the whig ticket. Let your election in the city be conducted as they are in the country, and no apprehension need be entertained of difficulties, riots, and the shedding of blood.

Mr. C. M. Conrad thought the gentleman from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs,) over estimated the beneficial effects of appointing three inspectors of election in the city in place of two. The evil did not arise from there being but two judges of election. The presence of an additional judge could not have precluded the difficulties that have occurred, and which will occur again, unless something be done to ascertain before the election who are the qualified voters. Where so many votes are to be cast, this knowledge is indispensable. It is too late and will not answer to dispute the matter at the polls, amid all the heat and excitement of a political contest. He disclaimed again the intention of imposing upon the country any inconvenience that might result from a principle essential to the city. He thought the interests of both could be reconciled, as their object was the same in this matter, to protect the ballot box from frauds.

He would offer the following as a substitute for that portion of the section which the delegate from Ouachita had moved to strike out. It had been handed him by a delegate from one of the country parishes:

"The general assembly shall provide by law that a register of the names of all the qualified voters residing in towns and villages whose white population exceed one thousand, shall be made out within three months preceeding any general election."

Mr. Sellers proposed a substitute to the effect, that citizenship should only be acquired by actual residence within a certain period in the parish; to be counted from the date of a declaration of intention made and recorded in any court of record.

Mr. Scott, of Baton Rouge, called for the previous question which was sustained and the question was taken by ayes and nays, upon Mr. Downs motion to strike out, which resulted as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfied, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott ot Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—44 ayes; and

Messrs. Aubert, Briant Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Garcia, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Labauve, Leonard, Lewis, Mazureau, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Wadsworth, Wikoff and Winchester, voted in the negative—21 nays; the motion was carried.

On motion the Convention adjourned till to-morrow at 11 o'clock, A. M.

SATURDAY, February 8, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

Its proceedings were opened with prayer from the Rev. Mr. CLARK.

Mr. RATLIFF, on behalf of the committee on contingent expenses, submitted the accounts of the Jeffersonian Republican, and Courier for $500, the amount due each for subscription.

Said accounts were referred.

Mr. RATLIFF, on behalf of the same committee, submitted the claim of J. A. Kelly, late printer to the Convention, amounting to $1,474 00. Mr. R. stated that the committee had examined Mr. Kelly's claim and had unanimously reported in favor of that amount.

Mr. BRENT moved to lay the resolution on the table, in order that the members of the Convention might make some investigation.

Mr. RATLIFF opposed this motion. The facts were before the Convention, and they could decide as well now as at any other time. Besides, it was not fair to keep Mr. Kelly here on expenses. If we owe him this money, let us pay him; if it be less, let us pay him the amount really due. At considerable expense and trouble, he came here to fulfiill his contract; we have seen fit to supersede him, let us settle with him—and that without unnecessary procrastination and delay.

Mr. LEWIS had no objections to paying Mr. Kelly, provided there was some guarantee that he would deliver the book containing the report of the debates and journals. As for that pamphlet, he had not seen a copy of it yet.

Mr. MILES TAYLOR spoke in favor of allowing the amount, inasmuch as from the report of the committee it appeared to be due; and he had understood that the book was in the hands of a respectable binder to be bound.

Mr. BENJAMIN stated that he had examined Mr. Kelly's claim, and after making certain reductions, he had united with the committee in their report. The book containing the report of debates and the journals, were in the hands of a respectable book binder, and would be forthcoming as soon as the binding was completed.

Mr. BRENT had no doubt that the committee had fully examined the subject and were convinced that it was due. He thought, however, that the members of the Convention should have some time to examine for themselves.

After some further remarks from Messrs. Mayo, Roselius, Culbertson and Ratliff, and an assurance on the part of Mr. Ratliff that the committee would not audit the claim until they were satisfied that the book would be forthcoming as soon as bound; and after reading the certificate of Mr. Bloomfield, the binder, the question was taken to lay on the table, and it was lost.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the report of the committee, allowing the amount reported by them.

The yeas and nays were called for, and the following was the result:

Yeas—Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Ledoux, Legendre, Leonard, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, King, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Roman, Roselius, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Baton Rouge, Sellers, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder—54.

Nays—Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Hynson, Peets, Penn and Porche—9.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The section proposed by Mr. ROMAN relative to a registry law, under discussion when Convention adjourned yesterday.

Mr. CADE moved to strike out the ballance of the section from the word "residence."

Mr. ROMAN moved to insert after the words "shall not have the right to vote," the words "at any election whatever."

Mr. C. M. CONRAD opposed the motion of the delegate from Lafayette (Mr. Cade) to strike out that part requiring the voter to vote in his election precinct. Mr. Conrad said that this requisition was necessary to facilitate the reception of the votes and to prevent frauds. He proposed to amend the sentence by adding after the words "in the parish," the words "and in cities and towns, in the several wards in which they may be divided."

Mr. PRESTON said he rose for the purpose of moving that the 2d clause of the section be stricken out, as the first had been. The Convention, he would again remark, had met but for three things—First, to extend the right of suffrage. Secondly, to apportion more equally the representation of the State. Thirdly and lastly, to reform the judiciary. He did not believe this body were assembled for any other purpose. It was not surely assembled to fall into minute legislation; to exhaust the patience of the people, and our own patience, and finally end by doing nothing. These ordinary matters were proper subjects for the legislature. Can we not place confidence enough in the legislature to leave it to them. The legislature, by the old constitution, has the power to regulate elections. Oh! but it is said, the legislature will not act. If the legislature does not act, it is because action further than has been had is not necessary. If any particular parish wants a particular modification it can get that modification of the election laws. It happened, if he were not misinformed, and if he were he could be corrected, that a portion of the inhabitants of the parish of Livingston voted in the parish of Ascension. Why waste our time with this ordinary legislation. He hoped the new constitution might not last ten years, and conceiving this matter to be purely legislative, was adverse to placing it in that instrument. A great deal had been said by one gentleman (Mr. Conrad) yesterday about the criminality of voting without having the legal qualifications, and that any one so offending should be sent to the penitentiary. I cannot consider it (said Mr. Preston) a penitentiary offence for an American citizen to attempt to get his right of suffrage. I would as soon think of prosecuting Promotheus for stealing fire as I would think of punishing a man for attempting to exercise a right which is implanted in the human soul. I approve of every word in the section, and yet I shall oppose it, because I think it a simple matter of legislation; but if it be pressed I shall vote for it, although it should not be introduced in the constitution.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD said that the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) had a strange way of testifying his approbation of the section. He approves of it and yet is ready to strangle it. The gentleman (Mr. Preston) thinks this is a small subject. I think it is one of the very greatest importance. It relates to our social organization, and therefore must be of the highest magnitude.

Mr. MILES TAYLOR said that the subject under consideration had taken a wide range. He differed from some of the views taken upon this question by the delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston.) He considered that it was not only proper and just to establish the principle in the constitution, but that it was a principle proper to that instrument. The division between parishes was one thing, and the boundaries of an election precinct another. An election precinct might embrace a portion of two parishes, but the delegate from Jefferson appeared to confound the territorial divisions with the election precincts.

Mr. RATLIFF presented the substitute which he had temporarily withdrawn yesterday.

A question of order was here raised by Mr. C. M. Conrad. He contended that this substitute was not in order, inasmuch as it was not on the same subject matter as the original section; which gave rise to a discussion upon the point of order, in which Messrs. Downs, Ratliff, Voorhies, Miles Taylor, and C. M. Conrad participated.

Mr. PRESTON said that he had remarked at the moment, that he approved of every word in the section, but after reflection, and a circumstance occurring to his mind, which he would suggest to the Convention, convinced him that his first impression was wrong. The section would operate to the exclusion of a portion of his constituents residing at a remote precinct—the Cheniere Cominada. They were fishermen for the most part, and raised water-melons. They were in New Orleans in the month of July, and it was impossible for them to vote at their precinct. They were as well known in the city of Lafayette as the mayor; but under this section their votes could no longer be received elsewhere in the parish than at the precinct of the Cheniere Cominada. He thought it a pernicious restriction, and it would be attended with great inconvenience to the voters.

The question was taken on Mr. CADE's motion, and it prevailed—yeas 36; nays 25.

The question then recurred on Mr. CONRAD's amendment, as amended by Mr. Roman.

Mr. READ opposed the amendment.

Mr. CLAIBORNE sustained it as necessary and proper.

Mr. PORTER thought that the 5th section of the 2d article accomplished the views of the advocates of this proposition.

The question was taken upon Mr. CONRAD's amendment, and the yeas and nays were called for.

Yeas—Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Cade, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Eustis, Garcia, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Legendre, Leonard, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wikoff and Winder—36.

Nays—Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Downs, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens and Wederstrandt—26.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the section as amended.

Yeas—Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Legendre, Leonard, Lewis, Mazureau, Penn, Porter, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wikoff and Winder—37.

Nays—Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Chambliss, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McRea, McCallop, Mayo, Peets, Porche, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Madison, Splane, Waddill and Wederstrandt—24.

Mr. SELLERS introduced his proposition which he had withdrawn temporarily, and asked that it be printed and laid on the table subject to call, which was ordered.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned over to Monday.

MONDAY, February 10, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

MR. WALKER resumed the chair, having recovered his health sufficiently to attend the Convention.

The proceedings were opened with prayer from the Rev. Mr. WOOLRIDGE.

Mr. SPLANE offered a resolution appointing a committee to inquire into the expediency of electing an additional reporter in English.

The resolution was adopted, and the president appointed Messrs. Splane, Scott of Madison, and C. M. Conrad, the committee.

The Convention took up the twentieth section of the second article which is as follows:

SEC. 20. "The members of the general assembly shall severally receive from the public treasury a compensation for their services, which shall be four dollars per day during their attendance on, going to, and returning from the sessions of their respective houses, provided that the same may be increased or diminished by law; but no alteration shall take effect during the period of service of the members of the house of representatives by whom such alteration shall have been made: And provided, also, that this compensation shall exist for the period of sixty days only, but if the general assembly shall at any time extend the session beyond sixty days, they shall not receive any compensation for any period beyond the said sixty days."

Mr. McRAE moved to strike out the proviso.

And Mr. SCOTT of Baton Rouge, that the following be substituted therefor, "provided that the session shall not exceed sixty days."

Mr. BRENT moved that this proviso should not apply to the first legislature held in pursuance of this constitution.

Mr. BEATTY considered that this was merely directory, and that as the supreme court would determine that laws passed by the legislature, after the sixty days, were as valid as if passed before; that it would be ineffectual to arrest prolonged sessions of the legislature.

Mr. TAYLOR of Assumption, considered that this objection of the gentleman from Lafourche, (Mr. Beatty,) was without force. After the expiration of the sixty days the legislative character of the body would cease. They would be no more than an assemblage of citizens, and certainly not empowered to legislate.

Mr. Conrad of New Orleans, would not pretend to say what would be the decision of the supreme court, but inasmuch as two members of the legal profession had arrived at contrary conclusions, it was evident that the question was somewhat ambiguous.

Mr. Read from East Baton Rouge, moved to amend the section by adding:—Provided also, that no session shall extend to a period beyond sixty days, except the session of the first legislature which is to convene after the adoption of this constitution.

Mr. Brent moved to amend the section by inserting after "days," "from the date of its commencement;" the amendment was adopted.

Mr. Downs offered an additional proviso, to wit:

"And unless, also, the session be protracted on a request of the governor, or by a vote of two-thirds of the members of the legislature."

To this proviso Mr. Taylor objected. He would not consent to invest any portion of the legislature with discretionary power in this matter. He should have no objection if it rested with the executive, who would be properly responsible for its use, and with whom in fact it always lay; for he had the perogative of calling, at any time, an extra session. But the object of the Convention was to limit the power of the legislature, to curtail what appeared to be, with it, an inherent vice, superabundant and unnecessary legislation. Sixty days is a term sufficiently long for a session; or it is not; if it be not, extend it; if it be, why cumber the section with clauses and provisos, the effect of which will be to enable the legislature to evade the spirit of the section, and prolong its sessions to any length of time it may please them? Confine them to sixty days, and the necessity of action will present itself to them from the first day they convene; let them understand that the power to prolong it rests with them and they will fritter away their time, leaving the public business in such a state that there would be no difficulty in getting a vote of two-thirds for the prolongation of the session. For his own part he thought sixty days sufficient for all ordinary puposes of legislation; if an extraordinary case arose, then the governor had nothing to do but to call an extra session. He, therefore, thought an absolute prohibition necessary, and in this the language of the constitution should be imperative; if not, they might as well strike out the section altogether.

Mr. Downs remarked that the difference between the legislature extending its sessions and the governor calling a new one, would be that the latter mode would be by far the more expensive.

Mr. Scott of Baton Rouge, moved, before the adoption of these two amendments, to strike out entirely the second proviso, which says that no member shall receive his per diem after sixty days' expiration of a session.

Said motion was adopted.

Mr. Downs' amendment was now put—rejected; nays 51, yeas 11. The question was now on the adoption of the first part of the proviso of the gentleman from Baton Rouge, (Mr. Read,) and the result was as follows:—yeas 50, nays 18. The first part of the proviso was then adopted.

The second clause of the proviso of the gentleman from Baton Rouge, (Mr. Read,) was read and adopted.

Mr. Marigny then offered another proviso, to the effect that no member of the legislature shall receive for their mileage more than $40, going to and returning from the seat of government.

Said proviso was laid on the table indefinitely.

Mr. Mayo moved to amend by fixing the pay of members, going to and returning from the general assembly, at ten cents per mile, instead of four dollars per day.

The amendment of Mr. Mayo was, on motion of Mr. Porter, laid on the table—yeas 37, nays 28.

Mr. Beatty then moved to insert a clause after the word "commencement," in the section, "that any legislative action had at the expiration of sixty days, would be null and void." Without such a provision it was his opinion, and that of some other gentlemen of the bar around him, that the legislature would continue to sit beyond the term of sixty days, and the supreme court would pronounce their legislation valid; without this clause the language of the section would be taken as merely declaratory and not as prohibitary. The member from Avoyelles moved to lay the clause on the table. The motion was lost, yeas 24, nays 27.

The whole section, as amended, was on motion of Mr. Beatty, then put and adopted—yeas 58, nays 8.

The section, as adopted, reads thus:

Sec. 20. "The members of the general assembly shall severally receive from the public treasury a compensation for their services, which shall be four dollars per day during their attendance on, going to, and returning from the sessions of their respective houses, provided that the same may be increased or diminished by law; but no alteration shall take effect during the period of service of the members of the house of representatives, by whom such alterations shall have been made; and provided also, that no session shall extend to a period beyond sixty days from the date of its commencement; that any legislative action had at the expiration of sixty days would be null and void; except the session of the first legislature which is to convene after the adoption of this constitution."

The 21st section was next read and adopted without debate. It reads as follows:

Sec 21. "The members of the general assembly shall, in all cases except treason, felony, breach or surety of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the sessions of their respective houses, and going to or returning from the same, and for any speech or debate in either house, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

The 22d section was read and without debate adopted, to wit:

Sec. 22. "No senator or representative shall, during the term for which he was elected, nor for one year thereafter, be appointed or elected to any civil office of profit under this State, which shall have been erected or the emoluments of which shall have been increased during the time such senator or representative was in office; except to such offices or appointments as may be filled by the election of the people."

Section 23d was, on motion of Mr. Lewis laid on the table, subject to the call of the house. [The section renders any minister of religion eligible to the general assembly or to any office of profit or trust under the government.] He had reflected much on the subject, and although good reasons might have existed for such a section when the old constitution was framed, the question was, did they still apply? He thought not and meant hereafter to move for its rejection, at which time he would submit to the house the grounds of his action.

The 24th section was adopted without debate, to wit:

Sec. 24. "No person who may at any time have been a collector of taxes, or who may have been otherwise entrusted with public money, shall be eligible to the general assembly, or to any other office of profit or trust under the State government, until he shall have obtained a quietus for the amount of such collection, and for all the public moneys with which he may have been entrusted."

The 25th section was also adopted without originating any debate, as follows:

Sec. 25. "No bill shall have the force of a law, until on three several days, it be read over in each house of the general assembly, and free discussion allowed thereon, unless in case of urgency, four-fifths of the house where the bill shall be depending may deem it expedient to dispense with this rule."

The 26th section was also adopted, to wit:

Sec. 26. "All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the house of representatives, but the senate may propose amendments as in other bills; Provided, that they shall not introduce any new matter under the color of an amendment which does not relate to raising a revenue."

The 27th and last section was next read and adopted:

Sec. 27. "The general assembly shall regulate by law, by whom and in what manner writs of election shall be issued to fill the vacancies which may happen in either branch thereof."

Mr. C. M. Conrad gave notice that at a future day he would move for the re-consideration of the eighth section, with the view of having a clause incorporated with it, which he handed to the secretary to have read, and moved at the same time that it be printed. It adds, in addition to the age and residence qualifications for voting, the further one of an annual State tax of one dollar, or the voter, or his father, or his mother must pay $—, annually, house rent.

The motion to print was lost.

Mr. O'Bryan moved that the rules be dispensed with and that the resolution be taken up forthwith.

Mr. Conrad declined; he had not yet made the motion to re-consider; when he should, the gentleman might take such action on it as he thought proper.

Mr. Garrett moved reference of a resolution which he offered to the committee of revision; it was to prevent the language of the eighth section having a retro-active effect. Referred.

Mr. M. Taylor called up the eleventh section with the view of amending it the better to define the residence qualification as laid down in the section. He read his amendment. It provides that any person leaving the State for sixty days, and having in it no house or workshop in which a servant or a portion of his family remains in charge, shall be considered as having forfeited the residence qualification of this constitution. He explained how necessary it was to be clear and explicit on this subject, and how reasonable was his proposition.

Mr. C. M. Conrad moved that the resolution be printed, which was carried; and on motion of Mr. Cenas the Convention adjourned till 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Tuesday, February 11, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened by prayer.

The Convention took up section 9th of the report of the majority of the committee as follows:

The members of the Senate shall be chosen for the term of four years, and when assembled shall have the power to choose its officers every two years.

On motion of Mr. C. M. Conrad, sections 11th and 12th relative to the Senate were laid on the table until the house shall have determined the question of apportionment.

On motion of Mr. Benjamin, the Convention took up the 4th section of the 2d article, which had been amended and not adopted as amended by the casting vote of the President.

Mr. Chinn moved to amend by adding to the qualification to be a representative, the following words: "and shall possess landed property to the amount of $500 at least."

Mr. Voorhies moved for the rejection of the amendment and called for the ayes and nays, which resulted as follows:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, King, Labauve, McCallop, McRea, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff, and Winder, voted in the affirmative—52 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Chinn, Conrad of New Orleans, Culbertson, Derbes, Legendre, Lewis, Pugh, Roman, and St. Amand voted in the negative—13 nays.

Mr. Humble moved to adopt the original report of the committee, which gave rise to a debate. Messrs. Brent and Scott of Baton Rouge, Humble and Downs, contending that the original report was in order; and Messrs. Benjamin, Guion and Claiborne, that the section as amended was in order.

The Chair decided that the section as amended was in order.

Mr. Downs appealed from the decision of the Chair.

The question was put shall the decision of the Chair be maintained, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Auburt, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Briant, Brumfield, Cénas, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garrett, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Hynson, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Prescott of Avoyelles, Pugh, Prudhomme, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Wikoff and Winder voted in the affirmative—41 yeas.

Messrs. Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Downs, Eustis, Humble, Ledoux, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bry- an, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Trist, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the negative, 31 nays.

The section as amended being before the Convention, Mr. GUION moved to amend by striking out the word "four," so that to be eligible to the house of representative "three" years be sufficient.

Mr. DOWNS asked for a division of the question.

Mr. PRESCOTT of St. Landry, offered the following substitute for the whole section. "That all persons eligible to the right of suffrage be eligible to a seat in the legislature."

The question was taken upon striking out the word "four," and the ayes and nays were called for, which resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Chinn, Conrad of New Orleans, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Leonard, McCallop, McRea, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Trist, Waddill, and Wederstrandt, voted in the affirmative—44 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Brumfield, Burton, Claiborne, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbès, Dunn, Garcia, Grymes, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Wikoff, and Winder voted in the negative—29 nays.

The question was then taken upon filling up the blank with "three," and the ayes and nays were called for, which resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbès, Dunn, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Wikoff and Winder voted in affirmative—38 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Leonard, MCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Trist, Waddill, and Wederstrandt, voted in the negative—35 nays.

Mr. PRESCOTT of St. Landry offered his section as a substitute.

The question was raised, whether the substitute was in order. The PRESIDENT decided that it was.

Mr. CONRAD moved to lay it indefinitely on the table, which motion prevailed. The ayes and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbès, Dunn, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the affirmative—38 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill, and Wederstrandt, voted in the negative—36 nays.

Mr. CLAIBORNE presented the following: "No one shall be eligible to be a representative unless he shall, at the period of his election, have been a free white male citizen of the United States and have attained the age of 21 years, and have resided within the State three years preceding the election, and the last year in the parish.

The foregoing was adopted; those voting in the affirmative, are,

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Downs, Eustis, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles,

Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—36 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbès, Dunn, Garcia, Garret, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—40 nays.

On motion of Mr. Benjamin, the Convention took up 3d article of the constitution as reported by the majority of the committee upon the executive department.

Sec. 1. The supreme executive power of this State shall be vested in a chief magistrate, who shall be styled the Governor of the State of Louisiana. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and together with the lieutenant governor, chosen for the same time, be elected as follows:

Sec. —. The citizens entitled to vote for representatives shall vote for a governor and lieutenant governor, at the time and place of voting for representatives. Their votes shall be returned by the officers presiding over the election, to the seat of government, addressed to the speaker of the house of representatives, and on the second day of the session of the general assembly then next to be holden, the members of the general assembly shall meet in the house of representatives to examine and count the votes. The person having the greatest number of votes for governor shall be declared duly elected, if such number be a majority of all the votes given; but if no person have such a majority, then from the two persons having the highest numbers on the list of those voted for as governor, the general assembly shall choose immediately by ballot the governor. The person having a majority of the votes given for lieutenant governor, shall be the lieutenant governor, and if no person have a majority, then from the two persons having the highest numbers on the list, the general assembly shall in the same manner, choose the lieutenant governor. The first section was adopted.

Mr. Ledoux moved to substitute the 2d section of the minority report for the 2d section of the majority report. He remarked, that the only difference between the two sections was, that the election of governor by the report of the minority was entirely confided to the people.

MINORITY REPORT:

Sec. 2. The governor shall be elected by the qualified electors of the State, at the same time and place where they shall respectively vote for representatives and senators. The returns of every election shall be sealed up, and transmitted to the secretary of the State, who shall deliver them to the speaker of the house of representatives, who shall open and publish them in presence of both houses of the general assembly; the person having the greatest number of votes shall be governor; but if two or more shall be equal and highest in votes, one of them shall be chosen governor by the joint vote of the members of the general assembly. Contested elections for governor shall be determined by both houses of the legislature, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. Roman said, he could see no reason why this section of the report of the majority should be thrown aside. It appeared to him to lead to the same result, inasmuch as it tended to elect the candidate having the plurality of votes. And, moreover, said Mr. Roman, the committee anxious to comply with the law convening this Convention, presumed, that in order to carry out the design of that law, they could not do better than to base their action upon the federal constitution.

Mr. Soule said, that he considered the section offered by Mr. Ledoux, on behalf of the minority of the committee, was infinitely preferable. Had he entertained any doubts on the subject the remarks of the member from St. James, (Mr. Roman) would have dispelled them. How is it that the delegate has discovered that we should conform strictly to the law convening the Convention, for which I insisted with whatever feeble powers I may possess, when a few days ago that gentleman was one of those that were most favorable to restrictions, and going beyond the requisites of the law, by establishing odious distinctions among our citizens. If, as the gentleman assumes, the report of the majority will have the same practical effect as that of the minority, why does he object to the latter since it presents a more popular principle; and if it be really true that the legislature could not do otherwise than elect the candidate having the plurality, why place it in their power to defeat the public wishes?

The annals, said Mr. Soule, of the federal government are too fresh in our remembrance not to admonish us that the legislative department of the government is quite capable of abusing this power. Who does not remember with indignation, that when the majority of the popular voices were cast for the revered Jackson, the wishes of the people were set at naught, and the minority candidate was made the president? If it be really the desire of those that favor the report of the majority, that the candidate having the plurality should have the preference, state it clearly and distinctly in the constitution, so that there cannot be any mistake, and that the representatives of the people may not impose upon the will of the people a candidate who is not the choice of the people.

Mr. Lewis said, he was in favor of the principle contained in the minority report. He prefered that principle, but it appeared to him that the style of the majority report was the best, and the principle of the former could be engrafted upon the latter. He would suggest an amendment to the majority report to that effect.

Mr. Soule thought that if the words were added to the section reported by the minority, "and the lieutenant governor," after the word "governor," this would meet the views of the delegate from St. Landry.

On motion the Convention adjourned.

Wednesday, February 12, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer from the Rev. Mr. Hinton.

Mr. Splane, on behalf of the committee appointed to investigate the causes of the delay in the publication of the reports of debates, offered a resolution that an additional reporter in English be appointed.

Mr. C. M. Conrad expressed his dissent from the report. He had not attended the meeting of the committee, and had he been in his seat when he was appointed on it, he would have requested the President to have excused him from serving. It was conceded on all hands that the reporter could not keep up a daily report with the deliberations of this body, but he saw no necessity for this. Where was the necessity that all that occurred here should be transmitted with all the rapidity of steam presses and steamboats over the country. Whether the reports were a few days behindhand he considered a matter of no very great consequence. It was no doubt pleasing for members to see themselves in print —perhaps he himself was under the influence of this weakness, but he saw no occasion for this hot haste, which would curtail additional expense and was after all, but a small matter.

Mr. Chinn said that when Mr. Kelly was displaced, it was said that the reporter was not at fault, and now it is admitted that he cannot keep up with the daily proceedings of the Convention. This appears to be a striking contradiction. He was opposed to the resolution.

Mr. Splane said that there was no contradiction in point of fact. Mr. Kelly published nominally weekly, whereas the present printers publish daily.

The question was taken on the adoption of the resolution—Mr. Labauve in the chair. The result was 33 yeas; 32 nays—Mr. Labauve voting in the negative, the motion to adopt was lost.

On motion of Mr. Voorhies the motion to adopt was reconsidered.

And on the motion of Mr. Beatty the further consideration of the subject was postponed until 2 o'clock, in order that the question should be decided in a full house, Mr. Beatty expressing himself averse to the passage of the resolution.

The motion for postponement prevailed.

Mr. Eustis, on behalf of the committee on revision, reported the sections which had been referred to that committee.

After some remarks from Messrs. Conrad of Orleans, Downs, Miles Taylor, Roman and Benjamin, Thursdays of each week were set apart for the consideration of the reports of the committee upon revision.

Mr Beatty, in comformity with the rules, gave notice that on Friday next he would move for the reconsideration of the 5th section of the 2d article, with the design of making it conform to the 10th section. The opposition in sense, was not merely verbal, and therefore would not fall under the supervision of the committee on revision.

On motion, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the 2d section of the 3d article, reported by the majority of the committee on the executive department.

Mr Ledoux had moved to substitute the 2d section of the report of the minority of the committee, as follows:

Sec. 2. The governor shall be elected by the qualified electors of the State, at the same time and place where they shall respectively vote for representatives and senators. The returns of every election shall be sealed up, and transmitted to the secretary of state who shall deliver them to the speaker of the house of representatives, who shall open and publish them in presence of both houses of the general assembly; the person having the highest number of votes shall be governor; but if two or more shall be equal and highest in votes, one of them shall be chosen governor by the joint vote of the members of the general assembly. Contested elections for governor shall be determined by both houses of the legislature, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

Mr Lewis moved to amend the 2d section of the report of the majority by striking out in the 19th line the words, "If such number be a majority of all the votes given; but if no such person have such a majority, then from the two persons having the highest number on the list of those voted for as governor, the general assembly shall choose by ballot the governor.

Mr Mayo offered the following amendment to the 2d section of the report of the minority, as reported by Mr Ledoux, to wit, viz:

Sec. 2. The citizens entitled to vote for representatives, shall vote for a governor and lieutenant governor at the time and place of voting for representatives. The returns of every election shall be sealed up and transmitted to the secretary of state, who shall deliver them to the speaker of the house of representatives, and during the first week of the general assembly then next to be holden, the members of the general assembly shall meet in the house of representatives to examine the returns of the election; the person having the highest number of votes for governor, shall be governor, but if two or more shall be equal and highest in votes for governor, one of them shall be chosen governor by the joint vote of the members of the general assembly.

The person having the highest number of votes for lieutenant governor, shall be lieutenant governor: but if two or more persons shall be equal and highest in votes for lieutenant governor, one of them shall be chosen lieutenant governor by the joint votes of the members of the general assembly.

Mr C. M. Conrad said that upon mature reflection he was in favor of the principle reported by the majority of the committee. He supposed a case, where five persons were candidates for the office of governor, and four of them obtained, respectively, 2,500 votes, and the fifth 2,501 votes, it was clear that the latter had not obtained the majority of the votes, and yet, in virtue of the report of the minority, he would be the governor. Would this be just or expedient? He thought not. The time might arrive when there would be local divisions in the State—contests for supremacy between the east and the west, the north and the south—between the city and the country—it might happen that arrangements might be made, that particular candidates should run in particular sections, so as to divide the strength of these sections and lead to the success of a particular candidate, if the principle in the minority report prevailed, and it might give rise to these arrangements, and the result would be, that a governor, chosen by a minority, would be foisted on the people. He could not consent to anything leading to the possibility of these occurrences, though it might be alledged that the principle in the minority report was the popular principle. He contended that if the legislature made the selection where there was not an absolute majority, it was after all, the choice of the people through their representatives. The representatives of the people were the mandatories of the people, and their choice, it was reasonable to infer, would be the choice of the people. It was a mistake to suypose that where the representatives of the people acted on behalf of the people, it was not the act of the people.

Mr. KENNER could not take this view of the subject. He considered it very objectionable to place the legislature between the candidates and the people. While he favored the principle of the minority report, he preferred the phraseology of the majority report, which could be amended in that particular respect.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said, that experience had demonstrated that the legislature would not make an improper use of the power. For thirty-two years they had invariably selected the candidate for governor that had the highest number of votes, when there was no election by the people. It was not likely they would pursue a different course, unless there were sufficient grounds for it, and in such cases, he conceived they should be vested with the discretionary power; as their choice would under such circumstances, be that of the people.

Mr. LEWIS had a word or two to say in reply to what fell from his friend from New Orleans, (Mr. Conrad.) In the case supposed by that gentleman, if three candidates were to run, two obtaining almost an equal vote and the third obtaining one hundred votes less, should the legislature chose the middle man, he (Mr. L.) would ask whether there would not be a minority governor, and a minority governor with a vengeance! He was opposed to the legislature intervening at all—if they selected the candidate having the highest number of votes, their intervention was useless; if they selected one of the others, their intervention would give just cause of complaint. He was not disposed to allow the legislature to mask their power of electing the governor. If they are to elect the governor at all, let it be done as in South Carolina, in every instance. He was for going the whole length. Upon this subject, he disagreed with some of those with whom it was his pride and pleasure to act on most occasions, and he might be called in reference to this matter, a radical. In Massachusetts, when there was no choice of governor at the first election, the two highest candidates were sent a second time before the people. The objection to this plan was its inconvenience. He was decidedly in favor of the principle in the minority report.

Mr. DOWNS sustained the proposition to substitute the 2d section of the minority report for the 2d section of the report of the majority. We have already had an example in the federal government, that the wishes of the people might not be consulted, and that there might be some bargain or intrigue to defeat their wishes.

Mr. MARIGNY said, that in fact the legislature ought not to intervene with election. That the plurality of votes ought to suffice when there was not an absolute majority. The first station in a country, said Mr. Marigny, let it be filled by an officer called a king or governor, was invariably an object of intrigue, and sometimes of revolutions, when it is not the people who elect immediately. History abounds with examples. He would refer particularly to the history of Poland, where although the crown had been elective, yet the election had been confined to a mere fraction of the people. In the election of the popes at Rome, the cardinals are confined to their cells, in order to prevent them from the intrigue and cabal which would otherwise attend the election. Does any one suppose, asked Mr. Marigny, that the legislature, if they have the power, will elect the plurality candidate to be governor? Not at all! They would elect the greatest intriguer, and it might reasonably be inferred, generally, that the candidate having less votes among the people would be the most active and most eager in determining votes in the legislature.

Mr. CHINN moved that the substitute and amendments be laid on the table and called for the ayes and nays.

YEAS.—Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Cenas, Briant, Brumfield, Cade, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Leonard, Lewis, McCallop, Prescott of St Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Winchester and Winder—43 yeas.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill and Wederstrandt—24 nays.

Mr. Mayo then offered the following amendment, to be inserted after the last word "representatives," in the first paragraph.

"The returns of every election shall be sealed up and transmitted to the secretary of state, who shall deliver them to the speaker of the house of representatives to examine the returns of the election. The person having the highest number of votes for governor shall be governor; but if two or more shall be equal and highest in votes for governor, one of them shall be chosen governor by the joint vote of the members of the general assembly."

Mr. Lewis then moved to strike out from the nineteenth line the words, "If such numbers be a majority of all the votes given, but if no person have such a majority then from the two persons having the highest numbers on the list of those voted for as governor, the general assembly shall choose immediately by ballot the governor," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "but if two or more persons shall be equal and highest in the number of votes polled for governor, one of them shall be immediately chosen governor, by joint vote of the members of the general assembly."

Mr. Downs moved for a division, to take the question upon striking out, when

Mr. Beatty announced that the hour had arrived to take up the resolution for the election of an additional reporter.

The question was taken upon the resolution, and it was decided in the affirmative by the casting vote of the President.

Mr. Wadsworth nominated Mr. Denis Corcoran for reporter.

Mr. Splane nominated Mr. Ilsley.

The votes being counted, it appeared that Mr. Ilsley was duly elected.

Whereupon, on motion, the Convention adjourned.

Thursday, February 13, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. Stephens.

Leave of absence was granted to Messrs. Sellers and Winder on account of sickness.

Mr. Voorhies offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That all those members of the Convention who do not answer to their names at 10 o'clock, when they are called, shall not be entitled to their per diem.

Mr. Mayo moved, "except in case of the sickness of any member who may fail to do so;" to which, no objection was made.

Mr. Kenner was in favor of the motion, and called for the sense of the house upon it. The question was then put and lost.

Order of the Day.—Article 3d, Executive Department; section 2d.

Mr. Dunn addressed the Convention on the amendment proposed by Mr. Lewis on the previous day, which was to strike out all the following words:

"If such number be a majority of all the votes given; but if no person have such a majority, then from the two persons having the highest number on the list of those voted for as governor, the general assembly shall choose immediately by ballot the governor."

Mr. Dunn said, he was unwilling to give a silent vote on this subject, and would therefore give his reasons for his vote. The governor he considered a very important officer—he was charged with the execution of the laws—he was clothed with the veto power—the appointing power—the pardoning power—he was commander-in-chief of the militia. In view of the magnitude of this officer, he asked if it was right or consistent with the fundamental principles of democracy, that he should be elected otherwise than by a majority of the votes cast? He maintained that the will of the majority of the whole people should be required, directly at the ballot box, if possible, and if on a failure of any candidate's receiving a majority, then the election to be sent back to the people, or referred to the legislature to make a choice from the two highest.

He maintained that if a plurality of votes were to elect, the governor would not feel that responsibility to the people which he conceived to be necessary for the permanency of a representative government, and was at a loss to understand why so many gentlemen were unwilling to trust the legislature; he was inclined himself to repose a higher confidence in that tribunal; he esteemed the legislators as the representatives and agents of the people; there might be among them log rolling, but was unwilling to disparage by supposing them dishonest; he looked upon the legislature as a deliberative and responsible body, with power to make laws and to elect senators, and thought, as a dernier resort, the election of governor might be safely left to them; he had no doubt it was far better, more expedient and more consistent with democratic principles to do so, than to have a governor elected by a mere plurality of votes, for he held that the wish of the majority should be manifested either at the ballot box directly, or through the people's agents, the legislature.

In some States the plurality system might answer very well, but in a State like Louisiana it would not do at all; in the country the white population is sparse, and it would be giving to New Orleans the power of making the governor. He was surprised that gentlemen who yesterday feared the influence of the city on account of numbers, were to-day voting to insure her, if not now, in ten years hence, all of our governors. He said the tendency of the plurality system would be to produce faction; that the love of office was very great, and would have its influence that way, and consequently would be the means of causing a multiplicity of candidates, and it would be impossible for any one to get a majority; the weakest and most objectionable might be elected, one who might feel responsible to his party and friends only. He confessed he was surprised at the popularity of this measure; considered it a sweep-stake race, the foremost nag to take the purse, and had no doubt there would be many entries, as the forfeit is nothing, and the price of entry only age and residence. Money or property belongs to the days gone by, and is repudiated by this Convention, and not considered a necessary qualification. He said there were many other reasons that might be urged, but as he was certain the Convention were determined on their course, he would not detain it longer, and would only add as an additional reason that induced him to vote as he should, the fact that in this State there are two distinct races—American and French; that heretofore a great jealousy existed between them, which time has in a great degree happily effaced. He believed the plurality system would have a tendency to re-kindle and inflame that feeling, and knew that all thinking men would be pleased to obviate it.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption, felt sure that the desire of the Convention, or a majority of them, was to elect a chief magistrate by a majority of the people, and the only difficulty in his mind was how that was to be done? He did not agree with some members that the legislature would be able to discriminate so as to bring about that result, because a large majority of that legislature frequently represented but a small minority of the people, in the aggregate. That arises from their being elected by localities.

The principles of this section, as reported, has the very effect which some gentlemen attributed to its opposite, viz: the causing a multiplicity of candidates; but the plurality principle brought two candidates before the people, and therefore was most likely to promote the desire that the majority should rule.

The motion to strike out was called for and the yeas and nays asked. Before the vote was taken, Mr. Claiborne desired to take exceptions to some remarks which had fallen, as regards the principle of interfering with the legislative will. He would always advocate such expression, where there is no expression or public will. He deprecates the danger there must and will be in leaving the door open on such occasions; and objects on that account to any such plan going into effect. While at the same time he thinks that the minority should not have the power of defeating the will of the majority; therefore he opposes the motion to strike out.

The question was then put, and carried, to strike out.

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Leonard, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, St. Amand Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Soulè, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill, Wadsworth and Wederstrandt—48 ayes; and

Messrs. Boudousquie, Briant, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Derbes, Dunn, King, Labauve, Legendre, O'Bryan, Roman, Taylor of St. Landry and Wikoff—14 nays; so the motion to strike out prevailed.

Mr. Lewis then moved to fill the blank in the seventeenth line, with the words, the person having the greatest number of votes for governor, shall be declared duly elected; but if two or more persons shall be equal and highest in number of votes polled for governor, one of them shall be immediately chosen governor by the joint vote of the members of the general assembly."

Mr. Preston could not see the use of this clause. He thought much valuable time was lost in legislating for improbabilities. It was far better to make a practical constitution, than waste our time on improbabilities, for it certainly never could be contemplated or expected, that any of the candidates would get an equal number of votes, and therefore opposed the motion.

Mr. Conrad thinks the motion made is a correct one, for such things have happened as in Massachusetts, in the case of Gov. Morton, and elsewhere, and may happen again.

Mr. Preston thinks it never did, nor ever would occur.

Mr. Conrad of New Orleans, then adverted to the fact of a tie vote being not an uncommon thing, even as near as the parish of Ascension, where in several instances on very important occasions, tie votes had been given. He therefore thought the amendment a wise and salutary one.

Motion to reject was put and lost, and then the amendment was adopted.

Mr. Preston thought that the latter clause should be stricken out, and moved to strike it out. Moved and seconded.

Mr. Culbertson thought the same principle should apply to the lieutenant governor as to the governor's election.

Mr. Lewis wishing to test that principle moved the adoption of the latter clause, in which the sense of the house was taken, and it was adopted.

Mr. Guion moved, that the report be so amended that the words "secretary of state" be inserted in place of the words "speaker of the house," which was agreed to.

Mr. Mayo moved to strike out all after the word "representatives," in the fourth line, as the commissioners contemplated by the report, might be faulty in their returns.

Mr. Downs is of opinion that the proper mode would be to insert the words "proper officer created by law," and made a motion to that effect, which prevailed.

Mr. Soule desired the insertion of the words "greatest number," in lieu of the words beginning at the 24th line.

Mr. Mayo then moved to strike out all after the word "elected," in the 8th line down to the 15th line, and to insert "the votes to be counted during the first week," instead of the second day, "by joint vote, &c," and then supposed the case of the legislature not having a quorum on the second day.

Mr. Lewis would much prefer the phraseology should remain undisturbed. The new legislature cannot commence without a governor: again, the house might perhaps disagree, as has happened elsewhere in the election of senators; in that case, as in the case of the senators, who were not elected by this disagreement, we should be placed in the same position with regard to a governor; and he is clearly of opinion that it is right to fix a day for the legislature to do their duty.

Mr. Mayo withdrew his motion and the question was then put on the section as amended, and which reads as follows:

Sec. 2. The citizens entitled to vote for representatives shall vote for a governor and lieutenant governor, at the time and place of voting for representatives. The returns of every election shall be sealed up and transmitted by the proper returning officer created by law to the secretary of state, who shall deliver them to the speaker of the house of representatives, and on the second day of the session of the general assembly, then next to be holden, the members of the general assembly shall meet in the house of representatives to examine and count the votes, the person having the greatest number of votes for governor shall be declared duly elected, but if two or more persons shall be equal and highest in number of votes polled for governor, one of them shall be immediately chosen governor by the joint vote of the members of the general assembly. The person having the greatest number of votes for lieutenant governor, shall be the lieutenant governor, but if two or more persons shall be equal and highest in number of votes polled for lieutenant governor, one of them shall be immediately chosen lieutenant governor by the joint vote of the members of the general assembly.

Messrs. Aubert, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cenas, Chambliss, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Guion Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Ledoux, Leonard, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Penn, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Porche, Porter, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Splane, Stephens, Soulé, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, St. Amand, Trist, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Waddill, and Wederstrandt —52 ayes.

Messrs. Chinn, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, King, Labauve, Legendre, O'Bryan, Roman, Roselius, Taylor of St. Landry, and Wikoff—12 yeas; the section was therefore adopted.

Mr. Roselius, while the vote was being taken, desired to express his reason for voting in the negative; it was, that in his opinion, the section as it stood, gave the power to a minority to elect a governor.

The 3d section was then taken up, it reads as follows: "The governor shall be ineligible for the succeeding four years after the expiration of the time for which he shall have been elected."

Mr. Saunders moved a momentary suspension of the rules of the house to make a report from the apportionment committee. Suspension granted. He then made said report; asked that it be laid on the table and made the special order of the day for Monday next. Agreed to.

The 3d section was then adopted without amendment, being the same as that in the constitution of 1812.

The 7th section was then readopted as in the constitution of 1812.

"Sec. 7. The governor shall at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the term for which he shall have been elected."

The 8th section was then taken up, and Mr. Grymes moved to strike out in the 45th line all the words after the word "except when in the service of the United States." He felt that we should not, in justice, require that our governor should be the only man required to keep his sword in the scabbard. On the contrary, he would leave him free to act as circumstances and his duty to his country might require.

Mr. Conrad did not regard it in the same light as the delegate from the county of Orleans, for although we may elect a governor of sufficient capacity for all the other duties of the office, still if we made him the commander of our forces in time of war or invasion, he might not possess the proper qualifications for a general. It had heretofore been the custom to employ majors general who had been trained to arms for such a purpose.

Mr. Kenner thought for that reason that the whole section was wrong, and moved to reject it. To his mind the beginning and the end of the section are totally at variance.

Mr. Conrad here referred to the case of Mr. Madison, who, although a very good man, still made but a poor general when called into service as commander-in-chief. The sense of the house was taken on the section as amended, and it was so adopted. It reads thus:

Sec. 8. He shall be commander-in-chief of the army ot this State and of the militia thereof, except when they shall be called into the service of the United States.

Section 9th then came up for discussion.

Mr. Splane moved to strike out the whole section.

Mr. Downs thought it was improperly printed, there being two copies of it in different parts of the house.

The secretary explained, that there were certain sections reported as not requiring amendment, which had been inserted in the first printed copy.

Mr. Roman desired to take them in the order adopted by the constitution.

Mr. Downs moved to take them in the order reported by the committee, which was adopted.

Mr. Dunn moved to strike out all after the second line, beginning at the word "native," &c. &c.

Mr. Dunn said he was induced to make this motion from a sense of justice to the naturalized citizens of our State; many of of them by a long residence have acquired rights that should not be disregarded. Whilst we admit the constitutional power of this Convention to engraft the report of the committee into the constitution, and thereby preclude the natralized citizens from filling the office of governor—still we must feel that in a moral point of view it would be wrong to do so. It seemed to him to be invidious and highly inexpedient.

It should be remembered, sir, that we have in our State many valuable citizens of this class, who have been here a long time; they have vested their all here; there labor has been bestowed, and their capital expended in the improvement of the country; the constitution which we are called to amend, guaranteed to them the privilege which is now asked to be taken from them. And, sir, who called this Convention? Who assisted in electing the delegates here assembled? This very class contributed in conferring upon us the power we now have. Did they do so with the expectation of our curtailing the privileges secured to them under the old constitution? Surely not. Nor was it contemplated by the people of the State, (those at least, who reside in the parish I have the honor, in part, of representing.)

He said he could see no necessity whatever for the restriction insisted upon. That many of our foreign friends had intermarried with our families; their interests were completely interwoven with our own, and he should regard them as Americans, and not doubt their patriotism. To draw the line of distinction disparaging to them, would be casting a fire-brand into the bosom of society, that would be productive of great discord—of great mischief. Sir, I ask if it would be just, fair, or honorable, to curtail them of those rights which they have enjoyed for so long a time under the old constitution? I shall not sanction it. I consider it, under the circumstances, wrong, and shall vote to strike out the word "native." Let the time be limited to sixteen years' residence as a citizen of the United States, and to ten years' residence in the State, and we shall have a sufficient guarantee of interest and attachment to the country. This, he said, he considered conservative—all extremes he looked upon as radical.

Mr. President, it should be remembered that in the Florida parishes there are many good men, who were born there prior to the acquisition of that part of our State—they are not American born; would you deprive them of any privilege? For instance, our worthy friend Mr. Carpenter, (the sergeant at arms,) was born in Florida, under the Spanish government; would you deprive him of the privilege of being our governor? (The gentlemen around me say that will be provided for.) To provide for it, sir, is to make another distinction—let us avoid that, and say in the liberality of our hearts that we will give no ground of complaint to any of our people, whether they come from Florida, or come across the big waters.

He said it was painful to differ with those with whom he usually concurred, but was bound to do so upon this occasion—he was aware that there was a great prejudice at this time against foreigners; he felt the force of it himself, and was admonished to be just; he believed the naturalization laws required amendment; but this was not the forum—the subject belonged to congress; and he had no doubt with some alteration that would prevent frauds upon the elective franchise, all prejudice would be removed, and the public mind tranqualized. This Convention has already done something that he considered calculated to prevent fraud, and he expected would do more before it adjourned; but he was unwilling to go to any extreme upon this or any other subject that may arise in our deliberations.

Mr. Lewis was opposed to striking out one word of the provision made in the section; aye, to striking out one single word. Gentlemen may as well meet this question at once; and he regards the motion to strike out as a test vote on the principles of the whole section. I regard the provision to be a good one. There are so many in favor of none but a citizen of the United States ever becoming a governor of a State, that we may well pause and examine the question. This is no novel question; if it were why then have New York, Maine, Virginia and many other States, engrafted it in their constitutions? Are they less liberal, less patriotic, less democratic in their views than we are? I think not. No sir, it is a measure called for by sound policy, and, sir, I desire to record my vote upon it, whether it pass or not, for the benefit of my children, that they may look upon and reflect upon my vote upon this question when I am no more. Moreover, I think, sir, the provision requiring the governor to be possessed bona-fide of landed property to the value of $5000 before eligible to the office, a wise provision. I deem a property qualification in the person filling such an office an important pre-requisite. But I regret that this question was called up until the question of the pre-requisites for a seat as senator, had been settled. It would have been far better to have settled that question first; and then we should have better known what guards ought to be thrown around the claimants for executive favor at the hands of the people. Desiring to secure the interests of the whole people, I would dislike to see a man elected governor, with power under the legislature to tax the people, without his being called upon to aid in such revenue. But if the motion to strike out prevail, the chances are that the first governor under the new constitution will have no property qualifications. What interest can he then have in looking to the taxing power, having no taxes himself to pay? The taxing power has always been considered the most important in the government of any free State or country. If the governor possesses nothing to tax, self interest is taken away, and when that is taken away I fear for the interests of the community, either from disregard or in-attention on his part to the interests of his fellow citizens. I think the property qualification recommended, to be the best guarantee for such protection of equality on the taxing power. It has been suggested that nothing but residence is requisite. Now, sir, I for one am opposed totally to that doctrine. I desire no uncertainty left, for a popular election to decide the merits of; I desire to see the principle fixed that we cannot be left to any such chance as that, the country is to be govered by those who have no property at stake themselves. Moreover, I think that the governor of the State should first arrive at the years of discretion. To be at the helm of affairs where such vast interests are concerned, requires that many frosts shall have passed over the head of any man of 21 years ere he can be suffered to have arrived at such an age as to pass for a man arrived at the years of discretion.

Mr. Culbertson thought it would be better to divide the question, but the president decided it could not be divided.

Mr. Beatty thinks it would be better to strike out a part of it. He would strike out the first clause, for we have not the right under the constitution of the United States, to deprive any citizen of another State, who has the necessary residence under our constitution, from being the governor of the State; secondly, he would strike out the property qualification, but in orde- to guard against all danger, he would suggest that it be required of him that he shall have been a citizen of the United States for at least ten years before he can be eligible to the office of governor of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. Grymes thought this was a circuitous way of arriving at the question; he wants the vote taken on striking out, and then, if that fail, it can be so amended as to take in or leave out particular parts of the section.

Mr. Downs thought that the experience of the previous day would have shown the fallacy of such a course.

Mr. Dunn persisted in his motion to strike out, particularly the word native.

Mr. Beatty moved to strike out all after the word "except" in the 2nd line to the 6th line.

Mr. Conrad is of opinion that the constitutional objection raised on this question, by the member from Lafourche, is perfectly untenable and unfounded. For his part he thinks the convention has the power to make the requirements of citizenship 15 years, or in fact any time they please. The Congress of the United States provides that he must have been a citizen of the U. States a certain number of years before he can be eligible, and that none but a native citizen can be president of the U. States. There is nothing in the constitution of the United States, denying the power of the several States from settling themselves, the qualifications of their own chief magistrates. It is no new question. I would refer to the State of Maine and would read from the constitution one of its clauses. The governor to be eligible, shall not be less than thirty years of age, and he must be a natural born citizen of the U. States.

Mr. Beatty feels yet perfectly satisfied that it is prohibited in the constitution of the United States, for the Convention to make any such provision. If we can, why not confine it to native born citizens of Louisiana? No citizen, in his opinion, from any other State should be placed on a different footing, than if he were born in this State. No limit should be placed, except the term of residence, and that he conceives to be a right of the Convention. He thinks the age of 35 years a just and equitable right on their part to fix upon as a pre-requisite qualification for a governor, but beyond that he is opposed to their power, as conflicting with the constitution of the United States.

Mr. Taylor: while he agreed that his mind was impressed with the views of the member from New Orleans, will yet vote for the measure recommended by the member from Lafourche.

He agrees with the member from New Orleans, that the argument about the United States and a single State is entirely different. It is said by the member from Lafourche, that one who is a citizen of any one State shall be entitled to the same privileges in any other State. I do not believe in any such broad construction. If the State herself wants to make a distinction among her own citizens, and does so, others coming into the State have no right to complain. He might then challenge our right to exclude him. We exclude not only the naturalized citizen of the United States, but also all the naturalized citizens of Louisiana. It would then amount to the exclusion of the naturalized citizen, and there would be no discrimination, because we should all see at once there was no difference between those from other States and our own citizens. But the executive of the State, it is said, is to be entrusted with the power of commander of the army and navy of the State and United States, yet it is known that all foreign negotiations, the declaration of war, &c., are entrusted, by the constitution, to the general government. They have the power to make all foreign negotiations, to declare war, &c., and should war be declared, there is no probability of any naturalized citizen interfering in such case with our rights; for this reason I shall vote to strike out.

Mr. Brent said he desired to offer a few remarks on this important question. He considered it clear, that this State had no power to adopt the section now under debate, as reported by the committee. All would admit, even those who were most zealous in upholding the rights of the States that no State sovereignty had any right to destroy the effect of legislation by the federal government, when that legislation was authorized by the national constitution. This was the question at issue, and to this point he desired to direct a few observations.

The 4th paragraph of the 8th section of the 1st article of the constitution of the United States, declares that "Congress shall have power to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, throughout the United States." By this article the several States ceded to the general government all control over the subject of naturalization, and consequently any legislation which it may have adopted upon the subject must be regarded as paramount and supreme. Has this power been exercised by the general government, and if so, can its action be nullified and set at nought by the authority of one of the States? These are the enquiries which naturally suggest themselves to the attention of the Convention.

Uniform rules of naturalization have been established by the general government, and Congress has declared that immigrants to this country, who reside here five years and pursue certain formalities, shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of American citizens. This legislation cannot be counteracted or countervailed by any exercise of power upon the part of the States. He who has the act of Congress and the judgment of a court in his favor, is to all intents and purposes an American citizen. His citizenship cannot be invalidated or nullified by any law emanating from a State authority.

It is true that this Convention has power to affix any qualification it pleases for him who aspires to the office of governor, with this reservation, that in so doing it does not make any distinction between American citizens. This the constitution of the United States expressly prohibits, for in the 2d section of the 4th article it declares that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. The language is clear, unambiguous and comprehensive. The object of it is, to place every American citizen upon the same footing of equality. The constitution does not speak of native or naturalized citizens, but its broad shield is thrown over all who, by birth or by law, are entitled to the inestimable privileges of American citizenship. It issues its mandate to the several States, and it forbids them, with the strong voice of supreme authority, from enacting any distinction in favor or against the citizens of each particular State. Should you pass the clause now under debate, such a distinction would be created, and thus the fundamental law of the Union would be disregarded and trampled under foot. A native citizen from Mississippi, for instance, coming to this State would be eligible to the office of governor, but a naturalized citizen from any other State would be rejected and excluded from that office. Would this not be clearly creating a distinction in one State, between citizens of the several States? Could it then be said that the citizens of each State had been vested with the privileges and immunities of citizens in all the States? If not, then most undeniably and unequivocally, the State authorities of Louisiana will have violated and destroyed the integrity of the federal constitution. Other States may have usurped this power, but, Mr. President, (said Mr. Brent) I will never give my vote to sanction such an usurpation. I will cheerfully support the motion which has been made to strike out the clause requiring that the governor should be a native citizen of the United States.

Mr. Saunders thinks there is an error on the minds of gentlemen who have spoken on this constitutional question, as to our right to define the qualifications of our governor.

He views the language of the constitution in its literal sense, not in the broad sense which the gentleman from Rapides appears to do. The constitution does not say that a citizen of another State shall have a right to hold the office in any particular State. Why, if so, a citizen of Mississippi could be balloted for, and claim a right, if elected by the people of Louisiana, to be our governor. According to the view which the gentleman from Rapides appears to take of the matter, citizens of other States shall enjoy the same privileges and immunities they enjoyed in their own State. If so, a citizen of Massachusetts, coming here would have the right to vote as he voted under the laws of his own State. There, as in New York, negroes are entitled to vote, and if such doctrine prevail, negroes would have a right here. His reason for retaining the word "native" in the section, is simply because he thinks the governor should be a native born citizen in the time of war, which may occur at any moment. He referred to a certain former governor, who with all other good qualities, would have been placed in a dilemma in case we should have, in his term, been at war with France. No man can be expected to act with the same energy and fidelity against his native land as his duty would require of him. He therefore shall vote to exclude foreigners from the right of being governor of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. Brent rose to explain, but the President reminded him, that without permission of the house, he could not speak again on that subject, which being immediately granted, he stated that the construction placed upon his remarks by the member from East Feliciana, (Mr. Saunders) was incorrect; for no native or adopted citizen would be entitled to vote immediately on his arrival. He did not contend for any such principle; what he contended for was this, that we are expressly told by the constitution of the United States itself that no distinction shall be drawn between a native and an adopted citizen, in their rights and immunities. Whenever the foreigner has complied with the law of congress, the rights and immunities of each, shall be one and identically the same, and any other construction than this on the words of the constitution cannot be sustained.

Mr. Conrad then addressed the Convention: We all know, Mr. President, that birth and citizenship are not synonomous terms. We all agree that none but citizens of Louisiana shall vote, nor be elected governor. I cannot perceive how the clause in the constitution referred to, can have any thing to do with the question we are debating.

Mr. Preston rose not to detain the house for but very minutes, as they had kindly listened to him on a previous occasion when a similar principle was discussed. The only argument used is this, that the executive being now made commander in chief of the army and navy; that in the time of war a foreign born citizen would not, and could not do justice at such a time to the State. He thinks this argument entirely futile and erroneous. In the first place, we ought not to take war or the possibility of war, into consideration in this case at all. We are moreover, not likely to have war for a long period to come, at least. The progress of civilization taken in connexion with the present civilized state of the world, will present the recurrence of wars. But suppose there were a war, who declares war? not this State; and suppose the case might happen, that in such an emergency, an adopted citizen should happen to be governor of Louisiana, and that his loyalty were doubted? a remedy for the case could easily be provided. When he becomes a citizen of the United States he renounces all allegiance to foreign countries. His feelings and his interests become identified with our institutions and our laws; he respects and obeys. It is constantly before his mind that he has exchanged a land of oppression for a land of freedom, and according to the experience I have had of the adopted citizens' feelings, I regard them as faithful and constant as that of any citizen amongst us. Besides, let me call your attention to the fact that during the revolution, and also during the last war, we called them into our ranks as officers and soldiers; and what instance have we ever had of their want of loyalty, courage or patriotism? None.

Then do not let us legislate upon a doubt. I conceive, (said Mr. Preston) that it would be a violation of principle. Young aspiring men there are in professional and planting interests (whom chance decreed should draw their breath in a foreign country,) there are, who ought not to be, must not be, prevented from the highest honorable aspirations. Again, suppose a man comes from Europe with a child two years of age, in due time the parent becomes a citizen, and makes a good one. By his labor and his usefulness he prospers, and in due course of time he sends that son to school, where my child also goes. They continue there together for years; his child is smarter than mine, he progresses faster, and finally becomes a man, much more intelligent than mine ever will be. His whole youth has been passed here, his whole interests are here, and have ever been here. Is it right to deprive that man of the same privileges my son enjoys from the mere accident of his not being a native born? It is unjust, it is invidious, and no principle like that ought to be entertained for a single moment. I hope, and I think, that the sense of justice of this Convention will induce members to vote as I shall, to reject the clause.

Mr. Grymes intended to pass by the matter under discussion without any notice, but in the course of the debate, he was amazed at the constitutional question, which had been raised by the member from Lafourche, (Mr. Beatty,) and argued and commented upon so strenuously by the member from Rapides, (Mr. Brent.) For the first time in my life, said Mr. Grymes, have I heard such ideas as are now advanced; there is no article in the constitution, which, speaking for itself; says that it has a tendency to deprive this State, or any other State, of the sovereign power to regulate the qualifications of officers in this, or any other State. Under several similar regulations in other States, it is now clearly settled, that each State has a constitutional right to define the qualification of electors, and further, to define what the qualifications of those who aspire to office shall be. It has been stated on this floor that there is no impartial or fair dispensation made in the pale of the constitution of the U. S., in support of the principles that we are contending for should prevail. What then are those principles? It is asserted on this floor that the 2d section of the 4th article of the constitution says, "that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the several States." Now, Mr. President, how can impartial dispensation be had, unless those States who have never parted with their sovereignty shall have the right and privilege of regulating not only of their own domestic relation and affairs, but also the right of making a proper qualification for every officer in their government, beginning at the governor and thence descending to the most minor offices. But, sir, we have been told by the gentleman from the parish of Rapides, (Mr. Brent,) that after the luminous exposition he has given us of constitutional law, that no one can pretend to take the field against him on that question. For my own part, I am willing to pass by the constitutional logic of the gentleman; and why, because I think that if he be serious in the principles which he has advanced, he will dispute the right of the State of Louisiana to meet and debate upon what shall be her organic laws of future government.

The next position that gentlemen have rung so many changes upon on this floor, is on the question of the expediency, whether we should or should not make any discrimination between those who were native born and those who were adopted citizens. I ask any gentleman here present, be he a native citizen or be he an adopted citizen of the United States, whether he can ever cease to love the country of his birth? If he does so, he is no advantage to this country, and is not fit to remain in it. If native born Americans could ever forget the soil on which they were born, disfranchise every one of them; cast them off sooner than the foreigners who come here, either for their interest or their pleasure. But, sir, that is impossible; no native born American that loves the country in which he was born, and glories in her free institutions ever can or will do so. Now let us look at the case of the foreigner; the laws of nature can never be reversed; God implants that sentiment, "the love of country in our hearts," and no sophistry, and no metaphysics can deprive him of those sentiments which the God of nature has made our natural impulse. What then would be the situation of the State of Louisiana provided we were to have a governor born in a foreign country in the time of war! A sudden eruption may not happen, but it has happened, and it may happen again. Can we expect that man to use all his energies? although he may not act overtly treasonably, or in any other way against the laws and institutions of the country; still is it to be supposed that he can ever forget the country of his birth? The voice of nature is louder than the voice of honor, and then what follows? The governor halts between duty and feeling, while the native born American citizen loving and cherishing the land of his nativity, steps forth at the first cry of invasion and defends her rights, and meets the invader's first footsteps. Suppose in the case of war we have in our governor a foreigner; no man doubts him either in his integrity or otherwise; he sits in his cabinet and appears to do all that is required of him under the law, and yet errors may creep into his proceedings which will be fatal not only to the interests of our own State, but also to the interests of our common country. To presume that "in nature, which in nature is not," is a mockery and a farce. Men coming from a foreign country cannot be politically born again, although they go through the form of naturalization in this country. This love of their own country holds them in thraldom and paralyzes their exertions when their own country is concerned. He (Mr. G.) regards the elevation of a foreigner to office as governor of the State of Louisiana, perhaps more to be dreaded than from any other reason (that he has yet advanced,) for the following:

In the first place let us imagine we had a German elected governor; second place, an Irishman; third place, a Scotchman; fourth place, an Englishman; and fifth place a Frenchman. Now then our community is made up of creoles proper. French creoles, native French, native Americans, Germans, Irish, Scotch, and English.

Well, if either of the above five different classes should be fortunate enough to have one of their tribe elected, what a rejoicing there would be; and why, because, as a matter of course, they would get all the offices among the countrymen and associates of the man elected. Some men advance the idea that no such thing could possibly exist; but those who have been watching the impulses of the human heart, and their natural tendencies, or the actions of men, will be at no loss to ascribe to them their proper position. You know that this world is made up of jealousies, and that it is a world of strife between man and man; and more especially in our Lousiana, it is so between the different sects of foreigners amongst us. These are proverbial truths and susceptible of every day's demonstration. Our State is filling up rapidly with Germans, Irish, Scotch and English, and the people of all nations. Is it to be supposed, that if we had a German governor he would forget his German brethren in the distribution of the offices within his gift? Certainly not; and if he did not do it, he would be a man who has no sympathy or fellow feeling with his countrymen. This is not doubted by them. They are attached to each other strongly by their mother tongue, and their love of "fader and." So with the Irish, the English and the Scotch. The German then gives the offices within his gift to his brethren, the Germans. What a hubbub among the Irish, English and Scotch!!! The Irish governor distributes the "loaves and fishes" among his countrymen.

The Scotchman and the Englishman cannot be unmindful of their natural feelings, and then in such an event what is the result? Dissensions, difficulties, heart-bickerings steps in, and discord reigns throughout, and amongst whom?—why amongst the very people we profess it is our desire to serve. Now, sir, let us look at the other side of the medal. If there be a preference to be given in this question, it is to a native born American; and, sir, whenever you see in our country a native born citizen applying for an office, he occupies, as he ought to do, the first rank; and when he comes forward there is no disconent; the passions and the excitement of all the foreigners die away; and why? Reason tells them, common sense tells them, that the offices of the country and State in which they live naturally belongs to them.

The foreigner in such a case has nothing to appeal to to raise a cabal, a faction, or or party. All experience has shown that when that question is raised every tongue is silent.

The American character, however, for the last twelve years, has measurably been one of a yielding disposition, a kind of neutral character, hardly seeming to care who got the offices, as they had something better to attend to. Now, when the question and right is raised, you will find every young American at his post. But while I say this I say more, that distinguished and able foreigners will always be welcome, not only in Louisiana, but in every part of our common country, to share the posts of duty.

But, sir, shall we not have the poor consolation in Louisiana? Shall we not have one scintilla of American pride and feeling left? Shall we be deprived of one single item to hang on to, in making our new constitution? In a word, is the boon too great to ask at the hands of this Convention, that while the foreigners are cared for, especially in all else, in the offices and favors of the executive and judiciary, the poor American citizen knocks at your door, and asks you to reserve and protect one right, and at least give him one privilege; that this Convention will find it in their hearts to say no—I do not believe they will.

Mr. Soule moved to adjourn, desiring to address the Convention on this subject tomorrow.

The Convention then adjourned.

Friday, February 14th, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Walker, President, in the Chair.

The Rev. Mr. Warren opened the sitting with prayer.

Leave of absence was granted to Messrs. Covillion and Hynson.

Mr. Ratliff offered a resolution to authorize the committee on contingent expenses to pay the sergeant-at-arms thirty dollars, being for thirty days services of the boy Leon, hired by him, to clean up the hall used by the Convention. The resolution was adopted.

The Convention then took up the Order of the Day—being the same under discussion yesterday.

Mr. Soule having yesterday expressed his desire to address the house on this subject, would call their attention to a few remarks he desired to make on it.

The question yesterday debated has other important features, in the same section, which should recommend it to the rebuke of this house, and he desires to lay them before the Convention in such relief as will show the spirit in which they were conceived. He acknowledges that the matters which were under discussion yesterday, were very important, of sufficient importance to command the attention of and to excite the eloquence of the gentleman who then spoke. This question has already been presented in a different form. Then it was known how the members for restriction would vote. The question was the right of suffrage, in which was involved the question now agitated. The same spirit of jealousy which then existed now exists, and the attempt is now made to introduce the measure into debate, and to cover it with a seeming spirit of generosity, and they now desire to justify themselves and to make it appear that they do not wish to make a difference between the members of this body and the citizens, and that they have no desire to bring nativeism into the question; but he rejoices that they have shown it to us in its naked deformity, by asking us to draw a line of distinction between one citizen and another. He has listened with an attentive ear to the arguments used in support of the section, but however eloquent and brilliant was the effect, it is nevertheless certain that powerful genius is powerless when opposed to the principle of truth, however much it may be sought to be disguised. He says it is impossible to vindicate this measure. As he said on a former occasion, "without equality there could be no justice." This principle is not to be denied in a republican government; it is a primary right that all citizens shall be on an equal footing, and if that be correct he thinks he shall be able to show to the Convention that it does not fall within their power to divest any member of this social compact or partnership of any of the primary rights appertaining to him without his expressed consent. He feels great delicacy in his own position on this question, but hopes the Convention will do him the justice to believe, that, unless he had conceived that by his silence on the subject it would be supposed that he had been convinced by the brilliant oratory of the gentleman from New Orleans, he should have abstained from addressing the Convention, and been content to give a silent vote on the measure.

Neither the confidence with which the member from Assumption, (Mr. Taylor) had asserted that it was an incontrovertible truth, that we had the right to prohibit any particular class of citizens from becoming governor, nor the ingenious interpretation which the member from East Feliciana, (Mr. Saunders) sought to give to the federal compact in order to sustain this section, had been able to convince him. He has not dared to suffer himself to be carried away by the luxuries of fancy indulged in by the member from Orleans, (Mr. Grymes) in opposition to the arguments he appears so much to disregard.

Does the right exist to make a distinction between citizens of the same country?

This is the true, the only question to determine. Mr. Beatty, immediately after the candid and manly course of Mr. Dunn, insisted that it was unconstitutional; notwithstanding the arguments of the gentlemen of a contrary opinion, he (Mr. S.) thinks, that the doctrine of Mr. Beatty, of which Mr. Taylor admits the results, and of which doctrine the member from Rapides has so admirably maintained the principles, is the pure and sound doctrine; and that it is and was so regarded as well by the greatest statesmen of the past as of the present day, and that it has been considered the only tenable doctrine, by the ablest writers of the country. In retaining this odious feature in our fundamental laws, we are told we are but following the example of the framers of the federal compact.

Let us see how the States have sustained this doctrine. When the country was under excitement; when the two parties were fighting for power, even in the very halls of Congress, and when it was to be feared that some unholy feeling for one of two nations of Europe, should be the base upon which they would build their hopes of success for federal power, then the restriction was judged necessary that none but a native born citizen should be eligible to the office of president of the United States. But it is nevertheless true, that then, as now, this measure was considered an exception to the general rule, and it will not be denied that in that case more than all others, it showed the sanctity of the feelings of the framers of the constitution; for while it was a settled rule that all were equal, for the sake of expediency they engrafted the strange provision of depriving foreigners of that right. It was then determined that all citizens were equal, and were entitled to the same privileges, but policy, or rather the expediency of the moment, required that foreigners should be excluded from the highest office in the country. The framers of the constitution, after they had made this one exception, showed their wisdom by depriving the States of the power to do the same thing. Mr. Brent showed yesterday most conclusively to his mind, by reference to the precise words of the constitution, "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States;" that the framers of that instrument, most clearly intended to prohibit the States from following their example, by thus placing (except in that particular case) all the citizens of the republic on the same footing of perfect equality. The gentlemen who differ with us in opinion maintain confidently the adverse position; that signifies nothing, said Mr. Saunders, (if I am mistaken in the gentleman's words I desire to be corrected,) it is nothing more than a guarantee that the citizens in every State shall have the right to acquire general rights under the constitution in the several States. He (Mr. S.) is bold enough to assert that such a construction is untenable; that it is a construction defying the spirit in which it was established; it is their construction and not ours; but for fear of error he will read the article again. (Here he read the article.)

Mr. Brent, with whom he (Mr. S.) shall vote on this question, clearly showed that the intention of the framers of the constitution was, that the citizens of one State should not be regarded as strangers in any other State, but that in all things they should be regarded as equal to the citizens of that State. Mr. Grymes affects to believe in this interpretation of Mr. Brent's, that the idea is a novel one, and indulged in a vein of humor and wit in endeavoring to rebut it; but wit and railery are not arguments. If any one has advanced a novel idea on this subject it is Mr. Grymes himself, and he (Mr. S.) will endeavor to prove it. The member from New Orleans, who first took the floor on this subject, endeavored to expound to the Convention that inequality was not thought of by the framers of the constitution. To maintain that position he had to presume that when that clause which I have cited was made part of the constitution, that convention had not even cast a thought on the naturalization laws; but could the honorable member have based an argument on such a supposition? The hypothesis is however excusable, particularly as it accorded with the principle he was defending. But in all the intercourse which it has been his good fortune to have with Mr. Grymes, and he acknowledges with pride and with pleasure that it has been considerable, he has had reason to know the candid nature and deportment of the honorable member. He is in hopes that he may yet convince him that he is in error in the views which he has advanced, and he feels confident that if he does so, he will change his opinions and vote as he (Mr. Soulé) will.

How, Mr. President, (said Mr. S.) could it have happened that the framers of the constitution lost sight of the laws of naturalization? We find in the constitution, first, a formal exception relating to the presidency; second, an uniform rule of naturalization for the whole United States. Therefore according to his (Mr. S.'s) mind it was clear that in the latter clause, they had it in contemplation to guard particularly against any further abuse of the exception contained in the first clause, on the part of the different States. The assertion was, however, made so clearly and positively here yesterday to the contrary, that he thought that either his memory or his judgment of the matter were at fault, and he now only returns to the question because he is convinced that he is right and the opposite party wrong.

It may perhaps have happened that the gentleman, looking at the constitutions of several other States, has conceived that it was really constitutional. This corollary would seem really plausible, and might reasonably create a doubt, had not the federal constitution itself shown its inapplicability, nay, its falsity to the views and principles laid down by the makers thereof. Those wise statesmen looked to the time, when for the want of information, or from tacit submission on the part of the people, through their delegates, that State governments would violate the federal compact. And to whom did they confide the power to restrain? To the judiciary.

In the 6th article of the constitution you will find these words: "This constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land. The judges in each State shall be compelled to conform thereto, any constitutional or legal provisions made in the laws of any other State to the contrary notwithstanding."

It was to prevent this evil, the evil of some of the States, who would or might abuse the power vested in them, and considered by them as sovereignty, introducing foreign matter into their constitutions, that the remedy was provided by the framers of the constitution of the United States.

The principle now contended for is abhorrent to the first principles of republican government.

The judges of the United States courts can pay no attention, and will not, to any section of a constitution which we may make, or which the people of Louisiana may ever see proper to ratify. And where is there a more odious or detestable principle than that which makes an abuse of power a constitutional right?

States will deviate sometimes, legislatures likewise; but judges are still left to bring them back "nolens volens" to the supreme laws of the land. Away, then, with the authority they so much rely upon as to the conduct of the other States upon this point, to influence us! Perhaps those States who entered into the confederation have some weight in their reasons; while those who entered the union before we did, evidently are no authority for us, as they were the opinions of widely different characters from them of the present day. And yet he (Mr. S.) is at a loss to conceive why the authority of two or three States should be consulted paramount to that of so many other States, twenty at least. In order to state this question fairly, there are six States whose constitutions contain the provision sought to be engrafted on ours, viz: the States of Arkansas, Missouri, Alabama, Virginia, New York and Maine. What? with twenty-six States entered into this federal compact, all having in view, and before their eyes, the constitution of the general government; while twenty reject the odious measure proposed to us; and six inflict the wrong; shall we be told that we ought to add one more to the restricting States? No, wisdom forbids it, justice forbids it. He felt that he had said enough on this point; if experience, the experience of other States, and the authority of some of our greatest men in the union can have weight, surely he had said enough, in endeavoring, as he had, to express their opinions and sentiments. God forbid that placing all on a footing of equality, we should hesitate to choose between the wisdom of twenty states, and the intemperance of six.

Let us now pass to the most important question of this debate; and let us see whether the principles advanced by Messrs. Conrad, Grymes and Saunders, be or be not correct; that when the framers of the constitution inserted in the federal compact the article on the naturalization laws, they did or did not have in view such a case as is now before us. Now, he (Mr. S.) contends that they had just such a case in view. We must not dupe ourselves by imagination; and there is no one but is bound to admit that we cannot sanction such a principle as is contended for, without trampling that sacred instrument, the constitution of the United States, under foot. Whenever it was acknowledged by the States, that the federal constitution was the supreme law of the land, that power invested in the hands of, and granted to congress, became an exclusive privilege. Mr. Grymes denies this, and affects to treat it as a new idea, and extraordinary. It may be so—but the authors of the federalist, whom I must regard, (despite his great regard for the opinion of his friend, Mr. G.) as the best authority, do not seem to agree in opinion with the idea advanced by Mr. G, on this question.

By referring to page 231 of the Federalist, we find the following remarks on this interesting subject:

"The dissimilarity in the rules of naturalization has long been remarked as a fault in our system, and as laying a foundation for intricate and delicate questions. In the fourth article of the confederation it is declared, that the free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States, and the people of each State shall in every other, enjoy all the privileges of trade and commerce, &c. There is a confusion of language here, which is remarkable. Why the terms free inhabitants, are used in one part of the article; free citizens in another, and people in another; or what was meant by superadding "to all privileges and immunities of free citizens"—all the privileges of trade and commerce, cannot be easily determined. It seems to be a construction scarcely avoidable, however that those who come under this denomination of free inhabitants of a State, although not citizens of such State, are entitled, in every other State, to all the priviliges of free citizens of the latter; that is to greater privileges than they may be entitled to in their own State; so that it may be in the power of a particular State, or rather every other State is laid under a necessity, not only to confer the rights of citizenship in other States, upon any whom it may allow to become inhabitants within its jurisdiction. But were an exposition of the term of inhabitants to be admitted, which would confine the stipulated privileges to citizens alone, the difficulty is diminished only, not removed. The only improper power would still be retained by each State, of naturalizing aliens in every other State. In one State, residence for a short time, confers all the rights of citizenship; in another qualifications of greater importance are required. An alien, therefore legally incapaciated for certain rights in the latter, may, by previous residence only in the former, elude his incapacity: and thus the law of one State, be preposterously rendered paramount to the law of another, within the jurisdiction of the other."

"We owe it to mere casuality, that very serious embarrassments on this subject have been hitherto escaped. By the laws of several States certain descriptions of aliens, who had rendered themselves obnoxious, were laid under interdicts inconsistent, not only with the rights of citizenship, but with the privileges of residence. What would have been the consequence, if such persons by residence or otherwise, had acquired the character of citizens under the laws of another State and then asserted their rights as such, both to residence and citizenship within the State proscribing them? Whatever the legal consequences might have been, other consequences would have resulted of too serious a nature not to be provided against. The new constitution has accordingly with great propriety, made provision against them, and all others proceeding from the defect of the confederation on this head, by authorizing the general g overnment to establish a uniform rule of naturalization throughout the United States."

In another part, viz: on page 164, we find these words, which clearly shews the States had no right over the matter. "This must necessarily be exclusive because if each State had power to prescribe a distinct rule, there could be no uniform rule."

Under the old constitution, provision similar to that of the actual constitution had placed the old States on a par, each State having the right of making their own laws of naturalization and many of their constitutions sanctioned just such provisions as they are now trying to fasten on to our constitution. The framers of the constitution of the United States, in order to put an end to this conflict, decreed, that Congress alone should be invested with the power to regulate it. What then are we doing here? we certainly have not the right to disfranchise all citizens or any citizen who has under the laws of Congress, acquired as many rights as we ourselves have, and yet it is sought to be done, and under the garb of this very law we rely upon. The doctrine we contend for is not a novel doctrine, it is a doctrine established and perfected when the constitution of the United States was made.

The confident assertions however to the contrary, made him, (Mr. S.) more than doubt whether the great Hamilton, and other eminent statesmen, bore him out in his view of the question, and he was again compelled to resort to authority and either give way to the eloquent speech of Mr. Grymes, or still further to adhere to the doctrine laid down by Mr. Brent.

He has examined every work extant, that he knows of, treating on this subject, for anything that could change the Convention or his mind, but has not been able to do so, on the contrary he is more and more satisfied, that the States have no power over the matter, and that it rests exclusively with Congress. Hear what Story says in relation to it.

In the third volume, first page, paragraphs, 1097, 1098, 1099, read thus:

Sec. 1097. The next clause is, that Congress "shall have power to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States."

Sec. 1098. The propriety of confiding the power to establish an uniform rule of naturalization to the national government seems not to have occasioned any doubt or controversy in the Convention. For aught that it appears on the journals, it was conceded without objection. Under the confederation, the States possessed the sole authority to exercise the power; and the dissimilarity of the system in different States was generally admitted, as a prominent defect, and laid the foundation of many debate and intricate questions. As the free inhabitants of each State were entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in all the other States, it followed that a single State possessed the power of farming into every other State, with the enjoyment of every immunity and privilege, any alien, whom it may choose to incorporate into its own society, however repugnant such admission might be to their polity, conveniencies, and even prejudices. In effect every State possessed the power of naturalizing aliens in every other State; a power as mischievous in its nature, as it was indiscreet in its actual exercise. In one State, residence for a short time might and did confer the rights of citizenship. In others, qualifications of greater importance were required. An alien therefore, incapacitated for the possession of certain rights by the laws of the latter, might, by a previous residence and naturalization in the former, elude at pleasure all their salutary regulation for self-protection. Thus the laws of a single State were preposterously rendered paramount to the laws of all the others, even within their own jurisdiction. And it has been remarked with equal truth and justice, that it was owing to mere casualty, that the exercise of this power under the confederation did not involve the Union in the most serious embarrassments. There is great wisdom, therefore, in confiding to the national government the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization throughout the United States. It is of the deepest interest to the whole Union, to know who are entitled to enjoy the rights of citizens in each State, since they thereby, in effect, become entitled to the rights of citizens in all the States. If aliens might be admitted indiscriminately to enjoy all the rights of citizens at the will of a single State, the Unio might itself be endangered by an influx of foreigners hostile to its institutions, ignorant of its powers, and incapable of a due estimate of its privileges.

Sec. 1099. It follows from the very nature of the power, that to be useful, it must be exclusive; for a concurrent power in the States would bring back all the evils and embarrassments, which the uniform rule of the constitution was designed to remedy. And, accordingly, though there was a momentary hesitation, when the constitution first went into operation, whether the power might not still be exercised by the States subject only to the control of congress, so far as the legislation of the latter extended, as the supreme law; yet the power is now firmly established to be exclusive. The federalist, indeed, introduced this very case as entirely clear to illustrate the doctrine of an exclusive power by implication, arising from the repugnancy of a similar power in the States. "This power must necessarily be exclusive," says the authors; "because if each State had power to prescribe a distinct rule, there could be no uniform rule."

This language is clear and precise, and distinctly says, that when a citizen acquires a citizenship in any one State, he is entitled to the same rights and privileges as are the citizens in any and all the other States. Thus far, the authority goes to show that the States had no right to infringe on the privileges thus left exclusively with congress;—and he, (Mr. Soulé,) thinks this section of the constitution passed, in view of the very emergency, we are now placed in, with regard to naturalized citizens, Story, so thinking, expresses himself in vol. 3, pp. 673, chap. 40, paragraph 1798, 99, 1800.

Sec. 1798. The fourth article of the constitution contains several important provisions, some of which have been already considered. Among these are the faith and credit to be given to State acts, records and judgments, and the mode of proving them, the effects thereof; the admission of new States into the union, and the regulation and disposal of the territory and other property of the United States. We shall now proceed to those which still remain for examination.

Sec. 1799. The first is, "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." There was an article on the same subject in the confederation, which declared "that the free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States; and the people of each State shall, in every other, enjoy all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions and restrictions as the inhabitants thereof respectively," &c. It was remarked by the Federalist that there is a strange confusion in this language. Why the terms free inhabitants, are used in one part of the article, free citizens in another; or what is meant by superadding to "all privileges and immunities of free citizens," "all the privileges of trade and commerce," cannot easily be determined. It seems to be a construction, however, scarcely avoidable, that those who come under the denomination of free inhabitants of a State, although not citizens of such State, are entitled, in every State, to all the privileges of free citizens of the latter; that is, to greater privileges than they may be entitled to in their own State. So that it was in the power of a particular State, (to which every other State was bound to submit,) not only to confer the rights of citizenship in other States, to any persons whom it might admit to such rights within itself, but to any persons whom it might allow to become inhabitants within its jurisdiction. But even if an exposition could be given to the term inhabitants, which would confine the stipulated privileges to citizens alone, the difficulty would be diminished only, and not removed. The very improper power was, under the confederation, still retained in each State, of naturalizing aliens in every other State.

Sec. 1800. The provision in the constitution avoids all this ambiguity. It is plain and simple in its language; and its object is not easily to be mistaken. Connected with the exclusive power of naturalization in the natural government, it puts at rest many of the difficulties which affected the construction of the article of the confederation. It is obvious that if the citizens of each State were to be deemed aliens to each other, they could not take or hold real estate, or other privileges, except as other aliens. The intention of this clause was to confer on them, if one may so say, a general citizenship; and to communicate all the privileges and immunities which the citizens of the same State would be entitled to under like circumstances.

Such being the doctrine of Story, he thinks it puts the question at rest. He considers it connected with the naturalization laws. It is the language and it is the spirit of the constitution and the settled policy of the country. Who then doubts we have properly considered the construction of this clause of the constitution of the United States? Who now doubts that this restriction would be a flagrant violation of the national compact?

There are other features connected with this restrictive measure, worthy of consideration, which render it still more odious. Is not the ground taken by Mr. Grymes, the ground of expediency, proof positive, an acknowledgement on his part of want of argument or reasons to sustain him in the ground which he takes? He (Mr. S.) thinks it is; for certainly it can form no part of our duties, nor have any effect in regulating the power with which we are confided. We are here to legislate not for an hour, a day, a week, nor for half a century. We are here for the purpose of raising a political foundation that shall ensure the political rights, the happiness and liberty of generations to come. We cannot be too careful, therefore, in yielding to our feelings on the ground of expediency. We are here to lay the corner stone of our public security, and to remove those defects in the constitution of 1812, which thirty-two years' experience have made clear to the people of Louisiana. But we are to do this, work with candor and without prejudice; and we must show to future generations that in forming a constitution by which they were to be governed, that we were not actuated by the transient and evanescent expediency of the moment. We must show them that we lost sight of party spirit at the moment, and we only desired to give them a constitution based on the immutable principles of truth and justice, equal rights and equal privileges. And yet we are told that expediency requires that the governor of Louisiana should not be a foreigner. This language shows a deep-rooted feeling, on the part of the opposers to it, which cannot be disguised. Whence comes this feeling? Even in his, (Mr. S's) time, he recollects things which appear as yesterday to him, foreign to the question of native born and adopted citizenship. Other matters and other names occupied public attention, and other men were then the victims of the hour. Is it because the times are changed, that we have to seek new subjects to emulate on the altar of prejudice? Be it so, attempt to enforce the spirit of persecution. The times are not far off when, yielding this question, it will not only embrace the limits of the State, but will gradually come down to districts, then to parishes, then to towns, and finally we shall be told that we must choose our governor or representatives from such a plantation.

Here Mr. CLAIBORNE called Mr. SOULE to order, as in his opinion he was giving to the debate an unwarrantable latitude, and was impugning the motives of members of the Convention.

Mr. SOULE did not intend to impugn the motives of any one; nor was he aware that he had said any thing which could be so construed, at any rate nothing was farther from his mind in any remark he had made.

Mr. GARCIA had listened attentively to Mr. SOULE, found nothing objectionable in his remarks, and was of opinion he was not out of order, this appeared the general opinion of the house, &c.

Mr. SOULE proceeded. He was not aware that he had done more than relate the history of the past; and as no bad feelings rankled in his bosom, he could not imagine how his analysis could have given offence to the president. It is in the nature of the spirit of restriction to become daily worse. If to day it is permitted to restrict the privileges of naturalized citizens, in a short time the same feeling will be pursued towards citizens of other States, then to some particular class of native born citizens of Louisiana, then another, until finally it will be limited to a single sugar plantation. Mr. Grymes' reasoning would go to show that a native born citizen is a supreme being to an adopted citizen; if that be so, why is not a Louisianian superior to the citizens of another State? And then why not one class of Louisianians better than another class? By such restriction you will bring about confusion and discordance, and you will annihilate love of country!

In the mandate of the people we are told (and it cannot be denied) to "extend the right of suffrage." But of what avail would that be, if the principle of restriction prevail? we must tell them at the same time, "you can only elect one or the other of 12 men for your governor;" if 12, why not any other number? Such a doctrine does not conform to the true principles of democracy —it is not founded on truth or justice.

Mr. GRYMES has told you that if this motion to reject does not prevail, you will have placed in the hands of an adopted citizen, as governor, powers that may clash with his nature and his duty. For arguments sake, let us admit it. The framers of our United States constitution, and the report of the committee which we are now debating, have fortunately placed before our eyes and within our grasp, the evil and the remedy.

The members of this Convention, comprising the committee on executive affairs, had wisely reported so that the least possible evil should be met by the greatest possible good. Well, the constitutional power, determined recently to be such as should guide this Coonvention in admitting, "that in case of a war, the governor cannot and shall not command our military forces without the advice and consent of the legislature," (and Mr. S. thinks that provision would have never left the governor in a false position,) has been stricken out. I will not say who did strike out that provision now, nor why it was stricken out; the parties who are intimately connected with the subject on the other side will understand my meaning.

The question is, have we acted wisely in removing the guard which had been placed on the constitutional powers of the governor, in a military point of vlew? the power which would have prevented abuse on the part of foreigners, (or the foreigner who might have popularity enough to be elected governor,) was taken away from the constitution by the member from New Orleans himself, and then when the guard is removed, he tells you of it himself, but will not tell you, 't'was I that did it.'

We have been asked what would be the situation of a naturalized citizen acting as governor of Louisiana, and we at war with the country of his birth? He could well retort by taking in his hand the history of the American revolution, and ask who were the only traitors during that eventful period? He would not soil his lips with their names; they were not, however, adopted citizens. He has the warmest feelings, the warmest affections for the native born Americans, and will have always his best wishes; and in all cases where they seek office if they have equal qualifications, his support, in preference to any naturalized citizen.

He can only say in reply to the gentleman from New Orleans, that, if, contrary to all probability, any naturalized citizen should be at the head of our government, and who at the moment' of danger should halt between duty and feeling, he does not hesitate to say he would be hurled from power; or he would be compelled to rush forward to the battle field, crying with the knights of old, of his (Mr. S.'s) native country, "Fais ce que doit, advienne que pourra."

He conceives that all naturalized citizens, not only by duty, but by inclination, would uphold the rights and liberties of his country in any emergency; they come from a land of oppression to a land of liberty, and there are few men who cannot appreciate the difference; and feeling it, will help to maintain the rights of freemen of this land of their choice and their adoption. Mr. Grymes' last argument was predicated upon the evils that would ensue from the election of a naturalized citizen as governor, in time of peace, and took it for granted that the loaves and fishes which governors have it in their power to distribute, would be distributed among his fellow countrymen; and that he would do so must be taken for granted, or he would not otherwise follow the natural feeling of his heart.

He agrees with the gentleman thus far, that whenever there is an office to bestow, and the native born citizen is qualified for it, he ought to have it, he is entitled to the preference, but without equal ability and equal capacity, he does not agree with the honorable member that he shouid have any preference, and he feels confident that any naturalized citizen whom the people might so far honor with their confidence as to make him Governor, (notwithstanding the opinion expressed by the member from New Orleans,) would strictly follow this just rule; but if the naturalized citizen be the most fit, the most capable, he would deprecate the policy of giving the office to another because he was native born. The rule could not be applied with justice. Make your laws if you will, so as to prevent foreigners becoming citizens but when you have admitted them as members of the same social compact, they must be on an equal footing with the natives. Our feelings should always be governed with equality; the provision of the section now before us, is not to guard, and protect those rights, but the very contrary, to destroy them. But gentlemen forget while they are so strenuous for what they conceive to be due to the native born citizen, that duty which they owe to the people as a whole. I say the whole people because the number of naturalized citizens who could or would aspire to the office of governor, is so small that the wrong done to them would be scarcely felt and if alone on their account I might withdraw my opposition to the section, but by sustaining it you deprive the whole people of their franchise—you deprive them of the right of extending that franchise, you restrain them, you set the limits on them; and by setting limits on their choice, the people may be restrained to choose their governor, from perhaps the least capable of our citizens.

There are gentlemen who are constantly crying out the danger of repeated Conventions, of the impolicy of making constitutions upon constitutions. Let those who are so deeply impressed with that danger, then beware; for it is not by going contrary to the will of the people that the evil can be remedied. The people know what they want, and if you disobey their mandate, they have the power to right themselves, and they will do it: if we, instead of obeying their mandate, obstinately persist in pressing restriction after restriction upon their rights and privileges, instead of extending the right of suffrage which we are here for; we forget our duties, and labor in vain, for the people will strike a death blow to all our labors, and the constitution will never be ratified. It seemed, sir, to cause some surprise, that I should have asserted that the restrictive system sought to be forced into our constitution was odious in every possible way.

Sir, the spirit of restriction never stops; they are not content with depriving the naturalized citizen of his rights, but they go further, and make another distinction between that class of citizens who became so prior to the treaty of cession; they make a difference between the citizen of 1803 and 1812, which are now confounded with those from 1812 to 1845. The committee do not wish to include in the exclusion those who came in under the treaty. Odious as is to me the principle of excluding any class, the idea of granting special privileges to any one portion of naturalized citizens over another portion of them, is a thousand times more odious. The injustice of it is not the most odious part; it is repugnant to the very letter, to say nothing of the spirit of the constitution of the United States.

The 9th section of Article 1 reads thus:

"No bill of attainder, or expost facto law, shall be passed." Congress has no power to pass such a law; the highest, the most important consideration forbids them—the organic law of the land. Surely, Sir, we can have no power then, to do what they are expressly forbidden to do. The foreigner, when he becomes a citizen of the United States, forswears allegiance to all foreign powers; he binds himself to the country of his adoption; he makes a contract of political association, and when he takes the oath which is unalienable, he becomes vested with all the rights of citizenship, and he cannot be deprived of them. In this section, you deprive all who have become citizens since 1803; you deprive them of one of the privileges secured them by the constitution and laws of the land. Can you do so? You cannot; and if you do, not all the eloquence, nor sarcasm, nor sophistry, which has been resorted to, in aid of the odious measure, can strip it of its true character—an unjust and outrageous violation of the constitution of the U. States.

Gentlemen say, you have the right to do this. I deny it. You may wonder at my boldness, but I tell you the highest tribunal in our land has settled the question, (the Supreme Court of the U. S.,) and I specially desire to call your attention to the case of the Dartmouth College, vs. the State of Massachusetts. That college received its charter from the king of England. After Massachusetts became one of the United States, a resolution was brought into the legislature modifying some of the clauses of the charter, and making sundry other rules for the government of the college; that resolution passed, but the original trustees thinking it was a stretch of power, resisted the law, and carried the case up to the Supreme Court. The decision was in favor of the trustees of the college, on the ground that no State or individual had the right to do any act that could impair the faith of a free existing contract. Why, then, have we the right to take away the vested rights of naturalized citizen? Rights acquired under the constitution and laws of congress made in pursuance thereof? We cannot do so, and I defy you or any man to show me the shade of an argument or reason for such an assumption of power.

Here the honorable member said that his physical strength would not allow him to proceed, and kindly thanked the house for their patience and indulgence in listening to his remarks.

Mr. Benjamin rose to address the Convention on this question with some embarrassment, which, however, was alone caused from not having had the pleasure of listening to the arguments from the beginning of the discussion, as he was compelled to be absent yesterday during the greater part of the debate.

He has listened to the eloquent remarks that have to-day been made, with much pleasure; and congratulates the honorable gentleman, not alone on his forensic ability, but because he has said and embraced in his speech all that can be said on that side of the question. I feel, Mr. President, that it is a duty which I owe to the members of this Convention, to the members of the committee who made the report which is now under consideration, to state here plainly, openly, clearly, that it was at my suggestion that the word "native," (the gist of controversy,) was inserted in the section now before us for our consideration. If, therefore, sir, there be censure to be cast upon any one, for that apparantly objectionable word, upon my shoulders it must in justice fall. It becomes then, I conceive, a part of my duty to reply to the arguments offered by the honorable delegate who last addressed you; and to the best of my humble ability to endeavor to refute them.

The very able and eloquent address which he has made you, comprises, not alone all his own views on this subject, but without doubt includes all that has been advanced by other members who agree with him in opinion. Consequently the few remarks with which I shall trouble the Convention, will be taken, (as I desire they should be,) as my reply to all that has been advanced by those who are opposed to the principle which I desire to see established in our organic laws.

The honorable gentleman, (Mr. Soulè,) had scarcely commenced his remarks on this question, ere he thought proper to rebuke the spirit of this provision, and ascribed to us feelings that ennoble no man. He is mistaken, greatly in error, if he supposes that the section under consideration was ever conceived or thought of, under what he pleases to term the doctrine of "nativeism."

I ask the gentleman to show, if he can, where, how, and in what manner the native born American has ever shown any jealousy towards his naturalized brother-citizen. Look at the history of the country, and point out to me, if you can, a single instance where any such feeling has been known to exist. Nor, sir, have we done any thing in this hall, that I am aware of, either in discussing the rights of suffrage, or in any other way, that should render us liable to censure, on the part of either our brother-delegates or our constituents.

How have we invaded or restricted the rights of the naturalized citizens? Have you deprived him of the rights which he has constitutionally acquired? Have you placed him, heretofore, on a different footing from the citizens of our sister States? Are not all on the same footing? Then what becomes of the assumption that we have restricted them in their rights? When they can show me that, then I shall be willing to acknowledge that I have been mistaken in the previous acts of this Convention.

So far as I understand the action of the Convention up to this time, it is that we have said we deem it essential that no man shall have a voice in our elections who has not been here for the period of two years.

The position advanced by some of the members on this floor, on a recent occasion, that political residence could be acquired by aliens, is to his, (Mr. B.'s) mind, an absurd one; and we did not then fail so to express ourselves fully and sustain the falsity of such a doctrine. How then stands the case?

They assumed that principle; we denied it—and what was the action of the Convention on the subject? Why, they decided simply that an alien could not acquire a political residence. What then becomes of the charge that we have attacked the rights and privileges of the foreigner? Where then is the odious restriction which, trumpet-tongued, we have so repeatedly been charged with, by the honorable member, as endeavoring to fasten upon the foreigner? We have respected their feelings, and have in all respects harmonized with them as with our American brethren. Do those gentlemen think, who profess so much zeal here, and pretend to so much love for the foreigner, that they are alone in their feelings of gratitude to those foreigners who, in the hour of our country's need, came to our aid? No sir. All Americans feel it. But feeling it and acknowledging it, as I am willing to do, that we are indebted to them for that service, is that a reason why we should place ourselves politically at their mercy? Is that a reason why we should deliver ourselves, bound hand and foot, over to them, that they may obtain the mastery over us in our own government and of our own institutions? For my part, sir, I shall forever oppose any measure, come from what quarter it may, that will tend to take from the hands of the American people the reins of their own government.

The honorable gentleman in adverting to the primary rights with which all American citizens are vested, endeavored to illustrate his argument by making a comparison between the common partnerships of individuals and the political partnerships of naturalized and native born citizens, and tried to show you, as an argument, that they were equally concerned in the welfare, or misfortunes of the government, and had to contribute, if necessary, their quota to its wants. For my part I cannot conceive there is any analogy in the two cases, and if there were, the gentleman's argument would not be aided by it, for it frequently happens in partnerships for business that it is mutually agreed that one of the partners is alone and solely charged with the government of the partnership affairs.

But, sir, I deny the gentleman's premises, I deny what he has been pleased to term an axiom, that all men are entitled to equal political rights, and that we have no power under our mandate from the people, to circumscribe those rights. If such were the case, sir, whence have we derived the power upon the restrictions as to residence, color, age, which we have already imposed without our right to do so being questiond? If the gentleman's argument be correct, it should hold good throughout, but its error is evinced when it is carried to its extreme, and its falsity is proven by a complete reductio ad absurdum.

Sir, scarcely a provision of any kind can be proposed in this hall without an outcry about "restriction." Every measure proposed is at once attacked as a "restriction" upon the people. Allow me to ask for what pupose we are here? Is it not to make a constitution? And what is a constitution except a system of rules and restrictions intended to secure a permanent government, which shall be unaffected by the changing views and passions of the hour; which shall restrict majorities and protect minorities? If the people are to be governed without restrictions at all, as some honorable members would seem to insist, what a farce are our proceedings? Why not, on every question that shall arise, assemble the people in your public square and let the majority decide? Surely, sir, this is no correct view of our mandate or our duties; and since every right thinking man must admit that some guards and restrictions must be imposed on the people, in every constitution, let gentlemen prove when a restriction is proposed that it is in-opportune or inexpedient, and not content themselves with merely exclaiming against restrictions. Sir, gentlemen who push their arguments to these extremes are not the true friends of popular government.

It was well remarked the other day in debate, by an honorable delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Grymes) that a government may become so popular as to be no government at all. An absence of all restrictions, leaves of necessity, power in the hands of the strongest or in other words, reduces society to anarchy; and yet when we endeavor to avoid this result by guarding our government, our institutions, and the prosperity of our country from danger, honorable members reply by accusing us of a bias towards aristocracy or monarchy. The question under discussion has been presented on two grounds, both of which I shall endeavor to treat—1st, have we the power; 2d, is it expedient to insert this provision in our new constitution.

The gentleman has roundly asserted that this State has not the constitutional power to prescribe, as a qualification for governor, that he should be a native born citizen of the United States. This, sir, is indeed a novel, and I may be allowed to add, a startling remark from a gentleman so learned and so eminent in his profession as the honorable delegate from New Orleans. I can say, sir, with truth, that having grown up from my earliest youth under the institutions of the country, having been compelled to make them my special study in the practice of my profession, and having the right to say, without I hope being accused of presumption, that they are familiar to me, I never till this hour heard a doubt suggested as to the constitutional power of a State to prescribe the qualifications required for holding office in its government.

On what can the opponents of so plain and so clear a right, base their opposition? Surely not on the paragraph which has been quoted from the constitution, that "the citizens of each State shall enjoy all the privileges and immunities enjoyed by the citizens of other States," for who denies the rights of citizens of other States as hereby guaranteed to him? If any one, I am not aware of it. It does not, however, follow that we are to admit all the arguments the gentleman draws from these premises. The constitution does not say, that in consequence of his being a citizen of the United States, and of another State, that he shall be vested thereby with the right of an elector in every State, nor that from that cause he shall possess a qualification for any of the public offices in the State government without complying with the requirements of the laws of such State.

Such a proposition as that now advanced is really too absurd to come from so respectable a source. If that doctrine be sustained, why, Sir, a citizen of Mississippi may cross your border to-morrow, place his name before the people, and if he gets votes enough may insist upon his right to take the gubernatorial chair. And can it be possible that gentlemen think they can meet this question by the argument drawn from an examination of the constitutions of our sister States? Those who preceded me on the same side showed as authority a similar provision in the constitutions of six States, and urged this fact to show that the power had never been questioned. To this the honorable delegate replies that nineteen States have no such provision in their constitutions, and he infers from this that the framers of these constitutions believed they did not possess the power of inserting such a clause. This is indeed a most extraordinary inference. Surely, Sir, the absence of such a clause in those constitutions, proves nothing more than that their framers deemed it inexpedient to insert it. Since, however, authority is desired upon this question, to me so plain as to admit of no dispute, let us examine authorities and see which side they lend their weight. Among the States which have adopted this so-called odious restriction in their constitutions is the State of Virginia. In the year 1830, a convention was called to alter, amend or remodel the old constitution or adopt a new one, as in their wisdom to them should seem fit. That Convention, Sir, numbered among its members some of the ablest men ever known in this Union. Mr. Munroe, who served as president of the United States for two terms, then presided over that body. Mr. Madison who had also been president of the United States for the same period of time, who moreover had a hand in the making of the first constitution of Virginia, and also in the making of the sacred instrument, (which we are now accused of endeavoring to render nugatory) the constitution of the United States; and Mr. Marshall, who so long and so ably filled the office of chief justice of the United States, were members of that body.

In that constitution, so made by the aid and advice of these same men, it is provided that no person should be governor of Virginia, unless he was—1st, thirty years of age; 2d, a native born citizen of the United States at the adoption of the constitution; 3d, that he must have resided five years in the State before eligible. And, Sir, are we to be told that such men as Madison, one of the framers of the constitution of the U. S. himself—Monroe, who had for years been administering the laws under that constitution as president of the United States—and Marshall, who for upwards of thirty years, had presided on the supreme bench, did not understand the constitution of their country; and that they engrafted an unconstitutional provision in the constitution of Virginia? Are we to be told that such men, full of experience, of vast and profound learning, as pure men as ever lived in this country, whose names and fame are without spot or blemish,—are we, I again ask, to be told that they voted for the insertion of a clause in the constitution of their own beloved State, which the honorable delegate from New Orleans represents as a palpable violation of the constitution of the United States? Between such authority and the authority of the honorable gentleman, much as I value it on other occasions, I cannot pause; and if I err, I can only say I am glad to err in such company. And even had my impressions been different from what they are, I should with such authority before me have questioned my own judgment and yielded my own opinions. But we do not rely on that authority alone. We have, we think, evidence of a more imposing and more important character yet to offer. It is the action of the congress of the United States on this very question. Several of the States who have engrafted the so-called odious provision in their several constitutions, viz: the States of Arkansas, Missouri, and Alabama, were not members of the old confederation of thirteen States; they came into the Union long after. Each one of these States was compelled to submit its constitutions to the congress of the United States, that the same might be by them examined to see that no clause or provision was inserted therein that should clash with any of the provisions of the constitution of the United States. Now, see what we do see? why, that congress has sanctioned these several constitutions, and admitted the States named into the Union with this terribly odious provision in them. Shall we, Sir, say that thrice the representatives and senators of the whole country, the presidents of the United States, have obstinately maintained an unconstitutional right to be a constitutional one? Shall we say that they have thrice been the dupes of their own ignorance, and the enemies of the constitutional rights of their own countrymen? One would almost be tempted to smile at the idea, were this not so serious a question.

In a word then, sir, I assert that our power to insert the clause disputed, is not a doubtful question; that we have the power to do so constitutionally, and the only question we now have to decide is, is it expedient for us to do so? My own impression is, that we should unhesitatingly insert it, if we study our own interests. When I first proposed to the committee to insert it in the section, it was a natural instinct that prompted me to believe that it was necessary. Since then I have given the subject calm and serious deliberation, and I have daily, nay, hourly become more and more convinced of the necessity and propriety of the measure. Sir, I have listened with delight to the eloquent eulogy pronounced by the delegate from New Orleas on the brave men who lent us their aid in 1815—on Savary, St. Gemes, and their associates—I have witnessed, in imagination, the memorable scenes so graphically and eloquently described by the honorable gentleman from Rapides, (Mr. Brent) and I have felt my heart glow with feelings of gratitude towards the brave and generous men, who, amidst the smoke and carnage of battle, breasted the British bayonets, and, side by side with American citizens, perilled their lives in our country's cause—honor and gratitude to them all?—and I will yield to no man in expressing on all occasions, and in all suitable manner, the acknowledgements that are due to their eminent services.

But, sir, let us not allow our feelings to obtain the mastery over our judgment. Those brave men were the sons of France, and the enemy was the hereditary foe of France. Sir, does the gentleman, can any man believe, that if our invaders had been French, these gallant men would have gone to battle against their countrymen. Sir, they would have recoiled with horror at the fore-thought with the same instinctive abhorrence as if called on to smite the cheek of the mother that bore them. How then, sir, can we place as the commander-in-chief of our armies, an individual, who, in the event of a war with the country of his birth, would be exposed to this conflict of duties and of feelings. The honorable gentleman tells us that in an event like this, a gallant spirit, stifling all that love of country, of our natal soil, that the creator has implanted in the breast of every man, would take for his motto, "fais ce que dois, advienne que pourra." Sir, this may sound very finely in theory, but every feeling of our nature would recoil from its practice. I call on the gentleman to point out to me the man, nay sir, I ask if he himself, and surely there is none whose eminence as a citizen would render him more worthy of so exalted a station, I ask if he himself, as commander of our armies, were called to lead our forces into the field against the country of his birth, would he not feel his inmost soul revolt at the bare idea? Whether the bare sight of the flag of his native country would not bring back upon his memory every thought and feeling of his childhood and his youth, and whether he could steel his heart to the task of carrying death and carnage into the midst of those in whose ranks might, perchance, be found the playmates of his childhood, the companions of his youth, nay, perhaps a brother or a parent? Never, sir, never could he do it. It is our duty then, sir, in making this organic law, to provide in such manner as to render it impossible, in any contingency, for our chief magistrate to be placed in such a position. The necessity is too apparent to admit of doubt.

But, sir, the gentleman tells us that if this clause were to affect the naturalized citizens alone he might yield his opposition. He however sees in it a restriction on the citizens at large in circumscribing the circle from which they are to choose their chief magistrate. This may be, sir, and all that we can answer is, that the necessities of the case make the restrictive expedient, and therefore it is that we support it. We are accused of usurping power not confided to us by the people, and inserting clauses on which they have not expressed their opinion. To this we reply, that it was impossible that every question that might arise in the performance of our duties could be foreseen or pre-judged by the people; and I, for one understand that, by the mandate with which they have honored me, I am authorized to use the best judgment and discretion in my power in acting and voting as to me shall seem best adapted to secure their happiness and prosperity on all questions that shall arise in the course of our deliberation?

Once again, sir, let not the feelings which dictated the proposal of this measure be misunderstood. Let it not be said that it is an attack directed against the naturalized citizen. He is received with open arms into the country. Every avenue to fortune which cupidity could desire, every path to office which the most unbounded ambition can aspire, are all opened to him. Is it too much to ask that there should be one small spot reserved sacred for the native of the soil? that the chief magistracy of the State, as that of the United States, shall be regarded as a temple within whose precincts none but the American people themselves shall ever be permitted an entrance? Our duty to our country makes it necessary that we should so determine, and I trust that such will be the vote of this Convention.

Mr. MARIGNY desired to address the house on this question, but as it was so late he moved to adjourn till to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. VOORHIES objected, and called for the yeas and nays, which resulted as follows, viz:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Brazeale, Briant, Brumfield, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Grymes, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, McRea, Mayo, O'Bryan, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—55 yeas; and

Messrs. Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Covillion, Humble, Legendre, Mazureau, Porter, Splane, Taylor of St. Landry, and Voorhies voted in the negative—12 nays.

So the Convention stood adjourned till to-morrow morning 10 o'clock.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and the proceedings were opened by prayer from the Rev. Mr. NICHOLSON.

Mr. MCRAE asked leave of absence for Messrs. SCOTT and READ of East Baton Rouge, and Mr. MCCALLOP of West Baton Rouge; which was granted.

On motion of Mr. WEDERSTRANDT leave of absence was also granted to his colleague Mr. Ratliff, of West Feliciana.

Mr. BENJAMIN offered a resolution in the following words:

Resolved, That an appropriation of $500 be placed at the disposition of the committee on contingent expenses for the printing done by order of the committee on the apportionment of the State, agreeably to the resolution of this Convention.

The resolution meeting with opposition, the sense of the Convention was taken on it, and it was carried.

The Convention then proceeded to the ORDER OF THE DAY.—Art. 3, on executive department; Sec. —.

Mr. MARIGNY rose to address the Convention, under no idle desire on his part to figure in the debates. It is a matter of regret to him that there are so very few of the members present; because, what he desires to say to the Convention, pertains to the past history of the State of Louisiana, and therefore, every man in it ought to be informed of the facts as they occurred in the formation of our govetrnment when we came into the Union. Mr. MARIGNY stated, in the first place, that he was opposed to the principle sought to be engrafted upon our constitution, the principle of nativeism, in every shape and form. He has paid particular attention to the arguments of his colleagues from New Orleans in favor of the adoption of such a principle, but they failed to carry conviction to his mind.

He thinks that the proposition has resolved itself down simply to this: "We will not have a naturalized citizen for our governor." And, I would ask, said Mr. MARIGNY, what are the reasons assigned for this extraordinary course on their part.

1st. That in time of peace, his partial predilections for his countrymen would naturally induce him to distribute amongst them the offices within his gift.

2d. That in time of war, the recollections of his infancy, the natural feeling inherent in the breast of every man, to love and reverence the country of his birth, would have so powerful an influence over him, in the feelings of his heart, which so much controls the action of men, that his efforts would thus be paralyzed if he had to go forth to the battle field to meet his own countrymen.

Here then, said Mr. MARIGNY, we have the two only reasons, assigned by some of his colleagues for persevering in the retention of the word native in the section; and it is about that single word that they have kicked up this fuss. For his, (Mr. M's) part, he thinks they have got alarmed without cause. His colleague, Mr. SOULE, met them with grave arguments; he called their attention to certain articles in the constitution, and shewed clearly what was the supreme law of the land; he further shewed from Story's commentaries, and the valuable articles published in the Federalist, that the measure now proposed was not only unconstitutional, but that it was unjust. That is all very well in its way. Some men arrive at the end of the journey by one path, some by another; the simile will apply as well to an actual physical journey of labor, as to the intellectual one of politics. While Mr. Soule, and those who sustain that side of the question, have met their opponents on the constitutional question, his task shall be to meet them with matters of fact, and to show them clearly, that it is contrary to the true interests of Louisiana to insert such a clause as is contemplated, to exclude the naturalized citizen from his right to become governor of Louisiana, and further, he thought such a measure would be pestiforously odious, and supremely infamous.

He desires to carry this Convention back to the time when the State of Louisiana came under the dominion of the government of the United States as a territory: that was in the year 1803. At that period, he, Mr. Marigny, was in his twentieth year, an epoch in man's life when he feels the deepest interest in his country's affairs; and the time when his memory is stored with those interesting events, which make for his after life a source of so much happy or serious reflection.

This country then ceded by treaty, became a territory of the United States, and they apparently were acknowledged to possess the same rights as pertained to other citizens of the United States. But how were the facts of the case? The territorial governor sent to us, took every possible measure in his power to ride over the people rough shodden, and to pass such ordinances as were in direct violation of the rights secured to us under the treaty of session. What did the people then in those days? The most respectable creoles of the country called a meeting, at a house in Conde street, and undertook measures that should redress their grievances. Now, Mr. Marigny asked who presided at that meeting, which met for the purpose of making this solemn declaration of the rights of the citizens of Louisiana? Why, it was Elieum Boré, a man whose lion-heart and ready nerved arm was always prepared to meet danger, and to defy the menaces of the people's oppressor. Who addressed the people at this critical moment; who instructed us in our rights, immunities and privileges? Why, forsooth, it was naturalized citizens, men whose more intimate knowledge with the laws of our country rendered more peculiarly fit to expound such principles to us, as were identified with the popular cause.

The governor became enraged at their proceedings and ordered out a force of 200 men, with two pieces of cannon, to disperse our assembly; and yet these men stood boldly, bravely up to the contest, and defended our rights. They sent a committee consisting of three members, to confer with the government of the United States on this extraordinary proceeding against the assembly, and in that very committee were to be found Messrs. P. Dubigny and P. Sauve, both naturalized citizens. The result of that mission was not satisfactory. The government refused to do any thing for our relief, further than that they went: they put in force the infamous ordinance of '87, by virtue of which the governor nominated all the officers, executive and legal, without consulting any other than his own proper will. Even further than that did they carry it. Justice herself was stripped of her robes, and we beheld, day by day, the singular spectacle of one man disposing of life, liberty and property, by simply endorsing on the back of the proceedings, "judgment for the plaintiff," or "judgment for the defendant." That was in reality an odious and insupportable tyranny. And now, sir, I would ask you who undertook the resistance to this oppression? Was it our creole population? No, sir. Again were we indebted to our naturalized citizens. Those naturalized citizens, too, whose talents and information had been called into requisition by the governor, and who profited by his administration, preferred rather to defend and protect the rights and privileges of their adopted country's citizens, than bask in the sunshine of executive favor.

Those very men, irritated by the wrongs inflicted by the powers that were, upon the people of Louisiana, stirred up our citizens to provide a remedy for the evil; yes, sir, these very men, or that class of citizens whom we now attempt to decry, found a remedy for the disease under which we then were suffering. They found a man, who, by his talents and means of fortune, was capable of devoting himself to the public good, and he was sent on as our representative to Congress to effect our political liberation. This was, I believe, in 1811.

And where did they find such a man? Was it among the creoles? No; again we had recourse to an adopted citizen. Mr. Julien Poydras, a planter of Point Coupée, was their choice, and most happily did he accomplish the objects of his mission. This plain and simple gentleman appeared at the White House in the same unstentatious garb as did our revered Franklin, at the court of Versailles; and so well was he received and appreciated by the representatives and senators in Congress, that by his means and efforts we were allowed a place among the States, and thereby released from the iron rule under which we had suffered.

Shortly after that, the Convention of 1812 met under happy auspices; I had the honor of being one of its members. That same noble spirit who had achieved our political regeneration, Julien Poydras, was called to the chair as president of the Convention; and in those days I assure you nobody thought of that honor belonging exclusively to a native-born citizen.

The government being organized, although the first governor was a creole, we still had to have recourse to the naturalized citizen to perform all those duties of office which were required by the different posts in the administration of the government, holding among themselves great experience of our political state, and the perfect knowledge of that language which was necessarily introduced into our legislative and judicial halls.

Besides that, we saw them called to the posts of honor and profit, from judges down to the minute officers, as justices of the peace. And now sir, point out to me if you can, during the space of thirty years, which have since then rolled by, whether a single one of those naturalized citizens have ever gave cause for impeachment. You cannot do it, and sir, as a mark of your gratitude for such eminent services rendered by the naturalized citizen you now tell him, (if this section prevail) that a naturalized citizen is not a fit man to hold the office of governor of your State. It is not towards those whom a blind, and foolish jealousy for others fame, have caused them to cast odium on the memory of one who has deserved well of Louisiana, that I would address myself, but I would state to you, sir an, historical fact perhaps not generally known.

We have heard the praises of those one thousand foreigners who on Chalmette plains took up arms in defence of our soil, and of our common country and who there performed prodigies of valor—but I imagine generally we are ignorant to whom we were then indebted for that intrepid and brave body of men. Let me tell you; it was to Judge Dominick Hall, an English naturalized citizen, of whose acquaintance I shall ever feel proud; and whose memory I shall ever kindly cherish.

Gen. Jackson by a proclamation dated in Mobile declared, that he would not give employment to any of the pirates of Barrataria, or in the Gulf of Mexico. His arrival was anxiously expected, and some few days after he arrived and made his quarters in Royal street near the present residence of Judge Morphy.

The legislature which was then in session appointed a committee consisting of Messrs. Rauffignar, Villeré, and himself, Mr. Marigny, to wait on Gen. Jackson, and inform him of the means we could place at his disposal. We mentioned at the same time what we conceived to be the advantage to be derived from the service of a body of men, who anxiously desired to enlist under our flag. They were under the command of one Dominick You, and could not fail to prove a corps of infinite injury to the enemy. He, Gen. Jackson, still, however, persisted in his refusal, and we left much chagrined. The idea struck us to go and consult with Judge Hall. After listening attentively to us, he suggested a very simple plan to accomplish what we aimed at, and that was, to get the legislature to pass a resolution asking the United States court to grant them an amnesty for the period of four months. That during that period the result of the war would be known, and whether conqueror or conquered, the pirates would then cease to disturb the tranquility of the country. For, said he, if we by their aid conquer, we shall pardon them for their services, and if we be conquered, then justice will no longer be at our disposal. We followed his advice, and arranged all in the manner he suggested. The pirates deserved their pardon! by braving death in defence of that country whose laws they had violated, and in carrying death and carnage into the ranks of that man's countrymen, who was fifteen years an admiralty judge, and whom, since his death, they have unjustly stigmatized the memory of, as a traitor. The friendship which I have ever entertained towards Gen. JACKSON, has neutralized my feelings touching his difficulties with Judge Hall. But the fact which I have just related, is a part from their misunderstanding, and I mention it to show that a naturalized citizen can feel even in the most trying circumstances as far as he is concerned, pure principles of honor, and the sanctity of his oath.

Let us now look at another side of the picture. Do you know who endowed your colleges in which the youth of the country was instructed? who established asylums for the poor and distressed orphans? was it citizens of our own State? No. It was naturalized citizens. Julien Poydras left $200,000 to the asylum which bears his name, $40,000 to West Feliciana, and $40,000 to Point Coupée parishes for similar purposes. Alexander Milne, attracted by the same spirit of philanthropy, left also $200,000 for similar purposes. Nicolas Girod left a legacy to the city of $100,000. Before them another naturalized citizen, Don Andre de Almonaster, built at his own cost, the Cathedral, the Ursuline Convent, and the Hospital. Turn on which ever side you will, you cannot fail to see monuments of the liberality of the foreigner, and I say it without intention to disparage any one, you may look in vain for any such evidence on the part of the native born Americans. And yet you contend that it is right to exclude that class of citizens from the first magistracy of the State, even though he leaves his fortunes to endow your colleges, and your institutions of learning or charity; and even though he possess in an eminent degree a knowledge of the science of government and the perfect confidence of the people. Nothing can be more odious, or unjust, than such conduct on our part. Had your predecessors, the members of the convention of 1812, suffered themselves to insert such a clause in that constitution to the one now asked for, in the one we are striving to make, is it to be supposed that those naturalized citizens whose patriotism, and munificence I have to-day set forth and made clear to you; is it likely, I ask, that they would have been as prodigal in their bounties, towards those who would place such odious restrictions on their rights? Do not, Mr. President, let us in 1845 make such a distinction as our predecessors have repudiated, and you cannot do so without reflecting on their memories.

Mr. MARIGNY now takes occasion to say to Messrs. Saunders, Benjamin, Grymes, and Co., that their satirical and sarcastic course will not avail them before this Convention. If they conceive that this question can be settled by such ruses as they have sprung upon us, they are mistaken; if they think that this question is to be settled by rhetoric, by unjust representations, by out of the way comparisons, or by wit, they grossly deceive themselves.

Now, Mr. President, let us take a look at the cunning position they have assumed. They tell you, one with an easy manner, the other with a dolorous accent, that in the time of peace a naturalized governor would distribute, what in their peculiar style of eloquence they are pleased to term "the loaves and fishes," amongst their own countrymen—and that no one else would have a chance to taste the one or the other, and that he would laugh in his sleeve if a poor native born American was to present himself for any little corner of the public favor; and therefore the gentlemen, reasoning by analogy, think it is right that they should have that small boon granted to the natives, to name among their own countrymen a governor who would not be subject to such influences. As if, Mr. President, the office of governor was to be put up every four years as in a lottery, and the first drayman coming either from Germany or from Ireland, if you will, had a chance for the first prize, and getting that he would have the right to divide all the loaves and fishes out forthwith among his brother draymen or associates, or acquaintance. So absurb an idea as this could never have entered into the heads of these gentlemen, unless they found them among the of the town of Jackson. They remind him, (Mr. M.) a good deal of the fable of the mountain in labor, which, alas, only brought forth as in this instance, 'a mouse.' There, are, however, reasons which are powerful, to entitle this provision to the rebuke of the Convention, and he (Mr. Marigny) will endeavor to exemplify them. An honest foreigner and a good man arrives on our shores—he acquires his citizenship in the regular mode prescribed by the constitution of the United States. He is attached to our institutions by thirty years of residence and identity with our interests. His children are born on our soil, and bind him still stronger to the interests of our country; the circle of his friends and acquaintance gradually is increasing from day to day; his talents and abilities are beyond dispute, and he is regarded as a man who would do honor to any country. And yet, if you were to talk to my colleagues who have taken the opposite side to the one I espoused, of placing such a man at the head of our governmental affairs—of confiding to such a man our civil and military affairs—they would tell you he is a foreigner, and in time of war between the United States and his own country, he would remember his own village clock. He would remember the early scenes of his childhood, his little sports with his schoolfellows on his own native meadows. He would be so imbued with such touching reminiscences that he could not serve you faithfully, and for these powerful natural reasons would either induce the poor man to either betray you or sell you to the enemy. What a bugbear, Mr. President, have the gentlemen held up to us? and to what extreme nonsensical provisions have our friends on the other side forced themselves. War! war!! is the sound in which they build their whole argument. War!! is the mystic term, around which, and to which, they all cling, as if it bore some cabalistic spell to carry them through this ordeal.

Now (said Mr. Marigny) I desire to join issue with the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin.) You, Sir, admit that in 1815 we had all cause to admire and be grateful for the courage and bravery displayed by the foreign force on the plains of Chalmette; but at the same time you ask whether the same courage and energy would have been evinced had they been called upon to meet the sons of France in deadly strife. Contrary then, Sir, to all parliamentary usage, you call upon the other distinguished member from New Orleans, who had the floor just previous to your address, and say to him, and you, Sir, suppose you had been placed at the head of an army to meet in deadly combat your own countrymen; could you, would you have done it? Upon what principle or by what right do you ask that colleague of ours to account to you, even if he be a naturalized citizen? By what right, I again ask, do you force a man to reply to you, nolens volens, when he is sick, which he tells you at the conclusion of his address, he is. I tell you, Sir, that you have inflicted on him an unjust provocation, and although you may consider it as a fair specimen of parliamentary eloquence to indulge in such vagaries, I give you distinctly to understand that I take up the glove in his behalf; and Sir, I trust that you will not complain of my not being a native of the country, since I descend from those ancient warriors who conquered the country and here represent six generations of Louisianians.

You say that the foreigner is not to be trusted, because when war is declared between this and his native country, he will not act against her. You either cannot be serious, or else you know nothing of history, (and I really had given you credit for having forgotten more than I know.) History contradicts your position at every page.

Who defended BuenosAyres against the memorable expedition of Great Britain, when Spain could neither defend herself, nor allay the storm? It was a Frenchman who had become a naturalized Spaniard. His name was Di Linierès. At his voice, and at his call, the militia of the country were united and became as a band of brothers fighting for freedom. He disciplined them; led them encouragingly along, until he made the attack upon the British at their head. He disconcerted them so, as at the end of a few months, to reduce their army of 8000 men to 4000, and finally he drove them from the country to their vessels in waiting, and thus they were driven from that country.

At a later period, the self same England sent a fora of 6000 veteran troops to take possession of the island of Porto Rico. Some naturalized Frenchmen attached to the country of their adoption, animated the creoles to a worthy spirit of resistance. Abercrombie lost an arm in the battle there fought. He saw his army dwindled down to nothing, and he took his departure suddenly from there.

I will not again call your attention to the events of 1815 in Louisiana; but you know that our proud and confident enemy, England, sent upon our shores 15,000 of her old and well tried veteran troops, veterans that had served and conquered under the redoubtable Wellington. And by whom were they met? By whom were they conquered? Why by the naturalized citizens principally in the State of Louisiana, combined with the efforts of the native American force.

The cry now is, however, but oh! if they had been Frenchmen invading our soil, we should have heard another story. It may be that you desire despite the merits of the natives of France to throw aside their pretensions; and yet, he, Mr. Marigny, will do the gentleman to whom he particularly replies, (Mr. Benjamin,) the justice to believe that such an idea was never entertained by him, yet such is the inevitable tendency of the principle he advances if carried out.

The enquiry he (Mr. Marigny) desires to make is this, do the gentlemen think to frighten us, the Frenchmen, with their vivid description of the horrors of war? He knows, as we all know, that Frenchmen, or their descendants, form the largest portion of the population of Louisiana; and it does appear to him as if the gentleman wished to direct the whole of his oratorical battery against that class of our citizens, when in exalting, as they do, their native genius, they create armies and navies; the ocean covered with vessels of war; and then with a rhetorical flourish, they make all these French, that they may make a screen to retire behind when they please, and thereby hide their odious system of proscription.

Fortunately for me, said Mr. M., all your fine quotations are lost on me. I have never read any of those works, which are supposed necessary to make a logical man. But, Mr. President, I am one of those who, looking at things as they are, feel myself capable of meeting the emergency of the hour; and of according my political acts to the political wants of my country. France to do, is not as France was, in the time of Louis the 14th and Louis the 15th. It is now constitutional France—France, governed by a constitutional monarchy—by a monarch who has less power than the president of the United States, in any of the departments of government, and who can't even draw from the treasury the means of sustaining his court, without a vote of the chamber of deputies.

How then is it likely that we can ever be engaged in a war with France?—that country which can have no other feelings towards us but those of amity and friendship. Nothing but an alliance between England and France could possibly bring about such a state of things; but experience daily proves to us that such an event can never happen, at least for centuries to come.

When Talleyrand and Louis Phillippe entered into that alliance of amity and friendship with England, of which so many talk, and which so few understand, it was because they believed the measure was necessary, in order to carry out the object of the revolution of July, 1830, at which the rest of Europe had became alarmed, and which they labored to destroy the effect of. This policy has been proved to be wise and salutary on the part of those statesmen—and it was not for the purpose of furnishing England with a pair of colossal boots, to bestride the world, as was wisely conjectured at the time, that such treaty was entered into.

Since that period more than fourteen years have elapsed; France goes on prospering and to prosper. She will no longer war with England, but with the spindle and loom, and her forty millions of people have accorded to the verdict. The French people are now an united and contented people. There is no longer any distinction between classes, either heriditary honors or the honors of wealth, which has heretofore bound down their spirits and kept them in poverty and misery, the real source of all their political revolutions. While Great Britain, with her twenty-eight millions, has eight millions of them in Ireland, who are ready at any moment to cast off their vassalage; groaning, as they are, under the systems imposed on them, an exacting priesthood that they do not worship under, and an intolerant and insatiable aristocracy.

No, that alliance between England and France ought not to inspire dread in the United States, because it is a natural alliance, springing from a community of interests. They know in France that we regard and repair on board their ships in this country with pleasure, and that they can alone arrest the trident from the hands of England, and gain the supremacy of the ocean, by their friendly feelings and sympathy with the United States of America.

It is nothing, therefore, but a mistaken notion engendered in the minds of those gentlemen, to satisfy their feelings of self love and self opinion, when they talk to you about the danger to be apprehended from a state of war, and consequent treason in Louisiana.

What has surprised him, (Mr. Marigny,) more than all else is that the eloquent gentleman, (Mr. Benjamin,) did not on this occasion indulge in the pathetics; that he did not conjure up such a scene as we have in Coriolanus, where the tender wife and venerable mother were made to appear, habited in sable weeds, and with hair streaming to the winds, were made to supplicate on their knees before the governor, in the name of Bordeaux and Toulouse, to spare the blood of Frenchmen.

Such a figure as that might have produced some effect.

The gentleman who last addressed us must indeed have a great love for his domestic hearth, to get into such a labyrinth of elegant description as he has about the recollections of his infancy; about the school house, where he first got the impression that he was destined to become a great man, as all boys do; about the grassy meadows on which he indulged in his boyish sports—in short, about all those tender recollections of infancy which, despite ourselves, fond memory will make us cherish in our hearts.

For myself, Mr. President, I am no poet, and do not indulge in such vagaries. But, Sir, I pretend to have my share of common sense, and with the history of my country in my hand, I am ready to prove that all the gentleman's assertions are nothing but hypothesis, contradicted by facts themselves. That moreover, the sentiment of honor implanted in the human heart, is stronger than that of love of country; and that a naturalized governor of Louisiana, (notwithstanding the fancyings of Mr. Benjamin,) would prefer falling on the field of battle, than to lose his character as a man of honor.

Did Marshal Saxe remember that he was a German, when he commanded the army of Louis the 15th, on the plains of Fortenay, against the allied armies of Germany and England? Was it not Langeron, a Frenchman, who had been naturalized in Russia, who commanded the troops of the emperor of Russia when the allied forces made their triumphal entry into Paris? True it is, that he recollected the country of his nativity, in this wise, by his affectionate attention and solicitude for all those Frenchmen, who had or were suffering from the effects of the war. But on the field of honor all those feelings vanished. He thought alone of duty; not even the glorious name of his own native country could have charms for him, and drive from his heart his feelings of duty to the country to which he had sworn allegiance and fidelity. Do you ask another proof? I have one at hand, and one, I think, that will satisfy the most sceptical, of the position I have taken. You must all recollect, and no doubt do, how the unfortunate Marshal Ney was tried in France, before the Chamber of Peers, after the restoration of Louis 18th. His lawyer, the celebrated Dupin, sen., after exhausting all the eloquence, logic, and law which was at his command, found that they did not produce such an impression, as to overbalance the influence of the crown upon the feelings of his judges. Suddenly he bethought himself of an idea, which he felt sure would save him. He arose again, and in a loud voice proclaimed to the astonishment of all present—"; defy you all, to touch a hair of his head I the Marshal is not a Frenchman, and you cannot arraign him before this assembly on a charge of treason to his country." The noble prisoner, forgetting his unfortunate situation, but yielding to a soldier's impulse, cried out, "Who gave you permission to employ such means to save my life. Let it be taken, if they will have it, but never say that I deny the country of my choice and my adoption! I feel the sanctity of my oath, and I feel moreover that France has the first place in my heart." These are the kind of men that they would proscribe from filling the office of Governor of Louisiana.

If ever there was a time in my life, Mr. President, that I regretted my inability to speak English fluently, it is now. I would now desire so to impress the voice of truth, and reason, upon the hearts of the members of this convention, that like myself they would see and feel (and I feel certain and sure that like myself they have seen and are prepared to resist the odious restriction, which it is endeavored to fasten upon us,) that they would say with me, engraft such an infamous proposition upon your Constitution and we will tread it under foot as we would a venemous adder.

Are you aware, Mr. President, what we have most to dread in Louisiana? It is not the English. It is not the French. It is not our native citizens; but it is a class of men who call themselves Americans, who have the unblushing impudence to express themselves ready, like another Hartford Convention, to propogate amongst us the odious doctrine of absolutism, and even abolitionism itself. The orator of yesterday, (Mr. Benjamin,) knows this as well as I do. Why, then, did his surpassing eloquence spare them? Where are his shafts of satire upon this subject?

The real cause of his silence is this, that he will not find fault with any thing that can operate against his preconceived opinions; and further, that in calling up his proscriptive system against these dangerous men, he would introduce the measure generally, against the native born Americans of other States, of which, if we are to believe what we hear, he was a citizen himself.

But Sir, I again ask you, by what right do you expect to disfranchise in 1845, those who had rights guaranteed to them in 1812? rights which never having been disputed, are vested rights. Did you consult the people, or did you take it for granted that Mr. Benjamin's doctrine is the correct one; that this Convention can do as they please? They will doubtless tell you that we are here, in the capacity of sovereign masters, with all the privileges of the Montmorencys, the Dumas, the Bridgewaters, and the Wellingtons!!! But Sir, I tell you, I, Bernard Marigny tell you, that you are after all, nothing but the servants of the people—nothing more, nothing less. Presume on your authority! if you do, they will soon bring you to a just appreciation of their power over you; and it would not at all surprise me, if they were to obstinately persist, at the very next election, in selecting a governor from the very men whom you are now so anxious to exclude from that privilege.

What then would you do, poor weak mortals? Why, you would be like the buttercup and daisy, which the first shower of rain would forever wash away from the face of the earth, resisting as you do public sentiment and opinion. The only thing, Mr. President, that is wanting to complete the iniquity of the course submitted to us for consideration is, to restrict our ancient catholic population, and make ineligible as governors; under the solemn mockery that a majority of the citizens of Louisiana are protestants. But that course sir, you dare not take. The moment has not yet come, when you have the power to fasten your restrictions further upon us.

It is upon the naturalized citizens, and particularly upon the French naturalized citizens, that you have directed your battery. Hence the great exertions of Mr. Benjamin to depict the dangers of a war with France. Hence spring all those sallies of imagination with which we have been so much favored recently. For my part, sir, believing it to be an unjust course on their part, I cannot but hope as I expect, that this Convention will deal out to them prompt but severe retributive justice.

Mr. President, I have done. I have endeavored to explain to you the reasons for the vote I shall give on this question. I have endeavored to express my sentiments in taking the floor on this question, as I conceived to be the duty of a watchman at the tower of liberty.

The history of the past, and the present position of things, admonish me, that I have only foretold you of the future, and if I did not appear before you in the robes of eloquence, yet it cannot be denied that I have furnished you with facts, so strong, which give the most positive and direct lie to the sophisms advanced by gentlemen opposed to me; and the only reason for my attacking their trenches, is that I conceived I might carry them by the force of truth.

It may be that you will class my speech as rude, but I want to bear in mind that my greatest happiness is to meet my antagonist face to face.

Mr. Roselius said, that it had been suggested to him by some of his friends, that on account of the peculiar position in which he was placed with regard to the question now under discussion, he ought not to participate in the debate; that it had also been intimated to him that a contrary course would have a tendency to injure his popularity. But, sir, (said Mr. R.) after having considered and weighed the friendly advice thus given, I have come to the conclusion to reject it. I value the approbation and good will of the generous constituency who have sent me here to represent them, as much as any member of this house; but, sir, I would be unworthy of being their representative, were I to attempt to conciliate their favor by a dereliction of duty. Nor do I believe, sir, that there is the slightest foundation for the apprehensions of my friends. I know my constituents too well to think, for a single moment, that their friendly feeling towards me can be impaired by pursuing an independent and straight forward course. They have sent me here, sir, to give a full and free expression to my honest and conscientious views on this, and every other subject, which may be presented to the consideration of this Convention.

Sir, what is the question now before us? It is proposed to introduce into the new constitution an additional qualification for the office of governor. The one sought to be introduced was not in the old constitution, it is an innovation, and he (Mr. Roselius) thinks that when any innovation is sought to be made in the organic law, those who propose it should assign some good reason for the change, either on the score of necessity, policy, or at least expediency. He (Mr. Roselius) considers it wrong, and therefore he shall oppose it. He will not follow the gentlemen who have discussed the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the proposed measure; he admits for argument's sake, that the Convention has the power; but is it right, just, reasonable, politic or expedient for us to use it? He (Mr. Roselius) says, that the question cannot be answered affirmatively, without an obvious violation of the most fundamental principles of government. The first and paramount object of this convention in framing an organic law, should be to extend and secure to all the citizens of the State, without distinction, equal rights, privileges, and immunities. If then this is incontrovertible, how can it be pretended, that a line of demarkation can be introduced into our new constitution as proposed in the section before us, without violating that principle? If to be placed on the same platform and level; if equality of rights and privileges, which ought to exist in every well constituted government, be acknowledged to be the proper foundation of our government; why is it asserted that naturalized citizens are foreigners? why should you desire to exclude them from any of those rights, acquired by them when they become citizens? The distinction is an odious one, and should not, and he hoped would not be sanctioned by this convention. They have rights acquired and secured to them under the laws and constitution of the United States; those laws expressly provide, that when he whose lot it was to be accidentally born on another shore, shall have complied with the requirements of the naturalization laws of Congress, from that moment he is to be taken and considered as a citizen of the United States. He is to all intents and purposes a citizen of the country, and although born on some far distant shore, he is entitled to the same rights and privileges as those who were born on the soil. I have endeavored to account to myself, and satisfy my own mind as to the motives which actuated the decision of the members of the committee, in introducing into the constitution a clause so contrary to the spirit of the institutions of our country. By what reason or by what principle can they pretend to justify such an odious measure. The power it is true, is for argument's sake admitted, but though he (Mr. Roselius) has listened with an attentive ear day after day to the eloquent remarks of gentlemen, he has never yet heard one sound argument for its adoption. Why sir, I have asked them at least a hundred times to explain to me, (and I have asked myself the question a thousand times) why this restrictive policy was necessary, and all the answer I ever could get from them is this: in a sarcastic and solemn style they tell us of their liberality in admitting naturalized citizens to the privileges they themselves enjoy. They tell us this is the asylum for the oppressed of all other countries, but at the same time they ask us to grant them one small boon; they tell us in the same breath (in which they make the assertion, that we have the same and equal privileges that they have;) that it is nothing but right we should leave to the native born citizen one exclusive privilege, that of filling the governor's chair. But why should this particular office be only accessible to those who are born in the United States? By what reason or by what argument do these gentlemen arrive at this conclusion? They are apparently candid, and they tell you they are guided by the impulse of their feelings. He (Mr. Roselius) does not doubt that they have been guided more by their feelings than their reason. My colleague from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin) tells you that his feelings prompted him to ask the insertion of the word "native," in this section, because they operated on his heart, and that afterwards when he had examined the question, his judgment co-operated with his feelings, and more and more convinced him of the necessity of the proposed clause in the section. It is not surprising, sir, that a man who suffers his judgment to be influenced by his feelings, should be led astray by those feelings; and let his judgment be warped in carrying out a principle which his predilections prompt him to adopt. You, Mr. President, have had experience in the profession of law—have you ever yet found a client who thought he had not right on his side, or who thought that his adversary was not about to wrong him? Whenever a man is acted upon by his feelings, he must necessarily be distrustful of the conclusion to which his reason leads him. This no doubt is the cause why my friend and colleague, (Mr. Benjamin) finds the conviction so strong upon his mind as to espouse the cause which he now does, with so much zeal, so much force, and so much eloquence. But, sir, to what do the arguments which the gentleman advances amount? to what do they tend? Let us take a sober, calm view of the question, sift the arguments, as they have been improperly dignified, and to what weight are they entitled? It is stated by one of the gentlemen that a naturalized citizen ought not to be trusted with the executive power in the State of Louisiana, because the duties of the office are such as might expose him to temptations that he might not be able to resist. In the first place in the appointing power, his feelings for his countrymen would be so strong and uppermost in his breast as to make them the especial recipients of his official favor.

Mr. President, I say this is a most unfounded and gratuitous assertion. It is true, sir, there

> "Breathes no man, with soul so dead,
> Who never to himself hath said:
> This is my own, my native land!"

We delight in the retrospective view we take of the land of our birth; memory lingers on the school-house where we were first taught to lisp our letters. We delight to think of the church where we first offered up our prayers to the Giver of all Good. We recur with lively emotions to those scenes in which our infancy was passed. The vineyards, the copses, the meadows, the orchards, through which in early life we rambled, must ever come up in the feelings of the heart of man with pleasurable emotions. But, sir, when a man has had the moral courage to leave his home and cross the wide Atlantic, to cast his lot permanently upon a foreign shore, he severs those ties, and contracts others equally strong and binding. After going through the probation required by law, he becomes a citizen of the United States. And now, sir, I will ask you why the assertion is made that he cannot be trusted to fulfil the duties of governor of the state of Louisiana? Why, forsooth, because of his attachment to his native land, and of the scenes of his early youth! But, sir, does not every man know that there is a wide difference between the innate and natural attachment a man may have for the locality of his birth; the delight he may experience to recur back to that spot on account of the associations connected with it, and the attachment for the government under whose tyranny he first drew his breath? The governments of Europe exist in opposition to and in defiance of the will of the people, and are sustained by standing armies; the people would overthrow them if they could. How, then, can it be supposed that a man, born under a government where power is a synonymous term for oppression, should yet be so devoted to that government as to unfit him for performing the duties required from a governor of Louisiana, and would not hesitate to forget the sanctity of his oath? The gentlemen on the other side of this question can bring forward no argument to sustain such a position.

It is next urged, that a naturalized citizen could not properly discharge the duties of governor in case the state should be at war with the country of his nativity. My colleague (Mr. Marigny) has told you, and told you truly, that history gives the lie to this assertion, and that it is unsupported by any example in this or in any other country, or by the experience of by-gone days.—The history of the United States, and of this state in particular, justify me in the assertion, that the naturalized citizens have never proved recreant to their adopted country in the hour of trial and danger.—'Tis not because their hearts are filled with recollections of the place of their nativity that it must be supposed they are attached to the mercenary soldiery of a despotic government, sent to invade this soil of the country of their adoption. No, sir, the love of country is one thing, the love of oppression another; and it ought to be clear to the minds of those gentlemen, as no doubt it will be in their cooler, calmer moments, that the European comes to this land of freedom to escape from the odious and galling systems of the despotism under which he has suffered. If this be true, sir, what becomes of this argument of the gentlemen? It is scattered like chaff before the wind. But, sir, although it is quite easy to draw conclusions from false premises to correspond with the feelings of gentlemen, still we have an undeniable right to call on them to establish, by proof or correct reasoning, why it is that a naturalized citizen should not be entrusted with the executive power of the state? It has been very broadly hinted that a naturalized citizen is unfit to have the executive power confided to him. But, sir, this again is mere assertion; and we all know how easy it is to assert. But fortunately for the cause of truth and justice, proof is somewhat more dicuffilt. God forbid that I should say one word that might produce any unpleasant feelings by one portion of our citizens towards another. I rebuke the invidious distinction, and say that we should pause before we throw into the midst of our population the torch of discord, which inevitably will lead to bloodshed and civil war. The experience of the last two years has brought an example by which we ought to profit. I care not who on that occasion was in the right, or who was in the wrong; it suffices for me to show the pernicious effects of a wrong principle carried out. Some will tell you one party was right, some the other; but when you reflect that a popular outbreak, such as was experienced in Philadelphia, where the government of the state found itself for several days impotent to suppress the riots, may by a similar contingency happen in our midst from a similar cause, ought we not to pause, I ask, before we throw amongst our citizens the firebrand of discord? The first duty of the citizen is to support and uphold the majesty of the law, and the second to maintain unimpaired those rights and privileges guaranteed to him by the constitution under which he lives. And he who preaches different doctrines propagates heresies that, if entertained and carried out, will destroy the republic. He (Mr. Roselius) thinks that there is no one in this convention that would force measures to that point; and yet he foresees that unless we are very cautious, we shall introduce something into our constitution that will have the effect of producing heart-burnings, bickerings, jealousies and discords. For his part, he denounces the bickerings of the present day as contemptible. The argument advanced is that no one but a native born citizen is fit to be entrusted with the executive government of this state. They say it should be a palladium which none but native born Americans should enter. Are not the restrictions already sufficiently strong without mingling the conservative principles in our organic laws with the spirit of ostracism which these gentlemen appear desirous of establishing? And, sir, I ask you why it is that this odious distinction between the naturalized and native born citizen should exist with regard to the office of governor of the state? Gentlemen tell us that the exclusive eligibility to the office of governor is a small boon which the natives of the soil ask of the naturalized citizens. The very idea, sir, here expressed, is absurd in the extreme. The laws of the land recognize no distinction between one class of citizens and another; how then can a boon be asked by one or accepted by the other? Why, sir, is there any principle of free government—any principle of republicanism—to sanction such a pretension? They say that a naturalized citizen is not to be entrusted with the powers we confer on our governor. What, sir, is the power of that governor, compared with the power of the government we are now exercising? Why, sir, it dwindles into insignificance in the comparison. Do you ask any proof to convince you that the insertion of the words "that he shall be commander in chief of the army and navy of the state of Louisiana" is a questionable feature? If you do, sir, I shall give you proof positive as to the navy; for we have not one single vessel of war belonging to the state. But one thing seems to have been forgotten by those gentlemen who are so anxious to restrict the rights and privileges of the naturalized citizens, and that is this: that in their desire to decry the rights of that class, they seem to have forgotten that no state in the union has a right to any special marine force; and so far as the question goes as to the military qualifications of the man who may be elected governor of the state of Louisiana, and thereby become commander in chief of the forces of the state, he (Mr. Roselius) does not think they should be so sensitive; if we may judge from the past. For, sir, it may happen again, as it has already happened, that the governor, whose imperative duty it is made by the constitution to be the commander in chief of the army, will not know even the first principle of the science of war. Among all the governors we have had, there has not been one who "the division of a battle knew more than a spinster," or could lead a single battalion into the field, or form and command a single company, much less an army. And yet we have so decided it, and as this honorable convention has so decided it, it is no doubt a very wise provision.

But what is there in the functions and duties of the governor so very difficult and arduous that no one except a native citizen can discharge them? He is the chief magistrate of the State—a high and important trust is confided to him. Notwithstanding this, however, his duties are comparatively few. What does he do? Once a year he writes a message to the legislature of the State, which, judging by the specimens which we have had for the last two or three years, ought not to have taken more than two or three hours of his time; any intelligent man could have done it in two hours, any man of common education, or any one who had been three or four years at a common school, could do it in three hours. There is no great mystery then in this difficult function required of the governor. What else has he to do? Why he has a duty to perform, which, to a vain man is no doubt very agreeable, because it keeps about him a host of needy office hunters, and that is not very irksome, and no great labor, if he be pleased as some men are, with the flattery of fawning sycophants. And he has the great privilege of nominating certain officers, who may be approved or rejected by the senate. And yet this is the task that we have heard so much said about, and no man can perform this great herculean task unless he be a native born citizen. And now sir, let me ask you another question; does he not have a secretary of state? and does he not also have a private secretary? Does not the private secretary write out all the appointments which the governor has the right of making by and with the advice and and consent of the Senate? And perhaps out of two hundred or two hundred and fifty greedy office hunters who annoy and harrass him, he may have the proud satisfaction of appointing some ten or twelve, provided, nevertheless, the senate see fit to confirm his nominations. What other great power has he? I may be answered perhaps, the removing power. Yes, sir, I am sorry to be obliged to state that this power, although not vested in the governor, has of late years been usurped by him; and that usurpation has been sanctioned by the supreme court, by a strange, and to my mind altogether unsatisfactory course of reasoning. I allude to the case of Prieto and Nicholson, vs. Thompson and others, in which it was decided that the governor has the power to remove one officer by appointing another; and that thus he can do indirectly what the constitution forbids him to do directly. The next question we come to, in looking to the extraordinary mental powers required from the governor, is the pardoning power. That power I admit to be of an elevated and serious order. But few governors will ever exercise that power, except in those very rare cases in which it clearly appears that injustice has been done to the accused, and even then he cannot exercise it without the consent of the senate. This is the substance of the power which we are told cannot be entrusted to any other than a native citizen. Now let me ask the advocates of this clause, on what ground it can be contended that a man who has been 30 years a citizen of the United States, who has acquired a residence and citizenship in Louisiana for 20 or 25 years, whose family has grown up around us, and who has the same identity of interest that we have, is not a fit and proper subject to present his claims to us for the highest office in our gift? I say that he has, and if I do not much mistake the feelings of this convention, they will say so too. If on consideration you judge it necessary to extend the time of a man's political residence, before he shall have the privilege to aspire to the gubernatorial chair, I will join you. If you say it shall be 30 years, or even fifty, I have no objection. If you adopt such a principle, you must in justice apply it to all, as well to the native as to the adopted citizen, and if you do, I shall be disposed to vote for it.

And, sir, let me tell you, much as it pains me to speak of myself, which I do with the utmost reluctance, that throughout all our deliberations, and in all the other public stations in which I have been placed, I have never been actuated by any other principle than that of broad and equal justice to all men. I have been charged, sir, on this floor, when voting on certain questions, with a leaning to the views of a certain party with which I have never been connected. But, sir, when I come into this body, I feel that I belong to no party. I have been a partizan, it is true, and I may continue to be so, but, it has been and will continue to be, upon the solemn conviction that I am right in the principles that I espouse. Whenever those with whom I generally act, depart from what I conceive to be correct principles, they will not find me in their company. When I voted for two years' residence for an elector, and three years' residence for a representative, I did so on the broad principle of equality, because the rule was uniform, and granted to all the same rights and privileges without any distinction. For my part, sir, I care not for the calumny of men who seek to place me in a false position. I conceive this to be an occasion in which I am called upon to mete out even-handed justice; and if the decision I have formed in my own mind be erroneous, I do not know it. I regard it as a question of distinction between one class of citizens and another, and as such I am determinedly opposed to it; no matter by whom brought forward. I feel as an independent man should feel, and cannot be influenced by the hisses or applause of the populace, and I care nothing for the evanescent smiles of popular will, conscious as I am that I am doing my duty as a member of this convention to the best of my ability.

Let us look a little farther into the extraordinary powers of the governor of Louisiana; there is one which I had forgotten, and that is the veto power. This power is of an important and delicate nature: it requires knowledge and discretion; but is it so difficult that none but a native can execute that power? Let me refer to precedents. The experience of the past has proved that the most scandalous abuse of that power recorded in the history of the country, was perpetrated by one of our native born citizens, the present president of the United States. I could call your attention to another example of this abuse of power, were it not that I am fearful of hurting the feelings of honorable gentlemen of this convention. I trust, sir, that what I have already said, will be sufficient to convince you that a naturalized citizen is not so utterly incapable of discharging the duties and exercising the powers of governor as some gentlemen seem to imagine.

Mr. Roselius thought that no argument had been advanced in support of the proposition; its advocates had indulged in declamation. The objection so often repeated that a naturalized citizen cannot safely be trusted with the office of governor, in time of war, may be answered in another way. It is well known, that the command of the army and navy, (and he must again repeat that he was ignorant of there being a navy in the State of Louisiana,) with the exception of an insurrection or sudden invasion, belongs to officers appointed by the general government; a most wise provision, calculated to guard against the danger of committing the direction of our military operations to incompetent and unskilful hands. What would have been the result in 1814 and 1815, had we then had alone to rely upon a governor who was ignorant of the first principles of the art of war; and here let me say, said Mr. Roselius, that while I thus speak of him, it is a duty I owe to myself to say, that he was a good man—a man whose memory is embalmed in the hearts of the citizens of this State. But suppose we had sent this good man, the governor, instead of General Jackson, to meet Pakenham, the probability is he would have been defeated; and taking into consideration the ordinary calculations of chance, I think we may safely say that his defeat would have been signal. Suppose, then, we indulge in this boundless field of conjecture, is it not likely to be possible that a naturalized citizen who had endeared himself so highly to the people as to get the office, would be equally fit to perform all the duties of the office, and do good service in the field too? But, Sir, on what ground can it be said, that a man so situated as to unite the suffrages of the people in despite of the accidency of his birth, would ever become a traitor as governor of Louisiana? Assertions are easily made, but in order to establish facts, proofs are necessary. Argument and logic are unavailing when the premises on which they rest are false, and not sustained by facts. Have I or have I not shown, that all the powers conferred and duties imposed on the executive of this State, are not so very difficult as some people strive to make them? What are those duties and powers compared to those of the judiciary? The judiciary constantly exercises power over the property, the honor, the reputation, and even the life and death of the citizen. Such is the tremendous power wielded by that department. We can, therefore, be at no loss to define which position is the most delicate, important and difficult.

If I be not mistaken, and I do not think I am, the judges of the supreme court of this State exercise more real power in one single session, than five governors could in the space of 20 years. The fortune, life and reputation of every citizen is more or less in their keeping. If my opponents are correct in their system of excluding the naturalized citizen from the executive chair, why not exclude him also from the bench? Answer this, gentlemen, if you can. Why then, I repeat the question, are not the same qualifications required for a judge as for a governor? My fear is, that I shall be told in reply chaque un a son tour, we'll come to them by-and-bye. I tell you therefore, sir, to be consistent; if you shut the naturalized citizen out from the office of governor, you must also exclude him from holding any office in the State government.

We all know that people are apt to draw unfavorable inferences from the course which public men are sometimes compelled to take, and I feel that such may be the predicament in which I am now placed. Sir, I hope that I shall not be charged with vain glorys when I say that I have never asked for an office, no, not even for a vote. It is true that I have been honored, undeservedly, with high and distinguished offices, and there is no man who more gratefully appreciates the kindness he has received and the confidence reposed in him than he, Mr. Roselius, does. At the time he was appointed attorney general for the State of Louisiana, he was not even personally acquainted with the executive; and when his name has been brought before the people for any other office it has not been at his own solicitation or request. And, sir, I have come to the firm resolution never to accept any political office hereafter. I have had enough of politics. I feel that I have sufficient firmness of purpose never to swerve from that resolution. But, sir, I want nothing incorporated in this constitution except on correct principles; those principles are immutable; they cannot fluctuate nor be influenced by the ups and downs, or the ins and outs of party. In framing a new organic law, give to all equal rights and equal privileges, without distinction, without restriction. I admit your right to restrict, but while you do restrict, let your restrictions be general. Do not discriminate between one class of citizens and another. The constitution of the United States recognizes no such odious and arbitrary distinction. But notwithstanding this, certain gentlemen seem disposed to tell those desirous to make this their adopted country, "you may obtain the name of citizens, but on condition that you become hewers of wood and drawers of water." Sir, I know that such are not the sentiments of the American people. That people takes a noble pride and pleasure in proclaiming to the oppressed and persecuted of every clime and country, its willingness to extend the inestimable blessings of liberty to all who wish to avail themselves of the invitation. No one has deplored more than I have, the shameful prostitution of the name of American citizen, for contemptible party purposes, by conferring it on those who by law were not entitled to it; and who for that very reason were unworthy of it. Individuals who have been guilty of fraud and perjury are unfit to become citizens of the United States; and every one who has been naturalized in violation of the laws of congress, stands in that predicament. Mr. President, I consider it a proud distinction to be an American citizen; but I fear that the respect which that name has heretofore commanded in every part of the world, will be diminished, if not entirely destroyed, unless the laws relative to naturalization are administered with that purity without which the ministers at the altar of justice become a disgrace and curse to the country in which they rule. In the days of Roman greatness and glory, her citizen required no pass-port. In whatever part of the world he travelled, even among the fiercest barbarians, the exclamation "civis sum Romanus" proved a talisman to him: the uplifted arm of the assassin was paralyzed, and the instrument of death dropped harmless from his hands. Such should be the charm of the words "I am an American citizen." But, sir, that will never be the case unless the rights and privileges appertaining to the citizens are scrupulously guarded and protected, without odious distinctions and disqualications.

Mr. Lewis desiring to offer a few resolutions on this subject, moved an adjournment to Monday morning, which was carried.

Monday, February 17, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer from the Rev. Mr. Woodbridge.

The Convention proceeded to the discussion of the clause recommended by the majority of the committee on the executive department, requiring that none should be eligible to the office of governor but a natural born citizen of the United States.

Mr. Lewis said that this question had been most elaborately discussed, particularly by those that opposed the principle in the section, that the chief executive office of the State should be restricted to native born citizens. I consider, said Mr. Lewis, this principle to be vital, and one of the most important that will come before this house for decision. I shall not follow the wide field of debate that has been opened by the gentlemen that have preceded me in opposition to this principle; but I shall restrict myself to showing that it is expedient; and that as to the argument of unconstitutionality, it is without the slightest foundation.

We have been frequently told, in the progress of our proceedings, that we should leave nothing discretionary with the legislature; that our duties are clearly defined; that in reference to suffrage, we are to extend it; and from the dispositions of the law it has been inferred that we should endeavor to carry out the presumed will of the people. What says the law convening this Convention, upon the subject of suffrage? That the 8th section of the 2d article of the constitution be amended, so as to fix and determine in a more specific manner the qualifications of all persons exercising the right of suffrage.

There is nothing in this section, said Mr. Lewis, which, strictly speaking, authorizes us to extend suffrage any more than to restrict it. Its palpable signification is this: that the particular section of the old constitution upon suffrage is vague and indefinite, and that we are to amend it so as to make it more clear and explicit. From its context, it may be safely inferred that it was the design of the people to leave us a certain discretionary power to amend the constitution, as well in respect to changes that were foreseen as those that were not foreseen, and upon which we were not made acquainted with the popular desires. We are to consult expediency and the public welfare, in all the changes we may deem it proper to make to the organic law; the people reserving to themselves the right to sanction or disapprove our work; as it may be presumed they would not yield their acquiescence to any system of government which did not meet their approbation.

This general principle being laid down, which may be considered a satisfactory response to the argument that we should not go beyond the letter of the stipulations in the act calling the Convention, I come to the question directly at issue; and I would here remark that the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Marigny) has misinterpreted the appeal made by the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin) to his colleague (M. Soulé.) That appeal was a vivid exposition of the feelings of the human heart, and of the sentiments and emotions which the Deity has implanted therein. I am of opinion that these emotions and sentiments are paramount, whatever may be said to the contrary upon this and similar questions, and which would tend to establish that a man who crosses the Atlantic and comes among us, is as susceptible of entertaining American feelings, and of being indoctrinated with them with the same facility, and to as great an extent, as a native born citizen who has imbibed them from his infancy. I deny this most emphatically. I believe it to be a delusion. Nor can I admit the right of foreigners to complain, if the native citizens of the country should think fit to stop the privileges that have heretofore so liberally been accorded to them. The United States is the patrimony of native Americans; and we have a perfect right to prescribe how far foreigners shall be allowed to participate with us, or whether we shall suffer them to participate at all in the administration of our government. Their persons and property being protected, they have no right to ask anything more; for this is all that is accorded by the most liberal and enlightened nations of Europe to the native citizens of the United States, while in their dominions.

I now come to treat of the constitutionality of the provision excluding foreigners from holding the office of governor of the State. And here I will take occasion to say, that far from me is the design to wound the feelings of any that may be born in a different hemisphere from our own, in the remarks I may make. Nor is it my intention to dispute the rights of those persons that are already naturalized; their rights, in my judgment, are as sacred as those of native American citizens. I regret the existence of the naturalization laws, but as long as they are in existence, I am for respecting them. My object is only for the future, and I would be the first one to sustain an amendment that would do away with any misapprehension upon the subject. I would not do this as a concession to the menaces that have been made, and the doubts that have been raised as to our power; but because I conceive it to be just and proper to recognize in the most positive manner the just pretensions of those who were citizens at the adoption of this constitution.

The gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Soulé) has fallen into a singular misconception in relation to the federal constitution and the original articles of confederation, that surprise me—coming from one so able and distinguished as a jurist. He calls the articles of the confederation the old constitution, in contradistinction to what he terms the new constitution; and seems not to be familiar with the character and extent of that original instrument. The powers of the general government under it were very limited; the states retaining the uncontrolled exercise of most of their sovereign powers as independent communities. When it became manifest to them that such a system was impracticable for national purposes, they, yielding to the exigencies of the case, met in convention, and conceded as much power as was requisite to give force and stability to the general government, and enable it to act in its general sphere. All other powers not expressly delegated to the federal government by the compact—the constitution—were reserved to the states respectively, or to the people. This is the fundamental principle which restrains the federal government and restricts it within certain limits, beyond which it cannot go. So far as it keeps within these limits, it is supreme and absolute; but beyond them it cannot go without encroaching upon the reserved rights of the states. If this principle were to be impaired, the just balance between the states and the federal government—the equilibrium between them—would be destroyed, and our federative system would be brought to a violent termination. The delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Soulé) confounds the true state of things. It is not the federal government, as his argument pre-supposes, that formed the states, but it was the states that formed and established the federal government. As I have premised, the states conceded only as much power as was indispensable to the functions of the federal government, and no more. The states, in other respects, retained their sovereignty, and have consequently the undoubted right to administer, as they may judge best, their own local affairs. The federal government does not pretend to interfere with them, nor would her interference be submitted to. There is nothing in the constitution to authorize it; for the states, jealous of their rights, have made in that instrument an express grant of powers, and what has not been expressly granted is expressly retained. The general government has no more right to regulate suffrage in a state than it has to say who shall be eligible to the offices of the state; and, in order to prevent any misapprehension, we find in the amendments to the constitution (art. 11) the following distinct enunciation: "The enumeration in the constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." And in article 12, the following: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people."

That the states or the people retain these powers is apparent from the fact that the general government has no other power than what is delegated to it by the states, and consequently those powers not delegated reside, as heretofore, in the state, and is part of their inherent sovereignty. The converse of this proposition would convert the federal government into a central government, and would place the state governments as mere appendages to its power.

Great stress has been laid by the gentlemen that have appealed to the constitution, as determining the want of authority in the state to insist upon the qualification of native citizenship for a particular station, that by a certain article which they have quoted, citizens of one state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the other states; and that, in virtue of that article, we have no right to inhibit any class of citizens from our sister states to hold office and to be eligible thereto under our state government. It is evident that the language of this section will not bear the construction attempted to be placed upon it. But, to exhibit at once what this construction would lead to, it is only necessary to remark that it would make a colored citizen of Massachusetts, or any other of the free states eligible to office among us. The absurdity of that construction must be apparent, which would lead to such a result; and yet, if we have no right to discriminate, the only question which would have to be resolved would be the citizenship of the individual in any one of our sister states; and if he were a negro, we would be bound, if he were a citizen, to admit his eligibility.

How, asked Mr. Lewis, does the delegate from New Orleans, Mr. (Soulé,) get rid of the authority of the State to prescribe the condition of native citizenship among other qulifications for governor. He cites a passage from the Federalist, which, referring to the powers ceded by the States to the federal government, and written for the express purpose of securing the assent of the States, deprecates any attempt to exclude foreigners, and to draw a line of demarcation between them and native citizens. This language in the Federalist at that day, had some pretext to excuse it, but in my humble conception, it would have been much better for the permanent interests of the country, had the policy of naturalization never existed.

Another delegate, (Mr. Roselius,) has attempted to destroy the argument of expediency in favor of the principle before us, by lessening the responsibilities and the importance of the office of governor. He has favored us, too, with an eulogium upon the merits of naturalized citizens, and shrinks with evident feeling from the term foreigner, applied to them. I cannot see any thing so very distasteful in this expression, and that it can be construed into an insult to remind a man of the country of his birth. For myself, on an occasion when I was in Canada, although I was still in America, and on the very borders of the United States, I felt as a foreigner, and if any one had told me that I was a foreigner, a citizen of the United States, I certainly would not have been ashamed of it. The title of citizenship conferred by adoption does not obliterate the register of ones birth-place, nor does it divest a man of his natural predilections. Whatever, therefore, may be said to the contrary, a foreigner continues to be a foreigner—be he naturalized or not, and only ceases to be such, when he returns to his native country.

I have great deference, said Mr. Lewis, for the opinions of eminent men, and when one's own judgment is in suspense, I think the weight of their authority may well be invoked to decide a controversy. In the present case there is great conflict of opinion, and it may be expedient, although the authority of great names is not always conclusive, to place some reliance upon the declarations and actions of men who have been conspicuous among us for patriotism and intelligence. To the three great names cited by the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin,) as favoring the principle which has been characterized in this house as odious and exclusive, I may add the name of Daniel D. Tompkins, president of the convention of New York, which formed the present constitution of that State, excluding naturalized citizens from the office of governor. It has been intimated that we are behind the age—that we, who support that principle, are seeking to revive old and exploded distinctions. If we are obnoxious to the charge, it is some consolation to know that we are in tolerable good company. There is one of the great champions of "the democracy" with us—Martin Van Buren, who was a member of the New York convention, and sustained the adoption of the same principle in the constitution of that state, if I mistake not. Other names, of other distinguished men might be added, but it is not worth while.

It is not alone upon one point that the opposition have shown great susceptibility. The simple apprehension that has been expressed that there would be danger in having a naturalized citizen governor in the event of a war with the nation of which he was originally a subject, has excited a great deal of feeling. The gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Marigny,) has auricularly foretold that we shall never have a war except with Great Britain.—That as to a war with France, that was utterly out of the question. It cannot possibly happen. The progress of civilization in France has been so great, and the liens of attachment that bind us and France together are so strong, that war is impossible! We may expect hostilities with England, and then we may count on the assistance of the French nation to help us to give John Bull a thrashing, for the French people have an inveterate hatred to Englishmen. I do not know why there would be greater probabilities of a war with one than with the other nation. The mass of the American people are descended from the same race as the English. We have derived from the parent state most of our institutions, and many of our great franchises. The writ of habeas corpus, the right of trial by jury, &c. &c. War, however, may occur with both, and if it does, we should have enough national feeling to carry us successfully and honorably through the contest. Unfortunately for the gentleman's predilections, the great friendship entertained in our behalf by that nation, was not sufficient to induce her to pay a certain indemnity, which she had procrastinated for years and years, and which was only recovered by the firmness of that great and good man, General Jackson, during his presidential term; when war was presented by him as the only alternative, in case the money was not paid. It has been said that several adopted citizens, Frenchmen by birth, when war was anticipated as the inevitable result of the misunderstanding, immediately declared in this city their intention not to take up arms against their native country.

I can very well understand the gentleman's (Mr. Marigny) predilections. I understood him to boast of his French origin, and to declare that he represented six generations of Louisianians. I cannot go as far as the gentleman. I have lost my genealogical tree, and I cannot trace my family much this side of one of the sons of Noah, who after the deluge peopled our globe.

The love of country is one of the strongest feelings of the human heart. It is exemplified in the Swiss, who pines away and dies, unless he can return to his barren mountain and to his solemn glaciers. It is admitted to be all-controling by the member from New Orleans (Mr. Roselius) who has depicted the strength and durability of schoolboy reminiscences, which, he says, nothing can eradicate. For myself, said Mr. Lewis, I confess I am under the influence of an undying love for the land of my birth, and I cannot conceive how any man, who is not devoid of honor, can be insensible to that sentiment. I believe it burns in the breast of every man. And, if a foreigner were to tell me that he preferred the United States to his own country, if I could believe him, I would think him unworthy of being the citizen of any country.

The gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Roselius,) tells us that in the transport of attachment and fidelity to our country, naturalized citizens would repair to the field of battle on the first appearance of danger, and that they would imbrue their hands in the blood of their brothers and of their kindred. If this be not a stretch of the imagination, it is a paradox against which both nature and reason protests.

Mr. Lewis disclaimed the intention of wounding the feelings of any one that had sought a refuge from the privations and tyrannies of European governments, under the shadow of our liberal institutions. But, he considered it was impossible for a man to forego or be insensible to the love of country, whether he were born in the United States, in England, in France, in China, or in the empire of the Mogul. If I were to abandon my native country, (said Mr. Lewis,) and become a citizen of another country, I could never raise my arm against the country of my birth. I could never shed the blood of my fellow countrymen on the field of battle. The most cruel tortures would appear to me preferable to this horrible sacrifice of the dearest and tenderest ties; and I cannot believe the love of country is less fervid in the bosom of others than in my own.

The gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Marigny,) has adverted to the daring and heroic deeds of the French citizens who were resident in New Orleans in 1815. Their devotion is easily understood. An inveterate hatred towards the English nerved their arms, and not any particular fondness for our cause. Had it been a French instead of an English invading army, would the result have been the same? I question it very much. Even as it was there was disaffection. Louallier, a subject of France, and citizen of the United States, a member of the Legislature, issued inflammatory appeals to his countrymen, and resisted the authority of the commander in chief, invoking the interposition of the French consul. I was well acquainted, (said Mr. Lewis) with Louallier. He was a most estimable man, and we were upon such habits of intimacy, that he appointed me his executor at his death. He cherished his native country to the last, and invariably gave to it the preference, as all foreigners do, although it is pretended that they are better Americans than the natives of the soil; because the latter are Americans by necessity, as we are tauntingly told, the former through choice. So it is said by those who are their panegyrists! I again repeat that I have no hostility towards any class of citizens—but I do think we should cherish a national character—a love of country.

A great deal of stress has been laid upon the services which, it is assumed, we received from foreigners during our revolutionary struggle. Washington was certainly in a position to appreciate those services? And what was his testimony? That all the foreigners were mercenary and untrustworthy, with the exception of Lafayette.

It is an error to suppose that this apprehension of foreign influence is something new—something that has originated, as we are told, with the party excitements of the day. Such is not the fact. The father of his country, the great Washington in his farewell address, admonished his countrymen to beware of foreign influence. The patriarch of democracy, the man who is most eulogised by those who profess to be the sole exponents of democratic principles, Thomas Jefferson, wished that there was an ocean of fire between the United States, and the Kingdoms of Europe. Were these men excited by temporary and evanescent resentments. Were they disappointed partizans, or were they convinced by their own sad experience of the danger that menaced their country? It seems to me, (said Mr. Lewis,) that this is a question in which every American must feel an abiding interest, and if naturalized citizens are as devoted to our country as we are told they are, and as attached to our institutions as is assumed, they ought not to entertain any other than purely local feelings upon this subject, or feel differently from the natives of the country.

Mr. Brent, said that he regarded the action of this convention, so far as related to the section under debate, as of but little importance in the practical operation of the government. The probability was extremely remote, that any naturalized citizen would ever be elected governor of the State. and so far as that particular office was concerned, it was wholly immaterial whether the prohibition be adopted in the constitution or not. But if the principle be true, that a naturalized citizen, invested with the rights of citizenship by the act of congress, and the decree of a competent court, is not worthy to be trusted with the office of governor, the principle cannot, and must not, be permitted to stop here. If a citizen of foreign birth be so suspicious, that you cannot trust him with the administration of the laws, I, for one, cannot consent that he should sit around our council boards, to assist in framing the laws by which we are governed, and above all, I cannot consent that he should ever be permitted to minister as a high priest at the altar of justice. No, sir, the door of the constitution must be closed effectually against him, and it is our high and imperative duty, to sweep all the departments of government, with the besom of Native American reform. The executive department is confessedly less important than the legislative or the judiciary. Are you to exclude the adopted citizen from an office of minor importance, only to invest him with more heavy and more weighty responsibility? I can never consent to this.—The principle is either a good one or a bad one. If a good one, it must be pushed to its consequences, if a bad one it must be utterly discarded and rejected. A grave and momentous question of principle is then submitted to our consideration, and it becomes the convention to pause and ponder well upon the decision which it is about to pronounce.

We were told on Friday last, by a delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin,) that he had decided this question, first, by his feelings, and that afterwards his reason had justified the decision. I must be permitted to say, sir, that the delegate has taken an unsafe counsellor to his bosom, that will be apt to lure him from the path of duty, into the mazes and perplexities of error.—If our judgment is to be clouded by the mists of feeling and prejudice, how can our decision be such as would best suit our own honor, and promote the solid and permanent good of our common constituency! We are not merely legislating for ourselves, or the age in which we live, but we are legislating for the unborn millions who are to come after us, and fill the places which now we occupy. Our aim should be to reach conclusions that will stand the test of time and scrutiny, and not such as are based upon the unsteady and treacherous foundation of the evanescent feelings of the hour. I have the advantage of that delegate. I have no feelings, no antipathies, no predilections to gratify. Whatever conclusion I have arrived at, has been reached by my judgment, unmingled and unalloyed by feeling—by either hate, or passion, or prejudice. It has been repeatedly asserted in argument, that there was a party in this convention who desired to dispense with every qualification for office. If such a party exists, I have no knowledge of its existence. I have maintained, repeatedly, that there should be no higher qualifications for office than what is required to exercise the right of suffrage. That principle I will never surrender, until my confidence in popular government is overthrown and destroyed.—No argument has been urged to show its impropriety, nor can any be advanced, consistent with democratic notions of government. The qualified electors are the sovereigns of the state. As the depositories of political power, they hold in their hands the issues of life and death. All offices hold. or ought to hold, their tenure from them, and they decide, through the ballot box, all the great political questions that are agitated before the country. Should this tremendous power be confided to men whom you are forced to disqualify from holding the very offices they have created? You permit them to vote, and by their vote, perhaps, to sway the destinies of this great nation, and yet you will not permit them to be voted for. Can a greater absurdity than this be conceived? The creature is elevated above the creator. The very order of things is inverted, and the governmental pyramid stands upon its apex. Instead of our institutions reposing upon the broad foundation of the popular sovereignty, it seems to be supposed that its stability can only be secured by a reliance upon the officers and agents of the people,—From whence was the doctrine derived, that the agent is greater than the principal? Such a doctrine I repudiate; for it is neither legally nor politically correct.

It is to be hoped, sir, that after this explanation, our principles will not hereafter be perverted or misrepresented. Here we plant the flag-staff of democratic equality. Gentlemen may fight under whatever flag they please—I stand here to defend this banner, and if need be, to perish in its defence.

A leading object in this convention appears to be, to impose restrictions on the people. In the parish which I have the honor in part to represent, there were but thirteen votes, as well as I recollect, against the call for a Convention, and some seven or eight hundred in its favor. Had the idea suggested itself, that this body when assembled, would employ itself in imposing additional restrictions upon the people, instead of removing those that already oppressed them, the tables would have been turned, and the glorious thirteen would have alone voted in favor of the measure. The object however, was conceived to be very different from what has been advocated and avowed in this House. We supposed that it was to remove obstructions—to strike off the shackles, and not to forge new fetters to impede the people in the exercise of their undoubted rights. But, sir, I am digressing.

The honorable delegate from Opelousas, (Mr. Lewis) who has just resumed his seat, has endeavored to support the restrictive feature embraced in the present section, and he has urged a variety of arguments to which I desire to respond. And here at the outset, you cannot but remark the singular adroitness, which he and other gentlemen, on the same side of the question, have displayed in evading the constitutional argument which has been so earnestly pressed against them. They think they can carry their point, by bold and unfounded assertions—by appealing to the principle of the sovereignty of the States, and by invoking the authority of great names in their behalf. But, sir, we cannot permit them to escape the issue which is made between us, by a resort to any other authority than that of the federal constitution itself. I bring them back to the point from which they have wandered, and I hold them to the plain and unequivocal language of that instrument. Their arguments cannot stand the test of the federal compact. That instrument repudiates their narrow and contracted doctrines, and it settles with the voice of supreme authority, the question we are now discussing. What does it say? What does it declare? It says, "that the citizens of each State, shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several States." These two lines adjudicate the question. They are plain and simple, and their meaning is apparent to any comprehension. Apply this simple declaration to that principle, which seeks to exclude a class of citizens recognized to be such, by the several States, and what becomes of the argument of constitutionality? But let me illustrate by example—suppose a foreigner, to have been naturalized in the State of Illinois, under the act of Congress, and by the decree of a competent court, admitting him to all the rights of citizenship. Under the laws of that State he is invested with all the privileges of an Illinois citizen, and is eligible to all the offices created by her constitution. He removes to this State, and is instantly struck with disability and disfranchised from holding the office of governor, whereas no such prohibition extends to the native citizen of any other State; can you say, that under these circumstances, "the citizens of each State are invested with all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several States?" Have you not disfranchised a citizen of Illinois, and deprived him of a privilege which you extend to citizens of the other States? And is not this a palpable and flagrant violation of the constitution! Sir, gentlemen cannot evade nor escape from the conclusion. The federal compact has denied to the States, any authority to create distinctions between different classes of citizens. All are placed upon the same broad platform of political equality, and no difference can be made between them, without nullifying and trampling under foot the fundamental law of the land. This State, in the exercise of its sovereignty, can declare who shall be eligible to the office of governor, provided, that in so doing, it does not attempt to create a distinction between American citizens. This is the only limitation upon its power, and to that limitation it ought to be, and it must be held.

But how sir, do gentlemen attempt to overcome this plain and palpable construction of the constitution? They tell us with an air of triumph, as if thereby the constitutional argument was utterly demolished, that some five or six other States of the Union have thought proper to adopt a principle similar to the one now proposed. I cannot conceive how the complexion of the argument is altered by this astounding discovery. Does one wrong justify another, or does the frequency with which a crime is committed, extenuate in any degree, the guilt of an offender? Are we to defend an usurpation of power, by quoting other usurpations? Upon this principle, every assassin who lifts his weapon against the throat of his fellow man, could justify himself by contending that others had been guilty of a similar offence.

But the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin,) has referred us to a precedent in the Virginia Convention. He tells us that three of the most distinguished men in that celebrated Convention, to wit: James Monroe, the president of it, James Madison and John Marshall, were in favor of a similar exclusion. That they were members of the Convention that adopted the exclusion, is undoubtedly true, but that they supported it is not equally clear. On the contrary, my information leads me to a different conclusion. While the gentleman was invoking the authority of these great names, he forgot to tell us that James Monroe had withdrawn from the Convention on account of ill health, and was not present when this question was decided, and that James Madison had voted against it. As to Mr. Marshall, I consider it immaterial whether he voted for or against it. I think it more than probable he voted for it. No man entertains a higher opinion of him as a profound and learned jurist, than I do, but I am free to confess, I attach but little importance to his opinions upon political matters. He was a federalist in the days of the black cockade, and deeply imbued with all the heresies of that school, whose temporary ascendancy resulted in fastening upon the country, the odious alien and sedition laws, the most disgraceful legislative enactments that have ever blurred and blotted the statute books of the nation. That he sympathized deeply with his party in its hostility to foreigners, I doubt not, and is it to be regarded as strange, that under these circumstances, he should have clung to the tenets of that political school in which he was reared? I repeat, sir, that whatever others may do, I attach no weight or importance to the mere political opinions of chief justice Marshall. All that we have heard, then, sir, about these great names, vanishes into thin air, and the gentleman is left unsupported by the very authority on which he has relied.

The member from Opelousas (Mr. Lewis) has invoked the doctrine of State rights, against the authority of the general government, to establish an uniform rule all over the Union, in relation to the immunities and privileges of the citizens of any one of the States, in all the other States of the confederacy. He says the general government has no such right. I am happy to find the gentleman advocating the doctrine of State rights, and to hear him declare that he is a strict constructionist, which is not the creed of the political party to which he belongs. I am rejoiced to have the weight of his ability on that side of the question. But I cannot concur with him in the application of that principle to the question now under debate. State rights do not involve any thing more, than the assertion and maintenance of the reserved rights of the States: The right of admitting foreigners to citizenship, has been conceded to the general government by the consent of the States, and the States have likewise consented to the principle engrafted in the constitution, that no distinction shall be made between different classes of American citizens. How then is this an invasion of State rights? The gentleman is evidently mistaken, and the position which I have assumed, is beyond the cavil of the strictest constructionist, and the most astute advocate of State rights.

The delegate from Opelousas then proceeded to dilate upon that intense and deathless attachment to our native land which, he says, burns with a steady and undying lustre in every human heart. He spoke of it as universal, pervading all classes and conditions of mankind, and he attributed a power to it beyond that of any other sentiment which warms and animates the breast of man. I fear, sir, the gentleman has been disporting himself upon the fields of fancy, and that he has not only misread the book of nature, but misinterpreted or overlooked the instructive lessons of history. The theory of the gentleman may be a good one, but it has nothing to repose upon but poetry and imagination. Against his poetry I will array history; against his fancy I will place facts.

Look at our revolutionary war; were there not numerous instances of persons born and educated in England, who had fought bravely and gallantly in her armies upon the continent, but who nevertheless threw up their commissions, and as officers and soldiers joined our standard and combatted nobly in our behalf, from the commencement to the close of that struggle? Hand to hand and shoulder to shoulder, they fought beside the natives of the soil, against the forces of the invader; and from Bunker Hill to the Plains of Eutaw, there was no battle field which did not reek with the blood of Englishmen, shed in the holy cause of freedom. The names of Gates and Lee, and a host of others, could be cited to prove that, in a good cause, brave and honest men will not hesitate to unsheath their swords against the land of their nativity. What now becomes of the argument which has been urged to show the impossibility of that which has so frequently happened? Can it be said, with the pages of history before us, that no conscientious man will take up arms to maintain the rights of mankind, against the country of his birth? Sir, honorable gentlemen who dispute this proposition deal altogether in fancy, and amuse themselves in the realms of fiction. History and experience are sad commentaries upon the tales of their imagination!

The argument of the delegate from Opelousas leads to strange and unnatural results. Although the immigrant is kindly and hospitably received upon our shores; although he is amply protected in person and property, by the parental care of a government which sheds its blessings as the heavens distil their dew; yet according to that delegate, his attachment to his native land is so absorbing that he cannot strike one blow in behalf of the land of his adoption, even though he may have been driven by tyranny and oppression from the home of his nativity. Is it the nature of man to forget evils inflicted or benefits conferred? I doubt not that the love of country is strong and deep-seated in the human heart; but like all other sentiments, it can be crushed and destroyed by unkindness and oppression. Why should the emigrant from Europe feel a stronger attachment for the home of his nativity than for the home of his adoption? From his earliest childhood, in the country of his birth, he has seen nothing around him but a people crushed and down-trodden by the iron heel of tyranny, writhing under the scourge of an imperious aristocracy, or plundered by the rapacity of a grasping and bigoted clergy. Were those scenes calculated to awaken the latent affections of his heart? Do you think that his memory would love to linger over those passages of woe, or that the emigrant would turn with joy from the spectacle of this free and happy people, to blast his vision, with the misery and pain and wretchedness which he had left behind? Forced to cross the wide Atlantic, by either religious or political persecution, he finds a home and an asylum, peace and protection, on our happy shores. Here he establishes himself; he builds up his fortunes · he surrounds himself with friends and family and kindred, and is it to be wondered at—is there any thing astonishing or unnatural in the fact, that he becomes identified with us in interest—that he reveres our institutions, and is ready to protect and defend them with his life? Is it remarkable that he should prefer the country of his adoption, with liberty and equality, to the country of his nativity, where there is a gloomy despotism and a constant restraint upon all his actions? To suppose the contrary, is to suppose something that would indeed be marvellously strange, and not at all consistent with the resentments of the human heart, for the insults and outrages of oppression. Is it natural for man to kiss the hand that smites him; or, like the frozen adder, to sting the bosom which warms him into life? Again I repeat, sir, that patriotism, like all other sentiments, may be eradicated by unkindness, ingratitude or oppression.

Do you not recollect that when Coriolanus was exiled by the decree of the three tribes, that he returned to Rome at the head of aforeign soldiery, determined to raze the city to its foundations—to give its temples and palaces to the flames, and strew their ashes on the gale—and that he was restrained from the work of vengeance; not by patriotism—not by love of country; but by the entreaties of his beautiful wife; and of his aged and venerable mother? The fire of patriotism had been quenched by the wrongs inflicted on him, and it was entirely the operation of another sentiment, which was the salvation of Rome. History tells us that if nothing but patriotism had stood between him and his revenge, the eternal city, with all her pride and pomp, would have been laid in ashes by the hands of her injured and exiled son.

We have heard many fantastic notions advanced about the strength of early impressions, and the strong influence which they exert upon the character of man; and we have had poetical allusions made to the school-houses and orchards and play-grounds of our childhood, as if the heart of man could recieve no impression whatever, except in the tender years of early life. This is all sheer fancy, and the very extravagance of poetry. You can no more compare the ties of early association, to those stronger and more powerful feelings, which bind and rivet the heart of man in its maturity, than you can compare the first faint light of the sun, whice streaks the eastern horizon, to the blazing splendors of his meridian glory.

In discussing this question, an honorable delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjaman) referred to the glorious battle of the 8th of January, 1815; and it was with surprise and astonishment, that I heard him express a doubt whether we would have been triumphant on that occasion, if we had been forced to encounter the armies of France, instead of the armies of England. This is a slur upon the French population of New Orleans. This doubt is derogatory to the character of a high-minded and chivalrous people, who are as conspicuous for their attachment to our institutions and government, as any other class of our citizens. Do you suppose, sir, that if a French army had landed upon our shores, breathing war and vengeance, and threatening this city with rapine and violence, that there would have been a French sword in New Orleans that would have slept in its scabbard, and would not have started indignantly forth to protect and defend the city, or if that should be unavailing, to sweep to its revenge. I have too high an opinion of French chivalry to suppose that this class of our population would have been traitors to themselves and the land of their adoption, merely because the invaders were Frenchmen. No sir, the result, under any circumstances, would have been the same, and the flag of our country would have waved in victory above the lilies of France, as it did above the lion of England.

Why seek to deny the love of liberty in the bosom of others, when we feel it burning so strongly in our own? I yield to no one in attachment and devotion to my native land; but I love it not merely because it is my native land—not because my eyes first happened to open to the light of day upon its soil, but I love it for the same reason that William Tell loved the glaciers and ice-ribbed mountains of Switzerland—because it is the abode of freedom. Nature has showered upon her its richest gifts. Behold her lordly rivers—her giant lakes—her fertile valleys—her majestic mountains. Here it is that "boon nature" has scattered free and wild "her germs of fruits—her fairest flowers." But it is for none of these, that my heart warms to her with inextinguishable love. I love her because here it is we have established a government of freedom and equality—here it is we have asserted and vindicated the rights of man, and here we have established an asylum where the exile can lie down in peace, and where all are left free and undisturbed in the pursuit and enjoyment of happiness. I can well conceive how the same feeling which animates my bosom, can find a resting place in the bosom of the adopted citizen.

Hence it is, Mr. President, that I dislike all attempts to breed and foment differences among our population of different origin. What, after all, is the mere circumstance of birth-place? It is the man, and not the place of birth, that we should look to. Once recognize these exclusions and distinctions, and you can place no limit to the principle. Society itself will be broken up and divided into innumerable fragments, that have lost entirely the principle of cohesion. This clamor about the danger to be apprehended from foreign influence, is all sound and fury, signifying nothing. If you wish to have a dangerous and deadly enemy in your midst, you have only to disfranchise the foreign population, and you have at once accomplished the result. The disfranchisement itself will be a bond of union, and a hostile body will be organized in your very midst, who, having no interest or participation in our government, will avail themselves of the first opportunity to strike it a fatal blow. If one solitary instance could be pointed out, where evil had been inflicted by the hand of an adopted citizen, there would be some show of plausibility in the arguments we have heard. But there is no pretence that in our past history, there is any thing which justifies this alarm. I must therefore recur to first principle, and insist that no distinction shall be made between different classes of American citizens.

But, Mr. President, I object to stigmatising our adopted citizens as foreigners. I make no distinction between an American by birth, and one declared to be such by an act of Congress and in pursuance of a judicial decision. An adopted citizen is not a foreigner. His rights are as sacred as those of the native, and he cannot be dispoiled of them without violating the fundamental law of the land. But, sir, if we permit ourselves to distinguish between different classes of our citizens, a due regard for our own safety will prompt us to provide against real, instead of imaginary dangers. The greatest peril which now menaces the south, comes from a different quarter from that at which this exclusion is levelled. I speak of the dangers which threaten from the machinations of the northern abolitionists, those wretches, who, in seeking to stir up our slaves to sedition and revolt, are hurling fire-brands, as it were, upon banks of gunpowder. You recollect, sir, the picture which was drawn upon this subject by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin.) I cordially concur with him, as to the frightful aspect in which this question now presents itself. Would it not be much wiser, sir, to guard against this impending danger, the reality of which is acknowledged, than to attempt to shield ourselves against an imaginary peril. If these restrictions are to commence, let them be carried out, and let every one be excluded from office but native Louisianaians. If adopted citizens are to be disqualified from office because it is feared that some of the prejudices of early association may cling to them, the same disqualification should attach to the abolitionist, and to him who comes from the land of abolition. The State of Louisiana, surrounded by this Chinese wall of restriction, would then indeed be a new celestial empire.

I believe, sir, that the doctrine of native Americanism, is too narrow and contracted to take root in the soil of Louisiana. The people of this State can never be under the influence of that spirit of selfish exclusion. Besides, we have nothing legitimately to do with the subject. We were delegated to make a constitution for all the people of Louisiana, without regard to their origin. The question of native Americanism was not broached before the election of this body, and I conceive that we will entirely disregard our duty, if we seek to incorporate in this constitution, any principles which have not received the sanction and approbation of our common constituency I shall vote for the motion to strike out.

Mr. Beatty begged the indulgence of the Convention to make a few remarks, which his position to this question rendered appropriate and necessary. It was I, said Mr. Beatty, that first raised the question of constitutionality in reference to this clause, and suggested the propriety of striking it out. In my humble opinion, if it were to be retained, it would be of no effect; and the only point involved is, whether such a principle ought to be found in the constitution. Whoever will take the trouble of examining it carefully, will find that it creates not only an odious distinction among our citizens, but that it is repugnant to the spirit, if not to the very letter of the constitution of the United States. If foreigners are to be excluded from citizenship; if grave and weighty reasons exist for such a policy, let it be done. There is a legal and constitutional way; but a national way only, to effect that purpose. But when a foreigner does become a citizen in virtue of the acts of congress and of a judicial decision pronouncing him to be such, he is beyond all question invested with all the prerogatives, all the immunities, all the rights of a citizen by birth, and there is no power to exclude or to withhold from him any of his political franchises. If he be eligible to hold some offices, he must be considered as eligible to hold all. The principle cannot be suspended, and he be incapacitated from a particular station, and that too in the face of the fundamental law of the country that makes no distinction between him and other citizens. The exclusion in the section presents but a very inadequate remedy, if there be evil resulting from the admission of foreigners to citizenship; and if these evils really do exist, it is not for this body to attempt to enforce a corrective, for it has neither the right nor the power to discriminate, and to say that this particular class of citizens are trust-worthy, and another class are not trust-worthy. That such a class of citizens shall be eligible to office, and another class shall not be eligible. If it were invested with any such authority, it would be competent to invalidate all the proceedings had for naturalization, and to declare that the proprietor of a certificate of naturalization was not entitled in Louisiana to the immunities and privileges of citizenship. That he was not entitled to suffrage, although he possessed all the essential qualifications of a voter.

I freely concede, said Mr. Beatty, and I am happy to hear the gentleman from St. Landry avow the doctrine, that the people and the States have certain reserved rights; but, the enunciation and substantive grants of power to the federal government in the constitution is exclusive of any reservation on the part of the States of the particular power which is granted. With reference to the power of naturalization, the States have conceded that Congress shall have the power of establishing an uniform rule of naturalization. Whether this were wisely done or not, answers not our purpose to inquire. It has been done, and is conclusive of the rights acquired in all the States of the union by the process of naturalization. It is likewise equally clear that the first paragraph of section 2d article 4th of the constitution, stipulating that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States, contains no reservations, but is a universal principle, applicable to all citizens, and the only test of which is citizenship. It means, and can only mean, that a citizen of one State shall be placed on a precise equality as regards political privileges with the citizen of another State. It matters not, then, that citizenship be acquired by birth or by naturalization; and the constitution makes not the slightest difference.

But there are other political rights besides suffrage and eligibility to State offices which are directly involved, if this construction be not the proper one. If the Convention have the power to declare, in this constitution, that naturalized citizens shall not be eligible to the office of governor, they may declare that naturalized citizens shall not vote—that they shall not have the faculty of holding property—of having a trial by an impartial jury—of being informed of the nature and cause of any accusation that may be brought against them—of being confronted with the witnesses against them—of having compulsory process to compel the attendance of their witnesses—of being allowed the assistance of counsel—the right of habeas corpus, or any other of those political rights for which the national compact has provided. There is nothing in the constitution of the United States that establishes any of those rights more clearly and definitely than the right of political equality; and if the latter be invaded by declaring that a particular class of citizens shall be ineligible to a particular office in the State, then with equal reason, and with as much authority, may the State abridge any or all of the other political franchises of citizenship.

There is another striking objection, Mr. President, to this section. It is not only invidious and exclusive as regards the naturalized citizen in reference to the native citizen, but it would operate, if it were susceptible of practical operation, partially and odiously between the naturalized citizens themselves. An inhabitant of the State, although a foreigner by birth, at the time of the treaty of cession of Louisiana, would be eligible to the office of governor, while a native of the territory of Florida, born before the acquisition of that territory by the United States, would not be eligible to that office.

A reference has been had, during this debate, to the peculiar opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in favor of a similar principle of exclusion. For that eminent jurist I certainly entertain great respect, but I think his authority is entitled to but little weight in the solution of the question. In purely legal matters, where the constitutional power was not involved, his dicta is always sound; but upon constitutional questions I know of no worse guide. He invariably lent towards the power of the government, and where there was no express grant, was always ready to imply one upon the slenderest pretences.

Some stress has been laid, in this discussion, upon the assumption that a similar principle has been embodied in the constitutions of one or two of the new States, and have obtained the acquiescence of the federal government. There is no weight in that argument, and I do not think it merits more than a passing notice.

To the argument of a deficiency in constitutional power to deprive the citizens of the other States of the same political privileges and rights which we enjoy, it is agreed that if this doctrine be true, it might lead to an absurd result. That a negro in Massachusetts might be vested with the privileges of citizenship by that State, and that consequently he necessarily, under that construction, would be entitled to all the privileges and rights of a white citizen of that State in Louisiana. To this I would reply, that the constitution of the United States never contemplated any other than the white population in its dispositions of government; and that an absurd inference cannot be an argument against the principle itself.

Mr. Ratliff said he rose less with the expectation of influencing the minds of his colleagues, than to discharge a solemn duty to his constituents. Much has been said upon this question, and ably said by the opponents and the advocates of the principle. I consider it, Mr. President, as an entering wedge, and if we sanction it, it will be but the prelude to other and more general exclusions.

So much has been offered (said Mr. R.) upon the constitutional points by gentlemen more competent than I can pretend to be, that I will dispense with saying any thing upon that head. The delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent) has well told you that as to the practical operation of this principle it would be well, and that it was only objectionable because it was restrictive, and an invidious discrimination between the rights of one portion of our citizens and another portion of our citizens. Our own experience proves how remote is the possibility that an adopted citizen will fill the chair of State. In thirty-two years, which dates our existence as an independent State, we have only had one adopted citizen elevated to the chief magistracy of the State. According to that result, to authorize the apprehensions entertained of an adopted citizen filling the chair of State at the period of an invasion, a cycle of thirty-two years would have to revolve, and even then there would be no danger unless the person holding the office of governor was a native of the country waging hostilities against us; for it is not assumed that there would be any danger in a citizen from any other country, or that he would be less faithful under such an emergency than a native citizen. The only peril would be that the governor for the time being chanced to have been born in the country with which we were at war. The improbability of any such a contingency is so palpable, even if we admit that an adopted citizen would be recreant under such circumstances to his adopted country, which I am far from believing, that it is truly astonishing that so much time and so much eloquence has been spent to alarm and excite our imaginations, when a little reflection would show us that it was a mere phantom.

But, admitting Mr. President, for the sake of the argument, that such a thing might happen, why attach greater danger to Frenchmen than to Englishmen, Scotchmen, or Irishmen, should a Frenchman happen to be the governor of the State? I am sorry to see a particular direction given to these assaults; for experience has shown us that the French people have always been the devoted friends and allies of the United States, and that as adopted citizens they are remarkable for all those qualities which characterize them as a brave, chivalrous and intelligent race. As for what has been said of the attachments to one's place of nativity, and that it would be something monstrous to expect an adopted citizen to fight against his native country in the event of a war with it and the United States; and to meet in mortal combat his brothers and relatives---his former countrymen—it is only a flight of the fancy, for we have seen in our revolutionary struggle, father fighting against son, and brother against brother; and the same people contending against each other, for the United States were then a portion of the British empire; the heroes of our revolution were the descendants of Englishmen, and were reared from their earliest infancy with as much loyalty towards the crown as if they had been born and reared on the other side of the Atlantic. Their subsequent hostility to the crown is conclusive that early impressions do not exercise a controlling and exclusive power over us.

I fear me much, said Mr. RATLIFF, that these and similar exclusions, have had their rise in party disappointments. The honorable delegate (Mr. Benjamin) has told us that his advocacy of the proposition proceeds from the dictates of his heart; that this is the monitor that has counselled him. If the honorable gentleman will consult his reason, he will find that this is not the counsel of his heart. That his judgment and his reason have been temporarily overcome by the defeat and disasters of the November presidential campaign. The delegate (Mr. Benjamin) on another occasion spoke eloquently of a little cloud, no bigger at first than a man's hand, which is now overshadowing the political horizon. When, during the presidential contest, that gentleman and his political associates were admonished of the appearance of that cloud, when they were warned of the danger, they treated it as visionary, as intended to operate upon the election and to secure the success of the democratic candidate. But now the gentleman comes over to us. He sounds the alarm and tells us that we were right---that there is danger, and we should avoid it by union and harmony in our councils. That the day is fast approaching when there will be but one party, and that all other considerations will merge into the necessity of guarding our homes and our firesides from the ruthless spirit of northern fanaticism. Let the gentleman sustain this position and he will be right. But how are we to guard against the danger which he anticipates? By dividing and distracting our communities, and establishing insidious and odious distinctions among them? The gentleman did not contemplate this, when he spoke so mournfully and so prophetically of the dangers that environed us! Why then make these odious distinctions? Why inculcate a feeling of distrust and mutual jealousy? Naturalized citizens are every way identified with us, as experience amply proves, and would be as ready to resist abolition, or any other evil with which we might be menaced, as native citizens. They would be as true to us in war as they are true to us in peace, and as ready to take up and defend the common cause, whether it be assailed from within or without. Why then exclude them? Why then tell them that they are unworthy of trust, and that there is one station beyond their fidelity? If they are unworthy to hold the office of governor, should the partialities of their fellow citizens elevate them to that post, they are unworthy of holding any civil or military employment, (especially the latter.) You should exclude them from all. If their fidelity be so deficient that there be danger to trust them with the office of governor, then the principle of exclusion ought to be carried out. They are unfit to be representatives to your legislature, to be senators, judges—to be sheriffs, or even constables. Exclude them altogether, if you have the power.

Mr. BENJAMIN rose to correct the delegate from Rapides, (Mr. Brent,) particularly in one point, where that gentleman had seen fit to controvert his (Mr. Benjamin's) statement, that Mr. Madison, in the Virginia convention, gave his sanction to a similar principle in refereece to the office of governor. The delegate from Rapides denied this fact, and also asserted that Mr. Monroe was not present when the question was taken, and therefore did not vote for it. It was true Mr. Monroe was not in his seat, owing to indisposition, when the section finally passed, but upon examination it would be found that his name was appended to the constitution, as well as Mr. Madison's; and it was quite clear that if either of those distinguished statesmen had disapproved of the principle, or had considered it in conflict with the constitution of the United States, which it has been here alleged to be, they never would have put their names to that instrument. There was, however, in reference to Mr Madison, still more direct testimony, establishing conclusively the fact that he sustained in the convention this very principle. [Mr. Benjamin here read an extract from the Debates in the Virginia Convention, page 722.] It is the gentleman from Rapides who is in error as to the point of fact, and not I.

Mr. PRESTON: It was on my authority that the delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent) asserted that Mr. Madison did not sanction, as asserted by the member from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin) that principle of exclusion. In going from the Convention, I mentioned it casually to the delegate from Rapides, as being my impression from a perusal of the report of debates in the Virginia Convention. I did not consider it a matter of much importance, and did not expect to have my statement called into question. But if the Convention will indulge me for a moment, I think I can establish it by a reference to the debates.

Mr. Brent: While the gentleman from Jefferson is examining the reports of the debates, I will take occasion to refer to the point of difference between the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) and myself. That delegate concedes I was right in reference to Mr. Monroe, who I stated was not present when the vote was taken. As to the inference drawn by the member, (Mr. Benjamin) that because Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe signed the constitution, they approved of every thing in it, I beg to differ in opinion with that gentleman; their signatures are by no means conclusive of any such fact. Because they considered, as a whole, the constitution was a good one, does it follow that they approved of each and every part of it? I expect to place my name at the end of the constitution we are now forming, and yet I have bitterly opposed what I considered exclusive and odious restrictions upon the right of suffrage and the qualifications of representatives to the legislature; and hereafter, with equal justice it may be pretended, because my signature is appended to the whole constitution, that I approved and sanctioned those restrictions.

Mr. Preston: I find that Mr. Monroe, on account of the prostration of his health, was not present when this matter was acted upon. Mr. Powell moved a substitute for the section requiring that none should be eligible to the office of governor but a natural born citizen, and proposed in lieu thereof that none should be eligible but a citizen of the commonwealth for — years. Mr. Madison, it appeared, voted for this substitute; but the language of the report, I admit, is somewhat ambiguous. Be it as it may, the position of Virginia and the position of Louisiana, in respect to this matter, are so dissimilar as to render this precedent of no possible weight in our deliberations.

Mr. Benjamin said that he was anxious to set this matter right, inasmuch as his statement had been controverted, and it might be inferred it was his design to mislead the Convention. He explained to the Convention how it happened that Mr. Madison voted in favor of the substitute of Mr. Powell. The discussion had turned upon the question whether the governor should be elected by the legislature or by the people. Mr. Powell's substitute comprised a section upon that subject. It was that the governor should be elected by the people; and upon that question Mr. Madison voted aye. The yeas and nays were not called for on the passage of the section, as it is embodied in the Virginia Constitution, excluding foreigners naturalized. The question was taken simply upon its adoption, and according to the reports of the proceedings, both Madison and Marshall were present, and the section was adopted nemine contradiscente. I was right, said Mr. B., in what I asserted, and I am borne out in it by the records.

Mr. Grymes said that if he had entertained the slightest doubts upon the expediency and constitutionality of the proposition, the debates that had taken place would have dissipated them. He alluded particularly to the remarks of the two learned and distinguished delegates from the parish of Orleans, (Messrs. Roselius and Soulè.) Not a single expression has escaped from those gentlemen that has not filled me with apprehensions for the future and pain for the present. I will not undertake the idle task of refuting the constitutional objections that have been urged, because I consider that one of the gentlemen (Mr. Soule) in attempting to establish their validity, has incontestibly established, to my humble conception, that they have no foundation.

As for the sylogism drawn from the sickness of Mr. Monroe, and the singular construction that has been placed upon the signature of Mr. Madison affixed to the constitution itself, I have but one remark to make, and that is this, that it is a dispute upon a matter of no consequence; for be that as it may, the principle is the same. One thing is clear, that Mr. Madison never would have suffered the section to have escaped his scrutiny, if there had been any conflict between it and the constitution of the United States, as has been strangely assumed in this Convention. The report of the debates show, moreover, that the clause was not in the original report—that it was suggested by an amendment—that to this amendment, Mr. Powell proposed a sub-amendment, and that the whole matter was more or less discussed. It may hence be concluded that it could not have passed unnoticed, both the attention of an intelligent and observant people and the scrutiny of an active and penetrating press. It may be, as has been said by one of the delegates, that what is suited for one locality is unsuited for another. But as to the principle involved violating the constitution, that is out of the question, for such a violation could not have escaped the attention of the distinguished statesmen to whom my colleague (Mr. Benjamin) has referred, and never would have found its way in an instrument which they participated in making.

But to proceed with the question of expediency. How have the learned and eloquent gentlemen (Messrs. Soulé and Roselius) established that this principle is inexpedient? To my humble judgment, all that they have said upon this point, proves the very reverse of what they have assumed. In refuting their arguments, which I flatter myself I shall be enabled to do, I shall refute the arguments of those whose views they may be supposed particularly to represent—for the distinguished position they both occupy—the brilliant career which they have pursued—the enviable reputation they enjoy in this community, and the numerous marks of popular favor they have received from their fellow citizens, whose enthusiasm they cannot but appreciate, induce me to take them as the model, and I trust they will not be offended with me for so doing, if the class of citizens who would be affected if the principle under discussion were to be engrafted upon our constitution.

The zeal, says one of these learned gentlemen, which is displayed in favor of this principle of exclusion, deserves a severe rebuke, because it was an emanation of jealousy, prejudice, and a most inveterate antipathy towards foreigners. What does he mean by this? One of two things—either that this discreditable and unworthy sentiment actuates the members of this Convention who sustained the proposition, or that it is an inherent vice in the American character. If it be designed for those, who in the Convention have sustained the proposition, I ought perhaps, as one of that number, to return him my acknowledgments for his reprimand; but I doubt much whether he has any just cause of complaint, be it against whom it may. The adversaries whom he may have met at the bar in his professional career, are not enemies of his renown, and the esteem and homage that are paid to him ought surely to be sufficient to satisfy him, without charging his confreres of being jealous of his progress. If, on the other hand, his allusion is intended to be general, and to depict the defects which he has found in the American character, I would ask him, how is it that he has attained, among the American people, so high a notch in the pinnacle of fame, and that honors and distinctions have so lavishly been bestowed upon him? How is it that the other gentleman has also attained similar distinctions and similar rewards? Was it through the naturalized citizens alone that they were enabled to attain their present exalted positions, or was it through the generosity and liberality of native Americans? They must take the one or the other horn of the dilemma. If they pretend that it is to their fellow naturalized citizens that they are indebted for their successful career, and it be assumed by them that they have met with only jealousy and antipathy on the part of the native citizens, it is high time that we should think of protecting ourselves—that we should establish some place of refuge; some mound where, like the Indian, we may die in peace, without loosing the type of our nationality.

I do not imagine that they are very solicitous whether we retain that peculiar type or not. It is quite probable they would see us confounded and lost among the European herds that swarm upon our shores, with infinite satisfaction. But I trust we will take better care of ourselves, and without designing to depreciate other nations, or elevating the United States above them, I may say that we are deeply interested in retaining our national character, be it for weal or for woe. It is true that we have been told that the natives of this country are slow of apprehension—that we stand in need of the stream of intelligence that flows upon us from Europe, and should be duly sensible of their continued efforts to elevate us in the scale of civilization. I admit their greater proficiency in the arts and sciences, but I am not less attached to our simple and humble pretensions. I think we should preserve our national traits as they have been handed to us by our ancestors, who formed us into a nation and bequeathed to us our liberties, and we should be excused if we prefer them to those of other nations.

What do the gentlemen mean by inalienable rights, of which they have spoken so emphatically? Do they mean that the innumerable embroys of citizens that spawn from the sources of the Neva to the mouth of the Rhine, and from the mouth of the Rhine to the straits of Gibraltar, are possessed upon reaching our shores of vested rights; for if they are, and we are without the power of imposing restrictions and prohibitions upon them, it is clear that we might as well abandon our country at once. Such a pretension is offensive to nature! I must presume that those who set it up do not comprehend, do not appreciate our institutions; and when I see them cutting and hacking away at the fundamental basis of our social organization, to carry out their singular and dangerous doctrines—they who are capable and intelligent men, I cannot but fear the ignorant and the dissolute of the class whose pretensions they so warmly espouse, to the exclusion of the native citizens of the country! What are we to do with the masses, if their leaders are carried so far away by the counsels of presumption?

With such notions as these, I can well understand that they detect some lowering clouds upon the disc of our political horizon, threatening us with violence and strife. They predict to us a civil war, and exhort us not to precipitate it. Between whom is this civil war to be waged? Will it be between the naturalized citizens of one nation, and the naturalized citizens of another, or will it be waged by the combined force of the naturalized citizens against the native citizens? Is it come to this, that in our own country, in our own homestead, we cannot determine upon the qualifications of our governor, without exciting those whom we have received with hospitality—with whom we have generously shared our political privileges; but who now turn round and defy us to preserve one little mark of our nationality at the peril of a sanguinary struggle; of a civil war! Surely, it is time for us to reflect seriously upon our position. Our liberties are endangered. The first assault will be made upon our state government, and when that is reduced to a mere corporation of the republic, this hetrogeneous mass will still complain of unnecessary rigor. They will call for the repeal of that article in the federal constitution, excluding them from the office of President, and will never be satisfied until they have placed one of themselves in possession of the chief executive power of the Union. The descendants of those that achieved the independence of the United States, and established its liberties, will be swept away by the tornado, and not a vestige will be left to tell of their existence! Methinks I already see that destructive movement---that dead level without limit—that universal platform, upon which there will not exist declivity enough to carry off the putrid evaporations. Like the waters of the dead sea it will cover the surface of the United States, and I was in hopes at least, that there should be one elevated spot where we might seek refuge and safety, and leave the strange fish that were congregated below us to perish by themselves.

These gentlemen, said Mr. Grymes, arrange every thing to their own fancies. They resolve at will all difficulties, and overcome all obstacles. Foreign nations could not do better than to be regulated by their counsels, for they tell us that wars hereafter are impossible. No one desires more sincerely than I that their predictions may be fulfilled, but I must acknowledge that my confidence in the future is not equal to theirs. That which has been in all times may very well be again, and if it does happen, how are we to obviate the temptations that may be set before a governor of foreign birth? That, we are told, is a matter of no difficulty. The legislature may prescribe that the governor shall not command in person, and the danger, if there be any, in that way may be avoided. Is not the position taken to relieve us from the difficulty evidently ridiculous? The State elects a governor, and at the very moment when his services become the most essential, the legislature ordains that he be dressed up like the Grand Lama, and exhibited to the enemy in a glass case. Such arguments as these make me doubt the judgment of those who urge them. Every thing that savors of the ridiculous in matters of government, fills me with regret.

I was misunderstood by those who have commented on what I said, in reference to the partiality which a naturalized Governor would feel for the citizens of the country that gave him birth, and that hence I inferred that none but a native citizen should hold that office. I meant that a native citizen, who might be the governor, would act with impartiality towards all the various classes of naturalized citizens in the State, whether German, French or Irish, and that it would be easier for him to keep the equilibrium than a governor taken from any one of the different populations; and this opinion I found entirely sustained by what fell from one of the honorable delegates, (Mr. Roselius,) who acknowledged the existence of a natural affection for the land of our birth.

To my mind, the man that can suppress that feeling, is nothing more than a painted sepulchre; guilded without, but rotten within. I cannot believe in the devotion of such a citizen to the land of his adoption. It is because I fear the collision of races, and that I wish to see the type of our nationality preserved, that I would fain snatch the office of governor from the dead level that will swallow up our institutions and blot us out from the list of nations. Any one who wishes to retain our identity as a people will then be with me. It is time that we should put some limit—that we should prescribe some check to guard our institutions. Otherwise we shall be hunted from river to river—from mountain to mountain—from valley to valley, until we are lost in the mazes of oblivion. But we are told that the office of governor is unimportant. This strikes me as a reason not to want it, rather than to dispute about it, on the part of those who hold it to be so insignificant. I do not agree with this assertion. The power of the governor is felt every where. He is in immediate relations with all the other departments of the government, and his political action may be likened to a drop of water falling upon a rock. It insensibly but surely leaves its traces. Let the naturalized citizen be satisfied with sharing with us all offices of profit and honor in the State, with this solitary exception. It is said to be unimportant, why not gratify us, then, with it. It is all that we ask—the sovereigns of the soil!

In speaking of native Americans, and in defending their rights and pretensions, let it not be understood that I favor the counsels of the political party known as Native Americans. I hold in perfect disgust the source from whence that party originated. I am anxious that my position on this question should not be confounded with any of their movements. Neither must it be understood that I am hostile to naturalized citizens. I am not so. I am not for restricting their rights, but in reference to this particular office, for the permanency of the institutions of my country, I really think the rule ought to be established, that none but a natural born citizen should be governor of Louisiana.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

Tuesday, February 18, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment. The Rev. Mr. Twitchard opened the proceedings by prayer.

Mr. Taylor offered a resolution "that this Convention do now rescind one of the standing rules of the house, viz: That one which requires the Convention to meet at 10 o'clock." He (Mr. Taylor) thought that the rule was practically bad, although, no doubt, it was if acted up to on the part of the members, one of the best rules in the house. But theory and practice, we all know, are different things. The rule as it stands is of no benefit, but the very reverse; and as it has not been productive of any advantage, he desired to see it rescinded.

The President reminded the member that a standing rule of the house could not be set aside, unless the Convention agreed to dispense with the rules of the house, and consider his resolution. Mr. Taylor then moved that the rules of the house be temporarily suspended; which question being submitted to the Convention, was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. Sellers then offered a resolution, that those members who do not answer to their names when they are called at 10 o'clock, shall lose their per diem.

Mr. Taylor regrets much to differ with the gentleman from Carroll, but believing as he does, that the measure proposed by him, will not work well, and that the reasons which doubtless actuate him in suggesting this resolution are fallacious, he is bound to oppose it, and insist upon the revision of the rule. And why, sir? because there are a certain portion of the members, of which I humbly claim to be one, who are always at hand when the Convention is to meet as per adjournment; but there is another class, that have other business out of doors, that they will attend to, and do, before they come here, and will necessarily keep them away until 11 o'clock. Will those who desire to be punctual, come. What proportion do they bear to those who do not come? The answer is at hand. We never get a quorum until eleven o'clock; and the punctual man, who by the bye, may have as many other personal matters to attend to as those who are not punctual in their attendance, is made to lose one hour each day; while the man who is not punctual, keeps, by his absence, all our proceedings in waiting for him. He hopes and trusts, therefore, that the house, In order to place all upon an equal footing, will change the standing rule so that the hour of 11 o'clock may be named, and thereby enable the whole Convention to be present at that hour.

On motion of Mr. O'Bryan, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Scott of Madison, and on motion of Mr. Penn, Mr. Burton had also leave of absence granted, both for a few days only.

Mr. Labauve now called upon the President, to know whether leave of absence had been granted to him yesterday. The secretary replied, no: Mr. Labauve said, that being sick, and confined to his room, he had requested a friend, a member of this body, to ask such permission. The Convention promptly excused the gentleman, for his non-attendance on yesterday.

The Order of the Day was then taken up, and was the same as under discussion yesterday. A question was then raised, which was the subject before the Convention? The amendment offered by Mr. Beatty to strike out, or the proposition offered by Mr. Guion to lay Mr. Beatty's amendment indefinitely on the table.

Mr Marigny called upon the President to decide the matter.

The President replied that Mr. Guion's motion was clearly the one before the house.

Mr. Marigny then moved the previous question, which was, that the sense of the house should be taken on Mr. Beatty's resolution.

Mr. Guion could not but think, with all deferenee to the opinion of the member from New Orleans, that the motion made by him clearly had the preference, because a motion to lay on the table was, by the rules of the house, one of the motions that had precedence over any other subject presented to the consideration of the Convention, except a motion to adjourn. The President dicided that the motion made by Mr. Guion, was the first in order, and therefore the motion before the house.

The question was then put, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows, viz:

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Brumfield, Claiborne, Chinn, C. M. Conrad F. B. Conrad, Culbertson, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, B. Taylor, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder—28 yeas.

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Grymes, Humble, Hynson, Leonard, McCallop, McRea, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, W. B. Prescott, W. M. Prescott, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Roselius, W. B. Scott, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, M. Taylor, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff—40 nays; the motion to lay Mr. Beatty's resolution on the table was consequently lost.

Mr. Beatty then called up the motion which he had previously made to strike out, &c., but before any action was had on it, Mr. Chinn moved a call of the house, which resulted in shewing that there were 59 members present.

Mr. Wadsworth then moved, that in view of the great importance of the subject, and as it was no doubt the wish of the Convention generally that the vote on it should not be forced, in so thin a house, he desired to propose to them that the further consideration should be postponed until 1 o'clock, at which time the Convention would doubtless be full. The proposition of Mr. Wadsworth was unanimously assented to, and the further consideration of the subject was postponed till 1 o'clock.

Mr. CHINN then moved that the Convention take up the apportionment bill, as reported by the special committee to whom that subject had been referred, and which was made the special order of the day, for yesterday, (Monday.)

Mr. CONRAD thought it would be better to take up the balance of the sections on the executive department, and get through that question at once. He felt sure that with a little energy and concert of action, much more work than has been done, might be done in this Convention.

Mr. SAUNDERS, the chairman of the committee to whom was referred the apportionment bill, said that he had made the said report, in his capacity of chairman; that he had done so with the hope and expectation that every man in the Convention might be heard on this interesting subject. He thinks it would be better to postpone the consideration of it for the present, and with a view to bring that about, he moved that the report be taken up and again laid on the table, subject to the call of the house, which motion was adopted.

Mr. CONRAD then moved that the Convention do proceed with the articles on the executive department, which motion also prevailed.

The section next in order was

SEC. 4. The governor shall enter on the discharge of his duties on the second Monday of January, in the year , and shall continue in office until the Monday next preceding the day that his successor shall have been declared duly elected, or until his successor shall have taken the oath or affirmation prescribed by this Constitution.

Mr. PEETS moved to strike out the word "second" and insert the word "fourth" preceeding the words "Monday of January," to which no objection being made, the motion prevailed.

Mr. MAYO moved to strike out the word "preceding" and insert the word "succeeding."

The secretary explained that it was a misprint, as the words in the original report made by the committee was "succeeding."

Mr. MAYO then moved to strike out the word "or" in the 6th line, and insert the word "and," which motion was adopted.

Mr. CHINN then moved to fill the blank in the 3d line with 1846, after the word "year," which was likewise adopted.

Mr. CONRAD thought there was still an ambiguity in the section, and moved to strike out the 4th, 5th and 6th lines.

Mr. BENJAMIN thought it should be made clear and explicit, leaving nothing to doubt; and he was of opinion that that might be accomplished by striking out the two last lines, and made a motion to that effect.

Mr. ROMAN agreed with Mr. Benjamin and seconded the motion.

Mr. DOWNS was opposed to striking out, because if we did, such an emergency might happen that we should have no governor at all.

Mr. BENJAMIN explained that such emergency was provided for in the next section.

Mr. CONRAD could not reconcile the clauses in the two sections, they seemed to him palpably at variance, and therefore should press his motion to strike out, which motion was put and lost.

Mr. CONRAD then moved to strike out all after the word "until," in the 4th line, down to the word "constitution," in the —— line, but afterwards withdrew his motion.

Mr. RATLIFF moved to reconsider the vote by which the blank was filled with 1846, because we were yet unable to say when this constitution on which we are engaged would be ratified by the people.

Mr. DOWNS agreed with Mr. Ratliff; he suggested that a blank had been left in some previous part of the constitution on which they had acted, to be filled up hereafter, and hoped the motion to reconsider would prevail, so as to fill up all the blank when we are near the close of our labors.

Mr. CONRAD concurred with Mr. Downs.

The question was then put on Mr. RATLIFF's motion, which was decided in the affirmative. He then moved to strike out 1846 and leave it blank for the present, which motion also prevailed.

Mr. KENNER moved to fill the blank with the "4th Monday in January, next succeeding his election," because it might so happen that a governor under the old constitution might be retained in office, (unless some time be specified,) and he would have the power of nominating all the officers under the new constitution. This he thought wrong.

Mr. Beatty, although he agreed with Mr. Kenner in his views as to appointments of officers, thought it could be better provided for hereafter, when we have made further progress.

Mr. Kenner withdrew his motion.

Mr. Conrad then moved to strike out the words "in the year," and insert the words "next succeeding his election," which motion prevailed.

Mr. Lewis then moved the adoption of the section as amended, which motion likewise prevailed, and the section as adopted read thus:

Sect. 4. The governor shall enter on the discharge of his duties on the fourth Monday of the January next ensuing his election, and shall continue in office until the Monday next succeeding the day that his successor shall have been declared duly elected, and his successor shall have taken the oath or affirmation prescribed by this Constitution.

The next section was read.

Sect. 5. No member of Congress, nor officer of the general government, nor minister of the gospel, or of any religious society whatever, shall be eligible to the offices of governor or lieutenant governor.

Mr. Downs thought it would be better to strike out the word "eligible" and insert the word "hold."

Mr. Grymes does not take the same view of the matter as the gentleman from Ouachita. If any change should be made, in his opinion the phraseology should be made still stronger than it was. His feelings of propriety have frequently been shocked at witnessing the rapacity of men for office. Why, he himself has seen a judge descend from the supreme bench and electioneer for the office of senator to Congress, in the representative chamber itself. He himself was asked by that individual for his vote, and his reply was, "yes, I will vote for you if you will first resign the office you now hold, but not without." He does not think it right when any man is desirous of obtaining any office, that he should, at the same time while he is aspiring to another, be the holder of another office at the same moment. He thinks it a privilege which no man in a republican government ought to enjoy. He desires to see purity of purpose more rigidly adhered to than could be under such a system as we have had.

Mr. Marigny does not agree with Mr. Grymes in the opinions he has advanced. He thinks they are not tenable. He admits that a particular case might occur when a judge of the supreme court would take advantage of his influence, but still he is not of opinion that for any such isolated case as has been referred to, we should establish any rule, the effect of which would be a flagrant violation of others' rights. He thinks that the talents and character of a man should be passports to office, and he does not think it right if, for instance, the people, or a respectable portion of them, were to select as their choice, one of their district judges for their candidate for either governor, or lieutenant governor, to deprive them of that right. It would also be very hard to deprive that man of an office (because it might be necessary in a pecuniary point of view to him for the support of his family,) which he held, until it was ascertained that he had not been placed in a worse position by accepting, how he would be placed in by accepting any nomination however flattering it might be to his feelings as a man; why if such a man were to resign one office, and be defeated before the whole people for such an one as he aspired to, the consequences would probably be ruinous to the interests of his family. He thinks further, that the measure proposed is a restriction on the rights of the people and as such he is opposes to it.

Mr. Chinn would go farther than even Mr. Grymes, and he moved to amend the section so that after the words "General Government," the words "or of this State" should be inserted; and further he moved to strike out the word "eligible," and insert "elected."

Mr. Downs opposed the proposition of Mr. Chinn, because he regarded it as an unjust restriction. It was not his intention to prolong or bring about a debate on this subject when he proposed to change the word "eligible" to "hold." His intention was to provide for any such possibility as that a man could hold two offices at one time—but certainly not to take away the right of eligibility from any man; for that right was to his mind as sacred as the right of suffrage itself. The more I reflect on it, (said Mr. Downs,) the more I become convinced that this question strikes at the face of the right of suffrage.

Why, sir, we are told that those who hold an office, no matter what, and no matter how capable or competent he may be, must resign before he can have any pretensions to any other place. Yes! every man of them. He (Mr. Downs) desires to argue on the principle advanced, as a general principle. He thinks it is unreasonable and unjust; for in that case, to hold any office under the general or state government, would be a disqualification: and he is opposed to restrictions on the rights of the people, unless called for by the sternest necessity. He thinks further that it is to the interest of, and moreover their duty, to get the services of the best and purest men that can be found for the office of governor, for they are called upon to exercise very responsible duties, even in the appointing power. Now, (said Mr. Downs,) if we carry out the doctrine of Mr. Grymes, without attempting in any way to dispute the facts advanced by him in proof of the unjust influence which was exercised by one certain individual in procuring the office of United States Senator, I contend that if we establish any rule, (if it be in any wise feasible to do so,) to guard against similar abuses of the popular will, the effect will be to stop the wheels of government. For his part, he was opposed to saying to any man, you cannot have any other office than the one you now hold, unless you first resign, (even before you put up any pretensions,) the one you now hold; according to such a doctrine, why no man could be a candidate for re-election who was at the time during which the canvass was going on serving the State to the best and utmost of his ability, in the senate or house of representatives at Washington.

The rule might apply, if Mr. Chinn's motion prevailed, even to the lawyers of the State, for their commissions make them officers of the State also; and then it might happen that he, (Mr. Grymes,) would be debarred from the privilege of becoming governor, certainly while holding the office he does, as a member of this convention, his name could not be used. Perhaps if the lawyers' influence could prevail, Mr. Grymes would stand the best chance of success, for in such a case, anxious to get him out of the way of themselves, the lesser lights, they might be willing, and doubtless would strain every nerve to get him elected. Well, even that power would operate against his election to that office, if persisted in.

For his, (Mr. Downs') part, he discards the idea put forth, even by implication, that office is created for the incumbent. He thinks it is created for the people, and the people alone. He feels that it is due to them to make their own free selection, and not in any manner restrict them in their choice. This is a new restriction, and as such he opposes it. It amounts to a multiplication of disabilities. Suppose one had such a case as this, how would it work?

A man who has been honored with numerous offices in the gift of the people, may be their representative in congress, or in the senate, at the moment when he is the choice of the people for the office of governor. This section would disqualify him entirely from accepting the nomination, unless he resigned his office, and were he to do that, other important interests of the people would be left unattended to, and perhaps totally neglected,

He is opposed to any measure which has the inevitable tendency which such a principle must have, to restrict not alone the rights of an individual, but also the rights of the people at large.

Mr. Grymes was surprised at the views taken by the gentleman from Ouachita on this question, for there cannot be any restriction where the party said to be restricted has an alternative. He does not conceive by the proposed measure either the rights of individuals or communities will be narrowed or restricted.

He, (Mr. Grymes,) wants the principle engrafted in our constitution, for nothing will tend so much to sap the foundation of our country's liberty, as the alarming increase of the trading politicians we are surrounded with, and beset by. He looks upon them as a species of cormorants—whose capacious maw is never filled—and whose machinations and manœuvrings are constantly undermining the social fabric, which the toil, labor and endurance of our ancestors has raised for us; and to his (Mr Gryme's) mind, the only way to prevent their increase, is to destroy the power of that class of persons—to take away from them the ability to engage in the nefarious traffic. To bring about such a state of things, as will result in the people forcing a man into office, instead of his being able to force himself in, by acts of chicanery, trickery, bribery, or otherwise.

Is it not apparent to all that the intriguing politician and placeman is never satisfied? that he is always knocking at the portal of those in power? and that he aims incessantly in all the primary meetings of the party in power, to get the control of the public offices? When they get one, they are never satisfied until they monopolize the whole; for themselves, family or friends—then progressing from one to the other, in proportion to its lucrativeness, until they reach the ladder's topmost round. All the tumults and riots which we have at our elections, spring from the unholy and unhallowed means resorted to by aspiring politicians and office seekers, to stifle the popular will.

Mr. Grymes thinks it is the duty of this Convention so to make our organic laws, as will throw all possible obstacles in the way of such traders in politics—and thereby check the consequences which such a state of things as he has described as is the natural result of their present course.

Mr. Downs will no doubt tell you, sir, that the idea I now advance, is that the people are not competent to judge of the qualifications of their State officers; but if he does, Mr. Grymes will join issue with him, and tell him, that there are many things in theory, which are very pretty, which do not work well in practice. He would have all to feel as he does. He cares nothing for an office seeker, he dislikes the whole race of them. He wants the political power of the State preserved in the hands of the people, and not in the hands of a parcel of political wire workers. He (Mr. G.) wants to leave the people to judge and select for themselves. He knows that then they would give no preference to a man because he was in an office; and he further knows that they would not be likely to commit so gross an act, as that of political turpitude.

Mr. Conrad had intended to vote for the amendment of Mr. Downs, but from the remarks offered by Mr. Grymes, he is disposed to leave the section as it is. The substitute of his friend from Baton Rouge, goes further than he is willing to go. With Mr. Grymes, he thinks there is a peculiar impropriety in a judge soliciting another office, while he retains his seat upon the bench; at the same time Mr. Chinn's amendment prohibits every one who may hold an office of honor or profit in the State, from offering his name for the office of governor or lieutenant governor. He thinks there are many State officers why ought not to be disqualified, such for instance as tax collectors, notaries, comptrollers or even members of the legislature, from offering for such place. He thinks the provision made by the committee, inserting the words members of congress, a wise one; for he has seen too much log-rolling going on at Washington City. The demagogueism there is so great, that members of congress unfortunately use their official position more with a view to make themselves popular at home, looking evidently back to that home to be rewarded therefor, by some higher office in the State, than in attending to the real and substantial duties which the interests of his whole constituents demand at his hands. For these reasons, he agrees with the member from New Orleans, and will go as far any one, in promoting plain, practical men, and in sustaining their rights; but he does not agree with Mr. Chinn, for the reasons he has stated; therefore he moved to to lay his (Mr. C.'s) substitute on the table.

Mr. Preston thought, both with Mr. Conrad and Mr. Downs, that Mr. Chinn's substitute ought to be maintained. He has but very few remarks to offer on this question, and will not detain the Convention long. His first objection to it, is on the score of its restrictive property. He wanted as little restriction on the popular will as possible. A distinguished gentleman had observed here a few days since, that the business of this Convention was to impose restrictions upon the people, in the formation of a new constitution. He does not agree with that honorable gentleman. His views as to the calling of this Convention, are, that the old Constitution had in it too many restrictive qualities; and he (Mr. P.) is convinced that the object of the people in calling this Convention, was to ameliorate and take off the restrictive parts of the present constitution, and so to make our organic laws that the whole people might have the fullest chance to express their will.

The committee of the legislative department has reported a section to this Convention which he opposed most strenuously, but to his (Mr. Preston's,) it was but a mole hill compared to a mountain, when compared to the principles sought to be forced upon the people under the section now before us. He regards this new proposal, which has been so suddenly sprung upon us, as one detrimental alike to pure as to equitable principle. It is clearly the spirit of the age to extend to the people the largest liberty consistent with public security, and he (Mr. Preston) challenges any gentleman on this floor, to point out one single State that has adopted in their constitution any clause, that one of her citizens who may hold a minor office, should be thereby debarred from the privilege of aspiring to a higher, even the highest office, while performing the duties of such minor office.

Experience has shown us very positively that the most practically experienced men to fill offices are those who have risen gradually from inferior offices to those of a higher grade. He regards all office as a school for a man to learn the art of government. Why, sir, if this section prevail, you will virtually say, that if the people should select a man for a high station on whom they had before conferred an inferior office, that your present restriction is intended to keep all such candidates out of the field. Is it right for you to do this? There are many men whom he (Mr. Preston) has known, who have risen from the force of hard and industrious labor, to be among the first men of our country. What was their object in devoting themselves to their laborious studies, even to midnight? yes! he has known many who had worked steadily by the midnight lamp, to acquire some science of government; others, other sciences, and are you, sir, going, as you surely will if this resolution pass, to say to those men, your labor is in vain; for if you succeed in getting a minor office in Louisiana, you can never expect to reach a higher one unless you first give up the small office you hold? The argument which is used amounts positively to that. Mr. Grymes says so distinctly and positively. But what do all men struggle and labor for, unless it be to raise their name for knowledge and character among their fellow men? to rise higher in the world? He (Mr. Preston) could have pointed out a more equitable mode of reaching this question, than some of the gentlemen have perhaps ever thought of. His idea would be, if you don't wish capable men to fill your offices, curtail the salaries, reduce them down so low that no one will think them worth their attention, and then you will remove the grand incentive so much dreaded by Mr. Grymes, of offices only being sought and chicancered for, for what they are worth. For his part, however, he must say, that he has never yet known a man who held an office to get rich from the emoluments of his office.

The hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, at which hour it was agreed to take up the discussion on the motion made by Mr. Beatty to strike out, &c., the President reminded Mr. Preston of it, and remarked that he could not proceed without the leave of the house. The Convention seemed unanimously to desire that Mr. Preston should proceed, but, he remarked, that as he was not well, and as this question had been suddenly broached to the house, he should prefer having some moments to reflect on all its important bearings before proceeding with his remarks; and therefore gave way to the regular business of the Convention.

The motion before the Convention was Mr. Beatty's, to strike out the word "native," &c. Before the vote was taken, several gentlemen desired to express the reasons which would govern them on the vote they were about to give.

Mr. Roman remarked that he was placed in a singular position in regard to this matter; while he was a member of the committee who made the report of which the section we are now about to act upon was one, he objected in committee to the insertion of the word "native," because he did not then think it was necessary; but subsequent events have shown him clearly that such a word is necessary in the section. What has been done since? why we have opened the door wider in our new constitution; we have established the principle of universal suffrage, and we have further agreed that a man receiving a plurality of votes, may become governor of Louisiana. For these reasons, and with the certainty that he felt that it was absolutely necessary to take some measures to prevent the great frauds which had been recently perpetrated, he thought now that the insertion of the word "native," was a wise provision in the section, and therefore he should vote against striking out.

Mr. VOORHIES is of opinion that we have the power to retain the word "native" —but he thinks it is inexpedient and uncalled for. Therefore he shall vote to strike it out.

Mr. CULBERTSON, desired in a few words to give his reasons for the vote he should give on this question. He has been anxiously and attentively listening to the arguments of the able gentlemen who have addressed this Convention on this interesting subject. The result of his reflections is this—that we have more to fear from the northern abolitionists than we had from our own naturalized citizens. If the Convention would entertain such a proposition as he was about to send to the secretary's desk to be read, he would endeavor to sustain it by reason and by argument. If they would not, he should vote to strike out, but offered it as an amendment. The amendment offered, was in these words: "That no person shall be eligible to the office of governor of the State of Louisiana, unless he be a native born citizen of Louisiana, or has acquired a residence in the State as a citizen of the United States, before this constitution goes into effect."

This amendment of Mr. Culbertson was then put and lost.

Mr. CONRAD then rose, and said that as it had become fashionable for the delegates of this Convention to assign their reasons for the different votes they gave on this floor, he was fearful his constituents might not think him a fashionable man. And in imitating the example of the distinguished gentlemen who have preceded him, he feels himself called upon to give two reasons for his vote on this question. The 1st is, that the Convention has the power to insert the word "native," under the constitution of the United States. And 2d, that in our situation it is expedient to do so.

Mr. GARCIA then rose for the purpose of expressing his views on the vote he was about to give. He regarded the insertion of the word "native" unnecessary, for three reasons. 1st, because it was unjust. 2d, because it was unnecessary. 3d because, he believed we had not the power to do it, under the constitution of the United States.

The question was then put on striking out, on motion of Mr. DOWNS, the word "native" first, and resulted as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Cade, Cenas, Culbertson, Carriere, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Humble, Hynson, Labauve, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, W. B. Prescott, W. M. Prescott, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Roselius, W. B. Scott, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, M. Taylor, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff—41 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Brumfield, Chinn, Claiborne, C. M. Conrad, F. B. Conrad, Garrett, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, R. Taylor, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder—27 nays.

So the word "native" was stricken out from the section.

Mr. DUNN then proposed to substitute for the balance of the section, the words, "No one shall be eligible either to the office of governor or lieutenant governor, unless he shall have attained the age of 35 years, and has been a citizen of the United States for the period of sixteen years, and has been a resident citizen of Louisiana ten years preceding his election."

Mr. BEATTY moved as an amendment to the motion, to strike out all the words beginning at the 6th line, with the word "nor," to the word "and," inclusive in the line.

Mr. BRENT offered a substitute for the amendment to the amendment; it was in these words: "No person shall be eligible to the office of governor or lieutenant governor, who is not a qualified elector of this State."

Mr. PRESTON suggested that the substitute had better be put in an affirmative form so as to make it read, "Every qualified elector shall be eligible to the office of governor or lieutenant governor."

Mr. DUNN thought that justice had not been done him in this matter, and rose to a point of order. He insisted that the substitute for the latter clause in the section under debate offered by him, was certainly the first in order.

Mr. Beatty is also of opinion that either Mr. Dunn's proposition or his own must be in order.

Mr. Labauve, temporarily in the chair, decided that Mr. Dunn's motion was not the first in order, but gave the preference to the substitute of Mr. Brent, as amended by Mr. Preston.

Mr. Dunn then appealed from the decision of the chair.

Mr. Claiborne thinks that we are going wrong. The usual mode of proceeding is to take up section by section, or clause by clause.

Mr. Grymes called Mr. Claiborne to order. He said that when any motion was made on a point of order, it was not debateable.

The question was then taken—shall the decision of the chair be sustained? which was decided in the negative; 38 to 27.

Mr. Beatty then moved to strike out the property qualification in the section before the house, which was decided as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Briant, Cade, Carriere, Cenas, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge. Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Taylor, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff, and Winder; 38 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Brumfield, Briant, Chinn, Claiborne, F. B. Conrad, C. M. Conrad, Cublertson, Derbes, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Taylor, and Winchester voted in the negative; 28 nays; so the motion to strike out prevailed.

Mr. Winder then offered to amend the section, by striking out all after the words "35 years," and inserting as a substitute, "and been a citizen of this State 15 years."

Mr. Brent then moved to strike out the words '35 years,' and insert '21 years.'

Mr. Conrad would also like to see the words "and a citizen of the United States," inserted in the section before us, after the words "a citizen of this State."

Mr. Taylor is of opinion that these words are not necessary, as no individual could be a citizen of Louisiana, unless he were a citizen of the United States, and the amendment offered by Mr. Winder specifies that he shall have been five years a citizen of Louisiana.

Mr. Conrad had in his mind when he made the proposal, the fact that in several other States, among them the State of Illinois, there was no requirement for an elector to be a citizen of the United States, nor was it required as a pro-requisite in any of the officers of the State. This, he thought ought to be remedied by us, and as he was not aware that there was any direct provision for it as yet in our constitution, he thought it proper to press his amendment.

Mr. Winder then consented to adopt the amendment offered by Mr. Conrad.

Mr. Dunn thought the question might be divided.

Mr. Read offered a substitute for the whole matter under debate, which was to strike out all that part of the clause beginning at the words "35 years," and to insert "who shall not be 21 years of age, and two years a citizen of the United States, and of this State, next preceding his election."

Mr. Dunn moved to lay the substitute indefinitely on the table.

Mr. Downs would second that motion. Although he is in favor of all necessary reform, he thinks the motion made by Mr. Read is going too far, and for that reason he opposed it.

The question was then taken, the yeas and nays being called for, and resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, C. M. Conrad, F. B. Conrad, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Hynson, Kenner, King, Labauve, Leonard, Lewis, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Penn, W. B. Prescott, W. M. Prescott, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder—52 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Humble, McCallop, O'Bryan, Porter, Preston, Read, W. B. Scott, Waddill and Wederstrandt—12 nays.

So the substitute was laid on the table indefinitely.

Mr. Brent then moved a division of the question, so that the question might be taken on striking out ten years, first.

The question was then put, and decided by yeas any nays, as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquié, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Carriere, Cénas, Chinn, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Garcia, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Preston, Pugh, Read, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Waddill, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder—40 yeas; and

Messrs. Cade, Claiborne, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, W. B. Scott, Sellers, Soulé, Stephens, Trist, Voorhies and Wederstrandt— 24 nays.

The words "ten years" were therefore stricken out.

Mr. O'Bryan wanted the blank filled with five years, but on being told his motion was out of order, he said he desired to reconsider his vote, and moved a reconsideration of the vote.

Mr. Taylor called Mr. O'Bryan to order, and

The President decided that the motion of Mr. O'Bryan was out of order, and that Mr. Winder's amendment came up next in order.

Mr. Downs thinks when a section has been divided, that the clauses become seperate questions, and the sense of the House may be taken on them as such, seperately. He then read the 101st rule from Jefferson's manual in support of his views of the matter, which fully sustained the position he had taken.

Mr. Conrad does not see that the rule heretofore adopted by the President of the Convention conflicts with the Manual; but

The President, from the authority advanced by Mr. Downs, saw clearly that his previous impression had been erroneous, and he was now convinced that any question may be amended when it is divided.

When that decision was made,

Mr. King moved to fill the blank with twenty-one years.

Mr. Preston hoped that the amendment would not prevail. The old constitution only requires a residence of six years—that had surely worked well enough. It is true for his part, that if two men of equal natural capacity were to be candidates, the one old, the other young, that he should and would always give the preference to the old man. But, sir, the old constitution has answered in this particular as well as could be desired. Why then change it? Why restrict the people from choosing whom they see fit? For his part, he said, he should always prefer the gray headed man, (perhaps from a natural sympathy on that account,) to the young man, even in time of war, even although we might have in that young candidate another Bonaparte, who astonished the world at the age of twenty-five.

The question before the Convention is, are we to restrain the people from choosing whom they please? Can any good come of it? Experience has shown that there is no necessity for increasing the term of residence from that established in 1812. His (Mr. P's) desire is to maintain an established principle, unless it can be shown to be injurious to the interests of the people, and that naturally leads him to ask the question, who is the government? The servants of the electors. Who the electors? Surely their masters.

He does not, therefore, wish to see the people prevented by any such restrictions from choosing whom they please. In private transactions we have the right of choosing agents under twenty-one years of age, and he is clearly of opinion that we should not distort the old constitution on the subject now under discussion. The resident population will always have the control of that matter, and it is not at all likely that a new comer or a youth will be selected to fill the post of governor.

He hopes the motion to fill the blank with twenty-one years will not prevail, but, that the term chosen will bethat in the constitution of 1812; 6 years.

Mr. Benjamin then moved to adjourn till 11 o'clock to-morrow, which motion prevailed.

Wednesday, February 19, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment; and at the request of the President, the Hon. Mr. Stevens officiated as chaplain.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the last clause of section 3d of the report of the majority of the committee on the executive department, which is as follows:

"No person shall be eligible to the office of governor who shall not have attained the age of thirty-five years, and have been ten years next preceding his election a resident within the State."

Mr. King withdrew the amendment offered by him yesterday to this section.

Mr. O'Bryan moved to fill the blank in the clause by five years. The question was taken on the previous motion of Mr. Winder to fill the blank with fifteen years, and the yeas and nays were called for.

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Cenas, F. B. Conrad, Culbertson, Derbes, Garcia, Garrett, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, W. B. Prescott, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Taylor, Wadsworth, Wikoff, Winchester, and Winder—29 ayes; and Messrs. Brent, Cade, Carriere, Claiborne, Downs, Dunn, Humble, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, W. M. Prescott, Preston, Read, W. B. Scott, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, M. Taylor, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, and Wederstrandt—27 nays.

Mr. Winder then moved to add to the requisition, "a citizen of the United States, and of the State;" and called for the yeas and nays on that motion: and the result was as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Cade, Cenas, Claiborne, Chinn, F. B. Conrad, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Guion, Garrett, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, W. B. Prescott, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, M. Taylor, R. Taylor, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Wikoff, Winchester, and Winder—35 yeas; and

Messrs. Brent, Carriere, Downs, Garcia, Humble, Leonard, McCallop McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, W. M. Prescott, Preston, Read, W. B. Scott, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Trist, Waddill, and Wederstrandt—23 nays.

Mr. Lewis therefore moved to add after the word "citizen," the words "free white male," which amendment was sustained without a division.

Mr. Dunn moved that the section offered by him yesterday, be adopted as a substitute for the foregoing section as amended.

Mr. Wadsworth moved to lay Mr. Dunn's motion on the table, which prevailed—yeas 31, nays 28.

Mr. Mayo then proposed a substitute to the following effect: "that no one should be eligible to the office of governer who was not a free white male citizen of the United States, who hath not attained the age of thirty years, and hath been a resident within the State ten years next preceding his election."

Mr. Benjamin objected to this section being taken under consideration. It was not in order, it being a renewal in effect of the proposition that had been rejected.

Mr. Kenner called for the previous question, which was ordered—yeas 28, nays 30.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the section—yeas 33, nays 25.

Mr. Mayo then gave notice that he would move for a reconsideration of the vote on Tuesday next.

The Convention then took up the following section:

Sec. 5. No member of Congress, or person holding any office under the United States, or minister of any religious society, shall be eligible to the office of governor, or lieutenant governor.

Together with the substitute offered for the same by Mr. Chinn.

Mr. Preston said he felt called upon to raise his voice against the substitute offered by the delegate from West Baton Rouge. Experience has demonstrated that this exclusion is entirely unnecessary. No State in the Union has as yet found such a principle proper or expedient, and why adopt it here? It would seem from the arguments of those who sustain this principle, that the mere investure of a public office should operate as an exclusion to all other public offices. And yet what other means have the people of judging of the capacities, the zeal, the virtue of a citizen, unless it be by the services that he may render them in the various stations of public life? I contend that the gradations of public employments are a school, and that a man who has passed through that school, necessarily offers to the people greater facilities of judging of his fitness and of his qualifications; and that so far from its being considered a matter of exclusion because he holds one office, it should be a recommendation to another, provided he has shown himself competent to the first. The people will see what are actually his merits; they will see him pass through a severe ordeal, and if he is capable, they will raise him to the highest offices. It is a mistake to suppose that the people do not possess discernment. That they cannot judge of the qualifications of a candidate when they have the opportunities of examining into his pretensions. They will not take an incompetent man, if they can get a competent one to represent them, or administer their government, and if a man of ordinary understanding, by some accident gets into a subordinate station, he is seldom if ever preferred by them to a higher or more responsible one. When his incompetency is once discovered, his political aspirations may be considered as at an end.

The extent to which a similar article in the old constitution was interpreted went, that they should not be competent to hold one office when elected to another, but it was never understood that they should not hold one office and be a candidate for another. What detriment has resulted from the common practice throughout the State, which has been sanctioned by usage? No injury has been the result; then wherefore establish this exclusion? Does the confidence reposed in a citizen which induces his fellow citizens to send him to the house of representatives of the United States, or to the senate of the United States, disqualify him from the office of governor, or any other station? Or that confidence—that knowledge of his peculiar fitness which has elevated him to a station on the bench, disqualify him for being governor of the State, or a member of congress? I am of a contrary opinion. I think that the public are gainers by the experience of these officers, and that this experience is acquired by being indiscriminately employed in the various branches of the public service. We have very important interests at Washington to represent, and I may say there is not a State in the Union so deeply interested in the legislation of that body as Louisiana. The city of New Orleans has vast commercial relations; she is the great city of the west and south west, and is directly involved in all the treaties made with foreign nations, and in the peculiar foreign policy of the government. It is of the very highest importance that the State should send capable and efficient representatives to congress. These representatives meet with the most distinguished men from the other States of the Union—with governors, judges, and senators, that have been delegated, like themselves, to congress. They compare notes, they glean information of the particular local position of every individual State, of its advancement, of its progress; how its peculiar system of polity works, and yet with all this general information you place a bar upon them in the constitution, and assume that they shall not be eligible to the office of governor. I can see no good reason for this. They have escaped from the turmoils of petty local excitements and local politics; they have their minds enlarged by legislating for the general interests of the whole country, and yet, if their fellow citizens choose to elevate them to the post of governor, they are denied that right by an arbitrary edict in your constitution. They are told they cannot do it, and to be a member of congress is to be excluded from all political preferment in the State. This is certainly an unjust exclusion—an exclusion repugnant to every principle of expediency or of good policy, and I feel certain that the gentleman who offers it would have so considered it when he was himself a member of congress.

No one is less disposed to believe than I, that military talents are the only talents for the office of chief magistrate. But I cannot perceive why a citizen of the State in the military service of the United States, should be excluded from holding civil offices in this State. I contend that it appertains alone to the people to determine whether any particular individual suits them for a particular office, and to deny to them the rights of free and unrestricted choice, is to impose odious restraints upon them, and to make invidious exclusions affecting particular persons. No principle is more thoroughly democratic, than rotation in office, and how is that principle to be carried out, if a man is to be retained as a fixture in one office, that is, if he does his duty he may expect to be retained, but as long as he is retained he must not aspire to any other office. As a general rule, it may be assured, that a man who fills one office well is capable of filling another well, and it is not an unsafe principle to act upon. Frequent elections, frequent recurrence to original principles, are the safeguards of republican governments. Why distrust the people; the people are far more competent than we are to judge who is best qualified to serve them. Let us not restrict their choice. Let us leave them unrestrained, to select where they please, and when they please, to carry on their government.

Suppose the people of Louisiana were disposed to elevate to the chief magistracy of the State some citizen who had rendered them essential service, in a military station, under the federal government—a citizen who had averted some eminent danger, would you deny to them the privilege of doing so? They would feel a lasting sorrow at not having the opportunity of testifying their gratitude, and in the disposition of their honors, to reward him adequately accordingly to his deserts. What I object to is, that this rule debars the people of their undoubted privileges of selecting when they will. It disfranchises a large number of worthy citizens, and as I can see for no earthly reason. Why should you pronounce the attorney or the district attorney of the United States, incapable of aspiring to any office in the State unless he returns first to the walks of private life? I agree with the democratic principle of rotation in office, but I understand it to mean not that a man should necessarily be expelled from office with no other motive than to give place to another. I do not understand that principle thus. I understand it that the people should have frequent opportunities of making changes, if they choose. I understand it as facilitating the means of holding their agents to a strict and immediate responsibiltiy.

One argument that has been assumed by the advocates of the proposition of the gentleman from West Baton Rouge (Mr. Chinn) is, that the judicial ermine ought to be kept pure and unsullied; that judges will descend from the purity and dignity of their stations, and become candidates for office, if this provision be not adopted; and that the consequences will be deleterious in the extreme, both as regards the standing of the judge and the proper discharge of his duties. I think there is no weight in the argument. If a judge be too pure and unsullied to aspire to any station, he is too pure for this world, and ought to be translated to another. But a more serious objection is urged. It is said that he will electioneer—that he will meddle in elections. What is meant by electioneering, for there are different meanings attached to that word? Is it pretended that because a man, yielding to the solicitations of his fellow citizens, consents to become a candidate for a particular ststion, and deems it to be his duty to express freely his opinions and sentiments in a public manner—to converse with his fellow citizens—that there is any thing wrong in that? And in a large district if it be not convenient to meet them all in one place, he meets them at several—is there any thing in that objectionable? Any thing improper in its being done by a judge or other functionary, more than any other man? Is there any violation of principle? I can see none. None, if the chief justice of the supreme court were to address his fellow citizens at different points of the State, and in a calm and dignified manner enunciate the principles that would govern him, were the partialities of some of his fellow citizens that had nominated him for the office of governor, confirmed by the general choice of all the people. I cannot perceive how this could result in the pollution of our elections! It is true that things do occasionally occur at our elections, that are disgusting. But these are the abuses of a popular system of government. They do not, however, outweigh the manifold benefits and blessings of that system—one advantage of which, is the very facility afforded to the people of scrutinizing the pretensions of those that would serve them; of examining into their qualifications. It is intelligence speaking to intelligence. It puts the candidate to the ordeal of public opinion—he is scanned with scrutinizing eyes—to make use of a common expression, the people have the opportunity of twigging him, to see of what stuff he is made. Where is the harm in this? If this is what is considered electioneering, I can see no harm in it. But if by electioneering he meant the abuses the excrescences, the aberrations from correct principles, I admit these are lamentable, still they are no argument against the general principle. When men of high intelligence become candidates for office, they instruct and enlighten the people of the State. They instruct those of less experience as to the capabilities of the State; the true course of State policy. Nothing is calculated more to enlighten the electors. They hear aspiring men discuss grave and important topics of public concernment, and are always ready and anxious to be present at these debates. When important political questions are pending, how often have we seen the public meetings thronged, and the anxious crowd remaining until 11 o'clock at night to hear the words of experience of some old, grave man, who has been called upon to shed the light of his intelligence upon those questions. The people are ever ready to glean all the information they can, in order to act understandingly. The consequence of discussion is that the people obtain information, and the humblest citizen who retires to his simple cottage, carries with him and treasures up some of the important facts that may have been elicited in that discussion. It is this interchange of thought and facility of hearing every public question discussed, that disseminated so much general information among the people, and gives them a decided advantage over the people of other countries. What makes the servility of the Russian serf; the fanaticism of the Spanish peasantry? It is the distance at which they are kept from the power that governs them. They are not instructed by their public men, nor enlightened as to measures of public policy. They are not the sources of honors and rewards, as the people of this happy country. No public man feels himself here too proud or too pure to address his fellow citizens, and suggest to them his views. The result is, that the good of the country is promoted.

I will repeat again, that the people are capable and have the virtue to select their public servants for themselves, without any restraint or restriction, and the strongest proof of that intelligence and virtue is, that a viscious man always appeals to virtue and to the rectitude of his purposes. This observation holds good throughout the length and breadth of the land, and shows the regard which is felt for virtue and intelligence among the masses. I care not where a candidate may address the people, be it in the midst of a tavern, where a mob may be collected together, this appeal is invariably heard, which shows that he well understands that that is the chord he must touch, if he expects success. This proves that although there are excesses, there is no lack of virtue or intelligence in the people themselves. An ignorant man who aspires to serve the people, is invariably destined, if the masses only have the opportunity, to have the shallowness of his capacities detected. The humblest among them will say, "well, that man has no more sense than I; how can he pretend to such an office?" The people pride themselves upon the talents of their public officers. They have great virtue. I speak generally. Out of twenty indiscriminately taken, the twentieth may be a base man; but he is the exception.

There is no disgrace, to my humble conception, to the ermine of judicial dignity, in a judge addressing the people, when the partialities of his fellow citizens induce him to become a candidate for any public station. He may address them by public speech or in writing. The principle of our government is, that every man should have the freedom of speech, and be eligible to serve his country, whether he be a private citizen or the incumbent of any particular office. This glorious privilege cannot appropriately be infringed in any instance, and the judge of the supreme court who may be induced to become a candidate, is just as much exposed to be conned and to be scrutinized as any other citizen that may offer.

I have no opinion in that policy that would house a man up, and claims for him merits that the world have never been able to discover. Talents he may have, but if they are not exerted, of what use are they? If, like the unfaithful steward in holy writ, he hide away that which is given him to be increased and to be multiplied, of what use is the gift?

I come now to speak of that clause in the section, which excludes ministers of the gospel. I shall say but little upon that point, as I have understood that it is the intention of the delegate from Opelousas, (Mr. Lewis) when the subject properly comes up in another and more appropriate portion of the constitution, to express his views upon it; and I feel he is more competent to the task than I am. But, as I vote against this principle in its partial application here, I will state briefly my reasons for doing so. I consider that the objections that may originally have existed, and which may have justified that exclusion, have had no practical effect for the last fifty years. I consider that it is contrary to principle. That it is an absurd restriction. The people are, I repeat, competent to vote for whom they please, and every voter should be eligible for every civil station—be he ecclesiastical or layman. A minister of the church is allowed to vote, and yet he is debarred the privilege of being voted for. If there be really danger to the community by investing him with the ordinary rights of citizenship, say so at once and deprive him of all those rights. The civilized christian world have set apart one day in the seven, as a day of repose—the sabbath---when the business of religion is to be exclusively pursued. I belong to no particular sect of religion; yet I think the setting apart of a particular day an appropriate moral institution; and I can see nothing in the functions of a minister of the gospel,---inculcating the holy precepts of religion, that should debar his congregation---his friends and neighbors of electing him to any station, or he from accepting it. There is nothing in these functions to make him a bad or dangerous man; on the contrary, there is the very reverse; and at any rate, the people may well be trusted with the faculty of exercising a sound discretion on the premises. Why under heaven should there be such an exclusion? In the superanuated constitution, as some reason had to be given---some pretext, it was said in the preamble, because ministers were dedicated to God, and to the care of souls. If that was the only reason, it was a most insufficient one. Every body believes in God. I am persuaded there is not an atheist at least in the world! What is there in the inculcation of religious doctrines to debar a man from secular pursuits? Away then with all such distinctions---distinctions without any necessity. It may once have been found necessary to establish this exclusion through fear of a connection between church and state. But the necessity no longer has an existence. We are not surely going back to the age of superstition and of despotism. Let us make a practical constitution; a constitution of equal rights and equal privileges; not a constitution of exclusions. Let us not permit the spirit of jealousy---nor feel envious that others may get higher than ourselves---being convinced that if we individually can be losers, the public are the gainers. In this way we shall raise the character of the State to the highest pinnacle, and make her great and respectable among her confederated States.

Mr. Lewis said, he rose not for the purpose of discussing the question involved, but rather to make the motion to lay the proposition now before the house, indefinately on the table. The subject would come up more appropriately when the section on the general provisions prescribing that no one should hold two offices at the same time, would be reached. The whole subject was embraced in that section. He thought it useless and worse than useless to sprinkle the constitution over with exceptions; when in one general rule well discussed and well conceived, the whole matter could be settled. He had been called a restrictionist. If by that was meant that he was in favor of restraining the will of majorities within a circumscribed limit, and protecting the rights of minorities, then he was a restrictionist. But, restrictionist as he might be, he was not disposed to place the bar of proscription upon any class of citizens, and to disfranchise them on account of their particular occupation. He could see no jusst caue for proscribing ministers from holding civil employments, and for conceding that their sacred calling disqualified them. He would move to lay the section on the table, and when the subject came up in its appropriate place, he would then take the liberty of suggesting his views to the Convention.

Mr. Dunn said, he had not the pleasure of hearing the arguments which had been urged by different members on this question, but he would take this occasion to express his views. He hoped the house would deliberate well before they rejected the proposition of the honorable gentleman from West Baton Rouge (Mr. Chinn.) It was one in which the public interest was deeply concerned; he would not dwell on the subject, but would call the serious attention of the Convention to the propriety of a judge being eligible to the office of governor, or any other political office, whilst exercising the functions of judge, and vice versa, any political officer being eligible to the office of judge. He would remark that his opinions were not formed from observation; for he had had the pleasure of practising law before judges who were above suspicion; judges in whom the public repose entire confidence, but he was satisfied the substitute offered by the gentleman from Baton Rouge was right in principle, and that public interest and public feeling demanded its adoption. The judiciary has been wisely considered by all statesmen, as the delicate part of government; distrust in the rectitude or ability of a judge, is the most fatal feeling that can pervade a community. The legislative and executive departments of government may be distrusted, and still the people may do very well; but the moment confidence in the judiciary is lost, the feelings of the social compact are poisoned at the fountain head. Sir, the judge should be independent of every influence that possibly could operate upon him. Yes, independent of his own ambition; and there cannot be too many guards and checks thrown around him, confining him to the important and delicate business, belonging to his office. What is the business of a judge? It is to administer "equal and exact justice." To dispense to every man his just due. This, considering the infirmaties of human nature, is a most difficult duty to perform; and is worthy the reflection of this Convention, whether it is likely to be correctly performed by politicians; for it is not only necessary that it be performed, but it should be done in such a manner as to inspire public confidence. Sir, it is not sufficient for a judge to decide right, but he should do so under such circumstances, as to show that he has done it; his learning, his talents, and patience, should all be put in requisition, to decide according to law and justice, and then to conciliate the public by proving that he has succeeded. If he indulges in political aspirations, is he likely to do so? Should not a judge devote himself entirely to the duties of his office? And is it not due to him, that he be placed in a situation above the reach of the suspicious---the invidious, or the malicious? It is for the Convention to determine how he would likely be esteemed as a judge, who canvasses for political preferment as a partizan, in times of high excitement like the present; and what would be the situation of the judge after the canvass, and after defeat; fancy him, Mr. President, returning to the bench after a warm contest, with all the feelings of a slandered and persecuted man. Sir, could you expect him to perform his duties with that dignity, that candor, that impartiality, and that equinimity, which are necessary to the advancement of his own honor, and his country's welfare? he would be superhuman if he did; and it is for this house to determine whether it is consistent with human nature for a judge under such circumstances, not to smart under the infliction of fancied or real wrongs. May he not be tempted to remember the services of his friends? and may he not be prejudiced in his judgments by the discovered hatred of his opponents? and if not---then sir, may he not be suspected? There are men adroit in management, and there is danger they might bring the power of their official stations to bear upon their elections.

It is expected that this Convention will direct that the judge shall hold his office for a term of years, and it is fair to presume the incumbent will continue to discharge his duties until his time expires. But if public interest or party feeling require him to become a candidate for political honors, then it should not be considered unjust or unwise to require him to resign, especially when we recognize the doctrine of rotation in office. We should look at this subject with an eye single to the great interest of the people, and not the advancement of friends, or partizans. The old rule of climbing, by holding on to the round of the ladder until a further step is successfully taken, should be abrogated; it is wrong in theory, and in practice gives one party the advantage---patronage of office, an influence likely to be abused.

Mr. President: not only this Convention, but the whole people would prefer that the best, wisest, and greatest man in the State should forever forego the privilege of being the highest and most honorable officer, rather than injustice should be done by a candidate judge to the humblest and most insignificant person in the community; yes, rather than the public should even suspect that injustice has been done. The people have but one feeling on this subject, and that is, the judge should punish the guilty, and protect the innocent. Sir we can but agree that the sacred ermine, should not be soiled for a single moment, nor should even a passing cloud darken the oracle of law and justice, but it should be known, and felt by every one, that the court is a refuge for the oppressed, an assylum for the widow and orphan, and a hiding place for the wronged and helpless.

In reference to the ineligibility of priests and ministers of the gospel, Mr. Dunn said, he felt himself called upon to defend the clergy, avowed himself their friend, and a friend to the church. He believed the clergy generally would concur with him, because he believed they would say their business was with men's souls—their profession was a high and exalted one, elevated far above party strife, and the petty things that belong to earth. It would be degrading them to suppose they had political aspirations, and gentlemen on this floor admit it; but object to the restriction. Sir, (said Mr. Dunn) it is not to underrate them, that the restriction is asked, it is not to prevent them from exercising any privilege which they consider within the sphere of their profession—no, sir, it is to protect the purity of the church, and maintain the dignity and consequence of the clergy; and at the same time to guard the institutions of man against all dangers, all undue and fanatical influences, that hypocrites may impose. For, Mr. President, there are hypocrites—men who pretend to be christians, when in reality they have only the external appearance, the sacred cloak is thrown over them to hide their depravity; "wolves in sheep's clothing." Such men, whose only study is deceit, and only aim, self promotion, would degrade the christian and disgrace the church to accomplish their object. It is to restrain such men that this restriction is required; to secure the pulpit from such profanity and desecration. The church should be shielded against the odium that a demagogue preacher might cast upon it. He concluded by saying that some of his best friends were clergymen, and he had no doubt he was truly representing their views and feelings.

Mr. Conrad of Orleans, participated in opinion with the delegate from Feliciana, (Mr. Dunn,) as to the propriety of excluding ministers of the gospel from holding civil employments. He did not think with the delegate from Opelousas, (Mr. Lewis,) that the section alluded to in the general provisions, embraced the subject as fully and as definitely as the section now before the house; and was therefore opposed to the motion to lay upon the table. With reference to the provision excluding members of congress from being candidates for other offices in the gift of the people, he was opposed to that provision. He thought, however, in reference to judges, it was necessary. They ought not to be involved in the party politics and excitements of the day, and if they were to be candidates while holding on to their judicial appointment, it would expose them at any rate to suspicion; and even that ought to be avoided. He did not concur in the singular remark of the delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston,) that judges who did not intermeddle in politics, and descend into the arena of party contests as candidates for office, were too pure for this world and ought to be transposed to another. The delegate, too, from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston,) has opposed the exclusion of ministers of the gospel. That delegate has on some occasions eulogized the old constitution. Does he forget that this very provision is in the old constitution? and I think the experience of thirty-two years has fully confirmed its wisdom. The delegate from Jefferson, it seems, only means to eulogise that particular portion that suits him, notwithstanding his professed reverence for the whole instrument.

The most cogent reasons exist for excluding teachers of religion from eligibility to offices, and for excluding them from entering the arena of politics. Their mission is to assuage the violence of party politics, not to increase it by being themselves candidates for public offices. In the language of the old constitution, which appears to be distasteful to the member from Jefferson, because they are antiquated, it is well laid down that they are dedicated to the service of God and the cause of souls. That is their appropriate sphere of action. There is besides great danger in opening to them the road to civil preferment. From the line of their duties they have every opportunity of acquiring a great control over society, and there is too much reason to fear they would abuse that influence if they were exposed to the temptations of worldly ambition.

Mr. Lewis said it was not his design to discuss this subject at the present time, for the reasons he had before alleged. He conceived it, however, necessary to make one or two remarks. The usual phillipic had been pronounced, admonishing us of the danger of placing ministers and teachers of religion on the same footing as the balance of their fellow citizens. It seemed to him that if this apprehension have any serious ground, the remedy should extend to disqualification, not simply from holding office, but from the right of suffrage.

I would be the last one, said Mr. Lewis, to withdraw a minister from the sacred desk, and vote for him to fill a political office. But I think we have no right to disfranchise him. We have no more right to say that he shall not be eligible to office, than we have to say that a lawyer or a butcher shall not be eligible. Such exceptions and exclusions are a blot upon our constitution. They are scars upon it. The particular pursuits of a man are no good cause of exclusion, notwithstanding the eloquence of the gentleman ; and they are paying a poor compliment to human nature, when they pretend that the very calling which would tend to elevate a man to the purest standard of morality, would make him incompetent in political matters. The history of the exclusion in the old constitution is well known. It is not worth while to slur the motive over. It arose from an apprehension that the Catholic religion, which was then the exclusive religion, would exercise a deleterious influence if its ministers were not excluded from holding office. I do not allude to the fact because I have any misgivings of that church; but to show that the exigencies for similar restrictions towards any sect, no longer exist; and that all the notions formerly entertained have no present application.

Mr. Downs concurred in opinion with the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis,) that the exclusion of clergymen was entirely unnecessary, and that it was invidious and unjust.

Mr. Marigny opposed the motion to lay the section on the table.

Mr. Chinn withdrew his substitute.

Mr. Ratliff spoke in favor of postponing the question.

Mr. Chinn called for the adoption of the section.

The question was taken upon Mr. Lewis' motion to lay the section indefinitely on the table. The ayes and noes being called for,

Messrs. Brent, Cenas, Culbertson, Derbes, Guion, Humble, Denner, King, Leonard, Lewis, McRae, Mayo, Mazureau, O'Brian, Peets, Penn, Prescott of Avoyelles, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Roselius, Saunders, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stevens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist and Waddill voted in the affirmative—29 ayes, and

Messrs. Beatty, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Cade, Carriere, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Hudspeth, Labauve, Legendre, McCaleb, Marigny, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Taylor of Assumption, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder voted against the motion—30 nays.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the section.

Mr. McRae proposed the following amendment : "that attorneys and counsellors at law shall be excluded."

Mr. Roselius: I move a sub-amendment that practising physicians be also excluded.

Mr. Mayo moved to exclude all persons convicted of infamous crimes,

But before these amendments were submitted,

Mr. Beatty called for the previous question.

The President put the question "shall the previous question be now put?" ayes 37; noes 19.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the section, and was carried in the affirmative, as follows :

Messrs. Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Cade, Claiborne, Carriere, Cenas, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Downs, Dunn, Garcia, Garrett, Humble, Labauve, Legendre, McCalop, Marigny, Mazureau, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Sellers, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption,

Wederstrandt and Winder—37 ayes; and Messrs. Beatty, Brent, Downs, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Lewis, McRae, Mayo, O'Brien, Peets, Penn, Preston, Splane, Stevens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Waddil and Winchester—19 noes.

On motion, the Convention adjourned till to-morrow, at 11 o'clock, a. m.

THURSDAY, February 20, 1845.

The Rev. Mr. PRESTON opened the proceedings by prayer.

The journal was read and approved.

Mr. CHINN gave notice that at the proper moment he would introduce a new, and one that he conceived to be a very important section, into our new constitution. He sent it up to the secretary's desk (being in bad health,) and fearful that he might not at the moment be in his seat when it was wanted to be read. Before the secretary read it, he remarked that it came under the head of "general provisions," and he should not and did not intend to call it up at this time. The section which he proposed and which he wished adopted reads thus:

"Any person who, from and after the adoption of this constitution, shall send a challenge, or be in any way engaged in fighting a duel with deadly weapons, either as principal, second, or even as a witness, shall be hereby deprived and deemed ineligible to any office of honor or profit under this coustitution."

The resolution of the honorable gentleman was laid on the table subject to call, at his own request.

Mr. O'BRYAN then moved a series of resolutions, which he moved should be adopted.

1st. That when the Convention adjourns on Friday next, it shall adjourn to meet again on Tuesday the 11th of March next at 12 A. M., in the hall of the house of representatives, at the State house.

2d. That in the meantime the business of this Convention shall cease, and the per diem of the members and officers of this Convention shall also be suspended during said adjournment.

3d. That the committee on contingent expenses be requested to notify Madame Hawley that we have returned her possession of the room called the "ball room," at present occupied for the deliberations of this body; to date from to-morrow the 21st

Mr. DUNN moved to lay the resolutions on the table indefinitely.

Mr. KENNER moved a call of the house, on which it appeared there were 55 members present. But Mr. Dunn's motion appearing in order, according to the decision of the president, the question recurred in laying Mr. O'Bryan's motion on the table. The motion of Mr. Dunn resulted as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Carriere, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Leonard, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porche, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder—46.

Nays—Messrs. Cade, Hudspeth, McRae, O'Bryan, Prescott of St. Landry, Prescott of Avoyelles, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, and Taylor of St. Landry—9.

The resolutions of Mr. O'BRYAN were consequently laid on the table indefinitely.

Mr. DUNN then offered a resolution that this Convention should hereafter meet at 10 o'clock every morning, (Sundays and holidays excepted) and adjourn at 3 P. M.; further, that no motion to adjourn to meet at any other periods than those specified, shall be entertained by this house, unless called for by a two-thirds vote; and further, that a motion to adjourn this Convention for the purpose of removal to any other part of the State shall be entertained by a majority vote, if the member introducing such a proposition give three days' notice to this Convention.

Mr. WADDILL thought that there was really too much time lost in discussing about these miner matters, and we are in the meantime losing much valuable time that ought to be devoted to more serious ones; and therefore he moved to lay Mr. Dunn's resolution indefinitely on the table.

Mr. VOORHIES had tried, he said, to enforce the 10 o'clock rule with perseverance and earnestness, but to no avail. He thought the loss of delinquent members' per diem would make them punctual, and therefore that was the mode to bring them promptly here at 10 o'clock.

Here Mr. RATLIFF reminded him that he was not in order, as the motion was not debatable.

Mr. BRENT offered a substitute to the resolution of Mr. Dunn, to this effect: that no leave of absence be granted to any member of the Convention, no matter on what account, except in the event of his being sick; and that in no case of absence from the Convention he should be entitled to his per diem, unless he had previously obtained leave of absence from the Convention.

Mr. KENNER then moved to lay the resolution of Mr. Dunn and the substitute to it on the table indefinitely, on which motion the yeas and nays were called for.

Mr. TAYLOR here remarked that the calling of the yeas and nays on every trifling occasion had become unreasonable, and amounted to an useless waste of time and money. He would, for the sake of illustration, give the time and cost of the useless debate now before the house: it already had taken the time of the Convention ten minutes, and that, according to the calculation of our per diem expenses, would cost the State some $2,62-100; and therefore to save further trouble and useless expense he hoped the call for yeas and nays would not be persisted in, and he appealed more especially to those gentlemen who were so loud in their expressions of economy.

The call was, however, persisted in, and resulted as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brent, Brumfield, Cade, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Garcia, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Leonard, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, O'Bryan, Porche, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder—49.

Nays—Messrs. Brent, Carriere, Dunn, Mayo, Peets, Peen and Porter—7.

The PPERIDENT then submitted to the Convention a letter of invitation from Mr. Labuzan, on the part of General Lewis, inviting the Convention to attend at and witness a review and sham battle, which was to take place near the city in honor of the birth day of Washington; and further, to partake of a collation thereafter.

On motion of Mr. CLAIBORNE the invitation was accepted.

Mr. W. B. SCOTT now called the attention of the Convention to the resolution he had offered in relation to removing the sitting of this Convention to Jackson; he desired it should be taken up and laid on the table, subject to call.

Mr. VOORHIES moved to lay the resolution on the table indefinitely.

The yeas and nays were again called for and resulted as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Cade, Carriere, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Garcia, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mayo, Mazureau, Penn, Porche, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder—45.

Nays—Messrs. Dunn, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scottof Feliciana, Waddill and Wikoff—14. So the resolution was laid on the table indefinitely.

Mr. TAYLOR then desired to engage the attention of the house to a new rule which he desired to see adopted; it was to this effect: "The yeas and nays shall not hereafter be taken on any question, unless ten members rise to support the call for them."

He was induced to do this for two reasons. 1st. Because it was evident these frequent calls for the yeas and nays on unimportant matters only tended to retard the deliberations of the Convention. 2d. That the effect evidently was to keep the members of the Convention here so much longer than was necessary, to say nothing of the expense of it to the people.

The PRESIDENT here reminded Mr. Taylor that when any rule of the house was contemplated by the resolutions offered by members, to be changed, that the rules adopted already by the Convention, required the resolution offering to alter the same should lie over for one day.

No objection being offered, the resolution to introduce the new rule was postponed till to-morrow, the 21st, with the understanding that it was to be taken up immediately after the reading of the journal.

Mr. RATLIFF moved that Mr. Roselius be added to the committee on contingent expenses. He stated that the members composing that committee were sometimes at a loss to know what was just or unjust in the printers' accounts; that if the Convention would add Mr. Roselius to the committee, they would have the advantage of practical experience and knowledge. No objection being made, Mr. Roselius was, by the president, added to the committee.

The Convention then, on motion of Mr. Humble, proceeded to the order of the day, which was the report of the committee of revision, on those articles adopted in the new constitution by this Convention.

Mr. LEWIS moved the adoption of the 1st section of the 1st article of the constitution, as reported by the committee of revision, which reads thus:

"The powers of the government of the State of Louisiana shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them to be confided to a separate body of magistracy, to-wit: those which are legislative to one, those which are executive to another, and those which are judicial to another."

It was adopted.

The 2d section of the 1st article was then called up.

Mr. MAYO then moved to insert the words "hold any office," after the word "shall," in the second line.

Before any action was had upon Mr. Mayo's motion,

Mr. KENNER desired to express his opinions as to the duty of the committee of revision. It was simply to correct any grammatical errors that might have crept into the sections of an article, as first adopted; but he emphatically desires to say that he denies the right of that committee to change the letter or the spirit of the section, as it has already passed. For, said he, if that permission be given, we shall sit here till doomsday. We shall settle a matter to-day, and some five or six weeks hence we shall have the same discussions and the same arguments over again, ad infinitum.

Mr. BENJAMIN regrets that he is obliged to object to the 2d section as reported; but he is confident that, as it stands, it is identically the same as in the old constitution. In the section of that constitution, there was a doubt existing in its phraseology; and the object of this Convention, when they altered it, was to prevent one department of our State government from interfering with any of the others; in other words, to specify what shall be the powers of each department.

The committee of revision, however, in their report of the 2d section, (the one now before us) have brought the ambiguity back again; and he (Mr. Benjamin) decidedly prefers the language adopted in the section by the Convention to that in the report. He therefore moved to reject the report of the committee as to the 2d section; but afterwards, (on an explanation given him by Mr. Taylor) he moved to withdraw his first motion, and then moved that it be referred back to the same committee for their re-consideration, which motion prevailed.

That question being disposed of,

Mr. CONRAD moved that the Convention should proceed to the orders of the day, which was, first,

SEC. 6. The governor shall have power to grant reprieves for all offences against the State, and, except in cases of impeachment, shall, with the consent of the senate, have power to grant pardons and remit fines and forfeitures after conviction. In cases of treason, he may grant reprieves until the end of the next session of the general assembly, in which the power of pardoning shall be vested.

The section was adopted.

Section 7th was then taken up. It is as follows:

SEC. 7. All commissions shall be in the name and by the authority of the State of Louisiana, and shall be sealed with the State seal and signed by the governor.

That section was adopted.

Section 8th was the next in order; it read as follows:

SEC. 8. In case of the impeachment of the governor, his removal from office, death, refusal to qualify, resignation, or absence from the State, the powers and duties of the office shall devolve upon the lieutenat governor for the residue of the term, or until the governor, absent or impeached, shall return or be acquitted. The legislature may provide by law for the case of removal, death, resignation or inability, both of the governor and lieutenant governor, declaring what officer shall act as governor, and such officer shall act accordingly until the disability be removed, or a governor shall be elected.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved that the word "inability" in the 9th line be stricken out, and the word "disability" be substituted, which was agreed to.

Mr. CENAS offered an amendment, which was, that the words "duly qualified" be added after the word "elected," in the – line.

Mr. CENAS said that there appeared to him to be a contradiction between the section under consideration and the 4th section. In that, it reads "The governor shall continue in office until his successor shall have taken the oath of office," &c.; in this, it says not only that the governor, but "the lieutenant governor shall perform the duties of the office."

Mr. ROMAN thinks the confliction which Mr. Conrad complains of is more imaginary than real. He does not think the sections conflict.

Mr. MAYO thinks, upon close examination of the words of the section, that it conflicts with itself. The first part of it says that, in certain emergencies, the lieutenant governor shall take the place of, and perform the duties of the governor. In the latter part of the section it says that "the legislature shall make the appointment." He thinks that this will produce confusion, a thing certainly not to be desired. He thinks, and therefore moves, that the words "both of them" be stricken out, and the words "of both" inserted.

Mr. ROMAN thought the gentleman had made a mistake in the meaning of the section. To his mind, it carried the impression that the governor and lieutenant governor must have both placed themselves under disability before the legislature could take the matter in hand.

The amendment offered by Mr. Mayo was then submitted to the Convention, and adopted.

Mr. CONRAD moved to insert the words "or disability" after the word "refusal," in the second line; as the officer elected might be temporarily sick when he would be required to qualify under this section.

Mr. CHINN remarked that it would be better, he thought, to lay the whole section on the table, amendments and all, since it appeared that we were not likely to make any progress in it; but

Mr. CONRAD replied that he did not think time was lost in this body by settling an important principle on a correct and proper basis; that he was not satisfied with it as it stood, and that he was determined to be so before he quit it; for he had the floor, and would keep it until he was satisfied on the principles involved in the question. As it stands now, he considers it ambiguous in the latter part of the clause. He desires to know, from the committee who made the report, whether it was their idea or intention for the legislature, in case of such a vacancy or vacancies, as is provided for in the section, to elect the chief magistrate for the whole unexpired term, or only until a new election can be had by the people? He is just as sensible as any gentleman on this floor that time is precious, and that we have none to lose; but he, Mr. Conrad, does not think we should be stopped by the consideration of a few moments of time, in comparison with the necessity of putting to rights, or at least striving to understand, an important provision in the constitution.

Mr. SAUNDERS moved, as an amendment, to insert the words "at the time appointed by the legislature" after the word "elected."

Mr. ROMAN rose to explain. He remarked that it was only during the temporary disability of the governor or lieutenant governor, or both, or in case of their death, that the legislature could be called upon; and that then the legislature would elect the person chosen by them for the balance of the unexpired term of the office.

Mr. BENJAMIN thinks Mr. Saunders' amendment will cover the ground, and therefore seconds it.

Mr. BEATTY desires to know if it be intended to give to the legislature the power of appointing for four years, in case it might happen a governor or lieutenant governor shortly after their election, when their own power as legislators only lasted for two years.

Mr. CONRAD agreed in part with Mr. Beatty: the section before us provides for the vacancy, he cannot help thinking, in a doubtful manner.

Mr. SAUNDERS again pressed his amendment, but Mr. Beatty did not think that that amendment covered the ground in doubt.

Mr. Saunders then proposed to change his amendment, to withdraw the first and substitute therefor the words "for the residue of the term."

Mr. Beatty is not yet satisfied; he does not think it yet meets the case.

Mr. Pugh thought the difficulty could be obviated by inserting the words "for the residue of the constitutional term."

Mr. Downs thought the principle ought to apply as well to the lieutenant governor as to the governor.

The president then requested of members to reduce their amendments and substitutes to writing. He said the members (he was sorry to say) sometimes jumped up and offered amendments, one after another, so fast that it was impossible to know, or even to try to recollect which was first in order.

Mr. Penn then offered a substitute for all the latter part of the section, striking out all beginning at the 6th line, and inserting "in case of removal, resignation, incapacity or death of the governor and lieutenant governor, the legislature shall declare what officer shall be appointed for the residue of the constitutional term."

Mr. Benjamin, with all due deference to the opinion of the gentleman last up, thinks Mr. Downs' proposition will come nearer to the wants of the case, and shall prefer it.

Mr. Downs then proposed to insert the words, as the last clause of the section, "and such officer shall not act accordingly, until the disability be removed, for the residue of the term."

This proposition was agreed to, and the section as amended was adopted. It reads as follows:

"In case of the impeachment of the governor, his removal from office, death, refusal or inability to qualify, resignation, or absence from the State, the power and duties of the office shall devolve upon the lieutenant governor for the residue of the term, or until the governor absent or impeached shall return or be acquitted. The legislature may provide by law for the case of impeachment, removal, death, resignation, disability, or refusal to qualify, of both governor and lieutenant governor, declaring what officer shall act as governor; and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, for the residue of the term."

The President then laid before the Convention a letter which he had received from Mr. McCabb, on the part of the committee of arrangements, inviting this Convention to attend a celebration to be held at Clapp's church on the 22d February next, by the scholars composing the free school system of the second municipality, and to hear an address to be delivered on that occasion by Mr. Benjamin.

The next section in order was

Sec. 9. The lieutenant governor, or other officer discharging the duties of governer, shall during his administration, receive the same compensation to which the gov. ernor would have been entitled, had he continued in office.

It was adopted with some objection made by Messrs. Taylor and Mayo, but afterwards withdrawn.

The next matter presented was

Sec. 10. The lieutenant governor shall by virtue of his office, be president of the senate, but shall only have a casting vote therein. Whenever he shall administer the government, or shall be unable to attend as president of the senate, the senators shall elect one of their own members, for that occasion.

Mr. Taylor moved to amend by striking out the words, "shall only have a casting vote therein," and insert "have a right, when in committee of the whole, to debate and vote on all subjects, and when the senate are equally divided to give the casting vote."

Mr. Mayo objected to it on account of its having a tendency, in his opinion, to make an interference in the different depatments of the government—the executive with the legislative. He thinks they ought rather to be separated than thrown together.

Mr. Roman agreed with Mr. Mayo, for in the event of granting him those privileges, he would become a legislator in addition to his executive right. Besides, in the senate of the United States they have no committee of the whole, (nor does he believe they have any in this State,) they form themselves into quasi committees. The vice president of the United States never takes part in the debates. He is not a legislator, and he only votes and speaks in case of a tie.

Mr. Downs agreed with Mr. Roman, that in the senate of this State, they had no committee of the whole, at least they had not had one for the last seven years, and probably never would have.

Mr. Taylor is induced to press his amendment, however, for he did not bring this proposal forward without having maturely reflected upon it. He conceives the advantage which would result, would be great and important. 1st, by increasing the duties, you thereby attach more importance to the office, and are likely to procure the services and talents of a man of ability; as it is, it is comparatively an office of no consequence; he can only be useful in case of an equal division, no matter how talented he may be; and he is required to sit in the chair with his mouth shut, except in the case of a tie vote. There would be, to his mind, 2dly, another advantage, that is, in case of the death or disability of the governor, we shall have secured the services of an able man to take his place; while on the other hand, in such an emergency we might be found with a very ordinary man as lieutenant governor, to administer important duties that required great discretion, firmness and knowledge of such business. In one case you give him a chance to shew his ability, on the other you but burden him with an unpleasant part. He can see no possible harm to arise from his amendment, and therefore still presses it on the attention of the Convention.

Mr. Beatty agrees with Mr. Taylor, and thinks the distinction drawn by some gentlemen is nothing but a verbal one, for he has no other duties assigned him except to be president of the senate, and he is not called to do any other duty but what pertains to legislative capacity.

Mr. Conrad, after a short reflection on the matter, thinks there is much reason in Mr. Taylor's suggestions. He would be willing to give the lieutenant governor the power of debating in the senate, because should he be a man of ability, his views on many important questions that may be discussed, might be valuable; and he would move as a further amendment to insert after the word "senate," "shall have the right of participating in the debates;" but he would not be willing to increase the privilege to the extent claimed, in the right of voting on all occasions. He would certainly confine his vote to the casting vote alone.

Mr. Taylor wished to inform the Convention that this is no new idea; and that the same feature is to be found in the constitution of Indiana and some others.

Mr. Porter is opposed to granting either of the extra privileges asked for the lieutenant governor. He has examined the constitutions of several States, viz: of Mississippi, Ohio, Virginia, Georgia, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire and Maine, and no such powers are granted therein. In fact there are very few that give the power, and for his part, he thinks not only precedent is against it, but that we should be careful not to allow any of the departments to interfere with each other; whereas, accept this amendment and we shall have one new debater and one additional vote, and that, too, to be given by an officer in the executive department.

Mr. Boudousquie is of the same opinion as Mr. Porter. He thinks it would destroy the just equalibrium of power that ought particularly to be observed in the senate. When the constitution of the United States was framed an equal representation was secured to all, particularly in the senate, and there can be no doubt if they had one new debater and a vote on all questions, that the equilibrium, there as here, would likewise be destroyed. Besides, the influence of the lieutenant governor as an executive officer (on all occasions when he saw fit to take part in the debates,) would be great, and that also should be guarded against. He thinks with Mr. Porter, that it would give too much power to the executive branch over the legislative branch, and therefore he moved to lay the amendment of Messrs. Taylor and Conrad indefinitely on the table, which motion prevailed.

Mr. Read moved to strike out the words "for that occasion," in the last line, and insert the words "for the time being." Adopted.

Mr. Downs was desirous of making a suggestion which the Convention might reflect upon, and which if entertained, would change the character of the whole section. It seemed to him that the committee in making the office and in defining the duties of the lieutenant governor, as they have done, must have been more anxious to make the office than to give the incumbent any thing to do. While he had no particular objection to the creation of such an officer, he thought with the member from Assumption, that he ought to be a man of talent and ability; and he is of opinion that such a man might be of immense service to the State. He would recommend, that the office should be made of that value as would induce able men to seek it, and he thought that by his performing the duties of secretary of state in lieu of that of president of the senate, that the object might be accomplished; in that way we could afford to pay a man something worth his attention. He recommends that the words in the section be so changed as to accomplish it, and that the section be recommitted to the committee for that purpose.

I am very well aware, sir, (said Mr. Downs,) that I shall be told that this is a new idea. I admit it—but sir, I think I have good reasons to offer for making this change in the section. In the first place, if he is only to act as president of the senate, will the sum be sufficient to induce any man to seek the office, or take it, where the emoluments are only two hundred and forty dollars, $4 per day for sixty days—and then only biennial sessions? It is too insignicant a sum for a man to devote his time for, who is worth having. In the second place, it must be clear to every one, that in case of such an emergency as the death of the governor, it is every way desirable that we should have a man (designated as his successor to hold the reins of government for the remainder of his term,) who has some knowledge of the science of government, and who knows something of the policy pursued by the governor at the time of his death or disability; and by making the lieutenant governor act as secretary of state, he will be placed in constant communication with he governor, will consult with him on all occasions, will become better known to the people, and will make himself a more useful officer of the government, without it costing the State one dollar more. In the third place, it would diminish the patronage of the executive, for we should then have the duties performed by two in lieu of three officers. He thinks two enough, because, under the changes contemplated in our new constitution to change the mode now in operation of appointing many officers, he means such officers as sheriffs, justices of the peace, and many other officers, which it is generally believed will be hereafter elected by the people; the duties required in the executive department will be diminished. For his part he thinks the office of state treasurer should be one coming directly from the people. In the fourth place, he would be as a cabinet counsellor as at Washington. There all the secretaries enter into deliberations with the president on all important matters; they set at the board with him, and give free vent to their opinions on a footing of perfect freedom, and frequently have an important influence on the actions of the president. In many other States they have provided for a separate counsel, to advise with the governor on State matters. Although he (Mr. Downs) would not now recommend such a measure here, yet it is always better to have some constitutional adviser who could bring his talents and information in aid of the governor, on every important occasion. In the fifth place, it would raise the character and importance of the office of secretary of state, which from some cause has heretofore been regared as an office of too little importance. In all previous administrations in this State, it has been considered that the governor was everybody; and the secretay of state, and his other officers, next to nobody.

He thinks it would lead to good in another way. Heretofore, without referring to any particular governor, he has noticed a great defect, the result of which might lead to serious evil—and that is the frequent and continued absence of both governor and secretary of state from the capital, particularly during the sickly seasons, and very frequently when important action is wanted it is left entirely to the governor's private secretary, an officer not known in the constitution. He has many other reasons which have considerable weight with him. There may be objections to his plan, but if so, he is not aware of them. It is a new principle he admits, but he thinks it a reasonable one, and therefore should be adopted. He would be glad members would take time to reflect a little on it, and with that view he would move to re-commit the section.

Mr. Marigny would detain the Convention but for a very few moments. He desired to remark that the only reason why the framers of the constitution of 1812 did not create the office of lieutenant governor, was, that the State was then too poor; and it was deemed then an unreasonable thing to make such an important office without attaching to it a respectable salary. What, (said Mr. Marigny,) do Mr. Downs' five reasons amount to? For his part, he regards them as having no bearing on the question; indeed, he considers them ridiculous. What would become of your lieutenant governor, if he be only a secretary of state? lieutenant governor if called upon in case of the death of the governor to perform the duties of governor, without a secretary of state? for in that case you would have no secretary of state.

He remembered the difficulties which occurred after Mr. Derbigny's death, and how they retarded and fettered the progress of the government. The senate, which elects its president every year, took the helm of affairs, as provided for in the constitution. In case they had elected a new president every year, and the governor had died shortly after his entering on the duties of the office, we should have seen four governors in the period of four years—and how do they propose to remedy it? On the one hand by making a lieutenant governor; on the other hand, by making the secretary of state the governor's successor in case of death or disability!!! To pay the former a salary of $240, and the latter the same price paid to the secretary of state. Our course reminds him of a man crazy to play a game of "marionettes," but at the same time was too mean to pay for it. He thinks the section is right in all but one thing, and that is that the lieutenant governor should have a salary more in proportion to the importance of his station; that he should get a salary of from say $1000 a $1500. That would not be too great a sum. When economy is necessary, it is time to be economical, but that sum can be spared, when the revenues of the State are constantly increasing. He objects to the proposed amendment of the member from Ouachita: he thinks, as he said before, it would be ridiculous to entertain it for a moment, and shall oppose it with his vote.

Mr. Benjamin agrees with Mr. Marigny; the proposition made by the gentleman from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs,) struck him with great astonishment. He thinks by following such a plan we should be complicating the offices for no practical advantage, and we should have to provide for unseen cases. One of the reasons which made him yield in committee to the creation of the office of lieutenant governor, was that by forming a kind of executive council between the three officers, the governor, lieutenant governor, and secretary of state, was that much benefit might be derived from it pratically, as for instance in the selection of officers and otherwise, it might happen in many cases of importance that the governor would yield to the suggestion of each or both of the others if he found himself alone in his opinion, which he would not do if he had only his secretary of state to consult with. The main reason alleged for the lieutenant governor being allowed the privilege to enter into the debate, was that he might have an opportunity to distinguish himself, and that thereby we should bring forward our best talent for the office; but it seems to me, sir, this is a mistaken notion. In his, (Mr. B.'s,) opinion the privilege of presiding in the senate and of giving the casting vote when senators divide, becoming thereby the senator of the State at large, is a great honor; and he thinks there is no citizen, however brilliant in his talents, but might well be proud to accept the office; add to that the possible chance that every lieutenant governor will have of stepping into the executive chair from unforseen causes, surely there are sufficient inducements to make the post an enviable one, and he, Mr. B., has no fear that the office will go begging while we have so many able men amongst us.

For these reasons he shall oppose the amendment offered by the member from Ouachita.

Mr. Roman had but a few remarks to offer, for he conceived that the whole ground had been covered by the two gentlemen from New Orleans.

He agrees with the gentleman from Ouachita, that the office of secretary of state should be one of dignity. If reference, however, was had to the next clause, it would be found that provision had been made to raise the dignity of that office, which would hereafter not render him liable to be displaced at the will of the governor, after his appointment had been confirmed by the senate.

In reply to the remarks made by the gentleman from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs,) he felt it due to himself to say a few words. The assertion is made that for some time during the summer months, and during the sickly season, the executive government has been abandoned generally, for years back, at least, to the private secretary. As to himself, he feels bound to give the assertion an unqualified denial. While he had the honor to fill the gubernatorial chair, he had invariably selected for the office of secretary of state, a gentleman who was a resident of New Orleans and who never left the city, and the duties of the executive department had never devolved on the private secretary; and so far as he knows and believes, up to the period of his leaving office, the same rule adopted by him had been the invariable rule. What had been the course pursued by the present governor he was ignorant of. But how could the evil complained of be remedied by the proposition of the gentleman from Ouachita? Why, if the lieutenant governor were elected by the people at large, he might be selected from, and no doubt would, one of the country parishes, and then he would most likely have to leave the city during the sickly season too. He thinks there is no weight in the reason assigned. He desires to say a few words in reply to the delegate from New Orleans, Mr. Marigny. He is of opinion that he is also mistaken as to the propriety of paying the lieutenant governor $1000 to $1500 a year for his services. The committee who made the report came to the conclusion that, in fixing the emoluments of the office, they should be governed by the duties he had to perform. When he performed the duties of president of the senate, he got the same pay as other senators did, and should he by chance be called upon to act as governor, he would get the same salary that was provided for the governor. In both cases, he thinks, the committee is right, and that the salary in either case is enough.

Mr. Ratliff accords with Mr. Downs in his motion for one reason, that, in uniting the offices as asked to be done, we should be virtually going back again and striking out the office of lieutenant governor. He has been ever opposed to the creation of that office. He thought it an useless one, and one only introduced into the constitution for the purpose of vesting some man with a title without having any thing to do. Mr. Ratliff remarked that we had now really arrived at that point described by some English traveller, who had written and published an account of his travels in America, and that the Americans were the most extraordinary people on the face of the earth, in one thing, and that was, in the pursuit of offices of all grades and kinds; and he further remarked, what was pretty true, that nothing less than a squire or a colonel could be found in the United States. Here we want to create an office to put somebody in it, not that there is any occasion for it, any more than there is for a fifth wheel to a coach. He further would object to it for another reason. He would be elected by a party. He will act as a party man, and the more talents and the more energy he has, the more dangerous he will be. It was intended that the senate, the natural guardian of the rights of the minority, should be a check on executive power; now, how can that check be said to exist, when in case of a tie vote the president of the senate has the power by his vote of ratifying the acts of a governor, right or wrong? The probability is, as one thousand to one, that being in the executive department, himself, that he and the governor would be hand and glove, and would understand each other thoroughly. Another objection to having such an officer would be, that we should be almost surely to get some incompetent man. No man of talent who can find something better to do with his time, will be found willing to make the canvass of the State, and expend a thousand dollars at the very least, in doing it, for the great privilege of getting two hundred and forty dollars every two years. Well then, some one is elected who knows nothing of the duties of the office; he will be embarrassing the senate at every step they take, and they will retort upon him, and then we shall have a pretty scene of confusion. Let us then abolish and do away with the office, and elect a secretary of state in place of him, who shall succeed the governor in case of death or disability, and then give him the power to appoint in such case another secretary of state, for the unexpired term of his office—that would do very well. For his part, he don't want to see so many big names in our constitution. He is in favor of having a secretary of state elected by the people, and in case of any difficulty as to an interregnum, let the legislature provide for it. As it is now, we shall never get a man of talents for the post in the world; he will be some man who never had any thing to do with politics in his life, and Here Mr. BEATTY called the honorable delegate to order, for, (said he,) Mr. President, he is discussing not the motion before the house, but he is discussing a principle definitively adopted into the constitution two hours ago.

The PRESIDENT did not think Mr. Ratliff out of order.

Mr. BEATTY appealed from the decision of the president, but on the call (in several parts of the hall) of "go on," "go on," "go on," Mr. BEATTY did not persist in his appeal.

Mr. RATLIFF: "the gentleman thinks, sir, I am not in order; well, I think sir, I ought to know, for I have had a greater deal more experience in parliamentary proceedings, I reckon, than he has; and I assert that I have a right to speak, sir. He, Mr. McRae, can appeal to the president, and ask if he has not always bowed with submission to the decision of the chair, and he always will do so; but he can always address the house: he knows he can, for he does not, like many others, offer to address the house twice on the same subject.

He, Mr. McRAE, said he had almost got through with his remarks, when he was so kindly interrupted, and should detain the Convention but one moment longer.

How, sir, was it possible to disconnect the questions without inquiring into the possible duty and the defined duty in the section of the lieutenant governor, without attempting to show that the lieutenant governor would be a mere automaton, a kind of nothing, except for the purposes of political power, unless the motion of the delegate from Ouachita prevailed? It was not possible. Well, sir, I want no lieutenant governor, but I want a secretary of State elected by the people."

Here Mr. RATLIFF turned round to Mr. Beatty, and asked if that was unparliamentary?

Some of the views of the delegate from St. James met his hearty concurrence, with respect particularly to the keeping of the duties separate of each officer of the government. He, Mr. McRae, wants each, separate and distinct. He wants the secretary of state to perform the duties properly belonging to his office; to give all information of the acts of the executive department when called upon in a proper manner; to make annual reports for the information of the citizens at large; and moreover, he would like to see him one of those officers, who, if he does his duty well, should not be made ineligible for a second term.

The lieutenant governor is a mere name any how, and he thinks we might yet abolish the office and make an elective secretary of state; or if we can't do that—why, then, couple the two offices of lieutenant governor and secretary of state together, and at least take away from him his political power in the senate. We could now make a section before we get through with this article in the constitution defining the mode by which a successor to the secretary of state may be appointed, in case it might happen he was called upon to take the duties upon himself as governor. For these reasons, and with the view of reaching what he aimed at, he should vote for the motion of the gentlemen from Ouachita.

Mr. BEATTY moved the previous question.

Mr. DOWNS protests against this off handed way of cutting off debate.

Mr. DOWNS then proceeded: He said that he was pleased to hear from Mr. Roman himself, that he (Mr. D.,) was mistaken in the assertion which he had made with regard to the executive abandoning their duties at the capital during the greater part of the summer and fall months. He stands corrected, but in justification of himself, he felt bound to say, that in the section of the country in which he resided the assertion he had made was matter of public rumor. He was glad to know the facts of the case were otherwise. He desired to say in answer to Mr. Marigny, that at least, it would have been expected in all fairness and reason that he should have advanced some arguments to rebut his (Mr. D's.) assigned reasons for the amendment, before he so sweepingly termed them as ridiculous. He could conceive nothing ridiculous in the amendment, and he is at a loss to know what to attribute Mr. Marigny's assertion to, in so calling it—unless indeed, it was the small piece of paper on which it was written, being something supremely ridiculous in his eyes.

The only argument he attempted to combat was that it would be right and proper to make the lieutenant governor secretary of state—and that the duties of that office should pertain to him, with the emoluments of that office; and he gave us no argument in answer, but endeavored to turn it into ridicule. Now, sir, I want argument, not assertion. It is very easy to say, in an off-hand way—"oh! it is ridiculous!" but sensible people are very apt to ask, why? And when no satisfactory reply is made, the ridicule, and the sarcasm connected with the ridicule, recoil upon the person who roundly makes the unwarrantable assertion; unwarrantable because he can shew no cause for it.

If in the reply which has been made to the proposition of Mr. Taylor, it could be shown me that when a man who has been elected lieutenant governor would feel perfectly at his ease, to be pent up inthe seat as president of the senate, to hear himself attacked and abused without a chance to say one word in reply, as was the case with Calhoun, Van Buren, and Johnson, I might perhaps agree with Mr. Benjamin, that the honor is commensurate with the sacrifice of feeling. When he can satisfy me that to be president of the senate and a chance at the first office in the State, to arise from the death or disability of the incumbent, is a very agreeable present, or a very flattering perspective; and when he can satisfy me that in the event of the duty being assigned to him by Mr. Benjamin, of being an assistant state counsellor, without any other pay than $4 a day for the period of sixty days, every other year, and that will induce men of a high order of talent to present themselves before the people for their suffrages on account of the distinguished honor conferred on them, then I shall indeed be astounded. Again, the idea of calling on the lieutenant governor to assist in cabinet deliberations, is a new idea. The vice-president of the United States has nothing to do with their deliberations in the cabinet council at Washington; neither Burr, nor Calhoun, nor Van Buren, nor Johnson, ever formed one of the members of such council. And suppose we were to do so here? we could not in reason ask him to devote his time for such service without remunerating him for his time, trouble, and the expenses he incurred in his attendance. If you do that, you will make the office one of three things, and perhaps the whole combined: 1st, an insignificant one; 2d, a disagreeable one; and 3d, an unprofitable one. He (Mr. Downs) has not yet heard any good argument to induce him to change his first views, and hopes, therefore, that the motion to recommit will yet prevail.

Mr. Conrad rose not to detain, but for one single moment to express his views as to the present position of the question before the Convention.

It seemed to him that the only difference between the wants of the gentleman from Ouachita, and the gentleman from West Feliciana, was this: one wants the lieutenant governor to be secretary of state, while the other wants the secretary of state to be lieutenant governor, only abolishing the title, and they both agree that the officer to be elected shall be elected by the people. One wants to abolish the name, but both wanted to keep the office. In all else they agree. Is it worth the time that has been taken to argue it?

The question is now, shall the lieutenant governor be president of the senate? or shall he be the secretary of state? To that complexion it must come at last. He therefore seconded Mr. Beatty's motion for the previous question.

Mr. Benjamin then moved that the motion made by Mr. Downs be laid indefinitely on the table.

Mr. Claiborne desired to say, that he thought the amendment proposed by Mr. Downs was worthy of consideration—and as such he would like to have it recommitted. He thinks that no proper person would be found willing to take the office as at present tendered to him, under this Constitution.

The question was then put on Mr. Benjamin's motion, to lay indefinitely on the table, and was decided as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brent, Briant, Cade, Cenas, Chinn, F. B. Conrad, Derbes, Dunn, Garrett, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Leonard, Lewis, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Peets, Prescott of Avoyelles, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Taylor, Trist, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder—38 yeas; and

Messrs. Claiborne, Conrad, Downs,

Humble, McCallop, Porter, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, W. B. Scott, T. W. Scott, Miles Taylor, and Waddill—15 nays.

So Mr. Benjamin's motion to lay the motion of Mr. Downs indefinitely on the table was carried. The question was then put on the adoption of the section, as amended by Mr. Read. The section was adopted and read as follows:

"The lieutenant governor shall by virtue of his office, be president of the senate, and shall only have a casting vote therein whenever he shall administer the government, or shall be unable to attend as president of the senate, the senators shall elect one of their own members for the time being."

Mr. Benjamin then moved an adjournment until to-morrow at 11 o'clock, which prevailed.

Friday, February 21, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Convention was opened by prayer from Mr. Stephens, in the absence of any regular minister of the gospel.

Mr. Roselius moved that the invitation tende red to this Convention to attend the examination of the scholars, forming the free school system of the first municipality, at the French theatre, be accepted; and he further moved, that the Convention proceed to that place in a body, at 12 o'clock, to attend at and witness the examination of the students.

He said, in support of his motion, that this Convention would there see some 2000 children, getting, some of them perhaps, nothing more, but at least all getting an ordinary education. The rich man's child mingling with the poor man's child, and thereby gradually acquiring that great sound principle that merit alone is a passport to future eminence. The best evidence of the feasibility of the plan proposed is this: they are striving to introduce education generally, and particularly amongst the poorer classes, who cannot afford to pay for such education. He trusts the Convention will meet his suggestions in the proper spirit. The question before them is an important one, and perhaps one of the most important that could be presented to this Convention.

There is, it is true, a committee on education appointed by this Convention, but he has not heard that they had yet made a report. If this committee will attend that assembly of the children educated at the public expense, and listen to the examination of the pupils, he (Mr. R.) feels sure, that they will be more than ever impressed with the necessity of making such a provision in our new constitution as will cover the whole ground. Now let us look at the practical operation of our accepting this invitation, and attending the examination. It will have a moral effect, and one that will be lasting in its character; that the Convention should attend the examination of the students of the free school system, established but one year, and under that system there are already more than 2000 pupils; the larger part the children of people unable to afford them education unless it were gratuitous. The committee on education of the Convention, are charged with a high and important trust. They doubtless would be prepared soon to report, and no doubt ably. But to his (Mr. R.'s) mind there was no opportunity like the one now offered for witnessing the practical benefits of the system.

On motion of Mr. Roselius, the invitation was accepted, and the Convention agreed to attend the said examination in a body at 12 o'clock.

It was moved and seconded to adjourn till Monday, 11 o'clock; lost.

The next question that was called up was on motion of Mr. Taylor, viz:

To take up his motion of yesterday in relation to the calling of the yeas and nays on any question, without there were ten members rising to support the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. Scott of Baton Rouge, moved to lay it on the table, subject to the call of the house. The motion was put and lost.

Mr. Benjamin regrets to see the disposition manifested, to force a vote on this or any other question. He thinks that every opportunity should be extended for the purpose of securing a full vote in all matters submitted to this body.

Mr. Conrad was opposed to delay, and thought the Convention was as full now as ever it was at the same hour. He says that many of the articles of the constitution have been adopted with no more members than are now present; but for a mere rule of the house, he thinks we have an abundant number of members.

Mr. RATLIFF next addressed the house. He was fearful from what he saw among the members, that they were now attempting to inflict upon us a gag law; and as such he was opposed to it. He objects as much as any one to the frequent calling of the yeas and nays, for he knows it in almost every case to be an useless waste of the people's money, for to that it comes at last. Nevertheless, there may be important questions come up, in the decision of which he may specially desire to record his vote, and yet under the proposed rule. No one would have a chance to get the record filled, unless he run about the house and get ten members to call for the yeas and nays. Thinking it unjust, he should certainly oppose it.

Mr. BENJAMIN remarked that there was a question before the house, to adjourn till Monday morning, and further to take up this question then, the very first thing after the reading of the journal. The motion was then put and carried.

Mr. BENJAMIN then moved an adjournment to 11 o'clock Monday morning, which was carried.

MONDAY, February 24, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. Clark opened the proceedings by prayer.

On motion; Messrs. Garcia, Soulé and Briant were excused from attendance on account of sickness; and leave of absence was granted to Messrs. Splane, Pugh, Cade, McRae and Lewis.

Mr. TAYLOR of Assumption, moved that the Convention adjourn till to-morrow at 11 o'clock, a. m., for want of a quorum; which motion was lost.

Mr. O'BRYAN submitted the following resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That from and after the 15th day of March next, the Convention will grant no leave of absence to any member, unless in case of sickness of the member or some one of his family."

Mr. TAYLOR of Assumption, suggested, as there was a bare majority, to lay the resolution over until Thursday at 10 o'clock, p. m.

Mr. WINDER moved to lay the resolution on the table indefinitely, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Bourg, Brumfield, Cenas, Dunn, Hudspeth, King, Legendre, Leonard, McCallop, Mazureau, Porche, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry and Winder voted in the affirmative—22 yeas; and

Messrs. Brent, Carriere, Covillion, Derbes, Downs, Garrett, Hynson, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Pects, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff, voted in the negative—22 nays; the vote being equally divided, the president voted in the negative, the motion was consequently lost.

Mr. BEATTY moved to amend by striking out the "15th of March," and insert in lieu thereof the words "the 24th day of February."

Mr. RATLIFF: Why that is to day.

Mr. BEATTY: That is what I intended.

Mr. DUNN moved that the resolution and amendment be laid on the table till to-morrow.

Mr. SELLERS opposed the motion to postpone.

The question was taken, and Mr. Dunn's motion was lost.

Mr. TAYLOR of Assumption raised the question of order.

On the question of order, the PRESIDENT decided that this resolution was out of order, inasmuch as the rule offered Friday, by Mr. Taylor of Assumption, was made the special order of the day for to-day, immediately after the reading of the journal.

Mr. TAYLOR of Assumption, called up the rule offered by him, and made the special order of the day for to-day, viz:

"The yeas and nays shall not be taken on any question, unless ten members rise to support the call for them."

Mr. PORTER said he did not intend to discuss this matter, but would simply make a few suggestions which he hoped would induce the honorable delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Taylor,) to withdraw his proposition. It was not in accordance with parliamentary rules, and was without precedent. The expediency of calling for the yeas and nays, had been concurred in by the wisest statesmen, and was sanctioned by universal practice. Unless this Convention were about deliberately to pronounce that they were unable to proceed without this gag, and it was essential to paralyze liberty of action, in order to facilitate their proceedings; he could not see how such a motion could be entertained. The great body of the members were not talking members; they did not discuss and debate every question; but still they wished to show their constituents how they voted, and by whom great measures were defeated. It was the right of both the majority and minority to ascertain by whose votes questions of importance were lost or carried. If the present proposition be carried, the next movement should be to close our doors, and expel our reporters, as was attempted a few days ago, and do every thing in secret. I am, said Mr. PORTER, for no such proceedings. I wish all our acts and all our votes to be public; that every man, as well as myself, may show the position assumed, and incur a just share of individual responsibility. But independent of this rule being arbitrary and pernicious in its consequences, I very much doubt whether it will have the effect which gentlemen profess to be their design, that of economising and saving our time. The yeas and nays will be called for as usual, and if they are not taken because there are not ten members to rise to support the call, debates will inevitably be the result. Each individual that supports the call, as he is refused the liberty of recording his vote, will explain his position; and more time will be consumed in a half dozen speeches a day, perhaps, than would be if they were called for and taken in the usual way. Ill feelings and contentions too, will arise, and not only will the design prove abortive, but our proceedings will be arrested from time to time. Mr. Porter terminated his remarks by hoping that the gentleman would withdraw the proposition.

Mr. TAYLOR of Assumption, said he would briefly submit his reasons for suggesting the proposition under consideration. The gentleman from Caddo, (Mr. Porter,) says that the proposition involves a departure from all parliamentary rules. The delegate is under a mistake in making this assertion. All deliberative bodies have an easy mode of ascertaining the different divisions of sentiment that may prevail. They resolve themselves into committee of the whole, where great latitude is allowed to the discussion, but when the yeas and nays are not allowed.

When the question is placed in a definite form, the committee rise and a direct vote by yeas and nays is taken, and then the point at issue is closed. A great deal of time has been lost in the Convention by the call, on every occasion, for the yeas and nays, even upon trivial matters. I do not say trivial in themselves, but insignificant as matters of record. On one occasion, the yeas and nays were called for four times on motions to adjourn. The yeas and nays too, are called upon allowing some petty claim which involves no principle, and is a question only of a few dollars, more or less. No one (said Mr. Taylor,) respects more than I, the proper use of the call for the yeas and nays, or would be more reluctant to yield or deny that privilege when any principle was at issue. Nor have I any apprehension that this proposition will have that result. Its only results will be to prevent an useless waste of time upon insignificant matters, where no principle will be involved. I apprehend no difficulty from the rule; there will always be found eleven members ready to sustain the call for the yeas and nays, whenever the question may possess the least ingredient of principle.

Mr. RATLIFF could not concur in the necessity or expediency for any such gag. By the old constitution, which is in vigor until superseded by the new one, as well in relation to this body as in other matters, it is provided that the yeas and nays on any question shall, at the desire of any two of the members of the legislature, be entered upon the journal. The proposition that has been submitted by the member from Lafourche, (Mr. Taylor,) will engender acrimonious feelings and bitter resentments. Nothing can be gained by it. It will be throwing a firebrand into the Convention. It will excite prejudices, and so far from economizing our time, for every simple response, yes or no, we shall be inflicted with a speech. And in fact, no other mode will exist for a member to develop to his constituents what are his sentiments upon any important matter that may come up, and upon which the majority may not be disposed to accord the privilege of the yeas and nays to the minority.

Mr. Ratliff referred to the motion made this morning to adjourn; because, said he, there happened not to be, at the identical moment, a quorum. The gentleman from Lafourche (Mr. Taylor) complains of asking the yeas and nays upon motions to adjourn. These questions are sometimes of grave importance. They are directly connected with important questions of principle, that might be defeated if the adjournment took place. In this very instance, when the gentleman this morning moved to adjourn, if a quorum had not been in attendance immediately after his motion, it would have been very essential to have called for the yeas and nays, to see, and let the people know, who voted for an adjournment, and the consequent loss of one day's proceedings, because a quorum was not at the precise moment in attendance; because some gentlemen's watches happened to be a little slow, or, like myself, they had some person holding on to their elbow.

The Virginia Convention, which was, both in point of talent and the character of its members, said Mr. Ratliff, the most distinguished body in the United States, had but two rules. There was no squabbling, no difficulty, no gags; every thing went on harmoniously and prosperously to a successful completion. In that, body, so far from prescribing the rigid rules we have heard spoken of in this body, it is a fact that they adjourned for several days, to afford five members who were unavoidably detained from their seats, the privilege of voting upon an important question. There was no feverish haste and excitement. The public business was sedulously attended to, but with calm, cool, dispassionate judgment; no taking advantage on account of absence, nor no gags upon the minority.

I trust, said Mr. Ratliff, that this proposition will be rejected.

Mr. Taylor of Lafourche, begged permission to call attention to one fact. The constitution of the United States contained a provision upon this very subject: that the yeas and nays, at the desire of one-fifth of the members of either branch of congress, shall be entered upon the journal. The gentleman from Feliciana, (Mr. Ratliff,) speaks of the Virginia Convention with high respect. I concur with him in a high estimation of that body, but I do not think, as he does, that it was the most important body that ever assembled in the United States. The Federal Convention, to my conception, was the most important and the wisest political assembly that ever met, and this very provision was the result of their action; the expression of their enlightened views and experience upon record. According to it the call for the yeas and nays in this body, would have to be sanctioned by eighteen members; whereas, according to my proposition, the number is limited to eleven. I cannot consider it in the light of a gag. It would facilitate business, and would throw no impediment in the way of a call for the yeas and nays, upon questions having any pretensions to importance.

Mr. Downs opposed the proposition. It was desirable that our time should not be uselessly consumed; yet taking it for granted that the ayes and nays were called for more frequently than the occasion required, he did not see how this proposition would effect the object assumed. It was of the very last importance that the present freedom should be allowed in calling for the ayes and nays, and it might very well happen that questions, that some might treat as trivial, would be viewed in a very different light by others.

Mr. Marigny moved for the adoption of the rule, and called for the yeas and nays:

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brumfield, Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jeffersson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Porche, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Voorhies and Winder voted in the affirmative—26 yeas; Messrs. Brent, Carriere, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Leonard, McCallop, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the negative—29 nays; consequently the motion was lost.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ARTICLE THIRD, AS REPORTED BY THE MAJORITY.

Sec. 11. "While he acts as president of the senate, the lieutenant governor shall receive for his services the same compensation which shall for the same period be allowed to the speaker of the house of representatives, and no more."

Mr. Marigny moved to amend by striking out all the words of the first line, moreover the words, "the same compensation which shall for the same period be allowed to the speaker of the house of representatives, and no more," and insert in lieu thereof the words "a compensation shall be fixed by the legislature."

Mr. Marigny said he did not think it becoming the dignity of the State, to allow to so high a functionary, so small a compensation as four dollars a day. and that only during the legislative sessions, which were to be held biennially. If it be expedient, said (Mr. M.) on the one hand, to use a prudent economy, on the other we should avoid a niggardly parsimony. In leaving the compensation to the discretion of the legislature, we need entertain no apprehension that they will be disposed to act with too much liberality. But, we will leave it to them to decide what is a fair compensation, for it may well happen that a person may be designated, on account of his great merit, whose fortune is but small; and if you maintain this provision in your constitution, you will exclude from that office all other citizens but those whose circumstances and positions are independent.

Mr. Marigny's motion was lost.

On motion, the said 11th section, as reported, was adopted, viz:

Sec. 11. "While he acts as president of the senate, the lieutenant governor shall receive for his services the same compensation which shall for the same period be allowed to the speaker of the house of representatives, and no more."

The 12th section was then called up; viz:

Sec. 12. "A secretary of state shall be appointed and commissioned, to hold his office during the pleasure of the governor. The records of the State shall be kept and preserved in the office of the secretary. He shall keep a fair register of the official acts and proceedings of the governor, and when necessary, shall attest them. He shall, when required, lay the said register and all papers, minutes and vouchers relative to his office, before either house of the general assembly, and shall perform such other duties as may be enjoined on him by law."

Mr. Claiborne moved to strike out the words "during the pleasure of the governor," and insert in lieu thereof the words "during the term for which the governor shall have been elected, if he shall so long behave himself well."

Mr. Claiborne said his object, by this amendment, was to make the secretary of state independent—not the creature of executive will. It might happen that the duties of that office may become incompatible with a dependance upon the executive will. He was by law required to keep an official register of the official acts and proceedings of the governor, and to submit them to the general assembly when required. There was no propriety in placing him in a subservient position, and hence his (Mr. Claiborne's) amendment.

Mr. Conrad of New Orleans, moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the words "if he shall so long behave himself well."

Mr. Conrad: these words were superfluous, "as long as he behaves himself well." They were nothing. The secretary of State, like all other officers, is subject to removal by impeachment for misconduct.

Mr. Downs: they are similar to the provisions in the old constitution.

Mr. Claiborne was indifferent as to that matter. He would accept of the suggestion of his colleague.

Mr. Benjamin was in favor of the section as reported. He conceived it would be exceedingly inconvenient, if, in the event of a disagreement between the governor and the secretary of State, the former was compelled to retain the latter. The public service would perhaps suffer, and inasmuch as the secretary of State was in direct and constant intercourse with the governor, and the latter was elected by the people, it seemed to him that the governor should be allowed the privilege of retaining the secretary of State, or of dismissing him if the state of their official and personal relations render it necessary.

Mr. Porter expressed his decided preference for the section as amended by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Claiborne.) In referring to the constitutions of the several States, I find that in fifteen the secretary of State is elected on joint ballot by the legislatures; three in which the secretary of State is elected by the people; and three only, to-wit: the States of Kentucky, Louisiana, (whose constitution is moddeled on that of Kentucky) and Delaware, where the secretary is appointed by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate. Mr. PORTER said he concurred fully in the views of the delegate from New Orleans, that the secretary of State might not be placed in a position to be the tool or the automaton of the governor. He said that the provision which the gentleman last up (Mr. Benjamin) had boasted of having introduced in committee, that the secretary of State should be removable at the discretion of the governor, was to be found but in one constitution in the United States. He was opposed to the one man power, even in appointing to office, but when it comes to appointing and removing, with or without cause, a State officer, he hoped such a power would never be recognized here. Mr. PORTER terminated his remarks by suggesting the provision upon the same subject in the constitution of Tennessee.

Mr. CONRAD of Orleans, said that the supreme court had virtually decided that the governor could remove from office where the tenure was limited, not by directly displacing the officer, but by appointing another in his stead, that is, he could drive out one nail with another. This he considered a most dangerous power. Mr. C. argued against the dependence of the secretary of State upon the governor. He considered it inexpedient and impolitic. The secretary of State was the custodian of the public records, and instead of being the creature of the governor, he should be a check upon that officer.

The question was taken on Mr. Claiborne's amendment as amended by Mr. Conrad, and carried in the affirmative.

Mr. PEETS offered the following substitute, viz:

"A secretary of State shall be elected by the qualified electors of the State at large, at the same time of the election for governor, and shall hold his office during the term for which the governor shall have been elected."

Mr. PORTER withdrew his proposition and accepted the proposition of Mr. Peets.

Mr. TAYLOR of Assumption, moved that the said substitute be postponed until the Convention take up the mode of appointing the members of the judiciary. Mr. TAYLOR thought that the question would then more properly come up, and that it could then be discussed once for all.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD opposed the postponement. The principle of electing the Secretary of State by the people was somewhat dissimilar from the principle of electing the judges by the people.

The question was taken upon the postponement, and it was decided in the negative.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the proposition of Mr. PEETS.

Mr. MARIGNY: I cannot conceive how it can enter into the immagination of any one to elect the secretary of state by the people. It is equivalent to throwing confusion and disorder into the administration of the executive department. What in fact is the secretary of state as regards the governor? He is the officer that comes in most direct contact with the governor, and is his counsellor and adviser. If you elect a popular man to the office of secretary of state, it may well happen that you give to the governor a powerful adversary, between whom and the chief of the State, there will be a mutual ill-will, prejudicial to the interests of the State and to the harmony which should pervade its councils; this misunderstanding will be considerably augmented by political differences between these functionaries and the hypothesis; such a result is fully warranted by the present political contests between democrats and federalists, or whigs and democrats; and others that will continue to agitate and distract the country. Why create a difficulty for the mere pleasure of creating it? Is it not much simpler that the governor should appoint the secretary of state, as he appoints all other officers with the advice and consent of the senate? An experience of thirty-two years, and I contend always that experience is the best guide, that no inconvenience, no obstacle, no schism has resulted from the full liberty given to the governor to choose that officer; whereas under the territorial government we had a striking example of the innumerable difficulties that grew out of the misunderstanding between the governor and the secretary of state. The governor at that period was Charles Cole Clay Claiborne, and the secretary of state was Thomas Bolling Robertson. Both these men were the bosom friends of Jefferson. The first one was nominated by Mr. Jefferson, probably because he had lent his essential aid in his contest with Burr; and the second was appointed simply on account of personal friendship. But Mr. Jefferson forgot the most essential part, and that was whether these two men would agree in the close and intimate official relations in which he had placed them. It so turned out that their characters were the most dissimilar. Robertson, with whom I was on the most intimate terms of friendship, and whom I sought because the originality of his character amused me, was always, notwithstanding his great talents and moral worth, in dispute with governor Claiborne. It was sufficient that the latter had expressed an opinion or formed an idea, for the former to contradict and oppose it. The cabinet, if I may so designate the executive conferences, was fire and the sword. No one, perhaps, could better describe the secretary of state, so eccentric and original, as I could; but I forbear from relating the many anecdotes that would most fully illustrate it. He assumed to be descended from the celebrated Pocahontas—he despised wealth and detested the laws—and it was a matter of astonishment to me, with such opinions, how he could have succeeded in a political career. It frequently happens that necessity impels men to a course contrary to their wishes, and so it might well have been with him. As he was necessitated to live in society, notwithstanding his great aversion for law, he asked for and obtained the office of judge of the district court of the United States. No one was more surprised at this than I; and meeting him some days afterwards, I inquired how it was that he was enabled to conciliate his dislike with his interest? Bah, bah, replied he, I shall hear these lawyers until they have entangled their cases, and then I will decide by throwing a dollar in the air, by head or tails!

I do not know whether he ever carried into effect his singular plan; but he had talents sufficient to comprehend a suit, and too much integrity to have made a game of his duties. I tell this anecdote merely to exhibit the originality of the man. Nothing in the world, it may well be conceived, would be so unpleasant as the forced interviews between two officers who heartily detested each other, and yet who were brought into constant intercourse by these duties. I was nineteen years of age when Louisiana became an integral portion of the United States, and my experience, as well as my recollections, induce me to hope that you will not adopt the proposition of the delegate, (Mr. Peets.)

Mr. Ratliff said that as this was the first opportunity he had had to express his views upon the question of electing public officers by the people, he would avail himself of this occasion to take a stand against executive patronage. He concurred with the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Conrad,) that the question of electing the secretary of state, was distinct from that of electing the judges by the people. There was no necessary connexion between them. He could not give any weight to the argument assuming a necessity for the secretary of state and the governor to be bosom friends. Their duties were distinct and separate.

What were the duties assigned to the secretary of state? That he should keep a fair register and attest all official acts and proceed of the governor, and shall, when required lay the same and all papers, and minutes, and vouchers relative thereto, before either house of the general assembly, and shall perform such other duties as may be prescribed by law. The governor may consult him, or not, at his pleasure; but there is no necessity for the executive to take or follow his advice. It struck me as somewhat singular that a gentleman belonging to the political party that the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin,) belongs, should be a stickler for a dependence of the secretary of state upon the governor; and it reminded me of the different view taken by the political party of which that gentleman is a conspicious member, when President Jackson removed Mr. Duane and appointed Mr. Taney in his stead, because the former was adverse to his views in relation to the removal of the deposits. That particular act of the president was treated as an abominable abuse of power.

If the secretary of state is to be made the creature, the dependant upon the executive, upon the plea of his being the confidential adviser, why not extend the principle to the attorney general; for the attorney general is just as much the confidential adviser of the governor as the secretary of state? Examine the law carefully, and determine how the secretary of state can faithfully discharge his particular duties, if he be placed under the immediate control of the governor, and the latter should find it convenient or expedient to suppress any record or conceal the failure of performance of any particular duty. Instead of being as he ought to be, and as his functions ought to make him, independent of the mere will of the governor, and a check upon that officer, he will be a dependant, exposed to be turned out if he dare dispute the executive pleasure. I am opposed to extending executive power. I am for restraining it within its appropriate limits, and those that have denounced so much the abuse to which it is susceptible now, have the opportunity in our state government of restricting its range; an opportunity which, if they be consistent, they will not fail to improve. Why give to the legislature the preference of electing the secretary of state, in place of the people? Are not the people the true sources of all power, and if they are competent to elect the governor, why are they incompetent to elect the secretary of state? When the question of electing the judiciary comes up, I anticipate great opposition, because from the nature of the judicial functions some arguments may be given for continuing something like our present system; but it is evident that there is not that dissimilarity between the functions of governor and secretary of state that there is between the governor and members of the judiciary; and that the same arguments will not, therefore, apply with the case of the secretary of state. Where is the necessity for extending the power of the governor over the secretary of state, and making the latter the mere echo of the former—the blind and passive instrument of executive will? The abuses of executive patronage, as I have before said, has been a theme of declamation for both political parties—the meanness, sycophancy and servility of office seekers, has been held up as a national reproach; and, we have been told, that all the evils which it engenders, should be arrested. How better can we arrest them, than by laying the axe to the root of the evil. It is said that, perhaps, the secretary of state who may be elected by the people, may be of opposite political opinions from the governor? If this should happen, so far from being any objection to the system, it is an advantage, for no one can keep as sharp a look out as a political adversary; and if such an one is secretary of state to a governor of opposite political opinions, he is sure to be a most efficient check upon the executive department, if there be the slightest tendency to abuse or to stretch its powers. The governor, let him be elected by this or that party, should be the governor of the State, and not the governor of a party. I admire the response attributed to Mr. Polk, that he was the president of the people, and not the president of a party. The governor whose motives and rule of conduct are right, has nothing to fear from the juxta-position of a secretary of state who may entertain different political opinions, or who may not be his bosom friend and associate. Mr. R. concluded by hoping that the section would be adopted, and that the people would have the same privilege of electing the secretary of state as they had of electing the governor.

Mr. Leonard was not opposed to the principle of electing the secretary of state by the poople, but he thought that inasmuch as the secretary of state was by law required to keep a register of the doings and proceedings of the executive department, the governor should have the right to inspect at will these records for the purpose of seeing that they were faithfully kept; and that as the secretary of state was bound to exhibit to the legislature when called upon, these records, he should be bound to exhibit them to the governor when required so to do.

Mr. Miles Taylor said, that before the question was taken, he would beg leave to submit his views. He had not anticipated that the question would have come up today, but his opinions had long since been formed. Although he was opposed to the election of judicial officers by the people, the objections that operated upon his mind in reference to the judiciary, had no application to the election of other officers. The present office was one that he conceived might, with great propriety, be filled by the popular suffrages. He was adverse to the appointment of the secretary of state by the governor. That officer should not be the creature of the governor, nor dependant upon him for his continuance in office. He should be independent of the executive. His duties bore but a slight relation to those of the governor. The intimate relations with the governor, attributed in this debate to the secretary of state, were held by the private secretary, rather than by the secretary of state. As he (Mr. Taylor) understood the details, the simple duty of the secretary of state as related to the executive department, was, to keep the records. The secretary of state had but few duties imposed on him by law, and some of these had never, within his knowledge, been discharged in a manner satisfactory to the public. He referred to the duties that devolved upon him as superintendent of the public schools: these duties were more important than all the others that had devolved upon him, and no secretary of state had ever discharged them as could have been desired. He recollected the promise that had been made in one of the reports upon that subject, by an incumbent of the office—a promise that had never been fulfilled, either by that incumbent, or any of his successors in office. There appeared to have been great neglect. No suggestions had been made, nor nothing accomplished in relation to our common schools. These duties were the most important assigned to that officer. The election of the secretary of state by the people, would involve a direct responsibility; his official conduct would be scrutinized, and if approved of, he would be re-elected. This would secure an effective action upon the most important duty that is assigned to him—that of superintending public education.

So far as any intimacy is concerned between the governor and the secretary of of state, it is, as an argument, of very trivial importance. The governor, if in doubt, may consult the attorney general. He is the appropriate law officer of the State. He may consult any private citizen at all times, and have the benefit of his experience and of his counsels. He may likewise ask information from all the officers of the government—the most extended sources of intelligence is before him, and there is no necessity for his having the secretary of state as an especial cabinet adviser.

Mr. Roselius said, that he could not agree with the member that had just addressed the Convention, as to the extent of the executive power. It was perfectly clear that one individual could not wield that immense power alone! Is it fair, just or proper to make the governor responsible for the acts of agents with whom he had nothing to do, and over whom he had no control? By what means and through whose agency does he exercise the executive power with which he is invested? It was through the medium—the agency of officers that were subordinate to him. These officers are numerous. First was the secretary of state, without whom the governor could scarcely perform a single act. It was that officer that countersigned every commission. It is unnecessary to refer to all the other officers through whom the executive acts. The attorney general is placed in the same category as the secretary of state. Let members but reflect upon the consequences of the doctrine that is here broached. The chief magistrate is responsible to the people for the manner in which the executive trust is administered, and is it right that he should be debarred any control over the instruments through whom he exercises the powers conferred upon him. As for making the subordinate officers of the executive department mere creatures of the will of the governor, I repudiate the idea; but I consider that this is one question, and the mode of appointment is another question. The secretary of state ought certainly to be independent of any servility to the governor, but at the same time the governor should not be placed in a servile attitude towards the secretary of state. Suppose that the secretary of state chooses to arrogate to himself, that the governor shall not examine the archieves, that he shall have no control over them, would not that be an absurd and extravagant idea, and inconsistent with the supervision which the governor is presumed not only to exercise over his own immediate department, but over every other officer of the State, to see that the laws are carried into effect? There is but one step further to go beyond the undoubted prerogatives of the governor, and that is to dispense with the office altogether. If you take away the executive power without lodging it somewhere else, it must be merged into the two other departments—for the first section of the first article of the constitution prescribes that the powers of the government of the State shall be divided into three distinct departments. If the intention be not to abolish the office of governor or to make him a mere automaton, is it just, right and proper to devolve the responsibility upon him for the manner in which the laws are carried out, if he have no voice in the selection of proper officers to enforce those laws? What idea have gentlemen of the executive power when they advocate such notions? What is the executive power designed for, if it be not to see that the laws are faithfully executed? One branch of that duty is to enter our courts of judicature, and to see that these laws are properly administered, and that portion of the executive duty is assigned to the attorney general. Another branch is to enforce the revenue laws, although assigned to a particular officer; but all acting under the general supervision of the governor. Any other view of the subject is utopian.

As for the argument assumed by the delegate that last addressed the house, that the secretary of state is the superintendant of public schools, or as the gentleman chose to denominate it, the common schools, I confidently believe, said Mr. Roselius, that the subject of education would be consulted by the appointment of a separate officer. This portion of the duty assigned to the secretary of state is by no means incidental to the office, no more than to any other office of the State. To be properly discharged, it will take up the time and the energies of one distinct officer, with some assistants. Why, sir, in this city alone, two individuals are employed exclusively in superintending the public schools in two municipalities alone; and they are men of exalted abilities and long experience. I trust that a clause will be introduced in the constitution for the establishment of a general system of public education, which shall pervade the whole State, and that a special office will be created for the superintendence of public schools, to watch over and to direct the proper application of funds destined for the support of these schools. I do not presume that one individual would suffice to the administration of that department throughout its details, but in the carrying out of the principles, he might avail himself of the assistance of subordinates.

Mr. Mayo said, that inasmuch as reference had been made to the subject of education, he would state for the information of members, that the committee appointed upon that subject, would shortly make a report, recommending the creation of the office of superintendent general of public schools.

Mr. Culbertson: I am not in favor of the proposition of the delegate (Mr. Peets) but will vote in favor of the proviso of the member from Caddo (Mr. Porter.)

The question was taken on the proposition of Mr. Peets, and the yeas and nays were called for.

Messrs. Brent, Brumfield, Carriere, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Humble, McCallop, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill, and Wederstrandt—26 yeas; and

Messrs. Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Cenas, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Grymes, Hudspeth, Hynson, King, Labauve, Legendre, Leonard, Marigny, Mazureau, Prescott of St Landry, Preston, Roman, Roselius, St Amand, Sellers, Taylor of St Landry, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Wikoff, and Winchester—30 nays; consequently the substitute was lost.

Mr. Porter then submitted the following substitute, for the whole section, viz:

"A secretary of state shall be appointed by joint vote of the general assembly, and commissioned during the term of four years; he shall keep a register of all the official acts and proceedings of the governor, and shall when required lay the same and papers, minutes and official vouchers relative thereto, before the general assembly, and shall perform such other duties as shall be enjoined by law."

Mr. Miles Taylor said that this was the worst mode of appointment that could be devised. It never could receive his sanction. The people were, in the mass, free from corruption. The legislative body was small, and there was some reason to apprehend that there might be trick and management. He went heart in hand for the election by the people, but he would not assign it to the legislature. He infinitely preferred the responsibility devolving upon the chief magistrate, to make a suitable appointment.

Mr. Wadsworth conceived that the gentleman (Mr. Taylor) had placed his objection upon improper grounds. His remarks cast an unfair reflection. If I were disposed to sustain the section, I would vote for an amendment to it, that no member of the legislature should be eligible to the office of secretary of state. But to suppose that the legislature are corrupt, and would be influenced by trick and management, was casting a reflection, not only undeserved, but out of place. I do not see any reason why the power to elect that officer should not reside as well in the legislature as in the people. The legislature represented the will of the people; its members were honorable and high minded men, selected for their intelligence and integrity, by their fellow-citizens.

I do not see the necessity suggested by the member from New Orleans, for a separateofficer to superintend the public schools; but if such were necessary, I think it would be much better to appropriate $2500 for that officer than to continue to appropriate it to the inspector and adjutant general, whose duties might well enough be dispensed with. We would do much better to have an officer to inspect the children throughout the State, and to see that they were properly educated. The secretary of state was as proper an officer to do that duty as any one else. The office at present was a sinecure, and the incumbent would no doubt be as competent to the discharge of the duties under the appointment of the legislature, as he would be under the appointment of the governor.

Mr. Downs said he was in favor of electing the secretary of state by the people, without intending to cast any reflections on the legislature, which, if he did, would be casting a reflection on himself as a member of that body. It was seven years since he entered the legislature, and he concurred with the delegate from Lafourche, that the elections by the legislature were the most uncertain and least satisfactory of all the other modes. It was infinitely better that the executive or the people should appoint. The people would do right, and the executive was held to a strict accountability. But where the appointment was divided among one hundred men, it was considerably lessened, and no one felt, perhaps, the proper weight of his single ballot. He would therefore vote against the proposition, because he conceived it to be inexpedient.

Mr. Taylor said that the gentleman from Plaquemines had misunderstood him. He intended to say that a large body like the people, were not susceptible of corruption; whereas, in a small constituency, as the legislature, a bad selection was more likely to be made.

Mr. Ratliff concurred in opinion with the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) that, for local offices, the legislature were not the proper source of appointments; but for officers whose functions embraced the whole state, he thought the legislature well fitted to make these selections, and in support of that opinion, he referred to the experience we have had in that peculiar mode of appointment for the state treasurer. No State in the Union had invariably possessed the same quantity of talent and integrity that were so conspicuous in every individual that has held that office in Louisiana, since the formation of the old constitution.

Mr. Porter said he would offer one or two words in support of the proposition submitted by him. The subject had occupied much of his attention, and he was convinced that there was nothing obnoxious in the legislature selecting the secretary of state. In the State of New York, the principal officers, such as the attorney general, the surveyor general, &c. &c., were elected by the legislature. Fifteen States in the Union elected their secretary of state in that way, and there were but three States where the appointment was made by the governor, viz: Louisiana, Kentucky and Delaware.

The yeas and nays being called for on the adoption of said substitute, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Culbertson, McCallop, Peets, Porter, Ratliff and Waddill voted in favor of said substitute; and

Messrs. Boudousquié, Bourg, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Carriere, Cénas, Conrad of New Orleans, Covillion, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Grymes, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Labauve, Legendre, Leonard, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Penn, Porche, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St.Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Read, Roman, Roselius, St.Amand, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winchester voted against the adoption of said substitute—49 nays; the same was lost.

Mr. Roman moved to amend said section, by inserting after the word "shall" the words "be nominated and appointed by the governor with the advice and consent of the senate," which amendment was adopted.

On motion, the section as amended was adopted, viz:

Sec. 12. A secretary of state shall be nominated and appointed by the governor, with the advice and consent of the senate, and commissioned to hold his office during the term for which the governor shall have been elected. The records of the State shall be kept and preserved in the office of the secretary. He shall keep a fair register of the official acts of the governor, and when necessary, shall attest them. He shall, when required, lay the said register and all papers, minutes and vouchers relative to his office, before either house of the general assembly, and shall perform such other duties as may be enjoined on him by law.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

Tuesday, February 25, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. Stanton.

Mr. Mayo said this was the day fixed on for a reconsideration of the 3d section of the executive department. But seeing such a thin house he moved the same be laid over until Tuesday next; which was agreed to.

Mr. Saunders gave notice that on some future day, when this house is full, he will move for a reconsideration of the vote given yesterday on the subject of making the secretary of state an elective office by the people. There are in this Convention, Mr. President, two parties of those who call themselves democrats: the one in favor of making all offices elective by the people, the other who seem disposed to retain the appointing power as now practised.

Mr. Saunders was of opinion that the middle path was the better one, and among those offices which he considered ought to be left to the choice of the people is that of secretary of state. It is one of the most important offices in the State, and he thinks that, the people would be pretty sure to make a wiser and better selection than either the members of the legislature or the governor.

Mr. Scott of Baton Rouge sent up to the president the report made in 1844 by the secretary of state, on public education, and moved that it be printed for the use of the committee (appointed by this Convention) on education. The motion was adopted.

Mr. Eustis submitted a report from the committee of revisal on the 2d section of article 1. It read as follows:

"Article 1st, as reported by the committee of revisal, section 2d. No one of these departments, nor any person holding office in any one of them shall exercise power properly belonging to either of the others, except in the instances hereinafter expressly directed or permitted."

Mr. Eustis remarked that it was presented in a different form, and hoped it would be approved; but should the Convention see fit not to adopt, it would only remain for the committee to try it again.

Mr. Downs moved that it be printed for the use of the Convention. Agreed to.

Special Order of the Day.—Mr. O'Bryan's resolution offered yesterday now came up for consideration. It reads thus:

"Resolved, That from and after the 15th day of March next, the Convention will grant no leave of absence to any member, except in case of sickness of the member or some one of his family."

Mr. Beatty moved to strike out 15th March, and insert 25th February, which was agreed to.

Mr. Ratliff hoped the Convention would reject the resolution. It is a well known fact that there are here, thirty-one members against their will. He (Mr. Ratliff) does not wish to draw any invidious comparisons between city and country members. The city members could easily attend the sittings of this body, and attend to their own affairs also during the recess, without inconvenience, but they must not suppose that country members had nothing to do in their own affairs. They protested against being obliged to hold their sittings in New Orleans; they desired to remain at Jackson. It would therefore be very hard if they were compelled to remain here all the time, without the privilege, if their affairs required it, of getting leave of absence for a few days at a time. Nobody pretends to say that country members have abused this privilege; that is not pretended. By what right do you attempt to exercise such a high-handed movement? Do you find any authority for it, either in the national or State constitution? But suppose we pass the resolution, what effect can it have on those thirty-one members who are here protesting against your right to bring them here? Would it be right, were they absent for a few days at a time without leave, which this resolution says shall not be granted, to have them held up to the gaze of the world as derelictive of their duty? No, sir, such injustice cannot prevail. We have no right to deprive any member of his per diem, if this motion shall prevail; and I have no hesitation in saying that I would never refuse, as chairman of the committee on contingent expenses, to sign the warrants of the members you seek to ostracise. He (Mr. Ratliff) is sorry to find some of the members disposed to be so arbitrary. But, sir, I warn this house in time, they may remove me from the committee if they will, but so long as I am chairman of the committee on contingents I shall, with the statutes in my hand, totally disregard what I conceive so illegal a measure.

Mr. Beatty moved the adoption of the resolution. It is very clear that every body gets leave of absence whenever he asks for it, and if Mr. Ratliff has the right to act as he pleases on the decision of the Convention, why then every body has the same right. Mr. Beatty thinks no member is entitled to his per diem, who does not attend to the duties of the office; and moreover, he does not hesitate one moment to say that he would instantly ask the president of any committee to be dismissed from said committee, who should disregard the expressed will of the Convention. The question is, have we the power to pass this resolution? Clearly. Then those who resist its will must take the consequences.

Once passed, we shall hear no more of the pecuniary wrong we are inflicting on members. We shall find that members will prefer remaining at their posts to losing their salaries. Experience has shown that we can't get along as we have been acting; we are frequently kept waiting for the want of a quorum, and the house is scarcely ever with more than two-thirds of its members. But once stop the $4 a day, and we shall soon see a change. He (Mr. Beatty) has business in the country himself, but he is never absent when the roll is called. Why can't other members do as he does, get some one else to attend to it in his absence.

He (Mr. Beatty) sees no force in Mr. Ratliff's allusion to his and thirty others being in New Orleans instead of Jackson, against their will. He (Mr. Beatty) voted in Jackson to adjourn to New Orleans, but that is no reason why a change of location for our sittings should effect a question of right. He further presses the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. Conrad will vote against the resolution, because he cannot possibly imagine that it will be productive of any good. The discussion of the resolution has already cost as much as it would cost to discuss an important measure. The loss of their per diem is not at all likely to keep those at their posts who have no nobler feelings to animate them. Besides, it is not at all likely that any member of the body absents himself for the mere pleasure of it, and we are therefore bound to conclude that nothing but urgent necessity could induce him to absent himself. At any rate, the evil cannot be remedied by the proposed resolution, and he shall oppose it.

Mr. Downs takes the same view of the matter as Mr. Beatty, and therefore will vote for the resolution. The absence of members has become a serious inconvenience, and there cannot be a doubt but that on many important questions we do not get the popular vote. He does not pretend to deny that gentlemen may have good and weighty reasons for absenting themselves; reasons they are compelled to regard, and therefore he cannot undertake to find fault with that which he might be compelled to do himself, but then he desires every one who does so, to take the responsibility of going from necessity or from choice. There are now twelve members, he believes, absent on leave. The Convention render themselves thereby responsible for such absence; this he wants corrected. Let them go without the consent of this body, and then the responsibility rests on their own shoulders.

It is a bad habit which we have copied from the legislature, of which we ought to break ourselves. It is not the practice in any other State; and in Congress such a thing is unknown. A well informed gentleman the other day remarked to him (Mr. Downs) that it was then a matter of great surprise to find so much of the proceedings of the legislature filled up with discussions on leaves of absence. He (Mr. Downs) will then be glad to see the resolution pass, but should it fail, he will feel it his duty to call for the yeas and nays on every question of leave of absence, so that the responsibility may fall where it belongs.

Mr. W. B. Scott did not think any allusion to the proceedings in Congress was pertinent to the question now before this Convention, because it was a notorious fact that there was no legislative body in the country where more time was frittered away than there; and, said Mr. Scott, I know of several cases in this Convention where a temporary absence is absolutely indispensable; and believing as I do, that no member of this body will absent himself without some strong reason for doing so, I shall oppose the resolution.

Mr. Downs replied that he did not desire to cast censure on any one, and all he asked, without enquiring into the motives which compelled members to absent themselves, was that they should take the responsibility.

Mr. Taylor is of opinion that the resolution as it stands, will be perfectly useless. He says there are one-tenth of the members who answer to their names and then are very seldom seen afterwards in the hall; one goes about his business here, another there, and unless we call them strictly to account this resolution will not do any good.

The question was then put on Mr. O'Bryan's resolution, amended by Mr. Beatty, and resulted as follows:

Yeas—Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Brent, Brumfield, Carriere, Chambliss, Claiborne, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prudhomme, Roman, Roselius, Saunders, Sellers, Trist, Voorhies and Wederstrandt—28.

Nays—Messrs. Bourg, Briant, Burton, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Penn, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Ratliff, Read, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Waddill, Wikoff and Winder—31. So the resolution was lost.

The Convention then proceeded to the order of the day.

ARTICLE THIRD, AS REPORTED BY THE MAJORITY.

Constitution of 1812, section 9. He shall nominate and appoint, with the advice and consent of the senate, judges, sheriffs, and all other officers whose offices are established by this constitution, and whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for: Provided, however, that the legislature shall have a right to prescribe the mode of appointment to all offices to be established by law.

Mr. Humble moved to amend the section by striking out the words "judges, sheriffs, and others."

Mr. Dunn moved a division of the question, and the vote be first taken on striking out the word "judges."

Mr. Penn called for the yeas and nays, but gave way to

Mr. Downs, who remarked that although he would most probably vote for striking out the word "judges" from the section, he was not prepared to say he should go for that measure, when we were further progressed with the constitution, and came to discuss the judiciary system. He was rather disposed to believe that the time for so great a change as contemplated—an elective judiciary—has not yet arrived, and that it will not work well now. At some future period the change may be productive of good. At any rate he shall reserve his final action on the matter, till he hears the question discussed on both sides.

Mr. Marigny is determinedly opposed to any change in the section, which it will be observed is the section verbatim of the one in the constitution of 1812. That section gives the power to the governor of nominating judges, by and with the advice and consent of the senate; and therefore it is a power that behooves us to study, whether properly given or not; and it is a question we ought not to run headlong against in the heat of our feelings.

In the first place we should consider well what we have already done to increase popular rights. We have established universal suffrage; and we have removed the property qualification, (heretofore considered a disability unless possessed by the citizen,) as a requisite for eligibility to the office of governor. Of this augmentation to popular rights and privileges, he, (Mr. Marigny,) does not complain; on the contrary, he thinks we have acted wisely for the benefit of the people as a whole, and in accordance with the liberal spirit of the age. But in approaching the judiciary, he thinks we ought to take into consideration that we are approaching an interest which should claim our serious attention; actuated, as we doubtless all are, by a spirit of justice, and with a determination to deprive no one of his just rights, we cannot forget that it is our duty to protect every citizen in all his just rights and his property, is a vital and important principle. The tranquility of the State materially depends upon our action on this subject; and we cannot do better, nor can we show more wisdom, in any of the deliberations of this Convention, on this question. The more guarantees you offer, and the more safeguards you throw around the judiciary department to make it completely independent of the popular will, (or caprice if you will,) the more you will show that you are actuated by a wise and honorable spirit. What becomes of the independence of a judge, where his election depends on popular will? Suppose you were now to say that the judges of the supreme court should be elected by the people. Is it not too probable that some favorite political partizan would be raised to the office, in lieu of a man of great legal attainments and moral worth? And then, what is the consequence? Why, instead of having on the bench a man who feels the sanctity of his oath, and is properly impressed with feelings of duty, as would be the case were he nominated by the governor and confirmed by the senate, who are always the conservative body, that protects the rights of the minority, and who feel their responsibility. We should have a man on that hitherto dignified bench, who would suffer his judgment to be scourged by his politics, and the passing popular feeling of the hour. Let us follow up the question, and ask what would be the result of having a district judge elected by the people? He decided all civil and criminal matters—and will it not be dangerous to the rights of a community, if the election of district judges, is left to the will of a majority of the people; a judge who has the destiny in his hand over the liberty, even the life of an individual, who it might happen would be a very popular man, and however guilty, may, nevertheless, by his popularity place the judge in a position of awful responsibility. I am sure you will see at once the position a judge may thus be placed in—between a conscientious discharge of his duty and his desire to lean to the side of friendship and spare the feelings of the numerous friends of the offender to the law. Let us then preserve the bench, independent of such influences, or justice will take her departure from amongst us.

It is a matter well known to you all, that no man but of the highest respectability and character, and one who is well known to the executive, has ever yet been nominated to the office of parish judge, and that he is afterwards looked up to as a kind of father in his parish.

Well, change their position, take away from them their independence, and what follows? Make them dependent on the voices of the people, and the result, it takes no prophet to foretell; they will daily be thrown in contact with wily lawyers, who are alone seeking popularity themselves, and will so pervert the decisions of a judge, if he decides against them, as to render the judge unpopular to his clients and their friends; and thus he, the judge, will be compelled to give an unjust decision or lose his place.

He (Mr. Marigny) makes these remarks in no invidious sense to either lawyers or politicians. His only object is to show the ordinary feelings which operate on the human heart, and thereby to convince the Convention of the truth of the position he advances.

We are told that the office of parish judge can, with benefit to the State, be abolished, and merged into the office of district judge. He thinks this would tend to injurious consequences. From the Balize to the uppermost parts of the State, men can be found sufficiently skilled to perform the simple duties of a parish judge, who would be totally incapable of performing those of a district judge.

On the subject of sheriffs, I have a few words to say, said Mr. Marigny. What is their duty? One of their duties is, to become conservator of the public money; and to whom, if not appointed by the governor, are they accountable? Would it be their duty to account to the people? It would really be droll to see how they would go about it. A popular sheriff might readily pocket a portion of the public money, and if he only had the talent of keeping in with his supporters and friends, by the means of some snug parties, &c., he would be re-elected sheriff despite his defalcation.

The more he (Mr. Marigny) reflects on this subject, the more he has become convinced that it would be truly the greatest misfortune that could possibly befall Louisiana, if she were to establish an elective judiciary. Those who feel disposed to question his democratic principles and call him a federalist, or any other name they please, may do so; but he unhesitatingly says, that he will never give his consent to such an abuse of power, as we are called upon to consummate.

He would be glad that, while we fixed the judiciary department on a firm and independent footing, some limitation should be made as to the tenure of office; and also that speedier means may be found to bring a delinquent magistrate or judge to account, without having to go through the tedious and difficult process of impeachment. And when the question comes up, in discussing the judiciary department, he will make some suggestions on those subjects. In the mean time, he hopes Mr. Humble's motion will not prevail.

Mr. Brent said he should vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Ouachita, (Mr. Humble) for two reasons; the first was, because he was opposed to giving the executive any power whatever over the judiciary; and second, because this was not the moment nor the proper time to discuss in what form or manner judges should be appointed or chosen. The striking out, as proposed by Mr. Humble, does not, in his opinion, touch that question. It is simply to define the powers of the governor over the constitutional officers of the State, and he hopes the questions will not now be confounded.

The question was then put on the amendment offered by Mr. Humble, and amended by Mr. Dunn, to strike out the word "judges," and resulted as follows, viz:

Messrs. Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Leonard, Mc-Callop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, W. B. Prescott, W. M. Prescott, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, W. B. Scott, Stephens, Trist, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill and Wederstrandt—30 yeas.

Messrs. Bourg, Briant, Cénas, Claiborne, C. M. Conrad, F. B. Conrad, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, T. W. Scott, Sellers, R. Taylor, Voorhies, Wikoff and Winder—28 nays.

So the question being carried, the word "judges" was stricken out. Messrs. Miles Taylor and W. M. Prescott, while the vote was being taken, declared themselves unfavorable to an elective judiciary.

The question was then put on striking out the word "sheriffs," and resulted as follows:

Messrs. Bourg, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, C. M. Conrad, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Ledoux, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, W. B. Prescott, W. M. Prescott, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, W. B. Scott, T. W. Scott, Sellers, Stephens, M. Taylor, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder—43 yeas.

Messrs. Cénas, Claiborne, F. B. Conrad, Eustis, Hudspeth, King, Labauve, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand and Taylor—14 nays.

So the word "sheriffs was stricken out of the section.

Mr. Conrad moved to strike out the word "of" in the 56th line, and insert the word "to."

Mr. Taylor moved to amend, by striking out from the 54th line, the words "provided however that," and to insert at the end of the 57th line "provided they shall not be elected by the general assembly, or by either of the two houses."

Mr. Conrad moved to amend the amendment of Mr. Taylor, by striking out the word "they" after the word "provided," and insert the words "the said officers," which amendment was accepted by Mr. Taylor; but

Mr. Porter moved to lay the original provision and all the amendments on the table, which motion was seconded by Mr. Kenner.

Mr. Taylor insisted on his amendment. He thought it would be impossible to perfect the constitution, without giving the legislature some power to fill those offices which are not and could not be inserted in that instrument; such, for instance, as bank directors, and many others; which, nevertheless, it is just as necessary to vest the power somewhere, to fill. At the same time, while giving them the power to create the offices, he thought it but right to prevent them from having the power of selecting those who should fill them, believing that power properly belonged to the executive.

Mr. Conrad thinks that even if Mr. Taylor's amendment be rejected, that the original proviso is correct and necessary—otherwise we shall arrive at the very point we are so desirous of avoiding, viz: that offices of a purely local character, should not devolve upon the governor, and since he has reflected on the subject he will vote against Mr. Taylor's amendment.

Mr. Porter insists, that the proviso contended for by Mr. Conrad, is in the power of ordinary legislation, and if the principle contended for prevail, the offices taken away from the control of the people necessarily fall back upon the nominating power of the governor; and he (Mr. P.) is totally opposed to this one man power.

Mr. Taylor could not see the application of the gentleman's remarks to the question before us; because the section as it stands, gives the power to the governor to appoint all the officers under the constitution—that is, the governor and senate. And suppose the legislature were to create new offices under their constitutional power to do so—why, unless such cases are specially provided for, it is clear the governor has the power of appointing all such officers. He cannot therefore see where his proviso clashes with any general principle.

The question was then put on Mr. Porter's motion to lay the whole matter with the amendments, on the table, and lost.

The question then recurred on Mr. Taylor's amendment. Before however it was put, Mr. Read sent up a substitute for Mr. Taylor's amendment to the following effect: "That all officers created by the legislature, shall be elected by the people."

Mr. Saunders, temporarily in the chair, decided that Mr. Read's substitute was not in order.

The question then recurred on Mr. Taylor's amendment, which on being put it was lost.

Mr. Read again offered his substitute as an amendment, but after a few moments reflection, withdrew it.

The section as amended was then adopted as follows:

Sec. 9. Constitution 1812. "He shall nominate and appoint, with the advice and consent of the senate, all officers, whose offices are established by this constitution, and whose appointments are not otherwise provided for; provided, however, the legislature shall have the right to prescribe the mode of appointment to all other offices to be established by law."

Sec. 10, of the constitution of 1812, was then taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 10. "The governor shall have the power to fill up vacancies that may happen during the recess of the legislature, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of the next session."

The Convention then took up section 12, of the constitution of 1812, viz:

Sec. 12. "He may require information in writing from the officers in the executive department, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices."

After which, the 13th section of constitution 1812 was adopted, viz:

Sec. 13. "He shall from time to time give the general assembly information respecting the situation of the State, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he may deem expedient."

The 14th section, constitution of 1812, was then read by the secretary, viz:

Sec. 14. "He may on extraordinary occasions convene the general assembly at the seat of government, or at a different place if that should become dangerous from an enemy, or from contagious disorders; and in case of disagreement between the two houses with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he may think proper, not exceeding four months."

Mr. Porter moved to amend by inserting after the word "assembly," in the second line, the words "or continue their sessions for a period not exceeding thirty days." He enforced his amendment by this remark, that it would be productive of of great expense to call the legislature together after a period of four months, when the business might be accomplished at once with a comparatively trifling expense.

The question being put on Mr. Porter's amendment, it was lost, and then the section was adopted.

Sec. 15, constitution of 1812, was then adopted as follows:

"He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

The next section called up was section 20, constitution of 1812, and is as follows:

Sec. 20. "Every bill which shall have passed both houses, shall be presented to the governor; if he approve, he shall sign it; if not, he shall return it with his objections, to the house in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their journal, and proceed to reconsider it; if after such reconsideration, two-thirds of all the members elected to that house shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of all the members elected to that house, it shall be a law; but in such cases, the votes of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the members voting for or against the bill, shall be entered on the journal of each house respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the governor within ten days (Sundays excepted,) after it shall have been presented to him, it shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the general assembly, by their adjournment, prevent its return, in which case it shall become a law, unless sent back within three days after their next sitting."

Mr. Mayo moved to amend the section by striking out "two-thirds" in the 9th line, and inserting the words "a majority." He thinks in making the amendment he is right, for, after a bill has been returned to the legislature with the reasons assigned by the governor for his veto, he thinks it would take a very large majority in the first instance to carry it over his head. He does not think the legislature would be hasty, but would weigh well the objections of the governor, before they concluded to adopt it in such a case.

Mr. Downs is constrained by a sense of duty to oppose this amendment; and his experience in the subject, makes him unwillingly trespass on the house for a few minutes. Up to this time he has yet to learn that the veto power has ever brought on the country, either in the general government or in this State any disastrous results. True it is when the executive interposes the veto power, great dissatisfaction, and sometimes popular indignation follows it, but when people get calmed down, and begin to reflect on it—the exercise of that privilege has most generally been found to have resulted beneficially to the real interests of the people. He will only cite one case, which came under his own observation. The governor saw fit to veto a bill passed by the general assembly, which however, they passed over his head, by the constitutional majority, but it was not long before they found out their error. He admits that he himself was amongst them in error. This veto of the governor was the first check on the wild spirit of internal improvements, and happy for the State would it have been had it been sustained. We should have saved $500,000, together with all the interest which has been paid on it ever since.

It is not argued, I presume, said Mr. Downs, that the executive should lend too attentive an ear to any local measure, and thereby interest his feelings in its success; and how often do we see these local matters and feelings absorb legislative action.

The veto power, if to be sustained at all, should be kept, just as it is; it is the greatest check that can possibly be put on partial or hasty systems of legislation; and these systems have already cost us too much in our prodigal course of expenditure.

He, Mr. D. would add more on this subject did he conceive it necessary; but he feels so confident that a very large majority of this Convention agree with him in opinion, that he will no longer trespass on their time.

Mr. CONRAD moved to lay Mr. Mayo's amendment indefinitely on the table.

Mr. MAYO then withdrew the amendment he had offered, remarking at the same time, he did not expect it would excite so much debate. But, he desired now to renew his motion in another form, and therefore moved to insert three-fifths in lieu of a majority, heretofore proposed by him. Surely, said he, in exacting two-thirds of all the members elected, they ask more than is ordinarily in attendance in the two bodies.

Mr. TAYLOR, in answer to this new proposition, stated a fact that had come under his observation, and tends to show the propriety and wisdom of the remarks of Mr. Downs, in regard to the veto power. It was this: an act was passed, authorizing and directing the emission of State bonds, to the amount of five millions of dollars, for the benefit of a certain banking establishment in this city—but the governor returned it, with his objections. Notwithstanding the veto of the governor, it lacked but one vote of becoming a law; and had the required number been only three-fifths, it would have become a law, and we should have been involved in five millions more of State debts than we now are.

The question was then put on laying Mr. Mayo's amendment on the table indefinitely and carried.

Mr. MAYO then proposed another amendment, which was to strike out the words "unless sent back within three days after their next meeting," and insert in lieu thereof, "in which case it shall not be a law;" for the case might happen, that if not sent back precisely within three days, it might be considered as overlooked, and thereby certain supercheries of the governor's would reap the benefit.

Mr. ROSELIUS regrets to hear any gentleman on this floor advance an idea so derogatory to the character of a chief magistrate, whom at least we should not think capable of turning traitor to the interests of the State without some strong reasons.

Mr. CONRAD thinks the text in the federal constitution is precisely similar to that in the sections before us, and he has never yet heard of any abuses under it.

Mr. MAYO feels confident that it is not the text, and in support of his position he read from the constitution of the United States: "in such case it shall not be a law."

Mr. TAYLOR agrees as to that provision, but experience has shewn that it was a bad one. It has happened that a bill has been defeated by being withheld. This provision for which we are contending, is to guard against such an abuse of power, and to protect the rights of the people; that is, if the legislature adjourn before the constitutional term.

The amendment was then rejected, and the section was adopted.

The Convention then took up section 21, of constitution 1812. It reads thus:

"Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of both houses may be necessary, except on a question of adjournment, shall be presented to the governor; and before it shall take effect, be approved by him; or being disapproved, shall be re-passed by two-thirds of both houses." Which was adopted.

The Convention also adopted section 22d, of constitution of 1812, viz:

"The free white men of this State shall be armed and disciplined for its defence; but those who belong to religious societies, whose tenets forbid them to carry arms, shall not be compelled to do so, but shall pay an equivalent for personal services."

The Convention also adopted section 23d, of constitution of 1812:

"The militia of this State shall be organized in such manner as may be hereafter deemed most expedient by the legislature."

Mr. CONRAD moved a reconsideration of the 10th section. He remarked, that the provision contemplated in the section was made when we had annual sessions of the legislature. The consequence might be, that if we suffered the phraseology to remain in the section as it is, that the governor would have the power of filling all the vacancies for the period of two years, instead of one, if the office was vacated immediately after the adjournment of the legislature; because, under the constitution he would have no right to call them together more than once in two years. He therefore moved to strike out the word "legislature" and insert "senate." Reconsideration agreed to.

Mr. Downs suggested another amendment, which was accepted by Mr. Conrad, and which was in these words, "unless otherwise provided for in this constitution."

Both amendments were then agreed to, and the section as re-amended, was adopted; it now reads thus:

"Sec. 10. Constitution of 1812. The governor shall have power to fill up vacancies that may happen during the recess of the senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of the next session, unless otherwise provided for in this constitution."

Mr. Ledoux desired to present to the consideration of the Convention, a portion of the minority report made by him on this article of the constitution, when he was at Jackson. It is as follows:

"There shall be appointed by the governor, with the advice and consent of the senate, an auditor of state, whose duty it shall be to examine and approve all accounts before they are paid by the treasurer. He shall assist the legislature in examining the accounts of the treasurer, and perform all other duties which may be required of him by law."

Mr. Ledoux stated that his reasons for presenting this section, were principally, that it would place a more effectual safeguard in protecting the fiscal branch of the government, by far the most important among them, and the one requiring the greatest care. It is more especially to do this, by special appointment, since the legislature is only to meet hereafter every two years. But, said Mr. Ledoux, this is no new question. The office of state auditor is common to most all of the States, at least within his knowledge, and although in the other States that office is appointed by the legislature, still he (Mr. Ledoux) thinks it would be better to make him an officer under the constitution.

Mr. Wadsworth is opposed to the section, because he sees no use whatever in making an office under the constitution which properly belongs to the legislature to make; and under such circumstances, he will oppose the section.

Mr. Claiborne is opposed to it. He does not object to the principle proposed in the section, because he admits it as a wise and salutary provision; the only reason he objects to it is, that he does not desire to multiply offices in the constitution, when the legislature can much better make laws required to carry out such basis as we lay down constitutionally for their government. He (Mr. Claiborne) conceives that the office is a simple one, he only having to audit the accounts of the state treasurer; and it is a fact well established that that officer cannot, without making himself personally responsible, distribute a dollar except under the authority of law, and without proper vouchers to warrant his doing so under the mandates of the laws.

Mr. Roman remarked, that the section now offered to the Convention, was proposed in the committee at Jackson. It was not then entertained by the committee, and he hopes it will not be by the Convention now assembled. The reasons that induce me, (said Mr. Roman) to hope it will not now find favor, are—first, because, in my opinion, it will be placing the public purse in the hands of or at the control of the governor; and the second is, that it will place the treasurer of the state under surveillance and as the creature of the governor. He (Mr. Roman) thinks such a course is uncalled for on the part of the Convention. We have placed guards sufficient around the constitution on this question, and with that we should be satisfied.

Mr. Downs thinks that with all due difference to the opinions of the member from St. James, that such an officer as is called for in the section proposed by the delegate from Point Coupée, is, or will be, much needed. The only question for us to consider, is, shall we make him an officer recognized by the constitution, in other words, an officer under the constitution, or not? For my part, sir, I can safely say that I am not alone in the opinion, that an auditor, to supervise and audit the claims against the State, is one that is much required.

We have heretofore, sir, as now, been peculiarly fortunate in our state treasurers, and their duties have been performed with singular fidelity and ability. To all those gentlemen it affords me much pleasure to render the just dues to which they are so much entitled; but, Mr. President, the duties of the treasurer are largely on the increase, and they will be more and more so when the fiscal affairs of the State become, (as they are bound to do,) more complicated and difficult to manage. The duties required to be performed in the treasury department of this State are incompatible, the one, with the other. First: He is a receiver and collector. Second: His duty is faithfully to keep, and disburse the public money. Third: His duty is to audit the accounts; the most difficult, and important, of all the duties imposed upon him.

The law, it is true, lays down now, the measure of his duty—it says what is to be paid, and what should not be paid. But the law should have gone further; and in the absence of sheriffs, and courts of justice, it should have invested special powers of law in an auditor and protected him in the discharge of his duties in guarding the state treasury as an officer appointed for that purpose: and it should be made his duty to see that every subordinate officer, accountable to the treasury department, promptly rendered an account of his charge. And he (Mr. Downs) cannot but believe, with all the good management, and care, and assiduity, now bestowed by the state treasurer in the duties of his office—that for the want of such an officer as now is asked for, much money is lost.

In the treasury of the United States they have an auditor, treasurer, district attorney, and besides all that they have an officer appointed whose special business it is, to watch steadily, and see that all the revenue laws are strictly enforced. Whether it be the legislature, the proper body to bring this reformation, or whether it rests with us, is the only matter of question. He (Mr. Downs) thinks the offices connected with the state treasury should be divided. They have done so, in other states, without increasing the expenses of the office—and even were it to cost more, the increased revenue from a watchful care over it, would more than make the increased expense, one hundred-fold to the benefit of the State.

In every view then of the case, he cannot but favor the section proposed by the delegate from Point Coupeé, Mr. Ledoux.

Mr. Roman agrees with Mr. Downs, in some of his remarks. He (Mr. Downs) says the question is, shall we do the requisite business to carry out the views of the member from Point Coupeé or shall the legislature do it? That is the question. He (Mr. Roman) thinks the Governor should not do it—for the reasons he has advanced—and therefore thinks we had better discuss the subject when we come to treat of the office of state treasurer.

Mr. Conrad agrees most cordially with Mr. Roman that the time to discuss this question is, when we reach that portion of our work regulating the duties of state treasurer. And with that view he moved to lay the section proposed by Mr. Ledoux on the table, subject to call—which motion was put and carried.

Mr. Downs moved to take up the report of the committee on apportionment:

But the Convention on motion of Mr. W. B. Scott adjourned till to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Wednesday, February 26, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. Clark opened the proceedings by prayer.

On motion, Mr. Covillion was excused from attendance on account of illness.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ARTICLE SECOND OF THE MAJORITY REPORT AS AMENDED.

Sec. 6. Representation shall be equal and uniform in this State, and beyond that, if entitled to any more, in proportion to the population of each, ascertained and calculated according to the principle of representation adopted in the constitution of the United States.

The first representation under this constitution shall continue until after the next United States census in 1850, and shall be as follows:

As soon as may be, after the United States census of 1850 shall have been taken and promulgated, and every ten years thereafter, the number of representatives shall be fixed and apportioned, according to the principles of this section, so as not to be less than seventy nor more than one hundred; and whenever a new parish shall be created, a separate representation shall at the same time be provided for it, which shall continue until the next decimal apportionment.

Mr. Saunders, chairman of the committee to whom was referred the said section, submitted the following report, as a substitute for the same, viz:

Sec. 6. Each parish shall be entitled to representation in proportion to its population, ascertained and calculated according to the principle of representation adopted in the constitution of the United States; Provided, that no parish or city shall ever be entitled to more than one-fifth of the whole number of representatives.

Sec. 7. No new parish shall be created with an extent of territory less than four hundred square miles, nor with a population less than the full representative number required at the time of its creation, to entitle it to a representative; nor shall any parish be so divided as to leave it with a smaller area or population than is above expressed.

Sec. 8. In the year 1846, and every tenth year thereafter, a census shall be made of the population of this State, in such a manner as shall be prescribed by law, for the purpose of ascertaining the number of the federal population in each parish.

Sec. 9. At the first regular session of the legislature after the making of each census, the legislature shall apportion the representation amongst the several parishes on the basis of the federal population, in the manner following, viz: Some number shall be chosen as a representative number, which, when applied in making the apportionment, shall give a number of representatives not less than seventy, nor more than one hundred; the number so chosen shall be taken as a divisor, and each parish shall be entitled to one representative for every time that the divisor shall be found in the dividend formed of its representative population, and to one additional member for every fraction exceeding the one-half of the divisor; and any parish having a federal population less than the whole divisor, but exceeding one-half of it, shall be entitled to one representative; and the legislature shall be incompetent to act on any other subject matter till the apportionment directed by this article shall have been made.

Sec. 10. The first representation under this constitution (ascertained as near as may be in accordance with the above principles,) shall continue until the first apportionment be made by the legislature, and shall be as follows, viz:

Mr. MARIGNY said the consideration of the report of the committee would give rise to great debate—there were twenty-five members not in their seats, and he would therefore propose that the subject be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. SAUNDERS was opposed to this postponement. There was no probability that the house would be fuller on Monday than it was now. The subject was surrounded by difficulties, but nothing was to be gained by putting it off. He hoped the house would not adopt the suggestion to postpone, but would proceed at once to a consideration of the report.

Mr. MARIGNY said his object was to preclude another discussion. If the subject were discussed now, it would be discussed de novo when there was a fuller house.

Mr. CHAS. M. CONRAD: the gentleman's remarks might apply to the propriety of fixing a day for taking the vote, but I can see no necessity for suspending the discussion.

Mr. MARIGNY moved that the whole matter be laid on the table, and made the special order of the day for to-morrow at 12, m., which motion was lost.

Mr. SAUNDERS said, as the chairman of the committee that made the report, it was proper for him to explain why its defence did not properly rest on him. The proposition which he had the honor of submitting, proposed the electoral basis, and on his motion it was referred to the special committee, who were afterwards charged with the examination of various other propositions. Upon that committee there was but one besides himself, perhaps, that was favorable to his proposition. The other members of the committee did not deem the federal basis proper; he was not himself particularly wedded to his own proposition. He admitted that the subject was surrounded with innumerable difficulties. He thought, nevertheless, without being disposed to view with too much partiality his own proposition on account of its paternity, that the principle in the old constitution was the simplest mode, and most in accordance with the democratic principle. He would not discuss the questions involved in the report, but would leave them to those more capable and more competent to do justice to the subject. In reference to that portion of the report that referred to the city, he conceded it was not in exact proportion with her population; but precise equality in the representation for the city was not looked for—was not expected by the city members themselves. The principle was false which assumed that every man, woman and child should be represented. It could not be practically carried out, and was subject to exceptions. The true principle—the principle of the revolution, was that all parts of the country should be heard, not that they should be equally represented. Is it to be presumed that if the colonies could have had a single representative on the floor of the house of commons, that the revolution for independence would have occurred at the period it did? Other causes might and would have contributed to the separation from the mother country, but the leading cause of that event, was not that the colonies were not equally represented, but that they were not heard at all; and that the taxes were imposed without their being heard. The application of the principle, that every man, woman and child should be represented, would be illustrated by supposing that the city had fifty members accorded to it, and the Florda parishes had ten, the balance of the State would for the most part be totally unrepresented. It resulted then, that the principle of representation, based on population, was antagonistical to the principle that all the political portions of the country should be heard. Population should be heard, but the principle should not be carried to the extent that every man, woman and child be represented. By the report, one-fifth of the representation is accorded to the city. I will concede that much, and will for the sake of compromise, even yield up one-sixth. But, I cannot consent that other interests should not be heard, and that the city should monopolize all political power. With these few explanations, he would leave the defence of the report to those with whose opinions it more especially conformed.

Mr. Preston said he had the honor of being a member of the committee and he disagreed entirely with their report. His views upon this subject had been expressed upon another occasion. He would not report them, but would simply state his dissent from the report.

Mr. O'Bryan submitted the following as a substitute to the first section of the report, viz:

"Each parish shall have one representative, and beyond that if entitled to any more in proportion to the number of voters in each; Provided, that no parish or city shall ever have more than one-sixth of the whole number of representatives.

Mr. Taylor raised the question of order.

The President decided said substitute to be out of order.

Mr. O'Bryan then moved to amend said section by striking out the words "its population ascertained and calculated according to the principle of representation adopted in the constitution of the United States."

Mr. Grymes moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Lafayette (Mr. O'Bryan) by striking out the proviso.

Mr. Beatty said the amendment of the gentleman from Lafayette, (Mr. O'Bryan) and the amendment of the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Grymes) would destroy the whole effect of the report of the committee. The committee had bestowed great attention to the difficult subject that was submitted for their consideration, and the result of their investigation was, that the federal basis offered the most equal and most convenient mode of apportioning the State. Whether they were correct or not in that opinion, it was for the house to decide. The solution of the inquiry whether population should be represented would not be difficult, if there were in this State but one species of population. In such a contingency an apportionment in reference solely to numbers might be proper. But the peculiar local circumstance of two populations in the same State—a white population and a slave population—produced inequalities that rendered a basis firmer alone on white population, extremely partial and unequal in its operation. The preponderance of whites over slaves in some of the political divisions of the State, and of slaves over whites in others, were so manifest that the very idea of excluding slaves altogether from entering into the basis, was evidently connected with the grossest injustice; it was tantamount to surrendering all the political power into the hands of the city, where the white population was on the increase and the slave population the decrease. A great portion of the menial labor performed in the country by slaves was performed in the city by white persons; the larger proportion of these white persons were not citizens of the United States, and were for the most part as devoid of interest in the country as our slaves. Is there to be no guarantee for the people of the country in the character of the basis of representation? They possess the greatest proportion of the territery of the State and the preponderance of productive labor. All the arguments that apply to a mixed basis, in which property shall enter as a constituent part, equally apply to the admission of slaves into the basis of our representation, inasmuch as slaves are property; and so far as population is concerned, let gentlemen argue as they will, slaves are legally persons. Laws are made for their protection; for the punishment of crimes committed by them; and defining the relations of master and slave. Is it proper that the proprietors of this species of property should be denied that weight in the councils of the State, to which they are entitled? If you adopt the white basis you give to the city of New Orleans one half of the representation. Some gentlemen appear willing to take that basis, and then restrict the city to one-fifth of the representation. But this would not operate fairly as regards the southern portion of the State; it would be taking from it a portion of its political power and transfering it to the north and west. That would be its inevitable effect, and if there be a doubt upon the subject it will be dissipated by a reference to the sub-report. That if the basis of electors were adopted which gives to the city of New Orleans forty-seven members out of one hundred and eight, and the representation of the city be then reduced to one-fifth of the whole, as is proposed by some members, the effect of it would be greatly to alter the relative strength of the different sections of the State in the house of representatives. That although he desired to see the city limited in her representation, he could not consent to limit her in such manner as to give an ascendancy to to the north-west part of the State to which they were not entitled. That the north-west gained more than any other section of the State in taking the voters as the basis—except the city of New Orleans—it is therefore evident that if this basis be chosen, and we then cut off from the south the representatives which the city gains by that basis, that the relative weight of the different sections would be materially changed, appears from the number of votes polled in 1840, (and the basis of population or of electors, will give about the same result,) that the city of New Orleans will be entitled to forty-seven members out of one hundred and eight, leaving sixty-one to be divided among the balance of the State. If one-fifth be then subtracted from the city, the delegation from the first and second congressional districts will not exceed twenty-seven, while seventy-three will be allowed to the balance of the State. By the federal basis, the first and second districts will be equal in representation to the third and fourth—or if they are not precisely equal, there will not be any great disparity between them.

There is yet another difficulty if the white basis be adopted. It will disfranchise a number of the parishes, unless the number of representatives be placed beyond what has been judged proper or expedient by the committee. Some of the parishes that would be deprived of representation, have been in the enjoyment of that privilege since the formation of the State government. Mr. Beatty instanced the parishes of St. Charles, St. John the Baptist, St. Bernard, &c., &c. Yet they would be disfranchised, or else a representative would have arbitrarily to be allowed them, which would justify the complaint of an attempt to introduce the rotten borough system. The committee judge that such was not the sense of the house from the action it had taken, and the only means of doing justice to these parishes, without the violation of a principle, was the adoption of the federal basis of representation. This was conclusive with many other valid reasons of that preference for the basis.

Having briefly referred to the general features of the report, he would now notice the disposition in the second section, upon the creation of new parishes. This was evidently a wise and necessary provision, as it would prevent majorities in the legislature from distributing the balance of political power by the creation of new parishes that were without a sufficiency of territory or population to justify that creation. It established a permanent rule upon the subject, and together with the provision that no parish should ever have more than one-fifth of the representation; it secured a proper equality between the representation of all the various portions of the State. It justly looked to the future. It was not a temporary enactment; and it was plain it could only refer to the parishes of Orleans and Jefferson; and it was not likely that any of the country parishes would ever swell to a size totally disproportionate with the other parishes. The cities of New Orleans and Jefferson were destined to compose but a single city. If some restrictions were not placed these two parishes would ultimately obtain control of the whole State, either independently by themselves or with the assistance of the adjoining and neighboring parishes, between whom there was an identity of interest and of feeling. That this would be the result, no one can doubt. There were advantages, too, from the concentration of power in the city, as well as the influence exercised over the legislature, so long as the city remained the seat of government; and from the absences, which characterises our legislative sessions, of the country members, which left the country occasionally without its full representation. If the seat of government were taken from the city, it would be the city then that would be exposed to that inconvenience. If the country lost its just weight, said Mr. Beatty, no one is to blame but themselves. It was no less for the true interests of the city than for the country, that she should be possessed of the preponderating control. This was admitted by sensible men, whose interests were confined to the city. The federal basis represented the productive labor of the State. It was a permanent, not a fluctuating and uncertain mode of representation; and in view of the political position of the State, it was recommended by the soundest considerations of good policy. Nothing was farther from his intentions than to act unjustly towards the city; he wished her to have all the weight to which she was entitled, consistent with the interests of the country, and to the permanency of our institutions.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption said he felt it to be his duty to reply to some of the remarks that had fallen from the gentlemen that last addressed the house, (Messrs. Saunders and Beatty.) The first named delegate has said that the true principle was not that numbers should be represented, but that they should be heard; and from that position he has drawn the remarkable conclusion, that if the colony of Massachusetts had had but one delegate on the floor of the house of commons, the American revolution would not have occurred. That the mere privilege of being heard, forsooth, would have removed every just cause of complaint against the mother country, and that no matter how despotic were the measures of the parliament, the colonies could have had no pretext for the revolution, if they had only had the privilege of being heard. I most emphatically (said Mr. Taylor) dissent from and condemn such an opinion.

The delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Beatty) and his colleagues upon the committee who concurred with him in opinion, have not examined the naked question. They have looked at supposed results, and have been frightened by the phantoms conjured up by their own imaginations. They fear the concentration of power in the city; they fear that the country will be trodden down by the multitudes of the city. I am very far from apprehending the consequences which they assume to be inevitable, and for one am not disposed to sacrifice a fundamental principle in representative governments, with the idle hope of remedying an imaginary evil. That representation in the popular branch of the legislature should be apportioned according to numbers, is essential to the existence of republican government. If, from local causes, there should be a preponderance of power in a particular district, the evil, without doubt, should be remedied; but the remedy must not destroy the principle itself. In the present instance, I think that the gentlemen upon the committee have exaggerated the consequences of following out the true principle, and that they have overlooked the peculiar composition of the legislative department. One feature in its organization affords a guarantee against the disasters they anticipate. The committee on the legislative department, in its report, recommends that representation in the senate shall be based in a great degree on territory, and that the city shall elect only one-eighth of the whole number of senators. It is evident, from this fact, that whatever may be the preponderance of the city in the house of representatives, if the principle of equality and uniformity of representation be carried out, that it never can control the destinies of the State. Ample security is given to the country in the constitution of that body. Admit it for one moment, that New Orleans should have the preponderance in the house of representatives, would not the absolute veto of the senate upon every act of that house be a sufficient check against the undue exercise of power on the part of the city? But let us go farther. What would be the consequence of limiting the city in the house of representatives as well as in the senate? It would present the unexampled spectacle of the majority being bound hand and foot, and delivered over to the power of the minority. The rights and interests of the many would be made dependant upon the will of the few.

These gentlemen say the country is in danger from the city. That at no distant day, the city will contain a large majority of the people of the State, and that then it will be in its power to oppress us; and then they would logically jump to the conclusion that we should so arrange representation as to put it in our power to oppress them. "Oh," say gentlemen, "we cannot trust the inhabitants of the city. They will be a majority, and they may oppress us." Indeed! and if we take power into our hands, might we not abuse it and oppress them? If the minority cannot trust the majority, how, I would ask, can the majority trust the minority? I do not hesitate to pronounce the proposition to limit the representation of the city in both branches of the legislature, as monstrous in theory, and to assert, that if adopted, it will lead to the most unhappy consequences. I felt compelled to notice what fell from gentlemen on this subject, though it is not immediately under discussion, and could not well say less on it, though I will not now say more.

Now, said Mr. Taylor, with the permission of the house, I will proceed to examine the question we are called on to decide (the motion of Mr. O'Bryan to strike out federal numbers.) We have already determined who are to be the depositaries of political power. It is to be vested in the white male citizens of the State who have attained the age of twenty-one years. It is the deliberate sense of the Convention, that they, and they only, shall exercise it. And now, after having settled that question, correctly as I think, we are about to decide how the legislative power in the house of representatives shall be distributed among the electors of the different parishes of the State. We have declared, in effect, that all the members of our political community are equal, and that they are entitled to equal weight in our elections.

If this be true—if they are equal—their representation ought to be apportioned among the different parishes according to their respective numbers. But after this solemn declaration, it is proposed to apportion them according to federal numbers. If this rule of apportionment is adopted, the principle of equality among our citizens, is at once violated, and may be said with truth that we > ——"Make the promise to the ear,

> And break it to the hope."

There are three simple bases or modes of apportioning representation. First: with reference to population; second: in proportiom to taxation; and third: according to the number of qualified electors. From our peculiar position, we are precluded from adopting the basis of population. We have amongst us a class of beings, of our own species, who are holden as property; there is another class, free persons of color, who, though they are possessed of personal freedom, do not exercise any political rights. That basis, therefore, in my view, is out of the question.

The next basis—that of taxation—is liable to great objection. The existence of the institution of slavery obliges us to adopt various measures for the purpose of securing that species of property, and preserving it in a proper state of subordination. Our militia system, and that of police patrols, are very burdensome to the white population; and in consequence the principal weight of taxation is thrown on slave property. Whether a proper system of taxtion might not be devised, is not now the question.

The constitution of the United States provides that to the whole number of free persons, shall be added three fifths of all other persons. These persons are slaves, and three-fifths of them would be represented. This would be in fact making the principle of taxation enter into the apportionment of representation; for the only manner in which slaves can have any possible connection with our political system, is in their character of property, which makes them subjects of taxation.

The system of taxation in actual existence in this State, is so arbitrary and unequal, that until it is altogether reformed, very few would be likely to favor this basis. Without attempting, however, any investigation into the advantages or disadvantages of any of these simple bases, I will confine my attention to the one proposed. This, in my opinion, includes within itself all the vices of the two first mentioned bases, without any of their advantages. In the first place, free colored persons would make a part of the representative number. In the next place, foreigners not naturalized would enter into the composition of them; and finally; all to she citizens of other States, who happen to be present in the State at the time the census is taken, would also make a portion of them. Now it happens that nearly all of these three classes of persons, who have no polititical rights, are congregated in New Orleans. Out of a little upwards of 23,000 free colored persons in the State, nearly 20,000 of them are inhabitants of the city. It is the same with foreigners not naturalized.

If taxation upon slaves alone were the basis, it would operate unequally, not only as regards city and country, but in reference to different portions of the country in relation to each other. The number of slaves are not equal in the different political divisions of the State, and where slaves predominated, representation would be greater in proportion than where white persons predominated. No matter in what point of view we examine the results of such a basis, it is eminently unjust and unequal. It embodies, I repeat again, all the vices without any of the benefits of the other modes. There are other considerations growing out of the peculiarity of our situation and of our institutions that should admonish us not to adopt it. If we do adopt it, the consequences will produce, sooner or later, conflict between the city and country. If it be true that slaves are diminishing in the city, the same causes that have contributed to that result will continue to operate, and the inhabitants of the city will not be slow in perceiving that they lose political power in the ratio of the decrease of slaves from among them, and with its consequent increase in other portions of the State, that the element of representation is not white men, but slaves. This will cause a line of demarcation between city and country. The first feeling will be opposition to that species of property that has been employed as a means to deprive them of their political power. The next will be aversion to the cause from whence it originated. These fee ings are natural to the human heart. All history teaches us, that when men are deprived of what they conceive to be a right, they hate the instrument by which it is effected, and if this injustice be persisted in, at no distant day, I will venture to predict, that opposition will ripen into a deadly hostility, and the citizens of New Orleans will be united as one man against the institution which is made use of to produce the inequality.

It would be most impolitic to do any thing to bring about such a state of feeling. We abhor and detest the unwarrantable interference of northern fanatics with our institutions, and we are united to resist their incendiary efforts. Far otherwise will it be, if you disfranchise a portion of the white population, in whom you have said the political power of the State resides, under pretext of depriving the city of New Orleans of her influence; and then transfer that power to the proprietors of your slaves—the city will increase in white population and decrease in slave population, and you will raise up in the city an antagonist interest against that species of property in the country. I apprehend the consequences of such a course, because I am sensible of the danger.

Is there a delegate on this floor that does not perceive that it will transfer the practical cry of abolition from the north to our own soil: to our own capital. There are other reasons why we should preserve an identity of interest and of feeling between the city and the country. Dangers may arise where the aid and assistance of the city may be necessary. Let us not then adopt a rule that will sow the seeds of dissention; that will cause envy and jealousy, and which will result in an open rupture between the city and the country.

Let us be just to the city, and then if we are assailed, if our rights are invaded, if our slave property is disturbed by foreign invasion, or domestic insurrection, her citizens will aid us in the conflict, and not be numbered with our enemies.

Mr. Downs said, I do not consider the point stands in the same situation as before the last committee made their report. The arguments in favor of the federal basis are not so strong as without the proviso recommended by the last committee. But I yet think the arguments are sufficiently strong to adopt that principle. No man admires more the eloquent and beautiful theories of the gentleman from Lafourche (Mr. Taylor,) than I; but however plausible they may be, they fail to satisfy my mind of the practical results. I will not attempt to follow the gentleman through all the ingenious ramifications of his argument; but I will proceed to combat his principal point of objections to the report, which I think entirely erroneous. All that he has said may be reduced to this, that the federal basis operates with peculiar harshness upon the city of New Orleans. I defy any one to find any thing else in his argument. This is the substance, this is the basis of all that he has said, and he overcomes it himself by admitting and recommending the inequality of representation in the senate as regards the city, as both proper and expedient. Showing that in despite of beautiful theories, that the idea of equality in representation, is impracticable. The idea of perfect equality in representative governments, is one of those speculative ideas that may serve as a basis for impassioned declamation, but which will not stand a rigid scrutiny. There is no community—no city—no village, where every individual can flatter himself with exercising the same amount of political power; and it must hence be conceded that such perfect equality is not possible. We may attempt and very properly do attempt to reach that equality, but we know the result in its perfect state to be unattainable; and I therefore contend that when we endeavor to establish it, we should not be led astray by false and visionary theories, but should confine ourselves to practical results, which have stood the test and received the sanction of experience.

Taking experience then as our guide, I would ask in what manner is the federal basis so unjust towards the city? I am told that it despoils her of a portion of her political power. It seems to me that this basis represents a numerous class to be found in the city which are not to be found in the country, or if found, only in small numbers. I allude to the laboring classes of the white population. In fact, who replaces that population in the country? It is the slaves, who are counted not in an equality as to their numbers, but in the proportion of three-fifths. I say this without intending to disparage the poorer classes that work in the city from day to day as laborers, and for whom I have been steadfast in claiming the political and important right of suffrage. But as it is evident that this class predominates in the city, and from the agricultural pursuits of the country, slaves predominate; there the federal basis is peculiarly appropriate, so as to reconcile the difference arising from the two kinds of population as to their relative numerical superiority in the city and in the country. But admitting for the sake of the argument, that greater relative political power be conceded to the proprietors of slaves than to those not possessed of that property, how can the gentleman (Mr. Taylor) imagine that this will tend to introduce abolition among us, and make the city the hot-bed of that abominable doctrine. This argument of the gentleman defeats itself, for it there be any such possibility, the necessity is strong why the country should look for protection to herself. It is not from without that we can be successfully assailed, but it is from within, and there it is we should be invulnerable. The country never should be placed in a state of dependence upon the city for her safety, and should she ever be in that unfortunate position, the danger will indeed be fearful and irretrievable. The federal basis in despite of the theories and declamations of the gentleman, is a bulwark against abolition. Hence the expediency and peculiar fitness of that basis in a slave holding State; and to all the arguments that have been addressed to sectional prejudices, and all the appeals to the city, I reply, by a simple fact, that now, when the country has the political ascendancy, and has both the will and the means of protecting herself, that so far from this creating an unnatural feeling of jealousy on the part of the city, the city is with her, identified in feeling and in interest—so far did this unanimity of sentiment prevail, that on a recent occasion, when the State of Massachusetts permitted herself to address us upon this very principle or federal representation, with the view of affecting the question of slavery, the senate, without a reference of the subject to a committee, instantly passed resolutions expressive of their indignation at such interference—these resolutions were taken down to the house of representatives, at the moment engrossed by an animated debate, but no sooner were they announced by the secretary of the senate, than the debate was suspended---the resolutions were instantly concured in unanimously, and returned to the senate.

The principle of federal representation, (continued Mr. Downs) is good or bad. If the principle be bad, it must be conceded to be bad altogether, and the abolitionists who declaim so loud against it, must be in the right. But the proof that this principle is a vital one is this, that it preserves the union of the States; for no one will pretend that if that basis were abrogated, the Union would hold together twenty-four hours. It would tumble to pieces. It is conceded that as a natural principle it is both wise and expedient—it would not do to dispute that point---but it is said that the same reasons do not exist for its local application in this State. I admit that the reasons are not so powerful; but yet I contend that the effect itself is the same, for it establishes the equilibrium between the parishes themselves, and reconciles the disparity in population between those that have an excess of white population and those that have an excess of slave population.

I did not expect to be so suddenly engaged in the debate, but the arguments of the member from Lafourche, (Mr. Taylor) appeared to me to be so singular and so erroneous, that I could not refrain from replying to them. He seems to think it involves an unjust preference to choose arbitrarily one kind of property for the basis of representation, instead of all kinds of property. The gentleman overlooks the difficulty of subjecting all kinds of property to equal taxation, and some particular kinds of property in fact, to any taxation. Slaves are visable property—they are attached too to the territory. It would be impossible to apportion representation equally upon all kinds of property, were it taken into the basis, and to make the distribution of the representation with such mathematical precision that each portion of the political community should have its just proportion. It is evident that great difficulties must attend the imposition of taxes upon capital. It is clear that a loan of one hundred thousand dollars would yield more interest than a plantation of the same value—yet the plantation could be easily taxed—so could houses and slaves, but it would be very difficult to reach capital and to apportion taxation proportionally upon it. So would it be with the attempts to apportion representation upon so fluctuating and uncertain a basis. There is no difficulty in taxing slaves; they are easy to be identified—whereas, the calculations that would be necessary in reference to other kinds of property, and the fluctuating character of that property would make it very unsatisfactory as a basis.

But it seems the gentlemen are not satisfied with attacking the principle of federal representation in the report, but they must needs destroy the proviso. I always entertained the conviction that when we reached that question, every one would comprehend the necessity of restraining the power of the city within rational limits, compatible with the relative power and the safety of the ballance of the State. I certainly have no hostilities nor prejudices against the city, but I do think that this precaution which is a distinguishing trait in the old constitution, ought to be observed. The danger of concentrated power is too obvious to be insisted upon. It is evident that a number of individuals collected together in a city can exercise greater power, and that their power will be more efficient than the same number of persons scattered over a wide expanse of territory. The combination of numbers was a favorite principle of Napoleon, and it was upon that principle that he won his most distinguished battles. It was the concentration of a large force at a particular point. Without carrying out the comparison further, I may say, that in the political contests decided in the legislature, as in the strategie of military service, that body is the strongest which can soonest coalesce, and among whom there is the greatest point of attraction. So that in the city, one hundred thousand persons who have ready means of communicating with each other, who may be instructed and harangued with the utmost facility as to any particular point of policy, have more power than double that number scattered over various parishes of the country, not perhaps knowing each other, and distrustful of one another from the want of that constant intercourse that exists in the city. A single representative would be more efficacious in representing the combined interests of the city, by reason of his contact and intercourse with the citizens, than the representative of an extensive parish, where the population was scattered, and where the means of meeting with them were extremely difficult.

For these reasons, said Mr. Downs, I hope that the present report will be taken up in the spirit of conciliation, and where it is faulty it can be amended. As I said, on the occasion, when the first report was so violently denounced, no report could be made that would meet with a better reception, and I find that my anticipation has been completely realized; for the labors of the last committee appear to be as unpalatable as those of the first.

Mr. Dunn said he concluded in the main with the arguments adduced by the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs.) He could not consider the federal basis as an arbitrary rule, but as a principle appropriately befitting our peculiar institutions. He was ready and willtng, on all occasions, to do justice to the city, and if he could be convinced that injustice was done to the city, he would cheerfully make every reparation, short of abandoning a fundamental principle. The true point of difficulty, after all, between the abolitionists and ourselves was slave labor opposed to white labor. That was the foundation of all their pretended philanthropy, and it was therefore essential that we should let them know that the principle against which they waged war, was consecrated among us to perpetuity. Although slaves were, in one sense, property, they were in another, no less a portion of our population; and both as persons and as property, they ought to enter into the basis of our representation.

Mr. Ratliff objected strenuously to this basis. There was something derogatory in the idea of placing a slave, in reference to representation, upon an equality with a white man. It would give rise to feelings of jealousy; for the consequence would be that the proprietor of slaves would have a much greater weight at the ballot-box than the honest citizen that was too poor to possess them. It was true that both would be allowed to deposit but a single ballot, but the ballot of the owner of the slave would be, in fact and in effect, double, treble, or quadruple, in proportion to the number of his slaves. The father of five minor children would have but a single voice at the ballot-box, while the owner of an old, decrepid and worn-out negro and four negro children, would be entitled not only to the representation accorded to him as a citizen of the country, but likewise to the representation accorded to these slaves. The principle was unjust—it was unequal, and operated exclusively in favor of the rich; and hence it was distasteful to him. It was not only in the city, where there were inequalities of condition. There were poor people in the country—hard-working, industrious people in the country—that had to do their own work, and were not possessed of slaves. It would be repugnant to the true principles of democracy to say, that a farmer without slaves, working on h s own farm, should have less weight in the government than the rich proprietor adjoining his little farm, who had a hundred negroes. But, whether the principle affected city or country, we ought to act with impartiality, and not make humiliating distinctions. If the city is to be restrained within the limits of a just proportion of the representation, and that was obviously proper, let it be done by unexceptionable means. Do not let us sacrifice the rights of any portion of our constituents, and say because a man owns slaves he shall have greater weight than another man that has none. They are all citizens alike, whether rich or poor.

I feel quite confident that the delegate from Oachita, (Mr. Downs,) never electioneered among his constituents on the principle that a person without slaves was not the equal of a rich planter with fifty or sixty negroes, and that the former was not entitled to as much weight at the ballot box. If the gentleman had done so, he would not be where he now is.

Mr. Downs: Did the gentleman communicate to his constituents before the election that he would take the position he now assumes upon this subject?

Mr. Ratliff: I did not, because I never imagined that the poor would be placed upon an an equality with negroes—and that representation would be claimed for the latter upon the same principle that it is accorded to freemen, to wit: that poor white people performed the menial services required of our slaves! That may be true, Mr. President; but I think there is a vast difference between the one and the other, whatever may be the opinions of others to the contrary. There are various considerations which should induce us to pause and reflect well, before we adopt a basis not founded upon principles of equality. If the tariff be continued, it is not at all improbable that the surplus of the slave population, will be employed in the cultivation of sugar, and where then will be the balance of power? The delegate from Oachita will find that he has committed a sad mistake. I admit with that gentleman that perfect equality may not be attainable, but at least let us endeavor to approach that standard as near as possible.

In reference to the State of Virginia, I have one remark to make. It was not in reference to the question of slavery that the federal basis was adopted, but to maintain the equilibrium between the eastern and western portions of that State—the two great geographical divisions. I would prefer rather to take population and land than the federal, because the land is stationary, if I were restricted to the one or the other of these two modes of apportionment.

These are my present views, Mr. President, and I reserve to myself the right of making such further suggestions as may occur to me in the progress of this debate.

Whereupon, on motion, the Convention adjourned until to-morrow at the usual hour.

Thursday, February 27 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer, by the Rev. Mr. Goodrich.

The journal was read and approved.

On motion of Mr. Taylor, the delegate from West Baton Rouge, Mr. Chinn, was excused, for his non-attendance for several days past—during which time he was sick.

Mr. Mayo, chairman of the committee on education, submitted the following report and resolutions, viz:

"As it is through the medium of education that the intellectual faculties of man are cultivated, and his physical and mental powers regulated and perfected, the subject would appear to justify as much attention and care as any other that can engage the attention of the legislator.

"This State has for many years acted with a degree of liberality in making appropriations for the erection and support of colleges and academies, and for the education of indigent children.

"By the report of the State treasurer, dated 11th January, 1844, it appears that the sum of $1,710,559 40-100, from the year 1812 to the 31st December, 1844, has been expended by the State for the support of public schools, colleges, academies, seminaries, and asylums; and by the same report it appears that $463,791 71-100, which is more than one-fourth of the whole sum, has been expended for the building and support of the colleges of Louisiana and Jefferson. The first of which is not now in operation; and owing to the want of a regular system of education, has not produced results that ought to have been expected from so large an amount of expenditure.

"The college of Jefferson is in operation, and has seventy or eighty students, as appears from the report of the committee of the house of representatives on the subject of education, lately made to that body.

"The annual appropriation for that institution being $10,000, the annual expenditure for each student, supposing the number to be eighty, is $125, paid by the State, in addition to all the expenses of tuition, board, &c., which is paid by individuals.

"These facts are stated for no other purpose than to bring to view the disproportion in the expenditure, and actual waste of public money for want of a well regulated system of education.

"A large portion of the State is in a situation, in relation to schools, which is truly to be lamented; produced by various causes, some of which are peculiar to local situations where the population is extremely sparse, rendering it impracticable to support schools in the neighborhood, for want of sufficient number of children to attend them without sending them from home to board, which many persons of large families either have not the means to do, or if they have, are not disposed to appropriate them for that purpose, in other neighborhoods where schools could be supplied if the people desired. No interest or zeal appears to be felt on the subject, and children are permitted to grow up in ignorance, for want of a disposition on the part of the parent to educate them. The money that has been expended for the support of schools has in many, if not a majority of the parishes, failed to produce the beneficial results which were intended. Incompetent men have been employed as teachers, whose object has been to get the public money, more than improve the children under their care; and when the public money, to which a school has been entitled, has been exhausted, the schools in many instances have been broken up, and no more taught in the neighborhood until another supply of money has been expected from the State to pay the teacher.

"Owing to facts like these, the children that have occasionally attended the schools have received, in many places, but little benefit from them. One of the causes of the failure in the expenditure of the funds of the State, distributed to the parishes generally, has been that indigent children only have been entitled to the benefits of the public funds. Men of the high sentiments and noble feelings that characterize the citizens of this State feel a repugnance at the thought of educating their children by the use of a fund that none but the poor and needy can be partakers of. Hence it is believed that many persons, unable to educate their children at their own expense, have too much pride and feel that it would be humiliating to themselves and their children to partake of a bounty thus offered. When the fact of partaking furnishes of itself evidence of their poverty and indigence; and though this may to some extent arise from false pride, still the fact exists, and the effect is the same as though the objection were a good one. Another cause of the failure has been that large expenditures have been made for building colleges and academies for the promotion of the higher branches of literature, before providing the means for teaching the first rudiments of a common education.

"The necessary steps ought first to be taken to place within the reach of the mass of the children throughout the State, such an education as will fit them for the higher branches, and in such a manner as to place all on an equal footing in the enjoyment of the benefits to be derived from the funds of the State. This would create a laudable ambition between those whose progress and advancement would fit them for the higher schools; and thus the higher as well as the lower would be supported. The progress of the child in the acquisition of a substantial education, would emulate the parent; parents would encourage each other; and when the spirit of education could be fairly put into operation, it is believed that it would here, as it has done in many of the States of the United States, and in Prussia and Germany, carry with it public opinion, which in this country is all that is necessary to sustain any measure that promises to be permanently useful.

"The people must see and feel the importance of the subject, the necessity of action. The subject must receive their approbation; excite their interest and zeal; they must act together with their influence and money to carry it into operation. The public mind in this State has never been sufficiently aroused to the importance of educating the youth. Any system that may be organised, not calculated to enlist the feelings and receive the cordial approbation and support of a majority of the citizens, cannot be relied upon to effect the object desired, viz: that of furnishing to the greatest number of the rising generation, upon equal terms, the best education that the resources of the State, and of its citizens generally, will justify.

"To overcome these difficulties would require a system more in detail, than it would be proper to incorporate into the constitution, and which would often have to be changed and improved, as circumstances and observation might require.

"Provision ought to be made by the State for as large a fund for immediate use as its financial condition will permit, and also for a permanent fund for future use, large enough if possible to afford the means to all the children in the State of obtaining a knowledge of reading, writing and arithmetic; branches which are indispensably necessary to every citizen in his intercourse with his fellow man and with the world.

"Your committee have, by a provision which they report herewith, endeavored to lay the foundation for a permanent fund, which will have the power of increase within itself; to meet the increase of children, and of expenditure that improvements may require, as will be seen by the provisions reported.

"A provision is also contained in the report providing for the appointment of a superintendent of education; the object of which is to secure an efficient officer whose sole business shall be to attend to the duties of that office, and who shall constitute the head of an organized school department of the State. By another section it is made the duty of the legislature to encourage the institution of common schools throughout the State, for the promotion of literature and the arts and sciences, and to provide means for their support. By enjoining the encouragement and support of education upon the legislature, it will be part of the duty which every member of that body will be sworn to perform, to give it attention.

"The cultivation of the mental faculties for the promotion of wisdom, morality and virtue, is amongst the first duties of a State. The chief object of constitutions and laws being to render its citizens secure in their lives, liberty and property, the importance of a good education to each individual, to every community, and to the State, cannot be too highly valued. It is certainly of too great value to be estimated by any pecuniary consideration.

"From the genius, nature and spirit of republican government, it is and must be based upon public opinion; which to be salutary in its operation must be virtuous and enlightened.

"The permanence of our institutions ever have, and must continue to depend upon the genius of our constitution and laws, sustained by that spirit of freedom which actuates every man who is truly an American.

"Upon education we may safely confide as the conservative power of the State, that will watch over our liberties and guard them against fraud, corruption and decay.

"Without morality, virtue and intelligence to regulate the genius and spirit of republicanism, the latter one constantly exposed to be swept away by the iron rule of ignorance and vice, when wielded by demagogues, to destroy our liberties.

"Morality and virtue may exist without the peculiar culture of schools; but a man can hardly be said to be intelligent without knowing how to read, and without that kind of knowledge that generally has its source in an education acquired at school. Without intelligence, virtue and morality would cease to perform their legitimate functions, and to have that influence upon the body politic which it is necessary they should exert. Without these necessary ingredients to sustain the purity and harmony of our constitution and laws, unless the people know and appreciate their rights, and know how to maintain and protect them, the vicious and disorderly will protect and screen each other from the operation of the laws; the restraining influence of the social and political compact will be annihilated, and dissolution and ruin will be the inevitable result.

"There can be no security, the true spirit of liberty cannot exist where vice, ignorance and immorality predominate.

"Where a right direction is given to the young and tender mind, correct principles inculcated and impulses given, morality, virtue and reason commence their reign, and with the necessary culture fit their possessors to be useful to themselves, ornaments to society, and safe-guards to the State. The strength of the State and the happiness of its people increase with the increase of useful knowledge. Without knowing their rights and duties men become dangerous to the State, nuisances to the community, and burdensome to themselves. By laying the foundation of a system susceptible of being carried into practical operation, and which will secure to the rising generation the means by which they may be educated.

"The greatest degree of social and individual prosperity will be secured to our posterity, and a strong guarantee of protection to our constitution and laws.

"Louisiana should possess the means of educating her youths at home. Southern men should have southern heads and hearts, with sentiments untarnished by doctrines at war with our rights and liberties. It is of the first importance that correct impressions be made upon the minds of children; for it is difficult to unlearn what has been learned amiss.

"When our children return from the north, after having received an education there, they have to be re-acclimated, and not unfrequently fall victims to the effects of the change. Many of the most promising youths of the State have been swept away within a very short period after their return with an accomplished education, from the effects of a change of climate. Youths who were the fondest hopes of their parents, and promised to be ornaments, not only to them, but to the State, and whose loss to both is irreparable.

"All this can be remedied by entering upon the work ourselves, with a determination to accomplish it. A good education furnished to the rising generation, will afford us a better guarantee of protection than fleets and armies. Shall we not then be inexcusable for neglect to make the trial?

"It is said that a man will give all he has for his life. If so, ought he not, with equal readness, give the same price, if necessary, to secure his life, liberty and happiness, and the prospect of conferring upon his posterity the same blessings, enriched and ennobled by the highest degree of intellectual attainments?

"All of which is respectfully submitted, together with the accompanying provisions and resolutions.

[Signed] "G. MAYO,
"Chairman."

Report of the committee on the subject of education:

Sec. 1. The governor shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the senate, appoint a superintendent of education, who shall hold his office for two years; whose duties shall be prescribed by law; and who shall receive such compensation as the legislature may direct.

Sec. 2. The legislature shall encourage the institution of common schools throughout the State, for the promotion of literature and the arts and sciences, and shall provide means for that purpose and for their support.

Sec. 3. The proceeds of all lands that have been or hereafter may be granted by the United States to this State, for the use and support of schools, and of all land that may have been or may hereafter be granted by the United States, or by any person or persons, body politic or corporate, to this State, and not granted expressly for any other purpose, which shall hereafter be sold or disposed of, and all estates of deceased persons to which the State may be or hereafter become entitled by law, shall be held by the State as a loan, and shall be and remain a perpetual fund, on which the State shall pay an annual interest of — per cent., which interest, together with all the rents of the unsold lands, shall be inviolably appropriated to the support of schools and institutions of learning throughout the State, until the rents or interest, or both together, shall amount to the sum of —— per annum; after which the annual excess of such rents and interest may be applied by the legislature to other objects.

Sec. 4. The funds arising from the rents or sales, which may hereafter be made, of any lands heretofore granted by the United States to this State, for the use of a seminary of learning, and of any land that may hereafter be granted for that purpose, and any interest that may accrue upon such funds, shall be inviolably applied to the use specified, or that may be specified in the grant.

And your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That our representatives and senators in congress be requested to use their best efforts to procure the passage of a law, granting to this State the unsold lands within this State, belonging to the United States, or as large a portion thereof as possible, for the purpose of education; and to co-operate, if necessary to effect that object, with the representatives and senators in congress from other States.

On motion of Mr. Mayo, said report and resolutions were laid on the table subject to call, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Benjamin moved a re-consideration of the vote just taken on the printing of the report just read. He thinks the expense of printing may be avoided. We shall before we want to touch the matter it treats of, have it published in our official reports, and we ought to endeavor to make the printer's bills as light as possible, for they are now so heavy as to be hard to meet.

The re-consideration was granted, and then

Mr. Benjamin moved that the sections accompanying the report and the resolution connected therewith be printed, and furnished this Convention forthwith, which motion prevailed.

The special order of the day was the report of the committee of revision.

The committee of revision submitted the following report to the Convention:

SECTION SECOND OF ARTICLE FIRST, AS REPORTED BY THE COMMITTEE OF REVISION.

SEC. 2. No one of these departments nor any person holding office in one of them, shall exercise power properly belonging to either of the others, except in the instances hereinafter expressly directed or permitted.

Mr. ROMAN asked if there was not a misprint in the report now before us, and whether the word "or" was not in the original report the word "and?"

The secretary referred to the report of the committee and found it to be the word "or" as printed.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved the adoption of the section, and it was accordingly adopted.

The Convention then proceeded to the

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Section 6th, of the report of the special committee, composed of three members from each congressional dictrict, viz:

"Each parish shall be entitled to representation in portion to its population, ascertained and calculated according to the principle of representation adopted in the constitution of the United States. Provided, that no parish or city shall ever be entitled to more than one-fifth of the whole number of representatives."

Mr. MARIGNY took the floor and addressed the Convention.

Mr. President, I had hoped that the special committee to whom was referred the subject of apportionment, and whose report we have now before us, would have been not only more prudent, but more just than they have. I had expected they would have eschewed the federal basis, which has been already the cause of so many warm discussions—and looking back to the constitution of 1812, would have preferred the basis, "the electoral," which they adopted, and certainly there was then less danger than now, in establishing a representative apportionment—based on slave population, no matter what the ratio may be agreed upon here. But since they seem blindly determined to allow no more to the city than one-fifth of the representatives of the State—to that city, which contains one-third of the population of the State, and contributes at least two-thirds of all the money paid into the State treasury—and while it is further made clear to us, that the influence of the city is further to be overshadowed, and neutralized by the adoption of the federal basis, I have no course left me but to endeavor to hold up to your gaze this monstrous usurpation of power, this flagrant violation of every principle of equality, probety and justice, and to point out to you the dangerous consequences which must inevitably flow from such a course.

Would to God, I could be inspired with language that should carry conviction to your minds as to the outrageous injustice this measure is to perpetuate! I feel myself that I appreciate that wrong; and I shall by every effort in my power endeavor to shew you, that you cannot act with such injustice to New Orleans, without undermining the social fabric itself. I will not as some other speakers have done, refer you to some hundred extracts from authors on this subject, which alone go to shew that what those authors said and wrote belonged to a different age, and a different locality from ours. No, I shall confine myself to the section of country in which we live, and with the historical facts of that country. I shall endeavor to tear away the veil from that committee, without fear, favor, or affection.

What was the state of slavery in America at the time of the Declaration of Independence? The powers of Europe who had divided among themselves this vast continent, universally and openly acknowledged the right to trade in slaves. Then you heard nothing of abolition, or of abolitionism, and slavery was then universally allowed to exist throughout the new world, with perhaps one small spot, that was in the blue mountains of the Island of Jamaica, where the Maroons maintained themselves for the period of eighty years, and finally the British government had to make terms with them, which were to leave them unmolested on condition that they did not interfere in the colonial affairs—and abstained from seducing or enticing away from the plantations the negro slaves thereon.

But how did the monarchical powers act towards these beings, whom by law were consigned to the service of the whites? It is that which demands our attention, particularly, so far as regards Louisiana.

The Spanish government had one criminal jurisprudence alike for the white and negro population, and no negro could then be executed unless the signature of the King had been procured to the warrant. This was fully exemplified during the administration of the Baron de Carondelet, in 1797, when a slave named Jean Baptiste committed an atrocious murder. The people loudly called for the prompt execution of the murderer, who was condemned to be hung, and yet the Baron dare not take upon himself to see the verdict of the law enforced.

He consulted with J. B. Vidal, the King's commissioner and procurator, who told him that he was not authorised to order the execution, without laying himself liable to a heavy penalty. Popular indignation and fury rose to the highest pitch, and the governor had at last, to incur whatever penalty the court of Madrid might see fit to impose on him, and consent to the execution of the slave: all the facts of the case were forwarded to the court of Spain, who referred the same to the department charged with the affairs of the West Indies; they disapproved of the Baron's course, and condemned him to pay a fine of $500. This case is mentioned in Judge Martin's History of Louisiana.

Besides that, a slave had a right, of which he could not be deprived, to purchase his own freedom. All he had to do, was to go before a judge, who put a valuation on him, or had him valued—and if the master could not prove that the slave had unlawfully acquired the money, he had the right to purchase his freedom in spite of his master. The slave had also the right to acquire and hold property, and the master had no right, even if he died a slave to inherit his own slave's property. Slaves had then the right of assembling together for amusement every Sunday, and of enjoying themselves in such games as they please. This privilege being abused on more than one occasion, the ——— Jean Paul Lanosse, was desirous of putting an end to it, and applied to the same councillor to whom Carondelet had applied for advice, and from him he learnt that it was a privilege accorded to them under an act of "Isabella" the catholic, and could not be abrogated. He further read him a passage of sacred history, where it was laid down, that Saint Madeleinae, tired and weary from six days labor, applied to the Lord for the privilege of dancing on Sunday, and he granted it.

Where are now these privileges? They have vanished under the operation of the black code, and yet, while you, under the name of law, and under pretence of right, have stripped these same beings of every privilege, you at the same time are very glad to put up your claims for representation on their account. Further, you want some 25,000 to 30,000 free persons of color, which the constitution of 1812 has deprived of the right of representation included in your basis.

The framers of that constitution were consistent, because after they had established the principle that colored people should have no voice in the councils or representative voice in the legislature, they discarded all but the electoral basis.

But what do you do? First you aim the same blow at them; and sencondly, you class them with animals, as cattle. You shall never be anything yourselves it is true say you, but we mean to take advantage of the possession of you, to usurp from others in consequence of such possession, the right of representation.

I shall endeavor to shew you how unreasonable and dangerous is this scheme of usurpation which you are striving to force through.

Under the Spanish government, free blacks enjoyed all the privileges of white persons. That led to an amalgamation between the white and colored races, until finally they have become within four degrees of the white man; and did not prudence forbid me, I could name several families who are descendants of those persons, whose color depends on that law to recognize them as white. Now let us see the results of that law. The Governor of Louisiana, Galvez, was desirous of taking possession by conquest of the Floridas, but being short of troops of the line, and with a white population not amounting to over 20,000 persons, he called into service every male inhabitant under forty-five years of age, and all those free colored persons who were recognized as citizens under the law. They crossed by the marshes leading towards Pearl River till they reached that point, and found their way across to the Gulf of Mexico, and thence finally arrived before Pensacola, where Campbell was in command.

A naturalized Spaniard by the name of Rousseau, whose descendants are as numerous as his name was famous, furnished them with artillery in flat bottomed boats. Another by the name of Guillemard, placed them advantageously for the attack, and after they had succeeded in making two breaches in the enemy's entrenchments, the colored regiment, under the command of one of Galvez' aids de camp, rushed in, and were the first who entered Fort St. Michael.

So pleased was the king of Spain with this act of bravery, that he granted to five of them the privilege of carrying a sword, and wearing the ribbon of honor. Finally, under the administration of De Mireau, a negro by the name of St. Malo, endeavoring to imitate the example set him by the blacks of Jamaica, fortified himself in the neighborhood of Lake Borgne, with a force of one hundred and fifty men, and for a period of thirty years maintained his ground, and became the terror of every settler on Terre aux Bœuffs. Who was relied on to put down this dreaded rebel? Why the very colored people of whom we have before spoken. They marched courageously to the scene of action, led by the same aid de camp [Mr. de Marigny, the father of the gentleman now addressing the house] of Galvez, who had commanded them at Pensacola, surprised St. Malo in his retreat, and captured him, with seven of his followers, and brought them to the city, where they perished on the gibbet.

Again, who does not recollect that it is to this same class that we are indebted for ridding the country of the celebrated Bowles, in 1800, during the administration of Cassa Calvo. That bold and daring man had been raised among the Indians—formed the plan of bringing over the Creeks and Seminoles to the aid of Spain. At first he succeeded. He went to Jamaica, returned with men and money, and encamped at Apalachicola; directing his attack upon fort St. Mark, (which was commanded by one Portil.) He displayed tact and courage in his movements; but unfortunately for himself, committed such depredations as to awaken Louisiana to a sense of her own danger, should he succeed.

De Cassacalvo formed a body of men, 2000 strong, which he placed under the command of Col. Trudeau. Fruitless enterprise! it succombed to the Indian rifle and tomahawk. What then was to be done? Why they again called out the people of color, and 800 of them marched to the seat of action under De Salles and De Breni Desclouet. They arrived shortly after, and raised the seige. Bowles was immediately afterwards taken prisoner, and died in the dungeons of Havana.

Yes, Mr. President; these men did what I have told you under the Spanish government, whilst they had the prospect of citizenship before their eyes for their children. I do not claim here for those they have left behind them either those rights or those privileges; but I do say that it is in the highest degree impolitic to make our representation based on any principle which should remind them of what they were, and what they are. In other words, I do not think we ought to take any step which would have the effect of embittering their feelings against us on account of the present state of things. It surely cannot be on their account that you want to establish the federal basis. No, for they have asked you nothing, and you have determined to give them nothing, so far as rights and privileges are concerned. Why, then, take them into consideration in making your basis? Why carry them into the dire necessity of comparing the past with the present? Why, I ask? because ambition blinds you, and without troubling yourselves about the consequences of such a measure, you think alone of benefiting the country at the expense of the city, as if the city was peopled by a set of Vandals, ready to pounce upon and destroy your plantations. As if the inhabitants of New Orleans thought of nothing but pillage, plunder and rapine, like the brigands of Calabria; who hid themselves from the gaze of the traveller behind the jutting rocks, more effectually to surprize and destroy them.

But, sir, what great harm has New Orleans ever done to the country, that she is now so roughly and unjustly handled, and for which they claim so much from her? They tell you it is the Irishmen they fear. The Irishmen, is their everlasting cry. That is the bugbear. You would almost think, when you heard that cry, as I have heard it dinned into my ears, that a band of Irish had rushed into the churches, and destroyed and defaced the image of Christ himself—and yet these Irishmen are a very industrious kind of people. We meet them in all the walks of life, and in every society. If poverty and laborious toil were considered as vices now-a-days, I might think, perhaps, that they were a very vicious people, for it is true that the masses are not rich. But, thank God, in our country, to be rich is nothing—to be industrious every thing. Who does not know that intelligence and genius are like the vigorous plants of spring, whose strength can only be developed by a rich soil, and whose verdure is constantly exposed to the powerful and genial influence of the sun.

There is no country on the face of the globe where examples abound as they do in this, to support the position I have taken.

After the conquest of Canada, when the Canadians and the Acadians were doomed to exile rather than submit to the English yoke, some 3000 of them arrived upon our shores —upon the soil of Louisiana. The whole population at that time numbered about 2000. The naked and squalid condition of this large mass of human beings, who were fugitives from their own country, naturally inspired our citizens with alarm and dread—I may say consternation; and the question was every where asked if we were to give such people a home amongst us. Every one then seemed to vie, who could inflict the greatest indignity on them; and finally the idea seemed to be general, that they should be made to return the way from whence they came.

But after some more reflection, upon the advice and by the firmness of some generous men, the feeling of selfishness was conquered, and listened to the call made upon them by the famous chevalier de Villires. This knight, brave man, worthy to rank amongst the knights of ancient days, was the last of seven brothers who had all borne arms in the wars of Canada; one of whom, was renouned for his valor and his military talents, and who finally yielded up to Gen. Washington fort Necessity when he laid siege to it, and if for nothing else, he deserved the good wishes of every American; for, probably, by that act, he preserved to us the man who was destined to become the hero and the father of his country. His name-sake then crossed the periled ocean, domicilated himself amongst us, and married a Miss Livaudais. It was well known that had he chosen to have returned to France, that honors and wealth awaited him for the military services he had rendered to his country in Canada. It was this man then, when his heart was touched by feelings of pity and commiseration when he beheld the distress and sufferings of these voluntary exiles from their country, that was determined, so far as he was concerned, that those brave men who had served under Montcalm should not be inhospitably driven back to the shores of the gulf. What did he do? Why he buckled on his sword to his side, (for in those days it was the brave spirit, and not the everlasting dollar as now, that commanded esteem in Louisiana,) and repaired to the levee.

There the Acadians were in doubt and despondency. He mixed amongst them, encouraged them and kept their drooping spirits, others followed this noble example; the result was, that the Acadians, finding themselves protected, immediatel y afterwards settled in different portions of the State. In the vast and fertile regions of Lafourche, Attakapas and Iberville, they thrived and with their thrift, the country prospered and so steadily persevering have they been, that you cannot turn to any page in the history of our country, but you will find the names either of those very men, who were about to be driven away, or their children, or their children's children, figuring largely thereon. They have furnished us with our best citizens, and we have every reason to be satisfied with them wherever they have been called into the public service—and if I mistake not very much, the present governor is descended from that very class of citizens whom I have been describing to you.

The question then naturally arises, why are the Irishmen more dangerous than the Acadians? Why can't they thrive and prosper in Louisiana as they have done? The most of them have received in their native country a primary education, and that is more than the Acadians did—and we are not without examples before us, that they know how to buffet with the world as well as others, and therefore we see that many have succeeded in their pursuits. They have therefore a common interest with us in the prosperity of the State and they have already furnished us two public men, who would and do compare favorably with any men in any country, Messrs, Judge Porter and Dick. It must therefore be apparent that in conjuring up of the phantom which they have, of the danger of 'Irishmen' it could only been done for the purpose of frightening us from our propriety of conduct, and bring us bound hand and foot by cause of our fears of raw heads and bloody bones, into their unjust and outrageous doctrines.

The President called Mr. MARIGNY to order for not confining himself to the subject under debate.

Mr. MARIGNY—I am in order Mr. President, I honorably conceive; for I am defending the privileges of 145,000 Irishmen—and sir if it be permitted in a criminal court, to suffer the attorney of the accused to rest his defence on what he conceives his strongest ground, surely it is not right to check me, in explaining in my own way the reasons which governs my action in this matter, and which I am willing to give and am trying in my own humble way to do. But sir, if any one here is dissatisfied, or displeased with what I say, why let them take me up and throw me out of the window. But if they do, that wont hurt me, for I shall be sure, while defending their political rights, to have some of the 145,000 Irishmen outside waiting to catch me in their arms.

The President remarked that he was neither displeased nor dissatisfied with Mr. Marigny for what he had said, but he must remind the gentleman that he was not speaking to the subject before the house, but was indulging us with the history of Louisiana, which was not the subject of debate now before the Convention.

Mr. MARIGNY hopes the President will pardon him for the length of his peroration but it was absolutely necessary to bring up the argument in its proper shape. He, will now endeavor to draw the inferences which he has laid down in the premises. The report before us has but one object, and that is, to secure for the country the political power of the State; to reduce New Orleans down to a fifth, on an unfair basis. That is the main question—and yet, sir, those who had the hardihood to propose it, had not the courage to confess it; no, not even to admit it in argument. Their talent was not to be found, because their courage failed them at the moment they wanted to use it, and why? They knew they had an unrighteous and unjust cause. Even the delegate from Ouachita, whose ability is so great, and whose imagination is so fertile, was yesterday more at sea than ever I have seen him. He seems as if he was groping about in the dark, trying to get hold of something to keep him up, no matter what, in support of his views of the matter now before us for consideration. He reminded him more of a flounder fresh caught and put into a tub, than any thing he could think of—first plunging this way, then that way, and all for the purpose of getting out of his false position, at the same time not willing to give his life without a struggle or two. But sir; badinage apart; let us examine how the question stands, and what are the arguments advanced. The main argument of the gentleman from Ouachita is this: that New Orleans ought not to make our laws; and, that if she got her just proportion, under this or any other basis, she was bound to do so. Now sir, how can that be, when with all her dreaded power, on the adoption of the new constitution, New Orleans will only have one eighth of the representation in the senate. It will be emphatically twenty-eight versus four, and in spite of all the dread entertained by country members, the governor will be, he is bound to be elected from the country. During the last thirty-two years under the constitution of 1812, we have lived and prospered—the country has prospered, if not more, at least as much as the city. And how many governors have we had from the city? One; and even he died at the end of two years. All the other governors were from the country parishes.

It is not, therefore, true that they have any thing to fear on that account. It is said the country is afraid of the city. This is a round assertion, but I can see no cause for it. The real cause lies deeper. The country wants to bind down and fetter the city, so that she, the country, may get her hands upon the treasury. It is of no use for country members to deny it—there is where the shoe pinches.

During the last twenty years, the legislature have made appropriations to the amount of eight millions of dollars, out of which the city has received fifty thousand dollars for the Draining Company, one hundred Thousand for the Mexican Gulf Rail Road, and five hundred thousand for the Nashville Rail Rail Road; in all, six hundred and fifty thousand. All the balance, no less than $7,350,000, has gone into the hands of the country members, for their several constituents' interests, when ever and howsoever they saw fit to divide it amongst themselves.

Thus, then, let us blindly pass the section as it stands, and it is not very difficult to see the result. The city, which always has filled, and always will, (and they know it, every man of them,) fill the State treasury, is to be kept as the fat bird for them to pluck. The city will get nothing in the distribution of the public funds, and the millions which have yet to flow into the public treasury, will be as the millions heretofor squandered for useless and improvident efforts at internal improvement.

Is there any one here bold enogh to deny this? No, sir, there is not a man among them that dare to do it; and why? because the facts will stare him in the face, and give the lie to his assertions. The only answer that they have attempted to make is, that the city and the adjoining parishes have an identity of interest, and consequently would combine—that we should be able, here in the city, to control the votes of the parishes of Plaquemines, St. Bernard, Jefferson, St. Charles, &c., &c. Now, Mr. President, I had expected some more sensible reason than this to be advanced; I had hoped we should not have had this humbug and balderdash forced upon us; but as it has come, we must endeavor to meet it with the voice of truth, and with the weapons of truth; despite the learned, shrewd and wise delegate from Ouachita, Mr. Downs' assertions and arguments. Unfortunately for that gentleman, (much as I esteem him,) I am compelled to say that in the discussion of this question, and with his long experience, he ought never to have said, that we could bring over ANY parish, by giving them an appropriation of $50 to $100,000. It was an admission I had not expected to hear from HIS lips; because if so, he would thereby admit that he has his price.

And now, Mr. President, to the main question, which has been so much harped upon. What does the city want from the country? Nothing. What does the country want from the city? Everything. These are truths which they don't want to understand; but they are, nevertheless, true, whether they will or whether they wont understand them. Mr. President, disguise it as they will, and I desire in my expressions to give offence to no one, yet it is clear to my mind, that the country is dependent on the city. And if they are so in one sense, they should be also in a political point of view, and why? because they cannot do without us; either in the sale of the productions of their labor, or in the gratification of their love of pleasure. I am now, said Mr. Marigny, about to recur to the history of our country.

Having promised the country members to remove the seat of government from New Orleans to the country, some years since, (to give it a trial,) we consented to remove the sessions of the legislature to Donaldsonville; that was the decision; and the location was made there. Thanks to the delightful dreams of those days, for the future prosperity of Louisiana!! said the contractor, for he got $50,000 for the job of putting up a State house.

But what was the end of this scheme? The members of the legislature had scarcely assembled, ere they began to complain, and many even, it is said, cried with bitterness and mortification at being cooped up in so small a place. Every steamboat that landed was boarded by the legislature, almost in a body, to know the news "from town."

Each day was to them an unsupportable burden. Each night was fraught with ugly dreams, and each succeeding morning they would say: "I would not pass another such a night for all the world," &c., &c.

At last they all had a dream—it seems one and all were taken charge of by Queen Mab, and she clearly showed them the walls of the new State house were about to fall over their heads and crush them into mummies. Oh what a catastrophe! horrible indeed! You could not convince them to the contrary, and back they came to New Orleans.

I have not yet said all on this subject which I intended to say, and you must bear with me, Mr. President, a few moments longer.

When it was decided to hold this Convention at Jackson, in August last—a retired spot, where people could be quiet and calm; where there would be a chance for reflection, &c. The members met, and the business of the Convention proceeded; but, day after day, it was painful to hear the complaints of members; first one thing and then another, did not please them; and it seemed that almost all had got tired of the place before they had been there a week.

For my part, Mr. President, I did not suffer as they did; I have a happy disposition, and am always satisfied, place me where you will. I found in Jackson many estimable people. I could always say some things that were new to them; and it was, and is always a pleasure to me, to have such friendly chats as I had with the citizens of Jackson. My leisure moments were, therefore, not as theirs; mine were contented and happy—theirs the reverse. I did not endeavor to keep an account of the health of the town—they did.

I did not complain of any thing; and yet these country members were complaining all the time. First: they said they had no books to refer to; second: they said they had no chance to get statistical information, and that both were necessary to carry on and complete the work confided to them by the people; and finally they got awfully scared; and although they did not say that they were afraid the house would tumble about their ears, yet they did say that they were afraid of the cold plague—and therefore it was a duty which they owed to themselved and the State to clear out, and go home as soon as possible.

Well, they adjourned, and to meet again in New Orleans. And now what follows? Here they are—that's certain; and a noble body they are—that's equally certain; but do you suppose that there is a man amongst them who has not something to attend to? some question of interest or pleasure on hand? I do not believe there is a gentleman present, who will ever doubt or deny it, that so long as there is any monies in the treasury to pay them, we shall hear no complaint. But would it not be well for them to enquire out of whose pockets it comes? No, they dare not ask the question; and why? because truth, honor and justice compels them to say that it is to New Orleans they have to look up for the supply of the very means they are now working upon; because she contributes more than two-thirds of the revenue of the State. The fear of the country members is, that New Orleans will, ere long, wake up, and refuse to pay the piper as they have heretofore done; and now they want to fasten us down QUIETLY, so that hereafter they may raise the cry of nullification, should we object. Even this ingenious argument will fail them; for I admit that it is ingenious. But, sir, Louisiana is too well known in her sincere attachment to the Union, I hope, for any such rigmarole to be forced down our throats at this late hour. But one thing I will say to the country members on this floor, and that is, that they will find it a harder task than they are aware of or anticipate, to fasten down 200,000 free American citizens, who have the same rights as they have, to their triumphant car—and to make that population their vassals. If they try it, they will find themselves mistaken.

If you want to be satisfied on that head, you have but to turn to the history of Switzerland, there they deposed the "Hudspeths" from power, who relied so much on their descent from Julius Cæsar. In Vienna they made light of the revolt; but they taught their soi disant masters that a people cannot, and will not be imposed upon without their own consent. Without leaving behind such restrictions, bitter regrets on their parts, as well for the principle itself, as in what the treasury will have to suffer to put it to rights. Turn whichever way you will, and you will find the same feeling, connected with the same principles. Look at the course of the people of the Netherlands, who successfully placed themselves in resistance to Philip II of Spain, a monarch who had at his control an immense army, till then invincible, and had, furthermore, inexhaustible resources from his rich mines in South America; yes, they resisted an odious tax, odious, moreover, because the right was claimed to tax the people according to their pleasure; and yet this simple people would not, and did not suffer such a tax to be levied from them.

But why should I call your attention to the facts chronicled in Europe, when we have so many nearer home, that we can cite?

We all know that the day of our birth as a republic, was that on which we resisted an onerous and unjust tax. And yet you will, I mean you gentlemen of the country, contend that it is perfectly fair in you to dispose of one-third of the rights of two hundred thousand citizens, at your own will and pleasure; and that afterwards it is in your power and in your province, to rob them of that which they contribute to the support of the government; and what for? to enrich and improve the country parishes, at the expense of the city; to draw from the labor and the sweat of the citizens' brow all you want to enrich yourselves. Oh, it is a monstrous doctrine! and I marvel much, to see my friend, Mr. Downs, having any thing to do with such an unclean thing.

Some may say, and doubtless do, that there is no injustice in it; but have they examined the subject? If they have not, they had better do so ere it is too late.

Carry out your doctrine and you "out Herod Herod." Macheavel himself, could not have conceived a more odious one. Here is a people who make the State what it is; a people forming one-third of the population; who pay two-thirds of all that is paid into the treasury, in the shape of taxes. Yes, they are taxed two-thirds of the public revenue; and yet they are to be restricted in the right of representation, and to be cut down to fifteen against sixty-one, whom you plainly tell us, have no feeling in common with the city.

Once more I say beware! For our lalors here are in vain, unless you get the sanction of the people to your constitution; and from your present chance, that is more than doubtful. Is it not better, then, to take the basis establised in the constitution of 1812? The framers of that instrument were all good men and true, and knew the wants and situation of the country. We have now 7000 electors in the city, under the proposed course in the suffrage, they will reace 12,000. Take this report, however, and the constitution of 1845 never will be ratified; but if it be ratified, all the old jealousies and heart-burnings will be revived throughout the country. You will plant the tree of abolition in our midst, and planting ever it is it not sure to grow?

You will make unjust and onerous laws, burdening one portion of the people for the benefit of the other, which must end in resistance to, and refusal to bear the burden.

The great aim of gentlemen from the country seems to be to crush the city, and give all to the country; that you say, perhaps not in so many words, but by your actions, which speak louder than words, in curtailing the representation of New Orleans to one-fifth, and you thereby place the whole revenue of the State in the hands of the country. I warn you again that you must abandon your position, for it is based on injustice, and will be disastrous in its consequences if persevered in.

God knows I am not fond of turmoil or strife, and have a natural horror of revolutions. I have, it is true, had my fortune impaired, but not my reputation. Well, then, I tell you that if you persevere in this iniquitous scheme, I will not sign the constitution, and I will advise my constituents not to submit to the taxes you impose under it; for when I voted for the call of a Convention, it was done with a view of dealing out even handed justice to all; not to aid in any system that should cater to the avarice or cupidity of the minority. But should you do this, it cannot be said that I did not warn you of the danger. If you take advantage of your numerical force on this floor, and cast the torch of discord among our hitherto happy State, on your shoulders the odium and disgrace that will be attached to it will surely fall. I feel, Mr. President, that I have done my duty. I may not live to see the evil day, but at least when the people pass my grave, and read on the cold marble, the name of Bernard Marigny, they will say, "he foresaw and foretold in 1845, what has now come to pass. He did all he could to prevent it. Oh! that they had listened to his warning voice."

Mr. Conrad deems the section before the Convention is one of such high and vast importance—in fact, a section upon which most probably will be determined whether our labors here are to result in any thing; whether the constitution we are endeavoring to make will be ratified or rejected by the people; that he cannot give a silent vote on it, and must therefore trespass, but for a short time however, on the attention of the house.

Sir, said Mr. Conrad, when the report was laid on the table, I read it, and carefully, I assure you; but, sir, I am free to say that it was with regret, and I was disappointed and surprised. I do not desire, Mr. President—far be it from me—to question the capacity, intelligence, or the motives of any member of the committee; but I was disappointed because I regarded it as a perfect failure on their part, in performing the duty assigned them, and that they were entrusted with, which was to separate the difficulties that surrounded the question, and present us with a project brsed upon fair and equitable principles.

The debate upon this subject, when previously before the house, was lengthy; and finally, when we came to the conclusion to re-commit the subject to a new committee, that they might alter the whole frame and shape of it, and the more certainly to arrive at the desired end, we appointed one member from each congressional district on that committee. That was virtually instructing them that we desired to have the report made, and the project to be submitted by them, on totally different principles to the one we had so recommitted. How, sir, have they discharged that duty? Why, by retaining that very principle which was so odious in the eyes of a majority of the Convention. Yes, sir, they have retained the federal basis. On that question I have already said so much, in discussing the pernicious effects of that principle, that little more remains to be said on it now: in fact, I do not think one other word is necessary. Certain it is, that nothing has since been said in this hall which could change my opinion, or which can justify the members of the committee in the course they have seen fit to take. I then said, and I now repeat without going further into details, that the federal basis was not, and never would be the proper basis on which to frame representation. My reflections since then have more and more confirmed me in that opinion, and in the propriety of our course in rejecting the first report.

The principle is engrafted in the constitution of the United States, it is true, but that is no model for State governments. It was there inserted as a compromise, to conciliate and harmonize the different and conflicting interests of the North and South, and therefore can have no possible bearing on the making of a State constitution. It is true, they have cited one or two States where the principle is adhered to, but if they will look a little closer into the question, they will discover that it was the consequence of divisions in those States on the question of slavery. Thus, in the western part of Virginia, the inhabitants were in favor of its abolition; while those of the eastern and central portions of the State as tenaciously clung to that institution. In order, therefore, to preserve a proper equilibrium, they insisted on a guarantee, and that was found in adopting the federal basis. But who will pretend to say, that there is any difference of opinion as to abolitionism in Louisiana? There is not a single advocate for such a doctrine to be found here, and consequently we can have no motive on that account to engraft that basis on our constitution. Another gentleman argues that we should take that as the basis because the negro is property. I should not object to a basis founded on property qualification, but further, I think property is the proper basis on which representation should be made.

He (Mr. Conrad) much regretted that Mr. Beatty was not in his seat, for he had expected that the committee would have reported on that subject, among others; and he cannot but think that the committee, in referring to the federal constitution, thought more of the person of the slave than regarding him in the light of property. But suppose they had so regarded it, the report would not be the less defective, nor the principle they contend for less obnoxious, because one part of the State would be favored at the expense of the other.

In some parts of the State—as for instance in the piney woods, throughout the Florida parishes—there are few slaves, comparatively speaking; while in the rich, alluvial lands in the western portion of the State, they are very numerous. Upon the point of injustice alone, then, the report is defective; for if we are to assume the basis on a property qualification, to be fair and equal, it must be on all descriptions of property; that is, on real estate as well as slave property, and should be regulated by the tax list. The assessment roll would show what property a man was possessed of, and if property qualification be deemed necessary, then all should be placed on the same footing.

It is of no use to endeavor to conceal the real though hidden motive of the section as reported. 'Tis said that murder will out; and if we are to be slain, why not come out and say so? It can answer no good end—no practical or beneficial result can spring from deception, or by keeping us in the dark as to your motives. All your differences of opinion merge into one, and that one is, Down with the power of New Orleans! Honor to those open and candid men, say I, who have had the manliness to admit that that is what they are aiming at. Why not say as they do, that the real object of pressing this section is to weaken the influence of the city? That is the real motive, and ought to be avowed. But, sir, if not admitted, it is nevertheless true; and it is unjust and oppressive, and the result cannot fail to prove disastrous to the interests of the State. It does not even contain one principle of abstract justice, and is calculated to create and foment jealousies not only throughout the whole city, but throughout the State at large.

He (Mr. Conrad) is not prepared to go as far as Mr. Taylor, when he says hat the citizens of New Orleans may hereafter, to get rid of one evil, choose the other, and prefer the abolition of slavery, rather than wear the galling chains of the country's oppression. But this I will say—I do say—and I want it proclaimed from the mountain's top—that this unreasonable and unjust principle which they are endeavoring to fasten upon the city, will undoubtedly tend to alienate the feelings of one portion of our State from the other; and that, if persisted in, and engrafted on our constitution, New Orleans will give the State no peace. She will never be satisfied until they come back to fair, honest and correct principles, and her citizens shall no longer be regarded as aliens by the citizens of the parishes. They will regard it as an indelible stain—a blot; and they will never stop till it is expunged.

But that is not even the most crying injustice of the report. They give to each parish one representative, without regard to its population. That is the report, rejected before, and sent to this last committee to re-model. It comes back in the same garb in which it went, and yet it is notorious that, during the first debate, the idea was scouted at and voted down, after a long, sharp and somewhat excited debate.

The best evidence that the new committee were not ignorant of what they were doing is, that Mr. Beatty admits that he and his colleagues took the decision of this house in its natural sense, and that was, that the committee should make such a report as they might deem most advisable; that is, however, duly regarding the sense of the Convention as expressed in debate.

But, sir, how have they discharged that duty? Why, by renewing the same identical, exploded and condemned proposition. They say, in extenuation of their course, that they must either disregard the implied instructions of the Convention, or look in vain for a proper basis; and without that important starting point they could do nothing. Gentlemen, let me respectfully ask you how it happens that, when the Convention told you, as it emphatically did, that you should not give to every parish a representative, unless its population entitled them to it, you, in the plenitude of your wisdom, determine to do it any how? You seem to find excessive pleasure in making your actions tally—by the rule of contrariness. The question, however, naturally arises: what makes you act so? Certainly not in obedience to the mandate of the Convention. No, that you have not the hardihood to reply.

Mr. Conrad now read several sentences from the report, and clearly showed that they had, in endeavoring to steer clear (as they said) of Scylla, run upon Charybdis; in other words, they had taken the matter into their own hands, and meant to sink or swim in supporting their own peculiar notions on the subject, with as much apparent show of sincerity as could be made to appear on the face of the transaction. But, sir, they have given you no reason, no argument, why they should place such an arbitrary rule as they have reported, on the city of New Orleans, in curtailing her representation to one-fifth of the representation of the State.

This is a new clause; it is not found in the original report, and doubtless springs from the fertile imagination of the gentleman from Lafourche, whose hobby it is to restrict and keep down the city. This is a more serious attack than it appears to be at the first blush; and why? because it is singular that what should have been omitted by the first committee, who evidently had in view the restriction of the rights and privileges of New Orleans, should be supplied by this second committee; unless, they were still more hostilely inclined to the interests of the city. And no doubt the argument they used among themselves was, "pshaw! let the city go to the devil, provided we can only get the country to unite, and fasten her down forever." And yet these men talk of justice!

Let us suppose for a moment, that New Orleans may hereafter become as populous as London or Paris. Let us imagine that she will hereafter have four-fifths of the population, and that she will continue to pay three-fourths of the taxes paid into the treasury. What then will be the position of New Orleans with one-fifth of the representation? On what principle of justice can this be sustained? There is one thing the committee have done, which is sensible and truthful; they have struck out the word "equal," and it no longer reads, "representation shall be equal," &c.; but the reason why they were moved to accord to us this act of justice, is "in the deep bosom of the ocean buried," for certainly if they had any, they have kept it to themselves. They meet—decide,—rule things their own way ---make a representation to suit themselves, and never condescend to give us any reasons for what they have done. Not one particle of explanation do they give us. It is a great pity that those gentlemens' ideas of propriety were not more acute. And the more you study the question, the more you must be convinced that the whole movement is done to show their contempt and loathing of the city of New Orleans and her rights.

For many years, Mr. President, when I was a member of the legislature, I regret to have to say that I could not help noticing the jealousies exhibited by certain men. If for instance, the country called for an appropriation, and any of the city members saw fit to oppose it, they would raise the cry of "jealousy to the interests of the country;" and that cry afterwards became proverbial among the country members. But on the other hand, whenever any city member proposed a measure, asking any thing for the benefit of the city or parish of Orleans, the country members would and did always imagine, or pretend to believe that it would increase the power of the city delegation, and therefore opposed it. Such feelings as these do credit to no man or set of men, and more particularly do they not reflect any on the members of an august body like this, who may see fit to indulge in them. Why not then cast such feelings from us? He (Mr. Conrad) hopes this Convention will meet this and every other question that is to be discussed, and every principle to be settled, without calling to their aid a spirit of jealousy, or of ostracism. It must be borne in mind that when the spirit of jealousy existed against New Orleans, as I have before described it to you, that then she had but one-sixth of the representation of the State, and one-seventh in the senate.

Let us look back a little however, and see if this Convention or their committees have acted so far in a spirit of justice or in a spirit of moderation, or in a spirit of jealousy; and I was going to say, spiteful revenge for injuries never inflicted but imagined by the overwraught imaginations of the gentlemen from the country. The legislative committee reported that we should hold our elections here in the month of September! Every body agreed that that was unjust, and yet it was pressed upon us by the country members with much zeal, because then it was said the yellow fever would prevail, and keep down that dreaded hydra—the power of New Orleans.

Some wanted one time, to suit his section of country; others preferred a time when they should not be compelled to go to the polls on "a log," or a "dugout," and finally, to suit the views of the country members, and their constituents, the first Monday in November was agreed upon.

Now, sir, to show not only the cunning, but the abuse of power sought to be forced on us by the committee whose report we now have under consideration, I call your attention to the fact, that with a perfect knowledge that universal suffrage is to prevail, they recommend that each parish shall have one representative; no matter how many residents calling themselves white, may reside therein; they further recommend that the city of New Orleans should be divided into three districts, or municipalities, (of course to paralyze as much as possible her political power,) for it was doubtless that which influenced the delegate from Lafourche to introduce such a report as he has. And what is to be the result of this proposition? we shall have three classes of citizens: 1st, favored citizens—2d, citizens tolerated—3d, citizens oppressed; and those of the third class will necessarily be, under the new arrangement, the city of New Orleans.

The great prerogative of the people in all free governments, consists in the taxing power; to lay the tax; appropriate the same, and finally to raise future revenue. It was that which led to the revolution in England. It was that which led to the first French revolution, and its consequent horrible scenes. And it was that which led to the declaration of our own independence, and therefore I reason that we should endeavor so to shape our course as to steer clear of all the difficulties we have had presented heretofore to our minds. What security I ask should we have against the abuses which the country members may inflict upon us, if this basis (federal) is established. Is it right that a minority shall have the power of taxing the majority? If so, let some of the gentlemen get out their democratic dictionaries and explain it.

The legislature then, with that principle established, will be able to tax you ad infinitum. First, they will tax your property; second, they will revive that odious measure by laying a tax upon some property, while some other property will be screened in the country from the payment of any tax; third, those brokers who were regarded by the legislature in a moment of excitement as public nuisances, have to pay $250 per annum for a license to pursue their avocations. They might as well have carried the ridiculous doctrine out, (for such an idea as that practised as it is, is a shameful proceeding) and made it $1000, then made a law that he who earned $500 over and above his expenses, should pay that also into the treasury, (provided he lived in New Orleans) in order to make the burden lighter on the wealthy planter in the country. Wherever we find inequality of representation, there we find one class of the citizens taxed for the benefit of the other class, who has the advantage of such extra legislators.

Mr. Conrad trusts that every thing like inequality will be discarded by this Convention; that no steps will be taken, nor any action had by them but on the broad principle of equal justice to all. He had seen with regret some of the country members appear to have been seized with a kind of indescribable fear whenever you mention New Orleans. They seem to regard us as a monster whose ravenous appetite is never to be satisfied till we have swallowed up every thing between the Balize and the Sabine river; of course taking in Red river and the Ouachita country. And they think the only way they can muzzle the huge animal, is to catch him while young, and gag him at once. But, Mr. President, is this the right way for men, who call themselves sensible, and for the most part doubtless are, to meet a grave question like this? I do not, sir, (said Mr. Conrad) appeal to the magnanimity of members, but to their sense of justice. I tell them they do not meet this question in the proper spirit, or if they did they never would commend so palpable a political outrage as they are now called upon to do. I will not appeal, sir, to any thing but their sense of justice, for be assured, that if the people see any disposition manifested in this Convention to rob the many of their rights or privileges for the benefit of the few, the constitution never will be ratified.

The President laid before the Convention a letter of invitation from the fire department, asking their co-operation in celebrating their anniversary on the 4th of March, which was accepted.

Mr. Penn moved that the debate on this subject should cease, and the vote be taken on Wednesday the 5th of March, which motion was agreed to.

Mr. Voorhies then moved an adjournment until to-morrow at 11 o'clock, which also prevailed, and the Convention adjourned.

Friday, February 28, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened by prayer from the Hon. Mr. Stevens, delegate from Sabine.

Ordder of the Day.—The Convention resumed the consideration of the Report of the special committee upon apportionment. The question pending being the motion of the delegate from Lafayette (Mr.

O'Brian) to strike out; under discussion when the Convention adjourned yesterday.

Mr. Roselius, I will postpone the remarks I intend to offer, if any gentleman in favor of the report desires to address the house.

No one having responded to the invitation, Mr. Roselius said. the first thing that struck him with astonishment in the report of the special committee was the disappearance of the principle enunciated in the first report, of equality and uniformity in representation. That great and fundamental principle was consecrated in the old constitution. Was it the intention of the Committee by exchanging it, to deny its truth? Did the gentleman on the committee come to the conclusion that representation ought not to be equal and uniform? If they have, said Mr. R., I should feel indebted to them if they would favor me with some explanations why and wherefore this important principle should be departed from. Surely, surely, nothing has been urged or can be urged why this great and all pervading political principle should be abandoned.

Is it necessary, asked Mr. Roselius, to recur to the fundamental principle of representative governments for the purpose of establishing this great truth---from which we cannot depart without endangering, nay without overthrowing the whole fabric upon which our free institutions are reared. Is it necessary to recur to those original principles, for the purpose of shewing the pivot upon which those institutions turn, the very corner stone upon which they are based. It would be trespassing upon the time of the house to do so. The discussion upon the question would be trite. It was self evident, and therefore with amazement I find the principle exchanged, obliterated from the report.

The first and all pervading principle of a representative democratic government is, that all the citizens of the political community were entitled to an equal participation in the political rights conferred by the social compact, to deliberate together and to decide upon the measures of public policy that were most expedient and proper. Such an immediate and direct expression of the will of the members of the community contemplated a limited extent of territory and a limited number of persons. But, what was the expedient devised to obviate the impracticability of assembling all the people, scattered over a wide extent of territory together, and obtain the expression of their individual will. Representation was employed to effect that object, and consequently it is apparent, that representation should be in strict conformity with a settled ratio based on the number of persons belonging to the political family that have a right to representation, or in other words to be heard in the decision of all political questions that may arise. No wonder, sir, I was amazed, thunderstruck, to find that great political principle obliterated, and no wonder I should feel great anxiety in the course that this Convention may ultimately pursue.

The honorable members that have participated in this debate in support of the propositions in the report, have not condescended to give us their reasons for the abandonment of the principle, that representation shall be equal and uniform. They have not favored us with any argument in relation to that point. If they have I have not heard it. I have heard much discussion, much eloquent declamation, but not a single reason advanced. I have listened in vain to hear any thing assuming to justify this house in laying its hands upon the fundamental principle of our social fabric, upon which the safety of the country materially depends—the great pillar which sustains the political edifice.

The gentleman from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs,) to my utter astonishment, I must confess, declares that there is no such thing as an equality of representation; that it is a chimera, a wild delusion. He says farther, that the idea of equal rights is an absurdity: That they are beautiful theories, but impracticable in practice. Is it come to this? And do we hear it urged in this body—the sad conclusion avowed in this assembly, that the beautiful system of government, that we have the happiness to live under, is a mere chimera—a mere stretch of the immagination—nothing more than a fancy sketch—without any thing solid—without any thing tangible to rest upon! If this be so, methinks our labors will be in vain. It were better we should at once disperse. Unless equality of representation and equality of rights be tangible things—be real and substantive, our labors cannot conduce to the advantage of our constituents. I boldly and emphatically deny the truth of that gentleman's proposition. I say that the assertion is destitute of foundation, and is not sustained by the practice or the experience of our government. I say that the experiment in the United States, have established beyond a possibility of a doubt that there are such things as equality of rights and equality of representation. That they are not only feasible, but that they are the only foundation upon which a republican government can rest. Away, then, away, then, sir, with the idea that there is no such thing as as equality of rights and equality of representation. It is not true, And if it be true, and they are, indeed, mere immaginary things—mere utopias of excited fancy—it is better we should not waste our time and our labor in filling seats in this assembly. If we take that as the argument of the gentleman that would despoil the city, that would shear her of her political strength, it is not a good argument; it is no argument at all! So far from authorising a departure from the fundamental principle of equality and uniformity, it proves nothing. It has no foundation. It is contradicted by the experience of mankind. This same principle, which has been questioned in this body—which has been deliberately pronounced a mere chimera, is spreading over the world—is gaining ground over the universal world!

The reasons that have been given for restricting the city in defiance of all principles of equality and uniformity were unworthy of the dignified and liberal members that composed this assembly. To use a happy expression of a member—it was unworthy of the fathers of the State. The people have confided to their representatives here, the important trust of reorganizing the organic law of the State. Petty feelings and local jealousies should find no place in this hall. Such an assembly convened for such a purpose should not be actuated by sectional feelings and petty strifes. No one portion should be agrandized at the expense of another, but equal justice ought to be meated out to all alike.

From what has already taken place in reference to the subject now under consideration, I begin to fear that there is a premeditated design to sacrifice the city of New Orleans and to believe that there is alas! but too much truth in the remark of an honorable delegate, that the doom of the city of New Orleans is about to be pronounced, and that she is to be put under the bow of a majority of this house. Let us examine into the facts. It is incontrovertible that there exists a settled determination to disfranchise the city, not only by adopting a basis unfavorable to her just representation—but by subjecting her to the penalties of a proviso. The obvious tendency of the adoption of the section as reported, will be to confine the representation of the city to fourteen members—excluding one member allowed to the right bank of the river, in the parish of Orleans. If the basis of elector were assumed for the representation, according to the data furnished by the committee, the city of New Orleans would be entitled to forty-seven members. Now, sir, there is a striking difference between the forty-seven members to which the city would be justly entitled, and the fourteen that is conceded to her by the restrictive system of the committee. What would be the number to which the city would be entitled taking population generally as the basis? She would have a right to not less than thirty-four. But let us go on one step further. What would be the result if the federal basis were adopted? From the same data furnished by the committee, it appears that the city would be entitled to twenty-three representatives. Yet we are proscribed in the report to fourteen!

The two measures proposed by the committee in their report, are aimed directly at the city of New Orleans. They can have no other tendency than to diminish—do I say diminish—to destroy the just and equal proportion of the representation to which the city is entitled. To smother the voice of the city—to disfranchise her—to deprive her of her political rights. It cannot be with any other design. In fact the design is openly avowed! One of the eloquent gentlemen attempting by the force of his logic and in the fervency of his fancy, to reconcile the city to this most iniquitous measure, tells the city delegation, tauntingly, that they should feel thankful for retaining one-fifth of the political power. I think (says the gentleman) that this is a great deal too much, but through complaisance, with the view of drowning your clamors, I will accede to the proposition that you retain one-fifth. Wondrous magnanimity!

I know nothing, said Mr. Roselius, to which this boast of excessive generosity can more appropriately be compared than to the vain boast of a highwayman who after robbing you of your purse, in a fit of magnanimity, tosses you a few coppers to bear you on your journey. There is no difference as to the principle. You have no more right to despoil the city of New Orleans of her just political rights than the highwayman has to empty the purse of the traveller. In both cases it is might—not right. In both cases, it is power—illegal—unholy and unrighteous power. What right has this Convention to say that a man because he chooses to fix his abode in the city should have less political weight than a man who chooses to settle in a country parish—that a citizen of New Orleans shall have less political weight than a citizen settled in the swamps of Catahoula or in the wilds of Ouachita? Is there any cause of incapacity about the citizen of New Orleans that renders him morally inferior to a citizen of the country? Why should he not participate equally in the common privilege of representation? Has he committed treason against the State because he happens to reside in the city? Is he guilty of felony—what high misdemeanor is he amenable for, that he should be stigmatized as unworthy of equal political privileges? It may be that the citizens of New Orleans have less intelligence than the inhabitants of the country—that the standard of intelligence is not in favor of the city. Has the city less virtue? What offence has its citizens committed that they should be punished politically? Surely there must be some political offence, or else they would not be curtailed of their just rights!

I have not heard gentlemen advance anything of that sort against the city.

But, why should we adopt the representation based upon federal numbers, as it is called? Why incorporate slaves into the basis of representation? One gentleman, a friend of mine, whose motives are as pure as those of any member, says that they should enter into the basis, because Louisiana is a slaveholding State—that slaves are persons—that they have rights which ought to be protected. This language appears to me to be somewhat extraordinary, in a country where slaves are counted as wealth—as property—that they ought to be heard in our councils, and should be taken into the constitutional apportionment of representation to which their masters are entitled.

We must concede one of two things; either slaves are property or persons, politically speaking. I do not pretend to argue that in a moral sense they are not persons, but according to the political condion of things in the State, and as forming an exclusive portion of the population of the State, they cannot be considered politically as persons. Suppose a representative government, a pure and unlimited democracy; some such unlimited democracy as Athens, Sparta, or Thebes existed here, under the peculiar form of that species of government, would the slaves be allowed to participate! Were the Helots called in to deliberate, to cast their votes? No! Would our slaves be allowed to deliberate among us if we were living under a pure democracy? No! How, then, can it be pretended that the slave population should enter into the basis of representation? Why not own the purpose openly, that this unjust, arbitrary rule is introduced to destroy the political rights of New Orleans. That basis can be maintained on no other grounds. But it is said that it is proper because it is found in the federal constitution! This argument can only be employed with the view of provoking an idle and useless discussion. Do those that advance it really believe it possesses any weight. Do they think us so ignorant—so unmindful of the history of the country to be deluded by it! Once before it was introduced in the progress of the debate. I protest against any such argument. Are we here deliberating a compact to unite different States under one government—States among some of whom slavery exists, and among others where it does not exist; are we here for such a purpose? The federal basis in the constitution of the United States, was a compromise. It is notoriously nothing else! Here we have assembled for no such purposes, and under far different circumstances. We represent but one people, interested in the same institutions, the same laws and the same customs, and I hope to God, animated by the same feelings; and having a single eye to the public good, and whatever is promotive of the interests of every section.

To recur again to the circumstance of the compromise upon representation in the federal constitution. I presume—I take it for granted that others are as familiar with the circumstances that led to it, and probably more so than I am. They must concede that there is no analogy between the two cases. Not the remotest. How could there be? In the one case thirteen independent States, having different laws, different customs, and in some respects, different feelings, were about to form a more perfect union, for national purposes. Here we have assembled for the purpose of form a constitution for one people. But we are told that this basis predominates in the slaveholding States. I regard that assertion as not well founded. So far as it is founded upon the constitution of Virginia, it is a mistake. The great question in the Virginia Convention was, the basis of population—of qualified voters, and a mixed basis of qualified voters and taxation. It is true that federal numbers were adopted finally, but they were adopted by the legislature of Virginia, and not by the Convention. Locality has been alluded to as a proper element to enter into the basis of representation. I am willing to subscribe to the expediency of this suggestion. Population alone I do not think forms a proper basis. Any measure having in view a mixed basis—property and population, or taxation and qualified voters, would be preferable, but the majority have decided differently. So far from entertaining the idea of placing the basis according to population, gentlemen say that a particular kind of property should be preferred. They say slaves should be represented—and are in favor of a mixed basis composed of population, and exclusively of slave property. If slaves be adopted because they are property, they are the most unstable and least permanent kind of property. Why not adopt other property?—Real property? Why confine it to slaves?

If we recur back to the course of proceedings from the very beginning, we shall find that the motive is to aim a fatal blow at the city. It is to diminish what we are told is her overshadowing influence. She is to be stript of her political privileges, and to be laid prostrate. And why is the city to be proscribed and her power annihilated? Because, says one gentleman, (Mr. Downs) the hero of Marengo discovered and acted upon the principle that masses were irresistible on the field of battle, and inasmuch as the population in the city have better opportunities of congregating together and meeting in council, than the inhabitants of the country, that are more isolated, and are dispersed over a greater extent of territory, therefore New Orleans shall not be allowed to exercise the power that legitimately belongs to her! It seems to me that the very converse of the proposition would be true. In order that people should act wisely and prudently, they ought to have the opportunity of consulting together, and of communicating their ideas with each other. The more facilities they possess of interchanging, the better qualified they must be for the proper discharge of their duties as citizens, and to select proper agents to whom they may commit the political powers of the government.—Whereas, if the citizens are dispersed over a wide expanse of territory, communication becomes difficult, if not impossible; they have no opportunity of interchanging opinions; there is no discussion to enlighten them; there is no harmony among them. It strikes my humble conception that the consideration of compactness, and the facility of consulting and counselling upon any emergency, so far from disqualifying the citizens that possess these advantages, it should be an additional reason why they should exercise their political power and be heard equally with the rest of the community.

But, sir, we are told that the people of New Orleans will possess the ballance of power. If the mass of the citizens of the State are congregated here, why should they not exercise their just proportion of political power? If they settte in New Orleans, it is because it is to their advantage. Because they find it to their interest to do so. But is the mere circumstanco of their locality—of the place where they may cast their lot, to deprive them of their political rights? Is there any justice, any reason in this? New Orleans is to be despoiled of her just representation; but it is not to be lost. It is to be filched from her and transferred to the fourth congressional district, which has not, from its remoteness, a particle of identity or sympathy with her. The moment that the combined forces of the country have succeeded in reducing us, in taking from us our rightful portion of political power, it is quite likely they will begin to squabble among themselves as to the distribution of the spoils! That will be the next difficulty.

Is it not more becoming not to depart from the paths of justice—not to introduce an arbitrary rule—a flagrant and unjust principle directed towards a particular portion of the citizens of the State?

Mr. Roselius said, that although this discussion had occupied a great portion of the time of the Convention, he was unwilling to listen to the peculiar line of argument addressed to the house by those hostile to a just representation to the city, without making a reply. The question involved was too vital. It struck at home, and its terrible effects upon the constituency, that he had the honor in part of representing, induced him, although in a feeble state of health, to raise his voice to prevent, if possible, this crying injustice from being consummated.

He presumed that the new constitution would be submitted to the people at large for their ratification. Few, if any—if he were not mistaken—were favorable to the idea that the constitution should go ino operation without having first passed the ordeal of public opinion. If there were any so disposed, they would be assuming a fearful responsibility by attempting to force the constitution upon the people. He apprehended that the course to be pursued would be to ascertain whether the constitution was acceptable to the people. If he were right in that view, was it to be expected that the people of New Orleans would vote for ratifying a constitution which outraged every principle of justice, as far as they were concerned; that they would be so lost to a proper sense of the injury as not to resent it by repudiating indignantly the instrument in which they were stigmatized and excluded from a just participation of political power common to the balance of the State. Let not gentlemen lay the flattering unction to their souls, that the reflecting citizens of New Orleans, as has been stated, will be satisfied after a while. This notion, if entertained, is a gross delusion, and those that entertain it know nothing of the character of the people of New Orleans. Before this issue all party distinctions will cease. Not a single vote in the city will be cast in favor of a constitution which contains so infamous a proposition. The city will be united in its resistance, and will have the sympathies and voices of the country who are not insensible to the dictates of justice. This constitution, with such a principle, will never be sanctioned—never! never! never! In common parlance, the delegation from the city will take the stump in opposition to its ratification, and will point out its gross and flagrant injustice. They will appeal from the decision of this Convention to the decision of the people.

Mr. Voorhies called up the resolution offered on yesterday by Mr. Penn, viz:

Resolved, That Wednesday, the 5th of March, at one o'clock, be and the same is hereby fixed for taking the vote on the apportionment.

On motion of Mr. Porter, said resolution was laid on the table indefinitely.

On motion of Mr. Downs, 2½ o'clock this day was fixed for the taking of the vote on the apportionment.

The 7th section, as reported by said committee of 12, was then called up, viz:

"No new parish shall be created with an extent of Territory less than four hundred square miles, nor with a population less than the full representative, nor shall any parish be so divided as to leave it with a smaller area or population than is above expressed."

Mr. O'Bryan offered the following as a substtute for said section, viz:

"Each parish shall have one representative, and beyond that, if entitled to any more, in proportion to the number of voters in each; Provided that no parish or city shall ever have more than one sixth of the whole number of representatives."

On Motion of Mr. Grymes, the section and substitute were laid on the table, subject to call.

On motion of Mr. Porter, the rule fixing half past two o'clock to-day, for taking the vote on the apportionment, was rescinded.

Mr. Downs said it was not his intention to have taken up the valuable time of the Convention by offering any remarks. He was drawn into the debate by the attacks that were made upon himself and the other members of the committee. He had waited long to see whether any other gentleman from the country would rise to repel the reflections indulged in by the gentleman that represent the city, but as no one had done so, the duty devolved upon him.

I have heard nothing, said Mr. Downs, to shake my conviction in the expediency of adopting the federal numbers as the basis of representation. I will not therefore add any thing to the arguments I have already adduced upon that point. I think these arguments are irrefutable.

I will now proceed to examine the proviso reported by the last committee, which has also given rise to some severe animadversions. The original report created a great deal of dissatisfaction on the part of the delegation from the city—and particular complaints were uttered against the 4th congressional district which was held entirely responsible for the character of that report. Its assumed injustice and partiality were made the pretext of referring the subject to another committee, whose opinions it was confidently predicted would be of an opposite character. But now, that the last committee have acted, the same gentlemen are in no better humor; and so far from considering their situation as being bettered they seem to think that they have fallen from the grid-iron into the fire! I really think the gentlemen would have consulted their interests quite as well had they avoided the particular mode of arguing that side of the question—and not have attempted to domineer over the country, by violence and threats, and by the employment of epithets calculated to wound the feelings of that portion of the population of the State, residing in the country.

One gentleman from New Orleans spoke of the country as being habited only by reptiles.

(Mr. Roselius. I referred to the uninhabited portions of the country. I certainly did not intend to apply the term to any portion of the people, and I cannot understand how the gentleman could so construe what I said.)

Mr. Downs: another one of the gentlemen from the city, assumes that whether a country parish have a representative or not, is a matter of perfect indifference. It may be so to the genileman, and I have no doubt that it is, but the matter is quite different to the parish herself. Her representation is as essential to her as the representation of the city is essential to the city, and perhaps more so; for New Orleans being the seat of government, without any delegation in the legislature, would have sufficient political influence to protect and promote her local interests.

(Mr. C. M. Conrad: The gentleman mistakes my remark. I said that it was a matter of indifference whether a small parish was represented distinctly, or conjointly, with another parish of similar dimensions. Their interests were identical.)

Appeals have been made to the city to reject the constitution, unless the country be willing to divest herself of political power, and transfer it to the city; and we have been told, that if the country did not concede this to the city the constitution will be rejected. Such a resort would be unfortunate indeed; but I entertain no fears that if the constitution be rejected, it will be on that ground. The citizens of New Orleans will see that they are allowed one fifth of the members in the house of representatives; and that so far from this allowance manifesting an illiberal and contracted spirit on the part of the country, it is a fair proportion, and is in accordance with the ratio that has been allowed to the city from the formation of the State government, with trifling variations.

From my examination into the subject, said Mr. Downs, I find that according to the apportionment of 1812, New Orleans had four out of twenty-four representatives. In 1826, according to the apportionment of that year, New Orleans had seven out of fifty representatives, being about one-seventh; and in 1841, the period of the last apportionment, the city was allowed ten out of sixty representatives, being one-sixth. So there is but little difference in the amount of her political influence for the last thirty-two years, and it cannot now, with any truth, be said that there is any disposition improperly to curtail her influence, and to deprive her of any portion of the weight to which she has heretofore been entitled.

In conceding to New Orleans one-fifth or one-sixth of the representatives, by reason of the concentration of her population, she will possess a formidable power. If, in addition to their advantage of concentration, she retains the seat of government, her influence will to a considerable extent mock the legislation of the country. We have the political fact of a section of country in the United States without a representation, having her interests as carefully watched over, and her wants and wishes responded to as fully as if she actually was in possession of a numerous and active delegation. He (Mr. Downs) alluded to the District of Columbia.

So far from there being a disposition to oppress the city of New Orleans and to act with severity towards her, our legislation is constantly making exceptions in her favor, and it may be said that a separate body of laws have been made exclusively for her convenience and the development of her interests. It is true, that her position as a great commercial city requires, in a great measure, the adoption of different principles; but independent of that consideration, the utmost latitude is allowed to her representatives. Why, it was only this morning that this spirit to accommodate the city was strikingly manifested, as it is almost daily in the proceedings of the legislature. The city of New Orleans was exempted from the provisions of the fee bill, on the motion of the senator from New Orleans, in the senate, where she has but a single member. When an increase was made in the apportionment, it was principally on her own account and for her benefit, for her proportion of increase was greater than allowed to the balance of the State. Eleven members had been conceded to her, but upon an examination of that apportionment, it was found that one of the parishes was omitted, and on the motion of a distinguished member of the senate, now no more one member, was taken from the city and given to the parish that had been omitted.

But say the advocates of those that favor a monopoly of political power on behalf of the city, the city pays the greatest amount of taxes and therefore ought to have the preponderating influence. I contend there is as much error in this assertion as there is in others that are so lavishly made to sustain the unreasonable pretensions of the city. The total revenue of the State for the year 1843, according to the treasurer's report, is $345,730, of which New Orleans contributes $65,483—leaving a balance of $280,247 in favor of the country; and which shows that the city pays about one-fifth of the taxation. Taxation, too, then it seems, tallies precisely with the representation accorded to her of one-fifth. To this amount of $65,483, those who attempt to sustain the assertion that New Orleans pays the greatest portion of the taxes, would add the amount of revenue derived from auctioneers and upon certain professions. But I contend that this amount is not derived from the city. It is derived and is a tax upon the people of the country—it is they who pay it. Who fill your boarding houses but transient persons who have, in fact, to contribute the tax upon those establishments? The same remark will hold good to the tax upon auctioneers, for whose produce is it that is sold? It is true that the tax is collected in the city of New Orleans, and upon that is raised the superstructure that it is she that pays it. I contend that it is no more the city of New Orleans that pays it, than that she pays the millions that are collected in duties at her custom house. The city of New York once raised a similar pretension, that she was entitled to great favors because her custom house contributed the greatest portion of the revenue derived from imposts. But to this pretension Mr. Jefferson appropriately replied: why, then remove the custom house to the opposite side, and it is there then that these duties will be paid.

A great deal has been said about the board of public works; it is pretended that all the expenditures it entailed were for the country. But who after all enjoyed the benefits of these improvements? It was the city of New Orleans. It opened to her new business, and augmented her commercial wealth. The whole amount of those expenditures amounted to $540,053. They were, in fact, more for the benefit of the city than for the country, but placing them entirely to the account of the country. What have we on the other hand to balance those appropriations? Let us look at the amounts appropriated to the city.

For the draining company,	$50,000
Charity hospital,	225,000
N. Orleans and Nashville R. R.,	500,000
Mexican Gulf Rail Road,	100,000
	$875,000

Here we have $875,000 to offset $540,053 appropriated to the board of public works. In addition to this there is an annual appropriation to the Charity Hospital of $15,000. This item of the Charity

Hospital is nearly sufficient to offset the appropriation to the Port Hudson rail road. Hence it may be inferred upon what an unsubstantial basis rests all the declaration that the country is hostile to the city and wishes to monopolize the treasury to herself. But this is not all; the city comes in for several other largesses. As regards the Charity Hospital—far be it from me to regret the liberality of the State,—I have invariably voted for these appropriations and invariably will vote for them, because that institution is an honor to humanity—its doors are thrown open to the unfortunate and the needy, let them come from where they may. But I allude to these appropriations to show that the country is not niggardly and illiberal towards the city. It would be convenient for similar institutions to be established and sustained by the bounty of the State, in the country, where poverty and wretchedness are not even known, although limited in their extent, when compared to the city. But yet nothing of the kind has been attempted in order not to divert a single dollar from the institution in the city. The imposition of taxation, too, said Mr. Downs, bears with greater severity upon the country than upon the city. The tax upon slaves applies to all slaves, old, young, worn out, and decripit. It is not the effective force that is taxed. The planter, work as he may, is scarcely able to make the two ends meet, while the merchant that sells his produce is taxed only something like twenty dollars for all his transactions. Examine the list of bankers and capitalists, and you will find that they are wielding millions of capital and realizing the interest without paying one dollar of tax upon that capital. A termination ought to be placed upon the heavy burthens imposed upon the country. The people, although groaning under it, have got accustomed to it, as usage establishes precedents with as much force as written law. Hence it is, we find that although the States are expressly prohibited from issuing bills of credit, still custom has established it so completely that there is not a court of justice that would pronounce the issues of a bank illegal. And how did these institutions come among us, and for whose particular benefit were they created? They were created for the city, and it was not until the bank fever raged, that the country was propriated by the establishment of branches.

In addition to all the other advantages enjoyed by the city from the patronage of the State, Mr. Downs instanced the preponderance of public offices in the city—the preponderance of the judiciary in the city. New Orleans was the residence of the principal public officers of the State, and was the recipient of almost all the money drawn from the treasury to meet the current expenses of the government.

Mr. Downs, in conclusion, disclaimed the slightest feeling of prejudice against the city. It was an unfounded assertion that the country was jealous of the city. No such feeling was entertained, as he conceived he had abundantly shown in this debate. For himself, he was proud of the city as the metropolis of the south. He wished her to thrive and to flourish. But at the same time the interests of the country ought not to be sacrificed. The course recommended by prudence and sound discretion, was to give the city her just relative weight, without committing the destinies of the country into her hands. Was it perceivable that the onward career of New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore were impeded by restricting those cities in their representation. Such had not been the consequence, and it would not be the consequence here.

Whereupon, on motion, the Convention adjourned.

SATURDAY, March 1, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. WATKINS opened the proceedings by prayer.

The Convention, in the absence of other preliminary business, proceeded to the

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SECTION SIXTH—ART. —.

Before proceeding with the debate,

Mr. President: said Mr. CHINN, I conceive, with so small a number of members present, we ought not to proceed with such an important debate as the one we have before us; and therefore I propose and move that the further consideration of it be postponed until Monday.

[Several members came in while the honorable delegate was making his remarks, and as he perceived the house had become ordinarily full, he withdrew his motion.]

Mr. Mayo took the floor. He was, he said, desirous to say a few words, to enable his constituents, as well as the Convention, to understand the reasons for the vote he should give upon the present question. I am in favor of making the duly qualified electors the basis of representation. The Convention has, by the section which it has adopted upon the subject of suffrage, decided that all free white male citizens above twenty-one years of age, who have resided two years in the State and one year in a parish, shall be permitted to exercise the rights of electors, and by that provision have entrusted to those persons, and those only, the exercise, in the first instance of the sovereign power of the people. In other words, we have delegated to the electors the political power of the State. It appears to me, that an apportionment of representation based upon voters will be likely to be more permanent, and less likely to fluctuate, than any other that has been proposed, and for that reason more just. Notwithstanding my preference for the electoral basis, however, sir, I am induced to vote against striking out the clause which provides for the federal basis, which I understand has been proposed and reported by the committee as a compromise. I fear the consequences of striking out may be as they were found to be on another occasion, when it was proposed to strike out ten years —the term of residence required by the report of the committee on the executive department, to qualify a citizen to be eligible to the office of governor. I then voted against striking out ten, notwithstanding I was in favor of a shorter period; fearing that if it were stricken out, the blank would be filled with a number less acceptable to myself and the friends of a shorter period than ten years. When the question was taken on striking out "ten," almost all who desired a shorter, as well as those who desired a longer period, voted to strike out. Ten was stricken out, and the consequence was that the blank was filled with fifteen, which, I am induced to believe, was less acceptable to a majority of the Convention than ten would have been. My reason then sir, for voting against striking out, is not that I prefer the federal basis; but because I fear that if that basis be stricken out some other may be inserted that will be less acceptable to me than that which it is proposed to strike out. If all who prefer the basis of electors, as well as those who prefer the basis of the whole population, white and black together; those who prefer the whole white population and those who prefer the basis of all white males over twenty years of age, vote to strike out, the clause will certainly be stricken out, and it is impossible to conjecture what will be inserted in its place. The federal basis has much to recommend it. A portion of the rights of persons are extended by our laws to slaves. They are by law protected in their lives, and from cruel treatment from their masters, and to that extent are recognized by law as having, in part at least, the rights of persons. This reasoning, by which an increase of representation on their account is claimed, has some degree of plausibility, as well as that by which the increase is claimed on the ground of their being property, which some think should, in part, form the basis of representation.

The argument upon the question of striking out the federal basis has been very discursive, and has embraced the question of restricting the representation of New Orleans. It does not appear to me that the question of restricting the represention of the city has properly anything to do with the present question, for I believe and hope it is intended to limit its represention to a less number than it would be entitled to under any ratio of apportionment that has been proposed, that is, less than would be apportioned to her by a regular division on the basis of voters—the federal number, or any other basis proposed. But as the question has been debated as though the question of restriction were now really before us, I will follow the example set by others, and reply to some remarks that have been made, and will here observe that I shall not say anything with an intention to give offence to any one, that I entertain feelings of respect towards the delegation from the city, as well as towards the city itself.

The member from New Orleans, (Mr. Roselius) who addressed the Convention yesterday, expressed the utmost astonishment that the last committee that reporte upon the subject of apportionment, should have expunged, as he termed it, the principle of equality and uniformity of representation, which are contained, he informed us, in the present constitution. The words equal and uniform are contained in the present constitution, but the principle of equality and uniformity of representation are not to be found in it. Great alarm was manifested at the disappearance of the words equal and uniform from the report, and we were told that by obliterating them from the fundamental law, we were laying sacriligious hands upon the constitution: that by departing from the all pervading principle of equality and uniformity, the whole fabric upon which democratic government was based, would be overthrown. I confess sir, that the use of the terms democratic principles always affords me pleasure when I have a hope that those principles can be put in operation, and pain, when accompanied by the reflection that they must be violated. The words equal and uniform, it is true, are used in the section of the present constitution, upon the subject of representation. It is also true that they are only used in that instrument to be violated; for that constitution provides for a representation in the senate most unequal and unjust, and entirely disproportionate to the number represented. However well the use of these terms may suit others, I do not desire to see them used in the constitution we are framing, at least not in the sense in which they are used in the present constitution, to define anything relating to the apportionment of representation, because their meaning is vague, indefinite and incomprehensible. What do they mean in the present constitution, or what will they mean if inserted in the section under discussion? Representation shall be equal and uniform. The use of the terms, it is true, are well calculated to impress upon the unobserving mind, the idea of harmony and consistency; but how is equality and uniformity to be enforced by virtue of their use. Representation must be equal. Equal to what, or equal with what? Equal with the different areas of territory, of the different parishes or sections of country represented? Equal by being proportioned to the number of qualified electors in each parish?—to the whole population of black and white?—to the federal numbers?—to all white males over a certain age? Uniform with what? I think sir, the true answer to these questions, and defidition to the terms, as used in the present constitution will be found to be—equal with nothing, and uniform with nothing, and that no definite meaning can be ascribed to them, and for this reson I prefer that they should be omitted in framing the present constitution.

Thus much sir, for the amazement of the delegate at the disappearance of these words. This was not, however, the whole cause of amazement. It is true sir, that this report, at which such great astonishment is manifested by a portion at least of the delegation from the city, is not charged with apportioning to the fourth congressional district twenty-nine members to the house of representatives and fourteen senators, as was, without the least foundation however, charged against the report of the first committee; but a charge is brought against this of a graver character, that it desecrates the principles of democratic government; and as if to illustrate and aggravate the charge, it was asserted by the honorable delegate and from the record too, viz: the statistical tables accompanying the report of the last committee, that by making the apportionment upon the basis of voters, New Orleans would get forty-seven representatives, and that to deprive the city of a representation in proportion to the number represented, was unjust, unholy and unrighteous. I have examined this record, this statistical table sir, as the honorable delegate from the city would probably have done, if the interest of his constituents had appeared to him to be violated by it, and find that it is incorrect. The greatest number that will be given to New Orleans under any census of voters, is twenty out of one hundred and one, as is correctly shown by one column of this statistical table, and not forty-seven, as appears from another column of the same statistics under the head of "representation on basis of voters." This apportionment of forty-seven representatives for the city is not based, as it purports to be, upon any census or other calculation of voters; but as is shown by making the calculation from another column, is based upon all white males over twenty years of age, according to the census of 1840.

This basis would be unequal and unjust, even if the same diversity of interest existed between the different parts of the city with each other and with the country, that exist between different portions of the country, for the reason that there are embraced in the census of the city, a greater number of foreigners not naturalized and of strangers and transient persons who hapen to be in the city when the census is taken, and who have no common interest to entitle them to representation, nor any attachment to our institutions, than there are of such persons embraced in the census of the country. As such diversity of interest, however, does not exist between the different portions of the city, so as to divide the vote of its representation, upon questions where the interest of the city and country may be different, the injustice would be increased on that account. This statistical table sir, is peculiarly calculated to produce confusion in making our calculations; and why it has been prepared in the manner it has, I am unable to determine. By one basis eighty-seven members are apportioned—by another, ninety-eight—by a third, ninety-nine—by a fourth, one hundred and one—and by a fifth, one hundred and eight. The column by which the largest number of representatives is apportioned purports to give the number on the basis of voters, when in fact such is not the basis, as any one may see by calculation; but instead of it, the number of representatives given by that column is based upon all white males over twenty years of age. Why there should have been such a diversity of the number of representatives, apportioned by the different basis, I am unable to comprehend, when nothing is easier than to find a representative number for each basis, that would have produced a result of the same number, or very nearly for each.

Having shown the error in the statistics reported, on which the assertion was founded, that the basis of qualified electors would give New Orleans forty-seven members, I will notice some of the assertions that were based upon it.

The delegate from the city, (Mr. Roselius) stated to us of the country, that we had no more right to restrict the city in its representation in proportion to the numbers to be represented; in other words, to deprive her of her forty-seven members which I understand him to mean, than the highway-man, the robber sir, had to take from the traveller his money or goods. That in either case the power was exercised by might without right. Apportion to the city forty seven members! Why sir, we might as well bind the country hand and foot, and deliver her over to the city at once.

I suppose sir, the object was to admonish the members of the danger of committing such an enormous crime, and that by committing them beforehand, they would be induced to desist from the commission of the sacriligious act.

Highway-men and robbers sir, applied to the delegates from the country, who pretend at least to desire nothing but justice!! I have sir, no desire to retort upon the delegation from the city, but will examine a little into the character and justice of the charge, and hope members from the country will not be moved from their position by the use of such denunciation and epithets. It was asserted by the delegate that the proposition that the number of the representatives should be equal to the number of the represented, was one, the absolute truth of which, was undenied and undeniable; that no reason had been nor could be given for laying sacriligious hands upon this democratic principle of republicanism.

I was struck with the force of these remarks, and fearing that a correct principle might be violated, I gave the subject my best attention, and on examining it, conclude that the principle which requires that the number of representatives should be equal to the number of the represented, holds good, only, when the local situation of the represented is alike,—when the number of the represented are scattered over a country of equal extent, or when the interests of the represented are equally diversified, then, and then only, can the principle hold good. But when the circumstances and local situation of the represented cease to be similar; when they cease to bear similar relations to each other, the principle ceases, and entirely disappears, as it certainly does under the circumstances that exist between this city and the country. And another principle takes its place, which if my conclusion be correct, is that representation should be so regulated, as to give to the representation of equal numbers, equal weight in legislation, upon subjects where a diversity of interests exists. This

I take to be the true principle, and the only true one under circumstances like those that exist in this State. The concentration of influence which a number of representatives will have, all coming from the same point, and representing similar interests, will necessarily give them greater power than the same number of representatives will or can have, representing each a large district of country, with a great diversity of interests. The former will vote together, and will always be strengthened by a portion of the representation from the country, the interests of whose constituents frequently differ from each other as much as that of either differ from the city; the consequence of which is that they can seldom if ever act and vote together, while the city can, and her interest requires that she should do so. It was stated yesterday by the delegate from Ouachita, that the principle that the number of representatives should be equal to that of the represented, was beautiful in theory but chimerical in practice. It is, sir, beautiful both in theory and practice where it holds good as a principle; but it is not a principle that can be applied in this case, and as it cannot properly be applied, it is not under the circumstances, and for the particular question, a principle at all.

Let us test the operation of the apportionment as it exists at present, and has existed ever since the present constitution was formed. New Orleans has but one-sixth of the members, and never has had, at least not for many years, if ever. Has she not had as much influence and weight in legislation, in proportion to her numbers represented, as the country? I maintain that she has, and much more; and that she has used it to the detriment of the country.

It was observed yesterday by the delegate from Ouachita, (Gen. Downs) that the various banks of the city were conceived here, and that it was here that the instruments were found to put them into operation: and though these remarks have not been replied to, I feel certain that they cannot with truth be denied. I have endeavored since yesterday to obtain the journals of the legislature in order to prove by reference to them, that the various charters of the banks in the city were presented by its own members, but have not been able to procure them. I am informed however, on authority that I consider good, that such was the fact, and presume that no one will attempt to controvert it. It was here that the first impulse was given to the rotten bank system in this State. It was here, under the influence of the city delegation, that it was determined to flood the country with a spurious currency in the shape of bank bills, containing promises to pay, which were made only to be violated, regardless of the consequences to the honest laborer, who was induced to take them in payment for the product of his labor, and so high did the banking mania rage here, that I heard a senator in his place say yesterday that the projects of charters flew about the city like falling leaves in autumn, and that they were piled up so high on the secretary's desk in the house of representatives, of which he was then a member, that he could not see the secretary's face for them. And for whose benefit were these banks chartered? Those who concocted them and acted a principal part in bringing them into existence and operation, were certainly first to be served; the good or ill effects to others were incidental, or more properly speaking, accidental.

The merchant, broker, schemer and idler, were all to be served, and if in serving them an accidental service were to result to the productive laborer, well; and if ruin resulted to the latter, it still was well. The result that has been produced already, is but too well known, not only to the producer in the country, but to many of the city, for whose benefit the banks were chartered. The whole country, with the exception of a few fortunate individuals, has been involved in universal ruin.

By delegating the power to banks to do the business of banking, the sovereign power of the State was also delegated and transferred from the people to these soulless corporations. They regulated the currency so far as it had any regulation, regulated the price of exchanges, controlled the price of merchandise, and of many of the products of the State, and controlled also the morals and virtue of the people; or probably it may be said with more truth, that by the operation and influence of banks, all was thrown into such disorder and confusion, as to be out of the reach of any regulator. The legitimate sources of the sovereign power were enfeebled and paralyzed, and the power itself held with an iron grasp by the banks. The spirit of justice that usually characterizes every well regulated community, succumbed to their power. To secure the payments of the debts of these institutions, the State has given her bonds to the amount of upwards of twenty millions of dollars, as appears by the State treasurer's report of December, 1843. The exact amount now due upon them I do not remember, but it is nearly that sum. Now, sir, I ask who is to pay these bonds that have thus been fastened upon us by the influence of the city, and of its delegation in the legislature? I may be answered, the banks will pay them, and you need not concern yourselves about them. I still hope that the most of them will be paid through the medium of the banks, and thus prevent the necessity of raising the amount by a direct tax; but if the banks pay them, they must first raise the amount from the citizens, the merchant or planter, or both, in order to be enabled to do so. They must get the money before they can pay it, and there is no way to get it but out of the produce of labor. But it is again said the merchant pays the most of it, as he is the principal borrower from the banks. Very true he does so, but where does he get his money to pay with? He must necessarily increase his profits upon the producer to a sufficient amount to enable him to pay this interest, and realize a profit besides, for himself. Hence it is perfectly clear, it is undeniable, that this enormous debt that has been fastened upon the banks, must all be paid by the product of useful labor, much the largest portion of which is performed in the country. Nothing useful is made but by useful labor—so that at the least, the most of their debt of twenty millions must be paid by the people in the country. It may be said in reply, that the planters and others in the country have voluntarily borrowed large amounts from the banks, and have been as much benefited as the city merchant. It is true that they have borrowed large sums during the rage of the speculating mania, and would still do so to relieve themselves from the consequent embarrassment; but when they borrow they have none to turn upon, as the merchant has, to make the interest from that they have to pay to the banks, and the profits upon that interest. They are real paymasters, and the real sufferers, and when they become involved in the banks by mortgages or otherwise, it is fortunate if they escape without losing all they have. These are consequences that have resulted to the country by the influence of the city, when her representation in the legislature has been but one-sixth.

We all know that one-sixth of the legislature could not by its vote simply, unaided by the votes of members from the country, carry any measure; but in legislation of this kind, it is always easy to present inducements to some of the members in a large body, come from where they may, that will be extremely inviting to them to aid in an enterprise, which can be made to appear to be laudable. A branch of the bank must be established in the parishes of some of the members, cashierships given to others, and loans made to the balance until a sufficient number is found willing to serve the people in their own way, to get the charter passed. It is said that men have their price, which it is likely there is some truth in, though I do not think that direct bribes would be either offered or accepted by the representatives of the people; still some of them may doubtless be flattered, some more than is for the good of their constituents. The city delegates in such cases have the advantage of a concentrated vote, while the country members will always be divided. Considering these circumstances, has not the city with one-sixth, ten members out of sixty in the house of representatives, had her full share of weight and influence in that body? And if she has, which I trust I have sufficiently shown, why should we grant her more? Where is the injustice in limiting her to that proportion? If to do so would be unjust, I hope we shall be furnished with some better reason than has yet been furnished; for I for one, certainly would not do injustice to the city sooner than to any part of the country, and as I observed on a previous occasion, to commit injustice in the apportionment will be more likely than any other cause, to endanger the sanction by the people to the constitution we are framing.

A sense of justice which I feel assured is entertained by every member from the country to the whole State, and every part of it, will prevent any injustice to the city; and I hope at the same time, that the decision necessary to impose such limits upon her as to prevent her from wielding an undue weight in legislation, will also be exercised by the country members,—those members who come from those parts of the State inhabited in part by men, and in part by reptiles, as the delegate stated. I did not understand him as using the term reptiles in an offensive sense, but taken in connexion with some of his other remarks, it was difficult to avoid the idea of a comparison of the citizens with reptiles. It is true that in all the northern part of the State there are reptiles, wolves, tigers and bears, that roam over the forest; but our constituency is composed of a magnanimous, patriotic and virtuous people; of men who understand their rights, and know pretty well how to preserve them. Another honorable delegate from the city, (Mr Marigny) has told us that New Orleans is the mistress of the State, and the country her servants. Truly she is sir, with the concentrated influence of one-sixth of the representation of the State, and has been for a long period, mistress of the State; and has ruled her servants with an iron rod, and now sir, when we manifest a disposition to take this rod from her, and so to enfeeble her as that she will only be able to act towards us the part of a step-mother! instead of a mistress, we are compared by her delegate to highwaymen and robbers,

I repeat sir, again, that notwithstanding the extraordinary tone assumed by some of the city delegation, that I have no disposition to pass the line of justice; at that line it is my intention to take my stand, and when the question is presented, to vote for such a proposition as will give the city such a proportion of representation as will secure to her a weight and influence in legislation, in proportion to the numbers represented, and no more; and I think the proportion she now has, is large enough for that purpose.

Mr. Eustis rose to address a few brief remarks to the house on this important question. It is true that his colleagues have covered nearly the whole ground, and yet he feels there is a propriety in his taking up the time of the Convention for a few moments, in order to satisfy his own convictions of duty: and further, that his constituents may know the principles which govern him in the vote he is about to give. He, (Mr. Eustis,) will endeavor not to repeat what has been said by his colleagues on this subject, because he is not disposed to weary or tire the Convention, but he will offer some views not yet advanced, and which have been doubtless overlooked. It is true, Mr. President, that I shall have to approach this subject with a perfect knowledge that at this moment we are in a minority on the question now before us for consideration; but, sir, it is not the first time in my life that I have seen minorities rise into respectable majorities, by the everlasting and immutable principles of truth and justice being clearly expounded to those heretofore in error. It is to such a class of gentlemen he, (Mr. Eustis,) feels he is now addressing himself; he believes them to be gentlemen as sincerely and devotedly attached to the interests of the State as he, (Mr. Eustis,) himself is; and he will go further, and say that which he believes to be the truth, that there is not a man among them who is opposed to the view he takes of the question now under discussion, no matter what his state of feeling be, political or otherwise, that would knowingly commit an act of injustice.

The gentleman who opened the debate, whom I regret not to find in his seat, the member from Ouachita, has told you that New Orleans is the heart of the State. He has shown you that there is an identity of interest and feeling between New Orleans every part of the State, even the most and remote. The sequitur of which is, that New Orleans comprises within herself the body politic of Louisiana. There we agree. No tree is felled, no spade is put into the ground, the result of which labor is not felt here. Agreeing, then, with the gentleman from Ouachita, as I cordially do, in these premises, certainly neither he nor any of his friends, have any reason to complain—for no more complaint could be made on the ground admitted by Mr. Downs, than the body, or the limbs of the body, would have a right to complain in performing their separate functions, whose life and being proceed from the pulsations of that heart.

New Orleans is, in many respects, different from any other city in the Union. She resembles no other capitol in the United States; and when the gentleman from Ouachita entitled her the heart of the State, he named her appropriately and well.

She was almost a giant at her birth; and she has grown so wonderfully as to astonish the world. Her brierrian arms extend from the Rocky to the Allegheny mountains.

On her destiny depends the weal or woe of Louisiana. And you might just as well take the heart from the human body, and expect a man to live, as to take New Orleans out of the State and look for any thing but general decay and ruin throughout the balance of the State of Louisiana.

Let us imagine, sir, that in spite of the universal opinion as to her future influence, her representation privilege should be curtailed, would that impede her growth? would that destroy her power, and her influence? or would she lose one scintilla of her magnetic attraction to every citizen of the adjoining States? No sir! The history of the past most clearly shows that such an hypothesis is not tenable; and shows you very emphatically that her march is onward. It is not for the sake of power that she wants her delegation on a fair and proper basis, because that power she is bound to have, and exercise, and no one—no system—either foreign or domestic, can ever take away from her her power. She will always be powerful in the intelligence of her citizens, in her wealth, and in the industrious pursuits of her honest, hard-working men.

Strike, then, the blow you meditated against her. No, sir, you dare not; and why? because in doing it you give her double power; and how? why by placing yourself in the wrong. The mere efforts you make to wrong New Orleans of any of her just rights; and the more you try to heap restriction upon restriction, on her the more fearful, I warn you, will be the just retribution that awaits you, for she cannot be impeded in her onward march by any such course as you are now pursuing. By your own showing this is your last ground; and even that will not avail you, for no human efforts can curtail her power or future greatness.

What surprises me more than aught else is the double injury which is to be inflicted on us, by mincing up the federal basis, with the liberal provision of limiting us to one-fifth of the representation even under that unjust and arbitrary rule. What can two such principles have in common? Take away the restrictive principle from the federal basis and apply it to the electoral basis, still the injustice remains, and besides, sir, I cannot conceive how they became grouped together, nor how they could arrive at the same conclusion by bringing together two principles utterly at war with each other; they at once show the futility of what we have heard so much of—the benefits of universal suffrage—if the section be persevered in, which is now before the Convention. On the one hand you say that all free, white male citizens over twenty-one years, shall be the basis on which you will erect political power, and that on that depends the safety and welfare of the country. On the other hand, you are striving with all your might and main to destroy the very temples which you professed yourself so desirous of raising; yes, you actually set to work to pull down the fair fabric of your own creation. Why, sir, this is boys' play, and not fit for sensible men to be engaged in. Have you any good reasons to give for such foolish conduct? You cannot have.

The law of 1841, calling this Convention, distinctly says that one of the main reasons is for the purpose of establishing a more equitable system of representation, as well in the senate as in the lower house, so that every parish and every district in the State, should be more equally represented than under the constitution of 1812, and more proportionate to their respective population. That is what the law calling this Convention clearly says. And now what does the report say? That says that every parish in the State shall be equally represented, except New Orleans. I ask can any thing be more remarkable than such a declaration coming from men who have met here to obey the mandate of the people, which is to give us a more equitable representation, than the one they have the boldness to make? which is nothing more nor less than saying that they are here for the purpose of putting aside the electoral for the federal basis, with the plain and unblushingly avowed object of having the city of New Orleans shorn of her power. Is this the feast to which we have been invited? Is this the great sturnalia of democracy?

If it be, then, indeed, am I mistaken in the object of my mission. The grand question is, are we to be just or not? The answer rests with you. But my view of the paramount duties of a member of this Convention is, that he should be just and impartial.

One question more on this subject. Was such a doctrine as that contended for, even broached in the legislature while they were passing the bill, calling this Convention? Was the slave basis ever thought of to be proposed to the people, as a proper representative basis? No, indeed: for if it had, we never should have been here. What would the Florida parishes have said? where the ploughs are followed by the farmers' children, and who can be seen regularly in the cotton field in the fall, gathering in the crop: why, they would have refused to send any man, however talented, who advanced the doctrine of the federal basis as the proper one on which to base State representation. The doctrine is repudiated by every State, or almost every State in the Union: and it was repudiated by the framers of the constitution under which we now live.

He, Mr. Eustis, addresses men of sense, men who know not only how to read, but to understand also what they read; and they know that the causes why Virginia agreed to adopt that basis was altogether owing to the contrariety of local interests, in that ancient and powerful State; and even then they left it to the wisdom of the legislature which was to put the constitution into being. He hopes the Convention will pause well, and reflect upon the mandate of the people who sent them here; and that will promptly reject the basis proposed to them by the committee. It is impolitic, it is unwise and uncalled for; it is rebuked by legislative wisdom, by the salutary lessons of the past, and by the examples which have been set us by the formation of every other State government.

But, say they, that is all very well, your reasons are very good, your argument indisputable, it is true. But that is not enough. We are determined that New Orleans shall be limited in her delegation! And why? because it will give her too much power.

Mr. Eustis thinks, however, that although a majority of the members of this Convention are from the country, and the power rests in their hands, they will exercise it with moderation and with justice; and here we approach the most absorbing part of the question. Let us not misunderstand it, but calmly see how it stands. You may say to the city of New Orleans, you will be too powerful under the proposed representation, if we act up to the basis we have adopted, and give you your just proportion; you will then be the majority, and we must find some means to check you. In other words, you, as a minority, holding temporary power, desire to shackle down and fetter the majority. And yet you cannot mean that, because you claim equal representation. All the professions that he, Mr. Eustis, has heard advanced on this subject must be hollow and heartless. If you do not admit the principle, that majorities must govern in all cases, pure democracy is not in you, and justice has taken leave of you forever.

Our political condition is too artificial for us to think of departing from that cardinal principle: we have here two distinct races, each entitled to their several positions, and protected in their rights; and he who will reflect at all on our condition and present situation, must come to the conclusion that numbers cannot govern safely here. It is not just; and institutions based on justice alone can stand.

A small tax cost one monarch his head, another his empire. Look well, then, to what you are doing; for injustice cannot, will not thrive. The object for which this Convention was called together was to take away from the old constitution those restrictions which amounted to unequality in the rights of the citizen, and to place all on an equal footing. The friends of popular government, of whom there are some in this Convention, and during the agitation of the question of calling this Convention, the most energetic and powerful arguments against restricting the masses, and yet they come here forgetting all the logic and eloquence they then brought to bear on this interesting subject, and thinking, as perhaps they do, that might makes right, they very cooly tell you that that is perfectly right now, which was wrong before; then they were struggling for power; now they think they have attained it, they ask you to insert a new, a more onerous restriction than can be found in the constitution of 1812; the restrictions in which we are now here for the purpose of removing.

In 1812 the power of New Orleans was comparatively as great as it is now; then we had a population of 24,000, and were entitled to four representatives. Was it then considered necessary to restrict New Orleans? Now we have a population of at least 150,000, and when we ask for a just share of representation, we are very cooly told, no, you cannot have it; you must be restricted; you must be shorn of your power. Talk to them of the framers of the old constitution being governed by principle and love of country, and they will tell you that people, now-a-days, think more and see further than they did formerly. For his part, Mr. Eustis, thinks that although they talked less, they thought more, and more wisely too; for they never engrafted a restrictive provision in that instrument, that was in direct violation of one of the fundamental principles laid down as the basis of that constitution. We are forced therefore to arrive at the conclusion that the old constitution was at least a model of consistency, and as such, it is entitled to our respect. There was no restriction on New Orleans in 1812; where is the necessity for it now? They say circumstances have changed the relative position of the city and country. We then ask them, in all candour, to explain how? and the only answer we can get is, that by the industry, diligence and enterprize of her citizens she has monopolized the trade of the country villages; that she has become the grand centre of the State; and that in consequence she has acquired so great a power over the country, in her mercantile interests, as to render it necessary to restrict her political power.

I appeal, sir, to the justice and good sense of every member on this floor, is that an argument to offer, in the discussion of a grave and vital principle affecting a people's rights? Are we to be told that because we have known how, by industry and application to our affairs, to make our position better than it was; that we are therefore to be deprived of our rights by a constitutional provision to punish us for what have ever been considered as virtues in the human character? If on the principles of republicanism we are entitled to the power, we ought to have it; and it is not reasonable in those who oppose us to meet the question by saying only that we have too much power already. The only answer we can get from them is—New Orleans has too much power, and must be restricted. Mr. Taylor was right when he told you that you could not curtail her representation in the lower house, without committing an act of injustice, while you have the power in your own hands in the senate, in which you have seven-eighths of the members from the country. Unless then you mean to contend, that you, as a minority, have the political right to commit a grievous wrong, because you have the numerical force, you must retrace your steps, and come back again to the true Democratic doctrine, that majorities alone must govern.

It is very natural for every one to look out for their own rights; nothing is more reasonable· but at the same time they should not forget the cardinal principle that they should at the same time do unto others, as they would that others should do unto them. Let all be equal. Don't try to govern a majority with a minority. New Orleans asks from you nothing but justice,and protection in her rights. Some represent one interest, some another on this floor. On the one hand we have those who represent the interests of the sugar planter,on the other,we have representatives of the cotton growing interest, while the middle interest is that of the commercial and manufacturing portion of our community. Now let all be fairly dealt with. A representative government cannot exist unless each interest be represented. That is the only perfect representation, and the only one recognized by the people of the present day, as constituting a real barrier to acts of oppression. Representing masses may do very well elsewhere, but will not answer here. While a por- of our population is regarded as property, you will say that there is an interest identified with that property which also requires protection, and that it should be represented as other interests. To this I answer, no. Take the senate, there you have the power to protect that interest, but do not deprive us of our proper proportion of power in the lower house. There is another and stronger reason than any which has yet been advanced, why it would be manifestly unjust to deprive us of that power; and that is, that the taxing power rest with the house of representatives. The city is seriously interested in preventing an abuse of that power; which, if the strength lay altogether in the hands of the country, she would be unable to prevent. give us then, the means to protect ourselves. Take the basis you call for, and restrict the city as you propose, and New Orleans will have cause to remember the month of March, 1845. Well may they remember the ides of March, which witnessed the act of a grave body of the people's agents, by which our children and our children's children were disfranchised, robbed of their privileges, because they lived in the city. If you do it, it will be a deed without a name. But he, (Mr. Eustis,) trusts they will reflect, and not commit so gross an act of injustice; for New Orleans cannot, will not submit to it. We ask nothing from you but equal representation.

You insist that the power, of right, belongs to you. But there you are wrong; you can have, no one can have a right to commit an act of injustice. We are governed in the course we take by reason and justice, and it is our sincere desire to show you that the course you are taking is impolitic, and that it is alike your interest and your duty to render us justice, and give us the means, at least, of protecting our own rights.

Under the law calling this Convention, it is made our duty to provide a more just and equitable representation.

From the commencement of our existence as a State, New Orleans has been entitled to one sixth of the representation in the lower house; that, up to this time, has only given her ten members. We now come and ask you in her name, for a more just and equitable number of representatives to be allotted to her; to grant her that which she is entitled to on a fair and equitable basis; and the law calling you into existence as a body, has told you that that is your duty. But you turn a deaf ear to her claims; you are blind to the progress she has made, to her increase in wealth, in population, and in science. You fold your arms quietly and say—no! now we have you in our power, we mean to curtail you and that forever. He, (Mr. Eustis,) cannot think that justice has yet departed from all the country members, and to them he appeals. Give us at least the means of protecting ourselves from unjust taxation.

Why animosity should exist against New Orleans, he, (Mr. Eustis,) is at a loss to conceive? For his part, were he a countryman, it seems to him he should look up to her with pride. Our increased population serves but to augment her usefulness to all; we are daily increasing our mercantile interests, and our mechanical interests. We have all sorts of employment going on in those branches, to say nothing of the fine arts, which are here cherished, fostered and protected. In short, we have every thing here which is calculated to, and does contribute to the welfare and happiness of the State at large, and yet the idea is held out that is right, that it is necessary to restrict—no, deprive is the more proper word, those very men, who are so laudably engaged in contributing to the welfare of the State, of their right to be represented in your halls of legislation. Oh! that such a novel idea should have been broached in the year 1845, by the collected wisdom of the State!

Recollect that we are all here to make a just and equal representation. Do as you threaten us you will, but remember that injustice is revolting; we shall have no rest, no peace, until the injury is repaired. Agitation will succeed agitation, until the evil is removed; and it may happen, that you will find too late, that by adhering to your present course, you have destroyed the labor of your own hands, the constitution of 1845.

Mr. Wadsworth thinks the delegate from New Orleans is wrong in attributing to the country members motives which do not exist. It is not, to his mind, apparent that they desire to curtail the city. The question is, shall we establish the federal basis or not. So far as New Orleans is concerned, he thinks it is immaterial whether the basis established be the white, or the federal basis. He thinks that put it on any footing, she will always have enough representatives allotted to her to protect her rights and interests.

We of the country prefer the federal basis, because we consider it necessary for the protection of our interests. The prosperity of the city depends on the prosperity of the country. It is the country alone that makes the city, and he, (Mr. Wadsworth,) thinks it is our first duty to have the productive property provided for in our legislation.

The country members now simply desire to fix the basis; and it is droll they should attack us on that point. The proper time for them to complain of restriction would have been, when we came to apportion on a basis that was fixed, if they had cause to do so.

Mr. Brent said, that he was desirous of offering some remarks in support of the vote which he intended to give upon this question. I feel (said he) Mr. President, that it is my duty, whatever opinion I might entertain about the correctness of the principles embraced in the report of the committee, in the abstract, to give them my support under the circumstances, which at present recommend them to our consideration. In forming our judgment, we should not confine ourselves to an examination of one point merely, but we should survey the whole horizon and decide under all the circumstances what would be best calculated to secure the peace, the happiness and prosperity of our people.

Before, however, proceeding to examine the principles embraced in the report, allow me to advert, very briefly, to the tone and the temper in which this discussion has been hitherto conducted. Sir, the report of the committee has been denounced from the commencement, in a spirit of bitterness and acrimony, altogether unusual in the halls of legislation. Its supporters have been stigmatized by an honorable gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Roselius) as highwaymen, robbers and plunderers, and in fine, the vocabulary of abuse and invective has been ransacked for epithets, which have been showered upon them with a liberal and a lavish hand. Although this is a game at which two can play, and although I would be fully justified by parliamentary rules, in retorting these epithets upon those who have sent them, yet, it is far from my design, to employ the time of this Convention, in any such unprofitable work, as that of recrimination. The question before us is too important and momentous in its character for me to attempt to increase the excitement of a discussion, which has proved too angry to be wise, and too harsh to be agreeable. Above all, sir, on an occasion like the present, should reason, not passion, be awake.

But the honorable delegates from New Orleans have not been content with either argument or denunciation. In case we do not think proper to adopt the basis of representation which they deem most suitable; in other words, if we do not consent that all the political power and influence of this State, shall be absorbed in the vast whirlpool of this great city, we are threatened with revolution. Blood, I suppose, sir, is to flow. We are to have let slip the dogs of war upon us, and the thunders of revolution are to shake this commonwealth to her centre. Sir, honorable gentlemen overshoot the mark, if they expect that the deliberations of this body are to be overawed by menaces of rebellion or revolution, let them come from what quarter they may. We are not to be deterred or frightened from the discharge of our duty by threats of revolution even from the important city of New Orleans. Whether our principles be palatable or unpalatable to the city delegation, we intend to support them by our voice and our votes, and we are willing to surrender ourselves now, and at all times, to the judgment of the country.

An honorable delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Eustis) speaking of some undefinable and mysterious danger, tells us to "beware of the ides of March. He dreads lest the ides of March should become celebrated in our history for some dark and fatal deed. Sir, if I recollect history aright, the ides of March have become memorable, because upon that day a tyrant was slain. If we are to have the same cause to remember this day, which Rome had; if tyranny is to be rebuked and despotism laid in its grave; if the rights of the people are to be this day secured by the adoption of a wise and just system of representation, whereby each interest will be protected, and the rights of the weak shielded against the power of the strong, then, sir, will this day justly become memorable in American as it is celebrated in Roman history. I might, sir, carry out the parallel, if I chose, in a way not at all suited to the notions of the honorable delegate from New Orleans, but I pass on, leaving it to be run out by others.

The federal basis, proposed in the report of the committee, and which has been attacked in such violent and unmeasured language, has at least one recommendation in its favor. It is of an antique and vene rable type. It comes down to us from a good old age. It is closely linked with the names of the best and most virtuous patriots of the land, and the maledictions which have been so unsparingly showered upon it, do not affect us, its present supporters, but rather fall upon the grey hairs and venerable forms of the wise fathers of the federal constitution; upon the heads of Washington and Madison, and Franklin, and Pinckney, and Rutledge, and Livingston, and that long line of illustrious statesmen who have circled the American name with a halo of undying and imperishable glory. Against the character of such men as these, the originators and projectors of this basis, no successful attempt can be made, not even when conducted by the talents, ability and eloquence of the city delegation. They are lifted too high by their virtues to be reached by the shafts of abuse and invective, and the thunders of denunciation roll harmless at their feet.

This principle, now the point of attack, is one of the compromises of the federal constitution, and it should be doubly dear to us, because it is one of those compromises; without it, this Union never could have existed, and without it, this Union could not exist for an hour. It may be said to be the very corner stone upon which is pillared the vast fabric of our national edifice. Let it be disturbed—let it be shaken from its foundation, and the whole magnificent structure will soon be reeling and rocking to its fall.

Sir, honorable gentlemen lose sight entirely of the position in which we place ourselves, by refusing to adopt this principle in our State constitution. There is no man in this hall but what desires to see this principle maintained in all its integrity in the national constitution. So far as relates to the general government, the principle is admitted to be fair and just and equitable, but when applied to State purposes, it becomes monstrous and shocking to every notion of justice and propriety. Is there not rank and flagrant inconsistency in this advocacy on the one hand, and opposition on the other? Do gentleman mean to assent that a bad principle, when inserted in a State constitution becomes a good principle when engrafted on the national constitution? Is principle of such material that it can be thrown into a state of fusion and moulded to suit the whim, caprice and fancy of honorable delegates on this floor? Is the national constitution an alembic in which by a chemical process, all the base ores can be transmitted into the precious metals? How, sir, do gentlemen reconcile the antagonistical positions, which they have assumed in reference to this principle? When they shall account for their inconsistency; when they shall furnish arguments in favor of the principle as found in the national constitution, it will be time enough then to refute the reasoning they have urged in the present debate.

An honorable delegate from West Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) has summed up the arguments against the federal basis, by informing us, that according to that basis, five negroes are equal to four white men. This argument, and this mode of stating the argument, is not original with that delegate. It is all borrowed. And allow me to say, Mr. President, that it comes from a very suspicious quarter. I have seen the gentleman's speech before in print. I have read his arguments in the columns of the Liberator and the Emancipator, and in the speeches of Mr. Giddings and Mr. Adams, and other abolitionists of the north. Sir, the gentleman has given us nothing new, he is a mere copyist, and has only followed in the wake of others who have gone before him. But to show that I do not misrepresent, I will give the first edition of the gentleman's speech as it was delivered in May last by the honorable Mr. Giddings, a member of congress, from the State of Ohio. I quote from the remarks of that gentleman, delivered in the house of representatives upon the annexation of Texas.

Mr. Giddings said—"But if Texas be admitted to the Union, it will be admitted as a slave territory, out of which several slave States will be formed, with all the advantages of a slave representation, under our federal constitution; the effect of which will be, to give the slaveholders of Texas an influence in the election of President, Vice President and members of Congress, in exact proportion to their disregard of the liberty for which our revolutionary fathers contended; or in other words, to the number of persons they shall hold in degradation and slavery. On this point I desire the particular attention of northern democrats. I say then that if the freemen of Texas shall each hold five slaves, each will exercise the same influence in electing federal officers, that will be held and exercised by four northern freemen. If each shall hold fifty slaves, he will have an influence in electing federal officers equal to thirty-one hard working, intelligent and virtuous democrats of New England or New York."

Sir, here is the whole argument of the delegate from West Feliciana. Mr. Giddings has travelled over this ground before him, and permit me to say, that the Ohio abolitionist has the advantage of that delegate, in the fact that he at least is consistent in his opposition to the measure. He has no connection whatever with slavery, but the delegate from West Feliciana insists upon making him submit to a principle which he is not willing to apply to himself and his constituents. Is there justice or right in this proceeding? Can we say with truth to our northern brethren, that we regard this principle as wise and just in our federal constitution, but that we deem it odious and unjust when proposed for adoption in our own State constitution? It can hardly be supposed that their metaphysical acumen will be as keen as ours, to draw the subtle distinction between a principle which is good at one time and one place, and bad at another time and another place. Sir, the judgment of condemnation pronounced upon this principle by the Louisiana convention, will have its effect, and may it not have a disastrous effect, so far as the interests of the south are concerned. It would do well for the members of the convention to reflect upon this, and not to condemn hastily, before they give to the subject that investigation which its importance demands.

Honorable gentlemen should recollect that we act in a double capacity, and have a double duty to perform. We not only represent the sovereignty of Louisiana, as a distinct and independent commonwealth; but we represent her as constituting one of the great sisterhood of American States. We are not only Louisianians, but we are members of the great family of the American Union. That we are deeply and vitally interested in upholding the basis of representation established by the federal constitution, no one will pretend to deny. We should pause, sir; we should move with caution and circumspection to any conclusion that may tend in any degree to unsettle that basis, or to furnish arguments in behalf of the efforts now made to disturb it.

The principle of representation established in the Federal constitution, is now the chief point of attack by the northern abolitionists. That fanatical party has already accomplished one result, important to the acquisition of its ends. The 21st rule of the house of representatives has has been rescinded. One of the outworks has been carried by storm. The floodgates have been opened by the American Congress, for the admission of incendiary petitions, and the dark and thundering torrent of Abolition is sweeping its billows, and foaming and maddening around the walls of our capitol. But the attack made upon this principle in the federal constitution, is confined neither to fanatics or associations of individuals, but it has been headed by one of the sovereign States of this confederacy. A State no less important than Massachusetts has thought proper to enlist in this crusade against a principle, the destruction of which would lead inevitably to the dissolution of our glorious and happy Union.

Here is the evidence of it, taken from the official records of the nation. I read from the proceedings of the United States Senate, on the 23d of January, 1844, as follows.

Slave Representation.—"Mr. Bates presented a resolution adopted by the legislature of Massachusetts, instructing the senators and requesting the representatives from that State, to vote for such an amendment to the constitution, as will allow only free persons to be represented, or in other words, to abrogate the slave representation. The resolution proposing the amendment was read, as follows.

"Resolved, That the following amendment to the constitution of the United States is hereby recommended to the consideration of congress, to be acted on according to the fifth article. The third clause of the second section of the first article, shall read in the words following: Representation and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which are or may be included in this Union, according to their respective numbers of free persons, excluding Indians, not taxed," &c.

Here, Mr. President, is the proof, that against this particular feature in the federal constitution, the whole battery of abolitionism is now directed. Massachusetts, forgetful of her ancient renown, has lent the power of her great name; to assist the sacrilegious work of pulling down the noblest fabric of government which was ever reared by mortal hands. Shall we join her in the crusade against the rights of the south—against one of the compromises of the constitution, and against the existence of our glorious Union? Are we to adopt the arguments of Mr. Giddings, and affix the seal of our reprobation upon that principle proscribed and denounced by Massachusetts? By refusing to apply this principle to ourselves, do we not virtually admit that it is unjust and unfair, and do we not place ourselves in the position of doing that to others which we would not should be done unto us? And cannot the abolitionists close the lips of our representatives upon the floor of Congress, by quoting the proceedings of the Louisiana convention, and particularly by quoting the speech of the honorable delegate from West Feliciana? One of two things is clear. Either the southern States have no right to insist upon the maintenance of the federal basis in the constitution of the United States, or they cannot with justice and propriety, object to the application of that principle to themselves. I am the advocate of equal and exact justice. That which I mete out to others, I am willing should be meted out to me. I desire to force no man to submit to a principle which I am not willing shall be applied to myself.

We are told that the case is very different as regards the State government and the general government, and that the reasons which render this principle necessary in the latter, do not apply to the former. Sir, I cannot understand the logic of the honorable gentlemen, who insist, that slaves should be represented in the national Congress, but should not be represented in the State legislature. Throwing out of view the consideration, that slaves are both persons and property, it does appear to me that the reasons are much stronger why this principle should be adopted in a slave-holding State, than that it should be adopted by the general government. While the authority of a State to abolish slavery, is not, and cannot be questioned, on the other hand the general government has no right to interfere with the internal regulations and institutions of a State. If then, any desire to protect that institution prompted the incorporation of that principle in the federal constitution, the necessity is much more apparent for its enactment in the State constitution.

If we were differently situated—if we were legislating for a people to whose laws the institution of slavery was unknown, the arguments of gentlemen in favor of the electoral basis, would to my mind be irresistible. But for weal or for woe, that institution exists amongst us, and there is no desire among the people of this State that it should cease to exist. The mere fact of its existence, must necessarily lead to a modification of our laws. Every motive of self preservation requires, that the legislation of the country should be accommodated to its existence, and the principle of representation adopted in the federal constitution, seems to be peculiarly adapted to the circumstances which surround us.

But the honorable delegate from West Feliciana, has attempted to make an issue upon this question between the poor man and the rich man, and he has told us that if he had avowed himself prior to the election, in favor of the federal basis, that he would not now be occupying the seat which he at present fills. He thinks that the poor men in his parish would have voted against him. I am at a loss to understand how the poor men of his parish would have been injured by the adoption of the federal basis. Although under this system, slaves are to enter into the basis of representation, yet in voting for the representatives, the vote of the poor man is equal to that of the rich. Any principle which goes to increase the representation of his parish, will confer as much benefit upon the poor as upon the rich, and if it should turn out that the delegate has advocated a principle which will diminish the representation of his parish, he will find it very difficult to satisfy his poor constituents that he has correctly represented their interests. I am differently situated. I avowed myself in favor of the federal basis before the election, and notwithstanding this avowal, I can assure the gentleman, that I received a very liberal support from the poorer classes of the community. Nay sir, I received a much more liberal support from them than I did from the more aristocratic and wealthy classes, who seemed to entertain the opinion that my election might in some degree, tend to subvert that form of government which best comported with their nobility.

A great deal has been said in argument, about equality and uniformity in representation. The changes have been sounded upon this doctrine of equality, from the highest to the lowest note of the gamut. This principle appears to strike honorable gentlemen with very unequal force. Those who are loudest in preaching up equality to-day, on to-morrow will not hesitate to disfranchise whole classes of citizens at one fell swoop. If I know my own heart, there is no principle which I cherish with greater reverence than the principle of political equality. It is the polar star of my political hopes. My attachment to it will survive, when these gentlemen after having accomplished their purposes, shall fall back upon their cherished doctrines of restriction and conservatism.

To obtain exact and mathematical equality in representation, is next to an impossibility. We may approximate to it, but the thing itself can never be obtained. The laws of population, and the geographical and political divisions of the State forbid it. Where large bodies of men are concentrated upon a single point, and embraced in one political community, and where the residue of the population of the State is scattered over a vast extent of territory, and divided into numerous political communities, it is impossible for any system to distribute the political power of the State with perfect equality. While one portion of the population is concentrated, and moves in solid column, to the accomplishment of its purposes, and while the other portion is divided and acting without unison, it is evident that the large and compact body, must of necessity have more weight and power, no matter what system may be devised, having reference only to the political consideration of numbers. For instance, the representatives of this city, moving in solid phalanx, representing one interest, and animated by one common impulse, are just as formidable to the delegates from the country, as would be a column of disciplined regulars, encountering the forces of a raw and undisciplined militia. Sir, these gentlemen are for keeping the promise of equality to the ear, but breaking it to the hope.

Look at our experience under the old constitution. That instrument provided that representation in this State should be equal and uniform, and be forever regulated and ascertained by the number of qualified electors. Could any thing be more just or beautiful than this in theory? And yet sir, the promise of equality was kept only to the ear, it was broken to the sense. Nothing could be more unfair or more grossly unequal than the representation, as it was practically distributed under this provision of the constitution. In proof of this, I have only to refer to the history of the past. At two consecutive elections in 1842 and 1843, it is well known that one of the political parties carried this State by large majorities upon the popular vote; in one case, electing their governor by fifteen hundred majority, and in the other, electing an undivided delegation to Congress, and yet it is notorious that this same party was unable to place a majority at that very time, in the State Legislature. What was the cause of this? The city of New Orleans throwing its vast weight into the opposite scale, decided then as it has always decided the political fortunes of the State.

Now the federal basis will have some tendency to throw power to the country parishes, and thus create an approximation towards equality, though of itself it will be insufficient to produce the whole result. Another advantage possessed by a large city where numbers alone are represented, is, that nothing is lost by the fractions which may exist over and above the representative number. Whereas, the losses to the country parishes from this source alone, are almost incalculable. For instance, suppose four thousand five hundred to be the representative number, established by law. Now it is evident that the city can only lose upon one fraction, whereas each and every parish in the State, may sustain a loss as heavy as that of the city itself. One-third of the people of this State, embraced within the limits of this city, cannot by any possibility be subjected to the loss of more than one fraction, whereas the two-thirds of the population out of the limits of the city, may be subjected to the loss of forty-four fractions, there being forty-five parishes in the State, including the parish of Orleans. Suppose each parish in the State to have a fraction of three thousand over and above the representative number, then the loss to the population of the city will be but three thousand, whereas the population of the country will sustain in the apportionment of representation, a loss of one hundred and thirty-two thousand. To take round numbers for purposes of illustration, suppose that there are one hundred thousand persons in the city, and two hundred and fifty thousand in the country parishes. The population of the city will then count as ninety-seven thousand, and the population of the country as only one hundred and eighteen thousand. Here is a great and a vast advantage possessed by the city, owing to the concentration of her numbers, and the fact that she constitutes but one political community.

In view of these things, Mr. President, I avow myself without hesitation, in favor of that principle embraced in the report of the committee, which provides that no parish or city in the State shall have more than one-fifth of the whole representation. This will give New Orleans twenty representatives out of one hundred, and what use she can have for a larger representation I am at a loss to imagine. Do gentlemen expect us to establish a different rule from that which has been established by other States situated similarly with ourselves? Pennsylvania, an exceedingly large and populous State, has thought proper to restrict the city of Philadelphia, whose relative proportion to that State is much less than that of New Orleans to Louisiana.—Maryland has arbitrarily limited the city of Baltimore to eight representatives, about one-eleventh of the whole number. South Carolina has placed a still greater limit upon the city of Charleston, and without any very urgent necessity, and yet we are asked to allow New Orleans, whose influence already overshadows the State, her full representation according to numbers, and without any limitation throughout all time to come. This Convention may perhaps accede to her wishes. The representatives of the agricultural interest may agree to surrender their constituents to the tender mercies of the stock jobbing and trading classes of New Orleans, but if they do, it will be a sad and fatal error, and bitterly will their posterity rue it.

Strong appeals have been made to us on the score of supposed identity of interest between the city and the country. I regret to say that this identity of interest exists only in the fancy of those who have made the appeal. It has no foundation in fact. New Orleans does not depend upon Louisiana for her wealth and prosperity. Her roots strike wider, and she gathers strength and nourishment from other sources, than from the State upon whose soil she stands. Look at her geographical position. The laws of nature which carry down the waters of the river to the sea are not more certain in their operation, than are those laws of trade which are building up this city with the rapidity of magic. Throughout all time to come, the trade of that vast and fertile region which lies between the Rocky and the Alleghany Mountains must centre in her ports. And then south of her lies the Gulf of Mexico, which, to borrow the language of another, like a monarch bowl at a feast, pours the rushing libation of its tides and wealth at her feet. Beyond lies the broad Atlantic which is already covered with the sails of a commerce connected with this city, that for its value and rapid augmentation, is scarcely equalled by any on the face of the globe. Sir, the domestic trade of this city with this State, compared with her vast foreign trade, is but as a rivulet to the sea—a molehill to a mountain. How then do gentlemen make out that identity of interest? New Orleans relies mainly upon a foreign trade, carried on with other States and other nations; and yet we are to be told that the country parishes have an interest identical with hers! It is an empty dream—an idle fancy. The country parishes of the State may languish in hopeless adversity, while New Orleans, like a huge vampyre, will feed and fatten and flourish upon their desolation and decay. Whatever disaster overwhelms the city will extend its ravages to the country, but when the country is affected, for the reasons which I have stated, the city does not necessarily sympathize in her affliction. There is much greater danger if the balance of power should tend that way, that New Orleans will oppress the country, than that the country will oppress the city.

We have been challenged to produce any instance in which New Orleans has shown a disposition to trample upon the rights of the country. Have the city delegation forgotten so soon the history of what was called the wharfage tax; and will they inform us what was the effect of that measure—what its object—who supported and who opposed it? Its effect was to tax the labor and toil of the producing classes of the country; its object was to redeem the shin plasters which had been issued by the broken and bankrupt municipalities of this city; and its ardent and unwavering supporters were the delegation from New Orleans. Will gentlemen persist in denying that New Orleans has ever attempted to oppress the country, when we cite them to this instance, yet fresh in the minds of us all. Sir, there are none so blind as those who will not see.

In the remarks which I have deemed it my duty to make, I do not desire to be considered as placing myself in an attitude of hostility to this great city. If I know myself, I have no feeling of unkindness in my bosom towards her. No one desires more earnestly than I do, to witness her success and prosperity. No one is more anxious to see her fulfil the glorious destiny which lies before her; and I trust yet to behold her the queen city of the earth, sending the white-winged messengers of her commerce to the four quarters of the globe and gathering to her exuberant bosom, the riches of the sea and of the land. May peace be within her walls, and prosperity within her palaces. But, Mr. President, the feeling of pride with which I contemplate her present position and future prospects, cannot outweigh my sense of duty nor induce me to forget the admonitions of the past. It is for the good of all parties concerned, that no one class of our citizens—no one interest in the State should have a predominating influence over the rest. Concentrate power where you will, in the hands of one man or one set of men, and it will be abused. It is the disposition of man—the propensity of his perverted and depraved nature, and it should be guarded against by wise and salutary enactments. There is every ground to apprehend that without some restraint, the commercial interest will absorb and engulph, like a Maëlstroom, all the other great interests of our State. We must guard against it in time, or when the evil does come, it will be too late to remedy. I shall sustain, sir, the report of the committee, without alteration and without amendment.

Mr. Ratliff would not have troubled the Convention nor have uttered one other word, to the few brief remarks which he made on that subject when it was previously before the Convention, had not he been so specially selected as the victim to be offered up to appease the excited and indignant feelings of the gentleman from Rapides, Mr. Brent. That gentleman has seen fit to address himself (in the violent phillipic with which we have just been indulged) most especially to him, the humble member from West Feliciana. Well, before he is led up to the altar to be sacrificed, he desires to express his views clearly and plainly, for he objects to the misrepresentations of the gentleman from Rapides, or to those of other gentlemen, come from whatever quarter they may, and what is more, he wants it distinctly to be understood, he will never submit to have the expressions he uses to be perverted to serve any gentleman for an argument, (for want of a better one.)

As he does not expect to be here when the vote is taken on the question now before the house, he is the more anxious to trespass on their attention for a short time, not to gratify any personal feeling he may have in the matter, but because he wants the position he has taken to be properly understood by his constituents. He (Mr. Ratliff) makes no pretensions to book-learning; at home every body knows him as a plain practical man. He does not indulge, therefore, in studies which he does not profess to understand, and he does not profess to understand any of the principles of abolitionism, which the gentleman seems disposed to attribute to him. I have never, Mr. President, read the Emancipator in my life, a paper which has been quoted by Mr. Brent as containing similar remarks as those which I advanced when this question was previously discussed. I have never yet read any of Mr. Giddings' or Mr. Slade's writings or speeches, which have been quoted as containing sentiments similar to those said to have been advanced by me; and yet, if we are to judge from some of the quotations which we have had read to us, they are principles which might readily be advanced by an humble peasant or a prisoner in his cell. The reasons, perhaps, why he has never had the advantage of Mr. Brent in getting such information, as he has indulged us with the knowledge of, are perhaps two-fold.

In the first place, he has never subscribed to any abolition paper whatever. In the second place, he feels certain that the reason he never got any sent to him, must have been from one of two causes, either that he was so well known as their determined and deadly enemy; or that they had regarded him as too small and insignificant a personage to serve their purposes. How the honorable gentleman came in possession of such documents he does not pretend to know, but one thing is certain, he (Mr. Ratliff) would hate to let the vile trash soil his fingers. When he was a candidate before the citizens of West Feliciana, no such question was presented to them, as is stated to have been before the citizens of Rapides, and if they had been, and he and his colleague, Mr. Wederstrandt, had maintained the doctrine of federal basis, he thinks one thing is very clear, they never would have been members of this body.

He desires at once to join issue with the gentleman from Rapides. He says the same reasons exist here for us to adopt the federal basis, as existed in the formation of the federal constitution to adopt it in that instrument; in other words, that they should be the same in the federal and State government. I cannot conceive there is a shadow of reason for such an analogy as he has endeavored to make.

In the first place, the one is a compromise entered into between the north and the south, when the interests, habits, customs and feelings are as different from those of the south as we can well imagine. In the federal constitution, therefore, the federal basis is the proper one; it has tended to allay angry feelings between the different sections of our country, and has produced a happy effect, but that is not so in the States.

In the second place, the other, the constitution of a State, is a kind of family matter, and the grand object every member of a Convention should have uppermost in his mind, is to deal out even handed justice to all. Now, in this State we have forty-five parishes, all the same people, all governed by the same laws, and all identified with the State by a common identity of interest and feelings. If that be so, and it cannot be denied, where is the justice of giving a wealthy parish a greater number of representatives on account of her having a larger amount of slave population than others? It is said that my parish would be benefitted by taking the federal basis, but, sir, it shall nevertheless not have my support on that account, for any evanescent advantage. I take a larger view and a longer one, perhaps, than the gentleman thinks I do; for what if, as is daily the case, the slave population is being carried from our poor and worn out lands to the rich alluvial bottoms of the adjoining parishes. With the negroes will be transferred the influence sought to be given to the possession of slave property besides, it is partial legislation and unjust, and shall not be sanctioned by me. Besides, it is hard to tell what may turn up in thirty or forty years, and it is my desire that hereafter I may leave no vote of mine on record but what is based on fair, just, and honorable principles. In giving to all an equal chance to be heard according to their proper proportion on an equal and fair basis of their white population, we shall not lay ourselves open to censure for abandoning any of those principles we have professed. Besides, I think the gentlemen who have taken the opposite side of the question will (when the figures come to be looked over again,) find themselves mistaken, and while they wish to increase their own power at the sacrifice of principle, feel rather awkward to find that instead of restricting New Orleans by adopting the federal basis, they will have added to her representation nine members more than she would be entitled to under the electoral basis. According to the voters of 1844, she would only be entitled to twenty representatives out of one hundred and one; and by the federal basis she would be entitled to twenty-nine, yes, almost thirty. It must be remembered that the census is taken in the month of June, then every body is here. We have a large part of the floating population of the world, while in the country we only increase in population from the proceeds of our labor. Now if New Orleans has the advantage over us fairly and honorably under the electoral basis, why in God's name let her keep it. If fixed at one-sixteenth of the house (of 100 or 120) why she can't have more than twenty representatives. Simply say that each parish shall have at least one representative; don't let us scare members away by supposing particular parishes are to be favored; and while upon that part of the subject, let me refer to the population white and black, in the parish of Rapides. I find there are 3,243 whites, and 10,511 slaves. He charges me that West Feliciana will be benefited by this basis being adopted. Suppose I were to act as the gentleman, in his zeal for my character before my constituents wants me, how could I even dare to look them in face? and when asked by them how I came to abandon their principles and my own, as professed on all proper occasions, I should have to say to them, "why, I know I was doing wrong all the time, and I felt ashamed of what I was doing; but I did it just to increase the political power of our parish, perhaps for ten years, certainly not over." What do you imagine would be the answer? let me tell you, they would say that [illegible]d not fairly represented them, for they never would take political power at the expense of principle.

The present position of the gentleman reminds him very much of a somewhat similar case in his own parish. A man who had committed a very grave offence, found but few friends to sustain him; and among those who censured him the most, was a certain eminent gentleman. Shortly after that, he became suddenly struck with the idea that the man was innocent, and every one wondered at this change in his conduct; it finally turned out that a fee of $1000 had wraught this wondrous change. Now, sir, I can't for the life of me help thinking that the 10,511 negroes in the parish of Rapides have had a similar effect on the mind of the gentleman, in making him so strenuous an advocate for the federal basis. I am a no time serving democrat, sir, I desire to serve my country on the broad principles of democracy, equal rights, and equal privileges; and I have never, nor ever will I take ground with any party that I consider wrong.

My motto is the same as that of the celebrated and eccentric Davy Crockett. "Be sure you are right, then go ahead." And this question when first presented, set me to investigating, and I asked myself after the examination of it, which is the fairest basis? I was compelled to come to the conclusion that it was the electoral basis, and that no other basis ought for a moment to be thought of. And now, sir, I would ask all men of all parties in this house, to come up and meet the question fairly, lay down a fair basis and settle it as if we were one family; fix it upon correct principles, and let no one throw impediments in the way, for the paltry gratification of a short-lived triumph of party. In support of his (Mr. Ratliff's) position, he quoted the opinions of Mr. Monroe on this subject.

"My idea has been, that it will be wise to base representation on the white population in the house of delegates; and to place an adequate check on the result of their deliberations in the senate. This is my opinion. By basing the representation on the white population, we are resting on principle; on a principle corresponding with the bill of rights and with the constitution; for our government is in the hands of the white people. We shall by this means rest on fundamental principles, and gratify the feelings of the people in every part of the community. Our constitution rests on that basis."

And, sir, said he, if I be in error, which I feel sure I am not, I at least err in very good company, for President Monroe besides being a good man, was a man of eminent ability, with a clear head and cool judgment; and withal, a pure republican. And he was in favor, as we see, of the electoral basis, when he was a member of the Virginia Convention, over which he presided.

Take then that basis, and you reduce the number of the representatives to twenty in a town of one hundred and one. And yet they are awfully scared. The gentleman from Rapides has informed us, in reply to a warning of the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Eustis) to "beware the ides of March." That the ides of March" was famous for having crushed a tyrant; evidently making thereby a responsive allusion to the city of New Orleans being now the tyrant. Now, sir, let me tell the gentleman from Rapides that he had better take the advice of Mr. Eustis, for if he persevere unto success in carrying any other basis than the electoral basis, the days of our political liberty are numbered; for nothing is more to be dreaded, than that in the struggle for political power in a constitution intended for all, party strife should be mingled in it. If it be permitted to enter into the conflict, the rights of the people are sure to be invaded, restricted and trampled upon, in the bitterness of partizan feelings. And tyranny takes the place of justice—representation would be a farce, and monarchy and aristocracy would hold the sway. Let us look at the other States surrounding us, and all bordering on the old States.

In the States of Ankansas, Missouri, Alabama, Kentucky, Mississippi and Tennessee, either the bases in their constitutions are, "the free white male population over twenty-one," or, "the electoral."

In South Carolina it is a mixed basis, but not a federal basis. And have these States ever been charged with abolitionism?

How was it in Virginia? Why it was settled by a compromise—and they left it to the legislature to determine the details, so as to render the diverse interests of the State one common interest.

Have not the New Orleans members shewn every desire to meet you in the same spirit of compromise? They have, and I respect them for it.

In the Virginia Convention on the question to combine, the vote stood 47 and 47, the speaker voted in the negative. On federal numbers, the vote was 47 yeas and 49 nays; rejected. On three-fifths, 47 yeas and 49 nays; rejected. And the compromise was only made in taking the federal basis, as the basis agreed upon, by striking out the property qualification of twenty-five acres of land as the electoral qualification. How then can that authority be referred to, when even on the compromise, there was only a majority of five votes for that basis—and twice rejected on all other modes proposed. Throw that authority aside then.

We were sent here to extend the right of suffrage. I dont suppose any body will deny that—now how are we about to do it? Surely not by giving one parish a special privilege over another, because they have more slaves in it. He, (Mr. Ratliff) while he admits the eloquence of Mr. Brent, is not convinced by a single argument that he has advanced. And he will never consent to put the black man on a footing with the white man. He had rather be charged with any epithet in the vocabulary of vituperation which he, the gentleman, may see fit to apply to him, than go home to his constituents and tell them that he had ever consented to place one hundred slaves, or the owner of them, on representative equality with sixty free white citizens. In deciding the principle of universal suffrage, we have virtually given in our adhesion to the electoral basis. But if we now change the representative basis, from the electoral basis to the federal basis, we shall virtually undo that work, and give a preponderating influence to those parishes with a large number of slaves, that will overbalance the smaller parishes. And I would further remark, that many of those parishes thus favored, contain large quantities of wild land, uninhabited; and when the large masses of negro population are concentrated on the alluvial lands, they are inhabited but by an inconsiderable number of whites; in many instances, by no one but the overseers on the plantations for miles and miles together. And shall we say that Rapides and such parishes are to overshadow West Feliciana, St. Helena, Livingston, and all the smaller parishes? He conceives that this Convention will never sanction such a doctrine. He feels sure that the calculation made by the committee, which says, that New Orleans would have forty-seven votes on the electoral basis is incorrect; for he knows the committee never dreamt of it. Taking the vote of November, 1844, the number would be twenty and a small fraction; and yet they say, New Orleans will swallow up the whole State. Give her a fair proportion, in God's name then, be it what it may; then in ten years make any apportionment on just and fair principles.

The cry against New Orleans then, I repeat, sir, is all a humbug, a solemn farce. She has too much at stake in the country, and is too closely identified with the interests of the different parishes for us to dread any thing from her. Where should we go to for succor in case of insurrections? to the favored nabob with his one hundred slaves? No, you would fly for aid to that very city, and those whom you now would deprive of their just rights, noble, generous spirits as they are, would promptly come to your relief with bold hearts and ready hands.

Let posterity be the judge when they want to change their constitution. It has been tauntingly said that I, sir, have gone over to the enemy—that enemy who on every possible occasion took advantage to grind down the country in the making of their wharfage laws and the like. But let me tell the gentleman that there he has again woke up the wrong passenger, for I was a member of the legislature myself when that bill was passed, and I opposed it with all my might and main, and I have always and on all occasions, opposed any measure not dictated by the pure principle of justice. Let him or any one scan my public acts for the last ten years, and I think he will find them as consistent as those of any man. Yes, sir, I am sure he will find the old horse as near the truth as any body else.

When our country was at war, who but the poor white men were found in the ranks? Did the one hundred negro men go? No, indeed. Why, sir, I recollect well when volunteers were called for to go to Florida, several of those worthy white men, whom you now propose to class sixty of as only equal to one hundred negroes, were the first to step forward. I recollect one man, Capt. Jourdan, then a pilot, earning two hundred dollars per month, gave up his situation, left the wheel, and fought the battles of his country nobly and heroically. That man has since returned wounded and sick. Another man went with him, and did good service to his country, in the field, and in his care and assiduity in attending to the company he commanded. He returned home sick, and remained so for a long period. I allude to the gentleman from my parish, who now holds a seat in the legislature of this State; for poor though he is, it is such noble and chivalrous spirits the people delight to honor.

I could cite still another case, that it gives me pleasure to enumerate. Mr. McDonough, now a clerk on board the Luda; he went out in that memorable campaign, and returned, though wounded, with honor, and deserving the gratitude of his country.

Such men as these it is we are called upon to curtail the privileges of. I think, sir, it is our duty to protect them in, and (whenever we can,) extend their rights.

Let all be fairly dealt with, and if West Feliciana be entitled to but one vote, she will nevertheless be heard in the legislative halls. He, Mr. Ratliff, was sent to this Convention more as a personal compliment, than on the score of ability, but, sir, there is no lack of great men in that parish, who are always ready to step forth and defend and protect her rights when necessary.

Mr. President, I am done. I felt it due to myself to reply to the unjust attack made on me, by the gentleman from Rapides; to say what I have said. I trust the Convention, which has given me a kind and attentive hearing, will remember that; as it is admitted that an honest man is the noblest work of God, it would be unjust to deprive any man of his political rights because he is poor.

Mr. Benjamin rose with a view of assigning his reasons for the vote he should give. The section under discussion embraces two principles to which he is opposed—1st, the federal basis; 2nd, the restriction on the rights of the city in her representation. The only question before us at this moment is, to strike out the federal basis. When in the committee, he opposed the insertion of that basis, not because he did not think New Orleans would get as much by adopting that as by taking any other basis that might be selected. On the contrary, he thought New Orleans would gain by it in that respect; but he opposed it, because he thought it radically wrong. He cannot be charged with interested motives, then, for the city; because he is satisfied she will be the looser if the federal basis be not established; but he opposed it because he thought it would operate unjustly. He regards representation as a co-relative term; that there can be no representation, unless from the choice of those represented; and he is opposed to any other basis than that of free, white population; and while New Orleans would be benefited by the adoption of the federal basis, considering it as I do, (said Mr. B.,) unjust, I feel bound to oppose it.

Mr. Ledoux: Mr. President, I shall take this opportunity to explain my position and my vote upon this most important question. I am most decidedly in favor of the duly qualified electors, as the basis of representation, because that embraces the principle for which we have been contending since we have met here—that is, that our government is essentially a government of men, not of property; and that is the principle that I wish to consecrate in the constitution we are framing. Gentlemen, I know, prefer the federal basis, because the country parishes will thereby gain political advantage. For my part, sir, there is no advantage in the world, either personal or political, that would induce me to abandon principle, or deviate from justice. I say that if, in adopting this, which I consider the most fair, equal and republican basis of representation, it should appear that the parish of Orleans, or any other parish in the State, was entitled to one third of the whole representation in the legislative halls, let her have it; if to one half, let her have it; principle expects it, reason and justice demand it. Gentlemen are unwilling to make distinctions between man and man, and yet they do not hesitate to make distinctions between large collections of men—between large and small parishes. True democracy, in my judgment, knows no distinctions. It places the rich and the poor, the small and the large, upon the same footing—all upon the same platform of equality. I know well, Mr. President, that in assuming this position, I incur the dissatisfaction of many friends, both in the Convention and out of it; but, sir, I must not forget that I have a country to serve, as well as friends to gratify. I must not forget that I have embraced principles which I thought best calculated to promote the interests of my country, and which I swear never to abandon. I must not forget, especially, that I occupy upon this floor the proud position of a representative of the State of Louisiana—of a representative of the whole state, and as such I cannot, and will not, permit injustice to be done to any portion of it. I came here "to do unto others, as I would be done by." This is the only true, genuine, unquestionable democracy—the only democracy that is synonymous with justice; and I would frown most indignantly upon any departure from it. These considerations, Mr. President, weigh heavy on my mind, and to act contrary to them, would be to act the hypocrite to my judgment and my conscience.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. O'Bryan's amendment, which was to strike out the following words: "its population, ascertained and calculated according to the principle of representation adopted in the Constitutton of the United States," and decided as follows:

Mess. Benjamin, Brazeal, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Cenas, Claiborne, Culbertson, Eustis, Grymes, Humble, King, Ledoux, Legendre, McRae, Marigny, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Soulé, Taylor, Waddill and Wederstrandt; 28 yeas: and Messrs. Aubert, Brent, Bryant, Chambliss, Chinn, Derbes, Downs, Garrett, Hudspeth, Hynson, Mayo, Porché, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Taylor of St. Landry, and Wadsworth; 22 nays.

Mr. Read desired, in giving his vote, to explain the reasons that influenced that vote. He will go as far as any member of this house, in restricting New Orleans to a fair proportion of the representation of the State, but he is unwilling to do so by means of the federal basis, believing that this basis would work injustice and inequality between the country Parishes. He is in favor of the electoral basis.

So the motion to strike out the federal basis prevailed.

Mr. O'Bryan then moved to fill up the blank with the words "the number of electors in it,"

But before any action was had on it,

Mr. Chinn moved to adjourn until 11 o'clock on Monday next.

Monday, March 3, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. Beatty opened the proceedings by prayer.

The journal of Saturday, first March, was read and approved.

Mr. Covillion moved that leave of absence be granted to Mr. Prescott of Avoyelles, on account of illness.

Mr. Wederstrandt moved that leave of absence be granted to his colleague, Mr. Ratliff, for a few days.

Mr. Saunders also moved that leave of absence be granted to Messrs. King, Huds-peth and Taylor, of St. Landry, for a short period.

Leave of absence was granted to all, but not without serious opposition from Messrs. Downs, Eustis, Humble and Voorhies.

Mr. Downs desired the reporter to record his name, in these proceedings, as did also Mr. Humble, in opposition to these everlasting calls for leave of absence. They were both opposed to leave of absence being granted except for illness.

Mr. Eustis desired also to have his name recorded against it. He thinks the Convention has no right to grant leave of absence to any of its members, without some good cause be shown why a member absents himself.

Mr. Chinn thought the gentlemen were catching at straws, for how could they reach the object they aimed at unless they inflicted some penalty on delinquent members—or unless they made it a rule of the Convention, to say, that those who did not reach the hall by the usual hour, should have no per diem, nor any seat in the Convention, if he were thrice guilty of absenting himself without good cause. The gentlemen, however, had the right accorded to them to record their names against all leave of absence whatever, except on account of sickness.

The Convention then took up the

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ARTICLE SECOND, SECTION SIXTH, OF THE REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE, AS AMENDED.

Each parish shall be entitled to representation in proportion to ——; Provided, that no parish or city shall ever be entitled to more than one-fifth of the whole number of representatives.

Mr. O'Bryan moved to fill the blank in said section with the words "the number of qualified voters in it."

Mr. Downs submitted the following substitute, viz:

"Representation shall be equal and uniform in this State, and shall forever be regulated and ascertained by the number of qualified electors therein; Provided, that no portion of the State now constituting one parish or city shall ever be entitled to more than twenty representatives, and that each parish shall have at least one representative; and, Provided further, that no new parish shall be created with a territory less than four hundred square miles, nor with a number of electors less than the ratio at the time, nor when the creation of such new parish would leave any other parish without the said extent of territory and number of electors."

In the year ——, and every four years thereafter, an enumeration of all the electors shall be made in such manner as shall be directed by law. The number of representatives shall, in the several years of making these enumerations, or during the next succeeding session of the general assembly, be so fixed, according to the principle of this section, as not to be less than eighty, nor more than one hundred; Provided, that the general assembly shall be incompetent to pass any law after the enumeration until the apportionment shall be made.

Until the first enumeration shall be made, as directed in this section, the parish of Orleans shall be entitled to twenty representatives, to be elected as follows: eight by the 1st municipality, eight by the 2d municipality, three by the 3d municipality, and one for that part of the parish on the right bank of the Mississippi: 20

On motion of Mr. Downs, the printing of the above substitute was ordered, and the consideration of the same postponed until printed.

Before the printing was ordered, Mr. Chinn rose to oppose the printing of the project offered by Mr. Downs, because it only procrastinates the matter; we have been already three weeks engaged on this question, and if the motion to print prevail there is no knowing how much longer it will take. It certainly is time to do something with this question.

Mr. Downs remarked, that his object was not delay, but to facilitate and hasten the matter, as doubtless it would do if every member had a printed copy of the project before him.

Mr. Chinn further objected to the printing on the score of economy.

Mr. Voorhies moved to lay the whole section on the table, until the project of Mr. Downs be printed.

Mr. Benjamin could not see the necessity of postponing the consideration of the section, as Mr. O'Bryan's motion to insert "the number of qualified electors in it," is substantially the same principle as submitted in Mr. Downs' project.

Mr. Claiborne suggested that the project of Mr. Downs should be printed in French as well as English; which was agreed to.

Mr. Sellers moved to amend Mr. O'. Bryan's motion by filling the blank with the words "in proportion to its population, black and white."

Mr. O'Bryan moved to lay said amendment indefinitely on the table.

Mr. Sellers would have no objection to lay on the table subject to call, but if to be laid there indefinitely, he would prefer to debate the question at once—and asked the question if it was in order to debate any question that was moved to be laid indefinitely on the table.

The President replied that it was debateable.

Mr. Sellers was about to address the house, but withdrew at the request of

Mr. Guion, who desired to move another amendment, which he trusted the house would see fit to adopt. It was a mixed basis, made on votes and taxable property. There can be no doubt that property should be represented in some shape, as well as men, and he therefore proposed the following amendment: "Each parish shall be entitled to representation according to the number of qualified electors, together with the taxable property it may contain."

Mr. Voorhies does not think any proper calculation can be made, on which we could depend, or which would operate fairly and equally.

Mr. Guion thought that nothing was more simple—property might be estimated by the tax rolls, although that he would hardly consider just. But a board of commissioners could be appointed by the legislature, whose duty it should be to make an estimate of the voters and taxable property in each parish. He is surprised that the committee made no report on the feasibility of this plan. He thinks it clearly the only just basis we can adopt.

This new proposal called Mr. Wadsworth up, who proved that the Convention should reconsider the vote of Saturday. He thinks the federal basis is the only fair one, and he therefore moved to lay the whole subject on the table, until Thursday next; which motion did not prevail.

Mr. Wadsworth then gave formal notice that he should ask the reconsideration of the vote taken on the first instant, on striking out the federal basis, on Wednesday, the fifth instant.

The question was then put on Mr. Guion's amendment, and resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Bourg, Chinn, Guion, Labauve, Legendre, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Sellers and Winder voted in the affirmative—15 yeas; and Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Leonard, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Read, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the negative—41 nays; the motion therefore was lost.

Mr. Sellers then renewed his motion, and moved as a substitute for Mr. O'Bryan's amendment, that the blank be filled with the words "whole population," and the yeas and nays being called for, resulthd as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Chinn, Derbes, Dunn, Guion, Kenner, Labauve, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Wadsworth and Winder voted in favor of the substitute—17 yeas; and Messrs. Benjamin, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Cenas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Legendre, Leonard, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Porché, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Read, Roselius, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Soulê, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted against the substitute—41 nays; so that substitute was rejected.

The next question presented was the amendment of Mr. O'Bryan, on which

Mr. Porter rose, and stated that he should vote for the principle proposed, but would like to have some alteration in the phraseology of the amendment, and was proceeding to explain, when

Mr. Downs remarked that that was the duty of the committee of revisal, but in the meantime they might take the vote, which should settle the principle.

Mr. Chinn thought that there was another question which ought to be settled first, and that was the restriction that was to be placed on the city of New Orleans. Thinking so, he moved it be laid on the table subject to call.

Mr. Downs is of opinion that it is a matter of no consequence whether the question of restriction is decided now, or at some future time. We are now called upon to decide the principle on which we are to establish a basis. If this proposition is adopted, he will move the further consideration of the whole matter under debate until to-morrow, when we settle all the minutia at the same time; but he does not think we ought to postpone the consideration of the amendment of Mr. O'Bryan, in which we do nothing more than fix what the basis shall be.

Mr. Conrad thinks Mr. Chinn is right, and that the restriction to be placed upon New Orleans had better be settled before this question is taken. He therefore seconds the motion to lay the amendment offered by Mr. O'Bryan on the table, subject to call.

The question on Mr. Chinn's motion was then put and lost.

Mr. O'Bryan's amendment was then decided by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows.

Messrs. Benjamin, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Cenas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Legendre, Leonard, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Read, St. Amand, Saunders, Soulé, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the affirmative—38 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Briant, Chinn, Derbes, Dunn, Guion, Kenner, Labauve, Porche, Pugh, Roman, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers and Winder voted in the negative—18 nays:

While the vote was being taken,

Messrs. Downs and Brent remarked that they voted for it, not as their first, but as their second choice.

Mr. Dunn remarked that he had been always in favor of the federal basis, and therefore he should vote against it.

So the Convention adopted the electoral basis, as the basis of representation.

Mr. Downs then moved to lay the section as amended on the table, until his project could be printed and submitted to the consideration of the Convention; say till to-morrow.

Mr. Beatty objected. He thought we ought to progress with the section as it is, and if necessary, the gentleman from Ouachita could accomplish as much in the way of amendment, as by waiting for the printed substitute proposed by him. We could proceed with the written one.

Mr. Downs' motion was put and lost.

Mr. Downs then proposed his substitute, as before set forth, for the whole section as reported.

Mr. O'Bryan moved to reconsider the vote for printing, and wishes the substitute to be read, which was done.

Mr. Dunn then rose to a point of order. He conceives that it cannot be in order, for this reason. The section proposed by Mr. Downs says that "each parish shall have at least one representative." Now that clause has already been rejected by the Convention.

The President agreed with Mr. Dunn, that the substitute was out of order.

Mr. Downs was sorry to differ in opinion with the President, but he was constrained to do so, with Jefferson's Manual in his hand. On page 101 it is laid down that a proposition once rejected by the house, may again be submitted when combined with other matter not previously acted upon. He further read from page 94, that wherever a different proposition is made, any thing previously acted on may be again connected with it. He thinks the question may now be settled, in company with the new questions presented in the substitute, whether each parish shall be entitled to one representative or not, and also that no new parishes shall be created, until they have the proper basis of representation. Alone it would not be in order, but combined with other clauses, it is clearly so.

The President, while he was satisfied with the reasons given by Mr. Downs, would take this occasion to remark, that he should adhere to the first decision he has given on this question, for where he had previously decided as Mr. Downs now asks him to do, his decision was not sustained by the house. He would prefer leaving the Convention to decide the matter for themselves.

Mr. Dunn then asked that the decision of the president be maintained.

Mr. Beatty moved to lay Mr. Downs' substitute indefinitely on the table, and to take up the report of the committee, and debate the section reported, clause by clause.

Mr. Downs hopes the motion made by Mr. Beatty will not prevail. He desires to have his substitute printed, and submitted to the Convention as a whole; he therefore prefers waiting until to-morrow. The matter is an entire subjec; it may have merit in it which the members may not see at once, from the simple reading of it; and which would certainly be better understood, if properly reflected on. The object of introducing it is to harmonize the feelings of the Convention, and with a view to settle this vexed question in a spirit of compromise. He (Mr. Downs) hopes the Convention will regard it in that light, and not hurry the matter through without time for reflection, nor throw it hastily aside. He therefore confidently expects that it will be laid on the table subject to call. He is moreover anxious, before this question is submitted, to have a full house, to decide on the merits of the important principles connected with it.

Mr. Beatty, however, persisted in his motion, when

Mr. Benjamin rose to explain to the Convention, that to his mind the member from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs,) must have taken an erroneous view of the result to be produced by laying his substitute on the table; for certainly, said he, (Mr. Benjamin,) it cannot be denied that we can offer the same principles in the shape of amendments to the section as reported by the committee, which he has embodied in his proposal of compromise. That is certainly no new question. It has been done repeatedly, and the right to do it has never been questioned, to his knowledge, in any deliberative body. To lay a substitute on the table in any form, even indefinitely, is not a rejection of the principles contained in it. We reject it as a whole, because as a whole it may not all be germain to the particular question we have under consideration, but any of those portions of it which are, may be selected from it and offered as amendments to the section under debate. The object of the gentleman from Lafourche seems to be, simply to reject the section, but not to touch the right of introducing the principles contained in the project of Mr. Downs, nor to prevent him from introducing them as amendments to the section before us.

Mr. Beatty moved to lay the substitute on the table, subject to the call of the house; which motion was put and carried.

Mr. Downs then moved to take up the article as reported, as to the organization of the senate. But his motion was lost, and the Convention then took up the 6th section of the 2d article of the constitution.

Mr. Mayo then moved to strike out the words "one-fifth," and insert "one-sixth" in the last clause; whereupon

Mr. Marigny took the floor:

It appears to me, Mr. President, that the gentlemen on the other side of this question, are a queer set of people. They are eternally telling you that they want nothing but justice, and yet they always manage to have it a kind of one-sided justice; every thing for themselves, and nothing for us. One, in the plenitude of his consideration, gives us one-fifth of the representation; now, another thinks one-sixth is a plenty for us; and yet they are both actuated by a spirit of justice!! The grand though hidden object of all these movements is to destroy the influence and power of the city; that has to be done some how or other. But I think, sir, and perhaps it will be much to the astonishment of my colleagues, that I have a plan to propose, that will test their sincerity. They are eternally prating to us about the moral influence which the city of New Orleans has upon the country members; that they are either feasted over, flattered over, cajoled over, or deceived over to measures which are specially to be made beneficial to the city, and to the prejudice of the country, and it is in consequence of the fear which they entertain, or express, for that malign influence, that they now have the modesty to say, we must be deprived of our equal and just representation in the house of representatives. Well, he, (Mr. M.) thinks he has a plain and simple remedy to cure the disease, provided the constitution of the patient be not too much impaired.

It is perfectly clear to every man of sense, to every right thinking man, that the hue and cry made by these members is not based upon the grounds which they profess, but it is that they may get their hands upon the treasury, while we of the city contend that we have a right to exercise our just and fair proportion of influence in the direction of the affairs of that treasury. Now then, in order to get rid of the dreaded influences which they charge upon us as possessing over the country members, if they will act honestly and give us our just and fair proportion of the representation, let them take away the seat of government from New Orleans and carry it into the country, even to Jackson if they see fit; provided, however, that they make the session to be holden in June. If you refuse this proposition, you will at once show, and palpably too, that you are not sincere in your professions; and that the only thing you are resolutely bent upon, is to deprive us of our just representation "nolens volens." Why, on the score of economy alone, (which some of you profess to be so much in favor of) you cannot, if you are sincere, object to my proposal, for every body knows if you take away from the legislature the excuse of debating upon local matters as they do now in bills to establish ferries, &c. &c. and put them to their work in the month of June, in a country village, that they will get through as much or more work in twenty days, than they would in an agreeable place, at an agreeable season of the year, in six weeks; and thus instead of a session of the legislature costing the State $50,000 as now, $20,000 would pay the expenses.

Mr. Marigny makes these suggestions with the view of waking up the members to a proper reflection of our duties here, and to test their sincerity of purpose. We are here to make a lasting constitution, but we must make it a just one, granting equal rights to all, or the $80,000 which has been appropriated and will be spent, to defray the expenses of our labor, will have been thrown away.

Act unjustly towards New Orleans, and she will vote against your constitution "en masse." And that vote, connected with the vote of those who do not desire to disturb the constitution of 1812, will defeat the very object for which we are ostensibly met, to wit, to amend that constitution to suit the present and future wants of the people of Louisiana.

Factions, or party spirit have no business in this body. We are met, or we should be, as a band of brothers, to mete out even justice; and yet you tell us, the country is afraid of the city. That assertion naturally makes the city afraid of the country, for people who in the first place take alarm, are very apt to do some rash and foolish act.

I repeat to you, then, (said Mr. Marigny) there is but one way to compromise. You give the city her fair and equal share of representation, and we give you the seat of government in the country.

He therefore moved to postpone all further consideration of the matter for two or three days, so as to give the members time to reflect upon his proposition.

The President pro tem, Mr. Labauve, decided that the motion was not in order.

Mr. Saunders appealed from the decision of the chair. He thinks the suggestions made by Mr. Marigny are in every way entitled to the consideration of the Convention, and they approach nearer to a prospect of settling the conflicting opinions between the city and country members, than any that he has yet heard proposed. He thinks them worthy of consideration, both in a pecuniary and political point of view, and he will support Mr. Marigny in their adoption. And therefore, to give proper time for an harmonious compromise of the question, he appeals from the decision of the chair, and hopes the motion to postpone will prevail.

Mr. Beatty desiring to make some remarks on the subject before the Convention, Mr. Saunders withdrew his appeal, and Mr. Beatty proceeded:

He felt it to be his duty to say, that amongst the members of the committee, who had made this report, the greater number thought one-fifth was too large a proportion to allow to New Orleans in the representation of the State; while the city member thought it was not enough. But finally, the committee came to the conclusion to report one-fifth as the suitable and proper proportion, although much difference of opinion had existed. He desires to say that he shall oppose the motion to strike out. He is prepared, in deference to the report before us, to go as far as one-fifth, but if the motion prevail to strike out that part of the section, he thinks Mr. Mayo's proposal to fix the proportion at one-sixth will prevail. He thinks himself that one-fifth is a fair and liberal apportionment, but he warns those gentlemen who press with so much zeal the striking out the one-fifth, to pause and reflect well upon what they are doing. He (Mr. Beatty,) makes no threats as to the course he intends to take, but he assures them, according to his poor judgment, that they will lose instead of gaining by striking out the one-fifth, and that they will finally get less than the one-fifth.

Gentlemen may pursue what course they see fit. If no alteration is made in the section touching the report in that respect, he will firmly maintain it in that particular, but should it be stricken out, he shall feel at liberty to act according to his discretion; at the same time he does not hesitate to say that he is in favor of restricting the political power of the city. The section of the country which he represents in part, all call for restriction on the city, and he will vote for any measure then that shall come the nearest to one-fifth, provided it does not exceed that amount. It does not require any prophet to foresee, that if she be not restricted, that she and the adjoining parishes will, in ten years, hold the controlling power of the State within their hands. All the different interests of the State will be at her mercy and control; the sugar interest, the cotton interest, the grazing interest, in short every interest of every class. Give her one-fourth of your representation, and she will swallow up all the others. He thinks one half the State is in favor of the federal basis, which he considers more equal and fair than the electoral basis. He considers the country has much to fear from the thousands that annually are filling up New Orleans. Under the free suffrage system, which we have established in our constitution, the number of voters will be increased under the electoral basis fully five thousand votes. That will swell the vote up to twenty thousand. It is this preponderance of power he desires to prevent. In this city there are many single men engaged in business pursuits, and therefore the number of voters under the electoral basis are greatly increased compared with what they will be in the country. There one voter will probably represent his whole family, which may consist of ten or twelve persons, and with only one vote in the family, and that his own. For these reasons he shall vote against striking out, and should it prevail, he shall then feel himself free from any pledges he may have given in committee.

Mr. Benjamin had moved to strike out the 4th proviso, but he withdrew that motion until it should be ascertained whether there was to be any restriction on New Orleans on the popular branch, and to what extent it would be pressed.

The questions then before us are,

First: Shall there be restriction?

Second: What shall be the extent of it?

He, Mr. Benjamin, is opposed to restriction in every shape and form.

He feels that it is his duty to make some remarks in reply to what has been said by the member from Lafourche, (Mr. Beatty,) because he was evidently referred to by him. The committee, whose report we have under consideration, was composed of twelve members, being from each congressional district; there were two members from the city of New Orleans. When the committee met he found himself the only member present from the city, his colleague from some cause being unable to attend. There were eleven members present. At first they decided that New Orleans should be restricted; and they proposed she should be confined to one-sixth of the representation. He, Mr. Benjamin, opposed it; and tried by every argument in his power, to prove to them how unjust it would be in its operation on the city, and its interests; but he was voted down. Finally I, said Mr. Benjamin, was notified by the members of the committee, that they had concluded to fix the restriction at one-fifth, provided I would agree to abide by it. Finding that they were decided and unanimously against me, and that one-fifth was better than one-sixth, if we were to be restricted, I consented to agree to the report. That was the dilemma in which he, Mr. Benjamin, was placed. He thought it better, if the country was determined to curtail our rights; as she seemed determined to do this, he felt convinced he would be doing right in securing the best he could for his constituents. His colleagues, when he represented the state of things, would scarcely believe that a majority of the committee would, or could sustain so unjust a measure; they thought that they would be impressed with the truth, that the pure republican doctrine demanded that representation should be equal and uniform; and further, that if it were deemed necessary to put a curb on the city of New Orleans to check her power and influence, that it was not in the lower branch that the check should be placed, but on the senate, which is emphatically the conservative body of our government; and they then plainly told him, (Mr. B.,) they could not be satisfied with this report; and that if so made, they would throw themselves at the mercy of the Convention; and should oppose it. The committee were then so informed; and they replied, that if he, Mr. Benjamin, felt himself at all compromitted, and would not sustain the report fixing the limit at one-fifth, they should not feel themselves bound to it, but should reserve the privilege to move an amendment making it at one-sixth. He feels it necessary further to explain to the Convention why he yielded to the allowing each parish one representative, without regard to its population; which question had been adversely determined by previous action of the Convention. When he came to make the calculation that there were many of the old parishes whose white population had become so small, but whose property interest was nevertheless large; that they would not be entitled to a representation, without on the same principle as that established by the Convention as the basis of representation. The new parishes came in, who were precisely in the same situation that they were; he was compelled, in fairness, to withdraw his previous opposition to it— and hence the reason why the report comes back as previously reported, with his consent. But when it is considered that the question was put in this form, can you deprive the new parishes of one representative, without depriving Saint Charles, St. John the Baptist, Washington and many other small parishes, of their representation? And moreover, when it is taken into consideration that this clause was only to remain in force until a new census could be made of the State; and the Convention would, by the action of the committee, be spared from censure; and that hereafter all new and old parishes would be placed on an equal footing; is it not to be considered a prudent and necessary conception, to give no cause of complaint, but to give to every parish now, one representative, and then leave it to future events to determine what each is fairly and justly entitled to? It was for those reasons he consented to that clause of the report.

He does not wish to deprive the northwestern or the Florida parishes of any of their rights; if they grow faster than the old parishes, let them have the full benefit of their growth; let the political influence of every one of them be increased as they grow in wealth and population. And he, Mr. Benjamin, will further say, as has already been said to the Convention before, while speaking of the rights of the city, let every one enjoy their rights to the fullest extent; be just, and be fair to one and all. Some may not be entitled to representation under the new census which is to be made next year, unless classed with other small parishes. But until we get correct data, which we have not now, as the census of 1840 is so incorrect that it cannot be relied on, it is neither fair nor right to deprive them of the privilege of being heard on the question of apportionment, when it shall come up to be acted upon in the legislature, on the principles we have established in the Convention. For these reasons he concurred in giving to each parish one representative to start upon.

He has before said that he was forced into giving his assent to the one-fifth principle of restriction; but as the other members of the committee are now freed from the obligation, he, Mr. Benjamin, feels himself equally free; and his first act of freedom shall be to say that he will vote against restricting us to one-fifth of the representation of the State.

To his, Mr. Benjamin's mind, the argument advanced by Mr. Eustis was too forcible, not to have its proper weight before the Convention; and that was, that not persons alone should be considered, but general interests, also, should be considered in determining a basis of representation; in other words, that no class of citizens should be placed in the power of another class; and for that reason he thinks that "total numbers" form the only element on which a fair representation can be based.

To a certain extent I am bound, said Mr. B., to admit the argument which has been used; that legislative power, when concentrated, is more than an equivalent to the same numerical number of votes in a legislative body, without that concentration. And that, which in theory may appear inconsistent, is not so in practice; as thus: twenty-five or thirty men who are united in one common interest, will have a greater influence and greater power in the decision of a question, than the same number, who have not the power of centrative interest.

Now, Mr. President, although I know and feel that I may be blamed by some, for making this admission, yet, conscientiously believing it, I do not stop to look at any other than such consequences as finally result to the candid, open and fair man.

Let us suppose, for instance, that the city should become entitled to fifty votes, and the country to fifty votes, in a house of one hundred members; there cannot be a doubt if fifty be united, that they have an advantage over the fifty who have no concert of action. And, sir, said Mr. B., feeling this, I should be willing, in the spirit of compromise, to allow something to the country as an equipoise; and when that is done they can ask no more. What do they now want? Suppose we pay, as we do now, one half the revenue of the State, and even it is doubtful if we shall not soon pay three-fourths of it, can we be satisfied with one-fifth of the representation? can we be satisfied to let two-thirds of our just weight go for one-fifth? If country members would say to us, that concentration increases your power one-fifth, and that to take that amount from our power would be considered an equivalent to satisfy what they conceive our advantage over them from that concentration of interest; then I could understand them; and then, sir, I might, and doubtless should, meet them on that ground of compromise. Just let them say, your representation shall be equal to ours on the basis we have adopted, less one-fifth; just let them say, that if you are entitled to fifty votes then you shall have forty members in the lower house, and we will divide the other ten proportionably among the other portions of the State; then I would understand you, and then I would join you, but don't say that you will restrict us to twenty members, when with even such a fair allowance as I propose to you, we are justly entitled to forty on your own democratic basis. He (Mr. Benjamin) thinks we have but two grand divisions of interest in the State, the one commercial and the other agricultural; because although the agriculture of the State is divided into two separate and distinct interests, the sugar and cotton interest, still so far as the city is concerned with the country, or the country with the city, they make but one interest; and yet we are virtually told in case agriculture should suffer to the value of one-fifth, and commerce should thrive and prosper to the extent of the other four-fifths of a whole, that the country would have a right to appropriate to their own use all the revenue which is derived by New Orleans from her immense trade with the great valley of the Missouri, Ohio, and Mississippi rivers; that the country interests are always to be first provided for; the country is to absorb all. If wealth and population are discarded altogether from your minds, and you are to be frightened out of your propriety by the fear of concentration of interests, then I shall protest in loud terms against your unjustifiable course. What we ask of you is, not to take all; and the only ground we can meet you upon is that of pure and simple justice. We do not know how far you mean to press your restrictive measures upon the interests of New Orleans. We regret to find you in such a desponding mood; we are sorry to hear you say that the country is about to be sacrificed for the benefit of the city. Such a contingency cannot arise, for the interests of the city and country are identical in almost every minutia of our mutual transactions. There is but one possible way to bring their interests in conflict, and that is by an undue use of the taxing power; but look back and see what results have heretofore proved; the country has always, up to this time, had the advantage of the city on the question of appropriations. When the city is imposed upon, and when her dearest rights are invaded, do they suppose that New Orleans will bind herself hand and foot, and deliver herself over to the country? Gentlemen are greatly mistaken if they think so. On what principle do they expect it? do they rely on their power? If they do they have lost sight of reason, and one would really think they had in the course they are pursuing. Do they imagine by fawning the spirit of jealousy against the city, and thereby discriminating in the legislature, by passing laws that are unequal in their operation, that they can succeed in their schemes of injustice to the city? It will not result as they expect, even should they try it.

On what principle of justice can one hundred thousand persons residing in the country, claim the right of taxing, unequally, three hundred thousand because they live in the city? How much less have they not that right when it is well known that the same country only contributes one-fourth in taxation of the amount paid into the treasury—she contributes $100,000, New Orleans $300,000. Can it be wondered at then that those who support the government should murmur and complain when they are deprived of their just portion of representation? The house of representatives, in which house originate all bills for revenue, might take it into their heads to pay the State tax by a special tax on the commerce of the city; and if we are shorn of our power in that branch of the government, and we are reduced down to one-fifth against four-fifths, where shall we look for relief? We may look for justice elsewhere, but we shall look in vain.

We have heard a great deal about the immense advantage which the country is to city, and that we could not get along without the country. In his (Mr. B.'s) opinion, it is the city which for years back has sustained and supported the country; yes, she has done so for the last twenty years.

Are not $100,000 raised in the city and paid into the treasury as a tax upon professions, besides the taxes imposed on all auction sales, and also the tax paid into the treasury by foreign merchants? The first is taken from the labor of men engaged in professional pursuits. The second results from the sale of goods sent here from the north or from Europe for sale at auction; that pays two and a half per cent. State tax.

Now who pays these taxes, the city or the country? Why, New Orleans pays it directly, and in fact under this onerous law, they pay more; and how? Why, both the foreign and native importer and trader, who have to submit to such exhorbitant taxes. The foreigner now does not import more than one-fourth of what he used to, and the latter is forced into the New York market to lay in his supplies, all which expense adds to the cost of his goods. Goods can't be imported here, owing to the heavy tax, and millions are sent to New York, which find their way here by that route with heavy profits—they take a commission at every turn. Thus the country, by such a course, lays an immense burden on the city. It is somewhat singular to hear the arguments of Messrs. Downs and Mayo on this subject, indeed he (Mr. B.) cannot but think they have become the dupes of their own sophistry, when they tell us that it is the country that pays the revenue, and that without them we should not have the means of doing so. Then reasoning on those false premises, they say they are bound to protect themselves in the representation of the State, and that out of one hundred representatives, of which one half really belongs to the city, they just want eighty, that is the argument; they say, when we are served, you may take the rest; we are desirous of leaving to you your just weight!

This brings to mind the course of those gentlemen when we were discussing the division of the State into four congressional districts. One of the members from the fourth district, while the matter was under discussion, was desirous of postponing the consideration of the question as to the fourth district until the other three were regulated. The first, second and third districts being agreed upon, he finally had to take the rest of the State for the fourth, when he might have done better, had he not been too anxious to increase her political power. Now they desire to apply the same principle to the city, you take what we leave—and they say that twenty out of one hundred is enough for us.

But this is a question that they must meet fairly—it must be decided on its merits—we must protect all interests that are growing in value. Diminish the vote of the city as far as you think it should be fairly done, to make up for her increased power from a concentrated vote; say in your proviso that no parish shall have no more than a certain number, but strike out from your constitution that they shall never have more than one-fifth. If you do not you will plant in it the germs of its own destruction. He (Mr. Benjamin,) will not indulge in any thing like a threat; but this he will say, that if we do not act on the principles of impartiality and justice, and although he will not say that the constitution will not be ratified, yet if we do adopt the section as it stands, it will only be one step towards the destruction of our political fabric.

For these reasons he (Mr. B.) moved to strike out the proviso in toto.

Mr. O'Bryan takes the same view as does Mr. Benjamin, for this reason—while it says too much, it says too little. Suppose we were to have hereafter four or five large cities in the State, and their population were to entitle them to one-fifth of the representation, what then would become of the country?

Mr. C. M. Conrad was desirous of making a few brief remarks. He had already addressed the Convention on the injustice and impropriety of restricting New Orleans so as to deprive her of her proper power in the legislature. He said it was his firm conviction that all parts of the State should be fairly and equally represented in the legislative halls, no matter what basis is assumed, whether it be numbers, taxation, or what not—that each should have what it is entitled to, whether it be numbers or taxable property, under our plain declaration that representation shall be equal and uniform. They would admit this to be correct doctrine if it were to be applied to any of the parishes, such, for instance, as Natchitoches or Livingston, but the moment you get to the city of New Orleans the tune is changed entirely; then there must be an exception. And what new reasons have we had urged upon us to sustain the exception? Why, that there is a concentration of power in cities. Upon my soul, (said Mr. Conrad,) I cannot see into the meaning of it. Have one hundred thousand persons in the city more political power than the same number would have in the country?

He (Mr. Conrad,) differed with his colleague, (Mr. Benjamin,) in the admission which he had made on that subject, and he thinks facts will sustain him in his position. Let us examine the vote in the city of New Orleans, where there is the larger number of voters than at any other given point, for the last twenty years, and we shall invariably find, that it has been more divided than it ever was in many parts of the country. Is it pretended that here is the great point of concentration? If they will go back and examine the facts as they are, they will find that concentration is more likely to be found in the vote of St. Landry or Lafouche Interior, St. Mary or Livingston. Is there any great concentration of power in the city delegation in this hall? No, they will find that on almost every question which has been so far acted upon by this Convention, that they are nearly equally divided. In this case they are united, because the proposed measure inflicts a vital stab at the rights of all the citizens of New Orleans, and it would be unlike honorable men, if they could remain with arms folded, when so important a measure as the disfranchising their own constituents was under discussion.

He cannot, then, see the danger of concentration, and he is bound to think, from what lights he has before him, that it is a chimera of their fancy.

Talk about sympathy, mutual intercourse, &c.; why the people of New Orleans, many of them, don't know their next door neighbors; while in the country parishes they are intimately acquainted, and generally throughout the neighborhoods in which they live, although miles apart.

He thinks that to a certain extent, in a certain contingency, it might be right to make some deduction, but that would alone be if the seat of government were retained in New Orleans.

A gentleman remarked here, recently, that no State or country could be properly governed where cities preponderated. Now it is clear, that either the interests of the city and country are identical, or that they conflict with each other. If they are identical, and he cannot see that they conflict, where is the policy of this measure? And even if they do conflict with each other, there is even then no justice in it.

He is sorry to see that there is a spirit infused into the minds of the members of this Convention, that there is a conflict of interest between the city and country; for his part he regards it as a mere imagination, unless, indeed, they placed it upon the ground that they fear the taxing power will be abused by the city members. Now if that be true, which he by no means admits, have we not provided a remedy? Is not the senate a check? Has not the country seven-eighths of the members of that body in their interests? And it is well known that no revenue bill, nor any other, can become a law without the consent of both houses. Where, then, is the necessity of restricting the city in the lower house, to guard that power? The only reason which we have yet had assigned for the necessity is, that if they do not restrict her, why, she will soon have the majority and govern the State. When he (Mr. Conrad) addressed the Convention on a recent occasion, he said he considered it less a matter of consideration that each parish should have a representative, than that each and every interest in the State should be represented. In this he was opposed by Mr. Downs, who thought that unless each parish had a representative, they could not be said to be represented, for they had local matters to attend to as well as those of larger parishes. He (Mr. Conrad,) returns now to that question. Why should not fair allotments be made to each portion, and each interest in the State? Why are we to take away the political power of the southern part of the State to give it to the north-western part of it? Why should we turn a majority of the people of the State, and a majority of the interests of the State, into a minority in our halls of legislation?

This is not only a blow at New Orleans, but also at the whole sugar growing and a portion of the cotton growing interests. When he speaks of the cotton interest, he alludes to the Florida parishes, who grow a large part of the cotton crop of the State, and who are clearly identified with New Orleans. By this blow they are deprived of their just weight in the legislature. He was in hopes that the committee, composed as it was of members from each congressional district, would have been governed in their report by more wisdom, and more justice, than they have, and he yet confidently relies upon the just feelings of many of the members of the Convention to strike the proviso out of the section; for, if restriction were at all necessary, where is the propriety of imposing it on the southern portion of the State? None at all.

Some of his (Mr. Conrad's) colleagues, have truly told you, that if you insert such a clause as the one before us, in your constitution, it will not be ratified by the people. He is far, very far from saying any thing that can be construed into a threat on his part. So far as the new constitution has been progressed in, he gives it a decided preference to the old one, but if a provision be engrafted in it like the one before us, he should certainly prefer the old one, and mark my words, sir! the people will so decide. What are we here for, but to make a constitution that will be acceptable to the people at large? Why then include a provision that the majority will repudiate? But, sir, suppose it were to be ratified, it will not last long. It is a libel on the American character, to say that they would tamely submit to despotism. The people, when they come to reflect, will never put up with any thing but justice, fairness and equality, and it will soon be like "The baseless fabric of a vision, Leaves not a wreck behind."

They say to us, how are you going to amend it, when we have you in our power? You may complain as much as you please, but we have got you in our power, bound hand and foot. Let me say that although you have four-fifths of the house of representatives, and seven-eights of the senate, and although you have provided that the legislature may make the necessary amendments to the constitution; that all combined together will not do it. The majority will turn a deaf ear to the complaints of the city, and thereby we are deprived of all peaceable means to redress our grievances, and we are then driven to one of two alternatives—base submission, or violent opposition. Now it is perfect folly to blink this question; to that it must come.

He (Mr. Conrad) shudders when he reflects upon the consequences to flow from the adoption of the principle of restriction now pressed upon us so warmly, and so vehemently. It may not be that they or we are to reap the fruits of this unjust measure; but it will surely come to pass in the next generation. All history tells us, that the American people will not submit to be ruled by a minority. It forms a part of their political religion, to repudiate any such doctrine, and they will not long submit to any paper constitution that is not based on the principles of justice. The Rhode Island rebellion will be nothing to the scenes that will be enacted here. So far as he is concerned, for the sake of peace and harmony, he is disposed to make some concessions. Surely two-thirds of the lower house, and seven-eights of the senate, ought to be sufficient with the veto of the governor, to satisfy them. But as there is a limit to the necessity, so there must be a limit to the rule.

Let us then inquire what is the amount of the absolute necessity in restricting? Take that, but take no more.

He has but few words to add. He had hoped during the progress of this debate, that the difficulty would be compromised. He now regrets to find that it is not likely to come from the quarter he had expected it. He thinks they are acting unreasonably, and not as true friends of their coun-ry.

He is himself greatly in favor of conciliation and harmony, and with a view to give time for reflection, he trusts they will take advantage of the adjournment.

Mr. Conrad then moved an adjournment until to-morrow at 11 o'clock, which was carried.

TUESDAY, March 4, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. PRESTON opened the proceedings by prayer.

This being the day fixed for the re-consideration of the vote given on the adoption of section 3d of article 3d; on the motion of Mr. MAYO, said section was called up, viz:

SEC. 3. "No person shall be eligible to the office of governor or lieutenant governor who shall not have attained the age of thirty-five years, and has not been fifteen years a free white male citizen of the United States, and of this State next preceding his election."

On motion of Mr. MAYO, said section was laid on the table, subject to call.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Section 6th of the report of the committee to whom the same was referred, and as amended, viz:

"Each parish shall be entitled to representation in proportion to the number of qualified electors in it; provided, that no parish or city shall ever be entitled to more than one-fifth of the whole number of representatives."

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to amend said section by striking out entirely the proviso.

Mr. SAUNDERS inquired of the chair whether it were in order to present a project and refer it to the house, as if they were in quasi committee?

The CHAIR replied that it was.

Mr. SAUNDERS: If that be the case, I will submit a project, which I will take the liberty of introducing with a few preparatory remarks. It will obviate the difficulty in the way of a favorite measure with the house, and yet will not violate a principle: the measure is one in which I heartily concur, that each parish be entitled to a district representation. I repudiate the idea that every individual person in the political community can be equally represented. What I assumed in the few remarks I made upon another occasion was this, that every political locality had the right of being heard, and that argument has remained unanswered; the gentleman from Lafourche (Mr Taylor) in commenting upon my position, misunderstood my language. What I said, with the view of illustrating the position I took, was this, and I repeat it again, that if the colonies had been heard the revolution would not have taken place at the period it did. Other causes would, without doubt, at a later period, have produced that revolution.

With the permission of the house, I will read to them the project:

"Until the first election after the month of January 1855, the members of the house of representatives shall be elected in the following manner:

"Every parish may elect one member, and 7000 inhabitants, (including slaves,) shall be the mean increasing number which shall entitle a parish to an additional representative.

"And to prevent the house of representatives becoming too numerous, the mean increasing number shall be proportionally increased in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-five, and every ten years afterwards; so that the house o representatives shall never consist of more than one hundred members.

"Every parish which shall hereafter be established, shall be entitled to elect one representative, when it shall contain 7000 inhabitants, and not before; and until the year 1855 the representation shall be as follows, viz:

It will be seen that one representative is allowed to each parish indiscriminately, and that 7000 inhabitants, (including slaves,) will be the mean increasing number that shall entitle a parish to an additional number. The reasons for this mode of apportionment are these, that without knowing what will be the ultimate cours taken by the Convention upon this question of apportionment; and without pretending to be an oracle, as to the decision, from the current of private feeling I am led to believe that the old parishes of St. Helena, St. Tammany, Washington, St. Charles and St. Bernard, will not be disfranchised, but that a representation will be allowed them. Assuming that as a most probable result, there will not be, I presume, any disposition to make them exceptions, and consequently the new parishes will be entitled to an equal participation with them in the right of representation; therefore, no parish will be without its representative. For myself I cannot see any objection to this representation of political locality. So far as precedent is concerned, the rule will have a most beneficial tendency. The State of Massachusetts has the best local government in the Union. The town of Hull, where there is scarcely a dozen persons, has a representation. The principle in the constitution of that State is, that corporations shall be represented. The principle in my project is that each parish corporation shall have a representative, and the necessity for a restriction upon any parish is obviated by the increase of the mean increasing number, so that the legislature can never be composed of more than one hundred members, to be divided in strict accordance with the ratio established.

Among the extraordinary things, said Mr. Saunders, that have marked this most extraordinary discussion, is the pertinacity that has been manifested against slaves being considered a portion of the basis of representation. However extraordinary that may be, it is not yet to be compared with the attempt to connect this question of apportionment with the question of abolition. What has the external basis of political representation in Louisiana, to do with the question of slavery?

The gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin,) upon some occasion alluded to a portentious cloud that had risen upon the disc of our political horizon, which was at first no bigger than his own little beautiful hand, but which suddenly threatened to overcast the whole horizon. The gentleman had heard the roaring of the distant thunder, and admonishes us of our danger. He told us that the time was fast approaching when there would be among us but a single party for the protection of our firesides and our hearths. And yet, after all these solemn warnings, the gentleman protests against the policy of adopting the slave basis, and reads to us the speeches of Giddings, I suppose for the purpose that nothing should be left out of view.

One thing to my mind is clear—that slaves, whether considered as persons or property, are a just element of representation. If they be persons, in political parlance, well then the matter of representation is beyond a doubt. If they be property, they are productive property; and where they predominate, white labor of the same description is excluded; and hence white population will not abound. I certainly have not the remotest design to compare the poor man with the slave, when I insist upon the federal basis; but I consider my slave as the producer, and myself as the consumer; and in every country production and consumption afford a proper basis of taxation, and consequently of representation. One advantage of my proposition, to which I can safely allude, is that it obviates the necessity for a constitutional restriction upon the representation of the city, which is considered in a very objectionable point of view by the delegates from the city.

On motion of Mr. Downs, said project was ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. Dunn, the section under consideration and project were laid on the table, and made the special order of the day for to-morrow at 12 o'clock, M.

Mr. Mayo then moved the reconsideration of the vote on the adoption of section 3d of article 3d, viz:

"No person shall be eligible to the office of governor or lieutenant governor, who shall not have attained the age of thirty-five years, and has not been fifteen years a free white male citizen of the United States, and of this State, next preceding his election."

Mr. Guion called for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider, which resulted as follows:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Leonard, McRae, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Stephens, Trist, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—30 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Guion, Kenner, Legendre, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Wikoff and Winder voted in the negative—28 nays; consequently said motion was carried.

Mr. MARIGNY obtained leave to change his vote.

Mr. McCALLOP having voted in the negative through mistake, moved that he be permitted to change his vote, and the yeas and nays being called,

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Covillion, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Ledoux, Leonard, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the affirmative—40 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cenas, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Guion, Legendre, Mazureau, Roman, St. Amand and Winder voted in the negative—18 nays; consequently the same was granted.

Mr. MAYO then moved to amend said section 3d, by striking out the word "fifteen," and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

On motion of Mr. SAUNDERS, the taking of the vote on the motion to strike out the word "fifteen," and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten," was postponed until two o'clock.

Mr. BENJAMIN informed the Convention that he would, before the adjournment of this day, submit a project of compromise on the question of apportionment, taking the whole population, including slaves, for the basis; which he moved might be printed, and taken up to-morrow with the project offered by Mr. Saunders. On the question to receive the project and print the same, the yeas and nays being called for, 52 voted in the affirmative and 9 in the negative; consequently the said project was received and ordered to be printed.

On motion of Mr. DUNN, the Convention then took under consideration the 10th section of article 2d, as reported by the majority, viz:

"The State shall be divided into eight senatorial districts, each of which shall elect four senators, to be voted for by the persons entitled to vote for representatives, as follows:

"All that portion of the parish of Orleans lying on the east side of the Mississippi river, shall comprise the first district.

"The parishes of Plaquemines, St. Bernard and the remainder of the parish of Orleans, parish of Jefferson, St. Charles and St. John the Baptist, shall compose the second district.

"The parishes of St. James, Ascension, Assumption, Lafourche Interior and Terrebonne, shall compose the third district.

"The parishes of Iberville, West Baton Rouge, East Baton Rouge, Point Coupée and Avoyelles, shall compose the fourth district.

"The parishes of West Feliciana, East Feliciana, Washington, St. Tammany, St. Helena and Livingston shall compose the fifth district.

"The parishes of Concordia, Carroll, Madison, Ouachita, Union, Franklin, Tensas, Morehouse, Catahoula and Caldwell, shall compose the sixth district.

"The parishes of Rapides, Natchitoches, Caddo, Calcassieu, Claiborne, Sabine, Bossier and De Soto, shall compose the seventh district.

"The parishes of St. Mary, St. Martin, St. Landry, Lafayette and Vermillion, shall compose the eighth district.

"Provided, That the legislature shall have the power, in any year in which they shall apportion representation in the house of representatives, to divide any one or more of said senatorial districts, each to be entitled to elect two senators."

Mr. DOWNS moved to strike out the 10th section, with the view of offering the following minority report as a substitute:

The senate shall consist of thirty-two members, to be elected for four years by the voters qualified to vote for representatives, and at the same time, one-half every two years; and the apportionment of senators shall be as follows:

The parishes of Plaquemines and St. Bernard, and that portion of the parish of Orleans on the right bank of the river, shall have one senator, 1

And whenever a new parish shall be created, it shall be attached to the senatorial district from which most of it was taken, or to another contiguous district, at the discretion of the legislatue, but shall not be attached to more than one district.

Mr. C. M. Conrad was not prepared to form a definite opinion as to the merits of the majority or minority reports, but it struck him upon the moment, that it would be better to adopt the principle of large senatorial districts than small senatorial districts. Whether the districts in the report of the majority were of the proper size, and of the proper territory, he was unable to determine from merely hearing the report read from the secretary's desk. He was of the opinion, however, in reference to the minority report, that the districts were too small. According to it, the senate would be but a miniaure house of representatives—a double house of representatives, with but one characteristic difference—greater inequality in representation.

Mr. Conrad thought that large districts would operate more favorably upon the character for intelligence of the body. It would be impossible for men with only a little local reputation to be elected. He instanced the great ability of the senate of the United States, probably the ablest body in the world, arising from the fact of their being selected from the States they represented at large. The same result, too, was attained, to a less extent, in the house of representatives at Washington. That body was confessedly superior to the local legislatures, and the cause was obvious.

Mr. Downs took a different view of the subject. He thought that government the best, where political power was divided into minute portions, and where it was not concentrated in the hands of a few. As for the gentleman's (Mr. Conrad's) argument that large districts would be more favorable to a superiority of intelligence in the body, we have in this convention the refutation of that theory. The members from the senatorial districts were not superior in point of intelligence, to those from the representative districts. There was nothing in that argument. The people would send the ablest men among them, whether the districts be large or small; and, after all, the senate is a representative body. It represents the people of a political division, and the constituency should be in as close contact with their senator almost as with their members of the house of representatives, It might happen that if the districts were large, one portion of a district would control another portion, and that those districts might be formed of territory that was not contiguous. Mr. D. instanced the formation of the congressional districts. The third congressional district afforded a striking illustration. There the Florida parishes were put with parishes on the other side of the Mississippi, with whom they had but little intercourse. At first some pretensions to equality might be preserved between the parishes—there might be some compromises at first, but after a while the parish that had the nominal strength, would appropriate the senator to herself exclusively in perpetuity.

The hour of two having arrived, Mr. Mayo moved that the vote be taken on his motion to strike out from the 3d section of article 3d, the words "fifteen," and insert in lieu thereof the words "ten," and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porche, Porter, Preston, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soule, Stephens, Trist, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—30 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferso, Culbertson, Derbes, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Kenner, Labauve, Legendre, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Wodsworth, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—34 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

Mr. Mayo then moved the re-adoption of the said section 3d, viz:

Sec. 3. "No person shall be eligible to the office of governor or lieutenant governor, who shall not have attained the age of thirty-five years, and has not been fifteen years a free white male citizen of the United States, and of this State, next preceding his election."

Which motion prevailed.

On motion, the Convention adjourned till to-morrow, at 11 o'clock, a. m.

Wednesday, March 5, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer by the Hon. Mr. Stephens, a member of the Convention, in the absence of a minister of the gospel.

Mr. Saunders then moved that all discussion shall cease, and the vote be taken on the different projects submitted on the apportionment of the State, this day at 2 o'clock. He would not press this matter forward, but that he feels sure that all further discussion will only tend to make it a more vexed question; and in order to avoid all acrimonious feeling, he presses this motion on the attention of the Convention.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption, trusts that this motion will not prevail. He has but one or two remarks to make, in relation to his desire to lay it on the table for the present. One is, that to-day we shall have before us a motion to re-consider a very important question, which is made the special order of the day, to-wit: Mr. Wadsworth's proposition to re-consider the vote on the federal basis. There is another which is uppermost in the minds of the members, restricting the city; besides that we have two new propositions on the subject of apportionment before us, to consider of, as substitutes for the whole section. One of those propositions has been printed and laid on our table; the other one has not yet been brought into the hall, and of course we have had no opportunity to examine it. Now, Mr. President, said Mr. Taylor, it would appear very absurd on our parts if we were to undertake to vote, and perhaps upon a call of yeas and nays, on questions that we have neither read nor discussed. Why, sir, if we do this, we may as well say at once that all deliberative assemblies amount to but a farcical operation; and that debating on any question is an useless matter.

If the motion prevail, it puts an end to all discussion; it takes away our character as a deliberative assembly. He therefore hopes it will not prevail.

He wants to hear something as to the advantages embraced in these projects; he wants them laid open, and their plans developed; and it might happen in the course of the discussion that he would have a few humble remarks to offer himself, as would doubtless many others, from whose enlightened minds he would derive such information as might enable him to arrive at correct conclusions. Besides, he feels sure that he is not alone in this situation, there are many others who want to be satisfied ere they are called upon to vote.

Mr. Marigny said he did not understand the way they were going to spring this federal basis upon us again. He hopes the vote will not be taken without giving to the members the right to discuss it, which they are clearly entitled to do. He is willing to give them all a chance, but he is not willing to have a gag law placed upon the members of this Convention.

Mr. Dunn thought Mr. Saunders, on this occasion, was out of order, a thing very unusual with him.

Mr. Saunders said that although he felt convinced he was in order, yet he would not press the motion. He remarked that it was dictated by the best of motives, to put an end to a discussion that could end in no good, as every body's mind, he thought, was made up; but he withdrew it, because he clearly saw that no man could play a card here, no matter how good, but what it was sure to be truped. He therefore withdrew his motion.

Mr, Scott, of Raton Rouge: From the diversity of opion which he had found, in conversing with the different delegates, was induced to think that we should first come to some settlement as to the removal of the seat of government; and he thought a compromise, satisfactory to all, could be arrived at. With that view he desired to offer a resolution which would reach the case, but

The President reminded him that the motion to re-consider, made by Mr. Wadsworth, was the first motion before the Convention; and that motion being called up,

Mr. Claiborne moved to lay said motion on the table, subject to call. He thinks that, as many projects have been submitted to the consideration of the Convention, some of which may, and doubtless do, approximate in some degree to the federal basis, it were better to take them up first, and see what they were; besides, it would be somewhat uncourteous to call up Mr. Wadsworth's motion, when he was not in his seat. He, therefore, presses his motion, to lay Mr. Wadsworth's motion to re-consider on the table, subject to call. This motion was sustained, when

Mr. Taylor of Assumption moved a re-consideration of the vote just taken. He thinks the Convention is placing itself in a very singular and strange position, for after having settled a very important principle, viz: the federal basis; and having yesterday agreed to take up two important matters for consideration early this morning, they are now laid over, to take up the discussion on other matters, unconnected with either of the questions. He is desirous of doing something, and not being at sea for ever.

Mr. Claiborne stated that his motion had been before the Convention, and it was then decided to lay it on the table, subject to call, which call would doubtless be made as soon as Mr. Wadsworth found a suitable moment, after he took his seat in the Convention; he being absent now, he hoped the motion to re-consider would not prevail.

The motion to re-consider was then put, and lost.

On motion of Mr. Downs, the next question taken up by the Convention, was the 10th section of the 2d article of the constitution; which is as follows:

Sec. 10. The State shall be divided into eight senatorial districts, each of which shall elect four senators, to be voted for by persons entitled to vote for representativs, as follows:

All that portion of the parish of Orleans lying on the East side of the river Mississippi, shall comprise the first district.

The Parishes of Plaquemines, St. Bernard, and the remainder of the parish of Orleans, parish of Jefferson, St. Charles and St. John the Baptist, shall compose the second district.

The parishes of St. James, Ascension, Assumption, Lafourche Interior and Terrebonne, shall compose the the third district.

The parishes of Iberville, West Baton Rouge, East Baton Rouge, Pointe Coupée and Avoyelles, shall compose the fourth district.

The parishes of West Feliciana, East Feliciana, Washington, St. Tammany, St. Helena and Livingston, shall compose the fifth district.

The parishes of Concordia, Carroll, Madison, Ouachita, Union, Franklin, Tensas, Morehouse, Catahoula and Caldwell, shall compose the sixth district.

The parishes of Rapides, Natchitoches, Caddo, Calcassieu, Claiborne, Sabine, Bossier and De Soto, shall compose the seventh district.

The parishes of St. Mary, St. Martin, St. Landry, Lafayette and Vermillion, shall compose the eighth district.

Provided, that the legislature shall have the power, in any year in which they shall apportion representation in the house of representatives, to divide any one or more of said senatorial districts, each to be entitled to elect two senators.

Mr. Conrad desired to make two or three remarks—not particularly in reply to any remarks which Mr. Downs had made, but more especially to explain some remarks which he had himself made yesterday, and he took this opportunity to do so. Mr. Downs is mistaken when he thinks that he (Mr. Conrad) would or could affirm, that you could not find proper men in small districts, fit to represent the State in the senate. What he said was this, that such men were not likely to be selected, because in almost every section of the State there are large family interests which would operate prejudicially to the claims of men of talent, if the districts were made sufficiently small for them to bring family influence to bear, and that therefore we might possibly get an inferior man elected on account of such influence. That was his remark, neither more nor less. The member from Ouachita objects to the reduction of the number, because when the senatorial district was composed of a large number of parishes, there would necessarily be many who never would have the senator from their parish. But he seems to have forgotten, that under his own arrangement, that difficulty is provided for; for every parish is now to have a representative in the lower house, to attend to their local wants. It appears to him, therefore, that is sufficient to satisfy the different parishes, without letting each of them have a direct voice in the senate. A State senate is not regarded as the place where local matters are presented; that is properly pertaining to the lower house, while the senate has wisely been created to keep a check on improvident or hasty legislation in local matters; acting more for the general than for special interests. The great aim of modern republics in creating such a body, seems to have been accomplished, in making them answer as such check. There is amongst them, less feeling and passion, than is to be expected where representatives are contending for local benefits. And therefore the less interests they have in common, the more they serve as a check upon each other. Now suppose two men are elected, one to the legislature, the other to the senate, from the same parish, or from adjoining parishes, whose feelings and prejudices are identical, it is natural to suppose they have an identity of feeling on all questions that come up for consideration. In such a case, the aim of making the one body a check upon the other, is not accomplished; while on the other hand, it would be, if the senator were elected from a different neighborhood. He has repeatedly declared, that he did not advocate this report. He does not approve of eight senatorial districts, any more than he would of thirty. In the one case they would be too large, and in the other too small—he thinks a middle course decidedly preferable. As the matter now stands, we know there is great disproportion; for instance, St. Charles and St. John the Baptist, form one district; and Concordia forms another, Point Coupée another; these are altogether disproportioned, taking into view the present situation and size of the State.

He would prefer some person who is more acquainted with the localities of the different parishes—their population, and the several interests in each portion of the country, than he is, would take this subject in hand, and propose some plan by which we should stear clear of the two extremes—for it has ever been allowed to be one of the wisest sayings, "in medio tutissimus ibis."

After Mr. Conrad had concluded his remarks, the Convention took up the Order of the Day—which was,

Section 6th of the report of the special committee as amended, viz:

"Each parish shall be entitled to representation in proportion to the number of qualified electors in it; Provided, that no parish or city shall ever be entitled to more than one-fifth of the whole number of representatives."

The secretary then read the projects of Messrs. Downs, Saunders and Benjamin. The first was furnished in the report of the 3d instant, and the second in that of the 4th inst. The one offered by Mr. Benjamin, is as follows:

Sec. 1. Representation shall be equal and uniform in this State, and each parish shall be entitled to representation according to the total number of its population.

Sec. 2. In the year 1846, and every tenth year thereafter, a census shall be made of the total population of the State, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

Sec. 3. At the first regular session of the legislature, after the making of each census, the legislature shall apportion the representation amongst the several parishes on the basis of the whole population, in the manner following, viz: Some number shall be chosen as a representative number, which, when applied in making the apportionment, shall give a number of representatives not less than seventy, nor more than one hundred; the number so chosen shall be taken as a divisor, and each parish shall be entitled to one representative for every time that the divisor shall be contained in the dividend formed of its total population, and to one additional number from every fraction exceeding the one-half of the divisor; and any parish having a total population less than the whole divisor, but exceeding one half of it, shall be entitled to one representative; and the legislature shall be incompetent to act on any subject matter till the apportionment herein directed shall have been made.

Sec. 4. The first representation under this constitution, (ascertained as near as may be in accordance with the above principle, by assuming 4500 as a representative number,) shall continue until the first apportionment shall be made by the legislature, and shall be as follows, viz:

Mr. O'Bryan thought the first motion in order was that of Mr. Mayo, to strike out one-fifth, and insert one-sixth; but Mr. Mayo, during the absence of Mr. Downs, when he wished to be heard on this question, withdrew his motion, and moved that the next in order be taken up, which was that of Mr. Saunders.

Mr. Miles Taylor is of opinion, that if taken up in the manner proposed, that they should all go together.

Mr. Mayo pressed the consideration of Mr. Saunder's project.

Mr. Marigny differed with the gentleman from Ouachita. He thinks Mr. Benjamin's proposal is clearly the one first in order. He offered it as a compromise of this vexed question, and the house agreed to consider it first as such.

Mr. Mayo, desirous of beginning somewhere, agreed that Mr. Benjamin's plan should be first called up, and so moved.

Mr. Downs, however, thought it would be better to take up the report, and then adopt one or the other of the proposed substitutes.

The question was put on Mr. Mayo's motion and carried. The compromise substitute, offered by Mr. Benjamin, was hen before the Convention.

Mr. O'Bryan then moved to lay that substitute on the table indefinitely.

Mr. Downs rose to explain his views in seconding the motion of Mr. O'Bryan, to lay the substitute of Mr. Benjamin on the table. He does not do so with the view of rejecting it on slight grounds. This is offered as a compromise, he, (Mr. D.,) wants a compromise; and he is satisfied that the question cannot be settled otherwise. He now thinks that a compromise can be made in this matter; and it is with that feeling he approaches the subject. He wants a compromise that will be satisfactory, both to the city and to the country. He thought the proposition of the last committee, limiting New Orleans to one-fifth, would have met the general approbation of all sides of the house; but like all other projects, it seems to be not satisfactory. It is very hard to satisfy either party at first; both sides have objections to any measure of compromise, when first presented; and it is very natural they should have; for man is too prone to think himself infallible, as well in the city as in the country; but when they come cooly and calmly to reflect on any measure, their previously expressed opinions gradually yield to the force of truth and reason. He, Mr. Downs, does not expect any project, based on a compromise, to be taken at once; it is contrary to our nature to receive at first, that which is opposed to our pre-conceived opinions.

Mr. Benjamin, with that spirit of truth and candor for which he is justly distinguished, has come into our midst in the spirit of conciliation and harmony; has made a suggestion which will lead to good results; he is endeavoring to throw oil on the troubled waters, it would seem, and if any good should result from his offer, (which, he, Mr. Downs, trusts there will,) to him alone, should belong the honor and the credit of the final settlement of this difficult question. I allude to the admission in his speech that it would be just and fair to reduce New Orleans one-fifth not to his project, so called, which is no compromise at all.

Mr. Benjamin has admitted that a necessity does exist for restricting the powers of the city; and he has explained it to you in so clear and concise a manner, that I am willing to take what he has said for granted, without amendment. He claims a fair and full representation for her, in the first place, under any basis which may be established, (and we have established the electoral basis;) although he, Mr. Downs, is willing to take that or the federal basis, and then deduct one-fifth from representation, to be divided amongst the country parishes, to counter-balance the influence which a concentrated vote would have. He, Mr. Benjamin, went further; he said that after duly weighing the matter, he was compelled to say that it was nothing but justice, that each parish should have one representative at least. He found that the new parishes were no smaller than the old parishes; and that they had as large a population. In all this he has acted in a frank and manly way, and come to the position first opened by me. Indeed it is clear, that where all are placed on an equality; on the same platform, where the same feelings and interests are identified, (as they are, New Orleans excepted,) between every parish of this State; that no distinction should be made. He, Mr. Downs, wants no advantage taken of the admissions of Mr. Benjamin; so far from injuring the cause which he has been upholding, he, (Mr. B.,) has strengthened it; and by giving up his untenable points, he has strengthened all the others. He feels certain that Mr. Benjamin has thereby acted for the best interests of his constituents; and that his course shows him to be a good logician, a man of sense; and thereby has only exemplified an old saying, that "one good reason is better than five hundred bad ones." No man comes here to fight for power; all we desire is right and justice, and if we could get more it would be impolitic, for "truth is mighty, and will prevail." And I am free to confess, that I have become convinced, from the arguments of Mr. Benjamin, that we from the country are likely to be met in a better and more conciliating spirit, by the city, than was at first evinced—something is now conceded—we have now made some progress, and I think we shall and may agree.

But there is one element of power in which they have greatly the advantage of us, which has not yet, I believe, been adverted to—and to that I desire, said Mr. Downs, to call the attention of the Convention—and that is, the press of the city, which have always united in favor of the city. That is, and always has been, a powerful lever. Just look at them for the last week. There are only two democratic papers in the city, and being a democrat myself, I naturally looked first into them. In the first one, I found, to my surprise, that they were opposed to the interests of the country. Well, thought I, that is surprising; and so I turned to the other, and I found that one more strongly in favor of the city and opposed to the country interests than the first one. Now, suppose we have the legislature established here; with the influence of the press, combined with the legislative power they ask, the country will truly be swallowed up by the overshadowing influence and power of the city; and that is one of the strongest reasons why she ought to be restricted.

True, we have country presses, and they are bold and fearless in the cause of the country and the people's rights; but then their voice cannot be heard, ere it will be too late to check any pernicious scheme that may be proposed. When the principle of restriction is admitted generally, as it is by Mr. Benjamin, it will only then remain for us to determine the extent of it. Mr. Benjamin thinks that after having ascertained the precise amount which the city is entitled to, on any basis that may be agreed upon, that a deduction of one-fifth is reasonable, and those country members with whom he (Mr. Downs,) has had an opportunity to converse with, seem to think favorably of the proposition. But at the same time he (Mr. D.) feels bound to say, that Mr. Benjamin's supposition that New Orleans would be entitled to one half of the representation, less one-fifth, is quite erroneous; and about as much so as the argument he advanced as to the tax on professions and auction sales, being paid exclusively by the city. Just let them construct another Chinese wall around the city, and keep out the products and people of the country—then see where they will be, and how many professional men, or auctioneers, will have any thing to pay into the treasury. It cannot be said to be paid by the country altogether or by the city altogether; but when they say, as they do, that the city can get along without the country, it reminds him of a story he once heard, of two yankee boys, who shut themselves up in a close room and swapped jackets all day, until they had made five dollars a piece. So it would be with the merchants and traders of New Orleans, if you cut them off from the trade of the country—they would have to go to swapping their goods with one another for a living. The tax, then, is paid by the whole people, by the merchants, mechanics, farmers and planters—the latter's proportion in the profits made out of them by the former.

The supposition of Mr. Benjamin is incorrect in another point of view. He seems to think that New Orleans contains one half of the white population in the State—but he (Mr. Downs,) does not think it is even one third; and therefore, although he is willing to agree with Mr. Benjamin in his first proposition, he declines agreeing to the last premises which he has advanced—he thinks they are erroneous.

The question then proposed by Mr. Benjamin is, to give New Orleans her proper apportionment; (less one-fifth for her concentration,) that would be fair. I will, so far as I am concerned, accept the proposition. It did not, perhaps, occur to the gentleman that to reduce New Orleans one-fifth, and to limit her to one-fifth of the whole representation of the State, amounts to very nearly the same thing. This at first appears a paradox, but it is not so. There are six basis of representation embraced in this tabular statement of the subcommittee, which has been printed and is in the hands of all the members:

First is on white population with the representation number, or as Mr. Beatty prefers to call it, a divisor of 1746, which gives New Orleans thirty-four members.

Second is on federal population, with a divisor (see how I follow a good example,) of 3,222, which gives New Orleans twenty-nine members.

Third is on the basis of voters, with a divisor of 490, I suppose, calculated on the voters of 1844; for this is not stated in the table, which gives New Orleans eleven members instead of forty-seven, as erroneously stated in the table.

Fourth is on the basis of the white population, with a divisor of 3,676, which gives New Orleans twenty-eight members.

Fifth is on the basis of 1844, with a divisor of 276, which gives New Orleans twenty members.

And sixth on federal numbers in the tax roll of 1843, and a divisor of 3,636, which gives New Orleans twenty-three members.

Now taking one-fifth off of each of these numbers for New Orleans and not calculating fractions, but taking the nearest full number above or below to simplify the calculation, and New Orleans would have by number one, thirty-four members, less 6 80-100, equal to twenty-seven members. By number two, she would have twenty-nine, less six, equal to twenty-three members. By number three, she would have eleven, less two, equal to nine members. By number four, she would have twenty-eight, less six, equal to twenty-two members. By number five, she would have twenty, less four, equal to sixteen members. By number six, she would have twenty-three, less five, equal to eighteen members.

The average for the whole six would be, for New Orleans nineteen members; for four of them, leaving out the extreme numbers of two or three, the average would be 19 75-100 members, say twenty members for New Orleans, about one-fifth of a number of representation, varying from eighty to one hundred, and as near as may be to one-fifth of the number suggested in the substitute offered yesterday.

How would this work in the future? favorably to New Orleans certainly, but not so favorably as to make it dangerous. Probably at the next apportionment, especially if not made for four or five years, a divisor on voters basis would be taken off, perhaps not less than five hundred. This applied to New Orleans with a vote of fifteen thousand—and I do not think it will exceed that for many years, considering how much the residence of two years for citizens of other States and naturalized citizens will curtail her—would give her thirty members, less six, equal to twenty-four, which would be one-fourth of one hundred; and by increasing the divisor, say to six hundred, this could be reduced to twenty five, less five; just twenty, equal to one-fifth of a hundred, and this by fixing the divisor at a proper point, the proportion might be so regulated as to have a reduction of one-fifth on her full number, just equal to one-fifth of the whole representation of the State. But to prevent this enlargement of the divisor from disfranchising small parishes, the principle ought to be adopted, that each parish ought to have one representative.

The calculations I have made here, it must be admitted, are not mine. They were suggested by an examination into the project of Mr. Benjamin. You admit two principles, 1st, that the city ought to be restricted one fifth of the proportion of representation, and

2d, that each parish shall have at least one representative.

One fifth taken from the political power of the city, I think, Mr. President, will be satisfactory to every portion of the State. He, (Mr. Downs,) found no fault with the city members for their course in this matter. On the contrary, he is pleased to see them stick up to their duty in the protection of their local interests. By this compromise you get one fifth of the representation, on a population of 100,000. You have in addition every other advantage, for it is well known and admitted that the influence of cities over the country is enormous. It is a well known and admitted fact, that Paris governs France; London, England; and in ancient days, Rome was considered not only mistress of Italy, but of the world.

So it may be with New Orleans. Her advantages are immense. Her commerce, her manufacturing interests, her increasing population, and the march she is making in spreading throughout the country the fine arts; by the concentration of talent constantly to be found in her city, is but the dawn of a bright futurity for her. Look at New Orleans as she was forty years ago, and then look at her now. She was then, truly, compared with the present moment, as a molehill to a mountain. This has been produced by her peculiar geographical position, and by the industry of her citizens, aided by the power of steam; and truly she has increased as if by magic power. Well, if she has increased in the last forty years as we know she has, what may we not look forward to for the future. She can now place one foot on the Allegheny or Rocky mountains, and the other on the isthmus of Darien; for she commands the trade of the whole valley of the Mississippi and its tributary streams on the one hand, and the full trade of the Gulf of Mexico on the other; and should the commercial world, (for they alone can or will do it,) connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans by a canal from Chagres to Panama, there will be no end to her prosperous course. God speed her, say I, (said Mr. Downs,) in her forward course, if you but deprive her of the power plitically, to unjustly deprive the balance of the State of their just rights.

Mr. Taylor then addressed the Convention at considerable length, in reply to Mr. Downs, to which he briefly rejoined, and

Mr. Dunn then moved to adjourn, but before the adjournment, Mr. Trist was on motion of Mr. Kenner, excused for his non-attendance, on account of sickness.

The Convention then adjourned till 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Thursday, March 6, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. Preston opened the proceedings with prayer.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The project submitted by Mr. Benjamin for the apportionment of representation.

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. O'Bryan, to lay said project indefinitely on the table.

Mr. Dunn said he hoped the motion of the gentleman from Lafayette (Mr. O'Bryan) would not prevail. Under present circumstances he thought it ought not to prevail. This subject had been for some time under consideration. It involved a most vital question in government, and one which in its settlement was invariably attended with great and innumerable difficulties. The inequality in representation was one of the principal causes for the call of this Convention. Mr. Dunn alluded to the restricted voice which was allowed to the Florida parishes in the legislation of the States. It was manifestly disproportionate not only in reference to the population, but to the wealth and intelligence of that portion of the country. It may well happen that we may not concur in the details of this proposition. But it is offered as a compromise, and as such it ought to be sustained; it ought to be calmly and dispassionately considered, and patiently discussed.

I know, said Mr. Dunn, that an opinion prevails in the city, that there is a prejudice entertained against her in the country. I think that impression has no foundation. I disclaim it for my constituents and myself. I entertain no prejudice against any portion of the State. There is no such feeling in my bosom. I entertain, it is true, a settled conviction that the country should retain the preponderance of power, because I conceive it is essential to the safety and perpetuity of the institutions of the State—that it is called for by the peculiar position of the country; and is, in a word, as necessary for the protection of the interests of the city as for those of the country. I may, perhaps, in view of the exigencies of the case, insist upon more than the delegates from the city are willing to accord, but if we differ, and a difference of opinion here is quite natural, we honestly differ. My colleagues from the country and myself are actuated in this particular, at least, I am sure, by the purest motives, and I am ready to concede similar motives to the city delegation. The love of power is inherent in the bosom of every man, and there will always be a struggle for its possession. This subject is one within the peculiar domain of compromise, and in the spirit of compromise I am ready to adjust it on fair and reasonable grounds. Some members on both sides appear disposed to assume extreme grounds, and then contend that they will not compromise because principle is involved, and principles ought not to be compromised. This is a fallacious doctrine, and if it were acted on by each member of this body the formation of a constitution would be a work of impossibility. Are gentlemen so wedded to their peculiar notions as to think that a difference of opinion cannot, by any possibility, be justified? If this be indeed their conviction, then argument and reason are superfluous.

I think that the federal basis is appropriate to our condition. It is suited to our mixed population—to the agricultural pursuits of the country, where the operative population are slaves; and to the elements forming our great commercial metropolis, where white operatives, to a considerable extent, are destined to supersede slave operatives. By whom are the countless bales of cotton—the innumerable hogsheads of sugar that encumber your levees, and which add to the wealth of the city, produced? Is it not by our slaves in the country; and whether you classify them as property or as persons, are not their proprietors entitled to some representation for their protection, and the protection of that labor? Most assuredly. There is nothing unreasonable in the demand, nor can it be said that to grant it involves a sacrifice of principle.

Mr. Dunn avowed himself ready to concede all that could be conceded, to settle this question to the mutual satisfaction of all. He did not desire to deprive the city of her just and proper proportion of power. He wished that to be distinctly understood, but at the same time he could not consent that the country should yield up one tittle, one jot, of what was really her proportion of political power. If the question was proposed to be compromised, so that the country should have the necessary guarantees for safety, he was ready to accede to that proposition. In relation to the smaller parishes, Mr. Dunn avowed himself favorable to their retaining a separate representative, but to enable them to do so, some rule should be adopted which would not necessitate the relinquishment of any portion of the representation accruing to the larger parishes, from whatever basis should finally be adopted by the Convention. To his conception, the representatives of the larger parishes had no authority to consent to give up any portion of their political power, in order that it should be transferred to a parish deficient in population. For his part, he could not, nor would not, assent to it, on behalf of his constituents. If this difficulty could be obviated, and it might be readily obviated, by placing the representation number sufficiently low to admit of the separate representation of the smallest parishes, he would give such a plan his assent. At the same time it would be proper not to enlarge the total number of representatives beyond reasonable bounds—although some increase might well be made to accommodate the smaller parishes, from the peculiar exigencies of the case, as well as from the fact that the legislature was to meet only biennially, and by the abridgement of the sessions, the expenses would be thereby considerably lessened from what they have heretofore been, even although the number of members should be augmented.

Mr. Dunn trusted that all selfish and sectional feelings would be discarded; that the members of this body would meet this question in a spirit of mutual compromise, and that, like a band of brothers, they would settle it without asking or making improper sacrifices. He would not participate in a victory obtained over the just and equitable rights of any section. Such a triumph would be evanescent. It would be of short duration—it would be a victory of which the majority should not be proud. There would be a reaction, and the torrent of popular opinion would destroy the work that had been done. It was better to deliberate a month longer than to take a forced vote. It was not only necessary that we were convinced ourselves that we were right, but we should also use every effort to convince those who differed in opinion with us that they were wrong, and give them a full opportunity of convincing us that we were really about perpetrating the gross and glaring injustice of which they so vehemently complained. The union of the States was the work of compromise. It is of the very essence of popular governments that there needs must be compromises. We were forming a constitution for ages—for posterity—not a mere legislative act that could be instantly undone if it did not answer public expectation. Without compromises this great and glorious nation would never have gathered the profits of its revolutionary struggle. It would have relapsed into its past state of colonial vassalage, or the States might, perhaps, have maintained a precarious and uncertain existence as rival petty sovereignties, exposed to perpetual struggles with one another and to internal commotions.

We have a striking example, said Mr. Dunn, on a recent occasion of our national history, how effectual was the spirit of compromise to preserve the union from internal strife, and to avert a terrible calamity. One of the confederated States of this Union conceiving that her interests were sacrificed by the majority, proceeded to the very utmost verge in resisting the authority of the federal government—declaring that the particular law against which she complained, should not be executed within her borders. Every one felt that a fatal crisis was at hand, and that the durability of our institutions were put to the severest test they had ever encountered. Dismay and apprehension pervaded every bosom as to what would be the result upon our institutions of this unfortunate collision, which seemed to be so inevitable, when the great statesman of the west, bade the troubled elements of the commotion to be calm, and in the spirit of compromise offered the olive branch of peace. His interposition was effectual—the lowering clouds disappeared from the horizon—the integrity of the union was maintained, and not one drop of American blood was spilt! This was the happy result of compromise. Let us then cherish that policy, and by respecting the rights of all, endeavor in the spirit of mutual concession, so to accommodate and to reconcile these rights as to preclude every cause for contention and jealousy between the various sections of the State.

I hope, Mr. President, that this project will not be laid upon the table, but that it will be taken into consideration, examined dispassionately and calmly, according to its merits, and in the spirit which has been avowed by its mover.

Mr. Benjamin said, that one of the most difficult subjects to be adjusted in a republican government was this very question of apportionment. Each fractional division of the community was anxious to participate in the distribution of political power, and was fearful that its neighbor should possess too much power. It was one of those questions where each one might well enough be distrustful of his own judgment. How can any one expect that he can induce those who differed with him to change their opinions, when he begins by telling them that he is impractically wedded to his own—and that whatever may be their arguments, he will not change that opinion. This question, I am sorry to see, has been discussed in such a spirit of intolerance as to have caused much warmth of feeling, and to have provoked personalities that ought to have been avoided. Hence I have consulted our past history, with the view of ascertaining if there were no examples which would induce us to meet on some middle ground—some ground of compromise.

One of my brother delegates (Mr. Roselius,) has told us that he will never consent to a compromise of principle, and so persuaded is he that he is right in that doctrine, that I have no hopes of inducing him to yield his support to my proposition. I think he is wrong, and I regret his determination. With similar resolutions, it may be said to be impossible to form a constitution. We have the knowledge that there were great divergences of opinion in the federal convention—and it is a notorious fact, that the constitution never would have been formed had there not been mutual concessions on the part of its illustrious framers. If a similar spirit had not pervaded the Virginia convention, to which reference has so frequently been had, and in which some of the same distinguished men participated, the constitution of that State would never have been formed.

Whoever, said Mr. Benjamin, has watched the progress of this debate, will admit that the pervading spirit of the majority, is to restrict the city of New Orleans, and to deprive her of a just portion of her representation, on the plea that it would be dangerous to the country, were justice meted out to her upon the principles and in conformity with an equal and uniform representation. It appears that the delegation from the city must make concessions to these fears, or withdraw from the Convention. There is no other alternatve. I am as anxious as my colleagues can be to insist upon the just proportion of power belonging to the city, but as I am met by the determined and impracticable resistance of the majority of this body, I am willing to make some concessions, provided the country is disposed to meet us in something like a similar spirit—and will not expect the city to make all the sacrifices.

I freely admit that I do not desire to see the preponderance of power in the city; and I think that the arguments adduced by the country members on that point, have remained unanswered. They have told us that the principle of uniformity and equality, however good and rational in itself, cannot be maintained under the peculiar circumstances in which the city and State stand towards each other. That the city has a concentrated and compact population, while the country is comparatively but sparsely peopled, and abounds, from its agricultural pursuits, in a particular class of working population that are less numerous in the city than in the country, and which may finally be confined to the country. They insist that even if there were any thing like equality between the city and the country in their representation, the latter would virtually be the possessor of the balance of power, inasmuch as the country is divided and subdivided into parishes, between whom there is a conflict of interest, and some local prejudices; and that the city, acting as a unit, would have a decided advantage in controlling the destinies of the State. Here again I am under the necessity of admitting, however I may differ from my colleagues from the city, that these arguments have not been satisfactorily controverted by us. We must endeavor so to apportion the representation, as to preserve a just balance between the town and country.

I am satisfied that my constituents will approve any arrangement of this difficult question that may be made upon a basis of reciprocity, which will not exact all the concession on their part, but which will, in a spirit of compromise, be met with concessions on the part of the country.

The proposition which I had the honor to submit, and which is now before the Convention, for its decision, has this striking advantage, that it is based on equality and uniformity, and that principle is strictly adhered to—the only point of concession on the part of the city is in this, that the apportionment under it is not as favorable to the city as to the country. But there is no exception in it. It is not like the proposition of the gentleman from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs,) which acknowledges the principle of equality and uniformity, and then sacrifices that principle to an odious exception against the city. The effect of either may be the same, but my proposition avoids a special restriction upon the city. That restriction would produce ill feelings and would never be acquiesced in, because it is based on a revolting exclusion of a particular section. It would wound and rankle the feelings of the people of the city. By my compromise there is a mutual concession, and by natural causes the effect favors the country.

Mr. Benjamin concluded by hoping that his proposition would receive a favorable hearing, both from the members from the country as well as from his colleagues from the city.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption, moved that the taking of the vote on the motion of Mr O'Bryan to lay indefinitely on the table the project of Mr. Benjamin, be postponed until to-morrow at 2 o'clock p. m.; and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brent, Briant, Carriere, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Dunn, Garrett, Grymes, Hynson, Legendre, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mazureau, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Wederstrandt, and Wikoff—38 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Burton, Chambliss, Covillion, Humble, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porche, Porter, Scott of Madison, Waddill and Wadsworth—13 nays; consequently said motion was carried.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption, then called up the following section, submitted by Mr. Scott of Baton Rouge, viz:

Sec. — The seat of government shall from and after the year be permanently located out of the city of New Orleans, and not within a distance of miles from the said city.

Mr. Taylor thought that the question of the seat of government being once decided, it would be easier to come to a solution of the question upon apportionment.

Mr. Grymes took this occasion to express his concurrence in the views expressed by Mr. Benjamin upon the subject of his (Mr. Benjamin's) compromise. He thought with that gentleman that the city ought not to be invested with an absorbing influence over the country. In reference to the seat of government, Mr. Grymes said he considered it to be of no great value to the city himself, although it was quite likely that some of his constituents might regard it in a different light. What was of greater value in his eyes was, that the city should not be despoiled of her just relative weight in the legislation of the country. That was all he asked for, and if the removal of the seat of government were essential to attain that object, he was ready to give it up. He would give it up as a part of the compromise to ensure the city something like a fair representation—for a mess of pottage.

Mr. Humble moved to postpone said section until the Convention take under consideration the general provisions.

Mr. Humble said he preferred the project of Mr. Downs to the other projects that had been presented. It was the most equitable and just for the country; and he hoped the question of apportionment would be first disposed of.

Mr. Humble's motion was lost.

Mr. Chinn then offered the following substitute, viz:

At the first session of the legislature after the adoption of this constitution, a law shall be passed locating the seat of government at the town of Baton Rouge, in the parish of East Baton Rouge.

Mr. Porter opposed the motion to take up the substitute, or to act upon the matter in its present shape. He was himself favorable to a removal of the seat of government from New Orleans, but where it should be placed was a matter upon which public opinion had not pronounced. It was not for the Convention to take upon themselves to decide that question. Nor did he think it proper on other grounds, that this decision should be made by the Convention, and incorporated into the constitution. There were elements of strife enough in this Convention, without originating a new bone of contention. Whatever might be said to the contrary, the city desired to retain the seat of government, and if such a section as that offered by the delegate (Mr. Chinn) were passed, it might be employed as a means to cause the rejection of the constitution by sectional appeals, particularly in the city of New Orleans.

Mr. Humble expressed similar views to those enumerated by Mr. Porter.

Mr. Winder submitted the following substitute, viz:

Resolved, That the first general assembly to be elected under this constitution, shall determine upon the place where the seat of government of this State shall be permanently located from and after the first day of January, 1850; provided, that it be not fixed in the city of New Orleans, nor less than sixty miles from the same, by the usual route of travelling.

Mr. Scott of Baton Rouge, said that the solution of this question would determine some of the difficulties that grew out of the question of apportionment and for that reason, he trusted it would be first disposed of.

Mr. Read thought that the seat of government should be transfered from New Orleans. Large cities were not the appropriate places for the functions of popular governments. The conflict of interests, and the most weighty considerations of public policy, had induced most of the States of the Union to transfer their seats of government into the interior. The necessity was more particularly applicable to the city of New Orleans. What have we here? A floating population, with divergent feelings and interests. The influence of the city could not be otherwise than pernicious to sound legislation, and if we were to trace the prolific causes of our public debt, and our extravagant expenditures, we would find it in the seat of government being located in the city, and subject to its commercial impulses. Never, said Mr. Read, was economy and prudent legislation more essential to the salvation of the State. In taking the seat of government from New Orleans, independent of all other considerations, we shall diminish our public expenses very considerably. The public property in the city where the legislature convenes, could be sold to great advantage, and with one half of the amount realized, and probably less, more suitable and appropriate buildings could be procured in the country for the reception of the public officers.

Mr. Dunn hoped that the expression of a willingness on the part of the New Orleans delegation to give up the seat of government, would be taken in connection with the proposition of Mr. Benjamin, as a part of the compromise assented to by the city. If it were so considered, he would move to substitute Jackson for Baton Rouge. Jackson was his first choice.

Mr. Porter would inquire whether this was a regular bargain entered into out of doors?

Mr. Dunn replied, he saw nothing in this matter that savored of bargain or corruption. If the question of the seat of government were settled by its removal from the city, the influence of the city over our legislation would be to some extent impaired, and the question of apportionment pro tarte, would have fewer difficulties. He saw no reason why the Convention should not fix the seat of government. It could be more effectually done by the Convention than by the legislature. In the legislature there were various concurrences to be obtained before the measure could be consummated, and it might be defeated against the wishes of the people. It might be lost in the senate, after it had passed the house of representatives, or it might pass both houses and be vetoed by the governor. It was exposed to many casualties if left to the legislature, and the better plan was for us to decide that question as the immediate organs of the people.

Mr. Conrad of New Orleans, was somewhat surprised at what fell from the gentleman from East Feliciana, (Mr. Dunn) on the subject of the removal of the seat of government being offered as a compromise on the part of the city. He (Mr. Conrad) disclaimed the remotest knowledge of any such compromise. He considered the two questions as entirely distinct—the removal of the seat of government, and the apportionment of representation. He thought the question of the removal of the seat of government, was best committed to the legislature. It was a question for the decision of the legislature, and not for the decision of the Convention. The experiment had been made to take the seat of government from New Orleans, and it had proved abortive. The year succeeding, the legislature returned back to the city, and it was frequently here asserted, that this country legislation was not very remarkable for its sagacity. The question after all was nothing more than this, which village or town shall have the honor and profit of feeding the members of the legislature for a given time.

Mr. Benjamin said that he had understood that certain members of the Legislature had expressed the opinion that if the seat of government were taken out of the city, they would be disposed to act with less rigor towards the city in reference to her representation. He had no objection that the question of the seat of government should first be decided, and if its decision were to exercise a favorable influence upon the question of apportionment, he would be glad to have the benefit of that influence for his proposition. But he would certainly vote against the removal.

Mr. Voorhies submitted the following substitute, viz :

At the first session of the legislature under this constitution, a law shall be passed to fix a suitable location for the seat of government of this State, which shall take effect in the year 1850; and shall not be subject to any change before the year 1870, and every twenty years thereafter, if deemed proper and expedient.

Mr. Wadsworth thought it an erroneous idea to suppose that the city of New Orleans exercised any control over the legislature, because it was the seat of government. The question at any rate, properly belonged to the legislature. There was certainly less apprehension of any influence directed towards the legislature being pernicious in the city than in the country. The city was the focus of all the interests of the State, and the legislature were sure to be in possession of both sides of every question. Say what you will, New Orleans was the centre of all information. The idea that was put forth by some persons, that the members of the legislature were seduced from their line of duty in the city, was a most humiliating reproach. Will any member of this body admit that any attempt has been made to seduce him with a plate of gombo, or a stuffed turkey. Yet this was the silly slang that was heard whenever it was proposed to take the seat of government from New Orleans. The Legislature had tried the experiment once, and it had signally failed. They have had the power for thirty-two years, to remove the seat of government, and have done so but once; and immediately afterwards, they repented and brought it back—a sufficient proof that it is best located where it is.

Mr. Beatty moved for the previous question.

The President then put the question, "shall the main question be now put?" which motion prevailed.

Mr. Voorhies then moved to lay indefinitely on the table the said section, and the yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Carriere Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Eustis, Garcia, Ledoux, Legendre, Marigny,

Mazureau, Porche, Preston, Roman, Roselius, St Amand, Soule, Voorhies, Wadsworth and Winchester—23 yeas: and Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton Chambliss, Chinn, Covillion, Downs, Dunn, Garrett Humble Hynson, Kenner, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott, of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder—40 nays. The motion was therefore lost.

Mr. Beatty moved to fill the blank with "1849," and the yeas and nays being called,

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Covillion, Garett, Hynson, Kenner, Labauve, Leonard, McRae, Mayo, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Pugh Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Soule, Stephens, Waddill, and Wikoff voted in the affirmative—25 yeas; and

Messrs. Boudousquie, Brazeale, Brent, Briant Cenas, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Humble, Ledoux, Legendre, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prudhomm, Ratliff, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—37 nays; consequently the motion was lost.

Mr. Wederstrandt then moved to fill the blank with "1848;" the yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Chambliss, Chinn, Covillion, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Humble Hynson, Kenner, Labauve, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan Peets, Porter, Prescott of St Landry, Preston, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the affirmative—39 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert Benjamin, Boudousquie, Briant, Carriere, Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Eustis, Garcia, Ledoux, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Porche, Prudhomme, Roman, Roselius, St, Amand, Soule, Voorhies, Wadsworth and Winchester voted in the negative—25 nays; said motion was carried.

Mr. Marigny moved that the Convention adjourn till to-morrow at 11 o'clock, a. m., and the yeas and nays being called,

Messrs. Benjamin, Boudousquie, Briant, Brumfield, Cenas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Kenner, Ledoux, Legendre, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Porche, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Scott of Madison, Soule, Stephens. Wadsworth, Wikoff and Winchester voted for the adjournment—36 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Carriere, Chinn, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Labauve, Mayo, Peets, Pugh, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Winder voted against the adjournment—27 nays; consequently the motion was carried.

Friday, March 7, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. Nicholson opened the proceedings by prayer.

The journal was read and approved.

Mr. Ratliff offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the sum of one hundred and forty-seven dollars be allowed D. O. Nadaud, as a remuneration for that amount paid by him to an assistant, to enable him to keep his records up with the proceedings of the Convention, and that the committee on contingent expenses be authorized to pay the same.

Mr. Ratliff explained that it was the opinion of himself and another member of the committee on contingent expenses, that the allowance asked for in this resolution, was nothing more than just and proper; and on the score of economy alone, it ought to be allowed. The duties which were imposed upon Mr. Nadaud were very heavy, and in transcribing the journal he has already had to employ a young man to help him, to whom he paid one-half of his salary. Mr. Read had examined the books with him, and found the work well and faithfully done. In addition, he was charged with the duties of clerk to the committee on contingent expenses; he had to make out all the warrants for the members, and keep a regular account of them. That he had done so with great fidelity and care, and was always prompt, obliging and efficient. He thought, as the labor was too much for one man to perform all these duties, that it was economical to permit him to select a young man to aid, as it was done at a less expense than the hiring of another clerk.

Mr. Voorhies moved to lay the resolution on the table, subject to call. It appeared to him that we have many clerks who are half their time idle, and who ought to have been employed at that business; as it now stands, we have no information on which to base any action, to appropriate such a sum of money as asked for.

Mr. Ratliff further explained, that in addition to what he had already advanced, he would simply state, that Mr. Nadaud had been a general runner for this Convention, between the hall and the treasurer's office on Canal street; and further, his work was more than one man could do; that it was by his advice Nadaud had engaged that young man; because he thought it would be cheaper. In the legislature he found errors would creep into the accounts of the committee on contingent expenses, and he thought it would result in saving money, by employing Mr. Nadaud to attend to those duties. He preferred it to coming before the Convention to ask for another clerk. Upon examing the records he has found as many as fourteen pages to be copied in a large book. Mr. President, said Mr. Ratliff, I speak knowingly on this subject; whenever any call is made upon me to take any thing out of the treasury, I have invariably made it a rule to investigate the causes which are said to have produced the necessity for allowing it. I have found that it was necessary that the sum claimed was a fair remuneration to pay the person whom Mr. Nadaud has employed; he was employed by my advice, on the score of economy, and I do hope this Convention will not boggle any longer about this small matter; it costs us money every moment we are debating this question; and surely there is no man on this floor, who could suppose that I, who have been so frequently called the guardian of the treasury, would recommend any call upon it, unless called for by the real justice of the claim for it.

Mr. Voorhies yet objected; he wanted yet to see what the other clerks were about, (who were doing nothing,) that they could not have done this work.

But when the question was put, Mr. Ratliff's resolution was carried.

Mr. Waddill then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That in commemoration of the annexation of Texas, whereby the peace, safety and glory of the Union are preserved, this Convention will now adjourn, to meet on Tuesday, the 11th inst., at 11 o'clock, a. m.

Mr. Waddill said that in addition to the glorious consumation which we have this day heard, of the final settlement of this measure, so important to the interests of Louisiana. He feels it incumbent upon him to say that there is another reason which induced him to offer this resolution; and that is, that the legislature is now on the point of adjourning; and there are some seven or eight members of this Convention who are also members of that body, who will be unable to attend our deliberations, until that body adjourns, and they are now holding morning and evening sessions, and will continue to do so until Monday, when they will adjourn. We have many very important matters, which are to be immediately acted on by the Convention; and we should have the benefit of their experience, and their votes, so as to have as full an expression of public sentiment on these matters as possible. He hoped, for these two reasons combined, that the motion would prevail; but there is another one, which had also some weight, and should be taken into consideration; which was, that there were many members residing within a short distance from the city, who had matters requiring their attention at home; and who had as yet no opportunity to visit their homes; and he thought no better opportunity offered than the present.

Mr. Porter moved to amend by having a clause added, that when we adjourned today we should meet again at the State house.

Mr. CHINN objects to the resolution, because we shall lose two days in glorifying over a thing which may or may not have happened. We have no evidence of the fact of Texas being annexed; it is nothing more than rumor—we had better wait and see. We have lost a great deal of time already, and he cannot see the necessity of losing two more days.

Mr. CLAIBORNE would be very willing to agree to the motion of the gentleman from Baton Rouge, if he would modify it in such a way as to stop the expenses. The State is now at a very large expense, two deliberative bodies in session at one time. It is true we have important business now before us, and we ought to have the counsel of every member of the Convention; besides it is also true there are many of the members absent on leave, while there are others who have never absented themselves, who ought to have some opportunity of going home. Let the pay be stopped then —let members take this opportunity to visit their homes, and then return and go to work in earnest.

Mr. DUNN moved to lay Mr. Waddill's motion indefinitely on the table; but much as he was in favor of annexation, he thought we had better not adjourn this Convention, at least until we were certain of it; he thinks we should not hallo before we get out of the woods. He pressed his motion, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, F. B. Conrad, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garrett, Hynson, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, Mayo, Mazureau, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Scott, Stephens, Miles Taylor, Voorhies, Wederstrandt, and Winder—37 yeas; and

Messrs. Brent, Brazeale, Cenas, Claiborne, Humble, Leonard, McRae, Peets, Porter, Ratliff, Read, W. B. Scott, S. W. Scott, Soulé, Waddill, and Wikoff—16 nays; so the resolution offered by Mr. Waddill was lost.

Mr. SCOTT of Baton Rouge, renewed the motion to adjourn, in the following form:

Resolved, That when the Convention adjourns to-day, it will adjourn to meet on Tuesday next, the 11th inst. at 11 o'clock, a. m. The yeas and nays being called for, (Mr. Claiborne in the chair,) resulted as follows:

Messrs. Brent, Briant, Cenas, Humble, McCallop, McRae, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Read, Roman, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, and Soulé—13 yeas; and Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garrett, Hynson, Legendre, Leonard, Lewis, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder—39 nays; consequently the motion was lost.

The next question in order was the resolution offered on yesterday by Mr. Scott of Baton Rouge, and which was under discussion when the house adjourned, viz:

The seat of government shall, from and after the year 1848, be permanently located out of the city of New Orleans, and not within a distance of ——— miles from the said city.

Mr. SAUNDERS proposed a substitute for the whole resolution, but was reminded by Mr. Claiborne, who was in the chair, that the vote having been already taken on the previous question, it could not be offered in the form of a substitute. No substitute could be offered unless it were to fill the blank. Mr. Saunders thought the chair was in error; as the vote on the previous question was certainly improperly taken—the only question before us, is on the whole section, and he conceives he has the right to offer a substitute for the whole.

Mr. CLAIBORNE reminded Mr. Saunders that he was still out of order—he could not be accountable for any thing that was done, when he was not in the chair; and the rules of the house were peremptory on the subject.

Mr. CHINN thinks he can cure the evil, although he feels satisfied that the chair is right in its decision; as a motion for the previous question had already been sustained by the Convention. In order therefore, properly to bring up the matter before the house, he should move a reconsideration of the vote given on yesterday on the previous question. The question was then put and the motion was carried.

Mr. Saunders then renewed his motion to adopt the substitute submitted by him.

Mr. Voorhies was of opinion that if any substitute were in order, certainly it was the one offered by him, but not acted upon on yesterday.

The President thought Mr. Saunders' motion was clearly in order, but Mr. Brent moved to lay the whole matter on the table.

Mr. Saunders thinks Mr. Brent's motion is a correct one, and will reach the case, if he will say all except one substitute.

Mr. Voorhies is convinced that the motion he made yesterday is the only one which should properly be before the Convention. The substitute which is embraced in that motion, will test the question clearly and plainly, whether the seat of government is forever to be removed from New Orleans or not. For his own part, he is in favor of leaving it to the legislature, who are not likely to decide so important a question on slight grounds. He is himself opposed to the removal of the seat of government at present, and certainly not out of the city permanently, if the legislature may hereafter deem it advisable, and for the interests of the State to bring it back again. For these reasons, he hopes the sense of the Convention will be taken on the substitute as proposed by him, and which reads as follows:

"At the first session of the legislature under this constitution, a law shall be passed, to fix a suitable location for the seat of government for this State, which shall take effect in the year 1850, and shall not be subject to any change before the year 1870, and every twenty years thereafter, if deemed proper and expedient.

Mr. Brent then moved to lay said substitute on the table indefinitely.

Mr. Benjamin hopes that Mr. Brent's motion will not prevail. It is true that the substitute, as offered by Mr. Voorhies, does not fully meet his (Mr. B's.) views, as it is stated, but nevertheless, he shall support it, because it contains one great principle, for which he (Mr. Benjamin) is contending; and that is, that this Convention should not bind the people down any more than is absolutely necessary, to keep the course of government equal and even, and moreover, just towards all. For that reason, he thinks it is not right for this Convention to designate any particular spot as the seat of government, so permanently, that the people themselves cannot (if they would) change it when it is once established, and that will be the inevitable result if we incorporate it in this constitution, when it is once established.

If the motion to lay this substitute on the table prevail, we shall be virtually saying that a very insignificant minority of the State shall have the power of ruling at their will and pleasure, an immense majority. It will not (said Mr. Benjamin) I trust, be improper for me to express my astonishment that those gentlemen who opposed us so strenuously on the most important and vital questions that we have already discussed; and who then were the loudest in their condemnation of any restrictive measure, should so suddenly be found willing to admit his assertion, made on the 14th of February last, that we were here, in Convention, to impose such restrictions as were deemed necessary, to be inserted in the constitution for the happiness and welfare of all; and it will not further, I hope, be considered out of place, when I say that the way and manner in which they have shifted their ground, reflects no credit on them, either in their actions, or in the manner in which they have seen fit to abandon principles, which they professed to cherish, and that, on the very ground which they scouted at us conservatives for, viz. the expediency of the case. Beautiful consistency! ! they say it is expedient to fetter down the people in the choice of the spot where the seat of government shall be held. We say it is both inexpedient and unjust to fetter the people at all, in their wishes on a subject purely of locality; the people at large are the best judges of these matters, and they will doubtless elect their representatives hereafter with such views as their own, on that and every other local subject, as they have heretofore done. We consider such a measure unjust in every sense, and we further say that if you insert it in our constitution, you stifle the popular voice. And shall we in 1845, when men are supposed to be endowed with more powers of thinking and reflection, than the gentleman opposed to us in this measure thought they were in 1812, shall we force upon them a restriction which will be monstrous in theory, and more than monstrous in practice? The question is, what right have we to do it? We might with propriety say, that it shall be fixed at any named point for a certain number of years; then, if it is found to be inconvenient, the legislature, with all the facts before them, (coming as they do fresh from the people, and knowing their wants,) could readily obey the wants and wishes of their constituents; but to say that we are now to fetter and bind down the people, and mark out a chalk line for them to walk on hereafter; and that such a spot, and only such a spot shall be the ground on which the legislative affairs of the State shall be conducted, is saying a little more than I could have expected from those who are, or profess to be, so fond of "the largest liberty;" of those who cry out eternally, the only pure principle of democracy is, that "majorities must govern." The more he (Mr. B.) reflects on the singular position those gentlemen have placed themselves in, the more he regrets it for their sakes; because if they be sincere in their professions, they cannot argue themselves out of their false position.

He therefore opposes Mr. Brent's motion to lay on the table.

Mr. Brent remarked, in reply to the delegate from New Orleans, Mr. Benjamin, that it is not the popular will they desire to restrict; but the legislative will; for, sir, said he, nothing is clearer, than if the majority of the people desired to change their seat of government, it would not be so very difficult to change the constitution in that or any other respect. But it is the agents of the people, the members of the legislature themselves, whom we are desirous to check; and he, (Mr. Brent) wants the seat of government of the State of Louisiana, unalterably out of New Orleans—and most especially beyond the power of the legislature to bring it back again. If former legislatures have failed in their promises to the people, and been governed by different motives to what they have professed—if this Convention, which it was the wish of the people, should meet at Jackson, have adjourned their sittings to New Orleans to make a constitution, he (Mr. Brent) thinks it high time for us to insert the clause asked for, in the constitution.

Mr. Eustis then rose to address the Convention.

Mr. President, I had not intended to offer any remarks on this subject, while the compromise question was before the Convention; and which I regarded more as a question of action than debate; but since it has been deemed proper to press this question to a vote at this moment, and as I conceive it has been improperly connected with the question of apportionment, I desire frankly to submit my views on the proposition, as briefly as possible, and to address myself particularly to those who style themselves the friends of popular rights, and who profess to be, like myself, partisans of the doctrine of anti-restriction.

Mr. Eustis remarked that it would be indeed a singular thing on our part to say, in a written constitution, that we cannot confide in the judgment of the people, nor in the wisdom of the legislature. Are the people so reckless, so incompetent, or so vicious, that they cannot be trusted to name the place where they shall make the laws which are to govern them? This is restriction with a vengeance, when you say that a majority shall not be deemed capable of selecting any village or spot they please for the seat of government. Is it proper to introduce such a clause in our constitution? Is it in the mandate that sent us here? It is in no way a proper subject even for discussion, much less to make it a part of our constitution. Why should we go into details to fix the place where the capitol shall irrevocably be, discarding from our mind what future exigencies may call for? It is neither expedient nor politic to insert it in the constitution. For his (Mr. E.'s) part, he cares not whether it be Baton Rouge, or Donaldsonville, or Cheneyville, or Jackson, that may be selected, but it is a matter of moment to interpose when we see the Convention about to violate an elementary principle by thus imposing another restriction on the will of the people, which is no where to be found in the instructions of those very people who sent us here. But it is said that the legislature will not remove it from New Orleans, and if they do, it will be brought back almost immediately. Why should we consider the legislatures and the people for the last thirty years, as stultified. Is it to be supposed they did not know what public convenience required? and if we are to presume, as we must, that they did, how can it be said or supposed that the people hereafter will not be as capable of judging what is for the benefit and convenience of the people at large, as those who have preceded us? He (Mr. Eustis) was somewhat suprised to hear of the removal of this Convention from Jackson to New Orleans referred to, and he regarded from the manner in which it was introduced, it was meant as a kind of reflection on his colleague, (Mr. Benjamin) and himself; but as he knows that both voted on principle he does not regret the vote they gave on that occasion; it was a measure called for by sound policy, and he believed as well for the interest of the country as for the city. The interests of the city particularly required it, as subsequent events have most clearly proved to us in the deliberations of this body.

Subsequent facts have clearly shown that we should never have made a constitution at Jackson. The great efforts that were then made to cast censure on the majority, for removing the sittings of the Convention, and which were resorted to for political purposes, have not produced the effect intended; no body now disapproves of the charge; and the small rumor of dissatisfaction, which we heard at first, has passed off; until finally all sensible people are satisfied that it was a wise measure.

What evidence have we to predicate the necessity of making the removal of the seat of government from New Orleans a question of constitutional provision? The rule he, Mr. Eustis, craves attention to, is the rule of experience, which is the test of truth. For thirty-two years the country members of the legislature possessed not only the physical power, but also the desire to remove the seat of government away from the city; but yet they never attempted it but on one occasion, and that resulted in serious loss to the State. He alludes to the session of 1830, which was held at Donaldsonville. Why did they adjourn then, to meet in this city? and why has it been here ever since? You have but to compare the regularity in the proceedings of the sessions held in the city, with the irregularity of that held at Donaldsonville, and you have the reply; besides the work was so much better done here than there, that it is easy to account for its removal back to the city. It was, moreover, found impossible to keep the members there; they were absent so frequently and so constantly, that it was a difficult matter to get a quorum present. Place the capitol within sixty miles of New Orleans, and you will find it impossible to keep the members away from the city; some will come to attend to their business; some for the purpose of enjoying the winter amusements of the city, (for men are alike every where;) and the consequence will be that your public buildings will be deserted. It is a matter of no moment to New Orleans whether the legislature be held here or not; and for his part he would disregard her interests, if they clashed or interfered with the interests of the whole State. But as we have had one lesson of experience, we ought to pause and reflect before we do that for which we were not sent here, and which is neither politic nor expedient. All very true, say you, but, oh! that city influence! Far from its being a pernicious one; it is a benefit to you. Have you not daily on your desks the proceedings of the preceding day, spread before you by a scrutinizing press, who will scan your every act? And why should you avoid it? A vigorous and independent press is the very best possible check on improvident legislation; and you ought to feel proud and gratified to have it in your power to satisfy your constituents, and to show them the propriety of your conduct, and the motives that prompt you in your actions. On the other hand, transport your State archives to some place on the banks of Red River, or to the prairies of Calcasieu, or to Ouachita, or to the borders of some of our immense forests, and then what shall we see? We shall find that, without that salutary check, an independent press, where the proceedings of the legislature can be promptly disseminated in every portion of the State, (which in Louisiana, can alone be found advantageously in New Orleans,) that instead of knowing what those proceeding are, before it be too late to remedy the evil, laws have been made to satisfy the cupidity or the avarice, or the vain-glorious efforts of some men, who are constantly agitating measures, which in effect, destroy the tranquility of the public mind, without producing ought else, than injustice to the majority of the people.

It is said that the influence of cities is great; admitted, and it ought to be in every proper point of view; but that influence is not a fatal one, unless used for particular purposes of self interest or self aggrandizement; but when we turn to the largest States in the Union, what do we find? You hear of no acts of public oppression in the cities of Boston or Richmond, or of acts that tinge the cheek of every American with shame. No: such acts are generally perpetrated in obscure places, where the press cannot be heard in time to avert the evil. For instance, was it not in Harrisburgh that the charter of the U. S. Bank was granted? And did not men go from all parts of the country, who were paid, and loaded with money, and every other inducement, that could be made to operate, for the purpose of securing the passage of that bill? And did not this occur before the news of what was going on could be spread abroad? it did. Would that iniquitus measure have been foisted on the people, had the seat of government been in Philadelphia, where their press is active, and their perceptions not only intelligent, but quick? most assuredly not. And is it for us, a State burdened with an immense debt, large enough to pave the state house with gold, to remove our legislature beyond the reach of the watchful and argus eyes of the press?

Look at the State of New York. Is not the legislature of that State, which convenes at Albany, most perfectly under the control of the lobby members? Has it not become a common thing in New York, whenever any measure is talked of as being before the legislature, to hear it said, oh! it all depends upon the lobby; it can't pass without they are in favor of it? Yes, sir, that lobby is more powerful than all the members put together, and this unscrupulous body of men hold them in such thraldom that legislation is brought to a stand, unless they come to an understanding with the venal wretches; and this same thing must and will happen in Louisiana if we remove our seat of government beyond the reach of an active and independent press. Albany, though now a large city, is nothing in comparison to the city of New York, and the same improper and unjust laws made at Albany could not have been passed in the city of New York, with their ever watchful press reporting their every act. Thus disgraceful and improper legislation is consumated in small towns and villages before the evil can be remedied, and all for the want of proper information.

The honorable delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) tells you that in consequence of the immense progress New Orleans is making in her growth and commerce, the country villages are dismantled and all the business is done here; and yet it is in some one of those deserted villages that he is desirous of fixing permanently the seat of government. How can those gentlemen who are so opposed to restriction, carry this restrictive principle so far without reflecting on the injustice they are doing their constituents in depriving them of the privilege of fixing the seat of government in any part of the State which they may deem most advantageous, and where the general good will be the most especially promoted?

He (Mr. Eustis) leaves them to answer the question, and he hopes the motion to lay Mr. Voorhies substitute on the table, will not prevail.

The question was then put to lay Mr. Voorhies substitute indefinitely on the table and resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Chinn, C. M. Conrad, Derbes, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Lewis, McCallop, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, W. M. Prescott, Preston, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, W. B. Scott, S. W. Scott, Sellers, Stephens, Miles Taylor, Trist, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff—36 yeas.

Messrs. Benjamin, Briant, Carriere, Cenas, Claiborne, F. B. Conrad, Culbertson, Eustis, Grymes, Legendre, Leonard, Mazureau, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Soulé, Voorhies, Wadsworth and Winchester —19 nays; consequently the motion was carried.

Mr. SAUNDERS then submitted the following resolution, viz:

The general assembly which shall sit after the first election of representatives under the new constitution, shall within the firt month after the commencement of the session designate and fix the seat of government at some place not less than sixty miles from the city of New Orleans, by the nearest travelling route, and if on the Mississippi river, by the meanders of the same; and when so fixed, it shall not be removed except by the consent of four-fifths of the members of both houses of the general assembly.

The sessions of the general assembly shall be held in New Orleans until the end of the year 1848.

Mr. Voorhies moved to amend said substitute by striking out the words "at some place not less than sixty miles from the city of New Orleans by the nearest travelling route, and if on the Mississippi river, by the meanders of the same."

Mr. Benjamin agrees with Mr. Voorhies, because he desires to leave the people free and untrammelled on this point. He is totally opposed to restricting them in their choice as to the spot where the seat of government shall be held, preferring to leave it open for them to remove from, or retain it in the place they may first designate; according to the exigencies of the moment. It is a power not delegated to us. He never heard of its being made a question before, and we therefore ought to leave it to their own decision; that, he (Mr. B.) understands to be the purport of the amendment and he therefore sustains it. Let the legislature regulate it according to their constituents' wishes, and not us, because we do not know; we have no means of knowing what are their wishes. The object of the amendment seems to be, that it should be submitted again to the people; and surely those who object so much to restricting the people in their desires, cannot refuse to act up to their professed principles.

Mr. Read took this occasion to say that it was a matter of general desire in his parish that the seat of government should be removed; that it was made a question before the people at the election in July.

Mr. Saunders desires to repudiate the idea that he would press any measure which the people generally did not approve, but he knows that his constituents do wish the seat of government irrevocably removed from the city of New Orleans; and it is his deliberate conviction that four-fifths of the people out of the city want the same thing.

Mr. Brent said that his constituents were almost unanimous in calling for the removal; indeed he did not believe there was one man in ten who was not in favor of it.

Mr. Dunn concurred fully with his colleague, (Mr. Saunders) as to the general wish to have the seat of government removed from New Orleans, but nevertheless he should vote against that portion of the substitute offered by Mr. Saunders, which places the limit of distance from the city at sixty miles. One of the reasons, he thinks, to be taken in consideration (when you fix upon a scite for the seat of government) should be, to have it as near the centre of the State as possible. New Orleans is more than one hundred and fifty miles from the centre of the State; yesterday he proposed that the distance should be fixed at not less than one hundred and twenty miles from the city. Some spot might be selected as near the centre of the State as possible; in that way all would be satisfied, there would then be no complaints; no charge of injustice to any; but he should oppose the limit of sixty miles, because he should regard New Orleans and Donaldsonville as about the same thing; indeed he would prefer its being held here, if in either. He thinks the first thing we have to do is, to remove it from the city, and then put it as near the centre of the State as possible.

Mr. Conrad thinks that the reasons advanced by the gentlemen who sustain the removal of the seat of government from New Orleans, in which their several constituents are so unanimous in desiring to have done, are the strongest possible reasons why Mr. Voorhies' amendment should prevail; because if their constituents are so unanimous on the subject there will certainly be no great diversity of opinion among their representatives, and they can settle the matter in the legislature during the first week of the session; but he thinks the mode recommended in the substitute is not the correct one, and that we are proceeding in an anti-republican manner, and that it is an assumption of power on our part which has not been delegated to us. He should feel that he would be doing wrong if he were to vote to keep it in New Orleans, and therefore does not believe it is right to force it either to, or out of any particular spot, it being a question purely belonging to the people at large, and one in which they have a right to suit their own convenience. Besides that, there would seem to be a peculiar impropriety in the measure, so far as New Orleans herself is concerned. In passing this substitute, you virtually fix a stigma, a brand on the city. You say that all the State may enter into competition for the prize except New Orleans, and that while all the representatives from the country may enter into the canvass, that the representatives from New Orleans must stand still and look on as silent, but humiliating spectators. The injustice is still greater to New Orleans when it is considered that the city is not represented on this floor in proportion to her population, as other parts of the country are. One of the main objects of calling this Convention was to equalize the representation, which years ago was found to be unfair under the existing apportionment, and yet we are about to decide a question which has never to his (Mr. C.'s) knowledge been regularly before the people, while New Orleans is not equally nor fairly represented in comparison with the country parishes in this Convention.

The only fair course to pursue is to leave it to the legislature, and then we shall have a fair chance to be heard in it. It is true, you have the power in your hands, but do not be unjust; if with the majority you have, you take away a right from us to be heard on a question as vital to our own interests, as they can possibly be to the country. You will commit an act of the most outrageous kind, and for that reason alone, if for no other, he shall vote for the amendment offered by Mr. Voorhies.

Mr. Saunders is of opinion that this measure has been fully before the Convention since our first meeting, and discussed incidentally, more or less, every day, and therefore he moves the previous question, which, however, he withdrew for the moment.

Mr. Voorhies wished it distinctly understood that the measure now before us had never been discussed, or talked of in his section of country, and therefore he does not feel himself instructed on the subject.

Mr. Porter would vote for the amendment proposed by Mr. Voorhies, because he thought it was a matter properly pertaining to the legislature, who would come fresh from the people, and would know what their wishes were. He has heard some one say he was not willing to trust the legislature. All he can say in reply to such an assertion is, that he has every confidence that the members who would be elected from the portion of the country in which he resides, would faithfully perform their duty, and carry out the wishes of their constituents; and he doubts not other members from the different parts of the State would do the same thing. There was another reason why he should vote for the amendment; which was, because he thought that when the legislature did settle the location, they would make one that would be permanent, and he much preferred that to leaving it in the unsettled state things are now in. He referred to the situation of the present State house, which doubtless would have been better cared for, if there was any certainty of its being permanently fixed here.

The question was then put on Mr. Voorhies' amendment, and resulted as follows:

Messrs. Benjamin, Briant, Cenas, Claiborne, C. M. Conrad, F. B. Conrad, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Grymes, Legendre, Mazureau, Porche, Porter, W. M. Prescott, Preston, Roman, Roselius, Read, St. Amand, Soulé, Stephens, Trist, Voorhies, Wadsworth and Winchester—27 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Chinn, Covillion, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, W. B. Prescott, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Saunders, W. B. Scott, T. W. Scott, T. B. Scott, Sellers, Miles Taylor, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff, and Winder—34 nays; consequently the amendment was not carried.

Mr. Beatty then moved the adoption of the resolution, as offered by Mr. Saunders; but

Mr. Claiborne moved to strike out four-fifths, and insert two-thirds. He remarked that if this resolution was persisted in, it would operate unjustly and injuriously, for it would be virtually placing it out of the power of the legislature, after they had once established at any given point, to remove it in case they should make a bad selection at first; for it is well known that the interests of those interested in keeping it at the place first designated, would certainly be able to gather together more than one-fifth of the votes of the legislature; for who does not know that the ties of neighborhood are powerful? who does not know that there is always a charm about our own village clock? That feeling will alone induce them to exert every sectional interest in order to keep it in that spot where it was first placed, however inconvenient it may be to the people otherwise. Besides, that the principle of the whole substitute is an odious and restrictive one, and that too supported as it is by those who have declaimed the loudest on this floor against all restrictions. Some of the gentlemen who support this measure, and who are so fond of looking to the constitutions of other States as models for us, had better have recourse to their books, to see if they can find one single State in the Union with such an odious and uncalled for restriction as the one now before us. The evil could scarcely ever be remedied by any legislation, even if it were placed in an unhealthy spot, because four-fifths of both houses could not be found united even then, when they had to contend against the sectional interest of the surrounding parishes. He is opposed to the whole section, because he thinks we have no business to touch the question, and that it properly belongs to the Convention to settle it. But he makes the motion to insert two-thirds in lieu of four-fifths, for the purpose of making it less obnoxious.

Mr. Saunders then moved for the previous question, and the President then put the question, "shall the main question be now put?" and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Chinn, Dunn, Garrett, Hynson, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder—31 yeas; and

Messrs. Benjamin, Briant, Carriere, Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Eustis, Grymes, Humble, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Porche, Porter, Preston, Prudhomme, Rathff, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Soulé, Stephens, Trist, Voorhies, Wadsworth and Winchester—30 nays.

Mr. Claibore then called on the president to vote; who voted in the negative, which made the vote equal, and therefore the motion was lost.

The President then said that he voted in the negative because he thought the restriction was too great upon the legislature; but that if that restriction were modified, it was most likely he should vote for it.

The resolution of Mr. Saunders became again the question before the house, and was on the motion to strike out "four-fifths" and insert "two-thirds."

Mr. Benjamin was of opinion that the gentlemen in their over-hot zeal to kill N. Orleans, are over-shooting their own mark: he thinks two-thirds is entirely too much, as it will be next to impossible to get that number of members in the legislature together, much less a majority of two-thirds of the whole; he thought three-fifths is all that in reason should be asked. For, said he, suppose they were to pick out some inconvenient or sickly spot, that would become obnoxious to the members, they would have no power to remove it; and there they would have to stay in spite of themselves, for sectional interest would be sure to defeat them. Alter it, if you will, so that it shall require four-fifths to remove it back to New Orleans, but don't pass any section which will be so onerous on the balance of the State, as the one now before us.

Mr. Claiborne remarked that he was disposed to meet the gentlemen who were pressing this matter with so much zeal, as far as they could reasonably expect, and for that purpose he had proposed two-thirds instead of four-fifths, which he regarded as tantamount to saying that the seat of government never should be changed when once established. They are constantly alluding to the baneful influence of New Orleans, of her grasping disposition to obtain power, and of her efforts to destroy the country. Let them beware, in the course they are now pursuing, they don't destroy the constitution itself. We have conceded to them the basis of representation; we have conceded to them seven-eighths of the senate; and we have, one after another, conceded so many points, that we can go no farther. In order, however, to test the question, he will accept the amendment to his amendment, which proposes three-fifths in lieu of two-thirds.

Mr. Beatty said he regretted that the previous question did not prevail, for much as he was desirous to see the seat of government removed from New Orleans, he should prefer it to remain where it was, in preference to giving the power to the legislature to change it at any time they saw fit.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, on reflection, withdrew his acceptance of the amendment made by his colleague, and pressed the original amendment made by him, which was to strike out four-fifths and insert two-thirds.

Mr. WINDER then moved a division of the question, so as to take the vote first on striking out four-fifths, and then to take the vote on the balance of the section, which was agreed to, and thereupon, Mr. Claiborne's motion to strike out was put, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Benjamin, Briant, Carriere, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Eustis, Grymes, Kenner, Ledoux, Lewis, Marigny, Mayo. Mazureau, Porter, Preston, Prudhomme, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Soulé, Trist, Voorhies, Wadsworth, and Winchester voted in favor of the motion—29 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Chinn, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Labauve, McCallop, McRae, O'Bryan, Peets, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted against the motion—33 nays; consequently the same was lost.

Mr. DUNN then moved to amend said substitute by inserting one hundred and twenty miles, instead of sixty miles.

Mr. LEWIS moved to strike out sixty miles, and insert one hundred miles.

Mr. BEATTY moved for the previous question.

The PRESIDENT put the question, "shall the main question now be put," and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Chambliss, Chinn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Labauve, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Pugh, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the affirmative—29 yeas; and

Messrs. Benjamin, Briant, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Guion, Grymes, Kenner, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Porter, Prescott of St Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Raliff, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Soulé, Trist, Voorhies, Wadsworth, and Winchester voted in the negative—35 nays; consequently the motion was lost.

Mr. COVILLION moved that the word sixty be stricken out, and one hundred and twenty inserted in lieu.

Mr. VOORHIES moved to insert two hundred.

Two o'clock having arrived, the special order of the day was called up, which was the substitute offered by Mr. Benjamin, on the question of apportionment. [This project having been before published is omitted.]

Mr. SAUNDERS moved to suspend the rules of the Convention, so as to enable us to finish the business now before them; which motion prevailed.

Mr. CLAIBORNE thought his amendment to insert two-thirds instead of three-fifths, was next in order.

The PRESIDENT, however, explained that the Convention had refused to make a blank, and there was therefore nothing to fill.

Mr. W. B. SCOTT moved to lay all the amendments on the table, except the amendment of Mr. Saunders.

Mr. WADSWORTH reminded him that it was precisely the same thing as calling for the previous question, which had just been negatived.

Mr. SCOTT then withdrew his motion.

Mr. LABAUVE then moved for a division of the question on the motion of Mr. Dunn, that was, on the motion to strike out the word sixty.

The PRESIDENT then put the question on striking out the word "sixty;" which was decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

Messrs. Benjamin, Briant, Carriere, Cénas. Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Grymes, Legendre, Leonard, Lewis, Mazu-

reau, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Soulé, Stephens, Voorhies, Wadsworth and Winchester voted in the affirmative—31 yeas; and Messrs. Auberr, Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Chinn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Labauve, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the negative—35 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

Mr. Conrad of New Orleans moved to amend, by inserting after the words "four-fifths" the words "the members present of each house of the general assembly; which motion was lost.

Mr. Saunders then moved for the adoption of his substitute, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Chinn, Covillion, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Labauve, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the affirmative—39 yeas.

Messrs. Benjamin, Briant, Carriere, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Eustis, Garcia, Grymes, Legendre, Leonard, Marigny, Mazureau, Porche, Porter, Preston, Prudhomme, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Soulé, Voorhies, Wadsworth and Winchester voted in the negative—28 nays; consequently the motion was carried.

Mr. Benjamin then moved that the Convention adjourn until Tuesday next at 11 o'clock, a. m., and the yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brent, Briant, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Grymes, Humble, Kenner, Labauve, Lewis, Mazureau, Porche, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Read, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Wadsworth and Winchester, voted in favor of adjournment—yeas 35; and

Messrs. Aubert, Brazeale, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Conrad of New Orleans, Covillion, Derbes, Garrett, Hynson, Legendre, Leonard, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, and Winder, voted against the adjournment—nays 29; the same was carried.

And thereupon the Convention adjourned until Tuesday, the 11th instant, at 11 o'clock, a. m.

Tuesday, March 11, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer from the Rev. Mr. Warren.

Mr. Hynson asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Brent.

Mr. Lewis asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Wikoff.

Mr. Cade asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. O'Bryan.

Mr. Trist was dispensed from attendance on account of sickness.

Mr. Wadsworth presented a resolution that a committee of three be appointed to make the necessary arrangements for the reception of the Convention in the hall of the house of representatives.

Mr. Marigny moved to amend the resolution by requesting the committee first to inquire whether the hall of the house of representatives was calculated to accommodate the members of the Conveution.

Mr. Marigny was of opinion that there was not room sufficient in the hall of the house of representatives to accommodate all the members of the Convention.

Messrs. Wadsworth and Boudousquie, expressed their entire conviction that there was ample room in the house of representatives to accommodate seventy-seven persons.

Mr. Voorhies was opposed to the appointment of a committee. He deems it unnecessary. All that the Convention had to do, was to adjourn from one hall to the other. He moved to lay the resolutions on the table.

After some remarks from Messrs. Voorhies and Pugh,

On motion of Mr. Downs the resolution and amendment was laid indefinitely on the table.

Action was then had for the delivery of the room and the disposal of the furniture not necessary,and on motion of Mr. Downs, it was resolved that when the Convention adjourn, it adjourn to meet in the hall of the house of representatives.

A motion was then made for the adjournment, in order to afford time to the clerks to remove the papers, and to make arrangements for the reception of the Convention to-morrow.

Mr. Downs objected. The yeas and nays were called for—15 yeas—36 nays.

The order of the day was taken up, being a motion to lay Mr. Benjamin's project of apportionment on the table.

Mr. Benjamin moved that the debates on the subject of representation should cease at 2 o'clock on Thursday, and that the vote be then taken.

This motion prevailed.

The Convention adjourned.

Tuesday, March 12, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. Clark.

Mr. Downs moved to add the Bulletin to the number of the city papers to be subscribed for, for the use of the Convention, and that the secretary be requested to have the same furnished to each member. He was anxious to get regularly, at least a synopsis of the debates; and it appeared that from some cause or other, the debates were not regularly published.

Mr. Chinn was anxious to know what would be the expense of it. He said that Mr. Kelly had been removed, most likely without cause. Then we had only one reporter, now we have two, and the reports ought to be up; the fault must lay some where.

Mr. Kenner was opposed to taking the Bulletin or any other paper, unless the subscription to the Jeffersonian Republican and Courier were discontinued; for, said he, we have discharged Mr. Kelly because he was supposed not to have performed his duty; and he can see no reason why both the other papers should not be discharged from the service of this Convention also.

Mr. Benjamin is opposed to striking off the subscription to the Courier, because the editor of that paper has fulfilled the obligations he has come under to this Convention, faithfully. The French reporter also seems to have performed his duty, and therefore we ought not to deprive the French population of having the debates regularly published for them, while both printer and reporter perform their duty regularly.

Mr. Kenner consented to leave the Courier in the employ of the Convention for the reasons stated, but

Mr. Downs remarked that it was not either his wish or intention in making the motion he had, to disturb the present state of things, either as regards the printers or reporters. He does not wish to disturb the system which we are now practising upon. It is true that our debates are not up in the paper we have selected; but that may arise from many causes; but the main difficulty, no doubt, arises from the reporter being so much overtasked before the Convention elected a second reporter to aid him in his work, and every body knows how hard it is to make up for lee-way. Under these circumstances, he conceived it better every way to take the paper which he recommended as containing good condensed reports of the proceedings. The expense will be so small, that it is hardly worth the while of this Convention to make it a matter of debate, when two or three dollars a day will pay the whole expenses. He hopes, therefore, that no further objection will be raised to his motion.

Mr. Beatty thinks that there is another matter connected with this subject, that requires attention; and that is, who is in fault in this matter? is it the printer, or is it the reporters? and if the latter, which one of them is delinquent in the performance of his duty? These are questions that ought to be investigated, and the person in whom the fault lies be discharged at once. The French reporter has published his proceedings regularly. What then can be the cause of the delay on the part of the English reporters? This should be investigated at once. He (Mr. Beatty) is opposed for these reasons, to the resolution offered by Mr. Downs, and hopes it will not prevail.

Mr. Boudousquie wants to know the amount it will cost; and Mr. Beatty then moved to lay the resolution of Mr. Downs on the table.

Mr. Downs replied to Mr. Beatty that it was hardly worth while to oppose his resolution for the small amount which it would cost the Convention.

Mr. Beatty then moved to lay the resolution of Mr. Downs indefinitely on the table, which motion prevailed.

Mr Beatty then offered a resolution, in the following words, viz:

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed to inquire whether it be the fault of the reporters or of the publishers that the debates in English have not been published to date, with instructions to report a resolution removing the delinquents from office.

Which resolution was adopted.

The President appointed Messrs. Beatty, Ratliff and Downs, members of said committee.

Mr. Ratliff moved to amend the above before the question was put; which amendment was accepted, that the facts of the case should be submitted; for although he would go as far as any one to turn out an incompetent, or a careless officer, yet before he can do that, he must have the facts before him.

Mr. Lewis asked leave of absence for Mr. Brumfield for a few days, and the same was granted.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The project submitted by Mr. Benjamin on the apportionment, the same as published in the official reports of the inst.

The President then informed the Convention that this subject should properly lay over until Thursday.

Mr. O'Bryan moved to lay Mr. Benjamin's project on the table indefinitely.

Mr. Ratliff moved to amend by substituting the words, "subject to call" for "indefinitely," which being accepted, it was agreed to.

Mr. Ratliff then moved to take up the 7th article of the constitution, which provides for the revising of the same. He thinks a settlement of that question will materially aid in bringing to an harmonious adjustment the apportionment question.

Mr. Downs thought we had better proceed with the section in relation to the representation in the senate; but

Mr. Ratliff's motion prevailed, and the Convention took up the 7th article of the constitution, as follows:

Any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed in the senate or house of representatives, and if the same shall be agreed to by a majority of the members elected to each house, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on their journals, with the yeas and nays taken thereon, and the secretary of State shall cause the same to be published three months before the next general election, in at least one newspaper in every parish of the State in which newspapers shall be published; and if in the legislature next afterwards chosen, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be agreed to by a majority of the members elected to each house, the secretary of State shall cause the same to be published in manner aforesaid, at least three months prior to the next general election for representatives to the State legislature, and such proposed amendment or amendments shall be submitted to the people at said election; and if the people shall approve and ratify such amendment or amendments by a majority of all the qualified voters of this State, voting thereon, such amendment or amendments shall become a part of the constitution: Provided, that if more than one amendment be submitted at a time, they shall be submitted in such manner and form that the people may vote for or against each amendment separately and distinctly.

Mr. Humble moved that the article be adopted as reported.

Mr. Mayo then moved to insert after the word "election" in the 10th line, the words "for representatives to the next general election."

Mr. Humble opposed it, thinking it right in its present shape.

Mr. Ratliff saw no good to be derived from amending it as Mr. Mayo proposed. He thinks it sufficiently explicit as it says, and it is understood most clearly to mean the biennial elections for representatives to the general assembly.

Mr. Mayo feels convinced that in making a constitution, it is our duty to make it as definite as possible; in fact we cannot make it too definite—it removes all doubt. He should therefore press his amendment; which on motion, was put and lost.

Mr. Boudousquie moved an amendment to have the advertisements printed in the French as well as in the English language. It was as follows: by inserting after the word "published," the words "in French and English," which motion was adopted.

Mr. Claiborne was not disposed to let this article pass, without examining more closely into its merits, and he thinks it is susceptible of amendment. He regards a constitution as no light matter; as a thing not to be touched, unless for weighty reasons; and on examining the article before us, we find a bare majority of the legislature will have the power of proposing amendments to it, and also that a bare majority of the second legislature may agree to any such amendments, and therefore take the vote of the people upon it.

Now he (Mr. Claiborne) fears that by so easy a mode being open to the legislature, we shall have incessant changes proposed, and we shall be constantly kept in a state of excitement; a thing always to be avoided when possible, or unless some great political benefit is to enure to the people. But he fears it will be made a kind of plaything, for we all know how these things have been managed before the people. He is of opinion, that the evil may be remedied by increasing the required majority in the legislature at the first proposal of amendment, for if a larger amount of the members than a bare majority be required, the people will examine the amendment with a greater confidence, and will naturally feel that it is not offered on slight grounds; the second time after the people have divided on it, it will not be so much a matter of moment. Besides, if we retain the bare majority we shall be more subject to the caprice and whims of particular parts of our country, who may by a concentration of strength, be able to carry such a measure through, and thus we shall be in a constant state of agitation. Now, as he thinks we ought not for slight causes to touch that instrument which it is now costing the State of Louisiana a large amount of money and the valuable time of her citizens to perfect, he is desirous to throw such guards around it as will prevent our future legislatures from lightly tearing to pieces, and leaving it as a piece of patch work. He therefore offers an amendment to this effect, to strike out the words "a majority" and insert "two-thirds."

Mr. Porter thinks the amendment is uncalled for. He thinks it will go further, and say that we shall not amend it at all, for two-thirds of both branches will be next to an impossibility to get. For if it be wrong in the first instance, if the first legislature should abuse its power, the whole matter would be before the people at their next election, and they would take it in hand and send a new set of representatives to the second legislature, who could remedy the evil. Besides, it has to go to them finally, and there would at least be six years for them to reflect gravely on the necessity of the change called for before they will be called upon to determine it definitely. He then thinks there is nothing to be dreaded from the article as it stands, and trusts it will not be altered.

Mr. Claiborne in reply to the delegate from Caddo, (Mr. Porter) would remark that it is not on the second action of the legislature he would put any restriction, but upon the first; take away the chances of offering any amendment to the constitution, unless it were called by the sternest necessity, and we shall not be incessantly in agitation from the uncalled for and unnecessary amendments that will be proposed, by either demagogues or aspiring politicians. He is desirous that the door should not be left open to gratify either the vanity or ambition, or caprice of such men. If the people of this State approve of the constitution we are framing, he (Mr. C.) hopes to live in peace for the balance of his days; but if this article passes as it stands, we shall be in constant commotion.

Mr. Porter in reply, stated that he had perfectly understood the question; what he endeavored to say was, that the succeeding legislature could readily undo the acts of the first, if they proposed any amendment to the constitution not agreeable to the people.

Mr. Ratliff objects to the amendment proposed by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Claiborne) because he thinks it is quite unnecessary; and that instead of good, evil may result from it. If gentlemen will carefully examine the phraseology of the report, (for it is his [Mr. R.'s] own report, every word of it,) it will be discovered that there are sufficient safeguards thrown around the people's power to check hasty or improvident amendments to the constitution. If he (Mr. Ratliff) could desire to amend the report at all, he would be in favor of taking off rather than adding restrictions on the popular will; but as it is, it will take six years before any amendment can be perfected. The first legislature have to propose the amendment, then when it has been published three months prior to the election of the succeeding legislature, in French and English, throughout the State, (he thanked the delegate from St. John the Baptiste for reminding him of the omission he had made in leaving out the word "French" in the report,) the second legislature have to act upon it, and if they approve of it, then at the next general election, two years afterwards, the people finally decide upon accepting or rejecting it. Thus you see it takes three biennial elections before it can be adopted, and he (Mr. R.) thinks that is restriction enough. He (Mr. R.) knows the difficulty of getting the people aroused to the necessity of altering or amending a constitution. He it was who ten years ago, first set the ball in motion, which has resulted in the deliberations of this Convention. He worked for four years, diligently, aided by the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) in the legislature; well then, it took two years before the amendments principally needed in the old constitution, could be properly understood by the people—so that six years is the lowest possible time that an amendment could be before the people for their action, The principle on which this report is based is the same as in the constitution of Pennsylvania, a State which has been remarked for her stability and for the regularity of her laws, and she has never made but one amendment in her constitution since it was adopted. He suggested it to the committee as, in his opinion, the best that could be found.

Mr. R. then read that portion of the constitution of Pennsylvania relating to the subject under debate; he remarked there was some slight alteration in the phraseology, but nothing material; and when it is reflected that it was re-adopted in 1838, the difficulty and danger apprehended on the subject is more apparent than real. He does not desire to see any more restrictions imposed upon the people than are necessary. He feels that our fault is, in conceiving ourselves perfect, which he, (Mr. R.) by no means does, for by what process of ratiocination can we take upon ourselves to say that we are wiser than our children will be? And if they should hereafter desire to amend the constitution, it is nothing but right that they should have the power to do it. He (Mr. R.) is no more desirous than the delegate from New Orleans is to put it in the power of demagogues to prevail over the popular will, but something may creep into the constitution to which there are objections, and he believes it would be wrong to increase the disability of the people themselves to rectify it. He thinks it will make it more palatable to the people if they find they have the power to correct any errors we may commit in framing it. When once ratified, and when people settle down again under these new organic laws, calm deliberation will succeed; it may then be found that errors have crept into the constitution which require amendment; and when they are thoroughly convinced of it, they ought to have every possible chance to remedy the evil. He (Mr. R.) agrees with Mr. Van Buren, that there is no danger in leaving it to the sober second thought of the people. He has gone as far as he thought it was necessary in the report, which he hopes will not be disturbed.

Mr. Benjamin, after reflecting on the amendment proposed by his colleague, (Mr. Claiborne,) has come to the conclusion that the proposition is a reasonable and proper one. He desires to make a few remarks to explain what has led him to think so, and why he sustains it. It is universally admitted that one of the greatest curses that can befall a country, is the uncertainty of the laws, which are so constantly being changed; some improvement in that respect is loudly called for; now it is an alarming evil. It is well known that at every session of the legislature there are always more or less who come with their own peculiar notions as to certain errors that may exist in particular statutes, and that steadily devote themselves to altering or repealing them, until they get them to their taste. The following session, others come with views totally opposed to those who made the laws before to suit themselves; and they use every exertion (generally too, successfully,) to repeal all acts which had previously been passed by the same genus of politicians, but who are opposed to each other on the material principle of the law in existence; thus laws are passed at one session and repealed at another, and the reeult is, that our laws are constantly conflicting the one with the other, and there is no stability in our system, to the great detriment and injury of the citizen. Now, if this be so, and it be a great crying evil, how much greater will it not be, if we insert in our constitution that a majority of the legislature shall have the power to propose amendments to the constitution? Why, we shall have amendment after amendment proposed at every session to suit the views of those visionary schemers who cannot accomplish what they aimed at without such amendment.

It is not questioned that in all republican governments majorities must rule; but it is no less true that the constitutions of all the States are made for the purpose of protecting the rights of the minority from being trampled upon by the majority; and that the only reliance the minority can have, is the measure of restriction thrown into the constitution by which they are to be governed. Without the constitution be framed in such a way as to accomplish both these ends, it will be an useless instrument. He (Mr. Benjamin) has advanced that doctrine on this floor more than once; but this day he is strengthened in his position by the language of the President of the United States, James K. Polk, an authority which he does not believe will be questioned, by the gentlemen who are opposed to the position taken by him, Mr. Benjamin.

In his inaugural address, he says:

"By the theory of our government majorities rule; but this right is not an arbitrary or unlimited one. It is a right to be exercised in subordination to the constitution, and in conformity to it. One great object of the constitution was to restrain majorities from oppressing minorities, or encroaching upon their just rights. Minorities have a right to appeal to the constitution as a shield against such oppression."

Who will not agree to that? It is the only true and correct doctrine that can be sustained in a country where we are governed by constitutional law. But if you leave your constitution at the mercy of a single vote in the legislature, you may just as well stop your labors, for you cannot progress without breaking down one of the fundamental principles of our system of government, viz: that constitutions are made for the protection of minorities. In such a case, the protection is null and void, and it would be better to have no constitution at all, than to rely upon any thing so illusory for protection against the sudden changes of popular feeling. Doubtless all the members of this Convention are actuated by a desire to make the constitution one of a permanently, beneficial, and lasting character. What is proposed to you to accomplish that desirable result? Simply to say that two-thirds of the legislature shall be required to propose any amendment to the people ere it be deemed necessary to raise it as a question before them. When that is done, the people themselves are to determine. At the second legislature a majority coming fresh from the people and knowing their wishes, will be sufficient. He, Mr. Benjamin, thinks that no more reasonable proposition could have been made, and he fully coincides with his colleague, Mr. Claiborne. The argument used in opposition to it is, that the people will always have it in their power to prevent any improper amendment from succeeding, as they can prevent it at the election of the second legislature; but that is not a good argument, for the people having confidence in their representative, will doubtless ratify and confirm his acts relative to the amendment and will send him back to finish the work which he has begun, and thus the minority are placed in the power of the majority, and what it is necessary for us to guard against is, that the power be not delegated to them, for such an abuse, as will inevitably result from trusting an unscrupulous majority.

But there are other evils to be guarded against, because it is not always that the majority in the legislature represents the majority of the people of the State, and therefore it is no proof, because such majority may be found, that the people at large desire such alteration in their constitution; and it is more than likely that scarcely a session will pass without having amendments made to the constitution, by bare majorities; and then we shall be constantly agitated by these appeals to the people, to know whether such and such an amendment shall be confirmed or rejected. A constitution is not a piece of patch-work, for people to tinker on. If we are guilty of any great oversight in making it, it will not be difficult to get two-thirds of the legislature to propose an amendment, if palpably defective. As much then, as there is reason to expect such prompt amendment on the one side, there is also as much to fear that questionable amendments might be forced through, if it only required a bare majority; but you may depend, if a constitution be made to serve the purposes of a party, it is no constitution, but a political engine, to crush minorities. He, Mr. Benjamin, will not go so far away as Pennsylvania, which State the delegate from West Feliciana has called our attention to, to show the efficacy of the proposed system; he will go no farther than to our neighboring State, Mississippi; she is constantly agitated by such amendments; not a session passes her legislature but what they make some amendments or alterations in their constitution, until at last it has become a complete piece of patch-work, bearing no kind of resemblance to what it was at its adoption. Are the people of this State prepared to follow that example? And yet they are bound to adopt or reject the constitution when placed before them; and if they adopt it, we are just as likely to have just such a piece of patch-work as they have. The delegate from West Feliciana, (Mr. Ratliff,) boasts of the time which it took to get this Convention called together; but if one party can change it every four years, by a simple majority, we shall have no other constitution than the will of that majority. For instance, the legislature which has just adjourned, if they had had the power to propose any such amendment as is herein contemplated, the legislature, to meet in 1847, could, in January, 1847, pass on it a second time, and put it before the people for acceptance or rejection; thus, in less than four years, an obnoxious amendment may be hurried through, step by step, depriving the minority of their rights. He feels convinced there is no safety for them, as the report stands; and that by inserting two-thirds, a geat evil may be remedied. He hopes the Convention will reflect on it well, and that they will not now destry the work of their own hands. The object of a constitution is to protect all equally, not to give one portion a right to impose on another portion of the citizens; and that cannot be called a restriction, which is intended as a protection to the rights of the whole equally.

He shall support the amendment of his colleague, (Mr. Claiborne,) and hopes it will prevail.

Mr. Marigny does not agree in opinion with his colleague, (Mr. Benjamin.) He thinks the report of the committee is well enough as it is, without the proposed amendment. Whatever may be his, Mr. Marigny's, opinion of the learning and ability of the members of this Convention, he is, nevertheless, not satisfied that it has absorbed the whole talent of the State. He sees no reason to doubt that future legislatures will contain as many talented and enlightened minds as are to be found in this hall; and he should not be surprised to find them still more able; for in proportion as we advance in extending our population, it is reasonable to suppose that our future course will also be marked, as well by great improvements in the science of goverument as in the other arts and sciences. Besides, it is to be supposed that whenever any amendment to the constitution shall have been favorably entertained, and proposed by the legislature, and which cannot, notwithstanding, have any force or weight, until the people shall have three times passed upon its merits, and it had also gone through a second examination by a legislature, chosen expressly with the knowledge of the people, that they were to act upon it. It is to be supposed, he said, that the legislature had not acted precipitately in the first place, if it should successfully pass through all those ordeals, and that no serious consequences would be likely to result from the adoption of the amendment.

By insisting on a vote of two-thirds of each house, you will render it next to impossible to make any amendments to the constitution at all. If a majority of this Convention, whose business it is to revise the old constitution, is considered enough to settle any principle requiring attention in it, why is not a majority of the legislature capable of discussing and determining on the propriety of submitting an amendment, of their own constitution, to the people themselves? They must surely think poorly of the legislature, as well as of the people, when they deem it necessary to throw so many impediments in the way of both of them.

Such a measure shall not be sanctioned by him, for he thinks all proper guards are thrown around the question by the committee, to prevent it from abuse; and he shall therefore sustain the report.

Mr. Soule proposed to his colleague, Mr. Claibore, that three-fifths would be more likely to meet the views of the Convention, and hoped he would accept that amendment to the one offered by him. While, on the one hand, although the legislature may be every way competent and worthy, he should not like to see an amendment left to the mercy of a single vote: on the other hand, he is not desirous of seeing too much restriction. He thinks by placing it on the footing he recommends, (of three-fifths,) the fears of those who dread the constant changes in the constitution will be allayed; while, at the same time, we shall be responding to the just wishes of the people.

Mr. Claiborne accepts the amendment proposed by his colleague, (Mr. Soulè) but before he takes his seat he desires to say a few words to the delegate from West Feliciana, (Mr. Ratliff) in regard to what has fallen from him as to the difficulties which there were to get the legislature to present the question to the people, whether the constitution of 1812 should be altered or amended or not. It is true that a bare majority was only required, but the gentleman ought also to have stated that the law was compelled to be passed within twenty days after the meeting of the legislature. The shortness of the time allowed by the old constitution was a far greater difficulty to surmount than it would have been to got a vote of two-thirds, later in the session. He knows full well that that was the greatest difficulty in the case; besides that there was another, which was, that many of the members threw difficulties in its way, fearing that the whole constitution was to be changed. He desired to state these facts, to account for the position assumed by the Orleans delegation in former years, in opposing the call. It was not against the principle they contended, but it was owing altogether to her peculiar position at that time. She had then but six members in the lower house and one in the senate; she was treated with much more injustice than now. Her representation was so small, compared with her rights, that we could not object to come here to represent her large interest with only seven members. But subsequently a new apportionment was made, and she received something nearer her just quota. The gentleman from West Feliciana must himself recollect, that after her representation was increased, New Orleans did not oppose the call of the Convention as she did when so unequally represented as she was with six members.

His main object in proposing to amend the report before us was, as he has said already, to do away with such continual agitation, both in the legislature and among the people. He does not believe that they want to change sections of their constitution as regularly as the leaves blow from the trees in the fall of the year. In fact, he thinks it better that a constitution should remain imperfect in some of its parts, than that it should be made the play-thing of parties, orpolitical agitators.

Mr. Downs will sustain the report of the committee, in preference to the amendment offered, which requires three-fifths of the legislature to propose any amendment to the constitution we are now framing. He has paid particular attention to the quotation read from President Polk's inaugural address, quoted for the first time, so unexpectedly and in such flattering terms, by the honorable delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin,) but he does not think they are properly applicable to the matter we have now under discussion; in fact he does not think they have any application whatever to it. No one denies that minorities ought to be protected; but that is no reason why they alone should make the constitution, or why they should prevent an amendment being made in the constitution, called for by the majority. A convention is called for the purpose of making a constitution, which is a compact between the whole people, and the majority of that convention is to decide on every question of interest to them as a whole. Therefore, it is neither two-thirds nor three-fifths, nor any thing but a simple majority who have the right of deciding any question here. The same rule applies in our legislative bodies, and the same principle was recognized by the Convention of 1812; and yet, if the principles laid down by Mr. Polk be applied in the sense, and the construction given to them by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin,) it would be made to say that the majority should yield to the will of the minority. That the minority and not the majority, should govern. If that be not the basis of his argument, why is it that the legislature, (who is not assembled to make a constitution, but laws under that constitution,) should be required, when they see an amendment necessary to that instrument, to have two-thirds of the members of that legislature supporting that amendment, before it can be submitted to the people, unless it be the adoption of the doctrine that minorities ought to govern majorities? Certainly then, when you come to make the application to this new constitution, they have no analogy to each other. The majority here and every where makes the constitution, not the minority. The difficulty of getting two-thirds or three-fifths of the members of the legislature to propose an amendment to the constitution would be so great, that to adopt either would be tantamount to saying there never should be an amendment to it.

He can see no reason why we should adopt such a principle, for certainly if we do, we never can amend the constitution. It has become usual in America to amend their constitutions in a peaceable and orderly manner. In other countries, many of them amend their's by bloody revolutions; and why should we tie up the hands of our citizens, and say to them, you shall not amend your constitution, and that to submit to it is better than violence. He (Mr. Downs) recollects when, many years ago, he first came to the bar, the idea prevailed, and he heard the remark made by a very distinguished man, that the constitution of 1812 never would, nor could be amended; and when asked for his reasons, he said they were many: First, that there would be the opposition to it of all those who held offices for life, under that constitution. Second, the short time allowed under the constitution of 1812—twenty days only being allowed to consummate the bill after the first meeting of each legislature, being all but saying it could not be done. And, third, that the difficulty still stronger to be surmounted than all, was the manner in which the question should be put to the people. Subsequent events, and the delays which he (Mr. Downs) has witnessed, and the difficulties which he with others has contended against, to surmount all these concurrent oppositions to the measure, have long since satisfied him that the gentleman who years ago made that remark to him was right; and he knows further, that if two-thirds of the legislature had then been required, that we never should have been in attendance on this Convention; and so it will be, when we say that two-thirds sha l be required before the legislature can propose an amendment to the constitution we are now making; no amendment ever will be made—and our agreeing to any such amendment virtually says, that when this constitution is adopted it is to last forever, and never can be amended. For this reason alone he would feel bound to sustain the report of the committee, were there no others. The probability is, that a very long time may and will elapse, before any great change will be called for in the constitution; but there may be one or two small points overlooked, which can gradually be remedied by the legislature and the people. He does not desire to see these small amendments refused without the necessity of uprooting the whole instrument; and he thinks the plan proposed by the committee the most conservative of any that he has seen. People, when they become familiarized with the constitution, will become more and more attached to it, and will not desire a change; at the same time they will most likely claim the privilege of altering or amending any portion which works adversely to the interests of the whole—and then it is that the power of the legislature should be acknowledged, and that the people should be heard through their representatives, and the right should be in them to pick out any particular clause, and amend it, if a majority of the people demand the change. On the one hand there can be no danger, for it must be sanctioned, not only by the legislature, but by the people also, no less than three successive times. On the other hand, we have a constitution which is placed in the hands of the minority, and the majority of the people cannot touch it, or alter or change one single word in it, unless it pleases the minority to let them. Now, let us suppose that the point sought to be amended were a very important one to the interests of the whole State, and some local cause or interest were to stop it forever, on account of the two-third or three-fith rule being applied. Will the people tolerate it? and the first question they would ask, shall or shall not majorities govern? For his part he thinks they ought to govern, and that they will. There is no necessity for hasty changes; for, as experience has proved, one party or the other hold the power of government in their hands for a succession of years, and they would do nothing that could impair the confidence people had in them. It could not be done by the sudden move of any party, for party purposes. Consequently there is nothing to be dreaded from hasty changes in our constitution; and those who advance that doctrine base their argument on an absurd theory.

Mr. Downs hopes the amendment will not prevail. We are constantly improving in the science of government, as in all else, and we ought not to tie either our own hands or the hands of those who are to come after us. We ought not to say that we shall not alter or amend the constitution, for we do not know what new necessities may arise; at any rate, we ought not to fetter down those who are to succeed us, but leave them free to take advantage of their own situation, and make their organic laws to suit the necessity and requirements of the age they may live in. There will be no excitement from a free and fair discussion—agitate measures as much as you please, that tend to ameliorate the condition of the citizen; submit them to the legislature and the people as often as you please; that can do no harm. The only real cause for agitation or revolution is, when the people are cramped, fettered, restricted and oppressed.

Mr. Conrad remarked, that when he read the report of the committee, it met his entire approbation. He yet approves of the principle contained in it, which provides for the partial amendmet of the constitution, in preference to calling a Convention for every slight alteration it may require. He thinks it is expedient, and is a happy idea; but when he comes to look further into it, he finds that we shall be going too far, in giving to a bare majority of the legislature the power to bring forward any measure of amendment they saw fit. To say nothing of the expense it will cost the State in publishing the amendments, which may be offered by those who have the power to make their chimerical notions bear a reasonable semblance, and thereby carry with them a majority of the legislature, but which, when adopted, are invariably a fruitful source of regret to all engaged in it. We must bear in mind that we have another duty to perform; and that is, to prevent any article containing in it a dangerous principle of innovation on the rights of any, either the majority or the minority; and more especially to place it beyond the power of the former to oppress the latter. It is moreover admitted, that all constitutions are made to furnish to the majority a check upon themselves; to guard them against momentary impulses, which are so often afterwards regretted.

Nothing is more true than the assertion made by the delegate from Ouachita (Gen. Downs,) that, in our form of government, majorities alone should govern; but while admitting that, it is equally true, that there shou d be no doubt or question that that majority of the whole people does exist in the majority of the legislature, before power shall be entrusted to that majority which may deprive the real majority of the people of their just rights. The power, then, he admits should be reserved to the majority of the people. No change in the constitution ought to be made rashly, hastily, and without the greatest necessity, and without due reflection withal; and he (Mr. Conrad) thinks it would be more wise, more politic, and more in accordance with the will of the majority, to submit to some slight imperfections in our social compact, rather than run headlong into every wild scheme that may be proposed as an amendment to it; and thereby accustom ourselves to perpetual changes. We should endeavor so to frame our constitution that it shall have a stability about it which will not require constant alterations. An instance of the necessity for permanency in a constitution is given in the history of Greece, where a distinguished and celebrated philosopher and statesman, after making a code of laws for his country, prevailed upon the people to swear on their oaths not to change it till his return, which they did. He never returned, for he died abroad; but although the people would have committed perjury had they changed it in their own time, they had no cause to regret it, for the system worked well, and was not subject to the constant uncertainties to which we are liable in these days. Can it then be considered unreasonable to ask that three-fifths of the legislature should be required before any amendment shall be made in our constitution? He thinks the more it is reflected upon, the more it will be apparent to every member of the Convention, that it will insure to us that very stability we require.

But the honorable delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) contends that thereby we shall be depriving the majority of their rights. He must pardon me for saying that is not so, for when he himself comes to reflect a moment, he is bound to admit, from his great experience in legislative business, that the legislature is very frequently not the mirror of the people; but on the contrary they do not reflect the feelings of a majority of the people.

How can it be said that the legislature who proposes the question of amendment the first time, is expressing the wishes of a majority of the people? They were not elected with any such question before the people, and if they were instructed, it would most likely be by a minority of their constituents. Men are generally elected to the legislature on account of their personal merit, and consequent popularity; from which the people expect to derive some local benefit, but those very electors would never have chosen them, if they had supposed they were to touch the constitution. It is clear then that such members are not elected on the question of necessity to amend the same, and therefore that cannot be called "placing it once before the people."

But take the plan proposed in the report, and what will be the consequence? Although they assert that which I am willing to admit, there cannot come any harm from submitting a question to the people, it is nevertheless clear, that if we do not put a check upon unnecessary changes and amendments, that they will be constantly and continually made. I admit there is no harm, I say, in submitting a question to the people, but there should be some safeguard in the constitution to prevent these frequent recurrences of constitutional questions to the people. Suppose the first legislature elected without reference to amending, should propose an amendment, and the second legislature ratifies what the first has done—the chances are, when the people begin to study and examine them, that nine out of ten of them will be rejected, and then all the expense in promulgating these theories, will have to come out of the pockets of the people at last.

Mr. Conrad need not go far away from home to show the fallacy of the arguments advanced against the necessity of a check upon sudden innovations in the constitution of a State. He has it on good authority, that in the State of Mississippi, no legislature meets or has met there for years back, but what some alteration is made in the constitution, and so steadily and so laboriously have they worked at it, that it is now little more than a common statute, something similar to our code of practice. We want a medium, and in that the delegates from West Feliciana and Ouachita (Messrs. Ratliff and Downs) say they agree with him; but when we come to compare notes, they say we are going to extremes, and that it is not right to put it out of the power of the people; but have they reflected where their doctrine will carry us? Surely not; for every reasonable person will admit that a middle is always preferable to an extreme course, in any case.

The difficulties which will exist in taking the plan proposed by Mr. Soulé, viz: of amending the article so as to read three-fifths instead of "a majority" of the legislature being required to entertain an amendment to the constitution, will certainly be much less, and more easily overcome, if proper, than the old plan of having to force it through in the first twenty days after the meeting of the legislature. For a while we heard that it was impossible; that it could not be done; but yet we see that popular sentiment has prevailed, and here we are altering and amending the constitution. Even with that modification, then, it would seem that it was accomplished, and what therefore, have we to dread from the easier task of getting three-fifths of the legislature, when we have overcome a so much greater one, without any of those frightful evils with which we have been so much and so often threatened, if Mr. Soulé's amendment to Mr. Claiborne's should prevail. He (Mr. Conrad) will surely sustain the amendment.

Mr. Wadsworth: I have but one question, Mr. President, to ask of those gentlemen, who oppose the amendment offered by the delegate from New Orleans, and that is, what is the object of a Convention, unless it be to protect minorities in their rights? Any body with half an idea, must have seen how often majorities trample on the rights of minorities when they have the power to do it; and he (Mr. Wadsworth) knows, on many occasions, that the members of the legislature have proved as great tyrants as ever the Czar of Russia was. There is not, there cannot be anything like perfect equality, until the minority can say to the majority, "thus far shalt thou come, but no farther." We of the minority have the privilege of asking protection in our rights, and but for that, why do we make a constitution? It is a matter of great satisfaction to him that he can refer, as has done the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin) to such good democratic doctrine as we have, coming from such a distinguished and elevated man as the president of this great republic of freemen—from the man who holds the first office in the world; for there is none so dignified or morally sublime, as to be at the head of a free people capable of self-government. President Polk says:

"One great object of the constitution was to restrain majorities from oppressing minorities, or encroaching upon their just rights. Minorities have a right to appeal to the constitution as a shield against such oppression. That the blessings of liberty which our constitution secures may be enjoyed alike by minorities and majorities, the executive has been wisely invested with a qualified veto upon the acts of the legislature."

That very principle, the veto, is what we ask you to accord us, and let that veto be in the people through their representatives. Don't change the constitution you are making as well for the interest of majorities as minorities, unless three-fifths of the legislature think the amendment is imperatively necessary. We are told that we are further protected by the veto of the governor. In ordinary matters it is right and proper that the veto power should be in the hands of the governor; and the only object of introducing a restriction in a constitution is to create a people's veto, and that is the very object of introducing this amendment. It is to take away from corrupt or venal men, (if any such there be in the legislature,) the power to trample on the rights of the minority.

How do those gentlemen who oppose this necessary restriction, account for the restriction which was imposed on the city of New Orleans in the removal of the seat of government, which cannot be brought back at all, and which cannot be removed from some spot to be selected sixty miles above the city, unless four-fifths of the legislature agree to it? And yet, here, while we are deciding the most important matter which can be brought before us, and which may produce the most grave results in the success or failure of this very constitution, we find them on one side to-day, on another to-morrow. Then, they say, they want a restriction of four-fifths; now, they say, they want none at all, on a question which needs it more than any other portion of the constitution! Out upon such consistency!! He (Mr. Wadsworth) will sustain the amendment for these reasons.

Mr. Soule feels it a duty which he owes to himself and to the Convention, to explain the motives which governed him when he proposed an amendment to the amendment offered by his colleague from New Orleans, (Mr. Claiborne.) While he agreed with the honorable delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) that majorities must rule in republican forms of government, still, it is nevertheless as clearly and positively an admitted fact, that the making of a constitution is mainly for the purpose of protecting the minority, and to restrain the majority from the abuse of power, which they would otherwise have the right of exercising, without such check as can be provided in a constitution.

There are two grand objects before us for consideration in this question; the one is a declaration of necessity for amendment—the other the trial of the question before the supreme authority, the people. Now, so long as it is not before the people, it cannot be considered as properly before the legislature, who have never consulted their constituents on it; but who may be induced from a variety of motives to press an amendment to the constitution, and thereby press it upon their constituents, who never dreamt of, nor ever wanted it. Why then is it needed to place a restriction on the people, by saying to them, as you virtually do, that they want a change of which they never had any idea, and on which you have never consulted them? But at the same time it is not right to check too far the will of the majority of the people, (particularly if it does not encroach on the rights of the minority,) and in the proper protection of the rights of the majority, he will go as far as the member from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs.) Therefore, the legislature is the proper place where such amendments should be proposed; but in order to guard against continual excitements at every session of the legislature, and furthermore especially to save the expense to the people, besides the trouble we put them to in calling upon them too often—and further, thinking a middle course was the wisest, most just and fair, that he had offered the amendment of three-fifths to the motion made by his colleague, requiring two-thirds. He would have gone for the report as it stood, had he not clearly seen that a single vote would have the power to carry amendments before the people, of which, perhaps, five out of six would result in no beneficial effect.

Mr. Preston thinks that every one will admit that the proposal submitted by the committee, in the report before us, is less liable to objection than the rule we have in our present constitution. The only question for our consideration is, which is the best way to set it to work in such a manner as will answer the ends aimed at. A new question has been raised upon us, in relation, to it, of a restrictive character, viz: that three-fifths of the legislature should be required to adopt an amendment to the constitution; but he (Mr. Preston) dislikes any of these restrictive measures, and therefore agrees with the report of the committee, as made. He will endeavor to show, by a simple fact, that if you take away from the house of representatives the power of moving an amendment to the constitution, by a majority, that you can have no chance in the senate, because they are no index of the popular will, (for it is admitted that they are to be organized on a restricted plan.) And further, if you press that question at all, there the chances are always against popular rights, when you have to appeal to a body of men, who are elected to restrict, not to respond to popular wants. It will be the inevitable result, if this amendment prevail, that a small fraction of the senate can defeat at will, any measure connected with the required amendments to the constitution, which may have been unanimously passed by the lower house; and thus a fraction even of the minority may fetter down the majority forever.

The proposition in simple form amounts to this, that one-fifth of the senate shall paralyze the action of the whole of the house of representatives. Such a doctrine is anti-republican, and inexpedient, for it says the people shall never have an opportunity to change their organic laws.

The extract which has been read to you from President Polk's inaugural address, has nothing to do with the case we have now before us for consideration; it is a perfectly different matter; he refers to the constitution of the United States, and not to separate States. He evidently meant that many of the States who had an identity of interest, should not oppress any two or three other States—as for example, the free States have no right to interfere with the slave States—but that has no kind of relation to the making of a constitution of any one State; for if it had, the next thing you would hear, would be that any one of the three branches of government, created to carry out the will of the people, had no right to pass any laws, for fear a small majority should swallow up the minority. Far beyond that is the question we have now to determine, which is whether a people shall have the right to amend their own organic laws when they don't suit them; or whether they shall be fettered down and restricted by the vote of one-tenth of the people, by means of the vote of one-eighth of the senate.

Have you ever reflected what such a state of things would result in, if we adopt this three-fifths amendment? You would be laying yourselves open to abuses of all kinds, in all the departments of government, but more especially in the judiciary. It is proverbial, even in republican governments, that those who are in office, will have a blind side to the defects of the incumbent. If you have not properly reflected on what the result would be, it would be well to say to you, that if you deprive the people of the watchful power which is provided for them in this report, you will at one single blow dash down the whole edifice of democracy, and not alone destroy it for ourselves, but for those who are to come after us.

To make an organic law, or any other law, we must have some spontaneous expression of popular will; and if either is to result beneficially to the people at large, why should we restrain it? Why should we say that in ten or twenty years hence, those who then may be desirous of changing their senatorial representation, should be debarred from doing so, although the senate may have become like so many rotten boroughs? By pursuing the course we do towards them, we say to them, we know what is better for you than you do yourselves, and, therefore, we have determined that two-fifths of the legislature shall control your action in remedying or righting your own grievances. But all such arguments are based on false premises. Let it be reflected upon by those around me, and who have had every opportunity to study facts as they have appeared upon the very face of things for the last twenty years. Let them look at the progress that has been made in the arts and sciences, in mechanics, in agriculture, in morality, and then say if they have reason to expect that those who may survive for that period, or those who are now pursuing their onward course, are likely to retrogade from what we are now? Where then the necessity to restrict them in their dearest privilege—that of self-government—without forcing them to go to the tedious and expensive form of a State Convention? Those who are to come after us, advancing, as the world is, in morality, in peace and tranquility, and in the repudiation of vices which have been too common in our days, will certainly know better how to govern themselves than we can. The great bug-bear which is held out to us is, that it will create too much agitation. Agitation is feared in monarchial governments; kings tremble when it is mentioned; but popular governments ought not to dread it, for popular will is the breath of their nostrils—they cannot exist without it. To agitate a question that is to result deneficially to our fellow man, cannot be injurious in a free government—on the contrary, it must be beneficial. We should encourage men to study government in every department. The only means of learning any science, either of political government or any other, is by study; and if no question or problem is ever propounded to a man for study, why his intellect would be as a stagnant pool. It is true that in England and France popular rights are not studied, but it ought not to be so with us; and, thank God, here the humblest peasant, the poorest man in the community, who is gifted with intelligence, has not only the right to think for himself, but may pursue his course of ambition with the rest, until, if he have merit and integrity, he may reach the pinacle of fame.

We have heard a great deal about agitation, and about demagogues, but they have yet failed to show us where the latter exist in these times, unless it be those who strive to learn; and as to the former, he (Mr. Preston) thinks the more there is of it, the better, if in a holy cause; and none can be more so than that which is to ameliorate the condition of man, politically or otherwise.

It is far wiser and better then, to leave to a majority the power to act, when you have placed all proper checks to prevent haste in legislation, and to leave them then free to act as to them may best seem fit. All other methods will be at war with republican government; and you might just as well say that henceforward minorities shall govern; which you know right well would lead to bloodshed and civil war.

The question was then put on Mr. Soulé's amendment of Mr. Claiborne's motion, it was to strike out the words "a majority," and insert the words "three-fifths;" and resulted as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Boudosquie, Briant, Cade, Carriere, Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Kenner, La bauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Sellers, Soule, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Wadsworth and Winder voted in the affirmative—29 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Burton, Chambliss, Chinn, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Stephens, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the negative—29 nays; the vote being equally divided, the president voted in the negative, consequently the motion was lost.

Mr. Boudousquie gave notice that he would, on a future day, move the re-consideration of said vote.

Mr. Conrad moved to amend by inserting after the words "members elected to each house," the words "and approved by the governor;" which amendment was adopted.

On motion, the Convention adjourned till to-morrow, at 11 o'clock, a. m.

Thursday, March 13, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. Goodrich opened the proceedings with prayer.

Mr. Peets presented a resolution rescinding the rule of the Convention for the meeting at 11 o'clock, and prescribing that the Convention shall, for the future, meet at 10 o'clock, A. M.

Mr. Humble moved to amend by making the hour of meeting at half past 9 o'clock, but subsequently withdrew his amendment.

Mr. Peets' resolution was then adopted.

Mr. Chinn said he did not feel altogether satisfied with the vote given by him yesterday upon the question, whether it should be a majority or three-fifths of the legislature, who should propose amendments to the constitution. He would therefore move for a reconsideration, with the view of changing his vote, which motion prevailed. And upon his further motion, the section was laid on the table, subject to call.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the article touching the mode of revising the constitution.

Mr. Downs said, that after a careful examination of this section, he was convinced there was nothing to justify the fears that had been expressed. The mere fact that the legislature are obliged to act upon amendments that may be suggested at two different sessions, and to promulgate their action thereon through the public papers; and the total impotency of the legislature to carry into effect, without the express assent of the people, any such amendment, rendered the power of the legislature dependent on the will of the people, and removed the slightest ground of apprehension. It is then useless to alarm one's self, or to alarm others, by supposing that the legislature would be enabled to change, at will, every disposition in the constitution. Moreover, I have not understood that it should require more than a simple majority of the legislature to determine whether an amendment should or should not be submitted to the examination of the people—especially, when it is expressly provided that the amendment shall not be embodied in the constitution, unless it receive the express assent of the people. It would be as well to abandon the section altogether, if the action of the legislature is to be restricted to two-thirds or three-fifths; for I conceive that the legislature have the power by a simple majority, to propose, at any time, amendments which they may judge expedient. And the people have the undoubted right to make amendments whenever they may conceive these amendments to be essential. I invoke the serious attention of members to this subject. I consider the section as conservative, and I trust that no greater restriction will be placed upon the legislature to propose amendments than the bare majority of the two houses.

Mr. Lewis did not propose to discuss the matter, but would make an explanation in reference to a particular point. The difficulty was to ascertain the majority of the voters, and the only way to avoid that difficulty was, to have a census of the good people of Louisiana. If this census were not provided for in the constitution, it ought to be. When amendments were suggested by the legislature, and voted on by the people, the difficulty of ascertaining whether those who voted with the majority in favor of the amendments, were actually the majority of the voters, would vanish upon reference to the last census. He presumed it would not be pretended by any one that less than a majority should have the right of changing the organic law. He was willing to concede that a bare majority of the legislature would suffice to suggest amendments to the people; but we must, to be consistent, require a majority of the electors to ratify the amendments. If the majority desired the amendments, they would declare them to be necessary. He considered that the will of the majority should govern, but the expression of such will should be placed beyond the shadow of a doubt. The reverse of this principle, he thought, was anti-democratic and anti-republican.

Mr. Lewis thereupon proposed to amend the section so as to require a majority of the whole number of electors.

Mr. Preston was opposed to this amendment, because it would be impracticable, and might be employed by the minority to defeat the expression of the public will. He saw no good reason why those who did not vote should be counted as opposed to the amendments proposed by the legislature to the constitution. A large proportion of our citizens were men of business—enterprising citizens who might be for the moment out of the State, and be unable to vote upon the question. Others might be sick. Again, in certain quarters of the State, by reason of the high waters, many voters might be debarred from expressing their concurrence; and thus, although in fact an immense majority were in favor of the amendments, they would be defeated from casual circumstances. It was a fair inference that every citizen who placed any value upon the right of suffrage, would vote if it were possible. Such citizens were the only ones who should, in fact, be counted upon such an occasion. The importance of the questions would excite the greatest degree of interest—they would be canvassed, and it was reasonable to presume that the friends and opponents of these measures would vote in mass. The lazy—those who were too indifferent or too indolent to go to the polls—ought not to be counted. The rule proposed by the gentleman from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis) was too uncertain. The only certain rule was to base the decision upon those that actually went to the polls.

I hope, said Mr. Preston, that the gentleman (Mr. Lewis) will not insist upon his amendment, but will leave the section as it is.

Mr. Dunn could not concur in opinion with the delegate from Jefferson. On the contrary, he thought that every amendment to the constitution should receive the unequivocal assent of the body of the people, for the constitution is designed essentially to protect the rights of the minority. It is not only the electors who are involved in the amendments that may be made to the organic law. Our wives and children, transient persons, and those who may not have the right to vote, are equally interested. The guarantees for their protection should be inviolably maintained, and not be subject to sudden changes.

Moreover, said Mr. Dunn, there was something solemn and positive about the enactments of the constitution; something stable and fixed, that rendered that instrument essentially different from the mere acts of the legislature. These latter were the resolves of a simple majority, and were open to amendment whenever the passing convenience or the necessities of the majority might require it. It was proper enough they should be subjected to a simple majority, as they were acts of mere expediency; but for the constitution he could not assent to the same principle. The constitution was the social compact. It was not a mere passing thing, but it was the basis upon which the institutions of the country reposed. It was for the benefit of all; and it should not be subject to sudden revulsion upon every evanescent change in the popular current. It was, in its nature, designed to be enduring, and should not be heedlessly or lightly touched.

Mr. Ratliff apprehended that this amendment would produce similar difficulties to those which arose from a similar disposition in the old constitution. It will be difficult, if not impossible to discover whether the actual majority of the electors have voted in favor of the amendments proposed to the constitution. There will be great contrariety of opinion, whether the majority that may have voted in favor of the amendments, are a majority of the total number of electors. In that way, the will of the majority may be thwarted. Moreover, the section contemplates an interval of four years, for the amendments will have to be submitted to the action of two different sessions of the legislature. The people will have sufficient time for reflection, and it would be hard indeed if the neglect of some persons who failed to vote, should deprive the majority of those that voted of a desirable reform. It is an unjust principle to infer, as in the old constitution, that those that did not vote were opposed to reform. The inconvenience of that rule were manifested in the difficulties that attended the calling of this Convention; that desirable result was procrastinated, and beset with impediments, that were overcome only after a great deal of trouble and perseverance.

I am sure, said Mr. Ratliff, that the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) with his accustomed penetration, will see that his amendment will occasion much embarrassment, and may be invoked as the means to defeat the will of an actual majority of the people. It will be borne in mind, that the act of consulting the wishes of the people as to the expediency of calling this Convention, was concurred in by a much smaller majority on the first than on the second occasion.

As to the dangers assumed to exist if the amendments are placed within the competency of a simple majority of the legislature, I think that the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) has shown it to be illusory. In the State of New York some such restriction exists as has been intimated in this debate, but it must be recollected that the sessions of the New York legislature are annual, and that these questions are submitted and decided by the people within two years. Whereas, the sessions of our legislature being biennial, four years will intervene, affording ample time to the people to determine whether they deem the amendments necessary.

I should prefer the section without the amendment; but if the delegate from St. Landry insists upon it, I shall vote in its favor rather than to lose his valuable cöoperation.

Mr. Lewis said he certainly could not think of withdrawing his amendment. He deemed it just and proper.

Mr. C. M. Conrad said he differed totally in opinion from the delegate from Jefferson (Mr Preston.) So far from considering that those that did not vote upon such amendments were in favor of them, he thought the contrary inference should be drawn. It was a fair presumption that they conceived the constitution to be good as it was, and that they desired no change. He admitted that when these amendments were involved, we should endeavor to ascertain the will of the actual majority of the electors; but how could that be ascertained positively? There are serious difficulties in relying upon the census, as proposed by the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) as the test by which the majority would be ascertained. The duty of making the census is generally confided to persons incapable of determining the various legal questions that would arise as to residence and naturalization, and many persons would be placed thereon who were not legal voters. From the nature of the proceedings, names migh be placed upon the roll that ought not to be there, and others omitted that ought to be there. How is it possible to ascertain whether the majority of those voting are in fact, a majority of the whole body of electors? The subject is surrounded with difficulties. I will suggest an amendment; it does not satisfy my mind, but it may in some measure obviate the difficulty. I would propose that the questions for amendments shall be twice submitted to the people, and shall only be considered binding when ratified by a majority on both occasions.

The amendment of Mr. Conrad was not adopted.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the amendment proposed by Mr. Lewis, to strike out the words "voting thereon," and the yeas and nays were called for, as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Brazeale, Briant, Carriere, Chinn, Claiborne, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn. Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Leonard, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt and Winder—46 yeas; and

Messrs. Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, McRae, Penn, Preston, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, and Waddill—11 nays.

Mr. Benjamin said, that the more he reflected upon the proposition of his colleague, (Mr. Soulé) the more he was convinced it was just and proper. The question that has excited the warmest interest in this Convention, has undoubtedly been the question of apportionment. The delegates from the country, however they may differ upon the details as relate to themselves, upon this and other questions, unite in solid column whenever there is a question to restrict the city; and to effect that object the more surely, they have recently resolved, that however great may be her augmentation, arising from the increase of her population, her immense resources and the intelligence of her citizens, her influence shall be impaired by cutting her up into fragments. Her delegation have complained bitterly of the injustice about to be done her—and the violence of the dissention, and the helplessness of her position, has induced the offer of a compromise. Should this compromise be carried into effect, it will necessarily make a portion of the constitution. What will it be worth, if you sanction the principle that a bare majority of the legislature may unsettle and undermine it, as every thing else, in that constitution? What real protection will it afford to the city? It will be competent for the legislature to impose still more onerous conditions upon the city, and the city will be without the means of defending herself, for she will be in the minority in the legislature, as she is in this body.

But we are told that if we are agrieved by any of these amendments, we may appeal to the people. How are we to make ourselves heard? What sympathy will be felt for the city in the parishes of the extreme north-west? Here, in this Convention, the city is at least heard; full justice may not be conceded to us, but our complaints cannot be entirely overlooked. I see (said Mr. Benjamin) danger in the future, unless there be some positive assurance that what is agreed upon in this Convention, and which may receive the sanction of the people, shall not be subjected to the mere control of a simple majority of the legislature. If the action of this Convention is to be exposed to such an ordeal, for one, I must say, I attach but very little value to any settlement made upon questions in which the city may be interested, and which shall be embodied in the new constitution. Hence it is with extreme regret and surprise, I see any member of the city delegation lending his countenance to the proposition before us, to invest a simple majority of the legislature with the extraordinary power of promoting sudden and radical changes in the organic law.

The delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) tells us that this power confided to the legislature, is a conservative power! To my mind, it is the very reverse of any thing conservative—it might with more propriety be termed destructive—for it will be destructive of every compromise assented to in the constitution, for the protection of the remnant of rights, which may be left to the city.

We do not ask (said Mr. Benjamin) that the same formalities be required to amend the new constitution as were required to amend the old constitution, although great as these difficulties have been represented, they have yielded to the popular wishes. All that we ask is that a simple majority of the legislature be not invested with the power of bringing about precipitate changes. Let there be some guarantees that the compromises solemnly entered into, will not heedlessly be disturbed, and that the rights of the minority shall not be exposed to further invasions. If this contemplated facility in amending the constitution be carried, it will be subject to the control of that party that may be momentarily in the ascendant, and it will seek to perpetuate its power by modifying the constitution so as to suit its particular purposes. All that we ask, is the restriction of one-tenth over and above an ordinary majority; and is that an unreasonable demand?

I trust, therefore, that the vote of yesterday will, upon reconsideration, be reversed. The city, it is true, is deeply involved in the issue of this question. But the country is likewise exposed to danger. To-day New Orleans may be sacrificed, and to-morrow it may be the town of Feliciana.

Mr. C. M. Conrad predicted that the very first fruits of this license to the legislature to amend the constitution, would be a proposition to return to the annual sessions of the old constitution. The legislature would come to the conclusion that it was impossible to attend properly to the public service unless they met annually. They would so manage it as to carry their point, and here would be one salutary reform that would be superseded. From this they would go on attacking the provisions of the constitution in detail, until they succeeded in making the most radical changes. Most of the provisions had been adopted in reference to other provisions. Had they been acted upon without such reference, some of them would not have been adopted, and others that were lost, would have received, in all probability, the sanction of this body.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said that in all the constitutions of our sister States, where it was contemplated that the legislature should propose amendments to the people, a similar provision prevailed, requiring three-fifths. Mr. C. in support of this opinion, read extracts from the constitutions of Maine, Michigan, Alabama, New Hampshire, &c. &c.; all (said Mr. Claiborne) good and orthodox democratic States!

The question was then taken upon Mr. Soulé's amendment, and the yeas and nays were called for.

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquié, Briant, Carriere, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Kenner, Labauve, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Sellers, Soulé, Taylor, of Assumption, Wadsworth and Winder—32 yeas.

Messrs. Brazeale, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Leonard, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill and Wederstrandt—30 nays.

The section, as amended, was then passed—40 yeas; 23 nays.

The Convention then took up Mr. BENJAMIN's project of apportionment.

Mr. DOWNS said he would vote in favor of laying this project indefinitely on the table. It had nothing in it like a compromise, and was in fact more prejudicial to the interests of the country than any other plan that had been suggested. It gave to the city twenty-three representatives out of eighty-six. It assumed the principle of equality and uniformity, but it sacrificed that principle. The city was placed by herself in possession of more than one-fourth of the representation, and if to this were added the representation of the surrounding parishes, upon the coast, and on the other side of the lake, the available force of the city in the legislature would be thirty-nine, to wit: twenty-three for the city, and sixteen for the parishes upon the coast as far as Iberville, and including the representation of the lake parishes. Take thirty-nine from eighty-six and the balance would only be a fraction exceeding one-half, which would have to be divided and split up among the various country parishes. The concentration of the city would be more than sufficient to overbalance the strength of the country parishes, which would be divided among themselves.

The city contained 19,000 free persons of color, and these, together with all transient persons, were included in the gentleman's (Mr. Benjamin's) project for the benefit of the city. It is useless to claim for it the credit of being a concession to the country. It is no concession at all, and it speaks for itself. I consider my project as essentially a compromise. It is based upon the electors, and the city has by it within one-fifth of the whole number to which she would be entitled by the most favorable basis. The gentleman (Mr. Benjamin) admits that the city should not have her full representation. What then, can be fairer than my proposition?

Mr. Downs then moved to substitute his project for that of Mr. Benjamin, with the following proviso: Provided; that in future apportionments the total representation of the city shall be confined to one-fifth of the representation of the balance of the State.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved for the rejection of Mr. Downs' project.

Mr. MILES TAYLOR moved to strike out Mr. Downs' proviso; which motion led to a slight debate, in which Messrs. Downs, C. M. Conrad and Benjamin participated.

Mr. MILES TAYLOR made a statistical comparison of the representation under the several projects that were before the Convention, with the view of explaining the errors which existed in the tables that had been referred to. He maintained that the basis of electors was the least favorable to the city; and certainly, he might add, the least objectionable.

Mr. BEATTY was opposed to the electoral basis; he conceived it would create great difficulty and doubt. The persons who might be deputed to make the census, might place innumerable names upon it that were not voters. This result was not unlikely to occur in the city, thronged at certain seasons of the year with transient persons, and it might be done with the view of increasing the political power of the city. Persons who were under the age of twenty-one years might also be placed upon this census.

Mr. Miles Taylor replied to these objections, that the census would be made in pursuance of that section of the constitution which would require it. If the officers charged with this duty should prove delinquent, it would be a violation of the constitutional requisition. It was not perhaps right to anticipate that result, and to infer they would lend their countenance to any such infraction.

Mr. C. M. Conrad denied the accuracy of the arithmetical calculations of the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) and insisted that the project offered by Mr. Benjamin was in fact a compromise of the question, as far as the city was concerned.

The question was taken on the motion to lay the project of Mr. Benjamin indefinitely on the table, and the yeas and nays were called for.

Messrs. Brazeale, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Leonard, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill and Wederstrandt—30 yeas.

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquié, Briant, Carriere, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Sellers, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption, Wadsworth and Winder—33 nays.

Mr. Marigny said that, instead of following a straight line, it seemed that the majority were disposed to attain their object by a crooked and tortuous path. It may be proper to recall facts which may lead them back to fundamental principles. the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) had proposed apportionment according to the federal basis. The delegattion from New Orleans, with a portion of the delegation from Lafourche, opposed that proposition. This mode had been thrown aside. Agitation and excitement have prevailed since the very inception of this question. One of the country delegates, speaking apparently from the card, got up and informed the delegates from the city, that if the city would relinquish the seat of government the difficulty would be compromised, and the city would be permitted to retain her just weight. A committee were appointed who reported a basis embracing the entire population. Their report created fresh discussions, in the midst of which the day and hour were fixed for taking the final vote; but, in the meanwhile, the question of the seat of government was decided in favor of the country.

I supposed that this concession having been made, the country delegation would have sustained the compromise offered by Mr. Benjamin; but so far from this opinion being well founded, I find that it has only escaped the fate of being laid indefinitely on the table, by a bare majority of two votes! What is the prognostic of that result? Is it designed, after inducing us to make one concession by holding out to us an inducement, to force us into another concession. The seat of government has most uncermoniously been withdrawn from the city, and a circle has been placed around the city—is it now designed to despoil us of a large proportion of our representation?

This course of proceeding, it cannot be denied, will have the effect of changing this hall into an arena for gladiators! But those that count upon their numerical force delude themselves. The rights of the city shall not be invaded—trampled upon with impunity. No sooner shall the measures be adopted, designed to prostrate the city, than I will rise and move an adjournment, sine die. With a certain intention, it has been circulated in the public papers, that a portion of the Orleans delegation, upon this very subject of apportionment, withdrew from the Convention in 1812, but that they were soon compelled by public opinion to return. To this allusion to a past event, I answer that the difficulty arose in reference to the apportionment in the senate, a much less important matter than the apportionment in the house; secondly, that after withdrawing, the members were induced to return, because they wished to get rid of the odious territorial government. Thanks be to God, this alternative is not now presented to us. We have a republican system of government, and the consequences will be much more pernicious for those that drive us to this expedient, than for us. I may be charged with speaking warmly upon the subject, but I conceive that the time has come boldly to take our stand and to maintain our ground—to speak plainly and emphatically. The city of New Orleans will not submit to oppression and to wrong. You may impose on her the necessity of an extreme measure, and when her delegation have left, you may continue to pile restriction upon restriction upon the devoted head of the city. You may endeavor to sacrifice her, but she will be beyond your reach. Your constitution will be rejected. The riches, the power, the resources of the city are not your disposable effects, and if you attempt to deprive the city of her just weight, I will move for the adjournment sine die. It were better that it were dissolved, or that at any rate, that the Orleans delegation should not participate in proceedings destined to sacrifice the dearest interests of their constituents.

Whereupon, the Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 14, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer, by Mr. STEPHENS, in the absence of a minister of the gospel.

The journal was read and approved.

Mr. RATLIFF, chairman of the committee on contingent expenses, submitted the following resolution, which was adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the committee on contingent expenses be authorized to pay Mrs. Hawley nine hundred and twenty-six dollars, for the rent of the St. Louis ball room for the sitting of the Convention, from the 13th January until the 11th of March, and other expenses, gas, water, &c., while there.

The PRESIDENT reminded the Secretary that the first thing in order was a translation of the speech of Mr. Marigny, made just before the adjournment; but the Convention dispensed with it.

Mr. RATLIFF inquired of the Secretary, whether a motion made by him yesterday, to reconsider the vote of three-fifths, then taken on the 7th article of the constitution, had been placed on the journal. He was informed it had not been, when the journal was amended, and the motion thereon recorded.

Mr. CHINN objected, but when

Mr. KENNER asked at what time the delegate from Feliciana would be ready to take it up,

Mr. RATLIFF replied, to-morrow if you will; in fact at any time—it was then set for to-morrow, at 2 o'clock.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Which was the project submitted by Mr. Benjamin, which project Mr. Downs moved to amend by striking out all the words and sections after the word "State," and insert the following:

ARTICLE SECOND.

"And shall forever be regulated and ascertained by the number of qualified electors therein; Provided, that at any future apportionment, the full representation of New Orleans, with its present limits, shall be reduced one-fifth, and that each parish shall have at least one representative; and provided further, that no new parish shall be created with a territory less than four hundred square miles, nor with a number of electors less than the ratio at the time, nor when the creation of such new parish would leave any other parish without the said extent of territory and number of electors. In the year ——, and every four years thereafter, an enumeration of all the electors shall be made, in such manner as shall be directed by law. The number of representatives shall, in the several years of making these enumerations, or during the next succeeding session of the general assembly, be so fixed, according to the principles of this section, as not to be less than eighty, nor more than one hundred; Provided, that the general assembly shall be incompetent to pass any laws after the enumeration until the apportionment shall be made. Until the first enumeration shall be made, as directed in this section, the parish of Orleans shall be entitled to twenty representatives, to be elected as follows: Eight by the first municipality; eight by the second municipality; three by the third municipality, and one by that part of the parish on the right bank of the Mississippi.

Mr. BENJAMIN, remarked that the motion made by Mr. Miles Taylor, is the first in order, and if the house will act on it he has no objection, but he thinks the position of the case is this: after that question shall have been decided, as the house previously refused to lay his project on the table, if Mr. Taylor's motion be lost he shall move to lay the substitute offered by the delegate from Ouachita on the table.

The PRESIDENT decided that Mr. Taylor's amendment to Mr. Downs' project was in order.

Mr. CLAIBORNE called the attention of members to the concessions already made by the city to the country. We concede to you your own basis of representation, provided you make it operate equally. The question now to settle is, whether the city is to be restricted in her just proportion of representation or not, in the popular branch of the legislature; the senate is clearly the conservative branch, where (if any where,) restriction should be placed on representation. But if you restrain us in the lower house, in addition to the restriction you put upon us in the senate, why then we can carry the spirit of compromise no further, and being overpowered by numerical force, we shall have but one course left, and that is, to vacate our seats as members of this Convention.

Mr. RATLIFF believing that the motion made by the delegate from Assumption (Mr. Taylor) will have the effect to firmly establish the electoral basis, and as he (Mr. R.) wants no restriction, except in self-defence, he shall support the motion to strike out.

Mr. DOWNS: This is the first time that the question has come directly before the Convention, whether or not the city of New Orleans shall be restricted in her representation in the house of representatives, and before the vote is taken, he (Mr. D.) desires to give a brief history of what has been done heretofore on the subject, in committee; and to offer some few observations to the attention of the Convention. The idea of restricting the city in her representation, originated in the committee with the honorable delegate from East Feliciana (Mr. Saunders.) He proposed that the city should be restricted to one-sixth of the representation; others proposed one-fifth; and one of the members of the committee objected to all restriction, while the honorable delegate from East Feliciana insisted that to restrict her to one-sixth of the representation was not too much; but as a measure of compromise one-fifth was the proportion which it was finally agreed upon she should be allowed as her representation in the house of representatives. It now appears, since the report has been made, that New Orleans objects to any restriction whatever, and, in consequence, we have listened day after day to a very lengthy and excited debate. It was to allay this excitement, and to meet the question in a spirit of compromise, that he, (Mr. Downs) as had two other delegates, submitted to the Convention the project which he had done. It is provided therein that the city shall always be entitled to twenty representatives, but never to any more; it is further provided that the lower house shall be composed of not less than seventy nor more than one hundred members.

The debate, however, continued with the same spirit, in the course of which the delegate from New Orleans himself (Mr. Benjamin,) admitted that some restriction was necessary upon the representation of the city, in consequence of the concentration of her interest, giving to her greater power than numerically appeared. To make his substitute agreeable to New Orleans, on that admitted principle, that she should be restricted 1-5th of her full representation, on the basis agreed upon, he (Mr. Downs) submitted another one, which amounted to curtailing her just one-fifth, and that proposition is the one now under discussion. But it seems that did not satisfy them, and the following day one of her delegates (Mr. Benjamin,) introduced a project based on total population, and called that a compromise; a very extraordinary one indeed, when it is remembered that when that basis was submitted to the Convention, seventeen could only be found to vote for it, while forty voted against it. The delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) calls that a very reasonable proposition; but he (Mr. Downs) desires to call the attention to the fact, that under his (Mr. B.'s) proposal, New Orleans will be entitled to a greater representation than she would be under any other basis—larger than she would have been under the federal basis. Could, then, the country members who feel the necessity that exists to put some restriction on the city, accept that proposal, which, instead of restricting, increased her power? Long discussions took place, and it seemed to be generally conceded that New Orleans should be entitled to her fair representation, which was her just proportion, on the electoral basis, less one-fifth. This, he thought, was a reasonable deduction; he (Mr. Downs) has changed his ground frequently to meet them; three times has he retreated from his first positions; can they ask for further receding? He cannot conceive they ought to; he has studied earnestly to make the substitute now under consideration agreeable to all. He is now somewhat inclined to think, however, that all his concessions only excite more and more opposition. He brought his mild and conciliatory proposition yesterday, thinking that it would be surely satisfactory; but it appears to be as little in favor as any of them. But the city delegates must not think that we are to keep receding for ever, and give up every thing; we have already yielded a great deal to them; but if they are now to come to us and say we must have it all as we want, they must not be surprised, if he among others, takes the studs and stops just where he is. All compromises they proposed are all on one side—none on the other. He understands the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Marigny) to say, that the removal of the seat of government was a kind of compromise, and that in consequence, it was tacitly admitted that the city should not be restricted in her representation. He (Mr. Downs) did not hear the arguments that were advanced when that question was discussed; but he remembers that coming into the hall, while the vote was being taken; he voted against the removal, because when the resolution was read to him, he saw at once that it was no concession on the part of the city. He may be wrong in the view took of it he hastily; but as he understands it, it provides that the legislature shall pass an act in future. You can't compel them to do that; the idea is futile. If that act were certain, it might have at least the semblance of concession; but they have only left it to the legislature to vote on this matter, and that may depend upon the very vote which we are now about to settle. If the resolution had said that Baton Rouge, or any other place out of the city, should be the spot where alone the seat of government could be placed, he might regard it as a concession, but as it is, it amounts to nothing at all. Throughout the history of Louisiana, she has never been entitled to more than one-sixth, and now we propose to give her full representation in the electoral basis less, one-fifth. There are many of the country members who think we have already acceded too much in going that far; but he warns those members that if the motion to strike out, prevail, it will be saying in so many words, that hereafter New Orleans is not to have any restriction whatever imposed on her in her representation. He therefore hopes the motion to strike out will not prevail; amend it if you will, and he may, and will doubtless, acquiesce; but do not strike it out. He thinks the principle is a good one, and is more favorable to New Orleans than any plan that has yet been proposed on the basis agreed to by this Convention.

[Mr. PORTER here addressed the Convention at some length, in support of the proposition offered by Mr. Downs. His remarks having been handed him for revision, were not returned in time for publication.]

Mr. KENNER felt some embarrassment in approaching this subject. But that should not deter him from explaining his reasons for the vote he should give. The silver-headed gentleman who last addressed this Convention, who has shown such a depth of research, and who has quoted to us parts of so many constitutions, which he considers germain to the question now before us, himself admitted his embarrassment, how much more so, ought he (Mr. K.) to feel, who has not gone into that elaborate study. He (Mr. Kenner) will sustain the motion to strike out, for the arguments of the delegate from Caddo have failed to carry conviction to his mind. He (Mr. K.) has listened attentively to all that has been advanced on the subject under discussion, and he can only discover a single point on which he conceives the friends of the report can at all rely; and that is, the danger to the country from the concentration of the city vote. Now let us see what is to be dreaded from this overshadowing influence, that is to destroy the country. It is asserted that New Orleans is in a small compass, and can be brought together in a mass to affect the interests of the State at large. Now how can they show the danger to exist? They have given no proofs, they have cited no parallel case in this, or any other country. What remedy do they propose for the evil which they say will ensue if New Orleans be not restricted? Why, they say that she must be shorn of one-fifth of that representation which she is justly entitled to, under the basis which we have established. Now the city would be entitled on a fair division, to twenty-five members. Suppose you take off five, and leave as you do twenty. Would that remedy the evil you profess to dread—the power and force of concentration? If it will, you have at least failed to show it, for to his (Mr. K.'s) mind, twenty men united on any plan or project, can and will accomplish as much as twenty-five. If you desire to weaken that power of concentration, the only way to do it will be to take the plan proposed by the delegate from Assumption, and that is, to cut up the representation into a certain number of electoral districts where the interests are not identical; it is the only fair and legitimate way of accomplishing it.

How much better would it be for those who are opposing New Orleans, and are trying to deprive her of her just rights, to come out at once and say that they do not want New Orleans to have as much power and influence as the country has. There is another consideration which should be called to our attention in the settlement of this question. We have decided that we will remove the seat of government from New Orleans, and as a matter of course, that so much dreaded lobby influence ascribed to the city is also removed, and therefore we shall not have so much to fear from the acts of our legislature as formerly. There will be no more fine dinners, no more fine wines, that can be brought to bear upon a question before the legislature. He, however, does not agree with the delegate from Plaquemines, (Mr. Leonard) that the members of previous legislatures have been affected by means of the stomach. At any rate the seat of government is removed, and we shall have no more of the hubbub and confusion we have been wont to see, by the greedy applicants to have this or that bill passed, as formerly, and who then kept up such a clamor that you could hardly hear yourself speak. He (Mr. Kenner) feels bound to say something in reply to the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) as to the city never having been entitled heretofore to more than one-sixth, and even in many cases to one-seventh. The constitution of 1812 placed both city and country on precisely the same footing, and guaranteed equal rights to both under it. The legislature gave to her that which she was justly entitled to at the time, taking into view the number of members in the house, and the basis agreed upon to qualify a man to vote, and they could have made no other apportionment without depriving the other parishes of rights that were equally guaranteed under that constitution.

He hopes therefore, he has explained sufficiently the reasons that govern him.

Mr. Downs remarked that he did not say there was a special provision that she should not have more than one-sixth.

Mr. Porter remarked that he had heard it argued out of doors, that by dividing the city into districts, we should divide the concentration we fear. But if we are to look to what passes in this hall for illustration, what do we find? Why, that whigs and democrats unite on any question that is to benefit the city. They divide on politics alone, and let the agricultural interest protect itself the best way it can.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Taylor, of Assumption, to strike out the proviso in the first section of the amendment of Mr. Downs, which was as follows:

Provided, that at any future apportionment, the full representation of New Orleans, with its present limits, shall be reduced one-fifth, and that each parish shall have at least one representative.

The yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Benjamin, Boudousquie, Briant, Carriere, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Ledoux, Legendre, Leonard, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Preston, Rathff, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption, and Wadsworth—35 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Labauve, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prudhomme, Pugh, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, and Winder —32 nays; consequently said motion prevailed.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption, then offered the following proviso, viz:

Provided, that at each apportionment hereafter to be made of the representation in the house of representatives, that part of the parish of Orleans lying on the east side of the Mississippi river, shall be divided into election districts in such manner that no one district shall elect more than two representatives.

Mr. Beatty moved to lay indefinitely on the table, the amendment and proviso, and the yeas and nays being called for, when

Mr. Downs remarked, that if the whole proviso be laid on the table, we shall have made no progress at all. He conceives there are two principles connected in the proviso—one of which has been accepted, the other rejected; but we have settled the basis of representation. And why then should we travel backwards? If the gentlemen want to disturb the basis, let them move a reconsideration, and then they will be able to arrive at their ends, if they can succeed in bringing back another basis to start upon; but no, they will not do that, because they know it will be decided in the same way. We have already been three weeks at work on this business, and he does hope we shall not undo all that we have heretofore done. The delegate from Lafourche (Mr. Beatty) ought at least to have told us what he intended to propose as a substitute to the one under consideration, before he proposed so unceremoniously to lay it on the table. He hopes they will proceed with his substitute.

Mr. Wadsworth then resumed the motion he had made about a week or two since, to reconsider the vote taken on the federal basis, which then resulted in its rejection—for he thinks after all, it is the only fair basis.

Mr. Conrad is of opinion that the motion made by the delegate from Lafourche (Mr. Beatty) is clearly the one in order. He does not understand what the honorable delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) meant by saying that one principle in this proviso has been adopted. He does not by any means regard it in that light. We have been discussing the proposition of the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) which the delegate from Ouachita has in vain been endeavoring to put aside for his own.

Mr. Downs remarked that his project was first presented, and was therefore the first in order.

Mr. Conrad: If it be true that his substitute is the first in order for discussion, I can only say we have been out of order for two weeks. I think Mr. Beatty's motion is most clearly in order, in any event, and that is to lay the project of the delegate from Ouachita on the table, for the purpose of taking up the other.

Mr. Benjamin remarked that the New Orleans delegation had agreed to take any basis that might be agreed upon, provided there was to be no restriction on the rights of the city after that basis was settled. But this substitute does restrict. After this Convention has fixed a basis, although less favorable than some others, to the city, and after they have also determined there shall be no restriction, he cannot hesitate which course to take—while he should prefer the amendment of the delegate from Assumption (Mr. Taylor) to the substitute of the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) he should still be compelled to vote against it.

Mr. Taylor is yet clearly of opinion that the question now under consideration, is the substantial question before the house. A week ago last Monday, (said Mr. Taylor) the house voted on the basis; there were a variety of basis offered. "Total population" was one of those offered, but "qualification" was the one chosen. The proposition now before us of Mr. Downs, contains nothing at war with that basis, but the substitute offered by Mr. Benjamin embodies a proposition which has been negatived by the house; and if we proceed to discuss the project of Mr. Benjamin, we shall thereby negative one of the pinciples we have already adopted. The only matter he humbly conceives before the Convention on which they can properly act, is the apportionment of the State on the basis of qualified electors. The only way we could properly proceed with the substitute of Mr. Benjamin, would be by moving a reconsideration, and without it were carried it could not clearly be in order for us to discuss what we have already determined on.

Mr. Dunn thinks that in proceeding with the substitute we have now under consideration, we are entirely out of order. When the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) first introduced his project, he raised that question, because it embraced a provision which this house had previously rejected, viz: that each parish should have at least one representative, without regard to population.

Mr. Benjamin replied to the delegate from Assumption, that there is this difference, when he (Mr. B.) proposed his substitute to this house as a compromise, a motion was made to lay it on the table, which motion failed. The Convention evidently then kept it before them for further consideration; and now, when a motion to lay the substitute of Mr. Downs on the table is made, it is called out of order.

Mr. Downs has not raised it as a question of order, but merely to show the inexpediency and impropriety of it. The Convention determined by a vote of 28 to 18, to fix the basis on qualified electors, and therefore he thinks it better to go on as we are going, and that if we do not we shall only be retrogading.

The President desired to call the attention of the members of the Convention to the fact, that to lay the substitute on the table, amounted to a rejection of the whole of it.

Mr. Ratliff wished to know if he was in order in moving to reconsider his vote, for he began to see pretty plainly that the city wanted the lion's share.

Mr. Wadsworth was clearly in favor of the proviso offered by the delegate from Assumption, as the only one which, while allowing New Orleans her fair share of representation according to any basis, still the country would be better protected from any thing like a concentrated vote when there would be such a variety of interests represented. He thinks it is fair for both sides.

Mr. Conrad, in reply to the delegate from West Feliciana, remarked that he had understood him to say, that the city wanted the lion's share—thereby saying that the basis claimed is fairer for the city than the one which is adopted. If the honorable delegate will take the trouble to re-examine his calculations he will find it is not so. Out of the whole population of the State, 250,000, there are 84,000 whites and free blacks, leaving 166,000 slaves—of which there are 25,000 in the city. Therefore the country could lose nothing on that score; and that was the reason why the delegate from Ouachita labored so industriously for many days to establish the federal basis. Did he not then urge it on the Convention as one of the means of restricting the city? Then the city objected, as now, to restriction of any kind. But if you are determined to restrict us, at least don't do so in so many words. Take the whole population, if you choose, but do not restrict. He was astonished to find Mr. Ratliff in such an error. Now, thus matters stand between the country and city: the delegate from Ouachita says it is true you will restrict New Orleans, but then you will increase the influence of the adjacent parishes; but there again he is mistaken. The number of slaves in the first congressional district is 28,000, in the second 30,000, together 58,000. In the third district it is 58,000, equal to the other two; and in the fourth district it is 50,000, nearly equal to the first and second.

Now, then, how can the adjacent parishes be benefitted by the plan proposed by the delegate from Ouachita, for it appears that the third and fourth districts bear the proportion of two to one over the first and second districts. These are facts and figures, and yet they get up and tell us seriously that this is the most favorable project for New Orleans. Figures dont prove it, nor does the census. They are at war with all these declarations. He regards the proposition made by his colleague the fairest compromise that has been offered, and as such he shall sustain it; and he conceives the Convention in refusing to lay it on the table, have properly made it the order of the day, and public interet requires we should again take it into consideration. He voted to lay the substitute of Mr. Downs on the table, because he thought that of his colleague would fully meet the wishes of the Convention. He reconciled himself to it by thinking it was the best that could be got, and he is yet at a loss to know how those who voted for the federal basis could possibly refuse to take, as their next choice, the total population.

The question was then put on Mr. Beatty's motion to lay Mr. Taylor's proviso on the table indefinitely, and resulted as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Carriere, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Kenner, Labauve, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders and Sellers—27 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Ledeaux, Leonard, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Roselius, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth and Wederstrandt—39 nays. So the motion did not prevail.

Mr. Ratliff moved the reconsideration of the vote given, to strike out the proviso in the amendment of Mr. Downs; and the yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Voorhies, Wederstrandt and Winder voted in the affirmative—31 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Carriere, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Eustis, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Leonard, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Preston, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption and Wadsworth voted in the negative—33 nays; consequently the motion was lost.

Mr. Taylor then moved that his proviso be adopted.

Mr. Claiborne hoped that the delegate from Assumption would withdraw the proviso, or at any rate amend it. If that be the price of the boon, which he has conferred upon the city by aiding in removing the restriction on her rights, the boon itself will not be very acceptable to the city. He would say to that gentleman, that if it be divided into twelve districts, it is very possible people might not be able to get suitable persons, to their minds at least, to serve them in such a narrow compass as one-twelfth of the city. Why separate the city at all? and if you do, why divide the municipalities? He should move to lay the whole subject on the table indefinitely.

Mr. Tayror was desirous of giving some of the reasons that induced him to propose this amendment. The delegate from New Orleans thinks he (Mr. T.) had acted upon the principle of extending a boon to the city of New Orleans in the vote he had given not to restrict the city; nothing was further from his mind; he acted in accordance with what he believed to be right, and from a sense of justice. He designed to do right, and did what he conceived to be so. But he made his proposition because he thought it proper and just, and he believes it will lead to happy consequences. Gentlemen seem to think there is great injustice in it, but he does not; but, on the other hand, that there is propriety in it, and that it will result in good. As it now stands, no matter what the divisions of interest may be, the smallest majorities may carry the whole number, without regard to those interests, and it is his design to put all the population on the same footing. If, for instance, one-third of the population of Louisiana, (because that is about the number of the population of New Orleans,) were to elect by general ticket one third of the representatives, the smallest majority would then determine the politics of that representation, and they might thereby determine the political complection of the State. In such a way those whom the people want are passed over, and party hacks substituted in their place. Besides, if we give representation to the people themselves, it will prevent combinations from being formed that shall shut out and exclude any particular portion of the city, as was the case at the last election, when the second municipality was entirely excluded from a participation even in our very debates. He has noted the remarks which have been made, as to the municipalities themselves being division enough, but as he thinks this is better, he adheres to it, for he wants no distinction made between citizens, and it is that same principle that induced him to vote against restricting the city.

Mr. Beatty remarked, that if we were going to divide the city into districts, we had better do it here at once, because if we left it to the legislature, then it is clear they would have it in their power to lay off the districts in such a way as to give the vote to one or other of the political parties, as might best suit them.

Mr. Conrad rose to address the house, but was momentarily interrupted by the call of "question," which however, subsiding, he proceeded.

The avowed object, Mr. President, it seems is, to limit the power of the city; but is it right to gerrymander it to suit party purposes, as might be done, and no doubt would be? The gentleman from Assumption says, that his vote on the question of restriction was no boon, but justice. Admitted—but has he not now carried that justice too far; has he not made them representatives for wards? It is a matter of experience how difficult it is to get men to serve in the council, even who are capable. He would much prefer municipalities to the mode proposed. The report say , no municipality shall send more than a parish. He considers the legislature a dangerous place to refer this division to; it will always be a fruitful source of strife, and will give them every opportunity for legerdemain and gerrymandering. It would be better done here, if it is to be done; but he thinks it is enough to divide it into municipalities, and if needs be, divide them into two districts each.

Mr. Claiborne, who joins Mr. Conrad in his opinions and fears, would submit to the house, while he called their attention to and particularly to the attention of the delegate from Assumption, a substitute to the proviso of that gentleman—it was to divide the representation into municipalities, in such a way that neither could have less than one-fourth of the whole representation. Each municipality has a separate and distinct line, and interest, not however in a general way as to the latter, but he (Mr. Claiborne) thinks it is the only reasonable way of dividing the representation.

Mr. Wadsworth is surprised to find gentlemen so greedy to control the interests of the whole State, as they seem to be—to his mind they want to concentrate the vote of New Orleans so as to control the vote of the State. The country is divided, then why not the city? Has any man ever dreamt of such a thing as the whole country sending their members here, perhaps, by a majority of one vote? New Orleans is bound eventually to govern the whole State, if we do not watch her political power with argus eyes. That he (Mr.W.) firmly believes, for she is not alone depending on Louisiana for her prosperity and greatness; the wealth of the whole western States is poured into her lap, and she is supported by her commerce, which extends throughout the world.

We all know there was a Tyre, a Rome, a Carthage, and an Athens, which in their days attracted the attention of the world; amongst them let us select Rome to carry out my argument. She controlled the world, and Athens handed down to us that mind which now controls our actions. Let them build up their Cincinnati, St. Louis, and all their other large western cities—but they have all to come here at last, and there is no telling to what power New Orleans may not arrive ere a century rolls around.

He (Mr. Wadsworth) cannot but think there is another question which ought to be taken into consideration by the gentlemen who object to the division, and that is, that it is to the interest of the city herself that she should be divived, for if not, the hour is not far distant when the second municipality will control the political power of New Orleans. There you find the enterprize, the intelligence of her citizens, making rapid strides, and distancing her sisters. This then is a thing to be thought of, and reflected upon by all. All we want is to divide the vote in such a way that by one vote in the city, the State of Louisiana shall not be governed by New Orleans.

The great idea here is, that New Orleans will control; this is the only way it can be prevented, and therefore he shall support it.

Mr. Roselius has felt great solicitude that justice should be done to the city; and if we are to judge from the vote of this morning, the question may be considered as settled, that the majority of this Convention are opposed to imposing a restriction upon her. He (Mr. Roselius) rejoices at the result; for all she asks is justice. She does not want to control the interests of the State; all she asks is that the same basis should be applied to her as to the other portion of it. He feared that New Orleans was to be placed under a ban, but he is indeed happy to know that the idea is abandoned, and that she is not now to be put in shackles.

The result is honorable to this Convention as a body; and he (Mr. R.) is willing to make any concession to accomplish that great and just end. He does not care into how many parts the representation is cut up, provided they do not divide it into too small districts—that is a matter of minor importance, compared with the grand principle of restriction.

Mr. Claiborne felt convinced that New Orleans would have preferred some slight restriction, in preference to this mode of dividing us into so many districts. Why, said the gentleman from Plaquemies, (Mr. Wadsworth,) should not the city be divided into districts, as well as the country into parishes? If he thinks we have any personal political interests in view, in maintaining that the city ought not to be divided, he is much mistaken; for his part he repels it. He only looks to the general interests of his constituents. He did not come here to seek pupularity; but he came with the determination, to the best of his humble ability, to protect the rights of those who sent him.

Mr. Saunders thinks in sustaining this motion we are going to much into detail. Who can say what may be the condition of the city even gfty years hence? The objection to it is, that if the division to be made produced a bad or pernicious effect, it is without a remedy; and therefore he shall not support the motion.

Mr. Claiborne then withdrew his substitute to the motion made by Mr. Taylor, and seconded Mr. Beatty's motion to lay the proviso on the table indefinitely, and called for the yeas and nays, which resulted as follows: Yeas 26, Nays 36.

And on motion, the Convention adjourned till to-morrow at 10 o'clock, a. m.

Saturday, March 15, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. Pritchard.

Mr. Beatty, on behalf of the special committee, to whom were assigned the duty of making certain enquiries in relation to the delay in the publication of the reports of debates, presented a report accompanied by a resolution requiring the reporters in English to deliver their reports on the day following the proceedings in the Convention. The resolution was modified on motion of Mr. Dunn, and was adopted.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the subject of apportionment; being the proposition of Mr. Miles Taylor to divide the city of New Orleans into representative districts.

Mr. Benjamin desired a temporary postponement of this question. He was about preparing a substitute, which he designed offering; but before submitting it to the consideration of the Convention, he wished to advise with his colleagues from the city. He wished it to be understood, inasmuch as the country appeared to wish it, that he did not intend to oppose the districting of the city. All that he objected to was, that the legislature should be empowered with control over the formation of these districts. He wished them to be placed beyond the power of the legislature; to be definitely settled in the constitution. He would propose in his proposition, that the three municipalities should be divided each into two representative district: to be represented in the ratio of electors as determined upon by the Convention. He would, therefore, renew his request, that the subject be laid over for the present.

Mr. Downs was opposed to any further delays. This subject had monopolized a great portion of the time of the Convention. For the last three days it has been discussed; it has been turned into every form and shape. This is the last day of the week: if we defer it until Monday, it is most likely it will consume the whole week. The city ought to be satisfied, inasmuch as, notwithstanding all the arguments that have been adduced, showing the necessity of restraining her influence within such reasonable limits as would give some gurantees to the country. She has succeeded in carrying her point, and is to have a full representation. What more can she possibly desire? The only guarantee that the country now asks, is, that her huge representation, totally disproportionate with the balance of the State, may be divided, in order to prevent the concentration of her vote. And yet it seems that even with this concession, she is not yet satisfied. When the subject of representation was before the committee at Jackson, a similar suggestion was made to divide the city into smaller representative districts than were offered by the existing local division into municipalities; but this was resisted by the Orleans delegation, and with some show of reason, on the ground that, inasmuch as the city was to be restricted, it was not just to restrict her further by dividing her into smaller districts. The committee under the circumstances assented. But now the whole matter is changed; she is to have a full delegation, and the only restriction to be imposed upon her, if restriction it can be called, is, that her delegation shall be divided so as to represent more immediately the various local districts and fractions of her population. I am indeed astonished that objection should be made to this reasonable provision on the part of her delegation. And if anything further were wanting to demonstrate the influence of the concentrated power of the city, we would find a striking illustration in the proceedings and debates upon this very question within the last three days! The delegation of the city consists only of eleven members in this house. Only one-seventh portion of the whole number of members; and yet we find that New Orleans has succeeded in every thing. If with so great an inferiority in numbers, she can carry her designs, what will be the result when she has one-half, or may control one-half of the members in the house of representatives? One fact to which I have alluded, is observable from the votes taken yesterday: and that is this, that wherever New Orleans is concerned, the carries along with her all the votes of the surrounding parishes. The division of the city into representative districts is asking but very little, for it will tend only, at best, partiality to effect the object of preventing the too great concentration of power in the city.

I trust, said Mr. Downs, that this matter will not be further procrastinated. The gentleman (Mr. Benjamin) it seems to me, can very well present his proposition now; it can be discussed, and he can explain it to his colleagues. If it be postponed, I shall move immediately to take up the report of the original committee upon apportionment, and from what country members have witnessed since yesterday, I am inclined to believe that the result will not be as favorable to the city as heretofore; and that the country will see the necessity for checking her power before it is too late.

Mr. Culbertson said he had not troubled the house with many remarks, because he believed there were others far more capable than he could pretend to be, to participate in the various discussions that had arisen upon this and similar questions. He did not believe it necessary, that because a man possessed the faculty of speaking he should make a speech merely to have the gratification of seeing it printed. The time of the Convention was too precious for any thing of that kind. And I doubt very much whether it should be indulged in, at the sacrifice of important objects, for which this Convention was called.

I will take advantage of the present occasion, in the name of my constituents, to express the general satisfaction produced by the decisive vote taken yesterday; they were happy to find that the Convention were at length disposed to render full justice to the city, upon the sacred principle of equality and uniformity. This resolution was worthy of the purest principles of republicanism. It was a recognition of of those principles, well worthy of the fathers of our constitution. And if in their desire to protect the interests of the city, those members of the Orleans delegation that have addressed the house, have employed all their skill and all their talents to carry their point, I trust they may not incur the slightest reproach from the country delegation. The warmth of debate, and the vital importance of the subject, may have given rise to some pointed expressions; but this might very well happen from the peculiar character of the questions involved. It has manifested their fidelity to their duties. They are no more deserving of reproach than a servant, an indented apprentice would be for the scrupulous exactitude with which he may have fulfilled his duties to his master.

Since the country, through an apprehension of the concentrated power of the city, desire to lessen her influence by dividing her into districts, the city is disposed to concur; but all that she asks is, that if this division must needs be made, it shall not be so made as to be the cause of serious difficulties and of grave disorders. I trust that a reasonable delay will be granted, in order that the Orleans delegation may have the opportunity of conferring with one another as to some mode the least exceptionable of forming the various districts into which it is proposed to divide the city. The delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) thinks we should economize our time. I think so too; not upon one abstract point, but a general rule; it will, in my opinion, be economizing our time to allow the city delegation time to make a definite proposition in which all may concur. This, I take it, is the intention of my colleague, Mr. Benjamin. The request is a reasonable one; and I trust it will be conceded.

Mr. Boudousquie proposed to lay the question relative to the apportionment of the city upon the table, and to take up that portion applicable to the country. The Orleans delegation, added Mr. B., desire to confer with one another, and with their constituents. By Monday they will be enabled to submit their labors to the Convention.

Mr. Beatty was opposed to delay—not because he was averse to the particular plan indicated by the gentleman (Mr. Benjamin) for districting the city, but because there was one point that ought, and should, be settled at once. He could not consent that the legislature should have the power to interfere and change the districts. He wished them to be established in the constitution permanently. If it were left to the legislature it would be subject to party action and party control. The number of districts in the city was less important than that they should be definitely formed as to their territorial limits. If you leave the question open for the future decision of the legislature, you expose it to the movements of party, and to political projects. I would rather see the city vote en masse than that it should be divided according to the ascendancy of the one or the other of the two great political parties. When the whigs would be in the ascendency, the districts would be so formed as to operate in their favor. When the democrats were in power the districting would be made so as to promote their objects. I trust that the Convention will provide against that result, by prescribing in the constitution the territorial extent of the districts, and their number. When the Convention have definitely settled that the districts formed in the city shall be permanent, then they may refer the details to the delegation from the city, in order that they may confer and agree upon the most acceptable number of districts into which the city shall be divided.

The question was taken upon Mr. Boudousquie's motion to lay the subject of apportionment, so far as it related to the city of New Orleans, upon the table, and it was carried in the affirmative.

Mr. Downs moved that the Convention take up the subject of apportionment, which had been laid upon the table subject to call, and called for the yeas and nays upon his motion.

Mr. Humble said he was convinced that the Convention would never get at the end of its business, if important questions were to be constantly postponed. He had witnessed with regret the disposition to procrastinate. In my young days, said Mr. Humble, I worked in a black-smith shop, and I think, to make use of a common expression, it is best to strike while the iron is hot.

The question was taken on Mr. Downs' motion, and the result was 28 yeas, and 26 nays.

The question recurring on the provision presented by Mr. Miles Taylor,

Mr. Benjamin offered the substitute to which he had referred at a previous stage of the proceedings.

Mr. Cade offered an amendment to the effect that none of the representative districts in the city be entitled to a greater number than allowed to the largest country parish.

Mr. Marigny considered that the amendment of the delegate from Lafayette, (Mr. Cade,) was contrary to the principle consecrated by the vote of yesterday; and that with a view of arresting the chimerical notions entertained in regard to the motives for asking a delay, he would feel himself under the necessity of voting for the proviso of the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Taylor.)

Mr. Claiborne would protest, by his vote, against any unjust and vexatious division of the city into representative districts. The request of my colleague (Mr. Benjamin) was a reasonable one. I have had no opportunity of conferring generally with my constituents, but those whom I have casually met are averse to such fractional divisions of this city. The facts speak for themselves. The city is already divided into municipalities, and each municipality is sub-divided into wards; so that in our elections, besides these divisions, we would have representative districts, senatorial districts and congressional districts—a mixture already sufficiently confusing; and if the city is again to be sub-divided into representat ve districts for the legislature, we shall be exposed to perpetual confusion and disorder. I would ask the country members how they would like to have their parishes cut up in a similar manner, with the view of breaking up a supposed amity of action? How would the delegates from St. Landry, for example, like to have their parish cut up into fragments, and that too, without giving them the opportunity of conferring with one another, or with their common constituents? They would be indignant, and with good reason, against such a proposition; and yet it is made for the city, and her delegation are expected to concur in it without consulting.

My colleague (Mr. Benjamin) has told you that he wished to have a little time to advise with the other members of the Orleans delegation. Yet this reasonable request has been refused. We are to be forced to acquiesce in any arbitrary division of the city, that it may please the majority in this house to entertain. We are forbidden to consult with our constituents. This is a mode of proceeding which I utterly condemn. And I shall feel under a necessity to vote, not only against the proposition of my colleague, (Mr. Benjamin) but also, under the circumstances, against the proposition of the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Taylor).

Mr. Wadsworth said that he was astonished at the vehement opposition of the gentleman that just resumed his seat, against the districting of the city. Notwithstanding the convincing and powerful arguments against the monopolizing weight of the city, she is to have her just share of representation upon the basis that has been adopted. Is not this sufficient to content her representatives? But must she be allowed to absorb and to swallow up the political power of the country. Let her delegation beware! No one anticipated that she would be allowed so large a number of members as she will get under the basis that has been adopted. Why, she will have from twenty to twenty-five representatives immediately, according to that basis! If she should force the members from the country to retrace their steps, the result might not be so favorable to her. This desire to engross the greater proportion of the representation, reveals designs which should make the country particularly careful. It seems to be but natural that the city should be divided, in order that its localities and conflicting interests should be distinctly represented, and that the whole of her large delegation should not be in the position of voting as an unit upon all important questions.

Mr. Scott of Baton Rouge, concluded that the only reason urged for delay, was the desire of the Orleans delegation to consult with their constituents. What would the delegation from the city say if a country member, upon any important question, should rise and ask that it should be postponed, in order that he might consult his constituents? Why, the idea would be scouted at; and yet the Orleans delegation, who are in the very midst of their constituents, ask us to postpone this question, which has been under a protracted debate, in order that they may confer with their constituents. The circumstances that have marked our proceeding for the last few days, are sufficient to convince any one, that the city ought to be restricted.

Mr. Ratliff was in favor of the principle of the gentleman from Lafourche, (Mr. Taylor.) The gentleman's idea was a most excellent one, inasmuc ash it will give to the minority an opportunity of being heard in the legislature. And when that gentleman was thanked by the Orleans delegation for his magnanimity in throwing off all restriction from the city, he replied becomingly, that he had done nothing more than his duty, by rendering justice to the city. Thus it will be seen, that justice has been rendered by the country to the city, and it may be said, against the will of the city. Justice then, has been forced upon the city in one instance, and I predict it will be forced upon her in another. This proposition for dividing her into representative districts will be held as an act of justice by the minority. But one side of the question was heard by her delegation in the legislature. They were usually a l whigs, or all democrats. By this provision the minority will have an opportunity of being heard; and thus justice has been forced upon the city. I was very much delighted with the proposition of the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Taylor,) when he offered it yesterday. I make the almost blasphemous exclamation, that an angel from heaven could not have had a happier conception, nor offered a proposition more just or more rational.

Mr. Marigny moved that the subject of districting the city be referred to the Orleans delegation, in order that they may confer together, and report a plan for districting the city.

Mr. Downs moved to amend the motion of Mr. Marigny, by instructing the committee that the city should be divided into twelve representative districts.

Mr. Wadsworth thought that this number was too large; it would be attended with some inconvenience. In some of these little districts it would be difficult to find men of sufficient talents to depute to the legislature. That might perhaps be remedied by a provision allowing the voters to select a person to represent them, beyond their district. He could see no reasonable objection to this; for he held that if the people of one parish were disposed to select a person from another parish, to represent them for particular reasons, they should be left free to do so.

Mr. Voorhies was willing to accede to reducing the districts in the city to nine. He thought that number would be amply sufficient for the purpose designed, and he was willing to consult the convenience of the city as far as he could.

Mr. Brent proposed to place the number to be submitted to the committee at ten.

Mr. Downs acquiesced in this proposition.

Mr. Eustis said that the intention of the Convention in relation to the city, was but too apparent—the principle of action was upon the maxim, "divide and conquer;" the city was to be sacrificed in detail.

In vain does she protest, through her delegates, against the willful wrong that is about to be done her. Hence it would seem that after the country has forced justice upon her, to use the language of an honorable delegate, it is found strange that she does not display her gratitude, if not in words, at least by an humble submission to whatever the majority may be pleased to order. Ever since the unfortunate word compromise has been heard in this house, the fate of the city has appeared to me to be irretrievably pronounced. The measure of her disasters are accomplished, and not only of her disasters, but those of the country. For let gentlemen from the country say what they may, the true interests of the city and country are one and the same. It should be borne in mind, that we are forming a constitution for the whole State—for the people of the city as well as for the people of the country, and that equal justice ought to be meted out to all. What will be the result of this proscriptive policy? You have already placed a ban upon the city, you have taken the seat of government from her limits, and have prescribed that it shall not be established within sixty miles thereof; and to complete that active proscription, you fix the sessions of the legislature in the month of January, at a period of the year when it will be excessively difficult for the city representation. And this is what is termed forcing justice upon the city!

But how does the second act of your generosity compare with the first? You now propose a territorial division of the city into minute particles, by which the city will lose her nationality, if I may be permitted to use that expression for the want of a better. Since the city must needs be divided, since she must be cut up, be it so! But at least do not insist upon such divisions as will be productive of the greatest disorder and confusion. There is not a member from the country that would not find it extremely harsh and unjust after the Convention had determined that the particular parish he represented, should be split into fragments for the purpose of dividing its representation, that the details should be settled without any reference to the delegation from the parish. Why act with this exclusive severity against the parish of Orleans? The city is already divided! division of municipalities—division of races—division of languages—division of manners and of prejudices—in a word, division in every thing. So much so, that one would seek in vain any other city where there exist greater and more radical differences; and where those differences are destined to exist for a longer period, and that independent of all law and of all constitutions! Divide the city since it is your pleasure, but have some regard for the interest and the convenience of its inhabitants! There are particular portions of the city where the population is dense; there are other portions where its population is sparse. According to your principle there would be a representative from the meat market, and a representative from the vegetable market. The delegate from Plaquemines (Mr. Wadsworth) thinks that the inconvenience of getting suitable persons to represent these various districts may be obviated by allowing latitude to the voters to choose any one residing in the parish to represent them. But the gentleman overlooks a fact that such a provision would be entirely useless. The feeling of locality is peculiarly strong, and no district would be willing to admit that there was no one sufficiently instructed to represent in the legislature. They would prefer electing one of their own citizens than to choose a citizen from a neighboring district, even although it were from the adjoining district.

I pray the Convention to consider the difficulties that would arise from districting the city into several small districts. Make the districts then as large as possible, consistent with your designs. These are not difficulties of a day; they are not momentary; they vary with circumstances, and a division that might answer well enough at one period, would be most unfortunate at another. The best plan, in my humble judgment, would be to adopt the provision of the gentleman from Lafourche,(Mr. Taylor) and leave with the legislature the discretion of varying the districts as circumstances may require. But if the city is to be divided, and not only divided, but the divisions to be permanent, make the evil as small as possible, and give the inhabitants of the city as little inconvenience as possible.

Mr. Brent could not refrain from expressing his astonishment at this cry of proscription from the city delegation. They have gone on triumphantly, and success upon one point has been only the prelude of success to another; and I may say, that they have obtained a controlling influence in this Convention. The expediency of restricting the city was concurred in by a large majority; but now, that principle of safety for the country has suddenly been conceded to the city. The interests of agriculture, the permanent interests of the country, have been sacrificed to the interest of commerce; and yet those that have obtained the sacrifice have raised the cry of proscription! This reminds me of the pretext of the wolf reproaching the lamb for having troubled the limpidity of the stream! In the name of justice and of reason, what ground is there for opposing the division of the city into small districts. I can see no just reason for it. I consider it as the inevitable sequence of the principle of equality and uniformity, which has heretofore been so constantly invoked by the city delegation. Is it reasonable that the city should elect en masse her entire delegation, when the delegation from the country is distributed among innumerable parishes? That the delegation of the city should be returned in a solid column to the legislature by the majority of but a single vote, while the country parishes stand in an isolated position in reference to each other, the maxim to which the gentleman from New Orleans refers, has no application to the city, but it refers with striking effect to the position of the country. The city knows full well how to act upon it. Divide and conquer has been her principle of action towards the country. The country is divided, and hence the preponderating influence of the city which is united—which votes her entire strength as an unite to place the city upon an equality with the country. She ought to be divided, and her strength should be distributed among her various localities and divergent interests.

The vote of yesterday, abandoning the principle of confining the influence of the city to her just relative position, caused as much surprise on the part of the city delegation, as it did on the part of that portion of the country delegation that retained the stand originally assumed. In fact, it was something truly remarkable, that in a Convention principally composed of members representing the agricultural interest, such a concession should have been made! But the matter may be considered in the light of the thing adjudged, and there is no other alternative for those that concur with me in opinion that this judgment is both eroneous and unfortunate, but to submit.

The principle of equality and uniformity has been adopted, and all that we ask is, that the city shall conform to that principle. As for the argument of the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Eustis) that there is a want of homogenity in the population of the city, I would answer, that it is with a view of representing these various interests that the division of the city into small representative districts is desirable, and that these local differences will in that way serve to equalize the representation between the city and country.

Mr. Claiborne would remark that the gentleman from Rapides (Mr. Brent) had argued the question as if the delegation from New Orleans had opposed the scheme for districting the city. The gentleman from Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) had argued it as affording the minority in the city the opportunity of being heard, as if their voices had heretofore been suppressed. Neither of these positions were correct. The delegation from the city had alone contended that the districting of the city should not be made so as to create disorder and confusion. In reference to the second point, there was no foundation for the assertion of the delegate from Feliciana. The composition of the Orleans delegation in this body without going farther, proved it to be unfounded; the members representing the city were chosen irrespectively of party politics.—They were sustained and voted for by both whigs and democrats indiscriminately.

Mr. Benjamin proposed that the city should be divided into six elections districts, and that the formation of these districts should be referred to the city delegation.

Mr. Voorhies proposed that the representation from the city should be distributed among eight election districts, as follows: three representative districts for the First Municipality; three for the Second Municipality; and two for the Third Municipality.

Mr. Waddill moved that the further consideration of the question of apportionment, as it related to the city of New Orleans, be postponed until Monday; his motion was lost.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. Voorhies, to establish eight representative districts in the city, and it was carried in the affirmative by yeas 36, and nays 23.

Mr. Cade withdrew his motion, and the resolution presented by Mr. Downs was adopted and referred to the Orleans delegation.

Mr. Beatty proposed to substitute sections ten and eleven of the second committee, to similar sections in the report of the majority of the committee on the legislative department.

Mr. Lewis proposed to amend the report further, and instead of requiring that new parishes should contain, instead of four hundred square miles, to require six hundred and twenty-five miles square. Mr. L. explained the necessity for this amendment. It was concurred in. The Convention then resumed the proposition of Mr. Beatty.

Mr. Benjamin remarked that there was a contrariety between the principle consecrated in section eleven in the report of the second committee and that part of the report of the majority of the first committee, which prescribed that each parish should have at least one representative; and that, therefore, he would move to strike out that clause entirely.

Mr. Downs replied that this clause was essential to insure representation to some of the old parishes whose population were quite small; as for the new parishes, for whom it might be thought that this principle had been invoked, they were increasing very fast in population, and would soon be entitled to a plurality in representation.

Mr. Benjamin thought that for the present, representation should be allowed to every parish. But some principle ought to be embodied in the constitution which would allow representation hereafter solely in reference to the principle of equality and uniformity, a settled basis; and if the parish fell below that number, should be merged with such neighboring parish as she should select, and conjointly, they should send a delegation upon the basis of the electoral number.

Mr. Downs thought that this question involved the acknowledgment or denial of the principle that each parish shall be entitled to one representative. The gentleman (Mr. Benjamin) is willing to concede the principle for the present. But to my mind there is no difference in conceding it now and conceding it hereafter. If the principle be good, it is good now, and is good hereafter. The intention of the gentleman is manifest; he wishes the city to get possession of the representatives of certain parishes as soon as it may appear that they shall fall beneath some increased electoral number, although they may in fact have increased in population: the same question is here at issue again, shall the city absorb the political power of the State?

Mr. Porter would ask the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) whether his construction was this, that if the population diminished in proportion with its increase in another, or whether the increase or diminution should be counted from the present actual number. If the first was his construction, some of the old parishes would be exposed to the danger of losing their representation. In the second place, the new parishes had nothing to fear, for it was not presumable that the alluvial soil of the Mississippi would ever lose its settlers so fast as to convert any of them into rotten boroughs.

Mr. Benjamin said that the population of the State should remain stationary in the several parishes. We have decided that there shall be but one hundred members in the house of representatives; if hereafter the electoral number be placed at one thousand voters for each representative, how can it be expected that parishes having but three hundred and fifty voters shall be entitled to a distinct representative? If we admit this, then we are virtually introducing the rotten borough system, and we shall transfer the inequality of representation from the senate to the popular branch of the legislature.

Mr. C. M. Conrad was under the impression that this question had already been settled. The second committee upon the question of apportionment had reported, it would be remembered, a plan of repartition, by which that concession was made temporarily, so as to include the new parishes of the north-west. But upon apportionment being made upon the electoral number they would not be entitled to distinct representation, unless they reach that number. I was opposed at that time to this concession, and if I yield my assent to it now, it is only upon the ground that it is temporary, and as a portion of the compromise.

Of course I can never consent that such a clause should be obligatory hereafter. That would be falling into the disparities that have marked the existing constitution. The senatorial representation has been very unequal; why has it been so? Because, notwithstanding the increase in certain portions of the State, the senatorial districts have invariably remained the same.

It would be a renewal of the rotten borough system. One of the causes for which this body is convened is to make a fairer apportionment in the senate. How can we, with that mission before us, seek to introduce the same inequalities in the house of representatives? It would be a sacrifice of principle.

The proposition of Mr. Benjamin was not adopted. Upon a call for the yeas and nays, the vote stood 24 yeas and 31 nays.

Mr. Beatty proposed the creation of a committee, composed of blank members, to be chosen from each congressional district, to whom shall be assigned the duty of verifying the calculations upon the provisional apportionment.

Mr. Downs maintained that the calculations and the tables reported by the committee were correct, and it was needless to refer them to a committee. They spoke for themselves.

Mr. Benjamin thought that there might be error, and it was better to refer.

Mr. E. M. Conrad was in favor of the reference, because members, in the uncertainty which basis would be adopted, had not examined and verified the calculations for themselves.

Mr. Voorhies was convinced that the calculations were sufficiently exact to justify us in proceeding. He had examined them some time ago, with a view of informing himself. Other members might have done the same. He hoped there would be no further procrastination.

Mr. Kenner inquired what were the calculations upon the table, by which Mr. Downs, the member from Ouachita, was governed.

Mr. Downs replied that he took the result of the Presidential elections in some particular sections of Louisiana; for instance, in the second municipality frauds may have been committed, but in the northwestern portion of the State, the commission of frauds had not been even alleged. The elections were properly conducted, and the number of voters was, on the whole, an accurate guide.

Mr. Kenner said he could not consent to adopt the electoral vote of 1844 as his guide. He considered that the Presidential election was one tissue of fraud. If our recent elections are to be assumed as a basis, why not take the elections in July for State officers. There was then an election for members of the house of representatives, members to the Convention, and in some districts members of the senate. It would be certainly a much fairer standard.

Mr. Wadsworth said that the gentleman from St. James (Mr. Kenner) was wrong in estimating the elections in July as affording a proper guide. In some of the parishes they might be so considered, but in his (Mr. Wadsworth's parish) it was not a fair guide. The voters there were not called out. There was no excitement. Mr. Slidell run for congress without opposition; so did Mr. White for the senate, and I had no competitor. This is apparent from the vote given. That parish is, I am convinced, capable of giving a much heavier vote. She did so at the last Presidential election. But it is said that frauds were committed at that election. About one hundred and fifty persons came from the city of New Orleans, upon the plea that they had been unable to vote in the city, and therefore were entitled to vote in the district; and they were allowed to vote. It is said that the election was conducted with great irregularity. But it was conducted under the influence of party. It was alone sufficient that a hand and two feet should approach the ballot box, in order to be allowed the sacred right of suffrage. According to that mode of receiving votes, I might have taken down a band of Irishmen or Germans, and their votes would have been received and counted. The privilege of suffrage is too important, and too essential to the well-being of our country, to be desecrated and abused. I am in favor of the federal basis of representation, but if you adopt the principle of electors, carry out that principle, and give to each parish the number of votes to which she is really entitled by the number of her electors. If the gentleman from St. James repudiates a reference to the number of votes cast in the Presidential election, because he may consider it not an accurate guide, I object to the election of July, so far as the parish of Plaquemines is concerned. I do not claim representation for that parish upon the electoral vote of November, but I would claim it, and insist upon it as being a reference to a well authenticated list of the legal voters.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned over until Monday.

Monday, March 17, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer, by the Rev. Mr. Shaw.

Mr. Burton asked leave of absence for Mr. Penn, on account of sickness, which was accorded.

Mr. Cenas, in behalf of the committee appointed to divide the city of New Orleans into eight districts, offered a report to that effect. He remarked that it had been found extremely difficult to comply with the resolution of the Convention, and that it was almost impossible in doing it to render justice to several of the districts; for that reason they had recommended that the number be reduced to six instead of eight.

The following is the nearest approximation they can make to the instructions of the Convention to divide it into eight districts—in fact the only one which the committee would agree to:

The committee composed of the delegation of New Orleans, to whom was referred the project of a division of the city of New Orleans for the choice of representatives to the house of representatives, into eight districts, report—

That the division of the three municipalities into eight districts is inconvenient and difficult to be carried into effect, so as to secure a just and equal representation; and it is therefore recommended that the number of districts be reduced to six, each municipality being divided into two election districts.

The following division, although far from being satisfactory to the committee, is the only one, dividing the city into eight districts, upon which they have been able to agree, viz:

1st. First district—To extend from the line of the parish of Jefferson to the middle of Benjamin, Estelle and Thalia streets.

2d. Second district—To extend from the last mentioned limits to the middle of Julia street, until it strikes the New Orleans canal, and thence down said canal to the lake.

3d. Third district—To comprise the residue of the second municipality.

4th. Fourth district—To extend from the middle of canal street to the middle of St. Louis street, until it shall reach the Metairie road, thence along said road to the New Orleans canal.

5th. Fifth district—To extend from the last mentioned limits to the middle of St. Philip street, thence down said street until its intersection with the Bayou St. John, thence along the middle of said Bayou until it intersects the Metairie road, thence along said road until it reaches St. Louis street.

6th. Sixth district—To be composed of the residue of the first municipality.

7th. Seventh district—To be composed of all that portion of the third municipality above the Pontchartrain rail road.

8th. Eighth district—To be composed of all that part of the third municipality below the Pontchartrain rail road.

After this report had been read,

Mr. Cenas moved that the same and the section submitted, be laid on the table, subject to call. He was anxious that the city delegation should be present when it was discussed, and he observed many of his colleagues were absent.

Mr. Downs assured the delegate from New Orleans that he did not wish to be discourteous, but he thinks it is perfectly unnecessary to postpone this matter any longer. It is true the business of the Convention should progress, and he (Mr. D.) wants to see it. It is too much to ask that we should be kept waiting forever.

The question to lay on the tabe was then put and lost.

Mr. Voorhies then moved to take up the section and report together.

Mr. Brent moved to adopt that part of the report dividing the city into eight districts; which was carried. He then moved to lay the balance of the report on the table indefinitely; which was also carried.

Mr. Splane then moved that the sergeant-at-arms be directed to make suitable arrangements for the reception of ladies who may desire to attend the deliberations of this Convention; which motion prevailed.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The substitute of Mr. Downs to the project of Mr. Benjamin.

Mr. Mayo moved to amend that portion of the section, now the order of the day, which originally constituted the 10th section of the report made by the delegate from East Feliciana, (Judge Saunders) as chairman of the committee to apportion representation, and also all of the 11th section as it stood in said report to the word "in," in the 5th line, and to insert the following: "At the first regular session of the legislature, to be holden in the year 1847, and every tenth year thereafter, the legislature shall apportion the representation amongst the several parishes on the basis of qualified electors, to be determined by the number of legal votes polled in the several parishes at the general election for members to the general assembly, next preceding the session of the legislature; that is, to make the apportionment as above—Provided, that the apportionment be made."

Mr. Mayo stated that the only alteration proposed by the amendment, was to change the phraseology from federal population to qualified electors, which is the basis that has been adopted; and to change the mode of determining the number of electors upon which the apportionment is to be made, and to provide that instead of taking the census of voters as made by the census-taker, that the number of votes actually polled at the last preceding election shall be the guide. I think, sir, that it will be much safer to trust to the judges of election to decide who are the qualified electors, than to a single individual who may be appointed to take the census. The judges of the election will be sworn officers, and will make their decision at the elections in a public manner. They are always authorized to administer an oath to every person offering to vote, against whose vote a reasonable objection may be made, and a decision is made before the public. The census-taker on the contrary, is always liable to be operated upon by improper influences. The census is taken in private; is not accompanied by any of the solemnities that will necessarily guard the ballot boxes at the election. The decision in the event of entrusting the whole matter to the census taker, will be made by him, and not subject to revision by any other power or person. If, on the contrary, the legal votes polled be made the criterion, the whole matter, in case of fraud or error, will go before the legislature that is to make the apportionment, who can revise and correct any errors or frauds that may be found to have been committed. Under the amendment the same legislature will have to make the apportionment that would have to be made under the provision as it now stands in the section, providing that a census should be taken in the year 1846; no apportionment could be made under that census till the next year.

I repeat, therefore, that the only substantial alteration that is proposed by the amendment, is to leave the decision of the number of qualified voters to the judges of election, instead of leaving it to a census taker.

Mr. Benjamin rose to a point of order. He thinks the delegate from Catahoula (Mr. Mayo) is clearly out of order, inasmuch as the Convention had already adopted that part of the section on Saturday last.

Mr. Mayo differs with the member from New Orleans, and still considers he is in order. He regards the section as an important one, as it affects the correct phraseology of the section itself.

Mr. Downs thinks that it may be adopted, and should be for the sake of preserving consistency in the section.

The President decided that the clause was already adopted.

Mr. Mayo then moved a re-consideration of the vote taken on Saturday.

Mr. Wadsworth gave notice a few days ago that he should move a re-consideration of the vote taken on the federal basis. He found we are so much at loggerheads here, that he is now induced to call it up.

Mr. Dunn moved that to-day, at two o'clock, the vote be taken on Mr. Wadsworth's motion.

Mr. McRae thinks both these delegates are out of order, as one motion to reconsider had been made and was lost.

Mr. Voorhies agreed with Mr. McRae, that such was the fact.

The President says the whole discussion is out of order.

The question then recurred on the motion of the delegate from Catahoula, to reconsider the vote taken on Saturday, on the following amendment offered by Mr. Beatty, viz:

Sec. 10. In the year ——, and every tenth year thereafter, a census shall be made of the population of this State, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law, for the purpose of ascertaining the number of qualified electors in each parish.

Sec. 11. At the first regular session of the legislature, after the making of each census, the legislature shall apportion the representation amongst the several parishes on the basis of the qualified electors as aforesaid, and in the manner following, to wit: some number shall be chosen as a representative number, which, when applied in making the apportionment, shall give a number of representatives not less than seventy nor more than one hundred; the number so chosen shall be taken as a divisor, and each parish shall be entitled to one representative for every time this divisor shall be found in the dividend formed of its representative population, and to one additional member for every fraction exceeding the one-half of the divisor—and any parish having a number of qualified voters less than the whole divisor, but exceeding one-half of it, shall be entitled to one representative, and the legislature shall be incompetent to act on any other subject matter until the apportionment directed by this article shall have been made.

Mr. Sellers thinks that the votes taken at an election is no test of the number of qualified electors in a parish, because there may be many causes to keep people away from the polls, but that is no reason why a citizen should be deprived of any of his privileges in the right of representation. The only proper test is a correct census; and to that the legislature would have to resort to settle any disputed election they might have to decide on the electoral basis, or any other.

Mr. Beatty is of opinion that the delegate from Concordia (Mr. Sellers) is right; and if gentlemen will reflect at all on this subject, they cannot fail to arrive at the same conclusion, and that is, that the votes taken at an election are no test what persons are, or are not, qualified electors; for instance, an election takes place in a parish having one thousand qualified voters, but perhaps will not poll over one hundred, and why? because there is probably no opposition to any set of candidates who may be before the people, and therefore, all interest being lost in the election, the voters don't go near the polls; but that is no reason why they should be curtailed of any of the privileges properly belonging to them. He (Mr. Beatty) thinks also that such a system as is sought to be introduced by this amendment amounts to nothing more nor less than being a premium upon fraud, and that those who can smuggle through the largest number of voters, shall be entitled to the greatest share in the representation of the State.

Mr. Claiborne agrees with both the delegates from Concordia and Lafourche, (Messrs. Beatty and Sellars,) and he thinks the measure proposed in the amendment is the worst possible one that can be adopted; for, besides the reasons advanced by them, it is a matter of notoriety, that there is, on some occasions, in many of the parishes an excitement which brings out all the voters, while in a neighboring parish, no such cause existing, they do not one-half of them repair to the polls. Therefore that can be no criterion. Besides that, it must be borne in mind that it is opening the door to frauds of a stupendous character on the ballot box, which it is our duty most effectually to guard from pollution.

Mr. Preston differing from the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Claiborne) thinks that the motion or amendment offered by the delegate from Catahula (Mr. Mayo) is perfectly correct, and ought to be sustained; because he thinks judges of elections, regularly appointed and under oath, are more to be relied on than those who are taking the census of the State. Besides he thinks that those who do not attend at general elections should suffer in the representation of their parish; and while the judges are surrounded by close and vigilant party committees, the census-taker may, for the sake of his own party predilections, omit to take down any but those of his own way of thinking. The census taker may then stay at home and neglect his duties, without your having the power to check him in any way, or to urge him on to his work. While on the part of the judges of elections, there cannot be any danger of such neglect. But there is another question growing out of this that must not be lost sight of, viz: the expense of taking the census each year,

In short, a census never has been taken correctly in Louisiana yet. Apportionments have been made without regard to the census, and from the best information that can be laid before the legislature, they get the best criterion to go upon which they can. All census which we have had any thing to do with have been very defective; for these reasons he hopes the motion of the delegate from Catahula, (Mr. Mayo) will prevail.

Mr. Brent asked for information, in what way can a census be taken to settle the qualifications of a voter? Is the census-taker to submit them to the test of an oath? In his (Mr. Brent's) parish, Rapides, a full census never has been made.

Mr. Taylor dissents from the opinions advanced by the delegates from Rapides and Jefferson on this question, because they contend that when the year arrives that the legislature shall be called upon to apportion off the representation of the State, they are to be governed by the votes actually cast at the preceding election. If we should now establish such a principle, it will be in direct opposition to what we have already done, when we said that representation is based upon the number of "qualified electors." There is a material difference between qualified electors and those who vote; but why should we depart from the principle we have already laid down and take another rule, which is so very liable to be an improper and unjust one? No reason has yet been assigned for it, that has even the semblance of necessity for such a course. On the one side we have a rule established, which will (eventually at least, if not at the moment) secure to every citizen his just rights. On the other, you say that those rights may be taken away from him by the passing accident of the hour. Let us suppose that a tempest raged in one particular part of the State; in another, a pestilence; in another, some local indisposition on the part of the voters to attend the polls; in another, a sudden rise of water that should prevent men from going to vote however much they wanted to; and all these things have happened before, during our election. Why should we disfranchise those who might be thereby prevented from casting their suffrages in those very elections, of any of their political rights? Assuredly we ought not.

He, (Mr. Taylor) in seriously calling your attention to these things, is giving you no fancy sketch. An election held in New Orleans during the prevalence of an epidemic, or one held in Opelousas while such a fever was raging, as they have before been visited by, would certainly be no criterion as to the number of qualified electors in either place. If then the balance of the State should have polled a full vote, mark the injustice you are doing those who were unable to do so from causes beyond their control. Is it not equally clear, that when any candidate for the legislature is, as is often the case, so much esteemed and beloved by all parties and classes, that he has no opponent, that a small vote only will be cast in that parish; many of the qualified electors not deeming it requisite to attend the polls? And is it not equally clear that in every closely contested election every legal vote is put into the box; and as parties at such times are less scrupulous than at less excited moments, many illegal votes are forced into the box likewise? In the one case you diminish the representation of those who have chosen a good public servant, because there was no necessity for every man to attend the polls. And in the other, you increase the representation of those who may happen to have had an exciting election, and who have committed more or less frauds; for it is notorious, that some parishes have polled twice the number of votes on certain occasion than they were ever known to have qualified voters before, and evidently by introducing fraudulent votes; and yet these gentlemen say this is an admirable plan. They object to relying on the officers appointed to take the census, because they affirm that they will not do their duty. That is laying down premises which he (Mr. Taylor) cannot admit, for it is presumable, in the first place, that the officer will perform his duty; and in the second place, it is certain that he will have only one chance to neglect it, while people are as watchful of their rights as they are. The delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent) asks how is a census-taker to know the voters? In cases of any doubt they should have the right to swear the parties; and further, the doubt may in every case be removed, if you have two in each district who will act together. The delegate from Jefferson seems particularly to dread the expense; but that is expensive economy when we lavish money for the purpose of establishing an arbitrary rule, and hoard it up when it is wanted for a useful purpose.

Mr. Conrad remarked, that when this question was up some days ago, and when the taking of the census was adopted, he had then stated that injustice would be done in many cases; and if the taker of the census was either a careless man, or one liable to yield to improper influences, that some parishes might by chance be fairly returned, while the most of them would be returned unfairly. And yet, he (Mr. Conrad) thinks that we should not mend the matter by taking the vote taken previous to the apportionment as a guide of the number of qualified electors in each parish. The delegate from Assumption (Mr. Taylor) has clearly shewed not only the impracticability of it, but the manifest injustice there would be in adopting that plan. What course then shall we pursue between these two extremes; shall we take the one he (Mr. Conrad) has before suggested of taking the votes given at two successive elections, allowing the largest number of votes cast in each parish, as her number of qualified, or shall we establish a registry of the qualified electors? This last plan was considerably mooted here, before we knew that we were about to adopt the electoral basis. That being done, there cannot be any impropriety in renewing that plan as the least liable to objection; and certainly, nothing will be easier than to establish an office to be kept constantly open for the qualified electors to record their names. The argument used against it, when it was proposed before, was, that it would not answer as well as a census; because it would be an useless expense to keep such an office in the country parishes; for there, all the voters were known; but that it might do well enough in New Orleans. But he (Mr. Conrad) nevertheless, thinks that a registry law is a plan deserving of serious consideration.

Mr. Claiborne remarked, in reply to what had fallen from the honorable delegate from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) in relation to the danger to be apprehended from a census-taker lending himself to suit party purposes by alone taking down the names of those only who favored the party to which he was attached; that he conceived the argument would apply directly the reverse to what he had intended it to do. As on the contrary, if the party to which he belonged had the ascendancy in any particular parish, the census-taker would get down as many names as possible, in order to increase the representation of that parish, and thereby as much as possible to increase the political power of his party. Besides, if one census-taker cannot be trusted, let three be appointed; and let all three be made to swear to the whole work—then there would not likely to be either favoritism or neglect.

Mr. Brent moved to amend the motion of the delegate from Catahoula (Mr. Mayo) by substituting the words "the two last elections" instead of "the last election," which motion to amend was accepted by Mr Mayo. The question was then put on the motion of the delegate from Catahoula, to reconsider the vote of Saturday, and decided as follows:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, and Wederstrandt—26 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Ledoux, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Winchester, and Winder—28 nays; consequently the motion was lost.

Mr. Wadsworth again called for a reconsideration of the vote on the federal basis, but withdrew it immediately.

Mr. Brent then moved the adoption of all the remainder of the substitute after the 41st line, apportioning all the other parishes except New Orleans.

Mr. Beatty opposed it, because he has serious objections to the apportionment submitted in the project before us. In the first place, it is unequal and unjust—and in the second, it is based on the votes given in 1844, when it is well known that a large quantity of illegal votes were polled in several of the parishes, and therefore that is no criterion for us to rely upon. There can be no excuse for us to punish those who have not violated the law, for the purpose of rewarding those who have. It would be far better to postpone the apportionment in toto, until the census be taken in 1845. From what we can gather from the secretary of State's office, it is very likely that in three or four weeks we shall have sufficient returns made to warrant us in making, with the proof before us, a fair and equitable apportionment, and therefore he (Mr. Beatty) would suggest that the whole subject be laid on the table, subject to call.

That the Convention may know the grounds of my opposition to the report, I would state that I have carefully examined the census of 1841 with that of election returns of 1844, and I find such a material variance that I can hardly persuade myself it is possible; but taking the census of 1841 as being the most likely to be correct, I find that if we take the number of voters in St. Charles as the minimum to allow one representative: Jefferson will be entitled to two representatives instead of three, which is given to her in the project before us; and that Lafourche Interior is entitled to three instead of two. What then constitutes the great difference between Lafourche Interior and the other parishes who have suddenly swelled their numbers? Lafourche Interior has been increasing in population constantly and steadily. The real truth is, that the judges of the election have there scrupulously performed their duty according to law.

The parish of East Baton Rouge is allowed three, when she is only entitled to two; and Natchitoches is allowed four, although that parish has been several times divided since the census was taken, by which she was only entitled to two. And all the other parishes are to have at least one. For these reasons he asks the delay he does in this matter, in sufficiently good season before we adjourn to act with some data on which we can rely, and on which we can make a fair and just apportionment. He hopes, therefore, the motion of the delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent) will not prevail; for if we are to continue this subject now, he shall move to take up the parishes regularly, one by one.

Mr. Wadsworth remarked that the only fair way to settle this question would be, first to establish the basis, and then give to each parish what she is justly entitled to, according to the certificate of the assessor of the parish, who is, by law, required to furnish it to the secretary of State. He feels convinced that it would operate unjustly to take the vote of 1844 for a guide in the present apportionment; for he knows, himself, that there were some 130 to 150 voters who went down to the parish of Plaquemines, from New Orleans, and who voted there.

The assessor's return is the nearest approach to truth we can come. He held in his hand the return of that officer, for the parish of Plaquemines, deposited in the secretary of State's office, on the 26th of February last, by which it appeared that that parish contained within her limits 926 legal voters. Mr. Moreau, the assessor, he knows well, and he knows him to be a man of probity and honor.

Mr. Conrad thinks it would be better to have a special committee appointed, to make the apportionment among the several parishes; and he trusts the delegate from Lafourche will accede to the suggestion. That committee will have an opportunity to examine all the returns that have, or will be shortly made, and will have many opportunities of arriving at facts, that a single individual could not.

Mr. Brent hoped the matter would not be procrastinated any more; we had it before us now for nearly five weeks, and it was truly time to do something with it. The project before us is as nearly correct as it is possible to come at. And as for the census of 1841, that is no way to be relied on, for it represents the parish of Rapides as containing 450 voters, when it is, to his knowledge, that there are over 1000. Some object to one starting point, some to another; we cannot expect that all should be satisfied, and he (Mr. Brent) thinks if we are not now prepared, we never shall be.

Mr. Conrad remarked that the only way of allaying discussion is the one he proposed, viz: to appoint a committee to get the proper information, and report to the Convention, while we proceed with some other subject.

Mr. Taylor agrees entirely with the delegate from New Orleans, and hopes the member from Lafourche will accept it as a substitute for his motion. He thinks there is a peculiar propriety in it, for we have adopted, finally, the general principle on which representation is to be based, and it only now remains to make the calculation, to allow to each parish that to which she is fairly entitled. If the gentleman from Lafourche accepts, he will vote for the appointment of a committee.

Mr. Downs is totally opposed to it—it will do no good. It was referred to a committee at Jackson; that report was rejected; then to a congressional committee, then to a sub-committee, in order to get the information. The delegate from Lafourche, himself, made that report. The apportionment now proposed in the substitute is taken on the same figures as reported by him. Still we are in the dark. How long are we to postpone it? The subject has been before us more than two months, and every time we come near a settlement of it, off they fly on some new track. We had far better go home, and tell our constituents to send some body else here to do it, for we cannot.

We must take the best facts we can, if we are going to do any thing—we cannot do impossibilities. If we approximate as near to what is right, as the facts and figures warrant us in doing, no one can accuse us of injustice. Suppose some injustice may be done at first, a new apportionment will be made in 1846, and then all the faults will be before the legislature at their first session, who can make a more reasonable apportionment if this be found defective. The new constitution besides, is not likely to go into operation until after 1846.

It is necessary for us to provide some rule for our government. Shall we stay here two or three weeks waiting for information? For his part, he protests against delay. Among all the projects before us, this is the only one based on the principle we have adopted; and he thinks we are as well prepared now as we ever shall be. A motion to postpone is tantamount to saying that we cannot get along with it at all.

Mr. Voorhies agrees with the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) and he thinks if that motion prevail we had better adjourn sine die.

Mr. Conrad remarked that the object was not delay, but dispatch. He asked the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) whether the apportionment submitted by him and now before the house, was all calculated from the table reported to us by the committee?

Mr. Downs: Yes, all but the parish of Plaquemines and the second municipality; he made these exceptions, and has always said so.

Mr. Mayo remarked that as some gentlemen had made the same inquiry on Saturday; it was surprising they had not taken the trouble to examine. To any one, conversant with figures, it would not take over an hour to examine the whole of it.

Mr. Beatty agrees as to the calculations. The only question is, whether the votes of 1844 are to be taken as the basis of calculation. He would test that, by moving to refer to a special committee composed of one member from each congressional district, that part of the section fixing the number of representatives to each parish; and the yeas and nays being called for—

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Guion, Hudspeth, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder, voted in the affirmative—25 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, King, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prudhomme, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Voorhies, Waddill and Wederstrandt, voted in the negative—30 nays; the motion was lost.

The apportionment of the city of New Orleans was suspended for the consideration of the Orleans delegation.

Mr. Benjamin then moved a division of the question, so as to take the vote on each parish separately.

The secretary then read the following apportionments, which were adopted:

The Parish of	Plaquemines,	2
"	St. Bernard,	1
"	Jefferson,	3
"	St. Charles,	1
"	St. John the Baptist,	1
"	St. James,	2
"	Ascension,	2
"	Assumption,	2

When he read the number allotted to Lafourche Interior as two—

Mr. Beatty moved to insert three instead of two, as she was fully entitled to that number on every principle of equality.

Mr. Guion seconds the motion of his colleauge, (Mr. Beatty.) He contends that great injustice is done to the parish of Lafourche Interior, in allowing her only two members, when she is clearly entitled to three. She has 800 voters under the present constitution, (usually polls about 700 votes) and when universal suffrage shall be in operation, she will give 1200. Why, then accord her but two, when Rapides is allowed four, when, from the admission of her own delegate, (Mr. Brent) there are not over, or but a fraction over 1000?

Mr. Brent replied that Rapides usually polled 900 votes. By referring to the statement he finds Lafourche Interior is not entitled to more than two on any basis.

Mr. Guion stated that it clearly showed the injustice of the project before us. As his colleague (Mr. Beatty) has stated, no one is allowed to vote in Lafourche Interior but those who are beyond dispute entitled to do so, under the strictest construction of the law. To so rigid a rule does the parish judge adhere, that he refused to suffer a citizen to vote who had removed out of that parish into the parish of Jefferson for a period of three months only; he was not entitled to vote in Jefferson, and like a good citizen, who wanted to do his duty to his country, he went to Lafourche, thinking he would of course have a right to vote there, but the judge refused him under the strict letter of the law, because he was not a citizen of the parish. Now, if he (Mr. Guion) is correctly informed, a kind of universal suffrage in the north-western parishes prevails; he knows that it was the case in Natchitoches, where the only question asked was, "are you a resident of Natchitoches?" and he presumes it is so, as he has heard it is in the other parishes.

The parish of Lafourche is clearly entitled to three members.

Mr. Dunn is disposed to vote for giving three members to the parish of Lafourche. She always had three, in a house of sixty members under the old constitution. By reference to the table before us, he finds that she has a free white population of 3986, which is as large a population as that of East Feliciana; she is allowed three, and he thinks but just to allow three also to Lafourche.

Mr. Guion wished to call the attention of the Convention to the fact, that Lafourche has a free white population of 3986, while Rapides has only 3243, nearly 800 difference; what justice is there in this? Where are the votes to come from, if they get them with a less population? The idea is preposterous.

Mr. Brent remarked that the project we are now discussing, is based on the vote of 1844; the electoral basis is what we have determined on, and from the shewing of the delegate from Lafourche himself, (Mr. Beatty) she is clearly not entitled to more than two representatives, on any basis, and yet she modestly claims three. It will be time enough to talk about Rapides, when it comes to her turn. On what do they found their pretensions?

Mr. Guion: On our population.

Mr. Brent: How can that be when Rapides gave nearly twice as many votes in 1844, as Lafourche?

Mr. Guion: The system of universal suffrage is prevalent in the north-west parishes.

Mr. Beatty: What he (Mr. B.) complained of was this, that on none of the basis were they willing to allow Lafourche more than two; but there would have been a vast difference between two out of seventy-seven and two out of ninety-seven. What is the reason why Natchitoches, which parish has been split up into several, should be entitled to four, when she had only two under the old apportionment. This is an unfair rule; for it is not shewn that her population is double that of Lafourche, and without people you cannot have voters. It only shows more clearly the injustice of taking the vote of 1844 as a proper basis to start from.

Mr. Downs thought it could be accounted for in this way: Lafourche Interior joins Terrebonne, and consequently when the large fraction over the 276 (the number fixed on) was in favor of Terrebonne more than the small one was in favor of Lafourche, it was thought more just to give it to Terrebonne; and moreover contiguous as they are, and with the same interests, he thought it the fairest way to settle it, being regarded almost as one.

Mr. GUION does not understand that logic. What has Lafourche to do with Terrebonne? She is entitled to two members, and she has got them; but that does not satisfy Lafourche Interior, who is deprived of one she is entitled.

The question was then taken on the motion offered by Mr. Beatty, to strike out "two" and insert "three," and resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—32 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill, and Wederstrandt, voted in the negative—26 nays; the motion was carried. So that the section now reads "the parish of Lafourche Interior shall be entitled to three members."

Mr. WADSWORTH moved for the reconsideration of the vote given on the adoption of the representation of the parish of Plaquemines. He said that the reason which induced him to make the motion, was, that upon mature reflection he found that the parish of Plaquemines was justly entitled to three representatives. When the paper was first handed to him which he read to this house, (it was while he was addressing the Convention) the number taken as the basis, 276, had not occurred to his mind; but the subsequent debate, and the manner in which the Convention had met the just claims of Lafourche Interior, had called his attention again to the certificate of the assessor of his parish. In that he says, under oath, that there are 926 legal voters in the parish of Plaquemines. I do not want (said Mr. Wadsworth) to go to the election of 1844 at all, but I refer to my proof, which is certified by the secretary of State; well then, having 926 voters in our parish, we are clearly entitled to three representatives. I ask for nothing but justice at your hands, and it is with the Convention to say whether my constituents are to get it.

The question was then put, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Briant, Carriere, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Culbertson, Derbes, Eustis, Guion, Ledoux, Legendre, Leonard, Marigny, Porche, Pugh, St. Amand, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill, Wadsworth and Winchester voted in the affirmative—23 yeas; and

Messrs. Benjamin, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porter, Prudhomme, Read, Roman, Roselius, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Voorhies and Wederstrandt voted in the negative—38 nays; said motion was therefore lost.

Mr. WADSWORTH remarked, that was making fish out of one and flesh out of another, with a vengeance; and he solemnly protests against such a flagrant act of injustice and oppression.

Mr. TAYLOR moved for the reconsideration of the vote giving two representatives to the parish of Assumption. Upon examining more clearly, he, as had the delegate from Plaquemines, discovered that the parish of Assumption was fairly entitled to three members. The population of Lafourche Interior was three thousand nine hundred and eighty-six, that of Assumption four thousand one hundred and toree, about one thousand more than that of Rapides. Upon every principle of justice then she is entitled to it.

Mr. BRENT replied, that he held to the basis which the Convention were acting upon, the vote of 1844, and therefore should oppose it.

The qustion was then put and resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Guion, Ledoux, Legendre, Leonard, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—27 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prudhomme, Read, Roselius, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the negative—31 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

The Convention then adopted the following representation.

For the parish of	Terrebonne,	2
"	Iberville,	2
"	West Baton Rouge,	1

When the parish of East Baton Rouge was called, and three representatives were named,

Mr. Winchester moved to strike out "three" and insert "two."

Mr. Read claimed three upon every principle of fairness; he remarked that at the election in November they had polled seven hundred and twenty-six votes, and no frauds had been committed, as he was prepared to shew, by the certificate of Judge Tepin and L. C. Morris, now sheriff of the parish.

Mr. Wadsworth sees that this Convention is disposed to do great injustice to his parish—they forget right because they have might. He regards the whole matter as a struggle for political power, and the higher you go up the river the more liberal you become.

Mr. Benjamin wants to make one remark before he gives his vote. From the published statement he feels satisfied that East Baton Rouge is entitled to three representatives, and so feeling, no political loss or gain can induce him to vote against a measure which is so plainly and clearly just. He shall therefore vote against the motion to strike out.

Mr. Winchester was desirous of knowing why the Convention was clothed with such a power as it seems they were about to use. You refuse justice to the parish of Assumption, and grant it to East Baton Rouge. Certainly the one is as much entitled to it as the other.

Mr. Porter remarked that it would be singular indeed, if we were to allow three members to Lafourche Interior, with six hundred and twenty-five voters, and refuse the same number to East Baton Rouge, with seven hundred and twenty-six voters.

Mr. Taylor took this occasion to say, that although the parish of Assumption had been treated with great injustice, he should not be governed by any spirit of retaliation, but should the more tenaciously cling to a fair and just cause, and he should vote against striking out, firmly convinced that East Baton Rouge was entitled to three members.

The question was then put on Mr. Winchester's motion to strike out "three" and insert "two," and the yeas and nays being called for resulted as follows:

Messrs. Bourg, Conrad of Jefferson, Legendre, Leonard, Mazureau, Roman, St. Amand, Sellers and Winchester voted in the affirmative—9 yeas; and Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Humble, Hynson, King, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prudhomme, Pugh, Read, Roselius, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt and Winder voted in the negative—49 nays; consequently the motion was lost, and the representation of said parish of East Baton Rouge was fixed at three representatives.

On motion the representation of the parish of West Feliciana was fixed at two representatives.

On motion the representation of the parish of East Feliciana was fixed at three representatives.

On motion the representation of the parish of St. Helena was fixed at one representative.

The parish of Livingston to be entitled to one representative.

Mr. McRae moved to amend the representation of the parish of Livingston, by inserting "two" instead of "one" representative. The yeas and nays being called for,

Mr. McRae claimed two representatives as being justly due to Livingston; and when her vote of 1844 is considered, she is entitled to it. The question was put, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Dunn, Garrett, Hudspeth, McRae, Porche and Saunders voted in the affirmative—6 yeas; and Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cenas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Guion, Humble, Hynson, King, Ledoux, Legendre, Leonard, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo. Mazureau, Peets, Porter, Prudhomme, Pugh, Read, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—53 nays; consequently the motion was lost, and the representation of the parish of Livingston was fixed at one representative.

On motion the representation of the pariah of Washington was fixed at one representative.

Mr. Lewis then desired to call the attention of the Convention to the great injustice which had been done to the parish of Assumption, and moved to reconsider his vote on that question. He said it was passing strange that justice should be denied to a parish in her representation which had more population, and consequently more actual voters, than the parishes of Lafourche and East Baton Rouge; which, with less numbers, and less actual voters, the Convention had decided should be entitled to three votes each, while Assumption is cut down to two. There is a manifest injustice in it—and it is proper for us to reflect seriously before we let it go any further.

Mr. Porter said that Lafourche had got one too many, but we ought not to continue to do wrong, which we should do if we went on in this way; and more particularly when we have agreed to take the vote of 1844 as a basis, on which representation shall primarily be made.

Mr. Mayo is opposed to a reconsideration, unless when it is done we reconsider the vote allowing three members to Lafourche; for although he admits that it was wrong to give Lafourche three members, it must, nevertheless, be borne in mind that two wrongs do not make one right.

Mr. Lewis being reminded by Mr. Garrett that one reconsideration had already been had on this question, withdrew his motion.

The Convention then, on motion, proceeded to fix the representation of St. Tammany—it was accorded one vote.

The question then was on allowing the parish of Pointe Coupée one vote, but

Mr. Ledoux moved to amend the same by inserting "two" instead of "one" representative. He remarked that it was natural to suppose that a parish with two thousand of white population should be entitled to at least two representatiens; more particularly when the position of the inhabitants of the parish is taken into consideration, and how they are situated towards each other. The two thickly populated parts of the parish are the upper and the lower; the lower part is peopled entirely by the French, or creoles descended from them—the upper part by Americans. They seldom see each other, and have but little identity of interest or feeling. Taking then into view the peculiar geographical position of the parish, with a front on the Mississippi river eighty miles in length, and further, the well known fact that the Americans have no chance to be heard in the legislature while the interests of the lower part of the parish are antagonistical to theirs he thinks the Convention ought in justice, looking at the same time to the amount of her population, to allow her two representatives.

Mr. Brent opposed it, on the ground that we are proceeding on the electoral vote of 1844, and that she is not entitled to two representatives under that rule, having only polled three hundred and forty-nine votes.

Mr. Burton remarked, that if that motion prevails, he should also offer one to increase the representation for St. Helena and Livingston, for there were several French settlements in those parishes which came under the same rule.

The question was then put, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Dunn, Guion, Ledoux, Legendre, Marigny, Porche, Pugh, Saunders, Taylor of Assumption and Wederstrandt voted in favor of said motion—10 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Leonard, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Prudhomme, Read, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Winchester and Winder voted against the motion—47 nays; consequently the same was lost, and the representation of the said parish of Point Coupée was fixed at one representative

The representation of the following parishes were then fixed as follows:

The Parish of	Concordia,	1
"	Carroll,	1
"	Franklin,	1
"	St. Martin,	3
"	Lafayette,	2
"	Calcasieu,	1
"	Tensas,	1
"	Madison,	1
"	St. Mary,	2
"	Vermillion,	1
"	St. Landry,	5
"	Avoyelles,	2

The parish of Rapides being called, and four representatives being proposed to be allowed her—

Mr. Taylor moved to strike out the word "four" and insert "two."

Mr. Brent opposed the motion. He contends it would be unjust in the highest degree to deprive the parish of Rapides of the number of representatives which she is justly entitled to, under the basis established, and the rule adopted, to take the vote of 1844 as the ground-work of calculation. By reference to the table he finds that she is entitled to four representatives, for she has an excess over one-half of forty, while Baton Rouge has only an excess of thirty-seven over the half; if it be just to her, it is certainly also just to Rapides.

The basis fixed is the electoral—take that and the vote of 1844, and she is fully entitled to four representatives. But let us even take the census of 1841, or the votes of 1840; St. Landry had then but three, now she has five; St. Martin had but two, now she has three. What is fair for one is fair for both. We have heard of no charge of fraud in the vote of Rapides, and she cast one thousand and six votes in 1844. To deprive her then of her just rights under the basis and the rule of computation that we have established, would be unjust and tyranical.

Mr. Taylor said he agreed with him that that which was fair for one was fair for both; and this Convention had negatived the principle for which he was contending, viz: the computation of the vote of 1844.

He (Mr. Brent) says that we have established that as a rule, but he (Mr. Taylor) denies that the Convention has done any such thing; on the contrary, they have repudiated it. There is no more unjust principle that could be established. Adopt that, and you deprive honesty of its proper weight, and you hold out a premium on fraud. Although he will not say that he knows of any fraud in Rapides, still the principle which those gentlemen support, is a bad one. The only real evidence before this Convention is the United States census of 1840. In that we find the figures call for eight hundred and eighty-eight, over twenty-one years of age in Assumption a population much more stationary than Rapides has, and principally made up of old settlers, and more steady than they are in new countries; while in Rapides in 1840 the whole number of males did not exceed one thousand and two, over twenty years of age. If Assumption then is only entitled to two representatives, having a population over twenty-one years of age, by what rule of arithmetic can he make out that Rapides is entitled to four. In Rapides parish they voted some three or four more than they had in 1840, counting all the whites over twenty-one. There has been no more emigration to Rapides than there has been to Assumption, and if the census were taken to-morrow, our white population would fall but little, if any, short of theirs.

Why then, he (Mr. Taylor) asks; is it pretended that four representatives are asked for one thousand and two white male citizens over twenty years of age, when only two is allowed to eight hundred and eighty-eight?

For these reasons he presses his motion to amend the substitute, but as he thinks it nothing but fair to allow her three representatives instead of two, as previously moved by him, he now moves to amend his first motion, and insert "three" instead of "four."

Mr. WADSWORTH complained bitterly as to the course of injustice pursued towards Plaquemines. He asked if it was not strange that his parish had polled one thousand and forty-four votes in November, and Rapides one thousand and six—should not she be allowed three, on the very principle that they themselves claim four?

He regards it as a species of greediness on their part, to ask four for themselves and refuse us three; and when you talk to them about it, they say, oh! we go upon principle! Peculiarly honest souls! They will do right until the shoe pinches them. Why should Rapides have more than Plaquemines asks; he (Mr. Wadsworth) does not suppose that they made any extraordinary efforts to keep out votes; and she has no right to ask four representatives while he holds the certificate that Plaquemines contains nine hundred and twenty-six voters, and is refused more than two.

Mr. BRENT contends that under any basis you please, except the total white population, she is entitled to four representatives. He asks nothing more for her than what she is entitled to. He contends that her total population is double that of Assumption. And why is it doubled. Were the votes polled in Rapides in 1844 fraudulent? You have nothing to offer in proof but your own mere supposition. He (Mr. Brent) presents facts against presumption; and as it would be unjust and unfair to reduce the number from four to three, he hopes the motion will not prevail.

The question was then put, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows: yeas 35, nays 24; consequently said motion was carried, and the parish of Rapides had three representatives allotted to her.

The next parish in order was Natchitoches, to whom the report gave four members.

Mr. GUION moved to strike out four and insert three. He remarked, we have no correct data here as to what her actual population is, because they have divided the parish since the last census into several parishes. But from the best information he can get she cannot be entitled to more than three representatives.

Mr. BRAZEALE thought that would be unjust, because it was to his knowledge, that she had a population of at least 14,000, and polled at the last election 1100 votes. Under the rule we have been acting on, she is clearly entitled to four representatives.

Mr. BRENT took the same view of the question as Mr. Brazeale, and contended she was entitled to four representatives, although he supposes they shall have to submit to whatever the Convention chooses to do.

Mr. CONRAD: Looking at the vote of Sabine (638) thought, that parish must contain more than one-third of what was formally Natchitoches; and if so, even under the rule which gentlemen press, she could not be entitled to more than three representatives.

Mr. VOORHIES thinks Mr. Conrad is in error, and that from the rule adopted of taking the vote of 1844, to start upon, she was entitled to four representatives.—When he voted before on the subject of Plaquemines, that question had not been raised.

The question was then put, on Mr. Guion's motion, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows: Yeas 33, and nays 26, so the motion was carried, and Natchitoches is entitled to three members.

Mr. BRENT gave notice that he should move a reconsideration of the vote allowing five members to St. Landry, to-morrow morning. And then, on motion, the Convention adjourned till to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

TUESDAY, March 18, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. BEATTY opened the proceedings with prayer.

Mr. VOORHIES presented the following as an additional provision to the section upon the qualifications of electors, inhibiting persons of unsound mind, paupers, non-commissioned officers in the service of the United States, soldiers, &c., from suffrage; which resolution was ordered to be printed.

Mr. READ offered a resolution requiring that the reports of the Convention be published in the "Jeffersonian Republican" daily, and instructing the committee on contingent expenses to allow such sum as may cover the expense incurred in bringing up the back reports.

The question was divided. The first resolution was lost—yeas 25, nays 33; as follows:

Messrs. Benjamin, Brazeale, Brent, Carriere, Cénas, Downs, Dunn, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill and Wederstrandt—24 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Briant, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Porche, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Sellers, Stephens, Trist, Voorhies, Wadsworth and Winchester—30 nays.

The second branch of the resolution was then laid on the table.

Mr. GARRETT asked the use of the hall of the Convention to-morrow evening, to enable Mr. Hardinge to deliver a free lecture on Mnemotechny. Laid on the table.

The Convention then resumed the consideration of the apportionment bill. The following parishes were apportioned; Plaquemines 2, Caddo 1, De Soto 1, Ouachita 1, Morehouse 1, Union 1.

Mr. GARRETT moved to allow Union two representatives instead of one, as according to the votes polled at the last presidential election she was entitled to this number.

This was opposed by Messrs. Benjamin and Brent.

Mr. DOWNS explained that he had put Union down for one representative, because a portion of her voters had been recently taken from her by the creation of the new parish of Jackson, which latter parish had been allowed one member.

The question was taken on allowing Union two members, and Mr. Garrett called for the yeas and nays.

Messrs. Downs, Garrett, Humble and McCallop—4 yeas.

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Dunn, Garcia, Guion, Hudspeth, Hynson, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, McRae, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porter, Prudhomme, Pugh, Read, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder—54 nays.

Mr. MILES TAYLOR moved to strike out "two," and insert "one."

Mr. MAYO contended that Catahoula had a large fixed population, and the increase for the last few years was greater than the number taken from the parish, in creating the parish of Franklin.

Mr. DOWNS sustained the claims of Catahoula to two representatives. She was undoubtedly entitled to that representation.

Mr. MILES TAYLOR withdrew his motion upon the statements of the two gentlemen.

Mr. BENJAMIN said, before acquiescing in the pretensions of Claiborne to two representatives, he would inquire of the delegate from that parish, whether a certain portion had not been cut off to form new parishes.

Mr. PEETS stated, that a small strip, containing only a few inhabitants, had been taken off to form the parish of Jackson. The increase in the parish of Claiborne of population, entitled her clearly to an additional representative.

Mr. DOWNS bore testimony from his knowledge of the parish, of the facts stated by Mr. Peets.

Two representatives were accorded to Claiborne.

Mr. WADSWORTH then moved to reconsider the vote on the representation of Plaquemines. Mr. Wadsworth contended, that according to a recent census taken by Mr. Moreau, assessor of the parish, there were nine hundred and twenty-six voters in Plaquemines, and that therefore taking the divisor of two hundred and seventy-six, which had been agreed upon, she was entitled to three representatives.

The motion to reconsider was carried.

Mr. VOORHIES moved to strike out "two," and insert "three."

The yeas and nays were called for.

Mr. WEDERSTRANDT stated, that yesterday he voted in error; having subsequently examined the subject fully, he was happy that the opportunity was offered him to correct the error. He is always open to conviction, and ready to correct any error that he may have been led into, and cheerfully awards to Plaquemines her just representation.

Mr. C. M. Conrad went into an exposition of the reasons why he would vote in the negative. He said that according to the census of 1840, the parish of Plaquemines had an entire population of but thirteen hundred and fifty souls. It was impossible, within four years, for her population to increase so fast as to enable her to give nine hundred and twenty-six votes, as she did at the last presidential election. It was notorious that great frauds had been perpetrated upon the right of suffrage in that parish.

Mr. Wadsworth denied the right of the gentleman (Mr. Conrad) to argue the question after the call for the yeas and nays. But inasmuch as he had been permitted to do so, I will (said Mr. W.) reply to his mere inferences. The gentleman has no right to argue upon the returns of the election at the presidential campaign in the parish of Plaquemines. I know full well that it is subjected to the imputation of fraudulent voting. I do not ask the Convention to apportion the representation upon that result; but I come here armed with an official certificate from the assessor of taxes, a sworn officer of the State, and upon that certificate—not upon my own statements, although great weight has been attached to the statements of other gentlemen in reference to the qualified voters in their parish,—I ask that simple justice may be done to those I have the honor in part of representing. The gentleman (Mr. Conrad) may say what he pleases about frauds being perpetrated in Plaquemines, but all that he may say will not invalidate nor affect the weight of a certificate of an officer of the State under oath, who as the assessor of taxes, makes a statement that must be conclusive, as to the representation which is due to the parish of Plaquemines, in accordance with the basis adopted by the Convention.

The question was taken upon allowing Plaquemines three representatives, and the yeas and nays were called for.

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Leonard, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prudhomme, Pugh, Read, W. B. Scott, T. W. Scott, T. B. Scott, Splane, M. Taylor, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth and Wikoff—33 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Cade, Cenas, Claiborne, C. M. Conrad, Dunn, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Roman, St. Amand, Sellers and Stephens—23 nays.

Mr. Brent said that he had given notice, that he would move for a reconsideration of the vote, according to the parish of St. Landry five representatives. I am satisfied however, Mr. President, (said he) from a subsequent examination, that her claim to five representatives, is as just as the claim of Rapides and Natchitoches to four representatives each; and as I design to press the claims of the two latter parishes, I will withdraw my motion to reconsider the vote upon the parish of St. Landry, and appeal to the course pursued towards that parish, for a reconsideration of the vote, awarding but three representatives to each of the parishes of Rapides and Natchitoches.

I trust that this Convention is not so far governed by prejudice, as to shut its eyes against the light of truth. For the parish which I in part represent, I have no favors to ask. I only demand for her strict and impartial justice. If principles have been established, if fixed rules have been adopted by this Convention, I have only to request, that her representation may be awarded to her in conformity with those rules. No matter what test may be applied, the parishes of Rapides and Natchitoches are more justly entitled to four representatives each, than is the parish of St. Landry to five representatives.

The census of 1840 informs us, that the white population of St. Landry and Calcasieu combined, amounts to eight thousand five hundred and twenty-eight souls. The white population of Rapides and Natchitoches amounts to ten thousand two hundred and eighty-five—there being an excess in favor of Rapides and Natchitoches of one thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven, the disproportion on the part of the entire population, black and white, is still greater. The entire population of St. Landry and Calcasieu is seventeen thousand two hundred and ninety, whereas the entire population of Rapides and Natchitoches is twenty-eight thousand four hundred and eighty-two, the excess being in this instance eleven thousand one hundred and ninety-two. And yet this Convention has decided, that the two former parishes are to be equal in representation to the later—that is to say, six representatives have been allowed to St. Landry and Calcasieu, and only six to Rapides and Natchitoches. I would ask gentlemen if there is in this apportionment the remotest semblance of justice?

I have examined these statistics, not because we are to be governed in the apportionment of representation by the population, either black or white, or both combined, but because this Convention, so far, appears to have been governed by any other basis than that which has been established by the solemn vote of this body. I wish to show that, no matter what basis be determined on, an equal and uniform representation has not been awarded to the two parishes of Rapides and Natchitoches.

But let us proceed farther. The Convention has decided that the basis of representation shall be the qualified electors of the State. It has decided that two hundred and seventy-six shall be the representative number in the present apportionment; and that any parish having two hundred and seventy-six voters, shall be entitled to one representative. It has also further decided, that any parish having a fraction of one-half, over and above the representative number, shall be entitled to an additional representative. Accordingly, a few moments since, the parish of East Baton Rouge was allowed three members, she having polled seven hundred and twenty-four votes at the last presidential election, two representatives having been allowed to her for five hundred and fifty-two votes, the double of the representative number; and one representative for a fraction of one hundred and seventy-two votes over and above that number. It will be recollected that in making this apportionment, the presidential vote of 1844 was expressly referred to, and taken by general consent as the test, by which the number of voters should be ascertained. I now claim for the parishes of Rapides and Natchitoches the benefit of that rule, which was deliberately established in the case of East Baton Rouge.

Governed by this test, what will be the representation that should be awarded to the parish of Rapides? She polled at the presidential election of 1844, one thousand and five votes. The representative number of two hundred and seventy-six, will divide this three times, and leave a fraction of one hundred and seventy-eight, larger by six than the fraction upon which the parish of East Baton Rouge was allowed an additional representative. The claims of the parish of Natchitoches are still stronger—she polled eleven hundred and two votes. The representative number will divide this three times, and leave a fraction of two hundred and seventy-four votes. She lacks but two votes of having her full quota for four representatives; yet you have given the parish of East Baton Rouge an additional representative for a fraction of one hundred and seventy-two, and you have refused Rapides a representative for a fraction of one hundred and seventy-eight, and Natchitoches a representative for a fraction of two hundred and seventy-four. The Convention may call this equality and uniformity, but the people will hardly give it that designation.

But there is a still more striking and glaring inequality in the case of the Opelousas representation. The parishes of St. Landry and Calcasieu, polled together, at the last presidential election, one thousand five hundred and twenty-seven votes. The united vote of Rapides and Natchitoches was two thousand one hundred and seven, exceeding by five hundred and eighty, the vote of St. Landry and Calcasieu. Yet you have given six representatives to the two former parishes, and six to the two latter. The five hundred and eighty voters in Rapides and Natchitoches have no representative, although they have the full quota for two additional representatives, and a fraction of twenty-eight over and above. Now mark the injustice. The parish of Lafourche Interior, polling but six hundred and eight votes, twenty-eight votes more than the excedent of theRapides and Natchitoches vote, over the St. Landry vote, has been awarded three representatives. Five hundred and eighty voters in Rapides and Natchitoches are not honored with a solitary representative; but six hundred and eight voters in Lafourche are worthy of three representatives. Of what material are the men of Lafourche made, that such an extraordinary preference should be manifested towards them by this Convention? What a mockery of that principle of equality, which has been assumed as the basis of representation; and what rank and flagrant injustice and oppression!

But it may be urged that the parish of Sabine once formed a portion of the parish of Natchitoches, and that two representatives have been granted to her. This is true, but how does it affect the case? Let us see. The parish of Sabine gave, at the last presidential election, six hundred and thirty-eight votes. If we add these to the two thousand one hundred and seven votes, cast by the parishes of Rapides and Natchitoches, we have a total of two thousand seven hundred and forty-five votes. The number of representatives awarded to these three parishes is eight, to-wit: two to Sabine, three to Rapides and three to Natchitoches. Let us now see what was the total number of votes cast in St. Landry, Calcasieu and Lafourche Interior, and compare them with the votes of the three parishes just named. Calcasieu and St. Landry gave one thousand five hundred and twenty-seven votes; Lafourche Interior six hundred and eight—making a total of two thousand one hundred and thirty-five. And yet to these two thousand one hundred and thirty-five voters, you have apportioned nine representatives, to-wit: five to St. Landry, one to Calcasieu and three to Lafourche; whereas you have conceded only eight representatives to two thousand seven hundred and forty-five voters. Is not this equality and uniformity with a vengeance? The men in Rapides, Natchitoches and Sabine appear not to have found as much favor in the eyes of this Convention as the men residing on Lafourche and in the prairies of Opelousas. Two thousand seven hundred and forty-five freemen in the valley of Red River, are only entitled to eight representatives; but a number of six hundred and ten less, in other quarters of the State, are entitled to nine representatives. The Louisiana Convention will truly make itself distinguished in the eyes of its constituency, for its impartiality, its justice, and its very correct and conscientious regard for the rights of others.

Sir, has reason lost its sway; have truth and justice been thrown to the winds; and will this Convention persist in inflicting a grievous wrong upon two of the sister parishes of this State? I ask gentlemen to pause and not consummate the foul injustice of this iniquitous apportionment.—You have made a donation, a free-will offering, of one representative to Lafourche, to which she is not entitled—for she has but a fraction of fifty-six, after giving her two members, and yet you deny Rapides a member for a fraction of one hundred and seventy-eight, and Natchitoches a member for a fraction of two hundred and seventy-four. If you choose to be bountiful and generous, do not be unjust. If you are determined to shower favors upon Lafourche, do not rob and filch Rapides and Natchitoches of their just representation. We are too proud to ask any boon at the hands of this Convention. We only demand exact and rigorous justice. If I have used strong language, the provocation has been great and the injustice crying.

If the presidential vote of 1844 is to be the criterion in apportioning the representation to some of the parishes, it should govern as to all, unless there is a well founded suspicion that the election has been fraudulently and illegally conducted. No suspicion that I am aware of, rests upon my parish; and why should she be placed under the ban of this Convention? I do hope, sir, that the majority of this Convention that have voted to despoil Rapides and Natchitoches of their just representation, will reconsider that vote. That they will not persist in a gross and flagrant act of injustice, and sacrifice the principle they have announced in this apportionment, that representation shall be equal and uniform. Let it also be borne in mind, that one of these parishes, Rapides, contributes more to the treasury, and is the largest tax-paying parish in the State, except the parish of Orleans. If any parish deserves favorable consideration, she does; but I repeat she asks no favors; she wants no boons extended to her. She only demands her just rights, for whether you take population, property, qualified electors or taxation, she is clearly entitled to an additional representative.

Mr. GUION raised the question of order whether Mr. Brent, under the rules, could move for the reconsideration without giving two days previous notice, as he had voted with the minority.

Mr. LEWIS had voted with the majority, and his opinions were still the same in reference to the representation accorded to the two parishes embraced in the gentleman's (Mr. Brent's) motion; but with the view of giving that member, the opportunity of testing the question over again, he would move for the reconsideration.

Mr. MILES TAYLOR hoped that the motion would include the parish of Assumption. That parish was clearly entitled to an additional member, as he was prepared to show to the satisfaction of every one.

Mr. LEWIS moved that the vote upon the apportionment to Assumption also be reconsidered.

Mr. BENJAMIN said that in his opposition to taking the number of votes polled at the presidential election as a guide to apportion the representation, he was influenced by the conviction that these returns were for the most part unworthy of reliance, by reason of the numerous frauds that marked that contest. He had heard nothing to induce him to change that opinion. This morning, in a conversation with the delegate from Rapides, (Mr. Brent) in which that gentleman attempted to convince me that his parish was entitled to four members, the very arguments he employed satisfied me that my first impressions were correct; for there is nothing in our assuming the basis of qualified voters that would justify us to make the apportionment in reference to the votes cast in the presidential election. These returns cannot be taken as a guide with any propriety. The election laws received various interpretations in various parts of the State. In some parishes, the constitutional requisitions were implicitly observed, and the spirit and intent of the laws were strictly maintained, in other parishes great laxity prevailed, and latitudinarian constructions were placed, by which general and unqualified suffrage was permitted. In the western and north-western parishes, the system of free suffrage more especially prevailed—every one were allowed to vote without reference to the most essential requisites of the constitution. Whereas, in lower Louisiana, the conditions of suffrage were in the main strictly insisted upon, and no one was allowed to vote unless his name was on the tax-list, or unless, if accidentally omitted, he exhibited his receipt showing that he was a bone fide tax payer. Hence we find the true cause for the great disparity in the votes given between the eastern and western parishes. It is true, that under ordinary circumstances, we would be justified in taking, as our guide, the number of votes given at a general election, where there was enough excitement to bring the people out. But to do so, there should not be such a sudden and wonderful increase as to excite general suspicion, which suspicion would be confirmed, as in the present case, upon a reference to the census of population. We have before us the census for 1840, and by that test we can at once perceive that the astonishing increase of voters in particular portions of the State, has been the result of frauds upon the ballot box. In no other way can we account for such an increase. The census affords us the more unerringly the means of arriving at a correct conclusion in reference to the voters, because one must bear a relative proportion to the other.

If then we take the census as a criterion, where is the injustice, of which the delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent) so vehemently declaims? The population of the parish of Rapides in 1840, was three thousand two hundred; the population of the parish of Lafourche Interior three thousand nine hundred and eighty-six. Yet Rapides is allowed, by the apportionment, the same representation as Lafourche Interior. The gentleman (Mr. Brent) seems to think there is great injustice done to Rapides! Is it not enough to place her representation upon an equality with a parish that outnumbered her in population, and where it is reasonable to presume that the increase has been since 1840 in a proportionate ratio? Must we despoil the parish of Lafourche of a representative and give it to Rapides, merely because Rapides, having allowed every one to vote, cast more votes than the parish of Lafourche, where great strictness prevailed, and the ballot box was more sedulously guarded? Surely the delegate from Rapides cannot, with any reason, ask us to do this, nor can he expect it to be done with any propriety! I am at a loss to understand why the gentleman (Mr. Brent) should complain so bitterly: I can see nothing to justify it!

But the gentleman accuses us of partiality in allowing to the parishes of St. Landry and Calcasieu, six representatives, while we allow but five to the parishes of Natchitoches and Sabine. How is this accusation borne out? We find by refering to the census that the population of Natchitoches, (and Sabine was then included as a portion of Natchitoches,) was seven thousand and forty-two, while the population of St. Landry was seven thousand one hundred and twenty-nine. The more I examine the question the more am I convinced that the grossest injustice and inequality would result, were we to take the number of votes in the several parishes at the presidential election, as a standard in apportioning the representation of the different parishes. It is from that conviction that I have opposed the concession of three representatives to the parish of Plaquemines, and that I am opposed to extending the representation of Natchitoches to four and Rapides to four. I place no reliance upon the returns of the election for president in 1844 in the different parishes, as indicating their relative qualified voters, and for that reason, and taking the population of each parish as a better indication of the qualified voters, I have assented to giving three representatives to Lafourche Interior, because I believe she is entitled to that number.

As to the pretensions of the parish of Assumption, for which an additional representative is claimed by one of her delegates, (Mr. Taylor) I am disposed to acknowledge the claim, because I find that in 1840 her population was four thousand. I trust, however, there is no design to connect the interests of Assumption with the other parishes, for which a reconsideration has been moved, and to compromise the different pretensions of each, upon the principle of their delegation's voting reciprocally the one for the other, so that they may combine their relative strength. If anything like that is designed—if there is to be any such thing as log-rolling, I shall oppose the reconsideration of the vote upon Assumption, as well as the reconsideration of the vote upon Rapides and Natchitoches; for I would rather that Assumption should be deprived of an additional representative than to participate in any such design.

The delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent) assures us that the increase of population in the north-western portion of the State has been such that we must prepare to relinquish the balance of power and submit to the government of that portion of the State. That may be, but I will not believe that the increase of the population is as great as it has been represented, until it be demonstrated by something more conclusive than mere assertion. I do not want declamation—I want figures. I want statistics to establish the result, and until it be shown by such testimony, I must be excused for entertaining doubts, and acting upon the only satisfactory data that is yet before me. The present apportionment of representation is but temporary. It will continue only until a census be made by the State of the qualified voters, and upon that census the representation will be apportioned. If Rapides be really entitled to four representatives, she will then get them; and if the increase in the north-west has been so prodigious as to entitle her unchecked to assume the reigns of government, it will be time enough when that fact will be established for us to submit to the yoke.

Mr. Miles Taylor said that the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) seemed to suppose that some understanding existed between the delegates of the several parishes for which a reconsideration had been moved, in order to increase their representation. This insinuation made it necessary for him to declare that the parish of Assumption stood entirely upon her pretensions, as did the parishes of Rapides and Natchitoches. As a matter of courtesy the motion for reconsideration had been made to embrace the three parishes, but upon the different questions themselves, said Mr. Taylor, I shall vote according to the dictates of my judgment, based upon the data before me.

As our means of information are rather scant and limited, and defective in their general character, I went this morning to
