the office of the State treasurer for the purpose of discovering the amount of taxes contributed by the several parishes, as under our constitution the quality of a tax payer is indispensable to the exercise of suffrage, and presuming that the amounts assessed in the several parishes would afford some approximation to their legally qualified voters. I may be told that there is an exception to taking the amount of taxation as an indication, arising from the fact that a large portion of the lands settled upon in the north-west have been acquired from the general government, and that the period for which they are exempted from taxation has not yet expired, and therefore there are more voters than tax payers in the parishes in that section of the State. I am disposed to concede some difference, but it is too trifling to vary the result to any considerable extent, particularly in reference to the parish of Rapides.

The tableau of taxes for the year 1844, shows that there are nine hundred and sixty-one tax payers in the parish of Assumption: nine hundred and twenty-two in the parish of Natchitoches, and five hundred and sixty-six in the parish of Rapides. From this statement it appears conclusive that Assumption is clearly entitled to three representatives. The increase of her population since 1840 has been considerable, and I would remark that a great many new settlements are forming beyond the banks of the Bayou Lafourche. I owe it to candor to state, in order that no misapprehension may exist, that while I shall vote to increase the representation of Assumption an additional member, I shall vote against the increase proposed for Natchitoches and Rapides, because I do not think their pretensions to four members have been made out—at least not to my satisfaction.

Mr. Brent said, in reply to what fell from the gentleman from Assumption, (Mr. Taylor) as far as the parish of Rapides was concerned, he would remark, that a great number of persons there had settled upon lands acquired from the United States, and that the period for which these lands were exempted from taxation had not yet elapsed. Hence it was they paid no tax, although they were entitled under the constitution to vote, and this satisfactorily explained any apparent discrepancy between the tax list and the number of votes cast.

If I had before, said Mr. Brent, entertained any doubt about the design of a majority of this body to apportion the representation arbitrarily and tyrannically, without reference to the rules which it has itself adopted, that doubt would have been dispelled by the extraordinary arguments which have been advanced by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin.) This Convention has decided that representation is to be regulated and fixed by the number of qualified electors in each parish. We are now engaged in making the apportionment for the year 1845, but the delegate from New Orleans, entirely disregarding the basis we have adopted, has been able to find nothing to justify the high-handed course of the majority, but a reference to the white population of Rapides in 1840. Instead of endeavoring to show that we have not votes enough to entitle us to four representatives in 1845, he goes back to the situation of our white population in 1840. This is a new way to make an apportionment upon the basis of qualified electors, to go back five years in the history of a parish, and ascertain how many men, women and children it had five years ago. Sir, does the number of the white population in Rapides in 1840 furnish any index as to the number of voters in 1845? Gentlemen know little of the history of our section of the State—its progress—its advancement and rapid increase in population, wealth and productiveness, who reason from such premises to such a conclusion. They may infer what they please, they may apportion the representation as they please, for it seems they have the majority, but they cannot deny the fact, which is apparent on the face of the statistics, that the parish of Rapides is justly entitled to four representatives, upon the basis of qualified electors.

Away then, sir, with all such arguments as have to travel back five years in the history of our country, for some fact upon which to repose, and that fact at last to have no connection with the subject matter of our present inquiry. We have adopted the basis of qualified electors. Let us adhere to it. Let us do justice to the different parts of the State, and abide by the rules which we ourselves have established.

But it has pleased honorable gentlemen to attempt to invalidate the only data we have for ascertaining the number of qualified electors in this State, at this time. The pretext for this is that frauds were committed at the last Presidential election. It is to be regretted that this alarming discovery was not made at an earlier period, and particularly before the representation was awarded to the parish of East Baton Rouge. It was not until we ascended from lower and eastern Louisiana to the northern and western portion of the State that these fraudulent election returns became invested with such suspicion as to meet with the indignant rebuke of this honorable body.

I am well aware, Mr. President, that the returns of the late Presidential election, in the northern and northwestern parishes have revealed an unpalatable fact to the people residing on the coast of the Mississippi, and in the southern quarters of the State. It announces to them that the balance of power, which they have so long held, is about gliding from their grasp, and will shortly be transferred from their hands to the hardy yeomen of the west. No wonder that such strenuous attempts are made to avoid these returns, for although the number of votes in the eastern portion of the State has been swelled by innumerable frauds, yet it is manifest that the west is rapidly gaining the ascendancy by the progressive increase of its population. The motive for these attempts is obvious. The election returns of 1844 disclose at once their weakness and our strength.

But the honorable delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) informs us that the elections in the north-western parishes were loosely conducted—that every one was permitted to vote—that no questions were asked—and that the constitutional requisites for suffrage were not insisted upon, and as a pretext why the parish of Lafourche Interior should have an additional representative, although not entitled to it by the number of her voters, we are told that the elections in that parish were so fairly and conscientiously conducted, that the necessity was very apparent of awarding to her an additional representative. Here is a new element introduced into the basis of representation. We must amend the section we have adopted, and that our constituents may know what we have done, and how we have done it, it should be stated that two representatives were awarded to Lafourche for her qualified electors and one for her remarkable honesty, so that the paragraph would read thus: Qualified voters two, honesty one, total three. Political power is hereafter to be given to honesty, and representation to be distributed according to the scarcity of voters. The people of Louisiana, who love truth and justice, and hate wrong and oppression, will know what value to attach to such flimsy pretexts as these.

But, Mr. President, in the course of the apportionment we will shortly reach the city of New Orleans. I have some curiosity, sir, to know upon what data we will be called upon to decide in fixing her representation; and would it not be a little remarkable if these gentlemen who have been shocked at the idea of imaginary frauds in the north-western quarter of the State, should claim the full benefit of the undoubtedly fraudulent vote polled in this city. Upon no other basis can New Orleans be allowed twenty representatives, now claimed for her, than upon the supposition that her vote at the last presidential election was fair and honest. Was it so, sir? And is it not known and admitted that the most infamous frauds were practised in this city, upon that occasion? I do not make this statement from my own knowledge, but I predicate it upon the authority of one of the delegates from Lafourche, (Mr. Beatty) who publicly preferred this charge upon the floor of this Convention, and no representative from the city has yet ventured to deny it. I take it for granted that the fact is now well known, and will not be disputed. Something has been said this morning about thirteen hundred tax receipts that were fraudulently issued to subserve election purposes, by the authorities of East Baton Rouge. At what point in the election were these tax receipts felt? Where did they make themselves known, by swelling to that extent the number of votes cast? Sir, if I mistake not, if I have not been wrongly informed, these tax receipts were expressly ordered for city consumption; and if you wish to find them in the votes of the last presidential election, you must look for them in the ballot boxes of New Orleans. Here was a fraud committed upon a scale of magnificence, which throws into the shade all the minor frauds that were practised in the country parishes of the State. But, sir, I suppose when we come to the city,the gentlemen who are ever so watchful of her interests, will insist upon allowing to her the full benefit of her thirteen hundred spurious and illegal votes. The enormous vote of the second municipality, is doubtless to be allowed its full representation, though resting upon fraud, while the parishes of Rapides and Natchitoches are to be shorn of their just influence, upon the mere surmises and inferences of gentlemen, that the election was loosely and irregularly conducted. The ordinary vote of Rapides is eight hundred and fifty or nine hundred—her vote in the presidential election was one thousand and five. The increase was not remarkable, unusual or calculated in any degree to excite suspicion. In this respect it can compare very favorably with New Orleans. The ordinary vote of the city is less than four thousand, her vote at the presidential election was five thousand six hundred and thirty-eight. Besides, by a reference to the census of 1840, you will find that the proportion of white males over twenty years, in the parish of Rapides, is unusually large in a population of its size. In 1840 there were one thousand and two white males in that parish above twenty years of age. Now when you recollect that every one who was at that time seventeen years of age, would have been old enough to have voted in 1844, there is nothing remarkable in the fact that she polled one thousand and five votes in 1840. On the contrary, the census of 1840 substantiates and verifies the vote of 1844. I will not pretend to deny but that some may have voted there who did not reside in the parish of Rapides, but the number was comparatively few; and making every allowance for non-residents, she is justly and fairly entitled to four representatives.

I conceive the presidential election of 1844 to be the best criterion for determining the number of votes in each parish, except where there are well founded doubts of the legality of the vote. Never was there greater interest felt in the result of any political contest. Popular opinion was thoroughly canvassed—appeals were made to the people, of the most exciting character, and the vote of every qualified elector was secured at the ballot box. Now, sir, where there are no charges of fraud, what better or fairer test could be desired of the number of qualified voters in each parish? If the number of votes has been swelled at any one point to an unusual and suspicious extent, or if, as in the case of new Orleans, it has been debased by known and acknowledged frauds, I would reject it, and fall back upon some previous election, or some other data, that would enable us to dispense equal and exact justice. But in all other cases where there are no charges of fraud based upon probable grounds, I would adhere to the returns of that election as the surest and the safest guide. Taking them as the test, the parishes of Rapides and Natchitoches have not had justice dealt to them. I hope, sir, that the Convention will retrace its steps, and remedy the wrong which it has inflicted.

Mr. Benjamin: The city will readily consent to base her representation upon the population in 1840, if the country will do the same.

Mr. Brent: I have said that that was not the basis determined upon by the Convention.

Mr. Dunn said that the vote given to increase the representation of Plaquemines, and the attempt now making to increase the representation of the parishes of Natchitoches and Rapides, confirmed him in his opposition to taking the basis of votes, and particularly the returns of the presidential election as a basis for the apportionment. In making a comparison between the relative claims of the parishes of Rapides and East Feliciana he could not but be convinced of the greater claims of the latter to additional representation. Yet East Feliciana is to have but three representatives! Rapides is accorded the same number, but her delegation are not satisfied—they needs must have four to content them. If four representatives are granted to Rapides, I shall feel myself under the necessity of insisting upon four representatives for East Feliciana, because her claims are better founded. Again, the parish of Jefferson is allowed but three representatives, and yet it is manifest, whether you take population, qualified electors or taxation, she has greater claims to four than the parish of Rapides. The total number of representatives should not have gone beyond seventy-five, and here we are at ninty-eight, and Rapides and Natchitoches contending for two more representatives. Where are we to stop if we admit the reasonableness of the argument of the delegate from Rapides, (Mr. Brent)?

Mr. C. M. Conrad hoped that the question of apportioning the representation would be decided upon sound principles of general equity and justice, and not upon particular political considerations. The returns in the presidential election of 1844 are confessedly a very defective guide to ascertain the qualified voters of the State, and little or no reliance can be placed upon them. Extraordinary efforts were made by both parties to carry the State, and unfortunately they were both not sufficiently scrupulous as to the means of obtaining the preponderance at the ballot box. A great deal of illegal voting took place; in some of the parishes the vote was extraordinary large, where the constitutional requisitions and the enactments of the law were observed it was proportionately small. A delegate from the parish of Livingston, told us a day or two ago, that the vote in that parish fell below the number of qualified voters. This probably was the case in the Lafourche parishes; while in other parishes, Rapides and Plaquemines, for example, the increase was beyond all calculation. It would be unjust to adopt the vote of 1844 as a standard, because in some of the parishes the number of votes was disproportionately large in comparison with the number of tax payers, the legal voters; while in a few other parishes, the vote was actually below the number of their qualified electors. I shall not certainly attempt to make any discrimination between the parishes; but this I can assert, that the votes of those parishes were the largest where the contest was most hotly disputed, and where the greatest efforts were made to secure the majority, or increase it—where the judges were the least scrupulous, and where there were the greatest facilities afforded for manufacturing voters!

The gentleman from Rapides (Mr. Brent) asks whether we are about to introduce a new principle into the basis of apportionment—and to give so many representatives to a parish because it is entitled to them by reason of its qualified electors or its population, and so many for its honesty in conducting its elections. The gentleman thinks such a system of rewards and punishments quite a novel idea. So do I; but nevertheless I think it would be better to augment the representation of a parish where the elections had been properly conducted, than to augment the representation of a parish where they had been improperly conducted, and to allow its illegal and fraudulent voters to be counted in the apportionment of its representation!

The same deputy has referred to the number of votes cast in the parish of Rapides at the presidential election of 1844, as entitling it to one more representative. If the votes cast were legal, it must be conceded that pro-creation goes on faster and with greater rapidity, and that the young sooner attain the age of majority in the parish of Rapides than any where else in the known world! If we consult the statistics of population, whether in the United States, or the kingdoms of Europe, we find that males bear a striking proportion to females, and that the increase in population is pretty nearly equal, and in accordance with the immutable laws of nature. How, I would ask the gentleman from Rapides, can it be possible that a population of three thousand two hundred in 1840 could give one thousand and five electors in 1844, under our restricted system of suffrage?

Mr. Brent: There were in 1840 as the gentleman will see from the census, one thousand and two individuals under twenty years.

Mr. Conrad—It is incontestible that there was much greater latitude taken in the western portion of the State than in lower Louisiana; and hence the vote in the former is considerably greater. But the fact that illegal votes were cast in a parish, and that its electors are apparently more numerous than those in a parish where the election was legally conducted, should not give it any advantage over the latter. That would be rewarding fraud. I am ready to admit that population is increasing very fast in the western parishes, but surely not in a ratio greater than in the parish of Orleans. And yet the city is perfectly willing to take the census of 1840.

The delegate (Mr. Brent) complains of the injustice of the apportionment in reference to the western parishes. Now what are the facts? That the western parishes get more representatives than any other portion of the State. Out of ninety-eight representatives, they will have thirty-three, more than one third; and if we add the representation in the neighboring parishes, whose interests are identical in the third congressional district, the fourth district will have the greater portion of the weight of members in the legislature. The increase in the apportionment in lower Louisiana, exclusive of the city, is quite small. In Florida it is scarcely any thing—nothing in the lake parishes! So elated is the delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent) at the prospect, that he tells us that the balance of power is lost to us forever. That may very well be, but let us enjoy that power until you can show us you have the numerical superiority, and then as a matter of course, we must submit. But not till then!

Mr. Brazeale hoped that an additional representation would be conceded to the parish of Natchitoches. It was clearly entitled to this increase, and he could not believe, with facts such as had been adduced in support of this claim, that the majority in the Convention would persist in denying to that parish justice. He would call for the ayes and nays upon the motion to reconsider.

The question was taken with the following result:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Couvillion, Downs, Humble, Hynson, McCalop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt.—27 yeas.

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Winchester and Winder.—31 nays.

The motion to reconsider was lost.

Mr. Brent then moved for the re-consideration of the vote apportioning the parish of Rapides, and called for the yeas and nays.

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth and Wederstrandt—27 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Winchester and Winder—31 nays; so the house refused to reconsider.

The question was then taken to reconsider the vote upon the apportionment, to the parish of Assumption.

Mr. Miles Taylor called for the yeas and nays.

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Carriere, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Guion, Kenner, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder—32 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prudhomme, Read, Saunders, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens, Voorhies and Waddill—27 nays; so the question was reconsidered.

Mr. Miles Taylor then moved that Assumption have three representatives in place of two, and called for the yeas and nays—yeas 31, nays 28.

Mr. Humble then moved that the Convention reconsider the vote upon the apportionment to the parish of St. Landry. Inasmuch as the parishes of Rapides and Natchitoches were placed below the number to which they were entitled, it was but fair to equalize the representation by reducing the number of representatives to the parish of St. Landry. He would, therefore, move to reconsider the vote upon the apportionment to St. Landry, with the view of moving a reduction in that apportionment.

Mr. Lewis said that he would not debate the question, but would simply remark, that the argument employed by the gentleman (Mr. Humble) to sustain his motion for the reconsideration of the vote upon the apportionment to the parish of St. Landry, was a species of reasoning that he did not think would satisfy the consciences of gentlemen that were disposed to reduce the representation to the parish of St. Landry, for no other motive than because they conceived that injustice had been done to the parishes of Rapides and Natchitoches. If such an argument as this were to prevail, we would at once convert this house into an arena for gladiators. He would submit the facts, and if gentlemen were willing to act upon the principle, so be it! If gentlemen believe that the parish of St. Landry has more representatives allotted to her than she is entitled to, I ask no better favor (said Mr. Lewis) than for them to vote to reduce her. But if they are convinced, upon an examination, that she is really entitled to the number at present allotted to her, I trust they will not vote in favor of this motion through a feeling of revenge or from the disposition to retaliate for a supposed wrong perpetrated upon some other parishes.

The total amount of taxes assessed upon persons and estates in the parishes of Natchitoches and Sabine, to whom five representatives are allowed, were eleven hundred and sixty-seven; that is to say, there were eleven hundred and sixty-seven taxpayers in the two parishes; while in the year 1843, one year preceding, (I have not the tax list for the parish of St. Landry for 1844, but the number of tax-payers has not certainly decreased) where in the parish of St. Landry alone, leaving out Calcasieu, were fourteen hundred and twenty-eight—exceeding both the parishes of Natchitoches and Sabine. I cannot comprehend why the parish of Natchitoches, having fewer tax-payers, should be placed upon a precise equality with the parish of St. Landry. If gentlemen believe, upon their consciences, that the assessment of taxes entitle the parish of Natchitoches to be placed upon that equality, or that there is an equality of legal voters, then I expect them to vote for this motion. But it is my conviction that whether you take total population, federal numbers, or any other possible basis of apportionment, that the parish of St. Landry would out number the two parishes of Natchitoches and Sabine together. These are the only remarks I shall make. In casting our votes, I presume we are governed by the best lights before us, and are actuated by a disposition to do equal justice to all. Not by particular sectional of views, to enhance the relative political weight of one section at the expense of another—to rob the south to give it to the west; but to give to each that voice in the government to which it is fairly entitled. If I have erred, upon being made sensible of my error, I shall retrace my steps. I trust that the house will not yield to the motion to reconsider, for the discreditable motives that have been assigned.

Mr. Mayo would call attention to a particular fact; from a statistical table before him, it appeared that St. Landry and Calcasieu had given at the last presidential election, thirteen hundred and sixty-five votes.

Mr. Lewis: The votes of Calcasieu were not counted, owing to some difficulty or informality in the returns; the thirteen hundred and sixty-five votes alluded to by the gentleman, were the votes given by St. Landry alone.

Mr. Wadsworth would state a fact that had come to his knowledge as a member of the house of representatives, in a contested election, that had not arisen in that house—it was ascertained that no returns were made from the parish of Calcasieu.

Mr. Voorhies: There were some of the returns from Calcasieu included in the returns from St. Landry.

Mr. Brent would vote in favor of the motion to re-consider, not because he did not think that the parish of St. Landry was not entitled to five members, but because he considered that her claim to them was no better than that of Natchitoches and Rapides to four. Since the majority had refused to give Natchitoches and Rapides the number to which they were fairly entitled, he thought it no more than right to reduce St. Landry so as to equalize the representation. It was necessary to make the reduction so as to maintain a just standard—according to the qualified voters, St. Landry was not more entitled to five representatives than Rapides to four.

The question was taken upon Mr. Humble's motion to reconsider, and Mr. Lewis called for the yeas and nays.

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, McRea, Mayo, Porche, Porter, Prudhomme, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison and Splane—17 ayes; and Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Carriere, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Peets, Read, Roman; Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder—42 nays.

So the Convention refused to reconsider.

Mr. Beatty moved to refer the apportionment for the city, to the Orleans delegation, with instructions to apportion the representation into eight districts, as follows: eight representatives to the First Municipality; eight to the Second Municipality; three to the Third Municipality and one to the right bank.

Mr. Eustis suggested that it would be better to leave the number of representatives to be allotted to each district, to the discretion of the Orleans delegation in making to them the reference. He was not prepared to say that the allotment in the proposed instructions was not a fair distribution, but he thought it best to leave the question opened.

Mr, Beatty: I have no objection.

Mr. Brent moved to strike out from the apportionment, the number twenty representatives for the city, and to substitute sixteen.

Mr. Beatty, with the view of taking the question upon Mr. Brent's motion, withdrew the proposition to refer.

Mr. Brent had one or two remarks to make. The city would not be entitled to more than ten votes, unless the returns of the presidential election were taken as a basis. I object to that criterion as relates to the city of New Orleans. When I claimed these returns as exhibiting the number of qualified voters in the parish of Rapides, where no frauds were committed, it was objected, that they could not be received because frauds had been committed in some of the other parishes, particularly in the parish of Orleans. These charges of frauds in the city were often repeated and have never been denied upon this floor. In fact the great disparity that existed between the votes given in New Orleans at the Presidential election, and those given in the election for two delegates to the Convention, about fifteen days after, substantiates the charge. In the latter election the votes fell one hundred and thirty to one hundred and fifty short of the former.

Mr. Beatty would explain in a few words why he would vote against the motion to reduce the delegation of the city from twenty to sixteen. It is well known, said Mr. B., that I was in favor of restricting the power of the city by a direct vote. I cannot vote to do that indirectly which the Convention have determined contrary to my wishes should not be done directly. If we take the census of the State as our authority, there is no parish entitled to the representation accorded her. If you consult population, the city of New Orleans is entitled to double the representation allowed her. A different rule prevailed in relation to suffrage in the upper portion of the State, from that in the lower portion. Every one indiscriminately were allowed to vote in the upper portion of the State, while suffrage was restricted in the lower parishes to the legal voters. Gentlemen may shake their heads, but this is an undeniable fact. I have it from persons resident in that portion of the State, who are cognizant of the fact. There is no question of the cause that produced the apparent disparity in the vote given at the presidential election, between the parishes in the north and those in the south. The proof is, that the south obeyed the law, and that is the reason why her vote is smaller, and instead of being punished, she ought to be rewarded for her fidelity.

Mr. Wadsworth said, that so far as the repartition of the apportionment were predicated upon voters, it was the most indefinite and vague standard that could be adopted. Frauds were committed at the last presidential election all over the city. In the first ward of the First Municipality, where the Whig party predominated the vote was larger than was ever given before—frauds were rife every where in the city—both parties were equally culpable in conniving at them. There was nothing but fraud; every body and any body went to the polls and exercised that sacred privilege, that our forefathers fought for seriously, and shed their blood. The ballot box was prostituted. Those who had no identity with the country were allowed to vote upon the presentation of a miserable certificate, which they had but just obtained. I could have brought a cargo of emigrants that had just reached the Balize, and in twenty-four hours they would have been converted into legal voters by the political parties. If such outrages are persisted in at our elections, they must inevitably sap the foundation of our liberties!

I am not, said Mr. Wadsworth, an enemy to foreigners. Far from it. I have no objections to their becoming citizens when they are really identified in feeling with the country. When I reflect upon the numerous frauds committed in the city, I am really amazed that so much ado should be made about the alledged frauds in the parish of Plaquemines. All will remember the cab votes! In the investigation that took place in relation to those votes, it was discovered that the tax receipts were invariably for two wheeled cabs—the tax was two dollars on two wheeled cabs, and four dollars on four wheeled cabs, but to cheapen the transaction, the tax was paid on the two wheeled cab, although there was no such thing in the city as a two wheeled cab. The consequence was, however, that according to these receipts the city was overrun with two wheeled cabs!

And yet, after all the frauds in which the city has been so prolifiic, the delegation from the city objected to the allotment of the delegation to which the parish of Plaquemines is entitled, because, say they, frauds have been committed in that parish upon the ballot box. This charge comes with a peculiar bad graca from that quarter. The city of New Orleans ought to blush in making it.

I have been invariably in favor of federal numbers as a basis. It is less favorable to the parish which I have the honor to represent than the basis of electors. But, in as much as the basis of eleetors has been chosen, it ought to be adhered to in good faith, and each parish should be entitled to the representation to which it can exhibit a good title by an exhibit of its tax papers.

Whereupon, on motion, the Convention adjourned.

Friday, March 14, 1845.

[The following remarks of Mr. Porter, in support of the propostion of Mr. Downs on the apportionment, was ommitted in the debates of the 14th inst.]

Mr. Porter said he regarded the motion as a very important one, and thinks that the city of New Orleans ought to be restricted in her representation, for he feels perfectly sure that no interest which is purely commercial, should be suffered to control both the political and agricultural interests of the State, and that must be the result if we establish the principle that representation shall be strictly according to numbers. Gentlemen may think that country members are blind as to the effect such a measure would produce, but he would say the city members were not, they were well aware of the power and influence it would give the city. Mr. Porter said that when he was discussing, some days ago, the subject of country or parish representation, he had taken the trouble to read from all the constitutions in the United States, with a view to show that representation was not based solely on numbers; and he thought he had succeeded, for he had found but four States, in that course of examination, that had laid down numbers exclusively, and they were inland States, having no large cities. The gentleman that followed him in the discussion (Mr. Roselius) had said, (I quote his remarky,) "the principle invoked, wherever it may be found, is a superanuated one;" and to prove his remarks, he said the constitution of Massachusetts was established in 1779. And he said "among the States enumerated by the gentleman from Caddo, figures the State of Rhode Island, whose charter was obtained from that vicious monarch, Charles the Second," &c. Let us for a moment examine this subject, and see if this principle be a superanuated one. The State of Maine in the year 1819, amended and re-adopted her constitution, retaining the principle alluded to; the State of Massachusetts remoddled and re-adopted her's in 1820, containing the principle first adopted that each sub division of the State should have at least one representative. The constitution of Rhode Island, which was read from, is not the charter of that vicious monarch, &c., but is the constitution adopted by the people, in November, 1842. The same may be said of nearly all the New England constitutions; they have been revised and re-adopted; the principle, therefore, is not a superanuated one, even in the old constitutions.

I will now, to show that the principle of giving to each county one representative, is not a superanuated one—read from a few of the most modern constitutions. [Here Mr. Porter referred to the pages and sections from which he read]. The constitution of Tennessee contains this provision, "that each county having one-half the ratio, shall have one representative." This he said, gave to each county one representative. This was one of the new constitutions.

Mr. Porter then read from the constitution of Mississippi, as follows: "Provided, however, that each county shall always be entitled to at least one representative."

Alabama—the constitution also reads as follows: "Provided, however, that each county shall be entitled to at least one representative."

The constitution of Missouri reads as follows: "Each county shall have at least one representative."

The constitution of Michigan—"Each organized county shall be entitled to at least one representative."

The constitution of Arkansas reads as follows, "Provided, that each county now organized shall, although its population may not give the existing ratio, always be entitled to one representative."

The States of Pennsylvania and New York, in their constitutions, hold precisely the same language as the constitutions above read. These are all modern constitutions. Then we find in both the ancient and modern constitutions, this principle of giving to each county one representative, irrespective of numbers, has been steadily adhered to, at least in more than twenty constitutions. So much, then, for the gentlemens' bold assertions.

The gentleman from Assumption, (Mr. Taylor) whom he has always heard with attention, the other day, in discussing the report of the committee which provided that no parish or city should ever be entitled to more than one-fifth of the representation in the State legislature, he said that this principle of restriction was a new one, "and that it presented a new spectacle, not hitherto to be found in the history of our country." Another honorable gentleman had said "it was a deed without a name." If the gentlemen would indulge him, he would examine this subject.

Whilst the committee had this subject under consideration, and I had the honor of being one of that committee, the delegation from the city, that were on the committee, concurred in the restriction, and one of them, (Mr. Benjamin) in argument afterwards in this house, admitted that some restriction ought to be placed on the city, in consequence of the concentration of numbers, &c.; but the gentleman from Assumption (Mr. Taylor) appears to be more the representative of the city than the city members themselves; he has fell much in love with the city; I know not why; perhaps in consequence of some of her splendid ladies or municipalities, I know not; but he has (so to speak) pushed the representatives of the city out of the way, and taken the city on his own broad shoulders. But if the gentlemen will follow me to the seaboard States, I think I will show them that restrictions have been imposed in nearly, or quite all the States that have large seaport towns.

Here Mr. Porter referred to the page and section in the book of constitutions, and read first from the constitution of Georgia, as follows: "Each county containing three thousand persons, agreeable to the foregoing plan of enumeration, shall be entitled to two members; seven thousand to three members, and twelve thousand to four members; but each county shall have at least one, and not more than four members." He wished here, first, to call gentlemens' attention to this fact, that representation did not increase according to population; for instance, three thousand in one county gave two representatives, but when increased to twelve thousand gives but four. Now, if representation had increased according to numbers, twelve thousand would have been entitled to eight members; then, as numbers concentrate, representation decreases; but furthermore, no county shall have more than four representatives. Now sir, suppose that one-half the population of the State of Georgia was in the city of Savannah, (which now has say over one-fourth) what proportion in the representation of the State would that county have? There are sixty-three members in the legislature; then sir, though there might be a majority of the whole State in this county, she would have but four representatives, less than one-fifteenth. Here, then, is a spectacle in the history of our country, and here there is a name found for the deed we were about to perpetrate. But I hope the gentleman will follow me along the sea-shore; South Carolina has a large sea-port town, Charleston—let us see if there is no restriction there. Here Mr. Porter read from the constitution of the State of South Carolina, showing that the house consisted of one hundred and sixty-one members, and that the city of Charleston and the counties of St. Philip and St. Michael together, were entitled to but fifteen members in the lower house, which is but one-tenth; and in the senate to but two members out of thirty-eight, which is one-nineteenth. Here, again, is a much stronger restriction than has been asked for. Here, then, we have a pair of spectacles through which we may read, in the history of our country, of similar restrictions. North Carolina has no large sea-port town, but she gives to each county one representative, which is a sufficient restriction where there is no large town. The State of Virginia has no large city, but if I recollect aright, the city of Richmond has but one representative. The State of Maryland I will next call to the attention of the gentlemen; and, sir, I wish their particular attention. Here Mr. Porter referred to the page and section of the constitution of Maryland, from which he was going to read; he said he would not read the ninth section, but he would call the attention of the house to it, for the tenth section, which he would read, alluded to it.

The ninth section appoints the representation to all the counties; the lowest number to any county is three, the highest five; in the tenth section it is provided as a check on the city of Baltimore, that in all future apportionments these numbers shall not be reduced, but (said he) I will read the section: "From and after the period when the next census shall be taken and effectually promulgated, and from and after every second census thereafter, the representation in the house of delegates from the several counties, and from the city of Baltimore, shall be graduated and established on the following basis; that is to say, every county which shall have, by the said census, a population of less than fifteen thousand souls, federal numbers, shall be entitled to elect three delegates; every county having a population of fifteen thousand souls and less than twenty-five thousand souls, federal numbers, shall be entitled to elect four delegates; and every county having by the census a population of twenty-five thousand and less than thirty-five thousand souls, federal numbers, shall be entitled to elect five delegates; and every county having a population of upwards of thirty-five thousand souls, federal numbers, shall be entitled to elect six delegates; and the city of Baltimore shall be entitled to elect as many delegates as the county which shall have the largest representation on the basis aforesaid, may be entitled to elect; provided, and it is hereby enacted, that if any of the several counties herein before mentioned, shall not, after the said census of the year eighteen hundred and forty shall have been taken, be entitled by the graduation on the basis aforesaid to a representation in the house of delegates equal to that allowed to such county by the ninth section of this act, at the election of delegates for the December session of the year eighteen hundred and thirty-eight: such county shall, nevertheless, after the said census for the year eighteen hundred and forty, and any future census, and forever thereafter, be entitled to elect the number of delegates allowed by the provisions of the section, &c., &c."

Mr. Porter said, we see here a house of delegates of seventy-nine members, and the city of Baltimore having but six votes out of that number and but one in the senate, and this number in the house can never be reduced by any future apportionment—neither can the city ever have more than six. Yet gentlemen have the hardihood to state on this floor, that restrictions are unheard of things—deeds without a name, &c. In the report before us, the city of New Orleans is not named, but in the case above the city of Baltimore is particular named, pointed out, and restricted.

Here I might stop and rest this matter, but I will proceed. Rhode Island, the constitution of which says expressly that each county shall have one representative, and that no town or city shall have more than one-sixth of the members to which this house is hereby limited. Here is another express restriction, but gentlemen assert that it is an unheard of outrage and injustice, unknown in all civilized countries. And the city of New York has a population of only one-eighth of the whole State, and that empire State has given to each county one representative; this, with a restriction which is laid on the city in the senate, and the fact that she is a farming State, and not a planting one, and that those farms generally contain only from twenty-five to one hundred acres, it is morally impossible that a city should ever get the ascendancy over the country. The same remarks will apply to Pennsylvania; though in the State of Massachusetts, there is no absolute or express restriction, yet that State is represented by towns, and there are some counties that have from twenty to thirty towns represented. Therefore it is utterly impossible that Boston should ever overshadow the country. Mr. Porter here said he would read from the constitution of Maine: "The house of representatives shall not be less than one hundred, or more than two hundred." No town shall ever have more than seven delegates; in a house of one hundred, this would be one-fourteenth; and in a house of two hundred, one twenty-eighth. I will not pursue this subject further, we have found restrictions wherever they were necessary, from Georgia to Maine. And they are much greater every where, whilst there is no other city that requires half the restriction, yet it is called a solecism in government; an abandonment of republican principles, &c. &c.

One of the honorable gentlemen from the city (Judge Eustis) says there can be no antagonist interest between the city and the country; that "every tree that is felled and spade that opens a drain" in the country, is for the benefit of the city. But is this an evidence that the city in all future time will do that which is most just and equitable towards the country. It proves that all we do, and all the improvements which are made in the country are for the benefit of the city. But why did not that eloquent gentleman proceed and tell us the whole truth; the subject was one which would have suited a gentleman of such ability. Why did he not tell us that every tree that was felled and every drain that was opened, not in Louisiana alone, but in the State of Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky, Virginia, Pennsylvania, thence sweeping down the west side of the Ohio and the Missouri, including the free States, and indeed one half the States in the Union? Why, I say, did he not tell us that wherever the axe was laid to the root of a tree, wherever a drain was opened, wherever a ploughshare turned a furrow, or a scythe or reap hook saved a harvest, in this vast valley, from the base of the Rocky mountains to the gulf of Mexico, they were laboring for the prosperity of this vast city? that all those improvements are to advance its interests, and that this city has no more comity of interest with this State than it has with the balance of this vast valley? Why did he stop at the boundary of this little State.

Sir, said Mr. Porter, I was in this city thirty years ago; what was it then compared to what it is now? It was then settled principally by native Louisianians; where are they now? by whom will this vast city be peopled? by the sons of native Louianians? No, in forty years they will be, in this city, few and far between. But, sir, it will be peopled by commercial men from the four quarters of the globe; by all tongues, kindreds and people; the most commercial and enterprising men from the whole world, will be tempted by their cupidity, and with a view of bettering their fortunes to settle here, having no interest in common with the State, opposed in principle to our peculiar institutions, and holding, as they will, the rights of government in their hands, what may we expect? I appeal to native Louisianians to pause before they act. This State can never have a large population, independent of the city. It is a planting country, the farms must be large, and the population never can be dense; but, sir, there can be no bounds set to the growth of this city. It must have a larger population than the whole State besides.

Now, sir, I ask, is it right that one small parish, less perhaps, than ten miles square, having but one interest, and that entirely commercial, should dictate laws to the whole State, and oppress the agricultural interest at discretion? Now sir, it is utterly impossible that a majority of the whole State can ever be crowded into one parish for the purposes of agriculture. Then when such concentration of numbers takes place, they must be almost exclusively commercial; the question is, shall the commercial interest swallow up all the rest? Sir, if the city is hereafter to dictate laws to this State, what may we not look for in the way of wharfage taxes and additional items of expense on our produce? Sir, if this be permitted, the mind of man, the greatest stretch of the human imagination, may not be able yet to see the injustice and oppression that may be visited on the hard laboring and planting part of this community. Sir, one of the great objects of Thomas Jefferson in the acquisition of Louisiana, was to save western produce from the inquisitorial duties and taxes then laid on it. If we yield to city legislation, I fear we have gained but little. Sir, the whole valley of the Mississippi is deeply concerned in this matter, and in the decision of this question. Sir, (said Mr. Porter) we have heard much that is eloquent said on the other side of this question, but I have not heard one argument that I even thought plausible, except on the subject of taxation. Gentlemen have said here that if you restrict the city, and the country have the majority, they might tax the city, and this would be taxation without representation. Then give the city the advantage, and the same might be said by the country; but this is supposing a case that I think never can exist, that is, that the country would tax a certain species of property in the city higher than they would tax the same in the country. This is a supposition so unjust and unreasonable, that I really think it is altogether without foundation. But if gentlemen are sincere, and are really afraid of being thus taxed, and are only requiring additional representation to protect them from this injustice, I will offer them a compromise which will effectually secure them against this injustice. If they do not wish to have this large representation for the purpose of giving them the political, and all other powers belonging to the State, they will not desire more than twenty members, if they can be protected against improper taxation. Mr. Porter said he would read from the constitution of Tennessee, which he would offer at a proper time to embody in this constitution. Mr. Porter read a part of the section as follows: "All property shall be taxed according to its value; that value to be ascertained in such manner as the legislature shall direct, so that the same shall be equal and uniform throughout the State; no one species of property from which a tax may be collected, shall be taxed higher than any other species of property of equal value," &c. Now if gentlemen are sincere, they will accept this proposition.

Mr. Porter said the gentleman from Assumption (Mr. Taylor) had said, whilst opposing restricting New Orleans, that he was willing to restrict her in the senate. He (Mr. Porter) thought the city ought to be restricted in both. Sir, if you give the city a majority in the lower house, having the number of one hundred, and it having from the city and its vicinity, some eight senators out of thirty-two, leaving some twenty-five senators only from the country, I ask any reasonable man if the senate could long resist the force of numbers that would be against them? It is not a supposable case that the senate could always resist such an influence; but suppose the case, and what would be the effect? Why, sir, the wheels of government must be suddenly stopt; the shock could not be sustained, and revolution must be the consequence. Sir, it will not do to create antagonist interests between the two houses.

Mr. Porter said he might have felt too much excited on this subject, but he was sure he had no prejudice against the city, and would not knowingly do her or any individual on earth any injustice; he hoped the restriction would be retained.

WEDNESDAY, March 19, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. HINTON.

The journal of yesterday was read and adopted.

The Secretary announced that he had not received the receipt from the reporter for his reports.

On motion of Mr. BENJAMIN, Mr. Soulé was excused attendance in his seat, in consequence of ill health.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The order of the day being the motion of Mr. Brent, the delegate from Rapides, to reduce the number of representatives reported by the committee for the city of New Orleans, from twenty to sixteen,

Mr. DOWNS had the floor from the previous day, but being indisposed, he yielded his place to

Mr. HUMBLE, who rose and briefly addressed the house. He said that during a long residence in the northwestern part of the State, he had been a close observer of what had been passing around him. In the parishes of Catahoula and Caldwell the laws were as well and truly observed as they have been in any part of the State. At every election poll in those parishes, a tax list was exhibited, and no man was allowed to vote who was not truly recorded a tax payer and property holder. There were charges levelled at the citizens of those parishes; they were compared to highwaymen, and called intriguers. He (Mr. Humble) saw nothing but habits of industry practised by the people while he lived there, which had been for the last twenty years, and he knew that the laws and constitution were no where more strictly observed.

Mr. SPLANE said that it devolved upon him to say a few words in reference to the subject under debate, and he only regretted that he had not been able sufficiently to investigate many facts in reference to it. Although opposed to some of the members of the Orleans delegation, he still considered them too liberal to inflict injustice on any portion of the State. He would, however, wish to lay before the house the fact, that the vote polled in New Orleans was, in 1838, three thousand and ninety-two, in 1842, three thousand three hundred and forty-seven, and in 1844 the vote had increased to five thousand six hundred and thirty-eight. How was this enormous increase? He asked the gentlemen to explain. He considered that a great injustice had been committed against the parishes of Natchitoches and Rapides. He did not understand why these parishes were not entitled to the same share of representation as Lafourche or Assumption, and if we take either the federal or electoral basis for our guide, the facts will fully support this opinion. There were other facts, too, to which he would call the attention of the gentlemen, and amongst them that of the thirteen hundred voters who were made in one day at Baton Rouge. Amongst other persons who were acquainted with those proceedings were the surveyor general and the sheriff of the parish. The latter officer had made out thirteen hundred tax receipts, and a tract of land was laid off and sold under the superintendence of the parish judge. The principal number of these voters came down to the city, and their votes go to swell up the figures on which the apportionment is sought to be based. There were, however, (he had understood so at least,) about one hundred and ten of them democrats; he had heard that some of them had voted in the parish of Jefferson, but they were very few. These were the means taken to increase the vote of New Orleans from 1842 to 1844, an increase of upwards of one half the former year, and if any parish therefore should be restricted, he considers that New Orleans should be the one. With these views, therefore, he would vote in favor of the motion of the delegate from Rapides.

Mr. CONRAD of New Orleans, in reply to the delegate who spoke last, said, that if the number of votes cast in the year 1840 were taken by that gentleman, he would find it still greater than that of 1842. It was a fact well known that the elections in 1838 and 1842 were in July; those of 1840 and 1844 were held in November, and consequently the vote must necessarily have been much larger, being both Presidential elections; and it was further a matter of notoriety that the election of 1844 was one of great and peculiar excitement, and on that occasion no measures were left untried to increase the number of votes. But many of these illegal voters—illegal under the present constitution—will be rendered legal by the operation of the new constitution. They will then have residence, which is the only qualification necessary. The sixty thousand free white population of New Orleans fairly entitle her to (according to the ratio allowed to Rapide) sixty representatives, giving one for every thousand. If you give a certain number of inhabitants to a given territy, the rate of apportionment is quite out of proportion. If we take the census of 1840 for country parishes, why not take it for New Orleans? He would not ask the number that she is fully entitled to however, but he thought twenty representatives where sixty was due, wast the least number that could be granted.

Mr. Brazeale offered as an amendment to the motion of the delegate from Rapides to allot fifteen representatives for the city of New Orleans, viz:

For the First Municipality,	7
" Second Municipality,	5
" Third Municipality,	3
And for that part of the parish of Orleans over the river,	1

Mr. Benjamin moved to lay both amendments on the table indefinitely.

Mr. Boudousquie seconded the motion.

Mr. Downs said, he hoped the motion would not prevail. The members from New Orleans had urged the reduction of the representation of many of the country parishes with much ardor, and they appeared to exult in every case in which their efforts had been successful. But he would remind the gentleman that New Orleans was not yet settled, and they should bear in mind the old adage, "that they who live in glass houses should not throw stones." He was, however, satisfied to try them by their own rule, if the gentlemen from Orleans were not satisfied with the ratio of 1842, they should go back to 1840. For want therefore of better data, he would for a moment scrutinize the votes taken in New Orleans, and thus show the great disparity of increase from 1840 to 1844 here, to what it could almost by possibility arrive at in any reasonable manner. The total population of the first municipality in 1840; was forty-eight thousand; that of the Second, twenty-one thousand; and yet in 1844, the second municipality polled seven hundred more votes than the First. It seemed to him like giving a bounty to fraud. Here was more fraud committed in the Second Municipality than there was throughout the rest of the State. Gentlemen need not have gone to Plaquemines to seek the election frauds, they were to be found nearer home; but it sometimes proved a good way to defend a bad position by commencing an attack upon our enemies. A more tremendous fraud was never perpetrated; the facts were before them. Thirteen hundred voters made at Baton Rouge, one hundred and ten of whom were democrats; but the rest were for New Orleans; where, he would ask, did these men vote, but in the second municipality. Many persons voted here who had no legal right to do so. He was aware of a circumstance which afforded an illustration. A steamboat that traded some way up the Ouachita river, arrived here during the election, her owners on board, two of them whigs, and one a democrat, and all non-resident here! The democratic voter presented himself at an early period of the polling to record his vote, but was told that he, not being a resident, could not vote. Towards the close of the election, however, he met his two whig friends who inquired at once whether he had voted: when he told them he had not, from having been refused on account of being a non-resident—they immediately brought him to the place where they had voted themselves, consequently his vote could not be refused. He (Mr. Downs) saw no great evil in a man voting at a general election wherever he might be at the time, but he could not tolerate the idea that the Convention were to take such a basis for the representation of New Orleans. He was willing to do ample justice. Let New Orleans be divided into eight districts with two representatives to each, and one over the river; he thought no complaint could be made to this. The vote on the question now debating from time to time has shewn the power of the city members over those from the country. They have fought us with one-tenth our number, and now if we are to give them one-fifth, must not their power be irresistible. They will after a short time, not even consult the country on the measures to be brought forward; the extent to which this may be carried cannot be now judged. Feeling, however, that the most calamitous consequences are to be dreaded if the power of the city is not limited, he sincerely hoped that the motion would not pass. He hoped gentlemen would maturely reflect before acting in this great question, as it was a measure which might involve the danger of placing the power of the government in the city, and wresting it completely from the great masses of the people.

The city have now more than one-sixth allotted to them, it is better to limit them to this than to grant too much. The most dangerous power which can be given to men, is that which strengthens the power of its possessors to retain it. They may convene again, and should you ask them to give up their power, they will laugh at the idea. When New Orleans contains half a million of inhabitants, her power will increase so as to become overwhelming.

Mr. Conrad of New Orleans, said he felt himself called on to reply to the few observations which had fallen from the gentleman from Ouachita. Frauds had been spoken of as having been committed in the second municipality, but he said before and would say again, that the vote in the city by the evasion of the property qualification has always been greatly swelled. Bnt could any one say that in the respective parishes throughout the State, similar frauds were not perpetrated? He knew it to be a fact that there had been.

Mr. Brent here made some observation relative to the Baton Rouge tax receipts.

Mr. Conrad said he would like to know, out of what lands the vote was raised in Rapides.

Mr. Brent replied, from the Congress lands.

Mr. Conrad remarked that that was the easiest mode of working and after all, of the two, it was the one of the least merit. But with regard to the second municipality, the frauds were not greater there than in other municipalities. The gentleman had spoken of Baton Rouge, no one ever pretended that these voters came from anywhere else but from New Orleans, that they were other than citizens of New Orleans, and who will be fully entitled to vote under the new constitution. So far as regards the number of representatives for each municipality, he believed the delegation from New Orleans were not going to quarrel about it, they only wished for a fair representation for the city. A large amount of emigrant population too, are constantly entering the second municipality, which accounts for the rapid increase of that part of the city, and it is also clear from the best data that can be had, that the increase of population in the country bears no proportion at all, compared with that of the city, which contains seven-eights of the whole white population of the State.

Mr. Marigny said that he felt called upon to repel the constant attacks made by the delegate from Ouchita, (Mr. Downs) who, it appeared to him, had endeavored, from the commencement of the session, to excite the passions and feelings of country members against those from the city. That delegate was not content with using the weight and influence which his talents fairly entitle him to, but managed to bring to his aid the overwhelming aid of local prejudice against some of the delegates of that house. He charges the delegates from Orleans with obtaining everything they wished, with crushing every measure they were opposed to. The delegate has forgotten that he (Mr. Downs) brought forward his own project for apportionment, with the federal basis for representation. After long debates, in which the delegate took frequent and distinguished part, the subject was again referred. The delegate, who seems to have the power of ubiquity, particularly wherever the fourth congressional district is concerned, is again at his post; he is in the minority, but like a skilful general, he is engaged in attack, and though sometimes foiled, yet he will continue to attack until at length he comes off victorious: so was it with the delegate from Ouachita. The committee return a different basis; but he (Mr. D.) offers a substitute, he now offers the basis of qualified voters, the basis assailed by him at the onset. He advocated and this he carried. Next he fears improper influence from the proximity of the city to the legislature, and forthwith commences the attack, he gains his point; and not satisfied with removing the seat of government out of the city of New Orleans, he gets a proviso inserted, that it shall never be "within less than sixty miles" thereof. No particular place either has been fixed for its removal to; perhaps one delegate may wish to remove it to Lafourche; another will, it may be presumed, propose the college of Jefferson as a suitable place, because the State has expended some five hundred thousand dollars on that building; some other may say that Baton Rouge is the only place to hold the legislative sessions. It did not, however, suit the views of the delegate to fix a place; but lest it might come back to New Orleans he has placed the restriction, that it shall require four-fifths of the legislature to carry the measure. Did the gentleman call this democracy? A restriction of four-fifths of a majority placed on the free will of a free people; if that was democracy, then he no longer understood the term as he did before. After all this, New Orleans did expect a representation proportioned to her population of qualified electors, and the city delegates gave up all the rest. But the delegate, (Mr. D.) whose tactics are as admirable as his talents are great, had maintained in his project, another proviso, that no new parishes should be created that did not contain an area of six hundred and twenty-five square miles, thereby shutting out the old parishes from ever subdividing themselves and leaving it to the fourth congressional district alone to subdivide, and thereby increase the representation. Thus the delegate has obtained more for his parish than he even asked for, and a restriction has sought to be placed on New Orleans. When the question of removal was brought forward, the delegates from New Orleans remained silent, lest they might be reproached with using undue influence; the delegate (Mr. D.) has, however, in his opinion, used uncontrollable influence wherever the interests of the fourth congressional district was at stake. He (Mr. Marigny) would be most happy to see his friend, the delegate from Ouachita, emigrate to the city of New Orleans, and would exert his best efforts to place him in the house of representatives or in the senate, feeling well assured that he would prove a sterling friend to the interests of New Orleans, from the powerful sway he has exercised against her in his advocacy of the fourth congressional district.

Mr. Downs said he felt much indebted to the delegate (Mr. Marigny) for his complimentary remarks, at the same time he would observe that whilst he rendered him (Mr. Downs) all the victory, he reserved to himself all the benefits of the triumph, for in every struggle where the interests of the fourth congressional district were at stake, he had been defeated; and he was at a loss to understand how or where he had been the victor. For the last few days, wherever an effort was made to restrict the power of country parishes, distant from this city, the New Orleans delegation have voted in solid column for the restriction. He would advise the gentlemen that New Orleans, with a circle of fifty miles, will have the power of wielding the interests of the State to any extent, as she has now with a small proportion, on that floor, and as he feared she would that day. As to the removal of the seat of government, that is a mere visionary boon; it is only in case the legislature wish it, but who can compel them? And if he had now the power to abrogate the provision for removal, he would do it, as he could not look upon any measure otherwise than chimerical, which can never reach any practical result. He had been charged with log-rolling, but he confessed if any such means had been used by him, it was with but very poor success. He thought he rolled to little purpose; and he considered that this removal provision was worthless; the time consumed in obtaining it was, in his opinion, completely thrown away. Gentlemen say we have got a representative for every parish; this, if the number were limited to seventy members in the house of representatives, would be something; but when that number is raised to one hundred, it becomes of no avail. He was driven from one proposition after another, until the power of New Orleans is left almost unlimited. He would only say that if she gets the power, she will hereafter ride rough-shod over the people of the State, and the yeas and nays of this day will be looked to by those who will come after. He hoped the motion would not prevail.

Mr. Benjamin said that when gentlemen upon that floor would be called to give an account of the stewardship of their votes of that day, they would be able to stand a proper test. Were they to be threatened? he would ask, and told that because two members were taken off northern Louisiana and added to lower Louisiana, the city of New Orleans was to be restricted?

He said no; the delegation from New Orleans say no. That Convention should never force a measure upon them which would brand her citizens as unworthy; they shall be left unshackled. He told the country members before, he tells them now to choose their own basis, to take any they please, but no restriction for New Orleans. We (the city delegates) had taken the basis offered. The delegate from Feliciana had said a few days ago, that justice was forced upon the city; he would tell that gentleman that justice was no bitter pill for them to swallow. He knew not upon what principle the delegate from Ouachita attacked the conduct of the Orleans delegation. In regard to the country parishes' apportionment, the parish of Natchitoches formerly had one representative; it is now divided, and the original parish now gets five; but when gentlemen have failed to break down the political power of lower Louisiana, they fall back upon New Orleans to avenge themselves.

Mr. BRENT said: I conceive, Mr. President, that no claim could be more unjust than that now advanced by the city of New Orleans, to twenty representatives. I should like to know upon what data, what basis, and what principle, such a claim is to be allowed? I go for meting out the same justice to her which she has extended to others, and I desire that the chalice of which she has made us drink, shall be commended to her own lips. Are the people of New Orleans of a different mould and texture, that higher privileges and greater favors should be conferred on them than are conferred on the free citizens of other quarters of the State? The delegates from the city have positively refused to apportion the representation of the parishes of Rapides and Natchitoches upon the basis of votes cast in the presidential election of 1844, and at the same time they have not insinuated any charges of fraud, against the fairness of that election. They now, sir, turn round, and planting themselves upon the acknowledged fraudulent vote of this city, insist that her representation shall be awarded to her upon that basis, which they themselves have rejected and denounced. That there is gross injustice and manifest wrong in such a proceeding, no one can pretend to deny. The honest vote of two parishes has been repudiated and set aside, by the action of the city delegates; and now these same gentlemen seek to avail themselves of a vote which has been swelled and enlarged to an unprecedented extent, by the most abominable and stupendous frauds. I call the attention of the Convention particularly to this point, that the city of New Orleans is not entitled to twenty representatives upon any other data than the presidential election of 1844. The tax list and the vote of no previous election will give her more than sixteen representatives. How then can the delegates from the city, after despoiling two parishes of their just representation, according to the vote of 1844, now insist that they are to have the full benefit of the wrong which the city herself has committed? Such a claim comes with bad grace, and should meet with no favor in the eyes of this Convention.

That the vote of this city was fraudulent to a great extent, in the Presidential election of 1844, is fully evident, from the fact that a few days afterwards, at a special election held for two members of this body, her vote fell fifteen hundred short of what it was at the presidential election. The excess of fifteen hundred was unquestionably fraudulent and spurious, and did not properly belong to the fair and honest vote of this city. And yet the representatives of the city, in their eagerness for political power, do not hesitate to claim for the city the full benefit of the frauds which were thus notoriously committed. I leave the people of the country to judge between us.

But let us see at what result facts and figures will bring us, in apportioning the representation of the city. Every parish that has two hundred and seventy-six voters, is to have one representative, and for every fraction exceeding the representative number by half, it is to have an additional representative. Now, the city of New Orleans polled, at the last presidential election, five thousand six hundred and thirty-eight votes. If we strike off fifteen hundred for illegal votes, which is a moderate deduction, it will leave four thousand one hundred and thirty-eight as the number of legally qualified electors in this city. The representative number of two hundred and seventy-six, will divide this fifteen times, and leave a fraction of two hundred and seventy-four, which would entitle her to sixteen representatives, according to the rule we have established. For this number I shall vote, and justice demands that her representation should be reduced to this point.

Some intimations were thrown out yesterday, by a delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin) as to the probability that some of the country parishes had combined and log-rolled together, for the purpose of acquiring an undue preponderance in the State legislature. No charge of that kind can be brought with truth against our section of the State, for if we have log-rolled with any one, we have log-rolled to very little purpose. It may be that we are rather the victims, instead of the perpetrators of the act. Now it is, to say the least of it, a somewhat singular coincidence, that the city delegates and the delegates from a certain favored region called the sugar district, have been voting in solid column upon all questions connected with the apportionment of the State. Unfortunately for us, they constitute a majority of this body, and hence we have seen them, by the strong hand of power, taking representatives away from cotton parishes that were justly entitled to them, and giving them by way of largess to sugar parishes, that had no just claim or title to them. Now, sir, if this coincidence should go a little further, and if the delegates from the favored region, in consideration of the services rendered by the city, should vote to give her a representation to which she is not entitled, it might not be log-rolling; such a thing of course could not be believed, but evil disposed persons might think that it had a most awful squinting in that direction.

So far, in the apportionment of representation, the Convention appears to have been guided by no fixed rules, but on the contrary, it appears to have substituted its arbitrary caprice for the basis of representation, established by the deliberate vote of this body. To show how unjust has been its tyrannical use of power, I will call the attention of the Convention to a few facts connected with the apportionment of representation to the parishes of Pointe Coupee and Lafourche Interior. I find by the census, that the white population of Pointe Coupee is two thousand and eighty-seven; the white population of Lafourche is three thousand nine hundred and eighty-six; the total population of Pointe Coupee is seven thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight; the total population of Lafourche is seven thousand three hundred and three; the number of votes cast in Pointe Coupee was three hundred and forty-nine, and the number cast in Lafourche was six hundred and eight.

Here, sir, it appears that Pointe Coupee has more than one half the white population of Lafourche, more than half the voters, and a larger total population, and yet you have given her but one representative, and Lafourche Interior three representatives. There may be justice, equality and uniformity in this, but my vision cannot discover these qualities in that apportionment. Pointe Coupee happens to be washed by the waters of Red river, and this has sealed her doom.

It is with mortification and deep regret, Mr. President, that I am forced to declare, that but little is to be expected from the sense of justice of this Convention. The north-west quarter of the State has been put under the ban, and not only have no favors been extended to it, but its demand for justice has been spurned and scouted at. We are forced to submit. We must bow in acquiescence to the declared will of the majority. But I would advise those gentlemen who seem so anxious to control the growing influence of the west, to fasten the chains well, and bind the rivets sure, if they expect to keep us in subjection. I tell them that the political power of this State is fast leaving the banks of the Mississippi, and setting with a strong and irresistible tide to the western and northern quarters of the State. There is no emigration to the eastern part of the State except to New Orleans, while upon the west there pours a constant stream of emigration, that must inevitably produce the result which I have predicted. The delegates from the north-west section of the State, constitute but one-seventh of this body, yet, sir, when we return to the councils of the State, even under the unjust apportionment which has been made, we shall have more than one fourth of the whole representation. At that time we shall be able to protect ourselves. Until then we must submit with the best grace we can, to the behests of the majority.

Mr. Roselius would show the gentleman (Mr. Brent) that his position was a wrong one, and that New Orleans was fairly entitled to much more than twenty representatives. The number of qualified voters had been established as the ratio of representation, let the apportionment therefore be made according to the fixed basis. He would lay down as data for this purpose the vote of 1844. Was it not known to every member of this house, that the franchise is fast extending? Was it not most evident and clear to every reflecting mind, that this apportionment of representation is to be made with reference to the new, and not the old, constitution? and therefore he deemed it just to take for his guide the number of votes polled at the last election, because they have all the qualification requisite by law. Under the provisions of the new constitution every male white citizen of the United States, who shall have resided two years in the State, and one year in the parish, is an elector. Under the present constitution a property qualification is required, and therefore the number of voters must be manifestly increased when that necessity is removed. The next data to go on, and which forms the strongest evidence in favor of the right of New Orleans, is the population. Every white male found in the city over the age of twenty years is qualified to vote, the exceptions being alienage, not being a citizen of the United States, or not being two years resident in the State. For these exceptions proper deductions must be made. According to correct statistical information, the total population of the city in 1840 was twenty-three thousand three hundred and sixty-seven. It requires no argument to prove that this number has increased; it has almost doubled; but at least no one will attempt to say that it has diminished; and taking every reasonable deduction from this number, and in view of the fact that of those, all who have remained since in the city will have residence, the qualification for citizenship, New Orleans is entitled to forty members instead of twenty. He hoped gentlemen would look at these facts before they voted. New Orleans was about to get twenty members, when she was entitled to forty; and he would like to know upon what principle gentlemen proposed to reduce one half still less. He trusted that there was still some principle left on that floor—if there was any principle remaining, it would show itself in the action taken upon this question. Is not the basis adopted? therefore why not apportion according to it? When he saw the unholy purpose of disqualifying the citizens of New Orleans, solely because they were living in New Orleans, discountenanced and lost, he greatly rejoiced, for he felt that there was some justice left in the house; but when he sees an attempt made to curb New Orleans, to restrict her representation, to deprive her of her rightful political power, then indeed he feared that justice had disappeared. But he hoped it would not be. It was a most flagrant injustice, this effort to cut off the number of New Orleans representatives, and he could only compare it to the conduct of Lear's daughters. The king who had abdicated the throne, was to have had an hundred knights of his own to attend him; but when he sought the hundred one of his daughters said that fifty were sufficient, and another said twenty-five, another ten —and at length the poor old king was coolly told by his ungrateful children, that their attendant knights would occasionally attend on him, and so his hundred knights were reduced to none at all. And thus the attempt is made to restrict New Orleans. Twenty representatives is at first proposed, then sixteen, somebody else will propose ten, and at length our country friends will doubtless tell the city of New Orleans that she shall have no representatives, the country members will look after her interests occasionally. He therefore hoped that common justice would not be denied the city; she was entitled to forty members, she is satisfied to take half that number, and therefore he hoped it would not be lessened.

Mr. Wadsworth was willing to adopt the same basis for New Orleans for as any other parish in the State. He was an advocate for uniform and equal representation. But when he came to view the gross frauds committed at the last election, he was unwilling to predicate the apportionment on such a basis. In the first ward of the first municipality, where the vote polled in 1840 was four hundred, it amounted up to eight hundred and ninety-five in 1844; it was not possible to attain this increase, and yet in Plaquemine, where they had an alluvial soil, continually increasing, the vote of 1844 was rejected. The city members advocate the doctrines to-day which they jumped up against yesterday. He did not wish to restrict them, but he wished them to be consistent, let them apply the same principle to every parish alike, and let that principle be equal and uniform representation.

Mr. Culbertson briefly replied to the last speaker in reference to the vote of the previous day on Plaquemine. He said that if time had been allowed New Orleans to make out a proper and correct census of her qualified electors, New Orleans would be found entitled to more than twenty representatives. If it were that any portion of the State were deprived of its just share of representation, that was no reason why the citizens should be restricted in their privileges. The delegates had been sent there to act according to the rules of right and justice, and not for the benefit of this parish or that. According then to the strictest construction of those principles, would he record his vote and act at all times, while he held a seat on that floor.

Mr. Miles Taylor observed that the charges made by the delegate (Mr. Brent) against oppression being used towards a portion of the State, were altogether unsupported by solid fact; they were as idle as the wind, and destitute of all correctness.

According to the first report of the committee, it was proposed that the house should consist of seventy-two members, and to the seventeen parishes in the north-western portion of the State, nineteen representatives were allotted. The number now is fixed at ninety-eight members, and the seventeen parishes are increased to eighteen, with twenty-five members, which is a larger proportion of ninety-eight, than nineteen is of seventy-two. The Lafourche district, which had originally eleven representatives, has now but fourteen, which bears a less proportion by nearly one-third, while the north-west is increased nearly that amount. In regard to New Orleans, he considers nineteen representatives as her right, under the basis adopted, and thought that were a correct census available, she would be entitled to even a larger number. She would have a right to something over one-fifth at least, of the whole representation.

After a few words from Mr. Mayo, Mr. Benjamin's motion to lay on the table indefinitely, was put and carried. The yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Carriere, Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Leonard, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Preston, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Soule, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Wadsworth, Winchester, and Winder, voted in the affirmative—40 yeas; and

Messrs Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of East Baton Rouge, Scott of East Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff, voted in the negative—31 nays.

Mr. Beatty then renewed his motion for the adoption of the section.

Mr. Downs moved to limit the number of representatives for New Orleans to seventeen.

Mr. Grymes moved the previous question, which was: shall the main question be now put? and his motion prevailed. The yeas and nays being called for, it was found that,

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Carriere, Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Preston, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Wadsworth and Winder, voted in the affirmative—40 yeas; and son, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Waddill, Wedersfrandt and Wikoff, voted in the negative—30 nays.

The adoption of the section was then put and carried. The yeas and nays being called for, the following gentlemen voted in the affirmative:

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Beatty, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Carriere, Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Preston, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder—40 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of East Feliciana, Scott of East Baton-Rouge, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff—30 nays.

Mr. Brent moved that the committee be instructed to divide the apportionment as follows:

To give the	First Municipality	8
" "	Second "	6
" "	Third "	5
" "	Over the river	1

Mr. Conrad thought that the matter ought to be referred to the delegation from Orleans.

Mr. Culbertson said he thought there would be no effort on the part of any member of the city delegation to interfere unjustly with one portion of the city more than another.

Mr. Grymes considered it premature on the part of the Convention to interfere with the distribution of the city representations. For his own part he cared not how the matter was disposed of, but there was no possibility that the arrangement, if improper, could escape detection. Giving instructions before hand, seemed like an interference with the duties of the committee. When the report is made, the house will have it in their power to act as they think proper on it.

Mr. Brent having withdrawn his motion, the section as adopted was then referred to the Orleans delegation without opposition, and Mr. Marigny was appointed chairman.

The Convention then adjourned till tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Thursday, March 20, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer.

Mr. Cenas, on behalf of the Orleans delegation, to whom were referred the apportionment of twenty representatives to the parish of Orleans, reported the composition of the several districts in the three municipalities, and that the following should be the number allotted to each: First municipality eight, second municipality seven, third municipality four, and the right bank one.

Mr. Cenas called for the adoption of the report.

Mr. Winchester moved that the report be laid temporarily on the table, as all the members of the Orleans delegation were not in their seats.

Mr. Downs hoped that there would be no further postponement. He saw no necessity for deferring action upon the report, inasmuch as there was no difference of opinion, he presumed, upon it.

Mr. Claiborne hoped that the report would be laid on the table, subject to call. The only question was this, that the Orleans delegation were not all, at this moment, in their seats. The courtesy ought to be extended, so that they might participate in a matter exclusively affecting the city. They had been compelled to make this apportionment—to cut up and fractionize the city; this was a most difficult and unpleasant task. None were satisfied with its performance. One of the delegates had expressly dissented—that gentleman was not now in his seat. He hoped, under all the circumstances, that this matter would not be acted upon, but in the full presence of the city delegation.

The question was taken on the motion to postpone the consideration of the report, and it was lost.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the report.

Mr. CLAIBORNE begged that it be distinctly understood, that the Orleans delegation had acted through compulsion. This division of the city into petty fractions, was distasteful to all the citizens of New Orleans. Their representatives had acted through compulsion, and not through choice. For himself he could never accede to it.

The report was adopted.

Mr. RATLIFF, on behalf of the committee on contingent expenses, offered a resolution allowing $34, for the hire of a servant. After some remarks from Mr. Humble, and explanations from Mr. Ratliff, the resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Convention resumed the consideraion of the apportionment of representation.

Mr. MARIGNY suggested an alteration in the boundaries of one of the districts in the third municipality. This alteration was made, together with a correction suggested by Mr. Benjamin.

Mr. LEWIS proposed to fill the blank for taking the census, by inserting the year 1850. The United States census would then be taken, and the census-takers of the United States and of the State, would be a check upon each other.

Mr. VOORHIES said, that the gentleman's object would be better obtained, by fixing the period for taking the census of the State in 1851, and the succeeding legislature could make the apportionment with both before them.

Mr. MILES TAYLOR thought the census should be made as soon as practicable. We were unable to know precisely, when the first legislature, under the new constitution, would assemble. That legislature should ordain the taking of the census, and the succeeding legislature should ordain the apportionment. If the legislature assembled in 1846, the census might be taken in 1847, and the apportionment be made in 1848. He would propose 1847.

Mr. LEWIS conceived that 1850 would be long enough to postpone taking the census, and not too long. It would be best not to disturb the present apportionment, which was within two of the maximum number, until that period. We would see how it would work. He would, therefore, call for the vote upon 1850.

Mr. BENJAMIN saw no necessity for having the census taken by two different sets of officers. To have this statistical information twice in ten years, would be better than once in ten years. It would be very useful for other purposes. This might be done by prescribing that the first State census should be taken in 1847; the second in 1855; and then every tenth year thereafter—he would propose that as a substitute.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Voorhies' motion, to fill the blank with 1851, and it was lost.

The question recurred on Mr. Lewis' motion for 1850, and it was lost.

The Convention then took up Mr. Benjamin's proposition.

Mr. MILES TAYLOR withdrew his motion, and the proposition of Mr. Benjamin prevailed.

Mr. DUNN proposed a proviso after the fifth line to the sixth section, to the effect that each parish containing five thousand inhabitants, including slaves, shall be entitled to two representatives; and each parish containing one thousand inhabitants, shall be entitled to three representatives.

Mr. HUMBLE would rise to a point of order. This proposition had been twice rejected.

Mr. DUNN said that the subject matter had never been acted upon by the Convention. It formed a portion of the compromise offered by the delegate from New Orleans, Mr. Benjamin.

Mr. DOWNS: It has twice been rejected.

Mr. DUNN wished to explain the object he had in view in presenting the proposition. Its importance would be obvious upon a moment's reflection. The Convention had established a rule, that every parish should have one representative. The city of New Orleans was very populace. It was growing every day and would ultimately possess a very dense and concentrated population. Where was the check upon the city? Where was the protection for the country? In 1847, scarcely a single parish would be entitled to more than a single representative. The representative number would be raised, and the representation would be absorbed by the city of New Orleans. The country parishes would have each but a single representative. Was there any thing to act as a check, as a guard; any thing to prevent New Orleans from controlling the legislation of the State? Any thing here to preserve an equality of power between the city and the country? I do not know where to find it, and hence I have deemed it my duty to offer this proviso. As it is, the political power reside in the city of New Orleans and the smaller parishes, they will control the destinies of the State, and the voices of those parishes that contribute the heaviest taxes and have the greatest amount of operative labor, will be stifled. They will not be heard in the councils of the State. If it be the sense of the house that the equilibrium of political power shall be maintained, this proviso prevents that question. Gentlemen are wrong in supposing that it changes the basis of representation. It does not change that basis, but it preserves simply the rights of those parishes whose voices ought to be heard and respected—those that pay the most to the government, but who from the preponderance of slave labor have the smallest white population.

Mr. VOORHIES would move to lay this proposition indefinitely upon the table. It was clearly out of order. The same matter had been already before the Convention, and had been distinctly rejected. It is now attempted to revive it. The Convention after having had under advisement several propositions, have finally determined upon the basis of qualified voters. A proposition offered by the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) to restrict the city was rejected. And now that we have assumed the basis of qualified voters, we are asked to embody in the same provision the very contrary principle. How can they exist together. One or the other must prevail. The federal basis has been voted down. The proposition was out of order and therefore ought to be laid indefinitely upon the table.

Mr. DUNN called for the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay his proposition indefinitely upon the table.

Messrs. Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Burton, Cade, Cénas, Carriere, McCallop, Claiborne, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Porter, Ratliff, Read, Roselius, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, King, Labauve, Leonard, Legendre, Lewis, McRae, Mayo, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Peets, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Roman, Saunders, Soulé, Stephens, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Waddill and Wederstrandt—50 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Dunn, Guion, Porche, Pugh, St. Amand, Sellers and Winchester—7 nays.

Mr. Voorhies then moved for the adoption of the section.

Mr. CLAIBORNE asked for the reconsideration of the apportionment of representation for the city of New Orleans, for the purpose of moving that the city be divided into nine representative districts, so as to admit of the third municipality being divided into three districts. This will be much more convenient than dividing that municipality into two representative districts.

Mr. CULBERTSON sustained the motion made by Mr. Claiborne.

It was reconsidered and amended as suggested.

Mr. DUNN gave notice that he would move for the reconsideration of the vote granting three representatives to the parish of Plaquemines.

Mr. O'BRYAN moved for the consideration of the vote upon the apportionment to the parish of Natchitoches, and asked for a dispensation of the rules.

Mr. KENNER objected to the dispensation of the rules.

The question was taken and it was decided in the negative.

Mr. GARCIA gave notice that he would move for the reconsideration of the vote granting but one representative to the parish of St. John the Baptist.

Mr. Garcia complained that great injustice had been done to that parish in the apportionment.

Mr. MARIGNY gave notice that he would move for the reconsideration in the apportionment to Point Coupee, for the purpose of giving two representatives in place of one.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the section.

Mr. SAUNDERS said that it was obvious that the section met with the concurrence of a large majority of the house. In saying that he would vote against it, he would state his reasons without argument. The subject had been thoroughly discussed. He would not add any thing to that discussion—it would be useless, and he would confine himself to an emphatic vote against the section. It met with his concurrence but in a single respect, and that was that it would put an effectual stop to further legislation. We have had enough legislation to last us half a century. A body composed of half French, half Spaniards, and half Yankees could do no harm in a session of but 60 days, and that only once every two years.

He considered that the principle adopted for the basis, was the worst of all principles—it was the most unfair—the most uncertain upon which our action could have been predicated. The worst basis upon which the wealth, prosperity and intelligence of the State could depend. That was his leading objection. He had hoped that the house of representatives would have been diminished instead of being increased. A house of fifty members would have been large enough to have excluded corruption, and would have been much more convenient for the despatch of business. Our own experience had demonstrated to us that this body, consisting of seventy-seven members, was too large. By the apportionment of representation in the house, and the proposed increase in the senate, the legislature would be composed of 130 members. If there was no other argument, the argument of economy ought to have great weight. But it was inexpedient—these bodies were unwieldy. They would be found fit for no practical purpose, and the only result would be, as he had before said, that the legislation would be impeded and arrested. This, he repeated, was some consideration with him. The whole thing was wrong. He was convinced that one man would more effectually represent the interests of the city of New Orleans than twenty, and the same remark would apply to the other parishes.

Mr. Culbertson: suppose that this representative was to get sick; what would you do then?

Mr. Saunders: I would wait until he got well.

Mr. Claiborne would state the reasons why he would vote against the section. He considered that the city of New Orleans was, in effect, limited as effectually as if an express restriction had been placed upon her in the constitution as was originally proposed. Each parish had arbitrarily been allowed one representative, without reference to any basis whatever. There were forty-seven members apportioned in this way. We had reached the number ninety-eight, within two of the maximum number to which representation was allowed. It was utterly impossible for New Orleans under any future apportionment to obtain more members than were at present allotted to her, whatever might be the increase in her population. The balance of the representatives, after giving to the small parishes one representative, would be absorbed by the larger country parishes that would get two and three representatives. It was therefore apparent that the city of New Orleans would never possess more than one fifth of the political power of the State, and there, after all, is the restriction against which the delegation from the city have contended.

But the apportionment is not only unjust in reference to the city of New Orleans; it is unjust in reference to the country parishes in relation to each other. In some of the country parishes the qualified voters will predominate, while in others, from its operative labor, taxation will predominate. Representation will increase in the former while it will decrease in the latter. The latter will bear the burthens of the government, and will be denied a voice in the government. It will be taxation without representation. The idea was shocking—taxation and representation should go together; they were inseparable. A mixed basis with electors and taxation would have been more just and equal in its operation, both in reference to the city and to the country parishes. The principle of this apportionment was then most unjust.

Another very serious objection that he had to it was, that the amity of representation in the city of New Orleans had been completely destroyed. It was cut up into minute fragments, against the will of the citizens, and with no other view than to divide and separate its interests, and to weaken the assertion and maintenance of them. He would therefore vote against the section.

Mr. Lewis said that he would vote in favor of the section, although he did not approve of the measure in every particular.

Mr. Porter would vote against the section for reasons very different from those assigned by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Claiborne.) He considered there were no restrictions upon the city of New Orleans, and he thought some restrictions were indispensably necessary for the protection of the country.

Mr. Ratliff would vote in favor of the section, but would join in a motion for the reconsideration in order to reduce the number of representatives to fifty. It was absurd to place the maximum at one hundred and then go as far as ninety-eight. Why did we not apportion one hundred at once, or make it ninety-eight. The yeas and nays were called for, and the following was the result.

Yeas—Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Burton, Cade, Cénas, Chambliss, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Labauve, Legendre, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Mazureau, O'Brien, Peets, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Ratliff, Read, Roselius, Soulé, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Stephens, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Winder—50 yeas.

Nays—Messrs. Boudousquie, Claiborne, Dunn, Garcia, Kenner, Marigny, Roman, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of St. Landry, Wikoff and Porter—12 nays.

Mr. Downs moved that the Convention take up the section in relation to the apportionment of representation in the senate; which motion prevailed.

The question pending when the subject was last before the Convention was the motion of Mr. Downs to substitute the report of the minority for that of the majority.

Mr. Guion said that he could not concur with either the report of the minority or the report of the majority of the committee. He would offer a new project, and would move that it be printed, and that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until Saturday.

The motion to print was carried.

Mr. Mayo had no objection to the printing, but he thought we might as well proceed with the discussion of the subject. He moved for a reconsideration of the vote postponing the consideration of the subject until Saturday. It was lost.

Mr. Benjamin moved to take up the article of impeachment.

Mr. Dunn thought it better to establish the judiciary first.

It was taken up.

The first section of the article on the subject of impeachment being under consideration,

Mr. Mayo offered the following as a substitute: "The power of impeachment for all officers, except clerks of court, justices of the peace, sheriffs, coroners, and all other parish officers, shall be vested in the house of representatives alone."

Mr. Mayo said, that the object of the substitute, as would be seen from its terms, was to change the mode of trying parish officers; to take that power from the legislature, and confer it upon the courts of the several parishes in which the officers resided, and where they had their residence.

There are many reasons which present themselves to my mind in favor of a trial by the courts, though I confess this subject has been suddenly and unexpectedly brought up, and I have not had time to prepare a substitute with as much care as I could desire, nor to arrange my ideas so as to present them to the Convention in as clear a manner as I ought. My object is to have a provision established that will insure justice to officers, and to the people, whose servants they are—which, I think, the provision reported is calculated to prevent. It is true, the present provision is in the words of the old constitution. "The power of impeachment shall be vested in the house of representatives alone." The effect of this provision has been generally to prevent justice. Officers, especially those who hold their offices for a short period, as sheriffs, are seldom sought to be impeached, when guilty of misdemeanors in office, on account of the great trouble and expense to the prosecutor, witnesses and the State, that would accompany the prosecution; and if charged before the legislature, the prosecution is generally a political one, in which the conviction or acquittal depends upon the influence of the political parties in the legislature.

This is a kind of trial which of all others known to our laws, ought to be avoided. Officers, sir, it is well known, are generally just as good as other men, and no better. Why then should they not be placed upon an equality with other men, in the mode of administering justice to them? I confess, sir, that the reason why they should not, especially parish officers, is incomprehensible to me. All other men must have their rights of life, liberty and property, decided on by the courts. This is, it appears to me, the mode which is most likely to ensure justice to all. It appears to me, sir, to be peculiarly proper that officers against whom causes of complaint exist, should pass through the usual ordeal of being presented to the grand jury in the first instance. If the charge is thought to be well founded by the grand jury, and sufficient to justify them in finding an indictment, they will do so, and the case will be presented to the court and petit jury as criminal cases are for final trial. If the grand jury think no sufficient cause exists to put an officer upon his trial they will not find a bill, and thus the matter will end. The officer will be saved the mortification and infamy of being publicly put upon a trial without a cause. If, on the contrary, the accusation be presented to the legislature, the charge becomes one of notoriety, and whether true or false, must fix in the minds of the public a stigma upon the character of the accused, that it will take years to correct.

If in the event of a trial being had in the courts, a bill be found, the officer accused has the assurance of being tried by a jury of men with whom he is acquainted, and who are acquainted with him; they know and are qualified to judge from their knowledge of his general deportment of the motives by which he has been actuated in whatever he may be charged with doing, or omitting to do. If he is guilty, they will be as likely to award his justice as members of the legislature, who know nothing about him; and if innocent, surely he will be in but little danger from a jury, all of whom must concur to convict him.

Another reason exists for this measure, which I think is peculiarly entitled to consideration, which is, that the sessions of the legislature are to be biennial only. I believe it is generally desired by members of the Convention to limit the term of office of the parish officers to about two years. If so, and both the members of the legislature and parish officers come into office together, an impeachment of a parish officer could hardly ever take place, for they would hardly be guilty of a misdemeanor, and have a charge presented to the legislature within the sixty days, the time to which sessions of the legislature are limited; and if not then, and they hold their offices but two years, they will serve out their whole time, notwithstanding the most aggravated charges exist against them before the next session of the legislature will take place, and consequently there will be no means of reaching them whatever. I hope, sir, that the substitute will be adopted.

Mr. Dunn said that, as the chairman of the committee had not seen proper to take the floor, he deemed it his duty to reply to the arguments of the gentleman, (Mr. Mayo.) I consider, said Mr. Dunn, that the legislature is the proper tribunal for the trial of all public officers. As for the proposition of the gentleman (Mr. Mayo) that parish officers should be an exception to the general rule, I do not think it would work well. For example, take the office of sheriff. The sheriff is a most important public officer; a great deal, if not every thing in his official duties, depends upon his promptitude and stern independence; otherwise his duties would not be properly executed. It is a situation of great responsibility, and its incumbent should not heedlessly be exposed to the malignity of evil minded persons, who would be ready to get up a prosecution against him on account of his prompt discharge of his official duties. Proceedings might be instituted against him by such persons, with no expectation of procuring his conviction, but merely with a view of spreading their accusation upon record. It would be opening the door for the malicious. The argument of the gentleman that the trials of public officers for official misconduct, could be had in the same manner as in ordinary criminal cases, would not hold good for many reasons. The object in ordinary cases is to maintain the supremacy of the laws, and to inflict the punishment which their violation deserves. There is no other motive. But if a public officer were submitted to the same kind of trial, upon allegations of misconduct, other considerations would enter largely into the investigation. It might be considered an object of paramount importance to convict him for the purpose of removing him and obtaining his office, whereas, in an ordinary prosecution for murder or larceny, no other feeling prevails but the desire to maintain the law. The provision under consideration would expose a public officer to the machinations of his enemies. The popular tide might be roaring against him, and at this unpropitious moment they would sacrifice their victim. They would raise the cry against him of mad dog, and in times of high excitement, he would be debarred the privilege of establishing his innocence. It will be recollected that it is not very long since several sheriffs in Mississippi resigned their offices, because they were threatened with being lynched if they discharged their duties. The same thing may possibly occur in Louisiana and ought there not to be some protection, for the independence of so responsible an officer. I would have public officers independent; not exposed to be assailed at every step, and to be placed under a criminal accusation at the mere will and pleasure of persons whose ill will they may have encountered. Malignant motives might lurk behind these accusations; they might be got up by an unsuccessful competitor. The object of a public trial is to obtain an impartial verdict. To place the accused beyond the influence of personal ill will. The house of representatives is most evidently fitted for the trial of public officers, who may have laid themselves open to the charge of dereliction of duty. And am I to be told that that enlightened body, combining the concentrated wisdom of the State, is less competent to try a public officer than the ordinary juries of the parishes. These jurors may be influenced by prejudice, passion or interest, in a matter in which they may be personally connected. If the only objection to the impeachment and trial by the legislature is the consumption of time, this is an objection of but little weight. The time of the legislature has heretofore been but little occupied with impeachments.

It is the business of the government to protect public officers in the discharge of their duties. Impeachments should not be easy. The bad passions of men were constantly at work. Man was a frail and wicked being. It was unjust to draw a distinction between officers of a higher and lower grade. The character of the sheriff was as dear to him as the character of the governor or the judges of the supreme court. There should be no distinction; we should mete out justice to all. What democratic principle authorized any such distinction. The same privilege was due to all alike.

Mr. Grymes was not prepared to say that he was opposed to this proposition, so far as it was intended to provide ways and means for the speedy trial of minor officers accused of malfeasance. But he had very serious objections to introducing this matter into this article. The power of impeachment resided alone in the house of representatives, and there it ought to reside. If the gentleman from Catahoula (Mr. Mayo) intended that the legislature should be invested with the power of providing by law for the trial of sheriffs and other parochial officers, I would have no objection. But I do not call that an impeachment.

Mr. Mayo said there appeared to be no difference in the object designed by him and the views expressed by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Grymes.) The only difference was in the mode of effecting the object. He may have misconceived the term impeachment, but as he understood that term, it was the trial and conviction of a public officer for a misdemeanor while in office. If his proviso were adopted it would have the effect of relieving the legislature from the trial of cases where parochial officers were involved, upon charges of malfeasance. That appeared also to be the design of the delegate from New Orleans.

Mr. Conrad considered the system of subjecting impeachments to the house of representatives as very defective, and very objectionable. It was attended with great expense, great inconvenience, and great trouble, and was insufficient to secure the end proposed. It had found its way into our constitution, and into the constitutions of other States, merely because it was accidentally embodied into the constitution of the United States. He said accidentally, because, in examining the proceedings of the federal convention, he found that in the three or four drafts that had been prepared of a constitution, impeachments had been invariably assigned to the judiciary department, and that the leading men in that convention, such as Hamilton, Madison and Pinckney, were in favor of confiding it to that department. How it came afterwards to be lodged in the senate, we were unable to discover from the debates in the convention, but it appeared that several States voted against it. The experiment has proved to be an unfortunate one, and whatever may be the intellectual superiority of the senate of the United States, it is one of the most inappropriate bodies that could have been selected for the purpose.

The increase in our senate would make it very unwieldly for such investigations. He (Mr. Conrad) would suggest as a better plan, that a provision be adopted directing that a commmittee of twelve members of the senate should be appointed, who, together with the judges of the supreme court, should hear and determine all cases of impeachments. This would secure a speedy trial, and would obviate many of the objections that exist against the present mode of proceeding.

Mr. Conrad then submitted the following substitute.

Impeachments of the governor, lieutenant governor or secretary of State, shall be tried by the senate and the chief justice of the supreme court, who, in such cases, shall preside.

Impeachments of the judges of the supreme court shall be tried by the senate.

Impeachments of all inferior judges and clerks of courts, shall be tried by the supreme court.

All other impeachments shall be tried by a committee of not less than members of the senate, presided by the presiding judge of the supreme court, for the time being.

Mr. Beatty had a few words to say upon the proposition now before the house. He was not in favor of any project that would require the impeachment or trial of inferior officers by the legislature. The proceedings in relation to them should be regulated by law. He was not prepared to fix upon any particular plan. The only difficulty, in his mind, was in reference to the inferior judges. In ordinary cases, if the grand jury found a true bill against a public officer, the proceedings might be had before an inferior court; and with regard to inferior judges, if they were charged with derelictions, the matter might be investigated by the superior court. He thought a larger discretion should be placed in the legislature. So far from impeachments being too easy, he thought it more likely that there would be greater difficulty in getting rid of improper officers, than retaining good ones.

Whereupon, Mr. Marigny moved that the Convention adjourn over until Monday next, on account of the religious services of Friday and Saturday. The yeas and nays were called for, and the motion to adjourn prevailed.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer by the Hon. delegate from Sabine, Mr. Stephens.

The journal of Thursday was read and approved.

Mr. Wadsworth rose to ask leave of absence for a few days for Mr. Leonard. He observed, that in order to gratify that gentleman's friends, and the members of the Convention, he would inform the house that though Mr. Leonard was wounded, yet he was not so mortally, and he would be able to take his seat in a few days.

Leave of absence was granted to Messrs. Mayo, Wederstrandt and Trist, for a few days.

Mr. Culbertson moved to insert on the journal the reason of an adjournment from Thursday over to Monday (this day,) which was, that good Friday and the day following, were rigidly observed by persons of the Catholic faith.

The motion to insert was ruled by the President as not being in order, and was withdrawn.

Mr. Wadsworth presented a letter from the English printers, praying for additional compensation for the work done by them for the Convention.

On motion of Mr. Downs, the same was referred to the committee on contingent expenses.

Mr. Beatty gave notice, that he would on Thursday next, bring before the house a new basis for the future distribution of representation, without any reference to that at present adopted by the Convention.

Mr. Downs moved to take up the report on the senatorial representation.

The President said that the last subject under consideration, when the Convention adjourned, was the first in order, and should have the preference.

Mr. Claiborne coincided with the opinion of the chair, and hoped that the unfinished business would be proceeded with at once.

Mr. Downs moved to lay the unfinished business (the law of impeachment) on the table, subject to call, with a view to take up the senatorial representation reports.

The motion was then put, and the yeas and nays being called for, it was found that

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Cenas, Chambliss, Couvillion, Downs, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Lewis, O'Bryan, Pects, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of East Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill and Wikoff, voted in the affirmative—27 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Claiborne, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Garrett, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, Roman, Sellers, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, and Wadsworth, voted in the negative—26 nays.

Mr. Walker would then in consequence, he said, of the thin attendance of members, give his casting vote in the negative, and the motion was lost.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The report of the committee to whom was referred the article of the new constitution on impeachment.

First section. "That the power of impeachment shall be vested in the house of representatives alone."

Mr. Mayo on Thursday, offered as an amendment to the above: "That the power of impeachment, for all officers except clerks of courts, justices of the peace, sheriffs, coroners and all other parish officers, shall be vested in the house of representatives alone."

Mr. Soule said, that the latter clause of the amendment could not well be sustained there, as it would place the parish judge beyond the reach of impeachment. He would therefore move the adoption of the first section of the report from the committee, as it clearly concentrates the principle of impeachment in the house of representatives. By subsequent sections, the officers who may be impeached can be more easily defined, and the tribunals before whom they should be tried, can be also laid down.

Mr. Downs was opposed to laying the amendment on the table without giving the matter some consideration. It might be said, indeed it was so found, that in some cases the uncertain test of impeachment was found to be a failure of justice. But it might be amended so as to obviate such a result. It was perhaps, going too far not to enumerate any particular officers, and might become a dangerous principle; but it is well known that sheriffs have been before now impeached, and that no good was ever derived from the process, but on the contrary, the State was put to much expense, and without any good result being obtained.

Mr. Soule perfectly agreed with the views expressed by Mr. Downs; but repeated that his object was merely to let the first section contain the principle that impeachment was to be concentrated in the legislature, then it will be easy to define how it is to be applied and regulated.

Mr. Miles Taylor remarked, that he considered the first step to be, to invest the power of impeachment in the proper place; the object was, as all knew, to insure good government. It is a principle adopted by other States, as well as by the general government, and he was decidedly of opinion that it should be invested in the house of representatives, without any restriction. That is the grand inquest of the State, and when the representatives of the people think any officer has behaved improperly in the discharge of his official duty, it shall and ought to be their right to declare it. Then if he is convicted on such charge by two-thirds of the senate, he shall be discharged. The law of impeachment is to reach and punish acts, that under ordinary legislation cannot be reached. It is easy however, to obviate all possible inconveniences by granting to the legislature the power to try by such process as they may deem fit, other officers than those to be named in this law. We have a law now, that when a justice of the peace or a parish judge shall extort large fees in his office, he may be impeached, and tried by the district judges. But it has been known that in many instances, the district judges have felt unwilling to remove from office judges and justices who have been guilty of high misdemeanors. And again, there are a multitude of inferior officers, who often commit malfeasances, and for these proper provisions, should be made by the legislature, that such acts be brought before competent tribunals, who would punish such acts. He had no objection to the unrestricted power being vested, therefore, in the house of representatives, and afterwards introducing general provisions.

The PRESIDENT said that if the section was taken up in division, he thought it would save much time and trouble.

Mr. SOULE moved to lay Mr. Mayo's amendment on the table. Carried without dissent.

Mr. VOORHIES moved to add after the last word in the first section, the words "subject to the modifications hereinafter to be made."

Mr. BEATTY considered the addition as being useless, as the powers and modifications of the bill could be clearly defined in the subsequent sections.

Mr. BRENT was in favor of a proviso by which the trial of inferior officers would be held before the district court.

Mr. BEATTY was as much in favor of the qualifying clause as Mr. Brent; but it will come better within the province of the legislature to make such a provision, than in that of the Convention.

Mr. LEWIS said that as far as practicable every section of the article would be construed with reference to each other. He understood impeachment to be a charge or accusation brought against an individual, and, therefore, the power of impeachment is the power to accuse, and, consequently, is wholly distinct from trial or judgment.—The object of impeachment is to reach crimes that cannot well be come at under ordinary legislation. Leave, therefore, the broad power of impeachment in the house of representatives alone, and then come to definitions. He considered the addition offered by Mr. Voorhies as wholly unnecessary. He did not believe that the power of impeachment, which is the accusation of a public functionary, could be subjected properly to strict modification; the principle must be a general one in the constitution. It is so in the constitution of other states in the Union; it is contained in that of the general constitution of the United States, and it may be found in the house of commons of England. He was opposed to the introduction of any modification of the section, because none could be made with direct reference to any result. Mr. Voorhies' amendment was then put and lost. The adoption of the section was then called for, and being put, was carried unanimously.

Mr. BENJAMIN offered, in the absence of his colleague (Mr. Conrad, of New Orleans) the following, as a substitute for the second section of the article reported by the committee:

"Impeachments of the governor, lieutenant governor and secretary of state shall be tried by the senate and the chief justice of the supreme court, who, in such cases, shall preside."

Mr. BEATTY moved to insert "attorney general," after lieutenant governor, in the substitute; and his amendment was adopted.

Mr. DOWNS moved to insert "state treasurer," after "secretary of state," in the same section; to which there was no objection offered.

Mr. CENAS moved the insertion of the words "or senior associate judge of said court, after "chief justice," &c., as the latter officer might be, under certain circumstances, rendered ineligible to preside. This amendment was also adopted.

Mr. DOWNS moved to insert after the words "state treasurer," in the section, "and district judge."

Mr. BRENT was of opinion that after descending from the judges of the supreme court, all other officers should be tried by the same process as ordinary criminals.

Mr. Benjamin was opposed to the amendment. He thought that the independence of the district judges could be as well maintained by trial before the supreme court, as before the senate. Impeachment cannot be made against them but by the grand inquest; and those charges which are likely to be preferred can be better judged and appreciated by men well versed in judicial proceedings, such as the judges of the supreme court, than they possibly could by the senate, a majority of whom in all probability are but little learned in those matters. Besides this, an expense of two or three hundred dollars a day pending a trial before the senate, is entailed upon the state; whereas, the supreme court judges being salaried officers, a trial before that body will be comparatively trifling as to the expense. With these views, he was satisfied that the supreme court was a proper tribunal for the trial of district judges.

Mr. Downs could not agree with the views of the last speaker for the reasons laid down. He did not feel satisfied that important trials arising from impeachment might be committed to the judges of the supreme court. It was well remarked by an eminent and talented man (Judge Story) that the trial by impeachment by the senate, which at first appeared to be an anomaly, was found a great safeguard in political affairs. It was found of great value in other countries—in the house of lords of Great Britain, in the United States senate; impeachment involved, generally speaking, political offences; and it is well understood that the members of a senate are better practically acquainted with politics than could be the bench of the supreme court. Thus, charges arising from political excitement against any individual are seldom brought by that party to which he belongs; and if we constitute a high judicial court a tribunal for the hearing of political cabals, we shall convert it into an arena of politics; no matter what the results may be, one party will applaud, another will be sure to condemn. The supreme court should be thought far beyond the reach of all political feelings. He was aware that improvements were necessary, but for all other officers, a general clause, he thought, might be introduced.

Mr. Lewis argued in favor of the independence of the district judges being fully maintained. They had trials of great consideration and importance brought before them, and generally were appealed to as a final resort; therefore it was necessary that they should be placed beyond the reach of frivolous and harrassing pursuits, and be rendered just as independent in the discharge of their official duties as the judges of the supreme court. He hoped the Convention would continue to maintain the same principles which had governed the citizens of Louisiana since she had been erected into a State.

Mr. Downs moved to add "judges of the commercial and criminal court of New Orleans, and judges next in jurisdiction to the supreme court."

After some modification, Mr. Downs' amendment was inserted in the section; after which it was adopted, as follows:

Sec. 2. Impeachment of the governor, lieutenant governor, attorney general, secretary of State, State treasurer, judges of the criminal court, and judges of courts next in jurisdiction to the supreme court, shall be tried by the senate and the chief justice of the supreme court, who in such cases shall preside, or in his absence, the senior associate judge of said court.

Impeachment of the judges of the supreme court shall be tried by the senate.

Mr. Beatty moved to add another clause: "Provided, that the legislature shall enact a law for the trial and removal from office, of justices of the peace, and all other officers of the State, by indictment or otherwise."

Mr. Downs wished to add an amendment to include the "punishment," as well as removal of offenders.

Mr. Beatty having accepted the amendment offered by Mr. Downs:

Mr. Taylor of Assumption, said he was more in favor of the original suggestion. The object under consideration was solely the removal from office of bad officers; the legislature could apply other punishment at any time, when the offence required it. A high judicial functionary when impeached was liable to be removed from office; but if his acts were criminal, he would be subject to the ordinary tribunals of the coun try afterwards. He thought this would be making a distinction highly necessary between inferior and higher officers.

Mr. SELLERS inquired if this impeachment were to extend to military as well as civil officers?

Mr. TAYLOR of Assumption, moved to strike out "punishment," and add to the clause the words "for misdemeanor in office."

Mr. CONRAD thought that "punishment" was unnecessary; the removal from office was all that was now required. Crimes were punishable by law, and there is no law to prevent a judge from being punished, no more than any other individual.

Mr. DOWNS contended that the amendment offered by him was an important one. He could well imagine cases where removal from office would be very inadequate to the offence that might be complained of. Cases where great oppression might be exercised by sheriffs or others: and the main reason why he would support the introduction, was that it would more fully secure the accountability of all officers.

Mr. TAYLOR of Assumption, said that the class of officers alluded to were now punishable by law. Justices of the peace were punished if they exacted high or exorbitant fees, and there were a variety of other acts that were already provided against in the statutes. In this case he did not see how they (the Convention) could go beyond the "removal from office."

Mr. EUSTIS was in favor of including the power of punishment, because the criminal powers of the State extends only to a class of offences which are defined, where the laws of impeachment is intended for a class of offenders which cannot be defined; and he would, therefore, instead of bringing an offender before one tribunal for removal from office, and sending him before another for the crime, vest the whole power in the one, and include both punishment and removal.

Mr. CONRAD thought the amendment of Mr. Downs not only useless but dangerous. If, as was observed, the law of impeachment is confined to offences which are not susceptible of strict definition, it is proper that judgment shall not extend beyond removal from office. If a man is to be punished, who commits a crime, is it not well known that no one can be tried and punished for an offence not defined by law beforehand? It would be a subversion of the principles of free government, to punish a man for an offence not laid down in the law. The legislature are prohibited by the constitution from enacting an ex post facto law. The constitution of the United States contains the same principle. He hoped that the law of impeachment would not be permitted to extend beyond the removal from office.

After some observations of Mr. BEATTY, in the affirmative, the question to strike out "punishment" was put, and lost; and the clause was adopted as follows:

"The legislature shall provide by law, for the trial, punishment and removal of all other officers of the State, by indictment or otherwise."

Mr. CENAS moved the following as a substitute to the report of the committee, which was adopted as follows:

SEC. 3. All officers against whom accusations of impeachment shall be preferred, shall be suspended from their office during the pendency of their trial.

To which was added, on motion of Mr. Benjamin:

Provided, That the appointing powers may make a provisional appointment to fill such vacancies until the decision shall be made on such impeachment.

On motion of Mr. DOWNS, the first clause of section four of the committee report, "the governor and all the civil officers shall be liable to impeachment for any misdemeanors in office," was stricken out, and the remainder of the section was adopted:

SEC. 4. Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold any office of honor or trust under this State; but the parties convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, and punishment according to law.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Section ten of the majority report on the senatorial representation.

The State shall be divided into eight senatorial districts, each of which shall elect four senators, to be voted for by persons entitled to vote for representatives, &c.

Mr. DOWNS moved to take up the report of the minority as a substitute for that of the majority.

Mr. Beatty moved the following resolution: That the State be divided into —— districts, each to return two senators.

Mr. Downs moved to strike out "eight" in the section.

Mr. Conrad proposed an adjournment in consequence of the absence of some delegates on professional engagements. The motion was lost.

Mr. Beatty renewed his motion and proposed sixteen districts. He proposed this number in consequence of the present practice, well known, that exists, of senators controlling the appointments by the executive made in their districts. Many other abuses, now prevailing, would be removed by this arrangement.

Mr. Miles Taylor said that although the subject had been a good deal discussed before, yet a part of what had been said on that occasion might have been forgotten. As he was one of the majority committee who reported the proposed number, (eight) he would wish to make a few remarks in support of it. He considered that correct principles and sound policy require that the State should be divided into large districts, and by an attentive examination of other constitutions this view will be clearly sustained. The great object of legislation is to secure wise action on the part of the members comprising the legislative body, and in view of that opinion it has been ordained that there shall be two distinct bodies. The senatorial branch is designed to act as a check upon the lower house, and in order to secure great and wise deliberation; to prevent the passage of laws which may have been adopted in the house owing to the peculiar construction of it, and when only a minority of the people were in favor of them; because it often happens that a majority of the members have been elected by a minority of the people, owing to the division of the electoral districts, then therefore this check becomes eminently necessary. This may not be secured by electing senators from parishes, for then the same constituencies will be electing both senators and representatives in the lower house. The most obvious remedy is, therefore, to throw several parishes into one senatorial district. At least let each of the senatorial be comprised of two electoral districts. By this means will be secured the more equal representation of the people, as parishes of different political complexion will be merged in one body when electing their senators. This was no novelty; large senatorial districts have been adopted in New York, in Michigan, and elsewhere; if lessons are to be had from experience, he would only point to the New England States. In seventeen States the senate is returned by a different constituency to that by which the house of representatives is elected, and that was the principle which he wished to see preserved here. When the subject came up regularly before the house, he would, however, be prepared more fully to investigate the matter. At present he trusted that the motion would not prevail.

The motion to adjourn was then renewed and carried, till to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

Tuesday, March 25, 1845.

The Convention met, and its proceedings were opened with prayer.

Mr. Boudousquie asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. Chinn, confined to his room by illness.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the project reported by the majority of the committee on the legislative department, providing for the apportionment of the senate, together with the project of the minority of the same committee, offered by Mr. Downs as a substitute for the report of the majority of the committee.

Mr. Guion had presented the following as a substitute for both reports:

The Senate shall consist of thirty-two members, to be elected for four years, by persons qualified to vote for representatives, and the apportionment of Senators shall be as follows, to wit:

The parishes of Plaquemines, St. Bernard and Jefferson, together with that portion of the parish of Orleans on the right bank of the river Mississippi, shall constitute the first district, with three senators.

All that portion of the parish of Orleans lying on the left side of the river, shall constitute the second district, with four senators.

The parishes of St. Charles and St. John the Baptist, shall constitute the third district with one senator.

The parishes of St. James and Ascension shall constitute the fourth district with two senators.

The parishes of Assumption, Lafourche Interior and Terrebonne, shall constitute the fifth district, with two senators.

The parishes of Iberville, West Baton Rouge and Pointe Coupée, shall constitute the sixth district, with two senators.

The parishes of West Feliciana and East Feliciana, shall constitute the seventh district, with two senators.

The parish of East Baton Rouge, shall constitute the eighth district, with one senator.

The parishes of Washington, St. Tammany, St. Helena and Livingston, shall constitute the ninth district, with two senators.

The parishes of Concordia and Tensas shall constitute the tenth district, with one senator.

The parishes of Madison and Carroll, shall constitute the eleventh district, with one senator.

The parishes of Avoyelles and Rapides, shall constitute the twelfth district, with two senators.

The parishes of Catahoula, Caldwell and Franklin, shall constitute the thirteenth district, with one senator.

The parishes of Ouachita, Union, Morehouse and Jackson, shall constitute the fourteenth district, with one senator.

The parishes of Natchitoches, Caddo, Sabine, De Soto and Claiborne, shall constitute the fifteenth district, with three senators.

The parishes of St. Landry and Calcasieu shall constitute the sixteenth district, with two senators.

The parishes of St. Martin, St. Mary, Lafayette and Vermillion, shall constitute the seventeenth district, with two senators.

The question in order was the motion to strike out "eight" as the number of districts, (which motion had been made the preceding day,) from the report of the majority of the committee.

Mr. Guion said, that having submitted his proposition as a substitute for the reports both of the majority and minority of the committee on the legislative department, it became him, in a few words, to explain his views in relation to the several propositions. He was opposed to the project of the gentleman from Assumption, (Mr. Taylor) because the districts were too large. It approximated too much to the general ticket system, which formerly prevailed in several of the States for the election of members to Congress, and which had been repudiated by almost every State in the Union. He had still another objection to it. It commingled different populations, different interests, and different feelings; which were irreconcileable. The proposition of the minority of the committee, presented by Mr. Downs, was objectionable because the districts were too small. He could concur in neither of these propositions, and hence he had embodied his views in a separate proposition. In making it out, he had kept in view three elements, which he deemed indispensable to the formation of the senate. They were population, territory, wealth or taxation. He had endeavored to bring his project as near these principles as possible. There might be, and were probably, errors in it; they were open to amendment. But as far as his vote went, he could not consent to any other legislation than one that combined territory, population and wealth.

Mr. Miles Taylor had a few words to say in reply to the gentleman from Lafourche (Mr. Guion) in respect to what that delegate calls the general ticket system. He dislikes it, he says, because it approximates to the general ticket system which congress has repudiated. I admit that congress have legislated so as to prevent the election of its members by the general ticket system. But the objection did not grow out of any vice inherent in the general ticket system. The measure was adopted to protect the small States from the combined action of the larger States. The representation of the several States being unequal—some of them were so large as to be entitled to forty representatives, and others were so small as to be entitled to only one. A number of the States elected their representation in congress by general ticket—for example: Georgia, Alabama, and New Jersey. These were States of a medium size, and were undivided in their representation on the one side or the other of any political question. This gave them a preponderating influence over States where the district system prevailed, and the larger States in order to maintain their weight would have been induced to adopt the same system; the result of which would have been that a majority of but a single vote would have returned the forty representatives to which the State of New York was entitled. The same would have been the result in Pennsylvania, and the other larger States, and they would have controlled the legislation of the country in favor of the one or the other of the political party which may have obtained the local majority. Congress were not vested with the power of placing the States upon a perfect equality, by reducing the larger States to a size bearing a tolerable proportion with the smaller States. The only power possessed by congress was to divide or district the States so as to preclude a concentration of their power. The circumstances here are essentially different. We can effect the same object by more direct means by equalizing the senatorial districts, which congress had not the power to do in reference to the States in their representation to that body.

There can be no doubt that large districts are more favorable to ascertaining the will of the majority. By the district system as applied to congress, it may happen and has happened, that a minority in the State, by a peculiar distribution of the district, have elected a majority of the representatives. It will be seen that there is nothing in common with the reasons that induced congress to direct elections to be held by districts, and the motives which should govern us in apportioning the representation to the senate. Moreover, congress legislated in reference to a different body than the one which now claims our attention. By throwing the State into large districts, we approximate nearer to the will of the majority. The conflicting majorities in the several parishes neutralize each other, and the result is determined by the aggregate vote of the several parishes. But, Mr. President, the delegate from Lafourche (Mr. Guion) has assumed another ground of objection. He says that the report of the majority, throws together people of different interests and of different feelings. If that gentleman will take the pains to examine the report, he will find that he is in error. With the exception of but one single district, the districts are formed of parishes having a great similarity of interests, and in the district in which perhaps there is some apparent dissimilarity, it is quite possible that the interests of the component parts will become identical.

The first district embraces the city of New Orleans. I imagine there is a perfect identity of interests in that district.

The second district is composed of sugar parishes.

The third district is composed of sugar parishes.

The fourth district is composed of sugar parishes, but cotton may be cultivated.

The fifth district is composed of cotton parishes.

The sixth district is composed of cotton parishes.

The seventh district is composed of cotton parishes.

There is but one district in which are combined parishes of opposing interests—that is parishes which cultivate different staples. It embraces Iberville and Avoyelles—some sugar parishes and some cotton parishes; but it is not certain that sugar will not become the sole staple in that district. At any rate, this is the only district liable to the gentleman's objections. I doubt whether any plan could be suggested that could throw together local interests with greater uniformity than the one under consideration.

Mr. Downs said he hoped that the project advocated by the gentleman who had just resumed his seat, and who had announced himself as the author of the project, would not prevail. If the gentleman's argument were good, why not extend it further, and instead of dividing the State into eight large senatorial districts, say that there should be but one single district, comprising the whole State, and that the members composing the senate shall be elected by general ticket? If it be a good rule, it should operate to its full extent. Perhaps the gentleman thinks that like taking arsenic for the chills and fever, it is excellent in small quantities. It reminds me, said Mr. Downs, of an anecdote I once heard, of a person who took a dose of medicine without knowing of what it was composed; he took a small dose at first, and he thought it done him so much good that he would take a double dose, in order to perfect the cure; it came near killing him.

This, I presume, may be the case with the gentleman's (Mr. Taylor's) proposition. If it be so good, we had better take a double dose.

I cannot see why local interests should not be immediately represented. The closer you can establish the connection between the representative and the constituency, the nearer you approach the perfection of the system. If the proposition of the gentleman (Mr. Taylor) were to prevail, it might happen that a man would be sent to the senate from a district where every voter in the parish of his residence might have voted against him, and that for particular reasons which would operate in the remote parishes. Mr. D. instanced the formation of his own senatorial district, in the report of the majority, in illustration, it was composedd of remote parishes; it might be in the power of the parishes on the Ouachita to elect the senator, or might be in the power of the parishes adjacent to the Mississippi. In either case it would be unnecessary for th candidate to consult any but the predominating influence. Either you must place the representative in immediate contact with the represented, or it will be tantamount with those not in immediate contact, and who do not possess a direct influence, to have no representative at all. Take for example the parishes of Avoyelles and East Baton Rouge. If East Baton Rouge have the preponderating influence, is it to be presumed that she will elect a man residing in Avoyelles, however good a man he may be to represent her interests? Or can it be presumed that such a person can represent her interests as effectually as one of her own local citizens, who is familiar with all her wants? For all practical purposes, the remote parish having the minority of voters, might as well not vote at all. According to the distribution of districts as proposed by the delegate from Assumption, (Mr. Taylor) it would be necessary only for a candidate to consult and obtain the favor of the voters residing in the parish that combined the majority of the votes; as for the smaller parishes, he might treat them with the utmost indifference. For myself, were I to offer in such a district, every voter in the parish of Ouachita might vote against me, and still I might be elected. I might tell the people of Ouachita to go to the devil, for there were enough votes in Catahoula to elect me. Such a system would be intolerable, and although there were good things in the constitution, it might so exasperate the people that they might reject it upon that ground alone. I hope it will be struck out. I am glad to be undeceived as to the paternity of this project. I had supposed that it emanated from the gentleman from St. James, (Mr. Winchester) and I must confess that I was much perplexed, how one whose views were like my own, more practical than thoeretical, could have devised such a plan. It does not belong to that gentleman, but comes from one who is remarkable for his novel theories. But come from where it may, I am opposed to it, and I trust it will be thrown aside.

Mr. Miles Taylor said he was unwilling to trespass upon the attention of the Convention; but inasmuch as this obnoxious project has been referred to me for its paternity, I shall say what occurs to my mind in support of it. What the gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) says about its being rejected, may very well happen; but its rejection will not, I opine, determine it to be a bad system. It will not show it to be impolitic—it will not determine that its adoption would not have been advantageous to the State, and subserve the interests of the people. That delegate says I am a theorist. True, it may be, that I entertain some views peculiar to myself.—But that is no reason why a proposition I may offer should be rejected, when it is in consonance with the truth, and sanctioned by experience. Surely, it should not be rejected because the gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) may imagine that I am a theorist! What are we aiming at by our actions here to promote the public good? If we parcel the State into petty districts, we place these districts in possession of certain cliques—we make them the arena for intrigue. Such a proceeding, would, I think, be most unfortunate. Small bodies are accessible to improper influences.—They will not do. I am one of those that always have believed in public virtue, and that the people act for the public good. If you make the district so small, you will enable men of but small abilities to make personal solicitation to the voters, and to place their hope of success upon the art of touching the feelings, in touching the prejudices, and in combining the petty partialities. If the district be large, the aspirant will rely upon the weight of his character —it will preclude personal solicitations— he will rely upon his merits; upon his abilities. This is the policy I would support. But the projet of the delegate from Ouachita(Mr. Downs) affords ample space for the exercise of petty arts, and will enable improper persons to exercise a controlling sway upon our legislation. In large districts the popular favor will only be attained by those who have become conspicuous by their merit—who have won the public confidence. In small districts it is true the candidate may be personally known; but his capacities to serve the people may not be known. We meet, in the ordinary course of life, with persons with whom we may become intimate to some extent, and yet not know their capacities. That would be the kind of knowledge which would prevail in small districts. In large districts the people would not be unacquainted with those offering to serve them. It is true, they may not have met at each other's houses—they might not have met at taverns, at drinking establishments. But before being presented as candidates they would have made themselves known— they would have made their names familiar,and if they were suitable, they would be chosen. The people in the district would be acquainted with them, as the people of the whole State are acquainted with the candidates for governor, or in the particular congressional district with the particular candidate for congress. That is the only information that would be useful or important to enable the people to select proper agents. It is not to gratify personal feeling—not to exalt a man simply for the purpose of exalting him; but it is to secure such representatives as are competent to render effective service to the State, and to contribute to her prosperity by a wise policy.

The delegate from Ouachita has assumed one or two cases to exhibit the monstrous character of this projet. He supposed that in his district under this projet he might be voted for and sent to the senate by the majority in the district; and yet, knowing that he was independent of the wishes of the people of the parish of Ouachita, he might disregard their wishes. I consider that he would not be the representative of the peculiar people of Ouachita; but that he would represent the people of the whole district. If in the discharge of his duties some peculiar local interest in that parish should conflict with the general interest, and he should prefer the general interest to the local interest, he would do right—he would be acting conscientiously. But if he did so merely because he was opposed to the people of Ouachita, he would find that he could not violate his public duties with impunity—that the majority in the other parishes would be ready to unite with the people of Ouachita in disapproving of his course, and that he would be left out. Whether the district be large or small, the majority must still govern, and the result would be the same as regards an unfaithful public officer.

The delegate from Ouachita(Mr. Downs) told the Convention a story illustrating the evil character of this projet. He said, before introducing it, that if the principle were good, we should elect all the members of the senate by general ticket. No doubt he assumed this position so as to illustrate it by his anecdote. It certainly told against himself—a district of one-eighth of the State would not surely be obnoxious to the objections which exist against a district comprising the whole State. Like his dose of the fever and ague, if carried to an extreme, it would kill the patient. To a reasonable extent it would operate beneficially; but if it were doubled, trebled or quadrupled, it would prove deleterious—his anecdote can have no other application than that.

I cannot agree with the gentleman (Mr. Downs) that the larger parishes would monopolise the selection of the member of the senate. The mass of the voters would be less solicitous about the residence of the candidate than in reference to his peculiar fitness for the station. In the senatorial district of Lafourche, as heretofore constituted, there are three large, populous parishes; and yet the senator has been invariably selected from the smallest parish— the selection has been made on the ground that the person so selected was best known and most popular. It has been wise as judicious, and has therefore been concurred in. I conceive that it would not be because a man resided in Ouachita or Catahoula that he would be elected from the district embracing those parishes; but because he was best known, or better qualified to act for the public good.

Mr. Porter said that he would vote in favor of the motion to strike out the seventh district, which embraced a distance from the Arkansas line to the Gulf of Mexico. It comprised remote territory, between which there was no similarity or identity of interest. For example, from the northern part of Caddo, or Claiborne, to the south-east part of Calcasieu, there were about three hundred miles.

What identity of interest could be supposed to exist between that parish and the parishes on Red River. This is the first time that I have ever heard the principle innunciated, that there should be no identity of interest between the representative and the represented. It is urged covertly, for those who would carry it out, do not dare to avow it distinctly. I consider it a novelty. The gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) said that the gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) charged him with a novelty in changing the districts, from seventeen to eight; he said the gentleman (Mr. Downs) was making a great change from the principle of the old constitution, in proposing to make thirty or thirty-two districts; and that eight is nearer to seventeen than thirty or thirty-two. By the old constitution, one member is allowed to each senatorial district; the increase in population has been immense, but instead of increasing the number of senatorial districts to keep up with that increase, and with the settlement of more extended territory, we are asked to reduce the districts to one-half. The population of the whole State in 1812, was less than one-half of the city of New Orleans, at the present time. If this proposition be seriously entertained, it must be on some very novel principle. One gentleman (Mr. Taylor) says that we ought to take experience as our guide. I am glad to hear that gentleman refer to precedent, because I think that his position is not sustained by such a reference. I will take occasion to examine, as briefly as possible, the constitutions of the several States. There are but three that hold the doctrine advocated by the gentleman: to begin with Maine—In Maine, one senator is apportioned to each district. In Massachusetts, the number of counties are added together, where there are not numbers sufficient to give one representative in the senate. In New Hampshire, one senator from each district. Vermont is not divided; twelve members elected from the State at large. Rhode Island, one senator from each town or city in the State. Connecticut, no district; twelve members. New York four senators from each district. This is the only State where we meet with large districts. In relation to Massachusetts, there is only one exception, and that is the district of Nantucket, composed of Nantucket and an adjoining county; every other county is a district in reference to Massachusetts. The gentleman has signally failed.

But to resume the examination of the constitutions of other States. New Jersey, each county shall elect one senator. Pennsylvania shall not be laid off to elect more than two senators, except in reference with the city of Philadelphia. Delaware, three senators from each county—the senators may be increased, but not the districts—each county is a district and cannot be divided. Maryland, (old constitution) two senators from each county. (New constitution) one from each county, and one from the city of Baltimore. Virginia is divided into thirty-two senatorial districts, one member from each. North Carolina, one senator from each county in the State. South Carolina, one senator from each district, except Charleston. Georgia, one member from each county. Kentucky, the same number of senatorial districts shall be established as there are senators in the State. Tennessee, each district shall have one senator. Indiana, each county forms one senatorial district; the largest district is entitled to four members. Louisiana, each district shall have one senator. Mississippi, the senatorial districts shall remain as fixed by law. Illinois, one senator to each district. Alabama, each district is limited to one senator and no more. Michigan elects by large districts. Arkansas, each county is a senatorial district, according to number.

Where now stands the gentleman's rule. Here, said Mr. Porter, I hold in my hands the collected wisdom of the several States of the Union in reference to their local government, and only in three States does the gentleman's doctrine receive the slightest countenance; in all States the very contrary system prevails.

I did not expect to say any thing upon the subject, and would not have troubled the Convention if the attempt had not been made to create large districts, and which attempt has been urged with great vehemence. If you combine, for example, the Ouachita parishes and those upon the Mississippi, you attempt to embody distinct and somewhat different local interests. Either the parishes in the one section or in the other will have the ascendancy, and will pay no attention to the views of that portion of the district which embraces the minority. There is one clear and evident principle, the representatives and the constituency must be identified; if you destroy the identity you destroy, at the same time, the responsibility.

Mr. Miles Taylor rose to correct a misapprehension that appeared to exist in the mind of the gentleman from Caddo(Mr. Porter) in relation to what he (Mr. Taylor) had said yesterday. He was not wedded to the allotment of particular parishes to particular districts. He was in favor of the principle that the constitution of the senate should be different from the constitution of the house of representatives. It was intended that they should operate on each other as a check, and therefore it was essential that they should vary in their formation. The senatorial districts and the representative districts should not be identical, and to prove that his position was sustained by precedent, he had referred to the constitutions of several of the other States, and particularly to the New England States, as showing that the composition of the upper and lower houses of their legislatures were materially different. The quotations of the gentleman from Caddo sustains that view of the case.

Mr. Porter read from the report of the minority of the committee, to show that according to that report the formation of the senate was entirely different from the formation of the house. It is, said Mr. Porter, precisely what the gentleman wants.

Mr. C. M. Conrad said he would move to strike out "eight" from the report of the majority of the committee. He considered the division of the State into eight districts to be too small. The proposition of the gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) to divide the State into thirty-two districts was on the other hand, too great. He thought in this matter, as in many others, the truth lay between the two extremes. He could not concur with the delegate from Ouachita, that a good principle should be carried out to its utmost limit. It was more politic to limit such principles within the range of experience. More mischief had, in his opinion, grown out of the attempt to carry good principles to an extremity, than had arisen from bad principles. He argued that there should be an essential difference in the formation of the senate and the formation of the house of representatives. The senate was designed as a check upon the house of representatives; the latter was the immediate echo of local interests, but the senate should be the exponent of the will of the aggregate people of the whole State—the guardian of the interests of the State, It had nothing to do with mere local matters. These were properly within the functions of the immediate representative in the house of representatives, and it was his duty to promote these interests in that body. The senate participated with the executive in making all the appointments for the State. According to the old constitution, they participated in the selection of the members comprising the third department of the government—the judiciary, We have not yet consulted upon the reorganization of the judiciary, but if any thing like the present system is to be maintained, it is obvious that the senate will continue to have very important functions to perform.

In support of his views, Mr. Conrad said he had high authority. The gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) had spoken in terms of great praise of the eminent abilities which distinguished the services of Mr. Wilson in the federal Convention. That delegate, I must say, said Mr. Conrad, did no more than justice to that distinguished individual.

As for the idea, said Mr. C., that the large parishes in the district will domineer over the smaller parishes, it is illusory.

Nothing of the kind will happen. They will not monopolize the senatorial delegation to themselves. The fact that the city of New Orleans is divided into three municipalities, and entitled to ten members to the house of representatives, have invariably, by common consent among themselves, apportioned the representation to the local subdivisions, and that with a great deal of liberality and fairness, is a proof that the disposition to monopolize does not exist. An illustration of the fact that no such sectional feeling exists, is found in the composition of the delegation to this body from the city. It so happens that one of the largest divisions of the city—the second municipality—has not a member that resides within her limits, and yet there were residents of that municipality who were candidates.

If you divide the State into small districts, you open the door for petty intrigues and petty acts. You will have small districts and small men. Mr. C. declared himself opposed to eight districts and to thirty-two districts. He would sustain seventeen districts. That was his favorite number, because it was neither too large nor yet too small.

Mr. Benjamin said he conceived it would facilitate the settlement of the question to take up the report of the majority of the committee, as the basis for the action of the Convention. It had made a fair and equitable division of the political power of the State into eight parts. That point, the only one of great difficulty, was in his opinion, settled by the report. The remainder was only a matter of convenience and of details. We have here settled the principle. If any of these districts desire to be sub-divided, it can be done. He had made a synopsis of the various propositions, and he found that there was not any very material difference in the distribution of the political power. According to the project of the senator from Lafourche, (Mr. Guion) and the project reported by the majority of the committee, the city is to have four senators, and lower Louisiana as far as Terrebonne, eight. The proposition of the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) gives to the city four members—the only difference between his project and the others, is in two points; instead of giving eight delegates to lower Louisiana, he gives seven, and takes the remaining one and transfers it to the northwest; the second difference is in this, that in place of giving the sugar parishes of Attakapas and Opelousas four senators, he gives them three, and transfers the one withdrawn to the parishes of Natchitoches and Rapides. The question then presents itself, shall lower Louisiana have seven senators as proposed by the delegate, [Mr. Downs] or shall she have eight, as in the other reports?

The next question is, shall the Attakapas and Opelousas parishes have four senators or three? As soon as these questions shall be resolved, the whole difficulty is at an end. The reports all concur as to the principle; and with reference to the size of the districts, the delegations for them can decide whether they ought to be divided. In reference to the district spoken of by the delegate from Caddo, I am ready to admit that his arguments have convinced me that that district embraces territory and interests that ought not to be commingled together; and I am disposed to vote in favor of dividing it. And too, with any other district, which it may be proper to divide for similar reasons. By pursuing the course I have suggested, we can get through by the hour of adjournment, and shall have satisfactorily settled the apportionment of the senate.

Mr. Downs said, that the conformity alluded to by the member (Mr. Benjamin) was a proof that all the reports were pretty near right. The report of the minority of the committee had been spoken of in debate as his peculiar project. That was a mistake. It was the report of a large number of the delegates upon the committee of the legislative department, although a minority of that committee. (Mr. Downs here read the names of those concurring with the report.) It approached much nearer justice, to his conception, than any of the other reports.

Mr. Downs said, he was sorry to hear appoals made to local divisions. That an upper and lower Louisiana should be brought in a conflicting point, although he had felt, perhaps, there was an upper Louisiana, and that the upper end suffered. If this distinction is to be openly avowed, it is as well that we should know it.

The only objection that the gentleman

(Mr. Benjamin) can find to the report of the minority is, that it does not give as many representatives to lower Louisiana, as that section is entitled to.

Mr. Benjamin: What I referred to is, that one senator had been taken from lower Louisiana, and another from the Attakapas parishes, and had been transferred to the cotton district.

Mr. Downs: It would seem that the parish of Plaquemines has suddenly become a great favorite in a part of the house, where she has hitherto been looked upon with a great deal of suspicion. The difference of the project of the delegate from Lafourche (Mr. Guion) is, that he takes a senator from my district and transfers it to that portion of the parish of Orleans, on the right bank of the river. The parish of Jefferson has never objected to the apportionment of one senator. The parishes of St. Bernard and Plaquemines have been satisfied with the allotment of one senator. But it seems with a view of strengthening lower Louisiana, and weakening upper Louisiana, a senator is taken from the latter and given to a little nook and corner on the Mississippi, opposite New Orleans, which contains so small a portion of voters that, as was observed by a gentleman residing in the neighborhood, it was difficult to find out as many as were represented. And yet to provide for it, a large slice is taken out of the district which I have the honor of representing, and had supposed this to have been an error in printing, but upon referring to the manuscript, I find that such is not the case. It has been said that by the project of the minority, that a senator has been taken from Attakapas. I will mention a circumstance in relation to this portion of this apportionment that is a matter of history. I suggested it, on the committee, that St. Martin should have one senator, but it was urged that it was better that St. Martin and St. Mary should go together, and be allowed one senator. In relation to Sabine and Calcasieu, they were placed together without reference to an upper or a lower interest in the State. I have no objection that Calcasieu and St. Landry should go together, and if that modification is desired, I am willing to accede to it; in other respects there is not any great variance in the reports. The Lafourche district in the report of the minority corresponds with the apportionment of that district in the projects of the two gentlemen from Lafourche. The greatest point of difference then, is that a senator is taken from my district, and a parish is lopped off the parish of Caldwell, which has invariably been embodied in that senatorial district, and that to give a senator to a nook and corner that is half caved in, or which may all cave in before the new constitution shall go into effect. I cannot see any great injustice in the project of the minority, but I see a great deal of injustice in the project of the gentleman from Lafourche (Mr. Guion) that takes away one senator from one section of the country which is entitled to it, and transfers it to another which can have no such pretension. The gentleman from Assumption, in the course of his argument, and the gentleman from New Orleans, who followed him, spoke of the influence of cliques, and that if small districts were made, they would be controlled by small men. If the gentlemen intended to point to me, they have shot wider of their mark than they could possibly have supposed. I never expect to profit in any way with the distribution, by the creation of a small district; so far as my personal communications have went, they have always embraced one of the largest districts in the State. I may say with one exception, the largest, so far from having had a small district to represent, the parishes embraced in that district have been apportioned by the several projects into four districts.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: So far from intending to refer to the gentleman, had I had any such intention, I would have cited him as an illustration that large districts were better qualified to make the selection of the senator.

Mr. Miles Taylor disclaimed any allusion to the delegate from Ouachita.

Mr. Downs: I accept cheerfully the disclaimer of the two gentlemen. Still that does not dispense me from replying, inasmuch as their remarks will be published. I had remarked that the district I represented was a proper division for four senators; heretofore it has embraced the entire parishes of Union, Caldwell, Ouachita and Morehouse, besides fractions of other parishes, as Madison, Carrol, &c. Therefore nothing said upon that point could have any application to me. We all disclaim politics, but nevertheless there is a vein running through whatever we say or do. I certainly am not influenced by any political motive in the creation of these districts. I might, by their formation in a certain manner, subserve the interest of the party to which I am attached, but I have no design to make the apportionment a political machine. While up, I will remark that I consider the project of the gentleman from Lafourche (Mr. Guion) as objectionable on the score of there being no uniformity between the districts; some are to have one senator and others are to have four. That is an anomaly. I think there should be uniformity, whether the districts should be large or small. By striking out eight, we can then act in detail. It is much better to act in this way than to have the case filled out first and to attempt to force into it a body which may be totally disproportionate in size. I do not think there is any thing sacramental in the number thirty-two. I am indifferent whether there be a few less. We can settle that matter in detail.

Mr. Guion had one word to say in reply to the gentleman from Ouachita; that delegate had complained that there was a large slice taken out of his district. I have to repeat what I stated this morning, that I was governed in making the apportionment by territory, population, and wealth. If his district have not the population, territory and wealth to entitle it to an additional member, it is the misfortune of the district. It was because I conceived, from a close examination, that it had neither population, territory or wealth to entitle it to an additional member that I took it away and assigned it to a territory that had. As for the gentleman's objection that there is no uniformity in the districts, I think it has no force, having rigidly adhered in my proposition to the three essential elements of territory, population and wealth combined, it makes no difference whether the districts be uniform or not.

Mr. Benjamin said that the argument of Mr. Downs did not touch the argument advanced by him. The only question at issue was whether certain river and sugar parishes should be included with those of the northern portion of the State—whether lower Louisiana should have seven or eight senators.

The question was then taken to strike out eight from the report of the majority of the committee, and the yeas and nays were called for:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Boudousquie, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Cénas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Dunn, Garcia, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Labauve, Ledeaux, Lewis, McCallop, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder—50 yeas.

Messrs. Benjamin, Briant, Kenner, Marigny, Roman, Taylor of Assumption, and Winchester—7 nays.

Mr. Brent then moved to fill the blank with thirty-two.

Mr. Kenner preferred entering into details, and apportioning the senate without fixing absolutely the number of senators at once. He moved to lay the first section on the table, subject to call.

The motion to adopt thirty-two as the number of senators was lost—thirty-two to thirty-one.

Mr. O'Brien moved to fill the blank with thirty.

Mr. Ratliff was in favor of small districts; he said they were just and proper, inasmuch as they facilitated the expression of the voice of the minority. Constitutions were not made for the protection of the majority; majorities were able to protect themselves. But constitutions were made to protect the minority. If we establish large districts we smother the voice of the minority. We place it in the power of a reckless majority to domineer over a minority. The true democratic principle was to place the representative and the represented in close contact. The nearer you can establish that contact the better representation you have of the immediate constituency. The senator would be known and appreciated through his district. He could represent all the local interest of his district. He appealed to the judgment of the members from the country not to allow the influence of the State to be neutralized by large districts. The intelligent and profound delegate from Ouachita had foreseen the result. As for myself, said Mr. Ratliff, I will never willingly allow the good old parish of West Feliciana to be devoured by her sister and neighboring parish of East Feliciana. What I predicted to my constituents has actually occurred. It is those that style themselves conservatives, that are knocking down the pillars of the old constitution, and it is the radicals that are throwing themselves in the breach to prevent the work of destruction. They may accomplish their design; they may make the new constitution odious to the people, but I shall continue on every occasion to oppose, to the extent of my feeble abilities, their designs.

Mr. KENNER renewed the motion to lay the first section on the table, and proceed with the apportionment of the State. This was the only way of expediting the subject.

The motion to lay on the table was lost —yeas 31, nays 30.

On the motion to fill the blank with thirty, the vote stood, yeas 30, nays 32. So the motion was lost.

Mr. GUION then moved to divide the State into seventeen senatorial districts. Lost—28 to 35.

Mr. KENNER then renewed the motion to lay the first section on the table Carried.

Mr. DOWNS then moved to take up his substitute as a basis.

Mr. SAUNDERS moved an adjournment. Lost.

Mr. DOWNS' motion was put and lost.

Mr. GUION'S substitute then came up, and Mr. Downs moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. KENNER then moved to adjourn. Lost, by the casting vote of the President.

A question of order then arose as to which proposition was properly before the Convention, which was discussed at some length, and it was finally decided that the proposition of Mr. Guion was next in order.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, March 26, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer by Mr. STEPHENS.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT offered an explanation, showing how the error which had occurred in regard to the question before the house yesterday when the Convention adjourned. It was owing to his absence for a few minutes during the day, when several motions had been made, and from his not being made acquainted with the exact question before the house on his resuming the chair. He decided, therefore, the majority report of the committee to be before the house then. The first paragraph of which was laid on the table, subject to the call of the house.

Mr. DOWNS then offered the first paragraph of the minority report, as a substitute for the second of the majority.

Mr. WADSWORTH considered that the parish of Plaquemines, with an extent of one hundred miles on both sides of the river, and which was allowed one senator in seventeen under the constitution of 1812, was entitled to two senators in a senate of thirty-two members. As far as territory, property and population went she was fully entitled to two representatives in the upper house.

Mr. CONRAD was of opinion that the house had refused to take up the minority report yesterday, and therefore contended that the motion of Mr. Downs was out of order. He (Mr. C.) was about to offer in detail to-day what had been rejected in totality yesterday. The delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) appeared alarmed, and expressed some regret when a colleague of his (Mr. Conrad's) had alluded to distinction between the north and the south of the State, where the southern portion was allotted thirty-three representatives out of ninety and upwards. But in this the senatorial apportionment as offered by the minority committee there appears to be a northern and southern interest. The parent (Mr. Downs) of the projet, for he has adopted it as his own, seems to regard it with much anxiety. He (Mr. Conrad) would like to see if he has apportioned the State more equally than the representation apportionment. For ten districts in the northern portion of the State, with an entire population of twenty-one thousand, the plan proposes ten senators; and for ten districts in the northern portion of the State, with a total population of forty-three thousand, there are the same number laid down. This certainly did not appear to be an equitable distribution. The south has been sacrificed to the north, in the lower house, and now the north claims the same advantages in the senate. The property qualification has been abandoned for members of the legislature, for the right of suffrage. Every basis of representation protective of the southern interest, has been abandoned for that which is most favorable to the north; those parishes that pay least are sacrificed to those that pay most to the State treasury; and the consequence is that representation is exactly in an inverse ratio to the amount of taxation, those who pay least getting the largest amount of representatives; those who pay the most are they worst represented. The responsibility of representation is thus destroyed. There should be some little protection for property; some guard against lavish expenditure. The way this should be had is by apportioning the senate with a view of qualification either of property or taxation.

But here it is found that these ten northwestern districts pay seventy-seven thousand dollars taxes, and the ten south-western pay one hundred and thirty-nine thousand dollars, and yet, with double population, paying double the taxes and sending the same number of representatives to the legislature, it is proposed to give them an equal senatorial allotment.

In this examination he (Mr. C.) confined himself to country parishes; if he were to take others into consideration, the disproportion would be found greater still; in New Orleans it would be found the disproportion quadrupled. He could not support any project of this kind. He was in favor of that offered by Mr. Guion, and even that did not go far enough. He thought too much attention had been paid to extent of territory, and not enough to property, taxation and population. Territorial extent had already been sufficiently looked to in the organization of the lower house; and in order to fix a basis for the apportionment of the senate, and that the house might go on with some principle to guide them, he would move to lay the subject, before the house, on the table momentarily, in order to take into consideration the following:

Whereas, Representation in the lower house of the general assembly has been based solely on numbers,

Resolved, That in the apportionment of representation in the senate, taxation and property shall be taken into estimate.

Mr. Ratliff rose to order. He did not understand how the gentleman's motion could be entertained.

Mr. Downs saw no use whatever in adopting a basis. He thought a basis had been adopted before, and the delegate (Mr. Conrad) as soon as he came to detail threw he tbasis overboard. There was no use in making rules which would never be followed. If the delegate had twenty rules, they would depart from all, as circumstances might seem to demand it. He hoped the motion would not prevail.

Mr. Wadsworth hoped the motion would prevail. He was one of those who advocated the rights of property as well as those of persons. Personal rights are protected in the lower house; why not, therefore, leave the senate as a safeguard for property? A basis of apportionment had been fixed for the former apportionment, and it was adhered to. But now the senatorial representation will be given to the pine woods, and thus the wealthy parishes of the State will be sacrificed for the poor ones.

Mr. Ratliff saw no good result that could arise from laying down a basis, as he supposed they could not strictly confine themselves to it. Let the house proceed on the property population and taxation of each parish, and apportion by the best fixed rule, taking the combined considerations into the estimate. If any rule is adopted, it will be deviated from the first step. He was unwilling to declare himself in favor of a property representation in the senate; he thought territory should be considered as well.

Mr. Claiborne did not understand why a principle for the apportionment of the senate, should be established beforehand. There existed the same necessity for a basis being established for the upper as for the lower house; it was equally necessary that this basis should not be the same; if otherwise, they shall be subject to the same prejudices and passions in both cases, and devoid of that salutary check so necessary in the constitution of republican governments. Let us now establish proper landmarks to guide in the correct apportionment of senatorial representation, and abide by them; without such a principle we shall be proceeding at random—a vast deal of time will be consumed in discussing local interests, and sectional feelings will mar us at every turn. In consideration of the formation of the lower house having been made with disregard to property and taxation, it is only just that those should have a fair weight in the senatorial house.

Mr. Downs contended that the gentleman was out of order, in discussing a question not before the house.

Mr. Conrad proceeded to make some observations in support of the resolution which he had just submitted, when

The President called on him to confine himself to the motion "to lay on the table."

The question was then put, and the yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Aubert, Boudousquie, Briant, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Guion, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Taylor of St. Landry, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—23 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, O'Bryan, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of East Baton Rouge, Scott of East Feliciana, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the negative—36 nays.

Mr. Wadsworth moved to strike out one senator, and insert two, for the parishes of Plaquemines, St. Bernard, and that part of the parish of Orleans situate on the west bank of the Mississippi.

Mr. Downs offered the first paragraph of the minority report, as a substitute for that of the majority.

Mr. Kenner said, the proposition of the gentleman was not in order. The subject matter under consideration, involving as it did, the city of New Orleans, was entirely different to that included in the motion, which was the parish of Plaquemines—and therefore he contended the motion to be out of order.

Mr. Downs then offered the section of the minority report, apportioning New Orleans in lieu of that of the majority.

Mr. Miles Taylor moved to lay the subject on the table. The Orleans delegation were averse to dividing the city, according to the report, and he would therefore oppose.

Mr. Benjamin moved to amend Mr. Taylor's motion, on the table subject to call, as there were many members of the Orleans delegation absent on professional business. He offered this with a view to go on with the other apportionment, there being no difference entertained on the number of senators for the city, the only question that might arise being the manner of dividing them.

Mr. Culbertson disagreed with his colleague, as he considered the division reported a very fair and just one.

The yeas and nays were then called, and the result was as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquié, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—31 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, McRae, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the negative—29 nays; so the motion prevailed.

Mr. Downs then offered the following: The parishes of Plaquemines, St. Bernard, and that portion of the parish of Orleans on the right bank of the Mississippi, shall have one senator.

Mr. Wadsworth moved to insert "two" senators, instead of "one." He had received some official documents showing the amount of taxation paid into the treasury by that parish. In the year 1843 Plaquemines paid $14,000, and that sum was now considerably increased. That parish had an extent of one hundred miles on both sides of the river, and when it had been allotted one senator out of seventeen, by the constitution of 1812, it was fairly entitled to two out of thirty-two.

Mr. Downs said that if they gave that portion of the State more than one senator, it would change the principle of the report altogether. The parishes of Jefferson, St. Charles and St. John the Baptist will comprise the second district. The parishes of Ouachita, Caldwell, Union and Jackson, (newly added) with larger population by far, will have one senatorial representative; and he could not see the justice or necessity of taking a member from other parishes and adding to Plaquemines and St. Bernard. The senatorial delegate from Plaquemine fully agreed with the project of the minority now offered.

Mr. Wadsworth said that the gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) knew that he (Mr. Wadsworth) and the senatorial delegate from Plaquemines (Judge Leonard) differed on that subject. The latter is of opinion that life and liberty should alone be protected; but he (Mr. Wadsworth) was one of those who always thought that as long as a man had a dollar in his pocket, that property was more valuable to him than liberty without it? Is not the acquirement of property the incentive to us all? Do not all labor with this view? All our exertions are to secure property. The representation of taxation and property, therefore, should be a vital principle in the formation of the senate. You have universal suffrage the basis of the house of representatives—for the sake of justice, then, let the senate stand by to prevent the State from being flooded with ruin by a prodigal waste of the treasury funds. Who will it ruin? Not the poor; they are ruined already—then it must fall on those who possess means. What protection have we, then, if we have it not in the senate? He would predicate the apportionment on property; the members of the lower house, members of congress, governor, are all voted for on the principle of universal suffrage; if the property qualification is abandoned, men will be elected who have nothing to lose, but all to gain.

Mr. Miles Taylor would support the motion to insert two, on the ground of extent of territory of that parish, and of the prospect of its future increase of wealth and population, from its proximity to the city of New Orleans.

Mr. Benjamin was in favor of the amendment. He found that in 1843 Washington and St. Tammany had paid the sum of $3,700 taxes, and Plaquemines $12,000 in the same year, though he had no doubt the latter sum was increased to $13,000 in 1844. He also found that Plaquemines, St. Bernard, and the west bank had a population double the number of St. Helena, Livingston and St. Tammany. On any basis that could be adopted two senators were fairly due to this district.

Mr. Splane opposed the amendment. Taking a view of the relative positions of St. Mary and St. Martins, compared with the district before the house, he would insist upon four members for the former, if two were given to the latter. He was satisfied with two; but it was in consideration of the apportionment now offered being adhered to. It was unequal and unjust to extend the number allotted.

Mr. Beatty said that the parishes under consideration, were, upon any basis, entitled to two senators, either as to extent of territory, population or property. He was surprised to hear members take up a principle and adopt it whenever it suited them, and abandon it the next moment.

Mr. Marigny supported the amendment. He briefly reviewed the progress of the parishes of Plaquemines and St. Bernard from 1812 to the present time; and contended that this apportionment should not be made with a view to the present; but that due regard must be had to the growing improvements which are constantly taking place around us.

The question was then put, and the yeas and nays being called for, the result was as follows, viz:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Briant, Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Garcia, Hudspeth, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Wadsworth, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the affirmative—26 yeas.

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Cade, Chambliss, Conrad of New Orleans,

Covillon, Downs, Dunn, Guion, Humble, Hynson, Keller, McCallop, McRae, O'Bryan, Penn, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feiciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill and Wedderstrandt—31 nays. So the motion was lost.

Mr. Downs moved the adoption of the section.

Mr. Beatty moved to strike out "that part of the parish of Orleans situate on the right bank of the river Mississippi." This amendment was lost.

The section was then put, on motion of Mr. Downs, and carried.

Mr. Benjamin then moved that the parishes of Jefferson, St. Charles, and St. John the Baptist be entitled to three senators.

Mr. Brent moved that Jefferson be allowed one senator; and that the parishes of St. Charles and St. John the Baptist be stricken out.

Mr. Claiborne opposed, conceiving the object to be to deprive the district of one senator, which was given to it in the report.

Mr. Conrad of Jefferson, would support the motion to divide the question, if two senators were allotted to Jefferson.

Mr. Garcia was in favor of giving two senators to Jefferson; the last accounts of the treasurer show that seventeen thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight dollars taxes had been paid to the State by her; she has a white population of four thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, and a total population of ten thousand four hundred and seventy. The interior of the parish is unlike that to be met with in other parts of the State, consisting of dry and fertile tracts; she commands a large extent of territory on the sea-shore too, where the population is increasing every day.

Mr. Benjamin moved to divide the question. He said that the question that should be first put to these was, whether Jefferson should be divided from the other or not.

Mr. Wadsworth would be satisfied to let Jefferson have two senators and give the others one, and have the three elected by general ticket. If a senator is taken away from this part of the State, it will be given to the Florida district, where they could not predicate a senator on a property qualification.

Mr. Downs preferred having separate parishes, as a general rule, and had adopted that principle in his report, except in two instances, where the parishes could not well be divided.

The question to divide was then put, on motion of Mr. Benjamin, and carried in the affirmative—34 voting in favor, and 27 against it.

Mr. Conrad of Jefferson, then renewed his motion to insert two instead of one senator for his parish. He felt assured that the returns for taxation has been recently largely increased. But he was satisfied to rest on the taxes paid in 1843, and to take even the census of 1840 for his claim to two senatorial members. In 1843 the tax on real estate in that parish amounted to eighteen thousand dollars, apart from the revenue derived from taxes on professions, no inconsiderable item, from the fact that there is growing up in the parish the second city in the State. The population in 1840 was put down at ten thousand five hundred. She is the fourth or fifth parish in the State in every respect, as to property, taxation, population, and prospects, and fully entitled to two senators. He looked upon a restriction in this case as striking out all proper principle of representation. He was satified even to let her remain joined to the two other parishes, provided three senators were allotted to them.

Mr. Preston was in favor of the motion offered by his colleague. There were however other and weighty considerations why Jefferson should be allowed two senators. She was essentially a commercial parish, and it was necessary that the senators should be elected by those whom they represent. He therefore agreed to divide this parish from St. Charles and St. John the Baptist, because there were different interests to be protected. He was opposed to having so large a number as thirty-two in the senate, but since that had been agreed to, and that they had one senator in 1812, when the parish was small, he could see no injustice in allotting two members to it. She has always had one in seventeen; you now double the number, and therefore can hardly refuse to double the representation. The population and wealth of the parish has increased, and in the last five years the number of votes polled has increased from three to eight hundred. But the citizens of Lafayette and Jefferson have been kept back by legislation; privileges were denied them that were accorded New Orleans; but recently Lafayette has obtained justice, she is now a port of entry, and because her port charges are considerably below those of New Orleans, the increase of shipping, commerce and attendant benefits are becoming more manifest every day. If this constitution lasts ten years, he had no doubt but that the parish of Jefferson would be equal at that time, in point of population, wealth and voters, to the parish of New Orleans. He hoped it would not last ten years. He would again say, that Jefferson, having property, taxation, population and voters entitling her to two senators, it would be unjust, nay, he would call it almost iniquitous—though he used the term with all due respect for gentlemen on that floor—to give them but one senator, which they had in 1812, when now their advantages have become so extended and increased. Give her at least two in thirty-two; do her justice, that is all she asks.

Mr. Downs fully admitted that the gentleman (Mr. Preston) has made out a strong case for his parish, as far as taxation, population and wealth went, but based on territory, or local divisions of the State, he felt himself obliged to differ. In distributing the apportionment and dividing the districts they had not given to any parish more than one senator, and as the number is likely to be thirty-two, it would lead to a subversion of other parishes from the allotment as reported. It is admitted with reason that the representation of a commercial community is not to be taken on the same grounds as an agricultural one, but it seemed to him that when New Orleans gets but four senators, it can't be pretended that the parish of Jefferson can claim any thing like half the representation of New Orleans; and in regard to the gentleman's (Mr. Preston's) opinion in relation to Jefferson being equal to New Orleans in ten years, he thought the calculation rather a large one, and something which transcends any thing ever known in this country. Jefferson is not the only fixed parish on the same basis as was the allotment of 1812. We will find Ascension, Assumption, Lafourche and others, very nearly in the same position as they held under the old constitution. He should number vote against a larger than one, at least as long as the senate was confined to thirty-two members.

Mr. Miles Taylor confessed himself somewhat amused at the controversy. He saw gentlemen severally advocate population, property, and territory; by others these were regarded as the united elements of a basis. He was one of those who regarded territory as a basis; there will be all through this distribution a contest for political power, and one portion may perhaps be sacrificed by the adroitness of the representatives from another. When Plaquemines was brought up, with a large extent of territory, and we propose to give it a certain representation, his honorable friend from St. Mary rises and says "you have not population sufficient." Jefferson comes up next, and the gentleman from Ouachita, with his usual penetration, discovers "that she has not territory." Thus gentlemen make their knife cut both ways, and can blow hot and cold at the same time.

Mr. Splane did not understand what the gentleman (Mr. Taylor) meant by "blowing hot and cold," but he saw that the delegate (Mr. Taylor) who always advocates New Orleans, although he does not represent her, was here indirectly endeavoring to give New Orleans and the country immediately around her, eight votes in the senate. Because New Orleans was to have four, so that if Plaquemines got two, and Jefferson two, the influence in the senate would be swallowed up in the city. He would oppose any effort to such an effect.

Mr. Wadsworth would vote to give Jefferson two senators, on the same principle as he claimed two for Plaquemines; and he would then ask two for Plaquemines, and he trusts that gentlemen would not be so inconsistent as to refuse him. Although they had done him great wrong in already refusing him two senators, yet he would never do wrong to other parishes because his own was unjustly dealt with. Mr. Splane has said the farming interests require protection, then why refuse him two senators? That is just the principle he advocates; he considers cities as mere agents for the country; but he (Mr. Splane) professes himself an advocate for the planting interest, and in his very first vote he denies the principle by refusing two senators to Plaquemines.

Mr. Conrad of New Orleans, was in favor of giving two members to Jefferson. As regarded the statement of Mr. Downs, that the interests and position of Lafayette and New Orleans were in every way identified with each other, that was purely a mistake; they have no feelings of interest with one another; they were essentially different in commercial business, in pursuits and in population. The delegate (Mr. Splane) will find that the taxation for Jefferson, for 1843, to be nearly equal to that of St. Mary and St. Martin, and assuming that those parishes were entitled to two representatives accordingly, he would vote for two representatives for them; and for all parishes having population, property and territory, he would give a fair representation. He therefore considered it nothing but justice to give Jefferson two senators.

Mr. Brent was opposed to giving more than one senator to Jefferson. By referring to statistics it will be found that the parishes of St. Landry, Rapides and Natchitoches will be entitled to two senators if Jefferson gets two; and as they want but one, he was unwilling to give the latter any more. The taxes paid by Jefferson in the year 1843 amounted to seventeen thousad eight hundred and thirty-eight dollars; the population in 1840 was ten thousand four hundred and seventy; Rapides paid in 1843 sixteen thousand four hundred and ninety-six dollars, and her population in 1840 amounted to fourteen thousand one hundred and thirty-two, and at the last election Rapides polled two hundred votes more than Jefferson; as regards territory, Rapides is far greater in extent than Jefferson; Natchitoches has a greater extent; and that of St. Landry is nearly double.

Mr. Preston said if they regarded territory alone, Jefferson would be entitled to twenty times the number of senators that New Orleans is. But the growing interests of Jefferson, its commerce and great prospects, induce us not only to look to the present state of things, but to the progressive importance of the parish.

Mr. Claiborne contended that as one district with four senators was to be formed out of the three parishes, Jefferson, St. Charles and St. John the Baptist, it was only fair, when they had separated Jefferson, to let her have two of them. He considered her, on any basis, fully entitled to them.

"Question" was called from all parts of the house, and being put, it was lost, by a vote of 29 yeas and 36 nays.

The motion to allot one senator to the parish of Jefferson was then put and carried.

The parishes of St. Charles and St. John the Baptist were allotted one district with one senator.

Mr. Kenner moved that St. James and Ascension form one district.

The motion, after a remark or two from Mr. Beatty, was carried.

Mr. Kenner then moved to give the district formed by those two parishes, two senators; when

A motion was made to adjourn, and carried.

Thursday, March 27, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer, by the Hon. Mr. Stephens, delegate from Sabine, at the request of the President.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the apportionment for the senate.

Mr. Kenner had moved that the parishes of Ascension and St. James form a senatorial district with two senators.

Mr. Kenner said, that when the Convention adjourned, the question pending was to allow two senators to the district composed of the parishes of St. James and Ascension. He was prepared to show that this apportionment was but sheer justice. By the reports, both of the majority and minority of the committee, as well as the project presented as a substitute by the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Guion) what was known as the fourth judicial district, comprising two parishes on the Mississippi and three on the Lafourche, was allowed four senators. The only difficulty was in allotting this representation between them. He would call the attention of the Convention to a fact or two which would place the claims of these two parishes, St. James and Ascension, in a proper light. Their total population was fifteen thousand [illegible] hundred and twenty-nine, the total population of the parishes on the Lafourche was eighteen thousand eight hundred and seventy. The amount of taxes paid by the former was nineteen thousand seven hundred and forty-seven dollars and three cents, and by the latter seventeen thousand nine hundred and eighty-one dollars and sixty-eight cents. Thus it would be seen that while there was an excess in the population in favor of the three parishes on the Lafourche, there was a considerable excess in the amount of taxes contributed by the two parishes on the Mississippi. They were then nearly equal in population, and more than equal in taxation. In reference to extent of territory, the difference between the two parishes on the Mississippi and the three parishes on the Lafourche was not material, and if value was taken as the measure, the result would be in favor of St. James and Ascension. These facts, he conceived, were sufficient to satisfy members that one-half of the senatorial representation allowed to the fourth judicial district, ought to be awarded to Ascension and St. James. Let us apply another test. If we take the total population of all the parishes combined in the fourth judicial district, amounting to thirty-four thousand three hundred and ninety-nine, and divide it by four, the number of senators allowed to the district, we find that eight thousand five hundred and ninety-nine persons would be entitled to a senator, and that according to that estimate St. James and Ascension would be entitled to two members of the senate.

If we take the total amount of taxes contributed by all these parishes as a basis for their relative representation, and divide the amount by the figure four, the total number of senators allowed them, we find that nine thousand four hundred and thirty-two dollars of taxation would entitle the population contributing that amount to a representation of one upon the floor of the senate; and that according to the requisite quotas St. James and Ascension would be entitled to more than two senators. Take any conceivable basis that would operate equally and uniformly, and it will be found that they are entitled to two senators. There is another consideration that should have great weight. Of the eleven members in this body from the fourth judicial district, there are but one or two that are opposed to this allotment of political power, and to this division of the senatorial delegation. The wishes of the people of both the parishes are decidedly in favor of their unity in continuing to form a distinct senatorial district.

If we indulge in a prospective view of the augmentation and mutual increase of these two parishes—which line of argument appears to have had, as it ought to have, some influence with the Convention, inasmuch as the dispositions of the constitution are permanent—in the space of thirty years they will be entitled to more than is now claimed for them. A large body of land known as the Houma grant, containing from one hundred and fifty to one hundred and sixty thousand acres, every foot of which is susceptible of cultivation, lies in one of these parishes, the parish of Ascension, and is just about being brought into the market. Owing to the contest between the grantees and the United States, it has heretofore remained a perfect waste. The contest in relation to it, however, is definitely settled. This parish, next to one, produces the largest quantity of sugar. It is increasing both in wealth and in population, to a considerable extent. The other parish, the parish of St. James, is one of the wealthiest parishes of the State. Combined together, they are entitled to two senators. The people of both parishes heretofore, for the last thirty-two years, have lived in the same political community; they have formed ties which they would be reluctant to sever. It is to be hoped that nothing of the kind will be attempted, and that while they shall be continued as forming a separate senatorial district, they will be allowed that representation in the senate to which they are justly entitled, and which is not only claimed by their immediate representatives upon this floor, but which is conceded unanimously by the delegations from the other parishes in the judicial district, with but a solitary exception.

Mr. Beatty said that whatever might be the opinion of his colleagues upon the question now submitted, and even although he might stand alone upon that question, he would, nevertheless, under his convictions, feel himself bound to vote against the proposition of the member that had just addressed the Convention. It was no difficult matter to represent the condition of a parish under the most flattering auspices, when it was desired to increase her political power. But in the present instance, the parishes of Lafourche and Terrebonne had nothing to apprehend from a comparison with St. James and Ascension, when all the facts were disclosed. With one-half of the slave population of the two latter parishes, they made more sugar. It was true they contributed less taxes; that there was less operative wealth, but their territory was more densely settled, and yet a large portion of that territory remained still unsettled, the resources of which were developed; while but a small portion of Ascension was susceptible of further settlement, and as for the parish of St. James, it was all settled. Both Ascension and St. James were old parishes; Lafourche and Terrebonne were comparatively of much more recent date, especially the latter. The parish of Lafourche, next to the parish of St. Mary, is the largest producer of sugar, and Terrebonne ranks next to Lafourche. But although Terrebonne is as yet secondary in importance, I have no hesitation in saying that the day is not distant when she will be the richest and most populous parish in the district. These parishes, whether in reference to the present or to the future be had, have as much right to two senators as the parishes of St. James and Ascension; but if this be done, it will be necessary either to increase the senatorial delegation from four to five, or else the parish of Assumption will be disfranchised.

It is well known, Mr. President, that I should have preferred large districts to small districts. But if there is to be a division into small districts, I will never yield my assent that it be based upon political motives; and yet the result will be, if this allotment and division be made, the furtherance of such motives. I will not object if a separate senator be allowed to St. James, provided that Ascension and Assumption be placed together for one senator, and Lafourche and Terrebonne have the other two.—This seems to me would be a much more appropriate and equitable division of territory and of political power.

As to the arguments, said Mr. Beatty, of the difference in the taxation, I will reply [illegible] land tax is arbitrarily fixed by the legislature. The Lafourche parishes are placed at less than the parishes of Ascension and St. James. Why, I am really at a loss to discover. The lands are certainly more productive in the Lafourche parishes than in the parishes of Ascension and St. James. As to extent of territory, it is undeniable they have a vast superiority, particularly the parish of Terrebonne. The parish of Terrebonne dates its existence scarcely twenty years back; whereas St. James and Ascension were established with the earliest settlements in Louisiana. If we are to take into consideration the future, as well as the present, then their claims are incontestibly superior to those of St. James and Ascension. But what is the design of this division? Is it to give two senators to two parishes, while three are to have but two?

Mr. Miles Taylor conceived it to be incumbent upon him, as a delegate of one of the parishes interested in this question, to state his views and to declare what principles would actuate him in the vote he was about to give. He took it for granted that it was the unanimous wish of the Convention that four senators should be allowed to the parishes embraced within the fourth judicial district. At one time it was suggested to allow them five senators. This was not proposed in the house, but was spoken of among individual members. He (Mr. Taylor) did not think them entitled to that number, and had the Convention been disposed to accord that number, he would have voted against it, on the ground, and with the perfect conviction, they were not entitled to it; and that necessarily if it were given to them, it would have to be taken from another section that was better entitled to it. He could not agree in the allotment of the four senators as suggested by the delegate from Lafourche (Mr. Beatty.) The house knew that he (Mr. Taylor) resided in the parish of Assumption. He had no connection with the parishes of St. James or Ascension; or if he had, they were less intimate than those with the lower parishes of Lafourche Interior and Terrebonne. His predelictions were therefore favorable to the lower parishes which formed the senatorial district under the old constitution. But he was actuated by a sense of justice, and taking into consideration the relative population of the two parishes on the Mississippi, and the three on the Lafourche, with the amount of taxation contributed by them, he thought the two parishes of St. James and Ascension were better entitled to two senators than the three remaining parishes were entitled to three senators. It was true that the two parishes were not equal in every respect to the three; there was a disparity in the population; but yet they came nearer to the standard for two senators than the three remaining parishes for three senators. To establish his view of their relative pretensions, he would refer to some statistics. St. James and Ascension have a population of fifteen thousand four hundred and ninety-nine, Lafourche and Terrebonne have a population of eleven thousand seven hundred and thirteen. As between St. James and Ascension, and the other two parishes of Lafourche and Terrebonne, if either be entitled to two, St. James and Ascension are better entitled to two senators than the two other parishes. St. James and Ascension have a population of fifteen thousand four hundred and ninety-nine, and the three remaining parishes of Assumption, Fafourche Interior, and Terrebonne, have an aggregate population of eighteen thousand six hundred and sixty; a little more than one-fifth. From that result, it appears that Ascension and St. James are more entitled to two senators than the three parishes are entitled to three senators. The fairer allotment would be to divide the four senators equally between the parishes on the Mississippi, and the parishes on the Lafourche.

He was in favor of large districts, but he felt pursuaded that the Convention would not act upon that principle. If the districts were separated, and St. James was allowed one senator, and Ascension one senator, there would remain two senators for the remaining three parishes. How ought they to be distributed? If the house will look into the tabular statement prepared by the second committee on the apportionment of the house of representatives, they will find the population of Assumption to be seven thousand one hundred and fifty-seven; the population of Lafourche Interior seven thousand seven hundred and fifty-three; and Terrebonne four thousand four hundred and ten. It is evident that Lafourche Interior would be better entitled to one senator than either of the other two parishes, and there would be nothing more than simple justice in granting her a senator if the remaining senator could be apportioned to Assumption and Terrebonne; and that would be a proper distribution. But unfortunately there are physical disabilities. The first parish in descending the Lafourche, is the parish of Assumption; it only touches Terrebonne at a remote point near the Atchafalaya, which is difficult of access. It would therefore be exceedingly inconvenient to unite these two parishes in their senatorial representation. The population of Assumption was nearly equal to that of Lafourche Interior, her white population was larger. If Lafourche Interior were united with Terrebonne in her representation, although there would be a peculiar fitness in placing them together from the contiguity of their territories, yet there would be great inequality both in reference to extent of territory and population. From the local position of the three parishes it is difficult to divide them into separate senatorial districts and to preserve the principle of equality and uniformity. All that could be done would be to make them as equal as circumstances would permit. He would not oppose the formation of separate senatorial districts, although he would prefer that they should be formed into two senatorial districts: Ascension and St. James to be one senatorial district, and Assumption, Lafourche Interior and Terrebonne, to be the other senatorial district. It is true, as has been stated by the delegate from Lafourche, that this would result in making both whig. But so far as his (Mr. Taylor's) actions were involved as the representative of the people, he knew of no other rule of action than their wishes, and was not to be controlled by the political divisions of whig or democrat. He was the representative of the parish of Assumption; the representative of the wishes of the people. It was his duty to consult the wishes of the people, and he knew full well that they desired no political division which would dissolve their political connection with the two contiguous parishes. Were he not to examine and base his actions upon their desire in that respect, he would violate his duty, and his course would not be in accordance with their wishes. He cared not whether the result were favorable to the whig party or to the democratic party; his vote was not predicated in reference to party politics, but it was in reference to what the people were entitled to, and what the majority desired.

Mr. Brent moved the reconsideration of the vote giving one senator to St. James and Ascension. Upon this motion a discursory discussion occurred, which terminated in a motion of Mr. Brent to lay the subject under debate, upon the table.

The motion was then put, and the yeas and nays being called for, it was found that

Messrs. Beatty Brazeale, Brent, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Humble, Hynson, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Winder voted in the affirmative—29 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Garcia, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Wadswikoff and Winchester voted in the negative—36 nays; consequently the motion was lost.

Mr. Kenner desired to know how any delegate could rise and assume to know the sentiments of the people of a district better than the immediate representatives of that district; delegates, too, that come from a different portion of the State. It was perfectly legitimate for all the members to participate in the apportionment of the representation of any particular district, but when the allotment was made, it seemed to him that it was for the people themselves to determine what distribution they would make of the number allowed them, among themselves. He considered it an interference into family affairs, to attempt to resist the wishes of the people of the district, and could not but notice the continued efforts made by the delegates from Ouachita and Rapides (Messrs. Downs and Brent) to misconstrue the wishes of a district that had its own representatives on this floor to express its views. How would the gentleman from Rapides relish it, were I to rise and state that his parish was a large parish and that it ought to be divided, because this division would be favorable to a certain expression of political opinion with which I concurred. It is well known to me, that the inhabitants of the valley of that parish entertain, unanimously, political opinions adverse to those entertained by the inhabitants residing in the Piney Woods. I am well aware of the disposition to divide the golden district of Acadia. But if it is to be doomed, it will be by no man having any identity of interest with it; it will be by those who have no feeling in common; who come from another quarter of the State. I trust the Convention will give no encouragement to the disposition to cut it up, but that they will determine to maintain it intact.

Mr. Downs: If the gentleman thinks that I wish to enterfere in the distribution of the senatorial delegation of this district, he is entirely mistaken. I do not care one straw whether St. James have all, if the other parishes choose to consent. What I object to is putting together two large parishes in one district. But I do not care how the district be divided, provided these two parishes do not stand together to elect the two senators. I am opposed to the principle, that any district should elect more than one senator. It was on that ground that I objected to allowing two senators to the parish of Jefferson. I think it important that there should be uniformity in the districts, and this result should be consulted as far as practicable. If St. James and Ascension be really entitled to two senators, let these parishes have them, but let each parish elect one, as a separate senatorial district. He would move that they be established into separate senatorial districts.

Mr. Roman hoped that this motion would not prevail. For the last thirty-two years St. James and Ascension have formed one senatorial district. The populations residing in the parishes have the same habits, the same kind of agricultural industry and the same interests. They have entrusted their delegation to ask the Convention to preserve their actual political organization and identity. I can see no good reason why this reasonable request should be refused, when a compliance with it can be of no detriment to any portion of the State. The delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) complains that it is obnoxious to his favorite system, of small districts. If he indeed have the power, which I much fear he has, to control the action of this body, and we must pass under the yoke while he is cutting up the State into insignificant fractions, let him at least have some clemency; let him hear our admonitions. These divisions, ad infinitum, may be carried to a dangerous exces. They will undermine and destroy the wise system of checks and balances which the founders of our institutions deemed it essential to establish between the two branches of the legislative department. The senate will cease to be a check upon the house of representatives so soon as you supersede the original basis of its organization, and cause its members to eminate from the same constituency, and to partake of the same responsibility.

I trust, Mr. President, that if there be a majority of this body, who are in favor of dividing the senatorial representation into minute fractions, they will at least respect the wishes and feelings of such parishes as have, under the old constitution, formed united senatorial districts, and which are very reluctant to lose their past political association.

Mr. Brent: The delegates from St. James and Ascension seemed to apprehend that great injustice was about to be done to their part of the State. He did not believe that any disposition existed to deprive that or any other portion of the State of its just representation. He could not agree with the delegate from Ascension, that the members from other parts of the State had nothing to do with this matter; that it was a family affair. He conceived that all parts of the State were interested in the apportionment for the senate. It was a matter of general consideration that no one portion should have a greater concentration of political power than another portion. He was decidedly favorable to small districts; that each district should have one voice, but that no district should have two voices in the senate. It was desirable, and indispensable, to carry out that principle with uniformity. How can these delegates object to that? They assume that the local representation are unanimous in desiring those two parishes to be an exception from the rule which the majority of this body have shown a disposition to sanction. But it would seem that the delegation from the locality, composing the whole district, are not united in opinion; I understand they are divided in opinion. These parishes are susceptible of being divided into separate districts, and I have heard no good reason advanced why that should not be done. I cannot consider this question in the light in which the delegate (Mr. Kenner) had attempted to place it; and cannot concur that it should be left solely to a majority of the local delegation to determine.

Mr. Kenner moved that the district composed of the two parishes of St. James and Ascension, have two senators.

Mr. O'Bryan moved that this district should have one senator.

Mr. C. M. Conrad desired to know whether it was the design of the gentlemen to take this senator from the south for the purpose of giving him to the north-west?

The north-western portion of the State, said Mr. Conrad, had, in point of fact, but half the population, and contributed scarcely one-half of the taxation of the State, and yet she was allowed an equal representation with the balance of the State. Was it intended to favor her still further?

Mr. Brent said it was unfortunate for the gentleman to refer to the voters, as they incontestably exhibited that the northern and western parishes of the State had the preponderance of members. To exhibit this, he would call the attention of the gentleman to the votes cast in the last presidential election. By calculating the number of votes given in the several parishes embraced within the senatorial districts, it would be seen that in proportion to population the senatorial districts in the south were allowed a larger represetation than they were entitled to, while the districts in the north and north-west were put down at less than they were entitled to. The gentleman's insinuation, then, that the north and north-west were peculiarly favored was not sustained by a reference to the facts. It was on the contrary, the parishes in the south that were specially favored.

[Mr. Brent read a comparative statement of the returns of the last presidential election to substantiate what he had advanced.]

Mr. Downs said it was altogether superfluous for the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) to ask for any such information. It had already been explicitly disavowed, that there was any intention to take away one senator from the districts embracing the parishes of Ascension, St. James, Assumption, Lafourche and Terrebonne. Four senators had been conceded to these parishes by common consent. The north-west did not want this senator. The only point of difference was, whether two parishes should form a district to send two members, and should send them conjointly. He was not averse to their having the two senators, but he was opposed to any one district in the country sending two members. Where some necessity existed for it—where one parish was large and another parish was small—where the circumstances were imperious he might yield the principle to such exceptions. But in the present instance there was no such necessity, and he saw nothing to justify a departure from the general rule.

Mr. Splane said he represented the same kind of interest as was involved in the decision of the question now pending before the Convention. It cannot be for one moment supposed that I wish to curtail the influence of the parishes of St. James and Ascension. On the contrary, I am deeply interested as the representative of a parish having an identity of interest, that the sugar growing region should have as many representatives as is consistent with justice. That each district should send one senator, is a favorite principle with me, but I am not in favor of any district sending more than one, where it can possibly be avoided. I would consent that St. James and Ascension should have two senators, but on condition that each should send, separately, one senator.

One of the arguments advanced by the delegate from Lafourche (Mr. Guion) to sustain his proposition that each senatorial district should send two senators was, that it would take the appointing power out of the hands of one senator from the district, which might be abused. I think that the gentleman paid a poor compliment to the executive department. And if his doctrine were true, that the senator from the district possessed the appointing power, then so far as the parish of St. Mary was concerned, the several senators from Attakapas had signally failed in the discharge of their duties in reference to the appointments made for that parish—for it had happened that all the appointments had been made out of the senatorial district, from the neighboring county of Opelousas, with but a solitary exception: that of a sheriff—that was actually taken from St. Mary!

Mr. Ratliff avowed himself in favor of the one district system, and went into an exposition both in reference to the population of the parishes embraced in the allotment under consideration and their taxation; and he thought upon the whole, it was fair to allow them two senators, but he was unwilling to vote that they should form one united district. It was impossible to have a perfect equality in the representation; in the present instance it was out of the question. All that we could do was to approach that equality as nearly as possible. He would vote in favor of granting two senators to the parishes of St. James and Ascension, but would insist that they form separate senatorial districts.

Mr. Downs thought the gentleman (Mr. Ratliff) would be more likely to effect his object by voting against granting two senators to the two parishes united. If that question failed, then their delegation would be ready to divide the district in order to obtain the two senators.

Mr. Roman called for the yeas and nays upon the question that St. James and Ascension form one senatorial district and be entitled to two senators.

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Burton, Cade, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wadsworth and Winchester—39 yeas; and field, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, McRae, O'Bryan, Penn, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Waddill, Wederstrandt, and Winder—25 nays.

Mr. RATLIFF gave notice that he would move for the reconsideration in order to establish two senatorial districts in the parishes of St. James and Ascension.

Mr. TAYLOR proposed to form one district of the parishes of Assumption, Terrebonne and Lafourche and to give the district two senators.

Mr. BRENT moved to constitute Lafourche into one district with one senator, and Terrebonne and Assumption into another district with one senator.

Mr. GUION said that the particular localities of these parishes would make it necessary, in order to make the two districts equal, that a portion of the parish of Lafourche should be connected with the parish of Assumption. To place the parish of Assumption as a separate district, and the parishes of Lafourche Interior and Terrebonne as another district, would be making the districts glaringly unequal. He did not believe that such a design could be entertained.

Mr. RATLIFF said there appeared to be suddenly a mania for a perfect equality between the districts. And yet those that are now such sticklers for that equality, had no objection to make Ascension and St. James a district, and give that district two senators, although not strictly entitled to them by population. He (Mr. Ratliff) conceived that a perfect equality in every respect was impossible, we could only approach that equality. It was that consideration that induces him to vote to give St. James and Ascension two senators, but with the design, at least on his part, that the two parishes should be divided into two districts. The great object was to secure to a similarity of interests and a contiquity of territory, a separate representation, and thus to protect the rights of the minority. As far as it was practicable he desired to see every distinct population and every distinct interest represented in the legislature. He was not influenced by any political considerations. If a small parish of different feelings and interests were connected with a large parish, the result would be that the voice of the former would be stifled. For example, if the parish of West Baton Rouge were united with the parish of East Baton Rouge, the voice of West Baton Rouge would never, in all probability, be heard. The only way of avoiding such a result was to give a separate and distinct representation, as was practicable, to each parish or distinct political community.

Mr. GUION disliked to trouble the Convention. His constituents might feel themselves indebted to the member from Feliciana for volunteering his assistance in their behalf. But (said Mr. Guion) I do not feel indebted to him. I consider myself as capable of representing their interests, and as much more conversant with their views. These parishes have been united ever since 1812. They have a similarity of interests, and their populations are homogenious. There is a peculiar fitness in their remaining united as heretofore. The gentleman has intimated that there was some inconsistency in my voting to give two senators to the district composed of St. James and Ascension. I see no inconsistency between that vote and my present position. These two parishes composed a senatorial district under the old constitution, and I have voted to grant them an additional senator, because, as I stated on a previous occasion, I consider that representation in the senate should not be based on taxation, population and wealth alone, but upon all three combined. There will be a fraction over after allowing two senators to Assumption, Lafourche, and Terrebonne, and that fraction may be transferred to Attakapas, in conformity with what I conceive to be a very just rule.

Mr. MILES TAYLOR called for the yeas and nays to constitute the Lafourche parishes into one senatorial district, with two senators, and the result was as follows:

Messrs. Auburt, Brumfield, Benjamin, Burton, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Cade, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendré, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry,

Voorhies, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder—38 yeas; and Messrs. Brazeale, Beatty, Brent, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Waddill and Wederstrandt—25 nays.

Mr. Chinn moved that the county of Iberville remain constituted as in the constitution of 1812, and be entitled to two senators. He said that upon reference to the statement prepared by the sub-committee, it appeared that the parishes of Iberville and West Baton Rouge contained a total population of thirteen thousand one hundred and thirty-three souls. The total amount of taxes contributed by these parishes was sixteen thousand seven hundred and eighty-one dollars and ninety-two cents. It is true that this amount is not quite equal to that contributed by St. James and Ascension, but there is no material difference, either in regard to the taxation or the population. Perfect equality, as has been well said, is not attainable. These parishes are rapidly on the increase. They were allowed one senator in 1812, and it seemed to him that the augmentation of another senator was not asking too much. There was an identity of interests and a similarity of feeling between the population of the two parishes, and it was their unanimous wish that their political association should be continued.

Mr. Voorhies said he had no objection to make to the motion of the delegate (Mr. Chinn) that the parish of Iberville should have two senators, provided that this senator should not be taken from the county of Attakapas. The total population of Attakapas, according to the statement made by a committee of this house, was twenty-five thousand four hundred and sixty-five souls. The population of St. Mary and St. Martin was seventeen thousand six hundred and twenty-four. The parish of St. Martin paid nine thousand seven hundred and ninety-four dollars and eighty-nine cents, and the parish of St. Mary eleven thousand six hundred and ninety-five dollars and ninety-five cents, making a total of twenty-one thousand four hundred and ninety dollars and eighty-five cents. On the score of territory they maintained a high pre-eminence. A great deal of valuable land still remained uncultivated. If any district were entitled to two members, it was a district composed of St. Mary and St. Martin.

Mr. Chinn had not the least doubt of the correctness of the statement of the delegate from Attakapas, (Mr. Voorhies) and if it were proper for him to commit himself, he would now declare his intention to vote that the united parishes of St. Mary and St. Martin should have two senators. The increase in population and wealth of the district he had the honor, in part, of representing upon this floor, clearly entitled it to two senators. Its united territory was extensive and fertile; its population was steadily on the increase. In the smaller parish—the parish of West Baton Rouge, this increase of population was more particularly remarkable, and was evidenced by the increased vote given at the recent elections. It gave at the last elections three hundred and thirteen votes.

Mr. Brent would remark that if we kept on increasing the number of senators at this rate, we would not stop until we had reached sixty or one hundred members for the senate. There were several large districts better entitled to two senators than the parish of Iberville, that claimed but one. He instanced the parishes of St. Landry and Rapides, and yet these parishes were satisfied with one senator each.

Mr. Lewis moved to add the parish of Point Coupée to Iberville and West Baton Rouge, and to allow two senators to that district.

Mr. Ledoux said that the parish of Point Coupée was clearly entitled to one senator. The people of that parish had voted with great unanimity for a Convention, which they would not have done had they thought they would be deprived of their voice in one branch of the legislature. The Convention had no right to deprive the parishes of the representation they enjoyed under the old constitution. Such a course would be exceedingly unjust, and might interfere with the ratification of the new constitution.

He (Mr. L.) commented upon the injustice of the representative apportionment in allowing Point Coupée but one member of the house, when she had as large a population as Plaquemines, to which three had been allotted. Mr. L. then read a number of statistical statements, to show that Point Coupée was in every respect entitled to ample representation, both in the house and senate.

Mr. Ratliff remarked that Point Coupée had adhered rigidly to the constitution in voting, and hence the vote bore but a small proportion to the population. That parish had a large extent of territory, and from his personal knowledge ought to be continued as a separate senatorial district.

Mr. Labauve agreed with Mr. Ledoux, that Point Coupée should have a separate senator, and should not be united with West Baton Rouge and Iberville. There was no connection, political or otherwise, between them, and an amalgamation was altogether to be deprecated. He hoped Mr. Lewis' motion would not prevail.

Mr. Lewis withdrew his motion.

The question was taken on constituting the parishes of Iberville and West Baton Rouge one senatorial district, and it was carried in the affirmative.

The question then recurred on allowing two senators to that district, and the yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Benjamin, Boudousquié, Briant, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Kenner, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Waddill and Winchester—23 yeas.

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Cénas, Chambliss, Covillion, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Lewis, McRae, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wederstrandt and Winder—38 nays.

Mr. Read moved that the parish of East Baton Rouge compose one senatorial district, and that this district be entitled to one senator. He said that in 1812, one senator had been accorded to the parish of East Baton Rouge. Her increase in population and in wealth had been very great; her present population was placed upon the statement made by the committee upon apportionment, at eight thousand one hundred and thirty-eight. She contributed in taxes nine thousand four hundred and twenty-nine dollars; and at the last presidential election, she gave seven hundred and twenty-four votes. She had an incontestable right, whether we consider population, extent of territory or taxation, to a senator, and he presumed no objection would be made to his motion. His motion prevailed.

Mr. Ledoux moved that the parish of Point Coupée compose one senatorial district, and be allowed one senator. He said that this body were assembled for the purpose of enlarging the liberties of the people—not to restrain them. If the number of senators for other districts are to be increased, it must not be done by taking away the senatorial representation accorded to any district by the old constitution. Far better would it be to augment the number of senators beyond thirty-two, than to create dissatisfaction by an act of positive injustice.

The motion to make the parish of Point Coupée a district, and to give it one senator, prevailed.

Mr. Covillion moved that the parish of Avoyelles compose a senatorial district, and be entitled to one senator.

Mr. Boudousquie was disposed to vote in favor of this motion, if the gentleman from that parish would submit some data showing that the parish of Avoyelles was entitled to a distinct senatorial representation.

Mr. Covillion said he would cheerfully communicate the information asked for by the gentleman, (Mr. Boudousquié.) The population of Avoyelles was six thousand six hundred and six, according to the statement lying upon the desks of members; it contributed six thousand four hundred and ninety-four dollars and ninety-two cents of taxes. From some local causes, its resources had but recently began to be developed. Its lands were fertile, and if it were not, strictly speaking, under the basis entitled at present to claim a distinct senatorial representation, it would, in the course of a very few years, have an excess, both of population and taxation, which would entitle it to more than one senator.

Mr. Brent bore his testimony in favor of the statement made by the delegate (Mr. Covillion.) The territory of Avoyelles was vast and fertile. Its natural position separated it from the contiguous parishes. It was true, that in reference to present population and taxation, it was not entitled, perhaps, to a distinct representation. But the principle had been adopted in relation to other sections of the State, that the excess of the population of one parish over and above the number necessary to entitle it to a senatorial delegation, should be transferred to another contiguous parish having a less population. If this principle were observed in the present instance, Avoyelles would be entitled to one senator, inasmuch as Rapides would be entitled to one senator, and have over and above a sufficient fraction remaining to transfer to the parish of Avoyelles. It was clear that united together in one senatorial district, the two parishes would be entitled to two senators. The only result would be, that if the gentleman's motion prevailed, they would vote separately, and there would be one senator for each parish, which met the concurrence of the people of both parishes.

Mr. Lewis was opposed to single districts on principle, and wished, whenever it was practicable, to give two senators to each district. He was, moreover, unwilling to arrange the district so as to require more than thirty-two senators.

Mr. Kenner said, that the parish of Avoyelles, together with the parish of Rapides and the parish of Catahoula, had heretofore formed but one senatorial district. He was averse to small districts. If these parishes be entitled to more than one senator, let them have the benefit of an increase; but let them remain as heretofore, united in one district. There was a great deal of force in the remark of the delegate from Lafourche (Mr. Guion) that districts with single senators, were objectionable, because they placed too much power in the hands of a single person in relation to the confirmation of appointments.

Mr. Covillion, in reply to the delegate (Mr. Kenner) would remark, that when a similar question came up in relation to the parishes of Ascension and St. James, the gentleman considered it an improper interference for other delegates to meddle with the wishes of the members from parishes that desired, for convenience sake, to be united. That delegate said it was a family affair. Is not this as much a family affair? The gentleman has shifted his position now, that he is beyond his locality.

Mr. C. M. Conrad thought there was a material difference between the two cases. In the case of the parishes forming the county of Acadia nothing was sought but to continue that district as it was in the old constitution, and to give it an additional senator. But in reference to Avoyelles, the matter was materially different. That parish was lopped off of a district composed of three parishes, with the view of creating it into a separate senatorial district. Its total population was only six thousand six hundred and six; while the total population of Ascension and St. James was fifteen thousand four hundred and ninety-nine. The contribution in taxes, of Ascension, was six thousand four hundred and ninety-four dollars and ninety-two cents; the contribution of St. James alone was nine thousand seven hundred and seventy-three dollars and sixty-seven cents, nearly double the amount paid by Avoyelles. Surely there was no similarity between the claims of St. James and Ascension and those of Avoyelles. I regret, said Mr. Conrad, that I am under the necessity of voting against giving a separate senator to Avoyelles, but I cannot vote in favor of it in conformity with any principle.

Mr. Boudousquie was ready to do justice to the claims of any parish. But really he thought that Avoyelles could not reasonably expect to have a distinct senatorial representation. Both in population and taxation she was deficient. The parishes of St. Charles and St. John the Baptist had been continued as a senatorial district, and were allowed but one senator, and yet they contributed in taxes thirteen thousand five hundred and thirty-seven dollars, more than double the amount paid by the parish of Avoyelles. Their united population was ten thousand four hundred and seventy-six; while the total population of Avoyelles was only six thousand six hundred and six. It was unfair to allow them but one senator, and Avoyelles one. It would not be in consonance with the principle of equality and uniformity. Let the same couse be adopted in relation to Avoyelles as was adopted for the county of German coast; and inasmuch as it has not by itself the requisite essentials to be a separate senatorial district, let it be united with some adjacent parish. It might be united with the parish of Catahoula, whose total population is four thousand nine hundred and fifteen, and which contributes a tax of two thousand nine hundred and thirty-nine dollars and ninety-five cents. These two parishes combined would be entitled to a senator.

Mr. Benjamin said that inasmuch as it appeared to be conceded that that the parishes of Rapides and Avoyelles combined, were only entitled to two senators, he saw no objection to allowing them to choose one senator each. It was true that the parish of Avoyelles had neither the requisite population nor the requisite taxation to entitle it to a senator. But on the other hand, Rapides had more than the requisite population and taxation to constitute her into a senatorial district. The excess of her population could be carried to the account of Avoyelles. He would have no objection to this, were it distinctly understood that the two parishes should not have more than two senators.

Mr. Voorhies said with this condition, he would have no objection to allowing a senatorial delegation to Avoyelles; but if hereafter more than one senator for Rapides were claimed, he would move to reconsider the vote creating the parish of Avoyelles into a separate senatorial district.

Mr. Claiborne could not vote in favor of granting a distinct senatorial delegation to the parish of Avoyelles, because it was evident that she was not entitled to it. If Avoyelles were united to the parish of Rapides, for the purpose of forming a senatorial district, he would vote to give to that district two senators, because the population and taxation of Rapides and Avoyelles united would entitle them to that representation. But to make Avoyelles a particular favorite, and to show in her behalf an unjust preference over other parishes, was what he could not assent to.

Mr. C. M. Conrad would remark that we were not here to act upon the diplomatic negociations entered into by the representatives of different parishes, with the view of arranging their respective claims. He doubted much whether the delegation from Rapides were authorised to make any such concession as had been intimated in this debate. That parish was allowed one senator, because she had the requisite population and contributed the requisite amount of taxation; over and above that it appeared she had a fraction, and she was clearly entitled to have that fraction represented, by uniting it with some other parish, that had not by itself the requisite population.

Mr. Voorhies said he was well acquainted with the parish of Avoyelles. It was true, as stated by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Conrad) that it was a portion of the State which had been settled many years ago. But from local causes it had made little or no progress until within the last ten years. He had been there when it was a wilderness. He was well acquainted with its topography. He had returned within a recent period, and was really astonished at its advancement. Plantations were opening on all sides, and population was flowing in steadily. If the parish of Rapides contained a greater extent of territory, some deduction would have to be made for a considerable body of pine lands which would not be very availrble to culture; whereas there was but little of the territory of Avoyelles which would be a waste; its lands were very productive, and from their fertility he doubted not that Avoyelles would become one of the wealthiest parishes of the State. Anciently but little was done in the way of cultivation. The old settlers followed the chase, and one of them, who was very well known and who traded with New Orleans, Jean Pierre Lemoine, acquired in that occupation one hundred thousand dollars. It was not at all unlikely that in the end, Avoyelles would outstrip Rapides by the extent of her productions.

Mr. Chinn said he could not consent to give a distinct senatorial delegation to Avoyelles, because it was evident it was not entitled to it, either in reference to population or taxation. He would renew the motion, that the parishes of Catahoula and Avoyelles form one senatorial district, with one senator.

Mr. Boudousquie said, that he had suggested the union of these parishes. But his attention had been called to the physical obstructions that existed against such an union. By reference to a map, he saw that it would be extremely inconvenient to the inhabitants, and might operate to their detriment. He would sustain the union of Avoyelles and Rapides in the formation of a senatorial district.

Mr. WALKER, with the leave of the Convention, would make a few explanations in relation to the peculiar positions of Avoyelles to the other parishes, with which she had heretofore been united in the formation of a senatorial district. The parish of Avoyelles was in fact an isolated parish. She was divided by physical causes from both Rapides and Catahoula. It was extremely difficult to pass over at times, to or from her territory, to that of the adjacent parishes. Nature had evidently designed that she should have a distinct political representation from that of the surrounding country. In reference to any present disparity, either in her population or taxation, he would remark that this was but transient. She was destined at no distant day to excel both in population and in wealth, and would in the end, probably outstrip the parish of Rapides. Being well acquainted with these facts, and as a delegate from the district which embraced this parish, he had deemed it not improper to offer these explanations.

Mr. CHINN said he could very well divine the object of the present effort to make Avoyelles a senatorial district. When this was accomplished, Rapides would be constituted into a senatorial district. Here we have two senators where there has heretofore been but one. But that is not yet all; a portion of the ancient district, to wit: the parish of Catahoula has been kept in reserve for the formation, with perhaps some contiguous territory, of a third district.

The yeas and nays were called for, on Mr. Covillion's motion to constitute the parish of Avoyelles into a senatorial district, with one senator.

Messrs. Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Winder—40 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Boudousquie, Briant, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Dunn, Guion, Kenner, Labauve, Legendre, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Wadsworth and Winchester—19 nays.

Whereupon, the Convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, March 28, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. NICHOLSON.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The majority report of the committee on the division of the State into senatorial districts.

Mr. CADE moved to take up that part of the report apportioning the eighth district, constituting the parishes of Opelousas and Attakapas.

Mr. DUNN rose to a question of order, contending that the section apportioning the Florida parishes was the proper question before the house.

Mr. LEWIS differed in opinion with the delegate from East Feliciana, (Mr. Dunn.) He thought it was in order to take up any part of the report, and contended that it was against all principles either of fairness or etiquette to give a preference to the new parishes over the old ones. He conceives that the old parishes of the State should be fairly apportioned first, and then we should proceed to divide, on the same principles of fairness, what was left among the younger parishes. This courtesy demanded. Mr. Lewis illustrated it by saying that the Congress of the United States pursued that course, as the old thirteen States take the precedence and are always called first; so it should be here. In this there can be no injustice to the Florida parishes, for there is no danger of their not getting what they are fully entitled to. He hopes Mr. Cade's motion will prevail.

Mr. DUNN thought that was a strange argument; for his part, he said he was of opinion that the Florida parishes were fully equal to, and just as much deserving of attention, as any of the older parishes.

Mr. Lewis replied, that he had not said they were not equal, but that they were younger, and that it was nothing but an act of courtesy in the younger parishes to give way to the older ones, when no unfair advantage was ever dreamt of towards them.

Mr. Dunn still insisted that no distinction ought to be made, and hopes the Convention will proceed as they are going on, and take the parishes in the order reported by the committee.

Mr. Cade remarked that his desire in calling the attention of the Convention to this matter was, that he was anxious, before they proceeded further, to suggest a change in the district; and that if they proceeded in the order laid down, they could not cleverly do so, particularly as the committee had reported his section of the country as the very last deserving of consideration, and if they proceeded in the order laid down, he could not well accomplish what he aimed at.

Mr. Brent remarked that the change could be made as we progressed with the report.

Mr. Ratliff was also in favor of proceeding with the report as it stands. He will have no objection if sufficient reasons can be adduced to change any part of it. He wants nothing for his district of country but what is just, fair, honorable, and right. He regrets to hear the arguments advanced on this floor, that new parishes coming into a State should be regarded in the light of a step-mother in a family. Let us look, (said Mr. R.,)at the constitution of the United States, and that tells us that all the new States, when admitted into the Union go in on an equal footing with the old States. The same rule then should apply to those parishes in our State that have been taken in under the treaty. The mere calling over the names of the old thirteen States in Congress first, amounts to nothing; it is a simple matter of courtesy, which has been regarded in the same light that gentlemen daily practice, that is, always to give place to an old man, who claims attention first. But, Mr. President, (said Mr. R.) I go further than that, and say that I do not think it is right we should give way, when we have reason to believe that the rights of our constituents are in danger; and I feel, sir, like the venerable Mr. Thomas, who formerly, in contending for the rights of the Florida parishes, when it was contemplated to deprive them of equality of representation, remarked that they should not take him out of the hall while defending those rights, unless it were feet foremost. Now, sir, I say that so long as I have power to stand, and raise my voice in this hall, that I will not, cannot, be driven off from maintaining the rights of those parishes. Men talk here as if we wanted some advantage. Sir, we want no advantage, but want justice; we are not afraid to ask it, and you are bound to give it.

The question was then put on Mr. Cade's motion, and the same was carried.

A discussion then arose, whether or not a dispensation of the rules was necessary to take up the question out of the ordinary course.

The President decided that a majority of the Convention had clearly the right to take up any part of a report which they saw fit to, not previously acted upon. The Convention then proceeded to the consideration of the senatorial representation of the counties of Opelousas and Attakapas.

Mr. Cade moved to add to the parish of St. Landry, the parish of Calcasieu, make the same one district, and allow her two senators. He conceived it was nothing more than what they were justly entitled to, and so thinking, he pressed his motion to the attention of the house.

Mr. Lewis then moved, that the parishes of St. Mary and St. Martin should form one district, and be entitled to two senators.

Mr. Cade then proceeded to divide them, and allow the parish of St. Mary to elect one senator, and the parish of St. Martin the other. He urged that the parish in its population, wealth, and importance, has a right to a separate conservative voice in the upper house.

Mr. Tayor regretted to oppose the honorable delegate from Lafayette, (Mr. Cade) but yet he was bound to do so on principle. He has always regarded the question thus, that the senate is the body where the minority looks to for protection against any encroachment on the part of the majority; and therefore, that is not likely to be accomplished, if we elect the representative and senator by the very same votes; for if we do, there will then be no check; both being elected by the same popular vote, they will be bound to, and doubtless will, act together, without regard to any other than sectional interests—the very thing intended to be guarded against. He therefore moved that the parishes of St. Mary and St. Martin form one district, with two senators.

Mr. Splane had hoped that this Convention would not have interfered in family matters, and as such, he regarded this question. He remarked that the parish of St. Mary was every way entitled to what she asked at the hands of this Convention, under the very principle upon which we have heretofore acted. She is entitled to it upon any basis, (whether it be population or taxation) which is to be regarded in this matter. In the first place, she has a population of over nine thousand. In the second place, she paid into the State treasury in 1843, twelve thousand dollars, and in 1844 over fifteen thousand dollars. He (Mr. Splane) hopes that this Convention will permit the members from the Attakapas and Opelousas counties to divide out the senatorial districts in their section, as to them may seem most fit, and the most in accordance with the wishes of the people, whom they represent.

Mr. Dunn was desirous of making a few brief remarks in reply to the gentlemen who had addressed the Convention on this subject. He was of the same opinion as the delegate from Assumption, as to small senatorial districts being decidedly not in accordance with the spirit of our institutions; and which heretofore has been so happily illustrated in large districts being so much preferable, because minorities are thereby always protected by the safeguard thrown around their rights, in the check afforded to them through the senate, over the acts of the popular branch of the government. He (Mr. Dunn) was momentarily in expectation that the same question would be started, as regards the senatorial delegation of East and West Feliciana, and he therefore takes this opportunity, as the question is precisely similar, to express his dissent to any such division. He thinks that it is in accordance with sound reason, that the same people who elect representatives to the lower house, should not alone elect a senator; and why? Because if you do, where is the very thing we profess to aim at, the check? A senator is a much higher, a much more dignified officer than that of the representative of the lower house. He is clothed with far more delicate and important powers; he acts not only as the judge in the bestowal of subordinate offices upon the governor's recommendation, but he is liable to be called upon at any moment to sit as a judge in cases of impeachment. How much more important then are his duties, than if he were to be governed by local interests and feelings; and how much more necessary to separate him from any such local influences? A senator should be a man thinking of no particular spot; but of the weal and welfare of the whole State; the best evidence that can be given of the importance of such an office, is, that it ever has been deemed advisable to have such a check on the house of representatives; further, we see there is in cases of impeachment, a check upon that check; because a bare majority of the senate is not sufficient for conviction of the officer under trial; and why? It shows plainly that that proviso is placed as a check upon men who might either be actuated by improper motives, or from sectional feelings; for that reason, and from the fact that two-thirds are required for conviction, it is apparent that it is necessary to restrict even them in their power, whenever we can do so, for we thereby the more effectually keep them independent of local feelings and prejudices; evidently the thing most feared in all deliberative bodies. He (Mr. Dunn) believes that the interests of the State require that the senatorial districts should be extended as to territory, and diminished as to numbers. It makes senators more independent, they take a bolder and more enlarged view of the interests of the State, than if they were to be held accountable to any one parish; and they then feel that they are indeed the conservative branch of the government.

It is for this reason that he is opposed to any separation in the parishes of St. Mary and St. Martin. As they will have their elections every two years for one of the senators, and as they have pretty much an identity of interests, they should be kept together. He thinks it important that the representation should be confined, if not into large, at least into convenient districts.

Mr. Taylor, while he is not desirous of discussing this subject, cannot see the benefit to result from it, which is claimed by some of those who wish it; but certainly for the reasons which he has heretofore assigned, whenever any proposition is made to connect two parishes together, as a senatorial district, such as St. Mary and St. Landry, he shall always vote for it, because he thinks it important for the maintenace of the check which ought always to be in the senate over the acts of the lower house.

Mr. Ratliff is of opinion, that two senators being allowed to St. Mary and St. Martin, with a population of seventeen thousand six hundred and twenty-four, is disproportionate, when it is considered that St. Landry alone has a population of fifteen thousand two hundred and thirty-three, and that therefore she will claim likewise two senators. In the parishes of East and West Feliciana, with a population of twenty-two thousand seven hundred and twenty-two, and paying into the treasury twenty-five thousand seven hundred and forty-four dollars, they might with the same propriety claim three senators; but although those two parishes have that excess, he does not claim it for them. Then why give it to St. Mary and St. Martin? If we do not closely watch this matter, we shall increase the number beyond bounds. The ratio must be made according to population and taxation; and then if that rule be observed, how small the difference between St. Mary, St. Martin and St. Landry. We have already said that Point Coupée shall be entitled to one senator; West Baton Rouge and Iberville to one; and if we adopt the principle contended for, we are bound to increase the number of senators, rather than diminish them, unless we are guilty of gross injustice to some of the parishes.

Mr. Lewis desired to make a few remarks particularly to satisfy the delegate from West Feliciana, but more especially to show that the Attakapas and Opelousas members were asking nothing but what was fair and just. It is a matter well known that the parishes adjoining St. Mary and St. Martin, viz: the parishes of Assumption, Lafourche Interior, and Terrebonne, had a large fraction of population left in their district over and above what was considered as requisite to entitle them to two senators, and that those parishes were willing to accord that fraction to the parishes of St. Mary and St. Martin. The parish of St. Landry moreover had no idea of being divorced from the parish of Calcasieu in her political ties of connection; and it was also worthy of remark that the parishes of St. Landry and Calcasieu formed an amount of territory not inferior to the old parish of Natchitoches, now divided into six, seven, or eight parishes. It is true that the population is not so great as is to be found in other parishes, but there can be no doubt that St. Mary, St. Martin, St. Landry, Lafayette and Vermillion are justly entitled, when you add the parish of Calcasieu to them, to five senators. Let gentlemen examine their statistics on this subject, and their fears will vanish, as to our getting more than we are entitled to. Instead of Calcasieu and Sabine forming one district with one senator, join Calcasieu to St. Landry, and accord them two senators; that would be fair and reasonable; and for the same reason he thinks when you take into consideration the amount of population, and the large amount of property in the parishes of St. Mary and St. Martin, that they are also fully entitled to two senators.

Mr. Brent proposed a division of the question.

Mr. Voorhies objects on the ground that it is not called for, and is, moreover, inexpedient and unnecessary. He represents the county of Attakapas, consisting of four parishes—St. Mary, St. Martin, Lafayette and Vermillion, and he knows that to divide the two former parishes is unnecessary; formerly they were one parish; there are no water courses to divide them; it is the same country, and peopled by the same class of citizens, having one common interest. Yesterday he had advocated the separation of Rapides from Avoyelles on the ground that they were separate and distinct communities; and even in this case he might not have any material objection, if it were considered a matter desirable to his constituents, but the members from St. Martin were opposed to it, and as he could see no possible advantage to be derived from the separation, and feeling that no injustice would be done to any of them by remaining together, he should vote to keep taem united as a district. It is very certain that they are entitled to two senators, particularly when it is known that what Lafourche loses she is willing to accord to those parishes.

Mr. CADE withdraws his motion,and accepts the one offered by Mr. Taylor, to keep the parishes united as one district with two senators.

Mr. SPLANE then pressed a division. He contended that they were not united; that their interests were not identical, St. Mary being a parish exclusively engaged in the cultivation of sugar cane, while St. Martin was considerably engaged in the culture of cotton, and had also a large grazing interest. He remarked, therefore, that they ought to be separated; that St. Mary was rapidly filling up by emigration; that she had a population about equal to that of St. Martin; that her citizens were desirous of a separaie representation in the senate, and as such, he felt bound to press it on the considera.ion of the Convention, and therefore renewed the motion to divide.

The question was then put, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Humble, McCallop, McRae, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Waddill and Wederstandt—25 yeas.

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Cade, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Hynson, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Winchester and Winder—36 nays. So the motion was lost.

Mr. SPLANE then moved to attach Vermillion and Lafayette to the parishes of St. Mary and St. Martin.

Mr. CADE hoped the motion would not prevail, for the parishes of Vermillion and Lafayette were identical in interest—were as one people; and were fully entitled to a separate representation in the senate.

Mr. CONRAD remarked, that although he was generally in favor of large senatorial districts, he thought that such an apportionment would be unfair, and as such he opposed it.

Mr. SPLANE withdrew his motion, and then

Mr. MILES TAYLOR renewed his motion to constitute the parishes of St. Mary and St. Martin one senatorial district; and his motion prevailed. He then moved that the district be entitled to two senators; which motion being put, the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Peets, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Scott of Baton Rouge, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder—49 yeas; and

Messrs. Burton, Hynson, Marigny, Penn, Porter, Ratliff, Roman, Scott of Feliciana, Waddill and Wederstrandt—10 nays; so the motion prevailed.

Mr. O'BRYAN then moved that the parishes of Lafayette and Vermillion do constitute one senatorial district, and shall be entitled to one senator; which motion also prevailed.

Mr. LEWIS then moved that the parishes of St. Landry and Calcasieu should form one senatorial district, and be entitled to two senators.

Mr. DOWNS objected to the manner in which the Convention was proceeding. He thought it was decidedly better for them to go on in the regular way, as reported by the committee.

Mr. WADDILL most perfectly agreed with the delegate from Ouachita, that we are proceeding irregularly; but he objects on another and stronger ground to the motion before the house. In the first place, Calcasieu is not large enough for one district by itself, and St. Landry has already got more than her share in the representation in the lower house. So has Calcasieu, under the system of representation we have adopted in the lower house; she has one, St. Landry five. He dislikes to see gentlemen not content with holding on to what they have, still eternally grasping at more political power. He feels convinced that the report of the committee is every way more just, and that it will be much fairer to constitute the parishes of Sabine and Calcasieu one senatorial district, than the amendment proposed.

Mr. Downs is of opinion that we are going on altogether too fast, and before we know where we are, we shall have passed the number we have agreed upon, thirty-two, and have made at least thirty-four senators.

Mr. Claiborne reminded the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) that what had been granted to the parishes of St. Mary and St. Martin had been taken away from the parishes adjacent to New Orleans, and therefore could make no difference in the total number.

Mr. Ratliff insists, that if the motion prevail, it will give us thirty-three senators. Now gentlemen, he conceives, ought to be more candid, and not conceal their object until too late; if it be their intention to make sections of any particular portion of the country, why not come out and manfully say so? because, if they do, then they can be prepared to defend themselves. Now let us look on what pretensions this clause is founded? Forsooth, it is simply this, that the parish of St. Landry in consequence of the heavy burden she is under, in taking under her wing a parish having a population of one thousand six hundred and eighty-eight, and paying into the State treasury about one thousand six hundred and fifty dollars, should be entitled to another senator, beides the one allotted to her. She is, by the report, entitled to one senator; and by the apportionment in the lower house, to five representatives—together six; surely as much as ought, in the name of common sense, to be asked for her. The reason assigned for giving to Point Coupée one senator, was, that she was not fairly represented in the house of representatives; but the same thing cannot be said of St. Landry, for she is there fully represented, having five members allowed her. He (Mr. Ratliff) thinks he can now see through the movement in taking up the eighth district out of its regular course. He feels convinced that they expected to lead us along blind-folded and in the dark, and for the great and insuperable burden which they were to take upon themselves in the junction to their parish of another with the enormous amount of one thousand six hundred and eighty-eight in population, they were to be entitled to one additional senator. Why, neither of the reports asked for more than four senators for that district. The majority report asks for four, the minority three, and now they modestly insist upon five. There they are again, trying to get the lion's share; "turkey for them, all the time!!!" Going on at the rate and in the manner we are, we shall be involved in inextricable confusion. We have already run the house of representatives up to ninety-eight, when we have positively said that it should not go beyond one hundred. God knows where we shall stop, in the way we are progressing. Now we say the senate shall not exceed thirty-two, but if we give them the extra one they claim we must either increase the number, or else take it off from some other part of the country. In East and West Feilciana there is a population of twenty thousand and over, and they pay into the State treasury taxes to the amount of twenty-five thousand dollars and over. Now we are more modest than our friends of the prairie, for we only ask two. He (Mr. R.) warns gentlemen that our course will be any thing but satisfactory in making the senate so large a body; from what he (Mr. Ratliff) now sees going on, he expects nothing less than that there will be thirty-five or thirty-six senators created; and if the matter be not properly understood, and checked at once, he should not be surprised to see it reach the number of forty-five. The only plea they put in for the extra senator, is, that they take in the one thousand six hundred and eighty-eight citizens of Calcasieu, which he (Mr. Ratliff) thinks does not sustain their pretensions. He objects to increasing the representation in the senate, unless it be shown—first, that it is warranted by the population; and second, that the taxes paid into the State treasury give them some reasonable claim; for if we do not adhere strictly to such a rule, we shall presently find the claims as thick as mushrooms of a summer's morning.

Mr. Voorhies thinks the delegate from West Feliciana is very unreasonable; he makes a great flourish of trumpets about his moderation, in asking but two senators for East and West Feliciana; but he has forgotten to tell you that he will modestly claim one senator for two parishes, in his darling district, Washington and St. Tammany, who pay together into the State treasury four thousand five hundred dollars; and that he will also claim one senator for the parishes of St. Helena and Livingston, who pay in taxes three thousand seven hundred. Now then, here are four parishes who contribute to the expenses of sustaining the government of Louisiana a little over eight thousand dollars, and with a total population of twelve thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven souls, and yet for these parishes it is thought perfectly right and fair to ask for two senators; while for those districts having twice the population, and paying three times the amount of State tax which they do, we are charged with being unreasonable when we ask for that to which we are fully entitled. Besides the section of country for which these two senators are asked, is one that is as thickly settled now as it ever will be, from the very nature of the country itself, it is bound to be stationary.

He (Mr. Voorhies) thinks it is nothing but just and fair to curtail the representation of those parishes, in the senate, who contribute so little to support the expenses of the State, and increase that of the parishes who bear the bulk of that burden. Besides there is no prospect of their ever getting in any better way; for the last ten or fifteen years they have not increased one jot, they have made no progress, nor is there any prospect of it; they will remain as they have been, in "statu quo," from now to eternity.

He regards all that is said by the member from West Feliciana, about his great moderation, as intended to mislead the members; for certainly if he did desire to have justice done in the premises, he would promptly say "take one member from the Florida parishes and add to the Opelousas district, for you are justly entitled to it; your country is rapidly filling up, and from the large body of your alluvial lands, you are bound to increase, not only in population, but in wealth and importance;" that is the way he would talk if he were sincere.

Mr. Lewis remarked that he was no prophet, and could not, like the honorable delegate from West Feliciana, predict what was to happen hereafter; but, looking at facts as they are, he thinks that the claim set up for another senator for St. Landry, annexing to it the parish of Calcasieu, is just, reasonable and fair. The county of Opelonsa is now entitled to one senator in a house of seventeen. She has always increased in wealth and population, as much as any other portion of the State. Her territory comprises one-fifth of the State of Louisiana.

The delegate from West Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) states that we claim another senator, simply because we take into our district the parish of Calcasieu. There he is in error; for when you come to look into the matter, you will find that St. Landry is nearly herself entitled to two senators—whether you regard her population, or the amount she pays into the treasury—and that by adding Calcasieu to the district, she is most unquestionably and clearly entitled to it. The Lafourche district have an average of about nine thousand to a sentor; the Opelousas and Attakapas districts about one thousand more; and if it be intended to make a fair division, which was preached yesterday, and is to-day, by gentlemen around us, surely that which is good to give is good to take. If Attakapas is entitled to three senators, Opelousas ought to be entitled to two.

Mr. Burton expressed himself as really gratified to know that one member at least (Mr. Voorhies) had candor enough to admit what his intentions were, viz: to cut down the senatorial representation of the poor pine-woods parishes, to add to that of the prairie country. But while eulogizing the latter he has misrepresented the former; for it is by no means so poor a country as he describes it—the parish of Livingston contains some considerable bodies of fine and valuable lands. He (Mr. Voorhies) asserts that the pine-woods pay comparatively nothing into the State treasury, but he has forgotten to tell you that whatever their proportion of the taxes is, it is always paid, and is not like the rich prairies of Opelousas, in debt for thirteen thousand dollars back taxes due the State. Poor, the citizens of the piney-woods may be, but they are a hard working, honest and industrious people; they pay what they owe, while others make a great fuss about what they are taxed, but forget to tell you that their taxes remain unpaid. He is opposed to cutting men down in their political rights on account of their poverty; but if that is the object and the cause, it would certainly be more fair to acknowledge it candidly at once. He protests against any such course as we are now pursuing.

Mr. RATLIFF remarked that he thought he might have been in error in asserting that the number of senators would be so largely increased, for he finds that the number so far, has not been increased over thirty-two, if no further change be made. The only question for us to consider in the matter before us, is the parish of St. Landry joined to Calcasieu, entitled to two senators? He does not think they are.

Mr. DOWNS insists that it will increase the number of senators to thirty-three, if this motion prevail.

Mr. CADE remarked, that what was taken off from the first district has alone been added to the eighth, and that when we add one parish to the district, if the other parish be joined to some other of the districts, there will then be no increase of the number.

Mr. PORTER is of opinion that by taking in the parish of Calcasieu, the district is really entitled to two senators, and shall vote for allowing that number to it, relying on the justice of the Convention not to take it off from any other part of the country without good cause.

Mr. CLAIBORNE regards it as a very plain and simple question—it is, whether it is more fair and equitable to give to Calcasieu and Sabine, who, together, pay taxes to the amount of three thousand six hundred dollars, and with a population of six thousand, a senator, or to give two to St. Landry and Calcasieu who pay, in taxes, sixteen thousand six hundred dollars, and whose population is about seventeen thousand three hundred. He (Mr. Claiborne) cannot hesitate in such a plain matter, and will vote for allowing the district two senators.

The question was then put, and resulted as follows, the yeas and nays being called for:

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Brumfield, Briant, Cade, Cénas, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Roman, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Spláne, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wederstrandt, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—57 yeas; and

Mr. Abel Waddill voted in the negative—1 nay; consequently the motion was carried, and the district composed of the parishes of St. Landry and Calcasieu, with two senators, was adopted.

Mr. RATLIFF then moved to take up the report regularly, where we left it on yesterday, and beginning at the apportionment of East and West Feliciana, Washington, St. Tammany, Livingston and St. Helena.

Mr. WEDERSTRANDT moved a division of this district, and proposed that West Feliciana should form one district, and elect one senator.

Mr. DUNN opposed that motion. He thinks that East and West Feliciana are so closely identified together in interest and feeling, they have always acted together so perfectly, are of the same political family, and every way so harmoniously, that a separation is not called for. The people of these parishes have never, to his knowledge, shown any desire for this separation, and no possible good can result to the State. There are, it is true, a few more votes in East Feliciana than in West Feliciana, but the former have never interfered to the prejudice of the latter; in fact they are so much one family that it would be wrong to separate them. Both parishes hold their political meetings at Jackson with perfect good feeling and harmony; and while it is clear there is no necessity for a division, he hopes the motion will not prevail.

Mr. RATLIFF trusts that the Convention will agree to the division proposed by his colleague, (Mr. Wederstrandt.) The delegate from East Feliciana must certainly have forgotten, when he said he never heard of a desire to have a separate senatorial district; for he (Mr. R.) had heard it repeatedly, and as the delegate from East Feliciana (Mr. Dunn) has, he knows, been frequently in West Feliciana on recent occasions, he could not have failed to hear some remarks on a topic so generally discussed. It is true, they are both democratic parishes, but when people are themselves desirous of the division, why deny it to them?

The population of East Feliciana is eleven thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, and pays into the treasury twelve thousand five hundred and ninety-three dollars State tax. That of West Feliciana, ten thousand nine hundred and ten total population, and pays State taxes to the amount of thirteen thousand one hundred and fifty dollars and forty-eight cents. There is scarcely any difference in the size and wealth of the parishes. The parish of West Feliciana has a front of nearly one hundred miles on the Mississippi river, and is divided from the parish of East Feliciana by a large creek. As it is the desire then of West Feliciana to separate, why should she not be indulged in her wish?

Besides, the honorable delegate from East Feliciana, (Mr. Dunn) who is about to remove from that parish to Baton Rouge, cannot be supposed to feel as deep an interest for the welfare of these parishes as he has done, while it was his permanent home. It is a well known fact that there is a bone of contention in East Feliciana, about dividing that parish, in which West Feliciana desires to take no part; she has no dissensions in her borders, and does not wish to be mixed up in a family quarrel. He (Mr. R.) regards that as a powerful reason for the separation. East Baton Rouge has a separate senator; Pointe Coupée, a little bit of a parish, has one; Avoyelles has one, which was magnanimously yielded to her by Rapides; and now a question is raised, when we reach the parishes of East and West Feliciana, whether the same favor should be extended to them which has been accorded to the others. The delegate from East Feliciana, (Mr. Dunn) has graciously remarked, that that parish has never tried to usurp power from West Feliciana, nor has she shown any jealousy of our prominent men. But suppose those feelings, heretofore so harmonious, were to clash? How then? Would it not be more clear and satisfactory for her to say, we have not only no desire to interfere with you, but we will place it out of our own power, by consenting to a division? Let them say, we set you free, and take away from ourselves every possible claim to do it hereafter. That is the way to show sincerity. He (Mr. R.) trusts that the house will accord to West Feliciana what she has already done to other parishes.

Mr. Scott of East Feliciana, then addressed the Convention.

Mr. President, (said he:) My situation here is a peculiar one; particularly so when I find myself in direct opposition to one o my immediate colleagues from the parish of East Feliciana. But, sir, I am here as the representative of the parishes of East and West Feliciana, and, as such, I am bound to act in this case as I believe strict justice to the two parishes requires. I have voted throughout this contest in favor of small senatorial districts, I believe a majority of my constituents are in favor of dividing those parishes into two senatorial districts, and believing thus, I feel constrained to urge a division of those two parishes, each to form one senatorial district, and hope the house will sustain me in doing so.

Mr. Chinn asked if he had correctly understood the delegate from East Feliciana, that a majority of the people in both those parishes desired the division.

Mr. Scott replied that he was so convinced.

Mr. Saunders remarked that he was opposed to the system of cutting up the senatorial districts into such small parts; for if the senators are elected by the same people as elect representatives to the lower house, there is then no check, and it does away with the necessity for the two houses. But in this case, (although it violates a rule which he regards an important one,) as the people of West Feliciana seem so desirous to be separated from us, he will vote for the motion of the delegate from West Feliciana, (Mr. Wederstrandt.)

Mr. CHINN, although he prefers large districts, from what he has heard, shall vote to separate the parishes, allowing each one senator.

Mr. LEWIS being opposed totally to cutting up the districts in such small parts, shall vote against the motion.

Mr. SPLANE, for the very opposit reason, shall spuport it,

The question was then put, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Chinn, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, McRae, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff--34 yeas.

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Guion, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder—26 nays; consequently said motion was carried, and the parish of West Feliciana constitutes one senatorial district, and is entitled to one Senator.

Mr. T. W. SCOTT then moved that East Feliciana shall constitute one senatorial district, with one senator, which motion prevailed.

Mr. MCRAE then moved that the parishes of St. Helena and Livingston, do constitute one senatorial district, and be entitled to one senator.

Mr. LABAUVE then moved to amend said motion by annexing the whole four parishes together, St. Helena, Livingston, St. Tammany and Washington, with one senator.

He contended that that was as much as they could in common fairness lay claim to. All, together, pay into the State treasury only eight thousand five hundred dollars of State tax, and have a total population of twelve thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven. Upon what principle of justice can they ask more? Iberville and West Baton Rouge are connected, and are only allowed one senator. Now let us compare the two districts, and ascertain, if we can, on what ground they set up their claims to two senators; whether it be on taxes, or population, or an imaginary rule, that they are entitled to them any how. The parishes of West Baton Rouge and Iberville have a total population of sixteen thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, which is four thousand more than the whole four parishes put together; and they pay into the State treasury, sixteen thousand seven hundred and eighty-one dollars, which is more than double what is paid in by those parishes which now claim two senators, when we were yesterday refused more than one. Why, the pay of the members which they will send to the legislature, will absorb pretty nearly the amount of the taxes they pay. Gentlemen ought to be consistent, and on the same ground that they refused it yesterday to his district, expect to be dealt with today themselves. He therefore, shall press his motion on the Convention, to make the whole four parishes into one district, with one senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH saw very clearly, that some were desirous of playing a game of grab, if we are to take any basis into consideration, as a proper starting point, for representation in the senate. The district in which Plaquemines is situated, and which has been refused more than one senator, is more entitled to two, than the whole four parishes put together; whether on the score of property, territory or taxation. She pays into the treasury twelve thousand one hundred and seventy-four dollars in taxes; two thousand two hundred and eighty-nine dollars taxes on professions; together, fourteen thousand four hundred and sixty-three dollars. And her wealth in property, is assesed at two millions eight hundred and twenty-seven thousand dollars. Now how do these four parishes together, compare? Why, they pay into the treasury eight thousand five hundred dollars State tax; and property assesed at one hundred and thirty-two thousand and seven hundred dollars; hence it is clear that Plaquemines district doubles them in every respect. It is admitted that the senate is constituted as a check upon the house of representatives, and for the protection of property, and every body understands that property is the most vital thing in the world to protect. Besides, it is a country that will never improve; it can never increase, because it is a poor miserable barren soil. Why, you can scarcely grow cow-peas on it. He recollects hearing, that a gentleman who was travelling through that country not long since, heard a sound resembling a moan of some female in distress; he pushed on more rapidly, and as he progressed some miles, the sound gradually became more distinct; at last he came up to the spot where it proceeded, and lo! he found that it was caused by a weed which was trying to grow. And yet it is for such a country that we are to be despoiled of our just rights. We are refused two senators, to which we are justly entitled, to satisfy the modest pretensions of the pine woods inhabitants.

Oh! shame!! where is thy blush?

Mr. Ratliff replied to the remarks of the delegate from Plaquemines, (Mr. Wadsworth). He remarked that he had not known what it was to have the blush of shame on his face; that all the declamation of the gentleman from Plaquemines, his sneers or denunciations, (or those of any member from any other portion of the State,) should not deter him by their unnecessarily severe remarks, to falter in the performance of what he conscienciously believed to be his duty to his constituents. But while he stood up to defend the rights of the Florida parishes on this floor, he did not wish, nor would he suffer any of those who make such a great pother and fuss about allowing the poor piney-woods parishes two senators, to rest, until he had shown them two things; first, that what is fair for one, is fair for another; or as has been observed here to day, "what is good to give is good to take." Second, that it is not wrong to be generous, provided, in doing it, you be also just.

Now Mr. R. contends that we have not, nor do we desire to depart from any just rule, when we ask you to protect the four parishes from the avarice and cupidity of those parishes that are richer..

He will endeavor to offer such arguments to this Convention as shall at once satisfy them that he is right. It was well known that when we came to the apportionment—not only of the house of representatives, but of the senate—that we should have much difficulty; and to his (Mr. Ratliff's) mind, this is the very time to settle it. We are, it is true, a little too much excited, but as he shall advance nothing but what the figures will prove, he thinks he shall rather allay it than otherwise. Now the district reported by the committee, which was to have been one district, in being divided ought not to lose any thing that she would have been entitled to in the aggregate. Let us see what the figures say. Why, that the parishes of East and West Feliciana, St. Helena, Livingston, Washington and St. Tammany, have a population of thirty-five thousand eight hundred—about nine thousand to a senator; that they pay together into the State treasury thirty-four thousand two hundred and ninety-five dollars, State taxes; something over eight thousand dollars for each senator claimed. Now if it be true that the bulk of this population, and the largest amount of the taxes be paid in the two first mentioned parishes, and they are disposed, as they are, to give the other parishes in the Florida district the surplus they have over and above what would entitle them each to one senator, why should they not have the right to do so? Notwithstanding the piney-woods people are not as rich as some other parts of the State, they are a virtuous and correct white population, and as such they are entitled to our protection in their rights. In the aggregate then these six parishes are entitled to four senators, and if East and West Feliciana are satisfied with two, no objection should be made in giving the other two to the remaining four parishes.

St. Mary and St. Martin pay short of ten thousand dollars of taxes each, and the Florida parishes average about nine thousand dollars; and if the bulk of the taxes be paid in some few, we are yet one people. He asks for the Florida district nothing but even-handed justice; and she is justly entitled to four senators; as to the division that is a matter of no moment. The original report gives us four, and the substitute gives us also four; why then should there be any objection? He has heard of none except from the honorable delegate from Iberville, (Mr. Labauve) and he can hardly think that he is sincere.

Mr. Dunn agreed that the large fraction created by the division of East and West Feliciana, should be given to the eastern parishes in the district.

Mr. Splane remarked that he was in favor of allowing the four parishes two senators. It is perhaps true that there is not population enough in those parishes alone but East and West Feliciana, and East Baton Rouge, have each large fractions over, which she is clearly entitled to the benefit of. The honorable delegate from Plaquemines (Mr. Wadsworth) has indulged us with a humorous story about a weed trying to grow there, making a piteous and mournful noise in the struggle for its life and progress. Now it is the first time that he ever heard of vegetable matter emitting sound from poor land. He has heard people say, in the rich alluvial bottoms, they could hear the corn grow, but he never heard of it in poor lands. He should vote for allowing her two senators, moreover as a compliment, for it was in that region of country he drew his breath, and this was the first time he had ever had it in his power to repay her by one single act of gratitude. He feels proud that he now can do so. They are not either as poor a country as the gentleman represents; there are many fine bodies of land in parts of it, which produce sugar cane and corn to as great profusion as in any part of Louisiana.

Mr. Chinn, in opposing the motion, is governed by a sense of conscientious duty. He knows the population and resources of the parishes, and knowing them, as he does, he is bound to take that course. Although he feels indisposed to say any thing that can operate against that portion of the country, yet he cannot disguise it from himself that the total population of them is short of thirteen thousand, and that they only pay into the treasury a sum short of nine thousand dollars. It is not a country likely to grow either in population or in wealth, as results have proved, taking the census of 1840 compared with the present number of their population.

Mr. Ratliff desired to call the attention of the Convention to a few more figures that would throw additional light on the subject. West Baton Rouge, Iberville, Point Coupée and East Baton Rouge have a population of thirty-five thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, and pay forty-three thousand two hundred and ninety-seven dollars taxes. The six Florida parishes have a population of thirty-five thousand eight hundred, and pay thirty-four thousand dollars taxes. The difference then is alone in the amount of taxes, while the population of the latter is greater. He mentions this fact to show the injustice there will be in rejecting the motion before us.

Mr. Penn then addressed the Convention. He contended that equity and justice demanded, according to any basis, that a senator should be given to the parishes of St. Helena and Livingston; and therefore he trusts the motion of the delegate from Iberville (Mr. Labauve) will not prevail. Their population, territory and extent of their voters, entitle them to it. While it is true that a portion of their lands are poor and unproductive, it is nevertheless equally undeniable that there are other portions, in Livingston particularly, which are rich and fertile, and which can be extensively cultivated in raising the sugar cane and cotton, and therefore we may reasonably look forward to an increasing population for her. St. Helena is also increasing, and has a white population equal to that of St. James. He (Mr. Penn) calls attention to the fact, that St. James gave in November last only five hundred and thirty-two votes, and has a territory of three thousand square miles; while St. Helena and Livingston gave seven hundred and five votes, and has a territory of at least one thousand and three hundred square miles;—upon what principle of equity or justice can they refuse to give one senator to St. Helena and Livingston, when they gave St. James one? He (Mr. Penn) is one of those who does not think that slaves, regarded as property, should be entitled to any representation. Let us see how Iberville and West Baton Rouge compare with St. Helena and Livingston. In the former they have a white population of one thousand three hundred and twenty-three, in the latter one thousand three hundred and seventy-one—together two thousand six hundred and ninety-four, and poll seven hundred and ninety-three votes; while in St. Helena and Livingston their white population is not far from four thousand, and they poll seven hundred and five votes; and yet while they refuse those two parishes one senator, they claimed yesterday one for each of their parishes. It is true they pay more taxes, but that is not a principle in republican governments, to base representation on. How can those who voted to give one senator to St. John the Baptist and St. Charles, refuse it to St. Helena and Livingston? At no distant day, St. Tammany and Washington are destined to become the suburbs of New Orleans, and so rapidly are they increasing that at the last election they gave two hundred votes more than were cast in West Baton Rouge and Iberville, and yet they contend that those parishes are not entitled to one senator as much as they are to two. St. Tammany contains nine hundred square miles, is sixty miles long and ninety miles wide; people are constantly settling in it from New Orleans, and a part of it is as rich as any part of Plaquemines. So fine is the land between the two islands, that recently as many as fifty families have settled there. He trusts, after this statement of facts, the Convention will readily agree to allow them two districts between the four parishes, each district with one senator.

Mr. Taylor enquired from the President whether it was proposed to unite them all in one district.

The President replied that it was.

Mr. Taylor was opposed to giving St. Helena and Livingston one senator, whose joint population was only five thousand seven hundred and odd; but if the four parishes were united, he would vote to give them two senators.

Mr. Wadsworth asked on what principle he assumed to be so generous?

Mr. Taylor replied that he did not regard population alone, but thought territory should also be taken into consideration in the apportionment of the senate. He had acted and voted on the same principle, with regard to Plaquemines.

Mr. Penn remarked, that the Tanchipahoe was the natural boundary between the parishes, and was so considered by their inhabitants. He trusts the districts will be separated.

Mr. Benjamin remarked, that the question before this Convention was simply whether St. Helena and Livingston should form one district with one senator. What! make a senatorial district with a population of less than six thousand, black and white, and pays into the treasury not over four thousand dollars? Why the idea is preposterous, for there is nothing to look forward to in the way of increase, either in wealth or population. There is not a section in any part of the State, that will not grow faster than these Florida parishes. The delegate from Iberville (Mr. Labauve) has justly observed, that in no part of the State is there an instance where any one of the districts has been allowed a senator on any such principles—there is no reason in it, no justice in it whatever.

The friends of the measure press it on the score of the number of voters; but that is an erroneous footing to place it. The number of voters may do to base representation on in the lower house, but as we have no property qualification any where, it cannot be allowed to go further. Some check is surely wanted. How are we to protect property, if we do not do it in the senate; we cannot therefore throw away that check without doing a crying injustice to those parishes who pay the bulk of all the taxes of the State.

Why the richest parishes will get the smallest appropriations, while the poor ones will divide out among themselves what the rich pay. The past history of the State has proved it, and it is destined to be her future history, if such a principle prevail; for then the taxing part of the community have nothing left to protect them from oppression and injustice.

Yesterday we refused two senators to West Baton Rouge and Iberville, who pay sixteen thousand dollars into the State treasury, but they certainly were entitled to four, if these two parishes are entitled to one, for they pay less than a fourth of that sum. He (Mr. Benjamin) joins with the delegate from Iberville (Mr. Labauve) in his expression of indignation at such gross injustice—judging from the past they are not likely to increase in numbers or in wealth; and we should look for something more stable in basing senatorial representation, than the vivid imagination of gentlemen from the Floridas.

Mr. Conrad remarked, that these four parishes would have four representatives, whilst West Baton Rouge and Iberville would only be entitled to three. This should have just been reversed. For at least they should not ask for special privileges in the upper house which has already been accorded to them in the lower house.

Mr. READ remarked, that they were entitled to four members before in the house of representatives.

The question was then put on Mr. LABAUVE motion, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Culbertson, Derbés, Eustis, Garcia, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, McCallop, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—29 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Chinn, Burton, Cade, Covillon, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the negative—nays 32; consequently the motion was lost.

Mr. PENN then moved that St. Helena and Livingston form one district, with one senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH remarked that he stood here in an isolated position; no body stands up for his parish; there are no combinations to help him; while the Florida parishes pull together to a man. Is not that a warning to us what we are to expect? Do not the people recollect who dragged from the treasury one million two hundred thousand dollars under pretence of building up the Nashville road, but in reality to benefit the piney woods parishes? Who but the members from that very county? They grabbed then for money, and now they are grabbing for power, so that they may get more. Why, I ask, should the land of cow peas be suffered to suck up the treasury of the State?

What have we got to resort to to pay the one million two hundred thousand dollars taken from the treasury for their benefit? They were not satisfied with that, but they wanted more; and so plausible were they about it, in connecting it with one of the banks, the amelioration of exchange bank charter, that they actually humbugged me; he was induced to vote on this measure to benefit the pine woods country. Thank God, Governor Roman saw the injustice of it, and placed his veto on it—that was a proud feather in his cap, and one for which I shall ever honor him.

And what does she ever furnish us with to entitle her to one-sixteenth of the representation in the senate? Why, a few bricks and pine boards!! Poor people, they say, are always greedy—they must be fed, and must have something to depend upon: they can't depend upon their land, for if they dig it forever, they can never get anything to grow; consequently they grasp at political power, that they may get their hands into the treasury. Are we to give up one-sixteenth of the political power of the State to those who do not own one-hundreth part of the property in the State? Why, the idea is preposterous and absurd. Let the river parishes look well to those things, for when they get the power they will ride over us rough shod.

Mr. W. B. SCOTT replied that if the money was raised for an unholy purpose the plan was not conceived in the Florida parishes, nor for their benefit.

Mr. WADSWORTH: That may be, but they grabbed the biggest share of the spoils when it was done.

Mr. CONRAD remarked that the plan was conceived by the Floridians; he recollects it well.

Mr. PENN is convinced that the delegate from New Orleans is in error—it was conceived in the city of New Orleans, and a meeting was held to consummate it in the hotel then kept by Mr. Bishop. But while it is admitted that that money was squandered, for whose benefit was it? The piney woods parishes? No sir, it was to make ditches through the morasses and swamps, and building bridges over the different bayous back of the city and bordering on the lake—a section of country which so much resembles the larger part of the parish of Plaquemines, and which he so glowingly pictures as the rich alluvial soil of Plaquemines!!! He (Mr. Penn) knows that the senator from the piney woods parishes was not in favor of the bill which governor Roman vetoed, and for which he (Mr. Penn) honors him as much as does the delegate from Plaquemines.

Mr. WADSWORTH: Who was the senator from the piney woods parishes?

Mr. PENN: T'was I. I was not here when the bill was vetoed, as I was obliged to be absent in the West Indies, on account of my bad health. I opposed the bill, and I gloried in the veto when I heard of it.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. Penn, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Covillion, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—33 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Eustis, Garcia, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—28 nays; so the motion prevailed, and the parishes of St. Helena and Livingston form one senatorial district, and are entitled to one senator.

Mr. Penn then moved that the parishes of St. Tammany and Washington form one senatorial district, with one senator.

The question was then put, and the yeas and nays being called for resulted as follows:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Brumfield, Cade, Cénas, Chambliss, Covillion, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Garcia, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—37 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Hudspeth, Garcia, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—23 nays; so that motion was carried.

Mr. Sellers then moved that the parishes of Concordia and Tensas, shall constitute one district, with one senator; which was adopted,

He then moved that the parishes of Madison and Carroll shall constitute one district, with one senator.

Mr. Sellers remarked, in asking for the latter he would simply state facts which would be better than any speech he could make, to show to the Convention the justice of the demand. The parishes of Madison and Carroll pay into the State treasury twelve thousand and eighty-six dollars, and has a population of ten thousand seven hundred and sixty-nine. He thinks these facts combined entitle her to one senator.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Garrett then moved that the parishes of Union, Morehouse and Jackson form one district, with one senator.

Mr. Kenner was desirous of knowing if the Convention intended to pass the number of 32 senators, because if not, it was time to pause and reflect; before we knew where we were, we should have reached thirty-four at least. He then asked if Jackson had not been made out of the parish of Ouachita principally? And if so, whether it would not be better to put Jackson in a district with Ouachita?

Mr. Benjamin moved to add Ouachita to the district proposed by the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Garrett); the motion would then read:

"The parishes of Ouachita, Union, Morehouse and Jackson, shall constitute one district with one senator.

Mr. Downs is of opinion that when the question comes to be better understood by the Convention, that the opposition to it will, in a great measure, be withdrawn. The three parishes which it is proposed to form into one senatorial district, is a much larger district than any yet formed, in territory. He here referred to a map, from which it appeared that it contained two thousand five hundred and twenty square miles. The district composed of Jackson, Union and Morehouse, extends ten townships, sixty miles, due north and south, and eleven townships and sixty-six square miles due east and west, along the Arkansas line, and contains about one hundred and seventy townships, two thousand five hundred and twenty square miles; which would be eight hundred and forty square miles each, nearly double the extent of the parishes fixed by this constitution; having four streams navigable for steam boats: the Ouachita river, running through it from north to south; the Bayou Darbone penetrating directly north west, forty miles to Farmersville, and beyond that in two directions, by different branches, to the State line and the line of the parish of Union, navigable by steamboats with a little improvement; the Bayou Bartholomew; the river of Morehouse, penetrating fifty miles or more, north-east, and bounded on the (parish of Morehouse) south and east by the Bayou Bœuf, Lafourche and Bœuf river; the last navigable for steamboats, and the two first capable of being made so.

The parish of Morehouse contains two of the most beautiful and fertile alluvial prairies in the State—Prairie Mer Rouge, said to derive its name from having formerly, when the favorite resort of the Indian or the French pioneer, been red with strawberries, and deer and cattle reposing on it red with them; and Jefferson, named after the founder of democracy and the purchaser of Louisiana. Here it was, that in Prairie Mer Rouge where Baron de Bastrop, (now the name of the parish scite,) Morehouse, after whom the parish was named, with Hunter, Nancarrow, and other talented citizens and foreigners made their favorite resorts. On the banks of the Bayou Bartholomew, are some of the finest cotton lands in the State, and it is one of the most beautiful streams, penetrating far beyond the limits of the State, and at one point within twelve miles of the Mississippi, whose turbid waters sometimes flow through it.

The parishes of Union and Jackson contain much of the finest pine-wood or upland in the State; so much so, that considerable quantities of it was entered by speculators in 1835–6, and is now settling rapidly.

They do not, it is true, show as large a tax return as their size and real importance call for; but that has been heretofore measurably the fault, in part, of the want of a correct assessment; and in part, by the fact that the largest bodies of it were purchased from the United States government, which are not taxable for five years after the purchase; therefore, the tax list is no criterion for us to be governed by. Heretofore these three parishes have voted together, and in the course we have been pursuing, of giving double representation to the old senatorial districts, whose population had increased to that degree as to justify the call, it is certainly nothing more than fair and just to allow these parishes one senator, for on any basis you please, if it could be correctly come at, they are equitably entitled to it. He (Mr. Downs) feels convinced that before long the voters of Jackson will be more numerous than those of Ouachita or Union. The largest part of it was taken from Ouachita, in territory, but the greatest population still remains in Ouachita; yet such is the character and face of the country, that Jackson is destined, at no distant day, to be more densely populated than either of them, and without taking the population of either. On the subject of voters in the lower house, there can be nothing to complain of, for Union, by the basis we have chosen, was entitled to two representatives, one of which was given to Jackson; and therefore there is no increase on account of the making of the new parish.

He (Mr. Downs) hopes when all these facts are duly reflected upon, and when it is considered that the district contains two thousand five hundred and twenty square miles of land, is not only now thickly settled, but has a bright prospect for the future, she ought to be fairly represented in the senate of the State; and that for these reasons the Convention will adopt the motion as proposed.

Mr. Humble protests against joining Caldwell with Franklin. He said there was a natural division between the parishes; an immense swamp, and to join them would not be satisfactory to either of the parishes.

Mr. Kenner being anxious to examine a map of that portion of the State, which a friend had just handed him, moved an adjournment until to-morrow morning.

Mr. Downs objected, and remarked that after he had examined the map, it was not likely he would be better informed on the geography of the country than the whole delegation of the Ouachita district.

The question was then put on the motion to adjourn, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Briant,

Brumfield, Cenas, Claiborne, C. M. Conrad, F. B. Conrad, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Sellers, Stephens, Miles Taylor, R. Taylor, Voorhies, Winchester and Winder—30 yeas; and

Messrs. Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McRae, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, W. B. Prescott, W. M. Prescott, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Waddill and Wederstrandt—29 nays.

The PRESIDENT, Mr. Walker, voted in the negative, so the motion was lost.

Mr. KENNER thought it was very unusual and uncourteous for the delegate from Ouachita, to have tauntingly remarked as he had, (when he had said he wished to study the geography of the country to satisfy himself as to the extent of the territory embraced in the Ouachita country) that even after he had done so, he would know nothing of it, or words to that effect.

Mr. CONRAD then moved an adjournment, and the question, on a call of the yeas and nays, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Cenas, Claiborne, C. M. Conrad, F. B. Conrad, Derbes, Garcia, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Lewis, McCallop, Pugh, Roman, Stephens, Miles Taylor, Voorhies, Winchester and Winder—23 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McRae, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, W. B. Prescott, W. M. Prescott, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Waddill and Wederstrandt—28 nays; so the motion was lost.

An animated discussion then took place between Mr. Downs on the one side, who insisted on proceeding with the section under debate, and Messrs. Taylor and Conrad on the other, who opposed it on the ground of its being unusual to press a motion when a delay was asked for, on account of the house being so thin, and the question so important; pending which, on motion of Mr. BRENT, the Convention adjourned till to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

SATURDAY, March 29, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer.

Mr. RATLIFF on behalf of the committee on contingent expenses, reported unfavorably upon the application of the printers to the Convention, for the publication of the English reports of the debates and journals of the Convention, asking some additional compensation to bring up the reports. Mr. R. accompanied this report with some verbal explanations. He said, that the present printers were well aware of the nature of their contract before they undertook it. That the whole subject of printing for the Convention had been thoroughly examined and discussed when the former printer was removed. They were to furnish ten copies of their paper containing the debates and proceedings, and to publish these debates and proceedings in their paper three times a week, and oftener, if necessary, to keep up with them. For the subscription to their paper, or in other words, for furnishing ten copies containing the debates and proceedings, they were to receive five hundred dollars, and were to receive two dollars per page for publishing the debates and proceedings in pamphlet form. The latter duty required a mere transfer of the types from their newspaper. There was no obligation in the contract for the printers to do any other work; and when other services were required from them, it was the practice of the committee to audit their accounts for extra work. The committee should continue to authorize the payment of all such claims unless otherwise directed by the Convention. The report recommended that nothing further should be allowed the printers for the publication of the journals and debates, for the reasons assigned, and he hoped that it would be adopted.

Mr. Ratliff concluded by moving the adoption of the report.

Mr. DOWNS hoped that the report would not be adopted, and that it would lay over for further consideration. It may be that according to the strict and literal construction of the contract with the printers, that they were not entitled to any additional compensation. But that should not be the sole question with the Convention. If it can be shown that this work has extended beyond the calculations of the printers, and that they are actually incurring a loss, is it equitable or fair that the Convention should hold them literally to the bond without guaranteeing them at least from a positive loss—there are some considerations connected with this matter, which should induce us to lend a willing air to their application. It should be borne in mind, that when they took the printing for the Convention, the debates and journals were fifteen days behind hand. It required time and expense to bring up these proceedings. In fact it was exacting from them that which was not strictly speaking, in their contract; for their duties began only from the day of their election; whereas, they had to bring up work that was behind hand. We ourselves had not anticipated so long a session. It was not supposed that the Convention would be in session more than sixty days, and here we were still, and to the best conjecture he could form, here we would remain for thirty days and perhaps sixty days. The extension of the session and the accumulation of labor—the very volumnious character of the debates and proceedings, imposed a very heavy and onerous duty upon the printers. If it can be established to our satisfaction that they have double the duty to perform, is it unreasonable to give them a fair compensation. All the officers of the Convention were paid liberally in proportion to their services—we ourselves were paid liberally. Is it just to expect and to require that the printers should be an exception to the general rule? By associations among the compositors they exact a fixed remuneration for the amount of the labor performed by them conformably to a tariff, and unless they are paid thereto, their services are not to be had. The proprietors of newspapers are compelled to submit to these conditions, and there is no way by which they can economise their expenses, so far as the preparation of the matter is involved. We are assured by the printers that the compensation allowed them is insufficient to meet their expenses for the publication of the proceedings. Suppose they are under the necessity by a want of means to continue the work: we cannot exact from them impossibilities. We have perhaps no means of compelling them to go on; they may find that they are sacrificing too much, and although they may feel under a moral obligation to prosecute the work, they may be without the means of doing so. Not the least important function connected with this Convention, are the publication of its proceedings. Let us guarantee the printers at least against a loss. Let the committee inquire what is really their expenses for doing the work and pay them accordingly, and not one cent more than they are justly and fairly entitled to. But, I beseech you, said Mr. Downs, not because you have got it in the bond, to exact the last pound of flesh. Even if it be in the bond, and it can be satisfactorily shown that there is a loss, do not take advantage of that, but extend that relief which the circumstances may require. I hope then, that the report will be recommitted with instructions to inquire and report upon the value of the services and upon what the printers are fairly and honestly entitled to.

Mr. Ratliff said, that the exuberant imagination of the gentleman from Ouachita, had given a coloring to this matter, which was not in exact accordance with the precise state of facts. That gentleman has discovered what does not exist in the application of the printers themselves. They say not one word about arrear publications. They were well aware of these arrear publications when they undertook the contract. The only question which presented itself to the committee was, whether they should receive an additional sum to the five hundred dollars already paid them for furnishing their paper containing the debates.

Mr. R. read from the letter of the printers.

The only matter then involved, was whether they should receive extra compensation for furnishing their paper. The committee had examined the subject and were of the opinion that they were not, and had so reported to the house. The same terms were made with the proprietor of another newspaper, the Courier, for the publication of the same debates and proceedings in French. That proprietor had never appeared nor complained of the insufficiency of the remuneration. He too, had taken the contract with a full knowledge of the extent of the labor, and of the remuneration—he was a practical printer, and had acquired a large fortune in the printing business. This was a proof of his judgment and discretion in conducting the business. Is it to be supposed that his lips would have remained hermetrically sealed to the present moment—that he would have never even intimated in the remotest manner, that he was entitled to one dollar extra compensation, if he had any grounds of complaint? He was assuredly duly sensible of his own interests, and had they been compromited by this contract, it is not to be presumed that the argus eyes of self-interest would not have discovered before this, that it was a losing business.

I consider (said Mr. Ratliff) that a contract with a legislative body ought to be held as sacremental as a contract between private individuals. It has been unfortunately too much the habit to interfere with these contracts whenever printers were concerned. In 1830, the democratic party set the example of giving the State printer an extra compensation; they raised his salary from four thousand dollars to seven thousand dollars. I voted against this proposition upon principle. A few years afterwards the whigs followed the same example, and gave to the printer they had elected, also an additional compensation. But in both instances, the journals speak for me. I have in every instance voted against granting additional compensation to printers, because they are practical men, and must know the extent of the labor required from them. In the present instance, the whole matter was perfectly understood. It had been fully discussed in the removal of the former printer; and before in fact he was removed, the printed tickets of the candidates for the succession, were laying upon our tables. In the house of representatives, the city papers are furnished for the session at from one hundred dollars to one hundred and twenty dollars. As chairman of the committee on contingent expenses for a number of years in that body, I am conversant with the amount usually demanded by their proprietors. The Picayune is furnished for one hundred dollars, and all the papers contain a synopsis of the proceedings. I do not think it just or proper to increase the compensation of the printers, or any other officers that may be employed by a legislative body. I was against it ten years ago, and I am against it now. No party considerations nor personal predelictions will induce me to change a contract for the public printing to the prejudice of the State. On one occasion I recollect that I succeeded in reducing the salaries of the officers of both branches of the legislature, but this retrenchment was of little or no avail, for at the end of the session, when the members begin to feel rich, they put back the compensation where it was before, with perhaps few exceptions. I do not think a contract with the State a rope of sand. In their present application, the printers were unfortunate in trying the committee. It would have been better policy for them to have waited until the last day of the session, when it is very likely their demands would at once have been assented to. In a conversation with one of them, I told him that he had nothing to expect from the committee, and observed to him jocosely, that it would have been better had he postponed the demand for the last day of the session. Perhaps this is the intention of the proprietor of the Courier, who has more experience in such matters. I would observe that four of the committee concurred in the report, and that we were unable to consult with the two remaining members, Mr. Roselius and Judge King.

Mr. Splane said that we were spending more money in this discussion than would cover the additional expense for bringing up the report. He hoped the subject would be recommitted to the committee with instructions to report upon the facts.

Mr. Beatty was willing, if the printers found the contract an onerous one, to discharge them from their contract, for he must confess that he was not satisfied with the manner in which the work was done. He would not vote to give one cent.

Mr. Downs: does the gentleman mean that the printing is badly executed?

Mr. Beatty: I complain of the matter printed.

Mr. Downs said that the gentleman from Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) had omitted to mention a very essential point, in referring to the number of newspapers furnished to the legislature during its session. There were but sixty copies of each paper furnished to the house of representatives; whereas, the printers to the Convention furnished of each number containing the debates, seven hundred and seventy copies. The subscription to the smallest city paper, and they all have the same price of subscription for three months, and to furnish seventy-seven copies, would amount to two thousand three hundred and ten dollars. Do not give the printer one cent more than he is fairly entitled to. The gentleman says that the printer of the debates in French does not complain; the gentleman it would seem is mistaken. The proprietor of the Courier will no doubt make a similar application, and I have no objection that this paper should be included in the investigations to be assigned to the committee under the motion.

Mr. HUMBLE said the gentleman (Mr. Ratliff) was mistaken in stating that the printers of the reports of the debates in English had never asked for additional compensation. From the showing made, it appeared they were entitled to something. The delegate from Baton Rouge, (Mr. Read,) the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin) and the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Beatty) on another occasion sustained their claim. It was better to recommit the subject, and if the facts of the case justified it, it was but right to allow them some additional compensation to bring up the reports.

Mr. PUGH said he felt under the necessity of voting against this resolution. The legislature had been very profuse in their expenditures. This body should inculcate economy by setting the example of restricting the public expenses within proper bounds.

Mr. CULBERTSON would sustain the suggestion first made by the delegate from Ouachita. It was proper that the subject should be inquired into, and if the contract was really prejudicial to the printers, some relief ought to be extended to them. If for example, he was to contract for the building of a house, and he found that the person contracting was really losing money, he would not hold him to the contract, without a sufficient remuneration for any loss. What he would do for himself individually, he felt authorized to do on behalf of those whose interests he represented.

The question was taken upon Mr. DOWNS' motion to recommit, and it was carried in the affirmative.

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder—36 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Chinn, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Hudspeth, King, Legendre, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, Saunders, Sellers, and Winchester—18 nays.

Mr. SPLANE gave notice, that he would on Wednesday next move for the reconsideration of the vote, constituting St. Mary and St. Martin one senatorial district.

Mr. CHINN gave notice, that on Wednesday next he would move for the reconsideration of the vote giving but one senator to the county of Iberville.

Mr. PUGH gave notice that he would introduce a proposition requiring that each parish and senatorial district should pay its own senators and representatives.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the section providing for the apportionment of the senate.

When the Convention adjourned yesterday, Mr. Garrett had moved to constitute a senatorial district to be formed of the parishes of Union, Jackson and Morehouse.

Mr. BENJAMIN had moved to add the parish of Ouachita.

Mr. HUMBLE reminded the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) of his promise to address the Convention in support of the motion to add the parish of Ouachita to the parishes of Union, Morehouse and Jackson.

Mr. G. M. CONRAD said that it was not his intention to have addressed the Convention to-day, because he observed that there were more seats vacant than usual. There would be manifest injustice in taking the vote to-day, and should that course be taken, he would give notice that he would move the reconsideration of the vote, for from the complexion of the house at present, he inferred that as many senatorial districts would be created in the west as its representatives would desire, he would barely remark as the gentleman (Mr. Humble) desired that he should express his views upon the proposition before the house, that he conceived it just and proper. With the addition of Ouachita, the district would not be as large as many that had been constituted, either in regard to taxation or population. From the best means we have before us of judging of this matter, we find that the population of Union is one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight; Ouachita, four thousand six hundred and forty. These are the only two parishes in the district whose population are indicated in the statement before us. In relation to Morehouse, we have one little datum.—Morehouse gave, in 1844, at the presidential election, when the vote was unusually large, one hundred and thirty-eight votes. At the same election, Ouachiita gave ——, about twice the number; hence it would seem that there is no great injustice in uniting Morehouse with Ouachita in forming the district. The total population of Morehouse, it may safely be inferred, is not one-half that of Ouachita. The population of both may be set down as two thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven. Having obtained a pretty accurate idea of the population, let us see what is the amount of taxation. By the report of the State Treasurer, we find that Ouachita, including Morehouse, pays four thousand six hundred and fifty dollars and forty-eight cents. This includes the taxation upon the property of residents and non-residents—of minors and of white persons, and free persons of color. It gives us some notion of the wealth of Union and Morehouse. With regard to the parish of Jackson, we know nothing further than that it is a new parish, created during the last session of the legislature; and from what has been mentioned incidentally in debate upon the apportionment of the parish of Claiborne in the house of representatives, we may presume that it is sparcely populated, and in reference to its contributions to the treasury, they must be insignificant indeed. A portion of the parish of Union was also taken to form the parish of Jackson, and the voters residing in that portion should be deducted from the vote of Union.

One of the principal causes that led to the convocation of the Convention was the inequality of representation in the Senate. This was one of the evils which we were mainly called upon to remedy. Some equality ought to be maintained in forming the districts, or we might as well leave the apportionment as it is in the old constitution.

I have heard, said Mr. Conrad, of apportioning the representation of a State for mere party purposes—for mere temporary objects, but I never heard of a deliberate attempt being made by any constituent body to perpetuate a system of injustice. The majority in the Convention have refused to increase to an additional member the senatorial representation of the old county of Iberville. In 1812, at the formation of the constitution, one senator was allowed to the parishes of Iberville and West Baton Rouge, composing that district, and only one is now allowed in 1845. While the disposition is clearly manifested to restrict the senatorial representation of the parishes in the south and south-east, and to deny them that representation to which they are entitled by their population and taxation, the very contrary spirit is exhibited towards the north and north-western parishes of the State. These latter, without either the necessary population and with but a small proportion of the taxation, it seems are to be multiplied into innumerable districts. In increasing the number of senators to thirty-two, we have added fifteen to the seventeen already apportioned in the old constitution. What disposition are we making of these fifteen? We have given to the parish of Avoyelles one senator, to the parish of Rapides one senator. Here we have two senators in a district where there was heretofore but one senator, and the parish of Catahoula, which belonged to the district, is reserved to form a third senatorial district. We have appropriated but eight senators to the south and south-eastern parishes, including the city of New Orleans, and the remaining seven are to be monopolized by the north-western parishes. Upon no principle of equality can such an apportionment be justified; upon reviewing our work it will be seen that the north-west has not only obtained the preponderance of the increase of representation in the house, but that her representatives are asking for her a similar preponderance in the senate. For her benefit an arbitrary rule was adopted, that each parish should have one representative without reference to population, as her territory had previously been multiplied into a number of small parishes, this rule operated especially in her favor.

He was not disposed to take one iota of representation from the parishes of the north-west. He wished every jot to be extended to them to which they were justly entitled. But we must have a rule to which we should adhere invariably. He regretted to have felt himself under the necessity of voting against the increase of senatorial representation to the piney wood parishes. He could not find that they were entitled to it. He was, however, better pleased that this additional representation was extended to those parishes, because injustice had been done to the parishes of the south and south-west, although, even on that ground, he could not feel himself authorized to sacrifice what he considered a principle. Fromtheearnestnesswhich he could see manifested to press a vote upon the question before the house, he was convinced he was loosing his own time and that of the Convention in discussing this subject, and he would not have trespassed upon the attention of the house had he not been called upon by the delegate (Mr. Humble) to redeem the pledge that he had made yesterday. Any vote that may now be taken he would not consider definitive of the question, as he had said at the beginning of his remarks, he would move for the reconsideration, and would take that occasion to express himself more fully.

Mr. Downs said that he did not design addressing the Convention, but the arguments of the delegate from New Orleans rendered it necessary for him to do so. I am at a loss to understand, said Mr. Downs, what the gentleman means by announcing that he will address the Convention hereafter, more fully upon the subject. It strikes me that he has thoroughly explored the whole matter. I may say that his argument was so full that it run over, and if his object was to prove that there was any thing unjust in giving a senator to a district to be composed of three parishes, I think he has shot wide of the mark. The gentleman assumes that much too large a share is about to be given to the parishes above Red river, on the Ouachita, and on Red river. If you will cast your eye upon the map you will see that much the largest portion of the State lies in that section. The parishes of Jackson, Union and Morehouse contain an area of two hundred and fifty square miles by the regular surveyors' charte—an extent that would embrace New Orleans, the parishes on the coast, the parishes on the Lafourche, and a great deal more. Whoever will examine dispassionately the apportionment will find that the large extent of country embraced in the north-western portion of the State is, in point of fact, the largest portion of the State. To that section but six senators are allowed, while the nine other senators are for the most part, distributed from the Balize to Point Coupée. These nine senators have been monopolized in this particular section of the State, with the exception of the Attackapas and Opelousas parishes, because perhaps sugar is principally cultivated in those parishes. Whenever the effort is made to give an equivalent representation to the north-western parishes the hue and cry is raised, and they are placed under the ban! It is really astonishing that so strenuous an opposition should be made to giving a fair representation to a territory that embraces the largest portion of the State. Look upon the map and you will readily see the vast difference in point of territory, between that section and the lower portion of the State.

But the delegate (Mr. Conrad) says that the parish of Morehouse is an insignificant parish, because it gave in the last presidential election, but one hundred and thirty-eight votes. How many votes did the parish of St. Charles, which together with the parish of St. John constitutes a senatorial district, give at the same election? It gave one hundred and thirty-eight votes—precisely the same number. And if it be taken into consideration that Morehouse is a frontier parish, and not so much exposed to political excitement as the parish of St. Charles, which is so near the city of New Orleans, it would be seen that the former has nothing to lose from the comparison. Moreover, the parish of Union gave four hundred and nineteen votes at that election—the parish of St. John the Baptist gave two hundred and fifty-five votes, which, added with the vote of the parish of St. Charles, makes a total of three hundred and ninety-three votes. Thus it will be seen that the parish of Union gave alone, more votes than the parishes of St. John the Baptist and St. Charles put together; and yet these two parishes have been allowed a senator without the slightest difficulty. Whereas when it is proposed to form a senatorial district composed of the parish of Union which gave more votes than the other two put together, in connection with the parishes of Morehouse and Jackson, it is pretended that these three parishes are insufficient to form a district, and that a fourth parish must be added—the parish of Ouachita, which gave three hundred and twelve votes at the last presidential election, to complete the district. Is there any justice in such a pretension? Its injustice is palpable. We have not yet created a single district having but one senator with a plurality of parishes, that is to say in any case more than two. Here we have three parishes placed in the same senatorial district with but a single senator, and still the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) tells us that three parishes are not enough to form this district—that they are in the north-west, and therefore, according to his notions, there must be four. If this be the gentleman's conception of justice, all that I have to say is, that it is peculiar, and I trust it is not shared by the majority of this body.

What are the motives that actuate some members of this body to suppress the voice of a particular portion of the State? Is it through political motives? It has been alleged that a systematic plan has been adopted, of which I am accused of being the author and promoter, to multiply new parishes in the north-west, with the view of organizing the political power of that section. There is no foundation for any such charge. The first parish that was formed, the parish of Caldwell, was created at the instance of Judge Morgan, a most decided whig. As for the formation of the parish of Union, it was created in 1838, at the solicitation of a number of citizens residing within its territory, which was cut off from itercourse, to a great extent, by the bayou Darbone, from the rest of the territory. They wished to set up for themselves. Its formation was promoted by persons more zealous than I; by zealous whigs; and so close is the contest in that parish, so rapidly is the whig cause gaining ground, that I can inform the gentleman, and his political associates, and I have no doubt that the information will give them great satisfaction, that at the last election the democratic party only carried the election by thirteen votes majority.

The gentlemen who so strenuously oppose the formation of this district may be deceiving themselves; they may be cutting off their own noses. As to Morehouse, the democratic party can make no show of a contest in that parish; they are completely in the minority, and if there were anything to turn the whigs, in that and the adjoining parish, it would be this attempt to suppress the voice of that portion of the State, attempted by those in this house professing similar political opinions.

Thus we see that Union is divided, Morehouse is whig by two or three to one; as for the remaining parish of Jackson, it was created during the last session of the legislature. The question of its creation was made before the people; the whig candidates pledged themselves to effect it; they used it as a means to promote their success, and the consequence was that the democratic party lost the election of two additional members to the house, because they did not take up this question, and two whigs were accordingly returned. The move was got up by that party, and it was that party that profited by it. I have nothing to say against it; but it did not originate with me. Its political complexion is not yet tested, but it is filling up fast with population. The district so composed may be whig, and elect a whig senator; it is by no means certain for the democrats. And thus, if the formation of those parishes into a district is opposed solely in reference to political questions, the gentlemen may be deceiving themselves as to the probable result.

But it has been insinuated that the population in the north-west are opposed to the creole population; that they are in favor of innovations, and against the civil law. It is not a fact; the democratic party have declared that they are not in favor of any material change in the civil law. It is true that the new comers have their prejudices against that system, but when they have resided long enough in the country to become acquainted with it, they are satisfied with its operation; they are adverse to its being superseded. The people of the north-west are American citizens, and as much entitled to a full participation in political power as the people of any other portion of the State. It is true that they may not be in the main as wealthy; there may be some amongst them who are poor, and subject to the same reproach as the people residing in the piney woods across the lake, who have been taunted with their poverty. It is bad policy to use such an argument, and the wisdom of that statesman who employs it, must be excessively small. The gentleman should recollect that there is another kind of wealth required for the protection of the country—it is courage, strong hands and bold hearts; and I doubt much, if danger should arise, whether the rich parishes, that have been so much eulogised by the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad), and the delegate from Plaquemines (Mr. Wadsworth), in contradistinction with what these gentlemen are pleased to term poor parishes, would render as efficient succour to the country as the latter. They may be poor if you will, but they are rich in patriotism, and for every one citizen that would volunteer, you would find four or five offering their services in the poor parishes of St. Tammany, of Livingston, and Washington, and if you will, of Union and Ouachita. If you repudiate them now because they are poor, they may turn their backs upon you in the moment of peril; in the emergency they may respond to your call for help, that if money is so powerful, why do you not defend yourselves? why ask help from those you have despised because they are poor?

In 1815 who repaired with the greatest alcarity to the field of battle to repulse the common enemy? Did the poor and humble inhabitants of the lake parishes hang back on that occasion? Were the people of the north-west insensible to the call of duty? Volunteers were raised in those parishes and in the parish of Ouachita. Did the unworthy motive, that they were not themselves in danger, influence their action, and paralize their noble impulses? Should danger arise again, although you may have repulsed them, they would be too generous, too noble to refuse you their assistance. They will leave their fire-sides, in the remote west, from the pine barrens across the lake, and will fly to your relief. It is bad policy to attempt to despoil them of their political privileges. These pine barrens, which they are reproached with inhabiting, are the natural ramparts to protect the State. I have considered it as one of the most fortunate physical peculiarities of the country, that there are these strips of pine barren running throught it, and in close contiguity with the rich alluvial lands. In these latter the slave population, from the productiveness of the soil, will always predominate; while in the poorer lands the white population must greatly predominate.

Let us then give equal protection to all alike, and let us remember that there is a mutual dependence.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: The gentleman from Ouachita has taken such a discursive range that, although I did not intend to trouble the house again, I deem it not unnecessary to notice some of his observations. He commenced with a high eulogium on his patriotism and disinterestedness, and if it were not for his remarks I would have taken it for granted that he was uninfluenced by any selfish or political considerations. I have heard no one impeach that gentleman's motives, and yet he has seen proper to enter into a long and elaborate defence of them. I did not suppose that the gentleman was under the influence of political motives, although I presumed, as was quite natural, that he was anxious to obtain as large a representation as he could for the section of the country which he represented on this floor. But the gentleman has fancied that he was liable to suspicion for the purity of his motives. This reminds me of an anecdote told by a distinguished gentleman in a political canvass, of two women not remarkable for their chastity, between whom a struggle arose which should call out harlot first. The gentleman, it seems, wishes to take the start; he calls hard names first. The gentleman has assumed for an argument that a feeling exists in this house to do injustice to the poorer parishes. Who has made any charge of that kind? No one but the gentleman from Ouachita. The gentleman from Plaquemines, alluding to the poverty of the land as indicating the sparseness of the population, humorously said that one could hear a weed trying to grow. The gentleman from Ouachita must be susceptible indeed if he can construe this into a reproach. Why, the gentleman from Livingston, (Mr. McRae,) one of the representatives of this particular region, laughed at this fancy as a joke; but it seems that the gentleman from Ouachita has constituted himself the champion of poverty, and imagined that a class of our population are assailed for no other purpose than to show his skill and magnanimity in defending them. Let us throw aside declamation—let us throw aside prejudice. No one pretends that there is less intelligence, less patriotism, in the poor parishes than there is in the rich. Let us look at the subject in its true and only point of view. The basis of electors is not favorable to equality and uniformity of representation throughout the State. In the rich parishes, where the lands are fertile, the slave population must predominate, and the burden of taxation will principally fall upon these parishes. In the poor parishes there will be an excess of white population and but little taxation. The result will be, that the parishes contributing the smallest amount of taxes, will have the greatest share of political power; and that those parishes contributing the most taxation will have little or no voice in determining even the burdens they are to bear! That is the reason why I object to such a system; and not because I wish to establish any distinction between the poor and the rich, for I am well aware that riches and wealth are not necessary corelatives. I am convinced that taxation should form an ingredient in representation, as well as electors or population. The house have decided differently, and I have yielded the point. The house of representatives has been based on popular suffrage. Is not that already a sufficient concession? Must the senate be constituted in a similar manner? The gentleman from Ouachita has tacitly agreed that in the formation of the senate, some regard ought to be paid to wealth and taxation. It was on that principle that we gave a senator to St. Charles and St. John the Baptist; to Pointe Coupée; and increased the senatorial representation in the Lafourche parishes, in Attakapas and Opelousas; not in reference to population alone, but likewise in reference to the large amounts contributed by these parishes. Surely nothing could be more conformable to the principle of population and taxation, and I am at a loss to conceive how we could have incurred the reproach of having shown no consideration for the poorer parishes of the State; with having despised and insulted them. The gentleman from Ouachita has assumed this position, and has undertaken to panegyrize the inhabitants residing in the lake parishes. No one respects them more than I do. No one is more anxious that they should have a proper representation; and I have had more connection with them than the gentleman from Ouachita. Their peculiar interests are assimilated with those of this portion of the State, of which they form a part, and certainly there is more identity of feeling between them and us, than between them and the people of the remote north-west. Declamation cannot overthrow facts. As for the comparison instituted by the gentleman from Ouachita between the parishes of St. Charles and St. John the Baptist, and the parishes of Union, Morehouse and Jackson, for the purpose of showing that the three latter are better entitled to a senator than the two former, it will not stand the test of scrutiny.

The parishes of St. Charles and St. John the Baptist pay double the taxes of Union, Morehouse and Jackson, all three united. It may be as the gentleman says, that the parishes in lower Louisiana do not cover as large an extent of territory as the parishes in the north-west. It may be that they are not as perceptible on the map; but if it requires, as the gentleman suggests, a microscope to discover them there, in comparison with the more extended parishes in his district, there is no necessity for any microscope to see the large piles of money that they pour into the treasury, and in the distribution of which they ought certainly to have some control.

Mr. Chinn said that the house was so thin it would be better to postpone acting upon the question at present.

Mr. Downs: I am not surprised at the disposition exhibited to procrastinate action upon this question. It appears to be a very sore spot. I hope that it will be decided at once.

The question was taken upon Mr. Benjamin's motion to add the parish of Ouachita to the parishes of Union, Morehouse and Jackson, in the formation of the senatorial district, and the yeas and nays were called for:

Messrs. Aubert, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Garcia, Hudspeth, King, Legendre, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of St. Landry, Wadsworth and Winder—18 yeas.

Messrs. Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff—41 nays.

Mr. Lewis said, that if the formation of the districts could be so arranged as to give the old Ouachita district two senators by striking off the parish of Catahoula from the Rapides district, and adding it to the Ouachita parishes for that purpose, and by that means apportion five senators between them and Rapides, and the Natchitoches senatorial district, he thought that would be a fair allotment. That would be giving to that section of the State about an equal voice with the Opelousas and Attakapas districts, to wit, five senators; and he did not think that any more ought to be conceded.

Mr. Humble said that he was as well acquainted with that section of the country as the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Marigny) was with lower Louisiana. There was peculiar fitness in uniting Franklin and Catahoula to form a senatorial district, but as for placing Caldwell in that district, he would as soon think of attaching it to the parish of Plaquemines; it would answer just about as well.

Mr. Garrett contended in favor of forming the parishes of Union, Morehouse and Jackson into a separate senatorial district. From all the data combined, he thought it was no more than just that they should form a distinct senatorial district. The parishes of Caldwell and Ouachita should also form a senatorial district, and Catahoula and Franklin another. This would give but three senators to a very large extent of country, possessing great fertility of soil, and which was fast increasing in population.

In apportioning the representation in the senate, he was guided not alone by reference to taxation, but by reference to extent of territory as well as population. In voting to give the county of Acadia two senators, he was influenced by the amount of taxation contributed by the two parishes of St. James and Ascension. They were entitled to two senators on no other ground. By a parity of reasoning, some consideration ought to be given to extent of territory and locality. The small parishes of St. John and St. Charles were formed into a senatorial district, and certainly they possessed but one of the elements of representation. They contributed a large amount of taxes, but were deficient, comparatively, in reference both to extent of territory and to electors. The dissimilarity between the parishes throughout the State, in the several requisites for representation, should not be overlooked. In some there was a preponderance of votes, of territory; and in others a preponderance of wealth. If taxation were admitted as the sole ingredient of representation, we would give to those parishes that were wealthy the sole privilege of being heard, and would disfranchize, or suppress to a great extent, the voices of other sections of the State, where there was the greatest extent of population and of territory. To do justice it was necessary to take them all into consideration, and so to apportion the representation that all might be heard.

Mr. Garrett said that local causes had contributed to arrest the progress of the section of the State which he had the honor, in part, of representing. The Maison Rouge grant covered a large extent of territory, and that and other conflicting claim had prevented the settlement of the country to some considerable extent. These causes, however, would not much longer operate. A decision was about finally to be had upon the Maison Rouge claim, and whatever might be the issue of that decision it was immaterial, so that the title were settled and the lands brought into market. As soon as that were done, they would be covered with inhabitants, and the increase in population and in wealth would be most remarkable. The object is to adopt a system of apportionment that will be permanent, and if there is any apparent deficiency at present, in any particular, in that portion of the State, it will not be of long continuance. The fertility of the soil, and the great natural advantages it posseses, offer a positive guarantee that its great resources will not remain long undeveloped to their fullest extent.

It has been assumed in this debate that more is asked for the north-western parishes than has been conceded to the other sections of the State. This is not sustained by a reference to the apportionment that has thus far been made. The four senatorial districts in the south and south-west have been doubled in their representation, and in addition a senator has been added to Opelousas, to Acadia, to Attakapas, and to Lafourche.

No disposition existed on his part to do injustice to any section of the State, or to any peculiar interest; and while he was ready to concede cheerfully what was due to other parishes, all that he asked for was that impartial justice should be meted out to the parishes in his section of the State.

Mr. Sellers, much to his regret, found himself under the necessity of voting against forming these three parishes into a distinct senatorial district. Upon no principle could he find himself authorised to vote for a district which was so totally deficient in every necessary requisite, whether as relates to population or taxation. The taxation of Morehouse was only seven hundred and seven dollars; of Union only one thousand five hundred and eighty-one dollars; and the total population of Union was only one thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight; of Morehouse we had no data as to population; and Jackson was a new parish, but just created, a portion of the territory of which had been taken from Union. If any other territory were added to that district, which would justify its pretentions to a senator, he would have no objection; but as it was, under a concientious sense of duty, he could not vote for the proposition.

The question was taken upon forming the parishes of Morehouse, Union and Jackson into a senatorial district, with one senator, and the yeas and nays were called for:

Messrs. Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff—38 yeas.

Messrs. Beatty, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Garcia, Hudspeth, King, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, Saunders, Sellers and Taylor of St. Landry—18 nays.

Mr. Garrett moved that the parishes of Caldwell and Ouachita should form one senatorial district, with one senator; and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the affirmative—39 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Hudspeth, King, Lewis, Mazureau, Roman, Roselius, Saunders, Sellers and Taylor of St. Landry voted in the negative—16 nays.

Mr. Mayo then moved that Catahoula and Franklin form one senatorial district, with one senator. Carried.

Mr. Brent then moved that the parish of Rapides be constituted one senatorial district, with one senator. Carried.

Mr. Peets moved that the parishes of Bossier and Claiborne form one senatorial district, with one senator. Carried.

Mr. Brazeale moved that the parishes of Natchitoches and Sabine form one senatorial district, with two senators. Carried.

Mr. Porter moved that the parishes of Caddo and De Soto be formed into one senatorial district, with one senator.

But before the question was put, Mr. Marigny moved that four senators be allowed to the city of New Orleans, and that they be elected by general ticket.

Mr. CULBERTSON moved to amend the motion by apportioning the four senators to the city of New Orleans as follows: two to the first municipality; one to the second municipality, and one to the third municipality.

Mr. SOULE sustained the motion of Mr. Culbertson.

Mr. LEWIS moved the adjournment. He did so because this was an important question as related to the city, and he observed that her delegation were not at the moment in general attendance. The qnestion was taken, and the yeas and nays were called for—19 yeas and 35 nays.

Mr. EUSTIS was not aware that this question would have been presented to-day, and it was probable there was more difference of opinion among the delegation from the city, than there would have been had it not arisen suddenly, and had they had an opportunity for some previous conferenee. Before the vote was taken he would beg leave to make his views known, and at the same time would crave the indulgence of the house for his total want of preparation. We have determined that the legislature shall be composed of two houses, to-wit: the house of representatives and the senate. Every law must receive the concurrence of both bodies; and be subjected to a double supervision. Of course it is of absolute necessity that these bodies should be differently constituted. The republican doctrine is this, that political power ought to be committed to the electors. The design of our system of government is to carry into effect what may be considered the settled will of the majority; not a mere accidental majority, but, if I may so express myself, the permanent will of the majority.

What is the difference in the organization of the two houses of the legislature which has been deemed, and found by experience to be sufficient in placing them mutually as checks upon each other? The constituency of both are alike, that is to say, they are both chosen by the same body of electors. In the composition of the senate three conditions have been found sufficient checks against the errors, imprudences, or temporary excitement of the popular branch. They have been found to attain the object designed, and with them the system has worked admirably without any property qualifications. The Convention have decided that property shall not be a necessary ingredient of political power, and if any vote has been given to sustain the contrary doctrine, it has escaped my attention. The three distinct conditions, to which I have referred in the formation of the senate, are first, that the inexperience of twenty-one may be reviewed, and that by requiring maturer age, greater experience, and better judgment may be found. The subject may be considered in another point of view. By a longer term of service, greater stability and consistency is given to the senate. This, and an essential difference in the formation of the election districts, is sufficient to place the senate as an effectual barrier to improper or indiscreet legislation, which may grow out of temporary excitements, and sudden ebullutions in the house of representatives.

In a republican government like our own, where all power emanates from the people, every man is interested in the perpetuity of our institution and in their proper administration, whether he rolls in wealth or whether he be obliged to sustain himself from the fruits of his daily labor. The idea that property is essentially conservative is a fallacy. The plans and follies of men of fortune have done more harm among us in a few years, than could have been done in centuries by the rest of the population. It is that class of persons that have set at defiance our laws; that have violated them with impunity, and I feel convinced that if our State has been brought to the verge of bankruptcy, it is to be attributed to the improper influence which property has acquired over our legislation. Our institutions could not rest upon a worse basis than that. The only safe basis is one reposing upon the popular will.

Mr. Eustis insisted that the senatorial districts ought to embrace a greter extent of territory than the representative districts. Without this radical distinction, the two houses would present such a similarity as would render one of them entirely superfluous. The object should be to neutralize local influences which would be represented in the popular branch, and to secure the representation of general interest. If, for example, you divide the city into four senatorial districts, it will no longer be the ensemble of the city which will be represented, but the local districts. The consequences of such a system will be most pernicious. The city has already been divided into nine representative districts; let there then be no division into senatorial districts; let her elect her senators, at least, by general ticket, and you will obviate some of the inconveniencies that will grow out of the division which has already been made. But if the dictates of sound policy are not to prevail; if we are determined to remain deaf to reason and argument, and there needs must be another division of the city, let us take for our guide the natural division of races. Let us divide the city from St. Louis street—the upper district will be composed of the Anglo Saxon; the lower of the Gallic race.

I have refrained from interfering with the formation of the districts in the country, although I am decidedly in favor of large districts, and should be pleased if such were the sense of the Convention. I voted in favor of giving a full representation to the parishes across the lake, notwithstanding the comparative sparseness of their population, because I conceived they had isolated interest that ought to be represented. The interests of the city are identically one and the same, and I trust that the unity of its interests may be preserved in the upper branch of the legislature, although I fear that such will not be the case. We want a strong government —a popular government, and the more popular it is the stronger it will be. If we fail to give it popularity, it will possess no force, and our labors will be useless in the annals of the State.

Mr. Soule regretted that he could not agree with the gentleman that had just addressed the Convention. Justice, in my opinion, requires that the Convention should sanction the proposed measure, and in so doing we shall only be carrying out a work already accomplished. I deplored the original division of the city into three municipalities, because I foresaw that it would lead to further divisions. But inasmuch as that division is consummated, and that we have realized its fruits, it is proper that the three distinct interests which it has created should be distinctly represented. All that now can be accomplished is to prevent the first municipality from being sacrificed to the second. If the city elect her senators by general ticket, that portion of the city which can give the greatest number of votes will decide the fate of the balance of the city; and where fraud can be brought to bear, the probity of one section will be the victim of machinations and corruptions of another. My experience and reflection has fully confirmed me in that opinion. In the third municipality, within a period of ten years, but six or eight fraudulent votes have been given at its elections. In the first municipality, or rather in some portions of that municipality, fraud has been rife; and in the second municipality, I may dare to say, it has been pushed to the greatest extremity.

We have been told with a great deal of force, that as relates to the senatorial representations, they should embrace a larger extent of interest than the representation to the popular branch of the legislature. That in the latter fractions of interest were represented, whereas, in the former, the entire interest of the whole locality ought to be represented. If this principle be true, then it results that wherever local divisions already exists they should be represented. No one can deny that the interests of the municipalities are opposed with each other, and that it has occurred that the interests of the one have been immolated on some occasion to subserve the purposes of the other. I dare to say that if the proposition of the gentlemen (Mr. Eustis) be sanctioned by the Convention, and I have not the slightest doubt of the rectitude of his motives, that before three years the second municipality will be able and will control the election of the four senators. If the Convention can bring themselves to believe that such a result would be just, that it would be fair, let them adopt the suggestion of the gentleman. But if on the other hand they think that the city proper is entitled to, and has an inalienable right of being heard, let them sanction that right irrevocably—let them ordain that the third municipality shall also have its senator. Far from me is the design of doing any injustice to the second municipality—I think too, that she should have her separate voice to protect her separate interests. If it is thought that she is entitled to two senators, let her have them. All that I ask for, and it is for the common interest of all alike, is that they should be relieved from making the election by general ticket, which would result in the oppression of the one or of the other. As in reference to dividing the city into two distinct parts as suggested by the gentleman, (Mr. Eustis) and which he says is founded upon the natural divisions of races, it is one of the very worst and most exceptionable divisions that could be made. I will never sustain any measure calculated to divide population of different origin. Let the Anglo Saxons and the Gaul commingle together as American citizens: let them sustain the honor and glory of their common country, and let them never forget that however they may differ upon other points they should be one and inseparable in the maintenance and defence of our free and enlightened institutions.

The yeas and nays were called for upon Mr. Culbertson's motion to divide the city of New Orleans into three senatorial districts.

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Garcia, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff—37 yeas; and

Messrs. Cenas, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Hudspeth, Lewis, Mazureau, Roman, Roselius and Taylor of St. Landry—10 nays.

Mr. Mazureau gave notice that on Wednesday next he would move for the reconsideration of the vote dividing the city into three senatorial districts.

Whereupon, on motion, the Convention adjourned.

Monday, March 31, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. Warren.

The journal was read and approved.

Mr. Read asked leave of absence for Mr. Scott of Baton Rouge, and Mr. Hynson of Rapides, for a few days each; which was granted.

Mr. Winder asked leave of absence for Mr. Guion, on account of sickness; which was also granted.

Mr. Derbes asked leave of absence for Mr. Briant for a few days; also granted.

Mr. Read then asked leave of absence for a few days for Mr. Duplantier, acting as minute clerk. He stated to the Convention that Mr. Duplantier would leave a competent person in his place, and that it was a matter of great importance in some of his private business, to have the privilege of a few days absence from his duties in the Convention. Leave was promptly granted.

The President notified the Convention that this was the moment to review petitions and memorials, and reports of committees. In the absence of such, he suggested there was a discrepancy in the tenth section of the report as it stood: the last clause being a proviso, giving to the legislature the power in any year, to apportion the representation in the senate, and to divide the State into senatorial districts.

Mr. Downs moved to strike out the whole subject matter under discussion; which was seconded by the delegate from Assumption, Mr. Taylor.

Mr. Kenner remarked, that when the President announced the matter now before the Convention, he was in the act of presenting a resolution for their consideration, and as he conceived it of some importance, he hoped he would now be allowed to offer it. Permission being granted, the following resolution was read:

Resolved, that the committee on contingent expenses be instructed to report to the Convention what amount of money has been paid to the different printers, for printing already done to this date.

Mr. Mayo offered to amend the resolution by adding the words, "and to whom."

Mr. Kenner in accepting the amendment, remarked, that it was simply his object to arrive at the facts of the case. He wanted all the information possible before the Convention.

The resolution was then adopted, and reads as above with the words "and to whom," added after the word "date."

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Mr. Downs then renewed his motion to strike out, but remarked that it might be so amended as to read that when making the apportionment, they might divide the number when more than one. He therefore moved to strike out the words "each to be entitled to elect two senators," and insert "having more than one senator."

Mr. Wadsworth then addressed the Convention:

Mr. President—great injustice has been done to my parish in the apportionment of the senate. I have already said much on this subject, but I intend before we get through with this matter to say a great deal more. Why, sir, so far as I have been observing the action of this Convention, I am bound to say, that gross injustice has also been done to other parishes. Some have been improperly favored by a detestable species of log-rolling, while others have been the victims of that combination. I therefore give notice that I shall move a reconsideration of the vote allowing to Plaquemines, St. Bernard and Orleans right bank, one senator. But, sir, to the question now before the house: It is proposed to give the legislature the power of reducing, if more than one. In other words, when there is one already, there shall be no increase; this is not fair; we want a proper representation, and based upon proper principles. Let us then consult together, and base representation in the senate on property.

He (Mr. Wadsworth) thinks the delegate from Ouachita does not meet the question properly, nor in the proper spirit. He says all those who have two, may be interfered with. Now that is not the way to meet a question like this; we want permanency, we want it fixed distinctly and permanently. Property alone is the proper basis. We are no children, and we are not here to operate for the particular aggrandisement of any particular man or set of men. If that be not the object of grasping at political power, what is it? He hopes it does not arise from any particular desire to secure property without labor; and if it be not, then let your property be made secure to you by the laws of your country. And that will never be done if you give up the only safe-guard you have in the senate; for if you do, the needy-greedy men will make the man of property a hewer of wood and a drawer of water for them. It is much more important than for us to labor for the purpose of making some men great and distinguished. Yes, sir, property must be protected; what do men work and toil for? Property. What do even our clerks, our reporters, our secretary work for? Property. True, they have doubtless a strong desire to acquire reputation and character, but that is not the ruling, governing motive; it is to get money, to acquire property. Property is the ne plus ultra, the goal for which all men strive. It produces money, and that pays your taxes; that supports your government. Life and liberty are perfectly worthless without property. Every man understands this, and he (Mr. W.) repeats, that the pursuit of property is what we are all aiming at.

Why are laws made to punish for stealing? For the protection of property. All laws are made for it, and yet gentlemen are desirous, it would seem, of securing political power by alone consulting the interests of the poorer classes of people.

Mr. Taylor had intended to fill the blank, had the motion to strike out prevailed with another provision. As it stands now, it is perfectly useless. Earlier in the discussion of this question, he was disposed to have it permanent, but he now sees reasons which induce him to abandon the view he first took of it; and instead of making it permanent, look to future reorganization. He would move a substitute for the whole proviso, which reads as follows:

The legislature, in any year in which they shall apportion representation in the house of representatives, shall have the power to divide the State into senatorial districts. No parish shall be divided, in the formation of a senatorial district. The number of senators shall not be less than twenty-five, nor more than thirty-four; and they shall be apportioned among the senatorial districts according to the total population contained in the senatorial districts. Provided, that no parish shall be entitled to more than one eighth of the whole number of senators.

Mr. Taylor further remarked, that we have now apportioned senators to the different districts without any fixed rule as a basis. Some have taken territory, others population, others taxes paid into the State treasury, others taxes and population, and others population and territory combined; and probably others by neither of these. For his part, he was in favor, whenever it could be properly done, that total population should be the basis; but he had been governed in his action on the question before the Convention as now presented, by population and territory. In the present apportionment, he is satisfied in the main. He thinks it perhaps the fairest that could have been made at this time, but he should regret to see it made perpetual. Because the only reason which can probably be assigned, for the great apparent disparities in the different portions of the State as to population, wealth and taxes, is, that it may be owing to the short period of time that Louisiana has been established, and perhaps accidental circumstances may have promoted the growth of some sections of the State, which have led to greater population, while other sections have not progressed as much, with equal natural advantages, for the want of opportunity and time. We must then look to the future, and if they have the advantage of soil and climate, they will also doubtless become filled with an industrious and thriving community. When their natural advantages are developed, and we can safely do so, then we should abandon territory, as a component part of the basis, and make it total population alone. When time has been given to test the advantages of every portion of the country, it may, and doubtless will happen, that some parts will support an immense population, some comparatively thin, and some perhaps none at all. But he is clearly of opinion, that before many years shall have rolled round, the resources of every parish in the State will be so fully developed that then it will be right and proper to take total population as a basis. Many gentlemen think that the present appropriation is altogether too partial, too favorable to a particular part of the State. He was not himself disposed to accord it, as he was governed by the census of 1840; but so much has been said about the increase of population in that section of country, that it may happen she has not got too much. But while he would not move a reconsideration of the apportionment as it stands, he offers the substitute to provide for the future, and if it be found that the progress in any of those parishes has been as great as it is said it is, and they be entitled to more than at present accorded, why let them have it.

Mr. Brazeale moved to lay the substitute indefinitely on the table.

Mr. Claiborne hopes that motion will not prevail. He is firmly convinced that the substitute is the only way we can expect to destroy the system of rotten boroughs, which has been passed upon by the Convention. They deny that such is the case, and that they are entitled to what they have got; but if he (Mr. C.) is not much mistaken, they have agreed in anticipation of what they may be; not what they are.

Now, if these gentlemen have been sincere, heretofore, in their round assertions, here is a good opportunity to show their sincerity. For if they believe in the extraordinary increase, it provides for the very thing they want; that is the test by which they can be tried. If they support this motion we may well pause, and say perhaps we have been mistaken; but if they do not, we shall the more clearly see how we have been sacrificed to build up the political power of that section of the State.

The question was then put on laying the substitute offered by Mr. Taylor, indefinitely on the table, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Humble, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porche, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Splane, Stephens, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff, —29 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Winchester and Winder—28 nays; so the motion to lay on the table prevailed.

Mr. Downs then moved the adoption of the amendment proposed by him.

Mr. Kenner then moved to lay the whole proviso, together with the amendment offered by Mr. Downs, indefinitely on the table.

Mr. Downs hopes the motion will not prevail. He shall vote against it, because he wants small senatorial districts. They are probably now inconvenient, but hereafter should they prove so, the legislature can cure the evil.

The question then recurred upon the motion of Mr. Kenner, to lay the proviso and amendment indefinitely on the table, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Ratliff, St. Amand, Sellers, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Wadsworth, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder—32 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Downs, Humble, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill and Wederstrandt—28 nays; so the proviso and amendment were indefinitely laid on the table.

Mr. Downs then moved the adoption of a section in the minority report, as follows:

"And whenever a new parish shall be created, it shall be attached to the senatorial district from which most of it was taken, or to another contiguous district, at the discretion of the legislature, but shall not be attached to more than one district;" which was adopted.

Mr. Downs then moved to amend the 10th section, and insert in lieu of the words "eight senatorial districts," the following senatorial districts, and the senators to be elected shall be voted for by persons entitled to vote for representatives; which substitute was adopted.

Mr. Downs then moved the adoption of the section as amended.

The first clause of the section read as follows: "The State shall be divided into the following senatorial districts; senators to be elected by persons qualified to vote for members of the house of representatives." The remainder of the section was the same that had already been reported.

Mr. Wadsworth said he wished to say a few words before the vote was taken on the adoption of this section of the constitution. He was seriously opposed to it, as he considered it a great injustice to that section of the country which he represented. He would repeat, that in 1812, out of a senate of seventeen, his parish had been allotted one senator, with half the population, property and wealth that she has at present; yet, with all these doubled, and the number of senators also doubled, has she not a right to two? Predicate your apportionment on any basis you wish, and she will be found fully entitled to two. Compare the allotment given to her with that of the pine-woods parishes. How ridiculous! Parishes that can scarcely support their own people have got two senators for the one given to those who bear the burden of filling the treasury, who pay the debts of the State. Parishes that have doubled themselves in wealth and population since 1812, are denied representation for pine-woods and sand banks. You might as well represent the deserts of Arabia! We are the wealth, the producing sources, and yet we are to have no power in the State! You give us half the number of those gentlemen who can scarcely live upon their resources. Let it not go abroad that this Convention has worked upon log-rolling principles. Show yourselves as high-minded, honorable gentlemen, who, when properly matured reasons, predicated on matters of fact, were laid before you, accorded the right due to all fairly and justly. When it has been ascertained that some portions of this State have been highly favored in the matter of this senatorial representation, will you have it said that you denied that portion that has aided you in the payment of your debts, any comparative amount of representation with others? If it is denied him, he would not say that he would expatriate himself from Louisiana, but he would say that it was the greatest piece of injustice ever committed against his section of the country, in the annals of history. In the house of representatives log-rolling was carried on, he knew it, where small matters were concerned: and one gentleman would, when he wanted to carry some particular bill, perhaps, go to another and say, "If you vote for this bill of mine, I will support yours." But here, in this Convention, where the concentrated sovereignty of the State was assembled to commence such a system! It was beneath the dignity of this house to countenance such a course. He now gives notice that he would move a reconsideration of the vote on Thursday, with a view to increase the number of senators awarded his parish.

Mr. CONRAD moved an amendment to the clause, though, he said, without any hope of carrying it at that time. The amendment was to follow after "persons" in the clause, and reads "who shall have paid during the last six months, or who shall be at the time of election, liable to pay a State tax of one dollar." His object was, that as the lower house was formed without any reference to property qualification, he wished to see some regard paid to this principle in the election of senators. Electors should at least be tax payers.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved to lay the amendment on the table, subject to call.

Mr. BRENT moved to lay it indefinitely on the table.

The question was put on Mr. Brent's motion, and the yeas and nays being asked for,

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Chinn, Carriere, Chambliss, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Kenner, King, Ledoux, Lewis, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—49 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Legendre, Mazureau, St. Amand, Taylor of St. Landry and Wadsworth voted in the negative—11 nays; so the motion prevailed, and the amendment was laid indefinitely on the table.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said that there was no fixed principle whatever adopted; equal justice should, he thought, be shown to all classes, but in the course now pursued a most perfect abandonment of all protection to property had been adopted in the lower house. He therefore hoped that in the organization of what might be termed the conservative branch of the legislature, this principle would have been regarded; that is now, however, so formed, as to be the mirror of the other house; property, taxation, and even population has been disregarded, and the consequence is, that two-thirds of the State have had allotted to them about one-third of the representation, and consequently one-third of the population is awarded to two-thirds of the representation in the senate. He would repel all allusions to rich and poor. The only distinction he knew was, that he respected the honest poor man as much as he did the honest rich one; but that was no reason why those persons living in the poorer parts of the State should be accorded higher political privileges than those in the more wealthy portions of it. He would submit to it, however, if it was the will of the majority, but he doubted whether the people after them will accept it.

Mr. PRESTON was also opposed to it on various grounds: First, equal justice was not dealt out to all; second, he was opposed to the number of the senate—that was an error of the old constitution, it is one of ours; third, he was opposed to fixing the districts, as it was impossible for this Convention to say what will be required ten years hence: it should therefore be left to subsequent legislatures to determine what is fair and equitable. He would propose some such amendment as the following: "That the legislature of 1845 should lay off the State in senatorial districts in number not less than twenty nor exceeding thirty; that the same number of electoral votes should be included in every district, to be decided by the preceding general elections. The division to be made every four years."

Mr. TAYLOR of Assumption, would be compelled, he said, to vote against the adoption, as there was no provision contained in it for future apportionment. Had there been any such principle inserted, he would be in favor of it even as it was.

Mr. WADSWORTH would vote against the proposition for two reasons: first, that he was fearful this apportionment was accomplished by log-rolling, and next, that it had brought about the worst sectional feelings between two parts of the country; feelings that may result in the worst consequences to the interests of the people at large.

Mr. Downs wished to place on record a refutation of the charges brought against this measure. The idea that injustice had been done one portion of the State more than another, was perfectly groundless; it was quite impossible that any apportionment could be made that would not disappoint individual members; every delegate was wedded to the interests of his own section of country; he was—yet he could not acquiesce in the opinion that injustice had been done. They had not adopted any basis in particular; the apportionment had been made with reference to the requirements of each district, and equally as far as it was practicable: yet he was far from impugning any man's conduct; he would not charge members with log-rolling, as the gentleman from Plaquemines (Mr. Wadsworth) had so courteously done. Wherever he (Mr. Downs) met an antagonist, if he could not beat him on fair grounds he submitted.

Mr. Kenner had no intention of stating his reasons for the vote he was about to give, but when he heard the observations which had fallen from the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) in reference to the way in which this measure was carried on, he felt called on to join the delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston) and the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Claiborne) in their opinion on this subject. He would say it was a gross piece of improper conduct, and log-rolling, as ever was perpetrated on any floor.

When we have seen two senators allotted where one alone was due, and where, vice-versa, we have seen only one given to those districts entitled to two, honestly and fairly; and then, when we term that log-rolling, we are coolly told that it is mortification and chagrin by which we are governed. For his (Mr. Kenner's) part he denies that, and he takes this occasion expressly to say, while disclaiming any such motives, that the course pursued in this matter heretofore by the member from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) and his friends, has been an arbitrary one, and a downright and flagrant act of injustice.

Mr. Claiborne asserted that his opposition arose from principle, he felt no personal ill-will or cast no reproach upon any gentleman. Every principle of justice had been departed from in the formation of the senate. The senatorial representation had been snatched from lower Louisiana and given to distant districts. He repeated what he had before asserted, that he opposed the adoption because he considered it unjust, and made without due regard to the interests of every portion of the State alike.

Mr. Saunders is opposed to the section as it stands; the substitute which has been offered and rejected comes the nearest to getting a fair and equal representation in the senate. As it is now, it is unequal and unjust, and is evidently a political combination for political purposes.

Mr. Taylor would make no such imputation on the motives of others. He feels that he himself, in opposing the section as it stands, will act according to the best dictates of his judgment; he regards it as unequal, but at the same time others who sustain the measure may be by principles equally pure.

Mr. Lewis remarked that he did not rise to discuss this question, but simply to assign the reasons which would govern him in his vote. He opposes it with reluctance, but when he looks at the unfair and unequal distribution made in some parts of the country, to the injury of those parishes which are every way entitled to equal representation; when I see, said Mr. L., great and glaring errors in the section as it stands, I am compelled to vote against it, with the hope that the Convention will retrace their steps, and fix upon some principle on which to base a just and equal representation throughout the State. Although we are told that we ought not to begin this matter over again, that it will be a long and tedious business, still I think that the best interests of the country will be promoted by doing so. There is another reason, Mr. President, which has great weight in influencing me to vote against: it is this—that I am particularly desirous of seeing important changes made in our existing constitution, and I feel convinced that this very section, if incorporated in the new constitution, will defeat it. It will create so much dissatisfaction that the people will not ratify it, after all our labors. We shall then be left where we were before this Convention met, and even in a worse position; for after such a total failure as we shall have made, it will be more difficult than ever to get another Convention called. And now one word to the reporter; I will thank him to report what I do say, or not report me at all. My remarks made on the 24th instant, are reported in such a puerile and ridiculous style as to call for this request from me.

Mr. RATLIFF regrets to hear so many severe remarks as have been made on this question. The strictures and reflections which he has heard are not calculated to produce harmony, or good of any kind; for his part he is willing to take the section as it stands, as a man takes his wife, for better or for worse. If there be such gross, such glaring injustice as we have been told exists in the section, why are they not pointed out? Why are not reasons shown why they should be corrected? If they be so glaring and so oppressively unjust, he for one is ready and willing to correct them; but no, after all, we hear of but one complaint, and that is a struggle for one other senator.

Lafourche got what she wanted; New Orleans what she wanted; Attakapas and Opelousas all they could possibly desire—all are satisfied except Plaquemines, and she wants one more. If that be the state of the case, where is the glaring injustice? where the great political combination with which we have been charged? He (Mr. Ratliff) emphatically denies, and he called upon the reporter to particularly note it down, that he emphatically repudiates the idea that he has any thing to do with a political combination for party purposes. He (Mr. R.) did not come here to make a constitution for a party, but for the whole State of Louisiana. He was never known to be engaged in political caucusing, he has, and he always will act conscientiously, irrespective of party; and those who knew him best and longest, know that well. The great difficulty seems to be that the delegate from Ouachita has got two senators in his district more than he is entitled to; now if he has done so, he (Mr. Ratliff) does not know it; but if he has, he did it manfully, and by his superior skill and management. He came boldly forward, and lustily did he maintain the justice of his cause; if they have fallen in the rencountre, they are unfortunate; they must take the chances of war, even though it be defeat. For his (Mr. R.'s) part, he gives him credit for his boldness.

But let us see if he has taken more than he is entitled to. They say that the northwestern parishes have gained two, to which they are not entitled; and yet they have not shown us how. If they had pursued the course he wanted them to take, to have reduced the number of senators to twenty-five, and then equalized the districts, giving to each its just proportion, all this noise and outcry about injustice we should never have heard one word of. But no; then the delegates from St. James and Ascension wanted to go into detail; and now, after all the labor, they want to destroy the the whole. They got the first slice off the loaf, and yet they are not satisfied. If Ouachita has gained any thing in the apportionment, it is an advantage to them which cannot be helped. He (Mr. Ratliff) does not want the legislature to interfere in this matter at all. He wants the senatorial districts permanently fixed in the constitution, that people may have something to depend on. If a man be poor, and he pays only one dollar into the treasury, he suffers as much in paying that one dollar as if it were one hundred, that the rich man pays. Where then is the difference?

He (Mr. Ratliff) thinks that both the senate and house of representatives are too large; thirty-four in the first, and ninety-eight in the second; but now it cannot be helped. Nobody voted to reduce it, and now when we have exceeded the report of the committee by two only, it is a dreaded increase; and yet they produced that increase themselves; one in St. Mary and St. Martin, and one in St. Landry. If the delegates from Jefferson, from Plaquemines, and from Iberville, had got one more apiece, they, like the fellow when he got his pockets filled, would have been perfectly satisfied.

The out cry they make about the piney-woods plantations getting two senators, is all for effect; for they know that East and West Feliciana gave it to them, and when it is seen that the six Florida parishes pay as much into the treasury, and have as large a population together, as any other parishes having four senators, why should there be all this complaint? East and West Feliciana had a right to give her excess in both taxation and population to the piney-woods parishes if she chose, and she has wisely done; for there is an identity of interest and feeling between them, their citizens intermarry with each other; in fact they are her right bower. And yet there is great complaint; the delegate from Plaquemines incessantly complains about the crying injustice done to his parish, and taxes us with having formed a political combination. New Orleans don't ask equality, she has got all she asked for. These complaints then are without foundation. As for the political combination of which so much has been said, it is an unjust imputation. He does not believe one word of it. He (Mr. Ratliff) shall vote for the adoption of the section, because he does not believe it can be bettered.

Mr. Claiborne objects to the argument advanced by the gentleman from Feliciana, (Mr. Ratliff) that East and West Feliciana have a right to give their excess to the piney-wood parishes, because if that argument be good, New Orleans may with equal propriety give her surplus of wealth and population to the parishes surrounding her; and if she were to do so, she would give one to every parish adjacent to her on the river, for sixty miles; that distance where her baneful influence, it is said, is felt.

Mr. Conrad said, if the argument of the delegate from West Feliciana be a good one, why should not the principle be applied between Jefferson and New Orleans, where it is universally admitted the intercourse and identity of interests are much greater than that between the eastern and western portions of the Florida parishes? He (Mr. C.) will not only vote against this section, but against any constitution which contains any such odious feature. It will, if it be passed, be the most flagrant act of injustice that was ever perpetrated, and Louisiana will be the first State that has ever been guilty of inserting such a clause in her constitution.

Mr. Splane remarked that if there was any gerrymandering in the case, it must be on the side of those who are complaining so bitterly about it, or in their fruitful imaginations.

Mr. O'Bryan thinks gentlemen are in error when they say that the first and second districts gave a larger number of votes than the third and fourth districts; but if they will examine their tables, they will find that instead of giving two-thirds, they only gave a little over one-third.

Mr. Mayo remarked with some astonishment, the charge of gerrymandering, applied to some of the members of this body. He has heard it advanced to-day for the first time. If such an idea has ever entered in the head of any member of this Convention, he knows it not—certainly it never has been thought of by him. But since it has been dwelt on in such strong terms, he desires to call attention to the fact, that there is not such great disproportion as they seem to suppose. Now, the first and second districts, in one of which New Orleans is situated, and which is restricted by common consent, (and which is the only restriction he, Mr. M., knows of) they are entitled to eleven senators for ten thousand nine hundred and twenty-one votes; the third district to eleven senators for seven thousand four hundred and thirty-three votes; the fourth district to twelve senators for eight thousand six hundred and one votes. Again, taking it on territory, entire population, white population, or any basis, he does not think that any body of men could make it fairer than it is. He differs entirely from the delegate from West Feliciana, (Mr. Ratliff) who says the north-western parishes have got the advantage in this apportionment; for they have nothing more than what justice accords them.

Mr. Ratliff said he wished to state one other fact, that he intended to state when up, but omitted it. Gentlemen on the other side complain that the senatorial districts of this State do not correspond with the congressional districts, that the third and fourth districts have a large majority of the State senators. I happened to be a member of the legislature when the State was laid out into four congressional districts, and well remember the memorable struggle on that occasion; and that the party opposed to myself in politics were in the majority; and at one time the districting the State at all, was almost entirely despaired of; and that I supported the final passage of the bill in opposition to many of the leading members of my party; and if gentlemen districted the State into congressional districts unequally, why now complain that those districts being the largest should have the majority of State senators.

Mr. Downs said: Mr. President, I have been so often alluded to in this discussion, especially by the member from East Feliciana, (Mr. Saunders) and the member from St. James (Mr. Kenner); and so often and so pointedly held up to the Convention and the public, here and elsewhere, as the author of all the troubles, and difference of opinion and excitements in which we now find ourselves; and of all the injustice that has been done by one section of the State to another; that in justice to myself, in justice to the friends with whom I act, and above all, in justice to my constituents and the quarter of the State from which I come, I cannot suffer the question to be taken without some reply to these unexpected and unauthorised charges. The representation in the senate, which has now been established in detail by the Convention, and on which you are about to put the final question, is said to be unjust, to give too much to the fourth district, and to be my project. I deny, sir, both these charges. This representation is most unjust, but if it were, it is not the work of my hands; it is not my project. The minority report is my project; this section as it now stands is based on the report of the majority of the committee, with some slight modifications. Had the report of the minority been adopted it would have been less tinctured with politics than this, for if there is any political bearing in either, it is in the one now adopted, not that proposed by me; and is against my party.

It is said by some that I wield great power in this hall, and always for party purposes. It is not uncommon in debate to flatter that we may conquer, to magnify the power of an opponent to destroy him. But how have I shown either my power or disposition to favor my party in this matter? Did I oppose St. Mary and St. Martin having two senators instead of one? Did I oppose St. Landry and Calcasieu having two? or would I have succeeded if I had?

If I had the political power, with the will which has been ascribed to me, of putting down political opponents, is it not likely I should have made some effort to do so, when I knew that not one of the senators thus provided for, would support the measures of the party with whom I act? No, sir, I looked at the measure, as I always do in my private and political relations, as an act of justice between equal parties. I found they were justly and fairly entitled to them, and I did not say a word against them.

How was it when one senator was allowed to Concordia and Tensas? What interference there? How with Carroll and Madison? was there any interference there? If I had had any political power, and was using it for political effect, I should certainly have made some effort to combine them differently. No, sir; I am actuated, I always have been actuated by a desire to do right.

There may, sir, it is true, be some inequality, some injustice done to the parishes of Plaquemines and Jefferson, they may have some cause to complain. But why should they blame me? The member from Lafourche, (Mr. Guion) in his project took one member from my senatorial district, leaving but one to four parishes, though by no project was more than two parishes in any case given but one member or put in one district. I thought the Conveniion would adhere to the number, thirty-two, and that unless one was taken away from that neighborhood, none would be left for my district. If I had thought the number would have been extended beyond thirty-two, I should not so seriously have insisted on this reduction. But I do not think there is much cause of complaint, particularly as to Plaquemines, since one of her delegates concurred in the minority report, which allowed her but one.

There is a better way of retracing our steps than saying we have been at childs' play. If we cannot amend any thing that is wrong in this report, we shall be boys indeed. Let us, then, reconsider any thing that is wrong. Let us correct any errors into which we may have been led; but do not reject the whole.

I am astonished at the strong feelings which I see evinced on this occasion. The feelings of the honorable members from Plaquemines and Jefferson are natural, because they think justice has not been done them. But why should there be so much feelings with others? Why should the member from St. James (Mr. Kenner) and the member from East Feliciana (Mr. Saunders), both of one party, and the leaders of one party, when they do not pretend that any injustice has been done to either of their districts, so much complain of the party movements of others. Was there any party movement in putting in the Lafourche district the four senators for five parishes, into two districts instead of four? Why was not Ascension and St. James divided? What will be the effect of the present combination? Four senators of the whig party constantly, whereas if the district had been divided there would have been generally one, some times two democrats elected. Hence the earnestness of the member who now accuses me of political motives. Let him take the beam out of his own eye first. Let him divide Ascension, and St. James, and Assumption, Terrebonne, and Lafourche, first, and then complain of me for political motives.

For his (Mr. Downs') part, he wants no combinations, no distribution made, unless upon the principles of justice. "Fiat justitia, ruat coelum." All that he knew of the report now before the Convention, was that he had gone through the details, but he declares before God, he never thought of political calculation; never thought of calculating the political effect it would have. He hopes sincerely, that no effort will be made to spread so false an assertion, that he has ever endeavored, either by log-rolling or otherwise, to procure political power. It would be a disaster to the State, if such an idea were to get abroad, that either party could so far forget themselves. It will create bickering and heart burnings without end. But if any effort be made, if the idea even prevail that political feeling is to be mixed up in this controversy, to defeat the constitution, let them not lay that flattering unction to their souls. No scheme could be devised so effectually to defeat the object they aimed at; that would leave the success of their opponents no longer doubtful. There is no good in trying to defeat it by such means, but much danger to all who attempt it.

He (Mr. Downs) protests against constant allusions being made to him, and his position in the fourth district. To hear some talk of him on this floor, one would think he never breathed nor moved without some political object. They are mistaken if they think prejudice will be excited against him in this hall, in which he is broadly accused of his political dependence on the fourth district. Gentlemen are much mistaken if they suppose that he has any political dependence there or elsewhere. He can tell them, if he would, but he will not, how and why he has less interest in political in that quarter than any other man on this floor. And yet they all cry out that his part of the State are depending upon him! They are all parading it forth that he is seeking some particular political object in every thing he says and does, and forthwith they are down upon him, as if their politics salvation depended on thwarting him. All he can say is that he came here with good intents, and to act to the best of his humble ability for the public good; and those who are now so fond of assailing him here, had better take care, for they ought not yet to have forgotten that they have made one democratic president, for Van Buren would never have been president if he had not been rejected by the senate. He was fighting the peoples' battle, and they rushed promptly and steadily forward to his rescue. Now, if he (Mr. Downs) wanted to acquire political renown and fame, he would say to them, go on, gentlemen, redouble your attacks; but he has no political aspirations; he has no object in view from any course he has pursued in public life, here or elsewhere. He looks not beyond the question before him; and he strives to do his duty faithfully to those who sent him. But do gentlemen suppose that if they succeed in putting him (Mr. D.) down, and with him the fourth district, that they will remain quiescent? No, indeed; put him (Mr. D.) and his other friends in this hall, down, (so that they be forever silenced,) you will soon find another set here who sustaining their rights you will soon find another and more powerful voice springing up to supply their places, a warroir's from the dragons teeth. He (Mr. D.) has no power but what they (the people) possess. The gentlemen fight not against him; and whether he is prostrate or not, the principles he advocates will still remain. He regrets to find these attacks made upon him; but he is constrained, he is obliged to repel them.

It is well known that the delegate from West Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) and he brought forward the plan to amend the constitution, perhaps that may have had some influence in their course towards him; perhaps again, there may be some lurking feeling that their power is gone, since this movement to amend the constitution commenced, which would naturally make them indignant. He can attribute the course pursued towards him to no other rational feeling. If it be so: he regrets they are not more liberal and patriotic. A suspicion exists in his (Mr. D.'s) mind, that there were certain leaders, who were in favor of the great reform we have met to endeavor to effect, but they cannot prove their sincerity by opposing it. He (Mr. D.) has no personal feeling on the matter. Results may operate against him as well as for him: but it is nevertheless from opinions according to the dictates of our own hearts, while some enter into them more from feeling than innate propriety.

If there be any plan that is preferable, why not adopt it? Why not amend the section and change the basis? Well, what basis shall we fix? Some want property; some total population; both these have been already rejected.

Now suppose we do set the report aside. The only basis which we have as yet established, is the electoral basis, and if you send it back what will be the result? There is no other basis on which we can agree, that would bring about a different result. The fourth district would be gainers by any other basis you would take.

The question to be asked is this, "is it intended to produce distrust and odium on this Convention? Are we to be regarded as a parcel of children, who put up a cock crib just for the pleasure of knocking it down again? There must be some hidden object in all these movements, which time alone can develope. We are here to do all that we can, we cannot be expected to do more; why then destroy what we have done; at the end of the proceedings they come up and destroy the whole. Is it intended by the constant reference to the house of representatives, that we are to break up and get into confusion? Is it to upset all and begin again? Are we to go back again, and act over the scenes on the suffrage question? Do it, and you will find the whole party will be overthrown and destroyed. If you do that we shall all be where we started in January last.

Soldiers often fight in a cause they don't understand, but he would ask every member to pause and reflect, for upon this vote will probably much depend the trouble which is ahead of us. For his (Mr. D.'s) part he shall go on as usual, but many may have cause to regret the course they are pursuing. The yeas and nays will shew the injustice, if any, and he is willing to meet it on its merits. If they believe any body is wrong, let the people say so; and when it is generally pronounced throughout the State, that the feeling commenced about Lafourche, St. Martin, St. Mary and St. Landry, and that there was a burst of political feeling about East and West Feliciana, and the Florida parishes, the people will know how to judge.

He (Mr. Downs) is of opinion that the apportionment we have made will be as satisfactory as any that could have been made with the information we had before us. Try it then. He does not think there is any danger of dissatisfaction, but if there be, he is not the cause of it; when his part of the country was assailed, then it was alone that he objected to the report. He never interfered after that; in fact it was the great leader of the whig party who has had more to do with it than any one else. Upon the whole he thinks the distribution a fair one, and whenever the majority settles it, he will abide by it.

The question was then put on the adoption, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Read, Ratliff, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Splane, Stephens, Waddill, Wederstrandt, and Wikoff—31 yeas.

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Preston, Pugh, St.

Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder—34 nays; so the motion was lost, and then,

On motion, the Convention adjourned till to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

TUESDAY, April 1, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer.

Mr. RATLIFF, chairman of the committee on contingent expenses, to whom was referred the inquiry relative to the several amounts of money paid the printers, reported that five thousand and seventy-four dollars had been paid for printing up to date, including one hundred dollars paid to J. Byon for printing the journals of the Convention of 1812; of this amount three thousand four hundred and seventy-four dollars had been paid to J. A. Kelly; to Besancon, Ferguson & Company, one thousand dollars; one half of which amount on account of extra printing; and five hundred dollars to J. Bayon, for subscription to his paper. Nothing had been paid J. Bayon for extra printing, because no account had been presented by him.

Mr. CHINN said, that having voted with the majority yesterday, he would move for the reconsideration of the vote on the section relative to senatorial apportionment. He would propose something in the shape of a compromise. It was not entirely satisfactory to himself, and he was prepared to relinquish it if any thing better could be suggested. Previous to submitting it in a more formal shape, he would state its general outlines. He proposed to give an additional senator to Plaquemines and St. Bernard; an additional senator to New Orleans, giving to the second municipality two senators, so as to place her upon an equal footing with the first municipality; an additional senator to the parish of Jefferson, and an additional senator to the county of Iberville. This would carry the number of senators to thirty-eight. When it was recollected that the sessions of the legislature were to be held biennially, the objection of the additional expense, was a matter of but little moment. Whether the number were thirty-two, or thirty-eight, was not of much consequence, and inasmuch as the number had been tacitly fixed at thirty-two, it was better to add a few more to obviate well grounded complaints of injustice to certain parishes. In connection with this subject, it would be well to take up another proposition which had been submitted by the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Taylor) that the legislature should have the power of apportioning the districts. If that proposition were carried it would facilitate action upon the section. It contained a very judicious principle, that no one parish should have more than one-eighth of the whole number of senators.

These are briefly (said Mr. Chinn) my views in relation to this matter. I have not consulted with any individual in particular, in regard to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH moved to refer the subject of apportionment to a committee of five, with instructions to allow one senator more to the parishes of Plaquemines and St. Bernard; one more senator to the parish of Jefferson; one more to the county of Iberville, and to report in favor of the election of the four senators allowed to New Orleans by general ticket, and to report to-morrow.

Mr. MILES TAYLOR moved a recess of half an hour, to enable members to consult upon the subject.

This motion prevailed.

On reassembling, Mr. VOORHIES moved to reconsider the vote upon the section.

Mr. WADSWORTH said it would be better to remain a month longer in considering this subject, than to make an unjust apportionment. We did not come here for our own convenience, but to do the public business, and that business ought to be done in a satisfactory manner. He renewed his motion to refer to a committee of five.

Mr. HUMBLE sustained the motion to reconsider, and thought that with some amendments the sections would be rendered satisfactory to all.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved to postpone the vote on the motion to reconsider until to-morrow at 12 o'clock, as by that time the Convention could come to an understanding as to the mode of proceeding for the purpose of obtaining a satisfactory apportionment. He declared that the two first districts had been sacraficed to the two others, and was of opinion that what was taken from the city should be divided among the parishes of the first and second congressional districts.

Mr. WINCHESTER asked if the motion to reconsider should prevail, whether the section would be open to amendment, without a separate vote of reconsideration on every paragraph. Many members opposed the section from various and conflicting motives, so that ample room for amendments must be allowed. It would be better, perhaps, to fix a basis of apportionment, and refer the subject of apportionment to a committee.

Mr. VOORHIES observed that experience had shown that the reference of similar subjects to the Convention had produced no good result.

Mr. CONRAD wished to know positively if a reconsideration in precisely the state in which it stood before the final vote—that is, whether subsequently it would be necessary to have as many partial votes of reconsideration as there were senatorial districts, or whether a vote of reconsideration would bring up the whole subject again, susceptible of any modification or amendment. This was an important point which should be clearly understood before the vote, as the decision would greatly influence that vote.

Mr. SAUNDERS proposed a resolution providing that all the paragraphs of the section should be reconsidered by one and the same vote.

Mr. RATLIFF maintained that the reconsideration should at first be taken on the entire section, and subsequently upon the details.

The PRESIDENT decided that if the motion to reconsider prevailed, the section would come up for amendment or modification.

Mr. CLAIRORNE said that the section had been framed without any fixed basis or principle. It was evident, therefore, that if we recommenced in the same manner we would arrive at a similar result.

Mr. BRAZEALE moved to reconsider the vote on Mr. Miles Taylor's proposition, empowering the legislature to fix the apportionment in the senate hereafter in any year in which they may apportion representation in the house of representatives.

The motion to reconsider prevailed.

The question recurred on the adoption of the proposition.

Mr. BENJAMIN hoped that it would be adopted inasmuch as its adoption would greatly facilitate the final disposition of the subject of apportionment in the senate. If members could only be assured that there was a remedy hereafter for any inequality or injustice in the representation, they would accept of the present apportionment.

Mr. PRESTON sustained a similar view of the subject. He said the chief cause of the rejection of the section yesterday, was the failure of this proposition. Had that proposition been adopted, he would not himself have voted against the section, although it did great injustice to the parish of Jefferson, and was obnoxious in some other particulars. What he particularly objected to in the section was, that it perpetrated perpetual injustice. If we adopt the proposition of the delegate from Assumption (Mr. Taylor) we obviate that objection. There will be a remedy, and those who complain with just cause against the injustice of this apportionment will submit to a temporary wrong, knowing that there is ultimate redress. They will submit as a man would submit, who, having a just cause, should lose it and have the right of an appeal to a superior court to do him justice.

Another objection to the section was, that the apportionment was not made upon any substantial data. The United States census for 1840 was no criterion of the population in 1845, in a State where population was increasing so rapidly. The voters at the last presidential election, he considered a better criterion, but it has been strenuously objected to on account of alleged frauds. There is nothing definite in the documents before us to make the representation with any certainty; that, however, would be a matter of no consideration, if we could obtain justice hereafter—if we could have a rule established which would be equal and uniform in its operation. If we can obtain justice in 1848, he would willingly submit to present wrong.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved an amendment making the duty of the legislature imperative in apportioning the senate. Adopted.

Mr. SAUNDERS moved to add after the word "population," the words "and slaves."

Mr. BEATTY considered this amendment totally unnecessary.

Mr. PENN presented a substitute to the section, that the legislature be empowered to make the apportionment.

Mr. KENNER moved to lay said substitute on the table.

Mr. LEWIS objected to this course. He deprecated all hasty and inconsiderate action. In the original resolution he objected particularly to the basis of total population, and thought no senatorial apportionment could be fair, in which territory did not enter as an element of the basis. He was willing to combine the white population, taxation and territory into one basis. He maintained the necessity of a different basis for the senate, from that selected for the house, in order that the two branches being differently constituted, might operate as a check on each other. If he had a favorite basis for the senators, it was territory, whether the land were rich or poor; and this he would select, if the Convention preferred an exclusive basis.

Mr. KENNER opposed the substitute, because it had nothing definite about it, leaving the basis of apportionment to the whim and caprice of the legislature.

Mr. WADSWORTH said that if the territory were taken, Plaquemines would be entitled to one-third of the entire senate.

Mr. BENJAMIN said that these substitutes frequently threw the Convention into confusion. Why not amend the resolution to suit the views of the Convention?

Mr. HUMBLE moved to lay both resolutions on the table; subject to call, and take up representation.

Mr. PENN withdrew his substitute, and Mr. Humble then withdrew his motion.

Mr. WADSWORTH suggested that there was one provision in the proposition, which conflicted with the section of apportionment. It declared that no parish should be divided in the formation of a senatorial district. In the section of apportionment, that part of the parish of Orleans on the right bank was added to the parishes of Plaquemines and St. Bernard. He had no objection to relinquishing it to the parish of Orleans, if the delegation from the city desired it. There was another point in the proposition to which he would invite attention: the number of senators was fixed at thirty-four; he objected to that number, because there were three or four districts to be provided for, which would make the number thirty-eight. He referred to the parishes whose senatorial delegation was deficient, and to whom justice ought to be done. It was a great mistake to suppose that small legislative bodies were better adapted to subserve the public interests than large bodies. Small bodies admitted of combination and intrigue, they facilitated log-rolling, and it was in the power of a few individuals to obtain complete control over them. There was no doubt that a greater number of senators were accorded to some sections of the country than these sections were entitled to; but inasmuch as it has been done, and not to travel over the same ground, he would propose that the number of senators be fixed at thirty-eight, and that the additional four senators be allotted in the manner which he had already indicated.

The city had been arbitrarily deprived of the right to a full apportionment, and what had been taken from her should be given to the surrounding country.

Mr. GARRETT submitted a substitute, in which the basis is composed of territory and white population; the senate limited to thirty-four members; an enumeration of the population to be made in 1855, and every tenth year thereafter,—no parish to have more than one-eighth the whole number of senators.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved to lay these propositions on the table, subject to call.

Mr. KENNER objected. It was yielding all the advantage gained by having brought the subject before the house. If postponed, no basis would ever be established.

Mr. RATLIFF said that to place negroes in the basis of apportionment, was abhorrent to his feelings. They were recognized in our laws as property, and they were nothing else. He has heard one delegate say that this was nothing more than a struggle for political power. If this were so, it was time for the cotton region to look out for itself. If the war cry is to be raised, and it is actually a struggle for political power, we will have to draw the sword and throw away the scabbard. We shall have to take our position with our backs to the wall. I was glad (said Mr.

Radliff) that the gentleman from Acadia (Mr. Kenner) explained what he intended by one of his remarks. I was electrified, because I understood him to say, that one interest in this house had the advantage, and that they would keep it. But the gentleman has disclaimed any such meaning, and I am gratified to hear it. I know that gentleman too well to believe he would take any undue advantage. I am guided in my votes by my convictions of what is just and proper. Sometimes I vote with gentlemen with whom I concur in political sentiment; but whenever I think they are wrong, I vote against them. This is however, an honest difference of opinion. It does not show their want of integrity, nor mine. I have not come here to be blindfolded.

Gentlemen have spoken of a compromise. And what is the compromise they propose? They ask us to concede four senators more. I am reluctant to concede another senator to Jefferson, not because I do not think her entitled to it, but because with the city of New Orleans, with which she is closely identified, I think that she will have her full share of political power. The cities of New Orleans and Lafayette are destined to be blended together. They are even now separated but by an imaginary line, and as long as I have been a member of the legislature, I would be unable to discover the boundaries that separate them. Actual experience has demonstrated to us that the city of New Orleans with but one member of the senate, has been fully able to protect herself. There is not an instance on record, in which she has been oppressed by the country. But I am sorry to say that the reverse has been the case with the country. The country has been oppressed by the city; look at the wharfage bill, and the vehement efforts that were made to continue that system of exaction. The representatives of the surrounding parishes were on that occasion, as on all other occasions, where the interests of New Orleans are involved, combined with the city. From the Balize to the bayou Lafourche, the only exception was in the representative of the parish of Terrebonne. I remember that parish, since elected to Congress, united with me his vigorous efforts to overthrow that iniquitous system. Let the gentleman from Plaquemines traverse his votes, and it will be seen that he has invariably voted in favor of the city. He has looked to the interest of Plaquemines and to the interests of New Orleans to the end of the chapter. That gentleman has spoken disparagingly of the resources of the Florida parishes. He has complained that their soil was sterile. But I feel sure that the gentleman did not complain when these same miserable parishes, as he appears to consider them in relation to apportionment, gave their six hundred votes majority for Polk. He did not then consider them sand-hill cranes. I hope that he will live to repent it. But it is not by caricatures that gentlemen can succeed in disfranchising the citizens of any portion of the State, and if we are driven to the wall, and the third and fourth congressional districts are compelled to combine in their own defence, they can defy all attempts to sacrifice them.

Mr. Humble considered this a very important matter. Let us not destroy what we have done. He should have preferred, and it would have been better, had we in the first instance established a basis of representation. But inasmuch as we have progressed without one, let us consummate our labors. If there be inequalities in the representation, let us remedy them. Let us first heal the wound that may have been inflicted.

Mr. Downs suggested to Mr. Garrett to withdraw his proposition, and offer its principles in detail. Mr. Garrett did so.

Mr. Mayo moved to strike out "total population" from Mr. Taylor's project. Lost—yeas 28, nays 34.

Mr. Eustis maintained that the amendment suggested by the delegate from Feliciana (Mr. Saunders) to add the word "slaves" to "population," was entirely superfluous.

Mr. Preston sustained the same view of the subject.

Mr. Saunders modified the amendment proposed by him, so as to read the "total population, Indians excepted."

Mr. Wadsworth objected to excluding Indians. He could see no good ground for such an exclusion. They were the original proprietors of the soil, and it was true that we had taken their lands from them.

But surely that is no reason why we should deprive them of political privileges.

Mr. SAUNDERS explained that his object was to prevent quibbling, but he withdrew the amendment.

Mr. LEWIS moved to add the words "and territory" to "total population."

Mr. DOWNS moved to amend by excepting sand banks, impregnable swamps and sea marshes. Lost—yeas 23; nays 29.

The question then recurred on Mr. Lewis' amendment to add to the words "total population" the following, "and territory equally," and called for the yeas and nays.

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Carriere, Chambliss, Downs, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Labauve, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Wederstrandt and Winder—30 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Burton, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Kenner, King, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Preston, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth and Winchester—32 nays.

Mr. MAYO moved to insert before the word "population," "white, and three-fifths of other persons."

Mr. BEATTY called for the previous question.

A motion was made to adjourn; lost, yeas 30, nays 31.

But before the question was put on Mr. Beatty's call for the previous question, on motion, the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 2, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. HINTON.

The journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RESOLUTIONS AND REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BEATTY desired to offer some resolutions, which he conceived were much wanted in this Convention, and asked the dispensation of the rules that they might be considered:

Resolved, that all motions to lay on the table shall be decided without debate.

Resolved further, that when the previous question be asked, and maintained by the Convention, the vote shall be taken on all the amendments proposed without debate.

Mr. PORTER objected, for, he remarked, it would cut off all debate; and was about to state his reasons more fully when,

The PRESIDENT reminded him that the resolutions were not properly before the Convention, and therefore not debateable.

The question being then put, "will the Convention dispense with its rules," it was decided in the negative.

Mr. CHINN rose to call the attention of the Convention to the importance of this matter. He does not think they are sufficiently impressed with it, or they would have given it more ready attention.

A pause ensuing,

Mr. BRENT asked for leave of absence for Mr. Chambliss; which was granted.

Mr. BEATTY then remarked, that as the house seemed to be fuller, he would again press his motion, and moved to reconsider the vote taken on the dispensation of the rules. It had been remarked by the delegate from Caddo, (Mr. Porter) that if these resolutions be adopted, all debate is cut off; but this is not so. The only alteration will be that the amendments will be adopted or rejected without debate, after the previous question has been sustained.

Mr. PORTER: That is the reason why I objected.

Mr. MAYO is now disposed to vote for it. He did not understand it when it was presented before.

The motion to dispense with the rules was again submitted to the Convention and lost, four-fifths not having sustained the motion.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Section 10. The substitute offered by Mr. Taylor of Assumption, as follows:

"The legislature, in any year in which they shall apportion representation in the house of representatives, shall divide the State into senatorial districts. No parish shall be divided in the formation of senatorial districts. The number of senators shall not be less than twenty-five, nor more than thirty-four, and they shall be apportioned among the senatorial districts, according to the total population contained in the senatorial districts; provided that no parish shall be entitled to more than one-eighth of the whole number of senators."

Mr. Downs moved to amend the same by inserting after the words "in any year" the words "after the year 1855."

He explained the reason why this amendment was offered. It was because in that year the census would be taken, and the legislature could make a more just appotionment after that than before.

Mr. Beatty said that the question last under discussion yesterday, was on a motion made by him for the previous question, and as he conceives that to have the preference, he presses it to the vote of the Convention.

Mr. Downs remarked, that it was not his intention to debate this question, but simply wanted it voted on.

Mr. Taylor trusts that the delegate from Lafourche will withdraw his motion:

Mr. Beatty: I insist on the motion.

Mr. Mayo remarked that he had yesterday introduced an amendment, to insert the word "white" between the words total and population, and "three-fifths of the slaves," and that when he made that motion it was clearly the first in order.

Mr. Saunders, temporarily in the Chair, decided that the motion for the previous question was the first in order.

Mr. Claiborne would certainly not vote for the previous question if the amendment of the delegate from Ouachita was the only one that was to be proposed to the substitute before the house.

Mr. Taylor accepts the amendment offered by the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs.)

The question was then put, "shall the main question be now put?" and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Chinn, Conrad of Jefferson, Dunn, Kenner, Labauve, Legendre, Mazureau, Preston, Pugh, St. Amand—11 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Boudousque, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Claiborne, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Roman, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder—48 nays; so the motion was lost.

Mr. Downs then renewed his motion to insert the words "after the year 1855," and strike out the words "in any year."

Mr. Kenner inquired if that contemplates after the census to be taken in 1855.

Mr. Downs: Yes.

Mr. Kenner: Then, sir, I must oppose it, and call for the yeas and nays on the motion. It is not likely, the way we are going on with the constitution, that it will last over twenty years, and more than half the time will have elapsed before the senate is properly and fairly apportioned.

Mr. Preston then addressed the house as follows:

Mr. President: As the section is now amended I oppose its adoption; first, because population is made the basis of senatorial apportionment; and second, because the apportionment is to be postponed until 1856.

I yielded yesterday my vote in favor of the total population as the basis, against my judgment and feelings, but in the spirit of compromise, in a moment of excitement, in the hope that gentlemen from the great and growing west, would be reconciled to abandon the excessive representation in the senate which they had obtained in detail, thinking the basis of population most favorable to them. And if they refused that, by an apportionment in 1848 any inequality would be remedied, and exact justice done to all. But now I find the total population adopted as the basis, and the apportionment postponed to 1856.

I have, with others, expatiated so much on the absurdity, in determining political power, of placing slaves on an equality with the free, minors with majors, females with males, that I will not trouble the Convention with another word on the subject. And, although it would perhaps favor the city and portion of the State I represent, to include in the enumeration free colored persons and unnaturalized foreigners, of all countries and climes, for if you go into our markets you will hear all languages and see all colors, I am opposed to it; for I see no more reason for enumerating them than for persisting on square miles, as some gentlemen still do with great zeal, as a basis of apportionment.

As to territory, it has no more to do with the basis of political power, than fire, air or water. These elements were given by a bountiful Creator for the support of his creatures, but while unappropriated to the destination of Providence, should have no influence upon man or government. If territory should have any influence, a farm appropriated to the objects of society, the support of man, the happiness of the fireside, should have more influence than uncultivated leagues of the richest land. But besides such land we have swamps of vast extent, fit only for the habitancy of noxious reptiles, and barren pine woods and prairies, which would scarcely afford a sustenance to the crows that fly over them. Some gentlemen propose to exclude these. It would require a corps of surveyors to apportion our senatorial representation.

In opposition to such schemes, I hold that white men above the age of minority, who are in reality the lords and masters of Louisiana, should be equally represented in the senate, as well as in the house of representatives in her government.

In the next place, I oppose the adoption of the section, because of the postponement of the apportionment until 1856. A pretext for adjourning the Convention from Jackson, was that we had not the statistical information there, necessary to make the apportionment. This was an admission not only that we must have a basis, and not fix the districts arbitrarily, but also that we should have certain information of the extent of the basis in each district. In a popular government we must have an equal representation apportioned on a certain basis. A leading object of calling this Convention was to equalize the representation in the senate; to abolish the arbitrary and unequal districts which existed, and apportion the senate equally, as I think, among the voters.

But in making the apportionment now, we have no certain information. No member knows the number of voters in any district. The census of 1840 is no criterion now, of population in the growing parishes. It was not originally made by State authority, and perhaps with little accuracy. I am certain the population of the senatorial district which I represent in this Convention, is double now, what it is represented to have been in 1840. The only criterion which approximates to certainty now, is the division of the State into congressional districts in 1842. We are bound to believe that the legislature divided the four districts as equally as possible, giving each that weight to which it was entitled by its population or voters. This is the last authorative proceeding upon which we ought to make our calculations. And if the apportionment is to be postponed until 1856, I for one must insist that it shall prevail, and that eight senators shall be allowed to each congressional district.

But it is in our power to have absolute certainty, by causing a census to be made immediately; and why should we perpetuate that which is uncertain, arbitrary and unjust, when certainty and equality is attainable? To end this two months' struggle for power without right, I would vote for the unjust apportionment which has been effected in detail, if you would permit it to be amended or righted in 1848. Like the just suitor who submits with cheerfulness to the injustice of a decision against him, because there is a speedy appeal to a tribunal where justice will be done. It is only the iniquity of perpetual inequality that the spirit of freemen cannot brook.

As we are now wandering in the dark with no compass to guide us, let us as soon as possible ascertain our population, if that is to be the basis, by a correct census; and then we will have justice and equality, with arithmetical certainty. The senate is the divisor, the population the dividend, and the quotient the number entitled to a senator, or senatorial district. And why should we postpone this arithmetical certainty of justice and equality? There can be no reason, except that some gentlemen think they have gained advantages by a struggle for power in the dark. And that is the very reason why an immediate apportionment should be made.

We have agreed that an apportionment of representation in the house, shall be made in 1848. What reason can there exist why an apportionment of the senate should not be made at the same time, and with the same trouble and expense. I appeal to gentlemen from the west, where the population is rapidly increasing in consequence of the extent of their territory, the fertility of their soil and genial climate. It will continue to increase beyond their most sanguine anticipations. I rejoice to see it, and should rejoice to see their ascendancy in the power of the State, on account of their truly republican principles. But trust with confidence to that natural growth to give that portion of the State political power and ascendancy with right, and do not take it by might.

We have it in our power to do speedy justice in our own day and generation. Our great fallacy consists in overlooking the present, and providing only for the unborn millions. They will provide for themselves, far better than our limited views can provide for their improved condition. Ten years is a political life-time in this country. If you perpetuate an arbitrary apportionment based upon uncertainties, or rather upon certain inequality. Now, I care nothing about your apportionment in 1856, when in all probability, I, and many of us, shall lay cold beneath "a load of monumental clay." Let us struggle for right and justice and equality now, with the certainty that its attainment and enjoyment in our day, will be the best guarantee that our chilldren, growing up in our principles, will maintain the same rights and equality, when they ascend the stage of action, and we descend to our original clay.

Mr. M. Taylor said, he was placed in a singular attitude in relation to the substitute presented by him. Before the previous question was called by the delegate from Lafourche Interior (Mr. Beatty) he had said to the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs,) that he had no particular objection to the time mentioned in his amendment; that he should be willing to see a vote taken on it, and that, although he preferred the time proposed in the substitute, he should still vote for the substitute if his (Mr. D.'s) amendment prevailed. At this stage of the proceedings the delegate from Lafourche Interior (Mr. Beatty) moved the previous question. If this had been sustained it would have cut off the amendment, and prevented any vote being taken on it. This I did not think right, said Mr. T. I was disposed to allow my proposition to be amended so as to meet the views of a majority of the house if possible. I thought the amendment of the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. D.) might be acceptable to a number of the members who had before voted against the proposition, and that it could not affect those who were in favor of the principle involved in it. If the vote had been taken directly, at that time on the amendment, I should in all probability, have voted against it. But when the previous question was moved, as I thought, not only to prevent debate, but to cut off the amendment, I thought it right to accept it, and with that view stated to the house, that if I had the right to do so, that I would accept. It was decided, however, that it was out of order, because the house was proceeding to vote on the call for the previous question. The house refused to order the previous question, and now (said Mr. T.) the amendment is before us, and I feel at liberty to vote against it, notwithstanding I was willing to accept it under the peculiar circumstances to which I have alluded; but as yet I have not decided how I shall vote on that question.

The delegate from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) says, that in the formation of senatorial districts, territory should go for nothing, and that the people alone ought to be considered. That, as a general principle, is undoubtedly true. But like all general principles, it is subject to particular exceptions. If this were a country which was fully peopled, I should at once concur with that gentleman in applying the principle to numbers. But such is not the fact. It is but a few years since the State was established. We are comparatively a new people; we have large districts containing the finest lands in the State, that have scarcely been explored. Others that are admirably adapted to the pursuits of husbandry are now in the course of settlement, and none has as yet a population in any degree equal to what it will in a few years contain. The experience of the past admonishes us of the necessity of being in some degree influenced at this time by the extent and character of territory in the formation of senatorial districts. When we look around us, we see on every side a happy population and smiling fields, when but a few years ago we should have found a wilderness. The delegate from Jefferson has forgotten that we ought to look ahead, and from the past, anticipate the future. We are in a state of rapid progress.—Where we to-day find a solitude, to-morrow may be filled with teeming thousands. One portion of the country from the fertility of its soil and the facilities of internal communication, will attract thousands of emigrants, and another, from its sterility, or the want of other natural advantages, will either remain unoccupied, or be inhabited by a small and scattered population. In consequence of this peculiarity in our situation, we may with great propriety allow territory to influence us somewhat in apportioning the senatorial representation. In proportion as we advance in population this consideration will be entitled to less weight. In a very few years the fertile districts will be filled up, and the relative increase of population in the different country parishes will then be nearly equal. When this is the case, the apportionment ought to be based on population: and it is because I entertain these views that I think the question whether the first apportionment should be made in 1848 or in 1856 is of comparatively little importance.

It seems that some gentlemen labor under a misapprehension as to the time when the apportionment would be made if this amendment were adopted. They suppose it would be ten years after 1855. This is not the fact. The first census is to be made in 1847 and the second in 1855. The apportionment is to be made by the legislature at the session after the census is taken; that is, after that of 1847, in 1848, and again in 1856, after the census of 1855.

The question was then put on the amendment of Mr. Downs, and the yeas and nays being asked for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Claiborne, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Humble, King, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St.Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winchester—36 yeas.

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Cénas, Chinn, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, Labauve, Ledoux, Lewis, Mazureau, Preston, Pugh, Saunders, Sellers, Splane, Trist, Wadsworth and Winder voted in the negative; so the motion prevailed.

Mr. Mayo then insisted on his motion being in order—which was to insert the word "white" before the word population, and immediately thereafter three-fifths of the slaves.

Mr. Chinn opposes it, because it shuts out all chance of justice to the large parishes for at least ten or eleven years. He has asked in vain of this Convention to put his districts on an equality with the others, and unless they give one senator more to Plaquemines and St. Bernard; one senator to Jefferson, and one to West Baton Rouge and Iberville, more than they have, he shall feel bound to vote against the resolution.

Mr. Beatty remarked that he was anxious on yesterday to have stopped this debate, and had for that purpose moved the previous question.

From the result of the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn, he was satisfied that the house was then prepared to sustain him. Some delay, however, unfortunately occurred in commencing the call of the yeas and nays on the previous question: the motion for adjournment was again renewed and prevailed by a large vote, and to-day, only eleven yeas have been found in a house of sixty, in favor of the previous question.

And what is the object of this refusal of the house to sustain to-day the previous question? Is it to postpone the new apportionment till 1855? Why, Mr. President, the very statement of the proposition suffices to show its utter injustice. We have already provided for taking a census in 1847, and then it is desired that the senate shall not be apportioned by that census, but that the present apportionment shall continue till 1855. Is not this an open confession that the present apportionment is unjust and unequal, and that this house is asked to perpetuate this injustice, till a period at which a certain portion of the State believes she will have increased sufficiently in population to be able to retain the power which, up to that period, she will have unjustly usurped?

From the vote of this house, which has just been taken, he supposes that it is prepared to sustain this act of injustice. So let it be; but for my part, Mr. President, it shall never receive the sanction of my vote. I prefer that even a great injustice should be forced upon me, than to enter into a compromise by which I give my consent to an act of injustice, still though it be of less moment than that which it is sought to inflict on me by force. So long, then, as this postponement of the new apportionment shall be continued in the section, he, for one, should vote against it—even if the present unequal apportionment should be so modified as to make it less objectional to him than it now is.

Mr. PORTER cannot consent that the vote on this subject should be taken without emphatically protesting against its policy and injustice. The gentleman that had just taken his seat (Mr. Beatty) had indulged freely in abusing the apportionment in the senate, as established by this house; he has denounced it as monstrous, as unjust, and as odious. And what are the principles which that gentleman and those acting with him are now advocating? Sir, it is representation according to the total population, including slaves and free negroes, giving to each negro the same political power, and placing him on the same footing with a white man, as far as the basis of representation is concerned. Now, sir, could there be a more odious proposition? could any man conceive a more odious principle? And yet, sir, this principle is attempted to be thrust into our constitution.

Mr. President—Where are the reasons offered in favor of this measure? Sir, there has been no good reason offered—there is no precedent on record in any of the State governments. I hold in my hand the book of constitutions, and present it to gentlemen, and I state without fear of contradiction, that in the twenty-six constitutions contained in it, such a provision is not to be found. No, sir, it is to be found nowhere. It is a novelty. I will adopt the language of gentlemen on the other side, whilst discussing the question of representation in the lower house, but with much more truth. "This is a solecism in government;" "this is a new spectacle, not hitherto to be found in the history of our country;" this is really "a deed without a name." The idea of basing representation on a kind of population that has hitherto had no political rights guaranted to them, has at least the virtue of being a novelty. Now, sir, I would ask gentlemen who are in favor of giving this political influence to a favored part of the State, upon what principle do they desire to have their slaves represented, as persons, or as property? If as property only, why ask representation for this particular species of property; is not other taxable property equally entitled to representation? or is it because more of this species of property is found in a favored region, according to the white population, than is found in the other parts of the State; or is there more taxes paid on slaves than all other property, or are slaves more permanent or less subject to change than the lands of the country? Sir, from the report of the treasurer, now before me, which I will refer to, I find that the whole tax of the State is three hundred and forty-four thousand seven hundred and thirty-three dollars; and that the tax on slaves is only one hundred and sixty-four thousand nine hundred and forty-one dollars; on lands, the taxes are one hundred and thirty-seven thousand and nine dollars, slaves paying only twenty-eight thousand dollars more than is paid on lands; and according to the same report the following five parishes have not hitherto paid any land tax, because they were not, according to the laws of the United States, entitled to pay any, that is, the parish of Franklin, the parish of Claiborne, of Bossier, of Caddo, and of De Soto. Now, sir, it cannot be disputed, that when those parishes become liable to land tax, (and that will be the case at farthest in one or two years,) that the taxes on lands will amount to more than that on negroes. Now, sir, I repeat, why is it that slaves, as property, should be represented exclusively, and all other species of property be left unprotected.

It will at once be seen that a large amount of tax is raised from other property beside land and negroes, for those two items only amount to about three hundred thousand dollars; but do gentlemen desire these slaves to be represented as persons? One gentleman insists that an amendment should be made, and that negroes be specifically named, for fear there should be some mistake or misunderstanding about the words total population, and that negroes might be left out. Now, sir, if this principle has to be forced on us, I would greatly prefer that they should be called by name—say Tom, Dick and Harry—and be permitted to come up to the polls and vote. It is stated on this floor, that the white population is decreasing in this favored region, and therefore I suppose it is desired to transfer the political power of that region to the slaves. If this has to be done, I wish them to have a choice in selecting their representatives, and I imagine there are many of them would be as apt to select some one else as their masters. But, sir, what is this great and crying injustice which has been committed in this apportionment of representation in the senate? It has been based on the size of the districts, on its population, and on its taxes, all duly considered and combined. And, sir, I believe it is the best basis, except the qualified voters, (which the gentlemen on the other side objected to.)

One word as to the inconsistency of the city delegation, in their votes on the subject of representation. Whilst this matter was under consideration, apportioning representation in the lower house, a proposition was made to base it on federal numbers. This principle would give to (say) five thousand negroes the political influence of three thousand white men; whilst the total population gives to each negro the same weight as to a white man. Where stood the city delegation, when the vote on federal numbers was taken? Sir, they stood where they ought to have been—voting in solid phalanx against it. It was then "anti-democratic, it was anti-republican," and every thing else that was wrong; but, sir, this was before a coalition was formed between the sugar interests on the coast and the city. I say, sir, before a coalition of opinion had been formed between them. Since then, the city delegation has generally voted en masse; with one honorable exception, I believe that gentleman has, on every occasion, voted a democratic vote. There has been one green spot on which to rest the eye. Yesterday, that faded from our sight; that gentleman went over, and voted with the entire delegation of the city, for total population, a much more objectionable principle than federal numbers. But, sir, I am rejoiced to hear that gentleman (Mr. Preston) give notice today, that he will ask a reconsideration of that vote, and that he will vote in favor of the basis being qualified electors. The gentleman shall not vote alone; mine shall stand recorded with him. I am truly glad that the gentleman has determined to change his vote. I did not wish to see his name on the black list. Sir, it seems strange that in a State, having so many slaves, and them not equally distributed over it, that they should be made the basis of our institutions. Sir, by reference to the tables before me, I see that there is a white population of only one hundred and fifty-three thousand and a fraction; and that there is of slaves, one hundred and sixty-five thousand, and of people of color, twenty-five thousand; making a large majority of slaves over the white population. Representation established on such a basis, must be unequal and unjust. I would be willing to meet gentlemen by way of compromise, on the principles above stated—territory, population and taxes. I do hope, sir, this new system will not be adopted.

Mr. M. Taylor said he disliked much to again trouble the house on the subject before it, but as he felt anxious that the substitute offered by him should pass, he wished, if possible, to remove from the minds of members the erroneous impressions under which he thought they were laboring.

What are we now attempting to do? Is it not to provide for the future and periodical apportionment of the senatorial representation among the different portions of the State, and to establish a rule in accordance with which that apportionment shall be made? Certainly it is. The original proposition provided that these apportionments should be made in 1848, in 1856, and every ten years thereafter. This proposition has been amended so that no apportionment will be made in 1848; and now because it is so amended, gentlemen who are in favor of providing for future apportionments, and establishing a basis on which they shall be made, declare that they will vote against the substitute. They will do so, they say, because the present apportionment is unequal and unjust, and they cannot consent that it should remain unchanged for ten years. These gentlemen are in error. There is now no apportionment. The one to which they allude, and which they condemn so loudly, has been rejected by this house, and is as though it had never been. The house has already decided that no apportionment shall be made in 1848, and the question we are about to decide is this: Shall there be an apportionment of senators in 1856, and every ten years thereafter, in conformity to an established rule, or shall there be no future apportionment of them at all? If the house rejects the substitute as amended, (and it will be very likely to do so, if gentlemen vote against it, merely because the principle involved in it does not take effect at as early a day as they desire,) then we shall have no future apportionment of senators at all. For my own part, I think that the organization of the senate in our present constitution is radically defective, and that that particular department of the government stands more in need of reform than any other. The greatest defect in the organization of that body it is the object of this substitute to remedy. No matter how equal the apportionment we now make may be, if the districts be permanent, the representation will soon become unequal. Situated as we are, with a great variety of soil and climate, and with advantages in some sections of country for the establishment of manufactures, and in others for the growth of trade, this is inevitable. We must apportion the senatorial representation of the State. This cannot be avoided. The inequalities in the existing districts are too great. They must be removed. If the apportionment we agree on is unequal, and we adopt the substitute, the inequality can be corrected in ten years. If it be equal, it will afford a means for removing inequalities which may result hereafter from the varying progress of improvement and population in the different parts of the State.

As I said before, no apportionment is in existence. The one made was rejected. The whole subject is within the power of the house. We can, and I trust will, make another one, which shall be more equal. If we do that, the objection made by the friends of the original proposition will be entirely obviated. But however that may be, I must (said Mr. T.) remind gentlemen that if they are in favor of the principle of the substitute, they ought not to vote against it as amended, on the ground that the apportionment which we are to make may be unequal. They should now vote for it, and then unite with me to make an equal and fair apportionment. If such an one is not made, they can always vote against the substitute by voting against the whole section.

If we decide that representation in the senate shall be apportioned at stated periods, and adopt a proper rule for making the apportionments, we shall not only have established an important principle, but we shall get rid of many of the difficulties which embarrass us in making an apportionment at this time. As for myself (said Mr. T.) I shall be consistent in my course. I am in favor of the principle involved in the substitute, and shall vote for it as amended. Afterwards I shall vote in accordance with the dictates of my judgment, upon the various propositions relative to the present apportionment of the senate, with the single view of making it fair and equal. Upon this subject (said Mr. T.) I must confess I feel great anxiety, for I am persuaded that upon the reform effected in the senatorial branch of the legislature, will in a great degree depend the fate of the constitution itself.

The delegate from Caddo (Mr. Porter) alluded to the course of the New Orleans delegation on this subject, and charged them with inconsistency. I do not (said Mr. T.) agree with that gentleman in opinion. When the house was engaged in fixing on a basis for the apportionment of representatives in the house of representatives, they voted against federal numbers and total population, and in favor of the electoral basis. The house of representatives is the popular branch of the legislature, and the basis for apportioning representation in it, ought, beyond all doubt, to be the electors. The senate is a very different body. It is of an entirely different character, and is created for a very different object. It is designed to act as a check upon the lower house, in order to prevent hasty and improper legislation, and any basis for the apportionment of representation in that branch, may with propriety be adopted which is calculated to secure the attainment of that object.

Mr. EUSTIS of New Orleans, rose and said,

Mr. President: I have been for nearly two months a silent observer of what has been passing in the Convention, on the subject of the legislative apportionment, and I should not deviate from the rule which I had prescribed to myself of not interfering in the discussion, except when the interests of New Orleans were directly to be affected, were it not apparent that we had reached a point beyond which we cannot advance, and from which we must retrograde if the motion of the honorable delegate from West Baton Rouge prevails. I beg of the Convention to look back on what is passed, and to take a lesson of wisdom from experience.

There is no one, either in the Convention or out of it, who will give himself the trouble to reflect for an instant, who will not be satisfied that no apportionment, at all satisfactory, can be made on the exclusively arbitrary plan the Convention has been for the last fortnight pursuing. We have been vacillating from error to error, from confusion to confusion, until finally, the result has been infinitely more unsatisfactory than either of the projets on your table; and in all probability, we should come to a better conclusion if the whole subject were considered as res nova. We are all anxious to advance, but an insurmountable obstacle is in our way. We have begun wrong. Let us repair the error. It is certain—and every body knows it who has witnessed our hitherto fruitless efforts—that no apportionment at all satisfactory can be made without a basis of representation. If the basis be fixed, the apportionment follows of itself, and can be made in twenty minutes. Can it be possible that in a Convention, composed of seventy-seven men chosen from among the people of this State, for their wisdom and experience, that the suggestions of the venerable delegate from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis) will be unheeded?

Mr. CHINN rose, and said that he would remove the difficulty, by withdrawing his motion. He by no means wished to retard the business of the Convention, nor did he apprehend, when he made it, that it would have any such effect; but as he perceives it may tend to produce such a result, he withdraws his motion, having every desire to facilitate and accelerate the public business.

Mr. EUSTIS expressed himself much gratified that the honorable delegate from West Baton Rouge had so promptly removed the difficulty in the way of our progress, and had but one word to add—one favor to ask—that the sense of the Convention be now taken on the vexed question of the basis. This once fixed, the apportionment can be adjusted in a manner which will be satisfactory to the Convention and the people. But this day ought not to pass—the Convention ought not to adjourn—without determining on the principle, without the establishment of which, the Convention cannot advance one step; all future labor and discussion will only lead to endless and senseless confusion.

Mr. WADSWORTH said that in contending that lower Louisiana was entitled to four more senators, he did not say they should be taken from the Red River parishes, but that New Orleans was entitled to five more senators than she was allowed; therefore in what she was restricted, the parishes contiguous to her ought to receive the benefit of, and that would only place them on a footing of equality.

Mr. CLAIBORNE withdrew his motion to reconsider, and moved the previous question.

The President then put the question, "shall the main question be adopted," and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquié, Bourg, Brent, Brumfield, Carriere, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Guion, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, M'Callop, Mazureau, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder—44 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Burton, Cade, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Lewis McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Madison, Stephens, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff—22 nays; so the motion prevailed.

And then on motion, the question was taken on the substitute offered by Mr. Taylor, and amended by the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs.) and resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquiè, Bourg, Brent, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Kenner, King, Labauve, McCallop, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Winchester and Winder—40 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brumfield, Burton, Conrad of Jefferson, Dunn, Hudspeth, Humble, Legendre, Lewis, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Stephens, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt and Wikoff—26 nays; so the substitute as amended, was adopted.

While the vote was being taken,

Mr. Chinn remarked that though he voted for the substitute, he should vote against the whole section, as injustice was done to his parish.

Mr. O'Bryan said he voted in the affirmative, because he regarded it as a compromise.

Mr. Peets could not see that any thing had been conceded, and therefore he should vote, nay.

Mr. Penn remarked that he could not and would not vote for any clause which contained such a principle as the one under consideration, viz: to take the slave population as a part of the basis of representation. He should not only vote against it now, but he would vote against any constitution containing that principle in it.

Mr. Wederstrandt said he could not vote for the proposition—the views expressed by the honorable delegate from St. Tammany, met his approbation, and consequently he would vote against the proposition. Total population was not his favorite basis. His favorite basis was that of qualified electors. Principle was his compass, and his determination was to adhere to principle.

Mr. Brazeale then moved the adoption of the section as amended.

Mr. Preston moved to amend the section by striking out "one," and inserting "two" senators for the parish of Jefferson.

Mr. Dunn expressed himself surprised at some of the arguments of the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin) although he agreed with him in the main. He (Mr. D.) had voted against the apportionment, because he conceived it unjust. Why should we wait ten years before making a new apportionment, instead of taking the data we can get in two? If we do make another apportionment in 1848, it is very clear to his (Mr. D.'s) mind, that the senators to be taken off will be from the northwestern parishes instead of the Florida parishes. What sense, then, is there in establishing a rule, and at the same time saying that it shall be postponed for ten years, unless it be an arbitrary one? Is this the work we are to put forth to the world as the result of our deliberations?

The President called Mr. Dunn to order for irrelevancy.

Mr. Dunn—Pardon me, Mr. President; I am perfectly in order. I am endeavoring to show that we are bound in justice to allow two senators to the parish of Jefferson; and the question we are now considering is on the motion to that effect. He (Mr. D.) is satisfied she has not had justice done to her, nor has the second municipality, nor the district composed of West Baton Rouge and Iberville. But the question raised about taking one senator from the Florida parishes, to make up for the injustice done to those districts, he is positively opposed to; because that would be adding injustice to injustice; for those parishes have nothing which they are not clearly entitled to. He thinks there is an easier mode to remedy the evil. We have adopted the rule for our basis, and that is total population; now let us determine what shall be the number of senators—say thirty-two, thirty-four or thirty-eight? That done, appoint a committee to make a fair apportionment on that basis, and in twenty minutes the work can be accomplished. Any other mode by which we may proceed will be arbitrary; it will create dissatisfaction, and will operate fatally against the ratification of the constitution itself. He therefore hopes it will be first determined what shall be the number of senators.

Mr. WADSWORTH said, by an increase of four, justice might be done to every parish.

Mr. READ remarked that on examining the tables, he found that Jefferson was not entitled to two senators, taking total population as the basis. After deducting one hundred and two thousand one hundred and ninety-five, for the city of New Orleans, it leaves a population of two hundred and thirty-eight thousand nine hundred and eighty-one, for the balance of the State. Now, deducting four senatorsfor New Orleans, it would leave thirty remaining, which would be about seven thousand as the average for each senator. Now, the population of Jefferson is about ten thousand, and if she be entitled to two senators, surely West Feliciana with ten thousand nine hundred and ten, East Feliciana with eleven thousand eight hundred and fifty-three, St. John the Baptist and St. Charles with ten thonsand two hundred and seventy-six, are equally entitled to two senators.

Mr. CONRAD contended that Mr. Dunn was in error, in saying that no rule had been adhered to in the apportionment; for the rule had been strictly observed in all the river parishes, in the Lafourche and Attakapas districts, and even as far as Point Coupée, and had not been departed from until we came to the Florida parishes; and when we got into the north-western parishes, all rules whatever had been departed from.

Mr. BRENT moved an adjournment, and the Convention adjourned until to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

[In the yeas and nays, in the report of debates of Tuesday last, April 1—upon Mr. Lewis' amendment to add to the words "total population" "and territory equally," as the basis of apportionment for the senate—the name of the mover of the amendment, Mr. LEWIS, was placed, by error, among the nays. It should have been among the yeas.—KERR, Rep.]

THURSDAY, April 3, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer.

The following resolutions of Mr. Beatty which were ordered yesterday to lie on the table, were taken up.

"Resolved, That all motions to lay on the table subject to call, be decided without debate."

"Resolved, That when the previous question be asked and be maintained by the Convention, the vote shall be taken on all the amendments that may be offered, without debate."

Mr. BEATTY said he did not design to make a speech and would merely remark, that experience had fully tested the necessity for these rules. It was impossible to make any progress unless they were adopted.

Mr. DOWNS proposed to amend, by inserting "subject to call."

Mr. BEATTY objected to this amendment. It was adopted.

Mr. RATLIFF and C. M. CONRAD opposed these rules, on the ground that they were useless, and would not effect the purpose designed. They were adopted.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SEC. 10. Art. 2.—Apportionment of the Senate.

The question pending at the adjournment yesterday, was the motion to allow one senator to the parish of Jefferson.

Mr. BRENT said that the proposition before the house, was to give an additional senator to the parish of Jefferson. His course in relation to this matter would depend materially upon the action taken in relation to the section under debate. He was willing to concede one senator more to lower Louisiana, provided the apportionment in the section was not disturbed. Or, he was willing to take one senator from the north-west, at any point the Convention should think just and proper, and not increase the number already apportioned. He did not rise so much to debate the individual proposition immediately before the house, as for the purpose of explaining a few facts in relation to the section rejected by this body. We have heard a great deal about the inequity of this apportionment; it has been denounced in unmeasured language, and we have been told, over and over again, that it is without a redeeming trait—a kind of gun-powder plot concocted in the north-west, designed to devastate the whole of lower Louisiana, and to involve it in one wide-spread and general ruin. It is easy to make assertions. Gentlemen can assert any thing; it costs nothing. But do they furnish us with proof to substantiate these assertions? Have they shown by substantial proof that this apportionment is unjust and iniquitous, as has so freely been charged. I have not (said Mr. Brent) seen any such proofs. The two delegates from New Orleans, who addressed the Convention yesterday, descanted upon the flagitious injustice that had been visited upon the devoted head of New Orleans. This was the old theme, the old song, and there was as much foundation for the complaints of the New Orleans delegation on the present occasion as in past instances. What injustice, I would ask, has been done to the city of New Orleans? Where is the oppression so vehemently complained of? has any injustice been done to New Orleans in her representation to the lower house? is there any injustice in the apportionment there? I understand not! She is admitted to a perfect equality in the popular branch, although the necessity and propriety of restricting her was admitted by her own delegates, notwithstanding the explicit admission emanating from one of her delegates. Yet no restriction has been placed upon her—she is admitted to a perfect equality with the balance of the State? Is there here any tyranny? any injustice? Surely not? Let us now see how the matter of complaint stands in relation to the apportionment under debate. The section under consideration allows four senators to the city, and distributes them among the three municipalities. Is there any injustice in this? has she not been awarded all that she was justly entitled to? has she not received what she asked for, and there is no danger that she will suffer from the want of asking. If she has got all she asked for, can they object that this apportionment has not conceded enough? Where then is the injustice, in the distribution? Why, that was made at the instance of one of her own delegates. If there was any injustice in it, any oppression, it originated with the city. It was not concocted in the fourth district, but it was at the instance of one of the representatives of the city.

But we are told that the city has no representation in the house of representatives to represent the whole city, by reason of its division into districts, and that this principle is applied to the senate. Will not four senators represent the city with more truth and fidelity if taken from the local districts than if elected by general ticket? Will they not reflect more immediately the will of the constituent body? At any rate the same objection might have been urged against the division of the county of Attakapas, and some other sections that have been divided into several senatorial districts. The county of Attakapas has been divided into two senatorial districts—the parishes of St. Mary and St. Martin, entitled to two senators; and the parishes of Lafayette and Vermillion entitled to one senator. The same thing may be said of the county of Rapides, and will it be pretended that they have no representation in the senate because they are not represented as an unit. It might as well be said that there is no representation for the whole State of Louisiana! This is the first time that I have heard that because the representatives are chosen by local districts, and not by general ticket throughout the State, they are not to be considered as speaking the voice of the people of the whole State!

But, Mr. President, an allusion has been made to the fact of the removal of the seat of government from the city. It is said that a spirit of proscription is exhibited towards New Orleans. I voted for the removal o the seat of government, but I never conceived that such a construction could be placed upon it. I thought that measure important—that it was called for by the soundest considerations of public policy—I think so still. The seat of government should not be held amid the hurly burly of a great commercial city. This opinion has been entertained by the greatest statesmen. And we find abundant precedent in the example set us by our sister cities. In the State of New York, the seat of government is not placed in her large commercial metropolis, but in the interior, at Albany. In Pennsylvania, the seat of government is not at Philadelphia, but at Harrisburg. The seat of the federal government has not been placed in a large commercial city, but in a barren heath where a large commercial city can never exist. It was not to proscribe the city of New Orleans that the seat of government has been removed, but because it was deemed more prudent, more wise, to remove it beyond the influence that surround a large city. I cannot conceive how that measure can reasonably give any just cause of umbrage to the citizens of New Orleans. Suppose the Convention were to provide that the seat of government should be located within the radius of twenty miles of the centre of the State, would that be a slur upon any portion of the State not embraced within that radius? I apprehend not! The clamor that has been raised has no just foundation whatever.

We were told yesterday that if the section was adopted, and if the distribution of the four senators were insisted upon, the city of New Orleans would vote en masse against the new constitution. This threat has taken the place of the threat of revolution, which at an early stage of our proceedings, was so frequently repeated. Gentlemen have become more peaceable—they only threaten us with the rejection of our labors. As to its being rejected, the wish is farther to the thought. But if it is to be rejected, it will not be upon that ground. If the city is to be placed in a hostile attitude upon the question of its approval or rejection —if a line of demarkation is to be drawn between the city and country upon that issue, it will be found that the city of New Orleans does not yet occupy the same position that Richelieu held to France. It will be found that New Orleans is not the State! The same causes that may induce the city to coalesce will induce the country to coalesce. What will the five thousand voters of the city do againts the twenty thousand voters of the country? I hope that the gentlemen will forego their threat of rejection of the constitution by the city.

But, Mr. President, let us look at some facts connected with the present apportionment. A great outcry has been raised against it. The public press has denounced it as the concentration of all that is iniquitous. The development of a few facts will show that the political power has been divided with remarkable accuracy, when it is considered that we have proceeded without any fixed basis in making the apportionment. The house has since decided upon a basis. They have taken for a basis the total population. Let us take that basis and examine and see whether justice has not been done to what is called lower Louisiana. Let us see whether justice has not been meted out in the aggregate. It may be true that some of the parishes may not have received their exact proportion. But it will be found—taking the apportionment as a whole upon a reference to the statistics before us—that almost exact justice has been done to every section of the State—as near an approach to justice as was possible. To the city of New Orleans four senators have been apportioned. It is conceded all around that the city should not be allowed a full representation under any basis that may be established. No one disputes that point. The city has been allowed her full representation in the popular branch, and by general assent it has been deemed proper to place the restriction upon her in the senate. The city had, according to the census, a population of ninety-eight thousand three hundred and twenty-four souls, exclusive of that portion of the parish of Orleans on the west bank. If we deduct ninety-eight thousand three hundred and twenty-four from the first and second congressional districts—and I make the deduction from these congressional districts rather than from the remaining portion of the State out of the city, because we have heard so much clamor raised that certain districts were favored over other districts—we find the remainder to be sixty-thousand two hundred and ninety-three souls. I would remark that if we deduct the population of the city from the total population of the whole State and give the city four senators, and then divide the remaining portion by thirty, to ascertain the representative number to entitle a district to a senator, it will be seen that eight thousand is the representative number:—After deducting the city of New Orleans from the first and second congressional districts, their population, sixty thousand two hundred and ninety-three, would entitle them, assuming eight thousand as the divisor, they to seven senators. The apportionment gives them that number. They are entitled to it, and they have it. Let us see how the apportionment stands in the third congressional district. The population of that district is placed at ninety-four thousand five hundred and twenty. They are entitled to eleven senators, and they have them. Is there any thing unjust in allowing them that representation? It is demonstrated that they are entitled to it upon the basis that has since been adopted. We now come to the fourth congressional district. We find that her population is ninety-one thousand two hundred and forty-one. She is not strictly speaking entitled to eleven senators, but she is entitled to ten, and has a fraction remaining of three thousand two hundred and forty-one. This fraction may not be large enough to entitle her to another senator. Well then take it away and there will be as exact a distribution of political power, as far as the State goes, as is possible. Add the senator taken away to lower Louisiana, and a perfect equality in conformity with the basis is reached. This equality might be attained by retaining the senator in the fourth district and adding one senator more to the second congressional district. But it would be fairer to take that senator from the fourth district and give him to the second district. That would be the most proper course.

But it may be said that we should not deduct the population of the city from the first and second congressional districts. That these districts are entitled to the excess of population after the allotment of the four senators to the city. I object to this. It is an exception from the rule that the city should be restricted in one branch of the legislature that is neither just nor safe. If the excess of population in the city is to be spread over the contiguous parishes, it will have a similar effect—it would be just as well, and infinitely more fair—to take off the restriction, and let the city have directly the full representation to which she is entitled. If the city can claim, and the balance of the State concede to her the right to have that representation, it would be better to give it to her than that it should enure to the exclusive benefit of the surrounding country. If the exception is to be carried out and the city is not to have her full representation in the senate, then the excess over and above the representation allowed her in that branch of the legislature should not be taken into consideration at all, but the apportionment in the country should be made upon the principle of perfect equality. It should be borne in mind that a large minority of this body think that the apportionment ought to be made upon the basis of qualified electors. If we compare the first and second congressional districts in reference to the basis of qualified electors, we find (taking the vote at the last presidential election as our guide,) that the first and second congressional districts gave ten thousand votes, the third and fourth congressional districts sixteen thousand votes, showing an excess of six thousand votes in favor of the latter districts.—Whether one consider then population or electors, it is apparent that substantial justice has been meted out. In some particular instances, some parishes may have obtained greater representation than they were entitled to; but others in the same section have obtained less, and therefore impartial justice in reference to the various sections has been done. It is impossible to obtain a perfect equality in the senatorial representation of the several parishes. But the political power has been divided with remarkable equality—with as much equality as was attainable. I will concur that one senator be taken from the north-west and transferred to lower Louisiana, if by that means the question can be definitely settled.

Mr. Benjamin moved to postpone for the present the motion under discussion, in order to examine what portion of the State shall be curtailed of a part of their senatorial representation. Adopted.

Mr. Benjamin moved to limit the number of senators to thirty-two.

Mr. Porter proposed thirty-three. If the number were fixed at thirty-two (said Mr. Porter) it would facilitate the settlement of this question. The north-western parishes were willing to relinquish one senator for the purpose of effecting a compromise, and that was all that they ought to be asked to concede. Thirty-three was one third of the number allotted to the house of representatives.

Mr. Saunders hoped that the motion to place the number at thirty-three would not prevail. In expressing this hope he would beg leave to call the attention of the Convention to a few facts. After a careful examination of the whole subject, his mind had come to a definite conclusion, based upon data which he would submit, in connection with a few remarks, to the consideration of the house. If the number is fixed at thirty-two, there will be no difficulty. The population of the State, excluding the city, was two hundred and fifty thousand. He would not enter into the calculations submitted by the delegate from Rapides, (Mr. Brent) because they were not applicable. Taking thirty-two as the number of senators, and deducting four senators for the city, twenty-eight would remain for the country. That would give nine thousand as the representative number; and assuming the whole population as the basis, the dividend nine thousand would give to the country parishes twenty-eight senators.

I have (said Mr. Saunders) in the next place divided the State into two classes; into the parishes, the representation of which is contested, and the parishes in which there is no contest. Those that are not contested, may be assumed as a fair basis for those that are contested. The Florida district, the Rapides district, the Attakapas district, and the Opelousas district, are not contested. The parishes extending from New Orleans to Iberville, and which have a similarity of interests, have three senators; to wit, St. Charles and St. John Baptist, one senator; St. James and Ascension two senators. St. James and Ascension are deficient, but with the fraction from St. Charles and St. John Baptist, they are entitled to two senators. The Florida parishes have a total population of forty-three thousand; they are allowed a representative for forty-five thousand; the difference between that representation and what they are entitled to is quite insignificant. The same results are found in the Lafourche district, the St. Landry district and the Attakapas district, with the exception in the latter, that Lafayette and Vermillion are somewhat deficient to be entitled to a senator, but the difference is so small as to be immaterial. The district of Avoyelles is deficient, but then the district of Rapides has more than the requisite number, and her excess makes up for the deficiency of Avoyelles. Madison and Concordia are entitled to one senator, and have over and above a fraction. It has been allowed them. We now come to the contested districts. The parishes of Plaquemines and St. Bernard, with that portion of the parish of Orleans on the west bank, have a total population of eleven thousand nine hundred and eighty-nine; they are entitled to one senator, and have a fraction of two thousand nine hundred and eighty-nine; too small a fraction to entitle them to another senator. It must be borne in mind that the parish of Plaquemines, with a total population of four thousand eight hundred and eighty-one, has been allowed three representatives in the popular branch, which she is not entitled to. That should put to rest all opposition on her part to the apportionment. The parish of Jefferson has a total population of ten thousand four hundred and seventy; that entitles her to one senator, and she has a fraction of one thousand four hundred and seventy. This is not worth cavilling about. The county of Iberville has a surplus of about four thousand seven hundred over and above the one senator allowed, and if any thing were given, it would seem that that district has the best claims to an increase. The parish of West Baton Rouge has increased greatly in population; a large stream of population has for some time been setting towards that parish. But I am in favor of maintaining the apportionment, even there as it is. We now come to the north-western parishes, to wit: Natchitoches, Ouachita, Sabine, De Soto, Caldwell, Caddo, Claiborne, Bossier, Morehouse, Union, Catahoula, Franklin and Jackson; thirteen parishes containing thirty-nine thousand two hundred and twenty-nine souls. They are allowed by the apportionment seven senators, when they in fact are entitled to but four, with a fraction of three thousand two hundred and twenty-nine. Strictly speaking, we would be authorized to withdraw three senators. But we only insist upon withdrawing two; we concede one more senator than they can lay claim to, by the basis of their population when compared with the population of the other parishes of the State. We give nothing to the parish of Jefferson, and nothing to the county of Iberville, although both have an excess of population over and above the one senator allotted to them respectively. Is there any thing unfair in the distribution of the representation to the north-western parishes, or any thing that can give them proper cause of complaint? But it is urged that they have increased in population since 1840. We give them one senator more than they are entitled to, taking the census of 1840 as our guide, and should not that satisfy them? But, if they have increased in population, have not the other parishes of the State likewise increased their population? Population has been taken as the basis, and assuming the census of 1840 as indicating the population of the several parishes, it is demonstrable that the representation has been made with remarkable fairness, with the exception of the north-western parishes. They are entitled to four senators; we have given them seven. We do not propose to take away three senators, but to take away two. With that correction, we reduce the number of senators to thirty-two, and the distribution is then as equal as it possibly can be made.

Mr. Porter had one remark to make; the parishes of De Soto, Caddo, Sabine, Bossier and Claiborne, had increased very largely in population. The census of 1840 afforded no criterion of their population. They had just come into existence. The parishes of Caddo and De Soto had doubled. The first land sales took place in 1839 and 1840. It was doing these parishes great injustice to assume the census of 1840 as the basis of distribution. He was willing however, in order to settle the controversy, to yield a good deal to the spirit of compromise. He would consent to relinquish one senator. That was meeting the gentleman half way, and he conceived that that ought to be a sufficient concession.

Mr. Saunders: I am willing to meet the gentleman thus far. I am influenced alone by the lights before me, without favor or prejudice to this or that section of the country. I am willing that it be provided that a census be taken next year, and upon that census the apportionment shall be made by the legislature. The house have determined that instead of indivisible districts, there shall be apportionments at stated periods, and upon these apportionments the senatorial representation shall be made. The proposition of the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Taylor) provided that the apportionment to fix the senatorial representation should be made at the same time as the apportionment for the house of representatives. The delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) offered an amendment that the repartition for the senate, instead of being made in 1848, should be postponed until 1855. If the north-western parishes received by this apportionment two senators more than they were entitled to, it is very evident that it is to their interest to postpone the apportionment by the legislature until a remote period; for in the mean while they will have the additional political power confered upon them by two senators, and will have a further time for the increase of their populations. Should the withdrawal of the two senators produce an inequality, which I do not believe, its effects will be but temporary, if the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) will consent to move a reconsideration of his motion to postpone the next apportionment until 1855, and will propose to reinstate 1848. I will repeat, that I consider the number of senators allowed to the north-western parishes, is not in relative proportion to the number allowed to the other districts, and if the motion of the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) prevails, I will propose that the thirteen parishes that I have enumerated, have five senators instead of seven. If my proposition prevails, I will then suggest to the Convention the propriety of providing that the four senators allowed to the city be elected by general ticket.

Mr. Chinn considered that the greatest sacrifice fell upon that section of the country which he represented. He would submit to th injustice, provided that an early apportionment should be made by the legislature. If that apportionment were fixed for 1848, he would vote for the present temporary distribution.

Mr. Downs was sorry to see a question which was considered as nearly settled, as being farther from being settled than it was a week ago. When we came here yesterday—at least he could say for himself, that he was influenced by a sincere desire to do all in his power to effect a compromise; it was to make some concessions. He voted for a proposition that under other circumstances he never would have voted for, the basis of total population, which had been rejected two or three times. He was prepared to make some concession—to reduce the senatorial representation in the north-western parishes one, or to add one to what was called lower Louisiana. He was sorry to say that instead of being met by the same spirit of compromise, the arguments that had been adduced, exacted concessions all on one side. If we are to be conquered, all that I ask of the gentlemen who oppose us, is, that we may be placed back where we stood yesterday, where we may fight it out on equal grounds. The delegate from Feliciana (Mr. Saunders) should remember that although the reduction may commence with the north-western parishes, it may not end with them. Those who are so much in favor of restricting the north-west, when they have carried that point, may next turn their attention to Florida. If the excess of population in the city, after allowing her four senators, is to be transfered to the parishes in her immediate vicinity; if the exclusion of the city of New Orleans from a full representation in the senate is not to innure to the benefit of the whole State, it would be much better to allow the city to retain her undue proportion of political power. There is some identity of interest between the country parishes generally, and the city of New Orleans. But between the interior parishes and the parishes that surround New Orleans, there is no identity of interest. As a matter of necessity, as the only alternative, I will say, and perhaps others will say, give to New Orleans her entire representation if the excess is to be transfered to the neighboring parishes.

Gentlemen tell us that they are governed by the census of 1840. I consider it no criterion, and to illustrate in a single point how imperfect and deficient it is, I will call attention to the fact which is clearly shown of the increase of slave population since 1840, in some parishes, and the decrease of that population in other parishes. In the city of New Orleans, the increase in white population has been great. We find that her slave population in 1840 was twenty-one thousand seven hundred and forty-three. By the tax roll of 1843 it is but seven thousand four hundred and sixty-three. The slave population of Union in 1840 was five hundred and sixty-three. In 1843, according to the tax roll, it is one thousand one hundred and sixty-eight; more than double. The slave population in Ouachita in 1840, before Morehouse and Jackson were taken off, was two thousand four hundred and thirty-eight. In 1843 the population of Ouachita according to the tax list, is two thousand eight hundred and forty-eight. But I may be told that the old parishes have likewise increased. From the same data it is shown there is no increase; many of them have fallen off. I have already show a large increase in two parishes in my district. We will see how the rule applies to lower Louisiana. In 1840 the slave population of Ascension was four thousand five hundred and fifty-three. In 1843, five thousand three hundred, a small increase. In Assumption, the slave population in 1840 was two thousand nine hundred and eighty-eight; in 1843, three thousand two hundred and twenty-eight. In East Baton Rouge, the slave population in 1840 was four thousand two hundred and six; in 1843, four thousand five hundred and seventy-seven; an increase of about three hundred. In West Baton Rouge in 1840, three thousand one hundred and forty-seven; in 1843, three thousand eight hundred and twenty-six. The increase in slaves had been nearly double in the parishes of Ouachita and Union, and it was fair to infer that the white population had increased three fold. The attempt to withdraw two senators from the north-west, and to postpone the apportionment for ten years, was to catch that section of country in a trap, and he could not see how gentlemen could hold their countenances while making such a proposition. If these parishes were to be deprived of two senators, he hoped at least that the resolution of yesterday would be rescinded, and that things would be placed in their former state. The population of Ouachita and Caldwell in 1840 was five thousand six hundred and eighty-three; if we add the increase of its slaves and white population, it would have eight thousand eight hundred and two. According to the calculation of the delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent) it has been shown that eight hundred is the number for a senatorial representation. It is evident that these two parishes are entitled to one senator, and that they have over and above a fraction. That delegate has shown triumphantly, that the apportionment had been made with equality and uniformity in reference to every section of the State, as far as these were attainable. It would be better to let the old apportionment stand, unequal as it is, until a new census of the State could be taken, rather than to make an apportionment which would do greater injustice, and which would continue for ten years—that a portion of the State should be disfranchised for ten years. Is this what is called justice? Do gentlemen understand concession to mean that we must give up every thing?

Another preposterous and absurd idea is, the conflict supposed to exist between the northern and southern portions of the State. Certain individuals may imagine that it may promote certain purposes, but I defy any one to point out a single instance where there is any adverse or conflicting interest between those sections. It is not expected that our legislature will impose a bounty in favor of the interests of either, but whatever promotes one, necessarily promotes the other. As a cotton planter, I have never been aware of any conflict; I have never felt it. There is no disposition nor feeling adverse to the prosperity of the sugar planters; they consume but a small amount of sugar, but they are well aware that whatever is calculated to lessen the cultivation of cotton is promotive of their interests. There is no adverse interests between those two classes. Every cotton planter feels desirous that the cultivation of sugar should be productive, because it draws away a large amount of capital which would otherwise be invested in the cultivation of cotton. Why should there be any difference or conflict between the producer of cotton, and the producer of sugar? Why excite sectional differences unless it be to promote local or party views which ought not to enter into our deliberations. They ought not to be alluded to or insisted upon. If it be true, as has been assumed, that there is a line of distinction and contrariety of interest between them, it is constantly changing. The whole State may cultivate sugar. The upper portion is as susceptible of that cultivation now as the lower portion was twenty years ago.

We are all citizens of the same State, interested in the same common cause, having the same kind of property, and navigating the same rivers. Where then is the necessity for these invidious distinctions? If all the wealth of the State was centered in the sugar region—if all the slaves were there, there might be some cause of apprehension. But this is not so; the largest and wealthiest parishes are engaged in the cultivation of cotton—the largest amount of capital is invested in that culture: for example, the parishes of Rapides and Concordia. I protest against such distinctions—I protest against arraying one portion of the country against another. Perhaps this idea may have grown out of the proceedings of another Convention where such feeling prevailed. There was, however, some peculiar reasons which engendered them there, that do not exist here. In one portion of the State of Virginia, the slave population almost exclusively predominate—in another portion, in the mountains, there are comparatively, but few slaves. Natural causes, then, promoted these distinctions. But in Louisiana we have nothing of that kind. Slaves are found all over the State.—Why attempt to create divisions between poor and rich? Why distinguish the occupants upon poor lands from the occupants upon rich lands? They are all citizens alike, and doubtless feel all equally interested in the prosperity and advancement of the State!

I have asserted that there has been a decrease in the slave population in many of the old parishes. To recur to that part of the subject: The parish of St. Bernard in 1840, had two thousand one hundred and thirty-seven; in 1843, but one thousand five hundred and twenty- St. Charles had in 1840, three thousand seven hundred and twenty-two; in 1843, three thousand seven hundred and forty-five. St. James in 1840 had five thousand seven hundred and eleven; in 1843, five thousand seven hundred and forty-nine. Jefferson in 1840, four thousand nine hundred and eighty-six; in 1843, three thousand nine hundred and sixty-four—a falling off of one thousand. St. John the Baptist in 1840, three thousand four hundred and forty-four; in 1843, three thousand four hundred and ninety-nine. St. Landry in 1840, seven thousand one hundred and twenty-nine; in 1843, seven thousand eight hundred and forty-three. St. Martin had in 1840, four thousand six hundred and forty; in 1843 she had five thousand two hundred and forty-two.

I have already alluded to the remarkable decrease of slave population in the city of New Orleans. In West Baton Rouge, notwithstanding all that we have been told about the great increase in population, we find that there has only been an increase in the slave population of six hundred and ninety-nine.

How can it be expected, that with a rule so erroneous as the census of 1840, that justice can be meted out to the north-west? If the withdrawal of two senators from that section be considered justice, I am at a loss to know what justice is! I am willing to concede much in order to settle this controversy, and if the motion of the delegate from Caddo prevails, the difficulty can be settled with the assent of all. If that motion should fail, I will then ask for the reconsideration of the vote assuming total population as the basis for senatorial representation, I will ask it as an act of justice from the majority, to place us back where we were before we made that concession, and that we may take a fair start.

Mr. Voorhies did not wish to detain the Convention further than to make a few remarks; to state some reasons why he thought the number of senators ought to be placed at thirty-two. He was always in favor of that number. From all the data we possessed, it appeared that with that number we could arrive at once to a just and equal apportionment. We were under the necessity of assuming, as a basis, the census of 1840. We had no other, and according to that basis, and in reference to the other senatorial districts, he could see no injustice in withdrawing one senator from the old Natchitoches district, and one from the old Ouachita district.

The delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) complains that great injustice has been done to his district. The proposition of the delegate from Assumption, (Mr. Taylor) provided that the next apportionment should be made in 1848, affording an early opportunity for a redress of any wrong that may have been committed in the present repartition. Why did the delegate from Ouachita object to that and propose 1855?

Mr. Downs: It was distinctly understood that the apportionment should remain as it was.

Mr. Voorhies: The gentleman complains that there is injustice done to his section of the State. If this be so, there is an effectual mode to prevent this injustice within a short period. Let the gentleman vote for the reconsideration of his own motion, fixing the re-apportionment in 1855, and bring it back to 1848. The present apportionment will be but temporary, and cannot produce any injury within two years. I have made a rough calculation in order to test the uniformity of that apportionment, and assuming eight thousand five hundred as the representative number, I find that all the various districts are entitled to their representation, with the exception of Ouachita and Natchitoches. I do not vouch for its accuracy, but here are its results. The parishes of Plaquemines, St. Bernard, and that portion of the parish of Orleans on the right bank have, according to the census of 1840, a population of eleven thousand nine hundred and eighty-nine. These parishes are clearly entitled to one senator, and have a fraction of three thousand four hundred and eighty-nine. St. Charles and St. John the Baptist have together a population of ten thousand four hundred and seventy-six, and they are entitled to one senator. The parish of Jefferson has a population of ten thousand four hundred and seventy; it is allowed one senator, and has remaining only a small fraction. I do not consider it entitled to more than one senator. Ascension and St. James have a population of fifteen thousand four hundred and ninety-nine; they are allowed two senators. There is a difficulty, but it is so small as to be scarcely worthy of consideration; and besides, it is more than compensated by the excess of population in St. Charles and St. John the Baptist. Assumption, Lafourche Interior and Terrebonne have a population of eighteen thousand eight hundred and sixty-one; they are entitled to their two senators, and have besides a fraction of eight hundred and sixty-one. Iberville and West Baton Rouge have a population of ten thousand and thirty-three; they are allowed but one senator, and the excess is transferred to the parish of Point Coupée, having a population of seven thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, which is allowed one senator. The three parishes combined are entitled to two senators, but they are entitled to no more; they have them. East Feliciana has a population of eleven thousand eight hundred and fifty-three; she has been allowed one senator, and she has a fraction remaining. West Feliciana has a population o ten thousand nine hundred and ten; she also is allowed one senator, and has over one fraction. East Baton Rouge has a population of eight thousand one hundred and thirty-eight; she has one senator allotted to her, and is nearly entitled to it. St. Helena, Washington, St. Tammany and Livingston have not the precise number to entitle them to the representation which they have received, but with the excess from East and West Feliciana, which is in the same section of country, they reach the necessary number, and I am willing to concede it to them. Avoyelles and Rapides are, together, entitled to two senators; the excess of population in the one supplying the deficiency of population in the other. St Martin has a population of eight thousand six hundred and seventy-four; she is entitled to one senator, and has a small fraction. St. Mary has a population of eight thousand nine hundred and fifty; she is entitled to one senator, and has a fraction of four hundred and fifty. The surplus may be transferred to the adjoining parishes of Vermillion and Lafayette, which are allowed one senator. St. Landry and Calcasieu have a population of seventeen thousand two hundred and eighty nine, and are entitled to two senators. Natchitoches and Sabine have a population of fourteen thousand three hundred and fifty, and in references to the parishes that we have examined, they are not entitled to two senators. One should be withdrawn from that district, and one from the Ouachita district, which is also deficient in population. This is shown by the statistics before us. Why increase the number of senators to thirty-four? Why give two districts two more senators than they are entitled to? Surely we are not to scramble after political power. If there is any injustice, it will be easy to rectify it by a reapportionment in 1848. The only principle by which I am governed, said Mr. Voorhies, is to do equal and impartial justice to all sections of the State. I have never been in that section of the couatry, and am governed by the data before me. The apportionment made under it is as correct as the nature of the case will admit, and if there be any wrong done, it cannot but be temporary.

Mr. M. Taylor trusted that the house would proceed to the final decision of this question. He conceived that the point at issue was not whether the number of senators should be thirty-two or thirty-three, but whether two more senators should be allowed to two districts than they appeared to be entitled to. If the question was, however, to be decided uaon the motion to reduce the number of senatois to thirty-two, he would vote in favor of that reduction, for he was in favor of that number; but he apprehended, that upon determining that question in the affirmative, it would only bring us back to the real difficulty, which was the withdrawal of a senator from the Natchitoches district, and one from the Ouachita district. He concurred fully in what was said as to the relative weight of the various sections of the State by the gentleman from Feliciana, (Mr Saunders.) He had listened to the remarks of the delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent) with some attention. In reference to the calculations of that delegate, I have not (said Mr. Taylor) taken the trouble to examine them; but I have little doubt that they are correct. I think the delegate should not have laid off the State into such large districts. When I proposed to divide the State into eight districts, the delegate from Rapides protested against it; and now I find, that for the purpose of securing a certain number of senators to a particular portion of the State, he is disposed to go further than I, who went the furthest. He proposes four districts. I did not concur with that gentleman as to the small districts that he advocated as his favorite system. But I disagree as far from him as to the formation of such large districts as those which he seems now to favor. Instead of eight districts as I proposed, he divides the State into four. The distribution might be very equal into four parts, and yet the distribution between these districts themselves—between the parishes of which each were composed, be quite unequal.

From the statistical detail presented by the delegate from Feliciana, we should be induced, if the motion prevailed, to reduce the number to thirty-two, to take the two senators from the north-west. Instead of a division into four parts, the delegate from Feliciana took the pains of making smaller divisions, and following out his plan, we find that if we group together the Attakapas and Opelousas parishes, they contain an aggregate population of from between forty-two thousand to forty-three thousand. Five senators are allowed to these parishes. The parishes of St. Charles, St. John the Baptist, St. James, Ascention, Assumption, Lafourche Interior, and Terrebonne, have a population of forty-four thousand eight hundred and forty-five, and have five senators. The Florida parishes have a population of forty-three thousand nine hundred and thirty-eight, including the parish of East Baton Rouge. Here we have three groups, each electing five senators. We now come to the north-western parishes—to the thirteen parishes in the north-west to which, under this apportionment, the house have voted seven senators. I do not pretend to say that the data before us determines with certainty the population of this particular portion of the State. They contain, according to the same sources of information, thirty eight thousand nine hundred and twenty-nine. Thus we find that one section contains forty-three thousand, the second section forty-five thousand, and the third, forty-four thousand; and to these several groups we allow five senators; while, for the thirteen north-western parishes, with a population of less than forty-thousand, seven senators have been allowed. This distribution must strike one as being in a high degree unequal. I think it is unequal, and therefore two senators should to be taken away. That will leave five senators for these parishes, which will give them an equal representation in the senate with the three groups that have larger populations. But we are met with the declaration, that they have increased in population. Gentlemen should hold in mind that other portions of the State have also increased. According to the data before us, it does not appear that the northwestern parishes are entitled to more than five senators. If injustice, however, has been done them, it will be but temporary; for by fixing the reapportionment in 1848, as originally proposed, they will obtain all that they are entitled to, and all inequalities will disappear when a census shall be taken for the purpose.

Mr. Porter moved to amend Mr. Benjamin's motion, by saying thirty-three instead of thirty-two, and called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of his motion.

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Carriere, Downs, Garrett, Humble, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott, of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane and Wederstrandt—34 yeas;

Mr. Downs moved to lay Mr. Benjamin's motion on the table subject to call, in order that he might move for the reconsideration of the vote assuming total population as the basis of representation.

Mr. Ratliff would vote against this motion, because he was desirous of fixing the number of senators.

The question was taken on Mr. Downs' motion, and it was lost.

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Legendre, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Waddill and Wederstrandt—28 yeas.

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Brumfield, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder—40 nays.

The question then recurred on Mr. Benjamin's motion fixing the number of senators at thirty-two.

Mr. Downs called for the yeas and nays:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Brumfield, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, Preston, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder—46 yeas.

Mr. Downs moved to substitute the report of the majority of the committee dividing the State into eight districts, for the proposition before the house.

Mr. M. Taylor said, I believe this is distinctly my project. It was rejected by a decisive majority, and I am opposed to reviving it at this stage of this proceeding and shall therefore move to lay it indefinitely on the table.

Mr. Downs deemed it proper to explain why he offered this proposition. I am satisfied that it is impossible to apportion the representation with any thing like equality in the north-western parishes if two senators be withdrawn. There is another reason, these districts cannot be divided without cutting off large minorities. It may be deemed necessary to take Jackson from the district to which it properly belongs and put it with the Red River parishes. It will be difficult to separate the parishes in my district, and to make such a combination of them with other districts as will be satisfactory to the people, Caldwell may be placed with Catahoula, which would be a combination not desirable to the citizens of the former, as there is a natural separation between the territories of those parishes. Another effect which I deprecate would be the breaking up of that uniformity which I have invariably advocated. They ought to be uniform. But if we take the apportionment in the section for which I have moved, as a substitute, the report of the majority of the committee, we shall have some districts with four senators, some with two, and some with one. Here we find two districts on the Lafourche and the adjoining parishes so combined that they will give senators all of one party; whereas, if they were separated they would be divided in political sentiment. Gentlemen disclaim party politics; they want no gerrymandering, and yet they use up two or three democratic parishes on the Mississippi, and will not let us have a bite. But when it comes to a large whig parish, they are for combining it in such a way that its strength will tell the most. I was opposed to placing Baton Rouge with the parish of Avoyelles. I thought that the report of the majority came from the other side, from the gentleman from St. James, (Mr. Winchester;) it originated with the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Taylor.) As I consider that the apportionment, as it has been made by the house, is effectually upset, I have made the motion to substitute the report of the majority of the committee. It contains a provision which is very acceptable, that the legislature shall divide the State into senatorial districts; whereas, by our present proceedings relief would be denied to the people for ten years.

Mr. Porter said it is impossible, Mr. President, for me to vote for the report of the majority of the committee. By their report, the parish I represent is embraced in a district extending from the mouth of the Arkansas to the Gulf of Mexico. No greater evil would result to the parishes on the Red river from a deprivation of their just representation in the senate, than from such a district.

Mr. Mayo was unalterably opposed to large districts.

Mr. Cade was willing, if the delegates from that part of the country desired it, that the sixth district—he believed it was the sixth district—he meant the district of Ouachita—should be apportioned according to the report of the majority of the committee. But otherwise, he was opposed to that apportionment by a distribution into large districts.

The question was taken on Mr. Miles Taylor's motion to lay Mr. Downs' proposition to substitute the report of the majority of the committee indefinitely on the table; and the yeas and nays were called for.

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Gade, Carriere, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Garrett, Grymes, Guion, Hudspath, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau,, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder—57 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Downs, Eustis, Humble, Legendré, McRae, O'Bryan, Preston and Splane—10 nays.

Mr. Bejamin then moved that one senator be taken from the district of Ouachita, and one from the district of Natchitoches; and that the remaining number of senators to each district be referred to the delegates of these districts to make the distribution.

Mr. Brent called for the division.

Mr. Garrett suggested that the parishes of Catahoula, and Franklin be embraced in the parishes among whom the distribution was to be made. That appeared to be just, inasmuch as a reduction was to be made.

Mr. Downs: Why this is a senatorial district of itself. If it be designed that they should also be victims, be it so.

Mr. Benjamin modified his motion that the thirteen parishes of the north-west have five senators in place of seven, and that the delegations from these parishes make the distribution and report by to-morrow.

Mr. Humble proposed that the parishes of Concordia, Madison, Tensas and Carroll be added to the thirteen parishes enumerated by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin) and that the senatorial representation be distributed among them.

Mr. Sellers said that these parishes had nothing to do with the thirteen parishes, which parishes, it was believed, had obtained more than their fair proportion of representation. Nothing of that kind could be urged against the parishes in his district.

Mr. Humble said, it seemed to him that a disposition existed to sacrifice that portion of a particular district that was weakest on this floor. He was sorry that such a disposition was manifested. As far as the parish of Caldwell was concerned, it would be subjecting her citizens to great inconvenience, to place that parish in connection with the parish of Catahoula, in forming a senatorial district. The citizens of Caldwell had no objections whatever to a political association with the citizens of Catahoula; but from natural causes, these two parishes were separated, and the union between them for political purposes, would be attended with great inconvenience. It would almost be as well to attach Caldwell to the parish of Plaquemines.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: The distribution of the senatorial representation will be referred to the delegation from the district, of which delegation the gentleman (Mr. Humble) will be a member, and his views will no doubt have great weight with the committee as to what district his parish ought to be united.

Mr. Downs sustained the motion to add the parishes of Carroll, Madison, Concordia and Tensas. There was nothing but justice in this proposition. The new combination affected a district of country extending to the Texas border. Several of the parishes embraced in the motion of the delegate from New Orleans, were taken in part from some of the parishes in the Concordia district. Franklin was taken from Madison, and Morehouse from Carroll. It will be difficult to make a satisfactory and just apportionment without bringing in that senatorial district, to whom two senators have been allowed. Carroll had but a small population. He did not pretend to say they were not entitled to the number allotted to them, but he considered they had no more a prescriptive right to that representation than the parishes of the north-west had to the number originally apportioned to them, a part of which had been withdrawn.

Mr. Sellers would object to this motion. There was a gulf between his district and that of the gentleman, (Mr. Downs) that separated them. They were as far apart as Dives and Lazarus. There was no connection; they were as much apart as two States. As for the smallness of the population, to which the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) had referred, I will simply remark that the disirict is amply entitled to its representation; in fact, more than entitled to its representation, as I can demonstrate by figures.

Mr. Benjamin sustained the motion of Mr. Sellers, to lay Mr. Downs' motion indefinitely on the table. The parishes of Concordia and Tensas, and Carroll and Madison were clearly entitled to one senator each. There was no contest as to that. It was established upon reference to the census of 1840. He could see no reason for adding these parishes to the thirteen parishes of the north-west, that were deficient in population, and for which a less partial apportionment is absolutely necessary.

The question was taken on Mr. Benjamin's motion to withdraw two senators from the thirteen parishes emanated on his motion, and to allow them five senators in place of seven.

Mr. Porter called for the yeas and nays, which were as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquié, Bourg, Brumfield, Burton, Cènas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder—46 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Cade, Carriere, Downs, Garrett, Humble, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prudhomme, Read, Sellers, Splane, Stephens and Wederstrandt—20 nays.

Mr. Brazeale would suggest, so far as the district of Natchitoches was concerned, that it was unnecessary to postpone action upon this question. Since it was determined by the house that the district of Natchitoches must yield a senator, he would state that the following distribution was the unanimous report of the delegation, to wit: that one senator be allotted to the parish of Natchitoches; one senator to the parishes of Caddo, De Soto and Sabine, and one senator to the parishes of Bossier and Claiborne.

On motion the house took a recess for the purpose of allowing the delegation from Ouachita to consult among themselves.

When the Convention resumed their sitting,

Mr. Downs stated that the delegation were unable to agree unanimously. Mr. Humble and himself concurred in recommending that the five parishes, to wit:—Union, Ouachita, Caldwell, Morehouse and Jackson form one senatorial district. Mr. Garrett, his other colleague dissented; that delegate proposed to add Jackson to Claiborne and Bossier, and Caldwell to Catahoula and Franklin, and to form a senatorial district of Union, Ouachita and Morehouse. Mr. Downs was opposed to dividing contiguous parishes in a district that had always been united, and transferring some of them to parishes with which they had no identity, and with which they would have to form new associations. He preferred that the district should remain as it was until a new census would enable it to obtain its just weight. There was more fitness in that than in the proposed division.

Mr. Garrett deemed it proper to offer a few words of explanation. His course course in relation to the formation of the senatorial districts, had not been dictated by political considerations, but by a sincere desire to promote what he conceived to be the wishes of his constituents. In that spirit he had proposed to form one senatorial district of the parishes of Union, Morehouse and Jackson, and the other district of the parishes of Ouachita and Caldwell. It was upon his motion that these districts were formed, and their combination was not at all calculated to subserve the interests of the political party to which he belonged. On the contrary, the result would be to the benefit of the other political party, but that consideration had no weight with him. He consulted only the convenience and wishes of the people. But a new combination had become necessary, inasmuch as one senator had been withdrawn from the district composed of those parishes, and consulting again what he conceived was for the greatest convenience of the people residing therein, the result would be a combination which might have a contrary political tendency from the first. That, however, would not influence him, and were he not convinced that it was the most proper course to take, in view of all the circumstances, he would concur with his two colleagues (Messrs. Downs and Humble) in their proposition. He was aware of his peculiar position in relation to this matter. The necessity for making another distribution than that originally suggested by him, of the parishes on the Ouachita, had been forced upon the delegation from those parishes by the Convention. It so happened, that the best distribution that could be made, might be promotive of a line of politics that were his own—that were different from those of his honorable colleagues, and different from those of the majority in this body. He trusted that his motives would not be misconceived, and that the reasons that induced him to come to the conclssion he did, would have their just weight with the Convention. His proposition was to unite Caldwell with Catahoula. There appeared to him to be some fitness in placing these parishes in the same district, inasmuch as two-thirds of the territory of the former were taken from the latter. The parish of Caldwell would be only returning to the parental bosom, and there could be no great difficulty in reviving former associations. In relation to the parish of Jackson, it was a new parish, and its territory was formed in part from the parish of Claiborne. It would readily unite with the latter, as, as yet it had formed no political associations. These two parishes transferred, the one to Catahoula and the other to Claiborne, the old district of Ouachita would be left with its originel elements. The old ties existing betwen its inhabitants would not be severed—the old territory would remain united, and the new territory would be placed in connection with territory from which it had in part derived its existence. There was another reason why this course should be adopted; the district composed of Claiborne and Bossier was but a small district—the same remark would apply to the district composed of Catahoula and Franklin—and the addition of Caldwell and Jackson to these districts, would make them bear a more relative proportion to the other districts; whereas, by placing all the five parishes together in one district, as suggested by his colleagues, it would make a district disproportionate in size and in population with the others. The territories of these districts, if the parishes are distributed as I propose, said Mr. Garrett, will be contiguous and compact, and adapted to the localities of the country. I have sunk on this, as on every other occasion since I have had the honor of a seat in this body, all political considerations. I am advocating what I consider just and proper. I am sorry to differ from my colleagues upon this matter; but these are the results of my solemn convictions, and if the politics of the district should not be conformable to theirs, it is the consequence of the necessity under which we act—of the distribution which has been forced upon us, and which should be made irrespective of all party purposes.

Mr. Humble conceived it necessary for him to explain his views in relation to this matter. It was doubtless expected from him by the house, and it was due to those he had the honor of representing on this floor. He represented the parish of Caldwell. The census of 1840 gave no adequate idea of the population of that part of the State, that was now about to be sacrificed. It afforded no just criterion upon which the Convention could or ought to act. The new parishes have sprung up since 1840; their populations have increased the most within the last two years; they have attracted a continued stream of population since that period. There are ten or twelve steamboats engaged in the trade with the country upon the Ouachita; the resources of that section of the State are beginning only to be fully developed. Every steamboat comes freighted with crowds of enterprising emigrants, and if a census were now before the house, the glaring injustice of taking the census of 1840 as any thing like an indication of the population of parishes that were then in their infancy—in their cradle, would be most apparent. Great injustice has been done by literally confining ourselves to that census—not to the old parishes of the State, because they have increased but little, but to the new parishes, where the increase has been in a far different ratio. But inasmuch as this has been done, let us not sacrifice the unity of our parishes—let us not divide our strength, but keep it together until a fairer apportionment shall do us that justice to which we are entitled.

In reference to Caldwell, he was speaking but the will of his constituents, when he said they did not wish to be severed from their past political connections. It was true, as had been stated by the delegate (Mr. Garrett) that two-thirds of that parish has been taken from Catahoula. But that has been eight or nine years ago, and new settlements have been formed, so that no connection between the two parishes can be properly said to exist. They are divided by an impassible swamp—the swamp of Catahoula, which is the abode of cranes and alligators.

The only connection between the parishes is on one side in the piney woods; there is some connection here where the old settlers are found; but in the new and flourishing settlements of the parish of Catahoula there is no connexion, and but little acquaintance. It is from no dislike to the people of that parish, that the inhabitants of Caldwell do not desire the connexion; but because they have had no association, and are cut off from any association by physical causes from the parish of Catahoula. The citizens of Caldwell desire to be attached to the parish of Ouachita. They have instructed me to that effect. I have not (said Mr. Humble) been influenced by political considerations in my votes, although I am a locofoco, and my colleage (Mr. Garrett) is a whig. That, however, has not influenced me. I think, irrespective of party politics, that the wishes of the people ought to be consulted in forming the districts. The parishes of Catahoula and Franklin are sufficient to form a district, and are entitled to a senator. Let them have it. And since from the necessity of the case, we must unite the five parishes of Union, Morehouse, Ouachita, Caldwell and Jackson together, or split them up and transfer them to other territory, I say, by all means, preserve them as they are. The proposition of my colleague (Mr. Garrett) is not satisfactory to me, nor will it be to my constituents.

Mr. Downs said he deemed it not improper to submit some other considerations to those adduced by his colleague (Mr. Humble.) It is true, as alleged, by my other colleague (Mr. Garrett) that Caldwell was taken from the parish of Catahoula. At first, she voted with Catahoula, but since the new apportionment, she has voted with Ouachita. The parishes of Catahoula and Caldwell are disconnected by the physical conformity of the country. There is an impassable swamp between them.

As for the parish of Jackson, although in part her territory is derived from the parish of Claiborne, there would be a want of suitableness in placing her in a district with that and another Red river parish. She is more immediately connected with Ouachita. Monroe is her town, and her business is centered in that town. The wishes of the inhabiants too, should be taken into consideration. Most of the inhabitants of Jackson are settlers of the old district of Ouachita. As my colleague (Mr. Humble) has said the people of Caldwell are wedded to their former associations; they would, if consulted, be disposed to be transferred to the territory of Catahoula. I trust that the old senatorial district will be maintained. If it be resolved upon to despoil that district of its just weight, be it so, but do not cut it up into fragments—into piece-meal—with a limb amputated, and sent to Red river, and another limb to Black river. Do not cut it up and divide it into minute fragments. I hope that this will not be done. Sufficient injustice is contemplated without that. Let the old Ouachita district remain as it is, even if it is to be shorn of a portion of its political power.

Mr. Downs then gave notice that he would move to reconsider the vote assuming total population as the basis of apportionment in the senate.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

Friday, April 4, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. Nichols.

The journal was read and approved.

Mr. Garrett then moved to reconsider the vote of yesterday allowing one senator to the parishes of Bossier and Claiborne.

He remarked that when the vote was taken he was not present.

Mr. PEETS, in objecting to the reconsideration, remarked that the county of Natchitoches had been allotted four senators, and the county of Ouachita three senators; after that, the delegates from each district met together, and with a view of meeting the difficulty that presented itself on this question, the county of Natchitoches had agreed to take off one senator. Mr. Peets desires to call the attention of the Convention to the fact, that the two districts are separate and distinct: the Natchitoches district from the Ouachita district.

The population of the county of Natchitoches is twenty-five thousand, they pay twenty thousand dollars into the treasury. The population of the county of Ouachita is twelve thousand, and they pay into the treasury about twelve thousand dollars. It is now proposed to reconsider the vote of yesterday, to saddle us unjustly with a parish that does not properly belong to us. He (Mr. Peets) objects to it; for it is wrong, and cannot be sustained on any fair or just principle. When you look at population, it is clearly out of all reason. When you look at taxation, that speaks equally for itself. The two districts are then totally different—they have no feeling in common. Besides all that, there is a natural division between them—a dividing line. In the parish of Claiborne the whole business is done on Lake Bisteneau; while that of the parish of Jackson has heretofore and naturally been done on the Ouachita river.

He desires to state to this Convention, that if the motion prevail, it wlll be an act of the grossest injustice to the county of Natchitoches in the first place; and in the second place, it will be equally unjust towards the citizens of the parish of Jackson. There would be a greater injustice in it, than meets the eye. Why take a man away from his natural habits and pursuits in attending to his political privileges? Why force a man in attending to those rights to go miles out of the way unnecessarily? That is the question: and to that, so far as it goes, I contend, said Mr. Peets, against the change, for if it be sustained, you force the people of the parish of Jackson to do that which they do not want, and which would be not only disagreeable, but inconvenient to them. Besides all that, it is known that farmers usually attend to their private and political business at one and at the same time; and there is no earthly necessity in forcing them out of their usual habits. Take the map and it will speak for itself. The parish of Jackson is totally isolated from Bossier and Claiborne.

These two parishes are increasing very rapidly, particularly the parish of Bossier; and there can be little doubt that in 1850 she will be entitled, by her population, to one senator alone. The increase has been greater in that parish than in any other part of the State; even the past year it has increased in population fully two thousand.

The parish of Jackson is about twenty-four miles square. He does not think it is right to keep her bandied about, but on the contrary, she ought to be kept where she now is. She is small, it is true, but that is no reason why we should commit an act of injustice to her; and assuredly it would be an act of flagrant injustice were we to do it. Besides taking into view the local position of the county of Natchitoches, it would not be right to attach any part of the county of Ouachita to it. He (Mr. Peets) feels sure that it will give great dissatisfaction to his constituents, and he will be blamed if the measure should pass, but not so with the delegate from Ouachita; (Mr. Garrett) for if he gets clear of the parish, he will at the same time get clear of their thunder.

Mr. GARRETT desired to explain the reasons which would influence him in proposing the annexing the parish of Jackson to the parishes of Claiborne and Bossier, as the delegate from Claiborne has gone into such an elaborate discussion on the subject. The county of Natchitoches arranged the matter among themselves, and doubtless they arranged it to suit themselves, in the deduction of the senator from their district; but that is no reason why a change should not be made if justice to the neighboring county required it. Now to do that we must add the parish of Jackson to the district comprising Bossier and Claiborne; for what equality would there be if on the one side we had a district composed of Claiborne and Bossier, and on the other of Catahoula and Franklin, while in the centre, consisting of five parishes, another district is formed in which there is one, the parish of Ouachita, which has a greater population than either of those in the district surrounding her.

He conceives that the first object in apportioning representation, should be to arrive as nearly as practicable at the same number of population; any other mode would be to gerrymander the districts. In proposing therefore to add Jackson to Claiborne and Bossier, he would also propose to add the parish of Caldwell to Catahoula and Franklin—then the territory and population of the three districts would be nearly equal. Let us see how they compare as at present laid off. Catahoula and Franklin have a population of four thousand nine hundred and fifteen. Claiborne and Bossier, six thousand one hundred and eighty-five; and Caldwell, Ouachita, Union, Morehouse, and Jackson, eight thousand four hundred and ninety-seven. The last district, it will be seen, has almost as large a population as the two first together.

Let us then in addition, examine the tax roll. Catahoula and Franklin pay three thousand nine hundred and seventy-seven dollars; Claiborne and Bossier, three thousand five hundred and sixty-nine dollars; while the parish of Ouachita alone pays four thousand two hundred and forty-two. If then the division be made as I propose, the taxation as well as the territory and population, will be about equal as it is; it is a crying injustice to leave one senator only to five parishes. He represents the whole district, and he desires that the voice of every parish in it should be heard on this floor. The cardinal point for us to attend to first is to act justly—and that can only be done by adding the parish of Jackson to the district before mentioned. It is admitted on all hands to be a small parish, although capable from the quality of its soil of considerable increase in the population. He does not regard the argument which is used about the citizens of Jackson feeling outraged at the separation from the Ouachita district, as worthy of consideration. And although it is also urged by the delegate from Claiborne, (Mr. Peets) that the citizens are desirous of voting with Ouachita, he must think from what has heretofore happened, that they are not very solicitous about it, for they have separated themselves from the parish of Ouachita and set up on their own account.

Now if we are to be governed by the basis of total population, or territory, or taxation, either separate or combined, there can be no justice in the apportionment if the plan I propose be not adopted.

Mr. Brazeale remarked, that if he understood this question, when the proposition was made to take two senators from the north-western parishes, a recess was had to enable the delegates to confer together and make an equitable distribution. The county of Natchitoches has a population of twenty-five thousand eight hundred, while that of Ouachita is but a little over twelve thousand. It was then determined that the former should be allowed three, and the latter two, making five in all, instead of seven, as reported by the committee; then they divided the districts out to suit themselves. He cannot see with what justice they now want to tack on another parish to Natchitoches, to increase the number of population, already greatly disproportioned. He shall most assuredly oppose it.

Mr. Benjamin regards the question thus: there are five senators to be allotted to thirteen parishes, and it was a matter of comparative indifference to us how they divided them out among themselves, so long as they all agreed about it; but as there is a difference of opinion among them, he thinks it is the duty of this Convention to interfere and settle it on fair and equitable principles instead of leaving it to them. At one time he thought the matter had been settled between them, but it turns out otherwise. It was proposed to give the parish of Natchitoches one senator, to which we agreed; one to Caddo, De Soto and Sabine, to which we agreed; then one was asked for Claiborne and Bossier, and I suggested that the parish of Jackson, if added, would make the district nearer equal; but to give only two senators to seven parishes, while we were giving three senators to six parishes, appeared to his (Mr. Benjamin's) mind an act of glaring inequality. However, when he heard that the matter was perfectly understood between them, he withdrew his motion.

It appears, however, that the difficulty has again arisen from some misunderstanding about the apportionment among those seven parishes, and he moves a reconsideration of the vote he refers to, given by him; for if they can't agree, we must endeavor to settle it fairly for them. It is now proposed to divide them thus: one to Claiborne and Bossier; one to Union, Morehouse, Jackson, Caldwell and Ouachita. We must endeavor to ascertain if that is a proper division prior to the reduction from seven senators to five. These parishes were divided by the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) in his his minority report, thus: Claiborne and Bossier one; Catahoula and Franklin one; Ouachita and Caldwell one; and Union, Morehouse and Jackson one, in all four senators, now to be reduced to three. The proposition is to leave two untouched and put two into one. He can hardly think that would be right, certainly it is not if the apportionment made by the delegate from Ouachita was correct before. It was then stated that Catahoula and Franklin had one-fourth of the population, and Claiborne and Bossier one-fourth; that would bring then this result, that the four parishes with half the population would have two senators; while the remaining five, with the other half, would only get one; that is certainly not right, on the very face of it; it must strike any one, at the first blush, that one-half gets two-thirds, while the other half only gets one-third.

There are five senators allotted to thirteen parishes, of which the county of Ouachita gets only two, the parishes of Catahoula and Franklin, forming part of that county. Now four parishes have had two allowed them, and it cannot be possible, if divided in a satisfactory manner before, that it can be equal now, to give those five parishes only one, for which before two were claimed as fairly due, at least unless some conclusive reason can be given for it. It is neither right for the present apportionment, nor the future. It will give those two districts too great power, and then, when the next apportionment is made they will contend that they ought not to be taken away, because granted now. He (Mr. B.) is opposed to giving them any plea for claiming two senators then, when they are not entitled to it now; while the other five parishes will have a good right to lay claim to two senators, on the basis we have established. It is a manner of reaching the point at a later period, to which they cannot now justly lay claim. These nine parishes should be equally districted, and not four by two senators, and five by one senator, for the parish of Ouachita alone pays more taxes than Claiborne and Bossier together; and what justice can there be in joining her to four other parishes, when those two are alone entitled to one senator? He thinks the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Garrett) has made out a very strong case to this house, and shown clearly that the object is to get another senator in 1848, which they cannot obtain now. He urges then the reconsideration of the motion adopted heretofore, allowing Claiborne and Bossier one senator.

Mr. Porter: I had thought that the question, as to the basis, was permanently fixed yesterday to be total population. Now, much as I object to that basis, if it be that by which we are to be governed, Claiborne and Bossier are fully entitled to one senator, for the seven parishes of the county of Ouachita contain a population of eleven thousand five hundred and seventy-five, or five thousand seven hundred for each senator. Claiborne and Bossier have a larger population, by one thousand, than that average. The county of Natchitoches has taken more than her proportion; we have taken eight thousand three hundred as the number for each senator; and he should consider it unjust to interfere with the parishes of Claiborne and Bossier.

Mr. Garrett remarked to Mr. Porter that there must be some error in his calculation, for he made the number of population in Ouachita county thirteen thousand four hundred and twelve.

Mr. Peets remarked that no one ever dreamt of such an idea as attaching the parish of Jackson to Claiborne and Bossier, until it was broached by the gentleman from Ouachita, (Mr. Garrett.) That parish had been formed out of the parishes of Union and Ouachita, with the exception of a very small part of it, and properly and naturally belonged to that district.

He could say in reply to the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) that it was not taxation, but total population which was the basis we have adopted, and Claiborne and Bossier have such an amount of population as to entitle them to one senator, when compared with the other districts. He does not see why they should be made the victims; for having a population of nearly seven thousand, they are fully entitled to it, and certainly if the rule is good for one, it is alike good for all.

Mr. Downs rose to offer his thanks to the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin) for the deep interest he had taken in the senatorial apportionment of the county of Ouachita, but while he assured us that he had no manner of interest in the matter, he had some how managed to make one of the closest analytical arguments against the plan proposed by a majority of the delegates of that county, that he had ever delivered in this house. He reminded him (Mr. D.) a great deal of the old woman, who, after having worked herself into a terrible passion, asserting at the same time: "You see how cool and calm I am."

But he hopes that gentleman will permit the delegates from that county to settle their own family differences, although he can well understand the motives that prompted his friendly interference in the matter, and what their tendency. The arguments of his (Mr. Downs') colleague appear to him either as untenable, or intended to operate in favor of the party to whom we are opposed in politics, and we cannot follow his plan without departing from the rule we have heretofore adopted, of not separating any of the parishes from the districts in which they have heretofore voted and properly belong. He proposes to take off Jackson on the one side, and add to Claiborne and Bossier; and Caldwell on the other and add to Catahoula and Franklin; to take a parish from one senatorial district and add to another; that has never been done, for even in the division of Attakapas they placed St. Mary and St. Martin together; Vermillion and Lafayette, and St. Landry and Calcasieu—that which you refused to do before, you now do doubly, and you might just as well say that Jackson and Caldwell should remain blank and have no election, for if thus placed among strangers their voice will not be heard.

There is another reason why he trusts the motion will not prevail, for if it does, we shall then have to reconsider the vote postponing the next apportionment until 1855, for that will certainly have to be done if we do, and he (Mr, D.) feels convinced that the parishes prefer, in that case, remaining as they are until a new apportionment is made in 1848 on the census of 1847. They would rather submit to the inequality than to have one parish taken from the district and thrown over to Red River, and the other to Catahoula and Franklin. He is satisfied that a large majority would prefer it.

His colleague is mistaken, if he thinks that the citizens of Jackson desire to have the district changed. It is not so. He has based his argument on a fact certainly that they have formed themselves into a separate parish, but his conclusions are erroneous, and not in accordance with their wishes; for they would avoid any such device, and repel it; for they are perfect strangers to those parishes to which you would attach them. There is not that inequality which is generally supposed between Catahoula and Franklin and the parishes of Ouachita, Union, Morehouse, Caldwell and Jackson; for if you take the census of 1840 for our guide, as it has been done, which I cannot but think is every way incorrect—(for in the parishes of Ouachita and Union, according to recent investigation, we have double the population reported in 1840)—but as it has been done by others in their arguments, I am of course free to use it myself, and by referring to it what do we find, why that the five parishes have a population of eight thousand four hundred and ninety-six; while Catahoula, alone, has a population of four thousand nine hundred and fifteen, without counting Franklin; and the two together do not vary more than one thousand from the full ratio. But if there were ten-fold greater inequality, they have a perfect right to require, if they will, that they should not be separated. He hopes that the motion to reconsider will not prevail. No senatorial district has yet been divided. Then why should ours be?

The delegate from New Orleans thinks we want an excuse to get another senator. Why, is he not satisfied with cutting us down two now, and does he wish and expect the proscription to last forever? Let me (said Mr. Downs) tell him that he need not trouble himself on that score, for they will have another apportionment before long, any how; and now that the line has been drawn, he expects to see the apportionment made in the strictest manner.

He will find himself mistaken if he thinks he can get another on his side of the question when that is done; he will have much less fun then than now. He (Mr. Downs) represents the whole district, and feels sure that Caldwell does not wish to be separated; but he relies more on the representations made by the delegate from Caldwell (Mr. Humble) for he comes direct from that parish, and he tells you emphatically that they do not want to make the change. Why then, should this Convention disregard their wishes?

Mr. Mayo said he was, perhaps, less interested in this distribution than any member from that section of the country; but the facts have not been stated correctly by any member, and he feels it his duty to lay them before the Convention, when it will be found that the difference is not so great as members suppose. In 1842 the parish of Franklin was formed out of the parishes of Ouachita and Catahoula, about eight hundred souls were thus transferred from the parish of Ouachita to the parish of Franklin. Now, if you take that number off of Ouachita and add to Franklin, it will materially alter the tables. What I state are facts.

If the division is made as proposed, the result would be that Claiborne and Bossier have a population, according to that table, of six thousand one hundred and eighty-five; the five Ouachita parishes, after deducting eight hundred off of seven thousand six hundred and ninety-seven, and Catahoula and Franklin of five thousand seven hundred and fifteen, and if that be correct, as he believes it is, for he thinks the whole of that country has increased in about an equal ratio, it will be seen that the difference is not so great as it would appear at first sight. For his part, he shall be equally contented, whether Caldwell is added to Catahoula and Franklin, or retained in the district, as proposed.

Mr. Benjamin takes the earliest possible moment of acknowledging that the lesson which the honorable delegate from Ouachita has taught him is deeply impressed on his mind; and he loses not an instant in making the amende honorable, and in saying that he was wrong in interfering in the family differences of the Ouachita delegation. But he trusts that delegate will pardon him, when he comes to reflect that he (Mr. B.) was only following the example set him by the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) himself. It must be remembered by that gentleman, and by every member of the Convention, that while the discussion was going on in the apportionment of the representatives for the city of New Orleans, the gentleman himself took a very active part in the debates, and showed us how much he was attached to our interests. When the present question came up for discussion, as none of my colleagues (said Mr. B.) seemed disposed to repay his kindness and attention in settling our family differences, I conceived it my duty from politeness alone, to endeavor to aid him through his troubles.

He complains of it—and I admit I was wrong—the lesson was a good one, and I withdraw from the discussion, but while I do so, I would fain hope that he himself will follow my example, and that when the question comes up on the senatorial representation of the city, he will be as mute as I shall hereafter be about the Ouachita parishes.

Mr. Garrett: My colleague (Mr. Downs) has told you that the parish of Catahoula has a population of four thousand nine hundred and fifteen alone; but he forgot to tell you what was the population of Franklin. The delegate from Catahoula (Mr. Mayo) further tells us that the parish of Franklin took eight hundred of the population of Ouachita from that parish; this is clearly all guess work, as there is no means of knowing.

In 1840 the Catahoula district had a population of four thousand nine hundred and fifteen. The Ouachita district eight thousand nine hundred and thirty-seven, and Claiborne and Bossier six thousand one hundred and eighty-five. Since that period there has been a rapid increase throughout that country; and certainly as great in Union, Morehouse and Ouachita, as in any other part, for my colleague says that there have been taken into the parish of Union alone as many slaves since the census of 1840, as there were inhabitants in it when the census was taken. If we are to take the fairest index to show the increase, it will be the comparison in the tax roll of 1843; then Catahoula and Franklin paid in one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven dollars and fifty cents; Caldwell three thousand nine hundred dollars; Ouachita four thousand two hundred dollars; and Claiborne and Bossier three thousand five hundred and sixty-nine dollars. The district then before us, the Ouachita district, paid as much as both the others put together.

He (Mr. Garrett) thinks also that no dissatisfaction does or will exist about connecting the parishes of Claiborne and Bossier with the parish of Jackson. There will be no ill-will about it, for it was formed out of the parishes of Claiborne, Union and Ouachita. They are intimately connected with each other, and are united in territory, and have no prejudice against each other, but the reverse; the very best of feelings reign between them; while on the other hand, if he is not very much mistaken, there will be great indignation if these five parishes are kept together, and only entitled to one senator. There is no justice in it, and he (Mr. G.) hopes this Convention will sustain his motion.

Mr. Mayo desired to call the attention of the Convention to an error, committed no doubt unintentionally, by the honorable delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Garrett.) The parishes of Catahoula and Franklin together, paid three thousand two hundred dollars taxes in 1843, and not the amount as stated; but he does not think that should be taken into consideration at all in this question; where we can only be governed by total population.

Mr. Miles Taylor thought upon looking more particularly over the tables, that we ought not to disturb the apportionment for the parishes of Bossier and Claiborne; for on the basis which we have determined to adopt, they have a total population, according to the census of 1840, of six thousand one hundred and eighty-five. The seven remaining parishes can be divided so as to leave three, with a population of six thousand nine hundred and thirty-four; and the remaining four with a population of six thousand four hundred and sixty-eight; leaving Caldwell, Catahoula and Franklin with only about seven hundred more, and Jackson, Ouachita, Union and Morehouse, with only two hundred and eighty more than we find in the first named parishes.

The question was then put on the motion offered by Mr. Garrett—and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquié, Bourg, Brumfield, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Mazureau, Penn, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, and Winder—26 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Downs, Eustis, Hudspeth, Humble, Ledoux, Lewis McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winchester—40 nays; so the motion was lost.

Mr. Humble then moved the adoption of the majority report, constituting, 1st, the parishes of Jackson, Union, Morehouse, Caldwell and Ouachita, one senatorial district with one senator; and 2d, the parishes of Catahoula and Franklin one senatorial district, with one senator.

Mr. Garrett moved to amend the motion by striking off the word "Caldwell" from the first mentioned district, and adding it to the second, to wit: the parishes of Catahoula and Franklin.

Mr. Humble deeply regretted that this motion had been made, and trusted it would not prevail; but while he shall endeavor to defeat, it will only be because he knows that his constituents in the parish of Caldwell are not desirous that such a change should be made. He remarked here, on a previous occasion, that there was a natural division between these parishes, but he did not mean for a moment to say that there were any unkind feelings between them; on the contrary, they were friendly and neighborly—the utmost friendship existed between them—and he believes he states that which is literally true, that the delegate from Catahoula, (Mr. Mayo,) is equally as popular in the parish of Caldwell as he is in his own parish. But he is endeavoring to call the attention of this Convention to the fact, that the citizens of Caldwell do not wish to have their political connection with the parish of Ouachita severed.

Before he left home, he heard many calculations made on the subject, and there seemed to be but one opinion on the subject. He (Mr. Humble) has been a citizen of that parish a long time; he has many a time rode thirty miles to help the early settlers of the country roll logs. He has been sheriff of the parish, and he professes to know their feelings and wishes on this sabject; and he hazards nothing in saying that it is their wish to join the parishes above in their representation in the senate. For these reasons, much as he esteems his colleague as a bosom friend, he is compelled with great pain, to move to lay the motion made by him on the table.

Mr. Lewis said, that whenever the delegates of any particular district could not agree among themselves, he thought it was the duty of the Convention to interfere, and do that which justice required; for, having laid down the rule on which we base representation in the senate to be total population, we should ourselves set the example for the legislature to follow. There is no one more desirous than he (Mr. Lewis) is, to accommodate the delegate from Caldwell, (Mr. Humble) if it could be done in accordance with the principle we have established. But it seems that the five parishes united give a total population of eight thousand four hundred and eighty-seven, while the parishes of Catahoula and Franklin have only a population of four thousand nine hundred and fifteen. It cannot therefore be just, with so great a disproportion in the population; but if Caldwell be united to Catahoula and Franklin, the population will be six thousand nine hundred and thirty-four, which is a much nearer approximation to an equal division than the former, and one we ought not to hesitate about adopting. It is his wish to comply, in all cases of apportionment, with the wishes of members from the different districts, when it can be done without injustice; but when one says it is unequal, and another says it is wanted by him in one particular way, to suit his constituents—when there is, I say, such a difference of opinion, we had better reduce it to figures; for, without you do that, you cannot divide, unless you make the division unequal. He thinks the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Garrett) has made out a case that is beyond dispute, and that the districts as moved for would be unfair and unjust, and consequently he shall vote for the motion to strike out the parish of Caldwell from the first mentioned district, and add it to the second.

Mr. Downs expressed himself as greatly surprised at the turn the debate had taken. He thought it was closed; but it seems to have been revived in a quarter in which he had least expected it. Surely the delegate from St. Landry had not forgotten that the Ouachita delegation had not attempted to interfere with him, when he proposed to attach the parish of Calcasieu to that of St. Landry, and thereby entitle her to two senators. Why, then, should he complain because the Ouachita district did not wish to be divided in her senatorial representation? He is the last man in this Convention whom he (Mr. Downs) would have expected to have taken that ground; for he had remarked that it was not right to divide the representation when the territorial connection was so great as it was in the parishes of St. Landry and Calcasieu. If it were so then, it is no less so in the parishes that we wish to keep together now. In point of territory, you have only to look at the map, and you will find that the parishes of Catahoula and Franklin are the most extensive of any senatorial district in the State, and that together they have larger boundaries than any other. Besides that, they are rapidly filling up. Black river is settling from one end to the other; and he should not be at all astonished, that there are more slaves taken into that settlement since 1840, than their inhabitants at that time.

Catahoula and Franklin are justly entitled to one senator. He (Mr. Downs) is always opposed to dividing any senatorial districts which are so closely allied as the Ouachita parishes, and hopes it will not be done. He feels sure it will not be acceptable to a large portion of the people in those parishes, to divide them.

Mr. Garrett, in reply, remarked that the natural position of the parishes of Catahoula, Caldwell and Franklin required that they should be kept together, and that he is of opinion they are not so much disposed to reject the alliance as some others think they are. On the western boundary, Catahoula extends the whole length of the parish of Caldwell; while on the eastern boundary, the parish of Franklin extends for a considerable distance. Thus, it will be seen, she lays, as it were, in the arms of her mother. He hopes, therefore, taking total population, territorial contiguity and taxation all into consideration, that the Convention will see the justice of the case, and adopt the amendment.

Mr. BRAZEALE remarked that there was great diversity of opinion on this subject, but as he thought it was not right to divide a district against its own wish, he should vote to lay the motion of the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Garrett) indefinitely on the table.

The question was then put, and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Downs, Humble, Ledoux, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—28 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brumfield, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of New Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—36 nays; so the motion to lay on the table was lost.

Mr. BRAZEALE then moved to put the whole seven parishes together, and form one single district with two senators.

Mr. HUMBLE said that would be more srtisfactory than the proposed division.

Mr. MAYO moved to lay the motion indefinitely on the table.

After some few remarks from Messrs. Mayo, Downs, Guion, Brazeale, Beatty, Humble and Garrett,

Mr. BRAZEALE withdrew his motion.

The question then recurred on the amendment offered by the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Garrett,) and the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brumfield, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—37 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Downs, Humble, Ledoux, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Soulé, Splane, Voorhies, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the negative—27 nays; so the motion prevailed; and Catahoula, Franklin and Caldwell form one district, with one senator; and Ouachita, Union, Morehouse and Jackson, one district, with one senator.

Mr. DOWNS then moved to reconsider the question, in reference to apportionment being made after the year 1855: that no parish shall be divided so as to be included in more than one district; that the number of senators shall not be less than twenty-five, nor mone than thirty-four, to be allottel according to the population of each district; and that no parish shall have more than one-eighth of the total population.

Mr. DOWNS moved to strike out the words "after 1845," and insert instead "in every year in which they shall apportion," &c.

Mr. CULBERTSON inquired if the number of senators was not to be thirty-two instead of thirty-four?

Mr. CONRAD considered thirty-two a sufficient number, and would move to insert that as the limit.

Mr. RATLIFF considered that as the house had decided upon the number thirty-two, it would be as well to fix it for the present at that number. He thought it improper to leave the power of increasing the number of senators to the legislature; at the same time, he deemed it necessary that they should have the power of equalizing the several senatorial districts, so as to meet the exigencies that might arise hereafter. It was impossible to foresee the dangerous results that may be the consequence, if the power of either increasing or diminishing the number of the senate were left in the hands of the legislature.

The political power of a section of the State might be wrested from it; he therefore hoped that the number thirty-two would be permanently fixed, so that no power will be left to the legislature, but that of equalizing districts from time to time, as increase of population and other causes may require.

Mr. Lewis moved to amend the clause, by inserting after the words "number of senators" the words "shall be thirty-two;" which was adopted.

Mr. O'Bryan moved to strike out "total population," and insert "electors;" but his motion was out of order, the amendment having been already rejected. He contended that, inasmuch as the basis was never before the house, it could not be said to have been rejected. After some remarks from several gentlemen, the decision of the chair prevailed.

Mr. M. Taylor called for the adoption of the section.

Mr. Downs wished to include an additional provision in the section, in reference to the senatorial apportionment. The secretary having read the project,

Mr. Benjamin moved that it be laid on the table, subject to call, with a view to have it printed and laid before the members. Carried.

Mr. Lewis asked, if he was then in order, to move a reconsideration of the vote on dividing the city of New Orleans into three districts—having voted in the minority; or whether he should give notice to that effect?

Mr. Benjamin said that Mr. Mazureau had already given notice to that effect.

Mr. Preston said, as there had been no direct vote taken on inserting "qualified electors," as the basis of senatorial apportionment, and as, when the question of "total population" had been brought up, he voted for it, in a spirit and with a view to effect a compromise with gentlemen from other sections of the State; and now, that one of the principles involved had been taken out of the clause, namely: a new apportionment being made in 1848—he hoped that the house would not object to reconsider the vote upon that question. He had voted against it under a wrong impression, and he was anxious to be set right before his constituents; and the question now, of taking up the vote to reconsider, with a view to insert "qualified electors" in lieu of "total population," would give every delegate an opportunity of declaring himself as he wished to appear before his constituents.

The rules of the house having been dispensed with, on motion of Mr. M. Taylor, the question for reconsideration was put, and the yeas and nays were called for; when

Messrs. Brazeale, Burton, Brumfield, Cade, Carriere, Downs, Humble, Ledoux, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of East Baton Rouge, Scott of East Feliciana, and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—23 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brent, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Hudspeth, King, Legendre, Lewis, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Soule, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—37 nays; so the motion was lost.

Mr. Taylor then moved the adoption of the clause, and his motion prevailed.

Mr. Lewis moved to amend that part of the section dividing New Orleans into four districts, by inserting "that all that portion of New Orleans on the left bank of the Mississippi shall be one senatorial district, and shall return four senators." He knew this to be a subject which had created a good deal of jealousy and dissatisfaction in the country. The city of New Orleans being a distinct political corporation, had no right to be divided into separate districts no more than had the country parishes, and these have not been divided except where in some few instances it could not be avoided, and where the representatives from that section of country had required or were in favor of it. He felt some degree of surprise indeed, that such a proposition had ever been made at all; had any such proposition been offered to divide a country district, we should have heard a general expression of astonishment at it. The country looks on the city with a vast deal of jealousy, because they justly consider that wherever a dense population is crowded into a small space, they obtain unjust and undue political advantages; thus New Orleans by this means has a preponderance over the balance of the State. In the organization of the house of representatives, the city was divided into nine electoral districts; and now an attempt is made to divide her senatorial representation in three districts. This was in his opinion proceeding in violation of that principle laid down by them at the outset, "that representation shall be equal and uniform in this State." The allotment of representative power already made in favor of New Orleans appeared to him to admit of a good deal of questioning as to its justice when taken in comparison with other portions of the State. He admitted the justice and necessity of restraining commercial communities, but in this instance he would say that if New Orleans is to be divided at all, let her be equally divided; let it not be said that one portion within her limits, which has now nearly reached its acme, shall have double the number of senators that you give another and rapidly growing quarter. He hoped sincerely that if they divided at all, they would do so by placing each section as near upon a footing of equality as possible; as equally as the country parishes were apportioned at least, and not have this glaring instance of inconsistency manifest in their proceedings. This was what he wanted to effect, and he trusted that his motion would prevail.

Mr. Marigny desired to offer his thanks to the honorable delegate who had preceded him, for the lively interest he appeared to feel in the welfare of the city, but at the same time could not agree with the ideas he had advanced as to the necessity of interfering with the apportionment of the senate as at present laid off. He is sometimes in doubt whether a division of the city has been beneficial, when he looks at the amount of debt which some parts of it are encumbered with. But he then stops, and comes to the conclusion that those who are the most interested in it must be the best judges. That point settled, let us now look at what the population of the three municipalities consists. According to the last census, the first municipality had fifty thousand, the second twenty-two thousand, and the third twenty-eight thousand. Hence I am bound (said Mr. M.) to come to the conclusion that a fair division out of four senators, is two for the first, one for the second, and one for the third. It will be then clearly seen that my views and those of the delegate from St. Landry are at utter variance: and that while he desires to do so much for us, he actually proposes nothing at all, unless he wishes that the ten or fifteen thousand floating population from Europe and the northern States, who inhabit the second municipality, like so many birds of passage, should swell their vote to the injury of the other two municipalities. He (Mr. Marigny) thinks it better in such a case, and fairer towards all to let each municipality elect their proper proportion of senators, as provided for already in the section, for assuredly if the principle contended for, of electing the senators by general ticket prevail, the first and third municipalities will be sacrificed for the benefit of the second, and he will oppose any measure calculated to bring about that result. We have never interfered with the country districts; why then should they interfere with ours? They separated the two parishes of East and West Feliciana, because they said their interests required it. We acceded to it. Then why should they not allow us to do the same thing, when we show them that the interests of the three municipalities are not only not identical, but antagonistical in some respects?

Already have we heard murmurs of dissatisfaction at some of the provisions of our new constitution. It is not in the province of this Convention to sow the seed that will increase such murmurs. Let us rather avoid such a course, and carry our work to a successful termination. We cannot do it by increasing the difficulties, and we shall assuredly do so, if we pass any unjust provision as to the rights of any of the municipalities of New Orleans.

On motion of Mr. Roselius, the Convention adjourned until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

Saturday, April 5, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and the proceedings were opened with prayer.

Mr. Downs called the attention of the house to the imperfect manner in which some of the official reports of the debates were made. The evil had become intolerable. Neither the language nor the ideas of members were given He referred particularly to the debates of the 31st March. If the public were to take these debates as a faithful narration of what took place in this body, they would form a very humiliating idea of its proceedings. They would infer that its members were in a constant struggle. Language was put in the mouths of members that never was employed by them—that gentlemen never used, and which gentlemen could not use. He did not know what to suggest; but it was manifest that some remedy ought to be employed.

Mr. Saunders said, in the few remarks made by him on the 31st March, his reasons were not such as were assigned to him in the reports of the proceedings of that day. He never said what is there imputed to him. He never said "that it was evidently a political combination for political purposes." What he might have said was this, "that it might bear possibly that appearance."

Mr. M. Taylor said that these reports went before the people, and some greater reliance was placed upon them from the fact that they were prepared by officers especially appointed by the house, to consign what actually took place—to give, if not the precise words, at least the arguments and opinions of members as they were delivered. It was unpleasant to complain, but in the present instance it was impossible for a member to recognize in the printed debates of the proceedings, the remarks he may have made. It was impossible, in point of fact, to assign the paternity of these remarks to the individual to whom they were attributed in the report. In the debates of the 31st March, his (Mr. Taylor's) arguments upon the subject of senatorial apportionment were not such as were reported. In the printed report many things that he did say were omitted—some things he did say were perverted—and the language employed to convey his meaning was ungrammatical. In five lines he was made to make two assertions that he never made. He never said "he was satisfied with the apportionment"—that "it was the feirest that could have been made." He did not say, with the facts before the house, that it was absolutely unfair, but he certainly did not make the contrary assertion.

Mr. C. M. Conrad was satisfied that it was impossible for any one but a stenographer, to take down the debates with that accuracy which was essential. As soon as he had learned that the gentlemen employed were not stenographers, he was disposed to do away with the reporting of the speeches altogether. He had no doubt that the individual complained of, had done his best; but, it was exceedingly difficult to make correct reports, without a knowledge of stenography. At first, he had been in the habit, occasionally, of looking at the speeches made. He was convinced they were as well done by the first reporter as they could be done by any one not a stenographer. Of late, he had not looked at the report of the debates, and he knew not how far he had suffered, but presumed he had not shared a better fate than other gentlemen.

Mr. Roselius: It is unnecessary to discuss this matter. Let us remove the reporter that has shown his incompetency.

Mr. Claiborne: The best course is to abolish the office. I think two reporters in English unnecessary, and that the duty would be better performed alone by the gentleman now reporting, who is fully capable.

Mr. Kenner said he was sorry to join in the out-cry raised against one of the reporters. But in the debate referred to by the gentleman, he (Mr. Kenner) was made to say what in fact he did not in fact utter, and, he should be sorry that the impression should be taken up that he employed the language attributed to him.

Mr. Ratliff suggested that it would be better for the reporters to submit the debates to the members who may have spoken, in order to be revised by them. This was the course pursued in congress when set speeches were made by the members. It was very difficult to report the remarks of gentlemen that spoke with the fluency and rapidity of the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin.) Sometimes too, he (Mr. Ratliff) remarked that some of the best speakers in the Convention, made use of phrases or expressions that were not strictly parliamentary. In reference to himself, he paid no particular attention to the manner in which his remarks were reported. But he remembered, on one occasion, upon looking into the reports, to have seen an anecdote related by him, so distorted as scarcely to be recognized by himself or those of his constituents to whom it was familiar.

Mr. Claiborne remarked that there was but one French reporter, and that he performed as great a labor, and in one sense a greater labor, than the English reporters, inasmuch as he had to translate what was said from English into French. He conceived that the first reporter would perform the duty of reporting much better alone.

Mr. Lewis complained, that for some time past, not a solitary speech delivered by him had been reported as he had spoken it. The report of the first of April, made by Mr. Kerr, contained the substance of what he might have said, pretty much in the same style as the letter writers at Washington would have employed to have announced the debates upon some question that was agitated in congress. His arguments were not given. It was his deliberate conviction that the reporters were too lazy, or were unwilling to perform the duty assigned them. If this were so, where was the use of keeping them? The publication of some of these reports were calculated to place the members of the Convention in a ridiculous point of view. To make them appear like school boys at the hornbook—as uttering the veriest nonsense—the most trifling puerilities; and all this not only appeared in a public paper, but likewise was consigned in a book form which would doubtlesss figure largely hereafter, as the proceedings of the Louisiana Convention! Truly, we were making ourselves an object of ridicule by these reports! He would renew the motion of the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Roselius.) One of the reporters was utterly incapable of performing the duty. He made us say the reverse of what we actually said, and that in a language by no means remarkable for its accuracy. I doubt not, continued Mr. Lewis, we are laughed at for all this jargon and nonsense, as we would deserve to be, if we were indeed guilty of uttering it. It is a tissue of nonsense! Mr. Kerr was tolerably correct, and at first I was satisfied with his reports: but of late he has become remiss. I believe him capable, and hence I do not include him in the motion; I trust for the future he will be more exact.

Mr. Beatty said he considered Mr. Kerr not much more correct than the other reporter. He had endeavored at first to have him removed, but having been unsuccessful, he had not troubled himself of late much about the reports. Before the appointment of Mr. Ilsley, he had in several instances remarked Mr. Kerr's report of his observations, and his meaning, as well as his language were totally perverted. He certainly bore that gentleman no personal ill will. He had no particular acquaintance with him. He did not believe the reports were correctly done—that justice was done to the proceedings of this body. For that reason he hoped that both reporters would be discharged, not only because they were both incompetent, but for the purpose of perventing them from being elected in a similar capacity by either of the legislative bodies.

Mr. Soule said, that if there was a member of this body who was authorised to complain before all others, that member was himself. It was not often that he troubled the Convention with any remarks. On the only occasion that he had spoken, what he had said was reported by a bad translation from the French, in which it was impossible to discover the traces of any of his ideas. He had consoled himself in the humiliating position in which he was placed, by the reflection, that the production bore upon its face what it really was, and therefore he would not be held accountable for its glaring defects. At the same time, he admitted that some excuse might be urged for the reporter to whom he alluded. He believed that it was from no want of zeal, nor from any indisposition on his part to give satisfaction. He thought that there was a means less harsh to attain the object proposed by gentlemen. Let us lay the resolution on the table, and if by Monday or Tuesday next no remedy suggests itself, it will be time enough for us then to act.

Mr. Wadsworth said that his eye happened to fall upon some remarks purporting to have been made by him on the 31st. He would read the following extract. Comment was totally unnecessary.

"He (Mr. Wadsworth) thinks the delegate from Ouachita does not meet the question properly, nor in the proper spirit. He says all those who have two, may be interfered with. Now that is not the way to meet a question like this; we want permanency, we want it fixed distinctly and permanently."

Mr. SOULE: I ought to add, that in what I have said, I refer neither to the reporter in English that was first elected, nor to the reporter in French, whose reports have been faithful and exact.

Mr. CLAIBORNE suggested, that as these reports were to be consigned to posterity, whether it would not be well to require the acting reporter to revise and correct them.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD replied that it was too late to make any corrections.

Mr. SOULE's motion was then adopted, laying Mr. Roselius' motion upon the table.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Apportionment of the city into four senatorial districts.

Mr. ROSELIUS said: Mr. President—Having the misfortune to differ with two of my colleagues in opinion, upon the subject under debate, I deem it proper, in a few brief remarks to state the grounds upon which I base my views of this matter. I consider, sir, that New Orleans is one city; that the interest of one part is the interest of the whole city; that what conduces to the benefit of one part, necessarily conduces to the benefit of the whole. I can safely assert that the greatest curse that has ever fallen upon this city has been its division into separate municipalities.—That division has caused more evil, and has done more to prevent the development of the interests and resources of the city, than any event that has ever taken place. If it were necessary to enter into a minute investigation, it would be no difficult task to show the awful results that have flowed from that unadvised and impolitic measure. A thousand evils have resulted from that circumstance. I do not believe there is a reflecting man, expressing his sincere convictions, that would not agree with me, that it has done more mischief than any thing else. Can any person reflect seriously and say that a city situated like New Orleans ought to be divided in policy, in government, and in interest? Can any honorable gentleman refer to any act of general legislation in which the interests of the city clash, and in which one part of its interests are adverse to another part? I have reflected in vain to discover any subject of general legislation in which such a conflict may arise.

If there be no conflict, no clashing of interest, why destroy further the unity of the city? Why divide it into three senatorial districts? What is the object of this division? What is the design of having a senate at all? The design is, that its members being selected by a larger constituency, and it being composed of men of more matured age, they will not be operated upon by local considerations; that it will take a more enlarged, a more comprehensive view, and that it will therefore operate as an effectual check upon the hasty legislation of the lower house. That is the reason; that is the principle why the legislature is divided into two branches. If you then subdivide the city into three senatorial districts, you establish no material difference, so far as the city is concerned, between the upper and lower house. You make the senate superfluous. Where is the necessity of having the two houses if the constituency are to be identically the same—if both bodies are to represent the same number of persons, and the same local districts? These are but elementary principles, which lie at the foundation of government itself. My honorable colleague (Mr. Mayo) adduced yesterday, what he supposed to be strong arguments in favor of the division of the city. I think that his arguments favored the converse of the proposition. What did the honorable gentleman say? He said that he had opposed with all his might the division of the city into districts, for the election of members to the house of representatives. That he deplored that division as a great evil. That it was a wrong inflicted upon the city, forced upon us by the delegates from the country. That it was done under the pretence of dividing the concentrated power of the city. He concedes all this. He concedes that the division was impolitic and inexpedient; that it is an evil. If this division be an evil, and that he admits, how can any man in his senses say that the division of the city for its senatorial representation is not a like evil? If you are opposed to one; if you think it prejudicial and pernicious, how can you consistently approve the other, which is still more pernicious and prejudicial? The arguments of the gentleman (Mr. Marigny) were strong, but they did not lie in support of his position. They established the very reverse. Gentlemen from the city very properly opposed the division of the city into nine representative districts. They raised a clamor, and did so very properly, because that measure was eminently calculated to injure the city; to destroy her proper weight in the councils of the State. How can gentlemen that took that ground, now say that it is promotive of the welfare and well being of the city to divide her into three senatorial districts. They were opposed to dividing the city into representative districts, and are yet in favor of dividing her into senatorial districts. The fallacy of such a proceeding is too palpable to require argument. It lies at the very surface. It is obvious and palpable. It scarcely requires reflection.

Has any thing been advanced by those of my colleagues with whom I have the misfortune of differing upon this question, showing that it is to the interest of the city to be divided into senatorial districts? They say that one municipality, (meaning the second,) may obtain an undue influence.—The gentleman (Mr. Marigny) uses that argument, but he forgets that his assertion is destroyed by the very figures he employs to sustain it. He tells us truly that the first municipality has a population of fifty-thousand souls; that the second has a population of twenty-two thousand souls, and the third a population of twenty-nine thousand souls. Now, sir, I would ask, does the relative populations of the three municipalities afford any just grounds of apprehension of the overwhelming and absorbing influence of the second municipality? How do the facts stand as to the disposition or the power of that municipality to control the other two, up to the present time? The city has in this body eleven delegates, chosen without reference to party politics, and there is not a single delegate residing in that municipality. And yet we are told that we must guard against the overwhelming influence of the second municipality! Here are the plain facts, in opposition to the theories of gentlemen. They cannot be controverted.

But the gentleman (Mr. Marigny) has dwelt much upon the progress of the second muninipality. He thinks it will outstrip the others. I do not take that for granted; and if I did take it for granted, is there any thing wrong that the greatest numbers, and largest amount of property, should have the controlling power? Let us be consistent. Let us not squabble upon illusory apprehensions. I do not own one inch of ground in the second municipality; all my interests are centred in the first; but I should consider myself unworthy of a seat in this body were I to permit myself to be governed by sectional considerations, if I were to suffer them to influence a single vote of mine. I am opposed, irresistibly opposed, to any further division of the city for any purpose.—And why should it be divided at all?

The basis of apportionment fixed for the senate is total population. For the purpose of circumscribing what is considered the undue influence of the city upon the legislature of the State, it is prescribed that she shall not have more than one-eighth of the representation in the senate, when, in point of fact, she is entitled to upwards of one-third. But we do not complain, and we submit so her being curtailed. We have made that concession. We have consented to take one-eighth in place of one-third, to which we are entitled. Is not that enough? Must the four senators allowed to the city be divided among the three municipalities? If gentlemen consider that justice, their ideas of justice differ from mine. The result of such a division will be, that the city, as a city, will no more be represented in the senate, than she will be in the house of representatives. The representation from the nine representative districts of the city will be nothing but a local representation. It will represent only the particular representative district. Where will the city be represented as a whole, as an unit? No where. The city will not have a single representative. You split us up into nine representative districts for the house of representatives, and then, where at least the city should be represented as an unit, in the senate, you go still further, and divide the city into four districts. I ask, and insist upon an answer, where is the justice of such a proceeding? Shall this vast city, with all her important interests, be without a representative in either branch of the legislature? A city which is constantly enlarging, and whose great resources are developed from day to day. This seems, of all the measures yet attempted against the city, the most oppressive, and the most unjust, not even excepting the ban placed upon her by which she is disqualified from ever again becoming the seat of government. I know of none so utterly opposed to every notion of justice that I have formed.

Another objection (said Mr. Roselius) that I have to the division of the city into several senatorial districts, is that this division of the State into senatorial districts, is no temporary affair. It is to last—it is to continue, and the increase of population in one district of the city will not entitle it to any augmentation in its senatorial representation. Will that be just? I doubt much whether any gentleman will pretend to say that such a result is consistent with justice or equity!

But it is said, or intimated rather, that in the fluctuation of parties, one of the political parties may get in the ascendant, and deprive the other party of all chance of entering the senate. I disclaim all considerations of this nature. In opposing the division of the city for senatorial districts, I am not influenced by any party motive. I oppose it because I consider it like all other divisions of the city, fraught with incalculable evils.

With the view of satisfying all objections, and to obviate the apprehensions of some gentlemen that the result of the general ticket system might be, that all four senators would be chosen in one municipality, I will propose a proviso to the proposition of the member from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis) that one senator shall be taken from each municipality—the whole four to be elected by general ticket, as proposed by that delegate.

Mr. Roselius then offered his amendment.

Mr. Soule: I expressed upon a former occasion what were my views and opinions in relation to the question now before the house. I have since that time seriously reflected upon the measure proposed by the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) and which is supported by the gentleman that has just resumed his seat. I have examined the question without reference to political considerations, and I may claim without vanity, the merit of never having interfered in the political questions that have been discussed in this body. I could not bring my mind to that standard of political feeling which would govern my vote upon any question that might arise in our deliberations. I do not impute political motives to any; but for myself I may say in truth and sincerity, they do not weigh with me a feather!

The first question we should resolve seems to be what is the basis of apportionment for the senate. One would naturally conclude from the discussion that has taken place, that what has been done, has been destroyed, and that we have assumed a different basis from the one we adopted. The logical powers of the gentleman (Mr. Roselius) have in vain been employed in favor of any other, and the attempt to connect any other with the question of large districts, cannot have any weight in influencing our judgments. Sir, the great question of property—whether mind or matter should be represented, is at an end. It is beyond the discretion of this house. We have adopted the basis of electors for the lower house, and total population for the senate. Here we have a point de depart. We are to determine according to the personality and not according to territorial extent. We are not called on to make an apportionment in reference to territory, but an apportionment in reference to personality. Now, sir, in establishing the divisions in the apportionment to be made, it is a safe and sound rule, to establish them according to the natural divisions which that personality presents. The question then resolves itself into this: Has the personality of New Orleans but one feature, which is so identical in all its parts, as to have but one interest to be represented? If this be the case, then I yield the point! It has been said that New Orleans is but one city. I shall not wage war with names. It is true that it constitutes but one city. But do you know what that is owing to? Its existence under its name of New Orleans, has been constitutionally secured. Otherwise that would have been destroyed. At one time, the city of New Orleans was but a single corporation. At the time to which I would allude, the second municipality, as the faubourg St. Mary, had scarce begun its progress. The old corporation was the richest body that ever existed in the United States. Yielding to considerations of the general prosperity, and with unexampled liberality, that corporation divided its treasures with the rising faubourg. But how was it recompensed? It was despoiled of its treasures. Its immense wealth was swallowed up in the improvements of that limb of the city, and when it was reduced to a skeleton, to use the language employed by my friend yesterday, and had nothing more to give—when all its means had been exhausted for improvements, it was then suggested by that section which had been so liberally favored, that the city be divided, and at its pressing and assiduous solicitations, that measure was effected. I remember (said Mr. S.) that in 1836, when a large portion of the means of the old corporation had been absorbed in the making of wharves in the second municipality—when many of its streets were paved, there was not a stone in Royal street! I should suppose that the fact that the division of the city was asked for and was determined upon, is conclusive that there was no identity of interests. Or else why was it demanded? By whom was it sought for? By the second municipality, and it was resisted by the city proper as far as resistance could be available!

It was accomplished, and the very first step was an act of most glaring injustice to the old city. The very lines of its corporate limits were changed; they extended as far as Common street, but by the act of separation, the boundary was run from the middle of Canal street, from the river to the lake. Ever since that period, all the zeal of the second municipality has been enlisted, and it has struggled with herculean power to draw all the advantages from the old city. Instead of one city, by the act of division, we have three cities. The part of New Orleans has been changed and carried up to the borders of Lafayette. The natural consequence of the division into separate and distinct municipalities, has been to excite a feeling of rivalry, which has reached a point where there is no identity of interest between them. Far from me to say or to intimate one word in disparagement of the inhabitants of the second municipality. They have advanced with giant strides. I admire their energy and indomitable perseverance, and what I wish is, that the old population which is so fast receding, would only be stimulated by their example! But I cannot consent that the second municipality have absolute sway over the two other municipalities—that she should absorb and engross to herself their political power, without attempting to avert the calamity.

Now, sir, I wish the Convention not to lose sight of the fact that this difference of interest is not the only difference between the three municipalities. It has been asserted on this floor that there is another difference. That the municipalities are not inhabited by identically the same population, and that is true in some respects. If total population be the basis, how can it be expected that populations said to be so different, can be represented by a general ticket? It is a fundamental principle, that all interests should be represented in a political community; that all are entitled to protection. I would rather yield that protection to those most in want of it! When I say this, I speak relatively; for one of these municipalities will always be able to take care of herself! When the others may need protection, they must look for it elsewhere!

I have said before, that in the political contests, three distinct features distinguish the three municipalities. The third municipality is quiet—without excitement, and with little disposition to intermeddle. The first municipality, as you progress up, step by step, presents features of greater excitement, and in the first ward, approaches nearest to the second municipality. In the second municipality, the art of manufacturing voters is a perfect system: it is reduced to a rule, and the savoir faire is well understood. No human art can baffle these designs upon the ballot box!

If it can be shown that the second municipality is entitled to two senators, let her have them. Let her be represented equally with the first municipality. If this can be established, I shall be up among the very first to sustain her pretensions? If the first and third municipalities were to have but one senator, that one would, at least, represent their interests and be responsible to them?

Now, sir, what is the object contemplated by electing the five senators by general ticket? I will not say that a political object is sought for. I am disposed to place it on a different footing. We have been told that the division of the city is the greatest curse that has ever been inflicted upon the city. I have always been of that opinion. But the thing is accomplished—it is done. It was consonated despite of the protestations of the city proper, and it defeats all the arguments that have been adduced by my friend and colleague, (Mr. Roselius.) It overcomes all his logic: for it is a fact, and what he urges are but theories! How can the election of the four senators by a general ticket restore to the city that unity which was destroyed by its division into municipalities. If I can only be convinced, that it will have that marvellous effect, I am ready to yield all my objections! If you cannot show this, your position is lost! It cannot be shown. The interests of the municipalities are different, and their populations are perhaps different.

In less than two years, I predict that if you sanction the general ticket system for the city, the five senators will be elected by the second municipality.

But, we are told that the evil we apprehend will be destroyed by the proviso of my colleague, (Mr. Roselius) which renders it imparitive that each of the municipalities shall be represented in the senate. How can you constrain the electors to such a condition, and what will be the remedy, should they refuse to obey? Moreover, is it not well known, that the second municipality are not those that reside within the limits of that municipality. Many of its best friends are found in the first municipality, who have at heart its interests as much as its own inhabitants: whose property and whose interests are identified with the second municipality, and who are ready to serve it upon all and every occasion. We are asked to be generous to the second municipality, to commit to it for the future, the opportunity of electing all four senators, because that municipality has no representative upon this floor. I admit that the second municipality has no representative upon this floor that actually resides within her limits. But I deny that this is any disadvantage. In the apportionment to the city, out of nineteen members allotted to the city, the first municipality, with a population of forty-three thousand five hundred and forty-six, obtained eight representatives; the second, with a population of nineteen thousand two hundred and thirty-five, obtained seven resentatives; and the third, with a population of twenty-six thousand eight hundred and forty-three, obtained four representatives; when by all the calculations, the second municipality was, in point of fact, entitled to but five, and at the utmost six representatives. I was the only one in the delegation that voted against allowing her one member more than she was by any calculation entitled to. So that it will be seen she effected more without a direct representation, than if she had actually had a majority of the delegation from her own border. We should not be generous, but be just. The census had to be made, and if there had been any blunder, any mistake, it would have been time enough to have given her the additional representation when it was shown she was really entitled to it.

I cannot see why the second municipality should complain of the part allotted to her in the senate. The first municipality is allowed two senators; the second one, the third one. Is that distribution just? The only data that we have are the statements prepared by the delegate from Lafourche (Mr. Beatty.) From this data, and inasmuch as the Convention have assumed total population as the basis for the senate, it is clear that the first municipality is entitled to two senators, and if either of the other two have a right to complain, it is the third municipality; her total population exceeds by eight thousand that of the second, and exceeds by five thousand, more than one-half the total population of the first. I was the only one in the delegation that contended in favor of giving the third municipality one more representative than she actually obtained. But it was decided to give it to the second municipality, notwithstanding all I could urge. The third municipality is satisfied with one senator—why should not the second be satisfied with one senator? The reason is obvious. She has not before her the same brilliant future, and the same hopes. I repeat it with confidence. We ask nothing that is not just, and for that reason I entertain not a doubt but that the members of this body, upon reflection, will appreciate the justness of our demand. They will the more readily do so, if they bear in mind one consideration, to which I shall briefly advert. The first and third municipalities are occupied by a scattered population; they are the remnants of those that once alone occupied all the extensive territories of the State. They have yielded to the new population that have overflowed the land, and whose activity and energy have raised the State to so high a degree of prosperity. But in ceding, they are still there, and as American citizens, they have a right to be heard and consulted. Will this house turn a reluctant ear to their demand through me, that they have the privilege conserved to them of being represented by those they may choose to delegate?

Mr. CLAIBORNE said he rose not for the purpose of participating in the debate, but to make an explanation which was rendered necessary by some remarks of his colleague (Mr. Soulé.) I understand that delegate to say that he was the only member of the Orleans delegation who, when the question of dividing the city into representative districts, raised his voice. . . . .

Mr. SOULE: I did not convey my meaning, in all probability. What I intended to say was, when the distribution of the twenty representatives to the city was referred to the Orleans delegation, I was the only one that claimed an additional representative for the third municipality.

Mr. CLAIBORNE: It was upon that very point that I desired to set the gentleman right. The basis upon which the distribution was made was the basis of electors, and I was compelled to accede to less than I would otherwise have claimed, had not the figures been decidedly against me. It is well known that the basis of electors is peculiarly unfavorable to the third municipality, from the fact that a large proportion of the free persons of color have taken refuge in that municipality, and that the mass of the white population, among whom are several old families, and the proprietors of a great number of slaves, whose labor supports them. In addition to these causes, there is another. There is a large proportion of the population that are aliens, and have not yet been naturalized. Of course, they have no right to vote. The number of electors from these causes, bear a less proportion to the population in the third municipality than in the second municipality, and that was my reason for consenting to give a greater representation to the second municipality. That municipality, upon the basis of electors, was entitled to it. If I had consulted only my affections, I would have been ready to insist upon more than the third municipality has obtained; for it is in that municipality where I reside, where are my children, and from which I had the honor of being chosen a delegate to this Convention. But before all, I considered that I was bound to consult the immutable principles of justice, and to be actuated in this, as in every other official or private act, by its dictates.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD said, it was unpleasant for a delegation representing the same interests, and sharing the same responsibilities, to differ in opinion in representing those interests. The first impressions he had formed were against the proposed division of the city into four senatorial districts. His matured reflections had confirmed those impressions. He thought he might claim some impartiality for his views upon this subject. He had resided all his life in the first municipality. He had received repeated marks of confidence from every section of the city, and particularly from the third municipality, with which he had been less connected by personal and other associations. And if there were any portion of the city which has particular claims upon him, and to which he felt peculiarly grateful, it was the third municipality. But he felt that he would be unworthy of a seat in this body, of a place in the city council, or in the humblest collection of his fellow-citizens, if he were to allow sectional preferences to sway his judgment. He felt that he was here the representative of the whole city, without reference to arbitrary distinctions for local purposes. The gentleman that has argued this question, in favor of local districts, (Mr. Soulè,) has assumed the anomaly that New Orleans is three cities. I must differ with my colleague upon that point. New Orleans is not yet three cities, although the whole course of proceedings on the part of the Convention have a tendency to effect that result; to divide it in interest and in feeling, and to divide it in the policy that it ought to pursue. It ought to be but one city. Would any stranger, in passing from its upper to its lower limits imagine that it was three cities? Would he, while standing upon its levees and viewing its magnificient and capacious harbor, teeming with the wealth of the western world, and while gazing at its fleets of vessels, with the flags of every nation, consider it three cities instead of one? It is but one city! united by a common interest, by a common pride, and he hoped that the period was distant, far distant, when it should be divided. He wished that its division would never be realized! The sectional divisions into municipalities had been perhaps the result of a distinction of races, which was increased by some real, but in most cases, by imaginary differences, and stimulated by party feelings. The inevitable tendency of the present measure was first to break up the harmony and reduce the weight of the city. Why was it advanced by the country members, if it were not to weaken the influence of the city? For that purpose gentlemen from the country have attempted to thrust it down our throats, that New Orleans has too much influence. I would ask my colleague, who differs with me, if the effect of this measure will not be to cripple the city in the senate, as she has already been crippled in the house of representatives by a similar measure? New Orleans has been curtailed in the senate more than one-half of her strength. She has been allowed four senators, when in point of fact she was entitled to ten! Is not this sufficient? Must she be further curtailed, and her voice be rendered still more ineffectual? Is she to be stabbed in her heart's core by a division into local senatorial districts? I cannot see the policy of such a measure. But I am told that there are conflicting interests in the city. If there be in reality these conflicting interests, will they not be represented in the house of representatives through the petty divisions into which the city is already divided? Must the senatorial representation from the city share the same fate? I would ask my colleague (Mr. Soulé) if the city has no interests, as a city, to be represented? May there not be measures introduced into the legislature prejudicial to the whole city? May it not happen that an attempt may be made to impose an unjust tax? The entire city may suffer. There are a variety of matters in which the city, as a whole city, are involved; matters of navigation, sanitary regulations, to prevent the spread of malignant and contagious diseases. Are not these some of the measures that may be effected by legislation? As for the apprehension that the local affairs of the city may be ever sacrificed, it is to be presumed that the local city council will take care of them. Besides, the very law which divides the city into three municipalities, ordaining a separate council for each, presupposes that there are general interests in the city, to be looked after. Ought there not to be some check in the senate, so far as the city is concerned, to protect her interests in that conservative body? There will be conflicts between the strong and the weak, and there should be some bulwark for the protection of the weak.

My friend on the right (Mr. Marigny) would hereafter see cause to deplore the districting of the city for senators, should it be carried. Does that gentleman think it will be more effectual to secure the representation of the lower municipalities than the system of a general ticket? Only let that gentleman reflect upon what has transpired for the last two years. It is a matter of but little moment where one senator may be temporarily placed. Where the mass of the population are, there will be the influence upon legislation. The new population is increasing, and the old population is decreasing. The upper portion of the first municipality will entertain sympathies and identities with the stronger portion. In the second municipality is an indomitable and active population—an active and vigilant press. These must give to it a decided advantage, if there is to be a separate and conflicting interest created. What would become of the allotment of one senator to the lower portion in the course of time? One must be blind, not to see that the tendency of population is towards the upper portion of the city. The basis of apportionment for the senate is total population. The apportionment is to be made at stated periods. Where will the mass of population be in the course of a quarter of a century? The election by general ticket is for the advantage of the whole city. It will combine and concentrate its interests from one municipality to another. The third municipality will concur in the election of the four senators, and that in point of fact, will give it more influence than were it to elect the fractional representative of one. Let us look at the past to enlighten us as to the future! Let gentlemen look at the State senate for a series of years. From what portion of the city came the senator from the parish of Orleans? Look at the composition on this floor of the delegation from this city? We find that the third municipality has four out of the eleven delegates—the balance are from the first municipality, and not one from the second municipality. Has the upper portion of the city ever sent a senator? Mr. Hoa, a distinguished gentleman, whose loss was so deeply deplored, was elected from the first municipality, and was the senator for a series of years. He conciliated friends and supporters in the three municipalities, and was invariably returned. The third municipality would have more weight by participating as heretofore with the others, than if she were allowed a separate senator for herself. This is not produced by a feeling of liberality. It cannot be claimed as the result of mere magnanimity. It has a more certain and inevitable foundation. It is based upon what all legislation should be based, upon human nature. As long as you consult human nature in legislation, you are sure to be right. Majorities will always consult minorities. They are anxious to get the vote of the minority.

I heartily concur with the gentleman (Mr. Soulé) that it is right to protect the weak in preference to the strong. I think it ought to be done, but we differ materially as to the means of doing it. If I were under the influence of sectional feelings; if I were animated by a preference for uptown, or a preference for down town—distinctions that I have always despised and ridiculed; and if I were desirous to see the second municipality obtain all the political power I would advocate and vote for the division of the city into senatorial districts, being persuaded that it would not be many years before that municipality would have the preponderating control, by the natural increase of her population.

The energy and activity of the new population—the Anglo-American race—are such, that as Napoleon humorously observed, if the devil had a dollar they would find it out! That energy would give the second municipality more weight without a representation, than the other two municipalities with a representation. If she were allowed by the present apportionment, but one senator, it would not be long before she would be entitled to two; then to three, and finally to all. If this course were taken, the second municipality would become entirely alienated from the other two. She would have no feeling in common with them, and it would then be too late to expect her sympathies. These attempts to divide the city and to excite sectional jealousies, have no other effect than to widen the breach that was unfortunately opened between the municipalities, and which were, I think, about closing. It is calculated to disturb all the harmony that yet remains among them, and to sow the seeds of discord and jealousy. There is nothing to protect the lower municipalities against the consequences of the overwhelming growth of the second municipality, unless the city be kept together. It has been but one city for the last thirty years, and has had but a single senator. Have gentlemen had cause to complain that the voice of any section was stifled? That the second municipality has monopolized the representation. Has any part of the city suffered for want of protection? As far as my personal experience goes, the representatives of the city have felt that as they were elected by the whole city, they were bound by a sense of duty and of power to sustain the interests of the whole city, and to discard all sectional feelings. They have maintained with equal fidelity the interests of every portion. They have conciliated these interests when they were supposed to conflict, for it has happened, that where the prejudices of the community inferred that there was a conflict, in point of fact, there was no conflict; and if it be well understood, the interest of one portion of the city will be found to be the interest of the whole city.

The three gentlemen who have spoken upon the subject, have held one language upon the division of the city into three municipalities. They have pronounced that division to have been a great calamity. Will it be pretended that if the division of the city into three municipalities is to be considered an evil, that the division into senatorial districts would be a benefit? I was not a member of the legislature when the act was passed dividing the city into three municipalities. But I remember some of the motives that were alleged as calling for its passage. The people of the upper portion of the city had complained for some years that the revenues of the city were not distributed with equal justice. That these revenues were divested exclusively for the lower portion of the city. I do not pretend to say that these complaints were well founded. But such were the complaints, and such were the motives that led to the division of the city. It met with little or no opposition from the members of the house, nor from the member of the senate. I believe that Mr. Hoa was then the senator. I am unable to say whether it produced all the mischief which has been attributed to it, in this discussion. I remember that it met with my support, and I am sorry if the results have proved detrimental. The motives that influenced me in favoring it were, that there were collisions of interest and collisions of feeling, that rendered the city council an arena of strife; and that it was better that each section should regulate its own affairs. If mischief has actually resulted, it proves, what I have asserted, that the interests of the city may be promoted or destroyed by legislation; and that the ground assumed that the representation in the senate for the city may be divided without injury to the city, is repugnant to reason.

Some allusion was made in the course of the remarks of the honorable delegate (Mr. Soulé) that the second municipality had obtained more than her share in the lower house. I have a few words to say in reply. The Convention, contrary to my views, established the basis of electors for the apportionment in the house of representatives. The only criterion that we had was the returns of the last November election. On account of the allegation of fraud in that election, these returns were looked upon with suspicion and distrust. The gentleman (Mr. Soulé) has said that the second municipality is possessed of peculiar skill in manufacturing voters. I think, unfortunately, that no portion of the city can boast a superiority in that line. We were induced to throw under these returns, and to take up another vote. We took up the returns of the senatorial election which resulted in the election of Mr. Slidell. That vote was least favorable to the second municipality, and most favorable to the third municipality; upon it we apportioned the representation of the two municipalities, and it was admitted by one gentleman that the third got one more representative than it was entitled to. As to the present apportionment, I consider it of no moment. It is temporary in its nature, and the next apportionment will correct its errors. To return to the question before the house, I protest against this division, at this or any other period; and if I were to indulge in prophecy, which I might from having paid some attention to passing events, I would predict the unfortunate consequences which would result from this fatal error, were the Convention to fall into it.

Mr. Benjamin said that if the vote was now insisted upon, we would be involved in the same difficulty that attended the proceedings of last Saturday. Instead of making any progress we would be retarding our proceedings. If the vote was taken at a time when the will of the majority could be ascertained, there would be a willingness to abide the decision. He would, therefore move the adjournment until Monday at the usual hour.

Mr. C. M. Conrad gave notice that in the event that the proposition was adopted, dividing the city into four senatorial districts, he would move for the reconsideration, so that five senators may be allowed. He considered that five senators, parcelled out in the way proposed, would not be as efficient as four senators selected at large from the whole city.

Whereupon, on motion, the Convention adjourned.

Monday, April 7, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Motion of Mr. Lewis to strike out that portion of the section dividing the city into senatorial districts.

Mr. CHINN said that he did not know whether the debate would be continued, but he was about to propose a thing that was unpleasant. This question had been twice debated, and he presumed every member was prepared to vote upon it.—This motion was viewed as an odious one, and sometimes it is. But a moment's reflection would convince members that we were wasting the time of the Convention uselessly. I have risen to move the previous question.

Mr. EUSTIS would request the gentleman to defer his motion for an hour.

The question was postponed until one o'clock.

Mr. SPLANE offered a letter from Mr. Ilsley, explanatory of the causes of certain inaccuracies in the reports of the debates.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved that it be read.

Mr. SPLANE moved that it be placed upon the journals. If the remarks made by members preferring complaints against Mr. Ilsley, as the reporter, were published, it was nothing but justice that Mr. Ilsley's communication were placed upon the journals.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD thought this course was hardly necessary. Some five or six members of the Convention have considered that they were incorrectly reported.—The reporter thinks he has reported them correctly. In a question of this kind, the members are more competent to judge whether they be correctly reported or not. Whether the facts stated by the reporter are sufficient to exonerate him, is a question for the Convention to determine, and particularly the gentlemen who have complained.

Mr. SPLANE said that his reasons for moving that the letter of Mr. Ilsley be spread upon the journals were, that the remarks made by members referring to the inaccuracies of his reports, would be published, and it was but just that Mr. Ilsley's vindication should be made a matter of record. He had the proof to shew that Mr. Ilsley had appointed a substitute to act in his stead when the reports complained of were made. He hopes that justice will be done.

The motion failed.

Mr. CULBERTSON then moved to lay Mr. Ilsley's letter upon the table, subject to call.

Mr. SPLANE then handed in Mr. Ilsley's resignation; which was accepted.

Mr. CLAIBORNE then moved to abolish the office of second reporter.

Mr. SPLANE moved to lay this motion on the table, subject to call; which motion was lost.

Mr. DOWNS opposed the motion to abolish the office of second reporter. We had had a great deal of trouble with printers and reporters. The reports were now nearly up to date, and by continuing the same system, and by getting a good reporter we would be enabled to have our debates published daily.

Mr. DOWNS called for the yeas and nays upon Mr. Claiborne's motion to abolish the office of second reporter.

Mr. BENJAMIN said that the debates were published in French with remarkable accuracy. He was satisfied that the same might be done in English, by one reporter.

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Cade, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Guion, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Mayo, Mazureau, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, and Wikoff—29 yeas.

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Carriere, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, McRae, Marigny, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Wederstrandt and Winder—26 nays.

The Convention then took up the following section presented by Mr. Downs:

"In all future apportionments of the senate the population of New Orleans on the left bank of the river, descending, shall be deducted from the population of the whole State, and the remainder of the population divided by the number twenty-eight, and the quotient or result produced by this division, shall be the poulation entitling a parish or other senatorial district to a senator. Single or contiguous parishes shall be formed into districts having a population the nearest possible to the divisor; and if a parish or district cannot be allowed a senator without a fraction of one-third over or under the ratio, then a district may be formed having not more than two senators, but not otherwise.—Whenever the election under a new apportionment shall have taken place, the seats of all the senators under the old apportionment shall be vacant without regard to the time they had served. All apportionments for senators made not in strict conformity to this section, shall be null and void; and after the census has been taken, and the general assembly convened, it shall not be competent for the legislature to do any business, except its own organization, until an apportionment is made in strict conformity to this rule, and all acts and proceedings of the then existing legislature, or any subsequent one, under an apportionment not in strict conformity to this constitution, shall be null and void.

Mr. Downs called for the adoption of the foregoing.

Mr. Marigny: I am opposed, Mr. President to this section, and will give my reasons for that opposition. Some strange things take place in this Convention, which would not perhaps occur if its proceedings were not for the most part carried on by fifty-five members, instead of being carried on by seventy-seven, as contemplated by law and desired by the people. There is a remarkable tendency to give power to the people that are the furthest, the remotest from the city. I may say, to give them a monopoly of the power. This is done under the alleged pretence that it is necessary to curb the city and to diminish her influence. We have been one month discussing the apportionment in the senate and house of representatives. We had finally reached the number of members of which the senate is to be composed. It was placed at thirty-four, and subsequently has been reduced to thirty-two. It is explicitly declared that no district shall have more than one eighth of the total number of senators. The city is doomed to have but four senators. I consider that as most unjust. I have been told that some feeling is exhibited against me in the second municipality because I am opposed to having but one senatorial district for the city of New Orleans. I have never hunted after popularity, but I have always sought to discharge my duties according to my convictions. I think that the two senators should be allowed to the second municipality. The restriction is placed upon the city in reference to her senatorial representation as in every thing else.—But what says the section under debate? It says, or rather it means, that the city of New Orleans is never to have the benefit of her surplus, but that it is to be taken away from her and transferred to other parishes that had not the requisite number to entitle them to a senator. The city of New Orleans is to be made the milch-cow for the whole State. She is not only to fill the public coffers, but she is likewise to fatten up the country parishes, by giving them senators.

The gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) uses his weapons when he has an object to attain with a great deal of dexterity. He brings up the same question a thousand times until he succeeds. Five senators ought to be apportioned to the city, to be distributed among the three municipalities. The population and wealth of the second municipality ought to be represented by two senators. The first municipality should likewise have two senators. But that will not be done. Reason and justice will fail of their effect. The surplus of the city will be denied to her. It will be transferred to Caddo or Bossier, or some of the other north-western parishes to give them additional senators. Such a course of proceedings are inconceivable; I cannot understand such a perversion of justice. The majority should remember that there is nothing durable but justice. Nothing that is unjust can be permanent; even in monachies themselves, justice must be observed or they will not stand. In France the monarchy of ten centuries was overthrown because justice had been sacrificed. In England the oligarchy were overthrown from the same cause. We are in a republic; the right of suffrage is to be extended, and representation is to be based upon suffrage. The city is destined to have two thirds of the whole population of the State. I cannot better establish the comparative increase between the country and city, than by referring to statistics. In 1804 the population of New Orleans was five thousand; the population of the balance of the State was forty thousand. The population of the State at present is three hundred and fifty thousand, of which the city contains one hundred and twenty thousand. The progress of the city is much the greatest. In 1804 the population of the western country was quite trifling; it is now swelled and become very numerous; with the increase of the population of the west, will increase the population and resources of the city of New Orleans. She is destined to contain a population of five hundred thousand souls. And yet, with all this prospect of the increase of her population she is to be restricted for ever to four senators. Her surplus is to be carried to the fourth district, or Florida. This is the position of things in reference to the senate. How do they stand in reference to the house of representatives? There too, there is restriction upon the city. It is provided that the number of representatives shall never go beyond one hundred, and we have already apportioned ninety-eight. So that notwithstanding all that we have been told of the great concessions made to the city, we find that these concessions amount to nothing. The city is as effectually restricted in the house of representatives as she is in the senate. A ban has been placed upon her as the future seat of government. Restrictions, upon restrictions, have been piled upon her. The proposition before us is similar to those that have preceded it. The only thing, it is more glaringly unjust and oppressive. Is one portion of the State to be enriched with the spoils taken from New Orleans? gentlemen should not allow their passions to dictate to their judgment. If the constitution be accepted by the majority even, the contest will not end there. There may be a reaction that may menace the tranquility. This section is tempestive. It is informal. Machevel himself never could have invented such a principle. If it be not rejected justice is deaf, and it will be impossible to obtain from this house what is just and rational.

Mr. Benjamin moved to strike out from the word "single," in the tenth line, down to the word "otherwise," in the eighteenth line. He said he would object to this clause, because it forced the legislature to make nothing but single districts, except where gross inequalities should result; he thought other causes might operate upon the mind of the legislature. It was unwise to place this restriction upon the discretion of the legislature; as far as he was concerned, he was opposed to single districts, but he was not so tenacious of double districts as to require the legislature, imperatively, to make no other, for he thought that some discretion ought to be left to the legislature. If they see strong reasons to put two parishes together, or to form single districts, from causes that we may not now foresee, they ought to have the power to do so, and not be bound down to divide populations that have an identity of interest, and which do not desire such division. Some of the members of the Convention are very much opposed to single districts; I am among that number; others are indisposed against the formation of double districts. The legislature should not be bound down to either, but be vested with a discretionary power.

Mr. C. M. Conrad hoped that the motion made by his colleague (Mr. Benjamin) would prevail. There was great differences of opinion upon the double and single district system; some were in favor of double districts, and others were in favor of single districts. The Convention have combined the two; they have adopted some single and some double districts. This was the compromise that reconciled our conflicting opinions. But one gentleman, who is in favor of single districts, has introduced that principle which is hereafter to prevail for all time. I differ from that gentleman; I am as much in favor of double districts as he is of single districts; but I am not so wedded to my system as to wish to tie up the hands of the legislature; I desire to leave the matter to the wishes of my constituents. We have formed some double districts; according to the section they ought not to have been formed. If we adopt it, we decide that the rule is wrong, on the other hand, we have determined that there should be some single districts, where, perhaps, double districts ought to have been formed. For example, we have made two districts of the parishes of East and West Feliciana, which I cannot help thinking, would have been better united in a double district.

Mr. Downs said the object of the section was that no district should send more than two senators.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: why does the gentleman not say so in the section. The language of the gentleman will not convey that idea. I have no objection to incorporate that principle. I am not myself in favor of forming any districts with three senators. I hope that the gentleman will not insist upon his section, but will leave it discretionary with the legislature—for "sufficient to the day is the evil thereof." This restriction would limit and embarrass the legislature in making the apportionments; when they should be left free to determine upon the propriety and justice of making the districts double or single.

Mr. Downs hoped that the motion of the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) would not be adopted. The majority insisted upon taking one senator (said Mr. Downs) from my district, although I had every data to show that it had doubled in population. This is the only way to recover at the earliest time possible from the great injustice that has been done. I wish the apportionment hereafter to be made in the strictest manner. An iron rule has been applied to the parishes in my district, and it is but fair that the same rule should apply to all the other parishes. The principle in the section under consideration does not apply unless a parish or district cannot be allowed a senator without a fraction of one-third over or under the ratio. It is only in that case that parishes may be combined to give one, but not more than two senators. If we leave the power unconfined to give the number of senators, there is no estimating the fractions that may be combined together to give one quarter of the State more power than another quarter of the State. I wish to see nothing of that kind. The better rule would be that no district should send more than one senator. But there is some objection to this, arising from the difficulty of carrying it out. It could not be well done in some particular cases, and from necessity, some two or three parishes would have to be combined to form the district. The number of senators in such cases are by the section limited to two. The system of unequal districts is decidedly wrong, and very properly rejected by a large vote. Because if some of the districts be large and some small, the result would be that the small districts would suffer from the combinations and concentration of power in the large districts. It would operate most unequally. I have yielded a great deal to certain considerations when I have consented that two parishes may be put together in the formation of a district. Is not this the rule adopted by the Convention? We have decided that in some particular cases two parishes may be put together in the formation of a district, and two senators be allowed; but in general the Convention have proceeded upon the single district system, which I greatly prefer. The parishes of St. Martin and St. Mary have been formed into a single district, and allowed two senators. Lafayette and Vermillion have been combined and allowed one senator. Calcasieu and St. Landry—here we have one large and one small parish, and the same necessity may occur again—placed together, and two senators allowed them. There it may be necessary, because St. Landry is a large parish, and after being allowed one senator, has a large fraction remaining. But in reference to St. Mary and St. Martin, the necessity for establishing them into double districts, does not exist. There is no fraction remaining after allowing them one senator respectively. The only object of the section is to establish a permanent rule to govern cases where it may be necessary to form double districts, with the imperative provision that no district shall have more than two senators. Is there any thing wrong in that? There are great inequalities in the distribution of the senatorial representation. These inequalities have arisen from following imperfectly the census of 1840, which is by no means a criterion of the present population, particularly in the north-west. Another apportionment should be made at as early a period as possible, and in the strictest manner. I see nothing in the clause that is inconsistent with what we have done in relation to apportionment. We have created no district with more than two senators, and the clause is within that rule.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: I do not pretend to say that there is any thing very wrong in this clause. I only say that we are renewing a question that we had got rid of. The present apportionment is but for two years, and the gentleman wishes his opinions to be the rule for ever afterwards. I agree that the section was the result of compromise; that those that favored large districts consented that small districts in particular cases, should be formed; and the advocates of small districts have consented that in some instances, large districts should be formed. That has been done at the instance of the delegation from the particular parish that wished to form a separate district, or to be united with another parish to form a double district. Why not allow the legislature the discretionary power to control the subject matter? The Lafourche, Attakapas and Opelousas parishes have been formed into double districts. It is impossible for us to know, with accuracy, whether they are within the principle of the gentleman's clause, and if we made the calculation now, the result might be very different in 1847, the period fixed upon for the next apportionment, and still more different in 1857. This clause will have the effect to prevent contiguous parishes from uniting when their people may desire it, and compel them to separate when they are united. Where is the necessity for this iron rule? Geographical position should be consulted, as well as population. It was that consideration that induced us, in part, to form the separate district of Point Coupée. Avoyelles was placed in the same district with East Baton Rouge, but when we reflected upon the difficulties that presented themselves in their difference of position, the design was abandoned, and each parish was formed into a separate district. There was strong reasons for connecting East and West Feliciana sa heretofore, in one senatorial district. But yielding to the strong appeals of the delegates from those parishes, we consented that they should be separate districts. The discretion ought to be left with the legislature, in order that they may consult the public wishes in the various sections of the country. I am in favor of double districts, and I am in hopes that the legislature will conform to that principle consistently. But what would the gentleman (Mr. Downs) say, if we were to reverse the position of things, and consent that single districts should be established until the next apportionment, and double districts for ever after. That is his proposition; the compromise is to exist for two years, and ever afterwards; his notions of single districts are to circumscribe the action of the legislature. I am against any such iron rule, based on population, without reference to natural causes. I hope that the clause would be rejected.

Mr. Roman considered it his duty to support the motion of the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin.) The qualifications for the electors for the senate were the same as those for the house of representatives. The only means that remained to give efficiency to the senate, and subserve the end for which it was created, to act as a check upon the popular branch, was that its members should be elected by a larger and more numerous constituency. If one parish is to be deemed sufficient, and is erected in a separate district, you destroy every distinction between the senate and the house of representatives, except the distinction in the duration of office, and the difference as to the period of eligibility to the one and to the other. The distinction of age is not sufficient, and indeed it is but seldom that it enters into the consideration of the electors; for nothing is more common to see men more advanced in age in the house of representatives than in the senate. If this system of one parish districts be adopted, the senate will be nothing more than the duplicate, the counterpart of the house of representatives. Both bodies will represent the same interests and the same feelings. Those that think that such a result is desirable, would facilitate its accomplishment, if, instead of providing for the separate election of the senate, they would provide that the number of persons necessary to form the senate should be drawn from the house of representatives, and be designated, nicknamed the senate. A body thus constituted would carry out their design just as well.

The consequences of small districts will be to destroy the checks and balances which have been deemed essential to the well-being and permanence of our system of government. The delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) is mistaken, when he states that the Convention has shown a disposition to favor the creation of small districts. I think they have exhibited a contrary disposition. Out of the thirty-two districts that have been formed, only eight have been established as separate districts, to wit: the parishes of Jefferson, Rapides

East Baton Rouge, West Feliciana, East Feliciana, Point Coupée, Avoyelles and Natchitoches. We may, therefore, infer that the sense of the Convention is in favor of double districts, and that these eight single districts are but exceptions to the general rule. Particular considerations, too, militated in favor of their establishment; some of them were established as single districts in the old constitution, and strong local reasons were given why they should be so formed. I trust, said Mr. Roman, that it will not be attempted to carry out the exceptions, while the rule itself is overlooked. From the sparseness of our population, it must be obvious that it will be absolutely necessary to unite contiguous territory in the formation of these districts. The adoption of the section proposed by the member from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) can have no other effect than to establish as a rule the exceptions to a general principle.

Mr. Downs said he was induced to infer from the remarks of the delegate from St. James (Mr. Roman) that his proposition was not understood by that delegate. It did not contemplate alone the adoption of single districts, but on the contrary, it provided for the formation of double districts. From the very number of senatorial districts, it was apparent that districts of a single parish could not be universally formed; for the number of senatorial districts were thirty-two, and the number of parishes were forty-six. It was clearly indispensable to put two or more parishes together in some cases.

Mr. Roman: The object of the section is, that each parish shall form a separate district when it is entitled by its population to elect a senator.

Mr. Downs: The member (Mr. Roman) says that there are only eight single districts. I have no doubt that, when the next census is taken, the apportionment of the representation among the parishes will be very different from what it now is. The number of parishes whose representation it will be necessary to change, may amount to about one-half. Some of the double districts may be separated. It is true that no express rule has been adopted by the Convention; but wherever double districts have been formed, two senators have been allowed. In New Orleans three single districts have been formed, to one of which two senators has been allowed. Two senators have been given to the Lafourche parishes; two to the Opelousas parishes, and two in the Attakapas parishes. Thus in five districts we have ten senators. Where it is necessary to form these double districts, I do not object.

The gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) calls my proposition an iron rule, and says that some discretion should be vested in the legislature, to take into consideration something besides population. When my district was about to be deprived of its just representation, and the census of 1840 was referred to as authorising the withdrawal of a senator, I implored the Convention to take into consideration something besides population.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: What I said was this, that the Convention should take into consideration geographical position in forming senatorial districts, but not in assigning the representation.

Mr. Downs: This was my very argument, that the old senatorial district which I represented should be taken into consideration geographically, as well as population. I cannot see what objection can be made to my proposition. Its object is to prevent the representation from being unequal. It fixes a permanent rule, and leaves nothing to be done but to make the calculations. I move that the question be divided, and that it be taken upon that part of the section which ends with the word divisor, and that afterwards it be taken upon the remaining portion of the gentleman's motion.—Before the question was put, the hour having arrived for the order of the day, the further consideration of Mr. Downs' section was suspended.

Mr. Benjamin moved that the question upon the motion of the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) that the city of New Orleans form one senatorial district, and the amendment of the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Roselius) that one senator should be a resident of each municipality, be divided, and that the question should be first taken upon the amendment.

The President stated that the question would be first upon striking out from the section, the provision districting the city of New Orleans.

Mr. MARIGNY called for the yeas and nays upon striking out:

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, Saunders, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry and Voorhies—31 yeas; Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Downs, Garcia, Humble, McRae, Marigny, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Preston, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Soulé, Trist, Wederstrandt and Wikoff—26 nays.

Mr. Roselius' amendment was then adopted.

Mr. ROSELIUS moved for the adoption of the section as amended.

Mr. BEATTY would observe that the Convention had decided that no parish should be divided in forming a senatorial district. I have voted for striking out the provision dividing the city of New Orleans into senatorial districts because it is in conflict with that decision. I trust that the house will be consistent in this matter, and I therefore move to strike out from the senatorial district of Plaquemines and St. Bernard that portion of the parish of Orleans on the right bank, in order that it may be restored to the parish of Orleans, to which it belongs.

Mr. BENJAMIN said it would be necessary to reconsider the vote constituting the district of Plaquemines. It would not be regular to do so now.

Mr. BEATTY thought the gentleman (Mr. Benjamin) was mistaken. The whole section was open to amendment.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD: The whole section has been adopted, with the exception of that portion now under consideration.

Mr. BEATTY thought the gentleman was mistaken.

The PRESIDENT decided that Mr. Beatty's motion was in order.

Mr. CHINN would suggest to the gentleman (Mr. Beatty) that the delegates from Plaquemines were not in their seats. They might think it was treating them cavalierly to act upon the matter in their absence. If the question is pressed I shall vote against it.

Mr. BEATTY: I presume they will not object.

Mr. CLAIBORNE: I shall protest against the adoption of the motion of the gentleman, (Mr. Beatty.) That portion of the parish of Orleans on the right bank has never been connected politically with the city. Its position in that respect has been an advantage to it, for it has obtained a separate representative in the popular branch of the legislature, with a smaller number of electors than any parish in the State; for at a period of the greatest political excitement it only gave one hundred and forty votes. To place it with the city of New Orleans would be imposing a greater restriction upon the city than was proposed by any of the reports of the legislative committee—for it would participate in the election of the four senators allotted to the city. The power of the city is already sufficiently restricted, without increasing the number of persons and the extent of territory by which that power shall be exercised. From the adoption of the constitution, that portion of the parish of Orleans has been united with the parishes of Plaquemines and St. Bernard, with which it has formed all its associations. He hoped it would be rejected. It had been sprung upon us suddenly, and at any rate we were not now prepared to sanction it.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD said that the addition of this territory to this senatorial district could be of no advantage to it, nor of any advantage to that portion of the parish of Orleans itself. The city was limited to four senators. It was better that the motion of the delegate from Lafourche should not prevail.

The question was then taken on Mr. Mr. Beatty's motion.

Mr. BEATTY called for the yeas and nays:

Messrs. Beatty, Carriere, Downs, Ledoux, Legendre, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption and Voorhies—18 yeas;

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquié, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Cènas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Kenner, King, Labauve, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Penn, Porche, Preston, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, Saunders, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder—42 nays.

Mr. Roselius renewed his motion for the adoption of Mr. Lewis' proposition as amended.

Mr. Marigny said, he should vote against the proposition as amended, because he was convinced that injustice had been done to the city, and that in place of allotting four senators, five should have been allowed, in the following proportion: two to the first municipality, two to the second municipality, and one to the third municipality.

Mr. Soule said, that he would vote against the proposition as amended, because it involved a contradiction: that is, the proposition, as introduced by the delegate from St. Landry, was inconsistent with the amendment proposed by the delegate (Mr. Roselius.) The first prescribed that the senatorial representation for the city shall be chosen by general ticket, and the latter admits that there is a difference of interest (my very argument) which is to be reconciled by providing that each of the three municipalities shall have one senator chosen from within its limits. If the amendment is designed to insure the representation of each municipality, it is not as well calculated to effect that purpose as a direct allotment of the four senators in proportion to their population to the three municipalities. The yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garrett, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies and Winder voted in the affirmative—30 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Downs, Eustis, Garcia, Humble, Ledoux, McRae, Marigny, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Stephens, Trist, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the negative—31 nays.

Mr. Porter proposed that each municipality elect one senator, and that the fourth senator be elected by the three municipalities combined.

Mr. Benjamin felt called upon to oppose this proposition. If it be adopted, the result will be, that the city of New Orleans will have but one representative in both branches of the legislature. I solemnly declare that I will never consent to so odious a principle. I can never sanction a proposition that would deprive the most populous and wealthy portion of the State of ninety-nine hundredths of the political power that belongs to it. What, sir, one senator for the city of New Orleans! The city has been divided in her representation to the lower house; she has been restricted to four senators, when she is in fact entitled to ten, and when her constituency shall make known in mass her views and interests, you go still further, and say that she shall have but one voice in the legislation of the State.

This injustice is revolting. When grave and important measures are agitated, deeply affecting the interests of the whole city, there will be but one member in both branches to assert and to defend those interests. In vain will the voice of the city be invoked to influence the course of the local delegations upon these questions of vital moment to the whole city. They will say that they are not the representatives of the whole city, but the representatives of the particular wards from which they may come. They will represent ward interests. They will not listen to the people of the whole city, and the only way of instructing them will be by little petty meetings held in the petty districts into which the city has been divided. The voice of one hundred thousand citizens will be heard only through one single representative. I have said that the city has been divided in the house of representatives. Let her preserve at least her unity in the senate. Let there be one branch at least of the legislature, through which the general interests of the whole city may be defended and protected. It should be borne in mind that the parish of Orleans is the largest parish in the State. That she contains one-half of the whole white population of the State. And yet it is seriously proposed, and that too by a delegate from a parish whose interests are identified with those of New Orleans, that she should have but one senator—for, it must be palpable that the local representation to which she would be doomed, is no representation of the interests of the whole city. It may be perhaps a representation of local petty feelings, of sectional jealousies, but it is by no means that representation which the commercial and other interests of the whole city requires! I cannot believe it possible, that those who are in favor of dividing the city into senatorial districts, will support this novel proposition. There are enough restrictions upon the city already, to arouse the citizens to a sense of the wrongs that have been inflicted upon them. The city has been placed under a ban. She has been declared unworthy to be the seat of government, and for thirty miles round, it has been declared that the atmosphere is tainted with her pestiferous breath. If this last act of proscription is to be consummated—if the city, with all her population and all her wealth, is practically to be narrowed down to one representative in the legislature, then I declare that I shall never sign a constitution in which this act of oppression is perpetrated. I protest against it now in the name of my constituents, as an outrage to which they will never submit.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: I indulged the hope that the amendment proposed by my colleague (Mr. Roselius) would have conciliated those who were the most strenuously opposed to a united ticket. Those gentlemen admit what they cannot deny, that to divide the city further in her representation will have the effect of weakening still further her already too weak influence. It is impossible for gentlemen, as distinguished as they are for penetration and for candor, to deny that such inevitably will be the result. What are the grounds for the position they have assumed? They tell us that they fear the overwhelming influence that one portion of the city will exercise over another portion of the city. That the rights of the weaker portion will suffer. I do not entertain these apprehensions. I think they are unfounded, and that the only consequence of what is proposed, as an effectual remedy, will be the very results which they so seriously deprecate. Have I not shown, conclusively shown, that in every election each particular municipality has had its wishes consulted in the selection of candidates, and that if any advantage was given, it was in favor of that portion of the city that is known to be in the minority. Have we not this fact established before our very eyes? Out of the eleven delegates from the city, nearly one-half are from the third municipality! I was willing to concede something to the fears of gentlemen, although I believed them to be illusory. My colleague (Mr. Roselius) whose family and whose property are all centered in the first municipality, proposed what I conceived eminently calculated to dispel the fears of the most timid; and I really thought that his proposition would have given satisfaction. That gentleman would certainly be the last one to propose any thing that would be prejudicial to any portion of the city, and least of all, the very portion of which he is a resident. Can gentlemen seriously entertain the apprehensions they profess? I would ask them if the participation in the election of four senators would not afford more adequate protection, and give to each section of the city greater weight in the legislature than the election separately of one senator? Why have not the rights of the first and third municipalities been invaded up to the present time by the second municipality, which, it is now assumed, desires to control the other two? Has any disposition been shown by her to monopolize the political power of the city? I have never heard of such an attempt. What protection did the old constitution afford, and yet in a period of thirty years, no example can be shown that any one section of the city has sought to oppress the other! Has any attempts been made by the representation to the legislature, taken at large from each of the municipalities, to rule over and oppress any portion of the city? I defy any one to point it out! I cannot conceive of a more effectual mode of representing the interests of all, than that all should participate in the election of the entire representation. The city of New Orleans has one general mass of interests that cannot be separated. Her feelings and sympathies as a city are identical. But if there were sectional interests in the city that ought properly to be represented in the legislature by representives chosen immediately by those interests, that necessity is amply provided for in the house of representatives. The city has not only been divided into the familiar division of municipalities, but each municipality has been subdivided into three or more election districts, for the purpose of distributing the twenty representatives allowed to the whole city. What danger can these petty interests incur? It is the city that is left defenceless, and if you deprive her of all representation in the senate save one, as proposed by the delegate from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) she will be helpless indeed!

The amendment of my friend, (Mr. Roselius) so far from conciliating the favor of those opposed to the election of senators for the city by general ticket, (and it went as far as was consistent with the principle of keeping the city united,) has, in one instance at least, alienated the vote of a gentleman who has heretofore opposed, with the greatest ability, the division of the city into senatorial districts. I deplore the unlooked for termination of that amendment. I should deeply regret if the present proposition were to pass, as I conceive it would be attended with the most disastrous results to the best interests of the city; and in the view of those results, I should feel myself constrained, were the proposition to be embodied in the constitution, to refuse my signature to that instrument.

Mr. Eustis: I should not have troubled the Convention with any remarks of mine, had not the gentleman who has just resumed his seat alluded to the vote I gave upon the proposition of the delegate from St. Landry, coupled as it was with the amendment of my colleague, (Mr. Roselius.) When the vote was taken, some days ago, upon the proposition to divide the city into three senatorial districts, I was the only member that spoke against that proposition. I then had the honor to state that the senators from the city would be entrusted with important general interests, and not with local interests. That every thing of a local character should be expunged, as it were, and not influence those who represented, in that body, this great constituency. It suited the Convention, for good or for evil, to take a different view of the subject.

I have been, throughout, opposed to small districts in the formation of the senate, because I conceived they were incompatible with the peculiar attributes of that body. I have voted throughout for large districts; and in reference to this great city, I do think that the ensemble of its interests should be represented in that branch of the legislature, which, from its very composition, was designed to promote and to guard those interests.

As for the hybrid proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston) I shall vote against it. I consider it as neither one thing nor the other. The amendment or proviso of the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Roselius) embodied in the proposition of the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) involved a palpable contradiction. The first part declares that the choice of senators for the city shall be by a general ticket; the latter part says that one senator shall be taken from each municipality. How can that be? If laws have any sense, the latter clause means that each municipality shall have a senator. I deny that such would be the result. If each municipality is to have its separate senator, that senator must be elected by the constituents whom he represents; otherwise, if elected by the concurrent vote of the three municipalities, he will be as much the representative of one municipality as he is the representative of the others. He cannot be chosen by the three and yet be the exclusive representative of but one. The strongest municipality will force the choice of the other two. That will be the result of this proviso. This being the light in which I have viewed the subject, and considering the interests of this great metropolis—its power and its dignity, I am in favor of the election of its senators by a general ticket. But I could not vote for that principle accompanied by an amendment in direct conflict with it; neither can I vote for the proposition of the delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston.) If the city is to be one senatorial district, adopt the principle without reservation. If, on the contrary, each municipality is to have its own senator, let each municipality elect that senator, without the participation of the other municipalities, for they can certainly have nothing in common with the mere local representatives of each other. I cannot vote for the two principles combined without a violation of both.

Mr. Roselius: I did not apprehend that my amendment would have encountered so much opposition. For myself, I care little whether it be incorporated in the constitution or not. I consider it of very little importance, and I only introduced it with the view of meeting the wishes of certain gentlemen on this floor. Its practical effect will be nothing more than to sanction what has been invariably done in our elections, and which will continue to be done. It is not likely, it is impossible that an attempt will be made to elect all the senators from one quarter of the city; and if it be made, it will not be successful. We have the proof before us that no sectional feelings exist among the municipalities, as to the mere residence of those chosen to represent the city. They have in all the elections been indiscriminately taken all over the city, and personal popularity and political predilections have had no more weight than any thing else. In the selection of delegates to represent the city in the Convention, party politics were discarded, and we find the third municipality, which is supposed to be the weakest, has four representatives on this floor. The balance are from the first municipality, and it has so happened; by accident, that not one of the delegates is a resident of the second municipality. This did not happen because there were no candidates residing in the second municipality. There were candidates defeated residing in all the municipalities. This has heretofore been the usual result in all our elections, and it frequently happens that a candidate obtains more votes in another municipality, than in the one in which he resides.

As to the proposition of the delegate from Jefferson, it is somewhat of a nondescript; it seems to me at any rate, to be a novelty. I presume, in his view, that if New Orleans compose but one senatorial district, it cannot constitute three senatorial districts. To divide it into three senatorial districts, in order to make each municipality a senatorial district, and then divide it into one senatorial district for the election of one member, would, in my humble conception, be an absurdity! For such a proceeding I can perceive no reason. One of two things, if the city of New Orleans be constituted one senatorial district, then the choice of the senators must be by general ticket. If you wish to enfeeble the power of the city, to paralyze her strength, you will establish small and insignificant local districts; and in that way you will carry out the principle—"divide and conquer."

Mr. Preston: I have one or two observations to make. I did not join in the desire to reduce New Orleans below her proportion of political power. I was in favor of electors as the basis of apportionment for the senate, as well as for the house of representatives. It was ascertained to be the sense of the Convention that there should be an absolute restriction upon the city, it being considered that a concentrated power of nearly one-half of the house and of the senate, would be attended with dangerous results to the balance of the State. The disposition to curtail the power of New Orleans was tested in two or three different ways, until it was determined that she should be restricted to one-eighth of the total number of senators, to wit: four out of thirty-two. That has been done; it is past, and cannot be changed. All that we can do is to take the basis of apportionment as it has been adopted.

The basis of electors which I proposed, would have been more favorable to the city, but her delegation all voted against it. The total population having been taken as the basis, from the neeessity of the case, the distribution among the three municipalities had to be made in conformity with the census of 1840; according to that census the allotment of senators was as follows: two to the first municipality; one for the second, and one for the third. The sense of the Convention was favorable to the division of the city, and this division was sanctioned, together with the distribution that was made among the municipalities, of the four senators, by a decisive vote. Subsequently the house retraced its steps, and that portion of the section was stricken out. It was then proposed that the senators for the city should be chosen by general ticket. This has been voted down; and it is necessary we should do something. Hence I have proposed this mode of settling the difficulty. I confess that I would have been better satisfied had five senators been allowed to the city; and that would have enabled us to have made a fairer distribution among the municipalities. We could have assigned two to the first municipality; two to the second municipality, and the remaining one to the third municipality. I think that the population of the municipalities would have fully justified it.

I have voted with others that we should not have large senatorial districts. By one of the reports of the committee on the legislative department—the report of the majority—the parish of Jefferson was placed in a district with four senators. I was convinced that the parish, nay the very city of Lafayette itself, would have controlled the election. But I could not sanction it, because I thought it wrong upon principle. Subsequently, when I saw the scramble for political power, I voted for it, but I must confess individually it went very much against me. I am in favor of small districts, because they bring the representative and the represented in close contact.

The delegate from St. James, (Mr. Roman) who has spoken with a great deal of good sense, has attempted to establish a very material difference between the composition of the senate and the composition of the house of representatives, and he has assumed that unless the difference be maintained by the constituency of the former being made greater than that of the latter, the objects for which the senate was created will most signally fail. I conceive that there is nothing that requires this dissimilarity between them. I grant that they have different functions to perform; the senate has executive and judicial powers, as well as legislative powers. The house of representatives can alone originate bills of revenue. In these respects their powers are different; but in other respects they are the same. So far as they represent the will of the people, and are amenable to the will of the people, the republican doctrine is, that they both should be under the direct and immediate control of the people; and there should be no more exemption from this responsibility for the one than there is for the other. It is of the very essence of popular government that the representative be brought into close contact with his constituency; and to secure that end the districts should be small. But to this it is objected that it will be impossible to get a proper man in a small district to represent its interests; that you must have large districts to get men of splendid abilities. I repudiate the necessity for these extraordinary abilities. If a man is endowed with good sense, if he have the good of his constituents at heart, that is the desideratum, and not splendid abilities. Take a man from home, where he is well known, and where he has been weighed, to represent the interests of the parish, if you wish to see those interests zealously and properly represented. For the third municipality elect a man for the third municipality; for the second municipality elect a man for the second municipality; and for the first municipality elect a man for the first municipality. The third municipality has a large territory and a considerable population, but a considerable portion of that population are excluded from political rights. The first municipality, in 1840, had more than double the population of the second municipality, but the latter is now about equal in population. Another senator would remain to be elected after allotting one to each municipality. It has been determined that the four shall not be elected by a general ticket. It has been determined that the first municipality shall not elect two senators. Let the three municipalities combine then and elect the other.

But, oh! says the gentleman, you will destroy the political power of New Orleans. The majority of her citizens are opposed to districting the city, and if it be done I will not affix my name to the constitution. I am of opinion that the municipalities will prefer to elect one of their own citizens to represent them, responsible to them for his fidelity, than to participate in the election of four senators. They will have a direct voice in the election of that one; and they may not approve of any proceeding calculated to deprive them of that advantage. I do not know what they may do, but I know that they have heretofore had but a single senator, one out of seventeen; and that for a series of years their representatives opposed the call of a Convention, which was indispensable to equalize the representation in both branches of the legislature. At all events their political power in the senate has doubled.

They will not have, exclaims the gentleman, the same political influence as if they were combined. They will not be a concentrated mass. I agree with the gentleman in that. But I would establish a material distinction. When the general interests of the city are involved, they will act in concert, and as an unit, in defence of those interests. When the local interests are alone concerned, they may differ, and when those interests conflict, the country will decide between them. Shall I tell the Convention in candor and in good will what is the real difficulty? The politics at Washington unfortunately have too much influence among us. They enter too much into our legislation. Suppose there are thirty-three hundred votes, and one party gets fifteen hundred and the other party eighteen hundred, your representative represents but three hundred, the simple majority, and no more. When the views of the fifteen hundred upon general subjects are opposed to his, he misrepresents them in reference to those views. But if you go still further, and narrow down the majority to only fifty votes, your senators would represent those fifty votes, but the fifteen hundred would not be represented. This would be unjust, and that injustice ought not to be rendered possible. If one municipality entertains different feelings or sentiments let her be in a situation to speak out those sentiments; let her express her local politics. If the majority be whig or democrat, let the municipalities, even upon those subjects, express their respective predilections. When the interests of the city are only involved, the representatives and senators from the municipalities will act in concert—they will unite a Macedonian phalanx; but when their interests are divergent, they will divide, as they ought to vide. If general politics should enter into the selection of the representatives, they will each represent the politics of the different districts, and the fourth senator, that will be elected by the combined vote of the city, will represent the majority of two or three hundred that may be found to exist. That will be justice. The only alternative that we have is to adopt the proposition that I have submitted.

Mr. Marigny: I will sustain the proposition of the delegate from Jefferson.

Mr. Grymes desired to record his sentiments and opinions upon the question under debate. He would never consent that the senatorial district should be divided and subdivided. The result of the present proposition would be to prostrate completely the influence of the city in the general assembly. Its influence had already been destroyed in one branch of the legislature.

It seems to me (continued Mr. Grymes) that the Convention are retracing its steps. This parish, which has been for the last thirty years a senatorial district, is to be cut up, to make three districts, notwithstanding the principle enunciated, that no parish shall be divided in the formation of senatorial districts. To save appearances, one senator is to be elected by the whole district, and three by the independent districts de facto. I stand here as the representative of the senatorial district, and I am representing the will of the great body of my constituents, when I say they wish the district to remain as it is. I am in favor of large senatorial districts, and I differ in opinion from the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Preston.) His doctrines in relation to the senate are without any foundation. The theory of our government is, that the house of representatives immediately represents the people, and the constituency are divided in reference to that body in as many small districts as the most thorough paced democrat could desire. I have reflected upon the organization of popular governments, and I am convinced that it was the design of the framers of our institutions, that the senate should operate as a check upon the more numerous and more popular body. To it are confided all subjects of general policy, and whatever may effect the general interests of the State. What is required from it is greater circumspection—a cooler and more dispassionate judgment, to still the effervescence of the popular branch. But if it is to be constituted upon the same model—if there is to be no dissimilarity in the constituency or in the territory it represents, what becomes of the theory of the government that it is a check to guard against the results of hasty and inconsiderate legislation. It is a perfect farce, and amounts to no more than this, that thirty-two men coming from the same persons, and representing identically the same local interests, sit in one room as the senate, and seventy-seven persons sit in another room as the house of representatives. One of them is assuredly superfluous. The gen tleman from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) has pointed out what he conceived to be the immaterial difference in their functions. He skims but on the surface. He says the senate has judicial powers. The faculty of judging between man and man creates no difference in the legislative attributes of the members of that body, no more than the investment of the right to hear and determine civil or criminal cases would change the character of other functions that might be committed to the same individual. If both bodies of the legislature are to be elected by the same people, the difference will be small indeed. The design of a larger constituency is that the qualifications of candidates may pass through the ordeal of a more general scrutiny; and that by this means there may be greater wisdom and sagacity in the senate; superior coolness, greater experience in public affairs, and greater aptitude. The only distinction now remaining, is that they are called from a greater constituency. Destroy that difference, and the theory of our government is at an end. Do gentlemen contemplate to drive the government into the hands of a bare majority? That would seem to be the argument of the gentleman from Jefferson. If the members of the senate are to be called from a hamlet, from a small circle, the choice will be confided to a few. The character and qualifications of those that may be chosen, will pass without a proper scrutiny. And if the person chosen have general interests to represent, it must be apparent that he will not understand those interests, and will be unable to maintain them. For example, in a large district like New Orleans, a man may be elected from one of the local districts, that represents nothing but an imaginary interest, and that suppositious interest may be considered incompatible with the promotion of some general interest of the whole city. The province of the senate is to revise what has passed through the lower house; to stop the errors it may commit. If this be not its province, it is useless. As to a similarity in the constituency, that would defeat the object of having a senate to act upon the general interests of all the people, in contradistinction with the partial interests of particular individuals.

I concur in the remarks that fell from my colleague, (Mr. Benjamin) and I repeat his declaration, that with the proposition of the delegate from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) I could never sign the new constitution. It would paralyze the efficacy of the senate, so far as the city of New Orleans was concerned, and if the same principle were carried out for the balance of the State, it would merge the senate completely in the house of representatives, and would destroy every vestige of conservative power.

I am opposed to the proviso of my colleague (Mr. Roselius) requiring that one senator should be taken from each of the municipalities, as a constitutional provision. I think it radically wrong. I voted for it, it is true. But why? Because I wished to get all I could. It was contrary, however, to my deliberate judgment of the well-being and proper representation. I conceded for the purpose of securing a compromise.

I am surprised that the representative of an adjacent parish, so closely allied to us as the parish of Jefferson, having a similarity of interests and profiting by our advancement, and the increase of our population, which is spreading to her limits, should have raised his arm against New Orleans to strike a fatal blow upon her prosperity and her political existence. How could that delegate be induced to favor the amputation of the city—the cutting off of her limbs, the reduction of her political weight to a mere cypher?

Whenever the system of dividing senatorial representation into infinities, has prevailed, governments have lost their force; parties destroy one another, and the social fabric crumbles beneath its own weight. May God deliver us from these petty passions and excitements! The legislation of the country cannot maintain itself without the checks and balances, peculiar to our system, are preserved. Nothing is safe without them. Our liberties and our property is exposed to become the mere sport of a temporary majority. The interests o the minority ought to be vigilantly guarded. The ancient landmarks of the constitution must be preserved; the bulwarks that our ancestors have raised must not be revived;—there is a limit to the power of majorities, and beyond that limit they must not be allowed to pass. The power of the majorities must be restrained to its appropriate orbit. Let them govern, but let them govern according to fundamental principles. The new theories that we have heard are dangerous, and if they prevail, the strength and the power of the State are gone. The efficacy of our institutions are gone! We have already, in some measure, gone beyond the essential principles of popular government. We have approached the dead level. Every thing has been cut to suit the motives of the day. There is but one thing left—we are riding with a single anchor. If we desire to perpetuate our institutions, let us put the conservative power of the government in the senate. It is the only place where we can transfer it.

Mr. BEATTY said he was in favor of large districts. He was in favor of there being but one district in the parish of Orleans. The Convention had determined that no parish should be divided in the formation of senatorial districts, and yet, when he moved to re-unite that portion of the parish of Orleans to the senatorial district formed of the parish, they refused to carry out the very principle which they had sanctioned. Under these circumstances, he was left to the alternative of refusing to vote, or to take that course which his judgment dictated to him as the test. If large districts are not to be established, then he was willing to take small districts, and being unable to compel the Convention to be consistent, he would vote in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson.

The question was taken on Mr. Preston's motion, and the yeas and nays were called for.

Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Downs, Garcia, Humble, Ledoux, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Trist and Wederstrandt—28 yeas.

Mr. SOULE then moved that the Convention adjourn. Yeas 23, nays 37.

Mr. EUSTIS moved for the reconsideration of the vote upon Mr. Lewis' proposition, that the four senators allowed to the city should be elected by general ticket, as amended by the proviso of Mr. Roselius.

The yeas and nays were called for.

Mr. ROSELIUS stated he would withdraw his amendment.

Mr. McRAE made a call of the house—58 members present.

Whereupon, the Convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 8, 1845.

The Convention met agreeably to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. CLARK.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Senatorial representation of the city of New Orleans.

Mr. CULBERTSON said, that the reconsideration voted yesterday, embraced the proposition of the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) and the amendment offered thereto by the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Roselius.) The secretary explained. Mr. Culbertson stated that he had a distinct recollection of what took place, and he was not the only one that remembered the proceedings that were had after the vote was reconsidered. My colleague (Mr. Roselius) said he would withdraw the amendment, but no action was had upon granting him leave to withdraw, and according to parliamentary rules, when a motion was once entertained by a deliberative body, it could not be withdrawn but with the assent of the majority.

The PRESIDENT said there was nothing before the house without a motion to correct the journals.

Mr. CHINN said that his recollection differed somewhat from that of the gentleman. He remembered that the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Roselius) stated that he would withdraw his amendment—that the President asked if there was any objection, and no objection was made. The President said there was nothing before the Convention if no motion were made to amend the journals.

Mr. ROSELIUS wished the journals to state that he had withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. CULBERTSON said that his colleague labored under a mistake. He had asked to withdraw his amendment, but no action had been had thereon.

Mr. PORTER had a distinct recollection of the facts stated by Mr. Culbertson.

Mr. ROSELIUS did not set up his memory as being infallible in relation to this matter. He did not pretend to be certain of what actually took place. He did not pretend to be certain of anything—he was not certain that he was now actually in the Convention.

Mr. CULBELTSON said it was easily accounted for why his recollection was the most distinct; he took a greater interest in the amendment.

Mr. EUSTIS proposed to take the opinion of the President.

The PRESIDENT stated that when a motion was once entertained, it could not be withdrawn without the consent of the house.

Mr. ROSELIUS said there was no difficulty about the rule. The only difficulty was in relation to the facts.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said that the state of the question was simply this: the motion made to reconsider by the delegate (Mr. Eustis) for the purpose of striking out the amendment. The reconsideration was carried, and the delegate (Mr. Roselius) stated that he would withdraw his amendment. If the question was not actually taken, the tacit consent of the house was at least obtained for the withdrawal of the amendment.

Mr. ROSELIUS said, that to prevent further debate, he would move to strike out the amendment. His motion prevailed.

Mr. BENJAMIN then moved the adoption of Mr. Lewis' proposition.

Mr. CULBERTSON: I find it entirely incompatible with my ideas of justice to vote in favor of the proposition before us. When the subject first came up—I do not recollect the particular day—I made a motion to apportion the representation accorded to the city in the senate, in accordance with the basis of total population, which had been adopted by the Convention. It will be recollected that in making the apportionment for the senate in the several districts throughout the State, the census of 1840 was taken as the guide in making that apportionment. I had in view the populations in the three municipalities, as indicated by the census. The population of the first municipality was shown by that data to be forty-eight-thousand one hundred and thirty-one, and it was therefore entitled to two senators. The population of the third municipality was twenty-six thousand eight hundred and forty-three, and it was entitled to one senator—and the second municipality having a population of nineteen thousand two hundred and thirty-five, was entitled to one senator. On that occasion, I do not recollect that any objection was made to my proposition, except perhaps on the part of my colleague (Mr. Eustis.) My other colleagues who were present did not form any opposition. In proposing this distribution, I acted without favor or fear, and with the sincere desire to be impartial. The proposition was adopted. Since its adoption, a great deal of noise has been made—a good deal here and a good deal elsewhere, and the particular course I thought it my duty to follow, has been attacked with some degree of asperity. Expressions have been employed, which were not authorized, and which were in the highest degree, to say the least, out of place. Without taking any especial credit to myself, I may say, that I am as anxious to represent the interests of the city, and to reflect the will of my constituents, as any member upon this floor. I have incurred some displeasure because I would not yield my settled convictions of what I considered to be just and right in reference to this matter. We have been told that the people of New Orleans would not yield their assent; that they are opposed to that measure! What evidence have we, that they are opposed to it, especially under the form presented by my colleague (Mr. Roselius.) I profess to know something about the views and sentiments of those I represent, and I do assert that the proposition will be acceptable. Each municipality will have one senator taken from its limits, that will take care of its local interests, while he will unite with his colleagues in the maintenance of the general interest of the whole city. The fourth senator will be taken, from whichever section that it may please the good will of the people to determine, and if there should be any clashing of interest between the municipalities, he will act as a species of umpire between them. The idea has been put forth in this body that the interests of the municipalities are not adverse. I will not say that such a notion is ridiculous, that it is nonsensical. The amendment is not mine—I am not the father of it—it originated with a gentleman who entertains contrary views to my own upon the expediency of establishing each municipality into a senatorial district. If the interests of the municipalities be diverse, this diversity will not be reconciled by establishing a single senatorial district, neither will it be aggravated by conceding to each municipality its just proportion of political power. I have thought in view of the separate interests of the municipalities, that there should be some guarantee that each municipality shall be heard, and believing that the amendment would have that tendency as well as the effect of settling the question, I have given to it my sanction. But we are here met by the inquiry, why divide a city whose interests are identical? I may reply to this, that even in the view of those that are opposed to creating more than a single senatorial district in the city, they have admitted that these interests are not identical, not only in their arguments, but in the very proviso they have offered. And besides, have we not the very division of the city into three municipalities, to show that their separation was considered promotive of the furtherance of their special interests?

Should no provision be adopted, the result may be that one municipality will be overpowered by another, and will have to complain and groan for some adequate relief. If we adopt the principle of the proviso, whenever the general interests of the city may be involved, the senators elected for the whole city, but coming from each municipality, will sustain those interests by their united action. Of that there can be no question. I do not believe that the result will be the same without the proviso. It is assumed that it will be so, and that the municipalities will arrange the matter between themselves. That may happen, or it may not happen. I cannot leave to chance that which ought to be placed beyond the possibility of contingencies. One portion will always be liable to suffer if there be no express stipulation. These are my views hastily expressed. I am sure that the people of two of the municipalities are generally in favor of assuring to them a senatorial representation. I think it is for the interest of all the municipalities. An effort is made to induce the belief that the people of the second municipality are against it in mass. If this be so, I am sorry for it; but at the same time I cannot consent to yield up my convictions and to expose the political rights of any portion of my constituents, to be swallowed up.

Mr. Roselius: Since this discussion began, I have reflected a great deal upon the question of the alledged diversity of interest between the different sections of New Orleans. I have endeavored to ascertain in what particular such diversity might arise. Gentlemen assert roundly, that what I have always considered one city, constitutes three cities. In what respect, I would ask them, are the interests of the third municipality opposed to those of the first or second municipalities on subjects of general legislation? For we are not considering the local measures that may apply to the different parts of the city. Our attention is called to general subjects of legislation, which will occupy the councils of the State. What are the all pervading, the peramount interests of New Orleans? Is not this a great commercial city, and will not the measures promotive of the course of trade by the legislation of the State, apply as well to one municipality as to another? Will not the measures which are essential to develope the resources of the city operate equally? The city is not actuated by different springs of action, and whatever contributes to her general prosperity, is felt as well in one municipality as in another. Will gentlemen tell me that there is any difference between the different portions of the city in matters of general legislation? After the best reflection, I consider the city of New Orleans, in reference to general objects of legislation, as an unity. It is erroneous to suppose that there are any measures of State legislation, which would be detrimental to one and advantageous to the other. It was justly remarked by one of my colleagues, the other day, that all measures of a general character emanate from her general council. It is only local measures that are represented in the local councils. The executive power of the city is vested in one chief magistrate. There is but one mayor, and his functions are not circumscribed within the artificial bounds of the separate municipalities. Is it sound legislation—is it sound policy, to subdivide a city situated as New Orleans, the pursuits of whose citizens are the same, and whose commerce, mechanics and navigation cannot be severed: whose interests go hand in hand, and whose extended relations has procured for her the appropriate name of the great emporium of the west?

And is it seriously proposed to strike a fatal blow at this great city, by splitting her up into petty fractions? All history teems with examples of the fatal consequences of separating general interests. To divide a city—to divide a community—that should be joined in the bond of unity—of brotherhood! Why, what will be the consequence? What was the consequence that immediately flowed from that division? An absurd, a preposterous rivalship between the municipalities. Instead of combining the interests of the whole city, these municipalities contended with each other, so as to defeat the very object which they all should have had in view. Instead of pushing forward to the development of the immense resources of this vast city, they were distracted and divided by petty jealousies, fomented and kindled from day to day, and which counteracted the most beneficial measures—measures that would have given it the most irresistible impetus, and which would have spread improvements and prosperity over every portion of the city. With this fearful example before our eyes—with the consequences of this abominable, execrable policy, let us pause before we make the deplorable results of that short-sighted policy perpetual. The evil may as yet be remedied. The same power that divided us may unite us, and it would be an act of the greatest wisdom, if the first legislature convened after the adoption of this constitution, should ordain that the city should be restored to its former state of unity, before the passage of the act dividing the three municipalities. That ought to be done. These are my sincere wishes. There is nothing in the way as yet but a legislative act. But if we recognize the constitutional division of the city into senatorial districts, we interpose an insuperable barrier. The evil will then be irremediable. The division will be recognized in the constitution, and no legislative act will be available to unite the city. With a view to prevent this obstacle, the Orleans delegation took care in the division of the city into representative districts, not to allude to the division into municipalities. They divided the city into election districts, but they abstained from saying any thing recognitive of the existence of three municipalities. Let us beware how we proceed. If we change our former course in reference to the apportionment of the house, and recognize three municipalities, the separation will be perpetual, and no legislative act will ever unite the city. There is no measure comprised within the legislative functions that I have more at heart than to see the city united in name as well as in nature. The distinctions that may have suggested its division were unnatural; they were artificial, and were not authorised by the pursuits of the citizens or the permanent prosperity of the city. It was effected by the greediness of certain persons residing within certain limits. Let me not be misunderstood. I refer to the act dividing the city into three municipalities. That is one of the great objections—one of the reasons why I am in favor of a general ticket, and against the recognition in the constitution of the three municipalities. But it may be said that my acts are inconsistent with my professions, and I may be charged with introducing the proviso. That proviso never met my approbation. I consented with my colleagues to introduce it for the purpose of removing the objections of certain gentlemen on this floor. I am not disappointed with the course taken by the house in relation to it. I am rejoiced that it met with an unfavorable reception. It was a measure that I regretted to introduce. It was sacrificing expediency to principle. It is is the first time I have ever done so, and I hope to God it will be the last.

Now as to the practical operation of the election of the senators allotted to the city, by general ticket: Is there any necessity —I would ask my colleagues with whom I have the misfortune to differ—is there any necessity for a constitutional provision that the senators should be taken from different portions of the city. There is none. We have had the experience of thirty-two years under the old constitution, and I am not aware that an election has ever taken place that has not been fairly and justly conducted, in reference to the different quarters of the city. It is true, that in times of great political excitement, the candidates that may have been elected have been taken from particular quarters of the city. But these are exceptions to the almost invariable rule. The sense of the community has been that the persons to be elected should be taken from the different quarters of the city. They have done so, and will continue to do so. I repeat that this supposed diversity of opinion does not exist. It is merely imaginary. It is conjured up by the fervid imaginations of gentlemen. I challenge them to point out any subject of general legislation in which the interests of the municipalities are adverse to each other. If they cannot give a satisfactory reply, it is a fair inference that they are mistaken and that we are right.

Something has been said about the opinions of the citizens at large in relation to this question. I am now speaking in the presence of a number of my constituents; I have conversed with hundreds of them in the first municipality—I have conversed with some in the second municipality, and some in the third municipality upon the subject, and as far as my personal communications with them have gone, their sentiments are the reverse of those attributed by one of my colleagues, who is not in favor of the election by general ticket. There may be different opinions upon the expediency of the measure, entertained by the people of New Orleans, but for my part I have not met with a single one of my constituents who is in favor of it. I do not pretend to be better conversant with their views and feelings than any of my colleagues, but I have taken some little pains to satisfy myself how far public opinion favored the proposition, not in any one particular quarter of the city alone, but all over the city. I represent on this floor the whole city of New Orleans. I am not the representative of a particular section, although I was upon the point of saying—and I would have given utterance to a bull—that I had resided all my life in one quarter of the city. I may say that I have resided for a quarter of a century in the first municipality, and may claim as much identity with that municipality as most persons residing there. I have had as fair an opportunity of ascertaining their wishes and knowing their will as any one. I have met with no opposition to preserving the unity of the city in her representation to the legislature. The only opposition that I have encountered has been in this house. If there had been opposition it could not have escaped my attention. But should there even be opposition, should there be a majority of my constituents who were in favor of dividing the city in her senatorial representation, I would not permit them to dictate to me the course I should adopt upon this occasion. I am here to use the best lights of my reflection, and to do that which in my own judgment would be most conducive to the interests of the whole city. I do not recognize the right of instruction, and before I would do any thing which my conscience condemned, I would resign. I am persuaded that nothing could be devised more detrimental to the city than to split her up and divide her into petty fragments. She is already too much divided, and so far from sanctioning further divisions, had I the power, I would this moment cause the last traces of those that exist forever to disappear.

Mr. Soule proposed the following amendment:

Provided, That the legislature which shall assemble immediately after this constitution shall pass a law abolishing the division of the city into three municipalities, and shall constitute it into a single corporation with a single council and a single administration.

Mr. Marigny: if I ever regretted my want of familiarity with the English language, it is at the present moment, for I have the settled conviction that if I could make myself understood in that language, which is most generally understood by the members of this Convention, I would triumph over all opposition. The arguments of my colleague (Mr. Roselius) are not the arguments of the heart. His mind has created them in the midst of the movements and excitements that have occurred within the last forty-eight hours. Let us pass them in review, in order that I may destroy them as the lightning blasts the leaves of the trees that it may strike. I do not (says he) represent a fraction of the city, but the whole city, and those that are opposed to me are not familiar with public opinion. Their doctrines are irrational, pernicious, and are dangerous to the public tranquility. This language is far from being complimentary to those who may differ with him in opinion. He tells us that we are extravagant in desiring to carry out our opinions, and leaves it to be inferred that all the wisdom of the Orleans delegation is concentrated in his person. I but seldom speak of myself. I do not aspire to popularity, still less to those honors, which under a government like ours, a government which I fully comprehend, it would have been easy for me to have attained by the assistance of those natural talents that I possess, for the faculty of speech, if not of elocution. I may therefore, as every man would, who feels that he is in the right, place myself face to face with an opponent or enemy, in assuming the defence of what I consider just and rational. We have been told that the division of the city into three municipalities is a misfortune; but we have not been told who provoked that misfortune. This is the second part of the episode, which I shall now relate. I was a member of the legislature when the law was introduced, dividing the city into three municipalities, and among my colleagues was the honorable delegate from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis.) Another of the delegates (Mr. Conrad) was not actually a member of the legislature at that period, but he was a lobby member. If I am not much mistaken, he bore a conspicuous part in drafting the law, and in securing its passage. In examining the grounds assumed at that time by the honorable delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) and those that particularly co-operated with him, among whom were most conspicuous, we shall have a pretty accurate knowledge of the merits of that question. The honorable delegate from St. Landry assumed that there was an incompatibility in the union between the upper and lower portions of the city, and by what arguments do you think he supported that position? He said that in the upper portion, English was spoken, and in the lower portion, French. That there was more activity above, and greater insousiance below—that the hour of repasts were different, and that there was no similarity in the habitudes of making these repasts. That the French police were more severe than the American police, and would not permit those familiar boxing matches with which the new population were familiar in the streets. By these singular arguments he succeeded in establishing to his own satisfaction, and to that of the majority of the house, that there ought to be a division of the city. The most remarkable feature however, was the attempt made by him to incorporate a section in the law by which the whole of the property belonging to the old corporation should be estimated, and the first municipality charged with a debt of two millions towards the second municipality, and five hundred thousand dollars towards the third municipality. Persons of small intelligence inquired in vain how it could be that a mother who had fed and clothed her children out of her own resources, could become their debtor. But notwithstanding, the discussion lasted ten days. I opposed the whole measure with as much warmth and energy as I could command, and the house becoming wearied with hearing me address them in French, I was under the necessity of sustaining my views as well as I could in English.

I introduced documents which incontestably proved that the property which was to have been seized upon, belonged to the old corporation in virtue of donations made by the kings of France and Spain. The three champions of the division of the city and the spoliation of the old corporation, grounded their arms, and that section was rejected. It was however no less apparent, from the debates, that the authors of the scheme designed to extort two millions five hundred thousand dollars from the old corporation, independent of the territory they took from her to constitute the two other municipalities. And is it now that they will seriously tell us that New Orleans is but one city; that we are but one family; that we have the same habits and the same usages, and that we can very easily combine in making the elections common to the three municipalities, as one integral city? I admit that were there any danger to menace the common tranquility, we would act in concert in resisting it. If a war or an invasion was to occur we would be united, because valor is the natural sentiment of all, and each would feel that they were fighting more for the country than for a locality. But in times of peace we do not harmonise; we do not appreciate each other's peculiar customs in any thing, not even in religion, for the inhabitants of the first municipality dance and amuse themselves on Sunday, while the inhabitants of the second municipality are making their prayers or singing hymns.

One of the gentlemen, I believe it was my colleague, (Mr. Conrad) has entertained us with an account of the numerous and splendid steamers that adorn our wharves, and of those rich and vast merchant vessels that are wafted to us from every clime, but he has not told us where these vessels moor. That is an important matter which he has forgotten. But of what do you complain, asks the advocates of the general ticket system? Is it of a matter of preference that may result in the elections? If it be this, say they, you are mistaken, and the proof that you are mistaken is found in the fact that out of the eleven delegates representing the city in this Convention, there is not a single one that is a resident of the second municipality. That is true. It is the result of mere chance; but what shows that the second municipality nevertheless, exercises the influence from which we desire to relieve ourselves, is, that upon any question in which she may feel herself interested, she commands the services of a majority of the members of the city delegation, even when it is apparent that there is some conflict between her views and those of the two other municipalities; upon this very question eight of the delegates are for consulting exclusively her wishes. I admire the indefatigable zeal which is a characteristic of her citizens—their incessant activity and constant energy. But I cannot admit their right to monopolize and to swallow up the whole political power of the city. How long has it been since this desire has been manifested to conform to her wishes upon this question? Only two days. One of the city delegation, (Mr. Roselius) animated with the desire of conciliating the interests of the two other municipalities, presented a proviso. The second municipality will not consent to any concession. Mr. Roselius withdraws his proviso. What does the second municipality want? The four senators—nothing more nor nothing less! And why? because she calculates that with the concurrence of the first ward of the first municipality, which acts in concert with her, she will be able to control the election of all four senators. Let us not be deceived. Here is the true secret of her opposition to the measure of districting the city.

But to conclude with the development of the tactics of the partisans of the second municipality, I suppose that they desire to realize the project of annexing the city of Lafayette to the second municipality, under the cognomen of Jefferson city. This project has been entertained for the last ten years. Who will prevent this junction when the second municipality, in concurrence with the first ward, will have the power of electing the four senators? It frequently happens that a candidate leaves the first and third municipalities with a heavy majority, which is completely overthrown by the votes of the second municipality, and in the first ward of the first municipality. Is it to be supposed that this striking difference will decrease? Let us examine the question as we may, I am convinced that to be just, we ought to give one senator, at least, to each municipality; and whoever will examine this question dispassionately—whoever is indifferent to ephemeral popularity, cannot come to any other conclusion. We are, however, accused of being unreasonable, and reproached with acting from passion. To this I may reply, that those charges belong to those who impute them to us; and as a test of their sincerity, when they disclaim so much against the division of the city, and express so earnest a desire to see it reunited under one administration, my colleague (Mr. Soulé) has introduced a provision having that very object in view. I predict, notwithstanding all their declamation, that now, that this question is presented to them, they will not sustain it. They have told us that the division of the city is one of the greatest calamities that has befallen our community. Well, they have the opportunity of effectually avoiding that calamity. Will they avail themselves of it? I am convinced they will not, and I defy any one of them to vote in favor of that proposition.

Mr. Roselius: The gentleman is mistaken; I will vote for it.

Mr. Marigny: Do not interrupt me. I have not like you, the talents of the advocate; and I cannot engage, like you, in a contest of joinders and rejoinders.

Mr. Roselius: You defied me to vote for the proposition. I wish you to know that I will vote for it.

Mr. Marigny: So much the better, and if you do vote with us upon this question, I will make you my excuses. But will your vote prevent the second municipality from intriguing and protesting? I repeat it, no one respects more than I do the indomitable energy of the people of the second municipality, and no one better understands their policy and their designs. They will not cede, and if we do not take the weapons out of their hands, they will treat us as already conquered. I know that there are some whose interests are concentrated in the second municipality, who reside in the first and third municipalities. But when you ask them where they reside, they will tell you that their country residence is in the first or in the third municipality; that their places of business are in the second municipality. And, in fact, it is there that all their interests, and all their affections are centred. Look at our lobbies. They are filled with persons from the second municipality. If you adopt the proposition of the delegate from Opelousas (Mr. Lewis) you will see that they will retire, filled with pleasure and satisfaction; even although they be convinced that we are right. They will say, well, never mind, Mr. Marigny and Mr. Soulé were right in principle, but we have carried our point. And yet I am accused of having acted with passion; I, who have never asked what was not just and reasonable.

Why, I would ask, do you refuse to accord to New Orleans what has been conceded to certain other districts in the country? The former district of Rapides has been divided into two districts; the district of Feliciana has been divided into two districts; the district of Attakapas has been divided into two districts, and an effort is making to divide it into three districts. Why then not divide the district of New Orleans? If we are to be denied the privilege of being heard in the senate, the only remaining thing to complete our servitude, will be an order to keep silent, and to allow ourselves to be swallowed up without uttering one word of complaint. These gentlemen measure majorities by the yard, and according as they increase their majorities they withdraw their amendments, in the hope of carrying their proposition as it was introduced. This reminds me of the feats performed by a man I met in Paris, who was denominated the king of the lions. He had four of those animals, with whose merits he alone was familiar, which he produced one after the other, reserving for the close of his exhibition the most formidable. My colleague (Mr. Roselius) has not the lions caged; they would be too difficult to manage; but he has serpents in his pockets, and he produces them one after the other. He has already exhibited three, and here he is with the fourth, which is to destroy us, if that can be done; for what is this proposition, but a rampant and venemous monster, that has penetrated into our city, to swallow up one part for the benefit of another? I trust that the members from the country will not allow themselves to be taken by surprise, by a policy which is so dangerous; but that they will do their duty, by rendering justice to the first and third municipalities, as well as to the second.

But, says my colleague, (Mr. Roselius,) and I quote his words, "I have met no one in the city who is favorable to this division." I do not desire to controvert the inference from what he says; it may well enough be. I have too seen a large number of my constituents, and feel bound as much to believe the inference of my assertion, as I am to believe his. I declare solemnly, and every one must know that I am well acquainted with the lower portion of the city, that the masses in the first and third municipalities are decidedly in favor of the division of the city into senatorial districts; and I may add, that it is as natural for them to desire that division, as it is for the people of the second municipality to oppose it. The proverb says, that a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. The certainty of having the privilege of electing one senator, at least, is preferable to the hope with which we are amused, of electing four. If the second municipality was sincerely disposed, as we are told, to allow the four senators to be taken equally from the three municipalities, she would not have opposed the measure of giving one senator to each municipality with so much violence; and her advocates would have accepted the amendment offered by the delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston,) by which she would have secured the election of two out of the four senators, whenever she chose. She was, however aware that she would have the cooperation of the first ward of the first municipality, and hence her anxiety to have the election by general ticket, knowing full well that she could control the selection of four senators. Here is the true cause for the zeal she has displayed. If the number of electors were in proportion with the population, the first and third municipalities could maintain the contest, and resist the supremacy of the second municipality. But, inasmuch as total population is the basis of the right of representation, the number of electors is the means of realizing the proportion of political power; and as the second municipality has the greatest number of electors in proportion with the numerous families and persons of color, with the slave population that are found in the first and third municipalities, it is apparent that the result would be at the control of the second municipality. Hence the zeal of our adversaries. Hence her complaints, her outcries, and her menaces. I say her menaces, because men who had rendered themselves popular a short time before, have been vehemently denounced, perhaps even hung in effigy, because they would not sacrifice the interests and the welfare of the other municipalities. Let her storm as she may—let her make as many outcries as she may, and let her denounce as she may, men who would not yield their convictions at her behests! It is not I, certainly, a veteran of the tribune, that will quiver before such a storm. I would rather lose all the advantages of three months' popularity, and of services rendered, than to hesitate a single instant in my duty. If I should fall in the contest, so much the worse. But those even, that may triumph, will, sooner or later, appreciate my motives and do them justice.

It is for you, gentlemen of the country, to decide. Upon you will devolve the task of determining the controversy between the city delegation. Close your ears against the clamors that have assailed you, free yourselves from the influence of intrigues and passions, with which you may have been surrounded. Place your hand upon your consciences, and judge without fear. You are told truly that there is this difference between this section of the constitution and an act of the legislature, that one is submitted to the will of the legislature, and that the other controls the legislature. And it is in view of that difference, that I understand it, as well as the gentleman, (Mr. Roselius,) and that I ask you to determine our limits and our rights, so that the day after your adjournment, these guaranties shall not be touched. My arguments, I readily avow, are not so brilliant as those of my opponents, but they are the suggestions of an old experience; and it is from my heart that I receive that energy which sustains me in the position I have assumed. I am attached to the soil upon which I was born, and I do not wish to die with the conviction, that in a short time there will be left nothing but the ruins of that portion of Louisiana where first began the glory and prosperity of the State.

Mr. Saunders moved to lay Mr. Soulé's amendment on the table, subject to the call of the house.

Mr. Claiborne said that he was not opposed to the principle enunciated in the proviso offered by his colleague (Mr. Soulé.) He was disposed to accept it with some modification. He thought however, it would be better to introduce the matter into a separate section, and to assign it a place in the general dispositions. Here is a form in which I would present the proposition:

Provided, that it shall be the duty of the legislature to unite and to constitute by virtue of a law passed for that purpose, two or more of the municipalities into one corporation, upon the application of a majority of their respective councils.

Mr. Culbertson said that he had always regretted the division of the city, and that he would be glad to see it reunited.

Mr. Soule called for the yeas and nays upon the motion of Mr. Saunders', to lay his proposition upon the table.

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Brumfield, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, McRae, Mazureau, Penn, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Pugh, Roman, St Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wikoff and Winder—35 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Culbertson, Eustis, Garcia, Humble, Ledoux, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Read, Roselius, Scott of Feliciana, Soulé, Stephens, Waddill, Wadsworth and Wederstrandt—25 nays.

Mr. Lewis: I do not rise with a design to discuss this question, but to put the gentleman (Mr. Marigny) right upon some matters of history. He has seen fit to refer to me, and to two other gentlemen, who were members of the house of representatives at the period, and upon the occasion to which he has referred. He has not drawn from his memory, but from his fertile and vivid imagination for his facts. I never certainly had the folly to employ the silly arguments that it has pleased him to put in my mouth. He has created a man of straw for no other purpose than the pleasure of showing his dexterity in demolishing this imaginary opponent! I cannot permit his remarks to go before the world, without a denial of their accuracy, at least as far as they are intended to apply to me. The only thing that is true is, that I favored the division of the city into three municipalities. The remarks which it pleased him to make upon the proceedings that he assumes took place in the legislature, are entirely out of place, and I should have taken no notice of them, had he not particularly alluded to me. I conceive that what we have to do has no relation to the past action of the legislature; and in this particular instance, if the legislature has done wrong in dividing the city, it will be in its power to rectify the error, provided that no constitutional restriction should supervene. If it be the desire of gentlemen not to put this matter beyond the power of the legislature, they will be particularly careful as to the action they may take upon the present proposition. If they sanction by a constitutional provision, the division of the city into three municipalities, how can they expect to re-unite the city and to do away with these local divisions? Will it not prevent the very object which they claim to have so much at heart? It will amount to an absurdity that a city divided into parts only large enough to be represented in a municipal body, should have its senatorial representation distributed among these different sections. The member (Mr. Marigny) has charged me and two others with being influenced in our course, because as he says, there were different kinds of population in the city. I never presented such an argument, nor do I remember to have heard it employed. He says, moreover, that the habits of the people residing in certain portions of the city are different—that in one section on Sundays they dance and sing, and that in another they participate in religious devotions to the God that made them. He asserts this to be a fact. I know nothing of it, and I leave him to maintain the assertion. I never alluded to any thing of the kind, and if I were to admit it, it would be entirely upon his responsibility.

The gentleman (Mr. Marigny) appears anxious that the city should be restored to its former state of a single corporation, and in the next breath he tells us that the differences between the municipalities are irreconcilable, and leaves us to infer that if the municipalities were brought together, it would give rise to a great deal of acrimony and dissatisfaction, and would lead to constant collision. He has said much about a design, entertained, as he says, by the second municipality to unite herself with the city of Lafayette, and charges that municipality with a sort of moral cannibalism. I would request the gentleman not to point me out—I would thank him not to choose me as the subject of but and ridicule. In the exuberance of his fancy, and with a touch of his ridicule, he has singled me out as an object of attack. Hence I wish to correct him in the same journals upon which his remarks will appear.

In the views that I have formed upon the question under debate, I am not governed by any local considerations in reference to the first, second or third municipalities. I do not know what are their financial positions, nor their political predilections; nor is it necessary that I should have that knowledge, to the discharge of my duties in this body. Some gentlemen, who are more competent than I, have treated upon what constitute the real and essential differences between the house of representatives and the senate. I concur in the line of their arguments, and in their deduction, that if both bodies are elected by identically the same constituency, both in reference to persons and to territory, one of them becomes superfluous. It is an useless expense. It is having double chambers, one of which might well be dispensed with. For these reasons, I am in favor of large districts, and I have heard no good reason why the city of New Orleans should be an exception to a general rule of policy, deemed beneficial for the whole State. As to whether one or the other municipality should have the ascendency in the elections, that is to me a matter of superlative indifference. I care not whether it be the first or the third municipality, or both combined, that have the ascendency. The majority will govern, and that is the theory of our government; as to sectional divisions, they should have no weight with us, especially in the composition of a body which is designed to represent general interests. The matter before us is one of serious importance to the whole State. The senate should be so constituted as to act with certainty, by its gravity and wisdom, as a check upon the popular branch of the government. It must be essentially different in its organization to answer that end, from the more numerous and more fluctuating body; and it should represent a larger and more permanent constituency. It is for the benefit of the State that I desire to retain the conservative features of the senate, not only in reference to the country districts, but in reference to the city districts. There are permanent interests of the city as well as permanent interests of the State to be protected, and these interests fall appropriately within the peculiar functions of the senate.

As to the division of the city into municipalities, for which act in a legislative capacity, I have been most singularly arraigned by the member from New Orleans, to whom I have referred particularly in the course of my remarks, the reasons that induced me to sustain that measure, and which was participated in by the country members, was to create a spirit of emulation and rivalship between the great divisions of the city; and that object has been fully attained. The people of the country had reason to complain of the inconveniences to which they were subjected in their intercourse with the city, and they felt desirous to promote a remedy. The port in front of Canal street was visited only by small sail-vessels. Steamboats and ships were confined to a small space, while there was a large portion of the port unoccupied. There was no landing any where but in that particular and favored portion of the port, situated in the limits now comprehended as the first municipality. It was in that celebrated municipality, about which so much fuss is made, that the produce of the country had to be landed, and the owner could not land it where he pleased, but was compelled to go clear there, by some arbitrary ordinance of the city council. The business of the country with the city was cramped down by the petty regulations of a petty municipality, and the monopoly was shared by a few lords residing in that portion of the city. Many were the evils resulting from the abuses that had grown up with this monopoly. It was a common sight to see horses stalled in the streets, and while business could not command the facilities it required, the grass was growing up in the faubourg St. Mary. The people of that portion of the city complained that their resources were taken from them, and expended with a lavish hand below, while they were left without any improvements. They declaimed again at that spirit of injustice, which left their portion of the city in a state of nature, and they asked to be entrusted with the management of their own affairs, and the disbursement of their own money. These complaints and the disposition to extend every facility to the growing trade of the city, induced me and others to vote for the division, and not the flimsy and ridiculous pretences that have been put in my mouth by the member who has forced me to this reply. It was to relieve the people of the second municipality from the iron yoke by which they were oppressed—and it was not only on their account, but I considered it a measure called for by the best interests of the whole State. I do not conceive that because the city has been divided into municipalities, that it must therefore necessarily be divided into senatorial districts. On the contrary, I conceive that there are as many and as solid reasons for not sanctioning the latter measure, as there were for sanctioning the former. Whether the city should be re-united under one corporation, is a question of policy for the legislature hereafter to determine; and I repeat that if the gentleman and his friends are sincere in what they have advanced upon the expediency of that measure, they will do nothing here to interpose an insuperable obstacle.

Mr. Marigny: the delegate from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis) has told you that in order to place him in a ridiculous position, I have put in his mouth arguments that he never employed. To this charge I will respond by a simple fact. The discussion upon the subject of dividing the city into municipalities continued for more than fifteen days. That gentleman declared himself warmly in favor of that measure, and as the passion, I may say, the fanaticism that animates him in debate, is a mystery to no one, while it will be conceded that if I am not brilliant in my discourses, I never abandon the rules of politeness. I would ask, how is it possible in a debate of fifteen days, when he was at issue with his adversaries, and was excited with them on that occasion, as he has been to-day, that he could have forgotten his wonderful facility of speech, and given merely a silent vote? He was no more then deaf and dumb than he is now. I can assure you, gentlemen, that if I were to repeat one-half of what he did say on that memorable occasion, you would have to make your arrangements to remain here all night, for I would certainly entertain you until to-morrow morning.

Mr. Soule: whatever repugnance I may feel in addressing the Convention again upon this vexed question, and I may add, in a language with which I am not as familiar as I would desire, I feel bound by the duty that I owe to my constituents, to express my views and opinions upon the debate that has been excited by the clause under consideration. It will be remembered that from the very commencement of this discussion, at its very outset, I assumed the position that the division of the city was the greatest curse that could have befallen it; that, notwithstanding the general opposition it met with from the entire population below Canal street, it was nevertheless carried, and that it was now an accomplished fact! The consequences of that act have not been denied. I further had the honor to remark, that if the measure advocated by my colleague from New Orleans (Mr. Roselius) was calculated to do away with the consequences of that division, and to supersede those ill feelings that were unfortunately its concomitants, I was ready to yield to it. Such was my position then, and such is the position of my friend and colleague who has just resumed his seat. We did assert, and we do assert, that if we can be met with any thing like fairness on the ground that the unity of the city would be preserved by the adoption of the clause under consideration, we are ready, in a spirit of reciprocal fairness, to yield to that proposition. But, sir, to bring the question to a proper test, in order not to leave in the minds of any the least room for doubt, what have we done? We have proposed to the Convention a clause by which it is made the duty of the legislature that shall assemble immediately after the adoption of the new constitution, to do away with these local divisions—to pass an act restoring the city to its former state, with a single council and a single administration. When that clause was before the Convention, my friend and colleague asserted boldly, but truly, as experience has shown, that out of the entire delegation who had spoken so much about the unity of the city and the identity of its interests, there were none, and at all events but one that would sustain that proposition. I applaud the gentleman that gave his vote in its favor for his firmness and sincerity—it established that he was at least consistent with himself and with what he had advanced in the debate! He was the only exception among those that assumed yesterday one position, and deserted that position to-day. The motion to lay my proposition upon the table, was an ingenious attempt to avoid the painful position of controverting one moment after, what had been assumed in debate a moment before. That was the object contemplated; that was the object to be attained. There were not two among the advocates of a general ticket for the election of senators for the city, that were in favor of re-uniting the city under one municipal government. This fact will stand in bold relief in the records of the Convention! Let not gentlemen suppose that the people are deceived; that the dilemma in which they were placed has been artfully avoided. The fact is well and conclusively established, that after having exhausted the subject—that after pressing upon the Convention the unity of the city, and deprecating the division of the city into municipalities, there are not two in favor of re-uniting the city, although they have told us over and over again that there are no conflicting interests, and to suppose that the city has divergent interests, is only a stretch of the imagination. These are their arguments on one side, and there stand their votes recorded on the other; not upon the direct question, it is true, of re-uniting the city, but upon the question to evade that proposition when it is directly presented to them as the test of their sincerity? That vote cannot be expunged. It speaks volumes.

If that be the true position of the case, the question of unity is done away with. We have been beaten,—conqured upon the very ground that they assumed, of the unity of the city; and our efforts, stimulated by their professions, to attain that object; to restore to the city its former organization; to expunge the feature of a division of feeling, a division of interest, and a division of sentiment, have proved unavailing. My honorable friend who treated us yesterday with a discussion upon the proper organization of the senate, (Mr. Grymes) gave us some exploded notions as original suggestions upon the theory of government. He placed the question upon the unity of the city, and yet of all the votes that appeared to favor that argument, there was but one that came to us this morning. Let gentlemen explain the inconsistency of their votes with the arguments that they have assumed. I will now advert to some of the grounds upon which they have placed this question in their debate. We have been told by the gentleman to whom I have just alluded, (Mr. Grymes) that unless we adhere to this last spot—this last dyke—that unless we preserve territorial representation, there is an end of all honesty, and a total revulsion of social order. Gentlemen have told us an hour ago, that territorial divisions are done away with; that we have nothing to do with it. Are we to recur to what has been settled by a direct vote of the Convention? If we are to discuss the subject upon territorial apportionment, let us have it in its proper form. The question before us has nothing to do with considerations of territory. We have determined that total population should be the basis of apportionment in the senate—not territory. This basis was proposed by a gentleman opposed to us on this question in one of the suggestions comprehended in the compromise offered by him. I allude to my colleague, (Mr. Benjamin.) I was opposed, with gentlemen on the other side of the house, to that basis, but it was nevertheless carried by the majority; therefore territory, federal population or white population, has nothing to do with our decision of this question. We are to be governed by total population alone.

The arguments of the honorable delegate, (Mr. Grymes) if they fall, as they do, within the question of territory, are fanciful—they are in an inverse sense, and are not applicable to the basis that has actually been adopted. But the gentleman may be excused; he has been absent occasionally from the debates, and it is quite possible that the decision of the question as to the basis has escaped his apprehension. The question of territory having been altogether superseded, the apportionment should be made in conformity with the principle of uniformity and equality, that we have explicitly consecrated; and it results from that principle, that numbers alone are to be considered in the distribution of political power, so far as the senate is concerned. Equal numbers are to have equal representation. If we speak of uniformity in districting representation, it must be understood to apply only as far as uniformity be practicable. The same may be said of equality.

I have never heard any objection to this, if I except the objection made by the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Beatty.) That gentleman proposed to preserve the integrity of the parochial limits. I thought there was great propriety in maintaining their integral limits as he suggested, and that he was right in principle. I apprehended, however, that it would not be carried into practice, and the decision of the Convention fully confirmed me in my anticipations; from hence I inferred that the question was determined in relation to the district of Orleans to the other districts. The principle of apportionment for the senate being total population, we have only then a mathematical calculation to make to carry out the representation among the several districts. The total population of the State is placed at five hundred and twenty-two thousand two hundred and eighty-five souls —allowing that it is within one hundred thousand of that number, which it actually is—it may be estimated at four hundred and fifty-two thousand two hundred and eighty-five souls. That number divided by thirty-two, the number of senators, will give fourteen thousand one hundred and seventy-three as the representative number, or in other words, the population entitled to a senator. But by reason of the restriction placed upon the city in the senate, there is an inequality in the representative number for the city and for the country; and if we deduct the population of New Orleans from the aggregate population of the State for the purpose of ascertaining the relative number for both, we find that in the country a population of about twelve thousand five hundred and seventy are entitled to one senator, while in the city it would require about twenty-four thousand five hundred and eighty. By comparing these results with the results of the basis of electors, chosen for the house of representatives, we find that the proportion is about one-third to entitle a population to a representative to the lower branch of the legislature—that is to say about one-third of fourteen thousand one hundred and seventy-three. If this criterion be true, its application to the three municipalities will not be difficult. We find that the first municipality, according to the census of 1840, had a population of forty-three thousand five hundred and forty-six, she would be entitled then to two senators; while the second municipality, if the proportion were observed, would not be entitled, with her population of twenty-one thousand and twenty-three, to more than one senator; and the third municipality, with a population of twenty-nine thousand one hundred and sixty-eight, would be entitled to one senator.

The result from these calculations is clear, or figures are not to be relied upon. The proportion, if the city is to be divided into senatorial districts between the relative number of representatives and senators allowed to the municipalities, would be as follows: Nineteen representatives have been allowed to the city of New Orleans, which have been distributed in this proportion—eight to the first municipality, seven to the second municipality, and four to the third. By allotting the number of senators contemplated by the report of the minority, in proportion to the number of representatives a constituency entitled to four representatives would be entitled to one senator. How would this proportion stand in relation to the city of New Orleans. If one senator were allowed to the first municipality, the proportion would be one senator to eight representatives, and if one senator were allowed to the second municipality the proportion would be one to seven, and for the third municipality one to four. If we must needs realize the pretended feature of a larger constituency for the senate than for the house, I would ask those who object to the division of the city into senatorial districts if that condition is not here fully established. The local interests of each municipality will be represented by several persons in the house of representatives, while they will have but a single representative in the senate.

I now recur naturally to the true physiognomy of the city. It presents three distinct cities under one common name, with little or no unity, and that by the constant struggle between their relative interests, more especially between the second municipality and the other two. From what fell from the gentleman from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) it would be supposed that the means of the old corporation were squandered for the profit of the city proper, while the grass was allowed to grow in the second municipality—that not one cent was appropriated for the improvement of that municipality. The gentleman must have been very sparing of research not to have enlightened his mind by a reference to facts when that consideration induced him to vote for the division of the city; and he must be still more sparing of research, to labor still under the same delusion. It is a notorious fact, that the old corporation possessed, at a period anterior to that when the city was divided, several millions of dollars. In 1828 the second municipality had not began to exhibit those wonderful signs of improvement which she displayed in 1834. It was at the latter period that she commenced her giant career which has been attended with such a wonderful prosperity. When the division took place, the wharves in that municipality were already effected out of the resources of the city proper. Had the gentleman from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis) examined the records he would have become convinced, that so far from the fonds of the old corporation being employed to ameliorate the city proper, they were exclusively devoted to improvements in the faubourg St. Mary. In 1830, when I became a member of the city council, sixty thousand dollars had been appropriated to paving in the second municipality, and while Royal street, the second street then in importance, was left unpaved, Natchez street, a little alley in the second municipality, was already paved.

The fact is notorious; the city proper was left without any improvements, while all the resources of the old corporation were diverted and expended to the benefit of the second municipality. The representatives of the city proper in the council, were for the most part of the old school, good, honest, ignorant, if you will, for they did not wish to go farther than their resources, and were unwilling to contract debts which they might be hereafter unable to pay. The second municipality were drawing from the coffers all the revenues of the city. In 1827 there was a fund created for the paving of the city; two cash accounts were opened, one for the first municipality, and one for the second and third. It was intended that each section should have its relative proportion. When I was elected in 1830, I endeavored to discover the traces whence this money had been expended; I found nothing but one general cash account, and the only means I had of ascertaining how it had been expended, and where, was to walk through the streets of the city; I found that nothing had been done below—all had been done above. When the municipalities were united there were no improvements deserving the name, made in the square of the city, while every thing was going ahead in the second municipality. Now, what is the position of the city proper in relation to the second municipality? From the first to the last of the centre of the squares of the city proper have been paved; her debt has disappeared in the ratio of her improvements; and the second municipality, that has no longer the coffers of the old corporation to drain, have contracted a debt of three millions of dollars. When she found that all the money was exhausted she set up for herself; she has created excessive taxation, and has been unable even with that taxation, to put a stop to the accumulation of her liabilities.

So far then from meriting the accusation that the revenues of the second municipality under the old corporation were diverted from that municipality, it is susceptible of proof that she received in appropriations for improvements, ten times as much as she paid. That shows that the people of the lower portion of the city were never deficient in generosity. We are told to be on our guard. That the second municipality is destined to absorb the political power of the city. We are told that the next census will show the weakness of the first and third municipalities; and in the pleasing visions of the prospective we are told that if we will behave ourselves and not insist upon anything, but throw ourselves upon their generosity, it will be better for us. Experience has shown that we have nothing to expect from their generosity. Generosity? We ask nothing but justice. I care little how what I may have said shall be received in certain quarters. There is no consideration under the cap of heaven which would induce me to remain silent when it is proposed to despoil a certain portion of the city—perhaps the weakest—of those privileges, and those immutable rights to which it is entitled. If in the course of events, the second municipality should attract the mass of the whole population—if our streets are deserted—let them enjoy to its fullest extent, all their prosperity. Let them have it. I claim it for them as I would claim it for us. If there be no cohesion of interest between her and the other municipalities, let her remain separate and distinct. If you have satisfied yourselves that there is this identity of interest, I know not how I can sufficiently admire the logical manner in which you have voted upon my proposition to re-unite the city. If voting in this Convention be not a miserable manoeuvre, let us have a direct vote upon that question. My vanity will not be wounded by a defeat, nor shall I exult at a victory. My political life is at an end, and brief as it has been, I may respond to those who accuse naturalized foreigners of an over weening ambition, that I have seduously refused all offices of public trust. That in the present instance, I was constrained to give a reluctant consent, and that no ambitious thoughts find a refuge in my breast. I have given up all such desires if I ever entertained them, and if they have entered my heart, it has been but for a short time. Had I the power to retrace my steps, surely, surely I would retire from this hall, to which I have been delegated by the partialities of my fellow citizens, before this question was put. Let us determine calmly—dispassionately, without regard to political considerations, and that justice, justice alone may be done. If there be but one identical interest between the municipalities, it cannot be impaired by allowing them separately to choose their senatorial representation. If it is true, as has been assumed, and must be assumed, that there is a perfect concord and harmony between the municipalities—that one will not seek to despoil another of the right of being heard in the senate, where is the danger of conceding to each the privilege of electing its senator? If there is to be any collision, then the argument is unfounded—it is a sophism that destroys itself. But is there really that identity of interests? I say there is not, and in confirmation of what I advance, I appeal to unerring history. I appeal to the law itself dividing the city into three municipalities. There it is. The most eloquent speech that could be pronounced to refute the arguments of gentleman that the interests of the city are one and identical. It is the ground work of the division, and it must convince the house that there is none of that identy about which we have heard so much. A law is nothing but a translation of the feelings, prejudices and passions of those who called it into existence. Every word of this law bears the stamp of prejudice, passion and feeling. Here is the text:

Be it enacted, &c. That the city of New Orleans is hereby divided into three different municipalities, each of which shall be vested with distinct powers. Each of which shall have the exclusive right within its respective limits to regulate its own affairs, and to make such ameliorations and improvements as it may think proper.

We are told in the first line that the city shall compose three distinct and separate municipalities. Here is a proof of the diversity of feeling and interest; secondly, that the power to make ordinances shall be exclusive, and that an ordinance passed in one municipality, shall have no force beyond that municipality. The division is perfect and complete. The law speaks in a louder voice than mine. Have we one city? I do not dispute upon words, but the thing itself has ceased to exist. We have three cities. It is true that there is but one general name, but why is it so? It is entirely attributable to the fact that the city of New Orleans was recognized in the old constitution. When the division was proposed, it was suggested by those that exclusively favored the measure—some of the prominent citizens of the second municipality—that the faubourg St. Mary should be established as a city, and they had already appropriated to it the name of Jefferson. A place was assigned for the court house, and every thing was prepared for the selection of its civic dignitaries; its mayor, as well as its board of council. All these arrangements were in part frustrated. But the second municipality obtained the thing without the name. The city was divided, but its name was retained.

We have been repeatedly asked in what respect any conflict between the three municipalities can arise? I will reply that upon one subject of great importance—the appropriation of money. It is natural that the senators coming from a particular quarter of the city, should have its interests more peculiarly at heart, and that it will in the distribution of public favors, consult that section. But we are told that there is no proof that the second municipality will appoint the senators. If we had no proof yesterday, we have got proof now. If she did not desire and was not aware that she could control the election of all four senators, would she not have acceded to the proposition that allowed her two? If she had shown any such disposition, I might have been condemned to silence, and in that partial distribution I might have left my reflections to the recesses of my mind. The conviction forces itself upon me that she wishes the appointment of all four senators. Perhaps if we had behaved well and not have evinced too much reluctance, she might have consented to make some terms with us. But that hope is fled forever. We have had the boldness to assert our rights, and to revolt at the injustice which was about to be done. There is one more consideration, and it is one which I shall support to my last breath. It holds no connection with political aspirations, but proceeds from the depth of my heart. When we cast our eyes about us we must admit that we are but strangers in this land of Louisiana. In looking around this Convention, the painful reflection is forced upon us that out of seventy-seven members, there are only eighteen coming from that population that once had property and every thing, that were possessors of this vast territory. They have yielded to the iron rule of time, and all that they ask of this new and unconquered population that have covered the land, is to be heard. They do not ask it as an act of generosity, but they ask it as an act of justice. Will you listen to their demand? That is the question.

Mr. Roselius had one word or two to say in reply to the insinuations about the purity of the motives of those who differed in opinion from the gentleman that had just addressed the Convention, and another gentleman that preceded him. From the language spoken by these two orators—and it appears to be susceptible of but one interpretation—it might be understood that I and others of the delegation of the city, are acting upon this question as the peculiar advocates of the interest of the second municipality. I am at a loss to conceive what grounds there are for any such suspicion. I utterly repel it. I stand upon this floor as the representative of the whole city; I am not the advocate of sectional interests, if there be any, which should claim the attention of this body; I am not the advocate, at any rate, of the interest of one portion of the city, to the detriment of another portion of the city. The insinuation, therefore, is gratuitous; and if the gentlemen had reflected, instead of inferring any inconsistency on the part of others, they would have been convinced that they were inconsistent themselves; for if the proviso which I introduced was so important, why did they not vote for it? Both of the gentlemen have made it the ground-work of their arguments, and they both voted against it. Why do they insinuate that we are led by the second municipality? I profess to lead no man, nor am I led by any one. I am one of those that do not recognize the right of instruction, and if the whole city were to instruct me upon a matter where my mind had come to a conscienceious conclusion, I would rather resign than to violate what I conceive to be right. But I am told that my proviso did not suit the second municipality; from what fact do the gentlemen draw that inference, who voted against the proviso? I declared that I cared little or nothing for it. Is that a sufficient reason to intimate that I and other gentlemen are operated upon by the second municipality? Why, I declared it was of little importance. I felt assured that no provision was necessary, for the municipalities themselves would see the propriety of taking the senators from the different sections of the city. I do not intend to enlarge upon this subject, nor do I wish to occupy the time of the Convention. But I again challenge the gentlemen to point out one solitary question of general legislation, where there is any conflict between the municipalities. I challenge them to adduce it. They have attempted it, but it has proved abortive. The last eloquent gentleman has referred to a question of the distribution of the public funds. If one section should attempt to obtain an appropriation to the exclusion of another section, would that be a question of general legislation? Does the gentleman pretend that this is answering my question? It is not. This is not a question, I repeat, of general legislation. It is not to be presumed, that if it was an act of glaring injustice to the others, the appropriation would not be made. I think that the division of the city would inflict a deadly blow upon its interests, and I have heard nothing to induce me to change that opinion.

The question was then taken on Mr. Lewis' proposition to elect the four senators allotted to the city, by general ticket.

Mr. Soule called for the yeas and nays.

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquié, Brumfield, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wadsworth and Winder—33 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Culbertson, Downs, Garcia, Humble, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Penn, Porche, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Read, Scott of Feliciana, Soulé, Trist, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff—30 nays.

Mr. Soule gave notice that he would move for the reconsideration of the foregoing vote.

Mr. Trist gave notice that he would move for the reconsideration of the vote, upon constituting St. James and Ascension one senatorial district.

Mr. Splane, in pursuance of previous notice, moved for the reconsideration of the vote constituting St. Mary and St. Martin one senatorial district.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: the gentleman has made this motion already, and it failed.

The President said that the motion was in order, inasmuch as the whole section was before the Convention.

Mr. Splane said he had a few remarks to make why he thought that St. Mary should be constituted into a separate senatorial district. I had understood that the senatorial delegate of the county of Attakapas would have sustained my proposition, and that it would be sustained by the majority of the delegation. To my utter astonishment I have found that there is only one of the delegates, the delegate from Lafayette and Vermillion, that is in favor of it. Why I have been abandoned by the other two, I have never inquired. I am in favor of small districts, and this measure is not only satisfactory to me on account of principle, but on the score of expediency and the general wishes of my constituents. They do not wish this connexion, and without distinction of party they are in favor of its formation into a separate district.

Mr. Benjamin suggested, that inasmuch as the delegation from Attakapas were not all present, it would be better to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow, at 12 o'clock.

Mr. Spane acquiesced.

Whereupon, the Convention adjourned.

Wednesday, April 9, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer from the Rev. Mr. Clark.

Mr. Garcia moved that the reading of the journals be suspended.

Mr. Wadsworth rose and said:

Mr. President—It is with deep feelings of regret that I announce to you the demise of one of our colleagues, the honorable Gilbert Leonard. I have known him for twelve years intimately, as a brother. He was a man of strict honor and integrity. His word was his bond. He never violated his integrity, nor wrongfully injured any man. No one could ever charge him with a mean or dishonorable action. He had his hardships to undergo, but by his indomitable perseverance and energy he overcame them. Although allied to one of the first families of the State, he had in early life to struggle against the afflictions of poverty, and in the school of adversity he acquired those high and noble qualities—that high and chivalrous devotion to his friends—that noble and impulsive generosity that so much distinguished him, and which endeared him to all who knew him. To his own exertions he was indebted for the high position he attained. He was pure of morals, temperate, exemplary—in all the relations of life he was estimable. Long and deeply will his untimely end be deplored. I feef, Mr. President, that I am unable to proceed. I cannot repress the emotions with which I am filled at this sad and melancholy bereavement.

Mr. Marigny said:

Mr. President—I rise under the influence of the most painful emotions, to add my feeble voice to the tribute rendered to the virtues of our deceased colleague. It is committing to the most profound sorrow, the task of exalting the purest friendship. Gilbert Leonard is no more! His career was at once brave, honorable and generous.

Scarcely had he attained the age of manhood, when, escaping from the college of Orleans, where he had been placed by some friends of his family, he volunteered his services in the defence of his native State, to drive back the British legions. The contest being gloriously terminated, he returned with the laurels of valor, but poor, and compelled too seek the means of subsistence. This painful position, instead of disheartening him, raised and exerted his energy. He assiduously applied himself to labor, and by patient industry sought to create for himself a more brilliant future. It was during this period of trial that he became acquainted with Judge Williams of the parish of Plaquemines. That gentleman was so much pleased with him that he employed him in the capacity of clerk of the court, and he was so faithful, and so intelligent, that upon the resignation of Judge Williams, he was raised to the bench, at an age when most men vainly aspire to such an honor.

From that period, his position placed him in contact with the citizens of the parish, and he succeeded in conciliating the esteem, the respect and confidence of all; and, notwithstanding the clamors of politics, which sometimes leads astray the judgment, all regret and deplore his loss, as a public calamity; and all unite in rendering to him the praise, that he was the friend of the poor, the protector of the widow, and the father of the orphan, for whom he frequently relinquished his salary.

I have said that courage with him was a natural impulse. When the Seminole war broke out, he raised a force of one hundred and fifty men, and offered himself and his command to the service of his country. In every capacity, whether as a citizen, a judge, or a soldier, he proved himself to be a patriot. His elevation to the judicial dignity was an evidence of his civic worth. His military promotion was due to his valor, his discretion and his judgment. The people honored and appreciated his talents. They, too, named him to public employments. He was chosen a member of the Baltimore Convention; subsequently an elector of President and Vice President, and but recently a member of this body, whose walls now reverberate with our unavailing regrets for this sad and painful calamity.

He had reached the fruition of all earthly expectation and felicity, when an unfortunate fatality terminated his career. An affair of honor, in which he exhibited, as well as his adversary, a noble courage, and a ganerous delicacy, opened this period of sorrow. The mutual friends of both parties succeeded in effecting an honorable arrangement, so that no one could for a single instant suppose that either merited the slightest blame, the least censure, and just as it was hoped he was restored to that happiness of which he was so deserving, another affair arose, which he might have avoided without compromitting his honor; he conceived that his honor was assailed, and ceding to the impulse of his chivalric spirit, he repaired at the call of honor—and found his grave. He has been taken from among us! This Convention mourns the loss of a member that it esteemed—the State deplores a faithful public servant—society has been deprived of one of its brightest ornaments—his afflicted family of a noble heart—and I, Mr. President, of a generous and devoted friend, whose loss I shall never cease to deplore.

Mr. Wadsworth then moved the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this Convention has heard with deep regret the news of the demise of their colleague, the honorable Gilbert Leonard, in whose death Louisiana deplores the loss of an able and faithful servant, and this Convention one of its most respected members.

Resolved, That the family of the deceased be requested to deliver over his remains to be buried by the Convention, and a committee be appointed to consult with the family to that effect, and make the necessary arrangements for the funeral.

Resolved, That the members of the Convention wear crape for the space of thirty days, on the left arm, a token of respect for the deceased.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect for the deceased, this Convention do now adjourn until to-morrow morning at the usual hour, and that a copy of these resolutions be transmitted by the secretary to the family of the deceased.

The PRESIDENT appointed Messrs. Wadsworth, Carriere, Garcia, Saunders and Downs members of the committee of arrangement.

The Convention then adjourned until to-morrow at 10 o'clock, a. m.

THURSDAY, April 10, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. CLARK opened the proceedings with prayer.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. BRENT, the Convention adjonrned until to-morrow at 10 o'clock a. m., to allow the necessary arrangements to be made for the funeral obsequies of the honorable Gilbert Leonard.

FRIDAY, April 11, 1845.

The Convention met, and its proceedings were opened with prayer by the Hon. Mr. STEPHENS.

Mr. HUMBLE offered the following:

Resolved, that from and after the 14th instant, the Convention shall meet at nine o'clock, and the roll shall be called at that hour, and the names of the absentees shall be marked on the journal.

Mr. Humble said that it was now near 11 o'clock, and yet the hour of meeting was fixed at 10 o'clock. Mr. Humble complained that the business of the Convention was not sufficiently expedited. If we are not more zealous, said he, we shall never get through with the duty assigned us.

Mr. LABAUVE stated that the meeting at nine o'clock was fixed by one of the rules of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT said that the resolution would have to lie over under the rules.

Mr. WADSWORTH moved the dispensation of the rules, and his motion prevailed.

Mr. BENJAMIN thought it would be extremely inconvenient to meet at nine o'clock, and that it would be impossible to secure a quorum by that hour. He suggested to the mover to modify his resolution, so as to provide for evening sessions.

Mr. HUMBLE said he had but little faith in these evening sessions; the experiment had been made and abandoned once before. He would however, yield to what appeared to be the general wish of the Convention.

On motion of Mr. BENJAMIN, the above resolution was so amended as to have two sessions, one in the morning at ten o'clock, and the other in the evening at five o'clock; which was agreed to.

Mr. CHINN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, that this Convention adjourn on Monday, the fifth day of May next, sine die.

The above resolution not being seconded, the Convention passed to the

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SEC. 10. Apportionment of the senate.

Mr. SPLANE renewed his motion to separate the parish of St. Mary from the parish of St. Martin, and to establish the former into a senatorial district, with one senator.

Mr. ROMAN: I am opposed to the motion of the delegate from St. Mary. I do not rise to discuss the policy or expediency of large districts. So much has been said already on that subject, that I will not offer any thing more. But I would inquire, when are we to get through if every question is to be reconsidered, and every step we take is to be retraced? Is all the labor and all the discussion we have had upon this prolific theme, to amount to nothing? I thought that the only question that was open in the apportionment was in relation to New Orleans, and that this question being settled, the vote would be taken pro firma upon the adoption or rejection of the section. If we are to progress in the way that I see indicated, we shall never come to a conclusion. If the district composed of St. Martin and St. Mary be divided, the advocates of small districts will not stop there. They will go to Lafourche, and insist that it be divided—to Ascension and St. James, and will finally come back to New Orleans—that great bone of contention. After getting through again, the house will in all probability, be in no better mood to settle this matter, and another circuit through it will be made. To put a stop to this course of proceeding, I shall move to lay the motion of the gentleman (Mr. Splane) indefinitely on the table, to test the sense of the house.

Mr. Dunn: I shall sustain the motion. I do so because it is my firm conviction that otherwise our labors will be interminable. My district was divided against my wishes, but I am disposed to acquiesce. If the body of the Convention could be brought together and kept together, there is a decided majority in favor of large districts. I am willing to leave my district where it is, because its division has not met the support of the great majority of the delegation from the two parishes interested. But I hope that other gentlemen will evince a similar disposition in reference to their districts, and let them remain as they have been decided. I feel confident that if the subject is again opened, there is no knowing where it will stop. If we open it in one place, we shall have to open it in another. If gentlemen persist in their course, I shall move for the reconsideration of the vote dividing the district, although I am very willing to leave that and all other questions in the apportionment as they have been settled. I have no disposition to open the subject, but if it be opened, I shall endeavor to carry out my plan of large districts.

Mr. Splane: I do not design to argue the question; but it really appears to me that I would not be doing justice to myself or those that sent me here, were I not to express their earnest desire that the parish of St. Mary should be separated from the parish of St. Martin. In the election of senators it has so happened that the parish of St. Mary never had the opportunity of electing one of her own citizens but once, when Mr. Crow was returned to the senate. As far as population was concerned, the parish of St. Mary had the superiority over St. Martin, and in every other respect the claims of the former to a senator were equal to those of the latter. It was the wish of the people of St. Mary, and he would not cease to urge that wish.

In reference to the separation of St. James and Ascention, that matter is not now before the house, but when it does come up, I shall vote in favor of it, upon principle; and in the second place to sustain the views I have heretofore expressed.

Mr. Derbes: The reason why I have voted in favor of constituting the senatorial districts at least of two parishes, is, because I consider that the senate should represent general interests, in contradistinction to local interests, which are properly committed to the house of representatives; and therefore the constituency ought to be large. If this distinction is to be superseded, then I consider the senate will become useless, for, representing the same constituency, it will be nothing more than a counterpart of the lower house. But in this particular case, is there any necessity for the division of St. Mary and St. Martin? I think not. Their population pursue the same kind of agricultural industry, have the same habits, and the same politics. It has been intimated that if the division does not take place, St. Martin will invariably choose the senators. I acknowledge that, up to the present time, the senators have not been chosen in the parish of St. Mary; but that has been from the circumstance that no candidates offered themselves from that parish. Had such been the case, the result would have been different. At any rate, what has not occurred heretofore, is not precluded from occurring hereafter. The district will consist of fewer parishes. Candidates may be selected from St. Mary, as they have been selected from Lafayette. I am ready to concede that the delegate from St. Mary (Mr. Splane) has consulted with some of the more influential and intelligent of his coparishioners, who favor the division. But I have also seen many who are opposed to that division. At any rate the question is a doubtful one, and should not be decided in the absence of any portion of the delegation from the county of Attakapas. If the gentleman (Mr. Splane) insists upon taking the question to-day, I shall give notice of my intention to move a re-consideration of the vote in its favor—for I have no doubt, from the thinness of the house, it may pass to-day.

Mr. Cade: When this question was first taken up, I voted in favor of uniting the two parishes, because I was given to understand that such was the desire of both

But having since understood that the people of St. Mary are in favor of the division, I will vote in favor of it.

Mr. BRIANT: If you sanction this division, what kind of a representation will the parish of St. Martin have in point of equality. The territory of St. Martin is nearly double as large as the territory of St. Mary, and the population is more numerous—the only difference in favor of St. Mary is that she has more slaves, and contributes a little more in tax. But supposing that the difference in the two latter particulars would give to St. Mary the right of a senator, the difference in population in favor of St. Martin, would give to the latter two senators, upon any fair system of equality.

The territory, too, of St. Martin, is now extensive. I arrived yesterday from that section of the State, and I can assure the Convention that the parish of St. Martin is making rapid progress, and is fast accumulating population. As for the information communicated by the delegate (Mr. Splane) I do not deny, but I am well aware that during my sojourn in Attakapas, I did not hear one word in favor of his proposition. I shall certainly vote against his proposition, if it be not postponed; which I should prefer on account of the absence of a portion of the delegation.

Mr. SPLANE: I will reply to what has fallen from the gentleman by incontrovertible facts. According to the census of 1840, the total population of St. Mary is eight thousand nine hundred and fifty. The total population of St. Martin is eight thousand six hundred and seventy-four. Inasmuch, however, as the basis of electors, which has been adopted for the house is most favorable to St. Martin, she has three representatives to the house, and the parish of St. Mary two. But by the basis for the senate, total population, the result is most favorable to St. Mary, and she is better entitled to one senator, by reason of her greater population, than St. Martin. The lands in St. Mary are richer, and she will abound in greater wealth. Every thing considered, their claims are equivalent to one senator each, and that has been allowed them. The only question is, whether they should have the privilege of electing one senator respectively, instead of electing two jointly. If the will of the people is to have its just weight, the house will accede to my demand.

The yeas and nays were called for on Mr. Roman's motion to lay Mr. Splane's motion on the table.

Messrs. Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garrett, Hudspeth, Labauve, Legendré, Lewis, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Sellers and Winchester—22 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Downs, Eustis, Humble, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Ratliff, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Trist, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt and Winder—30 nays.

Mr. SPLANE then moved the adoption of his motion to create the parish of St. Mary into one senatorial district.

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Downs, Eustis, Humble, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Splane, Trist, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt and Winder—30 yeas.

Messrs. Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garrett, Hudspeth, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Sellers and Winchester—21 nays.

Mr. WINDER explained that he had voted in the affirmative, to respond to the wishes of the people of both parishes, especially St. Mary. He understood that they were in favor of the measure, and this was a matter in which the public convenience and the wishes of the people ought to be consulted and respected.

Mr. DERBES gave notice that he would ask for the reconsideration on Thursday next.

Mr. DOWNS moved to strike out the words "no parish shall be divided in forming a senatorial district." These words were unnecessary, inasmuch as the same principle was embodied elsewhere in the section.

Mr. BENJAMIN called for the reading of the two clauses to which Mr. Downs referred.

Mr. Benjamin: The gentleman will perceive that the first clause has reference to new parishes alone. The second clause which he would strike out, applies to old parishes. Both ought to be preserved. I should like to know if it is the design of the gentleman to confer upon the legislature the power to divide the old parishes of the State in forming senatorial districts at future apportionments. If that be the gentleman's object, I would be glad he should so state it. If his motion to strike out prevailed, the legislature would have the power to divide the old parishes at will, in making the senatorial districts. That was a power which I expressly understood it to be the sense of the house expressly to inhibit.

Mr. Downs: There is no difficulty in understanding my motive. I do not wish the legislature to have the power to divide any district, with the exception of the district of New Orleans. To simplify my motive, I would propose to add the following: "No parish shall be divided in the formation of senatorial districts;" the word New Orleans excepted." If New Orleans be not divided now, she will be divided hereafter, and be made to compose more than one senatorial district.

Mr. Benjamin: It seems that the clause which the gentleman from Ouachita moved to strike out, was not as useless as his remarks accompanying that motion would have led one to believe. The real object, when disguise is no longer possible, is announced to be an attack upon the city of New Orleans, I had my misgivings when the gentleman made his motion, and I anticipated some covert attack, and hence I called for the reading of the two clauses, so as to see whether they were really as stated by the gentleman, but a repetition of each other. I was not deceived! It is my deliberate conviction that the intention is entertained that the Convention shall never adjourn. This must be the secret motive for the proceedings that take place from day to day in this body. A question is taken up—it is debated, and discussion is exhausted upon it—we succeed in getting a vote upon it, which is the deliberate determination of the Convention. We might suppose that it was decided! Not so! There are members of the Convention constantly on the watch to seize the first favorable moment, when the house is composed of a temporary majority in their favor, to move a reconsideration, and thus a rule which was designed to preclude the introduction of any odious principle when the Convention is not full, perverted and produces the mischievous results which it was intended to prevent. In this way, every subject is procrastinated, and we are protracting the period of our session to an extent that is disgusting to the members that are anxious to terminate the labors of this body, and to the people who desire us to come to some conclusion This question of the division of New Orleans has been thoroughly examined. We have had a deliberate vote upon it by a house of seventy out of seventy seven. The delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Soulé) gave notice that he would reconsider that vote. We are prepared to meet the motion to reconsider when it shall come up in its proper order. But in the meanwhile, while the matter is subject to reconsideration, here comes a fresh fire-brand which is to keep us in a state of excitement during the whole of next week. I tell the gentleman that it is impossible for him to succeed in dividing the city by these reconsiderations. He may carry his point, and the subject may be reconsidered when there is scarcely more than a quorum in the house, and he may succeed in districting the city. But we, who are opposed to the measure, and have the clear majority of all the members of the house, to place the question where it has been determined by that majority. The result may be that this subject may alone occupy the attention of the Convention for three months. If no question is to be considered as determined when voted upon, and there is to be a perpetual succession of reconsiderations, I tell the gentlemen that we will follow out their example, and they will find their strong holds are as precarious as ours. This is no spirit to actuate the proceedings of this body. It can lead to no good. We shall make ourselves the laughing stock of the public. Already are the people disgusted with the slow and uncertain character of our deliberations. The press are teeming with squibs. They say we proceed with a crab-like motion—one move on one side and one move on the other. The present question which is introduced under a new form, by the delegate from Ouachita, has already created a great deal of excitement. It was voted upon once, and the vote was taked upon it the second time. It can have no other effect in being brought up now than to create fresh debate and fresh excitement. Its introduction to-day appeared intended to delude detection. I thought something more was designed than we were given to understand. Instead of being a mere motion to strike out a useless clause—an useless repetition, it has a totally different object. I anticipated that some new attack would be made, and hence I scrutinized this motion, although from the remarks of the gentleman who introduced it, any one would have supposed that it was the most harmless thing in the world. I do really trust that the degrading spectacle will not be presented of two parties in this body watching each other, and springing up, as accident may favor them, a series of petty manœuvres, instead of assuming the broad grounds of meeting every question openly and fairly and submitting to its decision when we are conscious that it has commanded a clear majority of all the members of the Convention.

Is all the vengeance of the Convention to fall upon New Orleans? Is she to be the victim of another act opprobrium? Is she alone to be excepted and left at the mercy of legislative discretion to be gerrymandered? I desire no vain parliamentary phraseology to conceal my sentiments. There is nothing else designed than to cut up the city in small districts, to be gerrymandered at the mere whim and caprice of the legislature. To place the city at the mercy of the country, and we may well anticipate what that mercy will be! Is it not enough that we have been divided in the lower house without attempting to divide us in the senate? Are senatorial districts, to be formed in the city, to be left to the operation of party tactics, so as to favor the ascendency of a political party? I trust that such a design is not seriously entertained, and that the Convention are actuated by better motives. I hope that the present proposition be laid on the table, regardless of all party considerations, if such really have any weight in this body.

It is idle; nay, it is worse than idle and profitless; it is mischievious to excite this discussion. Even those political gentlemen who feel the most interested in this question of apportionment, begin to be worried with this incessant ding-dong on the same everlasting theme. If it is never to be settled; if there is to be agitation, and nothing but agitation; if the city is to be constantly assailed in reference to this question, we will profit by the lessons that are taught us. The gentleman from Ouachita, some days ago, repremanded me for daring to intermeddle in his Ouachita district. He said it was a family quarrel; and yet after the question of the division of the city has been settled, the gentleman comes in and makes a proposition which concentrates all the feelings of hostility towards the city, and he offers it as a harmless amendment—a mere motion to expunge the repetition of a principle found in the section. Why, it exposes the city ever after to the control of the jealous country members. The gentleman will remember that I yielded with due humility, and I appeal to the course taken by the gentleman himself. I ask the gentleman to recollect the lessons that he gave me, should the city of New Orleans come again into consideration. His opinions were that we should not interfere; that it was a family quarrel. The gentleman preaches one doctrine for others, and another doctrine for himself. He makes fish of one and flesh of the other. He claims for himself what he will deny to others. I hope that the gentleman will yield, now that he is reminded of his own lesson. I anticipated that it might possibly have an application, and I yielded implicitly to his behest for the purpose of bringing back the admonition for the exclusive benefit of the gentleman.

Mr. Downs: the gentleman expresses the apprehension that a great discussion will arise upon a subject which he says he considered as being near settled. He says that it is useless and profitless again and again to go over the same ground. If any gentleman of the highest abilities had calculated this morning what would have best answered the purpose of protracting the proceedings of the Convention, in order that they might result in nothing, he could not have conceived any thing better fitted for that purpose than the remarks that fell from the delegate (Mr. Benjamin.) He says that we have thrown a fire-brand into the Convention, and thrown into commotion a question that has been calmly settled, and which otherwise would not have been susceptible of debate. The most ingenious mind could have devised nothing to disturb the calm as effectually as the speech of the gentleman. Why, sir, if the proceedings of the Convention are to be protracted; if we are to do nothing, it will be to such efforts as those of the gentleman this morning that we will have to attribute that unfortunate result. If the good sense of the Convention is proof against the agitating, I might almost say, personal remarks of the gentleman, it is to that alone that we are to ascribe the want of excitement with which these remarks have been received, and not to the absence of any thing provocative of such excitement in the remarks themselves. The gentleman insinuates motives by which I have never been governed. He seems to think that an attempt has been made to smuggle a proposition through this house, and appeals to a vote given upon the districting of the city, as an evidence that the subject matter is properly beyond the control of the Convention, except through the motion made for the reconsideration of that particular measure. My proposition is a distinct constitutional proposition. It applies to all future apportionment, and prescribes that the city of New Orleans shall be an exception to the general rule, that no parish shall be divided in the formation of a senatorial district. The reason why New Orleans should be the exception is obvious, and it is needless for me to argue it. As for the particular question of districting the city in our present apportionment, that is but a temporary matter, and it is necessary to provide hereafter for other apportionments which shall be made, in which apportionments it is desirable to continue the system of dividing the city into a plurality of senatorial districts. The gentleman speaks of the vote upon the question of districting the city, as decisive of that question. The gentleman should not have forgotten that the vote was taken in a thin house, and that those three members absent, by chance, would have reversed that decision.

Does the gentleman expect by his vociferation to lock up the judgment of the Convention. He tells us that he will agitate and talk for three months, unless he is allowed to have his own way. He intimates that there is something sly; something covert in my manner of introducing my proposition. I repel the insinuation. I thought the ground was covered. I drew up the provision, and I was under the impression, from a simple recollection of it, that it provided that no parish should be divided to form a senatorial district, with the exception of the parish of Orleans. If I could have been capable of any thing underhanded, I should not have counted upon the want of penetration in the honorable member to detect the design. I would ask the gentleman if the principle could have been adopted in its general character had it not escaped the attention of the body of the Convention? The gentleman must be aware that if the city is embraced within the principle, it was through mere accident.

The gentleman appears to think that he has discovered a fine field to declaim upon, as to my interference, as he calls it, in a matter which relates to New Orleans. He congratulates himself upon the presumed inconsistency between the lesson he says I gave him and my present position. He gives me to understand that his apparent frankness was not actually, as I might have supposed, the emanation of a free and open generosity, but was assumed for the purpose of having something in reserve which would impose a check upon me if I should attempt to interfere in what he might consider his peculiar domain. The gentleman need not deceive himself. I was not led astray. There is no comparison between the present case and the one to which he has alluded. The city of New Orleans is directly involved with the balance of the State; they bear with her important political and commercial relations; and it is no interference for the people of the country to take care that their interests and their safety are amply guaranteed. His design to commit me was labor lost; I understood it as well as he did. I would ask the Convention, if this question were properly and fairly determined, what expectation could we entertain of terminating our labors, when we are told by the gentleman that unless he has his own way, unless he shall carry his point, he will wage war for three months! The right accorded to move reconsiderations may be abused, its exercise may give rise to unnecessary delays; but on the other hand, it is essential to secure the results of mature reflection, and to preclude questions that have been carried accidentally, and without sufficient research, from being maintained as the deliberate conviction of the house. No great harm can accrue where questions for a reconsideration are submitted to the test of a majority of the whole body. But if the gentleman thinks that he will induce the Convention to maintain an accidental vote, when there is a majority in this body to revise it, under the plea that the Convention will be perpetual, that it will never adjourn, and unless he can have his own way, he will speak for three months, he is entirely mistaken.

Suppose in the future action of the legislature it becomes necessary, as it no doubt will, to change the districts, are all the other districts to be subjected to changes, with the exception of the districts of Orleans? If the city districts are not to be left to the discretion of the legislature, then the country districts ought not to be placed within the power of the legislature! The principle is obvious.

The gentleman appears to think that because he has got an accidental vote in favor of his opinion, it must not be disturbed; it must be kept inviolate. The Convention will not be driven from what is just and fair by any extraordinary course the gentleman may think proper to pursue. If it be in contemplation to do nothing; to terminate the sessions of this body without forming a constitution, then the attempt to procrastinate and embarrass its proceedings are perfectly natural. But if the intention be felt to carry out the will of the people in the convocation of this body, then that course will be the last one that will be followed.

The imputation thrown out by the gentleman, that I wish to break up and protract the labors of the Convention, has no foundation to rest upon. That such an idea should be entertained of those that have fought against the call of a Convention, and who are opposed to any measures to popularize our institutions and enhance their democratic tendencies, is plausible, it is very likely. But such a design, applied to me, is very ridiculous! I, who have been so active here and elsewhere, to carry out the measures which public opinion have so loudly demanded. This accusation involves too great a stretch of the imagination to deceive any one; and it cannot have much weight; the only effect that it will have will be to create the belief that those who would apply the charge to me, are more likely themselves to be obnoxious to it; for it is not uncommon to charge upon others what we feel conscious we are guilty of ourselves. That is the most rational inference; and hence I may conclude that the gentleman wishes to divert attention from himself.

I regret much, Mr. President, to have to repeat again what I have so frequently had occasion to say, that when gentlemen find something done that they do not like, instead of arguing the question upon its merits, they turn round and assail me; they say that I am hostile to New Orleans.

I deny this pretended hostility to New Orleans, which is so freely and so frequently attributed to me. It has no foundation. It is true I am favorable to districting the city, for the election of senators. But the assertion of gentlemen that this shows any hostility to New Orleans is disproved by the fact that, as a matter of expediency, her delegation are divided upon it, and it is quite likely that if the people were consulted, they would favor it—at least two of the municipalities are understood to be in its favor. It would be prudent for the country that it took place, because it would prevent a concentration of the political power of the city in the senate. But neither the wishes of the city, nor of the country, have any thing to do with the violent opposition it has encountered. It is to party politics that we are to assign it. They have a great deal to do with it. Calculations have been made to secure all four senators, and that can be accomplished in no other way than by a general ticket, for the municipalities entertain conflicting political opinions. This is no ordinary purpose, and it well accounts for the great zeal which has been exhibited. The senate that will convene immediately after the new constitution will go into effect, will be peculiarly a most important body. It will participate with the executive in filling the most important offices of the State. The attempt will be made to elect the executive and the legislature of one political party—if that succeeds the whole power will be in the hands of that political party. But it may so happen that the executive may belong to the other political party. If that should happen, it would be considered a most lucky event to secure a majority in the senate of contrary politics, as that would control the appointments, and check-mate the executive.

The interests of New Orleans in this matter are considered to be practically small; they are considered to be of little consequence when compared to the political advantages which would result in securing her four votes in the senate, and to accomplish that in favor of a certain light of politics, there is no other way than that the election should take place by general ticket. Hence it is that this question creates so much excitement, and the gentleman tells us that rather than lose it, he would speak for three months. I have no doubt of it. It will be vigorously disputed, and I have no doubt that the gentleman, if he thought he could carry his point, would not only speak three months for his party, but would speak twelve months.

I did not propose to say one word in favor of dividing the city into senatorial districts. I was willing to leave it to abler hands. I am disposed to favor it for strong reasons. It has happened that during the seven years that I have served in the senate, I have observed the peculiar position of the senator from the city, in relation to so large a constituency, and one whose interests appear so divergent and conflicting. I was the better enabled to appreciate that position from my intimacy with the two distinguished senators that have represented the city during that period. A similarity of professions and other causes led us to form that intimacy, and I have frequently had an opportunity of judging of the excessive embarrassment they have felt in being called upon to advocate measures of an opposite character by the upper and lower portions of the city. The upper portion would desire one thing, and the lower portion another. In place of its being unjust, it is the only way of doing justice. It is reasonable, and must be acceptable to the people. I must conclude that the reason why it is so vehemently opposed, must be from considerations of a political character.

I must confess that I am dissatisfied and disheartened at the prospect of a protracted session. I am ready to do any thing to expedite business, and will join in whatever is most conducive to that result. I trust that the Convention will proceed dispassionately to the accomplishment of its high and important duties. But I must say that we shall never be done, and we shall be kept in a constant state of excitement, if such stimulating appeals as the gentleman has just made be repeated. Why, the gentleman has given us fire enough for one week. I hope that the Convention will take a calmer view, and that, notwithstanding the unfortunate attempt to arouse passion, they will proceed soberly and get through speedily, and that the gentleman, upon cooler reflection, will see the propriety of abstaining from threatening us that if we do not allow him to have his own way, right or wrong, he will procrastinate the proceedings by speaking for three months upon a single theme.

Mr. Benjamin: No one regrets more than I do this discussion. But it is really amusing to hear the gentleman accusing me, and treating me as its cause. It will be recollected that it was understood that the subject of senatorial apportionment had been disposed of, with the exception of the motion of the gentleman (Mr. Soulé) for a reconsideration so far as it affected New Orleans. So far from denying that to be the state of the question, I explicitly admitted it, and therefore I could have had no intention, as might be inferred from the remarks of the gentleman, to mislead the Convention, or, to use an expression of the gentleman, to humbug them. The gentleman attributes to himself great credit in defining motives. He says that he was not deceivdd with the apparent submission with which I received his lesson forbidding me to interfere with his district. That he was aware it was not made in a spirit of candor. I can readily believe this. Men who are less astute than that gentleman, and who have not his superior intelligence, would have arrived at the same conclusion. I do not see how that could well have been avoided, when I expressly stated that I hoped the gentleman would not preach one doctrine and practice another, and that when New Orleans would be involved I trusted he would remember what he had said. Therefore, his opinions upon his own penetration, as far as that subject is concerned, are gratuitous. I claimed no credit for candor or generosity, but I anticipated the opportunity of applying his observations to me to himself. But, says the gentleman, the cases are not parallel; that he has an intimate acquaintance with New Orleans; that I have no acquaintance, or but a very limited one, with his districtt Or, in other words, it was perfectly legitimate for him to lecture me for interfering with Ouachita, but that I have no right to expect that he will keep his hands off of New Orleans. He thinks that upon the question of the division of New Orleans, that I can be actuated by no other than a party motive. It is beneath the dignity of this body to retort ephitets. If the gentleman supposed that I intended to charge him with such motives, and designed this as a retort upon myself, he is mistaken. I had no such intention. I think that he is too far above any such considerations for me to have dreamt of imputing them to him. If I had done so it would have been untrue. I believe that he would scorn to be actuated by them, and that such an accusation would be improper and unjust. While I am willing to respect his motives, I may well claim from him a similar respect for mine. I trust that I take too enlarged a view of public matters to be influenced by anticipations of the result of the next election for senators. The duty that I owe to those who sent me here is not limited to so trifling a consideration. I trust I entertain higher and nobler purposes, and that I have the good of the country and its permanent welfare more at heart. Moreover, who can say with certainty what will be the aspect of political feeling three years hence. Cannot the gentleman suppose, in that spirit of charity which is due to the motives of all, that I am governed by superior views. Are there no reasons in the identity of New Orleans, and the desire to preserve that identity, which would induce me to assume the position I have, in opposition to her being further split and cut up into fragments. Cannot the gentleman attribute to me views which would better comport with a just sense of my duties. I trust that I do myself more justice. That I look further than any such temporal and ephemeral results. When the question was under consideration to apportion the representation of the city in the house of representatives, it gave rise to a stormy debate. One-fifth of the members of this body were impartial spectators of that contest. Upon them depended the fate of the measure. They came to the conclusion, in accordance with the sound republican principle, that no matter what basis should be adopted, the city should not be deprived of any of the weight to which she was entitled in the popular branch. That no restriction should be imposed upon her there. In consulting the true theory of our government, they found that the restriction could, without any deviation from principle, be placed upon her in the senate, which was designed to be a check upon the lower house. Although they conceded that in conformity with the principles of republican government, the city could not be deprived of her just representation in the house of representatives, they came to the conclusion, that by the greater concentration of power in the city, she had an undue advantage over the country, and that therefore, to equalize their relative weight, the city should be divided into representative districts, and that no one of these districts shall combine a larger representation than the largest country parish. We resisted but feebly the design of dividing the city, because resistance was unavailing, and because there was some justice in the arguments employed to sustain it. The restriction upon the city was then placed in the senate. Instead of allowing her ten senators, to which she was entitled, four were acceded to her, and that throughout all time. We made no objections to this; we submitted at once to that restriction, because it was placed where all checks, in all constitutions, are placed for the conservation of popular institutions—in the senate. The paramount object in constituting that body is, that it should restrain the enthusiasm and phrenzy of the popular will. We were disposed to concede to the claims of the country every thing that it could ask, and to take much less than the city was entitled to from her wealth, her progress, and the development of her resources. With one-third of the population of the State, we concurred without a murmur in the allotment of but one-eighth of the representation; and while other parishes were possessed of the faculty, by their growth and progress, New Orleans was condemned to remain stationary in her representation to the senate. It was the gentleman (Mr. Downs) that moved that the next apportionment should be made in 1855 in place of 1848, and if he was so dissatisfied with the present apportionment, why did he propose to prolong it? The city has been reduced more than one-half of her representation; where is the propriety of this attempt to impair and weaken her still farther. A direct restriction has been placed upon her, and is not that sufficient.

But oh! says the gentleman, these are different interests. There is an interest above, and an interest below, and the representative may be importuned with conflicting petitions. I will admit this, and yet I defy the gentleman to draw from it any conclusion. Are there no conflicts of local and personal interests in the country? The members from the country parishes are placed in the same situation. During the two short years that I served as a member to the house of representatives, there was a constant stream of these petitions. Some were in favor of a separation of a parish—others were opposed to it. Some were for the removal of the court house, and there were a thousand questions upon which the constituency of the particular parishes differed. If it be deemed essential to insure unanimity that the city be divided, why not divide the country parishes in view of a similar result? But will the division of the city into three senatorial parts force unanimity? Will it produce greater conformity of interests? If it will have that tendency, we would be more sure of the result if we were to divide the city into wards, into blocks, into families; and if we are desirous to attain still greater unanimity---to realize the beau ideal which gentlemen seem to entertain, we should apportion to each individual a separate representation. But it is said that there are divergent interests in the city; that there is an upper interest and a lower interest. This is an idle motive upon which to base the proposition to divide the city. If it holds good for the city, it must hold equally good for the country, and the same grounds exist for dividing the country parishes into wards, as exist for a similar course in the city; for there are differences of interests and differences of political sentiment in the country as there are in the city. There is in this as in every thing else, limits beyond which reason will not permit us to go. And all that we ask is, that the city should not be an exception to the general rule.

We have never entertained the design to ask to be exempted from the same constitutional rules that are common to the people of the whole State. We have not excepted nor asked to be excepted from all restrictions. We have submitted to a direct restriction upon our power in the senate. But what we do ask, what we do insist upon, is not to be left to the caprice of the legislature. We ask to be placed beyond the political influences and sectional petty jealousies which may govern that body, so far as fundamental principles be involved, and to have the means of defending ourselves in the ordinary legislation of the State, if our peculiar interests be assailed. I repeat what I have said time after time, that the minority should be protected from the tyranny of the majority. This principle is so vital, that if we must be divided in our representation to the senate as in the house of representatives, let that division be made in the constitution; let it be perpetual, and do not expose us, as is proposed by the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) to the caprice, to the prejudices, to the political promptings of dominant parties in the legislature. Do not make New Orleans the battle ground for contending factions; for the result will be that if she be districted, and if these districts be left to the control of the legislature, they will constantly be liable to be changed as may best subserve the designs of political parties and temporary majorities. We wish to be placed beyond the power of those jealous and hostile feelings which are unfortunately entertained by the country against the city, and of which we have had so many fatal proofs in the proceedings of this body. Let the city be relieved from that incubus forever! Otherwise we must have excitements---perhaps violence. I do not mean physical violence, but violence in debate. You have incorporated in the constitution that the legislature shall meet but once in two years; you have limited their sessions to sixty days, and prescribed that apportionments shall be made at stated periods, and that unless the legislature shall make these apportionments in strict conformity with law at the periods fixed upon, it shall not be competent for them to pass laws. The political excitement that may result is fearful to contemplate. The whole session may be consumed in a conflict for political power. The people will revolt—not with sword and musket in hand—at the disorders of the times. They will become dissatisfied with the government. Men that are anxious to preserve the public tranquility will give up all hope—the permanence of our institutions will be gone, and we shall be left completely at the mercy of temporary majorities that may govern from year to year!

I repeat I am not influenced by party calculations of party success, nor did I intend to mislead the Convention. I will tell the gentleman from Ouachita why I considered the question to be settled. I will state the facts, and if I am in error, or mistaken, I can be set right. When the question came up originally, it was on Saturday, and a number of the delegates living in the adjacent parishes had left the city, with the intention of returning on the following Monday. The minority present, judging that they were the temporary majority—they were a large and respectable minority, but still a minority—proceeded to divide the State, and to make such a distribution as suited themselves. The various propositions were adopted, but they were so glaringly partial that the least sensitive stomach revolted at them, and finally at a subsequent day, the entire section was rejected. I was present, but being thoroughly convinced that all opposition was perfectly useless—that reason had lost its sway, and that the distribution contemplated would be made, abhorrent as it was to every principle of justice, I took my hat and left the hall. At half past three o'clock when there was a bare quorum, and nine-tenths of the members were from the north west, and had arranged the political power so as to obtain more than they were entitled to, the proposition to district the city was made and carried by a majority of from four to five to one. These facts were related to me by members who were present. When I left the house it was because I found myself in a hopeless minority, and I was satisfied that nothing done in the house under such circumstances, would avert the deliberate sanction of the Convention.

The honorable delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent) was the originator of the scheme to divide the senatorial representation of the city, and not my colleague (Mr. Culbertson.)

Mr. Brent: it was Mr. Soulé that made the proposition that the city should be divided.

Mr. Benjamin: I refer to a period anterior to the motion made by Mr. Soulé; by referring to the journals it will be found that the suggestion came from a minority committee; composed of Messrs. Downs and Brent. Here I trace the origin of the scheme, and I am for putting the honor where it fairly belongs. I wish the gentleman to have the honor and credit, and I have no doubt that with some of their constituents it may be so esteemed, of having led the attack against the city, against those lordly nabobs—those avaricious merchants that the gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) once took occasion to denounce as being so extortionate and unreasonable, because they exacted a commission upon the sale of the produce of the country. Those unjust and griping merchants that will not give their warehouses gratuitously for the storage of that produce—that will not hire clerks to accommodate the business of the country, and who have the outrageous presumption to attack the people of the country through their pockets. It is proper that the two delegates should have all the distinction to which the suggestion entitles them. I know it may be considered a distinction, and I wish it to remain where it properly belongs.

The gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) repudiates all party influence, and yet has made one of the most artful appeals to party that I ever listened to. While objecting to an assumed course of proceedings on the part of one political party, he has suddenly lopped what might be done by his own political party, and has drawn their attention to the great inducements held out. He tells you that the first senate under the new constitution will be the most important body in the State. That if the governor be of our political party, it will be essential to secure the majority in the senate, in order to carry out his nominations; and that if the senate be of the contrary political party to the governor, they may check-mate him. All the offices of the State are to be filled. This is one of the strongest appeals to party spirit that the gentleman could have made. But I do not believe he so intended it. I believe he is free from all party biases, and had he foreseen what might be its consequences, he never would have made it. The effect is however the same as if it were made for that purpose, and I am sorry he has made it.

The delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) attributes to me the fault of bringing on this discussion. I deny the charge; it was forced upon me. He introduced his amendment stating that it was to prevent a repetition of the same clause; but when I discovered that it would affect the city, he he then openly announced his purpose to be to, except the parish of Orleans from the provision; that no parish shall be divided in forming a senatorial district, and finally moved a direct amendment to that end. Is it any thing remarkable that I should animadvert upon such a proceeding? What, sir, after all your restrictions, is the city to be left to the mercy of the legislature in her representation? The gentleman makes that motion, and then cooly—no not cooly, but warmly—and violently accuses me of being the author of the violence of the debate.

One word more, and I am done. The gentleman (Mr. Downs) accuses me in terms discourteous, but which I do not presume he designed, of endeavoring to force upon the Convention the conviction that the vote upon districting the city, is a final vote. I distinctly said that the subject was open for reconsideration upon the motion of my colleague (Mr. Soulè), but that I hoped with that reconsideration the matter would be settled; that the conflict should be closed and that the result would then rest in peace. The gentleman (Mr. Downs) speaks of the vote by which the general ticket system was adopted for the city, as a small vote; it stood thirty-two to thirty. The three gentlemen to whom the delegate from Ouachita alludes as being in the city, had paired off; had they been here they would have voted with us.

Of the absentees, a large proportion are with us, and it is my firm conviction that if all the members were present, we would have a clear majority, unless some members may have changed their minds. Whether the appeal of the gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) to their prejudices or passions, has had any effect, is a matter best known to themselves. But take the last vote that has been had, and adding to it the numbers that are known to be in favor of the proposition, there is a clear majority in its favor; and I hope that when that fact is ascertained the whole subject will be considered as at an end.

Mr. Downs: The first vote in favor of districting the city was thirty-seven to thirty-two.

Mr. Benjamin: That is precisely what I stated. Owing to the absence of several members who did not anticipate that the subject would come up; I do not object to bringing up the question, in order that it may be passed upon by a full house; but I do object to bringing it up in another and a worse form, when it is ascertained that there is a temporary majority in a thin house, to carry it. This is a day when the attendance is usually small. The gentlemen ought to be admonished by the experience of the past. They may carry their scheme now as they did on another Saturday, but they should remember that there is a day of reckoning. They will find that this is bad policy; that it will protract the sessions of the Convention, not by my speaking for three months, as supposed by the delegate from Ouachita, but by the perpetual motions that will be made for reconsiderations. No vote will be final; we shall be perpetually doing and undoing; and it is not to be expected that any member will feel satisfied with any vote which does not embrace a clear majority of all the members. The gentleman from Ouachita should not take all the credit to himself, of being disposed to yield to the will of the majority; other gentlemen are equally as ready to submit when the majority have pronounced; and as for myself, it is too late for me to be taught that no man can expect to carry all his views.

I would be the last one to raise my voice to revise a question after it had been deliberately decided by a clear majority of this body; but the gentleman cannot expect that I can yield my assent to a vote taken under the circumstances that present themselves to-day. He may press the subject if he will, and I have no doubt carry it, but I shall certainly avail myself of the privilege of having a more general expression of the house upon it.

Mr. BEATTY thought that the debate had continued long enough, and would call for the previous question.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD considered that a discussion of two or three hours were not sufficient to examine the merits of this question.

Mr. BRENT replied that the previous question cut off all debate.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD begged the gentleman to bear in mind that the system of forcing a question, and having it decided by a thin house, had not heretofore proved successful. A question taken under similar circumstances upon apportionment, one day, had been reversed the next.

The question was taken on Mr. Downs' motion to strike out, and it was carried in the affirmative—yeas 28; nays 26.

The yeas and nays were then ordered on Mr. Downs' amendment—28 yeas, and 26 nays.

Mr. BENJAMIN offered the following amendment: "The city of New Orleans shall not be divided by any legislature in making the future apportionment of senators."

Mr. PRESCOTT of St. Landry, said he would vote in the affirmative, because he was averse to the legislature having the authority to divide the city. He thought the districting of the city should be made permanently by the Convention, and not be left to the caprice of the legislature.

The yeas and nays were called for—yeas 28; nays 28. The President voting in the negative, the proposition was lost.

Mr. CULBERTSON remarked that he voted in the affirmative, under the expectation that the amendment offered by Mr. Roselius would come before the Convention again, and not because he was favorable to the amendment of Mr. Preston, as stated by the "Bee."

Mr. WADDILL moved the adjournment. He made this motion in order to remove the complaints of some gentlemen who thought there was a disposition to force them to a vote under unfavorable circumstances.

Mr. DOWNS said if there was any one to blame, it was the members who were not in attendance. He did not wish to act discourteously, but certainly the public business ought not to be arrested from day to day, because gentlemen choose to absent themselves.

The question was then taken on the adjournment, and lost by the following vote—14 yeas; 39 nays.

Mr. BENJAMIN regretted to see the course adopted to-day, and gave notice that he would move for the reconsideration of the section on Tuesday next.

Mr. DOWNS said that he considered the apportionment unjust towards his district, and that he voted in its favor to avoid embarrassing the proceedings of the Convention.

Mr. HUMBLE made a similar statement.

The question was then put on the adoption of the whole section, and adopted by 34 yeas, 19 nays. The section reads thus:

SEC. 10. "The State shall be divided into the following senatorial districts; the senators shall be voted for by persons entitled to vote for representatives."

All that portion of the parish of Orleans lying on the east side of the Mississippi river, shall comprise the first senatorial district, with four senators.

The parishes of Plaquemines, St. Bernard and the remainder of the parish of Orleans on the right side of the Mississippi river, shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parish of Jefferson shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parishes of St. Charles and St. John the Baptist, shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parishes of St. James and Ascension shall compose one district, with two senators.

The parishes of Assumption, Lafourche Interior and Terrebonne shall compose one district, with two senators.

The parishes of Iberville and West Baton Rouge shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parish of East Baton Rouge shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parish of Pointe Coupée shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parish of Avoyelles shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parish of West Feliciana shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parish of East Feliciana shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parishes of Washington and St. Tammany shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parishes of St. Helena and Livingston shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parishes of Concordia and Tensas shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parishes of Union, Morehouse, Ouachita and Jackson, shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parishes of Caldwell, Franklin and Catahoula, shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parish of Rapides shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parish of Natchitoches shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parishes of Claiborne and Bossier shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parishes of Sabine, Caddo and De Soto shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parish of St. Martin shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parish of St. Mary shall compose one district, with one senator.

The parishes of St. Landry and Calcasieu, shall compose one district, with two senators.

The parishes of Lafayette and Vermillion shall compose one district, with one senator.

And whenever a new parish shall be created, it shall be attached to the senatorial district from which most of it was taken, or to another contiguous district, at the discretion of the legislature, but shall not be attached to more than one district.

The legislature, in any year in which they shall apportion representation in the house of representatives, shall divide the State into senatorial districts. No parish shall be divided in the formation of senatorial districts, parish of Orleans excepted. The number of senators shall be thirty-two, and they shall be apportioned among the senatorial districts according to the total population contained in the senatorial districts; provided, that no parish shall be entitled to more than one-eighth of the whole number of senators.

Mr. Downs moved that the Convention take up the additional section offered by him.

Mr. Benjamin moved for the adjournment.

The motion to adjourn was lost, and the Convention took up Mr. Downs' section.

The question pending when this section was last up, was the motion to strike out the second paragraph. Mr. Downs had moved for the division.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: The effect of this portion of the section is to give to parishes that have not the population necessary, a senator, and it is designed to favor the north-west. The principle in the second portion of the paragraph is not equal, for it gives to a parish having one-third less than the divisor, the same privilege as to a parish having one-third over the divisor. I am aware that perfect equality is not attainable, but we should endeavor to reach the standard as near as possible.

Mr. Downs suggested that perhaps the language was not as clear as might be desired, but certainly it was not intended to convey the construction placed upon it by the gentleman.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: I do not think the language at all ambiguous. It seems to me that the clause is designed to place the parish having one-third exceedent over the divisor, upon the same footing as the parish having one-third under the divisor. If I were to propose an amendment, it would be to strike out the words "over" and "under."

Mr. Marigny moved to reject the section, but subsequently withdrew his motion.

Mr. Downs could not comprehend how it was that this section excited so much opposition. We have made a temporary apportionment of the senatorial representation, and have fixed a basis; but we have not determined how the apportionment is hereafter to be made. The section has no other object than to prescribe the mode of effecting that apportionment; unless it be designed to leave the legislature plenary discretion, full power to do just what ever they please, we must necessarily pass this section. If the phraseology be defective, let it be corrected; or if gentlemen can suggest any thing better, I am ready to receive it. I am solicitous for the principles it contains. But under the plea that the language is not as perfect as gentlemen would desire, do not overlook the principles. If they be discarded, it will be rendering the injustice done to my district, and to some other districts, perpetual; and will interpose an insurmountable barrier for the future. If you do not adopt the first motion, you are without chart or compass. The legislature has unlimited discretion. The only restriction will be, that the number of senators shall not be carried beyond thirty-two; but the legislature may distribute them as it pleases. As for the second clause, it is evident that no apportionment can be made without leaving fractions; it results that we should combine these fractions with the fractions of adjacent parishes, where single districts cannot be formed, so as to have as small fractions remaining as possible. This is all that is proposed.

It should also be borne in mind that, as the districts are not permanent, as they were in the old constitution, the whole senate will have to be renewed at each apportionment; for otherwise, senators would remain that would represent districts which had been changed. That is all that is contemplated in the third clause. As for the last clause, it is indispensably necessary.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: I am opposed to the first clause; as for the second clause, I think it a mere matter of form, upon which it will not be difficult to arrive at a conclusion. We have determined that there shall be thirty-two senatorsd; deucting four for the city, there remains twenty-eight to be distributed in the remaining districts. We have assumed for the basis total population; and we have determined that in making the apportionment that no parish shall be divided. The gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) thinks it is necessary to establish some rules. What other rules are necessary? I am ready to cede, if the gentleman can show me that there is any necessity for these provisions; but if that necessity cannot be shown, I must insist upon my objections; for I hold that in a constitution whatever is not necessary is pernicious. If we give to the adjoining parishes in the north-west the excess of population in Rapides and Natchitoches, why not, on the same principle, give to the surrounding parishes in this vicinity the excess of population in the city of New Orleans?

Mr. Beatty: It may be that the section contains details which are not indispensable; and I am disposed to think that it would be better to withdraw it and reproduce it in the form of distinct propositions. The first paragraph constitutes a principle for the apportionment in the senate; the second paragraph consecrates an important principle, which is the principle of single districts; the third paragraph relates to vacancies that may occur in the senate as the result of new apportionments. Whether the whole senate should be renewed, or whether that portion only should go out whose terms had expired, is a matter about which there is some contrariety of opinion.

It is evident that those paragraphs are distinct and separate propositions. I think it better to present them separately; and I trust that the gentleman (Mr. Downs) will take that course. As to the fourth paragraph, which is to incapaciate the legislature from passing laws in a certain contingency, I think it a very grave subject; I am fearful unless it be modified it will lead to a great deal of confusion and difficulty. We have already much difficulty in the application of our jurisprudence, without accumulating further embarrassments, by exposing every law to the action of the judiciary, whether it was passed by a legislature that had strictly complied with the regulations requiring an apportionment to be made.

Mr. Downs moved to substitute, in place of the word "divisor," the words "the number entitling a district to a senator." His amendment was adopted.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out the first part of the section, and it was negatived—12 yeas, 30 nays.

The question then recurred on striking out the second clause of the section.

Mr. Roselius asked for some explanations in reference to this portion of the section. He could not comprehend its meaning.

Mr. Downs said that the object of this clause was to give a parish, having a less excedent, the greater excedent of a neighboring parish, and thus to reduce the fractions. If the two parishes then contained double the amount, in population, of the divisor, they would be entitled to two senators.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: That is precisely the reason why I ask the rejection of the second portion of this paragraph. Is it not apparent that, by this clause, a parish that has but two-thirds of the divisor, will have as much weight as the parish that contains more than one-third over and above the divisor. This is intended to favor the north-western parishes of the State; and to give them a representation which the Convention did not think them entitled to. Gentlemen may say what they please, but I insist that such will be the result, if, in fact, it be not its main object. I think that the subject should not be pressed at this moment, in a thin house; and gentlemen should recollect that, although they may succeed to-day, they may fail, as they did on a similar occasion, on the following Tuesday.

Mr. Downs presented the following rule:

Be it resolved, That all motions for reconsideration shall be decided without debate.

Mr. C. M. Conrad presented the following:

"That no vote upon any constitutional provision shall be reconsidered, unless the motion for reconsideration shall be made in a house composed of more members than were present when the question was originally adopted."

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

Saturday, April 12, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and at the request of the President, the Hon. Mr. Stephens opened the proceedings with prayer.

Mr. Downs moved the adoption of the resolution presented by him yesterday, that no debate should be had upon motions to reconsider.

Mr. C. M. Conrad suggested that his resolution should be taken up as an amendment to the resolution presented by Mr. Downs.

Mr. Downs moved to amend Mr. Conrad's resolution by inserting the words "if there be present a greater number of members voting in favor of the reconsideration, than voted originally in favor of the adoption of the proposition."

Mr. Conrad apprehended that if the house acquiesced in this amendment, it would not effect the purpose he designed —which was to prevent all motions for reconsideration when there were barely more than a quorum of the members present.

Mr. Beatty was opposed to Mr. Conrad's resolution. He could not consent to a measure which would serve particular purposes. It might induce certain members to stay away in order to prevent a reconsideration. Suppose for example, that a question was carried by a majority of thirty-four votes. That would require a house of at least sixty-seven members. Now, if there were a majority of thirty-nine, the absolute majority of the Convention, and there were only fifty members present, the majority could not overcome the opposition of the minority.

Mr. Benjamin offered the following substitute:

Resolved, that no motion for reconsideration shall be entertained unless a greater number of votes shall be given in favor of the motion to reconsider, than were given in favor of the proposition moved to be reconsidered.

Mr. Downs: that is precisely what I proposed.

Mr. Ratliff saw no utility in multiplying the rules, we were only losing our time in doing so; for it was after all, in the power of the majority to do just as they pleased, rules or no rules. And whenever the rule was found to be in their way, they would suspend it, or abolish it. It is perfectly idle to make the attempt when there is scarcely more than a quorum present, at any rate. Thereis no way to effect anything by rules, and we are only losing our time in discussing them.

Mr. Eustis: I will admit that my knowledge and experience in parliamentary rules are not great, and I presume I am not the only one in this house who may make a similar avowal. But I have not the slightest doubt that if we examine our journals, we shall find that the forty rules we adopted immediately after we had organized, have been the cause of our losing a greater portion of our time than any thing else, by the frequent discussions to which they have given rise. In a body like this, to my humble conception, a single rule would be sufficient; at any rate four or five rules. The President would propose the question, we would vote upon it, and we would get on much better and much faster. And is it borne in mind, that subjected to these forty rules, which only a few among us adequately comprehend, we find ourselves constantly embarrased and stopped at every step? You may say what you please about their merits, but in my opinion for our proceedings, good faith is better than rules. If good faith prevails, they are perfectly useless, and if it does not, they cannot be enforced.

Mr. Porter participated the views of Mr. Eustis upon this subject.

Mr. Downs: the resolution I offer as well as the amendment of the gentleman (Mr. Conrad) in place of exciting debate, will have the contrary effect. It will repress unnecessary debate. Yesterday we were discussing all day a motion for reconsideration. If it be true that our rules really result in a loss of time, we should amend them, in order that they may facilitate our proceedings. If we do not pass this resolution and the amendment which accompanies it, we may rely upon it that the very next question which comes up on the question of reconsideration, will occupy a week in debate. As for the idea that a deliberative body does not stand in need of rules, it is something very novel to me, and I am still more surprised that it should emenate from gentlemen of so much judgment and experience. What, no rules! Why, in what way are we to know that we are proceeding regularly? What would keep us from recurring to all that we had done, and doing it over again? It would be as reasonable to attempt to send a steamboat to Louisville without a rudder, as for us to attempt to proceed without rules.

Mr. Miles Taylor: I concur with the gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) that we should devise some means to expedite the proceedings of this body, but I differ with him as to the adaptation of his resolution to that purpose. I can conceive that the resolution of Mr. Benjamin may relieve us from a great many useless propositions for reconsideration. But the other resolution in my opinion, will occasion a great deal of difficulty. That gentleman says his object is to prevent discussion. Well, if that be his object, why is not the previous question sufficient. It is always in the power of the majority to arrest the discussion when they think it useless. Does the gentleman propose this as an additional remedy? I would remark to him that this remedy is too violent, for it has the tendency to render powerless even the majority. In point of fact, a section may be passed in either house, and all arguments to prove the necessity for a reconsideration would be cut off under this resolution. If the proposition of Mr. Benjamin be seperated, I will vote for it, but if it is embodied in the resolution of Mr. Downs, I shall feel constrained to vote against both.

The question was taken on Mr. Downs' resolution—yeas 27, nays 16.

The question then recurred on the adoption of Mr. Benjamin's resolution—yeas 36, nays 6.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Presidsnt pro tem (Mr. Claiborne) informed the Convention that the question pending was Mr. C. M. Conrad's motion to lay indefinitely on the table the first paragraph of the section introduced by Mr. Downs.

Mr. Downs asked for a division of the question.

The President declared that the question was not susceptible of discussion.

Mr. Ratliff moved to strike out the words "on the left bank of the river in descending," and to insert the words "the city" between the words population and and New Orleans. He remarked, that without this correction there was some ambiguity. Mr. Ratliff's amendment was accepted.

Mr. Conrad's motion was then put and lost—yeas 34, nays 10.

Mr. Downs: is it any fault of mine that the attendance is not larger? Had I the power, I would have every member to be in his seat. If gentlemen will stay away, that is no reason why we should fold our arms and do nothing.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: I sincerely regret that those to whom allusion has been made, are not here. It is well known that on Saturdays the attendance is always small. What I object to, is that this accident should be employed to bring on a vote when only a certain expression of opinion can be had. I move that this section be laid on the table until there shall be a more general attendance, in order that the question may be fairly tested.

Mr. Downs: I deny in the most emphatic manner, that I have ever profited by the absence of members on a particular day to pass any provision that I might have favored. This accusation, brought against me by the two gentlemen from Mew Orleans (Messrs. Benjamin and Conrad) is entirely without foundation. No question has to my knowledge been taken up on Saturdays that did not come out of its regular order. Must we devote Saturdays to what those gentlemen call unimportant matters? I know of nothing in this constitution that is not important, and I do not know what the gentlemen mean. As to the present question, it has been before the Convention for some time—it came up yesterday in its order, and was followed up to-day. The gentlemen must be really deficient in good reasons, to travel out of their way to assail me, and to attempt to make me responsible for all the consequences.

I regret that so many members of the Convention are absent, because it interferes with the transaction of our business; but it is preposterous to suppose that because they are absent we should do nothing.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: I accuse no one. I respect the rules, and I conduct myself I believe, courteously to all. But I may nevertheless say that the precipitation with which important subjects are pressed, and that in a house with a bare quorum, induces the conviction that only a certain expression of opinion is to be had. I may be told that this section has been before the Convention for the last eight days, but it was only taken into consideration, and before it had scarcely been discussed, the previous question was called for, and that too when a large proportion of the members were absent.

Mr. Downs: it was not I that called for the previous question—that is a motion that I never make.

Mr. Beatty: for the information of the gentleman I will state that it was I that moved the call for the previous question. I have had frequent occasion to make that motion. I have generally been on the other side of the house when I have made it, and the gentleman nor his friends never complained. This is the first time that I have called for it in favor of views of gentlemen with whom I have almost always differed. As for the absence of members, I must for the credit of those gentlemen say that they are much more punctual in their attendance than those with whom I have been in the habit of acting.

The President: All this is not in order.

Mr. Beatty: I am well aware of it, Mr. President; but it is necessary to reply to a charge that has no foundation.

Mr. Soule proposed the following amendment: "And if the apportionment that shall be made, has over or at least one-third under the number necessary to entitle it to a senator," &c.

Mr. Claiborne: if I understand the question, it is to provide for cases when it will be necessary to form a district with two senators; but why tie up the hands of the legislature? The Convention have decided upon this matter in the manner they have deemed most fit, and it seems to me that in conferring upon the legislature the power of making the future apportionments, they should be vested with a discretion of forming double districts when they should deem it expedient, or when the people should require it. I am aware that if the house decide elsewhere, I must submit. At any rate I do not understand why we should insert words that are superfluous, and which can only give rise to doubt and confusion. Whatever may be the object designed by the second portion of the paragraph, I would move to strike it out and insert the following: "No district shall be formed having a right to more than two senators."

Mr. Downs: the gentleman's motion is out of order inasmuch as the question upon striking out has already been taken.

That being the case, said Mr. Claiborne, I will move to substitute what I have proposed in the place of the three last lines, which I consider useless.

Mr. Soule: there can be no doubt as to the meaning of the paragraph. The preceding paragraph lays down the principle which the Convention have sanctioned, that whenever it can be done without inconvenience, single districts shall be formed with the right to one senator. But as it may happen that in the apportionment a parish or a collection of parishes may have a fraction over or under the divisor, it is deemed necessary that some provision be had to meet such cases; that is the object of the clause now under consideration. I can well conceive that the principle announced may give rise to opposition, but I cannot well conceive how it can be attacked on the score of its being obscure. Certainly nothing can be more explicit than the text taken as a whole, and as for the three last lines appearing to be superfluous to my colleague (MrClaiborne) I would observe that they do not refer to the two senators to be given to a double district, but specify that such district shall not be established but under conditions prescribed.

Mr. Claiborne: I can well perceive now what is the object of this clause, but I would remark that it is not exact to say that the Convention have established the principle that there should be as many simple districts as possible. They have established some single districts, but that has not been in virtue of any invariable rule. Far from it. As to the section itself, I will not say that the delegate from Ouachita who seems to have succeeded today in all his propositions, has availed himself of the absence of a large number of the members. If there be a fault it is exclusively that of those members themselves. But their absence is nevertheless an incontestible fact, and hence it would seem that it is not an opportune moment to decide a question. If it be however taken, I shall conceive it to be my duty to move a reconsideration.

Mr. Ratliff would observe that the text of the paragraph was so conceived that it might give rise to misapprehension in this, that fractions of remote parishes might be combined together and a senatorial district be thus formed. I am convinced, said Mr. Ratliff, that such was not the intention of the mover.

Mr. Conrad proposed the following amendment. He said he was opposed to the section and would vote against it, but nevertheless, to meet the objections of the delegate from Feliciana, (Mr. Ratliff) which he thought were well founded, he would move this amendment. It was to the following effect: that when contiguous parishes shall have together a sufficient population to entitle them to two senators, double districts may be formed; provided, that neither one nor the other have a population over or under one third of the number necessary to entitle them to a senator.

Mr. Downs moved that Mr. Conrad's amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. Conrad moved an adjournment. The yeas and nays were called for—yeas 7, nays 30.

There being no quorum, Mr. Downs moved for a call of the house—38 members present.

Mr. Downs moved that the names of those that had left the house and broke the quorum, should be entered upon the journals.

Mr. Claiborne thought that the call of the house would exhibit who were present and who were absent.

Mr. Lewis stated that Mr. Hudspeth was confined to his room by indisposition.

Mr. Cade remarked that those who forced the adjournment to-day were the same members that had forced the adjournment at Jackson to New Orleans.

Mr. Soule moved to adjourn for want of a quorum; which motion prevailed.

Monday, April 14, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

There being no quorum, Mr. Beatty moved that the Convention adjourn for one hour.

Mr. Dunn opposed the motion to adjourn for one hour, and raised a question of order.

It was trifling, said Mr. Dunn, and would not have the effect supposed.

He was overruled by the President, and called for the yeas and nays.

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Cénas, Chambliss, Covillon, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prudhomme, Pugh, Read, Scott of Feliciana, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—25 yeas; and

Messrs. Brumfield, Dunn, Roman and Winder voted in the negative—4 nays.

The Convention re-assembled pursuant to their adjournment, and their proceedings were opened with prayer from the Rev. Mr. WARREN.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The additional section offered by Mr. Downs, upon apportionment. A substitute had been offered by Mr. C. M. Conrad for a portion of the section, which Mr. Downs moved should be laid indefinitely on the table.

Mr. CONRAD of Orleans, would state for the information of the delegates who were not in their seats on Saturday last, that the substitute did not express his sentiments. He had moved it to meet the views of the delegate from West Feliciana, (Mr. Ratliff.) That gentleman thought that the clause was susceptible of a diffarent construction than the mover himself appeared to give it. The object of the mover is to establish single districts. To that, as a matter of course, I am opposed, unless local or other circumstances should make it imperiously necessary to establish them. In the north west, where there is a vast extent of territory, I conceive there are peculiar reasons militating in favor of the establishment of single districts, and I am willing that they should be established there. But where the population is dense, it is expedient to have double districts, in order to maintain the difference in the constituency between the senate and house of representatives. I think that the legislature should have the discretionary power to make double or single districts, as circumstances may require, and as their judgment may dictate. As for the principle of applying the surplus of one parish to another parish, in the formation of districts, I have no objection to it, provided the surplus is carried to a parish that is adjoining in the same section of country, but I have very serious objections that it be transferred to another and remote section.

Mr. BEATTY inquired of the chair whether the clause was open to amendment, should the amendment of Mr. Conrad be rejected?

The PRESIDENT responded in the affirmative.

Mr. DOWNS preferred the clause as it was.

The yeas and nays being called for on said motion, resulted as follows :

Messrs. Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative —31 yeas; and

Messrs. Benjamin, Briant, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Culbertson, Dunn, Hudspeth, Lewis, Mazureau, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the negative—16 nays; consequently said motion was carried.

Mr. Downs said that to respond to the suggestion of several members, he would consent to strike out, in the last paragraph, all between the words "the legislature shall be incompetent," and the words "all acts,"and insert the following:"to pass any laws until the apportionment shall be made in conformity with these rules."

Mr. CLAIBORNE would suggest the propriety of striking out the third paragraph, for the following reasons. It is, without doubt, necessary and expedient that the senators whose districts may undergo change by reason of the new apportionment, should go out; but in reference to those districts that are not changed, for example, the city, which will be a permanent district, that necessity does not exist, and consequently there would be no reason for such a course, and its policy may well be doubted. If you adopt it, then you destroy one of the very few distinctions remaining between the organization of the senate and the organization of the house of representatives—the difference in the duration of the respective offices. I am aware that if the majority of this house are prepared to abandon all the theories of our government, we have no means of preventing it, but for one, I shall resist it to the last. For these reasons I move to strike out the paragraph, and insert the following: "At each apportionment the term of office of the senators whose districts may be changed or reorganized by such apportionment, shall expire so soon as the elections may be held in their districts, without reference to the time such senators may have served under any preceding apportionment."

Mr. Downs: I desire to state that I have no desire to shorten the term of service of the senators. I know of no instance, nor do I believe that any exists, where a portion of the old senators may hold on to their seats after a new apportionment has been made. It strikes me that the senate should be entirely renewed. The contrary principle is applicable only to those States where permanence is made the leading feature of the upper branch of the legislature. For example, the senate of the United States, it is a permanent body; its districts—the States—are perpetual. If the rule in our constitution be made to apply only to those districts that may be changed, you make the senators judges in their own cause, and enlist their feelings against making changes in their districts. If you give them the power to determine which of them shall go out of office, you will give rise to a degrading contest for the preservation of power. On the contrary, prescribe to them strict rules, and place it beyond their power to transgress those rules. It is, therefore, not without reflection that I have proposed the particular clause in the section to which objection is now made. It would seem, continued Mr. Downs, from the manner in which gentlemen propose their amendments, that every thing that comes from me is, or must be bad, and admitting that the honorable delegate (Mr. Claiborne) had some grounds for his proposition, I think he might have suggested an amendment to the paragraph instead of proposing its rejection.

Mr. Ratliff: I apprehend that there is more difficulty in this matter than gentlemen may at first suppose. If you renew the senate in full every ten years, it is clear that the term of office being for four years, some senators will not remain longer in office than two years. Is there no means of obviating this inconvenience. It is my opinion, that if we wish to retain the principle that the senate shall be a check upon the lower house, we should apply some principle which would give permanence in the order of the succession of senators. The senators elected two years before the apportionment should continue to hold office until the expiration of their term, I think that this can be done, and it ought to be done. The effectual means of accomplishing it will be to elect the senators by lot, one half to retain their seats for only two years, and the other half for four. This may be done without any inconvenience.

It is evident that if the senate be entirely renewed, there will be a tendency to postpone the apportionment, and if those senators whose districts shall be changed, are only to go out, it will give rise to party spirit and intrigues which may defeat the object proposed; but it is said that the senate will be forced to act. This is an argument in favor of my proposition, for if those degrading contests should arise for the possession of power, they may not fulfill the duty imposed upon them, and the mechine of government will be stopped—no laws will be passed having any binding effect, and every thing connected with the government will be at a stand still. No appropriations can be made, although the greatest emergency may arise—for an invasion or servile insurrection. We shall be reduced to a state of helplessness and confusion.

Mr. Benjamin said he participated in part the opinion of the delegate; but he thought it necessary that the duration in office should be explicitly expressed, and therefore proposed the following amendment: "No apportionment shall have the effect of abridging the term of office of any senator elected before such apportionment shall be made.

Mr. Claiborne said that he was always disposed to sanction whatever came from others that he conceived was better than what he suggested himself. The delegate from Ouachita labors under a mistake when he thinks that my opposition to the clause proposed by him, arises from the causes he has assigned. I have no such feeling, and if I differ from him on most occasions, it is from no such motives. The object which we have in view, seems to me to be to give greater permanence to the senate than to the house of representatives. I think his clause destroys that feature, and hence I have proposed what is more in accordance with my views. When the delegate (Mr. Downs) contends that my proposition would have the effect of deterring certain senators from making changes in certain districts, he forgets that the effect of the clause by a parity of reasoning would be still worse, as it would deter all the members of the senate from making any apportionment at all. His objection applies with greater force to his own position. If the delegate from West Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) can satisfy me that his proposition is proper, I shall give it my support.

Mr. Brent thought the discussion had proceeded sufficiently far, and he would therefore move the previous question. The yeas and nays were called for on his motion and it was lost—18 yeas and 30 nays.

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Carriere, Chambliss, Downs, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Lewis, McCallop, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Read, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soulé and Waddill voted in the affirmative—18 yeas; and Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Cade, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Ledoux, Mayo, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Peets, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the negative,—30 nays.

Mr. Downs proposed to add to Mr. Benjamin's amendment the following: Except those whose districts shall be changed. The question was taken on Mr. Downs' amendment and it was lost. The question then recurred on the adoption of Mr. Benjamin's amendment, and the yeas and nays were called for—yeas 36, nays 14.

Mr. Benjamin then moved for the adoption of the substitute, and the yeas and nays baing called for,

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Hudspeth, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Wikoff and Winder voted in the affirmative—36 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Carriere, Chambliss, Downs, Humble, Hynson, Marigny, O'Bryan, Porter, Read, Soulé, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the negative—14 nays.

Mr. Ratliff thought that by declaring that all laws should be null and void unless the apportionment should be made in strict conformity with the rules that were prescribed, would give rise to an infinity of questions upon the constitutionality of the laws that might be passed, and would be transferring from the legislature the power of judging of their own organization and committing it to the judiciary. This would have very unfortunate resuls, and would produce a great deal of confusion and uncertainty.

Mr. Downs withdrew the first portion of the paragraph.

Mr. Eustis: This is not yet enough. The paragraph says that the legislature shall not be competent to pass any law until an apportionment shall be made in strict conformity with the rule. Now suppose that the legislature, nevertheless, should pass laws. What would be the consequence? What would be the penalty? That the laws so passed would be null and void! It is then evident that you attach to each law the question of constitutionality. Let us consult the lessons of experience, which should be a guide to us, and we shall find that the slightest innovation of this kind will be the source of great confusion and doubt, and will give us cause hereafter for much regret. Why is it that there is no law which has eminated from congress, the constitutionality of which is doubtful? I will tell you why. It is because the federal constitution contains nothing but principles. Let us refer to a contrary example. The supreme court of the State of Arkansas has declared one hundred and thirty-six laws of that State to be unconstitutional—and why? Because the constitution of Arkansas is mixed up with heterogenious matters, and is filled with simple legislation. Let us reflect seriously. In attaching the question of incompetency to the legislature we give to the judiciary the power to decide upon the organization of that body, and we may be well assured that the power will be exercised on every occason. Every law that will be passed after a new apportionment shall be made, will be exposed to the question of constitutionality. They will say that your legislature is not organized in strict conformity with the apportionment as prescribed by the constitution. The result will be a great deal of doubt and confusion, and perpetual litigation. But it is not only the question of apportionment which will be exposed to to the scrutiny of the judiciary; there are other questions having reference to the same subject which may also be involved. For example it is prescribed that contiguous parishes shall only be formed into senatorial districts. This word contiguous! It happens that there are parishes which are contiguous only at one point, and if a controversy should arise the judiciary would have to determine the question. Are we ready to authorize a principle of encroachment of one of the departments of the government upon another? Why establish three co-ordinate departments of the government if each one is not to revolve in its appropriate sphere, in the orbit which you have signed it in your constitution? The moment that your common-practised lawyer can raise the question of constitutionality of your laws upon so prolific a source of confusion and doubt, your courts of justice will resound with nothing else. It would be better to submit to a defective apportionment than to leave the judiciary so extensive a power. Hence it is that I hope that the balance of the clause will be struck out.

Mr. Downs: I am willing to yield in reference to the first clause of the paragraph, because, upon reflection, I am persuaded that I went too far in providing measures that would assure the execution, and the effect of future apportionments. But I cannot consent to leave the legislature free to make an apportionment or not, as it pleases. Free from all obligation, and free from all responsibility except the moral responsibility which has heretofore proved totally ineffectual.

Mr. Eustis had no objections to any coercive measure to inforce the making of future apportionments, provided the constitutionality of the laws themselves were not put at issue by declaring the incompetency of the legislature.

Mr. C. M. Conrad thought that the obligation of an oath administered to the members of the legislature, together with the desire to enhance the political power of the sections of country which they represented, would be sufficient to insure the making of the apportionments. The session of the legislature was limited to sixty days, and we have been more than one month in making an apportionment with which no one is satisfied. How much would it require for a legislature, composed of two bodies, and whose combined action would have to be sanctioned by the executive, to perform a similar task? When we take into consideration the shortness of the period, the spirit of party, local feelings and personal aspirations, it will be seen that the period allotted may interpose an insuperable obstacle. This attempt to to constrain the action of the legislature reminds one of the practice at Rome for the election of a new pope. The cardinals are shut up in their cells until an election be made. In a similar spirit our legislators are to be shut up and to remain without any legislative capacity to make laws, until they have first made the apportionment.

Mr. Ratliff renewed the proposition of Mr. M. Taylor.

Mr. M. Taylor moved to strike out all between the words "after the census" and "this rule."

Mr. Downs said that if this portion of the clause was struck out it would be left at the discretion of the legislature, and thirty years experience taught us that that was bad policy.

Mr. M. Taylor participated partly in the views of Mr. Downs, and thought it would suffice to apply the clause to those years in which an apportionment should be made.

Mr. Porter said as the Convention had fixed a basis, there was nothing to impede the action of the legislature.

Mr. Ratliff expressed a regret that he was not present when a similar clause was passed for the lower house. We have here the opportunity of judging of the obstacles which embarrass the making of an apportionment. What will it be with a house composed of ninety-eight members and a senate composed of thirty-two, which bodies will have to determine the very same question that we have been discussing for the last month? The absence of seventeen of the senators will suffice to suspend the action of the legislature, and for the fault of the latter you punish all the citizens of the State, stop the laws, and arrest all necessary appropriations. Is that just? No one among us will pretend to say that it is. Punish the legislature in depriving them of their per diem; but do not punish the people—do not stop the wheels of government in order to compel the legislature to do its duty.

Mr. Benjamin said that he saw he was wrong in having voted for a similar clause in the apportionment for the house of representatives. The argument of the delegate from Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) had convinced him.

Mr. Beatty said that he would vote for this clause because he was convinced that the other clause was wise and salutary. The question was taken on Mr. Ratliff's proposition, and it was rejected.

Messrs. Benjamin, Briant, Burton, Cade, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Eustis, Hudspeth, Ledoux, Lewis, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, Sellers, Soulé and Splane voted in the affirmative—22 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Preston, Read, Roselius, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill, Wedsretrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the negative—28 nays; consequently the motion was lost.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption offered the following substitute:

"In all future apportionments of the senate, the State shall be divided into sixteen districts. The city of New Orleans shall be divided so as to form two districts. The population of the city of New Orleans shall be deducted from the population of the whole State, and the remainder of the population divided by the number fourteen, and the quotient produced by this division shall be the representative number entitling a senatorial district to two senators. Single or contiguous parishes shall be formed into districts, in such manner as to have a population the nearest possible to the representative number. After the census has been taken, and the general assembly convened, the legislature shall not pass any law until an apportionment is made."

Mr. Taylor of Assumption, said that his object in presenting the foregoing substitute, was to test the sense of the house as to uniformity in the system of organization for the senate. It follows from the section to which I have offered this as a substitute, that the legislature will establish single districts, and my design is to ascertain whether the sense of the house is not in favor of double districts. The Convention will perceive that, by adopting my proposition, they will simplify the process of apportionment, and make it more equal. For example, take the districts of Iberville and West Baton Rouge on one side, and the district of Point Coupée on the other; it is clear that there is here inequality. Inequality will exist as the result of single districts; whereas, if you adopt the principles of double districts there will be greater uniformity and less equality. Accordingly, by uniting the parishes of Avoyelles and Rapides in a double district, there will be little or no fraction left, in allowing them two senators. At present, Rapides with an excedent of population, and Avoyelles with a deficiency of population, are assigned respectively, one senator. There is one striking inequality, and similar inequalities will be found in most cases where single districts have been established. A question of order here arose.

Mr. Ratliff contended that the proposition of Mr. Taylor was not in order.

The President decided that it was in order.

Mr. Benjamin said he would vote in favor of this proposition, because he prefered large districts. It was true that, if it prevailed he would be under the necessity of consenting to the division of the city into two districts; and although he was invincibly opposed to such a division, as he was to all exceptionable measures towards the city, as if she were the paria of the State; he would vote for this proposition because at least it was general in its character.

Mr. Caiborne would vote against the proposition, because he considered the division of the city as an injustice, and because that division would stimulate an opposition among races which he wished to be buried in oblivion. If the city were to be divided it were better it were divided according to its municipal regulations.

On the motion of Mr. Taylor of Assumption, for the adoption of the above substitute, the yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Cénas, Conrad of Orleans, Eustis, Hudspeth, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Roman, Taylor of Assumption, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—17 yeas; and Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Claiborne, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescottof Avoyelles, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Roselius, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the negative—36 nays; consequently the motion was lost.

Mr. Mayo moved to amend by adding after the word "legislature" in the twenty-eighth line, the words "to pass any laws after the first forty days of the session;" which motion was lost.

Mr. Lewis moved for the previous question.

The President put the question, "shall the main question be now put;" which motion prevailed.

Mr. Conrad of New Orleans, moved to amend by striking out from the third paragraph the words "or to exceed." The yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows, viz:

Messrs. Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Eustis, Hudspeth, Legendre, Mazureau, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, Roselius, Taylor of Assumption, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—17 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the negative—34 nays; consequently the motion was lost.

Mr. Benjamin moved to strike out from the sixteenth line the word "may," and insert in lieu thereof the word "shall." The yeas and nays being called for, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Cènas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Hudspeth, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, Taylor of Assumption, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—17 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the negative—34 nays; consequently the motion was lost.

Mr. Brent gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, move a reconsideration of the vote given on Mr. Benjamin's amendment, to insert one-fifth instead of one-third.

Mr. Downs moved for the adoption of the section as amended, viz:

"In all future apportionments of the senate the population of the city of New Orleans shall be deducted from the population of the whole State, and the remainder of the population divided by the number twenty-eight, and the quotient or result produced by this division shall be the population entitling a parish to a senator. Single or contiguous parishes shall be formed into districts having a population the nearest possible to the number entitling a district to a senator; and if, in the apportionment to be made, a parish or district be found to be deficient of or to exceed one-fifth the ratio, then a district may be formed having not more than two senators, but not otherwise. No new apportionment shall have the effect of abridging the term of service of any senator already elected at the time of making the apportionment, and after the census has been taken and the general assembly convened, the legislature shall not pass any laws until the apportionment be made.

The yeas and nays being called for on the adoption of the above section as amended, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent,

Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the affirmative—39 yeas; and

Messrs. Benjamin, Briant, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Eustis, Legendre, Mazureau, Roman, Roselius, Taylor of Assumption and Winder voted in the negative—12 nays; consequently the motion was carried, and the section as amended was adopted.

On motion the Convention adjourned till five o'clock this evening.

Monday Evening, April 14, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

At ten minutes after 5 o'clock. Mr. Brent moved for a call of the house—36 members present.

After a quarter of an hour had elapsed, Mr. Brent moved for a call of the house—39 members present.

On motion of Mr. Soule, the Convention then adjourned for the want of a quorum, till to-morrow at 10 o'clock, a. m.

Tuesday, April 15, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer.

Mr. Brent moved that the names of absent members at the call of the roll be published in the public papers.

Mr. Ratliff said that these publications would swell the volume of journals to a great extent; they were already very voluminous; yesterday the journals were of twenty-one pages of foolscap. Besides he doubted whether any good would result from this publication of the names of absentees. It would not lose those gentlemen who fail to attend a single vote, were they candidates before the people. In his own instance as a member of the house of representatives he had been most punctual and assiduous in his attendance, and it happened that his colleagues were not as punctual; and yet he never could discern that it made any difference, except he was sure to get the blame if any thing went wrong.

Mr. Brent differed from the delegate from West Feliciana in opinion. He thought it at least proper and expedient that the people should be instructed into the causes which retard this Convention in the accomplishment of the duty assigned it. If it did not procure a more punctual attendance, it would at least place the responsibility where it ought to be.

The question was taken and decided in the affirmative—yeas 39, nays 7.

Mr. Brent moved to reconsider that portion of the section upon apportionment, which required that a parish having one-third over or under the divisor should be entitled to a senator. The paragraph had been amended by Mr. Benjamin so as to require one-fourth.

Mr. Lewis said that the only motion in order, was to reconsider the whole section.

Mr. Conrad of Orleans, expressed opposition to the whole section.

Mr. Ratliff inquired what would be the effect of this motion to reconsider. Would the house have to go over the same ground?

Mr. Brent: I call the gentleman to order. The motion to reconsider is not discussable.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider and it was lost.

The Convention then took up the third section of the second article.

Mr. Mayo moved to lay said article on the table until the Convention reached the general provisions.

Mr. Lewis moved to take it up and fill the blank with 1845.

Mr. Downs thought it rather premature to act upon it now. It would be better to lay it over until the Convention had reached the general provisions, where it would more appropriately come up. It was laid over.

Mr. Read moved that the Convention take up sections eleven, twelve and thirteen of the report of the legislative committee, which motion prevailed.

Sec. 11. At the session of the general assembly after this constitution takes effect, the senators shall be divided by lot, as equally as may be, into two classes; the seats of the senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year; so that one-half shall be chosen every two years, and a rotation thereby kept up perpetually.

Mr. Conrad of Orleans, proposed an amendment to the following effect:

That in case a district should elect two or more senators, the seats of those senators shall be vacated at the expiration of two or four years, and lots shall be drawn for that purpose.

The amendment was concurred in, and the section as amended was passed.

Sec. 12. "No person shall be a senator who, at the time of his election, has not been a citizen of the United States ten years, and who hath not attained the age of twenty-seven years, and resided in the State four years next preceding his election, and one year in the district in which he may be chosen."

Mr. Read offered the following substitute:

"That every qualified voter shall be eligible to the senate."

Mr. Conrad of Orleans, moved to lay said substitute on the table, and called for the yeas and nays—29 yeas and 20 nays.

Mr. Claiborne called for the adoption of the section.

Mr. Brent moved to insert "twenty-five" in place of "twenty-seven."

And Mr. Conrad moved "thirty" in place of "twenty-seven."

But subsequently they withdrew their propositions.

The section was then adopted.

Sec. 13. "The first election for senators shall be general throughout the State, and at the same time that the general election for representatives is held; and thereafter there shall be a biennial election for senators to fill the places of those whose time of service may have expired."

On motion of Mr. Read, the house then took up the following section of article 2d.

Sec. 23. "No person, while he continues to exercise the functions of a clergyman, priest, or teacher of any religious persuasion, society, or sect, shall be eligible to the general assembly, or to any office of profit or trust under this State."

M. Mayo would simply remark that, upon reference to the constitutions of other States, it would be seen that in eighteen States there was no such restriction; in nine States the clergymen were excluded from some offices; and there were but three States, including Louisiana, in which there was a total disqualification imposed upon them. He would move to lay the section indefinitely on the table.

The question was then taken on Mr. Mayo's motion, and it was lost—yeas 22, nays 30.

Mr. Mayo then moved to amend the section.

Mr. Preston would simply remark that the restriction in the old constitution was certainly going too far. According to it, there could be no chaplain under the authority of the State in the army. He trusted that, at least, the present section would be modified.

Mr. Culbertson would vote for the first part of the section, but not for the latter. He moved "or to any office of trust or profit under the authority of the State" be stricken out.

Mr. Lewis did not wish to argue the subject again. By a clause already adopted, clergymen were excluded from the office of governor; and now by the present section they are not only to be excluded from the legislature, but from all offices of trust and profit under the State. He considered this exclusion to be odious; although personally he was as little inclined to take a clergyman from his secular duties, and put him into a political office, as any member on this floor; still, there should be no disability in reference to clergymen, nor any restraint upon the will of the people, if they should think proper to elevate them to those offices.

The amendment was carried; and the section as amended was then adopted.

M. Taylor of Assumption, moved the additional section, offered by him two months ago, defining the acquisition of and continuance of residence necessary to qualify an elector.

Mr. Porter would suggest a longer period of time. He thought the time specified in the section was too short; this was a new country, and it was desirable to encourage population.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption had no objection to any amendment proposed by the house. The provision was necessary to ascertain who were citizens and who were not citizens; otherwise the commissioners of election would be without an uniform rule, and would differ in their constructions of the fulfilment of the constitutional requisition upon residence. I am willing that the section should be so amended as to refer to the acquisition of residence; after which it should have no effect.

Mr. Lewis would suggest that it be so worded as to say that it should interrupt the acquisition of residence.

Mr. Ratliff: I would move that the word "exclusively" be struck out. It might happen that the house might not be exclusively occupied by one family.

The section was modified so as to declare that an absence of sixty days should interrupt the acquisition of residence.

Mr. Culbertson was opposed to so short a period as sixty days; it was not time enough. As I understand the section it means this, that after the person has exhibited his intention to become a citizen of Louisiana, and has resided among us for twenty-two months, if he were compelled to absent himself, and be unable to return before the expiration of sixty days, he would be compelled to recommence, de novo, his residence to acquire citizenship; and would have to remain two years consecutively, without reference to his former residence, which would count for nothing. That appears to me to be too hard. I would not object to his losing the benefit of the period for which he might be absent; but after a man may have resided in Louisiana for two summers, to expunge that residence because he has not completed the term of two years, is what I cannot well consent to. I would rather say six months; at any rate four months. I can see no harm that would result from extending the time. We have among us a very valuable class of the community who have no wives nor children, and who are not housekeepers, and who absent themselves during the summer, and go to the north or to Europe. They could not very well return in sixty days, more especially as an epedemic might be prevailing.

Mr. Mayo would state the reasons why he could not give his sanction to the section. It appeared to him to be an attempt to change the law of domicil. The civil code determined this matter in an explicit and positive manner, and its provisions can be as well understood by the commissioners of election, as this section. It would have no other effect than to confuse those officers, and unsettle the uniformity of their decisions. At any rate, he conceived it did not properly come up in this place, and if it were to be inserted any where, it ought to be inserted in the general provisions. The delegate from Attakapas (Mr. Voorhies) had introduced a similar provision, which had been laid upon the table until the general provisions came up, both that provision and the present one might be discussed in connection.

Mr. Miles Taylor would not discuss the merits of the proposition. But would simply remark that the delegate from Catahoula (Mr. Mayo) labored under a serious misapprehension as to there being any conflict between the section and the dispositions of the civil code on the subject of domicil. The dispositions of the code as to domicil, referred to a civil right, and were intended to define what particular judicial process was applicable to particular cases The present section referred to a different matter. It defined a political right, which related to the qualification of electors. What connection could there be between a matter affecting the elective franchise and the civil right of domicil, I cannot, said Mr. Taylor, discover. As to this particular portion of the constitution not being the proper place for the section, I differ from the gentleman. I think there is a necessary connection between it and the dispositions preceding it. If the house are disposed to adopt it, it is proper they should do so now, and if they are disposed to reject it, they might as well reject it now as at any other time.

The question was taken on Mr. Mayo's motion to lay on the table, and it was lost.

The question recurring on Mr. Culbertson's motion to extend the period to four months,

Mr. Culbertson said he had conversed with gentlemen who were better judges than he considered himself to be, and at their suggestion he was willing to modify his motion, and to make the period ninety days.

Mr. Conrad of New Orleans, renewed the proposition for four months. He thought the provision unnecessarily rigorous; if the absence were not in the computation, he would have no objection. But he had serious objections to so short a period as ninety days.

The question was taken on Mr. C. M. Conrad's motion, and it was lost; yeas 23, nays 24.

Mr. Lewis then proposed ninety days. His motion prevailed, and the question being on the final adoption of the section,

Mr. Preston said he had had great hopes that the amendment would have been rejected. It appeared to him that there were sufficient restrictions upon the acquisition of citizenship already in Louisiana; we had certainly guarded our doors with a great many precautions. This additional restriction was calculated to do a great deal of injustice. He presumed such was not the design of the Convention; and had they anticipated that injustice would have resulted in a single instance, they would not have done it. This provision was particularly objectionable, because it would operate harshly upon a large and valued class of the community. It would disqualify the carpenters and engineers that were employed upon plantations—they were not house-keepers, but lived with their employers—they would therefore fall under the restriction. There were other mechanics too that lived with their employers, and they would share the same fate. In the hot season, the mechanic might think fit to recreate himself by going from Concordia, from Carroll, to the uplands of Mississippi. Was he to be deprived of his right to become a citizen by a tempory sojourn of sixty or ninety days out of the State? There were schoolmasters too in Ouachita, in Natchitoches and elsewhere, that in the usual vacation would wish to visit the springs of Arkansas to recruit their health from the effect of their sedentary employment. Should they be debarred that privilege under the penalty of loosing the benefit of their residence? It seemed to him, to make use of a vulgar expression, to be taking a snap judgment upon these individuals. There was not a State in the Union where similar restrictions could be found upon the acquisition of residence. There were hundreds of persons who for six or eight months of the year, toiled and struggled for the benefit of the State, and for the development of its resources, who had no families, and who lived in the numerous private boarding houses conducted by widows in this city, because they found it more convenient; who, after the hurly-burly of the business season was over, took a trip to the north, to Europe, to Beloxi, to Pass Christian, or to Pascagoula. Are we not about to perpetrate an act of injustice to limit the absence of these persons to sixty or ninety days? There were laborers too that toiled in their useful occupations, ten months in the year, that were employed in gardening, in mechanical establishments, in our foundries--and I trust that these useful establishments will continue to increase--who get moderate board at fifteen dollars per month, and who may desire to suspend their labors—they may ascend the Mississippi—they may go to Texas—to Arkansas, to any place they may choose, but is it right to say that a penalty of civil disability shall be pronounced against them? I would ask gentlemen, if it is right to attach such a penalty, if an overseer, who is unwell, should go over from the parishes of Calcasieu and Sabine into Texas, for the recovery of his health? For God sake, let us be done with these restrictions. They emenate only from an unworthy spirit of jealousy, that should find no place in our bosoms. They can do no good. Let us leave the matter of residence to be fixed and determined by the legislature, to whom it properly belongs. I trust the section will be rejected.

Mr. Mayo would suggest to the delegate from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) that the motion to reject was an equivalent question. If it failed, the section would be adopted.

Mr. Preston: I will then move to lay the section indefinitely on the table.

Mr. Beatty would offer a substitute, that the legislature be vested with the power of passing laws defining the mode of acquiring the residence required by the constitution. It miget be inferred that the legislature had the power without a specific clause to that effect; but in order to prevent any doubt it was better perhaps, to provide such a clause.

Mr. Humble renewed the motion to lay the section indefinitely on the table.

The yeas and nays were called for; yeas 20, nays 34.

Mr. Claiborne said he had voted against laying on the table, not because he was disposed to sanction ninety days, but with the view, if possible, of amending the section so as to extend the period to four months. He thought ninety days too short. On the one hand, he did not wish to restrict the right of suffrage, and on the other hand, he did not wish to encourage absenteeism, which was an evil that had become too prevalent. The State wanted all her good citizens. He wished to repress this tendency to absenteeism, but at the same time, he did not wish to impose a rigorous provision. It so happened that he had been called to the chair when the question was taken upon the amendment substituting ninety days, and he did not vote upon the question. He would have voted against the amendment, and that would have made a tie vote. He would therefore request some member who had voted in the majority, to move the reconsideration, in order that he might propose to substitute four months for ninety days.

Mr. C. M. Conrad hoped that the motion for reconsideration would be made, and that the further consideration of the subject would be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. Beatty offered the following substitute:

That the legislature shall have the power to pass laws, defining how citizenship may be acquired and lost.

Mr. M. Taylor would not argue the question. He would remark merely, that to his judgment the constitution ought to define every thing essential to the exercise of suffrage: if the legislature were to be entrusted with a discretionary power, that power might be exercised materially to affect the right of suffrage and to abridge it.

Mr. Beatty argued, that if there was a constitutional provision upon this matter, it might operate badly, and if that was the result, there would be no immediate means available to change that provision. But if it were left with the legislature they would provide such remedies against fraud and for the protection of the ballot box as experience might suggest, and if there was any defect in the legislation that might be applied, they could change that legislation. Moreover, a constitutional provision upon the subject might be interpreted differently by different officers, and lead to a great deal of confusion and difficulty.

Mr. Benjamin was of opinion that the section involved a qustion of domicil, that ought not to be decided in the constitution. It was a question peculiarly complicated—there were a thousand circumstances connected with it, that would have more or less weight in its proper decision. The fact, whether a man had a family or not, was material in determining whether he had his domicil or not in the State. A man might have all his interests at the north—have his family residing there—and be, as is familiarly termed, "a bird of passage;" if the question were asked, no one would determine him to be a citizen of Louisiana. Another man, who was unmarried, and had become identified by residence with our southern institutions, would be considered a citizen of Louisiana. The point at issue would turn upon some fact, some particular circumstance, that would induce a judge or a jury to determine whether a man was a citizen of Louisiana or not. This question of domicil was considered to be a very intricate matter by law writers. The C. Code, the Napoleon Code, and the Conflict of Laws, all testified to the same fact. Many circumstances had to be taken into view before determining it. It was impossible to make a constitution defining every particular shade of difference. It belonged to the judiciary to determine these questions. He was in favor of the substitute offered by the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Beatty.) He thought the legislature ought to have charge of this matter, and that they ought to be trusted. The constitution prescribes the general principle that there shall be a residence of two years—leave it to the legislature to carry out the details. If you can't trust your legislature, (continued Mr. Benjamin) whom can you trust? The legislature were more fit to have the control. If they make any omissions, or any bad consequences should flow from what they may do, it will be in their power to remedy their own acts. The legislature were the proper body—let us delegate to them the authority. He would say no more, as this subject had already been spun out to a great length, but would only remark, that if we continued to take up our time with ordinary questions of legislation, there would be no end to the labors of this body.

Mr. M. Taylor regretted to differ with the delegate that had just spoken, upon a question of so much importance. I confess (said Mr. T.) that I cannot agree with him in the slightest respect. Every consideration that appears to operate upon him, is an additional reason with me to favor the adoption of the section I think that the course suggested by the gentleman is the most objectionable that the house could take: that the Convention by a solemn vote should expressly delegate to the legislature the power of determining what constitutes political residence. The gentleman says that this is an ordinary matter of legislation. I beg leave to differ from him. In my opinion it does not properly appertain to the legislature. He says that the question of domicil is the most difficult question to be resolved in the whole range of our jurisprudence. Admitting such to be the fact, I deny that the question of domicil, as it is legally understood, has any bearing upon the present subject. Domicil, as treated of in our statute books, has reference to the particular civil process to which members of the community shall be subjected—it involves a question of jurisdiction, and defines what particular facts shall invest a man with the ordinary rights and the ordinary burthens of citizenship. There is a material distinction between the rights conferred by civil residence and those conferred by political residence. By civil residence one is entitled to hold property, to dispose of the same by sale or by other contract, and to transmit it by wil or by operation of law; it determines who are members of the civil community, amenable to the courts, subject to the laws, and as subject to these laws, before what peculiar courts they are to be sued, or to bring their actions—at what particular places they are to perform certain contracts. Ordinary legislation goes no further than that and if in some instances there are some statutary provisions affecting political rights, I hold it is a departure from political principle. My views are that any system that permits the legislature to exercise any influence over suffrage is the most vicious that we could adopt. I am decidedly averse that the rights of those claiming the elective franchise should be exposed to the changes of legislation—that the legislature should have the power to extend or limit the right of suffrage, or to interfere with it in any manner. I consider that such a power, if conferred either expressly or inferentially, would be most pernicious in its consequences; and that it would convert the legislature into an arena in which the right of suffrage would be subjected to the untoward control of political parties. If one particular provision operated to exclude a certain class of persons from voting whose votes might be secured to favor a certain expression of political opinion, the party that expected to be benefitted would labor to obtain the ascendancy in order to subserve that design. The evils that would follow from legislative control, should be guarded against by placing the right of suffrage beyond ordinary legislation. Had the power been conferred by the old constitution, the highest considerations of sound policy would have dictated the necessity of withdrawing that power.

The gentleman (M. Benjamin) has said that the section involves a great many propositions. I discover but one, and that is that the absence for a particular period shall interrupt residence. This is a distinct proposition, and unless the gentleman takes the exceptions which are the necessary consequences of the principle itself, there is no multiplicity of propositions. It results as a matter of course, that the question of absence involves some essential facts, such as whether the individual has been engaged in business, whether the premises occupied by him are still retained, whether he leaves behind him his family, or a member of his family, or a servant in possession of them. In any case, there are but two propositions—first, as to the fact of absence; and secondly, whether that absence is accompanied by some facts that show it to be but temporary, and that the residence in the State is constructively retained, to be actually and personally continued. I cannot perceive in this any thing vague or uncertain. The section succeeds the requisition that two years' residence shall be indispensable to acquire citizenship, and explains how this residence of two years is to be acquired. It is an attempt to make clear and evident, what was before doubtful. Without it the question would well arise, what constituted residence? For a civil residence, the acquisition of domicil, a constructive residence is only necessary.

But for a political residence, the residence which confers political rights, an actual residence is required. The distinction between these two kinds of residence are of a great deal of consequence. The legislature have nothing to do, and ought to have nothing to do, with defining political residence. That properly belongs to the constitution, as one of the principal conditions of suffrage. The choice of mere domicil depends simply upon the declaration of the person; it is not necessary for him to reside in the parish which he has declared to be his domicil, but persons having contracts to enforce against him are under the necessity of proceeding against him at his domicil, although he never sets foot there. Our legislature admits of the fact of a man having two domicils—certainly it will not be pretended that he may exercise his political rights in either or in both! If he fail to declare his domicil, and if he resides occasionally in two parishes both are considered his domicil, and the courts will allow actions to be brought against him in either. This illustrates the difference between domicil and residence connected with political rights, and shows that there are great objections to entrusting the latter to ordinary legislation. Our system of domicil for the exercise of civil rights, are exceedingly vicious.

Mr. Benjamin would read to the Convention the existing laws prescribing how residence was acquired. The law of 1813. (Mr. B. here read the law referred to.)

Now, Mr. President, (said Mr. Benjamin) under the provision of the existing constitution, to be entitled to the right of suffrage, it required one year's residence and the payment of a State tax. The constitution prescribed the term of residence and the tax, but did not point out the mode in which residence should be acquired. The legislature immediately after the adoption of the constitution, provided by law for carrying out this provision, and enacted the law which I have just read. Has any difficulty or confusion ever arisen upon the subject? I know of none! The delegate from Assumption (Mr. Taylor) has spoken of a distinction between civil residence and political residence. This distinction is unknown to our laws, and the legislature have provided indiscriminately for both under the constitution. The law prescribes how residence is acquired and lost. It is true that during elections, during periods of high political excitement, some contests have arisen upon the requisition of one year's residence. Whether it should be a consecutive residence for the whole year, without quitting the State for a moment, or whether a temporary absence on business or pleasure could effect the actual residence. The question has arisen at elections, whether a person going for recreation to Pass Christian, had lost his residence, and whether by crossing from Vidalia to Natchez, residence could be lost. Different interpretations on such occasions, have been given to the law. The supreme court have decided that it was sufficient to continue residence, if the person absenting himself had left any indication of his intention to return. The subject is open to a thousand exceptions, and there is no way of providing for them by any general constitutional rule. Suppose a man was to buy a house and have all his interests in the city, and yet periodically, every summer, should choose to absent himself with his family and go to the Virginia Springs, and instead of leaving a servant in charge of his house, should lock it up and carry the key with him. Would it be said that he had forfeited his residence? that he was disqualified from political privileges? We cannot foresee all the exceptions that may arise. It is, therefore, better to commit the subject to the discretion of the legislature. It has been exercised by the legislature for thirty years, and no detriment has been the result. Residence has never been a political question, except at the ballot box, where it has been raised to exclude the votes of individuals supposed to be favorable to the one or the other of the political parties. But constitutional provisions, however minute they were, and they would have to be minute to embrace the whole subject, would be exposed to different construction under similar circumstances; and the only difference in fact would be, that the evils found to exist would in the one case be readily obviated, while in the other they would be permanent. It was better the question remained where it properly belonged, to the representatives of the people, fresh from the people, and reflecting the will of the people!

Mr. Downs called for the previous question, and it was sustained. Yeas 45 nays 10.

Mr. Miles Taylor, at the request of Mr. Conrad of Orleans, moved for the reconsideration of that part of the section limiting the period of absence to ninety days.

Mr. Conrad: I consider the provisions of this section as another yellow fever qualification!

The question was taken on the reconsideration, and it was decided in the negative; yeas 25, nays 32.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: I am opposed to the section, but inasmuch as the majority are in its favor, I would suggest to them the propriety of making it as clear and as unambiguous in language as possible. I would therefore suggest, that the word "consecutive" be placed before the word "ninety days."

The house assented to this correction.

Mr. C. M. Conrad then moved to strike out the words "or mechanical pursuit," which correction was also concurred in.

Mr. C. M. Conrad moved to strike out the words "by him in such business."

Mr. Wadsworth saw no necessity for this verbal correction, inasmuch as a person employed was as much employed in the business of his employer as if he understood the business. A carpenter might employ a clerk to represent him in his business while he was absent, although the clerk understood nothing of tongueing and grooving; and it would not be improper to say, employed by him in his business. The clerk was incidentally employed in the business of his employer. However, it was a matter of moonshine, one way or the other, and he did not care about it, but certainly if the carpenter employed a person in his shop, that person had something to do with the shop.

Mr. Conrad said that one might be employed to take care of an establishment; to protect the residence of the proprietor, without being employed in his business.

Mr. Lewis called for the previous question.

The words "in such business," were struck out.

Mr. Claiborne said he would have preferred four months to ninety days. But inasmuch as the section only had reference to the acquisition of residence, he would vote for it.

The question was taken, and the yeas and nays called for—yeas 34, nays 31.

Mr. Conrad of Orleans, gave notice that he would call up his proposition upon suffrage, on Thursday next.

On motion of Mr. Downs, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the formation of the judiciary department.

REPORT OF THE MAJORITY OF THE COMMITTEE.

Sec. 1. The judicial power shall be vested in a supreme court, in district courts to be established throughout the State, in justices of the peace, and such other courts in the city of New Orleans as the legislature may from time to time direct.

Mr. Ratliff proposed to substitute article one of the report of the minority committee, which is in the following terms:

Sec. 1. The judiciary power of the State shall be vested in one supreme court, in district courts, and in such inferior courts as may be established by law.

Mr. Ratliff: It will be seen by the report of the majority, that the transition from district courts is to justices of the peace. The city, however, has been excluded from the operations of the provision, and it only is to apply to the country. I think that this transition is not expedient, and I cannot concur in adopting a rule for the benefit of the city, which is not extended to the country. I think that sound considerations of policy dictate that the legislature should be vested with a discretionary power in the establishment of courts which the exigencies of the country may require, and to modify the system that may be adopted, as experience shall suggest. I would prefer to hold on to the old constitution, because it gives to the legislature a control over the matter, and does not bind us to a system that may prove detrimental to the best interests of the country. We should consider that what might answer to-day, may not answer hereafter. The country is in a state of progress, and circumstances may arise which may render legislative interposition necessary. If you tie up the hands of the legislature, you make them impotent, and you may entail upon the country a system which you may hereafter have cause to regret. We have some experience; we have a system which, although it may not be free from abuses, is open to amendment. Let us prune away the excrescences, wherever we find them, but do not let us cut away the system to which we are accustomed, and build up one, which after all may be good, but the beneficial results are only conjectural. That the supreme courts should be established constitutionally is proper enough, but for the inferior tribunals, it seems to me that it would be the part of wisdom to place their establishment to the best judgment and discretion of the legislature. We shall not have fulfilled our duties, if instead of improving the present system, we shall inflict upon the people another, of which they may complain, and from the thraldom of which it will be impossible for them to obtain immediate relief.

Mr. Roselius: As I perceive that the chairman of the committee (Mr. Grymes) is not in his seat, I deem it my duty, as one of the committee that concurred in the report; to state the views that actuated the majority in presenting their report to the Convention, recommending a scheme or project for the judiciary department of the government. They were actuated by what they conceived were correct principles, to be embodied in the constitution. They assumed for their guidance that there were three distinct departments of the government; three great powers which are independent of each other—the executive department, the legislative department, and the judiciary department; that is to say, three powers which should move in their proper spheres—in their appropriate orbits. They should move harmoniously—without clashing with each other, and without interfering with each other. If this theory be correct; if it be a sonnd principle of political organization, the consequence is, that in adopting the judiciary department of the government, we must adopt such a department as is independent of the executive and of the legislative departments.—as independent as those two are independent of the judiciary department. And, sir, how is this to be done, unless the judicial power be invested in certain officers exclusively, whose attributes, and whose duties shall be enumerated in the fundamental law?

You have said that the executive power of the government shall be vested in the governor. The legislature cannot transfer from the executive department any of its power, and vest it elsewhere. You have decided in what bodies the legislative department shall be vested; they are independent of the executive, and he cannot diminish the power of one branch to increase the power of the other. You have said that the power to make laws shall be exclusively vested in the senate and house of representatives, and shall be exercised only by them. Hence it is clear that no part of the legislative power can be transferred to any other. It is fixed; it is irrevocable as long as the constitution endures. With regard to the class of officers by whom the legislative power is to be exercised, they are enumerated in the constitution. Why not the same principle for the other department of the government—the judiciary department? It will scarcely be assumed, I hope, that the judiciary department is not as important as the other two. In my humble opinion it is the most important. It will not be contended, I presume, that it is subordinate, that it is not a co-ordinate department, its power as necessary to the administration of the government as either of the others. Therefore I am at a loss to conceive what objection can exist to designating the officers in the constitution by whom that important power of the government is to be exercised; powers infinitely of more importance than the powers of the other two departments. But gentlemen may say that we should not divest the legislature of the power to change the courts and establish others. Will it not strike the apprehension of gentlemen, that if the power be given to the legislature to change the courts, that it will be perverted to legislate judicial officers out of office. This has, unfortunately, been done on more than one occasion, in violation of the constitution.

Under the constitution of the State, or the constitution of the United States, the legislature nor congress have no right to legislate a judge out of office by abolishing the office. It is an outrageous violation of the constitution. If the power be given to the legislature to institute one class of judicial functionaries, you make the judges dependent upon the legislature; you reduce the judiciary from is position as a co-ordinate branch of the government, into a subordinate, a subservient branch of the government. It is to prevent this abuse of power that the majority of the committee have submitted a system that will lead practically in establishing in the great political, the great fundamental law, the principle of putting the judiciary beyond the control of the legislative department. The functions of the judiciary are of such a character as to make it necessary that they should protect the constitutional rights of the citizens, when the legislature may have transcended their powers. They have unpleasent duties to perform. To remove a judge by abolishing a court, what can you expect will be the result? The incumbent will be subjected to the control of the legislature, and if he be called to decide whether the legislature have oversteped its legitimate powers and contravened the constitution, will he feel that independence that he ought to feel? The judiciary system, instead of being a blessing, will be the greatest curse. Any thing but an independent and honest judiciary is the greatest curse which the people can suffer. How can any plan or system be suggested by which its independence may be preserved, without designating its high functionaries? If any such plan or system I will listen to it with defference. The plan of the gentleman from Florida (Mr. Ratliff) will not attain the object. It falls short of any amelioration. It is no improvement upon the old constitution in any particular, in relation to this subject. The legislature, under the old constitution, have usurped a power which does not belong to them; they have violated the constitution by legislating judges out of office. I need not refer to the particular instances. They have exercised it, and no constitutional lawyer will disagree with me when I assert that it was a violation of the constitution. The evil is to be guarded against by providing that there shall be one supreme court, and district courts under the constitution. That places the judiciary upon the same level; it secures to it the same independence which is guaranteed to the legislature and to the governor. The section offered as a substitute from the report of the minority of the committee, proposes to leave the control, with the exceptions of the supreme court, entirely subject to the discretion of the legislature. It proposes that the judiciary power of the State shall be vested in one supreme court, in district courts, and in such inferior courts as may be established by law. It is true that the power is vested in a supreme court, and in district courts not established but which are to be established from time to time by the legislature. But be that as it may, it is conferring a very uncertain power, and infringes a great principle, without which it is impossible that this Convention, or any other similar body, can frame a republican system of government, and that is, there must be three great departments of the government independent of each other. If we do not do our duty and give to the judiciary sufficient independence and efficiency, the people will complain. If the judiciary be guilty of derelictions, let us point out specifically the manner in which they may be made answerable for these derelictions. But do not let me be told that the legislature shall control the judiciary. If you do this, the sooner you give up the idea of framing a constitution for the benefit of your constituents, the better.

Mr. Read proposed to insert in the first section of the report of the minority, the words "in as many district courts" instead of "district courts." The section would then correspond with the principle consecrated in the constitutions of the other States. As far as he had examined, he had not seen a single constitution which sanctioned the principle enunciated in the first section of the report of the majority of the committee.

Mr. Ratliff had had but little consultation in making the proposition which he had the honor to submit. His object was to make the section acceptable to all parties. He had no objection to the establishment of the supreme court in the constitution. It was a tribunal for the whole State. The gentleman (Mr. Roselius) in speaking of the judicial power, had said that it ought to be placed beyond the control of the legislature. In desiring, said Mr. Ratliff, that the legislature should have the power to create such courts as the public exigencies may require, I had certainly no intention that these courts once established should be under the control of the legislature. I wished that the judges should be independent of all such control, and should only be reached by impeachments, if they were guilty of any malfeisance in office. The city has been taken care of; and for her it has been provided that the legislature shall be competent to establish such courts as they think fit. If this provision be necessary for the city, why is it not necessary for the country? In a political point of view, the country has been admonished to take care less she be swallowed up, and to keep her hands out of the lion's mouth. I do not apprehend any collision here; but as the same necessity may exist for the country that is assumed to exist for the city, I move that the words in the fourth line, "in the city of New Orleans," be stricken out.

Mr. Eustis: Success in organizing the judicial department of the government can only be insured by moderation, matured consideration and reflection. If the country and city feeling be let loose, we shall have no judiciary worthy of the name—all is lost. I shall offer at the outset some observations for the consideration of the Convention. The report of the majority, which may be defective in some particulars, has been elaborately prepared; it has received great reflection, and will receive great reflection. I would crave members who may design to prepare amendments to the system it suggests, which I do not say is good or bad, to bear in mind that it has been submitted after mature reflection by men who are conversant with the matters involved. This is a subject which must be approached with great diffidence, even by those whose professional pursuits and great experience have given them the best opportunities of comprehending it in all its magnitude. The gentleman (Mr. Ratliff,) seems to think that there is some favoritism towards the city, in excepting her from the provision expressly appointing the courts for the State. I would inform the gentleman that this proposition came from the country, and I trust that this fact will be sufficient to remove any such impression from his mind. Perhaps the matters of information which I may communicate may be of some service to the Convention in enabling them to appreciate the labors of the committee. I do not propose to debate the subject. I consider it above debate, as demanding the highest order of intellect, the highest impartiality and moderation. The gentlemen composing the judiciary committee were actuated by the desire to establish a system for the country at large. This proposition was suggested by two distinguished delegates. The delegate from Ouachita and the delegate from St. Landry. It did not originate with the city. The delegation from the city on the committee acquiesced in it. For God's sake do not throw the city into the matter, and represent the plan as emanating from the city. I crave gentlemen to consider that this plan may be bad, it may be defective, but do not visit upon it the sin of being of city origin. I should not have offered one word, and would have suffered this preliminary question to be taken, had I not apprehended that the error under which the delegate from Feliciana labored was participated in by some other members, and I found this a suitable occasion for making a few brief explanations. This plan establishes two distinct courts, a supreme court and district courts throughout the State. In relation to the district courts, the reason for their establishment in the constitution is this, that there is a most material difference in the duration of the term of office of the judges. Although in other constitutions, and in the constitution of the United States, it is provided that the judicial power shall be invested in one supreme court and such inferior courts as the congress may establish, yet it must be borne in mind that the judges hold their offices for life; whereas the committee have proposed that the judges should hold their offices for a short term of years. It became a matter of necessity that there should be some certainty, some permanence in the system, and that it should not be abandoned to the inconsiderate action of the legislature, controlled by some temporary majority. That was the reason, and the only reason. The gentlemen from the country thought it expedient and proper, and I am but their organ in expressing that opinion. They thought that these courts were sufficient to transact all the public business, and that the judicial and ministerial functions should hereafter be entirely distinct and separate. As the judges were to hold their offices but for a term of years, it was but reasonable they should have some guarantees for their continuance in office and for their indepen-pendence. With these explanations I submit the question to the judgment of the Convention.

Mr. SOULE moved to lay the section, for the present, on the table; which motion prevailed.

Mr. SOULE then moved to reconsider the vote by which the city of New Orleans was constituted one senatorial district.

Mr. BENJAMIN said he had also made some motions for reconsideration, but as the hour was advanced, he would move an adjournwent.

Mr. LEWIS moved that the Covention adjourn until to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT decided that under the rule this motion was not in order, as 5 o'clock, every evening, was appointed for the meeting of the Convention.

Mr. LEWIS considered that the Convention had the right, and that the majority could not be bound down and trammelled by such a rule. It was in the power of the Convention to determine whether they should meet this afternoon, or to-morrow morning. He would appeal from the decision of the chair.

Mr, DOWNS: I would ask the delegate what are rules made for, if they are not to be observed.

The question was taken upon the appeal from the decision of the chair, and the decision was maintained.

Mr. LEWIS moved for the dispensation of the rules, in order to move for the revision of the resolution establishing afternoon sessions. Leave was refused; yeas 23, nays 31.

Mr. M. TAYLOR gave notice that he would move for the revision of the resolution to-morrow.

Mr. SOULE renewed his proposition to take up the reconsideration of the vote establishing one senatorial district in the city of New Orleans.

The question was taken and decided affirmatively; yeas 30, nays 26.

Mr. WINCHESTER moved for the adjournment. Lost.

Mr. BENJAMIN then moved a call of the house. Fifty-five members present.

Mr. BRENT moved that the vote upon the senatorial district for the city, be taken de novo, on Friday next, at 12 o'clock, M.

Mr. GARRETT would inquire if under the rules, it did not require a larger vote to carry the reconsideration of a question than originally voted in favor of that question? If this were so, then the question for reconsideration, just taken, had been lost.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD considered that the question for reconsideration had failed.

Mr. SOULE said he would ask for the vote upon the reconsideration on Friday.

M. C. M CONRAD: That can't be done. The question has been taken and it is lost.

Mr. SOULE: That would be strange, indeed! When the question was first taken on my proposition, there were thirty-seven votes in favor of it. If there be no impropriety in alluding to the dead, I would remark that there are now seventy-six members. Three or four members are absent, exclusive of those that voted for it—for the proposition; that would make forty-two members, an absolute majority, exclusive of the president. It surely will not be pretended that thirty-three members are to control forty-two members!

Mr. SPLANE: The rule does not apply to this case, because the motion for reconsideration was moved before the rule was adopted.

Mr. MARIGNY sustained a similar opinion.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned until this evening, at 5 o'clock.

TUESDAY EVENING, April 15, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

They took up the report of the majority of the committee on the legislative department. The question pending was on the motion of Mr. Ratliff, to strike out the words "in the city of New Orleans," in the first section.

Mr. PRESTON moved to lay this section on the table, and to take up sections five, six, nine, ten, eleven and twelve, which were concurred in by the minority of the committee, and about which there would be little or no debate. The morning sessions could be devoted to those sections which would ellicit debate, and the afternoon sessions to those sections which would excite little or no discussion.

Mr. PRESTON then moved for the adoption of section five:

SEC. 5. The supreme court, and each of the judges thereof, shall have po wer to issue writs of habeas corpus at the instance of all persons in actual custody under civil process.

Mr. PRESTON said that if the house should hereafter agree that the supreme court shall issue writs of habeas corpus in criminal cases, it would be very easy to supply the words, in the last line, "and criminal" before the words "civil process."

Section five was adopted.

Mr. READ then moved the adoption of section sixth:

SEC. 6. The appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court shall extend to all cases in which the constitutionality or legality of any tax, toll, or impost of any kind or nature soever shall be in contestation, whatever may be the amount thereof; and, likewise, to all fines, forfeitures, and penalties, imposed by municipal corporations.

Section six was adopted.

Mr. SOULE moved the adoption of the seventh section, and his motion prevailed.

SEC. 7. The supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases, on questions of law alone, in all cases in which the punishment of death or hard labor may be inflicted, or a fine exceeding three hundred dollars is actually imposed.

Mr. BRENT moved the adoption of section nine, which motion prevailed.

SEC. 9. The judges, by virtue of their office, shall be conservators of the peace throughout the State. The style of all process shall be, "The State of Louisiana." All prosecutions shall be carried on in the name and by the authority of the State of Louisiana, and conclude, against the peace and dignity of the same.

Mr. PRESTON then moved to amend the fifth section; to insert the words, "and criminal," before the word "process" in the last line.

Mr. BENJAMIN would inquire whether it was contemplated that the supreme court should issue writs of habeas corpus in all cases. There was scarcely a day that there were not some of these writs obtained from the inferior courts.

Mr. PRESTON replied that it was only in matters connected with the jurisdiction of that court.

Mr. Brent proposed to amend by adding the words "in all cases in which the supreme court have appellate jurisdiction."

Mr. GARRETT was of opinion that the supreme court in all cases should be competent to issue writs of habeas corpus. It should not be limited to the question of mere jurisdiction. He thought it better to postpone this section until there was a full house. The supreme court should not only have appellate jurisdiction upon writs of habeas corpus, but should have original jurisdiction in issuing them.

Mr. RATLIFF said he did not pretend to have much legal learning, and if he differed from the distinguished lawyers that had taken a position on this subject, it was with great diffidence. There were certain difficulties in this matter that suggested themselves to his judgment. Section seven declares that the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases in which the punishment of death or hard labor may be inflicted, or a fine of three hundred dollars be actually imposed. There appeared to be no connection between the fifth section and the seventh section. At what time will the supreme court exercise the superior control provided for in the seventh section? It must be after the sentence is pronounced, for upon the sentence depends whether that court shall have jurisdiction or not. Now, according to the fifth section, a writ of habeas corpus will be immediately from the supreme court; it will be attended with serious inconvenience. That court may examine a case, upon which it may find on investigation, it has no jurisdiction. A man is accused of a crime in a distant parish, and is lodged in jail to answer the charge, what will be the consequence? Will he be brought before the supreme court? Why not leave his case to the judge of the first instance, and if the judges commit an error, that error can be corrected upon appeal to the supreme court. If it decides that the man should be restored to liberty, it is done without delay, and with comparatively little trouble and expense.

Mr. PRESTON said that the delegate from Feliciana had taken a common-sense view of the subject. The majority of the committee were opposed to granting the writ of habeas corpus in criminal matters, alleging that it would interfere too much with the business of the court, and would be too serious a burthen. The minority of th committee were in favor of conferring that power in some particular cases that might arise. It would not be proper to extend it so far that its exercise might be abused. In criminal cases, a father of a family might be imprisoned on a charge of murder. The law says that bail shall not be allowed except where the proof is evident, and the presumption great. There might be prejudices against him, and it might be necessary in order to ensure him a fair hearing, that he should go before the supreme court. Why should be not have the privilege of the habeas corpus, and be brought immediately before the supreme court? Such cases would happen but seldom, but when they did happen, a ready and effectual remedy ought to be provided, if the party were actually entitled to relief.

Mr. C. M. Conrad saw insuperable objections to giving original jurisdiction to the supreme court upon writs of habeas corpus in criminal cases. How was that court to ascertain that it had appellate jurisdiction over the case until the writ was returned? The body would have to go before it before it could determine the question of jurisdiction, and that would in effect be giving it original jurisdiction. If it be invested with power to issue the writ of habeas corpus, it ought to be restricted to such cases where the inferior court had refused to issue it.

Mr. Ratliff would observe that where the inferior court refused the writ, it would only be necessary to bring the records up, for the supreme court to determine the question. This would be an efficacious mode, it would be prompt and economical, and would afford adequate protection.

Mr. Benjamin said that as soon as the house were decided upon the point that the supreme court should exercise appellate jurisdiction only, and be dispensed from trifling cases, we would be enabled to accommodate the present difficulty by providing that she should exercise the power involved, in all cases that depended upon her jurisdiction of appeal.

Mr. Soule was apprehensive that the Convention might not agree. The object of the committee was palpably to give a safe-guard to the citizen. Inasmuch as no man can be arrested and kept in confinement without a specfic charge against him, every court should have the power of opening his prison doors and relieving him from an illegal imprisonment. If there existed any cause which would make it doubtful whether the inferior court would grant redress, the right to apply at once to the supreme court, ought to be vouchsafed —for that court might reasonably be presumed to be free from the hasty passions of the moment. This is not in the nature of an obligation imposed, but of a power conferred for the ends of justice, and which may or may not be exercised.

Mr. Preston said that it would follow from the same power, that the supreme court might force the criminal court, for example, to render a judgment in cases where the judgment of that court had been delayed beyond a reasonable period, and it would have the faculty of interposing its authority in a case where a man was unjustly condemned and about to be hung. The supreme court would issue a writ of mandamus, of procedendum, or prohibition, as the case might require. The habeas corpus is an original writ of right. There is no such thing as an appeal.

Mr. Roselius: No where but here!

Mr. Conrad of Orleans, was not disposed to dispute that the writ of habeas corpus was an original writ, but he was not disposed to give to the supreme court original jurisdiction in all cases where parties agrieved might require it. He had an objection that the supreme court should exercise a supervisory control.

Mr. Roselius moved to lay the subject on the table, subject to call.

Mr. Saunders moved to lay it indefinitely on the table.

Mr. Winchester moved for the reconsideration of the fifth section; which motion prevailed.

Mr. Saunders was opposed to giving the supreme court an original jurisdiction in cases of habeas corpus. He did not think that, as an appellate court, it could exercise any other than appellate jurisdiction over those cases.

Mr. Brent differed in opinion from the delegate from Feliciana, who had just resumed his seat. He thought that gentleman misapprehended the question. The simple question was this, shall we invest the supreme court with jurisdiction to protect the liberty and lives of our fellow citizens? The writ of habeas corpus was an original writ. He had never heard of an appeal upon a writ of habeas corpus. As for the expense, it was exaggerated, and as for inconvenience there would be none. A man confined in prison, in the country parishes, desiring the interposition of the supreme court in his case, would wait until the court came into his district.

Mr. WINCHESTER said that the Convention were losing its time in attempting to find a remedy before they found the evil to which that remedy was to be applied. He objected to the whole section, because it was calculated to produce a collision of jurisdiction. No difficulty has ever arisen in the country in relation to these courts, to his knowledge. It was adding a great deal of business to the supreme court, without any obvious utility.

Mr. MARIGNY was in favor of the rejection of the section.

Mr. EUSTIS said that the business of the supreme court was very extensive. Its jurisdiction extended in civil matters where the amount in dispute exceeded three hundred dollars. It had therefore a labor to perform as extensive as it was complicated, and for that reason he was indisposed to extend its jurisdiction to criminal matters. I thought it was inexpedient to do so; and I was strengthened in that opinion by the fact that there never has been flagrant injustice done in the court of the first instance, with the exception of a solitary case. But nevertheless, as the community were in favor of a court of errors in criminal matters, it was conceived to be proper to give the supreme court appellate jurisdiction, and to review questions of law exclusive of questions of fact. The supreme court was then invested with the power of reviewing questions of law which might arise, and as a consequence it was not invested with the power of issuing writs of habeas corpus in criminal cases. It was presumed that the district courts would be amply sufficient for that purpose, and that no great hardship could arise. I have the highest deference for the opinion of the attorney general, whose experience must entitle them to great weight; but I would ask him what he means when he says that this original jurisdiction should extend only to cases of great importance? Does he mean where the accusers are men of an elevated position in society, and where figure the most eminent members of the bar? But these cases are rare, and they have the means, as in ordinary cases, to obtain immediate relief from the district courts. I think that these writs should be confined to civil process, and if you impose the burthen which would grow out of the jurisdiction proposed to be extended to the supreme court, you will be imposing upon that tribunal greater labor than it will be able to prosecute satisfactorily.

Mr. PORTER moved that the section be laid upon the table, subject to call; which motion prevailed.

The Convention then took up section tenth:

SEC. 10. The judges of all courts shall, in all cases, give in writing their reasons on which their judgment is founded.

Mr. BENJAMIN offered as a substitute for the said section, the 12th section of the constitution of 1812, and the same was adopted, viz:

SEC. 12, of 1812. The judges of all courts within this State shall, as often as it may be possible so to do, in every definitive judgment, refer to the particular law in virtue of which such judgment may have been rendered, and in all cases adduce the reasons on which their judgment is founded.

On motion, section eleven was taken up.

SEC. 11. No court, or judge of any court, appointed under this constitution, shall exercise any jurisdiction, or perform any functions, but such as are purely judicial; and no other duties or functions shall ever be attached, by law, to the office of a judge, but such as are judicial.

Mr. BEATTY moved to lay said section on the table subject to call.

Mr. SAUNDERS moved that the Convention adjourn till to-morrow at 10 o'clock, a. m.; the motion was lost, the vote being equal, the President voted in the negative.

Mr. BEATTY then renewed his motion to lay the said section on the table, subject to call, and the same was carried.

On motion, section twelve was taken up, viz:

SEC. 12. No court, or judge of any court, shall ever have the power, by any order or judgment, in any suit, process, or other proceeding before them, or pending in such court, to order or adjudge any money to be paid by the parties to such suits or proceedings, or make any allowance out of any money or property that may be in actual custody of said court or officers thereof, except for the payment of the legal fees of the ministerial officers of the said court, as allowed and established by law.

On motion of Mr. SAUNDERS, said section was laid on the table, subject to call.

On motion section thirteen was taken up, viz:

SEC. 13. The judges of all courts shall be liable to impeachment; but for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment, the governor shall remove any of them on the address of three-fourths of each house of the general assembly.

Mr. BEATTY moved to reject this section. He said that as the judges were to hold their offices under the new constitution but for six or eight years, and were subjected to impeachment, it was not necessary to provide for their removal by address. The first part of the section was already provided for, and it was superfluous.

Mr. PRESTON suggested the fifteenth section of the minority report as a substitute, as follows:

SEC. 15. For reasonable and stated cause, which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment, the governor shall remove any of the said judges, the attorney general and State attorneys, on the separate address of each house of the general assembly.

Mr. SAUNDERS said, that the very idea of such a proceeding filled him with horror. It was preposterous. We are asked gravely to bind the judiciary, hand and foot, and to deliver them over to a faction that may obtain a temporary control in the legislature. The thing was utterly unreasonable. The judiciary was in a fair way to be abundantly trammelled, without going to so unreasonable an extent.

Mr. RATLIFF said, that radical as he was he could not swallow—he could not go for this. He could not consent that a bare majority of the legislature should exercise so dangerous a power. He presumed that the mode of addressing judges out of office was intended to operate in cases where they were not amenable to impeachment—where they were incapacitated by moral or physical causes. They might in such cases be removed without being subjected to odium. He would concur that the governor should exercise the power of removal without the concurrence of three-fourths of both houses of the general assembly. With the gentleman from Feliciana, (Mr. Saunders) he thought the proposition of the delegate from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) was one of the worst features that could be embodied in the constitution.

Mr. READ moved to amend said section, by striking out the following words: "But for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient cause for impeachment, the Governor shall remove any of them, on the address of three-fourths of each house of the general assembly," and insert in lieu thereof the following words of the —— section of the constitution of 1812. "But for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient cause for impeachment, the governor shall remove any of them, on the address of three-fourths of each house of the general assembly; provided, however, that the cause or causes for which such removal may be required, shall be stated at length in the address, and inserted on the journal of each house."

On motion, said section was adopted as amended, viz:

SEC. 13. The judges of all courts shall be liable to impeachment; but for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient cause for impeachment, the governor shall remove any of them, on the address of three-fourths of each house of the general assembly; provided, however, that the cause or causes for which such removal may be required, shall be stated at length in their address, and inserted on the journal of each house.

On motion, the Convention adjourned till to-morrow, at ten o'clock, a. m.

WEDNESDAY, April 16, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

In the absence of a minister of the gospel, the Hon. Mr. STEPHENS, at the request of the president, opened the proceedings with prayer.

On motion, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Cade.

On motion of Mr. LEDOUX, the vote adopting the 13th section of the majority report of the committee on the judiciary, adopted on yesterday, was reconsidered.

On motion of Mr. Ledoux, said section was called up, viz:

Sec. 13. "The judges of all courts shall be liable to impeachment; but for any reasonable cause which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment, the governor shall remove any of them, on the address of three-fourths of each house of the general assembly: Provided, however, that the cause or causes, for which such removal may be required, shall be stated at length in the address, and inserted on the journal of each house."

Mr. Ledoux moved to amend said section, by inserting after the words "three-fourths," the words "of the members present."

Mr. Lewis said he had very serious objections to this amendment. If it prevailed, the result might be that you would have a man removed by the minority of the members of the legislature. The objections were palpable to his mind. If the house of representatives be composed of one hundred members, fifty-one would form the quorum, and if the senate be composed of thirty-two members, seventeen would form the quorum. The three-fourths of the former would be thirty-seven, and the three-fourths of the latter would be thirteen; that is, about fifty members of both houses; and the singular position would be presented, of an actual minority having the power to remove any officer except the governor, and it was not likely that he would remove himself if he were addressed to that effect. This position was too radical. He granted that heretofore, it was too hard to remove a judicial officer. But desirable as it was to get rid of a bad officer, it was expedient to retain a good one. One swallow did not make the summer, so one abuse did not justify another.

Mr. Miles Taylor said that among the number of reasons submitted by the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) was one which claims some attention. It is this: that it might happen that a minority might remove a judicial functionary. I admit that this is possible, but it is barely possible, and even should it be likely to occur, I hold that it is not of so serious a character as to prevent the adoption of the section. It declares that there shall be a concurrence of three-fourths of the general assembly, and it would seem to be its plain intent and meaning, to refer to those upon the floor. And there are members on this floor, gentlemen of large experience, who give it that construction, and think that the amendment proposed is superfluous. But in order to prevent misconstruction, it has been deemed proper so to express it in the section. If the house be composed of ninety-eight members, to obtain the dismission of a judge, seventy-five members of the house would be necessary, if we adopt the rule that we are to estimate three-fourths of the total body. In the senate, composed of thirty-two members, it would require twenty-four, making a united vote of ninety-eight members. Now if we have reference to the sessions of the legislature, and of this body, we shall find that for nine-tenths of the time, from the beginning to the termination of the session, one-fourth of the members are absent. Now it might happen that each individual member of the legislature were in favor of the destitution of a particular individual, and that there were strong reasons for immediate action, and yet because one-fourth of the members were absent, both houses would be powerless. I think that any principle which can entail such consequences must be improper. Although on the other hand, it may happen that a minority may act in the destitution of a judge, it is only possible; and is so barely possible that it may be considered improbable. If it should really happen that a bare minority should be disposed to act in that manner, is there not every reason to believe that one-fourth of those that were present, would refuse to concur? The difficulties to which I allude, may exist, and would lead to consequences lamentable indeed. It is surely the part of wisdom to suggest some means to prevent an unworthy public functionary from injuring the people.

Mr Ratliff said he listened always with pleasure and instruction to what fell from the delegate from Assumption. It was as plain as language could make it. What constitutes a house? That appears to be the question to be resolved. If the house of representatives, composed of one hundred members were to assemble, and on the first day of that session there should be but forty-eight members present, there would not be a quorum, and the house would adjourn until the next day. If the senate on the first day of the session were to meet, and but fifteen of the thirty-two members of that body were to answer to their names, they would also adjourn over for a similar cause. If they were to meet on the next day, and the house was to consist of forty-nine members, there would still be no quorum of either body. But if on the following Wednesday, the house upon meeting and calling the roll should find fifty-one members, and the senate seventeen, both bodies would organize; they would then become a house. They would elect their officers, and they would be constituted into the general assembly of the State. The three-fourths would be readily construed to mean after the organization. It might result in great injury to make the amendment proposed. The right of addressing in such cases was intended to apply where the functionary might be physically or morally incapable.

Mr. LEDOUX called for the previous question, which was ordered.

Mr. GUION called for the yeas and nays upon the motion for the adoption of the amendment.

Messrs. Beatty, Boudousquie, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Downs, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, St. Amand, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative —33 yeas; and

Messrs. Benjamin, Conrad of Orleans, Culbertson, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Porter, Ratliff, Read, Sellers, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—17 nays; consequently said motion was carried, and the amendment adopted.

On motion, the 13th section as amended was adopted, viz:

SEC. 13. "The judges of all courts shall be liable to impeachment; but for any reasonable cause which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment, the governor shall remove any of them, on the address of three-fourths of the members present of each house of the general assembly; Provided, however, that the cause or causes for which such removal may be required, shall be stated at length in the address, and inserted on the journal of each house."

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the first section of the fourth article of the report of the majority of the committee upon the judiciary department.

The question pending being the motion of Mr. Ratliff to strike out the words, "in the city of New Orleans."

Mr. BENJAMIN was opposed to striking out. He said he conceived this to be a proper occasion to express his individual views, and to state the reasons which he thought should influence the Convention in establishing a proper judiciary system for the State. The subject was one of great interest and magnitude to those having any thing to do with the administration of the laws. The first thing that struck the student in commencing the study of the law, was the question of jurisdiction; the first thing that attracted the profound consideration of the practitioner, was jurisdiction. It was a vexed, a most idle and useless source of perplexity. Certain individuals were vested with the power to decide the rights to property and to liberty, in virtue of a commission from the governor, with the approbation of the senate; to decide between man and man, and between society at large and one man. One would suppose that all these controversies would be subjected to the simplest principles; but what is the course? Different individuals are appointed to administer the laws of the country, and to these individuals different names were given. Nay, sir, two names were given to the same individual, and it depended whether you addressed him under his proper title, as it is called, or not; whether your suit was brought or not. For example, you sue before the officer called the parish judge, and you present your petition, but it depends whether you have addressed him properly, to prosecute your action and to obtain the redress you seek. If you have addressed him as judge of the parish court, when you should address him as judge of the probate court, you are turned out of court and are mulcted in the costs; and, yet, your petition is directed in point of fact to one and the same functionary! If this judge is to determine all controversies why should he have two distinct names to govern two distinct jurisdictions? It must be a constant theme of ridicule, as well as a source of great difficulty and confusion. When we are told that the Chancellor of England cannot give the same remedies in chancery as he can at common law, we laugh at this artificial distinction: we are amused at the idea that if you address him in chancery he can grant you relief, but if you address him at common law he cannot, and vice versa; and yet he is one and the same person, and appointed for one and identically the same purpose. We are at loss to conceive why this difference. Are we not doing the same thing? This question of jurisdiction meets us at every step, not only in reference to the parish and probate courts, which are filled by one and the same person out of the city, but between the district courts and the courts of probates. You bring a suit before one of your judges, the plea of jurisdiction is raised, it is enrolled by the court, and you go on and obtain judgment. An appeal is taken, and the supreme court decides that the court below had no jurisdiction. Here you are saddled with all the costs, and have to begin the proceedings de novo. We have forty-six parish courts, and, as if that was not sufficient, we have ten district courts besides, and a host of inferior judges with their taxes and costs. They can have no other result than to benefit lawyers, sheriffs, clerks, &c., &c. I defy any man to prove to me that all the legal business could not be done by one-half of these courts. The cause of all the difficulty is their accumulation, their different names and their conflicting jurisdictions.

I had not the honor, said Mr. Benjamin, to be a member of the judiciary committee, but while the Convention were at Jackson the organization of that department was a theme of constant conversation among us. It was our usual afternoon topic, while reposing upon the green turf, under the shade of the trees that surrounded the college building. And I really believe we did more by these consultations than we have accomplished in two months' sessions. My views were freely expressed upon those occasions, and they were participated by several delegates whose experience had led them into a similar train of thoughts, that we should have but one set of inferior courts and a supreme court. The advantages which would result, I considered to be the uniformity and simplicity of such a plan. I care not what particular name you may appropriate to these inferior courts; you may invent any name you please; all that I am solicitous about is that there should be but one set of courts, of original jurisdiction. That any man desiring to obtain legal remedies may go to one judge; and that you cut away all the mass of litigated cases growing out of vexed and intricate questions of jurisdiction The attempt to unravel them never promoted the investigation of great principles of jurisprudence; and why they were invented I do not know. Let it be established that there shall be but one place for all species of litigation, and for one general and universal jurisdiction. Let us have one appellate supreme court. The simplicity of such a system recommends itself to the comprehension of a child. I anticipate that it will excite objections, but these objections will be made by men who live by and are interested in the continuance of the former state of things; the people will not participate in them.

If we refer to the sixteen volumes last published, of the decisions of the supreme court, we shall find a large portion occupied with decisions upon questions of jurisdiction; to deciding whether in a particular case, the judge has been properly addressed as parish judge, or judge of the court of probates. After long and tedious investigation and great research, they have determined whether he should be called parish judge, in reference to a particular matter, or probate judge! It is no uncommon case, and if any gentleman doubts it, I can point it out in these authorities, for the supreme court to pronounce in favor of a certain jurisdiction, and afterwards pronounce against it. A practitioner at the bar examines the decisions for the purpose of enlightening himself upon the subject of jurisdiction—he finds that in a certain suit, which is parallel to one that he intends instituting, A. is pronounced to be judge of the probate court, and it is decided that it was a fatal error to style him judge of the parish court.

Being fortified by this decision, he institutes proceedings, and styles the judge accordingly. An appeal is taken, and it is determined upon that appeal that these proceedings are wrong; that A. is not probate judge, but parish judge! Before a decision is finally had the party against whom the proceedings have been had, is dead and his estate is insolvent. And thus for the mere satisfaction of settling the point, whether you should address the judge as parish judge or as probate judge, you have to incur vast expenses and trouble, and to find at last that you have lost all recourse. These are evils which loudly call for a remedy. I repeat that I am indifferent as to the title you may confer upon your courts; you may call them what you please, provided you institute them with one broad common and general jurisdiction; provided that the fundamental rule shall be, that their jurisdiction is universal and unlimited. Why, I would ask, should there be appeals to the district court, and from the district court, in the same matter, to the supreme court? Why not take the appeal directly, and at once, to the supreme court? Is it not a strange contradiction that a judge in his quality of parish judge, should not have jurisdiction beyond three hundred dollars, when the very same individual as judge of the court of probates, may exercise an unlimited jurisdiction, and pronounce upon a case involving three hundred thousand dollars or more; and when you enter in our supreme court you find five men seated upon the bench, whose age and experience have blanched their hair, seriously occupied in unravelling the thread of conflicting jurisdiction to determine whether you were right or wrong in styling the individual you addressed, in one judicial capacity or another, and resolving whether your suit was well brought or not, accordingly as you style the probate judge or parish judge. Again, there are questions as to the amount of jurisdiction. It is declared, that the parish court shall not entertain jurisdiction beyond or below a specified amount, and here comes the question, are costs and interest to be included in the amount specified? I hold that these questions have no other practical result than to enable clerks and lawyers to make money. Is such a system, so prolific in its abuses, to be perpetuated—and it must be perpetuated, unless you establish courts with but one kind of universal jurisdiction. The gentleman from Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) objects that there should be an exception in favor of the city of New Orleans. If it can be construed into a favor I do not desire it, as far as my humble capacity extends, I do not consider it a favor. If it were such, I would be ready to relinquish the boon on the spot. But there is an exception which arises from the exigencies of the commerce, and which renders it indispensable that there should be courts established in the city that should pronounce instantly upon questions that may be brought before them. A vessel may be sequestered, and in order that she should not be unnecessarily detained and her value be swallowed up in expenses, it is necessary and requisite that some court should be vested with the power of deciding summarily upon the case. There must be a tribunal ready to give prompt and immediate attention to commercial matters, but whether you call that tribunal a commercial court, or by whatever name you please, is immaterial. This exception is indispensable, on account of the wants of a great commercial city. But whether you have a special tribunal under a particular name, as the commercial court, or appropriate a district court to such business, amounts, after all, to the same result, so that you provide for this immense amount of litigation in a satisfactory manner. Establish two or three district courts in the city, and let the business of the city be distributed among them. You have provided for the establishment of eighteen district courts throughout the State. New Orleans contains one-third of the population. She should have more than one district court. Give her two or three, and let a preference be given to the trial of commercial cases. We are now surrounded by courts and subjected not only to conflicting jurisdictions, but to great inconvenience in the transaction of public business. We have a district court, a parish court, a commercial court, and the presiding city court. The ancient records ought to be kept in one place, where they would not be mislaid, and where they would be of easy access. We ought to establish the judiciary upon sound and proper principles. There should be an unity and a simplicity in all its parts. There should be but one original jurisdiction, and but one appellate court. Whether you call this a parish court, or a district court, is to me a matter of no moment. Let its jurisdiction be limited by territorial extent, and let it have jurisdiction in all matters of legal controversy. Such a system will redound to the credit of the State, and will free her from those enormous costs which have been a disgrace upon her jurisprudence.

Mr. Dunn would vote in favor of striking out. He concurred in all that fell from the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin) which favored the adoption of all means essential to the furtherance of justice and the adoption of the judicial system to the public exigencies. He would vote to strike out; not because he conceived that there was any favoritism towards the city designed, but for this simple reason—that he was not aware that public opinion required any particular courts differing from those which have heretofore been in existence. He apprehended that the present system might be simplified and improved, and if that could be done he was averse to making so radical and thorough a change. He thought it better to leave the organization of the courts to the action of the legislature, and was not advised that the public interests required an exclusive and irrevocable system. In the parish in which he lived no inconvenience was felt, and no complaints were made. There were none of those difficulties experienced in the practice which had been alluded to by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin) therefore he was unable to say whether the people desired any change. He admitted that the system was susceptible of improvement, but it would be better to leave the power with the legislature. He was not prepared to say whether one court would suffice for the wants of the people. If there be but one court, and that be the district court, it would be necessary to give it jurisdiction in cases of successions. It would be, perhaps, more advisable to leave the question open, for he took it for granted that the legislature would not establish a probate court unless it were called for. If it were called for by the people, it ought to be established. He saw nothing that would justify him in believing that his constituents were disposed to favor the present scheme. If the legislature were to institute a system of courts and they were found not to answer the purposes designed, a remedy could be applied. The present scheme may not work well, and if the experiment should prove unsuccessful, the people should be allowed to establish different courts. He would therefore move to strike out, so as to leave the question open at the discretion of the legislature.

Mr. Miles Taylor moved that the subject under consideration be laid temporarily on the table, in order to proceed to take up his motion rescinding the rule and appointing afternoon sessions.

Mr. Beatty hoped that this motion would not prevail. We had adopted this rule but three days ago, and we were now asked to repeal it.

Mr. Downs was opposed to rescinding the rule; we had met yesterday afternoon and accomplished much valuable work. The beginning was propitious, and if we were really anxious to expedite business we ought to adhere to the rule.

The yeas and nays were called for on Mr. Taylor's motion, and it was lost—16 yeas, 35 nays.

Mr. Marigny could see no good reason for striking out New Orleans. Its extended business required to be facilitated by the establishment of a greater number of tribunals than those that were necessary for the country. He hoped the motion to strike out would not prevail.

Mr. Wederstrandt said that he did not rise to make a speech, but to state that he would vote against striking out. He conceived that the ends of justice would be better assured by dispensing with the parish courts. He did not believe that the system embraced the wishes of the people, more particularly the people of West Feliciana. He felt fully instructed, and he hoped that so odious a system would be expunged.

Mr. Dunn said that it appeared to be the design to preclude the establishment hereafter of courts of probates. If he had entertained any doubts upon the subject, they would have been dispelled by what he had heard. The question was introduced at the threshold to abolish the parish judge system, and to deprive the legislature of any discretionary power in the creation of loyal tribunals. The gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin) whose eloquent voice was always heard with pleasure, had dwelt upon the abuses of the system. He had uttered a tirade for the purpose of showing that there were many cases which substantiated the defects of the present system. He would ask the gentleman why it was, if these evils were so great and glaring, that he did not propose some remedy when he was a member of the legislature; as for the difficulties growing out of conflicting jurisdiction, that could have been settled by a single dash of the pen.

Mr. Ratliff said, it is apparent, Mr. President, that the section as reported by the majority of the committee on the judiciary, is designed to overthrow the parish court system, and that, without providing any thing adequate to take its place. The delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) has endeavored to show that the present system has a great many defects, and that it gives rise to a great deal of confusion and difficulty, on account of its conconflicting jurisdiction. I do not pretend to urge that the system is not obnoxious to some censure, and that it does not need some reform. I readily admit the fact that it might be meliorated. But what I contend for is this, that the legislature should be vested with discretionary power to organize the courts as experience and the wants of the people may suggest. Why not follow this course? It is recommended to us by an experience of thirty-two years. It is said that we must fix the establishment of the several courts by name, in the constitution itself. Why do this? because it is urged that the legislature have established a bad system, and it is inferred that they will not change it. This seems to me to be a strange argument. Why should the legislature continue a bad system? That body has embraced some of the most eminent men in the State, and many of those who so vehemently denounce the parish court system on this floor. Why did not the legislature take some action on the subject? It was surely within their competency to do so. The ready answer to this is, that the system was upon the whole conformable to the wishes of the people. I think that we should act with a great deal of caution upon this matter. I cannot say that I am partial to the parish court system as it is established. I am certainly not in favor of the abuses of the system. I would have them eradicated, and even the system itself abolished, if it could not be freed from the abuses which are so freely attributad to it.

What I am specially solicitous to preserve, is our admirable system of civil laws; the best system in the world, and such has been the opinion of all those who have had occasion to examine it; I remember hearing one of the most eloquent and distinguished men in the United States, a resident of a sister State which has adopted the common law, in an argument addressed to the supreme court, bear his unqualified testimony in favor of that system. He said, alluding to the protection it afforded to women and minors, that it was the best system in the world, and that he wished not only that it was adopted throughout the States but throughout the universe! Before we discard a system with which we have become intimately familiar—before we thrust it out, we should reflect that it is closely connected with our system of laws; we should beware of a sudden transition! It is true that we have eulogisms bestowed upon the scheme which is presented to us to be irrevocably decreed in the constitution. It has been recommended to us on the score of simplicity. We are told that two courts will be all that is necessary. I concede that the scheme is beautiful on paper! It is something like old Foley's land—beautiful in the imagination, but to be found no where else! It is very fine in theory; but how will it operate? The gentlemen say not one word about the expense. Who are to make inventaries, petitions, and other duties now assigned to the probate courts? They do not tell us. Suppose a working man claims but sventy-dollars; how is he to obtain redress? He will have to go twice a year to the district court, and his claim may be postponed by the adroitness of some lawyer; he may come when the court is emersed in business, when the docket is full and he will be debarred a hearing. Is there any provision to meet a case of this kind? A succession may open in West Feliciana, and before the judge of the district court can be in attendence to give the necessary orders, it may go to dilapidation and ruin. Suppose a stranger died in Louisiana, possessed of ten thousand dollars in money, in a hotel or tavern; before any conservatory steps can be taken it may be placed beyond the power of the court. I cannot see how any economy can result by the proposed change; and I am not convinced that it will answer the end proposed. The expenses of settling successions have been frequently alluded to. In some particulars the expenses in other States are greater than in Louisiana; for example, in Kentucky the commission to executors, administrators, &c., &c., are five per cent. If we make the parish judges elective, and have their perquisites fixed by law, we shall do a great deal to remove the complaints that are made. If a parish judge exacts more than his regular fee, what will be the consequence? That his receipts will be taken and published in the public papers. He will be turned out. But we are told that the parish court system is the creature of the legislature: that it is an odious feature, and must be expunged by the constitution. Is it to be believed that republicans, I will not say democrats, will keep up a bad system against the wishes and desires of the whole community who will rise up against it? I think that this is an unjust argument; that it is unjust to the discrimination of the people, who will choose unfaithful servants to represent them; and to the representatives of the people who will violate their solemn duty.

If the distinguished gentleman who has dilated with so much energy against the system, had have given himself the trouble of addressing the same argument to the house of representatives when he was a member of that body, I feel confident that he could have meliorated materially the system, or have caused it to have been entirely abolished. How is it that with so many abuses, the gentleman (Mr. Benjamin) could have suffered the occasion to pass by, of denouncing these abuses and seeking a remedy for them?

I am not, Mr. President, solicitous of public honors. I was elected to the Convention by the free choice of my constituents, without any exertions on my part. I do not know that I will ever go to the legislature again, but if these abuses existed that have been charged against the parish courts, and the discretion were still vested with the legislature, I would study, day and night, to master the subject. I would go to the legislature, if the people reposed confidence in me, and I would raise my voice against the system; I would persevere from year to year until it was expunged from our statute books.

Let gentlemen beware; they may change the name and yet retain all the abuses of the present system. The same duties assigned to parish judges will have to be performed. You may transfer these duties from one class of officers to another class of officers. The expenses of which you complain so much, will continue to be exacted unless you restrict them, and that you might as well do under one system as the other. The pockets of minors will still suffer, and instead of one officer you will create twenty. I am not to be deceived by a change of names! The incumbent of an office remains the same, call his office by what name you please. It is not the name, but the thing, for which I am solicitous.

It has been deemed essential to give the legislature discretion to create courts in the city. Why should the legislature not have the same discretion for the country? If the legislature will not abuse the power in the one case, why should they abuse it in the other? Physical and moral changes may take place. The State is comparatively still in her infancy. Other cities may arise besides New Orleans. The Mississippi may change its course, and a magnificent city may be formed at the mouth of the Atchafalaya.

I have known instances where offices have been sought to be created for the purpose of filling them. I recollect one example where a man attempted to create a new parish out of portions of West Feliciana, Point Coupée and Concordia. He got up some plausible pretext, and continued to urge the matter upon the legislature, from time to time, up to the period of his death, when we heard no more of that scheme. I repeat, if there be errors in the system as we now have it, let them be corrected, not by legislating in the constitution, for I am averse to that, but by laying down wise and salutary principles, and leaving it to the vigilance of the people, and to the integrity of their representatives to carry out those principles in their integrity. I am not afraid to trust the people, nor to trust those whom they may delegate to represent them. The attention of the country has been aroused, and if the existing system be as obnoxious to censure as has been charged, we may rely upon it that it will be subjected to a rigid scrutiny, both in the legislature, if they be vested with any discretionary power, and among the people, if they have the opportunity of expressing their views.

Mr. Grymes said he had but little to say because he thought it was necessary to say but little. If the people were satisfied with the parish judge system, he had no objection. He rose to concur in the remarks of the delegate from Rapides, (Mr. Brent.) The gentleman from Feliciana was in error when he supposed that altering the name and form of the courts affected the jurisprudence of the country. It had no more effect upon the system of laws themselves, than if the legislature were to abolish the parish courts and substitute some other courts in their places. The laws were the same, and their application were the same. The parish judge system was conceded upon all hands to be most onerous. It was, he confessed, with reluctance that he voted in favor of the exception for the city of New Orleans in the section. He was apprehensive that the power vested in the legislature might be abused, and if he voted for it, it was only from the necessity of the case. There was a tendency in the legislature to create offices merely to provide for certain individuals who wished to be billetted upon the public expense, especially when it did not appear that the treasury was to be taxed. These things were introduced and went through as a matter of course. There was an accumulation of useless public offices, the only design of which appeared to be to afford fees to the incumbents. There was the office alienation; it was a cloy, a tax upon the people to the amount of ten thousand dollars annually, and yet there was no necessity for such an office. The fees were levied out of the purchasers. There was no question as to that. The creation of useless offices had been the practice for the last thirty years. Hence it was that we had so many offices that were in fact superfluous. He was reluctant to confide this power to create courts in the city of New Orleans to the legislature, and would infinitely have preferred to have inhibited its exercise; but being sensible of the great commercial wants of the city, he was impressed with the injury that might result if her legal business was brought to a stand by being left to one district court. He was averse to entering into details in a constitution, but if gentlemen wished to except any of their parishes he would not object to that course. I do not, however, think it is necessary, if the judges be restricted to functions strictly judicial. The ministerial officers of the courts can do all the preparatory or conservatory business. In the cases of successions, they may order their seals to be affixed; the seals to be raised; the inventories to be taken; the necessary publications to be made, and in a word, take all the initiatory steps that may be necessary. There is nothing to prevent the legislature from endowing certain offices with the attributes of a surrogate, or they may establish a register of wills. The object contemplated by the committee is to separate functions purely judicial from those that are ministerial. This object was accomplished by the sections eleven and twelve. These sections he considered important for the welfare of the people. It was of little moment how you christened your courts; but the important matter was to take away the money patronage and make judicial offices purely judicial. He would willingly vote in favor of the proposition to strike out New Orleans, but he was admonished by the necessity that one tribunal was insufficient to do the business of this great commercial emporium. That was his only reason for making New Orleans an exception from what he considered a most salutary principle.

Mr. C. M. Conrad had a few remarks to make. They were made more with a view to explain his vote than to influence the votes of other gentlemen. The discussion had taken so wide a range and embraced so many topics as to dispense him from saying much. What he would say was upon points that had not been touched upon by the gentleman that had preceded him in the discussion. The gentleman from West Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) had argued the question as if a change in the organization of the courts involved a change of the laws of the land. This was erroneous. The same gentleman had alluded to an elogium pronounced upon the body of civil laws which prevailed in Louisiana, by a very distinguished and eminent statesman. That eulogium was intended to apply to the system of laws themselves, and not certainly to the body of magistrates who administered them. But does the proposed system for the reorganization of the judiciary interfere with those laws? Unquestionably not. The gentleman seems to infer that some preference is designed for New Orleans. If the system were good, the city would gain nothing by being exempted from its operation; and if it be bad, there is no reason to envy her the exclusion. But there is no force in this argument. What is the essence of this clause, what change does it propose? It proposes that the jurisdiction of the probate courts should be vested in the district courts. There are many powers exercised by parish judges that are not judicial. The parish judge is a Caleb Quotem. He is judge, notary, auctioneer, police juryman, &c. &c. He is the Caleb Quotem of his parish. Is a petition to be presented for the opening of a succession, to whom is it presented? To John Stiles. Is there an order to be entered upon that petition? Who enters that order? John Stiles. Who makes out the papers as clerk? John Stiles. Is a family meeting deemed necessary for the interest of the minor? Well, before whom is it held? John Stiles. Are the proceedings to be homologated? Who homologates them? John Stiles. Who gives the order for the sale of the property? John Stiles. Who sells it as auctioneer? John Stiles. Who makes out the bill of sale? John Stiles. He first orders and then does. He performs multiform and incongruous duties. He has not alone judicial functions and ministerial functions, but he has ocular functions. He acts occasionally as a village priest, and ties the nuptial knot. But who is this eternal John Stiles? John Stiles is the parish judge. We want nothing but a judge, and that he should be confined strictly to his judicial functions. This section and section eleven are designed to accomplish that purpose. The language of the latter section is perhaps a little loose, and may require some amendment; but the principle meets my hearty concurrence.

If that principle be adopted, the judge will have no other functions than those that are purely judicial, and that will obviate the necessity of having more than one judge for three or four parishes. One judge, relieved of the ministerial functions, will do more than four judges saddled with them, and will do it better. I do not wish to impute any blame to the parish judges. I am aware that there are among them many intelligent and upright citizens, who would adorn any station to which the partialities of their fellow-citizens might elevate them. But on the other hand, it cannot be denied that the ignorance of some of those judges is the cause of great confusion and difficulty, and it may be said that two-fifths of the litigation of the country proceeds from that prolific source. They exercise the most important functions; within the circle of a quarter of a century, all the property of the State has passed through their hands. If they be deficient in intelligence or integrity, who suffers by it? Those that are interested in the proper administration of property belonging to deceased persons. If there be corruption, if there be ignorance, if there be imbecility, it is the community who suffer.

The delegate from West Feliciana seems to think that the functions heretofore assigned to parish judges, ought not to be committed to judges of the district courts. As far as ministerial duties are concerned, I concur in opinion with him. These duties ought to be assigned to no judge; be he parish judge or district judge. There is another advantage resulting from confiding those functions to ministerial officers. It will conduce to greater economy, for these services being no longer performed by a judge, less will be asked, and less will be expected to be paid. The practice of allowing judges of drawing their salaries from fees has had a most unfortunate result. It has placed temptations before them, and has given rise to public suspicion. There are I readily admit, some that have held on their integrity, and were prepared to meet the most rigid scrutiny. But others, whether truly or not I do not pretend to determine, have been accused of extortion and pillage. Here is another reason why we should make a thorough reform. As for the objection taken against the exception made in favor of the city, I have but one single remark to make. It must be obvious that in a large commercial city, a city that has immense relations both at home and abroad, which attracts a large share of foreign litigation, must have adequate means provided for the administration of justice. As for the separation of the judicial from the ministerial functions, I may say that it is accomplished in New Orleans. The clerks take all the initiatory steps, and the judges confine themselves to pronouncing upon the law.

Mr. Brent said that he concurred in the remares of the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) and that he dissented altogether from the ideas and opinions expressed by the delegate from West Feliciana, (Mr. Ratliff.) He could never consent to leave the organization of the courts of justice to the mercy of the legislature. We have organized the legislative and executive departments, and it is our duty to establish the main features of the judiciary department—the details may be left to the legislature. The delegate from West Feliciana confounds our jurisprudence with the organization of the judiciary. He seems to think that without the parish courts it will be impossible to protect the rights of married women and minors. It is not to be presumed that we are to abolish one system without supplying another that will answer the same purpose, and protect the same interests. The gentleman asks how we are to supply that deficiency? What functionary is to perform the duties heretofore discharged by the parish judges? The duties of a probate judge are either ministerial or judicial. The project of the majority of the committee, and which was unanimously concurred in as far as this point was involved, as well by the minority as by the majority, recommended that the ministerial offices should be separated from the judicial offices, and that those duties purely judicial should be confided to the judiciary. It was not intended to derange the system of our laws in that respect. The desire was that the parish judge system should be abolished. What were the parish judges in fact, under our present system? They were perfect factotums. Officers who might perform the ceremony of marriage for your children, protest your promissory notes, make your last will and testament, and cry your horse or sell your household furniture at public vendue. The design was to divide the multifarious functions appertaining to that single officer. It was deemed the best course to establish judges whose functions should be restricted to judicial duties alone. The district judge could exercise probate jurisdiction as far as matters were involved that were purely judicial. All other duties that were ministerial, could be assigned to some officer appoin ed for that purpose—for instance, a surrogate or register of wills. This would not only result in a saving of the public money, but the puritp of the judicial ermine would be better sustained. The delegate from West Feliciana has told us that the parish judge system has worked well, and that we should not abolish it until we are satisfied that we can provide a better system. I take issue with the gentleman an the question of fact. I deny that it has worked well. He has spoken of an eulogium pronounced upon it by a distinguished individual. Has that individual resided among us and felt the appression and extortion of the system? Had he seen its practical workings—that it levied annually from widows and orphans a tax of some one huddred thousand or one hundred and fifty thousand dollars—that it pillaged and fleeced and plundered the weak and the helpless, instead of eulogizing it, he would have poured out his bitterest and most unsparing denunciations against. We have been told to leave the discretion with the legislature to continue or abolish the system as they please. Why it is already the offspring of the legislature and if we permit the discretion to be legalized in that body, we may rest assured that it will be fastened upon us throughout all time to come. It will be perpetuated as surely as the sun will rise to-morrow. The gentleman spoke ef expenses. He, is according to his own account a great lover of harmony. He calls himself the guardian of the public treasury:

Mr. Ratliff: I would set the gentleman right. It is others that have called me the guardian of the public treasury.

Mr. Brent: The gentleman is a great lover of economy, a great stickler for economy; he has frequently called himself the guardian of the public treasury. Let us examine a few frets, and let us see what would be the difference in expense between his favorite parish judge system and the system which it is now proposed to organize. We have now forty-five parish judges, and placing them at an average salary of three thousand dollars a piece, which is below the estimate, we find that the total amount paid to these judges is one hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars. This is a mederate calculation, and I think it far below the mark. We have then ten district judges, to whom we pay twenty-five thousand dollars annually. We may then say that we pay for the inferior judges one hundred and sixty-thousand dollars. I will venture to say that there is no State in the Union that pays as large an amount of money for her judiciary. There is no State that pays more than from eighty thoesand to ninety thousand dollars, including all expenses. Here we pay one hundred and sixty thousand dollars to our inferior judges alone. How much would we have to pay vnder the proposed system? We would have but one set of judges and those salaried officers, not more than eighteen, for I think that with that number we could have the whole judicial busines of the State well attended to. They would be competent to transact all the public business. Allowing four thousand five hundred dollars for the salaries of these eighteen judges, and deducting that amount from what we now pay the parish and district judges, and we have remaining one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. This would be saved to the people, and since the gentleman is so great a lover of economy. But there are other important advantages to be derived from the system proposed, which were dilated upon this morning by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin.) I think with that delegate that grert confusion is the result of the conflicting jurisdictipn which now prevails. There should be but one court to apply the laws where individuals would be certain to obtain redress—where technicalities would be disregarded, and suits may be decided upon their merits. This is with me a most important consideration. I shall vote against striking out, because I am willing that the legislature should have the power to establish such courts as the peculiar wants of the city may hereafter require.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption, said that this was one of the most important subjects that had yet engaged the attention of this body. Gentlemen have said that it was circumscribed to narrow limits. I do not agree with them; I consider that it embraces the wisest scope. Before entering into the discussion, and attempting to show the fallacy of the whole proposition, I will beg the indulgence of the Convention, to refer to some of the arguments that fell from the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad). What is the object of the proposition? We are told that it is to effect a reform; a reform in what? A reform in the administration of successions. I am as anxious as any individual on this floor, that such a reform should be effected. But I must acknowlege that I am more solicitous about things than names. The minds of gentlemen have been filled with phantoms by the fear of reform, which has suddenly attacked them; and they now confound the name of parish judge, with the abuses growing out of our laws.

They tell us we should adopt their proposed system, as a cure for existing evils. It will, says they, rid us of them, because it will rid us of parish judges. According to one of the delegates (Mr. Conrad) however, this very system is now and has been for years, established in this city. Has it removed abuses here? No, sir. We are told by them that they still exist; and I believe there is no portion of the State where they are more numerous and flagrant. These abuses have continued to exist for years under the operation of the proposed system; and though this fact is notorious, and admitted, yet gentlemen, in a phrenzy of indignation, still cry out abolish parish judges. Why, sir, if they are abolished, will that effect a reform in the city of New Orleans? Not at all. There is no parish judge there. It is true there is a judge who is known as the judge of the parish court; but he is entrusted with no functions similar to those discharged by country parish judges. To effect a reform, we must first know the cause of abuse. Nothing is more certain than that the abuses complained of in the city, do not depend on the existence of what is called the parish judge system. To what then, we are compelled to enquire, are they to be attributed? The answer is obvious to all who have examined the subject with any care. They are the result of vices in our legislation. It is not because the city of New Orleans has a probate court, for I defy any one to point out any country in the civilized world, where an officer having similar functions, is not to be found; the thing exists, although the name may differ.

The delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent) has alluded to an officer known to the common law as the surrogate. Now, what are the functions of the surrogate? I have been familiar from childhood with the action of that officer, and I can with confidence assert that the surrogate is nothing more nor less than a judge of a court of probates. If the crying abuses do exist, about which we have heard so much, it is not because we have a judicial system varying so much from that of the other States, so far as probate business is concerned, but because a portion of our laws violate correct principles. The chairman of the judiciary committee (Mr. Grymes) in the remarks he made, observed that there was another section which was necessary to put a stop to the existing abuses. It seems then, that it is not the change of system which is to arrest them, but a provision depriving the judges of the money patronage! The delegate referred to section twelve, which prohibits judges from making allowances to any other than ministerial officers of their courts. If this provision be adopted, it will go far towards ameding the evils in question. We have been told that there is an organized system of plunder carried on in our courts, under cover of the judicial authoritp; and that the property of minors and of absent persons is preyed on, and consumed in the course of legal proceedings had in our courts. I have heard that this occurs too often in the city, and in some of the parishes in other portions of the State; in lower Louisiana such a perversion of justice has never come under my knowledge.

I have had some experience in the profession of the law; I am, it is true, no longer a practitioner, but when I was at the bar I had ample means of obtaining information on the subject; I enjoyed as large a practice, and one extending through as many parishes, as any member of the profession; and I can assert before God, that I never knew a case in which a minor or an absent person was plundered by a parish judge. If they have been guilty of the enormities charged on them in other quarters of the State; if the estates of minors and absent persons have been swallowed up by them and their creatures, it is because society has neglected its most important duty. The voice of the community has been silent; public sentiment has been dead. And when that is the case, no matter what may be the organization of our courts, abuses will accumulate, and the most monstrous wrongs will be perpetrated with the most perfect impunity.

I have always been an advocate for reform in the administration of successions, and of the estates of absent persons; and I would willingly join in the adoption of measures which would put a stop to this species of legal robbery. I have already alluded to a most fruitful source of their abusus, I refer to the power possessed by judges, of making allowances to all the persons concerned in the management of estates under judicial administration. The allowances for attornies to represent absent heirs; the charges for attornies of curators and executors; and their representing absent creditors, &c., are in many instances entirely disproportioned to the services rendered by them. Executors, administrators, curators and syndics, &c., have no interest in contesting these claims, and when they are not contested they are allowed of course. This is a radical defect; judges are authorized to make them allowances, an in too many instances it happens that estates are swallowed up by them. It is possiale that some times judges assent to exorbitant charges for the gratification of favorites; but it is of infinitely more frequent occurrence that the allowance of them is the result of collusion between those intrusted by law with the management of estates and the various persons employed by them.

The power to make these allowances is the principal source of the mischief, It is that which fritters away the inheritance of the successors of the dead, and the funds which should be sacred to the creditors of the estate. If this can happen when the heirs and creditors are present, it must happen to a greater extent when they are absent. Are we to change the names of things, and under a new name to be subjected to the same abuses? Are we to abolish the parish courts for no other purpose than to transfer their jurisdiction to the districts courts? The chairman of the committee (Mr. Grymes) has told us that we could do that by a single line. But is the destruction of one court to obviate the evils which are equally as incident to the action of another? Will not the district judges be exposed to the same temptations, and be subject to the same influences? Will they not be as likely to abuse their money patronage as the proscribed judges? Will they not gratify favorites, and make allowances out of money under their control? If it be a fact, that this vaunted system is in operation in New Orleans, in the name of God, with what propriety can we be called upon to extend it to the country? To destroy one set of courts, and to establish another set of courts liable to the very same abuses! We are told that these evils are of a most outrageous character, and this is the remedy which is proposed!

"The judicial power shall be vested in a supreme court, in district courts to be established throughout the State, in justices of the peace, and such other courts in the city of New Orleans as the legislature may from time to time direct."

Now, gentlemen say they will vote against striking out the words "the city of New Orleans," because, forsooth, the system in the country will be identical with the system in the city; and yet the legislature is to be vested, so far as the city is concerned, with the very same power which they so much deprecate for the country. They have voluntarily declared against the abuse of power by the legislature, should it be permitted to create courts, and with a strange inconsistency they abandon the principle in favor of the city! We may always gather wisdom from experience. This power has hitherto been vested in the legislature, and when has it been abused? We have had the same courts which now exist in the country for thirty-two years, without any change, unless the creation of two or three district courts in the north-western portion of the State, when they became necessary in consequence of the rapid increase in population. No new courts have been established in the country, and the power vested in the legislature, if it has been abused at all, has only been abused within the limits of the city. Some fifteen or twenty years ago, I have been told, a judicial office was created for the mere purpose of giving a place to a person well known at that time and since in the political history of Louisiana. Subsequently, the parish judge in the city was divested of his probate jurisdiction, and another court created, in which it was vested. Since then, we have had the commercial court created. The city then is the only spot where the power has been exercised and abused, and yet gentlemen desire to have that power perpetuated for the city! The city is to be an exception. The legislature is to have no power to establish courts in the country, no matter what may be the exigency, but they may continue to exercise that power for the city, although there alone it has, as yet, been abused.

If the words in question are struck out, will the city be deprived of the means of having her courts re-organized, or their number increased by the legislature, when experience shall demonstrate the necessity for some modifications or changes? Not at all! She will stand in precisely the same situation that she did before. The legislature are competent to act in her behalf, and will continue to be so. The power will be unlimited, to create as many courts for the city as may be deemed expedient. It is only in reference to the country, that it will produce any effect. If the words be struck out, the same power will then exist for the country; and if not, no matter what changes may take place, she will be restricted to the same courts throughout all time.

If it be impolitic to vest the power in the legislature to create courts in the country, it cannot be politic to have the power to create them in the city. If the consequences of the exercise of that power are detrimental, it ought certainly to be withdrawn altogether. But if the power is to be retained by the legislature, to provide for future exigencies in the city, the same arguments that establish the propriety of that course in relation to the city, ought to be conclusive with respect to the country. We are not a stationary people. We are making rapid advances. We may have cities in the interior. We may have a manufacturing population. Where the God of heaven has scattered minerals with a prodigal hand, there will man be found to employ those resources. There are immense beds of coal in Louisiana; they must be put to some use, and no doubt one day they will be made as available to industry as the coal mines of Pennsylvania. What right have we to deprive the country of such facilities in the administration of justice, as may hereafter become indispensable? I mean, what right have we to do this, in principle?

But to pass to another point. Let us look at the details. Gentlemen tell us that we shall get rid of an enormous expense in the administration of successions. I am amazed at this declaration. Have we not the city of New Orleans before our eyes? How are we to get rid of these expenses by abolishing the parish judge system? What sir, because you destroy the name, are you to get rid of the abuses? Every delegate except one (Mr. Benjamin) who has spoken upon this subject, has been staggered by the argument that the duties now performed by judges of the courts of probate, would have to be transferred to other officers. To whom are they to be transferred? This is a question of great difficulty to those that are for overthrowing the system. To what other functionaries will you transfer those duties? To the surrogate, says one. That functionary has no existence in our system. To the clerks of the courts, says another. If you do, will you get rid of the expense? Why, the same fees will be exacted; the same duties will be performed; the petition will have to be filed, and the same fee will be charged for filing it; the order will have to be given, and if a sale be made it will be by an auctioneer, and he will be entitled to his commission. Where is the economy of which we have heard so much? where is the prodigious saving made? The gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) amused himself by describing the multiformed duties of the parish judge, by assimilating him to that legal personage, John Stiles. He said that if an inventory had to be taken, it had to be done by John Stiles. If a family meeting were ordered it was before John Stiles; and if a sale were made, it was again John Stiles who officiated. These various duties may not be performed by one John Stiles, but what is the difference, as to the expense, whether that individual officiate, or several others. It comes to the same thing in the end. If you transfer all the duties to clerks of courts, which are now performed by the parish judge, ex-officio, does it not amount to the same thing? Is it not still John Stiles the clerk, who acts, instead of John Stiles, the parish judge? It is confounding the name with the thing, to pretend that there is any reform in this.

"A rose by any other name would smell as sweet," says the delegate from Orleans, (Mr. Conrad.) The quotation was not very appropriate in his argument. You may change the names, but I imagine the thing will still be the same, though he seems of a different opinion, his quotation to the contrary notwithstanding.

The delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent) advocates the change because he says it will result in a great saving of money to the State; and he figured it up in his own way, to show that there will be a saving of one hundred thousand dollars, if we adopt his system. I have also taken the trouble to prepare some memoranda, which I will submit as showing a different result. But let us see how the gentleman has arrived at his conclusions. He estimates three thousand dollars per annum for each judge, and I imagine that this estimate is not far wrong. There are forty-five parishes in the State, and to avoid an overestimate, instead of the sum of one hundred and thirty-five thousand, he assumed one hundred thousand dollars as the amount they annually receive, and then asserts that by striking out the name of parish judge from the list of judicial functionaries, this sum of one hundred thousand dollars will be saved to the people. But is this so? Will the mere erasure of the name of parish judge from our statute books put an end to the payment of fees in legal proceedings in relation to successions? Will there be no more successions opened—no wills admitted to probate—no executors, curators, trustees or administrators appointed? Will there be no more inventories made—no more property belonging to successions sold—no more partitions effected, accounts rendered and tableaus of distribution made? Why sir, these things, and many others relative to the administration and settlement of successions, must be done. They have heretofore been done in the country, under the authority of the parish judge, and certain specified fees allowed by them. You get rid of the name of the officer, but not of his functions. The functions may be divided; they may be given to clerks of courts, or divided between notaries, auctioneers, clerks and registers of wills or surrogates, but the fees must be paid. There will be some officer to do the same acts, and of course authorised to charge the same fees. And then this famous reform will have destroyed a name without in any manner touching existing abuses. And in consequence of this wonderful change, we are to have eight additional district judges with what gentlemen term liberal salaries. Will not the State then be burdened with these additional salaries? It will, sir; and this is the grand result of this great reform, this boasted economy. But this is not all. If the legislature parcels out the duties of our present parish judges among different officers; and this may happen if it is as much shocked at the idea of accumulating various duties in one office as some members of this body. We shall have several officers in place of one; and what then will be the result? Why, they must all live. One who serves the altar must live by the altar; and, as in many of our parishes the business is inconsiderable, the starving officers would, by their hungry clamor, be continually stimulating your legislatures to augment their fees. And, sir, in the end they would succeed, for good fees would be given with a view to secure good officers.

But there is another reason which operates on my mind, and if no other existed it would be sufficient to deter me from aiding to effect this sweeping change. If we destroy an entire class of officers, whose duties were now so multiplied and important as those of the parish judges, our jurisprudence must be changed before the new system goes into effect, or we shall be involved in inextricable confusion. Why, sir, without it, a stop would not only be put to the administration of successions, but there will be no persons authorized to do acts absolutely essential to the motion of the machinery of government. They preside at elections at some polls, and appoint the commissioners who preside at others—they make the returns of the result of our elections. If they are struck out of existence without legislative preparation, it is impossible to foretell the difficulties that may grow out of it. But gentlemen say it will be very easy for the legislature to make the necessary changes. That may be. But common prudence and common sense require that this should be done before the new system goes into effect. Why, sir, the article reported contains another section, which makes it imperative on the governor to organize the new judiciary as soon as the new constitution goes into effect. Gentlemen have determined to tear down and leave to others to build up. They distrust the legislature so much that they will not permit them to determine when the change of system shall take place; and yet they leave them to make those changes in our laws which are absolutely essential to make the change operative. Why, sir, from the language of gentlemen one would suppose that the legislature was a body at war with the people, and entirely independent of them, and that this house was the only place in which the people could be represented. And yet, previous legislatures have been, and succeeding ones will still be elected by the same citizens who have sent us here. I must say, that for one, I do not share in this distrust of that body. They will always represent the people: and in my opinion, to them, and them only, should the establishment of all courts of original jurisdiction be entirely left. If this be not done what will be our situation if the system adopted should work badly? Why, it cannot be changed, although the whole people should demand it, until after the lapse of years, for there must first be an amendment of the constitution. [Here Mr. Taylor particularized many difficulties and inconveniences which would inevitably follow the adoption of the proposed system, and then continued nearly as follows:]

I am opposed to taking the step contemplated with such rare complacency by many delegates, for another and very sufficient reason. It is not expected by the people. Sir, the question was not agitated by them. There were but two questions connected with the judiciary that were at all discussed before the people. One related to the mode of appointing judges, and the other to the tenure of their offices. The most important of them by far, in my view, is that relative to the tenure of office. The contest was between those who wished to make the office of judge as it now is, permanent, and such as were disposed to limit it to a term of years. I have for a long time thought that limiting the judicial office to a short term of years, would put an end at once and forever to all the abuses which have heretofore grown out of the negligence or misconduct of our judges. As it is now, they are in fact, independent of all control, and it may happen that their interest may turn them aside from the path of duty, or indolence prevent their pursuing it. If the term, on the other hand be short, they are responsible directly to the people through their agents. If they fail to discharge their duties through indolence, the failure will be marked; and if they violate them through the love of gain or the spirit of favoriteism, the violations will be chronicled in the memories of the people and arrayed against them in the day of reckoning. If we adopt this principle, we shall have the highest assurance that can be afforded by men for the faithful discharge of the trusts confided to them. Their tenure of office will depend on their conduct, and the feelings of interest will strengthen the sense of duty. If this be done, we shall have done nearly all that we can do to elevate the bench, and preserve the purity of the judicial ermine. But this is not all that is to be done to cleanse the stream of justice. I repeat it, sir, the abuses which have been the subject of so much vehement declamation, are not the consequence of the organization of our courts. I do not mean to say that the judges are all blameless, and that none have prostituted their power for the gratification of favoritism, or the promotion of their own interests; but I do deliberately say this: such derelictions of duty are rare indeed compared with the infinite number of instances in which persons acting in a representative capacity have under color of law, devoured the substance of the stranger and the orphan. To effect a reform there must be legislation—wise—efficient legislation; and this cannot be expected of this body. You may abolish the office of parish judge if you will, but the abuses will remain, until the cause of them is removed by changes in your statute book, not in your constitution.

In conclusion, I will only say that I protest against the wholesale destruction now proposed to be made of a system, before it is known what is to succeed it; and that for one I will not join in taking a step which is clearly unnecessary at this time, and which if wrong, cannot be retraced.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned until five o'clock, p. m.

Wednesday Evening, April 16.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Marigny gave notice that he would move, on Friday morning, for the reconsideration of the rule which requires as many votes in favor of re-consideration as voted in favor of the original proposition.

The Convention resumed the consideration of section one of the report of the majority of the judiciary committee.

Mr. Lewis: I did not think that the simple motion under consideration would have brought up the whole subject of the judiciary for discussion. I had supposed that this debate would have arisen upon another section of the report, to which it more properly belongs. But as several gentlemen have already spoken upon the subject, and have gone very fully into the various matters involved in it, I trust I may be permitted, without trespassing too much upon the indulgence of the Convention, to offer my views upon it.

We have entered upon the discussion of what is familiarly known as the parish judge system. One of the designs attributed to its opponents is that of uprooting, abolishing, the whole system; and I confess that, for one, I am in favor of its entire abolition. (I do not mean northern abolition.)

I am aware that there is one principle that has always exercised great influence upon mankind. We look with distrust and suspicion upon innovation, and are disposed to submit to evils, merely because they have been transmitted to us by our forefathers. We are apt to be wedded to fallacies because they are sanctified by antiquity.

There is nothing like the parish judge system to be found in any other State in the Union. The only system to which it may be assimilated is that of the Spanish alcaldés or commandants, that formerly governed in this country, in the name of his most catholic majesty. Those commandants were the political Caleb Quotems of their day. Their will was practically the only law of the land. The usual custom of those times was to apply to the alcaldè of the "arondissement," who redressed the wrongs complained of, or, too frequently, inflicted greater, according to the influence of the parties who came before him. Where the matter of dispute was too great for the action of the alcalde, the commandant administered justice in his own way.

When our present system of jurisprudence was first adopted, American principles had just been called into being, and were not then well understood by our public men. Many of the functions of the commandant were retained and engrafted upon our institutions, and the anomaly of the parish judge system was the natural result.

What are the functions of the parish judges? I do not argue this question with prejudice or passion, but shall urge considerations that are the results of my own experience, and of a comparison of the systems of other countries with our own.

The parish judge unites in his own person more functions than are attributed to any four different officers in any other of the States. He is ex officio almost every thing. Some of his multifarious attributes have, it is true, been withdrawn, in some of the parishes; but in others, I believe, they remain the same to the present time. The evils and inconveniences of this system have been so great, that relief has been sought for in partial legislation; hence we find that there are parishes separated only by a small rivulet, having institutions and local ordinances, differing as much from each other, as do the laws and institutions of the petty principalities of Germany. In some parishes, the parish judge is ex officio president of the police jury; in others he is not. In nearly all he is vested with criminal jurisdiction, and presides over the trial of offences committed by slaves. He is conservator of the peace, and as a justice of the peace may try a suit involving no more than six bits. He is ex officio judge of the court of probates, with unlimited jurisdiction as to amounts; a notary public, an auctioneer; in most of the parishes, recorder of mortgages, recorder of conveyances, and besides all these he is a sort of a priest, for he issues licences and celebrates marriages. He is invested with almost all the powers of government in his parish, and combines them in his own person. His mental and physical powers are taxed in every way, and he has need of the fabled powers of an Atlas to sustain their weight. Besides all these duties, he is ex officio guardian of minors, bound to see that they are suitably provided with tutors, guardian of the rights of insane persons, and others incapable of taking care of themselves, and their estates. A mass of duties too much for any one man, and which no one man is physically capable of performing well.

These are some of the duties which were assigned to the Spanish commandants, and which have been transferred to our parish judges, as, in some sort, their successors.

Such a system might answer the purposes intended by it, in a country with but few inhabitants, where men lived in an almost primitive state of society, and where one reverend gentleman could take upon himself, in reference to the rest of the community, the patriarchal or domestic duty of governing them as a "good father of a family;" and hence we find so frequently recurring in our civil code, the expression "a good father of a family."

This state of things seems to be based upon the patriarchal government that existed before the flood; and which, however well it may have suited the antediluvians, does not seem to me to be suitable to the present enlightened age of the world. It is said that we live in an age of progression—and it seems to me that we have made sufficient advancement to be able to discover what effect the present system has had upon the community, and to form a tolerable estimate of the probable effects of that which we propose as a substitute for it. We are not to be alarmed by the bugbear of innovation; nor by the argument of the gentleman from Lafourche, (Mr. Taylor) that we are pulling down a venerable institution. It is venerable, if you will, by its age, but whence did it have its origin? In despotism. It is a remnant of the old Spanish system. Our object is to provide against abuses that we think liable to result from this system, and to secure the benefit of a liberal and enlightened judiciary.

The gentleman (Mr. Taylor) says that we talk of abuses, but offer no remedy—that we are only changing the name, but not the thing. His argument, to my mind, was more specious that sound; it was very ingenious, and from the known candor of that gentleman, I doubt not it emanated from his convictions, and was satisfactory to his judgment; but it failed to convince me. I am far from concurring with him in that opinion.

I agree with him that legislation will necessarily carry out the details of the new system, proposed for our adoption; but this may be said of every radical change in our organic law; and unless we strike a blow at the root of the old system, and eradicate it by constitutional provisions, I fear the reform will never be effected. It requires legislative action to give force and efficacy to most of the provisions of the constitution, and to set the wheels of government in motion.

The establishing other courts besides a supreme court, in the constitution of a State, is no novelty; and I see no good reason why district courts should not be as well created by the constitution, as a supreme court.

In the course of my professional career, I have aided in the settlement of more than fifty successions, some large and some small in amount. In the city of New Orleans I had personal knowledge of the charges upon the settlement of but one estate, and I looked into that because it was the estate of one of my uncles, who died in this city, of the yellow fever.

He returned to this city from Mexico (on his way to Missouri, where he resided,) and died, leaving deposited in one of the city banks about three thousand dollars, in gold and silver. For the settlement of this estate about eleven hundred dollars were consumed in law charges and expenses; or one-third of the amount. I went to the office to look at these papers, accompanied by the honorable delegate from Jefferson, now attorney general of the State, who showed them to me, and to whom I now appeal to correct me if I am wrong in my statement. But I may be told that these extravagant expenses form no part of the system. To this I reply, that any system that leads to such extravagant expenses in the settlement of estates must be wrong. There is no system which, in my opinion, is susceptible of greater abuses than the one under consideration.

When a person dies, the seals must be affixed to his effects. These seals may not be removed without the authority of the parish judge, and he very generally goes himself to perfom that duty; and so he goes on, taking all the steps required, until the final settlement of the estate, for each of which heavy fees are allowed by law.

The gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) has indulged in some merriment in describing the attributes of the parish judge under the simile of that legal factotum, John Stiles. These attributes are melancholy facts. There is no system with which I am acquainted, that is half so expensive as our probate system, except the English court of chancery.

It is, unfortunately, made by our laws, the interest of the parish judge to create as much expense as possible in the settlement of successions. The system tempts them to do wrong at almost every step; and though I can, and do bear testimony to the fact, that, so far as my experience goes, our parish judges have successfully resisted this temptation; have been honest in spite of the system and maintained their integrity; still I consider no system good which offers temptation to the violation of duty.

A succession is opened and a contest arises amongst the heirs as to whether it shall be divided in kind or by a sale at auction. The judge must decide this contest, and as the division by a sale at auction will be more profitable to the judge (who as auctioneer makes the sale,) than any other mode, is he not tempted to incline to his own interest and so decide? Again, do the heirs disagree amongst themselves as to the mode of partition, and ask the judge's advice, will he not find reasons "thick as blackberries" in favor of a sale? Such is the natural tendencies of the principle and the temptation offered in our present system; and with the purest intentions and most upright designs, it is possible to imagine we are all more or less influenced by our interest in the conclusions to which our most enlightened judgments can arrive. In the language of an old poet—

"Mankind are unco weak,
And little to be trusted;
If self the wavering balance shake,
It's rarely right adjusted."

Entertaining these views, I feel bound to afford my aid in pulling down the present system, and substituting in its place one that I believe will not offer the temptations to wrong that I find or think I find, in the former.

Mr. Marigny: It would seem from what we have heard in this discussion that the Convention have assembled for the purpose of impeaching all the parish judges, and yet there is nothing that is more dissimilar to the mission we have received from the people, and I may dare add, with the promises we have made when we were upon the hustings. I am induced to believe that the honorable delegate from St. Landry participated in making these promises. How can we imagine that after having engaged to make no other changes in the constitution than those which the people desired, and which they indicated in precise terms through the legislature; how, I would ask, can we now assume the unlimited power of dictators. How can we imagine that we combine the concentrated wisdom of the whole State—that we are the Areopagus, and that we are elevated above all future deliberative bodies that may ever meet? The constitution of 1812 places the judiciary power of the State in from three to five judges of the supreme court, and in such inferior tribunals as the legislature might think proper to establish. This portion of the old constitution ought to have been left intact, inasmuch as the people have never complained, and it was not embraced in that essential reforms which were contemplated by the law, in virtue of which we are here convened. How does it happen that upon your own responsibility you are about to overthrow the existing system and to create, all through the State, with the exception of the city, district courts, and to abolish parish courts. I do not contend that it is proper to accumulate so many labors in the hands of the judge of the parish courts. All that I assume is this, that if the reforms in the judiciary system be necessary, about which we have heard so much, the legislature is better adapted to effect such changes as may be desired than we are. The action of this body is counterbalanced by no other power. It is generally composed of from sixty to fifty wills, whereas the action of the legislature, besides being a body more numerous, is checked by the action of the senate, and by the action of the executive branch, that has a negative upon it's proceedings. We must be animated, I repeat again by a strong spirit of presumption, to imagine that we are more skilled, and that we shall succeed better, than an assembly which will be composed of men our equals in every respect, and which will count among its number, citizens highly accomplished in political matters, and which we are led to expect from the rapid progress made by the young men of the present day. Let us not deceive ourselves. It does not become a constituent body like this to interfere in matters of pure legislation. If that was the design this body ought to be composed of two branches, in order that one branch might operate as a salutary check upon the other. If the national convention of France had been composed of two branches, one acting as a counterpoise to the other, Louis XVI would not have had his head brought to the block. Again, had the cortes in Spain been composed of two bodies, the civil war that has distracted and divided that country would have been averted. There never has been a dictator but where the will of one man has reigned supreme. But what are the arguments adduced by the honorable delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) to inspire us with the fell spirit of destruction to eradicate institutions with which our people have become familiar. We have been told that there is no such thing as a court of probates, possessing the same powers as our court of probate to be found in the union. And what does that prove? That in the State of Louisiana we regulate the rights of minors, and those claiming inheritances, with greater certainty and precision than elsewhere. In the other States the father has absolute control over his children, because he is the absolute master of his fortune, of which he may deprive them at pleasure. But in Louisiana we have forced heirs. Suppose this peculiarity did not exist, and that a father might donate his property to whom he pleased, who would be the losers by that disposition in our system? A considerable number of lawyers, not even excepting the honorable delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) draw a very profitable income from that accident in our legislation. I have no doubt that if it was contemplated to destroy a system which was adverse to the interest of the gentlemen of the bar, their organ would be found on the side of the opposition, for he himself has confessed that the most honest heart and the purest intelligence cannot resist the necessity of defending their interest.

What amused me in the argument of the gentleman (Mr. Lewis), was his attempt to establish the identity of the parish judges with the Spanish commandantes. He judges, if I may use a familiar expression, of a book by looking at the preface, and runs on with his remarkable volubility, from criticism to criticism, as if there were no government where the writ of habeas corpus was not to be found. If he had have given himself the trouble to examine the mode of governing of those commandantes who appear to have fallen so much under his displeasure, he would have seen that two among them, Michael Cantrelle and Manuel Andry, at the transfer of the government of Louisiana, in delivering over the archives of their respective offices to governor Claiborne, made the following striking declaration:—"It is now thirty years since we have been the commandantes of our respective districts, and we have never had a single case to decide."

I would ask the honorable delegate from St. Landry, if he can point to any place in the United States where as much could be said? He appears to think that he has discovered a most scandalous example, when he cites to us as a fact: that the parish judge of St. Landry was in the receipt for a number of years of a salary of twelve thousand dollars per annum. But what does that prove? It proves that there is a greater amount of legal business in that parish than there is in some others, and that if the fees which contributed this amount had not been solely received by the judge, they would have been distributed, and paid by the parties to a clerk of the court, to a notary and to an auctioneer. It is not, then, in the interest of the public that these salaries are paraded before us, but evidently in the interest of other offices, other than the parish judges. Where is the difference to the public whether the fees of office for probate business, is paid to the parish judges or to a half a dozen other officers? It is a matter of supreme indifference. I think I can discover what is the true cause of attack upon the parish court system. The parish judge gives advice gratis, and that does not answer so well for the gentlemen of the bar. He causes petitions to be written by his clerk, and estates are settled without the intervention of a lawyer, and that is to them a very objectionable feature of the system. They infer, with their usual sagacity, that that now will cost three hundred dollars in the settlement of successions, will, if the scheme advocated by the delegate from St. Landry prevail, will cost six hundred dollars, and as they expect to get a good slice, they find the system to be most admirable; and is it to effect such a change as this that one hundred thousand dollars have been drawn from the public treasury, to maintain this body? Let gentlemen beware; the sentiments of the people have undergone a revulsion. The city of New Orleans has been reprobated as a place of political pestilence, which could not be approached within sixty miles by the inhabitants of the other portion of the State, without exercising a deleterious influence upon them. It is not unlikely that this unjust reproach will cause three-fourths of the people of the city to vote against the constitution; and if you now destroy the judiciary system, which has been endeared to the people of lower Louisiana, and with which they are familiar, you may induce them to vote in mass against the adoption of the new constitution. Is it to defeat the object for which we have been assembled? or to carry it out with fidelity that we have assumed the responsibility of representing the wishes of our fellow citizens?

If you are resolved to destroy your own work, you may begin by destroying the parish courts. But if you are sincerely desirous to make a constitution which will be acceptable to the people, respect their customs and their habits, for there is in these nothing that is wrong or reprehensible; and it does not become you to interfere with any of their privileges; as far as I am concerned, I feel that I have discharged my duty. It is not my fault if a disposition has been manifested to abandon the true principles of democracy, with the view of satisfying the insatiable desire of obtaining political power. In attempting to establish a system instead of laying a basis, we have encroached upon the rights of the legislature; we have attempted to deprive them of the means of responding to the wishes of the people, and we have consecrated a despotism in the empire of liberty. You are about to fail in carrying out the wishes of the people in the presence of four hundred thousand of your fellow citizens. Again I repeat, beware! That formidable mass may annihilate you by their weight, and may reduce you and your work to the utmost insignificance.

But we are told that the people are disgusted with the parish court system. This is a mistake. The people are not dissatisfied with the system itself; it is their representatives who are moved by the restless spirit of innovation. How are you to supply the place of those officers who have resided in the midst of their several parishes and have obtained the public confidence?—who are the depositories of the transactions of the people, and of the fortunes which have been accumulated—who have in their hands a large amount of the inheritance of minors? By a district judge—an itenerant magistrate who may be under the influence of indifference or prejudice? To convince you that I have neither the subtle science of the lawyer nor the elocution of an accomplished orator, but I have a profound sentiment of my duty, I submit to you my views with the modesty which becomes a man whose experience has demonstrated to him that it is impossible to control the will of the people. You may carry your point here. You may abuse your your power if you choose, but remember that the people will do me the justice of believing that I have not the vanity of imagining myself more capable than others in whom they may hereafter confide their authority, and that I have not attempted to impose upon them a system of legislation in the constitution. Methinks I see those parishes against whom you are about to pass the sentence of death, gathering their strength to overwhelm you! Their voice alone will reduce you to silence, and banished by the popular will from the councils of the State, you will have nothing to do but to read your bibles and repent!

Mr. Soule desired to say a few words before the proposition of the gentleman from West Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) was put to vote. He had examined the question in all its bearings, and there was not a principle that had been enunciated since the opening of this debate in which he did not concur, so far as it was designed to introduce in the judiciary a system of uniformity, and to reform those abuses which had become excressences upon the present system. Names are with me but matters of little consideration, it is the results which claim my attention; and I would inquire, how are we to obtain the object which is so generally desired? The response to this question depends upon an impartial examination of all the facts. I have carefully pondered the subject, and it strikes me that the conclusion which has been urged in the course of this discussion is true: that to secure uniformity and simplicity, the judiciary should embrace but two tribunals—one of original and the other of appellate jurisdiction, to-wit: a supreme court and an inferior court, to which may be given indifferently the name of district court or parish court. If the majority of the judiciary committee could only convince me that the administration of justice would be as efficient and as convenient by the establishment of district courts, embracing several parishes, instead of the appointment of a separate court in each parish, I would at once accede to their plan. But I am apprehensive that it will not attain that result, unless perhaps the clerks of the courts are invested with other than purely ministerial powers.

I think that the parish court system, with proper modifications, would be preferable. It has besides, the advantage of being identified with the habits of the people. It has been in operation ever since the organization of our government, and it will be found difficult to destroy the predelictions which it has inspired. It would, therefore, be more expedient to retain the parish courts, giving to them the jurisdiction which is proposed to be given to the district courts, and depriving them of those ministerial functions which do not accord with the dignity of the judicial office, and which places the judge in the singular attitude of deciding upon his own acts. Heretofore the functions of parish judges have by a strange contradiction, presented the anomaly of restriction on the one hand, and of unlimited power on the other. In the one instance their jurisdiction extended without limit, and that in a matter deeply affecting the interest of individuals and families. On the other hand, they are limited, in ordinary cases, to a jurisdiction of three hundred dollars. Let us preserve the probate jurisdiction; and in reference to the ordinary jurisdiction, let it be as unlimited as the jurisdiction proposed to be given to the district court. With this simple change, we shall assure to each parish a court, where all matters in litigation can be decided promptly and conveniently. I have experienced, as wetl as my colleagues who have spoken in favor of the adoption of the report of the majority of the committee, the expediency of uniformity and simplicity in the organization of our judiciary; and I think with the committee, that the best means of effecting that object is to establish but two courts; the one of original, and the other of appellate jurisdiction. I prefer the conservation of the parish courts with some suitable changes and modifications, better to adapt them to the end for which they were created. Moreover, it must be borne in mind, that the people are familiar with that system, and that its destruction may cause great inconvenience, and another advantage will result from retaining the old system. It will necessitate fewer changes; whereas, if we adopt the present scheme, we shall have to make great and numerous changes in the civil code and code of practice. If we adopt the former, it will be scarcely necessary to make any changes in the laws themselves, and we shall have an administration which is familiar to the people. I will conclude by observing, that I did not expect to engage in the discussion this evening. These are my views, briefly expressed, and I shall take occasion to present the amendment which I shall now read, for the information of the house.

[Mr. Soulé here read the amendment referred to.]

Mr. Benjamin: It seems to be the sense of the house that there shall be but one set of inferior courts, whose jurisdictions shall be concurrent and universal, so that conflicting questions of jurisdiction will be settled forever. This coincidence of opinion convinces me that the defects in the present system are well understood. The subject has for some considerable time engaged my attention, and I proposed at one time to submit a plan for the reorganization of our judiciary system, embracing similar reforms. When I was a member of the legislature, I was precluded from doing this, from the precarious state of my health, having been unable to attend the sessions of the legislature until the close of the session. I attach but little importance to names, and it is with me a matter of no moment how you baptize your courts, provided that you organize them on just and proper principles. You may call them district courts, or parish courts, I care not! But I would suggest that there will be great difficulty in establishing these courts, so that one court may be allowed to each parish, exclusively. The salaries of the judges of the parish courts accrue principally from the fees they receive in the exercise of those functions, which are denominated ministerial. It is the parties interested in the settlement of successions, that contribute, for the most part, to the payment of the salaries of those officers. Now, if you take away from the judges, as is proposed, all ministerial functions, it becomes necessary for the State to allow them a fixed salary. It is proposed in the report of the majority of the judiciary committee, to establish eighteen judicial districts, and to allot to each, one judge. If we adopt the suggestion of my colleague (Mr. Soulé) we shall have forty-six judges in place of eighteen, besides those which may hereafter be appointed for the special courts that will be created for the city. These forty-eight judges will have to be compensated by a fixed salary, and the question arises, what will be a proper salary to each one of them? Shall it be uniform, or shall it be in proportion to the services rendered? If we say that the salaries shall be uniform, then we allow to the judge who has little to do, as much as to the judge whose duties are arduous, and whose time is constantly engaged by the greater amount of litigation in the parish for which he may be appointed; and as three thousand dollars would be as little as we could allow to the latter, we would be imposing upon the State an annual debt of one hundred and forty-four thousand dollars. If we say that it shall be in proportion to the services rendered, it is true we reduce the expense, but we create heart-burnings and jealousies, and it may be considered that, by this system of gradation, a humiliating distinction is made between the relative pretensions of these officers; all this may create a great deal of dissatisfaction and difficulty, and it may be inferred that less solicitude is shown for the interest of small parishes than for large parishes. Such an attempt, it strikes me, would be highly inexpedient.

Wherever the effort has been made to obtain judges at small and inefficient salaries, it has most signally failed. The experiment was made in Massachusetts, and was attended with unfortunate results. The able and accomplished jurists on the bench at that time, gave in their resignations, and as lawyers above mediocrity could not be induced to accept the appointments, persons far below it had to be chosen. The consequence was great confusion and great detriment to the administration of justice; and the legislature of that State were compelled to retrace their steps. A similar attempt in Louisiana will be followed by like results, and it will be found impossible to place on the bench without a fair and reasonable compensation, men of commanding talents and strict integrity. Such a mistaken notion of economy will in the end cost the State more than the very highest salaries that could be allowed. It will destroy the confidence of the people in their judges. Divide the districts as far as it can be done equally, but do not destroy the independence of the judiciary by making it subservient to the economical calculations of the legislature.

There are but two points upon which there is a difference of opinion, and that is simply to determine upon the name to be given to the inferior courts, and whether each parish shall have one judge exclusively. As for the first point, I conceive it to be a matter of no moment; names signify nothing. As for the second, as I have had the honor to state, I think there are insuperable objections to it. It would entail a very heavy expense upon the State, and it would be difficult to fix the salaries upon a principle of equality which would be satisfactory. A provision, it is true, might be introduced that the parish should be charged with the salary of the judge, and this might obviate the latter inconvenience; but I do not believe that such a proposition would meet with favor from the majority of this body.

Whereupon, on motion, the Convention adjourned until to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

THURSDAY, April 17, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The honorable Mr. STEPHENS, at the request of the President, opened the proceedings with prayer.

Mr. DUNN gave notice that he would move for the reconsideration of the section relative to the lieutenant governor, in order to attach to the office the duty of superintendant of public schools.

The Convention then resumed the consideration of the

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Section one of the report of the majority of the committee upon the judiciary.

Mr. PRESTON said that the motion to strike out three words in the first section, hardly presented the question before the house. The discussion would more properly have come up in another place, but as gentlemen had taken the occasion to go into an exposition of their views, he would beg leave to make a few remarks which would be as brief as possible. The first section proposes to abolish the parish court system and to substitute district courts. The motion of the delegate from West Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) was designed to counteract that object. The old constitution prescribed that there should be one supreme court, and directed the legislature to create such other inferior courts as they might deem proper for the dispatch of the public business. Experience has rendered it necessary to be more explicit. The delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) has expressed what, in my opinion, is necessary to give simplicity and vigor to the judiciary, with this exception, that I think it better to engraft the parish court system by remoddleing the judiciary, than to establish district courts. I concur with the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin) that there should be but two courts. I do not include justices of the peace, because they are hardly to be called courts. A court of appeals and a court of original jurisdiction to establish the facts and the law. I am averse to having three or four courts; they will give rise to interminable questions of jurisdiction, which will produce great confusion and be ruinous to parties involved in litigation, and will only enure to the benefit of those who live upon the laws of the country. It is absurd to have so many courts; they are called for by no necessity. We have but one set of laws, and they are few and definite. By an act of the legislature the C. Code, and the Code of Practice, and the statutes of the State. are declared to be the only laws adopted for the administration of justice throughout the State. These laws are few and simple; the decisions of the supreme court are not laws themselves, but only interpretations of laws. The idea that the same man should, as judge, be competent to grant you relief because you addressed him as chancellor, which he could not have granted you as a common law judge; involved an absurdity. It was what I never could comprehend; and I concur with the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) that such unmeaning and mischievous distinctions, should be swept away from our judicial proceedings.

I consider that one of the great measures of reform, which will have a most salutary effect, is the limitation of the term of federal office to short terms; as long as the term of office was for life, reforms in the system could only be partial and inadequate. The superintendence exercised by judges upon sheriffs, clerks and others, subservient to them in authority, was most powerful; and the combination of these officers might prevent the election of any one to the legislature, who was disposed to cut down their fees, and make other essential reforms in the public interest. There is another system which I freely broached when I was a candidate for the Convention, in an adjoining city and parish, a parish which is supposed to be aristocratic, and to be wedded to old systems; I declared my unqualified and unequivocal preference for the election of judges by the people; and as I expressed that preference publicly and frequently during the canvass, I am bound to conclude that a majority were in favor of that mode of reform. There are two or three incidental matters of reform which have been recommended in the report of the majority, that ought to be adopted; and which, in my humble opinion, if abopted would obviate most of the objections to the parish judge system. One of these, and the principal, is that the judges should exercise no purely ministerial functions. The gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) has alluded in an amusing manner to the multifarious duties of the parish judge. He might, in enumerating the various stations held by that officer, have gone farther, and have told us that in some instances to his thirteen other employments were added the presidency of a bank. But it is not in the multifarious functions of the parish judges that we are to seek for the evils which ezist in the system. The true policy would be to pay that officer a fixed salary, sufficient to remunerate him for his services and to give him a decent living, and to prescribe that he should perform all the duties properly belonging to the station, and which the public convenience might require. The great mode of reform, to my mind, is to take away the money patronage from the office, and to provide that the judge should no longer exact fees, so that he should not be exposed to the reproach of deciding his own case, what his own compensation should be, and to what extent he should accumulate the proceedings. This wrong has, together with the money patronage, thrown great discredit upon the system, and excited the general distrust in the public mind which prevails.

The gentleman from St. James (Mr. Lewis) had alluded to a particular case, which had almost slipped my memory, where eleven hundred dollars were paid in law charges, out of an amount of three thousand dollars. This is by no means an extraordinary case; there are far more cases in which more than one-third are paid out in law charges, than there are under that amount. It is this which throws discredit on the administration of justice, and degrades the high character of its functions. But the evil, great as it is, is not restricted to persons and property, but it exercises a baneful influence upon the prosperity of the State; it prevents the tide of population from setting towards Louisiana, and diverts it to Texas, and to other places, As the gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) told us on another occasion, that while people were pouring in as thick as locusts above the line of Louisiana, on the Arkansaw side, below that line they were few and far between. A man comes to Louisiana and by great industry acquires a fortune, but by the reputation which the administration of justice, in the mode of sucbessions, has obtained, he becomes alarmed and fearful that, instead of his property descending to his heirs, it will be squandered and diverted in law charges. These apprehensions induce many persons to remoqe their property out of the Sjate which they have accumulated it in; and thus, instead of remaining to enrich the State, ann to swell her retources, to pay the taxes and to contribute to the general improvement, it is taken away, and the State is deprived of so much capital.

I have been accused of being a violent denouncer of courts. I confess that when I came here thirty years ago, a boy, having read Blackstone and other elementary writers, who have eulogized the purity of the judicial ermine, I was as great a believer that that ermine was as spotless as snow, as any one could possibly be. I was as great a stickler for the inviolability of the judicial functions, and was as ready to contend for the independence of the judicial tenure as any lawyer at the bar. I will refer, in illustration of what my feelings were about that period, to a circumstance that I have never before mentioned. I was clerk to a notary who could not indite an act. He was called upon to make the will of the lamented Governor Claiborne, whose name I mention with the greatest reverence, and for whom I have always entertained the highest respect, as a patriot and as a man. I went to his bed side and told him that I was the clerk of the notary, and had come as the substitute of the notary. At first he demurred to my replacing that officer, but when the circumstances were explained to him, he finally consented, and I attended upon him for two or three days, an hour each day, until the will was completed. He expressed his great aversion to the court of probates; and that thirty years ago! So strong, however, so high was my admiration for every thing savoring of the judiciary, that I actually modified his language, as far as I could, although it was equally as strong as the will of the late chief justice Mathews. I direct, said governor Claiborne, in his last will, that my executors shall take possession of my estate extra judicially, and I expressly direct that it shall in no manner be under the control of the court of probates; nor shall that court have any thing to do with the government of my children. That was thirty years ago! The delegate from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis) has alluded to the strong expressions of Judge Matthews, a judge of the supreme court, and familiar with the practice of the court of probates. He reprehended the interference of that court in the settlement of his estate. But these two cases are not the only instances in which similar feelings have been manifested. Several prudent citizens have entertained the same misgivings—some of them have removed their property out of the State, while others, in their last wills, have solemnly abjured the jurisdiction of the court of probates. Amongst others, I will mention the name of the late Colonel Shamburg, an old citizen of Louisiana. Instead of looking to the court of probates for protection to their property, and for the maintenance of the rights of their children, they have looked with horror and dismay upon those tribunals; and have given vent to their feelings when they were about to depart for another and, I trust, a better world.

The gentleman from West Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) has spoken of legislative interference. Why, these evils have been felt for forty years. Other men have felt the same decided repugnance to the abuses of the system, as Governor Claiborne and Judge Matthews, but has any thing been done? Experience teaches us that the legislature are impotent to cure the evils, for if it could have been effected, it certainly would have been done during the last forty years. I have no faith in that remedy. We see the results before our eyes—we know whence they proceed, and we should lay the axe to the root of the evil. I do not for one moment imagine that any of the judges are susceptible of corruption. I do not charge any such thing upon any of them. I believe them above it. But I do contend that this money patronage, which is peculiar to the State of Louisiana, exercises a most deleterious influence, and that the judges, without being aware of it, and perhaps without suspecting even the extent of the evil, unwittingly are made to contribute to a state of things which is truly a public calamity!

I recollect an instance some eight or ten years ago, of a drayman, who had acquired a large fortune, some one hundred thousand dollars, which he devised upon a condition, which was never accomplshed and which could never be accomplished. This was considered too good a bone to be left unpicked. His wlll was annulled; and upon what ground do you suppose? There were other grounds, but seriously the only essential ground by which the charity asylum were deprived of this liberal donation, was this, that the seal was parched by his thumb, instead of being parched with his watch seal! The supreme court confirmed this decision, but as a matter of course they could not let their decision stand upon so ridiculous a pretence, they assumed some other; but the only substantial case, was that which I have related. I repeat, I do not charge upon the judiciary a corruption of money, but a corruption of influence. The will of the late Stephen Henderson was annulled on the pretence, that it was abstruse, incomprehensible and impracticable! And yet, who could believe this, who knew Stephen Henderson; a practical man, of good, sound common sense. I should not be surprised that the immense estate of Mr. Mylne should ultimately be bankrupt. The estate of Nichlas Girod will be kept in the court of probates, until a large slice is taken from it!

But these things are not peculiar to this country; they occur in England, in boasted England, whose jurisprudence is deemed by many to be the quintesence of equity.

I have a boy now in my eye to whose father a legacy was left in 1797. The will was written in language as plain as that of Stephen Henderson. The father died without recovering it, and the son has not been more fortunate. I sent him to England; but the voyage was without any satisfactory result. A lawyer informed him that if he would pay him a fee he would undertake his case; and thus it is, that to obtain the prospect of redresss, expense must be incurred, which may in the end serve but to increase the loss; and the property may stay for ever in the court of chancery, locked up with two hundred millions, upon the interest of which the greedy officials of the court are pampered. What is the cause of this? It is because the judiciary are too independent. They have grown up too strong. The great object is to retain such a controlling power as will constrain the judiciary to do the pnblic business speedily and equitably. That can be done by one or two lines most effectually. Limit the judicial tenure and subject the judges to the action of the people once in four years. Judges are but the servants of the people. The government is distributed among three departments—the legislative, the executive, and the judiciary. The legislative is to express the will of the people, the executive is to execute it, and the judiciary to interpret it.

Long after my brilliant notions of the perfect ability of the judiciary began to waver, I conceived that impeachment was a scare crow, but I have since become satisfied that it is not even a scare crow. And that it would not induce a judge to remain one moment longer upon his seat, or to take one cent less, were he confident that he might thereby esbape impeachment. The only remedy is to make judges responsible to the people.

The parish court system has been in operation ever since 1805, about the time when the State passed from a despotic to a territorial government. Our system of laws are engrafted, in many respects, upon those courts. Take for example successions; the judge orders the execution of a will, appoints administrators, orders the inventory, orders the homologation of the proceedings, orders the family meeting, orders the sale, and superintends the sale, and makes all other orders and decrees that may be necessary to the settlement of successions. The whole system refers to the existence of these courts. After forty years practice, to supercede these tribunals which have become identified with the habits of the people, and to adopt a different system, would be too great a shock upon public opinion, and might produce the rejection of the constitution. I repeat again, that were the question to be submitted to the people to-morrow, whether the parish court system should be abolished, the vote would be in the negative. When the Convention have adjourned, and each one of us has returned to give an account to his constituents, it may not be found satisfactory when we tell them, I have abolished your court, but I have obtained for you a justice of the peace. I have secured that. There is a district court that will come in the parish occasionally. I am sure that if I were to tell my constituents that, they would not thank me.

Well then, let us take the next district; Ascension and St. James. The people of Donaldsonville would not thank us when they were told that their court was abolished; that if there was a curator to be appointed, or an administrator, or any other similar business to be transacted, they would have to go out of the parish, and seek the district judge in the parish of St. James. Then, as to the next district: Iberville and Point Coupée. The district judge might be on the Amite or on the Atchafalaya, and certain emergencies might arise in the administration of justice, requiring his presence at a certain point; your property might be sequestered, your son might be imprisoned, and where would be the relief? But, oh, say the gentlemen, the court would be located at a certain point in th e parish, and the clerk would be competent to act, he could issue writs of sequestration, and attachements, and such other conservatory process as might be required. But could he dissolve them? The issuing of those writs, in some cases, might be very oppressive and injurious, and yet the party aggrieved would have to submit until the periodical return of the judge, unless the clerk was vested with the judicial power of determining these cases.

Inasmuch as the parish court system has grown up among us, and as it is a local tribunal of great convenience, it strikes me as being inexpedient to abolish it. We should lop off the abuses and excressences which have been produced by certain defects in its organization. We are called upon to remedy these abuses, but not to abolish the system. What reason has been urged for abolishing it? I think I have demonstrated that the public interest would be consulted by retaining it, with proper modifications and restrictions. Why we are told that it costs too much; that it would entail an expense for forty-eight judges, including the judges for the city of New Orleans. To that objection I would reply, that the expense would not be substantially greater than it now is. The supreme court for sitting some two or three weeks in Rapides and Opelousas, and some eight months in the city of New Orleans, is kept up at an annual expense of twenty-five thousand dollars. There are, besides, five courts in the city of New Orleans, exclusive of the associate judges, and if their salaries be added, we have an annual expense of sixty thousand dollars for the administration of justice in the city of New Orleans. The whole expense of the judiciary of the United States does not amount to that. To these expenses must be added the compensation paid to sheriffs, marshals, clerks, &c., whose name, to use the language of the delegate from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis), are legion.

I think that every man should be paid in proportion to his services. If he have but little to do, he should be paid but little. I do not apprehend the difficulty which is apprehended by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin) as to the compensation to be allowed to the judges of the parish courts, were the proposition that I advocate to prevail; their compensation could be graduated according to the duties they had to perform. It would be no difficult matter to do that, for a provision might be made by the legislature that the State should contribute one-half and the parish the other half; the parish to regulate the salary. I have no idea of extravagance, and yet I would not have men starved who were in the publicservice; any number of reputable men fully capable of filling the office of parish judge, could be found for a reasonable compensation. We do not want men of splendid talents, who are versed in black letter, and who are familiar with foreign languages. We want men of good ordinary sound sense, who have implanted in their bosoms principles of rectitude. I am not among those who think it difficult to obtain the necessary abilities in the ordinary walks of life. I have seen a great deal that convinces me no such difficulty exists. I have seen men called from their business without any preparation, and with very inadequate book knowledge, to serve on juries, and to pronounce upon life and death. They have, I may say, invariably decided right, and have exhibited great judgment and penetration, and yet their functions were the most important; they decided upon life, liberty and character. There will be no difficulty in obtaining men of sufficient abilities, without being compelled to impoverish the State by exhorbitant salaries. In the country, planters, who have wealth and leisure, will consent to dispense justice between man and man, without expecting to realize in the office a fortune in a few years. They will not be governed by such sordid considerations. There are, too, gentlemen of the bar, who have retired from practice, such as the distinguished delegate from Assumption, who would honor the station, and who would, I am convinced, if they accepted it, be indifferent to the amount of salary.

Who is considered the greatest judge? and who is most admired for his talents and learning? Judge Story. Well, that eminent man wrote seventy pages of manuscript which was produced on a certain trial, to the knowlege of one of my colleagues, (Mr. Soulé)—not by him, but by another party interested in the proceedings, to prove that a man could not have a second trial in a capital case, because it was in violation of the constitution; and thus, the man might be hung, in order that his life should not be twice put in jeopardy by a judicial process. Any one who reads Robertson's digest can very well understand the legal definition of murder, and that murder is meliorated into manslaughter, excusable homicide, justifiable homicide, according to the circumstances; so with the definitions of burglary, larceny, &c., &c.

There is not a parish in the State where a capable man is not to be had who will not decide correctly—as correctly as some of those men of splendid talents. Chief justice Taney, who in my opinion, is vastly superior in common sense to his distinguished colleague on the bench, to whom I have just referred, has not one-tenth of his lore.

I think a great deal is to be gained by the administration of justice on the spot. We have had some experience of the difficulties and blunders which attend the transfer of cases out of the State to the supreme court of the United States, where they nevertheless have the inestimable advantage in the opinion of some, of being submitted to the decision of men of splendid talents.

Having deeply pondered the whole subject, I am in favor of retaining the parish court system with some necessary ameliorations. I think that the people will prefer a court in their own locality to one out of it, or at least to one which is only periodically in it. I think that in cases where life, liberty or character are involved, and in matters of successions it would be a great improvement to provide that two or three magistrates should sit with the parish judge. The judge should be allowed a salary and no fees, and it should be provided that his salary should be paid one-half by the parish, and one-half by the State. I think that with these modifications to the system, and some others that I might suggest, we would secure a cheap judicature, and at the same time an efficient one. One that would answer all the just expectations of the people.

To illustrate some of the views that I have expressed, I would beg the indulgence of the Convention to read a page from a pamphlet prepared by me in relation to a certain case which has been transferred to the supreme court at Washington.

(Mr. Preston here read the extract referred to.)

If the suggestions which I have thrown out should be taken up by the Convention, and they should be induced to retain the parish court system with proper modifications, the reforms that we all desire can be readily accomplished. We can get through with this part of the subject in two days. But if we begin to engraft novelties and make so radical a change by the substitution of a new system for one which has been in existence for so long a time, there is no telling where we shall stop. 'It is better to bear the ills we have, than fly to others that we know not of.'

Mr. Downs said that the question was so important, that although it was exhausted to a great degree, he would offer a few remarks. He concurred in the general principle that one great object was to lessen the number of courts, and he scarcely doubted that this was the opinion of a large majority of the house.

One of the honorable delegates (Mr. Ratliff) had supposed that the abrogation of the parish court system would effect seriously the operation of our code of laws. That objection was so conclusively answered by one of the gentlemen that preceded me, that I deem it unnecessary to say any thing further upon that point. The delegate from Assumption (Mr. Taylor) whose remarks did not go to the same extent, had contended that if the change of system did not materially clash with the code of practice and the civil code, it would affect several articles in those codes. I understood the distinguished gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Soulé) to concur in that opinion. I have no doubt that the repeal of the parish court system will render some articles in the civil code and code of practice inoperative, which are based upon and refer to the existence of that court. All questions of conflicting jurisdiction will be brought to a close with the suspension of these articles, and that will be a most desirable result.

We have been told that the report of the majority of the committee recommends a new system, and that inasmuch as it is a new system, and we are habituated to the old system of parish courts, we ought not to make a change. If this argument possesses any weight, we might as well have dispensed with steamboats, and not have superseded the clumsy barges which once supplied their places. The introduction of steamboats was a new system—it was a novelty, and yet it has proved far preferable to the inconvenient barges that plied upon the Mississippi, and performed a voyage to Louisville once in four months!

But it is urged that if we adopt the plan suggested by the majority of the committee, legislative action will be necessary to carry out the details. I have no doubt but that such will be the result. This, however, is not a peculiarity applying only to this portion of the constitution. It is not the province of a constitution to go into details upon any subject. It only settles what are the fundamental principles upon which the government shall be administered. The details are properly assigned to the legislature; it is the legislature that carries into effect and gives vigor to those details which are drawn from, and most conform to the principles embodied in the constitution. Some changes will necessarily have to be made in reference to the reorganization of the judiciary by the legislature, but they will be fewer than are supposed. The functionaries who discharge the same duties as appertain to the parish judges ex-officio will be continued; and there will be no difficulty in complying with those requirements of the codes which direct family meetings to be held and other proceedings to be had, which are now had indifferently before parish judges as ex-officio notaries public, or ordinary notaries public; and public sales can be made by auctioneers as is the course pursued at present, on some occasions. An act of a few sections will be all that is necessary to accommodate and reconcile this portion of our jurisprudence with the fundamental law.

Where it may be necessary the legislature may vest in clerks of courts the power to issue all interolcutory orders. In many States the clerk of the court is the chief recording officer and the keeper of the archieves. He enregisters mortgages and conveyances. Where from the nature of the duties of clerk this can be done, it may be well to pursue the same course; but at any rate, there should be one general office where all these duties are transacted, and where the people may attend to do all their business, although it be necessary in some parishes to have separate officers to perform these duties.

Why should there be so great a difference of opinion as to the expediency of abolishing the parish court system? I am not surprised; in fact I expected that the ancient population who have derived the system from the Spanish government, and have become completely identified with it, should be reluctant to relinquish it. Their feelings and habits are more assimilated to the system, and it has operated differently among them from what it has among the American population. There is something in unison between their mildness and the system. It is better suited to their patriarchal habits. They look up for assistance and advice to the parish judge—they consider him as a friend, and make him the depository of their their property to distribute it among their children after their death. I can very well conceive these feelings, and if I lived in such a community I would be, perhaps, as strong an advocate for the system as any creole. However amiable this feeling may be, it is nevertheless evident that the new population do not entertain these peculiar ideas and habits. They must gradually give way to the large influx of population, who, so far from having a partiality for it, entertain against it a deep-rooted dislike.

Such has been the change in some parishes, that the functions of the parish judge have been considerably modified, and although the office retains the same name it is a different thing. Although I readily admit that among the new as well as the old population, there are parish judges who have endeared themselves to their parishioners, and secured the public confidence, still candor compels me to admit that there are some of those officers in these times of speculation, who so far from consulting the interests of the public, are now intent upon their own, and in making the most money they can in the shortest possible space of time.

There is only another point, and I shall refer to it. Some distinguished delegates who are in favor of securing the benefits of uniformity, by having but one set of judges between the supreme judges and justices of the peace, think that these judges should be parish judges. I conceive there are insuperable objections to this plan. In the first place, the expenses would be augmented to a great extent; and in the second place, there would be great difficulty in graduating the relative salaries. In some parishes, the duties of parish judge are exceedingly onerous; in other parishes these duties are trifling. To fix the scale of prices would be a source of perpetual contest in the legislature. Another objection that suggests itself, would be the difficulty of getting persons to accept the office who were competent in remote parishes. Forty-six of these judges would have to be appointed, and as they would sit upon cases where life and death were at issue, their functions would be much more important than those at present assigned to parish judges.

The great evil which resulted from the former system, was, that too little importance was given to the decisions of the superior courts, and the judges were left with too little to do. Some judges have admitted the fact, that they were not as good lawyers, after having been for several years on the bench, as they were when they received their appointments. Appeals were taken from their decisions, as a matter of course, and very little solicitude was manifested as to their decisions; they were converted into mere commissioners to take the testimony, and send it up to the appellate court. It was natural they should become in many instances, careless and indifferent as to the character of their decisions.

Public opinion is decidedly adverse to the system; that is a fact which cannot be controverted. The report of the majority of the judiciary committee has given greater satisfaction than any other report. It was prepared by men of sound experience, who were intimately conversant with the whole subject, and whose suggestions were the result of their own practical experience. The apprehensions that have been expressed that the change would not operate beneficially, are illusory. There is nothing that can militate against the plan, if it be but fairly tested. It will secure a prompt and economical administration of justice, and if we accomplish these results, we shall do much towards satisfying the wishes of our common constiutents as relates to that most important branch of the public service.

Mr. Eustis: I did not intend to present any views of mine on a subject which has been so fully developed by gentlemen on this floor. But, inasmuch as some doubt has been attempted to be thrown upon the system proposed, I deem it not out of place to make a few suggestions, in order that each member, be he lawyer or be he layman, may vote understandingly upon the subject. I have no particular predilection for the proposition now before the house, further than that I believe that the objections raised to it are much less serious than gentlemen who have urged them appear to think—and that upon the whole, the work of the committee has been performed in as satisfactory a manner as was possible, and its adoption would be for the interest of the State.

What is the point at issue? A judicial officer has heretofore been invested with nine different employments. This multiplicity of duties in the hands of one man, is a vestige of colonial servitude. It is the Spanish commandante without the sword and the cocked hat—for there is every thing else. This mode of investiture of officers may have answered, but it does not answer now.

Experience has demonstrated that nothing is to be expected from the legislature in reference to the abrogation of the parish court system. So far from any such design, a disposition has been shown to create new parishesin order to increase the number of these judges. It is only from the Convention that the people can expect that salutary reform, and I think their just expectations ought not to be disappointed. But how is the great work to be accomplished? The report of the majority of the committee suggests the remedy and the means. What do the committee propose? They propose to establish but one court inferior to the supreme court, which shall be presided over by a judge who shall exercise no other functions than those that are purely judicial, and that he shall be disinterested—not dependent upon fees, and therefore interested in litigation, but above any suspicion of improper motives, by receiving a fixed salary, suitable to the position he holds and to the services he renders—and sufficient to enable him to live in good repute among his fellow citizens.

This proposition appears to me to be wise. The members of the committee have reflected maturely upon it, and it is the result of the combined wisdom of gentlemen who stood high in their profession, and who had considerable experience in that profession. The community have had time to examine the question in all its aspects, they have pondered it well, and I believe there is a general concurrence of opinion. The members of the bar, who are presumed to understand the matter best, are generally in favor of such a change.

The delegate from Lafourche (Mr. Taylor) assumes that there will be but a change of names, if the proposition be carried, and that the old system will still prevail under a new form. This is a fallacy. We propose to supersede the parish judges, but we do not propose to transfer their manifold functions to the magistrates who may succeed them. If we were to do this there would be no reform in point of fact; it would only be a change of names, and if the district judge could accumulate litigation, it would be worse than the existing system.

We go further. We strike at the root of the evil, by placing the judge beyond temptation, and beyond suspicion, and in this consists the excellence of the principle. But we are told that there are courts established in all the other States which are analagous to our probate courts. I grant that there are courts whose jurisdiction extends to the settlement of the estates of deceased persons elsewhere, but I deny that their powers and their attributes are the same with our courts of probate. There is a material difference. Our courts of probate exercise exclusive jurisdiction over matters of successions, and all suits against estates must be brought before them. Elsewhere the exclusive functions of these courts, by whatever name they may be designated, extend to the probating of the last will and testament, the appointment and the confirmation of administrators, and the regulation of the assets. This is the system in England. In other States a similar practice prevails, and other courts may take cognizance of suits brought against successions. It was so here until 1825, but in that year the exclusive jurisdiction of the court of probates was consummated. In Virginia, Kentucky and Massachusetts, a suit may be instituted against an estate in any court. But here the decree is imperative—you must go to the court of probates! This exclusive jurisdiction is one of the prolific sources of the evil to which we are exposed, and which calls so loudly for reform. The other courts, in other States operate as a check upon the court of probates. The system thus works well. There is a responsibility and a remedy. Where the estates are insolvent, they are taken out of the probate courts, and placed in the hands of commissioners. But here they are thrown before the judge.

I do not pretend to say that the new system will be accompanied at first by all those benefits which we have a right to expect, but I consider the principle to be a good one, and if the details be wisely carried out by the legislature, I entertain no doubt but that it will fully realize our wishes. It will simplify our system. Our judges will be judges! They will not be notary publics, auctioneers, clerks of their own courts, recorders of mortgages and recorders of conveyances! These multifarious functions will be restored to the proper ministerial officers. What shall we have gained? We shall substitute a sound principle for one that is falling to pieces.

An objection has been made to the expense. By having a judge who is enlightened, you have a man not interested in creating expense; besides the expenses will be reduced by the change of system, and the community will get rid of the enormous expenses that are now paid in shape of fees. These fees will not be accumulated, but the judge will be placed in the position of a disinterested party, by having no interest in them. The clerk will perform the ordinary routine of ministerial duties, and they will no longer devolve upon the judge. That functionary will no longer order a family meeting in one capacity, and hold a family meeting by an order addressed to himself, in another capacity; he will no longer take an inventory, as a notary, and homologate it, as a judge; order a sale, as a judge, and then cry off the property, as an auctioneer. If there was nothing else, this accumulation of employments in the hands of one person, should make it unpopular.

If, as the delegate from Jefferson anticipates, the third and last class of magistracy established by this constitution, justices of the peace, should be elected by the people, I trust they will elect none who are not fully impressed with the duties imposed upon them by law. One of the most powerful causes which contributes to the moral force of the State of Virginia, is that the persons who fill the office of justice of the peace, are men of standing, and that they are invested with probate business.

By adopting the system which is proposed I think you will apply an efficacious remedy to existing abuses; the machinery is simple; and it will insure an administration essentially democratic.

In reference to the proposition to create forty-eight judges, instead of eighteen, as recommended in the report, and upon a basis germain to this principle, I think, throwing aside the question of greater expense, that it is not as good nor as practical as the plan proposed by the committee. I have deemed these few remarks necessary; and they pre-suppose that reforms in the judiciary are generally conceded. I think there is too much officialism about the parish court system, even in the modified form under which it is proposed to retain it. There is too much of the cocked hat and sword. We want a system which will facilitate parties in arranging their difficulties out of court. The evils that have resulted are the necessary consequences of the defects in the former system; and it is a matter of astonishment that it has not even produced greater evils. The gentleman from Lafourche (Mr. Taylor) says that the system has worked well in his parish. This is high praise to the officers who have officiated. But we must look at the system as it has worked generally, and not to an exception, which, after all, is only in favor of the respectable constituency represented by that delegate.

Mr. Miles Taylor said that he was unwilling to trespass upon the attention of the house, but he considered the subject of such vast consequence that he would submit a few remarks. He had listened with much pleasure to the gentleman who had assumed grounds in favor of the section as reported by the committee. It was conceded on all hands that although the parish court system was not named, it was intended to abrogate it. This was the design of that section. It was evident that the proposition before the house involved the total abrogation of that system. It sweeps away every thing connected with the former administration of justice, and supplies no substitute. We are at a loss to conceive what is to take the place of the system which is deemed to be so obnoxious. Gentlemen may attempt to manage it as they will, but the system must exist. The property of minors interdicted, and absent persons must be subjected to the supervision of some appropriate officer. We have been told that this portion of the judicial duty should be committed to the clerks of court, by one of the delegates that has advocated the report. Another delegate (Mr. Eustis) tells us with such confidence as would induce us to believe that he had arrived at a solution of the difficulty, you must entrust this charge to justices of the peace; and why? Because, says the gentleman, such is the practice in Virginia. To this I would reply, that it is not to justices of the peace, but to the county court, composed of several justices of the peace, to whom jurisdiction is given in these matters; and that even if we were disposed to go further than the State of Virginia has gone, and to confide to a single person in each parish, the same authority which is confided to a plurality of justices of the peace as a county court, our legislature, even if so disposed, would not under the section be competent to establish a similar system. This results as a corollery of the arguments which I shall proceed to state. But before entering into the merits of the question, I will take the occasion to set that delegate right upon one point. He says that the reform is necessary, but at the same time he admonishes us not to trust the legislature for the purpose of effecting it. This is as much as to say that the legislature are not likely to subserve the interests of the people, and to respond to their wants. He says that the people desire this reform, and they expect it from the Convention. Where, I would ask the delegate, and in what manner have they manifested such an opinion—have they given instructions to their agents in this Convention? We have been told that the system of parish judges is odious to the people; that they have suffered under it, and have waited in vain for legislative interposition. The legislature by a single breath could have annihilated it and have relieved the people, and yet they have refused to do so. Two of the distinguished delegates who have contended with so much zeal for the destruction of the whole system, were members of the legislature for several years. How is it that they never dreampt of suggesting this reform, and of testing the sense of the legislature upon it. The delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) was a member of the house of representatives, and the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) was a member of the senate, both possessing the public confidence and the commanding influence which their talents gave them, and yet neither of them thought proper to enlighten their colleagues upon the defects and abuses of the system. How is it that these gentlemen could have remained silent, entertaining the convictions which they now possess. If this were so, they have condemned themselves, for they were aware of the evil, and they not only neglected to seek a remedy, but they neglected even to make it known; and if I speak so plainly it is less with a view of constituting myself as a censor, than for the purpose of showing that there is an inconsistency between the course pursued by gentlemen and the arguments which they have here advanced. Gentlemen are deceived. There is not that general feeling of dissatisfaction against the existing system which they would have us to believe, and the accumulation of abuses to which they have so often referred, is to be found only in their imaginations. If there be abuses, I repeat, it is not to the system itself that these abuses are to be attributed. It was in the power of the legislature at any moment to have arrested them; and if this was not done, those who were aware of their existence, are to blame for not taking the proper steps to put an end to them. In the section of the State where I reside, the system under a proper administration, has been found amply sufficient to guard and protect the widow and the orphan.

But, says the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Eustis) we want a judge, and not a man who fills nine different employments. In all other countries, says the gentleman, the administration of successions are subjected to the jurisdiction of other courts, besides the court of probate, and so it was here until 1825, when the legislature invested the courts of probates with an exclusive jurisdiction, that we are to look for much of the evils that pervade the system. In assuming this as a fact, he then admits that the abuses are the results of legislation, and not the result of mal-administration. He admits that the evil would cease if the existing legislation were changed. But upon whom does that depend? It depends upon the authority which created the system. The evils are within the competency of the legislature, and therefore there is no necessity for our intervention. But oh! say the gentleman, the parish judge is paid by fees, and interest leads his judgment astray. The argument is the more specious, because as we are told, it is sustained by some deplorable facts. Admitting that this is another prolific source of evil, why is it that the judge is made dependant upon his fees? Why are they not taken from him. The legislature have had the power, and if they have not done so, surely it is not the fault of the system itself. Change your legislation and withdraw these fees, and you will find that the system will no longer be obnoxious to your blighting censures and withering reproaches. I am free to admit that these different functions do not become the dignity of the parish judge, but I cannot conceive how it can be expected that great economy will result from their distribution into other hands. But have the committee found the means of abolishing these fees? It would seem not. They say that the ministerial duties for which the parish judges have heretofore been paid, should be transferred to clerks of courts, who, performing these duties, will exact similar fees. This is not all. And it is not so much in this, as in the palpable contradictions in the report in which we see the glimpses of the errors and improvidence of the system. It is prescribed that the judges shall exercise no other functions but those which are purely judicial. The judges are restricted to their judicial duties. But the clerks are not only to exercise ministerial functions, but likewise certain judicial functions. They are to issue all orders, and to perform such other acts as may be necessary to the administration of justice. The theory of this plan is novel enough. The clerks are, in some measure, to be the successors of the parish judges, and are to be favored to a greater extent than the district judges, as they are not to be restricted to a separate line of duty. When I say that the scheme is novel, I mean that it is so not only in relation to those to whom it has just been unfolded, but novel to those by whom it has been connected.

In examining some documents, I accidentally fell upon a report, made by the honorable delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) when a member of the senate in 1841, as chairman of the select committee, to whom had been referred the bill to take the sense of the people as to the propriety and expediency of calling a convention to re-model the constitution. I will read an extract from the report in reference to clerks of courts, for the purpose of showing that the delegate (Mr. Downs) was not disposed then to place much confidence in these functionaries.

"Not only judges, but clerks, under our constitution hold their offices for life. This is one of the most lucrative offices under the government, and it is not only held for life and entirely independent of the people, or the legislature, or executive branches of the governmont, but has become in a great degree hereditary or transmissable by the will of the holder to others. The holder keeps it as long as he pleases, and then waits his opportunity until he can obtain a pledge from the judge who makes the appointment for his son, brother or other heir, who in turn transmits it as before. It is believed that many instances exist where this office has existed in the same individual, or in the same family since the organization of the State government, and where it will continue to so exist to an indefinite period, if the present constitution be not amended.

"This is creating a privileged order. This is giving a portion of the power of the government, as a property, to individuals and their heirs; and that, too, without the false plea of necessity, which is urged in favor of the life tenure of judges. So far is this principle from producing well qualified officers, it is notorious that, to the great annoyance of the lawyers and judges, no offices in the State are so incompetently filled. He had himself, within the last year, seen numerous cases in the supreme court delayed, lost, dismissed or imperfectly understood by the lawyers and judges, in consequence of the incompetency of clerks. In some cases the subpœnas to witnesses being sent up in the record, and the pleadings left out, and in some cases certified to be lost. He has seen a clerk officiating, who could not swear a witness correctly, or make the simple entry on the minutes, without the direction of the judge or the lawyers; and another whose habits and incapacity was such that the court could not possibly proceed, and was adjourned without doing any business, to the great detriment of many suitors. And what makes the evil in this case still more intolerable, is, that not even the judge, who has appointed such incompetent clerk, can remove him or appoint a successor. Nor can the legislature apply a remedy, because he holds his office under the constitution."

These are the officers which the gentleman (Mr. Downs) would now substitute in place of the parish judges. One of two things, either the clauses of the report render one another nugatory, and in that case your system is without foundation, and you destroy a principle which is at least as good as the one you proposed—or the judicial functions are to be in part confided to the clerks of courts; and if you assume this hypothesis, you admit that it would have been as well to have left those functions in the hands of the parish judges, and not to have destroyed for the mere pleasure of destroying, and of introducing an utopia in the constitution. The delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) stated his concurrence in what fell from the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) upon the subject of conflicting jurisdiction. The latter delegate spoke with so much warmth upon the perplexities of these conflicting jurisdictions, that one would have thought that his mind was preoccupied by the all-absorbing thought of conflicting jurisdiction, and that wherever he turned his eyes, he saw those ominous words, "conflicting jurisdiction." But how stand the facts? I find that they do not bear the gentleman out in his brilliant declamation, and in order that he should not attempt to correct me, I will submit the proof for what I here assert. I will refer to an authority which will have no doubt great weight with the gentleman. It is Benjamin Sliddill's Digest. It contains three thousand eight hundred abstracts of decisions of the supreme court, and embracing a period from 1813 to 1828.—Well, how many decisions do you suppose there are upon this vexed and all-pervading subject of jurisdiction, to paraphrase the language of the delegate (Mr. Benjamin)? There are one hundred and five, if I have counted them aright, and I find from the four last volumes of the decisions themselves, embracing a period from the early part of the year 1841 to late in the year 1843, but one case reported, and that arose in the city of New Orleans, which it is proposed to exempt from this remarkable change! Are we prepared to destroy a system because the fertile and inflamed imaginations of gentlemen have discovered greater difficulties than actually exist?

To pass on to another matter. Allusions have been had to the opinions of distinguished individuals to overwhelm the system with greater reproach. I have little regard for such authority. We should act for the welfare of the country, and use the power that God has given us to arrive at correct and proper conclusions. The delegate from Ouachita took me to task for differing from James Madison. These reproaches are useless; they are worse than useless; they are wrong, and inculcate a blind submission which is not authorized by the progress of the human mind. The gentleman from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis) has alluded to an expression of opinion of a citizen whose memory is justly revered. A man who was an honor to the State, and an ornament to the judiciary. He says that that individual left a solemn condemnation of the system. I do not draw the same conclusions from the fact to which he refers. It was not because the system was considered monstrous by one occupying so exalted a position, and that the judges of the courts of probates should not be entrusted with the duty of protecting the orphan, but it was because the legislation applied to these courts was vicious and defective. The horror which he felt at the interference of the court in his estate, was not the result of a want of confidence in the magistrate, but a want of confidence in the laws themselves, which were designed to guarantee the most sacred of rights; the right of property, and the right of inheritance. The delegate from St. Landry has confounded the cause with the instrument, and has attempted to throw upon the officer the vices of the system. We have been told that the functions of the parish judge are so multiplied that he celebrates marriages. There is nothing remarkable in confiding to him this power as a magistrate. Marriage is held to be a civil contract, and in all the States of the Union the ceremony may be and is performed by judicial functionaries.

I shall not recur to what has been said upon the various powers exercised by the parish judge, further than to remark that if it be wrong to accumulate so many employments in the hands of one person, and I am, for my part, averse to any thing of the kind, it is very easy to apply a remedy. The legislature can apply an effectual remedy. But I can see no wisdom in withdrawing these functions from the parish judge, and transferring them to the clerk of the district court. I do not comprehend how the public are to be relieved from the payment of the fees, about which so much complaint has been made, by this substitution; or how such a change can conduce to the public interest or convenience. It strikes me as a very singular mode of reform.

As I understand the object of a constitution, it is to settle principles, and not to provide legislation. If, however, this body take a different view of their mission, and create the details of an irrevocable system, which, in my opinion, they ought not to do, but leave the discretionary power with the legislature; I would entreat gentlemen, before they take this course to reflect seriously upon the confusion and disorder which will result, if the system be found totally inadequate to accomplish the purposes designed.

On motion, the Convention adjourned until this evening at 5 o'clock.

Thursday Evening, April 17.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

Mr. Soule moved that the reporters, during the continuance of the evening sessions, be dispensed from reporting more than an abstract of the proceedings.

Mr. Lewis opposed this motion. He had no idea of leaving such a discretion with the reporters, to report what they choose, and to leave out what they choose. It would give rise to a great many doubts as to what were the real opinions of members, and their sentiments would be misunderstood; for it was much more difficult to make a faithful abstract, than to report an entire speech.

Mr. Roselius was in favor of dispensing with the reports of the evening sessions altogether.

Mr. Mayo said he was convinced that it was physically impossible for the reporters to get through with the labor assigned them. He was very willing to dispense them with a certain portion of that labor.

Mr. Soule said he presumed that no more would be exacted from the reporters than they were capable of performing, and therefore, that his motion would prevail. From the manner in which these reports have heretofore been prepared, we may safely infer that this analysis will be satisfactory, as an outline of our proceedings.

Mr. Downs thought that the best course would be to elect another reporter in English. The session was drawing to a close, and the additional expense would be but trifling.

Mr. Claiborne said that if this motion prevailed he would move to appoint an additional reporter into French, for there was as much necessity in the one case as in the other.

Mr. Waddill, for similar reasons, would ask the appointment of an additional minute clerk.

Mr. McRae moved that the secretary be empowered to appoint such additional reporters, for the time being, as might be necessary.

These various propositions were put to vote, and lost.

The question then recurred on the adoption of Mr. Soulé's motion, and it was carried—yeas 39, nays 22.

Mr. Lewis said he could not consent to such a measure; he would, therefore, move that the office of reporter be abolished.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned until to-morrow at 10 o'clock, a. m.

Friday, April 18, 1845.

The Convention met agreeably to adjournment, and the proceedings were opened with prayer from the Hon. Mr. Stephens.

Mr. Humble offered the following resolution:

Be it Resolved, That from Monday, the 21st of April, the Convention shall meet at nine o'clock in the morning, and shall adjourn at three o'clock p. m. each day, Sundays excepted.

Messrs. Beatty, Dunn and Conrad expressed themselves in favor of holding evening sessions.

Mr. Dunn said it was out of the question to rescind the rule, holding evening sessions; it should be remembered that we had been in session four or five months, and we were not more than two-thirds through, and it was now nearly May. Could any member complain of sitting eight hours out of twenty-four? Certainly not; and he would ask members to determine if it was not as convenient to sit here in the afternoon and listen to the debates as to sit in their rooms, or promenade the streets? True, it was laborious on the secretary, clerk and reporters—but if they could not perform their respective duties, employ assistants,—any thing that would facilitate the progress of the Convention. He admits, the Convention last evening was interrupted by motions, and no headway was effected, but a recurrence of this can be obviated by making a rule that no motion shall be entertained except in the mornings.

Messrs. Splane, Mayo, Lewis and Claiborne argued, that from the experiment that had been tried, it was clear that evening sessions would not be productive of any beneficial result. It was better to meet an hour or two earlier in the morning and to adjourn at an hour or two later in the afternoon. Business would be facilitated much more by this plan.

Mr. Splane offered an amendment repealing the rule for the afternoon sessions, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. Lewis renewed it.

Mr. Downs proposed that the question be taken on the second part of the resolution. If it were adopted he would vote for the second portion, although it would be with some reluctance.

The question was taken on the first part of the resolution prescribing that the Convention meet at nine o'clock in the morning. And the yeas and nays were called for; yeas 47, nays 19.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the second portion of the resolution rescinding the rule for afternoon sessions, and the yeas and nays were called for; yeas 47, nays 19.

Mr. Lewis stated that he had given notice of a motion to abolish the office of reporter. He had done so because he was opposed to allowing the reporters to make sketches of the debates which they were authorized to do by the concurrence of the house during the continuance of the evening sessions. Inasmuch as the evening sessions were abrogated, and the dispensation to the reporters consequently was at an end, he would withdraw his motion.

On motion of Mr. Marigny, the Convention took up Mr. Marigny's resolution rescinding the rule requiring a greater number to vote upon a motion for reconsideration than voted for the proposition, proposed to be reconsidered. And the yeas and nays were called for; yeas 19, nays 45.

Mr. Soule would inquire whether it was considered that his motion to reconsider the clause by which the city of New Orleans was constituted into one senatorial district, made anterior to the rule which his colleague (Mr. Marigny) had just sought to rescind, could be effected by that rule. He would address this interrogatory to his colleague (Mr. Benjamin) who on a recent occasion, as he had understood, had conceded that inasmuch as this motion to reconsider had been made previous to the adoption of the rule, it did not apply to it.

Mr. Benjamin called for the reading of the rule.

Mr. Benjamin said he concluded that the motion of his colleague (Mr. Soulé) was subjected to the rule just read, for although it was true that the delegate (Mr. Soulé) had notified the house of his intention to move for the reconsideration of the vote in question before the rule was adopted, it was no less indubitable that the gentleman had not made his motion to reconsider until after the adoption of the rule.

Mr. Soule said that he was indifferent as to the matter, for he was convinced that if a full house were obtained, there was a clear majority opposed to constituting the city of New Orleans into a single senatorial district, he thought it however somewhat singular that after establishing his right by an explicit admission, his colleague (Mr. Benjamin) should now contest that right.

Mr. Benjamin replied, that his colleague labored under a misapprehension. He was not aware of ever having made the admission attributed to him.

Mr. Soule said that he was not present when that admission was made, but he had understood from some members that it was made, and it appeared that such was the case from the official reports of the debates.

Mr. Benjamin suggested that it would be better to take the vote upon the motion to reconsider de novo.

Mr. Soule assented, and the subject was then passed over to come up in its regular order.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Section first, article fourth of the report of the majority of the committee on the judiciary department.

The question pending being upon Mr. Ratliff's motion to strike out the words "in the city of New Orleans."

Mr. Downs called for the previous question.

Mr. Read said he would merely explain his vote, inasmuch as he was cut off from making any remarks; he believed that in voting for the section as it had been reported, and consequently against the parish judge system, he was voting in accordance with the wishes of his constituents, and not only of his constituents, but of nine-tenths of the people of the whole State. The people were in favor of those measures that would most effectually destroy that system, and which would substitute in its place a system more congenial with the feelings of the people, one more economical and less liable to abuse. Thousands of widows and orphans had suffered from the establishment of those courts. Successions had been dilapidated and wasted. We wanted a system based upon humanity and religion, and which would secure the rights of the helpless and unprotected.

Mr. Porter remarked that he was not favorable to the parish judge system, as a system. But he thought there ought to be some local court which would be of easy and ready access to the people of each parish. There was parish business that required such a tribunal. He was opposed to putting down the system before proposing one adequate to take its place. His ground for voting against the section was simply because no remedy had been suggested; or could be provided hereafter, even, by the legislature, for they are prohibited from establishing probate courts in each parish. This was unprecedented; there was no constitution in the United States that had such a provision, and there was no county or parish in any State but had a probate or orphans' court in it. He repeated, he was opposed to the present parish judge system, but he desired that the legislature should have the power of establishing such probate courts as are to be found in the other States, and that each parish should have the liberty of burying their own dead, and administering on their own estates at home. He said he had intended to discuss this question, but had been cut off by the previous question.

The question was taken upon Mr. Ratliff's motion, and the yeas and nays were called for; yeas 24, nays 37.

Mr. Downs called for the adoption of the section.

Mr. Soule moved to lay the section on the table subject to call. He made this motion in order to take up the section providing for the appointment of the judges. This course would do away with a great deal of debate.

Mr. Downs was opposed to this motion. The subject had been fully discussed for the last two or three days, and it was better to dispose of the section.

Mr. Lewis raised a question of order, whether the house would entertain Mr. Soulé's motion after the call for the previous question.

The chair decided that Mr. Soulé's motion was not in order, inasmuch as Mr. Downs had moved previously for the adoption of the section.

Mr. Porter offered the following substitute for the section:

The judicial power shall be vested in a supreme court, in district courts, and in justices of the peace. The legislature shall have the power to establish throughout the State courts of probates, the judges of which courts shall be chosen by the qualified electors in each parish, and the legislature shall have further authority to establish from time to time such courts in the city of New Orleans as may be necessary.

Mr. Beatty moved to strike out the words "the judges of which courts shall be elected by the duly qualified electors."

The yeas and nays were called for on Mr. Beatty's motion; yeas 30, nays 32.

Mr. Waddill then proposed to strike out the words "in the city of New Orleans," and to substitute the words "in incorporated towns." This motion was lost.

The question then recurred on the adoption of Mr. Porter's substitute; and the yeas and nays were called for; yeas 16, nays 49.

Mr. Saunders moved to insert in the section the words "and in parish courts with probate jurisdiction;" and the yeas and nays were called for; yeas 20, nays 40; consequently said motion was lost.

Mr. Porter said he was in favor of probate courts. They were recognized and established in every State of the Union; but there had been so many abuses in the parish court that he could not vote for it; yeas 20, nays 40.

Mr. Soule moved to take up his motion to reconsider the vote in relation to the senatorial districts of New Orleans.

Mr. Lewis would remind the gentleman that his motion had passed its order.

Mr. Miles Taylor moved to insert the following words after the words "district courts," "in probate courts."

The yeas and nays were called for upon his motion. Yeas 27, nays 35.

Mr. Waddill called for the division, so that the question might be taken on the several courts to be established.

Mr. Roselius considered that the question could not be divided.

Mr. Miles Taylor entertained the contrary opinion.

Messrs. Grymes and Wadsworth considered the question indivisable.

Mr. Culbertson appealed from the decision of the chair.

The decision of the chair was sustained.

Mr. F. B. Conrad moved to add after the words "New Orleans," in the section, the words "in the city of Lafayette;" which motion prevailed.

The question was on the adoption of the section, and the yeas and nays were called for; yeas 51, nays 16.

On motion of Mr. Soule, the Convention took up his motion for reconsideration; the yeas and nays were called for upon said motion—yeas 32, nays 34.

The Convention then took up section two of the judiciary report.

Sec. 2. The supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction only except in cases hereinafter provided, which jurisdiction shall extend in all cases where the matter shall exceed five hundred dollars.

Mr. Ratliff moved to strike out five hundred dollars, and substitute three hundred dollars. He said that he could see no reason why a poor man should not have access to the supreme court, as well as a rich man. He hoped his motion would prevail. He could see no reason for changing the old constitution in that respect.

Mr. Grymes said, that the reason which induced the committee to fix the minimum of jurisdiction at three hundred dollars, was because a great deal of business had been imposed upon the supreme court. That court is hereafter to be charged with jurisdiction upon appeal in criminal matters, with cases in which the constitutionality or legality of any tax, toll or impost shall be in contestation, whatever may be the amount; and likewise with cases of fines, forfeitures and penalties imposed by municipal corporations. In addition to these duties, which will claim a great deal of its time, it is charged with issuing writs of habeas corpus at the instance of all persons in actual custody, under civil process. It seemed to him that the rights of the poor were much better guaranteed by these provisions, than by placing the amount for appeal at three hundred dollars. If the matter be examined, it will be seen that it is decidedly in favor of the poor, and that it guarantees to them some of the most important rights and privileges.

Mr. Ratliff said that it was with great diffidence that he entered the lists against the honorable delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Grymes) to controvert the arguments he has assumed. The gentleman is so much occupied with suits of the highest magnitude, and holds so high a position at the bar, that he does not give that consideration to small matters which I do. My professional experience proves to me the necessity for keeping the supreme court opened to the poor suitor, as much as to the rich suitor. I had a case not long ago, in which this was strikingly exhibited. A widow lady had a case involving fifty head of cattle. She lost her case in the court in the first instance, and I took the appeal, and upon the appeal I gained the suit. Now if this provision had existed, she would have had no relief, and would have been compelled to submit to the judgment of the first court, unless I could have shown that the cattle were worth more than five hundred dollars.

If as the gentleman (Mr. Grymes) would intimate, that there are but few cases under five hundred dollars, that would be brought up to the supreme court, it strikes me that this is an argument in favor of my amendment, for it demonstrates that the supreme court will not be overburdened with this kind of business. Would it not be manifestly unjust to allow a stranger upon his arrival in our port to seek relief from the imposition of a tax upon him by going before the supreme court, when we deny to a citizen the right of an appeal where the amount involved was four hundred and ninety-nine dollars.

Mr. Grymes said he had briefly exposed his views upon the subject, and would not debate it further, but would leave it to the sense of the Convention.

Mr. Eustis said that he concurred in the views expressed by his colleague (Mr. Grymes.) There was a great accumulation of business in the supreme court at present, and the docket was behind-hand. It has been some years since the end of the docket has been seen. The dispositions in the new constitution imposed upon them additional duties. He thought there was more protection to the poor by the provisions which had been made in the report than would be derived by reducing the amount subject to appeal from five hundred to three hundred dollars. I would merely observe to those gentlemen who are not members of the bar, and who may not be familiar with this matter, that the committee composed of gentlemen of the legal profession, who have been for their whole lives in the courts, were unanimously of opinion that it was impossible, physically impossible for the judges to get through, if so much labor was thrown upon them, and that therefore it was expedient to relieve them in that particular. Now as to the considerations of poor and rich which have been introduced by the delegate from West Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) he would merely remark that the members of the committee were in the category of poor men. There were no rich men among them. If the additional duties proposed be assigned to the judges of the supreme court, it is necessary to relieve them from appeals under five hundred dollars. Or otherwise you will have to withdraw the provision requiring them to intervene in all cases of taxes and in cases of imprisonment under civil process, which to my mind are infinitely of more importance than the matter of an appeal for two hundred dollars less.

Mr. M. Taylor had a few words to say: the gentlemen who were upon the judiciary committee he readily conceded, were eminent in their profession. It was designed, he presumed, to organize the system for the dispatch of business. One of the highest objects of government was the dispensation of justice. He did not look at the different classes in the community—whether they were rich or poor. They were members of one community, equally well entitled to all the privileges and immunities of American citizens. They were equally well entitled to justice, whether the amount involved were large or small. A poor man was as much interested in a suit for a few dollars, as a rich man was in a suit for thousands of dollars. The rich man was personally interested, whether he should be a few thousand dollars richer or not by the termination of a suit in which he was interested. But with the poor man, it was a question perhaps of his daily bread. I admit that there are difficulties in adjusting this portion of the system. Our supreme court will be over-burdened with business, but I cannot admit that the proper remedy for this lies in cutting off appeals in which men of small means may be involved. We should adopt a different remedy, for justice is sacred, and ought to be meted out to all men. There should be no constitutional limitation, and the highest court in which the most confidence was reposed, should be as accessible of redress to the poor as to the rich. This is the system adopted in some countries, and it is proper because it places all men upon an equality in reference to remedies at law. In some other points it also has advantages. It frequently happens that a suit for a few dollars involves principles of more consequence than a suit for a much larger amount. This is exhibited upon reference to the judicature of other countries. Look at the cases in England, examined by men combining the highest order of intellect, where the amount in dispute does not exceed forty shillings, and which settle some of the most important principles of law. In some of our sister States a similar practice prevails, and any suitor, be the amount large or small, may have the judgment of the inferior courts revised; he may claim justice and have justice done him. I admit that such a system cannot be adopted here without great difficulty. The supreme court are not only authority in matters of law, but are authority in matters of fact. It is this supervision of facts that incumbers the court with records, and which arrest its proceedings. If that were changed, there would be no difficulty in giving the supreme court not only jurisdiction for an amount as low as three hundred dollars, but for a sum infinitely less. However that may be, I am for an equal distribution of justice without reference to the matters in controversy. I shall vote in favor of the motion of the delegate from West Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) for the simple reason that equal justice ought to be extended to all classes.

Mr. Dunn called for the previous question.

Mr. Benjamin hoped that the call for the previous question would not prevail. The whole question of jurisdiction was involved. He thought that the call for the previous question was premature.

Mr. C. M. Conrad trusted that the call for the previous question would not be insisted upon.

Mr. Dunn withdrew the call for the previous question, and Mr. Scott of Feliciana renewed it.

Mr. C. M. Conrad called for the yeas and nays; yeas 24; nays 30.

Mr. Benjamin was sorry to have any thing to say when there was so large a minority who were for closing the discussion. He would suggest that it would be better to lay the section and the amendment upon the table until the question was decided whether the supreme court should decide on questions of law alone. If appeals to the supreme court were restricted to questions of law only, he could see no objection to giving the supreme court unlimited jurisdiction. The solution of the question whether appeals should be granted where the amount was under five hundred dollars, depended upon the action of the Convention in relation to the former point.

Mr. Ratliff moved to lay the section and his amendment on the table, subject to call.

Mr. Brent moved to strike out all after the word "jurisdiction," and to insert the fourth section of the report of the minority of the committee as follows:

Sec. 4. The supreme court shall have jurisdiction of errors of law in all civil and probate cases, where the amount in controversy before it exceeds three hundred dollars, and in all criminal cases when the accused is sentenced to a greater punishment than an imprisonment, or to the payment of a sum of money exceeding three hundred dollars. The legislature may give to the supreme court appellate jurisdiction as to matters of fact in such cases as they may deem expedient.

Mr. Dunn moved to lay the sections and the amendment on the table subject to call, and to take up the third section; which motion prevailed.

Sec. 3. The supreme court shall be composed of one chief justice and of three associate justices, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum; each of said judges shall receive a salary of thousand dollars annually. The said court shall appoint its own clerks. The said judges shall be appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, for the term of ten years.

Mr. Dunn moved to strike out the word "three" and substitute the word "five." The reason that actuated him in making this motion was, that if there were but four judges on the bench, and they differed in opinion equally, the law would not be settled. Five were necessary to settle the question upon appeal, and by having that number the administration of justice would be greatly facilitated, and there would be greater weight and certainty attached to the divisions. Experience had demonstrated the expediency of increasing the number of judges in the supreme court from three to five. If one judge of the district court were to give a judgment one way, and another district judge were to give a judgment on the same question the opposite way, and the supreme court were equally divided, it would result that both judges would be affirmed. The bare mention of this inconvenience would, he presumed, be sufficient to induce the house to increase the number to five, by which it would be obviated.

Mr. Lewis was sorry to differ in opinion from the delegate from East Feliciana (Mr.

Dunn) but he thought that the section should remain without the amendment for this simple reason, that each case would be decided by a majority of three. If two of the judges of the supreme court were for affirming the judgment, it would be affirmed for in that case, there would be the district judge and the two judges of the supreme court for affirming the judgment, and that would be the deliberate opinions of three men against two. The mere fact of being a judge of the supreme court, did not make any material difference, for it was presumable that men of equal capacity would be appointed district judges, and if the judgment of the district judge was concurred in, it would be a safe inference that the judgment was a proper one; at any rate it was as likely to be so, as if it was pronounced by three of the supreme judges, and dissented to by the remaining judge of the supreme court and the judge of the district court. In either case there would be a concurrence of the majority of the whole number, and it would be as well secured one way as the other. There would be however a most decided advantage in adopting the mode prescribed in the section. Heretofore a great evil had grown up from the fact that the judges of the district court considered themselves, and were considered by lawyers only, as commissioners to take testimony for the ultimate action of the supreme court; and were therefore in many instances, indifferent whether their decisions went one way or the other, as very little weight were attached to them. The tendency of this was to induce neglect in their studies, and some of them have freely acknowledged that they became worse and worse lawyers the longer they remained on the bench. They might give hasty decisions, because very little responsibility devolved upon them. If however, they are to learn that their decisions are of great moment and may settle the law, they will be more careful and will study their cases with greater assiduity when they know that they have to bear a large share of the responsibility, it will stimulate them to greater exertion, and as it is to be hoped that those best qualified both by their talents and integrity will be chosen to fill the office, their judgments will be as maturely considered as if they were final, which they will be in the event of an equal division of opinion between the judges of the supreme court. These are some few of the considerations which induced me to hope that the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. Garcia called for the yeas and nays upon striking out the word "four." He was in favor of three judges for the supreme court.

Mr. Brent was in favor of having but three judges of the supreme court, but he would vote against the motion to strike out because he was apprehensive that five would be substituted for four.

Mr. Humble for the same reasons would vote against striking out.

Mr. C. M. Conrad thought there was a great deal of force in the objection of the delegate from East Feliciana (Mr. Dunn) to the mode provided in the section for affirming judgments; which might result in decisions of a contrary character, both standing affirmed. There was, moreover, a great accumulation of business in the supreme court, and this business would be very materially increased by the provisions reported by the committee.

Mr. Porter would vote to strike out, with the view of inserting two.

Mr. Ratliff would vote in the same way for a similar reason.

The yeas and nays were called for; yeas 12, nays 43.

Mr. Read moved to strike out the following words, "each of said judges shall receive a salary of thousand dollars annually."

Mr. Read said he had examined in vain the constitutions of these States, to find the shadow of a precedent for the liberty taken by the Convention of 1812, in fixing the salaries of supreme judges. He had inquired in vain the reason of this singular provision, sought to be re-established and consecrated by the new constitution. Perhaps he would be told that it was necessary for the independence of the judiciary. If the independence of the judiciary be jeopardized by legislstion in dollars and cents, by the mere matter of law determining from time to time, suitable and adequate salaries, which shall not be diminished during the term of office, then indeed must the temples of justice in other States be the very fountains of iniquity. It is hardly conceivable that high-minded, honorable men, such as judicial functionaries ought to be, would be bribed, influenced, or corrupted by the simple fact of their salaries being ascertained by law, instead of the constitution. Indeed, there is no possibility of danger from such source, when the legislature is prohibited, as is the case in the minority report, from diminishing the compensation during the continuance of the term of office. The framers of our federal compact had no such apprehensions, when they in their wisdom declared, that the judges of the supreme and inferior courts "shall, at stated times, receive for their services, a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office," thus leaving the subject to the justice of congress.

In order to have as many safeguards as possible, Mr. Read would prefer a total prohibition upon the legislsture from any control whatever, either in diminishing or increasing the compensation during the official tenure. But after all, if there be no higher or nobler motives for virtuous action, constitutional provisions of this kind would be of little avail.

Economy, good policy and business-like views are strikingly opposed to a permanence of salaries beyond all reach. Depression of the financial condition of the State, and general inability on the part of the people to restore the wonted prosperity, might imperiously demand a reduction of expenditures. Shall every officer but the favored judge, yield to the necessity? Such is not the doctrine of republicanism, nor of equal and exact justice to all men. On the other hand, it might so happen (though there is little danger to be apprehended on that score) that the salaries fixed by the constitution might be too small, in which event an injustice would be caused to those upon whom should fall the dignified honors of a judgeship. The judicial laborer is worthy of his hire, but he should be remunerated proportionally to the compensation of those engaged in other departments of government, and in a like manner, neither granting to him a constitutioual favor and security of which others are deprived, nor restricting him within limits not imposed upon all officers. It was formerly contended that large salaries were necessary to command the first talents of the country, but this has been found to be a gross mistake. Men seek not office for money alone, but principally for the immortality of name; they rise above the dust of earth, for the purpose of inscribing their histories upon the tablet of the skies. In order, however, to prevent the ermine from being prostituted to purposes of speculation, it should be removed as far as possible from every pecuniary motive, which might follow any action of this Convention in the premises, for in the establishment of salaries the highest standard would have to be selected for all times and seasons, lest in assuming a lower, the compensation would not be sufficient for the ordinary expenditures of life. Let us then leave this subject to the legislature, whose peculiar province it is to provide for the fair and just remuneration of all officers of government. He hoped his motion to strike out would prevail.

Mr. Marigny said that although the new constitution might not be approved by the people, he would nevertheless feel a secret pleasure in having been a member of this convention; for he must acknowledge, that during a life of sixty years, he had never seen such extraordiuary scenes as were enacted in this hall from day to day. Occasionally the sagacity and wisdom of the legislature are elevated to the skies, and again the legislature on the other hand is represented as a body in whom we should not repose the slightest confidence. Accordingly, when it was proposed to leave to it the discretion of establishing the seat of government where it was conceived to be most convenient, to modify the parish court system, we were told to beware of the legislature. The legislature will consult nothing but a spirit of cabal, intrigue and corruption. But now, when it is sought to establish by a fixed rule the salary of judges in the constitution, we are told that it is best to confide in the legislature; it is they that ought to be trusted with this matter, and they are worthy of implicit confidence.

From whence comes this contradiction? Where is the policy of making our judges entirely dependent and subservient to the will of the legislature? Is there in this any justice or good sense? No where in the constitution do we find a guarantee for property; and we were told that when we came to the judiciary that it would there find ample protection. How is this promise to be fulfilled? Is this last asylum for property to be abandoned? It would be as well to re-establish in Louisiana the usages of the Choctaws and the Cherokees, and create at once the agrarian law. It cannot be that this convention cannot understand that the safety of the judiciary depends upon its independence from any control, such as would be possessed by the legislature, if the proposition of the delegate from East Baton Rouge were to prevail.

If you reduce to ten years, the term of service for the judges of the Supreme Court, how can you expect lawyers of eminence to accept the appointment, unless you allow them a sufficient compensation to support them and their families, and to enable them to retire without being reduced to absolute penury. The executive has frequently found it extremely difficult heretofore, when the office has been for life, to obtain suitable persons to accept of the appointment. How much more difficult will it be to find suitable persons to accept the office after your democratic constitution, or I might rather say your constitution which is distinguished for its demagogueism, shall be proclaimed as the fundamental law of the land. Inasmuch as you do not want but four judges upon that tribunal, take the $25,000 which has been heretofore allowed, and divide it between the four judges, so as to give $8,000 to the chief justice, and the balance to be equally distributed among the other three. If you do this, you will obtain lawyers of acknowledged abilities, who may be willing to relinguish their brilliant career at the bar for the honor of a seat on the bench, provided they have the guarantee of a decent living. If you leave it to the legislature in their caprice to fix the salaries, you will create uncertainty in the judiciary, and no one who is capable will accept the office. If you adopt such a provision in your constitution, the result may be its rejection, for the only security for property is to be found in the constitution. Men of industry, who have acquired large fortunes, are indifferent to who may be elected a representative or a senator, in comparison with the deep and abiding interest which they feel in securing an upright judiciary. I trust that the convention will reflect seriously upon this point, and not put our liberties and our property at issue by the establishment of an irresponsible judiciary.

The question was taken on Mr. Read's motion to strike out, and it was lost; ayes 14, nays 41.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

Saturday April, 19, 1845.

The convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer from the Hon. Mr. Stephens.

Mr. Ratliff, on behalf of the committee on contingent expenses, submitted the accounts for the funeral expenses of the late Hon. Gilbert Leonard, which, on motion, were allowed.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Section third—Article fourth.

Salaries of the judges of the supreme court, being under consideration yesterday, when the Convention adjourned.

Mr. Saunders moved that the paragraph referring to the salary be laid on the table, until the duration of office be first determined, which motion prevailed.

Mr. Brent moved to strike out the word "ten."

The question was taken and the ayes and nays were called for, ayes 29 nays 22.

Mr. Splane moved to fill the blank with the word "twelve."

Mr. Conrad stated that he had voted to retain ten years as a matter of compromise. It was very desirable in the zeal which gentlemen evinced to shorten the duration of office, that they should take heed not to make the period so short as to introduce instability into the administration of public affairs, particularly in reference to the judiciary. If it be borne in mind that with a life tenure, that in the space of thirty-two years we have had fourteen judges of the supreme court, making an average of but seven years and a half to each, it must be obvious that if these changes were so frequent with such a system, they will be much more frequent with a limitation of office to ten or twelve years; and we shall be exposed to changes enough in all conscience without shortening the term any further.

The question was taken on Mr. Splane's motion, and it was lost, 18 yeas 39 nays.

Mr. Brent moved to fill the blank with eight years, and the yeas and nays were called for; 47 ayes 7 nays.

Mr. Waddill moved that the question be first taken on the amount of salary to be allowed to the chief justice. Carried

On the motion of Mr. Ledoux to fix the salary of the chief justice at $7,000.

Mr. Preston said, I shall oppose the motion as proposing an unnecessary and exorbitant sum for the salary of the chief justice, undoubtedly to be followed up with equal extravagance in fixing the salaries of his associates.

The salary of the chief justice of the State was fixed at five thousand dollars by the old constitution. Under that constitution we had the good fortune to have selected as chief justice the late George Mathews and he has been succeeded by the present chief justice. These gentlemen have filled that exalted station for upwards of thirty years with eminent ability and distinction. They have not only given general satisfaction, but the State has been boasted of their administration of her justice and proudly compared them with the head of the judiciary in the other States of the union. They have been satisfied with this less compensation for their distinguished services. With it they did not impair, but increased their fortunes from independence to great wealth.

During a part of the periods they served, money was of little value being, greatly depreciated by a bloated currency, which I hope will never occur again. The wise political economist regards money as a yard stick or pound weight; when it is made abundant by extravagant paper issues the yard stick is short, or the pound weight light and will measure or weigh but little of the necessaries of life. But now the circulating medium is scarce, there is but little paper money, and therefore money is valuable. It is to be hoped this state of things, most favorable to economy and industry, will be perpetuated. And if so, five thousand dollars will continue to be a larger salary than during the bloated years of the growth and multiplication of banks until their crash. Lest it may hereafter be otherwise, I voted for the proposition of the delegate from Baton Rouge to leave the establishment and regulation of all salaries to the general assembly, believing it moreover their appropriate duty, and that it does not belong to the Convention. The Convention have decided otherwise. And now we are to consider that money is scarce and valuable now; to hope it will continue so, so far as that scarcity results from a restricted issue of bank paper, and as we have heretofore secured the services of the best chief justices with a salary of five thousand dollars, to take it for granted that we will continue to do so hereafter.

The great argument in favor of these enormous salaries for judges is, that the public are entitled to the services of the most distinguished lawyers on the supreme bench; that those in the city of New Orleans make seven thousand dollars, and will not theretore accept of seats on the supreme bench if a smaller sum as fixed for their compensation. There is a great fallacy in this argument. It is not the most distinguished advocates, nor those who make the largest income from the profession, who would make the best judges. There are three classes of lawyers who realize large profits from their practice.

First, the brilliant advocate who, by the fascination of his eloquence, makes the worst appear the better cause; who can ensure the triumph of innocence over persecution, and even snatch from the hands of justice the wealthy criminal, who ought therefore to abandon to him half of his fortune. The sonorous voice, the elegant gesticulation, the intense passions, the nervous system of the orator, bear down in his course the feeble barriers of law and evidence, and he reaps for himself and clients the richest harvests. Such an advocate I see before me, at the very head here, and rivalling the most brilliant advocate of any other country. But such an advocate is entirely unsuited to be a judge. Those strong passions, great excitability and eager impatience that makes the advocate, disqualifies the judge. May we ever be delivered from the eloquent judge, or the storm of passion or impatience on the bench.

There is another class of money making lawyers, who are most profound in regulating and systematizing the accounts of administrators of successions, of syndics or assignees of insolvents, the partitions of partners or heirs, and in the distribution take care to distribute a large portion to themselves. Their talents are mathematical entirely. It is the talent which piles one brick on another, until a mausoleum is erected. As dull a man as I ever knew was the greatest mathematician; not a ray of genius ever illumined his perecranium. The principles of law and equity are foreign to their conceptions. Such lawyers may compass fortunes, but are unfit for judges.

There is still a third class of lawyers, who make large sums of money by investigating old titles, discovering defects in them, and embarking for the claimants for a contingent compensation generally, a half or at least a third of what is recovered. This class of lawyers make great profits, but by long practice in that description of suits, acquire a love and respect for forms and technicalities for rigorous law, as to loose all sense of equity and regard for moral right. From them the judges of the supreme court should not be selected.

What lawyers should be placed upon the highest tribunals of the State? Lawyers of good education, but who have studied the book of man as much as the books of authors written in their closets; men of clear undoubted minds, of but little imagination or excitability; great equanimity, patience and indulgence to human frailties. Lawyers habitually laborious and methodical in their profession, and especially in investigating the merits of the very case before them. They should be men of simple lives, of frugal habits, of great economy in their families, indifferent to the splendors of society and extravagant indulgencies, not only to afford an example in themselves and families to the community, but to abstract themselves from temptations and corruptions, inconsistent with their appropriate duties. Even if called from the country to this extravagant city, show no hesitation in saying they would obtain more respect, esteem and confidence, by being found at the neat, quiet and excellent but moderate boarding houses of the hundreds of widows who follow that occupation in this city, than at the splendid and extravagant St. Charles and St. Louis Hotels; and that such retirement would be far better adapted to the faithful and satisfactory discharge of their duties.

I would select the lawyer who, with a clear head and honest heart, had sought as far as possible the right side of all causes, and pursued them to a fair result and no farther, for a moderated compensation; whose soul swelled with equity, and whose mind anxiously sought for the rule of decision of the transactions and disputes of his fellow citizens, in the simple legislation of the State and decisions of its courts; the civil code of practice and statute, and our plain criminal law and reports of the decisions of our own courts; and where these failed, would look mainly to his own just heart for the solution of difficulties. The laws of God are few and simple; the laws of our State are likewise few and simple, and I trust in God will be kept so, so that all, as they are required to do, may understand them, and the plain lawyer I have described may easily interpret them.

Who was such a lawyer? The venerable, the lamented Judge Mathews, who could scarcely have made an economical living by the practice of the profession. The present chief justice of the State, a man of great learning, of deep methodical thought, of the most fearless independence and irreproachable integrity, but who could have made nothing by the practice of his profession.

But they had as their associate an advocate distinguished by brilliant talents, persuasive eloquence, and a fascinating imagination. By these advantages, united to great industry, he commanded a most lucrative practice, and made a great sacrifice by accepting a seat on the supreme bench. And now I say, without the slightest disrespect to his memory, which I revere, for I esteemed him to the day of his death, and know that he esteemed me, that he was not a good judge; that he yielded too much in his judicial career to those qualities which had distinguished himself, that having gained no doubt many, many bad causes, he did not distinguish sufficiently between what was right and wrong; what could be proved legally right secured his judgment in any case. He yielded entirely too much to technicality, and often sacrificed substantial justice to mere form. Commencing with the decision in the case of Guyiso against ————, he reared a system of technical jurisprudence by purchasers in good faith, for full consideration were evicted for mere defect of form, that was bringing total insecurity and ruin on the State, and was insupportable when he resigned. And I do believe he resigned, not from anxiety to embark in political life, but because he saw the course of his decisions becoming insupportable, and which he remedied as far as possible by the monition law, which I am told he proposed, and had friends to carry through the legislature.

From these considerations, I am persuaded a salary of five thousand dollars will always command the services of the most suitable men to be placed on the bench of the supreme court; and therefore that a greater compensation would be unnecessary and extravagant.

I am led to the same conclusion, by what I see throughout the United States. Without adverting to the moderate salaries of the supreme judges of our sister States, the chief justice of the United States receives but five thousand dollars, and his associates but four thousand: and yet, in addition to their sessions at the expensive city of Washington, they are required to travel over expensive circuits, and hold courts at the capitals of the different States, and yet congress, with all the resources of the United States, regard their salaries as adequate. The secretary of state of the United States, who has to engage in unceasing diplomatic correspondence with the talented ministers of all countries, and direct our ministers and agents all over the world, to study and regulate all our foreign intercourse and much of our domestic administration, and entertain social relations with all the agents in these departments, at the expensive city of Washington, receives but six thousand dollars. And the secretary of the treasury, charged with the collection and disbursement of the whole revenue of the United States, and the development of all her resources,—and the post-master general, with labors more herculean in the superintendence of almost an army of agents in diffusing knowledge and intelligeuce all over the United States, have each, with all the other great officers of government, but six thousand dollars compensation a year.

Mr. Ledoux: Mr. President, I owe, perhaps, an apology to the house in taking the floor after the distinguished delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston) who has just resumed his seat, but as I made the proposition which meets so strenuously his opposition, I may be pardoned to state the reasons that induced me to make it. It is a great fault, in my judgment, that both in the general and State governments the public servants of the people are not sufficiently compensated for their services: and for that reason, having served their country all their lives, at immense sacrifices, four-fifths of them die in the utmost poverty. Look at the history of our country, and you will find that to be a sad fact. I will not say, sir, that the compensation now allowed to a judge of the supreme court is inadequate to the responsible and arduous duties which he has to perform, though I admit that to be true; but I will say that it is insufficient to procure for him and his family even the necessaries of life; it is insufficient to permit him to live in the manner in which a judge of the supreme court of the State of Louisiana ought to live. Gentlemen must be aware that it is impossible for a family to live well in the city of New Orleans with less than three thousand dollars; but the judge has to hold court also in Alexandria, and in such other places as the legislature may by law determine; he has to take his family to the country during the summer months, and bring them back to the city in the fall of the year; and I risk nothing in saying that this necessary travelling consumes the balance of his total salary. Where then is he to find the means wherewith to educate his children, to render them in time capable of serving their country? Where are his hopes to leave them a fortune when he will be no more? I have been told, sir, by one of the judges of the supreme court, now sitting on that bench, whose family is not a very large one, that the actual salary, of five thousand dollars, far from being sufficeint to pay his annual expenses, that he has to take two thousand dollars from his income in order to meet these expenses; and I can assure gentlemen of the Convention that if the epithet of extravagant can be applied to any man, it will not be to him.

We were informed here, no later than yesterday, by the honorable delegate from New Orleans, on my right, (Mr. Marigny) that several of the judges of the supreme court have been compelled to resign their seats on that bench; and many eminent lawyers have refused to accept, because the salary is too small. I am not at all astonished at that, sir; and I will be less astonished to see it happen oftener in the future. There are in the Convention many very distinguished lawyers, whose practice I am informed, does not fall short of ten thousand dollars; is it to be presumed that any of them will abandon that practice for the mere honor of a seat on the supreme bench, especially when the tenure of that office is limited to eight years, as we have decided but a moment ago? Surely gentlemen do not believe that. I know myself, sir, some very distinguished and talented gentlemen, worthy in every respect to fill that responsible and important station, who would not consent to do it, on account of the salary. If it were offered to them, they would say, with Dr. Goldsmith, who being appointed professor of ancient history in one of the universities of England, an office to which great honor was attached, but no salary, declined, answering, "honors, for a man in my situation, are like ruffles for him who wants a shirt." Mr. President, there are many Goldsmiths in our country—men who are poor in what concerns the precious metal, but who are rich in intrinsical worth; men to whom the country looks with mingled pride and admiration, and in whom the people would place their love and confidence. These are the men who can serve their country well; these are the men who ought to be compensated well.

I hope, sir, that we will not prove by our actions that republics are ungrateful. I hope we will not show to the world by our conduct, that the sublime principles for which Washington drew his sword; for which Patrick Henry spoke, and Franklin wrote, and for which a host of the worthiest patriots that the world has ever seen, have fought and bled. I hope, I say, that we will not show by our conduct, that those principles are founded in error; and that our government, which results from them, is ungrateful. This would be a manifest contradiction. It would be to say that virtue, morality and justice itself is unjust; for these are the basis of our government. I hope gentlemen will consider this as a common-sense question, and not as one which ought to rest on precedence; for, if in other States, public officers are permitted to starve, it is no reason that it should be the case here. I hope that they will not be guided by motives of misplaced economy, but on the contrary, will do what in their consciences and their judgments they think is right and just.

I hope, sir, that my motion to fill the blank with "seven thousand dollars" will prevail.

Mr. Grymes said that he looked upon this matter as of great importance—perhaps the most important in its consequences that we could discuss. His adherance to the motion to fix the salary of the judges of the supreme court at seven thousand dollars, was the result of a few plain, practical principles. He did not seek to discover in which particular class of lawyers, as they had been classified by the delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston,) we should make the selection of judges. The question as to what amount of reputation this or that member of the bar may acquire in his practice, what is the amount of his fees, what particular quality might distinguish his head or his heart, and how far incompetency might result from erudition and experience, were matters with which we have nothing to do. The object he apprehended was to secure suitable persons to fill the responsible office of judge; persons in whom the public confidence could be reposed, and who were worthy of that confidence. The delegate from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) has imagined a system which is truly remarkable for novelty. He thinks that we ought to take our judges from those unpretending members of the bar, who are unable to make their living at the profession. Here is a new principle in political economy; and I would ask what is to become of the incumbent, who, after eight years of service on the bench of the highest tribunal of the country, is under the necessity of returning to his profession to make his daily bread, and to sustain himself and his family. His practice, such as it was, will be gone, and he will be without the means of acquiring an honest livelihood.

I consider property as the representative of labor. The man who works with his hands, as well as he whose mental powers are taxed, have a common object. It is to secure to themselves a reasonable amount of property, for that period of life when their physical powers and mental energies require tranquility and repose. The acquisition of property is the chief incentive to human exertion, and he who has labored to obtain it, clings to it with all the tenacity of which his nature is susceptible, and resists to the last every attempt to deprive him of its possession. The labor of all, as I have said, have a common centre; it is to secure property, labor is the great business of the world, and, in God's name, the fruits of labor ought to be adequately protected and guaranteed, and be placed beyond the power of injustice and oppression. This is the end and aim of the establishment of the judicial power. It has no other mission than to protect the rights of persons, and the rights of property. If these be desirable objects of human government, its ministers should be placed beyond the remotest possibility of suspicion; they should be adequately remunerated, and such inducements held out as to secure the services of men of superior talents and of great integrity, to administer its decrees. There is not a single tax payer who is not willing to contribute a few dollars more to secure an honest and impartial judiciary, for he knows that upon such a judiciary depends the possession and the enjoyment of his property.

The advocate is master of his own time. He may attend to his profession or not, as he chooses; he may devote his time to that particular business which he prefers; he may mix his professional pursuits with other pursuits; he may cultivate cotton or sugar, while following his profession; but the judge of the supreme court is bound to give all his time. all his energy, all his industry, to the public. All these are due to the public, and he must labor without stint and with scarcely any relaxation, in the discharge of the arduous duties he has undertaken. I would ask candid and reasonable men, whether seven thousand dollars is too much for such services? Experience has demonstrated that five thousand dollars is an indaequate compensation, for it has been with the greatest difficulty that the appointments have been made of suitable persons to hold the office. The judges are obliged to travel over the State, and have to incur the expense out of their salaries. I think that seven thousand dollars is as little as can be accorded to the chief justice, and six thousand five hundred to the associate justices. I cannot vote for less.

The question was taken on Mr. Ledoux's motion, to fix the salary of the chief justice of the supreme court at seven thousand dollars, and the ayes and nays were called for, ayes 22—nays 35.

Mr. Brent then moved to fill the blank with five thousand dollars.

Mr. C. M. Conrad said he had never heard it suggested at the bar, where he had practiced for a number of years, nor in the legislature, in which body he had had the honor of a seat on more than one occasion, that five thousand dollars was an exhorbitant salary for the Judges of the supreme court. On the contrary, he had frequently heard the opinion expressed that it was insufficient; and yet the tenure of the judicial office was for life. It seemed to him to be an irresistable conclusion, that if five thousand dollars were considered nothing more than reasonable when the office was for life, the compensation ought to be augmented now that the tenure is reduced to eight years.

The delegate from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) has made a long harrangue as to the particular class of lawyers who, in his estimation, should be placed upon the bench; and if we follow him in his remarks, it would seem that he delights in diminishing the objects that present themselves to his vision, and to look at them through the small end of the spy glass—so small and so contracted do the views which he presents appear.

Give us, says that delegate, a man of ordinary comprehension, but who has a mountain of equity in his bosom—for such a man a small compensation will suffice, inasmuch as he may board at one of the economical establishments kept by widow ladies. It seems to me (said Mr. Conrad) that a judge of the supreme court ought to be the father of a family, and not under the necessity for a matter of economy to board either in a private family or large hotel. He should reside in his own house, away from bustle and distraction, and in quiet retirement. Are five thousand dollars sufficient to providefor his wants and those of his family in a manner and style befitting his station in life? I would ask if the delegate himself, who as the attorney general, receives a salary of three thousand dollars, and has besides the opportunity of attending to a large practice, and who is allowed by law a district attoreny to assist him, and who does the drudgery of the office, whether he thinks five thousand dollars unreasonable. Has the delegate ever found his own salary of three thousand dallars too much, since he is enabled to procure the economical board with widow ladies, which he recommends to judicial patronage? I have no doubt that he thinks his compensation small enough, and that he would be the last to relinquish, willingly, one dollar of it, so long as he holds the office.

The duties of the judges of the supreme court are made more onerous than those of the attorney general. They are under the necessity of setting daily from ten until three o'clock, and have no relaxation—for when they are not in the city, they are holding court at Alexandria or Opelousas; whereas, the attorney general has a vacation of three months, and has the district attorney to represent the State, when he does not choose, or it is inconvenient for him to do so. He is therefore master of his own time, and yet he does not think three thousand dollars for himself, with perfect freedom to follow a lucrative practice, too much! But five thousand dollars, where a judge is concerned, is a most excessive salary, and ought to be cut down to a more modest standard. So says the attorney general.

What is the most remarkable in the gentleman's peculiar notions, is, that men of high intelligence are unfit to hold a seat upon the judicial bench. He thinks they ought to be excluded to make way for ordinary and common understandings. The more ignorant the man is, the better qualfied he is to discharge the functions of a judge of the supreme court. This is the logic of the delegate, and the gist of his argument is to exalt ignorance over talents. A man of superior abilities he pronounces unfit for the office! He wants a cheap judge—an ignorant man he prefers, provided he has a mountain of equity to swell his bosom. This superabundance of equity would be of very little avail to one who did not know how to apply it properly, and whose ignorance would be displayed on every occasion. For such a magistrate, five thousand dollars would be too much! But for a man of ripe judgment, an accomplished and able jurist—a man who has some reputation as a lawyer, five thousand dollars are not adequate. They are insufficient, and not in keeping with the nature and the character of the duties to be performed. The community want security; they want judges upon whom they can rely, and will never begrudge a suitable compensation to place such men upon the bench. I hope that the motion will not prevail, and that a more adequate compensation will be allowed.

Mr. Roselius said he was sorry to see a disposition manifested to adopt a system of economy, and to apply it to a branch of the government where it would be extremely mischievous to the State. The office of Judge of the supreme court required qualifications that it was difficult to meet with, and it ought to be remembered that it not only involved the duty of expounding the laws, and applying them to the matters submitted for their decision, but likewise, in a great measure, the making of laws; because in every State which exists, or may exist hereafter, the laws are divided into written and unwritten. The statutory law is the written law. The legislature lays down rules, and the judicial power developes them; and it is this which forms the jurisprudence of the country. The unwritten, or customary law, therefore, is more comprehensive than the written, or statutory law. If you ask a lawyer any given question, he will not only refer to the technical provisions of the law, but he will fortify his construction by a reference to the decisions of the tribunals of the country. Hence, the body of the law is not only confined to the civil code and the code of practice, but embraces, in this, as in other States, the decisions and expositions of the courts, upon all questions upon which may arise these statutory provisions. The rules invoked not only govern the particular cases, but all subsequent cases involving similar points, which may arise. It is folly to suppose that a man not conversant with the science of the law, is fit to be appointed to expound the law. He may fill the seat corporeally upon the bench, but for all useful purposes, you might as well substitute a man of straw. Law is not a science that is to be acquired by intuition. It requires a particular aptitude, great and continued study, and a profound and extended range of knowledge; and if you place a man upon the bench who has not the knowledge, who has not the skill to develope and apply the complicated and difficult principles of jurisprudence to the particular cases that may arise, justice will not be comprehended nor administered in a satisfactory and proper manner.

The doctrines which I have heard emitted this morning, appear to me to be so contrary to the principles upon which social order reposes, that I do not hesitate to assert that in ten years, if they were to prevail, the most complete anarchy and confusion would result in our judiciary, and we would be justly obnoxious to the anathemas of our constituents and of posterity. It is an error—a fatal and flagrant error—to suppose that a mere rectitude of purpose, if it can be obtained without intelligence and learning, will suffice to expound the laws, and to maintain them in their vigor and purity. It is essential that the judge should possess great integrity; but it is equally essential that he should possess a thorough knowledge of men and things—that he should be versed in the most difficult and abstruse of human sciences—for without a knowledge of law, how is he to comprehend and define the laws which he is called upon to interpret, and to apply, with a rare sagacity, the principles of the science, to doubtful and particular cases? Under the ægis of the law, life, liberty, property and reputation find protection; and how are these to be protected, if you commit your judiciary to incompetent and unworthy hands? Is it proposed to return to the ancient system which prevailed when Louisiana was under colonial vassalage to Spain? When the most shameful traffic attended the administration of the laws? Wherever ignorance predominates, venality and corruption are almost sure to be found.

When the constitution was formed in 1812, five thousand dollars was not deemed an immoderate compensation to the judges of the supreme court; and yet five thousand dollors at that period, may be considered the equivalent to ten thousand dollars now. If we consider the difference of labor imposed, the compensation in 1812 bears a most striking disparity to what is now proposed to be allowed. In 1813 there were but twenty-five cases to be decided in the eastern district. In in 1831 there were but ninety-eight cases on the docket; and this was considered to be a great increase by judge Porter; of whom I will take this opportunity to say, that a man of sounder, or a more comprehensive and grasping mind—one more enlightened or more upright as a magistrate, never graced the bench of this or any other State. He has shed more lustre upon our jurisprudence than any other man, with the exception of the present venerable chief justice, and his memory is embalmed in the best affections of his country. So great has been the accumulation of business since 1831, that during the last seven months, upwards of four hundred cases have been decided. And is it seriously proposed, that now that the labor is so much increased—that you have reduced the number of judges, and have attributed other important and difficult functions to them, and with the certainty that from year to year their duties will become more and more excessive, they are to have no greater salary than was allowed in 1812, and with the change of tenure in the office from life to eight years.

I am no admirer of monarchical institutions, and yet I am constrained to admit that there is no country in the world whose system of laws are better administered than those of England. Is it because her system of laws are better? No, our system is infiinitely better! How does it happen? Because the judges are selected from the ablest and most distinguished advocates; and in addition to the honor of a seat upon the bench, they receive liberal salaries. It is thus that the bench of England has been graced with such men as Mansfield, Ellenborough, Tittenden, and others of like distinction. Why, the chief justice of the Queen's Bench gets a salary of ten thousand pounds, equivalent to a salary of fifty thousand dollars of our currency. I do not refer to this for the purpose of advocating extraordinary salaries; but to show how labor is compensated elsewhere, and how desirable it is considered to obtain men of the most exalted talents for the bench, by the most liberal allowance of salary.

The arguments that I have heard this morning, induces me to believe, that one of the delegates was in earnest when he observed at Jackson, that in allowing large salaries to the judges of the supreme court, we were limiting the choice to those members of the bar that stood in the foremost rank, and were excluding all the balance, which was adopting an exclusive principle towards the more numerous class. It is true, that by allowing liberal salaries, we offer an inducement to men of talent and experience to accept the appointment, and we avoid the necessity of taking individuals totally unqualified for the station, which would invariably be the consequence of cheap and inadequate salaries. But we shall be the gainers by the restriction, if it may be so called, with monopoly in favor of talent. Economy in reference to the judiciary is totally misplaced, you may economize in every thing else, if you will, but for God's sake, do not impair this for a few thousand dollars, the efficiency of a system upon which depends millions, and not only property, but life and reputation. I hope the house will pause before they take an irretrievable step, from which the most pernicious consequences will flow.

Mr. Ratliff on behalf of the committee on contingent expenses, asked leave to audit an account of Messrs. Besangon, Ferguson & Co., printers to the Convention, for $200; which was accorded.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

Monday, April 21, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and the proceedings were opened with prayer from the Hon. Mr. Stephens.

Mr. Downs asked to be excused from serving on the committee to whom was referred the resolution of Mr. Chinn on duelling, on account of other duties. He was excused, and Mr. Lewis was appointed by the president in his stead.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the paragraph fixing the salaries of the chief justice and associate justices of the supreme court.

Mr. Brent said, I was in favor of leaving to the legislature the power to fix the salaries of judges. I thought it right and proper that that portion of the government which imposed taxation should control the public expenditures. It ought to be left in the hands of the legislature, where it is left in every constitution. I find in the constitution of the United States the following provision:

"Art. 3. Sec. 1. The judges both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior; and shall at stated times receive a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

Now, sir, I was in favor of incorporating a similar provision in this constitution; and I conceived that, had it been done, the judiciary would have been as independent of the legislative department, as it would have been, if the salary were fixed in the constitution. One strong reason which should induce us to leave it to the legislature is, that money fluctuates in value. Five thousand dollars may be an adequate compensation at present, and become exhorbitant hereafter. That, it seemed to me, would have been the wisest course; but the convention has decided otherwise, and now we are to say what shall be the salaries of our supreme judges, throughout all time to come. Three delegates from New Orleans have adduced arguments in favor of high salaries, and in the progress of their remarks, some curious facts have been elicted in relation to the practice of law in this city. They have furnished us with occasional glimpses of the ledgers, and cash accounts of the practising attorneys; and I must confess that it has disclosed a most prosperous and flourishing condition of the profession in this city. These gentlemen speak as familiarly of fees of six thousand dollars and of ten thousand dollars "as maids of thirteen do of puppy dogs." One gentleman on the opposite side of the house, (Mr. Roselius) speaks of having just received a fee of six thousand dollars; another gentleman, within my hearing, says that he has just been retained counsel in a certain suit, with a fee of four thousand dollars. Another delegate who spoke yesterday, has received, for one solitary fee, the enormous sum of sixty thousand dollars, as I have understood. Now, if the salaries of judges are to be graduated upon the scale of these exhorbitant fees; and if gentlemen are to be transferred from the bar to the bench, with such a practice as they seem to indicate, without losing anything by the operation, then it is evident that this State is doomed to hopeless and inevitable bankruptcy and ruin. While gentlemen were descanting upon the great wealth which attends the practice of the law in this city—of the vast sums which it produced, and which flowed not in small streams, but which rushed into their pockets in a torrent, I could not but reflect, that no gentlemen in the community were so ill qualified to make an estimate of the salaries which ought to be paid to our judges. These gentlemen live in a fairy land. They are treading upon carpets of gold and silver tissue, and their minds are constantly haunted by visions of splendor. But they have no thoughts of the bare walls, the rugged floors, and the scantly furnished apartments, which constitute the habitations of the industrious laborers of the soil—the very men upon whose labor this fabric of prosperity and splendor has been built. They seem to consider our people as in a flourishing and prosperous condition. The very reverse is the truth. We are not a wealthy people. We are groaning under a superincumbent pressure of debt, which sits upon our energies like an incubus. Our commercial and agricultural resources have been crippled and paralyzed, and we are but just recovering from the evils of an irresponsible banking system.

It will not be pretended that other states do not secure the best talents for their bench. It cannot be presumed, I say sir, that talents elsewhere placed upon the bench are inadequate. Some gentlemen appear to entertain the opinion that we ought to pay judges large salaries in order to enable them to make large fortunes. I object to that principle. It is not right and proper that they should accumulate large fortunes while in office.

But, admitting that the salary should be large enough to enable them to secure fortunes, then I contend that five thousand dollars is ample for that purpose. What has been our experience. We have been giving five thousand dollars to each of the judges of the supreme court. Have not some of them accumulated large fortunes? Is it not well known that there are three or four of them, who are immensely wealthy. One of them, it is said, has a fortune of half a million of dollars. Two others of them have made immense fortunes. With these facts before us, it is impossible to come to any other conclusion, than that five thousand dollars is amply adequate for every purpose for which a salary should be required. It is true, that if the judges live in magnificent style and with extraordinary splendor, five thousand dollars is inadequate. But do we desire this extravagance, for which the people are to be sorely taxed? Would we not rather see our judges practice economy and frugality, and set a good example to the rising generation of the country? We should not wish to furnish them with salaries to enable them to act otherwise.

One of the delegates last Saturday, alluded to a fact which exhibited that great reforms were needed for the judiciary. He said that there was a feeling of apprehension, of growing alarm, in relation to the judiciary; that the public confidence was unsettled in it. But, he seemed to think that this originated from the circumstance that the judiciary had not been sufficiently remunerated. If with a salary of five thousand dollars the judges have been enabled to make fortunes, I cannot see how it can be urged that the salary is insufficient. I cannot conceive that the salary has any thing to do with the fact to which that delegate alluded. I only refer to what he said, as settling the mooted question, whether reforms be necessary in the judiciary, or not. The delegate was right. There is a feeling of distrust and a want of confidence in the judiciary, but he is wrong in tracing it to its source. It can be traced, and it will be traced, to another and a different source. The cause lies deeper, and the remedy is to be found in a different direction than in an increase of the salaries of judges, and in allowing them an extravagant remuneration for their services.

The North American sun does not shine upon a people who are taxed more heavily than the people of Louisiana. Upon an average, each citizen pays a tax of two dollars, while in some States the average is fourteen cents a head. To hear gentlemen talk, one would suppose that our treasury was overflowing with the riches of the world; that money grew upon the trees, that we were the possessors of the mines of Peru, and the quicksilver mines of Mexico. Gentlemen have a very incorrect notion of the true position of the people of Louisiana. What are we to gain by allowing exorbitant salaries? They seem to think that all you have to do, is to place a man upon the bench, and fill his pockets with money, and instantly he is endowed with the virtues of Jacob and the wisdom of Solomon. It is a great error to suppose that we must pay high salaries, or else we must do without good judges. These high salaries are unsuited to the condition of the country. Can we expect, or is it necessary, to get better talents than are secured in our sister States? Where do gentlemen carry us, to show that we ought to pay exorbitant salaries? To England. We have been told, that in England the lord high chancellor gets ten thousand pounds sterling—about fifty thousand dollars—per annum. Are we to go to England for examples? Why not go to the confederated States of the Union? Why go to England? I object to it. No man has a greater respect for the people of England than I have, but I draw a material distinction between the people and the government of that country. Every thing connected with her government depends upon show and pageantry. It seems necessary that there should be pomp and glitter to dazzle the eyes of the people, and to make the incumbents of office respected. I object to following in the footsteps of England, but I will appeal to the governments of this country, and ask if there is a single judicial functionary in any of the States of the Union, receiving the exorbitant salaries advocated on this floor. Let us look at the fact: In Maine, the judges of the supreme court receive one thousand eight hundred dollars per annum; in New Hampshire, one thousand four hundred dollars; in Vermont, one thousand three hundred and seventy-five dollars; in Massachusetts, three thousand dollars; in Rhode Island, six hundred and fifty dollars; in Connecticut, one thousand one hundred dollars; in New York, three thousand dollars; in New Jersey, one thousand five hundred dollars; in Pennsylvania, two thousand four hundred dollars; in Maryland, two thousand two hundred dollars; in Virginia, two thousand five hundred dollars; in South Carolina, three thousand dollars; in Georgia, two thousand one hundred dollars; in Alabama, two thousand two hundred and fifty dollars; in Mississippi, three thousand dollars; in Arkansas, one thousand eight hundred dollars; in Kentucky, one thousand five hundred dollars; in Ohio one thousand five hundred dollars; in Michigan, one thousand six hundred dollars; in Missouri, one thousand one hundred dollars.

New York is one of the few States where the salary allowed to the judges of the supreme court, is three thousand dollars. There are on the bench of that State three judges; making only nine thousand dollars for the expense of that tribunal. New York has a population as large as that of the thirteen confederated States during the revolutionary war. She has immense wealth and resources and yet she pays but three thousand dollars to each of the judges of her supreme court, while we are called upon to allow seven thousand dollars and to appoint four judges, making a total of twenty-eight thousand dollars for what costs in the State of New York but nine thousand dollars. And yet Louisiana is but a small and insignificant State in point of wealth and population as compared with the great empire State of New York and her resources are infinitely less. But this is not all. The judges of the supreme court of the United States receive a salary of but four thousand five hundred dollars, the chief Justice receives five thousand dollars. Will it be pretended that it is inadequate, when it has secured the services of such men as Marshall, Taney and Story? Will it be pretended that it is inadequate in Louisiana, and that the services of any judges that we can get in Louisiada, are worth more than the services of those distinguished men? Gentleman have nothing to proceed upon. Their apprehensions are illusory and there is nothing to justify such extravagance.

A delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad,) has said that there are no complaints against allowing judges the high salaries claimed for them on this floor, he says, that he has never seen a man, who has seen a man, that complained of these salaries. I do not know how it may be in New Orleans. I can very well supppose from the inflated ideas that I have heard of the value of professional services in the city, that there are no complaints, and I am ready to take the statement of the delegate, as applying to the city. In reference to the country I know that there are general complaints. The people of the country expect a reduction of salaries indispensable to a reduction of the burthens of taxation; and if retrenchment begins, they expect it to begin with the judiciary. We have been sent here to correct abuses, not to add to them. The people expect us to begin the work of retrenchment and economy. They expect a new order of things; that profligacy and extravagance in the public expenditures should be arrested. They can see no good reason why our judges and other officers should receive higher salaries than are allowed to similar officers, in our sister States. We are not a wealthy people, and yet gentlemen are not satisfied that we pay more than double, upon the average, than is paid by any State in the Union, be her population and resources what they may. They insist upon our increasing the public expenditure. If the salaries allowed by the Convention of 1812 have given great dissatisfaction, how can gentlemen expect that the people will submit to further exactions. It does not become the simplicity and economy of a republican government to pay exorbitant salaries to its public officers. It may suit the splendid government of England, but not a simple and unpretending government like this. It is not in keeping with republican institutions.

I shall vote to give the chief justice of our supreme court five thousand dollars and the associate judges four thousand five hundred dollars. This is precisely what is allowed to the judges of the supreme court of the United States, and is more than is allowed by any State in the Union. I think it quite sufficient to give efficiency to the system, and no body can accuse of us of being niggardly and penurious. in the payment of salaries like these.

Mr. Soule had a few observations to make. He had not intended to have raised his voice, from motives which would no doubt be appreciated. But he was relieved from any delicacy he may have felt by the anathema, or he might rather call it the denunciation of incapacity which had been pronounced against him by his friend from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston). He was therefore disinterested, taking it for granted that he would ever be unfit to be a judge, and was disconnected with any salary that may be connected with the office.

He had been among the most fervent opponents of the life-tenure to the judicial office. He had recorded his vote to fix the term of service of the judges of the highest tribunal at eight years. In so doing, his object was to submit the judiciary to the control of the people—that as servants of the people they should be responsible to the people for their continuance in office. We have obtained in this a great point, and he conceived that the constituency would be satisfied. We have made the judiciary effective, and we have preserved its independence and dignity. It would be but poor economy, for a few thousand dollars, to deprive the State of an unrestricted choice. He was willing to concede to the delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston) that men of the most brilliant talents were not perhaps the best qualified to fill the office of judge; it might be as that delegate had assumed, and he was ready to admit that in men of less brilliant endowments, as sound judgments might be found as in those of greater brilliancy. But be that as it may, humble as may be the pretensions of the individual selected to be judge, and which after all was a question devolving upon executive responsibility, the incumbent, whoever he may be, ought to have his existence secured beyond the reach of want. He ought to be enabled to look forward for the support of his family when his term of office shall expire. He should be placed in a position to meet the contingency of a removal. His re-appointment, it is true, is possible, but it depends upon the will, if not upon the caprice of the governor and the senate. If you place the salary at six thousand dollars, and compute the necessary expenses of the judge with the utmost economy, little will remain at the end of the year to be put aside. Not that he should live like a nabob, but that he should live like a gentleman and be considered such.

I agree, said Mr. Soulè, with the delegate from Rapides, (Mr. Brent) that in other States, the salaries of judges are inferior to those allowed in this State. If the judges in Louisiana could be placed in the same position with reference to the relative value of their salaries as the judges elsewhere, I would join my friend and colleague from Rapides, in allowing them the same amount of salary. I would ask it of the candor of the gentleman, whether, with six thousand dollars, a judge in Louisiana can better provide for his wants, who is under the necessity of residing eight months in the year in the city of New Orleans, than a judge who receives three thousand dollars in New York for his services? My own opinion is in the negative. There is not a State nor a city in the Union as expensive for living as Louisiana and New Orleans. It is known that a man with a family living in decent style, cannot expend less than four thousand dollars per annum. If you add to these necessary expenses for a limited family, the expenses for making a circuit, five hundred dollars, the amount will be four thousand five hundred dollars; and assuming this to be but a reasonable estimate, there would be but five hundred dollars economised during the year. Can you expect men of talents, of a high judicial station for so small an amount as that. I do not wish the office to be accepted on account of the high salary attached to it. That is not the question. If you are bound to compensate your judges, give them a reasonable and just compensation.

The gentleman from Rapides (Mr. Brent) has asserted that two of the judges of the supreme court have made a considerable fortune. One of them, and I presume he refers to Chief Justice Martin, has amassed, he says, a fortune of half a million of dollars, without inquiring how he became possessed of this amount; but all who know the man will admit that it was by all honorable means, we may ask the question, how is it possible that he could have realized so large a fortune? He has been judge for thirty or thirty-two years, and the total amount of his salary for that period would be one hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

Mr. Brent: what becomes of the compound interest.

Mr. Soule: I will come to that presently. The gentleman alluded to is not a shaver. In the hardest times he has been a generous lender, and has invariably refused to take usurious interest. But admitting that he had placed his money at compound interest, it would be difficult for him to have thus placed all his salary, for he must have expended some of it for his support, and he must have incurred some losses; so that at the rate of ten per cent. it never could amount to half a million of dollars. How many judges are there who hold their offices for thirty-two years? We may conclude that the surmise is idle and the hypothesis not presumable, that a judge with six or eight thousand dollars salary will acquire a fortune with the tenure of office limited to eight years. To enable us to make the choice of capable men, who will accept of the arduous duties of judge, we must attach an appropriate salary to the office. As to the fees derived by members of the bar, whose services are in demand, that has nothing to do with the salary to be allowed the judges. I may, however, remark that a salary of six thousand dollars will not prove a great temptation to the bar of New Orleans; few will accept the office with that salary in the city, and the bar of the city will not be in the way of the distinguished lawyers of the country. We have made the experiment in the last four or five years, and have found but few persons willing to accept the office. Of those who accepted, two withdrew and could not be prevailed upon to return. Of the five thousand dollars paid to each of the judges, the city of New Orleans and the surrounding parishes pay one-half. The salary has never been considered excessive in this part of the country. On the contrary, it has been considered too little. Elsewhere there may have been complaints, and I have no doubt of the fact, the moment I heard it from so respectable a source as the gentleman from Rapides. Suppose we do economise some three thousand dollars, and to do this we run the risk of getting incompetent persons, what is that amount when distributed all over the State. To the tax payers it will be of little consequence. A moment's reflection will show that it is of but little import to the people in reference to their taxation, while it is of the highest importance to the administration of justice throughout the State. I think, therefore, that the most rigid economist should be satisfied with restricting the salary of the chief justice to six thousand dollars, and each of the associate judges to five thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. Marigny: the honorable gentleman from Rapides (Mr. Brent) has taken the trouble to make a comparative statement, showing what is paid by the several States of the Union to their supreme judges, and he attaches great weight to the fact that in

New York, but thirty-five hundred dollars are allowed to the judges of the supreme court. But the gentleman ought to have told us, the causes of this difference, and then, perhaps he would have been less ready in his deductions. There are in the States which he has named, more lawyers than in the state of Louisiana, and the practice of a lawyer in those States is worth less. Scarcely the most eminent counsel make an income of more than from three to four thousand dollars per annum, and there is nothing remarkable in their accepting the office of judge for life, with a salary of three thousand five hundred dollars. Mr. Webster was satisfied with a fee of five hundred dollars, when counsel in the State for the same cause, obtained one hundred and thirty thousand dollars. Inasmuch as lawyers obtained higher fees in Louisiana than elsewhere, and inasmuch as the expenses of living are much greater, it is plain that the salaries of judicial officers must bear a relative proportion with the value of services at the bar.

The gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) really astonishes me by the flights of his imagination. I really believe that if he had his way he would create the government in the regions of the clouds. He has favored us with a criticism upon talent, and thinks that the most competent person to be appointed judge is he who is the most obscure, and has the smallest share of abilities for the profession of the law. The man who was starving at his profession, would make, according to his logic, the best judge.

How is it that he cannot discover the dilemma in which he is placed by his mania for economy, and for placing the offices of the country at the disposition of the lowest bidder; either the attorney of whom he speaks, is an honest man, or is not an honest man. If he be an honest man, he will not accept an office for which he knows he is incompetent; and if he is not an honest man, how can his presumption justify the theory of the gentleman from Jefferson. I sincerely hope that sound reason will prevail over propositions which have no other effect than to compromit the dignity of the judiciary, and the interest of the public. The Convention cannot double, nay triple, the business of the judges of the supreme court, on the one hand, and on the other refuse to give them a suitable compensation. It is composed, in a great measure, of delegates whose consituents pay three-fourths of the amount which is annually contributed to the treasury of the State, and it is to be presumed that the majority will consent less from courtesy than from a desire to fulfil a sacred obligation, to protect the rights of property in our courts of justice. Where shall we, in fact, place the guarantees for property, if after establishing the executive and the legislative departments upon the unqualified rights of suffrage, we do not consecrate a place of refuge for property in the temple of justice.

The Convention in 1812, prepared a constitution, of which ours has neither the merit nor the wisdom which prescribed that the judiciary should be in possession of entire independence; and as one of the means to effect that purpose, it provided that each of the judges of the supreme court should receive a salary of five thousand dollars per annum; a sum which is equal to ten thousand dollars at the present day. The consequence has been that we have had one of the most distinguished tribunals throughout the country. But it may be told that it is not the salary that makes the merit of the man who may fill the seat. That I readily grant, but it is evident that unless you allow a reasonable compensation, no man of any standing will accept the appointment. I caution the majority of the Convention to beware. If property holders find that there is no protection for the stable interest of the country, you may rely upon it they will vote for the rejection of your constitution, and in so doing, they will treat it as it deserves.

Mr. Downs said he did not intend to make a speech, but to give briefly the reasons which would actuate his course upon this occasion. He would acknowledge at first, that he intended to have voted for allowing the same salary that is now accorded to the judges of the supreme court, by the constitution of 1812. After very matured deliberation, he had concluded, that inasmuch as the life tenure was reduced to eight years, six thousand dollars was not too much compensation. It should also be borne in mind, that a system of rotation will necessarily have to be established; the term of the judges first appointed will serve but to four, six and eight years. I have not heard it stated that there has been general complaints throughout the State, against the salaries allowed to the judges of the supreme court, nor do I believe such to be the case. There has been a great feeling manifested in the public mind that the judiciary should be submitted to reform, and one of the objects deemed the most essential to reform, was to do away with the life-tenure of the judges, which precluded responsibility; and by restricting their terms of service to short periods, make them directly amenable to the public control. I do not think that the people will begrudge them a fair salary, and it is quite evident that six thousand dollars, where the office is limited to eight years, is in fact less than a salary of five thousand dollars for life. We have had, in addition to the supreme court, another court of appellate jurisdiction for criminal matters, at an expense of fifteen hundred dollars per annum. By the attribution of duties under the new constitution to the supreme court, the court of errors in criminal matters will be superseded, and these fifteen hundred dollars may well enough be added to the salaries of the supreme judges by the reduction of the number of the judges to four of that court, and allowing them the small increase which is asked, there will be still an economy for the State. We should also take into consideration the saving which will result in the expenses for the criminal jurisdiction; we shall find that we are considerable gainers by the change. The expenses for the criminal proceedings of the country have been very excessive. I recollect, when I was on a committee of the legislature, that the amount incurred for this branch of the public service, was sixty thousand dollars. I have no doubt that the average would range as high as one hundred thousand dollars. This amount could be reduced to one-half by an active and efficient administration, which is one of the principal results that we anticipate from the new system. The business will be rapidly and speedily done.

But what, after all, is the matter of controversy, at best. My friend from Rapides is willing to leave the salaries of the judges of the supreme court as it is fixed in the constitution of 1812; the amount involved is about two thousand five hundred dollars per annum, which, if distributed among all the people of the State, would require an additional contribution of about one cent a head—less than one cent. Well, in an object so desirable as to obtain competent and efficient judges, in whom the public confidence may be reposed, is that a matter of moment? But I may be told that in my calculation, poor persons, who do not contribute to the taxes of the country, are to be excluded. Making a liberal deduction for that class, I will put the estimate at ten cents a head, and I would ask if each tax payer would not prefer to make the sacrifice of so small an amount, to have an earnest that the judiciary would be elevated above want and above suspicion. What is ten cents? we give it for a glass of lemonade, or a glass of ice cream, and we think nothing of it.

It has always seemed to me that we do not fully appreciate the power of the supreme court; it is the most vast and uncontrollable branch of the judiciary. To it are submitted questions of law and fact, and its decisions are final. They are absolute. Even in England there is an appeal from the court of King's bench. So great is the power of our supreme court that at an early period of our political existence, one of the most distinguished legists, Mr. Livingston, having had cause to complain of the great injustice done to him in one of the decisions of that court, asked the intervention of the legislature, but they replied, and very properly, that the power resided in the judiciary, and that they had no right to interfere with that branch of the government. We may say what we please. Public opinion are in favor of the decrees of the court, and, conceived to be whatever is done by the judges is properly done; and therefore if a man be ruined by some inconsiderate judgment, the judges are no less placid nor less esteemed because they may have inflicted the grossest injustice. It is a mistake to suppose that it is only those who are involved in litigation that are interested in having an upright and efficient judiciary. Those who never have a suit, and are averse to litigation have a deep and abiding stake in the character and standing of the judiciary. Circumstances may arise which may involve them in law suits, and they will then feel the importance of having judges in whom they can repose their confidence; at any rate, it is plain that the property-holders are those most deeply interested in the existence of an efficient judiciary: and inasmuch as they are disposed to tax themselves a little more in order to give such salaries as they think will conduce to the independence of the judges, those who contribute but little and have but little or no property involved, should not interfere.

Mr. Scott of Baton Rouge said that he rose merely to make a few observations. He did not concur with those who had argued that to get competent persons to fill the office of judge, it was essential to allow exorbitant salaries; salaries, which were disproportioned to the resources of the State, and to the means of the people. The fact was that the State paid higher salaries to her public officers, and her citizens contributed a larger share of taxation for the support of their local government, than any State in the Union. Gentlemen argued upon the assumption that Louisiana was a rich State, that her resources were without limitation. This is not the case; our State is poor, very poor, but if that even were not so, surely a higher compensation ought not to be asked than is accorded to the judges of the federal courts; to the judges of the supreme court. He concurred fully in the arguments of the delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent.) If economy and retrenchment are to be observed, we should make no exceptions; begin as well with the judiciary as the other departments of the government. He could not vote for more than five thousand dollars.

The question was taken upon six thousand five hundred dollars for the chief justice, and the yeas and nays were called for; ayes 23 nays 32.

Mr. Benjamin said that inasmuch as there was so much difference of opinion, he would not insist, nor did he expect to carry his own views. But he would be willing to meet gentlemen who entertained contrary opinions to his own upon a compromise. The reasons which operated upon his mind, had on another occasion been expressed by the delegate from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston) which he would beg leave to read to the Convention. The arguments of that delegate were so conclusive as to dispense with the necessity of saying anything further on the subject.

Mr. Benjamin here read the extract referred to. He would propose five thousand to the chief justice, and six thousand five hunderd dollars to the associate justices.

Mr. Bent could see no necessity for allowing a larger salary to the judges of the supreme court, than were allowed to the judges of the supreme court of the United States. It would not surely be pretended that the State of Louisiana was richer than the United States.

Mr. Roselius could not but express surprise that any comparison should be made between the salaries allowed to our judges and to those allowed to the judges of the supreme court of the United States. The chief justice of the United States was not bound to reside in any particular place, nor was he bound to remain upon the bench from one end of the year to the other. He was only required to sit once a year for a period of three or four months. The expenses for living were much less in Baltimore and in its vicinity than in New Orleans. But he did not propose to enter into the argument, because it appeared that the minds of the majority were not to be effected by arguments, however strong they may be. I will simply remark in conformation of what fell from the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs,) that persons of wealth of large property, are disposed to contribute liberally in order to have an effective and irreproachable judiciary. I had a conversation upon this very subject with the wealthiest man in Louisiana. The man who pays the greatest amount of taxes to the treasury, and who is one of the most prudent of men; I allude to John McDonough whose immense fortune has been acquired by his thrift and industry. He pays ten thousand dollars of taxes into the treasury per annum. He took me by the hand and implored me for God's sake to do all I could to secure an effective judiciary. He considered that our lives, our property, and honor depended upon the judiciary. He thought that seven thousand dollars per annum, were not enough, and that we would not be able to find a capable judge, possessing all the necessary guarantees, under ten thousand dollars. Here is a man of immense wealth, ready to contribute his portion of the taxationf which is immense, to allow the judge ten thousand dollars. This opinion of Mr. McDonough is concurred in by every man of property. Let me be permitted to make one solitary observation. The gentleman from Jefferson has argued upon the different classes of lawyers. He has placed in one of his categories of those unfit for the station of judge, men of powerful eloquence, and he took the liberty to designate my excellent friend and colleague (Mr. Soulé,) as one of these. In the other class, which he thinks the best qualified to be members of the judiciary, are persons of the least experience in the legal profession. Now let us call experience to our aid in resolving this matter: suppose any gentleman was involved in a serious charge, effecting his life or his honor, to whom would he apply for assistance and counsel. Would he apply to the cheap class of lawyers, those of no experience,and such as form the beau-ideal of my friend from Jefferson, (Mr. Preston) who would charge a fee of fifty dollars, or would he apply to the other class of lawyers, who for the identical same services charge him one thousand dollars. To whom would he go? Would he go to a lawyer who would charge him the same ratio as a tailor or a shoemaker for the manual labor performed. Or would he go to the lawyer whose eminent talents entitled him to a larger fee? A practice of seventeen years at the bar, authorizes me to say that in criminal as well as civil matter, suiters will apply to the most skilful lawyers, conceiving them the most able. If this be the general rule, and if individuals are disposed to pay liberally for talent,why should not the same thing exist in reference to the officers to be employed by the State. It is a bad argument to say that we must put up with mediocrity, and even less than mediocrity, for fear of impoverishing the treasury of the State.

Mr. Chinn said he was one of the oldest immigrants of the State. He was here before the promulgation of the constitution, and thought he was as familiar with public sentiments as any one. He could conscientiously declare, that he had never met with any one, either rich or poor, who considered the compensation now allowed exhorbitant. Moreover, any one who will reflect upon the subject calmly, must come to the conclusion, that we shall in the end be losers, by fixing the salaries of judges at an insufficient amount; for the inevitable consequence will be to place incompetent persons upon the bench, and bring the judiciary into disrepute.

Mr. C. M. Conrad whould make a few remarks. When the other departments of the government were under consideration, and when property was deprived of all guaranties, we were told by members who favored that course of proceeding, that we should find ample protection in the judiciary. But it seems that the changes in this department are not less radical than in the others. I may say they are more radical. We have reduced the life tenure of the judges of the highest tribunal to but eight years, and have subjected to periodical change, the whole judicial department. Is not this going as far as we should be expected to go? Ought there not to be some assurance, some guaranty, for the independence of the judiciary, and the judges be placed, not only beyond want, but beyond the suspicion of want? Those who contribute to the taxes of the country; those who have property at stake, know full well the value of an independent judiciary, and they are anxious to make sacrifices to obtain it; because it is essential to the possession and enjoyment of their property. The supreme court of the State pronounces upon a greater amount of property than all the other courts in the States of Georgia, South Carolina, and Virginia. The accumulation of legal business in that tribunal is immense. A great portion of the legal business of the other States, upon attachments, finds its way into that court, and has to be settled there. We have been referred to the salary of the judges of the supreme court for a precedent. There is no analogy. The office of chief justice of the supreme court of the United States is one of the highest. It may be said to be next to that of the President, and it is sought for in reference to the distinction. The salary was fixed at the inception of our government, and it has remained as a matter of course, ever since. But it has been deemed to be totally disproportioned with the importance and the dignity of the office. We have increased the labors of our supreme court, and I really consider that six thousand dollars is less salary for eight years, than five thousand dollars under the old constitution.

The question was then taken upon Mr.

Benjamin's motion, and it was carried—ayes 29, nays 27.

The question recurring on the salary of the associate judges,

Mr. Dunn said he could not see why there should be any distinction between the salaries. The duties of the associate judges are the same as those of the chief justice. He moved to allow them the same compensation.

Mr. Humble said he was opposed to making any distinction between the judges; but he thought six thousand dollars was too much.

The ayes and nays were called for upon Mr. Dunn's motion—ayes 24, nays 30.

Mr. Claiborne moved to fix the salaries of the sasociate judges at five thousand five hundred dollars. With that view he had voted with the majority on the last question.

Mr. Rosalius said he would vote in the affirmative; but he considered that amount by no means an adequate compensation for good judges.

The ayes and nays were called for on Mr. Conrad's motion—ayes 29, nays 27.

Mr. Brent gave notice that he would move for the reconsideration of this vote. It would cause a great deal of dissatisfaction among the people.

Mr. Barigny gave notice that he would move for a reconsideration of the vote allowing seven thousand dollars to the chief justice of the supreme court, as he was convinced that a majority of the people, and of the convention, were in favor of a proper remuneration for the members of the judiciary.

Mr. O'Bryan moved to strike out the words "nominated by the governor," and to substitute the words "elected by the people."

Mr. Conrad moved to lay this motion on the table, subject to call.

Mr. Miles Taylor said he was opposed to the election of the judges, especially of the supreme court. This was the first time that the proposition to elect the judges had been made, and he was reluctant to stifle discussion; he would therefore vote against the motion to lay on the table, inasmuch as it would effectually cut off debate.

Mr. Saunders would vote no, for the same reason.

The ayes and nays were called for—36 ayes, 20 nays.

Mr. Soule moved, as a substitute for the balance of the section, to come in before the words "the said judges," the following:

The power of nomination, so far as relates to judges, shall be exercised by the governor, in the following manner: The governor shall designate, and present to the senate, three capable persons, versed in the laws, and who shall have practiced at least five years in the courts of the State, for all judicial offices; and the senate shall proceed to select one from the three persons thus designated and presented, and shall vote upon said selection viva voce, and with open doors, provided, that no nomination shall be approved without the concurrence of a majority of all the members composing the senate; and provided, moreover, that the judge whose term of office may expire, shall be one of the three persons presented by the governor for the choice of the senate. After three unsuccessful ballottings to make a choice, it shall be the duty of the governor to designate and present three other persons, and successively to present the same number, until a choice may have been effected.

Mr. Soule said that the question would be on the striking out.

Mr. Guion thought it was not necessary to strike out. We could adopt the section, and the discussion upon the proposition would come up more appropriately in another place.

Mr. Soule: I yield very willingly.

Mr. Peets moved that the judges be elected by the two houses of the legislature, on joint ballot.

Mr. Preston moved to amend that portion of the original section, relative to clerks, by prescribing that they should not be related by blood or marriage, to either of the judges.

Mr. Beatty thought that if this amendment were to prevail, it ought to be restricted some reasonable degree.

Mr. Roselius said that he objected to so sweeping a clause. Moreover, he was a firm believer in the Bible; and as we were all descended from Adam, we were thereall relations.

Mr. C. M. Conrad said that some restriction, at any rate, was necessary, upon this provision, in a country where we were so much interfixed by marriages.

Mr. Beatty suggested the fourth degree.

Mr. Chinn proposed an amendment. He was averse to the provision; thinking it worse than useless, if not ridiculous. But to give it a more determinate character, he would propose that the exclusion should only apply to the son, brother, and son-in-law of either of the judges.

Mr. Eustis would submit one or two observations. In a country where relations of families were so extended, it was almost impossible that some one of the judges should not be related, in some way, to a person who might be very competent to fill the office of clerk. Consequently the proposition of the delegate from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) would operate as an exclusion of the residents of the country, and in favor of strangers. Moreover, it was casting a stigma upon the honor and disinterestedness of the judges, to restrict them in that way. If you can't trust your judges, to whom you confide the most important of your interests, to appoint a clerk, why, take away the power, and place it some where else. If that be the sense of the convention, I say let it be done. It is infinitely better than this proposition.

Mr. Brent was in favor of the adoption of the proposition. He thought the judges might abuse the discretionary power. In one district, to his knowledge, a clerk was imported from another district and appointed, because he was the brother-in-law of one of the judges, and the son-in-law of another. There were men in the district more competent to fill the office. He was in favor of incorporating this provision in the constitution, because he thought the judges would abuse the power. It was not necessary to fix the degree of relationship; if it could be traced, the individual ought to be excluded from receiving the appointment. The code of practice made it a good ground to excuse the judge, if he was related to either of the parties. He could see no good reason why the proposition should not prevail.

Mr. Roselius responded that he could see nothing wrong in a judge appointing one of his relations, provided he had the necessary capacities, and was worthy of the public confidence. We have two striking examples that such appointments have given universal satisfaction. Judge Lewis appointed one of his sons clerk of the district court, and he has proved a most efficient officer, and has won the esteem of the entire community. Judge Pitot did the same thing in relation to the parish court, and the same remark will apply to that gentleman. He has also proved a most excellent officer. As for the abuse of the power, none such has ever yet come under my observation. On the contrary, I am aware that at the death of Mr. Cuvillier, clerk of the supreme court, his deputy was appointed, unanimously, by the judges, although there were among the candidates, several relations of the judges. At any rate, this clause may be regarded as unconstitutional, since it excludes a portion of the community from holding an office, upon no other ground than because they happen to be related to one of the judges; no matter how remote the relationship may be.

Mr. C. M. Conrad thought this was discussing upon a very small matter. We did not think fit to place a similar restriction upon the executive power. Why should we place it upon the judicial power? What harm, or evil is there in the governor, or in the judge, appointing one of his relations to office, provided he be capable and honest. Even the great Washington, himself, the father of his country, appointed his nephew a judge of the supreme court of the United States. This was one of the best appointments that was ever made; for Bushrod Washington was one of the very ablest judges that have graced that bench. The only question in which the community are interested, is as to the capacity of the clerk. It is a matter of no moment to them, if he be capable, and efficient, whether he be related to one of the judges or not. As it is not presumable that any person who may become an applicant for clerk, will be related to all the judges, or even a majority of them, it is not likely that any one will be appointed solely with reference to the accident of consanguinity. For the convention to attempt to legislate upon such a subject, appeared to him to be idle; he was almost going to say, ridiculous.

Mr. Preston said that this might appear to be a very small matter, and I should not have proposed it had I anticipated so much debate. Nevertheless I think it expedient, and I shall press it upon the consideration of the Convention, because I am convinced that if it depends upon the legislature, and I draw my inference from the past, nothing will be done. The fact related by the delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent) is entitled to some weight in consideration of this matter. I admit that the two appointments mentioned by the delegate from New Orleans were most excellent; but this proves nothing, and the reverse might just as well have been the result. I think that the interest of the whole community demand that there should not be a concentration of offices in one and the same family. Is it not enough that one of the family should be appointed to the office of judge, without leaving it optional with him to fill all the subordinate stations with his sons, nephews and brothers? Suppose for a moment, that a clerk neglects his duties, and that he is the son of the judge; how is an attorney to bring the dereliction to the notice of the judge, and how is the latter to judge impartially in the case, or to take the necessary measures to have his son removed if it be necessary? It is altogether out of the question. I should feel great reluctance to bring such a matter before the attention of the judge. In such cases it is better to follow the Lord's prayer, "lead us not into temptation but deliver us from evil."

Mr. Sellers called for the previous question, which was ordered, and the question recurring on the adoption of Mr. Preston's proposition, it was lost—yeas 13, nays 40.

Mr. Brent then moved that the section be laid upon the table, together with the amendment offered by Mr. Peets for the election of judges by the legislature on joint ballot; and the proposition of Mr. O'Bryan that they be elected by the legally qualified voters, stating that it was his intention to address the Convention in favor of the latter proposition.

Mr. Beatty proposed the following additional section, viz:

At the first appointment of judges of the supreme court under this constitution, the chief justice shall be appointed for eight years, one of the associate judges shall be appointed for six years, one for four years, and one for two years; and in case of the death, resignation or removal of any one of said judges, his successor shall be appointed only to fill out the remainder of the term, so that the time of service of none of said judges shall expire at the same time.

Mr. Marigny was averse to appointing said judges for two, four and six years. He thought they should be appointed for eight years, to give stability to the decisions, and to settle, at least for eight years at a time, what would be the law. Another inconvenience would result, and that would be, that no man of talents and standing would accept of the office for so limited a period.

Mr. Benjamin explained to his colleague that it was indispensable to establish this system of rotation, and that the probabilities were in favor of the re-appointment of the incumbents. If they were all to go out at the expiration of eight years, the change would be too great and sudden, and the jurisprudence of the country would be subjected to violent innovations.

Mr. Marigny responded that he fully understood the question, and he thought his objection a valid one.

The question was taken on Mr. Beatty's proposition, and the yeas and nays were called for—yeas 45, nays 9.

The Convention then took up section fourth, as follows:

Sec. 4. The supreme court shall hold its sessions in the city of New Orleans, from the month of November to the month of June inclusive. The legislature shall have power to fix the sessions elsewhere, during the rest of the year. Until otherwise provided, the sessions shall be held in New Orleans.

Mr. Lewis moved to amend by striking out the words "in New Orleans," and substituting "as heretofore."

Mr. Roselius stated that it was the desire of several members of the judiciary committee, that the sessions of the supreme court shall be held entirely in the city of New Orleans. A great deal of time was lost to the court in travelling from parish to parish, and it was very difficult for the judges to obtain access to the necessary books which they needed in the examination of cases, out of the city. In several of the States, the supreme court was permanently located at the seat of government.

Mr. GARRETT said that the arrangement heretofore had was excessively inconvenient. The court was held at Alexandria, at a sickly season of the year, and there was greater inconvenience in going to that place, than coming to the city of New Orleans. For persons residing in his section of the country, this was especially the case; they had to ride a considerable distance, and were illy prepared to carry along the books to which they intended to refer. He thought it best to leave the discretion with the legislature, to hold the sessions of the court elsewhere than in New Orleans, as they should think most expedient hereafter.

Mr. BRENT was opposed to any thing of the kind. He had no objections to the people of the Ouachita district bringing their appeals to the city if they thought proper; but he wished for the convenience of his constituents that the sessions of the supreme court should be held at Alexandria, as heretofore. He would therefore sustain the motion of the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis). The yellow fever prevailed at New Orleans at the period when the supreme court held its sessions at Alexandria and Opelousas; and if the court did not avail itself of that period to visit the country, these four months would be lost.

Mr. DOWNS said that it was excessively inconvenient for persons residing in his section of the country, to attend the sessions of the supreme court at Alexandria. It was preferable that their appeals should be brought to the city of New Orleans. He remembered that when he was a resident of the Florida parishes, he was very anxious, with many others, to obtain an annual session of the supreme court there. The attempt succeeded, and the court was required by law to meet in the town of Baton Rouge. It was found upon experience not to answer, and ever since the appeals from Florida have been brought to the city. It was much better to hold the sessions in the city, and that fact was evidenced by greater weight being attached to the city decisions than were attached to the country decisions. The latter usually were made in great haste and with little research, and under the utmost anxiety of body and of mind.

Mr. SELLERS confirmed the remarks of Mr. Downs. Legal men in his section of the country were in favor of bringing the appeals to the city, on the score of greater convenience.

Mr. PORTER thought that the supreme court should hold its sessions at the seat of government; and inasmuch as the sense of the people had pronounced against the city of New Orleans for the seat of government, wherever that seat of government were permanently located, that would be the proper place for the sittings of the supreme court. He would propose a provision to that effect.

Mr. ROSELIUS referred to the remarks of the delegate from Ouachita, (Mr. Downs) to overthrow the novel proposition of the delegate from Caddo. Where, I would ask the delegate, is the seat of government as yet established? The Convention have determined that it shall not be located within sixty miles of the city. But let it be located where it may, the city of New Orleans will nevertheless remain, as heretofore, the heart and centre of the State. It is within her limits that the business of the State must be done; and it is through her that the agriculture of the State must be converted into capital. Four-fifths of the suits before the supreme court are from the city. It is here where the most direct and ready conveyance to every portion of the State is to be had; where almost every public enterprise has its origin. It is out of the question to think of carrying the supreme court from the greater portion of the very business which it was established to prosecute.

Mr. CONRAD of Orleans, could not believe that the gentleman from Caddo was in earnest; his proposition must certainly be intended for a jest.

Mr. PORTER said that the gentleman (Mr. Conrad) would find out that he was serious. When the question of the salaries of the judges was under consideration, it was assumed by that gentleman, and by some of the city delegation, that a large salary was necessary, in order to enable the judges to reside in the city, and that a great deal was spent in their travelling in the country parishes. Now it is proposed to locate the court in the city of New Orleans, in opposition to the above arguments. Thus the State is expected to lose four months, for it is notorious that for four months in the year the epedemic prevails in the city, and the court must stand adjourned. But we are told that there are no libraries in the country. This is identically the same language that we heard at Jackson, when it was deemed expedient to transport the Convention to this city. We were to come here for books and maps. In my turn, I would ask the gentleman if he is serious? So far from thinking that we have gained any thing by the change from Jackson to the city of New Orleans, I really believe that we would have made a better constitution there than we have made here, at any rate we would have completed our task before this time; and the constitution, ere this, would have been before the people.

Mr. Porter said if the courts were held four months in the year in the country as formerly, in Opelousas and Alexandria, it would be more convenient to his section of country, and he would not press the matter farther, otherwise he would insist on it.

Mr. Conrad said that at first he thought the delegate from Caddo was jesting; but the gravity of his countenance since, had convinced him that such was not the case, and that the delegate was serious in the design of transporting the supreme court to Baton Rouge or Donaldsonville. Four-fifths of the whole business of the State, arising in the city of New Orleans, is to be carried, if that delegate has his way, some one or two hundred miles from the city; and the members of the bar of the city are to be exposed to the necessity of making a voyage from day to day to attend to their cases!

The gentleman has accused me of inconsistency in speaking of the travelling expenses of the judges. Now, if the gentleman had examined the position I took, he would have seen that there was no inconsistency in it. I supported the motion of the delegate from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis), that the supreme court should continue to hold its sessions at Alexandria and Opelousas; because I considered that necessarily there would be a vacation of four months in the city, and that it would be impossible to get through with all the business unless these four months were made available to the country. I am not now a practising lawyer, but I remember when I was at the bar, the appeal cases from Florida interfered for two or three weeks with the business of the city, and monopolized the court exclusively.

Mr. Eustis said that this section had been adopted by the committee after a full consultation. It was suggested by members of the bar from the country, who were the best informed; and after all it was a matter resting chiefly on the convenience of members of the bar. For thirty-two years the constitution had fixed the duration of the sessions of the supreme court in the city of New Orleans. This was indispensable; now as to the question of holding sessions of the supreme court in the country, that was a question for the legislature to resolve. He would call for the previous question.

Mr. Mayo proposed the following amendment:

That appeals from the parishes of Jackson, Union, Morehouse, Caldwell, Ouachita, Catahoula, Franklin, Carroll, Madison, Tensas and Concordia, should, until otherwise directed, be carried to the city of New Orleans.

Mr. Eustis: This is legislation, and should find no place in the constitution.

Mr. Preston moved that the amendments and the section be laid upon the table until to-morrow. He had a proposition to submit upon the subject.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

Tuesday, April 22, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer from the honorable Mr. Stephens.

Mr. Humble gave notice that he would move a reconsideration of the vote depriving members of their mileage. Also, that he would move to reconsider the vote upon establishing the seat of government, with a view of moving that it be located permanently in the constitution.

Mr. Waddill said that this was a day fixed for taking into consideration the resolution presented by him. He would move to modify it, by accepting such offices filled by the election of the people, so that it would read—no member of this Convention shall be eligible to any office created by this constitution, until two years shall have elapsed from the date of its approval by the people, unless it be to such offices as are elective by the people.

Mr. Lewis thought this resolution was treating the good people of the State very cavalierly. They were the best judges of those best calculated to serve them. At any rate, it was not in order.

Mr. Waddill said that resolutions which had no direct relation to the order of the day, had been presented from time to time. He instanced the proposition of Messrs. Chinn and Marigny on the subject of duelling. On various occasions, other important propositions had been submitted, and he found it somewhat strange that the delegate from St. Landry should make that objection to his proposition. I think (added Mr. Waddill) that the Convention should place themselves beyond suspicion; that they should show by their acts, that they are not struggling for the loaves and fishes. He hoped that the provision would be adopted.

Mr. Sellers moved that it be laid indefinitely on the table, and Mr. Waddill called for the yeas and nays; yeas 32, nays 15.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the clause relative to the sessions of the supreme court, under consideration at the adjournment, yesterday.

The question pending was on Mr. Lewis' motion to strike out "in New Orleans," and insert "as heretofore."

Mr. Splane asked permission to make a few explanations.

The Chair said that under the rule, it could not be permitted. The previous question cut off all debate.

The yeas and nays were called for.

Mr. Lewis said it was not usual for him to assign reasons for his vote, but on this ocsasion, he would do so. He voted yes, because it would be depriving the section of country which he represented, from the advantages resulting from the establishment of that court, and it would be an act of manifest injustice to do so.

The question was decided in the affirmative—yeas 28, nays 23.

Mr. Splane gave notice that he would ask for a re-consideration on Thursday next. He hoped that he would have the opportunity of expressing his opinions upon the subject.

Mr. Brent: I will willingly give the gentleman the opportunity he desires.

The question then recurred on the adoption of Mr. Mayo's provision.

Messrs. Briant and Splane severally moved to add to the foregoing parishes the parishes of St. Martin and St. Mary, but subsequently withdrew their propositions.

Mr. Mayo moved for the adoption, which motion prevailed.

Mr. Mayo then moved to amend the section further, by striking out "June," and substituting "July;" which motion prevailed.

Mr. Benjamin moved to strike out in the second line, the word "month," and insert "first Monday of;" which was concurred in.

Mr. Preston then submitted the following as a substitute, viz:

"The State shall be divided into four districts, and for each district a judge of the supreme court shall be appointed. The said judge shall hold a court twice a year in each of the parishes comprised in his district, and he shall then decide upon all appeals that may be brought before him from the inferior courts. If he affirm the decision of the first court, the judgment shall be final. If he disagree with the first judge, the case shall be immediately transferred to the supreme court in the city of New Orleans, composed of all the said judges of said court. It shall begin its sessions on the first Monday of January, and shall sit until it has disposed of all the appeals pending before it.

The yeas and nays were called for—yeas 37, nays 12.

Mr. O'Bryan moved to strike out the words "during the rest of the year." The motion was lost—yeas 22, nays 29. The section was then adopted.

On motion of Mr. Brent, the Convention resumed the consideration of section three.

Mr. Brent moved to amend said section by substituting the following:

"The State shall be divided into four districts, each of which shall be designated by its respective number, and the duly qualified electors of each district shall choose one of said judges; the choice o chief justice shall be made by the electors of the first district."

Mr. READ said: I rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of putting the elective ball in motion, hoping that others will keep it rolling, until all opposition shall be overcome.

It seems to me that our judiciary system needs a thorough revision, and that a fear of diverging from the beaten track, along which public opinion has heretofore erected its guide-boards, with stationary fingers, pointing continually to the same spot and to the same end, should not deter us from being pioneers in the great cause of improvement, the very object of our assemblage, and not merely to drag ourselves from post to post, to reach the goal which others have. Innovation of established usages and customs, remoddelling with a bold hand the laws of a country, or departure from the nursery of maxims, sanctified by time and association, induces no pernicious consequences when the actuating motive is the zeal of philanthrophy and the love of country.

An elective judiciary is "nothing new under the sun," though it strikes many with amazement and horror. There is a kind of unaccountable sanctity enveloping the judicial ermine, as moss covers the time beaten temples of antiquity; but when stript of superstitious veneration, it stands out as the rude creation of man—the workmanship of a noble, yet fallible creature.

It is no sacrilege to approach this subject in a republican and an independent spirit, which, God grant, may continue in our deliberations. Nay, on the contrary, my colleagues and myself have been instructed by a voice that will admit of no excuse, to enter the great judicial tabernacle and make it accessible to the people. They want to know their priest—they want a voice in his promotion.

I am actuated by no spirit if reckless innovation in advocating the election of judges by the people, but by a desire to secure the greatest good to the greatest number; by a desire commensurate with the welfare of the whole people. In a republican government, vox populi vox dei, so far at least as the selection of officers is concerned. I am aware that there are those who worship idols because their fathers did before them; and who, if they knew the right, the wrong would pursue, in order to smother the irrepressible disposition to freedom which exists in the hearts of the people. There are those who have the boldness and temerity to avow that the legislature is superior to the people; that the creature is greater than the creator; and the records of this Convention will show that there are some such in our midst, even in this age of sense and progressive improvement. To men of such distorted vision, it is not strange that an elective judiciary is a hideous monster, without shape or comeliness. But I trust that all here are sincerely desirous of becoming benefactors, and that they will examine cooly and dispassionately all questions connected with the governmental policy of the State.

I assert without fear of successful contradiction, that our judiciary has become one of the most corrupt and irresponsible bodies of civil organization, and it is high time to cleanse the Augean stables, by turning another Alpheus through the filthy apartments, to restrain their untoward career, by letting the voice of the people declare, "thus far shalt thou go, but no farther."

To those who dare maintain the incapacity of the people to elect their officers, all their officers, I say, in the utmost charity and good feeling, go home to your insulted constituents, and they will settle accounts with you. And to those who doubt the honesty of the people, I say, beware of the just reproach and condemnation which awaits your avowal of such flagrant injustice.

I look around and see in this body learning, talent and honesty, and who was it that had the ability to make such a selection—a selection of men to whom the weightiest matters of State are confided, and upon whose decision hangs the weal or woe of thousands now existing, and yet unborn? The people, that people who are the scoff, but dread, of tyrants.

I daily see men, wise in legislation, dispensing the blessings of peace and harmony, the lights of science, and the benefactions of wholesome laws; who selected these from the great mass? The people! the people! I see the humble citizen make choice of his lawyer, his physician, his architect, his mechanic, his overseer, his agent for the transaction of all kinds of business, and yet I am gravely told that he is incompetent to deposit his vote for a judge. I see the culprit at the bar of justice; his life is jeopardized; all depends on the skill and adroitness of counsel; he chooses his attorney, and chooses well; and shall I be told that this individual, degraded as he may be, is not and never was capable of naming a judge to try the rights of property. It is an absurdity, involving ability where life is at stake, but inability where a paltry sum of money is concerned.

As men become enlightened they are driven to the truth. The ancients imagined the sun revolved around this little globe, but science taught another lesson. The moderns have advocated as great an error in principle, by elevating certain officers beyond the voice or control of the people, when these very officers are really the creatures and servants of the people, and properly amenable to them for all misfeasances, non-feasances and mal-feasances. Abandon republicanism, or burst the fetters which bear the rust of ages and the smell of despotism. The doctrine of a non-elective judiciary well suits kings, thrones and potentates, but it cannot consistently be urged or sustained in a land of liberty; a land where the foot-prints of aristocracy should never be seen.

Listen to the sage of Monticello on this interesting and important subject; he says: "It has been thought that people are not competent electors of judges learned in the law; but I do not know that this is true, and if doubtful, we should follow principle. In this, as in many other elections, they would be guided by reputation, which would not err oftener, perhaps, than the present mode of appointment." Such was the opinion of that great and good man, at a time when his bitterest enemy could not charge upon him any political or party design. It ought to have more than ordinary weight in the determination of this vital question. Justice Sharkey, of Mississippi, who is a man of high character and an able jurist, says: "much of the opposition to an elective judiciary arises from the prevalence of prejudice to whatever is new. * * * The people have acted with a good deal of discretion, and seem generally to divest themselves of party considerations. As a general rule, the selections have met the approbation of the bar; who are surely the best qualified to judge."

But I will not stop here; I beg leave to refer the Convention to the opinion of Chancellor Buckner, of the same Strte, in reply to an invitation to become a candidate for re-election, he makes use of the following language, which certainly speaks well for an elective judiciary:

"It has been intimated to me that there were grounds for fearing that the future elections for members of the judiciary, would be controlled by party politics. This suggestion has had no possible influence in shaping my determination to decline a re-election, because the past history of the country has furnished me with nothing to warrant such a suspicion, and I yet have full confidence in the honest, unbiassed judgment of the people on this subject. I am satisfied that they will be guided in their choice, by the moral and legal qualifications of the candidate, without regard to his political predilections. They are deeply interested in having the laws of the country faithfully and impartially administered, and they well understand that to attain this important end, they must guard with watchful jealousy the purity, firmness, independence and impartiality of the bench. It may be that there is a small class of small politicians, in either party, who would pollute even the temple of justice with the narrow and proscriptive prejudices of their political sect, but they are too few in number, and too inconsiderable in character to make any impression upon the good sense of the country at large. No good citizen of any party can desire to see our courts of justice converted into partisan machines, and made the mere registers of partisan's behests. Such a state of things would not only overthrow our constitution, but would be a practical subversion of our favorite theory of the capacity of the people for self-government. But it was not my purpose, in touching this subject to go further than to repel the idea that there is any party in this State who would disgrace and destroy its judiciary, by infusing into its members the violence and selfishness of partisan prejudices."

The following extract from a communication, published in the Jeffersonian of this city, is full of good sense, and true to the letter:

"But the necessity of electing judges becomes absolutely imperative, in our minds, when we approach the consideration of the functions they fulfil. Judges not only decide controversies between individuals, but they interpret and construe the constitution and the laws, which is nothing less than the equivalent of making constitutions and laws. The same constitution, when looked upon by a democratic and an aristocratic eye, presents very different appearances. The decision of a court to-day is its precedent on the morrow, and grows to be the law of the land on the third, though it may be such a law as the people or their representatives would have negatived, if brought before them. That such a power as this should be placed beyond the controlling influence of public opinion, which is public knowledge and public virtue, is clearly incompatible with free government"

Now sir, upon the admission that the people are competent electors of judges learned in the law, can it be possible that there are those who doubt their honesty? As strange as it may seem, it is even so; but I am one of those who place great reliance in the virtue of the mass. I believe that the possibility or probability of corruption is removed much farther by leaving the people as sole arbiters in such matters, than by entrusting an ambitious few with our destinies. Is it not preposterous to suppose that it is as easy to deceive and taint a whole body, as a single member? The people are not to be bought and sold as cattle in a market, though there are individuals who go for a price.

Divest the executive of such vast patronage, the very curse of republicanism, and you will soon discover a favorable change. The people's honesty and ability will lend freshness and vigor to all departments. The people will never unite upon a candidate merely because of his learning, his talents, or his family influence; but the question will be, "is he honest, is he capable;" will he dispense equal and exact justice to all men, regardless of personal promotion and family distinction? Will he stand as the sturdy oak, in the storm of passion, and the rage of party, sacrificing self to his country's good?

The very fact of making all officers elective, would have a tendency to enlighten as well as to improve in morals. The people would then feel and appreciate the necessity of inquiring into the duties of officers, and of ascertaining their capacity and fitness for public trusts. A great school would thus be formed, whose tendency would be the direct elevation and enlightenment of men. The day is not far distant when all the States of this glorious confederacy will follow the noble example of our sister Mississippi, on this subject; and since we cannot be the first in tearing the veil of superstition from around the judiciary, let us at least, be in the front ranks, where we can win the admiration and receive the homage of those who are to follow.

Some argue that even if the people are honest and capable, the system would not work, because men could not be induced to abandon lucrative professions for the short-lived honors of judicial stations, dependant on the popular voice. No fear of that—such offices would never go begging for tenants; the possibility of a like contingency would imply a deplorable want of honorable emulation. If the recipients of public favor act well their parts, they have as fair an opportunity of being continued as if the bounty fell from executive hands; nay, a better, for the people will reward services, when individual preference or private hate would sacrifice on the altar of self-interest or self-gratification.

Sir, we should not be deterred from doing our duty, merely because we have been accustomed to view the judiciary as independent of the people. On the contrary, let us leave the beaten track, and exhibit to the world a fallacy as absurd as the one that man is incapable of self government. We now have the opportunity of producing a system, which shall win the admiration of mankind; let us improve the occasion. Reduce every thing to a republican standard; let not a single cog in the great wheel be too small, or too large, or inappropriate, for it might forever destroy all symmetry and harmony of action. In the language of the great apostle of liberty, "follow principle, and the knot unties itself."

Mr. Brent said, the amendment before us, embraces an important measure of reformation, and it should be examined with calmness and deliberation, and a fixed determination on our part to be guided by truth and principle, High and important interests have been confided to our charge, and our decision upon this matter, as upon all other matters, should be made with strict reference to the good of our common country, the advancement of public morals and the security of public and private righs.

I admit, Mr. President, (said he,) that changes should not be made in the organic law for light and transient causes, yet I cannot but recognize the truth, promulgated in the Declaration of Independence, that all experience has shown, that men are disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, rather than abolish the forms to which they have been accustomed. Man has been defined by an English philosopher to be "a bundle of habits," and in nothing is the force of habit so conspicuously shown, as in the blind attachment, which too frequently binds him, to that particular system of laws under which he has lived. I could refer to many curious and singular instances to illustrate this position, but will content myself with alluding to one, familiar to those conversant with the history of the day. It is well known, that the people of Rhode Island continued to live under a royal charter, granted by the second Charles, until within a very few years past, they were compelled by the action of public sentiment out of the State, to abolish that charter and establish a government, more suited to the intelligence of the country, and the free and liberal spirit of the age. This instance, of itself, is sufficient to show the power and tyranny of habit over the mind of man. If then we have not already reached the acme of political wisdom, if there is any thing left for us to do, in ameliorating the organic law of the country, such improvement must be looked for, in the new, and not in the old States of the Confederacy. The older members of the Union never will be the pioneers in the march of improvement. From habit they cling to the particular forms to which they have been accustomed, not because they are good, but because they are indifferent —not because they are excellent, but because they are tolerable.

Any government, to answer the wise purposes for which all governments were established, must have its foundations laid deep in the respect and affections of the people. And this is particularly true as relates to a government, which, like ours, reposes on the broad foundation of the popular sovereignty. A popular government can never be energetic and efficient, unless it is sustained by the stout hearts and strong arms of the People. Upon what other power can that government rely, but the power of the people! Laws may be framed—whole volumes of statutes may be enacted, but they cannot be executed and enforced, if passed in defiance of the public will. The popular feature is the strongest feature in our constitution. When President Jackson encountered nine hundred banks of paper money, what was it that sustained his administration against the colossal strength of these institutions, but the fact that he was the great tribune of the people? If, instead of being elected by the popular suffrage, he had held his office from the vote of the Senate or the national Legislature, powerful as he was, he would have been crushed and overborne by the hydra brood that hissed around him, and nothing sustained him, but the fact, that he was upheld and supported by the strong and mighty arm of the American yeomanry that elected him. The greater participation the people have in the government, the more they are taught to believe that it is their goverment, the greater will be its energy and efficiency, and the better will it answer the wise purposes for which all laws were framed, and all governments established.

I may be mistaken, but I believe that the adoption of no measure which has yet engaged the attention of this Convention, or which will engage its attention, would diffuse so much joy into the hearts of the people, as the adoption of the measure now under debate. When I speak of the people, I do not speak of those who occupy distinguished stations upon the bench and at the bar, nor do I speak of those who have reached the elevated theatre of political life and public distinction; and still less do I speak, of those butterflies, who sport in the circles and in the saloons of fashion, but I speak of the plain practical yeomen of the country, the bone and sinew of the land, upon whose virtue, whose firmness and integrity, this government has always relied, and must always continue to rely, for its peace, its security and its permanence.

I know—I do not pretend to conceal the fact, or to deny its existence—I know that the more wealthy and aristocratic classes of society, with a few honorable exceptions, are opposed to the adoption of this measure. They cling to the feature of an Executive appointment of the judiciary, as the drowning mariner clings to the last plank that floats upon the waves, to keep him from going down into the unfathomed depths beneath. The tenacity of the grasp is the same, though the motives and circumstances are widely different. In the one case, it is to save from certain and inevitable destruction, in the other, from a fancied and imaginary peril.

There have always been two parties that have divided the people of this country—one of them has been in favor of popular government from principle, and hence, as the intelligence of the country advanced, and as experience demonstrated the feasibility and security of the plan, they have advocated, invariably, an extension of the range of popular power. The other party, equally opposed to popular government on principle, have steadily and uniformly resisted every attempt to widen and enlarge the circle of popular rights. Nothing discomposes the nerves of these gentlemen to such an extent, as a proposition to extend the power of the people. It comes upon them like the shock of a Galvanic battery. They can see nothing but death and ruin and disaster, in every departure from old and established usages, and so deep-rooted and deep-seated is their antipathy to popular government, that I doubt not there are individuals among them who had rather see our judges nominated by the Bashaw of Tunis, or the Autocrat of all the Russias, than to see them elected by the direct votes of the people. Between these gentlemen and myself, there is no community of feeling or of thought. We stand as far asunder as the poles. There is a chasm between us as wide as that which separates paradise from purgatory.

The first point which naturally suggests itself to the mind in the investigation of this subject, is that which relates to the political right of the people to elect their judges. Will honorable gentlemen opposed to us, concede that the people have the political right of electing their judges? If so, we shall be grateful for small favors. Should the admission be made, it then follows that I am arguing in favor of nothing that is wrong. I am merely contending for the exercise of a right which is conceded; but perhaps they may deem it advisable not to permit us to make such a strong lodgement on the field of argument as would be at once secured, by the concession of the right. If the right be on our side, we are entrenched at once behind a position, that can be carried neither by siege nor by storm. From under the cover of this redoubt, we could pour upon them the hottest thunderbolts of fight, while reposing ourselves in perfect security from their assaults. Hence the neceesity became urgent to dislodge us from this strong hold, and to bring the question, at once, to an issue by a denial of the right of the people to elect their judges.

To deny the right of the people, is to deny at once, that truth asserted in the Declaration of Independence, that "all governments are instituted for the benefit of the people," and that other truth, asserted in the Bill of Rights, that "all power is inherent in the people." This denial assails the first principles of a popular government, and prostrates in ruins, the Republic which was reared by the hands, and cemented by the blood of our fathers. No man can arise upon this floor, in the face of the assembled representatives of the people, and deny that the people, from whom he holds his trust, are not in full possession of all the rights and powers inherent in the sovereignty of the State. That question, then, I shall regard as settled, and I will hereafter hold the right of the people to elect their judges as indisputable and undisputed.

At this stage of the argument, we may be told that while the right of election by the people is granted, that the expediency of exercising that right is utterly denied. The concession, or the establishment of the right, is sufficient of itself to refute the argument based upon inexpediency. No man can be deprived of a political right, under the pretext that it is inexpedient for him to exercise it. The right once granted or proved, the free exercise of it follows, else the term "right" is an unmeaning and senseless word, having neither force, nor body, nor shape. Of what avail will it be, to possess a right in theory, if it is to be possessed in theory alone? For instance,

I have been invested by the laws and constitution with the political right of suffrage, yet I may abuse that right. Nevertheless, could you deprive me of its exercise upon the pretence that I might abuse it. Again, I have the unquestioned right to manage and control my own private affairs and property as I please, yet it might well happen, that I would abuse that right—that I would squander my means—dissipate my property, and reduce myself to bankruptcy and ruin—still would the Legislature be authorized to withdraw my property from my control, and place it in the hands of a trustee, under the pretext that I might abuse that right.

But what, after all, is this denial of the expediency of the exercise of popular rights, but the old and exploded argument of the monarchist? There is no monarchist on earth, but what will tell you that all governments are instituted for the benefit of the people; yet he will gravely argue, that it is for their benefit that the powers of the government should not be exercised by the people. This is the soothing argument which is to comfort the sorrows, and bind up the wounds of the crushed and down-trodden masses of the world! Behold the condition of the people of England! There, the very bread is taxed, 'ere it approaches the starving laborer's lips—every thing is taxed that man touches, or wears—the light of heaven, itself, is a source of governmental revenue, and the very habitations of men are darkened by taxation. Yet the people of that country are consoled by the information, that it is much better for them that the powers of the government should be wrested from their hands, where they properly belong, and placed in the hands of their tyrants—a pampered and bloated aristocracy, and a man who wears a crown upon his head, and holds a sceptre in his hands. And now, sir, the very argument which is employed to defend the most odious and grinding despotism on earth, is the very argument which is used by the opponents of an elective judiciary. They tell the people that it is much better for them that they should not exercise the powers which belong to them, of electing their judges; that as the king in England can manage the government much better than the people can, so can the governor in this country attend much better to the appointment of the judiciary. Whether the starving masses of England believe in the principle which dooms them to perpetual slavery, is a problem most easy of solution. Remove for a single day, the military power of that government, and the setting sun would shine upon the ruins of that colossal tyranny, which strides above the fortunes and liberties of her people.

Sir, can the free citizens of our country be deceived by the subtle and deceptive arguments, with which the opponents of an elective judiciary seek to wheedle and cajole them out of the exercise of their undoubted rights? Can they believe that it is for their interest that the most important functionaries of the State, who are callled upon daily to decide upon questions involving their lives, their liberty, and their property, should hold their appointment from, and be amenable to, some other authority in the State than that of the people themselves? Human credulity is great; but when the monstrous proposition stands revealed in its naked deformity, the heart of man recoils from it with instinctive loathing and disgust.

Many individuals entertain the opinion that the judiciary system of England is perfect; and that we should so organize that department, as to preserve the leading and important features established by that government. English authority has no weight with me; but if I can show that according to the true principles of the British government, the appointment of judges should flow in this country from the people, it is altogether probable that some votes might be secured in behalf of an elective judiciary, that could be obtained by no argument based upon the true principles of a republican government. In England, the judges are appointed by the crown. The crown is the sovereignty of the State. Now, where is the sovereign power of our government lodged, if it be not lodged in the hands of the people? The people are with us the sovereignty of the State, and an adherence to the British precedent would require that the judges should be elected by the people.

But a reference is frequently made to the British system, for the purpose of proving the importance of having an independent judiciary. The signification of this term "independent" in England, is different from any meaning that can be attached to it in this country. It means an independence of the crown, and not an independence of the people. Formerly, the judges in England held their offices at the pleasure of the sovereign; but this evil was remedied, and the revolution of 1688 resulted in establishing the principle that the judiciary should be appointed for life, and should not be removable at the will of the crown. This rendered that department independent of the sovereign, and it was a great stride in securing against the encroachments of the throne, the public and private rights of the citizen. It was the first decided advance in popular government, and by making the judiciary independent of the executive, it held out to the subject the hope that he would find in one branch of the government, defence and security from the exactions and oppressions of the other. No wonder that under these circumstances, the independence of the judiciary is regarded as the sheet anchor of the rights of the Briton.

The independence of the judiciary however in England, as every where else, does not result from the particular mode which is pursued in appointing the judges. It is the life tenure of the judiciary, which renders them independent, and they would be equally independent, if they were elected by the people, instead of being appointed by the crown. The independence of the judiciary then, is only to be found in their tenure of office, and does not flow from the particular manner in which they are appointed. A judge elected for life by the people, is just as independent as a judge appointed for life by the crown. In either case he is beyond the reach of responsibility, and the particular mode in which the appointment is conferred, does not abate one jot or tittle of his independence. If you abolish life tenure, and fix a term for which the judges are to be appointed and elected, you destroy this independence, and make the judiciary at once responsible to the power that appoints them. If appointed for a short term, they are subject to constant responsibility; if for a long term, that responsibility is proportionally diminished. But in neither case do you add to, or diminish their responsibility, by adopting any particular mode of appointment. A judge appointed by the crown or the governor, for a term of years, is just as independent (and no more) as a judge elected for a term of years by the people.

It has been generally conceded that in this country there does not exist the same necessity for an independent judiciary that is to be found in England. In fact, there is not the slightest analogy between the situation of the people of England, constantly warring against the aggressions of the throne, and the people of this country, where the very name of a monarch is unknown. According to the theory of our government, there is no power in the State antagonistical to that of the people. It is true, you may build up such a power; you may array one of the departments of the government in opposition to the people; but if you do, you violate the principles of republicanism, and by your own act, you will create a necessity for an irresponsible judiciary, which otherwise would not exist. Now, how do we stand, in reference to this question? We have already decided, and decided very correctly, to abolish life tenure, and the sense of the Convention is unanimous against a judiciary constituted, as it is in England, above all responsibility whatever. Life offices, hereditary titles, and entailed estates, do not comport with the republican feelings and principles of the day. Our supreme court judges are now to hold their offices for the term of eight years. They are no longer to be irresponsible despots, wielding uncontrolled influence over the liberties and property of our people. That question is settled—their responsibility is fixed—and in the investigation of this subject, I would warn gentlemen not to be led into bogs and morasses, by the ignis fatuus of an independent judiciary. Upon this question the Convention has moved with a bold and strong hand, and every vestige of an irresponsible judiciary, such as is found in England, has been swept by the board.

This point being gained, and the responsibility of the judiciary being established, another important question presents itself for our decision. The judges are to be held to accountability, and to whom shall we confide the delicate duty of holding them to that accountability? To the governor, the legislature, or the people? The choice is to be made between these three powers in the State, and between them, who can hesitate?

Every motive of sound policy and expediency requires that the judiciary should be independent of the executive and the legislature. Any other organization of the three departments, would lead to the most deplorable results. Our only safety consists in keeping each of the departments separate from, and independent of the others; and the true and proper independence of the judiciary is to be found in elevating it above the control, and placing it beyond the reach of the co-ordinate branches of the government. The Judiciary is the balance wheel of our political system. As the balance wheel in the machinery of a steamboat, regulates the stroke of the piston, the movement of the valves, and the harmonious action of the engine, even so is it the office of the judiciary, to steady the movements and working of our system, by giving force and proper direction to the other powers of the government. In a pure despotism, all power centres in the monarch. He is at once legislator, judge, and executive. Just in proportion as you divide and separate these powers, you advance from monarchy to republicanism.

The first article of the constitution we have adopted, provides that the powers of the government shall be divided into three parts, and each of them confided to a separate and distinct body of magistracy. As the centralization of power constitutes despotism, its separation and division constitutes the vital principle of a republic.—To make the judiciary dependent upon the legislature, or the executive, would destroy this principle, and would render that department potent for purposes of evil, but utterly powerless for purposes of good. The constitution assigns to each of the departments, its respective duties; and it says, "thus far shalt thou go, and no farther." The judiciary is relied upon, not only to decide disputes among citizens, but to keep the other departments from shooting madly from the spheres allotted to them. It is its duty to decide whether the laws enacted by the legislature, and approved by the governor, are constitutional, or not. If constitutional, to enforce them; if not, to avoid them and set them at nought. But if the judiciary be appointed by the legisture, or the governor, and at the end of a stated term of years, be condemned to pass under the censorship of these departments, what guaranty have we for the protection and integrity of our constitution? Look for a moment at the evils which might result from the dependence of the judiciary upon the legislature, or the executive.

The constitution declares that no ex post facto law, nor law impairing the obligation of contracts, shall be passed; and that the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, except in case of war, or actual invasion of the country. Suppose the legislature has declared that the writ of habeas corpus shall be suspended in a time of profound peace. A citizen, being deprived illegally of his liberty, applies to the judge for a writ of habeas corpus. The issuance of the writ is resisted, upon the ground that the legislature has ordered that writ to be suspended. The constitutionality of that act is denied, and a judge who is a candidate for re-election before that same legislature, is called upon to decide whether the constitution has been violated, or not. Do you think that the liberty of a citizen would be safe, before a tribunal thus constituted? Is this the kind of independent judiciary, to which you wish to surrender the lives, the liberties, and fortunes of our people?

But gentlemen tell us that the great and paramount object is, to have the judiciary independent of popular clamor. Sir, these gentlemen can see danger ahead, but in one direction. They seem to have no fear or dread, except of the power of the people. If they can obtain a judiciary independent of the people, no matter how servile it may be to the legislature, or the executive, they have reaped the fruition of their hopes. Independent of popular clamor! yet they say nothing of legislative clamor, venality and corruption! Nothing of executive power, tyranny and usurpation! As for myself, I had rather the judiciary should be a thermometer, to indicate the rise and fall of popular excitement, or that it should be a weathercock, to designate which way the winds of popular feeling blow, than that it should be constituted into a court of record, to register the edicts of the executive mansion, or the mandates of legislative usurpation.

With a judiciary appointed for a term of years and fully responsible to the power that appoints them, we are now called upon to say, whether that judiciary shall be subordinate to the legislature, or the executive, or whether it shall be responsible directly to the people. The election of the judges by the Legislature is the most objectionable mode that could possibly be divised. An adoption of this system, would lead to the most disastrous consequences. It would pollute the streams of our legislation at their fountain head. Corruption and venality would sit enthroned in the council chambers of State, and our legislative hall would be made an arena, in which hungry office-seekers would be pitted against each other. Besides it is a blending of powers utterly incongruous and irreconcilable. Nomination to office is an executive function. It is the duty of the legislature to pass laws and not elect judges. The introduction of this system would inevitably lead to log-rolling, barter of votes, frauds, venality and corruption without end, and in no point of view, is it such a system, as ought to meet with the approbation of this Convention. As however there are but few advocates of it upon this floor, I will pass on without a further examination of its defects.

The executive appointment of the judiciary, is the most earnestly pressed upon our consideration. To this mode of appointment, I have the most decided and invincible repugnance. To the chief magistrate I can never consent to surrender the judiciary, bound hand and foot. As executive and as a constituent branch of the legislature, his acts are to be brought by the judiciary to the test of the constitution. By holding in his hands, the power of reappointment, you give him absolute dominion over the judges, and if disposed to do a violent thing, he would soon fill the bench with fitting instruments to sanction and sanctify the deed. Give him this power and he will unite in his own person all the powers of the government. With legislative and executive functions, and a servile and obedient judiciary, he will possess as much power as the crowned monarch on his throne.

I object to it also, because it is the "one man power." It is a shoot from the doctrine of the divine right of kings. It is an exotic transplanted from the gardens of London tower. The patronage of the executive is a remnant of the monarchial principle, and it is the fountain from whence have issued copious streams of demoralization, that have flowed over the land. Nothing can be more disgraceful and degrading to the character of the American Republic, than the humiliating spectacle, which is presented upon the accession of each new executive, to the chair of State. That spectacle is not only witnessed in Louisiana, but upon the more elevated theatre of the national government. Swarms and myriads of office-hunters flock to the seat of government, as cormorants and vultures gather around a new slain carcass. They besige and beset every avenue which leads to the executive palace, and it is said that one president lost his life by the harrassments and importunities of these hungry claimants, that would take no denial. It is a lamentable truth, yet it cannot be denied, that there are hosts of individuals, who follow in the wake of the two great political parties, as sharks follow in the wake of a ship for the offal that is thrown overboard, or as "thieves and banditti follow after the caravans of the east for the hope of the plunder they may pick up in the rear." It is time, that this evil should be remedied, I desire to dry up this fountain of bitter waters at its very source. The executive ought to be shorn of the whole of his patronage. The power of appointment should be taken from him altogether, and placed where it properly belongs, in the hands of the people. Sir, that convention which shall accomplish this important work of reformation, will have earned for itself, a lasting title to the gratitude of posterity.

But we are told that by this system we have a guaranty for a good appointment, in the responsibility of the executive. The responsibility of the executive! A more unmeaning jingle of words never smote upon the human ear. The responsibility of the executive! What is it? Where is it? How is it ascertained, and how is it enforced? The executive is elected for four years, and is ineligible for a second term. In what then does his responsibility consist? In moonshine—nothing but moonshine. Suppose he makes a bad appointment, if he be responsible, there must be some mode of enforcing that responsibility. Will honorable gentlemen inform us, in what manner the executive is to be reached? Bad appointments have been made by the score and the hundred, yet I have never heard of a single instance in which the executive has suffered from his responsibility. I have known the governor to take a man from New Orleans and send him up the coast as parish judge, when there were many persons more competent than he, residing in the parish to which he was sent. I have known him to take an individual who was not a lawyer, from the parish of Rapides and make him parish judge of Avoyelles, when there were able and efficient lawyers residing in the latter parish, fully competent to discharge the duties of that station. The same thing has been practised in other quarters of the State—Men notoriously incompetent have been appointed to the important office of probate judge, and ignorant of the first rudiments of law, have been called upon to decide the most complex and difficult questions that could possibly arise in the administration of justice. Yet I have never heard that the governor has suffered from his responsibility. The distant wail of sorrow and suffering does not penetrate into the perfumed and carpeted chambers of power. No matter how much private wrong and injury may be inflicted, the serenity of the executive is undisturbed, and his pillow is not haunted by visions of remorse. No matter how much the public indignation may be excited in distant and remote regions, he wraps himself up in the gum-elastic cloak of his official dignity, and tells the storm to beat, and the rain to pour, and as for the people, "he whistles them down the wind to pray on fortune." Sir, this responsibility is like the airy dagger of Macbeth. It has no actual corporeal existence; you might as well attempt to gather in a basket the fog that hovers over the bed of the Mississippi, as to attempt to locate this floating and undiscoverable responsibility of the executive.

Again, sir, how does the governor act in distributing the patronage of office? In nine cases out of ten he knows nothing of the individual he appoints. He is forced to depend upon the representations of others. He gropes in the dark for such information as can be gathered from the venal crew that flock around the executive mansion. Formerly, under some of the dynasties that are extinct, a few individuals residing in the different sections of the State, were known to control the nominations of the executive. When we ascertained who these gentlemen were in favor of, we had but little curiosity to know who the governor would appoint. The governor being ignorant, from the very nature of things, of most of the candidates for office, a similar practice will always, to a greater or less extent, continue to prevail. The question then resolves itself in this—shall we permit our nominations to be made by an irresponsible cable of unknown intriguers or rather, shall we not confide a matter of such general concernment, to the decision of the great body of the people?

We likewise know that the governor frequently confers the appointment upon that individual who has been most industrious in getting signatures to his petition. Every one knows the facility with which persons affix their signatures to those documents, now so common through the land. Any one will sign a petition. A few years since a very incompetent person was near being appointed parish judge of Rapides, owing to his great industry in obtaining signatures to his petition, and he would inevitably have been appointed, if that same junto of intriguers, to whom I have before referred, had not decided otherwise. In further illustration of this, I once heard an anecdote of a man, who made a wager that he would obtain, in the course of one day, five hundred signatures to a petition, the object of which was to have the most popular clergyman in the city of Albany hung. The tale is soon told—the wager was won, and the five hundred signatures were obtained before breakfast in the morning.

Having now shown a few of the objections to either a legislative election or an executive appointment of the judiciary, I will proceed to explain some of the reasons why the judges should be elected by the direct votes of the people. In the first place, it will render the judiciary, what it ought to be, independent of the other branches of the government. The people now elect the governor and the legislature. Let them elect the judiciary, and all three of the departments are at once placed upon a footing of perfect equality. They will all then spring from the same common source, and be responsible to the same common tribunal. The whole government will hang then directly on the people, and ours will be a popular government, not in name merely, but in truth and in substance. The reasons why the judiciary should stand upon an independent footing, as regards the legislature and executive, are numerous and obvious. No principle hostile to our republican institutions, can ever creep into the government, unless it is through a department, that does not connect directly with the people. If a monarchical or aristocratic principle is to find a lodgment any where, it will be in that branch of the government that is not responsible to the popular authority. Engraft the judiciary upon the legislature or the executive, and it will produce a fruit different from what it would have produced, if left upon the parent stem. It is as true in politics as it is in physic, that the engrafted tree bears not the fruit of the original trunk. Let the judiciary repose upon either of the other departments —let it draw its vitality from them, and true to the instincts of nature—true to the warm impulses implanted in the bosom of the offspring, in behalf of the parent, it will defend and protect and uphold that parent; against the world beside.

But there are other and more conclusive reasons in favor of this proposition. Interest has been said to be, the main spring of human action. If you wish to have your business well done, you do it yourself; if you are indifferent about it, you employ an agent. That which a man has an interest to do well, will in nine cases out of ten, be well done. Now who has such a deep and abiding interest in the appointment of a good judge as the people among whom the judge is to act? If a bad judge be selected, who suffers from his dishonesty, his incompetency and his reckless disregard of justice, but the people who live under his jurisdiction? If rights are trampled under foot, if the power of the judge be prostituted to purposes of oppression, who are the victims but the people who are immolated by his power? Now you desire to take away from these people, whose rights, and liberty and property are at stake, the power of electing their judge, to vest it in a man, who has no immediate personal interest in the selection of a good officer. And can you believe that the end proposed, will be obtained by such a strange and unnatural proceedings? Except so far as the immediate locality where the governor resides is concerned, it is a matter of indifference to him what kind of an officer be appointed. If he can gratify his ambition, his hate, his friendship, or any other feeling of the human heart, he will do in it the appointment of a judge, though the streams of justice should run black with the waters of corruption. I am not dealing in fancy; the history of the past will fully justify what I say.

Again, sir, while the people have the deepest interest in the selection of a good judge; they are decidedly the most competent to make that selection. The governor, as I have before remarked, is generally forced to depend upon the representations of others. The people have a personal and direct knowledge of the qualifications of the candidate. There is nothing so purely local as the reputation of a lawyer, unless he possesses high and striking qualities, which are not always the best qualities for a judge. There are good lawyers in this city, every way qualified for a judicial station, who have no general reputation throughout the State. There are excellent lawyers in the country, who would make the best of judges, who are not known even by name to men practising the same profession in this city. Now you desire to take from the people of each locality, who have a perfect knowledge of the capacity and qualifications of the candidates; the power of electing their judges; to vest it in a man who has no knowledge whatever upon the subject, and who, if he has any desire to do right, can only guess as to the selection of a goood officer. In doing this you violate the plainest dictates of common sense, and you do not display even that ordinary prudence, which regulates the conduct of men in the every day transactions of life. You are for taking from the people, who have the deepest interest and the best knowledge on the subject, the power of selecting their judge, to give it to an individual without personal interest in the matter, and wholly devoid of the knowledge required for the proper discharge of that duty. With such a system as this in operation, who can wonder that bad appointments have been made—and that the public confidence has been unsettled in the administration of our laws?

When hard pressed upon this point, honorable gentlemen have been forced to admit that the chances are decidedly the greatest for the selection of a good judge, when elected by the people. But they say that the desire for re-election on the part of the judge, will throw temptations in his path, that cannot possibly be resisted. They urge that if a case arises between a popular individual and one of less note, that the judge will so shape his decision as to secure the greatest number of votes at the approaching election; or that if a case originates between one who promoted his election and one who opposed it, that he will be strongly tempted, to decide in favor of his friend and against his enemy. This is the argument most relied upon, by those who cannot look in the eye, the true principle of a popular government, and yet endeavor to skulk behind some subterfuge, that will excuse them for with-holding from the people; the exercise of the rights which justly belong to them. Sir, of all the arguments urged against an elective judiciary, this is the most shallow; and the most easily exposed. Suppose that the judge does desire a re-election, do gentlemen mean to say that dishonesty is a passport to popular applause? The great body of the people are under the control of no one individual; and that judge miscalculates the force of public sentiment, who can expect to stand up against it, by the aid of any individual, no matter how popular, or how influential. But what, after all, is this objection, but to charge moral corruption upon the judge who is elected by the people? If it be admitted, that the people will select the best judge, the great probability is that he will be best able to resist the temptations that beset his path. If the election by the people will give you a better man, than the appointment by the executive, you have a better guarantee for the faithful snd honest discharge of the judicial functions. The particular mode in which a man is elected or appointed, does not alter his nature. If the judge desires re-election, he would desire re-appointment; and according to the same logic, if a case should originate between an obscure individual, and one who had the ear of the executive, he would so decide as to secure his re-appointment. Again, if the judge is inclined to decide in favor of his friends and against his enemies, why cannot he gratify his inclinations, as well when appointed by the executive, as when elected by the people? Is there any peculiar virtue in holding office from the hands of the governor? Does an executive appointment freeze the nature of man to stone, or strike with torpor and paralysis the affections and passions of the human heart? The great object is to obtain capable and honest judges. That system is best which will secure the best men upon the bench. Let gentlemen prove to me that the people will not elect the best judges, and I will cheerfully acknowledge my error. And now, sir, I would here ask, whether any objection can be urged against an election by the people, that cannot be made to apply with ten-fold force to an appointmen by the executive? Again, I say, that gentlemen can see danger but in one direction; their vision is keen to detect any objection that may be urged against a popular election, but they can see no objection to an executive appointment, though it stood full in their sight, as high as Atlas, and as insurmountable as the Appenines.

But have gentlemen never heard of the leaning of these executive judges in behalf of the more wealthy and influential classes of society? There being something aristocratic in a judiciary thus constituted, its tendency has always been aristocratic. When a man of wealth has shot down his neighbor in cold blood, in broad day-light and in the open street, have you never heard it remarked, as if such a thing was a matter of course, "that man is too rich to be hung?" And is not this the case, not only here, but generally throughout the Union? When Commander McKenzie ordered one midshipman and two seamen to be executed at the yard-arm of the brig Somers, for mutiny, one of the reasons given by him for inflicting such summary punishment was, that the chief criminal being the member of a wealthy and influential family, it would be impossible for him to be convicted and punished, if brought to this country, to be dealt with according to law. It is lamentable, but it is nevertheless true, that in this country, wealth procures immunity from punishment for crime. It has always been the case here, as well as in England, where the judiciary hold their offices from the executive and from the throne. Even Shakspeare tells us

"The usurer hangs the cozener,
Through tattered clothes small vices do appear,
Robes and furred gowns hide all. Plate sin with gold,
And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks:
Arm it with rags—a pigmy's straw doth pierce it!"

This same remark applies equally throughout all the gradations of crime. The rogue who embezzles his thousands and hundreds of thousands, escapes the felon's doom, while the poor wretch who steals a loaf of bread to feed his famishing children, is certain to feel the heaviest vengeance of the law. How happens it that these great and crying abuses exist in our midst? Is this a free and equal government, where poverty alone is to be made the target for the shafts of justice? Is wealth to be permitted to hurl defiance at the civil power of the State, and to burst asunder, like cob-webs, the meshes of the law? But I may be told that the fault principally lies with the juries of the country, and should not be entirely attributed to the judge. I admit that juries are frequently to blame, yet most of the evils can be traced directly to the judge. In the first place, the judge is to decide whether the accused is to be admitted to bail or not, and if admitted to bail, to fix upon the amount required. Here a vast latitude is given to the judge. The constitution says that excessive bail shall not be required, yet the judge is to decide whether the bail be excessive or not. A man worth a hundred thousand dollars is frequently held to bail for a heavy crime, in the sum of five or ten thousand dollars. It amounts to nothing at all. A poor man, not worth a dime, will perhaps be held to bail, for the same offence, in the sum of one or two thousand dollars. It is more than he can possibly furnish, and hence he must go to jail; while the rich man goes at large, forfeits his bond, or stands the chances of his trial, or has the indictment quashed, or in some other mode makes his escape from the penalties of the law. When the case goes to trial, the judge stands between the evidence and the accused; and he decides what evidence shall be rejected, and what evidence shall be received and read to the jury. He is then given by law the power to charge the jury, and who does not know the vast influence which is thus exercised by the judge over the minds of the jury? After all, when the trial is concluded and the verdict rendered, he possesses the power to set the verdict aside, to order a new trial, and give another chance to the prisoner to place himself in a better position before the next jury that is to decide upon his case. There are a thousand ways in which the power of the judge can be employed to defeat the ends of justice, or to save any individual whom he desires to save. Now, sir, if these evils are to be remedied—if the tendency of the judiciary be to favor the wealthy and to sacrifice the poor—the aristocratic feature of an executive appointment of the judiciary must be abolished. The judges must spring direct from the people, or else justice will never be administered, by the same common standard, to the rich and the poor, the high and the low.

There is another point, to which I have already indirectly alluded, but which is worthy of a more pointed examination. By limiting the tenure of our judiciary, we have made them responsible officers. The purity of the administration of justice depends upon the manner in which that responsibility is enforced. If a bad judge be re-appointed, or if a good judge be not re-appointed, their responsibility ceases to be a good and becomes a curse. There will then be no inducement for an upright and fearless discharge of duty. Every thing depends upon the intelligence and impartial action of the power that is vested with the appointment. Now it is impossible for the governor to know, whether the judges in distant quarters of the State have discharged with industry and fidelity the important trust committed to their hands. A judge is an important character, and the governor would hardly venture to displace him, except in cases of gross and glaring outrage. These considerations render it of vital importance that the task of holding the judiciary to responsibility should be reposed in the hands of the people.

I have examined this question in every point of view in which it could be considered, and I unhesitatingly declare it to be my deliberate judgment, that no objection can be taken against the system but such as is founded upon a distrust of the capacity and intelligence of the people. Every argument urged againt it, when stripped and disrobed of that which is extraneous, assumes necessarily this complexion. The same arguments can be urged against popular government itself that are urged against an elective judiciary. If the people are competent and capable and have the right to elect their judges, upon what pretence can they be deprived of the exercise of that right? Those who deny the right of the people—their competency and capacity—assume the only true and manly ground upon which this claim can be resisted. The monarchist and the aristocrat, who believe that it is for the benefit of the people, that they should be scourged into subjection, can hardly be expected to give it their countenance and support. The judiciary as now constituted, is the only aristocratic feature in our constitution. The antagonist principle to republicanism has here taken up its abode, and has retreated to this, the last citadel of its power. Line after line, entrenchment after entrenchment, have been carried by the victorious democracy, and when their banner shall be planted upon these battlements, the glorious triumph will have been complete.

Mr. President, an experience of thirty-two years ought to satisfy us that there is something radically defective in the system of permitting the executive to appoint the judiciary. That system has worked badly. The public mind has been deeply agitated on the subject we are now discussing. A distinguished gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Grymes) told us, the other day, ihat a feverish excitement prevailed among the people. That harrassing doubts and anxieties perplexed the public heart; and that there was a growing feeling of insecurityand alarm arising from deep seated and well founded distrust of the judiciary. The picture which he drew is faithful to nature. The feeling of insecurity exists, and it will continue to increase, until some efficient measure of reformation shall be adopted. When a system has worked badly, I know of no better way than to abolish it, and try some other system, which offers a better prospect of success. The election of judges by the direct votes of the people, is that system, and I can see no reason why it should not be adopted.

Some gentlemen have said, that we are anxious to reduce this government to the government of a mob, and they object to our proposition, because, they say, the judicial ermine will be soiled, if brought in contact with the people. Will any representative upon this floor stigmatize the people that elected him as a mob? The serfs and minions of monarchy employ language like this, to bring in disrepute and opprobrium, the free government, under which we live; but that American who adopts it as his own, degrades his parentage, shames his nature. and is guilty of wilful and wanton self-abasement. So far from the judiciary being contaminated, by reposing upon the votes of the people, new elements of vigor and strength and purity will be infused into it; and instead of being watched, as it now is, by jealous and distrustful eyes, it will be looked up to, with love and veneration, and regarded as the palladium of our public and private rights. What is it that makes the office of President of the United States a prize so highly esteemed, and so eagerly sought after, but the fact that he is elevated to that distinguished office by the suffrages of twenty millions of freemen? Any office becomes elevated and dignified, when conferred by the voluntary suffrages of a free people; and who is there that had not rather hold office awarded by the confidence of his countrymen, than if awarded by the proudest monarch that wears a diadem!

Another fallacy exists upon this subject, which is frequently urged against the system. We are told that all experience is against it. Sir, the very reverse of the proposition is true. All experience is in its favor. The failure of other States to make the experiment, cannot be quoted as their experience against it. You might as well contend that, because the people of Europe have not established republics, their experience is against republicanism.

A partial experiment of this system was made, many years ago, in Connecticut, and we have the authority of Mr. Jefferson, that it was eminently successful. But the experience upon which I chiefly rely, is that of our sister state of Mississippi. The testimony of the success of this system in that State. is too strong and unanimous for the existence of the fact to be denied. I know that gentlemen will sneer at any allusion to repudiating Mississippi, and that they will hold up their hands in holy horror, at the bare idea of attempting to engraft the democracy of Mississippi upon the constitution of Louisiana. Admit, for argument's sake, that upon this question, she is wrong, and that her legislature ought to tax her people, to redeem her bonds, that were hawked through the streets of London, and shaved by the British brokers, in defiance of her constitution: still, can any argument be drawn from that against the ability, the independence, and the honesty of her judiciary? Her judges are to be judged by their acts, and not by the acts of her legislature. I have said that the testimony from Mississippi, in favor of that system, is strong and conclusive. I will prove it. In addition to the evidence of the delegate from Baton Rouge (Mr. Read) I hold in my hand a letter from a gentleman well known, by reputation, in this State; a lawyer of distinguished abilities, whose testimony upon this point is entitled to peculiar weight. The letter is addressed to myself, and reads as follows:

New Orleans, March 22d, 1845.

Dear Sir:

I have received your letter of the nineteenth inst., requesting my views upon the operation in the State of Mississippi, of the system adopted there of electing judges by the direct votes of the people, and asking my attention, particulary, to the objection urged against the system, that such elections would generally, if not always, turn upon party, or political questions.—Having no objections to the public avowal of my former opinions, or present views, upon this interesting subject, I cheerfully comply with your request.

At the time of the adoption of the revised constitution in Mississippi, in 1832, I was, with a majority of the bar of that State, opposed to the system of electing the judges by the direct votes of the people. We regarded it as a new and hazardous experiment, beautiful in theory, but dangerous in practice. Many of us did not doubt the capacity or intelligence of the people to make the best selections, but we feared that popular excitements would find their way upon the bench, that party spirit and political prejudices would generally determine the selection, and that the judges would carry these predjudices with them upon the bench, and a train of other evils. These, and other objections, were urged in the Mississippi convention, with great ability. The system was, however, adopted, and of course, its operation has been watched with deep interest and severe criticism.

The experience and observation of nearly thirteen years, have convinced me, and many others who opposed the experiment, that our apprehensions were not well founded. So far, the system has worked well in our State. We have witnessed no evils attending it which are not incident to any other mode of selection, and on the contrary, the development of some advantages over other modes of appointment. Our judicial stations have been filled with as much, if not more ability, learning and weight of character, than formerly. So far, the people of our State have appeared to perform this delicate duty with as much intelligence and discernment, and I conceive, with more integrity of purpose, than any other appointing power. We have seen the electors of districts, in the midst of political party excitement, elect judges differing from them on political questions; and I believe no instance has yet occurred of the election of a judge, in our State, upon mere party questions.

Upon the whole, after a careful observation of the operation of our system, I give it as my decided opinion, that the experiment of electing judges by the direct votes of the people, has proved eminently successful in our State.

I am very respectfully, your ob't servant,
J. A. QUITMAN.

We have seen from this letter of Gen. Quitman, that during the space of thirteen years, this system has been in active operation in Mississippi, and that it has fully realized the expectations of its friends. We find that under its workings, politics have been driven from the bench, and the judicial stations of the State have been filled with ability, learning and weight of character. Can as much be said for the operation of our system in this State? So far from politics being driven from the bench, with us, we have seen noisy and brawling politicians yet smoking with the dust of the political battle-field, with all the exacerbations of political strife yet clinging around their hearts, elevated to the important trust of deciding upon the lives, the liberties and property of our people. The practical working of our system has been the very reverse of that of Mississippi. There can be no comparison instituted between the two. But as I have before observed, the testimony of this gentleman is entitled to peculiar weight. He was a member of the Convention of Mississippi that adopted the revised constitution of 1832. In that Convention he was the leader of the opposition to this principle. His pride of opinion, his prejudices have all been arrayed against it; yet, as he informed me, the observation of thirteen years had forced him gradually and reluctantly, to abandon his first position, and at this moment he regards it as the best possible system that could be devised. Should this Convention think proper to adopt the amendment now under debate, thirteen years hence, I have no doubt, that the gentlemen who are now loudest in their opposition, if called upon for their testimony, would write a letter similar to the one I have just perused. I cannot, however, dismiss this branch of the subject, without expressing my deep and heartfelt admiration of the sagacity, the moral courage and independence of the statesmen and people of Mississippi. Trusting to truth and principle, they fearlessly launched the bark of State upon what may have been considered, (notwithstanding the partial experience of Connecticut) as the ocean of an untried experiment; just as the mariner stretches out boldly and fearlessly upon the wide and trackless sea, relying upon those known and fixed laws of nature, which regulate the action of the compass, to guide him through storms and tempests, through darkness and through danger into that haven, where all the winds are still and nature sleeps in smiles.

But, sir, I have other and higher authority than that of Mississippi. We invoke in our behalf the authority of a great name, around which, in time past, the democracy of this country rallied, as around a tower of impregnable strength—it is the name of Thomas Jefferson. His opinions have already been alluded to by the delegate who preceded me, (Mr. Read) but there are other portions of the same letter quoted by him, to which I wish to call your attention. I read from his letter addressed to Samuel Kerchival, dated the 12th of July, 1816; Mr. Jefferson said, after speaking of the defects of the first constitutions adopted by the States:

"Where then is our republicanism to be found? Not in our constitution, certainly, but merely in the spirit of our people. That would oblige even a despot to govern us republicanly. Owing to this spirit, and to nothing in the form of our constitution, all things have gone well. But this fact, so triumphantly misquoted by the enemies of reformation, is not the fruit of our constitution, but has prevailed in spite of it. But it will be said, it is easier to find faults than to amend them. I do not think their amendment is so difficult as is pretended. Only lay down the true principles, and adhere inflexibly to them. Do not be frightened into their surrender, by the alarms of the timid and the croakings of wealth, against the ascendancy of the people. If experience be called for, appeal to that of our fifteen or twenty governments for forty years, and show me where the people have done half the mischief in these forty years, that a single despot would have done in a single year. The true foundation of republican government, is the equal right of every citizen in his person and property, and in their management. Try by this, as a tally, every provision of our constitution, and see if it hangs directly on the will of the people. Reduce your legislature to a convenient number, for full and orderly discussion. Let every man who fights or pays, exercise his just and equal right in their election. Let the executive be chosen in the same way, and for the same period. It is thought that the people are not competent electors of judges learned in the law. But I do not know that this is true, and if doubtful, we should follow principle. In this, as in many other elections, they would be guided by reputation, which would not err oftener, perhaps, than the present mode of appointment. In one State of the Union, at least, it has been long tried, and with the most satisfactory success. The judges of Connecticut have been chosen by the people, every six months, for nearly two centuries, and I believe there has hardly ever been an instance of change, so powerful is the curb of incessant responsibility. If prejudice, however, derived from a monarchical institution, is still to prevail against the vital elective principle of our own, and the existing example among ourselves of periodical election of judges by the people be mistrusted, let us at least not adopt the evil and reject the good of the English precedent. Let us retain amoveability on the concurrence of the executive and legislative branches, and nomination by the executive alone. To give it to the legislature, as we do, is a violation of the principle of the separation of powers."

Thus spoke the sage of Monticello.—The words of wisdom hang upon his lips. "only lay down true principles and adhere to them inflexibly. Do not be frightened into their surrender by the alarms of the timid, or the croakings of wealth against the ascendency of the people." Let this admonition sink deep into our hearts, and a way will be opened up to us for escape from all the evils that now impend above us. Who that peruses the strong and nervous language, the short and pithy sentences of this statesman and philosopher, as his bold mind travelled over this subject, and explored the true principles of a free government but what feels his pride kindled in the reflection that "he too is an American!" With that intuitive sagacity which ever distinguished him, he discovered that in a popular government, principle required that all officers should be elected by the people, and with that boldness and independence worthy of his mighty and unshrinking nature, he declared himself in favor of adhering to principle, and trusting the consequences to that great Providence, who overseeth and over ruleth all things. Sir, the authority of this great name cannot but have its weight with the posterity of that people, to whom he rendered so many and such important services. He was the penman of the great charter of our liberty, and he was foremost in unfurling the standard of resistance to British tyranny and oppression, at a time when that flag floated friendless in the breeze, yet his fame does not depend upon brilliant and successful warlike achievments. The light of military glory does not linger around his tomb, but the civil services, which he rendered to his country after the close of the war, in defining and establishing correct principles of government, have endeared him to the hearts of the American people, and have wreathed unfading laurels around his brow.

The fact, that this principle is not to be found in any of the ancient constitutions of the confederacy, is no argument against its adoption now. As Mr. Jefferson remarked in the same letter, "the abuses of monarchy, at the period of their establishment had so much filled the space of political contemplation that they imagined every thing to be republican which was not monarchy." The capacity of man for self-government was then an unsolved problem. The republican principle was then in its infancy. It has since grown and expanded into the full vigor of maturity, and it is now in the strong and lusty prime of its golden manhood. The American people are capable of self-government in its widest and most extended signification. If the experience of sixty years were not sufficient to satisfy the most credulous; the events which have taken place in the last twelve months, would furnish the proof. No man can as yet have forgotten the intense excitement of the last presidential election; an excitement which leaving the thronged avenues and crowded thoroughfares of our great cities, penetrated into the remotest regions, the most quiet and sequestered haunts of men; an excitement which was all absorbing, and all pervading; where all the fierce passions of our nature were called into action. Avarice, the greediness for office, the lust for place and power, and that demon of the mind, restless and unsleeping ambition. In fine the thousand strings of the human heart had been smote upon, and every cord was tingling at the touch. In the midst of all this excitement, while the waters of the political sea were boiling and bubbling around, the day for the election came: the ballots were deposited; and instantly, as if the voice of him who spake as never man spake, had bid the raging elements, be still, a peace, a quiet, a hush, as profound as that of the grave, settled and brooded over the land in all its length and breadth. Where the wide earth over! where in all the annals of human history, can a spectacle be found, equal to this for moral grandeur and sublimity! The spectacle of a vast and mighty people, swayed by all the commingled passions of our nature, instantly relapsing from excitement to repose, yielding ready obedience to the majesty of the law, and doing voluntary homage to that principle, which they themselves had established, that the majority should prevail.

I have been told by honorable gentlemen opposed to me, that they entertained not a doubt but that this system of an elective judiciary would ultimately be adopted; but they stated, we were not prepared for it now. The state of our preparation can have nothing to do with the question. If it be right, we are prepared for it now. If it be wrong, we shall never be prepared for it. But why do they suppose that this system will ultimately be adopted? If it be error, why can it not be detected, exposed, resisted and defeated? But it is because gentlemen feel and know that it is truth and not error, and that truth is mighty and must prevail. Error can be attacked, uprooted and destroyed, but truth mocks at your efforts and defies your power. No matter what changes and vicissitudes may take place in human affairs or on the face of the habitable globe, truth will still flourish in immortal youth. Revolutions may sweep over the earth—war may kindle and extinguish its battle fires around the globe—new empires may rise and sink like bubbles on the water, and nature herself may be dissolved in elemental fire—yet truth —truth—will live unhurt amid these changes, and will walk unscathed and unharmed through the conflagration.

Mr. President, whatever may be the action of this Convention, at all events my duty has been discharged, and I leave the consequences to those whose province it is to determine; and to him who holds in his right hand, the destinies of men and nations. Should this Convention decide to abandon truth and principle, for the prejudices of habit and early education, there is a tribunal to which we can appeal with a confidence almost amounting to certainty. There is a power behind us greater than we, that will sit in judgment over our work; and to the people, themselves, we must look for this great and salutary measure of reformation. I stand here one of a feeble and powerless minority, yet few and weak as we are, we have a weight and moral influence that can only be derived from truth and a good and honest cause—not from any abilities we possess, for we are the weakest of the weak, the humblest of the humble. Yet, sir, we are the champions of the people—the advocates of popular rights—the defenders of truth and justice. The great masses of the country are with us, and it is their voice which urges us on to the conflict, and which cheers and animates us in the approaching hour of defeat and disaster.

If honorable gentlemen expect that the agitation of this question will cease with the decision of this body, they are most wofully mistaken. The agitation has but commenced. They have but heard the first mutterings of the storm. When the public mind shall grapple with this subject; when the public attention shall be fixed upon it, we will then see which way the popular current sweeps, and woe be to him who shall lift up his puny arm to stem the current of Niagara.

I have no despair, sir. I can look from under the gloom of the present, to the rainbow Hope, which spans the heavens in the distant future. I am no prophet, and no son of a prophet; yet I can see traced in letters of light, upon the broad and ample page of our country's future history, the ultimate triumph and ascendancy of the great principles for which I am now contending. I may not live to see it—my heart may e'er then have ceased its anxious beatings—its hopes and its fears may alike be extinguished in the grave—yet there are those living, older than I, who who will hail its consummation.

> Truth, crushed to earth, will rise again;
> The eternal years of God are hers;
> But Error, wounded, writhes in pain,
> And dies amid her worshippers.

The yeas and nays were called for on Mr. Brent's substitute.

Mr. Porter would explain that he preferred the appointment by the legislature. But he conceived the people the source of all power, and he certainly preferred the election by the people, than the appointment by the governor.

The yeas and nays were called for; yeas 20, nays 40.

Mr. Peets then moved to lay his proposition on the table, subject to call, to be taken up in connection with the mode of appointment of district judges.

The yeas and nays were then called for on the adoption of the original section; yeas 35, nays 23.

On motion of Mr. Benjamin, the Convention took up the fifth section as amended, and adopted the same.

The eighth section was then adopted.

The Convention then proceeded to section eleventh.

Sec. 11. No court, or judge of any court, appointed under this constitution, shall exercise any jurisdiction, or perform any functions, but such as are purely judicial; and no other duties or functions shall ever be attached, by law, to the office of a judge, but such as are judicial.

Mr. Mayo hoped that the committee would explain what was meant by the words purely judicial; would it embrace writs of seizure, and sale and orders of sequestration?

Mr. Lewis thought that these were embraced in the judicial functions.

Mr. Mayo moved to strike out "no court, or judge of any court," and to substitute "no judge of the district or supreme court."

Mr. Beatty said that he preferred the substitute to the amendment, but he was opposed to both.

Mr. Downs proposed to make a slight amendment to the substitute offered by the delegate from Catahoula, (Mr. Mayo) by inserting the words "shall perform any function not properly appertaining to a judge."

Mr. Eustis said that his only objection to this, was, that it would open the whole question.

Mr. C. M. Conrad: It will leave the courts to determine.

Mr. Eustis: That is what the constitution should avoid.

The yeas and nays were called for on the substitute; yeas 23, nays 27.

Mr. C. M. Conrad proposed the recommitment.

Mr. Mayo moved to strike out the word "purely," there were many mixed questions.

Mr. Eustis objected.

Mr. M. Taylor moved to insert the words "nor receive fees of office."

Mr. Lewis did not wish to argue the question; he was in favor of taking away from the judges all functions not judicial. In relation to justices of the peace it might be necessary to introduce some amendment, showing that they were not embraced in the clause. For that class of magistrates he would acknowledge he was in favor of the popular election.

Mr. Saunders moved to add the word "gratuitous" after the word "judicial."

Mr. Guion moved to substitute, for all the amendments, the following: the legislature shall not assign other duties but those that are purely judicial.

Mr. Lewis said that the gentleman's object appeared to make parish judges out of justices of the peace; he was wedded to that system, and that was his object.

Mr. Guion: I did not intend to raise the ghost of the dead parish-court system. My friend from St. Landry is mistaken; the question was taken on Mr. Guion's substitute, and it was lost.

Mr. Garrett thought that the section was sufficient; he would therefore move to lay all the amendments on the table indefinitely.

Mr. Benjamin hoped that the section would be adopted; he saw no necessity for the amendments. What was to prevent the legislature to permit the same abuses to grow up that have heretofore prevailed, and for accumulating in the judicial office again the functions of auctioneer, notary, &c. He thought the language of the section sufficiently explicit. It was to restrict the judges from exercising any other functions but those that were purely judicial. He was placed upon the bench to administer justice between man and man, and not to make contracts. These were not within his appropriate functions. There were stronger reasons for restricting the judges to functions purely judicial, because one judge was appointed for several parishes. Let us break up every thing like partial legislation. If you amend this section, and give the discretionary power to the legislature, the result will be continual exceptions in favor of particular judicial districts. It will be found desirable in some parishes, that the judge of the district court would make a good president of a police jury, and an act will be asked for to confer on him the duties of that office.

We shall thus insensibly be laid back to the old system. If the people chose to confer any duties upon the judge, not inconsistent with his judicial functions, let them do so. But let us maintain the present system in all its integrity.

Mr. Dunn said that it was very easy to destroy, to pull down—but it was difficult to build up. You destroy one system without giving us to understand what system should take its place. The Convention ought to know this, to vote understandingly, and with a due sense of public wants and public interest. I would ask gentlemen, where are the interests of orphans to be guarded? Who are to make inventories? Who are to take care of the estates of the helpless. There is nothing that reveals, nothing that sheds any light upon this very important point. Before I vote for the details of your system, I should like to know what officer is to look over these interests. I hope that the section will be laid on the table, until some functionaries are provided to take the place of probate judges, until you have established a tribunal to preserve the interests of successions. So far as the judges of the parish courts and the district courts are concerned, there is no great difference. But in reference to the probate court, there is evidently something required. There should be no speculation upon this subject. There should be some officer appointed to protect the interests of those who are unable to protect themselves; and I should prefer it if one of these officers were appointed for each parish. I move that this section be laid upon the table, until some provision be made upon this matter, and until you have determined the jurisdiction of such court as is necessary to take cognizance of the cases to which I have referred.

Mr. Garrett said that the gentleman was about to propose the revival of the parish court system.

Mr. Dunn said that he did not wish to frighten gentlemen with the ghost of the parish court system. He only proposed to lay the section upon the table until some provision was made for the indispensable business growing out of successions; he was anxious to know what was to take the place of the probate court. In his parish, alone, it would require all the time of a judge to transact all the legal business that arose. He hoped that nothing would be done until some disposition was made of this matter.

The question was taken on Mr. Dunn's motion, and it was lost.

Mr. C. M. Conrad proposed the following amendment: no judge shall hold any other office but that of a judge, and if other duties be assigned to him by the legislature, they shall be performed gratuitously.

Mr. Conrad said that his object was to prevent the multiplication of office in the hands of the judge. It was admitted on all hands, that the accumulation of these offices was a great evil; he wished to remedy that evil, but he was apprehensive that the clause in the section was too sweeping. The question might well arise, what were judicial functions? Was the appointment of an administrator, a dative testamentary executor, a proceeding purely judicial? The examination of young men for admission to the bar; was that a judicial function? Again, was the certifying of a record, a judicial function? He could see no use in tieing up the hands of the legislature. He thought that the clause was too sweeping.

Mr. Mayo moved to insert after the words "no judge," in Mr. Conrad's substitute, the following, "of the supreme court or of the district courts.

Mr. Lewis proposed to insert the words "or exercise." He wished the prohibition to be in explicit terms.

Mr. Downs proposed the following: "no judge shall perform or exercise the functions appertaining to a notary or an auctioneer, or any other duties which do not belong to the office of judge."

Mr. Soule was apprehensive that these numerous attempts to amend the section would be attended with no good result. He could not understand how the words purely judicial could interfere with those functions which necessarily arose from their office, and in the exercise of which it is not intended they should be restricted. In point of fact, it was not as judges that the parish judges exercise the functions of notaries public and auctioneers, but it was ex-officio, in virtue of a special law. If the judges be inhibited the exercise of certain functions, it is clear that they are still permitted to exercise those functions that do not come within that category.

The question was severally taken upon the propositions of Messrs. Conrad and Downs, and they were rejected.

Mr. Downs then moved to insert after the words "purely judicial," the following, "and which do not properly belong to the functions of judge," and to strike out the words "any jurisdiction."

The yeas and nays were called for on Mr. Downs' amendment; yeas 23, nays 32.

Mr. Mayo then moved to strike out the word "purely;" which motion prevailed.

Mr. Miles Taylor moved to add the following, "and they shall receive no fees of office."

Whereupon, on motion, the Convention adjourned.

Wednesday, April 23, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer by the Rev. Mr. High.

Mr. Marigny said he had been long enough in this Convention for each one of its members to be persuaded that he was sincerely devoted to his country, and that he would propose nothing which was not for its present and future welfare. If any one should feel surprised at the proposition I am now about to introduce, and which I desire may be placed in our social compact, I will respond that no one is worthy of holding the station of a legislator in a republic, who is fearful of assuming responsibility when a question is involved, in which all the citizens, of whatever station, must feel an interest, and which will indubitably be discussed in an inverse sense. He had reflected for a long time, as well upon the motives which determined him to submit this clause to the examination of the Convention, as well as upon the effects which it would produce if it were sanctioned. It does not belong to the matter now under discussion, but will properly come up in the general provisions. I shall then take that occasion to show that it is expedient, and I trust that my arguments will be understood. Inasmuch as the proposition is one of some consequence, I have thought it not out of place to present it now, in order that it may be taken into consideration by the members of the Convention, and that after due reflection, they may be prepared to vote upon it. My colleague (Mr. Eustis) will at my request make a translation of the proposition—it is as follows: "The legislature shall have the power to confer the rights and privileges of citizenship upon those descendants of persons of color, upon whom, for motives of public policy, it may deem expedient; provided, that said descendants be born in the State."

Mr. Marigny then proposed that the foregoing resolution be laid on the table subject to call.

The Convention then took up the

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Section eleventh of the majority report, as amended, viz:

Sec. 11. No court, or judge of any court, appointed under this constitution, shall exercise any jurisdiction, or perform any functions, but such as are judicial; and no other duties or functions shall ever be attached by law, to the office of a judge, but such as are judicial.

The question under consideration at the adjournment, was the motion of Mr. Taylor of Assumption, to amend by adding after the word "judicial," in the fourth line, the words "or receive any fees of office."

On motion, said amendment was adopted.

Mr. Mayo moved to amend said section, by inserting after the word "functions," in the third line, the words "arise directly from the exercise of judicial functions."

The Chair (Mr. Taylor of Assumption in the chair) decided the amendment to be out of order.

Mr. Mayo appealed from the decision of the chair.

On the question being put, the decision was sustained.

Mr. Lewis then moved the adoption of the section as amended, viz:

Sec. 11. No court, or judge of any court, appointed under this constitution, shall exercise any jurisdiction, or perform any functions but such as are judicial; or receive any fees of office; and no other duties or functions shall ever be attached by law to the office of a judge, but such as are judicial.

The yeas and nays being called for on the adoption of said section,

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton,

Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the affirmative—41 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Guion, Labauve, Marigny, Mayo, Roman, Trist and Waddill voted in the negative—8 nays; consequently said motion was carried, and the section was adopted.

On motion, the twelfth section was taken up, viz:

Sec. 12. No court, or judge of any court, shall ever have the power, by any order or judgment, in any suit, process or other proceeding before them, or pending in such court, to order or adjudge any money to be paid by the parties to such suits or proceedings, or make any allowance out of any money or property that may be in actual custody of said court, or officers thereof, except for the payment of legal fees of the ministerial officers of the said court, as allowed and established by law.

Mr. Benjamin offered the following as a substitute for said section, viz:

"No court, or judge of any court, shall ever have the power to order the payment or allowance of any fee or compensation, to any attorney, curator ad hoc, or other similar officer, appointed to represent any minor, absent heir, creditor or other party interested in any cause or proceeding, before such court or judge."

Mr. Guion moved to amend said substitute by inserting after the word "compensation," the words "except such as are allowed by law."

Mr. Benjamin said that he desired to state a few considerations which rendered the adoption of his proposition, or some thing equivalent to it, of indispensable necessity. The abuses which have grown up were without a parallel in the civilzed world. Large sums of money were allowed by order of the courts to persons who were appointed to represent absent heirs and absent creditors, without reference to the value or the necessity of these services. An attempt to put a stop to the evil had been made in the legislature but it had failed. There was a law limiting the amount in insolvent cases and prescribing that it should be paid out of the amounts collected, but in ninety-nine cases it was never carried into effect. He had known of cases where the fees of the attorney to represent the absent creditors exceeded the dividend. In cases of successions an attorney was appointed to represent the absent heirs, and his duty was confined to writing a simple letter to inform the parties that were presumed to be interested, that a succession was opened; and for this trifling service four or five hundred dollars and some times more were allowed by the court, or for the attorney of the absent heirs affixing his name to the inventory. This course of proceeding was calculated to bring great discredit upon the administration of our laws. It was in fact a system of legal plunder, of pillage, in which the property of absentees were most unmercifully fleeced. But these were not the only evils. It conferred a great deal of patronage in the disposition of the judge, and enabled the courts to sustain favorites at the bar. It appeared to him to be one of the most flagrant abuses. The profession of the law was as well remunerated as any of the liberal professions. Its members ought to be satisfied, and should be bound to represent the absent parties until a correspondence could be had between the parties. When the judge would find it necessary to appoint an attorney to comply with the formalities of law, that attorney ought to tender his service gratis; it was due by him to his profession; in the same way that a member of the bar would attend to a criminal case if requested to do so by the judge, without any compensation. He (Mr. Benjamin) would willingly contribute his quota of service, in order to put a stop to what might be appropriately designated a legal plunder. The members of the bar ought to be bound to accept for the time being this amount of tax upon their labor. It would be but little. It was at present accumulated in the hands of two or three, but if it were no longer a source of emolument, it would be distributed among the whole profession. He repeated that it was a service due to the profession, and it would preserve the judiciary pure. It would do away with the money patronage of the judges; they would not have a score of protegies in their pay, and unable to appropriate the money of absent persons without check or control. Every thing like legislative control have proved inoperative. He hoped his proposition would prevail. The members of the bar would no doubt readily perform this duty. It should be regarded as a part of the tax for obtaining their diplomas, and they would discharge it with the same alacrity as if called upon to volunteer in a criminal prosecution.

Mr. Mayo said he was anxious to stop the sources of all possible abuses, but it was indispensable that the absent creditors and absent parties should be adequately represented. To insure this, there should be a fee attached for the rendition of the services, or otherwise the interest of parties would be either totally neglected or inefficiently attended to. The best counsel, whose time were valuable, would not engage in these matters without being paid; nor did he know that it ought to be expected that these services ought to be rendered gratuitously, inasmuch as the parties interested were in a situation to pay for the services rendered.

Mr. Guion: I agree with the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin,) that the allowances to attorneys to represent absent parties are frequently disproportionate with the services rendered. His proposition however is more beautiful in theory than in practice. I have no doubt that in the generosity of his nature he would very willingly contribute his services, but it would not be so throughout the State. To do away with the patronage of the judges as he desires, it would be necessary to change our whole system. The only remedy that can be applied under existing circumstances, is to establish fixed fees in such cases.

Mr. Beatty was opposed both to the proposition of the gentleman from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin,) and to the amendment offered by his colleague from Lafourche (Mr. Guion,) although he considered the latter less exceptionable. He considered that every individual was entitled to be paid for his services whether he were an attorney at law or not. In his opinion the proposition was a matter for legislation, and should not be introdced into the constitution. He conceded that serious abuses may have arisen in New Orleans and some other parishes. But in the section of country in which he lived there were no abuses either in reference to this matter, or in reference to others, which it seemed had elsewhere brought the probate court system into so much disfavor. As nothing is better calculated to establish facts than actual occurrences, he would state a case in point.

In 1840 a widow married without obtaining the consent of a family meeting to retain the tutorship of her minor children. She was consequently by the effect of the law deprived of it, and has sought in vain to be reinstated. The amount of property is large, and the security required by the judge is consequently large. The minors have no relations, or at least they have none who are able to become tutors or tutrixes. Strangers are unwilling to accept the charge, and the minors remained without a tutor. The property amounts to twenty thousand dollars; a number of suits had been instituted against the father, but no judgment has been obtained against the succession. Four or five years ago I was appointed by the court tutor ad hoc, to represent the minors and to defend them in several suits for various sums from four to five hundred dollars, and one suit is for as mnch as twelve thousand dollars. Now I would ask, in similar cases is it reasonable to expect an attorney to give his services for a series of years without compensation; and yet this as well as many other cases would fall under the gentleman's proposition where the parties are able to pay. If abuses are the result of the present system it ought to be left to the legislature to provide the proper remedies. It is not to be presumed that the legislature will continue to neglect their duties, nor that the judges appointed for a limited term will neglect and violate the intendment of the law for the purpose of gratifying a few favorites at the bar. The courts should be restrained in the exercise of the faculty of making allowances without putting it entirely out of their power to make a reasonable allowance.

Mr. Lewis hoped that the amendment of the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Guion,) would not prevail. He did not know that any great abuses existed in his section of the country in relation to the administration of property which belonged to absent persons. He conceived it wrong in principle to dispose of the property of such persons without their knowledge or consent. As he understood the proposition of the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin,) it did not interfere with a proper allowance in proportion to the amount of services rendered. It was simply intended to restrain the judges as judges, and the courts as courts. It was to take away what was called their patronage, and which might be distributed with a lavish hand among their favorites. It was to leave the patrons without the means to fill the pockets of their favorites. He thought it a necessary principle and that it ought to be incorporated in the organic law. He did not believe that any judge was so corrupt as to have any personal interest in the distribution of these amounts, for the services that were rendered, and which were in striking disproportion to those services. He did not believe that, to use a common expression the judge went snacks, but it is possible that corruption and venality may find its way into high places. Even the distinguished philosopher and jurist, Francis Lord Bacon was seduced from the paths of rectitude. We should guard and protect the judiciary, and if possible place it beyond the reach of suspicion. I apprehend there will be no difficulty in carrying out the proposition of the delegate Mr. Benjamin. Whoever heard that when the services of a lawyer were required that he did not freely volunteer them, although he was conscious that they would be rendered without compensation. I have never heard of a respectable attorney who has refused to defend a criminal because that criminal had not the means of paying him. In an experience of twenty years at the bar, I have never heard of any thing of the kind. It is considered a point of honor among the profession, and these services are discharged with as much alacrity and as much zeal as if they were secured by a large fee. The amendment of the delegate from Lafourche I consider unnecessary. I hope the proposition will be adopted without the amendment.

Mr. Brent said, I agree in principle, but I differ in the construction placed upon the proposition by the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis.) The language I understood to be similar to that reported by the committee. I consider that the legislature would not have the power to impose upon the courts under the restriction, the appointment of attorneys to represent absent parties, and to allow them a compensation. Some provision ought to be made for allowing a reasonable compensation in such cases, but I am opposed to the courts fixing that compensation. I think that it ought to be fixed by the legislature; it ought to be established by law, and I think that the original section, with a slight alteration, would accomplish that result.

Mr. Dunn thought it better to postpone the consideration of this subject. There was no doubt of the fact that many abuses were the result of allowing the judges to appoint the attorneys, and then allowing them their fees. But he thought that if no provision was made, the interests of absent persons would suffer. Unless the attorney appointed was paid for his services, the interests of the parties would not be properly represented. At any rate, this was a matter within the competency of the legislature. A provision even might be introduced to make it obligatory upon the legislature to prescribe suitable legislation. It might happen that a man living in Mississippi might have large interests in this State to be protested, and under the proposition of the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) he would command the services of a member of the bar for nothing. On the other hand, it might prove injurious to the party represented, for after all there was nothing like interest, and lawyers were not an exception from the general rule. I do not say so, but it is a prevalent opinion. The legislature could take all such measures as were necessary.

Mr. Preston was opposed to laying the section upon the table. It had been postponed once before. He thought the Convention should go through with it. To his mind it was one of the wisest provisions, and to show how necessary it was considered, he would state the fact, that it had met with the unanimous sanction of both the majority and minority of the committee. He preferred the original section to the substitute of the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin.) The only objection to the original section was, that there was some little obscurity in the middle of it. It might be construed that the judge could not order the payment of money. But, the phraseology could be changed. It could be put into proper form by the revising committee; but we are met by the objection that these abuses could be cured by legislative intervention. To this he would reply, that they had existed for thirty or forty years, and no attempt had been made to remedy them. They had grown up, and were piled like Ossa upon Pelion. It was safe to infer from their overwhelming influence, that they would predominate hereafter, and as the legislature had never provided a remedy, it was to be presumed they could not, since they had not. It was fallacious to argue from special cases. But take the strong case put by the delegate from Lafourche (Mr. Beatty) where the minors were able to pay, and could have paid. The judge might have appointed a planter or a merchant, as the tutor ad hoc, and the tutor could have employed the lawyer, and have stipulated for his fees. This would have been the course, had it not been competent for the judge to make the selection of an attorney. He (Mr. Preston) objected to the money patronage of the judge. It produced crying evils in this community, thoughout the State. Persons had begun to regard it as so much business, to which they were legitimately entitled, and it had so far blunted their feelings that they were glad to hear of a failure or a death. The result was that the interests of a few favorites were exclusively consulted, and with moderate talents they obtained a great ascendancy over the judge. It went so far, that parties saw it, and they would go and employ the judge's favorite, to gain their case. He had no idea that there was any corruption of money, but there was a corruption of influence. This power of allowing money out of the estates of absent persons, or of persons incapable of representing themselves, ought to be repudiated. It resulted in the dilapidation of estates, and rendered them in many instances insolvent. There were but few exceptions, and these were in large estates. There was more paid to protect estates, frequently, than was left to be divided among the heirs, or distributed among the creditors. The legislature had fixed a fee of two hundred and fifty dollars for the attorney to represent absent creditors, in insolvent cases, to which each of the creditors were to contribute proportionably. But a great deal more than that amount was allowed in spite of the law. The consequences of the practice was to encourage enormous fees, and the attorneys for absent heirs were allowed large sums of money when it was not possible that the heirs themselves should ever get one cent. The features were the same in insolvent estates. The favorite attorney was paid, even though the creditors should not get one cent. The practice had become habitual, and the parties interested did not think they were doing wrong. An attorney who was a witness to these proceedings, could not reprobate them, because it would deprive him of his standing in the courts. You cannot reprobate the judges. It cannot be done, and will not be done. The Convention have the opportunity of rendering the judiciary pure, and not only pure, but like Cæsar's wife, beyond suspicion. The judges will applaud you to the skies. If you deprive them of this money patronage, by which they will be relieved from the swarm of parasites that hover about them with their mouths open, to devour insolvent estates and successions. There is no other State in the Union where this money patronage is to be found. The course pursued elsewhere, where absent persons are interested, is to make publications in the public papers. In most cases of attachment or seizure, the garnishee is the agent of the defendant, and would properly represent his interests. As relates to minors, I have answered the case submitted by the gentleman from Lafourche (Mr. Beatty.) In the case of estates of deceased persons, the executor can represent the interest of the absent heirs as well as an attorney specially appointed for that purpose. The same thing can be said of the curator. The executor had the confidence of the testator, as is shown by the will, and that should be conclusive. The curator has the confidence of the court. It is a humbug got up to pretend that the interest of absent persons are to be taken care of by the courts through the intervention of favorite attorneys, who are to be rewarded by extravagant fees, and in fact to the great detriment of the interests of those whom they are to represent. If the interests of these parties are likely to suffer, it might be made the duty of district attorneys, throughout the State, to intervene in all such cases to protect their interests, until they made themselves known, or caused themselves to be duly represented. This would be infinitely better. In the city of New Orleans, and for the parish of Jefferson, it would be, perhaps, necessary to increase the salary of the district attorney, by reason of the great accumulation of labor that would result, and this could be done by increasing the tax upon foreign successions, which has been established. He believed the parties that were so much benefitted by the existing system, were not aware that there was any thing wrong in it, and they were led to believe that they could get property without adequate labor. One of the first objects is to render your courts pure and unsullied. This was a reform most loudly called for.

Mr. CHINN said he could not consent by his vote to admit this matter into the constitution. It was a subject of pure legislation.

Mr. SOULE deemed it to be his duty, under a sense of impartiality, to correct some errors into which the gentleman had fallen in treating the subject. That there has been abuses in the administration of successions, and in the administration of the estates of insolvents admitted of no doubt. But he must confess he felt surprised that two members of the New Orleans bar should attribute these abuses in any way to the judge. They have grown out of defective legislation. To hear the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) one would suppose that the judges were at fault. It had always been in the power of the legislature to apply a remedy for any abuses that might be found to exist in the system. In regard to the amounts allowed to attorneys to represent absent heirs, the judge of the court of probates in the city, never took it upon himself to fix the fees in such cases. That is not the practice. The course was to present the account and have it discussed before the judge contradictorily, as in common cases, and the proof had to be administered to the judge in the presence of the parties that might choose to contest the claim. He did not speak from his own experience, for he had never been appointed to represent absent parties and never should be; but he spoke from what he had seen in cases in which he was interested in a practice of fifteen years. How is it then assumed by the gentlemen who are familiar with the practice, as a fact unsusceptible of contradiction, that the judges assess the fees of those whom they may choose to appoint to render these services. I never have known any judge to assume such a power. It is for the curator, administrator or executor to put down any exhorbitant claim. It is simply presented among other claims to be homologated, and public notice is given in the newspapers, to the end that any one who may feel interested, may contest the claim. It is throwing a responsibility by asserting that the judge takes upon himself any power to make the allowance arbitrarily; it is never assumed, and never can be assumed by the judge under your law. After erasing from the statute books, the parish judge and probate court system, although it has been intimated that New Orleans is the place of the greatest abuses in relation to these matters, I dare assert, that the judge of the probate court never takes it upon himself to allow any claim unless the proofs be exhibited in the presence of the parties interested.

I desired, said Mr. Soulé, to correct the gentleman, because an impression might have been created which was not authorized by the facts. It is but an act of simple justice to the gentleman who presides over the court of probates in the city to make these explanations. Now, in reference to the merit of the question, I will observe that it is a mere matter of legislation, and it ought not to be interpolated in the constitution. If you cannot trust your legislature, you might as well abolish it. But it strikes me that this want of confidence in the legislature is tantamount to denying the right of the people to govern themselves. If you cannot trust your legislature in the unimportant matter of regulating the fees of attornies for absent parties, you might as well, and better, refuse them the powers with which they have been so largely vested in the constitution. He would vote against taking this matter out of its appropriate sphere.

Mr. BENJAMIN said that his colleague (Mr. Soulé) labored under a misapprehension, or he would not certainly have volunteered a defence where no attack had been made. I have not heard a syllable attacking the judge of the court of probates, or any other judicial functionary, and I am surprised that the gentleman should have so construed any thing that might have been said. Nothing that I said could bear such a construction. I spoke generally and cited the proceedings in insolvent cases, and it is not the court of probates that has any thing to do with these bankruptcies. I stated that there was a law regulating these charges. That law has been passed about twenty-eight years. It provides that the fees shall be paid by the mass of the creditors from the amount recovered, at the rate of five per cent. Why did I cite the law? It was to show that the legislature had acted, but that their enactment was totally inefficient. It was the daily practice, where not one cent was collected, to exact exhorbitant fees in direct contradiction with the law. Did I say that the judges were responsible? It is the fault of the system itself, which admits of the abuse. It is in this way that the transaction is consummated: A. is the attorney of the syndic of the estate; B. has been appointed by the court, attorney to represent the absent creditors. When it becomes necessary for A. to file his tableau into court, he meets B. and asks him for his account. B. makes out the account according to how much he can get out of the estate, and not according to the amount of actual services rendered. A. is a friend to B., and he says this is not my business, the amount is large, but there are gross abuses in these matters, and he puts down B. for the full amount of his fee. The tableau is presented to the court, and the usual notice is given preparatory to its homologation. B. figures upon it for two, three or five hundred dollars, when in point of fact his services were not worth twenty dollars. After the expiration of ten days the tableau is homologated as a matter of course, there being no opposition. It happens that there are a large number of creditors, and the dividend to each is small; and the increase would not be sufficient to induce them to contest B.'s claim. B. pockets the money, to which he has no right. This is unjust, and it is to this abuse I wish to see applied an efficacious remedy.

In the case of successions, the practice is but little varied, and the result is the same. A. is the attorney of a succession. B. has been appointed by the court to represent the absent heirs. The executor has no interest in the matter. His duty is limited to administering the estate in conformity with law. The tableau is about to be placed in court, and B. hands in his account, which, as a matter of course is placed upon it. No opposition is made, and the judge presumes that it is right. Thus it is that the man who is appointed to protect the interest of the absent party, finds himself in the singular position of being interested to plunder him. The abuse exists, and it is manifest that the legislature has failed to apply a remedy. It must be borne in mind too that there are strong motives for upholding these abuses. They are the sources of immense profits. They ought to be uprooted in the constitution, and I think no matter too small which tends directly to uphold the purity of the judiciary. I attack no man, and it is gratuitous to suppose any thing of the kind. I repeat again that it is the fault of the system, and not the fault of individuals. One of the principal causes that promoted the call of the Convention, was to reform the abuses in the judiciary. They have caused more complaint than any thing else. I can see no objections to impose so slight a tax upon lawyers. They are at any rate a privileged class. They have to undergo a preliminary examination, and if admitted they are privileged to pursue the profession, exclusive of all others who are not admitted. This is an advantage. It is not so with manual employments. The apprentice to the brick-layer or carpenter, may set himself up as a journeyman, and get the same wages. It is clearly within the competency of the authorities, as the price of the license, to impose upon the lawyer the duty of attending to all cases where the parties are absent, gratuitously, as is now done in relation to criminal cases, when the accused has not the means of employing counsel. It would be a light tax, and it is one to which they ought to be subjected. I know of no other way to cure the evil. The authority to dispose of another man's money without his consent, or without his knowledge is in violation of every principle of right and justice. The system has led to crying abuses, and it ought to be put a stop to forever.

Mr. Preston said that he attacked no one in the remarks which he had submitted to the Convention. He certainly did not intend to say one word against the individual to whom reference had been had. He entertained for him the highest respect and kindest feelings.

Mr. Soule: The remarks of the gentlemen amount to this, that they have not attacked any one. Where have these abuses originated? They admit that the evils that exist have grown out of legislation. Because our legislation has been inefficient should we frame a body of laws? It has been stated that no allusion was made to the judges. I thought there was an unjust allusion made to them, but I did not intend to charge that such allusion was made by my colleague, (Mr. Benjamin.) Frequent allusions have been had during this debate to the parish judge and probate judge of New Orleans. From what has been said, it might be inferred that they were the supreme rulers of the fees allowed to attorneys appointed to represent absent parties. This is not the fact. There is not a bar in the world where good offices are rendered with more generosity than by the bar of New Orleans. I never heard that any citizen whose honor, life, and reputation were at stake, however humble or poor he might be, that wanted the assistance of the best defence of which his case was susceptible. As far as their liberality were taxed they were willing to accept the trust. But I do not think that it would be proper to impose an obligation upon them in the constitution, which, after all involved a question of generosity, and not of duty. We were not here to constitute laws, but to form a constitution. For these reasons, he should vote against the proposition.

Mr. Eustis begged permission to submit one or two remarks. He thought it wise and salutary to deprive the judges of every species of patronage. It was considered by the committee that the work assigned to them was not complete without some such guard as they proposed in the section. In a sister State, where similar abuses had grown up, a similar remedy had been applied. He would take the liberty of reading from the constitution of New Hampshire. [Mr. E. here read the clause referred to.] No where else did the system exist of making allowances out of the money of absent persons. It was regarded as sacred, and held inviolate. He could see no good reason why a contrary practice should prevail here.

Mr. Beatty moved to lay the section, the substitute and amendment on the table indefinitely. The yeas and nays being called for, (Mr. Taylor of Assumption in the chair,)

Messrs. Beatty, Briant, Carriere, Chinn, Labauve, Soulé and Trist voted in the affirmative—7 yeas; and Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cénas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, King, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Read, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the negative—50 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

Mr. C. M. Conrad thought some such amendment was necessary as was proposed by the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Guion.) Cases will arise, as have arisen, where the rights of those not competent to represent themselves would have to be represented. He was disposed to give as much credit to the members of the bar of New Orleans for liberality, as to the members of any other profession, and they would have to be as ready to perform any service gratuitously as the members of any other profession. But why declare that they shall render important services for ever gratuitously. If they were willing to render these services in particular cases, of the exigency of which they were the best judges, why let them do so. Let them have the privilege of selecting the proper object for their liberality. He could see no reason in subjecting them by an irrevocable rule to render services to a rich heir in France or in England. Such cases would not be proper subjects for charity. It had been stated that experience had proved that laws were inefficient to correct the evil complained of. Why the judge was as much bound to conform to the law as he was to the constitution. Both were obligatory, and if the law was rendered inoperative by the neglect of the judge, the constitutional provision might in the same way remain inoperative. He concurred in opinion that there ought to be a curb put to judicial patronage, to arrest the abuses that resulted from it. But he thought this was a proper subject for legislation.

With leave of the house, Mr. Benjamin withdrew the substitute offered by him.

Mr. Lewis then offered the following substitute, viz:

No court or judge shall make any allowance by way of fee or compensation in any suit or proceeding, except for the payment of such fees to ministerial officers as may be established by law.

Mr. Lewis moved the adoption of said substitute.

Mr. Conrad said that this amendment did not meet precisely his views, nor his argument. He would move to strike out the words "ministerial officers."

Mr. Benjamin said that these words were placed in the substitute at his request; without them we should accomplish nothing.

Mr. Beatty would call the particular attention of the Convention to what they were about incorporating in the constitution. He considered it absurd to declare in that instrument that the members of the bar should render services gratuitously for strangers which were not even pretended to be claimed for our own citizens; to render services to every foreigner upon the surface of the globe. If the question was understood, it could not, nor would not receive the sanction of the Convention. I can very well understand, and I conceive it to be proper, when the law has compelled the foreign heir to present himself, or to be duly represented by a power of attorney, that the right of action of the counsel appointed by the court to represent him, to a reasonable compensation, should be postponed until he is present, or represented by his own orders; but until this be done, it is nothing more than just that the attorney appointed for the protection of his rights should be compensated for his services out of the property which is protected. Now, as to the amount of that allowance, it should not be unreasonable nor disproportionate to the services rendered. In almost every country attachment suits are brought against the property of non-residents. There surely is some way of getting at the property, whether they appoint an attorney to defend the interests of the absent person, as in Louisiana, or not. I am but little familiar with the common law practice; but I presume there must be some mode of enforcing payment, and of proceeding against the party. There are many of our citizens who have to be represented in our sister States, in matters of pecuniary interest. It may become necessary that I should be represented in the State of Kentucky. If legal services were rendered in that State in my behalf, whether I were compelled to pay for them or not by law, I should feel nevertheless bound to do so. I am not willing to leave this a matter of generosity. In equity, I conceive that the party represented is bound to pay for the services rendered. There should be some legal means then of enforcing payment. But this proposition debars you. It debars you even if the party appear, and although you may have represented him in matters of immense value, and would be entitled to recover your claim before any judge or any jury, you are debarred from suing him. The court has no power of allowing you one cent, nor can you seek payment by any other means. As for the amendment of my colleague from Lafourche, (Mr. Guion) I consider it impracticable. It is impossible to fix the fee to be received by a legislative act. The amount allowed may be insufficient, or it may be exhorbitant, according to the particular service rendered. The only remedy which in my opinion can be applied, would be to require that no allowance should be made by the court, to the attorney appointed, but that he should have his recourse against the individual for whom he appeared, or his duly qualified agent. That remedy would meet the difficulty, and I should be satisfied with it.

Mr. Chinn called for the previous question.

The yeas and nays were called for on Mr. Conrad's motion to strike out the words "to ministerial officers," (Mr. Taylor of Assumption it the chair,)

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Carriere, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Porter, Scott of Feliciana, Splane and Trist voted in the affirmative—15 yeas; and Messrs. Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Chambliss, Covillion, Chinn, Eustis, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Read, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the negative—39 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

Mr. Dunn offered the following amendment, to be inserted after the word "compensation," viz:

"Unless such compensation be allowed by a judgment rendered contradictorily with the parties interested."

Mr. Dunn moved for the adoption of said amendment; which motion was lost.

Mr. Lewis moved for the adoption of the substitute; the yeas and nays being called for, (Mr. Taylor of Assumption in the chair,)

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Covillion, Eustis, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Peets, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Read, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the affirmative—36 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Downs, Garrett, Guion, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Mayo, Mazureau, Porter, Roman, Saunders, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Splane, Trist and Wadsworth voted in the negative—19 nays; consequently said motion was carried, and the substitute adopted.

On motion, the fourteenth section was taken up, viz:

Sec. 14. There shall be an attorney general for the State, and as many other prosecuting attorneys for the State as may be hereafter found necessary. The said attorneys shall be appointed by the governor, with the advice and approbation of the senate. Their duties shall be determined by law.

Mr. McRae moved to amend said section by striking out the words, "the said attorneys shall be appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and approbation of the senate," and insert in lieu thereof the following amendment, viz:

"The attorney general shall be elected by the qualified electors of the State at large, and the prosecuting attorneys, by the qualified electors of the several districts."

Mr. Read moved for a division, that is, the Convention first proceed to sirike out the words "the said attorneys shall be appointed," &c.; which motion prevailed.

The yeas and nays being called for on the motion to strike out,

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Preston, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Stephens, Trist, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—23 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Chinn, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Dunn, Eustis, Guion, Garrett, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Wadsworth, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the negative—31 nays; consequently the motion was lost.

On motion, the said fourteenth section was adopted.

On motion, the fifteenth section was taken up, viz:

Sec. 15. The State shall be divided into the following judicial districts, in each of which one judge, learned in the law, shall be appointed. Said districts shall remain unchanged until the first day of January, eighteen hundred and fifty one.

The first district shall be composed of the parishes of Plaquemines, St. Bernard and Orleans.

Second district, of St. Charles and Jefferson.

Third district, of Ascension, St. James and St. John the Baptist.

Fourth district, of Assumption, Lafourche Interior and Terrebonne.

Fifth district, of Iberville, West Baton Rouge and Point Coupée.

Sixth district, of East Feliciana and West Feliciana.

Seventh district, of St. Helena, Washington and St. Tammany.

Eighth district, of East Baton Rouge and Livingston.

Ninth district, of Natchitoches and Claiborne.

Tenth district, of Caddo, De Soto and Bossier.

Eleventh district, of Rapides and Avoyelles.

Twelfth district, of Sabine and Calcasieu.

Thirteenth district, of St. Landry and Lafayette.

Fourteenth district, of St. Mary, St. Martin and Vermillion.

Fifteenth district, of Union, Morehouse and Ouachita.

Sixteenth district, of Caldwell, Franklin and Catahoula.

Seventeenth district, of Carroll and Madison.

Eighteenth district, Tensas and Concordia.

Mr. PORTER moved to amend the first paragraph of said section by striking out the word "appointed" and insert in lieu thereof, the words "elected by joint ballot of both houses of the general Assembly."

Mr. Porter said he did not intend to discuss this question at length, but he would briefly give his views; he conceived that the question was pre-determined, and that nothing he could urge would change the determination of this house. We were told on this floor that, the legislature was not to be trusted, and this, too, by gentlemen that had served in that body. If he had have made such a statement about gentlemen who are now occupying seats on this floor, and were formerly members of the legislsture, (and there is a large proportion of the members of this body that have been members of the legislature) he would have expected to have been called out, and perhaps his life have been the forfeit; but gentlemen were the best judges of their own honesty. Sir, no gentleman can believe that this charge is made seriously, or with any other view than to sacrifice the legislature to the executive power. The first thing done by this body was to establish a legislature, consisting of a senate and house of representatives; now, sir, if they are not to be trusted, let us abolish them, and appoint a governor general and council, and save the expense of legislation. But, sir, I would ask, does not the legislature emanate more directly from the people, and is it not more directly responsible to them than any other department of the government? To mistrust it is to mistrust the people, for it is essentially the organ of the people. But what is the executive? A single individual, removed much farther from the people, consequently much less acquainted with their local wants and interests, is more likely to be deceived and to make improper appointments than the legislature would be, the members of which are acquainted with all the applicants from the different parts of the State, therefore the accumulation of power in the hands of the executive ought to be avoided. We have already confered on the governor the right of appointing the supreme judges; let the legislature by joint ballot elect the district judges; this would be a wholesome check on the executive, whose powers and patronage is now too great, and is exerting baneful influence over the country. All the arguments that have been urged against the appointing power being placed in the hands of the legislature, to-wit: log-rolling, favoritism, corruption, bribery, &c., will apply with ten-fold force to the governor; in the latter instance there is but one man to tamper with or corrupt; in the other you would have to tamper with or corrupt many; at the same moment is not the legislature acting under the solemnities of an oath, as well as the governor or the judges? Has not our governors and judges been members of the legislature? and are they now honester than they were then? Would they not be as easily tampered with now as then? Why, then, this abuse of the legislature?

We were, the other day, much amused by the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) in the description he gave of the multiplicity of the powers and functions confered on the parish judges. He told us that John Stiles (as he supposed the parish judge's name to be) was parish judge, that John Stiles was probate judge, that he was notary public, that he was auctioneer, &c., &c., giving him I think nine different offices or functions; now, sir, I do most heartily concur with the gentleman in believing that there is nothing more odious than giving so many different offices or functions to any one individual or officer; and as the Convention has killed off little John Stiles for that crime, I hope we will kill of old John Stiles, the governor, the father of all the Stiles'. But let us compare the power and patronage of little John Stiles with old John Stiles the governor; little John had nine functions—old John has the appointment of the supreme court, and I suppose all the district courts, of fifty sheriffs, of fifty coroners, of three hundred notaries, five hundred justices of the peace, and a thousand others too tedious to mention. Now, sir, I hope this house will kill off all the family of Stiles', and leave all the appointments to the legislature and the people.

Mr. Lewis said that he would explain his vote; he was not in favor of the election of the judges by the people, but he was in favor of their election by the legislature. With the view of carrying that principle into effect he would say yes.

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Brumfield, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Preston, Prudhomme, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Trist, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—23 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Chinn, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Dunn, Eustis, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Prescott of St. Landry, Roman, St. Amand Saunders, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Wadsworth and Wikoff voted in the negative—30 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

Mr. Garrett moved to amend said paragraph by striking out the words "said districts shall remain unchanged until the first day of January, eighteen hundred and fifty-one," and insert in lieu thereof the words "said districts may be changed by the legislature"—which motion was lost.

Mr. Beatty then offered the following as a substitute for the whole section, viz:

The first legislature assembled under this constitution, shall divide the State into not less than fifteen judicial districts, nor more than twenty-four, which shall remain unchanged for six years thereafter, and be subject to re-organization once in every six years only—for each of which district one judge, learned in the law, shall be appointed.

Mr. Beatty moved the adoption of the above substitute.

Mr. Soule moved for the previous question, which motion prevailed.

Mr. Garrett moved to amend said substitute by striking out the word "ten" and insert the word "six" in lieu thereof, which motion prevailed.

On the motion of Mr. Beatty for the adoption of the substitute, the yeas and nays nays being called for resulted as follows—yeas 26, nays 32.

Mr. Porter then moved to amend said first paragraph as follows, viz:

The State shall be divided into ten judicial districts.

The yeas and nays being called for on the adoption of said amendment, resulted as follows—yeas 7, nays 51.

Mr. Lewis moved the adoption of the first paragraph as reported, which motion prevailed.

Mr. Lewis then moved the adoption of the remainder of said section.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption moved for a division, that is, to adopt the remainder of said section by districts—which motion prevailed.

Mr. Wadsworth said that he hoped his amendment would prevail. The parishes of St. Bernard and Plaquemines ought to form a separate judicial district. If it were embraced in the New Orleans district, it would be inconvenient to the inhabitants; and they would have to come to the city to attend to any legal business they might have. In the settlement of successions, this would be very troublesome, and the business of those parishes would be exposed to neglect, from the great press of business in the city.

Mr. Brent said he would remind the gentleman, that the previous question had been called, and debate was not in order.

Mr. Wadsworth: The gentleman has occupied more than one-tenth of the time of the house.

Mr. GUION moved to reconsider the vote adopting the previous question; the yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hynson, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Sellers, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Wadsworth and Winchester voted in the affirmative—35 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Dunn, Hudspeth, Humble, Kenner, King, Labauve, McCallop, O'Bryan, Prescott of Avoyelles, Read, Scott of Feliciana, Splane, Taylor of St. Landry, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the negative—23 nays; consequently said motion was carried.

Mr. WADSWORTH said he had only five words to say, when the attempt was made to apply to him the gag, and that by gentlemen who occupied one-tenth of the whole time of the house! If he had been suffered to proceed, the time of the house would have been economised, for he was not in the habit of speaking merely for the purpose of speaking, and had only designed to make a few observations, showing the necessity for his amendment. The judicial district, if it embraced the city and the parishes of St. Bernard and Plaquemines, was too large. The proposition he made did not interfere with the city of New Orleans. The city could have as many judges as it pleased. All that he asked was that the two parishes of Plaquemines and St. Bernard should have a separate judge, to reside and to hold his court at a certain point in either of those parishes, and to relieve the inhabitants from the inconvenience and trouble of being dragged to the city. He thought the request a reasonable one, and he hoped it would be granted.

Mr. LEWIS: I would suggest that that portion of the parish of Orleans on the right bank of the river, be included with the parishes of St. Bernard and Plaquemines, in forming the district.

Mr. WADSWORTH: I have no objection.

Mr. EUSTIS explained that the only reason why those two parishes were placed with the parish of Orleans, in the formation of a judicial district, arose from the fact that there was not enough business in them to occupy the time of a separate judge.

Mr. MARIGNY thought that these parishes were entitled to form a separate judicial district. They comprehended a vast extent of territory, and embraced a sufficient population.

Mr. ROSELIUS opposed the amendment, because, from his own knowledge, there was not sufficient business to occupy a separate judge, nor there would not be, in all probability, for some years to come.

Mr. WADSWORTH thought it a high compliment to the quiet disposition of the people of these parishes, that they were not given to litigation. It showed that they were a moral people and did not violate the laws, but that was no argument why they should be deprived of the facility of having their few disputes settled among themselves, and not be compelled to come up to the city, and there be exposed to encounter great delays, and be put to unnecessary expense and trouble.

Mr. WADSWORTH moved for the adoption of the amendment, and called for the yeas and nays, (Mr. Claiborne in the chair,)

Messrs. Briant, Conrad of Orleans, Dunn, Kenner, Legendre, Marigny, Scott of Feliciana, Soulé, Stephens, Wadsworth and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—11 yeas; and Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Eustis, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Mazureau, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Sellers, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Waddill, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the negative—45 nays; consequently said amendment was lost.

On motion, said first district was adopted as reported, viz:

The first district shall be composed of the parishes of Plaquemines, St. Bernard and Orleans.

On motion, the Convention adjourned till to-morrow, at nine o'clock, a. m.

THURSDAY, April 24, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment and their proceedings were opened with prayer.

Mr. LEWIS rose and said,

In the French report of my remarks delivered on the evening of the 16th inst., on the report of the judiciary committee, as published in the Courier of the 19th, several passages occur wherein what I said has been entirely misunderstood by the reporter who translated them; for I cannot for a moment imagine that he intentionally misrepresented me. And inasmuch as I understand that some very worthy persons feel aggrieved by my observations, as published, I deem it to be due, both to them and to myself, to correct any false impressions that have been created by the mistranslation of those passages.

I am made to say in speaking of the parish judges, "il est vrai de dire que dans sa sphere il fait à peu près ce quil veut; tellement que lorsqu'on passe d'une paroisse à l'autre, on trouve presqu'autant de différence qu'il y en a d'un petit Etat à l'autre dans la confédération germanique."

Now I used no such langage as this; but I did say, in substance, that the partial legislation of this State had made as great a difference between the laws governing the different parishes of the State, as existed between the petty States of the confederation of Germany.

Again I am made to say, "Et certes on ne rencontrera personne qui ne se fasse une conscience de reconnaitre que les abus les plus outrageants accompagnent le systeme actuel." This language is so strong in its terms, and so denunciatory in its character, that I must confess I am at a loss for words in which to translate it into English; but these strong expressions are given as a translation of a simple statement that the parish judge system (as it is called) naturally led to abuses and extravagance, which I then maintained and still maintain.

Again, speaking of these abuses, I am represented as asking, "Mais qu'est-ce donc qui fait ainsi de la justice un moyen d'intérêts pour le juge, et comment peut-on croire que celui-ci ne profitera pas de tout ce qui peut le servir?" And as if to set off and render more striking this implied denunciation of actual corruption in our parish judges, it figures immediately before a statement that there are some of them who, despite the temptation, have remained honest. Now, sir, I was arguing against a system which, by its provisions, made it directly the interest of the judge to decide certain questions in a certain way, and instanced the case of the partition of an estate where it is the interest of the judge to order it to be effected by a sale, because in such case, as auctioneer, he would receive greater fees for a sale than, as notary, he could for making a partition in kind. And I did further say that I had no recollection of a contest as to the mode of making such a partition that did not result in a decree for a sale. I also agreed that it was wrong to subject any man to the temptation to do wrong by making it by law his interest to do so: but I never charged our judges with making a traffic of justice.

One portion of my remarks, also reported in French, has induced a gentleman connected with the probate court of New Orleans to furnish me with the facts connected with the estate to which I referred as having been heavily taxed in its passage through the court of probates. I spoke of that matter entirely from memory, and am free to admit that my picture was an exaggeration, though unintentional, of the original from which it was drawn. But still, for all useful purposes the real facts will sustain my argument as well as the case I put; though the blame, if any be due, must fall rather on others than the law officers.

The facts, as I am now responsibly informed, are these: John Hardiman, a citizen of Missouri, arrived in New Orleans during the prevalence of the yellow fever in 1829, and died. He had deposited in bank before his death, in cash, gold, bullion and dust and silver bars amounting to $23,314 92.

His wearing apparel sold for 20 47

Making a total of $23,335 39

Now it was made to appear some time afterwards, that of this money, &c. there belonged to Gen. Smith, his partner in Missouri a sum of	$13,589 27

To Agapito Alba, on deposit,	1,890 00
To Fran. Valverde, on deposit,	3,066 60
		$18,555 87
Leaving as belonging to the deceased,		4,779 52
Eexclusive of the expenses of the last illness and burial of the deceased, the law charges paid out of this sum amounted to		1,229 08
Of this sum there was allowed to the attorney of the curator,	$350 00
To do. of the absent heirs,	200 00
To the curator, 2½ per cent. on the whole sum of $23,385 39,	583 76
Appraisers, weighers, &c.	12 00
Court charges,	83 32
		$1,229 08

These are all the facts necessary to be stated to correct the error I had fallen into in the case referred to. If the estate be considered, as I think it ought to be, as consisting of only $4,779 72, then $1,229 08 for law charges, will not very materially vary the proportion stated by me in round numbers at a third of the estate. But if taken as the court seems to have understood it, (as I think erroneously,) at the sum of $23,335 39, these expenses still exceed five per cent taken out of actual cash deposited in bank, which needed but very little administration. And admitting as I cheerfully do, the most perfect purity in the judge and other officials of the court, this case, I think, furnishes a strong argument in favor of the change in our judicial system, that we have adopted.

I will only add that I never intended to charge corruption upon any of our public officers, but only intended to argue that the system I opposed in its nature, had a tendency to that result.

(Signed,) J. PITOT, Judge.

On motion of Mr. HUMBLE, the vote adopting the fourteenth section was reconsidered.

Mr. HUMBLE then moved to amend said section by adding after the word "senate," in the fifth line, the words "for the term of two years." Which amendment was adopted.

On motion, the section as amended was adopted, viz:

There shall be an attorney general for the State, and as many other prosecuting attorneys for the State as may hereafter be found necessary.

The said attorneys shall be appointed by the governor, with the advice and approbation of the senate, for the term of two years.

Their duties shall be determined by law.

This being the day fixed for the taking in consideration the reports of the committee of revision, on motion, the report of said committee on the executive department, was taken up, viz:

ARTICLE THIRD.

The first section, as reported, was adopted, viz:

SEC. 1. The supreme executive power of this State shall be vested in a chief magistrate, who shall be styled the governor of the State of Louisiana. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and together with the lieutenant governor, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows.

The second section was taken up, viz:

SEC. 2. The citizens entitled to vote for representatives, shall vote for a governor and lieutenant governor, at the same time and place of voting for representatives; the returns of every election shall be sealed up and transmitted by the proper returning officer created by law, to the secretary of state, who shall deliver them to the speaker of the house of representatives, on the second day of the session of the general assembly then next to be holden. The members of the general assembly shall meet in the house of representatives, to examine and count the votes. The person having the greatest number of votes for governor shall be declared duly elected; but if two or more persons shall be equal and highest in the number of votes polled for governor, one of them shall be immediately chosen governor by joint vote of the members of the general assembly. The person having the greatest number of votes for lieutenant governor, shall be lieutenant governor; but if two or more persons shall be equal and highest in the number of votes polled for lieutenant governor, one of them shall be immediately chosen lieutenant governor by the joint vote of the members of the general assembly.

The committee recommend the following correction, viz:

Strike out in the seventh line, the words "created by law;" and the same was adopted.

The section as corrected was adopted, viz:

SEC. 2. The citizens entitled to vote for representatives shall vote for a governor and lieutenant governor, at the same time and place of voting for representatives; the returns of every election shall be sealed up and transmitted by the proper returning officer to the secretary of state, who shall deliver them to the speaker of the house of representatives, on the second day of the sessions of the general assembly then next to be holden; the members of the general assembly shall meet in the house of representatives to examine and count the votes; the person having the greatest number of votes for governor shall be declared duly elected; but if two or more persons shall be equal and highest in the number of votes polled for governor, one of them shall be immediately chosen governor by joint vote of the members of the general assembly. The person having the greatest number of votes for lieutenant governor, shall be lieutenant governor; but if two or more persons shall be equal and highest in the number of votes polled for lieutenant governor, one of them shall be immediately chosen lieutenant governor by the joint vote of the members of the general assembly.

The third section was taken up and passed without corrections, viz:

The governor shall enter in the discharge of his duties on the fourth Monday of the January next ensuing his election, and shall continue in office until the Monday next succeeding the day that his successor shall have been declared duly elected, and his successor shall have taken the oath or affirmation prescribed by this constitution.

On motion of Mr. Beatty, the words "his successor," in the seventh line, was struck out; and the section, as corrected, was adoptod, viz:

Sec. 4. The governer shall enter in the discharge of his duties on the fourth Monday of the January next ensuing his election, and shall continue in office until the Monday next succeeding the day that his successor shall have been declared duly elected, and shall have taken the oath or affirmation prescribed by this constitution.

The legislature may provide by law for the case of removal, impeachment, death, resignation, disability or refusal to qualify, of both the governor and lieutenant governor, declaring what officer shall act as governor; and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or for the residue of the term.

Section eighth was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 11. The governor shall have power to grant reprieves for all offences against the State, and except in cases of impeachment, shall, with the consent of the senate, have power to grant pardons and remit fines and forfeitures after conviction. The fifteenth section was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 15. The governor shall have power to fill up vacancies that may happen during the recess of the senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of the next session, unless otherwise provided for by this constitution.

The committee of revision recommend the following correction, viz: to strike out from the second line, the word "up," which correction was adopted, and the section as corrected, was adopted, viz:

Sec. 15. The governor shall have power to fill vacancies that may happen during the recess of the senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of the next session, unless otherwise provided for in this constitution.

The sixteenth section was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 16. He may require information in writing from the officers in the executive department, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices.

Mr. Read moved to correct said section by striking out in the seventh line, the words "with respect" and insert the word "as," which correction was adopted, and the section as corrected was adopted, viz:

Sec. 18. He may on extraordinary occasions, convene the general assembly at the seat of government, or at a different place, if that should have become dangerous from an enemy or from contagious disorders; and in case of disagreement between the two houses as to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he may think proper, not exceeding four months.

The nineteenth section was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 19. He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

The twentieth section was taken up, viz:

Sec. 20. Every bill which shall have passed both houses shall be presented to the governor; if he approve he shall sign it, if not, he shall return it with his objections to the house in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their journal, and proceed to reconsider it; if after such reconsideration, two-thirds of all the members elected to that house shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of all the members elected to that house, it shall be a law; but in such cases the vote of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the members voting for and against the bill, shall be entered on the journal of each house respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the governor within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been sent to him, it shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the general assembly, by their adjournment, prevent its return, in which case it shall be a law, unless sent back within three days after their next meeting.

Mr. ——— moved to correct said section by striking out in the fifth and sixth lines the words "shall have," which motion prevailed.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to strike out in the sixth line the word "who" and insert in lieu thereof the word "which," and in the seventh line to strike out the word "their" and insert the word "its," which motion prevailed, and the section, as corrected, was adopted, viz:

SEC. 20. Every bill which shall have passed both houses, shall be presented to the governor; if he approve, he shall sign it, if not, he shall return it with his objections, to the house in which it originated, which shall enter the objections at large upon its journal, and proceed to reconsider it; if, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of all the members elected to that house shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of all the members elected to that house, it shall be a law; but in such cases the vote of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of members voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the journal of each house respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the governor within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been sent to him, it shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the general assembly, by adjournment, prevent its return; in which case it shall be a law, unless sent back within three days after their next meeting.

Section twenty-first was taken up and adopted, viz:

SEC. 21. Every order, resolution or vote to which the concurrence of both houses may be necessary, except on a question of adjournment, shall be presented to the governor, and before it shall take effect be approved by him, or being disapproved, shall be repassed by two-thirds of both houses.

The twenty-second section was taken up, viz:

SEC. 22. A secretary of state shall be nominated and appointed by the governor, with the advice and consent of the senate, and commissioned to hold his office during the term for which the governor shall have been elected. The records of the State shall be kept and preserved in the office of the secretary. He shall keep a fair register of the official acts and proceedings of the governor, and when necessary, shall attest them. He shall, when required, lay the said register and all papers, minutes and vouchers relative to his office, before either house of the general assembly, and shall perform such other duties as may be enjoined on him by law.

The committee of revision recommend the correction of the first paragraph of said section as follows, viz:

"There shall be a secretary of State, who shall hold his office during the time for which the governor shall have been elected," which correction was adopted, and the section, as corrected, was adopted, viz:

SEC. 22. There shall be a secretary of State, who shall hold his office during the time for which the governor shall have been elected. The records of the State shall be kept and preserved in the office of the secretary. He shall keep a fair register of the official acts and proceedings of the governor, and when necessary, shall attest them. He shall, when required, lay said register, and all papers, minutes and vouchers relative to his office, before either house of the general assembly, and shall perform such other duties as may be enjoined on him by law.

Section twenty-third was taken up and adopted, viz:

SEC. 23. All commissions shall be in the name, and by the authority of the State of Louisiana, and shall be sealed with the State seal, and signed by the governor.

Section twenty-fourth was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 24. The militia of the State shall be organized in such manner as may be hereafter deemed most expedient by the legislature.

Section twenty-fifth was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 25. The free white men of the State shall be armed and disciplined for its defence; but those who belong to religious societies whose tenets forbid them to carry arms, shall not be compelled so to do, but shall pay an equivalent for personal services.

On motion of Mr. Mayo, the 21st section was reconsidered, viz:

Sec. 21. Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of both houses may be necessary, except on a question of adjournment, shall be presented to the governor, and before it shall take effect, be approved by him, or being disapproved, shall be repassed by two-thirds of both houses.

Mr. Mayo moved to amend said section by inserting after the word "of," in the 8th line, the words "the members elected of;" which motion prevailed, and the section as amended, was adopted, viz:

Sec. 21. Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of both houses may be necessary, except on a question of adjournment, shall be presented to the governor, and before it shall take effect, be approved by him, or being disapproved, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the members elected of both houses.

On motion of Mr. Peets, the vote rejecting the substitute offered by Mr. Beatty, was reconsidered, and the substitute taken up, viz:

The first legislature assembled under this constitution shall divide the State into not less than fifteen judicial districts, nor more than twenty-four, which shall remain unchanged for six years thereafter, and be subject to reorganization once in every six years only; for each of which districts one judge, learned in the law, shall be appointed.

Mr. Ratliff moved to strike out the word fifteen and insert twelve. There would be two of the districts that certainly would not be sinecures. He referred to the district composed of East and West Feliciana, and to this district, perhaps, the district of Rapides might also be included in the same remark. He was told that the other districts would be sinecures at present. It was better to leave it discretionary with the legislature, to make any increase over twelve that was necessary, and restrict the maximum number to which they should go at eighteen.

Mr. Dunn said that the object was not to render justice economically, but to render it efficiently and properly. It was to bring justice home to the door of every one. Not that A. and B. in particular should be favored, but that every one should receive justice. A. asked for the curatorship of an estate, B. opposed him. What is to be the practice? Are the parties to be sent for, or are they to go and seek the judge? In the mean time, what becomes of the effects of the deceased. If they do not go in search of the judge, they must wait until he comes in their neighborhood. It is not surely in reference to the number of saits, that we should establish the courts, but it is in order that every parish should have the means of a ready and prompt administration of justice. If there be but one individual in a parish who is wronged and oppressed, he has a right to be heard and protected. If large districts be established you embarrass the administration of justice and expose the inhabitants to great inconvenience, when they seek redress through the laws of the country. It is no argument to urge, that because the people of a parish are not litigous they are to be debarred the facilities of courts in their immediate vicinity. If there be but one case in a parish, it is entitled to an immediate and speedy trial. The object in instituting courts is to render justice immediately. A parish with a few suits is as much entitled to have them promptly decided as a parish with five hundred suits.

There should be as many courts as were necessary to meet the wants of the inhabitants of each parish, without subjecting them to the inconvenience of waiting for the return of the judge, and to the delays that would result from imposing upon him the duty of attending to a large extent of country. In East and West Feliciana two judges are indispensable, the accumulation of business is very great. He trusted that his colleague from West Feli.

ciana (Mr. Ratliffe) would reconsider the motion he had made, for it was unjust to make the districts so large as to deprive the people of a parish of the facility of being heard without unnecessary delays, and having their contests promptly settled.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. Ratliff, to strike out the word fifteen and insert the word twelve, and the yeas and nays being called for, (Mr. Saunders in the chair,)

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Chinn, Eustis, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill and Winchester voted in the affirmative—27 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Bourg, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Covillion, Dunn Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Lewis, Marigny, O'Bryan, Pugh, Sellers, Taylor of St. Landry, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the negative—24 nays; consequently said motion was carried.

On motion of Mr. Ratliff, the blank was filled with the word "twelve."

Mr. Labauve moved to amend said substitute by fixing the maximum of the districts at twenty; he therefore moved to strike out after the word twenty, the word four. The yeas and nays being called for, (Mr. Saunders in the chair,)

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Eustis, Guion, Hynson, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, McCallop, Marigny, Peets, Porter, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill and Winchester voted in the affirmative—34 yeas; and

Messrs. Covillion, Dunn, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Ledoux, Lewis, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Read, Sellers, Taylor of St. Landry, Wederstrandt, and Wikoff voted in the negative—18 nays; consequently said motion was carried.

Mr. O'Bryan moved to amend said substitute by striking out the word "twenty;" which motion was lost.

Mr. Beatty moved for the adoption of the substitute as amended, viz:

The first legislature assembled under this constitution shall divide the State into judicial districts, which shall remain unchanged for six years, and be subject to reorganization every sixth year thereafter. The number of districts shall not be less than twelve nor more than twenty. For each district one judge learned in the law shall be appointed.

The yeas and nays being called for on the adoption of the above substitute, (Mr. Saunders in the chair,)

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Chinn, Covillion, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Hynson, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the affirmative—45 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Dunn, Humble, O'Bryan, Porter, Preston, Saunders and Waddill voted in the negative—8 nays; consequently said motion was carried, and the substitute was adopted.

On motion of Mr. Mayo, the sixteenth section was taken up, and laid on the table indefinitely, viz:

Sec. 16. After the first of January eighteen hundred and fifty-one, the legislature may reorganize the said district; which shall remain unchanged for ten years thereafter, and be subject to reorganization once in every ten years; provided the number of districts shall never be less than eighteen nor more than twenty-four.

On motion the seventeenth section was taken up, viz:

Sec. 17. Whenever a new parish shall be formed out of two or more parishes belonging to different districts, the said new parish shall be attached to one of them.

Mr. Chinn moved that the said section be laid on the table indefinitely; which motion was lost.

On motion the said seventeenth section was adopted.

On motion the eighteenth section was taken up, viz:

Sec. 18. Each of said judges shall receive a salary of not less than twenty-five hundred dollars annually. He must be a citizen of the United States, over the age of thirty years, and have resided in the State for six years next preceding his appointment, and have practised law therein for the space of five years.

Mr. Porter observed that in his district the residence and the age required in this section would operate injuriously. It would exclude men of talents who had come there since 1830; and it would be difficult to make the appointments within the districts. Therefore it would be better to insert a clause that the rule should not apply in relation to the first appointments to be made in that section of country.

Mr. Wadsworth was opposed to any exceptions. The rule ought to be general. The best mode at arriving at the object of the delegate would be to propose to reduce the time.

Mr. Ratliff moved to amend said section by striking out in the fourth line the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-six;" which motion was lost.

Mr. Read submitted the following as a substitute for the first paragraph, viz:

The legislature shall provide an adequate compensation for each of said district judges, which shall not be increased or diminished during his term of office.

Mr. Garrett moved to lay the above substitute on the table indefinitely; the yeas and nays being called for, (Mr. Saunders in the chair,)

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Carriere, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mayo, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Sellers, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Wadsworth and Winchester voted in the affirmative—36 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Burton, Chambliss, Covillion, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, McRae, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the negative—23 nays; consequently the motion was carried.

Mr. Porter submitted the following amendment, to be inserted at the end of the section, viz:

Except in such judicial districts as the major part of the parishes of which have been organized since the year 1840, and that the exception only extends to the first apportionment of judges.

On motion of Mr. Winchester said amendment was laid on the table indefinitely.

Mr. Ratliff said that in the anxiety to expedite the proceedings of the Convention, he was apprehensive that the house would sanction a provision which would convert the legislative halls into an arena for electioneering. If we give the facility to the legislature to increase the compensation, we shall find some members of the judiciary taking such steps as will ensure them an increase of salary. They will endeavor to elect such persons to the legislature as are favorable to their design, and that body will be so importuned that they may lend a willing ear to the applications that will be made to them from time to time. He would suggest the following modification, "that the salary shall not be increased nor diminished during the period for which said judges were appointed."

Mr. Wadsworth said it was indispensable to place confidence somewhere, and if we have no confidence in the legislature, we cannot have confidence any where to carry out the fundamental principles of the government. It was a strange notion to believe that twenty or thirty men could dictate to the legislature their salaries, and get what they pleased. If we fix the compensation in the constitution, it may be too much or too little, and that is a serious objection. We must, from the nature of things, leave it to the legislature, with the restriction in the section to a minimum amount, so that it may not be in the power of temporary majorities in the legislature to starve the judges out.

Mr. Miles Taylor would suggest a substitute, and would explain his views in a very few words. The object designed was to take away the temptation of seeking an increase of salary, and to place the compensation beyond the immediate power of the legislature, a power which they might possibly exercise to the injury of the incumbent, and with the sole view of driving him from his station. It seemed to be the sense of the house that the salary should be permanent during the term of service of the judge. Some inconvenience might result if this were not provided for. I do not say that such inconvenience will result; but in the view of any possible inconvenience, and it will at least preclude the personal solicitations of the judges, I am induced to offer the following as a substitute. The amendment of the delegate from West Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) that the salary should not be increased nor diminished during the term of service of the actual incumbent, might be construed that it could be diminished afterwards, and thus defeat one of the objects contemplated in the preparation of the original section. In my substitute I have retained it:

"Each of said judges shall receive a salary to be fixed by law, which shall not be increased or diminished during his term of office, which salary shall never be less than two thousand five hundred dollars, annually."

On motion, the section as amended was adopted, viz:

Sec. 18. Each of said judges shall receive a salary to be fixed by law, which shall not be increased or diminished during his term of office, which salary shall never be less than twenty-five hundred dollars. He must be a citizen of the United States, over the age of thirty years, and have resided in the State for six years next preceding his appointment, and have practised law therein for the space of five years.

On motion, the nineteenth section was taken up, viz:

Sec. 19. The judges of said district courts, and of the courts to be established in the cities of New Orleans and Lafayette, shall hold their offices for the term of six years, and shall be appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate; provided, that when the first appointments made under this constitution, are made, six of said district judges shall be appointed for the term of two years, six for the term of four years, and six for the term of six years.

Mr. Benjamin offered the following as a substitute for all the words coming in at the seventh line, to the end of the section, viz:

"The judges shall be divided by lot into three classes, as nearly equal as may be, and the term of office of the judges of the first class shall expire at the end of two years, of the second class at the end of four years, and of the third class at the end of six years."

Mr. Brent moved to amend by inserting "four years" instead of "six years," in the third line.

Mr. Kenner moved for a division, that is, strike out first the word "six," which motion prevailed.

The question recurring on Mr. Brent's motion to reduce the term of office to four years,

Mr. Preston said that he hoped that this amendment would prevail. He had considered it a great evil to make the tenure to judicial office for life. The State was about to abandon that unfortunate and mischievous principle, and he trusted we should not fall into a similar error of making the appointments for too long a period. Four years were abundantly long. The highest offices of the country, the chief executive office of the United States, was held but for four years. There was no reason that these judges should be appointed for a longer time than the highest officers of the country. There was an appeal from their decisions, both as to the law and to the facts, and the supreme court were appointed for eight years, which would give all the uniformity to the decisions that could be desired. In this country, six years was almost a life estate. It would subject us to many of the evils of a life appointment; it would have a tendency to promote listlessness and indifference on the part of the inferior judges, and an exception from that personal responsibility which was so desirable. It would give occasion to neglect and to procrastination. Men's disputes would not be settled with promptitude, but would be put off upon frivolous pretences.

But, say gentlemen, and this is all the objection they have to urge; the judiciary will not be sufficiently independent, and no one will accept the appointment. That was a mistake. The office would be accepted, and readily accepted; and as for independence, the incumbent would be as independent with a limited term as with a permanent term, so far as a proper discharge of their duties were involved. Those who fulfilled their duties with fidelity would be sure to be re-appointed. This had been demonstrated when the experiment was tested in Connecticut. It had met, in that State, with complete success. The judges were elected from term to term, that is to say every six months, and yet were even retained when they became superannuated. Preserve the feature of responsibility to the people, and you will have an efficient judiciary.

Mr. KENNER moved for the previous question on the whole section, which motion prevailed.

The yeas and nays being called for on the motion of Mr. Brent, to strike out "six," (Mr. Saunders in the chair,)

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Humble, Hynson, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill and Wikoff voted in the affirmative—27 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Cènas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers, Taylor of St. Landry, Wederstrandt and Winchester voted in the negative—31 nays; consequently the motion was lost.

Mr. BRENT moved to amend by striking out in the fourth line the word "governor," and insert in lieu thereof "qualified electors of each district."

Mr. BRENT moved to reconsider the vote ordering the previous question.

Mr. M. TAYLOR: I did not vote for the previous question, when it was moved and carried, and I can see no more occasion to stop debate now than then.

The yeas and nays being called for (Mr. Saunders in the chair,)

Messrs. Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Eustis, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Sellers, Soulé, Stephens, Trist, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—27 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Briant, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Scott of Feliciana, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the negative—32 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

The yeas and nays being called for on the motion of Mr. Brent, to strike out the word "governor," (Mr. Saunders in the chair,)

Messrs. Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Trist, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—23 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Briant, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the negative—37 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

Mr. LEDOUX said that in voting for the appointment by the governor of the judges of the supreme court, he was but carrying out the views of a large majority of his constituents, who preferred that mode of appointment. He felt bound to express their will in the vote he gave, but he wished it to be understood that he was in favor, and even would be in favor of an elective judiciary, deeming it the best, the wisest and safest mode of appointment, and the one most in accordance with the true principles of our institutions.

On motion, Mr. Benjamin's amendment was adopted, and

On motion, the nineteenth section, as amended, was adopted, viz:

SEC. 19. The judges of said district courts, and of the courts to be established in the cities of New Orleans and Lafayette, shall hold their offices for the term of six years, and shall be appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate; provided, that when the first appointments made under this constitution, the judges shall be divided by lot into three classes, as nearly equal as may be, and the the term of office of the judges of the first class shall expire at the end of two years, of the second class at the end of four years, and of the third class at the end of six years.

The Convention then took up Mr. Soulè's section, to come in between sections nineteen and twenty.

The appointing power with respect to judges shall be exercised by the governor, in the manner following to wit: He shall name and present three competent persons, leared in the law, and having practised at least five years in the courts of the State, for every office to be filled in the judiciary department; and the senate shall make their selection from the three persons thus named and presented, and shall vote viva voce and with open doors; provided, no appointment shall be effected unless it meets the concurrence of a majority of all the members composing the senate, and provided the judge, the expiration of whose time shall give occasion to an appointment, be one of the three first presented by the governor to the choice of the senate. After three unsuccessful attempts to make a selection, it shall be the duty of the governor to name and present three other persons, and so on, until a choice be effected.

Mr. Soule said that his object in presenting this additional section, was to place the executive power in such a position that it would be impossible for the executive to listen to his predilections in the choice of persons to be ratified by the senate. The measure he proposed was a due medium between the election of the judges by the people, and their appointment by the governor. The members of the senate being elected for four years, would imbibe the popular feelings, and their choice would be the choice of the people; whereas, if the governor were to appoint, he might be influenced by whim or caprice, and make an appointment that would not give general satisfaction. The favor and personal partialty of the governor would not in all probability, extend to all three of the candidates he might send in, and the senate would have ample opportunity to make a proper selection. It may, however, be urged, that the plan is defective in this, inasmuch as the governor might send in the name of his favorite with the names of two others, that were clearly incompetent, and thus force the senate to a choice. But upon examination of the section, it will be seen that this objection has no force. It provides an efficacious remedy, for it is the duty of the governor, should the senate fail to make a choice, to name and present three other persons, and so on, until a choice shall be effected. I presume that it will not be pretended that the governor will be at any loss to find three competent persons to recommend to the senate. I think the plan is clearly feasible. Now, as to the benefit to be derived from it, it will destroy the patronage of the governor, so far as the judiciary are concerned, and will guarantee to the people a direct agency in the selection of their judges through the senate. It will be observed, also, that provision is made that the governor shall not remove the actual incumbent without the assent of the senate, for the section requires that among the three names first presented by the governor, shall be the judge, the expiration of whose time shall give occasion to the appointment.

Mr. Ratliff said there were some good dispositions in the section, and yet without some modification, he feared it would be impracticable. The mode of selection was not without inconvenience. The governor, if he were animated by a sentiment of duty, would present three of the most competent persons he could find willing to accept the office. Now it might happen that their claims were nearly equal, and having each their friends in the senate, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to make a choice. It would be impossible to make a choice if the friends of each candidate were to hold out, and that might well enough happen. I think that this objection ought to be obviated, and I would suggest it to the author, so that he may modify the section.

Mr. Roselius said that if there were no other objection, there was one that was conclusive, the plan was impracticable. The governor was to begin by sending in the names of three persons, and continue to send in successively the names of three persons, until it pleased the senate to make a choice. It went on the presumption that competent persons were as plenty as blackberries. It is now found difficult to select one individual in a district, that united all the necessary qualifications. And by this proposition, the governor is to find three, and as many more threes as may be necessary to effect a choice. Suppose there was but one in the district that was competent, and the people of the district, through pride or jealousy, were averse to a selection out of the district, how would the governor get three competent persons, and three more, if the first three were rejected! In any case, three competent persons would scarcely consent to be dragged before the senate, when it was positively certain that two of them would be rejected. He did not know how other gentlemen would feel, but for himself, he certainly would feel mortified if he were nominated to be rejected, and he presumed it would be the same with most men. If three were nominated, in any case, is it not clear as the sun at noon-day, that two of them would be rejected. It amounted to an absolute certainty. His colleague (Mr. Soulé) had said that this was a middle course; in effect it was taking away from the executive any participation but a nominal one in the appointment, and transferring it to the senate. It vested the appointing power in fact, in the senate, and instead of being the best, it was the very worst mode of making the appointment. There was only one thing in the section that met his concurrence. It was this, that it should be the duty of the governor to present the name of the actual incumbent to the senate. If this disposition were detached, he would vote for it.

Mr. C. M. Conrad said that in addition to what fell from his colleague, (Mr. Roselius) that there were manifold inconveniences which would result from such a mode of appointment. There were a number of district judges to be appointed, and for each appointment the governor would have to send in three names, and from the rejections that would necessarily take place in so large a number, it was not unreasonable to infer that some one hundred and eighty names to two hundred names would have to be sent in for the district courts alone. For the supreme court, alone, twelve names would have to be sent in, and so on in proportion until the four judges were appointed. It has, heretofore, been very difficult to fill the vacancies on the bench of the supreme court, with the certainty that the nomination would be confirmed. It would be very difficult to find three persons who would be willing to allow their names to be presented, with the conviction that two of them were foredoomed. They would not like to have their names put in juxtaposition and to undergo the humiliation of a rejection.

There was one feature which met with his concurrence. It was a happy idea to give permanency and stability to our judiciary, under its new organization. It placed the judge beyond the mercy and caprice of the executive. If he had discharged his duties faithfully, and to the satisfaction of the community, it gave the opportunity to the senate to retain him, and made him independent of the executive will. He would like to see that feature consecrated in the constitution.

Mr. Claiborne said that although he was opposed to the section, because he not only conceived it inexpedient, but impracticable; yet he concurred in opinion with his colleagues that had preceded him, that there was a very admirable feature that ought to be retained and preserved in the new constitution. He alluded to that provision which made it incumbent on the executive to present the name of the actual incumbent for re-appointment. It gave to the senate the opportunity to determine whether the incumbent had properly and efficiently discharged his duties, and if he had, to retain him; and in that way it held out an inducement to a strict and faithful discharge of duty. It was to the interest of the community to retain a good officer, especially a judge; for immutability in the administration of justice was no less essential than equity. With the view of embodying the principle, he would beg leave to offer a substitute for the section. It would deprive the governor of the opportunity of presenting his friends, or a partisan, to the exclusion of the actual incumbent, who may have given general satisfaction.

Mr. Claiborne then presented his substitute, which was as follows:

"Whenever the term of service of judicial officers shall expire, the governor shall nominate to the senate for the succeeding term the actual incumbent, and he shall continue to do so at the expiration of each term, unless the incumbent shall signify in writing, his desire not to be reappointed."

Mr. SOULE considered that this substitute would have the effect of creating a judiciary for life. It would completely nullify that disposition in the new constitution which limited the tenure of their offices to a limited period. It might happen (he said) that his proposition was erroneous, but it was at least consciencious. He thought it expedient in the dipositions provided in his section that the senate should have the means of reviewing the official conduct of the incumbent, and if he were worthy, to continue him in the public service. Another object which he had hoped to secure, was to place the selection of the judiciary beyond the personal feelings and inclination of the executive, and beyond the influences that might control that officer. He thought that by placing the power of confirming the selection from those that the governor would present, it would secure an appointment that would be more satisfactory to the people. His proposition was but a modification of the existing system. Instead of restricting the senate to one nominee, as at present, it presented three, one of whom they were to approve, if deemed satisfactory.

Was there any real difficulty in the plan he proposed, as to the inability of the governor to find the number of persons necessary to be sent before the senate, for final selection. To hear his two colleagues (Messrs. Roselius and Conrad) one would suppose it presented an insuperable obstacle. So far from there being any dearth of candidates, the reverse would be the case. There would be a multiplicity of them, anxious to submit their claims to the final action of the senate. When it is asserted that it would be difficult to find one man in some of the districts, who was competent, I cannot but think it casting an unworthy reproach upon the intelligence of our citizens. I have a higher and a juster idea of their merits. So far from there being but one, I do believe there are few, if any districts, where there are not a plurality of citizens capable of holding any office in the State.

But we are told that if there is but one person who is capable in the district, what is the governor to do? This supposes an extreme case; but admitting that it did occur, the governor could select two other persons from an adjacent district, and the senate would determine, under the peculiar circumstances, between the candidates. The object which he designed was to place that deparment of government in whose hands were placed the life, liberty, reputation and property of the citizens beyond all political influences; and by requiring the governor to present three persons to the senate, a more enlarged choice would be given to that body, in confirming the appointments made. By requiring that one of the three persons sent in should be the actual incumbent, the governor would be deprived of the opportunity of removing a good officer, in order to gratify personal or political motives. But it is said that this plan would result in forcing the senate to make a choice in accordance with the governor's will. That the executive would send in one person that was capable and two that were incapable. This objection has no valid existence. It would not be in the power of the executive to force the senate to a choice, for their action would be as unlimited as it is under the existing system of nominating one person, and they could continue to reject, until a suitable appointment, in their opinion, was made. Until, said Mr. Soulé, I hear some good and valid objection, I must incline to the opinion that this section ought to be incorporated into the constitution.

Mr. DUNN said that to obviate the objections that had been raised, it might be provided in the section that the governor should nominate no person without his consent, and that after sending in three names without a choice being effected, he should then nominate but a single person.

Mr. KENNER said that he would move, as a test, that the amendmentb be laid on the table indefinitely. But before doing so, he would beg leave to make one or two remarks. The tendency of the section was to place the appointing power in the senate, in place of vesting it in the two branches of the legislature on joint ballot, as had been proposed by the delegate from Caddo (Mr. Porter). The object was to take the appointing power out of the hands of the executive. It would, however, be in the power of the governor to control the appointment, for he could send one person that was competent and two others that were incompetent. In this way he would fulfil the letter but not the spirit of the provision. It would lead to great inconvenience and to much abuse; and if I were restricted to this mode of appointment, and to a direct choice by the people, I would prefer the latter.

Mr. Claiborne begged permission to make a few explanations. He had not, as was inferred by his colleague (Mr. Soulé), the remotest intention of presenting any thing, to revive a judiciary for life. He han opposed the section offered by his colleague, (Mr. Soulé) benause he thought it impracticable. There was one feature in the section which he conceived to be judicious, and he had retained it in the substitute which he had had the honor of presenting. It placed the judicial incumbent beyond the mere will and caprice of the executive. He thought it a wise and salutare principle. But inasmuch as the delegate from Ascension (Mr. Kenner), manifested the intention of moving to lay the original section indefinitely on the table, he would beg leave to withdraw it.

Mr. Kenner moved to lay on the table, indefinitely, the additional section of Mr. Soulé, which motion was carried.

On motion, the Convention adjourned till to-morrow at 9 o'clock, a. m.

Friday, April 25, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. Nicholson opened the proceedings with prayer.

Mr. Ratliff, chairman of the committee on contingent expenses, submitted the following resolution, and the same was adopted, viz:

Resolved, That the committee on contingent expenses be authorised to issue a warrant in the usual form for the sum of forty-four dollars and twenty-nine cents in favor of James Carpenter, sergeant-at-arms, in remuneration for that sum expended by him for the use of the Convention.

On motion of Mr. Benjamin, the vote adopting the substitute of Mr. Beatty was reconsidered, and the same taken up, viz:

The first legislature assembled under this constitution shall divide the State into judicial districts, which shall remain unchanged for six years, and be subject to reorganization every sixth year thereafter; the number of districts shall not be less than twelve nor more than twenty. For each district one judge, learned in the law, shall be appointed.

Mr. Benjamin moved to amend said substitute by adding at the end of the same the following amendment, viz:

"Except in the districts in which the cities of New Orleans and Lafayette are situated, the legislature may establish as many district courts as the public interest may require;" which amendment was adopted.

Mr. Benjamin's amendment was adopted, and the section as amended was then re-adopted.

On motion of Mr. Eustis, the vote adopting the first section of article fourth was reconsidered, and the same was taken up, viz:

Sec. 1. The judicial power shall be vested in a supreme court, in district courts to be established throughout the State, in justices of the peace, and such other courts in the cities of New Orleans and Lafayette as the legislature may from time to time direct.

Mr. Eustis moved to amend said section by striking out the words "and such other courts in the cities of New Orleans and Lafayette as the legislature may from time to time direct;" which amendment was adopted.

On motion, the section as amended was adopted, viz:

Sec. 1. The judicial power shall be vested in a supreme court, in district courts to be established throughout the State, and in justices of the peace.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The question under consideration at the adjournment, was the following section, submitted by Mr. Mayo, viz:

The senate, in acting upon the nomination of the judges made by the governor, shall vote viva voce, with open doors, and the votes of at least seventeen senators shall be necessary to confirm a nomination.

To which section Mr. Taylor offered the following substitute, viz:

A majority of all the members elected to the senate shall be required for the confirmation or rejection of officers appointed by the governor, with the advice and consent of the senate, and the senate, in deciding thereon, shall vote by yeas and nays, and the names of the senators voting for and against the appointments, respectively, shall be entered on a journal, to be kept for that purpose, and be made public at the end of each session, or before.

Mr. KENNER moved to amend said substitute by striking out the words "and made public at the end of each session, or before," and insert the following words, "and to be published at the discretion of the senate."

Mr. TAYLOR of Assumption, said he hoped that this amendment would not be adopted; it would defeat the object designed, and would continue a state of things which had given rise to a great deal of complaint. The phraseology of his (Mr. Taylor's) substitute, was similar to that adopted in the constitutions of other States of the Union. The usage has grown up in this State to enshroud all the proceedings of the senate, in relation to executive appointments, in an impenetrable veil of mystery. In all the other States there is an executive journal published. It has been considered of the utmost importance to show how the agents of the people have discharged the trust reposed in them; but here, the utmost secrecy is observed; there is no such thing as an executive journal kept, and the members of the senate can be held to no greater responsibility than were the Venitian council. This mode of proceeding has outraged the public sentiment of the State, and it is for the purpose of insuring publicity to the proceedings, and to enable the public eye to scrutinize them, that it is deemed necessary to introduce a positive provision into the constitution, requiring these proceedings to be made public, to show in what manner the senators have performed the delicate and important functions devolving upon them in executive session. That they should no longer have the power to act as a secret conclave, and avoid the responsibility which should devolve upon them when acting upon executive nominations. If it be left discretionary with the senate to publish or with-hold their proceedings, it will, in effect, defeat the object of attaining publicity, and there will be no means of ascertaining whether the constitutional requisition that a majority of the members should vote for the approval or rejection of the nomination, has been complied with.

Mr. KENNER said that the delegate from Assumption (Mr. Taylor) mis-apprehended the object he had in view, and had mis-apprehended the system. Whether the evil complained of by that delegate, originated in the constitution, or had grown up from usage, he was unable to say; but the course of proceedings upon executive nominations were this: A box was placed before the members and they deposited into it a white or black ball, accordingly as they were favorable or unfavorable to the nomination. It was impossible to know who deposited a particular ball, unless the members chose to reveal it; and it was thus optional with the member to avoid all responsibility. He was far from approving of any such a system, for it enabled a member to indulge in personal and political feelings, which, before the people, or in an open senate, he would not dare to do, and that with perfect impunity. The calling of the yeas and nays upon nominations would preclude that evil. But there might be particular cases, where the senate, in the exercise of a sound discretion, should have the power to with-hold particular proceedings, for a time, from publicity. These proceedings, and the votes of each member, would be known to the body themselves, but it might be found expedient not to promulgate them at once. This was obviously the case in relation to pardons. If you trust your senate with the power of participating in appointments, and in granting pardons, surely they are worthy of some discretion in the matter of giving publicity to particular executive proceedings. With the amendment he proposed, he heartily concurred in the measure, as one every way proper and expedient.

Mr. BEATTY said that the discussion upon this question would come up more appropriately in the general provisions, and therefore suggested that it lay upon the table subject to call.

The PRESIDENT of the Convention said that his experience for a number of years, as a member of the senate, had convinced him that a reform was indispensably necessary, as regarded the secret nature of proceedings upon executive nominations. In point of practical results it was a mere farce. I know of no case where the senate have acted upon an executive nomination, to which the least interest was attached, that the whole matter was not in the possession of the public. I have been told immediately after leaving the senate, how each member voted, and that, notwithstanding the greatest discretion which I myself invariably observed upon these matters.

For myself, my political opinions are so well known, and I act with so little concealment, that I am indifferent as to whether my votes and opinions transpire on such occasins; but inasmuch as the assumed secrecy of the proceeding of the senate is no more than a mere farce, it may happen that certain persons may throw their responsibility upon others, and I really think that the Convention ought to put a stop to this objectionable mode of acting upon appointments.

Mr. Beatty moved to lay the substitute and amendment on the table subject to call, which motion was lost.

The question recurring on Mr. Kenner's amendment,

Mr. Lewis said that he was opposed to it, because it allowed a majority of the body to conceal proceedings which ought to be known to the community. It was often the case that censure was cast upon a citizen, nominated to a responsible office, with the sole view of defeating his nomination. It was but proper that the resposibility should be assumed, and that the people should know who took the responsibility, or rather who was afraid to let that responsibility be known. He could not conceive of any case which authorized these proceedings to be wrapped up in impenetrable darkness. As for the objection of the delegate from Ascension, (Mr. Kenner) that the proceedings had upon recommendations to pardon from the governor, should be secret, that had nothing to do with the matter under consideration. It was known who the governor nominated, and why should not the action of the senate upon the nomination be known? In relation to the secrecy observed by the United States senate, the case was widely different. The senate of the United States was a portion of the treaty making power, and in reference to some of its proceedings, it was necessary that secrecy should be observed. But here there were no good reasons for mystifying the proceedings had upon nominations. It was known when the individual was rejected, and it was due to him, as well as to the community, that the reasons for this rejection should be made known. He hoped the proposition would be adopted, that the amendment, which in part defeated the object intended, would be rejected.

Mr. Eustis would merely state that if the proposition of the delegate from Lafourche (Mr. Taylor) prevailed, it would make an entire change in the system of nominations. If it be the sense of the Convention to adopt it, I have nothing to say. But I will avail myself of this occasion to state the principles upon which I conceive the system to rest. It may be said that there is a choice of difficulties, and gentlemen have a right to complain of the results of the present system in some instances. There are, however, no general measures where justice will not occasionally suffer. It is true that by the existing mode that there is no responsibility, that there is a freedom from restraint, and that the nomination is in a word submitted to the unlimitted will of the senate. This independence would, with a conscientious man, insure a good choice, but with a bad man, one actuated with improper motives, it would influence him to act solely with regard to his personal views, and without considering the public interests. The president has told us that he had been called to account why he voted so and so. That man had enough nerve, but all men have not that command over themselves, to do their duty, regardless of the responsibilities they may incur. I have no doubt that there are men that do not care whether their votes on such occasions are known or not; but there are others who, from a natural timidity as well as from a disinclination to incur personal responsibility, that would prefer to avoid that responsibility. They would hesitate even in the discharge of what they conceived a paramount duty, by defeating a nomination, to incur the vengeance and ill-will of the individual who was rejected. After calculating the advantages and disadvantages of the system, I come to the conclusion that upon the whole it is better to retain it. If the Convention however, think differently, so be it. The only wish that I have is, that that their votes should be given understandingly upon the matter. I am apprehensive that, if the substitute be adopted, we shall entail infinitely more evils than can flow from the present system.

Mr. Marigny: It is an error to suppose that moral courage, like physical courage, is within the volition of a man. If you adopt the substitute which has been proposed, you will create a senate which, instead of being independent, will become the mere slave, or, at best, the mere creature of applicants for office. As far as the judgment of a senator finds a defence in his entire exemption from personal dissatisfaction, so far will he dread the effects of publicity; and you will find that through the fear of creating personal enemies, he will sacrifice the public interest, and that in spite of the best intentions. I had the honor for more than seven years of holding a seat in the State senate, and I am perfectly familiar with this subject of executive nominations. The most courageous and the boldest debator would, in reality, be the most timid if the doors were opened when the questiou was to be taken upon the approval or rejection of the nomination made by the governor. We have been referred to those that know their duty alone, and would fulfill it in spite of all opposition. I know that there are men of that character that have filled seats in the senate and some of the members of that body will recollect that I invariably voted in the most open and unconcealed manner; and that I was regardless of what might be the consequences of my official conduct. But the exception does not form the rule, and we should be careful how we base legislation upon the exception instead of the rule itself. I hope that the section will not be adopted.

Mr. Walker asked the indulgence of the Convention to make a few remarks in reply. The great experience of the gentleman (Mr. Marigny) entitled his opinions to great weight, and it was with diffidence he differed in opinion from that gentleman. For some years past, at any rate, this assumed secrecy of proceedings in the senate upon appointments has amounted to a mere farce. There was no good result to be obtained from this mode of proceeding, and it facilitated intrigues and attempts to influence the final action of the senators; whereas, if the proceedings were public, this result would be counteracted by public opinion, and each senator in the vote he would give would assume his own personal responsibility. For myself, (said Mr. Walker,) I have invariably voted openly. I voted upon such lights as I possessed, and with a single eye to the public service. I know, however, that as to any secrecy, in point of fact, it was out of the question. For upon leaving the senate, I have had related to me, with singular accuracy, all that had transpired in secret session. I never could account for this otherwise than by supposing that, from the position of the room, the debates, which were carried on in a very animated manner upon some occasions, were heard by persons in the vicinity of the room, and thus the course and particular objections of senators were ascertained. I think, in a government like ours, even if secrecy could be had, it ought to be avoided. The people have a right to scrutinize the acts of their agents, and these acts ought to be open and above board. These are my opinions, and I have no hesitation in expressing them. I trust that the section of the delegate from Assumption (Mr. Taylor) will be adopted; it meets with my most cordial approval.

The yeas and nays were called for on Mr. Kenner's amendment "to insert at the discretion of the senate," (Mr. Saunders in the chair,)

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Benjamin, Briant, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Eustis, Guion, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Trist, Wadsworth, and Winchester voted in the affirmative—21 yeas; and

Messrs. Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cenas, Covillion, Culbertson, Dunn, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Lewis, McRae, Mayo, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, St. Amand, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the negative—33 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption moved for the adoption of the substitute, and the yeas and nays being called for, (Mr. Saunders in the chair,)

Messrs. Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, O'Bryan, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Taylor of Assumption, Trist and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—40 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Briant, Burton, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Jefferson, Eustis, King, Labauve, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Wadsworth, Waddill, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the negative—18 nays; consequently said motion was carried, and the substitute was adopted.

On motion of Mr. Benjamin, the above substitute was referred to the committee of revision to be classed in the legislative article.

Mr. Claiborne said that he had yesterday offered a section embracing one of the features of the section offered by his colleague (Mr. Soulé) and had withdrawn it, when the motion was made by the delegate from Ascension, (Mr. Kenner) to lay the original section upon the table. He would beg leave to introduce it under a somewhat modified form, and one which he hoped would be acceptable to the house. So far from yielding the principle, he had been more and more convinced that the judicial power ought to be made as independent of the executive power as possible.

Mr. Claiborne submitted the following additional section, viz:

On the expiration of the term of any judicial officer, whenever the governor shall not have nominated to the senate for the succeeding term, the incumbent in office, any senator may nominate said incumbent, and in such case the senate shall have power to select between the incumbent in office and the person nominated by the governor, or to reject both.

Mr. Beatty expressed himself in favor of this proposition. He thought it possessed all the advantages of the section offered by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Soulé) and was infinitely more simple and practicable. He hoped it would be adopted.

Mr. Eustis said: I think that the Convention should well consider the question in all its bearings. It would be well that the claims and qualifications of the actual incumbent should be taken into consideration in making the apportionment, but at the same time it would be awkward to constrain the governor to send in the name of a person whose appointment he did not approve. I do not know of any other way of avoiding that difficulty than by adopting a substitute to the section, which I have prepared, and to which I would invite the attention of the Convention.

Mr. Eustis submitted as a substitute for the above the following, viz:

"On nominations for judicial officers, after the first appointments under this constitution, if a majority of the members elected to the senate shall advise the re-appointment of the incumbent, he shall be re-appointed."

Mr. Claiborne said that he was solicitous as to the principle, but indifferent as to the words in which it may be couched. He thought his section nevertheless the best, inasmuch as it placed the incumbent and the person appointed by the governor immediately before the senate for their action.

Mr. Porter said that the practical operation of this mode of proceeding would be to give the senate the power of electing the judges, The result would be a regular system of electioneering and log-rolling in and out of the senate.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption, said that at first he was inclined to view the proposition with favor, but subsequent reflection had convinced him that it was of doubtful propriety and expediency. He would therefore move to lay it indefinitely on the table.

The yeas and nays being called for, (Mr. Saunders in the chair,)

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Ledoux, Legendre, McCallop, McRae, O'Bryan, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—25 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Benjamin, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cenas, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Labauve, Lewis, Marigny, Mayo, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Feliciana, Taylor of St. Landry, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the negative—29 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

Mr. KENNER moved to insert the words "house of representatives" after the word "senate," so that the clause would read "and the senate and house of representatives shall make their selection from the three persons thus named and presented." Mr. Kenner stated, that in presenting his amendment, to include the house of representatives with the senate, he did so, not that he is in favor of electing the judiciary by the legislature, but that he would prefer to have them elected by joint ballot, than by one branch alone. If the amendment is passed he will vote against the entire section.

Mr. CONRAD of Orleans said he hoped the gentleman did not intend to insist on this amendment. It was not designed to take the appointing power out of the hands of the executive. This was only an exception to the general rule. It was an exceptional case, and it appeared to him to be called for by sound considerations o public policy. In ordinary cases the appointments would go under the general rule, but when there was a judge in office who had given general satisfaction, it would be in the power of the senate, in the exercise of a proper discretion to retain him. The executive, from personal pique or political motives, might supersede an excellent judicial officer, unless some power were lodged in the senate in acting upon the governor's nomination, to retain the incumbent, if it were for the public interest to do so. It was essential too to insure stability to the judiciary, to retain such judges on the bench as were competent and efficient.

Mr. RATLIFF said that he disliked to obtrude any thing he had to say upon the house, but he thought the proposition, if adopted, would be attended with unfortunate results. It would connect the judiciary and the senate into so many intrigues. The future judges would endeavor to appoint the senators, and the senators would appoint them. He did not approve of giving the executive the appointing powe with one hand and then depriving him o it with the other. It was best to leave things as they were, in the mode of appointment, if the people were to be deprived of electing their judges, which, in his opinion was the best system, and liable to the least objections.

Mr. CLAIBORNE called for the adoption of the substitute. He was willing to take the substitute in place of the original section, if such was the sense of the house.

Mr. BEATTY moved for the previous question, which motion prevailed.

The yeas and nays being called for on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. Kenner, to insert the words "and house of representatives," (Mr. Saunders in the chair,)

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Chambliss, Carriere, Humble, Kenner, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Porter, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Taylor of Assumption, Trist and Waddill voted in the affirmative—16 yeas; and Messrs. Aubert, Beatty, Bourg, Benjamin, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Hynson, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Peets, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Soulé, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the negative—41 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

Mr. KENNER then offered the following amendment, viz:

"It shall be competent for a majority of the members elected to the senate to reelect the incumbent;" and stated that this being the positive meaning of the section, though couched in different language, he wished it to be expressed in such language as that it might be known what would be the effect of the section as presented. He is opposed to the section, but wishes the language to conform to the real meaning and object in view. Which amendment was rejected.

The yeas and nays being called for on the adoption of the substitute of Mr. Eustis, (Mr. Saunders in the chair,)

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Brumfield, Briant, Burton, Cénas, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Taylor of St. Landry, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the affirmative—21 yeas; and

Messrs. Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Humble, Hyn son, Kenner, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, McCallop, McRae, Mayo Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill, Wadsworth and Wederstrandt voted in the negative—36 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

The yeas and nays being called for on the adoption of the section of Mr. Claiborne, (Mr. Saunders in the chair,)

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Feliciana, Taylor of St. Landry, Wadsworth and Winchester voted in the affirmative—24 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Chambliss, Carriere, Chinn, Covillion, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the negative—32 nays; consequently the motion was lost.

On motion section twentieth was taken up, viz:

Sec. 20. The said district courts shall have general original jurisdiction in all civil cases when the amount in dispute exceeds fifty dollars. In all criminal cases, and in all matters connected with successions their jurisdiction shall be unlimited.

Mr. Benjamin moved to amend said section by inserting after the word "dollars" in the third line, the words "exclusive of interest;" and the same was adopted.

Mr. Ratliff suggested that it would be well to ascertain whether this jurisdiction of the district courts comprehended a jurisdiction of the offences committed by slaves, and whether it was exclusive of other jurisdiction.

Mr. Chinn proposed an amendment, but subsequently withdrew it, upon the assurance of Messrs. Benjamin, Miles Taylor, and Eustis that it was unnecessary, and that it was competent for the legislature to confer all necessary authority upon justices of the peace; and that moreover the proceedings against slaves were no part of our criminal law, but of our police regulations.

Section twentieth was then adopted.

The twenty-first section was taken up, viz:

Sec. 21. The legislature shall have power to vest in clerks of courts authority to grant such orders and do such acts as may be deemed necessary for the furtherance of the administration of justice; and in all cases the powers thus granted shall be specified and determined.

Mr. Ratliff moved to amend said section by striking out in the third line, the words "and do such acts."

Mr. Ratliff said that he apprehended under this clause it was intended to revive tha chameleon character, the parish judge, under a new name. If the gentlemen were really serious in wishing to deprive the clerks of the courts, of the manifold duties of auctioneers, notaries public, registers of mortgages, conveyances, &c. &c. about which they disclaimed so much, they would concur in the amendment he had proposed. If they acted otherwise, it was because they wished to secure the mantle of Elijah, now that the office of parish judge was to be abolished. The words "and do such acts as may be deemed necessary for the furtherance of the administration of justice," meant a great deal. It meant almost every thing. They were not confined to ministerial duties, but were invested with judicial functions at the mere will of the legislature. If he were right, and the words inserted were sufficient to authorize an unlimited construction, they ought to be stricken out. He could not conceive what possible benefit could result in abolishing the office of parish judge, and then creating clerks of courts with the very same functions. The gentlemen have said a great deal about the impropriety of entrusting so many duties to a single person. If they are sincere in their denunciation of the parisn judge system on that account, they will not revive that system through clerks of the courts.

Mr. Benjamin said that the gentleman misapprehended the objections that had been urged against the parish court system. It was true that objection was made to accumulating ministerial functions in the hands of the judge. But so far as these ministerial functions were attributed to an officer, who was not a judge, he had never understood that it was intended to deprive such officer of such other duties as the public convenience might demand. It might be found necessary to invest that officer with the duty of issuing writs of arrest, writs of sequestration, and to perform such conservatory acts as were not purely judicial. It will be found convenient to have the several offices connected with the administration of justice kept in the same place, and where the extent of the duties permit it, the same individual may be the clerk of the court and keep the records of conveyances and the records of mortgages. Where it may be necessary, these different duties will necesserily be confided to separate and distinct officers; but still there should be but one place for the transaction of all such business. It must be borne in mind that these officers are supported out of the substance of the people, and the public interest requre that there should be as few of them as are essential to an efficient administration. In assigning these duties to the hands of one man, there is nothing which is incongruous or inconsistent. But it is a most shocking incongruity in our system, that a judge should descend from the bench to hold a family meeting, and then reascend the bench in order to homologate the proceedings. That he should make a will and then decide whether it was defective in form. There was in this something revolting to common sense. There is nothing that is objectionable in attributing various duties of an initiatory character to the clerks of courts, and in sparsely settled districts, all the necessary functions not necessarily attached to the judicial office may be discharged by one person. It will be an economy as well as a matter of great convenience. This was the reason why the committee reported the section in its present form. The object is one which I heartily approve. It was not that I conceived that the parish judge had too much to do, but it was because I believed the duties assigned to him were incongruous, and that he was called upon in one capacity to decide upon the very matters which he had performed in another.

Mr. M. Taylor had a few remarks to make in reply to the delegate who had just resumed his seat. It would be remembered that when the first section was under discussion, he (Mr. Taylor) had contended against the adoption of the section on the ground that it would not remedy the evil which it was designed to correct. The delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) now tells us that it was not because too many offices were accumulated in the hands of the parish judge that he opposed the system, but it was because he deemed those duties to be incongruous; and yet the gentleman is willing to attribute judicial functions to the clerks of the courts. This is the system that has been lauded so much. The object, I conceive has not been attained. It is true that the parish judge system is abolished; but what shall we have in place of it? Nothing more than a mere transfer of the functions of the officer called parish judge to the officer called clerk of a court. A reference to the first section and to subsequent sections will show that the delegate from West Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) and myself were correct in the position we assumed. The first section of the report of the judiciary committee which has been adopted, provides that the judicial power shall be vested in a supreme court, in district courts, and in justices of the peace. The eleventh section prescribes that no other functions shall be attributed to the judge but such as are purely judicial. The section under consideration makes an exception in favor of clerks. It gives to the legislature the power to make parish judges out of the clerks of courts. It reads as follows:

The legislature shall have power to vest in clerks authority to grant "such orders," &c.

Now are there any orders that are not judicial? But the next clause goes still further. They are "to do such acts as may be deemed necessary for the furtherance of the administration of justice." Does not this remove every limitation? They are not only to grant orders, and orders of all descriptions, but they are to do such acts as may be deemed necessary for the furtherance of justice! Language could scarcely be made use of that would more effectually authorise the legislature to establish parish judges under another name. There is but a changing of names. The section confers upon the legislature full authority; there are no words of prohibition, and in my view, if it be adopted, it will defeat the object that has been aimed at; and I hazard the prediction that clerks of courts under it will be authorised to exercise all the powers, and discharge all the functions of parish judges, with the exception of that of deciding contested cases, which all think they ought to be deprived of.

Mr. Eustis said that if the Convention desired to undo their work and revive the system, which it was presumed they had consigned to oblivion, all they would have to do would be to reject the present section. If they wished to restore this nine-office power; this power of holding nine offices in the person of one man, called a judge, let them so determine it. As for those powers not judicial, they ought to be attributed to ministerial officers. Three-fourths of the duties now performed by the parish judges were ministerial: such as the affixing of seals, taking of inventories, &c. &c. All the duties that did not require the fiat of the judge were properly within the competency of ministerial officers, and should be assigned to them. If the gentleman from West Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) would look at the last clause of the section, he would observe that every guaranty was provided in the discretion placed in the legislature. As to attempting to define what were judicial functions, and what were ministerial functions, it was taking up unnecessarily the time of the Convention. He hoped the section would be adopted. It had been prepared with a great deal of care, and was well designed to obviate the defects of the former system.

Mr. Ratliff said that notwithstanding the efforts made to conceal the practical operation of the system, it is nevertheless evident that clerks of courts will be invested with judicial functions. And when we ask why are not ministerial officers limited to functions purely ministerial, inasmuch as judges are limited to functions purely judicial, we are told that the system has been prepared by accomplished and eminent members of the bar, and we must conclude that it is faultless, and admirably designed to meet the public wants and public wishes. This is a peculiar mode of getting rid of objections. I may admit, as I readily do, the talents of the gentlemen composing the committee on the judiciary and their distinguished capacities for the duties assigned them; but they are liable to err, and with the best intentions, they may be deceived and led astray by theories, as well as men of humbler pretensions. I maintain that this section invests the ministerial officers of the courts with judicial powers, at the discretion of the legislature. It is perfectly competent for the legislature to prescribe to them judicial duties under that section, and that it will be done I have no the remotest doubt. A great deal has been said about the multiplicity of offices confided to the parish judges; that was doubtless a matter of serious objection; but have you got rid of that feature in your judicial system? It is true you have abolished the parish court system—the multiplicity of offices is destroyed in reference to parish judges; but have you not created another factotum; another officer with a plurality of functions? The material difference will be but slight as far as the principle is involved; for the clerks of courts will be invested with judicial functions, whereas parish judges were invested with ministerial functions. Gentlemen are deceived if they think the name makes the difference in the thing itself.

The same objections exist against investing the clerks of courts with distinct and different functions, that existed against a similar investure in the parish judges, and the objections are perhaps still more valid. But this is not all. There will be an almost utter impossibility for clerks to perform these duties. In some instances they may have to ride fifty miles to affix the seals, and fifty miles again to renew them, and to take the inventory. It may work well enough in the city; but how will it work in the country? It will be attended with a great deal of inconvenience and trouble, and however well gentlemen may find their theory to be, in the practice of their system they will be wofully mistaken.

Mr. KENNER called for the previous question; which was ordered.

Mr. RATLIFF moved to strike out the words "and perform such other duties," and called for the yeas and nays, (Mr. Saunders in the chair.)

Messrs. Carriere, Covillion, Porter, Ratliff, Scott of Feliciana and Taylor of Assumption voted in the affirmative—6 yeas; and Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cenas, Chambliss, Chinn, Conrad of Orleans, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Read, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Sellers, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the negative—45 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

On motion said section was adopted.

Mr. GARRETT submitted the following additional section, viz:

The clerks of the district courts shall be leected by the qualified electors in each parish, for the term of four years.

Mr. MAYO offered the following substitute, viz:

There shall be elected in each parish of the State, by the qualified electors thereof, at the time of the general election for members of the general assembly, a sheriff, coroner, surveyor and clerk of the district court, and a competent number of notaries public, justices of the peace, and constables, who shall hold their offices for the term of two years, and until their successors are qualified.

On motion the additional section and substitute were laid on the table, subject to call.

Section twenty-second was taken up, viz:

SEC. 22. The clerks of the several courts shall be removeable for breach of good behavior, by the judges thereof, subject in all cases to an appeal to the supreme court.

On motion said section was laid on the table subject to call.

Section twenty-third was taken up, viz:

SEC. 23. The jurisdiction of the justices of the peace shall never exceed, in civil cases the sum of fifty dollars. They shall be elected by the qualified voters of each parish for the term of —— years.

Mr. GARRETT moved to fill up the blank in said section with the word "two;" which motion prevailed.

Mr. BRENT moved to amend said section by striking out in the second line the word "fifty," and insert the words "one hundred." The yeas and nays being called for, (Mr. Saunders in the chair,)

Messrs. Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Humble, Hynson, Labauve, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—31 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Cenas, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Kenner, King, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Pugh, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the negative—19 nays; consequently said motion was carried.

On motion of Mr. LABAUVE, said section was amended by inserting after the word "dollars," in the third line, the words "exclusive of interest."

Mr. RATLIFF moved to amend, by inserting in the third line, after the words "exclusive of interest," the following amendment, viz:

"Subject to an appeal to the district court, in all cases wherein the matter in dispute exceeds twenty-five dollars;" which amendment was adopted.

Mr. SPLANE moved to amend by striking out the words "they shall be elected by the qualified voters of each parish." The yeas and nays being called for, (Mr. Saunders in the chair.)

Messrs. Bryant, Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Eustis, Labauve, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Splane, Taylor of St. Landry, and Winchester voted in the affirmative—15 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the negative —37 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

On motion the section as amended was adopted, viz:

Sec. 23. The jurisdiction of justices of the peace shall never exceed, in civil cases the sum of one hundred dollars, exclusive of interest, subject to an appeal to the district court in all cases wherein the matter in dispute exceeds twenty-five dollars. They shall be elected by the qualified voters of each parish for the term of two years.

Section twenty-fourth was taken up, viz:

Sec. 24. The judges of the supreme court and district courts, provided for in this constitution, shall be appointed and commissioned as soon as possible after this constitution shall go into effect; and the legislature shall provide for the removal of all causes now pending in the supreme and other courts of the State under the present constitution, to the supreme and district courts created by this constitution, and to the other courts that may be created by the legislature for the city of New Orleans.

Mr. Garrett moved to amend by striking out the words "and to the other courts that may be created by the legislature for the city of New Orleans;" which motion prevailed.

On motion the section as amended was adopted, viz:

Sec. 24. The judges of the supreme court and district courts, provided for in this constitution shall be appointed and commissioned as soon as possible after this constitution shall go into effect; and the legislature shall provide for the removal of all causes now pending in the supreme or other courts of the State under the present constitution, to the supreme and district courts created by this constitution.

On motion, the second section was taken up, viz:

Sec. 2. The supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction only, except in cases hereinafter provided, which jurisdiction shall extend to all cases where the matter in dispute shall exceed five hundred dollars.

Mr. Lewis moved to amend said section by inserting in the second line after the word "jurisdiction" the words "on questions of law."

Mr. Lewis intimating the desire of addressing the house on this amendment, on his motion the Convention adjourned.

Remarks of Mr. Read, upon the adoption of the first section of the report of the committee upon the judiciary.

Mr. Read said: Having been cut off by the previous question from the opportunity of submitting the remarks he had designed making, he would beg the indulgence of the Convention while he explained his opinions. By his vote upon this question, he thought he would not only give utterance to the sentiments of his immediate constituents, but of nine-tenths of the people of Louisiana. He was determined to pursue a course that would most effectually destroy the parish judge system as at present organized, and which would give full jurisdiction to district courts in all matters of probate. He was opposed to any system which made the judge first, last and best heir to every estate in the country, and thought such an one could be supported by but few, save the universal heirs themselves. Thousands of widows and orphans have suffered from the miserable system which has cursed the country for years, while certain life-time dignitaries have revelled in luxury and ill-begotten wealth. Justice calls loudly for our interference in this matter, and there seems to be but one remedy, viz: the total annihilation of these worse than Spanish inquisitions, and the complete transfer of all probate business to the district courts.

Let us then confer probate jurisdiction upon district courts, where successions can be settled in temples of justice, and not in sinks of iniquity; settled upon principles of benevolence and humanity, and not upon principles of plunder; settled by right and religion, and not by the depraved cravings of a callous heart. He said that he desired each and every parish judge in the State to be enabled to exclaim, "farewell! a long farewell to all my greatness."

SATURDAY, April 26, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer.

Mr. HUMBLE stated that yesterday the house adopted a clause allowing an appeal from decisions of justices of the peace, when the amount involved was of twenty-five dollars. He stated that at present, appeals were granted when the amount was of ten dollars. He thought the matter ought to be left to the discretion of the legislature. Even as it was, great hardship was experienced; he thought appeals should be for a smaller amount than twenty-five dollars; and would state further, that in some cases the appointments of justices of the peace, in some sections of the State, were not made from the first class of citizens.

Mr. RATLIFF thought this a small matter, and it would be, perhaps, better to leave the clause as it was. He was averse to encouraging litigation. He hoped the motion to reconsider would not prevail.

The question was taken upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. LEWIS inquired whether as many voted in favor of the re-consideration as voted in favor of the original proposition. He had voted in favor of the re-consideration, but he wished the rules to be observed.

The secretary stated that the yeas and nays were not called for yesterday.

Mr. MAYO observed that the chair had decided that when the yeas and nays were not called for, the presumption was that the re-consideration was carried, if a simple majority voted for the re-consideration.

The CHAIR (Mr. M. Taylor) stated that it had so decided the question.

Mr. LEWIS moved to leave the section as it originally stood.

Mr. GARRETT said that the argument of the delegate from West Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) had convinced him that it was expedient to insert the clause in the constitution, and before taking the question he would beg the Convention to take into consideration the remarks of that delegate.

Mr. PRESTON had a proposition to make which he thought would be satisfactory, and would move that the tenth section of the minority report be substituted, as follows:

SEC. 10. A suitable number of magistrates shall be chosen in every parish, by the qualified electors thereof, for the term of two years, who shall have jurisdiction of all cases when the amount in controversy, or penalty to be inflicted, does not exceed one hundred dollars, subject to appeal, to be determined by law, and shall perform such other duties as may be provided by law.

Mr. GARRETT moved that the substitute be laid on the table indefintely; the yeas and nays being called for, (Mr. Taylor of Assumption in the chair,)

Messrs. Aubert, Bourg, Brazeale, Brumfield, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hynson, King, Lewis, Marigny, Mazureau, Peets, Prescott of Avoyelles, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the affirmative—26 yeas; and

Messrs. Brent, Briant, Burton, Carriere, Covillion, Humble, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Porter, Preston, Ratliff, Saunders, Scott of Feliciana and Taylor of Assumption voted in the negative—15 nays; consequently said motion was carried.

Mr. LEWIS moved to amend said section by striking out the words "in all cases wherein the matter in dispute shall exceed twenty-five dollars," and insert in lieu thereof the following words, "in such cases as shall be provided for by law;" which amendment was adopted.

Mr. LEWIS moved to amend said section by adding at the end of the same the following amendment, viz: "And shall have such criminal jurisdiction as shall be provided for by law;" which amendment was adopted.

On motion, the section as amended, was adopted, viz:

SEC. 23. The jurisdiction of justices of the peace shall never exceed, in civil cases, the sum of one hundred dollars, exclusive of interest, subject to an appeal to the district court, in such cases as shall be provided for by law. They shall be elected by the qualified voters of each parish for the term of two years, and shall have such criminal jurisdiction as shall be provided for by law.

Mr. CLAIBORNE gave notice that he would on a future day move to reconsider the vote adopting after reconsideration, the amendment to the seventh section, because he believed the reconsideration to be out of order.

(Mr. Taylor of Assumption in the chair.) The question of order raised is a very important one, and the chair thinks it proper to express its opinion on it, although it is not now necessary to decide it formally.

The chair does not concur in the opinion expressed by the delegate from New Orleans, that the rules were made for the protection of absent members, and that they cannot be dispensed with without previous notice.

Rules are made for the government of the house, and that is composed of the members present forming a quorum.

In the opinion of the chair it does not admit of a doubt, that four-fifths of the members present can at any time and without any previous notice, suspend any rule; and that the proceedings had in pursuance of such suspension of a rule, are in all respects regular, and that they cannot at any future time be called in question on that ground. Any thing done with the unanimous assent of the house, as in the instance referred to, necessarily involves a suspension of the rules, and the chair would in consequence decide that there had been in that instance no violation of the rules adopted for its government.

Mr. Sellers gave notice that he would, on Thursday next, move to reconsider the vote adopting the eighth section of the legislative article.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Section second of the majority report.

Sec. 2. The supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction only, except in cases hereinafter provided, which jurisdiction shall extend to all cases when the matter in dispute shall exceed five hundred dollars.

The question under consideration at the adjournment, was the motion of Mr. Lewis to amend said section by inserting after the word "jurisdiction," in the second line, the words "on questions of law."

Mr. Lewis said, the change which I propose in the jurisdiction of the supreme court, is one which all will admit to be of considerable importance. Both systems—the one which I proposed to confine the appeals to questions of law alone, and the system to embrace both the law and the facts, which has heretofore prevailed in the State—have been tried. Complaints have been made that appeals are now allowed on matters of fact as well as of law, and our experience of this system has not given as much satisfaction as is desirable. In other States, where appeals have been confined to questions of law alone, the result has proved the wisdom of that provision. I know that the exercise, in this State, of the power to review the facts in the supreme court, has given rise to much dissatisfaction. I do not wish to be understood as casting the slightest censure upon the judges of that court. It would be as unnecessary as uncalled for. But I believe that it is physically and morally impossible for them to give that attention to every case which is essential to a proper decision, if they are under the necessity of reviewing the facts as well as the law. It is out of the question for them to do so with the mass of business annually carried before them. By our system the finding of a jury upon the facts, is subjected to the revision of the appellate court, and therefore all the testimony must be taken down in writing, to be sent up with the papers in the case. To become properly acquainted with the testimony, it is necessary that the judges should examine it with great attention; they should weigh every word; they should study it, to have it imprinted upon their memory, so that when they come to a decision, it should be as strong upon their minds as as it was upon the mind of the judge or of the jury, who listened to it from the lips of the witnesses that were introduced before them.

Every one who has the least experience in the practice of our courts, know how difficult it is to reduce to writing, correctly, testimony as it falls from the mouth of a witness; and from this fact I draw an argument to show the great difficulty, nay, the impracticability of a proper exercise of this jurisdiction by the appellate courts. As far as my experience goes, that tribunal is more liable to err in determing upon the facts than the courts of original jurisdiction, and is more liable to misconceive the weight of testimony than the judge or the jury before whom the testimony is taken. It is my deliberate conviction that the appellate court has more frequently erred in this matter, than the judge or the jury before whom the case was originally tried. To place the difficulties attending the exercise of this power, to review the facts, in their proper light, let us take a glance at the practice in the district courts and in the supreme court in the decision of cases. The witnesses are brought before the court of the first instance, examined, and their testimony is delivered before the court and jury. The weight of this testimony is affected by the manner in which it is delivered, and by circumstances occuring in the course of the trial, which cannot be transferred to the written evidence. A great deal, too, depends upon the credibility attached to the testimony of witnesses; and although you might not find any one to swear to a disbelief in the testimony of one witness, or that one witness was entitled to greater belief, if such were permitted, than another; yet every one knows that the testimony of A, from his standing in the community, may be worth, before a jury, a great deal more than the testimony of B. There are a variety of circumstances which give greater weight to the testimony of one man than to that of another; and to appreciate and comprehend the various shades of difference in the testimony of witnesses, it is necessary to hear the testimony from their own lips—to watch their gestures and their countenances. These indications of credibility or incredibility are denied to the court of appeal. The testimony of A is taken down as well as the testimony of B, and goes before them, and may have equal weight with them; and yet, had A and B been examined before them, they would have attached greater weight to the testimony of one of these witnesses than to the other.

I remember, said Mr. Lewis, in my professional experience, a case which occurred in the parish of Avoyelles, that illustrates the fact to which I have just referred. Six witnesses were examined—three of whom testified one way, and three the reverse. Here was an equal division of testimony, and it happened on one side there were two men of the highest respectability, and that nothing could be shown in favor of or against the three witnesses on the other side. No testimony can be adduced to show that A is a respectable man and worthy of belief, and that B is comparatively a disreputable man, and unworthy of the same belief; and consequently if it could have been shown in this particular case, it would not have been permitted. It looked like a case where a just decision upon the evidence was impossible, and it would have been impossible to have come to a satisfactory decision had it not been that two of the witnesses that testified on one side were well known to the court and jury, and were well known to be incapable of prevarication. Now, suppose such a case to arise before the supreme court on the written evidence sent before that court. How would they have decided it? They would have been as likely to have inclined to the opposite side, and have given their decision accordingly. At any rate they would have acted upon the principle of a preponderance of testimony, and had four witnesses testified one way, and two the other, they would in all probability have decided in favor of the testimony of the four, the parties testifying being unknown to them; and yet, had the witnesses been examined before them, they might have become convinced that the testimony of the two witnesses was sufficient to outbalance the testimony of the four. I know, continued Mr. L., of several instances where judgments have been reversed, on the ground of the preponderance of testimony. A jury might base their verdict on the testimony of a particular witness, who was known to them by his probity, and discredit the testimony of some seven or eight witnesses, whom they knew or believed to be unworthy of credence. And yet the supreme court, on the ground of the preponderance of testimony, would reverse the verdict. I recollect another case, which illustrates still more strikingly the impossibility for the supreme court to arrive at a correct solution of the facts in many instances. The record of an appeal, pending in the supreme court of Alexandria, containing some three hundred closely written pages, was put into my hands, as counsel for the plaintiffs. Having but one other case in that court, and which was set for argument two or three weeks ahead, I could, and did, give the case my undivided attention, and was closely occupied during a whole week in reading the testimony, before I could ascertain the facts of the case with sufficient precision to understand them and to make an argument upon them. If it took me one week, with no other business, to be able to make an argument only, how long, in the ordinary nature of things, would it have taken tthe judges to become indoctrinated into the character of the testimony, to come to a decision upon the facts involved, after hearing the conflicting contradictions of the counsel? There was not one question of law involved in the case. It was one of pure facts, at least the law was so well settled that its application to the facts was a matter of no dispute. The difference between the parties, and which induced the appeal, was confined to the doubt as to what had been proved. There was a good deal of conflicting testimony upon the facts in controversy, and it became indispensable that the whole body of the evidence should be familiar to the judges, who were to determine in the last resort. To understand the arguments of the counsel, it would have been indispensable for the judges to have read it over several times, to have reflected upon it, and to have studied it. Upon any possible hypothesis they could not have accomplished this labor under one week. Now, if we assume that there is one case in ten of this voluminous description, how is it possible that the court in one month can run through three hundred cases, examine all the records, and patiently and carefully thread their way through all the mazes of a closely contested suit, where the evidence is voluminous and conflicting, and where the facts to be resolved depends upon close and nice discriminations! No, sir, it is not possible for them to examine the facts critically, as they are examined before the court of the first instance, and they have not the benefit of the presence of the witnesses, and of resolving the testimony as it transpires. And what is the consequence? That they have to rely, two-thirds of the time, upon what is called "a statement of facts," frequently an imperfect, I shall not call it a garbled, statement of the testimony; necessarily imperfect from the fact that it is made out in a hurry, and is but an abridgment, a sketch of the testimony. The uncertainty in which the judges often find themselves, induce them to remand cases for new trials, which, if they could possibly get through the testimoney, they would determine. Here is the ground work of the uncertainty that marks our decisions, and, if I may be permitted to say it, the confusion which prevails in them.

But it is said out of doors, and may be repeated here, that it is impossible to get intelligent juries to determine the facts. I am not one of those who think there is so great a want of intelligence amongst the people of the State. Moreover no extraordinary intelligence is necessary. Does it require an extraordinary education or abilities to determine upon the mere facts involved in a controversy between neighbors? It requires good common sense and honesty of purpose. Few upon this floor will be willing to deny the possession of these to the mass of their constituents. An experience of twenty years has convinced me that this difficulty is but imaginary. But admitting as some persons are disposed to presume, that in the section of country which I represent, this obstacle actually exists—I admit no such proposition in point of fact, but for the sake of the argument—yet, even there, I can safely assert, from my own knowledge, that in nineteen cases out of twenty, the verdicts of juries are correct. In criminal cases it may well be that the judgments of juries are often warped by prejudice or feeling. I believe that this latterly has been a theme of just complaint; but in civil matters, as the law is expounded from the bench, their decisions are as correct in the main, as the decisions of the courts. I admit that there are occasional blunders, but new trials have been found amply sufficient to insure justice in those few instances. In the fifth judicial district I have known but a single case in twenty years, where juries have refused to do justice. This case is familiar to members of the bar. The wrong done in that case was flagitious. There was not a particle of evidence to authorize the verdict, and the supreme court very properly afforded relief. But why should not the district judge be as capable of determining upon matters of fact as the judges of the supreme court? He has a decided advantage in having the witnesses examined before him, and of watching the testimony from its inception to its termination. I suppose that a preference is given to the decision of the supreme court upon the principle "that there is safety in a multitude of councillors." In most cases the ordinary intelligence of juries, and the promptings of their sense of right and wrong, are all that is necessary to secure a just decision. If errors have occasionally been committed by juries, there are on the other hand striking examples of their independence and impartiality. One case presents itself to my mind, where a jury recently rendered a verdict sending in heavy damages to the full extent of the sum claimed, in favor of a captain of a steam boat, a perfect stranger, and against a number of influential citizens of the parish. It is my decided conviction that the country is sufficiently enlightened to make juries a valuable auxiliary in the administration of justice, and with the power of granting new trials in the courts below, I think the facts might safely be committed to them and to the judges of the first instance. As to the questions of law, they ought to be definitely settled by the superior tribunal, and they would be better settled if the attention of that court were exclusively called to them, without the necessity of entering into the tedious and prolix investigation of the facts de novo. It would be a great relief to the court to take away this mass of business; and if we consider the augmentation of the duties of the appellate court, it is apparent that this ought to be done in order to enable it to progress promptly and efficiently. Otherwise its proceedings will be remarkable for tediousness and procrastination. Its duties will, by the new constitution, be increased at least one-third. Appeals will be taken for no other purpose than to obtain indefinite postponement, and the party interested in the confirmation of a judgment will sicken and die with "hope deferred." It is true that there may be means to accelerate the action of the court, but if you overcharge it with business, and then compel it to get through with that business, justice must suffer; and the reputation of the court must suffer. The only object will be dispatch, and every thing else will be sacrificed to that consideration.

These are briefly my views in favor of the motion I have made, and unless I am convinced that I am wrong, I shall insist upon it. I think that the result will be greater uniformity in our decisions, upon questions of law, and that the ends of justice will be greatly facilitated by confining the supreme court to those questions exclusively. This is not an untried experiment. It has been tested elsewhere, and it has proved eminently successful, and I can see no reason why it may not be adapted to our system of jurisprudence with advantage.

Wherenpon, on motion, the Convention adjourned.

MONDAY, April 28, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

In the absence of a minister of the gospel the Hon. Mr. STEPHENS, at the request of the president, opened the proceedings with prayer.

On motion, Messrs. Soulé, Sellers, Prescott of Avoyelles and Taylor of Assumption were excused for non-attendance on account of illness.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

Section second of the majority report on the judiciary.

The question pending was on the motion of Mr. Lewis, to amend the section as follows:

"The legislature may limit the jurisdiction of the supreme court to questions of law only, in such cases as shall be determined by law."

Mr. MAYO said: Mr. President, when the Convention adjourned on Saturday, it was understood that the delegate from New Orleans (Judge Eustis) would address the Convention to-day, in reply to the delegate from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis) upon the subject which is now the order of the day, on which I am anxious to hear his views; but, as he is not now in his seat, I will avail myself of the opportunity of making some remarks upon it. I have, Mr. President, been much perplexed with this question, and acknowledge frankly that until the discussion upon it arose on Saturday last, I had not given it much attention. It is a subject I am satisfied which is not well understood, even by many of the members of the bar. I do not profess to understand it fully. The means to enable me to do so have not been within my reach since the subject was taken up, nor have I had time to examine authorities, if I had been in possession of them. It would require a good deal of careful research and investigation to understand the subject fully, and to be enabled to determine in a manner satisfactory to himself how the system of a court of appeals for the trial of errors of law only, has worked in other States under their various systems of jurisprudence, or what would be its operation and effect when applied to our peculiar jurisprudence, which is entirely different from that of any other State. Since the delegate from St. Landry addressed the Convention on Saturday last, I have given the subject considerable attention, with a view to forming a correct opinion, and have determined to oppose it for the reasons that it would be a dangerous innovation upon the rights of the citizen, and peculiarly dangerous to be incorporated into the constitution; where, if it be found impracticable, it will be extremely difficult to remedy the evil.

The peculiar character of our laws and of our judiciary system, as already formed by the Convention, will render the operation of a provision giving the supreme court jurisdiction of appeals on questions of law only, entirely different from the operation of a similar provision relative to appeals in other States. In most and probably all the other States of the Union, there are courts of chancery, as well as of law. In the courts of chancery, as such, no juries are allowed, but when important questions of fact are to be tried in a court of chancery, a jury is empannelled from the law side of the court to try them, and parties have in this way the advantage of the verdict of a jury to decide questions of fact in those courts, and appellate tribunals exists for the correction of errors from the courts of chancery as well as from the courts of law, which is a privilege of which this State would be deprived under the proposed plan of appeals in a very large proportion of cases, as I shall attempt to show.

The delegate presented us with the strongest and best reasons, I presume, that a careful examination of the subject enabled him to present. One of the cases to which he referred us, was one in which three witnesses on one side testified to what was totally irreconcilable with the testimony of three other witnesses on the other side. That two of the three witnesses on one side were men, in favor of whom much could be proven, That all the witnesses on the other side were men, of whom nothing could be proven. That the testimony of the three in relation to whose characters for veracity nothing could be proven, would, when spread upon paper and sent to the supreme court, have as much weight as the evidence of the other three. That in spreading the evidence upon paper much of what was actually a part of the evidence, the peculiar manner of the witnesses, the evident indications of either from their manner of testifying, to serve one of the parties at the expense of truth and of the other party, could not be made to appear in a transcript of evidence; and the influence of such indications evidenced only by their peculiar manner of testifying, could have no effect with the supreme court. The district court and jury only could appreciate it, and it was before that court only, that these circumstances could have any influence.

The case furnishes strong evidence of the misfortune of being inflicted with false witnesses, when it is impossible to prove them such. A misfortune which all would be glad to see remedied, if it could be done without producing greater evil than exists without the remedy. The evil, however, has been to a very great extent remedied already, by a long course of decisions of the supreme court, which now make part of the jurisprudence of the State, in which the court has stated as a settled rule by which they will be guided in cases where judgments are founded upon the verdict of juries, that they will not disturb the verdict unless manifest injustice has been done by it. This will generally afford a remedy for the evil produced by the inability of the parties to get the peculiar appearance of witnesses, and their apparent credibility or incredibility, before the supreme court. The jury first find a verdict from the law and evidence, as they estimate it; if by such verdict manifest injustice be done, the supreme court will reverse the judgment or remand the case for trial by another jury, but not without; and of this course, parties as a general rule, have no reason to complain.

The other case instanced by the delegate from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis) was one in which he was employed at Alexandria, in which there was a transcript of three hundred pages; the facts of which it took him a week with constant application to understand, and in which there was no single law question involved. That if it took the court but one-sixth part of the time that it took him, it would be more time in proportion than could be given to other cases at that court, during the short time they have to remain there. This, as well as the other case instanced, was a case well calculated to illustrate the difficulties of the present system of appeals; but it only shows an evil beyond our reach, at least one which would not be reached by the proposition offered. For the delegate told us that there was not a single law question in it, and if there was not, it is very evident that no appeal could have been taken in it, under his amendment, for it provides that appeals to try errors of law only, shall be allowed. In cases in the supreme court where the record is volumnious, counsel are in the habit of preparing a brief by which the particular portions of the record containing the facts to which either party desires to call the attention of the court, is pointed out. The lawyer cannot do his duty to his client unless he does this, and if he does, the time that would otherwise be required of the court is very much abridged. So that what would require a lawyer a week to examine, could, by the aid of his brief, be examined in half a day by the court. Now, I appeal to the candor of the gentleman to say, whether parties would be likely to be satisfied if prevented from taking cases of that magnitude to the supreme court, when they supposed injustice had been done them in the first instance. I think not, Sir. If experiments of that kind are attempted, let it be done by the legislature, where, if an error be committed, it can be easily corrected.

The delegate (Mr. Lewis) told us that it took him a week to examine the record to which he called our attention. If it took him a week to learn the facts from the record, how long would it have taken a jury to have understood them from the witnesses? It would take them a month, Sir. Would the citizen be satisfied to rely finally upon the verdict of a jury under circumstances of this kind, where the jury must necessarily be fatigued and worn out, with hearing the evidence and confused by the arguments of counsel, and to risk their all upon the verdict without any power of revisal by a superior tribunal? They will not be, Sir. A jury under such circumstances, are always very liable to overlook some of the important facts, facts which they may think unimportant, but on which the case ought to turn, and if their verdict must be final for want of a law question being involved in it, there can of course be no reviewal by the supreme court. It is well known that intelligent juries, as well as judges, sometimes overlook important facts, and if there be a tribunal more likely to give general satisfaction to parties dissatisfied with the decisions of courts rendered upon verdicts, the citizen should not be debarred from the privilege of resorting to it. The delegate stated, that for argument sake merely, he would admit that juries in the parish he represented, were as ignorant as in any other part of the State, and that being so, he would much rather leave the decision of questions of fact merely, to them, than to the supreme court, to be determined by them in the hurried manner in which they have to act. I am, on the contrary, willing to admit, and which I believe to be the fact, that in the parish which I represent, the juries are as intelligent as they are in any other part of the State,—and being so, are liable to commit errors, either from omitting to consider all the circumstances detailed in evidence, or from giving undue weight to the charge of a partial judge, or a judge acting unconsciously under the influence of bias or prejudice. And I am satisfied that suitors would not be satisfied, if deprived of a right to have the facts reviewed by a tribunal composed of men well acquainted with the law, and who from their situation are in the constant habit of calm and considerate consultation, to determine and weigh the facts and make an application of the law to them. I will now, Sir, inquire more fully into the probable effect of this proposition. As we have arranged the judiciary system, giving probate jurisdiction to the district courts, I suppose it is understood that the legislature will provide for four or six sessions of the district court in each parish annually, and that there will be but two terms of the court at which juries will be called, that the two or four other terms will be held for the trial of probate and other cases, in which no juries will be required nor permitted. That at the two terms at which juries will be required, cases in which no juries will be permitted will be tried, as well as those in which juries will be permitted.

I do not suppose that it is contemplated by any of the members of the Convention to call out the juries oftener than twice a year. To do so, would be imposing too great a burden upon the citizens, and one which they will not be likely to expect. The legislature in this respect, will probably conform to their wishes. If the system be put into operation, as I have supposed, the advantage of having facts submitted to a jury, and found by them to form the basis of law questions to be submitted to the supreme court, will be lost in all the cases to be tried at the two or four terms of court at which there will be no juries, and in a very large portion of the cases tried at the jury terms, as juries are not allowed in all cases tried in the district courts, under our present laws.

It will be recollected that by a late statute of the State, parties defendant in suits on bills, notes and drafts, are not allowed juries unless they first show by affidavit that the instrument sued on is forged, has been paid, or that it was given without consideration. It is not likely that the legislature will think proper to repeal that law, and if not parties in that class of cases cannot have the benefit of submitting questions of fact to the jury, to be determined by them. I think, sir, that the classes of cases to which I have alluded, will amount to three fourths of the whole. In that part of these, as well as in all cases in which no juries will be allowed, in which the judge may think there are no law questions, the judge, a single individual, must be relied on solely; first, to decide what the facts are, then to decide whether there are law questions involved in the case to which the facts are to be applied, and if so, to prepare the law questions and certify them to the supreme court.

Judges are like other men, afflicted like other men with the infirmities common to human nature, and like other men liable to biases, prejudices, likes and dislikes of parties to suits, and their counsel who manage them, and often act under feelings and influences of this kind, without being aware of it themselves. Men cannot be expected to be satisfied when compelled to abide the decision of a single judge under such circumstances, and such circumstances always have existed and always will exist. I hold it to be a principle of justice which all good government requires should be enforced, that men who have the misfortune to become involved in litigation, should be gratified with an opportunity of having as well the facts as the law of their cases fully reviewed before they are made final, by a tribunal in which they can reasonably be supposed to impose the greatest confidence. I hold this to be undeniable, both in principle and practice. And if it be, it appears to me equally undeniable that where the facts are to be decided upon finally by a single judge, and the questions of law to be prepared and certified by him to the supreme court, that the means of having a fair hearing, before a tribunal in which it is reasonable to suppose the citizen will have the most confidence, will be placed entirely beyond his reach.

All law questions depend entirely for their character upon the peculiar state of facts that exist in the case, and to decide what the facts are, and what the law questions, is virtually in most cases to decide the case. The single judge then, notwithstanding an appeal to the supreme court, will in all cases in which no juries will be allowed by law, have the first decision of the rights of the parties. Will not the judges be likely so to shape the law questions, if they can with any semblance of consistency, as to have their judgments sustained. Infirmities will induce this. Men have a natural pride in being sustained by their superiors. Suppose a judge to have decided a case during the term, and that before he prepares his certificate for the appeal, becomes dissatisfied with his own judgment, but not so much so as to induce him to mention the fact to the counsel of the parties, nor to grant a new trial ex officio. Will not his weakness, or his pride, or self-esteem incline him so to shape his law questions for the supreme court as to induce them to sustain his judgment, notwithstanding he thinks it erroneous himself? No cases can be decided by the supreme court under the proposed amendment but law cases, and no cases can be of that character purely, under the peculiar character of our jurisprudence, but such as arise under the provisions of the civil code, code of practice, or the statutes of the State. In these are to be found all the civil laws, strictly speaking, that we have. Those cases that will have to be decided by general legal principles, and not under the provisions of our statutes, or of the codse, cannot present strictly law questions, and consequently cannot be entertained by the supreme court on appeal. By a provision of the civil code, article twenty-first, it is provided as follows: "In civil matters, where there is no express law, the judge is bound to proceed and decide according to equity. To decide equitably, an appeal is to be made to natural law and reason, or received usages where positive law is silent." Those familiar with the practice of the law will readily perceive that this provides for a very large class of cases, in which the citizens seek their rights, and in which, strictly speaking, no law question can arise. If there be no express law by which a case can be decided, reference must be had to the laws of other States and countries, as found in the works of elementary writers, and in reports of decisions of the supreme courts of this and other States and countries.

These constitute a very large class of cases which are instituted with as much confidence of their being conducted and decided on general legal principles as any other class of cases. Still, under the amendment none of this class of cases can be taken to the supreme court, because in strictness of law there can be no law questions involved in them. Nearly all suits that will be instituted upon bills, notes and drafts, will be in a similar situation. We have but two or three statutory provisions relating to them, and the object of those statutes is principally to provide for the manner of giving notice of protest, and the interest and damages on protested bills; and there are also a few very general provisions in the civil code that apply to bills and notes, though not intended for that purpose, being applicable to contracts generally. In all cases of this kind the works of elementary writers on commercial law; Chitty and Baylie on bills and Benee's Lex Mercatori, and the decisions of our own and other courts are referred to, to determine what is generally understood to be, but what is not in strictness, the law of the cases, though these works and the decisions of the courts contain the general law marked out for all commercial cases.

Our codes and statutes being silent, any necessary reference to general principles of jurisprudence settled in other countries, or even by the decisions of the supreme court of this State, by a reference to general principles of law, and not involving questions under our codes and statutes, cannot make a question such a question of law as to bring it within the provision of the amendment, and enable the party to take an appeal. I am satisfied that the cases involving questions of law, in which the parties are not allowed juries at present, and those in which no law questions will be involved, owing to the peculiar character of our jurisprudence, will amount to nine-tenths of all that will be brought before the courts, which is a much greater number than good policy will justify us in excluding. In addition to this it must be recollected that lawyers as well as judges will have to learn the practice under the operation of the provision, and until that is well understood, cases must constantly be remanded because the questions have not been properly certified, or the appeal not properly taken. The supreme court will discover law questions where the district court saw none, and will think other questions of fact which the district court supposed were law questions; delays will be increased by sending the case back to perfect the appeal or certificate, and embarrassments will, I am afraid, be found in the working of the machinery that will make us regret the adoption of such a provision. It would be better to resort to the old mode of requiring the judge, in case the counsel of the parties could not agree, to prepare a statement of facts. It appears to me that the number of appeals are likely to be diminished under the new organization of the judiciary, from the fact that suitors will have more confidence in the district court than they have in the present probate and parish court. Whether this be so or not, I should prefer to see the docket of the supreme court choked up, than to see this untried and unknown system of appeals engrafted into the constitution. I fear we are not progressing with sufficient caution in relation to our organization of the courts. I am apprehensive that we have restricted the powers of the judiciary within too narrow limits. The first and second sections, if condensed into one, would read thus: "all the judicial and no other powers shall be vested in a supreme court, district court and justices of the peace." Is it not doubtful whether administering an oath is a judicial act, and if it is not, can a clerk of a court administer an oath? None but the judges and justices of the peace can perform judicial acts, and the judges can perform no act that is not judicial. Is the granting an attachment, arrest, provisional seizure, or the like a judicial act. I think they are, and if they are, can the legislature ever empower the clerks to issue them? It really appears to me that they cannot. Is writing down evidence a judicial act? I think not, and if not a justice of the peace cannot do it, because he can do no acts but such as are judicial. It is said that the first section granting all judicial power to the courts is not intended to recognize justices of the peace as courts, but I think differently. First, the article names the supreme and district courts, next justices of the peace as a third court, in the three of which the judicial power shall be vested. The eleventh and twelfth sections were passed when we were tied down by the previous question, when members could not express their objections to them. I should not have alluded to them now if I had had an opportunity of doing so then, but had not. I hope the Convention will appreciate the necessity of proceeding in these provisions with great caution, and adopt nothing the operation of which cannot be clearly understood, and known to be practicable.

Mr. Eustis said, I have a few remarks to add to those made by the gentleman from Catahoula. The view that he has taken of the subject under consideration is correct. In relation to what he has said concerning other sections of the article under consideration, I will merely add that they have been so fully debated and considered by the Convention, that I do not feel myself at liberty to enter into a discussion about them, notwithstanding my great respect for every thing that falls from the gentleman, on a matter with which he has shown so thorough an acquaintance.

The amendment proposed by the learned gentleman from St. Landry is so very important in its consequeuces, and the views of the gentlemen of the bar having been somewhat discordant, in relation to its operation, I deem it necessary to put the Convention thoroughly in possession of the state of the law on the subject of the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court, under its present organization. Let us first ascertain what the history of the appellate powers of the supreme court is, in order that we may judge whether any change be necessary. The committee propose the adoption of the words of the constitution of 1812; they are of opinion that no change ought to made in them. They have been long since settled by judicial and legislative interpretation, and when the Convention shall understand their extent and import, they will, in all probability, come to a correct conclusion as to the propriety of changing the constitution on the subject.

By the constitution, the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court extended to all civil cases in which the matter in dispute exceeded three hundred dollars. It is proposed to confine this jurisdiction to questions of law; to take from the court all supervision and power over questions of fact, which are to be determined by the verdicts of juries, and judgments of the judges in the first instance. This throws before juries all questions of fact in all cases; and the first objection to this system is its utter impracticability, which will be evident, on reflection, to the most superficial observer.

Is there precedent for such a system as that proposed by the gentleman from St. Landry? Are not all precedents against it? Throughout all christendom, is there a single example of such power being given to juries?

In France there is no trial jury in civil cases. In England there is a trial by jury in certain cases, but by no means in all cases. In the courts of common law civil cases being brought in certain artificial forms of actions are tried by juries, but only these cases. The rest of the whole mass of litigation and judicial proceedings is determined without juries. All cases in equity, cases of admiralty, and maratime jurisdiction, cases of separation, and those cognizable in the ecclesiastical courts, are terminated without the intervention of a jury. A chancellor may direct an issue to be tried by a jury; but it rests solely in his discretion. The same system prevails in the different States, and the possibility of submiting all these cases to juries has never, it is thought, been believed in.

It is only in particular cases that a trial by jury can be had in England. These are familiar to lawyers; but to enable those of the Convention who are not lawyers to judge of them, I will state a case by way of illustration. A planter sells a hundred bales of cotton, and gets a merchant's bill for it. The bill is accepted, and we will suppose is endorsed in blank. He loses his bill. The parties to the bill owe the money, and no question is made as to their liability. What now is the remedy of the holder? If he had the bill, he would have his case tried by a jury; but having lost it, matters are entirely changed. He must go into a court of chancery, and the chancellor will fix the indemnity the parties are entitled to have, before they are obliged to pay.

To place before juries, in defiance of all experience, all cases, without distinction would be an experiment which ought to make the boldest innovator hesitate.—There is a class of cases in which the power of supervision may be taken from the supreme court; but what that class is, we are by no means prepared to determine. It is a delicate matter—full of difficulty, and requiring much reflection. The constitution of 1812 left this power to the legislature; and the manner in which this power has been from time to time exercised, shows the extreme danger of adopting the innovation proposed.

The law of 1813, organizing the supreme court, provided that there should be no reversal for any error in fact, except on a special verdict, or a statement of facts agreed on by counsel, or made by the judge. No provision was made for reducing the testimony of witnesses to writing, and there could be no revision of a question of fact, except in the form here prescribed.

In 1817 another law was passed, by which the finding of juries on certain facts submitted to them, was conclusive, but the evidence on a general verdict could be examined in the supreme court, and provision was made for reducing the testimony to writing in the court of the first instance. By this statute the conizance of facts was taken from the supreme court, at the instance of either of the parties.

The proposition of the honorable delegate from St. Landry takes all cognizance of questions of fact from the supreme court in all cases. Now, let us see the operation of a statute, which took from that court cognizance of matters of fact, in cases provided by it. My brethren of the bar, who can here bear witness to its operation, will, I am sure, unite with me in assuring the Convention that it answered in no one particular the object it was intended to effect. It often produced the greatest confusion, and some times the most flagrant injustice. Neither the bar, nor the bench, nor the public, were prepared for it. With well trained and skillful practitioners on each side of a case, and an able judge on the bench, a system like that of the law of 1817 would work well. But it was found that although an experienced and able lawyer might present all the questions of fact of his case, and separate them from questions of law, yet his less skillful adversary could but ill defend his cause, and the better lawyer had always an undue advantage. The statute, by almost general consent, was repealed by the code of practice which went in effect into 1825, which provides for reducing the testimony of witnesses to writing, to enable the court above to determine questions of fact, if necessary.

Thus we see the legislature under the provisions of the constitution which we propose to re-adopt, has full power to take from the supreme court cognizance of any class of questions of fact. The attempt made in 1817 was not fortunate; perhaps at some future time the bench and the bar will be enabled to give proper and full effect to a similar project, but is it wise or prudent for us to take a step which is irrevocable, and deprive the court of jurisdiction, which in most cases it is, in the opinion of the most experienced members of the bar, absolutely necessary for the ends of justice? Such a measure would be the extreme of imprudence. Common prudence requires that in a matter so important we should not venture upon a mere experiment, which could only result in confusion and irreparable injury to the sound admisistrator of justice. We are at present not prepared for the change, and its disastrous results are as certain as cause and effect can make them.

The section, as it stands, gives sufficient power to the legislature to make any change in the apellate power of the court: let us leave this power where it is, with the prospect of its being judiciously and opportunely exercised.

But is it not obvious to the Convention that the provision of the gentleman from St. Landry, transfers this immense power of controlling verdicts to the district judges? A single judge will then have the power now exercised by the supreme court. Is the Convention prepared for this immense investiture of judicial power in a single judge, without supervision and without appeal?

It is clear that such a power would not be vested in our present district judges; and those who are to be oppointed under the new constitution, are they to be better than those who have preceded them? The result can only determine this matter, and while we hope for the best, we may be disappointed. The State is divided into two political parties, each struggling for the ascendancy. I hope that our party feelings will never reach the judiciary; that appointments to that department will be dictated by a single and sincere view to the public interest; but it may be otherwise, judges may be appointed, whom it would be madness to invest with such powers; and before we undertake to give this power to district judges, let us wait and see who they are. Leave the matter as it stands, and let the legislature act as the circumstances of the country may require, and the composition of the judiciary may authorize. Let the Convention not undervalue the power of the judge in granting or refusing new trials. It is immense; it gives him control of the fortunes of the citizen, and the interest of property requires that it should not be committed without control to inexperienced or incompetent hands. With the exercise of the power by the present court, (and I am not the apologist of that court) I have heard some fault found. In my own practice I have no reason to complain of it. It is a mistake to suppose that in order to enable a court to determine a case, it is necessary to read every part of a voluminous record. This would be physically impossible in many cases. Well prepared statements, indexes, the admissions and argument of intelligent counsel, abridge the labor of the judge, and facilitate the investigation of contested matters. Even in the case of the voluminous record, referred to by the learned delegate from St. Landry, it is not pretended that injustice had been done to his client. The reversal of verdicts is not the main cause of the complaints against the supreme court, and I think that it will be generally admitted that much injustice has been prevented by the exercise of this power by the court.

Having no wish, other than that of submitting the results of my experience to the Convention, and none whatever to control their opinion, I hope that matters will be left as they stand, and that we shall not incur the hazards of what I consider a dangerous experiment.

Mr. Preston said, that if the gentleman who took so active and influential a part in the preparation of the report of the majority of the committee upon the judiciary, (Mr. Lewis) would accept the fourth section of the minority report of the same committee, the vote in favor of the proposition would, he believed, be almost unanimous. But, if that delegate leaves it discretionary, it is not unlikely that his object will be defeated. The supreme court from 1813 to 1845, have invariably assumed the ground, that they have jurisdiction as well over the facts as over the law in all controversies, when the amount in dispute exceeds three hundred dollars. They so construe the constitutional provision, and will continue so to construe it, unless it be made specific.

I admit (said Mr. Preston) that in England, and in most of the States of the Union, it has been deemed proper to confine cases of a conflicting character specially to courts, without the intervention of juries. The parliament of Great Britain has so ordered it. In cases, for example, of admiralty and marine jurisdiction; in ecclesiastical cases, and in cases of equity. But in these cases, it is prescribed that the evidence should be taken down in writing, and be spread at large, for the revision of the supreme tribunal. This is all we contend for. Let the legislature adopt the same system as prevails in England, and in the other States. Let special officers be appointed to take down the evidence in such cases, without the presence of the judge. In cases of successions, the decision of the court is based upon the record, and it can be sent up to the supreme court in case of an appeal. Give us that mode of proceeding, and confine it to such cases, and I am agreed. But in cases where the facts have been ascertained by the finding of a jury, as in criminal cases, and in others, do not place it in the power of the supreme court to decide upon the very same facts. The slightest reflection will show that this is an important course, and experience has demonstrated that there are but few cases where the judgment of the supreme court upon the facts has been accurate. On the other hand, we know from positive experience, that the finding of twelve men, selected in the vicinity, initiated and familiarized into the merits of a controversy, from their knowledge of the parties and of the witnesses, is but seldom erroneous. In most instances, and in most cases, we find that a jury of the vicinage will decide more accurately and more satisfactorily upon the facts, from their acquaintance with the parties, and from the advantage of hearing the testimony from the lips of the witnesses, than judges who glance over the written testimony, or have it abbreviated in a statement of facts. It is superogatory to suppose, that they can read and study the enormous piles of testimony which is taken down for their guidance. They themselves have admitted the fact, by laying it down wisely as a rule, that they will not interfere with the finding of a jury, unless it be clearly contrary to evidence; and in thirty-two years in casting our eyes over their decisions, we find that there are but few cases where they have reversed the verdict of a jury. One dangerous feature of the existing system, is, that it tends to indifference on the part of the members of the bar, the judge and the juries, and it affords opportunities for trickery and bad faith. The fact that the trial is in no respect final before the inferior court, that it may be reviewed both in reference to the facts as well as the law, before the supreme court, which will finally decide it, tranquilizes the conscience of the judge; he feels no great responsibility for his judgment, inasmuch as he may consider it a mere matter of form. The jury anticipate that their verdict may be revised upon the appeal, and if the counsel for one of the parties is disposed to avail himself of this general listlessness, and adroitly manages the taking down of the testimony, while the judge, the jury and the opposite counsel are paying but little attention to the tedious proceedings, it may give him the decided advantage upon the appeal. If, on the other hand, the jury were aware of the fact that their verdict was final, if the judge in the first instance knew that there was great responsibility attached to his decision, he would be more solicitous about that decision; the attornies would feel the importance of presenting their cases in the strongest shape, and would not trust to an appeal for the proper decision of the matter in dispute. The jury would examine and would form their decisions with greater care, and would pay greater attention to all the proceedings had before them. Cases would then be determined with greater order, and with infinitely greater discernment. The only matter of controversy would be upon the interpetations of the law, and that would finally and properly be settled by the supreme court, with more order and more system.

I might well dilate upon the immense loss of time, and the great expense which attends the system. The docket accumulates, business is procrastinated, piles of testimony are taken down while the judge, the jury and the attornies are in a state bordering on somnolency, fatigued by the tediousness of the proceedings in taking down the testimony; cases are put off, parties litigant are kept waiting, and justice, if not denied, comes so slowly that frequently it does not accomplish its purpose. I have within my mind at this moment, a case in which two merchants of this city were involved. The jury, after considerable delay in taking down the testimony, rendered a verdict of twenty thousand dollars in favor of the plaintiff. The record in the case formed one of the largest volumes. The supreme court certainly did not go through it, nor was it anticipated. But, there was delay, and perhaps that was all that was desired. Months passed away, when finally the supreme court came to a decision; they did not pretend to decide the case, but sent it back to be tried by another jury! They had never read the testimony. It was too great a task to impose upon them. The same proceedings had again to be had; another jury was empannelled, another huge volume of testimony was written out, and the same verdict was again rendered. The case was again taken up on appeal, and was about being argued, when the defendant stopped the proceediegs by giving a check upon a city bank for the amount of the judgment and costs, and thus the matter was terminated, which, as far as legal proceedings were concerned, was as remote, perhaps, from being settled at the time, as when it stood originally in the same position before the appellate court!

Whatever view we take of the subject, we must come to the conclusion, that there are manifold evils in the existing system. Nothing tends so much to enfeeble the efficacy of trial by jury, as the withdrawal from it of a just responsibility, by subjecting its verdicts to revisal on the part of a superior tribunal. Upon questions of fact, a jury is much better adapted to decide than the courts; and if the decisions of juries were made final, subject to the remedy of a new trial, where they may have committed errors, it would be found that their decisions would give greater satisfaction, and be more in accordance with the immutable principles of justice. The supreme court would be relieved from a great press of business, to which it can give but partial attention, and having its attention exclusively directed towards questions of law, those questions would be better and more consistently determined.

Mr. Grymes said that he had listened with scrupulous attention to what fell from the honorable delegate from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) I admit (said Mr. Grymes) that there are some inconveniences in the present system; but on the other hand, I am persuaded that much greater difficulties will flow from the system advocated by that delegate (Mr. Preston) and the honorable delegate from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis.) There is in this nothing astonishing. Man is an imperfect being, and every thing which is fashioned by him, partakes of his imperfect nature. I may be told that he should endeavor to commit the fewest errors possible. I admit it, and yet I am forced to the conclusion that if we are so often led into error, it is because we attempt to reach a speculative perfectability, and do not give sufficient consideration to the actual state of society and to its habits, which, defective as it may be, forms public opinion, and which ought invariably to be consulted.

I am decidedly of opinion, if we adopt the proposition of the delegate from Jefferson (Mr. Preston,) we shall be opening the way for numberless abuses, and for the greatest confusion. And why? Because our community are not prepared to be governed by the proposed system! An experience of forty years authorises me to say that few men will be able to discriminate, in our practice, between questions of law and questions of fact; and if we should heedlessly make this experiment, in despite of experience and the unpropitiousness of the times, I would seriously recommend that the hands of the legislature be not tied; but that the action of that body be left free to undo what may be found upon actual experience to be detrimental. It is to the legislature that should be confided the discretion of making such changes as future exigencies may demand. The community will become but gradually prepared for radical changes such as that proposed; and if you make the change at once, the consequence will be, the jurisprudence of the country will fall into most deplorable disorder, and the people will feel nothing but disgust for this new mode of administering justice. I am convinced that it is better to leave the practice as it is, and commit any reforms which may be necessary to the progress of experience.

In recurring to the question at issue, leaving out the practical results of the proposed system, I would ask, what are the errors of law to be resolved? They can be no other than those derived from the application of the law to the fact in dispute. And it must necessarily be an imperfect system that requires the court to determine upon the law, while it inhibits any investigation into the facts. How is the judge to apply the law, if he does not know the facts; if he does not inquire into their validity, as a preparatory step; if he does not study and examine the depositions of the witnesses? This question is constantly recurring at every step in the practice of the common law: the inconveniences of such a practice are palpable. Suppose a doubt should arise as to an alleged fact, and that by an erroneous application of the law, the proceedings should be defective; and in that state they should be carried before the supreme court; how is that court to decide, without reference to the facts, that the judgment of the court below is proper or improper? It is obvious that this mode of procedure would entail the very worst results, and that it would seriously compromit the end and aim of justice. The supreme court cannot decide without a knowledge of the facts, unless we assume the hypothesis that a question of law may exist independentof the question of fact to which the law is to be applied. This would be a solicism in jurisprudence.

The facts in a judicial controversy, whatever may be said to the contrary, are the foundation of the action, and it would be affirming a grave proposition to assert that these facts are truly resolved, because twelve men, selected at hazard, determine them one way or another. The district courts hold their sessions in the country twice during the year. The judges, the lawyers, the parties are all anxious to get through with their business; and am I to be told that the facts under such circumstances have been properly determined because a jury may have pronounced upon them. It may happen, and does happen that the verdict of a jury is a proper verdict; but it may happen, and does happen that it is grossly erroneous, and flagrantly wrong. What is to become of such cases as these? Is there to be no remedy? It is certainly giving too much power to the inferior courts, and to juries, to say that their finding of facts, and their construction of testimony shall be irrevocable. Do the people desire it? The delegates from Jefferson and St. Landry (Messrs. Preston and Lewis) may think this change a salutary one; but I differ from them most widely in opinion. I do not think it would be safe. It would endanger the stability of property, and would create a want of confidence in the judiciary. It is indispensible to a proper administration that there should be a court of the last resort; and that court necessarily must have cognizance of the facts, or otherwise I hold it to be impossible, at any rate, it will be extremely difficult for it to apply the law properly and understandingly.

But the delegate from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) blows hot and cold in his zeal for innovation. In one breath he tells us that such has been the respect shown by the supreme court for the finding of verdicts by juries, that in a space of thirty-two years it has scarcely happened that they have reversed a verdict. Does not the gentleman perceive that he unconsciously pays the very highest tribute to the system he would destroy, and that he answers his own objection by asserting this fact?—Where is the necessity for any change, when you admit that the supreme court shows a decided reluctance to interfere with the finding of a jury, unless it be clearly repugnant to the facts?

I shall not take upon myself to reply to the numerous assertions made by that honorable delegate. As to the particular case to which he alludes, and in which I happened to be one of the counsel, I will merely say one or two words. He says that the supreme court never read the record; that they could not have read it for the want of time; that they committed greater errors than juries, when facts were involved, and that juries were a thousand times more competent to decide upon questions of fact. I would merely observe that these assertions prove nothing more than this: that the honorable delegate from Jefferson does not fancy the judgments of the supreme court! I may be told that this is unfortunate. Be it so! But we are not here to consult the opinions of the delegate upon questions of law, but to consult the wants and wishes of our constituents, in framing for them a constitution under which they may live in peace and quiet.

Of what do the people complain? Whence is that feeling of uneasiness which prevails all over the State? Does it proceed from the administration of justice? Not at all. It arises from a want of confidence occasioned by the defective organization of the judiciary. In correcting the errors of that organization, by limiting the tenure of office, and in creating a responsibility to the people, you meet the public wishes, and apply the axe to the root of existing evils.

As to the clause proposed by the delegate from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis) it is equivalent to the nisi prius system of the common law. Are the community, the bar, the bench, prepared for such a system? I answer unhesitatingly, they are not. By this change, there will no longer be a necessity for taking down testimony in writing, there will not be a vestige of proof to guide the supreme court in their decision, but all will be done by a single bill of exceptions. A moment's reflection upon the results of such a practice, will at once convince any man, of unprejudiced judgment, of the insurmountable difficulties which will ensue, if we trust ourselves to such a dangerous experiment. Where is the attorney that feels himself qualified to conduct a case according to this system? For myself I will candidly aver, that although I was admitted to practice in a State where the common law prevails, and have endeavored by great study to qualify myself to practice in the circuit court of the United States, since its extension to this State, it is with great diffidence I undertake business in that court, because the practice differs so widely from that with which I have been familiar for the last forty years; and I would certainly be very reluctant, and indeed quite at a loss, to conduct a suit under the system proposed by the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis.) I would be in constant fear, that some important point would escape me, and that I would endanger the rights of citizens who placed their confidence in me. Property is too sacred a thing to be exposed to an experiment.

It may very well happen that among the members of our bar, there are some gentlemen capable at once of adapting themselves to this new system. But if there are any, there are but few, and I can safely assert that in ninety cases out of a hundred, they would not encounter an antagonist who could match them. There would be no kind of equality, and they would necessarily have the decided advantage.

Moreover, this system has once before been attempted. Twenty years ago, a similar experiment was made. Certain theorists, who believed as others now do, in the infallibility of a verdict by juries, importuned the legislature and finally succeeded in getting their experiment tested. The system was established, but after a few years endurance of its inconveniences, it was repealed. The very clause proposed by the delegate from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis) is to be found in the tenth section of the law of 1817. The members of the bar attempted to conform to the practice. They prepared their statements with a great deal of care, but when they came to trial, a thousand facts arose about which they never dreamt. What was to be done, when the discovery was made that their statements were imperfect? Such a system did not answer then—it will not answer now. It was repealed after a trial of three or four years, which resulted in a most signal and complete failure.

Why should we be called upon to abolish a system, about which there is little or no complaint and to which we are habituated? It is infinitely better to leave it discretionary with the legislature to modify the present system as the public wants and conveniencies may require, than to adopt a system, which has already failed of success, and which is unsuited at any rate to our present habits. If hereafter, under other circumstances, such a change may become expedient or necessary, it will be full time to apply it; and that can be done by the legislature in the same manner as in 1817.

Mr. Lewis said he did not intend to reply to the gentleman who had just spoken. What he designed when he made his proposition, was to elicit discussion. He had thought much upon the subject, and considered it not devoid of inconvenience either way. The arguments of those opposed to his proposition, had satisfied him that it ought not to be sustained, and he would withdraw it. But he thought the gentleman had not taken a sufficiently extended view of the question. Some of his objections had not been answered. With the view, that the hands of the legislature should not be tied up, he would propose to add to the section the following words:

"The legislature may limit the jurisdiction of the supreme court to questions of law only, in such cases as shall be determined by law."

Mr. Grymes thought the section perfectly clear, without the amendment. The legislature inevitably possessed the power, and have exercised it. He was opposed to any thing superfluous in the constitution.

He was afraid of too much discrimination and too much explanation.

Mr. Lewis replied that if the legislature possessed the power by implication, what harm would it do to make the section explicit. The construction of the delegate (Mr. Grymes) may be true; he would not gainsay it, but if the construction can be rendered more clear by a single sentence, why not add it? He could not for his soul see that it would lead to any inconvenience; that it could do any harm. It may be found beneficial that the courts of original jurisdiction should, in some cases, exercise an independent jurisdiction. He doubted not that in a great many instances, their decisions would be as satisfactory as those of the supreme tribunals; and as to the policy of relieving that court as far as was practicable, inasmuch as considerable additional labor was imposed upon it, there could not exist a doubt. The legislature would be governed by a sound discretion, and by the public wants and exigencies.

Mr. Eustis said that in making a constitution, care should be taken to introduce nothing that was superfluous. The legislature under the section, possessed the power, and therefore the amendment was unnecessary. They had exercised it under a clause precisely similar in the old constitution. They had passed a law in 1813, immediately after the adoption of the constitution, and again in 1817, upon this very matter. If the learned gentleman indulged any doubts as to the constitutional power, those doubts would be dispelled upon reference to the case of Herman versus Livingston.

Mr. Porter said that inasmuch as there was a difference of opinion as to the construction, between legal gentlemen, it would be better to put this matter to rest, and he would therefore propose to substitute the phraseology of a section, having reference to this same matter, in the constitution of Tennessee. Lost.

The question then recurred on the adoption of Mr. Lewis' amendment.

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Carriere, Chamliss, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Guion, Humble, Hynson, Lewis, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Pugh, Scott of Feliciana and Taylor of St. Landry voted in the affirmative—18 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Brumfield, Cénas, Claiborne, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Grymes, King, Legendre, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Splane, Stephens, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the negative—27 nays; consequently said motion was lost, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. Lewis then offered, on behalf of Mr. Taylor of Assumption, the following as a substitute to said section, viz:

"The supreme court shall have civil and criminal jurisdiction on appeals or writs of error in such cases as the legislature may direct, which shall be exercised in the manner prescribed by law;" which substitute was rejected.

Mr. Mayo moved to amend said section by striking out in the last line the word "five," and insert in lieu thereof the word "three."

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the affirmative—27 yeas; and

On motion, the section as amended was adopted, viz:

Sec. 1. The legislative power of the State shall be vested in two distinct branches, the one to be styled the House of Representatives, the other the Senate, and both "the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana."

Section twenty-second was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 22. The clerks of the several courts shall be removeable for breach of good behavior, by the judges thereof, subject in all cases, to an appeal to the supreme court.

Mr. Conrad of Orleans gave notice that he would on Wednesday, move to reconsider the vote rejecting the substitute offered by Mr. Claiborne, providing that the executive shall send to the senate the names of all judges whose term of service shall have expired.

Mr. Claiborne gave notice that he would on Wednesday next, move to reconsider the vote adopting the first section of article fourth.

Mr. Mayo gave notice that he would on Wednesday next, move to reconsider the vote adopting the eleventh and twelfth sections of article fourth.

Mr. Porter submitted the following additional sections, viz:

Sec. —. Clerks in the district courts in this State, shall be elected by the qualified electors in each parish, for the term of —— years, and should a vacancy occur subsequent to an election, it shall be filled by the judge of the court in which such vacancy exists, and the person so appointed shall hold his office until the next general election.

Sec. —. A sheriff shall be elected in each parish by the qualified voters thereof, who shall hold his office for the term of two years, unless sooner removed; and who shall not be eligible to serve either as principal or deputy for the two succeeding years. Should a vacancy occur subsequent to an election, it shall be filled by the governor, and the person so appointed shall continue in office until the next general election.

Sec. —. All other parish officers shall be elected by the qualified electors of the different parishes, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. Conrad moved that the above sections be laid on the table, and made the special order of the day for Wednesday next, and that they be printed.

Mr. Brent moved for a division, that is to take up each section separately; which motion prevailed.

Mr. Conrad then moved that the first section be laid on the table, and made the special order of the day for Wednesday next, and that the same be printed; which motion was lost.

Mr. Humble moved to fill the blank in the first section with the word "two."

Mr. Garrett moved to fill the blank in said section with the word "four."

Mr. Cenas moved to fill the blank with the word "six."

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquié, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Eustis, Guion, Legendre, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Roselius Splane, Taylor of St. Landry and Wadsworth voted in the affirmative—16 yeas; and Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, King, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prudhomme, Ratliff, St. Amand, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Stephens, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the negative—29 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

Mr. Garrett then moved to fill the blank with "four."

The yeas and nays being called for,

The yeas and nays being called for, on the motion to adopt the first section as amended, viz:

Sec. —. Clerks of the district courts in this State, shall be elected by the qualified electors in each parish for the term of four years; and should a vacancy occur subsequent to an election, it shall be filled by the judge of the court in which such vacancy exists, and the person so appointed shall hold his office until the next general election,—resulted as follows:

Mr. Wadsworth then gave notice that he would on Wednesday next move to reconsider the vote adopting said section.

Mr. Garrett submitted the following additional section, and the same was rejected, viz:

"Clerks of courts shall be required to give bond and security in the manner to be determined by law, before entering upon the discharge of their official duties."

The second additional section, offered by Mr. Porter was taken up, viz:

Sec. —. A sheriff shall be elected in each parish by the qualified voters thereof who shall hold his office for the term of two years, unless sooner removed; and who shall not be eligible to serve either as principle or deputy for the two succeeding years. Should a vacancy occur subsequent to an election, it shall be filled by the governor, and the person so appointed shall continue in office until the next general election.

Mr. Mayo moved to amend said section by striking out the words "and who shall not be eligible to serve either as principal or deputy for the two succeeding years."

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Aubert, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Dunn, Eustis, Guion, Humble, Hynson, King, Legendre, Lewis, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Roman, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the affirmative—34 yeas; and

Messrs. Benjamin, Boudousquie, Cenas, Conrad of Jefferson, Garrett, McCallop, Mazureau, Pugh, Roselius, Saunders and Wadsworth voted in the negative—11 nays.

Mr. Claiborne observed that if the range of popular election was extended to embrace all officers, as appeared to be designed, the people would have little else to do than to attend the polls. It would keep them constantly in a state of excitement and perturbation. In referance to a sheriff, it seemed to him to be a proper precaution to determine who should be the judges of the security for the faithful performence of his duties. Should it be the people: they were the appointing power?

Mr. Eustis thought this mattter ought not to be hastily and inconsiderately passed upon. It would be better to postpone the section for the present.

Mr. Conrad of New Orleans moved to amend said section, by adding to the same the following proviso, viz:

Provided, that if any sheriff should fail to pay over any moneys of the State, collected by him, the parish for which he was elected shall be responsible for the deficiency.

Mr. C. M. Conrad said that the sheriff was an officer who might be regarded as appertaining to the whole State, rather than to the particular parish in which he might perform his functions. He was the collector of the State taxes; and in the discharge of that duty the parish alone was not only interested, but the whole State. Some guaranty ought to be given for his fidelity; and inasmuch as his appointment was confided to the people of the parish, they ought to be made responsible for his fidelity in collecting and paying over the revenues of the State. Hence he had proposed his amendment.

Mr. Brent had a word or two to say in reply to the delegate from New Orleans. (Mr. Conrad.) He could not see that any inconvenience would result by making the office of sheriff elective. No inconvenience could result in exacting from that officer proper security for the faithful discharge of his duties, in the same manner as if the appointment continued to be made by the governor. The plan of electing sheriffs was not a novel or untried experiment. It had been fully tested in several States; and had been found to answer public expectation. A disposition prevailed in a certain quarter of this house to provide for the appointment of public officers in every conceivable way, but in the republican mode of electing them by the people. This appeared to be the most distasteful of all propositions. But we have been told that the sheriff is a State officer, because he collects the revenues of the State. Now, if that be a serious objection to his election by the people of his parish, why, it is easily obviated. Let the legislature appoint a special officer a tax collector, if they are afraid to trust a sheriff elected by the people of the locality. They have the power to do so. As for the surety to be given by the sheriff, the legislature have the same power of regulating it, whether the sheriff be appointed by the people or be appointed by the governor.

Mr. C. M. Conrad said that the gentleman (Mr. Brent) seemed to admit that there was some impropriety in this mode of appointment. He says that the legislature may constitute another officer and impose on him the duty of collecting the revenue of the State; that they may create the office of tax collector. This is true; but the gentleman should bear in mind that these officers must be compensated; and that it would be creating a new swarm of office holders to eat up the substance of the people. It is unlikely the legislature will do any such thing. The duty of collecting the revenues of the State has been imposed upon the sheriffs because it appropriately comes within the sphere of their duties. It is an easy mode of making these collections; and the question recurs, is it right that the State should be deprived of any control over these appointments? That their appointment should be taken from an officer representing the whole people of the State and given to a small fraction? It must be borne in mind, too, that the sheriff has other important functions to perform, besides collecting the public revenues. He is, moreover, the custodian of criminals; and large sums of money pass through his hands for the administration of the criminal laws of the country. He is under the necessity of acting against his parishioners, and in favor of strangers who may have recourse to the criminal law. Is it not to be apprehended that in his desire to make himself popular, and to avoid the clamor of his neighbors, he may be indifferent or neglectful in the discharge of these duties?—We have had some examples of the evils of electing sheriffs in the neighboring State of Mississippi. For several years in that State, there was a total suspension of legal proceedings. The sheriffs elected by the people refused to execute writs of seizure and sale. This immediately will be the consequence, wherever a discharge of duty is made to depend upon mere personal interest. The sheriff who will harrass the poor and uninfluential man, will hesitate to do any thing that will incur the displeasure of the rich and powerful. But this is not yet all. Political considerations will enter into the contest for election, and the tendency will be to make the sheriff nothing less than a party instrument.

What is to be gained by this extreme system of elections? Do the people desire it? The people are indifferent; they do not desire it! It is sought for only by a few persons, who see in it the means of personal aggrandizement and political turmoil The pretext assumed is, that it will extend the principles of democracy; but its true result will be to produce corruption and immorality, and to destroy republican institutions. It can have no other result; and as for its being in unison with republicanism, it was never dreamed of by the fathers of our republican government. They would have considered it a heresy upon the true republican faith.

On motion the Convention adjourned.

Tuesday, April 29, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. Warren opened the proceedings with prayer.

Mr. WADDILL moved to lay said resolution on the table; which motion was lost.

Mr. MAYO moved for the adoption of the resolution; and the yeas and nays being called for,

And, on his motion, it was laid on the table, to be taken up when the general provisions should be under consideration.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The following section, offered by Mr. Porter, viz:

SEC. 2. A sheriff shall be elected in each parish, by the qualified voters thereof, who shall hold his office for the term of two years, unless sooner removed.—Should a vacancy occur subsequent to an election, it shall be filled by the governor; and the person so appointed shall continue in office until his successor be elected and qualified.

To which section Mr. CONRAD of Orleans had offered the following proviso, viz:

"Provided, that if any sheriff should fail to pay over any moneys of the State, collected by him, the parish for which he was elected shall be responsible for the deficiency."

Mr. PORTER would beg leave to make a few remarks in reply to the observations that fell from the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Conrad) yesterday. He was suffering from a violent head ache, and would beg the indulgence of the house, if he treated the subject rather cursorily. The gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) had attempted to show that a sheriff was not the officer of a parish, but an officer of the State; and therefore, he reasoned that it was not right that the appointment should be confided to a fraction of the whole population. The delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) cannot be serious in such an argument as that; for he cannot be ignorant of what is known to the simplest countryman. With the exception of the collection of the State taxes, which may in fact be attributed to another officer, the sheriff is essentially a parochial officer. His duties are essentially in the parish, even in the collection of revenue; and in every other respect he is a parish officer. If the official relations of the sheriff are to be taken into consideration, as is argued by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Conrad) then the appointment would of right belong to the judge; for the sheriff has functions almost entirely appertaining to the court. The object, in fact, appears to be to divide patronage between the judges and the governor; as for the people, they are apparently deemed by the delegate to be the worst medium of appointment!

The true question involved is this: who are the most capable of selecting a sheriff? Is it the governor, who is called on to make the appointment, particularly for a remote parish, or is it the people of the parish themselves? How can the governor be personally cognizant of the merits of the person soliciting the appointment? He must rely upon the representations of others; and the value of these representations, as a guide, is too well known, in a majority of cases, to need comment. If the governor were unlimited in his choice, and could at will transport a sheriff from one part of the State to another, as has been done, he might make a good selection; but if he be restricted to the parish, is he more competent—aye, is he as competent to make the selection, as the people of the parish themselves?

But the gentleman says that if you confide the appointment to the people, instead of the governor—to the creators, instead of the creature, they ought to be made responsible for any delinquency, should such occur, on the part of the sheriff. Now sir, it strikes me as a bad rule that will not work both ways. The governor is, under the old constitution, the appointing power. Is the governor responsible for the fidelity of the sheriff she may appoint? I imagine not. The executive power would be very loth to assume such a charge; and yet upon the same principle, it would be as reasonable to propose that the governor should be responsible for any deficiency that might occur in the accounts of the sheriffs appointed by him! The gentleman must perceive the extreme ridicule of such an argument. I hardly think he can be in earnest in employing it. He must be jesting, as he once said I was, on another occasion.

But the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) is not yet satisfied. He wishes the clerks of courts to be appointed, as well as the sheriffs. But by whom? By the judge! and thus it is, that the patronage of office when taken from the government, is to revert to the judiciary! This seems to be the gentleman's favorite mode. The people are incapable of making judicious appointments, and if they are allowed to make any appointments, they must be charged with the fidelity of the offices they neglect. This is the gentleman's doctrine. He says that there has never been any complaints in the city about confiding to judges the power of choosing their own clerks. That may very well be the case in the city. But the gentleman should remember that in the country the district will embrace three or four parishes. Admitting then, that the plan may be satisfactory in the city, does it follow it will be satisfactory in the country? Or does it follow because the judges in the city may have made good appointments of clerks, that the people are incapable of electing good clerks? The principle involved is the same in the election of one set of officers, as another set of officers. If the people can elect a good representative, a good senator, or a good governor, why not a good clerk of a court? Is there any thing so peculiar in the functions of a clerk, that he must be placed beyond the power of the people, and invested with his office for life? The office of clerk under the new system, will be one of the most important offices. But the gentleman says, that the judge should have the same power of appointing his clerk as a commission merchant? It seems to me that there is no similarity between a public duty and a man's personal business. The merchant may get a cheap clerk; is the judge to follow the same plan and to pocket the balance of the fees. This would follow, if the gentleman's argument is to be considered valid. The judge could make the best bargain, and may retain the balance for his own benefit, regardless whether the public interest suffered or not. He could put up the office of clerk of the court at public vendue, and have it knocked down to the lowest bidder. Some gentlemen are disposed to go very far to favor the judiciary. They are in the first place to be the recipients of extraordinary salaries. They talk of eight or ten thousand dollars as a salary for a judge, as a mere trifle, basing their calculations on exorbitant fees paid to attornies in the city. They do not know the wants and exigencies of the people of the country. That the producers of the soil have to labor with their hands, and do not coin money in that way. But high salaries are not alone sufficient. The judges must have patronage. They must appoint and control the clerks, and be unlimited in their sway over the fortunes of their fellow citizens. There is to be no check any where. The advocates of such a system have indeed singular notions of the principles of republican government.

There would be great inconvenience for the judge of a district in the country, embracing several parishes, to make the selection of a clerk, and his appointment might very well not be such an one as would give satisfaction to the majority of the people in the district. Certainly the people of the whole district should participate in the selection. But this is not all. It would have a corrupting and baneful influence. The people have seen the injurious effects of the overgrown patronage of the governor, but bad and pernicious as that influence may become, it is by no means comparable to what would follow similar patronage on the part of the judicial power.

In the re-organization of the judiciary department, the people have got little or nothing. Both the proposition to elect the judges by the people, as well as the proposition to elect them by the legislature, were voted down, and the patronage of judicial appointments is continued in the executive. The people will only exercise a remote influence upon these appointments, and that only by a single reform, the abbreviation of the tenure of the judicial office. We are disposed to yield to the will of the majority of this house, objectionable as may be some of the features embodied in the system. All we ask is the poor boon, in the name of the people, of electing their parish officers. If this be refused, it will raise a cry of indignation that will follow those who would deny it to the people, to their graves, from one end of the State to the other. I would beseech gentlemen to beware. The governor and the judges are but servants of the people, and the people are as capable of appointing their other servants as they are of appointing the governor. They will not fold their arms, and see political power taken from them, and transferred to their agents, without a struggle.

Mr. KENNER called for the previous question, which was sustained.

Mr. CONRAD of Orleans, moved for the adoption of the proviso; the yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Aubert, Bourg, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Legendre, Mazureau, Pugh, Voorhies and Wadsworth voted in the affirmative—9 yeas; and

Mr. LEWIS moved to amend said section by striking out the words "elected by the qualified electors of the different parishes," and insert in lieu thereof the word "appointed;" which amendment was lost.

Mr. CENAS moved to lay the section and amendment on the table, subject to call; which motion was lost.

Mr. PORTER then moved for the adoption of the section; and the yeas and nays being called for,

Measrs. Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Humble, Hynson, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Stephens, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the affirmative—31 yeas; and

On motion, the Convention took up article sixth.

ARTICLE SIX—GENERAL PROVISIONS.

So help me God!"

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, said article was laid on the table, subject to call.

Section second was taken up and adopted, viz:

SEC. 2. Treason against the State shall consist only in levying war against it, or

Sec. 5. No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in pursuance of specific appropriations made by law, nor shall any appropriation of money for the support of an army be made for a longer term than one year. A regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published annually, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

Section sixth was then taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 6. It shall be the duty of the general assembly to pass such laws as may be necessary and proper to decide differences by arbritrators, to be appointed by the parties who may choose that summary mode of adjustment.

Section seventh was taken up, viz:

Sec. 7. All civil officers for the State at large shall reside within the State, and all district or parish officers within their respective districts or parishes, and shall keep their respective offices at such places therein as may be required by law. And no person shall be elected or appointed to any district or parish office, who shall not have resided in such district or parish long enough before such election, or appointment, to have acquired the right of voting for representatives to the general assembly in such district or parish.

Mr. Eustis moved to amend said section, by striking out all of the last paragraph, commencing at the word "and" in the fifth line.

Mr. Eustis said: the results which would follow this provision were more serious than were anticipated. Now, sir, I can well understand that it may meet the views of persons who may hope to be appointed to office; and that it may gratify the petty ambition of some village lawyers, but I nevertheless hold that it is contrary to the public interest, and for this reason: that it restricts the executive choice to a circle in which it may be difficult to find any thing but mediocrity and incapacity. Why, in the face of experience and sound judgment, attempt to limit in this way the power of your executive? It seems to me that discussion is less necessary than reflection! There are a class of persons who imagine that all established authority, all existing forms of government, are, from the mere fact of their existence, defective and vicious. Nothing which has stood the test of time suits them, and they can see nothing but error and delusion in the opinions of those who differ with them. It is sufficient to differ with them to be wrong.

If we consult the experience of the past we find that in about fifty conventions that have been held in the twenty-six States of our Republic, there is not a single constitution in which a similar experiment has been made. Is it to be considered all sufficient for one to say, "I am a resident of this particular parish," and does that enunciation carry with it the higher recommendation of fitting qualifications to hold a responsible public office? To admit such an argument would be to travel from one extreme to another; it would be placing ourselves at the mercy of incapacity and ignorance. It would be to withdraw from the appointing power the circle of the whole State, from which to make his appointments, and trust our institutions to a mere novelty, to the pleasure of making a dangerous experiment! Who ever heard in England, or in our sister States, that a judge must necessarily be taken from a particular county, from this or that particular section of the State? Why such an idea never entered the minds of the fathers of our republican institutions. Where is the necessity for these local restrictions? where is there use? A judge is chosen to protect the life, the reputation and the property of the citizen, all that is dear and precious to him, and yet you would impose a mandate in your constitution that this judge must be taken from a certain locality, without reference to the fact whether a person fully competent can be found to accept. Intelligence and capacity become of no moment, and the only indispensable condition is locality. How are we to gratify such a condition otherwise than as a piece of insufferable folly?

Without doubt there are to be found in most of the judicial districts, into which the State has been divided, men highly capable and every way worthy of the appointment of judges, but it may happen that they will not be disposed to accept, and hence the necessity may arise of being obliged to seek elsewhere for competent persons. How is it that gentlemen, who have during the protracted and animated bebates that have attended our proceedings, resisted and combatted the spirit of restriction; how, I would ask, can they advocate a principle which is calculated to do more harm than all other restrictions put together?

I have said that all history is against such a restriction. The nation that possesses the best laws, but whose laws are the worst administered, and which once held sway over our territory, has in the Partidas, which is a monument to the memory of Alonzo the wise, consecrated the very reverse of the principle you seek to establish. No man, according to those laws, could be eligible to the office of a judge, who was born in the place in which he was to exercise his functions. This principle was founded on a thorough knowledge of the human heart. It was designed to place the magistrate beyond the influence of local feelings and resentments. Man is so constituted that if he has a favor to dispense he seldom looses sight of his relations, his partizans and his friends. It would be unwise to say that the choice of a magistrate should be restricted to a particular locality, instead of leaving the whole State open for the judgment of the executive, in which to make a fitting appointment. What is it whether a man be appointed judge from this side or that side of line dividing contiguous and neighboring parishes and whose populations are identical in feelings, interests and habits? I would ask the learned delegate from Caddo whether he would not be satisfied with a good judge, even although he should be selected from the Ouachita distrtct?

Mr. Porter said he would prefer a good judge, selected in his own district.

Mr. Eustis: Feelings of petty localities are not favorable to the public weal, especially, it may be said, in reference to judicial appointments. Sentiments, attachments and affection burn very strongly in the bosom of our population, and it may be a matter of very questionable policy how far it is expedient to stimulate those feelings in the extremely delicate functions of a judge, by appointing only those to administer justice who are residents of a parish where a large portion of the population are their relatives, and where it may be presumed they may have imbibed strong personal predilections, and personal animosities. These are subjects for executive forethought, and the utmost lasitude of choice should be afforded the governor, to make a judicious selection, irrespective of mere parish lines.

Those noble and generous impulses which attaches a man to his family, and which may induce him to give a preference to his family and to his friends, may have a dangerous tendency in the exercise of the judicial office; and even if a magistrate have sufficient firmness to withstand such an influence in his official capacity, it nevertheless may expose him to censure and to suspicion. It may be inferred that the inviolability of justice has been sacrificed to subserve the claims of kindred; and in this way public confidence may be wholly withdrawn. What a degrading situation for a judge; and what a degrading situation for the character of our laws!

Here then, we find two imminent perils to be encountered. On one side ignorance and degradation, on the other the presumed influence of family feelings and friendship. This is the alternative. Why, then, limit the power of the governor to appoint? why circumscribe him to particular bounds, instead of giving him the whole State from which to make a selection, relying upon his discretion, that if it be proper to appoint from the particular parish, he will do so, and if it be improper, he ought not? The influence of prejudice is ahead, sufficiently strong to make the tendency in favor of these local selections. Why pronounce a solemn mandate, and decree that the executive shall not go beyond the precincts of a parish? At best, what is it but an experiment? An experiment that no other State has tried, and which is repugnant alike to sound reason, to justice, and to experience.

Mr. Lewis said that the grounds assumed by the honorable member (Mr. Eustis) had created in his mind great surprise. He was astonished at the warmth displayed by that delegate. Although I do not assent, said Mr. Lewis, to all the propositions that I had reported, as chairman of the committee upon general provisions, with the understanding that I would urge my objections when they came before the Convention, this particular proposition is not among those to which I dissented. It met the hearty and unanimous assent of the committee, and notwithstanding the appeals of the delegate to history, I maintain that the provision is loudly called for, and will be acceptable to the great mass of the people.

There is no subject of more general complaint than the arbitrary exercise of the executive power, in appointing officers from one section of the State for another section. Upon one occasion I remember that the attempt was made by an executive to force upon a district a judge from another portion of the State, and it was alone unsuccessful from the firmness and determination displayed by the senate to resist it.

The gentleman tell us that the Partidas embraces the best system of laws extant, but the worst administered. He says that by a provision, which he considers very salutary, natives of the particular locality where they are enforced are excluded from the appointment of judges. This argument is suicidal, it detsroys itself, since the gentleman says the laws are good, but the administration is bad. The fault then lies with the persons administering them, and this destroys the principle which he appears to consider so beneficial.

But what is most extraordinary is that the delegate would have us believe that the section will operate peculiarly to the benefit of village pettifoggers, whose chances of judicial promotion will be thereby greatly increased; which is as much as to say, that in the districts generally, men of standing at the profession of the law, are not to be had to fill those appointments, and that therefore, out of the necessity of the case, the governor should be permitted to go beyond the district in making the nominations. If this argument hold good in relation to the selection of judges, it will hold equally good in the selection of all local officers. It will be necessary to grant to the electors of a parish the privilege of the whole State to make a suitable appointment of a representative to the legislature, of a senator, of a sheriff, or of the clerk of a court. There may be some disparity in the amount of talent in different sections of the State—the city, for example, may possess more talent than the country, but if the executive appoints from the best materials before him, no complaints will be made, and the citizens will be better satisfied with their own citizens to administer their laws, than with citizens imported from more favored sections of the State, even though they should possess a greater degree of abilities in the opinion of the gouernor. In the selection of the judges of the supreme court, the latitude of the whole State is given to the executive. This is proper, because the functions of those officers appertain to the whole State indiscriminately. But for district courts it is equally obvious that the appointments should be made from the districts, and not from the State at large. There is a peculiar fitness that the judge should be taken from the district in which he is to preside, and when it is borne in mind that the districts are composed of several parishes, the facilities of choice are abundantly great to make suitable appointments. It is unfortunate that in some districts but six or eight suitable persons may be found, perhaps when there are hundreds in the city of New Orleans, but from this limited number a good appointment may be made, at any rate a more satisfactory one to the people, than if recourse was had elsewhere. The detailing of citizens from one section of the State to hold offices in other sections, has produced great complaints. In some instances, where the nominees have been taken from the city, loud and vehement complaints have followed. If all power emanates from the people, the people have a right to govern; and their feelings, and even their prejudices, (if it be a prejudice for them to prefer those domiciliated among them, to strangers) should be taken into some account. Every delegate on this floor is aware of the general dislike to the imported appointments, that prevails all over the State, and that they are submitted to with great reluctance.

It is well known, that I am far from being radical in my views, but I do respect the will of a large number, and I do think that public opinion ought to be consulted. Public opinion has settled clearly in favor of appointments being made from the parish or the district where the officer is to exercise his functions, and I think the principle is a good one. As for the alledged inconveniences that may result, I think they are greatly exaggerated. I do not believe there is a district in the State, in which a proper selection may not be made. And on the other hand, great evils would be the consequence, if the executive were left unrestrained, to impose upon the people of a district, persons from another district, with whom they were not identfied, and it might well happen, as has happened, that persons of real merit in the district would be overlooked, to give the appointments to favorites elsewhere. If the truth is to be told this has happened very much to the detriment of the public service, and very much against the wishes of the people, whose preferences have been disregarded. I hope the section will be adopted: it will be wise and salutary in its operation, I have not a doubt.

Mr. C. M. Conrad said, that it might have happened in certain instances, that the executive power may have misconceived the claims of persons residing in a parish or in a district, by appointing citizens residing in other portions of the State. But in general, he believed, the practice of the executive was never to proceed to those nominations without consulting the wishes of the prominent and leading persons residing in the particular locality. An error, or an exception does not make the rule, and I am apprehensive, (said Mr. Conrad) that to avoid one difficulty we shall fall into another and a greater difficulty. What extent of territory will form a judicial district under the new constitution? A vast extent of territory, an immense circle in which will be found parishes, where there will be no want of proper talent for the judicial station? I apprehend not! The abolition of the parish court system, will infallibly result in a diminution of the actual size of the districts to less than one half of what they now are. This will be the result sooner or later, and to make it obligatory upon the governor to make his appointments strictly within the limits of each district, is in effect to confine his choice to one or two lawyers that may be found residents within the district, and both of whom may be incompetent. When I say one or two lawyers, I do not indulge in exaggerated language, for it is notorious that in some sections of the State where litigation is not prolific, and where the inhabitants are indisposed to hazard their little all in suits, there are few if any, members of the profession. It would be as well, inasmuch as the effect would be the same, to say at once that the governor should choose from three or four individuals, and that his choice should not be extended beyond them. There might be on the opposite side of the parish line, a legist of accomplised abilities, and although the people would prefer his nomination to that of either of those individuals, the governor would be restricted by this unfortunate section. He would be compelled to choose an unworthy person, although convinced of his unworthiness. Where is the wisdom of such a restriction? Where its necessity?

But the pernicious consequences do not stop here of this arbitrary provision. I would ask the honorable delegate (Mr. Lewis,) if there are not others interested in the administration of justice, save those who are the immediate residents of the district? Has not the judge to perform duties which affect others than those residing the district? Suppose I institute a suit againgt a resident of the parish of St. James, or a resident of the parish of Livingston, would I not be as much interested in the matter of who was judge, whether he was a capable, upright man, as if I were a resident of those parishes instead of the parish of Orleans? It is a mistaken notion to imagine that no other citizen in the State should be eligible to an office but the resident of the particular locality, where its duties are fulfilled, where from the nature of the office, it operates upon and may effect the interest of a citizen of one portion of the State as well as another.

The delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis,) has told us that judges were imported from the city for the country. I have no recollection of any such occurrence.

(Mr. Lewis: Among others I referred to the appointment of Judge Curry.)

Mr. Conrad: I did not think of that particular appointment, but I have no doubt it was satisfactory to a majority of people in the district, or it would not have been made. But admitting that abuses may grow out of the discretionary power of the governor to appoint out of the district, if he thinks it expedient, is not the senate constituted as a check upon the governor, and will not the feeling in favor of local appointments be sufficiently strong, to restrain the governor and preclude the possibility of an arbitrary exercise of the power? If you restrict the executive to local appointments, you may change the appointments for the office, but will the change be for the better? This is the true question to be resolved! It is one you will vainly seek to avoid. A Judge should be capable, free from reproach or suspicion, assiduous, just, and above all impartial. Are you sure that within the prescribed circle of a petty district, you will find a person uniting all these qualifications, willing to accept the appointment, and that whenever there be a vacancy? And if it should so happen that your expectations are disappointed, in what an unfortunate predicament you place the appointment. I am fearful you are about to introduce a principle in your constitution, which will germinate mischievous results. I would appeal to the honorable gentleman (Mr. Lewis,) for an example of the fatality of such proscription. He is a resident of the county of Opelousas, but is equally as well known and appreciated in the county of Attakapas. Suppose he were nominated Judge of a district embraciug the county of Attakapas alone, would the people object to his appoin;ment on the ground that he was not a resident within their district. They would hail it with great satisfaction, with as much satisfaction as if he were an actual resident, for they would have confidence in his integrity and abilities, and as for the matter of mere residence, they would consider it beneath their liberality and discernment. The same remark will apply to a thousand individuals in the State, who are as well known by public opinion in one locality as in another; and yet if the people of the district themselves should desire the appointment of a particular person without reference to his residence, they would not be gratified and would be compelled to receive an incompetent person because he happened to be a resident.

If the section is to be adopted, it strikes me that it ought to be modified, so as to embrace a congressional district or at least two or more counties in one judicial district. I would suggest to strike out in the sixth line, the words "district or;" the section would be then less exceptionable.

Mr. Wadsworth said, that if he had entertained any hope of success, he would when the legislative article was under consideration, have moved to strike out the restriction requiring the representatives and senators to be residents of the parishes and of the district which they represented, because he thought that the people had a right to elect whomsoever they pleased, and because the fact of a man's being a resident of one particular place as disqualifying him from representing another, was a matter for the poople themselves to determine. If they saw fit to elect a person not domiciliated in their parish, they should have the faculty of doing so. As for the particular section under consideration, I think, (said Mr. W.) I can cite an example that will show its utter absurdity. It so happens that in the district formed of the parishes of Plaquemines, St. Bernard and the right bank of the parish of Orleans, I am the only member of the legal profession to be found. If this section passes, the governor will be under the necessity of making me a district judge, if I choose to accept it, and if I do not, there will be no judge, and then he will have to make me district attorney: so I will argue on the one hand and decide on the other. But suppose I do not accept, or that I resign, who can the governor appoint? This mere fact shows the absurdity of such a principle. It is perfectly ridiculous.

Mr. Penn said that the honorable delegate, (Mr. Wadsworth,) was laboring under a misapprehension. It did not happen that such a contingency as the one upon which that delegate relied, existed. To my knowledge, (said Mr. Penn,) there are other lawyers in that district. There is Mr. Ducros, formerly a member of the senate, and Judge Rousseau. But even admitting that the delegate, (Mr. Wadsworth) was right in his conjecture, that does not authorise a departure from principle; and are other portions of the State to suffer because the parishes of Plaquemines and St. Bernard, are not provided with lawyers. Having set the delegate right as to this point, I will now proceed to examine the principle.

There is nothing, perhaps, that has produced greater exasperation and feeling among the people than the attempt to force upon them magistrates with whom they have no acquaintance, and no identity of association and feeling. What are the powers of the people under the new constitution? They are to have the privilege of electing their sheriffs and other parish officers. But should the sheriff or clerk of the court resign, or die, the appoinment for the remainder of the term devolves upon the governor. Suppose this section be rejected, what will be the result in reference to these appointments? A person from another quarter of the State may be appointed, if the governor should think fit to prefer him to a resident of the locality. He may consult his own feelings, at the expense of those of the people of the parish. He may appoint a friend, a partizan, and transfer him from one remote portion of the State to another. Is such a power as this to be confided to the executive; and particularly in reference to judicial appointments? Is it designed that an utter stranger should be sent to a district to decide upon the reputation, the property and the lives of the citizens? One in whom no confidence is reposed, and who is totally unknown to the mass of the people. Experience, and the loud complaints which have resounded from one section of the State to another, should induce us to pause in such a purpose.

The honorable delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Eustis) has appealed to history as opposed to the section. I am somewhat astonished that a gentleman so well versed in the annals of the State, should have forgotten an appointment made by governor Robertson, in defiance of the wishes of the people. He appointed in the Florida district, a man who had been but recently in the State, and of whom the people knew nothing, to be judge. That indiviadual may have been, and doubtless was a man of education, but he was totally ignorant of the people, among whom he was about to dispense justice; he was ignorant of our legislation and of our peculiar system of laws; and yet the governor insisted upon his appointment. At the death of this gentleman, his place was filled by another, not more acceptable to the people; one whose decissions were more frequently reversed than any other judge in Florida, and who was immensely unpopular. Under the administration of governor White, notwithstanding the wishes of the people and the sense of the senate, an unsatisfactory nomination was made, and persisted in, and it was only after a great deal of difficulty, that judge Jones was finally appointed, a gentleman, although I desire not to pronounce his, or any ones eulogium, who is not inferior, in point of ability and integrity to any man in the State. I think the section contains a principle highly salutary, and that the reverse of that principle is subversive of democratic institutions.

Mr. Wadsworth said that he was aware that Mr. Ducros was a lawyer by profession; but he was not a practicing lawyer. He did not think that Mr. Ducros would enter the lists. The contest would thereforefore be between him and judge Reausseau, and that would be no contest; for, if judge Reausseau took the judgeship, then the district attorneyship would have to be conferred on him. The result would be about the same.

The yeas and nays being called for on Mr. Conrad's amendment, to strike out in the sixth line, the words, "district or,"

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad, of Jefferson, Dunn, Eustis, Guion, Kenner, King, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Roman, Saunders, Winchester and Wadsworth voted in the affirmative—29 yeas; and

bauve, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo' Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the negative —36 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

Mr. KENNER moved to amend said section by inserting after the word "district," in the seventh line, the words "next adjoining or contiguous."

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Wadsworth and Winchester voted in the affirmative—24 yeas; and

Messrs. Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Humble, Hynson, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the negative—33 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

Mr. LEWIS then moved for the adoption of the section.

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Labauve, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Penn, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the affirmative—37 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boddousquie, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Dunn, Eustis, Guion, Kenner, King, Legendre, Marigny, Mezureau, Roman, Winchester and Wadsworth voted in the negative—20 nays; consequently said motion was carried, and the section was adopted, as follows, viz:

SEC. 7. All civil officers for the State at large, shall reside within the State, and all district or parish officers within their respective districts or parishes, and shall keep their respective offices at such places therein as may be required by law; and no person shall be elected or appointed to any district or parish office, who shall not have resided in such district or parish long enough before such election or appointment, to have acquired the right of voting for representatives to the general assembly in such district or parish.

Section eighth was taken up, viz:

SEC. 8. The legislature shall determine the duration of the several public offices, when such duration shall not have been fixed by this constitution; Provided, that such time shall never exceed four years; except notaries public, whose time of office may be extended to seven years; and all civil officers, except the governor and judges of the superior and inferior courts, shall be removable by an address of a majority of the members of both houses, except those the removal of whom has been otherwise provided for by this constitution.

Mr. WADSWORTH thought the whole provision useless. It would create confusion. It would be much better to leave the whole matter discretionary with the legislature.

Mr. EUSTIS said he was one of those that thought that public officers were, and ought to be, responsible to the people for the power delegated to them. But there were officers whose functions required qualifications so difficult to be met with, that prudence necessitated that they should be exceptions to what ought to be considered the general rule. Among this class of exceptions, he would place notaries public. A good notary is more difficult to be found than a good lawyer. A dozen may be appointed, you may fill the office, you may appoint a notary, but you cannot make a notary. The notary is necessarily the architect of his own fortunes. His business depends upon his skill and his reputation. It is to his hands that are confided the most important papers and the most important matters appertaining to society. From him are expected fidelity, order, discretion, punctuality and an intimate knowledge of the titles of the country; and can we reasonably hope to meet with all these qualifications whenever we please? It may be that you can get a ready copyist; but is a ready copyist alone suited to the delicate and important functions of a notary? Will a good hand writing and ordinary business habits be sufficient? How much harm can be done by an unskilful person, who is charged with the functions of a notary, if he be entrusted with the public business. The functions of the notary is directly connected with the safety of property and the proper fulfilment of contracts. I would appeal to the honorable and learned delegate, (Mr. Lewis) whether it would not be most unfortunate to expose property and the interests of families to constant peril, by impairing and destroying all the guaranties of having proper persons to fill the office of notary, and by making the tenure of the office uncertain, to create constant fluctuations in it, which would doubtless, be attended with pernicious consequnences.

The question was called for on the first part of the section.

Mr. Mayo proposed to add to it the following:

"Until his successor shall have been duly elected and qualified."

Mr. Lewis considered the amendment unnecessary, inasmuch as the legislature were vested with the necessary power under the section.

Mr. Mayo's amendment was lost, and the first part of the section was then adopted.

Mr. Lewis said that the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Eustis) had appealed to him whether the exception in favor of notaries public should not be maintained as proposed by the section as it originally stood.

To this appeal I would (said Mr. Lewis) reply that I coincide in opinion with him that a notary should possess the qualifications he has enumerated. But notwithstanding, I do not consider that a notary should be an exception to the general principle established in relation to all other officers. If a notary be faithful and competent, it is to be presumed he will be reappointed. I can see no good reason why greater importance should be attached to the tenure of office of a notary than of a judge. We have limited the tenure of judicial office to six years, and if the argument held good in relation to notaries, that they should be appointed indefinitely, the same argument would hold good, and in a greater degree, in relation to the tenure of office of judges. But the argument is unsound in either case; for the responsibility which will result from a limited tenure will produce more good than all the benefits which have been supposed to follow independence from popular control, on the part of public officers, and a permanent tenure. There are other offices no less important than notaries, that have been limited; and yet experience has demonstrated no inconvenience from the limitation. The highest dignitaries of the Republic, the president holds his office but for four years. Moreover, it is to be hoped that none other but capable persons will be appointed notaries; just in the same way that we expect that none but capable persons will be appointed judges.

Mr. Humble called for the previous question, which was sustained.

The question was taken on Mr. Lewis' motion to strike out the words "except notaries public, whose term of office may be extended to seven years."

The question then recurred on Mr. Wadsworth's motion to strike out the whole of the proviso, and it was carried —yeas 29; nays 25.

Mr. Lewis then moved for the rejection of the section. He said that by striking out the proviso full power was conferred upon the legislature to continue offices for life; the section became useless, if not dangerous, and for that reason he hoped it would be rejected.

The yeas and nays were called for on the motion to adopt the section—yeas 27; nays 26; the president having voted in the negative, the motion to adopt was lost.

Whereupon, on motion, the Convention adjourned.

Wednesday, April 30, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

At the request of the president, the Hon. Mr. Stephens opened the proceedings with prayer.

On motion, leave of absence was granted to Messrs. Scott of Feliciana and Penn.

Mr. Brent having voted in the majority, moved to reconsider the vote respecting the eighth section of the article upon the general provisions, which motion prevailed, and said section was taken up, as follows:

SEC. 8. The legislature shall determine the duration of the several public offices, when such duration shall not have been fixed by this constitution; provided that such time shall never exceed four years except notaries public, whose time of office may be extended to seven years; and all civil officers, except the governor and judges of the supreme and district courts, shall be removeable by an address of a majority of the members of both houses, except those the removal of whom has been otherwise provided for by this constitution.

Mr. WADSWORTH moved to amend said section by striking out in the fourth line, the words "provided that such duration shall never exceed four years."

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Eustis, Guion, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—22 yeas; and

Messrs. Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, Dunn, Humble, Hynson, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the negative—28 nays.

Mr. MAYO then moved to amend said section, by strking out in the fifth and sixth lines the words "except notaries public, whose time of office may be extended to seven years;" which was adopted.

Mr. MAYO then moved for the adoption of the section as amended, viz:

SEC. 8. The legislature shall determine the duration of the several public officers, when such duration shall not have been fixed by this constitution; provided that such time shall never exceed four years; and all the civil officers, except the governor and judges of the supreme and district courts, shall be removeable by an address of a majority of the members of both houses, except those the removal of whom has been otherwise provided for by this constitution.

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Chambliss, Claiborne, Covillion, Culbertson, Dunn, Guion, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Labauve, Lewis, McRae, McCallop, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the affirmative—36 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Briant, Conrad of Orleans, Eustis, King, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Roman, St. Amand and Winchester voted in the negative—13 nays.

Mr. MARIGNY submitted the following, which was ordered to be spread upon the journals:

Communication of Mr. Marigny.

A few days ago I laid upon the desk a section to be inserted under the head of general provisions. The object of the section was to empower the legislature to extend the right of citizenship to persons of colored origin, whenever required by the public interest.

But public opinion being against the measure, and many of the members of the Convention who seemed to approve of it, having since expressed themselves against it, I am now satisfied that it would be rejected.

I believe it is my duty to withdraw it. I trust that the members of the Convention of the State at large will do me the justice to believe that my motives were pure; I thought that it was proper to grant to the legislature a power that it was not likely would be abused, and the exercise of which might, under certain circumstances, redound to the benefit of the State.

The house then took up the

ORDER OF THE DAY.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

SEC. 9. Absence on the business of this State or of the United States, shall not forfeit a residence once obtained, so as to deprive any one of the right of suffrage, or of being elected or appointed to any office under this State, under the exceptions contained in this constitution.

Mr. GUION considered this section unnecessary, and it might operate to the prejudice of some of our citizens. It was useless to say that absence on the business of the State or of the United States should not forfeit citizenship, because, as a matter of course, a citizen representing the State abroad was not presumed to be divested of his right of citizenship by such service; and it might be understood that the reservation in favor of citizens abroad in the service of the State or of the United States divested such other citizens as were absent on pleasure or business of the right of citizenship. A native of the State might be disfranchised under the section, who happened to be abroad. If it was intended as a protection to those citizens who went abroad on public business, it was useless, and it could have no other tendency than to operate harshly towards other persons by the inference which might be drawn from it.

Mr. C. M. Conrad concurred in opinion, that it was unnecessary. By another section which has been adopted, it is prescribed that an absence of ninety days shall interrupt the acquisition of residence. The general law was against the present section. It was copied in the old constitution from the constitution of Kentucky, and had been retained by the committee probably becaure it was in the old constitution. It was useless, and he would rather see it left out.

Mr. Guion called for its rejection, and asked for the ayes and nays, Messrs. Aubert, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Guion, King, Legendre, Trist and Voorhies voted in the affirmative—8 yeas; and Messrs. Benjamin, Bourg, Brent, Brazeale, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Labauve, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—40 nays; consequently said motion was lost, and the section was adopted.

Section tenth was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 10. It shall be the duty of the general assembly to regulate by law, in what cases, and what deduction from the salaries of public officers shall be made for neglect of duty in their official capacity.

Section eleventh was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 11. Returns of all elections for members of the general assembly shall be made to the secretary of state, for the time being.

Section twelfth was taken up, viz:

Sec. 12. The legislature shall point out the manner in which a person coming into the country shall declare his residence.

Mr. Brazeale thought this section useless. He moved to strike it out.

Mr. Brent expressed opposition to the section, on the ground that it conferred the power of making a registry law.

Mr. C. M. Conrad denied that it had such a tendency. Its only effect would be to prevent perjury. The inference of the delegate (Mr. Brent) was not authorised.

Mr. Brent repeated that it evidently was designed to favor a registry law.

Mr. Lewis said it was literally copied from the constitution of 1812, and in pursuance of it, the legislature passed an act in 1813. He had never heard any complaint about the operation of that law. As to whether it favored a registry law or not, that he conceived was not a matter of serious consideration. The question may well be left to the legislature. If the people desired to have a registry law, they should be left free to have it ordained, and if they were opposed to such a law, it was not to be presumed the legislature would pass it, and if it were passed by one legislature in opposition to the wishes of the people, it would be repealed by the next legislature.

Mr. Claiborne moved an amendment that the residence begin from the date of the declaration. The legislature may never pass a law, and persons may under color of the section, declare their residence a few days before the election for the purpose of voting. He considered the section useless without the amendment.

Mr. Lewis said he hoped the amendment would not prevail. It was out of place, and the section was better without it.

Mr. Preston advocated the rejection of the section. It was imperative, and required a declaration as a sine que non, before residence could be acquired. The legislature were bound under the solemnities of an oath, to observe the requirements of the constitution. Now, taking it for granted that the legislature will pass a law in conformity with the section, I contend that it will be imposing an unnecessary restriction. In no other State is such a condition demanded. People coming among us were used to nothing of the kind, and because they failed to observe this formality, they were to be denied the privilege of citizenship. It was true the section was found in the old constitution, and that the legislature had passed a law in obedience to its requirement. But its practice was considered so onerous, so repugnant to the spirit of liberty, that by common consent it has fallen into desuetude. Since the adoption of the old constitution, one-half of those that has come to the State and become citizens, had failed to observe this senseless formality. Not one half of the citizens had ever made this declaration. If the records of the parish court were examined, it would be found that in this populous city, not one thousand, not five hundred persons have made this declaration. Look at the north-western parishes, which are filling up so rapidly with population; you will not find one dozen persons who have made any declaration preparatory to becoming citizens. It may be considered then, as an obsolete form. I say nothing of the impolicy of such a restriction. But let us be as generous as our sister States, who require no such a condition from our citizens. Let us place no obstacles in the way of population. We want population for the development of our great resources; no man who by his industry contributes to the wealth of the State, should be compelled to hunt among musty records to show that he has made a declaration to become a citizen. Let us repudiate such a narrow-minded policy.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said he did not concur in opinion with the delegate from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis) as to his amendment being out of place; but, nevertheless, as it was manifest it would not be adopted, he would withdraw it, not to take up the time of the house, and inasmuch as a motion had been made to reject the section.

Mr. BRENT moved for the rejection of said section.

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Brumfield, Carriere, Humble, Hynson, King, McRae, Mayo, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Trist, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—18 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Cenas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Kenner, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Roman, St. Amand, Taylor of St. Landry, Wadsworth, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—31 nays; consequently said motion was lost, and the section was adopted.

Section thirteenth was then taken up, viz:

SEC. 13. In all elections by the people, the vote shall be by ballot, and in all elections by the senate and house of representatives, jointly or separately, the vote shall be given viva voce.

Mr. PRESTON moved to amend said section, by striking out in the second line, the words "by ballot," and inserting the words "viva voce."

Mr. PRESTON said that his reason for making this motion was that the viva voce system was more conformable to republican government than the system of voting by ballot. The former system has been adopted in Virginia, the mother of States, and he doubted not it would work as well here as it had worked in Virginia. The only argument which he had ever heard against it was that it would expose the exercise of suffrage to a controlling influence. He thought this argument was a reproach to the people. There was not, in his opinion, a man who was ashamed of his vote. The people would be delighted at this open and independent mode of expressing their individual preferences and political predilections. In fact, as it is, the way a man votes is no secret. It is known to his friends and acquaintances, and is boldly declared. He did not think there was a man in Louisiana who could be subjected to any influence by voting openly. He had heard it said that a man might vote as he pleased, either by ballot, or viva voce, if it so suited him. The parish judges did not so construe it. He knew instances where they refused to receive a viva voce vote and insisted upon a ballot.

The tendency of viva voce voting would be to make the people independent. But that would not be the only advantage.—There was another consideration. In contested elections it was impossible to identify the illegal ballots, and this difficulty rendered these contests almost useless, when the difference was only a few votes, for it was held by the courts that the way persons voted could not be inquired into. The consequence was that the contest had frequently to be referred to the people, and that occasioned great delay and great expense. If frauds were committed under the viva voce system, they could be detected, and the individuals guilty of them would be held up to popular reproach. The ballot box would be purified. He conceived his amendment was called for by sound considerations of public policy; it was in accordance with democratic institutions, and he hoped it would prevail.

Mr. Wadsworth said he designed to answer but one or two things which fell from the gentleman, (Mr. Preston) and he believed that was all that was necessary, to show that the grounds assumed by the delegate were fallacious. It was a pretty theory to say that man was independent of all influences; to pretend that the great mass were beyond the influence of wealth and beyond the power of wealth; but practically, it was ridiculous. It was essential to secure the independence of the mass of the voters, men who depended for their livelihood upon the employment they obtained from the rich, that they should have the privilege of voting, if they chose, by ballot. It was a wise and salutry provision. The great power of wealth is seen and felt every day; and if a loboring man cannot be allowed to put in his ballot according to the dictates of his conscience, without exposure to punishment, the result must be pernicous to the purity of our elections. If the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) thinks it democratic that a man should be compelled to vote viva voce, his construction of democracy and mine are dissimilar. Democracy, I take it, is intended to put down the power of concentrated wealth; and hence its repugnance to banking, and other institutions which combine political influence. If a man is to get a loan from a bank, on account of a political vote he may give, or be removed from an employment, because he votes against his employer, or the party to which his employer belongs, you subject his independence to a doubtful ordeal. There is a struggle at once between his interests and his duty, and the calls of the former may stifle the voice of the latter.

But the gentleman says that the people will be proud to record their votes openly. There is nothing in the existing system that prevents a man from voting an open ticket, and if it be any pleasure, or if a man feels indifferent whether his vote be known or not, he may gratify his humor. It may be safely inferred that when a man votes with a folded ticket, he has his reasons for doing so, and these reasons are properly matters for his own reflection. It is sufficient he has voted, and the presumption is he has done his duty according to the dictates of his judgement.

Mr. Benjamin said he had made a calculation, by which it appeared that one hundred and thirty-eight officers had to be elected in the city alone. It was utterly impossible to get through with the elections in the city, by the viva voce system; and if he had no other objection, he should vote against it on the ground of its utter impracticability.

Mr. Porter said he was in favor of the viva voce system, but the remarks of the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Benjamin) had convinced him that the system would be difficult to practice, on account of the great number of officers to be elected, especially in the city.

The question was taken on Mr. Preston's proposition.

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Garrett, Humble, McRae, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Taylor of St. Landry, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the affirmative—11 yeas;

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Cenas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Chinn, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, Dunn, Guion, Hynson, Kenner, King; Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Porter, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth and Winchester voted in the negative—40 nays;

Mr. Boudousquie moved to strike out the words "by the senate and house of representatives."

Mr. Wadsworth objected to this amendment. He thought the members of the legislature should assume the responsibility of their votes.

The amendment was not put.

Mr. Chinn moved for the previous question, which motion prevailed.

On motion, the thirteenth section was adopted, viz:

Sec. 13. In all elections by the people the vote shall be by ballot; and in all elections by the senate and house of representatives, jointly or separately, the vote shall be given viva voce.

Section fourteenth was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 14. No member of congress, nor person holding or exercising any office of trust or profit under the United States, or either of them, or any foreign power, shall be eligible as a member of the general assembly of this State, or hold or exercise any office of trust or profit under the same.

Section fifteenth was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 15. All laws that may be passed by the legislature, and the public records of this State, and the judicial and legislative written proceedings of the same, shall be promulgated, preserved and conducted in the language in which the constitution of the United States is written.

Section sixteenth was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 16. The general assembly shall direct by law, how persons who are now, or may hereafter become securities for public officers, may be relieved or discharged on account of such securityship.

Section seventeenth was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 17. No power of suspending the laws of this State shall be exercised, unless by the legislature or its authority.

Mr. Marigny called up the additional section submitted by him, viz:

Sec. 18. The secretary of the senate, and the clerk of the house of representatives, shall possess the French and English languages; and any member of the general assembly may address either house in the French or English language.

Mr. Marigny said that in a few years, it was reasonable to infer, that the French language would scarcely be heard in the halls of our legislature. Out of respect for the ancient population, he hoped the principle consecrated in the section would be adopted. It might happen, as in his own case, in this body, that some persons might be elected to the legislature who were not as familiar with the English as with the French, and they ought to have the privilege granted them of speaking in the language most familiar to them. It was but an act of courtesy, and an act of justice.

Mr. Wadsworth considered the section unnecessary, and that was his motive for opposing it. As to the right of a member to speak in any language he pleased, it was beyond all doubt. A member of the legislature might address the chair in Choctaw, but whether it would be available or not was another question.

Mr. Lewis said that in 1812, when the constitution was adopted, the English language was but little spoken. The large preponderance of the population were French, or of French origin, and if any thing of the kind had been necessary, it would have then struck the framers of the constitution. But what would be the practical effect of this section? It was to preclude the legislature forever, and without reference whether the circumstances made it necessary or not, from employing a clerk or secretary who did not understand the French language. As to the right of a member to be heard in whatever language was most familiar to him, there could not be a doubt. It was useless to assert that right in the constitution. A member might speak, if he chose, in German, but if the object of speech was to communicate one's thoughts, it was not to be presumed a man would speak in a language that was not understood. About one half of the members of this house speak the two languages. It was immaterial to him in what particular language a gentleman uttered his sentiments, whether in French or in English. His opposition to the section did not grow out of any repugnance to the French language; on the contrary he hoped and trusted that the French language would be preserved. He confessed that the French language was not as much spoken in this body as the English; but this resulted from the fact that a large portion of the members did not understand the French —and those whose maternal tongue was French, spoke English so fluently as to induce them to express themselves in that language, as well to dispense with the tediousness of a translation, as because it was most generally understood.

He conceived the section, then, to be altogether, in the first place, unnecessary, and in the second place, he was averse to it, as trammelling the choice of the legislature, and coercing them in the matter of the election of their officers, of the qualifications of whom they were the proper judges. Thirty years experience has demonstrated that there is no disposition in the legislature to elect officers who are not familiar with the French as well as the English languages, and without doubt they will continue to act upon the same principle; at any rate, as long as the slightest necessity exists for it, and that was as long as they ought to act upon it, and as long as it would be acted upon, whether you cumber the constitution with this section or not.

M. Brazeale participated in the opinion that the section was unnecessary.

Mr. Chinn said that as distinct propositions were embraced in the section, with one of which he did not concur, he was under the necessity of voting against the section.

Mr. Marigny moved for the adoption of said section.

The yeas and nays being called for.

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Carriere, Conrad of Orleans Covillion, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, Scott of Baton Rouge, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, and Winchester voted in the affirmative—26 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Chambliss, Chinn, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Humble, Hynson, Lewis, McRae, Mayo, Porter, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry and Wikoff voted in the negative—21 nays.

Mr. Guion said he had voted nay because he was opposed to the first part of the section. He had no objection to the latter part. He did not think it proper to trammel the legislature in the choice of its officers by defining their qualifications.

Mr. Porter said he did not think the evil would ever occur, which the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Marigny) wished to preclude, and therefore he had voted no.

Section nineteenth was taken up, viz:

Sec. 19. In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall have the right of being heard by himself or counsel; of demanding the nature and cause of the accusation against him; of meeting the witnesses face to face; of having compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor throughout the State, and prosecution by indictment or information; a speedy public trial, by an impartial jury of the vicinage; nor shall he be compelled to give evidence against himself.

Mr. Preston said that if this section were not modified, it would be followed by the most pernicious results. It would entail enormous expense upon the State, and criminals would avail themselves of the pretext of prolonging their trials, by averring that they had material witnesses in remote portions of the State and abroad. There was no wrong done in the present practice to persons who were accused; they were allowed the facility of getting the written depositions of witnesses who were not present. It would ruin and bankrupt the State, and besides, interfere, seriously, with the prompt execution of the criminal laws.

He would, therefore, propose to amend the section, by striking out, in the sixth line, the words "throughout the State."

Mr. Lewis said that the words which the delegate from Jefferson (Mr. Preston,) had moved to strike out, had been added to the section as it was found in the old constitution. The expediency of adding these words had been discussed in the committee, and after mature reflection, it was determined that they were proper and essential to a just administration of the criminal laws. If the motion to strike them out prevailed, the inconveniences now felt will continue to be exhibited. It was of the utmost importance that this right should be secured.

The liberty of the citizen was one of the most important objects of legislation, and any thing so essential to an impartial trial should not be denied. But it is objected that it will occasion considerable expense. This is to be deplored yet it is not an argument that will outweigh the considerations growing out of the reputation and liberty of the citizen. I cannot see that the remedy proposed by the delegate from Jefferson would be efficacious; I think it would be worse than the disease itself. To say that a person accused of crime shall not have the benefit of meeting the witnesses face to face, because it will entail expense, is one of the weakest arguments that could be adduced. As to the ground assumed, that the judge may order depositions to be taken abroad, and that it is the practice to refuse to let the prosecuting attorney go to trial without allowing the accused the benefit of such depositions, it is not entitled to any weight.

It is true, it is within the sound discretion of the judge to continue the trial in order to afford the prisoner the benefit of taking testimony, but if the prosecuting attorney has any spite or ill will against the prisoner, this authority in the judge affords no protection after all, for the accused may be kept in prison at the will of the prosecuting attorney for an indefinite period. The prisoner may be unable to give bail and this power to continue his trial; so far from affording relief, may be so abused as to be a ready means of oppression. To the honor of our prosecuting attornies it can be said that these things have rarely or never happened; but worse things have happened, and it behoves us to throw round the citizen, where his honor, his life or his reputation is involved, every possible protection. Practically, it will not be a matter of as much trouble and expense as has been anticipated. But in few instances, the witnesses will be found not to reside in and about the vicinity, where the offence is perpetrated. It may happen that a sojourner, a stranger passing through a place may be a witness to a crime, and the facility of procuring his presence ought to be given both to the State and to the party. It is true the right may be abused, that it may be employed to get delay, and when guilt exists and the punishment is great, the inducement to commit perjury may have a fatal tendency, yet it may happen on the other hand that an innocent man may find it indispensable to have the witnesses confronted with him, and that the affidavit may be honestly made to bring the witness within the jurisdiction of the court. In such a case should he be debarred the privilege, because it may be abused by a desperate culprit? It is better to submit to the inconvenience of allowing the guilty to avail themselves of the privilege, than that it should be denied to the innocent. These considerations brought my mind and a majority of the committee to the opinion that the proposition was judicious, and I trust a majority of this body will come to the same conclusion.

Mr. Garrett considered the clause unnecessary, inasmuch as it was a matter of pure legislation; he was therefore in favor of the motion to strike out.

The yeas and nays were called for on Mr. Preston's motion, and

Messrs. Bourg, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Cénas, Chinn, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff Read, Roman, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—38 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Brazeale, Burton, Chambliss, Dunn, Guion, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny and Splane voted in the negative —12 nays.

On motion, the section as amended was adopted, viz:

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall have the right of being heard by himself or counsel; of demanding the nature and cause of the accusation against him; of meeting the witnesses face to face; of having compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and prosecution by indictment or information; a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the vicinage; nor shall he be compelled to give evidence against himself.

Section twentieth was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 20. All prisoners shall be bailable by sufficient securities, unless for capital offences, when the proof is evident or presumption great; and the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in case of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.

Section twenty-first was then taken up, viz:

Sec. 21. No ex-post facto law, nor any law impairing the obligation of contracts, shall be passed.

Mr. Conrad of New Orleans, moved to amend said section, by inserting the words "or vested rights be divested."

Mr. Benjamin moved to amend the amendment, by adding the words "unless for purposes of public utility, and for adequate compensation previously made;" which amendment was accepted by Mr. Conrad, and the amendment as amended, was adopted.

On motion the section as amended, was adopted, viz:

No ex-post facto law, nor any law impairing the obligation of contracts, shall be passed, nor vested rights be divested, unless for purposes of public utility and for adequate compensation previously made.

Section twenty-second was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 22. Printing presses shall be free to every person who may undrtake to examine the proceedings of the legislature, or any branch of the government, and no law shall ever be made to restrain the right thereof. The free communication of thoughts and opinions is one of the invaluble rights of man, and every citizen may freely write, speak or print on any subject, being resposible for the abuse of that liberty.

Section twenty-third was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 23. Emigration from the State shall not be prohibited.

Section twenty-fourth was taken up, viz:

Sec. 24. The first general assembly to be elected under this constitution, shall determine upon the place where the seat of government shall be permanently located, from and after the first day of January, id the year one thousand eight hundred ann fifty-one.

Mr. Claiborne hoped that this section would be adopted in place of the one that had been substituted for it. It contained the cool expression of the opinion of the Convention, while at Jackson, when they were free from that effervescence which had taken hold so unaccountably, of the minds of many in relation to the city.

Mr. Marigny moved for the adoption of the section. The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Benjamin, Boudousquie, Briant, Cénas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Guion, King, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Preston, Prudhomme, Roman, St. Amand, Soulé, Splane, Voorhies, Wadsworth and Winchester voted in the affirmative—21 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Covillion, Dunn, Garrett, Humble, Kenner, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the negative—32 nays; consequently said motion was lost and the section was rejected.

Mr. Marigny gave notice that he would on Friday next, move to reconsider the vote rejecting the above section, and also the vote adopting the section removing the seat of government from the city of New Orleans.

On motion the twenty-fifth section was taken up, viz:

Sec. 25. The legislature shall not have power or authority to pledge the faith of the State as security for the payment of any bonds, bills, or other contracts or obligations whatever, nor to borrow money for any purpose whatever, except for defraying the expenses of war, or for the purpose of repelling an invasion of the State by an armed force, or for suppressing an insurrection.

Mr. Cenas moved to amend said section by adding to the same the following proviso, and the same was adopted, viz:

Provided, that the State shall have the right to issue new bonds in payment of its now outstanding obligations or liabilites, whether due or not; the said bonds, however, to bear upon their face, either in principal or interest, an amount less than the original obligations they are intended to replace.

Mr. Cenas said that this provision was so obviously to the interest of the State as to require no explanation.

Mr. Roman remarked, in relation to the section, that while it was judicious to put a stop to the mania which had prevailed in the legislature, to accumulate debts upon debts, it would be unwise to fall into the opposite extreme. This section interdicts all loans which are not designed for the exigencies which it has so explicitly defined. It would follow, as a matter of course, that if the State had not the funds necessary to meet a just debt, she would be estopped from making any arrangements by which these funds might be obtained. He did not believe that it was intended to stop the wheels of government, or to embarrass the State in meeting her just obligations. To avoid such a contingency, he would propose to add the following words to the section, "for a sum not exceeding two hundred and fifty thousand dollars in any one year;" that would be about one-half of the revenue of the State.

Mr. Lewis objected to this amendment. He said it would put us back where we were before. It would deprive us of the benefits designed by the section. If the legislature have this power they may borrow every year. Let our administration be a prudent one, and our expenditures will never exceed our receipts. The legislature will be unable to involve the State to an indefinite amount, when the power to borrow money is restricted to certain specified purposes. The object of the section is to prevent the legislature from getting the State in debt. There is no good reason why the State should be involved, unless it be for one of the contingencies provided for in the section. It will put an effectual check to such wild schemes as the Nashville rail road, and similar undertakings. If you open the floodgates, we shall be again submerged by extravagant and profligate appropriations of money. After the revulsion through which we have passed, it is not to be supposed that similar legislation will occur for some years to come, but if we wish to be placed beyond the possibility of its recurrence, we must apply a stringent restraint.

Mr. Roman said that the delegate from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis) had defended his position with a good deal of ability, but he did not think the gentleman had met the point involved. Are the wheels of government to be stopped, in order that we may avoid a state of things which we all deplore? It may be an effectual mode of purchasing their recurrence, but will not the remedy be as bad as the disease? I do not object to the section; but I wish it to be so expressed as not to impose an impracticable condition. Contingencies may happen that may make it indispensable that the State should have the power to raise money to meet her current expenses. So long as the collection of the revenue is made with fidelity, the accounts may be squared; but suppose that some half dozen sheriffs become defaulters, is the State to be precluded from borrowing money to meet the deficit? It is evident that you place the State in an embarrassing and humiliating position, if you deny to her the power of anticipating her revenues in other cases of emergency than those enumerated in the section.

Mr. Guion said he conceived that some other emergencies might arise, rendering it necessary that the State should have the power of borrowing money. If it be restricted to meeting the ordinary expenses of the government, he conceived it would obviate all objection.

Mr. Preston was opposed to granting the power to borrow money on ordinary occasions, because he considered it would be pernicious. The revenues of the State wisely administered should suffice to meet her current expenses. There were only extraordinary occasions when it would be necessary to raise an additional amount over the ordinary revenue, and when those occasions arose, the people would not be backward in sustaining the government.

Mr. Ratliff was opposed to the amendment. It appeared to him that it went further than the mover designed. The power of the legislature ought to be explicitly restrained in this matter of borrowing, or otherwise we shall be constantly exposed to lavish expenditures. The true principle ought to be, to pay as we go. The suggestion of the delegate from Jefferson (Mr. Preston) was a good one; that if there was any extraordinary occasion for money, over the revenues, that additional taxation be imposed to raise it. The people would be the judges of the necessity, and would hold their servants to a strict accountability. There would be no way of shirking the responsibility and avoiding it when the elections came on.

The question was taken on Mr. Guion's amendment to insert after the word "insurrection," in the seventh line, the words "or for the payment of the ordinary expenses of the government, when there may be a deficiency in the annual revenue."

The yeas and nays being called for on the adoption of said amendment,

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Briant, Cenas, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, St. Amand, Taylor of St. Landry and Winchester voted in the affirmative—21 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Garcia, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the negative—32 nays.

On motion, the section as amended, was adopted, viz:

Sec. 25. The legislature shall not have power or authority to pledge the faith of the State as security for the payment of any bonds, bills, other contracts or obligations whatever, nor to borrow money for any purpose whatever, except for defraying the expenses of war, or for the purpose of repelling an invasion of the State by an armed force, or of suppressing an insurrection.

Provided, That the State shall have the right to issue new bonds in payment of its now outstanding obligations or liabilities, whether due or not; the said new bonds, however, to bear upon their face, either in principal or interest, an amount less than the original obligations they are intended to replace.

Section twenty-sixth was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 26. The legislature shall provide by law for a change of venue in civil and criminal cases.

Section twenty-seventh was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 27. No lottery shall be authorized by this State, and the buying and selling of lottery tickets within the State shall be prohibited by law.

Section twenty-eighth was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 28. No divorce shall be granted by the legislature of this State.

Section twenty-ninth was taken up, viz:

Sec, 29. Every law enacted by the legislature, shall embrace but one object, and that shall be expressed in the title.

Mr. C. M. Conrad said that while he admitted it was excessively inconvenient to lawyers to refer to particular laws, on account of their being accumulated under general titles, yet he conceived there were cases where laws under one title necessarily had to embrace several objects. The section, in his opinion, went too far, and would occasion much greater inconvenience than that which it was intended to remedy. It was very objectionable.

Mr. Lewis said that the object of the section was to remedy a very serious inconvenience. The titles of our laws were generally of a very indifferent character; and the words appended, "and for other purposes," were intended to cover a mass of heterogeneous propositions. It was impossible to find a particular statutory provision without wading through a long list of sections, the titles to which gave at best a most imperfect idea of what followed. It was the business of a whole life to penetrate and find out our laws. There was a total absence of order and system in their classification, and the evil was becoming greater and greater every year. Dispositions upon one subject were found appended to dispositions upon another subject, and where one would suppose it was the last place where they were to be found. A remedy, it was clear, ought to be provided, and the committee could suggest nothing better than this section.

The yeas and nays being called for on the motion to adopt said section,

Messrs. Aubert, Boubousquie, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Carriere, Cénas, Clambliss, Claiborne, Covillion, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Guion, Humble, Hynson, Legendry, Lewis, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Pugh, Read, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry,

Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the affirmative—41 yeas; and Messrs. Benjamin, Briant, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Garrett, Kenner, King, Labauve, McCallop, Ratliff, Roman, Roselius, Soulé and Winchester voted in the negative—14 nays.

Mr. SOULE offered the following additional section:

No law shall be passed to raise money for any other purpose than to defray the expenses of the State, or for the payment of debts incurred for the maintenance of the government.

Mr. WADSWORTH suggested to add the following words, "or for promoting public education."

Mr. SOULE accepted the amendment.

Mr. ROSELIUS observed that the section did not provide for the existing debts of the State. He was certain that this omission did not arise from any intention on the part of his honorable friend to prove repudiation. He was sure that was not the object. The State was ultimately bound to pay in default of payment of the banks. If the section were to be adopted, he would propose to add the following words, "and to provide for the payment of the debts of the State."

Mr. GUION would ask the honorable mover for some explanations as to the design of the section. If it was intended to restrict the State from incurring further liabilities for the future, that has been provided for already.

Mr. SOULE said, I consider the power to levy taxes for any other object than to meet the expenses of the government, as existing no where. The question in my opinion has nothing to do with what are the actual debts of the State, and how they were contracted; and if I were to enter into the enquiry, I would nevertheless ask whether the legislature have the right to impose taxes for other purposes than to pay the legitimate debts of the State, and whether in the event of the legislature having contracted debts for which it had no authority, it could give validity to those obligations, and tax the people to pay them. I think (said Mr. Soulé) my views have been enunciated so as to be understood in this matter. I should certainly regret very much to see the State refuse to pay her just debts, but I can never consent that additional taxation be imposed to pay any other.

Mr. GUION would inquire of the gentleman whether in the event of the State becoming liable for the bonds issued for the property banks, or any portion of them, he would consider that the legislature had no right to raise the means to meet those obligations by taxation, if the ordinary means of the State were insufficient?

Mr. SOULE replied that he had made no such intimation.

Mr. GUION said that in that case, the section had no object, for the legislature has for the future been inhibited from contracting future liabilities, except in certain specified emergencies.

Mr. SOULE observed that it might be the opinion of the delegate (Mr. Guion) that the section was useless. I think differently. As for the past indebtedness of the State, we have no power over it. It is not our province to inquire whether it be valid or invalid. Our mission is limited to prescribing wholesome checks for the future, and profit by past experience; and among the most important objects is to preclude the possibility of our ever again being involved beyond what is necessary for the support of the government, which ought not to exceed our revenues, unless in the event of sudden calamities, it be necessary to make loans.

I have nothing in this matter concealed. My object is plain and straight-forward, and I willingly accept the amendment of my colleague (Mr. Roselius) since he thinks it necessary. The design I have is this, to put it beyond the power of the legislature to impose upon the industry of the people onerous and heavy burthens, the result of extravagant appropriations, and an improper use of the public credit. I would be the last one to destroy the guarantees of the State towards those to whom the State was justly liable. But, at the same time, I am equally reluctant that the legislature should have the power of imposing other taxes than are necessary to carry on the government and to pay its just debts.

Mr. ROSELIUS said that the State had issued her bonds in favor of the property banks. It is beneath the dignity of the State to raise the question, whether, under the existing constitution the legislature had the right to authorize the emission of these bonds. This is not a question to be agitated, to be debated here. It is too late to raise such a question. The bonds have been issued and negotiated. The people have sanctioned their issue through their representatives and constituted authorities, and have acquiesced in it. To attempt to evade our indebtedness in any way, should it so happen that the State be called upon to meet these obligations, amounts to nothing less than repudiation, and if you take away and deny to the legislature the power to impose taxes for that purpose, you effectually repudiate. How can the State pay, if you say she shall not raise the means through taxation? If the legislature cannot call upon the citizens to contribute, it is an absurdity to say that you have no idea to deny the validity of the debt. You effectually make it impossible that it should be paid, and what is the difference between that, and saying at once, that the debt is invalid and that you will not pay it? Let us see if the section will bear the construction placed upon it.

[Mr. Roselius called upon the secretary to read the section.]

"To pay the debts incurred or to meet the current expenses of the government."

Does that confer the power to impose a tax to pay the existing debts of the State? But it is unnecessary to expatiate further to induce the house to reject the section. It can have no other bearing than to intimate that the State is not bound to take up her bonds, in the event of a failure to take them up on the part of those institutions in whose behalf they were issued. And this is a doctrine which I do not believe the gentleman himself, or any member of this house, can sanction.

Mr. Eustis remarked that this was a very important subject, and that it was better to postpone its consideration until another day, when the subject would properly come up in another portion of the constitution, and be then calmly decided.

Mr. Soule said it was clear to his mind that the design of his section had been totally misconceived. It was not intended, nor could not be intended to apply to what was past. It was designed only for the future. It was very clear that nothing we did here could effect any thing done under the old constitution. We had nothing to do with past legislation under that instrument, nor could we effect it. I certainly never had the remotest design to favor any thing which has been so strangely imputed to this section; and I am astonished that a gentleman of the high legal abilities of my respected colleague, could have put such a construction upon the section. I have declared the only object I had in view, the only object I could have in view, was to provide against the recurrence of evils which have been pointed out to us by sad experience. Assuredly, the section went no further. From what I have heard, to my utter astonishment, it seems that it is to give rise to a still further discussion, and as I have no idea of consuming the time of this body any longer with this matter, I will entreat gentlemen to repress their trepidation, and by withdrawing the section the alarming phantom that has conjured up the horrors of repudiation will disappear, and gentlemen's minds will be relieved from a most whimsical apprehension.

Section thirty was taken up and adopted as follows:

"Every law of a general nature, shall be equally applicable to all parts of the State."

Mr. Ratliff gave notice that he would move to-morrow, to reconsider the vote adopting the twenty-fourth section.

Whereupon, the Convention adjourned until to-morrow, at 9 o'clock, a. m.

Thursday, May 1, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. Preston opened the proceedings with prayer.

The Hon. Mr. Du Bouchel, senatorial delegate from the county of Plaquemines, appeared and took his seat; and on motion the certificate of his election was referred to the committee on elections.

The President appointed Mr. Labauve a member of the committee on elections, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Mr. Leonard.

Mr. Mayo moved to reconsider the vote adopting the 29th section. The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Chinn, Culbertson, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, King, Labauve, Le-

loux, Lewis, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Roman, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Wikoff and Winder voted in the affirmative—39 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Bourg, Carriere, Claiborne, Covillion, Legendre and Mazureau voted in the negative—7 nays. Said motion was carried, and the section was taken up, viz:

Sec. 29. Every law of a general nature shall be equally applicable to all parts of the State.

On motion of Mr. Mayo, said section was laid on the table subject to call.

This being the day fixed for the taking into consideration the reports of the committee of revision, the report of said committee on the seventh article was taken up, viz:

The committee of revision report the following:

(Signed,) G. EUSTIS,
Chairman.

April 14, 1845.

TITLE VIII.

MODE OF REVISING THE CONSTITUTION.

Any amendment or amendments to this constitution may be proposed in the senate or house of representatives, and if the same shall be agreed to by three-fifths of the members elected to each house and approved by the governor, such proposed amendment or amendments, shall be entered on their journals, with the yeas and nays taken thereon, and the secretary of state shall cause the same to be published three months before the next general election, in at least one newspaper in French and English, in every parish in the State in which a newspaper shall be published; and if, in the legislature next afterwards chosen, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be agreed to by a majority of the members elected to each house, the secretary of state shall cause the same to be again published in the manner aforesaid, at least three months previous to the next general election for representatives to the State legislature, and such proposed amendment or amendments shall be submitted to the people at said election; and if the people shall approve and ratify such amendment or amendments by a majority of the qualified voters of the State, such amendment or amendments shall become a part of the constitution: Provided, that if more than one amendment be submitted at a time, they shall be submitted in such manner and form that the people may vote for or against each amendment, separately.

On motion, said article was adopted as reported by the committee.

Mr. Ratliff, agreeably to notice previously given, moved to reconsider the vote adopting said article seventh. The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Covillion, Culbertson, DuBouchel, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Splane, Stephens, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—31 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Boudousquie, Bourg, Cénas, Claiborne, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Guion, Kenner, King, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Taylor of St. Landry, Wikoff and Winder voted in the negative—22 nays.

Mr. Guion raised a question of order, whether the motion for reconsideration could be considered as carried, as the number voting for the reconsideration was not greater than the number that voted for the section when it was carried, in conformity with the rule.

The President inquired of the secretary the date of the notice for reconsideration given by Mr. Ratliff.

By reference to the journal, it was found that the notice was given on the 18th of February.

The President decided that the rule relied upon by Mr. Guion was adopted on the 12th of April, and could not affect a notice given before its adoption.

Mr. Guion appealed from the decision of the Chair.

On the question, "shall the President's decision be maintained," the yeas and nays were called for, and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Cènas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Covillion, DuBouchel, Dunn, Eustis, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae,

Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Winder—voted in the affirmative—31 yeas, and Messrs. Aubert, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Chinn, Culbertson, Derbes, Garcia. Garrett, Guion, Kenner, King, Legendre, Lewis, Prudhomme, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Taylor of St. Landry, Wadsworth, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the negative—22 nays; consequently the decision of the chair was sustained.

Mr. Ratliff then moved to amend said article by inserting in the fourth and fifth lines the words "a majority" instead of "three-fifths," and to insert in the eighteenth line "three-fifths," instead of "a majority."

Mr. Lewis said he wished the constitution to be so placed that it would be within the power of the people to amend it, when experience should point out the necessity for any change. He thought that to transpose the words of the article as proposed by the delegate from West Feliciana (Mr. Ratliff) would make amendments to the constitution much more difficult. One man might defeat them. If three-fifths of each house should not concur after the amendments were suggested, they would be defeated. There ought to be in the first place, a decided majority of the legislature to propose the amendments, otherwise if a bare majority be only required, they will be proposed for the mere purpose of agitation. There should be a decided expression, not an uncertain and doubtful expression for change, and when such an expression is given, it should not be in the power of a minority of the people to defeat the wishes of the majority of the people. The article he conceived to be infinitely preferable as it was, and he hoped the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. Marigny considered this amendment as most important, as changing very materially the whole character and bearing of the section. If it prevailed, the result would be constant turmoil and excitement. Every succeeding legislature would propose amendments to the people, it would give an opportunity for ambition to display itself, and certain individuals would not lose the opportunity of manufacturing political capital. Already have we heard in this body, that this constitution, is not yet sufficiently democratic. There are already the seeds of enough excitement, and perturbation in it. We have an election for almost every thing, from a sheriff down to an inspector of pork! It would be exceedingly injudicious to adopt this amendment. Let us have something like consistency snd stability, and let us avoid giving occasion to perpetual changes and innovations. We have had the exposure of the difficulties of making a constitution. Let us beware of new projects which are not wisely examined and deeply pondered. Let us profit by the example of Madison, Jefferson and Monroe, and not imagine that this body concentrates greater talents than has been found in other conventions. He hoped the amendment would be rejected.

Mr. Ratliff said he hoped his amendment would be adopted. He considered the objections that were urged as without force. If a majority of the members of both houses were to propose amendments to the constitution, it would be only a suggestion to the people, but it would give the people the control of the question. They would decide whether these amendments were proper or not, and if deemed expedient, they would make their elections in reference thereto. It would be the popular will that would determine the question, but if you leave the section as it is, it will be in the power of a few persons to preclude the possibility that the people should be consulted, and without their being consulted, provisions in the constitution, objectionable to the mass of the people, will remain in full force. Certainly, the majority of the people should not be placed in that position, as to be debarred from amending the constitution, when experience should convince them that amendments were necessary. We know with what extreme difficulty amendments to the existing constitution have been effected, how often the will and expectations of the people have been disappointed, and yet for years, had the people been consulted, they would have resolved the question in favor of amending the constitution. The people are omnipotent and should have control of this question. If a majority of their representatives, reflecting their will, consider it expedient that amendments should be made, give them the facility of consulting the people, but do not require for this initiatory proceeding, a difficult, if not an impossible majority.

Mr. Brent said that he could not conceive on what just principle this amendment could be resisted. It cannot be the intention of the gentlemen to assert that the constitution of the State is to be placed beyond the will of the majority. If the amendment prevails surely there are yet sufficient checks against any haste or improvident action. It will require two votes of the legislature and one of the people before amendments can be embodied in the constitution. What more would gentlemen have? Do they wish to put it effectually out of the power of the people to amend the constitution, no matter what may be the necessities and exigencies for amending it? Do they wish to place the constitution beyond the control of the people? Are the people forever to be distrusted, and to be regarded with fear and suspicion? It does seem that tyranny and despotism are still favorite doctines even in this republican government. On what grounds can this amendment be opposed? It can only be from a distrust of the people; I must confess I entertain no such distrust.

Mr. Wadsworth said he had no disposition to flatter the people. He had as high a conception of their integrity and intelligence, and as great a respect for their rights and privileges as the delegate from Rapides (Mr. Brent,) or any member upon this floor. He did not think it argued any want of confidence in the people, to ensure some degree of stability and consistency to the established institutions of the country. This was a matter that would meet the concurrence of cool and dispassionate judgment. It was not the people he feared, but it was demagogues, who were never satisfied without popular excitement.

The gentleman has asked me, continued Mr. Wadsworth, to give him a reason, why the constitution should not be placed at the whim and caprice of a temporary majority? I will tell him why. It is because the constitution is not made alone for the majority, it is made to protect the minority, the majority can very well take care of themselves. But the minority must be protected—they must be guaranteed against the ebulitions and outbreaks of majorities. There must be a limit to the will of the majority. They may go so far but no farther. The doctrine that majorities can do no wrong, and that they may substitute at their will and pleasure their say-so as the irrevocable law of the land, without consulting the minority, is one of the most aristocratic notions that can be conceived. The gentleman has asked for a reason, and I have given it!

Mr. Lewis moved for a division of the question, first to proceed to strike out.

The yeas and nays being called for on the motion to strike out,

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Chambliss, Covillion, Du-Bouchel, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Trist, Waddill and Wederstandt voted in the affirmative—24 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Boudousquie, Bourg, Carriere, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Guion, Kenner, King, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Prudhomme, Roman, St. Amand, Taylor of St. Landry, Wadsworth, Wikoff and Winchester voted in the negative—25 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

Mr. Kenner moved for the previous question, which motion prevailed.

On motion, the seventh article was readopted.

Mr. Lewis, on behalf of the committee on elections, reported that Mr. Victor Du-Bouchel was duly elected senatorial delegate for the county of Plaquemines.

Mr. Roman having voted in the majority, moved to reconsider the vote adopting the eighteenth section, which motion prevailed, and the said section was taken up, viz:

Sec. 18. In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right of being heard by himself or counsel, of demanding the nature and cause of the accusation against him, of meeting the witnesses face to face, of having compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and prosecution by indictment or information; a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the vicinage, nor shall he be compelled to give evidence against himself.

Mr. Eustis moved to amend said section by inserting after the words "against him," in the fourth line, the words "and unless he shall have fled from justice." Which amendment was adopted.

On motion, the section as amended was adopted, viz:

SEC. 18. In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall have the right of being heard by himself or counsel, of demanding the nature and cause of the accusation against him, and, unless he shall have fled from justice, of meeting the witnesses face to face, of having compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and prosecution by indictment or information; a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the vicinage, nor shall he be compelled to give evidence against himself.

Mr. ROMAN submitted the following additional section, and the same was laid on the table subject to call, viz:

The legislature shall not in any manner create any debt or debts, liability or liabilities, which shall singly or in the aggregate with any previous debts or liabilities, exceed the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, (except in cases of war, to repel invasion and supress insurrection,) unless the same be authorized by some law, for some single object or work, to be distinctly specified therein, which law shall provide ways and means by taxation for the payment of running interest during the whole time for which said debt shall be contracted, and for the full and punctual discharge at maturity of the capital borrowed; and said law shall not be repealable until the principal and interest thereon shall be paid and fully discharged, and shall not be put into execution until after its re-enactment by the first legislature returned by a general election after its passage.

Mr. CHINN offered the following additional sections, which were laid on the table subject to call, viz:

SEC. —— Any person who shall, after the adoption of this constitution, fight a duel with deadly weapons, or send or receive a challenge to fight a duel with deadly weapons, either within the State or out of it, or who shall act as a second, or aid and assist in any manner those thus offending, shall be deprived of holding any office of trust or profit under this constitution.

SEC. —. "I, (A. B.) do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent on me as ———, according to the best of my abilities and understanding, agreeably to the rules and regulations of the constitution and laws of this State; and I do furthersolemnly swear (or affirm) that since the adoption of this constitution I have not fought a duel with deadly weadons, within this State nor out of it, nor have I sent a challenge to fight a duel with deadly weapons, nor have I acted as second in carrying a challenge, or aided, advised, or assisted any person thus offending—So help me God.

Section thirtieth was taken up, viz:

SEC. 30. No law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title; but in such case the act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted and published at length.

Mr. HUMBLE moved for the adoption of this section.

Mr. RATLIFF had a few words to say. He would suggest to the house the great difficulty which would attend an adherence to this section. He would give an example: There was the militia law, which contained one hundred and sixteen sections. Now, if it were necessary to amend one single section, it would be necessary to re-enact the whole law, of one hundred and sixteen sections, as if it were a new law. This would be the result whenever a clause in the law would be amended, and thus this single law, besides consuming the time of the house, would in a short time, of itself, make a volume. It would lead to great inconvenience to adopt the section.

Mr. MAYO said if the section were adopted, it would extend further than was contemplated by gentlemen who favored it. If any article of the civil code or code of practice were amended, all the articles under the title to which it belonged, would have to be re-enacted and published.

Mr. LEWIS said that the object of this section was to cure a state of utter confusion in our laws. The matter had been well weighed be the committee, and they were convinced that something should be done to remedy the inconvenience that was felt, and which, if not arrested, would be a source of the greatest doubt and perplexity. As prosecuting attorney, at one time, he had more partiularly felt the great inconvenience. It was a task of great difficulty to find particular provisions. They were so mixed up, and were found embodied under so many different and imperfect titles, it was a matter of great annoyance, of great trouble, and of extreme doubt to find out the actual state of our laws, as modified by the numerous amendments made to them from time to time, and which were introduced under the most indefinite form, and placed along with dispositions of dissimilar character.

Mr. C. M. Conrad said he understood the gentleman's object, but he thought it one of no great magnitude. It was a matter involving the convenience of lawyers, and he did not think that this consideration should be sufficient to induce us to entail very heavy expense and a great deal of trouble upon the legislature. The great multiplicity of amendments shows that this plan would swell the volume containing our statutes to an enormous size. The section says "the act revised, or section amended shall be re-enacted and republished." Which is it, the section amended or the entire act, that is to be re-enacted and republished? There is here some ambiguity. The same inconvenience attends the publication of the laws of congress. If the detached section be alone published, that will give but an indefinite idea of the character of the whole act; and if the whole act is to be republished, the enormous expense will be a most serious objection. It is better to leave things as they are. When our community gets older and more settled, our laws will become fewer, and a remedy will readily be provided for the inconvenience now felt.

Mr. Eustis said that the reform proposed by the section was imperiously called for, as well by the confused state in which our statutues were, as by public opinion. There would would be nothing more vicious than to amend laws by an indefinite reference to their titles. It gave a great deal of trouble, and it was a matter of much perplexity to find out what were the changes and modifications made to our existing statutes. The greater part were written in a language which was neither French nor English. The references were in many instances totally unintelligible. The design was that laws should be intelligible, and that they should be of ready reference. People were liable to prosecution for violating them. Such a subject was surely not trivial, or unworthy of our attention. On the contrary; said Mr. E. I think it a matter of great importance.

The gentleman who has just taken his seat, cites the acts of congress as obnoxious to the same objection. It is no reason why we should not seek for greater order and system because there is none in the laws of congress. It is very true that there is a great want of order and much confusion in those laws, but that is to be deplored. We have a precedent for our guide, in the Napoleon code. Some of our sister States are introducing regularity and order in arranging their statutes. The legislature of Massachusetts have been engaged a whole session to place their statutes in a form similar to the body of our civil laws. In France the laws are admirably arranged. If we wish to preserve our statutes from a total chaos, we must adopt something in the nature of the section before us.

Mr. Conrad of Orleans, moved that said section be laid on the table indefinitely.

Mr. Lewis moved to amend said section by inserting after the word "section," in the third line, the words "or article," and by inserting in the first and second lines the word "revived" instead of the word "revised;" which amendments were adopted.

Mr. Conrad of Orleans, moved that said section and amendment be laid on the table indefinitely. The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Boudousquie, Chinn, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion and Ratliff voted in the affirmative—5 yeas; and Messrs. Benjamin, Bourg, Brent, Brazeale, Briant, Bumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, DuBouchel, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Ledoux, Legendre, Rewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Pugh, Read, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—51 nays; consequently said motion was lost.

On motion, the section as amended was adopted, viz:

Sec. 30. No law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title; but in such case the act revised, or section or article amended, shall be re-enacted and published at length.

Section thirty-first was taken up and adopted, viz:

Sec. 31. The State shall not become subscriber to the stock of any corporation or joint stock company.

Section thirty-two was then taken up, as follows:

Sec. 32. No person shall hold or exercise, at the same time, more than one civil office in this State, except one of such offices be that of a justice of the peace.

Mr. Eustis moved to amend said section by inserting after the words "civil office," in the second line, the words "of emolument," which amendment was adopted.

On motion, the section as amended was adopted.

Section thirty-third was taken up, viz:

Sec. 33. No corporate body shall be hereafter created, renewed or extended with banking or discounting privileges, without six months previous public notice of the intended application for the same, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law; nor shall any charter for the purposes aforesaid be granted for a longer period than twenty years, and every such charter shall contain a clause reserving to the legislature the power to alter, revoke or annul the same whenever, in their opinion, it may be expedient so to do; and every charter so granted shall be upon the express condition that the share holders or members of such corporations, shall be bound severally and in solido, for all the liabilities and acts of such corporation, and for the consequences resulting therefrom.

Mr. Kenner moved that said section be acted upon paragraph by paragraph, which motion prevailed.

Mr. Brent moved to amend said section by striking out from the word "privileges," in the third line, the balance of the section, viz:

Without six months' previous public notice of the intended application for the same, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law; nor shall any charter, for the purposes aforesaid, be granted for a longer period than twenty years; and every such charter shall contain a clause reserving to the legislature the power to alter, revoke or annul the same, whenever, in their opinion, it may be expedient so to do; and every charter so granted shall be upon the express condition that the share holders or members of such corporation, shall be bound personally and in solido, for all the liabilities and acts of such corporation, and for the consequences resulting therefrom.

Mr. Lewis said he had moved to strike out this portion of the section in the committee, but was overruled. He hoped the motion would prevail here. It met his hearty concurrence. He was in toto an anti-bank man.

Mr. Conrad begged leave to assign the reasons of his vote. He had never been an advocate of the State-bank system. He had never voted for a bank charter, and doubted much whether he could, under any circumstances, be induced to vote for one. He had always thought there should be but one bank in the country, and that was a bank of the United States; but he did not believe that it was competent for any one State to bring about this salutary reform. What would it avail the State of Louisiana to prohibit the incorporation of banks within her limits, if the other States, particularly the adjoining States, should not imitate her example? Was not all experience shown that where a people are habituated to a paper currency, if they cannot have one of their own they will use that of other countries? The consequence is, that if we prohibit the establishment of banks, our State will be flooded with the paper of the banks of other States, over which we can exercise no control, and thus we will be made to share their losses without being able to participate in their profits.

We would go as far as any one in restricting the legislature in the power to incorporate banks, and to prevent the deplorable mischiefs which have resulted from the abuse of that power, but to deprive them of it entirely was farther than he was prepared to go.

Mr. Winder said he was in favor of restricting the legislature in the exercise of the power, but he doubted the policy of taking it away altogether.

The yeas and nays being called for, on the motion of Mr. Brent to strike out,

Messrs. Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, DuBouchel, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Humble, Kenner, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mauzreau, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the affirmative—38 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Boudousquie, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Guion, Hynson, King, Legendre, Pugh, Roman, Trist, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—19 nays.

Mr. Kenner then moved to fill the blank with the following amendment, viz:

"And should any person circulate, or cause to be circulated, any paper money issued by any corporation or person existing in any other State or county, he shall be considered guilty of a misdemeanor, and for such offence shall be amenable to such penalties as the legislature may determine."

Mr. Kenner said, in good faith and in sincerity, he had voted in favor of denying to the legislature the power to establish banking corporations. But this was not sufficient. It was an act of folly, and it might be considered an act of insincerity, to prohibit our legislature from creating banks, if we were to take no measures to preclude our being flooded by the paper of irresponsible banks elsewhere. It was a very easy matter for an association to be formed in this city, and to have their bank notes struck off in Natchez and sent here for circulation. This would be much worse than the evil of local banking corporations amenable to our laws, and it would inevitably result, unless we provided an effectual remedy. If we are to put down banking, let us put it down effectually, and let us return to the good old system of hard money.

Mr. Voorhies moved to lay Mr. Kenner's proposition on the table.

Mr. Kenner called for the yeas and nays on Mr. Voorhies' motion,

Messrs. Benjamin, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Eustis, Humble, Ledoux, Lewis, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Roman, Scott of Baton Rouge, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—31 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Bourg, Brumfield, Chinn, Culbertson, Derbes, Du Bouchel, Dunn, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Hynson, Kenner, King, Legendre, McCallop, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, St. Amand, Trist, Waddill, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—25 nays.

Mr. Kenner would enquire from those that were better informed, if an association could not be got up in this city, assuming to act as the bank of Kentucky, under a charter of the State of Kentucky, and circulate the notes of such an institution, receive them on deposit and pay them out? If this were not possible, he should say nothing more. But if it were, he would again submit it to gentlemen whether they should not protect the State from the evils of banking in other States, as well as from the evils of local banks.

Mr. Mayo moved for the adoption of the section as amended, viz:

Sec. 33. No corporate body shall be hereafter created, renewed or extended, with discounting privileges.

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Covillion, DuBouchel, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Humble, Kenner, Ledoux, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the affirmative—37 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Cénas, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Guion, Hynson, Legendre, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Trist, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—18 nays.

Section thirty-fourth was taken up, viz:

Sec. 34. All charters hereafter granted by the legislature, shall terminate on the first day of January, in the year one thousand eight hundred and ninety, where no certain limit has been fixed in the act of incorporation; and no corporate privileges hereafter to be created, shall ever endure for a longer term than twenty-five years; provided that this section shall not apply to political or municipal corporations.

Mr. MARIGNY moved to amend said section by striking out the words "and no corporate privileges, hereafter to be enacted, shall ever endure for a longer term than twenty-five years."

On motion of Mr. CENAS, said section and amendment were laid on the table subject to call.

Mr. CLAIBORNE submitted the following additional section, and the same was laid on the table subject to call, viz:

"It shall be the duty of the legislature to define and limit in the charters of all municipal or city corporations, the power of levying taxes on property, and of creating debts by such corporations, and to confine such power, as nearly as possible, to purposes of municipal administration and police."

Section thirty-fifth was taken up, viz:

SEC. 35. The general assembly shall never grant any exclusive privilege or monopoly, in such form as to prevent any subsequent legislature from granting similar privileges to other individuals or corporations.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to amend the section by so modifying it as to empower the legislature to grant a monopoly for a term of years.

Mr. Benjamin said that it was frequently necessary, in order to induce persons to engage in new enterprise of great public utility, to endow them with exclusive privileges for a certain number of years. Without such an inducement, capital would not be invested in such enterprises. Mr. B. instanced the water works, the gas works, and similar undertakings. He was opposed to monopolies, except they were of this description, and called for the public interest and convenience.

Mr. BRENT moved to amend said section by inserting after the word "monopoly," in the second line, the words "for a longer period than fifteen years," and to strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to amend the amendment of Mr. Brent, by inserting "twenty" instead of "fifteen," which amendment was adopted.

On motion, the section as amended was adopted, viz:

SEC. 35. The general assembly shall never grant any exclusive privilege or monopoly for a longer period than twenty years.

Mr. RATLIFF submitted the following additional section, and the same was adopted, viz:

"The legislature shall direct by law in what manner, and in what courts, suits may be brought against the State."

Mr. EUSTIS, of the committee on education, submitted the following, viz:

An university shall be established in the city of New Orleans. It shall be composed of four faculties, to wit: one of law, one of medicine, one of the natural sciences, and one of letters.

It shall be called the University of Louisiana; and the medical college of Louisiana as at present organized, shall constitute the faculty of medicine.

The legislature shall provide by law for its further organization and government.

Section thirty-sixth was taken up, viz:

SEC. 36. Slaves shall be forever held and considered as immovable, and shall be regulated by the same laws as other immovable property.

On motion of Mr. BENJAMIN, said section was laid on the table indefinitely.

Mr. RATLIFF submitted the following additional section, viz:

The relation of master and slave in this State shall not be abolished, unless a bill so to abolish the same shall be passed by a unanimous vote of the members of each branch of the general assembly, and shall be published at least three months before a new election of members to the general assembly, and shall be confirmed by a unanimous vote of the members of each branch of the general assembly at the next regular constitutional session after such new election; nor then, without full compensation to the master for the property of which he has been thereby deprived.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved for the previous question, which motion prevailed.

Mr. GUION moved to lay said section on the table indefinitely, and called for the yeas and nays, which resulted as follows:

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of

Jefferson, Culbertson, Dunn, Derbes, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Humble, Kenner, King, Ledoux, Lewis, Legendre, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Scott of Baton Rouge, Splane, Stephens, Trist, Waddill and Winder voted in the affirmative—38 yeas; and

Measrs. Boudousquie, Brazeale, Covillion, Claiborne, DuBouchel, Hynson, Porter, Prudhomme, Ratliff, Read, Roman, St. Amand, Voorhies, Wederstrandt and Winchester voted in the negative—15 nays; consequently said motion was carried.

Mr. Lewis submitted the following additional section, viz:

All officers of this State appointed by the governor and senate, or elected by the people, shall be required to understand the French and English languages, so as to transact the business of their offices in either language.

Mr. Marigny moved that said section be laid on the table indefinitely.

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Brazeale, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, DuBouchel, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Garrett, Guion, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prudhomme, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Trist, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—46 yeas; and

Messrs. Bourg, Brent, Brumfield, Lewis, Prescott of St. Landry, Splane, Voorhies and Waddill voted in the negative.—8 nays.

Mr. Lewis gave notice that he would move to reconsider the vote adopting the section which requires that the clerk of the house and secretary of the senate shall be possessed of the French as well as the English language.

Mr. Sellers introduced a section relative to the imposition of a poll tax as a qualification for suffrage, which

On motion of Mr. Benjamin, was laid on the table subject to call.

Mr. Eustis observed that the twenty-third section of the general provisions in the old constitution, had been omitted in the report of the committee. He would submit it to the Convention and ask for its adoption.

Sec. 23. The citizens of the town of New Orleans shall have the right of appointing the several public officers necessary for the administration and the police of the said city, pursuant to the mode of election which shall be prescribed by the legislature; provided that the mayor and recorder be ineligible to a seat in the general assembly.

Mr. Lewis said he should like to hear some good reason why the city should not be placed upon a perfect equality, in relation to these matters, with the country. He would ask the honorable mover to exhibit some necessity for the adoption of this section.

Mr. Eustis said he could only say in reply, that the necessities of the case were so pressing, and the propriety of the proposition so plain, that it admitted of no dispute. Thirty years ago it was deemed essential that the citizens of New Orleans should be possessed of this power, and the necessity now for its existence was ten fold greater than at that time. The same investure of power, in criminal matters, is only granted to the mayor and recorders that are attributed to justices of the peace. It is indispensible that they should possess these powers for the prevention and repression of crime. In a densely populated city, there was a large class who arose in the morning without knowing where they were to sleep at night, or how they were to satisfy the cravings of hunger. The tendency of this class were to fall into crimes, into pauperism, and into vagabondism. It was absolutely necessary that the city authorities should have the power of imposing such temporary punishments as the interests of society demanded. If the honorable delegate can suggest any thing better to facilitate the police of the city, and to preserve its order and quiet, I should be pleased to hear it. I cannot conceive that any thing like sectional feeling can enter into this question.

Mr. Lewis said he had no objection to the adoption of the section.

The section was adopted.

Mr. Ratliff moved to reconsider the vote adopting the twenty-fourth section, which motion prevailed, and the said section was taken up, viz:

Sec. 24. The legislature shall not have power or authority to pledge the faith of the State, as security for the payment of any bonds, bills, or other contracts or obligations whatever; nor to borrow money for any purposes whatever, except for defraying the expenses of war, or for the purpose of repelling an invasion of the State by an armed force, or of suppressing an insurrection; provided, that the State shall have the right to issue new bonds in payment of any of its now outstanding obligations or liabilities, whether due or not; the said new bonds, however, to bear upon their face, either in principal or interest, an amount less than the original obligation they are intended to replace.

On motion of Mr. Eustis said section was laid on the table subject to call.

Section thirty-seventh was taken up and adopted, as follows:

Sec. 37. All commissions shall be in the name and by the authority of the State of Louisiana, sealed with the State seal and signed by the governor.

Mr. Garrett offered the following additional section, and the same was adopted:

"The legislature may provide by law in what cases officers shall continue to perform the duties of their offices until their successors shall be inducted into office."

Mr. Garrett submitted the following as an additional section:

"All property subject to taxation in this State shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained by law. No species of property from which a tax may be collected, shall be taxed higher than another species of property of equal value, and subject to taxation."

Mr. Conrad of New Orleans submitted the following:

"Taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the State."

On motion, the proposition of Mr. Garrett and the proposition of Mr. Conrad were laid on the table, subject to call.

Section thirty-eighth was taken up and adopted:

Sec. 38. The constitution and laws of this State shall be published in the French as well as the English language.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

Friday, May 2, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Hon. Mr. Stephens opened the proceedings with prayer.

The Convention took action for the enroling of the new constitution.

Mr. Voorhies called up the following resolution:

"Persons of unsound mind, paupers, non-commissioned officers, soldiers, marines in the service of the United States, and all persons convicted of any crime deemed at law to be felony, shall not exercise the right of suffrage."

Mr. Voorhies observed that if the section were adopted, it could be referred to the committee on revision, to put it in proper form and assign it its proper place. It was important, he conceived, to embody it in the constitution, in order that the restictions to suffrage be clearly defined. As to the utility of this provision, it was apparent on its face. No one would contend that these classes of persons were entitled to suffrage. It was manifest that they ought to be excluded from that right. The right of suffrage should be limited to active citizens. In reference to soldiers and sailors in the service of the United States, they could not be considered permanent citizens, and as having any real interest in the affairs of the State. The section was taken from the constitution of Virginia, and was to be found embodied in the constitutions of several other States. He would call for its adoption.

Mr. Eustis thought the expression "unsound mind" too general. In times of high excitement, the voters of political parties would accuse each other reciprocally of unsound mind. Who was to decide? The commissioners of election? They would be influenced by like political feelings, and an election might be arrested, and great disorders prevail, arising out of this question of sanity. A man may deem another that differs with him in opinion insane. The only legal test of insanity is interdiction. It would be a dangerous prerogative to authorize a commissioner of election to disfranchize a voter on the plea of insanity. As to the use of the word "pauper," intended to designate a class to be excluded, I would merely observe (said Mr. E.) that there is no such class of persons known to our laws, and that, therefore, it can have no application.

Mr. VOORHIES replied that the expression "of unsound mind" was a technical expression, and to be met with in the civil code. It was embodied in our jurisprudence. But in addition to that, the very same expression was used in a similar section in the constitution of Virginia. The framers of the constitution of Virginia found no difficulty in construing the meaning of the term, and they were certainly as intellegent as the members of this body. It was very plain to understand it: it obviously meant a person bereft of reason. Now, as to limiting the restriction to persons under interdiction, that would not attain the object. Those only were placed under interdiction who had property to manage; other insane persons were not, because there was no motive why a decree of insanity should be pronounced against them. It was very evident that if the term insane persons under interdiction were used, it would apply to a very limited number of those who were bereft of reason. As to the other objection of the gentleman (Mr. Eustis) he would simply remark that the term "pauper" was well understood and defined. If there were no paupers in the State at present, it would have no immediate application; but doubtless it would become highly essential hereafter that the exclusion should be found to exist.

Mr. CLAIBORNE considered the section highly judicious, and hoped it would not be rejected. It was proper that the Convention should exclude the class of persons referred to from suffrage. If there were no paupers in Louisiana, in the sense in which the word was understood in England, at present, there was too much reason to apprehend that hereafter we should not enjoy the exception. The right of suffrage was too important to be vested in persons who were devoid of the most essential qualifications to its exercise.

Mr. MAYO said that the power conferred in the fourth section of the general provisions was amply sufficient, and rendered this section superrogary. It was better to leave such matters to the discretion of the legislature. They would prescribe such provisions as were necessary for the exercise of suffrage, and it was better to leave to them the full control. Our action was irrevocable, and we might do something that might hereafter be a source of great inconvenience. It might happen that the soldier or marine disqualified from suffrage was a native born citizen of the State. Would it be right to say that he should not vote because he was in the service of his country? An inflexible rule might work great detriment, and no immediate remedy would be at hand.

Mr. CHINN proposed to amend by striking out "of unsound mind," and substituting "persons under interdiction," and to strike out all after the word "interdiction."

Mr. VOORHIES objected to the amendment offered by the delegate from West Baton Rouge (Mr. Chinn) upon the grounds he had before assumed, that it would have only a partial application. As for the objection of the gentleman from Catahoula, (Mr. Mayo) that it might happen that the soldier or marine excluced, was a native of the State, I will observe that if it were so to happen, it would not affect the principle: for a native of Louisian enroling as a soldier, and subject to be sent from one part of the country to the other, and to be under the orders of his officers, ought just as much to loose the privilege of suffrage as any other citizen. The motive for exclusion would be the same. I am, at any rate, much amazed that this objection should come from that gentleman, inasmuch as on another occasion he offered a section containing precisely the same exclusion, applied to the very same persons.

Mr. CLAIBORNE begged to submit as a substitute, the gentleman's (Mr. Mayo's) own proposition. It was identically the same thing in meaning. It was found in a report drawn up by that gentleman and signed by several others, with a strong recommendation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Assumption suggested that it would be but carrying out the principle to embrace commissioned officers as well as non-commissioned officers and privates. The principle was the same, and should be applied equally. It may be said that a soldier is subject to the orders of his officers, and is dependent upon their will; that he has contracted for his services. But the same thing may be said of the officer. He, too, is subject to the orders of his superior officer. There should be no discrimination between the officer and the soldier; for the principle of excluding one applies equally to the exclusion of the other. If the Convention think the principle right, it should carry it out. Why should there be an exception in favor of the one? One, it is true, has a distingnished title, and instead of eight dollars a month, receives a higher salary. But both are subject to the orders of the general government, and the same disability attaches to both—the incapaity to acquire a legal residence.

Mr. Humble hoped that the section would be divided, and that the exclusion to soldiers and marines would be placed by itself. He did not like to see them in the same section, coupled with paupers and criminals.

Mr. C. M. Conrad said that the most sensitive officer would not take exceptions to the section because the various causes of exclusion were embodied together. It certainly did not carry the idea of any association between the persons excluded.

Mr. Guion said he had serious objections to the suggestions of the delegate from Assumption (Mr. Taylor). The reason that I have to urge (said Mr. G.) for the exclusion of soldiers does not apply to officers. The one is under the entire control of the government; they are not free agents. This objection does not apply to the other. The restraint imposed upon the soldier is of a character to deprive him of that freedom which is essential to the exercise of suffrage. I know of no constitution that excludes officers of the army or navy from the right of suffrage. Such exclusion would be unparallelled. It would be an invidous distinction—not called for by any public necessity, or sanctioned by any just principle.

Mr. Miles Taylor said he had a few observations to make in reply to the gentleman from Lafourche. The gentleman has said that if officers be excluded from suffrage, it will be the first time that such an exclusion has been known in the limits of the United States. Because it may be the first time that such an exclusion has been made, does that alone prove the impolicy of making it? If the principle be right, and the delegate (Mr. Guion) admits that it is right, when applied to soldiers, why should it not apply to officers? I cannot see that there ought to be a distinction. It is true that the soldier is exposed to the brutality of unfeeling officers. But is it any the less true that the soldier forms a part of the military class as well as his officer. And is not the officer subjected to punishment and control? There is not the power to inflict the same punishment which is sometimes inflicted upon the poor soldier; but there is the power to inflict a punishment upon the spirit, to humble it and render it subservient. I know there are debased soldiers; but they are not debased because they are soldiers; it does not arise or belong to their station, which in itself is honorable. There are, however, soldiers as meritorious as any class of the community. A distinction ought not to be made based upon a mere difference of grade; for the distinction between officer and soldier, in point of fact, is only one of rank. It should be recollected that the president is commander-in-chief, and that every officer, however brilliant may be his equipage and distinguished his rank, is under the orders of the president, and the heads of the military department, and that it is in the power of the superior authority to improve or render uncomfortable, to advance or retard his prospects. But it is not on the ground of dependence that I think the exclusion should rest. It should be placed on the broad ground, that persons in the military service of the United States neither have, nor can have a proper civil residence; and this applies as well to officer as to soldier. I care not for dignity when a principle is involved, which is as applicable to one set of persons as to another. If the principle is right, it should be general. I have no disposition to detract from the high claims of officers in every respect; but I think they should be excluded from suffrage; because, from the nature of their duties, they are liable to the same objection as soldiers, that they cannot acquire the necessary residence.

Mr. Chinn said he would protest against any such exclusion of the officers in the service of the general government. They were among the most gallant portion of our countrymen. Several of these officers were stationed in Louisiana and were as much identified in its prosperity and in the prosperity of our common country, as any portion of our fellow citizens. H never would consent to this exclusion.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD said that one great objection against allowing suffrage to soldiers was not applicable to officers. No possible danger could arise from admitting an inconsiderable body of men to vote, while great danger might result from granting the same privilege to a numerous class of armed persons. The number of officers was quite insignificant; the number of soldiers were much more numerous and might hereafter become still more numerous. They might be marched to the polls, in a solid body to vote one way or the other, and control the result. The body of officers were composed of some of the best citizens of the country. There were among them natives of this State—one of them a distinguished commander in the Naval service, and others who were fast ascending the ladder of fame. It would be unjust to exclude them from suffrage. They were essentially, in every respect, citizens of the State.

Mr. CLAIBORNE called for the previous question, which was sustained.

The question was taken on Mr. Miles Taylor's amendment to add the word "officers," and the yeas and nays were called for—ayes 10—nays 46.

Mr. VOORHIES moved to add to Mr. Claiborne's substitute, (the proposition of Mr. Mayo,) the word "paupers," in order that this description of persons should be excluded from suffrage.

Mr. M. TAYLOR doubted the propriety of making use of this expression. No one would come under the definition in Louisiana, as there were no poor laws. It would be better to use the word "mendicant."

Mr. CLAIBORNE repeated that if there were no class yet in Louisiana, to whom the term "paupers" could strictly apply, there would be hereafter.

Mr. VOORHIES' amendment prevailed.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD proposed to add the following after the word "paupers," "notorious vagrants." There were a large number (said Mr. C.) of this description of persons in the city and it behooved us to place the ballot-box beyond their reach. From a statement he had received from the worthy recorder of the first municipality, it appeared from the 23d of Sepsember to the 24th of last August there were committed by that magistrate, for petty larcenies and other minor offences, 2067 persons. The statement of the recorder of the second municipality showed a similar number. He was not aware of the number committed in the third municipality, but he presumed it was in proportion. The persons who would come under this clause were well known to the police, and could be readily detected. They were ready to do any thing but labor, and he feared that if the materials for carrying elections were so convenient, purchasers would be found during the excitement of a high political contest, to buy up their votes.

Mr. MAYO asked whether it was designed by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Conrad) to constitute the commissioners of elections, judges of a criminal court.

Mr. EUSTIS doubted much the propriety of a provision which might be employed by the commissioners of election as a pretext for turning away voters. If the judges choose to say that a man was a notorious vagrant, he could not vote, and his right to vote would depend solely upon the inference which they choose to draw. This was going too far.

Mr. MAYO said the absurdity of the thing defeated itself. The gentleman has told us there are several thousand vagrants in the city, and before an election can be concluded, he would convert the commissioners of election into a court to try several thousand perons accused of vagrancy.

Mr. TAYLOR of Assumption, said that the laws of the State recognised what was vagrancy. The persons falling under that offence were subjected to the jurisdiction of the police and were known to the police. There was a fitness in excluding them from suffrage, but there was no such class as "paupers," and that exclusion could have no application.

The ayes and nays were called for on Mr. C. M. Conrad's amendment to add the words "notorious vagrants." Ayes 20—nays 30.

Mr. HUMBLE suggested that it would be more becoming to divide the section so as to place the clause excluding soldiers and seamen by itself. He objected to the association of this meritorious class of persons, with those found guilty of crimes.

Mr. Humble's suggestion was referred to the committee upon revision.

Mr. Chinn submitted a project relative to the measures to be adopted for taking the sense of the people upon the new constitution, and for submitting it for their approval, and asked that they be referred to a special committee.

It was referred to a committee of five. The President appointed Messrs. Chinn, Brent, Eustis, Guion and Soule members of said committee.

Mr. Lewis then moved that the Convention take up the thirty-fourth section of the general provisions.

Mr. Eustis proposed to strike out all after the word "privilges" and insert the following: "No corporation shall be created in the State in virtue of special laws, unless for political or municipal purposes; but the legislature shall provide, by general laws for the organization of all other corporations, except those for discounting and banking purposes, the creation of which are prohibited."

Mr. Eustis observed, that a great deal of time was lost in the legislature by passing various acts of incorporation, which were granted as a matter of course. Such for example as incorporations of societies for charitable purposes, incorporations of academies, literary institutions, churches, &c., &c. These acts were similar in form, and individuals could as well unite under the provisions of a general law before a notary; the legislature would be relieved of a great barthen and our statute books would be free from the senseless jargon and useless repetitions which we find in them. There is no necessity why the legislature should have its attention taken up with these things. It would be infinitely better to make one general law under which such associations or companies may be formed. This was the object he aimed at, and it was one, he presumed, that would meet with general acquiescence.

Mr. Lewis suggested that it was expedient to limit such acts of incorporation to twenty-five years. It might be understood that the corporators under a general law would have the right of perpetual succession. He would propose the following as a proviso: "provided no privilege of incorporation shall be granted to extend beyond twenty-five years."

Mr. C. M. Conrad would call the attention of the house to the fact that by the section, all acts of incorporation granted by the State were to expire in 1890, if an earlier period were not fixed in their charters. He conceived that this clause would give rise to great confusion and disorder; it would be the year of general breaking down—he could see no possible good that could arise from this provision. There were a number of incorporations to literary institutions, colleges, churches, and for charitable purposes. What possible good can result from bringing them all to a close? There is certainly no necessity why they should all terminate in the same year. Would it not be better to authorise the legislature to renew such charters as may expire? If they all expire in 1890, how is the legislature that meets that year, if in fact it do meet that year, to renew them in a space of sixty days only?

Mr. Lewis said he had one or two words to say in reply. It was true the year 1890 was assigned as the period when all corporations should cease, when there was not an earlier period fixed in their charters. But he did not see that any inconvenience would result as anticipated by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr Conrad). Where it was deemed proper it could be prescribed by the legislature that charters should be renewed, and this would be done in reference to the institutions referred to by the gentleman, which were for scientific, religious or benevolent purposes. There would be ample time and opportunity for renewing all such charters. The great object with him was that no corporation should hereafter exist with an unlimited charter. It was an anomaly in our institutions. They were subject to change and to revision, and it was just and proper that corporations should be submitted to the ordeal of the public will. No man has a higher respect than I for charitable institutions; no man would go further in promoting their beneficient purposes; but yet I would not give them a perpetual charter, for fear that in the nature of things, they might pervert and abuse their privileges. I am a member of a religious sect, and would be glad to see it protected, but no further than is compatible with the public interests. I would have all other sects, and all institutions for the melioration of man protected, but I would never consent to endow even them with a perpetual charter, and invest them with extraordinary privileges, which may be a charge not only upon ourselves, but upon posterity.

Mr. Conrad of New Orleans, proposed the following amendment:

"From and after the month of January, 1890, the legislature shall have power to revoke the charters of all corporations, whose charters shall not expire at that time."

He proposed this amendment to the clause in the section because it would obviate the inconveniences he had suggested; and it would be much better than to have the charters of all public institutions knocked in the head by a general and sweeping clause in the constitution.

Mr. Eustis suggested that Mr. Conrad's amendment rendered the proviso unnecessary.

Mr. Lewis proposed to add to Mr. Conrad's amendment the following: "except political and municipal corporations."

The amendment and sub-amendment were adopted; and the question recurred on the adoption of Mr. Eustis' proposition as a separate section.

Mr. Conrad of Orleans, said he was sorry the honorable member (Mr. Eustis) had not favored the house with fuller explanations as to the utility of his proposition. I am apprehensive, said Mr. Conrad, that it confers a dangerous power. The right of creating corporations is one of the privileges of sovereignty; the proposition divests the legislature of the power, but does not say what othor department of the government shall be vested with it. It often happens that in acts of incorporations clauses are introduced, apparently harmless, which are dangerous to the public interests. Who are so competent to weigh and to consider the privileges conceded as the legislature? We have already taken away the power from the legislature to create certain kinds of corporations, and now it is proposed to withdraw the power of establishing other corporations from that body, and to vest it in an authority which is not defined. Unless the gentleman will favor me with some better reasons than I have heard him as yet adduce, I shall feel myself under the necessity of voting against his proposition.

Mr. Benjamin said that the proposition met his reflections on the subject, and he though his colleague (Mr. Conrad) had misconceived it. Any one that had any familiarity with the proceedings of our legislature, will bear testimony to the fact that a great portion of its time is taken up in passing and amending charters, incorporating individuals who wish to combine a capital under the privileges of a charter. The question then before us resolves itself into this: Shall we put a stop to this useless consumption of time, and waste of money in the legislature? As far as my experience authorises an opinion, I think we should not hesitate in deciding this question affirmatively. But, says my colleague (Mr. Conrad), you are divesting the legislature of a power that clearly appertains to it, to place it elsewhere. I think he is wrong in drawing this conclusion; for the power, instead of being divested, remains where it belongs, in the legislature; and is more efficacious, inasmuch as it is less dispersed. The legislature has still the control over the subject. They may pass laws authorizing, in the public interests, the formation of public companies. Under the general laws, individuals may associate and combine their capital, provided they conform to the stipulations of those laws. This mode of legislation is not a novelty. We have now general provisions of law which apply to all corporations, and which govern them in the absence of express provisions in their charters. But perhaps the operation of the proposition will be more apparent by an illustration.

Suppose some twenty or thirty citizens desire to undertake the construction of a rail road, all they would have to do, under a general law, would be to go before a notary and have an act prepared in conformity to this law. Their company will go into operation as soon as the act be passed, with all the privileges and liabilities affixed to a charter. And, should it happen that a piece of land over which the road is to traverse, is the property of some citizen who does not choose to sell it; what will be the proper mode to obviate this difficulty? They will apply to the legislature, who in their judgment will refuse or decree their special privileges, the expropriation of the land for purposes of public utility. If the legislature refuses, the corporation will dissolve itself; if not, it will prosecute its undertaking. But in either case the power resides in the legislature. This simplifies the process of forming corporations; if special privileges, or exclusive privileges are asked for, the legislature will act upon the demand, while, for general purposes, individuals will have the facility of incorporating themselves by public act.

As to the question of utility, in relation to general legislation upon such matters, it cannot be put in doubt. It will relieve the legislature from a great deal of useles labor; the routine of specifying the powers and liabilities of a corporation, occupies a great portion of the most precious time of the legislature, and diverts its attention from subjects which peculiarly appertain to it, and which cannot be transferred. We have an example of the waste of time attendant upon the granting of charters by special acts of the legislature. One branch alone of that body passed six weeks of the last session in discussing the provisions of a charter for a mutual insurance company! What a waste of time and money! But I will go still further, and insist that general legislation for corporations, is better than special legislation; for it frequently happens that in the conflict of debate, provisions escape observation, which would not be suffered to pass if the opportunity were given for a dispassionate examination and contrast of the charter in all its parts; but it is hurried through, or it is procrastinated so long that attention wearies, and many bad provisions go through, under the impression that they are matters of general detail.

Mr. Conrad of Orleans, said that these explanations were far from satisfying his mind. My colleague (Mr. Benjamin) lays it down as a principle that the object of the section is to facilitate the formation of corporations by individuals, subjecting them to the provisions of general laws. It seems to me that the right to incorporate, is a high and important privilege, inasmuch as it confers the power to contract without being individually responsible for the observance of the contract. Far from me, is the design to oppose the creation of corporations under proper restrictions, and with proper guarantees. I contend that the existence of a corporation pre-supposed the investment of greater or less privileges, and hence I concluded that it was not expedient to divest the legislature of the right to examine and prescribe the extent and powers of corporations, by separate and distinct legislation, applicable to particular cases. The legislature should determine upon the powers and liabilities of each incorporation. I do not think the gentleman has succeeded in invalidating this position. Of what consequence is it that there are some special privileges beyond the general law, if there be others that follow it as a matter of course. At best, according to the gentleman's argument, only a portion of the difficulty is resolved.

As for the consumption of time in the legislature, I do not think that a valid objection, it is not upon mere matters of form in a charter, that discussion is elicited in the legislature; and I have no doubt that in the particular instance referred to by the gentleman, if the legislature were six weeks in discussing some matters connected with the act of incorporation of a mutual insurance company, it was not on a matter of form, but rather in reference to privileges which met the disapprobation of a portion of that body, as being too great, or as being suceptible of abuses. Why should the legislature be deprived of the power of examining the provisions of each charter? The more I reflect on the subject, the more am I convinced that the section is not only useless, but dangerous; for I cannot suppose that an association of individuals would take the trouble, and go to the expense of incorporating themselves under a general law, without first obtaining the special privileges which would induce the formation of their company, and without which a charter would be valueless. I am apprehensive, on the other hand, that a great number of irresponsible companies will spring up under a general power to make charters, and which will enjoy the privileges incident thereto, which may be detrimental to the public interests. I would go so far as not even to allow corporation privileges to a church, unless through the intervention of the legislature, when it was demonstrated that the privileges asked for were necessary, and not repugnant to general interests.

The previous question was called for and sustained.

The question was taken on Mr. Eustis' proposition, and it prevailed—yeas 38, nays 13.

Mr. Eustis submitted the following section:

"After the year 1847 no corporation in this State shall issue notes or bills, in any form whatever, of a less denomination than ten dollars; after 1848, of a less denomination than twenty dollars; and after 1849, of a less denomination than fifty dollars.

"No action shall be maintained, after the year 1849, in any court in this State, on any note or bill of exchange payable to bearer, or endorsed in blank, of a less denomination than fifty dollars; and it shall be the duty of the legislature to enforce the execution of the preceding provisions, by such penal enactments as may be found necessary.

Mr. Conrad of Orleans, suggested doubts as to whether the provisions were constitutional.

Mr. Eustis said that those who knew him, knew that he should not have introduced the section had he not been persuaded that its provisions were perfectly constitutional. It is within the power of the State to legislate upon all matters that are for the interests of society, and which are favorable or repugnant to public morals. What may at one time and one place be permitted without detriment to society, may, at another time and another place, become highly dangerous; and I contend that the power which is in the people to change their legislation, according to the exigencies of the times and of different localities, belongs to the legislature which represents them and acts through their authority. Take, for example, lotteries; there is nothing in itself which is more harmless than the simple act of drawing a lottery; churches even have availed themselves of the privilege of lotteries, and have employed it to their profit; and yet for sound reasons of public policy, the legislature passed a law against lotteries in general, which our courts of law applied to a particular case, that appered to be beyond the general law. The circumstances of that case are these: A speculator bought the privilege accorded to a religious society in Natchitoches, of drawing lotteries. He established himself in the city, and in a short time the corners of the street were placarded with glittering bills announcing splendid fortunes to be obtained for a very inconsiderable sum, which was an irresistable inducement to servants and persons without reflection.

The attorney general having become cognizant of the fact, instituted proceedings against the proprietor of the lottery, to enforce the penalties of the law. That individual declared that he was guilty of no offence, that he had violated no law, and that he had only availed himself of a privilege granted by the legislature itself; having acquired it for a valuable consideration from a religious corporation in Natchitoches, to whom it had been granted. He considered himself beyond the power of a prosecution. He came to me and asked my opinion. I delayed giving it to him for a few days. In the meanwhile he informed me that he had obtained the opinions of several distinguished jurists, among others the opinion of chancellor Kent, that the legislature had no power to inhibit the exercise, by a penal statute, of a privilege which they had granted. I told him that I thought differently. His case came on before the criminal court, and he secured the services of gentlemen holding a prominent rank at the bar to defend him, Messrs Grymes and Mazureau were his counsel. The attorney general, at that time, Mr. Roselius, conducted the prosecution. The case was managed with a great deal of skill on both sides, with all the eloquence and power for which those gentlemen are so conspicuous. What was the decision? That in no case was the State divested of the penal power—the power to repress whatever it considered noxious or pernicious to society. I regret, said Mr. Eustis, to have had occasion to refer to a matter in which I had the remotest participation, but I could not better fortify the views I entertain that by adducing it in illustration of my position. I have nothing further to add than that the decision in this case met the general acquiesence of the bar, as it was founded upon just reasons of public policy.

Mr. Chinn said that the agitation of this subject at this particular moment, just as the Convention were at the end of their labors was a fire-brand thrown at random.

Why were these sections not proposed before? This sudden and unexpected way of introducing questions of the gravest import, at the close of a protracted session was, he might say, inexcusable. He would move for the purpose of testing the sense of this convention, that the section lay on the table indefinitely.

Mr. C. M. Conrad said he considered the section unconstitutional. He entertained a very high respect for the legal opinion of his colleague, but upon this question he differed with him entirely. As for the decision referred to by his colleague, it possessed no great weight. It came from a court more familiar with criminal cases than with civil cases. Suppose a bank were to resist the penal laws interfering with its chartered privileges, would it relinquish its vested rights without an appeal to the highest tribunal.

Mr. Lewis said that notwithstanding his aversion to paper money, he thought the section went beyond the necessity. It went too far. It is true that the legislature, strictly speaking may possess the power to impose penalties, yet the exercise of that power would be of doubtful propriety unless the abuse and its effect upon public morals were impending. With due deference for the opinion of the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Eustis,) I can see no necessity for this section, nor do I think that it can possibly do any good.

Mr.. Chinn, said he did not wish what he had said to be misunderstood. He had every respect for the gentleman that had introduced the section, while he heartily disapproved its introduction. As for any partiality towards banks, he could not be accused of it. He had never while a member of the legislature, voted for a single bank charter. But, nevertheless, he considered that the banks were entitled to the privileges of their charters and could not legally be deprived of them.

Mr. Eustis observed that to restrict the issue of small circulation was of benefit to the banks themselves, and in conformation of this opinion, he read from the minutes of one of the banks resolutions to that effect. So far from this measure being of the alarming character, which gentlemen in this body supposed, the best conducted bank in this city, in February 1843, attempted to carry it through. He referred to the Mechanics and Traders bank, which, although, in 1837, was in a critical position, subsequently by proper management has been placed upon the firmest foundation. That bank resolved to issue no notes under fifty dollars. The resolutions were sent to the other banks for their concurrence and they were rejected. Let us examine this question without prejudice and without passion. If the measure be constitutional, we should not hesitate to sanction it, for it must be apparent, that in a large commercial city, the city of an empire, which concentrates all the business of the great valley of the Mississippi, and which is destined to concentrate the trade and wealth of the immense region known as Texas, paper money as a currency will not do. Why do we not consult the experience of other nations. In England, there are no notes issued of a less amount than twenty-five pounds. In France no notes are issued under five hundred francs. This is the only means of giving stability to business, of avoiding revulsions, and resisting the shock of speculations, which are the natural consequences of a paper currency.

Mr. C. M. Conrad said, that his opinions upon this subject were well known. It was desirable that the circulation of bank notes should be raised. This was the opinion he entertained, and he conceived that when the banks forfeited their charters, it was the proper time to make it one of the conditions of their revival. The opportunity had passed by unimproved, notwithstanding the measure was submitted and urged upon the legislature. As chairman of a committee of the house of representatives, I recommended it. The legislature then had a right to impose this restriction. But they did not do it, and the circumstances are changed. The banks are fulfilling the conditions of their charters, and they have a right to all the privileges which those charters confer. The legislature cannot impair the obligations of the contract. My colleague (Mr. Eustis) however, avoids this difficulty, by drawing a distinction between civil privileges and penal statutes. His argument amounts to this: The banks under their charters have the right to issue notes of five dollars. You cannot withdraw the right, but you may prevent its exercise. The banks may if they dare, issue those notes, but if they do, you will punish their presidents, cashiers and directors by a penal statute. You will hang them or send them to the penitentiary. I do not know how such a doctrine can be sustained by the constitution. This is the first time I have ever heard that an obligation may be violated with impunity by a penal statute. If those that sustain this doctrine be right, then it reminds one of the jugdment pronounced in favor of Shylock. He is told that he is entitled under his contract to his pound of flesh, but if he sheds, in taking it, one drop of christian blood, his life must pay the forfeit. So in the present instance, the banks are told that they have a right to issue small notes, but if you do it, the penalty is death. If this be not a violation of the constitution of the United States, it is a violation of good faith, which is much more imperative. We have said, that no banking institution shall for the future be chartered. The charters of those banks that are in existence are drawing to a close, and the number of banks has been considerably diminished. If the section be constitutional, which I very much question, I put it to the sober sense of the Convention, whether it be not clearly indefensible in principle?

Mr. Benjamin said he had voted to deprive the legislature of the power to grant special charters, unless for political or municipal purposes, which evidently showed that the lessons of the past had not been lost upon him. But, much as he felt disposed to coincide with the majority in putting a stop to the creation of banking corporations by the legislature, he could not sustain the proposition offered by his colleague (Mr. Eustis.) In the first place, he doubted much whether the measure was constitutional, notwithstanding the opinion of his colleague; for admitting that the legislature could not be deprived of the power to inflict penalties, and to inhibit the enjoyment of a privilege conceded by the legislature itself, but which had degenerated into an abuse pernicious and demoralizing to society. Still, it would remain to be shown, that there was any thing criminal in issuing notes of five dollars in place of those of twenty or fifty dollars. The argument proved too much, if it proved any thing.

But, difficult as it might be to determine the question satisfactorily in the abstract, it is of easy solution in reference to the point at issue. Among other dispositions of the laws of 1843, which was to regulate the position of the banks towards the State, there was one prohibiting the emission of small notes. The banks did not conform to that disposition, and their refusal entailed a heavy loss to the State. One of the conditions upon which these charters were revived, were violated, and it would have been in the power of the succeeding legislature to have passed a prohibitory clause, similar to the one now proposed to be incorporated into the constitution. The legislature did not, however, deem it expedient. The banks declared that this prohibition would be most burdensome, and that it would be impossible for them to fulfill the other conditions if this one were insisted upon. The legislature considered their objections to be valid, and authorized the emission of small notes. The banks have since only availed themselves of the prviilege to facilitate the transaction of their business, and the State cannot violate her engagements towards them without releasing them from their obligations; for it is an immutable principle of jurisprudence, that no faith is due to him who violates his faith.

Moreover, what is the present position of the banks. There are five banks only that have survived the revulsion of 1837. The charters of two of these expire in two or three years, and none of the remaining charters extend to a period, I believe, beyond twenty years. Would it then be proper, if it were indeed constitutional, to ordain so rigorous a measure, which can at best have but a partial and exclusive operation? The house will not fail to perceive that it is exceedingly unjust and inopportune; it has an appearance even of bad faith, and we may well pause and reflect whether it would be becoming in so august a body as this, representing the sovereignty and justice of the State, to exceed its legitimate powers and to annul a solemn contract entered into on the part of the State with those institutions?

Mr. Kenner said there was not a member upon this floor more disposed to confine the banks within their proper sphere, and to preclude the recurrence of those calamities from which the community have so severely suffered, (the result of their mismanagement) than he, but he doubted much whether the Convention were authorized to introduce such a clause in the constitution. He disclaimed any thing like a design to consult the wishes of the banks. He was one of the last men to let their wishes have any weight, where the public interests were concerned; he would disregard even the opinion of the "ablest board of directors and the ablest bank president," to employ the panegyric of the honorable delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Eustis) in such matters. He had no intention himself to controvert the position of the delegate, backed as it was by such overwhelming authority. But, he would bring this distinguished financier and his "ablest board of bank directors," to contradict it themselves. He disliked to allude to himself, but he had the same apology to offer as the honorable delegate. It was necessary to illustrate his position. The honorable delegate had contended that it was for the interests of the banks themselves that their small circulation should be withdrawn, and had attempted to sustain his position by reference to the proceedings had by the Mechanics and Traders bank. Now let us see what this authority is worth! During the last session of the legislature an act was introduced conceding certain privileges to the banks, under certain conditions, deemed to be advantages to the State. I thought this a favorable moment (said Mr. Kenner) to bring about, what I considered, a very desirable reform. The State was about to make a contract with the banks, which was to be binding upon their acceptance of it, and I accordingly introduced a clause in the act similar to the one now before the Convention. I succeeded in passing it after some discussion. It was to have been presumed, that at least, it would have met the approbation of the very bank that had approbated as a matter of policy, the withdrawal of the small note circulation, and that she would not have made it an objection to accepting the conditions of the act, which in other respects was favorable to her. This reasonable expectation, however, was not realized. The cashier of this very institution, Mr. Samuel C. Bell, who has the advantage of being associated in its management, "with the ablest bank president and ablest board of directors," waited upon me and attempted to convince me that it was indispensable that this bank should have the facility of issuing a small circulation, and that if the clause I had introduced were insisted upon it would militate against the acceptance of the act by the bank. I leave it now to the Convention to decide, what the authority of "the ablest bank president and ablest board of directors" upon this matter, is worth? But independent of that, is it not evident that if the banks, who are not slow to understand their own interests, conceived it to be to their interest to draw in their small notes, they would do so. There is nothing to prevent it but their own will. As to the expediency of the prohibition for the public interest, I am in favor of it, provided it can be done in a proper manner, as I proposed in the act to which I have had reference and which was to have become binding only upon its acceptance by the banks. But, I cannot give my assent to any proposition which violates in the constitution, either directly or indirectly, the inviolability of contracts. Besides, we have decreed that there shall be no more bank charters, and the day is not far distant when we shall be relieved from those institutions altogether. There is therefore not even the plea of necessity for violating a contract, to cure at best but a partial evil, and assuming to ourselves, at any rate, very doubtful powers.

The previous question was called for and sustained.

The question recurred on Mr. Chinn's motion to lay Mr. Eustis' proposition indefinitely on the table, and the yeas and nays were called for—37 yeas; 15 nays.

Mr. Roman called up the following additional section:

"The legislature shall not in any manner create any debt or debts, liability or liabilities, which shall singly, or in the aggregate with any previous debts or liabilities, exceed the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, (except in cases of war, to repel invasion and suppress insurrection,) unless the same be authorized by a law, for some single object or work, to be distinctly specified therein, which law shall provide ways and means, by taxation, for the payment of running interest during the whole time for which said debt shall be contracted, and for the full and punctual discharge at maturity of the capital borrowed; and said law shall not be repealable until the principal and interests thereon shall be paid and fully discharged, and shall not be put into execution until after its re-enactment by the first legislature returned by a general election after its passage."

Mr. Brent moved that the section be laid indefiditely on the table.

Mr. Roman said that it was true the legislature had abused the power of borrowing, and had involved the State. But because the legislature had forgotten its duty so far, is that a reason why we should go to the other extreme? Is it not quite possible that notwithstanding every disposition on the part of the legislature to avoid contracting debts, they may find themseves under the necessity of borrowing to meet contingencies which may arise; and what will be the position of the State, if you deprive the legislature in the most absolute manner of any power to fulfill the solemn engagements of the State? There is something more than mere improvidence in depriving a government of any power to meet the exigencies of the people, or the necessities of the State, occasioned by unexpected calamities. Restrain the power —that may be an act of prudence; but do not suppress it!—that would be an act of folly! Ordain that no debt shall be contracted, unless the means for its payment be first provided by taxation. You will then impose a responsibility upon the legislature and arouse the attention of the people, which will be a salutary and efficient check against prodigality and extravagance. It will be recollected by some in this hall, that I frequently recommended to the legislature to follow this plan in practice, and it is quite natural that, being persuaded from my own experience of its necessity, I should desire to see it settled as a fundamental principle in the constitution. Whoever will read attentively the section I have had the honor to present, will see that no loan can be effected unless the law authorizing it shall be re-enacted by the first legislature returned by a general election after its passage. With such a restriction, all possible danger is precluded.

The question was taken on Mr. Brent's motion and it was lost—yeas 24; nays 26.

Mr. Waddill then moved that the section be printed, and that it be made the order of the day for Monday next; which motion prevailed.

Mr. Chinn then moved that the Convention take up the following sections offered by him, and his motion prevailed:

Sec. —. Any person who shall, after the adoption of this constitution, fight a duel with deadly weapons, or send or receive a challenge to fight a duel with deadly weapons, either within the State or out of it, or who shall act as a second, or aid and assist in any manner those thus offending, shall be deprived of holding any office of trust or profit under this constitution.

Sec. —. "I, (A. B.) do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully and impartially discharge and perform all the duties incumbent on me as ———, according to the best of my abilities and understanding, agreeably to the rules and regulations of the constitution and laws of this State; and I do furthersolemnly swear (or affirm) that since the adoption of this constitution I have not fought a duel with deadly weapons, within this State nor out of it, nor have I sent a challenge to fight a duel with deadly weapons, nor have I acted as second in carrying a challenge, or aided, advised, or assisted any person thus offending—So help me God.

Mr. McRae moved to amend the first section by adding after the word, "constitution," in the last line, the following:

"And shall be debarred of the privilege of suffrage." This would make the penalty more general; for there were many men who, from their reckless habits, never expected to hold office; but who would not like to be deprived of the privilege of suffrage, and this latter penalty would apply to them.

Mr. McRae's amendment was adopted.

Mr. Lewis said he was afraid the Convention was going too far. He was ready to do every thing that could be properly done to put down the pernicious practice of duelling. He was fearful, however, that this clause would in effect be impracticable. It might create a great deal of wrangling and disputation at the polls—some charging others with the offence of duelling, and others denying it. He hoped that the section would be reconsidered. It had passed apparently by default.

The yeas and nays were called for on the motion to reconsider—21 yeas—29 nays.

Mr. Lewis then called for the adoption of the section.

Mr. Benjamin said he was fearful the Convention were acting upon this matter with too much precipitancy. The existence of duelling has invariably excited the profound attention of civilized society, by whom it is acknowledged as an evil, and various attempts have been made to eradicate it. Nothing is more desirable than legislation which can effect that purpose but the great difficulty is to apply suitable legislation; and it is evident from our own experience that if it be pushed to an extremity, and be not tempered with moderation and with the prejudices of society, it will prove utterly impotent and ineffectual. It is better to commit this difficult subject to the legislature, to be under their control, and to be disposed of according to the feelings and exigencies of the times, and not for us to attempt to eradicate it by an irrevocable provision, which cannot, after all, have any effect without the force of public opinion.

He would propose the following as a substitute:

"The legislature shall have power to pass laws for the suppression of duelling."

Mr. Chinn said there certainly was no haste or precipitation exhibited in relation to this subject. He had brought it to the attention of the Convention more than two months ago, and a full and free investigahad been had. As for the substitute, it amounted to nothing. It would not be effectual. He hoped the question would be taken upon the adoption of his section, and to arrest useless debate, he would call for the previous question.

The call for the previous question was sustained, and the question was put on Mr. Benjamin's substitute.

Mr. Guion proposed to amend the substitute by making it imperitive upon the legislature to pass laws for the suppression of duelling.

The sub-amendment was rejected, and the question recurring on Mr. Benjamin's amendment, it was lost—yeas 13; nays 35.

Mr. C. M, Conrad said that he presumed it was not designed to apply the penalties to persons who had fought duels in other States, since the adoption of the constitution, but who may subsequently remove into Louisiana. He would therefore, to prevent that construction, propose the following amendment:

To strike out the words "any person," and substitute "any citizen of the State."

The amendment prevailed.

Mr. Labauve moved to insert before the words "aid and assist," the word "knowingly." He explained that the absence of this word might give rise to a great deal of trouble to individuals. One may "assist and aid" by lending a horse or a pair of pistols to a friend, without being aware of the uses to which these things may be put.

His amendment was adopted.

Mr. C. M. Conrad moved to qualify the clause still further, so that it would read "aid and assist by his presence."

The yeas and nays were called for on Mr. Conrad's amendment—yeas 10—nays 37.

Mr. Porter then moved to strike out the words "or out of the State."

His motion was lost.

The question was finally taken on the adoption of the section as amended.

The yeas and nays were called for—yeas 35; nays 12.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

Saturday, May 3, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. Clarke opened the proceedings with prayer.

Mr. Voorhies begged leave to make a few observations in relation to matter personal to himself. The reporter of the Jeffersonian Republican had represented him, in his report of the proceedings as as being opposed to the exercise of suffrage on the part of the officers of the navy and army of the United States. This was not so, as was well known to every member of this body, and would appear from the official reports of the proceedings. He called attention to the occurrence with the view of correcting the misrepresentation, and requested the reporters of the Convention to notice this explanation in their reports.

Mr. Lewis called up his motion for the reconsideration of the section presented by Mr. Marigny, requiring the secretary of the senate, and clerk of the house of representatives to be possessed of the French as well as the English languages.

The motion for reconsideration being before the convention,

Mr. Lewis said that he was not animated by anything like a wish to circumscribe the use of the French language. It was indifferent to him whether the English or French language was spoken in debate. He could understand both and speak both. What he objected to was the unconditional and imperative requirement upon the legislature that they must elect no one to be their clerk or secretary who was not familliar with both languages. He doubted not the legislature would do it without the requirement. It was indispensable that these officers should possess both languages, and as long as the necessity existed, the very necessity was the best guarantee that it would be done. But this is a matter where the legislature should have a discretionary power. They should not be trammelled, and irrevocably bound to conform to a provision which depended upon a necessity, that may not hereafter exist. He was not disposed to flatter this or that particular population. He considered that there was a perfect equality between our populations whether their mother tongue was French or English, and they were entitled to equal privileges. He had been matured among the ancient population—no man respected or esteemed that population more than he, nor no one would be more ready to defend their rights were they assailed. But he did not think such a provision an asseveration of their rights,or that it could force the French language to be employed, if in the nature things, it was destined to fall into disuse, which for one he would deplore. Neither did he think there was danger of such a result as apprehended by the mover of the section, (Mr. Marigny.) Whether there was real danger, however, or not, one thing was very certain that this section could accomplish nothing, while it was unsusceptible of defence upon principle. His admiration for the population that spake the French as their mother tongue, was based upon an intimate knowledge of their character. He remembered the time in Louisiana of the ancient virtue, when a man's word was his bond, and good faith needed not the spur of the law to be preserved nviolable, when bills, bonds and notes were unknown. He trusted his motives would not be misunderstood. It was unnecessary for us to attempt to legislate upon accidents. If we attempt this, we might as well establish ourselves into a perpetual legislature. These were his grounds of objection to the first clause. In reference to the second clause, all he had to say was this, that it was superfluous. A person had the right to address the body of which he was a member, in the language with which he was most familiar, but he might encounter the risk of not being understood, if the language was not one in general vogue. That, however, was an inconvenience which no legislature could prevent.

The yeas and nays were called for on Mr. Lewis' motion to reconsider.

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Dunn, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Lewis, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill, Wadsworth and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—28 yeas; and

Messrs. Bourg, Claiborne, Culbertson,Covillion, Du Bouchel, Derbes, Eustis, King, Ledoux, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Scott of Baton Rouge, Voorhies, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—20 nays.

Mr. Marigny said he had not the intention, as was intimated rather indecorously the other day, to propose any measure repugnant to good sense; on the contrary, he had never offered a suggestion or made a single remark in this body that was not to sustain useful and proper principles. A spirit of irritation has been got up against the clause I had the honor of introducing and which was adopted by this Convention, and a determination to have it expunged from the constitution by one means or another. I am therefore reluctantly forced into this contest. I accept the perilous task of defending the rights of that population whose privileges it is sought covertly to invade and destroy at the moment they are addressed in terms of flattering adulation.

We have been asked with a great degree of satisfaction as if it were unanswerable, why it is that no such provision is found in the constitution of 1812 ? I answer readily, for a simple and obvious reason: The Florida parishes were not at that time a part of the State; and three fourths of the then population of Louisiana proper, were French naturalized citizens, or descendents of French; and there was no occasion, no necessity for any provision to ensure the retention of the French language in our deliberative bodies. But things have materially changed since. Within the last thirty-three years that have followed the adoption of the old constitution, the Anglo-Saxon race have invaded every thing. They have the supremacy in both houses of the legislature, as they have in this body; where out of seventy-seven members there are but twenty-one of french origin. It is under these circumstances that a persevering effort has been made (as has been shown by the zeal of the delegate from St. Landry, Mr. Lewis) to deny this simple act of justice and to abolish the language of the ancient population to favor the language of the Briton. Let none be deceived by the covert character of the attack. This hostility to the French language is stimulated by the design to abrogate our civil system of law. And is it to be expected, that I, one of the representatives of that population which has now become the weakest, will not call up all my energies to defend and to protect their rights from impending ruin.

But we are told with apparently a great deal of magnanimity, of what consequence is it, whether one language or another be spoken in the legislature. This is a mere subterfuge. There never has been in Louisiana but two political languages, the English language and the French language. Your laws, your codes, your legislative records, your ordinances all establish the fact! Look at the 39th article of the general provisions which has passed this body. It prescribes that the laws shall be promulgated in French as well as in English. How, under this article, can the secretary of the senate and the clerk of the house of representatives ascertain whether the law is duly fulfilled, unless they understand both languages? I know that the Anglo-Saxon race are the most numerous, and therefore the strongest. We are yet to learn whether they will abuse the possession of numerical force to overwhelm the Franco-American population. Whether they will deny them equal privileges. Count the relative strength of both populations in this Convention. One has fifty-six votes, the other but twenty-one. Why is this so? Because the ancient population has not been influenced by considerations of origin. But can you abuse the confidence they have reposed in your sense of justice? Ah! if the descendants of that ancient stock of creoles had have been animated by the energy which I feel, we would not now be in a situation to apprehend the result of a vote, upon which depends the maintenance of our language. We would not be here supplicating that as a favor which belongs to us as a right, of which you cannot deprive us without a violation of the most sacred principles of justice. We could have become Americans without you, for we have the moral and political virtues that characterize the true republican, and it depended alone upon ourselves to restrain you from any superiority. Beware of abusing the power which we have supinely suffered to pass from our hands into yours.

Mr. Wadsworth said he had voted for the proposition of the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Marigny) because he thought it a matter of no consequence at the moment, but upon further reflection he would suggest whether it was not totally unnecessary, and whether it ought to be found in the constitution? Why lay this restriction upon the legislature? They are the proper judges of the qualifications of their officers. And if we go on to prescribe and say that these officers shall be versed in French as well as in English, why not say that they shall understand Spanish? It is true that Louisiana was formerly a French colony, but it has been likewise a Spanish colony. The Spanish language was once the legal language, just as much as the French language. There are remnants of that population and of their descendants still in the State, and the Spanish language may be most familiar to them. They may likewise be elected to the legislature, as well as those whose maternal tongue is French, and if you prescribe as an irrevocable qualification that the secretary of the senate and clerk of the house shall understand French, why not say they shall be conversant in the Spanish? I have certainly no design to do any thing calculated to drive the French language out of use, but we have a national language, and that language must necessarily predominate. It will be the language of the rising generation of French descent. The gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Marigny) speaks as if he were the representative of a distinct class. What does he mean? Does he mean to intimate that there is a distinct population in Louisiana, represented in this Convention, who are not Americans? I know of no such distinctions; I admit of none, nor do I admit any superiority based upon a distinction of what he calls the Anglo-Saxon race and the Franco-American race. We are all Americans, we all belong to the same country, whether we have a greater infusion of one kind of European blood than another. I have no greater respect for Anglo-Saxons than for other European races. In fact, I doubt much the accuracy of this term applied to any population in this country. My idea is that the ancestors of that population which are called Anglo-Saxons, were Normans; that they came from Normandy, and that the true Anglo-Saxons disappeared among their conquerors. The Anglo-Saxons, at any rate, were a defeated people. I may have Anglo-Saxon blood, and I may have Norman blood, but if I have any of the former I should not boast of it! The Saxons were whipped, and I should not be proud of being descended from them. We are so mixed up that it would be difficult to ascertain what particular kind of blood predominates. All these illusions to particular races is a matter of mere humbug.

As to the adoption of the section, I would suggest that it can have no useful result. The legislature will be guided in this matter by the existing necessity. If it be necessary, why they would adopt the principle of the section, and it would be superogatory. If, on the other hand, it should become unnecessary, why require it? I do not understand it as essential for the protection of any portion of our population.

Mr. Chinn said he was in favor of that portion of the section which gave to each member the right of addressing the legislature in French, if he judged proper, for he considered it a vested right by the acquisition of Louisiana, a right of which we cannot deprive the ancient population. But as regards the clause in reference to the secretary of the senate and clerk of the house of representatives, he felt bound to say that he could not vote for a restriction in the constitution, which incapacitates the legislature from electing any but those versed in the French language to those offices, and he would base his objections to it upon the very urguments of the honorable mover, intended to show us that this clause is necessary. That delegate has told us that at the adoption of the old constitution three-fourths of the citizens of Louisiana were of French origin, but that since things have so far changed, that in this body, out of seventy-seven delegates, twenty-one alone are of French origin.

If this diminution should continue in the same proportion, it is evident that the day is not very distant when the only language spoken will be the language in which the constitution of the United States is written. The only thing that can be desired is that so long as the necessity may exist for it, the officers of both houses should be conversant with both languages. The best guarantee to ensure the observance of this will be the necessity itself, and past experience has fully demonstrated that no disposition exists to embarrass the transaction of pbblic business, by choosing officers who do not understand the French language.

Mr. Brent called for the division of the question.

Mr. Eustis said there were two populations represented in the Convention, to-wit: the anglo-American population and the descendants of the French, who were the first settlers of Louisiana. The former, by their enterprise, activity and intelligence, were destined to have ascendency over the latter. It is in vain to deny it. It is as certain that that the American population will have the ascendency as that the earth is illuminated by the rays of the sun. The other population are already in a small minority; one of their representatives has told you what? He has appealed to your magnanimity. He has asked that the secretary of your senate and the clerk of your house of representatives shall understand the French language, because he conceives it to be a right guaranteed to the ancient population. He tells you that he knows that the population he represents are to be overrun; you have the power numerically, but are king numbers to prevail? I do not believe, no one believes, that numbers govern the world. It is intellect that governs the world. Give the sons of that population the necessary stimulant, let the necessity once exist for them to exert their faculties, establish an university, where the lawyer, the architect, the man of science may be found, and my life upon it that race will maintain itself. Its blood has already told in the annals of your country. It has produced your Bayards, your Pettygrews, your Guions, your Legarés, and many of the most accomplished and distinguished statesmen of theage. The same causes operating, will produce men equally as remarkable. All that this population ask of you, through their delegation is some public guarantee; something in the constitution merely directory that they be heard in the councils of your State. But, gentlemen say: this is unnecessary to secure them that right. If it were unnecessary, they would not ask it. It is but a small boon. Give them only an equal opportunity with the anglo-American race, and you will find that their French blood will tell. I merely wish to submit these views, why the motion of the gentleman from St. Landry (Mr. Lewis) ought not to prevail. If the Convention think that the section should be erased, so be it; I shall vote against it. We should do nothing to which objection will be made, for the constitution will require all its force to be adopted, and I should regret to see even prejudices enlisted against it.

Mr. Wadsworth said that no attack had been made on the French population, nothing had been said against that population, and no necessity existed for a labored defence. The idea that the right to speak French had been put in controversy, was preposterous. Who denied that right? The only reason why we find the English spoken in preference in the legislature and in this body, is because it is more generally understood, and it is presumed that what is said in English will have greater effect, because it is more generally understood. No one ever objected in the legislature to a gentleman speaking in French, although English may be his maternal tongue. One of the delegates from New Orleans (Mr. Soulé) invariably addresses this body in English, he does so because he is sufficiently familiar with the English to speak fluently, and because a majority of this body do not understand French. Why should we make this a question of races? I cannot so consider it. I am sent here by a constituency, the majority of whom are descended from the French, and I certainly would be the last one to deprive them of any right or privilege of which they have heretofore been in the enjoyment. I make no distinction. It is immaterial to me whether the ancestors of a man were Normans or Anglo-Saxons; it may answer well enough to get up a discussion for home consumption; a talk for bunkum, but surely, in the present instance, there are no grounds to build the assumption that it is designed to deprive a portion of our common constituents of any of their rights and privileges. As for talking of a boon, a favor to the creole population, from what has been denominated the Anglo-American part of this house, I repudiate and deny that such is the fact. The creole population have too much pride to ask for boons and favors. They know their rights and will maintain them, without this unnecessary and useless provision.

Mr. Lewis said he had no objection to the latter clause of the section. He would move to lay the first part of the section indefinitely on the table.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption, said he hoped this motion would prevail. He represented a constituency among whom there were a smaller number speaking English than perhaps in any other parish. Few spoke any other language than French, and among those a large proportion spoke Spanish. He would be one of the last to restrict his constituents in the exercise of any of their rights and privileges; but he considered the section as entirely useless. It was only prescribing that which existed as a natural right, and which was above the necessity of a constitutional provision. The right was inherent. It was not strengthened by any such declaration. He was unwilling to apply a strong term, but he could not refrain from designating as a perfect absurdity, the clause which declared that each member of the legislature should have the right of addressing that body in French. Our system of government would be a mere farce if our legislative bodies are to put in doubt the inalienable privileges of the citizens, for the purpose of decreeing them. For one, I am unwilllng that this section should appear in the constitution.

Mr. BRENT said he would vote in favor of tne second clause, but he was averse to the first.

Mr. WADDILL was opposed to the section because he considered it altogether unnecessary. A representative to the legislature had a right to speak in any living language—it was an inherent right.

Mr. MARIGNY said he admired the tactics of the gentlemen who were so solicitous to effect their purpose, of abolishing the French language. They professed to be perfectly indifferent as to languages. I would appeal to the honorable delegate from Opelousas, Mr. Thomas H. Lewis, who has placed himself at the head of this new crusade against the ancient population, does he believe that it has ever entered into the imagination of any one to speak Choctaw or Dutch in our legislative assemblies? And does he not know that the French is the only language spoken, except the English?

It is impossible for these gentlemen to conceal their true designs. If you have resolved to overthrow the last remnant of creole nationality, have at least the courage explicitly to avow it.. Your evasions expose you; for I would ask you, of what is the naked privilege of speaking the French, if the secretary be unable to translate what has been said, for the information of such members as understand the English language only? You are strong, because I am alone to struggle against you; but if there were twenty delegates in this body like myself, you would not have undertaken this task, and you would have learned in a louder voice that any encroachments upon the privileges of a large and respectable portion of the population of this State, would not be tolerated.

Mr. WINDER said there was a great deal of discussion, as he conceived to very little purpose. There were but two languages spoken in our deliberative assemblies, the English and the French. The section goes no farther than to say that the secretary of the senate and clerk of the house of representatives shall understand both languages, and that a member may speak in either. It is admitted by those opposed to the section that this will exist independent of the section—that it is an inherent right. Where then is the use of so much discussion, and where is the impropriety of enbodying the principle in the constitution. If it be an inherent right, it is nothing extraordinary to find it in the constitution. It will not be the only inherent right enunciated in that instrument. He hoped the section would be adopted.

The question was then taken on Mr. LEWIS' motion, to lay the section indefinitely on the table, and the ayes and nays were called for,

Messrs. Brazeale, Brumfield, Burton, Chambliss, Chinn, Dunn, Guion, Hynson, Ledoux, Lewis, McRae, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Wadsworth, and Wederstrand—23 yeas.

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Brent, Briant, Cade, Carriere, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, Du Bouchel, Derbes, Eustis, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, King, Legendre, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, Scott of Baton Rouge, Voorhies, Waddill, Winchester and Winder—20 nays.

Mr. WADDILL moved to add the following words to the last clause, "or in any living language."

Mr. DERBES moved that this amendment be laid indefinitely on the table.

Mr. WADDILL: if the amendment be rejected I shall then feel bound to vote against the section.

Mr. WADDILL called for the ayes and nays upon the motion to lay his amendment indefinitely on the table.

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, DuBouchel, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Splane, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder—48 yeas.

Messrs. McRae, Ratliff, Read and Waddill—4 nays.

Mr. MARIGNY called for the adoption of the section.

Mr. Guion said he looked upon the proposition as useless, and worse than useless. It would lead to evil consequences. We were not forming a constitution for the moment, for the present day, but to govern for ages to come. The population of Louisiana, it is said, are composed of French origin, and of Anglo-Saxon origin; but the greater portion of those of French origin, speak the English language, and the day is not distant when every citizen will speak that language. If we look at results we must be persuaded that the English will be essentially the prevailing language. I am, certainly, above suspicion of hostility to persons of French origin. The delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Marigny) belongs to the past. The present generation of Louisianians belong to young Louisiana. I am descended, like the gentlemen, from French ancestors, but I think, nevertheless, that we should place ourselves in a position that the English language should become the prevailing language of the State, as it is of the great confederacy of the States, of which Louisiana forms an integral part. I am, therefore, irrevocably opposed to the passage of this section.

Mr. Claiborne said that whatever may be the result of the vote about to be taken, it was incontestible that a member of the legislature could have the right of addressing that body in the French language. If the right was incontestible, and it was so conceded, it was ridiculous to recognize it, without at the same time guaranteeing that a translator should be provided. It was, therefore, essential to adopt or reject the section as a whole. As for myself, said Mr. C., I shall vote in the affirmative, if there were no other reason, because a respectable portion of the community desire this guarantee.

On motion of Mr. Lewis, the question was divided, and it was taken upon the first clause, that the secretary of the senate and clerk of the house of representatives should understand the French language.

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, DuBouchel, Eustis, King, Ledoux, Legendre, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Roman, Roselius, Scott of Baton Rouge, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Waddill, Winchester and Winder—32 yeas.

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Chambliss, Chinn, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Lewis, Porter, Preston, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Madison, Stephens, Wadsworth and Wederstrandt—19 nays.

The question was then taken on the second clause, and the yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Aubert, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cenas, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, DuBouchel, Derbes, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Read, Roman, Roselius, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—40 yeas; and

Messrs. Preston, Ratliff and Read voted in the negative—3 nays.

Mr. Marigny gave notice that on Tuesday next he would ask for the reconsideration of the vote upon the proposition of Mr. Eustis, inhibiting the banks from issuing small notes under a penalty.

M. Preston proposed the following section:

"The legislature shall establish a reasonable compensation in salaries or fees, for justices of the peace."

Mr. Culbertson expressed the wish that the section should be so modified as to restrict justices of the peace to a salary.

The yeas and nays were called for on the adoption of Mr. Preston's motion,

Messrs. Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cenas, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, DuBouchel, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Splane, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill, and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—40 yeas; and

Messrs. Aubert, Conrad of Orleans,

Eustis, Guion, King Roman, Roselius, Taylor of Assumption, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—10 nays.

Mr. Miles Taylor proposed the following section:

"All judicial proceedings shall be conducted in French against all citizens of the State whose maternal language is French, and who do not understand nor write the English language."

The utility of this section, (said Mr. Taylor,) is quite evident. If it be indeed necessary that a provision should be adopted in the constitution that any member of the legislature may address that body in French, it is still more important to those citizens who understand the French language alone, that all proceedings in court to which they may be parties, shall be conducted in the language with which they are most familiar. I may be told that our legislature has already provided for this matter; but to this I would reply, that at best, it is in relation to civil and not to criminal proceedings.

Mr. Roselius said that if this proposition were to be seriously taken up, he would have to insist upon a like privilege for those American citizens whose maternal language was German.

Mr. Porter claimed a like privilege for his constituents, whose maternal language was Spanish.

Mr. Chinn moved that the proposition and amendments be laid indefinitely on the table.

Mr. Miles Taylor said that gentlemen had conceived it of great importance that the right should be constitutionally secured to speak French in the legislature. They had considered it important that the two houses should be imperatively ordered to elect no secretary and clerk that did not understand the French language. This has been the deliberate sense of this body, after mature reflection. What objection can arise to this provision? It proposes a principle recognized in our civil proceedings, and is surely a privilege of greater value than the election of two officers understanding French. It is true, in relation to civil matters, there is legislation at present upon the subject; but that legislation may be repealed. It is certainly of material import that the right of a person should be recognized in the constitution to have the proceedings in which he is involved, and upon which may depend his life, liberty, reputation and property, conducted in a language with which he is familiar, than that the representative in whose election he may participate, should be authorized in the constitution to speak French in the legislature!

Mr. Marigny said he was quite astonished that the delegate from Lafourche, (Mr. Taylor) who voted against the clause relative to the secretary of the senate and clerk of the house of representatives, should now come forward with so much generosity and propose that the proceedings in courts be conducted in French as well as in English. But who does not see the difference between the two cases; between a representative and an attorney? A suitor may choose an attorney, and does ordinarily choose a lawyer to represent him; but the representative has not the privilege of delegating his charge to another. He must represent them personally, and express his sentiments in proper person.

Mr. Brazeale called for the previous question, which was sustained.

The question was taken on Mr. Chinn's motion to lay the section and amendments indefinitely on the table.

Mr. M. Taylor called for the yeas and nays.

Messrs. Aubert, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cenas, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Du Bouchel, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Legendré, Lewis, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Pugh, Ratliff, Read, Roman, Scott of Madison, Scott of Raton Rouge, Splane, Waddill, Widerstrandt, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—40 yeas; and

Messrs. Bourg, Briant, Covillion, Derbes, Guion, Ledoux, Roselius, Soule and Taylor of Assumption voted in the negative—9 nays.

Mr. Mayo proposed the following additional section, to be embodied in the article treating of the executive depratment:

"The governor shall have the power to issue writs of election to fill vacancies occurring in either house of the general assembly."

ORDER OF THE DAY.

The Convention took up the second section presented by Mr. Chinn on the subject of duelling.

Mr. Briant moved that a clause be adopted to prevent any one engaged in a duel from testifying as a witness.

The law (said Mr. B.) against duelling has never been enforced, because there is no motive for inducing vigilance in its execution; that is, there is no inducement for bringing the offender to punishment. The best and most effectual mode of enforcing penal enactments against duelling would be to interest the community in the denunciation of those who may incur the penalties of such enactments. You have determined that whoever engages in a duel shall not be eligible to office; that they shall forfeit the civic right of suffrage. Go a little further, and interdict the duellist from the privilege of giving testimony, and that will awake public attention; for there are always those engaged in litigation who would desire to exclude a witness, as well as those who are anxious to obtain his testimony.

Mr. C. M. Conrad moved to amend the section by striking out the words "to the rules and regulations of the constitution and laws of this State," and insert the following: "to the constitution and laws of the United States and of this State."

This amendment was adopted.

Mr. Conrad further moved, to insert after the word "sent," the word "accepted," which motion prevailed.

Mr. Ratliff said that if there were any reasonable prospect that the end proposed by this section would be accomplished, he would cheerfully vote in favor of it. But he was apprehensive that instead of being relieved from the evil, it would appear in a much worse and more dangerous form. It will give rise to street fights, to coffee-house brawls, to assassinations upon the public highway. It is useless for us to attempt to legislate in the face of public opinion. Let us examine what we are about irrevocably to do. Under the provisions which we are called upon to place in the constitution, if I meet my adversary in fair combat and give him an equal chance for his life, you proscribe me; but if to avenge myself for any real or imaginary insult, I should meet him in the streets and murder him at noonday, I suffer no civil disqualification. I may represent my fellow citizens in the legislature, and I am not deprived of my privilege to vote. Is there in this any thing like justice? Is duelling a worse offence than assassination, that it should be visited with a heavier penalty? We have seen the whole city in mourning when an honorable and distinguished member of the senate, the lamented Waggaman, fell in a duel. The judges of the supreme court, and the highest dignitaries of the State attended his funeral; and do you think public opinion will confirm your proscription against an honorable citizen, because he has chosen to give his adversary a fair chance, rather than steal up in a dastardly way and take life unawares? It is acting upon a very superficial knowledge of the human heart to suppose any thing of the kind! But, moreover, is it not perceptible that by your oath you punish the honorable man, while you hold out an inducement to perjury to the man who has no moral perceptions? The former will not take the oath, and is excluded; the latter may take the oath and profit by his perjury. This is a singular kind of legislation!

I shall say nothing of the chivalric feelings of the populatiou of Louisiana, for whose habits so little attention and respect is shown in the provision. You expose them to the insults of strangers, and deprive them of all means of redress under the severest penalties, the loss of the privileges of citizenship. It has been said that our citizens are hot-headed and ready to get into disputes. From my own knowledge, I can deny this assertion most positively. I have spent several winters in the city; I have been out at all hours without arms, and without apprehension, for I have never been once molested. After all, people fight duels for the purpose of avenging their honor, and if it be wrong, (and I am very far from upholding the practice, for I have never had a duel, and I trust in God I never shall,) it is not this constitutional disability that will put a stop to homicide, for in place of duels you will have assassinations, which will become so common as to excite little or no surprise!

Mr. Chinn said he did not purpose, at this late hour, to argue the matter, but would confine what he had to say to a few well authenticated facts. It is notorious that in Virginia duels were quite as common as they are in Louisiana. A provision was adopted similar to the section which has passed this body. It had no effect. At length it was resolved to apply the test of an oath. This was done, but the constitutional question was raised as to whether this could be done. The courts decided the question in the affirmative, and duelling from that moment ceased. I have no doubt that similar results in Louisiana will follow the adoption of similar measures.

Mr. Guion proposed the following amendment. To strike out all after and including the words, "and I moreover solemnly swear or affirm that since the adoption of this constitution, I have not fought a duel with deadly weapons," to the end of the section.

Mr. Guion said it was unnecessary, impolitic, to call upon a citizen to disfranchise himself by an oath. He was ready to take all proper measures for the suppression of duelling, but he could not consent to a provision which constrained a man to exclude himself. It might happen that in the hey day of youth, when the passions were so easily excited, that a young man might be drawn into a duel. He might afterwards regret it, and determine to abjure the practice. In twenty years he might be chosen to fill a high and important office; would it be right to exclude him because in his youth he may have fought a duel, and call upon him to exclude himself, when the occurrence may have passed away from the recollections of his fellow citizens, and he may more than have redeemed by the usefulness of his subsequent life, that one act of youthful indiscretion?

Mr. Lewis said, he rose to express his surprise at the motion of his friend from Lafourche (Mr. Guion.) If that gentleman desires the measure to be effectual, to be available, how can he reconcile it to himself to oppose this portion of the section. The section would be in vain, it would be worse than vain without that provision. A popular man elected to an office would never be questioned as to whether he had fought a duel or not, and he would take the ordinary oath and fill the office, although he may have fought fifty duels. What we hear dignified by the name of chivalry, when applied to duelling, is nothing but a remnant of barbarism, against which it behooves us to guard our youth. In fact, it does not so often happen that the man whose passions have become subdued by age and experience, yields to those sudden bursts of feeling and resentment which are so peculiar to youth. We should discountenance attacks of violence and passion on the part of our young men. We should inculcate in them a love of good order, and let them know that there is a holier object than the gratification of feelings of resentment. We should train them up to govern themselves within the bounds of reason and moderation, and not lead them to believe that their wishes may be carried by brute force. We should say to them, here is the irrevocable condition of your political preferment. You may aspire to the highest honors of your country, but if you violate that condition, all your hopes will be cut off. It is only in this way that we can expect to put down the vicious and demoralizing practice of duelling. But if you adopt the gentleman's argument, and tell young men they may fight as much as they please while in the hey day of youth, provided they abandon it when they get age and experience and their passions are subdued, you will fail of accomplishing any thing. The only efficacious mode is the administration of an oath, and if you abandon that, you had as well abandon the whole design.

The yeas and nays being called for, on Mr. Guion's motion to strike out, Messrs. Briant, Cénas, Claiborne, Guion, Legendre, Marigny, Porter, Raliff, Roman, Soulé, Splane, Wederstrandt and Winder voted in the affirmative—13 yeas; and Messrs. Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Covillion, Culbertson, DuBouchel, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Lewis, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Pugh, Read, Roselius, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies and Waddill voted in the negative —33 nays.

Mr. Chinn called for the adoption of the section, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

Messrs. Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, DuBouchel, Dunn, Eustis, Hudspeth, Humble,

Hynson, Ledoux, Lewis, McRae, Mayo, yo, Peets, Preston, Pugh, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Stephens, Voorhies and Waddill—36 yeas; and Messrs. Cenas, Legendre, Marigny, Porter, Ratliff, Roman, Soulé, Splane and Wederstrandt—9 nays.

On motion, the first and second section were ordered to be incorporated in the general provisions.

On motion of Mr. Lewis, the twenty-ninth section was taken up.

Every law of a general nature shall be equally applicable to every part of the State.

Mr. Mayo moved that it be laid indefinitely on the table. He thought this provision impracticable.

Mr. Lewis said that this provision would cure some of the evils, but not all. He had sought in vain so to word it as to make it meet all the purposes designed. He found no language that would better convey the design. The evil that existed for a want of conformity in our legislation was a subject of general complaint. There are one set of laws for one parish and another set of laws for another parish, and it is to avoid this, that the committee sought a remedy, and have reported this as the result of their labors. It does not realize all I could wish, but I am yet disposed to take it for the want of something better.

Mr. Eustis said that he thought something in the spirit of this section was necessary. Our legislation in reference to the different parishes was in a great measure unintelligible. A distinguished member of this body, one of the judges of our district courts, informed me that the evil had become so great that it was impossible for him to ascertain what were the laws applicable to police juries, in the parishes within his district. The idea to have all these local laws to conform to a general and uniform system, is a most excellent idea, and one which we should not disdain. The confusion which exists is becoming greater and greater, and if we can apply a remedy, the earlier it is appled the better. All those special acts of legislation passed for individual cases, sometimes to allow a wife to despoil herself in favor of her husband whose affairs are embarrassed, at other times to allow a dishonest tutor to make way with the property of a minor, although designed by the legislature for far different purposes, have a deleterious tendency. Let us look at France, where the science of legislation has been so perfected: all laws there are general in their operation. Exceptional legislation as it exists in this State, is unknown. What is to prevent us from attaining similar perfection? Are we to be told of the necessity of certain local legislation? Why those laws form a particular class and they may be an exception, without entailing upon us the necessity of abandoning the principle of general legislation. I trust, in view of the importance of the matter, that the section will be laid upon the table until Monday, in order that we may meditate upon it so as better to adopt it to the attainment of the object proposed.

The section was laid over until Monday.

Mr. Scott of Baton Rouge, offered the following section on behalf of Mr. Mc. Callop:

"All contested elections for seats in the senate or house of representatives and for parish officers, shall be determined by the district court in the parish in which such contest may arise."

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

Monday, May 5, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment, and its proceedings were opened with prayer by the Hon. Mr. Stephens.

Mr. Read presented the following section:

"Capital punishment shall not be inflicted in this State."

Mr. Brent, on behalf of the majority of the committee to whom had been referred the subject of the submission of the constitution to the people for their ratification, presented an ordinance for that purpose.

Mr. Chinn, on behalf of the minority of the committee, presented a counter report.

The report and counter report were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The Convention then took up section twenty-four of the general provisions, together with the following additional section offered by Mr. Roman.

The legislature shall not in any manner create any debt or debts, liability or liabilities, which shall singly or in the aggregate with any previous debts or liabilities, exceed the sum of one hundred thousand dolurs, (except in cases of war, to repel invasion and suppress insurrection,) unless the same be authorized by some law, for some single object or work, to be distinctly specified therein, which law shall provide ways and means by taxation for the payment of running interest during the whole time for which said debt shall be contracted, and for the full and punctual discharge at maturity of the capital borrowed; and said law shall be irrepealable until the principal and interest thereon shall be paid and fully discharged, and shall not be put into execution until after its re-enactment by the first legislature returned by a general election after its passage.

Mr. Lewis proposed the following substitute for the twenty-fourth section:

Sec. 24. The legislature shall not have power or authority to pledge the faith of the State as security for the payment of any bonds, bills, or other contracts or obligations, for the benefit of any person, corporation or body politic whatever, provided that the State shall have the right of issuing bonds in renewal of existing obligations, whether matured or not, but the new bonds shall not be issued for a greater amount nor at a higher rate of interest than the obligations which they are intended to replace.

Mr. Lewis said that the object was to leave the legislature free to make any arrangement beneficial for the interests of the State, but at the same time to place it out of the power of that body to increase the indebtedness of the State either in interest or in principal. No one would wish to see the State placed in a position not to meet those debts for which she was actually liable, at home or abroad.

Mr. Miles Taylor said that the principle enunciated was correct. But he thought it better to detach the second part of the section, and if it be adopted, to place it on the schedule as a transitory provision.

Mr. Roman considered it better not to separate the section.

Mr. C. M. Conrad proposed a verbal alteration. In place of the word "security" to substitute the word "surety." The former expression was equivocal.

Mr. Eustis said he wished to make a proposition. He was opposed to the provision authorizing the issue of new bonds. If the property banks were properly administered, the State would never be called upon for one sous. The State is only eventually liable, and that liability can only enure in the event of bad management or some unforeseen calamity perhaps, such as war. He was apprehensive of the power of issuing new bonds, it might be employed to perpetuate a state of things which we all deplore.

[Mr. Eustis here referred to data, exhibiting the position of the property banks, in corroboration of the remarks that the State could only be made liable through a bad administration of those institutions.]

It will (said Mr. E.) be indispensable that the administration be an efficient one, that the banks be made sensible that they must rely upon their own resources, in order that they may take proper measures for the collection of their debts. Otherwise, if recourse can be had to the State for postponing payment by the emission of new bonds, the consequences may be detrimental to the interests of the State, and to a salutary administration of the affairs of the banks. The assets of the banks are amply sufficient to pay every dollar they owe, and all that is necessary is proper administration. There was a time when it was impossible for them to call in their debts. Agriculture languished and confidence was gone. But the aspect of things has brightened. Agriculture begins to prosper and confidence begins to be restored. What more is necessary for them gradually to call in their debts and meet their obligations as they mature? No motive of interest actuates me in this matter, and I should be very sorry to advise any thing contrary to the public weal. But it strikes me as the true policy for the stockholders as well as for the State, to pursue such a course as will tend to the liquidation of the indebtedness of those institutions, and to the payment of interest as it may become due. The issue of new bonds in place of old ones accomplishes nothing. It only facilitates delay, and may be considered by some persons as savoring of repudiation; at any rate, it is a denial of payment for the time being. If the State be bound to redeem the bonds issued by her in favor of the banks, in default of their payment by the banks, and I do not permit myself to doubt that if the State is so bound, it will be necessary for her to raise the necessary means. Others may think differently upon this subject. I do not question their convictions, I merely express my own. What is the course pursued by other governments under similar circumstances? They fund their public debts. They make stock of it. Why do we not adopt a similar policy? In France the debt is inscribed on the Grande Livre, and certificates of it are issued The bond holders of Europe would rather have stock than renewed bonds. The credit of the State would be placed upon respectable ground, if we adopted that plan. If these suggestions meet the sanction of the Convention, they can be put in a proper form.

Mr. C. M. Conrad said that if the section were adopted without the proviso, it would be tantamount to inhibiting the legislature from renewing the bonds issued by the State. It would be prohibiting the State from prolonging her credit. It was equivalent to saying that the State must be prepared to pay when these bonds fall due, in default of payment by the banks. Let us look at the circumstances. The gentleman tells us that the banks have sufficient assets, if they are properly administered, to meet every dollar they may owe. If they are not properly administered, the gentleman admits that the State must pay. But if the State can't pay, what is to be done? You inhibit her from making terms with the public, evidently the issue of new bonds. No; she is not to have that privilege, lest it may occasion bad management in the banks—a too great reliance upon the State! But what is she to do?

Mr. Eustis: Why, fund it!

Mr. Conrad: Well, what is that but a postponement of the debt? She may inscribe it on the Grande Livre and issue certificates for it; but is not this equivalent to a bond? It amounts to the same thing, whether you call it a bond, a certificate or an inscription upon the Grande Livre. It is nothing more than a prolongation of the debt. If you place it out of the power of the legislature to renew the bonds, you shackle the legislature. I concur with my colleague that the assets of the banks should be strictly and faithfully applied to the payment of their debts, but he must at once conceive, that if the State be placed in the position that she must immediately pay, in default of the banks, the bonds that mature, the State will be under the necessity of forcing the banks to sell their property at no matter what sacrifice, and the result will be very detrimental to the interests of the State and to the interests of the people. The legislature must have the power to protect the State in case of necessity. My opinions, I may say, are not less disinterested than those of my colleague upon this matter. I never owned twelve shares of bank stock in my life, and I never borrowed five thousand dollars of a bank. Thank God I never knew any thing of the property banks except as a member of the legislature. Emergencies may happen to place it out of the power of the banks to meet their obligations; wars may ensue, the staples of our country may become valueless; the seasons may be unpropitious; many things may happen which may make it necessary that the legislature should be left in a position to meet future contingencies.

Mr. Roman said he was sorry to differ with the delegate (Mr. Eustis,) but he must say he differed with him totally. The proviso, I conceive to be necessary, but if we were to refuse to adopt it, the legislature would have the right to issue new bonds to replace old ones, for the section cannot have a retroactive effect. It applies to the issue of bonds creating a new debt—not to the renewal of bonds for an old debt. I would ask the gentleman, if we are not in a situation to pay what we actually owe, is not the legislature bound to provide future means for the liquidation of her indebtedness, and if we are unable to pay at the moment without sacrificing ourselves, may she not renew the debt to a more favorable period? But it is said we cannot continue as the surety for corporations or individuals. But so long as the bonds are outstanding they bear the pledge of the State, and the State is surety whether we consent to be so considered or not. The idea of funding the public debt, as has been well remarked by the gentleman who last spoke, (Mr. Conrad) is but changing the form of the debt. It is nothing more. But it is not only as surety that the State is bound; she is liable on her own account likewise. Is it designed that she should remain under protest, her credit dishonored until the necessary funds shall come into the treasury, to enable her to meet her debts? I cannot believe that any one in Louisiana would tolerate it. It would be a species of indirect repudiation. The people of Louisiana would scorn that doctrine. They would as soon think of putting their fingers in their neighbor's pockets, as to deny the payment of their legitimate debts!

Mr. Miles Taylor said he was unwilling to remain silent, lest his opinions upon this matter should be misapprehended. He concurred in many of the views of the gentleman who had just resumed his seat, (Mr. Roman.) In his general views, he certainly did concur. As to the course he recommends to be pursued, (said Mr. T.) I do not concur. Neither do I apprehend that to question the policy of that course would authorize the inference that one was favorable to repudiation. There are but few individuals in Louisiana who favor that doctrine.

I agree likewise in many respects with the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Eustis) but I differ with him as to the expediency of his remedy. With the remarks of the delegate that preceded him (Mr. Conrad) I differ altogether. Let us examine the section. Let us see whether the position of that delegate is sustained by the section itself. The gentleman argued upon the assumption, that if the first part of the section were adopted without the second, the legislature would be trammelled, that it would be unable if it thought proper, to issue new bonds in substitution of the bonds already issued. I do not agree with the gentleman in his construction, and I think it is clear he misconceives the purport of the section. [Mr. Taylor here read the section.]

It is manifest that the restriction upon the legislature applies to the future. There is not a word capable of being tortured to mean that the legislature shall be inhibited from acting for the benefit of the State in the matter of these bonds, nor from taking necessary measures to facilitate their payment. As was well said by the delegate from St. James (Mr. Roman) the restriction can have no retroactive effect. But that gentleman appears to think that unless we prescribe that the legislature may issue new bonds in place of those already issued, we shall lay ourselves open to the charge of repudiation. There are no grounds for such an apprehension. I do not think we can by a constitutional provision, effect the position of these banks; we certainly ought not to attempt in any manner, to interfere with them. The engagement exists in virtue of past legislation, and the legislature have full control over it. All that we have proposed to do applies to the future. The legislature is expressly prohibited from undertaking similar engagements hereafter. But what has been done is done, and is beyond our control. The legislature may issue new bonds in substitution of outstanding bonds, without the proviso; it has clearly the power, and therefore the proviso is unnecessary.

Mr. Eustis moved to strike out the proviso.

Mr. C. M. Conrad moved to strike out the following words: "as security," so that the section would read,

"The legislature shall not have power or authority to pledge the faith of the State for the payment of any bonds," &c. &c.

The yeas and nays were called for on Mr. Conrad's motion.

Messrs. Boudousquie, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Cade, Cenas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, DuBouchel, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Humble, King, Ledoux, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Preston, Pugh, Read, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt and Winder voted in the affirmative—33 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Bourg, Briant, Burton, Chinn, Downs, Dunn, Hudspeth, Hynson, Legendre, Lewis, McRae, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge and Winchester voted in the negative—18 nays.

Mr. Eustis then renewed his motion to strike out the proviso, and called for the yeas and nays.

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, Eustis, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Preston, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—21 yeas; and

Messrs. Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, DuBouchel, Downs, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Legendre, Lewis, McRae, Mazureau, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Sellers, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—31 nays.

Mr. Marigny proposed the following as a preamble to the section:

"Whereas the Constitution of the United States prohibits the several States from coining money, from emitting bills of credit, and from making any thing but gold and silver a legal tender for the payment of debts."

Mr. Culbertson moved to lay the preamble indefinitely on the table, and his motion prevailed.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption moved that the question be divided, and that the section be voted upon paragrph by paragraph, which motion prevailed.

The first paragraph was put to vote and the yeas and nays were called for.

Messrs. Beatty, Boudousquie, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Cenas, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, DuBouchel, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Ledoux, Legendre, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott, of St. Landry, Pugh, Read, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—53 yeas.

No votes in the negative.

The second paragraph was put to vote, and the yeas and nays were called for.

Messrs. Boudousquie, Bourg, Brumfield, Burton, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, DuBouchel, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Legendre, Lewis, McRae, Marigny, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Sellers, Taylor of St. Landry, Waddill, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—31 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Chambliss, Covillion, Eustis, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies and Wederstrandt voted in the negative—19 nays.

On motion, the whole section was adopted.

The additional section offered by Mr. Roman was taken up.

Mr. Lewis proposed to make amendments in two slight particulars. To strike out the word "any," in the fourth line and substitute the word "all," and in the seventh line to strike out the word "and" and substitute the word "or."

These corrections were adopted.

Mr. Lewis said he would submit one or two remarks. The object was to limit the legislature in spending the public money. It was to impose proper checks, without hampering the legislature to attempt the accomplishment of great public works. That power was not withheld. Of all powers, the taxing power was least liable to abuse; it was the safest, because the representatives of the people would consider well before incurring the responsibility of odious and burthensome taxation. If the pockets of the people had to be directly appealed to, before any money could be expended, the result would be greater circumspection in making expenditures. The necessity would have to be apparent and great, before the representative would dare to impose additional taxation, and before the people would submit to it. With the restrictions in this section, the evils of extravagance and prodigality in the administration of public affairs were precluded; for it is provided that the object for which the tax is imposed shall be specified, and that the law shall not go into effect until it is ratified by a succeeding legislature, returned at a general election.

Mr. Read moved to strike out all after the third line, with the exception of the parenthesis, and the section would then read:

"The legislature shall not in any manner create any debt or debts, liability or liabilities, except in case of war, to repel invasion and suppress insurrection."

He called for the yeas and nays on his amendment.

Messrs. Beatty, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Cade, Chambliss, Covillion, DuBouchel, Eustis, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McRae, Marigny, Peets, Porter,

Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soule, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—26 yeas; and Messrs. Boudousquie, Burton, Cenas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Legendre, Lewis, Mayo, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—27 nays.

Mr. Miles Taylor proposed the following as a substitute:

"The State shall not be authorized to borrow money, unless to meet the indispensable wants of the government, without the consent of the people first had and obtained at a general election."

Mr. Taylor remarked that this substitute covered the whole ground. It applied to invasion or insurrection, to the ordinary current expenses of the government, and precluded the legislature from embarking in extraordinary and perhaps useless public works, without consulting the people, who were to pay for them.

Mr. Beatty said he was decidedly opposed to throwing upon future generations the folly and extravagance of present generations. There were only two contingencies in which he admitted the State was authorised to borrow. They were in the event of war and insurrection. He was opposed to all attempts to raise money, no matter how commendable the design, except for the purpose of self-defence. For all purposes of internal improvement, the people should be first consulted. The tax should be first proposed to be laid.

Mr. Roman said he apprehended that the desire to limit the power of the legislature was about to be pushed to a dangerous extreme. That power, I readily concede, should not be unlimited; and even if it be true that the legislature has not on all occasions shown that moderation and frugality in the public expenditures which were deemed expedient; yet it would be extremely unwise to take away the power altogether, to prevent its being abused. I think prudence dictates a middle course between the two extremes. This is the spirit of the section which is before the house. Those delegates that are fearful of the power of the legislature, and who do not wish to place the slightest confidence in the discretion of that body, deny practically, the feasibility of a republican form of government; and it would be as well to withdraw the power altogether as to say that the legislature shall not impose taxation. I do not say without the consent of the people, but with the consent of the people, to effect objects of public utility. The delegate from Assumption (Mr. Taylor) insists, as a preliminary step, that the people shall first be consulted, before any debt be contracted, no matter of whatever nature. This is precisely what the section prescribes. Unless the people are to be mistrusted as well as the legislature, and in order the better to protect them, it be designed to place it out of their power to ordain a tax, the section must be adopted; for it affords every possible guaranty, by making the people themselves the judges of the necessity of the debt.

Mr. Downs observed, that although the section contained the same provisions that did not meet his concurrence, it nevertheless embraced a principle, the necessity and expediency of which were obvious. I cannot sustain the substitute of the delegate from Assumption, (Mr. Taylor) because it seems to me obscure; and in such a matter, we cannot be too explicit. It must be borne in mind, too, that the liabilities of the State have arisen chiefly from her binding herself as guarantee for corporations, and not on her own account. The possibility of the recurrence of a similar state of things is precluded by a direct and positive inhibition. Now, if we go one step further, and prescribe that she shall not contract any debts on her own account, without the consent of the people, who must pay these debts, we provide all that is expedient. I think the section a proper one, and with some modifications, it ought to be adopted.

Mr. C. M. Conrad proposed to add the following to Mr. Taylor's substitute:

"Or unless the law authorizing a loan shall have been passed by two succeding legislatures, and decree a tax, or establish a suitable sinking fund to meet the interest upon the loan as it may fall due, and the principal, at the expiration of the period fixed for its redemption; and in such cases the law fixing the tax or establishing the sinking fund shall not be repealed until the interest and capital shall be fully paid."

Mr. Lewis moved to lay the substitute, and the amendment to the substitute indefinitely on the table, and called for the yeas and nays.

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Brazeale, Briant, Brumfield, Cade, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, DuBouchel, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Read, Roman, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—47 yeas; and

Messrs. Cenas, Marigny, Scott of Baton Rouge, Soule and Taylor of Assumption voted in the negative—5 nays.

Mr. Roman moved to strike out the three first lines and to substitute the following:

"The aggregate amount of debts hereafter contracted by the legislature shall never exceed one hundred thousand dollars."

This amendment was adopted.

Mr. Peets moved to amend the section by striking out the words "during the whole term," &c. &c., in the thirteenth line, and substituting the following: "for a period not exceeding ten years."

Mr. Benjamin was opposed to this limitation, because it might preclude the legislature from making good terms. There were serious considerations why there should be no such limitation.

Mr. Peets thought that if the debt were not to come on the present generation, there would be much less solicitude felt. It would be a matter of indifference, since it would fall upon posterity.

Mr. Roman replied that the interest would have to be paid, and that would be a guaranty that the expense would not be heedlessly incurred.

Mr. Peets' amendment was lost.

Mr. Roman called for the adoption of the section.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Messrs. Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Burton, Cenas, Chambliss, Chinn, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Legendre, Lewis, McRae, Mayo, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Madison, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—32 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Cade, Covillion, DuBouchel, Eustis, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Marigny, Peets, Porter, Preston, Read, Sellers, Soule, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption and Waddill voted in the negative—22 nays.

The following is the section as adopted:

"The aggregate amount of debts hereafter contracted by the legislature, shall never exceed one hundred thousand dollars, (except in case of war, to repel invasion, or to suppress insurrection,) unless the same be authorised by some law, for some single object or work, to be distinctly specified therein; which law shall provide means, by taxation, for the payment of running interest during the whole time for which said debt shall be contracted, and for the full and punctual discharge at maturity of the capital borrowed; and said law shall be irrepealable until the principal and interest thereon shall be paid and fully discharged, and shall not be put into execution until after its re-enactment by the first legislature returned by a general election, after its passage."

Mr. Read called up the additional section offered by him, to wit:

"Capital punishment shall never be inflicted in this State."

Mr. Lewis declared himself opposed to this section. If, however, it were proper, the legislature were competent to act upon the subject.

Mr. Chinn moved to lay said section indefinitely on the table, and called for the yeas and nays.

Messrs. Benjamin, Boudousquie, Brazeale, Brent, Cade, Cenas, Chinn, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, King, Legendre, Lewis, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Winchester and

Winder voted in the affirmative—37 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Bourg, Briant, Burton, Chambliss, DuBouchel, Garcia, Ledoux, McRae, Porter, Read, Scott of Madison, Scott of Baton Rouge, Soule, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the negative—16 nays.

Agreeably to previous notice, Mr. Garrett moved to reconsider the vote adopting the seventh section of the general provisions.

His motion prevailed, and said section was taken up, as follows:

Sec. 7. All civil officers for the State at large, shall reside within the State, and all district or parish officers, within their several districts or parishes, and shall keep their respective offices at such places therein as may be required by law; and no person shall be elected or appointed to any district or parish office, who shall not have resided in such district or parish long enough before such election or appointment to have acquired the right of voting for representative to the general assembly in such district or parish.

Mr. Lewis moved to amend said section by striking out in the sixth seventh and tenth lines, the words "district or."

The yeas and nays being called for on Mr. Lewis' amendment, Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Cénas, Chinn, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, DuBouchel, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, King, Ledoux, Legendre, Lewis, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Roman, St. Amand, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder—34 yeas; and

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Chambliss, Humble, Hynson, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens and Waddill—17 nays.

Mr. Garrett moved to amend the section further, by inserting the following at the end of the same:

"And no person shall be appointed or elected to any district office, who shall not have resided in said district, or in an adjoining district, long enough before such appointment or election to have acquired the right of voting for representatives to the general assembly." Which motion prevailed.

Section twenty-ninth was taken up, viz:

Sec. 29. Every law of a general nature shall be equally applicable to all parts of the State.

Mr. Lewis offered as a substitute for said section the following, viz:

"No law shall be passed enabling particular individuals to make contracts which, by the general laws they were not permitted to make; or removing, in favor of individuals, any incapacity or disability imposed by general laws."

Mr. Benjamin said that the various attempts that were made, proved conclusively that it was impossible to attain the object desired, with sufficient precision.

Mr. Dunn offered as a substitute for the substitute of Mr. Lewis, the following, viz:

The general assembly shall not pass any private law, unless it shall be made to appear that thirty days' notice of application to pass such a law shall have been given, under such directions and in such manner as shall be provided by law."

Mr. Lewis moved for the adoption of the substitute offered by him.

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Boudousquie, Brent, Cade, Derbes, DuBouchel, Eustis, Garrett, Hynson, Hudspeth, King, Lewis, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Stephens, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—25 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cénas, Chambliss, Chinn, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Downs, Dunn, Guion, Humble, Legendre, Roman, St. Amand, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Waddill, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—25 nays; the vote being equal, the president voted in the negative; consequently said motion was lost, and the substitute was rejected.

Mr. Lewis moved for the adoption of the twenty-ninth section.

The yeas and nays were called for,

Messrs. Brumfield, Hudspeth, Hynson, Lewis, McRae, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Sellers,

Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—14 yeas; and Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Burton, Cade, Cénas, Chambliss, Chinn, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Derbes, DuBouchel, Downs, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Garcia, Guion, Humble, King, Legendre, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Roman, Scott of Madison, St. Amand, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Winder and Winchester voted in the negative—38 nays.

Mr. Chinn said he considered it to be his duty to present the following section. He believed it impossible for the new judiciary system to work as it is, and in case of its failure, or that the public necessities should require it, the legislature ought to have the power to provide such legislation as may be thought expedient. In offering it, he did his duty, and he left it to others to do theirs. His conscience would, at any rate be free from reproach.

Sec. —. The legislature shall have power, whenever the interests of the State may require it, to create courts of probates in each parish, or such other tribunals as may be calculated to insure a faithful protection and administration of estates.

Mr. Brent moved to amend said section by adding to the end of the same the following, viz:

"The judges of said courts shall be elected by the qualified voters in each parish."

Mr. Garrett moved that the section and amendment be laid on the table indefinitely.

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Benjamin, Boudousquie, Brazeale, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Conrad of Orleans, Cénas, Downs, Eustis, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Lewis, McRae, Peets, Prescott of St. Landry, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Waddill, Wadsworth and Wederstrandt voted in the affirmative—28 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Bourg, Brent, Briant, Chambliss, Chinn, Covillion, Derbes, DuBuchel, Dunn, Garcia, Guion, King, Ledoux, Legendre, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Porter, Pugh, Roman, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption, Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—25 nays; consequently said motion was carried.

Mr. Boudousquie gave notice that he would to-morrow move to reconsider the laying on the table indefinitely the above section.

The following additional section, offered by Mr. Conrad of New Orleans, was taken up:

"Taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the State."

With the following amendment, offered by Mr. Garrett:

"All property subject to taxation in this State, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained by law. No one species of property, from which a tax may be collected, shall be taxed any higher than another species of property of equal value, subject to taxation."

Mr. Garrett moved further to amend said section, by adding the following proviso:

"Provided, That the legislature shall have power to tax merchants, hawkers, pedlers, privileges or incomes, in such manner as may from time to time be prescribed by law."

Mr. Downs moved to lay these propositions indefinitely on the table. He did not like a general provision, tying up the hands of the legislature in this matter, and making the slightest deviation from the rule laid down, fatal. If the legislature came as near as possible to equality and uniformity in taxation, it was all that could be reasonably expected. He could not vote for these propositions—it was unnecessary and inexpedient.

Mr. Garrett said he could not concur with his colleague, (Mr. Downs) that the proposition he had the honor to submit was unnecessary, or that it was inexpedient. It had been copied literally from other constitutions. He had never heard that there had been any difficulty encountered in carrying it into effect. Its object, certainly, was unobjectionable. It was to ensure an equal distribution of the burdens of taxation. There was no reason why one species of property of equivalent value, should pay a higher tax than another species of property. The first principle in taxation was equality. The section was not unnecessary, for it was not to be inferred that the legislature would do any thing. It was quite likely they would continue to pursue the old system. This is not an untried experiment—it has been tested in other States with success, and there is no good reason why we should not adopt it here.

Mr. Conrad of Orleans, said that if there were good reasons for disposing, in the summary manner proposed, of the amendments offered, these reasons did not apply to his proposition. His proposition was nothing more than the enunciation of the principle, that taxation should be equal and uniform. It was the recognition of this principle. He presumed that the motion of his colleague, (Mr. Soulé) to lay on the table, did not apply to the enunciation of the principle.

Mr. Soule: I beg the gentleman's pardon. My motion comprehended all. I consider it all unnecessary.

Mr. Lewis said he differed with the gentlemen who took that view of the subject. So far from its being unnecessary, past experience has clearly shown it to be very necessary. There is not a State in the Union where a more partial system of taxation exists than in Louisiana. Horned cattle, for example, are taxed one cent per head, provided there are twenty-five. The tax upon one hundred head is one dollar. The tax upon a decripid, worn out slave is one dollar. And yet the one hundred cattle are worth infinitely more than the slave; he may be perfectly valueless, but the owner is, nevertheless, taxed one dollar. Whether his slave is old or young, useful or useless, the tax is still the same. The tax on land is arbitrary. The legislature say that it shall be so much for this parish and so much for that. The only just principle in taxation, is the principle of ad volorem. But as it is, that principle is not observed. In the parish of St. Landry the land tax is double what it is in some parishes of a similar extent of territory, and agricultural wealth. An old worn out carriage, not worth fifty dollars, ascending to the same unequal system, is made to pay a tax of five dollars, while a new carriage, worth five hundred dollars, pays but five dollars. Is there, in this, any thing like equality. It is the reverse of any thing like justice. The present proposition tends to limit the imposition of taxes according to the value of the property taxed. That is the true principle, and the result will be, that a property, worth ten thousand dollars, will pay just ten times as much taxes as a property worth one thousand dollars; whereas the reverse is often the case, under the existing system.

Mr. Soule: The principle of equality in taxation need not be asserted; it is just as clear as that two and two makes four. It is unnecessary to discuss the principle. It is true that abuses have grown up under the existing system, but are they not inherent to the infirmities of human nature, rather than to the system that has prevailed? These abuses will exist, do what we may, and whether we assert the fundamental principles of taxation or not, it will make no material difference. Hence it is, I insist upon my motion to lay the section and amendments on the table.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption, said that the principle involved was of great importance. As was truly remarked by the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) the practical operation of our system of taxation, was without example in any State of the Union. Certain species of property were exorbitantly taxed, and other species, of equal or greater value, were slightly taxed, or not tazed at all. One species of property pays nothing, and contributes nothing, while some others contribute but trivially. Look at the land tax. It has from time immemorial been fixed at forty-seven thousand dollars. What an insignificant amount from that source, in comparison to what is realized from slaves. They are made to contribute about five times as much. Moveable property, again, is never brought into account; it pays nothing. Then there is capital in money, which is employed under the protection of our laws, that pays nothing. And yet if the very same capital be invested in slaves and in agricultural pursuits, it is taxed very heavily. While I agree, said Mr. Taylor, in the remarks of the delegate from St. Landry, (Mr. Lewis) I do not think that the proposition submitted by the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Garrett) meets the difficulty. I object to it because it confers on the legislature the power to discriminate, and to determine what kind of property shall be taxed. It may impose taxation on one species of property and not on another. What it requires is only equality in apportioning taxation upon the property that the legislature may think proper to tax. I am opposed to that feature, and will offer the following as a substitute:

"The revenue of the State, derived from taxation, shall be assessed equally upon all the property of the State, according to its value, to be ascertained in such manner as the legislature shall direct, so that the same shall be equal and uniform throughout the State. No one species of property shall be taxed higher than any other species of property of equal value."

Mr. C. M. Conrad said, that one very serious objection to the substitute would be the difficulty of coming at all the property of the State. Would the assessors have to go to the ba.n-yard, to ascertain how many chickens there were, and how many ducks. How were promisory notes and bills of exchange to be got at for the purpose of taxing them. It was apparent that a large portion of the property of the State could not be got at. The gentleman's proposition resembled rather a plan of taxation than a principle of taxation. He doubted very much its practicability.

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

Tuesday, May 6, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The Rev. Mr. Warren opened the proceedings with prayer.

Mr. Porter gave notice that he would on to-morrow move to reconsider the vote adopting the section offered by Mr. Taylor of Assumption, in relation to the acquisition of residence.

Mr. Winder submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That from and after three o'clock this day, no new provision shall be offered, except by way of amendment, unless the Convention shall give its consent thereto by a vote of two-thirds of the members present."

Mr. Scott of Baton Rouge, moved to amend said resolution by adding the following:

"And that the Convention shall adjourn sine die, on Saturday next at three o'clock, p. m."

Mr. Winder accepted the amendment.

Mr. Winder then moved for the adoption of the section as amended.

Mr. Porter appealed to the patriotism of gentlemen not to hurry over the important business of the Convention, for a delay of two or three days at most. For himself he was anxious that the Convention should adjourn at the very earliest moment, when it should complete its task with all due dilligence and dispatch. He had been among those that had never been absent for a single hour from his seat. He hoped that the Convention would not dispatch its business after the same fashion that it was dispatched in the legislature at the close of a session. We should remember that there is an essential difference; if the legislature, through impatience, at the close of its session does wrong, there is a remedy at the next session; but the acts of this body are, in a great measure, irrevocable.

Mr. Dunn called for the previous question, which prevailed.

Mr. Dunn then moved for a division of the question, to take the vote upon the first proposition, which motion prevailed.

"Resolved, That from and after three o'clock this day, no new provision shall be offered, except by way of an amendment."

Said proposition was adopted.

The second proposition was then adopted.

The third proposition was then taken up, that the Convention adjourn on Saturday next; and the yeas and nays were called. For the adjournment, 24, against it, 27.

Mr. Guion submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That after the constitution has passed though its second reading, it shall be taken section by section, for a third reading; at which time no amendment which may be offered shall be adopted, unless by a majority of the members elected to the Convention, or by a greater number of votes than were given for the section at the first reading. No debates shall take place, and no remarks shall be permitted, but such as may be strictly necessary to explain the object of the the amendment; and after all the sections have been acted on, the question shall be put on the final passage of the constitution.

On motion of Mr. Cade, the rules were dispensed with, in order to take up the above resolution; and the same being taken up, was adopted.

Mr. Taylor of Assumtion, offered the following section, viz:

The legislature shall devise and establish a system of common schools for the education of all the children of the citizens of the State, and shall provide at least three-fourths of the funds necessary for the support thereof, by a tax on property.

Mr. Trist said, I now rise, Mr. President, to move the reconsideration of the vote making one senatorial district of the parishes of Ascension and St. James, in order that two districts may be made, one of each parish, with one senator to each district. I am induced to move for this division because I know it to be in accordance with the wishes of those who sent me here; at the same time, that it disturbs no cast iron rule, no inflexible rule of apportionment; since none such has been established by this body. The two parishes are about equal in wealth and population. It will also go some little way towards correcting a wrong done to a minority. I have heard, Mr. President, a good deal said in this body about protection of minorities. Now, sir, in the part of the country where I live I know of no minority requiring protection except a party minority: in all other matters we are a homogenious mass, without any jarring or discordant elements. Now, sir, what regard has been paid to the rights and feelings of the minority in that part of the country? Why, it is excluded from all chance of participation in the senatorial representation. I do not say that this exclusion is the effect of design: it is more respectful to view it as the result of the application of a particular system—that of large districts—in favor of which there is, no doubt, much to be said, but which I consider objectionable in the present state of the public mind, inasmuch as party minorities are sacrificed in its application; and we all know how acutely sensitive the public feeling is to such considerations; more so perhaps than to those of any other description whatever they may be.

As for myself, personally, I care not a copper about the result of the motion. I am not an aspirant after senatorial honors; and if I know myself I would not stretch out my hand to clutch them were they within its reach. I am actuated solely by a sense of duty, and I call upon the gallant protectors of minorities to come to the protection of a minority in distress, confident that their chivalrous feelings will move them to respond to the call.

Mr. Roman suggested that the house was thin, and requested the delegate from Ascention, (Mr. Trist,) to defer his motion until twelve o'clock, m.

Mr. Trist assented.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption, submitted the following section, viz;

At the general election, in the year ——, and every—— year thereafter, a poll shall be opened and taken in every election district in the State, as to the expediency of calling a Convention; and in the event a majority of all the qualified electors in the State shall vote in calling a Convention, the general assembly shall, at their next session, call a Convnntion, to consist of as many members as there shall be representatives in the house of representatives, to be chosen in the same manner and proportion as the said representatives, at the general election next thereafter ensuing, and to meet within six months after their election, for the purpose of re-adopting, amending or changing this constitution.

A question of order being raised, viz:

Whether the above section was not in direct conflict with the section adopted in the article providing for the mode of revising the constitution, and consequently out of order.

Mr. Labauve in the chair, decided that the section was not in order.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption, appealed from the decision of the chair.

The decision of the chair was not maintained.

Mr. Guion moved to lay said section on the table indefinitely. It was useless, said Mr. G. The people had a right, independent of any constitutional provision, to call a convention, when they pleased.

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Cénas, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Dunn, DuBouchel, Eustis, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, Marigny, Ma-

zueau, Roman, Sellers, Stephens, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—32 yeas; and Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, Downs, Garrett, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Preston, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soule, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the negative —27 nays.

Mr. Waddill submitted the following section:

No person shall be imprisoned for debt in any action, or on any judgment founded upon contract, unless in case of fraud; nor shall any person be imprisoned for a military fine in time of peace.

Said section was laid on the table, subject to call.

On motion of Mr. Ledoux, the fifth section of the general provisions was reconstdered.

Sec. 5. No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in pursuance of specific appropriations made by law, nor shall any appropriation of money for the support of an army be made for a longer time than one year. A regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of the public monies shall be published annually, in such manner as shall be provided by law.

Mr. Ledoux moved to amend the foregoing section by striking out in the third line the words "for the support of an army," and in the fifth line he proposed to strike out "one," and substitute "two," as the legislature met biennially.

Agreeably to previous notice, Mr. Sellers moved to reconsider the vote adopting the eighth section of the legislative article, for the purpose of proposing an amendment, that the payment of a poll tax be essential to the exercise of the right of suffrage. The said poll tax to be appropriated to public education.

Mr. Chinn opposed the reconsideration. It was contrary he considered to the wishes of the people to impose any such restriction upon the right of suffrage.

The motion to reconsider was lost.

It being twelve o'clock, Mr. Trist, moved to reconsider the vote forming one senatorial district of St. James and Ascention.

The ayes and nays were called for,

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, DuBouchel, Downs, Eustis, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Preston, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soule, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Winder voted in the affirmative—34 yeas; Messrs. Benjamin, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Chinn, Claiborne, Culbertson, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Derbes, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Sellers and Winchester voted in the negative—26 nays.

Whereupon Mr. Trist moved to amend the clause as follows:

The parish of St. James shall constitute one district, with one senator; and the parish of Ascension one senatorial district, with one senator.

Said amendment was adopted, and the section was then re-adopted.

Mr. Brent moved for the reconsideration of the third section of the article upon the judiciary, fixing the salary of the judges of the supreme court. He stated that his object was to move to reduce the salary to five thousand dollars for the chief justice, and four thousand five hundred for the associate judges.

The yeas and nays were called for upon the vote to reconsider:

Messrs. Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Dunn, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Preston, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens and Waddill voted in the affirmative—28 yeas; and

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Boudousquie, Briant, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, DuBouchel, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Kenner, King, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, Marigny, Mazureau, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Soulé, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Voorhies, Wederstrandt Winchester and Winder voted in the negative—33 nays.

Mr. Claiborne moved to reconsider the vote adopting the section offered by Mr. PORTER, making all parish officers not provided for in the constitution, elective.

Mr. CLAIBORNE observed that it was not his design to discuss the merits of the question in relation to the country parishes; but he deemed it not out of place to state that the people of New Orleans and their delegation in this body, with a single exception, and the gentleman alluded to only partially differs with his colleagues are opposed to a popular election of parish officers as far as they are concerned. They are thoroughly persuaded that however well it may answer in the country, it would be extremely inconvenient and troublesome in the city.

Mr. KENNER said that if an exception were to be made in favor of New Orleans, he would ask that the same privilege be accorded to the parishes of Ascension and St. James. He was averse to these exceptions, and would infinitely prefer that the section should be rejected.

Mr. BOUDOUSQUIE moved a like exception for the county of the German Coast.

Mr. BENJAMIN remarked that nothing was intended to be proposed by the Orleans delegation in relation to this matter, as far as it affected the country parishes, because from the decisive majority by which the section was passed, it was apparent that any effort towards that object, would be ineffectual. The people of the city desired to be excepted from the operation of the principle. They were clamorous for that exception because they were convinced, that however well it might operate in the country, it was totally unsuited to the city. He was not disposed to controvert the opinions of gentlemen from the csuntry parishes, in favor of the measure, it might suit very well, where the people were known to each other and where the population was sparse, but in the city where there were so large a number of local officers to be appointed, it was out of the question. The objections to its application to the city were overwhelming. When the proposition came up (continued Mr. Benjumin) for the election of public officers by the people, viva voce, I opposed it, because I considered it physically impossible to apply the principle to the city. I have since thrown together with little consideration the various offices in the city for the purpose of forming an estimate, and I find there are one hundred and fifty-six offices, that is to say there would have to be one hundred and fifty-six persons voted for in the city. There is the governor and lieutenant governor, four senators, twenty representatives, one sheriff, six or eight justices of the peace, a score of notaries, and a number of other offices that would have to be filled by popular elections. It would keep the people in constant occupation. There would not be a lucrative office for which there would not be several candidates; these candidates would have severally their friends and partizans,; there would be intriguing and electioneering for months before the canvass opened, the city would become a mass of confusion and would be converted into a grand battle-ground for contending factions. But this would not yet be all; there are other objections. There are forty-three notaries in the city. The appointment of a notary is no better than the diploma of a lawyer; to have a lucrative practice in either one must establish a reputation. The business of a notary depends upon his skill and the confidence he may inspire in that skill. In the country parishes, where there are but one or two notaries, the community have little choice; but in the city where there is a great many, the case is different. It so happens that in the city, five or six notaries do the mass of the business, because they are in the enjoyment of the public confidence, and because the ancient titles of property are to be found in their offices. Even with the existing system some inconvenience is felt, in hunting up titles. The titles of a notarial are retained by the individual succeeding to the appointment. This is the rule, and yet it is not free from inconvenience. What will it be when the office is to be renewed every four or five years? Where are the titles to property to be found? Who is to take the books of this or that notary: the books of A. B. and C.? Are the successful candidates to draw lots? But if to avoid this, the electors shall designate on their tickets, who is to be the successor of each particular notary, and there are twenty notaries to be elected, it will require a quire of paper to write down the various designations, and two weeks to count the votes. Full nine-tenths of the people of New Orleans are convinced of the absurdity of the principle when applied to the city. I hope, therefore, that the reconsideration will be ordered, and that the city will be exempted.

Mr. CULBERTSON said he was in favor of the election of some of the parish officers by the people, but not of all. He would readily vote to exclude from the popular election the offices of notaries, and perhaps one or two other offices, but with that reservation, he was in favor of the principle of popular elections in the city as well as in the country; for if it was good for the one, it was reasonable to conclude it was good for the other; and if bad, it was certainly bad for both.

Mr. LEWIS said he was distinctly opposed to the sweeping clause, that all parish officers should be elected. He thought there were some parish officers that would be advantageously elected by the people, and those he would have expressly named. But he was averse to the principle of one rule for the city and another for the country. He would vote for the reconsideration, if it were understood that the section was to be modified and be made general in its operations.

Mr. READ said he had designed voting for the reconsideration; but upon reflection he thought it would open the floodgates for other exceptions, and he would therefore vote no.

The yeas and nays were asked for upon the reconsideration.

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Boudousquie, Brazeale, Briant, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, DuBouchel, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Labauve, Ledoux, Legendre, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Roman, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soule, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Voorhies, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder—voted in the affirmative; 46 yeas; and

Messrs. Bourg, Brent, Brumfield, Covillon, Dunn, Hudspeth, Lewis, McRae, Preson, Read, St. Amand, Scott of Feliciana, Stephens and Waddill, voted in the negative; 14 nays.

The section was then taken up, as follows:

All parish officers not otherwise provided for by this constitution shall be elected by the qualified electors of the different parishes, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved to amend said section by adding at the end of the same the following proviso, viz:

Provided, that the mode of appointment and the tenure of office of all officers in the parish of Orleans shall remain as heretofore, unless otherwise provided by the legislature.

Mr. BOUDOUSQUIE moved to amend said proviso by inserting after the word "Orleans," the words "German Coast."

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Boudousquie, Briant, Chinn, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Hudspeth, Kenner, Legendre, Lewis, Roman, St. Amand, Sellers, Taylor of Assumption, Wadsworth and Winchester voted in the affirmative—18 yeas; and Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Claiborne, Cénas, Chambliss, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Downs, DuBouchel, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Humble, Hynson, Labauve, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Soule, Splane, Stephens, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Winder voted in the negative—44 nays.

Mr. KENNER moved to amend said proviso by adding at the end of the same the following amendment, viz:

And that the register of conveyances, register of mortgages, and notaries public for the State at large, shall be appointed as the legislature may direct.

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Beatty, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Chinn, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Garcia, Guion, Kenner, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Saunders, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Wadsworth, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—24 yeas; and

Messrs. Benjamin, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Cenas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Co-

villion, Downs, DuBouchel, Dunn, Eustis, Garrett, Grymes, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soule, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the negative—40 nays.

Mr. F. B. CONRAD moved to include the the parish of Jefferson. He said his constituents were as much opposed to the system of electing all their parish officers as were the people of the city of New Orleans. He considered himself instructed upon that point by the known wishes of his constituents.

The previous question was called and sustained on Mr. CONRAD's motion to exclude the parish of Jefferson.

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Boudousquie, Briant, Chinn, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Kenner, Legendre, Lewis, Pugh, Roman, St. Amand, Taylor of Assumption, Wadsworth and Winchester voted in the affirmative—17 yeas; and Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Cenas, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Covillion, Downs, DuBouchel, Eustis, Garrett, Grymes, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Labauve, Ledoux, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Stephens, Voorhies, Waddill Wederstrandt and Winder voted in the negative—45 nays.

When Mr. PRESTON's name was reached, that delegate said that he voted no, because he differed from the opinion expressed by his colleague (Mr. Conrad,) that the people of Jefferson were averse to the election of all their public officers. His colleague had said, he felt instruced by the known wishes of the people. I think, said Mr. Preston, that my colleague has misunderstood the popular sentiment of our common constituents upon his point. I avowed my feelings and views upon this very topic at public meetings, in private conversations, and on every occasion to my fellow-citizens. I declared I was in favor of the election of all parish officers by the people even including the parish judge; and I received, notwithstanding these avowals, a few more votes than were ever given to any candidate in that parish. I therefore am forced to the conclusion that my colleague is in error when he asserts that the people of Jefferson are in favor of his amendment. As to the difficulties growing out of the election of notaries public, spoken of by the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Benjamin) I consider it a perfect bug-bear. Notaries could just as well be licensed as lawyers or as physicians.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved for the adoption of his proviso.

Mr. M. TAYLOR said he was in favor of the election of several parish officers. He was in favor of the election of sheriffs and certain special officers. But, he was apprehensive that the session was too far advanced to act calmly and understandingly upon this matter. He was fearful the Convention would act with too much haste. It would therefore, to his judgment, be much better to reject the section altogether, and leave the subject to the judgment and wisdom of the legislature.

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved for the adoption of the proviso.

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Beatty, Benjamin, Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Cénas, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Derbes, Downs, DuBouchel, Eustis, Grymes, Guion, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Legendre, McCallop, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Pugh, Read, Roman, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Wederstrandt, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—46 yeas; and

Messrs. Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Dunn, Garcia, Hudspeth, King, Labauve, Lewis, McRae, Preston, St. Amand, Scott of Feliciana, Stephens and Waddill voted in the negative—15 nays.

Mr. CULBERTSON stated in giving his vote that he was willing to exclude from the operation of the section, notaries, the recorder of mortgages and the clerks of courts, but as the proviso embraced all parish officers, he felt compelled to vote against it.

Mr. Garcia said he voted against the proviso, because if the principle in the section were a good one, the city ought to have the benefit of it. And if it were bad, it ought not to be applied to the country any more than to the city.

Mr. Lewis would state briefly the reasons why he recorded his vote in the negative. He was in favor only of certain parish officers being excepted from the principle. If that could have been done generally, in regard to the whole State, it would have met his approbation. But he could not think of countenancing local exceptions in the constitution. It was bad enough in our legislation, but still worse in the constitution.

Mr. Wadsworth said he should have liked to have seen the city of Lafayette included, because similar reasons existed for her exclusion, and these reasons were valid. But it was no motive with him, because the city of Lafayette was not included, that the city of New Orleans should lose the benefit of the proviso.

Mr. Claiborne asked for the adoption of the section, and the yeas and nays were called for,

Messrs. Benjamin, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Cénas, Chambliss, Chinn, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Downs, DuBouchel, Eustis, Humble, Hynson, Ledoux, Legendre, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Mazureau, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Pugh, Read, Saunders, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Soulé, Stephens, Trist, Voorhies, Wederstrandt and Winchester voted in the affirmative—39 yeas.

Messrs. Beatty, Boudousquie, Bourg, Briant, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garcia, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Lewis, Roman, St. Amand, Splane, Taylor of Assumption, Waddill, Wadsworth and Winder voted in the negative—23 nays.

Mr. Benjamin declared he was opposed to the principle contained in the section. He thought it wrong. It did not meet his concurrence, and the only reason why he voted for it, was because it appeared to be understood that if the section were reconsidered, he was to vote for its re-adoption. Nothing he had said could give rise to that impression, but inasmuch as it prevailed, to avoid the remotest suspicion of bad faith, he voted in the affirmative.

Mr. Claiborne expressed a similar repugnance to the principle. But when he introduced his proviso, he declared it was not his intention to interfere with the section further than to make an exception in favor of the city. The section had been reconsidered by the votes of those favorable to the principle, the exception had been made, and now he voted to put the section where it was before the reconsideration. If the question had come up in its original form, he would have voted against the section, as on a previous occasion.

Mr. C. M. Conrad said he was opposed to the principle, and thought it good neither for city nor country. But he voted yea, because he wished to place the section in statu quo ante-bellum.

Mr. Culbertson said he voted in the negative on account of the proviso.

Mr. Dunn voted against the section, because dispositions in the constitution ought to be general.

Mr. Scott of Feliciana said he voted against the amendment, but he voted in favor of the section with the amendment, rather than that the section should be lost.

Mr. Miles Taylor said he voted in the negative chiefly on account of the exception. He had voted for the amendment through inadvertance.

Mr. Winchester voted yea, to move the reconsideration to-morrow.

Mr. Prescott of St. Landry said he voted for the section with the exception, because he considered that the city of New Orleans, from certain peculiarities, belonging to a large and populous city, ought to be excepted from the principle.

Mr. Boudousquie voted nay, because the section did not meet his concurrence, and because there was no greater reason to except the city of New Orleans than other parishes, for which their representatives had asked an exception.

Mr. Marigny asked for the reconsideration of the section, excluding the city of New Orleans from being the seat of government.

Mr. Garcia enquired what was the vote when the proposition was originally carried. The secretary replied that there were 39 yeas and 28 nays.

The question was taken on Mr. Marigny's motion, and the yeas and nays were called for; 26 yeas, 36 nays.

Mr. WADDILL called up the following section, offered by him:

"No person shall be imprisoned for debt in any action, or any judgment founded upon contract, unless in case of fraud; nor shall any person be imprisoned for a militia fine in time of peace."

Mr. GARRETT moved to lay said section on the table indefinitely.

Mr. DOWNS said he would vote in favor of the motion to lay the section indefinitely on the table, because a law existed for the abolition of imprisonment for debt. It was better to leave the subject under the control of the legislature, inasmuch as they disposed of it.

Mr. MILES TAYLOR said this was one of the few matters that he desired to see placed beyond legislative control.

Mr. BENJAMIN said he was opposed to laying the section on the table. It was a matter affecting the liberty of the citizen, and was therefore well worthy of the consideration of this body. He was decidedly against imprisonment for debt, except where fraud could be shown, and thought the exemption should be recognized in the constitution as a personal right, except in cases of fraud.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD thought there was no necessity for a constitutional provision. There was no imprisonment for debt in this State, except for fraud.

Mr. LEWIS would state the reason why he was opposed to the section. When a member of the legislature he had advocated and voted for the law abolishing imprisonment for debt. Subsequent experience had convinced him that it was one of the greatest sources of fraud.

Mr. GARRETT said he had moved to lay the section on the table, because he thought it unnecessary, inasmuch as the legislature have disposed of the subject.

The yeas and nays were called for on Mr. Garrett's motion to lay the section indefinitely on the table:

Messrs. Beatty, Boudousquié, Brazeale, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Cénas, Chambliss, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Downs, Garrett, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, Mayo, Peets, Pugh, Roman, Saunders, Scott of Feliciana, Sellers, Stephens, Taylor of St. Landry, Voorhies, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—33 yeas; and

Messrs. Benjamin, Bourg, Brent, Chinn, Claiborne, Culbertson, Derbes, DuBouchel, Dunn, Eustis, Garcia, Hynson, McRae, Marigny, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Read, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Soulé, Taylor of Assumption, Trist, Waddill and Wederstrandt voted in the negative—24 nays.

The Convention then took up the subject of taxation.

Mr. C. M. CONRAD had offered the following provision:

"Taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the State."

To which Mr. GARRETT offered the following amendment, viz:

"All property subject to taxation in this State, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained by law. No one species of property from which a tax may be collected, shall be taxed higher than another species of property of equal value and subject to taxation."

Provided, The legislature shall have power to tax merchants, hawkers, pedlers, privileges or incomes, in such manner as may from time to time be prescribed by law.

The question under consideration at the adjournment, was the following substitute, offered by Mr. Taylor of Assumption, viz:

"The revenue of the State derived from taxation shall be assessed equally upon all the property of the State, according to its value, ascertained in such manner as the legislature shall direct, so that the same shall be equal and uniform throughout the State. No one species of property shall be taxed higher than another species of property of equal value.

Mr. LEWIS said that when the substitute was first read, he thought it more concise than the proposition of his friend from Ouachita (Mr. Garrett). But upon examination, he apprehended that it carried the taxing power too far. It requires every species of property to be taxed. That is going too far. Some property may be taxed, while it will be extremely inconvenient to tax other property. As the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) had observed, it would not only be inconvenient but impracticable to carry out the plan. It was better to leave the legislature to determine from what sources the revenue should be raised, and only to provide that the taxation imposed should be equal, that it should be in the ratio of the value of the property subject to taxation. But to prescribe that all property should be taxed would require an inquisitorial inspection of a man's personal property, of the wardrobe of his family, of his bed and beding, and even an insight ito the barn-yard, to count the ducks and chickens. This was certainly goin too far. It was going far enought to declare that taxation should be equal, leaving it to the legislature to determine the species of property which should bear the burdens of taxation.

Mr. Taylor of Assumption, replied that he never dreamed that in practice it would result that the assessors would have to rate the poultry in a barn-yard, or to inspect a man's dwelling to ascertain the number of his sheets. He believed the principle embraced in his substitute to be correct. The original proposition did not touch and could not remedy the evil. It provides only that such property as may be taxed, in proportion to its value; it clearly leaves the legislature with a discretionary power to discriminate, to select one species of property and not another. This is the actual system which has been in practice ever since the organization of the government; and what has been the result of that system? That a small amount of taxation has been laid upon one kind of property of greater value, while a heavier amount of taxation has been laid upon another kind of property of less value. This has particularly been the case in relation to slaves. In the second place, a revenue is derived from some particular trades and professions, while others are not taxed at all, or but trivially taxed.

Again, moveable property, money loaned and stock in trade, are not taxed at all. The inequality and partiality of the present system cannot be justified. I defy any one, said Mr. T., to tell me why the capital of a planter should be subject to heavy burdens of taxation, while an equal amount of capital, if employed in loans or in trade, is not subject to be taxed at all? If a man have one hundred thousand dollars invested in slaves, an arbitrary tax, not based in proportion to their value in reference to other property, is laid, but the capitalist is free to invest the same amount, and to realize from it a much heavier interest, without contributing one cent to the public burdens.

The proposition of the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Garrett) will only compel the legislature to pay some respect to the relative value of land and slaves in the imposition of taxes; but the legislature may confine the revenue to these two sources. What is to prevent it? What has experience shown us? A few years ago there was a deficit in the treasury; what did the finance committee do? Did they propose the imposition of a tax upon moveables? No, sir, they increased the taxes. The same course will continue to be followed. The only correct system is to impose a tax upon all kinds of property; make it all contribute in proportion to its value. The burdens of taxation will then fall equally.

Mr. Conrad of Orleans, objected to a system of taxation in the constitution which would be immutable. No constitution should attempt any thing of the kind. It might become onerous. The matter of taxation must be regulated by the variable changes in society. If you attempt a system, and make that system perpetual, you may bear with peculiar hardship upon the poorer classes. The expression, "all the property of the State," was equivocal. He presumed the mover meant all the property in the State. That would include not only poultry in the barn-yard, but every thing else of any value. The planter would not only have his slaves and his land taxed, but his tools, and even the very crop after it was gathered, for it was property, just as much as his negro or his horse. The soil and labor would not only be taxed, but the product of the soil. There is no stop nor limit to the principle. It would require a swarm of tax collectors, and the system would even be still more burdensome than that pursued in England.

At the first blush he had been disposed to consider the proposition of the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Garrett) a good one, without the proviso. As to the proviso, it was useless. The legislature necessarily should have a discretionary power as to the property to be taxed. The general principle that taxation should be equal and uniform, was a good one. In asserting that principle, the constitution went sufficiently far. In other respects the legislature should have full power.

Mr. WADSWORTH said that the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Conrad) appeared to be frighened at shadows. There was no ground for the construction that the product of the property, as well as the property itself, were subject to taxation under the substitute. Taxation, as he understood it, would be imposed upon the property in proportion with its productiveness, that is to say, in reference to the revenue derived from it. And if a tax were imposed upon chickens, which the gentleman apprehended as one of the results, the tax would be graduated upon the revenue derived from them. He did not understand the substitute in any other way. As to the propriety of taxing actual capital in money, it was as proper a subject of taxation as slaves or lands; and it should be subject to taxation just as much as if it were converted into those sources of revenue.

Mr. EUSTIS said he approached this subject with a great deal of deference for the opinions of gentlemen who had spoken upon it. It was one of the most difficult and abstruse subjects of legislation, and had engaged the attention of the ablest minds, the penetrating judgments of men of the keenest intelligence, for years. The income tax in England was a matter of great perplexity to her statesmen. He was sorry that we had neither the time nor the means of reaching this question understandingly. It was better to take the sense of the house upon the principle that "taxation should be equal and uniform." That was as far as we could go. He would move to lay the other propositions indefinitely on the table.

Mr. MAYO called for the previous question; which was sustained.

Mr. PORTER was in favor of laying Mr. Taylor's substitute on the table, but not the proposition presented by Mr. Garrett. He, therefore, moved for a division of the question, that is, to take the vote on the substitute; which motion prevailed.

The yeas and nays being called for, to lay the substitute on the table indefinitely, resulted as follows:

Messrs. Beatty, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Chambliss, Claiborne, Conrad of Orleans, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Derbes, Downs, DuBouchel, Eustis, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, Legendre, Lewis, McCallop, McRae, Marigny, Mayo, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Read, Roman, Scott of Feliciana, Scott of Madison, Sellers, Stephens, Voorhies, Wederstrandt and Winder voted in the affirmative—39 yeas; and

Messrs. Bourg, Briant, Cade, Garcia, King, Mazureau, Preston, Scott of Baton Rouge, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Waddill, Wadsworth and Winchester voted in the negative—14 nays.

Mr. WINDER presented the following resolution:

"Resolved, That for the balance of the session the Convention shall hold evening sessions; and that the secretary be empowered to employ as many clerks as he may deem necessary to keep up the proceedings."

Whereupon the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 7, 1845.

The Convention met pursuant to adjournment.

The proceedings were opened with prayer from the Rev. Mr. CLARK.

Mr. WINDER stated that having voted with the majority upon the question to establish the parish of Orleans into a single senatorial district, and having upon mature reflection come to the conclusion that it would be better to divide the parish into a plurality of senatorial districts, he would move for the reconsideration of that vote, and that the reconsideration be had when the city delegation shall be in full attendance.

The PRESIDENT appointed Mr. Boudousquie a member of the committee on enrolment, in place of Mr. Roman, who asked to be excused from serving on that committee, as his time was monopolized as a member of the committee on revision.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

Additional section, offered by Mr. C. M. CONRAD:

"Taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the State."

Mr. GARRETT's amendment to the above was taken up in connection:

"All property subject to taxation in this State, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained by law. No one species of property, from which a tax may be collected, shall be taxed any higher than another species of property of equal value, and subject to taxation.

"Provided, That the legislature shall have power to tax merchants, hawkers, pedlers, privileges or incomes, in such manner as may from time to time be prescribed by law."

Mr. EUSTIS said he would propose to lay the proposition of the gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Garrett) indefinitely on the table. He conceived that the house were not prepared to act upon so difficult a question, and he was averse to details in a constitution. When you say that all property shall be taxed, it is clear you comprehend moveable property as well as immoveable property. But what means have you of reaching mooveable property? The unscrupulous man will evade the tax, while the burden will fall upon the fair-dealing man, who will frankly avow all that he possesses. Your section will hold out inducements to perjury, for implicit reliance will, from the necessity of tho casc, have to be placed in the oath of the party. I say this, continued Mr. Eustis, without the slightest disrespect. This subject is one of the most difficult in legislation; it is certainly not a proper time at the close of our labors to pass upon it. In no constitution is a similar clause to be fund. It will be attended with inconvenience, embarrassment, and other unfortunate results. The only principle we can act upon and embody in the constitution, is that offered by my colleague (Mr. Conrad), that taxation shall be equal and uniform. That provision is sufficient. We cannot go beyond it with safety, and if we go no further we shall act wisely and discreetly. These are my convictions, briefly expressed. I do not propose to discuss the principle, I think it no time even to discuss it, much less to give it a place in the constitution.

Mr. GARRETT said that had the gentleman from New Orleans (Mr. Eustis) have examined this question with his usual penetration, he would have seen that it was not subject to his objections. It was to provide against the very evils which the delegate had himself suggested. It does not require that the legislature shall impose a tax upon every species of property, as the proposition of the delegate from Assumption (Mr. Taylor). It only requires equality in taxation upon the property which the legislature may, in their wisdom, designate as sources of revenue. It requires only that taxation should be imposed strictly upon the ad valorem principle. As to the proposition of the delegate from New Orleans, (Mr. Conrad) it is good as far as it goes, but it does not go sufficiently far.

Mr. TAYLOR of Assumption, said he deemed it proper to say something, in consequence of what fell from the gentleman from Ouachita (Mr. Garrett), in relation to the proposition which had been laid indefinitely on the table yesterday. That provision, said Mr. T., laid down an imperative rule. It compelled the legislature to pursue what I considered a proper policy. I preferred it to the present proposition, because it is more explicit.

It strikes me, continued Mr. Taylor, from what fell from the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Eustis) this morning, and what fell from his colleague (Mr. Conrad) yesterday, that it is a part of a system, that whatever is regarded with great favor by the majority of the house, is considered an enormity by the city delegation, when applied to New Orleans. They are willing enough to lay the burdens of taxation upon land and slaves, because it falls principally upon the people of the country. But when it is proposed to tax moveable property, they raise an outcry against it. They regard such a tax with particular aversion. It is thus with every thing else. Delegates from the city have no objection that the country should bear the burdens of the most onerous taxation, provided the city be excepted. They will unite to rule us, if forsooth, we consent to except the city. The moment we speak of a tax upon personal property we are told, it will not do. Thus, capital embarked in trade, and otherwise, is to be left untouched, because the tax would fall principally upon the city, as the tax upon land and slaves falls chiefly upon the country. We are told that it is inquisitorial, and that the people will not submit to taxation on personal property. There is no country in the world where moveable property is not subject to taxation. It may be difficult to reach some species of personal property subject to taxation; but there are other species that is as tangible, as open to the sight, as immoveable property. As to capital, and things which may escape apprehension, as money, the conscience of the party may be probed by an oath. I cannot see any objections to that. The gentlemen have failed to convince me why taxation should be derived from immoveable property alone, while personal property should be exempted altogether. I can see no reason for it, unless it be intended to favor the city at the expense of the country.

The question under consideration at the adjournment was the motion of Mr. Eustis to lay the several propositions, with the exception of Mr. Conrad's, indefinitely on the table. Mr. Porter had called for a division. The question pending was to lay Mr. Garrett's proposition on the table indefinitely.

Mr. Garrett moved for a division, in putting the question, so that each clause might be acted upon separately, which motion prevailed.

The question was taken on the proviso, and the house refused to lay it on the table.

The question then recurred on laying the following portion of the proposition upon the table, and was lost:

"All property subject to taxation in this State, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained by law. No one species of property from which a tax may be collected, shall be taxed higher than another species of property of equal value, and subject to taxation."

Mr. Mayo said, when this proposition was first presented, he was disposed to view it favorably, and thought he should vote for it; but the remarks of members that had been made upon the subject, had inclined him to doubt the propriety of doing so. It was a subject of great importance, and contained a principle which he believed correct; but he feared it might be found impossible for the legislature to carry it into pretical operation.

The section, as it now stands, provides that "all property subject to taxation shall be taxed according to its value." This would certainly include all property on which the legislature has a right to impose a tax—all the property, of every description, in the State. This may be remedied by striking out the words "subject to taxation," and inserting the words "on which a tax may be levied." If these words be substituted, so as to make the provisions least objectionable, there will still exist insuperable objections, I apprehend; and it is this apprehension that induces me to oppose it. How can this valuation be made? It must, I think, be made, either by the assessor swearing the owner of the property, or by appraisers appointed for that purpose. Suppose the first mode should be determined on by the legislature. The assessor asks me on oath, what my twenty slaves and one thousand acres of land are worth. I answer a certain sum, according to my notions of its value. I form my ideas of its value, from notions peculiar to myself. I do not want to sell, but to keep my property, and will probably, put a low estimate upon it. My neighbor is asked what his twenty slaves and thousand acres of land are worth. His notions of its value are formed from peculiar circumstances which are applicable to him and not to me. He wishes to sell his property, and is asking a high price for it, and he in giving a valuation of it, honestly and conscienciously estimates it to double the amount at which I have estimated mine, which is of equal value. This will necessarily make the taxes, as between myself and my neighbor, very unequal. But suppose the appraisement to be made by appraisers appointed for that purpose. It will certainly be very expensive to pay appraisers to go through every parish, and see all the land, slaves, and other property that is to be taxed, in order to appraise it; and if they do not, they cannot make correct appraisements. But suppose they do go through the parish and make their appraisement, and that they, intending to make a correct appraisement, make one that is palpably incorrect. We have provided by another section that all questions relating to taxes may be taken, by appeal, to the supreme court. Now, suppose that either myself or my neighbor can prove that the appraisement is unequal; that the property which has been assessed and taxed as being worth a given sum, is worth but half that sum, or that it is worth double the sum, and should prove it, which is not an improbable case. It appears to me that he could make a very plausible constitutional case of it, and if aggrieved, could get relief. This is the very object of the constitutional provision; and if this be true, it does appear to me that it presents a difficulty that would render it impracticable to carry this provision, if made a constitutional one, into effect.

I must repeat, sir, that I am in favor of the principle contained in the provision; but I fear that it may be found impracticable to carry it into operation, and for that reason alone, I feel myself constrained to vote against it; and especially as the legislature will have the subject fully in their power, if we make no provision.

Mr. Roman said that the subject was very important, and if we made a false step, the consequences would be irretrievable. He would therefore, propose to refer the whole matter to a special committee.

Mr. Porter said that the delegate from New Orleans (Mr. Eustis) was mistaken in the opinion that a similar clause to the one now before the house was not to be found in any constitution. The principle of an ad valorum tax was to be found in most constitutions. Something had been said about the difficulty of getting at the value of personal property. He could see nothing valid in this objection: The assessors could place the parties under oath. That was done at present. The present system has manifestly operated partially. It is clearly unjust to make a man with five thousand dollars worth of property contribute as much as a man who has ten thousand dollars worth. That is an evil that ought to be remeded, and unless we pass the section, we have no hopes of any salutary reform in the system of taxation. It was similar in its phraseology to clauses on the same subject in other constitutions.

The question was taken on Mr. Roman's motion to refer, and it was lost.

Mr. Chinn said he thought it was too late in the session to dispose of this subject as it ought to be disposed of. Moreover, he did not think it necessary. The legislature have ample power. I will move you, Mr. President, that it lay indefinitely on the table.

The President said this motion was not in order. It had already been put and lost.

Mr. Brent moved to add the words "all other moveables."

Mr. Eustis said that in conceding to the views exposed by the delegate from West Baton Rouge, (Mr. Chinn) his assent, he would ask whether the legislature had the power to tax privileges?. If they have, they may extinguish privileges by taxation.

Mr. Waddill moved to amend Mr. Conrad's section by adding after the word "State," the words "on all moveable and immovable property."

His amendment was lost.

Mr. Lewis moved to amend Mr. Garret's proposition by striking out in the first line the words "subject to taxation" and insert in their stead, the words "on which taxes shall be levied," and in the last line, to strike out the words "subject to taxation," and insert the words "on which taxes shall be levied."

These amendments were adodted.

Mr. Labauve moved as a further amendment, to insert in the third line, after the word "ascertained," the words "as directed," which motion also prevailed.

Mr. Lewis called for the question upon the proposition down to the word "provided."

Mr. Benjamin said that if the proposition were not modified, it would bring the government to a stand still. Why, if you ordain that all property shall be taxed, it is evident that taxation upon any particular property is unconstitutional, the very moment it can be shown that the principle has not been applied generally, that some particular property has been excepted from the general and imperitive rule. To obviate that result, he would propose the following substitute:

"All property on which taxes shall be levied in this State, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as directed by law. No one species of property from which a tax may be collected shall be taxed higher than another species of property of equal value, on which taxes shall be levied."

Mr. Winchester suggested whether it was not absolutely necessary to delay the operation of the principle until the year 1848. It might be understood as applying to the present mode of collecting the revenue of the State, and give rise to serious difficulties.

Mr. PUGH considered it to be unnecessary to prescribe the period for the operation of the principle; it could not be operative, until provided for by law.

Mr. PORTER said this matter would be regulated by the first legislature convened under the new constitution. It should be left to the legislature to apply the principle at as early a period as practicable.

Mr. WINCHESTER would make one observation. The question had been discussed in the legislature, in relation to this very matter, of equality in taxation. It was proposed by the finance committee to appoint assessors to assess the property in all the parishes. It was discovered that this plan would cost more than the advantages it would confer were worth. Those parishes that would act strictly would pay more than those that would pursue an opposite course. On that account, it was abandoned. It was clear that some time would have to elapse before the legislature would be enabled to establish, and in the mean while the present mode of collecting the taxes would be unconstitutional. Hence it was that he proposed that the principle should not take effect until 1848. That was as early a period as could be assigned.

Mr. MAYO said that this was a strange argument against the adoption of the whole section.

Mr. WINCHESTER moved to amend said substitute by adding at the commencement of the same, the words "after the year 1848," which amendment was accepted by Mr. Benjamin and adopted.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved for the adoption of the substitute as amended, to-wit:

"After the year 1848 all property on which taxes shall be levied in this State, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as directed by law. No one species of property from which a tax may be collected shall be taxed higher than any other species of property of equal value on which a tax shall be levied."

The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Brazeale, Brent, Briant, Brumfield, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Covillion, Culbertson, DuBouchel, Dunn, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, King, Lewis, McRae, Peets, Porter, Prescott, of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Read, Roselius, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Feliciana, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt, and Wikoff voted in the affirmative—36 yeas; and

Mr. BENJAMIN offered as a substitute te the proviso, the followiug:

"The legislature shall have power to levy an income tax, and to tax all persons pursuing any occupation, trade or profession."

Mr. LEWIS was in favor of striking out the proviso altogether.

Mr. BEATTY considered that the legislature had the power to impose such a tax without the proviso.

Mr. BENJAMIN wished the tax on trades and professions to be general, not to be applied to one clause, and not to another.

Said substitute was adopted.

Mr. GARRETT moved for the adoption of the section as amended.

Mr. DOWNS said that the section contained a most extraordinary provision. According to it, there must be a precise equality; the tax must be identical, otherwise its imposition will be unconstitutional. He looked upon it as attended with great inconvenience and difficulty, in fact, he might say it was totally impracticable. It was inexpedient to make such an experiment, to say the least, for it would give rise to constant litigation, and the absence of equality in any one instance, would leave the treasury without resources. He was aware that the present system of taxation was liable to great objections, particularly in reference to slaves; but the remedy proposed, exacted what he conceived to be an utter impossibility. A precise equality in the imposition of taxes. All that ought to be reasonably expected, was as near an approach to equality, as was practicable.

What innumerable difficulties will present themselves in the assessments of property under the section! The best system of taxation is that based upon income, but the great difficulty is to ascertain what is the real income. The objection to that system is, that it is impracticable.

The legislature in 1842 endeavored, in laying the land tax, to proceed upon the principle of equality. They tried to arrive at an equality, and finally attempted to classify the lands into improved land, unimproved land, alluvial land, &c., but they found the whole matter attended with so much difficulty that they were compelled to abandon the design. As to appraisements, that is out of the question, as a means of producing equality. No two set of appraisers will act upon the same principle in every parish.

Mr. Brent said he felt some astonishment at the opposition made by the delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) to a proposition so plain and simple, so just and equal. He considered that no well founded objections could be urged against it. The delegate from Ouachita labored under a misapprehension. The section did not require that taxation should be imposed on all kinds of property; it simply provides, that upon all the property upon which a tax may be levied, taxation shall be equal and uniform. Is there any thing impracticable in this? Is there any thing impracticable through sworn assessors to assess an equal ad valorem tax? But he tells us that the assessors will place different valuations. Admitting, for argument sake, that they do, and that there will be still inequalities, these inequalities will be insignificant when compared with the gross injustice which now prevails, and which is the result of a total disregard of the value of property. The evil will be slight, and will bear no comparison with the excessive difference in taxation that now exists between one parish and another. The power assumed by the legislature, to lay special taxes without reference to the value of the property taxed, has led to great and crying abuses.

A similar provision to the present one is to be found in most of the constitutions. In Tennessee taxation is imposed upon the identical same principle. Now, sir, how does it happen that it is practicable in Tennessee, and impracticable here? Is not the treasury of Tennessee as well supplied as our treasury?

The delegate from Ouachita (Mr. Downs) gravely admits that the principle is just and fair, but he says it cannot be carried into effect. Now it really strikes me, said Mr. Brent, that this objection has not the slightest weight. The gentleman has adduced the land tax of 1842 for the purpose of showing the great difficulty encountered in laying an ad valorem tax upon land. What was done, in reference to that tax, by the legislature? Instead of acting upon a just principle, they decided arbitrarily that Layfayette should pay two thousand dollars land tax, St. Landry five thousand dollars, Rapides six thousand dollars, without the slightest reference to value. Had they adopted the principle of arriving at the value of the property taxed, there would have been no difficulty. In the State of Alabama there is a recognition of the same principle of taxation based upon land upon the value of property, and yet we have never heard that the government of that State has been brought to a stand still. The objections that have been urged to the section, have not the semblance of plausibility.

Mr. Dunn replied that under the section, if a tax was imposed upon a slave and it could be shown that the tax was greater than upon some other source of revenue of equal value, the tax would be null, it could not be collected, and the courts would so decide it.

Mr. Preston said that the principle was a just one. No court would declare that a tax was null if the principle was observed as far as possible. He could not see any weight in that objection. It would be infinitely easier to collect the revenue than by the present system. The property in the several parishes would be estimated, and according to the exigencies of the treasury, for the current expenses of the government, would a tax be laid of a certain per centum. As for the notion that taxation ought to be in proportion to income, that would not operate properly in some instances; for a rich man may have a great deal of unimproved property, which is increasing in value, which would escape taxation, while the labor of the poor man would be taxed.

The yeas and nays were called for upon the adoption of the section:

Messrs. Bourg, Brazeale, Brent, Brumfield, Burton, Cade, Carriere, Chambliss, Conrad of Jefferson, Covillion, Culbertson, Du Bouchel, Garrett, Hudspeth, Humble, Hynson, Kenner, King, Lewis, McRae, Peets, Porter, Prescott of St. Landry, Preston, Prudhomme, Read, Roselius, Scott of Baton Rouge, Scott of Madison, Scott of Feliciana, Stephens, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Trist, Voorhies, Waddill, Wederstrandt and Wikoff voted in the affirmative—40 yeas; and

"Taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the State. After the year 1848 all property on which taxes shall be levied in this State, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as directed by law. No one species of property from which a tax may be collected, shall be taxed higher than another species of property of equal value, on which taxes shall be levied. Provided, that the legislature shall have power to levy an income tax, and to tax all persons pursuing any occupation, trade or profession.

This being the hour fixed, Mr. Taylor of Assumption moved to reconsider the vote adopting the proviso which excepts New Orleans from the provisions of the section making all parish officers elective. The yeas and nays being called for,

Messrs. Aubert, Briant, Chinn, Conrad of Jefferson, Culbertson, Derbes, Dunn, Garrett, Guion, Hudspeth, Kenner, King, Labauve, Legendre, Lewis, McRae, Preston, Pugh, Saunders, Scott of Feliciana, Taylor of Assumption, Taylor of St. Landry, Waddill, Wikoff, Winchester and Winder voted in the affirmative—26 yeas; and

On motion of Mr. Ledoux, the following section was taken up, viz:

"There shall be appointed by the governor, with the advice and consent of the senate, an auditor , whose duty it shall be to examine and approve all accounts before they are paid by the treasurer. He shall assist the legislature in examining the accounts of the treasurer, and perform all other duties which may be required of him by law."

On motion of Mr. Benjamin, said section was laid on the table indefinitely.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. Sellers moved to reconsider the sixth section of the legislative article.

Mr. Conrad of New Orleans, said that he considered the house of representatives, under the new constitution, a most unwieldly body. It was composed of too many members. That was one of the defects he noticed in the constitution. He proposed to obviate the objection by reducing the number from ninety-eight to seventy-eight. In this reduction he has preserved the relative weight of the various sections of the State. He would beg leave to submit his proposition:

First congressional district:

From the parish of Plaquemines, take one member,		1
From the third municipality of New Orleans,		1
From the first municipality of New Orleans,		1—3
Second congressional district:
From the second municipality of New Orleans, take		2
From the parish of Jefferson,		1
From the parish of Assumption,		1
" "	Lafourche Interior,	1—5
Third congressional district:
From the parish of Iberville, take		1

On motion of Mr. Dunn, the report of the committee on the bill of rights, was taken up.

Mr. Porter said that the sections reported under the title of a bill of rights, and which were now before the Convention, were not the production of his mind. They emanated from a source beyond his humble pretensions; from the most eminent of our public statesmen—the fathers of our republican institutions. Some gentlemen may be disposed to treat this subject with levity and indifference. He thought they were wrong. These princi-
