THE CENTURY DICTIONARY

PREPARED UNDER THE SUPERINTENDENCE OF

WILLIAM DWIGHT WHITNEY, PH. D., LL. D.

PROFESSOR OF COMPARATIVE PHILOLOGY AND SANSKRIT IN YALE UNIVERSITY

THE plan of "The Century Dictionary" includes three things: the construction of a general dictionary of the English language which shall be serviceable for every literary and practical use; a more complete collection of the technical terms of the various sciences, arts, trades, and professions than has yet been attempted; and the addition to the definitions proper of such related encyclopedic matter, with pictorial illustrations, as shall constitute a convenient book of general reference.

About 200,000 words will be defined. The Dictionary will be a practically complete record of all the noteworthy words which have been in use since English literature has existed, especially of all that wealth of new words and of applications of old words which has sprung from the development of the thought and life of the nineteenth century. It will record not merely the written language, but the spoken language as well (that is, all important provincial and colloquial words), and it will include (in the one alphabetical order of the Dictionary) abbreviations and such foreign words and phrases as have become a familiar part of English speech.

THE ETYMOLOGIES.

The etymologies have been written anew on a uniform plan, and in accordance with the established principles of comparative philology. It has been possible in many cases, by means of the fresh material at the disposal of the etymologist, to clear up doubts or difficulties hitherto resting upon the history of particular words, to decide definitely in favor of one of several suggested etymologies, to discard numerous current errors, and to give for the first time the history of many words of which the etymologies were previously unknown or erroneously stated. Beginning with the current accepted form of spelling, each important word has been traced back through earlier forms to its remotest known origin. The various prefixes and suffixes useful in the formation of English words are treated very fully in separate articles.

HOMONYMS.

Words of various origin and meaning but of the same spelling, have been distinguished by small superior figures ($^1$, $^2$, $^3$, etc.). In numbering these homonyms the rule has been to give precedence to the oldest or the most familiar, or to that one which is most nearly English in origin. The superior numbers apply not so much to the individual word as to the group or root to which it belongs, hence the different grammatical uses of the same homonym are numbered alike when they are separately entered in the Dictionary. Thus a verb and a noun of the same origin and the same present spelling receive the same superior number. But when two words of the same form and of the same radical origin now differ considerably in meaning, so as to be used as different words, they are separately numbered.

THE ORTHOGRAPHY.

Of the great body of words constituting the familiar language the spelling is determined by well-established usage, and, however accidental and unacceptable, in many cases, it may be, it is not the office of a dictionary like this to propose improvements, or to adopt those which have been proposed and have not yet won some degree of acceptance and use. But there are also considerable classes as to which usage is wavering, more than one form being sanctioned by excellent authorities, either in this country or Great Britain, or in both. Familiar examples are words ending in or or our (as labor, labour), in er or re (as center, centre), in ize or ise (as civilize, civilise); those having a single or double consonant after an unaccented vowel (as traveler, traveller), or spelled with e or with œ or æ (as hemorrhage, hæmorrhage); and so on. In such cases both forms are given, with an expressed preference for the briefer one or the one more accordant with native analogies.

THE PRONUNCIATION.

No attempt has been made to record all the varieties of popular or even educated utterance, or to report the determinations made by different recognized authorities. It has been necessary rather to make a selection of words to which alternative pronunciations should be accorded, and to give preference among these according to the circumstances of each particular case, in view of the general analogies and tendencies of English utterance. The scheme by which the pronunciation is indicated is quite simple, avoiding over-refinement in the discrimination of sounds, and being designed to be readily understood and used. (See Key to Pronunciation on back cover.)

DEFINITIONS OF COMMON WORDS.

In the preparation of the definitions of common words, there has been at hand, besides the material generally accessible to students of the language, a special collection of quotations selected for this work from English books of all kinds and of all periods of the language, which is probably much larger than any which has hitherto been made for the use of an English dictionary, except that accumulated for the Philological Society of London. Thousands of non-technical words, many of them occurring in the classics of the language, and thousands of meanings, many of them familiar, which have not hitherto been noticed by the dictionaries, have in this way been obtained. The arrangement of the definitions historically, in the order in which the senses defined have entered the language, has been adopted wherever possible.

THE QUOTATIONS.

These form a very large collection (about 200,000), representing all periods and branches of English literature. The classics of the language have been drawn upon, and valuable citations have been made from less famous authors in all departments of literature. American writers especially are represented in greater fullness than in any similar work. A list of authors and works (and editions) cited will be published with the concluding part of the Dictionary.

DEFINITIONS OF TECHNICAL TERMS.

Much space has been devoted to the special terms of the various sciences, fine arts, mechanical arts, professions, and trades, and much care has been bestowed upon their treatment. They have been collected by an extended search through all branches of literature, with the design of providing a very complete and many-sided technical dictionary. Many thousands of words have thus been gathered which have never before been recorded in a general dictionary, or even in special glossaries. To the biological sciences a degree of prominence has been given corresponding to the remarkable recent increase in their vocabulary. The new material in the departments of biology and zoölogy includes not less than five thousand words and senses not recorded even in special dictionaries. In the treatment of physical and mathematical sciences, of the mechanical arts and trades, and of the philological sciences, an equally broad method has been adopted. In the definition of theological and ecclesiastical terms, the aim of the Dictionary has been to present all the special doctrines of the different divisions of the Church in such a manner as to convey to the reader the actual intent of those who accept them. In defining legal terms the design has been to offer all the information that is needed by the general reader, and also to aid the professional reader by giving in a concise form all the important technical words and meanings. Special attention has also been paid to the definitions of the principal terms of painting, etching, engraving, and various other art-processes; of architecture, sculpture, archæology, decorative art, ceramics, etc.; of musical terms, nautical and military terms, etc.

ENCYCLOPEDIC FEATURES.

The inclusion of so extensive and varied a vocabulary, the introduction of special phrases, and the full description of things often found essential to an intelligible definition of their names, would alone have given to this Dictionary a distinctly encyclopedic character. It has, however, been deemed desirable to go somewhat further in this direction than these conditions render strictly necessary.

Accordingly, not only have many technical matters been treated with unusual fullness, but much practical information of a kind which dictionaries have hitherto excluded has been added. The result is that "The Century Dictionary" covers to a great extent the field of the ordinary encyclopedia, with this principal difference — that the information given is for the most part distributed under the individual words and phrases with which it is connected, instead of being collected under a few general topics. Proper names, both biographical and geographical, are of course omitted, except as they appear in derivative adjectives, as Darwinian from Darwin, or Indian from India. The alphabetical distribution of the encyclopedic matter under a large number of words will, it is believed, be found to be particularly helpful in the search for those details which are generally looked for in works of reference.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

The pictorial illustrations have been so selected and executed as to be subordinate to the text, while possessing a considerable degree of independent suggestiveness and artistic value. To secure technical accuracy, the illustrations have, as a rule, been selected by the specialists in charge of the various departments, and have in all cases been examined by them in proofs. The cuts number about six thousand.

MODE OF ISSUE, PRICE, ETC.

"The Century Dictionary" will be comprised in about 6,500 quarto pages. It is published by subscription and in twenty-four parts or sections, to be finally bound into six quarto volumes, if desired by the subscriber. These sections will be issued about once a month. The price of the sections is $2.50 each, and no subscriptions are taken except for the entire work.

The plan for the Dictionary is more fully described in the preface (of which the above is in part a condensation), which accompanies the first section, and to which reference is made.

A list of the abbreviations used in the etymologies and definitions, and keys to pronunciations and to signs used in the etymologies, will be found on the back cover-lining.

'of the sea'; cf. Gr. ἅλς, L. sal, the sea: see sal[1] and salt[1].] 1. A marine carnivorous mammal of the order Feræ, suborder Pinnipedia, and family Phocidæ or Otariidæ; any pinniped not a walrus—for example, a hair-seal, a fur-seal, an eared seal, of which there are numerous genera and species. Seals are regarded as carnivores modified for aquatic life. The modification is profound, and somewhat parallel with that which causes certain other mammals, the cetaceans and sirenians, to resemble fishes in the form of the body and in the nature of the limbs. But seals retain a coat of hair or fur like ordinary quadrupeds, and an expression of the face like that of other carnivores. The body is more or less fusiform, tapering like that of a fish. It is prone, and can scarcely be lifted from the ground, so short are the limbs. These are reduced to mere flippers, especially in the true Phocidæ, in which the hind legs extend backward and cannot be brought into the position usual to mammals, but resemble the flukes of a cetacean. In the otaries (Otariidæ) the limbs are freer and less constrained. The latter have small but evident external ears, wanting in the former. The monk-seal, Monachus albiventer, lives in the Mediterranean and neighboring Atlantic, and a related species, Monachus tropicalis, is found between the tropics in Central American and West Indian waters. Another seal, Phoca caspica, inhabits inland waters of the Caspian, Aral, and Baikal. But with few exceptions all seals are maritime and also extratropical. They are especially numerous in high latitudes of the northern hemisphere. Among the Phocidæ may be noted Phoca vitulina, the ordinary harbor-seal or sea-calf, common in British waters and along the Atlantic coast of the United States; it is often tamed and exhibited in aquaria, being gentle and docile, and capable of being taught to perform some amusing tricks; it is one of the smaller species, usually from 3 to 5 feet long, and being the best-known, as well as wide-ranging, it has many local and fanciful names. Phoca grœnlandica (Pagophilus grœnlandicus) is the Greenland seal, or harp-seal or saddleback, peculiarly colored, of large size, and an important object of the chase. Pagomys fœtidus is a smaller species, the ringed seal or floe-rat of Greenland. Erignathus barbatus is the great bearded or square-flippered seal of Greenland, attaining a length of 8 or 10 feet. Halichœrus gryphus is a great gray seal of both coasts of the North Atlantic, of about the dimensions of the last named. Histriophoca is a genus containing the banded seal or ribbon-seal, H. fasciata or H. equestris. All the foregoing are members of the subfamily Phocinæ. Cystophora cristata is the hooded, crested, or bladder-nosed seal; this is a large seal, but the largest is the sea-elephant, Macrorhinus proboscideus, of southern seas; and these two genera form the subfamily Cystophorinæ. Certain seals of the southern hemisphere, of the genera Lobodon, Stenorhynchus (or Ogmorhinus), Leptonyx (formerly Leptonyx), and Ommatophoca, form the subfamily Stenorhynchinæ; some of these are known as sea-leopards from their spotted coloration, and others as sterrincks. All the foregoing are Phocidæ, or earless seals, and they are also hair-seals. But the distinction between hair-seals and fur-seals is not, properly, that between Phocidæ and Otariidæ, but between those members of the latter family which do not and those which do have a copious under-fur of commercial value. The larger otaries are of the former character; they belong to the genera Otaria, Eumetopias, and Zalophus, are of great size, and are commonly called sea-lions; they are of both the northern and the southern hemisphere, chiefly in Pacific waters, and do not occur in the North Atlantic. The southern fur-seals or sea-bears are species of Arctocephalus, and among the smaller otaries. The fur-seal of most economic importance is the North Pacific sea-bear, Callorhinus ursinus. Some genera of fossil seals are described. See cuts under Cystophorinæ, Erignathus, Eumetopias, fur-seal, harp-seal, otary, Pagomys, Phoca, ribbon-seal, sea-elephant, sea-leopard, sea-lion, and Zalophus.

An impressed device, as of a letter, cipher, or figure, in lead, wax, paper, or other soft substance, affixed to a document in connection with or in place of a signature, as a mark of authenticity and confirmation, or for the purpose of fastening up the document in order to conceal the contents. In the middle ages seals were either impressed in wax run on the surface of the document, or suspended by cord or strips of parchment, as in the papal bulls. (See bull[2], 2.) In some jurisdictions an impression on the paper itself is now sufficient, and in others the letters L. S. (locus sigilli, the place of the seal) or a scroll or a mere bit of colored paper (see def. 3) are equivalent. In the United States the seal of a corporation or of a public officer may be by impression on the paper alone.

Great seal, a seal of state. The great seal of the United Kingdom of England and Scotland is used in sealing the writs to summon Parliament (Irish members included), also in sealing treaties with foreign states, and all other papers of great importance affecting the United Kingdom. The Lord Chancellor is the official custodian of the great seal; during a vacancy in the chancellorship it rests with an officer of equal dignity styled the Lord Keeper. The great seal of Ireland is used in the same manner as before the Union in 1800, except in the matter of summoning Parliament, etc. There is also a seal in Scotland for sealing grants and writs affecting private rights there. The great seal of the United States is placed in the custody of the Secretary of State; State seals usually are in the charge of the State secretaries.—Hermetic seal. See hermetic.—Keeper of the Privy Seal, or Lord Privy Seal. See keeper.—Leaden seal, a disk of lead pierced perpendicularly to its axis with two holes, through which are passed the ends of a twisted wire connecting two objects, as a hasp and staple. (c) In Eng. hist., an instrument imposing a forced loan: so called because it was authenticated by the clerk of the privy seal.

If the agreement of the grantee is considered as under seal, by reason of the deed being sealed by the grantor, it falls within the settled rule of the common law.
Supreme Court Reporter, X. 832.

Cf. sation, a doublet of season. In def. 3 the noun is from the verb.] 1. A particular period of time. Specifically—(a) One of the periods into which the year is naturally divided by the annual motion of the sun in declination, or by the resulting characteristics of temperature, moisture, conditions of vegetation, and the like. Astronomically the year is divided into four nearly equal seasons, spring, summer, autumn, and winter, reckoned solely with respect to the sun's motion—spring beginning when the sun crosses the equator going northward, summer when it reaches the summer solstice, autumn when it crosses the equator going southward, and winter when it reaches the winter solstice. But popularly and historically the seasons refer to the four well-marked periods which in temperate regions are exhibited in the annual changes of climate and stages of vegetation. In consequence, the times of division and the duration of the seasons are entirely conventional, and are adjusted in terms of the monthly calendar in accordance with the local climate. In the United States and Canada spring is considered to begin with the first of March, and summer, autumn, and winter with the first of June, September, and December respectively. In Great Britain spring is regarded as beginning with February, summer with May, etc. In the southern hemisphere the summer season is simultaneous with the northern winter, and the periods of the other seasons are similarly interchanged. Within the tropics the annual variation of temperature is not so marked as that of humidity and rainfall, and, according to the locality, sometimes two, sometimes three, and sometimes four climatic seasons are distinguished, termed the rainy season, the dry season, etc.

It had but one large string, made of gut, stretched over a peculiar bridge, and tuned to a low pitch, usually about that of the second C below middle C. The bridge was made so as to rest firmly on only one foot, the other being free to vibrate upon the body. The instrument was played with a large bow, like that of a violoncello. The tones used were the natural harmonics of the string, produced by lightly touching the nodes. Its scale therefore coincided with that of the trumpet; and this fact, taken in connection with its general shape, probably suggested its name. It was used for both sacred and secular music, both alone and in sets of three or four. It was especially common in nunneries as an accompaniment for singing, since its tones corresponded in pitch with those of the female voice. The latest specimens date from early in the eighteenth century. The instrument is important in connection with the development of the viol. Also marine trumpet, tromba marina, nuns'-fiddle, etc.

That which is secondary, properly speaking, differs from anything subsidiary or subordinate in that the latter only serves to enable the primary to fulfil its function, while the secondary thing fulfils a similar but less important function. Thus, a subsidiary purpose is a means to an ultimate end; but a secondary purpose or end is a weaker motive reinforcing a stronger one.

The secondary qualities are properly fourteen in number—namely, hesvy and light, dense and rare, thick and thin, hard and soft, sticky and friable, rough and smooth, coherent and slippery. Color, smell, and taste are also secondary qualities. (b) In modern philos., since Galileo (who in 1623 calls the qualities known as primary "primi accidenti") and Boyle (who in 1666 uses the term "secondary qualities, if I may so call them," in precisely the modern signification), affections of bodies; affective, patible, sensible qualities; imputed qualities; qualities of bodies relative to the organs of sense, as color, taste, smell, etc.: opposed to those characters (called primary qualities, though properly speaking they are not qualities at all) which we cannot imagine bodies as wanting. 3. An officer of state who is charged with the superintendence and management of a particular department of government. (a) In the British government there are five secretaries of state—namely, those for the home, foreign, colonial, war, and Indian departments. The Secretary of State for the Home Department has charge of the privy signet office, and is responsible for the internal administration of justice, the maintenance of peace in the country, the supervision of prisons, police, sanitary affairs, etc. The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs conducts all correspondence with foreign states, negotiates treaties, appoints ambassadors, etc. The Colonial Secretary performs for the colonial dependencies similar functions to those of the Home Secretary for the United Kingdom. The Secretary of State for War, assisted by the commander-in-chief, has the entire control of the army; the office dates from 1855, when the office of Secretary at War was merged into it. The Secretary for India governs the affairs of that country with the assistance of a council. Each secretary of state is assisted by two under-secretaries, one permanent and the other connected with the administration. The Chief Secretary for Ireland is not a secretary of state, though his office entails the performance of duties similar to those performed by the secretaries of state. (b) In the United States government six of the executive departments are presided over by secretaries—namely, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture—all members of the cabinet; their duties are described under the names of their respective departments. (See department.) Each State has also its Secretary of State, or corresponding officer.

secretary-bird (sek′rē-tā-ri-bėrd), n. A remarkable raptorial bird of Africa, with very long legs; the serpent-eater or crane-vulture. This bird appears to have been first named Sagittarius by Vosmaer in 1769; it is le secrétaire, le messager, and le mangeur de serpens of early French writers, and Falco serpentarius, Vultur serpentarius, Otis secretarius, and Vultur secretarius of ornithologists of the last century. Between 1797 and 1817 four different generic names were based upon this type (see Sagittarius); and since 1800 five specific names have been added (reptilivorus, africanus, capensis, gambiensis, and, erroneously, philippensis)—the various combinations of the New Latin generic and specific names being now about twenty. The earliest tenable generic name (see onym) is Serpentarius of Cuvier; the earliest tenable specific name is serpentarius (Miller, 1785). Some strict constructionists of nomenclatural rules would combine these in the tautology of Serpentarius serpentarius, a form which has been introduced sparingly into the present work, simply to recognize its existence. The next specific name in chronological order is secretarius of Scopoli, 1786, yielding with the proper generic name the unexceptionable onym Serpentarius secretarius. The name secretary refers to the bird's crest, which when lying smoothly on the head has been likened to a scribe's pen stuck over the ear; and this is also the explanation of Sagittarius. The term crane- vulture (a reflection of Illiger's genus Gypogeranus) indicates the long legs like those of a grallatorial bird; Serpentarius, Ophiotheres, and reptilivorus describe the bird's characteristic habit of feeding upon snakes. Most of the remaining designations are place-names (one of them, philippensis, a blunder). The systematic position of this isolated type has been much discussed. It has usually been put in the Raptores, as a member of either of the families Falconidæ or Vulturidæ, or as forming a separate family called Serpentariidæ or Gypogeranidæ. Cuvier put the bird among waders, next to the boat-billed herons (Cancroma). The late Dr. H. Schlegel of Leyden thought it was a goshawk, and called it Astur secretarius. The expert of the British Museum in the latest official lists locates it next to the cariama (which is transferred to the family Falconidæ on the strength of the supposed relationship). The appearance of the secretary-bird is somewhat suggestive of the hoactzin (see cuts under hoactzin and Opisthocomus). It is about 4 feet long from the tip of the bill to the end of the tail; the wing from the carpal joint to the point measures 25 inches; the tail is about as long as this, the tarsus 13½ inches. The general color is ashy-gray; the flight-feathers, the feathered part of the legs, and the lower belly are black; the breast and under wing- and tail-coverts are whitish, more or less shaded with ashy; the two middle tail-feathers are longer than the rest, white-tipped, and with subterminal black bar. There is a bare orange-yellow space about the eyes; the iris is hazel; the shanks are flesh-colored. The long crest of black or gray black-tipped feathers springs from the hindhead and nape; these feathers are somewhat spatulate, and dispart when the crest is erected under excitement. The serpent-eater has a very capacious gullet and crop, capable of holding at once several snakes two or three feet long; it also eats other reptiles, as lizards, frogs, toads, and young tortoises. It is said to attack large serpents by grasping them in its talons and striking blows with the wings until it can deal a decisive thrust with the beak upon the head of its prey. The bird has often been tamed by the Dutch colonists, and kept to rid their premises of vermin.

2. In animal and vegetable physiol., to produce, prepare, or elaborate by the process of secretion — the product thus derived from the blood or sap being a substance not previously existing, the character of which depends upon the kind of organ which acts, or on the manner in which the secretory operation is carried on.

In physiol.: (a) In animal physiology, the process of preparing and separating substances by glandular activity. The product or secretion usually consists of substances previously existing in the blood, such as water, salts, etc., combined with others which have been elaborated by the glandular epithelium from more or less different substances in the blood. The secretion may be eliminated from the body as detrimental, as urine, or it may be used, as the digestive secretions, to serve requirements of the organism or (as the milk) those of its offspring. Secretions which are merely eliminated as detrimental are called excretions. The act of secreting seems, in most instances at least, to be a vital act of the glandular epithelium, and is often, if not always, under direct nervous control. (b) In vegetable physiology, the process by which substances are separated from the sap of vegetables. The descending sap of plants is not merely subservient to nutrition, but furnishes various matters which are secreted or separated from its mass, and afterward elaborated by particular organs. These secretions are exceedingly numerous, and constitute the great bulk of the solid parts of plants. They have been divided into — (1) general or nutritious secretions, the component parts of which are gum, sugar, starch, lignin, albumen, and gluten; and (2) special or non-assimilable secretions, which may be arranged under the heads of acids, alkalis, neuter principles, resinous principles, coloring matters, milks, oils, resins, etc.

Sp. secta = Pg. secta, seita = It. setta, a sect in philosophy or religion, < LL. secta, a sect in philosophy or religion, a school, party, faction, class, gild, band, particularly a heretical doctrine or sect; in ML. in general a following, suite, a suit at law, a part, train, series, order, suit of clothes, etc.; L. secta, a school or set of doctrines (in philosophy), in earliest use a mode of life, a way, most frequently in the phrase sectam (alicujus) sequi or persequi, 'follow (some one's) way' (whence sectam (alicujus) secuti, 'those following (some one's) way,' one's party, sect, or faction), where secta is prop. 'a way, road,' lit. 'a way cut through,' being orig. pp., secta (sc. via, way), fem. of sectus, pp. of secare, cut, as used in the phrase secare viam, take one's way, travel one's road, lit. 'cut one's way' (cf. Gr. τέμνειν ὁδόν, cut one's way, take one's way): see secant, sect[2], section. Cf. ML. rupta, a way, road, orig. a road broken through a forest: see rout[5], route[1], rut[1]. The L. secta has been explained otherwise: (a) According to Skeat and others, lit. 'a follower' (= Gr. ἑπέτης, a follower), with formative -ta, < sequi (√sequ, sec- as in secundus, etc.) (= Gr. ἕπεσθαι), follow: see sequent. But secta is never used in the sense of 'follower,' and the phrase sectam alicujus sequi cannot be translated 'follow some one's follower.' (b) L. secta, lit. 'a following,' formed from sequi as above; but this is equally untenable. The notion of 'a following,' however, has long been present in the use of the word, as in the ML. senses: see above, and cf. sectator, suit, suite, ult. < L. sequi, follow. (c) The notion that L. secta is lit. 'a party cut off,' namely from the true, orthodox, or established church, and thus implies schism and heresy (cf. sect[2]), is entirely groundless. Cf. sept[1].] 1. A system or body of doctrines or opinions held by a number of persons and constituting the distinctive doctrines of a school, as propounded originally by the founder or founders of the school and (usually) developed or modified by later adherents; also and usually, the body of persons holding such doctrines or opinions; a school of philosophy or of philosophers: as, the sect of Epicurus; the sect of the Epicureans.

As of the secte of which that he was born
He kepte his lay, to which that he was sworn.
Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 10.

Dryden.

When philosophers in after-times embraced our religion, they blended it often with the peculiar notions of those sects in which they had been educated, and by that means corrupted the purity and simplicity of the Christian doctrine.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. lv.

2. A party or body of persons who unite in holding certain special doctrines or opinions concerning religion, which distinguish them from others holding the same general religious belief; a distinct part of the general body of persons claiming the same religious name or origin; especially, such a party of innovators, differing in their beliefs from those who support the older or orthodox views; a party or faction in a religious body; a separate ecclesiastical organization; an ecclesiastical denomination: as, the sects of the Jewish religion (which were not separately organized); the sects of the Christian church (usually separately organized); Mohammedan sects; Buddhist sects. The Latin word secta, from which the English word sect is derived, did not at first become limited in Christian usage to a specific meaning. It was used for 'way,' 'mode of life,' etc., but also for the Greek αἵρεσις (Latin hæresis, the original of the English word heresy), signifying 'a school of philosophy, opinion, or doctrine,' especially peculiar or erroneous doctrine. A familiar application was to the sect of Christians, as distinguished from Jews and pagans. In four of the nine passages in which αἵρεσις is found in the New Testament, the Vulgate has hæresis, in the other five secta. In Acts xxiv. 14 it has "the way (sectam) which they call heresy (hæresim)." The use of secta in these passages led to the meaning of 'a separate or heretical body,' which is found in writers of the fourth century, and by desynonymization secta emphasized the organization and hæresis the doctrine. Afterward it came to be supposed that the word secta meant, etymologically, 'a party cut off'; hence the more or less opprobrious use of sect by many writers. It is often used, however, unopprobriously, in a sense substantially identical with the original sense, to signify 'a body of persons who agree in a particular set of doctrines.'

This newe secte of Lollardie.

In the section of bodies we find man, of all sensible creatures, to have the fullest brain to his proportion, and that it was so provided by the Supreme Wisdom, for the lodging of the intellective faculties.
Sir H. Wotton, Reliquiæ, p. 80.

2. A part cut or separated, or regarded as separated, from the rest; a division; a portion. Specifically—(a) A distinct part or division of a book or writing; a subdivision of a chapter; a division of a law or other writing; a paragraph. (b) In music, one of the equal and more or less similar divisions or parts of a melody or movement. The term is used inconsistently to describe either the half of a phrase or a double phrase. (c) A distinct part of a country or nation, community, class, or the like; a part of territory separated by geographical lines or of a people considered as distinct.

The extreme section of one class consists of bigoted dotards, the extreme section of the other consists of shallow and reckless empirics. Macaulay.

I add, too, that all the protection which, consistently with the Constitution and the laws, can be given, will be cheerfully given to all the States, when lawfully demanded, for whatever cause—as cheerfully to one section as to another. Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 113.

3. The curve of intersection of two surfaces.—4. A representation of an object as it would appear if cut by any intersecting plane, showing the internal structure; a diagram or picture showing what would appear were a part cut off by a plane supposed to pass through an object, as a building, a machine, a biological structure, or a succession of strata. In mechanical drawing, a longitudinal section usually presents the object as cut through its center lengthwise and vertically, a cross-section or transverse section as cut crosswise and vertically, and a horizontal section as cut through its center horizontally. Oblique sections are made at various angles. Sections are of great importance in geology, as it is largely by their aid that the relations and positions of the various members of the different formations, both stratified and unstratified, are made intelligible. The geological structure of any region is best indicated by one or more cross-sections on which the groups of rocks are represented in the order in which they occur and with the proper dips, as well as the irregularities due to faults, crust-movements, and invasions by igneous masses, by which causes the stratigraphy of a region may be made so complicated and obscure as to be unintelligible without such assistance to its comprehension as is afforded by cross-sections.

5. A thin slice of an organic or inorganic substance cut off, as for microscopic examination.—6. In zoöl., a classificatory group of no fixed grade or taxonomic rank; a division, series, or group of animals: used, like group, differently by different authors. Sections, cohorts, phalanges, tribes, etc., are frequently introduced between the family and the order, or between the family and the genus; but it is commoner to speak of sections of a genus (i. e., subgenera). The sense corresponds to that of the word coup as much used by French zoölogists. The sections of many English entomologists often correspond to families as they are understood in continental Europe and the United States.

7. In bot., a group of species subordinate to a genus: nearly the same as subgenus (which see).—8. In fort., the outline of a cut made at any angle to the principal lines other than a right angle.—9. A rock is massive when it has no structure indicating an aqueous origin; it is sedimentary when its appearance indicates that it is made up of the detritus of other rocks, eroded and carried away by watery currents, to be deposited in another place. All sedimentary rocks are made up of the fragments of the original crust of the earth, of eruptive materials which have come up through this crust from below, or of other sedimentary beds which, having been deposited, have again in their turn been subjected to erosion and redeposition. It is in sedimentary rocks that organic remains are found; in the original crust of the earth, or in volcanic materials, traces of life could not be expected to occur.—Sedimentary cataract, a soft cataract, in which the denser parts have subsided.

But it is not essential to the offense of sedition that it threaten the very existence of the state or its authority in its entire extent. Thus, there are seditious assemblies, seditious libels, etc., as well as direct and indirect threats and acts amounting to sedition—all of which are punishable as misdemeanors by fine and imprisonment.

Thus have I evermore been burdened with the word of sedition. Latimer, 3d Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

Sedum (sē'dum), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. sedum, houseleek.] 1. A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Crassulaceæ. It is characterized by flowers with a four- or five-lobed calyx, the same number of separate petals, twice as many stamens alternately adnate to the petals, and a number of small scales inserted beneath the four or five ovaries, the latter containing numerous ovules and ripening into separate follicles. There are about 150 species, natives of north temperate and frigid regions, rare in America, where one occurs in Peru, and in the United States 16 or more, chiefly in the mountains, with 3 others naturalized in the east. They are usually smooth herbs, either erect or decumbent, often tufted or moss-like, and remarkable for their fleshy stems and leaves. The latter are of very varied shapes, usually entire or but slightly toothed, and either opposite, alternate, or whorled. The flowers are borne in cymes, usually white, yellow, or pink, sometimes purplish or blue. Many species are common in dry, barren, or rocky places where little else will grow. The 10 British species and some of the American are known as stonecrop. Many others, known in cultivation by the generic name, and favorites for ornamenting rockwork, filling vases, and covering walls, are valued for the permanence of their foliage, which resists drought. Several with stiff rosettes of thick leaves are used for bedding out in summer, or employed for decorative borders and to form permanent designs, mottos, and lettering. Many similar Mexican plants so used, and commonly confused with these, belong to the subgenus Echeveria of the related genus Cotyledon, and are distinguished by their united five-furrowed corolla-tube. A similar habit occurs in the related genus Sempervivum. Several other species are in cultivation for their pink, purple, or scarlet flowers, and others for their variegated leaves mottled with white or yellow. A few are dioecious, and have flat, thinner leaves, forming the subgenus Rhodiola, the rhodia of medieval shops. (See roseroot and heal-all.) Many species are remarkable for persistence of life, cut stems growing and even flowering when fastened on a wall, deriving nourishment from reserves in their lower leaves and succulent stem, especially S. Telephium (for which see orpine, 2), also called live-for-ever and livelong, and known as Aaron's-rod because sometimes growing when pressed and apparently dried, and as midsummer-men because formerly used for divination on midsummer eve by setting up two stems to see if the one representing the lover will turn to the other. S. acre, the English wall-pepper, bird's-bread, creeping-jack, or pricket, an emetic and cathartic, is often cultivated in America as moss, golden-moss, or love-entangle, and S. Sieboldii, a Japanese species valued for its grayish-green whorled leaves, as constancy; S. rupestre is known in England as jealousy; and for S. Anacampseros, see herb of friendship, under herb. S. album, formerly esteemed in medicine and eaten cooked or as a salad, is known as worm-grass and prickmadam. S. pulchellum of the southern United States is sometimes cultivated under the name of widow's-cross. S. ternatum, the wild stonecrop of rocky places in Pennsylvania and southward, with white flowers and rounded ornamental leaves in threes, is also often cultivated. S. telephioides, from the Potomac southward, and the roseroot, in the Rocky Mountains and arctic America, are conspicuous on account of their growth in multitudes on high ledges of dry mountain-cliffs.

2. [l. c.] A plant of the genus Sedum: extended by very early writers to the houseleek and other crassulaceous plants. Sometimes written cedum.

And beestes wicke away thus may me kepe.

2. The seat of a bishop, whether an ordinary bishop, or a bishop of higher rank (metropolitan, etc., patriarch, pope); the local center of a diocese and of diocesan authority, or of a diocese and other subordinate dioceses; the city or locality from which ecclesiastical jurisdiction is exercised; hence, episcopal rank, authority, and jurisdiction as exercised from a permanent local center. The word see, from meaning any seat of dignity, came to apply specifically to the cathedra, or episcopal throne, situated in a cathedral, thence to the city which contained the cathedral and was the chief city of a bishop's diocese, and so in modern usage to the diocese itself. It differs from diocese, however, in that diocese represents the territorial province for the care of which the bishop is responsible (that is, where his duties lie), whereas see is the local seat of his authority, dignity, and episcopal privileges. Both words differ from bishopric, in that bishopric represents the bishop's office, whether actual or nominal. See throne.

The fertilized and matured ovule of the higher or flowering plants. It is a body within the pericarp or seed-vessel, containing an organized embryo, or nucleus, which, on being placed under favorable circumstances, develops into an individual similar to that from which it came. The reproductive bodies of the lower or flowerless plants (cryptogams) differ in their mode of germination and in other ways, and are not called true seeds, but spores. (See spore.) The seed-coats are those of the ovule — two, or rarely only one. The outer, answering to the primine, is the more firm and is not rarely crustaceous in texture, and takes the name of testa (also spermoderm and episperm). The inner, answering to the secundine, is called tegmen (sometimes endopleura); when present, it is always conformed to the nucleus, and is thin or soft and delicate in texture. The seed-stalk or podosperm, when there is one, is the pedicel or attachment of the seed to the placenta, and answers to the funiculus of the ovule. The chalaza, raphe, and hilum of the ovule retain the same names in the seed. The foramen of the ovule is called the micropyle in the seed. The terms which denote the position of the ovule, such as orthotropous, anatropous, amphitropous, etc., also apply equally to the resulting seed. The nucleus may consist of the embryo alone, or of the embryo and the albumen, which is the nourishing substance upon which the developing plant is to feed until it is capable of maintaining itself. See the various terms, and cuts under anatropous, campylotropal, Cruciferæ, ovary, and plumule.

=Syn. 2. Seem, Look, Appear. Look differs from seem only in more vividly suggesting the use of the eye, literally or figuratively: as, it looks (or seems) right. Appear is somewhat stronger, having sometimes the sense of coming into view or coming to seem. Each may stand for that which is probably true, or in opposition to that which is true: not to seem, but to be; the seeming and the real. Should seem and would seem are equally correct, but differ in strength. To say that a thing should seem to be true is to say that it ought to seem so or almost necessarily seems so; to say that it would seem true is to say that, while there are reasons for holding an opposite view, the preponderance of evidence is on the side of its being true.

II. trans. To separate or divide into segments: as, a segmented cell.

segmenta, n. Plural of segmentum.

segmental (seg'men-tal), a. [< segment + -al.] 1. Having the form of the segment of a circle; being a segment: as, a segmental arch.—2. Of or pertaining to segments or segmentation: as, a segmental formula; segmental parts; segmental organs.—3. Specifically, in embryol., noting the primitive and rudimentary renal organs which occur in all vertebrates and some invertebrates, consisting in the former of branched tubules opening at one end into the somatic cavity and at the other by one or more main ducts into the cloaca or hindgut. The segmental organs of a vertebrate are divisible into three parts, anterior, middle, and posterior. The foremost is the head-kidney or pronephron, whose duct becomes a Müllerian duct. The next is the Wolffian body proper, or mesonephron, whose duct is the Wolffian duct. The last or hindmost is the rudiment of the permanent kidney, whose duct is the ureter; this is the metanephron. The epithet segmental in this sense was originally used to note the kind of renal or excretory organs which annelids, as worms and leeches, possess, in more or fewer of the segments of the body, whence the name; it was subsequently extended to the above-described embryonic renal organs of vertebrates which are replaced by permanent kidneys—these segmental organs being thus loosely synonymous with primitive kidney, Wolffian body, and protonephron. See cut under leech.

segmentally (seg'men-tal-i), adv. In a segmental manner; in segments: as, the spinal nerves are arranged segmentally.

These organs, being . . . segmentally arranged, are termed segmental organs or nephridia.

segmentary (seg'men-tā-ri), a. [< segment + -ary[1].] Segmental; pertaining to or indicating segments: especially noting in entomology colored bands, rings, or other marks on the abdomen, corresponding to successive segments, as in many Lepidoptera.—Segmentary geometry. See geometry.

segmentate (seg'men-tāt), a. [< L. segmentatus, ornamented with strips of tinsel, lit. having segments, < segmentum, a segment: see segment.] Having segments; segmented. Encyc. Brit., II. 292.

segmentation (seg-men-tā'shon), n. [< segment + -ation.] The act of cutting into segments; a division into segments; the condition of being divided into segments; the manner in which a segmented part is divided.—Segmentation cavity, in embryol., the central space inclosed by the blastomeres of the embryo, before the formation of a gastrula by invagination; the hollow of a blastosphere; a blastocœle.—Segmentation nucleus, the nucleus of an impregnated ovum or germ-cell, resulting from fusion of a male and a female pronucleus, and capable of undergoing segmentation.—Segmentation of the vitellus, in embryol., yolk-cleavage; morulation; the first process of germination of the ovum of any metazoic animal, by which the original single cell of which the ovum primitively consists becomes converted, wholly or in part, into a mass of similar cells, constituting a morula or mulberry-mass. The cells thus formed are specified as cleavage-cells, blastomeres, or segmentella. Segmentation goes on in different cases with some variations, chiefly due to the presence of food-yolk and the position of this yolk relatively to the formative yolk (see centrolecithal, ectolecithal). Total segmentation is necessarily restricted to holoblastic ova; it is distinguished from the partial segmentation of meroblastic ova (see holoblastic, meroblastic), the terms meaning respectively that all, or that only some, of the yolk segments. Total segmentation is equal or regular when the whole germ-cell divides into two similar cleavage-cells, and these into four, and so on, the resulting gastrula being the archigastrula. Total segmentation is unequal or irregular when the cleavage-cells are unlike one another; it results in the amphigastrula. The partial segmentation of meroblastic eggs is always unequal, and either discoidal with formation of a discogastrula, or superficial and forming a perigastrula. Total equal segmentation is also styled primitive, primordial, and palingenetic, the modifications introduced in unequal and partial segmentation being described as kenogenetic. Other terms, descriptive rather than definitive, are used by different writers; the foregoing is nearly Haeckel's nomenclature. See egg[1], ovum, vitellus, and cuts under gastrula and gastrulation.—Segmentation rhythm, the rate of production of successive cleavage-cells, or their numerical ratio of increase, whether 2, 4, 8, 16, 32, etc., or any other mode of multiplication.—Segmentation sphere, a ball of cleavage-cells; a blastosphere; a morula.

segmented (seg'men-ted), a. [< segment + -ed[2].] Divided into segments, segmenta, or segmentella; characterized by or exhibiting segmentation; somitic; metameric: thus, the body of a vertebrate is segmented according to the number of vertebræ, whether any actual division of parts may be evident or not.

segmentellum (seg-men-tel'um), n.; pl. segmentella (-ä). [NL., dim. of L. segmentum, a cutting: see segment.] One of the cleavage-cells which result from segmentation of the vitellus of a fecundated ovum: same as blastomere. See cut under gastrulation.

Such a saw having a diameter of 60 inches would be about 16 inches thick at the arbor—the object being to bend the veneers out like a thin shaving as they are sawed from the log.

If government, however, throws the expense of coinage, as is reasonable, upon the holders, by making a charge to cover the expense (which is done by giving back rather less in coin than is received in bullion, and is called "levying a seigniorage"), the coin will rise to the extent of the seigniorage above the value of the bullion. *J. See seismometer.

seismograph (sīs′mō-gràf), n. [< Gr. σεισμός, an earthquake, + γράφειν, write.] Same as seismometer (which see). The more complicated forms of instruments contrived for the purpose of recording the phenomena of earthquakes are sometimes called seismographs, and sometimes seismometers. The name seismograph was first employed in reference to the elaborate seismometer contrived by Palmieri and used at his station on Mount Vesuvius. This was called by him a "sismografo," and this name has generally been Englished as seismograph, which is also the designation most generally applied by the members of the Seismological Society of Japan to the seismometers there contrived and used within the past few years.

seismographer (sīs-mog′rạ-fèr), n. Same as seismologist. [Rare.]

seismologue (sīs′mō-log), n. [< Gr. σεισμός, an earthquake, + -λόγος, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] A catalogue of earthquake observations; a detailed account of earthquake phenomena.

> R. Mallet, in Admiralty Manual of Scientific Enquiry (3d [ed.]), p. 327.

seismometer (sīs-mom′e-tèr), n. [< Gr. σεισμός, an earthquake, + μέτρον, a measure: see meter[1].] An instrument by the aid of which the data are obtained for the scientific study of earthquake phenomena. The forms of instruments used for this purpose are varied, and more or less complicated, in accordance with the wishes and means of the observer. A common bowl partly filled with a viscid fluid, like molasses, which, on being thrown by the earthquake-wave against the side of the bowl, leaves a visible record of the event, is one of the simplest forms of seismometer which have been proposed, as giving a rude approximation to the direction of the horizontal element of the wave. Another simple form of seismometer consists of two sets of cylinders, each set numbering from six to twelve, and the individual cylinders in each uniformly decreasing in size. These are placed on end, one set at right angles to the other, on plates resting on a hard horizontal floor, surrounded by a bed of dry sand, in which the cylinders when overthrown will rest, exactly in the position originally given by the shock. This instrument is theoretically capable of giving the velocity of the horizontal component of the shock, its surface-direction in azimuth, or the direction of the horizontal component of the seismic wave, and also the direction of translation of the wave. In practice, however, the results given by this simple and inexpensive apparatus have not been found satisfactory. The seismometer now most generally used in large observatories, or those where accurate work is expected, involves Zöllner's horizontal pendulum, the use of which was proposed many years ago, but which was put into the present practical form by Messrs. Ewing and Gray. The group of instruments constituting the seismometer of Prof. J. A. Ewing is arranged to give a complete record of every particular of the earthquake movement, by resolving it into three rectangular components—one vertical and two horizontal—and registering these by three distinct pointers on a sheet of smoked glass which is made to revolve uniformly by clockwork, the clock being started by an arrangement similar to that of the Palmieri seismoscope. To this is added another clock which gives the date of the shock and the interval which has elapsed since it took place. Another and simpler form of seismometer designed by Mr. Ewing, and called the "duplex-pendulum seismograph," does not show the vertical element of the disturbance, nor exhibit anything of the relation of time to displacement; but it is in other respects satisfactory in its performance. Of this latter form, fifteen sets were in use in Japan in 1886, and others were being made for other countries. Compare seismograph, and see cut under seismoscope.

> Instruments which will in this way measure or write down the earth's motions are called seismometers or seismographs. Milne, Earthquakes, p. 13.

seismometric (sīs-mō-met′rik), a. [< seismometr-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to seismometry or the seismometer; used in or made, produced, or observed by means of a seismometer: as, seismometric instruments; seismometric observations.

seismometrical (sīs-mō-met′ri-kạl), a. [< seismometric + -al.] Same as seismometric.

seismoscope (sīs′mō-skōp), n. [< Gr. σεισμός, an earthquake, + σκοπεῖν, view.] A name of the simpler form of seismometer. It is generally so arranged that the exact moment of passage is noted by stopping a clock, either by direct mechanical means or by the use of an electric current. The epoch may also be registered on a revolving cylinder or other similar device. The essential part of a seismoscope usually consists of a delicately suspended or balanced mass, the configuration of which is readily disturbed on the passage of the seismic wave.

> To construct an instrument which at the time of an earthquake shall move and leave a record of its motion, there is but little difficulty. Contrivances of this kind are called seismoscopes. Milne, Earthquakes, p. 13.

(a) In Cuvier's system of classification, the first family of Chondropterygii branchiis fixis, having the palatines and lower jaw alone armed with teeth and supplying the place of jaws (the usual bones of which are reduced to mere vestiges). (b) In Cope's system, a subclass of fishes characterized by the articulation of the hyomandibular bone with the cranium, the absence of opercular or pelvic bones, and the development of derivative radii sessile on the sides of the basal bones of the limbs and rarely entering into articulation. (c) In Gill's system, a class of ichthyopsid vertebrates characterized by the absence of dermal or membrane bones from the head and shoulder-girdle, the existence of a cartilaginous cranium, a well-developed brain, and a heart composed of an auricle and a ventricle. It includes the sharks, rays, and chimeras, the first two of these constituting the subclass Plagiostomi, the third the subclass Holocephali. (d) In Jordan's system, a subclass of Elasmobranchii, containing the sharks and such other selachians as the rays or skates, or the Squali and the Raiæ, together contrasted with the chimeras or Holocephali. They have the gill-openings in the form of slits, five, six, or seven in number on each side; and the jaws distinct from the rest of the skull. The Selachii correspond to the Plagiostomata. Also Selacha, Selachia.

It has been divided by Haswell into the Palæoselachii and the Neoselachii.

See Polyodontidæ, and cut under paddle-fish.

selachostomous (sel-ą-kos'tō-mus), a. [< NL. selachostomus, < Gr. σέλαχος, a shark, + στόμα, mouth.] Shark-mouthed; specifically, of or pertaining to the Selachostomi.

Selagineæ (sel-ą-jin'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Jussieu, 1806), < Selago (-gin-) + -eæ.] A small order of gamopetalous plants, of the cohort Lamiales. It is characterized by flowers with a corolla of five or sometimes four equal or unequal spreading lobes, four didynamous or two equal stamens, one-celled anthers, and a superior one- or two-celled ovary, forming one or two small nutlets in fruit, often with a fleshy surface and corky furrowed or perforated interior, investing a pendulous cylindrical seed with fleshy albumen. It is distinguished from the related order Scrophularineæ by its solitary ovules, from Labiatæ and Verbenaceæ by an embryo with a superior micropyle and radicle, and from its ally the Myoporineæ by habit and terminal inflorescence. It includes about 140 species belonging to 8 genera, of which Selago is the type. They are natives of the Old World beyond the tropics, chiefly diminutive heath-like shrubs of South Africa, with alternate, narrow, and rigid leaves, and small flowers grouped in terminal spikes or dense globular heads, commonly white or blue, rarely yellow.

Selaginella (sē-laj-i-nel'ą), n. [NL. (Spring), dim. of L. Selago, a genus separated from Lycopodium (-gin-), lycopodium: see Selago.] A genus of heterosporous vascular cryptogams, typical of the Selaginellaceæ and Selaginelleæ. They have the general habit of Lycopodium (the ground-pine, club-moss, etc.), differing from it mainly by the dimorphic spores. The stems are copiously branched, trailing, suberect, sarmentose, or scandent; in shape they are more or less distinctly quadrangular, with the faces angled or flat. The leaves are small, with a single central vein, usually tetrastichous and dimorphous, and more or less oblique, the two rows of the lower plane larger and more spreading, the two rows of the upper ascending, adpressed, and imbricated; spikes usually tetrastichous, often sharply square, at the end of leafy branches; microsporangia numerous; macrosporangia few, and confined to the base of the spike. About 335 species have been described, from the warmer parts of the globe. Many species are cultivated in conservatories, and numerous forms have resulted. S. lepidophylla is well known under the name resurrection-plant, and is also called rock-lily or rock-rose.

Fertile Plant of Selaginella lepidophylla.

Selaginellaceæ (sē-laj"i-ne-lā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Selaginella + -aceæ.] A group of heterosporous vascular cryptogamous plants, by some called an order, by others raised to the rank of a class coördinate with the Rhizocarpeæ, Lycopodiaceæ, Filices, etc. It embraces only 2 genera, Selaginella and Isoëtes (which see for characterization).

Selaginelleæ (sē-laj-i-nel'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Selaginella + -eæ.] A group of heterosporous vascular cryptogams. By many writers employed as an interchangeable synonym with Selaginellaceæ, by others regarded as an order under the class Selaginellaceæ. It embraces the single genus Selaginella.

Selago (sē-lā'gō), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < L. selago, a similarly dwarf but unrelated plant, Lycopodium Selago.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, type of the order Selagineæ. It is characterized by flowers with a two- to five-lobed calyx, nearly regular or somewhat two-lipped corolla, four didynamous and perfect stamens, and a two-celled ovary which separates into two nutlets in fruit. There are about 95 species, all South African except one in tropical Africa and one, S. muralis, growing on the walls of the capital of Madagascar. They are dwarf heath-like shrubs, sometimes small annuals, often low and diffuse, and with many slender branchlets. They bear narrow leaves, commonly alternate and clustered in the axils, and sessile flowers in dense or slender spikes.

(Vulgate), < Heb. selāh, of unknown meaning; connected by Gesenius with sālāh, rest.] A transliterated Hebrew word, occurring in the Psalms frequently, and in Habakkuk iii.: probably a direction in the musical rendering of the passage. It is explained by most authorities as meaning 'Pause,' but occurs also at the end of psalms.

Selandria (sē-lan'dri-ą), n. [NL. (Leach, 1817); formation uncertain.] An important genus of saw-flies or Tenthredinidæ. J. Selb, a German mineralogist (1755–1827), + -ite[2].] An ash-gray or black ore of silver, supposed to contain silver carbonate, but later shown to be a mixture of argentite with silver, dolomite, etc. It was found at Wolfach in Baden. 3. In biol., the separation of those forms of animal and vegetable life which are to survive from those which are to perish; the facts, principles, or conditions of such distinction between organisms; also, the actual result of such principles or conditions; also, a statement of or a doctrine concerning such facts; especially, natural selection. See phrases below. — Artificial selection, man's agency in modifying the processes and so changing the results of natural selection; the facts or principles upon which such interference with natural evolutionary processes is based and conducted. This has been going on more or less systematically since man has domesticated animals or cultivated plants for his own benefit. Such selection may be either unconscious or methodical (see below). It has constantly tended to the latter, which is now systematically conducted on a large scale, and has resulted in numberless creations of utility or of beauty, or of both, which would not have existed had the animals and plants thus improved been left to themselves — that is, to the operation of natural selection. Examples of artificial selection are seen in the breeding of horses for speed, bottom, or strength, or for any combination of these qualities; of cattle for beef or milk; of sheep for mutton or wool; of dogs for speed, scent, courage, docility, etc.; of pigs for fat pork; of fowls for flesh or eggs; of pigeons for fancied shapes and colors, or as carriers; in the cultivation of cereals, fruits, and vegetables to improve their respective qualities and increase their yield, and of flowers to enhance their beauty and fragrance. — Methodical selection, artificial selection methodically or systematically carried on to or toward a foreseen desired result; the facts or principles upon which such selection is based, and the means of its accomplishment. See above.

Methodical selection is that which guides a man who systematically endeavours to modify a breed according to some predetermined standard.
Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, xx. 177.

In the case of methodical selection, a breeder selects for some definite object, and free intercrossing will wholly stop his work. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 103.

Natural selection, the preservation of some forms of animal and vegetable life and the destruction of others, in the natural order of such things, by the operation of natural causes which, in the course of evolution, favor some organisms instead of some others in consequence of differences in the organisms themselves. (a) The fact of the survival of the fittest in the struggle for existence — which means that those animals and plants which are best adapted, or have the greatest adaptability, to the conditions of their environment do survive other organisms which are less adapted, or less capable of being adapted, to such conditions. This fact rests upon observation, and is unquestionable. (b) The means by which or the conditions under which some forms survive while others perish; the law of the survival of the fittest; the underlying principle of such survival, and the agencies which effect that result. These seem to be mainly intrinsic, or inherent in the organism; and they are correlated, in the most vital manner possible, with the varying plasticity of different organisms, or their degree of susceptibility to modification by their environment. Those which respond most readily to external influence are the most modifiable under given circumstances, and consequently the most likely to be modified in a way that adapts them to their surroundings, which adaptation gives them an advantage over less favored organisms in striving to maintain themselves. Hence (and this is the gist of Darwinian natural selection) — (c) The gradual development of individual differences which are favorable to the preservation of the life of the individual, with corresponding gradual extinction of those peculiarities which are unfavorable to that end; also, the transmission of such modified characters to offspring, and so the perpetuation of some species and the extinction of others — a fact in nature respecting which there is no question, since we know that more species, genera, etc., have perished than are now living. (d) The theory of natural selection; any statement of opinion or belief on that subject, which may or may not adequately reflect the facts in the case. Ignorance alike of these facts and of this theory has been fruitful of misunderstandings and objections respecting the latter. Some of its supporters have made of the theory a cause of the facts which it is simply designed to explain; some of its opponents, unconsciously biased perhaps by such other extremists, have denied that the theory has any validity. Between these extremes, the author of the theory states explicitly that it neither originates variability, nor accounts for the origin of variations, in individuals, still less in species; but that, given the origination and existence of variations, it shows that some of these are preserved while others are not; that favorable variations tend to be perpetuated and unfavorable variations to become extinct; that those variations which best adapt an organism to its environment are most favorable to its preservation; and, consequently, that the theory of natural selection is adequate to explain, to some extent, the observed fact of the survival of the fittest in the struggle for existence — that is, natural selection in sense (a) above. Natural selection, in so far as sex is concerned, is specified as sexual selection (see below). The facts and principles of natural selection, as recognized and used by man for his own benefit in his treatment of plants and animals, come under the head of artificial selection (see above). An extension of the theory of natural selection to the origination (as distinguished from the preservation) of individual variations has been named physical selection (see below).

This preservation of favourable variations and the rejections of injurious variations I call Natural Selection. Variations neither useful nor injurious would not be affected by natural selection, and would be left a fluctuating element, as perhaps we see in the species called polymorphic. Darwin, Origin of Species (ed. 1860), iv.

Natural selection . . . implies that the individuals which are best fitted for the complex and in the course of ages changing conditions to which they are exposed generally survive and procreate their kind.
Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, xx. 178.

Physical selection, the law of origin for differential changes or modifications in organisms which have arisen through the action of physical causes in the environment, in habits, etc. It is distinguished from natural selection, which relates not to the origin but to the preservation of these changes. A. Hyatt. — Sexual selection, that province or department of natural selection in which sex is especially concerned, or in which the means by which one sex attracts the other comes prominently into play. Thus, anything which exhibits the strength, prowess, or beauty of the male attracts the female, and decides her preference for one rather than another individual of the opposite sex, with the result of affecting the offspring for the better; and this principle of selection, operative through many generations, may in the end modify the specific characters of animals, and thus become an important factor in natural selection.

If it be admitted that the females prefer or are unconsciously excited by the more beautiful males, then the males would slowly but surely be rendered more and more attractive through sexual selection.
Darwin, Descent of Man (ed. 1881), p. 496.

For my own part, I conclude that of all the causes which have led to the differences in external appearance between the races of men, and to a certain extent between man and the lower animals, sexual selection has been by far the most efficient. Darwin, Descent of Man (ed. 1871), II. 367.

Unconscious selection, artificial selection effected unknowingly, or carried on without system or method; man's agency in unmethodical selection, or the result of that agency. See the extract.

Unconscious selection in the strictest sense of the word — that is, the saving of the more useful animals and the neglect or slaughter of the less useful, without any thought of the future — must have gone on occasionally from the remotest period and amongst the most barbarous nations.
Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, xx. 199.

This power of absorption is selective, and hence, for the most part, arise the phenomena of color.

The element was so called (by Berzelius) because associated with tellurium (< L. tellus, earth).] Chemical symbol, Se; atomic weight, 79.5. A non-metallic element extracted from the pyrite of Fahlun in Sweden, and discovered in 1818 by Berzelius. In its general chemical analogies it is related to sulphur and tellurium. It is found in combination with native tellurium, as in selen-tellurium, with sulphur in selen-sulphur; also in very small quantity in some of the varieties of iron pyrites, and in several rare selenides, as clausthalite, or lead selenide, etc. When precipitated it appears as a red powder, which melts when heated, and on cooling forms a brittle mass, nearly black, but transmitting red light when in thin plates. When heated in the air it takes fire, burns with a blue flame, and produces a gaseous compound, oxid of selenium, which has a most penetrating and characteristic odor of putrid horse-radish. Selenium undergoes a remarkable change in electrical resistance under the action of light: hence the use of selenium-cells. See resistance, 3, and photophone.

self (self), a., pron., and n. [Also Sc. sel, sell; < ME. self, silf, scolf, sulf (pl. selfe, scolfe, selve, sulve, scolve, later selves; in oblique cases selven), < AS. self, scolf, silf, siolf, sylf, same, self, = OS. self = OFries. self, selva = OD. self, D. zelf = MLG. self, sulf, LG. sulv = OHG. selb, MHG. selp, G. selb (inflected selber, etc.), selbst (uninflected) = Icel. sjælfr, sjālfr = Sw. sjelf = Dan. selv = Goth. silba, same, self; origin unknown: (a) in one view (Skeat) the orig. form selba* is perhaps for seliba*, 'left to oneself,' < se-, si- (Goth. si-k = L. se, oneself, = Skt. sva, one's own self), + lib-, the base of AS. līfan, be left, lāf = Goth. laiba, a remnant, etc. (see leave[1], life, live[1]). (b) In another view (Kluge) perhaps orig. 'lord, possessor, owner,' akin to Ir. selb, possession; cf. Skt. patis, lord, with Lith. pats, self; cf. also own[1], v., owner, with the related own[1], a., which in some uses is nearly equiv. to self. The use of self in comp. to form the reflexive pronouns arose out of the orig. independent use of self following the personal pronouns, and agreeing with them in inflection, in AS. as follows: ie selfa (ic self), 'I self' (I myself), mīn selfes, 'of me self' (of myself), mē selfum, 'to me self' (to myself), mē selfne, 'me self' (myself), pl. wē selfe, 'we self' (we ourselves), etc.; so thū selfa (thū self), 'thou self' (thyself), thīn selfes, 'of thee self' (of thyself), etc., hē selfa (hē self), 'he self' (himself), his selfes, 'of him self' (of himself), etc., the adj. self becoming coalesced with the preceding pronoun in the oblique cases mine, my, me, our, thine, thy, thee, your, his, him, her, their, them, etc., these being ultimately reduced in each instance to a single form, which is practically the dative me, thee, him, her, them, etc. (in which the acc. was merged), mixed in part with the genitive mine, my, our, thine, thy, your, etc., these orig. genitives in time assuming the appearance of mere possessives, and self thus taking on the semblance of a noun governed by them, whence the later independent use of self as a noun (see III.). The reflexive combination me selfe, him selfe (selve), etc., came to be used, as the dative of reference, to indicate more distinctly the person referred to — 'I (for) myself,' 'he (for) him self,' etc., thus leading to the emphatic use. The former (AS. ME.) adj. pl. -e has now changed to the noun pl. -es (selves, as in wolves, wives, etc.). Itself and oneself retain the original order of simple juxtaposition: it + self, one + self. In the more common one's self, self is treated as an independent noun.] I. a. 1. Same; identical; very same; very. [Obsolete or archaic except when followed by same. See selfsame.]

> She was alayn, right in the selve place.

J. Arrowsmith, Paper-Hanger's Companion, p. 82.

II. pron. A pronominal element affixed to certain personal pronouns and pronominal adjectives to express emphasis or distinction, or to denote a reflexive use. Thus, for emphasis, I myself will write; I will examine for myself; thou thyself shalt go; thou shalt see for thyself; the writing itself shall be exhibited. "I myself will decide" not only expresses my determination to decide, but my determination that no other shall decide. Reflexively, I abhor myself; he admires himself; it pleases itself. Himself, herself, themselves are used in the nominative case as well as in the objective. When the elements are separated by an adjective, self becomes a mere noun: as, my own self, our two selves, his very self; so one's self for oneself. See III.

> Now chese yourselven whether that you liketh.
> Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 371.

III. n.; pl. selves (selvz). 1. A person in his relations to that very same person. Self differs from ego as being always relative to a particular individual, and as referring to that person in all his relations to himself and not merely as given in consciousness.

The consciousness of Self involves a stream of thought, each part of which as 'I' can (1) remember those which went before, and know the things they knew; and (2) emphasize and care paramountly for certain ones among them as 'me,' and appropriate to these the rest.
W. James, Prin. of Psychology, I. 400.

2. A thing or class of things, or an attribute or other abstraction, considered as precisely distinguished from all others: as, the separation of church and state is urged in the interest of religion's self.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 355.

3. Personal interest and benefit; one's own private advantage.

4. In hort., a flower with its natural plain color; a self-colored flower, as distinguished from one which has become "rectified" or variegated. Compare self-colored.

[Self is the first element in numerous compounds, nearly all modern. It may be used with any noun having an associated verb, or with any participial adjective (in -ing[2] or -ed[2] or -en[1]), or other adjective implying action. It indicates either the agent or the object of the action expressed by the word with which it is joined, or the person on behalf of whom it is performed, or the person or thing to, for, or toward whom or which a quality, attribute, or feeling expressed by the following word belongs, is directed, or is exerted, or from which it proceeds; or the subject of, or object affected by, such action, quality, attribute, feeling, and the like; and the meaning is frequently negative, implying that the relation exists toward self only, not toward others: as, self-acting, etc. Most of these compounds are of obvious meaning; only the more important of them are given below (without etymology, except when of early formation). In words compounded with self, the element self has a certain degree of independent accent, generally less than that of the following element, but liable to become by emphasis greater than the latter.]—By one's self. See by[1].—To be beside one's self. See beside.—To be one's self, to be in full possession of one's powers, both mental and physical.

Self-love is not despicable, but laudable, since duties to self, if self-perfecting—as true duties to self are—must needs be duties to others.

An assembly or council of citizens invested with a share in the government of a state. Especially—(a) In ancient Rome, a body of citizens appointed or elected from among the patricians, and later from among rich plebeians also, or taking seats by virtue of holding or of having held certain high offices of state. Originally the senate had supreme authority in religious matters, much legislative and judicial power, the management of foreign affairs, etc. At the close of the republic, however, and under the empire, the authority of the senate was little more than nominal apart from certain administrative functions, chiefly fiscal, and from its sittings as a high court of justice and as an appellate tribunal. The original senate of the patricians numbered 100; after the adjunction of the tribes Tities or Sabines and Luceres, the number became 300, and remained at this figure for several centuries, with the exception of some temporary changes, until the supremacy of Sulla. Julius Cæsar made the number 900, and after his death it became over 1,000, but was reduced to 600 by Augustus, and varied under subsequent emperors. (b) The upper or less numerous branch of a legislature in various countries, as in France, Italy, the United States, and in all the separate States of the Union. The Senate of the United States consists of two senators from each State, and numbers (in 1891) 88 members. A senator must be at least thirty years of age, nine years a citizen of the country, and a resident of the State from which he is chosen. Senators are elected by the State legislatures, and sit for six years, but the terms of office are so arranged that one third of the members retire every two years. In addition to its legislative functions, the Senate has power to confirm or reject nominations and treaties made by the President, and also tries impeachments. The vice-president of the United States is the president of the Senate; in his absence a senator is chosen president pro tempore. The upper house of the Canadian Parliament is also called the Senate; its 80 members are appointed by the crown for life. Hence—(c) In general, a legislative body; a state council; the legislative department of a government.

There are 6 species, widely diffused through warm and temperate regions of both hemispheres. They are annual or biennial herbs, nearly prostrate and very much branched, bearing alternate entire or dissected leaves, and minute white or rarely purple flowers in short racemes opposite the leaves. *S. Cf. sencion.] 1. A genus of composite plants, type of the tribe Senecionideæ and subtribe Eusenecioneæ. It is characterized by terminal flower-heads with a broad or cylindrical involucre of one or two rows of narrow bracts, numerous regular and perfect disk-flowers with truncate and cylindrical recurved style-branches and nearly cylindrical five- to ten-ribbed achenes, smooth or but slightly downy, and little or not at all contracted at the summit, which bears a copious soft white pappus of slender simple bristles. Some species have flower-heads calyculate with a few bractlets below, and the majority bear spreading pistillate rays, which are, however, minute in some and in others absent. This has been esteemed the largest genus of flowering plants, containing (including Cacalia, with Durand, 1888) at least 960 clearly distinct species; it is yet uncertain whether or not it is surpassed by the leguminous genus Astragalus, under which 1,300 species have been described, but perhaps not over 900 of these are genuine. The species of Senecio are mostly herbs, of polymorphous habit, either smooth or woolly, and bear alternate or radical leaves which are entire, toothed, or dissected. Their flower-heads are either large or small, corymbed, panicled, or solitary, and are in the great majority of species yellow, especially the disk-flowers. The genus is of almost universal distribution, but the range of individual species is remarkably limited. They are most abundant in temperate climates; probably about two thirds of the species belong to the Old World, and of those half to South Africa and over a fourth to Europe and the Mediterranean region. About 66 species are found in the United States, including the 9 species of Cacalia (Tournefort, 1700), separated by many authors; the others are chiefly low or slender herbs with bright-yellow rays, most numerous in the central States. American species are much more abundant in the Andean region, where they assume a shrubby habit and in three fourths of the species develop no ray-flowers, the reverse of the proportion elsewhere. Many of the Andean species grow close to the snow-line, and have leaves quite glossy and glutinous above and clothed with warm wool beneath; some gummy-leaved species have been used for firewood by the Bolivians under the name tola. In St. Helena and New Zealand a number of species become small trees. (See he-cabbagetree and puka-puka.) (For the principal British and American species, see ragwort, liferoot, and jacobæa; for the original species, S. vulgaris, a weed sold for cage-birds in London under the names bird-seed and chickenweed, and also called sencion and simson, see groundsel[1].) Several species have been in repute as remedies for wounds, as S. Saracenicus (for which see Saracen's comfrey, under Saracen). S. paludosus is known as bird's-tongue, S. hieracifolius as hawkweed, and S. Lyallii, of New Zealand, as mountain-marigold. S. lobatus, a tall and rather showy species of the southern United States, is known as butterweed, from its fleshy leaves. S. Cineraria, a bushy yellow-flowered perennial of Mediterranean shores from Spain to Greece and Egypt, is the dusty-miller of gardens, valued for its numerous long and pinnately cleft leaves, remarkably whitened with close down; from it the native dusty-miller of the Atlantic coast, Artemisia Stelleriana, is distinguished by its short, roundish, less deeply cut leaves. S. scandens, Cape ivy, a tender climber with smooth and shining bright-green angled leaves, from the Cape of Good Hope, is a favorite in cultivation. Several species are cultivated for their flowers under the generic name Senecio, as the orange S. Japonicus, and the purple and yellow S. pulcher, which reach nearly or quite 3 inches in diameter. S. argenteus, the silvery senecio, a dwarf 2 inches high, is valued for edgings, and several others for rock-gardens. The most important species, perhaps, are those of the section Cineraria, cultivated under glass, some of which have deep-blue rays, a color elsewhere absent from this and most other composite genera.

Several different birds share the name senegal. That to which it specially pertains inhabits Senegambia; it is the sénégali of the early French and the fire-bird or fire-finch of the early English ornithologists, the Fringilla senegala of Linnæus, and the Estrelda senegala of many writers; it is 3½ inches long, the male mostly crimson, with black tail and brown belly, and the back brown washed over with crimson. L. minima is scarcely different, but slightly smaller, and has a few white dots on the sides of the breast.

The action, faculty, or immediate mental result of receiving a mental impression from any affection of the bodily organism; sensitive apprehension; corporeal feeling; any feeling; also, the elements of feeling or immediate consciousness and of consciousness of reaction in perception; the subjective element of perception. Sensation has to be distinguished from feeling on the one hand, and from perception on the other. All are abstractions, or objects segregated by the mind from their concomitants, but perception is less so and feeling more so than sensation. Sensation is feeling together with the direct consciousness of that feeling forcing itself upon us, so that it involves the essential element of the conception of an object; but sensation is considered apart from its union with associated sensations, by which a perception is built up. Sensations are either peripheral or visceral. Among the latter are to be specially mentioned sensations of operations in the brain. No approach to a satisfactory enumeration of the different kinds of sensations, even of the peripheral kind, has been made.

Those that make motion and sensation thus really the same, they must of necessity acknowledge that no longer motion, no longer sensation, . . . and that every motion or reaction must be a new sensation, as well as every ceasing of reaction a ceasing of sensation. Dr. H. More, Immortal. of Soul, II. i. 12.

The perception which actually accompanies and is annexed to any impression on the body made by an external object, being distinct from all other modifications of thinking, furnishes the mind with a distinct idea, which we call sensation. Locke, Human Understanding, II. xix. 1.

Sensation, so long as we take the analytic point of view, differs from perception only in the extreme simplicity of its object or content. . . . From the physiological point of view both sensations and perceptions differ from thoughts in the fact that nerve-currents coming in from the periphery are involved in their production. W. James, Prin. of Psychology, xvii.

Impressions may be divided into two kinds, those of sensation and those of reflexion. The first kind arises in the soul originally, from unknown causes. Hume, Treatise of Human Nature, I. ii.

The feelings which accompany the exercise of these sensitive or corporeal powers, whether cognitive or appetent, will constitute a distinct class, and to these we may with great propriety give the name of sensations; whereas on the feelings which accompany the energies of all our higher powers of mind we may with equal propriety bestow the name of sentiments. Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., xlv.

Unlucky Welsted! thy unfeeling master,
The more thou ticklest, gripes his fist the faster.
While thus each hand promotes the pleasing pain,
And quick sensations skip from vein to vein.
Pope, Dunciad, ii. 212.

Sensations sweet,

She was hardly conscious of any bodily sensation except a sensation of strength inspired by a mighty emotion. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, vii. 5.

2. A state of interest or of feeling; especially, a state of excited interest or feeling.

The sensation caused by the appearance of that work is still remembered by many. Brougham.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., v. 4. 94.

Possessing or characterized by sense, judgment, or reason; endowed with or characterized by good or common sense; intelligent; reasonable; judicious: as, a sensible man; a sensible proposal.

To be now a sensible man, by and by a fool, and presently a beast! O strange! Shak., Othello, ii. 3. 309.

No sensible person in Arrowhead village really believed in the evil eye. O. W. Holmes, A Mortal Antipathy, iv.

Sensible* in its first meaning was passive, but is now quite as often active. As active, it is both physical and mental, and is unemphatic: as, to be sensible (that is, aware) of heat or cold, of neglect or injury. Sensitive means feeling acutely, either in body or in mind. A sensible man will school himself not to be too sensitive to criticism. Sentient is a physiologically descriptive word, indicating the possession or use of the sense of feeling: as, the fly is a sentient being. — 6. Observant, aware, conscious. — 8. Sensible, Judicious, discreet, sage, sagacious, sound. As compared with judicious, sensible means possessing common sense, having a sound and practical reason, while judicious means discreet in choosing what to do or advise; the one applying to the understanding and judgment, the other to the judgment in its relation to the will. Sensible, Intelligent, Common-sense. As compared with intelligent, sensible means possessed of the power to see things in their true light, the light of a correct judgment, a large, sound, roundabout sense, while intelligent means possessed of a clear and quick understanding, so as to apprehend an idea promptly and see it in its true relations. The relation between cause and effect is here so close that intelligent often seems to mean essentially the same as well-informed. Where the sense implied in sensible is thought of as peculiarly general or level to the experience, conclusions, or notions of the mass of men, common-sense is, by a new usage, sometimes employed: as, he was a common-sense person: he took a common-sense view of the matter. All these words apply both to the person and to his opinions, words, writings, etc.

G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 401.

sensitive-plant (sen′si-tiv-plant), n. The tropical and greenhouse plant Mimosa pudica; the humble-plant. It is mechanically irritable in a higher degree than almost any other plant. The leaves are bipinnate, the very numerous linear leaflets ranked on two pairs of branches which are inserted close to the end of the common petiole, thus appearing digitate. At night each leaf curves downward and the leaflets fold together, and in the daytime a slight touch causes them to assume the same position. It has purple flowers in heads on long peduncles. It is widely diffused through the tropics, native at least in South America and naturalized in the southern United States. The name is extended to other sensitive mimosas, as M. sensitiva, which is irritable in a less degree, and sometimes to the whole genus. — Bastard sensitive-plant, Æschynomene Americana. The probability is that the use of Quadragesima Sunday for the first Sunday in Quadragesima or Lent, and the independent use of Quinquagesima for the fiftieth day before Easter (both included), led to the extension of the series by the inexact application of the names Sexagesima and Septuagesima to the two Sundays preceding. Also called Lost Sunday, Alleluia Sunday. See Sunday.

septuagesimal (sep′tū-a-jes′i-mal), a. [< septuagesima + -al.] Consisting of seventy, especially of seventy (or between seventy and eighty) years.

The rounded legend is that the translation was made by seventy-two persons in seventy-two days. In another view, the Seventy were members of the sanhedrim (about seventy in number) who sanctioned the translation.

The Septuagints translation. Minsheu.

2. A Greek version of the Hebrew Scriptures made by the Seventy (see def. 1): usually expressed by the symbol LXX ('the Seventy'). This version is said by Josephus to have been made in the reign and by the order of Ptolemy Philadelphus, King of Egypt, about 270 or 280 years before the birth of Christ. It is supposed, however, by modern critics that this version of the several books is the work, not only of different hands, but of separate times. It is probable that at first only the Pentateuch was translated, and the remaining books gradually; but the translation is believed to have been completed by the second century B. C. The Septuagint is written in the Hellenistic (Alexandrine) dialect, and is linguistically of great importance from its effect upon the diction of the New Testament, and as the source of a large part of the religious and theological vocabulary of the Greek fathers, and (through the Old Latin version of the Bible (see Italic) and the influence of this on the Vulgate) of that of the Latin fathers also and of all western nations to the present day. In the Greek Church the Septuagint has been in continuous use from the earliest times, although other Greek versions (see Hexapla) were anciently also in circulation, and it is the Old Testament still used in that church. The Septuagint contains the books called Apocrypha intermingled among the other books. It is the version out of which most of the citations in the New Testament from the Old are taken. Abbreviated Sept.

II. a. Pertaining to the Septuagint; contained in the Greek copy of the Old Testament.

Septuagintal (sep′tū-a-jin′tal), a. [< Septuagint + -al.] Pertaining or relating to the Septuagint; contained in the Septuagint.

W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 205.

Specifically — (a) In bot., any kind of a partition, whether a proper dissepiment or not: as, the septum in a seed; the septum of a spore. (b) In anat. and zoöl., a partition; a wall between two cavities, or a structure which divides a part or an organ into separate portions; a dissepiment. In vertebrates the formations known as septa are most frequently situated in the vertical longitudinal median line of the body, but may be transverse or otherwise disposed. A number of them are specified by qualifying words. See phrases following. (c) In corals, a calcified mesentery; one of the six or more vertical plates which converge from the wall to the axis of the visceral space, dividing this into a number of radiating loculi or compartments. Each septum appears single or simple, but is really a duplicature of closely apposed plates, just as the mesentery itself is a fold. They are to be distinguished from the horizontal dissepiments, or tabulæ, which may cut them at right angles. They are variously modified in details of form, may be connected by synapticulæ, and are divided, according to their formation, into primary, secondary, and tertiary. (d) In conch., one of the transverse partitions which separate the cavity of the shell of a cephalopod into chambers. (e) In Vermes, a sort of diaphragm, a series of which may partition a worm into several cavities. Cloquet, and better called septum femorale.—Septum femorale, the septum crurale. H. Gray, Anat. (ed. 1888).—Septum linguæ, the partition of the tongue; a vertical median layer of fibrous tissue dividing the tongue into right and left halves. It sometimes includes a cartilaginous rod, as the lytta or so-called "worm" of a dog's tongue. Also called septum pellucidum, septum medium, septum ventriculorum, ventricular septum, septum medullare triangulare. See cut under corpus.—Septum narium, the partition between the right and left nasal cavities or meatus of the nose. In man it is formed chiefly by the mesethmoid, or perpendicular plate of the ethmoid, the vomer, and the triangular cartilage of the nose.—Septum nasi. Same as septum narium. In zoölogy it is often restricted to the surface between the openings of the right and left nostrils, which may be of this or that character, deeply cleft as in the hare, hairy or naked, etc.—Septum orbitale or orbitarum, the orbital partition; any formation which separates the right and left eye-sockets. The term is less frequently used in relation to mammals, whose eyes are generally small and far apart, than among lower vertebrates, as birds, whose orbits are very large comparatively, and separated only by a thin vertical plate of bone, which may be perforated, or so far defective that the opposite orbits are thrown into one large cavity.—Septum pectiniforme, the pectinated septum of the penis, a median vertical partition between the right and left cavernous bodies of that organ. In man it is a dense, firm fibrous structure with many vertical slits, through which the blood-vessels of the opposite sides communicate freely, this comb-like appearance giving the name. It sometimes includes an ossification, the os penis or penis-bone, as in the dog, racoon, etc. Also called septum penis.—Septum pontis, the septum of the pons Varolii.—Septum rectovaginale, the wall which separates the rectal from the vaginal cavity.—Septum scroti, the partition between the right and left cavities of the scrotum.—Septum sphenoidale, the mesial partition between the sphenoidal sinuses.—Septum transversum, the diaphragm; the transverse partition between the thoracic and abdominal cavities.—Septum ventriculorum, or ventricular septum. (a) The partition between the right and left ventricles of the heart. (Endlicher, 1847), named from Sequoiah, Sequo Yah (also called George Guess), an Indian of the Cherokee tribe, who invented an alphabet and taught it to his tribe.] A genus of coniferous trees, of the tribe Abietineæ and subtribe Taxodinæ. It is characterized by an oval cone, with persistent woody scales each bearing about five ovules, and dilated upward in fruit into a rhomboidal wrinkled and flattened slightly prickle-tipped apex. The flowers are monœcious, terminal or axillary on young shoots, with their scales spirally set. The small and involucrate staminate flower consists of an oblong column of united stamens, bearing crowded ovate connective scales, each with three to five anthers. The compressed seed bears a thick spongy margin, and contains four to six seed-leaves. There are but two species, both Californian, and ranking among the most remarkable of trees, growing straight, tall, and columnar, with short densely spreading branches, soft red wood, and very thick fibrous and spongy bark. They bear acute, compressed, and keeled decurrent narrow leaves, which are alternate and spirally inserted, or spread in two ranks on the younger branches. Their small cones ripen in the second year. For S. sempervirens, discovered by Menzies about 1794, see redwood. The other species, S. gigantea, by some formerly separated as a genus, Washingtonia (Winslow, 1854), and the Wellingtonia of English gardens, is the mammoth tree or big tree of California. It is a less graceful tree, with shorter branches, pendulous branchlets, paler appressed leaves, its wood a duller red, with thin white sapwood, its bark near the ground 1 to 2 feet thick, and its cones much larger (2 or 3 inches long). It forms a series of forests in Tulare county, California, isolated groves extending 240 miles northward, and it has been recently (November, 1890) reported from southern Oregon. The tallest tree now known, one of the Calaveras grove, is 325 feet high; one known as the Grizzly Giant, in the Mariposa grove, is 93 feet in circumference at the ground; 1,200 rings were counted in a tree 11 feet in diameter. Both species were early classed under Taxodium (which see), their nearest American living relative; a closer ally, however, is Athrotaxis (Don, 1839), a genus of three Tasmanian trees distinguished by a cone with mucronate or umbonate scales; their other living relatives are a few distant and mostly monotypic genera of Japan and China. (Compare Taxodineæ.) A very large number of fossil species are known with certainty, showing that the genus was much more abundant in late Cretaceous and Tertiary time than at present.

serf (sėrf), n. [< OF. (and F.) serf, fem. serve = Pr. serf = Sp. siervo = Pg. It. servo, < L. servus, a slave: see serve[1].] 1. A villein; one of those who in the middle ages were incapable of holding property, were attached to the land and transferred with it, and were subject to feudal services of the most menial description; in early Eng. hist., one who was not free, but by reason of being allowed to have an interest in the cultivation of the soil, and a portion of time to labor for himself, had attained a status superior to that of a slave.

The slave, indeed, still remained [in the fourteenth century], though the number of pure serfs bore a small proportion to the other cultivators of the soil. . . . But even this class had now acquired definite rights of its own; and, although we still find instances of the sale of serfs "with their litter," or family, apart from the land they tilled, yet, in the bulk of cases, the amount of service due from the serf had become limited by custom, and, on its due rendering, his holding was practically as secure as that of the freest tenant on the estate.
J. R. Green, Short Hist. of Eng. People, v. § 4.

The serf was bound to the soil, had fixed domestic relations, and participated in the religious life of the society; and the tendency of all his circumstances, as well as of the opinions and sentiments of the time, was in the direction of liberation. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 352.

2. A laborer rendering forced service on an estate under seigniorial prescription, as formerly in Russia.

In Russia, at the present moment, the aristocracy are dictated to by their emperor much as they themselves dictate to their serfs. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 461.

The next important measure was the emancipation of the serfs in 1861. . . . The landlords, on receiving an indemnity, now released the serfs from their seigniorial rights, and the village commune became the actual property of the serf. Encyc. Brit., XXI. 102.

3. Figuratively, an oppressed person; a menial. =Syn. Serf, Slave. The serf is, in strictness, attached to the soil, and goes with it in all sales or leases. The slave is absolutely the property of his master, and may be sold, given away, etc., like any other piece of personal property. See definitions of peon and coolie. See also servitude.

Serjeants at law are appointed by writ or patent of the crown, from among the utter barristers. While they have precedence socially, they are professionally inferior to queen's counsel; formerly, however, the king's (or queen's) premier serjeant and ancient serjeant had precedence of even the attorney-general and solicitor-general. Till the passing of the Judicature Act, 1873, the judges of the superior English common-law courts had to be serjeants; but this is not now required. No serjeants have been created since 1868, and the rank will in all likelihood soon become extinct.

It consisted originally of twenty-four persons, not under the degree of knight, whose duty it was to be in immediate attendance on the king's person. One is assigned by the crown to attend each house of parliament. The lord chancellor, the lord treasurer, and on great occasions the lord mayor of London were each thus attended. One, usually the one attending the House of Lords, is an officer of the Supreme Court, to make arrests, etc.

The custom seems to have existed since the fourteenth century. The rings were presented to the eminent persons who might be present, their value differing greatly: thus, in 1429, Sir John Fortescue mentions the most costly rings as being given to any prince, duke, or archbishop, and to the lord chancellor and lord treasurer of England, rings of less value to earls, bishops, and certain officials, of less value again to members of Parliament, and so on.—Sergeant trumpeter, an officer of the British royal household since the sixteenth century, originally charged with the direction of a band of sixteen trumpeters.

[The two spellings sergeant and serjeant are both correct, and were formerly used indifferently. Sergeant, however, is more in accordance with modern analogies, and now generally prevails except in the legal sense, and as applied to feudal tenants, to certain officers of the royal household, and, in part, to officers of municipal and legislative bodies, where the archaic spelling serjeant is retained. > What may I conclude of this longe serye,
> But after wo I rede us to be merye?
> Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 2209.

seriema (ser-i-ē'mä), n. [See cariama.] A remarkable South American bird, whose name is as unsettled in orthography as is its position in the ornithological system. It is usually regarded as grallatorial, and related to the cranes, but sometimes placed with the birds of prey, next to the African secretary-bird, which it resembles in some respects. It is 3 feet long; the wing 15 inches, the tail 13, the tarsus 7½;

the legs are bare above the anffrago; the head is crested with a frontal egret; the bill is red; the bare orbit bluish; the iris yellow; the plumage is dark, but somewhat variegated with lighter colors, and the tail is tipped with white. The seriema inhabits the campos of Brazil and northern Paraguay, and may be domesticated. For its technical names, see Cariama and Cariamidæ.

Seriema (Cariama cristata).

series (sē′rēz or sē′ri-ēz), n.; pl. series. [In earlier use (ME.) serie, < OF. serie*, F. série = Sp. Pg. It. serie; < L. series, a row, succession, course, series, connection, etc., < serere, pp. sertus, join together, bind, = Gr. εἱρειν, fasten, bind; cf. σειρά, a rope, Skt. √ si, bind. From the same L. verb are also ult. E. assert, desert, dissert, exert, exsert, insert, scraglio, serial, etc.] 1. A continued succession of similar things, or of things bearing a similar relation to one another; an extended order, line, or course; sequence; succession: as, a series of kings; a series of calamitous events; definitions arranged in several distinct scries.

2. In geol., a set of strata possessing some common mineral or fossil characteristic: as, the greensand series; the Wenlock series.—3. In chem., a number of elements or compounds which have certain common properties and relations, or which exhibit, when arranged in orderly succession, a constant difference from member to member. Thus, the elements lithium, sodium, potassium, rubidium, and cæsium form a natural series having the familiar properties of the alkalis, and certain striking physical relations to the other elements. The hydrocarbons methane ($CH_4$), ethane ($C_2H_6$), propane ($C_3H_8$), etc., form a series having the constant difference $CH_2$ between successive members, but all the members having in common great chemical stability, slight reactive properties, and incapacity to unite directly with any element or radical.

4. In numis., a set of coins made at any one place or time, or issued by any one sovereign or government.

7. In systematic bot., according to Gray, the first group below kingdom and the next above class: equivalent to subkingdom or division (which see). In actual usage, however, this rule is by no means always observed. In Bentham and Hooker's "Genera" it is a group of cohorts with two stages between it and kingdom; and in the same and other good works it may be found denoting the first subdivision of an order, a tribe, a subtribe, a genus, and doubtless still other groups. It appears, however, always to mark a comprehensive and not very strongly accentuated division.

8. In zoöl., a number of genera in a family, of families in an order, etc.; a section or division of a taxonomic group, containing two or more groups of a lower grade: loosely and variably used, like grade, group, cohort, phalanx, etc.—9. In anc. pros., same as colon[1], 2.—10. In bibliography, a set of volumes, as of periodical publications or transactions of societies, separately numbered from another set of the same publication. Abbreviated ser.—Abel's series, the series is equal to $\frac{1}{2}\phi$ for values of $\phi$ between $-\pi$ and $+\pi$; but for values between $\pi$ and $2\pi$, it is equal to $\frac{1}{2}(\pi-\phi)$.—Divergent series. See divergent.—Double series, a series the general term of which contains two variable integers. $$1 + \frac{1-q^a}{1-q}\frac{1-q^b}{1-q^c}x + \frac{1-q^a}{1-q}\frac{1-q^{a+1}}{1-q^2}\frac{1-q^b}{1-q^c}\frac{1-q^{b+1}}{1-q^{c+1}}x^2 + \dots,$$

Thus, the series

$$\sin\phi - \tfrac{1}{2}\sin 2\phi + \tfrac{1}{3}\sin 3\phi - \dots$$

The most usual way of writing an infinite series is to set down a few of the first terms added together, and then to append "+ . . . , or + etc.," which is not addition, certainly, but is the indication of something analogous to the addition of the terms given. Another way is to write a general expression for any one of the terms of the series, and to prefix to this Σ, the sign for summation.—In series. See in parallel, under parallel.—Jet-rock series. See jet[2].—Karoo series. See karoo.—Lagrange's series, the series of Lagrange's theorem (which see, under theorem).—Lambert's series, the series

P. Fletcher, Purple Island, ii. 9.

II. n. 1. A scaly creature that crawls on the belly; a limbless reptile; properly, a snake; any member of the order Ophidia (which see for technical characters). Serpent and snake now mean precisely the same thing; but the word serpent is somewhat more formal or technical than snake, so that it seldom applies to the limbless lizards, many of which are popularly mistaken for and called snakes, and snake had originally a specific meaning. (See snake.) Serpents are found all over the world, except in very cold regions. Most of them are timid, inoffensive, and defenseless animals; others are among the most dangerous and deadly of all creatures. Some are very powerful, in consequence of their great size and faculty of constriction, as boas, pythons, and anacondas. Those which are not venomous are known as innocuous serpents, or Innocua; those which are poisonous are noxious serpents, or Nocua, sometimes collectively called Thanatophidia. All are carnivorous; and most are able, by means of their dilatable mouths and the general distensibility of their bodies, to swallow animals of greater girth than themselves. In cold and temperate countries serpents hibernate in a state of torpidity. They are oviparous or ovoviviparous, and in some cases the young take refuge from danger by crawling into the gullet of the mother, whence the common belief that snakes swallow their young. Most serpents can be tamed, or at least rendered gentle, by handling; others, as the rat-snake of India, are almost domestic; but the more venomous kinds can be safely handled only when the fangs have been removed. There is a very general misapprehension respecting the comparative numbers of venomous and harmless serpents. Out of more than 300 genera of ophidians, only about 50, or one sixth, are poisonous, and more than half of these belong to the two families Najidæ and Crotalidæ (the cobra and the rattlesnake families). The true vipers (Viperidæ) and the sea-serpents (Hydrophidæ), all venomous, have six or eight genera apiece; and four other venomous families have but one to three genera apiece. The proportion of venomous to non-venomous species is still smaller than that of the genera, as the latter will average more species to a genus than the former. Poisonous serpents are mainly confined to tropical and warm temperate countries; they are more numerous and diversified in the Old World than in the New, and rather more forms are Proteroglypha than Solenoglypha (see these words). Serpents large enough to be formidable from their powers of constriction belong to the Boidæ and Pythonidæ. A few families contain very small species, worm-like in appearance and to some extent in habits. A majority of all serpents belong to one family, the harmless Colubridæ. See cuts under the various popular and technical names.

And hadde not ben the doubliet that he hadde of a serpentes skyn, deed hadde he ben with-oute recoure.

2. [cap.] In astron., a constellation in the northern hemisphere. See Ophiuchus.—3. A musical instrument, properly of the trumpet family, having a cupped mouthpiece, a conical wooden tube bent to and fro several times and usually covered with leather, and nine finger-holes very irregularly disposed. Its compass extended from two to four octaves upward from about the third C below middle C, and included more or less diatonic and chromatic tones according to the skill of the performer. Its tone was pervasive, though somewhat harsh. It is said to have been invented by a canon of Auxerre in 1590 for use in church music. It was retained in orchestras until the invention of the contrafagotto, and is still occasionally used in French churches.

4. A hydrous silicate of magnesium, occurring massive, sometimes fine, granular, and compact, again finely fibrous, less often slaty. It is usually green in color, but of many different shades, also red, brown, or gray, sometimes with spots resembling a serpent's skin. There are numerous varieties, differing in structure and color. The most important of these are—precious or noble serpentine, under which term are comprised the more or less translucent serpentines, having a rich oil-green color; foliated varieties, including marmolite and antigorite; fibrous varieties, as chrysotile (sometimes called serpentine asbestos) and metaxite. Other minerals more or less closely allied to or identical with serpentine are picrolite, williamsite, bowenite, retinalite, baltimorite, vorhauserite, hydrophite, jenkinsite, villarsite, etc. Serpentine occurs widely distributed and in abundance, forming rock-masses, many of which were formerly regarded as being of eruptive origin, but which are now generally conceded to have been formed by the metamorphism of various rocks and minerals; indeed, it has not been proved that serpentine has ever been formed in any other way than this. The peridotites appear to have been peculiarly liable to this kind of alteration, or serpentinization, as it is called. Massive serpentine has been extensively used for both interior and exterior architectural and decorative purposes, but in only a few localities is a material quarried which stands outdoor exposure without soon losing its polish, and eventually becoming disintegrated. The serpentinous rock commonly called verd-antique, and known to lithologists as ophicalcite, is a very beautiful decorative material, and has been extensively employed for ornament in various parts of the world. See verd-antique.

Serranidæ (se-ran'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Richardson, 1848), < Serranus + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Serranus, related to the Percidæ and by most ichthyologists united with that family, and containing about 40 genera and 300 species of carnivorous fishes of all warm seas, many of them known as groupers, sea-bass, rockfish, etc. (a) By Sir John Richardson, the name was applied in a vague and irregular manner, but his family included all the true Serranidæ of recent ichthyologists. (b) By Jordan and Gilbert, the name was applied to all acanthopterygians with the ventral fins thoracic and perfect, the lower pharyngeal bones separate, scales well developed, pectoral fins entire, skull not especially cavernous, maxillary not sloping under the preorbital for its whole length, mouth nearly horizontal, and anal fin rather short. The family thus included the Centropomidæ and Rhypticidæ, as well as true Serranidæ. (c) In Gill's system, the name was restricted to serranoids with the body oblong and compressed and covered with scales, the head compressed and the cranium normal, the supramaxillaries not retractile behind under the suborbitals, the spinous part of the dorsal fin about as long as the soft or longer, and three anal spines developed. The family as thus restricted includes about 300 fishes, which chiefly inhabit the tropical seas; but a considerable contingent live in the temperate seas. It includes many valuable food-fishes. The jewfish or black sea-bass is Stereolepis gigas; the stone-bass is Polyprion cernium. The groupers or garrupas are fishes of this family, of the genera Epinephelus and Trisotropis. The maxillary is not supplemented with another bone, and the lateral canines are stronger than those in front. The type of the genus is the Mediterranean S. scriba. S. cabrilla is a British species.

fin like a salmon's, and the belly compressed and armed with scales projecting so as to give it a saw-like appearance: typical of the subfamily Serrasalminæ. See piraya.

Serrasalminæ (ser-ą-sal-mō-nī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Serrasalmo(n-) + -inæ.] A subfamily of characinoid fishes, typified by the genus Serrasalmo. They have a compressed high body, with the belly sharply compressed and the scales developed to give a serrated appearance to it; the branchial apertures wide; the branchial membrane deeply incised, and free below; the dorsal fin elongated, and an adipose fin. The teeth are well developed and mostly trenchant. The species are characteristic of the fresh waters of tropical South America. Among them are some of the most dreaded and carnivorous of fishes. By means of their sharp teeth they are enabled to cut the flesh of animals as with a pair of scissors, and where they are found it is impossible for an animal to go into the water without danger. They are attracted by the smell of blood, and congregate from considerable distances to any spot where blood has been spilt. They are best known by the name of caribe. Many species have been described, some of which attain the length of 2 feet, but most are much smaller. See piraya.

serrate (ser′āt), a. [= Sp. serrato, < L. serratus, saw-shaped, saw-like (cf. serrare, pp. serratus, saw, saw up), < serra, a saw, prob. for secra*, < secare, cut, and thus akin to AS. saga, E. saw, from the same root: see secant and saw[1].] Notched on the edge like a saw; toothed; specifically, in bot., having small sharp teeth along the margin, pointing toward the apex: as, a serrate leaf. A serrate-ciliate leaf is one having fine hairs, like the eyelashes, on the serratures. A serrate-dentate leaf has the serratures toothed. In zoölogy and anatomy serrate is applied to very many structures much unlike one another, but having more or fewer similar teeth.—Serrate antennæ, in entom., antennæ whose joints are triangular and compressed, presenting a serrate outline on the inner margin: sometimes the outer joints (usually three in number) are enlarged, forming a serrate club. See cuts under Serricornia and serricorn.—Serrate palpi, in entom., palpi whose joints are flat, produced, and pointed on one side.—Serrate preoperculum, a preoperculum with numerous parallel denticles on its posterior border.—Serrate suture, one of several kinds of cranial sutures in which a large number of small irregular teeth of the edge of one bone interlock or interdigitate with similar teeth on another bone, as in the sagittal, coronal, and lambdoidal sutures. The phrase is sometimes restricted to the interfrontal suture, the sagittal being called dentate, and the coronal limbose, but the difference is slight, if any, and holds for few animals besides man. See cuts under cranium and parietal.—Serrate tibiæ, in entom., tibiæ which have a row of sharp teeth along the greater part of the outer edge, as in the Scolytidæ.—Serrate ungues, in entom., ungues or claws having a row of sharp teeth on the lower edge. (b) In bot., noting that there is half as much more as the number of some other part to which a given part bears special relation, as where the stamens are one half as many more as the petals or sepals, or that a fertile flower is accompanied by an abortive one, as in some grasses; also, noting a large fertile floret accompanied by a small abortive one. (c) In entom., noting any part or ornament which is accompanied by another half as large, or much smaller—as (1) an ocellated spot having a smaller one close to it, the two being generally inclosed by a common ring of color (also called sesquialter and sesquiocellus); (2) a colored band crossing both of the outspread wings, and accompanied on either the primary or the secondary wing alone by another band; or (3) a cell or areolet of the wing to which a much smaller one is appended.

It is now important to observe that great numbers of centrifugal animals are sedentary or sessile, while the longitudinal are vagrant, moving from place to place.
E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 193.

(c) Specifically, in Crustacea: (1) Having no peduncle, as a cirriped; belonging to the Sessilia. (2) Having no stalk or ophthalmite, as an eye. (d) In conch., having no stalk or ommatophore, as an eye. (e) In entom., not petiolate, as an abdomen. (f) In Hydroida, not detachable or separable, as a gonophore.

(and F.) session = Sp. sesion = Pg. sessão = It. sessione, < L. sessio(n-), a sitting, session, < sedere, pp. sessus, sit, = E. sit: see sit, sedent.] 1. The act of sitting, or the state of being seated: now rare except in the specific theological sense of Christ's sitting or enthronement at the right hand of God the Father. Also assession.

Christ . . . hath as Man, not as God only, supreme dominion over quick and dead, for so much his ascension into heaven and his session at the right hand of God do import. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 55.

The French and Italian translations, expressing neither position of session or recubation, do only say that he placed himself at the table. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 6.

Milton, P. L., ii. 514.

3. The time, space, or term during which a court, council, legislature, or the like meets daily for business, or transacts business regularly without breaking up. Thus, a session of the legislature commonly means the period from its assembling to its adjournment for the year or season, in contradistinction to its daily sessions during that period. So a session of Parliament comprises the time from its meeting to its prorogation, of which there is in general but one in each year. Technically at common law it was held that a meeting of Parliament could not be called a session unless the sovereign passed an act. The session of a judicial court is called a term. Also applied in the United States to the daily or half-daily periods of work of a school.

During the twenty-five years of the York dynasty . . . the sessions of those parliaments which really met extended over a very few months. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 373.

sestina (ses-tē'nä), n. [It.: see sestine.] A poem in fixed form, borrowed from the French, and said to have been invented by the Provençal troubadour Arnaut Daniel (thirteenth century). It consisted originally of six stanzas of six unrimed lines, with a final triplet or half-stanza, also unrimed—all the lines being of the same length. The terminal words of stanzas 2 to 6 were the same as those of stanza 1, but arranged differently; and they were repeated in the triplet or envoy, partly at the end and partly in the middle of the lines. The modern sestina is written on two or three rimes, and the formula for a two-rimed sestina is thus given in the "Vers Français et leur Prosodie" of the best French authority, M. de Gramont: 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6; 6, 1, 5, 2, 4, 3; 3, 6, 4, 1, 2, 5; 5, 3, 2, 6, 1, 4; 4, 5, 1, 3, 6, 2; 2, 4, 6, 5, 3, 1; tripiet 2, 4, 6 at the end, and 1, 3, 5 at the beginning of the lines. In stanza 1, lines 1, 3, and 4 rime, and 2, 5, and 6 rime. Sestinas were written in Italy by Dante and Petrarch, in Spain and Portugal by Cervantes and Camoëns, and in England by Drummond of Hawthornden (1585–1649). Mr. Swinburne (in "Poems and Ballads," 2d ser.) has achieved a double sestina.

A sestina is a poem written neither in rhyme nor blank verse, but in so-called six-line stanzas, each one of which has to take the last word of the stanza preceding it, and twist it about into some new and fantastic meaning.
Athenæum, No. 3141, p. 14.

In the sense 'sink,' as the sun or stars, it is partly of Scand. origin, < Icel. refl. setask, set, as the sun, etc. Many uses are highly idiomatic, the verb, like put, its nearest equivalent, and do, make, get, etc., having become of almost universal application, and taking its distinctive color from the context.] I. trans. 1. To make or cause to rest as on a seat; cause to be put, placed, or seated; place in a sitting, standing, or any natural or normal posture; put: as, to set a box on its end or a table on its feet: often with up or down: as, to set up a statue or a flagstaff; to set down a burden.

5. In law: (a) The balancing or countervailing of one debt by another. (b) The claim of a debtor to have his debt extinguished in whole or in part by the application of a debt due from his creditor, or from one with whom his creditor is in privity. Set-off is that right which exists between two persons each of whom, under an independent contract, owes an ascertained amount to the other, to set off their respective debts, by way of mutual deduction, so that the person to whom the larger debt is due shall recover the residue only after such deduction. (Kerr.) Set-off, counter-claim, and recoupment are terms often used indiscriminately. Counter-claim is more appropriate of any cross-demand on which the claimant might if he chose maintain an independent action, and on which, should he establish it as a cause of action, either in such independent action or by way of counter-claim when sued, he would be entitled to an affirmative judgment in his own favor for payment of the claim except so far as his adversary's claim might reduce or extinguish it. This use of the word distinguishes it from such claims as may be set off in favor of a person, which yet would not sustain an action by him, nor any affirmative judgment in his favor. Recoupment is appropriate only to designate a cross-demand considered as dependent on the concession of plaintiff's demand, subject to a right to cut down the amount recoverable by virtue of it. In these, which are the strict senses of the words, a recoupment only reduces plaintiff's demand, and leaves him to take judgment for what remains after the deduction; a set-off extinguishes the smaller of two independent demands and an equal amount of the larger, but may leave the residue of the latter unenforced; a counter-claim is one that may be established irrespective of the adversary's success or failure in establishing his claim, and, although subject to be reduced or extinguished by the adversary's success, may otherwise be enforced in the same action.

This astrological association explains the identification by Pythagoras of the number seven with the opportune time (καιρός), as well as the fact that light was called seven by the Pythagoreans. That they termed it "motherless" may be due to the "seven spirits" of the Chaldeans—that is, the planets—being called "fatherless and motherless." The astrological association further explains why the number seven has so frequently been suggested by the conception of divine or spiritual influence, and why it was made the number of intelligence by Philolaus. The common statement that seven implies perfection has no further foundation than that the cabalistic meanings of all odd numbers are modes of perfection. One is the first, and was with the Pythagoreans the number of essence (οὐσία). Two involves otherness, and was the number of opinion, "because of its diversity." Three involves mediation, and was the number of beginning, middle, and end. Four naturally suggests a square, and so equity, and was commonly considered the number of justice; but it further carries the suggestion of system, and often has that signification. Five connects itself with the five fingers, used in counting, and thus is an ordinary synecdoche for a small group ("Five of you shall chase an hundred"—Lev. xxvi. 8); but the Pythagoreans, for some unknown reason, made it the number of marriage. Six played an important part in the sexagesimal ayatem of the Chaldeans; but its Pythagorean meaning is doubtful. In the Apocalypse 666 is the number of the beast. Eight, being the first cube, would naturally suggest solidity; but according to Dr. Wordsworth it is the dominical or resurrection number. Nine, or three triads, was the number of the great gods of Egypt, and was considered efficient in all magical operations. Ten, for reasons connected with the history of the Pythagorean brotherhood, was considered by them as the great number of power. To eleven no particular significance is attached. Twelve was important in the Chaldean division of the circle, and was the number of the great gods. Thirteen, according to Dr. Mahan, is the number of schism. Seven was formerly used generally and vaguely to indicate a large number.

I can then thanke Sensuall Apetyte;

That I saw this seven yere.

(c) The harmonic combination of two tones at the interval thus defined. (d) In a scale, the seventh tone from the bottom; the leading-tone: solmizated si, or, in the tonic sol-fa system, ti. The typical interval of the seventh is that between the first and the seventh tones of a major scale, which is acoustically represented by the ratio 8:15. Such a seventh is called major. A seventh a half-step shorter is called minor; and one two half-steps shorter is called diminished. All kinds of sevenths are classed as dissonances, the minor seventh being the most beautiful and the most useful of dissonant intervals. The seventh produced by taking two octaves downward from the sixth harmonic of the given tone is sometimes called the natural seventh; it is sometimes used in vocal music, and on instruments, like the violin, whose intonation is not fixed.

4. In early Eng. law, a seventh of the rents of the year, or of movables, or both, granted or levied by way of tax.—Chord of the diminished seventh, in music, a chord of four tones, consisting in its typical form of the seventh, second, fourth, and sixth tones of a minor scale, and made up, therefore, of three minor thirds superposed. It is usually regarded as a chord of the ninth with the root omitted. Several different resolutions of it are possible. Such a chord on a keyboard instrument like the pianoforte is capable of four enharmonic interpretations, so that it is possible to modulate immediately from it into any one of the keys of the keyboard. Thus, in the key of G minor, the typical chord of the diminished seventh is (a), which on the keyboard is identical with either (b) in the key of B♭ minor, or (c) in that of C♯ minor, or (d) in that of E minor.

—Chord of the seventh, in music, a chord of four tones, comprising a root with its third, fifth, and seventh; a seventh-chord or sept-chord. The most important seventh-chord is that whose root is the dominant of the key; it is often called the chord of the dominant seventh. See chord, 4.—Essential seventh. See essential.

sewing-machine (sō'ing-ma-shēn″), n. 1. A machine for stitching fabrics, operated by foot or other power. The sewing-machine is the outgrowth of a very great number of experiments and inventions made in France, England, and the United States, and first culminating practically in the machine invented by Elias Howe. It was developed through the simple type of machine using a needle which passes through the fabric—a type which survives in the Bonnaz or embroidery machine. Then followed the chain-stitch machine and the machines making an interwoven stitch, and lastly came the lock-stitch machines, which are the most approved type at the present day. The various kinds of sewing-machines are all essentially alike, and have been adapted, by the aid of numerous mechanical attachments and devices, to perform almost every kind of sewing that can be done by hand. 'distinction,' < secare, divide, cut: see secant. A less specific designation for 'sex' was L. genus = Gr. γένος, sex, gender: see gender, genus.] 1. The character of being either male or female; the anatomical and physiological distinction between male and female, evidenced by the physical character of their generative organs, and the part taken by each in the function of reproduction; gender, with reference to living organisms. Sex is properly predicable only of male or female, those organisms which are neither male nor female being sexless or neuter. But the two sexes are often combined in the same individual, then said to be hermaphrodite or monœcious. Sex runs nearly throughout the animal kingdom, even down to the protozoans, with, however, many exceptions here and there among hermaphrodites. The distinction of sex is probably the most profound and most nearly universal single attribute of organized beings, and among the higher animals at least it is accompanied or marked by some psychological as well as physical characteristics. The essential attribute of the male sex is the generation of spermatozoa, that of the female the generation of ova, accomplished in the one case by a testis or a homologous organ, and in the other by an ovary or a homologous organ. The act of procreation or begetting in the male is the uniting of spermatozoa to an ovum; the corresponding function in the female is the fecundation of an ovum by spermatozoa, resulting in conception or impregnation. The organs by which this result is accomplished are extremely varied in physical character; and various organs which characterize either sex, besides those directly concerned in the reproductive act, are known as secondary sexual characters. The frame of a sextant is generally made of brass, the arc h being graduated upon a slip of silver. The handle a is of wood. The mirrors b and c are of plate-glass, silvered. The horizon-glass b is, however, only half silvered, so that rays from the horizon or other direct object may enter the telescope e. This telescope is carried in the ring d, and is capable of being adjusted, once for all, by a linear motion perpendicular to the plane of the sextant, so as to receive proper proportions of light from the silvered and unsilvered parts of the horizon-glass. The figure does not show the colored glass shades which may be interposed behind the horizon-glass and between this and the index-glass c, upon which the light from one of the objects is first received, in order to make the contact of the images more distinct. This index-glass is attached to the movable arm f. The movable arm is clamped by the screw i, and is furnished with a tangent screw j. The arc is read by means of a vernier carried by the arm, sextus (seks'tus), n. [ML., sixth: see sext, sixth.] In medieval music for more than four voice-parts, the second additional voice or part.

sexual (sek'shū-al), a. [= F. sexuel = Sp. Pg. sexual = It. sessuale, < L. sexualis, < sexus (sexu-), sex: see sex[1].] 1. Of or pertaining to sex or the sexes in general: as, sexual characteristics.—2. Distinctive of sex, whether male or female; peculiar to or characteristic of either sex; genital: as, sexual organs; the sexual system.—3. Of the two sexes; done by means of the two sexes; reproductive: as, sexual intercourse; sexual reproduction.—4. Peculiar to or affecting the sexes or organs of sex; venereal: as, sexual disease or malformation.—5. Having sex; sexed; separated into two sexes; monœcious: the opposite of asexual: as, a sexual animal.—Secondary sexual characters, some or any characteristics, not immediately concerned in reproduction, which one sex has and the other sex has not; any structural peculiarity, excepting the organs of generation, which distinguishes male from female. Thus, the hair on a man's face and breast, the antlers of the deer, the train of the peacock or any other difference in the plumage of a bird between the male and the female, the scent-glands of any male, the claspers of a fish, and many other features are regarded as secondary sexual characters, and are concerned in sexual selection.—Sexual affinity. (a) The unconscious or instinctive attraction of one sex for the other, as exhibited by the preference or choice of any one individual, rather than of any other, of the opposite sex, as a matter of sexual selection. In man such selection is often called elective affinity (after Goethe). (b) Such degree of affinity between the sexes of different species as enables these species to interbreed or hybridize.—Sexual dimorphism, difference of form or of other zoölogical character in the members of either sex, but not of both sexes, of any animal. Thus, a species of cirripeds which has two kinds of males, or a species of butterflies whose females are of two sorts, exhibits sexual dimorphism. The term properly attaches to the adults of perfectly sexed animals, and not to the many instances of dimorphism among sexless or sexually immature organisms. Thus, the honey-bee is not a case of sexual dimorphism, as there is only one sort of perfect males (the drones) and one of perfect females (the queen), though the hive consists mostly of a third sort of bees (workers or undeveloped females). Sexual dimorphism is common among invertebrates, rare in the higher animals.—Sexual method, in bot., same as sexual system (b).—Sexual organs, organs immediately concerned in sexual intercourse or reproduction; the sexual system.—Sexual reproduction, reproduction in which both sexes concur; gamogenesis.—Sexual selection. See selection.—Sexual system. (a) In zoöl. and anat., the reproductive system; the sexual organs, collectively considered. (b) In bot., a system of classification founded on the distinction of sexes in plants, as male and female. Also called sexual method, artificial system, Linnean system. See Linnean.

sexuality (sek-ṣū-al′i-ti), n. [< sexual + -ity.] 1. The character of sex; the state of being sexual or sexed or having sex; the distinction between the sexes; sex in the abstract.

It was known even before the time of Linnæus that certain plants produced two kinds of flowers, ordinary open, and minute closed ones; and this fact formerly gave rise to warm controversies about the sexuality of plants.
Darwin, Different Forms of Flowers, p. 310.

Sex is a term employed with two significances, which are often confused, but which it is indispensable to distinguish accurately. Originally sex was applied to the organism as a whole, in recognition of the differentiation of the reproductive function. Secondarily, sex, together with the adjectives male and female, has been applied to the essential reproductive elements, ovum and spermatozoon, which it is the function of the sexual organisms (or organs) to produce. According to a strict biological definition sexuality is the characteristic of the male and female reproductive elements (genoblasts), and sex of the individuals in which the reproductive elements arise. A man has sex, a spermatozoon sexuality.

The shadoof is extensively used in Egypt for lifting water from the Nile for irrigation. The worker dips the bucket in the river, and, aided by the counterpoise weight, empties it into a hole dug on the bank, from which a runnel conducts the water to the lands to be irrigated. In the cut (see the following page) two shadoofs are shown, employed side by side.

An opaque object illuminated by the sun, or any other source of light which is not a single point, must have an infinite number of shadows, though these are not distinguishable from each other, and hence the shadow of such an opaque body received on a plane is always accompanied by a penumbra, or partial shadow, the complete shadow being called the umbra. In mining, a vertical or inclined excavation made in opening the ground for mining purposes. A shaft may be sunk vertically, without regard to the dip of the lode, or it may be sunk by an incline following the lode, either closely or approximately, according as its dip is more or less regular. When it is expected that extensive operations will be carried on, the shafts are usually sunk vertically, and connected with the lode at various depths by cross-drifts or levels. When, however, the dip of the lode is pretty uniform and its thickness considerable, all the shafts of the mine may be sunk upon it as inclines. This is the case with the largest mines on Lake Superior. Shafts have various forms, some being round, others oval; but the most common shape is rectangular. In large mines the shaft is usually divided into several compartments, one being used for the pumping-machinery, two or more for hoisting ore, and another for lowering heavy timbers. In the English coalmines the shafts are mostly circular in section; in Belgium, polygonal; in the anthracite region of Pennsylvania the winding shafts are always square or rectangular, and there the largest shafts have a length of from 44 to 52 feet, and a width of 10 or 12.

In addition to the castings, the repoussé work should be mentioned; . . . the inlaying of this kind of ware is sometimes of extraordinary delicacy and beauty. 2. Am (is, are, was, etc.) to (do something specified by the infinitive): forming verb-phrases having the value of future and conditional tenses, and usually (and properly enough) called such. (a) Shall is used in direct assertion to form the first persons singular and plural of the future and future-perfect tenses, the second and third persons in these tenses being formed by will. In this connection shall simply foretells or declares what is about to take place: as, I shall go to town to-morrow; we shall spend the summer in Europe. The future tense of the verb go thus becomes

|---|---|---|---|
| I shall | | We shall | |
| Thou wilt | go; | You will | go. |
| He will | | They will | |

"The use of shall instead of will in the first person is probably due to the fact that the act thus announced as about to take place ensues from the duty or obligation arising outwardly but contemplated inwardly as proper, and consequently as now about to take place in virtue of a tacit act of the speaker's will. Should the will or resolution of the speaker intervene, or be prominent in his mind, then will would be the proper word to express the futurity of the act: thus, 'I will go' means 'I am determined to go, 'I have made up my mind to go.' 'I shall go home this evening' announces a future event as settled by consideration outside of the speaker's self; 'I will go home this evening' announces a future event having both its cause and its accomplishment in the speaker's own mind." (Dr. Beard.) In indirect assertion shall may express mere futurity in the second and third persons: as, he says that he shall go; he said that he should go: in these sentences "he" refers to one and the same person, the one who "says." If it referred to any other person, will would be used and not shall.

That woman had to water her soup with her furtive tears, to sit of nights behind hearts and spades, and brood over her crushed hopes. If I contemplate that wretched old Niobe much longer, I shall begin to pity her.
Thackeray, Philip, II. xiii.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, ii. 8.

I shall stay and sleep in the church.
George Eliot, Romola, xiv.

(b) In the second and third persons shall implies authority or control on the part of the speaker, and is used to express (1) promise: as, you shall receive your wages; (2) command: as, thou shalt not steal; (3) determination: as, you shall go.

My glass shall not persuade me I am old,
So long as youth and thou are of one date.
Shak., Sonnets, xxii.

(4) Certainty or inevitability as regards the future.

And if I die, no man shall pity me [that is, it is certain no man will pity me]. Shak., Rich. III., v. 3. 201.

(c) Interrogatively, shall or will is used according as the one or the other would be used in reply, and accordingly 'shall I go?' 'shall we go?' 'shall he go?' 'shall they go?' ask for direction, or refer the matter to the determination of the person asked—that is, 'shall I go?' anticipates the answer 'you shall go.'

Pan. But will you tell me? Shall I marry?
Troil. Perhaps. Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, iii. 36.

I was employ'd in passing to and fro,
About relieving of the sentinels:
Then how or which way should they first break in?
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., ii. 1. 71.

(d) After conditionals, such as if or whether, and after verbs expressing condition or supposition, shall expresses simple futurity in all persons, the idea of restraint or necessity involved originally in the word shall being excluded by the context—thus:

If { I (or we) shall / Thou shalt, or you shall / He (or they) shall } say.

If then we shall [that is, are to] shake off our slavish yoke, Imp out our drooping country's broken wing,

Southey, Wesley, I. 309, note (quoted in F. Hall's False Philol., p. 49).

In the older writers, as for instance in the authorized version of the Bible, shall was used of all three persons.

Court and Times of Charles I., i. 161.

Shall, like other auxiliaries, is often used with an ellipsis of the following infinitive.

Men dreme of thing that nevere was ne shal.
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 274.

It shall [sc. go] to the barber's with your beard.
Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2. 521.

You have not pushed these diseased neither with side nor shoulder, but have rather strewed their way into the Palace with flowers, as you should.
Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, ii.

3. The past tense should, besides the uses in which it is merely the preterit of shall, as above, has acquired some peculiar uses of its own. In some of these uses should represents the past subjunctive, not the past indicative. It is not used to express simple past futurity, except in indirect speech: as, I said I should [was to] go; I arranged that he should [was to] go. Should is often used to give a modest or diffident tone to a statement, or to soften a statement from motives of delicacy or politeness: thus, 'I should not like to say how many there are' is much the same as 'I hardly like,' or 'I do not like,' etc. Similarly, 'it should seem' is often nearly the same as 'it seems.'

He is no suitor then? So it should seem.
B. Jonson.

Should was formerly sometimes used where we should now use might.

The scribis and Pharisees aspleden hym that thei schulden fynde cause whereof thei schulden accuse hym.
Wyclif, Luke vi. 7.

The distinctions in the uses of shall and will and of should and would are often so subtle, and depend so much upon the context or upon subjective conditions, that they are frequently missed by inaccurate speakers and writers, and often even by writers of the highest rank. There is a tendency in colloquial English to the exclusive use of will and (except after a conditional word) would. See will[1].

Cæsar should [would] be a beast without a heart
If he should stay at home to-day for fear.
Shak., J. C., ii. 2. 42.

But the requisite OF. forms intermediate between E. shark and L. carcharus are not found, and it is not certain that the name was orig. applied to the fish; it may have been first used of a greedy man (see shark[2]).] A selachian of the subclass Plagiostomi, of an elongate form, with the pectoral fins moderately developed, the branchial apertures lateral, and the mouth inferior (rarely terminal). Over 150 species are known as inhabitants of the modern seas, and sharks formed a very important or even predominant contingent to the faunæ of early epochs. The internal differences manifested by species having a considerable resemblance externally are so great as to have led some naturalists to propose for them three distinct orders, which have been named Anarthri, Proarthri, and Opistharthri. Most living sharks belong to the first order and represent therein 15 families, while of the Proarthri only one family with 4 species is known, and of the Opistharthri two families with 6 or 7 species. Most sharks are carnivorous, and some of them eminently so; their dentition corresponds to this character, the teeth being often compressed, with trenchant and frequently serrated edges, arranged in many rows, and folded back on the jaws, leaving only the outermost erect for action. These rows of teeth successively come into functional position. In others, however, the teeth are flattish and not erectile. In a few, also, which attain a large size, the teeth are extremely small, and the animal feeds upon very small animals, being not truly carnivorous. The skin is generally covered with small scales or plates firmly adherent to the skin and overlapping, forming shagreen. (See cut under scale[1].) But various deviations are manifested in different forms, and in one, Echinorhinidæ, the surface is mostly naked, only some thorn-like plates being developed. Sharks inhabit for the most part tropical and warm waters; the larger ones live in the open sea, but a few species extend into high north and south latitudes. The largest shark is Rhinodon typicus, the whale-shark, said to attain a length of over 50 feet. Next in size is the great basking-shark, Cetorhinus maximus, which is reported occasionally to reach a length of 40 feet. (See Cetorhinus, and cut under basking-shark.) Another large species is Carcharodon rondeleti, among those known as man-eaters. (See cut under Galeorhinus.) The hammer-headed sharks belong to the family Sphyrnidæ or Zygænidæ. Fox-sharks or threshers are Alopeciidæ. The porbeagles or mackerel-sharks are Lamnidæ. A barbed fish-spear with several prongs. E. H. Knight.—3. A strain consisting of a compression in one direction with an elongation in the same ratio in a direction perpendicular to the first. Thus, in fig. 1, suppose a body in which the axis AC is compressed to ac. Suppose there is an axis of equal elongation, upon which take BD equal to ac, so that after elongation it will be brought to bd, equal to AC. Then, all planes perpendicular to the plane of the diagram and parallel either to AB or to AD will remain undistorted, being simply rotated into positions parallel to ab or ad. If the body while undergoing strain be so rotated that a and b remain in coincidence with A and B (see fig. 2), the shear will be seen to be an advance of all planes parallel to a fixed plane in parallel lines in those planes by amounts proportional to their distances from the fixed plane. A shear is often called a simple shear, meaning a shear uncompounded with any other strain. Any simple strain may be resolved into a shear, a positive or negative elongation perpendicular to the shear, and a positive or negative expansion.

shear-steel (shēr'stēl), n. [So called from its applicability to the manufacture of shears, knives, scythes, etc.] Blister-steel which has been fagoted and drawn out into bars under the rolls or hammer: a repetition of the process produces what is known as double-shear steel. The density and homogeneousness of the steel are increased by this process, and it is generally admitted that a better result is attained by hammering than by rolling. See steel.

shear-structure (shēr'struk'tūr), n. In geol., a structure superinduced in rocks by shearing; a structure varying from lamellar to schistose, somewhat resembling the so-called "fluxion-structure" often seen in volcanic rocks, but produced by the flowing, not of molten, but of solid material, as one of the consequences of the immense strain by which the upheaval or plication of large masses of rock has been accompanied.

sheartail (shēr'tāl), n. 1. A humming-bird of the genus Thaumastura, having a very long forficate tail, like a pair of shears, as T. cora, T. henicura, etc. In the cora hummer (to which the genus Thaumastura is now usually restricted, the others formerly referred to it being placed in Doricha) the structure of the tail is peculiar; for the middle pair of feathers is so short as to be almost hidden by the coverts, while the next pair is suddenly and extremely lengthened, and then the other three pairs rapidly shorten from within outward. In Doricha (D. henicura, etc.) the shape of the tail is simply forficate, as the feathers lengthen from the shortest middle pair to the longest outer pair, like a tern's. In all these cases the long feathers are very narrow and linear, or of about uniform width to their ends. The peculiar formation is confined to the males. T. cora has the tail (in the male) about 4 inches long, though the length of the bird is scarcely 6 inches; it is golden-green above and mostly white below, with a metallic crimson gorget reflecting blue in some lights, and the tail black and white. The female is 3¾ inches long, the tail being 1¼. It inhabits Peru. Five species of Doricha range from the Bahamas and parts of Mexico into Central America.

2. A sea-swallow or tern: from the long forked tail. See cut under roseate. [Prov. Eng.]—3. A British shears-moth, as Hadena dentina.

shearwater (shēr'wâ″tėr), n. [Formerly also sheerwater, shcrewater; < shear, v., + obj. water.] 1. A sea-bird of the petrel family, Procellariidæ, and section Puffincæ, having a long and comparatively slender, much-hooked bill, short nasal tubes obliquely truncate and with a thick nasal septum, long pointed wings, short tail, and close oily plumage. There are many species, mostly of the genus Puffinus, found on all seas, where they fly very low over the water, seeming to shear, shave, or graze it with their long blade-like wings (whence the name). Some of them are known as hags or hagdens. Three of the commonest are the greater shearwater, P. major; the Manx shearwater, P. anglorum; and the sooty shearwater, P. fuliginosus, all of the North Atlantic. They nest in holes by the seaside, and the female lays one white egg. See cut under hagden.

The flesh is edible, the fat is used in dressing leather, and the sound yields a kind of gelatin. It is of elongate form with a small dorsal, no adipose fin, a long anal, and a distinct caudal with a roundish margin; there are six barbels. It takes the place in Europe of the common catfish of North America, and belongs to the same family, but to a different subfamily. (See cut under Siluridæ.) [< ME. sheep, shep, scheep, schepe, sceap, ssep, sep (pl. sheep, scheep), < AS. sceáp, scēp (pl. sceáp, scēp) = OS. scāp = OFries. skēp, schēp = D. schaap = MLG. schāp, LG. schaap = OHG. scāf, MHG. A ruminant mammal of the family Bovidæ, subfamily Ovinæ, and genus Ovis; specifically, Ovis aries, domesticated in many varieties, and one of the animals most useful to man. The male is a ram, the female a ewe, and the young a lamb; the flesh of the adult is mutton; of the young, lamb; the coat or fleece is wool, a principal material of warm clothing; the prepared hide is sheepskin, used for many purposes; the entrails furnish sausage-cases, and are also dried and twisted into strings for musical instruments ("catgut"); the prepared fat makes tallow or suet; and the twisted horns of the ram are used in the manufacture of various utensils. The milk of the ewe is thicker than that of the cow, yielding a relatively greater quantity of butter and cheese. The sheep is one of the most harmless and timid of animals. The artificial breeds of O. aries are numerous; it is not known from what wild stock or stocks they are descended. The mouflon is a probable ancestor of some at least of the domestic varieties, especially those with short tail and crescentic horns. The principal English varieties of the sheep are the large Leicester, the Cotswold, the Southdown, the Cheviot, and the black-faced breeds. The Leicester comes early to maturity, attains a large size, has a fine full form, and carries more mutton, though not of finest quality, in the same apparent dimensions than any other; the wool is not so long as in some other breeds, but is considerably finer. The Cotswolds have been improved by crossing with Leicesters; their wool is fine, and their mutton fine-grained and full-sized. Southdowns have short, close, and curled wool, and their mutton is highly valued for its flavor; they attain a large size. All these require a good climate and rich pasture. The Cheviot is much hardier, and is well adapted for the green, grassy hills of Highland districts; the wool is short, thick, and fine. The Cheviot possesses good fattening qualities, and yields excellent mutton. The black-faced is hardiest of all, and adapted for wild heathery hills and moors; its wool is long and coarse, but its mutton is the very finest. The Welsh resembles the black-faced, but is less hardy; its mutton is delicious, but its fleece weighs only about 2 pounds. The foreign breeds of sheep are numerous, some of the more remarkable being (a) the broad-tailed sheep, common in Asia and Egypt, and remarkable for its large heavy tail; (b) the Iceland sheep, having three, four, or five horns; (c) the fat-rumped sheep of Tatary, with an accumulation of fat on the rump, which, falling down in two great masses behind, often entirely conceals the tail; (d) the Astrakhan or Bucharian sheep, with the wool twisted in spiral curls, and of very fine quality; (e) the Wallachian or Cretan sheep, with very large, long, and spiral horns, those of the male being upright, and those of the female at right angles with the head. All the wild species of Ovis have the book-name sheep, and also particular designations. (See argali, bighorn, mouflon, musimon.) The only indigenous form in the New World is the Rocky Mountain sheep, or bighorn, O. montana. Certain Ovinæ of modern genera detached from Ovis are called sheep with a qualifying term, as the aoudad, or Barbary sheep. See cuts under aoudad, bighorn, merino, Ovis, quadricorn, and Ruminantia.

Those [eyes] of an amorous, roguish look derive their title even from the sheep; and we say such a one has a sheep's eye, not so much to denote the innocence as the simple slyness of the cast. Spectator.

2. In zoöl., a hard outer case or covering; a crust; a test; a lorica; a carapace; an indurated (osseous, cartilaginous, cuticular, chitinous, calcareous, silicious, etc.) integument or part of integument. A shell in one, two, or several pieces is so highly characteristic of mollusks that these animals are commonly called shell-fish collectively, and many of them are grouped as Testacea, Conchifera, etc. In some moliusks, as dibranchiate cephalopods, the shell is internal, constituting the pen or cuttle (see calamary); in others there is no shell. The shell is secreted chiefly by a mantle or folds of the mantle which are developed around the soft parts, and is usually composed of carbonate of lime. It is generally univalve and spiral, as in most gastropods. In chitons there are eight valves imbricated in a longitudinal series, bound together by a marginal band. In bivalves two shells are developed from and cover the sides of the animal, right and left. (See cuts under bivalve.) Some moliusks otherwise bivalve have accessory valves. (f) In Brachiopoda there are two valves, but one covers the back and the other the abdominal region, so that the valves are dorsal and ventral. These shells are sometimes composed chiefly of phosphate of lime, as in linguias. (j) In Vermes, the tube or case of a tubicolous worm, when hard, thick, or rigid, like a mollusk's shell: as, the shell of a serpula. (k) In some Protozoa, a silicious or calcareous test or lorica of any kind. Such shells are present under numberless modifications, often beautifully shaped and highly complicated, perforated, camerated, etc., as in foraminifers, radiolarians, sun-animalcules, many infusorians, etc.

Cf. townreeve, portreeve.] The chief civil officer charged with administering justice within a county, under direction of the courts, or of the crown or other executive head of the state, and usually having also some incidental judicial functions. (a) In England, the chief officer of the crown in every county or shire, who does all the sovereign's business in the county, the crown by letters patent committing the custody of the county to him alone. Sheriffs are appointed by the crown upon presentation of the judges in a manner partly regulated by law and partly by custom (see pricking); the citizens of London, however, have the right of electing the sheriffs for the city of London and the county of Middlesex. These appointed are bound under a penalty to serve the office, except in specified cases of exemption or disability. As keeper of the queen's peace, the sheriff is the first man in the county, and superior in rank to any nobleman therein during his office, which he holds for a year. He is specially intrusted with the execution of the laws and the preservation of the peace, and for this purpose he has at his disposal the whole civil force of the county—in old legal phraseology, the posse comitatus. He has also some judicial functions, less extensive now than formerly. The most ordinary of his functions, which he always executes by a deputy called under-sheriff, consists in the execution of writs. The sheriff performs in person such duties only as are either purely honorary, such as attendance upon the judges on circuit, or of some dignity and public importance, such as the presiding over elections and the holding of county meetings, which he may call at any time.

A shirreve hadde he been and a countour.

(b) In Scotland, the chief local judge of a county. There are two grades of sheriffs, the chief or superior sheriffs and the sheriffs-substitute (besides the lord lieutenant of the county, who has the honorary title of sheriff-principal), both being appointed by the crown. The chief sheriff, usually called simply the sheriff, may have more than one substitute under him, and the discharge of the greater part of the duties of the office now practically rests with the sheriffs-substitute, the sheriff being (except in one or two cases) a practising advocate in Edinburgh, while the sheriff-substitute is prohibited from taking other employment, and must reside within his county. The civil jurisdiction of the sheriff extends to all personal actions on contract, bond, or obligation without limit, actions for rent, possessory actions, etc., in which cases there is an appeal from the decision of the sheriff-substitute to the sheriff, and from him to the Court of Session. He has also a summary jurisdiction in small-debt cases where the value is not more than £12. In criminal cases the sheriff has jurisdiction in all offenses the punishment for which is not more than two years' imprisonment. He has also jurisdiction in bankruptcy cases to any amount. (c) In the United States, except in New Hampshire and Rhode Island, sheriffs are elected by popular vote, the qualification being that the sheriff must be a man, of age, a citizen of the United States and of the State, and a resident in the county; usually he can hold no other office, and is not eligible for reelection until after the lapse of a limited period. In all the States there are deputy sheriffs, who are agents and servants of the sheriff. In New York and some other States there is, as in England, an undersheriff, who acts in place of his chief in the latter's absence, etc. The principal duties of the sheriff are to preserve peace and order throughout the county, to attend the courts as the administrative officer of the law, to guard prisoners and juries, to serve the process and execute the judgments of the courts, and to preside at inquisitions and assessments of damages on default.—High sheriff, the sheriff as distinguished from the undersheriff and other deputies.—Joint sheriff, two persons jointly appointed sheriff, or one of such persons.—Sheriff of Middlesex case, a decision in 1840, noted in English constitutional history, on the relative powers of Parliament, to imprison for contempt and the courts to discharge on habeas corpus.—Sheriff's jury. See jury.—Sheriff turn, in early Eng. law, the periodical court or session held by a sheriff successively in the various hundreds of his county, at which the freeholders were bound to appear as a part of their service.—Statute of sheriffs. No boy who cared for his peace of mind and wished to save himself some "nips and tweaks" would appear in school without at least an oak-leaf in honour of the day.

A vessel of considerable size adapted to navigation: a general term for sea-going vessels of every kind, except boats. Ships are of various sizes and fitted for various uses, and receive different names, according to their rig, motive power (wind or steam or both), and the purposes to which they are applied, as war-ships, transports, merchantmen, barks, brigs, schooners, luggers, sloops, xebecs, galleys, etc. The name ship, as descriptive of a particular rig, and as roughly implying a certain size, has been used to designate a vessel furnished with a bowsprit and three masts—a mainmast, a foremast, and a mizzenmast—each of which is composed of a lower mast, a topmast, and a topgallantmast, and carries a certain number of square sails. The square sails on the mizzen distinguish a ship from a bark, a bark having only fore-and-aft sails on the mizzen. But the development of coastwise navigation, in which the largest vessels have generally a schooner rig and sometimes four masts, has gone far toward rendering this restricted application of the word of little value. Owing to increase of size, and especially increase in length, some sailing vessels now have four masts, and this rig is said to have certain advantages. Until recent times wood, such as oak, pine, etc., was the material of which all ships were constructed, but it is being rapidly superseded by iron and steel; and in Great Britain, which is the chief ship-building country in the world, the tonnage of the wooden vessels constructed is small compared with that of vessels built of iron. The first iron vessel classed at Lloyd's was built at Liverpool in 1838, but iron barges and small vessels had been constructed long before this. Four-masted vessels which are square-rigged on all four masts are called four-masted ships; those which have fore-and-aft sails on the after mast are called four-masted barks. See also cuts under beam, 3, body-plan, counter, forebody, forecastle, keel, poop, and prow.

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 46.

The name scir [AS. scire] or shire, which marks the division immediately superior to the hundred, merely means a subdivision or share of a larger whole, and was early used in connexion with an official name to designate the territorial sphere appointed to the particular magistracy denoted by that name. So the diocese was the bishop's scire, and the stewardship of the unjust steward is called in the Anglo-Saxon translation of the Gospel his grœfscire. We have seen that the original territorial hundreds may have been smaller shires. The historical shires or counties owe their origin to different causes.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 48.

Cf. folk-moot, witena-gemot.] Formerly, in England, a court or assembly of the county held periodically by the sheriff along with the bishop of the diocese, and with the ealdorman in shires that had ealdormen.

The presence of the ealdorman and the bishop, who legally sat with him [the sheriff] in the shire-moot, and whose presence recalled the folk-moot from which it sprang, would necessarily be rare and irregular, while the reeve was bound to attend; and the result of this is seen in the way in which the shire-moot soon became known simply as the sheriff's court.
J. R. Green, Conquest of England, p. 230.

The shiremoot, like the hundredmoot, was competent to declare folkright in every suit, but its relation to the lower court was not, properly speaking, an appellate jurisdiction. Its function was to secure to the suitor the right which he had failed to obtain in the hundred.

He then proceeds to state, apparently as a corollary of what may be called his bloody-shirt principle, that our Revolution was not popular with what he terms the inferior classes. . . . But most assuredly the Americans did not want a visible signal to push them on; and he who should have displayed a bloody shirt for that purpose would have been followed by the contempt of the spectators, and saluted with stones by every idle boy in the streets.

A jolt is a shaking by a single abrupt jerking motion upward or downward or both, as by a springless wagon on a rough road. Shock is used figuratively; we speak sometimes of the collision of ideas or of minds; concussion and jolt are only literal.

(= Chin. tsiang kiun, handle (or lead) the army), < sho (= Chin. tsiang), take, hold, have charge of, or lead in fight, + gun (= Chin. kiun, kun), army.] General: the title of the commander-in-chief or captain-general of the Japanese army during the continuance of the feudal system in that country. More fully called tai shogun ('great general'), or sei-i-tai-shogun, 'barbarian-subduing-great-general'—the earlier wars of the Japanese (when this form of the title was first used) having been waged against the 'barbarians' or aboriginal inhabitants of the country. The office was made hereditary in the Minamoto family in 1192, when the title was bestowed on a famous warrior and hero named Yoritomo, and continued in that family or some branch of it until 1868, when it was abolished, and the feudal system virtually came to an end. From the first a large share of the governing power naturally devolved on the shogun as the chief vassal of the mikado. This power was gradually extended by the encroachments of successive shoguns, especially of Iyeyasu, founder in 1603 of the Tokugawa line, and in course of time the shoguns became the virtual rulers of the country—always, however, acknowledging the supremacy of the mikado, and professing to act in his name. This state of things has given rise to the common but erroneous opinion and assertion that Japan had two emperors—"a spiritual emperor" (the mikado), living in Kioto, and "a temporal emperor" (the shogun), who held court in Yedo (now called Tokio). In the troubles which arose subsequent to 1858 in connection with the ratification and enforcement of the treaties which the shogunate had made with foreign nations, establishing trade relations, etc., many of the daimios, tired of the domination of the shogun and disapproving of the treaties, sided with the emperor; this led in 1867 to the resignation of the shogun of the time, and in the following year the office was abolished, the reigning mikado undertaking to govern the country in person. 14. Not prolonged in utterance; less in duration than times or sounds called long: said of times, vowels, and syllables. Specifically—(a) In pros., not exceeding in duration the unit of time (mora, semeion), or so regarded. The ordinary short vowel of ancient pronunciation varied somewhat in actual duration, but seems to have usually been uttered as rapidly as was consistent with full distinctness of sound. (See long[1], n., 2.) Sometimes in metrical or rhythmical treatment a short syllable occupied less time in utterance than a normal short (was a diminished short, βραχεῖα μεμειωμένη), and in what is commonly known as elision the first of two vowel-sounds, although still audible, was shortened to such a degree as to be entirely disregarded in metrical composition. A syllable containing a short vowel was regarded as short unless the vowel stood in position (which see). Rhythmical or musical composition occasionally allowed itself the liberty of treating a prosodic short as a long (an augmented short, βραχεῖα ηὐξημένη), and vice versa. In metrical composition a short syllable usually did not take the ictus; hence, in modern versification, an unaccented syllable, whatever its duration, is said to be short. A short time, vowel, or syllable is marked by a curved line written independently or above the vowel: thus, ⏑, ă.

The varieties of shorthand now in use are nearly all based on the phonetic principle. The system introduced by Isaac Pitman in 1837, and known as phonography (which see) from 1840, has, in its various modifications by its originator and others, a very wide currency wherever the English language is spoken. After the issue of the ninth edition of his work, in 1853, Pitman introduced extensive changes (especially in the vowel-system). The following is a comparative view of Pitman's later and earlier systems and that of a modification of them by J. E. Munson of New York (1866):

Pitman, Munson, and Pitman's Ninth Edition:

p, b, t, d, ch, j, k, g, f, v, th, dh, s, z, sh, zh, m, n, ng, l, r.

Pitman: w, y, h.

Munson: w, y, h.

"9th Ed.": w, y, h.

Vowels.

|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Pitman, Munson: | ah | ā | ē | ă | ĕ | ĭ |
| P., M., "9th Ed.": | aw | ō | ōō | ŏ | ŭ | o͝o |
| "9th Ed.": | ē | ā | ah | ĭ | ĕ | ă |

Diphthongs.

| Pitman: | ı | oı | ow | ʊ |
| Munson: | ı | oı | ow | ʊ |
| "9th Ed.": | ı | oı | ow | ʊ |

For further comparison, the sentence "my tongue is the pen of a ready writer," as written in these three systems, is here given:

shot-gun (shot'gun), n. A smooth-bore gun used for firing small shot, as in the chase of birds and small quadrupeds; a fowling-piece: commonly called gun simply, in implied distinction from rifle or other small-arm. Some shot-guns are too heavy to be brought to the shoulder. (See punt-gun, ducking-gun.) Shot-guns are usually either single-barreled or double-barreled; rarely a third barrel is added; sometimes one of the barrels is rifled (see the quotation). Besides being smooth-bored, a shot-gun differs from any form of rifle in having no hind-sight and a simple pin as fore-sight. Shot-guns are also distinguished as muzzle-loaders and breech-loaders; the former are little used now. Though the bore is always smooth, it is often contracted toward the muzzle to concentrate the discharge. (See choke-bore.) The standard shot-gun now most used by sportsmen is the double-barreled breech-loader, of 7 to 10 pounds weight, about 30 inches length of barrel, length and drop of stock fitting the shooter, often with pistol-grip, caliber usually 10, 12, or 14, and taking corresponding sizes of paper or metal shot-cartridges (see shell) with center-fire primers or percussion-caps and an automatic ejector; such as have the cock or hammer concealed in the mechanism of the lock are specified as hammerless. The special makes are numberless, but decided variations from the standard pattern are rare. Shot-guns are seldom fitted with hair-triggers, but usually with rebounding locks, in which the hammer flies back to half-cock on delivering the blow on the plunger. A special form of shot-gun, used by naturalists, is described under cane-gun.

The human shoulder-blade is somewhat peculiar in shape, and some of its parts are named in terms not applicable or seldom applied to scapulæ in general. It is a compound bone, including a coracoid as a mere process, and develops from seven centers of ossification, two of which are coracoid. It is commonly said to have two surfaces, three borders, and three angles. Of these, the ventral surface, which lies upon the ribs, is the venter; the other surface is the dorsum. The flat part above the spine is the supraspinous fossa; that below the spine, the infraspinous fossa; the venter is also called the subscapular fossa. These three fossæ indicate the primitively prismatic and rod-like character of the bone; and they correspond respectively to the prescapular, postscapular, and subscapular surfaces of a more general nomenclature. The spine being actually in the axis of the scapula, it follows that the long vertebral border ($a_1$ to $a_2$ in the figure) is the proximal end of the bone. The glenoid fossa is at the other end of the bone, at its confluence with the coracoid. The axillary border is one edge of the primitive prism; the superior border is another; and the third is along the free edge of the spine. The suprascapular notch in the superior border (converted into a foramen by a ligament) denotes the passage there of the vessels and nerve called by the same name. The peculiarities of the human scapula result mainly from its extensive growth downward to the inferior angle ($a_2$), with consequent lengthening of the axillary border and of the so-called vertebral "border," and from great development of the spine and acromion. This bone, as usual in the higher vertebrates, has two articulations—with the clavicle and with the humerus; excepting the acromioclavicular articulation, it is attached to the trunk solely by muscles, of which sixteen (sometimes seventeen) arise from or are inserted into the bone. (Compare the shape of the rabbit's shoulder-blade, figured under metacromion, and of a bird's, under scapula.) See also cut under shoulder.

The body of water formed by the dam bursts the crust of ice on its surface, and the current shoves or pushes the ice in great cakes or blocks, forming in some places masses over 30 feet high. In elect., a conductor, usually of relatively low resistance, joining two points in an electric circuit, and forming a desired circuit or path through which a part of the current will pass, the amount depending on the relative resistance of the shunt and that part of the principal circuit whose extremities it connects. Any number of shunts may be applied to a conductor, and the current distributed among them in any desired manner. The current passing through a galvanometer or other measuring-instrument may be reduced in any desired degree by the introduction of a shunt; and the factor by which the current indicated by the instrument must be multiplied in order to give the total current is called the shunt-multiplier. See field shunt, under field.—Shunt dynamo. See dynamo, and electric machine (under electric).

dle for the reception of the bobbin or pirn on which the weft is wound. The weft unwinds from this bobbin as the shuttle runs from one side of the web to the other. It is driven across by a smart blow from a pin called a picker or driver. There is one of these pins on each side of the loom, and the two are connected by a cord to which a handle is attached. Holding this handle in his right hand, the weaver moves the two pins together in each direction alternately by a sudden jerk. A shuttle propelled in this manner is called a fly-shuttle, and was invented in 1738 by John Kay, a mechanic of Colchester, England. Before this invention the weaver took the shuttle between the finger and thumb of each hand alternately and threw it across, by which process much time was lost. There are also a great variety of automatic picker-motions for driving the shuttles of looms. Compare picker-motion.

The shuttle travels on a roller-carriage drawn by a cord in the shuttle-race below the warp-threads, and having also a set of upper rollers. The shuttle has also a pair of under rollers, one at each end, and travels over the lower series of warp-threads through the shed, being pushed along by the carriage while the warp-threads are passed, without straining them, between the upper rollers of the carriage and the rollers of the shuttle. Compare positive-motion loom, under loom.—Weaver's-shuttle, in conch., a shuttle-shell, as Radius volva. See cut under shuttle-shell.

The root is appar. σιβ-, which is perhaps = L. sib- in per-sibus, acute, wise, and related to Gr. σοφός, wise (see sophist), and L. sapere, be wise, perceive: see sapient, sage[1].] 1. In anc. myth., one of certain women reputed to possess special powers of prophecy or divination and intercession with the gods in behalf of those who resorted to them. Different writers mention from one to twelve sibyls, but the number commonly reckoned is ten, enumerated as the Persian or Babylonian, Libyan, Delphian, Cimmerian, Erythræan, Samian, Cumæan, Hellespontine or Trojan, Phrygian, and Tiburtine. Of these the most celebrated was the Cumæan sibyl (of Cumæ in Italy), who, according to the story, appeared before Tarquin the Proud and offered him nine books for sale. He refused to buy them, whereupon she burned three, and offered the remaining six at the original price. On being again refused, she destroyed three more, and offered the remaining three at the price she had asked for the nine. Tarquin, astonished at this conduct, bought the books, which were found to contain directions as to the worship of the gods and the policy of the Romans. These sibylline books, or books professing to have this origin, written in Greek hexameters, were kept with great care at Rome, and consulted from time to time by oracle-keepers under the direction of the senate. They were destroyed at the burning of the temple of Jupiter in 83 B. C. Fresh collections were made, which were finally destroyed soon after A. D. 400. The Sibylline Oracles referred to by the Christian fathers belong to early ecclesiastical literature, and are a curious mixture of Jewish and Christian material, with probably here and there a snatch from the older pagan source. In composition they seem to be of various dates, from the second century before to the third century after Christ.

There has been some tendency in England to confine sick to the distinctive sense of 'nauseated,' but in America the word has continued to have its original breadth of meaning, as found in the Bible and in Shakspere. Diseased follows the tendency of disease to be specific, as in diseased lungs, or a diseased leg—that is, lungs or a leg affected by a certain disease; but the word may be used in a general way. Morbid is a more technical or professional term, indicating that which is not healthy or does not act in a healthy way; the word is also the one most freely used in figurative senses: as, morbid sensitiveness, self-consciousness, or irritability. Sick and ill apply to a state presumably temporary, however severe; sickly indicates a state not quite equal to sickness, but more permanent, because of an underlying lack of constitutional vigor. See illness, debility, disease.

It is characterized by monœcious flowers, with broadly bell-shaped or flattened five-toothed calyx, and five-parted wheel-shaped corolla, the stamens in the male flowers united into a short column bearing from two to five sessile curved or flexuous anthers. The ovary in the female flowers is bristly or prickly, and is crowned with a short style divided into three stigmas, producing a small flattened coriaceous or woody fruit with acute or long-beaked apex, commonly set with many sharp needles, and filled by a single large seed. There are about 31 species, natives of warm parts of America, one, S. angulatus, extending to Kansas and Canada, found also in Australia and New Zealand. They are smooth or rough-hairy climbers, or sometimes prostrate herbs, and bear thin, angled leaves, three-cleft tendrils, and small flowers, the fertile commonly clustered at the base of a staminate raceme. For S. angulatus, see one-seeded or star cucumber, under cucumber.

Sida (sī'dä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < Gr. σίδη, the pomegranate, a water-lily, also, in Theophrastus, a plant of the genus Althæa or other malvaceous plant.] 1. It is characterized by solitary pendulous ovules and an ovary of a single ring of five or more carpels, which finally fall away from the axis and are each without appendages and indehiscent, or are sometimes at the summit two-valved, bristle-tipped or beaked. There are about 90 species, natives of warm climates, mostly American, with about 23 in Australia and 8 in Africa and Asia. They are either herbs or shrubs, generally downy or woolly, and bearing flowers sometimes large and variegated, but in most species small and white or yellow. Several species are known as Indian mallow; S. Napæa, a tall white-flowered plant with maple-like leaves, occasional in the eastern United States, is sometimes cultivated under the name Virginian mallow; S. rhombifolia (from its local use named Canary Island tea-plant), a species widely diffused in the tropics, with its variety retusa, yields a fiber considered suitable for cordage- and paper-making, which, from receiving attention in Australia, has been called Queensland hemp.

side[1] (sīd), n. and a. [< ME. side, syde, rarely sithe, < AS. sīde = OS. sīda = OFries. side =

MD. sijde, D. zijde = MLG. side, LG. side, siede = OHG. sîta, sîtta, MHG. sîte, G. seite = Icel. sitha = Sw. sida = Dan. side (not recorded in Goth.), side; perhaps orig. that which hangs down or is extended, < AS. sîd, long, wide, spacious, = Icel. sîthr, long, hanging down: see side[2]. Cf. beside, besides.] I. n. 1. One of the two terminal surfaces, margins, or lines of an object or a space situated laterally to its front or rear aspect; a part lying on the right or the left hand of an observer, with reference to a definite point of view: as, the sides of a building (in contradistinction to its front and rear or back, or to its ends); the sides of a map or of a bed (distinguished from the top and bottom, or from the head and foot, respectively).

Dryden, Pal. and Arc., ii. 620.

2. Specifically, with reference to an animal body: (a) Either half of the body, right or left, which lies on either hand of the vertical median longitudinal plane; the entirety of any lateral part or region: as, the right side; the left side. (b) The whole or a part of the body in front of or behind a vertical transverse plane: as, the front side; the hinder side; the dorsal side. (c) A part of the body lying laterally with reference to any given or assumed axis, and opposed to another similar or corresponding part: as, the front or back side of the arm. (d) A surface or extent of any body, or part of any body, that is external or internal, considered with reference to its opposite: as, the inner or outer side. See inside, outside. (e) Especially, that part of the trunk of an animal which lies or extends between the shoulder and the hip, and partienlarly the surface of such part; the lateral region or superficies of the chest and belly.

Nor let your Sides too strong Concussions shake [with laughter], Lest you the Softness of the Sex forsake.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love, iii.

(f) One of the two most extensive surfaces of anything, being neither top or bottom, nor end, nor edge or border. [Since every organism, like any other solid, has three dimensions, to the extent of which in opposite directions side may be applied, it follows that there are three pairs of sides, the word having thus three definitions; a fourth sense is that which relates to the exterior and the (often hollow) interior; a fifth is a definite restriction of right and left sides; and a sixth is a loose derived application of the word, without reference to any definite axes or planes.]

3. One of the continuous surfaces of an object limited by terminal lines; one of two or more bounding or investing surfaces; a superficial limit or confine, either external or internal: as, the six sides of a cube (but in geometry the word is not thus used for face, but as synonymous with edge); the side of a hill or mountain (hill*side*, mountain-side); the upper and under sides of a plank; the right and wrong sides of a fabric or garment (see phrase below); the sides of a cavern or a tunnel. The word side may be used either of all the bounding surfaces of an object, as with certain prisms, crystals, and geometrical figures, or as exclusive of parts that may be called top, bottom, edge, or end, as with a cubical box, a plank, etc.

Men seith that dune-is [hill's] sithen on
Was mad temple salamon.

Milton, Comus, l. 295.

4. One of the extended marginal parts or courses of a surface or a plane figure; one of any number of distinct terminal confines or lateral divisions of a surface contignous to or conterminous with another surface: as, the opposite sides of a road or a river; the east and west sides of the ocean; all sides of a field. The outer parts of an oblong or an irregular surface may all be called sides, or distinguished as the long and short sides, or as sides and ends, according to occasion. Side in this sense is more comprehensive than margin, edge, border, or verge (commonly used in defining it), since it may be used so as to include a larger extent of contiguous surface than any of these words. Thus, the sides of a room may be all the parts of its floor-space not comprised in a central part reserved or differentiated in some special way. The sides of a table are those marginal parts upon which food is served. The east and west sides of a continent may constitute jointly the whole of it, or may consist of larger or smaller marginal strips or divisions, according as they are considered as separated by a mesial line or by some intervening region. The amount of latitude with which the word may be used in particular cases does not admit of definitive discrimination; but there is usually no difficulty in determining the intention of a writer or speaker in his employment of it.

A great market-place
Upon two other sides filis alt the space.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 4.

5. Position or place with reference to an intermediate line or area; a space or stretch divided from another by the limit or course of something: preceded by on and followed by of, either expressed or (sometimes) understood: as, a region on both sides of a river; we shall not meet again this side the grave.

sidereal (sī-dē'rē-al), a. [Formerly also siderial; < L. sidereus (> It. Sp. Pg. sidereo), < sidus (sider-), a constellation, a star. Cf. sideral.]

Pertaining or relating to the constellations or fixed stars; consisting of or constituted by fixed stars: as, the sidereal regions; sidereal calculations; a sidereal group or system. Sidereal distinctively refers rather to stars in the aggregate or as arranged in constellations or groups than to a star considered singly. It is, therefore, not a precise synonym of stellar or astral, and still less, of course, of starry; although in many phrases it is interchangeable with stellar. Thus, the "sidereal spaces" are the "stellar spaces," and "sidereal gold" is "starry spangles."

The sun, which is the organ and promptuary of all terrestrial and siderial light. Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, i. 10.

And o'er the deserts of the sky unfold
Their burning spangles of sidereal gold.
W. Broome, Paraph. of Ecclus. xliii.

The conjunction of the planets Jupiter and Saturn is one of the rarest of sidereal events.
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 169.

Sidereal clock or chronometer, a clock or chronometer that keeps sidereal time.—Sidereal day, hour, month. See the nouns.—Sidereal magnetism, according to the believers in animal magnetism, the influence of the stars upon patients. Imp. Dict.—Sidereal system, the system of stars. The solar system is considered a member of the sidereal system, in the same sense as the earth with its moon, and Saturn with its satellites, are considered members of the solar system.—Sidereal time, time as measured by the apparent diurnal motion of the stars. The sidereal day, the fundamental period of sidereal time, is taken to begin and end with the passage over the meridian of the vernal equinox, the first point of Aries, or the origin of right ascension (three names for the same thing). There is just one more sidereal than mean solar day in a sidereal year. The sidereal day is 3m. 55.91s. shorter than a mean solar day. The sidereal time of mean noon is 0 hours on March 22d (21st, leap-years), 6 hours on June 21st, 12 hours on September 20th (21st, years preceding leap-years), and 18 hours on December 21st (20th, leap-years). These dates are for the meridian of Washington. For Greenwich it is 0 hours on March 22d in all years, and 6 hours on June 22d in years preceding leap-years. Sidereal time is the only uniform standard of time-measurement; and this cannot be absolutely uniform, since the friction of the tides must tend to retard the motion of the earth.—Sidereal year, the time in which the earth makes one complete revolution round the sun. The ratio of the sidereal year to the tropical year is that of unity to unity minus the quotient of the yearly precession by 360°—that is, it is longer than the tropical year by 20m. 23.3s.; its length is thus 365 days 6 hours 9 minutes 9.5 seconds.

It is one of the important ores of iron. Also called chalybite, spathic or sparry iron, junckerite, junkerite. The term siderite is used only as meaning chalybite, spathic iron, or carbonate of iron by scientific men at the present time.

Sideritis (sid-e-rī′tis), n. [NL. It is characterized by flowers with a five-toothed tubular calyx within which the corolla-tube, stamens, and style are all included, a corolla with the upper lip flattish and the lower with a larger middle lobe, and four didynamous stamens, the anthers of the forward or longer pair usually only half-formed, those of the other pair of two diverging cells. There are about 45 species, natives of the Mediterranean region, abundant in western Asia and extending west to the Canaries. They are herbs or shrubs, usually densely woolly or velvety, with entire or toothed leaves, and small and generally yellowish flowers in axillary whorls or crowded into a dense spike. siderolite (sid′e-rō-līt), n. [< Gr. σίδηρος, iron, + λίθος, stone.] 1. A name first given by N. S. Maskelyne (in the form aëro-siderolite) to those meteorites which G. Rose had previously called pallasites. For meteorites consisting chiefly of metallic (nickeliferous) iron the name siderite was proposed by C. U. Shepard, and that of holosiderite by Daubrée; but the former is not admissible, because this name was long ago preoccupied by a well-known and widely distributed mineral species, and the latter cannot be accepted, because the majority of the specimens so designated are not wholly of iron. The name siderolite has therefore been transferred by M. E. Wadsworth to those meteorites which are composed chiefly of iron—in most cases, however, inclosing more or less irregular and nodular masses of pyrrhotite, schreibersite, graphite, etc. The same author includes in siderolite masses of iron of similar character although of terrestrial origin, as those of Ovifak in Greenland. See meteorite, under which the meaning of pallasite is given.

Sigillaria (sij-i-lā'ri-ȧ), n. [NL. (Brongniart, 1822), < L. sigillum, a seal: see sigil.] A genus of very important and widely spread fossil plants which occur in the (Carboniferous) coal-measures, and which are especially characteristic of the middle section of the series. Sigillaria is a tree often of large size, and chiefly known by the peculiar markings on the trunk, which in some respects resemble those which characterize Lepidodendron. These markings are leaf-scars, and they occur spirally distributed around the stem, and generally arranged on vertical ridges or ribs. Great numbers of species have been described, the variations in the form and arrangement of the leaf-scars and of the vascular scars being the points chiefly relied on for specific distinction. Sigilloria is but imperfectly known, so far as foliage and fruit are concerned, but most paleobotanists consider it probable that it will be eventually proved to be closely related to Lepidodendron; others refer it to the cycads; while there are some who maintain that it is probable that various plants quite different from one another in their systematic position have been included under the name Sigillaria.

sigillarian (sij-i-lā′ri-an), a. Belonging or related to Sigillaria.

The author has demonstrated a peculiarity in the origin of the medulla of the Sigillarian and Lepidodendroid plants. Nature, XLI. 573.

The significance of the last terms is that the values $m = n = 0$ are to be excluded in forming the sum.

sigmaspiral (sig′ma-spī″ral), a. [< sigmaspire + -al.] Curved as one turn of a cylindrical spiral, as a sponge-spicule; having the character of a sigmaspire.

(See notation, 2.) The principal astronomical signs are those representing the names of the twelve divisions or constellations of the zodiac. (See def. 11.) Others symbolize the sun, the earth, and the other planets, the moon and its different phases, and the first twenty or more of the asteroids or planetoids. The eight aspects have also signs, as follows: ☌ conjunction, ☍ opposition, △ trine, □ quadrature, ⚹ sextile, and three others very rarely used. In zoölogy two astronomical signs, ♂ and ♀, of Mars and Venus, are constantly used to denote male and female respectively; to which is sometimes added a plain circle, ⊙, meaning a young animal of undetermined sex. 3. The name of a person, or something used as representing his name, affixed or appended to a writing or the like, either by himself or by deputy, as a verification, authentication, or assent (as to a petition or a pledge). The initials, the first or familiar name by which one is known, or the mark or sign of the cross, and the like, if affixed by the person for that purpose, is a legal signature. A British peer uses his title as signature: thus, the Marquis of Salisbury signs himself simply "Salisbury." Prelates of the Church of England adopt signatures from the Latinized designations of their sees: thus, the Archbishop of Canterbury (E. W. Benson) signs himself "E. W. Cantuar."; the Bishop of Oxford (W. Stubbs), "W. Oxon." See sign, v. t., 2, 3.

4. In Scots law, a writing formerly prepared and presented by a writer to the signet to the baron of exchequer, as the ground of a royal grant to the person in whose name it was presented. This, having in the case of an original charter the sign manual of the sovereign, and in other cases the cachet appointed by the act of union for Scotland, attached to it, became the warrant of a conveyance under one or other of the seals, according to the nature of the subject or the object in view. Imp. Dict.

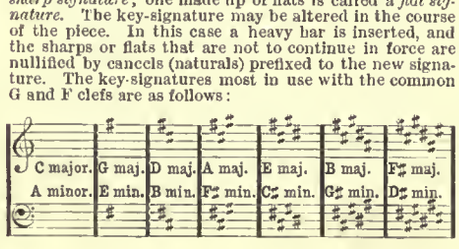
5. A letter or figure placed by the printer at the foot of the first page of every section or gathering of a book. The letters begin with A, the figures with 1, and follow in regular order on succeeding sections. They are intended to aid the binder in folding, collating, and arranging the sections consecutively. In early printed books the signature-mark was often repeated on the 3d, 5th, and 7th pages of a section of 16 pages as an additional safeguard for the folder: as, A on 1st page, A i on 3d, A ii on 5th, and A iv on 7th page. This practice has been discontinued except for offcuts of 12mos, which have the signature repeated.

Hence—6. A sheet; especially, in bookbinders' use, a sheet after it has been folded and is ready to be gathered.—7. In musical notation, the signs placed at the beginning of a staff to indicate the key (tonality) and the rhythm of a piece. The term properly includes the clef (which see), since it determines the form of the key-signature. The key-signature consists of sharps or flats placed upon the degrees corresponding to the black digitals of the keyboard that are to be used; their number and position show also the position of the key-note. The key-signature of a minor key is the same as that of its relative major key. A key-signature made up of sharps is called a sharp signature; one made up of flats is called a flat signature. The key-signature may be altered in the course of the piece. In this case a heavy bar is inserted, and the sharps or flats that are not to continue in force are nullified by cancels (naturals) prefixed to the new signature. The key-signatures most in use with the common G and F clefs are as follows:



Some slight variations in the above forms occur. (See key[1], key-signature, and circle of keys (under circle).) The rhythmical signature, or time-signature, consists of two numerals, the upper of which indicates the number of principal beats in the measure, and the lower the kind of note chosen to represent one such beat. (See rhythm, and rhythmical signature (under rhythmical).) The key-signature is usually repeated at the beginning of every brace; but the rhythmical signature is given but once.

A seal, especially a private seal, used instead of signing the name, or in addition to it, for verification of papers or the like. The signet in Scotland is a seal by which royal warrants connected with the administration of justice were formerly authenticated. Hence the title of writers to the signet or clerks of the signet, a class of legal practitioners in Edinburgh who formerly had important privileges, which are now nearly abolished. They act generally as agents or attorneys in conducting causes before the Court of Session. In English administration the signet is one of the seals for the authentication of royal grants, which before the abolition of the signet-office in 1848 was there affixed to documents before passing the privy seal, but it is not now required.

Silene (sī-lē'nē), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), so called in allusion to the frequent sticky exudation on its stems; < L. Silenus, Silenus: see Silenus.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Caryophyllaceæ, type of the tribe Sileneæ. It is characterized by flowers usually with a ten-nerved five-toothed club-shaped ovoid or inflated calyx, five spreading petals upon erect and slender claws commonly with two small scales, ten stamens, and a stalked ovary with one cell, a free central placenta, and usually three styles, the capsule opening at the top by six or by three short valves to discharge the numerous opaque and roughened seeds. About 480 species have been described, but only about 250 are now thought to be distinct. They are annual or perennial herbs of great variety of habit, tall and erect, tufted or procumbent, or partial climbers, with narrow entire opposite leaves, and pink, scarlet, white, or variously colored flowers, commonly in cymes or in one-sided spikes disposed in a terminal panicle. They are abundant in Asia north of the tropics, and in southern Europe and northern Africa, and there are about 12 species in South Africa. Besides 5 or 6 introduced species in the Atlantic border, the United States contains about 32 species, chiefly in the Rocky Mountain and Pacific region, about half of which are nearly or quite confined to California. Most of the species are known as catch-fly. Many are cultivated for their flowers, especially S. viscosa and S. Schafta, with S. Armeria, the sweetwilliam or Lobel's catch-fly, native of the south of Europe. S. Pennsylvanica, a glutinous early-flowering species, is the wild pink of the eastern United States (see cut under anthophore). (For S. Virginica, see fire-pink, under pink[2].) Many species with an inflated bladdery calyx are known in general as campion, among which S. Otites, abundant in sands of eastern Europe and known as Spanish campion, is used as an astringent. (For S. acaulis, also known in England as cushion-pink, see moss-campion.) S. Cucubalus (S. inflata), the bladder-campion, is a wide-spread species of Europe, central and northern Asia, now introduced in the Atlantic United States. It is also called behen and spatling-poppy; also, from the shape of its calyx, in America cowbell, in England knapbottle and whitebottle. S. maritima of the English coast (perhaps a variety of the last) has been called witches'-thimble.

Sileneæ (sī-lē'nē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1824), < Silene + -eæ.] A tribe of polypetalous plants of the order Caryophyllaceæ. It is characterized by flowers with a united and more or less tubular four- or five-toothed calyx, five petals with spreading border and a slender claw often bearing two scales at its summit, usually ten stamens, two or more styles separate to the base—the ovary, stamens, and petals all commonly elevated on a stalk-like gynophore or continuation of the receptacle. It includes 11 genera, all natives of the Old World except certain species of Dianthus and Silene. (See also Saponaria, Lychnis, and Gypsophila.) Most of the genera are cultivated for their ornamental flowers, as the pink, catchfly, etc., which resemble salver-shaped flowers, as phlox, in form, but are composed of separate petals.

Silent-alarm system. See fire-alarm telegraph, under fire-alarm.— Silent letter, a letter of a word which is not sounded or pronounced in the enunciation of the word, as the b in doubt, the c in victual, the d in handsome, the second of the two like consonants in ebb, odd, off, etc. The silent letter may be wholly useless, as in the above examples, or it may serve as an accidental or conventional index of the sound given to some adjacent letter: thus, the e in bate, mete, bite, note, mute, etc., is silent, but it indicates that the preceding vowel is long; the c in indict, the g in sign, the l in balm, etc., serve a similar purpose. Silent letters are traditional, representing sounds that once existed in the word, either in English or in the original tongue (as the p and l in psalm, pronounced in Latin psalmus, Greek ψαλμός), though often, as in this case, artificially restored after having been omitted (AS. sealm, ME. salm, saume), or have been foisted in to suit some false etymology or erroneous analogy, as the l in could, the g in foreign, the p in ptarmigan, etc. The proportion of silent letters in the present English spelling is about 12½ per cent.— Silent spirit, distilled spirit which is nearly or quite destitute of flavor and odor. Compare silence, 4.— Silent system, a system of prison discipline which imposes entire silence among the prisoners, even when assembled together.— Silent Week, Holy Week. Also Still Week.— The Silent Sister, an ironical name of Ireland.= Syn. 1 and 2. Silent, Taciturn, Dumb, Mute. Silent expresses the fact of not speaking, taciturn the habitual disposition to refrain from speaking. Dumb strictly implies lack of the organs of speech, or defect in them, or lack of the power of speaking, while mute implies some special cause: hence deaf-mute is thought by many a better name than deaf-and-dumb person for one who does not speak on account of deafness; an idol is dumb, not mute. Under figurative extension mute, dumb, and silent are often used outside of the lines here indicated. In such freer use there is an advance in strength from silent to mute and from mute to dumb: as, silent from abstraction; mute with astonishment; struck dumb with horror.

Silesian (si-lē′shan), a. and n. [< Silesia (see def.) + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to or characteristic of Silesia, a territory divided into the provinces of Austrian and Prussian Silesia, the latter much the larger.— Silesian bole. See bole[2].— Silesian wars, three wars waged by Frederick the Great of Prussia against Austria, in 1740–42, 1744–5, and 1756–63, ostensibly for the possession of Silesia. Each war terminated favorably for Prussia, and the greater part of Silesia was permanently acquired. In the third war, generally known as the Seven Years' War, Austria, France, Russia, Saxony, and Sweden were allied against Prussia, which received subsidies from Great Britain.

silhouette (sil-ō-et′), n. [= D. Dan. silhouet = Sw. G. silhuett, < F. silhouette, a profile portrait in black, so called after Étienne de Silhouette, French minister of finance in 1759, whose rigid public economy, intended to avert national bankruptcy, caused his name to be applied to things cheap, especially to things made ostentatiously cheap in derision of him.] 1. Originally, a portrait in black or some other uniform tint, sometimes varied as to the hair or other parts by lighter lines or a lightening of shade, showing the profile as cast by a candle on a sheet of paper; hence, any opaque portrait, design, or image in profile. Silhouette portraits were very common throughout the early years of the nineteenth century, and are often cut out of black paper.

silica (sil′i-kä), n. [NL., < L. silex (silic-), flint: see silex.] Silicon dioxid ($SiO_2$), or silicic anhydrid, a white or colorless substance, nearly insoluble in water and in all acids except hydrofluoric acid. Silica is extremely hard, and fuses with difficulty in the oxyhydrogen flame to a colorless amorphous glass. In nature, as quartz, it is universally distributed, and is the commonest of minerals; here belong the varieties rock-crystal, amethyst, chalcedony, agate, carnelian, onyx, jasper, flint, hornstone, etc., which differ in degree of crystallization and in purity, and hence in color. Silica in the form of quartz makes the sand of the sea-shore, and rock-masses as quartzite and sandstone. It also occurs as the rare mineral tridymite, known only in volcanic rocks and in a few meteorites, and as the amorphous opal, which is softer and more soluble than quartz and contains more or less water. (See quartz, tridymite, opal, also asmanite, cristobalite, melanophlogite.) Silica also forms the material of the spicules of many sponges and of the frustules of diatoms; deposits of the latter are not uncommon under peat-swamps, and in some regions vast beds have been accumulated. (See infusorial earth, under infusorial.) Silica combines with bases to form compounds called silicates, which constitute the rocky crust of the globe. It occurs in solution in the waters of many mineral springs, and sometimes is deposited in enormous quantities about geyser-basins. From the silicates taken up by plants silica is often deposited on the surface or in the interior of their stems. The value of the equisetum, or scouring-rush, is due to the silica contained in it, which sometimes amounts to 18 per cent. of the fresh plant. Sand is extensively used for the manufacture of glass and mortar. The prominent silicates recognized among minerals are the metasilicates, salts of metasilicic acid ($H_2SiO_3$), and orthosilicates, salts of orthosilicic acid ($H_4SiO_4$). Examples are rhodonite, or manganese metasilicate ($MnSiO_3$), and willemite, or zinc orthosilicate ($Zn_2SiO_4$). There are also disilicates, polysilicates, etc., but they are rarer, and their nature is less clearly understood. See glass, mortar[2], and sand[1]. Also called silex. — Infusorial silica. Same as infusorial earth (which see, under infusorial).— Silica bandage, in surg., a bandage which is moistened with sodium silicate after having been applied.

silicate (sil′i-kāt), n. [< silic-ic + -ate[1].] A salt of silicic acid. Silicates formed by the union of silicic acid with the bases alumina, lime, magnesia, potassa, soda, etc., constitute by far the greater number of the minerals which compose the crust of the globe. Glass is a mixture of artificial silicates of alkalis and alkaline earths or metallic oxids (see glass).— Silicate cotton. See cotton[1].

silicated (sil′i-kā-ted), a. [< silicate + -ed[2].] Coated, mixed, combined, or impregnated with silica.— Silicated soap, a mixture of sodium silicate and hard soap.

silicatization (sil-i-kā-ti-zā′shon), n. [< silicate + -ize + -ation.] The process of combining with silica so as to change to a silicate. [Rare.]

Silicea (si-lis′ē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < L. silex (silic-), flint: see silex.] 1. Siliceous sponges. See Silicispongiæ.— 2. Sponges, excepting Calcarea; all non-calcareous sponges. All the existing horny or fibrous sponges are supposed to have been derived from Silicea which have lost their spicules, or replaced them by a fibrous skeletal support. The Silicea, as a subclass of Spongiæ, are divided by Von Lendenfeld into three orders — Hexactinellida, Chondrospongiæ, and Cornacuspongiæ.

siliceous, a. See silicious.

silicic (si-lis′ik), a. [< NL. silica + -ic.] Of or pertaining to silica: as, silicic ether.— Silicic acid, an acid obtained by decomposing a silicate soluble in water with hydrochloric acid, and dialyzing the liquid so obtained. The acid is a colloid, and is obtained in an aqueous solution, which if concentrated sets to a jelly. Silicic acid has not yet been obtained in the pure form, as it undergoes decomposition into water and silica when dried. There are several hypothetical silicic acids, from which the several classes of silicates are supposed to be formed. Such are orthosilicic acid ($H_4SiO_4$), metasilicic acid ($H_2SiO_3$), and parasilicic acid ($H_6SiO_5$). None of these acids has been isolated.— Silicic ether, a compound of silicic acid with an alkyl, as methyl silicate ($(CH_3)_4SiO_4$).

silicicalcareous (sil″i-si-kal-kā′rē-us), a. [< NL. silica + L. calcarius, calcareous.] Consisting of silica and calcareous matter. Also silicocalcareous.

silicify (si-lis′i-fī), v.; pret. and pp. silicified, ppr. silicifying. [< NL. silica + facere, make, do (see -fy).] I. trans. To convert into silica, as organic matter of any kind, especially wood. — Silicified wood, jasperized wood, or agatized wood, wood which has been changed into the agate or jasper varieties of quartz by a replacement of the cellular structure of the wood by siliceous waters, sometimes containing oxids of iron and manganese. Agatized and jasperized wood admitting of a fine polish, and of the richest red, yellow, and brown colors, occurs in immense quantities in California, Nevada, and Arizona. It is extensively used for ornamental and decorative purposes. Table-tops three feet in diameter have been sawed from a single section.

II. intrans. To become silica; be impregnated with silica.

silicious, siliceous (si-lish'us, -ius), a. [= F. siliceux, of or pertaining to flint, < L. siliceus, of or pertaining to flint, < silex (silic-), flint: see silex, silica.] 1. Containing or resembling silica, or having its general character.—2. Silicispongiæ (sil″i-si-spon'ji-ē), n. pl. [NL., < L. silex (silic-), flint, + spongia, a sponge.] Silicious sponges; an order or other group of sponges characterized by the presence of silicious spicules: used with varying latitude by different writers. In the widest sense the Silicispongiæ include all non-calcareous sponges, whether silicious spicules are present or not, and are the same as Silicea, 2. In Sollas's classification the term is restricted to Micromastictora having a skeleton the scleres of which are not calcareous, being thus the silicious sponges without the Myxospongiæ. Also Silicospongiæ. See cuts under Porifera and Spongilla.

A non-metallic element which is obtained in three allotropic forms—namely, amorphous, as a dull-brown powder soluble in alkali, which burns when ignited; graphitic, in crystalline leaves having a strong metallic luster and lead-gray color, insoluble in alkali and non-combustible; and crystalline, in octahedral needles having a red luster, and hardness a little less than that of the diamond. Next to oxygen, silicon is the most abundant element in nature. It is found only in combination, chiefly with oxygen, forming silicon dioxid, or silica, which combined with bases makes up the larger part of the rock-crust of the globe. Also called silicium.—Silicon-brass, brass prepared with the addition of a small amount of silicon, by which its valuable qualities are said to be improved.—Silicon-bronze, copper prepared with the addition of a small amount of silicon-copper, by which its valuable properties for certain uses, as for telegraph-wire, are said to be considerably improved. The silicon-bronze telephone-wire of the same maker contained 1.02 per cent. of zinc, 1.14 of tin, and 0.05 of silicon. Also called high-silicon iron, and, of late more generally, ferro-silicon. For the more common Teut. word for 'silk,' see *say*4.] I. n. 1. A fine soft thread produced chiefly by the larvæ of various bombycid moths, especially of Bombyx (Sericaria) mori, known as silkworms, feeding on the leaves of the mulberry and several other trees. (See Bombyx and silkworm, and compare gut, 4.) Silk is the strongest, most lustrous, and most valuable of textile fibers. The thread is composed of several finer threads drawn by the worm from two large organs or glands containing a viscid substance, which extend, as in other cocoon-making caterpillars, along a great part of the body and terminate in two spinnerets at the mouth. With this substance the silkworm envelops itself, forming its cocoon. Raw silk is produced by the operation of winding off at the same time several of these cocoons, after they have been immersed in hot water to soften the natural gum on the filament, on a common reel, thereby forming one smooth, even thread. Before it is fit for weaving it is converted into one of three forms, namely singles, tram, or organzine. Singles (a collective noun) is formed of one of the reeled threads, twisted in order to give it strength and firmness. Tram is formed of two or more threads twisted together, and is commonly used in weaving as the shoot or weft. (For organzine, see thrown silk, below.) Silk of various qualities (but none fully equal to the preceding) is produced by different genera of the family Saturniidæ, particularly the tusser-worm of India, Attacus mylitta, the yama-mai of Japan, Antheræa pernyi, etc., feeding on the oak and other plants.

In this sense the word has a plural, silks, denoting different sorts or varieties: as, black silk; white silk; colored silks.

There are many species of different genera. The ordinary silkworm of commerce, or mulberry-silkworm, is the larva of Sericaria mori. It is indigenous to China, and its cultivation spread through India and Persia, reaching Constantinople about A. D. 550. This larva is a large whitish caterpillar with an anal horn, and the moth is large-bodied, white in color, with small wings. The best races have but one annual generation, and are known as annuals. There are races, however, which have two generations (bivoltins), or three (trivoltins), or four (quadrivoltins), or eight (dacys). The cocoon varies through shades of white, cream, green, or roseate, and also greatly in size. The principal moths of wild silkworms are the tusser (Attacus mylitta) of India, the yama-mai (Antheræa yama-mai) of Japan, the pernyi (Antheræa pernyi) of China, the ailantus or arrindy (Samia cynthia) of China, introduced into Europe and America, and the cecropia, polyphemus, promethia, and luna of North America. See cuts under Bombyx, luna-silkworm, and tamarin.

The material is tightly packed in the silo soon after it is gathered (sometimes with addition of a little salt), covered, and pressed down with heavy weights. Thus it is subjected to fermentation, which, if not carried too far, is beneficial rather than injurious. The resulting fodder is analogous in its nutritious quality to sauerkraut, which is the product of fermentation of cabbage. Similar pits or cavities in the ground or in rock have been used from remote times, in various parts of the world, for the prolonged preservation of grain in a dry state, through the careful exclusion of air and moisture.

See cut under Siluridæ.

Silurian (si-lū'ri-an), a. and n. [< L. Silures (Gr. Σιλῖρες), the Silures (see def. I., 1), + -ian.] I. a. 1. Of or belonging to the Silures, a people of ancient Britain, or their country.—2. In geol., of or pertaining to the Silurian. See II.

II. n. A name given by Murchison, in 1835, to a series of rocks the order of succession of which was first worked out by him in that part of England and Wales which was formerly inhabited by the Silures. The various groups of fossiliferous rocks included in the Silurian had, previous to Murchison's labors, been classed together as one assemblage, and called by the Germans grauwacke, sometimes Anglicized into graywacke (which see), also the Transition series or Transition limestone. In England and Germany these lower rocks have been greatly disturbed and metamorphosed, and have also been frequently invaded by eruptive masses; hence it was not until after considerable progress had been made toward a knowledge of the sequence of the higher fossiliferous groups that the lower (now designated as Silurian and Devonian) began to be studied with success. Almost contemporaneously with the working out of the order of succession of these lower rocks by Murchison in Great Britain, groups of strata of the same geological age, but lying for the most part in almost entirely undisturbed position, began to be investigated on and near the Atlantic coast of the United States, especially in New York, by the Geological Survey of that State, and a little later in Bohemia by Joachim Barrande. Murchison, Barrande, and James Hall, paleontologist of the New York Survey, are all agreed as to the adoption of the name Silurian, and in regard to the essential unity of the series or system thus designated. The Silurian is the lowest of the four great subdivisions of the Paleozoic, namely Silurian, Devonian, Carboniferous, and Permian. When undisturbed and unmetamorphosed, the Silurian is usually found to be replete with the remains of organic forms, of which by far the larger part is marine. The Silurian is divided into an Upper and a Lower Silurian, and each of these again is subdivided into groups and subgroups varying in nomenclature in various countries. The line between the Upper and Lower Silurian is drawn in Great Britain at the top of the May Hill sandstone or Upper Llandovery group; in New York, at the top of the Hudson River or Cincinnati group. The almost entire absence of vertebrates and of land-plants, and the paucity of plant-life in general, are the most striking features of Silurian life. The most prominent forms of the animal kingdom were the graptolites, trilobites, and brachiopods, and of these the first-mentioned are the most characteristic of all, since they range through nearly the whole Silurian, and disappear in the Devonian; while the trilobites, which begin at the same time with the graptolites, continue through the Devonian, and end only with the Carboniferous. As the line between the Silurian and Devonian is commonly drawn in England—namely, so as to include in the former the Ludlow group—the first vertebrates, in the form of a low type of fishes, appear near the top of the Upper Silurian; traces of land-animals (scorpions) have also been found in the Upper Silurian of Sweden and Scotland; and in France, in the Lower (?) Silurian, traces of insect life. A scorpion has also been found in the United States, at Waterville, New York, in the Waterlime group, or near the middle of the Upper Silurian. Mr. Whitfield, by whom the specimen was described, inclines to the opinion that the species, for which he instituted a new genus (Proscorpius), was aquatic and not air-breathing, and that it forms a link between the true aquatic forms like Eurypterus and Pterygotus and the true air-breathing scorpions of subsequent periods. He intimates that the same is likely to be true of the Swedish and Scottish Silurian scorpions. The traces of land-plants in the Silurian are rare, and for the most part of doubtful identification. Algæ, on the other hand, are of somewhat frequent occurrence. As the line between Silurian and Devonian is drawn in the United States—namely, between the Oriskany sandstone and the Canda-galli grit—there are neither land-animals nor fishes in the Silurian; and the evidence of the existence of land-plants lower than the Devonian is for the most part of a very doubtful character. The Silurian rocks are widely spread over the globe, with everywhere essentially the same types of animal life. This part of the series is of importance in the United States, especially in the northeastern Atlantic States and in parts of the Mississippi valley.

Siluric (si-lū'rik), a. [< L. Silures (see Silurian) + -ic.] Same as Silurian. [Rare.]

Siluridæ (si-lū'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Silurus + -idæ.] A very large family of physostomous fishes, of the order Nematognathi, represented by such forms as the sheat-fish of Europe and the catfishes or cats of America. It was the same as Siluroides of Cuvier. By Cope its name was used for Nematognathi with the anterior vertebræ regularly modified, the inferior pharyngeal bones separate, and an operculum developed. It thus contrasted with the Aspredinidæ and Hypophthalmidæ, and included all the Nematognathi except those belonging to the two families named. By Gill the family was restricted to those Nematognathi which have the anterior vertebræ regularly modified; the lower pharyngeal bones separate; the operculum developed; a dorsal fin, in connection with the abdominal portion of the vertebral column, rather short, and preceded by the spine; the pectoral fins armed with well-developed spines having a complex articulation with the shoulder-girdle; and the body naked, or with plates only along the lateral line. The lower jaw has no reflected lip, and there are usually from four to eight pairs of barbels, maxillary barbels being always developed. Species of the family thus limited are very numerous, several hundred having been described, and referred to many genera. Most of them inhabit fresh water, especially of tropical and subtropical countries, but many are also found in tropical seas. In Europe, one, the sheat-fish, Silurus glanis, occurs in the central and eastern regions of the continent; while a second, more southerly, and supposed to be the glanis of the ancients, has lately (1890) been distinguished as Silurus (Parasilurus) aristotelis. In North America the family is represented by a number of species belonging to different subfamilies, which are generally known under the name of catfishes. The leading genera of North America are Noturus, stone-cats; Amiurus, ordinary cats, pouts, bullheads, etc.; Ictalurus, channel-cats; Arius, sea-cats; and Ælurichthys (or Felichthys), gaff-topsails. See also cuts under catfish, gaff-topsail, pout, and stone-cat.

Chemical symbol, Ag; atomic weight, 107.9. A metal of a white color, having a specific gravity of 10.4 to 10.7 (according as it is cast, rolled, or hammered), harder than gold, and softer than copper, having a tenacity about equal to that of gold, and melting at a temperature a little lower than copper. Its whiteness is remarkable, that of tin alone among the common metals nearly approaching it; among the rare metals, iridium and lithium are equal to silver in color and luster. Silver crystallizes in the regular (isometric) system; but, although native silver is of frequent occurrence, distinct crystals are very rare. Arborescent and filiform shapes are most common, but very large solid masses have been found. Silver occurs in a great variety of ores, being mineralized by sulphur, antimony, and arsenic, as well as by chlorin, iodine, and bromine. These ores are widely distributed over the world. Silver is very commonly associated with lead; and the common ore of the latter metal, galena, always contains some silver, and generally enough to make its separation remunerative. Silver has also been detected in the water of the ocean. The principal silver-producing regions are the Andes and Cordilleras. From Peru and Bolivia came an immense supply of this metal during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Mexico has been a large producer of silver since the middle of the sixteenth century. The mines of the Comstock lode at Virginia City, in Nevada, produced about $320,000,000 worth of bullion from 1860 to 1890, about five twelfths of the value of which was silver. This metal has always been accounted "precious," and has been used for ornament and as a measure of value from the earliest times of which there is any historical record. Its most marked point of inferiority to gold, apart from color, is its liability to tarnish when exposed to sulphurous emanations or brought into contact with anything containing sulphur. Silver is too soft to be used in the unalloyed condition. The ratio of silver to copper in the silver coinage of England is 92½ to 7½ (or 12½ to 1); in that of France and the United States, 9 to 1; and in that of Prussia, 3 to 1.

The relative proportions of the metals in the alloy called German silver vary considerably, according to the desire of the manufacturer to produce a cheaper or more expensive article. The commonest kind contains about eight parts of copper, two of nickel, and three to five of zinc. A finer kind of alloy is obtained by adding more nickel; the metal is then less liable to tarnish, and the resemblance to silver in color and luster is more striking. Nickel is a much more expensive metal than copper, and very much more so than zinc. See nickel.—King's silver. (a) A name given to silver used in England from about 1700 to 1720 for plate of an unusually high standard: apparently introduced by workmen from the continent, and abandoned because not sufficiently hard and durable. Compare sterling. (b) In old Eng. law, a payment made to the king for liberty to abandon or compromise the judicial proceeding for the conveyance of property called a fine. Also called postfine. See fine[1], 3, and compare primer fine (under primer).—Mock silver, a white alloy allied to speculum-metal and Britannia metal; pewter. It is a native of the mountains of central and southern Europe, planted elsewhere. It grows from 80 to 120 or even 200 feet high. Its timber is soft, tough, and elastic, of a creamy-white color, useful for many building and cabinet purposes, for making the sounding-boards of musical instruments, toys, etc. It yields resin, tar, and the Strasburg turpentine. This is the "noble fir" (edler Tannenbaum) of the Germans. The silver fir of the Alleghany region, etc., is A. balsamea, mostly called balsam or balm-of-Gilead fir. It is a moderate-sized tree, its twigs sought for scented cushions, its bark secreting Canada balsam (see balsam), also the source of spruce-gum. Pacific North America presents several noble silver firs, as A. grandis, the white fir of Oregon bottom-lands, and A. nobilis and A. magnifica, the red firs of the mountains of Oregon and California, all trees between 200 and 300 feet in height.—Silver fox, the common red fox, Vulpes fulvus, in a melanistic variation, in which the pelage is black or blackish, overlaid with hoary or silver-gray ends of the longer hairs. It is an extreme case of the range of variation from the normal color, of which the cross-fox is one stage. It occurs in the red foxes of both America and Europe, especially in high latitudes, and constitutes the Canis or Vulpes argentatus or argenteus of various authors. The silver fox has sometimes been defined wrongly as a variety of the gray fox of the United States (Urocyon cinereoargentatus), perhaps by some misapprehension of Schreber's (1778) specific name, just cited; but this is a distinct species of a different genus, and one in which the silver-black variation is not known to occur. Compare cut under cross-fox.

While the Cross and Black and Silver Foxes are usually considered as different varieties, they are not such in the classificatory sense of that term, any more than are the red, black, or white wolves, the black marmots, squirrels, etc. The proof of this is in the fact that one or both of the "varieties" occur in the same litter of whelps from normally colored parents. They have no special distribution, although, on the whole, both kinds are rather northerly than otherwise, the Silver Fox especially so.

All [the Indian names are] more flexible on the tongue than their Spanish similars. Scribner's Mag., II. 505.

The law of similars. (a) The law of mental association by which similar ideas are connected in the mind and suggest one another. This kind of association is denied by some psychologists, who forget that without it similarity would have no possible meaning. When we say that today's idea is like yesterday's, we can only mean that a sense of affinity connects them. The kind of association is the essential condition of generalization. (b) The homeopathic principle of administering drugs. See similia.

similarity (sim-i-lar'i-ti), n. [= F. similarité = Sp. similaridad; as similar + -ity.] 1. The quality or condition of being similar; likeness; perfect, partial, or general resemblance.

Similarity was defined as the cointension of two connatural relations between states of consciousness which are themselves like in kind but commonly unlike in degree. H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 371.

Similarity, in compounds, is partial identity.
W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 579.

2. A point or respect in which things are similar.

It is plain that in finding out the similarities of things we analyse. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 336.

Center of similarity. See center[1].—Syn. Analogy, correspondence, parity, parallelism.

similarly (sim'i-lär-li), adv. In a similar or like manner; with resemblance in certain respects.

As similarly constituted beings, men have certain rights in common. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 534.

similary† (sim'i-lā-ri), a. [‹ ML. similaris*, like: see similar.] Similar; like. [Rare.]

simile (sim'i-lē), n. [Formerly also similie, simily; = Sp. simil = Pg. simile, a simile, = It. simile, a like, fellow, ‹ L. simile, a like thing, neut. of similis (› It. simile = Sp. simil), like: see similar. Cf. facsimile.] In rhet., the comparing or likening of two things having some strong point or points of resemblance, both of which are mentioned and the comparison directly stated; a poetic or imaginative comparison; also, the verbal expression or embodiment of such a comparison.

Tra. O, sir, Lucentio slipp'd me like his greyhound,
Which runs himself and catches for his master.

In Argument
Similies are like Songs in Love:
They much describe; they nothing prove.
Prior, Alma, iii.

=Syn. Simile, Metaphor, Comparison, Allegory, Parable, Fable, similitude, trope. The first six words agree in implying or expressing likeness between a main person or thing and a subordinate one. Simile is a statement of the likeness in literal terms: as, man is like grass; Herod is like a fox. Metaphor taxes the imagination by saying that the first object is the second, or by speaking as though it were: as, "All flesh is grass," Isa. xl. 6; "Go ye and tell that fox," Luke xiii. 32. There are various combinations of simile and metaphor: as, "We all do fade as a leaf," Isa. lxiv. 6;

"There are a sort of men whose visages
Do cream and mantle, like a standing pool" (Shak., M. of V., I. 1. 89).

In these the metaphor precedes; in the following the simile is in the middle of the metaphor: "These metaphysic rights, entering into common life, like rays of light which pierce into a dense medium, are, by the laws of Nature, refracted from their straight line." (Burke, Rev. in France.) In the same way the simile may come first. A comparison differs from a simile essentially in that the former fixes attention upon the subordinate object, while a simile fixes it upon the main one: thus, one verse of Shelley's "Ode to the Skylark" begins by saying that the skylark is like a poet, whose circumstances are thereupon detailed. Generally, on this account, the comparison is longer than the simile. The allegory personifies abstract things, usually at some length. A short allegory is Ps. lxxx. 8–16. Spenser's "Faery Queene" is a series of allegories upon the virtues, and Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" allegorizes Christian experiences. These are acknowledged to be the most perfect allegories in literature. The allegory is an extended simile, with the first object in the simile carefully left unmentioned. A parable is a story that is or might be true, and is used generally to teach some moral or religious truth: as, the three parables of God's great love for the sinner in Luke xv. Socrates's story of the sailors who chose their steersman by lot, as suggesting the folly of a similar course in choosing the helmsman of the state, is a fine example of the parable of civil life. A fable differs from a parable in being improbable or impossible as fact, as in making trees choose a king, beasts talk, or frogs pray to Jupiter; it generally is short, and points a homely moral. See the definitions of apologue and trope.

In the Arabian desert the simoom generally moves from south or east to north and west, and occupies from five to ten minutes in its passage; it is probably a whirlwind set in motion in the overheated air of the desert. The traveler seeks protection against the gusts of sand and the suffocating, dust-laden air, by covering his head with a cloth and throwing himself upon the ground; and camels instinctively bury their noses in the sand. The desiccating wind parches the skin, inflames the throat, and creates a raging thirst.

'being (so)' (see sooth), Goth. sunja, the truth, sooth.] 1. Any want of conformity unto or transgression of the law of God. (Westminster Assembly's Shorter Catechism.) The true definition of sin is a much contested question, theologians being broadly divided into two schools of thought, the one holding that all sin consists in the voluntary and conscious act of the individual, the other that it also includes the moral character and disposition of the race; one that all moral responsibility is individual, the other that there is also a moral responsibility of the race as a race. To these should be added a third school, which regards sin as simply an imperfection and immaturity, and therefore requiring for remedy principally a healthful development under favorable conditions. Theologians also divide sin into two classes, actual sin and original sin. Actual sin consists in the voluntary conscious act of the individual. (See actual.) Original sin is the innate depravity and corruption of the nature common to all mankind. But whether this native depravity is properly called sin, or whether it is only a tendency to sin and becomes sin only when it is yielded to by the conscious voluntary act of the individual, is a question upon which theologians differ. Roman Catholic and other theologians, following the early church fathers, distinguish between mortal (or deadly) and venial sins. Mortal or deadly sins are such as wilfully violate the divine law, destroy the friendship of God, and cause the death of the soul. The seven mortal or deadly sins are pride, covetousness, lust, anger, gluttony, envy, and sloth. Venial sins are such transgressions as are due to inadvertence, do not destroy the friendship of God, and, while tending to become mortal, are not in themselves the death of the soul. The differeoce is one of degree, not of kind.

And ye knowe also that it was do be me, and so sholde myn be the synne. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 80.

=Syn. 3. Because, Since, As, Inasmuch as, For. Because (originally by cause) is strong and the most direct. Since, starting from the idea of mere sequence in time, is naturally less emphatic as to causation: its clause more often precedes the main proposition. As is still weaker, and, like since, generally brings in the reason before the main proposition: as or since the mountain will not come to Mohammed, Mohammed must go to the mountain. Inasmuch as is the most formal and emphatic, being used only to mark the express reason or condition. For follows the main proposition, and generally introduces that which is really continuative of the main proposition and of equal or nearly equal importance, the idea of giving a reason being subordinate.

2. In trigon., formerly, with reference to any arc of a circle, the line drawn from one extremity of the arc at right angles to the diameter which passes through its other extremity; now ordinarily, with reference not to the arc but to the angle which it subtends at the center of the circle, the ratio of the aforesaid line to the radius of the circle. Thus, in the diagram, BE is the sine of the arc AB (sometimes it is defined as half the chord of double the arc), and the ratio of BE to CB is the sine of the angle ACB. (See trigonometrical functions, under trigonometrical.) A more scientific definition of the sine is that of Euler, $\sin x = \frac{1}{2i}(e^{-xi} - e^{xi})$, where $i^2 = -1$, and $e$ is the Napierian base. The sine is also fully defined by the infinite series

$$\sin x = x - \frac{x^3}{3!} + \frac{x^5}{5!} - \cdots$$

But all the properties of sines are readily deduced from the definition that the sine is such a function that it vanishes with the variable, while

$$\frac{d \sin x}{dx} = \sqrt{1 - (\sin x)^2}.$$

Abbreviated sin, as in formulæ here given.—Arithmetic of sines, analytical trigonometry. Its object is to exhibit the relation of the sines, cosines, tangents, etc., of arcs, multiple arcs, etc.—Artificial sine. See artificial.—Coversed sine, the versed sine of the complement of an angle. $$\frac{x^{m-1}}{(n-1)!} \pm \frac{x^{2m-1}}{(2m-1)!} + \frac{x^{3m-1}}{(3m-1)!} \pm \cdots$$ sin-eater† (sin'ē″tėr), n. Formerly, in some parts of England, one who was hired in connection with funeral rites to eat a piece of bread placed near the bier, and who by this symbol took upon himself the sins of the deceased, that the departed soul might rest in peace. The usage is said to have originated in a mistaken interpretation of Hosea iv. 8: "They eat up the sin of my people."

The manner [in the County of Hereford] was that, when the Corps was brought out of the house and layd on the Biere, a Loafe of bread was brought out, and delivered to the Sinne-eater over the corps, as also a Mazar-bowle of maple (Gossips bowle) full of beer, wch he was to drinke up, and sixpence in money, in consideration whereof he tooke upon him (ipso facto) all the Sinnes of the Defunct, and freed him (or her) from walking after they were dead.

3. In math., an exceptional element or character of a continuum. (a) In geom., a projective character of a locus consisting in certain points, lines, or planes being exceptional in their relations to it. (For examples, see binode.) An ordinary singularity is one of a set of singularities of which all others are modifications or compounds. Thus, an actual node upon a skew curve is a modification of an apparent node, and ought not to be reckoned as an ordinary singularity. But cusps and inflections, as stationary points and tangents, are ordinary singularities. A higher singularity is one which differs indefinitely little from an aggregation of ordinary singularities. (See tacnode.) By an ellipsis common in geometrical language, the word singularity is used for point-singularity, or a relation to some exceptional point. Thus, a plane curve with neither nodes nor cusps is said to be without singularities, although, unless a conic, it has inflections, and unless a conic or cubic, double tangents. The word singularity is also used to denote the number of singular points, lines, or planes of any one kind; also for any number characteristic of a projective property, in which sense the order, class, and rank of a locus are sometimes termed singularities. (b) In the theory of functions, a property of a function consisting in it or its differential coefficient becoming discontinuous for a certain value or connected system of values of the variable.—Elliptic, essential, hyperbolic singularity. See the adjectives.—Simple singularity, a singularity of a function consisting in it or its differential coefficient becoming ambiguous or discontinuous at an isolated point or points, while remaining unambiguous and continuous at all other points sufficiently near to these.—Syn. 1. Uncommonness, oddness.—2. Idiosyncrasy. siphon (sī'fon), n. [Also syphon; < F. siphon = Sp. sifon = Pg. siphão = It. sifone, < L. sipho(n-), perhaps < Gr. σίφων, a tube, pipe, siphon; akin to σιφλός, hollow.] 1. A bent pipe or tube with legs of unequal length, used for drawing liquid out of a vessel by causing it to rise in the tube over the rim or top. For this purpose the shorter leg is inserted in the liquid, and the air is exhausted by being drawn through the longer leg. The liquid then rises by the pressure of the atmosphere and fills the tube, and the flow begins from the lower end. Sometimes an exhausting-tube (a in the figure) is placed on the longer leg; the air, in that case, is sucked out through a till the tube is filled to the cock b, which is then opened, and the flow commences—the cock b being so constructed as to close the suction-tube when the siphon is running. But the more general method is to fill the tube in the first place with the liquid, and then, stopping the mouth of the longer leg, to insert the shorter leg in the vessel; upon removal of the stop, the liquid will immediately begin to run. The flow depends upon the difference in vertical height of the two columns of the liquid, measured respectively from the bend of the tube to the level of the water in the vessel and to the open end of the tube. The flow ceases as soon as, by the lowering of the level in the vessel, these columns become of equal height, or when this level descends to the end of the shorter leg. The atmospheric pressure is essential to support the column of liquid from the vessel up to the top of the bend of the tube, and this height is consequently limited, varying inversely with the density of the liquid. At sea-level the maximum height is a little less than 30 inches for mercury and 34 feet for water.

In Teredo the united siphons are so long that the mollusk resembles a worm. See cuts under ship-worm, Teredo, quahog, and Mya[1]. (2) A similar siphon in some gastropods, extending from the anterior portion of the mantle over the head. See cut under Siphonostomata, 2. See siphuncle. (4) A tubular or canaliculate formation of the shell of any mollusk which covers or protects the soft siphon; especially, the siphuncle of a cephalopod, or the communication between the compartments of the shell. with holes equidistantly arranged in a circle, which can be revolved over a jet of compressed air or steam so as to produce periodic puffs. When the revolutions are rapid enough, the puffs coalesce into a musical tone. The revolution of the disk is effected either by a motor of some kind, or by setting the holes at an oblique angle so that the impact of the jet shall do the work. In the more complicated forms of the instrument two or more tones can be produced at once, either by having two or more concentric circles of holes in the same disk, or by two separate disks: the latter form is called a double siren. The number of revolutions required to produce a given tone can be counted and exhibited in various ways; and the application of the instrument in acoustical experiments and demonstrations is wide. In the cut a is a perforated disk made to revolve by the pressure of the air forced from the bellows beneath through d; b, vertical shaft revolving with the disk, and, by means of a pair of cog-wheels in the box c, turning the two index-hands on their respective dial-plates, and thus registering the number of revolutions made during the time of observation. Very large sirens are sometimes made for use as fog-signals, the sound being conveyed seaward in a large trumpet-shaped tube called a fog-horn, a name also given to the whole arrangement. See fog-horn. Also sirene.

The brain is small and particularly narrow. The periotic and tympanic bones are ankylosed together, but not with the squamosal; the foramen magnum is posterior, directed somewhat downward; the lower jaw has a well-developed ascending ramus, a coronoid process, and an ordinary transverse condyle; and the teeth are molariform, adapted to chew herbage. The neck is moderate, and the axis has an odontoid process. The fore limbs are moderately developed, with a flexure at the elbow; the carpal, metacarpal, and phalangeal bones are directly articulated and of normal number. There are two mammæ, pectoral. The heart is deeply fissured between the ventricles. (See first cut under heart.) They are large or huge unwieldy and ungainly aquatic animals, inhabiting the sea-shores, bays, and estuaries of various countries, never going out to sea like cetaceans, nor ascending rivers far. They feed entirely on aquatic vegetation. There are only two living genera, Manatus and Halicore, the manatees and dugongs, representing two families, Manatidæ and Halicoridæ. The sea-cow, Rhytina stelleri, recently extinct, represents a third family, Rhytinidæ. There are several other extinct genera, some of them constituting the family Halitheriidæ. sirgang (sėr′gang), n. [E. Ind.] The so-called green jackdaw of Asia, Cissa sinensis. The sirgang inhabits the southeastern Himalayan region, and thence through Burma to Tenasserim, and has occasioned much literature. It was originally described and figured by French ornithologists as a roller, whence its earliest technical name, Coracias chinensis of Boddaert (1783), with the English synonym Chinese roller of Latham. These terms being overlooked, the bird was renamed Corvus speciosus by Shaw, and the genus Cissa (later spelled Kitta) was founded upon it by Boie in 1826, since which time it has mostly been called Cissa sinensis, sometimes C. speciosa. It is 15½ inches long, the wing 6, the tail 7 to 8½; the head is fully crested; the bill and feet are coral-red. The fresh-molted plumage in life is a lovely green, but has the peculiarity of soon changing to verdigris-blue, as it does also in stuffed specimens, particularly if exposed to the light. This green or blue is varied with a black fillet encircling the head, with white tips and black subterminal bars on the tail-feathers and inner quill-feathers, and with bright sanguine red on the wings, which easily fades to a dull reddish-brown. A variety of the sirgang found in Sumatra is called C. minor; other species of the same genus are the Ceylonese C. ornata and the Japanese C. thalassina.

2. Sisters collectively, or a society of sisters; in religious usage, an association of women who are bound by monastic vows or are otherwise devoted to religious work as a vocation. In the Roman Catholic Church the members of a sisterhood may be bound by the irrevocable vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and are then called nuns, or may be merely under one rule and bound by revocable vows. In the Church of England and its offshoots there are also sisterhoods, the members of which either take a revocable vow of obedience to the rule of their association, or live under the rule of the order without vow. Among the more important of the sisterhoods are the Sisters of Charity (see charity), the School Sisters of Notre Dame, the Little Sisters of the Poor, the Sisters of the Assumption, the Congregation of Sisters of Notre Dame, the Anglican Sisterhoods of St. John the Baptist, of the Holy Communion, of St. Mary, etc. The Sisters of Mercy is an order founded in 1827 in Dublin, with purposes analogous to those of the Sisters of Charity. The vows are for life. A similar sisterhood in the Church of England was founded about 1845 for assisting the poor. It consists of three orders—those who live in community actively engaged in assisting the poor, those who live in community but are engaged in devotions and other secluded occupations, and those not living in the community but assisting it as co-workers. There are also a number of somewhat similar organizations in the Episcopal Church in the United States.

Sisymbrieæ (sis-im-brī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836), < Sisymbrium + -eæ.] A tribe of polypetalous plants, of the order *Crucifer*æ. It is characterized by a narrow elongated pod or silique, with the seeds commonly in one row, and the seed-leaves incumbent and straight or in a few genera convolute or transversely plicate. It includes 21 genera, of which Sisymbrium is the type, chiefly plants of temperate regions. See Sisymbrium, Hesperis, and Erysimum.

Sisymbrium (si-sim'bri-um), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < Gr. σισύμβριον, a name applied to certain odorous plants, one said to be a crucifer, another Mentha aquatica.] A genus of cruciferous plants, type of the tribe Sisymbrieæ. It is characterized by annual or biennial smooth or hairy stems; flowers with free and unappendaged stamens, and a roundish and obtuse or slightly two-lobed stigma; and linear sessile pods, usually with three-nerved valves and many oblong seeds with straight cotyledons. It is destitute of the two-parted bristles found in the related genus Erysimum, which also differs in its linear or oblong leaves. Besides a great number of doubtful species, about 90 are recognized as distinct. They are natives especially of central and southern Europe, Siberia, and western Asia as far as India; a few are found in temperate and subarctic North America, and a very few in the southern hemisphere. They bear a stellate cluster of radical leaves, and numerous alternate stem-leaves which are usually clasping and irregularly lobed or pinnately divided. The flowers are usually borne in a loose bractless raceme, and are commonly yellow. The various species simulate the habit of many widely different genera. A few, constituting the subgenus Arabidopsis (A. P. de Candolle, 1821), have white, pink, or purplish flowers; two others, by some separated as a genus Alliaria (Adanson, 1763), have also broad or triangular heart-shaped undivided leaves, as S. Alliaria, the hedge-garlic. For S. officinale, see hedge-mustard (sometimes used also for any plant of the genus); for S. Sophia, see herb-sophia; and for S. Irio, see London-rocket. S. canescens is the tansy-mustard of the western United States, and S. Thaliana the mouse-ear cress of Europe, naturalized in the eastern United States.

Sisyrinchieæ (sis'i-ring-kī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1883), < Sisyrinchium + -eæ.] A tribe of monocotyledonous plants of the order Irideæ. It is characterized by commonly terminal or pedunculed spathes, by concave or keeled bracts within the spathe and opposite to the two or more usually pedicelled flowers, and by style-branches alternate with the anthers or borne on a style which is longer than the stamens. It includes 26 genera, classed in 4 subtribes, of which Crocus, Cipura, Sisyrinchium, and Aristea are the types. The first, the Crocæ, are exceptional in their one-flowered spathes; they are largely South African and Australian. The Cipureæ and a few genera besides are American. The tribe includes both bulbous plants, as the crocus, and others with a distinct creeping or upright rootstock, which is, however, in a larger number reduced to a cluster of thickened fibers. See Patersonia and Pardanthus.

Sisyrinchium (sis-i-ring'ki-um), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), transferred by Linnæus from the iris; < Gr. σισυριγχίον, a bulbous plant, said to have been of the iris family.] A genus of plants of the order Irideæ, type of the tribe Sisyrinchieæ and of the subtribe Eusisyrinchieæ. It is characterized by round or two-edged stems without a bulbous base, rising from a cluster of thickened fibers; flowers with the filaments commonly partly united into a tube, and with three slender undivided style-branches; and a globose ovary which becomes an exserted capsule in fruit. There are about 50 species, all American, occurring both in the tropical and in the temperate zones, one species also indigenous in Ireland. They are tufted plants with numerous flat, long, and narrow upright leaves which are all or mostly radical, and usually a single spathe with numerous open flattish flowers. The two species of the eastern United States, S. angustifolium and S. anceps, are known as blue-eyed grass, from the flowers. See rush-lily.

The Times remarked on the word [skedaddle], and Lord Hill wrote to prove that it was excellent Scotch. The Americans only misapply the word, which means, in Dumfries, "to spill"—milkmaids, for example, saying, "You are skedaddling all that milk." Notten, Slang Dictionary, p. 292.

In anat., the dry bones of the body taken together; hence, in anat. and zoöl., some or any hard part, or the set of hard parts together, which form a support, scaffold, or framework of the body, sustaining, inclosing, or protecting soft parts or vital organs; connective tissue, especially when hard, as when fibrous, cuticular, corneous, cartilaginous, osseous, chitinous, calcareous, or silicious; an endoskeleton, exoskeleton, dermoskeleton, scleroskeleton, splanchnoskeleton, etc. (See these words.) More specifically—(a) The test, shell, lorica, or set of spicules of any protozoan, as an infusorian, radiolarian, foraminifer, or other animalcule, exhibiting the utmost diversity of form, structure, and substance. See cuts under Foraminifera, Infusoria, and Radiolaria. (b) In sponges, the whole sponge except the animalcules which fabricate it. (See cut under Porifera.) A bath-sponge, for example, is only the skeleton, from which the animals have been decomposed and displaced. This skeleton presents itself in three principal textures, the fibrous, chalky, and glassy. In a few cases it is gelatinous. (See Fibrospongiæ, Calcispongiæ, Silicispongiæ, Myxospongiæ.) A nearly constant and very characteristic feature of sponge-skeletons is the presence of calcareous or silicious spicules. (See spicule.) Spicules in excess of fibrous tissue, and especially when consolidated in a kind of network, form the glass-sponges, some forms of which are very beautiful. (See cut under Euplectella.) Certain minute scleres of some sponges are flesh-spicules, and belong to the individual sponge-animalcules rather than to the general sponge-tissue. (Compare microsclere with megasclere.) (c) The special or general hard parts of echinoderms, as the shell of a sea-urchin with its spines and oral armature; the spicules or sclercs in the integument of a holothurian; the rigid parts of starfishes, crinoids, and the like. fishes the whole skeleton is cartilaginous. In most vertebrates, however, the cartilage forming the skeleton of the embryo or fetus is mainly converted into bone by the process of ossification, or deposition of bone-earth, some parts, especially of the ribs, remaining as a rule cartilaginous. The vertebrate endoskeleton consists of axial parts, the axial skeleton, in a series of consecutive segments, the vertebræ, with their immediate offshoots, as ribs, and at the head end a skull or cranium (except in the Acrania or lowest fishes); and of appendages, the appendicular skeleton, represented by the one or two (never more) pairs of limbs, if any, including the pectoral and pelvic arch, or shoulder- and hip-girdle, by means of which the limbs are attached to the axis or trunk. Various other ossifications may be and usually are developed in tendinous or ligamentous tissue, or in viscera, and constitute the scleroskeleton or splanchnoskeleton. Teeth are certainly skeletal parts, though not usually counted with the bones of the skeleton; they are horny, not osseous or dentinal, in some animals. The human skeleton consists of about 200 bones, without counting the teeth—the enumeration varying somewhat according as the sclero-skeletal sesamoid bones are or are not included. See sesamoid. (2) The external covering of the body; the cuticle or epidermis; the dermo-skeleton or exo-skeleton, including all the non-vascular, non-nervous cuticular or epidermal structures, as horns, hoofs, claws, nails, hairs, feathers, scales, etc. In man the exo-skeleton is very slight, consisting only of cuticle, nails, and hair; but in many vertebrates it is highly developed and may be bony, as in the shells of armadillos and of turtles, the plates, shields, or bucklers of various reptiles and fishes, etc. See also cuts under archipterygium, carapace, Catarrhina, elasmosaur, Elephantinæ, endoskeleton, epipleura, Equidæ, fish, Ichthyornis, Ichthyosauria, Ichthyosaurus, Mastodontinæ, Mylodon, ox, Plesiosaurus, pterodactyl, and Pteropodidæ; also cuts under skull, and others there named.

A skull is possessed by all vertebrates excepting the lancelets, and by no other animals. It is sometimes divided into the skull proper, cranium in strictness or brain-box, and the facial region or face. In the adult human skull eight cranial and fourteen facial bones are commonly enumerated, though the real number of osseous elements is much larger. The eight cranial bones are the occipital, two parietal, two temporal, frontal, sphenoid, and ethmoid. The fourteen facial bones are two nasals, two lacrymals, two superior maxillaries, two malars, two palatals, two inferior turbinals, one inferior maxillary, and one vomer. This enumeration of the bones is exclusive of the bonelets of the ear, which, however, are counted in vertebrates below mammals. Of these bones, the mandible, vomer, and frontal are really paired, or of lateral halves; the supramaxillary, ethmoid, sphenoid, occipital, and temporal are compound bones of several separate centers of ossification; the rest are simple. The most composite bone is the temporal, whose ankylosed stylohyoid process (peculiar to man) is an element of the hyoid arch. A skull of similar construction characterizes mammals at large, though its figure is usually quite different (owing mainly to production of the facial and reduction of the cranial parts), and though some of the bones which are confluent in man may remain distinct. In birds the skull is characterized by the great size of the cranial bones in comparison with that of the facial bones (excepting the specially enlarged intermaxillary and inframaxillary), the extensive and complete ankyloses of cranial bones, the permanent and perfect distinctness of pterygoid bones, the formation of each half of the lower jaw by several recognizable pieces, and especially by the intervention of a movable quadrate bone between the squamosal and the mandible. Some other additional bones make their appearance; and the occipital condyle is always single. A skull of similar construction to that of birds characterizes reptiles proper; but here again the cranial is small in comparison with the facial region (as in the lower mammals), sometimes excessively so; the skull is more loosely constructed, with fewer ankyloses of its several elements; and some additional bones not found in any higher vertebrates first appear. The skulls of batrachians differ widely from all the above. Some additional elements appear; some usually ossified elements may be persistently cartilaginous; and branchial as well as hyoidean arches are seen to be parts of the skull. The further modifications of the skull in fishes are great and diversified: not only is there much variation in the skulls of different fishes, but also the difference between any of their skulls and those of higher vertebrates is so great that some of the bones can be only doubtfully homologized with those of higher vertebrates, while of others no homologues can be recognized. In these ichthyopsidan vertebrates, also, the skull is sometimes permanently cartilaginous, as in selachians; in the lampreys the lower jaw disappears; in the lancelets there is no skull. In fishes, also, more or fewer branchial arches are conspicuous parts of the skull, forming usually, with the compound lower jaw, by far the bulkier section of this collection of bones; and in some of them the connection of the shoulder-girdle with the skull is such that it is not always easy to say of certain bones whether they are more properly scapular or cranial. The natural evolution of the skull is, of course, from the lower to the higher vertebrates (the reverse of that above sketched). Above lampreys and hags, after a lower jaw has been acquired, the general course of evolution of the skull is to the reduction in number of its bones or cartilages by the entire disappearance of some and the confluence of others, tending on the whole to the compactness, simplicity, and symmetry of which the human skull is the extreme case, and in which, as in the skull of any mammal or bird, evidences of its actual osseous elements are chiefly to be traced in the transitory centers of ossification of the embryo. A good illustration of this is witnessed in the condition of the bones of the tongue (hyoid arch) in mammals; for even in birds (next below mammals) the tongue has a skeleton of several distinct bones, the position of which in a series of arches next after the mandibular and next before the branchial arches proper is evident. The base of the skull is generally laid down in cartilage. The dome of the skull and the facial parts are usually of membrane-bones; and to the latter some dermal or exoskeletal bones may be added. Facial parts of all skulls are of different character from cranial parts proper, in that they belong essentially to the series of visceral (hemal, not neural) arches: (1) upper jaw; (2) under jaw; (3) tongue (hyoid), followed by more or fewer successive branchial arches. The neural arches, or cranial segments proper, are at least 3 (some count 4) in number, named occipital, parietal, and frontal, from behind forward, represented respectively by (1) the occipital bone; (2) the basisphenoid, alisphenoid, and parietal bones; (3) the presphenoid, orbitosphenoid, and frontal bones. With these are intercalated or connected the sense-capsules of the three higher senses—namely, of hearing, sight, and smell—these being the skeletons of the ear, eye, and nose, or the petrosal parts of the temporal, the sclerotic coat of the eye, and the lateral masses of the ethmoid bone. Remaining hard parts of the head, and, as such, elements of the skull, are the teeth, borne on more or fewer bones: in mammals, when present, confined to the premaxillaries, supramaxillaries, and inframaxillaries; not present in any existing birds; in various reptiles and fishes, absent, or borne upon the bones above named, and also, in that case, upon the sphenoid, vomer, palatals, pterygoids, hyoids, pharyngeals, etc. The body of facts or principles concerning skulls is craniology, of which craniometry is one department, especially applied to the measurement of human skulls for the purposes of ethnography or anthropology. skunk early attracted attention. It is mentioned in 1636 by Sagard-Théodat by several terms based on its Indian names, as scangaresse, ouinesque, etc., and in the same passage, in his "History of Canada," this author calls it in French "enfan du diable," a name long afterward quoted as specific. It is the fiskatta of Kalm's "Travels," commonly translated polecat, a name, however, common to various other ill-scented Mustelidæ. (See def. 2.) Chinche, chinga, and moufette (specifically moufette d'Amérique) are book-names which have not been Englished. The New Latin synonyms are numerous. The animal inhabits all of temperate North America, and continues abundant in the most thickly settled regions. It is about as large as a house-cat, but stouter-bodied, with shorter limbs, and very long bushy tail, habitually erected or turned over the back. The color is black or blackish, conspicuously but to a variable extent set off with pure white—generally as a frontal stripe, a large crown-spot, a pair of broad divergent bands along the sides of the back, and white hairs mixed with the black ones of the tail. The fur is valuable, and when dressed is known as Alaska sable; the blackest pelts bring the best price. The flesh is edible, when prepared with sufficient care. The skunk is carnivorous, like other members of the same family, with which its habits in general agree; it is very prolific, bringing forth six or eight young in burrows. The fluid which furnishes the skunk's almost sole means of defense was long supposed and is still vulgarly believed to be urine. It is the peculiar secretion of a pair of perineal glands (first dissected by Jeffries Wyman in 1844), similar to those of other Mustelidæ, but very highly developed, with strong muscular walls, capacious reservoir, and copious golden-yellow secretion, of most offensive suffocating odor, capable of being spirted several feet in fine spray, and of soon scenting the air for several hundred yards. The pungent effluvium is not less durable than that of musk, when the least quantity of the fluid has been spilled upon the person or clothes. It produces nausea in some persons, and has occasionally been used in minute doses as a remedy for asthma. Cases of a kind of hydrophobia from the bite of the skunk, with fatal result, have been reported, and appear to be authentic. For technical characters, see Mephitis.

The Skunck or Pole-Cat is very common.

slang[3] (slang), n. [Of obscure cant origin; the form suggests a connection with sling, in a way indicated by the use of sling and fling in 'to sling epithets,' 'to fling reproaches,' etc., and by similar uses of related Scand. forms, as Norw. sleng, a slinging, a device, a burden of a song; slengja, sling (slengja kjeften, abuse, lit. 'sling the jaw'); slengjenamn, a nickname; slengje-ord, an insulting word or allusion; Icel. slyngr, slyngum, cunning: see sling[1]. The noun, in this view, must have arisen in quasi-composition (slang-patter, slang-word, slang-name, etc.), or else from the verb. Evidence of early use is lacking. The word has nothing to do with language or lingo, and there is no evidence to establish a Gipsy origin.] 1. The cant words or jargon used by thieves, peddlers, beggars, and the vagabond classes generally; cant.

Slang in the sense of the cant language of thieves appears in print certainly as early as the middle of the last century. It was included by Grose in his "Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue," published in 1785. But it was many years before it was allowed a place in any vocabulary of our speech that confined itself to the language of good speakers and writers. Its absence from such works would not necessarily imply that it had not been in frequent use. Still, that this never had been the case we have direct evidence. Scott, in his novel of "Redgauntlet," which appeared in 1824, when using the word, felt the necessity of defining it; and his definition shows not only that it was generally unknown, but that it had not then begun to depart at all from its original sense. In the thirteenth chapter of that work, one of the characters is represented as trying to overhear a conversation, . . . but . . . "what did actually reach his ears was disguised so completely by the use of cant words and the thieves' Latin called slang that, even when he caught the words, he found himself as far as ever from the sense of their conversation." No one who is now accustomed either to speak slang [in def. 2], or to speak of the users of it, would think of connecting it with anything peculiar to the language of thieves. Yet it is clear from this one quotation that the complete change of meaning which the term has undergone has taken place within a good deal less than sixty years.
The Nation, Oct. 9, 1890, p. 289.

Let proper nurses be assigned, to take care of these babes of grace [young thieves]. . . . The master who teaches them should be a man well versed in the cant language commonly called the slang patter, in which they should by all means excel.
Jonathan Wild's Advice to his Successor (1758). (Hotten.)

2. In present use, colloquial words and phrases which have originated in the cant or rude speech of the vagabond or unlettered classes, or, belonging in form to standard speech, have acquired or have had given them restricted, capricious, or extravagantly metaphorical meanings, and are regarded as vulgar or inelegant. Examples of slang are rum for 'queer,' gay for 'dissolute,' corned, tight, slued, etc., for 'intoxicated,' awfully for 'exceedingly,' jolly for 'surprising, uncommon,' daisy for something or somebody that is charming or admirable, kick the bucket or hop the twig for 'die,' etc. This colloquial slang also contains many words derived from thieves' cant, such as pal for 'partner, companion,' cove for 'fellow,' and ticker for 'watch.' There is a slang attached to certain professions, occupations, and classes of society, such as racing slang, college slang, club slang, literary slang, political slang. (See cant[2].) Slang enters more or less into all colloquial speech and into inferior popular literature, as novels, newspapers, political addresses, and is apt to break out even in more serious writings. Slang as such is not necessarily vulgar or ungrammatical; indeed, it is generally correct in idiomatic form, and though frequently censured on this ground, it often, in fact, owes its doubtful character to other causes. Slang is often used adjectively: as, a slang expression. See the quotations below.

The smallest urchin whose tongue could tang Shock'd the dame with a volley of slang.
Hood, Tale of a Trumpet.

Cant, as used in the phrases "thieves' cant," "tinkers' cant," "printers' cant," or the cant of any craft or calling, is really a language within a language, and is intended to conceal the thoughts of those who utter it from the uninitiated. Slang, on the other hand, is open to all the world to use, and its ranks are recruited in various ways.
N. and Q., 7th ser., VIII. 341.

Center slang, thieves' slang in which the middle vowel of a word is taken as its initial letter, and other letters or syllables are added to give the word a finish, as lock becomes "ockler," pitch, "itchper," etc. Ribton-Turner, Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 478.—Riming slang, a kind of cant or secret slang spoken by street vagabonds in London, consisting of the substitution of words or sentences which rime with other words or sentences intended to be kept secret: as, "apples and pears" for stairs; "Cain and Abel" for a table. See back-slang.=Syn. 2. Slang, Colloquialism, etc. See cant[2].

3. A rock the most striking characteristic of which is its fissile structure, or capability of being easily split or cleft into thin plates of nearly uniform thickness and smooth surfaces. The rocks in which a fissile structure is particularly well developed are almost exclusively the argillaceous, and those which have been more or less metamorphosed, and this fissility appears to be the result of the rearrangement of the particles of the rock into new combinations flattened into thin scales which lie in a direction at right angles to the direction in which the rock was pressed at the time the metamorphism was taking place. The best-known variety of slate is the common roofing-slate, which is compact, homogeneous, and fissile enough to be used for covering roofs, or for manufacture into tables, chimney-pieces, writing-slates, etc. The valuable varieties of roofing-slate come almost exclusively from the older metamorphic rocks. (See cleavage and foliation.) North Wales is by far the most important slate-producing region of the world, some beds having been worked there as early as the twelfth century. The principal quarries are in southern Carnarvonshire and Merionethshire in the Lower Silurian, and in Montgomeryshire in the Upper Silurian. There are also quarries in Cornwall in the Devonian, and slates of the same geological age are obtained in France in considerable quantity, as well as in parts of Germany adjacent to the Rhine. There are various quarries in Devonshire in the Carboniferous; but in most of them the slate furnished is not of first-rate quality; and, in general, it may be said that the Carboniferous is the highest geological formation producing what can properly be denominated slate. The slate of the United States comes almost entirely from a very low position in the geological series, as is also the case in Europe. Pennsylvania and Vermont are the principal slate-producing States, and they together furnished in 1889 nearly six sevenths in value of the total production of the country; but Pennsylvania's share was three times as great as that of Vermont.

Serfdom died out gradually in England in the latter part of the middle ages, and slavery was abolished throughout the British empire in 1833, after long agitation, the sum of twenty million pounds sterling being paid as compensation to the slave-owners. Negro slavery was introduced into the present territory of the United States in 1620, and became recognized as an institution. The Northern States gradually got rid of their slaves by emancipation or transportation in the latter part of the eighteenth and the early part of the nineteenth century. Slavery became a leading and agitating question from the time of the Missouri Compromise (1820), and the number of slave States increased to fifteen. (See slave State, under slave[2], a.) President Lincoln, by his Emancipation Proclamation of January 1st, 1863, declared free all slaves in that part of the Union designated as in rebellion; and the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution, 1865, abolished slavery within the United States. Slavery has been abolished by various other countries in the nineteenth century, as by Brazil in 1888.

MHG. slāf, G. schlaf = Goth. slēps, sleep; from the verb.] 1. A state of general marked quiescence of voluntary and conscious (as well as many involuntary and unconscious) functions, alternating more or less regularly with periods of activity. In human sleep, when it is deep, the body lies quiet, with the muscles relaxed, the pulse-rate lower than during the waking hours, and the respiration less frequent but deep, while the person does not react to slight sensory stimuli. Intestinal peristalsis is diminished; secretion is less actively carried on; the pupils are contracted; and the brain is said to be anemic. If the depth of sleep is measured by the noise necessary to waken the sleeper, it reaches its maximum within the first hour and then diminishes, at first rapidly, then more slowly.

Half in a dreme, not fully weel a-waked,
The golden sleep me wrapt vndir his wieng.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 52.

Else could they not catch tender sleep; which still
Is shy and fearful, and flies every voice.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, iv. 41.

Sleep is a normal condition of the body, occurring periodically, in which there is a greater or less degree of unconsciousness due to inactivity of the nervous system and more especially of the brain and spinal cord. It may be regarded as the condition of rest of the nervous system during which there is a renewal of the energy that has been expended in the hours of wakefulness.
Encyc. Brit., XXII. 154.

2. A period of sleep: as, a short sleep.

It seems his sleeps were hindered by thy railing.

W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 201.

3. Repose; rest; quiet; dormancy; hence, the rest of the grave; death.

Here are no storms,
No noise, but silence and eternal sleep.
Shak., Tit. And., i. 1. 155.

A calm, unbroken sleep
Is on the blue waves of the deep.
Prentice, To an Absent Wife.

4. Specifically, in zoöl., the protracted and profound dormancy or torpidity into which various animals fall periodically at certain seasons of the year. Two kinds of this sleep are distinguished as summer and winter sleep, technically known as estivation and hibernation (see these words).

5. In bot., nyctitropism, or the sleep-movement of plants, a condition brought about in the foliar or floral organs of certain plants, in which they assume at nightfall, or just before, positions unlike those which they have maintained during the day. These movements in the case of leaves are usually drooping movements, and are therefore suggestive of rest, but the direction of movement is different in different cases. Thus, among the Oxalidaceæ the sleep-movement consists in the downward sinking of the leaflets, which become at the same time folded on themselves. Among the Leguminosæ, the leaflets, in some cases, simply sink vertically downward (Phaseoleæ); in others, they sink down while the main petiole rises (terminal leaflet of Desmodium); in others, they sink downward and twist on their axes so that their upper surfaces are in contact beneath the main petiole (Cassia); in others, again, they rise and bend backward toward the insertion of the petiole (Coronilla); in others, they rise, and the main petiole rises also, whereas in Mimosa pudica the leaflets rise and bend forward, while the main petiole falls. In Marsilea the leaflets rise up, the two upper ones being embraced by the two lower. (S. H. Vines.) The mechanism of these movements is explained by Pfeffer and others as due to an increased growth on one side of the median line of the petiole or midrib, followed, after a certain interval of time, by a corresponding growth on the opposite side. It is also accomplished by simple turgescence of opposite sides. The utility of the sleep-movements is believed to consist in protection from too great radiation. The cause or causes of these movements (and of analogous movements which have been called diurnal sleep: see the second quotation) are only imperfectly known, but they are undoubtedly largely due to sensitiveness to variations in the intensity of light. See nyctitropism.

Those movements which are brought about by changes in the amount of light constitute what are known as the "sleep" and "waking" of plants. Bessey, Botany, p. 198.

There is another class of movements, dependent on the action of light. . . . We refer to the movements of leaves and cotyledons which when moderately illuminated are diaheliotropic, but which change their positions and present their edges to the light when the sun shines brightly on them. These movements have sometimes been called diurnal sleep. Darwin, Movement in Plants, p. 445.

See sliding, n., 4.—Satellite sliding rule, an instrument invented by Dr. John Bevis (died 1771) to calculate the eclipses of Jupiter's satellites.—Sliding rule, a mathematical instrument or scale, consisting of two parts, one of which slides along the other, and each having certain sets of numbers engraved on it, so arranged that when a given number on the one scale is brought to coincide with a given number on the other, the product or some other function of the two numbers is obtained by inspection. The numbers may be adapted to answer many purposes, but the instrument is particularly used in gaging and for the measuring of timber.—Sliding scale. (a) A scale or rate of payment which varies under certain conditions. (1) A scale for raising or lowering imposts in proportion to the fall and rise in the prices of the goods.

In the Bible slide is used for slip. Slide generally refers to a longer movement: as, to slide down hill; to slip on the ice. We glide by a smooth and easy motion, as in a boat over or through the water.

II. trans. 1. To cause to glide or move along a surface without bounding, rolling, stepping, etc.; thrust or push along in contact with a surface.

The slide is the distinctive feature of the trombone; but it is also used in the true trumpet, and occasionally in the French horn. As facilitating alterations of pitch in pure intonation, it has decided advantages over both keys and valves. It may be moved from side to side so as either to admit the air from the pallets to the pipes or to cut them off entirely. The position of a slider is controlled by a stop-knob at the keyboard. By drawing the knob the slider of a set of pipes is pushed into such position that they may be sounded by the digitals. Also slide. See *organ*1, stop, and wind-chest. (g) In racing boats, a sliding seat.

Slide-valve.

b′, valve inclosed in steam-chest c′, and moved by the valve-rod or stem a. The valve-rod derives a reciprocating motion from the rock-lever b, pivoted at c and connected at the lower end with the eccentric-rod h, the latter being reciprocated by the eccentric g. d′, d′, induction-ports which also alternately act as eduction-ports; e, exhaust-port; d, pitman or connecting-rod which, being connected to the piston-rod k, reciprocated by the piston p, imparts circular motion to the crank f, crank-shaft f′, and eccentric g.

4. A South American tardigrade edentate mammal of the family Bradypodidæ: so called from their slow and apparently awkward or clumsy movements. The slowness of their motions on the ground is the necessary consequence of their disproportioned structure, and particularly of the fact that the feet exhibit a conformation resembling that of clubfoot in man—a disposition of the carpal and tarsal joints highly useful in climbing. Sloths live on trees, and never remove from one until they have stripped it of every leaf. They are helpless when on the ground, and seem at home only on trees, suspended beneath the branches, along which they are sometimes observed to travel from tree to tree with considerable celerity. The female produces a single young one at a birth, which she carries about with her until it is able to climb. Sloths are confined to the wooded regions of tropical America, extending northward into Mexico. At least 12 species are described, but the true number is fewer. All have three toes on the hind feet, but some have only two on the fore feet, whence the obvious distinction of three-toed and two-toed sloths (a distinction even more strongly marked in the anatomy of these animals) warranted a division of the family into bradypods (Bradypodinæ) and cholopodines (Cholopodinæ). Most sloths belong to the former group, and these have the general name ai. The best-known of these is the collared three-toed sloth, Bradypus tridactylus or torquatus, with a sort of mane. The unau or two-toed sloth, Cholopus didactylus, inhabits Brazil; it is entirely covered with long coarse woolly hair. (See cut under Cholopus.) A second and quite distinct species of this genus, C. hoffmanni, inhabits Central America. (See Tardigrada, 1.) The name is apparently a translation of the Portuguese word preguiça (Latin pigritia), slowness, slothfulness. See the quotation.

Here [in Brazil] is a Beast so slow in motion that in fifteen days he cannot go further than a man can throw a stone; whence the Portugals call it Pigritia.
