Although sourcely an angry word is uttered in this country in reference to this quatroversy between the United States fills dreat Ertair; although the press and the people here are perfectly calm and almost affects on the notifier, the London Times cannot find it in its heart to suffer it to pass. Either that journal is inhering under a messenants upon American affairs, or is more ignorant of popular sentiment in the United Sittes than we had bitherts heldered. The Times continues hamcan affairs, or in more ignorant of popular sentiment in the United States than we had bitherts believed. The Times continues hammering away on America, dolefully yet resolutely threshain its straw, and atriving to extract some particles of wheat from the crude and uncless mas: laboring earsestly died away. To hear the Thunders can exceed the perforce conclude that the United States was obstinately and truculently bent upon driving England into war, and that the Times, in the interest of humanity and sound policy, was crasslessly engaged in deprecating a rapture. For instance, on the 1st April—AR Pools Day that press endeavors to establish the close similarity between the policy of Russia and that of America, and then proceeds to say:

Now, it is rather a resarkable thing, and to be noted in the history of human delusions, that at the very moment when the one bubble has burst, when Russia's dream of irresistible power and endless dominion has been rudely and finally dispelled, the other Power, the self-boarted paralled, the bother the boundern pretonation and spectral face of the compect, it is a superior to the same suicidal fully—a war, not of self-defense, but of warlow do his or were the more than the rest of the world.

It would certainly be "rather a remarkable thing was a site of the same and and a the sent of the source of the control of the control of the rest of the world.

Our Washington Correspondence.

Washington, April 13, 1866.

It used to be supposed that there were more idle words spoken in the House of Representatives by far, than in the Senate. The former body was in olden times more given to "stump" or "buncom" oratory than the latter. When those giants of statemen and in orators, Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, were the brilliant luminaries that shed light and glory over that body, may sures were discussed and principles propounded, examined, attacked, defended, and sustained, which had relation to the great interests of the country. True, party questions and personal encounters sometimes took place, but then the ability, the eloquence, the high-toned courtesy which char acterized them. gave dignity and importance to them: it was at least a war of Titans, not of pigmies. A chapter from Mr. Beston's forthcoming volume, published in the Nesseas In addignment of yesterday, gives a most graphic and impartial account of one of these considerations of the color of the control of the company of the color of the country. The account given of it by Mr. Benton forcibly reminds one of the wery graphe description given many years ago of the celebrated passage-ai-arms between Broughan and Canning, when they were both in their prime, and the latter was ago of the celebrated passage ai-arms between Broughan and Canning, when they were both in their prime, and the latter was a little.
