leagues from Cape Lopatka; the next, named Paramoufic, is considerably larger than Shoomska. Those two islands were first visited by the Russians, in 1713, who have found it convenient to substitute numbers for the ancient names of those islands, concerning which authors are much at variance. They now call them No. 1, No. 2, &c. as high as 21, which last terminates the pretensions of Russia. Of these four only are inhabited, No. 1, 2, 13, 14; but on the others, the islanders land occasionally from their canoes for the sake of hunting foxes and otters. The natives are very hairy, wear long beards, and live entirely upon seals, fish, and the produce of the chase. They are hospitable and docile; and have all embraced the Christian religion.

Kuron, a chain of mountains in Asiatic Turkey. See Taurus.

Kurk, a government of the Russian empire, formerly part of that of Bielgorod. Its capital, of the same name, is a large city, half of it situate on a lofty eminence, and has a flourishing trade. It has several fabrics and manufactures, especially tanneries, and the vicinity is fertile and populous. It is seated on the Tukor, which runs into the Sem, 120 m sw Voronetz. Lon. 37 3 E, lat. 51 40 N.

Labourd, a late territory of France, part of that of Basques. It abounds in fruit, and is now included in the department of Lower Pyrenees.

Labrador, a country of N America, on the E side of Hudson bay. The climate, in only lat. 57 N, is excessively cold during winter. The ice begins to disappear in May; and about the middle of June commences hot weather, which at times is so violent as to scorch the faces of the hunters. Mock suns and halos are frequent; and the night is enlivened by the aurora borealis. The animals are moosedeers, stags, raindeers, bears, tigers, buffalos, wolves, foxes, beavers, otters, lynxes, martens, squirrels, ermines, wild cats, and hares. The feathered kinds are geese, bustards, ducks, partridges, and all kinds of wild fowls. The fishes are whales, morsees, seals, cod, and a white fish preferable to herrings; and in the rivers and fresh waters are pike, perch, carp, and trout. In summer, there is here, as in other cold places, a variety in the colour of the several animals; but when that season is over, which continues only for three months, they all assume the livery of winter, and every sort of beasts, and most of the fowls, are of the colour of the snow. See New Britain, Esquimaux, and Hudson Bay.

Laccadives, a group of small islands, in the Indian sea, lying w of the coast of Malabar. They are 32 in number; and their chief traffic is the produce of the cocoa palm, such as oil, cables, and cordage; and in dried fish. These are sent to the continent of India, whence they get rice, &c. in return; and also to Mascat, in large boats, which bring back dates and coffee. Calpeny, one of the largest, lies most to the s and e; and its s extremity is 170 m to the w of Cochin. Lon. 73 32 E, lat. 10 0 N.

Lacedogna; see Cadogna.

Lachja, a cit. of Arabia, capital of the province of Bahrin. It is well built, and seated on the Aftan, which flows into a considerable bay of the gulf of Persia, opposite the isle of Bahrin. Lon. 48 40 E, lat. 26 20 N.

Lachho, or Laotchu; see Lao.

Ladenburg, a town of Germany, in the late palatinate of the Rhine, seated on the Necker, 8 m nw Heidelberg.

Ladoga, a lake of Russia, between the gulf of Finland and the lake Onega. It is 140 m long and 80 broad, and esteemed to be the largest lake in Europe. It has many quicksands, which, being moved from place to place by the frequent storms, has often proved fatal to the flat-bottomed vessels of the Russians. This induced Peter the great to cut a canal 67 m in length, from the ss extremity of this lake to the river Neva, by which it has communication with the gulf of Finland.

Ladoga, New, a town of Russia, in the government of Peterburg, seated on the Volkhof, between the lake and canal of Ladoga. Old Ladoga, an inconsiderable place, is higher up the Volkhof. New Ladoga is 66 m e Peterburg. Lon. 31 42 E, lat. 60 0 N.

Ladrones, or Marian Islands, islands of the Pacific ocean. They are 11 in number, exclusive of the small islets and rocks, lying in 140 E lon. and between 11 and 22 N lat. They were discovered by Magellan, in 1521. He touched first at Guam, where the natives stole some of his goods, which caused him to name these islands the Ladrones, or Islands of Thieves. Beside the other fruits natural to the soil and climate, here is the bread-fruit tree in abundance. The names of the principal islands are Saypan, Tinian, Guam, and Rora.

Laznasco, a town of Piedmont, 24 m s Turin.

Lahore, a province of Hindoostan, bounded on the w by Candahar, n by Cashmere, e by Sirinagar and Delhi, and s by Moultan. It is often called Panjab, or the country of Five Rivers. It is extensive and fertile; affording, in addition to all the necessaries of life, wine, fugar, and cotton wool. In the tract between the Indus and the Chelum are salt mines, which afford pieces of rock salt, hard enough to be formed into vessels, &c. See Panjab.

Lahore, a city of Hindoostan, capital of a province of the same name, and of the country of the Seiks. It was the residence of the Mohamedan conquerors of Hindoostan, before they had established themselves in the central parts of the country; and owes its modern improvements to Humaion, the father of Achar, who made it his residence during a part of his troublesome reign. The city and its suburbs are 7 m in circuit. It is surrounded by walls of brick, and adorned with beautiful edifices and gardens. Here are manufactures of cotton cloths and stuffs of all kinds,

It is seated on the Douro, 50 m E Oporto. Lon. 7 30 W, lat. 41 12 N.

Lamermuir, a mountainous ridge in Scotland, which divides the county of Berwick from that of Haddington for above 20 m, and terminates on the W at Soutra hill, which is elevated 1716 feet above the sea. These hills are bleak and barren, affording but scanty pasture for sheep.

Lamlash, a lofty island of Scotland, in Buteshire, near the SE side of the isle of Arran, opposite Kilbride. It extends 2 m, and on the W side forms a semicircular bay of its name, which is one of the safest harbours in the universe, for vessels of any size. It is sometimes called Molas, and the Holy Isle, from having been the retreat of St. Maol Jos, whose cave, well, &c. are shown to strangers. The island is one vast mountain, in great part covered with heath, and invested with vipers; but along the side of the bay has sufficient pasture and arable land to support the few inhabitants, who live in a village of the same name. Lon. 4 55 W, lat. 55 33 N.

Lamo, an island of Africa, on the coast of Zanguebar, tributary to the Portuguese. The capital, of the same name, is well fortified. Lon. 40 24 E, lat. 2 0 S.

Lampa, a town of Peru, capital of a jurisdiction, in the bishopric of Cusco. The country is in some parts very fertile, others unproductive; but silver mines are abundant. It is 130 m S by W Cusco. Lon. 72 0 W, lat. 14 56 S.

Lampedoja, an island in the Mediterranean, between the coast of Tunis and the island of Malta. It is 21 m in circuit, pleasant and fertile, though not inhabited; but it has a good harbour, where ships water. Lon. 12 24 E, lat. 35 40 N.

Lampon, a town of Sumatra, capital of a district belonging to the king of Bantam. The Dutch have a resident here. It is situate on a bay of the same name, in the strait of Sunda, 180 m SE Bencoolen. Lon. 104 15 E, lat. 5 40 N.

Lamspringe, a town of Lower Saxony, in the principality of Hildersheim, situate at the source of the rivulet Lame, 17 m S Hildersheim.

Lancashire, a county of England, bounded on the N by Cumberland and Westmorland, E by Yorkshire, S by Cheshire, and W by the Irish sea. It is

LAN

74 m from N to S (including a detached hundred on the NW, called Furness, which is separated from the rest by a creek, at the head of Morecambe bay) and its greatest breadth is 44 m. It contains 1,155,840 acres; is divided into six hundreds, and 69 parishes; has 27 market-towns; and sends 14 members to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 672,731 in 1801, and 828,309 in 1811. It is a county-palatine, under the title of the Duchy of Lancaster; the only duchy of England (that of Cornwall excepted) which is not merely titular. This county comprises a variety of soil and face of country; but upon the whole, is one of those which are the least favoured by nature. The hundred of Furness is a wild and rugged region, stored with quantities of iron-ore and slate, and covered with a growth of underwood, which is cut in succession, and made into charcoal. The E part, between the Ribble and the Mersey, comprising the ancient forests of Wyresdale and Bowland, is mountainous and generally barren; but the S part of the tract between these two rivers is flat, quite from the sea to the commencement of the ridge called Black-stonedge, which separates the county from Yorkshire. Much of this is a fertile country, though occasionally deformed by black turf bogs, here called mosses; some of which are of large extent, and impassible in wet seasons. In the NE part of this division are some lofty hills, the most noted of which is Pendle hill. The remaining part is varied with hill, dale, and moor. Lancashire is little adapted for a corn country, but is singularly fitted for the growth of potatoes. Among its products is a species of coal, called cannel, far exceeding all other, not only in making a clear fire, but for being capable of being manufactured into candlesticks, cups, standishes, snuff-boxes, &c. As a commercial and manufacturing county, it is superior to any other in the kingdom. Its principal manufactures are linen, silk, and cotton goods; fustians and counterpanes, shalloons, bays, serges, tapes, hats, canvas, facking, pins, iron goods, plate-glass, &c. Of the commerce of this county, it may suffice to observe, that Liverpool is the second port in the kingdom. The principal rivers are the Mersey, Irwell, Ribble, Loynes, Levern, Wyre, Hodder, Roche, Duddon, Winster, and Ken; and it has two considerable lakes, Windermere and Conistone-mere. It has also numerous canals, and the honour of exhibiting the first regular one in the kingdom, which was begun by the duke of Bridgewater in 1758.

Lancaster, a borough and the capital of Lancashire, governed by a mayor, with a market on Saturday. It is seated on the Loynes, or Lune, which forms a port for vessels of moderate burden, and over it are two stone bridges. Along the river side is a fine quay, also yards for ship-building; and a canal, from Kendal, winds round the E part of the town, which is conveyed over the river by an aqueduct of five arches. The number of inhabitants was 9030 in 1801, and 9247 in 1811. The church is a fine structure, on the side of a hill, on the summit of which is a noble castle, serving both as the shire-house and the county-gaol. Here are also a neat chapel, several meeting-houses, and an exchange. On the top of the castle is a square tower, called John of Gaunt's Chair, whence there is an extensive prospect. Five m from this place is Dunald-mill-hole, a cave at the foot of a mountain, into which a large brook runs and passes 2 m underground before it appears again: some of its vaults are so high, that they resemble the roof of a church, and in other parts so low, that they can be passed only by creeping on the hands and feet. Lancaster carries on a considerable trade, especially to the W Indies; is noted for the making of mahogany cabinet ware; and has manufactures of canvas and coarse linens. It is 66 m S Carlisle, and 240 NNW London. Lon. 2 56 W, lat. 54 4 N.

Lancaster, a borough of Pennsylvania, capital of a county of the same name, and the largest inland town in the United States. Beside six churches, and other public buildings, it contains a college founded in 1787, called Franklin College. Here are manufactures of guns and other hardware; and the inhabitants, about 5000, carry on a considerable trade. It is seated near Conestogo creek, which runs into the Susquehanna, 58 m W by N Philadelphia. Lon. 76 20 W, lat. 40 3 N.

Lancaster, a town of the state of Ohio, capital of Fairfield county. It is seated on the Hockhocking, 50 m W Marietta.

Lancaster, a town of Massachusetts, in Worcester county. In the vicinity is a quarry of excellent stones for tombs, and the best slates for houses. It is situate on a branch of the Nashua, which runs into the Merrimac, 14 m N by E Worcester, and 35 WNW Boston.

Langward Fort, a strong fort of England, situate on a sandy point of land on the Suffolk side of the harbour of Harwich, but within the limits of Essex. At high-water it is surrounded by the sea, and becomes an island nearly a m from the shore. It was erected for the defence of the port of Harwich, and has a garrison, under the command of a governor.

Languedoc, a late province of France, 225 m long and 100 where broadest; bounded on the E by Dauphiny and Provence, SE by the Mediterranean, s by Roussillon, w by Gascony, and N by Querci, Rouergue, Auvergne, and Lyonnais. It now forms the departments of Upper Garonne, Aude, Herault, Gard, Lozere, and Ardeche.

Lanjan, or Lantchan, a city and the capital of the kingdom of Lao, at least of the southern part, to which it gives name. It is the usual residence of the king, whose palace is of vast extent. The houses of the grandees and persons of condition are elegant; but those of the inferior people are no better than huts. The priests alone have the privilege of building their houses and convents with brick and stone. Lanjan is situate on the w side of the river Mecon, 400 m NNW Cambodia. Lon. 101 38 E, lat. 18 30 N.

Lanhsburg, a town of New York, capital of Rensselaer county. Here is a library company, incorporated in 1775; and an academy, incorporated in 1796. It stands on the E side of the Hudson, opposite the S branch of the Mohawk, 9 m SNE Albany. Lon. 74 8 W, lat. 42 43 N.

Lanzo, a town of Piedmont, on the river Stura, 12 m NW Turin.

Lao, a kingdom of Asia, bounded on the N by China, E by Tonquin, S by Cambodia, and W by Siam and Birmah. It is surrounded by mountains, covered with forests, which produce abundance of excellent timber; but the country is in general flat, and the soil fertile, being watered by numerous rivulets from the mountains, and a number of canals from the Mecon, which flows from N to S, through the whole region. Some writers make a distinction between the northern part, which they call Laotchu or Lactho; and the southern, which they call Lanjan or Lantchan. In the mountains are many savages who go naked. The climate is somewhat more temperate than that of Tonquin, and more healthful. It abounds in rice, fruit, honey, wax, and cotton; the principal drugs are benjamin and lac; and a great source of wealth is from elephants teeth, which animal is no where in greater perfection than in this country. Gold and silver are found in certain places of the river; and it has mines of iron, lead, and tin. The Laos or Lanjans are well made, robust, of an olive complexion, and mild disposition; but very superstitious, and much addicted to women. Their principal occupation is tilling the ground and fishing; for they have little commerce, and are averie to business. The religion, language, and manners are much the same as in Tonquin. This kingdom became subject to Cochinchina about the commencement of the present century. Lanjan is the capital, or, according to some, Langione.

Laon, a town of France, capital of the department of Aisne, with a castle, and lately a bishop's see. The principal trade consists in corn and wine. It is seated on a mountain, 77 m NE Paris. Lon. 3 43 E, lat. 49 34 N.

Lapland, a country of Europe, bounded on the N by the North sea, E by the White sea, S by Sweden and the gulf of Bothnia, and W by Norway. It lies between 69 and 75 N lat. comprehending, on the most northern side of it, the Frozen Alps, or Alps of Snow. These Alps compose the summit of that chain of mountains called Severnoi, whose declivity toward the E and S consists of lower mountains, deserts, forests, fens, and lakes. Swedish Lapland occupies the S division of this country, and is the largest; it is divided into five lapmarks, or provinces, Uma, Pithu, Lula, Tornea, and Kimi, so named from rivers, which all flow into the gulf of Bothnia. Russian Lapland forms the E part, and is included in the government of Archangel. Danish Lapland, which is the smallest, extends the whole length of the Severnoi, on their northern side, forming the government of Wardhuys, in Norway. The Laplanders are of a middling stature; stout, straight, and of a yellowish complexion, occasioned by the weather, the smoke of their habitations, and their habitual filthiness. They have generally a flatish face, fallen cheeks, dark grey eyes, thin beard, and brown hair. Their manner of life renders them hardy, agile, and supple, but at the same time much inclined to laziness. They are peaceable, obedient to their superiors, cheerful in company, but mistrustful, cheats in commerce, and so proud of their country and constitution, that when removed from the place of their nativity, they usually die of the nostalgia, or longing to return. Their women are short, often well made, complaisant, chaste, and of weak nerves; which is also observable sometimes among the men. The language of the Laplanders comprehends so many dialects, that it is with difficulty they understand each other. The men are divided into Fishers and Mountaineers. The former make their habitations in the neighbourhood of some lake, whence they draw their subsistence. The others seek their support upon the mountains, possessing herds of reindeer, which they use according to the season; but they go generally on foot. They are very industrious herdsmen, and are rich in comparison of the Fishers. Some of them possess 600 or 1000 reindeer; and they castrate the superfluous males by crushing the testicles with their teeth. The Lapland fishers, who are also called Laplanders of the woods (because in summer they dwell upon the borders of the lakes, and in winter in the forests) live by fishing and hunting, and choose their situation from its convenience for either. Beside looking after their reindeer, the fishery, and the chase, the men employ themselves in the construction of their canoes, which are light and compact; they also make sledges, to which they give the form of a canoe, and harness for the reindeer: it is the man's business, likewise, to look after the kitchen. The employment of the women consists in making nets for the fishery, drying fish and meat, milking the reindeer, making cheese, and tanning hides. The articles of dress are the sole labour of the women; and they also make several utensils in wood, such as cups, bowls, &c. which are sometimes prettily carved, sometimes ornamented with bones, brass, or horn. They prepare the nerves of the reindeer in such a manner as to make them serve for thread; and draw brass wire by the help of the horns of the reindeer pierced, instead of a drawing iron. They embroider their clothes with brass wire, silver, sham gold, or wool, which they have the art of dying in all sorts of colours. These people live in huts in the form of tents, covered with briars, bark, linen, turf, coarse cloth, felt, or reindeer-skins; and the door is of felt, made like two curtains which open at under. They are not able to stand upright in these huts, but constantly sit upon their heels round the fire. At night they lie down quite naked; and, to separate the apartments, place upright sticks at small distances. They cover themselves with their clothes, and in winter put their feet into a fur bag. Their household furniture consists of iron or copper kettles, wooden caps, bowls, spoons, and sometimes tin or even silver basins: to these may be added their implements of fishing and hunting. That they may not be obliged to carry such a number of things with them in their excursions, they build, at certain distances, in the forests, little huts made like pigeon-houses, and placed upon the trunk of a tree cut off at about the height of six feet from the root. In these elevated huts they keep their goods and provisions; and though they are never shut, yet are they never plundered. In their dress they use no linen. The men wear cloth pantaloons, reaching down to their shoes, which are made of untanned skin, pointed, and turned up before. Their doublet, or close garment, is made of sheep-skin, with the wool on, the woolly side being inward: it has a high collar, made stiff with cloth neatly worked with different coloured threads, and extending a little way down the breast. Over this they wear a loose coat of coarse cloth, or of the skin of the reindeer, the skirts of which reach down to the knees, and it is fastened round them by a leathern girdle, ornamented with plates of tin or brass. To this girdle they tie their knives, their instruments for getting fire, and their smoking apparatus. Their clothes are always bordered with fur, or cloth of a different colour. Their caps are of a conical form, generally made of four pieces of red kersey cloth, and the four seams adorned with lists of a yellow colour: on the top of the cap is fixed a tassel of shreds of different coloured cloth; and the lower part has a border of fur. The Russian Laplanders generally border their caps with ermine. The women wear pantaloons, shoes, doublets, and close coats, like the men; but their girdle is commonly embroidered with brass wire. Beside these, they wear kerchiefs, and little aprons, made of Russian painted cloth, rings on their fingers, and earrings, to which they sometimes hang chains of silver, which pass two or three times round the neck. They sometimes wear caps folded after the manner of turbans, and sometimes caps to the shape of the head; but all are ornamented with the embroidery of brass wire, or with list of different colours. Sterility is a reproach among the women. They are generally delivered without difficulty; the husband assists at the labour, and affords his wife the necessary help. Their cradle is small, light, and made in the shape of a canoe; and, in their journeys, the women carry it at their backs. Their weddings are kept at the bride's house, who appears with her head quite uncovered, which, at other times, is never the custom with either women or maidens: the feast is a kind of club-meal, to which each of the guests brings meat and drink. Their diversions at weddings and other merry-makings, is the game of fox and geese: they wrestle, and jump over a stick; and are fond of giving grotesque accounts of different adventures. They likewise dance and sing, or rather howl in disagreeable measures. The reindeer supply the Laplanders with the greatest part of their provisions; the chase and the fishery furnish the rest; but the flesh of the bear is their most delicate meat. Their common drink is water, sometimes mixed with milk; and they are fond of brandy, but it is scarce with them. Their most considerable traffic is with the Norwegians, and the balance is always in favour of the Laplanders; because they can furnish more skins and furs than they buy flour, cloth, and hardware goods. All the money, which they have not immediate occasion for, they bury in the earth, as well as their plate, and whatever they think of value. Nor even at the point of death do they declare the spot where it is hidden, imagining that they shall want it in the other world. All the Swedish and Norwegian, as well as the greatest number of the Russian Laplanders, bear the name of Christians; but their religion is a compound of Christian and pagan ceremonies.

Lar, a city of Persia, capital of Laristan, with a castle on a rock, now in ruins. The residence of the governor is in the middle of the city, surrounded by a wall, flanked with towers. The bazar is said to be the noblest structure of the kind in Persia. Here are manufactures of muskets and cotton cloth. It is situate between mountains, in a sandy soil, 170 m s by E Shiraz. Lon. 53 40 E, lat. 27 20 N.

Leadhills, a village of Scotland, 18 m s Lanerk, situate amid mountains, in which are rich mines of lead. Here is a public library, fitted up by the miners, who work only six hours in a day, and employ much of their spare time in reading. It is supposed to be the highest inhabited place in Britain, being about 2000 feet above the level of the sea.

Leamington Priors, a village in Warwickshire, on the river Leame, 2 m E Warwick. Here are some saline springs, with warm and cold baths, a pump-room, and good accommodations for genteel company.

Leao-tong, or Chen-yang, one of the three departments of Eastern Tartary, or country of the Mandshur Tartars, who hence entered and conquered China. It is bounded on the s by the great wall of China and the Yellow sea, and enclosed on the E, S, and W by a palisade of stakes seven feet high, without either bank or ditch. Chen-yang, or Mougdun, is the capital.

Leatherhead, a town in Surry, which had formerly a market. Here is a bridge of 14 arches over the river Mole, which a little above is said to make its reappearance above ground. It is 18 m ssw London.

Leathes-water, or Thirlmere, a lake in Cumberland, lying sse of Keswick. It is narrow and irregular, about 3 m in length, skirting the foot of Helvellyn, and receiving numerous torrents from that huge mountain. The singular beauty of this lake is its being almost intersected in the middle, over which part there is a bridge. Its outlet at the N end joins the river Greeta, which runs into the Derwent, below Keswick.

Leba, a town of Further Pomerania, on the river Leba, which, after forming a lake 15 m in circuit, enters the Baltic sea. It is 16 m nsw Lauenburg.

Lebanon, a town of Pennsylvania, in Dauphin county, with two churches; seated on Quitaphilla creek, 22 m E by N Harrisburg, and 85 nsw Philadelphia.

Lebanon, New, a town of New York, in Dutchess county, noted for its medicinal spring, 30 m NE Hudson.

Lebida, a town of Barbary, in Tri-

Lee, a river of Ireland, which rises on the confines of Kerry, and flows E to Cork, below which city it enters Cork harbour.

Leeds, a town in W Yorkshire, governed by a mayor, with a market on Tuesday and Saturday. It stands on the river Aire, and in a vale which trade has rendered one of the most populous spots in England. It is the principal of the clothing towns in Yorkshire, and the mart for the coloured and white broad cloths, of which vast quantities are sold in its two cloth-halls, within the space of an hour, without the least confusion. The manufactures that supply these two halls extend about 10 m to the S, 15 to the SW, and eight to the N and W; the mixed cloths being mostly made in the neighbourhood of the river Aire, and the white cloths in that of the Calder. Leeds has five churches and several meeting-houses; a flourishing manufacture of carpets, some mills for the cutting of tobacco, and several potteries. In the neighbourhood are numerous collieries, and great quantities of coal are sent to York and Hull. Three m to the NNW, on the river Aire, stands the venerable remains of Kirkstall abbey, embowered in groves of oak. Leeds and its liberty contained 53,162 inhabitants in 1801, and 62,534 in 1811. A canal passes hence to Liverpool, by which and the river this town has a communication with the Irish sea and the German ocean. It is 22 m WSW York, and 19 1/2 N by W London. Lon. 1 34 W, lat. 53 48 N.

Leeds, a town of Virginia, in Richmond county, on the N side of the Rappahannoc, 34 m SE Falmouth, and 50 NE Richmond.

Leek, a town in Staffordshire, with a market on Wednesday, and manufacture of silk handkerchiefs, ribands, twist, and buttons; seated on the Churnet, 21 m N Stafford, and 154 NNW London.

Leer, or Lehr, a town of Westphalia, in E Friesland, on a river of the same name, which soon after joins the Ems. It is 11 m SE Emden.

Leerdam, a town of S Holland, seated on the Linghe, 6 m NE Gorcum.

Leerort, a fortress of Westphalia, in E Friesland, seated at the conflux of the Leer with the Ems, 10 m E by S Emden.

Leers, or Liers, a town of the Netherlands, in the territory of Liege, near which a battle was gained by the

LEG

French, in 1746, over the allies, commanded by prince Charles of Lorraine. It is 4 m N Liege.

Leeburg, a town of Virginia, chief of Loudon county. It is 40 m NW Alexandria, and 55 ESE Winchester.

Leeburg, a town of N Carolina, chief of Caswell county. It is 30 m NW Hillsborough, and 95 W Halifax.

Leeburg, or Leesfown, a town of Kentucky, in Fayette county, on the river Kentucky, 20 m W Lexington.

Leeuwe, a fortified town of the Netherlands, in Brabant, taken by the allies in 1705. It is seated in a morass, on the river Geete, 12 m E Louvain.

Leeward Islands, such of the Caribee islands, in the West Indies, as commence at St. Thomas, and extend SE to Dominica.

Leffoga, one of the Hapae islands, in the Pacific ocean, visited by Cook in 1776. Many parts of the country near the sea are sandy and barren; but in the internal parts were large spots covered with the paper mulberry-tree, and plantations stocked with plants and fruit-trees. To these Cook made some increase by adding melons, maize, &c. The island is 7 m long and 3 broad.

Leghorn, or Livorno, a strong city of Tuscany, in Pifano, and a bishop's see. It has one of the best harbours in the Mediterranean; and the inhabitants, computed at 40,000, carry on a great trade. The streets are wide and straight, and almost all the houses of the same height. There are so many canals, that some have given it the title of New Venice. The Jews, who are numerous, have a handsome synagogue and schools; the Greeks and Armenians have churches of their own; and no religion is disturbed. Near the harbour is a large building, in which they shut up every night the Turks and the galley slaves. At a little distance is a lighthouse, on a small island. The trade consists of foreign goods, as cotton, sugar, cocoa, spices, sulphur, and alum; and in home productions, as essences, oils, wine, straw-hats, cloth, juniper berries, oranges, lambs and goats skins, and coral. In 1741, this city suffered greatly by an earthquake. In 1796, it was entered by the French, who were obliged to evacuate it in 1799, but they re-entered it the following year. It is 12 m SSW Pisa, and 55 WSW Florence. Lon. 10 25 E, lat. 43 33 N.

Legnago, a town of Italy, in Veronese, seated on the Adige, with a regular fortress. The town is populous, and carries on a considerable trade, particularly in grain, which is facilitated by means of a canal from the Adige to the Po. It surrendered to the French in 1796. It is 24 m SE Verona.

L E I

Leibnitz, a town of Germany, in Stiria, seated on the Sulm, 16 m S Gratz.

Leicester, a town of Massachusetts, in Worcester county, with an academy and a considerable manufacture of wool cards, 6 m WSW Worcester.

Leicester, a borough and the capital of Leicestershire, governed by a mayor, with a market on Saturday. In the civil wars the walls were in a great measure demolished; the castle was also dismantled, the hall and kitchen being the only parts that are left entire, and the assizes are held in the former. It has five churches, and several meeting-houses. The combing and spinning of wool, and making it into stockings and other articles, is the chief business of this town and neighbourhood. A canal passes hence by Loughborough to the river Trent. At a parliament held here, in the reign of Henry V, was made the first law for the burning of heretics. In the meadows near the town, are the ruins of an abbey, in which cardinal Wolsey died. Leicester contained 16,953 inhabitants in 1801, and 23,146 in 1811. It is seated on the Soar, 28 m S by E Derby, and 98 NNW London. Lon. 1 8 W, lat. 52 38 N.

Leicestershire, a county of England, bounded on the N by Nottinghamshire, E by the counties of Lincoln and Rutland, S by Northamptonshire, SW by Warwickshire, and NW by Derbyshire. It is 38 m long and 30 broad, containing 522,240 acres; is divided into six hundreds, and 196 parishes; has 12 market-towns; and sends four members to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 130,081 in 1801, and 150,419 in 1811. The chief rivers are the Avon, Soar, Wreke, Anker, and Welland; and it has several canals. The soil, in general, affords great quantities of rich grazing land, and is peculiarly fitted for the culture of beans. Toward the NW, the Bardou-hills rise to a great height; and in their neighbourhood is Charnwood forest, now chiefly enclosed: further to the NW are valuable coal mines. The NE part feeds a great number of sheep; and the SE part is a rich grazing tract. This county is famous for its large black horses and horned cattle, as well as for its sheep; and for having bred every species of domestic quadruped to the utmost perfection of form and size. The manufacture of stockings is the principal one in the county.

Leigh, a town in Essex, on a creek at the mouth of the Thames, opposite the E extremity of Canvey island. It is noted for oysters, and has a good road for shipping. It is 18 m SSE Chelmsford, and 39 E London.

Leigh, a town in Lancashire, with a market on Saturday. It has several manufactures, particularly of fine jeans, in imitation of those of India. It stands at the head of the duke of Bridgewater's canal, 9 m NNE Warrington, and 199 NW London.

Leighlin, or Old Leighlin, a borough of Ireland, in the county of Carlow, and the see of a bishop united with Ferns. The cathedral serves for the parish church. It was formerly a city, but is now a poor place, 9 m SSW Carlow, and 12 NE Kilkenny.

Leighlin-bridge, a town of Ireland, in the county of Carlow, on the river Barrow, 7 m S Carlow.

Leighton Buzzard, a town in Bedfordshire, with a market on Tuesday, seated on the Lysfel, 18 m S Bedford, and 41 NW London.

ral, are lofty. There are six handsome colleges belonging to the university, beside the private colleges; and the exchange is a fine structure. Leipzig was taken by the Prussians in 1745 and 1756. The Austrians in 1756 besieged it in vain; they took it two years after, but were soon obliged to give it up. In 1813, a great victory was obtained here by the allies, over the French grand army, on the 18th of October; during the engagement, the whole of the Saxon troops abandoned the French, and joined the allies. The next morning the city was taken (with the king of Saxony and all his court) and entered at three different points by the emperor of Russia, the king of Prussia, and the crown prince of Sweden. Leipzig is seated in a plain, on the river Pleysse, 60 m WNW Dresden. Lon. 12 20 E, lat. 51 19 N.

Leira, a city of Portugal, in Estremadura, and a bishop's see, with an ancient castle on an eminence. In 1811, it was set on fire by the French, on their retreat into Spain. It is 80 m NNE Lisbon. Lon. 8 38 W, lat. 39 48 N.

Leisnig, a town of Upper Saxony, in Misnia, with manufactures of cloth, lace, stockings, &c. It is seated on the Mulda, 24 m ESE Leipzig, and 32 NW Dresden.

Leitenberg, a town of Upper Saxony, in Thuringia, with a castle on a mountain; seated on the Sorbitz, 11 m SSE Saalfeld.

Leith, a seaport of Scotland, on the frith of Forth, 2 m N by E Edinburgh, of which it is the port. It stands at the mouth of the river Leith, which forms the harbour, and divides the town into N and S Leith, which communicate by a drawbridge. The harbour is secured by a noble stone pier; and it has wet and dry docks, with other conveniences for ship-building, which is carried on to a great extent. Here are also manufactures of ropes, canvas, carpets, glass, shoes, leather, soap, and candles, and several iron forges. There are three churches, a magnificent banking-house, an hospital for disabled seamen, and a battery for the defence of the harbour. The commerce of Leith is very considerable; and the vessels employed in the London trade are, in general, of a large size; but the largest ships are those employed in the Greenland whale fishery. To foreign parts are exported lead, glass ware, linen, woollen stuffs, and a variety of other goods. The number of inhabitants was 15,272 in 1801, and 20,363 in 1811. Lon. 3 11 W, lat. 55 59 N.

Lerida, a strong city of Spain, in Catalonia, and a bishop's see, with a university. On a hill close to the town are the ruins of a castle, formerly a place of great strength. This place declared for Charles III, after the reduction of Barcelona, in 1705, but it was retaken by the duke of Orleans in 1707, after the battle of Almanza. It is seated in a fertile plain, on the river Segra, 80 m W Barcelona, and 200 NW Madrid. Lon. 0° 35' E, lat. 41° 32' N.

Lerins, a name given to two islands in the Mediterranean, on the coast of France, 5 m from Antibes. That nearest the coast, called St. Margaret, was taken by the English in 1746, but retaken in 1747. The other is called St. Honorat, and has a Benedictine abbey.

Lerma, a town of Spain, in Old Castile, with a palace, seated on the Arlanza, 23 m S Burgos.

Lerna, or Milos, a town of European Turkey, in Morea, at the NW extremity of the gulf of Napoli. It was the ancient Lerna, and though now a small place, is the port of Tripolizza, and corn, wool, &c. are hence exported. A little to the S is the celebrated lake of Lerna. The town stands at the foot of a mountain, on which is a fortress, 8 m SSW Argos, and 24 ENE Tripolizza.

Lernica, a town of Cyprus, formerly a large city, as appears from the ruins. It is situate on the S coast of the island, where there is a good road, and a small fort for its defence, 30 m SW Famagusta.

Lero, anciently Leria, an island of the Archipelago, lying 8 m SE Patmos.

Lerwick, a town of Scotland, capital of the Shetland islands, situate on the E side of Mainland, the principal island, on the spacious harbour called Brassa found. It is the rendezvous of the fishing busses, and vessels employed in the various fisheries. Here are manufactures of stockings, bed rugs, and plating straw. At the N end of the town is Fort Charlotte, which commands the N entrance to Brassa found. Lon. 0° 56' W, lat. 60° 12' N.

LES

Lefcar, a town of France, in the department of Lower Pyrenees, and lately a bishop's see; seated on a hill, 3 m NW Pau, and 42 SE Bayonne.

Lesguis, one of the seven Caucasian nations, between the Black sea and the Caspian. Their country is indifferently called Lesguistan and Daghestan, by the Georgians. It is bounded on the E and S by Persia and the Caspian, SW and W by Georgia, the Ossis, and the Kists, and N by the Kisti and Tartar tribes. It is divided into a variety of districts, generally independent, and governed by chiefs elected by the people. The Lesguis are supposed to be descended from the tribe of mountaineers, known to ancient geographers under the name of Lesgæ or Ligyes. The strength of their country, which is a region of mountains, whose passes are known only to themselves, has probably, at all times, secured them from foreign invasion. They subsist by raising cattle, and by predatory expeditions into the countries of their more wealthy neighbours. In their persons and dress, and general habits of life, as far as these are known to us, they greatly resemble the Circassians.

Lesina, an island in the gulf of Venice, on the coast of Dalmatia, 48 m long and 8 broad. It contains great quantities of different kinds of marble. The principal productions are wine, oil, figs, almonds, oranges, saffron, aloes, honey, and wool; but salt-fish is the chief article of commerce. The capital is of the same name, and has a good harbour, 20 m S Spalatro. Lon. 16 20 E, lat. 43 33 N.

Lesina, a town of Naples, in Capitanata, on a lake of the same name, 26 m NW Manfredonia.

Leskeard, a borough in Cornwall, governed by a mayor, with a market on Saturday. It had formerly a castle, now in ruins, is one of the coinage towns for tin, and has manufactures of leather and yarn. It is 31 m ENE Truro, and 225 W by S London. Lon. 4 42 W, lat. 50 27 N.

Lesko, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Lemberg, 68 m SW Lemberg.

Lesneven, a town of France, in the department of Finisterre, 10 m N Landernau, and 13 NE Brest.

Lesparre, a town of France, in the department of Gironde, near which are found transparent pebbles, known by the name of Medoc stones. It is 40 m NNW Bourdeaux.

Lessines, a town of the Netherlands, in Hainault, famous for its linen manufacture; seated on the Dender, 28 m SW Brussels.

Lestwithiel, a borough in Cornwall, governed by a mayor, with a market on Friday. It was anciently the capital of the county, and the county members are still elected here. It is seated on the Fowey, which was formerly navigable to the town, but the channel is now stopped up. Here is a woollen manufacture; and it is one of the tin coinage towns. Near it, on the edge of a hill, is Lestormel castle, formerly the residence of the dukes of Cornwall. Lestwithiel is 22 m NE Truro, and 236 W by S London.

Lettere, a town of Naples, in Principato Citra, at the foot of a mountain, 12 m NW Salerno.

Letterkenny, a town of Ireland, in the county of Donegal, on the river Swilly, 14 m NW Lifford.

Levant. This word properly signifies East; but it is generally used, when speaking of trade, for Turkey in Asia; comprehending Anatolia, Syria, the islands of Cyprus, Candia, &c. The Levant Sea means the E part of the Mediterranean Sea.

Leubus, a town of Silesia, in the principality of Wolau, with a celebrated Cistercian abbey; seated on the Oder, 10 m SW Wolau.

Leucate, a town of France, in the department of Aude, situate near the Mediterranean, on the N side of a lake of its name, 18 m S Narbonne.

Leuch, or Leuk, a town of Swisserland, in Valais, much frequented on account of its hot mineral springs. It is seated on an eminence, near the Rhone, 15 m ESE Sion.

Leuchtenburg, a town of the palatinate of Bavaria, in a landgrate of the same name; seated on a mountain, near the river Pfreibmt, 38 m NNE Ratibon. Lon. 12 18 E, lat. 49 35 N.

share in the coasting and Baltic trade. It stands on the w side of Largo bay, at the influx of the river Leven, 10 m NE Kirkealdy.

Leven, Loch, an arm of the sea, in Scotland. See Linthe. Loch.

Leven, Loch, a lake of Scotland, in Kinrosshire, 10 m in circuit, and of a circular form. It contains four small islands, on one of which is a ruinous castle, where queen Mary was confined by the confederate lords, after she had separated from Bothwell; and on another, named St. Serf, is the ruin of a priory. On the E side of the lake, near its outlet, stands the ruinous monastery of Portmoak.

Lewroux, a town of France, in the department of Indre, 11 m N Chateauroux, and 35 SW Bourges.

Leuse, a town of the Netherlands, in Hainault, seated on the Dender, 14 m NW Mons.

Leutkirch, a town of Suabia, lately imperial, with two suburbs, and a good linen trade. It is seated on the Etschbach, which runs into the Iller, 22 m NE Lindau, and 38 S Ulm.

Leutmeritz, or Leitmeritz, a town of Bohemia, capital of a circle of the same name, and lately a bishop's see. The circle is such a delightful country that it is called the Bohemian Paradise; it produces excellent wine, and contains warm baths, tin mines, and precious stones. The town is well built and populous, and seated on the Elbe, 30 m NW Prague. Lon. 14 17 E, lat. 50 32 N.

Leutmischel, or Leitomischel, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Chrudim, with a castle on a mountain, 20 m ESE Chrudim.

Leutsch, a town of Germany, in Carniola, 8 m SSE Idria.

Lewarden, a strong town of Holland, capital of Friesland. The buildings, as well public as private, are magnificent. It has several canals in the streets, which are a great assistance to its trade; they being continued to the sea, and to the most considerable towns in the province. It is seated on the river Ee, 32 m W Groningen. Lon. 5 48 E, lat. 53 13 N.

Lewenz, a town of Upper Hungary, in the county of Gran; seated on a river of the same name, where the Turks were defeated in 1664. It is 25 m NE Gran.

Lewes, a borough in Suffex, with a market on Saturday. It contains four parish churches; and adjoining are the villages of Southover and Cliff, each with a parish church. The latter place is parted from Lewes by the river Ouse, which is navigable for barges; and in the former are considerable remains of a celebrated monastery. Lewes was formerly surrounded by walls, vestiges of which are still visible; and on the summit of a hill are the remains of an ancient castle. Here is a capacious townhall, in which the summer assizes are held. The number of inhabitants was 3309 in 1801, and 6221 in 1811. Near this town was fought a battle in 1263, when Henry III and his son (afterward Edward I) were made prisoners by the earl of Leicester. Lewes is situate at the edge of the South Downs, 30 m E Chichester, and 49 S London. Lon. 0 2 E, lat. 50 55 N.

Lewes, a town of Delaware, in Suffex county, situate on Lewes creek, 5 m from its mouth in Delaware bay, and 16 NNE Georgetown.

Lewis, the largest, and the most northern, of the Western islands of Scotland. It is 57 m long, and of considerable breadth toward the middle and north end. It lies 20 m NNW of the isle of Skye, and the S end is separated from N Uist by the Sound of Harris, 9 m long and nearly the same broad, in which are many rocks and islets. This island is greatly intersected by arms of the sea, by which it may be said to be divided into five peninsulas. The southern part, which is connected by a mountainous isthmus of 6 m, is called Harris, and politically belongs to the county of Inverness; but the northern and principal part is attached to the county of Ross. The country, in general, is wild, bleak, nearly barren of wood, and little fitted for cultivation: the hills are covered with heath, which affords shelter for various sorts of game. The crops are oats, bigg, and potatoes; and there are many beeves and sheep. The lakes and streams abound with salmon, large red trout, &c. and the w coast is annually visited by millions of herrings. The flocks of aquatic birds are prodigious and various; and great quantities of sea-weed are cast ashore, of which abundance of kelp is made. The number of inhabitants is estimated at 17,000. There are several small villages, but Stornaway is the only town. The promontory at the N extremity of the island is called the Butt of Lewis. Lon. 6 32 E, lat. 58 34 N.

Lewisburg, a town of Pennsylvania, in Northumberland county, on the w branch of the Susquehanna, 17 m NNW Northumberland.

Lewisburg, a town of Virginia, chief of Greenbrier county. It stands on the

the N side of Greenbrier river, 150 m W by N Richmond. Lon. 81 15 W, lat. 37 52 N.

Lewisfawn, a town of Pennsylvania, chief of Mifflin county, the mountains of which abound with iron-ore. It stands on the Juniatta, at the influx of the Cistecoquillis, 26 m ENE Huntingdon, and 130 WSW Philadelphia. Lon. 77 36 W, lat. 40 36 N.

Lexington, a town of Kentucky, chief of Fayette county, and formerly the capital of the state. It has four edifices for public worship, a university, and a large court-house. The trade is considerable. Near this town are to be seen curious sepulchres, full of human skeletons, which are fabricated in a method totally different from that now practised by the Indians. In the neighbourhood also are the remains of two ancient fortifications, with ditches and bastions; one containing about six acres of land, and the other nearly three. Pieces of earthen vessels have also been ploughed up near Lexington; a manufacture with which the Indians were never acquainted. These, with the fortifications and the sepulchres, have been urged as an argument, that this country was formerly inhabited by a people further advanced in the arts of life than the present Indians. Lexington stands in a fine tract of country, on the head waters of Elkhorn river, 24 m ESE Frankfort, the present capital. Lon. 84 27 W, lat. 37 54 N.

Lexington, a town of Virginia, chief of Rockbridge county. It stands near the N branch of James river, 120 m W by N Richmond. Lon. 79 50 W, lat. 37 55 N.

Lexington, a town of Massachusetts, in Middlesex county, where hostilities commenced between the British troops and the Americans, in 1775. It is 10 m NW Boston.

Leyden, a city of S Holland, on the ancient bed of the Rhine, which here almost expires in a number of small channels. It is surrounded by a brick wall, with eight gates; and is famous for the long siege it sustained in 1574, against the Spaniards, during which 6000 inhabitants died of famine and pestilence. In honour of this siege a university was founded in 1575, celebrated for its colleges, medicinal garden, anatomical theatre, observatory, and library. The principal church is a superb structure; and the old castle, townhouse, customhouse, and house for orphans, deserve notice. Here are manufactures of cloth, serge, and cambric; and the vicinity produces excellent butter and cheese. It stands on 50 islands, and has 145 bridges, the greatest part built of freestone. The inhabitants are estimated at 50,000. In 1807, the university was almost destroyed, by the catastrophe of a vessel loaded with gunpowder blowing up as it passed. Leyden is 4 m E of the German ocean, and 23 SW Amsterdam. Lon. 4 28 E, lat. 52 8 N.

Leypa, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Lentmeritz, seated on the Pabets, 23 m ENE Leutmeritz.

Leyta, one of the Philippine islands, about 40 leagues long and 95 in circuit. The soil, on the E side, is very fertile; but there are high mountains that intersect it nearly in the middle from E to W, and occasion such an alteration in the climate, that when the inhabitants of one part of the island reap, the others sow; and they have two plentiful harvests in the year, to which the rivers descending from the mountains not a little contribute. The island contains 9200 inhabitants, who pay tribute to the Spaniards, in rice, wax, and quilts. It has a town of the same name, on the N coast. Lon. 124 16 E, lat. 11 20 N.

Liamone, a new department of France, including the S part of Corsica. It has its name from a river which runs into the bay of Sagona, 8 m N of Ajaccio, the chief-town.

Liam-po; see Ning-po.

Libanus, mountains of Turkey in Asia, between Syria and Palestine, extending from the Mediterranean sea as far as Arabia. The summits of these mountains are always covered with snow; but below are very fruitful valleys. They were formerly famous for cedar-trees; but now scarcely any remain. Geographers distinguish them into Libanus and Anti-Libanus: the latter rises on the S side of the valley, near the ruins of Sidon, and terminates at others in Arabia, in lat. 34. They are separated from each other at an equal distance throughout, and form a country, called by the ancients Cœlodyria.

Libatta, a town of Guinea, in the country of Gabon, near the mouth of a river of the same name, 120 m NW Sette. Lon. 8 54 E, lat. 0 58 S.

Libau, a town of Courland, on the Baltic, with a harbour for small ships. The chief articles of commerce are hemp and linseed. It is seated on a peninsula, 50 m N Memel, and 80 W Mittau. Lon. 21 25 E, lat. 56 30 N.

Lichtenfels, a town of Upper Saxony, in Misnia, with a castle on a mountain, 6 m SE Zwickau.

Lichtenford, a town and castle of Holland, in Gelderland, 17 m ESE Zutphen.

Licola, a lake of Naples, near Brta, formerly famous for chace fishes; but, in 1538, an earthquake changed one part of it into a mountain of cinders, and the other into a morass. It was anciently known by the name of Lucrino, or the Lucrine Lake.

Lida, a town and castle of Lithuania, in the palatinate of Wilna, 56 m S Wilna. Lon. 25 34 E, lat. 53 50 S.

Liddel, a river of Scotland, in Roxburghshire, and the only one in the county that flows southward. It forms the boundary with England for 5 m, till it enters the Esk. (from Dumfriesshire) 3 m above Longtown in Cumberland.

Lidford, a village in Devonshire, on the river Lidl, 7 m N Tavistock. It was once a borough, with a castle; and its parish may now compare for lands and liberties with any in the kingdom, the whole forest of Dartmoor being in the verge of it. The bridge is thrown over a part of the river that is pent between two high rocks; and near it is a fine cataract.

Lidkoping, a town of Sweden, in W Gothland, on the S side of the lake Wenner, at the influx of the Lida, 12 m NW Skara, and 68 NE Gotheburg.

Liebenwald, a town of Brandenburg, in the Middle mark, near which the Finow canal begins, that unites the rivers Oder, Finow, and Havel. It is seated on the Havel, 25 m N Berlin.

Liebenwerda, a town of the duchy of Saxony, with a castle, seated on the Elster, 24 m NNW Dresden.

Lichstadt, a town of W Prussia, with a castle, 45 m E by S Marienburg.

Liege, a territory of the Netherlands, lately a bishopric, bounded on the N by Brabant and Upper Gelderland, E by Limburg and Juliers, S by Luxemburg and the Ardennes, and W by Hainault,

Namur, and Brabant. It is fertile in corn and fruit, has mines of iron, lead, and coal, and quarries of marble. The bishop was one of the most considerable ecclesiastical princes of Germany, and his territory deemed a part of the circle of Westphalia. But on the subjugation of the Netherlands by the French, and in the new division of that country, this territory forms a part of the departments of Ourthe and Lower Meuse.

Liège, a strong city, lately the capital of the bishopric of that name, and now the capital of the department of Ourthe. Here the river Meuse is divided into three branches, and after passing through the city, under several bridges, unite again. Liège is 4 m in circuit, and has 16 gates; it has also 10 large suburbs, in which and the city are a great number of churches and religious houses. The magnificent cathedral contains many relics; and the other public structures are the castle, the palace, the councilhouse, the townhouse, and the arsenal: here is also a famous university, and a convent of nuns. At this place is made a great quantity of fire-arms, and nails, also cloth, leather, glass, &c. Liège was delivered up to the French in 1701; the allies retook it in 1702; and the French besieged it again in 1705, but abandoned the siege, on the approach of the duke of Marlborough. In 1714, a fire happened here, which consumed the bishop's palace, with all the furniture and writings. In 1792, the French took this city; they were driven thence in 1793, but entered it again, after a short resistance, in 1794. Liège is 60 m wsw Cologne. Lon. 5 35 E, lat. 50 38 N.

Lieou-kieou, or Loo keoo, the general name of 36 islands in the China sea, lying between Formosa and Japan, which form a kingdom. The inhabitants are civilized, and of a mild, gay, affable, and temperate disposition. Each island has a particular name; the principal one, called Lieou-kieou, is 126 m long and 28 broad, but the others are inconsiderable. The chief products are sulphur, copper, tin, coral, mother-of-pearl, tortoise and other shells, and whetstones, which are in great request both in China and Japan, as are also the vessels that are built in this country. The king is tributary to China. Kin-tching, in the SE part of the principal island, is the capital.

Lieou-tcheou, a city of China, of the first rank, in the province of Quang-tong. Its territories border on the kingdom of Tonquin, from which it is separated by inaccessible mountains. It is seated on the Lien-kiang, which forms a convenient harbour for barks, 325 m wsw Canton. Lon. 108 40 E, lat. 21 40 N.

Liere, a town of the Netherlands, in Brabant, which has a great trade in cattle; seated at the junction of the Great and Little Nethe, 10 m SE Antwerp.

Lieskenboeck, a fortress of the Netherlands, in Flanders, on the W side of the Scheldt, above Fort Lillo, 7 m SW Antwerp.

Liesse, a town of France, in the department of Aisne, famous for an image of the virgin Mary, to which pilgrims resort. It is 6 m E Laon.

Lille, a strong city of France, in the department of Nord, and one of the most commercial towns in France. The inhabitants are computed to be 60,000. Its citadel is supposed to be the strongest in Europe, next to that of Turin. The streets and squares are adorned with noble buildings, particularly the Great Square and the Little Square; and among the public structures are the exchange, a magazine of vast extent, and a general hospital. Here are manufactures of all sorts; but the principal trade is in camlets. Lille was taken by the allies, after three months siege, in 1708; but was restored by the treaty of Utrecht, in 1713, in consideration of the demolition of the fortifications of Dunkirk. In 1792, it sustained a severe bombardment from the Austrians. It is seated in a rich and marthy soil, on the Deule, 14 m W Tournay, and 130 N Paris. Lon. 3 4 E, lat. 50 38 N.

Lillers, a town of France, in the department of Pas de Calais, seated on the Navez, 17 m NW Arras.

Lillo, a fort of the Netherlands, in Brabant, on the E side of the Scheldt, 9 m NNW Antwerp. It was taken, in 1792, by the French, who soon after evacuated it; but they retook it in 1794.

Lima, the principal audience of Peru; bounded on the N by the audience of Quito, E by the Andes, S by the audience of Charcas, and W by the Pacific ocean.

Lima, the capital of Peru, and an archbishop's see, with a university. In 1534, Pizarro, marching through the country, was struck with the beauty of the extensive valley of Rimac; and there, on a river of the same name, at the distance of 6 m from Callao, he founded a city, and gave it the name of Ciudad de los Reyes, or City of the Kings. This Spanish name it retains in all legal deeds, but is better known to foreigners by that of Lima, a corruption of the appellation of the valley in which it stands. Lima is of a triangular form, and surrounded by a brick wall, flanked with bastions, in which are seven gates. The base, or longest side, extends 2 m along the bank of the river, and from the base to the opposite angle it is a mile and three quarters. The streets are handsome and straight; the houses are generally only one story high, and the roofs covered with coarse linen cloth, or only with reeds, for it seldom rains here; but the rich inhabitants cover theirs with fine mats, or beautiful cotton cloths; and there are trees planted round them to keep off the heat of the sun. What the houses want in height they have in extent, for some of them are 200 feet long and proportionably broad, so that they have 10 or 12 large apartments on the ground floor. The churches and convents are extremely rich; and many images of the saints are of gold, adorned with jewels. Here are the courts of the viceroy, the archbishop, the inquisition, the crusado, and the wills. A fine bridge extends over the river to a suburb, called St. Lazaro, which is neatly built like the city. The river forms canals in the streets, which run to most of the houses, and serve to water the gardens, &c. Lima is the general staple of Peru; for all the provinces remit hither their products and manufactures, and are supplied hence with the necessary commodities. The wealth of the provinces is principally embarked on the fleet, which, at the time of the galleons, sails from Callao (the port of Lima) to Panama; but its commerce with the other parts of N and S America is very considerable. Earthquakes are frequent, and some have done the city much damage; particularly that in 1746, by which Callao was destroyed. The inhabitants, estimated at 54,000, are rich and very debauched; yet are extremely superstitious, and have a strong belief in the power of charms. Lima is 850 m S by E Quito. Lon. 76 49 W, lat. 12 2 S.

Limale, a town of the Netherlands, in Brabant, seated on the Dyle, 13 m SE Brussels.

Limavady; see Newtown Limavady.

Limburg, a late duchy and province of the Netherlands, 42 m long and 30 broad; bounded on the N by the duchy of Juliers, E by the same and the territory of Treves, and S and W by the territory of Liege. It has good arable ground, abounds in a fine breed of cattle, and contains mines of iron and lead. The N part of it belonged to the Dutch, and the S to the house of Auftria; but the whole is now subject to France, the s part included in the department of Lower Meuse, and the s in that of Ourthe.

Limburg, a town of the Netherlands, capital of the lts duchy of that name, with a castle built of marble. Here is a manufacture of woollen cloths, and it is famous for excellent cheese. Near it are many quarries of different kinds of marble, and good mines of calamine and coal. Limburg was taken by the allies in 1703, and ceded to Austria by the treaty of Baden, but the fortifications were destroyed. The French took possession of it in 1794. It is seated on a mountain, near the river Wese, 20 m r Liege. Lon. 6 1 e, lat. 50 38 n.

Limburg, a town of Germany, in the territory of Treves, with a fine cathedral. The Austrians defeated the French on the heights near this place, in 1796. It is seated on the Lahn, 26 m sw Frankfurt.

Limkiltus, a town of Scotland, in Fifeshire, on the coast of the Forth. It is famous for great lime-works, has a good tide harbour for small vessels, and is 3 m sw Dunfermlin.

Limerick, a county of Ireland, in the province of Munster, 48 m long and 23 broad; bounded on the n by Tipperary and Clare, from which last it is separated by the Shannon, w by Kerry, s by Cork, and e by Tipperary. It is divided into 125 parishes, contains about 170,000 inhabitants, and sends three members to parliament. It is a fertile country, though the w parts are mountainous.

Limerick, a city of Ireland, capital of the county of Limerick, and generally considered as the capital of the province of Munster. It was formerly well fortified, and reckoned the second city in the kingdom, but at present has lost its rank; not because it flourishes less, but because Cork flourishes more. Limerick is a county of itself, and a bishop's see with Ardfert and Aghadoe united. It is composed of the Irish and English town; the latter standing on Kings island, formed by the river Shannon, which here admits vessels of 500 tons to the quays; and the two towns are united by a stately bridge. The inhabitants are estimated at upward of 40,000; and it sends a member to parliament. The linen, woollen, and paper manufactures are carried on to a great extent; and the export of provisions is considerable. Beside the cathedral and other churches, here are some handsome public structures. King

William was obliged to raise the siege of this city in 1690; but, in 1691, the garrison surrendered on a very honorable capitulation. It is 46 m sw Galway, and 112 sw Dublin. Lon. 8 34 w, lat. 52 35 n.

Limestone, or Maysville, a town of Kentucky, in Mason county, on the river Ohio, at the influx of Limestone creek. This is a trading place; and here the champaign country on the eastern side of the river begins. It is 7 m n by s of the town of Washington, 70 sw Frankfort, and 500 by the river below Pittsburg. Lon. 83 28 w, lat. 38 25 n.

Limousin, a town of France, in the department of Dordogne, on the river Dordogne, 20 m s Perigueux.

Limmat, a river of Switzerland, formed by the junction of the Mat and the Linth; the former issuing from the sw extremity of the lake Wallenstadt, and the latter flowing from the s. The Limmat flows sw, passes through the lake of Zurich, and unites with the Aar, below Baden.

Limne, or Limpne, a village in Kent, 3 m sw Hithle. It was formerly a port, till choked up by the sands, and its castle is now converted into a farmhouse. Though now a poor place, it has the horn and mace, and other tokens left of its ancient grandeur. The Roman road from Canterbury, called Stanestreet, ended here.

Limoges, a city of France, capital of the department of Upper Vienne, and a bishop's see. It is a trading place, and the inhabitants are estimated at 20,000. It stands on the Vienne, 50 m ne Perigueux, and 110 e Bourdeaux. Lon. 1 26 e, lat. 45 50 n.

Limousin, a late province of France, bounded on the n by Marche, s by Auvergne, s by Quercy, and w by Perigord and Angoumois. It has forests of chestnut trees, mines of lead, copper, tin, and iron, and abounds in cattle and horses. It now forms the department of Upper Vienne.

Limoux, a town of France, in the department of Aude, with a manufacture of cloth; seated on the Aude, 37 m w by s Narbonne, and 50 se Toulouse.

Linares, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, 22 m nne Jaen.

Linares, a town of New Spain, in New Leon, 40 m e by s Monterey.

Lincoln, a town of Kentucky, in Mercer county, on the e side of Dick river, a branch of the Kentucky, 12 m se Danville.

Lincoln, a city and the capital of Lincolnshire, with a market on Friday.

It is seated on the side of a steep hill, and on the river Witham, which here divides into three streams. It had formerly 50 churches, now reduced to 11, beside the cathedral; and is a bishop's see, the largest diocese in England. The number of inhabitants was 7398 in 1801, and 8861 in 1811. The cathedral stands on the brow of the hill, and is admired for its rich and light architecture. The ruins of the castle are venerable pieces of antiquity; and the ruins of religious houses are so numerous, that the very barns, stables, &c. are built with arched doors and windows. Newport Gate, on the w side of the city, still remains, and is one of the noblest remnants of Roman architecture left in Britain. Upon the plain, without this gate, was fought the famous battle between the partizans of empress Maui and king Stephen, in which that prince was defeated and taken prisoner. Lincoln is a county of itself, governed by a mayor. The chief trade is in coal, brought by the Trent and Fossike; and oats and wool, which are sent by the Witham. Here is a small manufacture of camlets. It is 32 m NE Nottingham, and 131 N London. Lon. 0 25 w, lat. 53 15 N.

Lincolnshire, a county of England, bounded on the N by the Humber, which divides it from Yorkshire, E by the German ocean, SE by the Wash and Norfolk, S by Cambridgeshire and Northamptonshire, SW by Rutlandshire, and W by the counties of Leicesters and Nottingham. It is 77 m long and 45 broad, containing 1,783,685 acres; is divided into 30 hundreds, and 630 parishes; has one city and 31 market-towns; and sends 12 members to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 268,557 in 1801, and 237,891 in 1811. The coast is flat, and at low water may be seen the submarine relics of a forest, which is a great natural curiosity. The principal rivers are the Humber, Trent, Witham, Welland, and Ancolm. This county is divided into three districts, called Holland, Kesteven, and Lindsey. The first, which lies in the SE part, consists of fens and marishes; some in a state of nature, others cut by drains and canals, and crossed by causeways, and some kept from constant inundations by vast banks. The fens, in their native state, produce vast quantities of reeds, which are annually harvested for thatch: the drained parts form excellent pasture land, and some even yield large crops of corn. Prodigious quantities of geese are bred in this district; and here are many decoys for wild ducks, teal, wigeon, and other fowls of the duck kind. Kesteven contains the w part of the county, from the middle to the S extremity: it includes part of the fens; but the air is more salubrious than the district of Holland, and the soil more fruitful. Lindsey, the largest district and most elevated part, includes all the county that lies N of Lincoln, and the Fossike, which Henry I cut between the Witham and the Trent. In the SW part, the rivers Trent, Dune, and Idle form an island, called Asholm, which is a rich tract, and produces much flax. To the NE is a large tract of heathy land, called the Wolds, in which great flocks of sheep are bred. The cattle of this county, and the horses and sheep, are all of the largest breed.

Lincolntown, a town of N Carolina, chief of Lincoln county. It is 22 m E by S Morgantown, and 35 w Salisbury.

Lindau, a city of Suabia (ately imperial) with a castle and a wall, deemed to be Roman works. The French took possession of this city in 1796; and it became subject to Bavaria in 1805. It is a trading place, seated on an island of the lake of Constance, joined to the mainland by a long bridge, 22 m ENE Constance, and 75 SW Augsburg. Lon. 9 41 E, lat. 47 32 N.

Lindau, a town and castle of Upper Sirony, in the principality of Anhalt-Zerbst, 5 m N Zerbst.

Lindou, or Lendow, a town of Brandenburg, in the Middle mark, 5 m NE Ruppin.

Lindensels; see Naze.

Lindisfarne; see Holy Island.

Lingen, a town of Westphalia, in the principality of Munster, capital of a county of its name. Here are churches for the three principal religions, and a celebrated Calvinist academy. It was formerly fortified, but is now barely surrounded by a ditch; and a little to the S of it is a passage over the Ems, called the Lingen Ferry. It is seated on the Ems, 48 m SW Munster. Lon. 7 25 E, lat. 52 32 N.

Lin-kiang, a city of China, of the first rank, in the province of Kiang-si. It is thinly inhabited; but is of some note, on account of one of its villages being the general mart for all the drugs sold in the empire. It is seated on the Linköping, a town of Sweden, capital of E Gothland, and a bishop's see, with a castle. It is not half the size of Nordköping, but the streets are more regular, and the houses more elegant. Here are two large and splendid churches; and near the principal one is a magnificent theatre. It is situate on the river Stång, near the lake Roxen, 24 m S by Nordköping. Lon. 15° 40' E, lat. 58° 23' N.

Linlithgow, a borough of Scotland, capital of Linlithgowshire, seated on a rising ground, overlooking a lake at its E end. The chief manufacture is leather and shoes; the woollen trade and bleaching business are also carried on. Here the kings of Scotland had one of their noblest palaces, now in ruins; but the room is still shown in which queen Mary was born. Linlithgow contained 3594 inhabitants in 1801, and 4022 in 1811. It is 17 m W Edinburgh. Lon. 3° 33' W, lat. 56° 0' N.

Linlithgowshire, or West Lothian, a county of Scotland, 20 m long and 12 broad; bounded on the N by the frith of Forth, SE by Edinburghshire, SW by Lanarkshire, and NW by Stirlingshire. It is divided into 13 parishes. The number of inhabitants was 17,844 in 1801, and 19,451 in 1811. It sends one member to parliament. The surface is finely diversified with hill and dale; and the chief rivers are the Avon and Amound. It is fertile in corn and pasture, and produces coal, iron, limestone, and lead.

Linne, a town of France, in the department of Roer, lately of Germany, in the electorate of Cologne; seated near the Rhine, 35 m NNW Cologne.

Linnhe, Loch, an arm of the sea, on the W coast of Scotland, which separates, at its northern parts, the counties of Argyle and Inverness. It extends in a NE direction from the foun of Mull to Fort William, where it takes a westerly direction, and acquires the name of Loch Eil. Another branch, in an easterly direction, is called Loch Leven. This lake is bounded on each side by lofty hills. The island of Linnore lies at its entrance, and the Caledonian canal commences at its N extremity.

Linnich, a town of France, in the department of Roer, lately of Germany, in the duchy of Juliers; seated on the river Roer, 5 m NNW Juliers.

Linosfa, an island in the Mediterranean, on the coast of Tunis, near that of Lampedosa. It is 12 m in circuit. Lon. 12° 30' E, lat. 36° 50' N.

Linfelles, a village of the Netherlands, in Flanders, 5 m N Lille. Here, in 1794, the French gained a bloody battle over the allies, but chiefly the English, commanded by the duke of York.

Lintain, a city of China, of the second rank, in the province of Chantung, seated on the great canal. Here is an octagonal tower, divided into eight stories, the walls of which are covered on the outside with porcelain. It is 187 m S Peking. Lon. 115° 31' E, lat. 36° 56' N.

Linton, a town in Cambridgeshire, with a market on Thursday, 12 m SE Cambridge, and 48 N by E London.

Linton, a town of Scotland, in Peeblesshire, on the river Lyne, 12 m NW Peebles, and 15 SW Edinburgh.

Lintz, the capital of Upper Austria, with two castles, the one upon a hill, and the other below it. Here is a hall, in which the states assemble, a bridge over the Danube, and considerable woollen manufactures. The French became masters of it in 1741, and again in 1800. It is seated on the right bank of the Danube, 96 m W Vienna. Lon. 14° 16' E, lat. 48° 21' N.

Lintz, a town and citadel of Germany, in the late electorate of Cologne, seated on the Rhine, 23 m SSE Cologne.

Linwood, a village of Scotland, in Renfrewshire, 2 m WNW Paisley, with an extensive cotton manufacture.

Lipari, the largest and most fertile of the Lipari islands, about 15 m in circuit. It has not suffered from subterraneous fires for ages past, though it every where bears the marks of its former volcanic state. It abounds with the currant grape; cotton also grows here; and great quantities of sulphur and pumice are exported. It has a town of the same name, which is a bishop's see, and stands on the SE side of the island, 26 m NNE Patti, in Sicily. Lon. 15° 30' E, lat. 38° 35' N.

Lipari Islands, a cluster of islands in the Mediterranean, which lie to the N of Sicily. They are all of volcanic origin, were feigned to be the residence of Æolus and Vulcan, and formerly called Æolian Islands. They are 12 in number; and nearly as follows in the order of their size; Lipari, Stromboli, Volcano, Salini, Felicuda, Alicuda, Panaria, Volcanello, Vacheluse, Lisca, Dattolo, and Tila Navi. They produce great quantities of alum, sulphur, nitre, cinnabar, and most kinds of fruit, particularly raisins, currants, and figs. Some of their wines are much esteemed, particularly the Malvasia.

Lipno, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Ploczko, 33 m NNW Ploczko.

Lipouree, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Cracow, 22 m w Cracow.

Lippa, a town of Hungary, with a castle, seated on a mountain, by the river Maros, 22 m NE Temeswar.

Lippe, a river of Westphalia, which flows w by Paderborn, Lippstadt, Ham, and Dorsten, and joins the Rhine above Wesel.

Lippelne, a town of Brandenburg, in the New mark, 26 m N Custrin.

Lippspring, a town of Westphalia, in the principality of Paderborn, near the source of the Lippe, 6 m N Paderborn.

Lippstadt, a strong town of Westphalia, capital of the county of Lippe.

In 1632, a bloody battle was fought here between the Swedes and the Austrians, in which the king of Sweden and the Austrian general were both killed. In 1757 it was taken by the French, who kept possession of it 11 months. It has a good trade in timber for building vessels on the Rhine, and stands on the Lippe, 18 m w Paderborn. Lon. 8 28 E, lat. 51 41 N.

Lique, a town of France, in the department of Pas de Calais, 12 m w St. Omer.

Liqueo, Liqueu, &c. Likeo Islands; see Licou-kicou.

Lir, a river that rises in France, in the department of Pas de Calais, flows by Aire, St. Venant, and Armentieres into Flanders, where it passes by Menin, Courtray, and Deynse, and joins the Scheldt at Ghent. It gives name to a new department of France, including the western part of Flanders, of which Bruges is the capital.

Lisbon, the capital of Portugal, and the see of a patriarch and an archbishop, with a university, and a tribunal of the inquisition. It is seated on the N side of the Tajo, 10 m from its mouth, and built on seven hills, not broad, but 6 m in length. The city is walled round, and it has fo increased by degrees, particularly toward the west, that the old walls now divide the two dioceses; the E part under the archbishop, and the w under the patriarch. The harbour will contain 1000 ships in the greatest safety, the entrance of which is defended by two forts; and before the entrance to the city is the fort of Belem. Near this is a grand aqueduct between two hills, which conveys water to a great reservoir at one of the extremities of Lisbon. In the middle of the city, on one of the hills, is a citadel, which commands the whole place. The cathedral, on another eminence, is ancient and gloomy; but the riches of the Portuguese have rendered it magnificent. The royal palace fronts the river; it is large and magnificent, and contains a library, collected at vast expense by John v. In 1706, pope Clement XI consecrated a chapel in this palace, as a patriarchal church, and granted it a chapter. It is singularly magnificent, and here the patriarch, who is generally a cardinal, officiates with more pomp than the pope himself. Lisbon was almost destroyed by an earthquake in 1755, but has been handsomely rebuilt. It contains many beautiful edifices, 40 parish-churches, 50 convents of both sexes, and about 200,000 inhabitants. There are public walks, two theatres, and a circus for the bull-fights. The trade is very considerable, and many foreign merchants, both catholic and protestant, reside here; this city being the grand magazine of all goods brought from Brazil and other colonies belonging to Portugal. In 1807, this city was entered by the French, who evacuated it in 1808 after the battle of Vimiera, in which they were defeated by the British. It is 178 m w by N Seville, and 255 s by w Madrid. Lon. 9 5 w, lat. 38 42 N.

Lisburn, a borough of Ireland, in the county of Antrim, with considerable manufactures of linen cloth, muslin, and cambric. It sends a member to parliament, and is seated on the Lagan, 8 m sw Belfast.

Lisca, or Lisca Bianca, one of the Lipari islands, 3 m sw Stromboli. It is a small desert spot.

Lisieux, a town of France, in the department of Calvados, and lately an episcopal see. It has a good trade, particularly in linen cloth, and is seated on the Touque, 12 m from the sea, and 40 sw Rouen. Lon. 0 14 E, lat. 49 9 N.

Lismore, one of the Hebrides of Scotland, at the entrance of Loch Linnhe, on the coast of Argyleshire. It is a fertile island, 10 m long, and nearly 2 broad, and was anciently the residence of the bishop of Argyle. A great part of the cathedral remains, and the chancel is used as the parish church.

Lismore, a borough of Ireland, in the county of Waterford, and a bishop's see united to Waterford. The cathedral is spacious and handsome, but the town is now a small place. It stands on the Blackwater, 30 m NE Cork, and 38 wsw Waterford.

Lisonzo, a river that rises in the duchy of Carniola, passes by Gorz and Gradisca, crosses Friuli, between Monte Falcone and Aquila, and enters the gulf of Venice.

LIT

Lissa, an island in the gulf of Venice, on the coast of Dalmatia. Here is a fishery of pilchards and anchovies, and it produces excellent wine. It is 70 m w Ragusa. Lon. 17° 0' E, lat. 42° 52' N.

Lissa, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Pofnan. In 1707, it was laid waste by the Russians; but it has been rebuilt, with great improvement, and carries on a great trade. It is 50 m w Kalisch. Lon. 16° 50' E, lat. 52° 0' N.

Lissa, a village of Silesia, on the Weiftritz, 6 m NW Breslau, where a great victory was gained by the Prussians over the Austrians, in 1757.

Lithay, a town of Germany, in Carniola, on the river Save, 15 m E Laubach.

Lithuania, a country of Europe, formerly governed by its grand dukes, but, in 1569, united to Poland, under one elective king. It is 300 m long and 250 broad; bounded on the S by Volhinia, W by Little Poland, Polachia, Prussia, and Samogitia, N by Courland and Russia, and E by Russia. The principal rivers are the Dnieper, Dwina, Niemen, Pripiet, and Berezina. It is a flat country, fertile in corn; and produces honey, wool, pitch, and vast quantities of wool; also excellent little horses, which are never shod, their hoofs being very hard. There are vast forests, in which are bears, wolves, elks, wild oxen, lynxes, beavers, wild cats, &c. and eagles and vultures are very common. In the forests, large pieces of yellow amber are frequently dug up. The country swarms with Jews, who, though numerous in every part of Poland, seem to have fixed their head quarters in this duchy; and this, perhaps, is the only country in Europe where Jews cultivate the ground. The peasants are in a state of the most abject vassalage. The nobility are numerous, some exceedingly rich, but the greater part indigent and poor; and those who are in low circumstances serve the richer sorts as pages, valets, treasurers, &c. In 1772, empress Catharine compelled the Poles to cede to her all that part of Lithuania bordering upon Russia, including at least one third of the country. This was erected into the two governments of Polotsk and Mohilef. In 1793, in conjunction with the king of Prussia, she effected another partition of Poland, in consequence of which she extended her dominion over almost the whole of Lithuania. The capital is Wilna.

Litiz, a town of Pennsylvania, in Lancaster county, and a settlement of the Moravians, 8 m N Lancaster, and 66 w by N Philadelphia.

LIV

Litjhan, a town and castle of Austria, on the frontiers of Bohemia, 23 m NW Horn.

Littau, a town of Moravia, in the circle of Olmutz, on the river March, 9 m NNW Olmutz.

Livadia, a province of Turkey in Europe, bounded on the N by Thessaly, E by the Archipelago, S by the gulfs of Engia and Lepanto, which separates it from Morea, and W by the Mediterranean. It includes ancient Greece properly so called, and the celebrated mountain Parnassus. The capital is Athens.

Livadia, a town of European Turkey, in the province of its name, built on the side of a hill, on the side of the ancient Lebadea, and is now so called by the modern Greeks. On the top of a rock is an old castle, part of which serves as a fortress; and at the bottom is the cave of Trophonius, the last oracle that was heard to utter the decrees of fate. The town contains six mosques and six Greek churches; and has a great trade in wool, corn, and rice. It is 68 m NW Athens. Lon. 23° 20' E, lat. 38° 42' N.

Livenza, a river of Italy, in the territory of Venice, which runs on the confines of Trevisia and Friuli, and enters the gulf of Venice, between the mouth of the Piava and the town of Caorlo.

Livordun, a town of France, in the department of Meurte, seated on a mountain, near the river Moselle, 8 m NE Toul.

Liverpool, a borough and seaport of England, in Lancashire, with a market on Saturday. It had but one church, which was a chapel of ease to Walton (a village 3 m off), till the year 1699, when an act passed to make the town a distinct parish, and erect a new church; since which time it has gradually advanced in population and trade. The number of inhabitants was 77,653 in 1801, and 94,376 in 1811. Its rise and increase was principally owing to the salt-works, and it is now become, with respect to commerce, the second port in the kingdom. It is seated on the Mersey, and has an excellent harbour, formed with great labour and expense; ships being admitted into noble wet docks, secured by flood-gates. Since the completion of the duke of Bridgewater's canals, a new dock has been formed by the duke above the town. The trade of Liverpool is general; but the principal branch is the African and West Indian trade. The American,

Baltic, and Portugal commerce is also very great, as well as that of Ireland; many ships are sent to the Greenland whale-fishery; the coasting trade employs a great number of vessels; and many good ships are built here. By the late inland navigations, Liverpool has communication with the rivers Dee, Ribble, Ouse, Trent, Humber, Severn, and Thames. The principal manufactures are fine porcelain, earthen ware, watches, and stockings; some glass, iron, salt, and copperas works; many roperies, and upward of fifty breweries. Here are eight churches and a chapel, for the established religion, three catholic chapels, several meeting-houses, and a synagogue; also a handsome exchange, a customhouse, and a library. The places of amusement are numerous; and here is a most complete set of baths for sea-bathing. Among the many charitable foundations are an infirmary, almshouses for the widows of mariners killed or lost at sea, or decayed seamen, and an asylum for lunatics. Liverpool is 48 m s Lancaster, and 202 NW London. Lon. 3° 0' W, lat. 53° 22' N.

Liverpool, a town of Nova Scotia, in Queen county, with a harbour at the mouth of a river of its name, 58 m SW Halifax. Lon. 64° 15' W, lat. 44° 10' N.

Livingston, a town of New York, in Columbia county, on the E side of the Hudson, at the influx of a river of its name, 11 m S Hudson.

Livonia, a province of Russia, which, with that of Esthonia, has been reciprocally claimed and possessed by Russia, Sweden, and Poland, and, for more than two centuries, has been a perpetual scene of the most bloody wars. It was finally wrested from the Swedes by Peter the great, was confirmed to the Russians by the peace of Nyfadt, in 1721, and now forms the government of Riga, or Livonia. It is 250 m long and 150 broad; bounded on the N by the government of Esthonia, E by that of Ekof, S by that of Polotik and that of Poland, and W by the gulf of Livonia. The land is so fertile in corn, that it is called the granary of the north; and it would produce a great deal more, if it were not so full of lakes and forests. In the forests are wolves, bears, elks, reindeer, stags, and hares. The domestic animals are numerous; but the sheep bear very bad wool. The principal articles of export are flax, hemp, honey, wax, leather, skins, and potash. The capital is Riga.

Lomond, Loch, a lake of Scotland, in Dumbartonshire, 26 m long and from 2 to 7 wide. It contains 33 islands, several of them inhabited, and adorned with antique ruins, concealed among ancient yews; and others rise into high rocky cliffs, the habitation of the osprey. On the E side is the lofty mountain Benlomond; and the river Leven issues from the S extremity.

Lonato, a town of Italy, in Bresciano, 12 m ESE Brescia.

Loncarty, a town of Scotland, in Perthshire, signalized by the great victory obtained by the Scots over the Danes in 970. It has extensive bleaching grounds, and is seated near the Tay, 5 m N Perth.

London, the metropolis of Great Britain, one of the largest and most opulent cities in the world, mentioned by Tacitus as a considerable commercial place in the reign of Nero. In its most extensive view, as the metropolis, it consists of the City, properly so called, the city of Westminster, and the borough of Southwark, beside the suburbs in Middlesex and Surry, within what are called the Bills of Mortality. London and Westminster are in Middlesex, on the N side of the river Thames; and Southwark is on the opposite bank, in Surry. The extent of the whole, from Limehouse and Deptford to Milbank and Vauxhall, is above 7 m; but the greatest breadth does not exceed 3. The city is divided into 26 wards, each governed by an alderman; and from the aldermen, the lord mayor is annually chosen. There are likewise 236 common-councilmen, a recorder, a common-ferjeant, two sheriffs (who are also sheriffs of Middlesex) a chamberlain, a town-clerk, a city-remembrancer, a water-bailiff, and many inferior officers. Westminster, once a mile from London, but now united to it, is governed by a high steward, who is generally a nobleman, chosen by the dean and chapter, and he has an under steward who officiates for him. Next to him is the high bailiff, chosen also by the dean and chapter; whose power resembles that of a sheriff. The suburbs are under the jurisdiction of the magistrates; and those of Middlesex, beside the county-hall on Clerkenwell Green, have an office in Bow-street, long distinguished for public spirit and activity, and several other public offices. Southwark was long independent of London, but Edward III granted it to the city. It was then called the village of Southwark; and afterward named the balliwic. In the reign of Edward VI it was formed into a twenty-sixth ward, by the name of Bridge Ward Without. On the death of the alderman of this ward, he is succeeded by the next in seniority, to whatever ward he may belong; this ward being considered as a sinecure, and consequently the most proper for "the father of the city." The city has likewise a high bailiff and steward here. Among the churches in the metropolis, the cathedral of St. Paul is the most conspicuous, and a noble fabric. It is now destined to be the receptacle of the monuments of such illustrious men, as may do honour to their country by their talents and their virtues: several are already erected; the first, for that great philanthropist John Howard. Westminster Abbey, the collegiate church of St. Peter, is a noble specimen of Gothic architecture. Here most of the English sovereigns have been crowned, and many of them interred. It contains also a great number of monuments of kings, statesmen, heroes, poets, and persons distinguished by genius, learning, and science. The chapel of Henry VII, adjoining, Leland calls the Wonder of the World. St. Stephen, in Walbrook, is a church of exquisite interior beauty, the masterpiece of sir Christopher Wren. Bow church, in Cheapside; St. Bride, in Fleet-street; and St. Martin in the Fields; are among the other churches most distinguished for fine architecture. The parish churches, in the bills of mortality, amount to 146; namely, 97 within the walls, 16 without the walls, 23 out parishes in Middlesex and Surry, and 10 in the city and liberties of Westminster. Beside these churches, is one belonging to the Temple, a celebrated seat of law: it was founded by the Knights Templars, in the reign of Henry II, upon the model of that of the Holy Sepulchre, at Jerusalem. There are likewise a great number of chapels for the established church, foreign protestant churches, Roman catholic chapels, meetings for dissenters of all persuasions, and three synagogues for the Jews. The royal palace of St. James is an ancient building, on the N side of a small park; it is mean in external appearance, but the apartments are said to be the best calculated for regal parade of any in Europe. The royal town residence is a house at the W side of St. James' park, built by the duke of Buckingham, and purchased by the king in 1761, when it received the appellation of the Queen's Palace, but is still frequently called Buckingham House. Carlton House, the residence of the prince of Wales, to the E of St. James' palace, is a stately building, on which vast sums have been expended. The Banqueting House, at Whitehall, begun in 1619, is only a small part of the vast plan of a palace, intended to be worthy of the residence of the British monarchs, but left incomplete. Beside the royal palaces, there are many fine houses of the princes of the blood, and of the nobility and gentry. Among the public buildings, which can merely be enumerated here, are Westminster Hall, containing the supreme courts of justice; and adjoining to which are the houses of lords and commons; the Guild-hall of the city; the Sessions House; the Tower, an ancient fortress, in which are some public offices, a magazine and arsenal, the regalia of the kingdom, the mint, and a menagerie; the New Mint, on Little Tower-hill; the Horse-Guards, the Treasury, and the Admiralty, at Whitehall; the noble collection of public offices which form that magnificent structure called Somerset Place; the British Museum; the Royal Exchange; the Bank of England; the Customhouse; the Excise Office; the East India House; the South Sea House; the Mansion House, for the lord mayor; the Monument, in commemoration of the great fire in 1666; the ancient bridge, called London bridge; and the two magnificent modern bridges, of Black-friars and Westminster. The inns of court for the study of the law; the colleges, learned societies, and public seminaries; the halls of the different trading companies; the noble hospitals and other charitable institutions; the public places of diversion: with its fine squares and streets, are all too numerous to be here particularly mentioned. Such, on a cursory view of it, is the metropolis of Great Britain, to the extent and opulence of which many causes have contributed. From the openness of the country round, and a gravelly soil, it is kept tolerably dry in all seasons, and affords no lodgement for stagnant air or water. Its cleanliness, as well as its supply of water, are greatly aided by its situation on the banks of the Thames; and the New River, with many good springs within the city itself, further contributes to the abundance of that necessary element. All these are advantages, with respect to health, in which this metropolis is exceeded by few. With regard to the circumstance of navigation, it is placed on the Thames, and has such extensive wet docks, as to possess every advantage that can be derived from a seaport, without its dangers; and at the same time by means of its noble river, enjoys a very extensive communication with the internal parts of the country, which supply it with all sorts of necessaries, and, in return, receive from it such commodities as they require. London is the seat of many considerable manufactures; some almost peculiar to itself, others in which it participates with the manufacturing towns in general. The most important of its peculiar manufactures is the silk-weaving, established in Spitalfields by refugees from France; a variety of works in gold, silver, and jewellery; the engraving of maps and prints; and the making of optical and mathematical instruments. The porter-brewery a business of very great extent, is also chiefly carried on in London. To its port are likewise confined some branches of foreign commerce, as the vast E India trade, and those to Turkey and Hudson bay. Thus London has risen to its present rank of the first city in Europe, with respect to opulence; and nearly, if not entirely so, as to number of inhabitants. By the enumeration in 1801, the residents in London, Westminster, and Southwark, and all the out parishes, were 885,577; and by that in 1811, they were 1,001,578. The population of London alone, within the walls, in 1811, was 554,884, which is a decrease of above three-fifths since the year 1700; owing to the diminution of houses, by widening streets, and erecting public buildings and warehouses.

London is a bishop's see, and sends four members to parliament. To enumerate all the events by which this great capital has been distinguished, would greatly exceed our limits; we shall only mention, therefore, the great plague, in 1665, which cut off 68,596 people, and the dreadful conflagration, in 1666, by which the cathedral and many other churches, with 13,200 houses, were destroyed. London is 210 m NNW Paris. Lon. 0 5 w, lat. 51 31 N.

London, New, a seaport of Connecticut, capital of New London county, with the best harbour in the state, defended by two forts. A considerable part of the town was burnt by Benedict Arnold in 1781, but has been rebuilt. It has a considerable trade to the W Indies, and is seated on the Thames, near its entrance into Long Island sound, 54 m E by S Newhaven. Lon. 72 10 W, lat. 41 19 N.

London, New, a town of Virginia, chief of Bedford county. It is situate on rising ground, 110 m W by S Richmond. Lon. 79 45 W, lat. 37 20 N.

Londonderry, a county of Ireland, in the province of Ulster, 32 m long and 30 broad, bounded on the W by Donegal, N by the ocean, S and SW by Tyrone, and E by Antrim. It contains about 125,000 inhabitants, is divided into 31 parishes, and sends four members to parliament. It is a fruitful champaign country; and the greater part of it was given by James I to an incorporated company of London merchants. The linen manufacture flourishes through every part of the county.

Londonderry, or Derry, a city and seaport of Ireland, capital of a county of the same name, and a bishop's see. It is a county of itself, and stands on the Foyle, over which is a wooden bridge, 1068 feet in length. It was built in the reign of James I, by some London adventurers, and surrounded by a strong wall. Five m below the town is Culmore fort, and there are four castles by the side of the river. The cathedral, the episcopal palace, and the buildings in general are handsome. It sends a member to parliament. The inhabitants are estimated at 10,000; and the trade is considerable, principally to America and the W Indies. This city is celebrated for the long siege it sustained against James II in 1689. It is 136 m NNW Dublin. Lon. 7 25 W, lat. 54 58 N.

Lord Howe Group, an extensive group of islands in the Pacific ocean, discovered, in 1791, by captain Hunter, who distinctly described 32 of them, some of considerable extent. They appeared thickly covered with wood, among which the cocoa-nut was very distinguishable. Nine of the natives came near the ship, in a canoe, which was about 40 feet long, badly made, and had an outrigger. They were a stout, clean, well-made people, of a dark copper colour; their hair tied in a knot on the back of the head; and they appeared as if clean shaved. They had an ornament consisting of a number of fringes, like an artificial beard, which was fastened close under the nose; and to this beard hung a row of teeth, which gave them the appearance of having a mouth lower than their natural one. They had holes run through the sides of the nose, into which, as well as through the septum, were thrust pieces of reed or bone. The arms and thighs were tattooed, and some were painted with red and white streaks. They wore a wrapper round their middle. Lon. from 159 14 to 159 37 E, lat. 5 35 S.

Lord Howe Island, an island in the Pacific ocean, discovered, in 1788, by lieutenant King. Many excellent turtle have been caught here on a sandy beach; and it abounds with a variety of birds, which were so unaccustomed to be disturbed, that the seamen went near enough to knock them down with a stick. At the S end are two high mountains, nearly perpendicular from the sea; the southermost named Mount Gower. About 14 m to the S is a remarkable rock, named Ball's Pyramid, which had much the appearance of a steeple at a distance. The island is near 4 m long, and very narrow. Lon. 159 0 E, lat. 5 13 35 N.

Loreto, a fortified town of Italy, in the marquisate of Ancona, and a bishop's see. The cathedral contains the Casa Santa, or Holy House, in which it is pretended the virgin Mary lived at Nazareth; according to the legend, it was carried by angels from Galilee into Dalmatia, and thence to the place where it now stands. This house or chapel is 31 feet long, 15 broad, and 18 high; the inner part very old, but cased with marble on the outside. The famous lady of Loreto, who holds the infant Jesus in her arms, stands upon the principal altar, in a nich of silver: this statue is of cedar wood, three feet high, but her face can hardly be seen, on account of the numerous gold and silver lamps around her. She is clothed with cloth of gold, set off with jewels; and the little Jesus, covered with a shirt, holds a globe in his hand, and is adorned with rich jewels. Great numbers frequently go in pilgrimage to Loreto, and every pilgrim, after having performed his devotion, makes the Virgin a present; that the treasury of this chapel is immensely rich. Such was the fate of this sanctuary till it was lately violated by the French, who seized and dispersed the stores of treasure; that no vestige now remains of this valuable collection. The inhabitants of the town subsist principally by agriculture and gardening, and many of them are shoemakers, tailors, and sellers of chaplets. Loreto was taken by the French in 1796, who plundered and retained it till 1799. It is seated on a mountain, 3 m from the gulf of Venice, 12 SE Ancona, and 112 NE Rome. Lon. 13 38 E, lat. 43 27 N.

the ^{no} The timber is as fine as any in the world; and the quantities of oak, ash, mulberry, walnut, cherry, cypress, and cedar, are astonishing. The neighbourhood of the Mississippi furnishes the richest fruits in great variety; and here are the chief settlements of the white inhabitants, which at present are few. The soil is particularly adapted for hemp, flax, and tobacco; and indigo is a staple commodity. It is intersected by a number of fine rivers, among which are the Missouri, Arkansas, Moingona, and Natchitoches, which all flow into the Mississippi. The chief articles of trade are indigo, cotton, rice, beans, wax, and lumber. This country was discovered by Ferdinand de Soto, in 1541; traversed by M. de la Salle, in 1682; and settled by Louis XIV, in the beginning of the 18th century. In 1763, it was ceded to Spain; restored to France in 1801, and by France transferred to the United States, in 1803. The population in 1810 was 20,845. St. Louis and New Madrid are the chief towns.

Lucaya Islands; see Babama.

Lucca, a republic of Italy, lying on the E coast of the gulf of Genoa. It is 40 m long and 16 broad, and in general mountainous; but it produces plenty of cattle, wine, oil, silk, wool, and chestnuts; the oil, in particular, is in high esteem. The common people usually eat chestnuts instead of bread; and they are the most industrious of any in Italy, for no spot of ground is neglected. The government was aristocratic; but in the recent revolutions of Italy this state adopted a consular constitution, under the protection of France.

Lucca, a city of Italy, capital of the republic of the same name, and an archbishop's see. It is nearly 3 m in circuit, surrounded by a rampart planted with lofty trees, and contains 40,000 inhabitants. The state palace is a large building, and includes the arsenal. Here are considerable manufactures of silk, and gold and silver stuffs. Lucca was entered by the French in 1796, evacuated in 1799, and re-entered in 1800. It is seated in a fruitful plain, near the river Serchio, 10 m NE Pisa, and 37 W Florence. Lon. 10 35 E, lat. 43 50 N.

Luce, a spacious bay on the S coast of Scotland, in Wigtonshire, lying E of the promontory called the Mull of Galloway. The river Luce enters its SE extremity, at the town of Glenluce.

Lucena, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, 36 m SSE Cordova, and 42 WNW Granada.

Lucera, a city of Naples, capital of Capitanata, and a bishop's see. The town is small but populous, and has a manufacture of cloth. It is 75 m NE Naples. Lon. 15 34 E, lat. 41 28 N.

Lucern, one of the cantons of Switzerland, 30 m long and 20 broad; bounded on the E by the cantons of Underwalden, Schweiz, and Zug, and on all the other sides by the canton of Bern. The air is mild, and the soil uncommonly fertile. Freedom and openness of manners characterize the inhabitants, who are Roman Catholics, and computed at 100,000. The government was aristocratical, with a certain mixture of democracy.

Lucern, the capital of the canton of the same name, in Switzerland. It is divided into two parts by a branch of the Reuss, which here enters the lake of Lucern. It has no manufactures of consequence, and little commerce; the merchants being principally engaged in the commission business, upon goods passing between Italy and Germany, over Mount St. Gothard and the Waldstatter see. In the cathedral is an organ of an extraordinary size; the centre pipe is 40 feet long. The bridges that skirt the town, round the edge of the lake, are the fashionable walk of the place; being covered at the top, and open at the sides, they afford a constant view of the romantic country. Lucern is 30 m SW Zurich, and 35 E Bern. Lon. 8 14 E, lat. 47 0 N. See Waldstatter See.

Lucerna, a town of Piedmont, in a valley of its name, 15 m SW Turin.

Luchoau, a town of Lower Saxony, in the duchy of Luneburg, situate on the Jetze, 11 m S by E Danneberg.

Luchovice, a town of Lithuania, in the palatinate of Novogrodeck, 40 m SSE Novogrodeck.

Ludia, St. one of the windward Caribbe islands, 27 m long and 12 broad. It consists of plains well watered with rivulets, and hills furnished with timber; and has several good bays and commodious harbours. By the peace of 1763, this island was allotted to France. In 1779 it was taken by the English, restored in 1783, taken again in 1794, evacuated in 1795, and again taken in 1796. There are two high mountains, by which this island may be known at a considerable distance. The N end is 21 m S of Martinico. Lon. 60 51 W, lat. 14 0 N.

Lucia, St. one of the Cape Verd islands, to the W of that of St. Nicholas. Lon. 24 32 W, lat. 16 45 N.

Lucia, St. a town of Sicily, in Val di Demona, on a river of the same name, 18 m W by S Messina.

Luciana, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, 8 m WNW Ecija.

Luciano, a town of Spain, in New Castile, 19 m W Ciudad Real.

Lucito, a town of the county of Moravia.

Luckau, the capital of the province of Brandenburg. The inhabitants are Vandals. It is a handiwork town, and has a swampy country. Lon. 13 58 W, lat. 51 52 N.

Lukenauale, a town of the Middle Ages, of its name; in the district of Pottsdam.

Lucknow, the capital of Oude, and the palace of a high bank. The houses are covered with thatch; and bamboo straw; and brick. The streets are narrow and worse than in the dry season, but tolerable; in the winter it is so deep, and the elevated court, contains a great number of shopkeepers. The merchants are of different nations, and there are several excellent edifices. Lon. 78 50 N, lat. 26 50 N.

Lucko, or Lucko, the capital of the province of Venedice, with a citadel. It is a part of it, with a citadel. It is seated on the coast, and 175 m S of Venice. Lon. 15 13 N, lat. 51 13 N.

Luckau, the capital of Lower Lufania. The inhabitants, many of whom are Vandals, subsist by brewing and handicraft businesses. It is seated in a swampy country, on the rivulet Geila, 23 m WNW Cobus. Lon. 13 46 E, lat. 51 52 N.

Luckenwald, a town of Brandenburg, in the Middle mark, capital of a circle of its name; seated on the Nute, 23 m S Potsdam.

Lucknow, a city of Hindoostan, capital of Oude. It is without walls, and the palace of the nabob stands on a high bank near the Goomty. The houses are chiefly mud walls, covered with thatch; many are entirely of mats and bamboos, thatched with leaves or straw; and very few are built with brick. The streets are crooked, narrow, and worse than most in India. In the dry season, the dust and heat are intolerable; in the rainy season, the mire is so deep, as to be scarcely passable; and the elephants of the nabob and his court, continually passing the streets, are a great annoyance to passengers and shopkeepers. The houses of the merchants are of brick, lofty and strong; and there are some, but not many, magnificent edifices. Lucknow is 110 m NNW Allahabad. Lon. 81 20 E, lat. 26 50 N.

Lucko, or Loutzk, a town of Poland, capital of Volhynia, and a bishop's see with a citadel. In 1752, the greatest part of it was destroyed by fire. It is seated on the Ster, 75 m NE Lemberg, and 175 SE Warsaw. Lon. 25 0 W, lat. 51 13 N.

Luco, a town of Naples, in Abruzzo Citra, on the W bank of the lake Celano, 9 m SSW Celano.

Luçon, a town of France, in the department of Vendée, and lately an episcopal see; seated in a morass, 17 m N Rochelle, and 50 S Nantes.

Luconia, or Luzon, the chief of the Philippine islands, in the Pacific ocean. It is 350 m long and 140 broad, beside a peninsula of very irregular breadth that shoots out 180 m at the SE angle. It is not so hot as might be expected, being well watered by lakes and rivers, and the periodical rains, which inundate all the plains. There are several volcanoes in the mountains, and a variety of hot springs. The produce is wax, cotton, silk, wild cinnamon, sulphur, coconuts, rice, gold, copper, horses, buffaloes, and game. Philip II of Spain formed a scheme of planting a colony in the Philippine islands, which had been neglected since the discovery of them by Magellan, in 1521. Manila, in this island, was the station chosen for the capital of the new establishment. Hence an active commercial intercourse began with the Chinese, a considerable number of whom settled here, under the Spanish protection. These supplied the colony so amply with the valuable productions and manufactures of Asia, as enabled it to open a trade with America, by a direct course of navigation, more than one third of the circumference of the globe. This trade, at first, was carried on with Callao, on the coast of Peru; but it was afterward removed to Acapulco, on the coast of New Spain. From this port formerly sailed two large ships, or galleons, annually, one at a time, at stated periods; but latterly smaller vessels are used. The ships are permitted to carry out silver to the amount of 500,000 crowns, in return for which they bring back from Manila spices, drugs, China and Japan wares, calicos, chintzes, muslins, silks, &c. Luconia is divided into provinces, most of them subject to the Spaniards; the principal are Ilocos, Camarinas, Paracale, Cagayan, and Balayan; and there are several others, Pangalinan, Bahi, Balacan, &c. The inhabitants are a mixture of several nations, beside Spaniards; and they all produce a mixed breed, called Mesties. The blacks have long hair, and good features; and there is one tribe, called Pintados, who prick their skins, and draw figures on them, as they do in most other countries where they go naked. Ludgershall, a borough in Wiltshire, which has now no market, 15 m N Salisbury, and 71 N by W London.

Ludlow, a borough in Shropshire, with a market on Monday. It is encompassed by a wall, having seven gates; and has a castle, where all business was formerly transacted for the principality of Wales. This castle and town were held for empress Maud against king Stephen, and besieged by him. Edward V resided here, at the death of his father, and was carried hence to London. Arthur, prince of Wales, son of Henry VII, held a court, and died here. Ludlow has a stately church (formerly collegiate) and an elegant townhouse. It is seated on the Lugano, a town of Italy, capital of a bailiwick, lately belonging to the Swiss cantons. It is built round a gentle curve on the SW part of the lake Lugano, and backed by an amphitheatre of hills. It is the emporium of the greatest part of the merchandise that passes from Italy over the mountains St. Gothard and Bernardin. Most of the houses are built of tuffstone, and on an eminence above the town is the principal church. It is 17 m SW Como. Lon. 8 48 E, lat. 45 54 N.

Lugano, a lake of Italy, 25 m in length and from two to four in breadth, of an irregular form, bending into continual sinuosities, and in some places of an immense depth. It lies between the lakes Como and Maggiore, but is 180 feet higher than either of them. It is enclosed between two steep mountains, covered for the most part with wood; but their rocky bases frequently descend so perpendicularly into the water, as not to allow shelter for a boat, or footing for a human being. Its outlet is the river Trefa into the lake Maggiore.

Lugde, or Lude, a town of Westphalia, in the principality of Paderborn, seated on the Emmer, 24 m NNE Paderborn.

Lugo, a city of Spain, in Galicia, and a bishop's see. It was once the metropolis of Spain, but is now chiefly celebrated for hot medicinal springs. It is seated on the Minho, 50 m ENE Compostello. Lon. 7 32 W, lat. 43 4 N.

Luneburg, a duchy of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, lately subject to the elector of Hanover. Including Zell, it is bounded on the n by the duchies of Holstein and Lauenburg, e by the marquisate of Brandenburg, s by the duchy of Brunswick, and w by the duchies of Bremen and Verden. It is 100 m long and 70 broad, watered by the rivers Aller, Elbe, and Ilmenau. Part of it is full of heaths and forests, which abound with wild boars; but near the rivers it is pretty fertile.

Luneburg, a fortified town of Lower Saxony, capital of the duchy of the same name. The chief public edifices are three parish churches, the ducal palace, the townhouse, the salt magazine, the anatomical theatre, the academy, and the conventual church of St. Michael, in which are interred the ancient dukes. The salt springs near this place produce great quantities of salt; and it has also a trade in lime, wax, honey, wool, flax, and linen. Luneburg is seated on the Ilmenau, 30 m SE Hamburg, and 45 s by Lubec. Lon. 10 39 E, lat. 53 1 N.

Lunel, a town of France, in the department of Hérault, near the river Ridourle. It produces excellent muscadine wine, and is 16 m E Montpellier.

Lunen, a town of Westphalia, in the county of Mark, situate at the conflux of the Zefack with the Lippe, 20 m s by w Munster.

Luneville, a town of France, in the department of Meurte. Its castle, where the dukes of Lorraine formerly kept their court, as did afterward king Stanislaus, is now converted into barracks. The church of the late regular canons is very handsome; and here Stanislaus founded a military school, a large library, and a fine hospital. In 1801, a treaty of peace was concluded here between France and Germany. Luneville is seated in a plain between the rivers Vezouze and Meurte, 14 m ESE Nancy, and 62 w Strasburg. Lon. 6 30 E, lat. 48 36 N.

Lungro, a town of Naples, in Calabria Citra, chiefly inhabited by Greeks, 35 m NNW Cosenza.

Lupow, a town of Further Pomerania, on a river of the same name, 15 m E Stolpe.

verted, in 1764, into a chapter of noble canons. It is seated near the Ougnon, 30 m NE Befançon.

Lurgan, a town of Ireland, in the county of Armagh, with an extensive linen manufacture, 17 m NE Armagh.

Lusatia, a marquisate of Germany, 90 m long and 60 broad; bounded on the n by Brandenburg, E by Silesia, s by Bohemia, and w by Misnia and Saxony Proper. It is divided into Upper and Lower. Upper Lusatia abounds more in mountains and hills than the Lower, in which are many boggy and moorish tracts, yet it is the most fruitful. The breeding of cattle is very considerable, and there is plenty of game; but the products of the country do not supply the necessities of the inhabitants. This want is compensated by its numerous manufactures, particularly those of cloths and linens. Bautzen and Luckau are the capitals.

Lusignan, a town of France, in the department of Vienne, seated on the Vonne, 15 m ssw Poitiers.

Luso, a river of Italy, which rises in the duchy of Urbino, crosses part of Romagno, and enters the gulf of Venice, 10 m w Rimini.

strong castle, seated on a mountain, 30 m N W Straßburg.

Lützen, a town of Upper Saxony, in Thuringia, with a castle. Near this place, in 1632, Gustavus Adolphus king of Sweden was killed in a battle, at the moment of victory. It is seated on the Elster, 7 m W W Leipzig.

Luxemburg, a late duchy and province of the Netherlands; bounded on the E by Treves, S by Lorraine, W by Champagne and Liege, and N by Liege and Limburg. It lies in the forest of Ardennes, and in some places is covered with mountains and woods; but, in general, is fertile in corn and wine, and has a great number of iron mines. The principal rivers are the Moselle, Sour, Ourte, and Semoy. It belonged to the house of Austria; but the whole country submitted to the French in 1795, and this duchy now forms the department of Forêts.

Luxemburg, a strong city of the Netherlands, capital of the department of Forêts, lately the duchy of Luxemburg. In 1713, it was given to the Dutch, as a barrier town; ceded to the house of Austria in 1715; and surrendered to the French in 1795. It is divided, by the Alstiz, into the upper and lower towns; the former almost surrounded by rocks, but the lower seated in a plain. It is 22 m W W Treves. Lon. 6 12 E, lat. 49 37 N.

Luxeuil, a town of France, in the department of Upper Saone. Near it are some mineral waters and warm baths; also an abbey, founded by St. Columban, an Irishman. It is seated at the foot of the Voiges, 14 m NE Vesoul.

Luzara, a strong town of Italy, in Mantuan, near the conflux of the Crostolo with the Po. Here a battle was fought between the Austrians and the French and Spaniards, in 1702, when each side claimed the victory. It is 18 m S W Mantua.

Luzarches, a town of France, in the department of Seine and Oise, 15 m N Paris.

Luzon; see Luconia.

Luzzi, a town of Naples, in Calabria Citra, near the river Craté, 3 m S Bisignano.

Lydd, a town in Kent, with a market on Thursday. It is a member of the cinque port of Romney, and seated in Romney Marsh, 25 m S W Dover, and 72 SE London.

Lyge, a town of Norway, near a lake of the same name, 16 m N W Christianland.

LYN

Lyme, or Lyme Regis, a borough and seaport in Dorsetshire, governed by a mayor, with a market on Friday. It is seated on the side of a craggy hill, on the river Lyme, at the head of a little inlet; and the harbour is formed by two very thick walls, called the Cobbe. It has a Newfoundland and coasting trade, and is noted for sea-bathing. Here the duke of Monmouth landed, in 1685, for the execution of his design against James II. Lyme is the birthplace of Thomas Coram, the benevolent patron and contriver of the Foundling-hospital. It is 28 m E by S Exeter, and 143 W by S London. Lon. 3 4 W, lat. 50 41 N.

Lynsford, a gulf of Denmark, in N Jutland, which has a narrow entrance from the Categat, and extends 18 m across the country, widening gradually, and forming several branches. The W end is 20 m long, and separated from the North sea by a narrow bank.

Lynnington, a borough in Hampshire, governed by a mayor, with a market on Saturday. It is seated on a river of its name, a mile from the sea, and the harbour will admit vessels of 300 tons burden. The chief trade is in salt; and it has two sets of baths, much frequented in the summer. Near it are the remains of a Roman camp; and in 1744 two urns were discovered that contained nearly 200 pounds weight of their coins. It is 13 m S W Southampton, and 94 S W London. Lon. 1 42 W, lat. 50 45 N.

Lynchburg, a town of Virginia, in Bedford county, on the S side and near the head of James river, 120 m W Richmond.

Lyndhurst, a village in Hampshire, on the S side of the New Forest, 8 m W W Southampton. Here are the Kings house and stables, the latter very large; and all the forest courts are held here.

Lyon, a city of France, capital of the department of Rhone, and the see of an archbishop. Many antiquities evince its Roman origin; and before the recent calamities, it was deemed the second city in France, in beauty, size, and population, but superior to Paris in trade, commerce, and manufactures. It contained above 100,000 inhabitants, and upward of 30,000 of them were employed in various manufactures, particularly rich stuffs of the most exquisite workmanship, in silk, gold, silver, &c. The quays were adorned with magnificent structures; the cathedral was a majestic gothic edifice; and the town-house was one of the most beautiful in Europe. The other principal public buildings were the exchange, the custom-house, the palace of justice, the arsenal, a theatre, a public library, two colleges, and two hospitals. The bridge, which unites the city with the suburb de la Guillotiere, is 1360 feet long; and there are three other principal suburbs, six gates, and several fine churches. Such was Lyon in June 1793, when it revolted against the national convention. Being obliged to surrender, in October, the convention decreed that the walls and public buildings should be destroyed, and the name of the city changed to that of Ville Affranchie. The chiefs of the insurgents had fled, but several of them were afterward taken; and of 3528 persons, who were tried before the revolutionary tribunal, 1682 were either shot or beheaded. In 1794, however, on the destruction of the faction of the jacobins, the convention decreed that the city should resume its ancient name, and that measures should be taken to restore its manufactures and commerce. In 1795, the friends of those who were so wantonly put to death in 1793 avenged their fate by a general massacre of the judges of the revolutionary tribunal, and of all the jacobins who were then confined in the prisons of Lyon. This city is seated at the conflux of the Saone with the Rhone, 15 m N Vienne, and 220 SE Paris. Lon. 4 49 E, lat. 45 46 N.

Lyonnois, a late province of France, lying on the W side of the Saone and Rhone, 130 m in length and 17 in breadth. This province and Beaujolois now form the department of Rhone.

Lysé, a town of Norway, 8 m ssw Bergen.

Lysobyski, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Lublin, 20 m nsw Lublin.

Lyth, a village of N Yorkshire, on

M.

Mabra, a town of the kingdom of Algiers, seated on the gulf of Bona, 10 m W Bona.

Macao, a town of China, in an island, at the entrance of the bay of Canton. It is defended by four forts. The Portuguese have been in possession of the harbour since 1640. The inhabitants, principally Chinese, pay a tribute for the liberty of choosing their own magistrates, exercising their religion, and living according to their own laws; and here, accordingly, is a Portuguese governor, as well as a Chinese mandarin, to take care of the town and the neighbouring country. Lon. 113 37 E, lat. 22 12 N.

Macarjca, a seaport of Dalmatia, and a bishop's see. In the vicinity are many subterraneous grottoes. It is seated on the gulf of Venice, 25 m SE Spalatro. Lon. 18 7 E, lat. 43 39 N.

Macas, a town of Quilo, and the capital of a district, which produces much fruit, tobacco, sugar-canes, cotton, cinnamon, and copal. It is seated on one of the sources of the Amazon, 170 m S by E Quilo. Lon. 78 45 W, lat. 2 40 S.

Macassar, the principal town of Celebes, whence that island is sometimes called Macassar. It is a Dutch settlement, with a respectable fort and good harbour, but the latter is of difficult access. The houses are of wood, and the roofs covered with very large leaves; they are built on thick posts, to guard against inundations, and are ascended by ladders. The rajah of the Matoyoa tribe resides here, and pays tribute to the Dutch. The tribe employs a great number of fishing proas; and their country abounds in sheep, cattle, horses, and goats, and produces much rice. Macassar is seated at the mouth of a river, on the sw coast, and at the end of the strait of Macassar, which separates Celebes from Borneo. Lon. 119 49 E, lat. 5 9 S.

Macclesfield, a town in Cheshire, governed by a mayor, with a market on Monday. It has manufactures of mohair, twist, hatbands, buttons, and thread, and mills for the winding of silk. Here are two churches, and a grammar school founded by Edward VI. The number of inhabitants was 8743 in 1801, and 12,299 in 1813. It is seated at the edge of a forest, near the Macduff, a town of Scotland, in Banffshire, with a good harbour, on the frith of Moray, 2 m E Banff.

Macedonia, a province of Turkey in Europe, bounded on the N by Servia and Bulgaria, E by Romania and the Archipelago, S by Livadia, and W by Albania. The soil is for the most part fertile, and the coasts in particular abound in corn, wine, oil, and every thing desirable for use and pleasure. Salonica is the capital.

Maccira; see Maxiera.

Macerata, an episcopal town of Italy, in the marquisate of Ancona, with a university. It is generally considered as the capital of the province, and has about 10,000 inhabitants. The principal gate is built in the form of a triumphal arch. In 1797 it was taken by the French. It is seated on a hill, by the river Chiento, 22 m S by W Ancona. Lon. 13 27 E, lat. 43 20 N.

Machala, a town of Peru, in the audience of Quito. The environs produce great quantities of excellent cacas; also great numbers of large mangrove-trees, the wood of which is very durable, and so heavy as to sink in water. It stands near the bay of Guayaquil, 80 m S Guayaquil.

Machecoul, a town of France, in the department of Lower Loire, seated on the Tenu, 20 m SW Nantes.

Macherry, a town of Hindoostan, in the country of Mewat, 70 m SSW Delhi.

Machia, a town of Naples, in the county of Molise, 12 m SW Molise.

Machian, one of the Molucca islands, 20 m in circumference, and the most fertile of them all. It rises like a conic mountain from the sea, and produces the best cloves. The Dutch have here three inaccessible forts. Lon. 126 55 E, lat. 6 28 N.

Machias, a seaport of the district of Maine, capital of Washington county. In 1792 Washington academy was established here. The trade is considerable in fish, lumber, and hewed timber. It stands on a bay of its name, 65 m ENE Castine. Lon. 67 17 W, lat. 44 48 N.

Machicaco, Cape, a promontory of Spain, in the bay of Biscay. Lon. 2 43 W, lat. 43 28 N.

Machidas, an inland kingdom of Africa, lying to the S of Abyssinia, between Ajan and Giugiro. It is watered by the Magadoxa, but little known to the Europeans.

Machlin, a town of Scotland, in Ayr-

Machynleth, a town of Wales, in Montgomeryshire, with a market on Wednesday; seated on the Dyff, over which is a bridge into Merionethshire, 37 m W Montgomery, and 207 WNW London.

Macon, or Mafcon, a town of France, capital of the department of Saone and Loire, and lately a bishop's see. It is celebrated for good wine, and seated on the side of a hill, near the Saone, 35 m N Lyon, and 188 SE Paris. Lon. 4 48 E, lat. 46 20 N.

Macreddin; see Carysfort.

Maeri, or Maari, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Natolia, seated on a gulf of its name, in the Mediterranean. Here are the ruins of an amphitheatre and an old fort, and numerous remains of Greek inscriptions. It is 150 m SE Smyrna. Lon. 29 24 E, lat. 36 56 N.

Macro, or Macronisi, an island of the Archipelago, near the coast of Livadia, 20 m E Athens. Lon. 24 16 E, lat. 37 30 N.

Maerroom, a town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, with an ancient castle, which was partly burnt in the wars of 1641, and is now altered into a neat mansion. It is situate on the Sullane, 18 m W Cork.

Maflan; see Matan.

Macula, a seaport of Arabia, in the province of Hadramaut, 150 m SW Shibam. Lon. 47 50 E, lat. 13 25 N.

Maexua, a small island in the Red sea, near the coast of Abex.

Madagascar, a large island in the Indian ocean, discovered by the Portuguese, in 1492. It lies 40 leagues E of the continent of Africa, from which it is separated by the strait of Mosambique. It extends 900 m from N to S, and is from 200 to 300 broad. The inhabitants are divided into a number of tribes, and their number is upward of four millions. The natives, who are called Melagaches, are commonly tall, well made, of an olive complexion, and some of them pretty black. Their hair is black, but not woolly, and for the most part curls naturally; their nose is small, though not flat, and they have thin lips. They have no cities or towns, but a great number of villages a small distance from each other. Their houses are pitiful huts, without windows or chimneys, and the roofs covered with reeds or leaves. Those that are dressed in the best manner have a piece of cotton cloth, or silk, wrapt round their middle; but the common sort have scarce sufficient to hide their nakedness. Both men and women are fond of bracelets, necklaces, and earrings. Their ordinary food consists of rice, beans, peas, yams, oil, fruit, cabbages, beef, mutton, goats, poultry, fish, and porcupines. The flesh of hogs is only eaten by hunters and their families; and ginger, green leaves, garlic, and white pepper compose their sauces. They have little knowledge of commerce, and exchange among themselves goods for goods: gold and silver coins brought by Europeans are immediately melted down for ornaments, and no currency of coin is established. There are a great many petty kings, whose riches consist in cattle and slaves, and they are always at war with each other. It is hard to say what their religion is, for they have neither churches nor priests. They have no rules relating to marriage: for the men and women cohabit together for some time, and then leave each other as freely again. Here are a great number of locusts, crocodiles, cameleons, and other animals common to Africa, but no elephants, tigers, lions, nor horses. Insects are numerous, and many of them troublesome. Beside the products already mentioned, the country yields several sorts of gums and honey; as also minerals and precious stones. There are only some parts of the coast yet known. The chief settlement on the E coast is Port Dauphin, and the place most visited by the Europeans is Tamatave.

Madain; see Modain.

Madalena, a river of Terra Firma, which rises in the mountains to the E of Popayan, takes a northerly course of above 600 m, and enters the Caribbean sea, by several mouths, between Carthagena and St. Martha.

Madeira, an island in the Atlantic ocean, 37 m long and 11 broad, and 250 N by E of Teneriff. The Portuguese discovered this island in 1419, which they found uninhabited and covered with wood, and on that account called it Madeira. Prince Henry, the next year, settled a colony here; and not only furnished it with plants and domestic animals, but procured slips of the vine from Cyprus, and plants of the sugarcane from Sicily. These thrive so profusely, that the sugar and wine of Madeira quickly became articles of some consequence in the commerce of Portugal. The sugar-works have since been removed, but the wine is now in the highest estimation. This island is also celebrated for sweetmeats, all kinds of fruit being here caudied in the most exquisite perfection. The scorching heat of summer, and the icy chill of winter, are here unknown; for spring and autumn reign continually, and produce flowers and fruits throughout the year. The cedar tree is found in great abundance, and the dragon tree is a native of this island. Flowers nursed in the English greenhouses grow wild here in the fields; the hedges are mostly formed of the myrtle, rose, jessmin, and honeysuckle; and the lackspur, fleur-de-lis, lupin, &c. spring up spontaneously in the meadows. There are few reptiles to be seen in the island; the lizard is the most common. Canary birds and goldfinches are found in the mountains. Hogs are the food most relished; they are suffered to range among the mountains, and are hunted and caught by dogs. Salted cod is imported from America, and is the chief diet of the poor. Madeira is well watered and populous. The British factory settled in this island consists of upward of twenty commercial houses, and have considerably more of its trade than the Portuguese. In 1808, it surrendered, conditionally, to the English. Funchal is the capital.

Madely Market, a town in Shropshire, with a market on Friday, held at the foot of Colebrook Dale bridge. Here are some iron-works; and a work for obtaining fossil tar, from the smoke of coal. It is 9 m N Bridgenorth, and 147 SW London.

Madhugiri, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore, with a strong hill fort. In the vicinity much iron is smelted, and a great number of cattle are bred. It is seated amid hills and fertile vallies, 22 m E Sera.

Madian, or Median, a town of Arabia Petraea, on the E side of the eastern arm of the Red sea. The Arabians call it Megar el Schuaid, the Grotto of Schuaid (or Jethro) and suppose it to be the place where Moses tended the flocks of his father-in-law. It is 50 m N Moilah, and 80 S Acaba.

Madras, or Fort St. George, the principal settlement of the English E India Company on the E side of the peninsula of Hindoostan, on the coast of Coromandel. The fortress is of great strength, and a regular square, about 100 yards on each side. It stands in the middle of the White or English town, which has three straight streets to the N, and the same number to the S of the fort. The houses are covered with a stucco called chunam, which is nearly as compact as the finest marble, and bears as high a polish: they consist of long colonades, with open porticoes, and flat roofs; and few of them exceed one floor. The inner apartments of the houses are not decorated, presenting to the eye only white walls; which, however, from the marble-like appearance of the stucco, give a freshness grateful in so hot a country. Ceilings are very uncommon in the rooms; it being impossible to find any which will resist the ravages of the white ants. Opposite the w side of the fort is a barrack, for the soldiers when off guard; and adjoining it is a convenient hospital. At the other end of the barrack is a mint, where the Company coin gold and silver. The whole is surrounded by a strong wall, and defended by batteries, bastions, &c. well supplied with cannon, stores, and other necessaries. The Black town, which is also walled and fortified, is inhabited by Gentoos, Mohamedans, Armenians, and Jews. The streets are wide, with trees planted in some of them, which afford shelter from the sun. Some of the houses are of brick; the rest are mean cottages in external appearance, but all within is neat and decent. The city stands in a flat country, on a fine sandy beach, and in common with all the European settlements on this coast, has no port for shipping; the coast forming nearly a straight line, and being incommoded also with a high and dangerous surf. Madras was settled by the English about the year 1640. It was taken by the French in 1746, but restored in 1748. The present fort, erected since the destruction of Fort St. David in 1758, is one of the best fortresses in the possession of the British. It is 290 m E by S Serinapatani. Lon. 80 29 E, lat. 13 5 N.

Madre de Dios, an island in the Pacific ocean, near the coast of Patagonia, 180 m in circumference. Lon. 42 0 W, lat. 51 0 S.

Madre de Popa, a town of Terra Firma, with a celebrated convent. It is much resorted to by pilgrims; and they pretend that the image of the Virgin has done a great many miracles in favour of seafaring people. It is seated on the Madelena, 50 m E Carthagenas.

Madrid, the capital of Spain, in New Castile. It was formerly an inconsiderable place, belonging to the archbishop of Toledo; but the purity of the air engaged the court to remove hither, and it is now the largest and finest town in the kingdom; but its form of government does not admit it to be termed a city. It contains 77 churches, 66 convents, 15 gates of granite, and about 148,000 inhabitants. The houses are mostly built of stone; the streets are long, broad, and straight, and adorned, at proper distances, with handsome fountains. There are above 100 towers or steeples in different places, which contribute greatly to the embellishment of the place. It stands in a plain, surrounded by mountains, and has a high wall built of mud. The royal palace being burnt down in 1734, another was erected on a large scale: each front is 470 feet long and 100 high, so that this immense pile towers over all the country; and no palace in Europe is fitted up with more royal magnificence. The churches and monasteries contain many paintings, by the most celebrated masters. The finest square in Madrid is the Plaza Mayor, 1536 feet in circuit, surrounded by houses, five stories high, all of an equal height; every story being adorned with a handsome balcony, and the fronts supported by columns, which form very fine arcades. Here the auto de fes were formerly celebrated, with all their terrible apparatus; and it is still the theatre of bull fights, which are given at the royal feasts. Casa del Campo is a royal house of pleasure, about half a mile from Madrid, with fine gardens, pleasant walks, and a great many uncommon animals. La Retiro is another royal palace near the city, and is a pleasant retreat in the heat of summer, there being a great number of fish-ponds, grottos, tents, groves, and hermitages: it also includes a fort called la China. Madrid has royal manufactures of china, cards, saltpetre, &c. but it has little trade, and chiefly prospers by the presence of the court. It is seated on the river Manzanares, which, though small, is adorned with a magnificent bridge. In March 1808, Madrid was entered by the French, under Murat, and the royal family retired into France: on July 20th, Joseph Bonaparte entered it as king of Spain; but the usurper and his adherents deemed it prudent to retreat on the 31st, taking with them such treasure as they had the means of conveying: in December following, it surrendered, without resistance, to the French, under Napoleon. In 1812, after the battle of Salamanca, the city was entered by the allied army, and fort la China capitulated; but the army retreated after the failure of the siege of Madura, an island in the Indian ocean, 75 m long and 12 broad, lying to the N of the E end of the island of Java. In 1811, it was taken by the British, out of the power of the French and Dutch, who were all made prisoners. It is governed by a sultan, and exceedingly fertile, especially in rice. The chief town is of the same name, situate on the S coast. Lon. 112 59 E, lat. 12 30 S.

Maeler, a lake of Sweden, 80 m long and 20 broad, extending from Kongsoer, in Westmania, to Stockholm. It contains several fine islands, is usually frozen over during a few weeks in winter, and then opens an easy communication, by sledges, between the interior parts of Sweden and the city of Stockholm.

Maelstrom, a dangerous whirlpool on the coast of Norway, in 68 N lat. and near the island of Moskoer, whence it is also named Moskoerom. When it is flood, the stream runs up the country with a boisterous rapidity; but the roar of its impetuous ebb to the sea is scarcely equalled by the loudest cataracts. The whirlpool is of such an extent and depth, that if a ship comes within its attraction, it is inevitably absorbed and beat to pieces against the rocks below; and when the water relaxes, the fragments come up again. The intervals of tranquillity are only at the turn of the ebb and flood, and calm weather; they last but a quarter of an hour, its violence gradually returning. When the stream is most boisterous, and its fury heightened by a storm, vessels have been reached by it at the distance of five miles.

Maerna, a town of Germany, in Tyrol, 23 m WSW Trent.

Maesjyk, a town of the Netherlands, in the territory of Liege, on the river Meuse, 10 m SSW Ruremonde.

Maeslandsluyt, a town of S Holland, near the mouth of the Meuse, 10 m W Rotterdam.

Maestricht, a city of the Netherlands, about 4 m in circumference, seated on the Meuse, opposite Wyck, with which it communicates by a stone bridge. The number of inhabitants is estimated at 18,000. It has fine long streets, many churches and convents, a college formerly belonging to the Jesuits, a council-house with its library, and manufactures of cloth and fire-arms. Near it is the lofty mountain of St. Peter, with a fortress; and a stone quarry, with such a number of subterranean passages as to be capable of containing 40,000 persons. The other fortifications and the situation of Maestricht are such, that it is deemed one of the strongest places in Europe. This city revolted from Spain in 1570, and was retaken by the prince of Parma in 1579. In 1632, the prince of Orange reduced it after a memorable siege, and it was confirmed to the Dutch in 1648. Lewis XIV took it in 1673; William prince of Orange invested it in vain, in 1676; but, in 1678, it was restored to the Dutch. In 1678, it was besieged by the French, who were permitted to take possession of it on condition of its being restored at the peace then negotiating. At the commencement of 1793 it was unsuccessfully attacked by the French, but they became masters of it toward the end of the following year; and it is now the capital of the department of Lower Meuse. It is 14 m NNE Liege, and 58 E Brussels. Lon. 5 48 E, lat. 50 49 N.

Mafra, a town of Portugal, in Estremadura, with a college founded in 1772. Near this place, in a sandy and barren spot, John V erected a building of extraordinary magnificence. This was done in pursuance of a vow, made in a dangerous fit of illness, to found a convent for the use of the poorest friary in the kingdom; which was found at Mafra, where twelve Fran-Ciscans lived together in a hut. The town is seated near the sea, 18 m NSW Lisbon.

Magadi, or Maghery, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore, seated in a hilly country abounding in timber-trees, stone, and iron. 24 m W Bangalore.

Magadoxo, the capital of a kingdom of the same name, on the coast of Ajan, with a citadel, and good harbour. It stands at the mouth of a river of its name, which is supposed to have a long course, having regular inundations that fertilize the country to a great extent. The king and his court are Mohamedans: his subjects, of what race soever (some being white, others tawny and olive, and others quite black) all speak the Arabic tongue; they are stout and warlike, and among other weapons use poisoned arrows and lances. This city is a place of great commerce, receiving from Adel and other parts cotton, silk, spices, and drugs, in exchange for gold, ivory, wax, and other commodities. Lon. 46 25 E, lat. 2 10 N.

Magdalen Islands, a group of seven small isles, in the gulf of St. Lawrence, lying NE of the E point of the island of St. John. They are inhabited by a few families, whose chief support is derived from fishing.

Magdalena, a river of Louisiana, which rises in the mountains that separate Louisiana from New Mexico, and runs into the Pacific ocean, to the SW of the bay of St. Lewis.

Magdeburg, a duchy of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, bounded on the N and E by Brandenburg, S by Anhalt and Halberstadt, and W by Brunswick. It is divided into four circles, Holz, Saal, Jerich, and Ziefar. The country is in general level, and the parts that are not marshy and overgrown with wood are very fertile. The salt springs are of such richness, that they can supply all Germany with salt. This duchy belonged to the king of Prussia, but by the treaty of Tilsit in 1807, he gave up that part lying on the left side of the Elbe.

Magdeburg, a fortified city, capital of the duchy of the same name. It has a handsome palace, a citadel with a fine arsenal, and a magnificent cathedral, which contains the superb mausoleum of Otho the great. The inhabitants are computed at 26,000. Here are manufactures of cotton and linen goods, stockings, gloves, porcelain, and tobacco; but the principal are those of woollen and silk. It is well situate for trade, on the left bank of the Elbe, by which it has an easy communication with Hamburg. It was taken by storm, in 1631, by the Austrians, who burnt the town, except the cathedral and a few houses adjacent, and massacred above 10,000 of the inhabitants; but it was soon handsomely rebuilt. In 1806 it surrendered to the French. It is 40 m WSW Brandenburg, and 120 SE Hamburg. Lon. 11 53 E, lat. 52 10 N.

Magellan, a strait of S America, discovered, in 1520, by Ferdinando Magellan, a Portuguese in the service of Spain. It has since been sailed through by several navigators; but the passage, upward of 300 m, being dangerous and troublesome, they now sail round Cape Horn. The Spaniards call the country to the N of this strait Tierra Magellanica, and reckon it a part of Chili.

Maggeroe, or Mageron, a large island, on the coast of Norway, and the most northern land in Europe. It is separated from the continent, on the S, by a narrow channel; and its N extremity is an enormous rock, called North Cape. Lon. 25 57 E, lat. 71 16 N.

Maggiore, or Verbano, a lake lying principally in the duchy of Milan, in Italy, and the N extremity in the canton of Tessin, in Switzerland. It is 36 m long and 4 broad, but 7 where a branch on the W side extends to the SW. The river Tessino runs S through its whole length; and in the widest part are the celebrated B-romeian isles, three in number; which are covered with orange and lemon trees, and laid out in gardens and pleasure grounds. The mountains on its banks have an intermixture of vineyard and forest, and the chain is frequently broken by rich intervening plains and expansive vallies.

Magra, a river of Italy, which rises in the Apennines, on the S confines of Parma, and flows by Pontremoli and Sarzana into the gulf of Genoa.

Mahaleu, a town of Egypt, capital of Garbia. It carries on a considerable trade in linen, cottons, and sal-ammoniac; and the inhabitants have ovens to hatch chicken. Lon. 30 31 E, lat. 31 30 N.

Mahanada, a river of Hindoostan, which rises in the NE part of Berar, crosses Orissa, and enters the bay of Bengal, by several mouths, below Cattack. These mouths form an assemblage of low woody islands; and at the mouth of the principal channel, near False Point, is a fortified island, named Cajung or Codjung.

Mahdia; see Medea.

Mahe, a town of Hindoostan, in Malabar, taken from the French, in 1793, by the English, and now the chief place of the Company's commerce in the province. Black pepper and cardamons are the chief articles of export; but the greater part of these are brought from the country above the Gauts. Mahe is situate on high ground, at the mouth of a river, 5 m SSE Tellichery.

Mahlberg, a town and castle of Suabia, in Brisgau, 17 m N Friburg.

Mahmoodabad, a town of Hindoostan, in Guzerat, 17 m SSE Amedabad.

Mahmudpour, a town of Hindoostan, in Bengal, 80 m NE Calcutta.

Mahomdy, a town of Hindoostan, in the country of Oude, 70 m NW Lucknow, and 150 ESE Delhi.

Mahon, a seaport of Minorca, at the SE end of the island. The harbour, called Port Mahon, is upward of 4 m long, and deemed one of the finest in the world. The town contains about 7000 inhabitants, and stands on a number of rocks on the W side of the head of the harbour, 27 m SE Cittadella. Lon. 4 18 E, lat. 39 51 N.

Mahrattas, two powerful states of Hindoostan, which derive their name from Mahrat, an ancient province of the Deccan. They are called the Poonah, or Western Mahrattas, and the Berar, or Eastern. Collectively, they occupy all the S part of Hindoostan Proper, with a large proportion of the Deccan, Malwa, Orissa, Candeish, and Visiapor; the principal parts of Berar, Guzerat, and Agimere; and a small part of Dowlatabad, Agra, and Aliahabad. These territories comprise their empire, which extends from sea to sea, across the widest part of the peninsula; and from the confines of Agra northward to the river Kistna southward; forming a tract of 1000 m long and 700 broad. The western state, the capital of which is Poonah, is divided among a number of chiefs, or princes, whose obedience to the paishwah, or head, is merely nominal at any time; and in some cases, an opposition of interests produces wars, not only between the members of the state, but also between the members and the head. Nagpour is the capital of the Eastern Mahrattas. Both these states, in 1792, were in alliance with the English in the war against Tipadoo, from whose territories they gained some acquisitions, which were ceded to them in 1799. Their armies are principally composed of light horse.

Mahrburg; see Marchburg.

Mahur, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a circar of its name, in the country of Berar. It is seated on the Chin Gonga, which flows into the Godavery, 140 m SW Nagpour. Lon. 78 34 E, lat. 19 24 N.

Maida, a town of Naples, in Calabria Ultra. On the plain near this place, in 1806, a victory was obtained by 5000 British troops over 8000 French. It is 9 m WNW Squillace.

Maidenhead, a town in Berkshire, governed by a mayor, with a market on Wednesday, and a good trade in malt, meal, and timber. It is seated on the Thames, over which is a bridge, 12 m E by N Reading, and 26 W by N London.

Maidensi, an island in the Pacific ocean, 36 m long and 9 broad. In the NW part of it native copper is found. Lon. 167 10 E, lat. 54 40 N.

Maidstone, a borough and the county-town of Kent, governed by a mayor, with a market on Thursday. It has a brisk trade in exporting the commodities of the county, particularly hops, of which there are numerous plantations around; here are likewise paper-mills and a manufacture of linen. The number of inhabitants was 8027 in 1801, and 9443 in 1811. It is seated on the Medway, over which is a bridge, 20 m w Canterbury, and 34 ESE London. Lon. 0 38 E, lat. 51 16 N.

Mailcotay, a lofty fortress of Hindoostan, in Mysore, and one of the most celebrated places of Hindoo worship. The large temple is a square building of great dimensions, and the jewels belonging to it are very valuable. Here, in 1772, Hyder was completely routed by the Mahrattas. It is 17 m N Seringapatam.

Maillezais, a town of France, in the department of Vendée, seated in an island formed by the Seure and Antize, 7 m S Fontenay le Comte, and 22 NE Rochelle.

Maina, a seaport of European Turkey, in Morea, which gives name to a mountainous district that lies between two bays of the Mediterranean sea. Its products are oil, silk, gall-nuts, honey, wax, cotton, and kermes; and considerable quantities of wool and raw hides are exported. The Mainotti could never be subdued by the Turks, on account of their vigilance and valour, and the defiles of their mountains. The town is seated on the SE part of the bay of Coron, 46 m S by W Mistra. Lon. 22 10 E, lat. 36 34 N.

Mainburg, a town of Bavaria, situate on the Ambs, 18 m ESE Ingoldstadt, and 32 NNE Munich.

Maine, a district belonging to the state of Massachusetts, 200 m long and 100 broad; bounded on the SW by the high lands, which separate the rivers that flow into the St. Lawrence and those that flow into the Atlantic; on the E by the river St. Croix, and a line drawn due N from its source to the said high lands, which divides this territory from New Brunswick; on the SE by the Atlantic; and on the W by New Hampshire. It is divided into five counties, York, Cumberland, Lincoln, Hancock, and Washington. The chief rivers are the Penobscot, Kennebec, Soco, Androscoggin, St. John, and St. Croix; and it has several small lakes. Though an elevated tract, it cannot be called mountainous, and a great proportion of the lands are arable and exceedingly fertile. Hops are the spontaneous growth of this country. The trees are white pine, spruce, maple, beech, white and gray oak, and yellow birch; these, as ship timber, boards, and every species of split lumber, are the principal exports of the country. The heat in summer is intense, and the cold in winter extreme; all the lakes and rivers are usually passable on ice from Christmas till the middle of March. In 1810, the number of inhabitants was 228,705. Portland is the capital.

Maine, a late province of France, bounded on the N by Normandy, E by Orleansois, S by Touraine and Anjou, and W by Bretagne. It now forms the departments of Mayenne and Sarthe.

Maine, a river of Germany, which rises in Franconia, flows by Bamberg, Wurzburg, Aschaffenburg, Hanau, and Frankfurt, and joins the Rhine a little above Mentz.

Maineville, a town of France, in the department of Eure, 24 m ESE Rouen.

Mainland, the largest and most southern of the Shetland isles, 60 m long and in some places 16 broad; but it projects into the sea with many irregular promontories, and is indented by numerous bays and harbours. The face of the country exhibits a prospect of black craggy mountains and marshy plains, interperised with some verdant spots, which appear smooth and fertile. Neither tree nor shrub is to be seen, except the juniper and the heath. The mountains abound with various kinds of game. Lofty cliffs, impending over the ocean, are the haunts of eagles, falcons, and ravens. The deep caverns underneath shelter seals and otters; and to the winding bays resort swans, geese, scarks, and other aquatic birds. The seas abound with cod, turbot, and haddock; and, at certain seasons, with shoals of herrings. Lobsters, oysters, muscles, &c. are also plentiful. The hills are covered with heaves and sheep of a small breed; the horses are also of a diminutive size, but remarkably strong, and called Shetland ponies. The rivulets and lakes abound with salmon, trout, &c. No mines have been wrought, but there are visible appearances of various metallic ores. The inhabitants are hardy, docile, and ingenious. They manufacture linen and woollen cloth for their own use; and worsted stockings, some of fine texture and great value, for exportation; but their principal occupation is fishing. Lerwick is the capital.

Mainland, the principal of the Orkney islands. See Pomona.

Maintenon, a town of France, in the department of Eure and Loire, with a collegiate church, and a priory, seated between two mountains, on the river Eure, 5 m N by E Chartres.

Malabar, a province on the w coast of the peninsula of Hindoostan, lying between those of Canara and Cochin. Including the districts of Coorg and Wynaad, above the Gaults, it is 130 m in length, and 60 in breadth. It was divided among several petty princes who were subdued by Hyder; and on the termination of the war with Tip-poo, in 1792, it was ceded to the English. The land is well cultivated; and there are many forests. Oxen and buffalos are numerous, but of a diminutive size. No horses, asses, sheep, nor goats are bred; but common poultry are in abundance. It is well watered by rivers; but none have any peculiar appellation, each portion being called by the name of the remarkable place near which it flows. The capital is Calicut. The whole coast from the northern part of this province to the southern extremity of Hindoostan is called the coast of Malabar. The natives are all blacks, or at least of a dark olive complexion, with long black hair, and tolerable features. In some places they are distinguished into tribes, all of which are brought up to the same employment as their parents. These are the Gentoos, of whom see an account under the article Hindoostan.

Malacca, or Malaya, a peninsula of Asia, containing several petty kingdoms; bounded on the N by Siam, E by the ocean, and sw by the strait of Malacca, which separates it from Sumatra. It is 560 m in length, and 150 in breadth. The chief commodities for trade are tin and elephants teeth; but there are a great many excellent fruits and roots, pepper and other spices, with some precious gums and woods. The pineapples are the best in the world; and the cocoa nuts have shells that will hold an English quart. There is but little corn, and sheep and oxen are scarce; but hogs and poultry are plentiful. The Malays are rather below the middle stature, their limbs well shaped, but particularly slender at the wrists and ancles. Their complexion is tawny, their eyes large, their noses rather flat, and their hair long, black, and shining. They are fond of navigation, war, plunder, emigration, adventures, and gallantry. They talk incessantly of their honour and bravery, and speak the softest language of Asia; yet they are deemed the most treacherous ferocious people on the face of the globe. Their religion is a mixture of Mohamedanism. The inland parts are possessed by a savage and barbarous people, who take delight in doing mischief to their neighbours.

Malacca, a seaport and the capital of a kingdom of the same name, in the peninsula of Malaya. The Portuguese had a settlement here, which was taken by the Dutch in 1640; and it was taken from them by the English in 1795. Malacca is seated on the strait of its name, 480 m SE Acheen. Lon. 102 5 E, lat. 2 12 N.

MAL

Malaga, a city of Spain, in Granada, and a bishop's see, with two castles, and a good harbour. The cathedral is a stupendous pile, begun by Philip II while married to Mary of England, and their united arms are over the gate. Its commerce is principally in figs, raisins, oil, and excellent wines; and it has manufactures of silks, velvets, shag, stockings, hats, soap, paper, &c. The inhabitants are about 54,000. It is seated on the Mediterranean, surrounded by hills, and rich valleys, 70 m sww Granada. Lon. 4 10 W, lat. 36 35 N.

Malamocco, a small island and town in the Lagoon of Venice, 5 m s Venice.

Malatia, a town of Asiatic Turkey, in Roum, and a bishop's see; seated on the Euphrates, 100 m s Sivas, and 200 m NE Adana. Lon. 38 10 E, lat. 37 28 N.

Malasvully, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore, with a large mud fort, separated into two parts by a transverse wall. Here is a fruitgarden, of great extent, planted by the late sultans. It is 27 m E Seringapatam.

Malcho, a town of Lower Saxony, in the duchy of Mecklenburg, between the lakes Calpin and Plau, 23 m s s E Gustrow.

Malden, a borough in Essex, with a market on Saturday, seated on an eminence, by the river Blackwater. It has two parish churches; and a third, which it had formerly, has been long converted into a free-school. Vessels of a moderate burden come up to the town, but large ships are obliged to unload at a distance below, in Blackwater bay. The custom of Borough-English is kept up here, by which the youngest son, and not the eldest, succeeds to the burgage tenure, on the death of his father. This town carries on a considerable trade, chiefly in corn, salt, coal, iron, deals, and wine. It is 10 m E Chelmsford, and 37 N E London.

Maldivas, a cluster of small islands, in the Indian ocean, lying sw Cape Comorin. The northernmost, called Head of the Isles, or Kelly, is in lon. 73 4 E, lat. 7 5 N; and Maldiva, in which the king resides, is in lon. 75 35 E, lat. 4 15 N. They are innumerable; but all low and sandy, and most of them uninhabited. They are divided into 13 attollons, or provinces, each having its separate governor, who rules with great oppression. The subjects are miserably poor, and appear to be a mixture of Arabs and Hindoos from Malabar. They supply ships with sails and cordage, cocoa-nuts, oil, honey, dry fish, tortoise-shell, and especially couries. The king assumes the title of Sultan of the Maldives, king of thirteen provinces, and twelve thousand isles.

mon poultry are the domestic animals. The inhabitants appear to be of a race totally distinct from those of the Friendly and Society islands. Their form, language, and manners, are widely different. They seem to correspond in many particulars with the natives of New Guinea, particularly in their black colour and woolly hair. They go almost naked, are of a slender make, have lively, but very irregular ugly features, and tie a rope fast round their belly. They use bows and arrows as their principal weapons, and the arrows are said to be sometimes poisoned. They keep their bodies entirely free from punctures, which is one particular that remarkably distinguishes them from the other tribes of the Pacific ocean. At the SE end of the island is a port, named Sandwich Harbour. Lon. 167 53 E, lat. 16 25 S.

Malling, West, a town in Kent, with a market on Saturday, 6 m W Maidstone, and 20 E by S London.

Mallow, a borough of Ireland, in the county of Cork. Here are considerable linen manufactures, and a fine spring of tepid water. It sends one member to parliament, and is seated on the Blackwater, 17 m NNW Cork.

Malmedy, a town of the Netherlands, in the territory of Liege, with a Benedictine abbey, and some mineral springs equal to those of Spa. It is seated on the Recht, 13 m S by E Limburg.

Malmo, a fortified seaport of Sweden, in Schonen, with a large harbour and a strong citadel. It has fine streets, and manufactures of woollen; and is seated on the Sound, 10 m SW Lund, and 18 E by S Copenhagen. Lon. 13 7 E, lat. 55 36 N.

Malmjas, a town of Sweden, in Sudermania, 23 m WNW Nikoping.

Malmisbury, a borough in Wiltshire, with a market on Saturday, and a woollen manufacture. Here was formerly a large abbey; and at the end of the cemetery are two ancient churches. It is seated on a hill, almost surrounded by the Avon, over which it has six bridges, 26 m E by N Bristol, and 96 W London.

Malo, St. a seaport of France, in the department of Ile and Vilaine, and lately an episcopal see. It has a large harbour, difficult of access, on account of the rocks that surround it; and is a trading place, of great importance, defended by a strong castle. It was bombarded by the English in 1693, but without success. In 1758, they landed in Canceille bay, went to the harbour by land, and burnt above 100 ships. St. Malo is seated on an island, united to the mainland by a causeway, 44 m NNW Rennes. Lon. 2 2 W, lat. 48 39 N.

Malojarofaul, a town of Russia, in the government of Kaluga. Here was a desperate battle on October 24, 1812, in which the French were defeated, on their retreat from Moscow; the town was taken and retaken eleven times, and finally burnt to ashes. It is 36 m N Kalugi, and 66 SW Moscow.

Malpartida, a town of Spain, in Estremadura, 24 m W Truxillo.

Malpas, a town in Cheshire, with a market on Monday, seated on a high hill, near the river Dee, 15 m SE Chester, and 165 NW London.

Malplaquet, a village of the Netherlands, in Hainault, 7 m S by E Mons; famous for a victory gained over the French, by the duke of Marlborough, in 1709, and sometimes called the battle of Blaregnies, from an adjacent village.

Malsejana, a town of Italy, in Venetia, 18 m NNW Verona.

Malta, an island of the Mediterranean, between Africa and Sicily, 60 m S of the latter, and the most southern island in Europe. It is 20 m long and 12 broad; contains two cities and 22 villages, and has several good harbours on the coast opposite Sicily. The port of St. Paul, toward the NE end, is so called from a tradition that the vessel in which St. Paul was sent prisoner to Rome was wrecked on the N point of its entrance. The island is divided into two very unequal parts; the one to the E, the other to the W, of the old city. The western part, which is the smallest, has no villages, and little land capable of cultivation, but it abounds with odoriferous plants, and has considerable salt-works. The other part, containing two-thirds of the island, is fertile; and here are cultivated large quantities of cotton, lemons, almonds, olives, and vines. The number of the inhabitants is said to be 90,000. The common people speak Arabic, but the better sort Italian. Emperor Charles V, in 1526, gave this island (with the smaller one of Gozo) to the order of St. John of Jerusalem, or knights of Rhodes, who removed hither in 1530, and hence they are now called knights of Malta. The island is extremely well fortified; the ditches, of a vast size, are all cut out of the solid rock, and extend many miles. See Citta Vecchia, and Valetta.

Malton, New, a borough in N Yorkshire, with a market on Saturday. Here are three churches, and some considerable remains of a monastery. It is seated on the Derwent, over which is a stone bridge to the village of Old Malton, 18 m NE York, and 213 N by W London.

Maltoy, a town of Hindoostan, in the country of Berar, seated at the source of the Tapty, 68 m NW Nagpour. Lon. 78 57 E, lat. 21 44 N.

Malwa, or Mallooiha, a river of Barbary, which has its rise in the desert, and flows N into the Mediterranean, separating the kingdoms of Algiers and Fez. Thirteen miles from its mouth are three uninhabited islands, between which coasting vessels may lie in safety.

Malvasia, a small island of European Turkey, on the E coast of Morea, celebrated for its rich wine, called Malmsey. See Napoli di Malvasia.

Malvern, Great and Little, two villages in Worcestershire. The former is 8 m W by S Worcester, and had once an abbey, of which nothing remains but the gateway of the abbey, and the nave of the church, now parochial. The latter is seated in a cavity of the Malvern hills, three miles from Great Malvern. Henry VII, his queen, and his two sons, were so delighted with this place, that they adorned the church with painted glass windows, part of which remain, though in a mutilated state. Between Great and Little Malvern are two noted chalybeate springs, one of them called the Holy Well.

Malvern Hills, a range of hills in the SW of Worcestershire, extending from N to S about 7 m, and dividing this part of the county from Herefordshire. The highest point is 1444 feet above the level of the sea; and they appear to be of limestone and quartz. On the summit of one of these hills, are the immense works of the Herefordshire Beacon, one of the strongest hill fortresses in this island; its construction is ascribed to the Britons, as a place of permanent security for a whole district, with all their possessions, in case of any sudden emergency.

Malung, a town of Sweden, in the province of Dalecarlia, 55 m W Fahlun. Lon. 15 20 E, lat. 60 30 N.

Malwa, a province of Hindoostan, bounded on the W by Guzerat, N by Agimere, E by Allahabad and Orissa, and S by Candeish. It is one of the most extensive, elevated, and diversified tracts in Hindoostan, and divided among the chiefs of the Poonah Maharrattas. Ougein and Indore are the principal towns.

M A N

Malzheu, a town of France, in the department of Lozere, 20 m NNW Mende.

Mamars, a town of France, in the department of Sarthe, seated on the Dive, 14 m W Bellefene.

Manora, a town and fort of the kingdom of Fez, seated on an eminence on the S bank of the Sebou, near its entrance into the Atlantic. The inhabitants subsist chiefly by fishing for thebebl, a species of salmon, of which they take an incredible quantity. It is 15 m NNE Sallee, and 90 m WW Fez.

Man, an island in the Irish sea, 30 m long and 12 broad. It contains 17 parishes; and the chief towns are Castletown, Douglas, Peel, and Ramsey. The air is healthy, and the soil produces more corn than is sufficient to maintain the inhabitants, who are denominated Manks, and estimated at more than 30,000. They have a bishop, called the bishop of Sodor and Man; but he has no seat in the British parliament. The commodities of the island are wool, hides, butter, tallow, black marble, slate, limestone, lead, and copper. Some manufactures of coarse hats, cotton goods, and linen cloth, are carried on in different parts; but the principal trade arises from the herring fishery. The duke of Athol was lord of this island, the sovereignty of which he sold, in 1765, to the crown. It is 37 m S Scotland, 37 N Wales, 27 W England, and 47 E Ireland.

Manaar, a small island in the Indian ocean, on the NW side of Ceylon. From this island a reef of rocks runs over to the continent of Hindoostan, called Adam's Bridge, which can only be passed by boats. The sea to the S of this, between the continent and the island of Ceylon, is called the Gulf of Manaar. The Portuguese got possession of the island of Manaar in 1560; the Dutch took it from them in 1658; and the English took it from the Dutch in 1795. Lon. 79 30 E, lat. 9 0 N.

Manachia, or Magnisa, the ancient Magnesia, a city of Natolia, and a bishop's see, with a castle. It was formerly the capital of the Ottoman empire, and is seated at the foot of a mountain, on the river Sarabat, 22 m N Smyrna. Lon. 27 6 E, lat. 38 45 N.

Manado, a town of Celebes, and a Dutch settlement, on the NE part of the island, defended by a fort. It surrendered to the British in 1810. Lon. 124 30 E, lat. 1 8 N.

point of land projecting into the gulf of Manaar, 40 m SE Palameotta.

Manbed, a town of Persia, in the province of Irak, 150 m ESE Isfahan.

Manbona, the capital of the kingdom of Sabia, situate on the seacoast, 60 m S Sofala. Lon. 35 39 E, lat. 21 15 S.

Manchester, a village in Warwickshire, near Atherstone and the river Anker. It was a Roman station on the Watlingstreet, and here several coins have been dug up.

Mancha, a territory of Spain, in New Castile, between the river Guadiana and Andalusia. It is nearly surrounded by mountains, producing antimony, vermilion, and mercury. The country is an immense plain, intersected by ridges of low hills and rocks; not an enclosure of any kind, except mud walls about the villages, nor scarcely a tree to be seen; but it is well cultivated in corn and vines. The inhabitants are affable, and great lovers of music and dancing; and it was here that Cervantes made his hero, Don Quixote, perform his chief exploits. The capital is Ciudad Real.

Manche, a department of France, including the W part of the late province of Normandy. It is almost surrounded by the English channel. Coutances is the capital.

Manchester, a large town in Lancashire, with a market on Tuesday and Saturday, seated between the rivers Irk and Irwell, and a place of great antiquity, though neither a corporation nor a borough. It has been long noted for various branches of the linen, silk, and cotton manufactures, and is now principally conspicuous as the centre of the cotton trade. The labours of a very populous neighbourhood are collected at Manchester, whence they are sent to London, Liverpool, Hull, &c. These consist of a great variety of cotton and mixed goods, fitted for all sorts of markets, both at home and abroad, spreading over a great part of Europe, America, and the coast of Guinea. The manufactures of tapes and other small wares, of silk goods, and of hats, are also carried on at Manchester; from which various sources of wealth it has attained greater opulence than almost any of the trading towns in England. Its chief ornaments are the college, the exchange, the collegiate church, another large church, and a spacious marketplace. The churches and chapels of the establishment are 22 in number, with as many places of worship for different sects of dissenters. In respect to population it ranks next to London, the number of inhabitants being 84,000 in 1801, and 98,573 in 1811. By the Irwell it has a communication with the Mersey, and all the late various extensions of inland navigation. It is 36 m E by N Liverpool, and 182 m NW London. Lon. 2 10 W, lat. 53 27 N.

Manchester, a town of Vermont, in Bennington county, situate on Batten river, which flows into the Hudson, above Saratoga. It is 22 m N Bennington, and 35 S Rutland.

Manchester, a town of Virginia, on James river, opposite Richmond, with which it is connected by a bridge.

Manciet, a town of France, in the department of Gers, 17 m SW Condom.

Mandal, a town of Norway, capital of a province in the government of Bergen; seated near the mouth of a river of the same name, 60 m WSW Christianland. Lon. 7 42 E, lat. 58 2 N.

Manderfcheid, a town of France, in the department of Sarre, lately of Germany, in the electorate of Treves, 26 m NNE Treves.

Mandingo, a country in the W part of Negroland, at the sources of the rivers Niger and Senegal. Not only the inhabitants of this state, but the bulk of the people in many other districts in the western part of Africa, are called Mandingos, probably from having originally emigrated from this country. The Mandingos, in general, are of a mild, sociable, and obliging disposition; the men are above the middle size, well-shaped, strong, and capable of enduring great labour; the women are good-natured, sprightly, and agreeable. The dress of both sexes is composed of cotton cloth, of their own manufacture; that of the men is a loose frock, with drawers that reach half way down the legs, and a white cap on their heads; and they wear sandals on their feet. The women's dress consists of two pieces of cloth, about six feet long and three wide; one of these is put round the waist, and hangs down to the ankles; the other is thrown negligently over the bosom and shoulders. See Kamalia.

Mandshurs, or Mancheus, a branch of the Mongul Tartars, whose ancestors conquered China in the thirteenth century, but were expelled by the Chinese in 1368. They inhabit the three provinces of Eastern Tartary, and retain the customs they brought from China.

Manfredonia, a seaport of Naples, in Capitanata, and an archbishop's see, with a castle and a good harbour. All sorts of vegetables are in abundance, and most of the corn exported from the province is shipped here. It is seated on a gulf of the same name, 30 m ENE Lucera. Lon. 16 12 E, lat. 41 35 N.

Mangalore, a town of Hindoostan, capital of Canara. It is seated between the two arms of a fine lake of salt water, each of which receives a river from the Gaults; but the bar at the entrance into this harbour will not admit vessels drawing more than ten feet. The town is built along the sides of the peninsula, and in the elevated center are the remains of a fort, which the late sultan Tippoo ordered to be demolished. It is a place of great trade, and the principal exports are rice, betel-nut, black pepper, sandal wood (from the country above the Gaults) cinnamon, and turmeric. In this town a treaty of peace was signed between Tippoo and the English, in 1784. It is 130 m NNW Calicut, and 190 SSE Goa. Lon. 75 4 E, lat. 12 50 N.

Mangeea, an island in the Pacific ocean, five leagues in circumference. In the interior parts it rises into small hills, and captain Cook represents it as a fine island; but did not find a landing place. Some of the inhabitants came on board, and they seemed to resemble those of Otaheite, in the beauty of their persons and general disposition. Lon. 158 16 W, lat. 21 27 S.

Manheim, a strong city of Germany, in the late palatinate of the Rhine, almost surrounded by the Neckar and the Rhine. The streets are all straight, intersecting each other at right angles; and it has three noble gates, adorned with basso-relievos. The palace is a magnificent structure, with a cabinet of natural curiosities and a gallery of pictures. The inhabitants are computed at 24,000. Manheim has been frequently taken and retaken by the French and Austrians in the late wars. In 1802, it was ceded to the margrave of Baden. It is 17 m N Spire, and 42 S Frankfort. Lon. 8 34 E, lat. 49 29 N.

Manica, an inland kingdom of Caffreria, bounded on the N by Mocaranga, E by Sofala and Sabia, and S and W by unknown regions. It is said to abound with mines of gold, and has a river and capital of the same name; but it is little known to the Europeans.

Manilla, the capital of the island of Luconia, as well as of the other Philippine islands, and the see of an archbishop, who is commonly the Spanish viceroy. It is well fortified, and defended by the castle of St. Philip. The number of Christian inhabitants is estimated at 12,000. Most of the public structures are built of wood, on account of the frequent earthquakes, by one of which, in 1617, a mountain was levelled; and in 1625, a third part of the city was overthrown by another, when 3000 persons perished in the ruins. This city is seated near the lake Batia, on the E side of a bay, on the SW coast. The bay is a circular basin, 10 leagues in diameter, and great part of it land-locked; but the port peculiar to the city, called Cavete, lies 9 m to the SW, and is the usual station of the ships employed in the Acapulco trade; for an account of which, see Luconia. This city abounds with convents; and there is also an inquisition. On account of the pure and mild temperature of the air, it is deemed the most healthy of all the European settlements in the East. In 1762, the English took this city by storm, and humanely suffered the archbishop to ransom it for about a million sterling; but great part of the ransom never was paid. Lon. 120 52 E, lat. 14 56 N.

Manningtree, a town in Essex, with a market on Tuesday. The principal imports are deals, corn, coal, and iron. It is seated on a branch of the Stour, called Manningtree-water, 11 m W Harwich, and 60 ENE London.

Monoique, a town of France, in the department of Lower Alps, with a castle; seated on the Durance, 25 m NE Aix.

Mantua, or Mantuan, a duchy of Italy, lying along the river Po, which divides it into two parts. It is bounded on the W by the Cremonese, N by the Veronese, E by the Ferrarese, and S by the duchies of Reggio, Modena, and Mirandola. It is 50 m long and 30 broad, and fruitful in corn, pasture, flax, fruit, and excellent wine. Charles IV, duke of Mantua, having taken part with the French, in the dispute relating to the succession of Spain, was put under the ban of the empire, and died in 1708. Having no heirs, the house of Austria kept possession of the Mantuan till 1800, when the French obtained it, after the battle of Marengo.

Mantua, a city of Italy, capital of the duchy of the same name, and an archbishop's see. It is seated on an island in the middle of a lake, 20 m in circumference and two broad, formed by the Mincio; and so very strong by situation as well as by art, that it is one of the most considerable fortresses in Europe. The only way into the city is by two moles or bridges, each of which is defended by a fort and other works. In the heat of summer, when the lake is low, the air becomes noxious, and the better sort of the inhabitants leave the city for some time. The citadel is partly free from this inconvenience, and in it is always kept a strong garrison. The streets are in general broad and straight, and the houses handsome. The cathedral has a noble dome, decorated with pilasters and fine paintings; the church of St. Anthony is famous for relics; and the Franciscan church is one of the most elegant of that order in Italy. Here are many other churches, numerous convents, a synagogue for the Jews who live in a distinct quarter, a university, the ancient ducal palace, with its gallery of paintings, &c. It was greatly noted for its silks, and silk manufactures, which are now much decayed, and the inhabitants reduced to about 12,000. Virgil was born at a village near this city. Mantua surrendered to the French in 1797, after a siege of eight months; and it was attacked by the Austrian and Russian army, in 1799, to which it surrendered after a short siege. It is 35 m NE Parma, and 90 ESE Milan. Lon. 10 50 E, lat. 45 10 N.

Marquartstein, a town of Bavaria, with an ancient castle, seated near the river Acha, 22 m W Salzburg.

Marquis, five islands in the Pacific ocean, named St. Christina, Magdalena, St. Dominica, St. Pedro, and Hood. The first four were discovered by Quiros in 1595, the last by Cook in 1774. St. Dominica is much the largest, about 48 m in circuit. Captain Cook, in his second voyage, lay some time at St. Christina, in lon. 139 9 W, and lat. 9 55 S.

It is high and steep, but has many valleys, which widen toward the sea, and are covered with fine forests to the summits of the interior mountains. The products of these islands are bread fruit, bananas, plantains, cocoa nuts, scarlet beans, paper mulberries (of the bark of which their cloth is made) casnarinas, with other tropical plants and trees, and hogs and fowls. The Marquesans are of large stature, well made, strong, and active; of a tawny complexion, but look almost black, by being tattooed over the whole body.

The men always go naked; for the small piece of cloth, which some of them occasionally wear round their loins, cannot be considered as clothing. Their arms consist of clubs, spears, and slings; and the persons killed and taken in war are devoured. Some of the women are nearly as fair as Europeans, and among them tattooing is not common, and then only on the hands and arms. Their drink is water only, cocoa-nuts being rather scarce. Their language much resembles that of the Society islands. To the NW of the Marquesas is a group sometimes called the New Marquesas; see Ingraham Islands.

Marjal, a town of France, in the department of Meurte, with considerable salt-works; seated on the Selle, in a marsh difficult of access, 17 m ENE Nancy.

Marfa's, a city of Sicily, in Val di Mazara, built on the ruins of the ancient Lilybæum, at the most western point of the island, and surrounded by a wall, with six bastions. Its fine port was destroyed by John of Austria, in 1562, to prevent the entrance of the Turkish galleys; but a long reef of rocks still form a temporary shelter for small vessels. The town is well built, and of considerable importance from the productive country around. It is 58 m WSW Palermo. Lon. 12 34 E, lat. 37 55 N.

Marfanne, a town of France, in the department of Drome, 8 m NNE Montelimar.

Marfaquiver, a strong seaport of Algiers, in the province of Mascara, belonging to the Spaniards, who took it in 1732. It is seated on a rock, near a bay of the Mediterranean, 3 m from Oran.

Marjden, a village in W Yorkshire, near the source of the Colne, and on the Huddersfield canal, 7 m SW Huddersfield. Here are some extensive cotton mills.

Marseilles, a city of France, in the department of Mouths of the Rhone, and lately an episcopal see. It was so celebrated in the time of the Romans, that Cicero styled it the Athens of the Gauls, and Pliny called it the Mistress of Education. It is seated on the Mediterranean, at the upper end of a gulf, covered and defended by many small islands. It is divided into the old town, or the city, and the new town. The first is built on the side of a hill; but the houses are mean, and the streets dirty, narrow, and steep: in this part is the principal church, built by the Goths, on the ruins of the temple of Diana. The new town is a perfect contrast to the city, with which it has a communication by one of the finest streets imaginable; and the other streets, squares, and public buildings are beautiful. With respect to commerce, Marseilles has been called Europe in Miniature, on account of the variety of dresses and languages which are here seen and heard. The port is a spacious basin of an oval form, and is defended by a citadel and fort. In 1720, the plague raged with great violence, and carried off 50,000 of the inhabitants. In 1793, Marseilles revolted against the French national convention, but was soon reduced. It is 13 m NW Toulon, and 362 s by E Paris. Lon. 5 22 E, lat. 43 18 N.

Marsilly, a town of France, in the department of Marne, 10 m S Suzanne.

Marsstrand, a rocky island of Sweden, in the Categat, lying N of the mouths of the Gotha. It is 2 m in circumference; and on account of its strength, is called the Gibraltar of Sweden. The town stands on the E side, and has a secure and commodious harbour. The castle stands on a rock, and is used as a state prison. The inhabitants subsist chiefly by the herring fishery, by the number of ships that in bad weather take refuge in the harbour, and by a contraband trade. It is 20 m NW Gotteborg. Lon. 11 30 E, lat. 57 52 N.

Marta, a town of Italy, in the patrimony of St. Peter, on a river of the same name, where it issues from the lake Bolsena, 10 m E Castro.

Martaban, a city of Pegu, capital of a province of the same name, fertile in rice, fruits, and wines of all kinds. It was a rich trading place before the king of Birmah conquered the country, who caused a number of vessels to be sunk at the mouth of the harbour, so that it is now only to be entered by small vessels. The chief trade is in earthen ware and fish. It is seated on the bay of Bengal, at the mouth of the Thaluau, 120 m SE Pegu. Lon. 97 56 E, lat. 16 30 N.

Martago, a town of Spain, in Leon, 10 m SSE Ciudad Rodrigo.

Martignana, a town of Piedmont, seated near the Po, 5 m w Saluzzo.

Martigues, a town of France, in the department of Mouths of the Rhone; seated near a lake 12 m long and 5 broad, which produces excellent salt, 20 m NW Marfeilles.

Martin, Cape, a promontory of Spain, in Valencia, which separates the gulf of Valencia from that of Alicant. Lon. 0 36 E, lat. 38 54 N.

Martin, St. a town of France, in the isle of Re, with a harbour, and strong citadel, 12 m WNW Rochelle. Lon. 1 20 W, lat. 46 13 N.

Martin, St. one of the leeward Caribe islands, in the W Indies, 44 m in circumference. It has neither harbour nor river, but several salt-pits, and its tobacco, the chief commodity cultivated, is reckoned the best in the Caribe islands. It was long jointly possessed by the French and Dutch; but was taken by the British in 1810. The w end is 5 m s Anguilla. Lon. 63 8 W, lat. 18 4 N.

Martinach, a town of Swisserland, in Valais, on the river Dranse, 12 m SW Sion.

Martinico, one of the windward Caribe islands, 60 m long and 30 broad. The French possessed it from 1535 till 1762, when it was taken by the British; and it was again taken by them in 1794 and 1809. There are high mountains covered with trees, several rivers, and many fertile valleys, yet they will neither bear wheat nor vines; but the former is not much wanted, for the natives prefer cassava to wheat bread. It produces sugar, coffee, cotton, ginger, indigo, chocolate, aloes, pimento, plantains, and other tropical fruits; but sugar is the principal commodity, of which a considerable quantity is exported. The island is populous; and it has several safe and commodious harbours, well fortified. It suffered great damage by a tremendous hurricane in 1806. Fort royal is the capital.

Martinsburg, a town of Virginia, capital of Berkeley county. It has two churches, and stands in a fertile country, 10 m WNW Shepherdstown, and 22 NE Winchester.

Martinsville, a town of Virginia, chief of Henry county. It is 25 m s by w Rocky Mount, and 66 w Halifax.

Martinville, a town of N Carolina, capital of Guildford county. Near this place, in 1781, lord Cornwallis defeated general Green. It is seated on Buffalo creek, a branch of Haw river, 45 m w by N Hillsborough, and 50 NE Salisbury.

Martock, a town in Somerssethire, with a market on Saturday, 7 m s Somerton, and 130 w by s London.

Mary, St. a small seaport of the state of Georgia, in Camden county, near the mouth of St. Mary river, 70 m s by w Newport. Lon. 81 40 W, lat. 30 45 N.

Mary River, St. a river of the state of Georgia, which rises in the Okefokoke swamp, and thence forms the southern boundary of the United States to the ocean, which it enters at the town of St. Mary, between the points of Amelia and Cumberland islands. It is navigable for vessels of considerable burden for 90 m, and its banks afford immense quantities of fine timber suited to the W India market.

Mary Strait, St. a strait in N. America, which forms the communication between Lake Superior and Lake Huron. It is about 60 m long, containing a variety of islands; and at the upper end is a rapid, which, by careful pilots, can be defended without danger. At the foot of the rapid, on the N side, is a factory belonging to a company at Montreal, consisting of storehouses, a saw-mill, and a bateau-yard.

Maryborough, a borough of Ireland, capital of Queen county, with the remains of a castle. It is not large, but considerable for its woollen manufactures, and seated on the Burrow, 47 m wsw Dublin. Lon. 7 12 W, lat. 53 0 N.

Maryland, one of the United States of America, 134 m long and 110 broad; bounded on the N by Pennsylvania, E by the state of Delaware, S by the Atlantic and Virginia, and W by Virginia. It is divided into 19 counties, 11 of which are on the western, and 8 on the eastern shore of the Chesapeak: those on the W side are Hartford, Baltimore, Ann Arundel, Frederic, Allegany, Washington, Montgomery, Prince George, Calvert, Charles, and St. Mary; those on the E, Cecil, Kent, Queen Ann, Caroline, Talbot, Somerset, Dorchester, and Worcester. Wheat and tobacco are the staple commodities of this state, which, in most respects, resembles Virginia. In 1810 the number of inhabitants was 350,546. Annapolis is the capital, but Baltimore is the mart of trade.

Maryport, a town in Cumberland, with a market on Friday, and a good harbour. In 1750 it was only a poor fishing town; but it has now upward of 3000 inhabitants, who employ many vessels, from 50 to 250 tons burden, in the coal or coasting trade. Here are two ship-yards and a cotton manufactory, and close by is the Roman station, Virofidum, where several altars and statues have been dug up. Maryport is situate at the mouth of the Ellen, in the Irish sea, 27 m sw Carlisle, and 297 nsw London. Lon. 3 22 W, lat. 54 35 N.

Marza Siroco, a gulf on the SE side of the island of Malta. The Turks landed here in 1565, when they went to besiege Valetta. It is now defended by three forts, two at the entrance of the gulf, and one at the point of land that advances into the middle of it.

Marzilla, a town of Spain, in the province of Navarre, near the river Aragon, 30 m s Pamplona.

M A S

Mas d'Agenois, a town of France, in the department of Lot and Garonne, on the river Garonne, 24 m NW Agen, and 50 SE Bourdeaux.

Mas d'Ast, a town of France, in the department of Arriège, with a Benedictine abbey; seated on the rivulet Rife, 8 m SW Pamiers.

Masafuero, an island in the Pacific ocean, 80 m W Juan Fernandez. It is high and mountainous, but lowest to the N, and at a distance appears like one hill or rock. It is of a triangular form, about 25 m in circumference, and uninhabited, except by numerous seals and goats. There is also plenty of wood, but difficult to be got off, as the heavy surf allows of no good landing place. Lon. 81 40 W, lat. 33 40 S.

Masbate, one of the Philippine islands, almost in the centre of them. It is 80 m in circumference, and the natives are tributary to the Spaniards. Lon. 122 25 E, lat. 11 36 N.

Masbrough, a village in W Yorkshire, on the river Don, adjoining the bridge of Rotherham. Here are considerable iron-works, where all sorts of hammered and cast iron goods are made, from the most trifling article to a large cannon, of which great quantities are exported.

Mascara, the western province of the kingdom of Algiers. 370 m long and 130 broad. It is dry, barren, and mountainous, except on the N side, where there are plains abounding in corn, fruit, and pasture. The S parts are inhabited by independent wandering tribes, particularly the Angad tribe.

Mascara, the capital of the province of the same name, in the kingdom of Algiers, with a strong castle in which the bey resides. In 1732 it was an inconsiderable place; but is now the only one in the kingdom, which, under the domination of the Turks, perceptibly increases in prosperity and extent. It is not so large as Tremefan, but surpasses it in beauty, having a great number of good houses and newly erected mosques. It stands in the centre of a fertile and populous district, 45 m ESE Oran, and 190 SW Algiers. Lon. 0 40 E, lat. 35 54 N.

Mascat, a seaport of Arabia Felix, and the chief town in the province of Oman, with an excellent harbour. It has a castle on a rock, and is very strong, both by nature and art, though the buildings are mean. It was taken, in 1508, by the Portuguese, who retained it for a century and a half. The cathedral, built by the Portuguese, is now the king's palace. There is no vegetation to be seen on the seacoast near it, and only a few date-trees in a valley at the back of the town, though the inhabitants have all things in plenty. The air is so hot from May to September, that no people are to be seen in the streets from ten till four. The bazars are covered with the leaves of date-trees, laid on beams which reach from the house tops on one side to those of the other. The religion of the inhabitants is Mohamedanism; and yet, contrary to the custom of the Turks, they suffer any one to go into their mosques. The products of the country are horses, dates, brimstone, coffee, and ruinosa, a root that dies red. Mafcat is seated at the foot of a range of mountains on a small bay of the Arabian sea. Lon. 57 26 E, lat. 23 30 N.

Mafham, a town in N Yorkshire, with a market on Tuesday, seated on the river Ure, 9 m NW Rippon, and 18 NNW London.

Mentz, a late archbishopric and electorate of Germany, in the circle of Lower Rhine; bounded on the N by Hassle and Wetteravia, E by Franconia, S by the palatinate of the Rhine, and W by the electorate of Treves. It produces much corn, fine garden fruits, and abundance of excellent wines. In 1798, this archbishopric and electorate, then the first state of the empire, was moved to Ratisbon, and all other bishoprics were secularized. In 1800, the small part of this territory lying on the left bank of the Rhine, including the city of Mentz, became subject to France; and the rest was given as indemnities to the neighbouring German princes.

Mentz, or Mayence, a city of France, capital of the department of Mont Tonnerre, and a bishop's see; lately a city of Germany, capital of the electorate of Mentz, and an archbishop's see. It is well fortified, and deemed to be a barrier fortress. The palace, called Martinsburg, is a considerable building, partly ancient and partly modern; and opposite the mouth of the Maine is a castle, called Favorita, with fine gardens and water-works. The university, founded in 1477, has lately received considerable improvements. Of the hospitals, that of St. Roch is worthy of notice for its printing-office and manufactures of stuffs and stockings. The city is built in an irregular manner, and plentifully provided with churches. In the cathedral, which is a gloomy fabric, is what they call a treasury, containing a number of clumsy jewels, some relics, and a rich wardrobe of sacerdotal vestments. Mentz is one of the towns which claim the invention of printing; and the growth of the best rhenish wine is limited to a circle of about 5 m round it. The French took this place by surprise in 1792; and the next year it stood a long blockade and siege before it surrendered to the allies. It was twice reattacked by the French in 1795, but they were defeated by the Austrians, who also relieved it from a blockade of two months, in 1796. They soon after resumed the siege, which continued till the signing of the treaty of Udina, in 1797, when it was taken possession of by the French. Mentz is seated on the Rhine, just below the influx of the Maine, and on the opposite side is the town of Cassel, connected with it by a bridge of boats. It is 22 m WSW Frankfort, and 70 E by N Treves. Lon. 8 10 E, lat. 49 58 N.

Mequinez, a city of the kingdom of Fez, and a capital of the empire of Morocco. It is seated in a delightful plain, having a serene and clear air; for which reason the emperor resides in this place in preference to Fez. The inhabitants are estimated at 110,000. In the middle of the city, the Jews have a place to themselves, the gates of which are locked every night, and guarded.

MER

Close by Mequinez, on the SW side, is a large Negro town, which takes up as much ground as the city, but the houses are not so high, nor so well built. The inhabitants are all blacks, or of a dark tawny colour; and hence the emperor recruits the soldiers for his court. The imperial palace stands on the S side, and is larger than that of Fez. The houses of Mequinez are very good, and the streets exceedingly narrow; but the light comes in at the back of the houses, where there is a square court, with a fountain in the middle if the house belong to a person of any rank. They are flat at the top; and the women, who live in the upper apartments, often visit each other from the tops of the houses. Their customs and manners are much the same as those of other Mohamedans; but they are much more affable than in the southern provinces. Mequinez is 40 m W Fez. Lon. 6° 0' W, lat. 33° 40' N.

Mexico, or New Spain, an extensive country of N America; bounded on the N by New Navarre, New Mexico, and countries unknown, E by Louisiana, the gulf of Mexico, the Caribbean sea, and Panama, S by the Pacific ocean, and W by the same and the gulf of California. It lies between 81 and 110 W lon. and extends from 7 to 32 N lat. being 2000 m long, and in the N part above 800 m broad, but it decreases thence considerably, and in some of the S parts is only from 40 to 120 broad. In general, it is a mountainous country, intermixed with many rich valleys; but the highest mountains are near the coast of the Pacific ocean, many of which are volcanos. The eastern shore is a flat country, full of impenetrable forests, with bogs and morasses, overflowed in the rainy season, which is from April to September. Although Mexico is within the torrid zone, the climate is temperate and healthy. No country abounds more with grain, fruits, roots, and vegetables; and it is singularly fertile in plants, which yield balsams, gums, resins, and oils. The mines produce sulphur, alum, vitriol, cinabar, ochre, quicksilver, iron, lead, tin, copper, silver, and gold. Diamonds are still found, though but few; and there are amethysts, cats-eyes, turquoises, cornelians, and some green stones not much inferior to emeralds. There are mountains of loadstone; and great abundance of the famous stone called itztil, which is semitransparent, of a glossy substance, and generally black, of which the Indians make looking-glasses, &c. there are also quarries of jasper, porphyry, and exquisite marble. Cochineal is almost peculiar to this country; its indigo and cocoa are superior to any in America; and its logwood has been long an important article of commerce. Among the quadrupeds are the puma, jaguar, bears, elks, wolves, foxes, deer, &c. The domestic animals of Europe, particularly horned cattle, have multiplied here with great rapidity; numbers of these now range over the vast plains, in herds of from 30 to 40,000, and are killed merely for the sake of their hides, which are annually exported, in vast quantities, to Europe. Birds are immensely numerous; above 200 species are peculiar to the country, and many of them superlatively beautiful for their plumage. The inhabitants consist of native Spaniards; Creoles, who are descendants of Spaniards; Mulattos, the issue of an European and an African slave; Metifs, born of an European and an Indian; Mestizes, the offspring of the Metifs; their descendants Terceroens, and Quateroens; after whom the fifth generation enjoys all the benefit of Creoles. New Spain is divided into three audiences, Guadalaxara, Mexico, and Guatimala; and subdivided into the following provinces: namely, Guadalaxara, Culiacan, Cinaloa, Sonora, New Biscay, and Zucatecas; Mexico, Mechoacan, Cohahuila, Texas, New Leon, Panuco, Tlascala, Guaxaca, Tabasco, and Jucatan; Guatimala, Soconusco, Chiapa, Vera Paz, Honduras, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Veragua. The whole country is governed by a viceroy.

Mexico, one of the three audiences of New Spain, and a province bounded on the N by Guasteca, E by Tlascala, S by the Pacific ocean, and W by Mechoacan. The greatest part of the province is mountainous; but there are immense plains and extensive vallies, the soil of which is so fruitful that all the necessaries of life are exceedingly reasonable, and its silver mines are richer than those of any other province. The richness of the country furnishes every article of commerce, and the roads, lakes, and rivers every requisite of domestic intercourse.

Mexico, the capital of the province and audience of Mexico, and of all New Spain. It was a flourishing city before the Spaniards entered the country, and was seated on several islands, in a salt-water lake, called Tezcuco, to which there was no entrance, but by three causeways, each 2 m long. The circuit of the city, exclusive of the suburbs, was 8 m; and it contained at least 50,000 houses, with several large temples, full of rich idols, and three palaces. Mexico was taken by Cortez, in 1521, after a siege of near three months. As the Mexicans defended themselves from street to street, it was almost ruined, but afterward rebuilt by the Spaniards. The streets are very spacious, and so exactly disposed, that in point of regularity it is the finest city in the world; and the great causeways and large avenues of elms and poplars leading to it, with the want of walls, gates, and artillery, render Mexico extremely remarkable. The great square in the centre of the city, and the public buildings, are magnificent: There are 34 public churches, and 36 monasteries and 29 nunneries, with each a church: of the riches of these an idea may be formed from the revenues of the grand cathedral amounting to 80,000l. a year, of which the archbishop has 20,000l.; and the great convent of St. Francis, from alms alone, possesses an annual revenue of near 21,000l. There are also a tribunal of the inquisition, a treasury, a mint, and a university. This city contains about 140,000 inhabitants; and though it has no communication with the sea, by navigable rivers, it carries on a great trade to Europe by Vera Cruz, and to Asia by Acapulco. In 1629, it suffered by an inundation, in which 40,000 persons were drowned. This induced the Spaniards to make a great conduit through a mountain, in order to empty the lake; by which, and other canals since done, the town is now seated on dry land, 2 m from the SW extremity of the lake. On this lake, and the fresh water lakes of Xochimilco and Chalco (which lie 6 m to the S of Tezcuco) are chinampas, or floating gardens; they are generally about 40 yards long and 15 broad, with less than a foot of elevation above the surface of the water, and are easily towed to a different station at the pleasure of the owner. Mexico is supplied with fresh water by two aqueducts; and at all seasons of the year is abundantly provided with all the gifts of nature, brought into it by means of canals. It is 180 m NNE Acapulco, and 200 W by N Vera Cruz. Lon. 99 6 W, lat. 19 26 N.

Mexico, New, a country of N America, bounded on the E by Louisiana, S by New Spain, and on other parts by unknown countries; extending along the Rio del Norte, from 30 to 41 N lat. and from 90 to 150 m in breadth. Great encomiums have been lavished on the fertility of its soil, and the variety of its valuable products; but it is generally deemed to be destitute of metallic wealth, except a few copper mines. The animals are deer, elk, buffalo, sheep, heeves, and horses. The mountainous district on the N border is deemed the highest land in this part of the continent, for hence issue the Rio del Norte, the Colorado, Arkansa, Platte, and other rivers, which flow in various directions. One of the mountains, near the source of the Arkansa, is found to be 10,581 feet above the plain through which the river flows, and the plain is supposed to be 8000 feet above the sea. The country is chiefly inhabited by the native Americans, hitherto unsubdued by the Spaniards. St. Fe is the capital.

Mexico, Gulf of, that part of the Atlantic ocean, on the coast of N America, bounded on the S and W by the audience of Mexico, and on the N by W and E Florida; the entrance lying to the E. between the S point of E Florida and the NE point of Jucatan.

Miami, Little and Great, two rivers of the state of Ohio, which run S into the Ohio, the former just above Columbia, and the latter 21 m below Cincinnati. The Little Miami is 60 m to its source, but generally so shallow as to afford no navigation. The Great Miami has a navigation, like the Muskingum, that approaches near the navigable waters of Lake Erie. The country between these two rivers is called the Miamis, and is reckoned among the richest belonging to the United States.

Michael, St. the most extensive and populous island of the Azores. It is 54 m long, and from 6 to 15 broad; and contains nearly 80,000 inhabitants. In a valley on the eastern side are a number of boiling fountains; also many sulphureous springs, some of a hot, and others of a cold temperature. In June 1811, one mile to the NW, where the sea was deep, a volcanic island arose with a tremendous eruption; and when it became quiescent, was from 200 to 300 feet high and a mile in circuit. It was named Sabrina, from the ship that first visited it; but in October following it gradually disappeared, leaving an extensive shoal. The principal towns are Punta del Guda and Villa Franca: the former is the capital of the island. Lon. 25 42 W, lat. 37 47 N.

Michigan, a territory of the United States of America. It includes the lake of the same name; and is bounded on the N by lake Superior, E by the lakes Huron, St. Clair, and Erie, S by the state of Ohio, and Indiana, and W by the territory of Illinois. This country, from its grand lakes, possesses immense advantages resulting from navigation and fisheries; but the soil is marshy and poor, and great part of it inundated for six months in the year. The number of inhabitants in 1810 was 5,485. The chief town is Detroit.

Michigan, a lake of N America, the largest that is wholly within the United States. It is 280 m long, and from 50 to 60 broad, and navigable for vessels of any burden. On the NW part the waters branch out into two bays, one to the N called Noquet Bay, the other to the S, Green Bay. This lake, at the NE extremity, communicates with the NW end of Lake Huron, by the strait of Michilimakinac.

Michilimakinac, a strait of N America, which unites the lakes Michigan and Huron. It is 6 m wide; and on its SE side, in Lake Huron, is an island, with a fort and village, of the same name. The fort was taken by the British in 1812. Lon. 84 30 W, lat. 45 48 N.

Middlesex, a county of England, bounded on the N by Hertfordshire, E by Essex, S by Kent and Surry, and W by Buckinghamshire. It is 22 m long and 17 broad, containing 190,080 acres; is divided into six hundreds, and 98 parishes, beside those in London and Westminster; has those two cities and six market-towns; and sends eight members to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 218,129 in 1801, and 953,276 in 1811. The air is healthy; but the soil, in general, being gravelly, is not naturally fertile; though by means of the vicinity to the metropolis many parts of it are converted into rich beds of manure, clothed almost with perpetual verdure. There are still, however, very extensive tracts of uncultivated heath. Beside the Thames, Lea, and Coln, which are its boundaries to the S, E, and W, Middlesex is watered by several small streams; one of which, called the New River, is artificially brought from near Hertford, for the purpose of supplying London with water.

Milan, or Milanese, a duchy of Italy, 150 m long and 78 broad; bounded on the N by Swisserland, E by Bergamasco, Mantua, and Parma, S by Parma and Genoa, and W by Piedmont. The soil is every where fertile in corn, wine, fruit, rice, and olives; and there are fine canals for the purpose of irrigation. Sheep are few and poor, but the cattle and cheese are excellent. Here are some mines of copper and lead. The rivers are the Sessia, Tesin, Adda, Oglio, and Po; and it is famous for lakes, the principal of which are those of Maggiore, Como, and Lugano. This country was subdued by the French in 1796, and formed the principal part of their Cisalpine republic. On the renewal of hostilities, in 1799, it was soon reconquered by the allies, and was again subject to the house of Austria. The French became masters of it again in 1800, after the battle of Marengo; and the W part, with Piedmont, was soon afterward annexed to France. See Piedmont.

Milan, a city of Italy, capital of the duchy of the same name, and the see of an archbishop. It was the ancient capital of Lombardy, and is now deemed the capital of the kingdom of Italy, Napoleon Bonaparte being here crowned king of Italy on May 26, 1805. The city is 10 m in circumference; but the garden grounds are so extensive, that it does not contain above 150,000 inhabitants. It stands in a plain between the rivers Adda and Tesin, which communicate with the city, by means of two canals. The town itself has no other fortifications than a high wall and ramparts; but the citadel, called Castello di Porta Zobbia, is a place of great strength. Here are 20 gates, a university, several colleges, many fine palaces, 230 churches, of which 96 are parochial, 90 convents, 100 religious fraternities, and a great number of hospitals. The cathedral is in the centre of the city, and next to St. Peter's at Rome, the most extensive in Italy, but not so lofty in the interior as that at Florence. This vast fabric is built entirely of white marble, supported by 52 columns; and in fret-work, carving, and statues, surpasses all churches in the universe. The most remarkable object in the interior is the subterranean chapel, in which is the tomb of St. Charles Borromeo; it is immediately under the dome, in form octangular, and lined with silver panels representing the principal actions of the life of this virtuous archbishop; and his body lies in a shrine of rock crystal, behind the altar, dressed in pontificals. The Ambrosian library contained 45,000 printed books, and 15,000 manuscripts; also a gallery of pictures, statues, and gems; but the latter, with the most valuable of the books and manuscripts, have been conveyed to Paris. Milan has considerable commerce in grain (especially rice) cattle, and cheese; and has manufactures of silk and velvet stuffs, stockings, handkerchiefs, ribands, gold and silver lace and embroideries, woollen and linen cloths, glass, porcelain, and curious works in steel, crystal, agate, hyacinths, and other gems. It has been many times taken in the wars that have desolated Italy. The French took it in 1796, and made it the seat of government of the Cisalpine republic. It was retaken by the Austrians and

The sides of the hills are stony, and yet there are tall trees, of kinds not known in Europe; some of the mountains yield very good gold, and the valleys are well watered with rivulets. It produces the bread-fruit trees, and all sorts of fruit proper to the climate, beside plenty of rice. Here are horses, beeves, buffalos, poultry, hogs, goats, deer, monkeys, guanas, bats of a large size, lizards, and snakes. The winds are easterly one part of the year, and westerly the other; while the former blow, it is fair weather; but while the latter, it is rainy, stormy, and tempestuous. In the s there is a volcano of constant eruption, which serves as a seamark; and near the centre is a lake, called Lano, about 60 m in circumference. The Spaniards have some settlements on the coasts, of which Sambuang in the w extremity is the chief. The island is governed by a sultan, who is absolute. The natives, called Karaforas, are of a mean low stature, with small limbs and little heads. Their faces are oval, with flat foreheads, black small eyes, short low noses, and large mouths. Their hair is black and straight, and their complexion tawny, but more inclined to yellow than that of other

Mississippi, a large river of N America, which separates the United States and W Florida from Louisiana. Its source is from the E side of Red Cedar lake, in lon. 95 2 w, lat. 47 28 N; and its length thence to the gulf of Mexico is about 3000 miles. The tributary streams are numerous, the largest of which are the Missouri and Arkanza from the w, and the Illinois and Ohio from the e. The general course of the Mississippi is from n to s; below the influx of the Ohio it is exceedingly crooked, and in it are many small islands. The water of this river is clear till it receives the Missouri. It is navigable, without any material obstructions, to St. Anthony Falls, in lat. 44, where the stream, more than 600 yards wide, falls perpendicularly 16 feet; and the rapid below, in the space of 300 yards, renders the descent 58 feet more, and the width is here contracted to 210 yards. Above these falls the river is confined between high hills, and has a number of rapids and hard ripples, caused by rocks and islands. Higher up, the country is more open, with fine meadows, to the fall of Pakagama in lat. 47 18, which has a thoot 20 yards wide and 20 feet deep over a flat rock. On both sides the river are salt springs, which produce excellent salt; and the adjacent country is equal in goodness to any in N America. It enters the gulf of Mexico by four mouths; the principal one, which is the s e pass, at the island of Balaité.

Missouri, a large river of Louisiana, formed by the junction of three streams in lon. 110 5 w, lat. 45 23 N. It flows upward of 3000 m in a very flexious s e direction, to the Mississippi, which it joins in lon. 90 0, lat. 38 55, but there is a broader and deeper river, and in fact the principal stream. In 1804-5, by direction of the government of the United States, it was ascended its whole length by captains Lewis and Clarke, who gave the names of Jefferson, Madison, and Gallatin to the three rivers that form the head of the Missouri; and they ascended Jefferson to its source 105 m, 80 of which is navigable for canoes. The Missouri is deep and rapid, and receives numerous rivers in its course, many of them of considerable extent. It contains many islands and sandbanks, and some rapids; and about 2300 m up are some cascades and falls; the first and largest fall 98 feet, and the whole 363 feet in the space of 17 m. The banks, except a sterile district below the falls, are in general rich and beautiful; in some parts are extensive meadows, with hills beyond them covered with trees; in others, lower down, are long chains of high hills of a dark colour, great quantities of which are washed into the river by rains, and the force of the current, which causes a muddiness that never subsides. If this river be regarded as the chief river that constitutes what is called the Mississippi, the Missouri will be above 4200 m in length.

Mistassin Lake, a lake of New Britain, lying E of the s part of James bay, and surrounded by mountains called the Great Mistassins. On each of the points of land, which enclose the road, is a fort; but they are wretched structures. The town is of a circular form, surrounded by a wall, in which are six gates. It carries on a great trade, especially in coffee; and the inhabitants are computed at 18,000, without including the Jews, who inhabit the suburbs. The women, except a small number of the common sort, never appear in the streets in the daytime, but visit each other in the evening; they have little buskins of morocco leather; and over their dress they wear a large veil of painted calico. The British, from Hindoostan, at present engross almost exclusively the trade of this place. It stands in a barren plain, 140 m ssw Sans, and 630 sse Mecca. Lon. 44 25 E, lat. 13 10 N.

Tidore, Motir, Machian, and Bachian: the last five, lying w of Gilolo, are the original Moluccas strictly so called; but the appellation is now extended. Except Gilolo, they produce neither corn, rice, nor cattle, but have oranges, lemons, and other fruits; and are most remarkable for spices, especially cloves and nutmegs. They have large snakes, and very dangerous land crocodiles. On the shores there are large rocks of coral, of great variety and beauty. The natives are idolaters; but there are many Mohammedans. They were discovered in 1511, by the Portuguese, who formed some settlements; but the Dutch drove them away, about the year 1607. By a treaty in 1619, the English had one third of the produce, and the Dutch two thirds; but in three years after, the latter forged a plot of the English against their lives and liberties, and put them to death by the most exquisite tortures. The chief settlement of the Dutch was in Amboyna.

Motuwitz, a town of Silesia, in the principality of Brieg, famous for a battle gained by the Prussians over the Austrians in 1741. It is 4 m w Brieg.

Mombaza, a city on the coast of Zanguebar. It was seated on a peninsula, which has been since turned into an island, by cutting a canal through the isthmus. It is defended by a strong citadel, has a commodious harbour for large vessels, and carries on a great commerce with the islands and kingdoms adjacent. Hence the Portuguese export slaves, gold, ivory, rice, flesh, and other provisions, with which they supply the settlements in Brasil. The king of Melinda, being a Christian, had a quarrel with the Portuguese governor, took the castle by assault, turned Mohammedan, and murdered all the Christians, in 1631; but, in 1729, the Portuguese became masters of this territory again. Mombaza is 75 m ssw Melinda. Lon. 39 30 E, lat. 3 15 S.

Monguls, Country of the, or Western Chinese Tartary, a region in the interior of Asia, bounded on the N by Siberia, E by Eastern Tartary, S by the great wall of China and Leao-tonz, and W by Independent Tartary. The Mongul Tartars have neither towns, villages, nor houses; they are wandering hordes, and live under tents, which they remove from one place to another, according as the different seasons, or the wants of their flocks, require: they pass the summer on the banks of rivers, and the winter at the foot of some mountain, which shelters them from the cutting N wind. They are naturally clownish, and dirty in their dress, as well as in their tents, where they live amid the dung of their flocks, which, when dried, they use for fuel. They choose rather to be satisfied with the food that their flocks supply, than take the trouble of cultivating the earth: it even appears that they neglect agriculture from pride. During the summer, they live only on milk, using without distinction that of the cow, mare, ewe, goat, and camel. Their ordinary drink is warm water, in which a little coarse tea has been infused; with this they mix cream, milk, or butter, according to their circumstances. They have also a method of making a kind of spirituous liquor of four milk, especially of that of the mare. The Monguls are free, open and sincere. They pride themselves chiefly on their dexterity in handling the bow and arrow, mounting on horseback, and hunting wild beasts. Polygamy is permitted among them; but they generally have only one wife. They burn the bodies of their dead, and carry the ashes to eminences, where they inter them, and cover the grave with a heap of stones, over which they plant a great number of small standards. They are unacquainted with the use of money, and trade only by barter. Although the Monguls might appropriate to themselves the spoils of a great number of animals, the skins which they use for clothing are generally those of their sheep, and they wear the wool inmost. The religion of the Mongul Tartars is confined to the worship of Fo. They have the most superstitious veneration for their lamas, who are clownish, ignorant, and licentious priests, to whom they attribute the power of calling down hail or rain: to these lamas they give the most valuable of their effects in return for prayers, which they go about reciting from tent to tent. These people are very devout, and continually wear hanging at their necks a kind of chaplet, over which they say their prayers. All the Monguls are governed by khans, or particular princes, independent of each other; but all subject to the emperor of China, whom they consider as the grand khan of the Tartars. nese government may be divided into four principal tribes, which are the Monguls, properly so called, the Kalkas, the Ortous, and the Tartars of Kokonor.

Monheim, a town of Bavaria, in the principality of Neuburg, 8 m n Donawert.

Monikenaam, a seaport of N Holland, which has manufactures of soap and silk. It is seated on a gut or frith of the Zuider zee. 8 m NE Amsterdam. Lon. 4 38 E, lat. 52 28 N.

Monistr. l., a town of France, in the department of Upper Loire, 14 m sw St. Etienne.

Monmouth, a town of New Jersey. See Freehold.

Monmouth, a town of the district of Maine, in Lincoln county, on the E side of the Androscoggin, 15 m w by s Harrington, and 48 n Portland.

Monmouth, a borough of England, capital of Monmouthshire, with a market on Saturday. It is governed by a mayor, and seated on the Monnow, which here joins the Wye. Over the former is a very ancient bridge and gateway, once a barrier against the Welsh. It was formerly defended by a wall and a ditch, and in the centre is a castle in ruins. Here was born the warlike Henry V, called Henry of Monmouth. It contains two parish-churches, one of them engrafted on part of the ruins of a priory, and both are curious structures. The number of inhabitants was 3345 in 1801, and 3503 in 1811. The town has no manufactures; but there are iron and tin works in the neighbourhood, and some trade is carried on with Hertford and Bristol by the Wye. It is 18 m s Hereford, and 129 w by N London. Lon. 2 46 w, lat. 51 49 N.

Monmouthshire, a county of England, bounded on the N by Herefordshire, E by Gloucestershire, SE by the mouth of the Severn, and w and sw by the counties of Brecknock and Glamorgan. It is 24 m long and 20 broad, containing 330,220 acres; is divided into six hundreds, and 122 parishes; has seven market-towns; and sends three members to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 45,582 in 1801, and 65,127 in 1811. Beside the Wye, which parts it from Gloucestershire, the Monnow, which separates it from Herefordshire, and the Rhyney, or Rumney, which divides it from Glamorganshire, this county has almost peculiar to itself the river Usk, which divides it into two unequal portions. The eastern part, and the largest, is a tract fertile in corn and pasture, and well wooded; and it abounds with limestone, coal, and iron. The western portion is mountainous, and, in great part, unfavorable for cultivation; whence it is devoted to the feeding of sheep and goats. Monmouthshire was formerly reckoned one of the counties of Wales; and from the names of its towns and villages, its mountainous rugged surface, and its situation beyond the Wye, which seems to form a natural boundary between England and Wales in this part, it certainly partakes mostly of the character of the latter country, though now comprehended in the civil division of the former. The higher ranks generally speak English, but the common people use the Welsh language. The chief manufacture of this county is flannels.

Monomugi, or Nimeama, a region in the interior of Africa, said to be of vast extent, bounded on the N by Abyssinia, E by Zanguebar, S by Mocaranga, and W by Congo. This country is very little known to the Europeans.

Monomotapa; see Mocaranga.

Monongahela, a river of the United States, which rises in Virginia, at the foot of Laurel mountain, flows N by Morgantown, where it becomes navigable, then enters Pennsylvania, and passes by Redstone to Pittsburgh, where it joins the Allegany, and their united stream assumes the name of Ohio.

Monopoli, a town of Naples, in Terra di Bari, on the coast of the gulf of Venice, 28 m ESE Bari.

Monpazier, a town of France, in the department of Dordogne, 18 m sw Sarlat.

Monquegna, or Monquega, a town of Peru, in the bishopric of Arequipa, and capital of a territory of its name, adorned with large vineyards. Its whole commerce is in wine and brandy, which are greatly valued. It is 100 m SE Arequipa. Lon. 71 40 E, lat. 17 34 S.

Monreale, a town of Sicily, in Val di Mazara, and an archbishop's see. The cathedral is very spacious, and richly ornamented; but it suffered considerably by a fire in 1811, and its rich funds are now applying to restore the damages done. Near it is the famous convent of St. Martino, so richly decorated that it might be deemed a superb palace. The town is neatly built, and stands on a lofty hill, 4 m w by s Palermo.

Mons, a strong city of the Netherlands, lately the capital of Austrian Hainault, and now the capital of the department of Jemappe. The most remarkable buildings are the castle, the arsenal, the townhouse, and the great church. It is a place of good trade, has considerable manufactures of woollen stuffs, and contains 25,000 inhabitants. Mons has been several times taken by the French, Dutch, and Austrians; the last time by the French in 1792, after the battle of Jemappe. It stands partly on a hill, and partly on a plain, on the river Trouille, 30 m ssw Brussels. Lon. 3 57 E, lat. 50 27 N.

Monfaraz, a town of Portugal, in Alentejo, seated on the Guadiana. 25 m sw Elvas.

Monfisi, a town of Guinea, in the country of Anziko, and the residence of the micoco, or king. It is 380 m NE St. Salvador. Lon. 17 16 E, lat. 4 40 S.

Monstiers; see Moustiers.

Mont Blanc, a mountain of the Pennine Alps, in Savoy, so called from its white appearance. It is 15,662 feet above the level of the sea, and supposed to be the highest in Europe. The French have given the name of this mountain to the conquered duchy of Savoy, as a new department of France.

Mont de Marfan, a town of France, capital of the department of Landes. It is seated on the Midouse, 30 m NE Dax. Lon. 0 30 W, lat. 43 55 N.

Mont St. Michel, a strong town of France, in the department of Manche, built on a rock in the sea, which is accessible at low water. Its late Benedictine abbey served at once for a castle of defence, and a state prison; and the prior of it was governor of the town. This place gave name to the military order of St. Michel, founded by Louis XI. It is 10 m sw Avanches. Lon. 1 30 W, lat. 48 37 N.

Mont Tonnerre, a new department of France, including part of the electorate of Mentz, the palatinate of the Rhine, and the duchy of Deux Ponts. It has its name from a ridge of mountains, near the Rhine, and the capital is Mentz.

Montabaur, a town of Germany, in the late electorate of Treves, with a fine palace, 7 m N Nassau.

Montagu Island, one of the New Hebrides, in the Pacific ocean, near Sandwich island. Lon. 168 31 E, lat. 17 26 S.

Montgats, or Munkats, a town of Lower Hungary, in the county of Perczas, with a fortress composed of three castles, seated on a craggy rock. It is encompassed by a great morais; and nature and art have rendered it almost impregnable. It was defended three years by the princess Ragotsky, wife of count Tekeli, when besieged by the Austrians, to whom it surrendered in 1688. It is 52 m ESE Cassovia. Lon. 27 55 E, lat. 48 26 N.

Montgomery, a town of Maryland, chief of a county of the same name. It is 12 m N Washington, and 23 SW Baltimore.

Montgomery, a borough of Wales, capital of Montgomeryshire, with a market on Thursday. It had walls and a castle, which were demolished in the civil wars, and is now a small place. The inhabitants were 972 in 1801, and 932 in 1811. It stands on the side of a hill, near the river Severn, 24 m SW Shrewsbury, and 168 NW London. Lon. 3 5 W, lat. 52 26 N.

Montgomeryshire, a county of Wales, bounded on the N by Merionethshire and Deabighshire, NE and E by Shropshire, S by Radnorshire, SW by Cardigan-shire, and W by Merionethshire. It is 36 m long and 34 broad, containing 628,480 acres; is divided into nine hundreds, and 53 parishes; has five market-towns; and sends two members to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 47,978 in 1801, and 51,931 in 1811. Though barren and mountainous in many parts, it has a greater mixture of fertile vale and plain than several of the Welsh counties. Its riches proceed from sheep and wool, the hilly tracts being almost entirely sheep-walks; and the flocks are driven from distant parts to feed on them during the summer. This county also affords mineral treasures, particularly lead, and it abounds with slate and lime; but there is no coal. The principal rivers are the Severn, Vyrnwy, and Tannat. The assizes are held at Welshpool.

Montmorillon, a town of France, in the department of Vienne, seated on the Gartempe, over which is a bridge, 25 m SE Poitiers.

Montpellier, a city of France, capital of the department of Herault, and a bishop's see, with a citadel, and a university, in which is a school of medicine. The cathedral was ruined by the Huguenots, but has been partly rebuilt. The trade consists in silks, blankets, carpets, cotton goods, printed calicos, gauzes, hides, cordials, perfumed waters, and verdigrise. The air is extremely healthy, and many invalids resort hither, from all parts, to recover their health. Montpellier is seated on a hill, 5 m from the Mediterranean, near the Lez, a small navigable river, and on the rivulet Merdanson, which is conveyed into different parts of the city, by subterranean canals. It is 27 m SW Nîmes, and 47 NE Narbonne. Lon. 3 52 E, lat. 43 36 N.

Montpensier, a town of France, in the department of Loir de Dome, 20 m NE Clermont.

Montreal, a fertile island of Lower Canada, in the river St. Lawrence, at the influx of the Utawas. It is 28 m long and 10 broad; and takes the name of a very lofty mountain, called Mont Real by the French, situate in the middle of the island, and covered with trees and shrubs, except toward its base, where some parts have been cleared and cultivated.

Montreal, a city of Lower Canada, the next in rank to Quebec, situate on the E side of the island of the same name. The lower part of it extends along the St. Lawrence, which is here 3 m broad, and ships can lie close to the shore, which is elevated, and forms a wharf. From the river there is a gradual ascent to what is called the upper town, in which is the cathedral, the English church, a spacious court-house, and the government house. The inhabitants were estimated at 12,000 in 1806; but the fortifications and walls of the city being now demolished, it is improving in extension. The chief commerce is in furs, which are sent to England; and it is the emporium of the trade carried on between Great Britain and the United States. Goods and merchandise for the upper country are carted hence to the village of Chine, 8 m higher up the river, where they are put on board batteaux; the navigation of the river, 4 m above the city, being interrupted by the rapids of St. Louis. Montreal was surrendered by the French to the Montreuil, a strong town of France, in the department of Pas de Calais, seated on a hill, near the mouth of the Canche, 36 m S Calais, and 42 WNW Arras.

Montreuil Bellay, a town of France, in the department of Mayenne and Loire, seated on the Louet, 10 m SSW Saumur.

Montriehard, a town of France, in the department of Loir and Cher, with a castle, seated near the Cher, 12 m SE Amboise.

Montrose, a borough and seaport of Scotland, in Forfarshire, at the mouth of the S Esk, over which is a bridge. See Inchbrayock. A little above the town the river expands into a wide lake, called the Basin, into which the tide flows, that at high water the town is almost surrounded by the sea. The harbour is very commodious, and has a dry and wet dock. A great quantity of malt is made here, and there are considerable manufactures of canvas, ropes, sheeting, linen, and thread. The salmon fisheries of the N and S Esk form a valuable branch of commerce. The number of inhabitants was 7974 in 1801, and 8955 in 1811. At this place the Pretender landed in December 1715, and embarked in February following. Montrose is 28 m NE Dundee. Lon. 2 22 W, lat. 56 41 N.

Montsaujeon, a town of France, in the department of Upper Marne, 15 m S Langres.

Montserrat, a mountain of Spain, in Catalonia, about 12 m in circumference, and 3300 feet above the level of the sea, towering over a hilly country, like a pile of Gothic spires. On it is a large monastery, with a chapel, dedicated to the Virgin, resorted to by numbers of pilgrims. It is inhabited by noble Benedictine monks of several nations, who entertain all that come out of devotion or curiosity, for three days, gratis. Here are also thirteen hermitages, in romantic situations: the most beautiful is that of Santa Ana, the residence of the father of all the hermits.

or mountain vicar. In 1808, the French made two attacks on this mountain, but were defeated by the monks and peasantry; and in a third attack, early in 1809, they succeeded in entering the monastery, but were forced to retreat the next morning. In 1811, they again obtained possession, but soon afterward evacuated it, having first burned the church, and every thing that might be useful to a re-establishment of this important point. It is 24 m NW Barcelona.

Montferrat, one of the leeward Carribe islands, discovered by Columbus, and so named by him from its resemblance to the mountain mentioned in the preceding article. It is of an oval form, 9 m long and 7 broad. The hills are covered with cedar and other trees; and the chief exports are sugar, rum, and cotton. It belongs to the English, and is 30 m SW Antigua. Lon. 62 17 W, lat. 16 45 N.

Montzingen, a town of France, in the department of Rhine and Moselle, lately of Germany, in the circle of Upper Rhine; seated on the Nahe, 13 m W by S Creutznach.

Monza, a town of Italy, in Milanese. It is famous for the treasury of St. John the baptist; where, among other things, is the iron crown with which the ancient Italian kings were crowned, and afterward the emperors of Germany whenever they were disposed to assert their rights, as kings of Lombardy. Charlemagne was crowned here in 774, after taking Desiderius king of Lombardy prisoner. It is seated on the Lambro, 8 m NE Milan.

Moravia, a marquisate of Germany, bounded on the W by Bohemia, N by Silesia, E by Hungary; and S by Austria. It is a mountainous country, yet very fertile and populous, and watered by a great number of rivers and brooks. More corn is grown than the inhabitants consume; and it produces much hemp and flax. The principal manufactures are cloth, iron, glass, paper, and gunpowder. From this country a sect of Christians, called Moravians, take their name, their doctrines having been first taught here; but the inhabitants in general are Roman catholics. This marquisate belongs to the kingdom of Bohemia, but has its own form of government; and is divided into seven circles, Olmutz, Brun, Iglau, Znaym, Hradisch, Prerau, and Teschen, so called Morlachie, a mountainous country in Hungarian Dalmatia, the inhabitants of which are called Morlacks, or Morlachi. They inhabit the pleasant valleys of Koter, along the rivers Kerha, Cetina, Narenta, and among the inland mountains of Dalmatia. They are said, by some, to be of Wallachian extraction; but others think their origin involved in the darkness of the barbarous ages. The inhabitants of the seacoast of Dalmatia tell many stories of their avarice and cruelty; but if any such events have happened, they ought to be ascribed to the corruption of a few individuals, for the most pleasing trait of character among the Morlachi is friendship. They have even made it a kind of religious article; for the Slavonian ritual contains a particular benediction, for the solemn union of two male, or two female friends, in the presence of the congregation. The Morlachi are extremely sensible of mild treatment, and when they meet with it are ready to perform every possible service; but are implacable if injured or insulted. Their hospitality is equally conspicuous among the poor, as among the opulent; nor is their generosity confined to strangers, but extends itself to all who are in want. They have very singular ideas about religion, and the ignorance of their teachers daily augments this monstrous evil: they are as firmly persuaded of the reality of witches, fairies, enchantments, nocturnal apparitions, and fortileges, as if they had seen a thousand examples of them. Segna is the capital.

Morlair, a town of France, in the department of Finisterre, with a castle and a tide harbour. The church of Notre Dame is a singular structure, and the hospital very handsome. Morocco, or Marocco, an empire of Africa, comprehending a considerable part of the ancient Mauritania, lying between 28 and 36 N lat. It is bounded on the W by the Atlantic, N by the Mediterranean, E by Algiers and Tafi-let, and S by Darah. Its greatest length is above 600 m, and from 200 to 380 in breadth. The three grand divisions of the empire are the kingdoms of Sus, Morocco Proper, and Fez. The soil, though sandy and dry in some places, is fertile in others; and the fruits, as well as the pastures, are excellent, but the country is not properly cultivated. The inhabitants are Mohamedans, of a tawny complexion, robust, and very skilful in managing a horse, and wielding a lance: they are jealous, deceitful, superstitious, and cruel. There are two sorts of inhabitants; the Arabs, who dwell in moveable villages, composed of about 100 tents; and the Bereberies, who are the ancient inhabitants, and live in cities and towns. There are a great number of christian slaves, and some merchants upon the coast, beside a multitude of Jews, who carry on almost all the trade; especially by land with the Negros, to whom they send large caravans, which travel over vast deserts almost destitute of water. They carry with them woollen goods, silk, salt, &c. and in return, have slaves, gold-dust, and elephants teeth. They also send large caravans to Mecca every year, partly out of devotion, and partly for trade, consisting of several thousand camels, horses, and mules. Beside woollen goods, their commodities are Morocco leather, indigo, cochineal, and ostriches feathers; in return for which they have silks, muslins, calicos, coffee, and drugs. In the deserts are lions, tigers, leopards, hyenas, and serpents of several kinds. The fruits are dates, figs, almonds, lemons, oranges, pomegranates, and many others. There is also flax and hemp, but little timber. The emperor is absolute, his will being a law, and he often exercises great cruelties. His naval force consists chiefly of rovers, who now and then take large prizes. He can bring 100,000 men into the field, half of which are foot and half horse; but they are poorly armed, and know little of the art of war.

Morocco, a city of the kingdom of Morocco, seated in a beautiful plain, formed by a chain of mountains on the N, and those of Atlas on the S and E. Though one of the capitals of the empire (for there are two others, Mequinez and Fez) it has nothing to recommend it but its great extent and the royal palace, in which the emperor spends the fast-days during the months of October and November. The mosques, caravan-serais, public baths, squares, and palaces of the sheriffs are numerous, but in a state of dilapidation. The best houses are enclosed in gardens; but the generality of them, with the ruins of many, serve only to impress the traveller with the idea of a miserable and deserted city. The inhabitants are estimated at 270,000, little more than a third of the number it contained before the court was removed to Fez and Mequinez. The Jews, who are numerous, have a separate town, walled in, and under the charge of an alcaid, appointed by the emperor. It has two gates, which are regularly shut every evening at nine; after which no person can enter or depart, till they are opened the next morning. They have a market of their own; and when they enter a Moorish town, market, or palace, they are compelled to be barefooted. Morocco is 90 m E Mogador, and 400 s Gibraltar. Mofambique, a strait or channel of the Indian ocean, between the coast of Africa and the island of Madagascar. It is narrowest in the middle, where it is 240 m over; and in this part, on the continent, is a kingdom, island, and city of the same name.

Mofambique, a kingdom on the coast of Caffreria, opposite the island of Madagascar. The capital is of the same name, situate on an island, chief of three islands that form a part of the kingdom. The largest, called Mofambique, is not more than 3 m in length, and half as much in breadth, and is about 2 m from the continent. The other two, called St. George and St. James, lie on each side of it, facing the continent. The islands are in general sandy, but in some parts produce citrons, oranges, and other fruits. The soil on the continent is luxuriant and fertile in rice, millet, fruit, pulse, roots, and other esculents; and it feeds vast quantities of cattle, large and small, particularly sheep with large tails. Here are wild beasts of various kinds, as stags, boars, and elephants, which last are so fierce and destructive, that the inhabitants are obliged to kindle large fires round their sown fields, to prevent their being devoured by them. The country is also rich in gold, which is washed down by the rivers in great quantities, and makes a chief part of its commerce. Ivory, ebony, slaves, and cattle, are likewise changed for European goods. The natives stand in awe of the Portuguese, who are the only Europeans admitted into some of their ports, whence they export the commodities already mentioned, also silver, copper, and wax. The city of Mofambique is said to be very handsome, and the buildings well constructed, especially the churches and convents; and the fort or castle is about a musket shot from the city. The fort belongs to the Portuguese, who have generally a good garrison here, a well stored magazine, and a large hospital for sick sailors. Their ships always call here in going to the E Indies; and the harbour is so commodious, that whole fleets may anchor and provide themselves with all necessaries. Lon. 41 8 E, lat. 15 5 S.

Moscow; see Russia.

Moscow, or Moskov, formerly a duchy, but now a government of Russia; bounded on the N by the government of Tver, E by that of great Volodimir, S by the governments of Kalugo and Refan, and W by those of Tver and Smolensko. It is a fruitful country, and produces abundance of asparagus.

Moscow, a city of Russia, capital of the government of Moscow, and formerly of the whole empire. It is the largest city in Europe; the circuit, within the rampart that encloses the suburbs, being 26 m; but the population does not correspond with the extent. It contains within the ramparts 250,000 souls, and is still the most populous city in the empire, notwithstanding the residence of the court is at Petersburg. Moscow is distributed into five divisions; the Kremlin, Khitaigorod, Bielgorod, Semlainogorod, and Sloboda. The Kremlin is in the central and highest part of the city, surrounded by high walls of stone and brick, 2 m in circumference. This division is not deformed by wooden houses. It contains the ancient palace of the czars, now only remarkable for being the birthplace of Peter the great; also the cathedral with seven towers, several churches with beautiful spires, two convents, the patriarchal palace, and the arsenal. The Khitaigorod is much larger than the Kremlin; it contains the university, the printing-house, and many other public buildings, with all the tradesmen's shops. The houses are mostly stuccoed or white-washed; and it has the only street in Moscow in which the houses stand close to each other. The Bielgorod, or White Town, runs round the two preceding divisions; it takes its name from a white wall, by which it was formerly surrounded. The Semlainogorod environs all the other three divisions, and is so denominated from a circular rampart of earth by which it is encompassed. The last two divisions exhibit a grotesque group of churches, convents, palaces, brick and wooden houses, and mean hovels. The Sloboda, or suburbs, form a vast exterior circle round all the parts already described, and are invested by a low rampart and ditch. These suburbs contain, beside buildings of all kinds, orchards, gardens, corn-fields, much open pasture, and some small lakes, which give rise to the Neghva. The Moskva, from which the city takes its name, flows through it in a winding channel; but, excepting in spring, is only navigable for rafts. It receives the Youfa in the Semlainogorod, and the Neghva at the western extremity of the Kremlin; but the beds of both these rivulets are nearly dry in summer. Moscow exhibits an astonishing degree of extent and variety, irregularity, and contrast; some parts have the appearance of a sequestered desert; others, of a populous town; some, of a contemptible village; others, of a great capital. The streets, in general, are very long and broad: some of them are paved; others, particularly in the suburbs, are formed with trunks of trees, or are boarded with planks like the floor of a room. The places of divine worship, including chapels, amount to above 1500; of these, 484 are public churches, some built of brick, stuccoed or white-washed, but the greater part are of wood, painted red; some have domes of copper, others of tin, gilt or painted green, and many are roofed with wood. They are richly ornamented within; and the pictures of the saints are decorated with gold, silver, and precious stones. Some of their bells are of a stupendous size: they hang in bellfries detached from the church, are fixed immovably to the beams, and rung by a rope tied to the clapper. Boris Gudenus gave a bell of 336,000 pounds of Moscow; and a bell that weighs 22,000 lbs, which is the largest bell in the world, and which is the last remains of the old bell-casting, and a trial from its perishing bell is visited by it with superstition. 336,000 pounds weight to the cathedral of Moscow; and empress Ann founded a bell that weighed 443,000 pounds, which is the largest in the world. This bell remains in the pit where it was cast, and a triangular piece is broken off from its periphery; on festival days this bell is visited by the natives, who regard it with superstitious veneration. In the cathedral of St. Michael, the sovereigns of Russia were formerly interred: their bodies are deposited in raised sepulchres, mostly of brick, in the shape of a coffin, above the pavement. Each tomb has, at the lower extremity, a silver plate containing the name of the prince and the time of his death; on great festivals they are all covered with palls of gold or silver brocade, studded with pearls and jewels. The cathedral of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary is the most magnificent in the city, and has been long appropriated to the coronation of the Russian sovereigns. The foundling-hospital, founded by Catherine II, is an immense pile of building, of a quadrangular shape, and will contain 8000 foundlings. Two m N of the city is the palace of Petrovsky, the residence of Russian sovereigns during their visits to Moscow: it is a large edifice of brick-work, and has an appearance of great magnificence, but the style of architecture is cumbersome and heavy. Moscow was entered by the French under Bonaparte, Sept. 14, 1812; prince Kutusoff having destroyed the magazines, and settled other matters, previous to its evacuation. On the entry of the French, a dreadful conflict ensued between them and the remaining inhabitants and troops, who set the city on fire in all quarters, and the wooden houses continued burning to the 21st, when little remained except the Kremlin. Bonaparte, after a severe affair of out-posts on Oct. 4, finding it impossible to subsist in the city, attempted a negotiation, which was refused with disdain by Kutusoff, who had made a flank movement with his army 40 m to the s. The whole French army was on its retreat on the 18th, except a garrison left in the Kremlin, which was forced on the 22d, and the Russians regained possession. Moscow is the centre of the inland commerce of Russia, particularly connecting the trade between Europe and Siberia. The navigation to this city is formed by the Moskva, which flows into the Oeca, near Kolomna, and that river communicates with the Volga; and also by a canal to the Don, which river communicates with the sea of Asoph.

Mosquito Shore, a country of New Spain, on the Atlantic ocean, containing the eastern part of the provinces of Honduras and Nicaragua. In magnitude it exceeds Portugal; is well watered by navigable rivers and lakes; abounds in fish, game, and provisions of all sorts; furnishes every necessary for raising cattle and stock; and clothed with woods producing timber for every purpose at land or sea. The soil is superior to that of the W India islands; the climate is more salubrious; and the destructive ravages of hurricanes and earthquakes have never been known here. The Mosquito Indians are so situated between morasses and inaccessible mountains, and a coast full of rocks and shoals, that no attempts against them by the Spaniards, whom they mortally hate, could ever succeed. When the duke of Albemarle was governor of Jamaica, they spontaneously put themselves under the protection of Great Britain, and their king received a commission from his grace, after which time, they were steady in their alliance with the English, and useful to them on many occasions. But this connexion no longer subsists; for by a convention with Spain, in 1786, the English, in consideration of certain cessions on the coast of Yucatan, agreed to evacuate this country.

Mosul, a city of Asiatic Turkey, in Diarbek, surrounded by high walls, and defended by a castle and citadel. The houses are in several places gone to ruin; but it has a great trade, particularly in cloth, and all sorts of cottons and silks. At some distance is a mosque, in which they pretend the prophet Jonah lies; and they believe this town stands on the site of the ancient Nineveh. The inhabitants are Mohamedans; but there are a great number of Christians. In 1743, it sustained a siege by the Persians. In 1778, the city and adjacent country were visited by a dreadful famine, in consequence of the preceding hard winter, and of the innumerable locusts by which the fruits of the earth were destroyed. principality. The chief rivers are the Ems, Lippe, Vecht, and Berkel. The country is level, with some agreeable heights, but no mountains; and it has fruitful plains, fine woods, extensive heaths that feed many cattle, and good quarries of stone. In 1802, the bishopric was secularised, and given as an indemnity to the king of Prussia, by whom, at the peace of Tilsit, it was ceded to Westphalia.

Munster, a considerable city, capital of the principality of the same name, and of all Westphalia. It is environed with double ditches and ramparts, and had also a strong citadel, which was demolished in 1765, and replaced by a magnificent palace. The cathedral, the library of the chapter, and many antiquities are worthy of notice. In 1535, a tailor, called John of Leyden, king of the anabaptists, made himself master of the city; but it was retaken in 1536, after 14 months siege, and this fanatic was tortured to death with red-hot pincers. The famous treaty, called the treaty of Westphalia, was concluded here in 1648, which ended the religious wars of 30 years continuance. In the war of 1756 this city sustained several sieges, and was taken in 1759. It is seated on the Aa, 50 m ENE Wesel, and 52 WNW Paderborn. Lon. 7 49 E, lat. 51 55 N.

Mysore, a country in the peninsula of Hindoostan, lying between the w and e ridges of the Gauts. It extends from 11 30 to 15 0 n lat. and in the w part from 74 55 to 78 35 w lon. but diminishing thence as it approaches the s till it ends in a point. The n side is extremely irregular and indented, and the middle part branches out above a degree beyond that to the s. The country is in general dry, rugged, mountainous, and barren; but there are several rivers and mountain torrents, which by artificial means serve to water rice-grounds, gardens, &c. In the forests are many elephants, and tigers are common. Oxen, buffalos, and goats are numerous, and in the ne part many sheep are bred; but horses and asses are few. The chief products are rice, cotton, pepper, cocoa and betel-nut, sugar-cane, butter, and oil. The whole of this country, with some other territories to the n and e, and the provinces of Coimbatore, Malabar, and Canara, were subdued by Hyder Ally, a Mooselmin, who usurped the throne of Mysore, in 1759, and made Seringapatam his capital. He was succeeded by Tippoo Sultaun, who continued his father's state of warfare. On the termination of a war in 1792, Tippoo agreed to pay 30 lacks of rupees, and to cede one half of his dominions to the British and their allies, the Mahrattas and the nizam of the Deccan. In 1799 a new war taking place, his capital was taken by the British, and himself killed in the assault. A partition of his remaining territories took place; and Kistna Rajah was placed by the British on the musnud of his fathers, at Mysore, and that town remade the capital of his dominions. He being only five years old, colonel Close was appointed to be resident with the rajah of Mysore; and the northern fortresses of Nagara, Chittledroog, Sera, and Nandedroog were garrisoned by the British, for which the rajah is to pay seven lacks of star pagodas yearly. The island of Seringapatam was retained by the British for provision of the families of Hyder and Tippoo. The dominions of the rajah of Mysore are now divided into three great districts, Patana to the s, Nagara to the nw, and Chatrakal to the ne, so called from the three places where the chief offices are situate. The Patana district is by far the largest, and of itself a much greater extent of territory than ever before was subject to the Mysore family.

Mysore, a city of Hindoostan, capital of the country of the same name. It each side to the outer and inner wall. In the fort are two large temples, and a ruinous palace. It is 30 m N Seringapatam.

Nagara, or Hyder-nagara, a city of Hindoostan, capital of the NW district of Mysore. It was formerly called Bidderuru, and by Europeans Bidde-nore or Bednore; but received its present name, in 1763, on being taken by Hyder, who made it his principal arsenal, and a place of great magnitude and commerce. It afterward declined, being neither the seat of a court, nor of any public works, except the mint. In 1783, it was taken by the British, and retaken soon after by Tippoo; but on his final defeat, in 1799, it was ceded to the rajah of Mysore, by the British, who keep a garrison in the fort. The surrounding country is hilly, and overgrown with woods, in which are many fortified defiles and passes, guarded by the rajah's troops. Nagara possesses no manufactures; but has still a considerable trade in the produce of the country, which consists of pepper, betel-nut, sandal wood, and cardamons; and also in a great variety of articles brought hither from distant places. The city contains above 1600 houses, beside huts, and is now in an improving state. It is 70 m N by E Mangalore, and 150 NW Seringapatam. Lon. 75 8 E, lat. 13 48 N.

department of Sambre and Meuse, and a bishop's see. It has a castle in the middle of the town, on a craggy rock, and several forts. The inhabitants are estimated at 20,000. Fire-arms, swords, knives, and many other kinds of cutlery are made here. This city was ceded to the House of Austria by the peace of Utrecht. In 1715, it was allowed to be garrisoned by Dutch troops, as one of the barrier towns of the United Provinces: in 1746, it was taken by the French, but restored in 1748. In 1781, emperor Joseph expelled the Dutch garrison. In 1792, it was again taken by the French, who were compelled to evacuate it the following year, but they regained possession of it in 1794. It is seated between two mountains, at the conflux of the Maese and Sambre, 24 m wsw Liege, and 32 SE Brussels. Lon. 4 45 E, lat. 50 29 N.

Nancy, a city of France, capital of the department of Meurte, and a bishop's see. It is divided, by a canal, into the old and new town. The first, though irregularly built, is rich and populous, and contains the palace of the ancient dukes of Lorraine; and their tombs are in a rich saloon, which adjoins the church of the late Cordeliers. The new town, whose streets are perfectly straight, is one of the finest in Europe. The cathedral is a superb structure. Nancy is seated in a delightful plain, near the river Meurte, 92 m NW Basel, and 175 E Paris. Lon. 6 10 E, lat. 48 42 N.

Nander, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Dowlatabad, 132 m NNW Hydrabad.

Nandidroog, a strong fortress of Hindoostan, in Mysore. Since the restoration of the rajah, in 1799, it has been garrisoned by British troops. It is 25 m N by E Bangalore, and 64 ESE Sera.

Nansio, an island of the Archipelago, a little to the E of that of Santorini. It is 16 m in circumference, but has no harbour, nor springs sufficient to water the fields. The inhabitants are all Greeks, and their trade is in onions, wax, and honey. The ruins of the temple of Apollo are yet to be seen, and consist chiefly of marble columns. Lon. 26 10 E, lat. 36 15 N.

Nangasaki, a city of Japan, in the island of Ximo, with a harbour, the only one in the empire that foreign ships are permitted to enter. The inhabitants carry on a great trade with the Chinese and Dutch. The latter are never suffered to come into the city, unless when their ships arrive, and then they deliver up their guns and sails, as Nan-king, or Kiang-ning, a city of China, capital of the province of Kiangnan. It is the largest in China, the walls being 17 m in circuit; but it is of an irregular figure, from the hills within its area. It stands 3 m from the Kian-ku, from which canals are cut, so large, that vessels may enter the town. It was formerly the imperial city, whence it was called Nan-king, which signifies Southern Court; but since the six grand tribunals have been moved hence to Peking, it is called Kiang-ning in all the public acts. This place is greatly fallen from its ancient splendour; for it had a magnificent palace, which is quite destroyed, as well as many ancient monuments; and a third part of the city itself is desolate. The streets are narrow, but handsome and well paved. The public buildings are mean, except a few temples, the city gates, and a tower of porcelain, 200 feet high. It is 500 m S by E Peking. Lon. 118 47 E, lat. 32 5 N.

Nan-ngan, a city of China, of the first rank, in the province of Kiang-si. It stands among plantations of sugar-cane, near the source of the Kan-kiang, and the foot of the mountain Me-lin, 200 m NE Canton, and 900 SSW Peking. Lon. 113 38 E, lat. 24 48 N.

Nan-tchang, a city of China, capital of the province of Kiang-si. It has no trade but that of porcelain, which is made in the vicinity of Jaa-teheou. The country is so much cultivated, that the pastures are barely sufficient for the flocks. It is seated on the Kan-kiang, which flows hence into the lake Po-yang, 695 m S Peking. Lon. 115 30 E, lat. 28 36 N.

Nantes, a city of France, capital of the department of Lower Loire, and a bishop's see, with a university. It was formerly the residence of the dukes of Bretagne, who built a strong castle on the side of the Loire; which still exists.

N A P

The cathedral contains the tombs of the ancient dukes; beside which there are a collegiate church and 11 parish-churches. The bridges over the river, in which are some islands, are almost a league in length. Large vessels can come no higher than Port Launai, which is 12 m below Nantes. The suburbs exceed the city in extent. A great quantity of salt is made in the territory of Nantes, both at the bay of Bourgneuf, and in the salt marshes of Guerande and Croisic. In this city Henry IV promulgated the famous edict, in 1598, in favour of the protestants, which was revoked in 1685, by Lewis XIV. It is 58 m s by E Rennes, and 217 SW Paris. Lon. 1 33 W, lat. 47 13 N.

Nantua, a town of France, in the department of Ain, with manufactures of gauzes, taffetas, chintzes, nankeen, and stockings; situate on a lake of the same name, 18 m E Bourg.

Nantucket, an island and county of the state of Massachusetts, which lies to the S of Cape Cod. It is 13 m long and 11 broad, including Sandy Point, which makes a fine road for ships. A considerable whale fishery is carried on here; and there are several spermaceti works, and a duck manufacture. It has only one town, formerly called Sherburne, but now Nantucket, which is 93 m SSE Boston. Lon. 70 30 W, lat. 41 20 N.

Nantwich, or Namptwich, a town in Cheshire, with a market on Saturday. Here are salt springs, from which are made great quantities of salt; also a manufacture of cotton and shoes. The principal dairies of Cheshire are about this town, and it has a considerable trade in cheese. It is seated on the Weaver, and by the Chester canal, which here forms a broad basin, 26 m SE Chester, and 164 NW London.

Nan-yang, a city of China, of the first rank, in the province of Ho-nan. It is seated on a small river, and surrounded by mountains, 160 m S Ho-nan.

Nan-yong, a city of China, of the first rank, in the province of Quang-tong. It is seated on the Pei-kiang, near its source, 170 m NNE Canton.

Napaul, or Nepaul, a country of Asia, bounded on the S by Bahar, W by Gorkah, N by the mountains of Himmaleh, which separate it from Tibet, and E by Bootan. It is mountainous and woody, with mines of copper and iron, and has many fertile valleys. This country was never under the dominion of the Mohamedans, and now is governed by a rajah, who is tributary to Tibet. The natives are peculiarly superstitious, and consist principally of the two superior classes of Hindoos, and of a Tartar or Chinese race denominated Newars: the last are chiefly found in the valley of Napaul; the former are scattered over the country, and engross all situations of trust, whether civil or military. Catmandu is the capital.

Naples, a kingdom comprehending the S part of Italy; bounded on the NW by the Ecclesiastical State, NE by the gulf of Venice, and every where else by the Mediterranean. It is 300 miles in length, by 100 in breadth, and divided into twelve provinces; namely, Terra di Lavoro (the ancient Campania Felix) Principato Citra and Ultra, Molise, Basilicata, Calabria Citra and Ultra, Abruzzo Citra and Ultra, Capitanata, Terra di Bari, and Terra d'Otranto; the last three forming the ancient Apulia, now called Puglia, on the E side of the kingdom. After many revolutions, the Normans became masters of this country, in the eleventh century; and the sovereigns were called counts, then dukes, and afterward kings of Puglia. In 1282, Peter III, king of Aragon, caused all the Normans in the island of Sicily to be massacred; and this massacre was called the Sicilian Vespers. After this, Puglia was joined to Sicily; and hence the sovereigns took the title of King of the Two Sicilies. It has also been called the kingdom of Naples, from its capital. France and Spain contended for the sovereignty in the sequel, and bloody wars and revolutions were the consequence. The French being defeated by the Spaniards in 1504, Lewis XII formally renounced all pretensions to the crown, and the country was governed by Spanish viceroys. In 1647 happened the dreadful insurrection of Massaniello in the city of Naples, by which the Spaniards were nearly expelled. The people, however, returning to their allegiance, on the assassination of Massaniello, the Spaniards continued in peaceable possession of the kingdom till 1707, when it was conquered by prince Eugene, and ceded to the emperor by the treaty of Radstadt in 1714. It was recovered, however, by the Spaniards in 1734; and Ferdinand IV, a prince of Spain, became king of Naples and Sicily. But in 1799, on the French gaining the ascendancy in this country, the royal family of Naples retired to Palermo, in Sicily, there to maintain their sovereignty; and this kingdom was napped, who king of Spain, Joachim Mur country is ext July, August, said to be one unfavorable to seasons it rain seven weeks disagreeable pirocco, or SE mon in May. Tha which the na able, is now g of the conjuga quarrels and ple of an infetropolis, affi trated from n Naples, a kingdom of bishop's see, seated on the on the side bay, which kingdom was first given to Joseph Bonaparte, who being afterward made king of Spain, it was then conferred on Joachim Murat. The climate of this country is extremely hot, especially in July, August, and September; and is said to be one of the most inconstant and unfavorable to valetudinarians. In some seasons it rains every day for six or seven weeks together; but the most disagreeable part of the climate is the firoco, or SE wind, which is very common in May, and extremely relaxing. In winter there is seldom any ice or snow, except on the mountains. The country abounds with grain, the finest fruits and vegetables, rice, flax, oil, wine, saffron, and mauna; and affords alum, vitriol, sulphur, rock crystal, marble, minerals, and fine wool and silk. Beside the manufactures noticed in the account of the city of Naples, waistcoats, caps, stockings, and gloves are also made of the hair or filaments of a shellfish, which are warmer than those of wool, and of a beautiful glossy green. The principal mountains are the Apennines, which traverse this country from N to S, branching out to the two extremities; and the celebrated volcano, mount Vesuvius. The rivers are numerous, but inconsiderable; the chief are the Garigliano and Volturno. One of the greatest inconveniences to which this kingdom is exposed is earthquakes. The established religion is the Roman catholic, and the clergy and convents possess two thirds of the whole kingdom; but protestants and Jews are allowed to settle here. The inhabitants of this country have, at all times, born but an indifferent character among other nations; gluttony is here a predominant vice, while instances of ebriety are comparatively rare. In the female sex, the passion for finery is almost superior to any other; and though chastity is not the characteristic virtue of the country, yet a Neapolitan woman would, for the most part, prefer a present to a lover. That furious jealousy, for which the nation was once so remarkable, is now greatly abated. The breach of the conjugal vow sometimes occasions quarrels and assassinations among people of an inferior rank; and, in the metropolis, assassinations are often perpetrated from much less cogent motives.

Naples, a city of Italy, capital of a kingdom of the same, and an archbishop's see, with a university. It is seated on the bay of Naples, and built on the side of hills sloping toward the bay, which is one of the finest in the world, almost of a circular figure 30 m in diameter, and three parts of it sheltered by a noble circuit of woods and mountains. The harbour is spacious, and protected by a mole, two castles, and several batteries; but these could not protect the city from a bombardment. The style of architecture in Naples is inferior to what prevails at Rome, and it cannot vie with that city in the number of palaces, yet the private houses are better built, and the streets broader and better paved. The Strada Toledo is a mile in length, and with the quay, which is extensive and well-built, forms the grand and distinguishing features of the city. The houses are principally five or six stories high, and flat at the top; on which are placed numbers of flower vases, or fruit trees, in boxes of earth. The fortress of St. Elmo is built on a mountain of the same name, and has the entire command of the town. Lower down on the same mountain, in a delightful situation, is a convent of the Carthusians, on which much expense has been lavished, to render the building and the garden equal to the situation. Naples is well situate for commerce, and has all the necessaries and luxuries of life in great profusion; but trade is in a languishing condition. The chief articles manufactured are silk stockings, soap, snuff-boxes of tortoise-shell and lava, and tables and ornamental furniture of marble. They are thought to embroider here better than in France; and their macaroni, confections, and cordials are in the highest esteem. The inhabitants are computed to be 400,000 within the walls, and 100,000 in the suburbs, which stretch in a magnificent sweep from Portici to the promontory of Misenum, and fill a spacious line of 16 m along the shore. Many of its streets are more crowded than in London, and a great proportion of the poorest spend the night in them, for want of habitations. There is not a city in the world, perhaps, with the same number of inhabitants, in which so few contribute to the wealth of the community, by useful and productive labour, as Naples; for the number of priests, monks, fiddlers, lawyers, nobility, footmen, and lazzaroni, or vagrants, surpasses all reasonable proportion; and the last alone are computed at above 30,000. The nobility are excessively fond of splendour and show; as appears by the brilliancy of their equipages, the number of their attendants, the richness of their dress, and the grandeur of their titles. The king, it is said, counts a hundred persons with the title of prince, and still a greater number with that of duke, among his subjects. A few of these have estates from 10 to 13,000l. a year; a considerable number about half that amount; and many is under 2000l. Of the inferior orders, many counts and marquises have not an estate of 400l. a year; many still less, and not a few enjoy the title without any estate whatever. Although the churches and convents of Naples are not to be compared with those at Rome, in point of architecture, yet they surpass them in magnitude, and in the quantity of silver and golden crucifixes, vessels, and other ornaments. The cathedral is a noble Gothic edifice; and in a chapel under the altar is deposited the body of St. Januarius, the tutelary saint of Naples; but his supposed head, and some of his blood in two crystal vials, are preserved in the treasury. These are on some extraordinary occasions publicly shown with great solemnity, and the blood brought near the head, when by a supposed miracle it liquefies, and thereby is deemed to be a happy presage; but if the blood retains its dryness, the people are struck with terror. Of all the palaces, that of the king is not only the most magnificent, but in the best style of architecture; those of the nobility are in general too much encumbered with ornaments, though in many the apartments are on a grand scale, and adorned with many fine paintings. The hospitals and charitable foundations are very numerous; many of them are well endowed, and all clean, well attended, and well regulated. Naples was taken by the French in 1799, and retaken by the Austrians and Russians, aided by a British fleet; but the French shortly afterward regained the possession. In 1803, the city suffered much damage, by an earthquake. It is 110 m SE Rome. Lon. 14 17 E, lat. 40 50 N.

Napoli di Malvasia, a seaport of European Turkey, in Morea, and on the island of Malvasia. It is called Monembasia by the Turks, and is the see of an archbishop. It has a fine harbour, defended by a good citadel; a long wooden bridge, which joins it to the mainland; and is famous for excellent wine, called Malmsey. It stands on a rock, at the entrance of the bay of Napoli di Romania, 38 m SE Mistra. Lon. 22 58 E, lat. 36 53 N.

at the head of a bay of the same name. It is inhabited by Turks, Greeks, and people of different nations; and has a large harbour, with a narrow entrance defended by a fort on an isolated rock, and a battery on the shore. The town and port are also commanded by numerous batteries planted on the side of a mountain, and its summit is crowned with a strong citadel. It has a considerable trade in the productions of the country. This town, still called Nanplia by the Greeks, was taken by the Turks in 1715. It is 34 m E by N Tripolizza. Lon. 22 44 E, lat. 37 42 N.

Napolsa, a town of Syria, in Palestine, the ancient Sichein, the capital of Samaria. It stands in a beautiful valley, surrounded by rich gardens, and in a country abounding with all the necessaries of life. Near it is Jacob's Well; also many ancient sepulchres, as durable as the rocks in which they are hewn, and travellers may contemplate the spot where the remains of Joseph, Eleazar, and Joshua were severally deposited. The town is governed by a sheik, subject to the pacha of Damascus. The inhabitants are deemed the richest people in Syria; their manufactures, and other articles of trade, being sent to a great distance upon camels. It is 30 m N Jerusalem.

Narasinghapura, a town of Hindoostan, in Mysore, with two considerable temples. It is well built, and stands in a fertile country, on the Cavery, immediately below the influx of the Kapini, 20 m ESE Mysore.

Narberth, a town of Wales, in Pembrokehire, with a market on Thursday, seated on a hill, 12 m NE Pembroke, and 242 w by S London.

Narbonne, a city of France, in the department of Aude, and lately an archiepiscopal see. In the time of the Romans, it was the capital of that part of Gaul called Caissa Narbonensis; and here emperor Marcus Aurelius was born. Some Roman inscriptions are still visible; and the canal from the river Aude, through the city to the Mediterranean, was cut by the Romans. The cathedral is remarkable for its noble choir, and the town is famous for honey. It is 5 m from the Mediterranean, and 80 ESE Toulouse. Lon. 3 0 E, lat. 43 11 N.

Narim, a town of Siberia, in the government of Tobolsk, surrounded by palisades and wooden towers. The environs abound with foxes, ermines, and fables. It is seated at the conflux of the Ket with the Oby, 400 m E by N Tobolsk. Lon. 81 15 E, lat. 59 10 N.

Narmalla, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Berar, 33 m WNW Ellichpour, and 72 E Buthanpour.

Narni, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Spoleto. Here are the ruins of a marble bridge, built by Augustus; and of an aqueduct that brought water from a spring at the distance of 15 m. It is seated on the summit of a high hill, whose sides are clothed with olives, and its base washed by the Nar, or Nera, 20 m SSW Spoleto, and 40 N Rome.

Narova, a river of Russia, which issues from the lake Pelpus, flows by Narva, and 8 m below enters the gulf of Finland. It has two cataracts, pompously described by travellers; but they are far inferior to that of the Rhine, at Lauffen.

Narraganset Bay, in the state of Rhode Island, makes up from S to N, between the mainland on the E and W. It embraces many fruitful and beautiful islands, the principal of which are Rhode, Canonicut, Providence, Patience, Hope, Dyers, and Hog. This capacious bay affords plenty of lobsters. On Beaver tail, at the end of Canonicut island, is a lighthouse. Lon. 71 20 W, lat. 41 22 S.

Narraguagus, a town of the district of Maine, in Washington county, situate on a bay of the same name, 16 m NE Goldsborough.

Narjagapatam, a town of Hindoostan, in the territory of Cattack, near the coast of the bay of Bengal, 44 m S Cattack.

Narva, a strong town of Russia, in Ingria, or the government of Petersburg. The houses are built of brick stuccoed white; and it has more the appearance of a German than of a Russian town. In the suburbs, called Ivangorod, are the stupendous remains of an ancient fortress, built by Ivan Baslowitz the great, which impend over the steep banks of the Narova. In 1700, Charles XII of Sweden obtained a victory here over Peter the great. Five years after,

Nassau, a princely county of Germany, in Westphalia; bounded to the N by the duchy of Westphalia, E by the county of Solmes, S by the territory of Mentz, and W by that of Treves. It contains mines of iron, copper, and lead; and the soil is fertile in some places, but the surface is for the most part woody and mountainous. The house of Nassau is divided into many branches, which have their distinctive titles from the principal towns in the several districts.

Nassau, a town of Germany, in Westphalia, and county of Nassau-Deitz, on the river Lahn. Opposite the town, on the other side of the river, and on a high mountain, formerly stood Nassau-berg, a place of great antiquity, and the original seat of the Nassau family. Nassau is 32 m WNW Frankfort. Lon. 7 53 E, lat. 50 16 N.

Nassau, an island in the Indian ocean, on the W side of the island of Sumatra, about 120 m in circuit. The inhabitants are dissimilar from their neighbours; for they approach the amiable simplicity of manners and personal appearance of the Otaheitans, while their colour is like that of the Malays. It abounds with forests, and presents an enchanting verdure. Lon. 99 40 E, lat. 2 50 S.

Navigators Islands, a cluster of 10 islands in the Pacific ocean, discovered by Bougainville, and explored by Perouse in 1787. They are called by the natives Opouu, Leone, Fanfoue, Maouua, Oyolava, Calinasse, Pola, Shika, Ollimo, and Ouero. Opouu, the most southerly and easterly of these islands, lies in lon. 169 7 w, lat. 14 7 s. Seven of them are small; but Maouue, Oyolava, and Pola, may be numbered among the largest and most beautiful islands of the S Pacific ocean. They combine the advantages of a soil fruitful without culture, and a climate that renders clothing unnecessary. The inhabitants go almost naked, and have their bodies thickly tattooed; they are a strong and lusty race, scarcely a man less than six feet high, and the women are in proportion. In disposition they are thievish, treacherous, and ferocious. Their villages are situate on creeks, by the seaside, and have no paths between them; that they pass from one to another in their canoes, and thus are almost constantly on the water. Their canoes, houses, &c. are well constructed; and they are much more advanced in internal policy than any of the islands in this ocean. See Maouua.

Naxia, or Naxos, the most fertile island in the Archipelago, 15 m long and 30 in circuit. It produces excellent wine; and the plains abound with orange, olive, lemon, cedar, citron, pomegranate, fig, and mulberry trees. The highest mountain is Zia, which signifies the mountain of Jupiter: but there are no antiquities, except some small remains of a temple of Bacchus. It is inhabited both by Greeks and Latins, and has a great many villages; but the whole island does not contain above 8000 inhabitants. The women paint, blacken their eyebrows and eyelashes, and cover their faces with patches, made of a black shining calc found in the island.

Naxia, the capital of the isle of the same name, and one of the most beautiful places in the Archipelago. It has two archiepiscopal sees, the one Greek and the other Latin. Here is no harbour, but the trade is considerable in barley, wine, oil, figs, cotton, silk, flax, cheese, salt, oxen, sheep, and mules. It stands on the s side of the island, and is defended by a castle. Lon. 25 32 E, lat. 37 8 N.

Negroland, or Nigritia, a large country in the interior of Africa, through which the river Niger flows from W to E. It is called by the Arabs Soudan, a word of similar import to the European appellation, to express the Land of the Blacks. It extends from lon. 10 W to 27 E, and from lat. 10 to 25 N; bounded on the N by Zahara and the mountains which separate it from Barbary, E by Nubia and Abyssinia, S by countries unknown and Guinea, and W by Guinea, Foulis, and Zahara. Of this vast country little more is known than the names of some of the towns and kingdoms of which it is composed. Some parts, particularly on the Niger, are said to be exceedingly fertile; other parts are represented as sandy and desert. That it is very populous is evident, from the great supply of slaves it has afforded to the traders. The principal territory known is Bornou. The general character of the Negroes, who are the inhabitants of this region, is that of levity; and that they do not suffer their gaiety to be disturbed by events, which, in other countries, are productive of much unhappiness. They do not appear to want the feelings of humanity, nor are they more destitute of sagacity than other people of an equal degree of education; but as their country supplies them with food by a very slight degree of industry, and the little occasion there is for clothing amid the heat of their climate, they have a general habit of seeking present pleasure, and no care for the future. The only necessary of life that appears to be deficient is salt, which is the more wanted among them in consequence of their subsisting chiefly on vegetables, and is proverbial ex- to say, that This importa Zahara by c They also rec les, and drink Europeans, an caravans of C rocco. chiefly on vegetable food; and it is a proverbial expression of a man's riches to say, that he eats salt to his food. This important article they receive from Zahara by caravans of trading Arabs. They also receive arms, hardware, glasses, and trinkets, from the w, by the caravans of Cairo, Fezzan, and Morocco. For these they give in return gold, ivory, and slaves. The kind of government that exists among the Negro nations is by no means uniform. In many districts the country is governed by a great multitude of independent petty chiefs, who are engaged in frequent wars with each other. In other places the talents of individual chieftains have been able to reduce considerable tracts of territory under their dominion; and hence some flourishing towns have sprung up. Many of the towns are fortified with ditches and high walls; the latter and the houses being constructed of clay and stone. Domestic slavery prevails in a very great degree among all the Negro states. When the tropical rains fall, or are so deficient that the sun burns up the face of the country, it is not uncommon for parents to sell their children, and even themselves, for bread. A freeman may also lose his liberty by being taken prisoner in war, or on account of the crimes of murder and forcery; and also in consequence of insolvency. The knowledge of the Negroes with regard to religion and all speculative subjects is extremely limited; but they have much superstition, and are implicit believers in witchcraft and magic.

Negropont, the largest island in the Archipelago, anciently called Eubœa. It is separated from the NE coast of Livadia by the strait of Negropont, the ancient Euripus, over the narrowest part of which is a bridge to the mainland. It is 100 m in length and 18 in breadth, though in some places much narrower. It abounds in corn, wine, oil, and fruit; but a ridge of mountains extends through its whole length, many of them continually covered with snow.

Negropont, or Egripa, a strong city, capital of the island of Negropont, and a Greek archbishop's see. It has a good harbour, which is commonly the station of the Turkish ships. The walls of the city, in which the Turks and Jews reside, are two miles and a half in circumference; but the suburbs, where the Christians live, are much larger. It was taken, in 1469, from the Venetians, who Neisse, a city of Silesia, capital of a principality of the same name. It is a place of great strength, and one of the finest towns in Silesia. Here is a magnificent palace, with several offices for the principality; but the seat of government is the castle of the adjacent small town of Otmachau. The inhabitants carry on a considerable trade in linens and wine. This place was taken by the Prussians in 1741, who, after the peace in 1742, built a citadel, to which they gave the name of Prussia. In 1757 it was besieged by the Austrians, but ineffectually. In 1807 it surrendered to the French. It is seated on a river of the same name, 48 m S by E Breslaw. Lon. 17 20 E, lat. 50 24 N.

The high hills on each side present a delightful view of wood, pasture, cultivated lands, and rugged precipices. It is navigated by a king's galley, which supplies the garrison of Fort Augustus, at its s extremity, with stores. Its outlet, at the n extremity, is the river Ness, which runs into Moray frith, below Inverness. It now constitutes a prominent feature in the line of the Caledonian canal.

Nestved, a town of Denmark, in the island of Zealand, on the river Ness, 38 m SW Copenhagen.

Netherlands, or Low Countries, a country of Europe, anciently called Gallia Belgica, 260 m long and from 100 to 200 broad; bounded on the w and n by the German ocean, e by Germany, and s by France. In the ninth century, the sons of emperor Lewis the pious, having divided the dominions of their father, who possessed Germany, France, and Italy, a new kingdom was formed, comprehending Germany and France, and a part of the Netherlands. It was called Lotharria, but did not long subsist; for it was soon divided into two; and that seated near the Mediterranean was called the kingdom of Burgundy; while the other to the n, had the name of Austrasia. Neither did this last continue long; it being divided into 17 provinces, under different names, exclusive of the territories of Liege and Upper Gelderland; but they still depended on the empire of Germany, and were called Lower Germany. In process of time, the house of Burgundy purchased many of them, and was about to form them, with Burgundy, into a kingdom; but Charles the bold, the last duke of Burgundy, being killed by the Swifs in 1477, his part of the Netherlands devolved on Mary, his only child; by whose marriage with emperor Maximilian, the Netherlands were an acquisition to the house of Austria. Emperor Charles v, king of Spain, in 1555, abdicated the sovereignty of the Netherlands, and, soon after, the Spanish crown, in favour of his son Philip. The tyranny of this cruel bigot, Philip II, who endeavoured to introduce the inquisition into the Low Countries, with the barbarities exercised by the duke of Alva, exasperated the people to such a degree, that they threw off the Spanish yoke; and, under the conduct of William I, prince of Orange, formed the famous league of Utrecht, in 1579, which proved the foundation of the republic of the Seven United Provinces. After a long war (with the interval of a truce of twelve years) Philip IV expressly acknowledged the independence of these provinces, by the treaty of Westphalia, in 1648. The other ten provinces, namely, Brabant, Antwerp, Malines, Namur, Limburg, Luxemburg, Hainault, Flanders, Artois, and Cambresis, returned under the dominion of Spain, but with very favorable stipulations with respect to their ancient liberties. On the accession of a branch of the house of Bourbon to the Spanish monarchy, it was stipulated, in 1714, that the Spanish Netherlands should return to the German branch of the house of Austria; but some considerable parts were obtained, by conquest or cession, by the French and Dutch. The Dutch had part of Brabant, Limburg, and Flanders: the French had Artois and Cambresis; with part of Hainault, Flanders, and Luxemburg: Austria held the rest; and the provinces of Antwerp and Malines were included under the name of Austrian Brabant. In 1788, emperor Joseph II, having projected many innovations, and enforcing them with violence, a universal spirit of revolt broke out; an army of 40,000 men, rose, as if by magic, to support the renunciation of all allegiance, which several of the provinces openly made; a congress was formed from the different states, in whom the supreme government was vested; and by the end of 1789 the Austrians were expelled. The new government, however, was not of long duration; for Leopold II (the successor of Joseph) was enabled, partly by conciliatory measures, and partly by the mediation of Great Britain, Prussia, and Holland, to recover the entire possession of his authority; the mediating courts having guaranteed the restoration of the ancient Belgic constitution. In 1792 the French over-ran the Austrian Netherlands: they were driven out of the country in 1793; but they returned in 1794, and subdued every part of it; and in 1795 decreed it, with the territories of Liege and Upper Gelderland, an integral part of the French republic. To this country they gave the name of Belgium, and divided it into the following nine departments; Dyle, Forets, Jemappe, Lis, Meuse Lower, Nethe (Two), Ourthe, Sambre and Meuse, and Scheldt; which see. The Netherlands, or Belgium, is 170 m long and 90 broad; bounded on the N by Holland, E by Germany, sw by France, and nw by the German ocean. The principal rivers are the Scheldt, Meuse, Dyle, Sambre, and Lis; and there are many fine navigable canals. The air is temperate, and the soil extremely fertile; but the mouths of the rivers and harbours are frozen in winter. Brussels is the chief town. See Holland, or Dutch Netherlands.

Neuchatel, a territory of Swisserland, which, with that of Valengin, forms one principality between the lake of Neuchatel and the borders of France; extending 36 m from S to S, and 18 in its greatest breadth. On the death of the duchess of Nemours, in 1707, the sovereignty of Neuchatel and Valengin was claimed by Frederic I of Prussia; and his right was acknowledged by the states of the country. In 1806, the king of Prussia ceded this principality to the French marshal Berthier, and the grant was confirmed by Napoleon. The inhabitants are protestants, except in the two districts of Landeron and Cressier, where the catholics are predominant. It is a hilly country, watered by several lakes and rivers. The soil is not equally fertile; but there are large vineyards that produce white and red wine, which last is excellent. The pasture on the mountains feeds a great number of cattle, and there are plenty of deer in the forests.

New Forest, a forest in Hampshire, lying between Southampton water and the river Avon. It is 20 m long and 15 broad; and has advantages of situation, with respect to conveyance by water carriage, and vicinity to the dockyards, superior to every other forest; having in its neighbourhood several places for shipping timber. It was afforested by William I, and was then 10 m longer. His son William Rufus was killed in this forest by an arrow, shot by Walter Tyrrel, which accidentally glanced against a tree, and the site is now pointed out by a triangular stone. The lord warden of this forest is appointed by letters patent, during the king's pleasure, and all the courts of jurisdiction are held at Lyndhurst.

New River, an artificial river of England, originally brought from Amwell, in Hertfordshire, to Millington, for the supply of the metropolis with water. It was finished in 1613, by sir Hugh Middleton, a citizen of London, who expended his whole fortune in the undertaking. It has since been extended to a spring near Hertford, called Chadwell, where the stream is also increased by a cut from the river Lea. This river, with all its windings, is 42 m in length, and is under the management of a corporation called the New River Company.

Newcastle, or Newcastle upon Tyne, a borough and seaport in Northumberland, situate on the N side of the Tyne, over which is a bridge to Gatehead on the Durham side. It is governed by a mayor, and has a market on Tuesday and Saturday. The number of inhabitants was 28,366 in 1801, and 27,587 in 1811. The river admits ships under 400 tons burden to come up to the town, and larger ones are stationed below, at Shields. The town is defended by a strong wall, above 2 m in circuit, in which are seven gates, and as many turrets, with several casements bomb-proof; but the castle is old and ruinous. The wall on the S side runs parallel with the river, leaving a spacious piece of ground between them both which forms a long and noble quay. Here are four parish churches, and that of St. Nicholas, which stands on a hill, has a lofty steeple of curious architecture. Among the other public buildings is a mansion house for the mayor, an exchange, and a large hospital for the maintenance of poor seamen; also several charitable foundations situate in the centre of the great collieries, which have for centuries supplied London and most of the southern parts of the kingdom with coal. This trade has been the source of great opulence to Newcastle: it also possesses manufactures of steel, iron, glass, soap, fine and coarse earthen ware, and copperas; and it exports large quantities of lead, salt, salmon, butter, tallow, and grindstones. Ships are sent hence to the Greenland fishery. The streets in the old part of the town are narrow, and the buildings crowded together; but some of the newer parts are handsome and commodious. It is 14 m N Durham, and 270 N by W London. Lon. 1 14 W, lat. 54 57 N.

Newfoundland, an island on the E coast of N America, between 47 and 52 N lat. discovered by Sebastian Cabot in 1496. After many disputes with the French, it was ceded to the English in 1713. The form is triangular; the N point is separated from Labrador by the strait of Belleisle, and from this apex it is 350 m to the base, which is 300 in length. It has several bays and harbours; and is a mountainous, woody country, and very cold, being covered with snow five months in the year. It seems to have no inhabitants of its own, but in the summer time is visited by the Etiquinaux Indians. About 500 English families continue here all the year, beside the garison of St. John, Placentia, and other forts. In the fishing season for cod, which begins in May and ends in September, it is resorted to by at least 10,000 people, on account of the great fishing-bank to the SE of the island; for here they cure and pack the fish, which are sent not only to England, but to the Mediterranean and the W Indies, in immense quantities. This great bank is a heap of sand 580 m long and 230 broad, with a depth of water varying from 15 to 60 fathoms, and abounding with small fish serving as food for the cod, the numbers of which are incredible. In winter the chief employment of the inhabitants is to cut wood; and the smallest kind, used for fuel, is drawn by their large dogs, trained up and harnessed for that purpose. There is great plenty of game, fish, and fowl, but very little corn, fruit, or cattle. St. John is the principal settlement.

Niagara, a river of N America, which forms the communication between the lakes Erie and Ontario, and flows from s to N about 34 m. At the head of the river, on the w bank, is Fort Erie; and 18 m below this, on the E bank, is Fort Slusher, where commences the cataracts that are reckoned among the greatest natural curiosities in the world. The river is here 740 yards wide. The half mile immediately above the cataracts is a rapid, in which the water falls 50 feet; it is then thrown, with astonishing grandeur, down a perpendicular precipice of 140 feet, in three distinct and collateral sheets; and in a rapid that extends to the distance of 6 m below, falls 100 feet more. The river then flows in a deep channel till it enters Lake Ontario, at Fort Niagara. The great pitch of this vast body of water produces a sound that is frequently heard at the distance of 20 m, and in a clear day with a fair wind 40 and even 50 m. From the descent of this river the surface of Lake Erie is about 300 feet higher than Lake Ontario.

Nile, a great river of Africa, which, according to Mr. Bruce, rises in Abyssinia, near the village of Geeth, in lon. 36 55 E, lat. 10 59 N. It runs first through the lake Dembea, then makes a circuit toward its source, which it leaves 25 m to the E, and enters into Nubia, through which country it makes a sinuous course, and forms some cataracts. It then enters Egypt, and flows almost directly S till it arrives at Cairo; and a little below that city it divides into two great branches, which, with the Mediterranean sea, form the island called Delta. The ancients reckoned eleven mouths of the Nile, of which seven were considerable; but now there are only two that are navigable at all times; and those are at Rosetta and Damietta. In the middle of this river, between Old Cairo and Gizeh, is seated the island of Rodda, which is almost as long as Old Cairo, and 500 paces in breadth in the middle; and the front of the Meklas takes up all the breadth of the southern part. This is the work of the Saracens, and derives its name from its use, for it signifies Measure. Here they observe every day, by means of a graduated column, the increase or decrease of the waters of the Nile. This river increases regularly every year, from the 15th of June to the 17th of September, when it begins to decrease. The fertility of Egypt depends upon the water of the Nile; and they reckon it will be a bad year when it rises less than 14 cubits, or above 18; but 16 cubits is the proper height. During the inundation, the little towns, standing upon eminences, look like so many islands, and they go from one to the other by boats. In Cairo there is a canal called Khalis, which is opened when the water is high enough; thence it is conveyed into reservoirs and cisterns, and is afterward distributed into the fields and gardens, as occasion requires. This inundation of the Nile is caused by the periodical rains which fall every year between the tropics, and more particularly in Abyssinia, which is full of high mountains.

Nineama; see Monoemugi.

Nimeguen, a city of Holland, capital of Gelderland, with a citadel, an ancient palace, and several forts. It is also the capital of a county of its name, or of the island of Betuwe, the ancient Batavia. The churches are, in general, handsome structures; and the town-house is magnificent. The inhabitants subsist chiefly by brewing ale, and their trade with Germany. Several treaties of peace were concluded here in 1678. This city was taken by the French in 1794. It stands on the Waal, 10 m WNW Cleve, and 35 ESE Utrecht. Lon. 51 53 E, lat. 51 51 N.

Norfolk, a county of England, bounded on the N and E by the German ocean, SE and S by Suffolk, and W by Cambridgeshire and Lincolnshire. It is 77 m long and 45 broad, containing 1,288,320 acres; is divided into 32 hundreds, and 724 parishes; has one city and 32 market-towns; and sends 12 members to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 273,371 in 1801, and 291,999 in 1811. The products vary according to the soil and situation. The light arable lands produce barley in great plenty; wheat is cultivated in the strongest soils; and turnips are grown in great quantities: much buck-wheat is also grown in the light soils, and used for feeding swine and poultry. The fenny parts yield great quantities of butter: which is sent to London under the name of Cambridge butter. The sheep are a hardy small breed, much valued for their mutton. Turkeys are reared here to a larger size than elsewhere; rabbits are extremely numerous on the sandy heaths; and there is abundance of game, especially of pheasants. The manufactures of Norfolk are worsted, woollen, and silks. The principal rivers are the Great Ouse, Nen, Little Ouse, Waveney, Yare, and Bure. Norwich is the capital.

Norfolk, a seaport of Virginia, capital of a county of the same name. It was burnt, in 1776, by order of the British governor; but is now the most considerable commercial town in the state. The chief exports are tobacco, flour, corn, staves, and lumber. Here are two churches, an academy, and a theatre; and the harbour is large enough to contain 300 ships. Here is a handsome stone edifice for the preservation of records; also an observatory, in which the celebrated Dr. Rittenhouse was interred, agreeably to his request. It is seated on the Schuylkill, 12 m NW Philadelphia. Lon. 75 24 W, lat. 40 10 N.

Nortelga, or Nor Telge, a seaport of Sweden, in the province of Upland. It suffered much from ravages committed by the Russians in 1719. Near it is a forge for making fire-arms. It is 30 m NE Stockholm. Lon. 10 32 E, lat. 50 44 N.

North Cape, an enormous rock at the N end of the island Maggeroe, on the coast of Norway, and the most northern promontory of Europe. Lon. 25 57 E, lat. 71 12 N.

North Sea, a name given to that part of the Atlantic ocean, lying to the N of Great Britain and Ireland; and sometimes to that part lying E of Great Britain, more generally called the British or German ocean.

Northallerton, a borough in N York-shire, with a market on Wednesday.

Near this place is the battle of Marston, between the king and the barons, in 1213. It is seated on the river Ouse, below joins the river Ure, and 2 m N York.

Northampton, a city and county in the county of Northampton, 18 m N from London. It is seated on the river Great Ouse, and is bounded by a wall, and the interior is almost entirely built since 1675, but was destroyed by fire in 1678. It is a good freeport, and has a good harbour, and a great number of churches, and a good free school, and a gaol. Near this place was fought the battle between the English and Scots, called the Battle of the Standard, in 1138. It is seated on a rivulet, which a mile below joins the river Whilk, 32 m NW York, and 222 N by W London.

Northampton, a town of Massachusetts, capital of Hampshire county. It has a considerable inland trade, and is situate on the Connecticut, 100 m W Boston. Lon. 72 38 W, lat. 42 24 N.

Northampton, a town of Pennsylvania, in the county of its name, situate on the Leigh, 18 m WSW Easton.

Northampton, a borough and the capital of Northamptonshire, governed by a mayor, with a market on Saturday. It is seated on the Nen, which is navigable to Lynn, and was formerly surrounded by a wall, and had a castle; the outer walls of the latter are kept up, and the interior is cultivated. It was almost entirely destroyed by fire in 1675, but was soon rebuilt. It has four churches, a spacious market-place, a good free-school, and a county infirmary and gaol. The principal manufacture is boots and shoes, of which many are exported. The number of inhabitants was 7020 in 1801, and 8427 in 1811. In the meadows below the town, a battle was fought in 1460, between Henry VI and the Yorkists, in which the former was defeated and made prisoner. Two miles to the S is Queen's Cross, erected by Edward I in memory of his queen Eleanor. This town is 30 m SE Coventry, and 66 NW London. Lon. 1 11 W, lat. 52 11 N.

Northamptonshire, a county of England, bounded on the S by Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire, W by the latter county and Warwickshire, NW by Leicestershire and Rutlandshire, N by Lincolnshire, and E by the counties of Cambridge, Huntingdon, and Bedford. It is 60 m long and 22 where broadest, containing 617,600 acres; is divided into 20 hundreds, and 304 parishes; has one city and 11 market-towns; and sends nine members to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 131,757 in 1801, and 141,353 in 1811. In the NE part, near Peterborough, commences a fenny tract, extending to the Lincolnshire Wash. With this single exception, Northamptonshire is said to contain less waste ground, and more seats of the nobility and gentry, than any other county. The greatest defect is a scarcity of fuel, which is but scantily supplied by its woods; and though coal is brought by the river Nen, it is at a very dear rate. This county, however, possesses some considerable remains of its old forests, particularly those of Rockingham on the NW, and of Salcey and Whittlebury on the S. The products are, in general, the same with those of other farming counties; but it is peculiarly celebrated for grazing land. Horned cattle, and other animals, are fed to extraordinary sizes; and many horses of the large black breed are reared. Woad for the dyers is cultivated here; but the county is not distinguished for manufactures. The principal rivers are the Nen and Welland; beside which it is partly watered by the Ouse, Leam, Cherwell, and Avon.

Northfleet, a village in Kent, seated on the Thames, 2 m W Gravesend. The church is very large, and contains fragments of monuments as ancient as the fourteenth century. Vast quantities of lime are made here, and great numbers of extraneous fossils have been dug up.

Northleach, a town in Gloucestershire, with a market on Wednesday; seated in the centre of the Cotswold-hills, near the source of the Lech, 23 m E Gloucester, and 81 W by N London.

Northop, a town of Wales, in Flintshire, with a market on Saturday, and manufactures of coarse earthen ware, fire-bricks, &c. It is 3 m SE Flint, and 190 NW London.

Northorn, a town of Westphalia, in the county of Bentheim, on the river Vecht, 10 m N Bentheim.

Northumberland, the most northern county of England. In the Saxon heptarchy it was a part of the kingdom of the Mercians, which contained also the counties of York, Lancaster, Durham, Cumberland, and Westmorland, and received its name from lying N of the Humber. It is of a triangular form, 64 m the greatest length, and 50 the greatest breadth: bounded on the E by the German ocean, S by the bishopric of Durham, W by Cumberland and Scotland, and N by the detached part of Durham called Northshire and Islandshire. It contains 1,157,760 acres; is divided into six wards, and 83 parishes; has 10 market-towns; and sends six members to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 157,101 in 1801, and 164,415 in 1811. The soil is various; the E part fruitful in most sorts of corn, with rich meadows on the banks of the rivers; but the W part is mostly heathy and mountainous. The SE part abounds with thick seams of coal; and the SW angle has rich lead mines. Limestone and iron ore abound in various parts. The chief rivers are the Tyne, Coquet, Aln, and Blyth. Alnwick is the county-town, but the largest town is Newcastle.

Northumberland, a town of Pennsylvania, in the county of its name, seated in the angle formed by the junction of the E and W branches of the Susquehanna, 2 m above Sunbury, and 112 NW Philadelphia.

Northumberland Islands, a chain of islands in the Pacific ocean, near the NE coast of New Holland. Lon. 152 E, lat. 22 S.

Northumberland Strait, the S part of the gulf of St. Lawrence, between the island of St. John and the coast of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia

Northwich, a town in Cheshire, with a market on Friday, a cotton manufacture, and considerable salt-works. Mines of solid rock salt have been dug here to a great depth, from which immense quantities are raised; and much of it, in its crude state, is conveyed to Liverpool to be exported. Northwich is seated on the Dan, at its junction with the Weever, 20 m NE Chester, and 174 NW London.

Norton, a town of Massachusetts, in Bristol county. A great quantity of nails is made here, and it has a manufacture of ochre similar to that of Taunton. It is 28 m S Boston.

Norton, or Chipping Norton, a town in Oxfordshire, with a market on Wednesday. Here is a free-school founded by Edward VI, and a manufacture of horse-cloths, tilting, &c. It is 12 m SW Banbury, and 73 NW London.

Norton Sound, an inlet of the sea, on the W coast of N America, discovered by Cook in his last voyage. The entrance is between Cape Denbigh on the E, and Cape Danby on the W, about 70 m distance; both lying in the same latitude, and the latter in lon. 162 55 W, lat. 64 30 N.

Norwalk, a town of Connecticut, in Fairfield county, with two churches, and some iron-works. It has a small trade to New York and the W Indies, and is situate on an inlet of Long Island sound, 50 m NE New York. Lon. 73 25 W, lat. 41 8 N.

Norway, a kingdom of Europe, the most westerly part of the ancient Scandinavia. It is bounded on the W and N by the Northern ocean, E by Swedish Lapland and Sweden, and S by the Categat; extending from the Naze in lat. 57 30, to the North Cape in lat. 71 10. Its breadth, which is very unequal, is from 40 to 280 m. It is divided into the four governments of Aggerhuys, or Christiana, Bergen, Drontheim, and Wardhuys. From its rocky soil and northern position, Norway is not populous in proportion to its extent. The Norwegians maintain their own army, which consists of 24,000 foot and 6000 cavalry. Their troops are much esteemed for their bravery; and, like the Swiss mountaineers, are exceedingly attached to their country. Norway is blessed with a particular code, called the Norway law, compiled by Grieffelfeld, at the command of Christian V, the great legislator of his country. By this law, peasants are free, a few only excepted on some noble estates near Fredericstادت. The Norwegian peasants possess much spirit and fire in their manner; are frank, open, and undaunted, but not insolent; never fawning to their superiors, yet paying proper respect to those above them. The same causes which affect the population of Norway, operate likewise on the state of tillage, for the country does not produce sufficient corn for its own consumption; but it is rich in pasture, and feeds many cattle, sheep, and goats. The fisheries, particularly on the W coast, find employment and wealth for the natives, and supply the finest sailors for the Danish fleet. The principal fish are salmon, cod, ling, and whiting: the smallest are given as winter fodder to the cattle; and their livers yield train-oil. The extensive forests of oak and pine produce timber, spars, beams, and planks, beside charcoal, turpentine, bark, fuel, and even manure; and the birch (the bark of which is used as a covering for the roofs of houses) not only supplies fuel, but also a kind of wine. The general exports are tallow, butter, salt, dried fish, timber, planks, horses, horned cattle, silver, cobalt, alum, Prussian blue, copper, and iron. It abounds in lakes and rivers; the former so large that they appear like inlets of the sea; but the rivers are in general of a short course, except the Giomme. The mountains are numerous, and generally clothed with pines and firs: the grand Scandinavian chain, which runs from S to N, dividing this kingdom from Sweden, is known by distinct appellations; the chief are the ridges of Langfial, Dofrafial, Kolen, and Severnoi. The wild animals are the bear, lynx, wolf, fox, and hare; but the most singular creature is the lemming, or Norwegian mouse, of a reddish colour, and about five inches long. These animals proceed in vast numbers from the ridge of Kolen toward the sea, devouring every product of the soil in their course, and at last seem to devour each other. Norway was formerly governed by its own hereditary sovereigns. On the demise of Hagen v, in 1319, without male issue, his grandson in the female line, Magnus Smek, united in his person the kingdoms of Sweden and Norway. Magnus was succeeded in the kingdom of Norway by his son Hagen vi, husband of the celebrated Margaret, and, at his decease, in 1380, Norway was united to Denmark by their son Olof v, who dying without issue, Margaret herself was raised to the throne by the unanimous voice of the nation. On her death it descended, with Denmark and Sweden, to her nephew Eric. Sweden was afterward separated from Denmark by the valour and address of Gustavus Vasa; but Norway continues united to Denmark. The capital is Christiania, but Bergen is the most populous city.

Norwich, a city and the capital of Norfolk, and a bishop's see, with a market on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday. It is surrounded by a wall, now much decayed, and seated on the Yare, which is navigable to Yarmouth. It is a county of itself, governed by a mayor, and of considerable extent, but contains a number of gardens and orchards within the walls. There are, beside the cathedral, 36 parish-churches, two churches for the Flemings, some dissenting meeting-houses, and a Roman catholic chapel. It has a stately castle, on a hill, which is the shire-house and the county gaol; also a city and county-hospital, a lofty market house of free-stone, a free-school founded by Edward vi, and several charitable foundations. The ancient dukes of Norfolk had a palace here, which is still in existence as a workhouse. Near this city are the ruins of the castle of Kett, the tanner, by whose rebellion, in the reign of Edward vi, the city was reduced to a ruinous state. Norwich has manufactures of crapes, bombazines, and stuffs of various kinds. The number of inhabitants was 36,854 in 1801, and 37,256 in 1811. It is 43 m N Ipswich, and 108 NE London. Lon. 1 20 E, lat. 52 40 N.

Norwich, a city of Connecticut, in New London county. It is in three divisions, namely Chelsea, the Town, and Bean hill; and it has three churches. The executive courts of law are held at this place and New London alternately. Here are made paper of all kinds, stockings, buttons, stone and earthen ware, and all kinds of forge-work. It is seated on the Shetucket, at its junction with the Quinabang, whose united stream forms the Thames, 12 m N New London. Lon. 72 3 W, lat. 41 29 N.

Norwich, a town of Vermont, in Windfor county, seated on the Connecticut, opposite Hanover in New Hampshire, and 20 m N Windfor.

Nossen, a town of Upper Saxony, in Misnia, situate on the Freyburg Muidau, 18 m W Dresden.

Notchengong, a town of Hindoostan, in the province of Berar, 47 m SSW Nagpour, and 75 SSW Ellichpour.

Noteburg, a town of Russia, in the government of Petersburg, seated on an island in the lake Ladoga, at the place where the Neva issues. It has a good citadel, and was the capital of Ingria, before Petersburg was built. It is 25 m E Petersburg. Lon. 31 9 E, lat. 59 56 N.

Noto, a city of Sicily, capital of Val di Noto. It was ruined by an earthquake in 1693, and rebuilt on a better site. It has good streets and handsome buildings, and contains nearly 16,000 inhabitants. The vicinity produces excellent wines, and abundance of all the necessaries of life. It is 100 m SSW Messina. Lon. 15 14 E, lat. 36 53 N.

Nottingham, a borough and the capital of Nottinghamshire, governed by a mayor, with a market on Wednesday and Saturday. It stands on the side and summit of a rock, into which are cut some small habitations, and numerous vaults or cellars. At the W end, on a rocky eminence, is a castle, a magnificent modern structure, belonging to the duke of Newcastle, built on the site of an ancient fortress, celebrated in English history. It is a handsome town, distinguished by its spacious marketplace, and noted for its excellent ale. The number of inhabitants was 28,861 in 1801, and 34,253 in 1811. It is one of the principal seats of the stocking manufacture, particularly of the finer kinds, as those of silk and cotton; and has also a manufacture of coarse earthen ware. The malting business is likewise considerable, and in the neighbourhood are many coalpits. It has three parish-churches, and many meeting-houses for dissenters. Here Charles I set up his standard at the commencement of the civil war, which terminated in his destruction. Nottingham is seated on a river, which communicates with the Trent, a mile to the S. It is 16 m E Derby, and 124 N by W London. Lon. 1 2 W, lat. 52 58 N.

Nottingham, a town of Maryland, in Prince George county, situate on the Patuxent, 20 m SE Washington.

Nottingham, a town of New Hampshire, in Rockingham county, 14 m NNW Exeter.

Nottinghamshire, a county of England, bounded on the N by Yorkshire and Lincolnshire, E by the latter county, S by Leicestershire, and W by Derbyshire. It is 48 m long and 20 broad, containing 495,360 acres; is divided into seven hundreds, and 208 parishes; has nine market-towns; and sends eight members to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 140,350 in 1801, and 162,900 in 1811. It enjoys such a temperature of soil and climate, as to render it one of the most fertile and pleasant counties in England. The principal rivers are the Trent and Idle. Almost the whole of the middle and western parts were formerly occupied by the extensive forest of Shirwood, which is the only royal forest N of the Trent; but the wood has in most parts been cleared, and the extent of the forest much contracted by enclosures. The chief products of this county are coal, of which there is great plenty; a kind of stone somewhat like alabaster, but not so hard, which, when burnt, makes a plaster exceedingly hard, and with this the inhabitants generally lay the floors of their upper rooms, instead of boarding them: its other commodities are malt, hops, wool, licorice, and woad. The manufactures chiefly consist of framework-knitting, glass, and earthen ware.

Nova Scotia, a British province of N America, which formerly, till 1784, included the province of New Brunswick. It is bounded on the S and SE by the Atlantic, E by the gut of Canso, N by Northumberland strait, and NW by New Brunswick and the bay of Fundy. Its length is 235 m; from Cape Sable on the SW to Cape Canso on the NE; its extreme breadth is 88 m, but the mean of the peninsular part is not more than 45. It has several lakes, and a vast number of small rivers. The French settled here before they made any establishment in Canada, and called it Acadia. The first grant of lands was made by James I, of England, from whom it received the name of Nova Scotia. Since the first settlement it has more than once changed rulers and proprietors, nor was it confirmed to England till the peace of Utrecht, in 1713. Though situate in a favorable part of the temperate zone, the atmosphere, for a great part of the year, is clouded with a thick fog, which renders it unhealthy; and for four months it is intensely cold. A great part of the country lies in forest; and the soil (except on the banks of the rivers) is thin and barren. Halifax is the capital.

Nova Zembla, an island in the Frozen ocean, separated from the continent of Russia by the strait of Waigatz. It is 500 m long and from 100 to 200 broad, and was discovered by the English in 1553. In 1595, a Dutch vessel being cast away on the coast, the crew were obliged to winter here, and with great difficulty preserved their lives. Since that, some Russians have passed a winter without suffering so much. The country is represented as extremely desolate, producing no tree, nor any vegetable but moss and some few arctic plants. It is not supposed to have any human inhabitants. The animals seen there are white bears, white foxes, elks, reindeer, and rabbits. Lon. 52 to 78 E, lat. 70 to 78 N.

Novalesé, a town of Piedmont, at the foot of Mount Cenis and the source of the Doria, 40 m NW Turin.

Novalle, a town of Italy, in Trevisano, 10 m SW Treviso.

Novara, a town of Italy, in Milanese, which contains 17 churches beside the cathedral. It is seated on an eminence, near the Agogna, 30 m W by S Milan. Lon. 15 0 E, lat. 45 18 N.

Novellara, a town of Italy, in Modenese, capital of a small principality, with a castle. It is 17 m E by N Parma, and 18 NNW Modena.

Novi, a town of the territory of Genoa, with a strong castle on a mountain. It is the principal depot for goods going from Genoa to the N part of Italy and into Germany. Near this place, in 1799, the Austrians and Russians defeated the French, who lost nearly 10,000 men, and their general Joubert was killed. It is 27 m NNW Genoa.

Novi, a fortified town of Croatia, on the right bank of the Unna. In 1789, it was taken by the Austrians. It is 52 m SE Carlstadt. Lon. 16 55 E, lat. 45 8 N.

Novi Bazar, a town of European Turkey, in Servia, seated near the Orsova, 72 m W Nissa, and 103 S Belgrade. Lon. 21 1 E, lat. 43 35 N.

Novogorod, a city of Russia, capital of a government of the same name, and formerly called Great Novogorod, to distinguish it from other towns of the same appellation. It was, for a long time, governed by its own dukes; and was, in fact, a republic, under the jurisdiction of a nominal sovereign. Its territory extended to the N as far as the frontiers of Livonia and Finland; comprising great part of the province of Archangel, and a large district beyond the NW limits of Siberia. This city was the great mart of trade between Russia and the haueatic cities, and made the most rapid advances in opulence and population. Its power was so great, and its situation so impregnable, as to give rise to a proverb, Who can resist the Gods and Great Novogorod? But in the 15th century, this independent republic was obliged to submit to Ivan I, grand duke of Russia. It continued, nevertheless, the largest and most commercial city in Russia, and contained at least 400,000 souls. It was first desolated, in a manner, by the cruelties of Ivan II; but its splendour was not totally eclipsed until Peter the great built Petersburg, to which he transferred all the commerce of the Baltic that had before centered here. It now contains scarcely 7000 souls; and a vast number of churches and convents are melancholy monuments of its former magnificence. The town stretches on both sides of the Volkoff, a river of considerable depth and rapidity, which separates it into the Trading Part and the quarter of St. Sophia: in the latter is a large fortress, including the cathedral of St. Sophia, in which several princes of the ducal family of Russia are interred. Novogorod is situate near the N end of the lake Ilmen, 125 m SSE Petersburg. Lon. 31 45 E, lat. 58 25 N.

Novogorod, Niznei, a city of Russia, capital of a government of the same name, and an archbishop's see. It has a castle, surrounded by stone walls; also two cathedrals, 28 parish-churches, and five convents. The trade is considerable, and the shops richly furnished with all kinds of foreign and home goods. It is seated at the conflux of the Oka with the Volga, 280 m E by N Moscow. Noyers, a town of France, in the department of Yonne, seated on the Serin, 19 m ESE Auxerre.

Noyon, a town of France, in the department of Oise. It gave birth to the famous Calvin; and was lately an episcopal see. It is seated near the Oise, 22 m NW Soissons, and 60 N by E Paris.

Nozeroy, a town of France, in the department of Jura, with a castle, seated on a mountain, 20 m SE Salins.

Nubia, a country of Africa, bounded on the N by Egypt. E by the Red sea, S by Abyssinia and Darfoor, and W by Bornou. It is about 600 m long, and 450 broad. The Nile runs through it; on the banks of which it is fruitful, but in other places barren, sandy, and destitute of water. The inhabitants make their bread and drink of a small round seed called doca, or seff, which is a kind of millet. Their houses have mud walls, are very low, and covered with reeds. The dress of the better sort is a vest without sleeves, and they have no coverings for their heads, legs, and feet. The common people wrap a piece of linen cloth about them, and the children go quite naked. They are a stupid debauched people, but profess to be Mohammedans. The productions of the country are gold, elephants teeth, civet, and sandal-wood; and a great many slaves are sent into Egypt. It is divided into several kingdoms, and those best known to the Europeans are Sennar and Dongola.

Oodamally, a town of Hindoostan, in Coimbatore, 30 m SSE Coimbatore.

Oonalaska, one of the islands of the Northern Archipelago, visited by Cook in his last voyage. The natives appeared to be very peaceable, having been restrained by the Russians, who now keep them in a state of subjection. As the island furnishes them with subsistence, so it does, in some measure, with clothing, which is chiefly composed of skins. The upper garment, which is made like a waggoner's frock, reaches down to the knees. Beside this, they wear a waistcoat or two, a pair of breeches, a fur cap, and a pair of boots, the legs of which are formed of some kind of strong gut, but the soles and upper leathers are of Russia leather. Fish and other sea animals, birds, roots, berries, and even sea weed, compose their food. They did not appear to be very desirous of iron, nor to want any other instrument except sewing needles, their own being formed of bone. With these they sew their canoes, make their clothes, and work curious embroidery. Instead of thread, they use the fibres of plants, split to the thickness required. All sewing is performed by the females, who are shoemakers, tailors, and boat-builders. They manufacture mats, and baskets of grass, which are both strong and beautiful. The neatness and perfection in most of their works show they are not deficient in ingenuity and perseverance. The E extremity of the island is called Cape Providence. Lon. 166 30 W, lat. 53 40 N.

Oran, a city and seaport of Algiers, in the province of Mascara, with an excellent harbour, almost opposite Carthage, in Spain. It is built on the side and at the foot of a mountain, which overlooks it from the N and NW; and on the ridge of this mountain are two castles that command the city on the one side and the town of Mazalquivir on the other. To the S and SE are two other castles, on a level with the lower part of the city, but separated from it by a deep-winding valley, through which flows a rivulet of excellent water. Oran was taken by the Spaniards in 1509, and retaken in 1708. In 1732, the Spaniards became masters of it again. In 1790, it was destroyed by an earthquake, little beside the exterior walls being left standing; and 2000 persons perished. It has since been evacuated by the Spaniards, who when they were first masters of the place built several churches and other edifices in the manner and style of the Roman architecture. It is seated on a bay of the Mediterranean, 225 m WSW Algiers. Lon. 0 5 W, lat. 35 58 N.

Orange, a city of France, in the department of Vaucluse, lately a bishop's see. It was an important place in the time of the Romans. A triumphal arch, 200 paces from the town, was formerly within its limits; and here are also the remains of a fine amphitheatre, some aqueducts, &c. The fortifications were demolished by Lewis XIV, in 1682. Orange was the capital of a principality of the same name, 17 m long and 12 broad, given by Charlemagne to William au Gornet, as a reward for his military services. It was possessed successively by the houses of Beaux, Chalons, and Nassau; and on the death of William III of England, in 1702, Frederic William of Prussia claimed this principality as his heir. Lewis XIV had seized it during the war with king William; but he exchanged it in 1713, with the king of Prussia, for the town of Geldres. The city is seated in a fine plain, on the river Aigues, 12 m N Avignon, and 57 S Valence. Lon. 4 49 E, lat. 44 9 N.

Orkened, a town of Sweden, in Schoonen, 24 m N Christianstadt.

Orkneys, or Orkney Islands, the ancient Orcaades, a cluster of islands to the N of Scotland, from which they are separated by Pentland Frith. They lie between 57 35 and 49 16 N lat. and are upward of 30 in number, of which one greatly exceeds the other in extent. This, like the principal one of Shetland, is sometimes dignified with the appellation of Mainland, but is more frequently called Pomona. Beyond this island, to the NE are seen, among others, Rowfa, Eglisha, Weltra, Shappinsha, Eda, Stronfa, Sanda, and N Ronalsha; and to the S appear Hoy, and S Ronalsha, with others of inferior note, many of them small and wholly appropriated to the pasturage of sheep. The whole group contained 24 445 inhabitants in 1801, and 23,238 in 1811. The currents and tides which flow between these islands are rapid and dangerous; and near the small isle of Swinna are two whirlpools, very dangerous to mariners, especially in calms. The sea-coast swarms with seals and otters, and is visited by whales, cod, ling, haddocks, herrings, and other fish; and on the shores are found large oysters, muscles, cockles, &c. The islands are visited by eagles, falcons, wild geese, and ducks in great variety, herons, hawks, gulls, &c. Springs of pure water are found in all the mountainous parts of these islands; and there are numerous lakes and rivulets abounding in fish. The heath, on the mountains, shelters grouse, plovers, snipes, &c. but there are no partridges, hares, nor foxes. There are great numbers of small sheep and bees. The products of the valleys and plains are big and oats, but no other sort of grain. Except juniper, wild myrtle, heath, and a shrub called cyor-hordon, there is scarce a tree or plant to be seen; but this nakedness cannot have been their former state, as many trunks of large oaks are to be found in all the moor. The climate of these islands in summer is moist and cold; but in winter there is never much snow, and that lies only a short time. Preceding the autumnal equinox, they are visited by dreadful storms of wind, rain, and thunder. For about three weeks in midsummer, they enjoy the rays of the sun almost without intermission; but for the same space in winter, that luminary hardly rises above the horizon, and is commonly obscured by clouds and mists. In this gloomy season, the absence of day is supplied partly by moonlight, and partly by the radiance of the Aurora Borealis, which here gives a light nearly equal to that of the moon. The coasts afford numerous bays and harbours for the fisheries. The chief exports are linen and woollen yarn, stockings, butter, dried fish, herrings, oil, feathers and skins of various kinds, and kelp. The English language prevails in all these islands, although there are many words in the Norse, or Norwegian, still in use. The inhabitants have the general character of being frugal, sagacious, circumspect, religious, and hospitable; but the common people are much addicted to superstition, and though injured to great fatigue, will neither work nor go to sea on particular unlucky days. The islands of Orkney and Shetland constitute one of the counties of Scotland, and it sends a member to parliament. The number of inhabitants in 1811 was 46,153.

Orlamunda, a town of Upper Saxony, in Thuringia, seated on the Saal, opposite the influx of the Orla, 40 m waw Altenburg.

Orleanois, a late province of France, divided by the river Loire into the Upper and Lower. It is a very plentiful country, and now forms the department of Loiret.

Orleans, a city of France, capital of the department of Loiret, and a bishop's see. It is seated on the Loire, and has a canal thence to the Loing, near Montargis. Under the sons of Clovis, it was the capital of a kingdom. In 1428, it stood a memorable siege against the English, which was raised by the celebrated Joan of Arc, called the Maid of Orleans. It is now considered as one of the largest and most pleasant cities in France; and its commerce consists in stockings, sheepskins, wine, brandy, corn, grocery, and particularly sugar, which is brought raw from Nantes and Rochelle. The faubourg of Paris is of a prodigious length, and that of Olivet, on the left side of the Loire, has a communication with the city by a bridge of nine arches. Near the city is a forest, containing 94,000 acres, planted with oak and other valuable trees. Orleans is 30 m NE Blois, and 60 ssw Paris. Lon. 15 54 E, lat. 47 54 N.

It is by far the most populous of the territorial governments belonging to the United States, and in 1810 contained 76,556 inhabitants.

Orleans, New, a city of the United States, capital of the territory of the same name. It was built in 1720, under the regency of the duke of Orleans, and intended to have been the metropolis of Louisiana, but the design proved abortive. In 1788, seven-eighths of it were destroyed by fire, but it was soon rebuilt on a regular plan, and is become a place of considerable importance, both on account of its commerce and population. It is fortified on the sides exposed to the land, and has a canal that passes 6 m N to the lake Pontchartran, where there is a fort. On the side next the river it is open, and secured from inundations by a raised bank, to which vessels can lie close, and receive or discharge their cargoes as at a wharf. From the advantages of its situation, it is becoming a general receptacle for the produce of the extensive countries on the Mississippi and its various branches, which are shipped hence for Mexico and the W India Islands. The inhabitants are estimated at 15,000. In 1812, the buildings of the city, vessels in the river, and country around, suffered great damage by a hurricane that continued upward of four hours. It is seated on the N side of the E and main branch of the Mississippi, 80 m from its mouth, and 490 S New Madrid. Lon. 89 59 W, lat. 29 58 N.

Ormus, a celebrated island, in a strait of the same name, at the entrance of the gulf of Persia, 9 m SE Gonabron. It is about 12 m in circuit, and seems to be a mass of rocks and shells thrown up by a violent convulsion of nature. In 1507, the Portuguese were permitted to form a settlement here; and it was afterward frequented by a number of rich merchants. In 1622, the Persians, by the assistance of the English, expelled the Portuguese, and demolished the buildings. Some time after, the Persians rebuilt the fort, and though they could never bring it to be a place of trade as before, it is still the key of the gulf of Persia, on account of the commodiousness of the harbour. It is almost deserted; for it produces nothing but salt, which sometimes is two inches deep upon the surface of the earth. Lon. 56 25 E, lat. 27 12 N.

Ormans, a town of France, in the department of Doubs, seated on the Louvre, 10 m SE Besançon.

Oronoko, a river of Terra Firma, which issues from the small lake Ipava, in lat. 5 5 N, flows E and SE to the lake Parima, from which it runs toward the W; but after receiving the Guaviari, it bends N, then NE and E till it enters the Atlantic by an extended delta of mouths. Seven of these branches are navigable, but only the two extreme ones are proper for large vessels; the first, called the Manamo, branches off opposite the town of St. Thomas, and flows N to the gulf of Paria; the other, which is the main stream, continues its course to the E, and enters the ocean in lat. 8 30 N. In its singular winding course, estimated at 1400 m, it receives many large rivers; and its chief estuary is so deep and impetuous, that it stems the tide, and preserves the freshness of its water to within 12 leagues of the sea. In September it overflows its banks, and fertilizes the adjacent plains. See Parima.

Ostend, a fortified seaport of the Netherlands, in Flanders, seated among a number of canals, and almost surrounded by two of the largest of them, into which ships of great burden may enter with the tide. It is famous for the long siege it sustained against the Spaniards, from July 1601 to September 1604, when it surrendered by an honorable capitulation. On the death of Charles II of Spain, the French seized Ostend; but, in 1756, after the battle of Ravilies, it was retaken by the allies. It was again taken by the French in 1745, but restored in 1748. In the war of 1756, the French garrisoned this town for the empress queen, Maria Theresa. In 1792, the French once more Otaia, one of the Society islands, in the Pacific ocean. It lies N of Ulitea; and is divided from it by a strait, which, in the narrowest part, is not more than 2 m broad. This island is smaller and more barren than Ulitea, but has two good harbours.

Otaheitee, an island in the Pacific ocean, discovered in 1767, by captain Wallis, who called it George the Third Island. Captain Cook came hither in 1768, to observe the transit of Venus; and it was visited twice afterward by that celebrated navigator. It consists of two peninsulas, connected by a low neck of land 2 m over, and is about 30 leagues in circuit. Great part of it is covered with woods, consisting partly of bread-fruit trees, palms, cocoa-nut trees, plantains, bananas, mulberries, sugar-canes, and others peculiar to the climate, particularly a kind of pineapple, and the dragon-tree. The birds most common are two sorts of paroquets, one of a beautiful sapphirine blue, another of a greenish colour, with a few red spots; a kingfisher, of a dark green, with a collar of the same hue round its white throat; a large cuckoo; several sorts of pigeons or doves; and a bluish heron. The only quadrupeds found on the island were hogs, dogs, and rats. The people have mild features and a pleasing countenance. They are about the ordinary size of Europeans, of a pale mahogany brown, with fine black hair and eyes, and wear a piece of cloth round their middle, and another wrapped about the head, like a turban. The women wear a piece of cloth, with a hole in the middle, through which they pass their heads, so that one part of the garment hangs down behind, and the other before, to the knees; a fine white cloth, like muslin, passes over this in various elegant turns round the body, a little below the breast, forming a kind of tunic, of which one turn sometimes falls gracefully across the shoulder. Both sexes are marked with black stains, occasioned by puncturing the skin, and rubbing a black colour into the wounds. As the climate is one of the hottest in the world, their houses have seldom any walls, but consist only of a roof, thatched with the long prickly leaves of the palm-nut tree, and supported by a few pillars made of the bread-fruit tree. Their cloth is made of the fibrous bark of the mulberry tree, which is beaten with a kind of mallet; and a glue, made of the hibiscus esculentus, is employed to make the bark cohere. Some of these pieces are two or three yards wide, and 50 yards long. Though the natives far excel most of the Americans in the knowledge and practice of the arts of ingenuity, yet they had not invented any method of boiling water. Long nails on the fingers are a mark of distinction among them, as among the Chinese; for they imply that such persons only as have no occasion to work could suffer them to grow to that length. The two sexes eat separately; and their provisions are chiefly fish, pork, coconuts, bread-fruit, and bananas; and they employ sea-water as a sauce both to fish and pork. Nothing can exceed their agility in swimming, diving, and climbing trees; and they are praised for their gentleness, goodnature, and hospitality. Omai, a native of this island, was brought over to England by captain Cook, and carried back by him in his last voyage. Point Venus, at the N end, is in lon. 149 36 W, lat. 17 40 S.

Ourthe, or Ourt, a new department of France, including the s part of Liege and of Limburg, and the sw part of Luxemburg. It has its name from a river, which flows into the Meuse, above Liege, the capital of the department.

Ouse, a river in Yorkshire, formed of the Ure and Swale, which rise near each other in the romantic tract called Richmondshire, and unite a little below Aliborough. The Ouse flows through York, where it is navigable for considerable vessels; proceeding thence by Ca-wood, Selby, and Howden, it receives the Wharfe, Derwent, Aire, and Don, and then meets the Trent on the borders of Lincolnshire, where their united stream forms the Humber.

Ouse, a river in Sussex, formed of two branches, one of which rises in St. Leonard forest, the other in the forest of Worth, and they unite above Lewes. It flows by that town to Newhaven, below which it forms a considerable haven, and enters the English channel.

Ouse, Great, a river that rises in Northamptonshire, near Brackley, and flows to Buckingham, Stoney Stratford, Newport Pagnel, Olney, and Bedford, where it is navigable. Thence it proceeds to St. Neot, Huntingdon, St. Ives, Ely, and Lynn, below which it enters the Lincolnshire Wash.

Ouse, Little, a river that rises in the s part of Norfolk, and dividing that county from Suffolk, as it flows westward, becomes navigable at Thetford, and afterward joins the Great Ouse.

Oussere, a town and fort of Hindostan, in Mysore, taken by the English in 1792. It is 19 m se Bangalore, and 69 ene Seringapatam.

Owhyhee, the largest and most eastern of the Sandwich islands, in the Pacific ocean. Its length from n to s is 84 m, and its breadth 70. Near the middle is Mowna Roa, a mountain that rises in three peaks, perpetually covered with snow, and may be seen at 40 leagues distance. To the n of this mountain, the coast consists of high and abrupt cliffs, down which fall many beautiful cascades; and the whole country is covered with cocoa-nut and bread-fruit trees. The peaks of the mountain on the sw side appear to be about half a mile high. To the s of this mountain, the ground is covered with cinders, and in many places has black streaks, which seem to mark the course of a lava, that has flowed from the mountain to the shore. The southern promontory looks like the mere dregs of a volcano. The projecting headland is composed of broken and craggy rocks piled irregularly on one another, and terminating in sharp points; yet, amidst these ruins, are many patches of rich soil, carefully laid out in plantations. The fields are enclosed by stone fences, and are interspersed with groves of cocoa-nut trees. Here captain Cook, in 1779, fell a victim to a sudden resentment of the natives, with whom he unfortunately had a dispute. Lon. of the e point 154 56 w, lat. 19 34 n.

Owram, North, a town of W York-shire, with various woollen manufactures. The inhabitants were 4887 in 1801, and 5306 in 1811. It is 3 m se Halifax. South Owram, with 3615 inhabitants, is 2 m se Halifax.

Oxford, a town of Maryland, in Talbot county, seated on an inlet of Chesapeake bay, 12 m s Easton.

Oxford, the capital of Oxfordshire, and a bishop's see, with a market on Wednesday and Saturday. It is seated at the conflux of the Cherwell with the Thames, and has a canal to Braunston, in Northamptonshire. The city, with the suburbs, is of a round form, 3 m in circuit, and was anciently surrounded by walls, of which considerable remains are yet to be seen; as also of its extensive castle, the tower of which now serves for a county gaol. The number of inhabitants was 12,107 in 1801, and 12,931 in 1811. It has, beside the cathedral, 13 parish churches, a famous university, a noble market-place, and a magnificent bridge. The university is generally supposed to have been a seminary for learning before the time of Alfred, although it owed its revival and consequence to his liberal patronage. Here are 20 colleges and five halls, several of which stand in the streets, and give the city an air of magnificence. The colleges are provided with sufficient revenues for the maintenance of a master, fellow, and students. In the halls the students live, either wholly, or

The colleges are, University, Balliol, Merton, Exeter, Oriel, Queens, New, Lincoln, All Souls, Magdalen, Brasenose, Corpus Christi, Christ Church, Trinity, St. John Baptist, Jesus, Wadham, Pembroke, Worcester, and Hertford. Of these, the most ancient is University college, founded before the year 872; and to Christ Church college, begun by cardinal Wolfsey, and finished by Henry VIII, belongs the cathedral. The halls are Alban, Edmund, St. Mary, New Inn, and St. Mary Magdalen. Among the libraries in the university, the most distinguished is the Bodleian, founded by sir Thomas Bodley; those of All Souls college, Christ Church, Queens, New, St. John, Exeter, and Corpus Christi. Among other public buildings, are the theatre, the Ashmolean museum, the Clarendon printing-house, the Radcliffe infirmary, and an observatory. Magdalen bridge, beside the beauty of its architecture, has this singularity, that more than half of it is on dry ground, and the rest covers two small stripes of the Cherwell; this bridge is 526 feet long. At Oxford, king John, compelled by his barons, summoned a parliament to meet, in 1258; the proceedings of which were so disorderly, that it was known afterward by the name of the Mad Parliament. Charles I assembled a parliament here, in 1625, in consequence of the plague then raging in London; and, in 1644, he summoned such of the members of both houses as were devoted to his interests: these were seceders from the parliament then sitting at Westminster. This city was distinguished for its attachment to that unfortunate king, who here held his court during the whole civil war. Without the town are many ruins of the fortifications erected in that war. Oxford is governed by a mayor, dependent on the chancellor and vicechancellor of the university; and sends four members to parliament, two for the university, and two for the city. It is 50 m s by E Coventry, and 54 wNW London. Lon. 1 15 W, lat. 51 46 N.

Oxfordshire, a county of England, bounded on the E by Buckinghamshire, W by Gloucestershire, S by Berkshire, and N by Warwickshire and Northamptonshire. The extreme length is 48 m, and breadth 26, but its form is very irregular. It contains 474,880 acres; is divided into 14 hundreds, and 219 parishes; has one city and 12 market-towns; and sends nine members to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 109,610 in 1801, and 119,191 in 1811. The soil, though various, is fertile in corn and grass. The S part, especially on the borders of Buckinghamshire, is hilly and woody, having a continuation of the Chiltern hills running through it. The SW part is also elevated and stony. The middle is, in general, a rich country, watered by numerous streams running from S to N, and terminating in the Thames. Of these, the most considerable are the Windrush, Evenlode, Cherwell, and Tame; the latter, although an inconsiderable rivulet, has obtained some importance from having been supposed to give name to the Thames. The products of Oxfordshire are chiefly those common to the midland farming counties. Its hills yield ochre, pipe-clay, and other earths, useful for various purposes. Corn and malt are conveyed from it, by the Thames, to the metropolis.

days in a uniform direction to the NW, without discovering land. In the distress he suffered in this voyage, before he discovered the Ladrone islands, he had the consolation of enjoying such uninterrupted fine weather, with fair winds, that he gave this ocean the name of Pacific. The Spaniards, on passing the Isthmus of Darien from N to S, at the first discovery of this ocean, named it the South Sea; but with respect to America, it is more properly the western ocean. On one side of the equator, it is called the North Pacific Ocean; and on the other, the South Pacific Ocean.

Padua, a fortified city of Italy, capital of Paduano, and a bishop's see. It is 7 m in circuit, but much less considerable than formerly; for great part of the area within the walls is unbuild, and the town in general so thinly inhabited, that grass grows in many of the streets. The houses are built on piazzas, which, when the town was in a flourishing state, may have had a magnificent appearance; but they now rather give it a more gloomy air. The cathedral is one of the richest in Italy; and in the sacristy is a statue of the celebrated Petrarch, who was a canon of the church, and left to it a part of his library. The Franciscan church is dedicated to St. Antonio, the patron of the city, whose body is enclosed in a sarcophagus, under an altar in the middle of the chapel. Near this church is the school of St. Antonio, where many of the actions of the saint are painted in fresco; some of them by Titian. The church of St. Justina is noted for a rich Mosaic pavement. The hall of the townhouse is the largest in Europe, and contains the cenotaph of Livy, who was a native of Padua. The university, once so celebrated, is now on the decline. Here is a considerable cloth manufacture; but the city swarms with beggars, who ask charity in the name of St. Antonio. Padua was taken by the French in 1796. It is seated on the Brenta and Baciuglione, in a fine plain, 20 m W by S Venice. Lon. 11 53 E, lat. 45 14 N.

Paduano, a province of Italy, in the territory of Venice, 40 m long and 35 broad; bounded on the E by Dogado, S by Polefina di Rovigo, W by Veronese, and N by Vicentino. It is well watered, and one of the most fertile countries in Italy. Padua is the capital.

Padula, a town of Naples, in Principato Citra, 14 m N Policastro.

Pagahn, a decayed city of the kingdom of Birmah, capital of a province of the same name. It is said to have been abandoned in the 13th century in consequence of a divine admonition. The remains of its ancient splendour are numerous mouldering temples, and the vestiges of a fort. It is seated on the Irrawaddy, 110 m SW Ummerepoora. Lon. 94 34 E, lat. 21 10 N.

Pagliano, a town of Naples, in Abruzzo, 15 m ESE Aquila.

Pailley, a town of Scotland, the largest in Renfrewshire. It has considerable manufactures of silk and linen gauze, lawn, muslin, cambric, thread, &c. also extensive soap, candle, and cotton works; and is deemed the first manufacturing town in Scotland. The river White Cart divides it into two parts, which communicate by three bridges. The part on the E side of the river is called the Abbey parish, and contains the magnificent remains of an abbey church, the only one which Pailley formerly required. The other part, now designated by Pailley, has three parish-churches, and several meeting-houses for dissenting congregations. By means of the river, and a canal, vessels of 40 tons can come up and unload at the quay. In 1801 the number of inhabitants was 17,026 in the town, and 14,153 in the abbey parish; and in 1811 the number was 19,937 in the former, and 16,785 in the latter. It is 10 m W Glasgow. Lon. 4 26 W, lat. 55 52 N.

Paita, a seaport of Peru, with an excellent harbour. It has frequently been plundered by the buccaners; and in 1741, it was plundered and burnt by commodore Anson. The bay is defended by a fort. It is 280 m NW Truxillo. Lon. 80 54 W, lat. 5 5 S.

Palermo, a fortified city of Sicily, in Val di Mazara, capital of the island, and an archbishop's see, with a university. It stands on a bay of the same name, on the N coast, near the extremity of a kind of natural amphitheatre, formed by high and rocky mountains. The country between the city and the mountains is one of the richest plains in the world; the whole appearing a magnificent garden, filled with fruitful trees, and watered by fountains and rivulets. The inhabitants of Palermo are estimated at 150,000. Two great streets, the Cassaro and Maqueda, intersect each other in the centre of the city, where is a handsome square, called the Ottangolo; from the centre of this is seen the whole of these noble streets, and the four gates that terminate them, each at the distance of half a mile. The Porto Felice opens to the Marino, a delightful walk, which has on one side the wall of the city, and on the other the sea; and in the centre is a kind of temple, frequently made use of as an orchestra. The royal residence is situate at the top of the Cassaro, and commands a view of the city and surrounding scenery; it is an extensive and irregular building, but the apartments are splendid and elegantly decorated. The palaces belonging to the princes are much admired for their situation and elegance; and the houses of the nobility are fine buildings, but their outward effect is destroyed by converting their lower part into stables and coach-houses. Palermo has upward of 100 churches, many of them rich and magnificent; also 96 convents, with superb chapels to each, and innumerable spots dedicated to some favourite saint. The cathedral is a large Gothic structure, supported within by 20 columns of oriental granite, and divided into a great number of chapels; some of them are extremely rich, particularly that of St. Rosalia, the patroness of Palermo, whose relics are preserved in a large box of silver, enriched with precious stones. Here are also found the tombs of several of the ancient Norman kings, and of the emperors Henry VI and Frederick II, of the finest porphyry. The city is crowded with statues of sovereigns and tutelar saints, placed in small courts and squares upon pedestals of colossal proportion and tasteless form. In the streets women hide their heads in black veils; a very ancient mode of dress in this island. This city has suffered greatly, at different periods, by earthquakes or inundations. The harbour, defended by a mole and two castles, is open to the sea from the NE; and even at the anchoring place, ships are in danger when a westerly wind rushes through the valley of Colli between the mountains. About the middle of the 11th century, the Norman king Roger established silk manufactures in this city, by means of prisoners taken in his war with the Greeks, and they still flourish, though not so lucrative since the manufacture has extended to Italy. A mile from Palermo is a celebrated convent of capuchins, in which is a vault made use of as a receptacle for the dead. It consists of four wide passages, each about 40 feet long, with niches along the sides, in which the bodies are set upright, clothed in coarse garments, with their heads, arms, and feet bare. They are prepared for this situation by keeping them six months upon a gridiron, over a slow fire, till all the fat and moisture are consumed. In some of the higher niches they are laid out at full length, and at the top are young children. On the floor are handsome trunks, containing the bodies of persons of distinction, the keys of which are kept by the relations. Palermo, in 1799, became the residence of the court, when the French made themselves masters of Naples. It is 110 m W Messina, and 180 s by W Naples. Lon. 13 34 E, lat. 38 12 N.

Palistine, a country in the SW part of Syria, so called from the Philistines, who inhabited the seacoast. In the scriptures it is styled the Land of Canaan, and the Promised Land; it is also called the Holy Land, as consecrated by the residence of the Deity through all ages of Jewish history, and as having been the scene of the ministry of Jesus Christ. It is divided from the other parts of Syria on the N by Mount Libanus, and on the E by the river Jordan and the Dead Sea; on the S it is bounded by Arabia Petraea, and on the W by the Mediterranean sea. It is fertile in general, abounding, where cultivated, with corn, wine, honey, and oil; and it might supply the neighbouring country with all these, as it anciently did, were the present inhabitants equally industrious. This country was by seditions, in the reign of Rehoboham, divided into the kingdoms of Judah and Israel; and after the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, it was divided into three parts, called Judah, Samaria, and Galilee. Even yet it is considered as divided into the same three parts, the capitals of which are Jerusalem, Napolis, and Nazareth.

Palmas; see Canary.

Palmyra, or Tadmor, once a magnificent city of Syria, originally built by king Solomon. On the decline of the Macedonian empire in the east, it became the capital of a principality, under the name of Palmyra; and it declared for the Romans, on Adrian marching his army through Syria to Egypt. The city flourished and increased to the time of Aurelian, when it resisted the Roman power, under queen Zenobia, who held it out a long time, but was at length taken captive, and led in triumph through the streets of Rome. Soon afterward the inhabitants massacred the soldiers who had been left in garrison; which outrage occasioned the return of Aurelius, who, having made himself master of the place, caused all the inhabitants to be destroyed, and gave the pillage of the city to the soldiers. The stupendous ruins of this city are in the midst of a sandy desert, bounded on three sides by high mountains. They were visited, in 1751, by Mr. Wood, who published a splendid account of them in 1753. The inhabitants then consisted of about forty families, living in mud cottages, erected within the spacious court of a once magnificent temple. Palmyra is 100 m SE Aleppo. Lon. 38 50 E, lat. 33 20 N.

Paragea, or Palawan, the most westerly of the Philippine islands, and the largest of the cluster called Calamianes. It is 180 m long and from 20 to 40 broad, divided between the king of Borneo and the Spaniards, with some independent natives in the interior parts, who are black, and have no fixed place of abode. The Spaniards have a garrison at the N end of the island, at a place called Tatay. Lon. 118 45 E, lat. 11 0 N.

Paraguay, a country of S. America, bounded on the N by Amazonia, E by Brasil, S by Patagonia, and W by Tucuman and Chaco. It is 1100 m in length, and from 300 to 600 in breadth. It has numerous lakes and rivers: of the latter, the three principal are the Parana, Paraguay, and Uruguay; the united streams of which form the Plata. These rivers annually overflow their banks; and, on their recess, leave the soil extremely fertile. This vast country appears to be mountainous to the N and NW; but many parts are still unknown. The principal province of which we have any knowledge is Plata, or Buenos Ayres, which, with all the adjacent parts, is one continued plain for several hundred miles; extremely fertile, and producing cotton in great abundance, tobacco, and the valuable herb called Paraguay, which is peculiar to this country, and the infusion of which is drank, in all the Spanish provinces of S. America, instead of tea. Here are also a variety of fruits and very rich pasture; but the country is destitute of woods. Cattle, sheep, horses, and mules are in great abundance; of the latter many thousands are annually sent to Peru. In the mountains toward Tucuman, the condor, the largest bird of the vulture tribe, is not unfrequent; and the ostrich is found in the wide plains. Several independent tribes of indigenes live in the interior; one of them, called Abipons, are a warlike race, and by a novelty in American manners, chiefly cavalry, securing and taming the wild horses introduced by the Spaniards. In 1515, the Spaniards discovered this country by sailing up the Plata, and, in 1535, founded the town of Buenos Ayres. In 1580, the jesuits were admitted into these fertile regions, and in the next century, founded the famous missions of Paraguay: these were a number of colonies, each governed by two jesuits, one of whom was rector, the other his curate; and in process of time, merely by the most wonderful address, they acquired an absolute dominion, both spiritual and temporal, over the natives. In 1767, the court expelled the jesuits, and the natives were put upon the same footing with the other Indians of the Spanish part of S. America. Buenos Ayres is the capital.

Paraiba, a province of Brasil, between those of Rio Grande and Tamaraica. It abounds in sugar-canes, brazil-wood, tobacco, and cotton. The chief town is of the same name, seated on the river Paraiba, 10 m from the sea. The Dutch got possession of it, in 1635, but the Portuguese retook it soon after. It has three forts, a magnificent cathedral, and many stately houses. Lon. 35 11 W, lat. 6 57 S.

Paramaribo, the capital of Surinam, in Guayana, and the chief place of the Dutch colonies in S. America. It has a small but strong citadel; and a road for shipping, where there are seldom less than 80 vessels loading coffee, sugar, cotton, and indigo. The streets are straight, and lined with orange, shaddock, tamarind, and lemon trees, in continual bloom. It surrendered to the English in 1799, and in 1803. It is situate on the W side of the river Surinam, 16 m from its mouth. Lon. 55 15 W, lat. 5 53 S.

Parima, a lake of S America, near the borders of Amazonia and Guayana, of a square form, 80 m long and 40 broad. It seems to be a kind of inundation formed by the Oronoko; for that river enters on the n and issues on the w side of the lake, near its nw angle. From the se of this lake issues the White river, called also the Parima, which flows s to the Black river, and thence se to the river Amazon. On the w of this lake, before the main stream of the Oronoko turns to the n, there are two other branches that flow from it to the Black river. Hence there are three communications between those two great rivers, the Oronoko and the Amazon.

Paris, the metropolis of France, the see of an archbishop, and the seat of a university. The river Seine, which crosses it, forms two small islands, called Ile du Palais and Ile Notre Dame; the first is the ancient city of Paris, and had its name from a building that was formerly the residence of the kings, and afterward resigned to the parliament. Paris has 16 gates, and is 15 m in circuit, including the suburbs. That part of it called the ville is situate to the north, the university to it south, and the city in the centre. The streets are narrow, and generally without accommodation for foot passengers. The houses are built of freestone, many of them seven stories high, and often contain a different family on every floor. The number of inhabitants, by an official statement in 1810, was 547,756. There are nine principal bridges in Paris, but only three occupy the whole breadth of the Seine, which is not half so large as the Thames at London. There are a great number of public fountains, and some triumphal arches. Of the squares, the finest is the Place de Louis xv, of an octagon form, in which was an equestrian statue, in bronze, of that monarch. This square (then called the Place de la Revolution) was the scene of the execution of Lewis xv, his consort, and his sister. Beside the cathedral of Notre Dame, one of the largest in Europe, Paris has many fine churches. The abbey of St. Genevieve was founded by king Clovis, whose monument is still to be seen in the church: it has a library of 24,000 printed books and 2000 manuscripts, also a valuable cabinet of antiquities and natural curiosities. The new church of St. Genevieve, now called the Pantheon, was destined by the national assembly, in 1791, to receive the remains of such great men as had merited well of their country. The Bastille, built as a fortress by Charles v, lately served for a state prison; but it was destroyed by the people, in the beginning of the revolution. The university, founded by Charles the fat, consists of four faculties; namely, divinity, the civil and canon law, physic, and the sciences. The finest college is that of the Four Nations, called also Mazarin, from the cardinal, its founder. Among the public libraries, that called the royal holds the first rank, in respect both to the extent of the buildings, and the number of volumes. The royal observatory is built of freestone, and neither iron nor wood has been employed in the erection. The botanical garden is worthy of its appellation of royal. The four principal palaces are the Louvre, the Tuileries, the Palais Royal, and the Luxemburg. In the Louvre is deposited the finest collection of paintings and statues in the world; the principal of them lately brought from various parts of Italy. The garden of the Tuileries, in front of the palace and on the banks of the Seine, is the finest public walk in Paris. The Palais Royal was long the property of the dukes of Orleans; and the interior courts have been embellished with many beautiful buildings, with shops, coffeehouses, and a garden, which render it like a perpetual fair. The Luxemburg is famous for its gallery, in which are twenty exquisite paintings by Rubens. The Hospital-general, which also goes by the name of la Salpêtrerie (saltpetre being formerly made here) is a noble foundation for the female sex; near 7000 of whom are here provided for, and live under the inspection of sixty sisters. To this foundation belongs the castle of Bicêtre, defended on all sides by a wall of considerable circuit, which contains within it many large buildings and several open places; and here near 4000 persons of the other sex are maintained. The Hospital de la Pietie, where poor children are brought up, constitutes also a part of the Hospital-general. These three foundations, with the Hotel Dieu, have one common fund, amounting to full two millions of livres a year. The Hotel des Invalides, for the wounded and superannuated soldiery, built by Lewis XIV, is a magnificent structure; as is the military school in the Champ de Mars, founded by Lewis XV. The two principal theatres are the Theatre de la Nation and the Italian theatre; which, in point of elegance and convenience, are worthy of the capital of a great nation. The Monnoie, or mint, is a noble building, situate on that side of the Seine, opposite the Louvre. The Samaritan is a beautiful edifice, at the end of the bridge leading to the Louvre, and contains an engine for conveying the water of the Seine to all the parts of the ville. The Hotel de Ville is an ancient structure; this tribunal stands in the Place de Greve, where all public rejoicings are celebrated, and common malefactors executed. The most interesting of the manufactures of Paris is plate-glass, and tapestries made after the pictures of the greatest masters. In the environs are excellent free-stone and abundance of gypsum. Paris now forms, with a small district round it, one of the departments of France. [This city, on March 31, 1814, surrendered to the emperor of Russia and his allies.] It is 210 m SSE London, 625 w Vienna, and 550 NNE Madrid. Lon. 20 E, lat. 48 50 N.

Parma, or Parmesan, a duchy of Italy, under which name are included the duchies of Parma Proper, Piacenza, and Guastalla. It is bounded on the w and n by Milanese, E by Modenese, and s by Tuscany and Genoa. The soil is fertile in corn, wine, oil, hemp, and pasture; and there are some considerable mines of copper and silver. The celebrated Parmesan cheese is no longer made in this country, but at Lodi in Milanese, and some other places. This duchy, in 1808, was annexed to France, under the name of the department of Taro.

Parma, a fortified city of Italy, capital of a duchy of the same name, and a bishop's see, with a citadel, and a university. It has a magnificent cathedral, many beautiful churches, and handsome streets. The cupola of the cathedral, and the church of St. John, are painted by the famous Correggio, who was a native of this place. In the church of the Capuchins, is the tomb of the celebrated Alexander Farnese. The other most remarkable places are the ducal palace, with its gallery and collection of artificial curiosities; a famous theatre, capable of containing 14,000 spectators; a large Benedictine convent, in which 12,000 soldiers were quartered in 1734; the Palazzo Giardino, a ducal palace connected with the town; and the promenade, between the town and citadel. The inhabitants, about 38,000, trade in silk and silk stockings. In 1734, a battle was fought here between the Austrians and the French and Sardinians, in which the former were defeated. Parma is situate on a river of the same name, which divides it into two parts, united by three bridges, 40 m NW Modena, and 60 SE Milan. Lon. 10 30 E, lat. 44 50 N.

Parnassus, or Parnasse, a mountain of European Turkey, in Livadia. It has two summits, one famous for being consecrated to Apollo and the Muses, and the other to Bacchus. It is the highest in Greece, and has a fine fountain, supposed to be the ancient Castalia. It is 8 m N Livadia.

Paros, an island of the Archipelago, one of the Cyclades, to the w of Naxia. It is 10 m long and 8 broad, and the soil well cultivated. The trade consists in wheat, barley, wine, and pulse, and in calicos. It once produced a great deal of oil, but the Venetian army burnt all the olive trees. This island was anciently dedicated to Bacchus, on account of its excellent wines; and has been so famous for its marble, that the best carvers would make use of no other. Those excellent staturaries, Phidias and Praxiteles, were natives of this island; and the famous Arundelian marbles, at Oxford, were brought from this place.

Paros, or Parechia, the capital of the isle of Paros, and a bishop's see. It was once the largest and most powerful town of the Cyclades; but is greatly decayed. The walls of the castle are built of ancient pieces of marble, and most of the columns are placed longwise; some of them that stand upright, support cornices of amazing size. The natives build their houses of marble, which they find ready cut to their hands; but they take no care to place the pieces in a regular manner; their fields likewise are enclosed with friezes, altars, and basso-relievos. The inhabitants formerly were great sculptors and skilful architects, but now are mere carvers of mortars and salt-cellars. Paros is situate on the w coast of the island. Lon. 25 44 2, lat. 37 8 N.

Parys, a mountain of Wales, on the NW coast of the isle of Anglesea, famous for a copper mine, which is wrought similar to a stone quarry, open to day. The quantity of ore is prodigious, and the purest part is exported raw to the smelting works at Swansea and other places: the most impure is deprived of its sulphur on the spot; which sulphur is sublimed, and afterward formed into rolls of brimstone. Quantities of nearly pure copper are obtained from the waters lodged beneath the bed of ore, by the intervention of iron. A lead ore, rich in silver, is also found in this mountain. The smelting and boiling houses are in the valley below, near the sea; and at Amlwch is a commodious haven for vessels employed in the copper and brimstone trade.

Pegu, a kingdom of Asia, bounded on the N by Birmah, W and S by the bay of Bengal, and E by Siam. It is very fruitful in corn, roots, pulse, and fruit; and the other products are teak, elephants, elephants teeth, bees wax, lac, saltpetre, iron, lead, tin, petro-leum, very fine rubies, small diamonds, and plenty of lead, of which they make their money. The inhabitants are but thinly clad, and the best among them wear neither shoes nor stockings. The women are much fairer than the men, small, but well proportioned. If the wife proves false, the husband may sell her for a slave. There are a vast number of temples in this country, mostly of wood, varnished and gilt. The priests have ground allowed them, which they cultivate for their subsistence: they are called Talapoins, and inculcate charity as the highest virtue; affirming that religion to be the best which teaches men to do the most good. They have idols in their temples, in a sitting posture, cross-legged, and with very large ears. They have various sorts of music, but the pipe and tabor are esteemed the best. In the low flat part of the coun-try, which is liable to be overflowed, the houses are built upon stakes, and in time of inundations, the inhabitants communicate with each other by boats. Pegu was long an independent king-dom, and in 1752, conquered the king-dom of Birmah; but Alompra, whom the king of Pegu had continued as chief at Monchabou, soon afterward revolted, and in 1757, reduced Pegu to a de-pendent province on Birmah.

Pegu, a city of the kingdom of the same name, erected on the site of the former city, which was ruined, in 1757, by the king of Birmah. The ancient city was a quadrangle, each side mea-suring nearly a mile and half, and sur-rounded by strong walls and other forti-fications, now in ruins. The present city occupies about one-fourth of the former area. On the N and E sides it borders on the old wall, and is fenced round by a stockade. Here is a grand temple, which has been newly embel-lished. The king of Birmah has here a viceroy, who resides in the fort. It is seated on a river of the same name, 300 m S Umerapooora. Lon. 96° 11' E, lat. 17° 40' N.

Pei-ho, or White-river, a river of China, in Pe-tche-li, which passes near Peking, and by the cities of Tong-tchou and Tien-sing, into the Yellow sea. The tide flows 110 m, and fre-quently submerges the flat country on its banks.

Peking, the capital of the empire of China, in the province of Pe-tche-li. Its name signifies the Northern Court, to distinguish it from Nan-king, the Southern Court, where the emperor formerly resided. This capital forms an oblong square, and is divided into two cities; one inhabited by Chinese, the other by Tartars. These two cities, exclusive of the suburbs, are nearly 14 m in circuit. The walls are 28 feet high, 24 thick at the base, and 12 at the top; and there are spacious towers at 70 feet distance from each other. The gates are high, and well arched, supporting buildings of nine stories high; the lowest of which is for the soldiers when they come off guard: they are nine in number, three in the s wall, and in each of the other sides two. The middle gate, on the s side, opens into the Tartar, or imperial city, which is a space within the general enclosure, about a mile from N to s, and three-fourths of a mile from E to W, with a rivulet winding through it. A wall of large red polished bricks, 26 feet high, covered with a roof of tiles painted yellow and varnished, surrounds this space, in which are contained the imperial palace and gardens, the public offices, lodgings for the ministers, the eunuchs, artificers, and tradesmen belonging to the court. Between the other two gates in the s wall, and the opposite ones on the N side of the city, run two straight streets, each 4 m long and 120 feet wide. One street of the same width runs from one of the eastern to the corresponding western gate, but the other is interrupted by the imperial city, round the walls of which it is carried. The other streets branch from these main streets at right angles, and are very narrow. The houses have no windows nor openings to the street, except the great shops; most of them are poorly built, and have only a ground floor. It is astonishing to see the concourse of people that are in the main streets; yet not one Chinese woman among them, and the confusion occasioned by the number of horses, camels, mules, asses, wagons, carts, and chairs; without reckoning the several mobs which gather about the jugglers, ballad-singers, &c. Persons of distinction have always a horseman to go before them and clear the way. All the great streets are guarded by soldiers, who patrol night and day with swords by their sides, and whips in their hands, to chastise those who make any disturbance, or take them into custody. The little streets have lattice gates at their entrance into the great streets, which are shut up at night, and guarded by soldiers, who suffer no assemblies in the streets at that time. The emperor's palace and garden occupies two-thirds of the Tartar city, and are surrounded by a brick wall, 2 m in length, with pavilions at each corner encompassed by galleries supported by columns. The architecture of the stupendous pile of buildings of which the palace consists, is entirely different from that of the Europeans; and they are covered with tiles of a shining beautiful yellow. The temples and the towers of Peking are so numerous that it is difficult to count them. Provisions of all kinds are exceedingly plentiful, they being, as well as the merchandise, brought from all parts by canals from the rivers, and always crowded with vessels of different sizes; and within the walls are several acres of land under cultivation. An earthquake, that happened here, in 1731, buried above 100,000 persons in the ruins of the houses. The inhabitants are estimated at 2,000,000. A Russian church is established here, with a seminary, in which the students are permitted to reside for the purpose of learning the Chinese language. Since this establishment, many interesting publications have appeared at Peterburg, relative to the laws, history, and geography of China, translated from the originals published at Peking. This city stands in a fertile plain, 60 m s of the great wall. Lon. 116 27 E, lat. 39 54 N.

Pelagisi, an island in the Grecian Archipelago, about 3 m in circuit. Lon. 24 12 E, lat. 39 50 N.

Pelegrino, a mountain on the N coast of Sicily, nearly 2 m w of Palermo. On this mount is a cavern, in which is the image of St. Rosalia, who is said to have died here; and round the cave of this saint (who is the patroness of Palermo) a church is built, where priests attend, to watch the precious relics, and receive the offerings of the pilgrims.

Pelew Islands, or *Palao*s, a group of islands in the Pacific ocean, lying between 134 and 136 E lon. and 6 and 8 N lat. They are encircled on the w side by a reef of coral; and the names of some of the principal are Orooioy, Emungs, Emillegue, Artingal, Corooora, and Pelelew. They are well covered with trees of various kinds and sizes; and every part of that called Corooora, to which Pelew appeared to be the capital, seemed to bear the marks of industry and good cultivation. Captain Wilson, of the Antelope E India packet, who was wrecked here in 1783, found the natives simple in their manners, delicate in their sentiments, friendly in their disposition, and, in fine, a people that do honour to the human race. The astonishment which those, who first discovered the English, manifested on seeing their colour, plainly showed, that they had never before seen a white man. They had no idea of the nature of powder and shot, and were amazed on seeing its effects. Their principal arms consist of bamboo darts, from five to eight feet long, pointed with the wood of the betel-nut tree; but there are short ones for different marks, which are thrown by means of a stick two feet long. The chiefs wear a bone round one of their wrists, which, being a mark of honour conferred by the king, is never to be parted with but with life. They are not all of the same degree; and captain Wilson was invested with one of the highest order. With respect to property in these islands, a man's house or canoe is considered as his own, and also the land allotted to him, as long as he occupies and cultivates it; but whenever he removes to another place, the ground reverts to the king. The natives make canoes out of the trunks of trees, some large enough to carry 30 men. Yams and cocoa-nuts are their chief articles of subsistence, and the milk of the latter is their common drink. On particular occasions, they add to their ordinary fare certain sweetmeats, and a sweet beverage, obtained by the aid of a syrup, extracted either from the palm-tree or the sugar-cane. The houses are raised about three feet from the ground, the foundation beams being laid on large stones, whence spring the upright supports of their sides, which are crossed by other timbers grooved together, and fastened by wooden pins; the intermediate space, and the roof, being closely filled up with bamboos and palm-tree leaves, platted together: the inside is without any division, forming one great room. The domestic implements are little baskets, nicely woven from slips of the plantain-tree, and wooden baskets with covers, neatly carved and inlaid with shells. No one goes abroad without a basket, which usually contains some betel-nut, a comb, knife, and a little twine. The best knives are made of a piece of the large mother-of-pearl oyster, ground narrow, and the outward side a little polished. The combs are made of the orange-tree, of which there are a few of the Seville kind; the handle and teeth are fastened in the solid wood. The fishing-hooks are of tortoise-shell; and twine, cord, and fishing-nets, are well manufactured from the husks of the cocoa-nut. Of the plantain leaf are formed mats, which serve the people as beds. They also use a plantain leaf at meals, instead of a plate; and the shell of a cocoa-nut supplies the place of a cup. There are vessels of a kind of earthen ware, of a reddish brown colour, in which they boil their fish, yams, &c. A bundle of cocoa-nut husks serves them for a broom; and thick bamboos, with bores five inches in diameter, are their buckets or cisterns. The shell of the tortoise is here remarkably beautiful; and the natives have the art of moulding it into little trays or dishes, and spoons. Some of the great ladies have also bracelets of the same manufacture, and earrings inlaid with shells. The Pelewans, in general, are stout and well made, rather above the middle stature, and of a deep copper colour. Their hair is long, and generally formed into one large loose curl round their heads. The men are entirely naked; but the women wear two little aprons, one before, the other behind. Both sexes are tattowed, have their teeth made black by art, and the cartilage between the nostrils bored, through which they frequently put a sprig or blossom of some plant or shrub. The men have the left ear bored, and the women both; a few of the first wear beads in the perforated ear, the latter either put some leaf through, or an earring of tortoise-shell inlaid. Both sexes are expert at swimming; and the men are admirable divers. Abba Thulle, the king of the island, entertained such an opinion of the English, that he permitted his second son, Lee Boo, to accompany them to England, where they arrived in 1784. In a few months after this hopeful youth died of the smallpox, and the E India Company erected a monument over his grave in Rotherhithe churchyard. The E India Company, sensible that there remained obligations for them to fulfil, equipped two vessels at Bombay, under the command of captain M'Cluer, which arrived at these islands in January 1791. A joyful and affecting interview took place between the English and the Pelewans; and Abba Thulle bore the intelligence of the death of Lee Boo with great fortitude. When the presents were landed, consisting of cattle, sheep, goats, pigs, &c. together with arms, grindstones, shovels, saws, and other utensils, the multitude were struck with amazement; the king himself was at a loss how to express his gratitude, and, in return, made a present of one of the islands to the English, which was taken possession of with the usual formalities. Captain McCluer leaving one ship behind to superintend the gardens, plantations, and live stock, proceeded with the other to Canton; some of the natives voluntarily accompanying him. He returned to Pelew in June; but thinking his benevolent mission not yet completed, he sailed with both ships to New Guinea and Bencoolen, and returned again in January 1793, with two full cargoes of cattle and stores. During his absence Abba Thulle had died, and his brother had succeeded to the sovereignty. The munificent gratitude of the E India Company has been attended with complete success; the live stock having greatly multiplied, and the rice producing two abundant crops every year. A small trade is now carried on occasionally by the English, between Pelew and China.

Pernes, a town of France, in the department of Pas de Calais, seated on the Clarence, 17 m NW Arras.

Perno, a town of Sweden, in the province of Nyland, on the coast of the Baltic, 36 m E Helsingfors.

Peronne, a strong town of France, in the department of Somme. It is called Pucelle, because it has never been taken, though often besieged. The castle was the imprisonment of Charles the simple, who here miserably died; and in this castle the duke of Burgundy detained Lewis XI three days, till he consented to sign a disadvantageous treaty. It is seated on the Somme, 27 m SW Cambrai, and 80 E by N Paris. Lon. 3 2 E, lat. 49 55 N.

Perote, a town of New Spain, in Tlascala, with a small fortress. Twelve m to the SE is the Coffre of Perote, a summit 1300 feet higher than the Pike of Teneriff, which serves for a mark to sailors on entering the port of Vera Cruz. Perote is 15 m W Xalapa.

Peroufa, a town and fort of Piedmont, on the river Cluson, 6 m NW Pignerol.

Perpignan, a fortified town of France, capital of the department of Eastern Pyrenees, with a good citadel and a university. It was lately a bishop's see, and is seated on the Tet, near the Mediterranean, 95 m SE Toulouse. Lon. 2 54 E, lat. 42 42 N.

Persepolis, anciently the capital of the Persian empire. It was taken by Alexander the great, who set it on fire. Its magnificent ruins are 50 m NE Shiras.

Perthore, a town in Worcestershire, with a market on Tuesday, and a manufacture of stockings. Here are two churches, and that of Holy Cross contains several ancient monuments. It is seated on the Avon, 9 m ESE Worcester, and 106 WNW London.

Persia, a country of Asia, consisting of several provinces, which, at different times, have had their particular kings. It is bounded on the N by Georgia, the Caspian sea, and Usbec Tartary, W by Turkey and Arabia, S by the gulfs of

Persia and Ormus and the Arabian sea, and E by Hindooftan. It is 1220 m from E to W, and 900 from N to S. In the N and E parts it is mountainous and cold; in the middle and SE parts, it is level and desert; in the S and W, level and extremely fertile, though for several months very hot. The chief rivers are the Tigris, Kur, and Kizil Ozan; but there are many others, and several in the interior which are lost in sandy deserts. The soil produces all sorts of pulse and corn, except oats and rye; but agriculture is in a depressed state, as the government affords no protection to private property, and offers no encouragement to industry. In several places naphtha rises out of the ground; and there are mines of silver, copper, lead, iron, turquois stones, and salt; but some of these are not worked, on account of the scarcity of wood, or rather from the ignorance of the people. Among the products of Persia that are peculiarly excellent, are dates, pistachio-nuts, and poppies that produce the finest opium; cotton, indigo, and tobacco are also raised; and no country can exceed this either in the variety or flavour of its fruits. There are extensive plantations of mulberry trees for silkworms; and large flocks of sheep and goats. The camels, horses, mules, asses, oxen, and buffalos, are the best of their kind, and are indifferently used for carrying passengers or burdens, the horses excepted, which are only used for the saddle. The principal manufactures are satins, tabbies, taffetas, silk mixed with cotton, or with camels or goats hair, brocades, gold tissues, gold velvet, carpets, calicos, camlets, and fire-arms. During almost the whole of last century, Persia was desolated by competitors for the sovereignty. On the assassination of the usurper, Nadir Shah, in 1747, Ahmed Abdalla, one of his generals, founded the kingdom of Candahar; to which he annexed the provinces of Korasan and Segeftan, in the E part of Persia, and those provinces of Hindooftan, W of the Indus, that had been ceded by the great mogul, in 1737, to Nadir Shah. Kerim Khan, another of Nadir's officers, obtained the sovereignty of all the southern provinces. He held the seat of government at Shiras; but refused the title of Shah, or king, being satisfied with that of Vakeel, or protector. He was a mild prince, beloved by his subjects, and respected by foreign powers. On his death, in 1779, new competitors for the throne sprung up, and caused another period of slaughter and desolation till the year

1794, when Akau Mohamed Khan became sole monarch. The government is highly despotic, and its functions exercised by the king and his two principal ministers, the grand vizier and the lord treasurer. The whole of the executive government is in the hands of these two men, and, while they continue in favour with a tyrant, their authority is without control. Subordinate to the ministry is a regular gradation of officers; and venality and extortion pervade every class, from the throne to the cottage. The standing army of the empire consists of the king's body guard, about 10,000 men, and the royal slaves, about 3000. But the number and bravery of the wandering tribes constitute the military force of the country; and from these the king could assemble an army of about 200,000 men, chiefly consisting of cavalry, whose evolutions and movements are very rapid. The armies seldom receive either clothing or pay, and are only kept together by the hope of plunder; it is therefore deemed incumbent on the king to take the field once a year, either against the Russians, Afghans, or Turcomans, his immediate neighbours. The Persians are generally Mohamedans, of the sect of Ali, and more tolerant in their principles than the Turks. They are commonly fat, with black hair, high forehead, aquiline nose, full cheeks, and a large chin; the form of the countenance being frequently oval. The general complexion is fair, somewhat tinged with olive; but those in the s, and the provinces toward India, are of a dark brown. The men are generally strong and robust, and inclined to martial exercises; they shave the head, and wear high crimson bonnets; but the beard is sacred, and almost universally dyed black, but some prefer blue. They often wear three or four light dresses, one above the other, fastened with a sash, in which a small dagger is stuck; and they are fond of large cloaks of thick cloth. The women cover the head with a large black turban, over which a Cashmerian shawl is thrown, to answer the purpose of a veil; and their robes are rather shorter than those of the men, fastened in front by large gold buttons. The Persians are generally gay, polite, and hospitable; yet are deceitful, treacherous, and cruel. They do not recline on cushions, in the manner of the Turks, but sit in an erect posture on a thick felt, called a numud. They are passionately fond of tobacco, which they smoke almost incessantly. Wine they never taste before company; but in private they indulge to excess, and invariably drink before they eat. They take coffee in the morning, and dine about noon, but the chief repast is the supper. The most usual dish is boiled rice, variously prepared. The meat is boiled to excess, and the meal is enlarged with pot-herbs, roots, fruits, cakes, hard eggs, and sweetmeats, of which last they are extremely fond. They are remarkable for cleanliness, both in their persons and habitations. The language of Persia is perhaps the most celebrated of all the oriental tongues, for strength, beauty, and melody. Isphahan is the chief city, but Teheran is the present capital.

Persia, Gulf of, a sea between Persia and Arabia. The entrance near Ormus is not above 50 m over; but within it is from 120 to 230 in breadth, and the length from Ormus to the mouth of the Euphrates is 500 m. The Arabian side is particularly celebrated for its pearl fishery, and has many sand-banks and shoals; the Persian side is deeper, and in general has regular soundings.

Perth, a borough of Scotland, capital of Perthshire, once the residence of the sovereigns of Scotland, and the seat of the parliament. It has two parish-churches, one of which belonged formerly to a fine abbey, and contains three places of worship for so many parishes. Here, in 1559, the reformed religion was first publicly avowed, after John Knox had preached a sermon in the church against idolatry. Perth is seated on a large verdant plain, on the sw side of the Tay, which is navigable for vessels of 120 tons to the quays, but larger vessels unload at Newburg. Over the river is a modern bridge of 10 arches, the most beautiful in Scotland, to the town of Kinnoul. On the se side of the town stands Gowrie castle, once the scene of a strange conspiracy, which caused its forfeiture; and it has since served as barracks for the royal artillery. Perth has several incorporated trades, some of which have halls. The salmon fishery is a great article of trade; and it has considerable manufactures of linen and cotton goods, leather, boots, shoes, and gloves. The number of inhabitants was 14,878 in 1801, and 16,948 in 1811. It is 35 m N by w Edinburg. Lon. 3 20 w, lat. 56 24 N.

Perth Amboy, a city and seaport of New Jersey, in Middlesex county, seated on a neck of land, between the river Rariton and Arthur Kill sound. It lies open to Sandy Hook, and has one of the best harbours on the continent. It is 30 m SW New York, and 64 NE Philadelphia. Lon. 74 25 W, lat. 40 31 N.

Perthes, a town of France, in the department of Seine and Marne, 6 m SW Melun.

Perthes, a town of France, in the department of Upper Marne, 6 m SW St. Dizier.

Perthshire, a county of Scotland, 76 m long and 68 broad; bounded on the W by Argyleshire, N by the shires of Inverness and Aberdeen, E by Forfarshire, SE by the frith of Tay and the counties of Fife and Kinross, and S by the frith of Forth, and the counties of Clackmannon, Stirling, and Dumbarton. It contains 4,068,640 acres, is divided into 68 parishes, and sends a member to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 126,366 in 1801, and 135,093 in 1811. The country exhibits scenes of rugged and striking magnificence, contrasted with the most beautiful ones of cultivation. The Grampian mountains cross it from SW to NE, the highest of which is Benlawers. The country NW of this ridge is mountainous, and contains several lakes; but the opposite side, though not free from hills, is more low and fertile. The principal rivers are the Forth and Tay. Perth is the capital.

Pertigi, a town of the island of Sardinia, 19 m SE Castel Aragonese.

Pertuis, a town of France, in the department of Vaucluse, near the Durance, 11 m N Aix, and 38 ESE Avignon.

Peru, a country of S America, bounded on the N by Quito, W by the Pacific ocean, S by Chili, and E by the Andes. It is 1800 m from N to S, and about 500 from E to W. It never rains in the south parts; but in the north, where the mountains are not so high, it often rains excessively. There are large forests on the sides of the mountains, which advance near the sea; but none of the trees are like those in Europe. Peru has been long celebrated for mines of gold and silver, which are the chief source of its riches. Notwithstanding the little industry which is employed in working them, and the small help that commerce affords to the miners, 534,000 marks of silver, and 6038 of gold, were smelted and refined in the royal mint at Lima, in 1790; and 5,162,239 piastres in both materials were coined there. Beside the produce of the mines, the commodities exported are sugar, Vienna wood, cotton, Peruvian bark, copper, and cocoa. The fiercest beasts of prey in Peru are the puma and jaquar, inaccurately called lions and tigers by the Europeans, for they possess neither the undaunted courage of the former, nor the ravenous cruelty of the latter. A quadruped, called the lama, peculiar to this country, was tamed to domestic purposes by the ancient Peruvians: in form it bears some resemblance to a camel, but only of a size somewhat larger than a sheep; its wool furnishes the Peruvians with clothing, and its flesh with food. Among the birds, the most remarkable is the condor, which is entitled to preeminence over the flying tribe, in bulk, strength, and courage. When the Spaniards landed in this country, in 1530, they found it governed by sovereigns called incas, who were revered by their subjects as divinities; and the inhabitants were found to be much more polished than the natives of other parts of America, those of Mexico excepted. These were soon subdued by a few Spaniards, under the command of Francis Pizarro. Peru is inhabited by the Spaniards, the native Americans, and a mixture arising from both, called Mestices. The native Americans, who live among the forests, form as it were so many small republics, which are directed by a Spanish priest, and by their governor, assisted by the original natives, who serve as officers. They have no distrust, for they leave the doors of their huts always open, though they have cotton, calabashes, and a sort of aloes, of which they make thread, and several other small matters that they trade with, which might be easily stolen. They go naked, and paint their bodies with a red drug, called rocu. The same man is of all trades, for he builds his own hut, constructs his own canoe, and weaves his own cloth; but if a large house is to be built for common use, every one lends a helping hand. Their skin is of a red copper colour; and they have no beard nor hair on any part of their bodies except their heads, where it is black, long, and coarse. Those that are not much exposed to the weather are of a lighter colour than the rest. Their garment is a sort of a sack, with holes to put their arms through; and this is given them by their masters as part of their wages. The Mestices, though illegitimate, have all the privileges of a Spaniard, and are the persons who carry on all trades; for the Spaniards think it beneath them to meddle with any thing of this sort. Peru is divided into two great audiences, Lima, and Charcas, which are under the government of a viceroy, whose authority once extended over all S America poss-

The capital of Peru is Lima.

Perugia, a city of Italy, capital of Perugia, and a bishop's see, with a strong citadel, a university, and several academies. The churches, and many other buildings, public and private, are very handsome. It is seated on a hill, near the river Tiber, 75 m N Rome. Lon. 12 20 E, lat. 43 6 N.

Perugia, the ancient Trasimenus, a lake of Italy, 10 m w of the city of Perugia. It is 9 m long and 7 broad; and in it are three islands, one of which is a church. On its N border was fought a battle between Hannibal and Flaminius, in which the consul and 15,000 Romans were slain.

Perugino, a province of Italy, in the Ecclesiastical State, 25 m long and 24 broad; bounded on the w by Tuscany, s by the territory of Orviero, E by the duchies of Spoleto and Urbino, and N by the county of Citta di Castello. The soil is fertile in corn and good wine. The capital is Perugia.

Pesaro, a fortified seaport of Italy, in the duchy of Urbino, and a bishop's see. The cathedral is magnificent, and it has handsome churches, convents, and palaces, with exquisite paintings. The environs abound in olives and excellent figs. It is seated on an eminence, at the mouth of the Foglia, on the gulf of Venice, 17 m ENE Urbino. Lon. 13 2 E, lat. 43 52 N.

Pescara, a strong town of Naples, in Abruzzo Citra. It was taken by the French in 1798, and stands at the mouth of a river of the same name, on the gulf of Venice, 10 m NNE Civita di Chieti.

Peschiera, a strong town of Italy, in Veronese. It was taken by the French in 1796; and the garrison surrendered to the Austrians in 1799. It is seated on the river Mincio, where it proceeds from the lake Garda, 16 m w Verona.

Pescia, a town of Tuscany, in Florentino, celebrated for its fine oil; seated on a river of the same name, over which is a handsome bridge, 27 m w by N Florence.

Pest, a town of Hungary, capital of a county of the same name, with a fortress, a royal palace, and a university, the only one in the kingdom. Here are many Greek merchants, who conduct the Levant trade to Germany and the northern nations. It is seated on the E side of the Danube, opposite Buda, 96 m ESE Presburg. Lon. 19 8 E, lat. 47 30 N.

Pesli, a town of Naples, in Principato Citra, near the magnificent ruins of the ancient Praetium, 20 m SE Salerno.

Pe-tche-li, the principal province of China, bounded on the N by the great wall and part of Tartary, E by the Yellow sea, S by Chan-tong and Ho-nan, and W by the mountains of Chan-si. It contains nine cities of the first class, which have many others under their jurisdiction. Although Pe-tche-li extends no further than the 44d degree N, yet all its rivers are so much frozen during four months in the year, that wagons with the heaviest loads may safely pass them. The soil is sandy, and produces very little rice; but it abounds with all other kind of grain, and with the greater part of the fruit trees common in Europe. But what renders this province the most considerable is, that the riches of the whole empire are brought hither, the southern provinces furnishing it with every thing they produce, that is most uncommon and delicious. The inhabitants, in general, are reckoned not so polite, nor so apt to learn the sciences, as those of the southern provinces; but they are stronger and more warlike, in which they resemble the people who inhabit the northern provinces. Peking is the capital.

Peter and Paul, St. or Petropaulskoi, a seaport of Russia, in Kamtschatka. The town consists of some log-houses and a few conical huts; and its harbour, deemed one of the best on the globe, is open for vessels from April to November. Captain Clerke, who succeeded captain Cook, and died at sea, was interred here. It is seated in a valley, on the E side of Awatska bay. Lon. 158 48 E, lat. 53 1 N.

Peterborough, a city in Northamptonshire, and a bishop's see, with a market on Saturday. It is governed by a mayor, and has but one church, beside the cathedral, which was formerly a monastery. The market-place is spa-

It is seated on the Nea, over which is a bridge into Huntingdonshire, 42 m NE Northampton, and 81 m London. Lon. 0 4 W, lat. 52 30 N.

Peterhead, a seaport of Scotland, in Aberdeenshire, situate on a peninsula, which forms the most eastern point of land in Scotland. It has two harbours, defended by piers; a considerable trade in the fishery, and to the Baltic; and manufactures of thread, woollen cloth, and cotton. Upon the Keith Inch, the E part of the peninsula, are many elegant houses; and on the S side is an old castle, now used as a storehouse, and near it is a small fort and a battery. A mineral spring, of a powerful diuretic quality, and the sea-bathing, bring a great resort of company, for whose accommodation there is a hall-room, &c. It is 34 m NE Aberdeen. Lon. 1 17 W, lat. 57 27 N.

Petersburg, a town of Pennsylvania, in York county, 25 m SW York, and 58 N Washington.

Petersburg, a town of Virginia, in Dinwiddie county, with a considerable trade, particularly in tobacco and flour. It stands on the S side of the Appamatox, 25 m S Richmond.

Petersburg, a town of the state of Georgia, in Elbert county, situate at the conflux of the Broad river with the Savanna, 50 m WNW Augusta.

Petersburg, or St Petersburg, the metropolis of the empire of Russia, in a government of the same name, with a university. It is seated on the Neva, near the gulf of Finland, and built partly on some islands formed by the river, and partly upon the continent. The ground on which Petersburg now stands was a vast morass, occupied by a few fishermen's huts. Peter the great first began this city by the erection of a citadel with six bastions, in 1703; he built also a small hut for himself, and some wooden hovels. In 1710, count G. Iovkin built the first house of brick; and the next year, the emperor, with his own hands, laid the foundation of a house of the same materials. From these small beginnings rose the imperial city of Petersburg; and in less than nine years, after the wooden hovels were erected, the seat of empire was transferred it from Moscow. The streets are straight, and generally broad and long, frequently intersecting each other in abrupt and sharp corners; and three of the principal ones, which meet in a point at the admiralty, are above a m in length; most of them are paved, but a few still remain floored with planks; and numerous canals, from one part of the river to another, pass through many of them, by which the inhabitants are supplied with water. In several parts, wooden houses, scarcely superior to common cottages, are blended with the public buildings; but as they are not suffered to be repaired, or if burnt down to be rebuilt, the number of them is now greatly reduced: however, the mother of all that exists in the city, the first wooden cottage of Peter the great, has a brick building on arches erected over it, to preserve it as a sacred relic of that monarch. The brick houses are covered with stucco, painted of a pink, yellow, or green colour; the roofs are nearly flat, formed of sheet or cast iron, or sheet copper, commonly painted green or red: tiles are only used for out-houses and the meaner sort of buildings. The mansions of the nobility are vast piles of building, furnished in the most elegant style. Petersburg, though more compact than the other Russian cities, is built in a very straggling manner. On the S and SE it has a boundary formed by the town ditch, which is dug far beyond the built parts; and on the NE and N flows the most northern branch of the Neva, called the Nevka, which includes a still more ample interstice. The circumference by these and the sea is nearly 20 m; but the part properly built upon occupies little more than a fourth of this space. The inhabitants are computed to be 300,000. The main stream of the Neva is, in many places, as broad as the Thames at London, and its banks are lined on each side with a continued range of handsome buildings. On the N side are the grand ducal palace, the fortrefs, the customhouse, the academy of sciences, and the academy of arts. On the S side are the imperial palace, the marble palace, the admiralty, the arsenal, the bank, the mansions of many Russian nobles, and the English-line, so called, because the whole row is almost wholly occupied by English merchants. In the front of these buildings is the quay, which extends 3 m, except where it is interrupted by the admiralty; and the Neva, during the whole of that space, is embanked by a wall, parapet, and pavement of hewn granite. divisions of Petersburg, situate on each side of the Neva, are connected by two bridges, on pontoons; and there are several others over the different arms of the river. These bridges, on account of the large masses of ice driven down the stream from the lake Ladoga, are usually removed when they first make their appearance; and for a few days, till the river is frozen hard enough to bear carriages, there is no communication between the opposite parts of the town. Among the noblest ornaments of Petersburg, is an equestrian statue of Peter the great, in bronze, of a colossal size; the pedestal of which is a huge rock, brought to the spot at a great expense. Within the walls of the fortress is the cathedral of St. Peter and St. Paul, in which are deposited the remains of Peter the great, and of the successive sovereigns, except Peter II, buried at Moscow. Petersburg has a considerable trade in exporting the products of the empire, and has a communication by canals and rivers with many of the southern provinces as far as Astracan, on the borders of the Caspian sea. Philadelphia, the capital of Pennsylvania, and formerly the metropolis of the United States of America, situate in the county of its name, on the w bank of the Delaware, which is here a mile broad. It was laid out by William Penn, the first proprietary of the province, in 1683, and settled by a colony from England; and, by a constant influx of foreigners, increased to so great a degree, that in less than a century, and in the lifetime of the first person born in it of European parents, it was computed to contain 6000 houses and 40,000 inhabitants, in the city and suburbs. The population has been constantly increasing, and in 1802 it was estimated to contain 70,000 inhabitants. The original plan was an oblong square, on the isthmus between the Delaware and Schuylkil rivers, one mile from s to n on the former and two from s to w on the latter. But the Delaware front has been preferred, and the buildings now occupy a space nearly 3 m in length, and in the most extended part do not reach a mile from the Delaware. The streets intersect each other at right angles; the principal one is Broad-street, 113 feet wide, running s and w, which is crossed by High-street, 100 feet wide, extending from river to river; the other streets, in general, are 50 feet wide; they are all paved, and have broad bricked footways, with pumps on each side at about 100 yards from each other, with a lamp on the top. Here are 26 places of public worship for Christians of various denominations, and a synagogue for the Jews. The statehouse is a magnificent building; on the left of which is a city court house, and on the right a philosophical hall. Here likewise is a county court house, a mint, a public library, and several other public buildings. A university was incorporated here in 1791; its funds partly given by the state, and partly taken from the old college. Here are also many literary and humane societies, with other useful institutions, both public and private. The city is governed by a mayor, has numerous manufactures, and a considerable inland and foreign trade. It is 97 m s w New York, and 130 n e Washington, the present metropolis. Philippine Islands, a large group of islands in the N Pacific ocean, discovered by Magellan, in 1521, and afterward conquered by the Spaniards, in the reign of Philip II. They lie 400 m SE of China, and are said to be 1100 in number, but some hundreds of them are very small. The principal are, Luconia, Mindanao, Paragon, Samar, Matbate, Mindoro, Luban, Panay, Leyta, Bohol, Zebu, Negros, St. John, and Abo. This extensive group presents many volcanic appearances, and is subject to violent earthquakes, thunder, and rains. The air is hot and moist, and the soil fertile in rice, bread-fruit, and many other useful vegetables and fruits. The cotton is of peculiar beauty, and the sugar-cane and cocoa-nut trees are objects of particular culture. The trees are always green, and there are ripe fruits all the year. Here are many wild beasts and birds, quite unknown in Europe; also many noxious and venomous creatures, and even herbs and flowers that are poisonous. Gold, copper, and iron are among the certain products. The natives are affable, hospitable, and honest, and cultivate the land with abundant skill; but they are not all of one original. The principal tribe, called Tagals, seem of Malay origin; they are tall and well made, of a tawny complexion, and wear only a kind of shirt and loose drawers; but the dress of the women is chiefly a large mantle, and Poitiers, a town of France, capital of the department of Vienne, and a bishop's see. The population is not in proportion to the extent; for it includes a number of gardens and fields within its circuit. It has several Roman antiquities, particularly an amphitheatre, partly demolished, and a triumphal arch, which serves as a gate to the great street. Here, in 1356, Edward the black prince gained a victory over the French, taking prisoners king John and his son Philip, whom he brought to England. The principal manufactures are stockings, woollen caps, gloves, and combs. It is seated on a hill, by the river Clain, 52 m SW Tours, and 120 N by E Bourdeaux. Lon. 0 21 E, lat. 46 35 N.

Poland, a country of Europe, bounded on the N by Prussia, Courland, Livonia, and Russia, W by the Baltic,

POL

Brandenburg, and Silesia, s by Hungary and Moldavia, and e by Russia and the territories wrested by that power from the Turks. It is divided into four principal parts, Great Poland, Little Poland, Red Russia, and Lithuania: each of which is subdivided into palatinates, or provinces. Poland has now no political existence as a nation, being divided among the neighbouring states. The government was monarchical and aristocratical; all the acts of state being in the name of the king and republic of Poland. The king was the only elective sovereign in Europe; being chosen by a general diet summoned by the archbishop of Gnesna, as chief of the republic during the interregnum. This circumstance proved the source of great calamities; for, on the demise of every sovereign, the country was generally involved in a war, between contending factions, respectively supported by foreign powers. In 1772, a partition of this country, projected by the king of Prussia, was effected by that monarch, in conjunction with the empress of Russia and the emperor of Germany. By this partition, one third of the country was wrested from the republic, the diet being compelled, by a foreign force, to make and to ratify this important cession. The three partitioning powers, moreover, forcibly effected a great change in the constitution. In 1791, however, the king and the nation, in concurrence, almost unanimously, and without any foreign intervention, established another constitution. By this the evils of an elective monarchy were avoided, the throne being declared hereditary in the house of Saxony. The rights and privileges of all orders in the republic (the king, the nobles, the citizens, and the peasants) were alike equitably consulted; and it seemed to be formed agreeably to the universal wish of the nation. A few of the nobility, however, discontented at the generous sacrifice of some of their privileges, repaired to the court of Russia; and their representations concurring with the ambitious views of the empress, she sent an army into Poland, under pretext of being guaratee of the constitution of 1772. Her interference was too powerful to be resisted; and this new constitution was overthrown. But the principal object for which the Russian army entered Poland was not yet attained. The empress had planned, in conjunction with the king of Prussia, a second partition of this country, which took place in 1793. Such multiplied oppressions at last roused the spirit of the nation. General Kosciusko appeared, in 1794, at the head of a Polish army, to assert the independency of his country, and to recover the provinces wrested from it. He was successful, at first, against the king of Prussia; but was defeated and taken prisoner in the sequel, by the Russians, who soon after took the capital, Warsaw. The king formally resigned his crown at Grodno in 1795, and was afterward removed to Peterburg, where he remained a kind of state prisoner, till his death in 1798. The whole of the country was divided among the three partitioning powers. Austria had Little Poland, and the greatest part of Red Russia and Podolia, which is now called the kingdom of Galicia; Prussia had Great Poland, Polish Prussia, a small part of Lithuania, and Polachia; and Russia had Samogitia, the remainder of Lithuania, Volhinia, and Podolia. The towns of Poland are for the most part built with wood; and the villages consist of mean cottages or huts. The country is so fertile in corn in many places, that it supplies Sweden and Holland with large quantities, and it has extensive pastures. Peat, ochre, chalk, belemnites, agate, chalcedony, cornelians, onyxes, jasper, rock crystals, amethysts, garnets, topazes, sapphires, and even rubies and diamonds are found in Poland; also talc, spar, lapis calaminaris, coal, iron, lead, and quicksilver. Here is much leather, fur, hemp, flax, salt-petre, alum, manna, honey, and wax; and there are mines of salt, of a great depth, out of which is dug rock-salt. Horses are numerous, very strong, swift, and beautiful; and horned cattle are bred in such numbers, that above 80,000 are driven every year out of the country. The principal rivers are the Dnieper, Viitula, Dwina, Niemen, Dniester, Bog, and Bug.

Portree, a town of Scotland, on the E side of Skye, one of the Hebrides. The inhabitants trade chiefly in beeves, sheep, and kelp. It has an excellent harbour, sheltered at its mouth by the isle of Raaza. Lon. 6 16 W, lat. 57 33 N.

Portsea, an island between Chichester bay and the harbour of Portsmouth, in Hampshire. It is a low tract about 14 m in circuit, separated from the mainland on the N by a creek, over which are two bridges, one for the entrance and the other for the departure of passengers. At the SW extremity is the town of Portsmouth.

Portsmouth, a borough and seaport in Hampshire, with a market on Thursday and Saturday. It is the most considerable haven for men of war, and the strongest fortified place in England. Its spacious harbour is made by a bay running up between the island of Portsea, on which the town is situate, and the opposite peninsula, having a narrow entrance commanded by the town and forts. Many of the largest ships are always laid up here; and, in time of war, it is the principal rendezvous of the grand channel fleet. The docks, arsenals, storehouses, barracks, &c. are all of capital magnitude, and kept in the most perfect order. The town is governed by a mayor, and entirely supported by the fort of the army and navy. To the S of it is the noted road of Spithead, where the men of war anchor when prepared for actual service. Portsmouth has one spacious church, and two neat chapels; the latter are in a part of the town called Portsea, built on what was formerly called Portsmouth Common, and is now above four times larger than the parent town. The number of inhabitants was 33,226 in 1801, and 40,567 in 1811, exclusive of the males belonging to the army and navy. Portsmouth is the birthplace of the celebrated philanthropist Jonas Hanway. It is 20 m SSE Winchester, and 72 SW London. Lon. 1 6 W, lat. 50 47 N.

Portsmouth, the capital of New Hampshire, in Rockingham county, with three churches. It is the largest town and the only seaport in the state, seated on the Piscataqua, 2 m from the ocean. Portfy, a town of Scotland, in Banffshire, with manufactures of fine linen and sewing thread. Near it are found a vein of serpentine, called Portsoy marble; a species of asbestos, of a greenish colour, which has been wrought into incombustible cloth; and a brilliant kind of granite of a flesh colour. Portsoy stands on a point of land, projecting into Moray frith, 9 m w Banff.

Portugal, the most western country of Europe, 250 m long and 120 broad; bounded on the w and s by the Atlantic, and on the e and n by Spain. It is divided into six provinces, Estremadura, Beira, Entre Douro e Minho, Tra los Montes, Alentejo, and Algarva. Though Spain and Portugal are in the same climate, the air of the latter is more temperate than that of the former, on account of the neighbourhood of the ocean. Corn is not plentiful, for little attention is paid to husbandry; and maize, imported from Africa, is used by the peasants instead of wheat. There is a great number of barren mountains, and many fine vales remain in a state of nature; yet there is plenty of olives, vines, oranges, lemons, nuts, almonds, figs, and raisins; and it is famous for excellent wines. Much salt is made also from the sea-water, especially in the bay of St. Ubes, whence a great deal is exported. The manufactures are few and unimportant, but the chief are those of woollen cloth. The foreign trade consists in the exportation of the produce of the country, and in the merchandise received from its foreign settlements; such as sugar, tobacco, rum, cotton, indigo, hides, brass and other woods for dying, and many excellent drugs. Beside these, it has gold, silver, diamonds, and other precious stones from America. The horses of Portugal were formerly in great esteem, but now mules are preferred; the horned cattle are small and lean; sheep are also neglected, and not numerous; but swine abound, and are fed with excellent acorns. Toward the frontiers of Spain there are mountains in which was formerly got gold and silver; and the river Tajo, the Tagus of the ancients, was celebrated by their poets for its golden sands.

POS

There are mines of iron, copper, tin, and lead, quarries of marble, and some precious stones. The principal rivers are the Tajo, Douro, Guadiana, Minho, and Mondego. The Portuguese are indolent, and spend all their wealth in the purchase of foreign luxuries. The women are addicted to gallantry, that men are jealous of their wives, and allow them but little liberty. The government is monarchical, but the royal authority is limited; for the sovereign cannot raise any more taxes than were settled in 1674. The established religion is the Roman Catholic, and there are a patriarch, two archbishops, and 10 bishops. The authority of the pope is so great, that the king cannot confer any benefice without his consent. In 1580, there was a failure in the royal line, and Philip 11 king of Spain subdued the country; but, in 1640, there was a great revolution, and the crown was conferred on John duke of Braganza (king John IV) whose descendants still enjoy it. In 1807, on the French invading Portugal, the whole of the Royal family embarked on a fleet in the Tajo, and sailed for Brazil, escorted by four British men of war. A regency was previously appointed, but no attempt was made to resist the French, who soon after entered the capital. The French governor immediately abolished the regency, and began to treat the country as a conquest of France; but in 1808, the English sent an army to aid the Portuguese, and the French were defeated at Vimiera. The battle was followed by a convention, and all the French forces were sent by sea to their own country. Lisbon is the capital.

Potosi, a town of Peru, capital of a jurisdiction, in the audience of Charcas. Here are the best silver mines in all America, in a conical mountain of the same name. Silver was as common in this place as iron is in Europe; but the mines are now much exhausted, or at least little is got in comparison of what was formerly. The country around is so naked and barren, that the inhabitants get their provisions from the neighbouring provinces. The town is seated at the skirt of the mountain, 260 m WNW Arica. Lon. 67° 22' W, lat. 19° 47' S.

Potsdam, a city of Brandenburg, in the Middle mark, seated on an island 10 m in circuit, formed by the river Havel. It is the most elegant and regular city in Europe. Many new houses were raised by Frederic II, and the various public buildings display great magnificence and taste. The royal palace is an admirable structure, and the houses near it are almost all built in the Italian style. The great parade, with Roman colonnades before the town, is the place of exercise for the king's guards and the garrison. In the market-place is a marble obelisk, 75 feet in height, and marble statues of the first four kings of Prussia. The garrison church is large, and has a marble pulpit, under which is the tomb of Frederic-William II. In 1795, the beautiful church of St. Nicholas, in the Palace-square, was destroyed by fire. Here are two large orphan-houses for the children of the soldiers, an extensive poor-house and hospital, and a capital foundery for fire-arms. On a hill near the city is the royal palace of Sans Souci, which is but small, and only one story high, yet its singularity and grandeur are astonishing. Potsdam has numerous manufactures of silk, velvet, cotton, linen, &c. It is 17 m SW Berlin. Lon. 13° 7' E, lat. 52° 25' N.

Prague, a fortified city, capital of Bohemia, and lately an archiepiscopal see. It comprehends four towns, the Old, New, and Little Town, and Radshin. It is 15 m in circuit, built upon seven hills; has about 100 churches and as many palaces; and contains 80,000 inhabitants. The Muldau runs through the city, separating the Old Town from the New, and over it is a bridge of 18 arches, with a strong tower at each end. The Old town is very populous; the houses are high, and the streets narrow. In this part is the old palace, where the ancient kings resided; but the finest ornament is the university, in which are a great number of students. Here also is a magnificent college, formerly belonging to the jesuits, and the Jews have nine synagogues. The New Town contains fine structures, handsome gardens, and large streets; also an arsenal, and a secular foundation, whose abbey was a princess of the empire. The Little Town, which is the most ancient part of Prague, has broad streets; and is very populous. Radshin once belonged to the Little Town, but in 1756 it was made the fourth town of Prague: its principal buildings are the royal palace, in which is a hall, 100 paces long and 40 broad, without any pillar to support the roof; the cathedral of St. Veir, containing the burial-place of the kings, and many relics; the chapel of Our Lady of Loretto; the magnificent archiepiscopal palace; and the large palace of Tschernin. Prague has suffered frequent devastations by war, which were however soon repaired. The White Mountain, without the gate of Strahow, is celebrated for the victory, in 1620, gained by the Austrians over Frederic v of the Palatinate, whom the Bohemians had chosen for their king. In 1631, Prague was taken by the Saxons; and by the Swedes in 1648. It was taken by storm by the French in 1741; but they were obliged to leave it in 1742. In 1744, it was taken by the king of Prussia; but he was obliged to abandon it in the same

Prince William Sound, a gulf on the NW coast of America, so named by Cook, in 1778. The men, women, and children, are all clothed in the same manner. Their ordinary dress is a sort of close robe, which sometimes reaches only to the knees, but generally down to the ancles. They are composed of the skins of various animals, and are commonly worn with the hairy side outward. The men often paint their faces of a black colour, and of a bright red, and sometimes of a bluish or leaden hue; but not in any regular figure. The women puncture or stain the chin with black, and bring it to a point on each of their cheeks. Their canoes are of two sorts; the one large and open, the other small and covered: the framing consists of slender pieces of wood, and the outside is composed of the skins of seals, or other sea animals, stretched over the wood. Their weapons, and implements for hunting and fishing, are the same as those used by the Eskimaux. Our knowledge of the animals of this part of the continent is entirely derived from the skins brought by the natives for sale; these were principally of bears, common and pine martens, sea-otters, seals, racoons, small ermine, foxes, and the whitish cat or lynx. The birds found here were the halcyon, the great kingfisher, the white-headed eagle, and the humming bird. Few vegetables of any kind were observed; and the trees that chiefly grew about the sound were the Canadian spruce pine. Lon. 147 21 W, lat. 59 33 N.

Prussia, a country of Europe, bounded on the N by the Baltic, E by Samogitia and Lithuania, s by Poland, and w by Germany. It produces a great deal of timber, flax, hemp, tobacco, and corn; and much amber is found on the seacoast. The domestic animals are numerous; and, beside the common game, there are eels, wild asses, and bison, in the forests; the last are of a monstrous size, and their hides are sold to foreigners at a great price. The principal rivers are the Vistula and Pregel; and there are numerous lakes, especially in E Prussia. The inhabitants are industrious, robust, and good soldiers; there are a great number of mechanics, but their principal business is husbandry, and the feeding of cattle. They are a mixture of different nations, comprehended under the denominations of Prussians, Poles, and Lithuanians. Most of the Prussians and the nobility conform to the German language and manners. The Lutheran religion is the most prevalent, but all religious sects enjoy liberty of conscience. The principal manufactures are glass, iron, copper, brass, gunpowder, paper, cloth, linen, and stockings. In the 13th century Prussia belonged to the knights of the Teutonic Order. In 1454, that part, since denominated Polish, or West Prussia, revolted to Casimir IV, king of Poland, and was incorporated into the dominions of the republic. At the same time, the knights were constrained to hold the remaining part, called Ducal or East Prussia, as a fief of the crown of Poland. In 1525, Albert, the grand master, betrayed the interests of his fraternity, and concluded a treaty with Sigismund, king of Poland, by which E Prussia was erected into an hereditary duchy, and given to him as a Polish fief. Having adopted the tenets of Luther, he married a princess of Denmark, and transmitted this rich inheritance to his descendants; one of whom, Frederic-William, was the first duke that threw off his dependence on Poland, in 1657. It is divided into the German department, or that of Konigsberg; and the Lithuanian, of which Gumbinnen is the seat of regency. The foundation of the Prussian monarchy was established by the above Frederic-William, between 1640 and 1688. His son and successor Frederic, in 1701, assumed the title of King of Prussia, which was soon after acknowledged by all the Christian powers, except Poland, which did not acknowledge it till 1764. In 1742, Frederic II acquired the duchy of Silesia from the house of Austria; and in 1772, he compelled the Poles to cede to him a part of Great Poland, and the whole of W Prussia, except the cities of Dantzic and Thorn. In 1793, Frederic-William II, by another forced cession, obtained the possession of those cities; also the remainder of Great Poland, and the provinces of Masovia and Polachia, which were denominated South Prussia, and Polen made the seat of government. From the unsuccessful war with the French, in 1807, Frederic-William III, by the treaty at Tilsit, gave up all the new acquisitions from Poland, also the circle of Cothbus in Lusatia, and all his German territories w of the river Elbe. But from a fortunate change in affairs, and the successful termination of the German campaign at the close of 1813, all his lost territories are likely to be restored by a general treaty of peace. Puzzoli, or Pozzuolo, the ancient Puteoli, a celebrated but now inconsiderable city of Italy, on the bay of Naples. Here are the remains of the temple of Jupiter Serapis, an interesting monument of antiquity, being different from the Roman and Greek temples, and probably built by the Egyptian and Asiatic merchants settled at Puzzoli, which was the great emporium of Italy, till the Romans built Ostia and Antium. Many other remains of temples, amphitheatres, and other public buildings in this city, afford convincing proofs of its former magnificence. The cathedral is supposed to stand on the ruins of a temple, and is undoubtedly built in a great degree of ancient materials, as appears from the vast blocks of marble that in many places form its walls. Near this city stood Cicero's villa, called Puteolanum, but not a vestige is left to mark its situation. Puzzoli is 10 m W Naples.

Pyrenees, mountains that divide France from Spain, and the most celebrated in Europe, except the Alps. They extend from the Mediterranean to the Atlantic, about 212 m, and have different names, according to their different situations. The passages over them are not so difficult as those of the Alps. These mountains yield great quantities of timber for ship-building, and abundance of pitch and tar. Their medium height is reckoned at 8000 feet, but many parts are considerably higher: see Perdu, Mount. At the western pass of these mountains, on the Spanish frontier, a battle was fought the end of July 1813, in which the French army, under marshal Soult, was signally defeated by the allies under lord Wellington.

Pyrenees, Eastern, a department of France, containing the late province of Roussillon. Although great part of the country is mountainous, it is fertile; producing corn, excellent wine, olives, and oranges; also leather of a superior quality. Perpignan is the capital.

Pyrenees, Lower, a department of France, containing the late provinces of Basques and Bearne. Pau is the capital. See Navarre.

Pyrenees, Upper, a department of France, containing the late province of Bigorre. Here are excellent horses and good partridges. The valleys are very fertile; furnishing rye, millet, Spanish corn, and flax. The mountains have mines of lead, iron, and copper, and quarries of slate, marble, and jasper. Tarbes is the capital.

Pyrgo, a town of European Turkey, in Morea, on the river Alpheus, 34 m NW Tripolizza.

Pyrmont, a town of Westphalia, in a county of the same name, with a fine citadel. Near it are mineral waters, well known to all Europe, and often frequented by persons of the highest rank. It is seated in a delightful valley, between high mountains, 38 m SW Hanover. Lon. 9 20 E, lat. 51 57 N.

Pyrslein, a town of Bavaria, in the principality of Passau, insulated in Austria. It is 10 m NW Linz, and 22 E Passau.

Q.

Quackenbruck, a town of Westphalia, in the principality of Osnaburg, seated on the Hase, 30 m N Osnaburg.

Quadra and Vancouver Island, an island on the NW coast of America, on the W side of which is Nootka sound. It was so named by captain Vancouver in compliment to senor Quadra, the Spanish commandant at Nootka. It is about 300 m long, and 80 in its greatest breadth.

Quadrella, a town of Naples, in Terra di Lavoro, 20 m ENE Naples.

Quang-ping, a city of China, of the first rank, in the province of Pe-tche-li, 212 m SSE Peking. Lon. 114 30 E, lat. 36 47 N.

Quang-si, a province of China, bounded on the N by Koei-tcheou and Hou-quang, W by Yunnan and the kingdom of Tonquin, S by the gulf of Tonquin and the province of Quang-tong, and E by the same and Hon-quang. The southern part is a flat country, and well cultivated; but the northern is full of mountains covered with trees, and has mines of gold, silver, copper, and tin. It is watered by several rivers, and produces so much rice, as to supply the inhabitants of Quang-tong for six months in the year. Here is a singular tree, which, instead of pith, contains a soft pulp that yields a kind of flour; and the bread made of it is said to be exceedingly good. Beside parquets, hedge-hogs, and the rhinoceros, a prodigious number of wild animals, curious birds, and uncommon insects, are found here. Quei-ling is the capital.

Quang-tong, a province of China, bounded on the W by Quang-si and Tonquin, N by Hou-quang and Kiang-si, NE by Fokien, and S by the China sea. It is diversified by valleys and mountains, and yields two crops of corn in a year. It abounds in gold, jewels, silk, pearls, tin, quicksilver, brass, iron, steel, saltpetre, sugar, ebony, and several sorts of odoriferous wood; beside fruit of all kinds. Here is a tree, whose wood is remarkably hard and heavy, and thence called iron wood. The mountains are covered with a sort of osters, which creep along the ground, and are so tough that baskets, hurdles, mats, and ropes, are made of them. The inhabitants breed a prodigious number of ducks, whose eggs they hatch in ovens. They load a great number of small barks with flocks of these birds, and carry them to the seashore, where the ducks mix together, and feed on shrimps and other kinds of shellfish left by the tide; and when night approaches they are collected together by only beating on a basin, and each flock returns to its own vessel. Canton is the capital; but the viceroy resides at Chao-king.

Quangtung, a town on the N borders of kingdom of Birmah, with a fort, frated on the Irrawaddy, 150 m NNE Ummerapoora.

Quaritz, a town of Silesia, in the principality of Glogau, 11 m WSW Glogau.

Queaus, a town of France, in the department of Vienne, 21 m SE Poitiers.

Quebec, a city and the capital of Lower Canada, situate on the left bank of the St. Lawrence. It is divided into the upper and lower town; the former erected on the summit of a black limestone rock, and the latter round the base of the eminence, on the border of the river. The highest part of this rock is called Cape Diamond, from the number of transparent quartz crystals found in its fissures, and is 350 feet above the level of the river, of which 250 rises perpendicularly. The communication between the lower and upper town is called Mountain-street, which is in a winding form and very steep. The houses in each are of stone, and the fortifications strong, though not regular. The citadel, which stands on the point of Cape Diamond, covers the town, and is both regular and handsome. The cathedral of the catholics is a plain building, with the spire on one side of its front. The jesuits' college, a large edifice, is now converted into a barrack for the troops. The protestant metropolitan church, and a house for the courts of law, are neat edifices built on the site of a monastery destroyed by fire in 1796. The seminary of the catholics and the convent of the Ursulines are spacious buildings, with extensive gardens. On the N side of the town is an edifice above 500 feet long, containing the office of ordnance, an armoury, storehouses and workshops, and a public gaol. The river here narrows suddenly to the breadth of a mile; but hence to the sea it is from 12 to 15 m broad, and navigable for men of war. The harbour is safe and commodious, and flanked by two bastions, raised 25 feet from the ground, which is the height of the equinoctial tides. Here are several dock-yards, and vessels of every description, from 50 to 1000 tons, are constructed of materials found in the country, but the anchors, sails, and cordage, are generally imported. The inhabitants are computed at 15,000. This city was erected by the French in 1605. The English reduced it, with all Canada, in 1626; but it was restored in 1632. In 1711, it was besieged by the English without success, but was taken by them in 1759, after a battle memorable for the death of general Wolfe, in the moment of victory, and confirmed to them by the peace of 1763. In 1775, it was attacked by the Americans under general Montgomery, who was slain, and his army repulsed. It is 360 m by the river, from the Atlantic ocean, and 330 N Boston. Queenstadt, a town of Lower Saxony, in the principality of Halberstadt; 5 m NE Halberstadt.

Queenstown, a town of Upper Canada, on the river Niagara, just below the last rapid. Here all the merchandise and stores received from Kingston for the upper part of the province are sent in wagons to Chippawa, a distance of 10 m, the falls and broken course of the river rendering the navigation impracticable for that space. This place was taken by the Americans October 13, 1812, and general Brock was killed; but it was retaken the same day, and the American general with 900 troops made prisoners. It is 7 m above Fort Niagara, and 20 N by E Fort Erie.

Queich, a river of France, in the department of Mont Tonnerre, which passes by Anweiler and Landau, and enters the Rhine, near Germersheim.

Quei-ling, a city of China, capital of the province of Quang-si. It has its name from a flower called quei, which grows on a tree resembling a laurel, and emits such a sweet odour, that it perfumes the whole country. It stands on a river that runs into the Ta, but with such rapidity as not to be navigable. It is 180 m N by W Canton, and 387 S Peking. Lon 109 51 E, lat. 25 12 N.

Quentin, St. a strong town of France, in the department of Aisne, with a considerable manufacture of lawns and cambrics. Near this place, in 1557, Philip II of Spain gained a signal victory over the French, and afterward took the town by storm. In memory of this, he built the Escorial. The town was restored to France in 1559. It is seated on an eminence, by the river Somme, Quistello, a town of Italy, in Mantua, famous for an action between the French and Austrians in 1734, when marshal Broglio was surprised in his bed. It is seated on the Secela, 15 m SE Mantua.

Quito, a kingdom of S America, in the vicerealty of New Granada, lying between two chains of the Andes, on a plain elevated 9370 feet above the level of the sea. Its W boundary is the Pacific ocean, on the coast of which it extends from lat. 2 N to cape Blanco in lat. 3 45 S.

It was under the jurisdiction of the viceroys of Peru until 1776, when it was made subject to the vicerealty established at St. Fe, the capital of New Granada. The lands are generally well cultivated, abound in every kind of vegetable production, and feed a great number of cattle of all classes. There are many towns and villages inhabited by the Spaniards or native Americans; and several districts are occupied almost entirely by Indians. Every village is adorned with a large square, and a church on one side of it. The streets are generally straight, and in the direction of the four cardinal points; and all the roads are laid out in a line, crossing each other, that the aspect of the country has the appearance of a large garden. Although this country is situate on both sides the equator, yet it lies so high, and so near the mountains covered with snow, that the air is very temperate. There are no noxious animals; for the tigers, &c. are below in the forests. This is the only province in Spanish America that can be called a manufacturing country. Hats, cotton stuffs, and coarse woollen cloths, are made here in such quantities, as to furnish a considerable article for exportation to other parts of Spanish America.

Quito, the capital of the kingdom of the same name, and a bishop's see. The principal square is large; in one of its sides is the palace of the president of the royal audience, opposite which is the city-house, in the third is the cathedral, in the fourth the bishop's palace, and in the middle a beautiful fountain. It has several religious communities, and two colleges, which are a kind of university; and all its edifices have a handsome appearance. Having no mines in its neighbourhood, it is chiefly famous for manufactures of cotton, wool, and flax. In 1755, it was swallowed up by an earthquake, but soon rebuilt. It is situate at the skirt of the volcanic mountain Picbinche, on the river Machangara, 400 m SW St. Fe. Lon. 78 8 W, lat. 0 13 S.

Rendsburg, a fortified town of Lower Saxony, in the duchy of Holstein, on the frontiers of Sleswick, and on the river Eyder. It is composed of three parts, the Old Town, the Sklenf-skule, and the New Town; the former of which stands on an island formed by the river. The principal manufactures are porcelain, earthen ware, and gold and silver lace; and the trade in timber, by means of the Eyder canal, is considerable. It is 15 m w Kiel, and 16 SSE Sleswick. Lon. 9 53 E, lat. 54 20 N.

Renfrew, a borough of Scotland, and the county-town of Renfrewshire. The principal branch of trade is the thread, but many looms are employed in the silk and muslin manufactures. Robert II had a palace here, of which nothing remains but the exterior ditch. The number of inhabitants was 2031 in 1801, and 2305 in 1811. It is seated near the Clyde, to which there is a canal, 11 m w by N Glasgow, and 13 E by S Greenock. Lon. 4 26 W, lat. 55 54 N.

Renfrewshire, a county of Scotland, 28 m long and 12 broad; bounded on the w and N by the frith of Clyde, E by Lanerkshire, and S by Ayrshire. It is divided into 17 parishes, and sends a member to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 78,056 in 1801, and 92,596 in 1811. In the N part, toward the borders of the Clyde, the soil is fertile, but the S part is mountainous, and rather barren. Beside the Clyde, it is watered by the Gryfe, and the White and Black Cart. The largest town is Paisley.

Rhayader, a corporate town of Wales, in Radnorshire, with a market on Wednesday. It is situate on the Wye, where there was formerly a cataract, which is now destroyed, and a neat bridge erected; and an eminence near it is the site of an ancient castle, of which no ruins remain. In the vicinity are lead and copper mines. It is 19 m wnw New Radnor and 178 London.

Rheda, a town of Westphalia, in the principality of Munster, 10 m n Lipstadt.

Rheims, a city of France, in the department of Marne, and lately an archbishop's see. The inhabitants are computed to be 30,000. The principal church, built before the year 406, is a very beautiful structure; and that of St. Nicaise is remarkable for its fine architecture. Behind the high altar of the church of St. Remy, the corpse of that archbishop is preserved in a magnificent shrine. The kings of France have been successively crowned at Rheims; probably, because Clovis, the founder of the French monarchy, when converted from paganism, was baptised in the cathedral here, in the year 496. The remains of lying along the Rhine, and now included in the canton of St. Gall. The protestant inhabitants are the most numerous. It is a fertile valley, 30 m long and from 3 to 8 broad, and produces excellent wine. Rheineck is the capital.

Rheinzabern, a town of France, in the department of Lower Rhine, seated on the Erlbach, 10 m SE Landau.

Rhena, a town of Lower Saxony, in the duchy of Mecklenburg, on the river Radegast, 14 m ESE Lubec.

Rhemen, a town of Holland, in Utrecht, seated on the Rhine, 20 m SE Utrecht.

Rhine, a great and remarkable river of Europe, which rises in Swisserland, in the canton of Grisons. It is formed of three streams; the Further Rhine, from the head of the valley of Disentis; the Middle Rhine, from the valley of Medelo, an appendage of St. Gothard; and the Hither or Upper Rhine, from the mount Avicula. The first two torrents united is called the Lower Rhine, which receives the Upper Rhine at Richenau; and the height is here about 6180 feet above the sea. Flowing by Coire, at the distance of a mile, the Rhine here becomes navigable for rafts. It is soon after the boundary between the Rheinthal and a territory of Austria, and passes through the lake of Constance from E to W. Leaving this lake, it becomes the boundary between Swisserland and Suabia, flowing by Schaffhausen (below which it forms a celebrated cataract) to Basel. At Basel the river turns to the N, and flows thence to Holland; in which course it becomes the barrier between France and Germany, waters many considerable cities and towns, and receives some large rivers. Below Emmerick, in the duchy of Cleve, it divides into two streams. That which bends to the W, and flows to Nimeguen, is called the Waal, but loses that name on its junction with the Meuse, at Worcum. Below Gorcum, it divides into four principal branches, forming the isles of Yffelmonde, Voorn, and Overflackee: the most northern branch is called the Merwe, and passing by Rotterdam and Schiedam, is joined by the branch from the S side of Yffelmonde, and enters the German ocean, below Briel: the other two branches make their exit at Helvoetsluys and Goree. The other stream which had branched off to the NW below Emmerick, retains its name; but below Huefsen another branches off to the N, takes the name of Yffel, and enters the Zuider zee, below Campen. The old river proceeds W by Arnheim to Duerstede, when it again divides into two streams:

that to the left is called the Leek, and enters the Merwe, above Rotterdam. The branch to the right, which retains its name, passes on to Utrecht, where it divides once more, into two streams: the smaller one is called the Vecht, which runs north into the Zuider zee, at Muyden; and the other, the remains of the noble Rhine, flows W by Woerden to Leyden, where it divides into several channels, and becomes lost among hills of sand near the village of Catwyck.

Rhine, Lower, a circle of Germany. It extended on both sides the Rhine, from the circle of Suabia, on the S, to that of Westphalia, on the N; containing the electorates of Mentz, Treves, and Cologne, the palatinate of the Rhine, the duchy of Westphalia, and the county of Lower Henburg. But in 1801, the territories of this circle to the W of the Rhine were ceded to France, and are included in the departments of Roer, Rhine and Moselle, Sarre, and Mont Tonnerre.

Rhine, Lower, a department of France, containing the N part of the late province of Alsace. Strasburg is the capital.

Rhine, Upper, a department of France, containing the S part of the late province of Alsace, the principality of Montbeliard, and the bishopric of Basel. Colmar is the capital.

Rhine, Upper, a circle of Germany. It extended across the Rhine from Lorrain in France, on the S, to the circle of Lower Saxony on the N, and was nearly intersected by the palatinate of the Rhine. It included the landgrate of Hesse, Wetteravia, the counties of Catzenellenbogen and Waldeck, the imperial town of Frankfort, the bishoprics of Fulda, Spire, and Worms, and the duchy of Deux Ponts. But the territories of this circle on the W side of the Rhine were ceded to France in 1801, and are included in the departments of Sarre and Mont Tonnerre.

Rhine, Palatinate of the, a late electorate of Germany, in the circle of Lower Rhine; bounded on the N by the archbishoprics of Mentz and Treves, E by Franconia, S by Suabia, and W by France. It was also called the Lower Palatinate, to distinguish it from the palatinate of Bavaria, sometimes called the Upper Palatinate. But this electorate was suppressed in 1801; the French annexing the part W of the Rhine to their own territory, and giving the remainder to the houses of Baden and Hesse.

Rhine and Moselle, a new department of France, including part of the late electorates of Cologne and Treves, and of the late palatinate of the Rhine. The capital is Coblenz.

Rhode Island, one of the United States of America, bounded on the N and E by Massachusetts, S by the Atlantic, and W by Connecticut. These limits comprehend what has been called Rhode Island and Providence Plantations. It is divided into the counties of Newport, Providence, Washington, Bristol, and Kent. The state is intersected in all directions by rivers: the chief of them are Providence and Tannun rivers, which flow into Narraganset bay. Iron-ore and limestone are found in great plenty in this state, which is principally a country for pastures. In 1870 the number of inhabitants was 76,213. Providence and Newport are the chief towns.

Rhode Island, an island of N America, in the state of its name, 15 m long and 4 broad. Between 30 and 40,000 sheep are fed here, beside bees and horses. This island is a noted resort of the invalids from the southern climates, being exceedingly pleasant and healthful. At the sw extremity is the town of Newport.

Rhodes, an island of the Archipelago, at the entrance of the gulf of Mæri, 40 m long and 15 broad. The soil is pretty fertile, but badly cultivated. This island is much celebrated in ancient history, having been frequently under the dominion of different masters. The Saracens became possessors of it in 665; and, in 1309, it was taken from them by the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, who afterward took the name of knights of Rhodes. They retained it till 1525, when it was taken by the Turks, after an obstinate resistance; and the small number of knights that remained were afterward removed to Malta. A pacha is the governor-general of the island, who presides over civil justice and military discipline.

Rhodes, the capital of the island of Rhodes, and an archbishop's see. It was anciently 9 m in circuit, and regarded by Alexander, who deposited his last will here, as the first city in the world; but the present town occupies only a quarter of the extent of the ancient city. It has a good harbour, with a narrow entrance between two piers, and is now so choked with ruins, that small vessels alone are able to enter. On a part of the harbour stood the famous Colossus, a statue of bronze, 70 cubits high, reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world: it was thrown down by an earthquake, 56 years after its erection; and when the Saracens became masters of the island, they knocked it to pieces, and sold the fragments to a Jew of Edessa. Rhodes was deemed an impregnable fortress, being surrounded by triple walls and double ditches, but they are now in a state of dilapidation. Over one of the gates is still to be seen a stone shield with the cross of the order of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem. A quadrangular edifice, which has the appearance of a monastery, is now converted into a guard-house and arsenal; and in it are large piles of marble bullets, made from the pieces of sculpture which formerly adorned the city. It is inhabited by Turks and Jews; for the Christians, who live in the suburbs, are not suffered to be within the walls in the nighttime. Lon. 27 56 E, lat. 36 27 N.

Rhodes; see Holetz.

Rhone, a river that rises in Switzerland, in Mount Furca, which source soon joins a more considerable stream from an extensive glacier called that of the Rhône. After passing through the vale of Valais, it runs through the lake of Geneva, and separating Savoy from Bresse, it flows W to Lyon, then S to Vienne, Tournon, Valence, Viviers, Pont St. Esprit, Avignon, Beaucaire, Tarascon, and Arles, and enters the Mediterranean by several mouths.

Rhone, a department of France, so named from the river Rhone, which flows on its E border. The Rhone and Loire was originally one department, but separated in 1792. This department includes the late provinces of Beaujolois and Lyonois. The capital is Lyon.

Rhone, Mouths of the, a department of France, on the coast of the Mediterranean, at the influx of the Rhone, containing the W part of the late province of Provence. Aix is the capital.

Rhonhouse, a village of Scotland, in Kircudbrightshire, 8 m NNW Newton Douglas, noted for a great annual fair, and a weekly cattle market from October to January.

Rhuddlan, a village of Wales, in Flintshire, on an eminence near the mouth of the Clwyd, 5 m NNW St. Asaph. It was once of considerable consequence, but now of little note, except for the remains of a castle built by Edward I, whose queen was here delivered of a princess in 1283; and in the same year a parliament is said to have been held here, when the famous Statute of Rhuddlan was enacted.

Ribnik, or Rimnik, a town of European Turkey, in Walachia, and a bishop's see. Here, in 1789, the Austrians and Russians gained a great victory over the Turks. It is seated on a river of the same name, 68 m sse Tergovist.—Another, on the river Alth, 50 m W by S Tergovist.

Ribnitz, a town of Lower Saxony, in the duchy of Mecklenburg, on a bay of the Baltic, near the influx of the Reckenitz, 15 m sse Rostock.

Richelieu, a town of France, in the department of Indre and Loire, founded by cardinal Richelieu in 1637, and seated on the Amable and Vide, 30 m ssw Tours.

Richmond, the capital of Virginia, in Henrico county, on the N side of James river. The public buildings are an episcopal church, a state-house, and court-house. Here is a floating toll bridge over the river; and the falls above the bridge are 7 m in length. Vessels of burden lie at City Point, 20 m below, to which goods from Richmond are sent down in boats. In 1811, the theatre here was destroyed by fire, which commenced during a time of performance, and many lives were lost. Richmond is 90 m ssw Alexandria. Lon. 77 55 W, lat. 37 35 N.

Richmond, a borough in N Yorkshire, governed by a mayor, with a market on Saturday. It was enclosed by a wall, with three gates, now in ruins; and has a castle, on an inaccessible mount, and two churches. It is the capital of a district called Richmondsire, which abounds in lead mines, and was formerly a county of itself. Richmond has a manufacture of woollen stockings, caps, &c. It is seated on the Swale, over which is a bridge, 40 m ssw York, and 230 ssw London. Lon. 1 35 W, lat. 54 28 N.

Richmond, a village in Surry, with a bridge over the Thames, 9 m wsw London. It was anciently called Sheen; but Henry VIII called it Richmond, on account of his having been earl of Richmond in Yorkshire. Here was a palace, in which Edward III, Henry VII, and queen Elizabeth expired. Richmond is still distinguished by its beautiful royal gardens, in which is an observatory; and its extensive royal park, surrounded by a brick wall, built by Charles I.

The Strada del Babuino, Strada del de Ripetta, Strada Felice, and Strada di Porta Pia, are also very long and noble streets. The chief squares are the Piazza Navona, Piazza d'Espagna, Piazza Colonna, Piazza del Monte Citorio, and Piazza del Popolo, which are surrounded with handsome buildings, and have fountains or obelisks in their area. There are no lamps lighted in the streets at night; and all Rome would be in utter darkness, were it not for the candles which the devotion of individuals sometimes place before the statues of the Virgin: these appear glimmering, at vast intervals, like stars in a cloudy night. Rome exhibits a strange mixture of magnificent and interesting, and of common and beggarly objects; the former consists of palaces, churches, obelisks, fountains, and the remains of antiquity; the latter comprehends all the rest of the city. The church of St. Peter, in the opinion of many, surpasses in magnitude, elevation, opulence, and beauty, every edifice in existence, or on record. It was begun to be built in 1508, finished in 1621, and is entirely covered both within and without with marble. The length is 730 feet, the breadth 520, and the height, from the pavement to the top of the cross that crowns the cupola, 450. The high altar is 90 feet in height, and of extraordinary magnificence; it stands under the centre of the cupola and over the tomb of St. Peter. A complete description of this church, and of its statues, basso-relievos, columns, and various other ornaments, would fill volumes. The cathedral of St. John Lateran, the Romans say, is the parent and mother of all churches. To this church every new pope goes in magnificent procession, to take possession of the holy see. The Pantheon, erected above 120 years before the christian era, to the honour of all the gods, is the most perfect of the Roman temples that now remain; and, notwithstanding the depredations it has sustained from Goths, Vandals, and popes, is still a noble monument of Roman taste. The pavilion of the great altar of St. Peter, and the four wreathed pillars of Corinthian brass that support it, were formed out of the spoils of the Pantheon, which has still a probability of outliving its proud capacious rival. This heathen temple, about the year 609, was made a christian temple, dedicated to the Virgin, and has obtained, from its circular form, the name of the Rotonda. The height is 150 feet, the diameter the same, and the cupola, which crowns it, is an exact hemisphere. It is paved and lined with marble, and lighted solely from a central opening in the dome. The amphitheatre of Vespasian and Titus, now called the Coliseum, is the most stupendous monument of antiquity in Rome: about one half of the external circuit still remains: from which an idea may be formed of the original structure, and by computation it could contain 85,000 spectators. But the antiquities of Rome are too numerous to be minutely described; that the ancient Forum, now a market for cattle; the column of Trajan, the arch of Constantine, the tomb of Cestius, the baths of Caracalla, &c. must be passed over. The Campidoglio, built by Michael Angelo, is a beautiful structure, standing on the site of the ancient capitol, so long the centre of the empire of the world. The body of this palace is the residence of the senators of Rome, and the wings are inhabited by the magistrates. The pope has three superb palaces, of which the principal is the Vatican, near St. Peter's church: the library of this palace is deemed the largest in the world, and rich, especially in manuscripts, in all languages and of all ages. In Rome the connoisseur will meet with innumerable paintings by the greatest masters, and with the finest works of sculpture, &c. Beside the university, which consists of several noble colleges, there are numerous academies and literary societies. The castle of St. Angelo serves more to keep the city in awe, than to repel any foreign attack. Several fine gardens and villas are within the ancient walls of the city, contributing much to its coolness and beauty; and many others, with several grand objects of antiquity, are in the suburbs and neighbourhood, which give the immediate environs an uncommon share of amenity and interest. Rome was entered, in 1798, by the French, and they sent away a great number of the most valuable statues and paintings; in 1799, it was retaken by the allies; and in 1809, it became subject to France.

one of the finest harbours in the Netherlands. It is the most considerable place in Holland, for the beauty of its buildings, and trade, next to Amsterdam; and its inhabitants are computed at 48,000. Its port is more frequented than Amsterdam; and there are so many deep canals, that ships may unload at the very doors of the warehouses. On the E side of the city is a large basin and dock, for the purpose of building and launching vessels employed in the service of the admiralty and the East-India Company. The townhouse, the bank, and the arsenal, are magnificent. Some of the houses are built in the old Spanish style, with the gable ends embattled in front; but there is a great number of modern brick houses, which are lofty and spacious, particularly on that magnificent quay called the Bomb Tees. On this quay is a handsome synagogue. A statue of Erasmus, in bronze, stands at the head of one of the canals; and on the house in which he was born is an inscription to his honour. mosses, hills, and mountains, interspersed with narrow valleys, well watered, and fertile in corn. The hills feed great numbers of sheep and cattle. This county had its name from the once magnificent city and castle of Roxburg, situate between the Teviot and the Tweed, nearly opposite Kelfo; of the city few traces are now evident; and the castle, near the mouth of the Teviot, is entirely a ruin. At this castle, in 1367, James II of Scotland lost his life by the bursting of a cannon. About 2 m w from the castle, on the banks of the Teviot, is a village called Roxburg. The present capital of the county is Jedburg.

Russia, a vast empire, partly in Asia, and partly in Europe; bounded on the N by the Frozen ocean, E by the Pacific ocean, S by Great Tartary, the Caspian sea, Persia, Turkey in Asia, and the Black sea, and W by Turkey in Europe, Poland, the Baltic sea, and Sweden. There were three countries that had the name of Russia; namely, Red Russia, which formed the S part of Poland; White Russia, which comprehended the E part of Lithuania; and Black Russia, which included the governments of Kaluga, Moscow, Tula, Rezan, Volodimir, and Jaroslavl; and hence his imperial majesty takes the title of emperor of all the Russias. This empire, exclusive of the late acquisitions from the Turks and from Poland (see Poland) forms a square, whose sides are 2000 m each. A country of such vast extent must lie in different climates, and the soil and products must be as different; but not a third of the country is sufficiently peopled, or properly cultivated. The most fertile part is near the frontiers of Poland, where the inhabitants can supply their neighbours with corn: the N part is not only more cold, but very marshy, and overrun with forests, inhabited chiefly by wild beasts. The whole country is well watered by lakes and numerous rivers, which abound with fish; the principal rivers are the Dnieper, Volga, Don, Dwina, and Oby. Medicinal and saline springs are not uncommon; and there are mines of fine silver, copper, iron, and other minerals. The red and black juchte, or Russia leather, for colour, smell, and softness, cannot be equalled in any other part of the world; and there are manufactures of linen, woollen stuffs, velvet, and silk: also brass, iron, steel, and tin are wrought; and great guns, arms, wire, cordage, canvas, paper, parchment, candles, saltpetre, gunpowder, glass, &c. are made in Russia. This country affords a variety of commodities that are of great use to foreigners, and as its exports greatly exceed the imports, there is a considerable annual balance of trade in its favour. The home commodities are furs, black furs, the skins of black and white foxes, ermines, hyenas, lynxes, bears, panthers, wolves, martens, white hares, &c. likewise Russia leather and linen, copper, iron, talc, tallow, wax, honey, corn, potash, tar, linseed and train oil, castor, iinglass, hemp, flax, thread, Siberian musk, soap, feathers, timber, &c. To these commodities may be added almost all the merchandise of China, India, Persia, Turkey, and some European countries. This extensive empire was divided by Catharine II into 41 governments; namely Petersburg, Olonetz, Wiburg, Revel, Riga, Pskof, Novogorod, Tver, Smolensk, Polotfk, Mohilef, Orel, Kaluga, Moscow, Tula, Rezan, Volodimir, Jaroslavl, Vologda, Archangel, Kostroma, Niznei Novogorod, Katan,

The church is governed by a patriarch, under whom are the archbishops and bishops. The established religion is that of the Greek church; but a considerable number of Russians profess the Mohamedan religion, and a greater number are still pagans. The inhabitants of the provinces conquered from Sweden are Lutherans; and the protestants, of whom there are great numbers among the Russians, as also the papists, enjoy the public exercise of their religion; but the latter are not suffered to hang up bells in their churches. There are many convents for both sexes in the empire; but Peter I ordered, that no man should enter on a monastic life before he is 30 years of age, and that no woman should take the veil under 50, and then not without the licence of the holy synod. Formerly the Russians were wholly employed in agriculture, feeding of cattle, hunting, and fishing; and he was thought a learned man who could read and write: but Peter the great undertook to introduce the arts and sciences; and, in 1724, he founded the first university that ever was in Russia, and an academy of sciences, at Peterburg, supplied with some of the best professors in Europe; and he also invited and established great numbers of excellent artificers. The Russians, in general, are robust, well-shaped, and of pretty good complexion. They are great eaters, and very fond of brandy. They smoke no tobacco, lest the smoke should dishonour the images of the saints, which they hold in great veneration; but they take a great deal of snuff, made of the tobacco brought from the Ukraine. With respect to dress, a long beard is in high estimation among the fair nymphs of Russia; and the commonalty have still a great veneration for this fringe of human hair, notwithstanding the efforts of their monarchs to root it out. Those who retain their beards retain likewise the ancient dress, the long swaddling coat, either of skins, or of coarse cloth lined with skins, in winter; and in summer, of cloth only. About their middle they have a sash of any colour; but what they mostly affect, is green or yellow. They wear trowsers and stockings; their limbs are, besides, wrapped in folds of woollen stuffs to keep them warm, and over all they wear boots. Their shirts are without collars; and their necks exposed to the cold, which are hard and impenetrable from this practice. Government endeavours to compel the subjects to adopt the German dress; and, the clergy alone excepted, none can procure any place or favour at court, upon other condition than banishing the Asiatic sheep-skin robes. But so zealously attached are the multitude to former manners, and so honorably do they esteem them, that a Russian dressed in his beard and gown, tells you by his looks that he has not prostituted the memory of his ancestors. The dress of the women is the reverse of the men, both in fashion and colour; every part of it being as short and tight as decency will allow, and very gaudy. It is the same with that of the Highland women in Scotland; both have the short jacket, the striped petticoat, and the tartan plaid; and both too, in general, have a napkin rolled about their head: the Russian women are, however, far more elegant and rich in their attire; nor is gold lace and paint wanting, to set off their charms. The young generation are modernizing these antic vestments; the stiff embroidered napkin is supplanted by one of flowing silk; the jacket and petticoat are of mullin, or other fine stuffs; and the plaid is exchanged for a silk or satin cloak, in the cold season lined with fur. The better class of females wear velvet boots. The dress of the higher ranks is after the French and English fashion; and all wear a covering of fur six months of the year. Persons of both sexes wear a cross on their breasts, which is put on when they are baptized, and never laid aside while they live; the peasants' crosses are of lead, but those worn by the better sort are of gold or silver. The sovereign of Russia is absolute. He was formerly called grand duke, which is now the title of the heir apparent; he afterward assumed the title of czar, which the natives pronounce tzar, or zaar, a corruption of Cesar, emperor; from some fancied relation to the Roman emperors; on account of which they also bear the eagle as a symbol of their empire. The first who bore the title of czar was Basil, son of Basilides, who freed his country from its subjection to the Tartars, about the year 1470. The title of emperor was first assumed by Peter I, who, by his actions, justly acquired the surname of Great, and finished his glorious course in the year 1725. Perhaps no country ever exhibited, in fo short a time, the wonders that may be effected by the genius and exertions of one man. Peter the great, at his accession to the throne, found his subjects of all ranks involved in the grossest ignorance and barbarism; his numerous armies ferocious and undisciplined; and he had neither merchant ships nor men of war; which, added to the remoteness of her situation, rendered the influence of Russia in the politics of Europe of little consideration. Peter civilized his barbarous subjects, disciplined his armies, built cities and fortresses, and created a navy. These national improvements have been continued since his time, and Russia now holds a rank among the nations of the world, of which human foresight, at the commencement of the eighteenth century, could have formed no conception. In 1812, this country was invaded by the French and their confederate allies with a well disciplined army of 300,000 men, under Bonaparté. This mighty host met with little opposition in the early part of its progress, the Russians generally evacuating their towns, burning the magazines, and destroying the bridges, &c. as they retreated: but at Smolensk a great stand was made, afterward a dreadful battle fought at Borodino, and then Moscow given up in flames. This sacrifice of the ancient capital, by order of the veteran field-marshal prince Kutusoff, probably saved the empire; for the French, not being able to subsist in the city, nor to obtain supplies from without, were compelled to make a retreat, in which, by war, want, and cold, scarce 50,000 men escaped out of Russia: these were afterward abandoned by the presumptuous chief, who fled in disguise for France, and half of them perished. The Russian official returns of taken, to December 25, were 41 generals, 1298 officers, 167,510 non-commissioned officers and soldiers, and 1231 cannon. Hence above 106,000 of the invaders lost their lives in this campaign. Petrsburg is the metropolis of the empire.

Salvador, St. a city of Brasil, capital of the province of All-Saints Bay, and an archbishop's see, with several forts. The cathedral is large; but the most superb structure is the grand church of the ex-jesuits, built of European marble, and the internal part exceedingly rich. The houses are two or three stories high, and built of stone. The principal streets are large, but the generality are narrow and dirty. In the royal square, is the governor's house, the mint, and the public offices; and along the beach is the custom-house, dock-yard, storehouses, &c. There are many gardens, full of a great variety of fruit-trees, herbs, and flowers. The chief commodities are cotton, sugar, tobacco, coffee, gums, wood, hides, tallow, and trainoil. The inhabitants are estimated at upward of 100,000. It is seated on an eminence, on the E side of the bay of All-Saints. Lon. 38 33 w, lat. 12 58 S.

Salzburg, a duchy of Germany, in the circle of Bavaria, 100 m long and 60 broad; bounded on the N by Bavaria, E by Austria and Stiria, S by Carinthia, and W by Tyrol and Bavaria. It was an archbishopric, whose prelate was a sovereign prince; but in 1803 the territory was given as an indemnity to the late grand duke of Tuscany, who held it as an electorate till 1805, when it was ceded to Austria, as a duchy; and in 1809 it was transferred to Bavaria. It is a mountainous country, but pretty fertile, and contains mines of copper, silver, and iron.

Salzburg, a fortified city of Germany, capital of a duchy of the same name, with a strong castle on a mountain, a university, and two noble palaces. The inhabitants are estimated at 20,000. The cathedral of St. Rupert is very fine, and contains five organs. The church of St. Peter is the oldest in the city, and near it stands a Benedictine monastery, in which is a fine library. An amphitheatre hewn out of a rock, and the ducal stables on the side of the mountain called Monchberg, are deserving particular notice. Near Salzburg are some very productive salt-works. The French became masters of this city in 1800, and again in 1805. It is situate between three mountains, on both sides the river Salza. 45 m S by W Passau, and 155 w by S Vienna. Samos, an island of the Archipelago, on the coast of Natolia, and to the E of the isle of Nicaria. It is 30 m long and 20 broad, and crossed by a ridge of hills. It abounds with partridges, woodcocks, snipes, thrushes, wood-pigeons, turtledoves, wheatears, and excellent poultry. There are no rabbits, but many hares, goats, and some sheep. Here is plenty of wheat, barley, and millet; also abundance of melons, lentils, kidney beans, muscadine grapes, and white figs, four times as big as the common sort, but not so well tasted. The silk, honey, and wax are esteemed; and pitch is made from the pine trees in the N part of the island. Here are some iron mines, emery stone is not scarce, and ochre is common. Most of the soil is of a rusty colour; and all the mountains are of white marble. The inhabitants are almost all Greeks, and are not tyrannised over by the Turks. The habit of the women is a vest, after the Turkish manner, with a red cowl, and their hair hanging down the back in tresses, with tassels of coarse silver or block tin fastened to the ends. Some of them are found in small detached bodies among the mountains to the w of Lake Baikal; others are supposed to be within the Chinese frontiers; others are scattered among the deserts, which extend along the Frozen ocean; and some nearly as far to the w as Archangel. The Samoyedes have a large head, a flat face, high cheek bones, small eyes, a wide mouth, yellow complexion, straight black hair, and little or no beard. They have no longer the use of horses, because the climate of their present country renders their subsistence impossible; but they still preserve the manners of a pastoral people, and retain the use of moveable habitations, with which they wander from place to place. They neither have, nor appear ever to have had, any kind of regular government. Their traditional songs mention only certain heroes, who, in better times, led their ancestors to battle. These songs form their principal amusements; but the exploits they celebrate are never likely to be renewed.

Sandwich Islands, a group of islands in the Pacific ocean, discovered by Cook in 1778. They are 11 in number, extending from 18 54 to 22 15 N lat. and from 150 54 to 160 24 W lon. They are called by the natives, Owhyhee, Mowee, Ranai, Morotoi, Tahoorowa, Woahoo, Atooi, Neeheehew, Oneehova, Morotinne, and Takoora, all inhabited, except the last two. The climate differs little from that of the W Indies in the same latitude; but there are no violent winds, and there is more rain. The vegetable productions are nearly the same as those of the other islands in this ocean; but the taro root is here of a superior quality. The bread-fruit trees are not in such abundance as in the plains of Otaheite, but produce double the quantity of fruit. The sugar canes are of a very unusual size, some of them measuring 11 inches in circumference, and having 14 feet eatable. There is also a root of a brown colour, shaped like a yam, and from six to ten pounds in weight, the juice of which is an excellent substitute for sugar. The quadrupeds are confined to hogs, dogs, and rats. The fowls are of the common sort; the birds beautiful and numerous, though not various. Goats, pigs, and European seeds were left by captain Cook; but the possession of the goats soon gave rise to a contest between two districts, in which the breed was destroyed. The inhabitants, in their persons, language, and manners, approach nearer to the New Zealanders, than to their less distant neighbours, either of the Society or Friendly islands. They are, in general, above the middle size, and well made; and are capable of bearing great fatigue. Many of both sexes have fine open countenances; and the women, in particular, have good eyes and teeth, with an engaging sensibility of look. There is one peculiarity, characteristic of every part of the nation, that even in the handsomest faces there is a fulcness of the nostril, without any flatness or spreading of the nose. The men suffer their beards to grow, and wear their hair after various fashions. The dress of both sexes nearly resembles those of New Zealand, and they wear necklaces of small variegated shells. Tattooing the body is practised by every colony of this nation. The hands and arms of the women are also neatly marked, and they have the singular custom of tattooing the tip of the tongue. They live together in villages, containing from 100 to 200 houses, built closely together, without any order, and having a winding path between them. They are generally flanked, toward the sea, with detached walls, which are meant both for shelter and defence. These walls consist of loose stones, and the inhabitants are very dexterous in shifting them suddenly to such places as the direction of the attack. The sides of the hills are covered with caves, the entrance of the same kind; and retreat in cases of emergency, can be defended by a few several assailants. Some are from 40 to 50 feet high, and 30 to 30 broad; others are from 20 to 30 feet high. The food of the natives consists principally of fish, which the people eat with the flesh of hogs and other animals, and in the tops of canoes, mats, &c. The occupations of the natives consist of fishing, and the employment in manufactures. The servants are principally employed in plantations, and in various amusements, such as boxing, wrestling, &c. The sports, which are spread over the sea-coast, consist of the root, and sweet potato, the cloth tree, set in salt in great abundance, and of all kinds. The canoes are of a simple construction, hollowed out to the length of an inch, and brought to a point at each end; the sides consist of planks, each about an inch thick, and lashed to the bottom of their double canoes in length, three and four feet in breadth. They use spears, daggers, clubs, and other arms, which are not easily broken. The government is monarchical; but as the islands are united under one sovereign, frequent among them is the tem of subordination to the other islands; the submission on the part of the human sacrifices are only at the command of the signal enterprise, but considerable chief cases of these horrid rites. Captain Cook was here, and his sudden resentment, acknowledged to be affectionate disposition, to strangers the respect, below the rank of mankind.

direction of the attack may require. In the sides of the hills they have little caves, the entrance secured by a fence of the same kind; these are places of retreat in cases of extremity, and may be defended by a single person against several assailants. Some of the houses are from 40 to 50 feet long, and from 20 to 30 broad; others are mere hovels. The food of the lower class consists principally of fish and vegetables, to which the people of higher rank add the flesh of hogs and dogs. The making of canoes, mats, &c. forms the occupations of the men; the women are employed in manufacturing cloth; and the servants are principally engaged in the plantations, and fishing. They have various amusements, such as dancing, boxing, wrestling, &c. Their plantations, which are spread over the whole seacoast, consist of the taro, or eddy-root, and sweet potatoes, with plants of the cloth tree, set in rows. They make salt in great abundance, and good cordage of all kinds. The bottoms of their canoes are of a single piece of wood, hollowed out to the thickness of an inch, and brought to a point at each end; the sides consist of three boards, each about an inch thick, neatly fitted and lashed to the bottom part. Some of their double canoes measure 70 feet in length, three and a half in depth, and 12 in breadth. Their weapons are spears, daggers, clubs, and slings; and for armour they wear strong mats, which are not easily penetrated. The government is monarchical and hereditary; but as the islands are not united under one sovereign, wars are frequent among them. The same system of subordination prevails here as at the other islands; the absolute authority on the part of the chiefs, and unresisting submission on the part of the people. Human sacrifices are here frequent; not only at the commencement of a war, or signal enterprise, but the death of every considerable chief calls for a repetition of these horrid rites. Notwithstanding captain Cook was here killed through a sudden resentment, the inhabitants are acknowledged to be of a mild and affectionate disposition; and in hospitality to strangers they are not exceeded by those of the Friendly islands. Their natural capacity seems, in no respect, below the common standard of mankind.

Sandwich Land, a desolate country in the Southern ocean, to the SE of the island of Georgia. The mountains are of a vast height, their summits wrapped in clouds, and their bases covered with snow to the water's edge. It is doubtful whether the different projecting points form one connected land, or several distinct islands. Santoua, a town of Spain, in Asturias, near the bay of Biscay, with a good harbour, strongly fortified by nature and art, 22 m E Santander.

Santorin, the ancient Thera, an island of the Archipelago, to the S of Nio. It is in the form of a crescent, 10 m long and from 1 to 4 broad. Between its two points, to complete the circle, are the small islands of Therasia and Aspronisi; and within these are three other islands, between which and Santorin is a road for ships, but it affords no anchorage, on account of its depth in some places, and rocky bottom in others. All these islands are of volcanic origin, but the three interior ones are evidently of much later date. Santori, in proportion to its extent, is the richest and most populous island of the Archipelago. There are two bishops; the one Latin, whose see is Scauro; and the other Greek, whose residence is at Pirgos, near the middle of the island. The soil is very dry, and far from fertile; but it produces plenty of barley, cotton, and wine, in which, and cotton manufactures, the trade consists. Fruit is scarce, except figs, and it has only cistern water. The inhabitants are almost all Greeks, about 12,000 in number, and though subject to the Turks, they choose their own magistrates. Scauro is the capital.

Saraceni, a people celebrated some centuries ago, who came from the deserts of Arabia: sarra in their language signifying a desert. They were the first disciples of Mohamed, and, within 40 years after his death, conquered a great part of Asia, Africa, and Europe. They kept possession of Spain till 1511, when they were expelled. They maintained a war in the Holy Land, a long time, against the Western Christians, and at length drove them out of it. There are now no people known by this name, for the descendants of those who conquered Spain are called Moors.

Saragoſſa, a city of Spain, capital of Aragon, and an archbishop's ſee, with a univerſity, and a court of inquisition. It is ſaid to have been built by the Phenicians; and the Romans ſent a colony hither in the reign of Auguſtus, whence it had the name of Caeſarea Auguſta, which by corruption has been changed into Saragoſſa. Here are many magnificent buildings, 17 large churches, and 14 handſome convents, beſide others leſs conſiderable. The Ebro runs through the city, dividing it into two parts; and on its banks is a handſome quay, which ſerves for a public walk. The Holy-ſtreet is the largeſt, and ſo broad it may be taken for a ſquare; and here they had their bull-fights. The cathedral is a ſpacious Gothic building; but the fineſt church is that of Nueſtra Señora del Pilar, and a place of the greateſt devotion in Spain. They tell us, that the Virgin, while living, appeared to St. James, who was preaching the goſpel, and left him her image, with a handſome pillar of jaſper. This image ſtands on a marble pillar, with a little Jeſus in her arms, ornamented with a profuſion of gold and jewels, and illuminated by a multitude of lamps and wax lights. The townhouſe is a ſumptuous ſtructure; and in the hall are the pictures of all the kings of Aragon. Saragoſſa has few manufactures, and but little trade. It is ſeated in a large plain (where the Ebro receives two other rivers) which produces all kinds of fruit in great abundance. A victory was obtained here over the French and Spaniards in 1710, but it was abandoned by the allies ſoon after. In 1808 it ſuſtained a ſiege by the French; but in another which laſted 63 days, the ſurviving beſieged were obliged to ſurrender in February 1809, being quite worn out by fighting, peſtilence, and famine. During this memorable ſiege,

On the top of this rock is a green plain, with a well of fresh water, and the remains of a castle, built by Henry II. This town is greatly frequented on account of its mineral waters, and for sea-bathing; that it is much improved in the number and beauty of its buildings. The harbour is one of the best in the kingdom, with a commodious quay, several ship-yards, and a strong battery. Scarborough has a considerable trade, and is much engaged in the fisheries. The number of inhabitants was 6409 in 1801, and 6710 in 1811. It is 36 m NE York, and 214 N London. Lon. 0 10 W, lat. 54 18 N.

Schafhausen, a canton of Switzerland, 15 m long and 10 broad; bounded on the W and N by Suabia, E by the canton of Zurich and the bishopric of Constance, and S by the same and Thurgau. The reformation was introduced here in 1529, and the religion is Calvinism. The country abounds in vineyards, and affords but little corn; so that the latter is procured from Suabia in exchange for wine.

Schafhausen, a town of Switzerland, capital of a canton of the same name. It is seated on the Rhine, and owes its origin to the interruption of the navigation of that river by the cataract at Lauffen; huts being at first constructed for the conveniency of unloading the merchandise from the boats, by degrees increased to a large town. Though a frontier town, it has no garrison, and the fortifications are weak. It had a famous wooden bridge over the Rhine, which is here near 400 feet wide; it was a kind of hanging bridge; for the road did not pass over the arch, but was suspended from it and almost level. This curious bridge was burnt by the French, when they evacuated the town, after being defeated by the Austrians, in 1799. Schafhausen is 22 m N by E Zurich, and 39 E Basel. Lon. 3 41 E, lat. 47 39 N.

Schweitz, a canton of Switzerland, bounded on the W by the Waldstadter see, S by the canton of Uri, by that of Glarus, and N by those of Zurich and Zug. This canton, with that of Uri and Unterwalden, threw off the yoke of Austria, in 1308; and they formed a perpetual alliance in 1315, which was the grand foundation of the Helvetic confederacy. The name of Schweitzerland, Switzerland, or Swisserland, which originally comprehended only these three cantons, was afterward extended to all Helvetia. It derived that appellation, either from the canton of Schweitz, as being the most distinguished by the revolution of 1308, or because the Austrians called all the inhabitants of these mountainous parts by the general denomination of Schweitzers. The cantons of Schweitz and Uri have the same kind of soil, and the same productions. The whole country being rugged and mountainous, consists chiefly of pasture, raises little corn, and has no wine; but this soil, naturally barren, has been improved by the natives to a great degree of fertility. The Roman catholic religion is here exclusively established.

sea was thrown furiously 3 m inland, and on its return swept off the prince of Sciglio, with 2473 of the inhabitants, who, hoping to find security, were then on the Scylla strand, or in boats near the shore. It is 10 m N by E Reggio.

Silly, a cluster of numerous isles and rocks, at the entrance of the English and St. George channels, lying almost 10 leagues W of the Lands-end, in Cornwall. Of these only six are inhabited, and in 1810 contained 2375 persons. They are a resort for sea-fowl, and feed many sheep and rabbits. The inhabitants principally subsist by fishing, burning kelp, and acting as pilots. The chief isle is that of St. Mary, nearly 3 m long and 2 broad, which has a good port, is well fortified, and contains more than half of the whole population. In this isle, and in two or three others, are various antiquities, particularly the remains of a temple of the Druids, and ancient sepulchres. On that of St. Agnes is a lighthouse, which, with the gallery, is 51 feet high, and a very fine column. At the outermost extremity of the isle of St. Martin is a seamark, built with rockstone, and as conspicuous by day as the lighthouse on St. Agnes, but not so high and large. The Scilly rocks have been fatal to numbers of ships entering the English channel. One of the most disastrous events of this kind happened in 1707, when three men of war perished, with admiral Sir Cloudesley Shovel and all their crews. St. Agnes lighthouse is in lon. 6 19 W, lat. 49 54 N.

Silly, a group of isles or shoals, in the Pacific ocean, discovered by captain Wallis in 1767, and described as very dangerous. Lon. 155 30 W, lat. 16 30 S.

Scio, or Chio, an island of the Archipelago, near the coast of Natolia, NW of Samos. It is 36 m long and 12 broad, and a mountainous country; yet various kinds of fruit grow in the fields, such as oranges, citrons, olives, mulberries, and pomegranates, interspersed with myrtles and jasmines. The wine of Scio, so celebrated by the ancients, is still in great esteem; but the island is now principally distinguished by the profitable culture of mastic: it has also some trade in silk, cotton, and figs. It is computed that there are 4000 Turks, 60,000 Greeks, and 2000 Latins, on this island. The Turks took it from the Genoese in 1566. Beside the town of the same name, it contains 68 villages all inhabited by Greeks; and those which furnish mastic are the most rich and populous.

Selo, a seaport and the capital of an island of the same name, and a bishop's see. It is the best built town in the Archipelago; the houses being commodious, some of them terraced, and others covered with tiles. The castle is an old citadel built by the Genoese, in which the Turks have a garrison. The harbour is a rendezvous for ships, that go to or come from Constantinople: it will contain 80 vessels, is protected by a low mole, and has two lighthouses. It stands on the E side of the island, 67 m W Smyrna. Lon. 26 12 E, lat. 38 26 N.

Scioto, a river of the state of Ohio, which rises near the source of the Sandusky, a potable water of Lake Erie, and flows S to the Ohio, which it enters 300 m below Pittsburg. It is navigable by large barges 150 m, and by small boats to its source, whence there is a portage of only 4 m to the Sandusky.

Scipio, a town of New York, chief of Onondago county. It is seated on the E side of Cayuga lake, 95 m W Cooperstown. Lon. 76 52 W, lat. 42 44 N.

Sciro, or Sciros, an island of the Archipelago, to the W of Metelin. It is 15 m long and 8 broad, and a mountainous country, but has no mines. The vines make the beauty of the island, and the wine is excellent; nor do the natives want corn or wood. It contains only the village and convent of St. George, both built on a conical rock, 10 m from the harbour of St. George. Lon. 24 38 E, lat. 38 54 N.

Scituate, a town of Massachusetts, in Plymouth county, with a harbour, on an inlet of Massachusetts bay, 15 m W Plymouth.

Scituate, a town of Rhode Island, in Providence county, near which is a foundery for cannons and bells. It is 11 m SSW Providence, and 27 NW Newport.

Sclavonia, a country of Europe, lying between the rivers Drave and Danube on the N, and the Save on the S; bounded on the W by Croatia, from which to the conflux of the Save with the Danube it is 150 m in length, and from 25 to 45 in breadth. It is a fertile level country, divided into six counties, and belongs to the house of Austria. The eastern part is called Ratzia, and the inhabitants Rascians. These form a particular nation, and are of the Greek church. The ancient Slavonia contained many large countries; some have extended it from the Adriatic to the Euxine sea, and say that it had its name from the Sclavi, a Scythian nation, who conquered Greece the reign of emperor of four others, namely, Hungary, Bohemia, Po-

Scione, or Scoon, a town on the E side of the Perth. Here is a site of a more ancient kingdom of Scotland and on a celebrated removed to England.

Scopelo, an island of the Archipelago, 10 m long and 3 broad, lying 5 m E of Scio. Lon. 23 50 E, lat. 39 23 N.

Scopia, or Uskiub, a town of European Turkey, in Macedonia, and an archbishop's see. It is celebrated for the manufacture of Morocco leather, and seated on the Vardar, over which is a bridge of 12 arches, 90 m E Scutari, and 170 m NW Salonica. Lon. 21 15 E, lat. 43 40 N.

Scotland, or North Britain, the northern of the two kingdoms into which the island of Great Britain was formerly divided. It is bounded on the W by the Atlantic ocean, N by the North sea, E by the German ocean, SE by England, and S by the Irish sea. To Scotland also appertain the islands on its western coast, called the Hebrides, or Western islands, and those to the NE called the Orkney and Shetland islands. From N to S it extends 270 m, and the greatest breadth is 150, but in some places not above 30; and no part is distant above 40 m from the coast. It contains 29,167 square miles, or 18,666,880 acres. The number of inhabitants was 1,599,068 in 1801, and 1,805,688 in 1811, exclusive of the army and navy, for which a thirtieth part may be added. Scotland is divided into two districts, the Highlands and the Lowlands; the former is applied to the mountainous part to the N and NW of the Grampian hills, and the latter to the more level district on the E and SE. But nature seems to have pointed out three grand divisions in Scotland. The first, or North division, is formed by a chain of lakes, which cross the country, from the frith of Moray to the foun of Mull, in a SW direction, and are now uniting into a canal, called the Caledonian Canal; the second, or Middle division, is bounded on the S by the friths of Forth and Clyde, and the great canal by which they are united; and on the S side of this boundary is the third, or South division. The North division is chiefly an assemblage of vast dreary mountains; not, however, without some fertile valleys on the northern and eastern shores. The Middle division is traversed in different directions by several ranges of mountains; and though cultivation here is also found chiefly on the eastern shore, yet of this division, as well as of the former, the arable land bears a small proportion to the mountainous and barren tracts. The South division has a great resemblance to England, and, with respect both to the aspect of the country and progress of cultivation, exhibits every kind of rural variety. The civil division of the country is into 33 counties, namely, Shetland and Orkney, Caithness, Sutherland, Ross, Cromarty, Inverness, in the North division; Argyle, Bute, Nairn, Elgin, Banff, Aberdeen, Kincardine, Forfar, Perth, Fife, Kinross, Clackmannan, Stirling, Dumbarion, in the Middle division; and Linlithgow, Edinburgh, Hadington, Berwick, Renfrew, Ayr, Wigton, Lanark, Peebles, Selkirk, Roxburg, Dumfries, Kirkcudbright, in the South division. The principal rivers are the Spey, Don, Tay, Tweed, Clyde, Forth, Northern Dee, Esk, Annan, Nith, and Southern Dee. The loches, or lakes, are numerous, and some of them extensive. The climate is very various. The northern extremity, which is in the same latitude with some parts of Norway, is extremely cold: but from its insular situation, the frosts are far from being so intense as in parts of the continent equally as far to the N. The west coast is subject to frequent rains in the summer, and to sudden changes of weather. In many places on the eastern shore, and in the whole south division, the climate is not inferior to the north part of England. The products of the country are grain, flax, woods of oak and fir, coal, lead, iron, freestone, limestone, slate, the most beautiful marble, fine rock-crystals, pearls, variegated pebbles, &c. It feeds vast herds of cattle and flocks of sheep: they are both small, but much valued for the delicacy of their flesh; and the fleece of the latter emulates the finest Spanish wool. It is on the high grounds that the cattle are so diminutive; for in many parts of the country, the horses and cows are not excelled in size and beauty by those of the English breed. Among the wild animals are the roe, stag, fox, badger, otter, hedge-hog, rabbit, weasel, mole, and other small quadrupeds. Among the feathered race are the capercaillie, or cock of the wood, the eagle, falcon, partridge, quail, snipe, plover, black game, &c.

Scotland was governed by a king before the Romans visited England, and continued an independent kingdom till the death of the English queen Elizabeth, when James VI of Scotland, the most immediate heir, was called to the throne of England, and constantly resided in the latter: he and his successors calling themselves kings of England and Scotland, and each country having a separate parliament, till the year 1707, in the reign of queen Anne, when both kingdoms were united under the general name of Great Britain. The counties send one member each to parliament, except Bute and Caithness, Cromarty and Nairn, Kinross and Clackmannan, which send members in conjunction; so that the counties send 30 members, which with 15 sent by the cities and boroughs make the 45 commoners sent by Scotland; and 16 peers are elected to represent the nobility. The established religion is the presbyterian, which is modelled principally after the Calvinistical plan settled at Geneva, and on a general principle of an equality of ecclesiastical authority among its presbyters. There are few Roman catholics, nor are the episcopals numerous. With respect to the trade and manufactures, they are noticed under the respective cities and towns. Edinburg is the capital.

Scutari, a strong town of European Turkey, in Albania, capital of a pachalic, and a bishop's see, with a castle on a rock. It has four suburbs, and carries on a considerable trade. to the true believers, and believe that the land of Europe will one day fall into the hands of Christians, and be trodden on by infidels. Scutari is a mile E Constantinople.

Scylla, a rock near the entrance of the straits of Messina, on the coast of Calabria, opposite the celebrated Charybdis. It forms a small promontory in the narrowest part of the strait, and is the famous Scylla of the ancient poets. It does not come up to the formidable description given by Homer, nor is the passage so narrow and difficult as he represents it; but it is probable that the breadth is greatly increased since his time. The rock is nearly 200 feet high; and on the side of it stands the town of Sciglio, whence the promontory is sometimes called Cape Sciglio.

Seaford, a town of Sussex, and one of the Cinque Ports. Its forts are in a state of defence; but it has no market, and its trade and harbour are now of little consequence. It is seated near the English channel, 10 m SSE Lewes, and 60 S by E London.

Seaton, a town of Scotland, in Haddingtonshire. Here is a ruinous palace, in which queen Mary occasionally kept her court. It has a considerable trade in salt and coal, and is situate on the frith of Forth, 9 m E Edinburg.

Serara, a province on the N coast of Brazil, watered by the river Serara, which rises in the mountains far interior in the country, and flows SE to the ocean. The capital is of the same name, situate on a hill, to the right of the port and near the river, and defended by a fort. Another fort below defends the harbour, which is large and convenient, but not of sufficient depth for large vessels. Lon. 38 29 W, lat. 3 31 S.

Sebastia, a town of Syria, in Palestine, the remains of the ancient city of Samaria. It is 34 m NNE Jerusalem.

Sebastian, St. a city and seaport of Spain, in Biscay, seated at the foot of a mountain, on the top of which is an ancient castle in ruins. The harbour is small, secured by two moles, and a narrow entrance for the ships. The town is surrounded by a double wall, and fortified toward the sea. It is the capital of the district of Guipuscoa, and carries on a great trade, particularly in iron, steel, and wool. St. Sebastian was taken by the French in 1794; and retaken by storm in 1813, by the allies under lord Wellington. It is 50 m E Bilbao, and 50 NW Pamplona. Lon. 1 56 W, lat. 43 24 N.

Sebastian, St. the capital of the province of Rio Janeiro, and of all Brazil, with a citadel on a hill, and numerous forts. The city stands 4 m W of the harbour, and behind it are high hills crowned with woods, convents, houses, and churches. It is 3 m in circuit; the streets are most of them narrow, intersecting each other at right angles; and the houses, in general, are of stone, and two stories high. The churches are very fine; and there is more religious parade in this city, than in any of the popish countries in Europe. The harbour is very commodious, with a narrow entrance defended by two forts. Here are manufactures of sugar, rum, and cochineal. The different mechanics carry on their business in distinct parts of the town; particular streets being set apart for particular trades. On the S side of a spacious square is the palace; and there are several other squares, in which are fountains, supplied with water by an aqueduct of considerable length, brought over a valley by a double tier of arches. The mint is one of the finest buildings existing, and furnished with all the conveniences necessary for coining with great expedition. A Benedictine convent and a fort are on the extreme point, jutting into the harbour, opposite which is Serpent island, where there are a dock-yard, magazines, and naval storehouses. In another part of the harbour, at a place called Val Longo, are the warehouses for the reception, and preparation for sale, of the slaves imported from Africa. St. Sebastian is a bishop's see, and at present the seat of the royal family of Portugal, who arrived here, Jan. 8, 1808. It is seated near the mouth of the Rio Janeiro, in the Atlantic. Seiks, a nation in the nw part of Hindoostan, consisting of several independent states, that had formed a kind of federal union. They possess the whole province of Lahore, the principal part of Moultan, and the w part of Delhi. This rich and healthy tract extends 400 m from nw to SE, and is from 150 to 400 broad, in general, but the part between Attock and Behker cannot be less than 320. The founder of their sect was Nanock, who flourished in the beginning of the 16th century; and they are the descendants of his disciples: the word seiks, in the Sanscrit language, signifying disciples. They are in general strong and well-made, accustomed from their infancy to the most laborious life and hardest fare. A pair of long blue drawers, and a kind of chequered plaid, part of which is fastened round the waist, and the other thrown over the shoulder, form their clothing and equipage. The chiefs are distinguished by wearing some heavy gold bracelets on their wrists, and sometimes a chain of the same metal round their turbans, and by being mounted on better horses; otherwise no distinction appears among them. The civil and military government of the Seiks, before a common interest had ceased to actuate its operations, was conducted by general assemblies; but since their dominions have been so widely extended, the grand assembly is now rarely summoned. Their army consists almost entirely of horse, of which a Seik will boast they can bring 300,000 into the field; and it is supposed they might bring 200,000. They have commonly two, some of them three horses each, and indeed consider this animal as necessary to their existence. The Seiks, like the Hindoos, are perfectly tolerant in matters of faith, and require only a conformity in certain signs and ceremonies; but unlike the Hindoos, they admit profelytes, abolish the distinctions of tribe or cast, and eat all kinds of flesh except that of cows. Their capital is Lahore.

Sennar, a city of Nubia, capital of a kingdom of the same name. It is 5 m in circuit, and very populous. The houses are chiefly of one story, with flat roofs; but the suburbs contain only cottages covered with reeds. The palace, surrounded by high walls, is a confused heap of buildings. The heats are almost insupportable in the daytime, except in the rainy season, which begins in April and continues three months, and then the air is unwholesome. The commodities are elephants teeth, tamarinds, civet, tobacco, and gold-dust. Near the palace is a market for slaves, where the females sit on one side and the males on another, and the Egyptians buy great numbers of them every year. The merchandises required here are spices, paper, brass, hardware, glass beads, and a black drug, which is used to colour the eyebrows. The women of quality have slight garments of silk, and wear rings of various metals on their hair, arms, legs, ears, and fingers; those of low rank and girls, have cloths wrapped round them from the waist to the knees. SES are narrow and confused; and the generality of the houses mean. The palace is very large, and surrounded by a massy wall of stone and mud. Without the walls of the city are two gardens and palaces: and near to one of them is the mausoleum of Hyder, where his son also reposes in state. In the space between the city and the two gardens is the suburb called Shahar Ganjam, which is rapidly increasing on a regular plan. The city is strongly fortified; notwithstanding which, lord Cornwallis, in 1792, here compelled Tippoo to sign a treaty, by which he ceded half of his dominions, and agreed to pay a vast sum of money to the English and their allies: and a new war breaking out in 1799, the British troops carried the fort by an assault, in which Tippoo was killed. The city and the island have since been retained by the English, toward the support of the late sultan's family. A manufacture of gun-carriages was established here in 1802. Seringapatam is 10 m N Mysore, and 290 W by S Madras. Lon. 76 50 E, lat. 12 24 N.

Seville, a city of Spain, capital of Andalusia, and an archbishop's see, seated on the Guadalquivir. It was the capital of the kingdom, till Philip II established his court at Madrid, as a more central position. Seville is of a round form, fortified by strong walls flanked with high towers, and takes up more ground than Madrid, although it now has not above 20,000 inhabitants. The Phenicians called it Hispatis, and it is the Julia of the Romans, who embellished it with many magnificent buildings. The Moors built an aqueduct, still to be seen, 6 m in length. The cathedral is by some supposed to be the largest church in the world next to St. Peter's at Rome; the steeple is of Arabian architecture, and very high, consisting of three towers, one above another, with galleries and balconies. The churches and convents are opulent and beautiful; of the latter, that of St. Francis is adorned with a handsome public square, in the midst of which is a fine fountain. The university consists of many colleges; but is almost solely appropriated to the education of the clergy. The inquisition is a noble building, and was formerly the college of the jesuits. The royal palace, called Alcazar, was partly built after the antique taste by the Moors, and partly in the modern taste by king Pedro; it is a mile in extent, and flanked by large square towers, built with stones taken from the ancient temple of Hercules. Here is a royal foundery, and one of the largest depots for artillery in the kingdom. The principal manufactures are silk; and behind the Alcazar, is a royal tobacco and snuff manufacture. The exchange is a square building of the Tuscan order, each front 100 feet, and three stories high. The townhouse is adorned with a great number of statues, and before it has a large square, with a fine fountain in the middle. There are 120 hospitals richly endowed. The suburb of Triano stands on the other side of the river, over which is a long bridge of boats; and here are public walks, where many of the inhabitants go to take the air. The situation of Seville renders it one of the most commercial towns of Spain. All the trade of that kingdom with the New World centered originally in its port, at St. Lucar; but that of Cadiz having been found more commodious, the galleons have failed from that place since 1720. Such vast employment did the American trade give at one period, that in Seville alone there were no fewer than 16,000 looms in silk and woollen work; but, before the end of the reign of Philip III, they were reduced to 400. The country around is extremely fertile in corn, wine, &c. and there is abundance of oil; for to the w of the river is a grove of olive trees. Seville was entered in 1810; in 1812 they were out and soon after the town was taken by assault.

Shiras, or Sheeraz, a city of Persia, capital of Faristan, seated at the end of a spacious plain, bounded on all sides by lofty mountains. It is 5 m in circuit, surrounded by a wall, with six gates, and round towers at the distance of 80 paces; and is adorned with many fine mosques and noble edifices. The houses are built of brick, but plastered over so as to resemble walls of mud. Here are many good bazars and caravansaries, also manufactures of swords, fire arms, and glass-ware. This city was the seat of government under the revered Kerim Khan, who erected many of the fine buildings in and near this place. In the vicinity are numerous summerhouses, with gardens; and the rich wines of Shiras are deemed the best in all Persia. The tomb of the celebrated poet Hafiz

Siberia, a country of Asia, comprehending the principal Asiatic part of the Russian empire. It is bounded on the E by the Pacific ocean, S by Great Tartary, W by European Russia, and N by the Frozen ocean. It extends 3500 m from E to W, and 1200 from N to S, containing the half of Asia. The S part is fertile, producing all the necessaries of life; but the N and E parts are extremely cold and thin of people, presenting vast marshy plains, covered with almost perpetual snow, and pervaded by enormous rivers, which, under masses of ice, pursue their course to the Arctic ocean; there are also extensive plains, called steppes, which are somewhat similar to the sandy deserts of Africa. Here are inexhaustible forests of birch, alder, lime, &c. and millions of noble trees of the pine kind. The Siberian plum and crab, the mountain ash, Tartarian mulberry and honeysuckle, and Daourian rose, form thickets of extensive beauty; under shelter of which arise multitudes of plants, particularly the yellow farine lily and the libicum; the roots of the former are a favorite food with the Tartarian tribes, and from the dried stalks of the other, the natives procure a saccharine efflorescence, from which they make a coarse ardent spirit. The principal riches of Siberia consist in fine skins and furs, and mines of gold, silver, iron, lead, and copper. Several kinds of precious stones are found here, particularly topazes of a very fine lustre; it also affords magnets of an extraordinary size, and even whole mountains of loadstone. Coal is dug up in the N parts, and a yellowish kind of alum is found in several mountains. The inhabitants are of three sorts; the natives of the country, Tartars, and Russians. The Siberians dwell in forests in the winter, and in the summer on the banks of rivers. Their garments are the skins of wild beasts, and their riches consist in bows, arrows, a knife, and a kettle. They all live in wretched huts, which they remove from place to place; and make use of reindeer and dogs to draw their sledges. Those in the southern parts are not much more polite; but they have horses with which they go a hunting, and their houses, though poor, are not shifted from place to place. Of this class of people, some have no other religion than that of nature; others are pagans and Mohamedans; and some of them have been converted to Christianity by the Russian missionaries. The Tartars who live in this country are the most civilized of any foreign nation in Siberia; and those Tartars who are Mohamedans are still more so than the pagan Tartars, of whom there are many different hordes or tribes. The Russians settled here are much the same as in their native country. Siberia is the place to which criminals, as well as persons under the displeasure of the court, are commonly banished from Russia. Through this vast tract the Russian caravans travel every year with their merchandise, to China. The principal rivers are the Oby, Lena, Irtysh, and Yenesei; and there are numerous lakes of fresh water, and some of a saline nature. Siberia was reduced under the dominion of Russia about the close of the 16th century: the W part of it is comprised in the governments of Tobolsk, Ufa, and Kolyvan; the E part in the government of Irkutsk.

Sicily, an island in the Mediterranean, separated from the kingdom of Naples by a narrow channel, called the Faro; and as Messina is seated on it, the Faro di Messina. It is of a triangular form, terminating in three points or capes; that to the NE is called Capo Faro, that to the SE Capo Passero, and that to the W Capo Boeo. Sicily is 160 m long and from 90 to 110 broad. It has the title of a kingdom; and is divided into three provinces called Val di Mazara, Val di Noto, and Val di Demona. The two kingdoms of Naples and Sicily are under the same climate, and were lately under the same government; but on the French becoming masters of Naples, in 1799, the king removed his court from the city of Naples to that of Palermo in this island. The productions of the two countries are much the same; but Sicily abounds much more in corn, particularly in the valleys of Noto and Mazara. The valley of Demona has more forests and fruit trees than the two others. It is famous for horses and mules; and the cattle are all red, strong, and compact, with large horns. There are snakes of a great size in the forests; asps and scorpions, whose venom is very active; and harmless lizards of a beautiful green colour. In this island the ancient practice of treading out the corn from the ear is in use; and here is the celebrated volcano, called Etna. The numbers of the clergy, which exceed 80,000, and the multitude of the nobility, to whom belonged the criminal jurisdiction over their subjects, with other rights equally oppressive, were causes of the poverty and misery of the natives of this country. But in 1812, this ill-governed kingdom, by means of the English, who had for some time aided it with a naval and military force, acquired a better form of government, apparently without opposition, on the plan of the British constitution; that the inhabitants are now relieved from many oppressions, and have obtained an impulse to industry and wealth. The capital is Palermo. See Naples.

Sierra Leone, a country in the W part of Guinea, so named from being mountainous, and the mountains abounding in lions. Its limits are from the Grain coast on the SE, to Cape Verga on the NW; that is, between 7 and 10 N lat. In the open and plain parts, on the banks of a river of the same name, the heat of the sun, before any breeze arises, is almost intolerable; but as a refreshing gale constantly springs up about noon, it renders the country supportable. The wet season, from May to October, is ushered in and terminated by stormy weather. The whole tract, on each side the river, is rich in rice and millet, which is the chief sustenance of the inhabitants; and, upon the whole, it is one of the best countries on the coast. The Negroes are in general of mild external manners, and noted for their hospitality; but they possess a great share of pride, and are easily affected by an insult. Of all the tribes, those who have embraced Mohamedanism are the most civilized and respectable; and those on the coast, from their intercourse with the European slave-factors, Sierra Leone, a river of Guinea, in a country of the same name. Its source is uncertain; but its mouth, at Freetown, is 9 m wide. In 1791, the Sierra Leone Company was incorporated, for the purpose of cultivating W India and other tropical productions on the banks of this river. The first settlers were 200 white persons, and a number of free blacks from Nova Scotia. In 1793, the colonists were all put into possession of small lots of land, and a new town was begun to be built. The next year a French squadron destroyed the settlement, and captured several of the company's ships: from this disaster they recovered; and a factory was established in the Rio Pangos, in 1795. The colony, however, still continued to languish, and, in 1808, it was transferred from the company to his majesty.

The principal rivers are, the Oder, Bober, Neisse, Queis, and Oppa. A long chain of mountains bound Silesia on the W; and the highest mountain, called Zotenberg, is in the principality of Schweldnitz. There are mines of coal, lead, copper, and iron, and quarries of various stones, beside antimony, salpetre, sulphur, alum, vitriol, quicksilver, agate, jasper, and even some gems. The principal manufacture is linen cloth; and there are also some woollen manufactures, potteries, iron founderies, and glass-houses. In this country are a great number of cattle, large studs of horses, and plenty of game in the woods; also a few lynxes, bears, foxes, otters, and beavers. There are many lakes, full of good fishes; also plenty of bees, which produce much honey and wax. It affords wheat, maize, barley, oats, and millet, and in some places saffron is cultivated; but its wine is bad, and chiefly turned into vinegar. Silesia is divided into Upper and Lower Silesia, and the county of Glatz. In Upper Silesia, which is the S part, the inhabitants are generally Roman catholics, speaking the Polish language: in the Lower they are almost all protestants, and speak their mother tongue. This country was ceded to Prussia in 1742, by the treaty of Breslau. In 1807, it was overrun by the French, but restored at the peace of Tilsit. In 1813, it was entered by the French, who were completely defeated by the Prussians, between the Katzbach and Neisse, in which rivers immense numbers were drowned. Breslau is the capital.

Sindelfingen, a town of Suabia, in the duchy of Wurtemberg, 10 m SSW Stuttgart.

Sindy, a province of Hindoostan, bounded on the W by Persia, N by the territories of the king of Candahar, NE by those of the Seiks, E by a sandy desert, and SE by Cutch. It extends along the course of the Indus, from its mouth to the frontiers of Moultan 300 m; and its breadth in the widest part is 160. In soil and climate, and the general appearance of the surface, it resembles Egypt; the country being an extended valley, confined on one side by a ridge of mountains, and on the other by a desert; and the Indus, equal at least to the Nile, winding through the midst of this level valley, and enriching it by its annual inundations. During great part of the SW monsoon, or at least in July, August, and part of September (the rainy season in most other parts of India) the atmosphere is here generally clouded; but no rain falls, except near the sea. Owing to this, and the neighbourhood of the sandy deserts, on the E and on the NW; the heats are so violent, and the winds from those quarters so pernicious, that the houses are contrived so as to be occasionally ventilated by apertures on the top resembling the funnels of small chimneys. When the hot winds prevail, the windows are closely shut, by which the hottest current of air, near the sur-

By this also vast clouds of dust are excluded; the entrance of which would alone be sufficient to render the houses uninhabitable. The roofs are composed of thick layers of earth instead of terraces. Few countries are more unwholesome to European constitutions, particularly the lower part called the Delta. The Hindoos, who were the original inhabitants of Sindy, are treated with great rigour by the Mohamedan governors, and are not permitted to erect any pagodas, or places of worship; and this severity drives vast numbers of them into other countries. The inland parts of Sindy produce saltpetre, sal ammoniac, borax, bezoar, lapis lazuli, and raw silk. Here are manufactures of cotton and silk of various kinds; and also of fine cabinets, inlaid with ivory and finely lacquered. Great quantities of butter are exported, which is clarified and wrapt up in duppas made of the hides of cattle. Here are large beeves, fine sheep, and small hardy horses. The wild game are deer, hares, antelopes, and foxes, which are hunted with dogs; also leopards, and a small fierce creature called a shiahgush. The internal government of this province is a military despotism; the head of which has the title of Hakem, or ruler. The inhabitants are principally Mohamedans, but there are a considerable number of Hindoos, who enjoy the confidence of the prince, and are chiefly employed in commerce. The prince is tributary to the sultan of Candahar. Hydrabad is the capital.

23 broad. The SE end is separated from Invernesshire (to which it belongs) by a narrow channel, called the Inner Sound; in the most narrow part of which, named the Kyle, cattle are made to swim across. This side of the island swells gradually from the shore, in a verdant slope, over which are seen the naked hills of Strath; and above these rises the rugged top of Cullin or Cuchullin. Toward the SW are a series of rude mountains, black and red, as if discoloured by the rage of fire; and on the E a long extent of lofty hills. There is, notwithstanding, a great proportion of level ground, with excellent pasturage; and it has numbers of deer and different kinds of game. It abounds with limestone, marble, &c. but the basaltic columns, resembling the Giant's Causeway in Ireland, are its greatest curiosity. A cave in this island afforded an asylum, in 1746, to the disappointed pretender and his faithful guide, for two nights. Many thousands of beeves and sheep are annually exported hence. Some small horses are bred, and a great quantity of kelp is manufactured here. Portree is the principal town. Smyrna, a seaport of Asiatic Turkey, in Natolia, and one of the largest and richest cities of the Levant. The privileges it has enjoyed for many ages, and the goodness of the harbour, has caused it to be rebuilt several times, after having been destroyed by earthquakes. It is the rendezvous of merchants from almost all parts of the world, and the magazine of their merchandise. The Turks have 19 mosques, the Greeks three churches, the Jews six synagogues, the Armenians one church, and the Latins three convents. There are three bishops, one Greek, another Latin, and the third Armenian. The population is computed at 150,000 persons. The streets are more open, better paved, and the houses better built, than in other towns of the continent. The street of the Franks is the finest in Smyrna, and extends along the harbour. The imports from England consist of woollen cloths, camlets, lead, tin, and hardware; these are exchanged for cotton, coffee, mohair, drugs, galls, raisins, figs, &c. The English and Dutch factors have protestant chapels, and in the Frank quarter are several taverns, and lodging-houses for travellers. The fortifications consist of a fort, a

The soil is very fertile; but there are large tracts of uncultivated ground; and the superior attention paid to the large flocks of sheep, greatly impedes the progress of agriculture. The produce of the country is wheat, barley, saffron, honey, silk, salt, saltpetre, hemp, barilla, and even sugar-canes, with the richest and most delicious fruits that are to be found in France and Italy; and its wines are in high esteem. Wolves are the chief beasts of prey that infest Spain. The wild bulls have to much ferocity, that bull-fights were the most magnificent spectacle the court of Spain could exhibit. The domestic animals are horses, which are remarkably swift, mules, asses, bees, and sheep, the wool of which is superior to any in Europe. Spain abounds in minerals and metals: cornelian, agate, jacinth, loadstone, turcois stones, quicksilver, iron, copper, lead, sulphur, gypsum, calamine, crystal, marbles of several kinds, porphyry, the finest jasper, and even diamonds, emeralds, and amethysts, are found here. Anciently it was celebrated for gold and silver mines; but since the discovery of America no attention has been paid to them. The principal rivers are the Douro, Tago, Guadiana, Guadalquivir, Ebro, and Minho. Spain, formerly the most populous kingdom in Europe, is now very thinly inhabited; for by the census taken in 1803, including the Balearic islands, the number of souls was only 10,351,075. To this diminution of inhabitants various causes have contributed; as the expulsion of the Moors, the emigrations to the colonies, the vast numbers and celibacy of the clergy, and the indolence of the natives. Here is a want even of the most necessary trades; and of the few to be met with, the greatest part are in the hands of the French, who are very numerous in Spain; the natives themselves, beside their aversion to work, disdain to stoop to handicrafts. They are not, however, wholly without manufactures, but they are far short of that flourishing condition they might attain; for they are checked by the royal monopolies, which extend to broad cloth, china, glass, pottery, paper, saltpetre, salt, sulphur, tobacco, snuff, and some others. The Spaniards in general are tall, their complexions swarthy, their countenances expressive.

The beauty of the ladies reigns chiefly in their novels and romances; in their persons they are small and slender. Jealousy is no longer the characteristic of a Spanish husband; the married ladies have their cortejo, or male attendant, in the same manner as the Italian have their cicisbeo. The established religion is popery; and here the inquisition once reigned in all its horrors, but in 1813 it was entirely suppressed. There are eight archbishops, 46 episcopal sees, and 24 universities, or rather academies. The Spanish language springs from the Roman, but many of the words are derived from the Arabic, used by the Moors, who for seven centuries held dominion in this country; the speech is grave, sonorous, and very melodious. Spain, once the most free, is now one of the most despotic monarchies in Europe. It had once its cortes or parliaments, which had great privilege; but now, though not absolutely abolished, they are under the control of the king. But the despotism of the monarchy is balanced by the power of the church, to which the nobles are submissive devotees; and by many councils, which are responsible for any unwise or unsuccessful measures. In 1808, the French attempted to overturn the government of this country; and having assured the royal family into France, they were retained there by Napoleon, and his brother Joseph sent to Madrid, where he assumed the title of king of Spain. The Spaniards immediately appointed a supreme Junta of government of the kingdom, who, in 1810, summoned the cortes to join them at Cadiz; and this assembly, subsequently removed to Seville and Madrid, are endeavouring to restore Ferdinand VII, their absent king. The campaigns of 1811 and 1812, of the united Spanish, Portuguese, and British forces, under lord Wellington, were carried on with variable success; but in that of 1813, after the battle of the Pyrenees, few of the French remained in Spain; and in October the allied army passed the Bidassoa, and established itself in France. [On the downfall of Napoleon, in 1814, Ferdinand VII was restored, and the inquisition re-established.] Madrid is the capital.

Staffa, a famous island of Scotland, on the W side of that of Mull, but only a mile in length. The SW end is supported by ranges of basaltic pillars, mostly above 50 feet high and four feet thick. Here is a magnificent cavern called Pinal's Cave, which extends 250 feet in length. The entrance is a natural arch, 53 feet wide and 117 high, from which the cavern is lighted, so that the furthest extremity may be seen; it is supported on each side by ranges of columns, and roofed by the fragments of others that have been broken off in forming it. The bottom of the cave is filled by the sea, reaching to the extremity, and in calm weather a boat may sail into it. On the N side of the island is another cavern, called the Cormorant's Cave, which exhibits the same appearances, but on a less scale. The island is every where supported by basaltic rocks and pillars, and so much hollowed by various caves, that its whole surface is shaken in stormy weather. The basaltic pillars are all magnetic; the lower parts possessing a N, and the upper a S polarity. This singular little island is undoubtedly the greatest natural cu-

Stockholm, a city, and the capital of Sweden, with a castle, in a situation remarkable for its romantic scenery. It occupies, beside two peninsulas, seven small rocky islands between the lake Maeler and a bay of the Baltic. The water that divides the inhabitants of the different quarters in summer, unites them in winter; for it becomes a plain, which is traversed by horses in sledges, and by vehicles of all sorts placed on scales, along the sides of ships fixed in the ice. A variety of contrasted views are formed by numberless rocks of granite, rising boldly from the surface of the water, partly bare and partly craggy, and partly dotted with houses, or feathered with wood. The harbour is an inlet of the Baltic, and the water of such depth, that ships of the largest burden can approach the quay. At the extremity of the harbour, several streets rise one above another; and the royal palace, a magnificent quadrangular building, crowns the summit of the central island, which constituted the original city; here also is the house of the nobles, the mint, the exchange, the bank, and several other public buildings.—The churches are not remarkable for beauty, but that of Riddezhalm is noted for being the burying place of the kings of Sweden. The houses are almost all of stone, or brick covered with plaster; and roofed with tiles; except in the suburbs, which extend on the N and S side of the lake, where many are of wood, painted red. The royal academy of sciences owes its institution to the celebrated Linné and five other learned men, and was founded in 1739. The royal academy of painting and sculpture contains a fine collection of casts, from the antique statues at Rome, presented by king Adolphus Frederic. The arsenal contains an immense number of trophies and standards; and the exchange and opera-house are handsome buildings. Suez, a seaport of Egypt, with a castle, seated at the n end of the w arm of the Red sea, called the gulf of Suez. This gulf is separated from the Mediterranean by an isthmus ~~7.25~~ ^{7.25} miles over, which joins Asia to Africa. The town is surrounded by a sandy country, and is without water. Fish is the only provision that is plentiful; all other necessaries of life, for both men and animals, being brought from Cairo, or more distant places; and the only water fit for drinking is brought by the Arabs from the wells of Naba, on the other side of the gulf, 7 m from Suez. Several vessels are employed in the navigation between this port and Jidda, where the commodities are bartered for Indian goods and the coffee of Arabia. The commerce of Cairo with Suez is carried on by caravans, which wait the arrival, and set out on the departure of the vessels, that is, about the end of April, and in the course of July and August. The merchandize consists in corn, wood, iron, lead, wool, cloth, cochineal, sails, cordage, &c. Suez is 65 m E Cairo. Lon. 32 51 E, lat. 30 2 N.

Sumatra, an island in the Indian ocean, the most western of the Sunda islands. It is 950 m long, and from 150 to 200 broad; separated from Malacca by the strait of that name, and from Java, by the strait of Sunda. The equator divides it into almost equal parts; the one extremity being in 5 33 n, the other in 5 56 s, lat. and Achem Head, the n extremity, is in lon. 95 34 e. This island is surpassed by few in the beautiful indulgences of nature. A chain of mountains runs through its whole extent; the ranges, in many parts, being double and treble; yet their altitude is not sufficient to occasion their being covered with snow during any part of the year. Between these ridges are extensive plains, considerably elevated above the surface of the maritime lands. In these, the air is cool; and, from this advantage, they are esteemed the most eligible portion of the country, are the best inhabited, and the most cleared from woods, which elsewhere, in general, cover both hills and valleys with an eternal shade. Here too are found many lakes and rivers, that facilitate the communication between the different parts. The inhabitants consist of Malays, Acheneze, Battas, Lampoons, and Rejangs; the latter are taken as a standard of description, with respect to the person, manners, and customs of the Sumatrans. They are rather below the middle stature; their bulk in proportion; their limbs, for the most part, slight, but well shaped, and particularly small at the wrists and ancles. Their hair is strong, and of a shining black. The men are beardless; great pains being taken to render them so, when boys, by rubbing their skins with a kind of quicklime. Their complexion is properly yellow, wanting the red tinge that constitutes a copper or tawny colour; those of the superior class, who are not exposed to the rays of the sun, and particularly their women of rank, approaching to a degree of fairness; but the major part of the females are ugly. The rites of marriage consist simply in joining the hands of the parties, and pronouncing them man and wife, without much ceremony, excepting the entertainment that is given upon the occasion. But little apparent courtship precedes their marriages. Their manners do not admit of it; the young people of each sex being carefully kept asunder, and the girls being seldom trusted from their mothers. The opportunities which the young people have of seeing and conversing with each other are at the public festivals, where the persons who are unmarried meet together, and dance and sing in company. A man, when determined in his choice, generally employs an old woman as his agent, by whom he sends a present to the female of his choice. The parents then interfere, and the preliminaries being settled, a feast takes place. At these festivals, a goat, a buffalo, or several, according to the rank of the parties, are killed, to entertain not only the relations and invited guests, but all the inhabitants of the neighbouring country who choose to repair to them. The greater the concourse, the more is the credit of the host, who is generally, on these occasions, the father of the girl. The customs of the Sumatrans permit their having as many wives as they can purchase, or afford to maintain; but it is extremely rare that an instance occurs of their having more than one, and that only among a few of the chiefs. This continence they owe, in some measure, to their poverty. Mothers carry their children straddling on the hip, and usually supported by a cloth tied in a knot on the opposite shoulder. The children are nursed but little; are not confined by any swathing or bandages; and being suffered to roll about the floor, soon learn to walk and shift for themselves: when cradles are used, they swing suspended from the ceiling of the room. The original natives are pagans; but when the Sumatrans, or any of the natives of the eastern islands, learn to read the Arabic character, and submit to circumcision, they are said to become Malays; the term Malay being understood to mean Moorish. The wild beasts of Sumatra are tigers, elephants, rhinoceroses, bears, and monkeys. The tigers prove to the inhabitants, both in their journeys and domestic occupations, most destructive enemies; yet, from a superstitious prejudice, it is with difficulty they are prevailed upon to use methods for destroying them. Alligators likewise occasion the loss of many inhabitants, as they bathe in the river, according to their regular custom; and yet a superstitious idea of their sanctity also preserves them from molestation. The other animals are buffalos, a small kind of horses, goats, hogs, deer, bullocks, and hog deer. This last is an animal somewhat larger than a rabbit, the head resembling that of a hog, and the shanks and feet like those of a deer: the bezoar stone found on this animal has been valued at ten times its weight in gold. Of birds there are a greater variety than of beasts. The coo-ow, or Sumatran pheasant, is a bird of uncommon beauty. Here are flocks of a prodigious size, parrots, dunghill fowls, ducks, the largest cocks in the world, woodpigeons, doves, and a great variety of small birds remarkable for the beauty of their colours. The reptiles are lizards, flying lizards, and camelions. The island swarms with insects, and their varieties are no less extraordinary than their numbers. Rice is the only grain that grows in the country. Here are sugar-canes, beans, peas, radishes, yams, potatoes, pumpkins, and several kinds of potherbs unknown to Europe; and also most of the fruits to be met with in other parts of the E Indies in the greatest perfection. Indigo, saltpetre, sulphur, arsenic, brasil wood, two species of the bread-fruit tree, pepper, cassia, camphire, benjamin, coffee, and cotton, are likewise the produce of this island. Here also is the cabbage tree and silk cotton tree; and the forests contain a great variety of valuable species of wood, as ebony, pine, sandal, eagle, or aloes, teak, manchineel, and iron wood, and also the banyan tree.

SUN

Bees wax is a commodity of great importance here; and there are likewise edible bird-nests. Gold, tin, iron, copper, and lead, are found in the country; and the former is as plentiful here as in any part of Asia. Sumatra is divided into many petty kingdoms, the chief of which are Acheen, Indrapore, Palimban, and Jambi. The English and Dutch have factories on this island; the principal one of the former being Fort Marlborough, at Bencoolen. See Acheen.

on the Thames, 2 m NE Reading. It was once an episcopal see, and had nine bishops in succession, the last of whom, Hermannus, removed the see to Salisbury.

Sunning Hill, a village in Berkshire, 6 m SSW Windsor. It is noted for its medicinal wells, which are efficacious in paralytic cases.

Superior Lake, a lake of N America, so called from its being the largest on that continent. It is above 1500 m in circuit, and supposed to be the largest body of fresh water on the globe. It contains many islands; two of them large, especially Isle Royale, which is 70 m long and 20 broad. Upward of 30 rivers enter this lake, some of which are of considerable size; and its water is more pure and pellucid than that of any other lake in the world. It abounds with fishes, particularly trout andurgeon. Storms are more dreadful here than on the ocean. It discharges its water from the SE corner, through the strait of St. Mary, into Lake Huron; but the quantity does not appear to be one tenth part of what is conveyed into it by the rivers.

Supino, a town of Naples, in the county of Molise, with a castle; seated at the source of the Tamara, 17 m N by W Benevento.

Sur, or Sour, a town of Syria, in Palestine, on the coast of the Mediterranean, where stood the famous city of Tyre, destroyed by Alexander the great. It is now no more than a village, situate on a peninsula which projects from the shore into the sea, in the form of a mallet with an oval head. The point to the N is occupied by a basin, which was a port evidently formed by art, and the entrance defended by two towers; but it is now so choked up, that children pass it without danger. Further on in the sea, to the SW of the point, is a ridge of rocks nearly level with the water, the space between which and the mainland in front forms a sort of road, where vessels may anchor with rather more safety than at Sidon. The village consists of about sixty families, who live obscurely on the produce of their little grounds, and a trilling fishery. It is 18 m SSW Saida, and 65 SW Damascus.

bulence. The larger houses are flat roofed, with courts before them; and those of the common people are high roofed. It is said to have 320,000 inhabitants; and its trade is considerable, notwithstanding the sand-banks that obstruct the entrance of the Tapty, which causes large vessels to load and unload at Swally, 15 m to the w of Surat. Here are many different religions; Mohamedans of several sects, many forts of Gentoos, and Jeyss and Christians of various denominations. The Mohamedans at Surat are not, by far, so strict as they are in Arabia, or in other Turkish countries; nor are the distinctions of tribes among the Hindoos who reside here strictly observed. These Hindoos are a set of industrious sober people, and of a most surprising honesty. They are almost all of the cast of the Banians; and hence their skill and dexterity in matters of calculation and economy often raise them to places of considerable trust. Some of them are very rich, but all live in a style of moderate simplicity, wearing for dress only a plain robe of white cotton. All people of distinction in Surat, and through the rest of India, speak and write the Persian language; but in trade, corrupt Portuguese is the language used. This city is the emporium of the most precious productions of Hindoostan; for hither are brought from the interior parts an immense quantity of goods, which the merchants carry in their ships to the Red sea, the Persian gulf, the coasts of Malabar and Coromandel, and even to China. The English engross almost the whole of the trade in this city; that of the Dutch, French, and Portuguesé having become trifling. One thing singular in Surat is, that, though there is no hospital for human beings, there is an extensive establishment of this nature for sick or maimed animals. When the Europeans turn out an old horse, or any other domestic animal to perish, as useless, the Hindoos voluntarily assume the care of it, and place it in this house, which is full of infirm decrepit cows, sheep, rabbits, hens, pigeons, &c. The country round Surat is fertile; except toward the sea, where it is sandy and barren. Before the English E India Company obtained possession of Bombay, the presidency of their affairs on the coast of Malabar was at Surat; and they had a factory here, after the presidency was transferred to Bombay. The great mogul had then an admiral here, who received a revenue called the tanka; but his tyranny toward the merchants induced the E India Company, in 1759, to fit out an armament, which dispossessed the admiral of the castle; and, soon after, the possession of this castle was confirmed to them by the court of Delhi, and they were constituted receivers of the tanka, by which their authority in this place became supreme. Surat is situate 20 m up the river Tapty, and 147 N Bombay. Lon. 72 48 E, lat. 21 11 N.

Surgooja, a town of Hindoostan, capital of a circar of the same name, in the country of Orissa. It is 75 m N Ruttunpour, and 210 ssw Patna. Lon. 83 32 E, lat. 23 6 N.

Surinam, a country of Guayana, extending 75 m along a river of the same name, which enters the Atlantic in lat. 6 6 S, and on its w shore is a fort to defend the entrance. The country abounds with game, and singular animals of different kinds; the toad, in particular, being remarkable for its enormous size and ugly form. It produces fruit, indigo, sugar, cotton, tobacco, gums, and wood for dyeing. The woods are full of monkeys, and it is said there are serpents 30 feet long. This country was ceded by the English to the Dutch, for the province of New York, in 1774. It was taken by the English in 1799, and again in 1804. The capital is Paramaribo.

Suringia, a seaport of Japan, in the island of Nippon, capital of a province of the same name, with a castle, where the emperors formerly resided. It is 170 m E Meaco. Lon. 139 5 E, lat. 39 30 N.

Surry, a county of England, bounded on the N by Middlesex, E by Kent, S by Suffex, and W by Hampshire and Berkshire. It is 37 m long and 27 broad, containing 519,040 acres; is divided into 14 hundreds, and 140 parishes; has 11 market-towns, including Southwark; and sends 14 members to parliament. The edge of the county on all sides has a rich soil, extremely fruitful in corn and grais, particularly on the N and W toward the Thames; but in the interior part are wide tracts of sandy ground and barren heath, and in some places long ridges of hills. It produces corn, box-wood, walnuts, hops, and fullers-earth. The principal rivers beside the Thames (which is the boundary of this county on the N) are the

It is 70 m long and 28 where broadest, containing 935,040 acres; is divided into five rapes, and 313 parishes, has one city and 16 market-towns, and sends 18 members to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 159,311 in 1801, and 190,083 in 1811. The soil is various: that of the downs, and thence to the sea, is fertile in corn and grass, the latter feeding sheep whose wool is remarkably fine; the middle abounds with meadows and rich arable ground; and the n side is shaded with extensive woods, that used to supply fuel for the iron-works when they were in a flourishing state. The chief commodities are corn, malt, cattle, wool, wood, iron, chalk, and glass; and it is famous for wheatears, which are taken in great numbers on the se downs. Suffex is not distinguished for any manufacture, but that of gunpowder at Battel, and of needles at Chichester. The principal rivers are the Arun, Adur, Ouse, and Rother. Chichester is the capital; but the spring affizes are held at Horsham, and the summer at Lewes.

It is divided into 13 parishes, and sends a member to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 23,117 in 1801, and 23,629 in 1811. Some parts of this county, called forests, are trackless deserts, destitute of trees; or bleak mountains, abounding with wild roes. In these parts there are few inhabitants, and no villages; but along the frith of Dornoch, the country is populous and well cultivated. It has abundance of ironstone, limestone, and slate; also many veins of lead ore. Dornoch is the county-town.

from E to W; bounded on the N by
gulf of Finland and the Baltic, and W by the Sound, the Categat, and Norway.

It is divided into five general parts:
Sweden Proper, Gothland, Nordland, Lapland, and Finland; and each of these is subdivided into provinces. Sweden Proper contains Upland, Suderman-ia, Nericia, Westmania, and Dalecarlia. Gothland contains E Gothland, Smoland, W Gothland, Wermeland, Bahus, Dalia, Schonen, Halland, Blekingen, and the isles of Gothland and Oeland. Nordland includes Gellricia, Helsingia, Medelpadia, Jemtia, Angermania, and W Bothnia. Swedish Lapland comprises Uma, Pitha, Lulea, Tor-nea, and Kiruna; these districts have no towns in the interior parts, and take their names from rivers that rise near the borders of Norway and flow into the gulf of Bothnia. Finland contains Finland Proper, E Bothnia, Tavasteland, Nyland, Savolax, and part of Kymene and Carelia. See Finland. The whole country is well watered by rivers, (though not a single navigable one worth mentioning) numerous lakes and inland pieces of water, on the banks of which the palaces and villas are usually built. At Stockholm, spring and autumn are scarcely to be perceived; but winter continues nine months, and summer during the remaining three. In winter the cold is excessive, and in summer the heat is considerable, the air being serene all that time. All the rocks are quite covered with flowers in the summer time, and the gardens have plenty of fruits. The trees are early blooming, the soil being fat and sulphureous; but the fruits have not so good a taste as in the more southern countries. The animals are horses, bees, hogs, goats, sheep, elks, reindeer, bears, wolves, foxes, wild cats, and squirrels. The horses are small and feeble; but a lame or foundered horse is seldom to be seen, which is attributed, in a certain degree, to the manner of stabling them on perforated boards without litter. Here are several sorts of fowls; and partridges, woodcocks, and falcons, in great plenty. It has rich copper and iron mines, and vast forests of timber trees. The articles of export are boards, gunpowder, leather, iron, copper, tallow, skins, salt, pitch, resin, and masts; and it imports corn, brandy, wine, linen cloth, stuffs, tobacco, sugar, spice, and paper. The Swedes are of a r. but constitution, and able to sustain the hardest labour. They are more polished than formerly; and have several public schools and colleges, where the arts and sciences are taught. Their houses are generally of wood, with very little art in the construction; and the roofs, in many places, covered with turf, on which their goats often feed. The Swedish government, before the accession of Gustavus I, was an elective monarchy. By the union of Calmar, in 1397, it was stipulated that the same monarch should rule over Denmark, Sweden, and Norway; and hence Sweden became a mere tributary kingdom to Denmark. From this state of subjection it was rescued by Gustavus Vasa, on whom the Swedes, in 1523, conferred the sovereignty, and made the crown hereditary in his male issue. He was entrusted with great prerogatives; and these were augmented by Gustavus Adolphus, the right of succession being extended, at the same time, to the female line. In the minority of his daughter Christina, the regal powers were greatly circumscribed, and the nobles acquired such an exorbitant authority, as gave great umbrage to the clergy, citizens, and peasants. This proved a favorable opportunity for Charles XI to obtain from the states a formal cession of absolute sovereignty, which quietly devolved upon his son Charles XII. On the death of the latter, the Swedes conferred the crown upon Ulrica Eleonora, his youngest sister; stipulating, at the same time, great limits to the prerogative. Ulrica resigned the crown to her consort Frederic I. From the period, the Swedish monarch was the most limited one in Europe, till 1772, when Gustavus III effected a revolution, by which he regained the most essential royal prerogatives, without, however, being an absolute monarch. He was assassinated in 1792, leaving his son Gustavus Adolphus a minor, who attained his majority in 1796. Another revolution took place in 1809; the king and his family were deposed, his uncle Charles raised to the throne, and the government declared to be monarchical and hereditary, with limitation to the male issue, and on failure the diet to choose a successor. The aged Charles XIII having no issue, the diet, in 1810, elected prince Augustenburg; but he died in 1811, and then they elected the French general Bernadotte to be crown prince. The established religion is the Lutheran, and they have one archbishop, and eleven bishops; but no other mode of worship is prohibited. The capital is Stockholm.

Switzerland, or Switzerland, a country of Europe, bounded on the N by Suabia, E by Tyrol, S by Savoy and Italy, and W by France. It is 220 m long and 150 broad, separated from the adjacent countries by high mountains, called the Alps. Switzerland was divided into 13 cantons, exclusive of their allies and bailiwicks; namely, Lucern, Uri, Schwitz, Unterwalden, Zug, Friburg, Soleure, Zurich, Bern, Basel, Schaffhausen, Glarus, and Appenzel. The first seven are catholics, the next four are Calvinists, and the other two contain both religions. Swisserland has four passages over the Alps into Italy; the first is beyond the lake of Geneva, over Mount Cennis, which leads to Savoy; the second begins in the country of the Grisons, crosses Mount St. Bernard, and leads to the valley of Aousta in Piedmont; the third begins in the country of the Grisons, crosses Mount Simplon, and leads to the duchy of Milan; the fourth crosses Mount St. Gothard, and the bailiwicks of Italy, to the same duchy. The principal lakes are those of Constance, Geneva, Lucern, Zurich, and Neuchatel. The most considerable rivers are the Rhine, Rhone, Aar, Arve, Reufs, and Limmat. Swisserland exceeds every country in the world in diversity of appearance: the vast chain of Alps with enormous precipices, extensive regions of perpetual snow, and glaciers that resemble seas of ice, are contrasted by the vineyard and cultivated field, the richly wooded brow, and the verdant valley with its crystal stream. Agriculture cannot of course be carried to great extent, but the grain produced is sufficient for domestic consumption. The chief riches consist of excellent pastures, in which many cattle are bred, and the goats and chamois feed on the mountains and in the woods. The men are all strong and robust, for which reason they are preferred by several nations for the military service. The women are tolerably handsome, have many good qualities, and are in general very industrious. The peasants retain their old manner of dress, and are content to live upon milk, butter, and cheese; and there are some of the mountaineers who never have any bread. In 1797, the partizans of France having excited disputes and disturbances in Swisserland, the French entered the country; and, after defeating the troops and peasants, who opposed them, in several battles, they abolished the constitutions of the principal cantons, erected what was termed the Helvetic Republic, and vested the government in two councils and a directory. This constitution was abolished, in 1802, by the first consul of France, and another was presented for their acceptance, but rejected; and he offered them a new one, in 1803, which they consented to accept. By the new constitution, exclusive of the republic of Valais and the territory of Neuchatel, the country is divided into 19 cantons: the six new ones are Pays de Vaud, Tesin, Argau, Grisons, St. Gall, and Thurgau; of which the first two are catholics, and the other four contain both catholics and protestants. Each canton has its distinct internal government. In seven of them, Schwitz, Appenzel, Glarus, Unterwalden, Uri, Zug, and Grisons, it is of the democratic kind; all the male inhabitants above twenty years of age having voices in the assembly: the government of the other twelve is of the aristocratic form, being administered by a great and little council. The general government of the country is by a diet, composed of a member from each canton, which assembles annually at Friburg, Bern, Soleure, Basil, Zurich, or Lucern, in rotation; and the president is styled Landammann of Swisserland.—See Schavritze.

Syracuse, a strong seaport of Sicily, in Val di Noto, and a bishop's see, with an excellent harbour, defended by a castle. It was once the metropolis of all Sicily, but war, tyranny, and earthquakes have reduced it to less than one fourth of its former size, when it was deemed one of the most famous cities in the world, and 20 m in compass. It contains many antiquities, and the temple of Minerva, erected 700 years B. C. is now the cathedral. Here is a coral fishery, and a powder manufacture; and a trade in salt, nitre, salted tunny, hemp, wine, and oil. Syria, or Suriſtan, a province of Turkey in Asia, bounded on the N by Natolia and Diarbeck, E by the latter and the deserts of Arabia, S by Arabia Petraea, and W by the Mediterranean. Under the general name of Syria was included the ancient Phœnicia, lying S of Syria Proper. This province abounds in oil, corn, and several sorts of fruit, as well as peas, beans, and all kinds of pulse and gardenstuffs; but it would produce much more if it were well cultivated; for there are the finest valleys in the world, between mountains whose sides are proper for the cultivation of tobacco, olives, and vines. The inhabitants have a trade in silk, camlets, and halt. Syria was possessed by a succession of foreign nations, before the time of Ptolemy, when it became a province of the Roman empire. Five centuries after, when the sons of Theodosius divided their immense patrimony, this country was annexed to the empire of Constantinople. In this situation it continued till the year 622, when the Arabian tribes, under the banners of Mohamed, laid it waste. Since that period, torn by the civil wars of the Fatemites and Omniades, wrested from the califfs by their rebellious governors, taken from them by the Turkmen soldiers, invaded by the European crusaders, retaken by the mamlukes of Egypt, and ravaged by Tamerlane and his Tartars, it fell, at length, into the hands of the Ottoman Turks, who have been its masters nearly three centuries. It is divided into five pachalics, or governments; Aleppo, Tripoli, Damascus, Acre, and Palestine. Aleppo is the capital.

Tabriz, or Tauris, a city of Persia, capital of Aderbijan. The rivine Spingteha flows through it, and the river Agi passes on the SW side of the city, in its course to the lake Urmia. Tabriz is no more the magnificent city described by Chardin; all its large buildings having been destroyed by earthquakes. In 1724, it was terribly shaken by one, and nearly 100,000 persons perished. Soon after this the Turks laid siege to it, and they were drove away with great loss; but they took it the next year after a bloody contest. Other earthquakes have succeeded; and by these calamities it was reduced to an insignificant place. But about the year 1824, prince Abbas Mirza, the heir apparent of the crown, was appointed to the government of Aderbijan, and made Tabriz his capital. Since that time, the walls (3 m in circuit) have been repaired and beautified, a new citadel made, and many new buildings erected. Here are 12 public baths, some of which are handsome, and a bazar that extends the length of the city; but there are no mosques of any particular merit, except the large ruin of one destroyed by an earthquake about the year 1778. The inhabitants have a trade in cotton, cloth, and silks. The marble of Tabriz, famous throughout the kingdom, is not procured near the city, but found in large quantities on the E borders of the lake Urmia. The town is surrounded by gardens, in which are numerous fruit-trees; and on every stream in the vicinity are planted thousands of poplars, of which all the timber-work of the houses is constructed. Tennessee, one of the United States of America, lying between the parallels of 35 and 36½ degree latitude; bounded on the S by Georgia, W by the Mississippi, N by Kentucky and Virginia, and E by the Iron and Bald mountains, which separate it from N Carolina. It is 410 m in length and 104 in breadth; and divided into three districts, Washington, Mero, and Hamilton, which are subdivided into 14 counties. The principal rivers are the Mississippi, Tennessee, Cumberland, and Holston, and it is watered by other rivers and creeks. The Cumberland mountains, a lofty ridge near 30 m broad, cut this state into the eastern and western divisions, which were originally known by the names of the establishments of Holston and Cumberland; but the latter is much the largest part. The climate, soil, and produce of Tennessee are nearly the same as the adjoining state of Kentucky; but W Tennessee, or Cumberland, is less salubrious, having a warmer and more humid temperature. In 1810 the number of inhabitants was 261,727. Knoxville is the capital.

Tennessee, a river of the United States, formerly called the Cherokee river, and the largest of all those which flow into the Ohio. Its commencement is formed in the state to which it gives name, by the junction of the Holston and Broad rivers, at fort Grainger, 35 m below Knoxville. It flows SW, on the E side of Cumberland mountains, into the Mississippi territory, where it makes a circuit to the W, called the Great Bend; it then reenters the state of Tennessee, which it passes quite through into that of Kentucky, where it enters the Ohio, 50 m above the conflux of that river with the Mississippi. The Tennessee is 600 yards broad at its mouth, and thence navigable by vessels of great burden for 260 m, to the Muscle Shoals, in the Great Bend: here the river widens to between 2 and 3 m, for nearly 30 m; and these shoals can only be passed in small boats: hence it may be navigated, by boats of 30 tons burden, 400 m further to its commencement.

out, the provinces assembled a general congress, styled the Confederation of Venezuela, and they endeavoured to become an independent empire. But, in 1812, when multitudes were assembled in the churches to celebrate Maundy Thursday, a sudden and terrible convulsion of nature happened, and extended over a great part of the country; many thousands of human beings were lost; rocks and mountains split, and rolled into valleys; rivers lost, or their courses changed; some towns swallowed up, some totally, others nearly destroyed, and many very much injured. The surviving inhabitants deemed this a heavy judgment for recent transgressions, and their revolutionary principles subsided.

Terra del Fuego, a large island, separated from the southern extremity of America, by the strait of Magellan, and so called from the volcanos observed on it. The sea intersects it into several islands; all of them barren and mountainous; but on the lower grounds are found several sorts of trees and plants, and a variety of birds. The natives are short in stature, not exceeding five feet six inches; their heads large, their faces broad, their cheek bones prominent, and their noses flat. They have little brown eyes, without life; their hair is black and lank, hanging about their heads in disorder, and besmeared with trainoil. On the chin they have a few short hairs instead of a beard. They have no other clothing than a small piece of seal-skin, hanging from their shoulders to the middle of the back, being fastened round the neck with a string. Their natural colour seems to be an olive brown, but they paint themselves with various colours. Their arms are bows and arrows, and darts; and their instruments for fishing are a kind of fishgigs. They live chiefly on seals' flesh, and like the fat oily part most. There is no appearance of any subordination among them; and their whole character is a strange compound of stupidity, indifference, and inactivity.

Terracina, a town of Italy, in Campagna di Roma, with a castle on a rock. It is the ancient Auxur, the capital of the Volsci, and the cathedral was originally a temple of Jupiter. Pope Pius VI built a palace and resided here during the spring and autumn, in order to urge on his noble undertaking of draining the Pomptine marshes, which he began in 1778 and effectually completed in ten years. Thames, the finest river in Great Britain, which has its two sources, the Churn and Isis, in Gloucestershire, and form their junction in Wiltshire, 2 m to the w of Cricklade. Some writers have continued the name of Isis to the Thames till it arrives at Dorchester and receives the Thame; but this is an impropriety, being contrary to ancient and unquestionable authorities. The Thames proceeds to Cricklade, where it receives several rivulets, which cause it to widen considerably in its course to Lechlade; and being there joined by the Coln and Lech, at the distance of 138 m from London, it becomes navigable for vessels of 50 tons. At Oxford (in whose academic groves its poetical name of Isis has been so often invoked) it is joined by the Charwel; at Abingdon, by the Ock; and at Dorchester by the Thame. Passing by Wallingford to Reading, it there receives the Kennet; and thence proceeds by Henley, Marlow, Maidenhead, Windsor, Staines, Chertsey, Kingston, and Brentford, in its course to London; during which it receives the Loddon, Coln, Wey, Mole, Brent, and Wandale. From Lechlade to London it forms a boundary to Oxfordshire, Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, Surry, and Middlesex. From London the river proceeds by Greenwich, Woolwich, Grays-Thurrock, Gravesend, and Leigh, to the German ocean, in which course it parts Essex from Kent, and receives the Lea, Roding, Darent, and Medway. Though the Thames is said to be navigable 138 m above London Bridge, there are so many flats, that, in summer, the navigation westward would be stopped, were it not for a number of locks; but the first lock is 52 m above that bridge. The plan of new cuts has been adopted, in some places, to shorten the navigation; there is one near Lechlade, and another a mile from Abingdon. A still more important undertaking was effected in 1789; the junction of this river with the Severn. A canal had been made from the Severn to Stroud; which canal is now continued thence to Lechlade, where it joins the Thames; a distance of above 30 m. A communication between this river and the Trent and Mersey has likewise been effected, by a canal from Oxford to Coventry; and another canal extends from this, at Braunston, to the Thames at Brentford, called the Grand Junction Canal.

Thames, a river of Connecticut, formed of two principal branches, the Shetucket and the Quinnabaug, which have their junction at Norwich. From this place the Thames is navigable 14 m to Long island sound, which it enters below New London, forming the fine harbour of that town.

Thomas, St. an island in the Atlantic, lying under the equator, near the W coast of Guinea, discovered in 1640 by the Portuguese, to whom it belongs. It is almost round, about 30 m in diameter; and consists chiefly of hills, intermixed with valleys, which are often filled with a thick fog. The soil is fertile, and produces plenty of sugar-canes, rice, and millet. On the same vine are blossoms and green and ripe grapes all the year round. The climate is unwholesome to the Portuguese, and few live to a great age; but it agrees well with the original natives, and also with the cattle, which are larger and finer here than on the coast of Guinea. In 1641, this island was taken by the Dutch; but they soon relinquished it through the inclemency of the climate. Pavaosan is the capital.

Thorn, a city of W Prussia, formerly a hanseatic town. In the church of St. John is the epitaph of the famous Copernicus, who was born here. It is divided into the old and new town, and has a celebrated protestant academy. In 1703 it was taken by the Swedes, who demolished the fortifications. Between 1708 and 1710 it was visited by the plague. In 1724 a tumult happened here, between the Roman catholics and protestants, on account of the students of the jesuits; and the Poles sent judges to try the magistrates for not suppressing the riot, who condemned the president and nine citizens to be beheaded. In 1793, the king of Prussia forcibly took possession of this town, and annexed it to his dominions. It is seated on the Vistula, over which is a long wooden bridge, 67 m S Dantzic, and 105 NW Warsaw. Lon. 18 42 E, lat. 53 6 N.

Tibet, a country of Asia, bounded on the nw and n by the desert of Kobi, in Tartary, e by China, s by Assam and Birmah, and sw and w by Hindoostan and Bootan. This country is deemed the highest in Asia; it being a part of the elevated tract that gives rise not only to the rivers of India and China, but also to those of Siberia and Tartary. The length from e to w cannot be less than 1400 m. the breadth about 500, but is very unequal. It is divided into three parts, Upper, Middle, and Lower Tibet. The Upper lies toward the sources of the Ganges and Burrampooter; the Middle is that in which Lassa, the capital, is seated; and the Lower, that which borders on China. Little Tibet lies between Upper Tibet and Cashgur. Notwithstanding the very rough and sterile state of Tibet, and the severity of the climate, from its wonderful elevation, the inhabitants are in a high state of civilization; their houses lofty and built of stone; and the useful manufactures in some degree of improvement. The principal exports are gold dust, diamonds, pearls, lamb skins, shawls, woollen cloths, rock salt, musk, and tincal or crude borax. The nature of the soil prohibits the progress of agriculture; but wheat, peas, and barley are cultivated. Here are many beasts of prey, and great abundance and variety of wild fowl and game; with numerous flocks of sheep and goats, and herds of cattle, of a diminutive size, as well as small horses. The Tibetians are governed by the grand lama, who is not only submitted to, and adored by them, but is also the great object of adoration for the various tribes of pagan Tartars, who walk through the vast tract of continent that stretches from the river Volga to Corea. He is not only the sovereign pontiff, the vicegerent of the deity on earth, but by the more remote Tartars is absolutely regarded as the deity himself. Even the emperor of China, who is of a Tartar race, does not fail to acknowledge the lama, in his religious capacity, although, as a temporal sovereign, the lama himself is tributary to that emperor. The opinion of the most orthodox Tibetians is, that when the grand lama seems to die, either of old age or infirmity, his soul, in reality, only quits a crazy habitation, to look for another younger or better; and it is discovered again in the body of some child, by certain tokens known only to the lamas or priests, in which order he always appears. In 1774, the grand lama was an infant, who had been discovered some time before by the Teshoo lama, who, in authority and sanctity of character, is next to the grand lama, and, during his minority, acts as chief. The lamas, who form the greatest and most powerful body in the state, have the priesthood entirely in their hands. At the head of their hierarchy are three lamas: the Dalai lama, who resides at Lassa; the Teshoo lama, who lives at Teshoo Loomboo; and the Taranat lama, whose seat is Kharcas, in the north. The priests constitute many monastic orders, which are held in great veneration among them. The most numerous sect are called Gylonga, who are exempt from labour, enjoined temperance, and interdicted all intercourse with the female sex: they abound over all Tibet and Bootan, notwithstanding the severity of discipline; since every family consisting of more than four boys is obliged to contribute one of them to this order; and it is also encouraged by ambition, as the officers of state are usually selected from this sect. Beside the religious influence and authority of the grand lama, he is possessed of unlimited power throughout his dominions. His residence is at a vast palace on the mountain Putala, 7 m from Lassa. In 1774, the English E India Company made a treaty with the grand lama. The religion of Tibet, though, in many respects, it differs from that of the Indian bramins, yet, in others, has a great affinity to it. The practice of polyandry is universally prevalent in Tibet; and one female associates with all the brothers of a family, without any restriction of age or number: the choice of the female is the privilege of the elder brother. This extraordinary custom, and the celibacy of the priests, may have been intended to guard against too numerous a population in an unfertile country. The Tibetians preserve entire the mortal remains of their sovereign lamas only; every other corpse is either consumed by fire, or exposed to be the proxeniscuous food of beasts and birds of prey. They have a great veneration for the cow, and highly respect the waters of the Ganges, the source of which they believe to be in heaven. The sunniasses, or Indian pilgrims, often visit Tibet as a holy place; and the grand lama always maintains a body of near 300 of them in his pay. See Palte.

Tinevelly, or Palameotta, a town of Hindoostan, capital of the province of Tinevelly, at the S extremity of the Carnatic. It is seated on a river, which flows into the gulf of Manara, 85 m ssw Madura. Lon. 77 46 E, lat. 8 42 N.

Ting-tcheou, a city of China, of the first rank, in Fo-kien. It is 980 m S Peking. Lon. 116 30 E, lat. 25 48 N.

Tinian, an island in the Pacific ocean, one of the Ladronez, 12 m long and 6 broad. The soil is dry, and somewhat sandy. Here are many cattle, abundance of fowls, and plenty of wild hogs. It affords abundance of cocoa-nuts, papauas, guavas, limes, four oranges, and bread-fruit; also much cotton and indigo. There are no streams; and the water of a well, supposed to be the same at which Anson filled his casks in 1742, was found by Byron, in 1765, to be brackish and full of worms. Both these officers experienced that the fish caught here were unwholesome. The principal inconvenience arises from the number of muskitos, and other kinds of flies; and there are likewise many venomous insects, centipedes, and scorpions. The road is dangerous, for the bottom consists of hard sand and large coral rocks. Lon. 146 0 E, lat. 15 0 N.

Tino, the ancient Tenos, an island of the Archipelago, to the S of Andros, from which it is separated by a narrow channel. It is 15 m long and 8 broad, and subject to the Turks. This island produces abundance of silk, and the stockings made of it are very good, but nothing can equal the gloves which are knit here for the ladies. The fortress stands on a rock; and here is a bishop's see of the Latin church, though the Greeks have 200 papas or priests. The capital is of the same name. Lon. 25 10 E, lat. 37 40 N.

Tintagel, a village in Cornwall, a mile W of Bossiney. It is noted for the splendid remain of a castle, on a bold promontory in the Bristol channel, said to have been the birthplace of king Arthur, and the seat of the ancient dukes of Cornwall.

Tintern, a village in Monmouthshire, on the river Wye, 5 m N by E Chesham. It has a manufacture of iron wire, also the venerable remains of an abbey, which is a beautiful specimen of Gothic architecture.

Tinto, a river of Spain, which rises in the province of Seville, and has its name from the water being tinged of a yellow colour. Near its springs it has a petrifying quality, no fish will live in it, nor any plants grow on its banks; these properties continue till other rivulets enter and alter its nature; for when it passes by Niebla it is not different from other rivers, and 18 m below it enters the bay of Cadiz, at Huelva.

Tinzeda, a town of Barbary, in the county of Dara, on the river Dras. Lon. 6 13 W, lat. 27 30 N.

Titeri, the middle or southern province of the kingdom of Algiers, in which is a lake of the same name, formed by the river Shellif, near its source. Toward the N it is mountainous and narrow, and to the S it extends far into the desert. The Anwall mountains on the river Isser rise to a great height; but to the SE are some of the highest in the whole kingdom, called Jurjura and Felizia. The latter are a rocky ridge, extending about 20 m, and in most places inaccessible. Here dwell the Cabyls, an independent tribe, who have never been subdued by the Algerines. This province is the smallest and least important. The principal town is Belida.

Titicaca, or Chucuito, a lake of Peru, in the audience of Charcas, of an oval figure; 240 m in circuit. Many streams enter into it, but the water is so muddy and nauseous as not to be drank. It contains several islands, and on the largest, called Titicaca, the most splendid temple in the empire was erected by Manco Capac, the first inca.

Tobago, the most southern of the islands in the W Indies, and the most eastern except Barbados. It is 32 m long and 10 broad; and near the NE extremity is Little Tobago, which is 2 m long. The climate is not so hot as might be expected from its situation so near the equator; nor is it visited by such dreadful hurricanes as frequently desolate the other islands. It is diversified with hills and vales, and equal in richness of produce to any island in these seas. In 1748, it was declared a neutral island, but in 1763 was ceded to the English. It was taken by the French in 1781, and confirmed to them in 1783; but it was taken by the English in 1793, restored in 1802, and again taken in 1803. The principal place is Scarborough.

Tobolsk, a city of Siberia, capital of the government of Tobolsk (formerly of all Siberia) and an archbishop's see. It is seated on the Ittyh, opposite the influx of the Tobol, and divided into the upper and lower town. The upper town, which is properly the city, stands on a hill, on the E side of the fort, and is enclosed with an earthen rampart. It has three wooden churches and a convent; and in the fort are the governor's house, the archbishop's palace, the exchange, and two churches, which are all stone buildings. The lower town stands on a plain, between the city and river. Most of the houses being constructed of wood, it was nearly consumed by a fire about 1786; but it is now rebuilt, and chiefly of stone. Tobolsk contains 15,000 inhabitants, and almost the fourth part are Tartars, who drive a great trade on the river Irtysh, and carry their goods to China. There are also a great number of Kalmucs. The rest of the inhabitants are Russians, whose ancestors were banished hither for their crimes, or such as are exiles themselves. All the Chinese caravans are obliged to pass through this town; and all the furs furnished by Siberia are brought into a warehouse here, and thence forwarded to the Siberian chancery, at Moscow. Here are many artificers, who want neither tools nor materials to carry on their trades; but from the cheapness of all the necessaries of life, indolence and sloth prevail to such a degree, that it is difficult to get any thing made. Tobolsk is 1100 m E by N Moscow, and 1200 E by S Petersburg. Lon. 63 35 E, lat. 58 12 N.

Toledo, a city of Spain, in New Castile, of which it was formerly the capital, and the see of an archbishop, who is primate of Spain. It stands on a conical hill, which is nearly surrounded by the river Tajo; and on the land side is an ancient wall, flanked with 100 towers. There are a great number of superb structures, beside 17 public squares, where the markets are kept. The cathedral is the richest in Spain; the Segrario, or principal chapel, contains 15 large cabinets let into the wall, full of gold and silver vessels, and other works. Here are 38 religious houses, with a great number of churches belonging to 27 parishes, and some hospitals. The inhabitants, once estimated at 200,000, are now reduced to 25,000. Without the town are the remains of an amphitheatre, and other antiquities. It has a royal castle, a famous university, and several manufactures of arms, silk, and wool. It is 37 m S Madrid. beside a great number of foot, who frequently take captives, and sell them to the merchants for slaves. The houses are built like bells, with walls of hurdles plastered with clay, and covered with reeds. The better sort of women have their faces covered, their religion being Mohamedanisin. Both men and women are fond of dancing, and spend a great part of the night in that exercise.

Tombuctoo, the capital of the kingdom of the same name, with a stately mosque built of stone, and a royal palace. It is said to be 12 m in circuit; but the houses being spacious, and having for the most part no upper apartments, the population is not proportionally great.
Here are many cotton-weavers, and ingenious mechanics. Cloth and other European merchandize are brought by caravans from Barbary; these are exchanged for ivory, slaves, sena, gold-dust, dates, ostriches feathers, &c. brought from the interior and more maritime parts of Africa. This city is subject to a well regulated police, and the inhabit-

Tonquin, a kingdom of Asia, bounded on the N by China, E by China and the gulf of Tonquin, S by Cochinchina, and W by Lao. It is 450 m in length, and 380 in breadth in the N, but narrows to 70 as it approaches the S. Toward China is a large tract of desert, and a chain of mountains, through which there is only one passage, defended by a wall; yet it is one of the finest countries of the east, for population, fertility, and trade. The extremes of heat and cold are never felt; for periodical rains, the vicinity of the sea, the number of rivers and canals, and the wide-spreading irrigations necessary for the cultivation of rice, all tend to maintain a moderate temperature, which, while it is grateful to the human species, is singularly favorable to vegetation. Rice is the principal produce, of which two abundant crops are reaped in the year; and sometimes between these, a crop of pulse will be raised in three weeks. Maize and Turkey corn are successfully cultivated. Potatoes, yams, and other farinaceous and nutritive plants are plentiful, and a great variety of excellent herbs grow spontaneously in the woods. The ox and buffalo are used both in agriculture and for food. Horses are small and of little utility. There are no camels, sheep, nor asses; but goats and hogs are in abundance. The chief commodities are gold, musk, silks, calicos, drugs of many sorts, woods for

In May to August one house to a through the water have boats. They are courteous to men are haughty soldiers insolent. They buy all the great men have so addicted to dying, lackered and earthen ware, salt, aniseed, and worm-seed. The lackered ware is not inferior to that of Japan. The commerce of Tonquin is almost limited to a coasting trade; the jealousy of government prohibiting a free intercourse with other nations, and keeping foreign ships at a distance from their harbours. The Chinese, indeed, are permitted to ascend some of the rivers; but they are not suffered to remain long, nor are they allowed any fixed habitation. The Tonquinese are of a middling stature, and clean limbed, with a tawny complexion; their faces oval and flat-tish, their noses and lips well proportioned, and their hair black, long, and coarse. They die their teeth black, and their lips of a bright red. They are dexterous, active, and ingenious, but have more aptitude for imitation than invention; and they are unacquainted with most of the contrivances that facilitate and accelerate mechanical operations. Silks and cottons are the manufactures in which their skill appears pre-eminent, and in these women are chiefly employed; but there is such a number of people, that many want employment; for they seldom go to work but when foreign ships arrive. Their garments are made either of silk or cotton; but the poor people and soldiers wear only cotton of a dark tawny colour, and children go naked till the age of seven. Both men and women wear turbans, and go barefooted; persons of consequence only wear sandals within doors. Their houses are small and low, and the walls either of mud, or hurdles daubed over with clay. They have only a ground floor, with two or three partitions, and each room has a square hole to let in the light. They have stools, benches, and chairs; and on the side of a table is a little altar, with two incense pots thereon, which no house is without. The country abounds with villages, which consist of 30 or 40 houses, surrounded by trees; and in some places are banks to keep the water from overflowing their gardens, where they have oranges, betels, pumpkins, melons, and salad herbs. In the rainy season, from May to August, they cannot pass from one house to another, without wading through the water, but sometimes they have boats. The Tonquinese in general are courteous to strangers; but the great men are haughty and ambitious, the soldiers insolent, and the poor thievish. They buy all their wives, of which the great men have several. The men are so addicted to gaming, that when every thing else is lost, they will stake their wives and children; and in hard times they will sell them to buy rice to maintain themselves. The first new moon that happens after the middle of January is a great festival, when they rejoice for ten days together; and they have another great feast in May or June, when their first harvest is got in. Their religion is paganish, and yet they own a Supreme Being. Their idols have human shapes, but in very different forms; they have likewise some resembling elephants and horses, placed in small low temples built of timber. The language is very guttural, and some of the words are pronounced through the teeth; it has a great resemblance to the Chinese, and the characters are the same; and like them they write with a hair pencil. This kingdom about the beginning of the present century became subject to Cochinchina. Cachao is the capital.

Toulomba, a town and fortress of Hindoostan, in the province of Moultan; seated on the Rauvee, 50 m NNE Moultan.

Toulon, a fortified city and seaport of France, capital of the department of Var, and lately an episcopal see. It is divided into the old and new quarter: the first, which is ill built, has nothing remarkable in it but the Rue aux Arbres (a kind of mall) and the townhouse; the other contains the magnificent works constructed by Lewis XIV, many fine houses, and a grand oblong square, lined with trees, and serving as a parade. The old and new harbours communicate with each other by means of a canal. The old haven has a noble quay, on which is the townhouse, and it is protected by two moles, begun by Henry IV. The new haven was constructed by Lewis XIV, as were the fortifications: it contains an arsenal, a ropewalk, a park of artillery, dock-yards, basins, and every thing to be expected in the second port for men of war in this country. The galleys, transferred from Marseilles some years ago, occupy a basin in the new port. Many of the galley-slaves are artisans, and some merchants: they no longer sleep on board the galleys, but are accommodated on shore, in a vast building erected for the purpose. Both the old and new port have an outlet into the outer road or harbour, which is 10 m in circuit, surrounded by hills, and the entrance defended by a fort and batteries. Toulon is the only mart in the Mediterranean for the re-exportation of the products of the E Indies. In 1706 it was bombarded by the allies both by land and sea, by which almost the whole town was demolished, and several ships burned; but they were at last obliged to raise the siege. In 1721 it experienced the dreadful ravages of a pestilence. In 1793 it capitulated, in the name of Lewis XVII, to the British, who, not finding the place tenable, evacuated it the same year. Toulon is seated on a bay of the Mediterranean, 37 m SE Marseilles, and 517 SSE Paris. Lon. 5 55 E, lat. 43 7 N.

Toulouse, a city of France, capital of the department of Upper Garonne, and an archbishop's see. It contains 60,000 inhabitants, and is the most considerable city in France, next to Paris and Bourdeaux, though the population bears no proportion to its extent. It was the capital of the Teutofages, who made so many conquests in Asia and Greece. It was next a Roman colony, and successively the capital of the Visigoths (who destroyed the city), of the Saracens, of the Normans, of the English, of the French, and of the Spaniards. The walls of the city, and the houses, are built of stone. The cathedral is the work of the 12th century, and is the most magnificent in France. The metro is incomparable. The choir is of the 12th century, and is magnificent. The nave is a modern structure, and is 324 feet long. The principal front of the cathedral is of the grand style. TOU cessively the capital of the Visigoths (who destroyed the superb amphitheatre, of which there are still some remains, the capitol, and other Roman monuments) and that of Aquitaine. The walls of the city, as well as the houses, are built with brick. St. Stephen's, the metropolitan church, would be incomparable, if the nave was equal to the choir; and the archbishop's palace is magnificent. The townhouse, a modern structure, forms a perfect square of 324 feet, and is 66 high: the principal front occupies an entire side of the grand square, called the Place Royale. In the great hall, called the Hall of illustrious Men, is the statue of the chevalier Isaure, and the busts of all the great men to whom the town has given birth. Toulouse, communicating with the Atlantic by the river Garonne, and with the Mediterranean by the canal of Languedoc, might have been a very commercial city; but the taste of the inhabitants has been principally for the sciences and belles lettres. The little commerce they have consists in leather, wool, drapery, blankets, mignonets, oil, iron, mercery, hardware, and books; and near it is a manufacture of indigo, from the woad plant. The bridge over the Garonne, equal to that of Tours, forms a communication with the suburb of St. Cyprian. Toulouse is 125 m SE Bourdeaux, and 350 s by w Paris. Lon. 1° 26' E, lat. 43° 36' N.

finest in the E Indies, but situate in the most barren part of the island. The nearest farm villages are upward of 12 m, from which the inhabitants are supplied with provisions. The harbour is defended by two forts, Trincomale and Ostenburg, the last built upon a cliff, projecting 1500 paces into the sea. The town occupies more ground than Colombo, but contains a much smaller number of houses, and of an inferior appearance. The circumference within the walls is about 3 m, but in this space is included a rising point, immediately over the sea, covered with thick jungle. Trincomale was taken from the Dutch, by the English, in 1782; retaken by the French the same year; restored to the Dutch by the peace of 1783; and again taken by the English in 1795. It stands on a spacious bay of the same name, 100 m NNE Candy. Lon. 81 25 E, lat. 8 32 N.

Trinidad, an island on the NE coast of Terra Firma, separated from Paria on the S, by a channel about 10 m wide, and from Cumana on the W, by the gulf of Paria. It is 80 m long and 50 broad; produces sugar, cotton, maize, fine tobacco, cocoa, indigo, and fruit; and has abundance of fine timber trees. Many trees brought from the E Indies and Otaheite also flourish here; and cinnamon is become abundant. The lake Brea, or of pitch, is a wonderful phenomenon; it covers about 150 acres, and is capable of supplying all the dockyards of Great Britain. This island was taken, in 1595, by sir Walter Raleigh, and in 1676, by the French, who plundered and left it. In 1797, it was captured by the English, and afterward ceded to them by the treaty of Amiens. The capital is St. Joseph.

Trinidad, a city of New Spain, in the province of Guatimala, near the head of a bay of the Pacific ocean. Tripoli, a country of Barbary, extending along the coast of the Mediterranean from the gulf of Cebes to the S extremity of the gulf of Sidra, and bounded on the E by Barca, S by Fezzan, and W by Biledulgerid and Tunis. There are numerous harbours on the coast, some of them capacious, and surrounded by a fine country; but the interior is not very fertile, and the E part is quite a desert. It has the title of a kingdom, but is governed by a bashaw, who is nominally subject to the Porte.

Tripoli, a city and seaport of Barbary, capital of a country of the same name, with a castle and a fort. It was taken by emperor Charles V, who settled the knights of Rhodes here; but they were expelled by the Turks in 1551. The principal mosque fronts the bashaw's castle, and is a very elegant structure. The houses of the different consuls and the higher classes of the inhabitants are usually built of stone, and whitewashed: those of the lower orders are fabricated of earth, small stones, and mortar; and are all of a square form, with a court in the centre, and only one story high, with a flat roof and no windows to the street. Bazars occupy a considerable portion of the city, and are kept in excellent order. The streets are remarkably clean; and acts of violence are rarely committed in them.

It is situate on an island formed by the Don, and so intersected by the river and numerous canals, as to bear some resemblance to Venice. Here are four churches of stone, and three of wood; one of the latter belongs to the Tartars, who have a district of the town peculiar to themselves. The first church erected here was founded by Peter the great, and in it are kept the rich standards, flags, lances, &c. presented from different sovereigns. The other public edifices, and the houses, are of wood; most of the latter built on piles, to avoid the inundations which commonly last from April to June. In most of the streets are lofty wooden bridges that run along the middle of them, and to which a smaller bridge leads from the door of each house; but where this is not the case, the inhabitants are obliged to use boats during the inundation. The shops are numerous, containing the produce of Turkey and Greece; and there are two public baths. The principal exports are fish, iron, civiate, and wine. Tucuman, an extensive country of S America, lying E of the Andes, between Peru and Chili on the W, and Chaco and Paraguay on the E. It is 1000 m in length, and 400 where broadest.—Many rivers water this country, all which, with the exception of two, after having run many leagues, disappear, forming lakes or losing themselves in the earth. The N part is intermixed with mountains, plains, and vallies, producing abundance of seeds, plants, and fruits of all kinds; also tobacco, cotton, and fine timber, the last of which is a great article of trade to Peru and Paraguay. The S part is an immense plain, almost without a tree; the soil a deep fertile mould, watered by many streams from the Andes, and clothed in perpetual verdure. In this rich pasturage, the horses and cattle imported from Europe have multiplied to an almost incredible degree; and hence Peru is supplied with cattle, horses, and mules, and immense numbers of hides are exported to Europe. This country is in the jurisdiction of the vicerealty of Buenos Ayres. St. Michael is the capital.

Tver, a government of Russia, formerly a province in the government of Novogorod. It was the first province modelled according to the code of Catherine II. The country produces abundantly all kinds of corn and vegetables. The forests yield valuable timber. The quadrupeds, and the feathered race, are the same as in all the N of Europe. Beside the fishes common to most lakes and rivers, there is one called the sterlet, a species of sturgeon, highly esteemed for its flavour; and of its roe the finest caviare is made.

Tver, a city of Russia, capital of a government of the same name, and an archbishop's see, with a fortress. It is a place of considerable commerce, being seated at the conflux of the Tverza and Volga, along which is conveyed all the merchandise sent by water from Siberia, and the s provinces, toward Petersburg. It is divided into the old and new town: the former, situate on the right bank of the Volga, consists almost entirely of wooden cottages; the latter having been destroyed by a conflagration, in 1763, has risen with lustre from its ashes. Catherine II, at her own expense, raised the governor's house, the episcopal palace, the courts of justice, the exchange, the prison, and some other public edifices. The streets are broad and long; extending, in straight lines, from an octagon in the centre: the houses of this octagon, and of the principal streets, are of brick, stuccoed white, and make a magnificent appearance. Here is an ecclesiastical seminary, which admits 600 students. In 1776, the empress founded a school for the instruction of 200 burgers' children; and, in 1779, an academy for the education of 120 of the young nobility of the province.—Tver contains upward of 15,000 inhabitants, and is 100 m NNW Moscow. A mile and a half from the wells are some rocks, which in some parts are 75 feet high, the mean height 40, with surprising clefts and chasms between them, that they have the appearance of the hulks of men of war, ranged close together. The town is 5 m s Tunbridge, and 35 sse London.

Tunguska, a town of Russia, situate on the Irkut, 80 m sw Irkutsk. Lon. 103 15 E, lat. 51 18 N.

Tunja, a city of New Granada, capital of a district of the same name. Near it are mines of gold and emeralds; and the country abounds in cattle, corn, and fruit; also in saltpetre, that here are the only manufactures of gunpowder in the kingdom. The city is seated on an eminence, in a valley, 90 m n by E St. Fé. Lon. 73 8 W, lat. 5 20 N.

Tunkat, a town of Western Tartary, in Turkestan, seated in a large plain, on the river Ilak, near its conflux with the Sirr, 100 m se Taraz. Lon. 67 40 E, lat. 43 30 N.

Tunis, a country of Barbary, 200 m from N to s, and 120 from E to W; bounded on the N and E by the Mediterranean, s by Tripoli and Biledulgerid, and w by Algiers. This country was formerly a monarchy, but in 1574 it became a republic, under the protection of the Turks, and pays a certain tribute to the bey who resides at Tunis. The soil in the E part is but indifferent, for want of water. Toward the middle, the mountains and valleys abound in fruit; but the w part is the most fertile, being watered by rivers. The chief productions are wheat, barley, oil, wool, bees-wax, tallow, and a variety of fruits. The mountains near Tunis abound in silver, copper, and lead mines; but jealousy and indolence render them little sources of national wealth. In the woods and mountains are lions, bisons, ostriches, monkeys, roebucks, hares, pheasants, partridges, and other sorts of birds and beasts. The form of government is by a divan, or council, whose president is the bey. The members of the divan are chosen by the bey. The inhabitants are a mixture of Moors,

TUR

Turks, Arabs, Jews, and Christians, merchants and slaves; and they carry on a great trade in linen and woollen cloth, Morocco leather, gold dust, lead, horses, oil, soap, and ostriches eggs and feathers. The established religion is Mohammedanism. All public instruments are written in the Arabic tongue, but commerce is usually carried on by that of the Lingua Franca.

Tunis, a city and the capital of the country of the same name, with a citadel on an eminence, and the fortress of Goletta on the side of a canal, which is the greatest naval and military depot belonging to the bey. The city stands on the w side of a shallow lake, 9 m in diameter, which is entered from the port, or bay of Goletta, by a narrow passage between the point of Cape Carthage and the opposite cape. It is an oblong square, 5 m in circuit, with a lofty wall, five gates, and 35 mosques. The number of inhabitants, including 30,000 Jews, is upward of 130,000. Tunis is built without any regularity; the streets, in general, are narrow and dirty; and there are few buildings of any magnificence, except the great mosque, the bey's palace, and a few others. The houses are all built of stone, though but one story high, and have flat roofs. Near the centre of the city is an extensive piazza, which is said formerly to have contained 3000 tradesmen's shops. The divan, or council of state, assembles in an old palace, where the bey formerly resided. The Mohammedans here have nine colleges for students, and a great number of smaller schools. Tunis is a place of great trade, and has manufactures of velvets, silks, linen and woollen goods, fire-arms, sword cutlery, Morocco leather, and red caps worn by the common people. It is 320 m nsw Tripoli, and 380 m Algiers. Lon. 10 6 E, lat. 36 45 N.

Tunkerstown; see Ephrata.

Turcoin, a town of France, in the department of Nord, where the allies, under the duke of York, were defeated by the French in 1794. It is 6 m nne Lille.

Turcomania, a country of Independent Tartary, lying between the Caspian sea and the lake Aral. It is said to be extremely populous, but wholly uncultivated. The Turcomans are sunnis, and therefore execrated by the Persians, who deem them infidels. They live in tribes, being subject to no particular governor; but each tribe chooses a nominal chief, who has no further authority among them than that of settling differences and arranging their civil economy. As a people, they have no fixed habitations; but carry about the black horse-hair tents in which they live. Their general characteristics are those common to all wandering nations; great hospitality within their own boundaries, and universal depredation abroad. They make incursions into Persia, frequently crossing the wide intervening desert of sand, and surprising and carrying away, from the centre of towns and villages, men, women, and children. These expeditions are performed on horseback by parties of 20 or 30 with incredible speed and activity; for they are admirably supported by their horses, as, like their riders, they undergo immense fatigue with a small portion of food. Their horses are bought by the neighbouring nations at vast prices, which, with the sale among other tribes of their captives, and of their camels, sheep, &c. supply the chief source of a Turcoman's wealth. The people feel not the want of corn, and live on the flesh of horses, camels, and sheep, and the milk of mares and camels. They excavate a large hole in the ground, in which they make a fire; and, placing the meat in the embers, cover it up until it be baked. To the northward of Turcomania are the Kamchanks, who inhabit a desert, and are reported to be most ferocious and warlike, and hitherto unconquered. All these inhabit the eastern coast of the Caspian sea.

Turenne, a town of France, in the department of Correze, with a castle, 16 m ssw Tulle.

Turin, a fortified city of Piedmont, lately the residence of the king of Sardinia, and an archbishop's see. It is now the capital of the department of Po, and stands in a fertile plain, at the conflux of the Doria with the Po. There are many large squares, among which that of St. Charles is the most spacious: the buildings are handsome, and it has extensive arcades on each side. Most of the streets are well built, uniform, straight, and terminate on some agreeable object: the Strada di Po, the finest and largest, leads to the late royal palace, and is adorned with piazzas, filled with shops; as are various others of the best streets; all of which are kept clean by means of a canal from the Doria, with sluices that flow through them into the Po. The inhabitants are computed to be 80,000. The cathedral is an ancient edifice, in no respect remarkable; but several of the churches are notable for their magnitude or their pillars, or the variety of marbles employed in their decoration. The palace consists of two magnificent structures, joined together by a gallery, in which are several pictures, statues, and antiquities of great value. The citadel is a regular pentagon, and deemed the strongest in Europe; it comprehends an extensive arsenal, a cannon foundry, a chymical laboratory, &c. The university is an extensive building with two colleges dependent on it; and here is also an academy. The splendid ramparts and gates of the city, with the beautiful walks and plantations that encircled it, have lately suffered by French spoliation, together with the churches, palaces, &c. Near the city, on the banks of the Po, is the beautiful castle of Valentin, the garden of which is applied to botanical studies. The French besieged this city in 1706; but prince Eugene defeated their army, and compelled them to raise the siege. In 1798, the French republican army took possession of Turin, seized all the strong places of Piedmont, and obliged the king to retire to Sardinia. In 1799, the French were driven out by the Austrians and Russians; but shortly afterward the city and all Piedmont surrendered to the French. Turin is 68 m sw Genoa, and 80 sw Milan. Lon. 7 40 E, lat. 45 4 N.

TUR

TUR

Bulgaria, Servia, Bosnia, part of Croatia and Dalmatia, Romania, Macedonia, Albania, Thrace, Livadia, and Morea. These countries lie between 17 and 20 N lon. and 36 and 49 E lat. Turkey in Asia is bounded on the N by the Black sea and Circassia, E by Persia, S by Arabia, and W by the Mediterranean and the sea of Marmora. It lies between 27 and 46 E lon. and 28 and 43 N lat. and contains the countries of Irak, Diarhek, Kurdistan, Armenia, Roum, Caramania, Natolia, and Syria. In Africa, the Turks have Egypt, part of Nubia, and Barca; and the states of Tripoli, Tunis, and Algiers, are under their protection. Of these countries, (which see respectively) the climate, productions, manners, &c. must be various. The Turks are generally robust, well shaped, and of a good mien. They shave their heads, but wear long beards, except those in the seraglio, or palace, and military men, who wear only whiskers. The turban worn by the men is white, and consists of long pieces of thin linen made up together in several folds. No one but a Turk must presume to wear a white turban. Their clothes are long and full. They sit, eat, and sleep on the floor, on cushions, mattresses, and carpets. Many of their manners and customs are contrary to the English: they pull off their shoes and keep the head covered on entering a mosque; they turn in their toes; they mount on the right side of a horse; they put their guests into a room first, and out of it last; serve themselves at table first; they take the wall, and pass hastily, in sign of respect; they deem beholding more disgraceful than strangling; they cut the hair from the head and leave it on the chin; they invite with the hand, by throwing it backward not drawing it toward them; their mourning habit is white. In general, they are very moderate in eating, and their meals are despatched with great haste. Their principal food is rice; and the frugal repast is followed by fruit and cold water, which are succeeded by hot coffee, and pipes with tobacco. With opium they procure what they call a kief, or placid intoxication. Chess and draughts are favorite games; and the coffeehouses and baths furnish other sources of amusement. Polygamy is allowed among them; but their wives, properly so called, are no more than four in number. The fair sex here are kept under a rigorous confinement: the Arabic word Harem, which signifies a sacred or prohibited thing, is, in its fullest sense, used both of the habitation of the women, and of the women themselves. The Turks believe in one God, and that his great prophet is Mohamed; they appropriate to themselves the name of Moslemism, which has been corrupted into Musselmism, signifying persons professing the doctrine of Mohamed, which he calls Islamism. Drinking wine is prohibited by this prophet in the Koran, yet the Turks make use of it occasionally, without any scruple; though instead of it they generally use sherbet, a liquor made of honey, spices, and the juice of fruits. They expend great sums on fountains, not only in the towns, but in the country, and other solitary places, for the refreshment of travellers and labourers. They are charitable toward strangers, let their religion be what it will; and no nation suffers adversity with greater patience than they. The grand signior is absolute master of the goods and lives of his subjects, inasmuch that they are little better than slaves. The grand vizier is the chief next the emperor; but it is a dangerous place, for he often deposes them, and takes off their heads at his pleasure. Though the grand signior has such prodigious power, he seldom extends it to persons in private life, for these may remain as quiet as in any other part of the world. The nobility among the Turks are the chief military officers, judges, and ecclesiastics. The beglerbegs or viceroys, the bashaws or governors, the sangiaes or deputy-governors, and the officers of state, are, in general, the children of Christian parents, who are commonly taken in war, or purchased. The Turks have always very numerous armies on foot, the chief of which are the janisaries, who have been bred in the seraglio, and have used military discipline from their infancy. Of these they have always 25,000, and there may be 100,000 who have that name. The tributary princes, as the princes of Moldavia and Wallachia, are obliged also to send auxiliaries. The whole Turkish army makes above 300,000 men. Their navy, which is laid up at Constantinople, consists of about 40 large ships, but in time of war auxiliary ships are received from Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli; they also buy up or hire merchants ships, and thus raise a fleet of 150 sail, exclusive of gallees. Constantinople is the capital of all Turkey.

Tuscany, a country of Italy, lately a grand duchy, belonging to the house of Austria. It is 120 m long and 80 broad; bounded on the N and E by the Ecclesiastical State, S by the Mediterranean, and W by that sea, the territory of Lucca, and Modenese. Beside this, a small part of the duchy, to the NW, is enclosed by the sea and the territories of Genoa, Parma, Modena, and Lucca. Tuscany is divided into three provinces, Florentino, Pisano, and Siennese. It is watered by several rivers, of which the Arno is the chief. There are several mountains, in which are mines of iron, alum, and vitriol; also quarries of marble, alabaster, and porphyry, beside hot baths and mineral waters. Many parts of it are fruitful in corn and wine, and produce plenty of citrons, oranges, pomegranates, and other fruits. Manna is gathered in the marshy lands near the sea, and the salt pits are rich. The inhabitants are distinguished by their attachment to commerce, and have established various manufactures, particularly of silks, stuffs, earthenware, and gilt leather. They are much visited by foreigners, on account of their politeness, and because the Italian language is here spoken in its greatest purity. John Gaston, the last duke of Tuscany of the house of Medici, died in 1737, without leaving any heirs male. By the treaty of London, 1718, the emperor of Germany, Charles VI, had promised Tuscany, as a sister of the empire, to don Carlos, infant of Spain, as being the nearest male heir; but, in 1735, when the sovereignty of Naples and Sicily was confirmed to that prince, he renounced his right to Tuscany, in favour of Francis, duke of Lorraine, as an equivalent for that duchy, which he had ceded to France. Francis succeeded to the grand duchy in 1735, and he was raised to the dignity of emperor of Germany in 1745, by which means Tuscany became annexed to the house of Austria. In 1801, on the ascendancy of the French in Italy, the Austrian archduke Ferdinand was obliged to give up Tuscany to a prince of Spain, Louis the son of the duke of Parma, to whom the French gave the sovereignty by the name of the kingdom of Etruria; and it was ceded to him by the treaty of Luneville. In 1807, this country was formally ceded to France. Florence is the capital.

Valais, a country in the SW part of Switzerland, lately a republic, but now subject to France. It is a valley of 100 m long and 20 broad, between ridges of very high mountains, among which are the Great St. Bernard, Simplon, Grimel, Furca, and others, whose summits are never free from snow. The S chain separates it from Milanese, Piedmont, and Savoy; the N divides it from the canton of Bern. The country is divided into Upper and Lower Valais. The former reaches from Mount Fulca, its E boundary, to the river Morge, below Sion; and the latter from that river to St. Gingou, on the lake of Geneva. A country consisting of plains, elevated vallies, and lofty mountains, must necessarily exhibit a great variety of climates and prospects. The productions must vary also according to its singular diversity of climates; for strawberries, cherries, plums, pears, and grapes, in their natural growth, may be tasted in the same day. It has more than sufficient wine and corn for the interior consumption, the soil in the midland and lower districts being exceedingly rich and fertile; but in the more elevated parts, barley is the only grain that can be cultivated with success. The inhabitants profess the Roman catholic religion, and they have no manufactures of any consequence. In 1802, Valais was constituted an independent republic, under the guarantee of France, Switzerland, and Italy; but, in 1810, it was annexed to France, and made a new department called Simplon. Valdivia, a city and seaport in the Indian part of Chili, built in 1552 by Pedro de Valdivia, after he had conquered the country. It is surrounded by walls built of earth, and defended by several forts and batteries; the two entrances of its capacious harbour have also numerous pieces of cannon on each side. The city and its district extends from the ocean about 36 m long and 18 broad, on both sides the river Valdivia, in the midst of the country occupied by the Araucanians. The district abounds in valuable timber and the purest gold dust. The city stands on the S side of the river, 10 m from the Pacific ocean, and 210 S Concepcion. Lon. $72^{\circ} 20'$ W, lat. $39^{\circ} 46'$ N.

long and from 20 to 60 broad, and the most pleasant and populous country in Spain; for here they enjoy a perpetual spring. It is watered by a great number of streams, natural and artificial, and fertile in all the necessaries of life, especially rice, fruit, oil, and wine. In the mountains are mines of iron and alum, and quarries of marble, jasper, and lapis calaminaris. Here is also much silk, cotton, and hemp; the manufactures of which are the cause of a considerable population. Notwithstanding all this abundance, the Valencian peasantry are very poor.

Valencia, a city of Spain, capital of a province of the same name, and an archbishop's see, with a university. It contains 12,000 houses within the walls, beside those in the suburbs and pleasure gardens around it, which amount to the same number. The cathedral has one side of the choir incrustated with alabaster, and adorned with paintings of scripture history. The palace of the viceroy, that of Ciuta, the monastery of St. Jerom, the exchange, and the arsenal, are all worthy of notice. Here are flourishing manufactures of cloth and silk, and several remains of antiquity. The city was taken by the earl of Peterborough in 1705, and lost again two years after. In 1812, after a bombardment of four days, it surrendered to the French. It is seated on the Guadalaviva, near the Mediterranean, 130 m ESE Madrid. Lon. $0^{\circ} 27'$ W, lat. $39^{\circ} 27'$ N.

Valencia, a city of Terra Firma, in the province of Caracas. The principal church is on the E side of the great square, and some of the streets are well built, but the houses are in general low and irregular. It was nearly destroyed by the great earthquake in 1812. It is situate in an extensive plain, near the lake Tocurigua, 57 m SW Porto Cabello. Lon. $68^{\circ} 30'$ W, lat. $9^{\circ} 50'$ N.

Valestra, a town of Italy, in Modenese, 12 m SW Modena.

Valetta, a city of Malta, the capital of that island, and wonderfully strong both by nature and art. It is seated on a peninsula, between two of the finest ports in the world, which are defended by almost impregnable fortifications. That on the SE side of the city is the largest; it runs 2 m inland, and is surrounded by such high grounds, that the largest ships may ride in the most stormy weather, almost without a cable. This basin is divided into five distinct harbours, all equally safe, each capable of containing a vast number of ships. The entrance is scarcely a quarter of a mile broad, and is commanded on each side by strong batteries, fronted by a quadruple battery, one above the other, the largest of which is on a level with the water. The harbour on the N side, though only used for fishing, and as a place of quarantine, is likewise well defended; and in an island in the centre of it, is a castle and a lazaret. Valetta has three gates, and the streets are all paved with flat square stones. The houses are neat, and built of stone; the roofs forming a flat terrace plastered with pozzolana; and most of them have a balcony to the street. The principal buildings are the palace of the grand master, the infirmary, the conservatory, and the magnificent church of St. John. The pavement of this church is composed entirely of sepulchral monuments of the finest marbles, porphyry, lapis lazuli, and a variety of other valuable stones. There are some other churches richly endowed, and several convents. The great source of water that supplies Valetta rises near Citta Vecchia, and is thence conveyed by an aqueduct, erected at the expense of one of the grand masters. Notwithstanding the supposed bigotry of the Maltese, here is a mosque, in which the Turkish slaves are permitted to enjoy their religion. The inhabitants are estimated at 50,000, and half of them are said to be foreigners. The Turks besieged this city in 1566; but after many dreadful assaults, were compelled to raise the siege, with the loss of 30,000 men. It surrendered to the French, under Bonaparte, in 1798; and they, in 1800, surrendered it to the British, after a blockade of two years. Valetta is 70 m SE of Cape Passaro, in Sicily. Valladolid, a city of Spain, in Leon, capital of a principality of the same name, and a bishop's see, with a university. It is surrounded by strong walls, has long and broad streets, and is adorned with handsome buildings, squares, and fountains. The marketplace, called El Campo, is 700 paces in circuit, surrounded by a great number of convents. There are 70 monasteries and nunneries, the finest of which is that of the Dominicans, remarkable for its church, which is one of the most magnificent in the city. The kings formerly resided at this place; and the royal palace, which still remains, is of very large extent, though but two stories high. The townhouse takes up the entire side of a square. The house of the inquisition is an odd structure, for there are no windows, but a few holes to let in the light. Here are some woollen manufactures, and many goldsmiths and jewellers; but the number of inhabitants does not exceed 20,000. The environs of the city are covered with gardens, orchards, vineyards, meadows, and fields. It is seated on the Escurva, near the Pisuerga, 74 m SSE Leon, and 100 NNW Madrid. Van Diemen Land, an island in the S Pacific ocean, 160 m long and 80 broad, separated from the S part of New Holland by Bass strait. It was discovered by Tasman in 1642, and till 1799 was deemed the S extremity of New Holland. Cook called here in 1777, for supplies of wood, water, and grass. The natives were entirely naked; of a common stature, but rather slender, the skin black, and the hair woolly, but their lineaments more pleasing than those of Negroes; the hair and beards, and some of the faces, were smeared with red ointment. They seem to prefer birds to all other food. The hovels resemble those of New S Wales; but sometimes large trees are hollowed out by fire to the height of six feet. The land is chiefly high, diversified with hills and vallies, which are well wooded and watered. The forest trees seem to be all of one kind, growing quite straight to a height proper for masts. The low lands produce flowering shrubs, and odoriferous plants. The only quadrupeds seen were opossums and kangaroos; and the birds cannot differ much from those of New Holland, to which there is as it were a passage by intermediate isles. In 1804, a British settlement was established on the SW coast, near the mouth of the Derwent, and named Hobart; it has a church, the altar of which is over the vault of colonel Collins, the first lieutenant governor, who died here in 1810. Venajque, a town of France, in the department of Vaucluse, on the river Nasque, 10 m ESE Carpentras, and 30 ENE Avignon.

Vencaticbery, a town of Hindoostan, in the E part of Mysore, ceded to the English by the treaty of Seringapatam. Here are the remains of the rajah's palace, and the ruins of a fort. Near this place iron is smelted from black sand. It is 57 m W Arcot, and 58 E Bangalore.

Vence, a town of France, in the department of Var; lately a bishop's see. It is 9 m N Antibes, and 9 W Nice.

Vendee, a department of France, including part of the late province of Poitou. It is so called from a small river of the same name. Fontenay le Comte is the capital.

Vendeu, a town of Russia, in the government of Riga, on the river Aa, 36 m ENE Riga.

Vendome, a town of France, in the department of Loir and Cher, on the river Loir, 30 m NE Tours, and 95 SW Paris.

Vendrell, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, 25 m WSW Barcelona.

Veneria, a town of Piedmont, which took its name from a magnificent hunting-seat built by a duke of Savoy. It has manufactures of wool and silk, and stands on the Stura, 8 m NNW Turin.

Venezuela, a province of Terra Firma, in the government of Caracas; bounded on the N by the Caribbean sea, E by Caracas, S by New Granada, and W by Rio de la Hacha and St. Martha. It spreads round a gulf of the same name (which reaches 90 m inland and is 80 broad) and the lake of Maracaybo. When the Spaniards landed here in 1499, they observed some huts built upon piles, in an Indian village named Coro, in order to raise them above the stagnated water that covered the plain; and this induced them to give it the name of Venezuela, or Little Venice. Near the seacoast are high mountains, the tops of which are barren, but the Venezuela, or Coro, the capital of the province of Venezuela, in Terra Firma, and a bishop's see. This town suffered by the great earthquake in 1812. It stands on a peninsula, on the E side of the gulf of Venezuela, 60 m ENE Maracayho. Lon. 70 15 W, lat. 10 55 N.

Venice, a late celebrated republic of Italy, which comprehended the Dogado, Paduano, Vicentino, Veronese, Bresciano, Bergamo, Cremasco, Polesino di Rovigo, Trevisano, Feltrino, Bellunese, Cadorino, and part of Friuli and Istria. The government of the republic, before it was subverted by the French, was aristocratic, for none could have any share in it but the nobles. The doge was elected by a plurality of votes, and the ducal cap was placed on his head, with great ceremony, in St. Mark's church. He held his dignity for life; and his office was to marry the Adriatic sea, in the name of the republic; to preside in all assemblies of the state; to have an eye over all the members of the magistracy; and to nominate to all the benefices annexed to the church of St. Mark. On the other hand, there were five councils, which so limited his power, that he has been justly defined to be, in habit and state, a king; in authority, a counsellor; in the city, a prisoner; and out of it, a private person. This constitution, however, now no longer exists. In 1797, a tumult having happened at Venice, in which some French soldiers were killed, the French seized the city, and instituted a provisional democratic government: but, soon after, by the treaty of Campo Formio, the city and territory of Venice, lying to the N and W of the river Adige, was ceded to Austria as a duchy, in equivalence for the dominions that house had lost in the Netherlands; and the remainder of the territory was annexed to what the French then styled the Cisalpine republic. In 1805 commenced a short war between Austria and France, and by the treaty of peace at Presburg, the duchy of Venice was given up; and the whole territory of Venice is now a part of the newly erected kingdom of Italy. The Venetian territories on the continent, enumerated above (and which, by way of distinction, are sometimes called the Terra Firma) are described in their respective places. Venice was once one of the most powerful commercial and maritime states in Europe. For this it was indebted at first, to the monopoly of the commerce of India; the products of that country being conveyed, in the middle ages, up the gulf of Persia, the Euphrates, and the Tigris, as far as Bagdad; thence by land, across the desert, to Palmyra; and thence to the Mediterranean ports: and, afterward, the supplying of the crusaders with provisions and military stores was an additional source of opulence and power. All this declining, however, after the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope by the Portuguese, in 1486; which, in its consequences, has reduced Venice from a state of the highest splendour to comparative insignificance. The Venetians are lively and ingenious, extravagantly fond of amusements, with an uncommon relish for humour. They are in general tall, well made, and of a ruddy brown colour, with dark eyes. The women are of a fine style of countenance, with expressive features, and a skin of a rich carnation: they are of an easy address, and have no aversion to cultivate an acquaintance with strangers who are properly recommended. Whatever degree of licentiousness may prevail among them, jealousy, poison, and the filetto have been long banished from their gallantry. The common people display some qualities very rarely to be found in that sphere of life, being remarkably sober, obliging to strangers, and gentle in their intercourse with each other.

Venice, a city of Italy, and a long time the capital of a territory of the same name. In the 4th century, when Attila king of the Huns ravaged the N part of Italy, many of the inhabitants abandoned their country, and retired into the islands of the Adriatic sea, now called the gulf of Venice. These islands being near each other, they found means to join them, by driving piles on the sides, and forming the channels into canals, on which they built houses, and thus the superb city of Venice had its beginning. It is the see of a patriarch, and stands on 72 little islands, about 5 m from the mainland, in a kind of laguna or lake, separated from the gulf of Venice, by some islands, at a few miles distance. These islands, in a great measure, break the force of the Adriatic storms, before they reach the laguna. The number of the inhabitants is computed at 160,000, and they have a flou-ishing trade in silk manufactures, bone-lace, and all sorts of glasses and mirrors, which make their principal employments. Most of the houses have a door opening upon a canal, and another to a street; by means of which, and of the bridges, a person may go to almost any part of the city by land, as well as by water. The streets, in general, are narrow; and so are the canals, except the Grand canal, which is very broad, and has a serpentine course through the middle of the city. There are nearly 500 bridges in Venice; but what pass for such are only single arches thrown over the canals; most of them very lofty. The Rialto consists also of a single arch, but a very noble one, and of marble, built across the grand canal, near the middle, where it is the narrowest: this celebrated arch is 90 feet wide on the level of the canal, and 24 feet high. The beauty of it is impaired by two rows of booths or shops, which divide its upper surface into three narrow streets. The view from the Rialto is equally lively and magnificent; the canal covered by boats and gondolas, and flanked on each side by magnificent palaces, churches, and spires. The only place where a person can walk with ease and safety is in the Piazza di St. Marco; a kind of irregular quadrangle, formed by a number of buildings, all of marble: namely, the ducal palace; the churches of St. Mark and St. Geminiano; and a noble range of buildings, in which are the museum, the public library, the mint, &c. The patriarchal church of St. Mark, one of the richest and most expensive in the world, is crowned by five domes; and the treasury is very rich in jewels and relics. The churches and convents are numerous, in which the most admirable part are the paintings; and indeed Venice, highly renowned for valuable paintings, far surpasses, in this respect, even Rome itself. The ducal palace is an immense building: before the subversion of the republic it contained the apartments of the doge; halls and chambers for the senate, and the different councils and tribunals; and an armory, in which a great number of muskets were kept, ready charged, that the nobles might arm themselves on any sudden insurrection. The arsenal is a fortification 3 m in compass: before it was pillaged by the French, it contained arms for 60,000 foot and 20,000 horse, arranged in an ornamental manner; and 2800 men were daily employed in building ships, casting canons, making cables, sails, anchors, &c. The handsome structure called Il Fontica di Teleschi, containing 23 shops and 100 rooms, is that where the German merchants lay their commodities. The bank of Venice is supposed to be the first of the kind in Europe, after the model of which those of Amsterdam and Hamburg were established. In this city a famous carnival is held from Christmas till Ashwednesday; in all which time libertinism reigns through the city, and thousands of foreigners frequent it from all parts of Europe. The chief diversions are riddos and mascherades; and St. Mark's place is the general rendezvous. Venice is included in the province called the Dogado, and is 125 m SNE Florence, and 140 E Milan. Lon. 12 23 E, lat. 45 27 N.

Venice, Gulf of, a sea, or gulf of the Mediterranean, between Italy and Turkey in Europe. It is the ancient Adriaticum Mare, and is still sometimes called the Adriatic Sea. There are many islands in it, and many bays or small gulfs on each coast. The grand ceremony of the doge of Venice marrying the Adriatic annually on Ascension Day, by dropping into it a ring from his bucciantur, or state barge, attended by all the nobility and ambassadors in gondolas, was intermitted in 1797, for the first time for several centuries.

Venlo, a strong town of the Netherlands, in Upper Guelderland, and a place of trade for merchandise coming from the adjacent countries. In 1702, it surrendered to the allies, and was confirmed to the Dutch by the barrier treaty in 1715. It was taken by the French in 1794. It is seated on the E side of the Meuse, opposite Fort St. Michael, 12 m N Ruremonde. Lon. 6 6 E, lat. 51 22 N.

Venosa, a town of Naples, in Basilicata, on the river Ofanto, 13 m SW Acerenza.

Venta de Cruz, a town of Terra Firma, in the isthmus of Darien, and on the river Chagre. Here the Spaniards used to bring the merchandise of Peru and Chili on mules from Panama, and embark it on the river for Porto Bello. It is 20 m N Panama.

Venezone, a town of Italy, in the country of Friuli, situate on the Tagliamento, 18 m NNW Friuli.

Vera, a town of Spain, in Granada, 34 m NNE Almeria, and 80 E Granada.

Vera, a town of Spain, in Navarre, on the Bidassoa, 28 m N by W Pamplona.

Vera Cruz, a city of New Spain, in Tlascalala, on the gulf of Mexico, and the capital of another province on the coast. There is a fort, situate on the N side of St. Juan de Ulua, which is the capital of the province. The port is the centre of the commerce, and receives much European merchandise from Acapulco from which are brought to Vera Cruz, and the W Indies. It was held here for 10 years by the Spaniards, and the Old world. The Spaniards attend to their agriculture, and the commerce of this town is famous for the landing of Cornish Spaniards, who were the first quest of Mexico. It is 16 m to the SW of Vera Cruz, and is a beautiful city, and is surrounded by materials drawn from the sea; for no rocks are to be seen in the environs, nor is there any fresh water, that the Spaniards served in cisterns, and is estimated at 1000 militia and 5000 m E by S Mexico. 19 11 N.

Vera Paz, a town of Spain, in the audience of the N by J. It is in the province of Huesca, and is w by Chiara, and is a fertile vally, and feeds a great number of mules. The produce is drugs, cocoa, &c.

the capital of an extensive district along the coast. The harbour is defended by a fort, situate on a rock of the island St. Juan de Ulua, nearly adjoining. This port is the centre of the treasure and merchandize of New Spain, and it receives much E India produce by way of Acapulco from the Philippine Islands, which are hence exported to Europe and the W Indies. An annual fair is held here for the rich merchandize of the Old world; and such crowds of Spaniards attend, that tents are erected for their accommodation. The site of this town is famous on account of the landing of Cortez, in 1519, with 500 Spaniards, when he undertook the conquest of Mexico; and the Old Town, 16 m to the NW, is deemed the first colony founded by Cortez. The city is beautifully and regularly built, and of materials drawn from the bottom of the sea; for no rock is to be found in the environs, nor any springs of potable water, that the best is rain-water preserved in cisterns. The inhabitants are estimated at 16,000, exclusive of the militia and seafaring people. It is 190 m E by S Mexico. Lon. 96 9 W, lat. 19 11 N.

Vera Paz, a province of New Spain, in the audience of Guatimala; bounded on the N by Jucatan, E by the bay and province of Honduras, S by Guatimala, and W by Chiapa. It is full of mountains and forests; but there are many fertile vallies, which produce some corn, and feed a great number of horses and mules. The principal commodities are drugs, cocoa, cotton, and wool.

Vera Paz, or Coban, a town of New Spain, capital of the province of Vera Paz, and a bishop's see, but is inconsiderable. It stands on a river, which runs into the gulf Dulce, 120 m NE Guatimala. Lon. 91 2 W, lat. 14 46 N.

Veragua, a province of New Spain, in the audience of Guatimala; bounded on the N by the Caribbean sea, E by the province and bay of Panama, S by the Pacific ocean, and W by Costa Rica. It is a mountainous and barren country, but abounds in mines of gold and silver. St. Jago is the capital.

Verd. Cape, a promontory on the W coast of Africa, 145 m to the NW of the mouth of the Gambia. Lon. 17 31 W, lat. 14 44 N.

Verd Islands, Cape, islands in the Atlantic, above 300 m to the W of the coast of Africa, between 13 and 19 N lat. They are said to have been known to the ancients, under the name of Gorgades; but not visited by the moderns till discovered, in 1446, by Anthony Noel, a Genoese, in the service of Portugal, and received their general name from their situation opposite Cape Verd. They are ten in number, lying in a semicircle, and named St. Antonio, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, St. Nicolas, Sal Bonavilla, Mayo, St. Jago, Fuego, and Bravo. St. Jago is the principal.

Verden, a duchy of Germany, in the circle of Westphalia, 28 m long and nearly as much broad; bounded on the W and N by the duchy of Bremen, and E and S by the duchy of Lueburg. It consists chiefly of heaths and high dry lands; but there are good marshes on the rivers Weser and Aller. It was formerly a bishopric, which, at the peace of Westphalia, was secularised, and ceded to Sweden; in 1712 it was taken by the Danes, who, in 1715, ceded it to the electoral house of Brunswick, which cession, in 1718, was confirmed by the Swedes. The inhabitants are Lutherans.

Verden, a town of Westphalia, capital of a duchy of the same name. It contains four churches, and is seated on a branch of the Aller, 18 m SSE Bremen. Lon. 9 20 E, lat. 52 58 N.

Verdun, a strong town of France, in the department of Meuse, and a bishop's see. It is divided into the upper, lower, and new town. The citadel was constructed by Vauban, who was a native of this place. Beside the cathedral there are a collegiate and nine parish-churches. Verdun surrendered to the Prussians in 1792, but was retaken soon after. It is seated on the Meuse, 28 m N by E Barle Duc, and 140 E by N Paris. Lon. 5 23 E, lat. 49 9 N.

Verdun, a town of France, in the department of Saone and Loire, seated on the Saone, at the influx of the Doubs, 30 m E by S Autun.

Verdun, a town of France, in the department of Upper Garonne, seated on the Garonne, 20 m NNW Toulouse.

Verca, a town of European Turkey, in Macedonia, 48 m W Salonica.

Vereria, a town of Russia, in the government of Moscow, 56 m WSW Moscow.

Vergennes, a town of Vermont, in Addison county, seated on Otter creek, 6 m from its mouth in Lake Champlain, and 10 N Middlebury.

Verina, a town of Terra Firma, in the province of Cumana, celebrated for its tobacco. It is situate on a gulf of the Atlantic, 45 m E Cumana. Lon. 63 44 W, lat. 10 8 N.

Vermandois, a late territory of France, in Picardy; which, with the late territory of Soissonnois, is now included in the department of Aisne. It abounds in corn, and excellent flax.

Vermantos, a town of France, in the department of Yonne, 14 m SSE Auxerre.

Vermejo, a river that rises in Tucuman, on the borders of Peru, flows SE to the Pariqua, and enters that river a little above its junction with the Parana.

Vermont, one of the United States of America; bounded on the N by Lower Canada, E by the Connecticut, which divides it from New Hampshire, S by Massachusetts, and W by New York. It is 157 m long and 65 broad, and divided into 11 counties; Windham, Windsor, Orange, Caledonia, Essex, Bennington, Rutland, Addison, Chittenden, Franklin, and Orleans. A chain of high mountains, running N and S, divides the state nearly in the centre, between the river Connecticut and lake Champlain. The natural growth upon this chain is hemlock, pine, spruce, and other evergreens: hence they are called the Green Mountains, and give name to the state. The country is generally hilly, but not rocky, and the soil is fertile. It has numerous streams and rivers, which all rise in the Green mountains: the largest are on the W side, and the chief are Otter creek, Onion river, Moille, and Mischiscoui; the most numerous are on the E side, and the largest are West river, White river, and Pousoomfic. Iron ore abounds in this state, Veroli, a town of Italy, in Campagna di Roma, seated on the Cosa, three m S Alatri.

Verona, a city of Italy, capital of Veronese, and a bishop's see. It has three forts, and is surrounded by thick walls, deep ditches, and good ramparts. The river Adige divides it into two parts, which communicate by four bridges. The streets are neither clean nor straight; the best is that called the Corso, which is pretty long, and there is a handsome square called the Piazza d'Armi. This city is famous for antiquities, and the most remarkable structure is a Roman amphitheatre, of which seven rows of benches of white marble are still entire; but various repairs have been made from time to time. In the townhouse are the statues of five illustrious natives of Verona; namely, Catullus, Æmilius Marcus, Cornelius Nepos, the elder Pliny, and Vitruvius. Beside the cathedral there are 48 parish-churches, 13 other churches, 41 convents, and 18 hospitals. The palaces of Bevilacqua and Scipio Maffei contain many valuable paintings, antiques, and other curiosities. Most of the buildings are of marble, above 30 kinds of which are found in the neighbourhood. The principal trade arises from the manufactures of silk and woollen, and next to them are those of gloves and leather. Near the city is a delightful place, called Campo Marzo, where two annual fairs are held in May and November. Verona was taken by the French in 1796, and retaken by the Austrians in 1799. It is 20 m NNE Mantua, and 54 W Venice. Lon. 11 18 E, 45 26 N.

Vesuvius, a volcanic mountain of Italy, 7 m to the E of Naples. It is near 30 m in circuit at the base, and about 3600 feet high. The base on all sides is covered with towns, which with the villages and villas that encircle them to some height, may be said to cover the lower parts of the mountain with fertility, beauty, and population. The next region is a scene of perfect devastation, furrowed on all sides with streams of lava, extended in wide black lines over the surface. The upper part has the shape of a truncated cone; it is covered almost entirely with ashes, and extremely difficult of ascent. The top of this is a narrow ledge of burnt earth or cinders, nearly 2 m in circuit, with the crater open beneath, about 350 feet in depth. Its steep shelving sides are formed of ashes and cinders, with some rocks and masses of lava intermingled, enclosing at the bottom a flat space of about half a mile in diameter. To the s of this cone, separated by a deep dell, is a ridge called Monte di Somma, from a town that stands near its base: the distance between these two summits, in a straight line, is about 3000 feet. The ridge on the side toward the cone presents a rugged precipice, but the other sides shelve gently to the plain. The eruption of Vesuvius in the year 79, under Titus, was accompanied by an earthquake that overturned several cities, particularly Pompeii and Herculaneum, and proved fatal to Pliny the naturalist. Great quantities of ashes and sulphureous smoke were carried not only to Rome, but also beyond the Mediterranean into Africa. Another violent eruption, in 1631, totally destroyed the town of Torre del Greco. The eruption of 1767 was the 27th from the time of Titus, since which there have been 12 others. Next to those in 79 and 1631, the eruption of 1794 was the most violent and destructive; the lava flowed over 5000 acres of cultivated land, and the town of Torre del Greco was again destroyed; the top of the crater likewise fell in, and increased its dimensions.

Vicenza, a city of Italy, the capital of Vicentino, and a bishop's see. It has no walls, but is a large place, adorned with above 20 palaces from the designs of Palladio, who was born here. The cathedral is embellished with marble, and has some good paintings. There are above 60 other churches, and in that of St. Corona, the high altar and the painting by Paul Veronese of the Magi paying adoration to Christ, attract particular notice. In the fine square before the townhouse are two lofty columns, with St. Mark's winged lion on one of them, and on the other a statue of our Saviour. The other remarkable places are the Monte della Picca with its fine library, the Palazzo Vecchio with its admirable paintings, the Theatrum Olympicum after the model of the amphitheatre of Palladio, and the triumphal arches in the public promenade of Campo Marzo. The principal manufactures are silk, damask, and fasseta. About 4 m from the city, on a mountain, is the church of Della Madonna di Monte Berico, which is much frequented by pilgrims, and has a fine frontispiece, with a convent close by. Vienna, a city of Germany, capital of Austria, and an archbishop's see. It stands in a fertile plain, on the right bank of the Danube, at the influx of the little river Vien. The city itself is not of great extent, nor can it be enlarged, being limited by strong fortifications, but it is populous, and contains 78,000 inhabitants. The streets in general are narrow, and the houses high; but there are several fine squares, and in that called Joseph-square, is a colossal equestrian statue in bronze of Joseph II. Some of the public buildings are magnificent; the chief of them are the imperial palace, the palaces of the princes, the imperial chancery, the imperial arsenal, the city arsenal, the mint, the general hospital, the townhouse, the customhouse, the bank, the library, and the museum. Vienna was ineffectually besieged by the Turks, in 1589 and 1683. At the latter period, the siege was raised by John Sobieski, king of Poland, who totally defeated the Turkish army. No houses without the walls are allowed to be built nearer to the glacis than 600 yards; so that there is a circular field of that breadth all round the city, which has a beautiful and salutary effect. The eight suburbs are said to contain 220,000 inhabitants; but they are not populous in proportion to their size, for many houses have extensive gardens. The circuit of the city and suburbs is upward of 18 m. Many families who live during the winter within the fortifications, spend the summer in the suburbs. The cathedral is built of freestone, and the steeple contains a bell of uncommon magnitude, cast out of the cannon taken from the Turks. Joining to this church is the archbishop's palace, the front of which is very fine. The university had several thousand students, who, when this city was besieged, mounted guard, as they did also in 1741. The archducal library is much frequented by foreigners, as it contains above 100,000 printed books, and 10,000 manuscripts. The archducal treasury, and a cabinet of curiosities of the house of Austria, are great rarities. The Danube is here very wide, and contains several woody isles, one of which is the prater, or imperial park; it also forms a sort of harbour, where are magazines of naval stores, and ships have been fitted out to serve on that river against the Turks. The trade of Vienna is in a flourishing state, and it has manufactures of silk-stuffs, gold and silver lace, tapestry, looking-glasses, &c. In 1805, this city surrendered to the French and their allies; but was given up by the peace at Presburg. It is 50 m w Presburg, 350 nNE Rome, and 570 E Paris. Lon. 16 16 E, lat. 48 13 N.

Vienne, a town of France, in the department of Isere, seated on the Rhone, over which it had formerly a bridge, but only some piers remain. In the 5th century, the Burgundians made it the capital of their kingdom. Before the revolution, it was the see of an archbishop, and the capital of a province called Viennois. The cathedral is a handsome Gothic structure. In 1311, a general council was held here, at which pope Clement v presided, and among other matters, the suppression of the Knights Templars was determined. The commerce of Vienne consists in wine, silks, and sword-blades. It is 15 m sse Lyon, and 38 nW Grenoble. Lon. 4 56 E, lat. 45 32 N.

Vincent, St. one of the Caribe islands, in the W Indies, lying 55 m to the W of Barbados. It is inhabited by Caribs, a warlike race of Indians, between whom and the aborigines of the larger islands there is a manifest distinction. They are conjectured to have been originally a colony from N America; their fierce manners approaching nearer to those of the original natives of that continent, than they do to that of S America, and their language also having some affinity to that spoken in Florida. In their wars they preserve their ancient practice of destroying all the males, and preserving the women either for servitude or for breeding. St. Vincent was long a neutral island; but, at the peace of 1763, the French agreed that the right to it should be vested in the English. The latter, soon after, engaged in a war against the Caribs, on the windward side of the island, who were obliged to consent to a peace, by which they ceded a large tract of land to the crown. The consequence of this was, that in 1779, they greatly contributed to the reduction of this island by the French, who, however, restored it in 1783. In 1795, the French landed some troops, and again instigated the Caribs to an insurrection, which was not subdued for several months. St. Vincent is 24 m long and 10 broad. It is extremely fertile for the raising of sugar and indigo; and here the bread-fruit trees, brought from Otaheite, thrive remarkably well. A ridge of mountains passes along the middle, through its whole length, the highest of which, called Souffrier, is at the N extremity. From this mountain, in 1812, after the lapse of near a century, proceeded a dreadful volcanic eruption, with an ebullition of lava and undulating earthquakes; the island was enveloped in a chaotic gloom for three days, and wholly covered by showers of sand, cinders, calcined pebbles, and other volcanic matter. Kingston is the capital.

The Royal Society here is likewise the oldest association of the kind in the north. Here is an observatory, planned by the celebrated Celsius, from which the Swedish geographers compute the longitude. The botanical garden, of which the famous Linné was superintendent, is almost desolated; but a new one lies on the w side of the palace, and is much larger. Upsal contains about 4000 inhabitants, exclusive of the students, who are seldom fewer than 500. It is seated in a vast open plain, fertile in corn, 40 m NW Stockholm. Lon. 17 39 E, lat. 59 52 N.

Urach, a town of Suabia, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, with a decayed castle on a mountain. It has a trade in paper, damasks, and linen, and is 21 m SSE Stuttgart.

Uruguay, a province of Paraguay, so named from a large river, which unites with the Parana, 70 m above Buenos Ayres, and forms the famous river Plata. This province, which lies E of the river, was ceded, in 1757, by Spain to Portugal for the colony of St. Sacramento; that the river Uruguay is now the boundary between the two crowns.

Uraichore, a town of European Turkey, in Livadia, and a bishop's see. It is governed by a bey, and stands on the left bank of the Aspro, 25 m WNW Lepanto.

Ural, a river of Russia, which rises in Mount Caucasus, flows by Orenburg, Uralsk, and Gurief, and enters the Caspian sea by three mouths.

Ural Mountains, a chain of mountains extending from 50 to 67 N lat. or about 1150 m, and has by the Russians been called the backbone of the world. The central part of this chain abounds in metals; and they contain fine white marble. Pauda, one of the highest mountains, is said to be 4512 feet above the level of the sea. This chain forms a considerable part of the boundary between Europe and Asia.

Uralian Cossacs, a Tartar tribe that inhabit the Russian province of Orenburg, on the s side of the river Ural. These Cossacs are descended from those of the Don; and are a valiant race. They profess the Greek religion; but there are dissenters from the established religion, whom the Russians called Roskolniki, or Separatists, and who style themselves Staroverski, or Old Believers. These consider the service of the established church as profane, and have their own priests and ceremonies. The Uralian Cossacs are all enthusiasts for the ancient ritual, and prize their beards almost equal to their lives. A Russian officer having ordered a number of Cossacs recruits to be publicly shaved in the town of Yaitsk, in 1771, this wanton insult excited an insurrection, which was suppressed for a time; but, in 1773, an impostor, Pugatchef, who assumed the name of Peter III, appeared among them, and, taking advantage of this circumstance, roused them once more into open rebellion. This was suppressed by the defeat and execution of the impostor; and in order to extinguish all remembrance of this rebellion, the river Yaik was called the Ural; the Yaik Cossacs were denominated Uralian Cossacs; and the town of Yaitsk was named Uraitsk. These Cossacs are very rich, in consequence of their fisheries in the Caspian sea. Their principal fishery is for sturgeons and beluga, whose roes supply large quantities of caviare; and the fish, chiefly salted and dried, afford a considerable article of consumption in the Russian empire.

Ural'sk, a town of Russia, in the government of Caucasia and province of Orenburg. It was formerly called Yaitsk, and is seated on the Ural, 375 m NNE Astracan. Lon. 50 10 E, lat. 52 0 N.

Uraniburg, once a magnificent castle of Denmark, in the island of Huen. It was built by Tycho Brahe, a celebrated astronomer, who called it Uraniburg, or Castle of the Heavens, and here made his observations. It is now a ruin. Lon. 12 43 E, lat. 55 55 N.

Urbania, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Urbino, built by Urban VIII, on the Metro, 7 m SSW Urbino.

Urbanna, a town of Virginia, in Middlesex county, seated on the Rappahannock, 22 m from its mouth, and 73 NE Richmond.

Urbino, a duchy of Italy, in the Ecclesiastical State, 55 m long and 45 broad; bounded on the N by Romagna, NE by the gulf of Venice, SE and S by Ancona, and W by Perugia and Tuscany. The air is not deemed wholesome, nor is the soil fertile. The chief production is silk, and game is plentiful.

Urbino, a city of Italy, capital of the duchy of Urbino, and an archbishop's see. The university contains a noble college and 16 convents. Great quantities of fine earthen ware are made here; and it is the birthplace of the illustrious painter Raphael. It was taken Tartars are divided into several tribes, governed by their respective khans, or princes. When under one sovereign, they were the most powerful of all the Tartarian nations. The principal khans pride themselves in being descended from Tamerlane, whose birthplace was Samarcand, the present capital of the country. The Ubees, in their persons, are said to have better complexions and more engaging features than the Kalmees. Their religion is Mohamedan-ism; and they differ, in general, very little from the people of the northern provinces of Hindoostan.

Usedom, an island of Hither Pomerania, in the Baltic sea, between the mouths of the Peene and Swin, with two forts named after these two rivers. It has a town of the same name, on the sw coast, 40 m NW Stettin. Lon. 14 3 E. lat. 53 58 N.

Ushant, an island of France, on the coast of the department of Finisterre, opposite Conquet. It is 8 m in circuit, and contains several hamlets and a castle. Lon. 5 5 W, lat. 48 28 N.

Uslug, a town of Russia, in the government of Vologda, capital of a large province of its name, and an archbishop's see. Great quantities of grain are sent hence to different parts. It is seated on the Dwina, at the influx of the Sukhona, 464 m NE Moscow. Lon. 16 30 E, lat. 61 15 N.

Utawati, a river that forms part of the boundary line between Upper and Lower Canada, and enters the St. Lawrence at the island of Montreal. It issues from the lake Teniteamin, and has a course of above 300 miles, in which are several rapids and falls.

Utrecht, one of the provinces of Holland, 30 m long and 20 broad; bounded on the N by Holland and the Zuider zee, E and S by Gelderland, and W by Holland. The soil is fertile, and there are no inundations to fear as in the other provinces.

Utrecht, a fortified city of Holland, capital of a province of the same name, with a famous university. It is of a square form, about 3 m in circumference, without its four suburbs, which are considerable. The inhabitants are estimated at 20,000. The steeple of the cathedral is very high, and the handsomest in Holland. There is a great number of churches and hospitals; and the townhouse is a noble building. The principal manufactures are silk and firearms; and in a place called the Mall is an extensive foundery for cannon balls. Two canals, called the New Graft and the Vaert, pass through the city, and over them are 36 stone bridges. The environs are full of gardens, walks, and groves, which, added to the purity of the air, render Utrecht one of the most agreeable places for residence in these parts. Here the union of the Seven United Provinces was begun in 1579; and here was concluded, in 1713, the peace which terminated the wars of queen Ann. Utrecht surrendered to the Prussians in 1787, and to the French in 1795, each time without resistance. It is seated on the Rhine, 18 m SE Amsterdam, and 35 NNW Nimeguen. Lon. 5 8 E, lat. 52 6 N.

Utrera, a town of Spain, in Andalusia, near which is a salt spring, 12 m SE Seville.

churches, and an ancient stone bridge over the Calder, on which Edward IV erected a chapel, to the memory of his father, who lost his life in the battle near this place, in 1460. Here are considerable manufactures of woollen cloth and stuffs, and a hall for the sale of the goods; also a free grammar school, which has several exhibitions to both the universities. The number of inhabitants was 8131 in 1801, and 8593 in 1811. It is 28 m SW York, and 184 NNW London.

Walachia, a province of Turkey in Europe, 175 m long and 125 broad; bounded on the N by Transylvania, E by Moldavia, S by the river Danube, which separates it from Bulgaria, and W by Hungary. It is watered by numerous rivers, abounds in good horses and cattle, has mines of several kinds, and produces wine, oil, and all manner of European fruits. It was ceded to the Turks by the treaty of Belgrade, in 1739. The inhabitants are chiefly of the Greek church. It is governed by a waywode or prince, styled also the hospodar, who is a vassal of the empire. Bucharest is the capital.

Waladia, a town of Morocco, with a very spacious harbour, but the entrance is obstructed by rocks. It stands on an extensive plain which produces every necessary and luxury of life, 130 m WNW Morocco. Lon. 8 25 W, lat. 31 56 N.

Walcheren, an island of Holland, the principal one of Zealand, and the most westerly, at the mouth of the Scheidt. It is 9 m long and 8 broad, and being low is subject to inundations, but has good arable and pasture lands. In 1809, the English sent an immense armament to take this island, as a primary object, in which they succeeded; but the expedition returned without attempting any other design. The capital of this island, and of the whole province, is Middleburg.

Walcour, a town of the Netherlands, in the county of Namur. In 1615, it was entirely destroyed by fire. The French attempted to take it in 1689, but were compelled to retire, with great loss. It is seated on the Heura, 27 m SW Namur.

Walzburg, a castle of Suabia, which gives name to a county, between the Danube and the Ilser. It stands on a mountain, 7 m N Waagen, and 38 S by W Ulm.

Waldeck, a county of Germany, in the circle of Upper Rhine, 30 m long and 24 broad; bounded on the E and S by Lower Hesse, W by the duchy of Westphalia, and N by the principality of Paderborn. It is a mountainous country, covered with woods; and has mines of iron, copper, quicksilver, and alum. Corbach is the capital.

Walden, or Saffron Walden, a town in Essex, governed by a mayor, with a market on Saturday, and a trade in malt. It has a fine large church, and stands on a hill, among fields that were formerly cultivated with saffron. The keep of its ancient castle is still to be seen. It is 27 m NNW Chelmsford, and 42 N by E London.

Waldenburg, a town and castle of Upper Saxony, in Misnia, situate on the Muldau. The old town, on the opposite side of the river, is famous for brown and white earthen ware. It is 12 m NNE Zwickau.

Waldenburg, a town of Franconia, in the principality of Hohenlohe, with an ancient castle on a mountain, 6 m E by N Ohringen.

Waldheim, a town of Upper Saxony, in Misnia. Here was formerly a monastery, now converted into an orphan house and house of correction, in which various manufactures are carried on. It is situate on the Zschopa, 30 m SE Leipzig.

Waldkirch, a town of Suabia, in Brigau, on the river Eltz, 6 m NNE Friburg.

Waldmunchen, a town of the palatinate of Bavaria, on the river Schwarz, 32 m ESE Amberg.

Waldoborough, a town of the district of Main, in Lincoln county, 16 m E Wiseport.

Waldsassen, a town of the palatinate of Bavaria, near which is a rich Cistercian abbey, whose abbot was formerly a prince of the empire. It is 44 m NNE Amberg.

Waldsee, a town of Suabia, with a castle, 10 m NNE Ravensburg.

Waldsbut, a strong town of Suabia, one of the four Forest towns; seated on the Rhine, at the entrance of the Black forest, 19 m WSW Schaffhausen.

Waldstadt, a name given to the Swiss cantons of Lucern, Uri, Schwytz, and Unterwalden. It signifies Forest Towns; these cantons containing a great number of forests. For the Waldstadt of Suabia, see Forest Towns.

Waldstadter See, or Lake of the Four Cantons, one of the finest lakes in Switerland. It consists of three principal branches, called the lakes of Lucern, Schweiz, and Uri. The upper branch, or lake of Lucern, stretches from Kuffnacht to Dullenwal, a village near Stantz. It is bounded toward the town by cultivated hills, sloping gradually to the water, contrasted on the opposite side by an enormous mass of barren and craggy rocks; Mount Pilate, one of the highest mountains in Swisserland, rising boldly from the lake. Toward the E of this branch, the lake contracts into a narrow creek, scarcely a mile across. Soon after, it again widens, and forms the second branch, or lake of Schweiz; having on the w side the canton of Underwalden, and on the E that of Schweiz. Here the mountains are more lofty, and infinitely varied; some covered to the summits with verdure, others perpendicular and craggy. Near Brumen, commences the third branch, or lake of Uri, which takes a SE direction. It is deep and narrow, about 9 m long, and bordered on both sides by rocks uncommonly wild and romantic, with forests of beech and pine growing down their sides to the very edge of the water. The river Reufs flows through this lake.

Wales, a principality in the w of England, 120 m long and 80 broad; bounded on the N by the Irish sea, w by that sea and St. George channel, S by the Bristol channel, and E by the counties of Chester, Salop, Hereford, and Monmouth. It contains 8125 square m, or 5,200,000 acres. The number of inhabitants was 541,546 in 1801, and 611,788 in 1811, exclusive of the army and navy, for which a thirtieth part may be added. It is divided into North and South Wales, each containing six counties; namely, Anglesey, Carnarvon, Denbigh, Flint, Merioneth, and Montgomery, in N Wales; Brecknock, Cardigan, Carmarthen, Glamorgan, Pembroke, and Radnor, in S Wales. It is the country to which the ancient Britons fled, when Great Britain was invaded by the Saxons. They are now called Welsh, and continue to preserve their own language. They were long governed by independent kings, till the reign of Edward I, their last prince, Llewellyn, being vanquished and slain in the year 1283, the country was united to England. The natives submitted to the English dominion with extreme reluctance; and Edward, as a conciliatory means, promised to give them for their prince a Welshman by birth, and one who could speak no other language. This notice being received with joy, he invested in the principality his second son, Edward, then an infant, who had been born at Carnarvon. The death of his eldest son, Alphonso, happening soon after, young Edward became heir also of the English monarchy, and united both nations under one government; but some ages elapsed, before the animosity which had long subsisted between them was totally extinguished. From the time of Edward II, the eldest son of the king of England has always been created prince of Wales. The country is mountainous, but not barren, producing all the necessaries of life; the cattle and sheep are numerous, but small, and it is particularly famous for goats. It is watered by many rivers, the principal of which, and other particulars, are noted in the different counties.

Wales, New North and South, a large country of New Britain, lying w and sw of Hudson bay, and little known. See Britain, New.

Wales, New South, a name given to the E coast of New Holland. It was first explored by captain Cook, in 1770; and a design was formed, in consequence of his recommendation, to settle a colony of convicts at Botany bay. Captain Philip being appointed governor of the intended settlement, sailed in 1787, with a detachment of marines, and 778 convicts, of which 220 were women. He arrived at Botany bay, early in 1788; but finding this bay ineligible for a colony, he fixed upon Port Jackson, 13 m further to the N; and here a settlement was begun, to which he gave the name of Sydney Cove. With respect to the country, a vast chain of lofty mountains, named the Blue Mountains, about 40 m inland, runs nearly in a N and S direction further than the eye can reach. The general face of it is diversified with gentle risings and small winding valleys, covered, for the most part, with large spreading trees, which afford a succession of leaves in all seasons; and a variety of flowering shrubs, almost all new to an European, abound in those places which are free from trees. The climate is variable, yet very healthy; the heat is never excessive in summer, nor the cold intolerable in winter; storms of thunder and lightning are frequent, but the atmosphere is generally bright and clear; ice is very seldom seen, and no snow has yet appeared except on the highest ridges of the remoter mountains. The quadrupeds are principally of the op-possum kind, of remarkable size. The dogs are extremely fierce, and be brought to the most familiarity as those with. There are several eaters; with the duck-billed platy of a quadruped complete bill of many beautiful among which the swan, its wings bill tinged with r cassowary, which height of seven kinds of serpents scelopendras, have and three or four particularly green are nests upon trees. There are likewise though the finny so plentiful here in higher latitudes been seen in the rivers and salt cators. possum kind, of which the most remarkable is the kangaroo. The native dogs are extremely fierce, and cannot be brought to the same degree of familiarity as those we are acquainted with. There are also weasels and ant-eaters; with that singular animal the duck-billed platypus, in which the jaws of a quadruped are elongated into the complete bill of a bird. There are many beautiful birds of various kinds; among which the principal is a black swan, its wings edged with white, its bill tinged with red; and the ostrich or cassowary, which frequently reaches the height of seven feet or more. Several kinds of serpents, large spiders, and scolopendras, have also been met with; and three or four species of ants, particularly green ants, which build their nests upon trees in a singular manner. There are likewise many curious fishes; though the finny tribe seem not to be so plentiful here as they generally are in higher latitudes. Some sharks have been seen in Port Jackson, and in the rivers and salt creeks there are alligators. The natives of New South Wales are represented as, perhaps, the most savage race of people existing. They go entirely naked; and though pleased at first with some ornaments that were given them, they soon threw them away as useless. Some of them, whom the colonists partly clothed, seemed to be pleased with the comfortable warmth they derived from it; and they all expressed a great desire for iron tools. The colour of the natives is rather a deep chocolate than a full black; but the filth with which their skin is covered, prevents its true colour from appearing. Notwithstanding their disregard for European finery, they are fond of adorning their bodies with scars; so that some of them make a very hideous figure: sometimes, the skin is raised considerably from the flesh, and appears as if filled with wind: and all these seem to be reckoned marks of honour. Some of them perforate the cartilage of the nose, and thrust a bone through it, as a kind of ornament. Their hair is generally clotted with a red gum; and they paint themselves with various colours: they will also sometimes ornament themselves with beads and shells, but make no use of the beautiful feathers of their birds. Most of the men want one of the foreteeth in the upper jaw, which appears to be a badge of honour among them; and it is common for the women to cut off two joints of the little finger. The New Hollanders appear extremely deficient in the useful arts. Of the cultivation of the ground they have no notion; that they depend for subsistence on the fruits and roots they can gather, and the animals and fish they catch. They frequently set fire to the grass, in order to drive out the opossums, and other animals, from their retreats; and they set decoys for quails: but these resources being precarious, they are frequently distressed for provisions. There is no good reason for supposing them to be cannibals; but they eat animal substances raw, or nearly so. Some of their vegetables are poisonous when raw, but not so when boiled; and they sometimes bake their provisions, by the help of hot stones. Among the fruits used by them is a kind of wild fig; and they eat also the kernels of a fruit resembling the pineapple. The principal part of their subsistence, however, is fish. They sometimes strike the fish from their canoes with spears, sometimes catch them with hooks, and also make use of nets, which are generally made of the fibres of the flax plant, with very little preparation, and are strong and heavy; the lines of which they are composed being twisted like whipcord. Some of them, however, appear to be made of the fur of an animal, and others of cotton. The meshes of the nets are made of large loops artificially inserted into each other, without any knots. Their hooks are made of the inside of a shell very much resembling the mother-of-pearl. Their canoes are nothing more than large pieces of bark tied up at both ends with vines; and, considering the slight texture of these vessels, the dexterity with which they are managed, and the boldness with which they venture out to sea in them, are wonderful. Their huts consist of pieces of bark laid together in the form of an oven, open at one end, very low, but long enough for a man to lie at full length; but they seem to depend more for shelter on the caverns with which the rocks abound. In some things they possess a great power of imitation: they can imitate the songs and language of the Europeans almost instantaneously, much better than the latter can imitate theirs by long practice. This talent is also discernable in their sculptures, every where to be met with on the rocks: these represent men and other animals, and, though rude, are very surprising for people who have not the knowledge of constructing a comfortable habitation, or of making clothes. In person they are active, vigorous, and stout, though generally lean. The women have sometimes been kept back with the most jealous sensibility, sometimes offered with the greatest familiarity. Such of them as have been seen have soft and pleasing voices; and seem not to be destitute of modesty. The men display great personal bravery on the appearance of any danger; but, with all their courage, they are much afraid of a musket. They certainly burn their dead; which, perhaps, has given rise to the story of their being cannibals. They seem very little given to thieving, in comparison with the inhabitants of most of the islands in the Southern ocean; but they are ever ready to commit depredations on the Indian corn, whenever there is a probability of their attempts proving successful. They are very expert at throwing their javelins, and will hit a mark at a considerable distance. Their number seems to be few, in comparison to the extent of the country: and there is reason to believe that the interior parts are uninhabited. The jealousy of the Europeans, which originally excited, has now entirely vanished; but the proximity of a civilized colony has not tended in the least to polish their native rudeness and barbarism. The British settlement here has continued to flourish and extend from its first establishment at Sydney. In 1809, the population was 9356; of which number above two-thirds maintain themselves, and the rest are victualled and clothed at the expense of the crown. Most men of a trade or profession pursue their calling; and labourers are either employed by settlers to cultivate their lands, and in various occupations, or work in different gangs, where they can be serviceable. The land in cultivation at that time was 6887 acres of wheat, 3389 of maize, 534 of barley, 93 of oats, 101 of pease and beans, 301 of potatoes, 13 of turnips, 546 of orchard and garden, 35 of flax, hemp, and hops: and the live stock, consisting of horses, beeves, sheep, goats, and pigs, were become very numerous. Coal of a very fine quality is procured with little trouble; but the most prizable subjects yet discovered are valuable stones, of which the white and yellow topazes are of greater worth than those produced in Brasil. The jurisdiction of the governor of New S Wales extends from 10 37 to 43 49 s lat. From the seacoast it extends westward to 135 E lon. and thence proceeding in an east-

Warsaw, a city of Poland, lately the metropolis of that country, and in the palatinate of Masovia. It is built partly on a plain, and partly on a gentle rise from the Vistula; extending, with the suburbs of Kraka and Praga, over a vast extent of ground, and containing above 66,000 inhabitants. The streets are spacious, but ill paved; the churches and public buildings, large and magnificent; the palaces of the nobility, numerous and splendid; but the greatest part of the houses, particularly in the suburbs, are mean wooden hovels. Early in 1794, the empress of Russia put a garrison into this city, in order to attain the usurpations she had in view; but it was expelled by the citizens. The king of Prussia besieged Warsaw in July, but was compelled to raise the siege in September. It was undertaken by the Russians, who, in November, took by storm the suburb of Praga, massacred the inhabitants, and nearly reduced it to ashes. The immediate consequence was the surrender of the city to the Russians, who, in 1796, delivered it up to the king of Prussia. Toward the end of 1806 the French occupied this place; and by the treaty of Tilsit, the city, and this part of Poland, was given to Saxony, to be held under the title of the duchy of Warsaw. Washington, a city and the metropolis of the United States of America, in the territory of Columbia. It is seated on the Potomac, at the junction of the Eastern branch, extending about 4 m up each river, including a tract of country scarcely to be exceeded in point of convenience and salubrity by any in the world. This city, in 1792, was established by the United States, to be the permanent seat of government, after the year 1800. It is divided into squares or grand divisions by streets running due N and S, and E and W; which form the ground-work of the plan; but from the capitol, the president's house, and some of the important areas in the city, run diagonal streets, from one material object to another, which produce a variety of prospects. The great leading streets are 160 feet wide; including a pavement of 10 feet and a gravel walk of 30 feet planted with trees on each side, and 80 feet of paved street in the middle for carriages. The other streets are, in general, 110 feet wide, with a few only 90 feet, except North, South, and Capitol streets, which are 160 feet. The diagonal streets are named after the states composing the Union, while those running N and S are from the capitol eastward, named East First-street, East Second-street, &c. and those W of it are, in the same manner, called West First-street, West Second-street, &c. Those running E and W are, from the capitol northward, named North A-street, North B-street, &c. and those S of it are called South A-street, South B-street, &c. The squares, or divisions of the city, amount to 1150: the rectangular ones contain from three to six acres; and are divided into lots of from 40 to 80 feet in front, and their depth from 110 to 300, according to the size of them; but the irregular divisions, produced by the diagonal streets, are some of them small. All the houses must be of brick or stone. The area for the capitol (or house for the legislative bodies) is on an eminence, about a mile from the Eastern branch, and not much more from the Potomac, commanding a view of the city and of the country round. The president's house is on a rising ground, not far from the Potomac, possessing a delightful water prospect, and a view of the capitol. Due S from the president's house, and due W from the capitol, run two great pleasure parks or malls, which intersect and terminate upon the banks of the Potomac, and are to be ornamented at the sides by a variety of elegant buildings, houses for foreign ministers, &c. Interspersed through the city, where the most material streets cross each other, are a variety of open areas, formed in various regular figures; the best of these are appropriated to the different states composing the Union; not only to bear their respective names, but as proper places to erect statues, obelisks, or columns, to the memory of their celebrated men. Proper places are marked out for other public buildings; as a marine hospital, with its gardens; a general exchange, and its public walks; a fort, magazines, and arsenal; a city hall, churches, colleges, market-houses, theatre, &c. The Eastern branch is sufficiently deep for the largest ships, for 4 m above its junction with the Potomac, and the channel lies close along the edge of the city. The Potomac produces a communication by water between the city and the interior parts of Virginia and Maryland, by means of the Shannandoah, the South branch, Opocan, Cape Capon, Patterfon creek, Conocohegue, and Monocasy, for upward of 200 m through a healthy region, producing tobacco, hemp, maize, wheat, and other small grain, with fruits and vegetables in abundance. The lands upon the Potomac, above the city, all around it, and for 60 m below, are high and dry, abounding with springs of excellent water, and covered with timber trees of various kinds. A few m below the city, on the banks of the Potomac, are inexhaustible mountains of freestone, of which the public edifices are building; and above the city are immense quantities of excellent coal, limestone, marble, and blue slate. The Tyber, which is the principal stream that passes through the city, is to be collected in a grand reservoir, near the capitol, whence it will be carried in pipes to different parts of the city; while its surplus water will fall down in cascades, through the public gardens w of the capitol, into a canal. Since 1792, many workmen have been employed, but many years will be required to complete the plan. In 1800, after the adjournment of congress, at their last session in Philadelphia, the public offices, records, and property were removed to this city; and on the 22d of November, the congress assembled here for the first time. In 1810, the number of inhabitants in the city and its district was 24,023. [On August 24, 1814, a British military and naval force defeated the Americans near this place; then entered the city, set on fire the capitol, the president's house, other public edifices, the dock-yard, &c. and retreated the next day.] Washington is 144 m sw Philadelphia, the late capital of the United States. Wetzlar, a town of Germany, in Wetteravia, capital of a county of the same name. It was lately an imperial town, and is surrounded by ditches and walls flanked with towers. Near it stands the castle of Carlsmund, or Kalschmitt. In 1693, the imperial chamber was transferred hither from Spire, on account of the wars which ravaged the palatinate. It is seated at the conflux of the Lahn, Diffe, and Dillen, 30 m N Frankfort. Lon. 8 37 E, lat. 50 33 N.

Wexford, a county of Ireland, in the province of Munster, 38 m long and 24 broad; bounded on the N by Wicklow, E by St. George channel, S by the Atlantic ocean, W by Waterford and Kilkenny, and NW by Catherlough. It contains 109 parishes, sends four members to parliament, and is fertile in corn and grass. The principal rivers are the Barrow and Slaney.

Wexford, a borough of Ireland, capital of the county of the same name. It has a spacious harbour at the mouth of the Slaney, defended by two forts, but the water is not deep enough for large vessels to go up to the town. Over the river is a wooden bridge 1560 feet in length. Much woollen cloth is manufactured here and in the neighbourhood. The inhabitants are estimated at 9000;

Wexio, a town of Sweden, in Smoland, and the capital of a district. It is situate on the lake Helga, which contains a group of woody islands, 54 m wnw Calmar. Lon. 14 57 E, lat. 56 51 N.

Wey, a river that rises in Hampshire, flows through Surry by Godalming and Guildford, and enters the Thames, at Weybridge.

Weybridge, a village in Surry, seated on the Wey, near its entrance into the Thames, 2 m E Chertsey. Here is Woburn Farm, the plantations of which were the first specimens in England of the ornamented farm.

Weyhill, a village in Hampshire, 3 m w Andover, famous for an annual fair, lasting 10 days, for all kinds of cattle, leather, hops, cheese, and pedlary.

Weymes, a town of Scotland, in Fife-shire, with a harbour, whence much coal and salt are exported. It stands on the frith of Forth, 4 m NE Kirkaldy, and 12 s by w Cupar.

Weymouth, a seaport and borough in Dorsetshire, with a market on Tuesday and Friday. It stands on a bay of its name, in the English channel, and on the s side of the mouth of the Wey, which separates it from the borough of Melcomb Regis. The two boroughs are united as one corporation, governed by a mayor, and the communication between them is by means of a bridge. The harbour is injured by sand, that its trade is much reduced; but this is compensated by the great resort of persons for the purpose of sea-bathing; and the royal family have often honoured it with their residence. A few plain and striped cottons are made here; and it has a handsome battery, a royal assembly room, and an elegant theatre. In the church is a fine altar-piece, executed and presented by sir James Thornhill, who was born at Melcomb Regis. Near it, at the village of Nottingham, is a famous sulphureous spring. Weymouth is 9 m s Dorchester, and 128 wsw London. Lon. 2 34 w, lat. 50 40 N.

Weymouth, a town of Massachusetts, in Norfolk county, on the s side of Boston harbour, 14 m SE Boston.

Whalley, a village in Lancashire, 4 m s Clithero; noted for the ruins of its abbey, formerly of great note, on the bank of the Calder.

Wheeling, a town of Virginia, in Ohio county, which participates with Pittsburg in the trade to the western coun-

Whernside, the highest mountain in Yorkshire, situate amid other mountains, 12 m nww Settle. Its summit is 2384 feet above the level of the sea; and near the top are four or five tarns, or small lakes. Its extensive base contains several spacious caverns, of which the principal are the Yordas, Gatekirk, and Greenside caves.

Whidah, a country of Guinea, extending about 10 m along the Slave coast, and 12 m inland. Europeans who have been in this country extol it as the most beautiful in the world; and that spring and autumn reign in alternate succession. The country is so populous, that a single village contains as many inhabitants as some entire kingdoms on the coast of Guinea. The people, in their manners, have been compared to the Chinese: having the same persevering industry, ceremonious civility, jealous affection for their women, and thievish inclinations in trade. Bows, arrows, assagays, and clubs, are the principal weapons of the Whidanesse. They have no distinction of hours, days, weeks, or stated periods; and yet, without pen, ink, or the assistance of artificial arithmetic, they calculate any thing with great accuracy. They are said to have a faint idea of a Supreme Being, to whom they attribute omnipotence, and consider him as the Creator of the universe. He is, they say, too highly exalted to have any concern about his creatures; and the government of the world he leaves to the fetiches, to whom, therefore, they apply as the mediators between God and them. These fetiches are divided into three classes; snakes, tall trees, and the sea; and sometimes they add a fourth, namely, the chief river of the kingdom, the Euphrates. The deified snakes are about a yard long, amazingly tame and familiar; and no insult or injury can be offered to them by a native, under pain of death. Here are oxen, cows, goats, sheep, hogs, turkies, ducks, and hens; also elephants, buffalos, tigers, several kinds of deer, and a sort of hares. The fruits are citrons, lemons, oranges, bananas, tamarinds, &c. and there are vast numbers of palm-trees, from which much wine is made. The trade consists of slaves, elephants teeth, wax, and honey; and the chief manufactures are cloths, umbrellas, baskets, pitchers for pito or beer, plates and dishes of wood-gourds finely ornamented, white and blue paper, &c. In 1727, the king of

with a market on Saturday. It has a considerable manufacture of canvas, and a great traffic in the building of ships, and in the carrying business. In the neighbourhood are some large alum works. Its harbour is the best on this coast, and has a fine pier; but it has no river communication with the inland country. Several ships are sent hence to the Greenland fishery. In 1787, a strong new-built quay, running parallel to a high cliff, fell into the sea, followed by large masses of the cliff. The remains of an abbey church stood on this cliff; and since the above accident several parts have fallen to the ground.
Whitby is the birthplace of James Cook, the great circumnavigator. The number of inhabitants was 7483 in 1801, and 6969 in 1811. It is seated on the German ocean, at the mouth of the Esk, 48 m NNE York, and 243 N London.
Lon. 0 30 w, lat. 54 30 N.

Whitchurch, a borough in Hampshire, with a market on Friday, and a manufacture of shaloons and serges. It is seated on the Test, near its source, 12 m N Winchester, and 56 w by s London.

Whitchurch, a town in Shropshire, with a market on Friday, 20 m N
Shrewsbury, and 160 NW London.

White Mountains, the highest part of a ridge of mountains, in the state of New Hampshire, extending from NE to sw. Their height above an adjacent meadow is 5500 feet; and the meadow is 3500 feet above the level of the sea.
They are covered with snow and ice nine months in the year; and during that time exhibit the bright appearance from which they are denominated the White Mountains. Although 70 m inland, they are seen many leagues off at sea, and appear like a bright cloud in the horizon. Their highest summit is in lat. 44 N.

White Sea, a large bay of the Frozen ocean, on the coast of Russia, on the E side of which stands the city of Archangel.

Whitehaven, a seaport in Cumberland, with a market on Tuesday. It is seated on a creek of the Irish sea, on the N end of a great hill, washed by the tide on the w side, where there is a large whitish rock, and a strong stone wall that secures the harbour. Near it are many coal mines, some of which run a considerable way under the sea, and are the great source of its wealth; but its trade is now extended to foreign parts.

A packet-boat sails hence weekly to Douglas, in the isle of Man. Here are six yards for ship-building, an extensive canvas manufacture, three large rope-ries, and several copperas works. The town is defended by batteries, and has three neat churches. The number of inhabitants was 8742 in 1801, and 10,106 in 1811. It is 37 m sw Carlisle, and 294 NNW London. Lon. 3 35 w,

Whitchorn, a borough of Scotland, in Wigtonshire, near the bay of Wigton.
It is a place of great antiquity, having been a Roman station, and the first bishopric in Scotland. Here are several cotton manufactures, a considerable tannery, and quarries of fine variegated marble. It is 11 m s Wigton.

Whitfort, a town of New York, in Herkimer county, on the s side of the Mohawk, between Old and New Fort Schuyler, 30 m wnw Canajohary.

Whitstable, a village on the coast of Kent, 7 m NNW Canterbury. It is a small port, whence Canterbury is supplied with coal, and has several trading vessels to London.

Hebrides, in the Pacific ocean. It is 30 m long and 8 broad, and was discovered by captain Wallis, on Whitfunday, 1767.
Lon. 168 20 E, lat. 15 44 S.

Whittington, a village in Derbyshire,
3 m N Chesterfield. It is famous for a thatched cottage, in the upper story of which the glorious revolution of 1688 was planned; and on Nov. 4. 1788, the hundredth anniversary of that auspicious day was celebrated here, by the descendants of the illustrious leaders, and a numerous gentry.

Whittlebury Forest, a forest in the N part of Northamptonshire, 9 m long and 3 broad. In 1685, the first duke of Grafton was appointed hereditary ranger of this forest, in which is a fine seat, called Wakefield Lodge.

Wiblingen, a town of Suabia, with a Benedictine abbey, seated near the conflux of the Iller with the Danube, 3 m ssw Ulm.

Wiburg, or Viborg, a government of Russia, formerly Russian Finland, and comprised in Kexholm and Carelia. It was ceded by the Swedes to the Russians, partly by the peace of Nyfstadt in 1721, and partly by the treaty of Abo in 1743. Beside pasture, the country produces rye, oats, and barley, but not sufficient for the inhabitants. In the governor's court, business is transacted in the Swedish, German, and Russian tongues. Lutheranism is the established religion; but Greek worship has been introduced by the Russians.

Wiburg, a fortified seaport of Russia, capital of a government of the same name, and a bishop's see with a strong citadel. The houses are almost entirely built of stone. The chief exports are planks, tallow, pitch, and tar. In 1793, it was almost destroyed by fire. The surrounding country is pleasant; and near it, at Imatra, is the famous cataract of the Woxa, which makes a noise more stunning than that of the Rhine at Lauffen. Wiburg stands on the NE point of the gulf of Finland, 110 m NNW Petersburg. Lon. 29 10 E, lat. 60 56 N.

Wiburg, a city of Denmark, in N Jutland, capital of a diocese of the same name, and the seat of the chief court of justice in the province. In 1726, a fire burnt the cathedral, a church, the townhouse, and the bishop's palace; but they have all been magnificently rebuilt. It is seated on a lake, in a peninsula, 95 m N Sleswick. Lon. 9 50 E, lat. 56 20 N.

Wick, a borough of Scotland, and the capital of Caithness, with a harbour on an inlet of the German ocean, at the mouth of a river of the same name. Much kelp is made here, but the fisheries are the chief objects of importance. The number of inhabitants was 3986 in 1801, and 5080 in 1811. It is 55 m NE Dornoch. Lon. 2 51 W, lat. 58 21 N.

Wick, a fortified town of the Netherlands, in the duchy of Limburg, seated on the Meuse, opposite Maestricht, with which it communicates by a bridge.

Wick Duerstede; see Duerstede.

Wickerad, a town of France, in the department of Roer, lately of Germany, in the duchy of Juliers, with two castles, 12 m N Juliers.

Wickford, a town of Rhode Island, in Washington county, on the W side of Narraganset bay, opposite the N end of Canonicut island, 10 m NW Newport, and 20 S Providence.

Wicklow, a county of Ireland, in the province of Leinster, 33 m long and 20 broad; bounded on the N by Dublin, E by the Irish sea, S by Wexford, W by Catherlough and Kildare, and SW by Kildare. It is divided into 58 parishes, has about 58,000 inhabitants, and sends two members to parliament. It is very mountainous and woody, interspersed with rocks and bogs; but the valleys are fertile, well cultivated, and watered by small rivers.

Wicklow, a borough of Ireland, capital of the county of the same name. It is seated on the Irish sea, with a narrow harbour, at the mouth of the river Leirtrim, 28 m SSE Dublin. Lon. 6 12 W, lat. 52 58 N.

Wickwar, a town in Gloucestershire, governed by a mayor, with a market on Monday, 17 m NE Bristol, and 111 W London.

Widdin, a fortified town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, and an archbishop's see. It has often been taken and retaken by the Austrians and Turks. It is seated on the Danube, 100 m N by W Soffa, and 140 ESE Belgrade. Lon. 24 27 E, lat. 44 12 N.

Wied, a county of Westphalia, at the conflux of the rivers Wied and Rhine. It is composed of two parts, the upper county, or Wied-Runkel, and the lower county, or Wied-Neuwied, each governed by its own count; and the former, in 1791, was raised to the rank of a prince of the empire. The capitals are Dierdorf and Neuwied.

Wied, a town of Westphalia, in the lower country of Wied, with an ancient decayed castle on a mountain, 9 m NNW Coblenz.

Wielun, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Siradia, with a good castle, 16 m S Siradia.

Wielitka, a village of Poland, in the palatinate of Cracow, celebrated for its salt mines, 8 m SE Cracow. In these mines are several small chapels, excavated in the salt; and most of the inhabitants reside chiefly in the mines.

Weissensteig, a town of Suabia, capital of a lordship, with a castle; seated on the river Fils, in a valley enclosed by mountains, 16 m WNW Ulm, and 25 SE Stuttgart.

Weisenthal, a town of Upper Saxony, in Misnia, with manufactures of iron, steel, and fire-arms, and a considerable trade in leather. It stands on a rivulet of the same name, on the frontiers of Bohemia, 15 m N by E Carlsbad.

Wigan, a borough in Lancashire, governed by a mayor, with a market on Monday and Friday. It has a manufacture of strong checks, and other articles of linen and cotton. Braziery has long been a staple article; and there is a large pottery of fine ware. The number of inhabitants was 10,989 in 1801, and 14,060 in 1811. In the neighbourhood are very extensive iron-works; a mineral spring, of a somewhat similar nature with that of Harrowgate; and plenty of that species of coal, called Cannel, of which snuff-boxes and a

Wight, an island in the English channel, on the coast of Hampshire, to which county it belongs. The strait that separates it from the mainland is of unequal breadth, being about a mile over toward the western, and 7 m at the eastern extremity. The form of the island is somewhat like a lozenge, with its angles toward the four cardinal points. It is 21 m from E to W, and 13 from N to S; and is divided into two parts by the river Medina or Cowes, which rises in the southern angle, and enters the sea at the northern, at the town of Cowes, opposite the mouth of Southampton bay. The SE coast is edged with very steep cliffs of chalk and freestone, hollowed into caverns in various parts; and vast fragments of rocks are scattered along the shore. The SW side is fenced with lofty ridges of rocks, and the W extremity of them is called the Needles, from the slender form and erect position of two of them, one of which lately fell into the sea. Between the island and the mainland are various sandbanks, especially off the eastern part, where is the safe road of St. Helens. Across the island, from E to W, runs a ridge of fine downs, which feed a great number of fine fleeced sheep; rabbits and poultry are also very plentiful, and vipers are caught in large numbers for medicinal purposes. To the N of this ridge the land is chiefly pasture; to the S of it is a rich arable country, producing great crops of corn. The variety of prospects which this island affords, its mild air, and the neat manner in which the fields are laid out, renders it a very delightful spot. It is devoted almost solely to husbandry, and is one of the principal resourcers of the London market for barley. Among its products are a pure white pipe clay, and a fine white chrystalline sand; of the latter great quantities are exported for the use of the glass-works in various parts. In 1811 the number of inhabitants was 24,120. The principal town is the borough of Newport; and it likewise contains the boroughs of New-

Wigton, a town in Cumberland, with a market on Tuesday, and manufactures of coarse linen and cotton; seated among the moors, 12 m SW Carlisle, and 304 NNW London.

Wigton, a borough and seaport of Scotland, capital of Wigtonshire. On the S side, near the mouth of the Bladenoch, are the vestiges of an ancient castle; and to the SE is a great morass, called the Moss of Cree. Here are manufactures of woollen and cotton, the former chiefly of plaids and flannel. The number of inhabitants was 1475 in 1801, and 1711 in 1811. It is situate on a hill, which overlooks the bay of Wigton, 90 m SW Edinburgh. Lon. 4 23 W, lat. 54 57 N.

Wigtonshire, or West Galloway, a county of Scotland, bounded on the N by Ayrshire, NE by Kircudbrightshire, and on all other sides by the Irish sea. The greatest extent in any direction does not exceed 30 m, and its figure is very irregular. It is divided into 17 parishes, and sends a member to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 22,918 in 1801, and 26,891 in 1811. The bays of Luce and Ryan extend inland, forming by their approximation a peninsula, called the Rhyns of Galloway. The principal rivers are the Luce, Cree, and Bladenoch. The coast is tolerably fertile; but the interior and northern parts are mountainous, fit only for the pasturage of sheep and bees.

Wilhars, a frontier town of European Turkey, in Bosnia, seated on a lake formed by the river Una, 40 m SE Carlsbad, and 220 W Belgrade. Lon. 16 10 E, lat. 45 34 N.

this place. It is situate on the N side of Christiana creek, 2 m w of the river Delaware, and 28 sw Philadelphia. Lon. 75 40 W, lat. 39 43 N.

Wilmslow, a town in Cheshire, with a market on Saturday, seated on the Bolin, 13 m N Congleton, and 174 NW London.

Wilna, the capital of Lithuania, in a palatinate of the same name, and a bishop's see, with a university, an ancient castle, and a royal palace. It stands on several little eminences, and has two considerable suburbs called Antokollo and Rudaiska. Here are upward of 40 churches; and the magnificent one belonging to the castle has a very rich treasury. In 1748, a conflagration destroyed 13 churches; and in 1749, another fire happened by lightning, which consumed six churches: beside these, the Jewish synagogue, the council-house, 33 palaces, numerous stone edifices and other buildings were destroyed. The churches have been rebuilt, and some of them in a more elegant manner than before; but the city has not recovered its former grandeur. Wilna was taken by the Russians in 1794, and with its territory annexed to that empire. In 1812, it was entered by Bonaparte in his progress to Russia: on his return, and flight from Molodegno, he reentered it Dec. 1, but immediately fled again in disguise for France; and on the 11th the city was retaken by the Russians. It is seated on the Wilia, 180 m E Konigsberg, and 240 NE Warsaw. Lon. 25 28 E, lat. 54 41 N.

Wilsdorf, a town of Upper Saxony, in Misnia, near which, in 1745, the Saxons were defeated by the Prussians. It is 9 m W Dresden.

Wilznach, a town of Brandenburg, in the mark of Pregnitz, 14 m SW Havelberg.

Wilscowitz, a town of Moravia, in the circle of Hradisch, 15 m ENE Hradisch.

Wilser, a town of Lower Saxony, in Holstein, 10 m N Gluckstadt.

Wilton, a borough in Wiltshire, governed by a mayor, with a market on Wednesday, and a manufacture of carpets and thin woollen stuffs. It was formerly the capital of the county, but is now much reduced. Here is Wilton-house, the magnificent seat of the earl of Pembroke, in which is a celebrated collection of antiques. It is seated between the rivers Willy and Nadder, 3 m W by N Salisbury, and 85 W by S London.

Wiltshire, a county of England, bounded on the E by Berkshire and Hampshire, S by Hampshire and Dorsetshire, W by Somersetshire, and NW and N by Gloucestershire. It is 53 m long and 38 broad, containing 841,120 acres; is divided into 28 hundreds, and 302 parishes; has one city and 23 market-towns; and sends 34 members to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 185,107 in 1801, and 193,828 in 1811. The air is sharp on the hills in winter, but is mild during that season in the vales. The land in the N parts is generally hilly and woody, but very fertile; here being made that kind of cheese which is so much esteemed as North Wiltshire. In the S it is rich and fertile. In the middle it chiefly consists of downs, that afford the best pasture for sheep; and in the vallies, which divide the downs, are corn-fields and rich meadows. The chief commodities are sheep, wool, wood, and stone; of this last there are excellent quarries on the banks of the Nadder, where some of the stones are 23 yards in length, and four in thickness, without a flaw. The chief manufactures are the different branches of the clothing-trade. The principal rivers are the Upper and Lower Avon, the Nadder, Willy, Bourn, and Kennet. Salisbury is the capital.

Wimbledon, a village in Surry, on an elevated heath, 7 m SW London. It has copper mills, a manufacture for printing callicos, and another of japan ware. On the SW angle of the common is a circular encampment, including seven acres; the trench deep and perfect.

Wimborn, or Wimborn Minster, a town in Dorsetshire, with a market on Friday. It had a monastery, in which were interred the W Saxon kings Etheldred and Sigeworth, and queen Ethelburga. Its noble church, called the Minster, was formerly collegiate. It is seated between the Stour and Allen, 6 m N Poole, and 100 SW London.

Wimmerby, a town of Sweden, in Smoland, 28 m SW Westerwick.

Wimmis, a town of Swisserland, in the canton of Bern, seated on the Sibnen, 18 m S Bern.

Wimpfen, a town of Suabia, lately imperial. It consists of two towns, called Wimpfen on the Hill and Wimpfen in the Vale: in the former is a Lutheran parish church, and a grammar school; and in the latter is a catholic abbey, and a monastery. A salt-work was established here in 1761. It is seated on the Neckar, 8 m N Heilbron, and 22 E Heidelberg.

Wincaunton, a town in Somersetshire, with a market on Wednesday, and a manufacture of ticking and douglas; seated on the side of a hill, 24 m s Bath, and 108 w by a London.

Winchcomb, a town in Gloucestershire, with a market on Saturday. It was formerly noted for its abbey, whose ruined abbot sat in parliament. Near it is the ruin of Sudeley castle, where Catharine Parr, queen of Henry VIII, and afterward wife to sir Thomas Seymour, died in childbed, not without suspicion of poison. Winchcomb is seated in a bottom, 15 m NE Gloucester, and 69 WNW London.

Winchelsea, a town in Sussex, an appendage to the cinque ports, governed by a mayor, with a market on Saturday. It was built in the reign of Edward I, about 3 m from the place where a more ancient town of the same name had been swallowed up by the sea. The new town being sacked by the French and Spaniards, and deserted by the sea, dwindled to a mean place. Three of the gates are yet standing, but much decayed; and the haven is now choked up. On the level relinquished by the sea, which is kept out by expensive works, and 2 m ENE of the town, is Camber castle, built by Henry VIII. Winchelsea is seated on a rocky cliff, on an inlet of the sea, 4 m SW Rye, and 64 SE London.

Winchester, a city in Hampshire, governed by a mayor, with a market on Wednesday and Saturday. The walls, which are greatly decayed, are a mile and a half in circuit, and through them are four gates. Here are eight churches, beside the cathedral, in which were interred several Saxon kings and queens, whose bones were collected by bishop Fox, put into six small gilded coffins, and placed on a wall in the s side of the choir. In this cathedral also is the marble coffin of William Rufus. On a fine eminence overlooking the city, stood the castle, which was taken from Charles I, and afterward demolished, except the magnificent hall, in which the assizes are now held. Near the site of this castle is the shell of a palace, built by Charles II, but never finished: it is now converted into a barrack for 1800 infantry, and the wings fitted up for the officers. Near this place is St. Mary's College, founded by William of Wykeham, for a warden, 70 scholars, 10 fellows, &c. with exhibitions for New College, Oxford; and contiguous to it is a spacious quadrangular edifice for commoners or gentlemen not on the foundation. Near the s end of the city is the hospital of St. Cross, founded by a bishop of this see, for a master, nine poor brethren, and four out-pensioners. All travellers, who call at this hospital, have a right to demand some bread and beer, which is always brought to them. Near the s gate of the city is St. John's hospital, in the hall of which the corporation give their entertainments. Winchester was of great note in the time of the Saxons, and here Egbert was crowned the first sole monarch of England. Here Henry II held a parliament, king John resided, Henry III was born, Richard II held a parliament, and Henry IV was married, as was also Mary I. The number of inhabitants was 5826 in 1801, and 6705 in 1811. It is seated on the Itchen, which is navigable hence to Southampton, 21 m NW Chichester, and 62 w by N London. Lon. 1 12 w, lat. 51 4 N.

Winchester, a town of Virginia, capital of Frederic county. It has four edifices for public worship, and stands near the head of Opeckon creek, which flows into the Potomac, 80 m WNW Alexandria. Lon. 78 34 E, lat. 39 15 N.

Windau, a seaport of the duchy of Courland, with a castle. The exports are pitch, tar, wax, &c. and some ships are built here. It stands at the mouth of a river of the same name, in the Baltic, 76 m NW Mitau, and 100 N by E Memel. Lon. 21 50 E, lat. 57 15 N.

Windermere, or Winandermere, the most extensive lake in England, lying between Westmorland and Lancashire. It extends 12 m from N to S, but in no part broader than a mile; and is famous for fine char, and abundance of trout, perch, pike, and eel. The principal feeders are the rivers Rothay and Brathay, and its outlet is the river Leven. This lake is frequently intersected by promontories, and spotted with islands. Among these, the Holme, or Great Island, an oblong tract of 30 acres, crosses the lake in an oblique line, furnished by a number of inferior isles, finely wooded.

Windham, a town of Connecticut, capital of the county of its name. It is seated on the Shetucket, 14 m NNW Norwich, and 22 ESE Hartford. Lon. 72 10 W, lat. 41 45 N.

Lauter, at its conflux with the Neckar, 12 m SE Stutgard.

Windbach, a town and castle of Suabia, in the margravate of Anspach, seated on the Rednitz, 10 m SE Anspach.

Windheim, a town of Franconia, lately imperial. The ramparts that surround it serve for a promenade. It is seated on the Aisch, 30 m SE Wurtz-burg, and 32 SSW Bamberg.

Windsor, a borough in Berkshire, seated on an eminence, by the Thames, with a market on Saturday. It is celebrated for a magnificent castle, built originally by William 1, and enlarged by Henry 1. It was the residence of the succeeding monarchs, till Edward 111 (who was born in it) caused the ancient building to be taken down, and erected the present structure and St. George's chapel. Great additions were made to it by Edward 1v, Henry 111, Henry 1111, and Elisabeth. Charles 11 enlarged the windows and made them regular, furnished the royal apartments with paintings, enlarged the terrace walk on the N side, and carried it round the E and S sides. His present majesty has also made very fine improvements. This castle stands on a high hill, which rises from the town by a gentle ascent; and its fine terrace, faced with a rampart of freestone, 1870 feet in length, is one of the noblest walks in Europe, with respect to strength, grandeur, and prospects. From that part of the castle called the Round Tower, is an extensive view into twelve counties. St. George's chapel, or the collegiate church, which stands between the upper and lower courts, was begun by Edward 111, in 1377, in honour of the order of the garter. Edward 1v enlarged the design, and it was finished by Henry 111. The interior architecture is greatly admired, particularly its stone roof; and the whole was repaired and beautified in 1790. In this chapel are interred Henry 1v, Edward 1v, Henry 1111, his queen Jane Seymour, and Charles 1. The royal foundations in this castle are; the order of the garter, instituted in 1349, consisting of the sovereign, and 25 knights companions, exclusive of the princes of the blood royal; and the royal college of St. George, consisting of a dean, 12 canons, seven minor canons, and 18 poor knights. Opposite the SE side of the castle, is a modern-built mansion, called the Queen's Lodge; and below this is the Lower Lodge. Adjoining the queen's lodge is the little park, which extends round the E and N sides of the castle, and forms a beautiful lawn, 4 m in circuit. On the S side of the town is the great park, which is 14 m in circuit: it has a noble road from the town, through a double plantations of trees, to the ranger's lodge. On the death of the last ranger, Henry Frederic duke of Cumberland, his majesty took the management of this park into his own hands, and has made considerable improvements with respect to agricultural utility, as well as rural beauty. Windsor contained 3361 inhabitants in 1801, and 6155 in 1811. It is 17 m E by N Reading, and 22 w London. Lon. $0^{\circ} 36'$ w, lat. $51^{\circ} 30'$ N.

Windsor, a town of Vermont, chief of the county of its name. The assembly of the state holds its session here and at Rutland alternately. It is seated on the river Connecticut, 40 m E by S Rutland, and 70 NE Bennington. Lon. $72^{\circ} 4'$ w, lat. $43^{\circ} 27'$ N.

Windsor, a town of Connecticut, in Hartford county, on the river Connecticut, at the influx of Windsor Ferry river, 7 m N Hartford.

Windsor, a town of N Carolina, chief of Bertie county. It is situate on the Culbat, 23 m w by S Edenton.

Windsor, a town of Massachusetts, in Berkshire county, seated among hills, 20 m NNW Lenox, and 136 w by N Bolton.

Windsor, a town of Nova Scotia, with a college, founded by royal charter in 1802. It is seated on a river of the same name, 48 m NW Halifax.

Windsor New, a town of New York, in Ulster county, on the W side of the Hudson, just above the high lands, 6 m S of West Point.

Windsor Forest, a forest in the E part of Berkshire, 50 m in circuit. Though the soil is generally barren and uncultivated, it is finely diversified by hills and dales, woods and lawns, and delightful villas. It contains several towns and villages, of which Wokingham is the principal.

Windward Islands, such of the Caribbe islands in the W Indies, as commence at Martinico, and extend to Tobago.

Windward Passage, the strait between Point Maizi, the E end of the island of Cuba, and Cape St. Nicholas, the NW extremity of St. Domingo.

Winnenden, a town and castle of Suabia, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, 12 m ENE Stutgard.

Winnicza, a town of Poland, in Podolia, with a castle; seated on the river Bog, 35 m N Bracklau.

Winnipeg, a lake of Upper Canada, N W of Lake Superior. It is 240 m long and from 50 to 100 broad, and exhibits a body of water next in size to Lake Superior. It receives the waters of several small lakes in every direction, and contains a number of small islands. The lands on its banks produce vast quantities of wild rice, and the sugar-tree in great plenty.

Winnborough, a town of S Carolina, chief of Fairfield county, with a seminary called Mount Zion College. It stands on Waeree creek, which flows into the river of that name, 36 m N by W Columbia. Lon. 81 15 W, lat. 34 28 N.

Winschoten, a fortified town of Holland, in Groningen. Here, in 1568, was fought the first battle between the revolted Dutch and the Spaniards, who were defeated by Lewis, brother to the prince of Orange. It is 6 m S of Dollart bay, and 19 ESE Groningen.

Winsen, a town of Lower Saxony, in the duchy of Luneburg, with a castle, seated on the Luhe, near its conflux with the Ilmenau, 15 m NW Luneburg. — Another, seated on the Aller, 6 m below Zell, and 47 SSW Luneburg.

Winsford, a village in Cheshire, on the river Weaver, 4 m W by N Middlewich. Here is a manufacture of salt, and abundance of salt rock, of which great quantities are sent to Liverpool for exportation.

Winslow, a town in Buckinghamshire, with a market on Tuesday, 7 m NW Aylesbury, and 49 WNW London.

Winslow, a town of the district of Maine, in Lincoln county, with a fort; seated on the Kennebec, 18 m N Harrington.

Winstler, a town in Derbyshire, which has a meeting for the sale of provisions on Saturday. It is situate among rich lead-mines, 26 m NNW Derby.

Winterberg, a town of the duchy of Westphalia, 12 m SW Corbach, and 28 SE Arensburg.

Winterberg, a town of Bohemia, in the circle of Prachin, 25 m WSW Piseck.

Winterburg, a town of France, in the department of Rhine and Moselle, lately of Germany, in the county of Sponheim, 10 m WNW Creutznach, and 12 SSE Simmern.

Winteringham, a town in Lincolnshire, governed by a mayor, but has no market; seated near the Humber, 33 m N Lincoln.

Winterthur, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Zurich, where there

Yen-tcheou, a city of China, of the first rank, in Chan-tong. Its district, which is enclosed between two considerable rivers, is well cultivated, and the mountains covered with woods. It is 270 m S Peking. Lon. 116 36 E, lat. 39 44 N.

Yen-tcheou, a city of China, of the first rank, in Tche-kiang. In the neighbourhood are mines of copper, and trees that yield an excellent varnish, which, when once dry, never melts again, and will bear boiling water. The paper made here is in high esteem. It is 650 m SSE Peking. Lon. 119 14 E, lat. 29 30 N.

Yen-tching, a town of China, in Chan-tong, where a kind of glass is made, so delicate, that it will not endure the inclemencies of the air. It is 45 m SE Tsi-nan.

Yeovil, a corporate town in Somersetshire, with a market on Friday. Here are manufactures of cloth and leather gloves; and the trade in hemp and flax is considerable. It is seated on the Ye or Ivel, 20 m S Wells, and 122 W by S London.

Yezd-khast, a town of Persia, in Farsistan, on the confines of Irac-Agemi; seated on a rocky eminence, 75 m SSE Ispahan, and 130 N by W Shiraz.

Yetholm, a town of Scotland, in Roxburghshire, on the rivulet Bowmont, and borders of Northumberland, 9 m SE Kelso.

Yezd, a city of Persia, in Irak, on the borders of Kerman. It has manufactures of silk and cotton stuffs, fine porcelain, and carpets; and is a place of considerable trade. The inhabitants are estimated at above 90,000, of whom 15,000 are Guebres, or worshippers of fire. The city is destitute of a wall, and the fort has a mean appearance.

Y O R

Cattle are scarce here, and the greatest part of its corn is obtained from the vicinity of Ispahan. It is situate in a sandy desert, contiguous to a high range of mountains, 200 m E by S Ispahan. Lon. 56 10 E, lat. 32 20 N.

Ylo, a seaport of Peru, in the province of Charcas, 70 m N W Arica. Lon. 71 13 W, lat. 17 36 S.

Yonkers, a town of New York, in West Chester county, on the river Hudson, 17 m N N E New York.

Yonne, a department of France, containing part of the late province of Burgundy. It is so called from a river, which rises in the department of Nievre, flows by Chateau-Chinon, Clamecy, Auxerre, Joigny, and Sens, and joins the Seine at Montereau. Auxerre is the capital.

York, a city, the capital of Yorkshire, and an archbishop's see, with a market on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. It is the Eboracum of the Romans, and many of their coffins, urns, coins, &c. have been found here. It has always been considered as the capital of the North, and, in point of rank, as the second city in the kingdom. Though now surpassed in wealth and populousness by many of the more modern trading towns, it still supports a considerable degree of consequence, and is the residence of many genteel families. The number of inhabitants was 16,145 in 1801, and 19,099 in 1811. The cathedral of St. Peter, generally called the Minster, is reckoned the largest and most magnificent Gothic structure in the world: the E window is said hardly to have its equal for tracery, painting, and preservation, and was the work of John Thornton, a glazier of Coventry, in 1405. Beside the cathedral, York contains 17 churches in use; though in the reign of Henry V there were 44 parish-churches, 17 chapels, and nine religious houses. It is divided by the Ouse into two parts; which are united by a stone bridge of five arches, the centre one 87 feet wide; and the river is navigable to the bridge for vessels of 70 tons, although it is 60 m from the sea. York is surrounded by walls, in which are four gates and five posterns. It has a castle, which was formerly a place of great strength, but is now a county prison for debtors and felons. Near it, on an artificial mount, is Clifford's Tower, a round shell, said by some to have been raised by William I, but others deem it a Roman work. It was used as a garrison in the civil wars, and till the year 1683, when the magazine blowing up, reduced it to its present form. Without Bootham bar stood the magnificent abbey of St. Mary, some ruins of which remain, and on the site of part of it is the manor or royal palace, built by Henry VIII, where several of the kings have lodged, though it is now neglected. York is a county of itself, governed by a lord-mayor; the prefix of lord being given by Richard II; and its county includes Ainsty Liberty, in which are 35 villages and hamlets. The guild-hall, built in 1446, is a grand structure supported by two rows of oak pillars, each pillar a single tree. The corporation built a mansion-house, in 1728, for the lord-mayor; and among the other modern buildings are a noble assembly-house, designed by the earl of Burlington; an elegant court-house, on the right of the castle; a theatre-royal, a county hospital, and an asylum for lunatics. York is 190 m S S E Edinburg, and 195 N by W London. Lon. 17 W, lat. 53 59 N.

York, a city of Upper Canada, and the seat of government of that province. It is situate on the NW side of Lake Ontario, with an excellent harbour, formed by a long peninsula, which embraces a basin of water sufficiently large to contain a considerable fleet. On the extremity of the peninsula, called Gibraltar Point, are stores and blockhouses, which command the entrance of the harbour; and on the mainland, opposite this point, is the garrison. The government house is about 2 m above the garrison, near the head of the harbour, on a spot well suited for gardens and a park. The front of the city, as now laid out, is a mile and a half in length: several handsome squares are projected, particularly one open to the harbour; and the buildings are increasing rapidly. The river Don enters the harbour a little above the town, running through a marsh, which, when drained, will afford excellent pasture. York was taken by the Americans in 1813, and while in their possession they destroyed all the public edifices. It is 45 m N W Fort Niagara, and 140 W by S Kingston. Lon. 79 36 W, lat. 43 35 N.

York, a town of Pennsylvania, capital of a county of the same name. It has six edifices for public worship, and stands on the Codorus creek, which flows into the Susquehanna, 88 m W Philadelphia. Lon. 76 48 W, lat. 39 55 N.

York, New, one of the United States of America, 400 m long and 300 broad; bounded on the NW and N by Upper Canada, E by Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, S by the Atlantic ocean, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, and W by the state of Ohio. It is divided into 21 counties; namely, New York, Richmond, Suffolk, West Chester, Queen, King, Orange, Ulster, Dutchess, Columbia, Rensselaer, Washington, Clinton, Saratoga, Albany, Montgomery, Herkemer, Otsego, Ontario, and Tioga. New York, in general, is intersected by ridges of mountains running in a NE and SW direction. Beyond the Allegany mountains, however, the country is quite level, of a fine rich soil, covered in its natural state with various kinds of trees. East of these mountains it is broken into hills and valleys: the hills are thickly clothed with timber, and, when cleared, afford fine pasture; and the valleys produce hemp, flax, peas, grass, oats, maize, and wheat; and of the last immense quantities are exported. This state abounds with several fine lakes; and the chief rivers are the Hudson and Mohawk. In 1810 it contained 959,420 inhabitants.

York, New, a city of the United States, capital of the state of its name. It stands on the SW point of an island, called Manhattan, at the conflux of Hudson and East rivers, and is 5 m in circuit. Surrounded on all sides by water, it is refreshed by cool breezes in summer, and the air in winter is more temperate than in other places under the same parallel. The island is 15 m long, but not two where broadest; and at the N end it is joined to the mainland, on the W, by a bridge called Kings Bridge. There is no basin for the reception of ships; but the road where they lie, in East river, is defended from the violence of the sea by some islands which interlock with each other. The number of inhabitants was 23,814 in 1786, and 83,530 in 1807. Here are 16 churches, as many meeting-houses, and a noble seminary of education, called Columbia College; but the most magnificent edifice is Federal Hall, in the front of which is a gallery 12 feet deep, where the illustrious Washington took his oath of office, at the commencement of the federal constitution, in 1789. Here are also a large state prison, numerous commercial and charitable institutions, literary establishments, &c. The markets are well regulated, and abundantly supplied with every thing in its season, that land and water affords. This city, in time of peace, has more commercial business than any other town in the United States; but in time of war is insecure, without a maritime force. It is 97 m NE Philadelphia. Lon. 74 11 W, lat. 40 40 N.

York Fort, a settlement of the Hudson Bay Company, on the W side of Hudson bay, at the mouth of Nelson or York river. Lon. 88 44 W, lat. 57 15 N.

York River, a river of Virginia, formed by the conflux of the Pamunkey and Mattaponi, 30 m above York Town, below which place it enters Chesapeake bay.

York Town, a seaport of Virginia, capital of York county, with the best harbour in the state for vessels of the largest size. Here, in 1781, the British army were captured by the combined force of the United States and France. It is seated on York river, near its entrance into Chesapeake bay, 13 m N Williamsburg. Lon. 76 54 W, lat. 37 18 N.

Yorkshire, the largest county in England, bounded on the N by Westmorland and the bishopric of Durham, E by the German ocean, S by Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, and Derbyshire, SW by Cheshire, W by Lancashire, and NW by Westmorland. It extends 90 m from N to S, and 115 from E to W, and contains 3,848,320 acres. From its great extent it has been divided into three ridings, called the North, East, and West; is subdivided into 26 wapentakes, and 634 parishes; has one city and 60 market-towns; and sends 30 members to parliament. The number of inhabitants was 858,892 in 1801, and 973,113 in 1811. The air and soil of this extensive county vary extremely. The E riding is less healthy than the others; but this inconvenience decreases in proportion as the country recedes from the sea. On the hilly parts of this riding, especially in what is called the York Wolds, the soil is generally barren, dry, and sandy; but great numbers of lean sheep are sold hence, and sent into other parts to be fattened. The W riding, which is much the largest, enjoys a sharp but healthy air, and the land on the western side is hilly, stony, and not very fruitful; but the intermediate valleys consist of much good arable ground, and pasture for the largest cattle. It also produces iron, coal, lime, jet, alum, horses, and goats. Here the clothing manufactures principally flourish. The N riding, in general, exceeds the other two in the salubrity of the air. The worst parts breed lean cattle; but, on the sides of the hills, in the valleys and plains, it produces good corn, and rich pasture for large cattle. Richmondshire, in the sw part of this riding, was formerly a county of itself; here many lead mines are worked to great advantage. In Yorkshire likewise are the districts of Holderness, on the borders of the Humber; Cleveland on the confines of Durham; and Craven, on the borders of Westmorland and Lancashire. In this last district are three high mountains, named Wharfedale, Ingleborough, and Pennycant; they form a sort of triangle from their tops, at the distances of about 5, 6, and 8 m, while their monstrous bases nearly unite. The principal rivers are the Ouse, Don, Derwent, Calder, Aire, Wharfe, Nidd, Ure, and Hull, and they all terminate in the Humber, which enters the German ocean, between Yorkshire and Lincolnshire.

Yo-tcheou, a city of China, of the first rank, in Hou-quang. It is seated on the river Kian-ku, and on the lake Tong-tung, which is more than 200 m in circuit. The great number of barks and merchandise that are brought hither, render it one of the richest cities of the empire; and the country round it is full of different kinds of orange and lemon trees. It is 700 m s by w Peking. Lon. 112 35 E, lat. 29 23 N.

Youghall, a borough and seaport of Ireland, in the county of Cork. It is surrounded by walls, has a collegiate church, a commodious harbour with a well-defended quay, and a manufacture of earthen ware. It sends a member to parliament, and is situate on the river Blackwater, near the entrance of a bay to which it gives name, 28 m E by N Cork. Lon. 8 10 W, lat. 51 49 N.

Ypres, a fortified city of the Netherlands, in Flanders, and a bishop's see. It has considerable manufactures of cloth and serges, which are the principal articles of trade; and the canal of Boslingen, and the New Cut, greatly expedite the conveyance of goods to Nieuport, Ostend, and Bruges. It was one of the barrier towns belonging to the Dutch, till 1781, when emperor Joseph II obliged them to withdraw their garrison. It has been often taken and retaken; the last time by the French in 1794. It is seated on the Yperlee, 15 m w Courtray. Lon. 2 48 E, lat. 50 51 N.

Zaab, a district of Algiers, in the desert, behind Mount Atlas, belonging to the province of Constantia. The people of Zaab are free, and pay no tribute: they are poor and indigent, as it may be expected of the inhabitants of so barren a soil. Dates are their principal article of food; and they have extensive plantations of palm trees. They carry on some commerce in Negroes and ostriches feathers. Small troops of the poorest of them every year wander forth to the larger cities of the kingdom, where they get employed in various services; and having, in the course of two or three years, accumulated from six to ten zechins, return home, and are reckoned among the wealthy of the land. In the capital, they are known by the name of Biscaris, and constitute, under a common head, a kind of distinct corporation: they have even a common treasury for the purpose of mutually relieving each other. They are the only class of free servants, and are frequently employed in the houses of the Europeans, being very useful to them; as, beside the language of the country, they speak the Lingua Franca. All the inhabitants of Zaab are dog-eaters; and, in general, neither scrupulous nor squeamish with regard to their food. The villages which the Biscaris inhabit in their native country are small, all similar to one another, and remarkable only for dirtiness and poverty. The chief place of the district is Biscara.

Zaara, or the Desert, a vast country of Africa, 1500 m in length by 800 in breadth; bounded on the N by Barbary, E by Fezzan and Cassina, S by Negroland and Fouli, and W by the Atlantic ocean. The air is very hot, but wholesome to the natives. The soil is generally sandy and barren; but there are verdant valleys in which water either springs or stagnates, and it is here and there interspersed with spots of astonishing fertility, which are crowded with inhabitants. These fertile spots in the desert are called oases, or islands, bearing some resemblance to islands in the sea; and they abound most in the northern and eastern parts: but the smaller ones are not always permanent; for a furious wind from the desert, bringing along with it an immense quantity of sand, sometimes overwhelms an oasis, and reduces it to barrenness. These oases are formed into a number of states, governed by petty princes; and those of which some intelligence has been obtained, are noticed in this work in their proper places. The inhabitants, consisting of various tribes, are wild and ignorant; and the Mohammedan religion is professed throughout the country, unless where they approach the country of the Negroes. They maintain toward each other the maxims of apparent hospitality, but a Christian is every where odious. Their language is chiefly a dialect of the Arabic; and their only intercourse with other nations is carried on by the caravans which periodically traverse these immense deserts. The Zaara abounds in antelopes, wild boars, leopards, apes, ostriches, and serpents. There are few horses and bees; but many sheep, goats, and camels. Much salt is produced in the desert, which the Arabs carry into Negroland, and bring back provisions, blue cotton cloth, and slaves.

Zamora, a town of the kingdom of Quito. In the neighbourhood are rich mines of gold. It is seated near the Andes, 230 m s Quito. Lon. 78 20 W, lat. 4 6 S.

Zamora, a town of New Spain, in Mechoacan, 60 m NW Mechoacan.

Zamsra, a town of Algiers, in the province of Constantina, 250 m W Hammamet. Lon. 6 25 E, lat. 36 20 N.

Zamoski, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Beltz, with a citadel, a cathedral, and several other churches. It is 37 m ssw Chelm, and 44 wnw Beltz.

Zampago, a town of New Spain, in the province of Mexico, seated on a small lake, 30 m N Mexico.

Zanfara, a kingdom of Negroland, to the S of Zegzeg, between Cassina and Bornou. The inhabitants are tall in stature, of a very black complexion, with broad faces, and savage dispositions. The capital, of the same name, stands on a river that forms a lake N of Ghana, and then flows through that city into the Niger. It is 230 m NE Ghana, and 450 wsw Bornou. Lon. 16 0 E, lat. 18 30 N.

Zanguebar, a country on the E coast of Africa, between 3 N and 9 S lat. It includes several petty kingdoms, in which the Portuguese have settlements. The inhabitants are all blacks, with curled woolly hair; and, except those converted by the Portuguese, are either Mohamedans or pagans, the latter much the more numerous. The principal territories are Jubo, Melinda, Mombaza, and Quiola. The Portuguese trade for slaves, ivory, gold, ostriches feathers, wax, and drugs. The inland country is represented as lying low, and intersected with woods, forests, marshes, lakes, and rivers, the latter, for the most part, covered with weeds and thickets; all which so infect the air, that the products of the earth are corrupted, and the inhabitants sickly and indolent. But here are rich mines of gold, easily got; by the help of which grain, roots, fruits, &c. are purchased from other parts.

Zante, an island in the Mediterranean, near the coast of Morea, 17 m S of the island of Cephalonia. It is 14 m long and 8 broad, and forms part of the republic of Seven Islands. The principal riches consist in currants, which rival those of Corinth; and it has springs of petroleum that have been celebrated for ages. Here are also the finest peaches in the world, with other choice fruits, and excellent wine and oil. The natives speak both Greek and Italian, though there are very few Roman catholics among them; but they have a bishop as well as the Greeks. Here are about 50 villages, but no other town than Zante, which is fortified, and has a good harbour on the E side of the island. Lon. 20 50 E, lat. 37 43 N.

Zanzibar, an island in the Indian sea, on the coast of Zanguebar, between the islands of Pemba and Monfia, tributary to Portugal. It abounds in sugar-canes and citrons. The inhabitants are Mohamedans. Lon. 41 0 E, lat. 6 0 S.

Zara, a seaport of Dalmatia, capital of a county of the same name, and an archbishop's see, with a citadel. The harbour, which lies to the N, is capacious, safe, and well guarded; and the citadel is divided from the town by a deep ditch, hewn out of a rock. Near the church are two fluted columns of the Corinthian order, supposed to have been part of the temple of Juno. Zara is seated on a small peninsula, in the gulf of Venice, 70 m NW Spalatro, and 150 SE Venice. Lon. 16 6 E, lat. 44 30 N.

Zanang, or Dooshak, a city of Persia, capital of Segistan. The modern city, called Dooshak, is small and compact, but the ruins cover a vast extent of ground. It stands in an open country, about 8 m from the river Hermund, which flows into the lake Zerch. The vicinity affords good pasturage, and wheat and barley in sufficient quantities to be sent to Herat. It is 140 m S by E Herat, and 500 E Ipahan. Lon. 61 20 E, lat. 32 15 N.

Zarko, a town of European Turkey, in Theffaly, seated in a fine plain, 22 m wsw Lariffa.

Zarnata, a town of European Turkey, in Morea, seated on an eminence, 20 m wsw Mistra.

Zarnaw, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Sandomir, 32 m N Sandomir.

Zarnowitz, a town of Prussia, in Pomerelia, on a bay of the Baltic, 38 m NW Dantzic.

Zaslav, a town of Poland, in Volhinia, seated on the Horin, 30 m NNW Constantinow.

Zatmar, a strong town of Hungary, capital of a county of the same name. It is seated on a small lake formed by the river Samos, 50 m E by S Tockay, and 130 E Buda. Lon. 22 34 E, lat. 47 50 N.

Zator, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Cracow, with a castle; seated on an eminence, near the river Vistula, 20 m SW Cracow, and 50 SE Ratibor.

Zaweh, a town of Persia, in the province of Khorasan, situate on the Tedjen, 20 m from the Caspian sea, and 80 N Meshed.

Zawila; see Zucela.

Zbaras, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Podolia, 28 m E Zborow, and 68 N by Kaminiack.

Zborow, a town of Poland, in the palatinate of Lemberg. Here, in 1649, John Casimir, king of Poland, with 20,000 men, was attacked by 110,000 Cossacks and Tartars, for three days successively, but defended himself so bravely, that the latter consented to terms of accommodation. Zborow is 52 m E by Lemberg. Lon. 25 46 E, lat. 49 46 N.

Zea, or Zeia; see Zia.

Zealand, or Zeeland, an island of Denmark, of a triangular form, 230 m in circuit. It is the largest of the isles of the Baltic sea, and lies at its entrance, having the Catgat on the N, the Sound on the E, and the Great Belt on the W. The coast is much intersected by large bays; and within the country are several lakes, which, as well as the rivers, abound in fish. It is exceedingly fertile; producing grain of all sorts, with excellent pasture, and in most parts plenty of wood. It is particularly famous for its breed of horses. Copenhagen is the capital of this island, and of the whole kingdom.

Zealand, a province of Holland, bounded on the N by the isles of Holland, E by Dutch Brabant, S by Flanders, and W by the German ocean. It is composed of several islands, the principal of which are Walcheren, Schowen, N and S Beveland, Tolen, Duyveland, and Wolferdike. The inhabitants are at a great expense to defend themselves from encroachments of the sea, in keeping up their dikes. The river Scheldt forms the most of these islands, and the soil of them is fruitful. The principal towns are Middleburg and Flushing.

Zealand, New, an island in the Pacific ocean, discovered by Tasman, in 1642. He traversed the E coast from lat. 34 to 43 S, and entered a strait; but being attacked by the natives, soon after he came to an anchor, in the place to which he gave the name of Murderers-bay, he did not go on shore. He called the country Staten Land, though it has been generally distinguished in our maps by the name of New Zealand. From the time of Tasman, the whole country, except that part of the coast seen by him, remained altogether unknown, and was by many supposed to make part of a southern continent, till 1770, when it was circumnavigated by Cook, who found it to consist of two large islands, separated by a strait four or five leagues broad, to which he gave his own name. On the W side of this strait is Queen Charlotte Sound, which was a place of rendezvous in his subsequent voyages. The coasts are indented by deep bays, and there are also several rivers, capable of receiving large vessels. The southernmost island is for the most part mountainous and barren, as far inland as the eye can reach; but the land bordering on the seacoast is clothed thick with wood. The northernmost island has a much better appearance; for the hills and mountains are covered with wood, and every valley has a rivulet of excellent water. The soil of these valleys, and the plains, of which there are many overgrown with wood, is in general light, but fertile. The winters are milder than in England, and the summers not hotter, though more equally warm. There are forests of vast extent, full of the straightest and largest timber, fit for buildings of any kind. Wild celery, and a kind of cresses, grow plentifully in almost every cove. Yams, sweet potatoes, and coconos, are raised by cultivation. Cook, in 1773, planted several spots of ground with European garden seeds; and, in 1777, in several of these spots, although totally neglected and overrun by weeds, were found cabbages, onions, leeks, purslain, radishes, mustard, &c. and a few fine potatoes, greatly improved by change of soil. In other places every thing had been rooted out to make room for temporary villages. The only quadrupeds are dogs and rats: the former are domestic, and for food; and the latter, though not numerous, seem also to be eaten. The birds, like the vegetable productions, are almost entirely peculiar to the country. Cook introduced European poultry, and, on his last visit, had the satisfaction to find them increased, both in a wild and domestic state, beyond all danger of being ever exterminated. The men are stout, well made, and fleshy; but none of them corpulent, like the inhabitants of Otaheite; and they are exceedingly vigorous and active. The women possess peculiar graces of form and person. The bodies of both sexes are marked with black stains, called amoco, which is the same as tattooing at Otaheite. Their dress consists of an oblong garment, about five feet long and four broad: they bring two corners of it over their shoulders, and fasten it on the breast with the other part, which covers the body; and about the belly it is again tied with a girdle of mat. They ornament their heads with feathers, pearl-shells, bones, &c. The women sometimes wear necklaces of sharks teeth, or bunches of long beads made of bones or shells. Their houses are miserable lodging places; and their only furniture is a few small baskets, in which they put their fishing-hooks and other trifles. Their food consists chiefly of fish; and instead of bread, they eat the root of a kind of fern, which they scorch over the fire, and then beat with a stick till the dry outside falls off. Beside their dogs they also contrive to kill birds. Their cookery consists wholly in roasting and baking, which latter is performed in the same manner as at Otaheite. The women eat in common with the men, and their method of feeding corresponds with the nastiness of their persons. From Cape Kidnappers, in lat. 39 43, for upward of 80 leagues, to the northward, the people acknowledge one sovereign, called Teratu, and under him several subordinate chiefs, to whom great respect is paid; but whether his authority be hereditary or delegated is uncertain. This part of the coast is much the most populous; tillage, weaving, and the other arts of peace, being best known, and most practised. The canoes are more decorated, the plantations more numerous, and the clothes and carving finer, than any where else. In other parts, they are scattered along the coast, in single families, or in larger tribes, and each in a state of perpetual hostility. For such continual wars, and the inhuman banquet that is the consequence of victory, among a people in other respects mild and gentle, perhaps no better reason can be assigned, than what at first originated in necessity, has been perpetuated by habit, and exasperated by revenge. Upon the whole, there is little room to doubt that these people are cannibals. These two islands lie between lat. 34 and 48 s, and lon. 166 and 180 e.

Zebid, a city of Arabia in the province of Yemen. It was once very considerable, but the walls are demolished, and the present buildings scarcely occupy the half of its ancient extent. It is seated on a river, 10 m from the Red sea, and 140 N Mocha. Lon. 44 28 E, lat. 15 10 N.

Zebu, or Sebu, one of the Philippine islands, between those of Leyta and Negros. It is 140 m long and 30 broad, and has a town of the same name, on the E coast. Lon. 122 30 E, lat. 10 36 N.

Zedie, a town of Barbary, in the country of Tripoli, seated on a bay of the Mediterranean, 120 m SE Tripoli.

Zuckmantel, a town of Silesia, in the principality of Neisse, and a bishop's see. It has mines of gold, silver, copper, and iron, and is 15 m s Neisse.

Zueela, a town of the kingdom of Fezzan, situate in a district of remarkable fertility. The remnants of ancient buildings, the number and size of the cisterns, and the construction of the vaulted caves, intended perhaps as repositories for corn, exhibit wonderful vestiges of its ancient splendour. It is 60 m ENE Mourzook. Lon. 16 34 E, lat. 27 59 N.

Zwenigorod, a town of Russia, in the government of Moscow, situate on the Moskva, 28 m w Moscow.

Zug, a small canton of Swisserland, bounded on the E and N by Zurich, w by Lucern, and s by Schweitz. It is rich in pasturage; has plenty of various kinds of stone fruit, as well as walnuts and chestnuts; and its wine is of a very acid flavour. The inhabitants are Roman catholics.

ZUR

Zug, a town of Swisserland, capital of a canton of the same name. Here are several handsome churches, and a good townhouse. It is seated on a lake of its name, 12 m NW Schweitz. Lon. 8 24 N, lat. 47 4 N.

Zuider Zee, a great bay of the German ocean, which extends from N to S in Holland, between the provinces of Friesland, Overysel, Gelderland, and N Holland.

Zulau, or Sulau, a town of Silesia, in a lordship of the same name, 5 m SW Militsch.

Zuleb, a town of France, in the department of Roer, lately of Germany, in the duchy of Juliers; seated on the Nassel, 12 m S Juliers.

Zullichau, a town of Brandenburg, in the New mark. The castle stands without the wall of the town, and has a rampart and ditches. The suburbs contain more houses than the town itself, and among them is a large orphan-house, to which is annexed a school, an academy, &c. Here are good cloth manufactures, and the vicinity produces much corn and wine. In 1759, a battle was fought near this town between the Prussians and Russians, in which the former were defeated. It is situate in a plain, near the Oder, 24 m E by N Crossen. Lon. 15 52 E, lat. 52 9 N.

Zulpha, or Julfa, a town of Persia, almost close to Ispahan, to which it is a sort of suburb, and separated from it by the river Sanderon. It was peopled by a colony of Armenians, brought hither by Shah Abbas, and contains several churches and monasteries.

Zulz, a town of Swisserland, in the canton of Grisons, on the river Inn, 26 m SE Coire.

Zumampa, a town of Tucuman, on the river Dolce, 110 m SSE St. Jago del Estero.

Zumaya, a town of Spain, in Biscay, near the coast, 15 m W by S St. Sebastian.

Zumpango, a town of New Spain, in the province of Mexico, 100 m N by E Acapulco, and 105 S Mexico.

Zurich, a canton of Swisserland, 50 m long and 30 broad; bounded on the N by Schaffhausen, E by Thurgaw and the county of Tockenburg, S by Glaris, Schweitz, and Zug, and W by Lucern and the county of Baden. Zurich was admitted a member of the Helvetic confederacy in 1351, and obtained the privilege of being the first canton in rank; it is also the most considerable in extent, both of territory and power, next to that of Bern. It abounds in wine and excellent pasture; but as there is not a sufficient supply of corn, for interior consumption, the deficiency is chiefly supplied from Suabia. The inhabitants are all Calvinists.

Zurich, a city of Swisserland, capital of a canton of the same name. It stands at the N end of the lake Zurich, where the river Limmat issues from the lake, and divides the town into two unequal parts, which communicate by three bridges. It was formerly an imperial city, and is one of the best built in this country, but the streets are narrow. The cathedral was founded by Charlemagne, and is adorned with a statue of that emperor. The two divisions of Zurich are called the old town and the suburbs; the former is surrounded by the same battlements and towers that existed in the 13th century; the latter is strengthened by fortifications in the modern style. The arsenal is well supplied with cannon, ammunition, and musquets. Among the charitable foundations are an orphan house; an hospital for the sick of all nations, which usually contains above 600 patients; and the Almosen Amt, or foundation for the poor, which puts out children as apprentices, and distributes money, clothes, and books of devotion, to poor persons, not of the town only, but of the canton, to the amount of upward of 5000l. a year. Here are several manufactures; particularly muslins, cottons, linens, and silk handkerchiefs. Zurich was taken by the French in 1798, and retaken by the Austrians the year following; but the latter were soon obliged to evacuate it, on the French gaining a decisive victory over the Austro-Russian army near this city. It is 35 m SW Constance, and 55 NE Bern. Lon. 8 35 E, lat. 74 12 N.

Zurich, a lake of Swisserland, 24 m long and 4 broad. The borders are studded with villages and towns, and the S part appears bounded by the stupendous high mountains of Schweitz and Glaris. The river Limmat runs through its whole length to the city of Zurich.

Zurz, a town of Swisserland, in the canton of Grisons, seated on the Inn, 20 m NNW Bormio.

Zurzach, a town of Swisserland, in the county of Baden, seated on the Rhine, just above the influx of the Aar, 9 m N Baden.

Zurzonza, a town of New Spain, in the province of Mechoacan, situate on an island in a lake, 25 m wsw Mechoacan.

Zutphen, a strong town of Holland, in Gelderland, capital of the quarter or county of its name. It was taken, in 1672, by the French, who destroyed the fortifications and abandoned the place in 1674. The fortifications have been since repaired. It is seated at the conflux of the Berkel with the Yssel, 9 m s by s Deventer, and 55 s by s Amsterdam. Lon. 6 13 E, lat. 52 10 N.

Zuyst, a village of Holland, 5 m from Utrecht. It abounds in plantations and shady walks, and is ornamented by the spacious buildings which count Zinzen-dorf appropriated to the fraternity of Hernhuthers or Moravians, who are employed in various kinds of manufacture, and their workmanship exceeds that of any other part of Holland. Zuyst is much frequented in the summer months, by merchants who have no country seats of their own.

Zwittau, a town of Moravia, in the circle of Olmutz, 40 m wsw Olmutz.

Zwoll, a fortified town of Holland, in Overijssel, with three handsome suburbs. On the adjacent mountains of St. Agnes was formerly an Augustine convent, in which Thomas Kempis lived 71 years, and died in 1471. A canal begins near this place, and extends to the river Yssel, which is defended by several forts. Zwoll is the most opulent town in the province, and stands on an eminence, by the river Aa, 14 m N Deventer, and 31 sw Coevorden. Lon. 6 3 E, lat. 52 31 N.
