A VIEW IN THE DARGLE

By George Barret, R.A.

In the possession of the author.

Oils on canvas. 24 inches high by 29 inches wide.

This picture is possibly the one which Barret brought with him to London and showed at the Society of Artists Exhibition in 1784, (No. 4). The scene, in the Powerscourt demesne, is easily identified at the present time; though one hundred and fifty years have wrought great changes in the growth and decay of the trees. The sky is full of delicate, evening hues of pale blue and pink. The water in the pool is brown. The cascade, in the high lights, has a warm blue tinge. The trees wear their full summer foliage. The little figures are by Barret himself and among the best of those he has done. The one over the main mass of rock wears scarlet. The two in the foreground wear deep blue and light brown-yellow respectively.

The picture was formerly in the possession of Sir Edward Wingfield Verner, Bart., a connection of the Powerscourt family.

"In an artistic sense the majority and backbone of the world have not yet begun to be artistically civilized. Ages must elapse before such civilization can make any appreciable headway. And in the meantime the little hierarchy of art, by which alone art lives and develops, exists precariously in the midst of a vast dangerous population—a few adventurous whites among indigenous hordes in a painful climate."—ARNOLD BENNETT.

"Sans doute les hommes capable de goûter de très belles œuvres d'art sont rares ; et, d'ailleurs, dans les musées ou même sur les places publiques elles ne sont regardées que par un nombre restreint de spectateurs. Mais les sentiments qu'elles contiennent ne finissent pas moins par s'infiltrer jusque dans la foule. Au-dessous des génies, en effet, d'autres artistes de moindre envergure reprennent et vulgarisent les conceptions des maîtres ; les écrivains sont influencés par les peintres, comme ceux-ci par les littérateurs : il y a un continuel échange de pensées entre tous les cerveaux d'une génération ; les journalistes, les romanciers populaires, les illustrateurs, les dessinateurs d'images mettent à la portée de la multitude les vérités que de puissantes intelligences ont découvertes. C'est comme un ruissellement spirituel, comme un jaillissement qui se déverse en de multiples cascades, jusqu' à former la grande nappe mouvante qui représente la mentalité d'un temps."—AUGUSTE RODIN.

"If we are to be excused for rejecting the arts, it must not be because we are contented to be less than men, but because we long to be more than men."—WILLIAM MORRIS.

PREFACE

I FEAR that this book may seem out-of-date and dull to many of its readers. Certainly it should prove so to those subtle moderns who love to worry the topic of art with such terms as "dynamic hieroglyph," "rhythmic relativity," "plastic integration," or "primordial volume." It was written for people further behind the times; principally, for such Irishmen and Irishwomen as entertain a vague but honest liking for pictures, and want to know a little more about the painters whom their own country has produced. I believe that these people are numerous. I met some of them when I had the privilege of delivering the Hermione lectures on art at Alexandra College, Dublin, three years ago : and it is due to their representations that the fourth of those lectures, that on Irish landscape painters, is here developed and put in print.

The Irish are regarded, generally, as a people without talent for the art of painting, but Ruskin, who did not find the Irish temperament congenial, and whose critical utterances were usually the fruit of his prejudices, could yet say truthfully: "In the eighth century Ireland possessed a school of art in her manuscripts and sculpture which, in many qualities—apparently in all essential qualities of decorative invention—was quite without rival, seeming as if it might have advanced to the highest triumphs in architecture and painting."

Sir Walter Armstrong, another, but more friendly, Englishman, testified that "there has been a race inhabiting this country for more than a thousand years which has got very exceptional artistic powers. It is one of the very few races in the world which have shown real originality in their art, and the art of which bears examination as to quality very deeply indeed."

Both of these eulogia were written with reference to the art of the ancient Irish, manifested principally in their manuscript illuminations. It was not till the end of the eighteenth century that the early promise of the race showed any signs of fulfilment.

There exist, undoubtedly, strong oppositions of opinion as to the causes of the long period of stagnation in the art of Ireland, and as to the causes of the apathy which many of the best of modern Irishmen show to so important a matter as the cultivation of art. I will not here develop my own theories on those questions, for I wish this book to be as uncontroversial and as inoffensive as possible.

When Irishmen, after seven centuries began again to paint and to admire pictures, they broke completely with the technical tradition of the past. It was lost beyond the possibility of recapture. In the long interval art had become a cosmopolitan thing, and painting, in particular, a universal language, evolved, by practice and experiment, into an almost limitless power of expression. Irishmen looked to Italy, to France, and, chiefly, to England to learn about the new wonder which had grown up while they were otherwise occupied.

There is some excuse for those who persist in classing the Irish painter with the "English School": for he learned the elements of his craft from itinerant English artists who came to Dublin in the reigns of the Georges. But he soon dispensed with his English masters, and went himself to England, called thither by prospects of greater fame and wealth than he could hope for in his native place. Nathaniel Hone, R.A.; George Barret, R.A.; James Barry, R.A.; Sir Martin Archer Shee, P.R.A.; William Mulready, R.A., and a host of minor men were thus lost to their country. The exodus still continues: and the Irish now look with regretful pride to Sir William Orpen, R.A.; Sir John Lavery, R.A.; Mr. J. J. Shannon,

R.A., and their other numerous compatriots who maintain abroad the reputation of Irish art.

It may be noticed that most of the emigrants are portrait or figure painters. England has always proved to be the happiest of hunting grounds for the wandering portraitist. There, from the days of Lely to those of Laszlo, the foreigner with a talent for painting faces and clothes has never lacked recognition and riches.

No such welcome is extended to foreign landscape painters; and little encouragement is given even to native English practitioners of the gentler art. Gainsborough had starved had he confined his work to landscape. Wilson starved because he did so. Constable died poor and disappointed. Mr. Mark Fisher is only admitted to the full membership of the Royal Academy on the eve of his eightieth year. There is nothing in such a record to draw the Irish landscape painter oversea.

So he remains at home. The Royal Hibernian Academy shows his work in excess of all other kinds of exhibit. He is prominent in their councils. Yet he does not prosper.

Irish people distrust their instinct woefully in matters of art; though Dublin must be one of the best places on earth in which to sell worthless old paintings. The Irish will back their fancy for anything but a modern picture. Scores of college professors, doctors, and barristers in Dublin are fully persuaded that they are the happy possessors of "Old Masters." They can see little or no technical difference between their treasures and the admitted masterpieces which hang in the excellent National Gallery of Ireland. They argue, in their hearts, that even if their "Rembrandt" or their "Titian" be spurious, it is, at all events, the sort of thing which they are expected, by the learned and judicious, to like. To purchase a modern picture would be an adventure far beyond their range. They have no tests nor standards for such articles since "The Lane Gift" was lost to Ireland through their lethargy.

They may, in truth, prefer something sunny and fresh to a dark, worm-eaten panel; but they feel a sort of shyness in declaring their taste; they wait for someone else to lead the way: they wait till the artist dies, and his work appears in a public gallery. When that happens they will—as the case of Hone proves—buy his pictures at ten times the price which the artist himself would have asked.

This attitude of mind is not peculiar to Ireland, nor so base as the bare description of it might suggest. It is laudable, so far as it reflects a deference to authority and an anxiety to give admiration only where admiration is due. But it is deplorably bad, inasmuch as it sets an example—far too frequently followed in Ireland—to those who, in default of any education in art, see no decipherable signposts to set them on the proper way.

The remedies for this condition of things are so obvious that they are often overlooked. A slightly more generous endowment of our various schools of art; a new type of art teacher, better trained, paid and treated; a determined effort to popularise our few picture galleries; an increase in the number of lectures and books on Irish painters and pictures should work wonders for us in a couple of years. The Irish passion for graphic art, of which Ruskin and Walter Armstrong spoke, is still strong, though it is starved. There is plenty of material wealth at present in the country wherewith to provide for its gratification.

I fancy the first signs of a revival will be shown in the direction of landscape painting. The main tendency of the art of painting in every country during the last century has been in that direction. Landscape is no longer a mere background accessory. Turner, Constable, Corot, and Monet have made it the prime, vital matter of great masterpieces. The Irish, by taste and opportunity are landscape lovers. Their country provides almost every form of landscape dear to the painter.

The neighbourhood of Dublin, for example, is a treasury of subjects which, I feel sure, cannot be paralleled in such a narrow space elsewhere in the world. The broad pastures and rich farms that lie round Raheny; the dazzling strands at Portmarnock and Malahide; the cliffs at Howth; the woods of Glendhu and Powerscourt; the Dargle, the Liffey, and the Dodder rivers with their high falls and quiet reaches; the incomparable Bay of Killiney; the Vale of Shanganagh; the Golden Spears; the picturesque ruins of the Hellfire Club, Mount Pelier, and Mount Venus; the lonely mountains and bogs that cluster about Cruagh and Kippure, and the two mysterious lakes at Glencree—all these may be reached in three or four hours' walk from the centre of the city.

Barret and O'Connor both worked for years in Powerscourt Demesne. Hone painted continually in his homelands at Malahide and in the Dublin mountains. Osborne was fascinated at times by the coast around Howth. But they were only pioneers in this delectable country. There are estates and to spare for ten thousand followers.

In writing about Barret, O'Connor, Osborne, and Hone I have endeavoured to devote my attention to facts rather than theories. It seemed to me that I should be always alert to jettison a paragraph of criticism in favour of a couple of dates. Books about painters are so often made dull by the wanton intrusion of their author's opinions that I sought to guard against dullness of that sort, even though the fault should overcome me in another form. Thus it is that my appendices are very bulky; but I could not bring myself to sacrifice any part of them, as I believe them to be the most valuable portion of the book.

I hope that the small size of the illustrations will be excused in consideration of their clarity and, also, because they face the text and, so, can be studied without the necessity of turning the book on its side. The actual measurements of each original picture which I have reproduced are given, as without them it would be impossible to form any adequate notion of the way in which each subject is treated. It is amazing how often essential information of this sort is omitted by even the most careful and learned writers.

My descriptions of the colour scheme of each picture afford me little satisfaction. Indeed I hesitated, for a while, to insert them at all; for words are poor materials with which to convey an idea of colour. However, as each description was written in front of the picture described, its errors are limited to those of omission. The only possible alternative, the three-colour process block, too often errs by crude mis-statement.

I have found so many blunders among the existing brief accounts of Barret, O'Connor, and Osborne that I feel I must crave the reader's indulgence for such as I have inevitably committed myself. They are to be attributed to lack of capacity rather than to want of care. The task of compiling this book, though self-imposed and pleasant enough, was more exacting than may appear, or than I anticipated. No one will realise better than myself how far my endeavour outstripped my performance. No one will be more ready than I am to admit that Barret, O'Connor, Osborne, and Hone deserved a better biographer. But I take the liberty of doubting if anyone could ever be found more jealously anxious to secure their just reputation than is their present apologist,

THOMAS BODKIN.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

WERE I scrupulously honest, I should put many names with my own on the title-page of this book : for it may be said to be a work of collaboration. It could not have been written without the unstinted help which I received from all quarters to which I applied.

The Directors and Curators of Galleries containing works by Barret, O'Connor, Osborne, or Hone spared neither time nor trouble in giving me assistance. I may mention in particular : Cambell Dodgson, Esq., O.B.E., Keeper of Prints and Drawings at the British Museum ; James L. Gaw, Esq., Director of the National Gallery of Scotland ; Martin Hardie, Esq., A.R.E., Assistant Keeper of the Department of Engraving, Illustration, Design and Paintings, at the Victoria and Albert Museum ; Arthur Bolton, Esq., F.S.A., F.R.I.A. ; Curator of Sir John Soane's Museum ; Sydney C. Cockerell, Esq., M.A., Director of the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge ; G. H. Wallis, Esq., F.S.A., Director of the Nottingham Gallery ; Butler Wood, Esq., F.R.S.L., Director of the Bradford Corporation Art Gallery; W. B. Barton, Esq., Director of the Harris Art Gallery, Preston; A. G. Quigley, Esq., Curator of the Walker Gallery, Liverpool; Mrs. Ellen Duncan, Curator of the Dublin Municipal Art Gallery; and Arthur Deane, Esq., Curator of the Municipal Art Gallery of Belfast.

Those who gave me liberty to reproduce their pictures were : Miss Jane French, Mrs. Bury, The Right Honourable The Speaker, The Right Honourable Jonathan Hogg, The Right Honourable Laurence A. Waldron, The Right Honourable Lord Justice O'Connor, Sir George Brooke, Bart., Barrington Jellett, Esq., my colleagues on the Board of the National Gallery of Ireland, and Mr. Joseph Egan.

Others to whom I am under obligation are : Mrs. Noël Guinness, Miss G. Reilly, Sir William Corry, Bart., Lieutenant-Colonel Sir W. Hutcheson Poë, Bart, C.B., D.L.; His Honour Judge Parry, K.C.; Monsieur E. Thoumy, Le Commissaire Général de la Société des Artistes Français; Captain Stephen Gwynn, Walter G. Strickland, Esq., M.R.I.A.; Herbert Hone, Esq.; Algeron Graves, Esq., F.S.A.; Dermot O'Brien, Esq., P.R.H.A.; Emery Walker, Esq., F.S.A.; W. M. Crofton, Esq., M.D.; Thomas Ulick Sadleir, Esq., Barrister-at-Law; Edmund Lupton, Esq., K.C.; R. B. Falkiner, Esq.; Henry C. Drury, Esq., M.D.; Arthur Bennett, Esq.; W. J. Morgan, Esq., the Secretary of the North British Academy of Arts; Nassau Blair Browne, Esq., R.H.A., the Secretary of the Royal Hibernian Academy; W. H. Pencil drawing on paper by himself. In Sir John Soane's Museum.

GEORGE BARRET, R.A.

GEORGE BARRET, the elder, was reputed in his day, to be the greatest landscape painter whom Ireland, England, or Scotland had till then produced. His fame suffered a sudden eclipse. Alan Cunningham, with characteristic complacency, described him, in 1833, as a "worthless dauber"; and writers on art since Cunningham's time have shown a similar reckless ignorance of his work. Sir Walter Armstrong never even mentioned Barret's name in either of his two big discursive volumes on Barret's famous contemporaries, and fellow foundation members of the Royal Academy, Reynolds and Gainsborough. Those critics who do refer to him at all, do so for the purpose of making his painting the subject of an invidious comparison with that of Richard Wilson.

The only oil paintings by Barret to be found at present in the public galleries of England and Scotland are one in the Walker Gallery, Liverpool, another in the Gallery of the City of Nottingham, and a, doubtful, third in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge. He is one of the very few Royal Academicians unrepresented in the Diploma Gallery of the Royal Academy. In the National Gallery of his native country there are but two pictures by him, both in his early manner. One of these is badly damaged and badly repaired.

Barret was born at Dublin probably in the year 1732, though, according to some authorities, in the year 1728. He was the son of a clothier in the Liberties. His name is variously spelt 'Barret' and 'Barett,' both by himself and by others. 'Barret' would appear to be the more correct form. As a boy he was apprenticed to a maker of women's stays. But that employment did not last long, for in 1747 he is found learning to draw in Robert West's famous academy in George's Lane. While there he was awarded a prize by the Dublin Society. His first earnings were gained by colouring prints for Thomas Silcock, a local printseller. Then he became a drawing teacher in a school. Edmund Burke observed his talents and was, as usual, ready to extend encouragement and friendship where he discerned merit. He wisely advised Barret to go to Nature for further instruction. Barret took the advice and for several years painted assiduously in the County Wicklow, particularly in the neighbourhood of the picturesque Dargle River and the splendidly wooded demesne of Powerscourt through which it flows. He confined his work to landscapes, and developed an attractive and accomplished style.

In 1762 he printed and circulated a proposal to have four of his landscapes, of the Dargle and Powerscourt, engraved, under his own supervision by John Dixon, and published to subscribers. It would seem that this project did not receive sufficient encouragement: and the plates were not engraved. The only landscapes by Barret ever engraved were six done by William Watts which appeared in his Views of the Seats of the English Nobility and Gentry, 1779—86, and three done by Samuel Middiman, which appeared in his Select Views in Great Britain, 1783—1789.*

As Dublin would not employ Barret adequately, he sailed for London in 1762, bringing with him his wife, whom he had married in 1757, and some of his best

*The six prints after Barret in the Views of the Seats of the English Nobility and Gentry are: Plate VI., Claremont; Plate XII., Burton Constable; Plate XVI., The Lodge in Richmond Park; Plate XXII., Kedleston House; Plate XXIV., Cadland Park; Plate XXXI., Trentham.

The three prints after Barret in the Select Views in Great Britain are: Plate I., Winnandermere (sic) Lake, Westmoreland; Plate VI., Ulleswater (sic); Plate XXXIV., View on Shanklin Chine. Of these Plates No. I. is described as painted by "G. Barrett, R.A."; Nos. VI. and XXXIV. as by "G. Barrett." They would all, however, seem to be after George Barret, R.A. They are very characteristic of his work. One of those attributed to "G. Barret," if done by George Barret, junior, must have been done when he was, at most, seventeen years of age, for it was first published by Boydell in 1784.

pictures. The exhibition of the Society of Artists of Great Britain in 1764 contained four of his works, including views of the Dargle and Powerscourt Waterfall. In that year he also showed at the Free Society a large work entitled simply "A Landscape with Figures," and gained with it a premium of fifty pounds offered, for a landscape, by the Royal Society. He acquired instant popularity and commissions were poured upon him; while Richard Wilson maintained with difficulty a poverty-stricken and obscure existence, being reduced at times to barter his pictures for bread and cheese. James Barry, that caustic critic of his contemporaries, wrote to his friend Dr. Sleigh, in Ireland, declaring "Barret does no small honour to landscape painting among us. I have seen nothing to match his last year's premium picture. . . . It has discovered to me a very great want in my favourite Claude's performances."

The prices Barret commanded are always alleged to have been, for the period, huge. Reynolds, who himself was accustomed, in his heyday, to ask only £200 for a full-length portrait, could buy from Gainsborough for sixty guineas the picture which he described as "by far the best that Gainsborough ever painted or, perhaps, ever will." About the same time Barret was reputed to have been paid £1,500 by Lord Dalkeith for three landscapes. This is a story often repeated, yet one I find hard to credit. Entries in the Royal Academy catalogue for 1775 show that he was then, five years after he had painted the Dalkeith pictures, willing to accept eighty guineas for each of two, presumably, important pieces; and seventy-five guineas for a third. There is no extant evidence that he lived in an exceptionally extravagant way, yet he was on the verge of bankruptcy when he died. Had his prices run to hundreds of pounds, we would not read, as we do, of a picture by him selling for the paltry sum of one pound three shillings at a notable auction held within twelve years of his death. That was not an age of such quickly veering tastes.

During the seven years that elapsed between Barret's arrival in London and the first exhibition of the Royal Academy he continued to exhibit regularly with the Society of Artists of Great Britain. He formed the plan for the institution of the Royal Academy, which was taken up by Sir William Chambers and carried into effect. He was nominated a member in the King's instrument of foundation. Thenceforth he sent pictures regularly to the Academy's annual exhibitions until 1782, two years before his death. The last, done when his health was failing, was entitled "A Sun-set."

Old exhibition and sale catalogues show that he enjoyed, at least, his fair share of patronage. Lord Powerscourt, The Duke of Portland, for whom he did twelve pictures; The Duke of Buccleuch, Sir George Colebrook, William Lock of Norbury Park and William Constable of Burton Constable were chief among those who employed him to do pictures of their demesnes. Lord Albemarle and Lord Lansdowne increased his fame by including his works in their collections. He was said to have made, in his prime, £2,000 a year : but, if so, he spent more than he made and was never clear of financial embarrassment. When Edmund Burke came to enjoy his one brief spell of patronage he remembered Barret ; and, in 1782, secured his appointment to the lucrative and almost sinecure post of Master Painter to Chelsea Hospital. It is this appointment, probably, that accounts for the presence of three drawings by Barret, one a portrait of the artist, in the Soane Museum. For Sir John Soane was then Clerk of the Works and Resident Architect at Chelsea Hospital.

There is no record of Barret's having ever left Great Britain after he settled there. He travelled extensively up and down England ; the Lake District was the source of inspiration of many of his best pictures. He also visited, and painted in, Wales and the Isle of Wight. In 1768 or 1769, he went to Scotland, to paint Melrose Abbey and Dalkeith for the Duke of Buccleuch. A landscape entitled "Tivoli" and attributed to him, which was shown at the loan exhibition held in the Whitechapel Art Gallery in 1913, might give some ground for a belief that he had visited Italy. But it is more likely to have been the work of his son and namesake, who certainly did paint many pictures of Tivoli, which became a fashionable subject when the Temple of the Sibyls was bought by the Earl of Bristol. Ruskin described George Barret the younger as "aiming high, but generally put off with stale repetitions—the Temple of Tivoli, etc." One of his water-colours of Tivoli is in the Victoria and Albert Museum.

In 1772 George Barret the elder settled at Westbourne Green, near the then country village of Paddington. He went there for the sake of his health, as he suffered severely from asthma, and he took a house with a fine prospect where he enjoyed frequent visits from his fellow-painters, with whom he was always most popular. "He was well-informed, an enthusiast in his art, and a delightful companion," says Henry Angelo. Fuseli describes him as "a man remarkably kind and friendly, gentle in manners, with a vast flow of spirits even to playfulness, and a strong turn to wit and humour." Perhaps the best evidence of his amiability is found in the fact that the acrimonious Barry on his way to Rome wrote him a long pleasant letter from Paris; and, waiving his usual ungracious formality, subscribed himself thereto as "yours most affectionately."

Only three portraits of Barret exist. One is his own pencil sketch of himself seen in profile, full-length, seated, which by the kindness of the Trustees of the Soane Museum I have reproduced as an illustration. A rough pencil profile, of the head only, by John Greenwood is in the British Museum. He also appears in Zoffany's group of the Royal Academicians in His Majesty the King's collection at Windsor Castle. The latter two likenesses show him to have had a mobile, intelligent countenance, though one too careworn and haggard for his age.

He died at Paddington on May the 29th, 1784, leaving his widow and nine children destitute. The Royal Academy granted the widow a pension of thirty pounds a year. In the course of time, several of the children adopted their father's profession; and the eldest made, in his turn, the name of George Barret again familiar. His landscapes in water-colour are among the best and best known of the English School, and his work is often confused with that of his father.

George Barret the elder, painted in both oils and water-colours and was masterly in both media. He also etched a few plates, which are of small importance. There seems to be no solid foundation for the statement of a recent writer on Gainsborough to the effect that "George Barret realised quite a small fortune by the sale of his small landscape studies and etchings." According to Edwards in the Anecdotes of Painting, no prints from his etchings were published until after his death, when the plates were acquired by Paul Sandby, R.A. Two views of Hawarden Castle, drawn and etched by him, were certainly published by Boydell in 1773; but as regards the rest of his etchings, Edwards is borne out by the appearance of the impressions in the British Museum, one of which is described in old manuscript as "a proof" from an etching by "the late George Barrett." Excepting the Boydell prints, none of them bears any publishers name.

His water-colours are rare, and far surpass those of his contemporaries. They are painted with great fluency and grace, and break further away from the brown convention of the time than do his oil paintings. They are also less formal in design. The bold blueness of their skies, though usually now much faded, excites particular admiration, when the distaste of the eighteenth century public for primary colour in landscape is remembered. Like John Sell Cotman, he was fond of painting water-colour landscapes in monochrome. These were executed at times in Indian ink, and at times in washes of pale pure blue. Occasionally they were drawn on an almost miniature scale. It has been said "that his studies from Nature with a blacklead pencil are excellent." Ephraim Hardcastle, in The Somerset House Gazette and Literary Museum: or Weekly Miscellany of Fine Arts, Antiquities and Literary Chit-Chat for 1824 declares "that he painted in body-colours, or what is termed by the French who excel in that process gwash": but I cannot trace any of his landscapes in either pencil or gouache.

To our modern eyes, taught by Monet to perceive the vivid yellows and violets that glow in all sunny scenes, Barret's oil paintings often appear too heavy and dark in tone, too pervaded with sombre, olive tints. It comes as a great surprise to find critics near his own time lauding, as they invariably do, the freshness and greenness of his scenery. In Pilkington's Dictionary of Painters he is praised for the "dewy freshness" of his colour. Samuel Redgrave declares that "he represents English scenery in its true freshness and richness, excelling in the verdure peculiar to Spring." When his work is compared with that of other popular eighteenth century landscape painters, the reason for such eulogies becomes more clear. Sir George Beaumont, that clever amateur painter and critic, who exercised such influence on the taste of his time, always painted his trees brown with deliberate intention. Even Gainsborough's trees are sometimes brown in spite, as it were, of his better self. As a rule, the general aspect of an Irish woodland scene is noticeably more moist and vivid than anything of the sort to be seen in England, and Barret's early studies in the Wicklow woods probably kept him from being overwhelmed by the example of his English colleagues, who rendered the foliage of ash, oak, elm and willow alike in bituminous gloom.

Still more remarkable than the comparatively bright colour of Barret's oil paintings is the fine feeling for light which they display. Not Wilson, nor even Claude, could convey the clear level light of a warm afternoon with more competent assurance than does Barret. He never rises to the heights occasionally attained by such Masters; but the standard of his later work is far beyond the reach of talent untouched by inspiration.

The composition of his oil paintings, as distinguished from the water-colours, which are less formal, is usually a curious blend of the artificial and the well-observed. His rocks, trees and clouds are often arranged in an improbable fashion, but they are always drawn with great understanding of their structure.

The technique of his painting shows that dexterous ease which comes from long years of labour praised and well-rewarded. His brushwork is sure, light and expressive. His glazing is unusually skilful. The paint, save in the high-lights of a cloud, a rock, or a tree trunk is thin, yet always satisfying.

The little figures which enliven most of his landscapes were sometimes done by himself; but more often by his friend and fellow-Academician, Sawrey Gilpin. In return, he frequently painted the landscapes in Gilpin's pictures of animals. Gilpin was not the only Academician who so assisted him. One of his best pictures, a view looking towards Knipe Scar and Lowther Park, which is in the possession of the Right Honourable the Speaker, and which, with his kind permission, I reproduce as an illustration, represents a cluster of hills through which some sportsmen and their dogs are advancing. The dogs were painted by George Stubbs, A.R.A., and the sportsmen by Philip Reinagle, R.A. In the room which he decorated at Norbury Park in Surrey he was assisted by Gilpin, Cipriani and Pastorini—Cipriani doing the figures, Gilpin the cattle, and Pastorini the sky. A painting by him, sold in 1802, contained figures then attributed to Francis Wheatley, R.A., who had only died the year previously.

Such collaborations afford proof of Barret's desire for friendly intercourse with his fellows, rather than of his incapacity to complete his own work. The figures in some of his early landscapes, such as those in the "Powerscourt Waterfall" of the Irish National Gallery and those in my own picture reproduced as a frontispiece to this book, were done by himself and often well done too; and Edwards says "he sometimes painted animals which he executed in a bold and masterly manner." He did a portrait of a spaniel for Lord Edward Bentinck, which was in the exhibition of the Society of British Artists in 1768, and was afterwards engraved by James Watson; and a picture of "A Bull" which was in the Academy exhibition of 1770. The figures and horses in the two of his water-colours in the Victoria and Albert Museum, which are also reproduced here, were competently done by himself.

His pictures are rarely signed in any way, and sometimes merely initialled. The example in the Nottingham Gallery is signed in full "G Barret" and dated 1777: but no signature appears for Gilpin, who did the horses and the figures therein.

Few things could be more to the credit of Barret's mind and taste than the fact that the beauty of Wilson's painting so wrought on him that his own work, towards the end of his career, began to show the strongest resemblances to that of his more gifted, but poor and unpopular, rival. Barret's first style had pleased the public and brought him success. He abandoned it, to follow a failure whom he knew to be his superior. Wilson and he were personal friends; which goes to show that he was not chary with his praise, for Wilson was a fiery spirit who chafed under neglect. The friendship between the despised genius and the man of fully, if not over-rated talent, is a clear proof of the high character of both. Many a "Wilson" has since their deaths been sold as a "Barret" to purchasers, who were, nevertheless, not without taste and knowledge. If Barret while living was unduly exalted above Wilson, the growth of Wilson's fame has had the curious effect of gradually, but effectively, obliterating Barret's reputation.

Were more of his pictures accessible in the public collections this state of things would cease. There is no just antithesis between the two men's works. Barret set narrower limits to his aims, but within his limits he was a master of his art. The Speaker lent the "View looking towards Knipe Scar" to the National Gallery during part of the War. It hung in a room with many excellent pictures of the English school, including a couple by Wilson, and held its own in that distinguished company.

Keswick and Derwentwater, which he lent to the White-chapel Exhibition of 1913. Other notable pictures by Barret in England are to be seen in the collection of the King at Windsor Castle, and in the collections of the Duke of Portland and the Duke of Buccleuch.

Norbury Park, near Leatherhead, in Surrey, which contains Barret's well-known decorated room, has been acquired recently by Sir William Corry, Bart. The room was done to the order of the Reverend John Lock. It measures twenty-nine feet by twenty-three feet and is fourteen-and-a-half feet high. The decoration takes the form of a species of panorama of Cumberland scenery, divided into panels by slender, pictured pilasters and trellis work. The ceiling depicts the interior of a roof with an oval opening to the sky in the centre. The whole is intended to represent a prospect seen from a light summer-house. The work was painted directly on a stucco ground in oils, and must have been done with uncommon technical skill, for it survives in almost perfect preservation to the present day. It is curious to note that the Victorian History of Surrey, which records so much of little interest, does not mention this remarkable room. John Britton and Edward W. Brayley, in 1801, referred to it in the volume of The Beautys of England and Wales, which is devoted to Surrey. But they err in stating that Barret decorated more than one room at Norbury Park.

Acknowledged works by Barret are not as plentiful in Ireland as might be imagined, considering that he did not leave the country till he was thirty. Yet his name is heard constantly in Irish auction rooms, for it is customary there to attribute to him every mediocre eighteenth century landscape : a practice which, naturally, has tended to increase his disrepute. Two undoubtedly original paintings by him are in the Royal Dublin Society's premises at Leinster House. Two are at Castletown, Co. Kildare; and two at Donacomper in the same county. The Right Hon. Laurence A. Waldron owns a very attractive view of Powerscourt Waterfall seen from a distance. It is unusually small, measuring only twenty-eight-and-a-half inches high by twenty-seven inches wide. The Castletown pictures and one from Donacomper were lent, by their respective owners, Captain Connolly and Mr. Kirkpatrick, to the Irish International Exhibition of 1907, and were admired there.

It is to be hoped that the Governors of the National Gallery in Dublin will soon find an opportunity of acquiring, by gift or purchase, a really representative work by Barret, for he was a painter of whom the Irish people have sound reason to be proud.

William Lowther, P.C., D.C.L., LL.D. Speaker of the House of Commons.

Oils on canvas.

44 inches high by $63\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide.

This picture was painted from Naddle Forest, just above Haweswater, Westmoreland. The Speaker tells me that the bottom of the valley depicted may soon be turned into a lake, as the Manchester Corporation design to acquire it for the purpose of forming a gigantic reservoir for the supply of water to Manchester and other Lancashire towns.

The quality of the painting shows Barret's matured technique at its best. The tone of the picture is a luminous golden brown, with a warm, grey autumn sky. The sportsmen were painted by Philip Reinagle, R.A., and the animals by George Stubbs, A.R.A. They are all so well placed, and their colouring so harmonised with the landscape, that Barret must be supposed to have planned their position and treatment. The foremost man wears a black hat, a white choker with a blue ribbon, a buff suit, and boots with pink tops. The second man's suit is of French grey. The third man, on horseback, wears a suit of pale blue-grey.

This picture was lent by the Speaker to the London National Gallery for some time during the War.

SUNSET AND RUINS.

In the possession of the author.

Oils on canvas.

25 inches high by 30 inches long.

Unsigned.

This picture was evidently a late work of Barret's, and one in which he was much influenced by Richard Wilson, R.A. It depicts a sunset scene. The sky, flooded with orange light, merges into a cool blue in the top right corner. The ruin against the sky is a warm reddish grey: the near isolated block is covered with ivy. The low trees and bushes fringing the pool are most carefully distinguished in colour and form; and rendered, in an accomplished way, by glaze after glaze of translucent tints. The rocks, creepers and roots in the foreground are drawn with great freedom, in a solid, satisfying impasto. The tree on the shoulder of the hill, and the outline of the principal tree in the foreground are painted with the thinnest possible rubbing of paint, to produce the effect of being suffused with the light of the setting sun. The line of mountains in the extreme background is soft blue. The figures and boat were not done by Barret himself. They are probably the work of Sawrey Gilpin. The sitting man in the stern of the boat wears a red coat: the standing man, wielding the fishing rod, wears a blue coat and buff breeches.

14 $\frac{5}{8}$ inches high by 21 inches wide.

Mr. Martin Hardie, A.R.E., the Assistant Keeper of the Department of Engraving, Illustration, Design and Painting in the Museum, has kindly given me the following description of this drawing, as it is many years since I have seen it myself and it is not at present accessible to the public owing to the closing of part of the Museum during the War.

“The drawing has faded considerably, and indigo in sky, distance and trees, has probably disappeared. The whole scheme of colour is very pale, giving an effect of earth colours and greys, with a suggestion of autumn tints. The foliage of the right-hand tree of the three trees on the left, and of the trees to the right on the cliffs, is blue-grey in tone. The man on the near horse, which is of a brownish tint, wears red waistcoat and blue breeches: the further horse is in pale yellow ochre.

There is no pen-work in this drawing.”

Signed, in lower right corner, in pencil—“G. Barrett, 1782.”

Mr. Martin Hardie, A.R.E., the Assistant Keeper of the Department of Engraving, Illustration, Design and Painting in the Museum, has also kindly given me the following description of this drawing.

“This drawing, though fresher than the other,” (Plate IV), “is also in pale autumnal tints. The foliage on the trees to the left is definitely a pale brown. The trees to the right still retain a certain amount of grey-green.

The rushes in the foreground are a golden ochre. The horse in the centre is white, the other two a yellowish colour repeating tones in the trees and foreground.

The rider on the left wears a red coat.

The figures and horses are outlined with pen and ink.”

This drawing was reproduced as a full-page illustration in the first edition of Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse's The Earlier English Water-colour Painters (1890). It was omitted from the second edition.

JAMES ARTHUR O'CONNOR

Oil painting on millboard by himself.

Size of original; $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches high by $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide.

In the possession of Mrs. Bury and reproduced by her kind permission.

JAMES ARTHUR O'CONNOR

JAMES ARTHUR O'CONNOR was born in Dublin in 1792. He was the son of a printseller and engraver who at that time was established in 15, Aston's Quay. The son probably got his first impulse towards painting from the study of his father's wares. The only formal teaching he ever enjoyed was received from William Sadler, the second, whose small copies after old masters, and little paintings on panel of Irish town and country scenery, are so well known and popular in Ireland. Sadler was an indifferent artist; but he had a good workmanlike way of handling paint which he succeeded in communicating to his pupil, who eventually surpassed him in every artistic quality.

Like Barret, O'Connor was attracted to the Dargle in his student days and did many landscape studies there. But his first exhibit, evidently, was not a landscape. It was entitled "Card Players" and shown at the exhibition of the Society of Artists of Ireland in 1809, when he was seventeen. He continued to exhibit, confining himself for the future to landscapes, with fair regularity at the annual exhibitions of the various Societies of Irish painters, until the year 1821, when he left Ireland never to return.

The project of settling in England was conceived by him early in his career. He attempted in 1813, for the first time, to put it into execution; and in company with George Petrie and Francis Danby, both artist friends of his, the latter also in some degree his pupil, he went to London in the June of that year. They got little encouragement there. Petrie soon returned home, and became, in due course, president of the Royal Hibernian Academy. O'Connor and Danby made their way together on foot to Bristol, where they arrived without a shilling. Danby, however, managed to sell a couple of his studies of Wicklow scenery and emboldened by this success elected to remain where he was and to try his fortune afresh. He obtained patronage there, and afterwards became a popular Associate of the Royal Academy. O'Connor had had no such encouragement, and was reduced to such straits that it was only with Danby's assistance that he was able to return to Ireland.

His failure on this occasion is not so surprising as those who only know his later work might think. I have seen a collection of ten landscapes all done by him before his twenty-fifth year. They show nothing more than promise, and a great resemblance to the uninspired manner of his master, Sadler. In only one, and that the latest, can a trace of his own natural feeling and pleasant handling be discerned. He was an artist who developed with unusual slowness.

On his return to Dublin he set up as a landscape painter, first at Aston's Quay and afterwards in Dawson Street and painted, with unremitting labour, scenery round Dublin and in Wicklow. There was little demand for his work. In 1818 and 1819 he toured and painted in the west of Ireland. The Lords Sligo and Clanrickard of the time purchased some of the pictures done on this tour. A couple of them are still in the collection of the present Lord Sligo. Four drawings done on the same occasion are in the British Museum.

In 1820 O'Connor received a premium of twenty-five guineas from the Royal Irish Institute, which, however, does not seem to have improved either his practice or his prospects. He had married; and felt himself driven again to try his chance in a larger sphere. So, in 1822, he went once more to London. He began to show his work immediately in the Royal Academy exhibition and sold several pictures. From thenceforth to his death he continued to be a constant contributor at the annual exhibitions of the Royal Academy, the British Institution, and the Society of British Artists. He became a member of the last-mentioned body. He exhibited in the Royal Hibernian Academy only twice in his lifetime, sending, from London, a single landscape to the exhibition of 1830 and three landscapes to that of 1840.

His second migration to London proved successful to the extent of encouraging him to adventure further afield. In May, 1826, he went to Belgium for a year, in the company of a French dealer named Collier, and there painted and disposed of many pictures. His success was clouded : for while in Brussels he was swindled of a considerable sum of money. He seems to have been always easily duped.

Henry Ottley in his Dictionary of Recent and Living Painters, published in 1866, refers to a second Belgian trip which, according to him, took place in 1830. O'Connor, he declares, was driven back to England by the Revolution of that year. Ottley is sometimes inaccurate, and I can find no evidence to support these statements.

In 1832 O'Connor, accompanied by his wife, went to Paris where he painted for eight months, probably, with even better success than he had had in Brussels, for the French had been fired with an enthusiasm for British landscape painting by the Constable pictures shown in the exhibition of 1824. From Paris he intended to go to Italy. But on the eve of his departure, while dining with his wife at a restaurant outside the city, he met a plausible stranger who professed great interest in his art and persuaded him instead to go to Germany. This person, who called himself Elliott, promised him introductions, among others, to a certain Herr Boch Bushman, whom he described as an important resident of Metlach. The name might have put O'Connor on his guard : it has a farcical and suspicious aspect. But there was, in fact, a Herr Boch Bushman at Metlach, who happened to be the Burgomaster of the district. When O'Connor presented his credentials he learned, to his horrified surprise, that " Mr. Elliott" was the alias of a notorious scamp whom the Burgomaster had orders to arrest on sight. The adventure ended well for the artist and his wife. Herr Bushman was charmed with them, entertained them as his guests for three weeks and then sent them on their way rejoicing, armed with fresh letters of introduction written by himself. It is customary with O'Connor's biographers to denounce " Mr. Elliott" severely. But the fact remains that no one ever proved of greater use to him.

O'Connor's itinerary on this trip comprised Chalons-sur-Marne, Saarbruck, Metz, Saarlouis, Metlach, Treves, Cochem, Coblenz, Bingen, Mayence, and Frankfort. During this period he painted some of his best and most important works, many of which, in all probability, still remain in Germany.

When he came back to England in November, 1833, he did not succeed in improving his position further, and his eyesight began to fail. No greater calamity could fall upon an artist. He struggled valiantly and painted incessantly : but in 1839 his health showed signs of collapse. After a life of hard labour and little recognition he died on the 7th of January, 1841, in the cheap lodging at 6, Marlborough Street, off College Street, Brompton, where he was then living with his wife. This lodging was his eleventh successive residence in London, which goes to show what a troubled and restless life his must have been.

Several of his works were exhibited at the Royal Hibernian Academy exhibitions of 1842 and 1843.

He left his wife without any means of support. In 1845 a movement was set on foot by his countryman, Sir Martin Archer Shee, then President of the Royal Academy, and other influential persons to buy an annuity for her benefit. The Prince Consort headed the list of subscriptions with a donation of twenty-five guineas. The appeal circulated in the Art Union Journal for April 1st, 1845, on this occasion, began by declaring that “There are few who love art who have not some acquaintance with the admirable works of James O'Connor. They are becoming scarce—and will ere long be very valuable notwithstanding that he produced so many.” It went on to complain that he “was never able to extricate himself from the hands of dealers,” and concluded with the following extraordinary quatrain, misquoted from Moore's threnody on Sheridan :

“In the plains of the East there are insects who prey
On the brain of the elk till his very last sigh;
Oh, Genius! thy patrons more cruel than they
First feed on thy brain and then leave thee to die.”

Sir Martin Archer Shee, who had a solid literary reputation to lose, can hardly have taken much interest in the drafting of this petition.

Most of O'Connor's work, and all that by which he is best known, is in oils. He also painted in water-colours. In his youth, he did a few etchings of figures. Three of these were published in Dublin in 1810. They represent peasants of a rather Dutch type. Though not ill-drawn they are in no way remarkable as works of art. The magazine Hibernia, referring to them, ‘ventured to predict the success of this young artist, if by constantly uniting literary study with professional practice he endeavoured to deserve it.' Five more etchings by him, of a similar character, were published in London by T. North probably in, or about, the year 1824.

O'Connor painted in oils on millboard, panel, or canvas. His happiest and most characteristic work is found, as a rule, on little panels of oak prepared with a thin gesso-like priming. His earlier pictures are stiff and hard in drawing and too topographical. The catalogue of the Irish National Gallery is wrong in declaring that they are his best. Sadler's influence was but a passing phase. He was of a more romantic temperament than Sadler and was never really at ease in his teacher's cheap and empty convention. Barret's work influenced him later to better purposes : and Constable's, which he became acquainted with in his maturity, left a lasting, though not always fortunate, effect. His later pieces show, occasionally, as the result of his study of Constable's work, a calculated dramatic stress altogether alien to his placid spirit. This can be noticed in such a fine picture as "The Devil's Glen," lately given to the National Gallery of Ireland by its Director, Captain R. Langton Douglas.

In one branch of O'Connor's art we have to search for a predecessor as far back as Aart Van der Neer : for O'Connor was the only landscape painter in these islands who painted moonlight scenes with anything like the truth and force of the Dutchman who was the first to essay them seriously. He, also, often closely observed and cleverly reproduced the misty effects of early morning.

Many of his pictures show a trick of art which he was particularly fond of, the introduction into the landscape of a little figure in a red cloak or wearing a red cap, by which device of contrast he gave his greens great value and brilliancy. Indeed, his greens are often so brilliant that some of the critics of his time, Samuel Redgrave included, were inclined to charge him with overdoing that colour. The device is one well known to forgers of O'Connor's work, and I have seen many pictures confidently attributed to him on no better ground than that of a little figure flaunting a scarlet garment.

The way in which O'Connor handled paint was very workmanlike, and particularly adapted to his smaller scale pictures. He developed a deft, rapid touch, indicating foliage with peculiar crispness. Oak trees were his speciality. He used his colours rather dry and liked a good impasto in the more highly keyed passages. In his sketches the clouds are put in, at times, with the palette knife. His shadows are thinly laid; they tend to a golden brown tone: and some bituminous pigment which he used for that effect has caused many of them to crack, though not seriously. His little figures are excellently drawn and placed. When a young man he collaborated once or twice with Joseph Peacock, afterwards a Royal Hibernian Academician, who probably contributed the figures to his landscapes: but he stood thenceforth upon his own unaided merits.

His more important pictures are generally signed in full 'J. A. O'Connor' and dated. Less important ones are often only initialled 'J. A. O'C.', but they, too, are usually dated.

He painted only one portrait, so far as I know. It was of himself, before he left Ireland, and is at present in the possession of Mrs. Bury of Ardilaun Terrace, the North Circular Road, Dublin, whose late husband is said to have bought it, many years ago, from the painter's sister. Mrs. Bury has kindly allowed me to reproduce it among the illustrations to this book. It is on millboard and measures three-and-a-half inches by four-and-a-half. He shows himself in a blue coat and high white stock, aged about thirty, with fine eyes, a sensitive mouth, a straight nose and a broad forehead. But his look is troubled, as though he presaged his sad career.

All who knew him united to praise him as a man. Henry Ottley, who apparently never met him, is alone in suggesting that his death was due to intemperate habits. A flamboyant eulogy of his charm of mind and manner appeared in the Dublin Magazine for April, 1842, signed "M." The initial probably stood for George Mulvany, a member of the Royal Hibernian Academy, who afterwards became the first Director of the Irish National Gallery. He was a life-long friend of O'Connor's and described him as "a spirit of exceeding mildness; manly, ardent, unobtrusive and sincere; generous in proclaiming contemporary merit and unskilled and reluctant to put forth his own." Danby, in a letter to Petrie, refers to him after his death as "our dearly remembered friend, poor James O'Connor."

O'Connor is well represented in the public collections of both England and Ireland. The South Kensington Museum contains nine of his oil paintings. The Mappin Art Gallery at Sheffield contains two. The Nottingham Gallery holds one example; and so does the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge. Eight of his drawings are in the British Museum. The National Gallery of Ireland has five oil paintings, six water-colour drawings, of which three are in sepia; and thirty-two most interesting pen and pencil sketches from his note-book. He died at an early age, but he worked very hard all his life, and, as his pictures are generally on a small scale, he must have produced great numbers of them. He exhibited, in various societies, over one hundred and twenty works. Nearly all these were what he would consider his more important pieces. The British Institution alone recorded the size of exhibits, and many of his works sent there were, according to the catalogues, over nine square feet in area. One shown in 1830, was over sixteen square feet. Any-thing smaller than four square feet was exceptional.

It is by his little pictures, measured in inches, that his fame is best secured. These he did not care generally to exhibit : but they formed the larger part of his output. " His landscapes," wrote Richard Garnett, in The Dictionary of National Biography, " were usually small and unpretending, but, to judge by the specimens now accessible, of extraordinary merit. . . . He was a poet with the brush and exquisitely reproduced the impressions inspired by the more romantic and solemn aspects of nature."

There must be hundreds of his smaller pictures extant. They are not likely to become scarce nor very valuable in the near future, and room might be found with advantage for a few more in public galleries, at least in those of Ireland. They are exactly the sort of things which help to stimulate the love of landscape and landscape painting in simple, unsophisticated people.

A VIEW IN CASTLE COOTE DEMESNE.

In the possession of the Right Honourable Lord Justice O'Connor, P.C.

Oils on canvas.

24½ inches high by 30 inches wide.

Signed in the lower right corner:-

“J. A. O'Connor, 1840.”

The tone of the picture is golden brown: there is a very faint touch of blue in the sky. It is painted in a vigorous, easy style, with good solid impasto. It contains no figure, an unusual omission in pictures by O'Connor.

This, in all probability, was O'Connor's last work; and, if so, it was done for Captain Chidley Coote, of Huntingdon, Queens County, his most consistent and generous patron. Captain Coote, hearing of his illness, sent him some money; and, during a period of relief, O'Connor, in return, painted for him what George Mulvaney, R.H.A., described as “a very able picture which he valued at Twenty Guineas.”

It afterwards came into the possession of the late Charles Bennett, Esq., who exhibited it at the Dublin Exhibition of Arts and Industries in 1872. It was sold by auction, in August 1918, to a dealer who, in his turn, sold it to Lord Justice O'Connor.

Signed: "J. A. O'Connor, 1835," in the lower right corner.

This is probably O'Connor's best moonlight piece, if not the best picture he ever painted. It is not, as so many admired "moonlights" are, a mere monochrome of silvery blue. The landscape is studied with great care and is full of cool greens. The handling of the paint is masterly. If the picture has a fault, it is that the moon is too white, with a whiteness accentuated by the naturalistic, faint touch of warm orange in the surrounding cloud. I think the composition might have been improved by pulling a denser veil of cloud across the moon. The figures are admirably drawn, and placed with great dramatic effect. The late Sir Richard Garnett, C.B., LL.D., in his article on O'Connor in the Dictionary of National Biography, justly described this picture as a "composition steeped in Irish sentiment." It is badly hung in the Gallery, the moon being on the level of the spectator's eyes, and the figures and the landscape lost in reflected lights from the floor and balustrade.

It was acquired from the late Lord Powerscourt in 1879 for the sum of twenty-six pounds. Another picture in the Irish National Gallery, entitled "Moonlight" (No. 158), measuring 7 inches by 6½ inches, was possibly used as a study for the more important work.

"The Poachers" was lent by the Governors and Guardians of the National Gallery of Ireland to the Exhibition of Works by Irish Artists held in the Guildhall, London, in 1904. It was reproduced in half-tone in the catalogue of that exhibition.

A lowering grey sky hangs over distant trees and a leaden-coloured hill. The water is brown, running rapidly, with touches of pure white in the cascade. The rest of the picture is in varying tints of brown. The bluff behind the centre figures is a little cracked, owing to the use of some bitumenous pigment to which the artist was addicted. The figures are very well and crisply drawn. The sitting man wears a blue-grey coat, with buff breeches. The woman leading the child wears the usual red cloak.

Oils on millboard.

8 inches high by 12 inches wide.

Signed: "J. A. O'C. 1839" in the lower right corner.

This is an unusually bright picture for O'Connor. The sky is warm and clouded, with blue and mauve tints. The oak on the left, and the woods in the middle distance are full of finely arranged greens. The road in the foreground, and the rock, are in warm golden yellows and browns. The little figure wears a blue bonnet, blue-green dress, and the usual scarlet cloak.

It is a charming and typical example of O'Connor's art, in exceptionally perfect preservation.

This was probably a sketch composition for a larger picture. The sky is greenish blue, with a warm cream-coloured cloud. The distance, middle distance and foreground are in varying shades of yellow-green. The two figures in the foreground are in grey-green. The figure seen on the left, near the approach to the bridge, wears a red garment.

WALTER FREDERICK OSBORNE, R.H.A.

Oil painting on canvas by himself. In the National Gallery of Ireland.

Size of original; 17 inches high by 13½ inches wide.

WALTER FREDRICK OSBORNE, R.H.A.

I FEAR that those of my readers who are fortunate enough to possess portraits by Walter Osborne will take exception to my ranking him among landscape painters. They will desire to remind me that most of the important works of the latter part of his career were portraits. Doubtless, he was a thoroughly accomplished portrait painter, and as such was chiefly patronised. But landscape painting won his earliest and his lasting affection; and in his landscapes there is much more than accomplishment. Had he obtained the encouragement and reward to which his talents in that branch of art entitled him, I fancy he would not now be known at all as a portrait painter. He is not yet known, either as landscape painter or as portrait painter, to the extent his work deserves.

In the latest edition of Bryant's Dictionary of Painters and Gravers, published in 1904, the year after his death, he is described as "Walter P. Osborne, an Englishman who settled in Ireland." His full name was Walter Fredrick Osborne, and he was born at Castlewood Avenue, Rathmines, Co. Dublin, on the 17th of June, 1859. His father, himself of Dublin birth, was a popular artist and a Royal Hibernian Academician, who is now chiefly remembered as a painter of dogs and horses; but who could also paint an excellent equestrian portrait. The father's pictures are sometimes confused with the early work of his more distinguished son who, as a student, felt his influence greatly. The similarity of their signatures makes the confusion worse confounded.

Walter Osborne once told a friend that as a boy he felt no desire to adopt his father's profession. However, he must have made up his mind to do so long before he reached manhood, for when he was seventeen he entered the school of the Royal Hibernian Academy. A few months afterwards he showed at the Academy exhibition a little picture of the family fox terrier, "Zoë," and modestly priced it at five guineas. He called himself in the catalogue "Fred Osborne," probably to avoid confusion between his name and his father's. It was not till 1885 that he appears as Walter F. Osborne.

In the second year of his studentship he was represented at the Academy by two landscapes and a study of a collie dog. He won a silver medal at the Academy school in the same year; and in 1880 was awarded the Albert Prize for a large landscape in oils which he entitled "A Glade in the Phoenix Park." It represents a pool, closely fringed with willows and ash trees, in which a wading boy fishes with rod, line, and float. On the bank, a little mongrel terrier guards his coat and bottle of bait. The distance is closed with a rustic bridge shining in a shaft of sunlight. This painting was afterwards in my own possession for a while, and I remember Sir Hugh Lane remarking—with reference to its close detail—that it afforded yet another proof of the fact that good landscape painters generally commence their career as pre-Raphaelites. The work is certainly an astonishing one for a youth of twenty who had received little instruction. It measures about thirty inches by forty inches. Every leaf in the glade seems to have been separately studied; and yet the whole effect is quite broad and harmonious. It shows, too, a preoccupation with difficult problems of lighting which was far in advance of his time.

Miss Jane French is the fortunate owner of an early sketch book of the artist's, which contains several careful pencil studies for this picture. The boy and the dog are drawn in a variety of poses. In one design a fishing net is sketched as an alternative to the rod. In another a second boy is introduced as a spectator. All through his subsequent career Osborne showed a similar assiduity in the preparation of plans for his more important pictures.

He followed up his success with the "Glade in the Phoenix Park" by winning the Taylor Scholarship of the Royal Dublin Society in 1881, and again in 1882.

Later in 1882 he went to Amsterdam to study under Charles Verlat, with whom he remained for two years. Verlat was a painter with a great love for sunlight and a great power of painting it, both of which he probably acquired during a long sojourn in the Holy Land. He strengthened and developed Osborne's own natural love of sunlight, and many of his pupil's subsequent landscapes are remarkable for the ease and truthfulness with which they convey warm, sunny effects.

Osborne was elected, during his absence abroad, early in 1883, an Associate of the Royal Hibernian Academy, and sent home to the Academy exhibition next following his election, eleven paintings of Belgian scenery, some of them being little more than sketches. The year after he was represented by no fewer than fifteen landscapes, which included Breton as well as Belgian views. In 1885 he sent landscapes from Surrey and Warwickshire. In 1886 he was elected a full member of the Hibernian Academy, presumably on the merits of his landscapes alone.

About this time he established a custom of spending his summers, as a boarder, in secluded English farm-houses, particularly in those of Surrey, Sussex, Oxfordshire, Berkshire, Warwickshire, and Norfolk. The fruits of these holidays mingled with pictures of scenes in the Dublin streets were shown every spring in the Hibernian Academy exhibitions and brought him considerable reputation but indifferent material success.

His landscapes almost invariably contained figures which were beautifully drawn and placed. Sometimes he even made the landscape subservient to the figures, as in one or two of his admirable pictures of the benches in Stephen's Green. More rarely still, and generally in his earliest period, he painted interiors in which figures were of prime importance. A noticeable example of this phase is in the possession of the Royal Irish Yacht Club. He also did several small portraits where the setting was at least as carefully treated as the sitter. One of the best of these is that of Captain Stephen Gwynn, representing—in the Captain's own words—"a very young man smoking a pipe while he reads, seen up against a studio table littered with brushes and palettes and a wall nailed over with sketches." Another is of Mr. J. B. S. MacIlwaine, R.H.A., sitting in summer sunshine in a garden.

Osborne does not seem to have thought seriously about portraiture, in the usual sense of the word, until the "eighteen-nineties" were well begun. The first important portrait in oils which he exhibited was one of the late Dr. Anthony Corley. It was shown at the Royal Hibernian Academy exhibition in the year 1889. In 1890 he showed no portrait. In the next year a competent but rather dull portrait of Edward Dowden—now in the National Gallery of Ireland—created the vogue which kept him busily occupied until his premature death, wasting his talent in immortalising the people of reputation, rank, or fashion in Dublin. He painted over a hundred of them in little more than ten years. I am not suggesting that many of these portraits are not most cleverly done. Occasionally he rises in them to a high degree of excellence, for example, in his portraits of Mrs. Noël Guinness and her Daughter, of Miss Honor O'Brien, of Sir Walter Armstrong, and of Canon Travers Smith. But his heart was not thoroughly in them. He openly confessed that he went to them with feelings of real distaste.

For a while his landscape painting continued to flourish beside his essays in portraiture. In 1895 he went on a tour in Spain with Sir Walter Armstrong, then Director of the Irish National Gallery; and, in the year following, on a tour to Holland with the same companion. Landscapes painted in both these countries were duly exhibited in the Hibernian Academy. They were almost the last of their kind. In 1898 four, of his total of five, exhibits were portraits. From thenceforth his landscape work was relegated to the second place in his endeavours. He still painted landscapes in his holidays, and still, occasionally, sent one or two to the exhibitions. But he felt, as a greater master of both landscape and portraiture, Thomas Gainsborough, must have felt when he showed his landscapes to the Lord Lansdowne of his time saying: "People won't buy 'em, you know. I'm a landscape painter, and yet they come to me for portraits." Osborne had more reason to regret the public's predilections than had Gainsborough, for, unlike Gainsborough, he was far greater in his landscapes than in his portraits. He knew this himself and deplored the disloyalty to his art into which he was led by a most chivalrous loyalty to his family. Yet when seven years had passed without his being able to sell a single important landscape, he wrenched himself from what he truly loved and turned unflinchingly to what he thought was duty.

Like many good painters, Osborne possessed a shrewd business sense, and took every legitimate opportunity of increasing his reputation, showing his wares wherever and whenever he could. As a result, notwithstanding the moderate prices he asked for them, and the still more moderate prices he generally received, he left a fortune of close on £4,000.

In 1881 he commenced to exhibit in England, sending a picture to the Walker Art Gallery of Liverpool, which institution he continued to favour with fair regularity until his death. His work found plenty of admirers and an occasional purchaser in Lancashire, though the Liverpool Corporation never thought fit to add an example of it to their permanent collection. In 1884 he first sent pictures to London, to the Institute of Painters in Oil Colours which is now known as the Society of Oil Painters. In 1886, the year of his election to the full membership of the Royal Hibernian Academy, he began his series of contributions to the Royal Academy exhibitions which continued, annually, as long as he lived. The Royal Birmingham Society of Artists attracted his notice in 1888, and he exhibited with them on eight occasions during the next decade. He sent pictures at longer intervals to the New English Art Club, and to Newcastle-on-Tyne. The Grosvenor Gallery, The New Gallery and Bradford all displayed examples of his art at least once. During the ten years' life of the Dublin Arts Club, Osborne contributed no fewer than eighty-two pictures to its annual shows. He acted as honorary secretary of the fine art section of the club for the year 1892—93.

The trustees of the Chantry Bequest conferred distinction on him in 1892 by purchasing, for twenty-five guineas, a pastel shown in the Royal Academy exhibition of that year. It is entitled "Life in the Streets—Hard Times," depicting a winter scene in a busy back street near Saint Patrick's Cathedral, and is one of the best, and at the same time most popular, of the more modern drawings in the Tate Gallery. I think that Mildred Butler and Edwin Hayes are the only two other Irish names which appear on the list of Chantry purchases since the fund was inaugurated in 1877. No oil painting by an Irish artist has ever been purchased therefrom.

At the Paris International Exhibition of 1900 his portrait of "Mrs. Noel Guinness and her Daughter" was adjudged worthy of a bronze medal, and its frame was labelled by the authorities to that effect. But at the close of the exhibition Osborne was invited to forward the cost of the medal he had won; and, as he very properly refused to do so, he never received his prize. Another honour, one rarely conferred on an Irish artist, was offered to him in the same year when Lord Cadogan, the Viceroy, wished to make him a knight in recognition of his merits as a painter. He modestly declined the dignity.

On the 24th April, 1903, Osborne died suddenly of double pneumonia, in the house where he was born and where all his life was spent. He was only forty-three years of age when he died, and was unmarried. His father had predeceased him two years before, but his mother lived for seven years longer. As he had always shown a generous temperament, a sense of fun and a spirit of sportsmanship, he left a wide circle of personal friends to whom his charming personality had endeared him. These were by no means all artists or art-lovers, for he had no inveterate taste for such company.

Many of his friends knew him principally as a cricketer. Indeed, Sir Walter Armstrong, in his article on Osborne in the Dictionary of National Biography, records a general belief that had he not won a reputation at the easel he might have done so on the crease. Captain Stephen Gwynn says: "He was by nature the most destructive kind of left-hand bowler."

His death was a serious injury to art in Ireland. He was the one Irish artist who, with a great and growing reputation in England, elected to live and work in his own country; and his influence there grew steadily from year to year. Had he lived out the normal span of life he could scarcely have failed to raise the general level of Irish taste, and might even, at last, have excited in Irish people an impulse to patronise living painters.

Shortly after his death a memorial exhibition of his work was organised at the Royal Hibernian Academy. The exhibits covered his whole career, and numbered two hundred and sixty-nine.

Osborne worked in most media. He painted with equal facility in both oils and water-colour : he also did many fine drawings in pastel and, at least, two etchings. There is no Irish painter who comes near rivalling his versatility, either in range of subject or in variety of technique. His work shows the most scholarly appreciation of the possibilities and limitations of each method. His landscapes in oil are, at times, perhaps too fluidly painted ; and in some cases they show a tendency to crack. They never show a trace of underpainting nor of ill-considered arrangement. His manner of laying paint became broader and more free with each succeeding year—not less careful but more skilful. The way in which he signed his pictures reflects this gradual change. The works of his early and middle period are usually signed with his full name and the date, in slender printed capitals, at the bottom of the picture. Towards the end of his life the signature is always in cursive script, often of a dashing and undecipherable kind, and is placed in whatever corner it would best suit the general composition. Excellent work was often left unsigned, or merely initialled. His water-colours were often signed in ink with a pen.

Osborne's larger pictures were all on canvas. The small ones and sketches are often found painted directly on unprimed white wood panels.

Water-colours did not appeal to him as much as oils. He has not left many water-colour drawings, and, apparently, produced very few until comparatively late in life. All I have seen are bold and direct in handling. He was not of the school that eschews the use of body colour as something entirely noxious. There are passages of opaque pigment in many of his water-colour drawings; yet he could manage the dangerous matter without the slightest loss of that transparent luminous effect which gives distinguishing charm and character to the best water-colour work. In one of them at least, "The Dolls' School," of the Irish National Gallery, he has reinforced the paint with a few deft touches of pastel.

His pastels were more popular in England than in Ireland: and some of his warmest admirers consider him at his happiest in this medium, though I cannot agree with them in that opinion. He seems to have sometimes neglected to mount and frame them properly. In damp climates like our own pastels have an extraordinarily precarious existence, and I have seen several excellent ones by Osborne spotted by mildew, which, when it once attacks such things, almost inevitably causes irretrievable ruin.

In most cases, however, his work of every kind stands perfectly, and will improve with time, for he laboured with full knowledge of the means to his end and laid his colours surely and cleanly.

He is very well represented in the two Dublin Galleries. Thanks to the generosity of Sir Hugh Lane, the Municipal Gallery has three of his works, one of which, now called "The Fishmarket," but originally entitled "Life in the Streets : Musicians," ranks among his best achievements. The National Gallery of Ireland has seven oil paintings, sixteen pencil, chalk and water-colour sketches, and two finished water-colours. The latter two, entitled respectively "The Dolls' School" and "The House Builders," show his powers of tender observation, rich and sympathetic colour and thorough craftsmanship in their matured perfection. London possesses, in addition to the pastel in the Tate Gallery, an excellent large landscape in oils entitled "An October Morning," which is described as "Presented by a community of Artists, as a memorial of the esteem and regard in which the late Walter Osborne was held by them." Sad to say, there is not one Irish name upon the list of donors. The Corporation of Preston showed commendable enterprise when they purchased, in 1901, his "Summer Sunshine," a fine painting of slum children in a public park.

Many most interesting scraps of information as to Osborne's tastes and temperament can be gleaned from the collection of his catalogues which his mother presented to the National Library of Ireland soon after his death. Several of them are elaborately annotated, and contain excellent sketches, a few of which are originals. He liked a "story picture," domesticities or military subjects for preference. Early catalogues show that Alma Tadema, R.A., H. Woods, R.A., Marcus Stone, R.A., and Miss Maude Goodman captured his youthful sympathies. But he also records that Mr. Mark Fisher, R.A., as far back as 1883, was painting things "rather like Constable's work," and that "Day Dreams" by Mr. George Clausen, R.A., was "by far the best picture in the Exhibition" of the Society of Oil Painters in the same year. He was an admirer of both these artists and of Mr. La Thangue, R.A., and Professor Fred Brown at the very start of their careers.

Those catalogues in the National Library which contain his sketches should, if possible, be duplicated there. They are not often consulted : but as the sketches, with one exception, are in pencil, they suffer a little with every handling. One sketch, that of an old man, entitled "A Lover of Art," on the fly leaf of the catalogue of the 1894 exhibition of the New English Arts Club, is well worthy of being framed and glazed. The Catalogue of the Dublin Loan Exhibition of 1899 is particularly rich in illustrations by Osborne. It contains careful little drawings of Millais' "The Gambler's Wife" and "Stella," Leighton's "Bather," Millet's "L'Amour Vainqueur," and Whistler's "Miss Alexander," all in pencil; and of Orchardson's "Master Baby" in pen-and-ink. His admiration of the "Miss Alexander" must, I think, have been the limit of his concession to modernity.

The study of Osborne's work discovers nothing distinctively Irish in its author. He does not seem to have any special sympathy or understanding for Irish character, or even for Irish landscape. I think his ancestry must have been predominantly English. His faith, upbringing, and environment certainly cut him off, to a considerable extent, from close contact with the majority of his fellow-countrymen. He was what "John Eglinton" calls an Anglo-Irishman, what a Sinn Feiner would probably describe contemptuously as "a West Briton." His pictures of the Dublin streets show careful observance: but it is the trained, detached observance of an intelligent foreigner. For all his interest in humanity, he never seems to see Dublin with native eyes. Obviously he was happier in Rye or Walberswick than in Galway. He did some pictures in Galway in 1893: but one need only compare his western types with those of Mr. Jack Yeats to realise Osborne's lack of anxiety to depict anything more than the mere appearance of his models. His peasants, even in the picturesque costume—tall hat, frieze coat and knee breeches—which then survived, are not nearly as Irish nor as romantic as those painted by Mr. Yeats in their present-day suits of shoddy tweed and their hideous artisan's cloth caps.

At least three portraits of Osborne exist. They are all in the nature of sketches. The self-portrait in oils in the National Gallery of Ireland, which I reproduce by kind permission of the Governors and Guardians, is a brilliant, slick piece of painting, but, judging from a pencil sketch, also in the National Gallery, by Nathaniel Hill, his friend and fellow-pupil in Antwerp, Osborne was not particularly concerned in it to do full justice to his own countenance. The third portrait, a clever and very interesting one in oils, by William Stott of Oldham, is in the possession of Miss Manning. None of these portraits seems to satisfy memories which his many friends and sitters cherish of a pleasant face and an attractive nature.

Erratum.—For "William Stott of Oldham" read "Edward Stott, A.R.A."

THE FERRY.

In the Collection of the Right Honourable Jonathan Hogg, P.C.
Oils on canvas.

36 inches high by 48 inches wide.

Signed "Walter Osborne" in upright capitals, about an inch and a half high, in the lower right corner.

This picture was painted in 1889 or '90, and is the most important large landscape of Osborne's earlier work. It is painted in a smooth manner and is a little over anxious in handling and too obvious in composition. He had not at this time quite attained the dexterity of technique and facility in composition which his latter works display.

The dominant tints in the picture are the cool grey-green of the water, the silvery greys of the sky and the low-toned browns of the massed fishing vessels. These are relieved by the pink striped shawl which the old woman in the foreground wears, the boy's blue muffler, and the little girl's neckwear delicately coloured with touches of pink, yellow and pale, bright blue.

The picture was shown in 1890 at the exhibition of the Royal Academy (No. 1113), and later in the same year at the Walker Art Gallery Liverpool, (No. 923), where it was priced one hundred guineas. In 1891 it appeared at the exhibition of the Royal Hibernian Academy (No. 32), priced eighty-four pounds; and in the autumn of that year it was shown at the exhibition of the Royal Birmingham Society of Artists with the same price affixed. In 1893 Osborne sent it to the Chicago Exhibition. He did not sell it during his lifetime: and it was shown by his executors at the Memorial Exhibition of his works held in the Royal Hibernian Academy in the winter of 1903, (No. 20), where they also showed a sketch of the same subject, (No. 20), now in the possession of Mr. Herbert Hone. A reproduction from a pen-and-ink drawing by the artist appeared in Henry Blackburn's "Academy Notes" for 1890; and a reproduction by photographic half-tone process appeared in an illustrated souvenir of the Chicago Exhibition, entitled "The World's Columbian Exhibition, Art Gallery, 1893": published by G. 12½ inches high by 15½ inches wide.

Signed in upright capitals in the lower left corner:- "Walter Osborne".

This picture, though carefully studied, has all the freshness and spontaneity of a sketch; and I know of no other which expresses better Osborne's remarkable power of rendering transient effects of light. It is late in the afternoon. The sky is blue, with faint lavender-coloured clouds. The corner house of the street, running at right angles to the pier, is a warm pink with weather-worn blue-green shutters and canopy. The house in the extreme distance is pale green. The woman nearest the spectator wears a rich crimson dress, against which is outlined a black and white Dalmatian dog. The seat behind her is bright green.

This work was shown at the Royal Hibernian Academy exhibition of 1892 (No. 280). An interesting sketch, the first plan of the final picture, is in the National Gallery of Ireland, inscribed in pencil: "Hastings. 20. 11. 91. Clouds working up sky seen through warm clouds cold at base. Glow on houses." The sketch measures 9½ inches high by 7 inches wide.

In the possession of the author.

Signed in the lower left corner:- "W O" and inscribed on the back of the stretcher in Osborne's handwriting:- "The Neglected Garden. W. Osborne. (15 gns.)"

This little picture was evidently begun and finished in the open air. It represents the remnants of a garden swamped by a luxurious, and rather rank-growing, meadow. Behind the hedge, in the distance, is a line of blue hills. The sky is cool grey, painted largely with the palette knife, and its tint is repeated with emphasis in a line of roofs beyond the hedge towards the right. I know of no work of Osborne's painted with more certainty or gusto, and think it must have been begun and finished out of doors. It is remarkable among his landscapes in oils in showing no figure.

Mr. R. Lloyd Praeger, the distinguished Irish botanist, is inclined to think that it was painted towards the end of a hot June. The sow-thistle on the right, the oriental poppies, and the feathered grasses all point, by their state of development to that season. The big dock on the left is rust-red, as it would not normally be till the late autumn. But Mr. Praeger conjectures, in explanation, that the plant withered, by mischance, prematurely.

I cannot trace this picture as having been ever exhibited. It was possibly given to someone by Osborne as a present. I bought it by auction for a trivial sum in 1918. Its authenticity was not then known nor, apparently, suspected.

Oils on canvas.

28 inches high by 36 inches wide.

Signed in the lower left corner, in cursive script:-

This picture is regarded by many as Osborne's masterpiece. I cannot think of any landscape by which he might be more fitly represented.

It was painted at Foxrock, near Dublin, towards the close of summer. The inextricable tangle of weeds and grasses in the foreground is wonderfully rendered both as to line and colour. Black-and-white goats, red-and-white cattle, the blue-shirted boy, the pink-frocked smaller child, the Thornbush itself, are all placed with great skill to emphasise the suggestion of a confused and spacious wilderness. The composition of the picture is as subtle as it is effective. The way in which the paint is laid is accomplished in the extreme; and yet conveys a first impression of delightful, almost careless, ease.

“The Thornbush” was shown at the exhibition of the Royal Academy in 1894 (No. 43), and at the exhibition of the Royal Hibernian Academy in 1895 (No. 47). It was there priced fifty guineas. It was lent by its late owner, Canon Harris, to the Dublin International Exhibition of 1907. A reproduction from a pen-and-ink drawing by the artist appeared in Henry Blackburn's “Academy Notes” for 1894. Another reproduction in half-tone appeared in “The Palace of Fine Arts Souvenir, The Irish International Exhibition 1907, a Folio of Famous Pictures.”

NATHANIEL HONE, R.H.A.
By John Butler Yeats, Esq. R.H.A.

This pencil drawing on paper, measuring 11 inches high by 9 inches wide, was done in 1907. It is in the possession of Miss Jane French, by whose kind permission it is reproduced.

NATHANIEL HONE, R.H.A.

THE Hone family was first heard of in Holland. Some of its members went thence, with the Vanderbilts, to America and helped to found New York. Others, about three hundred years ago, emigrated to Ireland. The Irish branch has produced many painters, including three notable ones; a Lord Mayor of Dublin, several Governors of the Bank of Ireland, and merchants and sportsmen in profusion.

The father of Nathaniel Hone, R.H.A., was a well-known Dublin merchant, and a direct descendant of one Berkeley Hone, a pin manufacturer who was established in business, about the middle of the eighteenth century, on the Dublin quays. This Berkeley was a brother of Nathaniel Hone, a foundation member of the Royal Academy. Nathaniel the first was a painter of great skill, and a character of brilliant and impetuous parts. Such pictures as the portrait of his son Camillus Hone, in the character of "The Piping Boy," now in the National Gallery of Ireland; the self-portrait, recently bequeathed by Mrs. Hone to the same institution; and the superb "Mrs. Blake Foster," in Lord Revelstoke's collection quite justified the high reputation as a painter which he enjoyed in the opinion of the best judges of his generation. After a long and undeserved period of neglect, collectors have recently begun again to clamour for his works.

Nathaniel had another brother, Samuel, who was also an artist, though of far less ability. Horace Hone the miniaturist was Nathaniel's eldest son. His great grand-nephew and namesake, the subject of this memoir, was born at Fitzwilliam Place, Dublin, on October 26th, 1831.

Notwithstanding his family's traditional prowess in the art of painting Nathaniel Hone, the second, studied engineering at Trinity College, Dublin, and commenced life as an engineer. He worked on the making of the Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland and afterwards laid a light line, I think, in Cavan. When these railways were finished he thought for a while of going to South America, or some such foreign part, where important works of constructive engineering were then in progress. But his profession, by constantly bringing him into the open country, and an early passion for yachting, by familiarising him with the sea, must both have done much to develop his latent love of art. In 1853, when he was twenty-two years of age, he abandoned, finally, all projects of going to America and went instead to Paris to study painting.

His first master was Adolphe Yvon, an artist celebrated in his time, who painted large ceremonial pictures and big battle-pieces in a mood of heroic sentiment. One of Yvon's best-known pictures is "The Retreat from Moscow," now in the Nottingham Gallery; another is that of Napoleon III. handing an Imperial Decree to Baron Haussmann, which can be seen in the Hotel de Ville of Paris. Hone selected him as a master on the casual advice of a close friend of his, William Armitage, a brother of Edwin Armitage, R.A. Afterwards, he studied for a while under Thomas Coture, another historical painter, famous for his huge canvas "The Romans of the Decadence," which hangs in the Louvre.

Hone was not a pupil of either of these men in the modern sense of the word. His mature work does not show the slightest trace of their influence nor the slightest sympathy with any of their productions. Neither of them arranged any course of study for him; nor undertook a definite obligation to teach him. The old atelier system which prevailed in his time was worked by some one student, who had a business sense, getting a number of others together, hiring a studio and models on their behalf, and inviting a well-known painter to visit them and criticise their work, once or twice a week. The master got nothing for it except honour and glory, and a vague claim on their votes when the election for the jury of the Salon fell due.

Mention of the names of Yvon and Coture prompted me once to ask Hone if he had started his term of study with the fixed intention of becoming a landscape painter; and he told me that he had worked rigorously for three or four years, drawing and painting from the model and copying in the Louvre, before he even thought of painting landscapes. He was always insistent on the necessity, for a student, of constantly copying from the Old Masters. He held that every painter must learn his craft by copying some of the masterpieces of the great Venetians. In his house were to be seen a number of most careful, yet spirited, copies done by him in his student days. When he died they were sold by auction with his furniture, and not generally recognised as from his hand. Among them were copies of pictures so diverse in style as Murillo's "Beggar Boy"; Gericault's "Equestrian Portrait of M. Dieudonné, an Officer of Chasseurs of the Imperial Guard"; Raphael's "Portrait of a Young Man"; two children and a dog from Veronese's "Supper at Emmaus," and a beautifully painted head of a saint, with a scrap of sunlit, sapphire mountain in the background, from Giorgione's "Holy Family." The originals of all these copies are in the Louvre.

Two of the best of Hone's early copies were retained by Mrs. Hone's executor, acting under the terms of her bequest to the National Gallery of Ireland. Neither, as it happens, are from Venetian paintings; and both are landscapes. One is of Ziem's "Venice," now in the Louvre, and was done when Ziem was a comparatively young and unknown man. The other is of Claude's famous "Vue du pont, effet du Soleil levant." Both were painted when Hone had nothing more to learn from his masters. They show the most careful and competent craftsmanship, and are as fresh and rich in colour to-day as they could have been on the day they were finished. The elaborate architectural drawing of Claude is reproduced with an ease and accuracy which would surprise some of those critics who are pleased to assert that Hone, if a great colourist, was no draughtsman. These two copies must have proved important factors in directing his attention to the pictorial possibilities of landscape.

When his period of study in Paris was over, he moved out to the village of Barbizon, the chosen home of the great contemporary school of French landscape painters, and settled there close to Jean François Millet and Charles Jacque. Thenceforth he devoted himself, almost exclusively, to landscape painting.

This is not the place in which to recall at length his reminiscences of the Barbizon masters. He knew them all well, and his memory of their ways and works remained clear till he died. Millet, he has told me, was glad to sell a picture for forty francs in the early days of their acquaintanceship. The models used to hawk them about to likely purchasers. Corot was more prosperous. He and Hone often dined with each other. Henri Harpignies was his chief friend among the French; and used always to come to the railway station to welcome him back to France, on his return from visits home to Ireland. Rousseau he knew later, when he went to Fontainebleau; but never well, for Rousseau was a morose and solitary man.

Hone stayed in France for seventeen years, living, for the most part, at Barbizon or Fontainebleau. While there he came in touch with the leaders of the Impressionist movement as well as with those of the Barbizon School. He knew Manet in particular, and told me with amusement that Manet was a regular dandy in appearance and looked much more the man of fashion than the artist.

Every painter is affected, whether consciously or unconsciously, willingly or unwillingly, by the achievement of his precursors. Art is a matter of evolution. Yet it is very difficult to say from which of Hone's artistic fore-runners he derived most aid. Felix Ziem, who was only ten years his senior, undoubtedly exercised some slight influence upon his work. So did the Barbizon painters, though, perhaps, to a lesser degree. Manet and the Impressionists did not affect it in any way. After his long residence in France he spent a year and a half in Italy; but neither did any Italian painter perceptibly sway him. Constable's work played a relatively important part in moulding his style. He copied both "The Haywain" and "The Valley Farm" superbly. The latter shows the boldest handling which I have ever seen in a copy. It is painted to a great extent with the palette knife, in the technique so loved by Constable himself. But even Constable had little permanent effect on Hone.

It was not from want of appreciation of the merits of other people's painting that Hone showed such fidelity to the methods he had adopted at the beginning of his career. He had always the greatest interest in, and sympathy with, good painting, no matter in what manner: but he had the sense and character to adhere unswervingly to the way he had found best for the expression of his own personality. The many extant pictures of his early continental period, those scenes from Barbizon, Fontainebleau, and the Mediterranean coast show his work to have been sure and tender, strong and capable, comprehensive and observed, to degrees that young men can seldom attain. His landscapes were never mere excuses for architectural or anecdotal interests. They are filled with sincere emotion without the aid of any sidelong glances at humanity. Mr. C. J. Holmes declares in his admirable book, Notes on the Science of Picture-making, that all great pictures possess in some degree these four qualities : unity, vitality, infinity, and repose. There are very few of Hone's pictures that do not possess, in serene amplitude, all four. It is as a colourist he is pre-eminent, for his art was lyrical or emotional rather than didactic or intellectual. He could draw well, as he proved in many pictures, but he was not primarily concerned with contour nor with detail. The green of the tree delighted him more than its grace; the blue of the sea more than the tracery of its waves; the yellow of the strand more than its curves and folds.

To his deep feeling for the colour of a landscape and his marvellous power to reproduce it, he joined a talent for bold design, a breadth of vision and a vigour of execution that combined to lift him to a foremost place among the landscape painters of his age, no matter what their country.

While in France, Hone sent nothing to Irish exhibitions. He exhibited in the Salons of 1867, '68, and '69, sending in all six pictures. He showed one picture, and one only, in the Royal Academy. This was sent in 1869 from No. 44, Rue Notre Dame de Lorette and was entitled simply a "Study from Nature." It was "skied." Mrs. French, who remembers seeing it on exhibition, tells me that it represented a sunny courtyard enlivened with a flight of pigeons. One of the pictures forming part of Mrs. Hone's bequest to the Irish National Gallery answers to this description.

When he returned home from his long absence abroad he settled down at Malahide, Co. Dublin, where he resided until the end of his life. He contributed to the exhibitions of the Royal Hibernian Academy; to those of the Dublin Art Club, during its brief existence between 1886 and 1895; and, occasionally, to various loan exhibitions at home and abroad; sending paintings first from Seaford, in 1876, then from Moldowney in 1894, and after 1895 from Saint Doulough's Park, which he inherited from his uncle. He lived there quietly, occupying himself with painting and farming. Many of his finest pictures are from scenes in the neighbourhood. Of these the best and best-known are "The Pasture at Malahide" in the National Gallery of Ireland, and the "Evening, Malahide Sands" in the Dublin Municipal Gallery, both of which were presentations by himself. "The Pasture at Malahide" was admitted into the National Collection in 1907 during the lifetime of its artist, and it is the only picture that was ever so distinguished.

He married in 1872 Magdalene, daughter of John Jameson. They had no children, but enjoyed a happy married life of great mutual devotion for forty-five years. Though Mrs. Hone was twelve years' younger than her husband she died within eighteen months of his death.

Between the Royal Hibernian Academy exhibitions of 1879 and 1880 Hone was elected to both the Associateship and the full membership of the Academy. In 1894 he was elected its Professor of Painting, on the death of Sir Thomas A. Jones, the President, his predecessor in the office. He held the professorship until his own death in 1917.

Irish scenes were but a part and that, perhaps, not the greater part of Hone's work. He travelled much in his prime and painted beautiful things in England, from Norfolk to Devon; in France, from the Norman Coast to the Riviera; and in Italy, Turkey, Holland, Greece, and Egypt. On all the walls, and in most of the corners, of his house at Saint Doulough's Park were splendid pieces brought home from these various journeyings. Pictures of the Portico of the Priestesses on the Acropolis, of the woods at Bougival, of the Sphinx, of the shore at Scheveningen, and of the Porte d'Aval at Étretat proved his capacity to translate the most diverse climes and subjects into masterpieces of painting. He had a special fancy for Egypt as a painting ground; and when I last saw him he spoke to me of his intention (which unfortunately he did not live to fulfil) of working up some of his Egyptian sketches during the coming winter. An excellent example of his Egyptian work is the view on the Nile in blazing sunlight which was part of Sir Hugh Lane's bequest to the Municipal Gallery of Dublin.

Because he was a rich man and chose to live his life in his own simple fashion, painting for pure love of his art and courting neither fame nor money, an idea obtained for a long time in his own country, where gross ignorance of all that concerns art is so prevalent, that he was only a gifted amateur. His finished pictures seldom found purchasers even at the modest prices he was accustomed to ask for them. I think £60 was his maximum price, one very seldom sought; and his minimum was £15, at which figure pictures of Villefranche, Bundoran, and Portmarnock were offered by him as late as 1909. His sketches in oils were often to be had for as little as £5, at the Dublin Art Club exhibitions. Towards the end of his career, when he had ceased to paint much, there were signs of better sense among the public. He still continued to send annually three or four pictures, the work of earlier times, to the Hibernian Academy; but they were not offered for sale. The moment they became difficult to obtain they were eagerly desired.

His output was copious, yet the number of his paintings publicly exhibited in his lifetime did not, I think, nearly total two hundred. Of these probably not more than one hundred have passed into private possession. It was generally rumoured, soon after his death, that Mrs. Hone intended to bequeath her collection of his work to the Irish National Gallery. But even those who knew him best were scarcely prepared for the quality and extent of her bequests. The collection comprised no fewer than five hundred and fifty works in oils; eight hundred and eighty-seven water-colours, nearly one hundred of which have separate scenes painted on the reverse; and seventeen sheets of miscellaneous studies. The bequests are couched in the following, not too clear, terms: "I bequeath to the Governors and Guardians of the National Gallery of Ireland Paintings and Pictures at Saint Doulough's the works of my late husband Nathaniel Hone, such Paintings and such Pictures to be selected by the said William George Jameson" (her brother and executor). "Dermod O'Brien, R.H.A., and James Wilcox, Esq., to act as advisors to him. If any question arises on this bequest, the decision shall be left to the said William George Jameson." . . . "I bequeath to the National Gallery, London, two good pictures by my late husband to be selected by the said William George Jameson." Mrs. Hone also left the sum of £1500 to be used towards providing such additional accommodation in the Irish National Gallery as this accretion to its contents would make necessary.

At the time of writing the final selection from these pictures has not been made. It is not yet settled, whether the trustee shall retain the complete collection for the nation, as apparently he has power to do, or whether some portion of it shall be sold with a view to enhancing Hone's fame outside his native country, and to providing additional accommodation, so badly needed, for the gallery. Pending a decision on these difficult points, the whole collection has been removed for safe keeping to the National Gallery, but no portion of it has yet been shown to the public. It covers all phases of Hone's activity. Through the courtesy of Mr. Dermod O'Brien I am enabled to print in an appendix the complete catalogue which he has so carefully compiled.

The section of this catalogue which will surprise everybody is that devoted to water-colours. I have never seen a water-colour drawing by Hone exhibited. Indeed, though I had several times visited his house and been shown his pictures by himself, I had never been shown, nor seen, any of his water-colours. Mine was the common experience of those who knew him much more intimately than I did. We had all heard that he painted in water-colour : but when he was questioned about this branch of his art he used to put us off by growling good-humouredly, "Ah! only studies! Little watery blots!"

The water-colours are nothing more than studies in intention, but they have in quintessential degrees many of the qualities of great art. They are mostly small, measuring on an average four and seven-eighth inches by six and three-quarter inches; and are done, obviously, with slashing rapidity and from a palette of not more than three or four tints. Nevertheless, in accuracy of drawing and brilliancy of colour they are completely satisfying. They convey the stark power of the man who did them as vividly as do any of his most carefully considered masterpieces. The germ of all his great pictures is to be found among these sketches. They were the vital sparks that set on fire the memory and imagination which he brought to making of his large oil paintings.

The oil paintings bequeathed constitute a wonderful achievement. In number alone they form an impressive life work. In merit, almost any one of them entitles their author to take rank as a notable artist.

They cannot easily be classified into periods. Hone was a master of his medium from the start of his career; though his mastery grew with time and can be traced in steady progression from the firm, if slightly too deliberate, handling of his Barbizon days, to the culminating grace and strength shown in the closing years of the last century and the opening ones of this.

His best work is painted in rich, liquid pigment, laid on thinly and boldly, with that caressing ease which only comes through ceaseless effort. With the matured technique may be noticed a tendency to simplification in subject and composition, and that love and understanding of loneliness which age often brings to great men.

His water-colours are never signed. His oil paintings often bear the simple initials NH. A few are signed in full. I have seen pictures by him on which the signature was scratched; and one which was signed with a pen and ink. The superb work which he presented to the Royal Irish Yacht Club is signed "N Hone, R H A"; and the "Evening, Malahide Sands," which he presented to the Dublin Municipal Gallery is signed "Nathl Hone R.H.A." But he followed no principle in the matter. Many of his best things, and in particular the unsurpassed "Pasture at Malahide," which he presented to the National Gallery of Ireland, are not even initialled.

All the oil paintings in Mrs. Hone's bequest are landscapes, as are most of the water-colours. On the reverse of very many of the latter are careful pencil sketches of cows in every posture. Among the sheets of studies are several excellent drawings of figures. One, of peasants in a French farm-cart, deserves particular attention.

It is curious to observe how little interest Hone showed in figure painting, which his rigorous apprenticeship had made him so competent to practice. He seldom, and only in his early period, introduced human figures into his landscapes, though when he did so the figures left nothing to be desired. I only know of one oil painting by him which might fairly be called a figure-pièce. Sir George Brooke owns this, a small picture of a peasant girl, "Rosalie," which is wholly delightful.

His painting of Saint Patrick and his companions, a lunette twenty feet long and eight feet high, done for the decoration of a ward in Sir Patrick Dun's Hospital, Dublin, where it may be seen at present, is unique in another fashion. It was painted for the Kyrle Society and first shown in the Dublin Art Club exhibition of 1889, entitled "Saint Patrick." The title it bears to-day is "Saint Patrick with Seven Missionaries take the form of Deer to pass through a Hostile Country." The central figure is a magnificent stag of fourteen points, leading a little herd of smaller stags and does through an autumn-coloured glen. Two huge snakes occupy the corners of the composition. The design is a most striking one, and the painting is vigorous in the extreme. It is on canvas. But it is now a ruin, blackened almost beyond hope of restoration, as are the works of other artists, which form part of the same decorative scheme. Possibly the ward in which they are placed was disinfected at some time with a chemical injurious to paint.

The Hone bequests will, no doubt, cause much stir when they come to be set on view in London and Dublin. They will also make those who knew and revered Hone as an artist in his lifetime, regretful that he did not live to enjoy the honours which he deserved. No one could have been more genuinely modest than he was about his own work. But he was too great an artist not to know its worth, and it would be nonsense to pretend that the public distaste for it did not affect him. The artist who declares he is indifferent to his audience denies the first cause and reason of his art. Hone was frankly pleased when anyone showed an honest admiration of his painting: and he was frankly disturbed at the prospect of any of it falling into unsympathetic ownership. He himself said as much to me when we were discussing the raffling of one of his seascapes for some charity. His feeling on the matter is further shown in the story told by a relation of his to whom he presented six pictures and who treated these pictures with proper respect, having them handsomely framed, and installing a special system of lighting to display them in the evening. Hone was so touched and pleased by this unusual appreciation that he sent a gift of six more pictures to his discriminating and fortunate kinsman.

Had he been given during his lifetime the honour which was his due, and which will soon be paid in part to his memory, he had almost certainly responded to the stimulus by surpassing even the best of his existing work.

There were a few who always knew him for what he was. The late Mr. John Jameson, Mr. George, Mr. Andrew, and Mr. William Jameson, Sir George Brooke, Bart.; Lieutenant-General Sir H. M. Lawson, and Mr. John Quin of New York have each acquired many excellent examples of his art. His fellow-artists never failed to recognise his merit.

One of them, Miss Purser, H.R.H.A., organised in 1901 an exhibition of his works and those of Mr. John Butler Yeats, R.H.A., in the latter's studio at 6, Stephen's Green, Dublin. Twenty-eight of Hone's pictures were there shown. These, with six exceptions, were lent by the artist himself. Five of the six exceptions were the property of practising artists. Mr. George Moore contributed to the catalogue a rather overbearing prefatory note entitled "Modern Landscape Painters—apropos of Mr. Hone." He declared that Mr. Hone's painting was "not very special," that "the influence of France is not apparent in his work," but that it was "more interesting than Maris." He was sure that "we do not find in Mr. Hone that intensity of observation which is necessary in cultured art." Mr. Moore now, twenty years after, would probably wish to revise these rash opinions.

A critic of more discrimination, the late Sir Hugh Lane, constantly visited this exhibition, and was from thenceforth an ardent admirer of the artist's work and one whose admiration I know was particularly valued by the artist. No one did more to spread Hone's reputation.

In the exhibition of the works of Irish artists which Lane organised at the London Guildhall in 1904 Hone was represented by nine works. At the Franco-British Exhibition of 1908 Lane displayed fifteen. He failed, it is true, to convince the trustees of the National Gallery of British Art at Milbanke that they should have Hone worthily represented in such a collection. But the Ministry of Fine Arts in Paris showed no such fatuity, and one of his best works is to be seen in the Luxembourg. Lane, in 1908, presented his picture "The Derelict" to the Scottish Modern Art Association, who show it from time to time in the Scottish National Gallery, and in the art galleries of Glasgow, Dundee, Stirling, and Aberdeen. Another picture by him hangs in that Municipal Gallery of Modern Art which Johannesburg owes to Lane's taste and energy. The University of Wisconsin acquired, in 1914, through the generosity of Mr. Frank Cantwell, his "Ships on the Beach." The Dublin Municipal Gallery is very rich in Hone's work. It holds ten examples, of which five were presentations from Lane in his life or by his will. The unsuitable temporary premises in which they are housed prevents them from being properly seen.

No other public honour of any kind was paid to Hone during his long life. He died on October the 14th, 1917, at the patriarchal age of eighty-seven, almost unknown beyond the circle of his acquaintances.

At least six portraits in oil of him exist. The earliest of these is a small painting, signed "Ed. Brandon, 1870," which was done in Paris and is a very attractive piece of work—Jacob-Edouart Brandon was a well-known pupil of Picot and of Corot. It is reputed to be an excellent likeness of Hone at the time. He is bearded, wears a dark coat, light trousers, and high-heeled French boots, and leans back in a red armchair smoking a pipe. On the wall behind him hangs a sombre canvas in a massive frame. At his left hand is a case stuffed with portfolios and papers. This portrait is in the possession of Hone's heir, Mr. Herbert Hone, who also owns a pen-and-ink sketch for it, dated 1868. The next portrait, in chronological order, is an important and pleasing three-quarter length done by Walter Osborne, R.H.A., in the "eighteen nineties." This, too, is in Mr. Herbert Hone's possession. Miss Elsie Hone owns another portrait by Osborne, a charming small picture depicting Hone, wearing a hat and seated in a bright garden. It was presented by the artist to Mrs. Hone. The next, a half-length, was done by Sir William Orpen, R.A., to the order of Sir Hugh Lane in 1907, and was presented by the latter to the Dublin Municipal Gallery of Modern Art. It is an able sketch, but does not do justice to its subject. It was painted in the Dublin Metropolitan School of Art, at a single sitting. Two other portraits, a half-length and a bust, were painted by Mr. Wilcox in the year before Mr. Hone's death. One of these is in the possession of Mr. Herbert Hone; the other is at present lent by the artist to the Dublin Municipal Gallery. In my opinion neither is good as likeness or as picture, but it is only fair to add that my opinion on this point has been disputed. Miss Jane French possesses two pencil sketches by Mr. John Butler Yeats, R.H.A., which give an even better idea of the man than do any of the more elaborate works. She has kindly allowed me to reproduce the more characteristic of the pair.

Mr. Dermot O'Brien, soon after Hone's death, commissioned Mr. Oliver Shepperd, R.H.A., to do a posthumous portrait, in the form of a bronze medallion eighteen inches in diameter. This was cast in September, 1920. Technically, it is an excellent piece of modelling: but, like most posthumous portraits, it is not entirely successful as a likeness.

Of Hone's personality, I, who knew him so slightly, am not the one to speak. I may say, however, that whenever I met him his charming simple ways, his superb gifts as an artist, his great age and venerable appearance produced in me a feeling of reverence which will not soon, nor easily, be forgotten. I think it is a privilege to be able to close this book with a tribute of profound admiration for the artist and the man—NATHANIEL HONE.

PASTURE AT MALAHIDE.

In the National Gallery of Ireland. (No. 588).

Presented by the artist in 1907.

Oils on canvas.

32½ inches high by 49 inches wide.

Unsigned.

The heavy rain cloud to the right is of a reddish hue, merging into cool purple grey. There is a little clean blue sky in the left upper corner. A burst of sunlight illuminates the ploughed upland. The long grove of trees in the background is dark, luscious green, composed mainly of a mixture of chrome yellow and ivory black. The patches of ragweed scattered through the pasture are painted with the same colour. The cows are red and white.

The work was done very rapidly and dexterously with fluid paint richly, but thinly, laid. The canvas shows through the paint here and there, particularly, and designedly, in the cow to the extreme left.

This picture was shown by the artist in the exhibition of works by Irish painters organized by Sir Hugh Lane at the Art Gallery of the Corporation of London in 1904, (No. 25), and in the Irish International Exhibition, Dublin 1907, (No. 80). Its measurements in the official catalogue of both these exhibitions vary slightly from those given above, and were evidently "sight" measurements.

It was reproduced in half-tone in "The Palace of Fine Arts Souvenir, The Irish International Exhibition 1907, a Folio of Famous Pictures." It is also reproduced in half-tone in the official catalogue of the National Gallery of Ireland.

"The Pasture at Malahide" is generally recognized to be the artist's masterpiece.

This picture was done in or about the year 1872, the year of the artist's marriage. I do not know any other work of his more sumptuous in colour. The sky is a hot summer sky veiled with opalescent mist. The sea is warm blue. The cliff in the background runs from shades of pink to biscuit, with high lights of white. Its hollows and crest are violet-grey. The strand fringing the bay is yellow-brown, barred with heavy brown shades. The undergrowth is yellowish green. The tree trunks are clear grey in their high lights. The foliage of the trees is a bluish green. The figure of a woman in the middle distance was probably sketched from Mrs. Hone, who appears in several of the artist's watercolours done about this time.

This picture was never exhibited. Mrs. Hone allowed me to choose it, after her husband's death, from a selection of almost all the works by him then in her possession.

The grey, clouded sky, has slight touches of pure blue. The sea is grey-green. The rocks in the middle distance are warm brown, with splashes of ochre weed. The rocks in the foreground are slate blue, with a patch of yellow-green weed under the flying bird.

I believe this picture was exhibited at the exhibition in aid of the Belgian Relief Fund held, in 1915, at the Royal Hibernian Academy. If so, it was then entitled "Near Kilkee". But Hone painted and exhibited so many pictures with similar titles, that it is impossible, in most cases, to be sure of their identification.

This picture was not in Saint Doulough's Park when he died, but in his house "Moldowney", at Malahide.

A wet afternoon sky rises above a line of blue hills which are lost in the left distance. Warm pink light shines from the slopes facing the right. The bog in the middle distance is red-brown, with soft, very vivid, light yellow-green growth in the cutaway hollow. The foreground is blue-purple with bright touches of pure blue, and yellow rushes.

This picture was acquired by Sir George Brooke from the artist, and exhibited by him at the Irish Art Gallery, Ballymaclinton, in the Franco-British Exhibition of 1908, (No. 56): at the Whitechapel Art Gallery 1913, (No. 109): and in the Royal Hibernian Academy exhibition 1917, (No. 34).

This picture is painted almost entirely in two colours, an astonishingly fine green and a dark purplish grey. The deer, the tree trunks, the branches and the boundary fence are all in the latter colour. The little portion of sky shown is overcast. Though so few colours are used Hone has divided them into an infinity of tints, obtaining an amazing effect of depth and recession.

This picture may be the one exhibited at the Salon of 1869 under the title "Lisière de bois". It was acquired from the artist by Sir George Brooke, and exhibited by him in the Irish International Exhibition of 1907, (No. 132), in the exhibition of the works of Irish painters organized by Sir Hugh Lane at the Corporation of London Art Gallery in 1908, (No. 39): and at the Whitechapel Art Gallery in 1913, (No. 115).

THE SPHINX AND PYRAMID.

Part of Mrs. Hone's bequest to the National Gallery of Ireland.

Not yet exhibited.

No. 557 in Mr. Dermod O'Brien's catalogue of the Hone Bequest.

Watercolour on cartridge paper, taken from one of the artist's sketch books.

$4\frac{7}{8}$ inches high by $6\frac{3}{4}$ inches wide.

Unsigned.

This is one of the artist's working sketches, the existence of some thousand of which was hardly suspected before his death. It is painted in the most rapid, cursory manner possible; probably not more than three colours—cobalt, light red and yellow ochre—being employed. Hone was accustomed to speak depreciatingly of such sketches as "little watery blots", yet they give ample evidence of his artistry. An important picture, now in the National Gallery of Ireland but not yet exhibited there, was painted from this sketch.

AN OASIS.

Part of Mrs. Hone's bequest to the National Gallery of Ireland.

Not yet exhibited.

No. 572 in Mr. Dermod O'Brien's catalogue of the Hone Bequest.

Watercolour on cartridge paper, taken from one of the artist's sketch books.

$4\frac{7}{8}$ inches high by $6\frac{3}{4}$ inches wide.

Unsigned.

The same description of colour and technique applies to this sketch as to the one reproduced above.

APPENDIX I.

BIBLIOGRAPHY.

The following are the principal books consulted on the lives and works of Barret, O'Connor, Osborne and Hone. They are, with few exceptions, very meagre in their information. I think that I have, in this book, set out all the facts they contain, and corrected many of their more patent errors :—

An Authentic History of the Professors of Painting, Sculpture and Architecture, who have Painted in Ireland. By Antony Pasquin, London. No date.

("Antony Pasquin" was John Williams, not unfairly described by Macaulay as "a malignant and filthy baboon." The Authentic History was published in 1796.)

Anecdotes of Painters who have Resided or been Born in England. By Edward Edwards, A.R.A. London, 1808.

A Dictionary of Painters. By the Rev. M. Pilkington, A.M. With additions by Henry Fuseli, R.A. London, 1810.

(Matthew Pilkington was Vicar of Doneraile, Co. Dublin. An earlier edition of his work, published in 1798, contained a supplement by James Barry, R.A.)

A Dictionary of Recent and Living Painters. By Henry Ottley. London, 1866.

A Critical and Commercial Dictionary of the Works of Painters. By Fredrick Peter Seguier. London, 1870.

A Dictionary of Artists of the English School. By Samuel Redgrave. 1874.

Cyclopædia of Painters and Painting. By J. D. Champlin and C. C. Perkins. London and New York, 1888.

Art Sales. By George Redford, F.R.C.S. London, 1888.

A Century of Painters of the English School. By Richard and Samuel Redgrave. London, 1890. (Second edition.)

A History of the Old Watercolour Society. By L. Roget. London, 1891.

A Dictionary of Artists who exhibited in London, 1760-1893. By Algernon Graves, F.S.A. London, 1895.

The Royal Academy Exhibition, 1709-1914. By Algernon Graves, F.S.A. London, 1905-1906.

The Society of Artists and the Free Society. By Algernon Graves, F.S.A. London, 1907.

The British Institution, 1806-1867. By Algernon Graves, F.S.A. London, 1908.

A Century of Loan Exhibitions, 1813-1912. By Algernon Graves, F.S.A. London, 1913-1914.

Art Sales. By Algernon Graves, F.S.A. London. Vol. I. 1918. In course of publication.

(All Mr. Graves' works are monuments of accurate industry.)

The Royal Academy and its Members. By J. E. Hodgson, R.A. and Fred A. Eaton, M.A. London, 1905.

Bryant's Dictionary of Painters and Engravers. Revised by George C. Williamson, Litt.D. London, 1913-1915.

A Dictionary of Irish Artists. By W. G. Strickland. Dublin, 1913. (An essential book for all serious students of Irish Art.)

Imaginations and Reveries. By A.E. Dublin, 1915. (Contains a short appreciation of some of Hone's pictures.)

The Dictionary of National Biography. London.

Capt. Stephen Gwynn has written a pleasant account of Walter Osborne in an essay entitled "Garden Wisdom," which will have appeared in The Englishwoman before the publication of this book.

APPENDIX II.

WORKS BY GEORGE BARRET, R.A. FORMING PART OF PUBLIC COLLECTIONS.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY OF IRELAND.

174. POWERSCOURT WATERFALL. 3 ft. 3½ in. H., 4 ft. 2 in. W. The Waterfall is seen through trees which occupy the foreground.
175. VIEW NEAR OVOCA, IN THE COUNTY WICKLOW. 1 ft. 10 in. H. 2 ft. 4¼ in. W. The river flowing between precipitous rocks, at the foot of which is a wooden stage or wharf and a water wheel connected with the machinery of a mine above. Both purchased in 1880. They are examples of his earlier style.

(From the Official Catalogue.)

Note.—Both these pictures were purchased at "Christie's" in 1880: No. 174 for £23 1s. and No. 175 for £13 13s.

Note.—A third oil-painting by Barret,

- A LANDSCAPE WITH A RIVER IN THE FOREGROUND, is to be found in the cellars of the National Gallery, though no mention of it appears in the current official catalogue. It is a large, dull work, measuring 3 ft. 2 in. by 4 ft. 4 in. It was presented by Thomas S. Berry, I.L.D.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY OF BRITISH ART.— VICTORIA AND ALBERT MUSEUM.

WATER-COLOUR AND OTHER DRAWINGS.

- 1722--'71. LANDSCAPE WITH RIVER AND FIGURES. 14¼ in. by 21¼ in.
Signed and dated 1782. William Smith Gift.

- 344—'72. TREES AND HORSES. The horses are by Sawrey Gilpin, R.A., q.v.
 13½ in. by 10½ in. Dated 1872. In circulation.
- 257—'75. LANDSCAPE, WITH RIVER, AND HORSES WATERING. 14⅝ in.
 by 21 in.
- 191—'14. A LAKE SCENE. Indian ink. 9¼ in. by 14½ in. In circulation.
Given by Mr. J. E. Taylor.

(From the Official Catalogue.)

Note.—Numbers 1722 and 257 are illustrated in this book. No. 1772 was illustrated in the first edition of The Earlier English Water-Colour Painters by Cosmo Monkhouse (1890), but not in the subsequent edition. It is signed by "G. Barrett, 1872."

THE BRITISH MUSEUM: DEPARTMENT OF PRINTS AND DRAWINGS.

- I. LANDSCAPE WITH FIGURES. A torrent foaming from rocky, tree-hung heights, crowned with a castle, r., into a deep hollow, the view of which is intercepted by a high bank in the foreground, l., A road leads down to the hollow, and a shepherd drives his sheep along it, while a man and woman are seated at the roadside, r.; in the distance a wooded plain and an isolated mountain. Water-colours. 14¼ in. x 20¾ in. Purchased August, 1861.
(From the Official Catalogue of Drawings by British Artists. Vol. I.)

UNCATALOGUED ETCHINGS.

(From particulars kindly given by Cambell Dodgson, Esq., O.B.E., Keeper of the Department of Prints and Drawings.)

- I. A set of five, uniform in size and appearance, with a border-line (about 5 in. x 7½ in.) some way inside the plate mark. The titles are:—
- (a) ON THE HARROW ROAD.
 - (b) SOUTHALL.
 - (c) THE GREEN MAN, HARROW ROAD.
 - (d) WILLESDEN CHURCH, MIDDLESEX.
 - (e) MICKLEHAM CHURCH, SURREY.
- (a) and (b) are in two states: 1st, before letters; 2nd, with the title engraved in centre at foot of plate, in open letters, and with "Etched by George Barrett" in italics on the right. (c), (d) and (e) are before letters. The plates measure about 5¼ in. x 7⅞ in.

2. NORBURY PARK, with groups of horses under trees. Plate size, $8\frac{1}{8}$ in. x $11\frac{1}{8}$ in. In two states : before letters and with "Norbury Park" in centre, and "Etched by G. Barrett" in italics on right, similar to left, but without border-line.
3. LANDSCAPE (unnamed). A stream flowing between great oaks through a wooded dell. Two men on the right bank, one standing, the other seated. No signature or name. $8\frac{1}{2}$ in. x $11\frac{1}{4}$ in. to outer border-line (of several), cut within plate mark. Bought in 1852 with Set 1 in first state. (In the opinion of Mr. Dodgson, the attribution to Barret is correct.)
4. TWO VIEWS, numbered 3 and 4, entitled, "A View of Part of Hawarden Castle in Flintshire" and "A View of Hawarden Castle in Flintshire." With engraved inscription: "G. Baret delint. et fecit. Published March 1st, 1773 by J. Boydell, Engraver in Cheapside, London." Plate, 9 in. x $11\frac{1}{2}$ in. Subject, $8\frac{1}{2}$ in. x $10\frac{3}{4}$ in.
5. A LARGE ETCHING. Three impressions. One bears at foot an old manuscript inscription: "An Etching, by the late George Baret, of Roach Abbey, Yorkshire (a proof)." This print differs from the second state only by containing a few very lightly etched pieces of foliage between the branches of a tree; and certain scribbles with the needle outside the border-line, which have been cleaned away before the more neatly printed second state was issued. The latter has no inscription. Size of plate, 14 in. x 19 in. Size of subject to border-line, $12\frac{3}{8}$ in. x $17\frac{7}{8}$ in. The two impressions of the second state differ in showing various parts of the faint scribblings visible in the first state; but, in Mr. Dodgson's opinion, these scribblings were not actually removed from the plate, but only prevented, in unequal degrees, from printing.

THE FITZWILLIAM MUSEUM, CAMBRIDGE.

7. THE FALLS OF CLYDE.

Note.—This picture is attributed to Barret in the Official Catalogue. It is unsigned, and Mr. Sydney Cockrell, the Director of the Gallery, tells me that it was formerly attributed to Richard Wilson, R.A. I have never seen the original; but a photograph which Mr. Cockrell very kindly sent me leads me to believe that the present attribution is correct.

SIR JOHN SOANE'S MUSEUM, LONDON.

(From information kindly given by the Curator, Arthur Bolton, Esq., F.S.A., F.R.I.B.A.)

1. VIEW IN MR. LOCK'S PARK, LEATHERHEAD. 12½ in. x 9½ in. Sepia and Chinese white (?) touches in parts.
2. WATER-COLOUR : A MAN ROLLING GRASS ON A LAWN : WITH ORNAMENTAL TREES. 7 in. x 11 in. Blue, green and brown in pale washes.
3. PENCIL PORTRAIT OF THE ARTIST. 7½ in. x 11 in. On rough paper. Slight. Side view seated figure in wood chair with rush seat. Dress : Knee-breeches, wig (?) with pigtail. Palette and brushes in hand.

Note.—These drawings formerly hung in different rooms of Sir John Soane's house, 13 Lincoln's Inn Fields. They are now hung together in the anteroom. They are mentioned in the current catalogue of the Museum, but are not fully described. No. 3 is illustrated in this book.

CITY OF NOTTINGHAM ART GALLERY.

23. LANGDALE PIKES, WESTMORELAND. In the foreground is a party of sportsmen with horses and dogs, waiting to cross Lake Elterwater. Canvas height, 67¼ in.; width, 48 in. Signed "G. Barrett" and dated 1777. Reg. No. '04—10, Richard Godson Milnes' Bequest. Figures and animals are by Sawrey Gilpin.

(From the Official Catalogue.)

Note.—The picture is actually signed "G. Barret."

THE WALKER ART GALLERY, LIVERPOOL.

(From information kindly given by the Curator, A. G. Quigley, Esq.)

- POWERSCOURT WATERFALL. According to the old catalogues, this picture was painted for Edmund Burke. In them it is described as a "Waterfall called the Dargle." 3 ft. 3 in. x 4 ft. 1 in.

Note.—Not mentioned in the current official catalogue.

APPENDIX V.

A SELECTION OF THE PRICES REALISED FOR WORKS BY GEORGE BARRET, R.A., AT AUCTION SALES SINCE HIS DEATH.

Note.—No painter of his time has fallen further in public repute than has George Barret, R.A., if auction prices be a fair criterion of public opinion. Only five times since his death has a picture by him realised more than £100. The following list does not include all sale records in my possession. But it may be taken as representative:—inclusive of many of the best-known of his pictures and of both the highest and lowest prices his pictures have fetched. Sale catalogues are so seldom accurate in their allocation of water-colour drawings between George Barret, R.A. and his son, George Barret, that I have judged it better to exclude all reference to water-colours from the subjoined list, as such would only lead to confusion. The water-colours attributed to George Barret, R.A., in George Redford's Art Sales, published in 1888, should all be assigned to George Barret, junior.

The particulars not appearing in the Catalogue, I owe, for the most part, to the courtesy of Mrs. Duncan, the Curator of the Gallery.

APPENDIX XI.

WORKS BY WALTER FREDRICK OSBORNE, R.H.A., EXHIBITED IN HIS LIFETIME.

Note.—The particulars in this appendix are derived, largely, from Osborne's own catalogues, which were presented by his mother soon after his death to the National Gallery of Ireland. Osborne was an excellent business man, and his collection of the catalogues of those exhibitions in which his own work was shown is almost complete. This is fortunate, for it is a regrettable fact that those in control of public libraries, including even the British Museum, do not bother to complete sets of catalogues of important, picture exhibitions. The want of anything like a complete set of catalogues of Irish picture exhibitions has proved an immense difficulty in the preparation of this book.

Osborne, as will be seen, was accustomed to keep his unsold pictures moving about. I have noted, as far as is possible without making this appendix unduly bulky, the various peregrinations of each individual work during his lifetime; and have, with that object, begun this appendix with the record of pictures shown by him at the exhibitions of the Royal Hibernian Academy. For these exhibitions, sooner or later, included the majority of his principal works.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

Note.—Mr. W. G. Strickland, in his admirable Dictionary of Irish Artists, refers to the following four pictures as having been exhibited by Osborne at Newcastle-on-Tyne :—

1894. A TOUCH OF WINTER.

A WARM THOROUGHFARE.

Note.—Query: "A Narrow Thoroughfare"?

1895. WHEN THE BOATS COME IN.

GALWAY FISHWIVES.

Mr. Strickland tells me he cannot now trace the references. Nor can I. Further, I have written to Mr. W. S. Morgan, the Secretary of the North British Academy of Arts, who, after search and many enquiries, cannot find any catalogues of exhibitions held in these years at Newcastle-on-Tyne. Messrs. Mawson, Swan and Morgan, the well-known local Art Dealers, also write to me :—"We regret we have no record of Exhibitions of pictures held in Newcastle. It is just possible that the pictures referred to were exhibited in what was known as the Old Art Gallery, which was purely a private concern. It has been out of existence for many years, and we do not know of any record of the pictures exhibited." The collection of Osborne's own catalogues in the National Library of Ireland does not include any of Newcastle-on-Tyne. I repeat Mr. Strickland's information, confident that it is founded on fact.

AFTER long, almost heartbreaking delay, the promise given to Sir Hugh Lane that the modern pictures he presented to the City of Dublin would be housed in an adequate gallery is to be fulfilled. Mr. Blythe has informed Miss Purser, Hon. Secretary of the Friends of the National Collections, that the fine building known as Charlemont House, with sufficient land behind it for a gallery, would be offered to the City Commissioners for this purpose. We think all parties to this are to be congratulated. Lady Gregory, who has made so long a fight that the ideals of her nephew should be realised; Miss Purser, who brought her unique powers of conversation and argument to stir up the lethargic; the Friends of the National Collections, who had this project much at heart; the Government, who have made the contribution of a fine building and land, which eases very much the financial problem for the City Commissioners. We have no doubt the Commissioners will accept the offer, and that a gallery will be built which will display to best advantage the pictures collected with such rare taste by Sir Hugh Lane. When the gallery is built it will remove the last shred of argument left to those on the other side of the Channel for the retention of the other pictures donated to Dublin by Sir Hugh in the codicil to his will. We believe the extraordinary official arguments put forward for the retention of the pictures affect honourable men and women in Great Britain very disagreeably. They feel that the whole business was rather crooked, and we have no doubt when the gallery in Dublin is built that they will bring whatever influence they can exert on the Government to restore the pictures to the city to which Sir Hugh Lane bequeathed them.

Chicago Furnishes Irish Money's Model

Sir John Lavery, noted painter, who drew figure which appears on Irish Free State notes, and his wife, formerly Hazel Martyn of Chicago, who was his model.
