POST OFFICE INQUIRY. We commence in this day's Journal the debate in the Senate on the extraordinary resolu tion offered by Mr. Grundy, and finally adopted, in a modified, but scarcely less exceptionable form, on the subject of a limitation of the powers confided to the Select Committee appointed to investigate the condition of the General Post Office Department. The history of this discussion is too curious to be omitted among the records of the times. After the second speech delivered by Mr. Clayton, which we shall be able to lay before our readers in a few days, and for which we, in anticipation, solicit their serious attention, and while Mr. Holmes was maby a prompt rerusal. It was evidently made under the influence of a powerful apprehension of the effect which was likely to be produced on the public mind by the circulation abroad of the facts divided within the walls of the Senate. Mr Holmes persevered in his speech; the application for quarter—for a termination of the fight, was made again on the next day; and the request, urged, not literally with trembling, but doubtless with fear, was again unsuccessful. The minority of the committee-a minority of which any Committee choice of Stephen Mazurcan Esq.
